14–15 One of the women was from Thyatira, a city of western Asia Minor. It had been part of the ancient kingdom of Lydia before its incorporation into the Roman province of Asia; hence the woman was called Lydia (or, perhaps, "the Lydian lady"). Thyatira was famous for making purple dyes and for dyeing clothes—industries that were mostly carried on by women at home. Lydia had come to Philippi to carry on her trade. She was a "God-fearer," having doubtless received instruction at a synagogue in her native Thyatira. She was likely either a widow or unmarried, and some of the women gathered for worship were relatives and servants living in her home. As she listened, God opened her heart to the Christian message and "she and the members of her household were baptized." Then she urged the missionary party to stay at her home, which they did.

From such small beginnings the church at Philippi began. To judge from his letter to the Philippians, it was one of Paul's most-loved congregations. Luke, as suggested above, was probably involved in the establishment and growth of this church. Soon, it seems, Lydia's home became the center for Christian outreach and worship in Philippi (cf. 16:40).

3. The demon-possessed girl (16:16–18)

16 One day on their way to the Jewish place of prayer, the missionaries were met by a slave girl possessed by a demonic spirit. Undoubtedly all who knew the girl regarded her as neither fraudulent nor insane but one who could foretell the future. By her fortune-telling, she earned her masters much money.

17–18 As the girl followed Paul and his companions around, she kept on screaming out: "These men are servants of the Most High God, who are telling you the way to be saved" (cf. Mk 1:24; 3:11; 5:7; Lk 4:34, 41; 8:28). This acknowledgment is stated in terms acceptable to the Jewish world and readily understandable to Gentiles. The title "Most High God," while originally a Phoenician ascription for deity, was used by the Hebrews for the Lord their God (cf. Nu 24:16; Ps 78:35; Isa 14:14; et al.) and by the Greeks for Zeus. And the announcement of "salvation"— while for Paul and the Jews referring to deliverance from sin—would have connoted for Gentiles release from the powers governing the fate of humans and of the material world. It was, therefore, cast in terms Gentiles could understand but Paul could build on.

But while the demon-inspired words provided some free publicity for the missionaries and helped gather an audience, when it continued for many days, it became a nuisance. The demon's words were getting more of a hearing than the proclamation of the Gospel! So Paul commanded the evil spirit "in the name of Jesus Christ" to come out of the girl, and the demon left her. Presumably, having been delivered by the power of God, she became a Christian and a church member.

4. Paul and Silas in prison (16:19–34)

19–21 What Paul did for the slave girl was not appreciated by her masters. In exorcising the demon, he had exorcised their source of income. Because of interference with what they claimed as their property rights, and with callous disregard for the girl's welfare, they seized Paul and Silas and dragged them into the marketplace to face the city's authorities. The charge laid was that Paul and Silas were advocating a religio illicita and thus disturbing the Pax Romana. But the charge, spoken in terms that appealed to the latent anti-Semitism of the people ("these men are Jews") and their racial pride ("us Romans"), ignited the flames of bigotry and prevented any dispassionate discussion of the issues.

Many have asked why only Paul and Silas were singled out for persecution, with Timothy and Luke left free. Of course, Paul and Silas were the leaders of the missionary party and therefore most open to attack. But we must also remember that Paul and Silas were Jews and probably looked very much like Jews. Timothy and Luke, however, being respectively half-Jewish and fully Gentile (cf. Col 4:14, where Luke is grouped by Paul with his Gentile friends), probably looked Greek in both their features and their dress and therefore were left alone. Anti-Semitism lay very near the surface throughout the Roman Empire. Here it seems to have taken over not only in laying the charge but also in identifying the defendants.

22–24 As a Roman colony, Philippi had a form of government that was independent of the provincial administration headquartered in Thessalonica. There were two chief "magistrates" (vv.20, 22, 35–36, 38), who had "officers" (vv. 35, 38) serving under them to carry out their orders. Jailers commonly were retired army veterans, who could be expected to follow orders and use their military skills as required.

Incited to anti-Semitic fury by the slave girl's owners, the crowd turned on Paul and Silas. The magistrates had them stripped and severely flogged as disturbers of the peace and then ordered them to be jailed. The jailer put them into the innermost cell, fastening their feet in stocks. Though both Paul and Silas were Roman citizens and politically exempt from such treatment (cf. comments on v.37), the frenzy of the mob and the rough justice of the colonial magistrates overrode whatever protestations they may have made. Later when writing to the Christians at Corinth, Paul looked back on this experience as one of the afflictions he suffered as a servant of Christ (2Co 11:23, 25).

25–28 One would expect that after such brutal treatment, Paul and Silas would be bemoaning their plight. Certainly they were suffering pain and shock from the flogging. But about midnight, while Paul and Silas were "praying and singing hymns to God," God suddenly vindicated his servants by sending an earthquake that shook the prison, opened its doors, and loosened the chains of all the prisoners. When the awakened jailer saw the doors open, he surmised the worst. In Roman law a guard who allowed his prisoner to escape was liable to the same penalty the prisoner would have suffered. Thus the jailer drew his sword to kill himself, believing the prisoners had all escaped. But Paul saw him in the doorway and shouted out from within the prison, "Don't harm yourself! We are all here!"

29–30 Since it was midnight, the jailer called for torches to dispel the darkness of the prison. Rushing in, he fell trembling before Paul and Silas, doubtless taking them to be some kind of divine messengers. If he had not heard the shouts of the demon-possessed slave girl (v.17), he undoubtedly had heard from others what she was saying. And now what had happened confirmed her words about Paul and Silas. So he cried out, "Lords [kyrioi; GK 3261; NIV "sirs"; a word that certainly carries a note of adoration here], what must I do to be saved?" His question showed recognition of his spiritual need and opened the way for Paul and Silas to give him the Good News about Jesus Christ.

31–34 What Paul and Silas gave the Philippian jailer was the same Christ-centered Gospel that had been proclaimed since Pentecost: "Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved—you and your household" (cf. 2:38–39; 3:19–26; 4:12; et al.). But since it was all new to the jailer, the missionaries took time to explain to him and the others of his household "the word of the Lord." To judge by their actions, the jailer and his family believed in Christ and received the Holy Spirit. The jailer washed the wounds of Paul and Silas, probably at a well in the prison courtyard, and there too he and all his family were baptized. Then he brought the missionaries into his home and fed them. "And the whole family," Luke tells us, "was filled with joy, because they had come to believe in God."

5. Paul and Silas leave the city (16:35–40)

35–36 In the morning the magistrates sent the officers to the prison with an order to release the two vagabond Jews. They had probably only wanted to teach them a lesson about the peril of disturbing the peace in a Roman colony and felt that a public flogging and a night in the city's jail would be sufficient to do that. So they ordered the jailer to release Paul and Silas.

37 Paul, however, refused to be dealt with so summarily. Claiming the rights of Roman citizenship for himself and Silas, he demanded that they be shown the courtesy due a citizen and be escorted out of the prison by the magistrates themselves. According to Roman law, a Roman citizen could travel anywhere within Roman territory under the protection of Rome. He was not subject to local legislation unless he consented, and he could appeal to be tried by Rome, not by local authorities, when in difficulty.

Evidence regarding the exercise of this right of appeal is scanty. We do not know, for example, how a citizen who made the claim "I am a Roman" supported his claim then and there. Most of our information regarding these rights comes from Acts itself (cf. 22:25–29; 25:9–12; 26:32; 27:1; 28:16). Nevertheless, it does seem that the law protected a Roman citizen against arbitrary flogging without a trial.

Paul took pride in his Roman citizenship and valued it highly (22:25–28)—a feeling that was doubtless shared by Silas. Just why they didn't assert their rights earlier we can only conjecture. Perhaps the uproar of the mob and the hubbub of the beating kept their protestations from being heard. But now they claimed their rights as Roman citizens—probably not only for their own sakes but also to provide some measure of protection for the few believers meeting at Lydia's home.

38–39 To beat and imprison a Roman citizen without a trial was a serious offense. So when the magistrates heard that Paul and Silas were citizens, they came to apologize for their illegal actions and to escort them out of prison. Then in order to avoid any further embarrassment or opposition from the crowd, they asked Paul and Silas to leave Philippi. Here was one case where Roman officials took action against the Gospel and its messengers. As such, it seems to run counter to Luke's apologetic purpose in Acts (cf. Introduction: Luke's Purposes in Writing Acts). But his point is that the magistrates initially acted in ignorance; and when they came to understand matters more fully, they apologized and did what they could to avoid repetition of the blunder.

40 After leaving the prison, Paul and Silas met with the small body of Christians at the house of Lydia and encouraged them in their new faith. Then they left with Timothy to go westward toward Thessalonica. Apparently, Luke stayed behind at Philippi, for only later (20:5) does the second "we" section begin—again at Philippi. By that time the little congregation that had begun so modestly had grown in size and spirituality; for in the letter Paul later wrote them, he speaks of their "overseers and deacons" (Php 1:1), counsels them as believers growing in maturity, and commends them for their continuing concern for him (cf. Php 2:25–30; 4:10–19).

C. At Thessalonica (17:1–9)

1 Thirty-three miles southwest of Philippi was Amphipolis, at one time the capital of the northern district of Macedonia. Situated on the east bank of the Strymon River, it straddled the Via Egnatia. But though it was larger and more important than Philippi, Paul and his companions "passed through" it. As they continued west-southwest, they also passed through Apollonia some twenty-seven miles beyond Amphipolis. Their desire was to reach Thessalonica, the present capital of Macedonia and its largest and most prosperous city, lying another forty miles southwest of Apollonia.

Thessalonica (modern Salonika) was strategically located on the Thermaic Gulf. Straddling the Via Egnatia, it linked the rich agricultural plains of the Macedonian interior with the land and sea routes to the east. When Rome conquered Macedonia in 167 B.C., Thessalonica became the capital of the second of the four administrative districts of the province. With the reorganization of Macedonia into one province in 142 B.C, it became the capital. It was declared a free city in 42 B.C.

As a large commercial and government city of perhaps two hundred thousand, Thessalonica naturally attracted diverse groups of people, including a substantial Jewish contingent (1Th 2:14–16). Paul seems to have looked on it as the strategic center for the spread of the Gospel throughout the Balkan peninsula (1Th 1:7–8). Therefore Paul and Silas—though doubtless in some pain from their recent beating and time in the stocks—pushed on resolutely the hundred miles from Philippi to Thessalonica.

2–3 In portraying the extension of the Gospel to the main cities bordering the Aegean Sea, Luke lays special emphasis on the fact that Paul's preaching consisted of both proclamation and persuasion—interlocking elements of the one act of preaching. He had struck such a note earlier (cf. 13:43), and it will continue to be heard in 17:17; 18:4, 19; 19:8–10; 20:9; 24:25; 26:28; 28:23.

At Thessalonica the missionaries, true to their policy of "to the Jews first, but also to the Gentiles" (cf. comments on 13:46–52), sought out the local synagogue, sure of finding there a prepared audience of both Jews and "God-fearing" Gentiles. During the span of three Sabbath days Paul carefully reasoned from Scripture, attempting to prove that the Messiah had to suffer, die, and rise from the dead. Then he went on to declare: "This Jesus I am proclaiming to you is the Christ." In other words, the preaching of Paul at Thessalonica was a "proclaimed witness"—i.e., a witness to the facts that Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ, that his suffering and resurrection were in accord with the Scriptures, and that through his earthly ministry and living presence men and women can experience the reign of God in their lives. At times miracles accompanied the proclamation.

4 "Some of the Jews were persuaded," but the greater number of those who responded positively to Paul's preaching in the Thessalonian synagogue were "God-fearing" Greeks and "prominent women" (i.e., women of high standing in the city who were the wives of the principal citizens). The Jason mentioned in v.5 as Paul's host was probably one of the Jewish converts; Aristarchus and Secundus, identified as Thessalonians in 20:4, may have also been converted at this time.

5–7 Just as at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra, the Jews who did not believe the Gospel were incensed at the Gentiles' response to Paul's preaching and with his direct approach to them. So they stirred up a riot. Their plan was to bring Paul and Silas before "the crowd" and "the city officials" on a charge of disturbing the Pax Romana by preaching a religio illicita and by advocating another king in opposition to Caesar. But when they could not find the missionaries at Jason's house—evidently because Jason and some others who believed their message had hidden them—they dragged Jason and some other Christian brothers before the politarchs.

As a free city, Thessalonica had its governing assembly of citizens, which is probably what Luke had in mind by the use of the term "crowd" (demos; GK 1322) in v.5. The magistrates of Thessalonica were called "politarchs," a title applied almost exclusively to Macedonian cities. From five inscriptions referring to Thessalonica, it appears that a body of five politarchs ruled the city during the first century A.D.

Certainly the assembly of citizens and the politarchs at Thessalonica would have known of the troubles within the Jewish community at Rome in connection with Christianity and of Claudius's edict of A.D. 49–50 for all Jews to leave that city (see comment on 18:2). Probably the Jewish opponents of the missionaries played upon the fear that such a situation might be duplicated at Thessalonica, unless Paul and Silas were expelled. In addition, from their charge that the missionaries proclaimed "another king" (v.7), it may be inferred that they tried to use Paul's mention of "the kingdom of God" (cf. 14:22; 19:8; 20:25; 28:23, 31) to arouse suspicion that he was involved in anti-imperial sedition. Indeed, it may be for this reason that Paul avoided the use of "kingdom" and "king" in his letters to his converts, lest Gentile imperial authorities misconstrue them to connote opposition to empire and emperor.

8–9 The charges against Paul and Silas and their companions naturally alarmed the Thessalonian politarchs. But apparently they found the evidence for the charges scanty; after all, Paul and Silas could not be found. Therefore, they took what they thought to be a moderate and reasonable course of action. They made Jason and those with him post a bond, assuring them that there would be no further trouble. This probably meant that Paul and Silas had to leave Thessalonica and that their friends promised they would not come back, at least during the term of office of the present politarchs.

When writing his Thessalonian converts a few months later, Paul speaks of many times desiring to visit them again but of being unable to because "Satan stopped us" (1Th 2:18). Likely Paul had in mind that posted bond, and therefore his hands were tied. But though he was unable to return, that did not stop either the spread of the Gospel or the opposition of the Jews (cf. 1Th 1:2–10). Amid all their persecutions and difficulties, the Christians of Thessalonica maintained their faith and witness in a manner that filled Paul with joy (cf. 1Th 3:6–10).

D. At Berea (17:10–15)

10 The bail bond Jason and his friends posted would have been forfeited were Paul and Silas to be found in their homes. So the brothers sent them, together with Timothy, on to Berea, some fifty miles southwest of Thessalonica by way of Pella. A city in the foothills of the Olympian range south of the Macedonian plain, Berea was of little importance historically or politically, though it had a large population in NT times. It also was south of the Via Egnatia, but with access to the eastern coastal road that ran down to Achaia and Athens. On arriving there, Paul and his companions went as usual to the synagogue to proclaim the Good News of salvation in Jesus the Christ.

11–12 Luke gives the Jews at Berea undying fame by characterizing them as being "more noble" (GK 2302) than the Thessalonian Jews because they tested the truth of Paul's message by the touchstone of Scripture rather than judging it by political and cultural considerations. So they examined the Scriptures daily to see whether what Paul proclaimed was really true, and many believed. Among them was probably Sopater son of Pyrrhus (see 20:4; cf. Ro 16:21). Included among the Berean believers were not only "a number of prominent Greek women" but also "many Greek men"—that is, not just converts from among Gentile "God-fearers," but also converts who had been pagan Gentiles.

13–15 The Thessalonian Jews, on hearing that "the word of God" was being preached at Berea, sent a delegation there to stir up the same opposition as at Thessalonica. Evidently the Berean Christians recognized that not only was Paul not safe at Thessalonica but he was not safe anywhere else in the region, because the Thessalonian Jews had the ear of the provincial authorities. So the Bereans acted immediately as if they were taking Paul to a coastal town to sail for some other country. Having thrown their opponents off the track, they escorted Paul down to the province of Achaia and into Athens, apparently to stay there with some of their relatives. Silas and Timothy remained in Berea since they were not in such danger as Paul. But when those accompanying Paul to Athens returned to Berea, they brought a message from Paul for Silas and Timothy to join him as soon as possible—doubtless because he saw that Athens was another strategic center for proclaiming the Gospel and wanted Silas and Timothy with him.

The movements of Silas and Timothy after Paul left them at Berea are rather difficult to trace, because Luke was not always concerned with details of the minor characters in his narrative and because Paul's references to their activities are somewhat incidental and allusive. But in accord with Paul's instructions, Silas and Timothy rejoined Paul at Athens (1Th 3:1). Then Timothy was sent back to Thessalonica (1Th 3:2). Silas, however, seems to have gone back to Macedonia (cf. 18:5—probably to Philippi, where he received from the young congregation there a gift of money for the support of the missionaries; see Php 4:15). In the meantime, Paul moved from Athens to Corinth (Ac 18:1) and was rejoined there by Silas and Timothy (18:5; 1Th 3:6).

E. At Athens (17:16–34)

Paul's coming to Athens appears to have been intended primarily to escape persecution in Macedonia; preaching in Athens was not part of his original plan. Presumably, when called to Macedonia (16:6–10), he had planned to follow the Via Egnatia all the way to Dyrrhachium, then cross the Adriatic to Italy, and so to Rome. When writing the Christians at Rome some six or seven years later, Paul speaks of having often planned to visit them but being unable to do so (Ro 1:13; 15:22–23). Provincial action in Macedonia appears to have thwarted his plans for a continued mission in Macedonia, and news of Claudius's expulsion of the Jewish community in Rome (A.D. 49–50; see Ac 18:2) would have caused him to change his plans.

But now in Athens, Paul saw rampant idolatry all around him; this compelled him to present the claims of Christ to Jews and "God-fearing" Gentiles in the synagogue on the Sabbath and to whoever would listen in the marketplace on weekdays. As with Jeremiah (cf. Jer 20:9), "the word of God" burned within Paul like a fire in his bones, and he could not keep silent.

1. Inauguration of a ministry (17:16–21)

16 Athens is five miles inland from its port of Piraeus, which is on an arm of the Aegean Sea stretching fifty miles between Attica and the Peloponnesus. It is situated on a narrow plain between Mount Parnes to the north, Mount Pentelicus to the east, and Mount Hymettus to the southeast. When the Persians tried to conquer Greece in the fifth century B.C., Athens played a prominent part in resisting them. It reached its zenith under Pericles (495–429 B.C.); and during the last fifteen years of his life, the Partheon, numerous temples, and other splendid buildings were built. Literature, philosophy, science, and rhetoric flourished; and Athens attracted intellectuals from all over the world. Politically it became a democracy.

Culturally and intellectually, Athens remained supreme for centuries, with such figures as Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Epicurus, and Zeno living there. In 338 B.C. Philip II of Macedonia conquered Athens, but the conquest only served to spread Athenian culture and learning into Asia and Egypt through his son, Alexander the Great. Even when the Romans conquered Athens in 146 B.C., it continued as the cultural and intellectual center of the world. Rome also left the city free politically.

When Paul came to Athens, its population probably numbered no more than ten thousand. Yet it had a glorious past on which it continued to live. Its temples and statuary were related to the worship of the Greek pantheon, and its culture was pagan. Therefore Paul, with his Jewish abhorrence of idolatry, could not but find the culture of Athens spiritually repulsive.

17 In spite of not wanting to begin a mission in Athens until Silas and Timothy came from Macedonia, Paul could not keep from proclaiming the Good News about Jesus the Messiah when he attended the synagogue on the Sabbath. There he "reasoned" (GK 1363) with the Jews and God-fearing Gentiles. He also presented Jesus in the marketplace (the agora, i.e., the forum of the city and the center of Athenian life) every day to all who would listen.

18 Athens was the home of the rival Epicurean and Stoic schools of philosophy. Epicurus (342–270 B.C.) held that pleasure was the chief goal of life, with the pleasure most worth enjoying being a life of tranquillity free from pain, disturbing passions, superstitious fears, and anxiety about death. He did not deny the existence of gods but argued in deistic fashion that they took no interest in the lives of people. Zeno (340–265 B.C.) was the founder of Stoicism. His teaching centered on living harmoniously with nature and emphasized one's rational abilities and individual self-sufficiency. Theologically, he was essentially pantheistic and thought of God as "the World-soul."

Epicureanism and Stoicism represented the popular Gentile alternatives for dealing with the plight of humanity and for coming to terms with life apart from the biblical revelation and God's work in Jesus Christ. When the followers of Epicurus and Zeno heard Paul speaking in the agora, they began to dispute with him. Some in their pride declared him to be a "babbler" (i.e., a ne'er-do-well; GK 5066). Others, however, thought Paul was advocating foreign gods, probably mistaking Anastasis ("resurrection"; GK 414) as the goddess consort of a god named Jesus.

19–20 The Areopagus (meaning "Council of Ares"; GK 740) reaches back to legendary antiquity. Presumably it first met at Athens on the Hill of Ares, northwest of the Acropolis, for murder trials. Early descriptions of processions in ancient Greek city-states, however, depict the Areopagus of the cities as always heading the column of dignitaries, which suggests that the "Court" or "Council of Ares" was the senate or city council of a Greek city-state. In Roman times it was still the chief judicial body of the city and exercised jurisdiction in such matters as religion and education.

It was before this council that the followers of Epicurus and Zeno brought Paul—probably half in jest and half in derision, and certainly not seeking an impartial inquiry after truth. The city fathers, however, took their task seriously because the fame of Athens rested on its intellectual ferment and on the interplay of competing philosophies. So we should doubtless understand Paul's appearance before the Athenian Council of Ares as being for the purpose of explaining his message before those in control of affairs in the city so that he might either receive the freedom of the city to preach or be censored and silenced.

21 Luke's comment about the Athenians "doing nothing but talking about and listening to the latest ideas" is paralleled in the evaluation of his fellow Athenians by Cleon, a fifth-century B.C. politician and general, and by Demosthenes (384–322 B.C.).

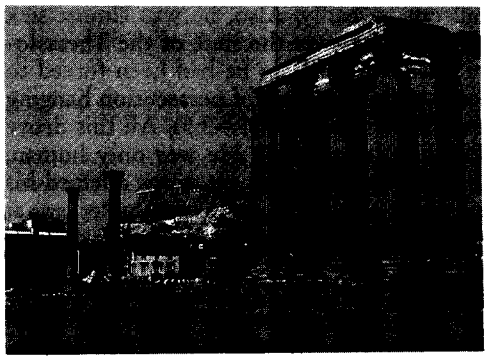
2. Paul's address before the Council of Ares (17:22–31)

22–23 Paul does not begin his address by referring to Jewish history or by quoting the Jewish Scriptures, as he did in the synagogue of Pisidian Antioch (cf. 13:16–41). He knew it would be futile to refer to a history no one knew or argue from fulfillment of prophecy no one accepted as authoritative. Nor does he develop his argument from the God who gives rain and crops and provides food, as he did at Lystra (cf. 14:15–17). Instead, he took for his point of contact an altar he had seen in the city with the inscription "To an Unknown God." The presence of such altars is attested by other Greek writers, so it is not surprising that Paul came across such an altar in the city.



As with the other speeches in Acts, this one is a précis by Luke, in which he summarizes the basic content of what Paul said. Luke gives us another illustration of how Paul began on common ground with his hearers and sought to lead them from it to accept the work and person of Jesus as the apex of God's redemptive work for humanity.

24–28 The substance of the Athenian address concerns the nature of God and the responsibility of human beings to God. Contrary to all pantheistic and polytheistic notions, God is the one, Paul says, who has created the world and everything in it; he is the Lord of heaven and earth (cf. Ge 14:19, 22). He does not live in temples "made by hands," nor is he dependent for his existence upon anything he has created. Rather, he is the source of life and breath and everything else humanity possesses. While Paul's argument can be paralleled at some points by the paganism of his day, its content is decidedly biblical (cf. 1Ki 8:27; Isa 66:1–2).

Contrary to the Athenians' boast that they had originated from the soil of their Attic homeland and therefore were not like other people, Paul affirms the oneness of humankind in their creation by the one God and their descent from a common ancestor. And contrary to the "deism" that permeated the philosophies of the day, he proclaimed that this God has determined specific times for humans and "the exact places where they should live," so that they would seek him and find him.

In support of this teaching about humankind, Paul quotes two maxims from Greek poets. The first ("For in him we live and move and have our being") comes from the Cretan poet Epimenides (c. 600 B.C.); the second ("for we are his offspring"), from the Cilician poet Aratus (c. 315–240 B.C.). By such maxims, Paul is not suggesting that God is to be thought of in terms of the Zeus of Greek polytheism or Stoic pantheism. He is rather arguing that the poets his hearers recognized as authorities have to some extent corroborated his message. In his search for a measure of common ground with his hearers, he is, so to speak, disinfecting and rebaptizing the poets' words for his own purposes. But despite its form, Paul's address was thoroughly biblical and Christian in its content.

29–31 The climax of the address focuses on the progressive unfolding of redemption and the apex of that redemption in Jesus Christ. Since we are God's "offspring" (GK 1169)—not in a pantheistic sense but in the biblical sense of being created in God's image—we should not, Paul insists, think of deity in terms of gold, silver, or stone. All that idolatrous ignorance was overlooked by God in the past (cf. 14:16; Ro 3:25) because God has always been more interested in repentance than judgment. Nevertheless, in the person and work of Jesus, God has acted in such a manner as to make idolatry particularly heinous. To reject Jesus, therefore, is to reject the personal and vicarious intervention of God on behalf of humankind and to open oneself up God's future judgment meted out by the very one rejected in the present. And God himself has authenticated all this by raising Jesus from the dead.

The picture on the left shows the ruins of the temple of Zeus in Athens, with the Acropolis in the background. In the foreground of the other picture is Mars' Hill, from where, perhaps, Paul delivered his address to the Council of Ares.

3. The response to Paul's address (17:32–34)

32 While the resurrection of Jesus from the dead was the convincing proof to the early Christians and Paul that "God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ" (2Co 5:19), to the majority of Athenians it was the height of folly. The tragic poet Aeschylus (525–456 B.C.), for example, made the god Apollo say, "When the dust has soaked up a man's blood, once he is dead, there is no resurrection." If Paul had talked about the immortality of the soul, he would have gained the assent of most of his audience except the Epicureans. Instead, outright scorn was the response of many of his hearers. Others, probably with more politeness than curiosity or conviction, suggested that they would like to hear Paul on the subject at another time.

33–34 Paul obviously failed to convince the council of the truth of his message, and he evidently failed as well to gain the right to propagate his views. He could tell from this first meeting that sentiment was against him. Some, of course, did believe, for God always has his few in even the most difficult of situations. Among them were Dionysius, who was himself a member of the Council of Ares, and a woman named Damaris. But because no action had been taken to approve Paul's right to continue teaching in the city, his hands were legally tied. With a vast territory yet to be entered and a great number of people yet to be reached, Paul decided to move on. We hear of no church at Athens in the apostolic age; and when Paul speaks of "the first converts in Achaia," it is to "the household of Stephanas" in Corinth that he refers (1Co 16:15).

Many have claimed that Paul's failure at Athens stemmed largely from a change in his style of preaching and that later on at Corinth he repudiated it (cf. 1Co 1:18–2:5). He spoke, they charge, about providence and being "in God" but forgot the message of grace and being "in Christ"; about creation and appealed to the Greek poets but did not refer to redemption or revelation; about world history but not salvation history; about resurrection but not the cross. We should remember, however, that going to Athens was not part of Paul's original missionary strategy. Nor should we minimize the working of God's Spirit or Paul's message because only a few responded. Still, the outreach of the Gospel at Athens in overall terms must be judged a failure. But the reason for this lay more in the attitude of the Athenians themselves than in Paul's approach or in what he said.

F. At Corinth (18:1–17)

Paul's coming to Corinth was "in weakness and fear, and with much trembling" (1Co 2:3). Though he was directed through a vision to minister in Macedonia (cf. Ac 16:9–10), the mission there had not gone at all as he had expected. Nor had his initial attempt in Achaia provided him with any reason to hope for a change in his fortunes. So he must have traveled from Athens to Corinth in a dejected mood, wondering what worse could happen and why God had allowed matters to fall out so badly. Also, he was almost sick with anxiety over the state of the Thessalonian converts whom he had been forced to leave with the threat of persecution hanging over them (cf. 1Th 2:17–3:5). All this drove Paul into depression. He was only human, and he found that his emotions affected his spiritual well-being and his work. Perhaps at this time he prayed repeatedly for deliverance from his "thorn in the flesh," to which God responded, "My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness" (cf. 2Co 12:7–10).

At Corinth the exact situation is difficult to ascertain, mainly because in his letters to the Corinthians Paul provides so much allusive material about his relations with them, while Luke gives so little in Acts. One reason for this problem is the wide difference of purpose between Paul and Luke in their written materials: Paul's concern was pastoral and Luke's apologetic. Luke's main interest here in Ac 18 is the proceedings before Gallio (vv.12–17), in order (1) to demonstrate that one of the wisest of the Roman proconsuls had declared Christianity to be a religio licita and (2) to warn that if Rome began to persecute the church, it would be acting contrary to Gallio, a ruler renowned for his urbanity and wit.

1. Arrival at Corinth (18:1–4)

1 Corinth was on a plateau overlooking the isthmus connecting central Greece to the north with the Peloponnesus to the south. It was built on the north side of the Acrocorinth, an acropolis rising precipitously to 1,886 feet and providing an almost impregnable fortress for the city. To the east was the port of Cenchrea leading out to the Aegean Sea, and to the west, the port of Lechaeum opening to the Adriatic. Smaller ships were actually dragged over wooden rollers across the isthmus for the three and one-half miles between Cenchrea and Lechaeum in order to avoid the long and dangerous trip around the southern tip of the Peloponnesus; cargoes of larger ships were carried overland from port to port.

Because of its strategic land and sea location, Corinth had become a prosperous city-state in the eighth century B.C., reaching its zenith during the seventh and sixth centuries with a population of approximately two hundred thousand free men and five hundred thousand slaves. In 338 B.C. the city was captured by Philip II of Macedon, who made it the center of his Hellenic League; and after Alexander the Great died, it became a leading member of the Achaian League of Greek city-states. In 196 B.C. Corinth was captured by the Romans and declared a free city. In 146 B.C., however, it was destroyed as retribution for the leading part it played in the revolt of the Achaian League against Rome. Julius Caesar decreed in 46 B.C. that it should be rebuilt; in 27 B.C. it became the capital of the Roman province of Achaia.

The population of Corinth in NT times was probably over two hundred thousand, made up of local Greeks, freedmen from Italy, Roman army veterans, businessmen and governmental officials, and Orientals from the Levant—including a large number of Jews. Thanks to its commercial advantages, the city greatly prospered. But along with its wealth and luxury, there was immorality of every kind. Beginning with the fifth century B.C., the verb "to corinthianize" meant to be sexually immoral. Corinth was also the center for the worship of the goddess Aphrodite, whose temple at one time boasted of a thousand sacred prostitutes and crowned the Acrocorinth. Many other pagan shrines, such as those built to Melicertes (the god of sailors), Apollo, and Asclepius (the god of healing), were also located there.

2–3 Entering this large and thriving city, Paul probably asked a passerby where he could find a master tentmaker or leather worker to seek a job from so that he could support himself. On his missionary journeys Paul earned his living in this occupation (cf. 20:34; 1Co 9:1–18; 2Co 11:7–12). So he came in contact with the Jewish Christian couple Aquila and Priscilla, with whom he lived and worked, presumably alongside other journeymen.

Aquila was a native of Pontus, a region in northern Asia Minor on the south shore of the Black Sea. Priscilla is the diminutive of the more formal name Prisca. Since Priscilla is often listed before her husband (18:18–19, 26; Ro 16:3; 2Ti 4:19), we may conclude that she came from a higher social class than her husband or was in some way considered more important. Perhaps Aquila was a former Jewish slave who became a freedman in Rome and married a Jewess connected with the Roman family Prisca, which possessed citizenship rights. Together they owned a tentmaking and leather-working firm, with branches of the business at Rome, Corinth, and Ephesus (see texts listed above).

Lately Aquila and Priscilla had been forced to leave Rome because of the Edict of Claudius, an expulsion order proclaimed during the ninth year of Emperor Claudius's reign (i.e., January 25, A.D. 49 to January 24, 50). It was directed against the Jews in Rome to put down the riots arising within the Jewish community there "at the instigation of Chrestus" (according to the Roman historian Suetonius). Many take this to be a reference to Christ (Gk. Christos), where the dispute in the Jewish community was between those who accepted his messiahship and those did not. We do not know whether Aquila and Priscilla had any part in the riots—either as agitators or victims.

4 While working with Aquila and Priscilla, Paul attended the local synagogue every Sabbath. There, Luke tells us, "he reasoned" (GK 1363) with those gathered, "trying to persuade" both Jews and Gentiles. But his ministry during those weeks seems to have been relatively unobtrusive, probably conforming to the kind of witness Aquila and Priscilla were already carrying on among the Jews.

2. An eighteen-month ministry (18:5–11)

5 The coming of Silas and Timothy to Corinth altered the situation for Paul. They brought good news about the Christians at Thessalonica (cf. 1Th 3:6) and a gift of money from the congregation at Philippi (cf. 2Co 11:9; Php 4:14–15). The news from Thessalonica was better than Paul dared expect, and it greatly comforted and encouraged him (cf. 1Th 3:7–10)—though it also told of a slanderous campaign started against him outside the congregation (1Th 2 3–6) and of some perplexity within it concerning the return of Christ (1Th 4:13–5:11). The money from Philippi was especially welcome at this time, for Paul was now able to devote himself "exclusively to preaching." His purpose was to proclaim the Good News to the Jews of the synagogue that Jesus is "the Christ."

In response to the report from Thessalonica, Paul wrote 1 Thessalonians, in which are interwoven (1) commendation for growth, zeal, and fidelity; (2) encouragement in the face of local persecution; (3) defense of his motives against hostile attack; (4) instruction regarding holiness of life; (5) instruction about the coming of the Lord; and (6) exhortation to steadfastness and patience. Some weeks later, on learning of continued confusion at Thessalonica regarding the return of Christ and the believer's relation to it, he wrote 2 Thessalonians. In that second letter, while acknowledging that the church lives in eager expectation of the Lord's return, Paul insists that imminency must not be construed to mean immediacy but is rather the basis for dogged persistence in doing right.

6–7 The ministry at Corinth followed the pattern set at Pisidian Antioch (cf. 13:46–52): initial proclamation in the synagogue, rejection by the majority of Jews, and then a direct outreach to Gentiles. In solemn biblical style (cf. Ne 5:13), Paul "shook out his clothes"—an act symbolizing repudiation of the Jews' opposition, exempting himself from further responsibility for them (cf. 13:51), and protesting against what he considered the Jews' "blasphemy" (NIV, "became abusive"; GK 1059; cf. 13:45; 26:11). So leaving the synagogue, he went next door to the house of Titius Justus, a "God-fearing" Gentile who was receiving instruction at the synagogue. He invited Paul to make his home the headquarters for his work in Corinth, presumably because he believed Paul's message. The house of Titius Justus therefore became the first meeting place of the Corinthian church. The first name of this person may have been Gaius, for in Ro 16:23 Paul says that he and the whole church at Corinth enjoyed Gaius's hospitality. In 1Co 1:14 Paul also speaks of a Gaius whom he personally baptized as he began his Christian ministry in Corinth.

8 One of the first to accept Paul's message at Corinth was Crispus, the leader of the synagogue, who, together with his whole household, "believed in the Lord." He was certainly one of the most prominent believers, and his conversion must have made a great impact and led to other conversions. Paul lists him first in 1Co 1:14–16 among the few that he had baptized.

9–10 Paul had come to Corinth in a dejected mood, burdened by the problems in Macedonia and his dismissal at Athens. Of course, he had been encouraged by the reports and the gift brought by Silas and Timothy, and he was beginning to witness a significant response to his ministry. But a pattern had developed in his Galatian and Macedonian journeys of a promising start, followed by opposition strong enough to force him to leave. Undoubtedly he was beginning to wonder whether this pattern would be repeated at Corinth. So one night God graciously gave Paul a vision in which "the Lord" (GK 3261; evidently Jesus, as in 23:11) encouraged him not to be afraid but to keep on, assured him of his presence and of suffering no harm, and told him that many "people" in the city were to be Christ's own. Here was one of those critical periods in Paul's life when he received a vision strengthening him for what lay ahead (see also 23:11; 27:23–24). In this case, it was confirmed by the ensuing Gallio incident.

11 With such a promising start and encouraged by the vision, Paul continued to minister at Corinth for a total of eighteen months, during which time he taught the message about salvation in Jesus. This period probably stretched from the fall of A.D. 50 to the spring of 52, as can be determined from the story about Gallio (vv.12–17).

3. Before the proconsul Gallio (18:12–17)

12–13 The promise given Paul in the vision was that he would be protected from harm at Corinth, not that he would be free from difficulties or attack. As more and more people responded to Paul's preaching, his Jewish opponents attacked him and laid a charge against him. This occurred, Luke says, "while Gallio was proconsul of Achaia." From what we know of Roman history, Luke is amazingly accurate in the words he uses to designate the various governing officials of Roman provinces.

Gallio was the son of Marcus Annaeus Seneca, the distinguished Spanish rhetorician (50 B.C.–A.D. 40). He was born in Cordova at the beginning of the Christian Era and named Marcus Annaeus Novatus. On coming to Rome with his father during the reign of Claudius (A.D. 41–54), he was adopted by the Roman rhetorician Lucius Junius Gallio, and thereafter bore the name of his adoptive father. He was renowned for his personal charm. An inscription at Delphi mentions Gallio as being proconsul of Achaia during the period of Claudius's twenty-sixth acclamation as imperator—that is, during the first seven months of A.D. 52. Proconsuls entered office in the senatorial provinces on July 1, and therefore Gallio became proconsul of Achaia on July 1, 51, but only for a brief period of time.

Paul seems to have been preaching in Corinth for eight or nine months before Gallio came to Achaia as proconsul (i.e., from the fall of 50 to July 1, 51). When he took office, the Jews decided to try out the new proconsul. They brought Paul before him on a charge that he was preaching a religio illicita and therefore acting contrary to Roman law.

14–16 The word "law" (GK 3795) in v.13 is somewhat ambiguous. Undoubtedly when it was first used by Paul's antagonists in their synagogue, it referred to God's law against which they were convinced Paul was speaking. But at the proconsul's forum, they meant "law" to be understood as Roman law, which they charged Paul was breaking. Gallio, however, after hearing their charges, was not at all convinced that this was true. For him the squabble was an intramural one about "a word [NIV, words; GK 3364] and names and their own law"—which doubtless means a squabble concerning "a message," "names" (having to do with an expected Messiah), and particular interpretations of the Jewish law. Gallio's responsibility was to judge civil and criminal cases, not to become an arbitrator of religious disputes. What Paul was preaching, in his view, was simply a variety of Judaism that did not happen to suit the leaders of the Jewish community at Corinth but which was not for that reason to be declared religio illicita. Thus he did not need to hear Paul's defense but ejected the plaintiffs from the forum as not having a case worth being heard by a proconsul.

The importance of Gallio's decision was profound. Luke highlights it in his account of Paul's ministry at Corinth and makes it the apex of all that took place on Paul's second missionary journey. No Roman authority had yet repudiated Christianity's claim to share in the religio licita status of Judaism—neither in Macedonia or in Athens. If Gallio had accepted the Jewish charge and found Paul guilty of the alleged offense, provincial governors everywhere would have had a precedent, and Paul's ministry would have been severely restricted. As it was, Gallio's refusal to act in the matter was tantamount to the recognition of Christianity as a religio licita; and the decision of so eminent a Roman proconsul would carry weight wherever the issue arose again. Later, in the sixties, Rome's policy toward both Judaism and Christianity changed. But for the coming decade, the Christian message could be proclaimed in the provinces of the empire without fear of coming into conflict with Roman law.

17 Taking their cue from the snub that Gallio gave the leaders of the Jewish community, the crowd at the forum—in an outbreak of the anti-Semitism that always lay near the surface in the Greco-Roman world—took Sosthenes, the synagogue ruler, and beat him. Gallio, however, turned a blind eye to what was going on, evidently because he wanted to teach a lesson to those who would waste his time with such trivialities.

G. An Interlude (18:18–28)

The ministry at Corinth proceeded without any legal hindrance and with considerable success for some nine months after Gallio's decision. In the spring of 52, however, Paul left Corinth to return to Jerusalem and then to Syrian Antioch—primarily to complete a vow at Jerusalem he had taken earlier. In vv.18–23 Luke briefly summarizes Paul's route. And in vv.24–28 he uses this interlude in his portrayal of the advance of the Good News to introduce Apollos (cf. 1Co 3:5–9; 4:6–7; 16:12).

1. Paul's return to Palestine-Syria (18:18–23)

18 Paul now decided to leave Corinth, sail for Jerusalem, and then go on to Syrian Antioch. As he set out, he had his hair cut "because of a vow he had taken." Paul had apparently earlier taken a Nazirite vow that had now ended; such a vow had to be fulfilled at Jerusalem, where the hair would be presented to God and sacrifices offered. For one who thought of himself as a Jewish Christian (2Co 11:22; cf. Ro 9–11) and who at the conclusion of three missionary journeys to the Gentile world could still insist that he was "a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee" (Ac 23:6; cf. 26:5), such an action should not be thought strange. As a Gentile writing to Gentiles, however, Luke felt no need to explain this distinctly Jewish practice.

19 Boarding a ship at Cenchrea, Paul crossed to Ephesus, the major commercial center and capital of the Roman province of Asia. With him were Aquila and Priscilla, his hosts at Corinth, who were either transferring their business from Corinth to Ephesus or leaving their Corinthian operation in charge of a manager in order to open a new branch at Ephesus. What happened to Silas and Timothy during this time, we do not know. They may have remained at Corinth to carry on the ministry there. Or perhaps they went with Paul to Jerusalem, then to Antioch in Syria, and back to Ephesus.

On arriving at Ephesus, Aquila and Priscilla set up their business in the city. There they were to remain for four or five years, hosting a congregation of believers in their home and sending their greetings back to their Corinthian friends in one of Paul's letters (cf. 1Co 16:19). They were probably there during Demetrius's riot (cf. 19:23–41), even risking their lives to protect Paul (cf. Ro 16:4). Sometime after Claudius's death in A.D. 54, they returned to Rome (cf. Ro 16:3). Paul, having wanted earlier to minister at Ephesus (cf. 16:6), went to the synagogue and "reasoned" with the Jews gathered there. Though it was not the Sabbath, he knew he could find an audience in the synagogue and probably desired to "test the waters" in anticipation of his later return.

20–21 In the synagogue at Ephesus, Paul found a receptive audience. But though they encouraged him to stay, he seems to have felt that fulfilling his vow at Jerusalem took priority over everything else. Nevertheless, he promised to return, if it were in the will of God. And with a heart lightened by the prospect of a future ministry at Ephesus, he sailed for Jerusalem.

22 Paul probably booked passage for Caesarea, the port city of Jerusalem since the time of Herod the Great (cf. comments on 10:1). From Caesarea, he "went up" to Jerusalem, some sixty-five miles southeast. While the name "Jerusalem" does not appear in the text, it is certainly implied by the expressions "went up" and "went down," and also by the absolute use of the term "the church." At Jerusalem, then, he met with the mother church. In addition, he undoubtedly entered into a thirty-day program of purification for his Nazirite vow, after which he presented his shorn hair to God in thanksgiving and offered sacrifices. Then he "went down" to Antioch of Syria, some three hundred miles north, reporting to and ministering within the church that originally commissioned him to reach the Gentiles (13:1–4).

23 Paul remained at Syrian Antioch probably from the summer of 52 through the spring of 53. Then, on what was to be his third missionary journey, he set out for Ephesus some fifteen hundred miles to the west, revisiting the churches throughout "the region of Galatia and Phrygia" and "strengthening all the disciples." Once again, Luke is probably referring to the Phrygian region of Galatia or some district in southern Galatia where both Phrygian and Celtic dialects could be heard (cf. comments on 16:6). He strengthened the Christian disciples in the areas surrounding Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe.

2. Apollos at Ephesus and Corinth (18:24–28)

24–26 Between the time of Paul's stopover at Ephesus (18:19–21) and his return to the city on his third missionary journey (19:1ff.), Apollos came to Ephesus. A native of Alexandria, he was a highly educated man and possessed a thorough knowledge of the Jewish Scriptures. Somewhere and somehow he had received instruction about Jesus, and to that extent he knew the Gospel "accurately" and "spoke with great fervor" concerning Jesus. When Priscilla and Aquila heard Apollos in the synagogue, they recognized some deficiencies in his understanding of the Christian message. So they invited him to their home and explained "the way of God" to him "more accurately."

Apollos's knowledge of Jesus seems to have come through disciples of John the Baptist, perhaps when he was in Alexandria. Presumably he knew that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah and knew something of Jesus' earthly ministry, but that is all. When instructed further by Priscilla and Aquila, Apollos readily accepted all God had done in the death and resurrection of Jesus and in sending the Holy Spirit at Pentecost.

27–28 A number of people who identified themselves in some way with the Gospel were at Ephesus before Paul began to minister there—people like Priscilla and Aquila who understood clearly, like Apollos whose understanding was growing, or like those mentioned in 19:1–7, 13–16, whose faith was to some extent deviant. When Apollos desired to visit Achaia, apparently on behalf of the Gospel, the Christians of Ephesus encouraged him and sent along a letter of commendation, probably written by Priscilla and Aquila, to the believers at Corinth. There he vigorously debated with the Jews and showed from the OT that Jesus was the Messiah. People in the Corinthian church obviously thought highly of him, as Paul also did later (see 1Co 1–4).

H. At Ephesus (19:1–19)

The third missionary journey of Paul was chiefly devoted to an extended ministry at Ephesus, the city he apparently hoped to reach at the start of his second journey. On his brief visit there less than a year before, it had shown a real response to the Gospel (18:19–21). Luke's account of the ministry at Ephesus is abbreviated, with a short summary of only five verses (vv.8–12) sandwiched between two striking vignettes of a deviant kind of faith (vv.1–7, 13–19). In all, Paul's Ephesian ministry lasted about three years, from A.D. 53 through 56.

1. Twelve men without the Spirit (19:1–7)

1 Ephesus was on the western coast of Asia Minor, at the mouth of the Cayster River and between the Koressos mountain range and the Aegean Sea. It was founded in the twelfth or eleventh century B.C. by Ionian colonists from Athens as a gateway to the vast resources of the Asian steppes. In 334 B.C. Alexander the Great captured it at the start of his "drive to the East." From Alexander's death to 133 B.C. it was ruled by the Pergamum kings. With the inevitability of a Roman takeover, Attalus III, the last of these kings, willed the city to Rome at his death; and Ephesus was made the capital of the newly formed Roman province of Asia.

Ephesus relied upon two important assets for its wealth and vitality. The first was its position as a center of trade, linking the Greco-Roman world with the rich hinterland of western Asia Minor. But because of excessive lumbering, charcoal burning, and overgrazing the land, topsoils slipped into streams, streams were turned into marshes, and storm waters raced to the sea laden with silt that choked the river's mouth. The Pergamum kings promoted the maintenance of the harbor facilities at Ephesus, and Rome followed suit. But it was a losing battle against the unchecked erosion of the hinterland. In Paul's day, the zenith of Ephesus's commercial power was long since past.

The second factor the life of Ephesus depended on was the worship of Artemis, the multibreasted goddess of fertility whose temple was one of the Seven Wonders of the ancient world. King Croesus of nearby Lydia (reigned 564–546 B.C.) had built the first temple to Artemis one and a half miles northeast of Ephesus. It was rebuilt on the same site in the fourth century B.C. after a fire, its size being almost four times that of the Parthenon at Athens. With the decline of its commerce, the prosperity of Ephesus became more and more dependent on the tourist and pilgrim trade associated with the temple and cult of Artemis. Around it swarmed all sorts of tradesmen and hucksters who made their living by supplying visitors with food and lodging, dedicatory offerings, and souvenirs. The temple of Artemis was also a major treasury and bank of the ancient world, where merchants, kings, and even cities made deposits, and where their money could be kept safe under the protection of deity. At the time of Paul's arrival, the people of Ephesus were becoming conscious of the precariousness of their position as a commercial and political center of Asia.

After revisiting the churches of Galatia (cf. 18:23), Paul "took the road through the interior" and came to Ephesus. He arrived after Apollos had left for Corinth, entering the city probably in the summer of 53. There he found "about twelve men" (v.7) who professed to be Christian "disciples," but in whom Paul discerned something amiss.

2–3 The question Paul put to the twelve, "Did you receive the Holy Spirit when you believed," suggests two things: (1) that he assumed they were truly Christians, since they professed to believe; and (2) that he held that true faith and the reception of the Holy Spirit always went together. These two assumptions caused Paul some difficulty when he met these twelve men, for something in their life indicated that one or the other assumption was wrong. When they answered his question by saying, "We have not even heard that there is a Holy Spirit," he knew the second assumption was not in error. So he asked further about the first one and found that they claimed to have been baptized only with "John's baptism."

The account is extremely difficult to interpret, principally because it is so brief. Probably these twelve men thought of John the Baptist as the height of God's revelation—perhaps even as the Messiah himself (cf. Jn 1:19–34; 2:22–36, which counters such thinking). Presumably a John-the-Baptist sect existed within Jewish Christian circles in Asia in the first century (cf. Eph 4:5). As in any such group, some (such as Apollos; see Ac 18:24–26) would have appreciated John the Baptist and yet looked forward to the greater fulfillment of which he spoke; others (such as the twelve men here whom Paul met in Ephesus) would have stayed in their devotion to the Baptist himself without any real commitment to Jesus.

4–7 Despite their being known as disciples, Paul preached Jesus to the men as he would to any Jew. "John's baptism," he said, "was a baptism of repentance" that pointed beyond itself and the Baptist to "the one coming after him"—that is, to Jesus. So on their acceptance of Jesus as the focus of Christian faith, they were baptized "into the name of the Lord Jesus." Then Paul laid his hands on them, and they received the Holy Spirit and evidenced the same signs of the Spirit's presence as the first believers did at Pentecost—namely, tongues and prophecy. Doubtless in Paul's mind they were not rebaptized but baptized into Christ once and for all.

2. A summary of the apostle's ministry (19:8–12)

8–10 The ministry of Paul at Ephesus lasted approximately three years (cf. 20:31). It is remarkable how concisely Luke summarizes this extensive period—though perhaps not so remarkable if we may assume from the absence of the pronoun "we" that Luke was not himself an eyewitness of the events here narrated. The conciseness of the passage is particularly notable when compared with Luke's expansive, anecdotal treatments of the ministry at Philippi (cf. 16:10ff.) and the return journey to Jerusalem (cf. 20:5ff.), where he was an eyewitness.

In the synagogue at Ephesus, Paul argued "persuasively about the kingdom of God." He was speaking to those who had earlier received him favorably (cf. 18:19–21), and the three-month hearing they gave him was one of the longest he had in any synagogue. When opposition to "the Way" arose within the synagogue, he withdrew and continued to minister for two more years at the lecture hall of Tyrannus. This was probably the hall of a local philosopher named Tyrannus ("Tyrant") or one rented out to traveling philosophers by a landlord of that name. Since it is difficult to think of any parent naming his or her child "Tyrant," the name must have been a nickname.

© 1989 The Zondervan Corporation.

As for the rent for the hall, perhaps Priscilla and Aquila shared it or the growing congregation underwrote it. For two years Paul had daily discussions about the claims of Christ; during that time the Gospel radiated out from Ephesus through Paul's converts so that the entire province of Asia heard the word of the Lord, with the result that many churches in the outlying cities and villages were founded (cf. Col 1:7; 2:1; 4:16; Rev 2–3). Then after sending Timothy and Erastus as his envoys to Macedonia and Achaia, Paul stayed for a while longer at Ephesus (cf. 19:21–22).

While there, Paul wrote the Corinthian church a letter on the subject of separation from the ungodly (cf. 1Co 5:9–10)—a letter either not now extant or partially preserved (as often suggested) in 2Co 6:14–7:1. In reply he received a letter from certain members of the Corinthian church (cf. 1Co 7:1) seeking his advice on matters concerning marital problems at Corinth, food previously dedicated to idols, the decorum of women in worship, the observance of the Lord's Supper, spiritual gifts, and (possibly) the nature and significance of the resurrection. At about the same time he also had some visitors from Corinth, whom he identifies as "Chloe's household" (1Co 1:11), who told of deep and bitter divisions within the church. And from rumors widely circulating (cf. 1Co 5:1), he knew that some of the Corinthian believers were manifesting blatant immorality and pursuing litigations in the public law courts. To deal with these matters, the apostle wrote a second pastoral letter—1 Corinthians.

The problems at Corinth seem to have involved opposition to Paul's authority and criticism of his doctrine, and he was forced to make a "painful visit" to the city in an attempt to settle matters within the church (cf. 2Co 2:1; 12:14; 13:1). This visit to Corinth from Ephesus is extremely difficult to place historically because Luke's summary of events during this time is so brief and Paul's references so allusive. It was not entirely successful, however, for Paul continued to rebuke the Corinthians. His opponents even taunted him, it seems, with being humble in their presence but bold when away (cf. 2Co 10:1).

11–12 From his Corinthian correspondence we learn that Paul, while at Ephesus, had his difficulties, which arose chiefly from conditions at Corinth. But Luke does not mention them or refer to any further difficulties at Ephesus beyond his general reference to Jewish opposition (v.9) and the Demetrius incident (vv.23–41). Instead, he rounds off his summary of Paul's Ephesian ministry by speaking of "extraordinary miracles" taking place directly through Paul and through such personal garments as Paul's sweat-cloths and work-aprons being taken to the sick and demon possessed. Luke seems to have had in mind two types of "extraordinary miracles": (1) direct healings through the laying on of Paul's hands, and (2) indirect healings through the application of Paul's clothing. It is certainly strange to read of healings occurring through sweat-cloths and work-aprons. But Ephesus was the home of all sorts of magic and superstition, and the phrase "Ephesian writings" was common in antiquity for documents containing spells and magical formulae. So Paul was likely just meeting his audiences at a point of common ground in order to impress them and lead them on to the Good News of salvation in Christ. The virtue, of course, lay not in the materials themselves but in the power of God and the faith of the recipients.

Luke's interest throughout this chapter is in emphasizing the supernatural power of the Gospel. Therefore he has highlighted these "extraordinary miracles." Also, he doubtless included reference to miracles done through Paul's clothing in order to set up a further parallel with the ministries of Jesus and Peter, where healings took place by touching Jesus' cloak (Lk 8:44) and through Peter's shadow (Ac 5:15).

3. The seven sons of Sceva (19:13–19)

13–16 The use of magical names in incantations to exorcise evil spirits was common in the ancient world, and it seems to have been especially prominent at Ephesus. In addition, Jewish practitioners of magic were highly esteemed in antiquity, for they were believed to have command of particularly effective spells. The great reluctance of the Jews to pronounce the divine name was known among the ancients and often misinterpreted according to magical principles. Moreover, those connected with the Jewish priesthood would have enjoyed great prestige in magical circles since they were the most likely ones to know the true pronunciation of the Ineffable Name.

Some Jewish exorcists, on coming into contact with Paul and his preaching about Jesus, attempted to make magical use of this new name. Luke identifies them as "seven sons of Sceva, a Jewish chief priest." Perhaps they did belong to one of the high priestly families of Jerusalem, though the title "Jewish chief priest" was more likely a self-designation manufactured to impress their clients and is reported by Luke without evaluation. Perhaps they even professed to accept Paul's message and to be committed to Jesus personally themselves, much as Simon of Samaria did (cf. 8:9–24). But their main goal was for the benefits they could derive for their magical arts from the power of the name of Jesus, and so they simply continued in their old ways with a new twist.

When, however, they tried to use this more powerful name in their exorcisms, Sceva's sons found they were dealing with realities far beyond their ability to cope. The demon they were trying to exorcise turned violently on them, and they fled from the house naked and bleeding. The name of Jesus, like an unfamiliar weapon misused, exploded in their hands; and they were taught a lesson about the danger of using the name of Jesus in their dabbling in the supernatural.

17–19 News of what happened spread quickly throughout Ephesus. All who heard were overcome by reverential fear and held the name of Jesus in high honor. Negatively, they learned not to misuse the name of Jesus or treat it lightly, for it is a powerful name. Positively, many Christians renounced their secret acts of magic and several magicians were converted. Openly demonstrating the change in their lives, they brought their magical scrolls together and burned these expensive items in the presence of the gathered congregation.

I. A Summary Statement (19:20)

20 The advances of the Gospel into Macedonia, Achaia, and Asia did not come about without great difficulty and repeated discouragements. At times, in fact, matters looked very bleak (cf. 1Co 2:3). But God also gave Paul an open door and a successful ministry in places such as Corinth and Ephesus.

Paul's second and third missionary journeys read like a slice of life. Having shown in his earlier panels the gradual widening of the Gospel to new groups of people and the establishment of a new missionary policy to the Gentiles, Luke in Panel 5 presents for his readers a graphic account of the Gospel's entrance into entirely new regions. It is the story of the church's dedicated service under the guidance and power of the Holy Spirit in proclaiming the Good News to those who desperately needed to hear it. Through both the hardships and the blessings, God was at work. In looking back on those days, Luke simply says, "In this way the word of the Lord spread widely and grew in power."

Panel 6—To Jerusalem and Thence to Rome (19:21–28:31)

The last panel in Acts presents Paul's somewhat circuitous journey to Jerusalem, his arrest and defenses, his imprisonment and defenses in Caesarea, his voyage to Rome, and his ministry at Rome. The panel is introduced by the programmatic statement of 19:21–22 and concludes with the summary statement of 28:31. Three features immediately strike the reader in this sixth panel: (1) the disproportionate length of the panel, including one-third of the total material of Acts; (2) the prominence given the speeches of Paul in his defense; and (3) the dominance of the "we" sections in the narrative portions (cf. 20:5–15; 21:1–18; 27:1–28:16). The length seems to be related to Luke's apologetic purpose, particularly in Paul's five defenses, and to the eyewitness character of the narrative (i.e., a predominance of "we" sections) with its inevitable elaboration of details (see introductory comment on 16:11–40). The events narrated here span the time from approximately 56 through 62.

A. A Programmatic Statement (19:21–22)

21 "After all this had happened" (lit., "fulfilled"; GK 4444; tr. "finished" in 12:25) refers to the events of the first, second, and third missionary journeys of Paul, as recorded in Panels 4 and 5 (12:25–19:20). For Luke the fulfillment of the Gentile mission came (1) in the inauguration of the new missionary policy for reaching Gentiles that was established on the first missionary journey and confirmed at the Jerusalem Council (i.e., Panel 4), and (2) in the extensive outreach to the Gentile world that took place during the second and third missionary journeys (i.e., Panel 5). All that took place earlier (i.e., Panels 1–3) was for Luke a preparation for the Gentile mission; and all that happened afterwards (i.e., Panel 6), its aftermath and extension into Rome.

With the eastern part of the empire evangelized (cf. Ro 15:23), Paul decided to return to Jerusalem and then go on to Rome. On the way he planned to revisit the churches of Macedonia and Achaia, ministering to them and gathering from them a collection for the Jewish Christians of Jerusalem (cf. 1Co 16:1–4). Thereupon he hope to take up a Gentile mission in the western part of the empire, using the Roman congregation as the base for that western outreach just as the church at Syrian Antioch had been his base for evangelizing the eastern part of the empire (cf. Ro 15:24–29). Now, however, he had to return to Jerusalem, knowing full well that serious difficulties could befall him there (cf. Ro 15:30–32). In all these plans, Paul was under the direction of the Holy Spirit (implied in the NIV word "decided"; lit., "placed in the Spirit").

22 Before going to Jerusalem, Paul sent Timothy and Erastus into Macedonia while he remained "in the province of Asia" somewhat longer—which probably means that he stayed on at Ephesus. Luke has not mentioned Timothy since 18:5, but he was with Paul at Ephesus and served during Paul's Ephesian ministry as his emissary to Corinth (cf. 1Co 4:17; 16:10–11). This is the first time we hear of Erastus (cf. 2Ti 4:20). As for Silas, though Luke speaks of him repeatedly in describing the second missionary journey, he makes no reference to him in the rest of Acts. Another companion of Paul not mentioned by Luke is Titus, who was extensively involved at various times during the Gentile mission (cf. 2Co 2:13; 7:6, 13–14; 8:6, 16, 23; 12:18; Gal 2:1, 3; 2Ti 4:10; Tit 1:4).

B. The Journey to Jerusalem (19:23–21:16)

1. The riot at Ephesus (19:23–41)

Before Paul left Ephesus, a riot threatened his life and could have put an end to the outreach of the Gospel in Asia. The situation was undoubtedly more dangerous than Luke's account suggests. For in what may well be allusions to this riot, Paul said later that he had "despaired even of life" in the face of "a deadly peril" in Asia (2Co 1:8–11; cf. 1Co 15:32), and that Priscilla and Aquila had "risked their lives" for him (Ro 16:4). Luke's purpose in presenting this vignette is clearly apologetic, in line with his argument for the religio licita status of Christianity (cf. Panel 5 [16:6–19:20]) and in anticipation of the themes stressed in Paul's speeches of defense (Panel 6, esp. chs. 22–26). Politically, Luke's report of the friendliness of the "officials of the province" toward Paul and of the city clerk's intervention on his behalf is the best defense imaginable against the charge that Paul and Christianity threatened the official life of the empire.

23 This event of the riot most likely took place at the end of Paul's Ephesian ministry. What happened here was not simply against Paul personally but threatened primarily the continued outreach of the Gospel.

24–27 Artemis of Ephesus, depicted as a grotesque, multibreasted woman, was believed to have been fashioned in heaven and to have fallen from the sky (cf. v.35). Probably she was originally a meteorite that resembled a multibreasted woman and became the object of worship. Her temple had become the primary basis for Ephesus's wealth and continued prosperity (cf. comment on 19:1).

Paul's preaching had turned many away from the idolatry of the Artemis cult, with the result that the economy of Ephesus was being affected. One profitable business was the making of "silver shrines of Artemis," probably silver statuettes of Artemis to be used as souvenirs, votive offerings, and amulets. When the Gospel began to touch their income, the silversmiths, led by their guild master Demetrius, instigated a disturbance they hoped would turn the people against the missionaries and stir up greater devotion for the goddess Artemis—and greater profits for them.

28–29 The silversmiths began shouting out the ceremonial chant: "Great is Artemis of the Ephesians!" hoping thereby to stir up the city on a pretext of religious devotion. A magnificent boulevard ran through the heart of Ephesus, lined with fine buildings and columned porticoes. Into this boulevard Demetrius and his fellow craftsmen most likely poured, sweeping along with them in noisy procession all the residents and visitors within earshot. Their destination was the large open-air theater on the eastern side of the city, large enough to seat twenty-four thousand people. On their way, the crowd laid hold of Gaius and Aristarchus, two traveling companions of Paul from Derbe and Thessalonica respectively (cf. 20:4; 27:2), and dragged them along into the theater. There, much to the delight of Demetrius and his fellow silversmiths, the procession became a fanatical mob.

30–31 The riot faced Paul with an extremely serious situation. He wanted to appear before the assembly, doubtless believing that because of his Roman citizenship and his earlier successful appearances before government officials, he could quiet the mob, free his companions, and turn the whole affair to the advantage of the Gospel. But his Ephesian converts would not let him enter the theater, and even some of "the officials of the province" (lit., "Asiarchs"; GK 825) who were his friends sent an urgent message for him not to go there. The Asiarchs were members of the noblest and wealthiest families of the province of Asia and were bound together in a league for promoting the cult of the emperor. While they did not have political authority, they served Rome's interests by securing loyalty to Roman rule. That some of these men were friendly to Paul and gave him advice in such an explosive situation suggests that imperial policy at this time was not hostile to Christianity. This fits in with Luke's apologetic purpose.

32 The crowd had been worked up into a frenzy; most didn't even know why they were there. What united them was a common resentment against those who paid no honor to the goddess Artemis.

33–34 The Jewish community at Ephesus was large and enjoyed a number of special exemptions granted by past provincial proconsuls. Yet it also suffered from the latent anti-Semitism that always lay beneath the surface of Greco-Roman society. In an endeavor to disassociate themselves from the Christians in such an explosive situation, the Jews sent one of their number, Alexander, to the podium. To the idolatrous mob, however, Jews were as insufferable as Christians on the point at issue in the riot because both worshiped an invisible deity and rejected idols. So Alexander was shouted down with the chant "Great is Artemis of the Ephesians." This shouting kept on for about two hours.

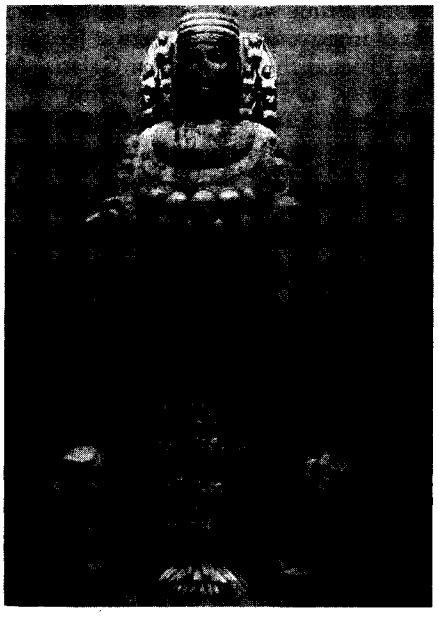
35–40 The "city clerk" of Ephesus was the chief executive officer of the assembly. He came to his position from within the assembly and was not appointed by Rome. As the most important native official of the city, he was responsible for disturbances within it. He argued with the crowd that a riot would hardly enhance the prestige of the city in the eyes of Rome, and therefore any complaint raised by Demetrius and his guild of silversmiths should be brought before the legally constituted authorities. Gaius and Aristarchus, standing before them, were neither robbers of temples nor blasphemers of other gods (common accusations in antiquity made against Jews generally, including Jewish Christians). Anything further that could not be brought before the courts and the proconsuls could be presented "in a legal assembly." Otherwise, he concluded, the city would risk losing its favorable status because of a riot for which there was no reason.



41 The city clerk then dismissed the crowd. Luke highlights his arguments because they are important elements in his apologetic motif in Acts, which he emphasizes further in the accounts of Paul's five speeches in his own defense later in this panel.

2. A return visit to Macedonia and Achaia (20:1–6)

This report of Paul's return visit to Macedonia and Achaia is the briefest account of an extended ministry in all of Acts—even more so than the summary of the ministry at Ephesus (cf. 19:8–12). Nevertheless, it can be filled out to some extent by certain personal references and historical allusions in 2 Corinthians and Romans, which were written during this time.

1 Leaving Ephesus, Paul moved north either by land or by ship to Troas. There he hoped to find Titus, whom he had earlier sent to Corinth to deal with and report on the situation in the church there. Not finding him and being disturbed about conditions at Corinth, he went on to Macedonia without any further preaching in either Troas itself or the surrounding region (cf. 2Co 2:12–13). As at Athens and Corinth when his concern for the

The large theater in Ephesus in which the riot of ch. 19 took place still stands, though in ruins. Excavations at Ephesus have uncovered statues of the multibreasted goddess Artemis, probably similar to the ones made and sold by Demetrius and the other silversmiths.

Christians at Thessalonica prevented him from giving full attention to an evangelistic outreach (cf. introductory comments on 18:1–17), so at Troas Paul seems to have been consumed with concern about the Christians at Corinth and was unable to launch out into any new missionary venture.

2 In Macedonia (probably at Philippi) Paul met Titus, who brought him reassuring news about the church at Corinth (cf. 2Co 7:5–16). In response to the triumphs and continuing problems that Titus told him about, Paul sent back to the church the letter known as 2 Corinthians.

Just how long Paul stayed in Macedonia we do not know. Luke's words seem to suggest a fairly prolonged period. It was probably during this time that the Gospel entered the province of Illyricum in the northwest corner of the Balkan peninsula (Ro 15:19; cf. also 2Ti 4:10, where Titus is mentioned as returning to Dalmatia, the southern district of the province of Illyricum). Perhaps Paul himself traveled across the Balkan peninsula on the Via Egnatia to the city of Dyrrhachium. It is probable that this ministry in Macedonia lasted for a year or more, from the summer of 56 through the latter part of 57.

One activity that especially concerned Paul at this time was collecting money for the relief of impoverished believers at Jerusalem. He instructed the churches in Galatia, Asia, Macedonia, and Achaia about this (cf. Ro 15:25–32; 1Co 16:1–4; 2Co 8–9). The collection was an act of love like that undertaken by the church at Syrian Antioch earlier (cf. 11:27–30). More than that, Paul viewed it as a symbol of unity that would help his Gentile converts realize their debt to the mother church in Jerusalem and give Jewish Christians an appreciation of the vitality of faith in the Gentile churches.

3 After spending some time in Macedonia, Paul went to Corinth, where he stayed for three months, probably during the winter of 57–58. While there, and before his final trip to Jerusalem, Paul wrote his letter to the church at Rome (cf. Ro 15:17–33). The Greek world in the eastern part of the empire had been evangelized (cf. Ro 15:19, 23), and he desired to transfer his ministry to the Latin world, as far west as Spain (cf. Ro 15:24). He anticipated using the Roman church as his base of operations, much as he had previously used the church at Antioch in Syria. But first he needed to go to Jerusalem if the collection from the Gentile Christians was to have the meaning he wanted it to have (cf. Ro 15:25–32). So, instead of going to Rome at this time and in preparation for his future visit—and also to expound the righteousness of God—Paul sent a formal letter to the Christians at Rome (the longest and most systematic of his writings).

At the end of three months in Corinth, Paul sought to sail for Palestine-Syria, doubtless intending to reach Jerusalem in time for the great pilgrim festival of Passover. But a plot to kill him at sea was uncovered, and he decided to travel overland through Macedonia. Robbery was common on the ancient roads, and with Paul carrying a substantial amount of money collected from the Gentile churches, he undoubtedly wanted to get to Jerusalem as quickly and safely as possible. Nevertheless, he felt it best to spend time on the longer land route, preferring its possible dangers to the known perils of the sea voyage; so he began to retrace his steps through Macedonia.

4 Gathered at Corinth for the return journey to Jerusalem with Paul were representatives from the churches: Sopater of Berea, Aristarchus and Secundus of Thessalonica, Gaius of Derbe, Timothy of Lystra, and Tychicus and Trophimus from Asia. With the change in travel plans, they then accompanied him (together with Silas and perhaps others) into Macedonia. Almost all the main centers of the Gentile mission were represented, with the notable exception of Corinth. The lack of mention of this church may suggest continued strained relations within the church there. Luke, who appears to have joined the group at Philippi (cf. v.5), may have represented that church.

5–6 Having been unable to get to Jerusalem for Passover, Paul remained at Philippi to celebrate it and the week-long Feast of Unleavened Bread. He sent his Gentile companions ahead to Troas and stayed on at Philippi, apparently with Silas and Timothy. Then after the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the missionaries—accompanied by Luke (note the "we" section of vv.5–15)—went down to Neapolis, the port city of Philippi, and crossed the Aegean to Troas. It was evidently a difficult crossing because it took five days instead of two days as earlier (16:11).

3. The raising of Eutychus (20:7–12)

From 20:5 through the end of Acts (28:31), Luke's narrative gives considerable attention to ports of call, stopovers, and time spent on Paul's travels. The use of "we" (20:5–15; 21:1–18; 28:16) shows its eyewitness character.

7 Though Paul himself had not undertaken a mission at Troas (cf. 2Co 2:12–13), the Gospel had radiated out from many centers of influence in Galatia, Asia, Macedonia, and Achaia to penetrate the Gentile world of the eastern part of the Roman Empire. Thus at Troas Paul and his colleagues found a group of believers and met with them "to break bread" and to give instruction regarding the Christian life. The mention of their meeting "on the first day of the week" is the earliest unambiguous evidence we have for Christians gathering together for worship on that day (cf. Jn 20:19, 26; 1Co 16:2; Rev 1:10). The Christians met in the evening, which was probably the most convenient time because of the necessity of working during the day. They met to celebrate the Lord's Supper (cf. 1Co 10:16–17; 11:17–34; see comment on 2:42). Paul "spoke to" the believers till midnight.

8–9 "As Paul talked on and on," Eutychus went to sleep and fell to his death. He may simply have been bored by Paul's long discussion, though Luke's reference to the many torch lamps in the room suggests that lack of oxygen and the hypnotic effect of flickering flames caused Eutychus's drowsiness. But whatever its cause, his fall brought the meeting to a sudden and shocking halt. They dashed down and found him dead.

10–11 Of course, Paul also ran down. In an action reminiscent of Elijah and Elisha (cf. 1Ki 17:21; 2Ki 4:34–35), he "threw himself on the young man and put his arms around him," restoring Eutychus to life. Then they returned to their third-story room, had a midnight snack, and listened to Paul until dawn.

12 There is no hint that Paul took the incident as a rebuke for long-windedness. Nor were the people troubled by the meeting's length. They were eager to learn and only had Paul with them a short time. It was an evening of great significance for the church at Troas: Paul had taught them, they had fellowshiped together in the Lord's Supper, and they had witnessed a dramatic sign of God's presence and power. No wonder Luke says that they "were greatly comforted."

4. From Troas to Miletus (20:13–16)

13 Leaving Troas, Paul's companions took passage on a coastal vessel that was to stop at various ports along the western coast of Asia Minor. Paul, however, waited a while longer at Troas; then, while the boat went around Cape Lectum, he took the direct route to Assos on the Roman coastal road and got there in time to join his colleagues on board. He may have wanted to avoid the northeastern winds that blew around Cape Lectum or may just have wanted to be alone with God on the walk to Assos.

14–15 Assos was on the Roman coastal road and faced south toward the island of Lesbos. The boat went on to Mitylene, a splendid port on the southeast coast of Lesbos and the chief city of this largest of the islands of western Asia Minor. From there they went to Kios; then they passed through the channel separating Kios from the mainland of Asia Minor to come to Samos, an island directly west of Ephesus. So the boat arrived at Miletus, the ancient port at the mouth of the Meander River, some thirty miles south of Ephesus.

16 Paul had to miss the Passover at Jerusalem (cf. comments on vv.3, 5 6). But he wanted, if at all possible, to get to Jerusalem for Pentecost, the fiftieth day after Passover (cf. comment on 2:1). He had previously decided not to take a boat that stopped at Ephesus, for he evidently preferred to forego the emotional strain of another parting with the entire Ephesian church and to avoid (possibly) some local danger.

5. Paul's farewell address to the Ephesian elders (20:17–38)

Paul's farewell address to the Ephesian elders is the nearest approximation in Acts to the Pauline letters. Its general content recalls how in his letters Paul encouraged, warned, and exhorted his converts. Moreover, its theological themes and vocabulary are distinctly Pauline. In his three missionary sermons (13:16–41; 14:15–17; 17:22–31) and five defenses (chs.22–26), Paul addressed non-Christian audiences. But here he was speaking to Christians. It is significant that, in a situation similar to those he faced in many of his letters, this farewell to the Ephesian elders reads like a miniature letter of his. This becomes all the more significant when we recognize that nowhere else in Acts is there any evidence for a close knowledge of Paul's letters.

The address is constructed in a way familiar to readers of Paul's letters. Its body has three parts, which deal with (1) Paul's past ministry at Ephesus (vv.18–21), (2) Paul's present plans in going to Jerusalem (vv.22–24), and (3) the future of Paul himself and of the church at Ephesus (vv.25–31). It concludes with a blessing (v.32) and then adds further words of exhortation that point the hearers to Paul's example and the teachings of Jesus (vv.33–35). Heading each section is a formula: "you know" at v.18; "and now behold" at v.22; "and now behold I know" at v.25; and "and now" at v.32 (pers. tr.).

17 At Miletus the coastal boat docked for a number of days to load and unload cargo. So Paul took the opportunity of sending for the elders of the Ephesian church to join him at Miletus. The road back to Ephesus around the gulf was considerably longer than the thirty miles directly between Ephesus and Miletus. It would have taken some time to engage a messenger to summon the elders, who could hardly have made the return trip as quickly as a single runner. Doubtless, therefore, elders arrived at Miletus, at the earliest, on the third day of Paul's stay there.

18–21 Paul's address to the Ephesian elders begins with an apologia that closely parallels 1Th 2:1–12. As at Thessalonica, evidently Paul's Ephesian opponents had been prejudicing his converts against him in his absence; he therefore found it necessary to defend his conduct and teaching by appealing to his hearers' knowledge of him. The opposition at Ephesus seems to have been chiefly Jewish and to have insisted that full acceptance with God could come only through a fully developed Judaism. Therefore Paul had to declare that he had faithfully preached what was helpful to them, focusing on repentance to God and faith in the Lord Jesus—a content wholly sufficient for salvation (cf. Ro 10:9–10; 2Co 5:20–6:2; cf. Ac 26:20–23).

22–24 The second section of Paul's address concerns his plans to go to Jerusalem. Many have claimed a discrepancy between his being "compelled by the Spirit" to go to Jerusalem (vv.22–24) and his later being warned by the Spirit not to go to Jerusalem in 21:4, 10–14. But Luke opened Panel 6 of Acts with the statement that Paul's decision to go to Jerusalem was "by the Spirit" (cf. comment on 19:21), and nothing here is incompatible with that programmatic statement. Both compulsion and warning were evidently involved in the Spirit's direction, with both being impressed upon Paul by the Spirit at various times as he journeyed—probably through Christian prophets he met along the way. Nothing would keep him from completing his ministry of testifying to the grace of God throughout the eastern part of the empire by taking to the Jerusalem believers the money sent by Gentile believers in Galatia, Macedonia, Achaia, and Asia (see comment on 20:2).

25–27 In the third section of his address, Paul began by speaking of his own future expectations after visiting Jerusalem. He told the Ephesian elders that neither they nor any of those he had ministered to in the eastern part of the empire would ever see him again, for he was intending to leave his ministry there and, after visiting Jerusalem, move on to the western part of the empire with Rome as his base (Ro 15:23–29). He said he felt free from any further responsibility in the East because he had done all that he could in proclaiming "the whole will of God." At it turned out, however, it seems that Paul was able to return later to Ephesus (see 2Ti 4:9–13). Luke thus probably wrote this book before Paul's release and further ministry.

28–31 The third section of Paul's address continues with an exhortation to the Ephesian elders in light of what Paul sees will soon take place in the church. He warns regarding persecution from outside and apostasy within (cf. later evidence in 1Ti 1:19–20; 4:1–5; 2Ti 1:15; 2:17–18; 3:1–9; Rev 2:1–7). So he gives the elders the solemn imperative of v.28.

Theologically, much in Luke's précis of this address reflects Paul's thought at this stage in his life, as these are revealed in the letters he wrote at Ephesus (1 Corinthians), in Macedonia (2 Corinthians), and at Corinth (Romans) immediately prior to this time. Paul's use of the word "church" (GK 1711) in v.28 is a case in point. While in the salutations of Galatians and 1 and 2 Thessalonians he used "church" in a local sense (Gal 1:1; 1Th 1:1; 2Th 2:1), in addressing the Corinthians he used the word more universally: "To the church of God in Corinth" (1Co 1:2; 2Co 1:1). And thereafter in his writings "church" always appears in a universal sense (cf. esp. Ephesians and Colossians). Other phrases of Paul are his identification of God with Jesus in the phrase about God's obtaining the church for himself "with his own blood" (cf. Ro 9:5) and the reference to the blood of Jesus as instrumental in our redemption (Ro 3:25; 5:9; cf. Eph 1:7; 2:13; Col 1:20).

32 Paul concluded his address with a blessing, committing them "to God and to the word of his grace." Though Paul had to leave them, God was with them and so was his word—the word of grace that was able to build them up, give them an inheritance, and sanctify them. Again, the expressions used in Luke's summary of Paul's blessing comprise a catena of Pauline terms: "grace" (GK 5921, which appears in almost all his salutations and benedictions); "build up" (GK 3868; cf. 1Co 8:1; 10:23; 14:4, 17; 1Th 5:11); "inheritance" (GK 3100; cf. Ro 8:17; Gal 3:18; Eph 1:14; 5:5; Col 3:24); and "sanctified" (GK 39; cf. Ro 15:16; 1Co 1:2; 6:11; 7:14; Eph 5:26; 1Th 5:23).

33–35 Following his blessing, Paul adds a few words of exhortation (as in his letters), urging the elders of the Ephesian church to care for the needs of God's people without thought of material reward. He asks them to follow his example (cf. Php 3:17) and calls on them to remember the words of Jesus applicable here: "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Paul often related his ethical exhortations to the teachings of Jesus (cf. Ro 12–14; 1Th 4:1–12) and the personal example of Jesus (cf. Php 2:5–11), so he does that here. The specific words attributed to Jesus here do not appear in any of the Gospels. But they can be approximately paralleled by Lk 6:38.

36–38 When Paul had finished speaking, he knelt down with the Ephesian elders and prayed with them. On the basis of the parallels between this farewell address and Paul's letters, the substance of what he prayed for can be found in such places as Eph 1:15–23; Php 1:3–11; Col 1:3–14; and 1Th 1:2–3; 3:11–13; 5:23–24. After a deeply affectionate and sorrowful farewell with tears on both sides, Paul and his traveling companions boarded the ship.

6. On to Jerusalem (21:1–16)

The narrative of Paul's journey to Jerusalem is of literary and historical significance because it comprises the third of Luke's four "we" sections (21:1–18; cf. 16:10–17; 20:5–15; 27:1–28:16). This section is theologically significant because Luke seems to describe Paul's trip to Jerusalem in terms of Jesus' going up to Jerusalem to die. Luke knows, of course, that Paul did not die at Jerusalem. Yet he seems to sketch out Paul's journey to Jerusalem in terms that roughly parallel that of Jesus: (1) a similar plot by the Jews; (2) a handing over to the Gentiles (v.11); (3) a triple prediction on the way of coming suffering (20:22–24; 21:4, 10–11; cf. Luke 9:22, 44; 18:31–34); (4) a steadfast resolution (v.13); and (5) a holy resignation to God's will (v.14). As Luke has reserved for Paul the mission to the Gentiles, which Jesus saw as inherent in the Servant theology of Isa 61 (cf. Lk 4:16–21; see introductory comments on 12:25–28:31), so he describes Paul's journey to Jerusalem in terms reminiscent of the Suffering Servant.

1–2 After the emotional farewell, Paul and his party (including Luke) continued by boat to Cos. The next day they sailed to Rhodes, the capital of the large Dodecanese island of Rhodes just twelve miles off the mainland of Asia Minor. The next stop was Patara, a Lycian city on the southwest coast of Asia Minor with a fine harbor. There Paul and his party boarded a large merchant ship bound nonstop for Tyre, for they desired to travel quickly.

3–4 Paul and company sailed the four hundred miles from Patara to Tyre, the famous Phoenician seaport of Syria. A church had been established at Tyre through the witness of the Christian Hellenists forced to leave Jerusalem at the time of Stephen's martyrdom (cf. 11:19). While the ship was unloading, Paul had fellowship with the believers there for a week, who tried to dissuade him "through the Spirit" from going on to Jerusalem. This phrase most likely means that the Spirit's message, given through a Christian prophet, was the occasion for the believers' concern because they knew what lay in store for him (cf. vv.10–15).

5–7 After a scene reminiscent of the parting with the Ephesian elders (cf. 20:36–37), Paul and his companions sailed from Tyre. The ship went on to Ptolemais, another ancient Phoenician seaport south of Tyre. There it made harbor for a day, undoubtedly again to unload cargo. Once more Paul met with the believers of the city. Probably Christianity at Ptolemais also stemmed from the witness of the Hellenistic Christians (cf. 11:19).

8–9 Paul and his party came to Caesarea, the magnificent harbor and city built by Herod the Great as the port of Jerusalem and the Roman provincial capital of Judea (cf. comment on 10:1). There they stayed with Philip the evangelist, one of the seven who had been appointed in the early days of the Jerusalem church to take care of the daily distribution of food (cf. 6:1–6). He had evangelized in Samaria and the maritime plain of Palestine (cf. 8:4–40), after which he apparently settled at Caesarea for some twenty years. Paul stayed at his home for "a number of days." For a man in a hurry to get to Jerusalem, this delay of several days may seem strange. But he wanted to be in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (cf. 20:16)—not just get there as early as possible. So Paul's stay in Caesarea was probably a deliberate matter of timing.

Luke speaks of Philip's four unmarried daughters as prophetesses, yet says nothing about what they prophesied. Perhaps these prophesying maidens and their father gave Luke source material Luke and Acts, for example, on Philip's mission in Samaria and to the Ethiopian eunuch.

10–14 While Paul was at Caesarea, the Jerusalemite prophet Agabus (cf. 11:27–28) came there. With the belt that held Paul's outer cloak together, he tied his own feet and hands in an act of prophetic symbolism (cf. 1Ki 11:29–39; Isa 20:2–6; Eze 4:1–5:17) and announced that Paul would be bound by the Jews and handed over to the Gentiles. In response to this dramatic prophecy, the Caesarean believers—together with Paul's own traveling companions, begged him not to go. But Paul's determination to go to Jerusalem came from an inward spiritual constraint that could not be set aside (cf. 19:21; 20:22), for he was increasingly convinced that he must present the gift from the churches personally for it to be understood as the symbol of unity he intended it to be (cf. 1Co 16:4 with Ro 15:31). Paul well knew that his reception at Jerusalem might be less than cordial (cf. Ro 15:30–32).

15–16 Paul and his colleagues, accompanied by some Caesarean Christians, took the road up to Jerusalem, some sixty-five miles away to the southeast. They brought Paul to the home of Mnason, a Cypriot and an early follower of Jesus. Not everyone in the Jerusalem church would have been prepared to have Paul and his company of Gentile converts as house guests during Pentecost. But the Caesarean Christians knew their man.

C. Various Events and Paul's Defenses at Jerusalem (21:17–23:22)

1. Arrival at Jerusalem (21:17–26)

17–18 With these two verses, the third "we" section of Acts concludes, though Luke may have remained in Palestine for a longer time than vv.17–18 imply. Paul is now the focus of the narrative—particularly in his discussion with the leaders of the Jerusalem church, his arrest in the temple precincts, and his five speeches of defense at Jerusalem and Caesarea—and so Luke speaks only of him.

It was probably at Mnason's house that the believers gathered to receive Paul and his party "warmly." Then on the next day, as Luke says, they called on James, the resident leader of the Jerusalem church (cf. comments on 12:17; 15:13). Sharing with him in the administration of the church was a body of elders, who were also there to meet Paul and his colleagues.

19 On this occasion Paul "reported in detail what God had done among the Gentiles through his ministry." Undoubtedly he also presented the collection from the Gentile churches to James and the elders, for that was his chief motive for going to Jerusalem (see comments on vv.10–14). Nowhere in Acts (except later at 24:17) does Luke mention this collection, probably because he did not know how to explain to his Gentile readers (1) its significance as being much more than a way of currying favor and (2) Paul's fears that the Jerusalem Christians might not accept it.

To understand Paul's fears, we must realize that the Jerusalem church was increasingly being caught between its allegiance to the nation and its fraternal relation to Paul's Gentile mission. To accept the contribution from the Gentile churches was to be identified further with that mission and to drive another wedge between themselves and their compatriots. True, they had accepted such a contribution earlier (cf. 11:27–30) and had declared their fraternity with Paul in previous meetings (cf. Gal 2:6–10; Ac 15:13–29). But with the rising tide of Jewish nationalism and a growing body of scrupulous believers in the Jerusalem church, Jewish Christian solidarity with the Gentile mission was becoming more and more difficult to affirm if the Jerusalem church's relations with the nation were to be maintained and opportunities for an outreach to Israel kept open. Undoubtedly Paul recognized the increased tensions at Jerusalem. No wonder he feared that James and the elders, for the sake of their Jewish relations and mission, might feel themselves constrained to reject the contribution (Ro 15:31), thus severing, in effect, the connection between the Pauline churches and the Jerusalem church.

20–24 James and the elders responded to Paul's report and the gift from the churches by praising God. Yet they also urged Paul to join with four Jewish Christians who were fulfilling their Nazirite vows and to pay for their required offerings. In effect, they were saying to Paul, "We can accept this gift from the churches and so identify ourselves openly with your Gentile mission, if you will join with these men and identify yourself openly with the nation." Thus they were protecting themselves against Jewish recriminations while at the same time affirming their connection with Paul and his mission. And, as they saw it, they were providing Paul with a way of protecting himself against a slanderous accusation floating about that he was teaching Jews to apostatize from Judaism. In view of his having come earlier to Jerusalem in more placid circumstances to fulfill a Nazirite vow of his own (cf. 18:18–22), Paul would not have viewed such a suggestion as particularly onerous. It doubtless seemed to all concerned a particularly happy solution to the vexing problems that both Paul and the Jerusalem church were facing.

25 James and the elders reminded Paul of the fourfold Jerusalem decree (see comment on 15:20–21) of the early Christians' agreed-on basis for fellowship between Jewish and Gentile believers. Having urged Paul to follow their proposed course of action, the leaders of the Jerusalem church went on to assure him that this in no way rescinded their earlier decision to impose nothing further on Gentile converts than these four injunctions given for the sake of harmony within the church and in order not to impede the progress of the Jewish Christian mission.

26 Coming from abroad, Paul would have had to regain ceremonial purity by a seven-day ritual of purification before he could be present at the absolution ceremony of the four Jewish Christians in the Jerusalem temple. In keeping with this ritual, therefore, Paul reported to the priest at the start of his seven days of purification, informing him that he was providing the funds for the offerings of the four impoverished men who had taken Nazirite vows; he undoubtedly returned to the temple at regular prescribed intervals during the week (the third and seventh days) for the appropriate rites.

2. Arrest in the temple (21:27–36)

27–29 The strategy of Paul's taking a vow and paying for the Nazirite offerings hardly proved successful—probably nothing could have conciliated those whose minds were already prejudiced against him. Jews from Asia who had come to Jerusalem for Pentecost determined to take more effective action against him than they had at Ephesus. So toward the end of Paul's seven-day purification (possibly when he came to receive the water of atonement on the seventh day), they instigated a riot under the pretense that he had brought Trophimus, a Gentile representative from Ephesus, beyond the barrier that separated the Court of the Gentiles from the temple courts reserved for Jews alone. Archaeologists have found inscriptions at this point of the temple that read: "No foreigner is to enter within the balustrade and embankment around the sanctuary. Whoever is caught will have himself to blame for his death which follows." Roman authorities supported Jewish scruples about this matter and ratified the death penalty for any Gentile—even a Roman citizen—caught going beyond the balustrade.

The charge against Paul resulted from the fact that he and Trophimus were seen together in the city, which led to the assumption that they went together into the Holy Place in the temple. Paul would hardly have done this, however, since his purpose at this time was to appease Jewish susceptibilities.

30 "The whole city," Luke tells us in natural hyperbole, "was aroused." The crime Paul was alleged to have committed was a capital one and could easily ignite the fanatical zeal of the many pilgrims in Jerusalem. So they seized Paul in one of the inner courts of the temple and dragged him out to the Court of the Gentiles. Then the temple police who patrolled the area and stood guard at the gates leading into the inner courts closed the gates to prevent the inner courts from being defiled by the tumult and possible bloodshed.

31–32 Word of the riot came to the commander of the Roman garrison stationed in the Fortress of Antonia, a building built by Herod the Great to the north of the temple precincts where it could overlook the temple area to the south and the city to the north and west. With some soldiers and centurions, he rushed into the mob and prevented the people from beating Paul further. While the temple police were drawn from the ranks of the Levites (cf. comments on 4:1), the commander of the fortress was a Roman military officer, whose responsibility was to keep peace in the city. He represented Rome's interests and was to intervene in the affairs of the people on behalf of those interests.

33–36 The commander formally arrested Paul and ordered him bound with two chains. Undoubtedly he considered him a criminal and was prepared to treat him as one. But when he asked the mob about his crime, he got no clear answer. Therefore he ordered him to be taken into the fortress where he could be questioned directly and where a confession could be extracted from him. But the mob still pressed hard after their quarry, so hard that the soldiers had to drag Paul up the steps to the fortress. All the while the mob was crying out, "Away with him!" (i.e., "Kill him!" cf. Lk 23:18; Ac 22:22).

This fragment was one of several stones set on the Temple Mount warning Gentiles not to proceed any further. Paul was accused of taking a Gentile past this point. Courtesy Andre Lemaire.

3. Paul's defense before the people (21:37–22:22)

The account of Paul's defense before the people consists of three parts: (1) Paul's request to address the people (21:37–40), (2) his speech in defense (22:1–21), and (3) the people's response (22:22). In this first of Paul's five defenses, Luke's apologetic interests come to the fore in highlighting the nonpolitical character of Christianity (contrary to other messianic movements of the day, cf. 21:38) and in presenting Paul's command to preach to the Gentiles as being the major reason for Jewish opposition to the Gospel (cf. 22:10–22).

37–38 At the head of the stone stairway leading into the Fortress of Antonia, Paul asked for permission to say something to Claudius Lysias, the commander (cf. 23:26). The commander was startled to hear his charge speaking in fluent Greek and surmised that perhaps the prisoner was the Egyptian Jew who three years earlier had appeared in Jerusalem claiming to be a prophet and had led a large band of followers into the wilderness and then to the Mount of Olives in preparation for the messianic overthrow of Jerusalem. Most people had considered him a charlatan, and Felix and his soldiers had driven him off.

39–40 But Paul assured the commander that he was not the Egyptian revolutionary; rather, he was from Tarsus. The epithet "no ordinary city," by which Paul referred to Tarsus, was used by various cities to publicize their greatness; Paul was proud of the city of his birth. The Roman commander, probably impressed by Paul's courteous composure under such trying circumstances and also hoping to gain some insight into the cause of the riot, gave him permission.

Paul then began his speech to the crowd "in Aramaic" (or "in Hebrew"; see NIV note). Though probably frustrating for the commander, this was appreciated by the crowd and elicited for him a temporary measure of goodwill.

22:1–2 Paul opens his defense with the formal Jewish address "Men, brothers" (cf. 7:2). Many commentators have objected that this speech does not fit the occasion, for it makes no mention of the people's charge that Paul had defiled the temple by taking Trophimus, a Gentile, into its inner courts (cf. 21:28b–29). In reality, however, this speech deals eloquently with the major charge against him—that of being a Jewish apostate (cf. 21:28a)—by setting in a Jewish context all that had happened in his Christian life and by insisting that what others might consider apostasy really came to him as a revelation from heaven. Indeed, the speech parallels much of what Luke has already given us about Paul's conversion in 9:1–19 and what he will give us again in 26:2–23. Such repetition impresses something of exceptional importance indelibly on his readers' minds (cf. introductory comment on 9:1–30). Yet the variations in each of these three accounts correspond to their respective contexts and purposes.

3 The triad of birth, upbringing, and training was a conventional way in antiquity of describing a man's youth. What Paul here is, "I am a Jew, 'born' in Tarsus of Cilicia, 'brought up' in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, and 'instructed' in the strict manner of the law of our fathers." That is, his Jewishness cannot be disputed (cf. 2Co 11:22; Php 3:5), and he insists that with such a background he was as zealous for all that Judaism stands for as any of those in the crowd before him (cf. Gal 1:14).

4–5 As evidence of his zeal for God and the Jewish religion, Paul cites his earlier persecution of Christians (cf. comments on 9:1–2). The ascription "this Way" picks up what was the earliest self-designation of the first believers in Jesus at Jerusalem—namely, "those of the Way" (cf. comment on 9:2).

6–9 This description of Christ's encounter with Paul on the road to Damascus, except for stylistic differences, closely parallels the one in 9:3–6 (cf. comments there). As in Acts 9, he maintains that his conversion to Jesus as God's Messiah was the result of a heavenly confrontation and that it was not something Paul originated subjectively or others imposed on him. It was, indeed, "Jesus of Nazareth" who confronted him, and this places his messianology in the matrix of the Jewish homeland. But it was the risen and ascended Jesus of Nazareth, the heavenly Christ, who rebuked him and turned him about spiritually; this alone explains his new understanding of life and his new outlook on all things Jewish.

10–11 In response to the heavenly confrontation and as a good Jew who thought first in terms of how he should act in obedience to divine revelation, Paul's question was "What shall I do, Lord?" He was told to go into Damascus, where the divine will would be revealed to him. So in his blindness he was led into Damascus by his companions to await instructions as to God's purposes for him.

12–16 At Damascus Paul was visited by Ananias, God's messenger to bring about renewal of Paul's sight and to announce God's purpose for him as a witness "to all men." The Jewish matrix of Paul's commission is highlighted by the description of Ananias as "a devout observer of the law and highly respected by all the Jews living there" (v.12); and the Jewish flavor of the episode is strengthened by the expression "the God of our fathers" and the messianic title "the Righteous One" (v.14; cf. 3:14). The words "Brother Saul, receive your sight" (v.13) summarize the fuller statement reported in 9:17. What was important in the present circumstance was not to reproduce the exact words of Ananias but to emphasize that the commission Paul received from the risen Christ was communicated by a pious Jew who spoke in distinctly Jewish terms. Later on, when Paul defended himself before Agrippa II (ch. 26), there was no need for this particular emphasis; therefore, the substance of what Ananias said in the name of the Lord Jesus is there included in the words spoken by the heavenly voice on the Damascus Road (cf. 26:16–18). Having thus delivered the Lord's message, Ananias called on Paul to respond: "Get up, be baptized and wash your sins away, calling on his name" (v.16); cf. 2:38).

17–21 Paul's commission at Damascus to be God's witness "to all men" was reaffirmed and amplified in a vision he received as he was praying in the temple, which most likely occurred on Paul's return to Jerusalem three years after his conversion (cf. 9:26–29; Gal 1:18–19). At that time, Luke tells us, Paul faced opposition from the Hellenistic Jews of the city, who viewed him as a renegade and sought to kill him (cf. 9:29). At a period in his life when he most needed divine direction and support, the same heavenly personage he met on the road to Damascus, the risen and exalted Jesus, directed him to "leave Jerusalem immediately, because they will not accept your testimony about me" (v.18). More importantly, the same exalted Jesus also ordered him: "Go, I will send you far away to the Gentiles" (v.21). Jerusalem, therefore, Paul says, was his intended place of witness, and the temple was God's place of revelation. Nevertheless, his testimony was refused in the city, and by revelation his earlier commission "to all men" was to have explicit reference to Gentiles, those who are "far away" (GK 3426; cf. comments on 2:39).

22 During most of Paul's defense, the crowd listened with a certain respect, for he had spoken mostly of Israel's messianic hope and had done so in a thoroughly Jewish context. Even his identification of Jesus with his people's messianology and with the Revealer from heaven, while straining the credibility of many in the crowd, could have been tolerated by a people given more to orthopraxis (authorized practice) than orthodoxy (correct thought). When, however, Paul spoke of being directed by divine revelation to leave Jerusalem and go far away to Gentiles who had no relation to Judaism, that was "the last straw." In effect, Paul was saying that Gentiles could be approached directly with God's message of salvation without first being related to the nation and its institutions. This was tantamount to placing Jews and Gentiles on an equal footing before God, and for Judaism that was the height of apostasy indeed! Paul was thus shouted down, and the crowd called for his death.

4. Paul claims his Roman citizenship (22:23–29)

23–24 The garrison commander, puzzled why they were rioting and probably unable to understand Paul's Aramaic, decided to find out the truth of the matter by scourging Paul (see comment on Mk 15:15). His earlier friendliness toward Paul soured, and the brutal part of his nature and job came to the fore. By this time Paul had already received thirty-nine lashes at the hands of Jewish authorities five times and beatings with rods by the order of Roman magistrates three times (cf. 2Co 11:24–25; see comments on 9:30; 11:25; 16:22–24). But this type of flogging was far more brutal than these others. Here Paul was at the brink of the kind of unjust punishment Christ endured when Pilate, in a travesty of justice, had him flogged after declaring him innocent (Mk 15:15; Jn 18:38–19:1).

25 Roman citizens were exempt from examination under torture. In such trials there first had to be a formulation of charges and penalties, then a formal accusation laid, and then a hearing before a Roman magistrate and his advisory cabinet. Therefore, as the soldiers "stretched him [Paul] out to flog him," he said to the centurion in charge, "Is it legal for you to flog a Roman citizen who hasn't even been found guilty?"

26–28 At this time, Roman citizenship (GK 4486; also 4871) was a highly prized right conferred only on those of high social or governmental standing, those who had done some exceptional service for Rome, or those able to bribe some imperial or provincial administrator to have their names included on a list of candidates. In the second and third centuries A.D., the use of bribery became increasingly common, but earlier it accounted for only a small minority of citizens. The names of new citizens were recorded on one of the thirty-five tribal lists at Rome and on their local municipal register. Succeeding generations of a citizen's family possessed at birth a registration of their Roman status and were registered as citizens on the taxation tables of their respective cities.

No article of apparel distinguished a Roman citizen from the rest of the people except the toga, which only Roman citizens could wear. But even at Rome the toga was unpopular because of its cumbersomeness and was worn only on state occasions. Papers validating citizenship were kept in family archives and not usually carried on one's person. The verbal claim to Roman citizenship was accepted at face value; penalties for falsifying documents and making false claims of citizenship were exceedingly stiff.

We do not know how and when Paul's family acquired Roman citizenship. Most likely one of Paul's ancestors received it for valuable services rendered to a Roman administrator or general in either the Gischala region of northern Palestine or at Tarsus. When Paul claimed his Roman citizenship, the centurion immediately stopped the proceedings and reported to the commander: "This man is a Roman citizen" (v.26). This brought the commander immediately to question Paul, who convinced him that he was indeed a Roman citizen (v.27). His own citizenship, the commander said, was purchased by a large sum of money—probably, since his name was Claudius Lysias (23:26), during the reign of Claudius through paying a member of Claudius's court. Paul's response, "But I was born a citizen" (v.28), implies his high estimate of his citizenship.

29 That Paul was a Roman citizen put the situation in a different light (cf. 16:37–39). Examination under torture, while suitable for ordinary people in the empire, had to be abandoned; some other way of determining the nature of the charge had to be found. Undoubtedly the commander shuddered as he realized how close he had come to perpetrating a serious offense against a Roman citizen.

5. Paul's defense before the Sanhedrin (22:30–23:11)

The irregular structure of Luke's account of Paul's defense before the Sanhedrin evidently reflects the tumultuous character of the session itself. Three matters pertaining to Luke's apologetic purpose come to the fore: (1) Christianity is rooted in the Jewish doctrine of the resurrection of the dead (cf. 23:6); (2) the debate Paul was engaged in regarding Christianity's claims must be viewed as first of all a Jewish intramural affair (cf. 23:7–10); and (3) the ongoing proclamation of the Gospel in the Gentile world stems from a divine mandate (cf. 23:11).

30 Still unsuccessful in ascertaining why the people were so angry at Paul, the commander ordered the Jewish Sanhedrin (cf. comment on 4:5) to come together to interrogate his captive. As a Roman citizen, Paul had a right to know the nature of the charges against him and the penalties involved before formal accusations were laid. The commander also needed to know these things in order to decide what else should be done. Perhaps he had talked with Paul after releasing him from his chains (cf. 21:33). Since this was a religious matter, he decided to have it clarified before the highest judicial body of Judaism. As a Roman military commander, he had no right to participate in the Sanhedrin's deliberations. But as the Roman official charged with keeping peace in Jerusalem, he could order the Sanhedrin to meet to determine the cause of the riot.

23:1 Paul began his defense by addressing the members of the Sanhedrin as "Men, brothers" (see comment on 22:1–2). Then he asserted, "I have fulfilled my duty to God in all good conscience to this day"—a bold claim but not without parallel on Paul's part in other situations (cf. 20:18–21, 26–27; 24:16; Ro 15:19b, 23; Php 3:6b; 2Ti 4:7).

2 This so enraged the high priest Ananias that, in violation of the law, he ordered those near Paul to strike him on the mouth. Ananias served as high priest from A.D. 48–58 (or 59) and was known for his avarice and liberal use of violence. As a brutal and scheming man, he was hated by Jewish nationalists for his pro-Roman policies.

3 Indignant at the affront, Paul lashed out at Ananias and accused him of breaking the Jewish law, which safeguarded the rights of defendants and presumed them innocent until proved guilty. Paul was not yet charged with a crime, let alone tried and found guilty.

Anyone who behaved as Ananias did, Paul knew, was bound to come under God's judgment. Paul's words were more prophetic than he realized, for Ananias's final days were lived as a hunted animal and ended at the hands of his own people.

Paul's retort to Ananias' order seems quite out of character for a follower of the one who "when they hurled their insults at him, he did not retaliate; when he suffered, he made no threats" (1Pe 2:23). Paul momentarily lost his composure—as evidently Ananias hoped he would—and put himself at a disadvantage before the council. We cannot excuse this sudden burst of anger, though we must not view it self-righteously. We are made of the same stuff as Paul, and his provocation was greater than most of us will ever face. Paul himself realized his wrong and quickly acknowledged it.

4–5 At regular meetings of the Sanhedrin, the high priest presided and would have been identifiable for that reason. But this was not a regular meeting, and the high priest may not have occupied his usual place or worn his robes of office. Also, since Paul had visited Jerusalem only sporadically during the past twenty years, and since the high priest's office had passed from one to another within certain priestly families (cf. comment on Jn 18:12–14), Paul presumably did now know who the high priest was in A.D. 58. Nor, in fact, would he have known any of the current high priestly claimants by sight. All he could do when told he was speaking to the high priest was apologize—though more to the office than to the man—and acknowledge by citing Scripture (Ex 22:28) that, while he did not accept the view that the OT law provided the supreme direction for life (cf. 1Co 2:15; 9:20–21), he had no intention in being guided by Christ and his Spirit to act contrary to the law or do less than the law commanded.

6 Ananias's interruption changed the entire course of the meeting but not as he had expected. Instead of being cowed into submission, Paul began again (note the resumptive use of the formal address used in v.1). This time he took the offensive. "I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee," he declared; "I stand on trial because of my hope in the resurrection of the dead" (cf. 24:21; 26:6–8; 28:20b). Pharisaism in Paul's day was not as stereotyped as it later became under rabbinic development. He still considered himself a Pharisee because of his personal observance of the law and his belief in the resurrection, even though he did not separate himself from Gentiles. The phrase "the resurrection of the dead" seems to have been used by Paul and by Luke to refer to the whole doctrine of resurrection as that doctrine was validated and amplified by the resurrection of Jesus (cf. 17:32 in the context of 17:31).

7–10 Paul's declaration served to divide the council, with Sadducees on the one side (cf. comment on 4:1) and Pharisees on the other (cf. comment on 5:34). Some of the Pharisees saw in the inquisition of Paul an attempt by the Sadducees to discredit Pharisaism and its theology, and they rose to his defense. The Sadducees, however, kept pressing their objections, and the debate soon got out of hand. So violent, in fact, did it become that the commander had to bring in soldiers and rescue Paul. Once more the commander was frustrated in his effort to learn exactly why the Jews were so adamantly opposed to his prisoner.

11 Paul had feared such a reception at Jerusalem (cf. 20:22–23; 21:13; Ro 15:31), and now his worst fears were being realized. He had planned to go to Rome (see comment on 19:21). But developments at Jerusalem were building up to a point where it appeared his life could come to an end in the city through any number of circumstances beyond his control. Undoubtedly he was despondent as he awaited the next turn of events in his cell in the fortress. But "the following night," the risen and exalted Jesus appeared to Paul—as he has done at other critical moments in his ministry (cf. 18:9–10; 22:17–21)—and encouraged him by his presence. "Take courage!" he said, and he assured Paul that he would yet testify in Rome as he had done in Jerusalem. This assurance must have meant much to Paul in the ensuing months.

6. A plot to kill Paul (23:12–22)

12–15 Failing in their earlier plot to kill Paul in the temple precincts, more than forty fanatical Jews (probably many of them Asian Jews who had instigated the earlier plot, cf. 21:27–29) resolved to do away with him by ambushing him in the narrow streets of Jerusalem. For this they needed a pretext to lure him out of the fortress. So they arranged with "the chief priest and elders" to ask for Paul's return before the Sanhedrin for further questioning. They pledged to kill him as he was being brought from the Fortress of Antonia to the hall of the Sanhedrin (cf. comment on 4:5). To show their determination, they vowed not to eat or drink until they had accomplished their purpose. The conspirators' plan, though violating both the letter and the spirit of Jewish law pertaining to the Sanhedrin, was in keeping with the character of the high priest Ananias (cf. comment on 23:2).

16–17 We know nothing about Paul's sister and his nephew (this is the only reference anywhere to Paul's relatives), nor do we know how the young man learned of the plot. With his uncle in mortal danger, Paul's nephew could not stand by without warning him. After all, in Judaism the saving and preservation of life takes precedence over everything else. As a Roman citizen under protective custody, Paul could receive visitors—among them his nephew. On hearing the warning, Paul asked one of the centurions to take his nephew to the commander.

18–22 The seriousness with which the commander took the warning about the plot shows that he knew Ananias was the kind of man who could support such action and realized that Jewish feeling against Paul was strong enough to nurture it.

D. Imprisonment and Defenses at Caesarea (23:23–26:32)

1. Imprisonment at Caesarea (23:23–35)

23–25 Since the commander could not risk having a Roman citizen assassinated while in his custody, he took steps to transfer Paul to the jurisdiction of Felix, the governor of the province of Judea. He wanted to get Paul to Caesarea, the provincial capital (cf. comment on 10:1), as quickly as possible and before the conspirators got wind of it. So he ordered two centurions to ready two hundred infantry and seventy cavalry, together with two hundred "spearmen" (more likely, the word used here means "additional mounts and pack animals"), leaving for Caesarea at nine that evening. In addition, he ordered that "mounts" be provided for Paul—probably not only a horse for Paul but also another one for either riding or carrying his baggage, or both.

The purpose of the detachment was security and speed—the first being provided by the two hundred infantry and the second by the seventy cavalry with their two hundred extra mounts and pack animals, many of which may also have been used to carry the infantry during the night. If the garrison at Jerusalem consisted of about six hundred men and the word "spearmen" refers not to infantry but to additional mounts and pack animals, then the commander considered the plot against Paul serious enough to commit almost half the garrison at the Fortress of Antonia to escort Paul, with most of them due to return in a day or two (cf. v.32).

In saying that the commander wrote a letter "as follows" (lit., "of this type"), Luke suggests that what follows is only the general purport of the letter. He would hardly have been in a position to read the correspondence between a Roman commander and a Roman provincial governor. What he knew of the letter probably came from Paul, who himself would only have known about its contents as the governor used it in the initial questioning of his prisoner.

26 A letter beginning with a salutation that (1) named the sender, (2) named the recipient, and (3) sent greetings was the standard form for a letter of antiquity and is common to every letter of the NT, except Hebrews and 1 John.

For the first time in Acts, the commander's name is given. He was evidently a free-born Greek who had worked his way up through the ranks of the Roman army and at some time paid an official of Claudius's government to receive Roman citizenship (cf. comment on 22:28). At that time his Greek name Lysias became his Roman cognomen, and he then took the nomen Claudius in honor of the emperor. Felix was the governor of the Roman province of Judea from A.D. 52–59 (see comments on 24:1). The title "Excellency" (GK 3196) here denotes an honorific title for highly placed officials in the Roman government (cf. 24:3; 26:25).

27–30 The body of the letter summarizes the events from the riot in the temple precincts to the commander's discovery of a plot against Paul's life. Paul may very well have smiled to himself when he heard how Lysias stretched the truth to his own benefit in claiming to have rescued Paul from the mob because "I had learned that he is a Roman citizen," omitting any reference to the proposed flogging. The most important part of the letter, that concerning Lysias's evaluation of the Jewish opposition to Paul, was clear: "I found that the accusation had to do with questions about their law, but there was no charge against him that deserved death or imprisonment" (v.29). That was of great significance not only for Paul's fortunes but also for Luke's apologetic purpose.

31–32 The soldiers carried out their orders and brought Paul during the night to Antipatris, a town built by Herod the Great in honor of his father Antipater. Having left Jerusalem at nine in the evening (cf. v.23), the detachment lost no time in covering the distance by morning. When the conspirators were left far behind and ambush was less likely, the infantry turned back to Jerusalem and the cavalry took Paul to Caesarea, some forty miles distant.

33–35 At Caesarea, the prisoner and Lysias's letter were turned over to Felix, the governor. On reading the letter, he questioned Paul on the basis of its contents. Had Paul been from one of the client kingdoms in Syria or Asia Minor, Felix would probably have wanted to consult the ruler of the kingdom. But on learning that Paul was from the Roman province of Cilicia, he felt competent as a provincial governor to hear the case himself, when Paul's accusers arrived from Jerusalem. In the meantime, Paul was kept under guard in the palace Herod the Great built for himself at Caesarea. It now served as the governor's headquarters and also had cells for prisoners.

2. Paul's defense before Felix (24:1–27)

In his account of Paul's defense before Felix, Luke gives almost equal space to (1) the Jewish charges against Paul (vv.1–9), (2) Paul's reply to these charges (vv.10–21), and (3) Felix's response (vv.22–27). He wants to show that despite the devious skill of the Jewish charges and the notorious cruelty and corruptibility of Felix, no other conclusions can be drawn from Paul's appearance before him than that (1) Christianity had nothing to do with political sedition and (2) Jewish opposition to Christianity sprang from the Paul was removed from Jerusalem and spent a night in the fortress at Antipatris (v.31), the ruins of which are shown here.

Christian claim to legitimate fulfillment of the hopes of Judaism.

1 "Five days later" evidently means five days from Paul's arrest in the temple (cf. Paul's remark that "no more than twelve days ago I went up to Jerusalem to worship," v.11). With the notations of time and of place ("Caesarea"), the names of Paul's adversaries ("the high priest Ananias . . . with some of the elders and a lawyer named Tertullus"), and the identification of the judge ("the governor," i.e., Felix), the stage is set for Paul's defense. Ananias characteristically decided to prosecute Paul as quickly as possible (cf. comment on 23:2). To present his trumped-up charges as effectively as possible, he employed a lawyer named Tertullus. This man was probably a Hellenistic Jew who had expertise in affairs of the empire and had manifested strong allegiance to Judaism.

The governor, Antonius Felix, was born a slave and freed by Antonia, the mother of the emperor Claudius. He was a brother of Pallas, who was also a freedman of Antonia and became a good friend of the young prince Claudius. Through the influence of Pallas, Felix was appointed in A.D. 48 to a subordinate government post in Samaria. In 52 Claudius appointed him governor of Judea. History tells us that he was a master of cruelty and lust. During his governorship, insurrections and anarchy increased throughout Palestine. Try as he would to put down the uprisings and regain control, his brutal methods only alienated the Jewish population more and led to further disturbances. Despite his low birth, Felix had a succession of three wives—the third being Drusilla, the youngest daughter of Agrippa I, who had been unhappy as the wife of Azizus, king of Emesa; Felix desired her because of her beauty and persuaded her to leave Azizus for him. The relationship between these two seems to have been based upon greed, lust, and expectations of grandeur.

2–4 Tertullus began the case for the prosecution with the customary flattery for the judge in words chosen for his purpose. Many Jews would have been shocked to hear the high priest's mouthpiece attributing "a long period of peace" and "reforms" to Felix's administration; and few would have joined in any expression of "profound gratitude" for the governor's frequent displays of ferocity, cruelty, and greed. But Tertullus knew how to appeal to Felix's vanity. It was also customary to promise brevity, though such is human nature that the promise was rarely kept.

5–9 The three charges laid against Paul (v.5) are probably only a précis of the entire case. Tertullus obviously intended to create the impression of political sedition against Rome in his first two charges (disturbing the peace among the Jews; being a ringleader of the Nazarenes) and to argue the right for Judaism to impose the death penalty in his third charge (attempting to desecrate the temple; cf. comment on 21:28–29). During his reign over Judea, Felix had repeatedly crucified the leaders of various uprisings and had killed many of their followers for disturbing the Pax Romana. Tertullus's endeavor, as supported by the high priest and the Jewish elders with him, was to put Paul on the same level as these brigands, with the hope that in his insensitivity to the issues, Felix would act in his usual manner simply on the basis of their testimony. As in Jesus' trial before Pilate, their accusations were framed principally in terms of political sedition (cf. Lk 23:2, 5), though all along their main grievance was religious.

10 Invited to respond, Paul also began with a complimentary statement—but a briefer and truer one. Felix had been in contact with the Jewish nation in Palestine for over a decade, first in Samaria and then as governor over the entire province of Judea. Therefore Paul was pleased to make his defense before one who was in a position to know the situation as it was and to understand his words in their context.

11–13 In refuting the charges against him, Paul dealt with each in turn. First, it was "no more than twelve days ago" that he came to Jerusalem, not for political agitation but for worship. In such a short time, he implied, there would hardly have been sufficient opportunity to foment a revolt. Second, his accusers could hardly charge him with being a ringleader of any sedition, for he was alone when they arrested him in the temple and they could not cite any time when he was stirring up a crowd anywhere in the city (v.12). Third, their claim that he desecrated the temple was unproved because it was entirely without foundation (v.13).

14–16 The real reason Ananias and the Jewish elders opposed him, Paul insisted, was religious. He was "a follower of the Way," a Jewish group that agreed with the basic doctrines of Judaism. And while he differed from Ananias and the elders in his acceptance of "the Way," his conscience in the matter was "clear before God and man" (cf. 23:1).

Paul's statements about having "the same hope in God as these men" and accepting "a resurrection of both the righteous and the wicked" have led to much comment since Ananias himself would not have accepted the doctrine of a resurrection (cf. comment on 4:1 regarding Sadducean beliefs) and Paul in his letters speaks only of a resurrection of the righteous (cf. 1Co 15:12–58; 1Th 4:13–5:11; 2Th 2:1–12). But evidently some Pharisees were among the elders who had come down to Caesarea with Ananias (cf. v.1). And though Sadducees did not accept the hope of a resurrection, Paul as a Pharisee was probably sufficiently self-confident to believe that it was the Pharisaic hope that characterized—or, at least, should characterize—all true representations of the Jewish faith. Furthermore, while Paul in his letters speaks only of a resurrection of the righteous (as also did our Lord in Lk 14:14; 20:35–36), this is probably because such treatment is pastoral in nature and deals only with the righteous.

17 Reconstructing for Felix what happened in Jerusalem, Paul spoke of coming to Jerusalem "to bring my people gifts for the poor and to present offerings" (cf. v.11). This is the only time Luke mentions the collection for the poor at Jerusalem, which was so dear to Paul's own heart (cf. Ro 15:25–27, 31; 1Co 16:1–4). Some have objected that for Paul to say that the gift was "for my nation" adds a note of insincerity, for certainly Paul's efforts were directed toward relieving the plight of poor believers in the Jerusalem church and not of Jews in general. Yet Paul brought the gift not only for the relief of Christians and as a symbol of unity between believers but also with a view to the conversion of the entire nation. By aiding that branch of the church whose mission it was to call the nation to its Messiah, he was indirectly engaged in a mission to his own nation (cf. Ro 11:13b–14).

18–21 Continuing the summary of what took place at Jerusalem, Paul spoke of his arrest in the temple (v.18) and his arraignment before the Sanhedrin (v.20). But, he insisted, he made no attempt to create a disturbance; rather, he was taken by the crowd while worshiping in a ceremonially clean condition. If the Asian Jews who instigated the riot had any serious charge against him, they should have been present to accuse him before the governor. Roman law imposed heavy penalties upon accusers who abandoned their charges, and the disappearance of accusers often meant the withdrawal of a charge. Their absence, therefore, suggested that they had nothing against him that would stand up in a Roman court of law. Nor did the Sanhedrin, Paul went on, find any crime in him—except that he believed in the resurrection of the dead. Therefore, Paul declared, he was on trial because of his belief in "the resurrection of the dead" (v.21).

22–23 Felix seems to have summed up the situation accurately. After a decade in Palestine (cf. comment on v.1), he was "well acquainted with the Way" (v.22). While certainly not a Christian, he could see that the Jewish charges against Paul were entirely religious in nature—even though presented in the guise of political sedition. He therefore sought to preserve the Pax Romana within his jurisdiction simply by removing the possibility of confrontation between the disputants and by delaying judicial procedure. So Paul was placed under protective custody in the palace of Herod the Great, and Ananias was given the deceptive promise of a decision being reached when the commander Lysias came down to Caesarea and presented his testimony (which he had already given in his letter, cf. 23:25–30). As a Roman citizen, Paul was allowed some freedom and permitted visits from friends to care for his needs. But both he and Ananias seem to have realized that Felix had no intention of bringing the case to a decision in the near future; and they evidently, each for his own reasons, decided to await the appointment of a new provincial governor (anticipated soon) before pressing for a resolution.

24–26 Added to the description of Felix's response is this vignette about the interaction between the Roman governor, his Jewish wife, and the Christian apostle, which elaborates further the nature of Felix's response and highlights one aspect of Paul's continued, though restricted, ministry while under protective custody at Caesarea. Drusilla apparently still had some qualms of conscience about her marriage to Felix and therefore took the opportunity to send for Paul in order to hear his message.

Paul spoke to Felix and his wife about the necessity of "faith in Christ Jesus" (v.24). He also made it plain that this involved an ethical life, for he spoke of "righteousness, self-control and the judgment to come" (v.25)—three subjects Felix and Drusilla particularly needed to learn about! Felix ordered him to stop, for he became afraid in the presence of such preaching. Apparently Drusilla was offended by what she considered Paul's moralistic ranting, for Luke makes no mention of her having listened to him again. Felix's corruption led him to call Paul often before him in hope of getting a bribe for his release. He must have believed that Paul had access to some money—perhaps through a large number of Christian friends who visited him (cf. 24:23; 27:3).

27 After two years Festus replaced Felix as governor of Judea. According to Josephus, Felix's downfall came through an outbreak of hostilities between Jews and Greeks at Caesarea, with both claiming dominant civil rights in the city. Using the Syrian troops under his command, Felix's intervention retaliated on the Jews. Many were killed, taken prisoner, or plundered of their wealth; and a delegation of Jews went to Rome to complain. Felix was recalled to Rome and replaced by Festus in A.D. 60.

During those two years, Paul remained in Herod's palace at Caesarea—with Felix undoubtedly rationalizing his imprisonment as a protection for Paul and a favor to the Jews. It must have been an extremely tedious time for Paul. Luke, however, probably made full use of these two years to investigate "everything from the beginning" about Christianity (cf. Lk 1:3). And while we cannot say whether he at this time produced either a preliminary draft of his gospel or any portion of Acts, it is probable that he became quite familiar with (1) the traditions comprising Mark's gospel, (2) other materials having to do with the story of Jesus that he would also incorporate into his gospel, (3) accounts circulating in Palestine of events in the early church that he would include in the first half of Acts, and (4) recollections and interpretations of Paul as to his activities before Luke joined him.

3. Paul's defense before Festus (25:1–12)

Luke's account of Paul's defense before Festus is the briefest of his five defenses. Most of it parallels in summary fashion Paul's appearance before Felix. The new element is Paul's appeal to Caesar, setting the stage for his journey to Rome. Luke's apologetic purpose here is to show that only when Roman administrators were largely ignorant of the facts of the case were concessions made to Jewish opposition that could prove disastrous for the Christian movement.

1 For the Jewish population of Palestine, Porcius Festus was a welcome successor to Felix. Nothing is known of him before he assumed the governorship of Judea. Nor can the time of his nomination for the post or his arrival in Palestine be precisely fixed, though it was probably sometime in A.D. 60. He inherited all the troubles and tensions that were mounting during Felix's maladministration, which culminated in the disaster of 66–70. His term of office was cut short by his death in 62.

The situation in Palestine demanded immediate action to bring together opposing factions within the Jewish nation. Therefore on arriving in Palestine, Festus took only three days to settle in at Caesarea before going up to Jerusalem to meet with the leaders of the nation.

2 The high priest at Jerusalem when Festus took office was Ishmael, appointed by Herod Agrippa II to succeed Ananias during the final days of Felix's governorship. Ananias, however, continued to exercise a dominant role in Jerusalem affairs right up to his death in 66 at the hands of Jewish nationalists. This is probably why Luke speaks of "the chief priests" and not just the high priest as appearing with the elders before Festus when he came to Jerusalem (cf. 4:23; 9:14; 22:30; 23:14; 25:15).

3 Counting on the new governor's inexperience, the Jewish authorities urged Festus to transfer Paul's case to Jerusalem for trial. They were hoping to ambush and murder him on the way (cf. 23:12–15). Perhaps also they hoped that with such a change of venue, if their plans for an ambush were again frustrated, they could arrange to have Paul tried before the Sanhedrin on the single charge of profaning the temple—for which they had the right to impose the death penalty (see comment on 21:27–29).

4–5 Unwittingly, Festus overturned their plans by inviting the Jewish leaders to return with him to Caesarea and press charges against Paul there. Evidently he desired to carry out only such business as was absolutely necessary on his first visit to Jerusalem and preferred to preside over any extended trial back at Caesarea—particularly since the prisoner was already there.

6–8 Festus convened court and ordered Paul brought before him, thus reopening the whole case against him, and the Jewish accusers restated their charges (cf. 24:5–6). But again they produced no witnesses, nor could they prove their charges. As for Paul, he stoutly continued to insist on his innocence (v.8). So the impasse remained.

9 Festus was at a loss to know what to make of the Jewish charges and Paul's denials (cf. vv.18–20a). Yet the Sanhedrin plainly wanted the case transferred to Jerusalem for trial; and as the new governor of Judea, Festus saw no reason why he could not concede the Jews this. He seems not to have fully appreciated what lay behind their request and apparently thought it would be politically wise to gain their goodwill by a change of venue.

10–11 Paul knew that to return to Jerusalem would place him in serious jeopardy. It would likely involve being turned over to the Sanhedrin; for once he was in Jerusalem, the Jewish authorities would pressure Festus to have Paul turned over to them for trial on the charge of profaning the temple. "I am now standing before Caesar's court, where I ought to be tried," he asserted. But being unsure as to just what action Festus might take in the matter if left at that, Paul went on to claim one final right he had as a Roman citizen: "I appeal to Caesar!"

Roman law at this time protected Roman citizens by their right of appealing to the emperor. Such appeals could only be made in cases that went beyond the normal jurisdiction of a governor—particularly where the threat of violent coercion or capital punishment by provincial administrators was present. It may seem somewhat strange that Paul should have preferred to appeal to the emperor Nero (A.D. 54–68), the persecutor of Christians at Rome, rather than continue to entrust his case to Festus, whether at Caesarea or Jerusalem. But the early years of Nero's rule, under the influence of the Stoic philosopher Seneca and the prefect of the praetorian guard Afranius Burrus, were looked upon as something of a Golden Age. There was little in A.D. 60 that warned of Nero's character and relations with Christianity during the last five years of his life.

12 Festus's discussion with his advisors was probably not whether an appeal to Caesar should be allowed. Rather, he had to determine (1) whether the charges against his prisoner fell into the category of normal provincial jurisdiction or went beyond that jurisdiction, and (2) whether it was either just or feasible to acquit the prisoner and make the appeal unnecessary. Since the charges against Paul concerned political sedition, which in Roman law could be punished by death, and profanation of the Jerusalem temple, which in Jewish law called for death, Festus had no choice but to acknowledge the extraordinary character of the charge and accept Paul's appeal. But Festus still had the legal right to pronounce an acquittal after the act of appeal. Yet politically no newly arrived governor would have dreamt of antagonizing the leaders of the people he sought to govern by acquitting one against whom they were so vehemently opposed. It was more a political than legal decision Festus had to make, and he was probably only too glad to have this way out of a very sticky situation. So he agreed to the appeal.

4. Festus consults with Herod Agrippa II (25:13–22)

Though ridding himself of one problem, Festus now took on another: What would he write in his report to the imperial court at Rome about the charges against Paul and the issues in the case? Undoubtedly, Luke had no direct knowledge of what was said in private between a Roman governor and the king of a neighboring principality. But the gist of what was discussed would certainly have been evident from their resultant actions, and Luke here fleshes out the details of that conversation in order to prepare the way for Paul's last great defense before Herod Agrippa II.

13 Marcus Julius Agrippa II (A.D. 27–100) was the son of Herod Agrippa I (see comment on 12:1). He was brought up at Rome in the court of Claudius and, like his father, was a favorite of the emperor. At his father's death in 44 (see 12:21–23), he was only seventeen years old—too young to rule over his father's domains. Therefore Palestine became a Roman province administered by a provincial governor. In 50, Claudius appointed Agrippa II king of Chalcis, a petty kingdom to the northeast of Judea. In 53 Claudius gave him the tetrarchy of Philip in exchange for the kingdom of Chalcis, which he gave to Agrippa's uncle Herod. And in 56 Nero added to his kingdom the Galilean cities of Tarichea and Tiberias with their surrounding lands and the Perean city of Julias with fourteen other villages. As ruler of the adjoining kingdom to the north, Herod Agrippa II came to pay his respects to Festus, the new governor of Judea.

With Agrippa II was Bernice (properly Berenice), his sister one year younger than himself. She had been engaged to Marcus, a nephew of the philosopher Philo. Then she married her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, but at his death in A.D. 48, she came to live with her brother Agrippa. Rumors of their incestuous relationship flourished in both Rome and Palestine.

14 Though Agrippa II did not rule over Judea, he had been appointed by Claudius to be "the curator of the temple," with power to depose and appoint the high priest and with the responsibility of preserving the temple's treasury and priestly vestments. He developed an interest in the Jewish religion and was, in fact, looked upon by Rome as an authority. Thus Festus broached the subject of Paul's case when Agrippa visited him.

15–21 Festus told Agrippa how the Jewish leaders confronted him with Paul's case when he first went to Jerusalem and that they had asked for Paul's death (v.15), but he acted in accordance with Roman law in demanding that charges be properly laid and the defendant allowed his day in court (v.16). Furthermore, he insisted, he acted with due dispatch, for on the day after he and the Jewish leaders returned to Caesarea, he convened court in order to try the case (v.17). To his surprise he found that the charges did not concern real offenses punishable under Roman law but theological differences of a Jewish intramural nature (vv.18–19a) and a debate "about a dead man named Jesus who Paul claimed was alive" (v.19b). With a shrug of his shoulders, Festus confessed his total inadequacy to deal with them (v.20a). In an endeavor to resolve the impasse, Festus told Agrippa he was prepared to accede to the Sanhedrin's request for a change of venue to Jerusalem (v.20b). But Paul objected and appealed to Caesar, an appeal Festus had granted (v.21). Now then, what was he to write in sending Paul on to the imperial court regarding the charges against the prisoner and the issues of the case?

22 This stirred Agrippa's interest so that instead of merely giving his advice, he had an intense personal desire to hear Paul himself. Festus was only too happy to arrange a meeting for the very next day. Paul's meeting with Herod Agrippa II has often been paralleled with that of Jesus before Herod Antipas in Lk 23:6–12. Not only was each arraigned by a Roman governor, but each was brought before a Jewish king who wanted very much to meet him (Lk 23:8). Paul's time with Agrippa II, however, turned out far more harmoniously than that of Jesus before Antipas.

5. Paul's defense before Herod Agrippa II (25:23–26:32)

Paul's defense before Herod Agrippa II was for Luke the most important of the five defenses. It is the longest and most carefully constructed of the five. Perhaps Luke was even in the audience chamber through the courtesy of an officer of the guard.

All the attention in the account is focused on Paul himself and the Gospel, not on the charges brought forward by the Jews, and certainly not on any rumored incest between Agrippa and Bernice. Inherent in Luke's account are at least three apologetic themes: (1) Paul's relations with the Roman government in Judea did not end in dissonance but with an acknowledgment of his innocence (cf. 25:25; 26:31); (2) even though the Jewish high priests and Sanhedrin opposed Paul, the Jewish king who in Rome's eyes outranked them agreed with a verdict of innocence (cf. 26:32); and (3) Paul's innocence was demonstrated not only before Roman and Jewish rulers but also publicly before "the high ranking officers and the leading men of the city" (25:23).

Yet Paul's speech before Agrippa II is not just a personal defense of himself. It is also a positive presentation of the Gospel with an evangelistic appeal: (1) according to the OT prophets, the Christ would suffer, rise from the dead, and proclaim light to both Jews and Gentiles (26:23); (2) what God did in and through Jesus the Christ was done openly, "not done in a corner" (v.26); (3) believing the prophets leads one to accept redemption in Christ (v.27); (4) Paul's prayer for all who hear is that they "may become what I am, except for these chains" (v.29). After this climactic speech of Paul, all that remains for Luke is to sketch out the apostle's journey to Rome and his ministry there, thus completing the geographical framework of Luke's presentation and concluding it on a note of triumph (cf. 28:31).

23 Luke describes Agrippa and Bernice as entering the audience chamber of Herod the Great's Caesarean palace "with great pomp," accompanied by a procession of "high ranking officers and the leading men of the city." The Romans always knew how to process well. The sight of Agrippa's royal robes, Bernice's finery, and the military and civil dignitaries decked out in their official attire doubtless overwhelmed those unaccustomed to such displays. Paul the prisoner was then brought in. But though the situation asserted the importance of Roman officialdom and the inferiority of the man who stood before it, Luke's inspired insight penetrated the trappings and saw that the situation was really reversed. And his evaluation has prevailed in history.

24–27 Festus opened the proceedings by turning the dignitaries' attention to Paul with the words "You see this man!" After saying that he could not substantiate the charges against Paul, he told them how Paul had appealed to Caesar. Then, asking for help with what he would have to write in sending Paul to the imperial court, Festus turned the inquiry over to King Agrippa.

A number of subtle touches in these verses are particularly appropriate for the situation. The title Sebastos ("Emperor," v.25; GK 4935), found only here and in v.21 in the NT, is the Greek equivalent of Augustus (a title first conferred on Octavian by the Senate in 27 B.C. to denote one who is lifted above other mortals). The addition of Kyrios ("Lord" or "His Majesty"; GK 3261) to the imperial title began in the time of Nero (A.D. 54–68). Despite its associations with deity in the eastern realms of the empire, the growth of the imperial cult, and the pretensions to divinity of such emperors as Nero and Domitian, Kyrios did not by itself signal to Romans the idea of deity but rather connoted that of majesty. Likewise, Festus's statement (v.27) that he thought it "unreasonable" to send on a prisoner with unspecified charges against him is typical of the face-saving language used among officials, for the failure to specify charges was a dereliction of duty.

26:1 At Agrippa's invitation to speak for himself, Paul, though manacled by chains (v.29), motioned with his hand for attention (cf. 21:40) and began speaking. While we have only a summary of his speech, it is the longest of Paul's five defenses, undoubtedly reflecting the relative length of the address. Since Agrippa was considered an authority on the Jewish religion, he might have been expected to listen closely to Paul's lengthy explanation of the relation of his message and ministry to the hope of Israel.

2–3 This was just the kind of situation Paul had longed for during two bleak years in prison—namely, a knowledgeable judge and a not inherently antagonistic audience before whom he could not only make his defense but also proclaim his message. Therefore he began with unusual fervor, expressing appreciation for the opportunity of speaking, complimenting the judge, and asking for patience in hearing him out. Since Festus had already said that Paul had not committed a capital crime (cf.25:25), Paul chose to defend himself only against the charge that he had transgressed against Judaism.

4–8 It was not in spite of his Jewish heritage but because of it, Paul insisted, that he believed and proclaimed what he did. So he began the body of his address by drawing together his Pharisaic background and his Christian commitment, arguing that the Jewish hope and the Christian message are inseparably related. His life had been spent among his people in his own country and in Jerusalem (v.4; cf. 22:3). He had lived as a Pharisee, "the strictest sect" of the Jewish religion (v.5; cf. Php 3:5–6). It was because of the Jewish hope in the resurrection of the dead that he was being tried (v.6). Ironically, the charges against him were brought, of all people, by the Jews themselves. Yet why should any of his audience think it "incredible that God raises the dead" (v.8), particularly when God had validated the truth of the resurrection by raising Jesus from the dead (cf. comment on 23:6)?

9–11 Paul went on to acknowledge that he too at one time thought that Christian preaching about the resurrection of Jesus was incredible. Pharisee though he was, he too had denounced belief in Jesus' resurrection and had persecuted those who claimed to have seen him alive after his crucifixion. He put Christians in prison, agreed with the death penalty for their "blasphemy" (cf. 8:1), and went through the synagogues seeking to punish them for apostasy and to get them to recant. This he did not only in Jerusalem but also in cities outside Judea.

12–14 While Paul was trying to stamp out nascent Christianity, the encounter that changed his life took place. That Paul's account of his Damascus Road conversion appears three times in Acts (chs. 9; 22; 26) undoubtedly shows how important this event was not only for Paul but also for Luke (cf. introductory comments on 9:1–30). It is in this third account that Luke's purpose to proclaim the Gospel of Christ in Luke-Acts reaches its climax. Each account fits its own special context in Paul's life and in Luke's purpose. Here there is an intensification and explication of the details that is not found in the earlier accounts: (1) the heavenly light was "brighter than the sun" (cf. 9:3; 22:6); (2) it blazed around both "me and my companions" (cf. 9:3; 22:6); (3) "we all fell to the ground" (cf. 9:4; 22:7); and (4) the voice from heaven spoke "in Aramaic" (or "in Hebrew"; see NIV note).

Likewise in v.14b we have the only place in the three accounts where "It is hard for you to kick against the goads" is included (cf. 9:5; KJV). This was a well-known Greek expression for opposition to deity; Paul used it here to show his Greek-oriented audience the implications of the question "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" Lest he be misunderstood as proclaiming only a Galilean prophet he had formerly opposed, he was pointing out what was obvious to any Jew: correction by a voice from heaven meant opposition to God himself.

15–18 On the other hand, this third account leaves out certain features of the other two: (1) the heavenly speaker identifies himself only as Jesus (cf. 22:8); (2) there is no mention of Ananias (cf. 9:10–19; 22:12–16); (3) there is no mention of Paul's blindness and subsequent healing (cf. 9:8–9; 18–19; 22:11, 13). There was, however, no need here to refer to Jesus "of Nazareth" or to the devout Jew Ananias (cf. comment on 22:12–16). Nor was it necessary for Paul to refer to his blindness and healing, which might have been confusing to a pagan audience. Rather, in his address before Agrippa and the others, Paul merged the words of Christ as spoken on the road to Damascus (cf. 9:5–6; 22:8,10), as given through Ananias of Damascus (cf. 22:14–15), and as received in a vision at Jerusalem (cf. 22:18–21). In other words, while not emphasizing details of time or human aid, Paul did emphasize the lordship of Christ and the divine commission Christ gave him.

The words of the risen Jesus calling Paul to his mission (vv.16–17) recall the commissioning of the prophets Ezekiel and Jeremiah (Eze 2:1, 3; Jer 1:7–8), and the commission itself (v.18) echoes that of the Servant of the Lord in Isa 42:6b–7. Indeed, Paul's mission was a prophetic one that perpetuated the commission originally given to God's Righteous Servant, Jesus Christ. And Christians today, as God's servants and prophets, are called to the same kind of ministry.

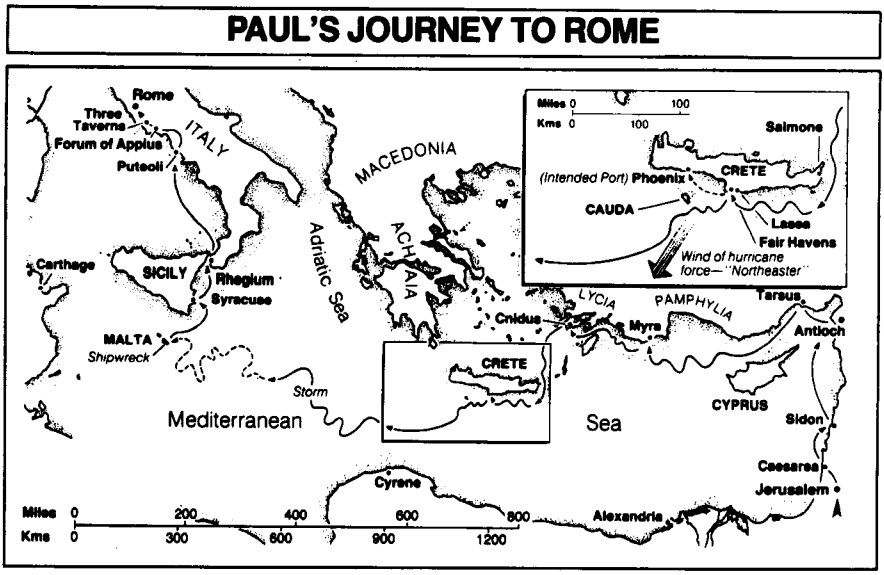
19–21 Having been confronted by the risen and glorified Jesus, Paul henceforth knew but one Master and found it impossible to resist his commands. So he told Agrippa how he began preaching about Jesus in Damascus and continued to do so in Jerusalem (cf. 9:20–30). The words "and in all Judea" are grammatically strange and conflict with the evidence of Ac 9:20–30 and Gal 1:18–24 that Paul did not preach the Gospel throughout "all the region of Judea." Perhaps this phrase was an early gloss that entered the text through a false reading of Ro 15:19. And Paul also preached to the Gentiles a message of repentance and conversion. It was because of his preaching to Gentiles, he insisted, that the Jews were so aggressively opposed to him.

22–23 Nevertheless, in fulfillment of Christ's promise (v.17), God had stood by Paul, protecting him and enabling him to proclaim "to small and great alike" a message thoroughly in accord with Israel's faith and in harmony with all that the prophets and Moses said would happen: "that the Christ would suffer and, as the first to rise from the dead, would proclaim light to his own people and to the Gentiles." The proclamation of both a suffering Messiah and the resurrection of Jesus were distinctive teachings in early Christianity. To these foundation tenets of the early faith, Paul, by revelation (cf. Gal 1:11–12; Eph 3:1–6), added the legitimacy of a direct outreach to Gentiles, a development brought about by God himself as the true intent of Israelite religion.

24 At this point Festus broke into Paul's address, unable to endure it any longer. He may not have been speaking for the Jews, to whom a suffering Messiah and a direct ministry to Gentiles were outrageous. But no sensible Roman could believe in the resurrection of a man from the dead—and even if he did privately accept such a strange view, he would not allow it to interfere with his practical living or bring him into danger of death. Paul, Festus concluded, was so learned in his Jewish traditions that he had become utterly impractical. Such talk was the height of insanity.

25–27 But what Festus declared to be madness Paul insisted was "true and reasonable." Then he turned to Agrippa for support. The ministry of Jesus was widely known in Palestine, and Agrippa would have heard of it. Jesus' death and resurrection were amply attested, and the Christian Gospel had now been proclaimed for three decades. Certainly the king knew of these things, because they had been done openly. And certainly the king believed the prophets—a belief, as Paul saw it, that inevitably brought one to Christ. So the prisoner became the questioner, as Paul boldly said, "King Agrippa, do you believe the prophets? I know you do."

28 Paul's direct question embarrassed Agrippa. He had his reputation to maintain before Festus and the other dignitaries. Whatever he may have thought about Paul's message personally, he was too worldly-wise to commit himself in public to what others thought was madness. So he parried Paul's question with his own clever, though rather inane, one: "Do you think that in such a short time you can persuade me to be a Christian?" The KJV's translation of this reply, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian," has become one of the famous quotations in history. It has inspired countless sermons and even a gospel hymn. Nevertheless, "almost" is not what Agrippa said.



29 Addressing the king with extreme politeness and taking up Agrippa's own word "short time," Paul replied, "Short time or long—I pray God that not only you but all who are listening to me today may become what I am." Undoubtedly he spoke with evangelistic fervor, directing his appeal not only to the king but also to the other dignitaries. Then in a lighter vein, recognizing the apparent incongruity of appealing for their acceptance of spiritual freedom while he himself stood chained before them, he raised his hands and added, "except for these chains."

30–32 Paul had had the last word, and his light touch at the end of his response evidently broke up the meeting. With it Agrippa dismissed the proceedings and with Festus and Bernice strode out of the audience chamber to discuss the situation. Agrippa had presumably heard enough to instruct Festus what he should write in his report to Rome. Their conclusion was that Paul had done nothing that in Rome's eyes merited death or imprisonment, and Agrippa was heard to comment, "This man could have been set free, if he had not appealed to Caesar." This comment should not be taken to mean that a provincial governor could not free a prisoner after an appeal to Caesar (see comment on 25:12). In this situation, however, Paul's status was not a question of law only but also of politics. With these words, Luke concludes his apologetic motif in Acts and vindicates both Paul and Christianity from any suspicion of sedition.

E. The Journey to Rome (27:1–28:15)

One would like to know many things about Paul's two-year imprisonment at Caesarea. For instance, how was the apostle supported during this time (cf. comment on 24:26)? How cordial were Paul's relations with the Jerusalem Christians and their leaders? How about his contacts with the Caesarean believers or with other groups of Christians in the area? What were Timothy and Luke doing? What happened to Silas and to those who represented the Gentile churches during Paul's last visit to Jerusalem (cf. 20:4)? Such matters, however, were evidently not of interest to Luke or to Paul in his letters. In an endeavor to fill these gaps in Luke's account of Paul's stay in Caesarea, some have proposed that several of Paul's letters (notably Eph, Col, Phm) were written while he was in prison in Caesarea. But more likely they were composed during his subsequent Roman imprisonment.

Luke's account of Paul's voyage to Rome stands out as one of the most vivid pieces of descriptive writing in the whole Bible. Its details regarding first-century seamanship are exceptionally precise and its portrayal of conditions on the eastern Mediterranean remarkably accurate. What stands out is his portrayal of Paul as a man of powerful personality, who commanded respect in various situations. Most of all, he was an apostle of Jesus Christ, who had been promised divine protection and assurance that he would reach Rome (cf. 23:11), and, as elsewhere in Acts, Paul was one through whom God by his Spirit worked in an extraordinary fashion (cf. 19:11–12; 20:10–12).

1. From Palestine to Crete (27:1–12)

1 The account of Paul's journey to Rome is the longest of Luke's four "we' sections (27:1–28:16; cf. 16:10–17; 20:5–15; 21:1–18). The vividness and precision of the narrative confirm what the use of "we" implies—that it is an eyewitness report. The centurion Julius, assigned to take Paul to Rome, was a member of "the Imperial Regiment." The soldiers who performed the police and escort services in Paul's day were the speculatores, a special body of imperial guards who were particularly prominent in times of military intrigue. They did not belong to any division of a Roman army legion; instead, they formed a special unit of their own.

2 The port of embarkation was undoubtedly Caesarea. The boat they boarded was a coastal vessel from the city of Adramyttium in Mysia. Embarking with Paul were Luke (cf. "we") and Aristarchus, who were possibly entered on the passenger list as Paul's personal doctor and servant, respectively. As a Roman citizen who had appealed to the emperor, Paul would naturally have had a more favored position than the other prisoners; and the centurion would have recognized his superiority as a gentleman with attendants. That Aristarchus is included in Col 4:10 and Phm 24 as sending greetings from Rome (assuming a Roman origin for these letters) suggests that he traveled with Paul all the way to Rome and remained with him during his imprisonment there.

3 At Sidon, the ancient Phoenician port some seventy miles north of Caesarea, the boat took on cargo. Here Paul was permitted to visit the Christians of the city, who, like those at Tyre (cf. comment on 21:4), had probably become believers through the witness of Christian Hellenists forced to leave Jerusalem at the time of Stephen's martyrdom (cf. 11:19). The centurion Julius had probably been advised by Festus to be lenient with Paul, and doubtless Paul had already made a good impression on him. Yet a soldier would have been always with him during his visit.

4–5 From Sidon, the boat sailed northwest toward Cyprus, staying close to the long east coast of the island because of the westerly winds that blow from spring through fall on the eastern Mediterranean. Two and one half years earlier Paul and his companions had sailed with that westerly wind from Patara to Tyre and had passed Cyprus on the south (see 21:3). Now, however, their voyage was considerably slower as their boat had to run against the winds, and they tried to stay in the lee of sheltering land masses. Crossing the open sea between Cyprus and Cilicia, the vessel worked its way westward to Myra in Lycia, on the southwest coast of Asia Minor, helped along by local land breezes and a westward current that runs along that coast.

6 Myra was the most illustrious city in Lycia, with distinguished public buildings, a large theater, and many evidences of wealth. It became the natural port of call for grain ships bound for Rome from Egypt, and in commercial importance it overshadowed its rival Patara to the west. There Julius arranged with the owner of a larger Alexandrian grain ship to take the soldiers and prisoners on board for the longer voyage to Italy.

7–8 Leaving Myra, the grain ship moved slowly along the peninsula that thrusts seaward between the islands of Cos and Rhodes to the port of Cnidus, at the southwestern tip of Asia Minor. Cnidus was the last port of call before sailing west across the Aegean for the Greek mainland. But the northern winds that blow down the length of the Aegean at this time of year pushed the ship off course and forced the pilot to seek protection along the southern coast of Crete, the 160-mile-long island southeast of Greece. Passing Cape Salmone on the eastern tip of Crete, the ship entered the small bay of Fair Havens.

9–10 Navigation in this part of the Mediterranean was always dangerous after Sept. 14 and was considered impossible after Nov. 11. The ship had lost valuable time since leaving Myra, and it was obvious that there was no hope of reaching Italy before winter. "The Fast" (i.e., Yom Kippur or "Day of Atonement"), the chief festival of Judaism celebrated on the tenth of the lunar month Tishri (between the latter part of September and the first part of October), was already past. So Paul warned that disaster would befall them if they tried to go further.

11–12 But the pilot and the ship's owner preferred not to winter in the small, open bay of Fair Havens, being reluctant to seek quarters for themselves and their passengers in the small town of Lasea. They hoped to winter instead at the larger and safer port of Phoenix, forty miles west of Fair Havens. Between these two ports, however, the south coast of Crete turns suddenly to the north and exposes a ship to the northern gales before it regains the protection of the coast just before Phoenix. The centurion agreed with the pilot and the ship's owner that it would, if at all possible, be best to winter at Phoenix.

2. Storm and shipwreck (27:13–44)

13–15 Shortly after the decision to winter at Phoenix was made, a gentle southern breeze began to blow; and it appeared that they would have no trouble in crossing the Gulf of Messara that began west of Cape Matala on the southern coast of Crete. But no sooner had they rounded the cape and entered the gulf than they were caught in a hurricane coming from Mount Ida to the north. Sailors called this wind the Euroquilo (lit., "northeaster"). Before it they were helpless.

16–17 Driven southwest some twenty-three miles to the small island of Cauda, the ship managed to gain the lee of the island. The sailors pulled in the dinghy, which was full of water, reinforced the ship with ropes to keep it from breaking up (exactly how these ropes were positioned is not known, though most argue that ropes were passed under the ship and secured above the deck), and put out the sea anchor to keep the ship from running onto the sandbars of Syrtis, off the African coast.

18–20 For fourteen days and nights (cf. v.27), the ship was in the grip of the northeaster. The crew tried to lighten the ship by throwing overboard all the deck cargo (v.18), then by disposing of the ship's tackle (v.19). In the darkness of the storm they could not take their bearings from the sun or stars. All hope of being saved had vanished.

21–26 Undoubtedly Paul shared the general pessimism on board ship (cf. the inclusive use of "we" in v.20). But one night toward the close of the fourteen-day storm, "an angel of God" stood by him and reassured him with a message of comfort for this time of crisis (cf. 23:11). The next morning when Paul shared this vision with his companions on shipboard, he was human enough to (in effect) say "I told you so" to those who had not taken his advice at Fair Havens. He added that in his opinion they would not be saved without running aground on some island.

27–29 During the fourteenth night after leaving Crete, it was clear—probably from the running swell and the roar of surf—that they were near a shore. Soundings indicated shallower water. To keep the ship from being wrecked against the rocks of an unknown coast in the darkness, they dropped four anchors and waited for dawn. Luke tells us that they were in the Adriatic Sea (the name used in ancient times for all parts of the Mediterranean between Greece, Italy, and Africa).

30–32 Contrary to the best tradition of the sea, the sailors schemed to save themselves by lowering the dinghy (cf. vv.16–17) under cover of lowering some more anchors from the bow. But Paul saw through the ruse, doubtless realizing that no sailor would drop anchors from the bow under such conditions. He knew that to try to make shore in the morning without a full crew would be disastrous. So Paul warned Julius that all would be lost if the sailors deserted the ship. Though he had not listened to Paul earlier (cf. vv.11–12), Julius took his advice here and ordered his men to cut the lines holding the dinghy and let it fall away.

33–38 The storm had been so fierce that preparing food had been impossible. Once again, Paul's great qualities of leadership came to the fore. Urging all on board to eat, he took some bread, gave thanks to God, and ate it. The others on board also ate. Then, strengthened by the food, they threw the cargo of grain overboard to give the ship a shallower draft as they beached her. Only at v.37 does Luke tell us how many were on board. Probably in distributing the food, they had to know the exact number, and Luke himself may have helped supervise the distribution.

39–41 With a profusion of nautical detail that makes this chapter unique, Luke tells how the ship was beached amid the pounding surf on a sandbar some distance from land and began to break apart. From then on it was every man for himself.

42–44 Roman military law decreed that a guard who allowed his prisoner to escape could expect the same penalty the escaped prisoner would have suffered (cf. comments on 12:18–19a; 16:25–28). Thus the soldiers wanted to kill the prisoners, lest they escape while getting to land. Julius, however, determined to protect Paul, prevented this and ordered all to get to land either by swimming or by holding on to pieces of the wreckage. So God in his providence brought them all safely to shore, as he had promised Paul he would (cf. v.24). Many, like Luke, undoubtedly saw the relation between the promise and their safety and in their own ways praised the God Paul served.

3. Ashore at Malta (28:1–10)

1 Malta is an island about 18 miles long and 8 miles wide, lying 58 miles south of Sicily and 180 miles north and east of the African coast. It had been colonized about 1000 B.C. by Phoenicians, but was captured by Rome in 218 B.C (though it was given much local autonomy). Augustus established a Roman governor on the island and settled a number of army veterans and their families there. In Paul's day the island was known for its prosperity and residential architecture, and its native population spoke a Phoenician dialect, though many probably knew some Latin and Greek.

2–4 The islanders showed kindness to "us all" (i.e., the 276 survivors) by building a fire, which was just what was needed in the cold and rain. When Paul was bitten by the viper, the islanders concluded he was a murderer whom Justice had at last caught up with since he had not died at sea. The Greek goddess Dike (i.e., "Justice"; GK 1472), or her Phoenician counterpart, was apparently venerated by the Maltese.

5–6 Seeing that Paul was unaffected by the snakebite, the islanders decided that he must be a god—or, perhaps, a favorite of the gods. Nothing is said about Paul's rebuking the islanders as he had rebuked the people at Lystra (cf. 14:15–18), for evidently they made no attempt to worship Paul. Luke gives us such a vividly detailed account of the incident because he wants his readers to appreciate that Paul was not only a heaven-directed man with a God-given message but also a heaven-protected man. The powerful account of the storm and shipwreck has shown this, and now this vignette stresses it once more.

7–9 Though Paul spent three months (cf. v.11) on Malta, Luke gives us only one more incident from his stay there—the healing of Publius's father. This account is much like that of Peter and the crippled beggar (cf. 3:1ff.) in purpose, though not in length. Luke likely included it to illustrate the continuing power of Paul's ministry despite his being in Malta as a prisoner. No matter what the circumstances are, the true servant of Christ is, like Paul, never off duty for his Lord.

As the Roman governor of Malta and as an act of official courtesy, Publius brought the survivors of the wreck to his estate and entertained them for three days while their respective situations were sorted out and arrangements made for their lodgings over the winter. Luke's reference to the governor only by his praenomen may reflect a friendly relationship that developed between Publius, Paul, and Luke during those three months.

The malady that the father of Publius was suffering from may have been Malta fever, which in 1887 was traced to the milk of Maltese goats. Cases of Malta fever are long-lasting—an average of four months, but in some cases lasting two or three years. Luke uses the plural "fevers" here, probably implying the way it affects its victims with intermittent attacks.

After Paul had healed Publius's father through prayer and laying on of hands, "the rest of the sick on the island" came to him and were healed. Paul's ministry to those he met consisted in both proclaiming the Good News of Christ Jesus and healing them physically. Luke's inclusion of this vignette prepares for the climax of his book—Paul's entrance into Rome and the triumphant note of the Good News being preached "without hindrance" (see comment on v.31).

10 As a result of Paul's ministry during his months on Malta, the islanders honored him and his party in many ways. Paul was no god, as they had soon learned. But he was a messenger of the one true God, with good news of life and wholeness in Jesus Christ. In carrying out his God-given commission, Paul gave of himself unstintingly on behalf of people. That they appreciated his ministry is evidenced by their giving him and his colleagues supplies for the rest of their journey.

Luke suggests that Paul may have looked on his stay in Malta as a high point in his ministry—a time of blessing when God worked in marvelous ways, despite the shipwreck and his being still a prisoner. God seems to have been refreshing Paul's spirit after the two relatively bleak years at Caesarea and the disastrous time at sea, and he was preparing him for his witness in Rome.

4. Arrival at Rome (28:11–16)

11 "After three months" (probably about mid-February), the centurion Julius arranged for another ship to take his contingent of prisoners and soldiers for the last leg of their voyage to Italy. It was another Alexandrian vessel, probably another grain ship (cf. comment on v. 13) from Egypt that had harbored at Malta before winter set in. Ships, like inns, took their names from their figureheads; and this one had the painted carving at its prow of Castor and Pollux, who in Greek mythology were transformed by Zeus into twin gods represented by the constellation Gemini. Their cult was especially widespread in Egypt, and the Gemini were considered by sailors a sign of good fortune in a storm. For an Alexandrian ship, the figurehead was an appropriate one.

12 Sailing north-northeast, the ship reached the harbor of Syracuse, on the east coast of Sicily. There it remained for three days, probably awaiting better wind conditions and loading and unloading cargo.

13 From Syracuse the ship "set sail" for Rhegium, an important harbor at the toe of Italy and on the Italian side of the Strait of Messina. Docking there to await a more favorable breeze, they sailed the next day when a southerly wind began to blow and made the 180 miles up the coast of Italy to Puteoli in only two days. Puteoli was a resort city on the Bay of Naples, the port city of Neapolis (modern Naples) and the principal port of southern Italy. There many grain ships from Egypt docked, and there Julius and his contingent disembarked with Paul and his party.

14 There are two rather surprising statements in this verse. First, at Puteoli Paul and his companions "found some brothers who invited us to spend a week with them." It was not, of course, unusual for Christians to be found in such an important city as Puteoli, especially since there was a Jewish colony there. What is surprising, however is that prisoner Paul was at liberty to seek out the Christians of the city and accept their invitation to spend seven days in fellowship with them. For some reason Julius found it necessary to stay at Puteoli for a week, and during that time he allowed Paul the freedom (though undoubtedly accompanied by a guard) to seek out his fellow believers and enjoy their hospitality (cf. 27:3). As Luke presses toward the end of his story, his account becomes more and more concise.

A second surprising feature of v.14 is its forthright conclusion: "And so we came to Rome." It is not surprising that they came to Rome, for that had for some time been the goal of Paul's journey and Luke's narrative. But that the mention of their arrival appears here before v.15 and not as the opening statement of v.16 is indeed surprising. The best explanation is that it reflects Luke's eagerness to get to the climax of his story and that this eagerness led him to anticipate their arrival at Rome even though he had to go back in v.15 and include another detail of the last stage of the journey.

15 Paul and company took the Via Domitiana from Puteoli to Neapolis, turning northwest to travel to Rome on the Via Appia—that oldest, straightest, and most perfectly made of all the Roman roads. During the seven-day stopover at Puteoli, news of Paul's arrival in Italy had reached Rome. So a number of Christians there set out to meet him and escort him to Rome. Some of them got as far as the Forum of Appius, one of the "halting stations" built every ten to fifteen miles along the entire length of the Roman road system. It was forty-three miles from Rome, and a market-town had grown up around it. Others only got as far as the Three Taverns Inn, another halting station about thirty-three miles from Rome. Paul's gratitude to God for the delegation that met him must have been unusually fervent, for Luke makes special mention of it. In his letters, Paul often urges his readers to be thankful, and here he illustrates his own advice.

16 At Rome, Paul was allowed to live in private quarters, though a soldier guarded him at all times. The chain he wore (v.20) was probably attached to his wrists. Yet in Luke's eyes Paul entered Rome in triumph. Through his coming the Gospel penetrated official circles in the capital of the empire, and God used his detention there for two years to spread the proclamation of the kingdom of God and the Lord Jesus Christ throughout the city (cf. vv.30–31).

With this verse, the last "we" section in Acts closes. To judge by Paul's greetings in Col 4:10–14 and Phm 23–24 (assuming a Roman origin for these letters), Luke and Aristarchus remained with Paul through most—if not all—of his detention at Rome, being joined from time to time by such friends as Epaphras, John Mark, Demas, and Jesus (surnamed Justus).

F. Rome at Last (28:17–30)

At last, Paul's great desire to visit the capital of the empire (cf. Ro 15:22–24, 28–29) was fulfilled. Despite his manacles, guard, and house arrest, he was free to receive visitors. Among them, Luke tells us, were (1) the leading Jews of the city, whom he asked to visit him when he first arrived (vv. 17–28) and (2) others, evidently both Jews and Gentiles, who came to his quarters at various times during his two-year detention (v.30).

1. Meetings with the Jewish leaders (28:17–28)

17–20 Three days after arriving at Rome, Paul invited the leaders of the Jewish community to meet with him in his own quarters. He wanted to learn what they had heard from Jerusalem about him and to find out their attitude toward him. Through their contacts in the imperial court and with their money, they could, if they desired, support the charges against him. Since they undoubtedly knew something about his case, he wanted to defend himself before them. Also, he hoped the occasion would be an opportunity for proclaiming the message about Jesus the Messiah and that some would respond to it.

Paul began with the typical salutation used at Jewish formal gatherings (cf. comment on 23:1).The first word of his address, "I," clearly shows that Paul was about to deliver a personal defense. He had done nothing, he insisted, against the Jewish people or against the customs of the fathers (v.17). The Roman authorities had in fact judged that he had not committed any capital crime and were willing to release him (vv.17b–18). But objections from Jerusalem forced him to appeal to Caesar—not to accuse his own people but to save his life (v.19). The point of contention between him and his accusers at Jerusalem had to do with the messianic hope of Israel, which Paul believed was fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth and they did not. Therefore he concluded: "It is because of the hope of Israel that I am bound with this chain" (v.20; cf. 23:6; 24:21; 26:6–8).

21–22 The immediate response of the Roman Jewish leaders to Paul's address is surprising. Apparently they did not want to get involved. They disclaimed having gotten any letters about him from the authorities at Jerusalem and said they had heard nothing, officially or unofficially, against him from any Jew who had come to them from Judea (v.21). Yet Christianity had been known within the Jewish community at Rome for some time (cf. comments on 2:10; 18:2). Certainly the Jewish leaders at Rome knew a great deal about Christianity generally and at least something about Paul, and their claim to know only "that people everywhere are talking against this sect" (v.22) seems much too "diplomatic" in light of their knowledge.

It is, however, in the light of their recent experience that we should judge the Jewish leaders' response to Paul's words. Having been expelled from Rome in 49 or 50 because of riots about Christianity in their community (cf. 18:2), and having only recently returned to their city after Claudius's death in 54, they were simply not prepared in 61 to become involved in Paul's case one way or another. They doubtless had their own opinions about it. But (1) the Jerusalem authorities had not requested them to get involved; (2) Paul was a Roman citizen who had had essentially favorable hearings before Felix, Festus, and Agrippa II; and (3) his case was now to be tried before Caesar himself. So they wanted to have as little as possible to do with Paul and Christianity. But they did say that they were willing at some future time to hear his views on "this sect."

23–24 So they arranged a second meeting, and an even larger delegation came to Paul's quarters. Luke tells us only that it lasted "from morning till evening" and that Paul proclaimed "the kingdom of God" (cf. comment on 1:3), focusing on Jesus, to whom the Law and the Prophets bore witness (v.23; cf. v.31). For the content of what he said, we should probably think of his sermon in the synagogue at Pisidian Antioch (13:17–41) and the letter sent to the Romans. As for his method, he "tried to convince them," which implies that Paul combined proclamation with persuasion (cf. comment on 17:2–4) and that there was a good deal of impassioned debate. The day-long session proved profitable, for "some were convinced by what he said"—though, sadly, "others would not believe" (v.24).

25–28 The points at which many of the Jewish leaders disagreed with Paul and left the session, Luke says, were two. (1) Paul attempted to prove the obduracy of Israel from Scripture on the ground that Isaiah, in Isa 6:9–10, had foretold the Jews' rejection of Jesus as Messiah (cf. the use of this passage in Mt 13:13–15; Lk 8:10; also Mk 4:12; Jn 12:40, though not with quite the same thrust). Paul had elaborated on this issue in Ro 9–11. (2) He quoted prophecy here not just to explain Israel's stubbornness but to set the stage for his second point: because of Israel's hardened attitude the message of "God's salvation" had been sent directly to Gentiles, who would respond positively.

A revolutionary new policy for proclaiming the Gospel and making converts had been providentially worked out during Paul's first missionary journey and at the Jerusalem Council (cf. 12:25–16:5 and comments). That policy was then carried out through two more missionary journeys extending into Macedonia, Achaia, and Asia (cf. 16:6–19:20). This policy advocated the proclamation of the Gospel "first for the Jew, then for the Gentile" (Ro 1:16; cf. Ac 13:46–52). Luke has carefully shown how everything that happened in the ministry of the early Jerusalem church essentially looked forward to the inauguration of this policy and how it lay at the heart of Paul's missionary purpose. Now having traced the story of the advance of the Gospel to Rome, Luke reports how that same pattern was followed at Rome. His account of the Gospel's advance from Jerusalem to Rome in terms of the distinctive policy of first the Jew, then the Gentile comes to a fitting conclusion with the quotation of Isa 6:9–10.

2. Continued ministry for two years (28:30)

30 Luke does not give us details about Paul's two years in Rome because he is not writing Paul's biography. But during the storm at sea, the angel of the Lord had assured Paul that he would stand trial before Caesar (cf. 27:24). Therefore, it seems proper to assume that Luke intended his readers to infer that Paul's case, whatever its outcome, did come before the imperial court.

With Acts ending so abruptly, we must look elsewhere for information about Paul's Roman imprisonment and its aftermath. Accepting the Prison Letters as having been written during this time, we may surmise that Paul fully expected to stand before Caesar's court and that, while we cannot not be certain about the outcome, he did expect to be released (cf. Php 1:19–26; Phm 22). We may date such a release around 63. Accepting the Pastoral Letters as genuine, after Paul's release from this imprisonment, he continued evangelizing the eastern portion of the empire (at least in lands surrounding the Aegean Sea)—perhaps even fulfilling his desire to visit Spain (Ro 15:23–24). And since 2Ti 4:6–18 speaks of a second trial in a tone of resignation, we may conclude that Paul was rearrested about 67 and, according to tradition, beheaded at Rome by order of Nero.

G. A Summary Statement (28:31)

31 This summary statement has often been viewed as only an amplification of v.30, indicating the nature of Paul's ministry during his two years of detention at Rome. But to judge by Luke's practice in the other five summary statements in Acts (6:7; 9:31; 12:24; 16:5; 19:20), we should take it as the summary statement for the whole of Panel 6 (19:21–28:31). In all of his prison experiences at Jerusalem, Caesarea, and Rome, Luke is saying, Paul "boldly . . . preached the kingdom of God and taught about the Lord Jesus Christ." And he did this "without hindrance" (GK 219)—the last word in the Greek text of Acts, which thus closes this work on a victorious note. This word shows the tolerance of Rome at that time toward Christianity—a tolerance Luke was passionately promoting throughout these last chapters and hoped would continue.

In seeming to leave his book unfinished, Luke was implying that the apostolic proclamation of the Gospel in the first century began a story that will continue until the consummation of the kingdom in Christ (Ac 1:11).

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
Ac 1:20	Ps 69:25	Judgment on Judas
Ac 1:20	Ps 109:8	Replacement for Judas
Ac 2:17–21	Joel 2:28–32	God's Spirit poured out
Ac 2:25–28, 31	Ps 16:8–11	Resurrection of Christ
Ac 2:34–35	Ps 110:1	At God's right hand
Ac 3:22–23	Dt 18:15, 18–19	The prophet
Ac 3:25	Ge 22:18; 26:4	Nations blessed in Abraham
Ac 4:11	Ps 118:22	Rejected cornerstone
Ac 4:24	Ex 20:11; Ps 146:6	God the creator
Ac 4:25–26	Ps 2:1–2	Kings against the Lord
Ac 7:3	Ge 12:1	Call of Abraham
Ac 7:6–7	Ge 15:13–14	Prophecy to Abraham
Ac 7:18	Ex 1:8	King who did not know Joseph
Ac 7:27–28, 35	Ex 2:14	Moses in Egypt
Ac 7:32	Ex 3:6	The living God
Ac 7:33	Ex 3:5	Moses at the burning bush
Ac 7:34	Ex 3:7–8, 10	God promises to deliver Israel
Ac 7:37	Dt 18:15	The prophet
Ac 7:40	Ex 32:1, 23	Asking for idols
Ac 7:42–43	Am 5:25–27	Sin and judgment

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
Ac 7:49–50	Isa 66:1–2	No temple contains God
Ac 8:32–33	Isa 53:7–8	Jesus as the dying lamb
Ac 13:33	Ps 2:7	You are my Son
Ac 13:34	Isa 55:3	Blessings of David
Ac 13:35	Ps 16:10	Resurrection of Christ
Ac 13:41	Hab 1:5	Judgment for sin
Ac 13:47	Isa 49:6	Salvation of the Gentiles
Ac 14:15	Ex 20:11; Ps 146:6	God the creator
Ac 15:16–17	Am 9:11–12	Restoration for everyone
Ac 23:5	Ex 22:28	Cursing rulers
Ac 28:26–27	Isa 6:9–10	Seeing but not perceiving

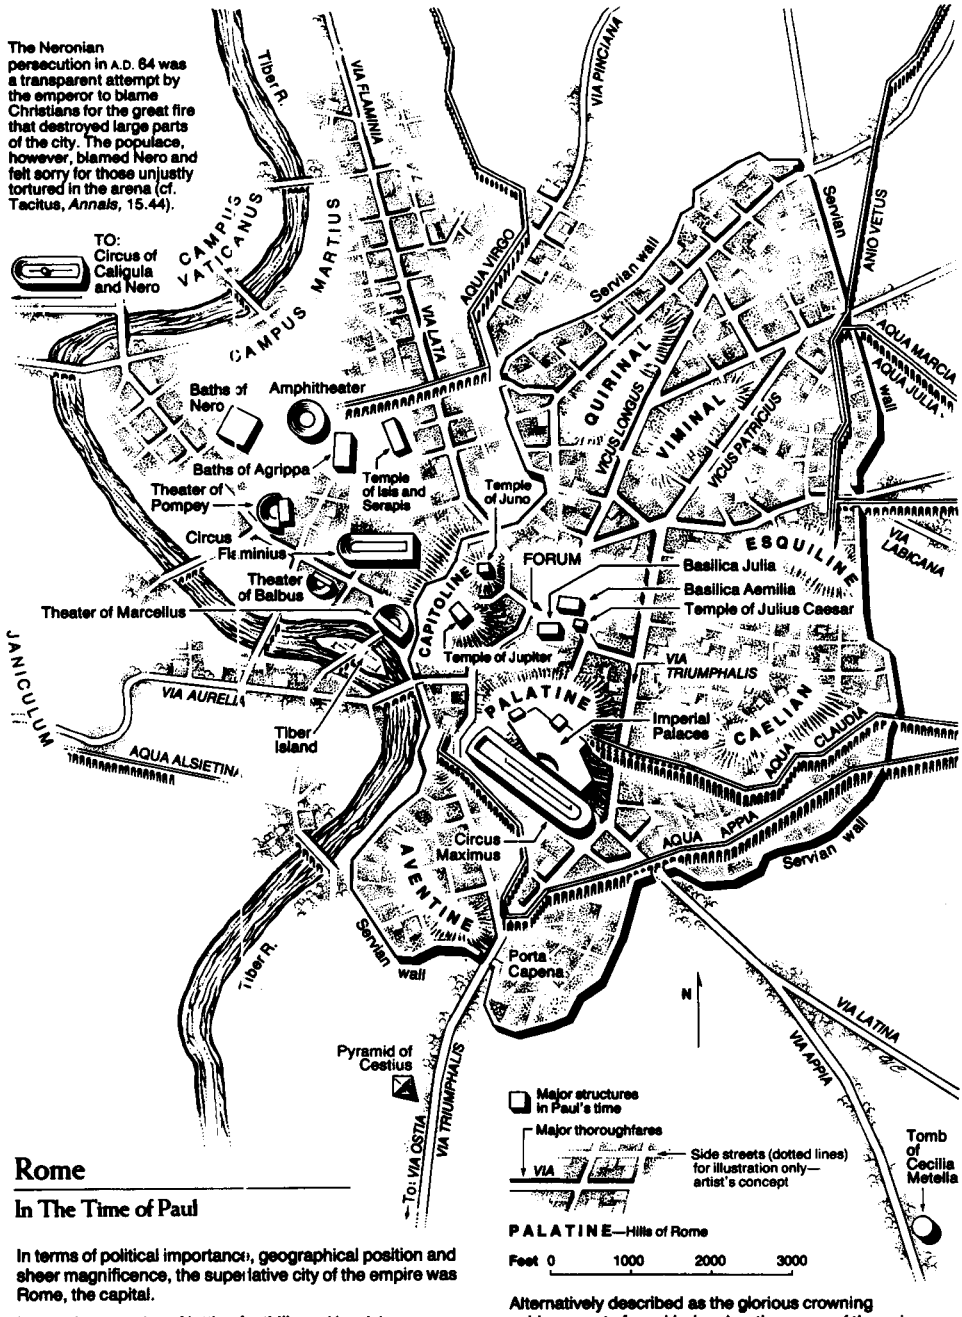
Romans

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

By common consent, Romans is the greatest of Paul's letters, and the Roman church became one of the major centers of Christendom. However, next to nothing is known about the founding and early history of this church. Paul does not deal with these issues in the course of his letter, nor does Luke provide any help beyond mentioning that Aquila and Priscilla, with whom Paul lived and labored at Corinth, had recently come from Italy (Ac 18:2). He says nothing about Paul's witnessing to them, so the presumption is that they were already believers. The expulsion of Jews from Rome by order of the emperor Claudius was dictated by "disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus [Christ?]" (A.D. 49; see comment on Ac 18:2). It is likely that by the fifth decade of the first century the Christian faith had gained a foothold in the capital of the empire, and by A.D. 57 (when Paul wrote this letter, it was famous far and wide for its faith (1:8).

2. Authorship, Date, and Place of Origin



From the post-apostolic church to the present, with almost no exception, this letter has been credited to Paul. If the claim of the apostle to have written the Galatian and Corinthian letters is accepted, there is no reasonable basis for denying that he wrote Romans, since it echoes much of what is in the earlier writings, yet not slavishly. A few examples must suffice: the doctrine of justification by faith (Ro 3:20–22; Gal 2: 16); the church as the body of Christ appointed to represent and serve him through a variety of spiritual gifts (Ro 12:3–8; 1Co 12:12–27); the collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem (Ro 15:25–28; 2Co 8–9). Understandably, Paul makes fewer references to himself and to his readers in Romans than in these three other letters, since he had not founded the Roman church and guided its struggles to maturity as he had the others.

Fixed dates for the span of Paul's labors are few, but one of them is the summer of A.D. 51, when Gallio arrived in Corinth to serve as proconsul of Achaia (see comment on Ac 18:12–13). After this the apostle stayed in the city "some time" (18:18). Possibly in the spring of 52 he went to Caesarea and Jerusalem, stopping at Antioch on the way back and probably spending the winter of 52 there. Presumably, his return to Ephesus was in the spring of 53, marking the beginning of a three-year ministry there (20:31). At the end of 56 he spent three months in Corinth (20:3), starting his final trip to Jerusalem in the spring of 57. When he wrote Romans the fund for the Jerusalem church seems to have been finally completed (Ro 15:26ff.). This suggests a date in early 57 for the writing of the letter.

Corinth is the most likely place of composition, since Phoebe of nearby Cenchrea was apparently entrusted with the carrying of the letter (Ro 16:1–2). The mention of Gaius as Paul's host (16:23) confirms this conclusion, Gaius having been one of the most prominent of converts during the apostle's mission at Corinth (1Co 1:14).

3. Destination

The titles of the Pauline Epistles are not part of the text, so the superscription "The Letter of Paul to the Romans" cannot be attributed to the apostle but must be taken as reflecting the understanding of the church as a whole sometime during the second century. Yet, since the intended readers are located at Rome by the writer (Ro 1:7, 15), all doubt about the destination would seem to be removed. A few scholars argue that Paul also sent a copy of this letter to Ephesus, especially since some manuscripts do not have ch. 16 included. They claim that the people mentioned in the closing chapter were living at Ephesus rather than at Rome. Attractive though this view is, it has not been universally received, because a good case can be made for a Roman destination for ch. 16.

Rome

In The Time of Paul

In terms of political importance, geographical position and sheer magnificence, the superlative city of the empire was Rome, the capital.

Located on a series of jutting foothills and low-lying eminences (the "seven hills") east of a bend in the Tiber River some 18 miles from the Mediterranean, Rome was celebrated for its impressive public buildings, aqueducts, baths, theaters and thoroughfares, many of which led from distant provinces. The city of the first Christian century had spread far beyond its fourth-century B.C. "Servian" walls and lay unwalled, secure in its greatness.

The most prominent features were the Capitoline hill, with temples to Jupiter and Juno, and the nearby Palatine, adorned with imperial palaces, including Nero's "Golden House." Both hills overlooked the Roman Forum, the hub of the entire empire.

© 1985 The Zondervan Corporation

Alternatively described as the glorious crowning achievement of mankind and as the sewer of the universe where all the scum from every corner of the empire gathered, Rome had reasons for both civic pride in its architecture and shame for staggering urban social problems not unlike those of cities today.

The apostle Paul entered the city from the south on the Via Appia. He first lived under house arrest and then, after a period of freedom, as a condemned prisoner in the Mamertime dungeon near the Forum. Remarkably, Paul was able to proclaim the gospel among all classes of people, from the palace to the prison. According to tradition, he was executed at a spot on the Ostian Way outside Rome in A.D. 68.

4. Occasion and Purpose

These two items are so closely related as to warrant considering them together. When Paul's Ephesian ministry had continued for more than two years, with tremendous impact on the city and province, he sensed that it would soon be time for him to move to another field of labor. It may be that for some time he had been looking westward toward Rome (see "many years" in Ro 15:23). Now the conviction grew that he must begin to plan for work in the West (Ac 19:21). He had already preached the Gospel in the strategic centers of population in the East, and his restless spirit yearned to reach out to places where Christ was not known. Thus he planned to go through Rome to Spain to plant the Gospel there (Ro 15:22–24).

The question naturally arises, Why did this plan dictate the writing of a letter such as Romans? Why not send a note by Phoebe simply to inform the church that he would be coming to them in a short time? Two things should be said about this.

First, since Paul hoped to go beyond Rome even as far as Spain, he evidently expected to have in the Roman church a base of missionary operation comparable to Antioch in the East. If this was to be realized, he needed to share with the church a rather complete exposition of the Gospel he had been preaching for over twenty years. By putting this exposition in writing and sending it ahead, he would give the Christian community in Rome an opportunity to digest the message and be ready to share in the extension of the Gospel to the West.

Another factor may have entered in. The very passage that sets forth his plan and purpose is followed by one requesting prayer for his safety and success as he went on to Judea prior to leaving for Rome. Particularly ominous is his expressed need to be rescued from unbelievers in Judea (Ro 15:31). The plot by Jews at Corinth against his life (Ac 20:3) may already have been made and become an omen of future events. Possibly at this point intimations from the Holy Spirit began to warn him about the imprisonment and afflictions that awaited him (Ac 20:23). What if he should not live to declare the Gospel in the West? Then he must write a letter so systematic and comprehensive that the church would be able intelligently to continue his work, proclaiming the very Gospel he was spelling out for them, taking it in his stead to the farthest reaches of the empire. For all he knew at the time, this letter might be in a sense his last will and testament, a precious deposit bequeathed to the church and through it to the community of the faithful everywhere.

Furthermore, we should not overlook the distinct possibility that in addition to its evangelistic function, Romans may have been designed to meet needs within the congregation of Rome, for, alongside its kerygmatic materials, it abounds in teaching. The degree to which Paul was familiar with conditions within the church at Rome may be debatable, but it is probable that he knew a good deal about them. Beginning at least from the time of his contact with Priscilla and Aquila at Corinth, he doubtless had a fairly continuous stream of information about the church, especially during his stay at Ephesus, since travel to and from Rome was relatively easy. The number of people listed in ch. 16 suggests many sources of information.

Yet for Paul to exhibit an intimate knowledge of conditions in the church and to attempt to deal with these problems too directly and pointedly would be unseemly in view of his personal detachment from the Roman situation. The most one can say is that the broad and general statements contained in Romans would compel the Christians at Rome to wonder at the unexpected discernment of an apostle who had never set foot in their city. Especially pertinent in this connection is the tension between Jew and Gentile within the church, two groups that may be approximately identified with the weak and the strong in 15:1–8. Then there is a warning not to be lifted up with pride because of Israel's being set aside (11:20–21), followed by a reminder that this setting aside is temporary (11:25–26). The very fact that Jew and Gentile (rather than humankind in general) are given so much prominence in the main theme of the letter (1:16) and in the section that demonstrates the need for salvation (1:18–3:20) argues for the impact on the apostle of this tension at the time of writing.

5. Theological Values

Romans satisfies the craving of the human spirit for a comprehensive exposition of the great truths of salvation set out in logical fashion, supported and illumined by OT

Scripture. The systematic element includes due attention to doctrine and life—in that order, because right relations must be established with God before one can live so as to please him and mediate his blessings to others.

The question as to what is most central to Paul's theology has been long debated. Some have said that it is justification by faith. Others have insisted that the life "in Christ" is the secret, for it lifts one out of the rigidity and barrenness of legal terminology, disclosing the positive and dynamic relationship the believer may have with God's Son. Fortunately, we do not have to choose between these two, because both are important in Paul's presentation. Without justification there can be no life in Christ (5:18), and such life in turn confirms the reality of justification.

Salvation is the basic theme of Romans (cf. 1:16)—a salvation presented in terms of the righteousness of God, which, when received by faith, results in life (1:17). It is helpful to realize that salvation, righteousness, and life are eschatological terms. The apostle talks about salvation with a future reference (13:11). Righteousness, too, in the absolute sense, belongs only to the perfected state. Again, life comes to fullness of meaning only in terms of the future (6:22; cf. Mk 10:29–30). Yet all these future realities are to be entered into and enjoyed during the earthly pilgrimage of the saints. Salvation is a present reality (10:10), as are righteousness (4:3–5) and life (6:23; 8:2). In the last analysis, only the grace of God permits us to participate now in that which properly belongs to the future.

Though Romans does not give special instruction about the Trinity, it clearly delineates the respective responsibilities of the members of the Godhead. The Gospel is called "the gospel of God" at the very beginning (1:1), before it is called "the gospel of his Son" (1:9). God's righteousness must be reckoned with, both by sinner and by saint, for it is the basis of judgment as well as of salvation. The Son of God is held up to view also from the first, because the Gospel centers in him (1:3). He is the one through whom the grace of God is mediated to sinful humanity in justification, reconciliation, and redemption. The man Christ Jesus is set over against the first Adam as the one who has succeeded in undoing the ruin brought about by the Fall (5:12–21) and who now sustains and preserves all who put their trust in him (5:10). The Spirit's role is to nurture the new creation life of the children of God by providing assurance of their sonship (8:16), their release from bondage to sin (8:2–4), their effectiveness in prayer (8:26–27), and their experience of the love of God (5:5) and of other joys of spiritual life (14:17), crowned by a confident hope that the bliss of the better state that is to come will be realized (8:23; 15:13). The Spirit also provides the dynamic for Christian service (15:19).

It is not possible, however, to claim for Romans a complete coverage of doctrine. Though salvation is central, its climax in terms of the coming of the Lord is not unfolded to any extent (13:11), though the glorification of the saints is included (8:18–19, 23). Furthermore, though the word "church" appears five times in ch. 16, it is not a theme for definitive instruction per se. Too much can be made of this seeming incompleteness, however, for in chs. 9–11 Paul is deeply concerned about the composition of the church and about how Jew and Gentile relate to it in the divine plan. Again, any attempt to deal with the concept of "covenant" is lacking, for the two references (9:4; 11:27) say nothing about the new covenant in Christ (contrast 2Co 3; Gal 3–4). That there should be no mention of the Lord's Supper may seem strange, especially since baptism is mentioned (6:4). But in Romans Paul is not concerned with ecclesiology, at least not in the sense of giving it specific treatment. Despite these omissions, it remains true that nowhere else in Scripture is the subject of salvation dealt with in such breadth and thoroughness.

In the so-called practical section of the Epistle (chs. 12–15), the effect of these great truths is set forth in terms of transformed conduct. Christians have a life to live in this world as well as a faith to hold and a fellowship to enjoy. Paul was pastor as well as preacher. In Romans, as in his other letters, his theological teaching was given not merely for the sake of information, but to build up and encourage the people of God.

6. Special Problem

Only one problem will be dealt with here—a question of whether the believers in Rome were mainly Gentile or Jewish Christians. At the outset, Paul considers his readers Gentiles (1:13), and this should be decisive unless contrary evidence of the strongest sort can be adduced. Such evidence is sometimes given in 4:1, where the apostle speaks of Abraham as "our forefather," and in 7:1ff., where he treats the law (presumably Mosaic) and says that his readers know it.

Neither of these constitutes compelling evidence, however. As to the former item, Paul also alludes to Israel's history in speaking of "our forefathers" in 1Co 10:1, in a letter intended for a Gentile church. Paul was careful to teach the spiritual kinship that existed between the Israel of the past and the people of God in the Christian dispensation. In the case of Abraham, this is spelled out clearly when he calls Abraham "the father of all who believe but have not been circumcised" (Ro 4:11). As to the familiarity of Roman Christians with the Mosaic law, Paul feels perfectly free to quote the law and other portions of the Hebrew Scriptures even when writing to predominantly Gentile churches—e.g., Galatians and Corinthians. Many Gentile converts to the Gospel had previously attended the synagogue as God-fearers and there had heard the OT read and expounded.

There remains, however, the awkward fact that the apostle devotes chs. 9–11 to the nation of Israel. The failure of this people as a whole to turn to Jesus as the Messiah was a source of deep grief to him. One may well ask, Was he not writing a section of this length to inform and comfort a Jewish Christian church that may have been struggling with this issue? Not necessarily, for one can ask a counter question: Isn't it possible that Paul was using this section to warn Gentile believers not to take their position for granted and to lapse into a false security (11:13ff.)?

Going back to the solid fact that Paul addresses the church as Gentile in character (1:13), chs. 9–11 might indeed have a special purpose for that type of audience. These people could certainly learn much from the passage—namely, the obvious advantages God had given the Jew, his own sovereignty in setting them apart as his chosen people, his righteousness in cutting them off from national privilege, and his faithfulness to covenant commitments to be seen when the nation by repentance and faith would be restored. On reading this, Gentile believers would inevitably feel an impulse to pray for and witness to Israel. When these considerations are added to the generous use of the OT in the development of the theme of Romans, it becomes clear that Paul is concerned lest Gentile Christianity should lose sight of its heritage in OT history and revelation.

EXPOSITION

I. Introduction (1:1–15)

A. Salutation (1:1–7)

1 As in all his letters, Paul uses his Roman name (cf. Ac 13:6–12). His relation to Christ is primary, so to express his attachment to his Lord he uses the term "servant" (GK 1528). In Israel the citizenry regarded themselves as servants of their king. This same word is used of Christ in relation to the Father (Php 2:7). By beginning in this fashion, Paul is putting himself on the same plane as his readers; he does not seek to dominate them.

The word "apostle" (GK 693) sets forth his authority as Christ's appointee—his right not only to preach the Gospel (believers in general can do that) but to found and supervise churches and to discipline them if necessary. But this authority carries with it responsibility, for he must give account of the conduct of his mission (1Co 4:1–4).

Paul has been "set apart" ever since his conversion (Ac 9:15; Gal 1:12) for the Gospel of God. As a Pharisee he had been set apart to a life of strict observance of Jewish law and custom. Now his life's work is to further the Gospel, the Good News that God has for all humanity.

2 Before the historic events providing the basis for the gospel message unfolded, God "promised" the Good News in the prophetic Scriptures. Promise means more than prophecy, because it commits the Almighty to make good his word, whereas a prophecy can be merely an advance announcement of something that will happen. The concept of promise permeates this letter (4:13–25; 9:4; 15:8). The reference to "the Holy Scriptures" prepares the reader for rather copious use of the OT, beginning with 1:17.

3–4 The Gospel centers in God's Son, who had this status before he took on a "human nature" and who, in becoming human, became not only an Israelite (9:5) but a son of David (Mt 1:1; Lk 1:32; Ac 13:22–23; 2Ti 2:8), a qualification he needed as Messiah (Isa 11:1). By beginning with the sonship, Paul guards against a heretical adoptionist Christology. The period of Christ's earthly life and ministry was followed by another phase—that which resulted from his resurrection. "With power" most likely belongs not with "declared" but with "Son of God," indicating the new quality of life Jesus had after his resurrection (Php 3:10; Col 1:29).

"Spirit of holiness" is an expression that means "Holy Spirit." There may be a suggestion here that Jesus, anointed and sustained by the Holy Spirit in the days of his flesh, was acknowledged by the fact of resurrection to have successfully endured the tests and trials of his earthly life. By resurrection he has become a life-giving spirit (1Co 15:45).

Appropriately, Jesus Christ is now described as "our Lord" (GK 3261). Though this title was fitting during his earthly ministry, it attained more frequent use and greater meaning following the resurrection (Ac 2:36; 10:36; Ro 10:9). It is notable that in this initial statement about the Gospel nothing is said concerning the redeeming work of Christ, which is reserved for later consideration (3:21–26; 4:25; 5:6–21). It was the infinite worth of the Son that made his saving work possible.

5–7 Now the apostle returns to his responsibility to proclaim the Good News (cf. v.1). Two problems present themselves here, and they are somewhat related. Who is indicated by "we," and how should one understand the phrase "all the Gentiles"? Clearly, in using "we," Paul cannot be including his readers, because they did not possess apostleship. Could he be referring to other apostles, of whom the Roman believers must have heard? This is a possibility. The problem is complicated by the mention of the intended sphere of labor—"among all the Gentiles." This wording tends to limit the "we" to Paul as a literary plural, since the Gentiles constituted his special field of labor (cf. 15:16, 18, where the word "obey" corresponds to the word "obedience" in this passage). On the other hand, "all the Gentiles" can equally be rendered, "all the nations" or "all peoples" (cf. Mt 28:19). This would favor the wider reference of "we" to all the apostles, since Israel would be included as one of the peoples. It is difficult to decide this question.

The desired response to the gospel message is "obedience that comes from faith" (see 15:18; 16:26 on obedience and 1:16–17; 10:17 on faith). Paul's readers were not called, as he was, to apostleship; they were called "to belong to Jesus Christ" and to be "saints" (GK 41), the common term designating believers. This term has almost the same force as the expression Paul uses for himself—"set apart" (v.1). It carries the aroma of holiness to which every child of God is called (6:19, 22).

Finally the apostle is ready to extend a greeting to his readers—"grace and peace." Ordinary letters of that period usually contained a single word meaning "greeting" (cf. Jas 1:1). Paul, however, is partial to terms with theological import. He desires his readers to have a continuing and deepening experience of spiritual blessing that only God can bestow. Father and Son are the joint benefactors. People may long for grace and peace, but only God can grant such gifts. The rich meaning of these terms will emerge as Paul uses them in the body of his work.

B. Paul and the Church at Rome (1:8–15)

8–10 The salutation has been unusually long; but instead of moving on immediately to his main theme, the apostle still lingers over introductory matters. Doubtless he felt the need to get acquainted, so to speak, by unburdening his own heart about what his readers meant to him. It is a shining example of his pastoral concern mingled with his gracious sensitivity.

First of all, Paul customarily expresses his thanks to God for his readers. His thanksgiving for the Roman believers is based on their faith (cf. Eph 1:15–16; Col 1:3–4; 1Th 1:3).

Not without reason Paul had become known in Christendom as the apostle of faith. To him, faith was the basic Christian virtue, and he was eager to commend it wherever he saw it. Here his commendation is exceedingly generous, even hyperbolic. The whole world has heard of their faith (cf. 1Th 1:8). Paul's thanksgiving is followed by a statement concerning his prayer—both intercession for them and a special plea that his hope of coming to them would be realized, providing it is God's will.

But why should Paul find it necessary to summon God as his witness that he had been faithful in praying for the Roman believers? He only does this when the thing he is claiming is difficult to believe. Here there are two reasons. Since he claims to have been praying repeatedly, it seems almost too much to expect of a man who did not know most of these people. Furthermore, as he would tell his readers later (15:25), he was about to leave for Jerusalem, and this could give the appearance that he was not putting the Roman believers first in his plans.

11–13 The apostle confesses to a great desire to see his readers, not simply in order to know them personally, but especially to minister to them. By "spiritual gift" (GK 5992) we should probably not understand some "charismatic" gift as in 1Co 12, since Paul does not specify any particular gift and avoids the plural. Moreover, his own prominence in this contemplated gift hardly makes room for the specialized gifts of the Spirit (cf. 1Co 1:7). But no sooner has this sentiment been expressed than it is halfway recalled, being revised because it seems to suggest that a blessing will flow only one way, from Paul to the church. So he alters his language to make room for mutual encouragement and upbuilding. Seeing faith at work in one individual after another adds zest to Christian fellowship. Paul himself needed this.

As he had prayed constantly for the Romans, so he had planned many times to visit them, but the plan often had to be set aside. Presumably his work in the East had involved him so completely that he did not see his way clear to break away for the projected trip to Rome.

His hope to have "a harvest" among his readers should not be interpreted narrowly as though he is hinting that some in their ranks are not genuinely saved. His use of the word "Gentiles" instead of "churches" may be a pointer for us, hinting that "among you" is a reference to the community rather than to the church specifically, and that the fruit he envisions is the reaching of the unsaved. This would not, of course, exclude fruit-bearing in the sense of developing the saints in character (Gal 5:22–23).

14–15 Paul looks forward to his visit, but he also considers it an obligation. Why? He has already laid the groundwork for such a statement by acknowledging that he is Christ's servant (v.1), who has been given a charge with taking the Gospel to all peoples (v.5). The phrase "Greeks and non-Greeks [Gk. barbaroi; GK 975]" refers to all non-Jewish members of the human race (cf. "Gentiles" in v.13), dividing them into two categories. It is probable that barbaroi refers mostly to the people in the territory west of Rome, where he hoped to go, though he would undoubtedly find representatives of both groups also in Rome.

The "wise" are not to be equated with the Greeks, for this would mean that non-Greeks are being dubbed "foolish," which would be unwarranted. Rather, Paul seems to have in mind what he wrote in 1Co 1:18–31 (see comments). The wise are perishing in the midst of their worldly wisdom, and the foolish in their abject simplicity. Both need the Gospel.

How heartwarming is the apostle's attitude toward his obligation! Instead of considering it a burden he must bear, a duty he must carry out, he is "eager" to fulfill it. While success in preaching demands the finest intellectual and formal preparation, it also requires great zeal.

II. Theme: The Gospel As the Revelation of the Righteousness of God (1:16–17)

16 Having confessed his fervent desire to preach the Gospel at Rome, Paul goes on to give a reason for his zeal. He has no sense of reserve about his mission. He is ready to challenge the philosophies and religions in Rome that vie for the attention of people, because he knows from his experience in the East that God's power at work in the proclamation of the Good News is able to transform lives. "Power" (GK 1539) stresses not how the Gospel operates but what its intrinsic efficacy is. It offers something not found anywhere else—a righteousness from God (see below).

Power is linked closely with salvation. Judaism was prone to think of the law as power, but this is not affirmed in Scripture. As for salvation, the OT is clear that whether it is conceived of physically as deliverance (Ex 14:13) or spiritually (Ps 51:12), it comes from the Lord. This is maintained in the NT as well in Paul's affirmation in this verse. So the apostle permits himself to say that if he himself saves anyone (1Co 9:22), it is only in the sense that he is Christ's representative who is able to point out the way of salvation to his fellow human beings.

"Salvation" (GK 5401) is a broad concept. Its basic meaning is soundness or wholeness. It promises the restoration of all that sin has marred or destroyed, and it unites in itself the particular aspects of truth suggested by justification, reconciliation, sanctification, and redemption. But its efficacy depends on one's willingness to receive the message. "Everyone who believes" will benefit equally. This sweeping declaration ties in with the previous statement (concerning Greeks and non-Greeks) and now includes both the Jew and the Gentile. The Jew receives "first" consideration. This does not mean that every Jew must be evangelized before the Gospel can be presented to Gentiles. But it does mean that God, after having dealt in a special way with the Jew in OT days and having followed this by sending his Son to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Mt 15:24), could not pass by this people. To them was given the first opportunity to receive the Lord Jesus, both during his ministry (Jn 1:11) and in the Christian era (Ac 1:8; 3:26). Paul himself followed this pattern (Ac 13:45–46; 28:25, 28). It is a case of historical priority, not essential priority, for the Jews who are first to hear the Gospel are also the first to be judged for their sins (2:9).

17 The apostle now explains his statement (cf. "for") that the Gospel means salvation for those who receive it by faith: it discloses "a righteousness [GK 1466] from God." Paul is dependent here on the OT (Isa 46:12–13; 61:10), which emphasizes that God is righteous in the way he acts—an idea foreign to Greek thought. Clearly, the character of God is involved in the sense that what he does and provides is fully in keeping with his righteous nature (cf. 3:26). But just as clearly, this expression also includes the activity of God. The Gospel would not be the good news if it simply disclosed God's righteousness, and such a message would scarcely demand faith. But if salvation as God provides it is fully in keeping with his righteous character, then it has integrity.

We should compare Paul's statement here with Php 3:9, where he contrasts his pre-Christian state, in which he had a righteousness based on obeying the law, with his present situation, in which he rests on a righteousness which is from God, based on faith. In summary, God's righteousness in this context stresses divine provision. What this entails will be unfolded in due course.

Somewhat baffling is the twofold reference to faith—lit. "from faith to faith" (cf. NIV "by faith from first to last"). These two prepositional phrases relate directly to God's righteousness, indicating how that righteousness is to be received (cf. Paul's restatement of this idea in 3:21–22). Having said that, we must inquire into the distinctives of the two phrases involving "faith" (GK 4411). Among the numerous suggestions are these: from the faith of the preacher to the faith of the hearer; from OT faith to NT faith (cf. the following quotation); entirely from faith; and from God's faithfulness to human faith. It is best to see the first phrase ("from faith") as indicating the basis on which God grants justification (3:26; 5:1; Gal 2:16) or righteousness (9:30; 10:6). The really troublesome element here is the second phrase ("to faith"). It is intended to remind believers that justifying faith is only the beginning of the Christian life; that same attitude must govern them in their continuing experience as children of God (this is how NIV understands the phrase).

What about "The righteous will live by faith"? Should it be translated this way or "The one who is just by virtue of faith shall live"? Since the apostle quotes the same passage in Gal 3:11 to show that one is not justified by law but rather by faith, it is probable that he intends the reference in the same way here. Also, since the quotation is used at the very beginning of Romans, Paul's main concern here is not how justified sinners should live (chs. 6–8), but how they can be considered just or righteous in the sight of God. Ethical righteousness depends on a right relationship to God, so the latter merits priority of treatment.

Why did not Paul then change the order to read, "The one who is righteous by faith will live?" Apparently he did not want to disturb the form of a familiar quotation, even though he changed its emphasis from the OT. The liberty involved in using an OT quotation somewhat differently from its original setting is necessitated by the progress of revelation. It was a practice used in Judaism before Paul's time, as we know from the Dead Sea Scrolls, and it was also used by other apostles (see comment on Ac 2:16–21; also EBC 1:617–26).

III. The Need for Salvation: The Plight of Humanity (1:18–3:20)

Instead of plunging at once into an exposition of the Gospel, Paul launches into a lengthy exposure of human sinfulness. This is sound procedure, for until people are persuaded of their lost condition they are not likely to be concerned about deliverance. So Paul undertakes to demonstrate in the human situation a grievous lack of the righteousness God requires.

A. In the Pagan World (1:18–32)

18 At the outset it is important to observe the correlation between righteousness and wrath. Both are represented as being revealed from God. Just as full salvation awaits the future (see comment on 1:16) but also belongs to the present and is appropriated by faith (1:17), similarly wrath, while an eschatological concept, is viewed here as belonging to the present age. It is "being revealed" (GK 636). This means that the unfolding of history involves a disclosure of God's wrath against sin, seen in the terrible corruption and perversion of human life. This does not mean that the price of sin is to be reckoned only in terms of the present operation of wrath, for there is a day of judgment awaiting the sinner (2:5). But the divine verdict is already in some measure anticipated. Paul regards the degrading depths of sin among pagans as a present judgment from God (cf. vv. 24, 26, 28).

This wrath of God is being revealed "from heaven." This phrase as used in the Gospels means "from God." Some scholars object to the idea of the wrath of God, but such objection is often molded by human experience of anger as passion or desire for revenge. God's wrath, however, is not temperamental; rather, it is righteous (cf. 13:4–5).

The object God's wrath is twofold—"all the godlessness and wickedness of men." Paul explicates the first term in vv.19–27 and the second in vv.28–32. "Godlessness" (GK 813) means a lack of reverence, an impiety that arrays people against God, not simply in terms of neglect but also of rebellion. "Wickedness" (GK 94) means injustice, relating to the vitiating of a person's conduct toward other human beings. The two together serve to denote the failure of humankind in terms of the requirements of the two tables of the Decalogue. No distinction is made here between Jews and Gentiles, since "men" includes the entire human race. These are the very areas in which the prophets found fault with Israel. But as the thought unfolds here, the culprit appears much more sharply in terms of Gentiles than of Jews.

They "suppress the truth by their wickedness." That is, whenever the truth about God (cf. v.25) starts to assert itself and makes them feel guilty, they suppress it—either by further immoralities or by denial. Suppression of the truth implies a knowledge of the truth, and what this involves is explained in the sequel.

19–20 The creation bears clear witness to its Maker, and the evidence is "plain" to people. Here Paul enters upon a discussion of what is usually designated natural revelation in distinction from the special revelation that comes through the Scriptures. Four characteristics are noted. (1) It is a clear testimony set before human eyes. (2) The word "understood" (GK 3783) suggests that the revelation does not stop with perception, but is expected to include reflection, the drawing of a conclusion about the Creator. (3) It is a constant testimony, maintained "since the creation of the world" (cf. Ac 14:17). (4) It is a limited testimony in that it reflects God in certain aspects only—namely, "his eternal power and divine nature." One has to look elsewhere for the disclosure of his love and grace—i.e., to Scripture and especially to God's revelation in his Son (Jn 1:14). Natural revelation is sufficient to make human beings responsible (they are left "without excuse"), but is not by itself sufficient to accomplish their salvation.

21–23 Despite the knowledge of God conveyed to them through the creation, people failed to act on it. They "neither glorified him as God nor gave thanks to him" (two obligations embracing one's entire duty towards God). Those who refuse to let God have the place of preeminence that is rightfully his will put something or someone else in God's place.

"Their thinking became futile." This phrase suggests that mythology and idolatry grew out of an insistent need by people to recognize some power in the universe greater than themselves, coupled with their refusal to give God the place of supremacy. It is highly suggestive that the verb "to become futile" yields a noun form that was used for idols (Ac 14:15). Idols are unreal and unprofitable, and their service can only lead to futility and further estrangement from the true and living God (cf. Da 5:23).

This abandonment of God in favor of inferior objects of worship is traced in a descending scale. "Mortal man" is the first substitution; the Creator is forsaken in preference for the being created in his image. Scripture shows us such deification of humankind in the case of Nebuchadnezzar (see Da 2:38; 3:1). In Paul's day the cult of Caesar had spread throughout the empire. In modern times the western world has outgrown crass idolatry, but humanism has subtly injected the worship of humanity without the physical trappings. God is quietly ruled out and the human spirit is placed on the throne.

The next stage is worship of the animal kingdom. Paul alludes to Ps 106:19–20 here, using a text that refers to Israel's sin in making the golden calf at Horeb and bowing down to this molten image. Although Paul is dealing with a characteristic sin of paganism, he resorts to OT history for an illustration. God did not and could not condone idolatry in the people he had chosen. His judgment fell heavily when there was no repentance, eventually deporting them from the land he had given them.

24–25 The opening word "therefore" carries the reader all the way back to the mention of the revelation of God's wrath, taking in also what lies between. The false worship just pictured is God's judgment for abandoning the true worship. Human religion in its various cultic forms is a species of punishment for spurning the revelation God has given of himself in nature. In many cases it is a means of keeping people so occupied that they never arrive at a confrontation with the true God.

"God gave them over" becomes a refrain (vv.24, 26, 28). The same expression is used of God's judgment on Israel for idolatry (Ac 7:42). In our passage the reference is principally to Gentiles. We are not told how this giving over was implemented, but most likely we are to think of it in negative terms—i.e., that God simply took his hands off and let willful rejection of himself produce its ugly results in human life.

At this point a problem surfaces. How is it that we have a reference to sexual immorality in v.24 and again in vv.26–27? Is this a case of repetition? No, the immorality lies in different areas. The earlier reference is to cultic prostitution, the latter to immoral relations in ordinary life. Paul was no stranger to the matter he discusses here. Writing from Corinth, where the temple of Aphrodite was fabled to have once housed hundreds of cult prostitutes, he must have been keenly aware of how this scourge affected the moral life of that city so adversely. How true is the observation that "their foolish hearts were darkened."

"They exchanged the truth of God for a lie" (lit. "the lie"). This is the lie above all others—the contention that something or someone is to be venerated in place of the true God. According to Paul elsewhere, history will repeat itself in that when the man of lawlessness is revealed and demands to be worshiped, people will follow him and reap ruin because they have refused the truth and have believed the lie (2Th 2:3–12). There, too, God gives them over to strong delusion (v.11).

Paul's indictment here is that by a wretched exchange human beings came to worship and serve "created things rather than the Creator." They have wholly rid themselves of God by substituting other objects in his place. This should be sufficient to banish the notion that the practice of idolatry is simply using a man-made image in order to worship God (cf. Hos 14:3). Contemplating this abysmal betrayal, the apostle cannot resist an outburst to counteract it. The Creator "is forever praised." God's glory remains, even though unacknowledged by many of his creatures.

26–27 For the second time the sad refrain is sounded—"God gave them over"—this time to immorality, with emphasis on perversion in sexual relations. What is the connection between the idolatry and immorality? By inventing their own deities, people were free to follow their own sinful passions, for they had no outside God to account to. Furthermore, the heathen went so far as to project their own license onto their gods, who in many cases were extremely immoral. Paul's use of

"exchanged" is suggestive. The first exchange, that of the truth for the lie (v.25), is followed by another—the upsetting of the normal course of nature in sexual relations. Instead of using the ordinary terms for men and women, Paul substitutes "males" and "females." The irony is that this sort of bestiality finds no counterpart in the animal kingdom. Sexual perversion is the unique contrivance of the human species.

In bringing this discussion to a close, the apostle uses the expression "received . . . the due penalty," which denotes the idea of recompense, a punishment in keeping with the offense. Sexual deviation contains in itself a punishment for the abandonment of God and his ways. This need not demand the conclusion that every homosexual follows the practice in deliberate rebellion against God's prescribed order. What is true historically and theologically is in measure true, however, experientially. The "gay" facade is a thin veil for deep-seated frustration. The folly of homosexuality is proclaimed in its inability to reproduce the human species in keeping with the divine commandment (Ge 1:28). To sum up, what people do with God has much to do with their personal character and lifestyle. Throughout the passage they are represented as actively choosing a religion and a lifestyle; they are not being taken captive against their will.

28–32 Paul now explains the word "wickedness" in v.18. This section describes the havoc wrought in human relations because of suppressing the knowledge of God. In the original there is a wordplay—when people disapproved of retaining God in their knowledge, God in turn gave them over to a "depraved" (lit. "disapproved"; GK 99) mind, which led them in turn to commit all kinds of sin. It is God's function to judge, but people have usurped that prerogative in order to sit in judgment on him and dismiss him from their lives. Paul's theme here accords with our Lord's appraisal, who traced the wellspring of sinful acts to the inner life rather than to environmental factors (Mk 7:20–23). The depraved mind is explained in terms of what it approves and plans—to do what even the popular moral consciousness regards as wrong.

Scholars have found it difficult to detect any satisfactory classification in the long list of offenses included here, which only confirms the fact that sin is irrational in itself and disorderly in its effects. It can be pointed out, however, that the initial group contains broad, generic descriptions of sin. The first of these, "wickedness," is the antithesis of righteousness, denoting the absence of what is just. It necessitates the creation of laws to counteract its disruptiveness, lest society itself be rendered impossible. "Evil" denotes what is evil not in the sense of calamity, but with full ethical overtones, signifying what is sinister and vile (cf. the devil, who is called "the evil one"). "Greed" indicates the relentless urge to acquire more (cf. Col 3:5). "Depravity" is a term describing a condition of moral evil, emphasizing its internal and resident character.

Among the final twelve descriptions, "God-haters" stands out, since it alone is related directly to an attitude toward the Almighty. But it is not isolated. The hatred that vents itself on God readily finds objects of hatred among his creatures. When human beings start worshiping themselves, insolent pride is the inevitable attitude assumed toward their fellow human beings. Some of the descriptions Paul uses here are not found again in his writings or elsewhere in the NT, but four of them occur in 2Ti 3:2–3, in predictions of the state of society in the last days.

The final item in the indictment is climactic (v.32). It is prefaced by the reminder that people have not lacked a sufficient knowledge of God's "righteous decree" or requirement (cf. 2:26; 8:4). If the knowledge of his power and deity (v.20) was sufficient to obligate them to worship God, the knowledge of his righteousness, innate in their very humanity, was sufficient to remind them that the price of disobedience was death. Yet they were not deterred from their sinful ways by this realization. In fact, they were guilty of the crowning offense of applauding those who practiced all kinds of wickedness. Instead of repenting of their own misdeeds and seeking to deter others, they promoted wrongdoing by encouraging it in their fellow human beings, in a defiant revolt against a righteous God.

Two final questions need to be raised about vv.18–32. Since the use of the past tense predominates in this section, are we to conclude that Paul has in view some epoch in the past when sin manifested itself with special intensity? This is unlikely, for he occasionally moves to the present tense. The conclusion is that the description fits his own time as well as earlier ages If this were not so, the passage could scarcely deserve a place in the development of his theme.

Another problem is raised by the sweeping nature of the charge made in this portion of the letter. Are we to think Paul is accusing every pagan of this total list of offenses? Such a conclusion is unwarranted. While sinful people are capable of committing all of them, no one is necessarily guilty of each one.

B. Principles of Judgment (2:1–16)

In turning to this section, one can recognize considerable resemblance to 1:18-32. Human inadequacy in the light of divine standards continues to characterize the discussion (compare 2:1, "no excuse," with 1:20, "without excuse"). The indictment is stated first in broad terms, with no indication whether the people in view are Jews or Gentiles (cf. 1:18; 2:1), but as the picture unfolds, the Jew takes shape before our eyes just as the Gentile has come into focus in the previous section. In both portions, general terms for sin are followed by specific accusations (compare 1:18 and 1:23, 26–32 with 2:1–16 and 2:17–29).

1–4 Paul changes his style here as he enters into dialogue with an imagined questioner who has absorbed what was said up to this point and who shows by his attitude that he is in hearty agreement with the exposure of Gentile wickedness. That Paul had experienced such encounters in his missionary preaching is hardly open to doubt.

A Jewish listener, heartily endorsing the verdict rendered concerning the Gentiles, fails to realize his own plight. True judgment rests on the ability to discern the facts in a given case. If one is able to see the sin and hopelessness of the Gentile, one should logically be able to see himself or herself as being in the same predicament. But such people are so taken up with the faults of others that they often do not consider their own failures (cf. Mt 7:2–5). The charge that those who pass judgment do the same things they see in others is enlarged in 2:17–24. The allegation "you . . . do the same things" stings, for the word "do" is the term used in 1:32 for the practices of the sinful Gentile.

Paul repeats himself in v.2. As he moves to state the first of his principles of divine judgment, he carries the observer with him. Surely this person will agree ("we know") that when God pronounces judgment on those who make a practice of indulging in sin, his judgment is based on truth. By this Paul simply means that God's judgment is reached on the basis of reality, not on appearances. He then asks (v.3): "Do you think you will escape God's judgment?" Two words are emphatic here, "think" and "you." Paul is reading the inmost thoughts of the Jew, whom he understands thoroughly from his own pre-Christian experience.

Paul carries the probing deeper still (v.4) by suggesting that people ignore and despise the fact that God, to be true to himself, must bring sin into judgment. There is even a scornful attitude toward God's patience with his people Israel, as though that forbearance confirmed of their security, if not signaled weakness on God's part. "When the sentence for a crime is not quickly carried out, the hearts of the people are filled with schemes to do wrong" (Ecc 8:11). God's kindness toward Israel, noted here, is noted again in Ro 11:22.

In this passage "tolerance" and "patience" seem to be explanatory of "kindness," which is repeated as the governing thought. "Tolerance" (GK 496) has the idea of self-restraint. "Patience" (GK 3429) is literally "long-spiritedness." The intent of the kindness is to give opportunity for "repentance" (cf. 2Pe 3:9, 15), a term that occurs only here in Romans, though it must have been often on Paul's lips in preaching (Ac 20:21).

5–11 The apostle speaks plainly in order to startle Jews out of their lethargy of self-deception. What the nation is doing by its stubbornness and impenitence is to invite retribution, which is slowly but surely building up a reservoir of divine wrath that will be crushing when it breaks over the guilty in the day of reckoning. Then the judgment will be revealed to all, in contrast to the indirect working of God's wrath in the present scene (cf. ch. 1). At that time a second principle of divine judgment will become apparent, emphasizing performance: "to each person according to what he has done" (lit., "according to his works"). What Paul has in mind here is the final reckoning (cf. the word "day"). National judgment may fit into a temporal scheme, but personal judgment belongs to the frontier of the ages to come.

In amplifying this second principle of judgment Paul makes room for only two broad classes—those who persist in doing good and those who follow an evil course (vv.7–10). The first group, pictured as seeking glory, honor, and immortality, are promised eternal life. What can the apostle mean by his breathtaking assertion about attaining "eternal life"? At the very least, it is safe to say that he is not contradicting what he says later about the impossibility of having salvation by means of the works of the law (3:20). In fact, the statement of v.7, rightly understood, teaches the opposite. The reward of eternal life belongs to those whose good deeds result from their hope in God. Paul is simply portraying the motivation and the tenor of the life of faith that will culminate in eternal fellowship with God. The good works that believers perform do not bring them salvation, but they attest to the salvation they have received by faith (6:22; Eph 2:8–10).

On the other side of the ledger is a pattern of evil defined in terms of self-seeking and rejection of the truth, leading to divine wrath in terms of trouble and distress. The statement "who reject the truth and follow evil" echoes 1:18. Destiny does not depend on whether one is Jew or Gentile. The Jew is mentioned first simply because of God's prior dealing with that nation in history. Mention of the two divisions of humankind leads naturally to the pronouncement of Paul's third principle: God's judgment is impartial; he "does not show favoritism" (v.11). This is the truth that Peter learned in the Cornelius incident (Ac 10:34). Paul's explanation of what it involves belongs to the following paragraph.

12–15 The principle of impartiality has to face a problem as soon as the two groups, Jews and Gentiles, are considered together, for God has not dealt with them in similar fashion. The Jews have received a revelation of God in Scripture that has been denied the Gentile. But in this section Paul shows that Gentiles do have a law, and this suffices as a basis for judgment. Before discussing this law, however, Paul sees in it no power to save, for "all who sin apart from the law will also perish apart from the law." Gentiles do not perish for the reason that they lack the law which Jews possess, but because they sin. In speaking of Jews, Paul says they "will be judged" by the law, but this does not imply exoneration, for no Jew has succeeded in keeping the law.

The expression "all who sin under the law" could strike a Jewish reader as incongruous, but Paul is linking sin with law deliberately in order to prepare the way for his next statement—that the righteous are not those who "hear the law" (cf. Jas 1:22–24). Rather, doers of the law are the ones who will be "declared righteous" (v.13; GK 1467). This is the first occurrence in Romans of the important expression "be declared righteous." Full treatment of this matter must wait until ch. 3, though the full theological significance of this word should be retained here.

Paul's purpose is to undercut the position of those Jews who are counting on their (limited) obedience to the law for acceptance with God. To Paul, one's compliance would have to be perfect if one were to be declared righteous by an absolutely righteous God (cf. Lk 10:28; contrast Lk 8:12). By analogy, Gentiles are in essentially the same position, seeing that they also are not without law (cf. vv.14–15). The future tense in "will be declared righteous" favors the conclusion that final judgment is in view. Paul is not raising false hopes here; on the contrary, he is dashing them. Only after the flimsy edifice of humanly contrived righteousness has been leveled will the apostle be ready to put in its place the sturdy foundation of the justification provided by God in Christ.

The word "indeed" in v.14 demonstrates that Paul intends to counter the boastfulness of the Jews by a discussion of the Gentile situation, to which he now turns. He seems anxious to avoid the impression that he is discussing the Gentiles in their entirety (he says "Gentiles," not "the Gentiles"). He is thinking of them in individual terms, not as masses. He goes on to recognize that there are Gentiles who, despite their apparent disadvantage in not possessing the Mosaic law, "do by nature" what the law requires.

What are these things? Presumably, they are not matters peculiar to the law of Moses, but moral and ethical requirements widely recognized and honored in people generally. It was a commonplace of rabbinic teaching that Abraham kept the laws of Sinai long before they were given. Paul states that such people as he has in mind are "a law for themselves." He is not talking about laws invented in their own self-interest; rather, they are laws that come from the law that is written on their hearts. We must not confuse this statement with God's promise in Jer 31:33 of the law written in the heart, for if that were the case, Gentiles would have the law in a more intimate way than Jews did. Rather, Paul is insisting that the basic requirements of the law are stamped on human hearts. Presumably, he can say this because human beings are made in the image of God. All people, for example, when they quarrel, instinctively try to determine who is in the right and who is in the wrong. Similarly, despite the great differences in laws and customs among peoples around the world, what unites them in a common humanity is the recognition that some things are right and others are wrong.

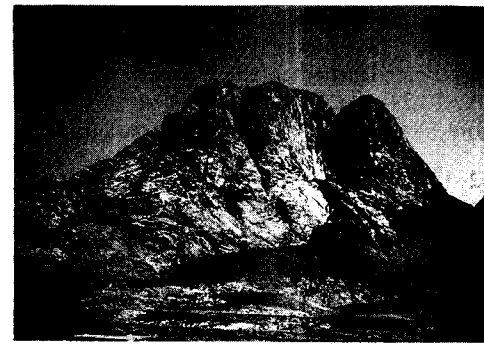
An additional element that belongs to the equipment of the Gentiles is "their conscience," which "[bears] witness" (v.15; GK 5210). The word used here has the idea of bearing witness with; so one must ask, With what? Only one answer seems possible: with the requirements of the law written on the heart. The two function together. While in the Greek OT the word "conscience" never appears, the operation of a conscience is recognized in such passages as Ge 42:21 and 2Sa 24:10.



Paul's fairly frequent use of the term "conscience" (GK 5287) indicates his indebtedness to his Greek environment and his desire of capitalizing on a concept familiar to his Gentile churches. In his thinking, the function of conscience in Gentiles is parallel to the function of the law for Jews. The way conscience operates is described as a process of accusation or defense by the thoughts of a person, the inner life being pictured as a kind of debating forum, so that at times one finds oneself exonerated at the bar of conscience, at other times convicted of wrong.

16 "This will take place on the day when God will judge men's secrets" (v.16). What does "this" refer to? Does Paul mean that only at the judgment will conscience be engaged in the manner he has just indicated? This would seem to be a severe limitation. Perhaps, therefore, it is best to see vv.14–15 as a parenthesis, so that what takes place on the day of judgment is the declaration of righteousness (or otherwise) referred to in v.13 (cf. NIV).

God's judgment will include "men's secrets" (cf. 1Co 4:5). This is the only court able to assess them. Many an act that seems entirely praiseworthy to those who observe it may actually be wrongly motivated; and contrariwise, some things that seem to us to merit stern disapproval may pass muster in this supreme court because the intention behind the deed was praiseworthy. The Jews theoretically admitted judgment and certainly welcomed it in the case of the Gentiles, while trying to shield themselves behind their privileged position. Non-Jews admitted the reality of judgment implicitly by the very process of reasoning that either accused or excused their conduct. What they did not know was the item included here—that God will judge "through Jesus Christ" (Jn 5:27; Ac 17:31). Paul concludes this section by noting that these principles of judgment are consistent with the Gospel that he preached.

C. Specific Guilt of the Jew (2:17–3:8)

Two main developments are discernible in this section. In 2:17–29 the advantage of the Jews in terms of their possession of the law and the distinctive mark of circumcision is offset by their boastfulness and fruitlessness. In 3:1–8 a new factor is introduced: Israel's failed to respond to God in terms of trust and obedience, justifying the visitation of his wrath upon them.

The law of God is naturally associated with his revelation given to Moses on Mount Sinai (see also 2Co 3; Gal 4:42–31).

17–20 Paul now begins to dialogue with a representative Jew, and his razor-sharp irony is superb for its deftness. He first builds up the Jew, citing his various distinctives and appearing to appreciate them (vv.17–20), only to swing abruptly into a frontal assault by exposing the inconsistency between his claims and his conduct (vv.21–24). Jews were characterized by their reliance on the law, given by God through Moses. Such reliance came as the result of a relationship with God enjoyed by no other people. In Paul's time some of the leaders of Judaism were making such extravagant statements about the law as to put it virtually in the place of God. Many Jews were trying to keep the law for its own sake, to honor the law rather than its Giver. This tendency became even more developed after the fall of Jerusalem, when the law became the rallying point for a nation that had lost its holy city and its temple.

Paul concedes that the use of the law brings knowledge of God's will and a recognition of its superior teaching. But this is not all, for Jews think that this advantage had made them superior to Gentiles. We can paraphrase Paul's statement to his Jewish opponent: "You come to Gentiles and propose yourself as a guide for their blindness (when, as a matter of fact, as I have already shown, they have a light and a law as well as you). You come to the Gentiles as though they were dumb and childish, giving you the whip hand, which you thoroughly relish. To you they are mere infants, knowing next to nothing." By employing terms actually used by the Jews for the Gentiles, one after the other, not once suggesting that the Gentile has anything to his credit, but invariably magnifying the Jew, Paul has succeeded in exposing Jewish pride and boasting as utterly ridiculous.

21–24 Abruptly the shadow-boxing turns aggressive and the blows become lethal as the Jew is confronted by the disparity between what he teaches others as the will of God and his own manner of life. The thrust loses nothing of its forthrightness by being posed in a series of questions, for the effect is to turn the complacent Jew back on himself to search his own soul.

The indictment is summarized by the general charge of breaking the very law the Jew boasts of (v.23). In fact, the failure is so notorious that even non-Jews notice the discrepancy. At this point Paul introduces a quotation from Isa 52:5. God has been obliged to chasten his disobedient people by permitting them to go into captivity, where their captors make sport of their God who was apparently unable to prevent their deportation (cf. Eze 36:20–21). But there also the fault lay not with God but with his people who had refused to take his law seriously.

25–27 If the law was the major distinctive of the Jews, a close second was circumcision. As with the law, so with circumcision, the nation was guilty of placing unwarranted confidence in this rite. Many held the view that only circumcised children shared in the world to come. In dividing people into two classes, circumcised and uncircumcised, the Jews were in effect indicating those who were saved and those who were not.

But Paul contends that circumcision and observing the law cannot be separated. If one has the symbol of Judaism and lacks the substance, of what value is the symbol? If a Gentile should show success in observing the law, the lack of circumcision is surely not so important as to discount his spiritual attainment (cf. 2:14). In fact, says Paul, one can go a step further (v.27) and say that the circumcised Jew may find himself on a lower plane than the despised Gentile, because if the latter obeys the law that the former takes it for granted, then the Gentile will "condemn" (GK 3212) him. This does not involve the bringing of any charge, but is a specialized use of the word "condemn" to indicate the effect created by one who surpasses another despite his inferior status or limited advantage (cf. Mt 8:11–12; 12:41).

28–29 That this portion is intended as a conclusion to the discussion of both the law and circumcision is evident, for both are mentioned, though the law is referred to in terms of "letter" (cf. v.27). There was plenty of background for Paul's appeal for circumcision of the heart (e.g., Dt 30:6; Jer 4:4; 9:25–26). A real Jew is one who has circumcision of the heart, accomplished "by the Spirit, not by the written code" (cf. 2Co 3:6). How striking this is! The law is part of the Scripture that the Spirit has inspired, yet there is no hint here that the true Jew is one in whom the Spirit has made the teaching of the law dynamic. By avoiding any such suggestion,

Paul prepares the way for his treatment of the law in ch. 7.

He goes on to note that a Jew transformed by the Spirit would really be living up to the name he bears ("Jew" comes from Judah, meaning "praise"). He would be praiseworthy in the eyes of God, fulfilling what the law requires but cannot produce (cf. 8:3–4). Paul writes, of course, as a Christian, as one who has suffered much for his faith from his countrymen. But the closing verses of the chapter show that for all the bluntness of his references to the Jew he is not motivated by a desire to belittle his nation. Rather, he seeks their highest good (cf. 9:1–3; 10:1).

3:1–4 Paul continues with the subject of the guilt of the Jew, but now with an emphasis on the element of unbelief and on a sophisticated claim of immunity from divine judgment. His opening question reflects a devastating attack: What advantage is there in being a circumcised Jew? Paul implies that there are many such advantages, but he proceeds no further than the first one. The reader is kept waiting a long time for any resumption, but eventually the full list is provided (9:4–5).

For present consideration, the chosen advantage is that this nation has been "entrusted with the very words of God." The Greek word for "words" (lit., "oracles"; GK 3359) was used especially for divine utterances. To be "entrusted" (GK 4409) with these divine oracles obviously meant more than being the recipient of them, and even more than being their custodian and transmitter. What God expected were faith and obedience.

Precisely at this point the Jews failed (v.3). Paul has already dealt sufficiently with Jewish failure in terms of the law, but here he deals with it in terms of God's revealed purpose. He is considerate in saying that "some did not have faith" (cf. 1Co 10:1–10). Actually, of the exodus generation only two men pleased God and were permitted to enter the Promised Land. Paul is here recognizing the concept of the faithful remnant in Israel.

We should understand "God's faithfulness" in terms of the covenant aspect of God's dealings with Israel. There are really two sides to this faithfulness, the one positive, the other negative (cf. a similar duality in "the righteousness of God"; 1:17–18). Here the negative aspect is before us, as evident from the mention of "his wrath" (v.5). This is in harmony with a frequent emphasis in the prophets. When Israel fractured the Sinaitic covenant, God's very faithfulness compelled him to judge his people by sending them into captivity. The positive aspect will appear in Paul's sustained discussion of God's dealings with Israel (chs. 9–11).

As might be expected, Paul vigorously rejects any suggestion that God could fail in terms of his faithfulness (v.4). The concept of his fidelity is carried forward by the use of a closely related term. He is "true" to his covenant promises because he is true in himself. If one had to choose between the reliability of God and of humankind, one would have to agree with the psalmist who declared in his disillusionment concerning his fellow human beings, "Every man [is] a liar" (Ps 116:11). Even David, one of the best men in Israel's history, a man after God's own heart (1Sa 13:14), proved a disappointment. After being chastened for his sin and his refusal to confess it for a long time, he was ready to admit that God was in the right and he was in the wrong (Ps 51:4).

5–8 The supposition that human wrong could serve to display the righteousness of God was probably suggested to Paul in his quoting of Ps 51. Is it not possible (so the question goes) that since human failure can bring out more sharply the righteousness of God, the Almighty ought to be grateful for this service and soften the judgment that would otherwise be due the offender? The question is one a Jew might well resort to in line with the thought that God would go easy on his covenant people. So Paul speaks for a supposed interlocutor. The mention of wrath ties in with 2:8–9.

Paul's explanatory statement, "I am using a human argument," is due to his having permitted himself to use the word "unjust" of God, even though it is not his own assertion. If God were unjust, says Paul, he would not be qualified to judge the world. He makes no attempt to establish God's qualifications, since the readers have no doubt about this point.

Once more the apostle entertains a possible objection (vv.7–8). The thought is closely related to what has been stated in v.4. Speaking again for an objector, Paul voices the hoary adage that the end justifies the means. He has evidently had to cope with this in his own ministry, and he will be dealing with it again in a different context (6:1). Here he is content to turn the tables on the objector. Those who claim that their falsehood, which throws into sharp relief the truthfulness of God, promotes his glory and should therefore relieve the sinner of condemnation, should ponder the apostolic verdict—their "condemnation is deserved."

D. Summary (3:9–20)

9 Paul now identifies himself with the Jews, of whom he has been speaking. He asks whether they, with their moral and spiritual fitness, have an edge over Gentiles. His answer, "Not at all," registers an emphatic denial. Paul then backs up that denial of Jewish superiority by reminding his readers of the charge he has been bringing, "that Jews and Gentiles alike are all under sin." To be under sin is to be under its sway and condemnation. Up to this point in his discussion of sin, Paul does not charge the Jew with the death of Christ (cf. 1Th 2:15), nor does he charge the Gentile with this crime (cf. Ac 4:27–28). Perhaps this is because few Jews and still fewer Gentiles were involved in effecting the actual death of the Lord Jesus. Paul is basing his case on a much wider sampling of human character and conduct.

10–18 However, there is another argument waiting to be brought into play to seal the verdict. It is the testimony of Scripture. Writing to those who were for the most part Gentiles, Paul does not set down Scripture first and then work from that as a base for exposition; rather, he uses a minimum of references to the OT to substantiate what he has already established. Leaving a string of OT references to the conclusion of the argument is calculated to increase the respect of the Gentiles for Scripture as being able to depict the human condition accurately and faithfully. Both Jews and early Christians often drew up collections of Scripture passages relating to various topics as proof texts for instruction or argumentation.

The present list serves a double purpose: (1) to affirm the universality of sin in the human family, and (2) to assert its ramifications in every facet of human existence. "There is no one righteous, not even one." The language is devastatingly clear and sharp. No exception is allowed. Again, it can be put positively: "All have turned away," which seems to echo the thought of ch. 1 that people had an opportunity to know God but discarded him to their own detriment and confusion. Paul wants the full impact to register. He does not turn aside to answer the objection that the OT does speak of the righteous as a class of people over against the wicked (Ps 1) or as individuals (Job 1:8). From the standpoint of the divine righteousness, they all fall short, as Paul has affirmed of both Jews and Gentiles.

The latter half of the OT list, beginning with v.13, reflects the second emphasis mentioned above. As far as relationship with God is concerned, the rupturing power of sin has been noted (vv.11–12). But what effect does sin have on the sinner? The effect is total, because one's entire being is vitiated. Paul selects texts that refer to various members of the body: the throat, the tongue, and the lips (v.13); the mouth (v.14); the feet (v.15); and the eyes (v.18). This list affirms what theologians speak of as total depravity, i.e., not that humans in their natural state are as bad as they can possibly be, but rather that their entire beings are adversely affected by sin. Human relations also suffer, because society can be no better than those who constitute it. Some of the obvious effects—conflict and bloodshed—are specified (vv.15–17).

The chain of Scriptures closes by giving the root difficulty: "There is no fear of God before their eyes" (v.18). This is the same observation gleaned from the study of ch. 1. Being out of step with God causes conflict and chaos in human relations.

19–20 In these closing statements of the indictment, the apostle may be reading the mind of a Jew who questions the legitimacy of appealing to the type of passages used in vv.10–18, on the grounds that humankind in general is in view and at best includes only those Jews who by their very godlessness do not represent the nation as a whole. But the stubborn fact is that "whatever the law says, it says to those who are under the law" (v.19). The first reference to "law" (GK 3795) here must refer to the law in the general sense of the OT revelation (cf. 1Co 14:21); note that the string of quotations in vv.10–18 derives from various parts of the OT. The second reference, "under the law," is more literally "in the law"; the thought is not so much that the Jews are under the law's authority and dominion in the legal sense as that they are involved in Scripture, which has relevance to them at every point. The legislative aspect of the law is involved only by virtue of its being a part of Scripture.

"So that every mouth may be silenced." When human achievement is measured against what God requires, there is no place for pride or boasting but only for silence that lends consent to the verdict of guilty. In various biblical scenes of judgment, the silence of those who are being judged is a notable feature (e.g., Rev 20 11–14). Questions may be raised for the sake of clarification of the reason for the verdict (Mt 25:41–46), but when the explanation is given, no appeal is attempted. The Judge of all the earth does right (Ge 18:25).

In making these statements (v.19) the apostle has been concerned primarily with Jews because Scripture has been at issue. Suddenly he makes a statement involving the entire human race, which he pictures as "accountable to God." This may seem puzzling. How can Jewish failure in terms of what Scripture requires lead to the conclusion that all humanity is included? Two possibilities come to mind. One is that the Jewish nation is regarded as a test case for all peoples. If given the same privileges enjoyed by Israel, the rest would likewise have failed. A more likely explanation is that the failure of Gentiles is so patent that it is not a debatable subject; it can be taken for granted as already established (1:18–32). Once it has been determined that the record of the Jew is no better, then judgment is universally warranted. The final word to the Jews (v.20) is designed to rob them of any fancied support in the law of Moses. Justification before God cannot be attained by trying to observe the law, however much one may take satisfaction in that. As Jesus pointed out, no one had succeeded in keeping the law (Jn 7:19).

For the first time in Romans we encounter the expression "observing the law" (lit., "works of law"; cf. v.28), which has such prominence in Galatians (2:16; 3:2, 5, 10). That "no one will be declared righteous in his sight" is a quotation from Ps 143:2. The practical result of working seriously with the law is to "become conscious of sin" (cf. 5:20; 7:7–11). How startling it is to contemplate the fact that the best revelation the human race has apart from Christ only deepens one's awareness of failure. The law loudly proclaims one's need for the Gospel of Christ.

IV. Justification: The Imputation of Righteousness (3:21–5:21)

A. The Description of Justification (3:21–26)

To help his readers follow his train of thought, the apostle reverts to the term he used in stating the theme of the letter in 1:17—God's righteousness. He repeats also the necessity for faith (cf. 1:16) and then summarizes the material from 1:19–3:20 by the reminder that there is no difference between Jew and Gentile insofar as all have sinned. Having done this, he goes on to give a rich exposition of salvation through the use of various theological terms, with principal attention given to justification.

21 God's "righteousness" (i.e., his method of bringing people into right relation to himself; GK 1466) is "apart from law." This stands to reason, for Paul has been declaring that the law operates in quite another sphere, making those who live under it conscious of their sin (v.20). God's righteousness "has been made known"; the Greek tense used here draws attention to the appearing of Jesus Christ in history (cf. 2Ti 1:10) and especially to the fulfillment of God's saving purpose in him. Yet even before the Savior appeared, this method of making people right with himself was operating in principle, as "the Law and the Prophets"—a summary term for the OT—testify. This observation prepares the reader for the recital of God's dealings with Abraham and David in the following chapter.

22 God's righteousness becomes operative in human life "through faith in Jesus Christ." This statement is more explicit than the initial mention of faith in connection with the Gospel (1:16–17), since it specifies Jesus Christ as the necessary object of faith. A problem lies beneath the surface, however, in that a literal translation is "through faith of Jesus Christ." This raises the possibility that our Lord's own faith, or more precisely, his faithfulness in fulfilling his mission, is the thought intended (note 3:3, where pistis ["faith"; GK 4411] is translated "faithfulness"). However, Mk 11:22 makes it clear that the pistis of God can also mean faith in God, as the situation there requires. What should settle the matter here in v.22 is the precedent in Gal 2:16, where we find the identical phrase "through faith of Jesus Christ," followed by the explanatory statement "we believed in Christ Jesus."

Incidentally, it is never said that people are saved on account of their faith in Christ, as if our faith makes a contribution to our salvation. On the contrary, faith is simply that which appropriates God's gift; it adds nothing to it. And the way of salvation is the same for everyone, for "there is no difference" (cf. 3:9).

23 The reason all must come to God through faith in Christ is that "all have sinned and fall short of [or 'lack,' cf. Mk 10:21] the glory of God." This "glory" (GK 1518) cannot refer to God's final glory (cf. 5:2), since even believers, for whom the sin problem has been solved, lack the future glory now. Rather, glory must be associated with the divine presence and the privilege that the human race originally had of direct communion with God. This ever-present deprivation is depicted in the restriction of God's glory to the holy of holies in the tabernacle and in the denial of the right of access to that glory except through the high priest once a year. God's glory is the majesty of his holy person. To be cut off from this fellowship is the great loss occasioned by sin.

24 One might think that Paul is committing himself to a doctrine of universal salvation—that all who have sinned are justified. That impression is certainly incorrect. The problem can be handled in either of two ways. Either the last statement in v.22 and all of v.23 should be regarded as semi-parenthetical (joining this verse with "all who believe"), or else Paul intends us to read it this way: "Since all have sinned, all must be justified—if they are to be saved—by God's free grace."

The concept of "justification" (GK 1466) is the leading doctrinal contribution of Romans. How to be just or righteous in God's sight is the age-old problem of humanity (Job 9:2; 10:14). To get at the meaning of the doctrine, some attention must be given to terminology. The Greek verb used here ("are justified"; GK 1467) is a forensic term (i.e., the language of the law court); in both OT and NT it means "to acquit" (Ex 23:7; Dt 25:1). But the idea of "acquittal" expresses only a part of the range of the word, for there is a positive side that is even more prominent in the NT—"to consider, or declare to be, righteous." God not only acquits believers, but he declares them to be righteous in his sight.

In the background is the important consideration, strongly emphasized by Paul, that the believer is "in Christ," a truth that he unfolds in greater detail later in his discussion (see 8:1; cf. 1Co 1:30; 2Co 5:21). His doctrine of justification and its link with being in Christ is perhaps best stated in Php 3:8–9: "that I may gain Christ and be found in him, not having a righteousness of my own that comes from the law, but that which is through faith in Christ." To be justified, in other words, includes the truth that God sees sinners in terms of their relation to his perfect Son.

Though justification has much in common with forgiveness, the two terms ought not to be regarded as interchangeable, for even though forgiveness of sins can be stated in comprehensive fashion (Eph 1:7; 4:32), one's continuing need for forgiveness (cf. Jn 1:8–9) sets it somewhat apart from justification, which is a once-for-all declaration of God on behalf of the believing sinner.

Sinners are justified "freely" (GK 1562), i.e., as a gift. The same word is used in Jn 15:25, where it bears a somewhat different but not unrelated meaning—"without reason." God finds no reason, no basis, in sinners for declaring them righteous. He must find the cause in himself. This truth goes naturally with the observation that justification is offered by God's grace. If "freely" is the manner in which justification operates and if grace is its basis, "the redemption that came by Christ Jesus" is the means a gracious God employed to achieve this boon for humankind. The benefit that redemption brings in this life, according to Eph 1:7, is forgiveness of sins, and this is applicable in our passage. Another aspect, belonging to the future, is the redemption of the body, which will consummate our salvation (8:23; Eph 4:30).

25 "God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement." The emphasis on faith in this verse suggests that the force of "presented" is in the proclamation of the Gospel that makes Christ's saving work central—a proclamation emphasizing that Christ, under God, has become "a sacrifice of atonement." This phrase renders the Greek hilasterion (GK 2663). In LXX the first occurrence of this word is in Ex 25:17, where it refers to the lid on the ark of the covenant ("atonement cover"; KJV "mercy seat"). The only other occurrence of this word in the NT (Heb 9:5) also alludes to this atonement cover. Does Ro 3:25 have the same frame of reference? Perhaps not, for Hebrews is filled with references to the sanctuary and its ritual, whereas Romans is not. But the contrast should not be overdrawn (cf. Ro 12:1). And although the ark of the covenant was withheld from public view and access, Heb 9 emphasizes that the death of Christ opened up what had formerly been concealed and was inaccessible to the people. The word "presented" here in Romans is a signpost suggesting a similar concept here. God's atonement has been set up before the eyes of the entire world. Christ has become the meeting place of God and humankind where the mercy of God is available because of the sacrifice of the Son.

The idea of atonement also relates to the context of Romans up to this point. The first main section of the book (1:18–3:20) is permeated with the concept of the divine wrath (cf. 1:18; 2:5, 8; 3:5), along with an emphasis on judgment. It would be strange for Paul to state the remedy for human sin and unrighteousness without indicating that this wrath of God has been satisfactorily met by his own provision. There is no other term in 3:21–26 that can convey this idea besides hilasterion.

The phrase "through faith in his blood" (v.25) poses a problem. This translation suggests that the believer's faith is to be placed in the blood of Christ, and the sequence of terms favors this. However, Paul nowhere else calls for faith in a thing rather than in a person. Thus an alternative suggestion is to place a comma after "faith," separating the clauses and making both of them dependent on hilasterion.

The remainder of v.25 deals with the necessity of Christ's propitiation in terms of God's "justice" (GK 1466; the same word in the original as "righteousness"). God's character needs justification for him to pass over "sins committed beforehand"—i.e., in the ages prior to the cross. His "forbearance" (GK 496) must not be thought of as sentimentality or weakness but as an indication that meeting the demands of his righteous character would be accomplished in due season. This happened at the cross. The full penalty for sin was not exacted earlier, in line with God's forbearance.

26 Now the bearing of the cross on God's dealings with the human race "at the present time" is unfolded. It amounts to a declaration that God is at once just in himself and justifying in his activity on behalf of humankind.

B. The Availability of Justification Through Faith Alone (3:27–31)

27–30 The opening words here suggest that this paragraph is designed especially for Jews, for even though boasting is not confined to them, it has already been noticed as a distinct tendency in their case (2:17, 23). On what established principle is boasting excluded? God has ordained faith as the sole condition for receiving salvation; that is what provides no basis for boasting, for in the last analysis faith, like the salvation it embraces, is God's gift (Eph 2:8). While Paul could speak of the righteousness he sought through observing the law as his own righteousness (Php 3:9), he cannot so speak of the righteousness he has in Christ. Once again he insists that justification takes place by faith apart from observing the law. Does this statement contradict 2:13? No, for everything depends on the right motive. To glory over one's achievement ruins the whole enterprise: it becomes an affront to God, and its value is gone (see Gal 3:12).

Again Paul moves to catch the eye of his Jewish readers by appealing to their awareness that God is one (vv.29–30). Jews, surrounded by pagan idolatry, proudly repeated the monotheistic confession of Dt 6:4. Paul now turns it to good account. Logically, if God is one and if he alone is God, then we can expect him to employ only one method to bring humanity to himself. Faith is therefore the condition for receiving salvation on the part of Jew and Gentile alike (v.30). Neither has any advantage over the other. The Gentile must come "by that same faith" required of the Jew (cf. 1:16; Gal. 2:15–16).

31 The final verse of the chapter has elicited many interpretations, attesting its difficulty.

That correct view is the one that most closely accords with the foregoing material.

Paul has twice mentioned that observing the "law" (GK 3795; vv.27–28) does not enter at all into justification, which is by faith apart from works of the law. May we draw the conclusion, then, that the law is useless? By no means, the apostle would answer, for the operation of faith really upholds or establishes the law; i.e., the Gospel vindicates the law. The law has fulfilled a vital role by bringing an awareness of sin (v.20). Breaking the law made the redeeming work of Christ at the cross necessary (vv.24–25). Those who see that the cross was a divine necessity will never feel that they can make themselves approved by God by fulfilling the law's demands. If that were possible, Christ would have died in vain. Since the death of Christ was performed in accordance with God's righteousness (v.26), this means that the demands of the law have not been set aside in God's plan of salvation.

One other interpretation of v.31 should be noted briefly, that this verse provides a transition to ch. 4, where Abraham's justification is explained. On this view "law" simply means Scripture, or more specifically, the Pentateuch (cf. "the Law" in v.21). While such an interpretation is possible, the word "law" does not have an article with it as it does in v.21. Further, it is doubtful that the material of the following chapter can be said to uphold the law.

C. The Illustration of Justification From the Old Testament (4:1–25)

The fact that in the Gospel a righteousness from God is revealed (1:17) could suggest that justification is a new thing, peculiar to the Christian era. To discover that it was already present in the OT serves to engender confidence in the basic unity of the Bible. This chapter is devoted almost exclusively to Abraham and God's dealings with him. The NT writers turn to Abraham almost instinctively when discussing faith (Heb 11; Jas 2). If Paul can establish as true that the father of the nation of Israel was justified by faith rather than by works, he will have scored heavily, especially with his Jewish readers.

1. The case of Abraham (4:1–5)

1–5 Paul now asks what Abraham had "discovered" about getting into right relation to God. In calling Abraham "our forefather," he is not addressing Jewish believers only, because he makes the point in this chapter that Gentile believers also have a stake in Abraham (v.16). In his answer, Paul picks up the matter of boasting from 3:27, but denies that it is possible to boast of works "before God." Abraham was not guilty of pharisaic folly. To show that his close relation to God was not based on works, a simple appeal to Scripture (Ge 15:6) is sufficient: "Abraham believed God, and it was credited to him as righteousness" (v.3). That appeal was necessary because Judaism even before Paul's day placed great emphasis on Abraham's piety and grounded his justification in his obedience. But Paul selects a text that emphasizes Abraham's faith and mentions nothing about his obedience.

At the time referred to in the Ge 15:6 quotation, Abraham was in the promised land but had as yet no progeny. Reminding God of this fact, he protested that "a slave born in my house will be my heir" (Ge 15:3), i.e., that he would have to adopt Eliezer his servant to be his heir. As time went on and Sarah did not bear a son, Abraham saw no prospect other than this. But God directed him to look up into the heavens and count the stars, promising that his descendants would be as numerous. Abraham accepted this promise, relying on God to fulfill it. This was the basis on which God pronounced him righteous.

The nature of Abraham's faith described here was essentially the same as that of the NT believer despite the difference in time. That is, Abraham trusted in a promise that looked forward to Christ (Jn 8:56; Gal 3:16), even though at this time it may not have been clear to the patriarch. Christians, on the other hand, look back to what God has provided in Christ. When God saw Abraham's faith, he credited it to him "as righteousness," which means that faith itself is not righteousness.

Paul goes on to contrast faith with works (vv.4–5), noting that work yields wages that must be treated as an obligation for an employer, whereas faith means that the one who exercises it receives a righteous standing from God simply as a "gift" (lit., "grace"; GK 5921). So grace is pitted against obligation and faith against works (cf. 11:6).

How far grace goes beyond justice is seen in the statement that God "justifies the wicked" (or ungodly). Not only does God justify people apart from works but he does so contrary to what they deserve. OT law required a judge to condemn the wicked and to justify the righteous (Dt 25:1), but where God is both Judge and Savior, the wicked have an opportunity denied to them in human reckoning. The prophetic word anticipated this result through the work of the coming Servant of God (Isa 53:5–6, 11).

2. The case of David (4:6–8)

6–8 Though the case of David is not strictly parallel to that of Abraham and is treated only briefly, it is clear from the phrase "the same thing" that the overall theme remains the same. What strikes one as peculiar, however, is the apparent lack of harmony between the quote from Ps 32 and what Paul announces as its meaning. While Paul indicates that Ps 32:1–2 concerns the reckoning of righteousness apart from works, the passage itself contains neither of these terms. Instead, it speaks about offenses that have been forgiven and about sins that have been covered. But when we compare v.6 with vv.7–8, one Greek word stands out as common to both: the word translated "credit" in v.6 and "count" (GK 3357) in v.8. In fact, this word dominates the early part of the chapter, occurring in vv.3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11.

Paul's training as a Pharisee shows through here, since it is evident that he is utilizing a principle of rabbinic interpretation known as the principle of analogy. This means that in situations where the same word occurs in two passages of Scripture, the sense in one may be carried over to explain the meaning in the other. In the case of Abraham, righteousness was credited to him, apart from works, on the basis of faith. In the case of David, obviously no good work is involved; rather, sin has been committed. So the far-reaching nature of justification is seen to still greater advantage.

One may add that since David was actually already a justified man, known as the man after God's own heart, in his case we learn the truth that sin in the life of a believer does not cancel justification. God's gifts are irrevocable (11:29). At the same time, God showed his displeasure regarding David's sin, severely chastening him until the sin had been fully confessed, and even afterward, his sins produced havoc in his family (see 2Sa 12–21). Yet God did not withdraw his favor and support but guided him through these family crises. In contrast to Abraham, David lived under the regimen of the Mosaic law. Though the law is not mentioned, the text says that David "speaks of the blessedness of the man to whom God credits righteousness apart from works" (v.6). Paul may be suggesting here that after David sinned, he could not rectify his situation by means of works. He was completely dependent on God's mercy of forgiveness.

3. The promise to Abraham—apart from circumcision (4:9–12)

9–12 The issue discussed here is the importance of time: the time of God's declaration of righteousness on behalf of Abraham in relation to the time of his circumcision. By using the term "blessedness" (GK 3422) from the opening of Ps 32 Paul moves from David back to Abraham. Are the uncircumcised able to share in the blessedness mentioned by David? To the Jews, such blessedness was properly confined to the circumcised. Paul dissents, arguing skillfully that this benefit was enjoyed by Abraham, and Abraham received it when he was still uncircumcised! To all intents and purposes, he was like one of the Gentiles. This opens the door to the extension of the blessedness of justification to the Gentiles.

Paul is still using the above-mentioned method of analogy regarding "credited." As Ge 15:6 had been explained with the aid of Ps 32:1–2, now the apostle reverses direction and explains Ps 32 with the aid of Ge 15. Since Abraham was not circumcised until fourteen years after being pronounced righteous, circumcision was therefore really a sign of what he previously had. It was a testimony to his justifying "faith" (GK 4411) and was not something in which to take any pride (cf. 2:25–29). Circumcision was delayed to teach the future believing Gentiles that they too can claim Abraham as their father. It could even be said that Gentiles have first claim on the patriarch, who was just like them when justified. Jews stand rebuffed for their pride and exclusiveness (cf. Ac 15:11; Gal 2:16). The people referred to in v.12 are Jews who are not only circumcised but, more important, are believers who share the faith Abraham had before he was circumcised.

4. The promise to Abraham—apart from the law (4:13–17)

13–17 The thought moves on to consider that Abraham's justification was apart from any law or legal considerations. Paul speaks of a promise received by "Abraham and his offspring" that "he should be heir of the world." Nothing so precise can be detected in the text of Genesis. So what does Paul mean? The theme of the chapter has not changed; it is still that vast influence of this man of faith on succeeding generations and peoples. The word "world" (GK 3180), therefore, denotes the multitude of those in future generations who will follow Abraham in terms of his faith as his rightful heirs. He will be their father in the sense that he is the father of their faith, since by that means they will be justified (cf. Ge 12:3; 22:18).

But we must return to Paul's main thrust, that the promise is not conditioned "through law." The thought is not developed in quite the same way as in Gal 3:17–18 (see comments). Here Paul makes the point that if inheriting the promise comes to those "who live by law," then faith is emptied of value and the promise has effectively been put out of operation. As soon as a promise is hedged about with conditional elements, it loses its value. Particularly is this true if these conditions are the law, with its inflexible character. As Paul puts it, "The law brings wrath." In other words, if God's promise had been conditioned by keeping the law, the human inability to observe the law with complete fidelity would have occasioned disobedience and consequently the operation of God's wrath, resulting in forfeiture of what was promised. In summary, the need to keep the law as a condition for receiving the promise would have two disastrous effects. It would pit the God of grace over against the God of judgment (an intolerable impasse), and it would make the realization of the promise impossible for us, since no one has been able fully to keep the law (see vv.14–15).

The promise, however, belongs to the realm of faith and grace (v.16). By mentioning faith first, Paul seems to put grace in a secondary position, but it cannot have been his intent to make grace depend on faith (cf. Eph 2:8). Rather, faith is put forward here to reaffirm v.13, after vv.14–15 have ruled out law—hence its prominence in the sentence. The only ground for certainty in relation to the promise is grace (as opposed to attempted legal obedience). This certainty (cf. the word "guaranteed" in v.16) is intended to apply to faith as well as to grace. In other words, the ultimate guarantee must be God and his faithfulness.

"Those who are of the law" are not excluded from Abraham's offspring. This means that the Israelites who happened to live during the Mosaic era were not excluded from the blessing of the Abrahamic covenant, provided they had faith. The above expression cannot refer to legal obedience, for then Paul would be contradicting himself. And the blessing of Abraham is also for those who, though not belonging to the Mosaic epoch, yet share the faith of the patriarch. Both Jews and Gentiles, then, are in the statement "He is father of us all." This is followed by an appeal to the prediction that Abraham would be a father of many nations (Ge 17:5), a statement that cannot refer exclusively to the twelve tribes of Israel, since they constituted but one nation. Only God could foresee the course of history that was to include the coming of Christ, his finished work, his command to evangelize all nations (Mt 28:19–20), and the response of faith to the Gospel around the world.

God is described by two terms. (1) He is one "who gives life to the dead." It is perhaps natural to think of such an expression in terms of resurrection (vv.24–25), but hardly with reference to receiving Isaac back, as it were, from the dead, when Abraham was ready to offer him to God (a subject pursued in Heb 11:19 but not mentioned here). The thought seems to move rather along the line of making it possible for Abraham and Sarah to have offspring despite their deadness as producers of offspring (cf. v. 19, where the word "dead" occurs twice). (2) This conclusion is favored when we read that God is the one who "calls things that are not as though they were." The word "calls" (GK 2813) in this case means to "summon" or "call into being," a word that may be used for God's creative activity. That is, Isaac was real in the thought and purpose of God before he was begotten.

5. Abraham's faith as the standard for every believer (4:18–25)

18–22 The final value of Abraham in respect to justification is that his faith becomes the standard for all believers. "Against all hope," this man believed. In view of his "deadened" condition (and that of Sarah likewise) because of advanced age, the situation seemed past hope. Nevertheless, he believed the promise of God that offspring would be given. "In hope" (GK 1828) takes account of the great change that came over his outlook because of the pledge God gave him. After making the original promise (Ge 15:5), God waited until it was physically impossible for this couple to have children. Then he repeated his pledge (Ge 17:5). Abraham's act of faith was essentially the same as on the previous occasion, but meanwhile circumstances had made the fulfillment of the promise impossible apart from supernatural intervention. He was shut up to God and was able to rest his faith in God alone.

He "faced the fact" of his physical condition and that of Sarah and "did not waver through unbelief." The refusal to waver answers to the refusal to weaken in faith. Abraham apparently suffered a momentary hesitancy (Ge 17:17), but it passed and was not held against him. That he really trusted God for the fulfillment of the promise is seen in his readiness to proceed with circumcision for himself and his household before Isaac was conceived (Ge 17:23–27). This act in itself could be construed as giving "glory to God," an expression of trust in the power of the Almighty to make good his promise. Moreover, it was an open testimony to others of his trust in God's faithfulness to his word.

As far as Abraham was concerned, he was not taking a chance. He was "fully persuaded" that God's power would match his promise. This man of God was called on to believe in a special divine intervention—not after it occurred, as the Jews were challenged to do concerning the resurrection of Jesus (Ac 2-5), but before. His faith is the more commendable because it was exercised in the face of apparent lack of necessity. Would not Ishmael do as the desired progeny? He had been born to Abraham through Hagar in the interval between the original promise (Ge 15) and its renewal (Ge 17). Abraham was willing to rest in the wisdom as well as in the will of God. Verse 22 probably refers to the original statement of Abraham's justification, emphasizing that his ability to meet the renewed promise of God by unwavering faith was strictly in line with the faith that brought justification at an earlier point (v.3).

23–25 Having dealt with Abraham's situation, the apostle turns finally to applying God's dealings with the patriarch to the readers of this letter. This procedure accords with his observation that "everything that was written in the past was written to teach us, so that through endurance and the encouragement of the Scriptures we might have hope" (15:4). There are differences between Abraham's case and the position of the readers. Yet the basic similarity in God's dealings with both is unmistakable. Both believe in God as the one who acts in their behalf; both receive justification. Of course, the mention of the resurrected Jesus (v.24) is an element that could not belong to the OT as history, but the intended parallel with Abraham's experience is fairly evident. The same God who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead quickened the "dead" body of Abraham so as to make parenthood possible.

Death and resurrection were the portion of the Savior (v.25). One can hardly fail to notice the carefully balanced character of this final statement, relating as it does the death of Jesus to our sins and his resurrection to our justification. Beyond question, the statement owes much to Isa 53, where the Servant is pictured as delivered up on account of the sins of the many (v.12). Moreover, the resurrection, though not stated in so many words, is implied in 53:10, 12. Perhaps this statement is one that Paul has taken over from Christian tradition (cf. 1Co 15:3–4). In any case, this passage shows the early tendency to phrase redemptive truth in brief, creedlike formulations.

The chief difficulty for interpretation lies in the preposition "for" that is common to both clauses. In itself our word "for" is ambiguous. It can mean "because of" or "with a view to." In this case, however, "delivered over to death for our sins" is best seen to mean "because our sins were committed" and that on account of them Jesus had to die if salvation were to be procured. Similarly, "raised to life for our justification" means that Jesus was raised because our justification was accomplished in his death (cf. "justified by his blood," 5:9). It may be helpful to recognize that justification, considered objectively and from the standpoint of God's provision, was indeed accomplished in the death of Christ (5:9) and therefore did not require the resurrection to complete it. Subjectively, however, the resurrection of Christ was essential for the exercise of faith, since his continuance under the power of death would create serious doubts about the efficacy of his sacrifice on the cross. To believe in a Christ who died for our sins is only half the Gospel (cf. 6:3–4). Furthermore, justification is not simply a forensic transaction, important as that aspect is, but involves also a living relationship with God through the living Jesus Christ (5:18).

D. The Benefits of Justification (5:1–11)

The discussion of justification now goes beyond the exposition of what it is in itself, for that has been sufficiently covered. We hear no more of the law or of fancied merit built up through obedience to it. Justification is now viewed in the light of the wealth of blessings it conveys to the child of God. This section demonstrates beyond any doubt that justification is a central teaching with Paul.

Some contend that Paul is already dealing with sanctification in this chapter, pointing to the strong emphasis on experience in vv.2–5. The elements mentioned there obviously have an important bearing on Christian life, but the overall emphasis still remains on justification (vv.9, 16), along with reconciliation as seen against the background of enmity occasioned by sin (vv.10–11). Perhaps even more decisive is Paul's use of prepositions, a small but significant indicator. The emphasis in ch. 5 is on what has been done for believers through Christ and his saving work, whereas in ch. 6 Paul deals with what has happened to believers together with Christ and what they enjoy in Christ. The word "sanctification" (or "holiness") does not appear until 6:19, 22.

1–2 "Therefore" suggests that the whole argument from 3:21–4:25 is the background for what is now set forth. Paul is assuming the reality of justification by faith for himself and his readers ("we have been justified").

The first of the blessings conveyed by justification is "peace" (GK 1645). We have encountered the word in the salutation (1:7) and in an eschatological setting (2:10). Here, however, the milieu is the estrangement between God and humankind because of sin. Peace relates back to Paul's emphasis on divine wrath in 1:18–3:20 (cf. "wrath" in v.9 and "enemies" in v.10). Peace in this setting means the believer's harmony with God rather than a subjective state within his or her consciousness.

That the objective meaning is to be adopted here is put beyond all doubt by Paul's assertion that the kind of peace he is referring to is peace "with God." Since this particular boon is placed first among the benefits of justification, it shows how central the wrath of God is to Paul's exposition of the plight of people that God has moved to remedy, a plight that could be dealt with only through the mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ (see also Eph 2:14; Col 1:20 for similar comments on peace).

The second benefit is "access" (v.2). Here also faith is mentioned as the essential instrument. The word rendered "access" (GK 4643) can mean either "approach" or "introduction"; the latter meaning seems the more appropriate here. We must think of the Father in his exaltation and glory as the one being approached, with the Lord Jesus introducing us as those who belong to him and so to the Father (see also Eph 2:17–18; 3:12ff.).

The "grace in which we now stand" sums up the privilege of the saints in this present time, enjoying every spiritual blessing in Christ, and the possession of this grace gives warrant for the hope that we will share the glory of God (v.2). In this prospect believers exult. Grace gives a foothold in the door that one day will swing wide to permit the enjoyment of the glorious presence of the Almighty, a privilege to be enjoyed forevermore. Worth noting is the close relationship between faith and hope. As with Abraham (4:18), so with the believer in this age, the two virtues have much in common (cf. Heb 11:1; 1Pe 1:21).

3–5 The word "rejoice," used to characterize the hope of the Christian for participating in the glory yet to be revealed (v.2), now carries over to another area, different both in nature and in time—that of "sufferings." Peace with God does not necessarily bring peace with other people. The actual conditions of life, especially for believers in the midst of a hostile society, are not easy or pleasant, but the knowledge of acceptance with God, of grace constantly supplied, and of the prospect of future glory enables believers to exult in the face of sufferings. The usual setting for the term "sufferings" is external suffering such as persecution, though it is used occasionally for distress resulting from external events affecting the human spirit.

At this point Paul does not give full treatment on the subject of suffering, since he refers to it here simply as one link in a chain of events that benefit the Christian. Elsewhere Paul stresses that our sufferings are an extension of the sufferings experienced by Christ in the days of his flesh, rightly to be experienced now by those who make up his body (Php 3:10; Col 1:24). Believers rejoice when by their suffering they can show their love and loyalty to the Savior (Ac 5:41).

Suffering has value in that it produces "perseverance" (GK 5705) or "steadfast endurance." Believers do not take the pressure of tribulation passively by abjectly giving in to it; rather, they resist it, like Christ who "endured" the cross and thus triumphed over suffering. One of the distinctives of the Christian faith is that believers are taught to glory and rejoice in the midst of suffering rather than to sigh and submit to it as an inevitable evil.

Such perseverance develops "character" (GK 1509). Job sensed its worth, saying in the midst of his troubles, "When he has tried me, I shall come forth as gold" (Job 23:10 RSV). The word "character" indicates tested value. The newborn child of God is precious in his sight, but the tested and proven saint means even more to him because such a one is a living demonstration of the character-developing power of the Gospel. When we stand in the presence of God, all material possessions will have been left behind, but all that we have gained by way of spiritual advance will be retained.

This helps to explain Paul's statement that character produces "hope" (GK 1828), the climax of the items beginning with "sufferings." Just prior to that (vv.1–2) Paul had described hope from the standpoint of another series—faith, peace, access, grace, and then hope of the glory of God. In other words, just as our present access to God gives hope of sharing the divine glory, so with our sufferings. They help to produce character, and approved Christian character finds its ultimate resting place in the presence of God, not in a grave. By the tutelage of suffering the Lord is fitting us for his eternal fellowship.

Paul then makes it plain that this hope is not just a pious wish, for it does not put one to shame. It does not disappoint, because it is coupled with the love of God (v.5). Human love may bring disappointment and frustration, but not the love of God. Subjective desire is supported by an objective divine gift guaranteeing the realization of an eternal fellowship with God.

This passage concludes with a statement about the importance of the believer's possession of the Holy Spirit as a certification concerning the future aspects of his salvation, a theme developed more fully in ch. 8. But even in the limited treatment given the Spirit here we see something that specially characterizes the Spirit. By him God's love is "poured out" (GK 1772) in our hearts. This verb speaks of the inexhaustible abundance of the supply of God's love through the Spirit. All the blessings found in Christ are mediated to God's people by the Spirit. Looking back over the paragraph, we see that the thought has advanced from faith to hope and from hope to love (the same order as in 1Co 13:13).

6–8 Having dwelt on the powerful influence of the divine love ministered to the hearts of believers by the Spirit, Paul goes on to explore the depths of that love, finding it in the cross of Christ. The demonstration of God's love in Christ came "at just the right time" (cf. Gal 4:4). The law had operated for centuries and had served to expose the weakness and inability of people to measure up to the divine standard of righteousness (cf. Ro 3:20; 4:15). No further testing was needed. It was the right time for the Messiah to come into the world.

"Powerless" (GK 822) is the translation of a word that commonly means "weak" or "sickly," but here it has a somewhat specialized force of the inability for us to work out any righteousness for ourselves. A still more uncomplimentary description of those who needed the intervention of Christ's death on their behalf is "ungodly" (GK 815; cf. 4:5).

A third word descriptive of those for whom Christ died is "sinners" (GK 283). The verb "to sin" (GK 279) has been used in 3:23 to summarize the human predicament traced in the opening chapters. We need to see how

Paul prepares the way for the impact of this term by contrasting it with both "righteous" (GK 1465) and "good" (GK 19). He puts aside for the moment the technical theological force of the word "righteous" in the sense of "justified" and uses it as it is used in ordinary parlance. Likewise, he ignores the fact that in 3:12 he has quoted "There is no one who does good" from Ps 14:3, and then proceeds to use "good" as we do when recognizing kindness and benevolence in one another. In other words, Paul is illustrating a point from ordinary life. It is a rare thing, he says, to find a person ready to die for an upright person, but conceivably it would be easier to find one willing to die for a good person. Evidently the "good man" stands on a higher plane than the "righteous man."

Now Paul is ready to proceed to his main point. It was for "sinners" that Christ died—for people who were neither "righteous" nor "good." The stark contrast is between the tremendous worth of the life laid down and the unworthiness of those who stand to benefit from it. Behind the death of Christ for sinners is the love of God (v.8): God loved; Christ died. Paul does not attempt to deal with the Savior's reaction or motivation. He leaves much to Christian awareness of the intimate bond between Father and Son—the whole truth about God being in Christ (2Co 5:19) and Christ being motivated by love for the lost (Jn 15:12–13). What he puts in the foreground is the love of God for the unsaved, and this Paul underscores by designating it as God's "own love." It is distinctive, unexpected, unheard of (cf. Jn 3:16).

Four times in these three verses the expression "die for" occurs, and in each instance Paul uses the Greek preposition hyper ("on behalf of"; GK 5642). This word expresses the substitutionary character of the sacrifice of Christ plus the additional element of action on behalf of another in line with the loving empathy of God in Christ.

9–11 Whereas the preceding paragraph dealt with the depth of the love of God as seen in the cross, the present section moves on to declare the height of that love, namely, its refusal to stop short of effecting final and everlasting salvation in which the enmity created by sin has been completely overcome.

One again Paul assumes an achieved justification (cf. v.1), repeating the means whereby it was accomplished ("by his [Christ's] blood"). Then he turns to face the far-reaching effects of this justification on our future. We were reconciled when we were enemies. Surely, then, since God no longer looks on us as enemies subject to his wrath, he will maintain the status quo and not suffer us to lapse back into an unreconciled position and, furthermore, will carry us on to the full end of our salvation. The agency of Christ continues to be crucial, only now with this difference, that, whereas our justification was achieved by his death, our preservation is secured by his life. This is a clear reference to Christ's postresurrection life rather than to his life in the days of his flesh. Here Paul conjoins justification and salvation as he did when he stated the theme of this letter (1:16–17).

The pivotal word for the right understanding of vv.10–11 is "enemies" (GK 2398), the fourth term Paul has used for those in the unsaved state (see vv.6–8 for the others). Does Paul use "enemies" in an active sense, meaning those who experience enmity toward God (cf. 8:7), or in the passive sense, meaning those who are reckoned as enemies by God? Several reasons dictate that the latter is the intended force of the word. (1) That the word is capable of conveying this meaning is evident from 11:28, where the people of Israel are spoken of as enemies in the reckoning of God and yet loved by him. The enmity there is judicial. (2) The mention of "God's wrath" in v.9 points to the conclusion that the "enemies" are the objects of his wrath. (3) The whole tenor of the argument leads one to the same conclusion. Paul reasons from the greater to the lesser. If God loved us when he considered us his enemies, now that he has made provision for us at such infinite cost, he will certainly all the more see us through to the final goal of our salvation. (4) Paul not only states that we have been reconciled (v.10) but that we have received the reconciliation (v.11). He avoids saying that we have done anything to effect the reconciliation. God provided it through the death of his Son. The appropriate response is exultation (cf. vv.2–3).

E. The Universal Applicability of Justification (5:12–21)

This most difficult portion of the letter, packed with close reasoning and theological terminology, stands at the very heart of the development of Paul's thought. He has presented all people as sinners and Christ as the one who has died to redeem them. Now he delves into the question: How does it come about that every human being—with no exception but Jesus Christ—is in fact a sinner? In answer, he goes all the way back to the first man Adam to affirm that what he did has affected the whole of humankind, involving everyone in sin and death. But over against this record of disaster and loss he puts the countermeasures taken on behalf of the human race by another man, Jesus Christ, of whom all are potential beneficiaries.

12 The one man through whom sin entered the world is not immediately named (see v.14). The same procedure of talking about a man before he is named is followed with Christ (v.15). Except for two nontheological references (Lk 3:38; Jude 14), every mention of Adam in the NT comes from the pen of Paul. In 1Ti 2:14 he makes the point that Adam, unlike Eve, was not deceived, but sinned deliberately. In 1Co 15:17, 56, as here in Romans, Paul institutes a comparison between the first and the last Adam, but confines his treatment to the issue of death and resurrection, whereas here both sin and death are named immediately and are woven into the texture of the argument throughout. In that earlier letter Paul made the significant statement, "For as in Adam all die, so in Christ all will be made alive" (1Co 15:22), in line with Ro 5:12. In the only previous mention of death in Romans (1:32) exclusive of the death of Christ (5:10), Paul referred to the inevitable connection between sin and death. Here in v.12 he pictures sin and death as entering the world through one man, with the result that death permeated the whole of humankind. It was the opening in the dike that led to the inundation, the poison that entered at one point and penetrated every unit of a person's corporate life.

If Paul had stopped with the observation that death came to all human beings because all have sinned, we would be left with the impression that all sinned and deserved death because they followed the example of Adam. But subsequent statements in the passage make it abundantly clear that the connection between Adam's sin and death and what has befallen the human race is far closer than that. Paul can say that the many died because of "the trespass of the one man" (v.15). Clearly the gist of his teaching is that just as humankind has become involved in sin and death through Adam, it has the remedy of righteousness and life only in another man, in Jesus Christ.

What, then, is the precise relation of Adam in his fall to those who come after him? Paul does not comment on that issue in this verse, though he later states that all sinned in the first man (v.19). Why does he not say so here? Was it his sudden breaking off to follow another line of thought in vv.13–14 that prevented the full statement? Or was it his reluctance to gloss over human responsibility, which he had already established in terms of universal sin and guilt (3:23)? Experience demonstrates that despite the inheritance of a sinful nature from Adam, people are convicted of guilt for the sins resulting from it that they commit themselves. Conscience is a factor in human life, and the Holy Spirit does convict of sin (Jn 16:8). Perhaps, then, as some hold, while the emphasis on original sin is primary in the light of the passage as a whole, there is a hint that personal choice and sin are not entirely excluded (cf. "many trespasses" in v.16).

That we could have sinned in Adam may seem strange and unnatural to the Western mind. Nevertheless, it is congenial to biblical teaching on the solidarity of humankind. When Adam sinned, the human race sinned because it was in him. To put it boldy, Adam was the race. What he did, his descendants, who were still in him, did also. This principle is also utilized in Heb 7:9–10: "One might even say that Levi, who collects the tenth, paid the tenth through Abraham, because when Melchizedek met Abraham, Levi was still in the body of his ancestor."

If one is still troubled by the seeming injustice of being born with a sinful nature because of what the father of the human race did and of being held accountable for sins resulting from that disability, one should weigh carefully the significance of the reconciliation statement of Paul: "that God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ, not counting men's sins against them" (2Co 5:19). The sins committed, that owe their original impetus to the sin of the first man, are not reckoned against those who have committed them if they put their trust in Christ crucified and risen. God takes their sins and gives them his righteousness. Would we not agree that this is more than a fair exchange?

13–14 The dash at the end of v.12 (NIV) is intended to indicate that the comparison that Paul launched with his "just as" is not carried through. In view of what follows, the complete statement would have run something like this: "Just as sin entered the world through one man, and death through sin, and in this way death came to all men, because all sinned, so righteousness entered the world by one man, and life through righteousness" (cf. v.18, which sums up vv.15–17. Throughout the passage the thought is so tremendous that it proves intractable from the standpoint of expressing it in orderly sequence. The thought outruns the structural capacity of language.

Judging from the use of "for" at the beginning of v.13, these next two verses are intended to support and explicate v.12. From Adam to Moses the law was not yet given, so sin was not present in the sense of transgression. The human race did not have a charge from God similar to that which Adam had and violated. But the very fact that death was regnant during this period is proof that there was sin to account for death, seeing that death is the consequence of sin. The sin in view here was the sin of Adam, which involved all his descendants. Death in this case means physical death, which suggests that the same is true in v.12. This agrees with Paul's treatment of the subject of death in 1Co 15 (see especially v.22).

Adam is described as "a pattern of the one to come." "Pattern" translates the word typos (GK 5596), often rendered "type." It may seem strange that Adam should be designated as a type of Christ when the two are so dissimilar in themselves and in their effect on humankind. But there is justification for the parallel. The resemblance is that Adam and Christ each communicated to those whom he represented that which belonged to him ("sin" and "righteousness" respectively). In other words, what each did involved others. "The one to come" is to be taken from the perspective of Adam and his time; it has no reference to the second coming of Christ (cf. Mt 11:3).

15–17 In this section Christ's effect on the human race is seen as totally different from that of Adam—and vastly superior. Any hint of parallelism suggested by "pattern" is replaced by the element of contrast. True, there is one similarity: the work of Adam and that of Christ relate to "the many." It will readily be seen by comparing v.15 with v.12 that "the many" is the same as "all men" (compare "death came to all men" with "the many died"). This use of "the many" (cf. Isa 53:11–12; Mk 10:45) underscores the importance of Adam and Christ respectively. What one did, in each case, affected not one but many.

The contrast between Adam and Christ is particularly noted in the expression "how much more" (vv.15,17). The force of this seems to be bound up with the recurring use of "grace" (GK 5921) and "gift" (GK 5922), suggesting that the work of Christ not merely cancelled the effects of Adam's transgression so as to put human beings back into a state of innocence under a probation such as their progenitor faced, but in fact gives them far more than they lost in Adam, more indeed than Adam ever had. The gift, prompted by grace, includes righteousness (v.17) and life (v.18), which is later defined as eternal life (v.21). Paul further observes that in Adam's case, a single sin was involved, one that was sufficient to bring universal condemnation, but in the work of Christ a provision is found for the many acts of sin that have resulted in the lives of his descendants (v.16).

Whereas up to this point Paul's train of thought has been concerned with developing the concept of sin taken over from v.12, now it turns to its companion factor, death (v.17), also mentioned in v.12. The point of this "much more" appears to be that in Christ not only is the hold of death, established by Adam's sin, effectively broken, but because of Christ's redeeming work the believer is able to look forward to reigning in life through Christ. This, of course, implies participation in the resurrection (cf. ch. 6). Believers will have a share in the Lord's kingdom and glory.

18–19 At this point, Paul provides something of a conclusion to v.12 (see comment on vv.13–14), but in such a way as to take account of the intervening material. The word "consequently" shows his intent to summarize. Paul carefully balances the clauses. One trespass brought condemnation for all humanity and one act of righteousness brought justification for all. Adam's sin is labeled "trespass" (GK 4183), indicating that it was deliberate breaking of a command (cf. v.14). The reference is clearly to his violation of the divine restriction laid down in Ge 2:16–17, resulting in condemnation for the entire human race. His act involved others directly; it did not merely set a bad example. Over against Adam's act, Paul put another of an entirely different character—an "act [or better, 'work'] of righteousness [GK 1468]" The same Greek word occurs at the end of v.16, where it is rendered "justification." The whole scope of the ministry of our Lord is in view. He came "to fulfill all righteousness" (Mt 3:15). The word "justification" is set over against "condemnation" (GK 2890), but something is added, namely, the observation that justification is more than the antithesis of condemnation, more than the setting aside of an adverse verdict due to sin, and more than the imputation of divine righteousness. It is the passport to life, the sharing of the life of God (cf. v.21).

Another term for Adam's failure occurs in v.19, "disobedience" (GK 4157). This accents the voluntary character of his sin. Matching it is the "obedience" (GK 5633) of Christ, a concept that was highly meaningful to Paul (see Php 2:5–11). The interpretation of that passage in Philippians should be along the lines of a latent comparison between Adam and Christ. Instead of grasping after equality with God, as Adam had done, the Lord Jesus humbled himself and became obedient even to the point of accepting death on a cross.

The result of Christ's obedience is that "the many will be made righteous." Does this refer to righteous character? Possibly so, if the future tense points to the glorious time when imputed righteousness becomes righteousness possessed in unblemished fullness. But "will be made righteous" may simply be the equivalent of "will become righteous" in the forensic sense (cf. 2Co 5:21), in which case the future tense embraces all who in this age are granted justification (most of whom are future to Paul's time).

Does the sweeping language used here suggest that all humankind will be brought within the circle of justification, so that no one will be lost? Some have thought so. But if the doctrine of universalism were being taught here, Paul would be contradicting himself, for he has already pictured people as perishing because of sin (2:12; cf. 1Co 1:18). Furthermore, his entire presentation of salvation has emphasized the fact that justification is granted only on the basis of faith. We must conclude, therefore, that only insofar as "the many" are found in Christ can they qualify as belonging to the righteous.

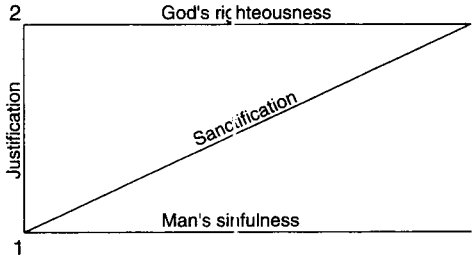
20–21 At the conclusion of the chapter, Adam as a figure fades from view. Yet his influence is still present in the mention of sin and death. Paul now introduces another factor—the Mosaic law—to show its bearing on the great issues of sin and righteousness. There is scarcely a subject treated by Paul in Romans that does not call for some consideration of the law. The closest affinity to the thought in v.20 is found in 3:20, "Through the law we become conscious of sin" (see also ch. 7).

The apostle is not maintaining that the purpose of God's giving of the law is exclusively "that the trespass might increase," because he allows that the law is a revelation of the will of God and therefore has a positive benefit (7:12). The law also serves to restrain evil in the world (implied in 6:15; stated in 1Ti 1:9–11). Paul says the law "was added," suggesting that it was something temporary, designed to disclose the transgression aspect of sin and so prepare the way for the coming of Christ (see Gal 3:19). In the Sermon on the Mount, it appears that Jesus sought to apply the law in precisely this way, to awaken a sense of sin in those who fancied they were keeping the law tolerably well but had underestimated its searching demands and the sinfulness of their own hearts (Mt 5:17–48).

Lest someone raise a charge against the Almighty that to make possible an increase in sin is not to his credit, Paul insists that only where sin is seen in its maximum expression can divine grace truly be appreciated. "Grace increased all the more." The apostle waxes almost ecstatic as he revels in the superlative excellence of the divine overruling that makes sin serve a gracious purpose.

With great effect Paul brings the leading concepts of the passage together in the final statement (v.21). "Sin reigned in death" picks up vv.12, 14; "grace" looks back to vv.15, 17; "reign" reflects vv.14, 17; "righteousness" harks back to v.17 as well as to 1:17; "eternal

Great Doctrines in Paul



The apostle Paul has often been called the first great Christian theologian. His writings have shaped Christian doctrine from the time that he wrote his letters. The following chart lists many of the great doctrines of the church and the main passages in Paul that explore these doctrines. There are, of course, many other passages in Paul, not listed here, that touch on these doctrines, and there are many other passages of the Bible, not written by Paul, that also explore these teachings. The ones listed here are the main ones of Paul.

The Inspiration of Scripture	Gal 1:11–12; 2Ti 3:14–17
Divine Election	Ro 8:29–30; 9:6–33; Eph 1:3–14
God's Plan for Israel	Ro 11:1–32
The Universality of Human Sinfulness	Ro 1:18–3:20; 3:23; Tit 3:3
Victory Over Sin and Satan	Ro 6:11–7:6; 8:31–39; Eph 6:10–18
The Twofold Nature of Jesus Christ	Ro 1:3–4; Php 2:5–11
The Sacrificial Atonement of Christ	Ro 3:25–26; 5:6–10; Gal 3:10–14
Reconciliation Between Human Beings and God	Ro 5:10–11; 2Co 5:16–21; Col 1:19–23
Christ as the Second Adam	Ro 5:12–21; 1Co 15:20–22, 42–49
The Supreme Lordship of Jesus Christ	Ro 10:9–13; Eph 1:15–23; Php 2:9–11; Col 1:15–20; 2:6–15
The Old and New Covenant	2Co 3:1–18; Gal 3:15–4:7; 4:21–31
Justification by God's Grace through Faith	Ro 1:16–17; 3:21–4:25; Gal 2:16–3:14; Eph 2:1–10; Php 3:7–11; 1Ti 1:12–16; Tit 3:4–8
Life Through the Holy Spirit	Ro 8:1–17, 26–27; Gal 5:16–26
The Christian's Life of Love	Ro 12:9–21; 13:8–10; 1Co 13; Gal 5:13–15; Col 3:12–14
The Gifts of the Holy Spirit	Ro 12:3–8; 1Co 12:1–11, 27–31; 14:1–40; Eph 4:7–12
Marriage in Christ	1Co 7:1–40; Eph 5:22–33; Col 3:18–19
Christian Freedom	Ro 14:1–15:13; 1Co 8:1–13; 10:23–33; Gal 5:1–12; Col 3:16–23
Unity in the Church	1Co 1:10–17; Eph 2:11–21; 4:1–16
Baptism	Ro 6:1–10; 1Co 12:12–13; Col 2:11–12
Lord's Supper	1Co 10:14–22; 11:17–34
Death for Believers	2Co 5:1–8; Php 1:19–26
The Resurrection	1Co 15; Php 3:20–21
The End of History	1Co 15:23–29; 2Co 5:10; 1Th 5:1–11; 2Th 1:5–2:12; 2Ti 3:1–9
The Second Coming of Jesus Christ	1Co 15:51–57; Php 3:20–21; 1Th 4:13–18; Tit 2:11–14

life" completes and crowns the allusion to "life" in vv.17–18. Sin and death are virtually personified throughout. Sin poses as absolute monarch, reigning through death as its vicar; but in the end it is exposed as a pretender and is obliged to yield the palm to another whose reign is wholly absolute and totally different, being as much a blessing as the other is a curse.

V. Sanctification: The Impartation of Righteousness (6:1–8:39)

Up to this point the letter has answered such questions as these: Why do we need salvation? What has God done to effect it? How can we appropriate it? The answers have come in terms of sin, condemnation, the gift of Christ, faith, and justification. Is there need for anything more? Yes, there is. For the saved cannot safely be turned over to their own wisdom and their own devices, seeing that they have not yet reached the perfect state. They must still contend with sin and must depend on divine resources. God's plan of salvation does not stop with justification but continues on in sanctification. A diagram may help to clarify the relationship between the two.

Point 1 marks conversion, or, if we think objectively rather than subjectively, regeneration. It is here that justification takes place. The line from 1 to 2 is not to be thought of as a process but as a change of position effected by God—his declaration of righteousness on behalf of condemned sinners. Justification by faith means that people are lifted once for all to the level of God's righteousness. Their standing before him is complete and perfect, because Christ has been made their righteousness (1Co 1:30; cf. 2Co 5:21). At no time in this life or in the life to come will their status in terms of righteousness be any greater (the line from 2 to 3).

But God is concerned not only with believers' status but also with their state, their actual condition. No sooner has he justified a person than he begins a process of growth that we know as sanctification. It is represented by the diagonal line between 1 and 3. This is a process, to be sure, but it should be observed that the term "sanctification" as used in Scripture is also a position, a setting apart by God that is basic to any progress in the Christian life. Consider, for example, Paul's description of the Corinthian believers as (already) "sanctified" (1Co 1:2), in spite of a seeming contradiction to the unholy state of many of them as evidenced by their many shortcomings.We can understand this by Paul's observation about what happened at their conversion: "You were washed, you were sanctified, you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God" (1Co 6:11). Mention of their sanctification is given priority over their justification, which reverses the expected order. This is the initial or positional sanctification, which is basic to any improvement in their manner of life (cf. 1Pe 1:2). This aspect of sanctification cannot be distinguished from justification in respect to time. But sanctification as a process is naturally dependent on and subsequent to justification.

Point 3 is the juncture at which the process of sanctification reaches its consummation, when the saints experience complete sanctification because their sinful natures have been left behind and their lives are fully conformed to the divine standard as seen in God's Son (8:29). This occurs at death (Heb 12:23) or at the return of Christ in the case of the saints who are alive at that time (1Jn 3:2). Then for the first time the believers' actual state in terms of righteousness will conform to the status conferred on them at their justification (Gal 5:5).

A. The Believer's Union With Christ in Death and in Resurrection Life (6:1–14)

Paul now refers to the various epochal experiences that Christ passed through—namely, death, burial, and resurrection. Viewed from the standpoint of his substitutionary sacrifice for sin, these events do not involve our participation, though our salvation depends on them. Our Lord was alone in enduring the cross, in being buried, and in being raised from the dead. But his redeeming work is not only substitutionary; it is also representative. "One died for all, and therefore all died" (2Co 5:14). So Christians are viewed as being identified with Christ in his death, burial, and resurrection. And as truly as he, having borne our sin, is now removed from any claim of sin against him—because he died to sin and rose again—we also by virtue of being joined to him are delivered from any claim of sin to control us. This line of thought is what Paul proceeds to develop in the passage before us. It is evident that God has a plan for dealing with the power of sin as well as with its guilt. The way has been prepared for this emphasis by the presentation of the solidarity between Christ and the redeemed in 5:12–21.

1. The statement of the fact (6:1–10)

1–2 Paul begins his discussion by raising an objection and answering it—an objection that grows out of his presentation of justification, especially the teaching that where sin increased, grace increased all the more (5:20). The query is to this effect: "Are we not able, or even obliged, by the logic of justification, to continue on in sin, now that we are Christians, in order to give divine grace as much opportunity as possible to display itself? The more we sin, the more God's grace will be required to meet the situation; this will in turn contribute the more to his glory."

The apostle shows his horror at such a suggestion: "By no means!" (see also his repudiation of a similar suggestion in 3:8). It is likely that as Paul taught justification by faith, objections of this sort were raised from time to time by those who feared that his teaching would open the door to libertinism by encouraging indifference to the ethical demands of the law. If so, his answer is forged in years of reflection under divine guidance.

His answer is crisp: "We died to sin; how can we live in it any longer?" He does not say that sin is dead to the Christian; ch. 7 is a sufficient refutation of any such notion. Rather, we died to sin. Nor does Paul here explain when or how we died to sin; instead, his emphasis lies on the logical impossibility of a Christian continuing in a life dominated by sin. Death to sin is not something hoped for by the believer; it is something that has already taken place. It is a simple fact basic to the living of the Christian life.

3–4 The explanation of how this death to sin occurred follows immediately (vv.3–4): by being "baptized into Christ Jesus." What is being described is a spiritual reality of the deepest import—not a mere ceremony, not even a sacrament. The metaphor of baptism is clearly used by Paul in a relational sense elsewhere, as in the Israelites being baptized into Moses when they crossed the Red Sea (1Co 10:2). They became united to him as never before, recognizing his leadership and their dependence on him. Union with Christ means union with him in his death. It is significant that although Jesus emphasized discipleship throughout his ministry, he never spoke of union with himself until he was on the verge of going to the cross (Jn 14–16). He had earlier spoken of his death under the figure of baptism (Lk 12:50).

Baptism illustrates this vital union with Christ in his death, though baptism does not accomplish it. Apparently, Paul pictures burial with Christ, however momentarily, in the submergence of the body under the baptismal waters. The importance of burial is that it attests the reality of death (1Co 15:3–4). It expresses with finality the end of the old life governed by relationship with Adam. It also expresses the impossibility of a new life apart from divine action. The God who raised Jesus Christ from the dead has likewise imparted life to those who are his. The expression to "live a new life" is literally "to walk in newness of life," the walk being the evidence of the new type of life granted to the child of God. This is a distinctive type of life realized only by one united to Christ (cf. 2Co 5:17), so that Christ is its dynamic. In this connection the question arises, Why should the resurrection of Christ be described as accomplished "through the glory of the Father?" It is because "glory" here has the meaning of power, as in the resurrection of Lazarus (Jn 11:40).

The latter half of v.4 has a noticeably balanced structure ("just as Christ . . . we too"), recalling the pattern in 5:12, 18, 21. This suggests that the principle of solidarity advanced in 5:12–21 is still thought of as operating here in the significance of baptism. There is no explicit statement that in baptism we were raised with Christ as well as made to share in his death. Resurrection is seen rather as an effect that logically follows from the identification with Christ in his death (but see Col

2:12, where resurrection is verbally connected with baptism).

5–7 In v.5 we encounter a problem concerning resurrection. Is Paul referring to the future bodily resurrection of the saints? Many expositors think so, pointing both to the future tense of the verb ("we will . . . be") and to the fact that Christ's resurrection was indeed a bodily one. But a future tense can indicate what must logically or inevitably occur (cf. Gal 6:5, which has a future tense). Furthermore, Paul does not say that just as Christ was raised, so we too shall be raised. Instead, he connects the resurrection of Christ with the possibility of a new life in the present for those who are his. In addition, the "for" at the beginning of v.6 shows that what follows is intended to relate closely to the mention of resurrection at the end of v.5. Yet one looks in vain for anything in v.6 that relates to future bodily resurrection. Instead, Paul returns to the matter of participation in Christ's death and its bearing on freedom from the bondage of sin. Consequently, the resurrection in v.5 has to do with spiritual resurrection—raised with Christ (see also Eph 2:6; Col 2:12, 3:1).

The certainty of our present participation in this new resurrection life is grounded on the truth that "we have been united with him in his death." Clearly this union is not something gradually arrived at through a process of sanctification. Rather it is something established by God that becomes the very basis of our sanctification in Christ.

The problem of sin continues to dominate the thought of this section, and Paul returns to this theme by insisting that "our old self was crucified with him" (v.6). While the relation to v.5 is close, the language now becomes sharper and more realistic—e.g., "united with him in his death" becomes "crucified with him" (cf. Gal 2:20). Our spiritual history began at the cross. We were there in the sense that we were joined to him who actually suffered on it. The time element should not disturb us, because if we sinned in Adam, it is equally possible to die to sin with Christ.

But what was it that was crucified? "Our old self" is literally "our old man" (GK 4094 & 476; see also Eph 4:22; Col 3:9). In Eph 4:22, however, the putting off of the old self is a matter of exhortation. In some sense, then, the old man has been crucified; in another sense, it may still claim attention. Since "man" has been used of Adam (5:12, 17, 19), it is possible that what has been crucified with Christ is our place in Adam, our position in the old creation, which is under the sway of sin and death. For Christians, the old self is gone; they belong to the new creation order (2Co 5:17).

The purpose behind the crucifixion of "our old self" is that sin should be rendered powerless so far as we are concerned. But the expression "body of sin" is a phrase that needs clarification. The term "body" (GK 5393) glances at the fact of Christ's crucifixion, which he endured in the body. Our body can become the instrument of sin, thus negating the truth of crucifixion with Christ. So "body of sin" seems to mean human body insofar as it may become the vehicle of sin. Its previous slavery to the dictates of sin is broken. This annulling of the power of sin is based on a recognized principle—that death settles all claims. Our union with Christ in his death, designed to deal with sin once for all, means that we are free from the hold of sin. Its mastery has been broken (v.7).

8–10 Union with Christ continues to be the theme here, but attention shifts from its effect on the problem of sin to a consideration of its bearing on the problem of death. Consequently, resurrection comes into focus. Though there is considerable similarity with the close of v.4, the note of futurity ("we will also live with him") makes it apparent that future bodily resurrection is now in view. For a brief time, death as the executor of sin held the Savior, but not for long. Since he was not guilty of personal sin, death had no right to hold him indefinitely (Ac 2:24). Likewise, it had no right to call him again to the experience of death. Once having been raised from the dead, our Lord is alive for ever and ever (Rev 1:18).

It was important for Paul to emphasize this truth, for believers must have full confidence that the captain of their salvation will never again come under the power of sin and death. If they lack that assurance, the teaching about union with Christ will be of little help to them. "He died to sin once for all." In his risen life our Lord is set free to resume his face-to-face fellowship with God (Jn 1:1) and his preoccupation with the consummation of God's eternal purpose. In this respect he presents a pattern for believers in their expectation of the future and also in their motivation for life in the present time (2Co 5:15).

2. The appeal based on the fact (6:11–14)

11–14 In this section Paul uses the key word "count" or "reckon" (GK 3357; the same term used so often in ch. 4 in connection with righteousness). Reckoning does not create the fact of union with Christ but makes it operative in one's life. The charge to count ourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus is in the present tense, indicating a necessity to keep up the process if we are to avoid reactivating the body of sin. Christians are dead and alive at the same time (Gal 2:20)—dead to sin and self but alive to God. They must give no more response to sin than the dead can give. On the other hand, all the potential that redeemed life affords should be channeled Godward.

Since Paul lays considerable stress on the importance of this process of reckoning, we should inquire about its value—especially in view of the objection that such a process smacks of attempting to convince oneself of something unrealistic in terms of actual experience. The justification for the use of this terminology is at least threefold. (1) This is a command freighted with apostolic authority. God is speaking through his servant, and what God commands must be efficacious. (2) The command is psychologically sound, for what we think tends to be carried out in our actions. (3) This process must not be undertaken in a mechanical fashion, as though there were some sort of magic in going through the motions. We must really desire to have freedom from sin and to live responsibly to God. To that end we must avail ourselves of the means of grace, particularly the diligent use of Scripture and faithfulness in prayer.

This element of willing cooperation receives emphasis in v.12. The implication is that sin has been reigning. Believers must do their part by refusing obedience any longer to sin's enticements. If the body is kept dead, it will have no ear for the subtle suggestions of evil. Paul's description here of the body as "mortal" reminds us that despite the glorious asset of being united to Christ, we are still living in a frail instrument subject to the ultimate call of death.

Turning from the body as a whole to its separate members, Paul admonishes his readers not to hand these over to sin (the old master). But this is only half of our obligation. On the positive side, we must offer our total selves to God with our separate bodily capacities "as instruments of righteousness."

Paul concludes this portion of text with an encouragement and an incentive. He promises the Roman Christians that if they will do as he has enjoined, sin will not be their master; then he adds, "because you are not under law, but under grace" (v.14). Why should law be injected here? Surely because under law sin increases (5:20; cf. 1Co 15:56). The law lords it over its subjects, condemning and bringing them into virtual slavery. But under grace there is liberty to live in accord with a higher principle—the resurrection life of the Lord himself.

It is worthy of attention that Christians are said to be under grace. Usually grace indicates a principle of divine operation, a moving out in kindness and love to lift the sinful person to God. Here it appears as a disciplinary power, in line with the apostle's effort to show that grace is not license (6:1ff.; see also Paul's reminder that God's grace has appeared for the salvation of all, training us to live sober, upright, and godly lives; Tit 2:11–12).

B. Union With Christ Viewed As Enslavement to Righteousness (6:15–23)

15–17 Paul has just affirmed, "You are not under the law." Now he shows that this does not mean that believers are free from the demands of living according to righteousness. It would be strange if those who are under grace should evidence a manner of life inferior to the standard held by those who are under law. As a matter of fact, believers must face the fact that their salvation actually means a change of bondage. As they once served sin, they are now committed to lives of practical righteousness.

At first glance, the opening question seems to repeat v.1. The difference, however, lies in the tense of the verb. In v.1 the question was "Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase?" Now the question is "Shall we sin [in any given case, or sin at all] because we are not under law but under grace?" Law is supposed to be a restraining influence. But if we move out from under that umbrella, will we not be exposing ourselves to the danger of committing sin even more than in our previous situation?

In answer, Paul appeals first of all to a fact familiar to all—whatever one submits to becomes his or her master (cf. Jn 8:34). To commit sin, then, puts one into bondage to sin, and the sequel is death (cf. 5:12; 8:13). The other option is a life of obedience resulting in righteousness (cf. 5:19). Paul is happy to acknowledge that his readers have renounced the service of sin and are now wholeheartedly obeying Christian teaching (v. 17). Let us take special note of the way he puts the matter: "you wholeheartedly obeyed the form of teaching to which you were committed." By virtue of becoming Christians, believers had obligated themselves to obey what we might call the law of Christ (Gal 6:2). Even though Paul had not founded the Roman church, he was confident that the Christians there had been taught the standard teaching of the apostles (see Ac 2:42). Just as the Gospel itself had certain ingredients (such as Christ's death, burial, and resurrection, as in vv.1–5; 1Co 15:3–4), so the teaching about the lifestyle of believers, derived from what Jesus and the apostles taught, was standard throughout the church. This is the point being made in the use of the word "form" (GK 5596).

18 The term that most adequately describes the standard Christian instruction about lifestyle is "righteousness" (GK 1466). Here Paul arrives at the full answer to the question raised in v.15. There is no middle ground to a believer's service to righteousness, no place where Christians are free to set their own standards and go their own way. So it is idle to object that on becoming a believer one is simply exchanging one form of slavery for another. There is no alternative. Let no one say, however, that the two bondages are on the same plane. The one is rigorous and relentless, leading to death; the other is joyous and satisfying, leading to life and peace.

19–20 Reviewing his own remarks, Paul grants that he has spoken "in human terms" (v.19). This is a kind of apology (see comments on 3:5) for having described the Christian life in terms of slavery to righteousness. Paul's reason for this reference to slavery is "because you are weak in your natural selves." The nature of the weakness, while not expressed, likely relates to one's moral fiber. After all, Christians have just come from lives characterized by slavery to "impurity" and "ever-increasing wickedness." The readiness and zeal with which they once served sin now become the basis for a challenge. Surely the new master is worthy of at least equal loyalty and devotion! That new master is not described in personal terms but in personified terms of righteousness and holiness—a lifestyle demanding one's complete attention.

21–22 The pre-Christian state is undesirable, for it yields no benefit. In fact, it leaves behind memories that produce shame (v.21). On the other hand, the Christian state of freedom from servitude to sin and the corresponding commitment to serve God produce a harvest of holiness, at the end of which is eternal life (cf. Gal 6:8). Paul is not denying the present possession of eternal life (see v.23), but is simply presenting eternal life as the inevitable conclusion of the process of sanctification (see chart at the beginning of the chapter; also Mk 10:29–30).

23 In a fitting conclusion, Paul puts God (and his mastery) over against sin, gift over against wages, eternal life over against death—crowning it all with the acknowledgment that the mediation of Christ Jesus our Lord accounts for the shift from one camp to the other.

C. Union With Christ Viewed As Deliverance From Law (7:1–6)

Sin and death in their correlation have occupied Paul to a great degree from 5:12 on, with an occasional reference to a third element, the law. In ch. 6 he sought to explain that the believer's crucifixion with Christ has brought freedom from enslavement to sin's dominion. Since the law has served to promote sin (5:20), it is expedient now to show that Christ's death, which involved the death of those who are his, effected release from the law also. At the same time Paul is careful to indicate that this emancipation from the law is in order to permit a new attachment, namely, to the risen Lord and his Spirit, so that from this union might flow a fruitfulness of life unattainable under the law. Deliverance from the law does not open the door to irresponsible and sinful conduct.

1 The readers are described as those who know "the law." The fact that "law" (GK 3795) here does not have a definite article in the Greek suggests that Paul is primarily interested not in the specifics of the Mosaic law but in its essential character as law, as that which has binding force. In this opening statement, the principle is laid down that law imposes a lifelong obligation on a person.

Already in this initial statement we have a clue for determining the thought that Paul is about to develop. The law has authority over a person only during his or her lifetime. Since the believer has died with Christ (ch. 6), one can anticipate the conclusion—that whatever authority the law continues to exercise over others, for believers that power has been abrogated. The law remains, of course, an entity that expresses the will of God. The life under grace does not belittle the ethical demands of the law.

2–3 To illustrate the binding character of the law, Paul uses the case of a woman who is married to a husband and remains bound by law in that relationship as long as her husband is living. During this time she is not free to seek another attachment; that may be done only in the event that the husband dies. Particularly in Jewish life this was the actual legal status of the wife, for she could not divorce her husband; divorce was a privilege granted only to the man. If the husband died, she was then released from "the law of marriage."

4–6 Paul now applies this illustration. But the reader is apt to be somewhat disturbed about a measure of inconsistency in the way it is applied. In the case under consideration three essential statements are made: a woman is married to a man; the man dies; then the woman is free to be married to another. In the application three statements likewise can be readily inferred: the readers have had a binding relation to the law; they have died to the law; and they are now free to be joined to another, even the risen Lord. The parallel breaks down at the second item, for the law, which is the assumed master or husband in the application, is not represented as dying; rather, the readers are said to have died to the law. Paul avoids saying that the law died (something that is never affirmed in Scripture). The only thing he is concerned with is continuing the emphasis already made in ch. 6, that death ends obligation. Paul was no doubt aware of the incongruity between illustration and application, but counted on the understanding of his readers to see that he was seeking merely to underscore the truth that death with Christ brought to an end the sway of the law over those who are in him and ushered in a new, superior relationship.

Death to the law is said to have occurred "through the body of Christ" (v.4). This is a reference to the personal body of the Savior in his crucifixion. Through their being crucified with Christ (6:6), believers became dead both to the law and to sin.

Death to the law occurred so that believers "might belong to another." To belong to Christ involves participation not only in his death but also in his resurrection. Severance from obligation to serve the law is only part of the truth. We are married, as it were, to the risen Lord, with a view to bearing fruit to God. Perhaps an analogy is intended here—as a marriage produces progeny, so the believer's union with Christ results in spiritual fruit (cf. Jn 15:1ff.). In Gal 5:22–23, bearing fruit is attributed to the Spirit, in contrast to the output of the flesh and of the law. Since Paul speaks of the Spirit in Ro 7:6, the parallel with Gal 5 is close.

In the pre-Christian state there was fruit of a sort, but it was corrupt and perishable, emanating from the sinful nature and produced by the sinful passions as these were aroused by the law (v.5). The phrase "controlled by our sinful nature" is an attempt to render the Greek phrase "in the flesh." Paul has used "flesh" (GK 4922) in several senses thus far: (1) the "human nature" of Jesus Christ (1:3); (2) the "physical" body (2:28), (3) humankind—"no one" in 3:20 is literally, "not all flesh"; and (4) moral, or possibly intellectual, weakness ("natural selves" in 6:19). Now he adds a fifth: the so-called "ethical" meaning of flesh, which is his most common use of the word and denotes the old sinful nature. It is this sense of the word that pervades chs. 7–8, together with a final use in 13:14. In noting here in v.5 that the "sinful passions" are aroused by the law, Paul is anticipating his fuller discussion in vv.7–13 about the manner in which the law promotes sin.

Release from the law has as its objective service to God "in the new way of the Spirit," in contrast to "the old way of the written code" (cf. 2Co 3:6). The written code, which refers specifically to the OT law, has no power to give life and to produce a service acceptable to God. Only a person can beget human life, and only a divine person can impart spiritual life, which is then fostered and nurtured by the Spirit. The word "new" (GK 2786) has in it not so much the idea of newness in time as freshness and superiority. This is the only mention of "the Spirit" in the chapter. It anticipates ch. 8 with its unfolding of the wealth of blessing to be experienced in this relationship.

D. The Relationship Between Law and Sin (7:7–25)

Paul must now clarify his thoughts, especially his statements that believers have died to sin (6:2) and to the law (7:4). Are these so similar as to be in some sense equated? The explanation has been touched on briefly in 7:5, but Paul now expands it. In essence, the solution of the problem is this: the law cannot be identified as sinful simply because it provides awareness of sin (cf. 3:20). Can one say of an X-ray machine that revealed a disease that the machine is diseased? That would be utter nonsense.

As Paul elsewhere appealed to the experience of his converts to support Christian truth (Gal 3:1–5; 4:1–7), so he now appeals to his own experience (Ro 7:7–13). This personal reference then broadens into a more general picture of the soul-struggle of those who try to serve God by obeying the law but find themselves checkmated by the operation of sin within themselves (vv.14–25).

Paul sharpens his observation that consciousness of sin is produced by the law through a specific example. He seizes on the tenth commandment. "Do not covet." His use of this commandment helps define the meaning of law in vv.1–6, the law from which believers have been released. What he has in mind includes the moral law. While students of Scripture find it convenient at times to distinguish between the ceremonial law and the moral law, Paul regards the law as a unit. To those who may be disturbed by the thought that the divine standard for one's life is abandoned by maintaining release from the law, Paul will reply in due course that no such danger exists (8:4).

Writing flourished in the ancient world; even marriage contracts were written down (cf. 7:1–3). These ink wells were found at Qumran. Courtesy Israel Antiquities Authority.

7 "Sin" (GK 281) is an oft-repeated word in this paragraph. It does not refer here to an act of sin, but to the sin principle, to that mighty force that a human being cannot tame, but which lurks dormant or relatively inactive in a person's life, is then brought to the fore by prohibition, and proceeds to rise up and slay its victim. Sin, then, has essentially the same meaning here as in 5:12ff.

The subject in hand is the awareness of sin in a personal, existential sense—an awareness created by the law's demands. To come to grips with this the apostle selects an item from the Decalogue, the tenth commandment. Possibly he chose that one because he saw something basic here, for "to covet" means "to desire." If one gives rein to wrong desire, it can lead to lying, stealing, killing, and all the other things prohibited in the commandments. In analyzing sin, one must go behind the outward act to the inner person, where desire clutches at the imagination and then puts the spurs to the will.

8 In the background is the Genesis story of the temptation and the Fall. Eve was faced with a commandment—a prohibition. When desire was stirred through the subtle suggestion of the serpent, a certain rebelliousness came into play that is the heart of sin—a preference for one's own will over against the expressed will of God. The warning "Don't" to a small child may turn out to be a call for action that had not even been contemplated by the child. A sure way to lose blossoms from the garden is to post a sign that says, "Don't pick the flowers." Prohibition furnishes a springboard from which sin is all too ready to take off.

"For apart from law, sin is dead." It appears from a comparison of "dead" with "sprang to life" in v.9 that the word "dead" is intended to be taken in a relative sense, namely, quiescent, dormant, inactive. This statement appears to be an axiom, a broad and general principle.

9–11 Paul's statement that he was once alive apart from the law should be taken in a relative sense, for there was actually no time in his life before his conversion when he was unrelated to the law. He was the son of a Pharisee (Ac 23:6) and lived in strictest conformity to the regulations of his sect (Ac 26:5). What he means is that there was a time when he was living in a state of blissful indifference to the intensely searching demands that the law made on the inner self. He was careless and self-deceived as to his own righteousness (see Php 3:6). Before and at the time of his conversion, his struggle was intellectual rather than moral. He was convinced that Jesus could not be the Messiah, for God had permitted him to die as a criminal. His conversion, however, meant a complete reversal in this matter. He felt within himself the sentence of death ("I died"), becoming bogged down in hopelessness and despair in contrast to the blithe self-confidence he had before.

The commandment not to covet, like the others, "was intended to bring life." Its design and ideal were to promote observance that would lead to divine blessing and consequent human happiness (see Lev 18:5). The practical difficulty, of course, is that a sinful person fails to do the will of God as set forth in the commandments.

In v.11 sin is strongly personified, being represented as acting as a person would act. The language is reminiscent of the Fall, with sin taking the place of the tempter and provoking a deception that led to death (spiritual death occurred then; physical death would follow later). The word "deceive" (Gk 1987) occurs here in a strong form indicating utter deception (see 2Co 11:3; 1Ti 2:14). Sin within him led Paul to do the very thing the commandment forbade, thus bringing him under condemnation as a lawbreaker (cf. 2Co 3:6).

12 It is time for the apostle to give a decisive answer to the question he raised in v.7: "Is the law sin?" So far from being identifiable with sin, the law is holy, as are the individual commandments (such as the command not to covet). The law is "holy" because it comes from a holy God and searches out sin. It is "righteous" because it lays just requirements on people and because it forbids and condemns sin. It is "good" because its aim is life (v.10). The misuse of the law at the hands of sin has not altered its own essential character.

13 Having detached the law from any wrongful association with sin, Paul must still treat the problem of its relation to death, the other great enemy of the human race. Continuing to present the case in personal terms, he protests that the responsibility for incurring death must be assigned to sin rather than to the law. By using the law to bring death, sin shows how "utterly sinful" it is. At the same time, the law, which seemed to be victimized by being taken over by sin, emerges as having gained an important objective. It has exposed sin for the evil thing it is.

From this point on to the end of the chapter, the personal emphasis continues, and with increased intensity. The powerful forces of law and sin are depicted as producing a struggle that ends in a confession of despair, relieved only by the awareness that in Jesus Christ there is deliverance. Paul does not shrink from putting himself prominently in this arena of conflict if only his doing so will help others (cf. 1Co 4:6).

A shift of emphasis is discernible on moving from vv.7–13 to vv.14–25. In the former section Paul has shown that the fault lay not with the commandment of God but with sin in its use of the commandment. In the latter section he will maintain that the responsible party, ultimately speaking, is not "I" but the sin that dwells within.

14–20 At the outset Paul wants it understood that he is not depreciating the law, for it is "spiritual" (GK 4461)—that is, emanating from God (vv.22, 25), who is Spirit (Jn 4:24). The law reflects the character of God. Godly people recognize this fact ("we know").

"But I am unspiritual." What a stark contrast! The word "unspiritual" is literally "fleshly" (see comment on 7:4–6), what I am in myself. I am not subject to the law and therefore I am in rebellion against God, since the law is from him. (The problems as to whether Paul speaks individually or universally here and as a saved or an unsaved man will be dealt with at the close of this chapter.)

Then Paul moves on to a second description more wretched than the first: "sold as a slave to sin." This strikes the keynote of what follows, down to the anguished cry, "Who will rescue me. . . ?" (v.24). The slavery extends to the totality of his being. It numbs and blinds him, for he confesses that he does not know what he is doing (v.15). This is a graphic picture, one of a slave going through certain motions under the authority of a master. Whatever obedience there seems to be is really not a matter of volition, but something almost mechanical. Paul feels forced to carry out what he does not want to do, what he really hates, whereas what he would like to do never seems to materialize (v.15).

The failure to do what he desires must not be attributed to a wrong attitude toward the law, such as indifference or defiance, since he concurs in the verdict that the law is praiseworthy (v.16). Rather, doing things contrary to the law must be traced to the power of sin working within him (v.17). Paul is not attempting to escape responsibility, but is putting his finger on the real culprit—indwelling sin. The invader has managed to secure more than a foothold; he roams the place, considering it his home. In putting the matter like this, Paul has moved from a consideration of outward acts to an emphasis on the unwanted tenancy of sin. With this alien master in control, no matter how strongly he wants to do the good, he finds himself checkmated. He cannot carry it out (v.18). Verse 19 is a virtual repetition of v.15; v.20 of v.17.

21–25 Paul now summarizes what has gone before. "So I find this law at work." So far, "law" (GK 3795) meant the law of Moses, but here it has a specialized meaning—that of "principle" (cf. 3:27; 8:2). This usage makes it necessary, when speaking once more of the Mosaic law, to call it "God's law" (v.22). In Paul's inner being the divine law is welcome and brings delight, but that which manifests itself in the bodily members (what may be called the outward self) is the law (i.e., principle) of sin. There is a state of war, and he finds himself a captive (cf. the slave figure in v.14) to the imperious operation of sin. The agony of this unhappy condition comes out in the cry "What a wretched man I am!" It is a powerful and moving cry, recalling the words of Isaiah when he became aware of his sin (Isa 6:5). Since Paul is unable to help himself he must look elsewhere.

In answering this cry of desperation, the apostle does not say, "What will rescue me?" but "Who. . . ?" There is deliverance, provided by God through Jesus Christ, for his sinlessness and triumph over evil assure him that deliverance is possible.

The final statement of the chapter (v.25b) is another summary. Coming as it does after the cry of thanksgiving for deliverance through Christ, it seems strange that there should be a reversion to the state of tension described earlier. What could possibly account for this strange concluding statement? Apparently Paul wanted to state once more the essence of the struggle he had depicted in order to prepare the reader to appreciate the grand exposition of one's deliverance in terms of Christ and the Spirit in the next chapter.

Before moving on to that portion, we must return to the overall problems of interpretation in ch. 7. First of all, is Paul giving a truly autobiographical sketch, or is the "I" a vehicle to present a human being in his or her extremity, a means to universalize the experience treated here? It is difficult to decide, as both are possible explanations. Perhaps the personal and the universal are intended to mingle here.

The more strenuously debated issue is the question of interpretation of the material itself, especially vv.14–25. Are we to regard the state pictured here as that of the unsaved person or of the Christian? The case for the unsaved condition is as follows: (1) It was the prevailing view among the Greek Fathers of the early church. (2) Such expressions as "sold as a slave to sin" and "unspiritual" seem more fitting as a description of the unsaved than of genuine believers. After all, the main message of ch. 6 is that Christians are free from sin. How can Paul then say they are sold as slaves to sin (v.14)? (3) If the "now" of 8:1 means what it seems to mean, Paul is passing from a consideration of the unsaved to the saved condition. (4) The absence of the Holy Spirit from the discussion and even of Christ (until the very close) is hard to understand if a redeemed experience is under review.

The other interpretation holds that a Christian is being depicted, despite his wretchedness. The case for that position is as follows: (1) This was the conclusion of Augustine and of the Reformed interpreters. (2) Paul changes from the past tense in vv.7– 13 to the present tense in vv.14–25. Presumably, then, the former section relates to Paul's pre-Christian experience and the rest of the chapter to his postconversion experience. (3) Paul's description of his pre-Christian life in Php 3:6 as a blameless condition in terms of the law does not jive with his wretchedness in the passage before us. (4) The progress of thought in Romans needs to be taken into consideration. Paul has passed beyond his description of the unsaved state and is now giving attention to sanctification and its problems; so the theme is really relevant only to believers. (5) That a conflict of the sort described here can and does characterize the Christian life is apparent elsewhere in Paul (see Gal 5:17). (6) The power of self-diagnosis at the penetrating level found here (vv.22–23) is beyond the capacity of an unbeliever. (7) A person desiring holiness of life, as pictured here, could only be a believer, for the unsaved person does not long for God but is hostile toward him. (8) The last verse of ch. 7 acknowledges deliverance in Christ, yet goes on to state the very problem sketched in vv.14–24 as though it continues to be a problem for one who knows the Lord.

The wide difference between these two views puts the general reader in a dilemma. Which view is correct? Which has the better of the argument?

Another and more satisfying approach is possible—namely, that the experience pictured here is not wholly autobiographical but is deliberately presented in such a way as to demonstrate what the situation would indeed be if someone who is faced with the demands of the law and the power of sin in his life were to try to solve his problem independently of the power of Christ and the enablement of the Spirit. That is, Paul is hypothetically describing what life under the law would be like if it was seen according to the logic of its nature.

A parallel use of this methodology may be detected in Ecclesiastes. The writer knows God personally, but purposely and deliberately views life from the standpoint of his natural self in order to expose it as meaningless, empty of lasting value. Romans 7 performs a service by calling into question certain popular notions that lack biblical foundation: that the soul's struggle is essentially against specific sins or habits; that human nature is essentially good (cf. v.18); that sanctification is by means of the law; that if one will only determine to do the right, he or she will be able to do it. These are some of the misconceptions that must be removed, and they might not have been removed had the apostle proceeded directly from ch. 6 to ch. 8. Without ch. 7 we would not be able to appreciate to the full the truths presented in the next chapter.

E. The Blessings of Life in the Spirit (8:1–39)

It is altogether too narrow a view to see this section only as the antidote to the wretched state pictured in ch. 7. Actually the chapter gathers up various strands of thought from the entire discussion of both justification and sanctification and ties them together with the crowning knot of glorification. Like ch. 5, it presents the blessings of the justified life, grounded in the removal of condemnation. Like ch. 6, it stresses freedom from the bondage of sin and ultimately from the bondage of death. Like ch. 7, it deals with the problem of the flesh (or sinful human nature), finding the solution in the liberating and productive ministry of the Spirit. The chapter begins with instruction, rises to consolation, and culminates in jubilation. This is high and holy ground indeed for the Christian pilgrim to tread.

1. Liberation by the Spirit from the law of sin and death (8:1–11)

1–2 We are hardly prepared by the contents of ch. 7 for the glorious pronouncement that there is no condemnation at all for those who are in Christ Jesus, and we find it hard to associate the "therefore" with anything in the immediately preceding context. The connection must thus be sought in the entire sweep of the thought as developed from ch. 3 on. The natural antithesis to condemnation is justification. Justification is such a basic truth to Paul that he brings it even into his discussion of the Christian life (8:33–34; cf. 8:10). It is the basis and starting point for sanctification. Believers must be assured of acceptance with God before they can grow in grace and conformity to Christ.

Furthermore, the construction of vv.2–4 carries us beyond the thought of freedom from condemnation to the application of the redeeming work of Christ by the Spirit to the believer's life in such a way that the dominion of sin is broken and the reign of godliness assured. The noun "condemnation" has its counterpart in the verb "condemned" (v.3), which is followed immediately, not by a statement about the legal standing of believers, but by one concerning their manner of life (v.4). Thus, there is both a forensic and a practical force in "no condemnation."

Verse 2 immediately picks up this practical, dynamic aspect by concentrating on the freedom from the imperious rule of sin and death, a freedom now available to believers through the operation of the Spirit. The word "law" is used figuratively here in the sense of "principle" (cf. 7:21, 23). Clearly it would be impossible for Paul to refer to the law of Moses as "the law of sin and death," even though it provokes sin (7:7–8) and produces death (7:9–11; 2Co 3:6–7); the Mosaic law in itself is holy (7:12). In the present passage, therefore, "law" indicates the certainty and regularity of operation that characterizes sin (which leads to death) and the Spirit (which leads to life). "Life" (GK 2437) emphasizes both supernaturalness and spontaneity—hence the superiority of the Spirit's operation over that of sin. The Spirit gives us freedom from the enslaving power of sin.

3–4 But how was this freedom gained (v.3)? The opening statement about the powerlessness of the law because of the weakness of the sinful nature to which its commands are addressed is an obvious reminder of the major thrust of ch. 7. The law makes demands and condemns when those demands are not met, but it cannot overcome sin. This inability of the law required the personal action of God in Christ. He sent "his own Son." This mission could not be entrusted to anyone else or anyone less than his Son. While the preexistence of the Son is not formally taught here, it is implied (cf. Jn 3 17; 7:33; 17:18; 20:21). When vv.2–3 are taken together, they bear a close resemblance to Gal 4:4–6, where Father, Son, and Spirit are pictured as involved in the mission of Christ.

The Son was sent "in the likeness of sinful man" ("man" is literally "flesh"; GK 4922). Observe with what care Paul states the incarnation. He does not say "in sinful flesh," lest the Son's sinlessness be compromised, nor "in the likeness of flesh," which would convey a docetic idea and thereby deny the reality of the humanity of our Lord. Paul's terminology here fully agrees with Php 2:7: "being made in human likeness."

What about the work of Christ? The purpose of his coming was "to be a sin offering" (lit., "for sin"). Christ's mission was to deal effectively with sin, making possible among his people the type of life presented in the following verse. Included in that mission was the expiation of sin, which he accomplished through his sacrifice on the cross (cf. 2Co 5:21).

"So he condemned sin in sinful man" ("sinful man" is literally "flesh"). It is possible that "in the flesh" is intended to be correlated with "through the flesh" at the beginning of the verse, in which case the NIV translation is justified. However, since "flesh" can be used of Christ apart from any sinful connotation (e.g., "physical body" in Col 1:22), it is also possible to refer the phrase to our Savior rather than to sinful humanity; in that case, Paul is saying that God condemned sin in the same sort of (human) nature that, in everyone else, is dominated by sin. This brings the teaching in line with 6:5–11.

The purpose of the incarnation, so far as the believer's life is concerned, is stated in v.4 in such a way as to indicate that the apostle has not allowed the agonizing struggle of ch. 7 to fade from view. There the law was pictured as faultless in itself, but agonizingly elusive for those who try to keep it in their own strength. The self-satisfied will minimize the law's demands by magnifying their own achievement, whereas the conscientious will end up in despair. In God's plan, however, the law must be honored not simply in lip service or in desire but in reality. Its righteous requirements must be fully met. This can be done only by living according to the divine aid of the Spirit rather than according to the sinful human nature (cf. "Spirit of life" in v.2).

One should observe the balance in this passage between the divine and human elements in Christian life. Paul recognizes that believers are not robots, but persons accountable for their redeemed lives. At the same time Paul pictures the requirement of the law as fulfilled (passive) in believers, not by them, as though to remind them that the redeemed do not possess spiritual power that they can control and utilize on their own. Rather, the Spirit is always channeling that power and never releases it to those in whom he lives for them to use independently of him. The power to keep the law resides in the Spirit.

It would be a mistake, however, to ground the Christian "walk" solely on the enabling ministry of the Spirit. The close connection with v.3 demands that we include the saving work of Christ (cf. 6:4, where Paul has observed that identification with the Savior in his death and resurrection has this very objective, that "we too may live [lit., walk; GK 4344] a new life").

5–8 At this point Paul launches upon a fairly extended statement contrasting the terms "sinful nature" (lit., "flesh") and "Spirit," which he has used in v.4. Both terms are difficult because they can have more than one meaning (for "flesh," see comment on 7:4–6). To be in the flesh, as the word is used here, is to be in the unregenerate state. To "be [NIV live] according to" the flesh (v.5) is to have the sinful nature as the regulating principle of one's life. To "walk [NIV live] according to" the flesh (v.4) is to carry out in conduct those things dictated by the sinful human nature.

Less complicated is the use of "Spirit" (pneuma; GK 4460), but even here there is some question as to whether or not this word as used in contrast to "flesh" perhaps refers to the (redeemed) human spirit. This much is clear: in the passage under consideration pneuma does not mean "spirit" simply as an element in the constitution of a person (cf. 1Co 5:3). The problem is to determine whether pneuma in this passage means the divine life-principle (the new spiritual nature communicated to the believer) or whether it means the Spirit of God.

Two considerations strongly favor the view that this is a reference to the Holy Spirit. (1) This chapter has begun with an obvious allusion to the divine Spirit (v.2), so that unless there is clear indication to the contrary, one should expect this to be the intended meaning of pneuma in the verses that follow. (2) In stating the ground of Christian victory over sin, the apostle would likely assign the basis of that victory to the highest source possible rather than to a lower, intermediate factor.

The statements in vv.5–8 about the sinful nature refer to the unregenerate person, especially judging by the care with which Paul excludes his readers in v.9. This is not sufficient ground, however, for claiming that the Christian has nothing to do with the sinful flesh. The warning of 8:12ff. would be meaningless if that were the case. But for the moment Paul wishes to expose the flesh in its stark reality as totally alien to God and his holy purposes. He insists that there is a correspondence between one's essential being and what interests that person. The fleshly are occupied with fleshly things, whereas those who possess the Spirit and are controlled by him are concerned with the things of the Spirit (see also 1Co 2:14). The expression "have their minds set on" denotes far more than a mental process, for it also includes one's inner desires (cf. Php 2:5ff.; Col 3:2).

The same root word appears again (v.6), only in the noun form: "The mind of sinful man is death." The unsaved are cut off from God, and this amounts to death in the sense of separation from God. Those who are spiritual, on the contrary, enjoy life from God (cf. v.2) and the peace such life affords (cf. 14:17). The dead state of the natural man, both present and future, is then traced to the inveterate hostility to God that characterizes "flesh," a hostility that manifests itself in opposition to the law of God. Such people refuse to obey it and thereby are in rebellion against God. In summary, Paul names four characteristics of the sinful unregenerate person: hostility toward God, insubordination to his law, failure to please God, and death. It is no wonder that when Jesus spoke to Nicodemus of "the flesh," he went on to declare, "You must be born again" (Jn 3:7).

9–11 Turning now to his readers, Paul reminds them of the basic difference between themselves and those he has been describing. As believers, they have, in the Spirit, an antidote for the sinful human nature ("the flesh"; see comment on 7:4–6). Furthermore, the Spirit of God "lives" in them (the word "if" here presupposes the truth of the statement). Previously (v.2) the Spirit has been called "the Spirit of life" because of his regenerating and renewing power; here he is "the Spirit of God" and "the Spirit of Christ," indicating that he carries out the purposes of God and applies the fruits of Christ's redemptive mission to the lives of believers (cf. Gal 4:6).

No one who lacks the Spirit belongs to Christ. Everyone who trusts Christ has the Spirit (Eph 1:13). The title "Spirit of Christ" is made meaningful by the deliberate way in which Paul says essentially the same thing about both the Spirit and Christ in relation to believers: the Spirit lives in you (v.9) and Christ is in you (v.10). The presence and fullness of Christ are realized in a Christian's life by means of the indwelling Spirit (Eph 3:16–17).

Paul's observation (v.10) about those in whom Christ lives—"your body is dead because of sin, yet your spirit is alive because of righteousness"—has proved difficult for interpreters. The NIV and most leading modern translations make "spirit" refer to the spirit of the Christian rather than to the Spirit of Christ. But it seems preferable to see pneuma ("spirit"; see comment on vv.5–8) here as referring to "the Spirit of God," for three reasons. (1) It is unlikely that Paul, having consistently referred to pneuma as the Spirit of God, would give this word a different frame of reference in this one instance. His use of the word "body" here, not the word "spirit," refers to the entire human person. He maintains that sin necessitated our dying with Christ. (2) The phrase about the pneuma being alive because of righteousness relates back to "the Spirit of life" at the beginning of the chapter (v.2). (3) The first part of v.11 refers to the living presence of the Spirit in believers; Paul seems there to be repeating what he said at the end of v.10 in order to present a further observation—namely, that the same Spirit will provide resurrection life in due season. The close of v.10 teaches, therefore, that the Spirit who is life in himself brings life to those in whom he lives only because they have already been granted God's righteousness (through their justification).

In v.11 the Spirit is given yet another title: "the Spirit of him [i.e., God; cf. 4:24] who raised Jesus from the dead." The Spirit's future work on behalf of the saints will be to "give life" to their mortal bodies. This accords with Paul's description of the glorified bodies of believers as "spiritual" (1Co 15:44). The life bestowed by the Spirit in that coming day is beyond the power of death or any other agency to vitiate or destroy. It is the very life of God, blessedly spiritual and indestructibly eternal.

2. Additional ministries of the Spirit (8:12–27)

12–13 The apostle turns now from instruction to exhortation, from what God has done through Christ and the Spirit to what the believer is expected to do by way of response. But even with a strong emphasis on human responsibility, the desired lifestyle can be accomplished only "by the Spirit." The special ministry described here is mortification (putting the sinful nature to death). It is the message of 6:11–14 all over again, except for the reminder that no one can hope to deal effectively with the sinful nature simply by determination alone. The Holy Spirit is needed, and he is the Spirit of power.

"Obligation" (GK 4053) is the keynote. Only the negative side is stated; the positive side—that we are debtors to the Spirit and must put on the Lord Jesus (13:14)—must be inferred. If we do not have an obligation to live in terms of the sinful nature, the conclusion must be that we are obligated to live and serve God in terms of the Spirit. It is important to grasp the import of v.12, because it teaches beyond all question that believers still have the sinful nature within themselves, despite having been crucified with Christ. The "flesh" (see comment on 7:4–6) has not been eradicated, but we are obliged not "to live according to it" (see comment on 8:3–4). Sanctification is not a luxury but a necessity. Since the solicitations of the fleshly nature are constant, we must continually put to death (that is the force of the verb) the deeds of the body. And since the Spirit is the Spirit of life, he cannot do otherwise than oppose the flesh and its desires, which lead to death.

14–17 The Spirit's ministry set forth in these verses may be thought of as his attestation, in which he confirms for believers the reality of their position as children of God based on adoption into the heavenly family. Though this ministry is mentioned after that of mortification, it is basic to it, because those who want to be successful in contending against the flesh must be assured that they have been claimed by God and equipped with his infinite resources. Later (v.23) Paul will move on to set forth another aspect of adoption that belongs to the future.

The relation of the Spirit to the children of God is presented as being much like that of a shepherd to his sheep. They are "led" by him as their guide and protector. In Gal 3:24 Paul pictures the law as leading people to Christ. Once this goal is achieved, the law must hand over the guiding role to the Spirit, who guides into the truth (Jn 16:13) and, as in the present passage, into holiness. Unlike sin, which may at first only gently seduce, then deceitfully begin to drive as a hard taskmaster, the Spirit relies on persuasion rather than force. In fact, Paul goes to some pains to avoid misunderstanding on this very point, assuring us that the Spirit's leadership does not involve a new bondage in which fear ruled one's life (cf. Heb 2:15). The new title given to the Spirit, namely, "the Spirit of sonship" (lit., "Spirit of adoption") emphasizes the vast gulf between slavery and family relationship. By the Spirit believers cry, "Abba, Father" (cf. Gal 4:6). The two terms are equivalents, the first being the Aramaic word Jesus used in prayer (Mk 14:36).

The term "adoption" (GK 5625) bears a relationship to justification in that (1) it is declarative and forensic (i.e., it is a legal term); (2) it bestows an objective standing; (3) it is a pronouncement that is not repeated but has permanent validity; (4) it rests on the loving purpose and grace of God (Eph 1:5).

Paul's readers are called "sons" (v.15) and "children" (v.16), without any appreciable distinction. Both are family terms. "Children" emphasizes family relationship based on regeneration, while "sons" stresses the legal standing. In v.16 (cf. Gal 4:6) the Spirit bears witness together with the redeemed spirit in people to the reality of that membership in the family of heaven, i.e., to the actuality of salvation through Christ. Hebrew law prescribed that at the mouth of two or three witnesses every matter was to be established (Dt 17:6; cf. Mt 18:16). Similarly, there are two witnesses to one's salvation, the individual person in his or her inmost being and the Holy Spirit, who confirms the believer's realization to having been made God's child through faith in Christ.

A comparison of vv.15 and 16 brings out an important truth concerning the assurance of salvation. We sometimes come to the point of doubting our salvation because our sanctification has proceeded so slowly and so lamely. The Spirit, however, does not base his assuring testimony on progress or the lack of it in the Christian life. He does not lead us to cry, "I am God's child." Rather, he leads us to call upon God as Father—to look away from ourselves to him who established the relationship.

A final truth about adoption is that it involves an inheritance (v.17). In line with current legal provisions that enabled even a slave, once adopted, to inherit his master's possessions, Paul teaches that the Christian follows a similar course: a slave (to sin), a child, then an heir (vv.15–17; cf. Gal 4:6–7). How unexpected and how breathtaking is the gracious provision of God! The marvel increases with the news that we are co-heirs with Christ. Sharing his sufferings may be looked at as simply the cost of discipleship. Yet it has a brighter aspect, because it is the prelude to partaking with him of the coming glory (cf. 1Pe 4:13).

18–22 Before passing to the final ministry of the Spirit (vv.26–27), Paul lingers over the concept of future glory in relation to present suffering. His presentation may be seen as an expansion of what he had already written to the Corinthians (2Co 4:17). Weighed in the scales of lasting values, the sufferings endured in this life are light indeed, compared with the splendor of the life to come—a life undisturbed by anything hostile or hurtful. Scripture does not tell us much of what that glory will be, but it assures us that it will be. The glory will be revealed "in us" (or possibly "to us").

Instead of considering the future simply from the standpoint of the redeemed, Paul enlarges the perspective to include the whole "creation" (GK 3232), which is here personified as longing for the time when the children of God will enjoy the consummation because creation's own deliverance from the frustration imposed on it by the Fall cannot come until that time. This accords with the superior place given humankind in the creation (Ge 1:26–28; Ps 8:5–8). "Eager expectation" is a picturesque term describing a person leaning forward out of intense interest and desire, usually used in Scripture regarding one's attitude toward the Lord's coming (e.g., Gal 5:5; Php 3:20; Heb 9:28).

The one who subjected the creation to frustration is not named. The most natural interpretation is that God, at the time sin entered the world, did the subjecting. The creation is pictured as not willingly enduring the subjection, yet as having hope for something better—liberation from its "bondage to decay." The apostle is concerned with the creation only as it relates to humanity. How gracious of God to retain for believers the habitat they have long been accustomed to, only so changed and beautified as to harmonize with their own glorified state.

Verse 23 implies that the expression "whole creation" (v.22) excludes the people of God. Its "groaning" looks back to its subjection to frustration (v.20), whereas the "pains of childbirth" anticipate the age of renewal. In other words, the same sufferings are at once a result and a prophecy. Christ too spoke of the renewing of the world as a "rebirth" (Mt 19:28).

23 The parallel Paul has been drawing between the saints and the material creation is true in at least two respects—groaning (cf. 2Co 5:2) and eagerly awaiting the new age (Ro 8:23). Perhaps a third element of comparison is intended: "the redemption of our bodies," answering to the transformation of the earth. But in one respect no parallel can be made. Only the people of God have "the firstfruits of the Spirit" (v.23).

The concept of "firstfruits" (GK 569) is prominent in the OT, where the Israelites were expected to bring the first ripened elements of grain, fruit, etc., to the Lord as an offering (Ex 23:19; Ne 10:35). By doing so the offerer acknowledged that all produce was the provision of God and was really his. Implicit also in the ritual was the assurance from the divine side that the general harvest to be enjoyed by the offerer would providentially follow. As applied to our passage, the concept seems somewhat out of place, for if the Spirit is truly a person, how can any more of him be given in the future than has been given at conversion? We should rather understand the gift of the Spirit to believers at the inception of Christian life as God's pledge of the completion of the process of salvation, here stated as "adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies." These bodies were earlier described by Paul as spiritual bodies (1Co 15:44). The future bodily resurrection of believers will be the full harvest of redemption.

In this connection we encounter "adoption" for the second time (see comment on vv.14–17). The saints who already have an adoption and are sealed by the Spirit for the day of redemption (Eph 1:13–14; 4:30) will receive their second and final adoption. Between the two events stretches the course of sanctification, and at the final adoption the children of God will be fully conformed to the likeness of God's Son (v.29; cf. 1Jn 3:2). Their bodies will be like the body of him who has provided redemption from sin and death (Php 3:20–21). This is the Spirit's work of glorification.

24–25 In keeping with the eager waiting of those who long for their complete salvation (v.23) is the emphasis on hope (vv.24–25; cf. also 5:4). The Christian pilgrims are on the road to glory, assured that the promises of the word and the spiritual energy provided for their "walk" are not illusory. As they see the dark tunnel of death ahead of them, they are confident that beyond it the road leads on to their ultimate destination, even though it remains unseen. Because an element of our salvation—the redemption of the body—is held in reserve, we have hope. If all were ours now, there would be no place for this experience. Since the object of our hope is not yet realized, "we wait for it patiently" (or "with endurance," if the hardships and sufferings that remain to be faced are in view).

26–27 At length Paul arrives at the final ministry of the Spirit mentioned in this chapter, his work of intercession. "In the same way" seems to link this ministry with hope. Both help to sustain believers amid the burdens and disappointments of life. The word "weakness" (GK 819) is a general expression for the Christian's limitations while still in the human body. Paul had long before discovered his weakness and along with it the compensating factor of the power of God (2Co 12:9–10). He admits that we often do not know our real needs as God sees them, nor do we know the needs of others. Going deeper, we do not know the will of God respecting these things. In the last analysis, it is God's will that determines how our prayers will be answered.

Standing over against this severe limitation is the gladdening information that "the Spirit helps us." The culmination of the Spirit's activity on our behalf is the declaration that he intercedes "for the saints" (intercessory prayer means prayer for others). Prayer activity on the part of believers goes on in the background and is overshadowed by the part played by the Spirit of God. Elsewhere (Eph 6:18) this is called praying in the Spirit.

Verse 27 is needed to clarify something referred to in v.26, i.e., the inexpressible groanings. How can such prayer, if it be called prayer at all, be answered? Are not such prayers unintelligible? Not for God! He is no stranger to the intent of the Spirit. He knows what the inexpressible meaning is, because the petitions that the Spirit voices are strictly in accord with the will of God. It is a mistake to associate the inexpressible groanings with glossolalia.

3. The security and permanence of the life of the redeemed (8:28–39)

God's provision for his own is spelled out in exalted and fervent language—reaching back into the past to include his eternal purpose and its implementation in the love and sacrifice of Christ, moving into the present to proclaim God's keeping power, and sweeping down the years to defy any power to separate the saints from the abiding love of God in Christ.

28–30 Verse 28 begins with the notion that God works for the good of believers. This thought is connected with the foregoing section in that we now have a broad, general statement after a more specific one relating to the work of the Spirit as intercessor.

What is the meaning of "all things"? It most likely refers to those things that, while themselves adverse, are turned to good account by the sovereign God working on our behalf. This line of thought agrees with 5:3–5 as well as with the mention of sufferings and opposition in the present chapter. The "good" (GK 19) is not defined, but should be sought in the intended conformity to God's Son.

The beneficiaries are those who on the human side "love God" and on the divine side are "called according to his purpose." Paul seldom refers to love for God on the part of the saints (1Co 2:9; 8:3). Nor does he introduce it here as the ground for the benefit he has been describing, for it is simply a response to the divine love and grace. The "called" (GK 3105) are not those who are merely invited to respond to the proclamation of the Gospel; they are called according to God's (electing) purpose.

This calling is further explained in terms of foreknowledge ("foreknew"; GK 4589) and predestination (v.29). The former term does not indicate advance awareness of someone; it refers to God's choice, his electing decision (see especially 1Pe 1:20). God's calling is not a haphazard thing, nor is it something cold and formal. It is filled with the warmth of love, as in the Hebrew word "to know" (GK 3359; see Ge 18:19; Am 3:2). Though foreknowledge is not mentioned in Dt 7:6–8, that passage illumines the concept. God's sovereign choice precludes any possibility of human merit entering into the decision (cf. Eph 1:4). Observe also that we are called according to God's purpose, not according to his foreknowledge; hence foreknowledge must be included in the electing purpose.

If "predestined" (GK 4633) stood by itself without any amplification, one might conclude that only an action by God is involved whereby one is chosen to salvation. But the remainder of the sentence indicates otherwise, pointing to much more than deliverance from sin and death. The background is adoption, but now presented not as in v.15 (where it is related to the Father and the Spirit) but as related to the Son. Paul presents two aspects of this conformity. By a sharing in the sufferings of Christ (Php 3:10) that is based on having the mind of Christ (Php 2:5–8), the believer is gradually being made into his likeness. This is the essence of sanctification. Its second and final aspect is conformity of the body to that of the risen Lord, to be realized at the resurrection (Php 3:21), which is the culmination of a growth in likeness to Christ based on the Spirit's work in the believer (2Co 3:18).

From these passages we learn that fellowship with Christ in his sufferings is the prelude to sharing with him in his glory. God sent his Son in our likeness (v.3) that we might eventually be like him. This makes understandable and legitimate the use of "brothers" as a description of believers in relation to the Son. The likeness will be complete except for the fact that glorified humanity never, of course, becomes deity.

Verse 30 states the various steps involved in the realization of the divine purpose: the call (cf. v.28), justification, and glorification. The marvel is that the final item is stated as though it had already occurred. This is what we might call a prophetic perfect (cf. Isa 53, where the work of the Servant of the Lord is spoken of as though his sacrifice had already been made).

Why is sanctification not mentioned in this verse? It is probably left out deliberately because sanctification is the one area in which human cooperation is essential. God never appeals to us to be called or justified or glorified, but there are numerous appeals to cooperate with him in the realization of the life of holiness.

31–36 From this point on to the end of the chapter Paul expounds the impregnable position of the believer. The key lies in the sentence "If God is for us, who can be against us?" (v.31). God has not given empty promises. He has acted, and what he has done in Christ and by the Spirit constitutes all the proof we need that the glorification will be ours in due season. This is precisely the point of v.32. God's activity has cost him dearly—he did not spare "his own Son," Jesus, who endured the cross. In all of this God was with him (2Co 5:19). Moreover, the Son was not an unwilling victim pressed into sacrificial service. "God gave him up" (GK 4140) expresses the Father's participation, but the same verb is used of the Son's involvement (Gal 2:20). With the cross before us as the mighty demonstration of God's grace in giving his dearest to help the neediest, it naturally follows that the same grace will not withhold anything from those who are his (see 2Pe 1:3).

Paul does not deny that Christians face foes and hardships. Yet his challenging question stands: "If God is for us, who can be against us?" Amplifying it, he proceeds to ask a series of questions and then to provide answers. First, "Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen?" (v.33) No one can successfully press charges, no matter how hard he may try. Satan is busy doing just that (Rev 12:10), no doubt pointing out the discrepancy between the profession of believers and their "walk," but he gets nowhere with his pretended zeal for righteousness. Ultimately, as David perceived (Ps 51:4), all sin is committed against God. Logically, therefore, God is the only one who can bring charges against us. This, Paul is saying, God refuses to do, because he is for us, not against us.

The second question, "Who is he that condemns?" (v.34), finds its answer in Christ. He will never renounce the efficacy of his own work on our behalf. Paul packs four aspects of that work into one great sentence (v.34b). (1) Christ died and thereby secured the removal of sin's guilt; (2) he was raised to life and is able to bestow life on those who trust him for their salvation (Jn 11:25; 14:19); (3) he was exalted to God's right hand, with all power given to him both in heaven, so as to represent us there, and on earth, where he is more than a match for our adversaries; (4) and he intercedes for us at the throne of grace, whatever our needs may be (Heb 4:4–16; 7:25).

A third question is "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" (v.35). Can there be a contradiction between Christ's love for his own and his allowing suffering to overtake them? Severance from his love is no more thinkable than that the Father ceased to love his Son when he allowed him to endure the agonies of the cross, apparently forsaken. Christ predicted trouble for his people who are left in the world, but told them to be of good cheer because he had overcome the world (Jn 16:33). The quotation from Ps 44:22 (v.36) reminds believers that suffering has always been the lot of the godly. Whereas the people of God in the OT were often perplexed about the reason for their trials, the saints of NT times can trace their sufferings back to identification with Christ and rejoice that they are counted worthy to suffer for his name (cf. Ac 5:41).

37–39 Here Paul bursts into a magnificent piece of eloquence. This passage, like 1Co 3:21–23, is notable for largeness of conception and majesty of expression: "No, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us" (v.37). That is, we win the supreme victory through Christ, who loved us. By saying "loved us," Paul does not intend to restrict Christ's love to the past; he rather is emphasizing the historic demonstration of this love that gives assurance of its continuance under all circumstances. "Death" cannot separate the believer from that love (cf. 2Co 5:8; Php 1:21), nor can "life," with all its allurements and dangers and trials.

Surprisingly, Paul includes "angels" here (v.38). Since he uses other terms for hostile supernatural powers, the angels should be understood as good ones. Perhaps he means that no angel will ever seek to come between Christ's love and the object of that love. "Demons" are evil spirits, such as those often mentioned in the Gospels. Being agents and underlings of the devil, they would delight to separate Christians from Christ, but they cannot do so.

Time is equally powerless to do this, whether it be "the present" with its temptations and sufferings or "the future" with its uncertainties. "Powers" probably refers to hostile spiritual intelligences who, though conquered by Christ (Eph 1:21), are nevertheless permitted to carry on spiritual warfare against the saints of God (Eph 6:12).

Nor can space come between us and the love of Christ (v.39). If there are other possibilities, Paul is sure they are all equally impotent. For he declares that there is nothing in all creation that can drive a wedge between the love of the Savior and his redeemed people. After all, the creation itself is his handiwork and cannot thwart the will of the Creator. God is love, and that love has been manifested in the redemption of humankind.

VI. The Problem of Israel: God's Righteousness Vindicated (9:1–11:36)

This section contains "unfinished business." Although Paul has insisted on the priority of the Jew (1:16) and has noted in part their advantages (3:1ff.), he has also been obliged to expose their failure and guilt, despite their being the chosen people of God. Those who have been under divine tutelage for centuries in preparation for the coming of the Messiah have failed to receive him. Has the purpose of God been frustrated? What does the future hold for this people? The problem faced here was underscored in Paul's own ministry. He had been faithful in going to the Jew first, but in place after place he had been rebuffed by Jewish unbelief. Was his earlier statement about the power of the Gospel (1:16) too hasty or too optimistic? Or were his own labors among his people inadequate? Paul could not subscribe to either conclusion. He had to face the problem from the standpoint of God's purposes and ways.

Jew and Gentile (or circumcised and uncircumcised) are distinguished in the first four chapters. In chs. 5–8 the Jew/Gentile tension drops out of sight, only to be renewed in chs. 9–11 and brought under searching examination. Notable is a shift in terminology. Although "Jew" occurs twice in this section, Paul prefers "Israel," using it ten times here and nowhere else in the letter. The reason for the change will be noted later.

In line with the nature of the problem Paul is dealing with, he frequently mentions God in chs. 9–11 (26 times). References to Christ are limited (7 times), and the Holy Spirit has no place except in 9:1. For all its distinctiveness, this section does not lose continuity with the foregoing material. "Salvation," "save," "righteousness," "believe," and "faith" are all prominent (cf. 1:16–17, the theme of this letter). There is also a tie-in with the end of ch. 8: election, which is treated on an individual basis in 8:28–30, 33, is now viewed from the national perspective of Israel. Adoption is common to both portions (8:15; 9:4), as is the concept of "call" or "calling" (8:28-30; 5 times in ch. 9).

Another feature is the liberal use of OT quotations, partly to emphasize the sovereignty of God and his covenant faithfulness and partly to substantiate the apostle's exposure of Israel's failure. Unfaithfulness to God in OT times has its parallel in rejection of his Son in recent times. Israel according to the flesh has not materially changed.

A survey of the movement of thought in these chapters warrants the conclusion that Paul, who has written so penetratingly on the justification of sinners, now turns to write on the justification (vindication) of God himself (cf. 3:3–4). He reminds us that the Almighty is free and sovereign in what he does (ch. 9). Then he turns the discussion to the Jews' mistake in trying to establish their own righteousness before God in terms of meritorious obedience to law instead of responding to the Gospel of Christ by faith. They have not lacked opportunity to hear (ch. 10). So God did not set Israel aside arbitrarily. This matches the great section on condemnation at the beginning of this letter.

In ch. 11 Paul introduces further considerations. One is that Israel's rejection was not complete, for there was a believing remnant in Paul's day. Also, the rejection is not final, for a mass conversion of Israel will occur. In addition, Paul weaves in the observation that during the time of Israel's hardening God continues his work of grace by saving a host of Gentiles. In the end, God is found faithful to his covenant promises in spite of the unfaithfulness of Israel. This final, grand achievement embracing both Jew and Gentile leads Paul to conclude with a worshipful note of praise for this unfathomable divine wisdom. It is a testimony to the divine mercy (11:32) which, along with God's righteousness, provides the insight needed to appreciate his ways.

A. Paul's Sorrow Over Israel's Condition (9:1–5)

1–3 The apostle begins on a personal note, expressing, like the prophets of old, the burden of his soul over the condition of the Jews. Since he has left Judaism behind, this sorrow might be interpreted as somewhat less than sincere. Hence the solemn introduction in which he summons two witnesses—his union with Christ who is the truth (cf. Eph 4:21) and his conscience as aided by the Holy Spirit (cf. 8:16). As though that were not enough, he declares himself ready to accept severance from Christ (cf. 8:39) if that would avail to bring his countrymen into the fold of the Savior (cf. Ex 32:32). Paul could not, of course, actually become anathema from Christ (cf. ch. 8). Yet if it were possible, he would gladly make the sacrifice. This readiness takes on poignancy in light of Paul's having suffered the loss of all things in order to gain Christ (Php 3:8). So he would be facing a double loss.

Paul's longing for the salvation of his people comes out in the way he speaks of them—"my brothers" (cf. Ac 2:29; 3:17; 22:1; 28:17). To avoid misunderstanding, he qualifies this by noting that the bond is one of "race" rather than of a common faith in Christ.

4–5 Paul goes on to cite the spiritual heritage of his nation that he shares with them. He avoids the term "Jews" in v.4, for that term ordinarily stresses the racial, political, and ritualistic aspects of his nation. By referring to his countrymen as "the people of Israel," he is emphasizing that they are the covenant people of God, different from every other people on earth.

It is only when the distinctives of Israel are spelled out that the full implication of the word can be appreciated. Probably Paul has in mind his implied promise to enlarge on the advantages of his people (3:2). In the forefront in v.4 he puts "the adoption as sons." Though this specific word is not used in the OT, the idea is certainly present (see Dt 14:1–2; also Ex 4:22; Hos 11:1). This explains Israel's enjoyment of the glory of God's presence, symbolized by the pillar of cloud that settled over the sanctuary in the wilderness and filled the temple at its dedication.

"The covenants" (GK 1347) are either the arrangements God entered into with Abraham, with the nation of Israel at Sinai, and with David, or else those arranged with Abraham (Ge 15), then renewed with Isaac (Ge 17) and with Jacob (Ge 28). The word "covenant" used here implies divine initiative rather than a mutual agreement between equals.

"The receiving of the law" refers, of course, to what was communicated through Moses to the children of Israel at Sinai. In Paul's time the nation tended to look on this as its most prized possession (2:17), the most precious portion of the OT. A closely related item is "the temple worship" (i.e., the laws concerning sacrifices as prescribed in the law). "The promises" have a close relationship to the covenants (cf. Eph 2:12) and represent various aspects of the messianic salvation promised in the OT.

The importance of "the patriarchs" (v.5) can be seen in 11:28. They are the men to whom the promises were given prior to the giving of the law. God was pleased to announce himself as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Ex 3:15). In "from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ" (v.5), "them" refers to the people of Israel (v.4) rather than to the patriarchs, for there were many generations between them and the advent of the Messiah (cf. Mt 1:1–17; Lk 3:23–38). A subtle distinction is to be noted between "theirs" and "from them." Israel cannot lay claim to Christ in the same way they can claim the patriarchs, even though he entered the human family through the Israelite gate (cf. 1:3). Christ is much more than the patriarchs. In his earthly origin he does belong to one nation, but by virtue of his heavenly origin and mission he cannot be claimed exclusively by any segment of the race, seeing he is "God over all." In this final affirmation, Paul attests to the divine nature of Christ.

Looking back over vv.1–5, one is bound to conclude from the combination of Paul's sorrow and the extended enumeration of Israel's privileges that the subject of his nation's spiritual condition constantly weighed on him. His statement of the advantages of Israel anticipates the fuller discussion of her election and serves to accent the element of tragedy in her current state. A double purpose is served by the culminating statement concerning the Messiah: it not only underscores the blindness of Israel but is also calculated to keep believing Gentiles from gloating over Israel's fall (11:20), seeing that Israel has been the channel by which God gave Christ to the world.

B. God's Choice of Israel Based on Election, Not on Natural Generation or Works of Merit (9:6–13)

6–9 The atmosphere of tragedy is qualified by Paul's forthright denial that the course of events has taken God by surprise. If there is failure, it must be attributed to human beings, not to God and his declared purpose. He points out that God's saving purpose does not include all who belong to Israel in the biological sense (cf. his distinction in the term "Jew" in 2:28–29). Though unnamed, Ishmael is apparently in view, in contrast to Isaac; Paul's contrast is between merely being a physical descendant of Abraham and enjoying God's call to spiritual destiny—belonging to the godly line of descent that culminated in the Messiah himself (Gal 3:16). Ishmael was born by natural processes, and God bestowed on him material blessings simply because he belonged to Abraham (Ge 17:20; 21:13). Isaac was unique in that he was the child who was promised. God's purpose was centered in him before he was born. In fact, apart from divine enablement to the parents, Isaac would never have been born (cf. 4:18–21).

10–13 "Not only that" (v.10). Something more needs to be said, for any Jew could point out that the nation of Israel looked back to their origin in Isaac rather than in Ishmael. It was only natural that the son of Sarah should be chosen rather than the son of Hagar the bondwoman. So Paul feels impelled to cite the case of the twin brothers, both of them sons of Isaac and Rebecca. According to ordinary human expectation, they should stand on equal terms before God in his dealings with them. But it was not so. Natural generation from Isaac, the promised seed of Abraham, did not assure them of the same place in God's plan. God made a distinction between them before they were born—before their characters had been shaped or any deeds had been performed that might form a basis for evaluation. The freedom and sovereignty of God were thus safeguarded. He deliberately disturbed the normal pattern of the culture into which the children were born by decreeing that the elder should serve the younger.

By quoting Mal 1:2–3 here, Paul lifts the discussion from what might appear to be a purely personal one to the plane of corporate, national life. God's love for Jacob and his hatred for Esau should not be construed as temperamental. Malachi is appealing to the course of history as fulfilling the purpose of God declared long before. Hatred in the ordinary sense will not fit the situation, since God bestowed many blessings on Esau and his descendants. The "hatred" is simply a way of saying that Esau was not the object of God's electing purpose (cf. the use of "hate" in Lk 14:26). The value of using these two brothers is to make clear that in election God does not wait until individuals or nations are developed and then makes a choice on the basis of character or achievement. If he did so, this would make a mockery of the concept of election, because it would locate the basis in a human being rather than in God. God's love for Jacob, then, must be coupled with election rather than explained by some worthiness found in him (cf. Dt 7:6–8).

C. God's Freedom to Act in His Own Sovereign Right (9:14–29)

14–18 God's dealings with Jacob and Esau might be challenged as arbitrary, on the ground that Esau was the object of injustice. To demonstrate that this is not God's character, Paul goes further into the history of Israel, focusing on the golden calf incident at Sinai. There the people sinned grievously. If God had acted simply in justice, he could have blotted out his people. Instead, he recalled Moses to the mountain and for a second time gave him the Ten Commandments, yet not until he had proclaimed to him, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy" (Ex 33:19). And lest that mercy be construed as depending on human "desire or effort," Paul denies any such qualification (v.16). "Mercy" (GK 1796 & 1799), like grace, stands over against human worth and effort

Passages Indicating the Deity of Christ

Many passages in both the OT and NT help to demonstrate that Jesus Christ is fully God—a teaching often denied by sectarian groups and cults. This chart compiles the major passages that support this important Christian doctrine.

In the Old Testament
God's Son is to rule on the throne at God's right hand, equal in power with the Father	Pss 2:7–12; 110:1–2
The promised Messiah will be "Immanuel" (i.e., "God with us")	Isa 7:14 (cf. Mt 1:23)
The promised Messiah will be "Mighty God," ruling eternally	Isa 9:6–7
The ruler born in Bethlehem has origin from all eternity	Mic 5:2
The righteous Branch of David is called "The LORD Our Righteousness"	Jer 23:5–5; 33:15–16
The one who will appear in the temple is "the Lord"	Mal 3:1
Self-Affirmations of Jesus
His is "Lord" of the Sabbath, having created it	Mt 12:8; Mk 2:28; Lk 6:5
He is the "I am" of Ex 3:14	Jn 8:57–58
He is one with the Father	Jn 10:30
He is the judge of the living and the dead	Mt 25:31–32; Jn 5:22, 27 (cf. Ps 98:9)
He deserve the same honor as the Father	Jn 5:23
He made himself equal with God	Jn 5:16–18; 10:33
He, like God, is everywhere present	Mt 28:20
He, like God, is all-powerful	Mt 28:18
He, like God, is all-knowing	Jn 1:47–50 (cf. 2:22–23)
He has the authority, which belongs only to God, to forgive sins	Mt 9:2–7; Mk 2:5–12; Lk 5:20–25
Believing in him and believing in God are the same	Jn 14:1
To know him is to know the Father, and vice versa	Mt 11:27; Lk 10:22
He is the only way to the Father, and to see him is to see the Father	Jn 14:6–10
Other Testimonies in the Gospels and in Acts
Jesus is the eternal Word of God	Jn 1;1
Jesus was present at the time of creation	Jn 1:2–3
Jesus is the One and Only God	Jn 1:18
Thomas confessed Jesus as "My Lord and my God"	Jn 20:28
Evil spirits recognized Jesus as "the Holy One of God" (an OT term used for God)	Mk 1:24 (cf. Isa 6:3; 30:15)

Passages Indicating the Deity of Christ (cont.)

Other Testimonies in the Gospels and in Acts (cont.)
Jesus is "Lord" (the same Greek word as translates "Yahweh" ("LORD") in the LXX	Ac 2:36; 10:36
Jesus is "the Holy and Righteous One"	Ac 3:14 (cf. Isa 6:3; 30:15; Jer 23:6)
Jesus is the coming Judge	Ac 10:42; 17:31 (cf. Ps 98:9)
The Testimony of Paul
Jesus is "God over all"	Ro 9:5
Jesus is in very nature God and equal with God	Php 2:6
Jesus is Lord (the same Greek word as translates "Yahweh" ("LORD") in the LXX	Ro 10:9; 1Co 2:8; Php 2:11; Col 2:6
Jesus is the fullness of the Deity	Col 1:19; 2:9
Jesus was present at the time of creation	Col 1:16
There is only one God and Lord	1Co 8:5–6; Eph 4:5–6
Jesus is "our great God and Savior"	Tit 2:13 (cf. 1Ti 4:10; 2Ti 1:10)
The Testimony of the Other New Testament Letters
The Son is "the exact representation of God"	Heb 1:3
The Son is God	Heb 1:8
God commands the angels to worship the Son, an act that belongs only to God	Heb 1:6 (cf. Mt 4:10; Rev 19:10; 22:8–9)
Jesus, like God, is unchanging	Heb 13:8 (cf. Mal 3:6)
Jesus is "our God and Savior"	2Pe 1:1
Jesus is "our Lord and Savior"	2Pe 1:11; 2:20; 3:18
Jesus Christ is "the Righteous One"	1Jn 2:1 (cf. Jer 23:5)
To acknowledge the Son is to acknowledge the Father	1Jn 2:23
The Son Jesus Christ is "the true God"	1Jn 5:20
The Testimony in Revelation
Jesus is "the Alpha and Omega," "the First and the Last" (a term ascribed to God in the OT)	Rev 1:8; 2:8; 21:6; 22:13 (cf. Isa 44:6; 48:12)
Jesus is "the Almighty"	Rev 1:8
Jesus is "the Living One"	Rev 1:18 (cf. Jos 3:10; Pss 42:2; 84:2)
Jesus holds the key of David (ascribed in the OT to God)	Rev 3:7 (cf. Isa 22:22)
Jesus is "Lord of Lords"	Rev 17:14; 19:16
Jesus received worship from people, an act that belongs only to God	Rev 5:11–14 (cf. 19:10; 22:8–9)

whenever salvation is concerned. It is free, because God is not bound to show mercy to any.

Paul's thought moves from Moses to Pharaoh, the king of Egypt at the time of the Exodus—i.e., from the leader of Israel to their oppressor (v.17). The Scripture is represented as speaking, a vivid reminder that it is God's word. "I raised you up" does not refer to Pharaoh's emergence in history, but to God's providence in sparing him up to that time. Pharaoh deserved death for his oppression and insolence, but his life would not be taken during the series of plagues, so that the full extent of his hardness of heart might be evident and the glory of God in the deliverance of his people enhanced (cf. Jos 9:9). The fame of this Pharaoh actually depended on the mercy of God in sparing him. God can be glorified through both those who oppose him (cf. Ps 76:10) and through those who trust and serve him.

In his conclusion to the Pharaoh episode (v.18), Paul does not record those texts that say that Pharaoh hardened his own heart in unbelief and rebellion, because the apostle is emphasizing the freedom of God's action in all cases. God's hardening of Pharaoh's heart can profitably be related to the principle laid down in ch. 1: in dealing with those who reject the revelation of himself in nature and history (and in Pharaoh's case, also in miracles), God abandons them to still greater excess of sin and its consequences.

19–26 As he continues the review of God's sovereign activity, Paul presents another problem. If God acts unilaterally, according to his own will and purpose, does this not remove all basis for judgment, since no one can resist the divine will? Why, then, should a person be blamed? In reply, Paul first points out the inappropriateness of creatures talking back to God (v.20), as though they had sufficient wisdom to judge the Almighty. The illustration of the potter and the clay (v.21) shows how ridiculous this is (cf. also Isa 29:16; Jer 18:6). The apostle insists on the right of the potter to make whatever type of vessel he chooses. Those made for "noble purposes" are valuable for their beauty and decorative function, while those made for "common use" are not admired, though they are actually more essential to the household than the other ones. Pharaoh was useful in fulfilling God's purpose. Apart from this, he would not even have appeared on the pages of sacred history.

In v.22 the crucial problem is the correct interpretation of "prepared for destruction." Is Paul teaching a double predestination—i.e., that God chooses some people to experience his mercy and others to experience his wrath? This is improbable, because he avoids involving God in this case, whereas God is involved in showing mercy to the objects of his mercy (v.23). Furthermore, God's patience in bearing with the objects of his wrath suggests a readiness to receive such people on condition of repentance (cf. 2:3–4; 2Pe 3:9). So "prepared for destruction" designates a ripeness of sinfulness that points to judgment unless such people turn to God, yet God is not made responsible for their sinful condition. The preparation for destruction is the work of human beings, who allow themselves to deteriorate in spite of knowledge and conscience.

Presumably, and in view of what follows, when Paul speaks of "the objects of his [God's] wrath" (v.22), he is thinking of those in Israel who have remained obdurate in opposing the Gospel, yet are still the objects of the divine longsuffering. In contrast to them are "the objects of his mercy" (v.23) in whom God wills to show the riches of his glory. These include both Jews and Gentiles (v.24), in line with the previous teaching (1:16; 2:10–11; 3:22) and with the prophetic announcement. Through the prophet Hosea God declared his freedom to call others to be his people (v.25). Strictly, this passage from Hos 2:23 refers to the reversal in Israel's status from being called "not my people" (Hos 1:9) to being restored, but both Ro 9:25 and 1Pe 2:10 apply it to include Gentiles. The Gentiles, who are not actually a people but masses of humanity, are called by the grace of God to a distinctive role—that of being the people of God. This was happening in Paul's day.

The second quotation is from Hos 1:10 (omitting the first half of the verse, which refers to the prophesied increase in the number of the people of Israel). Here too the background is the Lo-ammi prophecy of Hos 1:9, which is seen to be revoked when Israel will once again be called "sons of the living God." In light of Peter's use of Hos 2:23 to apply to Gentiles (1Pe 2:10), Paul's intimation of a similar application would be understandable. It is just possible, however, that he does not intend Hos 1:10 to apply to Gentiles but rather to Jews, in which case he may be giving a hint of something developed in ch. 11—the influx of Gentiles during Israel's temporary rejection, followed by the turning of Israel to the Lord in great numbers (11:25–27).

27–29 As Paul used Scripture to show that God's purpose is to extend his mercy to Gentiles, so now he uses Scripture again to make clear that the election of Israel does not preclude her reduction through chastening judgments; yet in the sparing of the remnant his mercy and faithfulness are to be seen. Both passages quoted here are from Isaiah. The former anticipates the depletion of the nation by reason of the Assyrian invasion under Sennacherib. Without softening his decree and without delay, God would permit the judgment to fall; Jacob would be reduced to a remnant (Isa 10:22). The remainder of the sentence, however, underscores the divine mercy—"the remnant will be saved." The Hebrew text has "will return" (i.e., after deportation). But Paul sees the promise of a greater deliverance, for he says, "will be saved." Even as he wrote, there was a remnant of Israel found in the church. In view of the nation's rejection of Jesus as Israel's Messiah, Messianic Jews should be grateful for the minority of Jews who have embraced the Gospel of Christ (Paul returns to this theme in 11:5). If God's judgment had been unsparing, the nation would have become as truly wiped out as Sodom and Gomorrah (v.29). But the divine judgment is tempered by unfailing mercy, of which the remnant is the eloquent proof.

D. Israel's Failure to Attain Righteousness Due to Reliance on Works Rather Than Faith (9:30–10:21)

30–33 Paul now introduces a contrast between Gentiles and Israel, emphasizing that what has come to the former by the exercise of faith has been denied the latter by their insistence on seeking righteousness on the basis of works.

There is no blanket inclusion of all Gentiles; only those are included who meet the description laid down here—that of not pursuing righteousness in the manner followed by the children of Israel. Paul uses the figure of a foot race. The paradox here is sharp—Gentiles who are unconcerned about acquiring righteousness actually get the prize, even though they are not competing in the race with the Jews. The prize is justification by faith. It is a pitiful picture of the nation of Israel struggling intensely to perfect their religious life and coming up empty-handed. Gentile success is attributed to their avoidance of the false approach of the Jew and their willingness to receive righteousness as a gift. Hardly a passage in the NT is stronger than this one in its exposure of the futility of works as a means of justification.

Verse 31 presents a difficulty: "But Israel, who pursued a law of righteousness, has not attained it." What is the "it"? The Greek has the word "law" here. Yet the reader looks for a repetition of the word "righteousness." Perhaps we can translate, "has not attained to such a law" (i.e., the law of righteousness in the sense of righteousness gained by means of the law). Israel confusedly identified their own works, in which they took pride, with the absolute standard the law requires. Their whole effort was not grounded in faith but in works designed to gain acceptance (v.32).

"They stumbled over the stumbling stone" (v.32). The analogy of the race continues to influence Paul's thought. Absorbed in their own efforts, the Israelites did not recognize in Christ the stone of their prophetic Scripture and they fell headlong over him. By failing to receive him, they denied their own election of which he was the fulfillment and crown. Paul's quotation of Isa 8:14; 28:16 here demonstrates that the Lord Jesus himself, though provided as a foundation stone for faith and life, was actually to become for Israel a stumbling stone. This became especially true with respect to his cross (cf. 1Co 1:23). The misdirection of Israel's thinking became painfully clear in that the preaching of the cross, the event that was at once the quintessence of her sin and the sole hope of her salvation, left her defiant in her self-righteousness.

10:1–4 The chapter division does not mark a break in the thought, for such key words as "righteousness," "law," and "faith" continue to appear, especially in the beginning of the chapter. Paul has spoken pointedly about Israel's failure, but not censoriously. He feels deeply for his countrymen. He knows their plight because their condition was his own condition prior to his conversion. His desire for their salvation is reflected both in his going to the Jews first (Ac 13:46; 18:5–6; cf. Ro 1:16) and in his praying to God on their behalf.

Paradoxically, it is Israel's zeal for God that constitutes their greatest barrier (v.2). The apostle knows whereof he speaks, for his zeal on behalf of Judaism had been notorious (Ac 22:3; Gal 1:14). That zeal so preoccupied him that he considered Jesus and his followers as traitors to the faith of his fathers. But he persecuted in ignorance (1Ti 1:13). So here he diagnoses the zeal of Israel as lacking in "knowledge," as ignoring "the righteousness that comes from God" (cf. 1:17). In trying to establish their own righteous standing before God, the Jews have refused submission to God's righteousness. They have attempted to achieve a standing in righteousness by imagining success in meeting the demands of the law of Moses. Paul knew whereof he spoke, for he had been where they were. It was a great day for him when he gave up his cherished righteousness, based on obeying the law, in exchange for the righteousness that comes from God and depends on faith (Php 3:9).

Israel's covenant relation to God and reliance on observing the law do not add up to salvation (Jn 14:6; Ac 4:12). For this reason Paul points to Christ and his righteousness as Israel's great need (v.4). The proof that Israel was out of line with respect to God's will lies in the fact that when he sent his Son as the one who brought salvation in full accord with his righteousness, the nation rejected him. The same kind of revolution in thinking that was necessary for Paul was required for his people.

Considerable debate has centered on the interpretation of v.4, especially on the intended meaning of the word translated "end" (telos; GK 5465). Just as in English we speak of "the end of the matter" and we use the expression "to the end that"— meaning either "conclusion" or "purpose"—the same dual possibility lies in the Greek word telos. The second meaning has some plausibility here, because the statement "Christ is the end of the law" fits in with Paul's teaching about the law as that which brings people to Christ (Gal 3:24). Favorable to the first meaning ("Christ terminated the law") is the fact that the law had a certain course to run (Lk 16:16; Gal 3:19, 23; cf. Mt 5:17) in the economy of God. Both concepts seem to fit rather well in our passage. The decisive factor that favors "termination" rather than "purpose" as the main idea, however, is the contrast in 9:30–33 between the law and God's righteousness. Though the law is righteous in its requirements, it fails as an instrument of justification (cf. 8:3–4). Paul's contention regarding the Jews (v.3) is not the incompleteness of their position, which needed the coming of Christ to perfect it, but the absolute wrongness of that position, because it entailed an effort to establish righteousness by human effort rather than by accepting a divine gift.

Paul adds a certain qualification to the statement about Christ as the end of the law for righteousness: he is that "for everyone who believes." This implies that the law still applies to those who do not believe and that they still feel its power.

5–8 The thread of the discourse in the next section (vv.5–13) continues the emphasis on "everyone who believes." This is developed in two ways: first, by showing that the principle of faith is amply set forth in the OT—in fact, in the pages of Moses—and then by expressly indicating, in line with 1:16, that "everyone" includes Gentiles as well as Jews.

Paul deals first with the negative side of the attainment of righteousness by citing a passage (Lev 18:5) that calls for obedience and performance of the will of God as contained in his statutes and ordinances. The one who complies will live. Paul had already dealt with Lev 18:5 in Gal 3:12. In both letters the emphasis in this verse falls on doing if one expects to gain life (cf. 2:13). The dark side of the picture is that a curse rests on anyone who fails to meet the law's demands. The upshot of the matter is that the course being pursued by Israel—the attempt to gain righteousness for themselves by keeping the law (v.3)—cannot bring life because of human weakness and imperfection. It can only lead to self-deception and pride.

Next Paul addresses himself to the positive approach, for which purpose he makes use of another passage from Moses (Dt 30:11–14), this one designed to describe "the righteousness that is by faith." At first sight, this passage seems inappropriate, since neither "righteousness" nor "faith" can be found here, and there is heavy emphasis on doing, as in Lev 18:5. But the context helps us, for the passage presupposes a heart attitude of loving obedience (Dt 30:6–10) rather than a legalistic attempt to attain righteousness. The whole burden of the passage is to discourage the idea that doing God's will means to aspire after something that is too difficult and out of reach. Actually, if life is attuned to God, his will is as near as the mouth and heart (the mouth as the organ that repeats the word of God and turn it back to him in prayer and praise; the heart as the source of desire to please him).

Paul then applies the reference to heaven (v.6) in order to emphasize certain aspects of the Gospel. There is no need to try to ascend to heaven to gain spiritual knowledge or acceptance, for Christ has come from heaven to proclaim and effect salvation for the world. In v.7 Paul substitutes "the deep" ("the abyss") for "the sea" in Dt 30, changing the figure from one of distance to one of depth—thus making the contrast with heaven sharper. This affords opportunity to think of Christ as going down into death as a prelude to resurrection. Apparently lost to us by death, he has been returned to us by resurrection. This means that our grasp of the righteousness of God, with his Son as the object of our faith, is not difficult. Everything is of him. Our part is to believe. The saving message lies at hand, waiting to be received.

9–10 Building on the Deuteronomy passage, especially its use of "mouth" and "heart," Paul goes on to speak directly of the content of the Christian Gospel and its availability to Jew and Gentile alike. "The word of faith" (the gospel message) is something to "confess" as well as to "believe" (cf. 2Co 4:13–14). To "confess" (GK 3933) means to say the same thing as other believers say regarding their faith. This was done within the Christian group especially by new converts in connection with their baptism; when it was done "before men" (Mt 10:32) it had an evangelizing function. The priority of confession over believing is simply due to Paul's preservation of the "mouth" and "heart" in Dt 30:14. The influence of the OT passage is also evident in that, whereas it provided a point of contact for citing the resurrection of our Lord (vv.7,9), there was nothing to provide a basis for mention of the saving death of Christ (contrast 1Co 15:3–4). The concentration on the resurrection is understandable also when it is recognized that the creedal statement before us pertains to the person of Christ rather than to his redeeming work. "Jesus is Lord [GK 3261]" was the earliest declaration of faith fashioned by the church (Ac 2:36; 1Co 12:3). It stressed the objective lordship of Christ, the very cornerstone for faith. Paul links his lordship with the resurrection, which in turn validated our Lord's saving death.

11–13 Scripture indicates how faith can be transforming for one's life, replacing fear and hesitation with bold confidence that rests on the sure promises of God. For this purpose Paul uses Isa 28:16 (cf. the close of 9:33). This belief and its blessing are open to Jew and Gentile alike. Whatever "difference" there may be in the two groups in some respects, there is no difference when it comes to the need for Christ and the availability of his salvation (cf. 3:22). The source of their spiritual life is found in "the same Lord," whose blessings (notably salvation) are richly bestowed on them without partiality. In support of this, Paul cites Joel 2:32 (cf. Peter's use of this verse in Ac 2:21). This calling on the Lord is the echo within the human heart of the call of God himself according to his gracious purpose (8:28–30). God will hear the cry of any who call upon him for salvation. When v.13 is compared with v.9, it becomes evident that the Lord of Joel 2:32 is being identified with the Lord Jesus Christ.

14–15 Paul now turns from the responsibility of the seeker after salvation to emphasize the role that believers have in God's plan for reaching the lost. Calling on the Lord is meaningless apart from some assurance that he is worthy of confidence and trust, that he has something to offer guilty sinners. Calling on the Lord continues to be a mark of the believer, not simply the first step in the direction of establishing relationship to him (cf. 1Co 1:2).

Paul then proceeds to the second consideration in his closely reasoned argument—that faith depends on knowledge. One must hear the Gospel before he or she can be expected either to receive it or reject it. The message of the Gospel has to be communicated by word of mouth to the hearing of others.

The third step is the necessity that someone proclaim the message. We are saved to serve, and the paramount element in that service is to bear witness to the saving power of Christ.

"And how can they preach except they be sent?" (v.15) rounds out Paul's series of questions. No answers are given, for the logic is so airtight that no one could properly question the essential role of each step in the process. To be "sent" (GK 690) suggests at least two things: that one operates under a higher authority and that one's message does not originate with oneself but is given by the sending authority. The OT prophets had been sent in these two respects. So was the Lord Jesus (Jn 3:34; 7:16;). The apostles also received their commission from the risen Lord (Jn 20:21; cf. Ro 1:1). All Christians are sent in these two respects in their witness-bearing capacity. The task was too big for just a handful of people (see Ac 8:4; 11:19). The sending out of missionaries by a sponsoring group of believers (Ac 13:3) is likewise included here.

Once again (v.15) Paul corroborates his words by the sayings of the prophets, this time using Isa 52:7, which heralds the favor of the Lord to the city of Jerusalem that had lain desolate during the Babylonian captivity. The tidings are good; the proclamation is one of peace. If the message to returning Israel in the former day was good news, how much more the promise of eternal salvation in God's Son!

16–17 But here an element of tragedy enters. The good news of physical restoration may have been welcome to Israel, but the spiritual salvation God promised to provide through his Servant and did provide in the fullness of time has met with unbelief. What a change of atmosphere from Paul's quotation of Isa 52:7 in v.15 to his quotation of Isa 53:1 in v.16! The prophet foresaw a repudiation of the message about salvation through a suffering Servant. History has sustained prophecy (1Co 1:23).

Paul sums up by saying that faith depends on hearing and understanding the message. "And the message is heard through the word of Christ." This can mean either "the word about Christ" or "the word proclaimed by Christ" (the former is more likely).

18–19 In his indictment of Israel, Paul is prepared to investigate any possibility that would offer an excuse for the nation's failure. Could it be, he asks, that they did not hear the Gospel? He could have appealed to widespread missionary activity, but he is content to cite Scripture, so that Israel may stand condemned by the testimony of God rather than by that of other people. In making use of Ps 19:4 (v.18), Paul sees a parallel between the diffusion of light and darkness every day and night, of which no one can be ignorant, and the proclamation of the Gospel in the areas where Jews made their home. This was essentially the Mediterranean basin, where Paul and his helpers had been laboring for some years. His countrymen could not claim lack of opportunity to hear the Gospel (cf. Ac 17:6; 21:28).

There remains the possibility, however, that in spite of hearing the message, Israel has not understood it (v.19). So in all fairness this should be considered. But the form in which Paul asks his question makes this highly unlikely. It is true that at Pentecost Peter spoke of the ignorance of his countrymen as explaining the crucifixion. But as time went on, fewer and fewer Jews in proportion to the total population of the nation responded to the Gospel. A hardened attitude was setting in. The precedent of the Jews who did respond to the Gospel, instead of moving their fellow Jews, only embittered them. Then, as the Gospel spread abroad and was received by Gentiles in ever greater numbers, this served to antagonize them still further.

It is over against this situation that Paul quotes Dt 32:21b, a part of Moses' song to Israel in which he chides the congregation for perversity and (in Dt 32:21a, not quoted here) voices the complaint of God that the people had provoked him to jealousy by their idolatry. This in turn prompts God to resort to something that is calculated to make Israel jealous. It will be done through "a nation that has no understanding." This must be understood of Gentile response to God and his word in such a way as to surpass the response of Israel—exactly what was happening during Paul's day. Those who lacked special revelation and the moral and religious training God provided for Israel have proved more responsive than the chosen people.

20–21 The quotation from Isa 65:1 clearly supports what has been declared in the previous passage (Dt 32:21). Paul sees in the OT an anticipation of what has come to pass in his day. The pagan world, occupied with its own pursuits, was in the main not seeking after God (cf. 9:30), but now they were. Paradoxically, God had been continually seeking and reaching out to his people Israel with a plea that they return to him in loving obedience, only to be rebuffed. Consequently, the spiritual condition of Israel did not come from a lack of opportunity to hear the Gospel or a lack of understanding of its content, but must be traced to a continuous pattern of a stubborn and rebellious spirit.

E. Israel Not Entirely Rejected; There Is a Remnant of Believers (11:1–10)

Thus far, Paul has treated the problem of Israel from two standpoints. In ch. 9 he emphasized the sovereignty of God in choosing this people for himself in a special sense. In ch. 10 he dealt with Israel's failure to respond to God's righteousness, ending with the verdict that they are "a disobedient and obstinate people" (10:21). These two presentations involve a serious tension. Will Israel's sin and stubbornness defeat the purpose of God, or will God find a way to deal effectively with the situation so as to safeguard his purpose? To this question Paul now turns. His answer will dip into Israel's past, encompass her present, and reveal her future.

1–6 Preparation for this section has been made, especially in 9:27–29, where the OT teaching concerning the remnant is summarized by quotations from Isaiah. That teaching involved both judgment and mercy—judgment on the nation as a whole for its infidelity and wickedness, and mercy on those who are permitted to escape the judgment and form the nucleus for a fresh start under the blessing of God.

The opening question, "Did God reject his people?" (based on Ps 94:14) requires that we keep in mind what was made clear early in the discussion—that "not all who are descended from Israel are Israel" (9:6). That the bulk of the nation proved disobedient (both in OT days and at the opening of the gospel period) does not mean rejection of "his people." Paul has in mind the remnant, as the ensuing paragraph demonstrates.

Why does Paul now inject himself into the discussion as a bona-fide Israelite (cf. Php 3:5)? He not only is certifying that he is able to handle the subject with fairness to Israel, but, sensing his prominence in the purpose of God, he cites himself as sufficient evidence to refute the charge that God had rejected Israel.

For God to reject his people would require repudiation of his deliberate, unilateral choice of Israel (for the meaning of "foreknew" in v.3, see comment on 8:29). The inference is that God could not do such a thing (v.2). But instead of dealing in abstractions, Paul turns to the OT for confirmation, to the time of Elijah. If ever there was a period of flagrant apostasy, it was during the reign of Ahab, when Jezebel promoted Baal worship throughout the land. The situation was so bad that Elijah, in his loneliness, cried to God against the killing of prophets and destruction of altars. He went so far as to assert that he was the only one left and that he was being hunted down so as to complete the destruction of God's servants (1Ki 19:10). Paul, likewise persecuted by his own countrymen, may have felt a special kinship with Elijah, and this also may help to account for his mention of himself in v.1.

The important thing is the contrast between the assertion of Elijah—"I am the only one left"—and God's reply: "I have reserved for myself seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal" (v.4). If in that dark hour such a goodly company of the faithful existed, this is sufficient evidence that God does not permit his own at any time to disappear completely. The sparing of the remnant is inseparably related to the choice of the remnant.

This parallel between the days of Elijah and Paul's own time suggests that when he wrote, the vast majority of Israel were resisting the Gospel and that, therefore, despite their claim of loyalty to God and the law, they had failed to move forward in terms of the climactic revelation in his Son. Those who had turned to Christ were only a remnant (v.5).

But the matter of numbers is not crucial. What is important is the reminder that irrespective of its size, the remnant is "chosen by grace." This element is brought out in the quotation "I have reserved for myself seven thousand" (v.4). It is also evident, though not expressed, that the existence of the church, far from being contrary to the will of God, is actually the present channel of the operation of his "grace" (GK 5921). Having mentioned grace at the end of v.5, the apostle cannot pass by the opportunity to contrast grace with works (v.6). They are mutually exclusive as the means of establishing one's relationship to God (cf. Eph 2:8–9).

7–10 Here Paul sets forth in the case of Israel according to the flesh the tragic consequences of persisting in the pattern of "works." Once again he cannot overlook Israel's "earnestly" seeking to get from God what they prized (see comment on 10:3). But the elect obtained righteousness not by works but by depending on divine grace. While this was true in the past, Paul's main emphasis is the present situation (cf. v.5). In distinction from the elect, Israel as a whole has become hardened. The comparison between present and past, already made on the favorable side between the current remnant according to the election of grace and the 7,000 in Elijah's time, is now projected to cover the dark aspects of the situation.

The failure of the bulk of Israel to attain divine righteousness and their being hardened is in line with OT history. Paul throws the weight of Scripture behind his presentation; by so doing he avoids having to speak on his own as bluntly and severely as the Word of God does. The first quotation weaves together Dt 29:4 and Isa 29:10 so as to provide illustrations from two periods. In Deuteronomy, it is the testimony of the eyes that is stressed: the people had seen the wonders of the Exodus and God's miracles in the wilderness, but from these experiences they did not derive a heart of loving trust in God. In Isaiah, the background is the faithful testimony of the prophets; yet the people shut their ears to the voice of God through these spokesmen. As a consequence, God sent them a "spirit of stupor." That involved a judicial punishment for their failure to use God-given faculties to perceive his manifested power and to glorify him (see Jn 12:39–40).

Before leaving v.7, something should be said on the word "hardened" (GK 4800), especially since it is not the same word as the term used in 9:18. It is a strong word, suggesting petrification and permanent bluntness and insensibility in the intelligence.

David's word of imprecation in Ps 69:22–23 follows (vv.9–10). David suffered reproach and torment from his enemies, who were also viewed as the enemies of the Lord. Apparently their feasts were times for special outbreaks of blasphemy. David prays that the Lord will make their table their snare so as to entrap them. Then he prays for the darkening of the eyes that have looked with complacency and even glee at the sufferings of the one whom God has permitted to be smitten (cf. Jn 2:17; 15:25; Ac 1:20, which also quote Ps 69). One problem arises regarding the final word of the quotation, "forever." It is best to understand this word as "continually," for in the following section, Israel's obduracy and rejection are not treated as lasting indefinitely, but as giving way to a great ingathering of repentant Israel.

F. Israel's Temporary Rejection and the Salvation of Gentiles (11:11–24)

Paul now turns from the remnant to consider Israel as a whole, insisting that her rejection is not final and that during the period when the nation continues to resist the divine plan centered in the Messiah, God is active in bringing salvation to the Gentiles. The figure of the olive tree emphasizes that Gentile salvation is dependent on Israel's covenant relationship to God; Gentiles have to be grafted into the olive tree. The purpose of this Gentile influx into the church is not merely to magnify the grace of God toward outsiders, but to evoke envy on the part of Israel as a factor in leading to her ultimate return to God as a people. This in turn prepares the way for the climax in vv.25–27.

11–12 A dark picture of Israel has been painted both from the OT and from present observation. This leads naturally to an inquiry: Is this hardening a hopeless situation? Are they doomed to stumble so as to fall and rise no more? "Not at all!" The stumbling is admitted; an irreparable fall is not. This is a broad hint of the future salvation of Israel that Paul goes on to affirm. Those who stumbled are "the others" of v.7, those not included in the believing remnant. The language recalls the indirect reference to the Messiah in 9:32–33 as the stumbling stone.

God is bringing good out of apparent evil. Israel's stumbling has opened the way for Gentile salvation on such a scale as to make Israel envious (cf. Ac 13:42–47). That envy, though it may involve bitterness, will ultimately contribute to drawing the nation to her Messiah. The longer the process goes on, the more unbearable the pressure on Israel becomes. Her transgression "means riches for the world."

A word should be said about "loss" (v.12; GK 2488). This is a military figure. An army loses a battle because of heavy casualties. In other words, as surely as Israel's defeat (identified with her stumbling) has brought the riches of God's grace to the Gentiles on a large scale, so the conversion of Israel to her Messiah (v.26) will bring even greater blessing to the world. The word "fullness" (GK 4445) refers to that conversion, meaning the full complement in contrast to the remnant. It will mark an end to the state of hardening that now characterizes the nation.

13–16 This paragraph follows naturally from the preceding, because Paul now applies to his own position and ministry the truth he has stated. He wants the Gentiles in the Roman church to catch the full import of what he is saying. They have looked on him as "the apostle to the Gentiles." Very well, but they must not suppose that he has lost sight of the need to witness to Israel. His work among Gentiles is not simply as an end in itself but is a means of reaching his countrymen (cf. v.11). The salvation of the Gentiles is for the sake of God's election of Israel, of whom Paul hopes thereby to save "some" (cf. 1Co 9:22). The word "some" suggests that he does not expect his efforts will bring about the actual eschatological turning of the nation to the crucified and risen Son of God, when "all Israel will be saved" (cf. v.26). This belongs to the indefinite future. But if God could turn him around, a proud Jew who bitterly set himself against Jesus as the Christ, surely through him others can be won. These others are the "firstfruits" (the "remnant"; cf. v.5), who contain in themselves the promise of the ultimate harvest of a nation of believers (v.16).

There is some difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of "life from the dead" (v.15). In order to retain the balance of the sentence, this expression must pertain to the world (cf. the structure of v.12). Perhaps Paul is suggesting the promise of a worldwide quickening and deepening of spiritual life when Israel is restored to divine fellowship. She will become a tonic to the nations that are to be saved.

There is a difficulty in understanding the final statement: "if the root is holy, so are the branches." Paul uses "root" in anticipation of his use of this word in the following verses to refer to the historic Israel, especially to its patriarchal foundation (see vv.17–24; cf. the use of "building" in 1Co 3:10 anticipating 3:11–15). Israel's future restoration conforms with the holy character impressed on them at its beginning.

17–24 Paul now expands the figures of root and branches by setting forth the allegory of the olive tree. Actually, there are two trees, the cultivated olive and the wild olive. Israel is the cultivated olive, the Gentiles the wild olive. The breaking off of some of the branches of the former and the grafting in some of the branches of the latter represent the present partial rejection of Israel and the corresponding reception of the Gentiles. From this presentation two lessons are drawn. (1) Paul warns the Gentile Christians of the danger of repeating the sin of the Jews—boasting of their privileged position (vv.18–21). (2) Even more important, if God, by cutting off the branches of the natural olive, has made room for Gentile believers, how much easier will it be for him to restore the natural branches to their place in the cultivated olive (vv.23–24)! So the groundwork is laid for the next stage in the argument. God is not only able to do this; he will do it (vv.25–27).

By stating that only some of the branches have been broken off (v.17), Paul inserts a reminder of the fact that Israel's rejection is not complete (cf. v.5). The "others" are the Jewish Christians who rub shoulders with Gentile believers in the church. Both depend on the "olive root," the patriarchal base established by God's covenant (cf 4:11–12). This calls to mind Eph 2:11–22, where Paul writes that the Gentiles, once aliens and foreigners, are now "fellow citizens with God's people and members of God's household." The two have been made one in Christ.

"Do not boast over those branches" (v.18)—i.e., the broken-off branches of vv.17, 19. The temptation to boast must have been considerable, a kind of anti-Semitism that magnified the sin of the nation Israel in rejecting the Lord Jesus and saw in Jewish persecution of the church a sure token of an irreparable rift between the nation and her God. But Israel's plight is not to be traced to a change of attitude on the part of God toward her. It is due simply to her unbelief, a condition noted earlier (3:3). The reason Gentile believers have a standing with God is that they have responded to the Gospel in faith, the very thing that Israel has failed to do. The current Gentile prominence in the church was made possible by the rejection of the Gospel on the part of the nation of Israel as a whole. Let Gentile Christians beware. Their predominance in the Christian community may not last!

"Kindness and sternness" (v.22) are aspects of the divine nature, the latter experienced by Israel in her present condition, the former being the portion of Gentile believers. But the positions can be reversed, and if this occurs, it will not be due to any fickleness in God, but to the nature of the human response. Once Israel's unbelief is put away, God is prepared to graft her branches in again (v.23).

Paul's concluding observation (v.24) has a double value. It helps to explain the curious circumstance that his illustration of the olive tree does not follow the pattern of grafting ordinarily found in the ancient Mediterranean world but is in fact the reverse of it. Paul grants that his allegory is "contrary to nature." Normally, a tame olive branch was grafted into the stem of a wild olive tree. Furthermore, one would not expect that the natural branches, after being broken off, will ever be grafted in again. Paul's argument is that if the hard thing, the thing contrary to nature—i.e., the grafting of wild branches into the cultivated olive—has been accomplished, one should not find it difficult to believe that God will restore the broken-off branches of the cultivated olive to their former position. Since in tree culture this would be impossible because of the deadness of the branches after they were removed, Paul is indeed talking "contrary to nature." But he rests his case not on nature but on God's being "able" to do it. With God nothing is impossible. The branches that will be grafted in are not of course identical with those that were broken off, but they are the same in two respects: their Israelite heritage and the attitude of unbelief they have maintained in the past. Then both Jews and Gentiles will share together the blessings of God's grace in Christ.

G. Israel's Future Salvation (11:25–32)

This is the crowning feature of the discussion, the outcome of everything that chs. 9–11 have been pointing to. The same mercy that has overtaken the Gentiles who were formerly disobedient will finally overtake the now disobedient Israel.

25 Now Paul speaks of a "mystery" (GK 3696), lest his readers imagine that either he or they are capable of understanding the course of Israel's history simply by observation and insight. The term "mystery" refers to the activity of God in salvation history, once hidden (16:25), but now made known to his people by revelation. The content of this mystery embraces Israel's present hardening—which is "in part" because the believing remnant constitutes an exception and because the hardening is limited in duration, lasting only "until the full number of the Gentiles has come in." But it also embraces the salvation of "all Israel" that follows.

26–27 The expression, "all Israel," when taken in the light of the context, is the climax of this entire section. It must be understood to mean the nation Israel as a whole, in contrast to the present situation when only a remnant has trusted Christ for salvation. The language does not require us to hold that when this final ingathering of Israel occurs, every living Israelite will be included, but only that Israel as a nation will be saved.

Not all interpreters agree, however, on this meaning of "all Israel." Some insist that it means the entire company of the redeemed, both Jew and Gentile. But "Israel" has not been used of Gentiles at all in these chapters, and it is doubtful that such is the case here. Paul has used "Israel" for the nation or the godly portion of it (cf. 9:6). To be sure, Gentiles are included in the seed of Abraham (4:11–12), and this concept is applicable to the church at the present time. But he is speaking here of something to be fulfilled in the future. Clearly "all Israel" stands over against "part" of Israel by way of contrast.

Does our passage throw light on the time when Israel's national conversion is to be expected? Not in terms of "that day or hour" (Mt 24:36), but rather in terms of the time when the full number of the Gentiles has come in (v.25). The "so" (v.26) is apparently intended to correlate with "until" (v.25), thereby acquiring temporal force, such as "when that has happened."

The declaration concerning the future of Israel is now confirmed by citing Isa 59:20–21 and 27:9. While there are problems of exact correspondence with these OT passages, Paul's use of them implies that Israel's conversion will occur at Messiah's return, when he will come out of Zion, i.e., from the heavenly Jerusalem (cf. Gal 4:26; Heb 12:22). It is hard to account for the wholesale conversion of Israel in any other way, since the activity of the Spirit of God has not produced any such mass movement of Israel during the course of this age. Paul possibly sensed a certain parallel between his own conversion and the future conversion of his people as a whole. Christ revealed himself to him directly, sweeping away his rationalizations and his self-righteousness; some day he will do the same for the nation.

The effect on Israel is not couched in terms of material prosperity or martial invincibility, but purely in spiritual terms, in the forsaking of godlessness and the removal of sins by the Lord God. The reference to covenant suggests that Jer 31:31–34 was also in Paul's mind.

28–29 Even though the condition of the Israelites is presently considered by God as those who are enemies for the sake of the Gentiles, yet all the time, when viewed from the standpoint of their national election, they are loved of God for the sake of the fathers (cf. v.16). God's promises are irrevocable, and time will prove it. "God's gifts" are doubtless the special privileges of Israel mentioned in 9:4–5. These bear witness to the reality of the calling—the summons of Israel to a unique place in the purpose of God.

30–32 God's purpose must be implemented if it is to be effective. His mercy is the needed factor. Paul is addressing his Gentile readers here. In fact, the "you" is emphatic, as though to remind Gentile believers (who might be prone to think it strange that God has a glorious future in store for Israel) that they themselves were formerly disobedient toward God. It was Jewish disobedience in regard to the Gospel that opened the gates of mercy for them.

Again, to warn the Gentiles against being inflated over their present position in grace, Paul reminds his readers (v.31) that it was the very mercy received by the Gentiles that made the Jews more firm in their disobedience. Yet God has not given up on his chosen people, but keeps in view his plan for their salvation and extends his mercy. The second "now" in v.31 is somewhat perplexing in the light of the eschatological emphasis in vv.26–27. It may refer to the present salvation of the remnant, or it may include the future along with the present and so anticipate the ultimate salvation of the nation. The conclusion of the whole matter is that God has magnified his mercy by the very fact of disobedience, binding all people over to it (cf. 3:9) that he might have mercy on all. So disobedience does not have the last word (cf. Gal 3:22).

H. Praise to God for His Wisdom and His Ways (11:33–36)

33–36 In view of the assurance generated by v.32, it is no wonder that Paul, despite his burden for the Israel of his day, is able to lift his heart in adoring praise to God. We are reminded of Isa 55, where the ungodly and sinful are urged to return to the Lord and find mercy, for God's thoughts and ways are not human but are infinitely higher and better. Instead of being vindictive, God is gracious. His plans defy the penetration of the human mind and his ways surpass the ability of any person to trace them out. The Lord has not been obliged to lean upon another person for advice (v.34). He has not had to depend on human assistance that would make him indebted to people (v.35). He is the source, the means, and the goal of all things (v.36).

While this exalted and moving ascription of praise has in view God's plans and operations in the history of salvation affecting both Jews and Gentiles, the closing verse applies also to the individual life that pleases God. For the life of every believer has its source in God, lives by his resources, and returns to him when its course has been run. To God be the glory!

VII. Our Spiritual Service: The Practice of Righteousness (12:1–15:13)

A distinct break in the train of thought occurs as Paul moves from 11:36 to 12:1. His theological exposition centering around the problem as to how sinful humanity can be put into a right relationship with God is over. But more must be said, because after we have been made right with our Maker, we need to know what difference this makes in our relations with other people, what God expects of us, and how we should apply our new resources to all the situations. This last main section of Romans is designed to meet these needs (cf. Eph 4:1). It is notable that the key word "righteousness," which until now has dominated the book, occurs only once in the closing chapters (14:17; see comment). Paul's exhortations include both commands and prohibitions and are spread over various areas of application: Christian conduct toward fellow believers, toward society (especially in meeting hostile reactions), and toward the state.

A. The Appeal for Dedication of the Believer (12:1–2)

This introductory portion is a prelude to the discussion of specific duties of believers. It sets forth the fundamental obligations we must meet before being prepared to face the challenge of living as believers in this world.

1 "Therefore" establishes a connection with the entire foregoing presentation in this letter. It particularly relates to 6:13, 19, as a comparison of the terminology will show. The apostle begins by urging his readers instead of simply instructing them ("urge" lies between commanding and beseeching). "Mercy" (GK 3880) denotes that quality in God that moved him to deliver sinners from their state of sin and misery and therefore underlies his saving activity in Christ. It serves here as the leverage for the appeal that follows. Whereas the heathen are prone to sacrifice in order to obtain mercy, biblical faith teaches that the divine mercy provides the basis for a life of sacrifice as the fitting response.

Since the milieu of thought is so similar to ch. 6, it is natural to conclude that "bodies" (GK 5393) here include both the person (the volition of the one making the dedication) and the bodily powers that are thus set apart for God's use. In Greek thought the body was considered the receptacle containing the soul, but this was not the Hebraic concept, which viewed the human being as a unit. Thus Paul is not urging the dedication of the body as an entity distinct from the inner self; rather, he views the body as the vehicle that implements the desires and choices of the redeemed spirit. Through the body we serve God.

The words "offer" and "sacrifices" are cultic terms (cf. 15:16). Before a priest in Israel could minister on behalf of others, he had to present himself in a consecrated state and the sacrifices he offered were to be without blemish (Mal 1:8–13). "Holy" (GK 41) is a reminder of that necessity for the Christian, not in terms of rite or ritual but as renouncing the sins of the old life and being committed to a life of obedience to the divine will (cf. 6:19). The body is not evil in itself; if it were, God would not ask that it be offered to him. As an instrument, it is capable of expressing either sin or righteousness. If we do the latter, then we give an offering "pleasing to God." The word "living" may glance by way of contrast to the animal sacrifices of the OT, which, when offered, no longer possessed life. But it is also a reminder that spiritual life, received from God in the new birth, is the presupposition of a sacrifice acceptable to him. Christian sacrifice has in view a total life of service to God. In Israel the whole burnt offering ascended to God and could never be reclaimed. It belonged to God.

Next, the living sacrifice is equated with "spiritual worship." While the exact sense is difficult to determine, the main idea is that the sacrifice we render to God is intelligent and deliberate, in contrast to the sacrifices of the Jewish worship in which the animals had no part in determining what was to be done with them. "Worship" (GK 3301) is perhaps too narrow a translation, for in the strict sense worship is adoration of God, which does not fit well with the concept of "bodies." The term "service" (KJV) has an advantage, since it covers the entire range of a Christian's life and activity (cf. Dt 10:12). Serving God is the proper sequel to worship.

2 The dedicated life is also the transformed life. Whereas v.1 called for a decisive commitment, v.2 deals with the maintenance of that commitment. We must be continually vigilant lest our original decision to serve God is vitiated or weakened. The threat comes from "this world" (GK 172), whose ways and thoughts can so easily impinge on the child of God. Believers have been delivered from this present evil age (Gal 1:4), which has Satan for its god (2Co 4:4), and they live by the powers of the age to come (Heb 6:5). But their heavenly calling includes residence in this world, among sinful people, where they must show forth the praises of him who called them out of darkness into God's marvelous light (1Pe 2:9). They are in the world for witness, not for conformity to that which is a passing phenomenon (1Co 7:31).

Complementary to the refusal to be conformed to the pattern of this world is the command to be "transformed" (GK 3565). These two processes of renunciation and renewal are going on all the time. Our pattern is Christ, who refused Satan's solicitations in his temptation and was transfigured in his acceptance of the path that led to Calvary (Mk 9:2–3). As his mission could be summarized in the affirmation that he had come to do the Father's will (Jn 6:38), so the Christian's service can be reduced to this simple description. But we must "test and approve," refusing the norms of conduct employed by the sinful world and reaffirming for ourselves spiritual norms befitting the redeemed. Aiding this process is "the renewing of your mind"; i.e., believers must keep going back in their thoughts to their original commitment and reaffirm its necessity and legitimacy in the light of God's grace extended to them. In this activity the working of the Holy Spirit is important (cf. Tit 3:5). Believers are not viewed as ignorant of God's will, but as needing to avoid blurring its outline by failure to renew the mind continually (cf. Eph 5:8–10). Dedication leads to discernment and discernment to delight in God's will. An intimate connection between certifying the will of God and making oneself a living sacrifice is demonstrated by the use of "pleasing" in each case (cf. Php 4:18; Heb 13:16).

B. Varied Ministries in the Church, the Body of Christ (12:3–8)

3 The will of God (v.2) is identical for all believers in respect to holiness of life and completeness of dedication. But what that will involves for each one with respect to special service in the church may be considerably diverse. Since God also calls for individual application in a Christian's life, the apostle must remind his readers of his authority to expound this subject even though he is unknown to most of them and their gifts are unknown to him (cf. 1:5; Gal 2:9; Eph 3:7). But this reminder is not intended to erect a barrier between himself and them, because what he has by way of authority and teaching ability is traced to divine grace, the same grace that has bestowed spiritual gifts on them.

In addressing himself deliberately to "every one of you," Paul grants that every believer has some spiritual gift (cf. v.6; 1Pe 4:10). But his primary goal in getting their attention in this regard is to drive home the necessity of appropriating and using their gifts with utmost humility. After all, God did not have to spread his gifts around so lavishly. Paul recognizes the danger that the possession of a particular gift can easily result in pride (v.3; cf. his experience with the Corinthian church, 1Co 12:14–31; 13:4; 14:12, 20). He equates humility with "sober judgment," in contrast to thinking of oneself more highly than one should (cf. also v.16). Obviously, there is less danger of a person's depreciating himself than of exaggerating one's own importance.

Is there some gauge that will enable a person to estimate his or her position with respect to spiritual gifts? Paul answers in the affirmative, pointing to "the measure of faith." "Faith" (GK 4411) here, as elsewhere in Paul, is that which a Christian exercises; it is subjective rather than objective. One's faith should provide the basis for a true estimation of oneself, since it reveals that each believer is dependent on the saving mercy of God. That, in turn, ought to induce humility.

4–5 To offset the danger of individualistic thinking with its resulting danger of pride, Paul refers to the human body—an illustration familiar from his earlier use of it in 1Co 12:12ff. Three truths are set forth: the unity of the body; the diversity of its members, with corresponding diversity in function; and the mutuality of the various members—"each member belongs to all the others." The third item calls attention to the need of the various parts of the body for each other. None can work independently. Furthermore, each member profits from what the other members contribute to the whole. Reflection on these truths reduces preoccupation with one's own gift and makes room for appreciation of other people and their gifts.

Personal Gifts of the Holy Spirit

Gift	Definition	General References	Specific Examples
Message of wisdom	An utterance from the Holy Spirit applying God's Word or wisdom to a specific situation	Ac 6:3; 1Co 12:8; 13:2, 9, 12	Stephen: Ac 6:10 James: Ac 15:13–21
Message of knowledge	An utterance from the Holy Spirit revealing knowledge about people, circumstances or Biblical truth	Ac 10:47–48; 13:2; 15:7–11; 1Co 12:8; 13:2, 9, 12; 14:25	Peter: Ac 5:9–10
Faith	Supernatural faith imparted by the Holy Spirit, enabling a Christian to believe God for the miraculous	Mt 21:21–22; Mk 9:23–24; 11:22–24; Lk 17:6; Ac 3:1–8; 6:5–8; 1Co 12:9; 13:2; Jas 5:14–15	A centurion: Mt 8:5–10 A sick woman: Mt 9:20–22 Two blind men: Mt 9:27–29 A Canaanite woman: Mt 15:22–28 A sinful woman: Lk 9:36–50 A leper: Lk 17:11–19
Healing and miraculous powers	Restoring someone to physical health or altering the course of nature by divinely supernatural means	Mt 4:23–24; 8:16; 9:35; 10:1, 8; Mk 1:32–34; 6:13; 16:18; Lk 4:40–41; 9:1–2; Jn 6:2; 14:12; Ac 4:30; 5:15–16; 19:11–12; Ro 15:19; 1Co 12:9, 28, 30; 2 Co 12:12; Gal 3:5	Jesus: see chart on THE MIRACLES OF JESUS Apostles: see chart on THE MIRACLES OF THE APOSTLES
Prophecy	A special temporary ability to bring a word, warning, exhortation or revelation from God under the impulse of the Holy Spirit	Lk 12:12; Ac 2:17–18; 1Co 12:10; 13:9; 14:1–33; Eph 4:11; 1Th 5:20–21; 2Pe 1:20–21; 1Jn 4:1–3	Elizabeth: Lk 1:40–45 Mary: Lk 1:46–55 Zechariah: Lk 1:67–79 Peter: Ac 2:14–40; 4:8–12 Twelve men from Ephesus: Ac 19:6 Four daughters of Philip: Ac 21:9 Agabus: Ac 11:27-28; 21:10–11
Distinguishing between spirits	Special ability to judge whether prophecies and utterances are from the Holy Spirit	1Co 12:10; 14:29	Peter: Ac 8:18–24 Paul: Ac 13:8–12; 16:16–18
Speaking in tongues	Expressing oneself at the level of one's spirit under the direct influence of the Holy Spirit in a language he or she has not learned and does not know	1Co 12:10, 28, 30; 13:1; 14:1–40	Disciples: Ac 2:4–11 Cornelius and his family: Ac 10:44–45; 11:17 Ephesian believers: Ac 19:2–7 Paul: 1Co 14:6, 15, 18
Interpretation of tongues	Special ability to interpret what is spoken in tongues	1Co 12:10, 30; 14:5, 13, 26–28

6–8 "We have different gifts [GK 5922]." Paul is not referring to gifts in the natural realm, but to those functions made possible by a specific enablement of the Holy Spirit granted to believers (though, of course, such a gift may build on one's natural gift). The variety in gifts should be understood from the standpoint of the needs of the Christian community, which are many, as well as from the desirability of giving every believer a share in ministry. With his eye still on the danger of pride, Paul reminds his readers that these new capacities for service are not native to those who exercise them but come from divine grace (cf. also 1Co 12:6; Eph 4:7; 1Pe 4:10).

Although Paul has spoken of different gifts, he does not proceed to give an exhaustive list (cf. 1Co 12:27–28). Rather, he emphasizes the need for exercising the gifts and for exercising them in the right way—"in proportion to [one's] faith." He uses this specific expression only in connection with prophesying, but there is no reason to suppose it is not intended to apply to the other items as well. What is meant by this phrase (v.6)? The most satisfactory explanation is that "faith" retains the subjective force it has in v.3 and that the whole phrase has the same thrust as "measure of faith" there. A prophet is not to be governed by emotions (1Co 14:32) or by love of speaking (1Co 14:30) but by dependence on the Spirit of God.

Paul does not define "prophesying" (GK 4735) here, but if we are to judge from the earlier reference to it in 1Co 14:3, 31, the nature of that gift is primarily the communication of revealed truth that both convicts and builds up the hearers. This gift is prominent in the other listings of gifts (1Co 12:28; Eph 4:11), where prophets are second only to apostles. That Paul says nothing of apostles in this passage may be a hint that no apostle, Peter included, had anything to do with the founding of the Roman church.

"Serving" is a broad term. The Greek word diakonia (GK 1355) is sometimes used of the ministry of the word to unbelievers (Ac 6:4; 2Co 5:18), but the gifts in this passage seem intentionally restricted in their exercise in the body of Christ. Despite its place between prophesying and teaching, the narrower meaning of service as ministration to the material needs of believers is probable here (such as that provided by deacons). It may be compared to the gift of "those able to help others" (1Co 12:28).

The gift of "teaching" (Gk 1436) is mentioned next. It differs from prophesying in that it was not characterized by ecstatic utterance as the vehicle for revelation given by the Spirit (cf. 1Co 14:6, where it is paired with knowledge). Probably the aim in teaching was to give help in the area of Christian living rather than formal instruction in doctrine, even though it must be granted that the latter is needed as a foundation for the former. Paul himself gives a notable example of teaching in vv.9–21. His considerable use of the OT in this section suggests that early Christian teachers were largely dependent on it for their instruction.

"Encouraging" (paraklesis; GK 4155) has a variety of meanings; only the context can indicate whether to render it "encouragement" (Ac 15:31), "exhortation" (1Ti 4:13), or "comfort." Assuredly some encouragement could be included, but exhortation seems to be the dominant meaning here.

"Contributing to the needs of others" has to do with spontaneous private benevolence (cf. 1Jn 3:17–18). This is not intended as a repetition of serving (v.7), thus favoring the view that the latter activity belongs to the public distribution of aid by the church to its needy. The only doubt concerning this interpretation resides in the word "generously," which KJV rightly translates as "simplicity" (i.e., with singleness of heart, free of mixed motives). That wrong motivation can enter into giving is shown by the account of the sin of Ananias and Sapphira in Ac 5.

"Leadership" (GK 4613) translates a word that means to stand before others, so the idea of governing derives readily from it (cf. 1Th 5:12; 1Ti 3:4–5; 5:17). This gift should be carried out "diligently." Even in church life some people are tempted to enjoy the office rather than use it as an avenue for service.

"Showing mercy" (GK 1796) does not pertain to the area of forgiveness or sparing judgment. Rather, it has to do with ministering to the sick and needy. This is to be done in a cheerful, spontaneous manner that convey blessing rather than engender self-pity.

C. Principles Governing Christian Conduct (12:9–21)

Paul presupposes the dedicated life, which enables one to discover and demonstrate the will of God. Relationship to fellow Christians is treated first (vv.9–13), then the stance to be assumed toward those who are outside the church (vv.14–21).

9–10 "Love" (GK 27) is primary, but if it is not sincere, it is not real love but only pretense. In 1 Corinthians Paul paused in his discussion of spiritual gifts to inject a chapter on love (1Co 13); thus it is fitting that he should follow his presentation of spiritual gifts here in Romans with the same emphasis. The whole conduct of believers should be bathed in love. Failure to love our fellow Christians casts doubt on our professed love for God (1Jn 4:19–21).

Love readily suggests purity. The two are found together in God, who is of too pure eyes to behold evil (Hab 1:13) and cannot be tempted by it (Jas 1:13). Hatred of evil therefore readily follows love. To "cling to what is good" (v.9) is to be wedded to it. Total commitment leaves neither time nor inclination to court evil.

In v.10, the apostle puts love in a living context. It must be shown to people, not lavished on a principle. He uses a special term here denoting "brotherly love" (GK 5789). "Devoted" is appropriate, since it customarily denotes the family tie. Believers are members of the family of God.

"Honor one another above yourselves" (v.10). To "honor" (GK 5507) is to accord recognition and show appreciation. This is based not on some personal attractiveness or usefulness but rather on the fact that every Christian has Christ in the heart and can express him through one's own individuality. We honor God when we recognize his transforming work in our lives. If the according of such honor seems to diminish the recognition of what God has done in our own lives, the problem is readily solved by the example of the Son's exalting of God the Father despite the Son's equality with him (Jn 10:30; Php 2:4–6).

11–12 Paul now momentarily directs our attention to the Lord and our service to him before returning to the horizontal relationship within the body of Christ (v.13). After converts have experienced the initial glow and ardor of Christian life there is often danger of slipping back into a deadening spiritual inertia. To counter this, the apostle urges diligent endeavor fed by fervency of spirit. The lack of such fire brought down a rebuke from the Lord on the Laodicean church (Rev 3:15–16). The Lord calls us to serve him with our best. Such service arouses hope in us, tinged with joy, of seeing Jesus in his glory and of being united with him (1Pe 1:7–8). This hope sustains us as his servants, enabling us to be "patient in affliction" (cf. 5:3–4). At this point, Paul's mention of prayer is natural, since it is our great resource when we are under stress and strain.

13 Even under persecution we should not allow ourselves to be so preoccupied with our own troubles that we become insensitive to the needs of other believers. To share our earthly goods with others is never more meaningful than when people are hard pressed to find sufficient supplies for themselves. When this sharing takes place under one's own roof, it is labeled "hospitality" (lit., "love for strangers"; GK 5810). The word "practice" is strong (lit., "pursue"; GK 1503), calling for an undiminished ardor in extending this courtesy to traveling believers. The Lord had encouraged his disciples to depend on such kindness during their mission (Mt 10:11). Without hospitality, the spread of the Gospel during the days of the early church would have been greatly impeded. With it, the "church in the house" became a reality (16:23; cf.16:5). What sanctified this practice above all was the realization that in receiving and entertaining travelers, those who opened their doors and their hearts were receiving and entertaining Christ (Mt 10:40; 25:40).

14–16 The material in these verses seems to describe a Christian's relations to one's neighbors and friends (including believers), preceded by one reference to their opponents (v.14, anticipating vv.17ff.).

Paul's injunction to bless persecutors rather than curse them undoubtedly goes back to our Lord's teaching (Mt 5:44; Lk 6:28). The teaching was incarnated in the Savior himself and became clearly manifested during his trial and his suffering on the cross. Persecution can take various forms, stretching from verbal abuse and social ostracism to the use of violence resulting in death. Some form of persecution was so common in the experience of the early church that Paul can assume as a matter of course that his readers will suffer it. If such treatment is not encountered in our society, we can at least cultivate the readiness to meet it and so fulfill the injunction in spirit. To bless one's persecutors involves praying for their forgiveness and for a change of outlook regarding the Christian faith. It can be done only by the grace of Christ.

One charge follows another without any apparent connection as Paul calls on his readers to share one another's joys and sorrows (v.15; cf. 1Co 12:26). It has often been noted that it is easier to fulfill the second half of this command than the first, because our natural inclination is to feel genuine sympathy for those in sorrow, but to share their joy may present difficulty if another's achievement or good fortune is viewed with envy. In general, people have less need for fellowship in times of joy than in times of grief, for if loneliness is added to sorrow, the trial is compounded.

Living "in harmony with one another" (v.16; cf. Php 2:2) dispels discord in the church. As a means to attaining this harmony, Paul stresses the necessity of rejecting the temptation to think superior thoughts about oneself and of coming down off the perch of isolation and mingling with people "of low position" or of a humble frame of mind. And lest one consent to do this while still retaining heady notions of one's own superiority, Paul puts in a final thrust: "Don't be conceited" (v.16). Conceit has no place in the life ruled by love (1Co 13:4).

17–21 Paul takes his stand alongside believers by giving them explicit counsel about how to face the hostile world. "Do not repay evil for evil" (v.17), for to do so would be to follow the inclination of the sinful human nature. The remainder of v.17 means that believers are constantly under the scrutiny of unsaved people as well as of fellow Christians, and they must be careful that their conduct does not betray the high standards of the Gospel (cf. Col 4:5; 1Ti 3:7). Each situation that holds prospect for a witness to the world should be weighed so that the action taken will not bring unfavorable reflection on the Gospel.

The charge to "live at peace with everyone" is hedged about with two qualifying statements. "If it be possible" suggests that there are instances in human relations when the strongest desire for concord will not avail. If disharmony and conflict should come, however, we should accept the responsibility for resolving it. Believers may not be able to persuade the other party, but they can at least refuse to be the instigator of trouble. God wants us to be peacemakers (Mt 5:9).

This peace-loving attitude may be costly, however, because some will want to take advantage of it, figuring that Christian principles will not permit the wronged party to retaliate. In such a case, what is to be done? The path of duty is clear: We are not to take vengeance, for vengeance trespasses on the province of God, the great Judge of all. We must "leave room for God's wrath" (v.19), trusting that he will take care of the situation. He will not be too lenient or too severe. Here Paul quotes Dt 32:35, whose context indicates that the Lord will intervene to vindicate his people when their enemies abuse them and gloat over them.

Paul does not suggest that God's wrath will be visited on the wrongdoer immediately. On the contrary, the hope is that those who have perpetrated the wrong will have a change of heart, will be convicted of their sin, and will be won over by the refusal of the Christian to retaliate (v.20). Here again Paul lets the OT speak for him (Pr 25:21–22). "Burning coals" are best understood as the burning pangs of shame and guilt. There is, of course, no definite promise at this point that offenders will be converted. By going the second mile and showing unexpected kindness, believers may also spare their companions from having the same experience. In that measure, society has benefited.

Guidance on the problem of coping with evil reaches its climax in the final admonition: "Do not be overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good" (v.21). Being overcome by evil means to give in to the temptation to meet evil with evil, to retaliate. To overcome evil with good has been illustrated in v.20. The world's philosophy leads people to expect retaliation when they have wronged another. To receive kindness, to see love when it seems uncalled for, can melt the hardest heart.

D. The Duty of Submission to Civil Authority (13:1–7)

This is the most notable passage in the NT on Christian civic responsibility. It probably reflects the famous saying of Jesus: "Give to Caesar what is Caesar's, and to God what is God's" (Mt 22:21). That Paul lived in conformity with his own teaching is apparent from his relation to various rulers as recorded in Acts. Because he realized that this subject had a definite bearing on the spread of the Gospel (cf. 1Ti 2:1–7), he saw its relevance to the theme of salvation and included it here in Romans. These verses are an expansion and special application of the teaching about good and evil (12:17, 21) and living "at peace with everyone" (12:18). The word "wrath" (GK 3973) in 12:19 seems to anticipate the same Greek word in 13:5 (translated "punishment" in NIV).

More important, however, is the broader connection in terms of thought. (1) There is the natural connection with 12:1–2, where the foundation is laid for Christian service in its various ramifications. The believer's relation to the state is one of those areas. (2) Another possible connection is with chs. 9–11; Paul may be intent on warning the Roman church, which contained some Christian Jews as well as Gentile believers who sympathized with them over the plight of their nation, not to identify with any revolutionary movement advocating rebellion against Rome. As is well known, Jews had been expelled from Rome by Claudius (see comment on Ac 18:2), and it is possible that the Jews who later returned to Rome (including some Christian Jews) were hostile toward the state because of the way Claudius had treated them. These needed to be mollified.

1 The teaching in this section is addressed to "everyone," i.e., every believer. What Paul requires is to "submit" (GK 5718) to those who ruled from Rome. Submission means placing oneself under someone else. Paul seems to avoid using the stronger word "obey" (cf. also v.5), probably because believers may find it impossible to comply with every demand of the government. A circumstance may arise in which they must choose between obeying God and obeying people (Ac 5:29). But even then they must be submissive in that, if their Christian convictions do not permit their compliance, they will accept the consequences of such refusal.

Paul makes a sweeping statement when he says, "There is no authority except that which God has established." This is true even of Satan: what authority he exercises has been given him by God (cf. Lk 4:6). The name of Christ does not appear anywhere in the passage, probably because Paul's concern is not with redemption or the life of the church as such, but with one's relation to the state. While Christians have citizenship in heaven (Php 3:20), they are not excused from responsibility to acknowledge the state as possessing authority from God to govern him. They hold a dual citizenship.

2 Those who refuse submission are rebelling against what God has ordained. While it is true that "the world" can be set over against God (1Jn 2:16), this cannot be said of the state, despite the fact that individual governments may at times be anti-God in their stance. Those who rebel "will bring judgment on themselves." This judgment refers to that which is administered through human channels and in the sphere of human affairs (cf. Jesus' words in Mt 26:52). For example, the Jewish revolt against Rome that began within a decade after Paul wrote led to the sack of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the nation.

3–4 These verses constitute the most difficult portion of the passage, for they seem to take no account of the possibility that government may be tyrannical and may reward evil and suppress good. A few years after Paul wrote these words, Nero launched a persecution against the church at Rome; multitudes lost their lives, and not because of doing evil. Later emperors also lashed out against Christians. It should be noted, however, that the empire did not persecute Christians for their good works or even for their faith, but rather because they felt the Christians' refusal to honor Roman gods threatened stability in the empire.

There are two ways to deal with this problem. (1) Paul is presenting the norm here, i.e., the ideal for government, which is certainly that of punishing evil and rewarding or encouraging good. If this is the correct interpretation, then we can understand why Paul warns against rebellion and makes no allowance for revolutionary activity. This interpretation does allow for revolution in cases where rights are denied and liberties taken away, since the state has ceased to fulfill its God-appointed function. At the very least, when justice collapses, the Christian community is obliged to voice its criticism of the state's failure and deviation from the divinely ordained pattern. (2) The other possibility is to introduce the principle of 8:28, whereby God finds ways to bring good out of apparent evil, so that even in the event that the state should turn against the people of God in a way that could rightly be termed evil, he will bring good out of it in the long run.

Paul terms the state "God's servant [GK 1356]" to extend commendation to the one who does good and, conversely, to punish the wrongdoer. This implies considerable knowledge on the part of the governing authority as to the nature of right and wrong, a knowledge not dependent on awareness of the teaching of Scripture but granted to human beings in general as rational creatures (cf. 2:14–15). While "God's servant" is an honorable title, it contains a reminder that the state is not God and that its function is to administer justice for him in areas where it is competent to do so. The state must not be thought of as infallible in its decisions. Yet this does not entitle persons to flout the state's authority when decisions are not to their liking.

The warning to believers to avoid evil carries with it the admonition that if this warning is neglected, "fear" will be in order because the authority has the power to use the sword. This warning relates to public acts that threaten the well-being and security of the state, not to individual crimes that might warrant capital punishment. That is, Paul is warning believers against becoming involved in activity that could be construed by the Roman government as encouraging revolution or injury to the state. To engage in subversive activity invites speedy retribution.

5 In bringing this portion of the discussion to a close, Paul advances two reasons why Christians must submit to the state. One is the threat of punishment if one does not put oneself in subjection. Paul appeals here to personal advantage, to the instinct of self-preservation. To defy the state could mean death. The other reason is "conscience" (GK 5287), which is more difficult to determine. Mostly like this word denotes a personal awareness that the ultimate foundation of all of life is God. In other words, Christians, by virtue of divine revelation, can have a clearer understanding of the position of the governing authority than an official of the government is likely to have (cf. 1Pe 2:19). Let that knowledge guide them in their attitudes and decisions.

6–7 Building on his allusion to conscience, the apostle explains the payment of taxes. The more clearly a person recognizes that the governing authority is God's servant, the greater appears the reasonableness of providing support by taxes. While the person in authority may be unworthy, the institution is not; and without financial undergirding, government cannot function. For the third time Paul speaks of rulers as God's servants, but this time he uses a different word, one that means workers for the people or public ministers. Their work is carried on under God's scrutiny and fulfills his will. These public servants give full time to governing; therefore they have no time to earn a living by other means (cf. Lk 10:7).

There is deliberate repetition in the sense that the paying of taxes is assumed (v.6), then enjoined (v.7). But the word Paul uses in v.7 literally means "give back" (GK 625; the same word Jesus used in Mk 12:17), suggesting that what is paid to the government in the form of taxes presupposes value received.

The various items mentioned in v.7 are all classified as obligations. Since the Christian ethic demands clearing whatever one owes another (cf. v.8), no basis is left for debate. The very language that is used supports the imperative form of the communication. The word "taxes" means tribute paid to a foreign ruler. "Revenue" pertains to indirect taxation in the form of toll or customs duties. "Respect" refers either to that which one gives to God (cf. "fear" in 1Pe 2:17) or the veneration that is due to the highest persons in the government "Honor" is the respect due any who hold a public office.

E. The Comprehensive Obligation of Love (13:8–10)

Although Paul has previously put in an urgent call for love (12:9–10), he now returns to this theme, knowing that he cannot stress too much this essential ingredient of all Christian service. The connection of the present paragraph with the foregoing section is his use of the word "debt" (GK 4053), which comes from the same root as "owe" (GK 4051) in v.7. Christians owe submission and honor to the civil authorities, but they owe all people much more.

8 "Let no debt remain outstanding." While it is appropriate for a believer to incur debt, to be perpetually in debt is not a good testimony, and to refuse to make good one's obligations is outrageous But there is an exception to the rule: the "continuing debt to love one another." One can never say that he or she has completely discharged it. Paul has in mind here love for all other people; its sweep is universal (cf. also Gal 6:10; 1Th 3:12).

In saying that the one who loves has fulfilled the law, Paul presents a truth that parallels his statement in 8:4 about the righteous requirement of the law being fulfilled in those who live in accordance with the Spirit. The connecting link between these two passages is provided by Gal 5:22–23, where first place in the enumeration of the fruit of the Spirit is given to love and the list is followed by the observation that against such fruit there is no law. So the Spirit produces in believers a love to which the law can offer no objection, since love fulfills what the law requires.

9 When we want to know what the law of love requires, we naturally think of those precepts that pertain to human relationships, since love for one's neighbor is at issue, not love for God. Consequently, Paul lifts from the second table of the law certain precepts that call for the preservation of the sacredness of the family, the holding of human life inviolable, and the recognition of property rights, concluding with the key item that is involved in the other three, the control of one's desires (cf. 7:7). These and other demands of the law are summed up in the positive command, "Love your neighbor as yourself."

Once again Paul follows the Lord Jesus in summarizing the horizontal bearing of the law with Lev 19:18 (Mt 22:39). Jesus rebuked the narrow nationalistic interpretation of the word "neighbor" (GK 4446) in the parable of the good Samaritan. This word in Greek is derived from "one who is near." Both the priest and the Levite found their nearness to the stricken man a source of embarrassment (Lk 10:31–32), but the Samaritan saw in that same circumstance an opportunity to help a fellow human being. In the light of human need, the barrier between Jew and Samaritan dissolved. Love provides its own imperative.

10 "Love does no harm to its neighbor." This is an understatement, for love does positive good. But the negative form is suitable here, because it is intended to fit in with the prohibitions from the law (v.9). By concluding with the observation that love is the fulfillment of the law, Paul returns to the same thought he began with (v.8).

What, then, is the relationship between love and law? In Christ the two concepts that seem to have so little in common come together. To love others with the love that Christ exhibited is his new commandment (Jn 13:34). And if this love is present, it will make possible the keeping of all his other commandments (Jn 14:15). Love promotes obedience, and the two together constitute the law of Christ (Gal 6:2).

F. The Purifying Power of Hope (13:11–14)

Though this passage contains no explicit mention of either hope or love, both are surely involved. Paul is loath to let go of the theme of love. So, with a final word about it, "And do this," he is ready to plunge into a delineation of the critical nature of the time that intervenes before the Lord's return. It is as though he is saying, "Show love while you can, and meanwhile keep girded with hope and sobriety for the consummation." While love identifies Christians with others in their need, hope puts a gulf between them and the world. They refuse to be conformed to an age that is satisfied with earthly things (cf. Php 3:18–21). Paul summons us to self-discipline rather than profligate living.

11 Paul sounds a call for alertness. The era between the Christ's first and second coming is critical, because the promise of his return hovers over believers. They must not be lulled to sleep by indulgence in pleasure or be influenced by the specious word of those who suggest that the Lord delays his coming or may not return at all. Paul does not know how near the day of the Lord's appearing is, but he is content to advance the reminder that "our salvation is nearer now than when we first believed." To be sure, salvation is already both an achieved fact for the believer (Eph 2:8) and a continuing fact (1Co 15:2; 1Pe 1:5), but it has also its future and final phase (cf. Php 3:20; 1Pe 1:9). Only at the return of the Savior will our salvation be complete. Believers are not like a child looking for a clock to strike the hour because something is due to happen then. They are content to know that with every passing moment the end is that much closer to realization.

12–13 Paul's line of thought here resembles 1Th 5:1–11. Even as darkness is symbolic of evil and sin, light fittingly depicts those who have passed through the experience of salvation. Paul pictures Christians as those who anticipate the day by rising early. The night clothes are the works of darkness, the deeds that belong to the old life. The garments to which they transfer, however, are unusual. They are likened to armor as in 1Th 5:8. To walk through this world as children of light involves a warfare with the powers of darkness (cf. Eph 6:12–13). Even though the final day has not yet arrived, believers belong to the day (1Th 5:8), anticipating the glory that will then be revealed (2Co 3:18; 4:4).

This forms the basis for the plea, "Let us behave decently, as in the daytime." Christians must to live as though that final day had actually arrived, bringing with it the personal presence of Christ. There should be no place for the type of conduct that characterizes unsaved people, especially in the night seasons. Paul describes this manner of life in three couplets, the first on intemperance, the second on sexual misconduct, and the third on contention and quarreling. Here we learn the double lesson that one sin leads to another and that committing the sin does not bring inner rest but rather dissatisfaction that betrays itself by finding fault with others.

14 In conclusion, the apostle returns to his figure of putting on clothing (cf. v.12), but now the garment is personalized: they must put on the Lord Jesus Christ. They must consciously accept the lordship of the Master. But how can Paul say this when believers have already put on Christ at conversion and baptism (Gal 3:27)? There is always room for decisive renewal, for fresh advance.

Paul allows no room for a spirit of complacency, as though a life of godliness automatically follows faith. The redeemed must always be attuned to the Savior. They must exercise ceaseless vigilance lest the flesh prevail. They must not give thought to how the desires of the old nature can be satisfied (cf. ch. 6). Union with Christ must be accompanied by a constant reckoning of oneself as dead to sin and alive to God and his holy will.

G. Questions of Conscience Wherein Christians Differ (14:1–15:13)

It is uncertain to what extent Paul possessed definite information about the internal affairs of the Roman church. Consequently, it is difficult to know whether his approach to the problem of the "weak" (GK 820 & 822) and the "strong" (GK 1543) is dictated by awareness of the precise nature of the problem in Rome or whether he is writing out of his own experience with other churches, especially the Corinthian congregation (1Co 8:1–11:1). There definitely are similarities, such as the danger that by their conduct the strong will cause the weak to stumble, and the corresponding danger that the weak will sit in judgment on the strong. But the differences are numerous: the treatment in Romans is briefer and couched in more general terms; there is no mention in Romans of idols or food offered to idols; the word "conscience" does not appear; the strong are not described as those who have knowledge. On the other hand, 1 Corinthians does not refer to vegetarians or to those who insist on observing a certain day in contrast to others who look on all days as being alike.

The weaker brethren at Rome should probably be identified with the Jewish element in the church, those who had avoided certain foods because of the dietary laws of the OT. Information may have reached Paul that with the return of Jewish Christians to Rome after the death of Emperor Claudius in A.D. 54, tension had developed in the church with the Gentile element that had been able to enjoy freedom for several years without challenge.

Judging from his discussion in 1 Corinthians, Paul would place himself among the strong. Yet he was careful not to become an occasion of stumbling to a weaker brother. He had words of warning and words of encouragement to both groups. His primary concern was to promote unity in the church (15:5).

1. Brethren must refrain from judging one another (14:1–12)

1–4 The word "eat" characterizes this section. Diet practices differ, and these differences can easily become a basis of disagreement. Paul terms overscrupulous believers as those who are "weak in faith," meaning that the faith of such persons is not strong enough to enable them to perceive the full liberty they have in Christ. They are plagued by doubt as to whether it is right for them to eat certain foods (cf. v.23). The injunction to those who do not share this weakness is to "accept" them warmly (v.1) and not to pass judgment on them. Weak Christians must not be made to feel inferior or unwanted.

The specialized use of "faith" (GK 4411) becomes clearer when Paul gives it a definite context (v.2). One person, obviously strong in faith, feels he can eat anything. Paul would concur that he has this freedom (1Ti 4:3–4). Another person, weak in his faith, confines his diet to vegetables The motive for doing so is a personal matter, and for that reason Paul does not make it an issue. He is solely concerned with specific practice and the reaction of the strong to this practice. The omnivorous man is apt to "look down" on the weak brother, an attitude that is not conducive to full fellowship. The weak brother may retaliate by condemning the one who has no inhibitions about his food. If so, the latter needs to reflect on the fact that God has accepted this man (v.3), so why should he himself not do so?

To reinforce the rebuke, Paul cites the relationship of a servant to his master (v.4). In ordinary life, it would be unseemly for anyone to attempt to interfere in a case involving the servant's actions. Thus the strong certainly may enjoy their freedom in Christ. This assurance is grounded not so much on the discretion of the strong as on the power of Christ to sustain him.

5–8 Here the recurring phrase is "to the Lord," indicating that whether one be thought of as "weak" or "strong," the important thing is that each one conduct his or her life in the consciousness of God's presence, because God's approval is more significant than the approval or disapproval of fellow Christians. Eating is still in view, but alongside it Paul places a second topic—the holding of certain days as sacred.

Does this refer to Sabbath observance or to special days for feasting or fasting? The answer is not easily determined. Since the early church in Jerusalem almost certainly observed the Sabbath and did not want to offend non-Christian Jews, and since the Roman church presumably had a good-sized minority of Jews, it is not impossible that Paul has the Sabbath in mind. But the close contextual association with eating suggests that Paul has in mind a special day set apart for observance as a time for feasting or for fasting. The important thing is that one should "be fully convinced in his own mind" as to the rightfulness of his observance. More important still is the certitude of the individuals involved that their motivation is their desire to honor the Lord in what they are doing. It is possible for the observant and the nonobservant to do this, as illustrated by the giving of thanks at mealtime (cf. 1Ti 4:5). The one partaking can give thanks for the meat before him, while the one abstaining from meat can give God thanks for his vegetables. The latter should be able to do this without resentment toward his brother who enjoys richer fare.

In vv.7–8 Paul is not expressing a maxim applicable to all people; rather, he is speaking of believers. Christians do not live to themselves because they live to the Lord. This attachment, which is also an obligation, does not cease with death but carries forward into the next life (Php 1:20). Paul has already affirmed that death cannot separate Christians from the love of God in Christ (8:38–39; cf. 2Co 5:9). Their death is to be viewed as an enlarged opportunity to show forth the praises of the Lord. Relationship to him is the key to life on either side of the grave.

9–12 Both groups will have to answer to God in the coming day. It is premature to pass judgment on one another (cf. 1Co 4:5), since Christ will assume that responsibility. He gave his life, laying it down in obedience to the will of God and thereby purchasing the church by his blood (Ac 20:28). But he is also "Lord" by virtue of his resurrection, an event that established his claim to deity, to Saviorhood, and to universal dominion. He is in fact the Lord of both the dead and the living.

Against this background the apostle returns in v.10 to direct address, first to the weak brother, then to the strong. The former is prone to judge, the latter to depreciate or even scorn. Both attitudes are virtually the same, because they involve improper judgment. The true judge is God, and his time for judging is coming, making human judgment not only premature but also a usurpation of God's role. Notable is the ease with which Paul passes from the Lord (v.9) to God (v.10). The two are inseparable in their operations. In fact, God's judgment seat (v.10) can be identified with the judgment seat of Christ (2Co 5:10). The same phenomenon occurs in the quotation in v.11, which combines Isa 49:18 and 45:23 (cf. Php 2:10–11). In Paul's summary of the situation in v.12, the note of judgment is retained, but the emphasis falls on the fact that each person must give a personal account of himself or herself to God (cf. Gal 6:5).

2. Brethren must avoid offending one another (14:13–23)

Paul's appeal in this section for the most part is directed to strong Christians, who are warned that their example may have a disastrous effect on those who are weak by leading them to do what their spiritual development disapproves of. The discussion proceeds along the same line as before—what Christians should include in their diet.

13–15 The opening statement gives the gist of what has been already said. Both parties have been guilty of passing judgment on one another. Then, by a neat use of language, Paul employs the same verb "judge" (GK 3212) in a somewhat different sense ("make up your mind"). He calls for a course of action that will not hurt fellow believers, a decision once for all to avoid whatever might impede anyone's progress in the faith or cause another person to fall. Strong believers must not put a "stumbling block" in the way of the weak. A "stumbling block" (GK 4682) is literally something against which one may strike one's foot, causing that person to stumble or even fall. An "obstacle" (GK 4998) presents the picture of a trap designed to ensnare a victim (cf. its use in Mt 16:23). In v.13 it could be taken as a stern warning against deliberately enticing fellow believers to do what for them would be sinful (cf. v.23). Even if such an act were motivated by the desire to get them out of the "weak" category, it would still be wrong.

Paul himself is convinced of something that the weak believer does not share, namely, that "no food is unclean in itself" (v.14; cf. also 1Ti 4:4). He is most likely thinking of what Jesus said in Mk 7:15–23. But not everyone has been enlightened on this issue, and those who are convinced that some foods are unclean (in terms of the Levitical food laws), for them such foods remain unclean. Until they are convinced otherwise, they would violate their conscience if they partook.

Moreover, even if the strong do not try to convince the weak to change their habits, the practices of the strong can be a stumbling block to the weak, causing distress of soul. Such distress may contain a hint of something tragic, a sorrow of heart induced by following the example of the strong, only to find their consciences ablaze with rebuke and their lives out of fellowship with the Lord. In such a situation, love is not operating.

Paul's basis of approach to the strong has changed from granting them their position of liberty to an appeal to love, which may call for sacrifice. If such sacrifice is refused, then the strong must face the responsibility for bringing spiritual ruin on the weak. A selfish insistence on freedom may tear down and destroy, but love, when it is exercised, will invariably build up (1Co 8:1).

16–18 In v.16, the "good" must be understood as the liberty to eat, since all foods are regarded as clean. This liberty, however, if resented because it has been flaunted in the face of the weak, can be regarded as an evil thing on account of its unloving misuse.

Then, with pastoral insight, Paul lifts the entire discussion to a higher level than mere eating and drinking (v.17). His readers, all of them, are the loyal subjects of Christ in the kingdom of God. In that sphere the real concerns are not externals such as diet but the spiritual realities motivating life and shaping conduct. Surely the strong will agree that if their insistence on Christian liberty endangers the spiritual development of the church as a whole, they should be willing to forgo that liberty (cf. 1Co 9:12–23). In this context "righteousness" (GK 1466) does not mean justification but right conduct to which the believer is called to obey the will of God (cf. 6:13, 16, 18). This conclusion is supported by the fact that "joy" is an experiential term. "Peace" here means the peace of God (Php 4:7; see comment on v.19). Mention of "the Holy Spirit" is understandable, because joy and peace are included in the fruit he produces in the believer's life (see Gal 5:22–23). Paul then links these matters to the believer's service of Christ. The manifestation of the fruit of the Spirit is acceptable not only to God who provides it, but also to those who see it in operation and experience its blessings.

19–21 The entire church is urged to pursue "peace" (harmony between the two groups; GK 1645), which alone can provide the atmosphere in which "mutual edification [GK 3869]" can take place (cf. the importance of edification in 1Co 14:5, 12, 26). Mutual edification implies that the strong, despite their tendency to look down on the weak, may actually learn something from them. Perhaps they will come to appreciate loyalty to a tender conscience and begin to search their own hearts to discover that they have cared more about maintaining their position than about loving the weaker Christians. Through the fresh manifestation of love by the strong, the weak will be lifted in spirit and renewed in faith and life.

Paul then reinforces his point about edification by warning of the reverse process (v.20). To "destroy" (GK 2907) the work of God is to tear it down, making it impossible for the church to function as the instrument of God's purpose. It is disheartening to realize that such colossal loss could be occasioned by a difference of opinion over food! Although all food can properly be regarded as clean and proper to eat, the wrong lies in causing someone to stumble by one's eating.

The "better" or more noble course is to do without meat under such circumstances and to refrain from drinking wine, if that would be a stumbling block to anyone. For the first time in the discussion wine is mentioned, suggesting that a measure of asceticism may be in view here.

22–23 Although the language of the opening statement of this section is general (cf. vv.1–2), in all probability Paul is directing his counsel in v.22 chiefly to the strong, since they are the ones who must be warned to act on their confidence privately, where God is their witness. To exercise their freedom in public would grieve the weak and raise a barrier between them. The strong are "blessed" in their private enjoyment of freedom, because they are free from doubt and no one who might be scandalized is looking on. They are therefore not faced with the danger of causing the weak to condemn themselves by approving something their conscience will not endorse.

Then in v.23 Paul addresses the weak. "Faith" here must be understood in the same way it was used at the beginning of the chapter (see comment on vv.1–4)—not as saving faith, but as a reference to the confidence one has to make free use of what God has created and set apart for the good of humanity. In keeping with this, "condemned" does not refer to God's action of excluding a person from salvation, but it means that the person stands condemned by his or her own act as being wrong. To act in contradiction to one's conscience or to the known will of God inevitably brings an experience of guilt. When believers refuse to move in a certain direction because they feel that step is out of line with God's will, they receive strength by their refusal, so that it is much easier on other occasions to move on the basis of faith.

3. The unity of the strong and the weak in Christ (15:1–13)

Two fairly distinct motifs run through this portion. In vv.1–6 the appeal to both the strong and the weak is grounded on the example of Christ, who did not please himself but gladly accepted whatever self-denial his mission required. In vv.7–13 Christ is again the key. He has accepted both Jew and Gentile in accordance with the purpose of God. To refuse to accept each other is to resist that purpose in its practical outworking.

1 As Paul draws the discussion on Christian liberty to a close, he openly aligns himself with the strong. They are the ones who hold the key to the solution of the problem. If they are interested simply in maintaining their own position, the gulf between the two groups will not be narrowed and the weak will continue to be critical and resentful. But if the strong reach out the hand of fellowship and support, this will be a bridge. So to the strong belongs the obligation of taking the initiative. The word "bear" (GK 1002) is the same word used in Galatians where believers are to fulfill the law of Christ by bearing each other's burdens (Gal 6:2). Let the strong, then, bear the burden of the scrupulousness of the weaker Christians. But if they do this in a spirit of mere resignation or with the notion that this condescension marks them as superior Christians, it will fail.

Rather, they must do it in love—the key to fulfilling the law of Christ. They must resist the inclination to please themselves, for that is the antithesis of love.

2 Indeed, refusal to live a self-pleasing life should characterize every believer, whether strong or weak, and should extend beyond the narrow circle of like-minded people to all with whom we come in contact (i.e., our neighbors). Our chief concern must always be to contribute to the spiritual good of others, in order to edify the church and to win as many as possible to the Lord (1Co 9:19–23).

3 For the first time in this letter Paul holds Christ before his readers as an example. Christ was also faced with whether he should please himself and go his own way. His concluding affirmation was: "I always do what pleases him" (Jn 8:29), even though the cost was heavy: "The insults of those who insult you [God] have fallen on me" (quoting Ps 69:9). In spite of reproach and insult, our Lord remained faithful in his ministry to help those about him. Paul's readers must likewise seek the good of others even if they are misunderstood or maligned in doing so.

4 Having cited Ps 69, a portion evidently regarded in the early church as messianic (see comment on Ro 11:7–10), the apostle then refers to the Scriptures in a more general way as useful for the instruction of NT believers—in fact, it was deliberately written for their edification. The very phenomenon of quoting from the OT speaks loudly of the dependence of the church on the course of redemption history. The example of Christ was also bound to influence the church to revere and use the OT. In many cases, Gentiles were already familiar with the OT in the synagogue (Ac 13:44–48) before they heard the Gospel and put their trust in the Lord Jesus. The use of the Scriptures promotes "endurance" and supplies "encouragement." Both may be learned by precept and example from these records of the past. These two elements are intimately connected with "hope," for the endurance is worthwhile if it takes place on a course that leads to a glorious future, and the encouragement provides exactly that assurance.

5–6 Endurance and encouragement are ultimately God's gift, though they are mediated through the Scriptures. They tend, however, to be individually appropriated, some realizing them to a greater degree than others. So Paul prays for a "spirit of unity" that will minimize individual differences as all fix their attention on Christ as the pattern for their own lives (cf. v.3). This does not mean that all believers must see eye-to-eye on everything, but that the more Christ fills the spiritual vision, the greater will be the cohesiveness of the church. Though this unity will help the church in its witness to the world, Paul is more interested here in its effect on the worship of the people of God—"with one heart and mouth" glorifying the God and Father whom Jesus so beautifully glorified on earth.

7 As he moves forward to the conclusion of his treatment of the strong and the weak, Paul summarizes what he has already stated. "Accept one another" picks up the emphasis of 14:1, where the same verb occurs, but here the charge is directed to both groups rather than to the strong alone. Then, in line with 15:3, 5, he again brings in the example of Christ and states that bringing praise to God is the grand objective (cf. v.6).

8–12 From the three elements that constitute v.7 Paul now singles out the second—Christ's example of accepting all who make up his body—and proceeds to enlarge on it, first in relation to the Jewish Christians (v.8) and then in relation to the Gentiles (vv.9–12). In both these directions Christ has fulfilled the OT.

"Christ has become a servant of the Jews" (v.8). This brief statement epitomizes the earthly ministry of our Lord, who announced that he was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Mt 15:24) and restricted the activity of his disciples during those days to their own nation (Mt 10:5–6). The word "servant" (GK 1356) reminds us how far Jesus went to minister to the needs of Israel (cf. Mk 10:45). This dedicated limitation of ministry to his own people was in the interest of "God's truth" in the sense of God's fidelity to his word, especially his promises made to the patriarchs (cf. Ro 9:4–5). This statement served to remind the Gentile element in the church (the strong) that God had given priority to Israel (cf. 1:16–17; 9–11) and that they should be concerned not to slight or depreciate the Jewish element.

Once that point has been made, however, Paul brings out the truth that all the time

God's purpose was not exclusively directed toward the nation of Israel (cf. Ge 12:3), since the Scriptures portray the Gentiles as embraced in the saving mercy of God and responding to it. Consequently, the Jewish believers of Paul's time should not think it contradictory for God to lavish his grace on the nations through the Gospel. There is an element of progression in Paul's quotations from the OT in vv.9–12. The first (Ps 18:49) pictures David as rejoicing in God for his triumphs in the midst of the nations that have become subject to him. In the second (Dt 32:43, in the LXX), the position of the Gentiles is elevated to participation with Israel in the praise of the Lord. The third and fourth quotations no longer picture the Gentiles in relation to Israel but in their own right, praising the Lord (Ps 117:1) and hoping in him whom God has raised up to rule over the nations (Isa 11:10).

13 As he had done at the close of the first section in this chapter (v.5), Paul again expresses his desire that God will meet the needs of his readers. Although the subject of the last things has little formal place in Romans, its subjective counterpart, "hope" (GK 1828), is mentioned more often than in any other of his letters, especially here (vv.4, 12–13).

The expression "the God of hope" (v.13) means the God who inspires hope in his children. He can be counted on to fulfill what yet remains to be accomplished for them (5:2; 13:11). Likewise, in the more immediate future and with the help of Paul's letter, they can confidently look to God for the working out of their problems, including the one Paul has been discussing. Hope does not operate apart from trust; in fact, it is the forward-looking aspect of faith (Gal 5:5; 1Pe 1:21). Paul expects a rich, abounding experience of hope along with an overflowing of love (Php 1:9; 1Th 3:12; 4:10), of pleasing God (1Th 4:1), and of thanksgiving (Col 2:7). Believers can count on God to enable them to increase in the manifestation of Christian graces "by the power of the Holy Spirit" who lives in them and fills the inner life.

VIII. Conclusion (15:14–16:27)

A. Paul's Past Labors, Present Program, and Future Plans (15:14–33)

The remainder of this chapter contains a prominence of personal matters that Paul feels will be of interest to the believers at Rome (cf. 1:8–15). Here and in ch. 1, however, his own affairs are invariably regarded as important only as they relate to the Gospel of Christ, of which he is such a committed minister.

14–16 Paul now reflects on the character of his readers and what he can expect his letter to accomplish for them. Since he had earlier acknowledged their strong faith (1:8), it is now in order to add some other things he has picked about them up from various sources, including people mentioned in the closing chapter.

The first item is "goodness" (GK 20). Having just written of the Holy Spirit, Paul undoubtedly has in mind the moral excellence that is the fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22). This quality is needed to carry out the recommendations mentioned in 14:1–15:13. Desiring to do the right thing for someone else is essential, but it must be coupled with "knowledge" of what is rightly expected. Paul goes so far as to call his readers "complete" in this area and therefore "competent to instruct one another." Such language shows his confidence that the Roman church, which had been in existence for at least a decade, had been well taught (cf. 6:17). The word "instruct" (GK 3805) reflects more than merely imparting information; "inculcate" comes close to expressing its force (a word translated "counsel" in Col 3:16; "warn" in 1Th 5:14). In the absence of resident pastors, believers were expected to exercise such a ministry among themselves.

Though he was not the founder of the Roman church, Paul has been outspoken, and he proceeds to explain this lest he be thought tyrannical or perhaps tedious in going over what they already knew. He is simply doing his duty, fulfilling the commission God in his grace has granted him as a minister of Christ (vv.15–16). Furthermore, his boldness has been in evidence "on some points" (v.15) but has not pervaded the letter as a whole. Since he here emphasizes his call to go to the Gentiles, one may assume that most of his readers were Gentiles (cf. 1:13). They are his special offering, a sacrifice acceptable to God (cf. Isa 66:18–20). His own function as a priest pertains directly to proclaiming the Gospel and winning Gentiles to Christ.

It remains for the Romans to make their own personal commitment to God (12:1). Their acceptability to God comes not only from their reception of the Gospel of Christ but also from the ministry of the Holy Spirit that sets them apart to God as the people of his possession (cf. 1Co 6:11). This initial sanctification makes possible the progressive spiritual development that spans the two great foci of justification and final redemption (1Co 1:30).

17–19 Paul refuses to boast in his special ministry to the Gentiles. He restricts his glorying to Christ Jesus (cf. Gal 6:13–14), the one he serves as a minister (cf. v.16). This relationship means not only that the glory goes to the Savior, but also that as Christ's minister Paul must depend on him for everything he has accomplished. He is only the instrument by which God brings Gentiles to obey Christ (cf. 1:5). His ministry has consisted both of word and deed ("what I have said and done," v.18). His word ministry (which permeates this letter) he simply calls "the gospel of Christ" (v.19); he goes on to give more details about his deed ministry.

"Signs and miracles" (v.19) served to accredit the messenger of God and validate the message he brought. It was so in the ministry of Jesus (Ac 2:22) and of the original apostles (Ac 5:12). Paul is able to certify the same for himself (cf. 2Co 12:12). A "sign" (GK 4956) is a visible token of an invisible reality that is spiritually significant. The same act may also be a "wonder" (GK 5469), something that appeals to the senses and is recognized as a phenomenon that needs explanation. In the OT, God's presence and power were indicated through such means, especially at the time of the Exodus and during the wilderness sojourn. However, "the power of the Spirit" was required to persuade people to make the connection between the miracles and the message and so believe.

How well has Paul fulfilled his task in proclaiming the Gospel as a minister of Christ? He now affords his readers a glimpse into his activity over many years (v.19b), not by citing the number of churches founded, of converts won or of sufferings endured, but by drawing a great arc reaching from Jerusalem to Illyricum (a Roman province northwest of Macedonia). Luke's account of Paul's final visit to Macedonia and Achaia before going up to Jerusalem for the last time is brief (Ac 20:1–2). Yet it is possible that Paul visited Illyricum before settling down at Corinth for the winter (see comments on Ac 20:1–2).

The statement "I have fully proclaimed the gospel of Christ" means not that he had preached in every community between Jerusalem and Illyricum but that he had faithfully preached the message in the major cities along the way, leaving to his converts the task of evangelizing surrounding districts (cf. 1Th 1:8). His ministry in Jerusalem had been brief and met with great resistance (see Ac 9:28–29). But the very fact that it was attempted at all displayed his determination to fulfill that part of his commission that included Israel (Ac 9:15). His habit of visiting the synagogues wherever he went points in the same direction.

20–22 From this brief outline of his missionary activity, the apostle turns to the drive that kept him ceaselessly at his task. He had a godly "ambition" to preach the Gospel where Christ was not known. Such an item was not contained in his call to service except by implication in connection with reaching the Gentiles, so it represents his own desire to blaze an uncharted trail for the Gospel no matter how great the cost to himself. He longed to preach "in the regions beyond" (2Co 10:16). Somewhat parallel is his insistence on preaching the Gospel without charge, supporting himself by the labor of his hands (1Co 9:18).

Paul had not been able to visit Rome because he had been fully occupied elsewhere. For example, conditions in the Corinthian church detained him a long time, so that he did not feel free to move on to another area. His dislike of building "on someone else's foundation" did not come from an overweening sense of self-importance that could be satisfied only when he could claim the credit for what was accomplished. Actually, he preferred to work with companions, and he was always appreciative of the service rendered by his helpers (cf. 1Co 3:5–9). But he was impelled by the love of Christ to reach as many as possible (2Co 5:14–15). He felt deeply his obligation to confront everyone with the good news (Ro 1:14). This is confirmed by the quotation in v.21 of Isa 52:15.

23–24 Only by taking into account the restless pioneer spirit of Paul can we understand how he could claim to have "no more place . . . to work" in the regions where he had been laboring. Plenty of communities had been left unvisited and several groups of believers could have profited from a visit, but his eyes were now on the western horizon (see Ac 19:21). His mention of "many years" suggests his desire to go to Rome had been born even earlier, though not crystallized into resolve until the successes at Ephesus showed him that a move to more needy fields was in order. Others could carry on after he had laid the foundation.

Now a still more remote objective than Rome comes into view: Spain (v.24), the frontier of the empire on the west. Thus his stay in Rome will be limited. Though Paul looks forward to fellowship with the believers there (cf. 1:11–12), he hopes to go beyond. Openly, he announces his hope that the Roman church will assist him in making the Spanish campaign a reality. This sharing will naturally include their prayers on his behalf, their financial cooperation, and possibly some helpers to go with him. If Paul were ever to reach Spain, he would no doubt feel that he had realized in his own ministry a measure of fulfillment of the Lord's Great Commission (Mt 28:18–20; Ac 1:8). Whether Paul actually reached Spain is not certain.

25–29 The contemplated trip to Spain by way of Rome will have to be postponed, however, until another mission is accomplished, namely, his impending visit to Jerusalem. So three geographical points lie commingled in the mind of the apostle: Rome as the goal of much praying, hoping, and planning; Jerusalem as the necessary stop on the way; and Spain as the ultimate objective. Obviously the journey to Jerusalem was critical in his thinking; otherwise, the lure of the West might take precedence over everything else. So Paul explains just how important this trip to the mother church is, so that his readers will understand that he is not dilatory about visiting them.

The principal reason, no doubt, for remaining in the East so long is the situation necessitating this final trip to Jerusalem. Paul's churches were made up mainly of Gentile converts. While the Jewish-Christian element in the church had an interest in the growing work among the Gentiles (Ac 11:21–22; 15:4), some were concerned that these Gentiles were not being required to accept circumcision in accordance with the OT provision for receiving proselytes into Israel (Ex 12:48) and were not keeping the various OT laws, such as avoiding unclean foods (Ac 15:1, 5). A further concern was the rapid growth of the Gentile churches, while growth in Jerusalem and Judea had diminished because of persecution and other factors. Jewish believers might be outnumbered before long.

As the leading apostle to the Gentiles, Paul found this situation troubling. What could be done to cement relations between the Jewish and Gentile elements in the church? He felt that the answer might well lie in a great demonstration of love and desire for unity on the part of his churches toward the mother church in Jerusalem, using a gift of assistance to the poor Christians there similar to what Barnabas and Paul had brought years before from the Antioch church (Ac 11:27–30). The gratitude of the recipients was real and lived on in the memory of Paul. Perhaps on the quick trip Paul made to Jerusalem as reported in Ac 18:22 he conferred with the leaders of the church there about this plan. At an earlier period he had expressed eagerness to help the leaders at Jerusalem in ministering to their needy (Gal 2:10). Shortly thereafter he began to inform his congregations of the plan and their responsibility to participate in it (1Co 16:1; cf. 2Co 8–9). Soon after writing to the Romans, he prepared for the trip to Jerusalem, accompanied by representatives of the various churches bearing the offerings that had been collected over a period of time (Ac 20:3–4).

According to v.27, this contribution could be looked at from two standpoints: as a love-gift ("they were pleased to do it") and as an obligation ("they owe it to them"). The latter statement is then explained. Had it not been for the generosity of the Jerusalem church in sharing their spiritual blessings (the Gospel), the Gentiles would still be in pagan darkness. So it was not such a great thing that they should reciprocate by sharing their "material blessings" (v.27). Paul here mentions only those of Macedonia and Achaia as taking part in the contribution, perhaps because he was in Achaia at the time of writing and had recently passed through Macedonia (2Co 8–9). From 1Co 16:1 and Ac 20:4, though, it is clear that believers in Asia Minor participated also.

Evidently Paul looked forward to a great feeling of relief when he would convey the monetary offering into the custody of the Jerusalem church. It would mark the completion of an enterprise that had taken several years. He saw this gift as a "fruit" (v.28), probably meaning that the generosity of the Jerusalem church in dispersing the seed of the Gospel to the Gentiles would now be rewarded, the offering being the fruit of their willingness to share their spiritual blessings.

The completion of the service at Jerusalem would free Paul to make good on his announced purpose to visit the saints at Rome. He looked forward to it as a time when the blessing of Christ would be poured out on all. It would be a time of mutual enrichment in the Lord (cf. Ac 28:15 for the account of his reception by the Christians in Rome).

30–33 At the time of writing, Paul was aware of stubborn Jewish opposition to him and his work. The attempt on his life when he was about to leave for Jerusalem (Ac 20:3) clearly shows that his apprehension was justified. He had experienced deadly peril before and knew that prayer was the great resource in such hazardous times (2Co 1:10–11). So he requests prayer now, the kind involving wrestling before the throne of grace that the evil designs of other people may be thwarted (cf. Eph 6:18–20). He strengthens his request by presenting it in the name of the one whom all believers adore—the Lord Jesus Christ—and by adding, "by the love of the Spirit," i.e., by the love that the Spirit has (cf. 5:5). We should never think impersonally of the Spirit, as if he denotes the power of God. Paul clearly affirmed the Spirit's deity, personality, and equality with Father and Son (2Co 13:14).

The request for prayer includes two immediate objectives. One was deliverance from nonbelieving Jews in Judea. This group had forced his departure from the city at an earlier date (Ac 9:29–30), and there was no reason to think they had mellowed. The other objective concerned the attitude of the Jerusalem church to the above-mentioned offering. Evidently the opposition of the Pharisaic party in the church (Ac 15:5) had not ceased, despite the decision of the council (Ac 15:19–29). This opposition was nourished by false rumors concerning his activities (Ac 21:20–21). It would be a terrible blow to the unity of the church if the love-gift from the Gentile congregations was spurned or accepted with only casual thanks. The body of Christ could be torn apart.

These two items are intimately related to the successful realization of Paul's hope of reaching Rome safely, coming with joy because of the goodness of God in prospering his way and finding refreshment in the fellowship of the saints (v.32). Yet he knew that all this was conditioned on God's will (cf. 1:10). As it turned out, he did reach Rome, but not as a free man. Yet that very circumstance enabled him to demonstrate the all-sufficient grace and power of Christ (Php 1:12–14; cf. 2Ti 4:17). However strife-torn may be his lot in the immediate future, he wishes for his friends the benediction of the God of peace (v.33; cf. v.13).

B. The Commendation of Phoebe (16:1–2)

1–2 Paul hoped to come soon to the believers at Rome (15:32), but he must first go to Jerusalem (15:25). But another believer, Phoebe, was about to leave for the imperial city, so Paul took this opportunity to commend her to the church. It was customary for believers who traveled from place to place to carry with them letters of commendation (2Co 3:1). This woman belonged to the church at Cenchrea, located some seven miles from Corinth and serving as the seaport of the city (cf. Ac 18:18). It was one of the Achaian communities to which the Gospel spread from Corinth during and after Paul's original ministry in that city (2Co 1:1).

Phoebe is called a "servant" (GK 1356) of this church. The same word can be rendered "deaconess." Men were serving as deacons about this time (Php 1:1), and before long women were being referred to in a way that suggests they held such an office in the church (1Ti 3:11). But Paul is not stressing office but service (cf. v.2). Phoebe apparently stopped at Corinth on her way to Rome. From what is said about her, it seems likely that Paul sent his letter in her care. She was accustomed to serve, so this would be in character for her. Many had reason to thank God for her assistance in the past, Paul among them. Possibly, like Lydia, she was a Christian businesswoman and would need help in connection with her visit to the great metropolis.

C. Warning Concerning Schismatics, Personal Greetings, and Doxology (16:3–27)

Certain preliminary observations are in order before plunging into these greetings to individuals. It has seemed strange to some scholars that Paul would know so many people in the imperial city, seeing that he had never been there. But presumably he had met them or at least heard of them elsewhere. Travel was facilitated by peaceful conditions in the empire, by the fine network of Roman roads connecting the principal centers, and by available shipping during sailing season.

But why so many names here? A clue is provided by Paul's letter to the Colossians, which also contains greetings to a church he did not personally establish. Paul is taking advantage of all the ties he has with this congregation that he hopes to visit in the near future. To send greetings to specific individuals in churches where he knew virtually the entire congregation would expose Paul to the charge of favoritism. But the congregation at Rome was not such a church.

Since his letter to the Philippians was in all probability written from Rome, the greetings he sends from those of Caesar's household (Php 4:22) to the believers at Philippi may well have been from slaves and freedmen serving in the imperial establishment. That this is so seems evident from the fact that many of the names in Ro 16 appear also in burial inscription of households of emperors of that period, notably those of Claudius and Nero (the reigning emperor when Paul wrote).

3–5 First to be greeted are Priscilla and her husband, Aquila. Paul's friendship with them went back several years to his mission at Corinth, when they gave him hospitality, encouragement, and cooperation in the Lord's work (Ac 18:2). Their usefulness is confirmed by his taking them with him to Ephesus on leaving Corinth (Ac 18:18). When he left for Jerusalem, they remained there to lay the groundwork for his long ministry there (Ac 18:19) and were used of God in the life of Apollos (Ac 18:24–28). It was during the mission at Ephesus (Ac 19) that these "fellow workers" proved their mettle and personal devotion to Paul. They "risked their lives for me" (v.4). Probably the reference is to the dangerous riot that broke out, endangering the apostle's life (Ac 19:28–31; cf. 1Co 16:9; 2Co 1:8–10).

Their presence with Paul at Ephesus just prior to the riot is confirmed by 1Co 16:19; cf. v.8). At that time they had a church in their house, so it is not surprising to find that the same is true of their situation in Rome. Their return to the imperial city fits in with their earlier residence there (Ac 18:2). Paul likely encouraged them to return, so that they could prepare for his arrival by acquainting the church with his work and by helping in his plans for the future (cf. Ac 19:21). Priscilla and Aquila represent a splendid image of Christian married life. Since several women are mentioned in this chapter, it is well to note that there was a married woman whom Paul encouraged to labor in the Gospel along with her husband. Paul's habit of naming Priscilla first testifies to her great gifts and usefulness in the kingdom of God.

Epaenetus is the next to be greeted (v.5). It is understandable that Paul should speak of him as "my dear friend," since this man was the first convert (lit. "firstfruits" [GK 569], suggesting that many more were to follow) to Christ during his mission in the province of Asia, of which Ephesus was the leading city. He naturally held a special place in Paul's heart.

6–15 Mary is a Semitic name borne by several women in the NT. Paul indicates his precise knowledge of her, testifying to her hard work for the saints, but without any hint as to the nature of the work. Emphasis falls rather on her willingness to grow weary in serving them.

Andronicus and Junias (v.7) are Latin and Greek names respectively. Three things out of the four said about them create difficulty for the interpreter. (1) What does "relatives" (GK 5150) mean? The identical word is found in 9:3, where it means fellow Israelite. It may be best to conclude that this word connotes "those who are also Christians." To take the word in the ordinary sense of "relative" is difficult, since Paul gives the impression that he suffered the loss of all things for Christ's sake (Php 3:7), which would include kindred. Added to this is the improbability of his having three kinfolk in Rome (cf. v.11) and three more in Corinth (v.21). (2) Paul adds that these "have been in prison with me." Since Paul was imprisoned many times (2Co 11:23), the expression in this case is doubtless intended to be taken literally, even though we have no idea when it occurred. (3) The pair are further described as "outstanding among the apostles." The word "apostle" (GK 693) can hardly mean "messenger" here (cf. Php 2:25), and it goes without saying that Andronicus and Junias do not belong in the circle of the Twelve. What is left is the recognition that occasionally the word is used somewhat broadly to include leaders in Christian work (cf. 1Th 2:7). Evidently their conversion to the faith occurred in the early years of the history of the church, so they have had ample time to distinguish themselves as leaders.

Paul confesses to a warm personal attachment to Ampliatus (v.8), demonstrating the reality and depth of Christian friendship that developed between him and others who remain obscure to us. Paul was a man who gave himself to the people among whom he served and to those who worked alongside him.

Urbanus (v.9) had helped Paul at some time in the past and assisted others also in the work of the Lord ("our fellow worker"). Regarding Stachys, Paul contents himself with indicating, as with Ampliatus, a very close bond of affection.

Apelles (v.10) was a fairly common name, but this man has an uncommon pedigree, for he is one who is "tested and approved in Christ." This was Paul's desire for Timothy (2Ti 2:15) and for himself (1Co 9:27). The "household of Aristobulus" are Christian slaves either of a certain grandson of Herod the Great who lived in Rome or of some unknown person.

Herodion (v.11) was a Hebrew Christian (cf. the word "relative" again, as in v.7). The household of Narcissus were probably the Christian slaves of a well-known wealthy freedman.

Similar in name, Tryphaena and Tryphosa (v.12) were likely sisters. It was not uncommon then, as now, to give daughters names with a certain resemblance. Since their names mean "dainty" and "delicate," their Christian convictions led them to put aside any tendency to live a life of ease. They are given an accolade for being hard workers in the Lord's cause. To these two women Paul adds another, probably a single woman: Persis, a "dear friend" of Paul. He knew enough about her efforts to commend her as having worked "very hard" in the Lord.

A person bearing the name of Rufus is mentioned in Mk 15:21 as one of the sons of Simon, the man who was compelled to bear the cross of Jesus. On the supposition that Mark's gospel was composed at Rome, all is clear: Mark refers to Rufus because he is well known to local readers as a member of their church. He is "chosen in the Lord," probably used here to connote the idea of "noble" or "eminent." The incident involving his father may have brought him a certain fame among believers at Rome. Paul cannot think of Rufus without thinking of his mother. Though she remains unnamed, she was special in the eyes of the apostle, because she evidently perceived his loneliness after the loss of his family when he became a Christian (Php 3:8) and resolved to mother him. Where this occurred remains unknown, but her presence in Rome made him look forward with special anticipation to his visit.

In vv.14–15 two groups of believers are mentioned without accompanying descriptions or commendations. For both groups, a greeting is extended to the believers associated with them. This appears to indicate a house church in both cases. Rome was a large place, making it probable that there were circles of believers in several sections of the city. They would certainly maintain communication and, when necessity dictated, could arrange to meet together.

16 The admonition to share a holy kiss may well be intended in this case to seal the fellowship of the saints when the letter has been read to them (cf. 1Co 16:20; 2Co 13:12; 1Th 5:26). The reminder that it is a "holy" kiss guards it against erotic associations. It was a token of the love of Christ mutually shared and of the peace and harmony he had brought into their lives. In order to encourage warm relations among churches and among the individuals within them, Paul takes the liberty of extending the greetings of the churches he has founded in the East.

In summary, two observations concerning the greetings should be made, especially since the church at Rome eventually became the strongest in all Christendom. (1) Several of these names appear in inscriptions at Rome in reference to slaves of the imperial household. If many of Paul's acquaintances were actually slaves, this may seem a rather inauspicious beginning for an influential church. But slaves in Roman times were often people of education and outstanding ability. Frequently they were able to gain their freedom and play a larger role in society. The very fact that at Rome believers were found in the service of the emperor (Php 4:22) augurs well for the growth of the church in subsequent days. Yet it should be remembered that God's grace, not human nobility, is the important thing (cf. 1Co 1:26–31).

(2) Prominent in this list are women. They occupied various stations—a wife, a single woman, and a mother—and all are represented as performing a valuable service for the Lord. Evidently Paul esteemed them highly for their work's sake. It is certainly wrong to label Paul, on the basis of 1Co 14:34 and 1Ti 2:11–15, as a misogynist.

17–18 Before Paul ends his letter, he includes a warning concerning schismatics. Is it possible to identify these troublemakers? Perhaps it glances back at the problem of the strong and the weak already discussed in 14:1–15:13 (cf. the word "obstacles" here in v.17 and in 14:13). However, the general tone of vv.17–20 is so much sharper than the earlier one, so that any relationship is dubious. The sort of people the apostle singles out here do not yet seem to have come yet on the Roman scene but posed a threat of doing so. Paul does not specify the particular doctrines of these interlopers, but he is quite pointed in identifying their motives and tactics, which suggests that his warning is based on his missionary experience that had often brought him into contact with false teachers who tried to build their own work on the foundation he had laid (Ac 20:29–30; Php 3:18–19). Some of them may even have kept track of Paul's movements and, being aware of his plan to visit Rome, were hoping to arrive there before him. If they could gain a foothold in this influential church, it would be a notable success.

Paul's command to the believers in Rome is to "watch out" (GK 5023). Alertness to the danger is the main consideration, because failure to be on guard could result in being deceived. Whatever they did, their activity could affect the whole church. As an antidote to their corrupting influence, the apostle points them to "the teaching you have learned." This is hardly to be identified solely with the contents of this letter, but is more particularly intended to refer to the instruction they have already received in the basics of the faith (cf. 6:17). This should serve as the touchstone enabling them to discern error. But such counsel is not enough. As a practical measure, they must "keep away from them," giving them no opportunity for inroads into the congregation.

Paul uses the term "such people" (v.18) rather than "these people," an important distinction that confirms the opinion already given that he does not have in mind a group he could name or identify precisely, but a class he has become all too familiar with in his travels. They may talk about the Lord but they do not serve him. Rather, they serve "their own appetites' (cf. Php 3:18–19; 1Ti 6:3–5). With their smooth talk and flattery intended to deceive, they brand themselves as sophists and charlatans. Those they aim to reach are the "naive," the simpleminded folk so innocent of ulterior motives.

19 Despite the warning, Paul affirms his confidence that his readers will be able to handle the situation (cf. 15:14). This assurance is based chiefly on their "obedience" (cf. 1:5; 6:16), which is so well known in the church at large as to make it almost inconceivable that there will be a failure in the matter under discussion. An appeal to one's record always puts a person on his mettle. So Paul strikes a balance: on the one hand, he rejoices as he thinks of the good name of this congregation; on the other hand, he wants to make sure that they are discerning, able to spot trouble and avoid falling into it.

20 Perhaps the mention of "what is evil" leads Paul to think of the instigator of evil (Satan) and of the One who had blocked the devil's efforts and will thwart his hoped-for triumph. God is the God of peace (cf. 15:33; Php 4:9; 1Th 5:23), who is concerned to preserve harmony among his people and protect them from divisive influences. He is able to defeat the adversary who delights to sow discord among Christians. The word "crush" suggests that Paul has in mind the "promise" of Ge 3:15.

The benediction, as usual, magnifies the grace of our Lord Jesus. The odd feature, however, is that it does not conclude the letter. It appears as if Paul allowed his companions to send greetings after he had written this benediction.

21–23 Paul usually had coworkers and friends around him. This occasion is no exception, and they take this opportunity to send greetings. Timothy, named first, had been Paul's helper on the mission to Macedonia and Achaia (Ac 17–18) and his assistant in handling problems in the Corinthian church (1Co 4:17; 16:10).

The next three persons named are called "relatives," raising the same problem of interpretation faced in vv.7, 11 (see comment). There is a possibility that Lucius is an alternate form for Luke (but see Col 4:14), who does seem to have been with Paul at Corinth (Ac 20:5). Jason could be the individual who entertained Paul and his two helpers at Thessalonica (Ac 17:5), though this too is uncertain (especially since he is not mentioned in Ac 20:4). Sosipater could be the Sopater mentioned in Ac 20:4; his home was in Berea.

At this point (v.22) Tertius, Paul's amanuensis (the one who wrote down the letter at Paul's dictation; cf. 2Th 3:17), asks for the privilege of adding his personal greeting. We may be sure Paul carefully chose believers to write down his letters rather than public secretaries. We also may be sure that people like Tertius would undertake that task as work for the Lord.

Resuming his closing remarks, Paul again takes up the pen and passes on the greeting of Gaius, with whom he had been staying while he wintered at Corinth (v.23). Gaius seems to have been one of the early converts in Paul's mission to the city (1Co 1:14), and the very fact that Paul made an exception in his case by personally baptizing him suggests that his conversion was a notable event due to his prominence. This mention of Gaius as Paul's host helps confirm that Paul was writing from Corinth.

Erastus (v.23) also, a notable figure because of his public office, sends a greeting. Archaeologists have found an inscription in Corinth that bears the name of this public official (cf. also Ac 19:22). Nothing more is known of Quartus than what is stated here. He was probably a member of the Corinthian church and may have had some contact with the congregation in Rome.

25–27 Since Paul has already given his usual benediction of grace (v.20) found at the close of all his letters, we must seek some other explanation for the doxology here. Since Paul allowed other greetings after that benediction (vv.21–23), he probably wanted to write another concluding thought—a magnificent doxology (an ascription of praise to God) that draws into itself words and concepts found in his earlier letters and gives special emphasis to the leading matters discussed in the preceding chapters. This one is lengthy, so much so that the final verse is separated from the rest by a dash in order to indicate a resumption of the thought with which the passage begins and to bring it to a proper conclusion.

The opening words in v. 25 express confidence in God's ability to do what is needful for the readers (cf. Eph 3:20; Jude 24). In the introduction (1:11) Paul had written that he was looking forward to his ministry at Rome as a means of strengthening the congregation. Here he acknowledges that ultimately only God can bring that result. As an instrument for establishing the saints, nothing can compare with the Gospel. Paul is not being egotistical or possessive in calling it "my gospel" (cf. 2:16; 2Ti 2:8). Doubtless the possessive pronoun points up the fact that in Paul's case it came by direct revelation (1:1; cf. Gal 1:12), though it was confirmed as to its historical content by leaders of the Jerusalem church (1Co 15:1–11). Another term for the Gospel is "the proclamation of Jesus Christ," i.e., the preaching that has Jesus Christ as its message (cf. 1:2–3; cf. 1Co 1:21; 2:4; 15:14).

"Proclamation" follows upon "revelation," and both stand in contrast to "the mystery hidden" (see also 1Co 2:7–10). Paul has his usual meaning to "mystery" here (GK 3696; contrast 11:25). What was hidden in God's purpose ultimately becomes revealed and is the property of all his people. The mystery was hidden "for long ages past," i.e., for "eternity past" (cf. 2Ti 1:9; Tit 1:2), by "the eternal God" (v.26), but has now been "revealed" and "made known through the prophetic writings." This probably refers to the OT, even though that material was not necessarily understood as referring to Christ (see Lk 24:25–27, 44–45), and even the OT prophets themselves were puzzled by the messianic element in their own predictions (1Pe 1:10–12). No doubt Paul is taking a backward glance at what he had set down at the beginning of the letter concerning the Gospel as promised by God through his prophets in the Holy Scriptures (1:2).

"The command of the eternal God" points to the Great Commission, which includes all the nations as embraced in the divine purpose (Mt 28:19). This emphasis recalls what Paul said about his own commission (1:1, 5; cf. Col 1:25–27; Tit 1:3). He had a special concern to reach Gentiles (11:13).

In the final verse, God is described under two terms. "Only" (cf. 1Ti 1:17) recalls the line of thought in 3:29–30; he is God of both the Jew and the Gentile. "Wise" (GK 5055) invites the reader to recall the outburst of praise to God in his wisdom (11:33) that brought to a close Paul's long review of God's dealings with Israel in relation to his purpose for the Gentiles. Wisdom is also allied to the hidden/revealed tension noted in v.25, as we gather also from 1Co 2:6–7. So the God whose eternal purpose has been described as hidden and then manifested in the Gospel of his Son, draws to himself through his Son the praise that will engross the saints through all the ages to come. The silence that for so long held the divine mystery has given way to vocal and unending praise.To God be glory forever!

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
Ro 1:17	Hab 2:4	The righteous live by faith
Ro 2:6	Ps 62:12; Pr 24:12	God's fair judgment
Ro 2:24	Isa 52:5; Eze 36:22	God's name cursed among Gentiles
Ro 3:4	Ps 51:4	God's righteous judgment
Ro 3:10–18	Ps 5:9; 10:7; 14:1–3; 36:1; 53:1–3; 140:3; Ecc 7:20; Isa 59:7–8	Sin of humanity
Ro 4:3, 9	Ge 15:6	Faith of Abraham
Ro 4:7–8	Ps 32:1–2	Blessings of forgiveness
Ro 4:17	Ge 17:5	Abraham as a father of many
Ro 4:18	Ge 15:5	Offspring of Abraham
Ro 4:22	Ge 15:6	Faith of Abraham
Ro 7:7	Ex 20:17; Dt 5:21	Tenth commandment
Ro 8:36	Ps 44:22	Sheep for the slaughter
Ro 9:7	Ge 21:12	God's choice of Isaac
Ro 9:9	Ge 18:10, 14	Promise for Sarah
Ro 9:12	Ge 25:23	God's choice of Jacob
Ro 9:13	Mal 1:2–3	Love for Jacob, not Esau
Ro 9:15	Ex 33:19	Mercy of God
Ro 9:17	Ex 9:16	Purpose of Moses
Ro 9:20	Isa 29:16; 45:9	Potter and clay
Ro 9:25–26	Hos 1:10; 2:23	Now God's people
Ro 9:27–29	Isa 1:9; 10:22–23	The remnant
Ro 9:32–33	Isa 8:14	A stone on which people stumble
Ro 9:33	Isa 28:16	Trust in the cornerstone
Ro 10:5	Lev 18:5	Living by the law
Ro 10:6	Dt 30:12	The word not in heaven
Ro 10:7	Dt 30:13	The word not in the deep
Ro 10:8	Dt 30:14	The word near you
Ro 10:11	Isa 28:16	Trust in the cornerstone
Ro 10:13	Joel 2:32	Salvation in the Lord
Ro 10:15	Isa 52:7	Beautiful feet
Ro 10:16	Isa 53:1	Unbelief of Israel

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
Ro 10:18	Ps 19:4	General revelation
Ro 10:19	Dt 32:21	Making Israel envious
Ro 10:20	Isa 65:1	Salvation of the Gentiles
Ro 10:21	Isa 65:2	Obstinate Israel
Ro 11:3–4	1 Ki 19:10, 14, 18	A saved remnant
Ro 11:8	Dt 29:4	A misunderstanding mind
Ro 11:8	Isa 29:10	God seals the eyes
Ro 11:9–10	Ps 69:22–23	Judgment on enemies
Ro 11:26–27	Isa 59:20–21	Deliverer from Zion
Ro 11:27	Isa 27:9	Full removal of sin
Ro 11:34	Isa 40:13	The mind of the Lord
Ro 11:35	Job 41:11	God owns all
Ro 12:19	Dt 32:35	God avenges sin
Ro 12:20–21	Pr 25:21–22	Treating one's enemies
Ro 13:9	Ex 20:13; Dt 5:17	Sixth commandment
Ro 13:9	Ex 20:14; Dt 5:18	Seventh commandment
Ro 13:9	Ex 20:15; Dt 5:19	Eighth commandment
Ro 13:9	Ex 20:17; Dt 5:21	Tenth commandment
Ro 13:9	Lev 19:18	Love your neighbor as yourself
Ro 14:11	Isa 45:23	Every knee shall bow
Ro 15:3	Ps 69:9	Insults on Christ
Ro 15:9	2Sa 22:50; Ps 18:49	Praise among the nations
Ro 15:10	Dt 32:43	Rejoice, O nations
Ro 15:11	Ps 117:1	Nations praising God
Ro 15:12	Isa 11:10	The root of Jesse
Ro 15:21	Isa 52:15	Gentiles hear the gospel

1 Corinthians

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

The ancient city of Corinth was located on the isthmus between Attica to the northeast and the Greek Peloponnesus to the south; it had controlling access to two seas—the Aegean to the east and the Ionian to the west. Its eastern port was Cenchrea, located on the Saronic Gulf (Ac 18:18; Ro 16:1), while its western harbor was at Lechaeum on the Corinthian Gulf. This proximity to the seas and its nearness to Athens, only forty-five miles to the northeast, gave Corinth a position of strategic commercial importance and military defense. It lay below the steep north side of the 1,800-foot high fortress rock, the Acrocorinth with its temple of Aphrodite. Thus located, the city received shipping from every major city on the Mediterranean. Instead of going around the south end of the Peloponnesus, ships often docked at the Isthmus and transported their cargoes by land vehicles from one sea to another; or if the ships were small, they were dragged the five miles across the isthmus. Today there is a canal running through the narrowest part of the isthmus near Corinth.

Corinth was a prosperous city. At the peak of its power and influence it probably had a free population of 200,000, plus half a million slaves in its navy and in its many colonies.

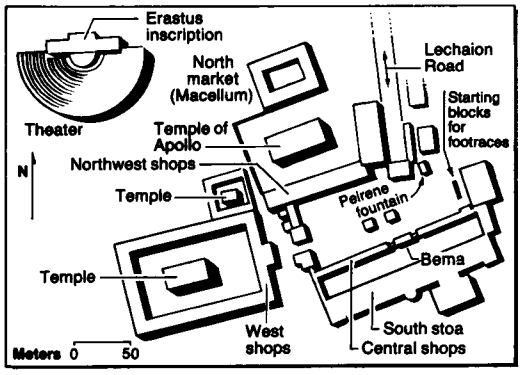
Julius Caesar had reestablished Corinth in 46 B.C. He populated it with Roman war veterans and freedmen. In the reign of Augustus (27 B.C.–A.D. 14) and his successors, the city was built on the pattern of a Roman city, with all remaining buildings reclaimed and new ones added in and around the old marketplace (the agora). It became the capital of the Roman province of Achaia (cf. Ac 18:1–2), which included all the Peloponnesus and most of the rest of Greece and Macedonia.

The celebration of the Isthmian games at the temple of Poseidon made a considerable contribution to Hellenic life. This temple was located about seven miles east of Corinth, not far from the eastern end of the isthmus. But with the games came an emphasis on luxury and profligacy, because the sanctuary of Poseidon was given over to the worship of the Corinthian Aphrodite, whose temple on the Acrocorinth was once purported to have had more than 1,000 female prostitutes in the pre-Roman era. The Greek language developed a verb, korinthiazomai, which meant "to live like a Corinthian in the practice of sexual immorality."

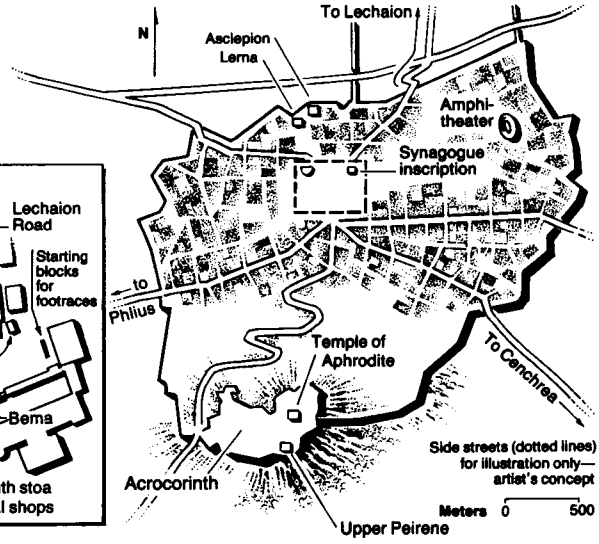
Paul probably came to this important but immoral city in the fall of A.D. 50, after preaching the Gospel to the highly intellectual Athenians. He ministered there a year and a half (Ac 18:11) before he was brought by the Jews into court before the proconsul Gallio (v. 12). That these were the dates of Paul's stay at the city is established by comparing the reference to Gallio with a Gallio, proconsul of Achaia, mentioned on an inscription of the Emperor Claudius at Delphi, dated between January and August, A.D. 52. This Gallio took office on July 1, A.D. 51, and Paul had arrived in Corinth about a year earlier. Shortly after this court appearance, Paul left Corinth for Syria (v.18).

In the Corinthian church were both Jews and Gentiles (see 1Co 1). Some Gentile members had Latin names (e.g., Gaius, Fortunatus, Crispus, Justus, and Achaicus: 1:14; 16:17); so did some Jews (e.g., Aquila and Priscilla, Ac 18:1–4; Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, v.8). No doubt the greater part of the church was composed of native Greeks (cf. 1Co 1:20–24; 12:2).

The existence of a synagogue in Corinth (Ac 18:4–8) is confirmed by an inscribed lintel block with enough of the words remaining to make out the reading "Synagogue of the Hebrews." The miserable nature of the inscription, which has no ornamentation, fits the social position of the Jewish people at Corinth with whom Paul was dealing (see 1Co 1:26).



Archaeologists have identified other buildings of the ancient city. An ornamented triumphal gateway, located at the south end of the Lechaeum Road, led into the agora. Around the market were a good many shops, numbers of which had individual wells, suggesting that much wine was made and drunk in the city (cf. Paul's warning in 1Co 6:10). Located near the center of the marketplace was the bema, the judicial bench or tribunal platform. This was a speakers' platform, and officials addressed audiences assembled there. It was to this place that the antagonistic Jews brought Paul before Gallio (Ac 18:12–17).



Besides its many temples and shrines, the city had two theaters to the north and west, one of which could seat 18,000 people. In a paved street at the east side of this theater was found a reused paving block with this inscription: "Erastus, the aedile [commissioner of public works], bore the expense of this pavement." This Erastus may well have been the one who became Paul's fellow worker (see Ac 19:22; Ro 16:23).

Besides his initial stay in Corinth as recorded in Ac 18, Paul's contact with the Corinthians can be outlined as follows (see map on Paul's interaction with the church at Corinth in the introduction to 2 Corinthians): At Ephesus (Ac 19) he apparently wrote the "previous letter" (1Co 5:9—now lost to us). Besides hearing of the Corinthians' seeming misunderstanding of that letter, Paul had reports from Chloe's household of disorders in the church there (1:11). He may also have received a delegation from Corinth (16:17) who presented him with questions from the congregation (cf. 7:1). As a result, he wrote 1 Corinthians. Paul then heard other unfavorable reports from the church and paid them a "painful visit" (2Co 2:1). This visit was no doubt necessary because the church had failed to act on Paul's advice given in 1 Corinthians. Upon his return to Ephesus, he sent the church a "sorrowful letter" (2Co 2:4; 7:8–9), probably carried by Titus. From Ephesus Paul went to Macedonia, where he received from Titus an encouraging report (2Co 7:5–7). So he wrote

Corinth

In The Time of Paul

The city of Corinth, perched like a one-eyed Titan astride the narrow isthmus connecting the Greek mainland with the Peloponnese, was one of the dominant commercial centers of the Hellenic world as early as the eighth century B.C.

No city in Greece was more favorably situated for land and sea trade. With a high, strong citadel at its back, it lay between the Saronic Gulf and the Ionian Sea and ports at Lechaion and Cenchrea. A diolkos, or stone tramway for the overland transport of ships, linked the two seas. Crowning the Acrocorinth was the temple of Aphrodite, served, according to Strabo, by more than 1,000 pagan priestess-prostitutes.

© 1985 The Zondervan Corporation

By the time the gospel reached Corinth in the spring of A.D. 52, the city had a proud history of leadership in the Achaian League, and a spirit of revived Hellenism under Roman domination following the destruction of the city by Mummius in 146 B.C.

Paul's lengthy stay in Corinth brought him directly in contact with the major monuments of the agora, many of which still survive. The fountain-house of the spring Peirene, the temple of Apollo, the macellum or meat market (I Co 10:25) and the theater, the bema (Ac 18:12), and the unimpressive synagogue all played a part in the experience of the apostle. An inscription from the theater names the city official Erastus, probably the friend of Paul mentioned in Ro 16:23.

2 Corinthians, expressing his gratitude for the improvement. Later he spent the winter in Corinth (Ac 20:2–3) before departing for Jerusalem with the contribution for the poor among the Christians of Palestine. On the basis of this analysis of the events, we may conclude that Paul wrote the Corinthians four letters (two of which have been lost) and that he paid the church three visits.

2. Authorship, Date, Place of Origin, and Destination

Few doubt that Paul was the author of this letter. Not only does the letter itself clearly state this (1:1), but evidence from early church fathers universally confirms it. There is no question, therefore, of the canonicity of this letter; it was accepted almost immediately as God's word. Paul himself makes the strong statement in 14:37, "If anybody thinks he is a prophet or spiritually gifted, let him acknowledge that what I am writing to you is the Lord's command."

Obviously, the letter was written some time subsequent to Paul's first visit to Corinth from A.D. 50–52. Following his departure from the city, he sailed from Cenchrea, stopped at Ephesus briefly, visited the Jerusalem churches, and journeyed north to his home church at Antioch in Syria (Ac 18:18–23). After a stay there, he left on his third missionary journey, visiting the churches of Galatia and Phrygia (Ac 18:23), until he finally came to Ephesus (19:1), where he preached and taught for almost three years (19:10; 20:31)—from A.D. 53–56.

While at Ephesus, Paul heard of the Corinthians' troubles and questions through reports from Chloe's house (1Co 1: 11) and possibly through a delegation from Corinth (16:17). At this point he wrote this letter—toward the end of his stay there. (1) Paul specifically says he is writing from Ephesus (1Co 16:8–9, 19). (2) The letter was written subsequent to Apollos's stay at the city (Ac 18:26, 27; 1Co 1:12) and after Timothy and Erastus had been sent by Paul from Ephesus to Macedonia (Ac 19:22) and Timothy had been sent on to Corinth (1Co 4:17). (3) The letter was written in late spring, because in 1Co 16:8 Paul intimates that it is a relatively short time to Pentecost, after which he intended to leave Ephesus. The time of writing is certainly before winter, for he plans to spend the winter with them (16:6). This all adds up to A.D. 56, about five years after his initial departure from Corinth in the fall of A.D. 51.

It is not fully clear who carried the letter to Corinth, but most likely Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus did, who according to 16:17, had arrived from Corinth and were with Paul. Since in 16:18 the apostle says that the Corinthian Christians should show respect for these men, it is logical to conclude that they were returning to Corinth with the letter.

3. Occasion and Purpose

First Corinthians is a source book of answers to church problems in the past and today. After the introductory material, Paul answers the theological and practical problems raised through the report from members of the household of Chloe (1Co 1:11)—reports about divisions, incest, adultery, Christians taking fellow Christians to court, and the misuse of Christian liberty (chs. 1–6). Following this, a letter came from the church (7:1), posing a number of questions and requiring Paul's answer—questions about marriage, eating meat offered to heathen idols, disorderly public worship, spiritual gifts, and the resurrection (chs. 7–15). Finally, Paul wanted the Corinthians to participate in the offering he was taking for the Christians in Jerusalem (16:1–4). These things, together with Paul's desire to send greetings to Corinth, were sufficient occasion for him to write the letter.

It may well be that Paul did not compose the whole letter at one time. He first wrote the response to reports that came through Chloe; then later, after receiving the letter from the Corinthians (7:1), he wrote the rest. That is likely why the expression and tone change in various parts of 1 Corinthians.

4. Theological Values

Several theological emphases stand out in 1 Corinthians, related to the daily living of Christians as well as to the corporate testimony of the worshiping church. For example, in ch. 15 Paul sets forth valid reasons for believing in the bodily resurrection of Christ and relates this to Christ's second coming. In ch. 11 the doctrine of the Lord's Supper is effectively taught, along with the admonition for Christians to take it seriously.

In chs. 5 and 6 Paul speaks forcefully against the incident of incest and adultery in the church and condemns all sexual immorality. Also in ch. 6 the thorny problem of believers' taking other believers into secular court is faced and Christian arbitration suggested. The practical problem of whether Christians should marry and how they should conduct themselves in a married or unmarried state is adequately discussed in ch. 7. Christian liberty versus the responsibility of believers to their fellow Christians is clearly explained in chs. 8 and 10. In the area of ecclesiology, the subjects of Christian gifts and their use for the church, as well as orderly conduct in church services, are fully expounded in chs. 12–14.

EXPOSITION

I. Greetings (1:1–3)

1 Characteristically, Paul begins by naming himself and by identifying his position as an apostle of Jesus Christ. He stresses his apostleship because his authority has been challenged (cf. 1:12; 9:1–27). He makes it clear that he is an apostle by divine calling through God's sovereign will (cf. Ac 9:15). The word "apostle" (GK 693) means "a sent one" and connotes a commissioned envoy.

Paul links Sosthenes to himself as a Christian brother; he was evidently one of the apostle's special helpers and was presumably well known to the Corinthian church. It is possible that he was at one time a leader of the Corinthian synagogue (Ac 18:17). If so, he must have been subsequently converted and gone off to help Paul in his Ephesian ministry.

2 The believers in Corinth are designated as the "church [ekklesia; GK 1711] of God" (cf. also Ac 20:28; 2Co 1:1), a phrase that has OT associations, as in the expression "assembly [or congregation] of the Lord" (Nu 16:3; 20:4, Dt 23:1; 1Ch 28:8) and the "assembly of Israel" (Lev 16:17; Dt 31:30). For Paul, this church at Corinth was considered a part of the universal "church of God"; note his reference to Palestinian churches as also being a part of that same body (1Co 15:9; cf. 10:31–32). The apostle may have found it particularly useful in Corinth to distinguish the church from the secular ekklesia (assembly) of Greek cities, which was the gathering of the citizenry in a city-state to discuss and decide on matters of public interest (cf. Ac 19:39).

The Corinthian Christians are described as "sanctified" (GK 39), i.e., set apart and in a holy position before God because of their spiritual union with Jesus Christ. Paul goes on to emphasize that they are called to live as God's holy people. They are on an equal footing with the people of God everywhere, who also call on the name of Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord (cf. Ac 9:14, 21). The unity of believers in Christ is shown by Paul's emphatic words in v.2, "their Lord and ours."

3 This verse is identical to Ro 1:7b; 2Co 1:2; Gal 1:3; Eph 1:2; and Phm 1:3. Though carrying a sense of greeting, "grace and peace" also refer to the truth of redemption purchased by Christ. It was of God's grace that the Corinthian believers were saved (2Co 8:9; Eph 2:8–9), just as all Christians are saved, and through this redemption Jesus Christ purchased peace with God for the sinner (Eph 2:14; cf. Ro 5:1). This grace and peace are from God our Father, who planned redemption, and from Christ, who purchased it on the cross for the justification of his people.

II. Paul's Thanksgiving for God's Work in the Lives of the Saints (1:4–9)

4–6 As is characteristic of Paul in his other letters (cf. Ro 1:8; Php 1:3–7; Col 1:3–8; et al.), he begins by thanking God for those whom he is addressing. He realizes that God has given them his grace through their union with Christ, enriching their lives by their ability to speak about God and by their knowledge of him (v.5). He is thankful that the testimony he gave them was confirmed in their lives. The form of the verb "I thank" (GK 2373) indicates that Paul regularly interceded for the believers at Corinth as well as thosewherever he preached the Gospel (cf. Eph 1:16; Php 1:3; et al.).

Greeks naturally put emphasis on knowledge and wisdom (cf. 1:18–25), and they certainly were good at expressing their thoughts. However, God had so enriched the lives of these Christians in Corinth in spiritual perception and expression that they had been given increased ability in speaking. The extent of their enrichment is seen in the use of the adjective "all" with both "speaking" and "knowledge" (v.5). These two terms are interrelated, for Paul uses a single preposition "in" to unite them. He is convinced that this was a real work of God's grace because he saw his witness about Christ established in their lives at the time of their conversion and had heard about it since then.

The reference to "knowledge" (GK 1194) in v.5 should not be construed to mean that the Corinthians possessed some hidden mystical knowledge by which they could, without the cross of Christ, somehow reach God and be saved (cf. Php 3:8, 10). While it is true that in the later heresy known as Gnosticism some thought they could do this, Paul is speaking about concrete knowledge based on the reality of Christ's person and his death on the cross.

7–8 Now Paul addresses himself to the Corinthians' need for present and future Christian living. He introduces the thought by "therefore": "Therefore you do not lack any spiritual gift." The potential lack indicated by the Greek verb does not necessarily refer to the lack of special gifts mentioned in chs. 12–14, because there Paul indicates that each Christian is not to exercise every gift (12:27–31). Rather, he seems to be referring more generally to God's grace actively counteracting the sins and faults so prevalent in the Corinthian congregation. Paul expresses confidence that God will keep them strong and will present his people blameless before him at Christ's return, for which they are eagerly waiting.

It is not clear in v.8 whom "he" refers to—God the Father or Christ. Christ is the nearer antecedent (v.7), but in the light of the reference to God's faithfulness in v.9, it is best taken as referring to the Father. Through his power and strengthening, Christians will certainly be blameless when Christ comes again.

9 Before concluding this section of thanksgiving, Paul assures the Corinthians of God's faithfulness. As God called them initially into fellowship with Christ, so he is "faithful" (GK 4412) in completing the work, granting them every grace and gift for daily life (cf. Php 1:6). Observe the apostle's fivefold repetition of the name of Jesus Christ in this brief section. All of salvation—past, present, and future—is based on Christ's redemptive work. And he is coming again!

III. The Problem of Divisions in the Church (1:10–17)

10 In the light of information given him about divisions in the church, Paul strongly exhorts the Christians both positively and negatively. He begins by charging them to have a united testimony, then adds his plea for inward harmony in mind and confession about Christ. Between these two positive exhortations Paul introduces the solemn purpose: "that there may be no divisions" in the Christian community. The word "divisions" (GK 5388) graphically conveys the idea of the dissensions that were rending the church. He makes this exhortation through the authority of Jesus Christ, whose name they revere.

11–12 Paul had received word about the divisions (which he here calls "quarrels") in the Corinthian church from members of a certain Chloe's house. Presumably, all of those quarrelling were Christians and were members of the church. They were divided into at least four factions, each one having its own emphasis, following its own leader, and acting in antagonism to the other three. How frequently local church congregations today are likewise divided into cliques!

At Corinth the four groups centered around four prominent leaders. First, there were those who claimed to be special adherents of Paul, possibly because of his emphasis on the ministry to the Gentiles, a ministry with which many of them were connected. Then there were those following Apollos, enamored of that learned and eloquent preacher from Alexandria (Ac 18:24; 19:1; Tit 3:13). The followers of Cephas (Peter's Aramaic name; cf. Jn 1:42) were no doubt impressed by this apostle's emphasis on the Jews. Possibly they connected him with the Judaizers. The mention of the "Christ" party suggests that some Corinthians claimed special relationship to Christ (2Co 10:7) or placed a special emphasis on him—an emphasis they felt the followers of Paul, Apollos, and Cephas had neglected or did not have.

13 Paul quickly destroys the validity of such distinctions by insisting that Christians are all one in Christ. "Is Christ divided?" he asks. He shows the foolishness of even raising the question by asking two other questions that imply a negative answer: he, Paul, was not crucified for them, nor were they baptized in his name. The same could be said also of Apollos and Peter.

14–16 The mention of baptism leads Paul to comment that the Corinthian believers had no reason to depend on the efficacy of baptism by him as a sanctifying grace, because he had baptized so few—Crispus, Gaius, and the household of Stephanus, these being the only ones he could remember as having been baptized by him. Crispus probably was at one time the head of the Corinthian synagogue (Ac 18:8), and Gaius was probably the Gaius mentioned as Paul's host in Ro 16:23. Stephanus was one of those whom Paul calls the "first converts in Achaia"; he, with Fortunatus and Achaicus, was with Paul at Ephesus (1Co 16:15, 17). The whole household (i.e., the family members and the servants) of this prominent man had been baptized by Paul.

17 Why Paul did not baptize more during his stay at Corinth we are not told. He does go on to state that his essential work was not baptizing but preaching the Gospel (Ac 26:17–18). That is, baptism was of secondary importance. This, then, gives him an opportunity to talk about the thrust of his preaching ministry. His method was to preach not "with words of human wisdom [GK 5053]," i.e., not with the cleverness of human argumentation (such as the methods used by philosophers like Plato and Aristotle). If he were to depend on human argument, the heart of the message of the cross would be emptied of its essential meaning.

IV. The Wisdom of God—the Preaching of Christ Crucified (1:18–2:16)

A. Christ, the Power and Wisdom of God (1:18–31)

In this section Paul emphasizes that salvation is in Christ and not in human wisdom. Because Christ, the power and wisdom of God, is the source of our salvation, we have no basis for boasting.

18–20 These verses flow logically from the proposition of v.17 that Paul did not come preaching with human wisdom. In his avoidance of human ostentation, he realizes that the straightforward presentation of the message of the cross produces two effects. It is foolishness to those who are on the way to being lost, but the power of God to those who are being saved (cf. Ro 1:16). In his emphasis that God's power for salvation is in the cross, Paul introduces an OT quotation from Isa 29:14 to show that God dismisses human wisdom as a means of salvation. In the Isaiah context, the Lord deplores the man-made precepts and mouthing of words for salvation (Isa 29:13) and declares that he will set aside human wisdom and understanding as a means of finding favor with him. This thought Paul now adapts to his argument.

Having established God's rejection of human striving for salvation through wisdom, the apostle now asks just where in fact "the wise man" (possibly an allusion to the Greeks; cf. v.22b) can be found who was able to do what the message of the cross of Christ had done. The "scholar" (GK 1208; translated "teacher of the law" elsewhere) was the Jewish professional who was skilled in interpreting the law. For the saved Jews in the Corinthian congregation this idea would be relevant. "The philosopher of this age" (v.20) was the man who wanted to dispute every issue and solve it by human reason. The designation could fit both Greek and Jew. The question Paul asks at the end of v.20 is introduced with a word that anticipates a positive response.

21–22 To Paul, in God's all-wise purpose human beings with all their philosophical and religious wisdom and searching "did not come to know God." This is not to deny the truth that people have a certain knowledge of God through the natural creation (cf. Ro 1:18–20). But Paul says it was God's good purpose to save those who believe by the seemingly foolish process of preaching the cross (cf. v.18).

In explaining the world's seeking God through wisdom, Paul states that the Jews seek for "miraculous signs" (GK 4956) and the Greeks seek "wisdom" (GK 5053), and that through these means they hope to find the answers to the questions about God and life. The Jews were seeking signs to identify the Messiah and the apocalyptic deliverance they hoped God would bring them (cf. Mk 8:11; Jn 6:30). But Jesus had said that they would be given only "the sign of the prophet Jonah" (Mt 12:39–40), pointing to his death as Messiah. The "Greeks" are primarily the native Greeks of Corinth, though in a broader sense that word also refers to the whole non-Jewish world (cf. Col 3:11; see also Paul's use of "Gentiles" instead of "Greeks" in v.23).

23 Paul's task is to preach Christ crucified. He uses the form of the verb "crucified" that implies that Christ's death has a continuous vicarious effect (cf. Gal 2:20). To the unsaved Jews, however, this message of a crucified Christ was a "stumbling block" (GK 4998), an offense, for they expected a political deliverer. To the nonJewish world the cross was "foolishness" (GK 3702)—criminals died on crosses, so how could the cross provide any moral philosophical standard to help them toward salvation? Furthermore, the Greeks and Romans looked on one crucified as the lowest of criminals, so how could such a one be considered a savior? The sophisticated Greeks would also have had difficulty in conceiving of how a god, being spirit, could become incarnate and thus provide a god-man atonement for sin.

24–25 In contrast, Paul states that God has his chosen ones, the "called" (GK 3105), from both the Jews and Gentiles. Paul has preached to such people about God's effective power to save them and his wise plan through Christ to bring this about. He then uses a kind of paradoxical hyperbole to present the greatness of God's wisdom: God has foolishness, God has weakness! What Paul means is that God's smallest, least significant thought is more worthwhile than the wisest plans of all humankind. And God's seemingly insignificant expression of his creative and providential power, such as the coming of the dew or the unfolding of a leaf, is greater and more effective than the mightiest thoughts and acts of people. God has complete control and fully accomplishes his purposes, while the power, acts, and thoughts of human beings are in comparison as nothing.

26–27 Having contrasted God's strength and human weakness, Paul now speaks about the circumstances under which God has called his people. The word "called" stresses his dynamic drawing of his people to himself (Ro 11:29; Eph 1:18). Not many of them were of the intellectual-philosopher class (i.e., wise according to human standards), nor of the politically powerful, nor of the upper level of society. By these three terms, Paul has given the sweep of all that humans count as socially, politically, and intellectually important.

Instead, God has chosen from the world those who seem foolish, weak, and helpless so that he might put to shame the wise and powerful by showing how temporary and insignificant to salvation their achievements are. In his grace he has showered his mercy on them and made them strong and wise in Christ.

28–29 Paul continues by stating that God has chosen those of the lower levels of society. First he mentions the slave class and the despised. These terms were particularly appropriate for the situation at Corinth because there were so many slaves there. Also among those God has called, Paul lists "the things that are not"—i.e., "the nonexistent," those who seem to the world to be nonentities. God has done this so that he might show those who seem to be important ("the things that are") that they can accomplish nothing for their own salvation because their wisdom, power, and importance are ineffective for this. As a result, no one may boast in God's presence that salvation has been gained by his or her own effort.

30–31 Instead of boasting, redeemed people must realize that salvation is all of God's grace: it is because of his effective plan that they are in saving union with Christ (cf. Jn 15:1–7; Ro 5:12–21). This saving relationship is a true one because Christ has been made for us wisdom from God, so that through him we have come to know God (Jn 1:18; 14:6–9) and are made "wise for salvation" (2Ti 3:14–17). Paul shifts from "you" to "we" to make certain the readers understand that all Christians, including himself, have this vital union with Christ.

Paul adds other effects or results of our union with Christ: he is righteousness, sanctification, and redemption for us. These concepts are best seen as explanatory of God's wise plan that is effective in the substitutionary atonement. Christ has become our righteousness, having our sin on himself (2Co 5:21). He has become our sanctification, having made possible our growth in grace in the Christian life (Ro 8:9–10; Eph 2:8–10; 2Pe 3:18). He is our redemption—the one by whom we have been delivered from sin (Ro 3:24), the devil, hell, and the grave (1Co 15:55–57).

Because of God's gracious provision of salvation in this way, all praise must go to the Lord. To strengthen this conclusion, Paul appeals to the authority of an OT quotation (Jer 9:24), using it in condensed form. In OT times as in NT times, it was the duty of saved people to glory in the Lord for his great salvation.

B. Paul Preaches Christ in the Power of God (2:1–5)

Paul now returns to the manner of his own preaching introduced in 1:17. He argues that since salvation is attained not through human wisdom or might but only through the cross, he came to Corinth in dependence on the Holy Spirit and simply preached Christ and the efficacy of his death.

1 In alluding to his visit to Corinth, Paul is thinking of the initial trip recorded in Ac 18:1–18, when the Corinthians first heard the message of salvation and believed. He did not depend on overpowering oratory or philosophical argument. He rather came preaching the "mystery" (GK 3696 [see NIV note]; NIV text reads GK 3457, "testimony") of God—the message not fully understood by them before, but now explained by him and illuminated by the Holy Spirit (2:10–14).

2 Paul came with the sole purpose of centering his attention on the truth concerning Jesus Christ—on the fact and meaning of his crucifixion. The "for" introducing this verse confirms the statement in v.1 about his simple proclamation of the cross. It was not sufficient for Paul to tell about Jesus and his life; he had also to tell about his death for sinners (cf. Ac 10:37–43). Christ died on a Roman cross at Jerusalem, and his death was effective then and is effective now to bring forgiveness to sinners (Gal 2:16).

3 Paul adds, in effect, "I came preaching, simply as a frail insufficient human being; I came with fear and a great deal of trembling as I realized the importance of preaching the eternal gospel." In writing somewhat later to the Christians at Philippi, he encouraged them to live their lives in a similar humble attitude, though with complete reliance on God (Php 2:12–13).

4 So Paul's message and preaching conform to his own personal attitude—he did not present his message in a way that depended on overpowering them with wise and persuasive arguments. Though he came in this unostentatious way, yet he came in a display of spiritual power because of the Holy Spirit. This is the first time in this letter that Paul mentions the Spirit's ministry.

5 Paul intends that the Corinthians' faith might not be a superficial, misdirected belief coming from human wisdom, but a real Christian faith generated by the power of God, who also worked in Paul as he preached (v.4). "The faith" (GK 4411) spoken of here is not just the act of believing but the substance of their belief based on the person and work of Christ. We must have the word of God as well as the power of God through the Spirit.

C. Wisdom of Christ Revealed by the Holy Spirit (2:6–16)

Paul now makes clear that his presentation of God's eternal plan of salvation (v.7) is based, through the Holy Spirit, on the wisdom of God revealed to Paul and to others, a wisdom to be understood by those who are God's people.

6 In case some think that the Gospel is devoid of wisdom, Paul states that it involves a higher wisdom discernible by those who are spiritually mature. Though some understand "the mature" (GK 5455) as referring to those far advanced in spiritual understanding compared with infants in Christ (cf. 3:1), the context favors the conclusion that the spiritually mature were the saved—those enlightened by the Holy Spirit—in contrast to the unsaved. This latter view is supported by Paul's argument that it is the unsaved who think the Gospel is foolish (1:21–23) and that the unsaved do not receive the things of the Spirit of God (2:14). This wisdom, Paul says, does not come from this age of time and space and certainly not from the rulers of this age (i.e., those who are of highest importance in the world), because such people crucified the Lord of glory (v.8). These rulers with their wisdom will end up in futility.

7 Describing God's wisdom further, Paul states that it is a wisdom that is contained in a mystery ("God's secret wisdom") not fully revealed, but one that God had planned before the beginning of the ages. This plan originated in God's mind, and though outlined in the OT, it is not as fully explained and understood there as it is in the NT. Moreover, God conceived of this plan of redemption in relation to the final glory of Christians when they will share with Christ the glory of God (Ro 8:17–18).

8 None of the earthly rulers understood such redemption relating to wisdom. By "rulers" Paul means the Sadducees, Pharisees, teachers of the law, and Herod Antipas, as well as the Romans represented by Pilate and his soldiers (Ac 4:25–28). Otherwise, they would not have crucified "the Lord of glory" (cf. "King of glory" in Ps. 24:7–10; "God of glory" in Ps 29:3; Ac 7:2). This phrase describes Christ's divinity, and Paul brings it together with Christ's human nature (he was crucified in a real body on a hard, real cross), leading to the conclusion that the Son of God, incarnate in a human being, died on the cross (cf. Ac 20:28).

9 However, Paul goes on to say, the "hidden" (GK 648) wisdom he has been preaching is the wisdom referred to in the OT. It was set forth in the promises God had prepared and laid up for his people—for those who love him. It is these promises that people like the rulers of this world still do not see and have not even thought of obeying. That God has prepared these things for us Christians implies that we will sometime know and share in these promised blessings (Ro 8:18–25), which, Paul hastens to say, have been revealed to God's people by the Spirit (v.10).

The expression "it is written" (v.9), often used to cite OT Scripture (cf. Mt 4:4; Mk 11:17; Ro 1:17, et al.), may mean here "to use the language of Scripture" or "to speak generally from Scripture" (cf. Jn 1:45), without meaning that the passage is formally cited. The first two lines of the quotation and the last line loosely refer to Isa 64:4, whereas the third line may merely be a thought from the OT generally as summarized by Paul (but cf. Isa 65:17). Verse 9 does not make a complete sentence in Greek (see the dash at the end of the verse), but Paul, in giving more than one OT thought, is not attempting strictly to weave them into his sentence structure.

10 Paul now begins to stress the work of the Holy Spirit in revealing the wisdom of God. God has revealed "to us" (i.e., to Paul, the other apostles, and their associates) the spiritual wisdom that the unsaved rulers of this world did not understand. "Revealed" (GK 636) is a strong term, usually used in the NT to indicate divine revelation of certain supernatural secrets (Mt 16:17; Lk 10:22) or an eschatological sense of the revelation connected with certain persons and events (Ro 8:18; 1Co 3:13). Throughout vv.10–16 it is Paul who speaks. mostly in the first person plural, strengthening the interpretation that he is referring primarily to divine revelation given to apostles. Later in 3:1–3 Paul returns to addressing the Corinthians as "you." But what is true primarily of Paul and the other apostles, is true secondarily for all Christians—the Holy Spirit helps them to interpret Scripture.

The latter part of this verse amplifies the first part by showing the extent ("all things") and depth ("the deep things of God") of the Holy Spirit's revelation of God's wisdom and truth. The Holy Spirit infallibly guided the writers of Scripture (2Pe 1:21) and continually works effectively in the lives of believers (Eph 1:17–19; 3:16–19).

11–12 "For" introduces an illustration that shows that the spiritual wisdom and truths of God can be understood only through the Holy Spirit, just as human wisdom needs the human spirit to understand it. The conclusion is that only the Holy Spirit can reveal God's wisdom and truth to humankind. The concept of "spirit" (GK 4460) in this verse involves a real personality who thinks and acts; it is not an impersonal force.

By way of application, Paul states that it is the Spirit of God they have received. This is in contrast to some other kind of spirit through which some might try to know God's wisdom and truth—whether the spirit of the wisdom of this world (1:20; 2:6; 3:19) or another kind of spirit (cf. 1Jn 4:2–6). The purpose of the Holy Spirit's special work of revelation (v.10) is that "we may understand what [i.e., the truths] God has freely given us."

13 Paul now reverts to the nature of his own ministry (cf. vv.4–5). He and other associates do not speak "in words taught . . . by human wisdom but in words taught by the Spirit," as they express spiritual truths in words conveying the real spiritual truth. Again, the contrast is between human wisdom and wisdom from God.

14 In using the generic term "man" (GK 476), the apostle now shows he is speaking of the unsaved in general, governed as they are only by their "soulish-human" nature; they do not accept enlightenment and truths from the Spirit of God. Therefore such persons consider those truths to be foolish. Paul states it even more strongly when he says that "the man without the Spirit" cannot understand these truths because they can be discerned and understood only with the guidance of the Spirit.

The verb translated "discerned" in v.14 is the same verb translated "make judgments" and "subject to man's judgments" in v.15 (GK 373). The idea of this verb involves making intelligent spiritual decisions following the examination (cf. 4:3).

15 In contrast to the unregenerate, persons who are guided by the Spirit draw discerning conclusions about all kinds of spiritual things, but such spiritual people are not subject to spiritual judgments by those who are without the Spirit (v.14). Elsewhere Paul teaches Christians the appropriateness of making judgments concerning the spiritual condition and actions of other Christians (see 5:9–12; 12:3; Gal 1:8.)

16 This verse confirms the thought of v.15 by quoting the LXX of Isa 40:13. The quotation in the form of a question casts doubt on the possibility of knowing God's wisdom, but the final statement gives reassurance that Christians do know it. This explains v.15b — the person who has God's Spirit is not subject to judgments by one who does not have the Spirit.

Paul introduces the "mind [GK 3808] of Christ" terminology in order to relate it to the OT expression he has just quoted—"the mind of the Lord." The verse implies that we and all God's people can understand spiritual truths and spiritual wisdom in a way similar to the way the Lord knows them. This verse is the climax of Paul's argument about his preaching of God's "foolishness" (the cross of Christ) without ostentation. Let the philosophers of Greece (cf. Ac 17:18, 32) and the Jews in their sign-seeking jeer and mock. They cannot really judge the message of Paul, who has the mind of Christ, because they do not have the Spirit of God and cannot judge spiritual truths.

V. Servants of Christ (3:1–4:21)

A. Workers With God—False Estimate Corrected (3:1–23)

In this passage Paul speaks to the Corinthians about the lack of spiritual discernment he has been discussing in ch. 2. This lack is seen in their misconceptions about those who are fellow workers with God. The corrective is given in his later statements about the importance of working correctly for the Lord (3:10–17) and not depending on humans or on human wisdom (3:18–23).

1. Spiritual immaturity and divisiveness (3:1–9)

1 As in 2:1, Paul calls the Corinthians "brothers" (GK 81) before reprimanding them for their spiritual immaturity. Not only had he not preached to them with persuasive words (2:1–5), but here he states he could not even speak to them as to those with spiritual maturity. They were acting immaturely as people controlled by the fleshly prejudices and viewpoints of the unsaved. Part of what he means is shown by his reference in vv.4–5 to the party contentions he had discussed in 1:10–17. The word "spiritual" (GK 4461) must be interpreted differently in 3:1 from its meaning in 2:14–15, where Paul uses it to denote the saved person in contrast to the unsaved. Here he combines it with "worldly" and "infants," so that "spiritual" refers to believers who are spiritually mature Christians.

2 Paul now amplifies the reference in v.1 to infants by explaining that when he first came, he fed the Corinthian Christians spiritual milk—i.e., the elementary salvation truths of the Gospel. He could not teach them deeper doctrines ("solid food") because they could not spiritually digest them. And their immaturity is continuing.

3–4 The word "worldly" (lit. "fleshly"; GK 4920) further indicates that these Christians are showing characteristics of spiritual immaturity. "For" prepares for Paul's illustrations of this worldliness—the "jealousy" and "quarreling" that plague the Christian community. His questions are stated in a way that expects a positive answer. The Corinthians, if honest with themselves, should admit their failing here. They are living the way the ordinary sinful people live—in selfishness, pride, and envy.

Implied here is an allusion to their divisions (see 1:10–17). Paul's example of himself and Apollos who shared in the ministry at Corinth (Ac 18:1–28) was needed to show the Corinthians that they had a distorted view of the Lord's work. Whenever they thought of God's work in terms of belonging to or following a particular Christian worker, they were simply acting on the human level and taking sides, just as the world does.

5 Paul now answers the question of how Paul and Apollos should be viewed. They are simply servants, as are any other workers. No Christian worker is ever to be idolized. Indeed, those who are idolized can become instruments for fragmenting the work of God. Believers must realize that Christian workers are simply God's agents through whom people believe in Christ. By "believe" (GK 4409) Paul not only means the initial trust in Christ (Ro 3:22–24) but, as v.6 shows, the planting, watering, and God-given increase—the whole process of growth in the Christian life to maturity (2Pe 3:18).

6–9 Paul bluntly states, "I planted the seed," and quickly adds, "Apollos watered it, but God made it grow." In vv.7–9 he draws some conclusions from his basic premise. (1) Since they are merely God's servants, they cannot themselves produce any spiritual results. Only God can do that (cf. Jn 3:5). (2) The servants with their various functions are really one, being united in God's work. (3) Though they are one in the work, yet they are individually subordinate to God and responsible to him who will reward them according to their faithful labor. (4) All is from God, and the church is his work (v.9). He uses people of different talents and temperaments to help him cause the church to grow.

Christians are the spiritual "field" in which God's servants are working. In speaking of their being God's cultivated field and of Paul and Apollos and others as God's workers in the field, the apostle brings to the minds of the Corinthians the farming going on in the plain below the city. There the land was plowed, the crops reaped, the grapevines tended, and the grapes gathered (cf. also Eph 2:20–22; 1Pe 2:5).

2. Building on Christ the foundation (3:10–17)

Paul closed v.9 by changing from the picture of a field to that of a "building" (GK 3869). He now discusses how God's servants can build the church of Christ. The foundation laid down through the preaching of the cross of Christ (1:18) is always the same—Jesus Christ. The Christian workers bring to it their labor and the spiritual materials they use to build the church upon Jesus Christ. At the end (i.e., the second coming of Christ), the payday comes, when the right kind of work will be rewarded and the wrong kind will be destroyed. This section ends with a declaration that Christians are the temple of God and a warning that no one is to destroy this temple, for such people will themselves be destroyed.

10–11 Paul views his skill as an expert builder (cf. Pr 8:30) as being possible only through God's grace. He knew God's plan for the building of his church (Eph 3:7–10) and had laid the doctrinal "foundation" (GK 2529) of "Jesus Christ and him crucified" (2:2; cf. Isa 28:16; Ac 4:11; Eph 2:20; 1Pe 2:6). He acknowledges that others, such as Apollos, also build on this same foundation. Then, shifting from the worker to the work, Paul gives a warning: All builders—Paul, Apollos, and whoever works for God—must be careful how they build. Any defects in their work will be their own fault. Christ cannot be blamed for it.

12–15 Paul turns his attention to the kind of materials Christian workers are using: the materials of preaching the cross for salvation, building up believers (cf. 1:18), and living a Christian life that is commensurate with that preaching (2:2–4). The purity and depth of such Christian teaching and a life corresponding to it are crucial, for that kind of building material will stand the test of fire on the day of the Lord's judgment.

Since valuable metals and precious stones were used to adorn ancient temples (cf. Rev 21:18–21), Paul could have taken his imagery from Herod's temple in Jerusalem (Mt 24:1–

2) or from the beautiful public and religious buildings in Athens (Ac 17:23) and Corinth. Such imagery would be sufficient to convey the thought of pure doctrine. The frames of ordinary houses and buildings were built of wood; hay or dried-grass, mixed with mud, was used for the walls; and roofs were thatched with straw or stalks. So the kind of insipid teaching and life represented by these lesser things will also have to face the test of the pure fire of God's justice and judgment, when it will be consumed.

"The Day" (GK 2465) is "the day of the Lord" (1Th 5:2–9), the day of the second coming of Christ (cf. 2Th 2:2). The "quality" of each one's work refers to the kinds of materials of doctrine and life that are used. The fire is the fire of God's judgment. Fire in Scripture is used figuratively in two ways: as a purifying agent (Mt 3:11; Mk 9:49) and as that which consumes (Mt 3:12; 2Th 1:7–8; Heb 12:29). So it is a fitting symbol here for God's judgment, as he tests the quality of the Christian's work.

Those Christians whose works stand the test of fire (cf. 1Pe 1:7) will be rewarded (cf. Mt 25:14–30; Lk 19:11–27). Those whose works are consumed by the fire will themselves escape the flames (as if they were jumping out of the burning wooden structure they had built) and be saved, but without any works of praise to present to Christ.

16–17 The "temple" (GK 3724) is reminiscent of the OT tabernacle and temple as well as the holy sanctuary built by Herod. As Jesus spoke of his earthly body as the "temple" (Jn 2:19–21), so his redeemed people, indwelt by the Spirit of God (1Co 6:19), can be called individually and collectively God's temple.

Paul challenges the church with the fact that they together (the word "you" is plural) are the spiritual temple of God, because the Spirit of God dwells in them (Eph 2:22; 1Pe 2:5). Therefore those who build this temple in a shoddy way deserve the destruction of their doctrine and false testimony as described in v.15. Implicit in this is a warning against any false teachers coming in among the believers.

More pointedly, Paul states that anyone who actually destroys or tends to destroy God's temple will be destroyed by God (cf. Lev 15:31). The reason is clear: God's temple is "sacred" (GK 41), i.e., set apart to holiness (Isa 28:16; Rev 3:12). In his justice and holiness, God cannot allow any part of his holy work to be damaged without bringing retribution. Here is a fitting warning to every Christian minister and worker.

3. Complete dependence on God, not other people (3:18–23)

18–20 Paul now returns to the subject of "wisdom" (GK 5055) and warns the believers not to be deceived into thinking that the wisdom of this human age is sufficient for obtaining salvation and for building up the church of God. Rather, if any Christians think themselves to be wise by this world's standards, they must renounce dependence on that wisdom in order to really receive God's wisdom (v.18).

To prove this, Paul again mentions the truth of 1:18–25—the seeming foolishness of the preaching of the cross is really God's true wisdom for salvation. Directly and forcefully he declares that the wisdom of this world is foolishness in God's sight, and he uses two OT Scriptures to support this. The first is a free rendering of Job 5:12–13, which he applies in a special sense to God. The graphic word "catches" vividly portrays the idea that humans in their craftiness are no match for God—they set up their schemes of salvation against God's, but he catches them up short. His second quotation is Ps 94:11 (from the LXX), showing that the Lord knows all the futile thoughts of the so-called wise men—nothing that enters their minds is beyond his understanding. All that is not in tune with God's thoughts is vain.

21–22 The conclusion is that no Christian should be "boasting" (GK 3016) or glorying in human wisdom and attainments—not even in those of Paul or Apollos. Why not? Because all things—yes, all the blessings of God in the whole universe—belong to the redeemed church. So the ministry of Paul, Apollos, Cephas (Peter), and any other Christian worker belongs to God's people. Also the world itself, the processes of living and dying, the present and the future—all must be viewed in relationship to God's purposes and plans for his redeemed people. So Paul can say, "All things are yours." Everything is for the believers' benefit and belongs to them.

23 All things are not, however, centered in believers, for all things actually and finally belong to God. They belong to Christians only as they themselves belong to God through the mediatorship of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. Christ and the Father are one (Jn 1:1; 10:30), yet Christ was sent by the Father into the world (Jn 10:36; 17:18) to effect our redemption so that we may "inherit the kingdom" (Jas 2:5).

B. Servants of Christ: the Ministry of the Apostles (4:1–21)

1. Faithful servants (4:1–5)

These verses follow up the preceding discussion about Christian workers. Here Paul adds that such servants of Christ must also be considered stewards of God—those to whom a trust has been committed, a trust they are to be faithful to.

1 Everyone should count Paul and other Christian workers as "servants" (GK 5677) of Christ, fully responsible to him and not to the Corinthians. The phrase "those entrusted with" (GK 3874) means "house stewards" and refers to a position often held by a slave (e.g., Joseph, Ge 39:2–19) entrusted with managing the affairs of a household. "The secret things [GK 3696] of God" indicates the mysteries of salvation God has revealed in his Word (Ro 16:25; Eph 1:9; 3:3–4; 1Ti 3:16)—things one cannot discover by human wisdom (cf. 2:1). These truths of the cross have been entrusted to Christian workers to be carefully used and guarded. As subordinate servants of Christ, they have no right of authority over those truths, but must minister them in Christ's name to God's people.

2–4 Paul now examines the character of those who are handling God's truth: they, including himself, must first of all show themselves faithful. Since he is the Lord's servant and steward, it is to the Lord that he owes responsibility, and it is the Lord who "judges" (GK 373) him for the quality of his service. Human judgment has little value; even self-evaluation is unreliable. Christ is Lord of the conscience and the one who can evaluate it properly.

5 The apostle leaps forward to the return of Christ when all Christians will have their works examined at the judgment seat of Christ (2Co 5:10). Because of this, he charges the Corinthians not to judge his faithfulness, for this can be done truthfully only by the Lord when he returns. Therefore, knowing that the Corinthians are already judging him and others, he says to them in effect, "Curb your habit of judging."

"What is hidden in darkness" are the acts and motives concealed in the inner recesses of a person's mind and heart. In Hebrew poetic style (cf. Ps 18:10), Paul says the Lord will "expose the motives of men's hearts" as an explanation of his statement, "He will bring to light what is hidden in darkness." Thus, at the second coming of Christ, those who have been faithful in their work for the Lord will receive praise from him (cf. 3:8; also the parables in Mt 25:14–23; Lk 19:12–19). As the final judging must be done by God, so one's final praise will come from him.

2. The proud Corinthians and the despised servants (4:6–13)

Paul describes the difference between himself and Apollos and some of the other Christian leaders. The Corinthians, he says, were proud and claimed to be spiritually rich. On the other hand, Paul and Apollos were considered weak and were despised and persecuted.

6 What Paul has said about not judging or misjudging Apollos or himself he wants understood as applying to the Corinthians' attitude toward all of God's people; they should not take pride in some and despise others. In referring to this misconception on their part, the apostle may be alluding to the real leaders of the factious parties for whom the other names—Paul, Apollos, Peter, and Christ—had been substituted. Or he may be simply referring to some who were responsible for stirring up this misconception about how God's ministers should be viewed.

In the expression "I have applied these things to myself and Apollos," Paul says he is teaching the Corinthians by personal illustration that ministers are only examples, rather than merely teaching them by abstract principles.

The saying "Do not go beyond what is written" contains the familiar phrase often used to introduce OT quotations. Paul is advising the Corinthians not to go beyond any written doctrine in the OT. The last clause in v.6, like the preceding clause, is one of result and fits into the context as follows: If they learn not to go beyond the teaching of the Scripture about how they should treat God's teachers and all of God's people, then the result will be that they will not be conceited in taking a stand for one teacher or person over against another.

7–8 Some Christians evidently were boasting because of their talents, positions, and parties. So Paul puts the rhetorical question to them: "What do you have that you did not receive?" The obvious answer is that they received everything from God and had no right to boast. He therefore derides their conceit by a series of dramatic boasts of theirs: they, so they think, have all they need; they are rich and are reigning like kings, even without any help from Paul. The Corinthians evidently thought they had reached full maturity and were ruling and reigning rather than walking humbly with God.

9 Continuing the irony, Paul replies that in his opinion, God has not placed the apostles in a reigning position such as the Corinthians think they themselves are in. The irony is that the Corinthians were trying to reign as "kings," while their spiritual fathers and examples were far from reigning. Actually, Paul goes on to explain that God has publicly displayed the apostles (using this term in the widest sense to include not only Peter and himself but also Apollos and perhaps other prominent Christian workers; cf. Ac 14:14; Ro 16:7) as humble, despised men—men worthy of death. He pictures those of the apostolic band as condemned to death and led forth by a conqueror. The word "spectacle" (GK 2519) alludes to the figure of condemned men tortured and exposed to the wild animals in the colosseum. They are despised before both the whole world and the angelic hosts.

10 Paul makes a series of contrasts between the proud Corinthians and the "dishonored" apostles—all from the warped viewpoint of the Corinthians. What a contrast: the apostles—foolish, weak, and dishonored; the Corinthians—wise, strong, and honored!

11–13 To set the record straight, Paul describes in detail the hardships he and his fellow Christian workers have suffered throughout their ministry. He first emphasizes the physical deprivations they were suffering: hunger, thirst, lack of clothing, rough treatment, and homelessness. To remind the Corinthians again that he has no desire to be a physical burden to them, he injects the statement, "We work hard with our own hands." He continues by mentioning mainly the verbal abuse he and his friends took and their response to it. They were frequently reviled, but they called on God to bless their revilers! When persecuted, they endure it; and when slandered, they answer kindly. Climaxing this moving passage, Paul states that he and his fellow workers have become like the scum of the earth.

3. The challenge to be God's humble servants also (4:14–21)

Paul concludes this section (4:1–21) with a challenge for the Corinthian Christians to be spiritually humble; to this end he has sent Timothy to help them, and he himself will also come later.

14–17 Paul's seeming harshness in writing this to the Corinthians was not to "shame" (GK 1956) them but to warn them of the seriousness and perverseness of their actions and their pride. He grants that they have countless guides or guardians but denies that they have spiritual fathers to advise them. This reference to "guardians" (GK 4080) calls attention to the distinction between himself, their spiritual father, and their other leaders. In the ancient Roman Empire, "guardians" were slaves who escorted boys to and from school and were in charge of their general conduct. So, in a sense, they could be called instructors (cf. Gal 3:24). But he, Paul, has begotten them in Christ (i.e., by Christ's atoning work) through the Gospel and is therefore their spiritual father. So he feels he has a right to advise them, specifically to ask them to become imitators of him (cf. 1Co 11:1; Gal 4:12; Php 3:17; 1Th 1:6; 2Th 3:9). He has sent Timothy to them to help them in their progress. Timothy, too, was Paul's beloved child, "begotten" through the Gospel, and faithful in the Lord—i.e., in his service for Christ.

Though Paul mentions having sent Timothy, the latter was evidently not the messenger who brought the 1 Corinthians letter. He is not mentioned in the greetings at the beginning or at the end of this letter, suggesting that he was not with Paul in Ephesus at the time Paul wrote this letter. Further, Ac 19:22 states that Paul had sent Timothy from Ephesus to Macedonia, and 1Co 16:10 implies that he was to continue on to Corinth and was still on his way. It is more likely that Stephanus, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, who are indicated as being from Corinth and who are said to be with Paul (16:17), were the bearers of the letter (see the introduction). Paul expects that when Timothy arrives at Corinth he will cause the saints there to reflect on all Paul's work and actions, and that they correspond to his teaching in all the churches. As should be true of every Christian, Paul practiced what he preached.

18–21 Now concerning his own proposed trip to Corinth, Paul addresses some in the church who had acted arrogantly as though he were not going to come and did not dare to do so. These were the false teachers who were trying to undermine his authority (cf. 9:1–3; 2Co 12:12) by saying he was unstable (2Co 1:17) and weak and that his message was of no importance (2Co 10:10).

Paul replies that, the Lord willing, he will come without delay and will then find out the real power of the arrogant persons who are doing all the talking against him (v.19). "But" emphasizes the contrast: Talk is cheap! What real power do these people have to promote their unscriptural and derogatory ideas? Paul uses the expression "kingdom [GK 993] of God" here in the present spiritual sense of God reigning over his people and demonstrating his power in their lives. He is talking about the life that comes from Christ (2Co 5:17)—the new birth and its power (cf. Jn 3:3–8).

Paul climaxes his thought with the question, "What do you prefer?" He poses two alternatives: to come "with punishment, or in love and with a gentle spirit" (i.e., in a manner expressing gentleness). So Paul has answered their charge that he is afraid.

VI. Paul's Answer to Further Reported Problems in the Church (5:1–6:20)

A. Paul's Condemnation of Sexual Immorality—Incest (5:1–13)

The sin of sexual immorality and the church's indifference to it is the second major evil in the Corinthian congregation that Paul mentions. Corinth was noted for its loose and licentious living (see the introduction), a situation duplicated in the prevailing lack of moral standards in contemporary society. In this chapter Paul condemns the sin of incest and rebukes the church for its arrogance in this matter and its failure to excommunicate the violator—something Paul insists on (vv. 1–5). The purity he describes is symbolized in the removal of yeast in the celebration of the OT Passover, which is fulfilled in Christ, "our Passover lamb" (vv.6–8). He closes with instructions that the church should guard its own membership against sexually immoral persons, but should not try to Christianize unbelievers by forcing biblical standards on them (vv.9–13).

The ruins of the central square in old Corinth are still highly visible. Courtesy Bastiaan Van Elderen.

1 The Greek word porneia (GK 4518) used in this verse is accurately translated "sexual immorality." Paul has heard a widespread report that a particular man of their congregation had married his stepmother (the NT expression "to have a woman" means "to marry" her; cf. Mt 14:4; 1Co 7:2, 29). Such a sin of incest, Paul says, is not even practiced among non-Christians. It was also strictly forbidden according to Lev 18:8 and Dt 22:30 and carried with it a curse (Dt 27:20). Rabbinic law, however, seems to have allowed a marriage when a proselyte married his stepmother, since his becoming a proselyte broke all bonds of relationship. It is possible that some in the Corinthian church who had come from the synagogue may have known of this allowance. Though as a Pharisee (cf. Php 3:5) Paul knew the system of Jewish law with its varying interpretations, he applies the OT law and its teaching on marriage strictly.

2–3 Paul again alludes to the pride of the Corinthians. This time it was a pride that, rather than causing them to mourn over the shocking sin, allowed them to tolerate such a sinner in their midst. Paul presses his judgment of the case by saying that he is with them in spirit and has already passed judgment on the offending person.

4–5 Though the local congregation itself is to gather and discipline the offender, Paul reminds them of his apostolic authority over them by saying, "I am with you in spirit." But he does not overassert his authority, because he recognizes that the decision is to be made "in the name [GK 3950] of our Lord Jesus" (i.e., by the authority of Jesus, for his name carries authority), and that it is to be done with "the power [GK 1539] of our Lord Jesus." These two expressions amplify each other: church discipline must be exercised carefully on the authority of Jesus' name, and the verdict given is accompanied by the spiritual power of the Lord.

By saying, "Hand this man over to Satan, so that his sinful nature [or body] may be destroyed," Paul includes both the man's excommunication (cf. v.2) and some form of physical suffering, even as far as death (cf. 1Ti 1:20). The word sarx (lit., "flesh"; GK 4922) can mean the "sinful nature," but since "flesh" in this verse stands in contrast to "spirit" (GK 4460), the reference seems to be to the human body. That Satan has power to afflict the body is evident from frequent NT references to the effects of demon possession (cf. Mt 9:32–33; Lk 9:39–42) and to satanic activity in causing affliction or limitation (2Co 12:7; 1Th 2:18). This bodily punishment by Satan, Paul hopes, will have the effect of causing the man to repent so that his spirit (i.e., his person) may be saved at the second coming of Christ.

Although Paul teaches church excommunication here, he does not say that the man should divorce his stepmother. This accords with the scriptural teaching that marriage is an indissoluble bond (Ge 2:24). He does imply that by repenting the man's spirit will be saved. Some interpreters see in 2Co 2:6–7 and 7:9–12 a reference to this man, that he did repent. If true, such an interpretation implies that the man was to be allowed to come back into fellowship in spite of his incestuous marriage.

6–8 Paul illustrates Christian holiness and discipline by the OT teaching that no yeast was allowed in the bread eaten at the Passover feast. Yeast in Scripture generally conveys the idea of evil or sin (cf. Mt 16:6). If the church allowed such sin as that described here to go undisciplined, it would affect the attitude of the entire Christian community toward sin by working its way "through the whole batch of dough." The church must get rid of the old yeast—"the sin that so easily entangles" (Heb 12:1)—by getting rid of the sinner; it must thus become an unleavened batch of dough, a new creation in Christ, who has been sacrificed as our Passover lamb.

Christ, "our Passover lamb" (GK 4247), died at the time of the Jewish Passover celebration (see the discussion of this issue in comments on Jn 13:2). The Passover, which began when the lambs were sacrificed, is called the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Mk 14:12). So Paul concludes in v.8, "Let us keep the Festival"—that is, let us live the Christian life in holy consecration to God (cf. Ro 12:2; 1Pe 2:5). This means, he says, that we are to live not with the old yeast of malice and wickedness, but on the basis of the unleavened principles of sincerity and truth. Therefore, such sins as incestuous marriages cannot be tolerated or left undisciplined in the church.

9 Though the letter here referred to could possibly be a reference to the preceding part of the present letter, it is more natural to conclude that Paul had written a previous letter that we do not possess. Paul now comments on a subject discussed in that former letter—that of not associating with sexually immoral people (those committing any type of sexual sins, including incest), a point the Corinthians had not fully understood. The social milieu in Corinth was notoriously immoral and if the Corinthians took the command in the previous letter too literally, as they seem to have done, they would have had to break contact with even some family members, business associates, and social acquaintances.

10 Paul proceeds to correct their misunderstanding. By referring to other categories of sinners besides the sexually immoral, he shows that his earlier reference to the sexually immoral meant only that such people should not continue as a part of the church community. If Paul had meant that contact or even acquaintance with all sinners was to cease, then Christians could not live at all in human society.

By the words "not at all," Paul limits the extent of his command. He is talking about the sexually immoral of the secular world system, who are not to be included as a part of the church community. The "greedy" (GK 4431) persons here are literally the ones "who must have more" (cf. Ro 1:29; Eph 4:19; Col 3:5). Greed is a serious sin, and Paul touches on aspects of it in 6:7–8. The word translated "swindler" (GK 774) really means one who steals by violence.

11 Having explained that he did not mean Christians are to be totally dissociated from the world, Paul hastens to add that the church community should not "associate" (GK 5264) with such flagrant sinners as those enumerated, even if they carry the name "brother" (i.e., are part of the Christian fellowship). They should not eat together. In sharing in a common meal, Christians show their union with one another. This eating is probably not the Lord's Supper, but any meal, including the Christian agape (love feast). This kind of association should still be avoided, for otherwise believers raise questions about the validity of their own Christian profession. To the list of sinners in v.10 Paul now adds the slanderer and the drunkard (cf. 6:10; 11:21; Eph 5:18; 1Th 5:7).

12–13 Though it is logical and necessary for the church to exercise spiritual discipline over members within its fellowship (the question asked in v.12 implies a positive answer), the church has no business judging and seeking to discipline those outside the church's communion, i.e., unsaved society. Paul concludes by insisting that the wicked man who had married his stepmother must be put out of the church. This he commands by quoting somewhat loosely from Dt 22:24 (a context of adultery) and Dt 24:7 (a context of stealing).

B. Christian Morality Applied to Legal and Sexual Matters (6:1–20)

1. Christian morality in legal matters (6:1–11)

Continuing in the area of moral and ethical practice, Paul now discusses the apparently common practice of the Corinthians of settling noncriminal property cases before non-Christian judges or arbitrators. He refers to the Roman law courts, where Roman law was strictly administered in accordance with Roman standards. "What about God's standards?" Paul asks. They as a Christian community should have been deciding such cases among themselves. In Christian love they should have "turned the other cheek" (cf. Mt 5:39) and suffered wrong and loss of material goods (v.7) rather than go to court over such matters.

1–2 In speaking of Christians taking other Christians to court, Paul does not specify any criminal cases, for he teaches elsewhere that these, along with any punitive penalties, must be handled by the state (Ro 13:1–7). The legal "cases" (GK 3215) referred to here, therefore, include different kinds of property cases (v.7). The decisions to be made by Christians are ministerial and declarative (cf. Mt 16:18–19; 18:18–20; Jn 20:19–23), not punitive. By "dare" (GK 5528), Paul strongly admonishes rather than commands Christians to take their legal grievances for settlement before qualified Christians. In this way, he allows for the possibility that under some circumstances Christians might take cases to the secular civil court.

Paul writes here in the light of Roman law, which allowed Jews to apply their own law in property matters; and Christians, who were not yet distinguished as a separate class, must have had the same privilege. But since Jewish and Christian communities appealed to Roman law for the right to try their own property cases, certainly it would be right to take some cases before the civil court. By analogy, Paul himself, who had received his Roman citizenship according to Roman law, appealed to the civil courts—to the Roman commander (Ac 22:25–29), to the governor (Ac 23:27; 24:10–21), and to the emperor (Ac 25:4–12)—to establish his right to a proper trial and proper treatment as a Roman citizen (Ac 16:37–39). In modern life this biblical principle allows for church cases to be brought into civil courts to determine the extent of the rights of the congregation—as, for example, their right to own and retain their own church property. What concerned Paul was that the Corinthians were failing to exercise their prerogative in settling such cases themselves.

The "saints" (GK 41) are those who are holy—those consecrated and set apart for God; the same word is translated "God's people" in v.2. They are in sharp contrast with the "ungodly" (GK 96) or the unsaved. In saying that God's people will judge the world, Paul is writing eschatologically. At the second coming of Christ, God's people, who are coheirs with Christ (Ro 8:17), will reign and judge the world with him in his millennial kingdom (2Ti 2:12; Rev 20:4; cf. Da 7:22; Mt 19:28).

3 To make his argument even stronger for the validity and competence of Christians to settle cases at Corinth, Paul teaches that Christians will even judge angels, though he does not specify any details (v.3). He probably means that Christians, when ruling in the future with Christ, will have a part in judging the devil and the fallen angels at the Second Coming (cf. Rev. 19:19–20; 20:10). Alternatively, Paul may mean that Christians will preside with Christ over the angelic host (cf. Mt 19:28, where Jesus speaks about sitting "on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes," i.e., presiding over them).

4 The main verb "appoint" (GK 2767) is probably an imperative with a sarcastic tone. What Paul is saying is this: "If you must have disputes about these mundane matters when you are destined to judge men and angels, well then go ahead and get the least esteemed members of the congregation to take care of these little matters!" Such an interpretation fits in with Paul's other ironic remarks to the Corinthians (see 4:8).

5–6 Paul now argues positively that if it is really necessary for such disputes to be handled, they should find a Christian wise enough to take care of them, rather than have Christians oppose each other in secular litigation. They should be ashamed of themselves in the way they are acting.

7–8 In climaxing his argument, Paul feels that the very existence of legal cases among the Corinthians shows a malicious attitude and spiritual failure. Instead of being involved in all these disputes and harming and cheating their fellow Christians, they should be willing to suffer wrong.

9–10 Paul concludes that in practicing such acts of wickedness toward others, they had better realize that the wicked will not inherit "the kingdom" (GK 993) of God (cf. Jn 3:3–5). They are in a dangerous frame of mind—they must remember that if they act wickedly in this way, they are no better than those who will not inherit heaven. To the list of sinners already mentioned in 5:10–11 Paul points out specific kinds of sexually immoral people: the adulterers, the male prostitutes, homosexuals (in Ro 1:26 he also mentions lesbians), and thieves. In the light of this comparison, the Corinthians should have seen how unchristian and sinful their actions were toward one another.

11 Some of the Corinthians at one time participated in such sins. In describing their conversion, the apostle lists three transactions that occurred at the time when the Lord saved them: they were "washed" (GK 666), i.e., they were spiritually cleansed by God in submitting themselves to baptism (cf. Mt 28:19); they were "sanctified" (GK 39), an expression either amplifying the concept "washed" (cf. Tit 3:5–6) or meaning that they had been set apart as God's people (cf. 1Pe 2:9); and they were "justified" (GK 1467), showing God's act as judge in declaring sinners righteous because of Christ (Ro 3:23–26; 5:1) and in qualifying them for his cleansing. All this, Paul says, was done by God for them on the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ and by the regenerating power of the Holy Spirit.

2. Christian morality in sexual matters (6:12–20)

Every action we contemplate should be tested by two questions: "Is it beneficial?" and "Will it overpower and enslave me and so have a detrimental effect on the church and my testimony for Christ?" The main thrust of these verses argues against sexual immorality and for glorifying God in our bodies.

12–13 Undoubtedly there were some Christians in Corinth who, without examining the Scriptures and its implications, claimed that it was permissible for them to do anything they desired. In making such claims to unrestricted freedom, they evidently argued that since the physical activity of eating and digesting food did not have any bearing on Christian morals and one's inner spiritual life, other physical activities such as promiscuous sex did not touch on either morals or spiritual life.

Paul grants that food and the stomach are temporal and transitory and, in God's providence, will disappear—but he denies that what affects the body is unimportant; this denial especially includes the undisciplined and unscriptural use of the body in sexual practices (v.13b). So he denies the parallel between eating and digesting food as a natural process and practicing sexual immorality as a natural process. Of course, he is not denying that sex in wedlock is natural and wholesome (7:3–5; cf. also Heb 13:4).

The apostle sets the stage for discussing the horrors of sexual immorality and the contrasting holy use of the Christian's body by stating that as they evaluate their right to do "all things," Christians should ask themselves four questions: (1) Is the thing contemplated beneficial to me? (2) Will the practice in question overpower and dominate me, and will the result affect others? (3) Will the practice support the truth that the body is "for the Lord," who created it and intended it to be used for his glory? (4) Will it support the truth that "the Lord is for the body"—i.e., the Lord has redeemed my body (vv.19–20)? Thus the Christian must have no part with sexual immorality, because the body is not meant for sexual license (v.13b; cf. Ge 2:24) but for the Lord.

14 Paul goes on to state God's interest in the Christian's body. As God raised the body of Jesus from the tomb, so he will raise the bodies of his people from the grave through his power. The phrase "through the power of God" is probably to be taken with both parts of the sentence: the power of God was used to raise the Lord, and it will also be used to raise his people.

15–17 A further argument that the Christian's body is for the Lord is that God's people are members of his mystical body (cf. 1Co 12:27). So Christians may not unite their bodies with that of a prostitute. They should understand that sexual relations involve more than a physical act—they join the two persons together (v.16; quoting from Ge 2:24; cf. Mt 19:5). Since Christians have been joined in union to the Lord, they dare not form another union with a prostitute.

Verse 17 states the case even more strongly: while the one who cleaves to a prostitute is one body with her, the one who cleaves to the Lord is united to him spiritually. In saying this, Paul is not making the union of normal marriage mutually exclusive of the union of God with his people. He teaches in Eph 5:21–32 that the human marriage union is valid and is to be viewed in the light of the Christian's higher union with the Lord. What Paul argues against here is that unholy union with a prostitute is a wicked perversion of the divinely established marriage union.

18 Those who commit sexual immorality sin against their own body—that is, by weakening and perverting the very life process, as well as human character. In contrast, other sins are "outside the body." From such sins Christians should be continually fleeing.

19–20 Now Paul talks positively about how Christians should view their bodies. (1) They should consider that their bodies, including their whole personality, form "the temple" (GK 3724)—the sacred dwelling place—of God, the Holy Spirit. (2) Christians have received the Spirit from God to help them against sin. (3) They have no right to pervert and misuse their bodies, for they are not their own master but have been purchased by God at a price (v.20). That price, though not mentioned here, is the blood of Jesus Christ (Eph 1:7; 1Pe 1:18–19; et al.). The picture is of a slave (Ro 6:17; cf. 1Co 7:23) being purchased from the horrible system of slavery. Christians have been freed from being overpowered by sin (Ro 6:17–18) and Satan (Col 1:13) and are enslaved to Christ (Ro 1:1) and to righteousness (Ro 6:18).

The conclusion of the matter is that Christians must glorify God in their bodies. Since Paul has been writing about individuals and since the individual Christian is indwelt by the Holy Spirit, it is best to understand v.19 to mean that each individual Christian's body is a temple of the Holy Spirit (contrast 3:16–17).

VII. Paul's Answers to Questions Raised by the Church (7:1–14:40)

Paul now begins to answer questions the Corinthians had raised in a letter to him (7:1). He begins by using the Greek words peri de ("now concerning"); he uses this same introductory phrase elsewhere in this section as he takes up other questions of the Corinthians—about the unmarried (7:25), food sacrificed to idols (8:1), and spiritual gifts (12:1). It is not certain whether his instruction in 16:1–4 regarding giving for the need of the saints was in answer to their written question, since it is separated by ch. 15 from the main section dealing with these questions (7:1–14:40). But since the same introductory phrase occurs in 16:1, it is reasonable to conclude that this issue is a postscript answer to another of their questions (see comment on 16:1–4).

A. Instructions Concerning Marriage (7:1–40)

The Corinthians had written a letter to Paul, asking at least two questions concerning the subject that is the topic of this entire chapter. The first was whether a Christian should get married at all (7:1), and the second was whether virgins should get married (7:25). Evidently there were those in Corinth who, as Jewish believers relying on Ge 2:24, were advocating marriage. Others were no doubt arguing for the unmarried state. Besides answering these questions, Paul deals with an additional point, that a Christian should live according to God's calling, whether married or single (7:17–24).

1. Christian obligations in marriage (7:1–16)

1 As to the question from the Corinthian church on the pros and cons of being married, Paul may seem to agree completely with those who argued for a celibate life—in contrast to Ge 2:18, "It is not good for the man to be alone," and the usual Jewish view in favor of the married state. But Paul's statement of 7:1 is not to be taken absolutely; it is his suggestion specifically for Corinth because of some present crisis there (v. 26; cf. vv.29, 35). Part of this crisis may have been connected with possible persecution they might have to suffer for the Lord.

It is difficult to hold, as some do, that Paul here is teaching against marriage because he felt the second coming of Christ was near. If that were his position, he would naturally have argued against marriage in his other letters also. But in Eph 5 and 1Ti 3 he speaks in favor of marriage. Further, in 1Ti 4:1–3 Paul states that "forbidding to marry" is one of the signs of the approaching end-time apostasy, and in Heb 13:4 it is said that "marriage should be honored." It is true that distresses and crises are connected with both the first and second comings of Christ (cf. Mt 24:3–14; 1Pe 1:10–12). But reference to "crises" (7:26) need not be pressed to mean that the Corinthian Christians should not get married because the Lord was to come shortly.

For an alternate view, see the NIV note.

2–4 Having said that it would be good under the present circumstances not to get married, Paul hastens to add that the general rules for marriage should apply. The reason, especially true at Corinth, is the prevalence of sexual immorality, into which they also might be tempted to fall. Since the temptation might affect either sex, Paul specifies that each man should have his own wife and each woman her own husband.

So that no abnormal situations in the Christian marital status might develop, leading to sexual immorality (v.5), the apostle gives instruction regarding normal sexual behavior and attitudes that the Christian man and woman should have (vv.3–6); in doing so he argues against a forced asceticism. Christians should have normal sexual relations, and Paul strengthens his argument by stating that the bodies of the marriage partners belong to each other (cf. 6:16). Having stated the principle in v.4, Paul adds the command that husbands and wives may withhold these normal marital rights from each other by mutual consent, but only for a specified purpose (so that they may spend time in prayer) and for a specified period of time (v.5). In this way, as those who are united to Christ (6:17), they may exercise their rights and privileges in communing with God. But when this separate time of prayer is over, the married pair are to come together again, lest Satan, the enemy of Christians (1Pe 5:8), tempt one or the other partner with sexual immorality through possible lack of sexual self-control. Paul recognizes the strong but normal sexual drive in the human being (cf. Ge 1:28), but also knows that it can be used wrongly to displease God.

5–7 The present tense of the verb "deprive" (GK 691) in the prohibition in v.5 indicates that some at Corinth were practicing a kind of celibacy within marriage. This sentence may be translated, "Stop depriving one another." Through the word "time" (GK 2789), the apostle impresses on Christians that a time limitation should apply for marriage partners to agree to be parted from one another.

In Paul's comment that "this" comes not by direct command (i.e., from the Lord) but by permission or concession, it is not clear what the "this" refers to. Perhaps it is best to understand it as referring to v.2, indicating that though marriage is desirable and is according to God's creation plan, it is not mandatory. That this is Paul's meaning is evident from v.7, where he says he really wishes everyone was single like him. However, he recognizes that God gives each one his or her own gracious "gift" (charisma; GK 5922). Some are given the desire or the inclination to be married, and some have the power to refrain from marriage.

8–9 Paul now gives advice to those who are single, whom he classifies as the unmarried and the widows. It is good or advisable for them to remain in their single state for the reasons spelled out in vv.26, 32–35. However, in another situation Paul counsels the younger widows to marry (1Ti 5:14). He then adds a postscript. If the situation is such that these persons cannot control their sexual desires, they should marry. It is, after all, better to get married than be inflamed with sexual desire, which is hard to control outside of marriage.

10–11 Paul's next major concern relates to Christians and divorce. What he states in v.10 "to the married" is by "command"—not his own, but the command of the Lord. He has just stated that for the unmarried to remain so is a "good" thing if a person can control his or her sexual desires. But for a married couple to stay together is not just "good"—it is commanded by the Lord.

How specifically Paul is citing the words of Jesus depends on whether he had access to the notes of one of the gospel writers or to one of the Gospels themselves. He could have had access to such notes when he visited the Jerusalem area earlier in his ministry (cf. Ac 9:26–28; 11:30; 15:1–2). That such material, as well as any accurate oral tradition regarding Jesus, was available is seen from a statement given by Luke, Paul's close companion (see Lk 1:1–4). Furthermore, the formula for the Lord's Supper in 1Co 11:23–26 is clear evidence that Paul acquired accurate information from an oral or written source concerning Jesus' teaching.

The burden of Christ's command was that the married were not to be divorced (Mt 5:32; 19:3–9; Lk 16:18)—a principle Paul summarizes from both sides of the marriage partnership: the woman is not to separate herself from her husband, and the husband must not divorce his wife (v.11). Such separations seem to have occurred at Corinth, for Paul says, "If she does [separate], she must remain unmarried, or else be reconciled to her husband." The stress in this passage on maintaining the marriage bond unbroken definitely strengthens the second of these options, that separated marriage partners become reconciled.

12–16 Paul now adds instructions beyond those given by the Lord Jesus—instructions having to do with mixed marriages, where one partner has, since marriage, become a Christian. Paul addresses himself to this problem by saying, "To the rest [to the others with marital questions] I say this. . . ."

According to the way Paul writes, there were mixed marriages in the Christian community in this pagan city. Since he preached in Corinth for over a year and a half (Ac 18:11, 18), with many turning to the Lord, we may conclude that while he was still with them some marriages became mixed marriages. Had he at that time given them advice about this? Doubtless he had. But the problem then was probably not so acute for the unbelieving partner when the other partner was a new Christian. The unbelieving one may have thought this stand for Christ was a passing fad or a superstition. As time went on, however, the condition in these Corinthian homes was becoming more serious. In spite of Paul's teaching about Christian living and the sanctity of the home (cf. Eph 4–6), the unbelieving partners in some instances were threatening to leave their Christian husbands or wives. So Paul was confronted with the question, "What should the Christian marriage partners do?"

We should note first, in the light of 2Co 6:14–7:1 (cf. Ezr 10:10), that Paul would not have allowed an already-professing Christian to marry an unbeliever. But on the question of what should be done by a husband or wife who has turned to the Lord after marriage,

Paul is decisive. If the unbelieving partner is content or willing to live with the Christian, then the Christian must not divorce the partner—for the sake, Paul implies, of the marriage bond God has ordained.

Rather (v.14), the Christian partner should think of the truth that the Lord can use him or her as a godly, holy influence in such a mixed family relationship and in helping that family to be consecrated to God. The word "sanctified" (GK 39) does not refer to moral purity—Paul is certainly not teaching that the unbelieving partner is made morally pure through a believing spouse. What the word emphasizes is a relationship to God, a claim of God on the person and family to be set apart for him (cf. Ac 20:32; 26:18). The tense of the verb stresses that the unbeliever who is in a Christian family has already become and continues to be a part of a family unit upon which God has his claim and which he will use for his service. The same is true of children born in such a family. They are "holy" (GK 41) and not "unclean" (GK 176)—i.e., not spiritually separated from God, as is the case in unbelieving families. The Bible's teaching elsewhere about Christian parents and their covenant children set apart for God is also relevant to this passage. Consider Ge 17:1–14, where the children of God's people of the OT were included among God's covenant people, and Ac 2:38–39, where God's promise applied to the children of all believers (cf. Eph 2:12–13). Covenant children are to be counted a part of God's people and should be nurtured in the Christian faith and in the fear of the Lord (Eph 6:4).

Dealing with the actual situation at Corinth, Paul realizes that in some instances the unbelieving marriage partner will not stay. So he teaches that in such an event (v.15), the believer must let the unbelieving partner go. Paul adds two reasons: First, in this case the believer is not "bound" (GK 1530), for the unbeliever by willful desertion (the other legitimate reason for divorce besides sexual immorality; Mt 19:9) has broken the marriage contract. Second, God has called his people to live in peace, which would not be possible if the unbelieving partner were forced to live with the believer.

The force of v.16 tempers any tendency to foster or encourage a rupture in the marriage. For Paul is teaching that the believer must try to keep the mixed marriage together in the hope that the testimony of the believer will be used by God in his providence to bring the unbeliever to Christ.

2. Christian obligation to live according to God's call (7:17–24)

In extending the principle that God has called his people to live in peace (v.15), Paul now teaches that Christians should live contentedly in any station of life in which God has placed them. They should live obediently to God with full confidence in his sovereign purpose whether married or unmarried, Jew or Gentile, slave or free. Paul is not in favor of the subjugation or elevation of certain segments of society, but he wants individual Christians to realize and accept God's sovereign purpose in saving and keeping them regardless of the level of society they are in. Paul is more afraid of the spirit of anarchy and rebellion (cf. Ro 12:3; 13:1–7; 1Co 12:4–11; 2Co 10:13) than of social inequality.

It may well be that Paul's teaching that all Christians are equal (Gal 3:28), that all things material should be viewed as relatively insignificant in the light of eternal realities (2Co 4:18), and that the second coming of Christ will bring in a new order of divine rule (1Co 15:23–28) had made the Christians restless and somewhat discontented with their lot in life. Their place in life is what God has "assigned" (v.17; GK 3532) and called them to. God's people can and must live as Christians, whatever social, economic, and religious level of society they are in. Their conditions do not affect their relationship and service to Jesus Christ.

17 Paul now expands his thought of the Christian's call to other areas besides that of marital status. Christians should live for the Lord wherever they are. This, Paul says, is the principle that he orders to be followed in all the churches (cf. Eph 5:21–6:9; Col 3:18–4:1)—a principle that transcends all boundaries.

18–20 The apostle's first application of this principle is to the religio-national distinctions related to being Jews or Gentiles, being circumcised or uncircumcised. In a Gentile situation like that in Corinth, some Christian Jews may have tried to obliterate the OT covenant mark of circumcision. On the other hand, Judaizers tried to force circumcision on the Gentile Christians (cf. Ac 15:1–5; Gal 3:1–3; 5:1). Paul argues that this outward sign of circumcision with its stress on the Jew versus the Gentile now has no significance. If a person was a circumcised Jew when he was saved, he should not become uncircumcised. If he was an uncircumcised Gentile, he should not be circumcised. Circumcision and uncircumcision now make no difference (Ro 2:25, 29; Gal 5:6), but keeping God's command is essential (cf. Jn 14:15). By repetition, Paul emphasizes this principle in v.20. One should not seek to change his or her station in life.

21–22 Paul's other illustration relates to slavery. The key phrase in this passage is "Don't let it trouble [GK 3508] you" (v.21). Paul is not speaking against human betterment or social service, but he is stressing that Christians in Corinth should live for the Lord without anxiety in their present situation. If they were slaves when they became Christians, they should live on as Christians even while remaining slaves. He adds a parenthetical comment that "if you can gain your freedom, then do so." However, the Bible teaches that Christianity does not guarantee material or social betterment but makes it a matter of individual responsibility (cf. Ps 73; Ac 11:29; 20:35).

Verse 22 refers to v.21. Paul is saying, "If you were a slave when God called you, don't let it trouble you—you are the Lord's freedman. If you were free when called, remember you are Christ's slave." The spiritual antithesis is striking. The Lord has freed us from the penalty of sin (2Co 5:21) and from Satan and his kingdom (Col 1:13) and bound us as "slaves" to himself (Ro 1:1).

23–24 Paul points up the priority of Christ's authority over Christians. In all earthly service they must realize that their obedience and service are to Christ, not to other people. The reason is that God bought us with the price of Christ's blood (5:7; 1Pe 1:18–19). Thus, because on this higher level we are slaves to Christ, we are not to become mere slaves of other people. We serve faithfully in our earthly position, but we serve as slaves of Christ (cf. Eph 6:5-9, Col 3:24; 1Ti 6:2). In v.24 Paul repeats the command of vv.17, 20 but adds the phrase "before God," as though he is saying, "God is looking on and is there with you to help you."

3. Instructions concerning virgins (7:25–40)

Now Paul turns to the second main question: What about "virgins" (GK 4221) and marriage? In this section he discusses the advisability in the present situation of remaining in an unmarried state (vv.25–35). Then he advises that they do what they think is right for the virgin who is unmarried, whether it is by initiating marriage or by remaining single (vv.36–38). He concludes with a statement regarding the married woman's responsibilities to her husband and regarding her freedom to be married again in the Lord if her husband dies. However, Paul thinks she would be happier if she remained unmarried (vv.39–40).

Regarding vv.25–35, Paul maintains that "because of the present crisis" (GK 340), it is better for a man or woman to remain in their present state, whether married or single (v.26). He advises this because the time to do the work of the Lord is so short (v.29); and anyway the material conditions of this world are changing and disappearing (v.31). Paul also introduces certain corrective statements lest the Corinthians draw false conclusions from the main principle. In saying that they should stay married, he insists that marriage itself is not a matter of right or wrong (v.28). He also argues that the real problem they face in their present world situation is the proper expenditure of their time and energies. He is desirous that they devote their energies to the service of the Lord, and this they can do better if they are unmarried (vv.32–34). But he hastens to add that he does not mean to hamper them in such a way as to keep them from marrying—he only wants to help them. His advice, he implies, is not an argument for the superiority of celibacy or the obligatory nature of it (v.35).

25 Paul is not now relying directly on a command from the Lord—i.e., from Jesus—as he was, for example, in Ac 20:35. Rather, he is giving his own opinion on the matter at hand, but his opinion must be taken seriously because by the Lord's mercy he is trustworthy. In other words, his command is not any less inspired than one from Jesus.

26–27 Each person should remain as he or she now is "because of the present crisis" (see comments on vv.1, 29–31). In other words, remain married if you are married; single if you are single.

28 Paul hastens to make it plain that there is nothing sinful in marriage, whether entered into by a widow, a widower, or a virgin. His main motive in dissuading the unmarried from marriage is to spare them the hardship and suffering in physical life that accompany times of trouble and persecution.

29–31 The apostle explains that the time for doing the Lord's work is short and is coming to an end. This is not necessarily a reference to the second coming of Christ, for Paul may have been anticipating severe persecutions and a resulting curtailment of freedom to witness. So for the time remaining Paul admonishes them not to be overwhelmed by the social and material problems of the world but to live for the Lord. By "those who have wives should live as if they had none" (v.29) he means, "Live for the Lord in marriage." If life brings sadness, live beyond it and do not be bound by it. If things are joyous, do not be engrossed in them. Those who are blessed with material possessions should not cling to them, as though they were to have them always. The reason for this challenge is that the material things (this is the meaning of "the present form" in v.31) of this world are changing and disappearing (cf. Col 3:12–14).

32–35 Paul goes on to argue that if they want marriage, they must realize that it brings extra cares, and he wants them to be free from concern. Married persons, whether men or women, have their attentions centered on the desires and needs of their spouses (vv.33–34). In saying that the unmarried woman or virgin is concerned with how she may please the Lord (v.34), Paul implies that the married person is apt to neglect this Christian duty. Since the apostle upholds the right and privilege of marriage even for himself (9:3–5), he must here be advising against marriage because of particular abuses and tensions at Corinth. He is giving this advice for their own benefit, not to restrain them or put them in a noose. Rather, he wants them to live properly in complete and undivided devotion to the Lord.

36 Paul now turns to teaching about virgins of marriageable age, insisting that they must be treated honorably, whether they become married or not. Who is meant by "he" in this verse, the father of the virgin or the man who is engaged to her? Both have been suggested, for in ancient times a father arranged for his daughter's marriage. But more likely "he" refers to the man who is considering the possibility of marrying his fiancée. Paul is teaching that if the situation in Corinth seems to be unfair to a particular virgin and especially if she is passing her prime marriageable years, then the fiancé should go ahead and marry her. There is no sin in their getting married.

37–38 In contrast, the man who feels no need to get married has done the right thing too. The words "who is under no compulsion" refer to outward pressure to marry, such as might come from some prior engagement contract or the pressure of a master on a slave. Paul favors the man who does not marry.

39–40 In climaxing the discussion, Paul states that marriage is a life-long contract. If a woman marries, she is to cleave to her husband till he dies (Ge 2:24). But when he dies, she is free to marry anyone she chooses, so long as he is a Christian. But, Paul says, the woman will be happier—freer from hardship and care—if she remains unmarried. This is his judgment for the Corinthian situation. When he says, rather modestly, "And I think that I have the Spirit of God," he means that in writing this he also is inspired by the Holy Spirit as were the other writers of Scripture. It is possible that some in Corinth were claiming inspiration; if so, Paul is contrasting himself with them in a veiled way.

B. Instructions Concerning Christian Freedom: Its Privileges and Responsibilities (8:1–11:1)

This section focuses on the next question the delegation from Corinth put to Paul: "What about eating food offered in heathen sacrifices to idols?" Paul's answer leads to a discussion of the larger question of how believers should use their Christian liberty. He lays down the principle that love for one's brother or sister in Christ should be the motivating factor in contemplating one's Christian liberty (8:1–13). Then he gives a personal example of how he was ready to forego the exercise of his own rights as an apostle for the sake of God's people (9:1–18). He argues that though he was under obligation to no one, he showed his self-restraint and love by placing himself on the cultural and social level of everyone so that he might reach some for Christ (9:19–27). By way of warning, he speaks of the lack of self-restraint by the OT Israelites, who actually embraced the idolatry they toyed with (10:1–13). So God's people must avoid participation in idol feasts and "flee from idolatry," because they belong to the Lord and have their own feast with him, the Lord's Supper (10:14–22). Paul's conclusion is this: Live your testimony with loving concern for your fellow believers, but do not make an issue of meat sold in the market. Eat it as a gift from God. Do this, except when the point is explicitly made that the meat was offered in sacrifice to an idol. For you would in such a case seem to be participating in this religious heathen practice. Refrain, then, for your weaker brother's sake and for your own peace of mind. Above all, do everything for the glory of God (10:23–11:1).

1. Eating meat sacrificed to idols (8:1–13)

a. Knowledge and love contrasted (8:1–3)

1 With the phrase "Now about," Paul turns to another question asked by the Corinthian delegation (cf. introductory comment on 7:1–14:40). The importance of the question of "foods offered in sacrifice to idols" becomes evident when one realizes how thoroughly idolatry and pagan sacrifices permeated all levels of Greek and Roman society. In Corinth itself, there were no less than sixteen temples and shrines, some of which had dining rooms in them.

Indeed, people could hardly escape contact with the pagan practices and their influence. The meat offered on the heathen altars was usually divided into three portions: one portion was burned up, a second given to the priest, and the third given to the offerer. If the priest did not use his portion, it was taken to the meat market. Thus a considerable amount of sacrificed meat ended up in the public market, on the tables of pagan neighbors and friends, or at the pagan festivals. With such idolatry and other pagan practices dominating the life and culture of Corinth, no wonder Paul was so concerned how Christians exercised their freedom to eat meat sold in butcher shops after it had been offered to some idol and consecrated in pagan worship in the city. They faced questions such as these: Was the meat spiritually contaminated? Did the pagan god actually have an effect on the meat? Even if one did not think so, what would one's participation do to a fellow Christian who might have scruples about this? Though Christians today do not have to deal with this particular problem, they too must face questions of how to conduct themselves in a non-Christian society.

In v.1 Paul concedes that all Christians know—at least theoretically—the real meaning about the meat sacrificed to idols. But, he implies, there is something more—some may really feel that there is something wrong with that meat (v.7). So he adds that the mere knowledge that there is nothing wrong with it inflates one to a level of false security and indifference. As a result, in dealing with this issue, love is necessary. Love takes one beyond himself to aid another; it builds up.

2 Paul warns against dependence on simply knowing something, since a person never knows all that ought to be known about a subject. Such an attitude exhibits a complete dependence on one's own self-sufficient knowledge and illustrates what Paul means by saying, "Knowledge puffs up [GK 5881]."

3 With the essential ingredient of love, knowledge is tempered and made the right kind of discerning and compassionate knowledge exhibited when one loves God. In loving God, a person shows that he is known by God—that God recognizes him as his own and that he had the right kind of knowledge, because he is exercising it in love to his fellow Christians and to God.

b. The meaning of eating meat sacrificed to idols (8:4–6)

4 The word translated "food" (GK 1111) is sometimes translated "meat," since the subject involves altar sacrifices and the meat market. The main thing to remember in connection with such meat is that the idol before which it was sacrificed and the god it represents are actually nothing—i.e., nothing as to personal reality and power. There is only one true God in the entire universe (cf. Dt 6:4–9; 1Ki 18:39; Isa 45:5).

5–6 Paul grants for argument that there are "so-called gods" in heaven and earth, such as those the pagans recognized in Greek and Roman mythology. He also mentions the many "gods" and "lords" who are called such in Scripture (cf. Dt 10:17; Ps 136:2–3) and who in the widest sense represent rulers in the universe who are subordinate to God (Col 1:16). Paul is therefore teaching that the "so-called gods" of the pagans are unreal and that the real "gods" and "lords," whatever they may be, are all subordinate to the one supreme God whom alone we recognize. To Paul, there is only "one God, the Father," and "one Lord, Jesus Christ." The Father is the source of all creation, and Jesus Christ is the dynamic One through whom creation came into existence. As for Christians, they live for God, the source of all, and have the power for living through Jesus Christ. So why, implies Paul, should we be concerned with idols or meat sacrificed to idols?

When Paul came to Corinth, he found a city filled with idolatry. These are the ruins of one of the pagan temples at which its residents worshiped. Courtesy Bastiaan Van Elderen.

c. Freedom to be exercised with care (8:7–13)

7 The knowledge Paul speaks of here is the previously mentioned knowledge regarding an idol and the existence and position of the "so-called gods." Some may not fully realize the significance of these truths, because in their former unsaved state they had become so accustomed to idols and to the sacrificed meat that when they now eat such meat, they think of it only as something sacrificed to the idol, rather than as food provided by God. Their moral awareness—their conscience—is weak, being unable to discriminate in these matters, and so is defiled.

8 This next statement has a twofold thrust. First, as in v.1, we should know that there is nothing inherently wrong with sacrificial meat and that in itself food neither enhances nor minimizes our standing before God. Second, since the eating of meat is of no spiritual importance, the Corinthians should realize that to eat sacrificial meat is not a practice to be avoided or to be insisted on for maintaining Christian liberty.

9–12 Though Christians have the authority to act as Paul has just described, they must "be careful" (GK 1063) lest through the exercise of this authority they somehow cause the weak (in conscience) to stumble in living their Christian lives. By "stumbling block" (GK 4682) is meant causing the weak believer not only to have a sense of guilt (v.7), but to go beyond this into sin (v.13) by compromising with pagan idolatry.

So Paul depicts for the Corinthians what may well have been an actual scene (v.10): Suppose a brother who is weak in conscience sees you, who understand that an idol is nothing, reclining at table to eat in an idol temple; won't he also be encouraged to eat and so do what his conscience forbids him to do? When you do such a thing, you are using your freedom and knowledge to bring your weak brother down the path toward spiritual weakness and destruction. Paul does not mean ultimate spiritual destruction, for he calls this man a "brother, for whom Christ died." The stress is on weakening the faith and ruining the Christian life of a fellow believer.

Speaking to the strong brother (v.12), Paul says in effect, "If you cause the weak brother to stumble into sin, you yourselves are sinning in a twofold way: (1) against your brother and (2) against Christ, by wounding the conscience of those who belong to him." The plurals in this verse imply that Paul has in mind a sizeable group at Corinth who were both the offenders and the offended.

13 In closing the discussion, the apostle includes himself. He may be indicating that when he was in Corinth, he had had to face this question and had, for the sake of the Christians there, refrained from eating meat that had been sacrificed to idols. So he ends with the personal declaration: "Therefore, if what I eat causes my brother to fall into sin, I will never eat meat again, so that I will not cause him to fall" (v.13)—a noble resolve that stands as an enduring principle for Christian living.

2. Paul: on giving up his rights as an apostle (9:1–18)

a. Rights of an apostle (9:1–12a)

1–2 Paul's reference to the spiritual freedom we have in Christ, coupled with his claim of apostleship, leads him to expand the theme of Christian freedom and apply it in a wider context than that of sacrificial meat. His illustration is particularly pertinent because it involves himself and his important rights as an apostle and Christian worker. The four rhetorical questions in v.1 (all anticipating a positive answer) relate to freedom and apostleship, the last three specifically relating to his apostleship. Paul contends that he is an "apostle" (GK 693) and then states one of the criteria for an apostle: he had seen the Lord (Ac 1:21–22; 9:3–9). (Another evidence of apostleship is working signs and wonders [2Co 12:12], which Paul had done in Corinth.) Paul then contends that his apostleship had produced spiritual work "in the Lord"—the Corinthians were the fruit of his work. He expected them to accept him as an apostle—though others did not—because they were really the seal that stamped his apostleship as genuine.

3–6 Paul now begins to defend himself against those who have criticized his apostleship on the ground that he had not exercised all the rights one might expect an apostle to use. He brings up certain rights that he and others, such as Barnabas, had the authority to exercise. The first one, "the right to food and drink," means, in the context, daily provisions at the expense of the church (cf. vv.9–11). Next he claims the right to have a wife join him in his missionary travels. In referring to the "rest of the apostles" (v.5), Paul is not saying that all were necessarily married, but that at least a larger part were. The phrase "brothers of the Lord" should be taken at face value—physical brothers (i.e., half-brothers), children of both Joseph and Mary after Jesus was born (Mt 1:18–25; 12:46; 13:55; Ac 1:14; Gal 1:19).

In v.6 Paul raises the practical question of his and Barnabas's right to be supported financially in the ministry. It was Paul's practice to support himself materially by tentmaking (Ac 18:2–3; 1Co 4:12) in order not to be a burden to the church. Some apparently misunderstood this to mean that he was not on a par with other apostles and Christian workers who depended on the church to support them. In not denying that principle, Paul asserts, by way of a rhetorical question, that he has a right to be supported.

7–10 These verses present illustrations supporting the proposition that God's servants have the right to be supported with food and drink and other necessities of life as they labor in their work. Verse 7 gives illustrations from common experiences in ancient life: the soldier supported at public or royal expense; the vineyard keeper, who eats of the grapes he gathers; the shepherd, who drinks milk from his flock. But as an additional argument, Paul cites the authority of Scripture, "Do not muzzle an ox when it is treading out the grain" (Dt 25:4). This merciful command covered the practice in ancient times of oxen pulling the threshing sledge over the grain or treading it out with their feet (Isa 28:28; 41:15; Hos 10:11). They were allowed to eat as they did their work. The reason for the command, Paul says, is not just God's care for the cattle (cf. Mt 6:26–29), but because by it he wants to teach us a lesson about God's care for us (v.10). This is evident, too, in the provision for the farmer: When a plowman and thresher do their work, they do so expecting that through God's blessing they will share in the crop.

11–12a The same principles of the worker's sharing in the results of his crop are now applied to God's spiritual work. Those who have sown the spiritual seed at Corinth with its resultant harvest can expect to have their material needs supplied from that harvest. Certainly, if the Corinthians have supported other Christian workers, should they not also support Paul and his companions, who have sown spiritual seed among them?

This basic principle is true today. The Christian worker who sows the spiritual seed of the Gospel has a right to be supported materially by those who benefit from the Gospel.

b. Rights not used (9:12b–18)

12b The apostle now announces that he will not exercise this or any other "right" (GK 2026) that is his because he and his companions do not want to hinder the advance of the Gospel.

13–14 To emphasize further the reason and importance for his self-restraint in exercising this right of being supported, Paul turns to a religious illustration that was applicable both in OT biblical worship and in pagan temples. The question in v.13 expects a yes answer. His illustration has a particularly telling relation to the Corinthians with their former connections with pagan worship. Paul's language is pointed: When people serve in a temple or are offering sacrifices at the altar, they eat of the temple offerings as part of their payment for their work.

Paul then applies what he has just said. The principle of giving material support to those who serve in the temple must be applied also to ministers of the Gospel. The Lord Jesus himself commanded that those who preach the Gospel should be supported by those who believe the Gospel (see Mt 10:10; Lk 10:8).

15–16 In spite of all this evidence, Paul again states that he has not used these privileges. Nor is he writing this to get them to start supporting him, for he wants to be able to face his opponents at Corinth with the boast that he is unselfishly serving them and the Lord in the Gospel. If one considers only his preaching, that gives Paul no reason for boasting, since the Lord has laid on him the necessity of preaching (Ac 26:16–18). In further explanation, he cries out that God's judgment would descend on him if he did not preach.

17–18 It is true that there is reward or pay in preaching, but only if done without pay. Paul states the alternatives. If he preaches freely, voluntarily, he has a reward; if for pay, he is merely fulfilling the commission entrusted to him (Ac 26:16). His reward is the boasting he can make before them that he is preaching to them without charge and not making use of his rights as a gospel minister. Paul wants to prove to the Corinthians the genuineness of his ministry.

3. Paul: subjection of self for others and to meet God's approval (9:19–27)

19 Going beyond his right to financial support, the apostle now discusses other areas of life in which he has forfeited his right to freedom in order to win more to Christ. His statement is a strong one: "I am free from all men, but I have enslaved myself to all."

20 In discussing his self-sacrificing concern in vv.20–23, Paul mentions three groups—the Jews, the Gentiles, and those whose consciences are weak. For the Jews' sake Paul became like a Jew. That is, when necessary and regarding indifferent matters, he conformed to the practice of Jewish law (cf. Ac 16:3; 18:18; 21:20–26) to win the Jews. "Those under the law" need not be taken as a separate group such as proselytes to Judaism, but as reference again to Jews. In the parenthetical phrase "though I myself am not under the law," Paul means that in his freedom he was not obligated to practice such Jewish laws.

21 For the Gentiles "without the law," those who did not have any written revelation from God (Ro 2:12), Paul says he became like one not having the law—and took his place in their culture in order to reach them (cf. Gal 2:11–21). But he hastens to correct any misunderstanding: he counts himself still under God's law, and even more, under Christ's law.

22–23 Those with a "weak" (GK 822) conscience (cf. 8:9–12) he also wants to be sure to win. With them he becomes "weak"—that is, he refrains from exercising his Christian freedom and acts as they do regarding these indifferent things. He has forfeited his freedom for the sake of all, that by all these means some may be saved. He does this for the sake of the Gospel, that he might share in the blessings of the Gospel personally and see others come to Christ.

24–27 By way of practical application, Paul now gives a strong exhortation for Christian self-denial, using himself as an example and employing athletic figures familiar to the Corinthians at their own Isthmian athletic games, hosted every other year by the people of Corinth. The particular events he refers to are running and boxing.

Paul assumes their common knowledge of the foot race in the stadium (v.25). Every one of the Corinthians believers should run as these runners do, with an all-out effort to get the prize. "Strict training" refers to the athlete's self-control in diet and his rigorous bodily discipline. Paul observes that the athletes train vigorously for a "corruptible crown"—a laurel or celery wreath that would soon wither away. But the Christian's crown, eternal life and fellowship with God, will last forever (Rev 2:10).

Paul says of himself that he does not contend like an undisciplined runner or boxer. Rather, he aims his blows against his own body, beating it black and blue. The picture is graphic: the ancient boxers devastatingly punishing one another with knuckles bound with leather thongs. So by pummeling his body, Paul enslaves it in order to gain the Christian prize.

In the Greek games, there was a herald who announced the rules of the contest; but Paul is not only a Christian herald (i.e, preacher), he is also one who plays in the game. That is, he not only preached the Gospel but he also lived by the Gospel's rules. True Christians, while confident of God's sovereign grace, are nevertheless conscious of their own battle against sin. They do not want to be "disqualified [i.e., tested and disapproved] for the prize."

4. Warning: Israel's lack of self-restraint (10:1–13)

Paul now presents several examples of the sins of Israel during the time of Moses as a basis for warning the Corinthians. Though the Israelites had the covenant blessings and were miraculously delivered and sustained, yet most of them died in the wilderness because of disobedience and unbelief.

1–5 The word "for" connects these verses with the argument in chs. 8–9. Having challenged the Christians in Corinth to self-discipline, Paul now looks back to Israel, who were in the race described in 9:24–27. "I do not want you to be ignorant" is a phrase used by Paul to introduce an important truth (cf. Ro 1:13; 1Th 4:13).

First, Paul stresses the miraculous passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea. "Under the cloud" indicates that they were under God's sure guidance (Ex 13:21–22; Nu 9:15–23; 14:14; Dt 1:33; Ps 78:14). That "they were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea" simply means they were initiated and inaugurated into union with God and also with Moses and his leadership (cf. the expression "baptized into Christ" in Ro 6:3–4; Gal 3:27); the thought is a spiritual one (v.3). The cloud represented God in his shekinah glory; the sea, God's redemption and leadership.

In the desert they were provided with food and drink. Paul calls these provisions "spiritual" (vv.3–4; GK 4461), meaning that these physical objects were a means of grace to God's people. They pointed forward to Christ, the true bread and drink to come (cf. Jn 6:30–65). In other words, the entire nation shared in the blessings and the privileges of God's grace.

In spite of all these blessings, however, God was not pleased with most of them (v.5; cf. Heb 3:17–19). He saw in them a heart of unbelief (vv.6–10) and scattered their corpses over the desert. Only Caleb and Joshua entered Canaan and won the prize.

6 All these experiences of the Israelites serve as examples for us to think about, lest we who also have received the covenant blessings should displease God by lusting after evil things as Israel did.

7–10 Paul then cites several OT incidents of what that lusting involved and warns against following the example of the Israelites. Many of them became idolaters, as the story about the worship of the golden calf indicates (Ex 32:1–6). Israel ate a sacrificial meal in dedication to the calf and then got up to dance in ceremonial revelry (Ex 32:6), just as the pagans danced before their gods. This may look back to Paul's discussion in ch.8 about eating meat sacrificed to idols.

Paul's next allusion is to Israel's joining herself to Baal of Peor (Nu 25:1–9), an act involving both spiritual and sexual unfaithfulness. This god of the Moabites was worshiped through the prostitution of virgins; idolatry and sexual immorality were joined together, and Paul warns against such acts (v.8). The NT says 23,000 died, whereas the OT reports 24,000 (Nu 25:9). Paul is speaking about how many died in that one day; he does not include others who were killed subsequently, among them being the leaders in the rebellion, whom God ordered Moses to hang (Nu 25:4).

Paul's next example (v.9) is the murmuring of Israel against the Lord for bringing them out of Egypt, for which they were severely punished (Nu 21:6). With the use of the plural pronoun "we," Paul includes himself in cautioning the Corinthians against complaining like the Israelites and against testing the Lord to see what he will do.

The final example (v.10) relates to Israel's grumbling against the Lord at Kadesh Barnea (Nu 14:2) and their desire to have died in Egypt or in the desert. The "destroying angel" (GK 3904) was the angel of God (cf. Ex 12:23), whom Paul indicates was sent to bring the plague spoken of in Nu 14:37. The incident referred to may also be the destruction of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Nu 16:30).

11–13 Paul now applies these examples for the Corinthians. They have been written down to warn us, he says. His warning amounts to this: "Do not be smug in your firm stand for Christ. Keep alert lest you fall." "The fulfillment [GK 5465] of the ages [GK 172]" is the entire stretch of time between the coming of Jesus and the end of the world.

Verse 13 is one of the most helpful verses in the NT and presents the great antidote to falling into sin through temptation. "Temptation" (GK 4280) is not itself sinful. God allows it as a way of purifying us (Jas 1:12), but the devil uses it to entice us into sin (cf. Mt 4:1). The temptations that come to the Christian are those all human beings face—they are unavoidable. But, says Paul, God is right there with us to keep us from being overwhelmed by the temptation. He will provide a way out, not in order to avoid the temptation, but to meet it successfully and to stand firm under it.

5. Warning: attendance at pagan sacrifices means fellowship with idolatry (10:14–22)

Paul now applies the example of Israel's idolatry to the problem of ch. 8—eating meat sacrificed to idols. There is the danger of going a step beyond just eating sacrificed meat—i.e., joining the pagans in the sacrificial feasts in their pagan temples. To do this would be wrong and sinful. Paul illustrates this by showing that participation in the Lord's Supper signifies that the believer is in a sharing relationship with the Savior. So participation in idol feasts in pagan temples means sharing in the pagan worship, and such participation is forbidden. This is the mistake Israel made. Christians today must discern how the illustration applies to their own lives.

14–15 The apostle's terse injunction, "Flee [GK 5771] from idolatry," applies not only to the weak who through eating might be led into idolatry but also to those with a strong conscience who, by leading the weak into sin, are also guilty. Paul asks the Corinthians to use good sense and to determine the truth of what he says.

16–17 The cup of blessing or thanksgiving used in the Lord's Supper brings us spiritually into participation in the blood of Christ and into fellowship with him. The same is true of the bread, whereby we become one body with him. The "cup of blessing" was a technical term for the third cup drunk at the Jewish Passover (see comment on Lk 22:14–18), the time when the Lord's Supper was instituted (Mt 26:17–30; Mk 14:12–26; Lk 22:7–23; Jn 13:21–30). That "participation [GK 3126] in the blood of Christ" is meant to be a memorial symbol of fellowship with Christ rather than a literal drinking of his blood is clear from the fact that (1) Christ had not yet died when he instituted this supper, and (2) this participation is in remembering him, not in drinking him (1Co 11:25).

18–20 Here Paul compares the OT sacrifices with pagan offerings. When the people of Israel sacrificed at the altar and ate part of the sacrifice (Lev 7:15; 8:31; Dt 12:17–18), they participated in and became a part of the sacrificial system and worship of God. The apostle does not mean that the meat sacrificed to an idol or the idol itself is anything, but he does insist that when the pagans sacrifice, they do so to demons, and he does not want the Corinthians to share in worship having to do with demons. One cannot do both—participate in Christ and in demons.

21 To make it clearer, Paul speaks of "the Lord's table"—a term that the Corinthian converts from paganism would readily associate with "tables" used for pagan idol meals. Here is an example of an invitation from an ancient pagan letter: "Chairemon invites you to a meal at the table of the lord Serapis in the Serapeum, tomorrow the fifteenth from nine o'clock onwards." To Paul, a Christian cannot at the same time participate in the meal at the table of the pagan god and the table of the Lord.

22 The conclusion is that if we as Christians share in pagan idolatry, we will "stir up" the Lord's jealousy and thus incite him to action in his hatred of sin and for mixed allegiance (cf. Dt 32:21; Ps 78:58). And surely, Paul says, we are not stronger than God and cannot overcome or subdue his jealousy and anger against sin if we share in pagan practices.

6. Freedom, but within limits: do all to the glory of God (10:23–11:1)

Returning specifically to the thought of ch. 8 that eating meat sacrificed to idols is essentially a matter of indifference, Paul now adds that it can be harmful. He lays down three principles: (1) Though Christians have the right to do all things, such as eating sacrificial meat, it may not be beneficial to them. (2) Such practices of liberty may not in fact build up a fellow Christian. (3) In summary, Christians are not merely to seek their own good but to promote the good of their fellow Christians and the glory of God.

23–30 Meat eaten at an idol feast is associated with pagan worship and is contaminated, Paul claims. But meat sold in the public meat market has lost its religious significance and is all right to eat, as long as one remembers that meat and all things come from the Lord (v.26; the OT quotation from Ps 24:1 was used as a Jewish blessing at mealtimes). The Greek word for "meat market" (GK 3425) is mentioned on an inscription found in Corinth; this establishment could be the very one Paul is referring to, where meat previously offered in sacrifice to idols was sold.

In approving of a believer joining an unbeliever at the latter's house for dinner (v.27), the apostle is thinking of the believer's giving the unbeliever a quiet, appreciative testimony. If, however, at the dinner someone (probably a fellow Christian; cf. v.29a) points out that the meat was offered to an idol, then the believer should refrain from eating the meat. The reason for this is that he does not want his Christian freedom condemned through another man's conscience (v.29). Paul asks why he should be condemned for partaking of something in the meal he could thank God for. So the strong brother has the power to protect his "right" to eat by choosing not to eat meat in such cases.

31–33 These verses introduce a positive and more ultimate perspective. It is not just the other brother who should be in view, but God as the creator and giver of all things. Paul relates this ultimate concept to one's attitude toward the weak brother. The "glory [GK 1518] of God" must be the Christian's objective in everything (Col 3:17; 1Pe 4:11). But Paul says that doing all for the glory of God means thinking of the good of others, both Christians and non- Christians (v.32). By "the church of God" Paul means to include the brother with the weak conscience (cf. Ro 14:13, 21). So we find encompassed by these verses the two great commandments—love God and love your neighbor (Mt 22:37–39). Paul seeks to benefit others, not himself. His ultimate objective in all his conduct is that people might be saved—not superficially but fully and to the glory of God.

11:1 This verse belongs to the previous discussion. The command given has a continual relevance, "Follow my example" (lit., "Ever become imitators [GK 3629] of me"). Paul is calling the Corinthians to the unity that had been disrupted (ch. 1). He can do this because he himself is an imitator of Christ (Gal 2:20)—the same Christ who had dealt gently with Paul in all his prejudices (Ac 26:12–18).

C. Worship in the Church (11:2–14:40)

This entire section deals with problems connected with church worship—matters concerning the veiling of women (11:2–16), observing the Lord's Supper (11:17–34), and the granting and use of spiritual gifts (12:1–14:40).

1. Propriety in worship: covering of women's heads (11:2–16)

2–3 Since Paul does not begin this section the way he did 7:1, 25 and later 12:1 (see introductory comment on 7:1–14:40), he is likely taking up the subject on his own rather than answering another question that had come in their letter to him (7:1).

Verses 3–16 have evoked considerable difference of opinion about the nature of the head covering and about the place of women both in public worship and in their relationship to men. The head covering has been interpreted as either a veil or shawl, or else hair—either long or short. As to the use of veils, women in the ancient Orient were veiled in public or among strangers, but otherwise they were unveiled. Rebecca, for example, was unveiled till she met Isaac (Ge 24:65). Painting on ancient pottery, however, shows Greek women in public without head coverings. In Corinth the women may well have gone to public meetings without veils. But the question is whether Paul is talking about the use of veils in public worship or about women letting their long hair hang loose—a sign of mourning or of the shame of an accused adulteress—rather than having it "put up."

4–6 Whichever view is held as to the nature of the head covering, the same basic principles emerge from the passage. In vv.3–10 Paul emphasizes the order of authority and administration in the divine structure of things. As every man is to be under Christ's authority and Christ is under God's authority, so the woman is under her husband's authority. (Paul does not mean by this analogy that subordination in each case is of the same completeness.) Therefore, the woman should not demonstrate her authority by having her head uncovered, as the man did when he was praying and prophesying. Evidently at Corinth women were coming to church with their heads improperly covered, thus causing disorder and disrespect in the services. Paul is not necessarily giving his opinion on the propriety of women praying or prophesying in the church, which he later observes was being done (cf. 14:34), though some feel that since he mentions women praying and prophesying here, he approves of the practice. Paul's point is that if a woman is in the public worship with her head uncovered, it is as if she had her head shaved (v.5). He insists that if the woman in fact does have her head uncovered, she should have her hair cut; on the other hand, since it is shameful for a woman to have her hair cut or her head shaved, then, of course, she should have her head properly covered (v.6).

7–9 In stating that a man should not have his head covered in church, Paul argues that this follows from the principle that man was prior to woman and is the "image" (GK 1635) and "glory " (GK 1518) of God—meaning that he is to be subject to and represent God in authority. The woman, however, is the glory of the man—i.e., she is to be subject to man and to represent him in authority. Although God created Adam and Eve and gave both dominion over the creation (Ge 1:26), Paul argues for man's exercise of authority over woman on the basis of man's prior creation to woman. The argument goes like this: Woman was made from man's body and she was made for man's sake and not the reverse (Ge 2:7).

Although it was not proper for a first-century Jewish man to cover his head for prayer (a custom originally meant to indicate sorrow), yet the act seems to have been innovatively tried in the Jewish synagogues of Paul's time.

10 The woman has a certain authority in that by having her head properly covered in worship, she shows respect for God's ministering angels who are in attendance and serve God's people (Heb 1:14). Perhaps angels are mentioned in this discussion about the place of women in the church to remind Christians that angels are present at the time of worship and that they are interested in the salvation of God's people (1Pe 1:10–12; cf. Gal 3:10) and sensitive to the conduct of Christians at worship. So the angels would recognize the breach of decorum if Christian women did not have proper head coverings and the long hair distinguishing them as women—the "sign of authority [GK 2026] on her head" (v.10), which symbolized her husband's authority over her.

11–12 But lest he be misunderstood as wanting to demote women, Paul now argues that men and women are equal in the Lord and mutually dependent.

13–15 The final point in the passage is that man is to be distinguished from woman. Thus the Corinthians are to see that women should not pray with their heads uncovered as men do. They are reminded that in ordinary life men with short hair are distinguished from women with long hair. If a man has long hair like a woman's, he is disgraced, but with long hair a woman gains glory in her position of subordination to man. Also long hair is actually given to her as a natural veil.

16 Finally, Paul states that he and the churches follow the principle that in worship men come with short hair and women with long, and that the man exercises the position of authority (v.16). This, he implies, should deter those who would want to be contentious about the matter. In using "we" (meaning the apostles), Paul teaches that the Corinthians must take his statements given in vv.2–16 as having apostolic authority, and not as pious advice.

Summary of vv.2-16 The instructions given by Paul relating to the place of women in the church were addressed to the cultural milieu of the Corinthian believers in the first century A.D. Corinth was a pagan Greek city out of which God was calling a church of his redeemed. Apparently some Greek women in the Corinthian church were coming to worship services without a veil on. Also other women may have been going to church with hair disheveled and hanging loose (a sign of mourning or the shame of adultery). So disorder and unrest had begun to mar the services.

The apostle Paul, of course, wanted to correct any such improprieties in that church. But his teaching in these verses goes far beyond the cultural conditions affecting the Corinthian church. Indeed, it was applicable also to other first-century churches (v.16b) and it is applicable to God's people at any time. The principles Paul presents here that are to govern the church and individual Christians in their life and conduct are as follows:

(1) Christians should live as individuals and in corporate worship in the light of the perfect unity and interrelatedness of the persons of the Godhead. The Father and the Son are perfectly united (Jn 10:30), and yet there is a difference administratively: God is the head of Christ (1Co 11:3). So Christians are one, but they too have to be administratively subordinate to one another.

(2) Christians must remember that God first created man, then woman (Ge 2:21–23), and placed the man as administrative head over the woman and the woman as his helper-companion (Ge 2:18). So in the Christian community, the man is to conduct himself as a man (1Co 11:4) and as the head of the woman (v.3), while the woman is to conduct herself as a woman with dignity, without doing anything that would bring dishonor to her (v.5).

(3) Since Christians live in the Christian community of the home and the church, they must remember that God has established the man and the woman as equal human beings (v.12). So in the Christian community believers should treat one another with mutual respect and admiration as they realize each other's God-given special functions and positions.

(4) Christian men and women should remember that, though God has made them equal human beings, yet he has made them distinct sexes. That distinction is not to be blurred in their realization that they are mutually dependent (v.11)—the man on the woman and the woman on the man. It is also to be observed in their physical appearance (vv.13–15), so that in worship the woman can be recognized as woman and the man as man.

(5) God is a God of order. This means order in worship and peaceful decorum in the church (v.16). Therefore Christian men and women should conduct themselves in a respectful, orderly way not only in worship but also in daily life.

2. The Lord's Supper (11:17–34)

In dealing with the Lord's Supper, Paul discusses three matters: first, the problem of believers making a mockery of the Supper because of abuses practiced at the agape (GK 27; cf. Jude 12)—the love feast or dinner accompanying the Supper (vv.17–22); second, the necessity of taking the Lord's Supper seriously through rehearsing its institution as given by the Lord (vv.23–26); and third, the warning about partaking of the Supper unworthily (vv.27–34).

17–19 Regarding the meal that evidently preceded the communion service, the apostle condemns the conduct of the believers as harmful and degrading to the communion (see v.20). Their actions at the common agape meal were betraying their divisions, including class distinctions between the rich and the poor. Though he might discount part of what he heard, Paul felt he had to believe some of it. Knowing human nature, he assumes some such divisions are inevitable even among Christians, so that those who act worthy of God's approval might be evident.

20 "It is not the Lord's Supper you eat" may be interpreted in two ways—either by supplying the word "it" as in NIV, or by taking the verb "is" to mean "can," thus rendering it, "You cannot eat [or celebrate] the Lord's Supper." Either translation fits the context. What Paul means is that in acting the way he is about to describe, they were not approaching the Lord's Supper in the right manner but were nullifying its spiritual meaning.

21–22 The Christian common meal (agape feast) apparently followed the pattern of public sacred feasting among the Jews and Greeks. The food was brought together for all to share (a sort of "potluck" supper), with the rich bringing more and the poor less. As Paul describes it, however, cliques were established and the food was divided inequitably. The rich took their "lion's" share and became gluttons, and the poor remained hungry. So they were bringing contempt on the church of God and humiliating the poor.

23–24 The chief reason why Paul cannot commend their actions is that they do not agree with the spirit of the Lord's Supper as he had received it. Using technical words, Paul writes that he "received" (GK 4161) from the Lord and "passed on" (GK 4140) to them the Christian tradition of the Lord's Supper. That most likely means that he received the Lord's words of the institution of the Supper through its being passed on by others, just as he then passed them on to the Corinthians—i.e., through a process of repetition (cf. 15:3–4). Observe the similarity of Paul's words about the Supper with Mt 26:26–29; Mk 14:22–25; Lk 22:14–20.

Since the Supper was celebrated in connection with the Passover (cf. Mt 26:17–29; Lk 22:7–20), we assume that the bread that was available was unleavened. Jesus gave thanks, as was the Jewish practice at a meal. The breaking of the bread was symbolic of Christ's bruised body (Isa 53:5), "given for you" (Lk 22:19). The word "this" most naturally means in the context "this bread" that Christ was holding in his hand as a symbol to represent his body; the bread was not Christ's body itself (cf. somewhat similar figures in John 10:7; 1 Cor 10:4).

25–26 That the Lord's Supper was connected with the Passover meal is clear in the phrase "after the supper," meaning, as the Synoptic Gospels show, "after the Passover Supper." This cup was the third of the Passover cups (see comment on Lk 22:14–18). The word "cup" (GK 4539), used metonymously for its contents, symbolizes the covenant in Jesus' blood (Lk 22:20). The covenant idea is that of God's sealing his agreement of salvation with his people through Christ's blood. It is a new covenant in being the fulfillment of the covenant promises of God in the OT exemplified in the sacrificial system (cf. Eph 2:12; Heb 8–10). In the ceremony Jesus does not say how often the communion was to be held but indicates that it is to be periodic—"whenever you eat . . . and drink"—and it is to be continued to his second coming. The statement "you proclaim" involves the personal application of the meaning of the Lord's death in the believer's testimony.

27 Participating "in an unworthy manner" (GK 397) entails coming to the table in an irreverent and sinful way and so sinning against the body and blood of Christ. This is what some of the Corinthians had been doing (vv.20–22). Of course, any other sinful approach to the table would be unworthy also. The apostle does not teach, however, that in eating and drinking the elements Christians are physically eating of Christ (see comment on vv. 23–24).

This mosaic plate and cup, symbols of the Lord's Supper, are replicas of those found at ancient church sites.

28–30 Now Paul shows how to guard against unworthy partaking of the Lord's Supper. "To examine [oneself]" (GK 1507) is to put oneself to the test as to the attitude of one's heart, outward conduct, and understanding of the true nature and purpose of the Supper. The Supper is a means of spiritual grace. By self-examination believers guard against eating and drinking to their own judgment through not recognizing the importance of this Supper that commemorates the death of Christ. This judgment is not God's eternal judgment but some temporal judgment such as sickness and death.

31–32 The purpose of self-examination is to come to the table prepared in heart. Paul's teaching justifies the wholesome practice of some churches in having a communion preparatory service that affords opportunity for such self-examination. Here he quickly adds that even when a Christian is judged by the Lord, this judgment is not punitive to destruction, but a form of fatherly discipline (Heb 12:5) to bring God's child to repentance, so that he or she will not be finally and totally judged with the unsaved world (Rev 20:12–15).

33–34 Paul now deals positively with the agape meal. In eating it, the Corinthians should show respect for their fellow believers' physical as well as spiritual needs by waiting for each other and eating together. If they come only to satisfy their physical craving and not for communion with the Lord and his people, then they should eat their meal at home, for otherwise God will judge them in some way.

Paul's final comment suggests that there were other irregularities regarding worship and the Lord's Supper, but they were not sufficiently urgent for him to deal with at this time.

3. The use of spiritual gifts (12:1–14:40)

This long section on "spiritual gifts" (charismata; GK 5922) may be divided into several sections. The first emphasizes the source of the gifts, the Holy Spirit (12:1–11); the second, the diversity of the gifts in their unity (12:12–31a); the third, the necessary ingredient of love in the exercise of all gifts (12:31b–13:13); the fourth, a discussion of the priority of prophecy over tongues, with rules for the exercise of each (14:1–25); and finally, the teaching that all church worship must be done decently and in order (14:26–40).

a. The Holy Spirit, the source of spiritual gifts (12:1–11)

1 "Now about" suggests that this section is an answer to another question asked by the Corinthians in their letter (see introductory comment on 7:1–14:40).

2–3 In saying that they had been "led astray to mute idols," Paul implies that the Corinthians had experienced the effects of evil spirits in their former pagan worship. In contrast, he now stresses the twofold test of the presence of the Holy Spirit in a believer's life. Negatively, no person by the Spirit can curse Jesus; and positively, only by the Spirit can a person openly testify that Jesus is Lord (v.3). Lord (kyrios; GK 3261) was used in the LXX (Greek translation of the OT) to translate Yahweh ("LORD" in NIV). In this context Paul recognizes the deity of Jesus and of the Holy Spirit in the phrases "Jesus is Lord" and "Spirit of God."

4–6 By using the words "service" (GK 1355) and "working" (GK 1920), Paul indicates that such spiritual gifts were useful in serving the Christian community. Here he teaches that the Trinity is involved in administration of these gifts: the Spirit; the Lord; God (cf. 2Co 13:14; Eph 4:3–6).

7–10 Paul goes on to declare that many spiritual gifts are given by the Spirit for the total good or profit of his church. Different gifts are given to different people—not all have the same gift (cf. 12:29–30). The gifts given to each person are clearly intended to be used for the common good.

The gifts listed begin with the most important one—the ability to express the message of God's wisdom in the Gospel of Christ. The second is the ability to communicate with knowledge of God's way of salvation by the Spirit. The gift of "faith" (GK 4411) does not refer to one's initial trust in Christ for salvation but to deeper expressions of faith, such as undergoing hardships and martyrdom; hence it can be rendered "faithfulness."

The next two gifts—the outwardly demonstrable ones of healings and miracles—belong together and were particularly applicable to the ministry of Paul and the other apostles (Ac 19:11–12; 28:7–9; 2Co 12:12). The mention of the gift of prophecy anticipates ch. 14 and seems to include an ability to give insights into, and to convey the deeper meanings of, God's redemptive program in his Word. It is to be distinguished from the inspiration of the Holy Spirit (2Ti 3:16) given the apostles and their associates to prophesy in setting forth God's truth in Scripture. Paul separates the apostles' office from that of prophets in 12:28, where the prophetic office is listed between that of the apostles and the teachers and does not include in it, in this period of church development, the miracle-working function listed separately in 12:29.

By the gift of distinguishing between spirits (v.10b), Paul must be indicating a distinct ability beyond that which the apostle John calls on Christians in general to exercise (1Jn 4:1). The ability to speak in different kinds of "tongues" (GK 1185) has been taken to mean speaking in ecstatic, humanly unintelligible utterances, possibly similar to the ecstatic speech exhibited in pagan Greek Dionysiac expressions. In the light of Ac 2:4ff., however, where it is said that the Holy Spirit gave the Christians on Pentecost the ability to speak with different languages, we are safe to say that the ability mentioned here is the ability to speak unlearned languages.

Many have attempted to differentiate between the tongues-speaking at Pentecost in Ac 2 and that in 1Co 12–14. A list of these differences, together with responses, is as follows:

1. At Pentecost the disciples spoke to people (Ac 2:6) but at Corinth the speaking was to God (1Co. 14:2, 9). Reply: In Corinth, though the speaking in tongues was to God, it was also a speaking to people when there was speaking in the church service through someone who interpreted (14:26–27).

2. At Pentecost tongues were a sign or credential to believers but at Corinth to unbelievers (1Co 14:22). Reply: At Pentecost, at the time when the people heard the tongues they were unbelievers (Ac 2:12–13); it was only when they heard the message in Peter's sermon that many of them believed (Ac 2:41).

3. At Pentecost the unbelievers were filled with awe and marveled (Ac 2:7–8), but at Corinth the unbelievers thought the Christians were mad (1Co 14:23). Reply: In Acts 2 the unbelievers also were bewildered (v.6); they were amazed and perplexed (v.12), and some even thought the believers were intoxicated and they made fun of them (v.13).

4. At Pentecost there was harmony (Ac 2:1), at Corinth confusion (1Co 14:23). Reply: This contrast must not be pressed to imply a difference in the nature of the tongues spoken; it only reveals the generally disorderly conduct of the Corinthian congregation seen in their party spirit (1:10–17) and in their reprehensible conduct at the Lord's Supper (11:17–34).

The foregoing points suggest that there is no significant difference in the nature of tongues between Ac 2 and 1Co 12–14. The only concrete evidence we have as to the nature of the tongues-speaking in the early church is found in Ac 2, where it is a speaking in foreign languages that were understood by those who listened. Since in this initial instance the speaking in foreign tongues was done by the apostles and their close companions, it is logical to conclude that as the apostles were involved in the subsequent scriptural examples of tongues-speaking (Ac 10:44–46; 19:1–7; 1Co 12–14), these situations should also be understood as speaking in a foreign language.

In v.10d Paul hastens to add that such speaking in tongues should be accompanied by interpretation or translation by someone with that ability, a subject expanded in ch. 14. That Paul is simply giving a sampling of gifts is evident from his expansion of the list in 12:27–30 and in Ro 12:3–8.

11 Paul concludes that regardless of what spiritual gift each person has, the Holy Spirit has sovereignly distributed them to produce his own spiritual results. Therefore, no one should despise another person's gift, a gift given by the Spirit for the good of all (v.7). This theme the apostle develops in vv.12–26. The Spirit mentioned here is set forth as one who is sovereignly God (he wills to give the gifts) and personally active (he "works" all these gifts in the lives of his people).

b. Unity in the diversity of gifts in the body of Christ (12:12–26)

12–13 Paul now illustrates the diversity and unity of the spiritual gifts by the example of the human body. It is made up of many parts, all of them important, and yet the whole body functions as a unit. By the words "So it is with Christ," he means so it is with Christ's "body" (GK 5393), the church. That the invisible church is an organic whole is seen in that every believer, regardless of racial and religious connection (Jew or Greek) or social standing (slave or freedman), has been united by the one Spirit into one spiritual body in baptism. The figure is now reversed—all the believers have drunk one Spirit; i.e., each one has received the same Holy Spirit (cf. 1Co 6:19; Eph 5:18–20). Paul is here emphasizing spiritual baptism and the communion of spiritual food and drink (cf. Jn 7:37–39; Ro 6:4; 1Co 10:3–4). It is not the local church alone that Paul is speaking of here, but the church universal.

14–20 Paul now emphasizes the necessity of having diversity in a body for it to operate as one. Each part (such as the eye or the ear) must be willing to perform its own function and not seek to function in a role for which it was not made. The whole body cannot be a single part, or it would not be a functioning body. So it is with the church. Members with one gift should not repudiate that gift and complain that they do not have some other gift. The apostles were to function as apostles, the elders as elders (1Pe 5:5), the deacons as deacons (Ac 6:1–6), etc.

The logic of v.17 is compelling: no body can function as all seeing, all hearing, or all smelling. So for the church to function properly, it must have different gifts and offices. In vv.18–20 Paul brings the believers back to the sovereign purposes of God. It is God who has organized the human body in the way he wants it, and it is the same with the church; according to his will, its many parts should function as one body—the body of Christ.

21–26 Here the emphasis is on the mutual dependence and concern of the various members of the body. As the organs of the human body—such as the eye, hand, head, and feet—need each other, so the members of the church with their various functions need each other. Moreover, the least attractive and inconspicuous parts of the body are important and should be treated with respect (vv.22–23). So also the inconspicuous members of the church are essential—those who pray, those who work with their hands and bring their meager tithes into the church, etc. As the humbler parts of the body are given special attention by covering them with appropriate clothing and, as in the case of the digestive organs, providing them with food, so the inconspicuous members of the church—the poor, the despised, the less prominent—are to be cherished and nurtured.

The "But" in the middle of v.24 brings the argument back to God's sovereign purposes. He has brought the members of the body together in perfect harmony. By saying that God "has given greater honor to the parts that lacked it," Paul means that through implanting modesty and self-respect in our hearts, God has caused us to protect our unpresentable parts (such as the sex organs) from exploitation by properly covering them. All this concern for the body is for the purpose of enabling it to operate in unity, so that all its parts will mutually respond to each other's needs—e.g., the brain sending nerve signals to the hand. The word "division" (GK 5388) in v.25 reminds the Corinthians of the discussion in 1:10–17. As it is with the body, so with the church (v.26). What happens to one part affects the well-being of the whole.

c. Offices and gifts in the one body of Christ, his church (12:27–31a)

As he speaks about that spiritual unity of the body of Christ, Paul declares that each Christian has his or her function as a part of that body. He illustrates this by a selective list of church offices and spiritual gifts (cf. Ro 12:3–8; Eph 4:11).

27 Paul has the entire Christian church in mind with the phrase, "the body of Christ." The plural "apostles" confirms that here there is a wider reference than to Corinth alone.

28 It is the sovereign God alone who dispenses offices and gifts to his church. The order of the gifts here is instructive. The first three—apostles, prophets, and teachers—are in the same order as in Eph 4:11 (cf. Ro 12:6–7) and, as placed first, must be considered of greatest importance; these are classes of persons ruling in the church. The next gifts are set off from the first three by "then" and range in order from miracles to the ability to speak in different kinds of tongues, which, being mentioned last, seem to be of least importance. The office of apostle was all-encompassing, including the gifts of prophecy, teaching, miracles, and the rest. But the prophetic gift (cf. Ac 11:24; 13:1; 15:32; 21:10) did not include apostolicity, though it did include teaching. The teacher class did not compare with that of apostles or prophets. The rest of the list includes gifts given various members of the church—gifts that, while of lesser significance, are yet of importance.

Those having the gift of being "able to help others" are persons gifted in helping the church officers deal with the poor and sick. Those with "administration" have ability to govern and manage affairs in the church.

29–30 By these rhetorical questions, all of which imply "no" for an answer, Paul stresses the principle of divine selectivity. Not all believers function in each of the ways listed. God selects individuals and gives them their specific gifts (v.28). Paul ends v.30 with the gift of interpretation of tongues, because he will comment on this in ch. 14. As in v.28, "tongues" comes last in his list.

31a Having mentioned tongues and their interpretation, Paul urges Christians to seek the better gifts—not that of speaking in tongues, which the Corinthians apparently wanted to have more fully. The possession of specific gifts, says Paul, is not so important as the way in which the gifts are exercised.

d. The supreme position of love in the ministry of the church (12:31b–13:13)

This supremely beautiful chapter speaks first of the superiority and necessity of love—gifts are nothing without love (12:31b–13:3). It then describes the essential character of Christian love (vv.4–7) and tells of the enduring nature of love (vv.9–12). Finally, it proclaims love to be greater even than faith and hope (v.13).

12:31b–13:1-3 Verse 31b introduces ch. 13. Love is the most excellent way for Christians to use their spiritual gifts. The word "love" (agape GK 27) is used in the NT of the deep and abiding affection of God and Christ for each other (Jn 15:10; 17:26) and for us (1Jn 4:9). It is also used of Christians in their relationship with one another (e.g., Jn 13:34–35). Christians are to love, because they belong to God, and "God is love" (1Jn 4:8).

In referring to tongues and prophecy (13:1–3), Paul is apparently trying to counteract the excessive emphasis the Corinthians were evidently placing on these gifts to the detriment of love for Christ and for their fellow believers. "Tongues of men and of angels" are obviously the languages humans and angels use. (On occasion, angels spoke to people in human language; e.g., Lk 1:13–20, 26–38.) It was in the temple worship that the "resounding gong" and "clanging cymbal" were struck (2Sa 6:5; 1Ch 13:8; Ps 150:5). Also prophecy, understanding mysteries and knowledge, and possessing dynamic faith are nothing apart from love. Both "mysteries" (GK 3696) and "knowledge" (GK 1194) mean the deep, secret things to be discovered about God's redemptive works. "Faith" (GK 4411) refers to special acts of faith (e.g., performing miracles), as the reference to the moving of mountains shows (cf. Mt 21:21). Moreover, Paul says that giving all one's material wealth to the poor can be done without love and that one can even be martyred or submit voluntarily to torture without a sense of love for others.

4–7 Christian love is now described positively and negatively. Its positive characteristics are patience (slow to become resentful), kindness, delight in the truth, and a protective, trusting, hopeful, and persevering attitude. Verses 4b–6a state love's characteristics negatively. "Is not rude" may refer obliquely to the disorderly conduct at worship (11:2–16; 14). Love "keeps no record of wrongs"; indeed, for love to keep a record of wrongs violates its nature. Love does not rejoice in evil, in which it has no part; but it does "rejoice with" the truth, with which it does have a part.

Furthermore, love covers the faults of others rather than delighting in them (v.7). It is trusting, optimistic, and willing to endure persecution (cf. Ro 5:3–4). In short, it "perseveres" (GK 5702).

8–12 Love is permanent, in contrast with prophecies, tongues, and knowledge—all of which will cease to exist because they will cease to be needed. The reason these three will cease is that they are imperfect and partial (vv.9–10) compared to perfect knowledge and prophetic understanding in heaven. Paul does not say when they will cease. Some think he meant that the need for miraculous gifts would cease to exist at the end of the apostolic period. This view is based in part on the implications of the meaning of the term "perfection" (GK 5455) in v.10, which is taken to refer here to the completion of the canon at the end of the first century A.D. With this view, the term "prophecies" (GK 4735) in v.8 is taken narrowly as referring to direct, inspired revelatory communication from the Holy Spirit. This cessation would apply also to tongues and to the special gift of knowledge (vv.8–9).

There is something attractive about this view as an argument against the position that the gifts of vv.8–10 continued beyond the apostolic period; however, it is difficult to prove the cessation of these gifts at the end of the first century A.D. by taking "perfection" (teleion) to refer to a completion of the canon at that time, since that idea is totally extraneous to the context. On the other hand, in a number of contexts the Greek words related to teleion, such as telos ("end"; GK 5465) and teleo ("to bring to an end"; GK 5464) are used in relation to the second coming of Christ. This is true in both 1:8; 15:24 and in non-Pauline writing (cf. Jas 5:11; Rev 20:5, 7; 21:6; 22:13). Therefore, it seems more appropriate to understand teleion in v.10 to mean that "perfection" is to come about at the Second Coming, or, if before, when the Christian dies and is taken to be with the Lord (2Co 5:1–10).

All things considered, one can argue for the cessation of the gifts of prophecy, tongues, and the special gift of knowledge on the basis of the larger context of Paul's writings and on the basis of the grammar of vv.9,13, rather than on the meaning of a specific word. According to Paul, prophecies, tongues, and knowledge will pass away soon. His view seems to be that this passing away will occur when the important office of apostle with its requirement of men having seen the Lord and having been a witness to his resurrection (Gal 1:14–24) is no longer exercised. But "now" faith, hope, and love continue to remain.

Paul's illustration of a child's thoughts and speech, real but inadequately conceived and expressed in comparison with those of mature persons (v.11), aptly conveys the difference between the Christian's present understanding and expression of spiritual things and the perfect understanding and expression he or she will have in heaven (v.12). The metaphor is that of the imperfect reflection seen in a polished metal mirror (cf. Jas 1:23) of the ancient world in contrast with seeing the Lord face to face (cf. Ge 32:30; Nu 12:8; 2Co 3:18). Paul's thought in 12b may be expanded as follows: Now through the Word of God, I know in part; then, in the presence of the Lord, I will know fully—to the full extent that a redeemed finite human being can know and in a way similar in kind to the way the Lord in his infinite wisdom fully and infinitely knows me. The Corinthians, Paul implies, must not boast now of their gifts (cf. 13:4), for those gifts are nothing compared to what is in store for the Christians in heaven.

13 The words "and now" introduce Paul's conclusion; namely, "and now, there are faith, hope, and love—they, to be sure, remain now and forever." By faith and hope remaining in eternity Paul means that trust in the Lord begun in this life will continue forever and that hope in the Lord begun now (Ro 8:24– 25) will expand and issue into an eternal expectation of his perfect plan for our eternal existence with him (cf. Rev 22:3–5). Love is the greatest of these three graces because through faith love unites Christians personally to God (1Jn 4:10, 19) and through God's love (Ro 5:5) we are enabled to love one another (Jn 13:34–35). Love is communicating grace and identifies us as children of God (Jn 13:34–35; 1Jn 4:8; et al.).

e. The priority of prophecy over tongues and rules for the exercise of both (14:1–25)

This significant chapter deals with two important subjects: (1) the relative value and use of prophecy and speaking in tongues (vv.1–25) and (2) orderly conduct in public worship (vv.26–40).

Having established in ch. 13 that prophecy, tongues, and all spiritual gifts must be exercised in love, Paul now argues that prophesying is to be preferred over speaking in tongues since the former, because it is understood, edifies the church; whereas, without an interpreter, the latter does not. Because of Paul's stress on the need for interpretation (vv.5, 13), the implication is that the Corinthians, in their desire to speak in tongues and their pride in it alone, had neglected this essential matter.

1 In making his transition from the beautiful thirteenth chapter (14:1a), Paul uses a strong verb—"pursue" ("follow the way of" in NIV; GK 1503; cf. Php 3:12, 14)—as he charges the Corinthians to seek love. This verb is stronger than the following one ("eagerly desire"; GK 2420), which he applies to seeking spiritual gifts. So love must have the priority; after that the gift of prophecy must particularly be sought.

2 Paul now begins to show why tongues are not to be preferred. In speaking in tongues, the speaker is talking only to God (cf. Ro 8:26) in a language unknown to other people. "Mysteries" (GK 3696) refers to the deep truths of God's salvation (cf. Ac 2:11). "By [or, with] the spirit" does not refer to the Holy Spirit, who is not mentioned in the context, but to the person's own spirit (vv.14–15).

3–4 Paul describes the advantages of prophesying (GK 4736). Prophecy edifies the church, whereas by speaking in tongues, one builds oneself up in seeking spiritual fellowship with God. There is no mention here that the speaker understands the tongues; not until later does Paul discuss the problem of understanding and insist that the gift of interpretation should be sought by speakers in tongues (vv.13–15). "Encouragement" and "comfort" are aspects of the edifying or strengthening that comes from prophesying.

5 Paul emphatically restates v.1b: Speak in tongues, you Corinthians, yes; but more than that, I want you to prophesy, because this gift brings understanding and strengthening to the church. However, if there is an interpretation of the tongue, then speaking in tongues can strengthen the church.

6 At this point Paul draws a conclusion. Since tongues without interpretation do not edify, what good would it do the Corinthians if Paul came speaking in tongues unless the message he brought were understandable? The four kinds of messages he lists may be put into two categories: (1) supernatural revelation (cf. Gal 2:2) and prophecy, and (2) natural tools of communication—knowledge and teaching (cf. 1Co 12:8–10). The conditions are stated here as possible, not factual. Paul is not saying that he will come to them speaking in tongues, but only that if he were to do so, it would be futile unless he brought an understandable message.

7–9 Paul now gives some vivid illustrations. The flute and the harp were well-known and valued musical instruments in Greece, and the Jews would be acquainted with the music of temple worship. But music is nothing more than senseless sounds without systematic differences in pitch, tone, and time. Everyone in Corinth would understand the necessity of the trumpet's call to battle (cf. Nu 10:9; Jos 6:4, 9). Applying the illustrations, Paul says that it is not the mere sound of speaking that is important, but whether the sounds can be understood by the hearers.

10–12 Paul's reference to the "languages in the world" and the "foreigner" substantiates the conclusion that in his discussion of tongues he has in mind known foreign languages, which convey meaning by their systematic distinction of sounds. The "meaning" (lit., "power"; GK 1539) of a language refers to its "power" to convey meaning. In v.12 Paul applies these things to the Corinthians. They should major in gifts that will strengthen the church.

13–14 With the possibility before them of a non-understood tongue, Paul now argues that its interpretation must be sought. He urges this not only so that those who hear but do not understand may know the meaning, but also that the speaker himself may be benefited by getting an intellectual as well as a spiritual blessing from the exercise. The expression "my mind is unfruitful" means that the mind does not intelligently share in the blessing of the person's spirit. The mind is that faculty in a person that is involved in conscious, meaningful reasoning. Paul desires the Corinthians to have a complete blessing here, both in their spirits and in their minds.

15–17 Praying and singing in the spirit and mind (v.15) are involved in praising and giving thanks to God (v.16), all of which are to be a coherent part of Christian worship (Eph 5:18–19). "Those who do not understand" are Christians who do not understand the tongue without an interpretation, or inquirers about Christianity who do not understand the language. Such people, too, are important, Paul implies, for they also ought to be able to say "Amen" (cf. 1Ch 16:36; Ne 5:13; 2Co 1:20; Eph 3:21) to the thanksgiving conveyed in the strange language. But how can they do that and mean it, when they do not understand what they have heard? Paul grants that the tongue may in itself be conveying thanksgiving to God, but it was important for Christians without that gift to understand it (v.17).

18–19 Having said that he has the ability to speak in foreign tongues more than all of them (an ability he could properly use), Paul hastens to add he would rather speak a few words in a language the church knows so that they might grow spiritually.

20–25 In this section Paul first calls on the Corinthians to think maturely, as "adults" (GK 5455) in Christ, rather than be controlled by evil motives in their appraisal of tongues. He then implies that prophecy is superior to speaking in tongues because though tongues, as in Ac 2, can be impressive to the unbelievers in showing that God is present and can lead them to face the claims of Christ, yet prophecy can be more effective in bringing the unbeliever to conviction of sin. This was true of Peter's sermon following the speaking in tongues at Pentecost (Ac 2:14–37). To illustrate his point that there is no special mark of divine blessing to have people in the congregation who can speak in a language not understood, Paul cites Isa 28:11–12, his point being that if Israel would not hear the Lord through the prophets, they certainly would not hear when he spoke in foreign languages to them through foreign people. So, Paul is saying, why put so much stress on tongues?

Paul concludes (v.22) that tongues can be and are a sign of something miraculous, an indication of God's presence to unbelievers (cf. Ac 2). Believers do not need that sign, for they already have the indwelling Holy Spirit (Ro 8:9–11; 1Co 6:19). But this is not all. Too much emphasis should not be placed on tongues even for unbelievers, for excessive use of this gift will have an adverse effect on them, and they will think that the Christians are out of their minds (v.23). Furthermore, everyone needs the blessing of prophecy that can bring unbelievers visiting the church under conviction of sin (vv.24–25). Those who "do not understand" seem to be unbelievers who have begun to show interest in the Gospel—inquirers. The effect of Christian prophecy on such people is threefold: They will be convicted of sin (cf. Jn 16:8); they will be called to take account of their sins and examine their sinful condition; and they will have their sinful heart and past laid open to inspection (cf. Jn 4:16–19). The entire church through its prophetic message has, in God's providence, a part in bringing unbelievers to this place of conviction. They will then recognize that God really is present and is dealing with them.

f. Orderly conduct in Christian worship (14:26–40)

In this final section on conduct in church worship, Paul insists that all the parts of worship should be conducive to instruction and edification. Tongues, prophecy, and other gifts were to be practiced under strict regulation (vv.26–33a). Also, for the sake of decorum in the churches, women were not to speak in public worship (vv.33b–36). Paul declares that what he is writing is the Lord's instruction (vv.37–38). He concludes by encouraging the Corinthian Christians to seek to prophesy and not to prohibit people from speaking in tongues, provided the whole of the worship service is decorous and orderly (vv.39–40).

Paul is not so much addressing his remarks here to particular individuals as to the entire church. All his imperatives are in the present tense, indicating that the church must keep a constant supervision over all these aspects of its worship.

26–28 Verse 26 gives us a short outline of the elements of worship in Corinth: a hymn, instruction, revelation, a tongue, an interpretation. Some of this is reminiscent of Jewish worship (cf. Mt 26:30; Lk 4:16–30). Paul again stresses here the unity and diversification of gifts in the church. One person has this ability, another that one; but all gifts must be used to build up the church (cf. vv.3–5). As for tongues, they must be regulated, with only two or three speaking, one at a time and with someone interpreting (v.27). The phrase "in turn" (v.31) suggests that the speaker in tongues is not the one doing the interpreting, though on some occasions it is conceivable that he may himself have done so (v.13). Without an interpreter, there was to be no public tongues-speaking in the church. Thus the one speaking in tongues had the responsibility of finding out first if an interpreter was present. If not, the speaker must be silent in the worship service and speak only to himself and God (v.28). Perhaps this means that if no interpreter was on hand, one should do tongues-speaking at home.

29–33a As for regulating prophesying in church, only a limited number—not over three—should speak, lest so much be said as to cause confusion. The mention of revelation (v.30) suggests that the prophecy in mind involved a revelation, a special deep teaching, which, however, was distinct from the kind of revelation of inspired Scripture (2Ti 3:14–17). Such teaching should be heard even from one who had not been on his feet to speak. In some way the person with this revelation was a spokesman for God in giving some edifying message to the church. The "spirits of the prophets" (v.32) are the spirits of those who were guided by the Holy Spirit in using this special gift. And these prophetic utterances were subject to being checked by other prophets for accuracy and orthodoxy. All this would lead to the peace and order of which God is the author (v.33). Paul was afraid of unregulated worship that might lead to disorderly conduct and belie the God of peace who had called them to be orderly.

33b–36 Paul now turns to the role of women in public worship, the implication being that men were to lead in worship. Paul indicates that his instruction for Corinth was followed in all the churches, thus emphasizing the universality of the Christian community. All the churches were composed of "saints" (those set apart for God), and should be governed by the same principle of orderly conduct.

The command seems absolute: Women were not to do any public speaking in the church. This restriction was not to be construed as demoting women, since the expressions "be in submission" (GK 5718) and "their own husbands" are to be interpreted as simply consistent with God's order of administration (cf. 11:7–8; Eph 5:21–33). "The Law says" must refer to the law as set forth in such places as Ge 3:16; 1Co 11:3; Eph 5:22; 1Ti 1:12; Tit 2:5. A woman's request for knowledge was not to be denied, since she was a human being equal to the man. Her questions could be answered at home rather than by asking her husband in the public service and so possibly interrupting the sermon.

The word "woman" (GK 1222) has the general meaning of an adult female, but it also means "wife." Paul uses the word here in the general sense when he states that "women should remain silent in the churches." That he assumes there were many married women in the congregation is evident from his reference to "their husbands" (v.35). He does not address himself to the question of where unmarried women (cf. 7:8, 36ff.) were to get their questions answered. We may assume, however, that they were to talk in private with other qualified persons, such as Christian widows (7:8), their pastor (cf. Timothy as a pastor, 1Ti 5:1–2), or elders who were "able to teach" (1Ti. 3:2). At any rate, a woman's femininity must not be disgraced by her trying to take a man's role in the church.

But what about the seeming contradiction between these verses and 11:5ff., where Paul speaks of women praying and prophesying? The explanation may be that in ch. 11 Paul does not say that women were doing the sort of things in public worship that are discussed in ch. 14.

Paul's rhetorical questions (v.36) are ironical and suggest that the Corinthians had their own separate customs regarding the role of women in public worship and were tending to act independently of Paul's other churches. They were presuming to act as though they had originated the Word of God (i.e., the Gospel) and as if they could depart from Paul's commands and do as they pleased in these matters of church order.

37–38 Paul now steps delicately. He had given strict commands but wants to soften their impact. He asks for those who have the gift of prophecy and are spiritually gifted to authenticate the fact that his commands are from the Lord (v.37). But immediately Paul returns to his strict injunction (v.38). The tone is abrupt, the meaning is clear: anyone who ignores it will be ignored by Paul and the churches, or possibly even the Lord, and so be considered an unbeliever (1:18).

39–40 These closing verses revert to prophecy and tongues. Paul urges the Corinthians to keep on desiring to prophesy and not to prohibit people from speaking in tongues. But Christian worship must be marked by good order.

Summary At this point a summary of the place of speaking in tongues in the apostolic community of the first century A.D. and also a discussion of tongues in the post-apostolic period and the relevance of tongues in the twentieth-century church are in order. (1) In Paul's discussion of this and other gifts in chs. 12–14, he emphasizes priority of love over tongues and other gifts (ch. 13).

(2) In the list of offices (those of apostles, prophets and teachers) and gifts for the church (12:27–31a), the office-gifts are listed first, with other gifts following, the last being "tongues." This implies that Paul gives priority to office-gifts over the others. Furthermore, among the office-gifts, that of apostles, who were unique in having seen the Lord, ceased to exist in the first century A.D.

(3) In his treatment of tongues and prophecy in ch. 14, Paul again shows his preference for prophecy over tongues, since the former was the gift that brought edification to the church (vv.1–5). He minimizes the importance of the gift of tongues (v.19).

(4) In his discussion in ch. 12 regarding the diversity of gifts and their functions in the church, the body of Christ, Paul uses the analogy of the human body with its various parts functioning in unique and distinct ways without each one trying to usurp the function of another part. So he shows that the gifts, including tongues, were not to be sought for the sake of the gifts, nor was everyone to seek to have the same gift, such as tongues.

(5) God does not have to work by miraculous means in order to accomplish his purposes; he usually uses ordinary natural means—e.g., in the production of crops, he uses the sun, the rain, and the nutrients of the ground, as well as the hard work of people in farming the land. In connection with "spiritual gifts," it is significant that in 12:5–11 not all of the gifts mentioned are miraculous; in fact, gifts of wisdom and knowledge (v.8) are mentioned before the miraculous ones, including tongues. It is not essential that everyone have a miraculous gift (see 12:29–30).

(6) On the basis of the phenomenon of foreign languages spoken of in Ac 2:5–12, we have argued that the tongues referred to in 14:13–15, 20–25 were also foreign-language tongues—not ecstatic utterances, gibberish, or nonunderstandable erratic variations of consonants and vowels with indiscriminate modulation of pitch, speed, and volume.

(7) The essential offices for building up the body of Christ, the church, are, according to Paul (Eph 4:11–16), those of apostles, prophets, evangelists, and pastors-teachers. He says nothing there about the necessity of miraculous gifts either in evangelism (Eph 4:11) or in the teaching-edifying ministry of the church (vv.12–16).

(8) The other NT passages in which Christian worship patterns are set forth do not include miraculous gifts and functions. This is true not only for worship in the developing church under Paul's ministry as portrayed in the last half of Acts and in the letters, but also in the worship of the OT and early NT periods involving predominantly Jewish Christians. These important elements of worship were: the reading of Scripture and expounding it with understanding (Ne 8:1–8; Lk 4:16–30; Ac 2:17–36); prayer (1Ki 8:10–61; Ac 14:23; 16:25); singing (1Ch 25; Ac 16:25; Eph 5:19); Christian fellowship (2Ki 23:1–3; Ac 2:42); and Christian ceremonies or sacraments (as the Passover in Ex 12 and the Lord's Supper in Ac 2:42; 20:7; 1Co 11:17–32). Miraculous gifts, including tongues, are absent from these contexts, the conclusion being that they were not to be a necessary part of the general worship patterns of the church.

(9) Miraculous activity, including speaking in a tongue, did come in biblical times from other sources than the Lord. Witness such activity induced by evil spirits and satanic forces—the Gerasene demon-possessed man (Lk 8:26–39) and the spirit-possessed girl (Ac 16:16–18). Psychological factors were involved in the superhuman strength and tongue-speaking activity of the Gerasene demon-possessed man, for upon his deliverance from the demons, he was found to be in his "right mind" (Lk 8:35). Therefore caution and balance are needed in relation to such miraculous activities as speaking in tongues. We must also recognize that other gifts were similarly perverted by Satan. The OT speaks more than once of false prophets, as does the NT. The Bible speaks of false pastors (e.g., Zec 11:17; Jn 10:12–13) and frequently warns against false teachers. Yet no one would insist that either prophecy in its valid sense of speaking out for God to the people or the pastoral-teaching ministry is no longer valid. Misuse of a gift does not invalidate the gift itself. However, because of their intimate psychological nature, "tongues" must be viewed with special caution and not be overstressed.

(10) Directly after the first-century apostolic period, legitimate miraculous gifts, such as tongues, practically ceased. There is little evidence for miracle-working in the post-apostolic church; not until the fourth century did claims to miracles become abundant. Furthermore, the writings of the Apostolic Fathers contain no clear and certain allusions to miracle-working or any other supernatural gifts.

Why was there a preponderance of miraculous gifts, including tongues, at the time of the ministries of Jesus Christ and his apostles? After all, miraculous gifts do not appear as a part of God's working among the believers in many parts of the biblical record. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the twelve patriarchs did not possess or use miraculous gifts, nor did David, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and others. However, when certain prophets of God needed particular support and verification, then God performed great miracles through them, as with Moses and Joshua (Ex 12–40; Jos 1-7) and Elijah and Elisha (1Ki 17–2Ki 13). Likewise, during Jesus' ministry and that of his apostles, God verified their message and work by performing mighty miracles through them, including the speaking in tongues on Pentecost. Then miracles ceased when the need for the particular witness ended and the writing of the Scriptures was complete.

As to the relevance of tongues-speaking in the church today, we may observe, in addition to the foregoing discussion, that the requirements Paul gives for the important offices of elder and deacon (1Ti 3:1–13; Tit 1:5–9) say nothing about the necessity that the bearers of these offices have such gifts (cf. also Eph 4:11–13). Also, the instructions given Christians as to how they are to live together in the various units of society (Eph 5:21–6:9; Col 3:18–4:1; 1Pe 2:13–3:7; 5:1–7, et al.) say nothing about the exercise of these kinds of gifts.

In conclusion, this writer believes that the best answer to the question of the relevance of the gift of tongues today is found in the principle that God used this and other miraculous gifts in OT and apostolic times to authenticate the messengers of his word, and that the present-day Christian should not seek such gifts. This is not to say that the churches collectively and individually should not pray that if it is God's will, the sick may be healed by his power, or that the church should not pray for deeper illumination in understanding God's inerrant written Word.

Having said this, this writer realizes that many Christians of orthodox and evangelical commitment hold that the gift of tongues as set forth in Acts and 1Co 12–14 is relevant today. Some of them no doubt recognize that speaking in tongues is the least of the gifts, as suggested in 12:28–30 (where Paul placed it last in the list) or in 14:5, 18–20, 22–24 (where he subordinates it to prophecy). But they would insist that the gift is not completely ruled out for this modern era, since Paul declares, "Do not forbid speaking in tongues" (14:39).

Moreover, some Christians who accept the present validity of tongues maintain that contemporary conditions point to the end times and are the reason for a resurgence of tongues. Also, they emphasize that any practice of tongues-speaking today must be done in accordance with the guidelines of 14:26–40. Perhaps most would say that tongues-speaking may best be practiced in private (especially when there is no interpreter), where one can speak in a tongue to God alone (14:2, 8).

These present-day advocates of tongues would undoubtedly agree that this gift, as well as any of the other gifts, should not be considered an end in itself but must be exercised in love (13:1–3)—not as a spiritual ornament to be seen or as a test of spiritual attainment. Rather, they would say, it must be used as an instrument for the service and glorification of God.

VIII. The Resurrection of Christ and of the Christian (15:1–58)

This is the classic chapter on the resurrection. In it Paul argues the whole subject of the resurrection from the dead—a teaching that some in the church at Corinth had been questioning (see v.12).

How he had heard about this denial he does not say. But the question gives him an opportunity to bring again before the church the doctrine of the bodily resurrection of Christ, which, along with the death of Christ, he had faithfully communicated to them (vv.1–3). He validates the historical reality of Christ's resurrection by citing eyewitnesses, including himself (vv.4–11). He argues the validity of the resurrection of believers from the fact of the resurrection of Christ (vv.12–19) and then shows that Christ's having been raised and becoming the firstfruits of the believing dead guarantees the sequence of events at the second coming of Christ (vv.20–28). He refers to the futility of certain practices of baptism for the dead (vv.29–30) if the dead are not actually raised. He also asks why Christians should suffer for Christ if there is no resurrection and calls on the Corinthians to give up these doubts and witness to their faith in a risen Christ (vv.29–34). Finally, in a passage of great eloquence, Paul discusses the nature of the resurrection body and the victory over death that God will give us through our Lord Jesus Christ (vv.35–58).

A. The Resurrection of Christ (15:1–11)

1–2 Paul begins by reminding the Corinthian Christians that the resurrection is an integral part of the Gospel he had preached and they had received and believed (see comment on 11:23). The "if" clause in v.2 implies that Paul believes they are really holding firmly to the Word of God and are therefore saved. So the sentence "Otherwise, you have believed in vain" means that the Gospel assures them of salvation unless the supposed faith they had was actually empty and worthless.

3–8 "Of first importance" stresses the centrality of the doctrines cited to the Gospel. Paul gives two kinds of witness to the historic events of Christ's death and resurrection: the OT Scriptures and the testimony of eyewitnesses. He does not quote specific OT passages but must have had in mind such texts as Isa 53:5–6 and Ps 16:8-11. He mentions Christ's burial to show the genuineness of his death and resurrection. Paul feels no compulsion to cite any eyewitnesses of Christ's death, because its factuality was commonly accepted. The resurrection was a different matter, however. If Christianity was to be believed, valid eyewitnesses must be cited to attest this historical event and set to rest doubts about the resurrection of the dead.

That "Christ died for our sins" (v.3) implies that Christ was sinless. That he was raised agrees with the Scripture in Ps 16:10 (cf. Ac 2:25–32); so also does Paul's statement about the third day, which may be based on Jesus' words in Mt 12:40 that relate his three days in the tomb to Jonah's three days inside the fish (Jnh 1:17). According to Jewish reckoning, "three days" would include part of Friday, all of Saturday, and part of Sunday.

Part of the message Paul passed on to the Corinthians was eyewitness reports of the resurrection of Christ, some of whom Paul names. It is natural for him to include Cephas (Peter) and the apostles (possibly referring to the meeting recorded in Lk 24:36ff. and Jn 20:19ff.). "The Twelve" is a designation of the apostles as a group and is not to be pressed numerically, since Judas was no longer there and on one occasion Thomas (Jn 20:24) was not with them. The apostolic witness was of vital importance for the Corinthians, and Paul doubtless included the witness of the 500 especially to impress doubting believers with the sheer number of eyewitnesses of the event. Some of them may have been known to the Corinthians. This appearance of Christ to so many at one time may have taken place in Galilee, where the eleven and many more went to meet the risen Lord (Mt 28:10, 16). "Fallen asleep" (GK 3121) is an early Christian expression for dying (cf. Ac 7:60; 1Co 11:30).

The James mentioned in v.7 certainly is not one of the two apostles of that name—James the son of Zebedee and James the son of Alphaeus (Mt 10:2–4), since the whole group of apostles is mentioned next and would include these two. Instead, it must be the Lord's half-brother (Mt 13:55), who had, with his brothers, joined the apostolic band (Ac 1:14) and eventually became prominent in the Jerusalem church (Ac 15:13). We do not know when this appearance took place. Since Paul had mentioned "the Twelve" in v.5, "all the apostles" (v.7) must be used more loosely to include others who met with the apostolic band (cf. Ac 1:13–15). All this evidence (vv.5–8) was received by Paul from the eyewitnesses themselves (cf. Gal. 1:18–19) and possibly from some of the gospel writers.

Paul includes himself as the last witness (v.8). He describes himself as one born of a miscarriage, thus conveying his feeling that he was not a "normal" member of the apostolic group, but one who had been snatched out of his sin and rebellion by the glorified Christ (Ac 9:3–6).

9–11 Paul reflects on his own unworthiness and on God's matchless redeeming grace. Though he taught that all are unworthy before God (Ro 3:10–18), he felt himself particularly unworthy because he had persecuted the church. He calls it "the church of God"; therefore, in persecuting it, he felt he had been persecuting God. With true humility, he attributes all his hard work for the cause of Christ solely to God's amazing grace (v.10). Then, with great emphasis, he declares that all—both he and the other apostles—preached the same Gospel with the same stress on the resurrection, and this is the message the Corinthians believed.

B. The Validity of the Resurrection of the Dead (15:12–19)

12–16 Paul now presents his major proposition. Some at Corinth had argued that there was no resurrection of the dead. He replies that this is absolutely contrary to the proclamation that Christ has been raised. The particular verb form he uses (in vv.4, 12–14, 16–17, 20) emphasizes the present reality of that historic fact (cf. Gal 2:20). The conditional sentences throughout this section use a construction that assumes a fact: "If it is preached [as it is] that Christ has been raised . . ." (v.12; also in vv.13–14, 16–17, 19).

Having questioned the contention of some that the dead do not rise (v.12), the apostle states a series of conclusions flowing from the contention that the dead do not rise: (1) There is no resurrection of Christ (v.13); (2) preaching that he has been raised is then empty and meaningless (v.14a); (3) their resultant faith in Christ is also meaningless (v.14b); and (4) his own testimony about Christ's resurrection is false, because it claims God did something he really did not do (v.15). Verse 16 closes this set of conclusions by reiterating the statement of v.13.

17–19 Paul draws additional hypothetical conclusions from the thesis that Christ has not risen from the dead: (1) Faith is not only vain or meaningless (v.14), it is also fruitless (v.17); (2) believers still carry the guilt of their sins and are not justified (v.17b; cf. the converse in Ro 5:1); (3) there is no hope for those who have died in Christ—they have perished (v.18); (4) therefore putting up with persecutions and hardships is futile; and finally, (5) we are most to be pitied among men (v.19).

C. Christ the Guarantee of the Resurrection From the Dead (15:20–28)

20 The "but . . . indeed" is an emphatic and conclusive way of introducing some vitally important affirmations. Certainly, Paul implies, none of the Corinthian believers would deny that an integral part of the Gospel is the resurrection of Christ (15:1–4). Therefore, they must now accept the sequel—Christ guarantees the resurrection of the Christian dead, as the word "firstfruits" (GK 569) teaches. By "firstfruits" Paul brings to bear the rich imagery of the OT. The "firstfruits"—the first sheaf of the harvest offered to the Lord (Lev 23:10–11, 17, 20)—was not only prior to the main harvest but was also an assurance that the rest of the harvest was coming. So with Christ. He preceded his people in his bodily resurrection and he is also the guarantee of their resurrection at his second coming.

21–22 These verses are similar to Paul's two-category contrast in Ro 5:12–21. The man who brought death is Adam, and the one who will bring about the resurrection of the dead is Christ (cf. also 1Co 15:45). All who are represented in Adam—i.e., the whole human race—died. All who are in Christ—i.e., God's redeemed people—will be made alive at the resurrection (cf. Jn 5:25).

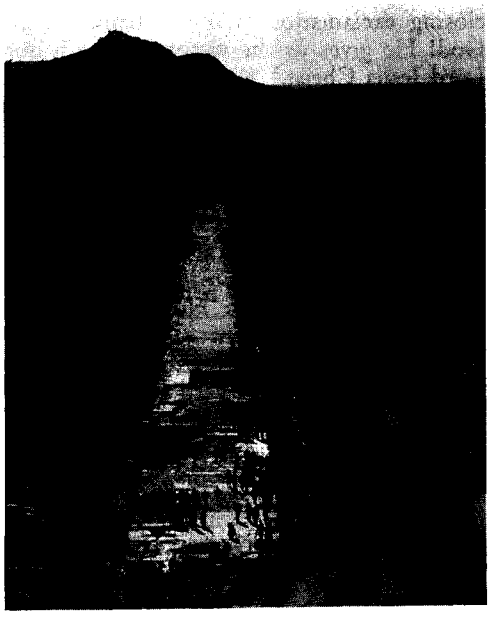
23 The expression "each in his own turn" stresses the different times involved: Christ the "firstfruits" was made alive three days after his death; the other group, those who belong to Christ, will be made alive "when he comes" (parousia; GK 4242). This term refers here to Christ's second coming at the rapture (cf. Mt 24:27; 1Th 4:13–17).

24–27 Paul continues with the idea of time-sequences (cf. "then"). At the time of Christ's second coming and the resurrection of the blessed dead (cf. Rev 20:4–6), then in order will come the process of his handing over the kingdom to God. This will include his conquest of all earthly and all spiritual powers and enemies (cf. Col 2:16). The picture is total, including the physical kingdoms of this world. This future total conquest of the rulers of this world is further suggested in v.25. Christ must continue his reign (i.e., his millennial reign; Rev 20:4–6) until all his enemies are conquered. The expression "under his feet" (an allusion to Ps 110:1; cf. Mt 22:44) is an OT figure for total conquest. The mention of Zion in Ps 110:2 suggests further that his enemies include those who attack Palestine (Rev 16:12–16) and Jerusalem (Rev 20:7–10) at the time of the millennial reign of Christ. Finally, death, the last enemy, is destroyed (v.26) at the close of the second-coming events at the great judgment (Rev 20:2–15). This results in the consummation of Christ's conquest of his enemies and all other things, as implied by the prophetic statement about "man" and particularly about the incarnate Christ in Ps 8:6 (quoted in v.27).

Some think the reference to "the end" (GK 5465) in vv.24–27 refers to the absolute end of this world, at which time believers will be raised. They hold that what follows "then" in v.24 is identical with what follows the "then" in v.23. According to this view, the end in v.24 is the final end, and it is not preceded by a literal thousand-year reign in which Christ puts his enemies under his feet. But this interpretation changes radically Paul's idea of events following each other in temporal sequence, to an abrupt "then the end will come," where there is no more sequence. This seems arbitrary, and it does not take adequate account of the fuller teaching on this subject in Rev 20:4–10—a passage that posits a reign of Christ and a time when this earth will have peace and rejuvenation before its final destruction (Rev 21:1). In Ro 8:18–25 it is stated that the whole creation (including the earth) will be delivered from "its bondage to decay" and will be delivered from decay at the time of the "glorious freedom" of the children of God. All of this occurs, according to Rev 20–21, before the destruction of the present heavens and earth. God's dealings with this present heaven and earth are described in Rev 21:1, not as a rejuvenation, but as a total destruction of what is called the "first" heaven and earth; a "new" heaven and a "new" earth (an earth in which there is "no longer any sea") take the place of the old ones (cf. 2Pe 3:10–13).

28 Verse 27 makes clear that in the "all things" God the Father is not made subject to Christ. On the other hand, v.28 suggests that the Son in a certain sense will be made subject to God the Father. That this does not mean inferiority of person or nature is shown by the future tense of the verb: "the Son himself will be made subject." If there were inherent inferiority, the present tense would be expected—i.e., "he is ever subjected to the Father." But the future aspect of Christ's subjection to the Father must rather be viewed in the light of the administrative process in which the world is brought from its sin and disorder into order by the power of the Son, who died and was raised and who then, in the economy of the Godhead, turns it all over to God the Father, the supreme administrative head. All this is to be done so that God will be recognized by all as sovereign, and he—the triune God—will be supreme (cf. Rev 22:3–5).

D. Implications of Denying the Resurrection From the Dead (15:29–34)



29 Paul now returns to his argument for the resurrection of the dead. There is a special difficulty in understanding v.29 because we do not know the background of the words "baptized for the dead." There are many interpretations, but it is difficult to find a satisfactory one. The present tense of "baptize" suggests that the practice of baptizing for the dead was current and evidently well known to the Corinthians. Most views center around the idea that Paul is referring to the practice of living believers being baptized for deceased believers who had died unbaptized or perhaps for deceased relatives who had never become believers. At any rate, Paul simply mentions the superstitious custom without approving it and uses it to fortify his argument that there is a resurrection from the dead.

30–32 Another argument for the resurrection is that if it is not true, then suffering and hardship for the sake of Christ are useless. By "endangering ourselves every hour," Paul seems to be alluding to peril looming up in his ministry in Ephesus (cf. Ac 19; 2Co 1:3–10), where he was when he wrote this letter. He is in danger of death every day (v.31). He seals this assertion with the oath that this is as true as the fact that he glories over them and over their union with Christ.

Paul's reference to fighting with wild beasts in Ephesus (v.32) may be taken literally or figuratively. But since from Ac 19 we see no evidence of such punishment and since it was questionable whether a Roman citizen would be subjected to such treatment, it is best to take the words metaphorically—the human enemies he fought with at Ephesus were like wild beasts. Paul's main point is: why go through all this suffering if there is no hope of resurrection? To prove his point, he first quotes Isa 22:13 (possibly for the benefit of the Jewish believers at Corinth). Without eternal hope through the resurrection, people have nothing to turn to but gratification of their appetites.

33 Turning to Greek literature, Paul supports his position by quoting a piece of practical worldly wisdom from the Greek poet Menander, relevant to the situation in the Corinthian church. The "bad company" points to those who were teaching that there is no resurrection and so were a threat to the testimony of the church.

According to legend, Paul was incarcerated in a prison in Ephesus, located in the mountain in the background of the picture.

34 Paul calls for the Corinthians to stop sinning in denying the resurrection of the dead and, by implication, the resurrection of Christ—a denial that leads to loose living. There were some in the church who did not know God or the precious doctrine of the resurrection. They were in a shameful condition, Paul says, because they were espousing such a denial of the truth.

E. The Resurrection Body: Its Nature and Change (15:35–58)

With incomparable logic, Paul's argument mounts toward its magnificent climax. First, he discusses the nature of the resurrection body (vv.35–49). Then he describes the transformation the body must undergo before death is conquered and the believer lives with God eternally (vv.50–58).

35–49 Paul now answers the question some believers were asking: since a resurrection "body" (GK 5393) would be like the sinful mortal body we now have, how can the resurrection of such a body occur? Paul calls such questions foolish, and in replying to them he uses analogies from the physical life and world. His first analogy is the seed analogy (v.37), which teaches that through "dying" (decaying in the ground), a seed gives birth by God's power to a new and different "body," though one related to the seed it came from.

A second analogy involves the body of flesh that various forms of animal life have—the different kinds of flesh for humans, animals, birds, and fish (v.39).

A third analogy relates to inanimate objects of creation (vv.40–41), in connection with which Paul again uses "body." These also differ. The "heavenly bodies," such as the sun, moon, and stars, differ from "the earthly bodies," and their "splendor" differs from "the splendor of the earthly bodies." Moreover, the heavenly bodies themselves differ from one another in splendor and brilliance. So, Paul is arguing, God is able to take similar physical material and organize it differently to accomplish his purposes.

In vv.42–44a the apostle applies these analogies to the truth of the resurrection of the body. God can take the mortal body, perishable (Gal. 6:8), dishonored, humiliated because of sin (Php 3:20–21), and weak (Mk 14:38)—a natural body like those of the animal world—and bring that body that "is sown" in death (cf. Jn 12:24) into a different order of life in a spiritual body. Such a body will indeed have immortality (2Ti 1:10), glory (Php 3:21), and power. It will have a spiritual way of functioning similar to the way heavenly bodies function in contradistinction to earthly bodies. This spiritual body is an imperishable yet utterly real body—one of a different order and having different functions from the earthly body; it is a body given by God himself—a body glorified with eternal life.

Verses 44b–49 develop the distinction between the natural body and the spiritual body by bringing in two categories—one of Adam and his descendants and the other of Christ, the last Adam, and his redeemed ones. By "natural body" Paul means one such as Adam had when he was made of the dust of the ground and given the breath of life (cf. Ge 2:7). By "spiritual body" the apostle means an imperishable body that has received eternal life from Christ, the life-giving Spirit (cf. Jn 5:26)—a body that will be changed, without either corruption or mortality, in order to live with God eternally (Php 3:21), just as Christ in his resurrected and glorified human body (Lk 24:36–43) went to heaven to be with the Father (cf. Acts 1:11; 2:33). There is, indeed, a real sense in which the accounts of the post-resurrection appearances of Christ in Lk 24; Jn 20–21; and Acts 1:1–9 shed light on the nature of the resurrection body (see also 2Co 5:1–10; 1Jn 3:2).

50–58 Paul now comes to the conclusion of his argument for the resurrection. God's people must have more than the natural body to inherit the eternal kingdom of God. "Flesh and blood" (GK 4922 & 135) refers to the mortal body—our present humanity, which Christ fully shared through his incarnation (Heb 2:14). This mortal body is perishable and cannot inherit that which is imperishable. So the unsaved cannot be in heaven at all, and the saved must have their bodies changed.

By using "mystery" (GK 3696) in reference to the resurrection body, Paul implies that there are various things about that body that the Corinthians did not understand, and about which he wants to inform them. (1) Not all Christians will "fall asleep," for some will be alive when Christ returns (1Th 4:15). (2) All Christians will receive changed bodies when Christ comes back and summons his people at the sound of the last trumpet (cf. Rev 11:15). Theologians call this "the rapture" (1Th 4:13–17). (3) The change will occur instantaneously and completely for all Christians, whether living or dead. (4) The change will occur from one kind of body to another. The "perishable" (GK 5785) bodies (i.e., those in Christ whose bodies are decaying in the grave) will be given "imperishable" ones. The "mortal" (GK 2570) bodies (i.e., those in Christ living in mortal bodies at the time of Christ's return) will be given "changed" (GK 248) immortal bodies—ones that will not die. When this occurs (v.54), the triumphant words in Isa 25:8 and Hos 13:14 will become a reality for God's people. (5) With strong emphasis on the words "victory" (GK 3777) and "sting" (GK 3034), Paul reaches the climax of this song of triumph in vv.56–57. If it were not for sin, death would have no sting. It is the law of God with its stringent moral demands that strengthens the power of sin by showing us how sinful we are, and thus condemns us. But death does not have the final victory! Hear the glorious closing exclamation (v.57): "Thanks be to God! He gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." Yes, victory, even over death and the grave, has been won through our Lord, who died and rose and is coming again.

Following this glorious outburst of eloquence, Paul concludes with a practical, down-to-earth exhortation (v.58). It is almost as if he is saying to the Corinthian Christians and indeed to all of us: "Now, my brothers and sisters, in the light of these sublime truths, be steadfast in doing the Lord's work, knowing that he will reward you at his coming."

IX. The Collection for God's People, Requests, and Final Greetings (16:1–24)

A. The Collection for God's People (16:1–4)

1–4 This section begins with "Now about," the same phrase as was used in 7:1 and 12:1 (see introductory comment on 7:1–14:40). The Corinthians had evidently asked about the "collection" (GK 3356) to be taken up for God's people at Jerusalem (v.3). Paul must have spoken to them earlier about it, as he also did later (cf. 2Co 8–9). This offering for the poor in Jerusalem was much on his mind during his third missionary journey (cf. Ro 15:26). That he mentions the Galatian churches here implies that this collection was to be a widespread and extensive effort with the Corinthian Christians contributing along with those from other lands. Why some of the Christians in Jerusalem were poor (Ro 15:26) at this time (c. A.D. 55–56) he does not say. It may have been in part because of the famine referred to in Ac 11:29 (c. A.D. 49). Some maintain that the poverty resulted from the Jerusalem Christians' being overgenerous in giving away their property and goods (cf. Ac 2:44–45; 4:34–35).

Paul teaches that the collection was to be set aside by each individual (and family) on the first day of the week (i.e., Sunday). While we are not told specifically that it was to be collected at church, the reference to Sunday suggests that the Christians were to bring their offerings to church on that day, since that was the day they assembled for worship (Ac 20:7; cf. Rev 1:10). Giving was to be proportionate; all were to participate, whether rich or poor; and the money was to be regularly set aside. The offering was to be planned for and saved up ahead of time instead of being hurriedly and ineffectively collected when Paul visited them. It was to be properly handled by messengers approved by the Corinthians themselves, who, bearing letters of recommendation to the church at Jerusalem, carried the gift. Paul eventually made provision for approved messengers to avoid any suspicion of wrongdoing with the funds (cf. 2Co 8:16–21).

In v.4 Paul does not explain why he may be going to Jerusalem, but he probably is thinking that some missionary business to be conducted there (cf. Ac 21:17–19) might compel him to do so. Or he may be thinking that he would like to be in Jerusalem when the gift was delivered. At any rate, he says that if he should go, the approved messengers would accompany him.

B. Personal Requests (16:5–18)

These requests revolve around Paul's travel plans (since he expects to leave Ephesus) and around his friends—Timothy, Apollos and others who have helped him, and the Corinthians.

5–9 The projected journey through Macedonia fits the record of Paul's travel in Ac 19:21 and 20:1–2, which shows that after following that route, he ended up spending three months in Greece—most likely in Corinth. This intention of spending the winter with them (1Co 16:6) relates to the "three months" mentioned in Ac 20:3. "To help him on his journey" must mean endorsing Paul's intended trip and encouraging him, perhaps with fresh supplies and equipment. Paul did not seem to want to burden them by asking directly for money (cf. 1Co 9:7–12).

His work, Paul feels, is not yet finished at Ephesus (vv.8–9), because a great door (cf. "door" in Ac 14:27; 2Co 2:12; Col 4:3) of opportunity stands open for him there. We are not told just who the opponents at Ephesus were, but according to Ac 19:23–27 they included the pagan craftsmen engaged in making miniature silver shrines of Artemis. The reference to Pentecost means that Paul expected to stay at Ephesus until well into spring, then go during the summer to Macedonia (including Philippi), and finally spend the winter in Corinth. The following spring, by Pentecost time, the apostle was at Jerusalem (Ac 20:16; cf. 20:6, which states that Paul sailed from Philippi after the Feast of Unleavened Bread, about forty-two days before Pentecost).

10–11 The reference to Timothy's coming must be connected with Ac 19:22, where Paul sent Timothy (and Erastus) into Macedonia. Therefore, at the time Paul wrote this, Timothy was traveling and was expected to arrive in Corinth (1Co 4:17). Because Paul remembered that the Corinthians had acted so harshly toward himself (4:1, 8–13), he was afraid that they would treat the timid Timothy (1Ti 4:12; 2Ti 1:7) coldly.

Paul's young helper, Timothy, had been with him for several years (Ac 16:1–3) and (as the Corinthians must have known) was doing effective work. When Timothy's work for the Lord was finished at Corinth, Paul expected the Corinthians to send him back with all his needs supplied and with their blessing. The brothers coming back with Timothy may have included Erastus (Ac 19:22), who was a Corinthian believer (Ro 16:23).

12 The way Paul brings up the matter of Apollos—"Now about" (cf. introductory comment on 7:1–14:40; also comment on 16:1)—suggests that the Corinthians had asked about him and had perhaps suggested that he visit them. The text implies that Apollos was working independently of Paul, for Paul could only strongly urge him to go. Apollos was apparently with Paul when the Corinthians made their inquiry, but because of the past tense of the verb "was willing," when Paul actually wrote 1 Corinthians Apollos was apparently no longer with him.

13–14 Paul now includes several apt exhortations, as he generally does at the end of his letters (Ro 16:17–19; 1Th 5:12–22; et al.). His reference to "the faith" reminds one of the discussion of the faith in 15:14, 17. In a dramatic way, he encourages them to "be men [and women] of courage" (GK 437).

15–18 The reference to "the household [GK 3864] of Stephanas" was evidently prompted by the Corinthians' lack of respect for them; by personal experience the apostle knew full well that the Corinthians were capable of disrespect. There is no conflict with Ac 17:34 in the statement in v.15 that those "in the household of Stephanas" were the first converts in Achaia, for Ac 17:34 speaks only of individuals like Dionysius, Damaris, and "a number of others" at Athens; here, however, a whole household (including the family and slaves) is in view. He urges the Corinthians to submit to the household of Stephanas and others like them because that entire family was committed to serving God's people.

Fortunatus and Achaicus—mentioned here for the first time (v.17)—were, along with Stephanas, probably the ones who brought the letter referred to in 1Co 7:1 to the apostle. That this delegation had "supplied what was lacking" may be taken to mean that their coming had encouraged Paul by showing him that the Corinthians were at least willing to ask his advice. So they "refreshed his spirit" and the spirit of the Corinthians also (v.18) in that they were willing to go to Paul. Or perhaps Paul means that the Corinthians will be refreshed when the three men get back home and tell of their visit to him.

C. Final Greetings (16:19–24)

19–20 Characteristically Paul concludes with a series of final greetings. First, he wants the Corinthians to know that the churches of Asia are interested in them and send greetings. The term "Asia" is used by Paul for the Roman province of Asia located in what is now western Turkey. By "churches" Paul may be implying the existence of more than one church group in Ephesus and the existence of other churches in the area, such as at Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis (Col 4:13–16; also Rev 2–3). The word of the Lord had spread all over the province (Ac 19:10). It was natural for Aquila and Priscilla to send greetings, since they had been of such help in founding the Corinthian church (Ac 18:2). They had left Corinth with Paul (Ac 18:18) and evidently were with him at Ephesus. While they were there, a church met in their house, which was also true at Rome (v.19; cf. Ro 16:3–5). To "greet" (GK 832) one "in the Lord" was to greet a person as a professed believer. When the Corinthians receive this letter and read it in church, Paul encourages them to give one another a "kiss" (GK 5799). The holy kiss (see also Ro 16:16; 2Co 13:12; 1Th 5:26) was apparently a public practice among early believers to show their Christian affection and unity in the faith. The kiss of respect and friendship was customary in the ancient East. Such a greeting may have been practiced in the synagogue by first-century Jews—a practice in which men would have kissed men and women women. If this custom was taken over by the early Christian church, it is unlikely that in the worship services the church would have practiced kissing between the sexes.

21–24 Paul is now ready to take the pen to append a greeting and sign the letter, as was his practice (Col 4:18; Phm 19). This was a mark of the letter's authenticity (2Th 3:17). Up to this point, he had dictated the letter to an amanuensis (secretary).

Then, in view of the problems existing at Corinth, Paul felt the need to add a strong warning: "a curse be on him" (v.22). A curse (anathema; GK 353; cf. 12:3; Ro 9:3; Gal 1:8) meant that the person involved was to be delivered over or "devoted to the divine displeasure" as being under the wrath and curse of God. Paul's use of this curse is not at variance with Jesus' words in Mt 5:34, because there Jesus qualifies what he means by saying in effect: "Do not take oaths on the basis of any of God's created things—the heavens, the earth, or Jerusalem." Here Paul is bringing God himself to witness and is saying he who does not love and obey God is under God's wrath. Having spoken so strongly, Paul then turns to the future hope and cries out, "Marana tha"—Aramaic words that came to be used in the early church and that can best be translated "Our Lord, come!"

Paul ends with his usual shorter benediction (Gal 6:18; Eph 6:21; et al.; cf. 2Co 13:14 for its enlarged trinitarian form). In concluding with an expression of his own love for all the believers (v.21), Paul wants the whole Corinthian church to know that, in spite of the stern way in which he has had to rebuke them, he really loves them.

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
1Co 1:19	Isa 29:14	Worldly wisdom perishes
1Co 1:31	Jer 9:24	Boasting in the Lord
1Co 2:9	Isa 64:4	What no eye has seen
1Co 2:16	Isa 40:13	The mind of the Lord
1Co 3:19	Job 5:13	God and the crafty
1Co 3:20	Ps 94:11	God knows human thoughts
1Co 5:13	Dt 17:7	Purge out evil
1Co 6:16	Ge 2:24	Institution of marriage
1Co 9:9	Dt 25:4	Not muzzling an ox
1Co 10:7	Ex 32:6	Sin of idolatry
1Co 10:26	Ps 24:1	The earth is the Lord's
1Co 14:21	Isa 28:11–12	Through strange tongues
1Co 15:27	Ps 8:6	Everything subject to Christ
1Co 15:32	Isa 22:13	Tomorrow we die
1Co 15:45	Ge 2:7	Creation of Adam
1Co 15:54	Isa 25:8	Death is swallowed up
1Co 15:55	Hos 13:14	Victory over death

2 Corinthians

INTRODUCTION

1. Historical Background

Probably no part of Paul's life is more difficult to reconstruct accurately than the thirty or so months he spent in and around Ephesus (perhaps from the fall of A.D. 53 to the spring of A.D. 56). It was a stormy period, particularly toward its close. There were many evangelistic opportunities (Ac 19:8–10; 20:20–21, 31; 1Co 16:9) and many healings and conversions (Ac 19:11, 18–20). There was also widespread opposition owing to Paul's conspicuous success (Ac 19:9, 13–16; 1Co 4:9–13; 15:30–32; 2Co 4:8–9; 6:4–5, 8–10). Whether or not the Demetrius riot (Ac 19:23–41) actually precipitated his withdrawal from Ephesus, it must have climaxed the hostility directed against him by the devotees of Artemis, not to speak of the Jewish opposition he encountered in the city (Ac 20:19).

A chronological list of the events that took place between the writing of 1 and 2 Corinthians will be helpful, though no such reconstruction of events commands universal agreement.

1. After they received 1 Corinthians, the Christians at Corinth probably rectified most of the practical abuses for which Paul had censured them in his letter. For example, he says nothing further in 2 Corinthians about abuse of the Lord's Supper (1Co 11:11–34) or about litigation among Christians (1Co 6:1–8).

2. In spite of this and because of the arrival of Judaizing intruders from Palestine (2Co 11:4, 22), conditions in the church at Corinth deteriorated, necessitating Paul's "painful visit" (see 2Co 2:1; 12:14, 21; 13:1–2; see sec. 5, below).

3. At some time after this visit, Paul (or his representative) was openly insulted at Corinth by a spokesman of the anti-Pauline clique (2Cor2:5–8, 10; 7:12).

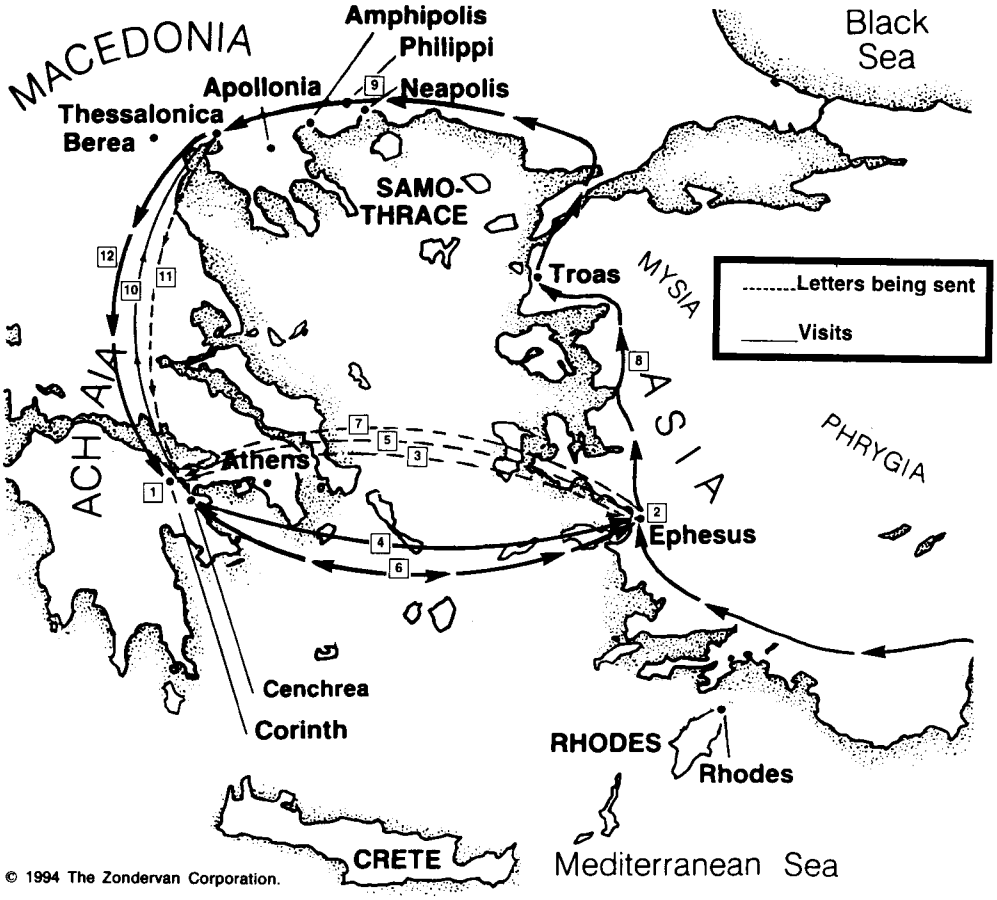
4. Titus was sent from Ephesus to Corinth with the "severe letter," in which Paul called for the punishment of the wrongdoer (2Co 2:3–4, 6, 9; 7:8, 12; see sec. 5, below). In addition, Paul instructed Titus to organize the collection for the saints at Jerusalem (2Co 8:6a), which had gone by default since the Palestinian interlopers had arrived and had begun to derive their support from the church (cf. 2 Cor 11:7–12, 20; 12:14). Titus was to meet Paul in Troas, or, failing that, in Macedonia (perhaps Philippi; 2Co 2:12–13; 7:5–6).

5. Paul left Ephesus shortly after the Demetrius riot (Ac 19:23–20:1), began evangelism in Troas (2Co 2:12–13), and then suffered his "affliction in Asia" (2Co 1:8–11).

6. Paul traveled to Macedonia (2Co 2:13; 7:5) and engaged in pastoral activity (Ac 20:1–2) while organizing the collection in the Macedonian churches (2Co 8:1–4; 9:2; see sec. 5, below).

7. Titus arrived in Macedonia with his welcome report of the Corinthians' responsiveness to the "severe letter" (2Co 7:5–16).

8. Paul wrote 2 Corinthians 1–9 during further pastoral work in Macedonia and pioneer evangelism along the Egnatian Road and probably in Illyricum (see comments on Ro 15:19–21).



9. On returning to Macedonia and hearing of fresh problems at Corinth, Paul wrote 2Co 10–13 and sent the whole letter to Corinth.

10. Paul spent three months in Greece (primarily Corinth) (Ac 20:2–3), during which time he wrote Romans.

2. Unity

Many scholars have questioned whether 2 Corinthians is a single composition because of four problem areas in the letter as it presently stands: 2:14–7:4; 6:14–7:1; chs. 8–9; and chs. 10–13. The last section has generated the most debate and the largest number of theories (see discussion of this issue in EBC 10:304–6). Suffice it to say that this commentary adopts the position of the unity of 2 Corinthians, though we do sympathize with

PAUL'S INTERACTION WITH CORINTH

© 1994 The Zondervan Corporation.

1. A.D. 50–52: Paul establishes the church at Corinth (Acts 18:1-18).
2. 53–56: Paul establishes the church at Ephesus (Acts 19:1-22).
3. 54: Paul hears about immorality at Corinth and writes a brief letter (see 1Co 5:9).
4. 54: People from Chloe's household (1Co 1:11) and later Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (1Co 16:17) visit Paul in Ephesus; one of these groups brings a letter (1Co 7:1).
5. 55: Paul writes 1 Corinthians and sends it to Corinth — perhaps with Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus.
6. 55: Paul hears about further problems in Corinth and pays a brief, painful visit to the church (2Co 2:1; cf. 12:14; 13:2).
7. 55: Paul sends off a third letter to Corinth, called the "severe letter" (2Co 2:3-4, 9; 7:8, 12). He sends it with Titus, who is also told to organize the collection in Corinth (2Co 8:6).
8. 56: Paul leaves Ephesus and has opportunity to evangelize Troas, but he does not do so (2Co 2:12-13).
9. 56: Paul crosses over into Macedonia and begins evangelistic work there (Acts 20:1-2; 2Co 2:13; 7:5).
10. 56: Titus meets Paul in Macedonia (Thessalonica or Philippi?) and reports on his successful stay in Corinth (2Co 7:6-16).
11. 56: Paul writes 2 Corinthians 1-9, and after hearing of further problems, also writes chapters 10-13; he sends the whole letter to Corinth, with Titus (2Co 8:16-24).
12. 56: Paul arrives in Corinth and spends the winter there (Acts 20:3).

those who hold that 2Co 10–13 is a later letter than 2Co 1–9.

3. Authorship and Date

Unlike some other Pauline Epistles, 2 Corinthians has rarely been called into question with regard to its authenticity. The author twice identifies himself as Paul (1:1; 10:1). Certainly no one imitating Paul's style would portray the apostle as in danger of losing his authority at Corinth or struggling to preserve the Corinthians from apostasy. Already early in the second century Polycarp quoted this letter (c. A.D. 105), as did Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian at a later time. Marcion (c. A.D. 140) considered it a Pauline letter, and it is included in the Muratorian canon (late second century A.D.).

The dates of 1 and 2 Corinthians are linked together. Paul wrote 1 Corinthians in the spring (cf. reference to "Pentecost" in 1Co 16:8), probably in A.D. 55. Second Corinthians was written from Macedonia, probably in the fall (see 7:5; 8:1; 9:2–4), shortly before Paul spent three winter months in Corinth (Ac 20:3). While these two letters could have been written in the same year (i.e., six months apart), it seems more likely that eighteen months intervened between them. Adequate time must be allowed for Paul to engage in pioneer evangelism all the way into Illyricum (cf. Ro 15:19), a campaign that must have occurred between his Ephesian residence (Ac 19) and his arrival in Greece (Ac 20:2). It is difficult to fit into a six-month period all the travel between Ephesus and Corinth and all the events at Corinth that took place between the writing of 1 and 2 Corinthians (see sec. 1 above).

In our opinion, therefore, 1 Corinthians was written in the spring of A.D. 55, while the sending of 2 Corinthians may be placed in the fall of A.D. 56. If 2Co 10–13 is a separate letter after 2Co 1–9, these last four chapters also date from the fall of A.D. 56, while the first nine chapters may have been sent at any time between the fall of A.D. 55 and early fall A.D. 56.

4. Occasion and Purpose

The outline of events given above suggests that the immediate circumstances prompting Paul to send 2 Corinthians were twofold: (1) the arrival of his pastoral assistant Titus, who brought welcome news of the favorable response of the majority of the Corinthians to the "severe letter" (see 7:6–16), and (2) the arrival of fresh, disturbing news concerning Corinth. An interval between the arrival of Titus and the sending of 2 Corinthians seems indicated by 7:8. Paul had several overriding purposes in writing. He wished (1) to express his great relief and delight at the Corinthians' positive response to his "severe letter" that had been delivered and reinforced by Titus (2:6, 9, 12–14; 7:5–16); (2) to exhort the Corinthians to complete their promised collection for the saints at Jerusalem before his next visit (8:6–7, 10–11; 9:3–5); (3) to prepare them for that forthcoming visit by having them engage in self-examination and self-judgment (12:14; 13:1, 5, 11)—so that they could discover the proper criteria for distinguishing between rival apostles (chs. 10–13), and so that Paul could be spared the pain of having to exercise discipline (10:2, 5–6, 11; 11:3; 12:19–21; 13:10).

Was 2 Corinthians successful where 1 Corinthians had been only partially so? Apparently it was, because Paul made the promised visit (Ac 20:2–3) and during this three-month stay in "Greece" (primarily Corinth, in the winter of A.D. 56–57) he wrote his letter to the Romans, which gives no hint of trouble at Corinth. Also Ro 15:26 shows that the Corinthians did complete their collection for their fellow believers at Jerusalem.

5. Special Problems

a. The "painful (or intermediate) visit"

In spite of Luke's silence in Acts, there are several passages in 2 Corinthians showing that Paul had visited Corinth twice before his final visit, the second one being "painful" (GK 1877 & 3383). (1) Paul is planning his third visit to Corinth (12:14; 13:1–2). (2) In 2:1 and 12:21, Paul specifies that one of the two earlier visits was painful. This can hardly have been his first visit to Corinth when he founded the church, in spite of the opposition he encountered at that time (Ac 18:6, 9–10, 12–17). Since 1 Corinthians gives no hint about a second, difficult visit, this visit likely took place after 1 Corinthians and before the "severe letter," because in writing 2 Corinthians Paul is dependent on Titus for his information about the outcome of the "severe letter"; he had not himself visited the church after the sending of the "severe letter."

At some stage after the Corinthian believers received 1 Corinthians, therefore, conditions within the church deteriorated. Possibly a cleavage developed over the implementing of Paul's injunction of 1Co 5:2, 5, 13 about the incestuous man. Perhaps an ultra-loyal group of Paulinists (cf. 1Co 1:12; 2Co 2:6–7) confronted the influential anti-Pauline clique of Judaizing intruders from Palestine and their Corinthian adherents in a bid for control of the uncommitted and vacillating majority. In any case, Paul received adverse news, perhaps from Timothy, that induced him to hurry to Corinth to reinforce the effect of 1 Corinthians and prevent any further undermining of his authority at Corinth.

Little is known about what happened during this visit. Certainly Paul would have explained the reasons for the change in his travel plans (see the comments on 1:15–17), for the Corinthians were expecting him to arrive from Macedonia (cf. 1Co 16:5–6), not from Ephesus. Apparently he rebuked those guilty of immorality ("those who sinned earlier," 2Co 12:21; 13:2), but refrained from exercising summary discipline, choosing rather to issue a warning: "If I come again, I will not spare you" (cf. 13:2). Also he seems to have been humiliated by the Corinthians' failure to champion his cause against the false apostles (cf. 12:21).

As a sequel to this brief visit, Paul or his representative was personally insulted by some individual at Corinth in an open act of defiance by which all the Corinthians were to some extent pained—if not at the actual time, at least later on (2:5–11; 7:12). So Paul sent Titus to Corinth after considerable persuasion (7:14) as his personal envoy to deliver the "severe letter" (see next section) and to organize the collection (8:6a).

b. The "severe letter"

Clearly the general aim of the "severe letter" was to arouse the church to discipline "the one who did the wrong" (7:12; cf. 2:6, 9). But 2 Corinthians contains four additional statements of Paul's purpose in writing: (1) to spare the Corinthians and himself another painful visit (1:23–2:4); (2) to demonstrate his affection for the Corinthians (2:4); (3) to put to the test the Corinthians' obedience to apostolic authority (2:9); and (4) to make them aware before God of their genuine concern and affection for him as their spiritual father (7:12; cf. 1Co 4:15).

Titus, who took the letter to Corinth, related to Paul its outcome (7:6–16). The Corinthians as a whole had felt concern and remorse over their behavior during the "painful visit." They now longed to see Paul again to assure him of their change of attitude. They had zealously punished the offender whose scandalous action had provoked their indignation. But now some Corinthians were in danger of being merciless in their punishment; so Paul needed to stay their hand and encourage them to forgive the offender who had repented (2:6–8).

When Titus gave his report, Paul's initial reaction was to regret that he had caused such pain, but upon reflection, his opinion had altered: "I do not regret it" (7:8). The infliction of pain, though unavoidable, had proved remedial; in fact, God had inspired their grief and had prevented the letter from causing them any permanent injury (7:9–11a).

While some scholars identify this severe letter with 1 Corinthians and many with 2Co 10–13, neither of these seems to fit the description given by Paul in ch. 7. Consequently, it seems most likely that this letter has been lost. It was an intensely personal letter, quite brief, and addressed to a specific unedifying situation, so that its nonpreservation is not a matter of surprise.

c. The collection for the poor at Jerusalem

From A.D. 52 to 57 a considerable proportion of Paul's time and energy was devoted to organizing a collection among his Gentile churches for "the poor among the saints in Jerusalem" (Ro 15:26). There is general agreement that Ac 20:4 contains a list of the appointed delegates from certain Gentile churches who were Paul's traveling companions on his final visit to Jerusalem when he was delivering the collection (see comment on Ac 20:4). The offering was intended for the Jewish Christians at Jerusalem, who were going through difficult times. Several factors account for their poverty: (1) After their conversion to Christianity, many Jews in Jerusalem would have been ostracized socially and economically. (2) The community sharing described in Ac 2:44–45 and 4:32, 34–35 undoubtedly would have aggravated their poverty. (3) Persistent food shortages in Palestine because of overpopulation culminated in the famine of A.D. 46 in the time of Emperor Claudius (Ac 11:27–30). (4) As the mother church of Christendom, the Jerusalem church was obliged to support a proportionately large number of teachers and probably to provide hospitality for frequent Christian visitors to the holy city. (5) Jews in Palestine were subject to a twofold taxation the crippled them—Jewish and Roman.

Why did Paul to take up this offering? Several motives can be mentioned here. (1) Most important, it was an expression of brotherly love (Ro 12:13; 13:8; Gal 6:10), a tangible expression of the interdependence of the members of the body of Christ (1Co 12:25–26) that would honor Christ (2Co 8:19) and help effect equality of provision (2Co 8:13–15). (2) It symbolized the unity of Jews and Gentiles in Christ (Eph 2:11–22) and may have been designed to win over those Jewish Christians who were still suspicious of Gentile missions (cf. Ac 11:2–3). (3) It dramatized in material terms the spiritual indebtedness of Gentile believers to the church at Jerusalem (Ro 15:19, 27; cf. 1Co 9:11). (4) It marked the culmination of Paul's ministry in the eastern Mediterranean; he planned to turn westward after visiting Rome (Ro 15:24, 28). (5) It was a visible sign of Paul's fulfillment of a promise (2Co 8:19; Gal 2:10) and perhaps a way of partially compensating for his earlier persecution of the Jerusalem saints (Ac 8:3; 9:1; 26:10–11; 1Co 15:9; Gal 1:13; 1Ti 1:13).

In spite of Paul's misgivings about the potential success of the enterprise (Ro 15:31), the offering was evidently gratefully received on his arrival in Jerusalem (see Ac 21:17).

d. Paul's opponents at Corinth

Regarding the problem of Paul's opponents at Corinth, three basic questions clamor for solution. First, who were they? Everyone acknowledges that Paul's adversaries were Jews (cf. 11:22). But were they Judaizers? If a Judaizer is defined as one who insists on circumcision as a prerequisite for salvation (cf. Ac 15:1), they were not Judaizers, for 2 Corinthians lacks any trace of a dispute over circumcision. But if a Judaizer is a person who tries to impose Jewish practices on Gentiles as conditions either for salvation or for the enjoyment of Christian fellowship, then the opposition to Paul may appropriately be labeled Judaizing. Most likely in their attempt to reproduce Jerusalem in Corinth or to claim Corinth for Jerusalem, they sought to impose on the Corinthians the provisions of the Apostolic Decree, especially its food regulations (Ac 15:20, 29).

Second, what was the relation between Paul's antagonists at Corinth and the church of Jerusalem, particularly the three "pillars" (Gal 2:9) or the Twelve? In our opinion, they were self-appointed agents from Judea who appealed to the authority of the Twelve, especially Peter, in defense of their Judaizing program. (1) That these persons were from Palestine is based on the term "Hebrews" in 11:22 (cf. Php 3:5), which refers to Jews of Palestinian descent. (2) We should draw a distinction between the "super-apostles" of 11:5; 12:11 and the "false apostles" of 11:13. The former expression represents Paul's ironical description of the exalted view of the Twelve held by the "false apostles" who appealed to them, whereas "false apostles" describes the Palestinian intruders who laid claim to apostleship and preached "another gospel" (11:4). (3) We know that some persons from Judea had already invoked the authority of the Twelve without their authorization (Ac 15:24; cf. Gal 2:4). (4) We also know that one clique at Corinth had already set a precedent for appealing to Jerusalem by using the name of Peter (1Co 1:12).

Finally, what message did these Jewish missionaries teach? There can be no doubt that their primary aim was to undermine and destroy Paul's apostolic authority. They were hoping to bring about Paul's downfall, at least in Corinth, and to establish their own credentials as authentic servants of Christ.

Several of their charges against Paul can be inferred from what he writes in this letter. Paul was a double-minded worldling who acted capriciously (1:17–18; 10:2–4) and lorded it over his converts (1:24; 7:2). He carried no letters of commendation (3:1; 10:13–14) because he commended himself (4:2, 5; 5:12; 6:4; 10:12, 18; 12:11; cf. 1Co 9:1–3; 14:18; 15:10b) as would a madman (5:13; 11:1, 16-19; 12:6, 11) or impostor (6:8). Just as his gospel was obscure (4:3; 6:2–3), so also the letters he wrote were unintelligible or devious (1:13), written with the perverse aim of condemning and destroying (7:2–3; 10:8; 13:10) and causing pain (2:2, 4–5; 7:8). He was impressive at a distance but weak and contemptible when he attempted to make a personal appearance (10:1–2, 9–11; 11:6; 13:3–4, 9). His refusal to accept remuneration from the Corinthians proved that he cared little for them and that he was aware of being a counterfeit apostle, not the mouthpiece of Christ (11:5, 7–11, 13; 12:11–15; 13:3a, 6). On the other hand, he was exploiting the willingness of a church to support him by having his agents organize a collection, ostensibly for the saints at Jerusalem but in reality for himself (12:16–18).

Paul's opponents also apparently made claims about themselves, as may be inferred from his reply (4:5). Proof of their genuine apostolicity could be found, they claimed, in their polished eloquence and erudite knowledge (11:6), their visions and revelations (5:13; 12:1, 7), their healing miracles (12:12), their possession of commendatory letters (3:1), their willingness to accept remuneration (11:12; cf. 1Co 9:5–7, 11–12), their pure Palestinian origin (11:22), their being disciples of Jesus (5:16; 10:7), their high estimate of Moses (3:7–16) and Abraham (11:22), and their preaching of the true Gospel of Jesus (11:4). Little wonder that the impressionable Corinthians were swayed by the vaunted self-sufficiency (3:5) of these rival claimants to apostleship.

6. Theological Values

Traditionally, Paul's two letters to Timothy and one to Titus are called "the Pastoral letters." But 2 Corinthians has a strong claim to be recognized as Paul's most important pastoral letter, because it contains "applied" pastoral teachings. Paul, the pastor, has penned a profound, though brief, autobiography. In it we can see beautiful examples of the tenderness of a spiritual shepherd sensitive to the needs of his flock (1:24; 2:6–7; 6:1; 10:2; 13:5, 10) as well as the pleading of a spiritual father jealous of his children's affection, purity, and unity (6:11–13; 11:2–3; 13:11).

This letter also contains the classic discussions of the theology of Christian suffering (1:3–11; 4:7–18; 6:3–10; 12:1–10), the role of a minister of the new covenant (2:14–17; 4:1–5; 5:16–21; 11:28–29; 12:14–15), the relation between the old and new covenants (3:7–18), the theology of death and resurrection (4:7–5:10), and the principles and practice of Christian stewardship (chs. 8–9).

EXPOSITION

I. Paul's Explanation of His Conduct and Apostolic Ministry (1:1–7:16)

A. Introduction (1:1–11)

1. Salutation (1:1–2)

1 In most of his letters, Paul begins by referring to himself as "an apostle" (GK 693) of Christ Jesus. Although he was not one of the twelve chosen by Christ (Mk 3:14–19), he claimed equality with them (see 2Co 11:5; 12:11; Gal 2:6) on the basis of the special revelation of Christ God gave him at the time of his conversion (1Co 9:1; Gal 1:15–16). Like them, he had been commissioned "by the will of God" to be a "chosen instrument" of God (Ac 9 15).

Paul's delight in speaking of a fellow Christian as "our brother" (GK 81) may be traced to Ananias's generous and reassuring use of that term ("Brother Saul," Ac 9:17) at a time when the believers in Damascus had every reason to regard Saul as the archenemy of the church (Ac 9:1–2, 13–14). The mention of Timothy (not Sosthenes, as in 1Co 1:1) as a cosender of the letter may be intended to reinstate this timid young man (1Ti 4:12; 2Ti 1:7; 2:1) in the eyes of the Corinthians, possibly after his failure or limited success as Paul's representative at Corinth (see 1Co 4:17; 16:10–11). Titus had replaced Timothy as Paul's chief envoy to Corinth by the time this letter was written.

Paul refers to the principal addressees not as "the church of Corinth" but as "the church of God in Corinth"—the local representatives of God's universal church. Linked with them are "the saints throughout Achaia," i.e., believers in such places as Athens (cf. Ac 17:34) and Cenchrea (Ro 16:1).

2 This characteristically Pauline salutation combines and elevates the traditional Greek and Hebrew greetings. Chairein (the common Greek greeting) becomes charis ("grace," i.e., God's unsought and unmerited favor; GK 5921)—a word that occurs in every opening greeting of Paul. The word "peace" (GK 1645) reflects the Hebrew shalom (GK 8934)—the peace that comes to humanity from God (cf. Php 4:7) as a result of salvation (Ro 5:1).

2. Gratitude for divine comfort (1:3–7)

The paragraph embodies the chief emphasis of chs. 1–7: "comfort in the midst of affliction."

3–4 Paul generally follows his salutation with thanksgiving for the divine grace evident in the lives of his converts and a summary of his prayers for them. Here, however, he offers praise to God for consoling and encouraging him, while later (v.11) he solicits their prayers for himself. This atypical preoccupation with his own circumstances shows the distressing nature of the experience in Asia from which he had so recently been delivered (vv.8–10). He highlights the aspects of God's character he had come to value in deeper measure as a result of personal need and divine response, namely, God's limitless compassion (cf. Ps 145:9; Mic 7:19) and never-failing comfort (cf. Isa 40:1; 51:3, 12; 66:13).

Paul sees his suffering not merely as personally beneficial, driving him to trust God alone (v.9; 12:7), but also as directly benefiting those he ministered to: "God . . . comforts [GK 4151] us . . . so that we can comfort. . . ." To experience God's help, consolation, and encouragement in the midst of all one's affliction is to become indebted and equipped to communicate the divine comfort to others in any kind of affliction or distress.

5 This verse supplies the reason why suffering equips Christians to mediate God's comfort. Whenever Christ's sufferings were multiplied in Paul's life, God's comfort was also multiplied through the ministry of Christ. The greater the suffering, the greater the comfort and the greater the ability to share with others the divine sympathy. "The sufferings of Christ" (cf. Gal 6:17) cannot refer to the atoning passion of Christ that Paul regarded as a historical fact, a completed event (Ro 5:8–10; 6:10). Rather, they include sufferings that befall the "man in Christ" (12:2) engaged in his service (cf. 4:11–12). They are Christ's sufferings not simply because they are similar to his but because they contribute to the fulfillment of the suffering destined for the body of Christ (Ac 14:22; Col 1:24) or because Christ continues to identify himself with his afflicted church (cf. Ac 9:4–5).

6–7 Verse 6a restates and applies v.4b. Paul's affliction and endurance of his trials ultimately benefited the Corinthians in that he was now equipped to administer divine encouragement to them when they were afflicted and to ensure their preservation when they underwent trials (cf. Eph 3:13; 2Ti 2:10). Paul then makes explicit (v.6b) the divine comfort he received in the midst of affliction. Whether he suffered affliction or received comfort, the advantage remained the same for the Corinthians (cf. 4:8–12, 15). They too would know an inner revitalization, an infusion of divine strength that would enable them to endure patiently the same type of trial that confronted Paul (cf. 1Pe 5:9).

Since Paul realized that to share Christ's sufferings always involved the experience of God's comfort through that suffering, his hope that the Corinthians would be triumphant in their time of trial was securely grounded (v.7).

3. Deliverance from a deadly peril (1:8–11)

8 Paul proceeds to describe the particular hardship in which he received divine comfort and empowering. It overtook Paul "in the province of Asia" (i.e., probably some part of the province other than Ephesus; cf. Ac 19:22), possibly Troas (2:12–13). That it had occurred recently—certainly after 1 Corinthians was written—seems indicated by the vividness of Paul's description of the divine deliverance. While the Corinthians may already have known about Paul's trial, he now informs them of its overwhelming and unique character. He had been through such a devastating hardship that he was forced to renounce all hope of survival.

9 In his estimation Paul had received a death sentence (the word used can refer to an official verdict) from which there was no reprieve. But in the wake of this trying experience there followed a further experience that, by God's intervention, was tantamount to resurrection. All this undermined Paul's self-confidence (see 1Co 15:31; 2Co 12:9–10) and compelled his utter dependence on a God who raises the dead (cf. Ro 4:17) and therefore can rescue the dying from the grip of death (cf. Php 2:27, 30).

10–11 "The Father of compassion" (GK 3880) had delivered Paul from his deadly peril (cf. vv.3–4). But since such perils were likely to recur, continuing divine intervention on his behalf was necessary if death was to be robbed of its prey. Immediately Paul qualifies his bold assertion, "and he will deliver us" (cf. 2Ti 4:18), by adding, "On him we have set our hope that he will continue to deliver us." He could not presume on "the gracious favor" of protection or deliverance from danger and death; this came from "the God of all comfort" (v.3) "in answer to the prayers of many," and it would prompt still further thanksgiving.

Of the various proposed identifications of Paul's affliction in Asia, five deserve mention: (1) his fighting with "wild beasts in Ephesus" (1Co 15:32); (2) his suffering the "thirty-nine stripes" (2Co 11:24); (3) the riot at Ephesus instigated by Demetrius, the silversmith (Ac 19:23–41), or an unsuccessful attempt by the populace, after the Ephesian uproar, to lynch the apostle; (4) a particular persecution encountered in Ephesus or elsewhere (cf. Ac 20:19; 1Co 16:9) shortly before his departure for Troas; and (5) a prostrating attack of a recurrent malady. The last-mentioned view seems favored by (1) the allusion in v.10 to Job 33:30; (2) the fact that a Jew could regard sickness as death and healing as a return to life (cf.Hos 6:1–2); (3) the present tenses of vv.4–6; and (4) the twice-repeated "he will deliver" in v.10.

B. Paul's Conduct Explained (1:12–2:13)

1. Characteristics of his conduct (1:12–14)

12–14 Before defending himself against the specific charges of vacillation and domineering leveled against him by his opponents (1:15–2:4), Paul deals with two more general accusations: that he had acted shamelessly and insincerely in his relations with the Corinthians (cf. v.12a), and that in his letters he had shown worldly shrewdness and had been evasive by writing one thing but meaning another (cf. vv.12b–13a).

These baseless charges Paul answers in the only way possible for him—by appealing to the testimony of his own conscience and the Corinthians' knowledge of his conduct. He thus claims that in both church and world his conduct had been characterized by God-given purity of intention and openness and had been governed by "God's grace" (v.12; GK 5921). Then he asserts that in none of his correspondence—the Corinthians had already received at least three letters from him—did his meaning become apparent only by "reading between the lines." Rather, his meaning lay on the surface and could be understood simply by reading (v.13a). Paul concludes by reminding his converts at Corinth that they had already begun to appreciate his motives and intentions, especially through the recent visit of Titus (see 7:6–16). He expresses the hope that they would reach the full assurance that he could give them as much cause for pride now (cf. 5:12) as they would give him pride "in the day of the Lord Jesus" (cf. 1Co 15:31; Php 4:1: 1Th 2:19–20).

2. Charge of fickleness answered (1:15–22)

15–17 In 1Co 16:3–8 and in these three verses are found the outlines of two different itineraries relating to Paul and Corinth. Plan A had been: Ephesus-Macedonia-Corinth-Jerusalem (possibly). But now in 2Co 1 we find Plan B: Ephesus-Corinth-Macedonia-Corinth-Judea (now definitely). If, as is probable, Plan A discloses Paul's original intention, Plan B, made after the writing of 1 Corinthians, introduces two modifications of that previous itinerary: Paul now planned to visit Corinth twice—before and after his activity in Macedonia—and he definitely intended to travel to Judea with the collection.

But not only did Paul have to explain these changes. His actual itinerary (see the introduction) seems to have been: Ephesus-Corinth (i.e., the "painful visit")-Ephesus-Troas (2:12–13)-Macedonia (7:5)—the place of writing. In other words, neither Plan A nor Plan B was carried out as intended. It may be said that after the "painful visit" Paul reverted to Plan A (see Ac 20:1–3, 16). In other words, to Plan A Paul seems to have said, "Yes-No-Yes"; to Plan B, "Yes-No." He had apparently provided his opponents with a convenient handle for a charge of fickleness!

His detractors were shrewd enough to convert the charge into one of capricious vacillation. His arbitrary changing of travel plans, they urged, was motivated purely by self-interest, with no concern for broken promises or for needs at Corinth. He made his plans on mere impulse like a worldly man, according to the mood of the moment, so that he could say, "Yes, yes" one day and "No, no" the next day, with the result that he seemed to be saying both "Yes" and "No" in the same breath.

18 Paul is so distressed by this charge and so convinced of his innocence that he solemnly invokes the unquestionable trustworthiness of God (1Co 1:9; cf. 11:10) as guaranteeing and testifying to the consistency of his message to the Corinthians. Neither in proclaiming the good news to them nor in telling them of his travel plans was his language a blending of "Yes" and "No." How could the messenger of a faithful God vacillate between a reassuring "Yes" and a disconcerting "No" or deliver a message that was not an emphatic "Yes"?

19–20 Paul now elaborates this last point. The message originally proclaimed at Corinth (Ac 18:5) by the threefold testimony (cf. 13:1; Dt 19:15) of Paul, Silas, and Timothy centered in none other than God's Son, in whom inconsistency and indecision have no place. So Paul contrasts the humanity of the messengers and the divinity of the Person who was the essence of their message. Indeed, in and through him the divine "Yes" has come into effect as a permanent reality (v.19), because all God's promises (cf. 7:1; Ro 9:4; 15:8), whatever their number, find their fulfillment in him (v.20a). "They are 'Yes' in Christ," since he forms the climax and summation of the divine self-revelation. That is why, in their corporate worship offered to God through Christ, Christians joyfully utter the "Yes" or "Amen" of agreement (cf. Rev 1:7; 3:14; 22:20). Such a response enhances God's glory (v.20b).

The Corinthians' "Amen" (GK 297) to the Gospel declaration itself validated the apostolic preaching (cf. 1Co 1:6; 2Co 3:2–3; 13:5–6). With his consistency confirmed here, was it likely that Paul would act in a worldly manner in relatively trivial affairs? How could they distrust the apostle who himself had taught them to affirm the trustworthiness of God by repeating the "Amen"?

21–22 Paul's final defense of himself against the charge of indecision (v.17a) points to the constant activity of God in producing stability in Paul and in the Corinthians—in those who have been brought into intimate and dynamic relation with Christ, God's secure and permanent "Yes." Each of the four verbs in these two verses has God as its subject. The first ("makes . . . stand firm"; GK 1011) is a legal term denoting a seller's guaranteeing of the validity of a purchase; God continually strengthens believers in their faith in Christ and progressively enriches their knowledge of Christ. The other three ("anointed," GK 5987; "set his seal of ownership," GK 5381; and "put [GK 1433] his Spirit") indicate what took place at the time of their conversion and baptism. God commissioned believers for his service by consecrating them as his "anointed ones" and imparting those gifts necessary for their task. God "set his seal of ownership on us" by putting "his Spirit in our hearts as a deposit, guaranteeing what is to come." Believers are "branded" as God's property, the reality of their faith is attested, and their status is guaranteed "for the day of redemption" (Eph 4:30).

3. A cancelled painful visit (1:23–2:4)

Allied to the charge that Paul had arbitrarily altered his travel plans regarding Corinth according to the mood of the moment, there was in all probability the accusation that by doing so he had shown himself to be a spiritual dictator who tried to dominate his converts and did not hesitate to cause them pain.

1:23–2:1 In answering this charge, Paul solemnly invokes his faithful God (cf. 1:18) as his own witness to the truth of statements like these: "The reason I postponed my intended visit to Corinth was to spare you a second painful visit (1:23b; 2:1). So far from being unstable in my desires, I have the settled purpose of promoting your highest good and joy (1:24) and of saving you unnecessary pain or sorrow." That is, Paul wanted to spare the Corinthians and himself further pain by not returning to Corinth from Ephesus after the so-called "painful visit." "I made up my mind" (2:1) refers to a decision Paul made at Ephesus after hearing of the insult hurled at him or one of his deputies at Corinth by "the one who did wrong" of 7:1 (see comment on 2:5–8). He resolved to pay the Corinthians a visit by this letter (2:3–4; 7:8, 12) rather than by another personal visit that might have proved mutually painful.

For Paul to speak of "sparing" (GK 5767) the Corinthians (v.23) implied that he might have punished them. He therefore proceeds in 1:24, which is parenthetical, to reject the inference—probably also an actual Corinthian charge—that he was some tyrannical overlord, seeking to intimidate and domineer in matters of faith and conduct. An apostle was obligated to serve his converts, not dominate them. It was his privilege to work with them to secure their "joy in the faith" (Php 1:25), not to lord it over them by causing them unnecessary pain.

2 Paul acknowledges that his decision not to revisit Corinth had been partially determined by his awareness that to inflict needless pain on the Corinthians at that time would have effectively dried up the only source of his own happiness. His joy was intimately connected with theirs (1:24). To cause them pain meant he would experience pain himself, a pain that could be relieved and then converted into gladness only by their repentance (see 7:8–10).

3–4 In place of a second painful visit to Corinth, Paul wrote the Corinthians a letter that has come to be known as the "severe letter" (see the introduction). By this letter he wanted to avoid being pained by them when he finally did pay another personal visit (v.3a). It was incongruous to Paul that his converts, who ought to have been a constant source of joy to him (1Th 2:19–20), should cause such distress to their spiritual father. Yet in writing that letter, he had had the buoyant assurance that whatever made him glad would give all of them pleasure too, for they were all one in joy, as in sorrow (v.3b).

In v.4a Paul describes the origin and circumstances of this sorrowful letter. It was born "out of great distress and anguish" and had been produced "with many tears." Since such expressions can hardly be true of 1 Corinthians as a whole, this letter (cf. also 7:8, 12) must be identified with a letter no longer extant, sent to Corinth after 1 Corinthians and after his "painful visit" (see the introduction). A second purpose (cf. vv.3, 9; 7:12) behind this letter is stated in v.4b. Although it actually proved painful to its recipients (7:8), its aim was not vindictive or even vindicative. On the contrary, it sought to convince the Corinthians of the intensity of Paul's affectionate concern for them.

4. Forgiveness for the offender (2:5–11)

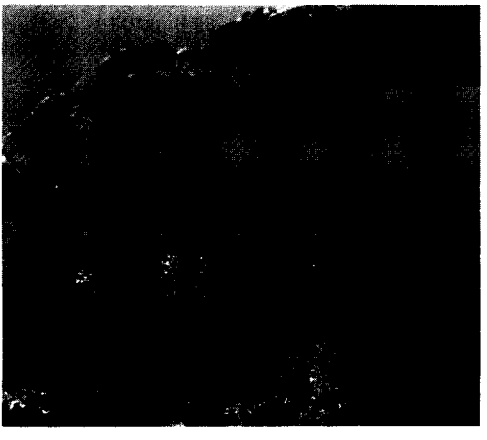
In 1:23–2:4, Paul has spoken about feeling pain, causing pain, and avoiding further pain. All three aspects recur in this paragraph with reference to a certain wrongdoer at Corinth. Particularly apparent here is Paul's sensitivity as a pastor: He avoids naming the culprit (vv.5–8); he recognizes that Christian discipline is not simply retributive but also remedial (vv.6–7); he understands the feelings and psychological needs of the penitent wrongdoer (vv.6–8); he appeals to his own conduct as an example for the Corinthians to follow (v.10); and he is aware of the divisive operation of Satan within the Christian community (v.11).

5–6 The man referred to in these verses is almost certainly not the man guilty of incest (1Co 5; see comment on vv.10–11). Rather, after Paul's painful visit some powerful insult had been directed against him or one of his representatives by a visitor to Corinth or by a Corinthian, who perhaps headed the opposition against Paul at Corinth and objected in particular to his disciplinary methods. The apostle here discounts the sorrow caused him by the unfortunate episode.

On the basis of Titus's report about the Corinthian reaction to the severe letter (see 7:7–11), Paul counsels the church to terminate the discipline they had inflicted on the man in question. Whether a formal gathering of the church had been held and specific disciplinary measures had been decided on is impossible to say. The words rendered "the majority" (GK 4498) may simply mean "the main body," referring generally to the membership. But what was the view of the implied minority? In light of v.7a, it seems likely that they were a pro-Pauline clique, the "ultra-Paulinists," who regarded the penalty as insufficient.

7–9 Instead of continuing or increasing the punishment, the Corinthians ought to rescue the man from inordinate grief and complete his reformation by forgiving and encouraging him and by publicly reaffirming their love for him. This would serve to assure the wrongdoer that God had, in fact, forgiven him (cf. "binding" and "loosing" in Mt 16:19; 18:18; Jn 20:23). Such a positive Corinthian response to this plea would afford Paul further evidence of the church's willingness to acknowledge his divinely given authority. By reproving the offender after hearing the "severe letter," they had already stood the test and proved their loyalty to the apostle in all respects (cf. 7:11–12). Now by ending the punishment, they would be doing the same.

10–11 Paul here aligns himself with the Corinthian decision to forgive the person in question—a decision he trusts they will make after receiving the present letter. But he hastens to add that he has already forgiven the man—if, in fact, there was anything to forgive. Clearly it was Paul, not the Corinthians, who had taken the initiative in this matter of forgiveness.



Verse 10 affords perhaps the clearest evidence that the offense was basically a personal act of effrontery against Paul rather than some act of immorality in the church. There was need for Paul's personal forgiveness, although, in deference to the penitent offender's feelings, he discounts the personal pain he himself experienced (v.5) and deliberately understates the seriousness of the offense (v.10) lest anyone imagine that he considered himself virtuous in granting forgiveness so readily.

The circumstances and purpose of Paul's forgiveness are then defined. First, forgiveness was granted "in the sight of Christ," i.e., as Christ looked on as a witness and approved—the One who taught that willingness to forgive one's brother was a precondition for receiving divine forgiveness (Mt 5:12, 14–15; 18:23–35; cf. Eph 4:32; Col 3:13). Moreover, forgiveness was granted for the welfare of the Corinthians ("for your sake"), i.e., to preserve their unity and to relieve them of their patent embarrassment at not having acted against the offender before Paul wrote to them. Verse 11 states an additional but related purpose: to avoid being outwitted by the master strategist, Satan, who hoped to create discord within the church at Corinth, either between the church at large and a dissident minority or between the repentant wrongdoer and his fellow Christians. To withhold forgiveness when the man was repentant was to play into Satan's hands, who already had gained one advantage when the man sinned. There is a point at which punishment can become purely vindictive (cf. v.6) and suffering a penalty can drive one to despair (v.7; Col 3:21). While Christian discipline does include punishment administered in love, it is not simply retributive or punitive; it is also remedial or reformatory (cf. 1Co 5:5; 11:32; 2Co 7 9–10; 13:10). It aims at reinstatement after repentance, through forgiveness and reconciliation.

5. Restlessness at Troas (2:12–13)

12–13 This is the final section in Paul's explanation of his recent conduct (see the introduction for more on the historical events). Titus had been dispatched to Corinth with the "letter of tears" while Paul continued work in and around Ephesus (cf. Ac 19:22b). His departure for Troas, mentioned here, was probably precipitated by the Demetrius riot (Ac 19:23–41). Evidently Paul had already planned to leave the city, for when he sent Titus to Corinth, he had arranged to meet him at Troas, or, failing that, probably at Philippi.

We may safely assume that Paul actually preached in Troas, though v.12 speaks only of his intent. He would recognize an open "door" of opportunity (note Ac 16:6–10) only after grasping the evangelistic opportunities initially afforded by the Lord. But evangelism was curtailed because of Paul's restless spirit (perhaps seen as a device used by Satan, cf. v.11). This disquiet (7:5–6) was caused by several factors: (1) the disheartening opposition at Ephesus, forcing his premature departure; (2) persistent uncertainty and fears concerning the situation at Corinth (7:5b); (3) Titus's nonarrival; and (4) concern for the safety of Titus in travel (note 7:6b–7a), particularly if he was carrying the completed Corinthian collection.

The city of Troas, the ruins of which are seen here, played a significant role in the life of the apostle Paul. On his second missionary journey he received a vision here of a man from Macedonia, beckoning him to evangelize their area (Ac 16:8–10). Now on his third journey, he once again landed in Troas, though he only stayed a short while.

C. Major Digression—The Apostolic Ministry Described (2:14–7:4)

1. The grandeur and superiority of the apostolic ministry(2:14–4:6)

a. The privilege of apostolic service (2:14–17)

14 Here begins the so-called "great digression," brought about by Paul's remembering his happy reunion with Titus in Macedonia, who brought encouraging news from Corinth that relieved his fretful tension (7:5–16). In the favorable Corinthian reaction to the "letter of tears" as reported by Titus, Paul saw God's vindication of his apostleship and a triumph of God's grace in the hearts of the Corinthians.

Paul likens the irresistible advance of the Gospel, in spite of temporary frustration, to a Roman "triumph" (GK 2581), in which a victorious general, along with his proud soldiers, led in triumphal procession the wretched prisoners of war who were exposed to public ridicule. Not all the details of this picture can be pressed. The apostles, as well as Christians in general, may be either exultant soldiers who share in the benefits of Christ's victory (cf. Ro 8:37) or willing captives who count it a privilege to be part of God's "triumph" (cf. Ro 1:1; Col 1:10). The metaphor is certainly suggestive: Christ undertook a battle not rightly his; we share in a triumph not rightly ours. The reference to the diffusion of fragrance may be carrying on the imagery, for sacrifices were offered when the procession reached the temple of Jupiter and perfumes may have been sprinkled or incense burned along the processional route. Through the apostles, God was spreading far and wide the fragrant knowledge of himself that can be gained through knowing Christ (Col 2:2–3).

15–16a As faithful preachers and followers of Christ, the apostles themselves formed a sweet "aroma" (GK 2380) of Christ rising up to God as a pleasing "fragrance" (GK 4011; cf. Lev 1:9, 13, 17; Nu 15:7). To the extent that they diffused the fragrance of Christ, they were that fragrance or aroma. Irrespective of the human response to the Gospel, its proclamation delights God's heart, because it centers on the Son whom he loves.

Behind Paul's thought in both these verses may be the rabbinic concept of the Law as simultaneously life-giving and death-dealing. Just as the Torah had a beneficial effect on those who received and obeyed it and a lethal effect on those who rejected it, so the proclaimers of Christ are at the same time a "life-giving perfume" to those who believe the Gospel and so are being saved, and a "death-dealing drug" to those who repudiate it and so are perishing (cf. 1Co 1:18, 23–24).

16b–17 To Paul's urgent question "Who is equal to such a task [of preaching the Gospel of Christ or being the aroma of Christ]?" the answer may be either, "We apostles are, for we are not peddlers of an adulterated message," or "No one is, if a person depends on his or her own resources." The latter reply is supported by 3:4–6; the former by 3:1.

By the phrase "unlike so many," Paul may be referring to the numerous wandering teachers and philosophers of the first century (see comment on 11:8) who expected payment for what they claimed was "the word of God," or, more likely, to the group of Judaizing opponents at Corinth who converted preaching into a means of personal gain. In contrast, Paul appeals to the sincerity of his motives and the purity of the message as shown by his divine commission ("like men sent from God"; cf. Gal 1:1, 12, 15–16), his sense of divine dependence and responsibility ("we speak before God"), and his divine authority and power ("in Christ"). The principle is clear: As those who dispense the life-giving remedy for sin, preachers must avoid diluting or adulterating the medicine of life, the word of God.

b. The results of the ministry (3:1–3)

1 Behind each of the two questions in this verse, both of which expect the answer "no," stands an actual or expected charge against Paul. Since he had just spoken of the distinctive role of apostles (2:14–16) and of his own divine commission and authority (2:17; cf. 1:12; 1Co 4:15–16; 11:1; 14:18; 15:10), some of the Corinthians might say, "Paul, once again you are indulging in your notorious habit of self-commendation." Furthermore, some of "the many" who were profiting from preaching (2:17) had undoubtedly been making a charge like this: "Since Jerusalem is the starting point of Christianity, anyone working outside that city must be able to give proof of his apostolic commission by letters of recommendation from the believers there. We brought you Corinthians such commendatory letters, and you yourselves have supplied us with such when we have visited other places. Why should you regard Paul as an exception? Does not his unconcern about letters of recommendation prove he is an intruder and impostor?"

Paul is not here disparaging the use of letters "of recommendation" (GK 5364). He himself had sought epistolary credentials from the high priest at Jerusalem before setting out for the synagogues of Damascus (Ac 9:2; 22:5), and their use within the Christian world was established (see Ac 15:22, 25–27; 18:27). Paul himself wrote what amounted to commendatory letters (Ro 16:1–2; 1Co 16:3, 10–11; 2Co 8:16–24).

His opponents apparently carried letters as their credentials, probably not from the three Jerusalem "pillars" (Gal 2:9) or the Twelve, but from the Pharisaic wing of the Jerusalem church, who regarded the scrupulous observance of the Mosaic law as essential for salvation (Ac 15:5) and were unable to distinguish between the law-abiding conduct of the Twelve and legalistic teaching.

2–3 The latter of the two questions posed in v.1 Paul now answers explicitly. He insists that for him to carry commendatory letters to Corinth would be completely superfluous. The most complimentary letter he could possibly possess had already been written (cf. 1Co 9:2). Their very lives as men and women "in Christ," the result of the grace of Christ operative in his apostolic ministry, were an eloquent letter that all could read. To bring another letter would amount to a personal insult to the Corinthians.

The letter imagery is further developed and explained. This letter was not a human document recorded in ink on papyrus. Nor was it a divine composition, such as the Decalogue, engraved on inanimate tablets of stone (Ex 31:18; 32:15–16). Rather, the letter was authored by Christ, was "written by the Spirit of the living God," and was indelibly inscribed on living tablets, sensitive human hearts (Jer 31:33; 32:38; Eze 11:19; 36:26). Proof of Paul's genuineness was to be found not in written characters but in human characters.

So Paul delivers a powerful rebuttal to his opponents. His commendatory letter had been written before theirs; it was indelible; it was widely circulated, not confidential or unpublished; and its author was Christ, not a partisan group within the Jerusalem church.

c. Competence for service (3:4–6)

4–5 Paul's confidence before God in claiming that the Corinthians were a letter written by Christ that validated his apostolic credentials came through Christ (v.1). It was not the product of a pious wish or imagination. Still speaking of this confidence before God, he disowns any ability to form a competent judgment on the results of his own ministry or any personal right to lay claim to the results of what was in reality God's work. Paul's confidence came through Christ and his competence came from God.

6 Paul realized that being divinely commissioned required being divinely equipped. His equipment to be a minister of a new covenant was given at his Damascus call when he was named a "chosen instrument" of God and filled with his Spirit (Ac 9:15, 17–19). There follows a contrast between two basic characteristics of the old and new covenants. The basis of the old covenant between the Lord and Israel was a lifeless, written code, "the book of the covenant" (Ex 24:7). The basis of the new covenant between God and the church is a dynamic, pervasive Spirit. The written code (or "letter"; GK 1207) pronounced a sentence of death (see Ro 7:9–11; Gal 3:10), but the Spirit brings a transformation of life (Ro 7:6; 8:3). Though the new covenant was ratified by the shedding of Christ's blood (Heb 13:20) and is symbolized in the communion cup (Lk 22:20; 1Co 11:25), it becomes operative only through the indwelling Spirit who imparts new life. Where "the letter" was powerless, the Spirit is powerful in producing holiness of life, enabling a person fully to meet the righteous requirements of the law (Ro 8:4). This is what makes the new covenant "new" (GK 2785) and the old covenant (3:14) "old" (see Heb 8:6–13).

d. The surpassing glory of the new covenant (3:7–11)

Thus far in this chapter, Paul has progressed from the idea of commendatory letters written on human hearts by the Spirit to his reflection on the new covenant promised by God through Jeremiah, under which the law would be written on human hearts (Jer 31:31–34). This now prompts him to compare the old and new economies. Each involved a distinctive ministry that was accompanied by "glory" (GK 1518), but so superior was the glory of the new covenant that the glory of the old covenant faded into insignificance.

7–9 In the remainder of the chapter Paul provides a commentary on selected points of the narrative in Ex 34:29–35. When Moses descended from Mount Sinai with the two tablets on which were written the Ten Commandments, his face shone so brightly that "the Israelites could not look steadily" at him. Well then, argues Paul, if such glory attended the giving of the law under the administration that brought death and condemns people, how much more glorious will be the ministry of the Spirit that brings righteousness! What was a distinctive and positive feature of the old order must also characterize the new economy, but in greater measure. The new covenant has surpassing glory inasmuch as it is a more adequate revelation of God's character.

10–11 The comparison in glory between the covenants advances one step further. So pronounced is the contrast between the two dispensations that what once was rightly considered resplendent now appears scarcely resplendent at all (v.10). The greater light obscures the lesser light, just as the sun obscures the moon. The old covenant belonged in fact to a vanishing order, which began to fade immediately after its inception—the glory on Moses' face began to fade as soon as he left the divine presence. On the other hand, a covenant destined to be permanent (cf. Heb 13:20) must be invested with a far greater glory.

e. Veiling and unveiling (3:12–18)

12–13 As participants in the new covenant, Paul and his fellow apostles and fellow preachers had the certain hope that it was a permanent, irrevocable covenant, never to be superseded and never to be surpassed in splendor. This accounted for their boldness and confidence in preaching. They had nothing to conceal but every reason for fearless candor (v.12).

This idea of openness prompts Paul to continue his commentary on Ex 34:29–35. This OT passage suggested to him that after each encounter between Moses and the Lord in the tent of meeting, when Moses returned to the people of Israel to tell them what he had been commanded, they were dazzled by the radiance of his face and he put on his "veil" (GK 2820). Only in the tabernacle did he keep the veil on. Although the OT does not explicitly state that the radiance on the face of Moses gradually faded and then disappeared, Paul suggests that the reason for Moses' veiling was not so much to prevent the Israelites from being dazzled by its brightness (cf. Ex 34:30–31) as it was to prevent them from continuing to gaze in amazement until his face totally lost the brilliance of the reflected glory (cf. v.7). He was attempting to teach them, Paul implies, that the newly established order was destined to be eclipsed and pass away.

Alternatively, the purpose of Moses' veiling may have been to deny the Israelites the privilege of looking right on to the end of the fading glory. It was an acted parable condemning them, emphasizing that their sins had made them unable and unworthy to behold even temporary glory without interruption. Others suggest that Moses wished to avoid the personal embarrassment of having the people realize that the splendor of his face was fading.

14–15 Moses' laudable attempt was, however, unsuccessful; instead of recognizing the significance of Moses' veiled face, the Israelites became dulled in their powers of perception. Paul finds evidence of this spiritual insensitivity in the fact that down to his own day, when the old covenant (or the OT) was read in the synagogue, the ability of the Jews to recognize the impermanence of the Mosaic order was impaired. A "veil" (GK 2820) covers their hearts comparable to the veil that covered Moses' face. Paul could call it the "same" veil because in both cases a veil prevented vision, or because it was identical to the veil of ignorance about the transitory nature of the Mosaic economy. To Paul, this veil remained unlifted in the case of unbelieving Jews, because only as they came to Christ was the veil set aside.

16 The verse restates and amplifies v.11, that only in Christ is the veil set aside. Whenever a person turns to the Lord and finds in him the end or fulfillment of the law (Ro 10:4), the Lord completely removes the veil from that person's heart. No longer is one's spiritual perception impaired. Such people recognize that the dispensation of grace has superseded the dispensation of the law (cf. Jn 1:17). They are a "new creation" in Christ (5:17).

17 This verse explains v.16. There are three possible interpretations. (1) "The Lord" (Yahweh; GK 3378) mentioned in Ex 34:34, to whom the Jew must now turn for the removal of the veil, is none other than the life-giving Spirit of the living God (cf. vv.3, 6, 8). Thus Paul is describing the Spirit here, not Christ, and he is describing his function, not his identity. (2) Another view finds a functional equivalence between Christ (identified as "the Lord") and the Spirit: in v.14 it is Christ who removes the veil; in v.16 it is the Spirit. (3) Again, some believe Christ is being identified as "the life-giving Spirit," as in 1Co 15:45.

Paul's point in v.17b is that the Spirit's presence brings liberation, not bondage (Ro 8:15). Not only does he remove the veil; he also sets a person free from bondage to sin, to death, and to the law as a means of acquiring righteousness.

18 In vv.4–6 Paul was speaking primarily of his apostolic ministry. Now, as he draws his conclusion concerning the superiority of the new covenant against the background of his commentary on Ex 34, he refers to Christian experience in general. Under the new covenant, not just one person, but all Christians behold and then reflect the glory of the Lord. Moreover, unlike the Jews, who still read the law with veiled hearts, Christians, with unveiled faces, behold in the mirror of the Gospel the glory of the Lord, who is Christ. Again, the glory is displayed not outwardly on the face but inwardly in the character. Finally, so far from losing its intensity or luster, as did Moses' glory, the glory experienced under the new covenant progressively increases until the Christian finally acquires a "glorious body" like that of the risen Christ (Php 3:21).

Paul concludes by noting that the progressive transformation of the Christian's character is the work of the Lord who is the Spirit (cf. v.17a). After conversion to the Spirit of God (v.16), there is liberation through the Spirit (v.17b) and transformation by the Spirit (v.18).

f. The light brought by the Gospel (4:1–6)

1 Paul now resumes the theme of 3:6—divine appointment and provision to be a minister of a new covenant. He had no reason to lose heart (cf. Gal 6:9), for God in his mercy had granted him a privilege exceeding the ministry of Moses (cf. 1Ti 1:12–16). He had been called not to communicate the law but to dispense grace. Paul regarded this divine commission to serve under the new covenant as more than compensating for all the trials he endured for being true to his calling (vv.7–12, 17; cf. Ro 8:18), including the malicious charges of his Corinthian opponents (v.2).

2 To the thought of refusing to grow disheartened Paul will return presently (v.16). Now he expands his brief self-defense of 2:17. Evidently he had been accused of deceitful behavior (cf. 7:2; 12:16) and of willfully adulterating the Gospel (perhaps by not insisting on Gentile compliance with the Mosaic law). These charges he emphatically rejects. The openness marking the new covenant had always been reflected in his conduct. He had never been secretive or deceptive, nor had he ever dishonestly manipulated the message of God entrusted to him.

In any self-defense, self-commendation must play some part. But Paul's particular self-commendation was distinctive. He commended himself, not by self-vindication at every point, but simply by openly declaring the truth of the Gospel. He appealed not to a partisan spirit or the prejudices of other people but "to every man's conscience [GK 5287]." In his self-commendation, God was an onlooker.

3–4 Paul's Gospel, some had claimed, was designed only for a spiritually minded elite; what he said was obscure and what he did was underhanded (v.2). For the sake of argument, Paul concedes his critics' point. Even if his Gospel is veiled in the case of some people, it is not his doing, he insists, because he sets forth the truth plainly (v.2). Any veiling (cf. 3:14–15) comes from the unbelief of "those who are perishing" (cf. 1Co 1:18; 2Co 2:15), whose minds have been blinded by the god of "the present evil age" (Gal 1:4)—i.e., Satan, who wishes to prevent people from seeing the light of the Gospel that focuses on Christ's glory as the image of God. Paul's reference to Christ as "the image [GK 1635] of God" means that Christ is the visible and perfect representation of the invisible God (Col 1:15; cf. Jn 1:18). Christ is one with God the Father by nature, but distinct from him in person.

5 Though Paul might have been forced to commend himself to everyone's conscience (v.2; cf. 1:12; 6:4), he never advertised or preached himself. The essence of his Gospel was the proclamation of "Jesus Christ as Lord" (Ro 10:9; 1Co 12:3; Col 2:6), a message faithfully delivered by him and eagerly embraced by the Corinthians. Paul saw himself related to his converts, not as a spiritual overlord (1:24) but as a willing servant. In this he followed in the footsteps of "the Lord of glory" (1Co 2:8), who himself had adopted the status and role of a servant (Php 2:7; cf. Ro 15:8).

6 Paul now states the reason why he preached Christ and served the Corinthians. It was because God had dispelled his darkness by illuminating his heart and had given him a knowledge of Christ he wished to share (cf. Ac 9:15; 26:16, 18; Gal 1:15–16). In this second creation, as in the first, darkness is dispersed and light is created by divine intervention. In the first case it was a personal word: "Let there be light" (cf. Ge 1:2–3); in the second creation it was a personal act: "God shone in our hearts" (cf. 1Pe 2:9).

This is an unmistakable allusion to Paul's Damascus encounter with the risen Christ when God "was pleased to reveal his Son" to him (Gal 1:15–16). Each of the three accounts of Paul's conversion mentions the noonday light from heaven, brighter than the sun, and emphasizes the revelatory nature of the experience (Ac 9:3–9; 22:6–10; 26:13–18). In the unveiled face of Christ (cf. 2Co 3:7, 13, 18) Paul saw God's glory.

2. The suffering and glory of the apostolic ministry (4:7–5:10)

a. The trials and rewards of apostolic service (4:7–15)

No person was ever more aware of the paradoxical nature of Christianity than Paul. And perhaps none of his letters contains more paradoxes than 2 Corinthians, of which vv.7–12 are typical.

7 Here is the first paradox—the difference between the indescribable value of the Gospel "treasure" (GK 2565) and the apparent worthlessness of the Gospel's ministers, whom Paul terms "jars of clay" (GK 5007 & 4017). Behind this contrast Paul sees a divine purpose—that people may recognize that "this all-surpassing power" is God's alone. His power finds its full scope in human weakness (12:9).

8–9 Then follows a series of four vivid antitheses that illustrate both the weakness of Paul in discharging his commission and the power of God in preserving his life and his spirit. Each metaphor may reflect gladiatorial or military combat. Paul was "hard pressed on every side," but not completely cornered and never driven to surrender. He was "at a loss, but never totally at a loss" (an attempt to retain the word-play of the Greek between "perplexed" and "despair"). He was hounded by the foe, but not left to his mercy. He was knocked to the ground, but not permanently grounded.

10–11 Verse 10 summarizes the four preceding contrasts in the paradox. In the phrase "the death [or dying; GK 3740] of Jesus," Paul sums up his experience of being "hard pressed," "perplexed," "persecuted," and "struck down" during his ministry. On the other hand, the phrase "the life [GK 2437] of Jesus" expresses the Lord's saving him from being "crushed," "in despair," "abandoned," and "destroyed," all of which prefigures the Christian's final deliverance from mortality at the resurrection. This idea of "life in the midst of death" is, of course, closely related to the main theme of chs. 1–7—"comfort in the midst of affliction."

But the meaning of the arresting phrase "the death of Jesus" is also explained by what follows, for v.11a amplifies v.10a. What Paul carried around in his body was nothing other than his being always "given over to death [GK 2505] for Jesus' sake." He faced perilous hazards every hour and death every day (cf. 1Co 15:30–31; also 4:9). This interpretation is preferable to understanding this phrase as a reference to the Christian's once-for-all baptismal identification with Christ in his death (Ro 6:3–5), to one's daily mortification of the sinful nature (Gal 5:24), or to the gradual weakening of one's physical powers while serving Christ.

Both verses stress that the death and the life of Jesus were simultaneously evident in Paul's experience (cf. 1:4–5). For him it was not a matter of life after death, or even of life through death, but of life in the midst of death. Paul's repeated deliverances from death evidenced the resurrecting power of God (1:9–10); otherwise stated, the resurrection life of Jesus was operative in his "mortal body" (cf. Php 3:10).

12 With a bold stroke, Paul relates this theme of life in the midst of death to his earlier statements in ch. 1 about vicarious suffering (1:3–7). There he had said in effect: "I suffer for Christ; God comforts me; I comfort you during your suffering." Here his thought seems to be: "I suffer exposure to physical death for your sakes [cf. v.15a]; you enjoy more of the risen life of Christ as a consequence." He apparently saw not only a causal but also a proportional relation between his "death" and the "life" of the Corinthian believers. The deeper his experience of the trials and sufferings of the apostolic life, the richer their experience of the joys and privileges of Christian existence (cf. Col 1:24; 2Ti 2:10). The "middle term" between his experience and theirs was the divine comfort that, having received, he could then dispense (cf. 1:4). This rich theology of suffering was forged on the anvil of his own experience of "the sufferings of Christ" (1:5).

13–14 But what enabled Paul faithfully to discharge his ministry (3:6; 4:1, 5), even though it involved suffering? It was (1) his sharing the psalmist's conviction that faith cannot remain silent and (2) his own Christian conviction that Christ's resurrection guarantees the resurrection of all believers.

Regarding the first reason, Paul quotes Ps 116:10a (from the LXX): "I believed; therefore I have spoken." The psalmist recounts a divine deliverance from a desperate illness and its accompanying despondency (vv.1–11) and then considers how he might most fittingly render his devotion to the Lord (vv.12–19). In a real sense, then, the psalmist's expression of thanksgiving arose from his vindicated trust in God: "I held firm to my faith and was vindicated; therefore I have spoken." Similarly, Paul, for his part, could not remain silent about the Gospel he believed: "Woe to me if I do not preach the gospel" (1Co 9:16).

A second reason Paul proclaimed the good news with the utmost confidence (cf. 3:12) was a firm conviction of his personal resurrection and his being presented along with all believers before the presence of God or Christ (cf. 11:2; Eph 5:27; Col 1:22). Our being raised "with Jesus" (cf. 1Th 4:14) means that the resurrected Christ forms the prototype and ground of our resurrection. His resurrection from the dead is the firstfruits of the Easter harvest; ours is the full ingathering (1Co 15:23).

15 This verse concludes a section of Paul's thought, for in v.16 he repeats the phrase "we do not lose heart" (GK 1591) from v.1. Rather movingly, he reminds his converts that he endures all his afflictions with resilience, not to promote his own good but for their benefit (cf. 4:5), and ultimately for God's glory. As God's grace expanded in their hearts and through them reached ever-increasing numbers, so too the volume of thanksgiving to God for the receipt of illumination (cf. 4:6) was increasing and promoting the glory of God.

b. Glory through suffering (4:16–18)

16 Paul has supplied several reasons for refusing to grow discouraged in spite of seemingly overwhelming odds: (1) his divine commission as a minister of a new and superior covenant (4:1), (2) the prospect of sharing Christ's triumphant resurrection from the dead (4:14), and (3) his immediate task of promoting the Corinthians' spiritual welfare and the glory of God (4:15). But he was realistic enough to recognize that his toil and suffering had taken their toll on him physically. For this, however, there was splendid compensation. Matching the progressive weakening of his physical powers was the daily renewal of his spiritual powers. It was as though the more he expended himself for the Gospel's sake (cf. 12:15), the greater his spiritual resilience (cf. Eph 3:16).

17 Paul then supplies a surprising definition of daily spiritual renewal. It is a constant production of solid, lasting glory (lit., "an eternal weight of glory"), out of all proportion to the slight, present affliction that causes physical weakness (v.16); this eternal glory "far outweighs" any "light and momentary troubles" that are being presently experienced (cf. Ro 8:18). Again, as in vv.12, 16, the idea of proportion seems to be present: the greater the affliction Paul suffered, the greater the glory produced for him.

18 But this production of glory was by no means automatic. Only as attention was focused on what was unseen did suffering lead to glory. Behind the contrast between "what is seen" and "what is unseen" is the Pauline tension between the "already" and the "not yet" (cf. Ro 8:24–25; 1Co 13:12), the contrast between what is now seen by mortals and what is as yet hidden from mortal gaze. Paul affirms that his affections are set "on things above" (Col 3:1–2), on lasting realities as yet unseen, on the age to come that is present in promises and blessings still to be fully realized.

This preoccupation with the realm "where Christ is seated at the right hand of God" (Col 3:1) was not the result of an arbitrary choice; it was an informed decision. Paul was profoundly aware that the present age is transient (cf. 1Co 7:31), whereas the age to come is destined to last for ever; his afflictions therefore were temporary but his reward eternal.

c. Confidence in the face of death (5:1–10)

No passage in 2 Corinthians has prompted more discussion than this one. Paul's message here relates directly to ch. 4, where he pointed out that even in the midst of affliction, perplexity, and persecution, there was, through divine consolation, the hope of glory (4:8–9, 13–14, 17); and that even in the presence of the ravages of mortality and death, there was, through divine intervention, the operation of life (4:10–12, 16). Paul continues this twofold theme by specifying the sources of divine comfort afforded the believer who faces the possibility of imminent death. Basically they are three: (1) the certainty of the future possession of a spiritual body (v.1), (2) the present possession of the Spirit as the pledge of ultimate transformation (vv.4b–5), and (3) the knowledge that death begins a walk in the realm of sight (v.7) and involves departure to Christ's immediate presence where personal fellowship with him is enjoyed (v.8).

1 Apparently for the first time in his apostolic career Paul reckons seriously with the possibility, even probability, of his death before the return of Christ. Previously, to judge by 1Th 4:15, 17 and 1Co 15:51, he had expected to be among those Christians living when Christ returned. But now, as a result of his recent devastating encounter with death in Asia (1:8–11), he realized that he could die before the Parousia.

As a Cilician leatherworker whose duties included tentmaking, Paul naturally likened his present body to an "earthly tent" (GK 2103 & 5011; cf. vv.2, 4) that might at any moment be dismantled or destroyed. This would simply mark the termination of the process of weakness and decay already at work in his body (4:16). But this possibility did not daunt him, for he was the assured recipient of a permanent heavenly house—a spiritual body provided by God.

2–4 These verses belong together, since v.4 expands v.2, while v.3 is parenthetical. One reason for Paul's assurance of his future acquisition of a resurrection body was the raising up of the temple of Christ's body (Mk 14:58; Jn 2:19–22), alluded to by the phrase "not built by human hands" in v.1. An additional reason was the experience of Spirit-inspired groaning (vv.2, 4; GK 5100; cf. Ro 8:23). Paul's sighing did not stem from a desire to become permanently disembodied but from an intense longing to take up residence in his "heavenly dwelling."

The passage does not define the precise nature of the "groaning," but the immediate context and Paul's thought elsewhere (Ro 8:19–23; Php 3:20–21) suggest it was his sense of frustration with the limitations and disabilities of mortal existence, knowing as he did that he was destined to possess a spiritual body perfectly adapted to the ecology of heaven. Paul sought liberation only from the imperfection of present embodiment (i.e., from "bondage to decay," Ro 8:21), not from any and every form of corporeality. After all, Paul taught that the Christian will have a "spiritual body" (1Co 15:35–49).

But not all at Corinth shared Paul's view of the Christian's destiny. Some were teaching that one's resurrection lay in the past (see 1Co 15:12), accomplished spiritually and corporately for all believers at the resurrection of Christ or else personally experienced at the moment of baptism (cf. 2Ti 2:17–18); to them there was no future, bodily resurrection but only a disembodied immortality. To such people Paul asserts, "We do not wish to be unclothed but to be clothed with our heavenly dwelling." This background also affords a satisfying interpretation of v.3, where Paul seems to be repudiating the teaching that the Christian looks forward to a vague immortality: "when we are clothed, we will not be found naked [as some of you would like us to believe]."

Another possible interpretation of vv.2–4a sees Paul expressing his own eager desire to avoid the unpleasantness or pain of a disembodied intermediate state between his own death and his receipt of a new body at the coming of Christ. He shrinks from the denudation of death and longs to put on his heavenly dwelling over his preserved earthly tent through the return of Christ before his death, though he is uncertain whether this will happen.

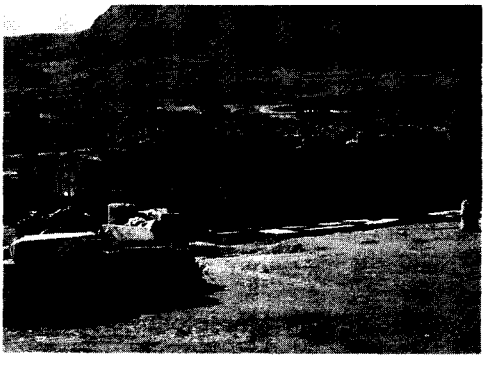
Verse 4b states the purpose and actual result of the receipt of the heavenly dwelling—the swallowing up of the mortal body by the revivifying action of the indwelling Spirit of life (Ro 8:2, 11; 2Co 3:6, 18). This transformation forms the climax of the incessant process of inward renewal (4:16b). In other words, 5:4b is related to 4:16b as 5:1a is related to 4:16a. For Paul, resurrection consummates rather than inaugurates the process of spiritual re-creation.

5 The "very purpose" for which God had "made" (or "prepared"; GK 2981) the believer is defined by v.4b as the transformation of the mortal body. God has given believers the Spirit as the pledge of that coming transformation—"a deposit, guaranteeing what is to come." The Greek word lying behind this paraphrase (GK 775) meant either (1) a pledge or guarantee, differing in kind from the final payment but rendering it obligatory, or (2) a down payment that required further payments but gave the payee a legal claim to the goods in question. Clearly not all these elements apply to Paul's use of the word, for redemption is not a process of reciprocal bargaining ratified by some contractually binding agreement but is the result of the grace of God, who bestows on believers his Spirit as an unsolicited gift. But how can the Spirit be God's pledge of the Christian's final inheritance (Eph 1:13–14; cf. 4:30)? No doubt through his present work of empowering the Christian's daily re-creation (2Co 3:18; 4:16; Eph 3:16), the Spirit guarantees his future completion of that work (cf. Php 1:6).

6–8 With the assured hope of receiving a glorified body (v.1) and with the pledge of his transformation in the presence and activity of the Spirit within him (v.5), Paul was always confident, even in the face of death. However, he continues, because we realize that we are absent from the Lord's presence as long as this body forms our residence, we really prefer to leave our home in this body and take up residence in the presence of the Lord.

Just as the repeated verb "we groan" shows vv.2 and 4 to be related, so "we are confident" relates vv.6 and 8, with v.7 being parenthetical (cf. v.3). But v.8 does not simply repeat v.6; it stands in antithetical parallelism to it. The corollary of "residence in the body = absence from the Lord" (v.6) is "absence from the body = residence with the Lord" (v.8). In other words, as soon as a person dies (v.8a), residence in the presence of the Lord begins (v.8b).

What is involved in being "at home with the Lord"? To be sure, it denotes a change of location. But the preposition translated "with" (GK 4639) also implies an active fellowship between two persons (cf. its use in Mk 6:3). Being "at home with the Lord" supersedes earthly experience where believers simply know the Lord (cf. Php 3:10); it is a higher form of the intimate fellowship with Christ than what we experience on earth (cf. Php 1:23; 1Th 4:17).



In v.7 Paul corrects a possible misinterpretation of v.6. If the clause "we are away from the Lord" (v.6) is interpreted in an absolute sense, present fellowship with Christ would appear illusory and being in the physical body would hinder spirituality. Since both deductions are totally false, Paul qualifies his statement by observing that "we do in fact still walk in the realm of faith, not of sight." To the believer the Lord is present, not to sight but to faith. Any spatial separation is temporary, not final.

9–10 Verse 9 follows vv.1–8 in much the same way as an ethical imperative frequently follows a doctrinal indicative in Paul's letters ("You are . . . ; therefore be!"; see comment on Ro 12:1). After stating profound doctrinal facts (vv.1–8), Paul shows their implications for present behavior (v.9). His constant ambition to please Christ (v.9) resulted directly from his awareness that death would terminate his relative exile from Christ and would inaugurate his walking in the realm of sight in the presence of the Lord (vv.6–8). Entertaining the hope of intimate communion with Christ after death (v.8) naturally prompts the desire to gain acceptance in his eyes especially before death (cf. Gal 1:10; Php 1:20; Col 1:10; 1Th 4:1), through "things done while in the body."

In v.10 we find a second and secondary reason for Paul's eager striving to win Christ's approval: his accountability to Christ (v.10) requires his compulsory attendance before the "judgment seat" (GK 1037) of Christ. From 1Co 4:5 we know that this not only requires us to appear in the court of heaven (cf. Ro 14:10), but also involves both the divine illumination of what has been hidden by darkness and the exposure of one's secret aims and motives. The person thus scrutinized will then receive an equitable and full recompense.

Of whom is this attendance required? While it is true that all people are accountable to God their maker and judge (Ro 2:1–11), Paul is here thinking primarily, if not exclusively, of each Christian's obligation to "give an account of himself of God" (Ro 14:12). Appearance before Christ's tribunal is the privilege of Christians. His judgment is concerned with the assessment of works and, indirectly, of character, not with the determination of one's eternal destiny. Judgment on the basis of works is not opposed to justification on the basis of faith. Delivered from "observing the law" (Ro 3:28), Christians are presently committed to "work produced by faith" (1Th 1:3). Not all verdicts on the Judgment Day, however, will be comforting (see comment on 1Co 3:15).

The bema (judgment seat) of the city of old Corinth is still visible (Paul adopts this word for "the judgment seat of Christ" in v.10). Courtesy Bastiaan Van Elderen.

3. The function and exercise of the apostolic ministry (5:11–6:10)

a. Motivation for service (5:11–15)

11 "The fear [GK 5832] of the Lord" here is not personal piety nor the terror that the omnipotent Lord arouses in the hearts of people (e.g., Ge 35:5), but the reverential awe Paul had for Christ as his divine assessor and future judge (v. 10). Aware of his personal accountability, Paul strove to persuade other people of the truth of the Gospel, which included both exposition of Scripture about Jesus and his kingdom and discussion about practical life, and the truth concerning himself (i.e., that his motives were pure and sincere [cf. 1:12] and that his apostolic credentials and conduct were sound [cf. 3:1–6; 4:1–6]). Whether or not those to whom Paul addressed his appeal recognized his claims as true, God recognized him for what he was. Yet Paul realized it was necessary for the Corinthians to come to a proper understanding of his apostolic status and conduct.

12 Paul insists that these assertions about himself in relation to God and other people should not be interpreted as a further attempt at self-commendation (cf. 3:1). But he does want his converts to have the necessary ammunition with which to defend his apostleship. They ought, he implies, to have had sufficient pride in him to have undertaken this defense on their own initiative (cf. 12:11) with their weapons in hand—namely, their personal knowledge of his devoted service as an apostle. However, he reluctantly supplies them with additional weaponry by reminding them of the testimony of their individual consciences.

Paul describes the opposition as those who prided themselves on outward appearances. No doubt they made superficial claims to superiority over him—such as their relation to the Jesus of history (cf. 5:16) and to Palestinian orthodoxy (cf. 11:22) or to their greater number of visions and revelations (cf. 12:1–7). Paul was content to take his stand on what was not outwardly evident or fully provable, i.e., what was "in the heart."

13 Whatever the background to this difficult verse, its general message seems clear. Paul disowns self-interest as a motive for any of his actions; all is for God's glory (1Co 10:31; 2Co 1:15). Of this the Corinthians can be justly proud (v. 12). This interpretation accords well with his following appeal to Christ (v.14) and his definition of the purpose of Christ's death (v.15)—that believers should lead a life that is not centered on self but on Christ.

Verse 13a has been explained in several ways: (1) Paul's critics had accused him of being "out of his mind" (cf. Mk 3:21), perhaps because of his allegedly esoteric teaching (cf. Ac 26:24), his ecstatic experiences, or his indefatigable zeal in his work. To this charge he replies, "That is for God to judge." (2) Paul is referring to his experience of speaking in tongues or having visions (cf. Ac 22:17–21; 1Co 14:18, 23). If this is the charge, his answer is, "That is a matter between God and me." (3) Sometimes the Corinthians had viewed Paul as having been carried away by excessive emotion. To this charge he affirms, "It led to the glory to God." (4) Paul had been criticized for his self-commendation, which appeared to be sheer lunacy (cf. 11:1, 16–21). To this charge he replies, "It is in defense of God's cause."

14–15 Why was a life of self-pleasing impossible for Paul? Because of the supreme example of his Lord in dying for all. "The love Christ showed for us compels us to love and serve him and you [cf. v.13b], because when he died, sin's penalty was paid and we died to ourselves, while through his resurrection we live to please him [cf. v.9] by serving you." Thus Paul has now isolated two motives for Christian service: knowledge of accountability to Christ (v.11) and awareness of Christ's example of self-sacrificing devotion (v.14); in other words, Christ as Savior and as Judge.

Ever since his conversion, Paul felt he had no other choice but to expend himself in the service of others for Christ's sake (4:11–12; 12:15). In addition he had two convictions about the death of Christ. The first was that since one man died on behalf of and in the place of all, all had undergone death (v.14b). What is this latter death? Either the death deservedly theirs because of sin (cf. Ro 6:23) or the death to sin and self that is involved in Christian living (cf. Ro 6:11–13). In neither case was the death a physical death like Christ's; rather, it was a potential "death" of all human beings. Paul is not suggesting that, irrespective of one's response and attitude, everyone knows forgiveness of sins or experiences selfless living. There is universalism in the scope of redemption in that no one is excluded from God's offer of salvation; but there is a particularity in the application of redemption, since not everyone appropriates the benefits afforded by this salvation.

Paul's second conviction was this: Dying with Christ should lead to living for Christ. He is not speaking of every person without exception but only of "those who live" in union with the resurrected Christ. While all people died potentially when the Man who represented them died, not all were raised when he rose. But for those who rose with Christ to walk "in newness of life" (Ro 6:4; Col 3:1–2), slavery to sin and self has ended while devotion to Christ and his church has begun (cf. Ro 6:6, 11). The outcome of Christian self-denial is a Christ-centered life filled with concern for others.

b. The message of reconciliation (5:16–6:2)

16 Paul now introduces the first of two consequences of Christ's death and his own living for Christ. Since his conversion ("from now on"), when he gained the twofold conviction about his own death (v.14) and life (v.15), Paul had ceased to make superficial personal judgments based on external appearances (v.12). It was now his custom to view others, not in terms of nationality but in terms of spiritual status. The Jew-Gentile division was less important for him than the Christian-unbeliever distinction (Ro 2:28–29; 1Co 5:12–13; Gal 3:28; 6:10; et al.); Gentile believers were his brothers "in Christ" while his unbelieving compatriots were "without Christ."

Similarly, his sincere yet superficial preconversion estimate of Jesus as a misguided messianic pretender whose followers must be extirpated (Ac 9:1–2; 26:9–11) he now repudiated as being totally erroneous, for he had come to recognize him as the divinely appointed Messiah whose death had brought life (vv.14–15).

17 Paul's second stated consequence of the death and resurrection of Christ (vv.14–15) is that whenever a person becomes part of the body of Christ by faith, there is a new act of "creation" (GK 3232) on God's part. One set of conditions or relationships has passed out of existence and another set has come to stay. Paul clearly emphasizes the discontinuity between the two orders (cf. Ro 12:2; Eph 4:23; Tit 3:5) and the "newness" of the person in Christ, although he does acknowledge the coexistence of the present age and the age to come (e.g., 1Co 10:11; Gal 1:4).

18–19 "All this is from God" looks back to the new attitudes of v.16 and the new creation of v.17. God is as surely the author of the second creation as he was of the first (cf. 4:6).

At this point Paul passes from the subjective to the objective aspects of the atonement as he talks about "reconciliation" (GK 2903). Elsewhere he shows that reconciliation is the divine act by which, on the basis of the death of Christ, God's holy displeasure against sinners was appeased, the enmity between God and humankind was removed, and human beings were restored to proper relations with God (Ro 5:10–11; Col 1:20–22). Reconciliation is a total and objective removal of hostility.

Here Paul makes it clear that God was the reconciler, that humankind was what God reconciled to himself (but cf. Col 1:20), that Christ was God's agent in effecting reconciliation, that the reconciliation has been accomplished, and that reconciliation involved the nonimputation of trespasses (i.e., forgiveness and the accompanying imputation of righteousness; see comment on Ro 3:24). Those to whom God has committed the ministry of reconciliation (cf. 4:7) are primarily Paul and his fellow ambassadors. Nevertheless, a reference to all believers cannot be excluded (cf. v.18a, "God . . . reconciled us," including the Corinthians).

20 As proclaimers of the good tidings about reconciliation, the apostles were acting on Christ's behalf as messengers and representatives duly appointed by him. Furthermore, it was as if God were issuing a personal and direct invitation through them to their hearers to enter into the benefits of the reconciliation already achieved by Christ. "We implore you on Christ's behalf: Be reconciled to God" summarizes that message of reconciliation.

This appeal issued in Christ's name is the God-designed link between the objective work of reconciliation and its subjective appropriation by the sinner. From this viewpoint reconciliation is a continuing process as well as an accomplished fact. Yet there is a real sense in which reconciliation was effected before its results are subjectively felt (see Ro 5:11).

21 Thus far Paul has been content to give the broadest outlines of the drama of reconciliation, stating merely the relationship between the principal actors. Now he explains, so far as human language and imagery permit, the "how" of reconciliation. The fifteen Greek words defy final exegetical explanation, dealing as they do with the heart of the atonement. Perhaps the best way to understand the first section of the verse, particularly the second use of "sin" (GK 281), is to recognize that Christ, treated as if he were a sinner, became the object of God's wrath and bore the penalty and guilt of sin. So complete was the identification of the sinless Christ with the sin of the sinner, including its dire guilt and its dread consequence of separation from God, that Paul could say profoundly, "God made him . . . to be sin for us."

Paul's declaration of Christ's sinlessness may be compared with other affirmations in Scripture: Heb 4:15; 7:26; 1Pe 2:22 (quoting Isa 53:9); 1Jn 3:5. Just as "the righteousness of God" is extrinsic to us, so the sin with which Christ totally identified himself was extrinsic to him. He never had a sinful attitude or did a sinful act.

The glorious purpose of the Father's act in making Christ "to be sin" was that believers should "become the righteousness [GK 1466] of God" in Christ. This is a bold restatement of the nature of justification. Not only do believers receive from God a right standing before him on the basis of faith in Jesus (Php 3:9), but "in Christ" believers in some sense actually share the righteousness that characterizes God himself (cf. 1Co 1:30).

6:1 If God "[made] his appeal" (GK 4151) to people through Paul (5:20), there was a sense in which Paul was a fellow worker with God (cf. 1Co 3:9). As such he was concerned to plead God's cause with unbelievers and believers alike. Hence this urging (GK 4151), addressed to the whole body of Christians at Corinth, "not to receive God's grace in vain."

This latter phrase may mean one of two things: (1) Paul does not want the Corinthians to show by their present lives that they had received God's grace to no purpose. (2) Paul does not want the Corinthians to spurn the grace of God, which was being perpetually offered to them. How could they fail to profit from that grace? By refusing to purify themselves from everything that contaminated body and spirit (7:1; 12:20–21), by allowing a chasm to develop between faith and conduct, or by embracing a different gospel (11:4), one based on observing the law as the ground of acceptance before God.

2 To emphasize the seriousness and urgency of his appeal and to highlight the privilege of the present and the danger of procrastination, Paul quotes Isa 49:8 and then applies the passage to the age of grace. In its original context this quotation belongs to a section of Isaiah where the Lord directly addresses his Servant who has been "despised and abhorred by the nation" (Isa 49:7), promising him vindication before people in due time and calling on him to carry out the work of restoration after the return from exile. Paul uses the quotation to establish that the gospel era ("now") is "the day of salvation," when God's favor is shown to humankind. How unthinkable that such grace should be received in vain (v.1)!

c. The hardships of apostolic service (6:3–10)

3 Since v.2 is grammatically a parenthesis, v.3 is closely connected to v.1 and 5:20. As was fitting for an ambassador for Christ, Paul tried to put "no stumbling block [GK 4683] in anyone's path" lest the ministry should incur discredit. That various accusations were being leveled against Paul was inevitable, given the success of his ministry and the jealousy of others. His concern was that such charges be totally without foundation, that no "minister of reconciliation" be guilty of inconsistent or dishonest conduct, and that no handle be given adversaries who wished to ridicule or malign the Gospel. The life of the Christian minister is the most eloquent advertisement for the Gospel.

4–5 Paul proceeds to itemize his hardships (cf. 1Co 4:9–13; 2Co 4:8–9; 11:23–29) as he seeks to commend and defend his ministry as a servant of God and to provide the Corinthians with further material they might use in his defense (cf. 5:12). Paul's commendation was a matter of actions, not words.

After a reference to the "great endurance" that marked all his service and suffering (cf. 12:12), Paul lists nine afflictions, which fall into three groups. (1) General trials: "troubles" are oppressive experiences; "hardships" refer to unrelieved adverse circumstances; "distresses" are frustrating tight corners (cf. 4:8). (2) Sufferings directly inflicted by others: "beatings, imprisonments and riots." (3) Self-inflicted hardships: "hard work" includes the arduous task of incessant preaching and the toil of manual labor (cf. 1Th 2:9; 2Th 3:7–8); "sleepless nights" means voluntary abstention from sleep (cf. Ac 20:7–11); "hunger" probably refers to voluntary fastings (cf. 11:27).

6–7 From mention of outward circumstances (vv.4b–5) Paul moves on to specify the inward qualities he sought to display (v.6) and the spiritual equipment he relied on (v.7) while discharging his apostolic commission.

"Purity" refers to both moral uprightness and singleness of purpose. "Understanding" is not simply pastoral insight but also knowledge of the Christian faith and sensitivity to God's will (cf. 1Pe 3:7). By "patience" Paul means the endurance of insult or injury without anger or retaliation. "Kindness" is the generous and sympathetic disposition that acts in love. Paul's reference to the person of the Holy Spirit here emphasizes the Spirit as the source of all spiritual graces. That is, "the Holy Spirit" probably denotes the gifts or graces of the Holy Spirit.

After a reference to his proclamation of the truth "in the power of God" (cf. 1Co 2:1–5), Paul introduces a military metaphor that he had used earlier (1Th 5:8) and would develop later (Ro 6:13; Eph 6:11–17). "Weapons of righteousness" means either weapons supplied by God (Eph 6:10–11) as a result of justification or weapons that consist of personal integrity. Weapons "in the right hand and in the left" may allude to "the sword of the Spirit" and "the shield of faith" that form part of the Christian's armor (Eph 6:16–17).

8–10 Behind these verses probably lie a number of actual allegations that Paul's opponents made against him (cf. Ro 3:8; 1Co 4:13). In some quarters, Paul had probably become an object of disrepute and slander

(v.8). He was thought a "nobody" who relied on deceit to become a "somebody" (vv.8b–9a), an irresponsible person who, needlessly courting danger and death, suffered for his trouble (v.9b–c), and a morose individual lacking the power that wealth affords (v.10).

"Glory and dishonor, bad report and good report" (v.8) may epitomize the two types of response to Paul's preaching, or they may contrast the opinion of others (dishonor, bad report) with the reward of God (glory, good report). In the contrasts that follow (vv.8c–10) the paradoxical character of Paul's apostolic ministry is emphasized. If in fact various charges had been made against him, he takes the accusation, lets it stand or invests it with his own meaning, and supplies an opposing complement to form a series of antitheses that point to the vicissitudes and tension of living as a persecuted "ambassador for Christ" (5:20).

4. The openness and joy of the apostolic ministry (6:11–7:4)

a. A plea for generous affection (6:11–13)

11–13 Paul did not customarily address his readers by name, doing so only when his emotions had been deeply stirred—as at the bewitchment of the Galatians (Gal 3:1), at the generosity of the Philippians (Php 4:15), or here, at the remarkable candor of his defense and the intensity of his affection for the Corinthians. Behind his freedom of speech (cf. 3:12; 4:2) was a warmly receptive attitude of heart. "If there are any feelings of constriction or restraint in our relationship," he continues, "they are on your side, not mine. I appeal to you as my spiritual children [cf. 1Co 4:14–15]: in fair exchange for my unrestricted affection, give me yours, too." Although Paul's desire was for complete reciprocity in family relationships, he was acutely aware that affection could only be given, not taken.

b. Minor digression–call to holiness 6:14–7:1)

14–16a Paul has just appealed to the Corinthians for mutual openness in affection and in speech. His own heart is open wide to them, but both he and they know why they cannot reciprocate as fully as they ought. Some of them have an uneasy conscience about their continuing pagan associations. The apparent abruptness of v.14a after v.13 may be explained: (1) by this mutual knowledge; (2) by Paul's "coming to the point" immediately, as he sets forth the truth plainly (4:2) or speaks the truth in love (Eph 4:15); and (3) perhaps by a brief dictation pause.

Paul begins with a concise summary of his message in this brief digression (6:14–7:1), which repeats the main point of 1Co 10:1–22, his warning to the Corinthians of the danger of idolatry (note 1Co 10:14: "Flee from idolatry"). "Do not be yoked together with unbelievers" clearly is not an injunction against any and all association with unbelievers (cf. 1Co 5:9–10; 10:27). Paul actually encouraged the Christian partner in a mixed marriage to maintain the relationship as long as possible (1Co 7:12–16). Rather, this is a prohibition against forming close attachments with non-Christians, using an agricultural metaphor about yoking (cf. Dt 22:10; also Lev 19:19). Although precisely what constituted a "diverse yoke" for the Corinthians remains unstated, it clearly involved compromise with heathendom, such as contracting mixed marriages (cf. Dt 7:1–3), initiating litigation before unbelievers in cases involving believers (1Co 6:1–8), or forming any relationship with unbelievers that would compromise Christian standards or jeopardize consistency of Christian witness. Paul is content to state a general principle that needs specific application under the Spirit's guidance.

Five rhetorical questions follow (vv.14–16a), each of which presupposes a negative answer. They stress the incompatibility of Christianity and heathenism, the incongruity of intimate relationships or fellowship between believers and unbelievers (cf. 1Co 10:21). After two comparisons of abstract nouns ("righteousness" and "light" with "wickedness" and "darkness"), there follow two personal comparisons—"Christ" and the "believer" with "Belial" and the "unbeliever." The final contrast (v.16a) climaxes the series and prompts what follows (vv.16b–18).

16b–c The chief reason why believers must not enter any compromising relationship with unbelievers (v.14a) is that they belong exclusively to God. Corporately they form "the temple [or sanctuary; GK 3724] of the living God" (cf. 1Co 3:16–17; Eph 2:22; see also 1Co 6:19). To establish this last point (v.16b) Paul quotes or alludes to several OT passages: Lev 26:11a, 12, (cf. Ex 25:8; 29:45a; 1Ki 6:13; Eze 37:27a) and Ex 6:7 (cf. Jer 32:38).

17 Paul's next quotation (Isa 52:11) stresses God's demand for purity of life and separation from evil. In Isaiah, the call was for separation (or departure) from Babylon with its pagan idolatry. In Paul, the call is for separation from unbelievers with their pagan way of life. This verse may not be used to defend separation from believers on the ground of doctrinal differences.

"And I will receive you" stems from Eze 20:34, 41. God's acceptance and approval of his people is dependent on their obedience to his commands. Separation from the world leads to fellowship with God (cf. Jas 4:4).

18 The next mosaic of OT texts comes from 2Sa 7:14a, 27, with the reference to "daughters" possibly coming from Isa 43:6. What God promised to Solomon through David and to Israel through Solomon (cf. Jer 31:9) finds its fulfillment in what God is to the community of believers through Christ (Gal 3:26; 4:6). If Christians corporately are the temple of the living God (v.16), individually they are his sons and daughters.

7:1 In his chain of OT quotations Paul has stressed both the privilege of being a temple of God (v.16) and the benefits of compliance with the divine will (vv.17d–18). As recipients of such promises of fellowship with God, all Christians should avoid every source of possible defilement in any aspect of their lives. "Body and spirit" here denotes a Christian in his or her total personality in relations with other people and with God (cf. 1Co 7:34).

Paul is probably implying that the Corinthians have become defiled, perhaps by occasionally sharing meals at idol-shrines or by continuing to attend festivals or ceremonies in pagan temples (cf. 1Co 8:10; 10:14–22), or even by maintaining membership in a local pagan cult. If they make a clean break with pagan life in any and every form, they will be bringing their holiness nearer completion by this proof of their reverence for God.

c. Paul's pride and joy (7:2–4)

2–4 After this brief digression (6:14–7:1) Paul renews his appeal (cf. 6:13) for the Corinthians' full affection. He knows of nothing in his past conduct or instruction that can cause them to doubt his sincerity or lose confidence in him. Paul had been accused of bringing about the moral and financial ruin of innocent victims at Corinth by callously exploiting them (v.2), and apparently some at Corinth were inclined to believe these charges. As before (cf. 1Co 4:4; 2Co 4:2; 5:11; 6:3), Paul can do no more in reply than appeal to his clear conscience and the Corinthians' knowledge of his conduct and insist that the charges are groundless.

But to mention the charges did not imply that the Corinthians really believed them, nor was Paul trying to blame them for anything (v.3a). He reminds them (cf. 6:11) that they occupy a permanent and secure place in his love and concern. The leveling of charges, the arrival of death, the trials of life—none of these could divorce them from his affection (v.3b).

The situation at Corinth was not perfect and probably never would be. But Paul had grounds for great confidence and pride in his converts. In spite of all his frustrations and in the midst of all his affliction, he was filled with comfort and overflowing with joy (v.4; cf. 6:10). The reason? The safe arrival of Titus in Macedonia with encouraging news about Corinth (vv.5–7).

D. Paul's Reconciliation With the Corinthians (7:5–16)

1. Comfort in Macedonia (7:5–7)

5 At this point Paul resumes the account of his movements broken off at 2:13. Although he expected to meet Titus when he (Paul) arrived in Macedonia, his hopes were frustrated just as they had been at Troas (2:12–13). His body (Gk. sarx, "flesh"; GK 4922) had no rest. In 2:13 he had said that his "mind" (Gk. pneuma, "spirit"; GK 4460) had experienced no rest at Troas. If a distinction is to be drawn between the pneuma of 2:13 and the sarx of 7:5, terms often contrasted in Paul's writing (e.g., Gal 5:16–24), the former denotes Paul in his spiritual sensitivity; the latter, Paul in his physical suffering. But more likely the terms as used here are virtually synonymous.

"Fears within" alludes to Paul's persistent apprehension about Titus's reception at Corinth, his safety in travel, and the Corinthian response to the "severe letter." "Conflicts on the outside" may point to violent quarrelling that focused on Paul or to persecution that may have happened to him in Macedonia.

6–7 It probably seemed to Paul that from the human point of view his whole future as apostle to the Gentiles was related to the Corinthians' reaction to his assertion of authority in the letter delivered by Titus. And now the nonarrival of Titus tended to confirm his worst fears (see comment on 2:12–13).

God used three means to dispense comfort to the "downcast" (GK 5424) apostle: the actual arrival of Titus, Titus's positive experience at Corinth, and the reassuring news he brought concerning the Corinthians' attitude toward Paul—their great "affection" for him, their "deep sorrow" over their disloyal behavior, and their "ardent concern" to defend Paul's cause and to follow his directions in disciplining the guilty party.

2. The severe letter and its effect (7:8–13a)

8–10 "My letter" refers to the so-called "severe letter," one that is no longer extant but was written after 1 Corinthians and Paul's "sorrowful visit" and was delivered by Titus (see comments in the introduction, sec. 5). From the report of Titus Paul had learned for the first time that his letter had caused the Corinthians considerable distress, at least for a period (v.8). As a spiritual father who disliked causing pain for whatever reason, his first reaction was to regret that he had written so stern a letter. But some later time, possibly after Paul had had time to reflect on the whole episode, his initial regret had disappeared when he realized that the temporary pain suffered by the Corinthians had produced sincere "repentance" (GK 3567). Of what had the Corinthians repented? Probably their failure to defend Paul before his detractor (cf. v.12). Thus Paul could now say that he did not regret the letter; it had caused no permanent harm. The inference is clear: the imposition of discipline or the suffering of pain that does not, under God, lead to repentance, can cause irreparable harm.

Verse 10 describes two ways of reacting to pain or sorrow. God's way ("godly sorrow") invariably produces a change of heart; this repentance "leads to salvation" and therefore gives no cause for regret. Sorrow borne in a worldly way, on the other hand, does not lead to repentance but has the deadly effect of producing resentment or bitterness. What makes suffering remedial is not the actual experience of it but one's reaction to it.

11 A splendid example of the beneficial outcome of "godly sorrow" was the positive response of the Corinthians to Paul's letter that had for a time pained them. It could have compounded trouble at Corinth and caused widespread resentment against Paul, if it had not been received in a spirit of humility and with a willingness to follow God's will. As it was, it produced in them seriousness of purpose, "eagerness" to clear themselves from blame, "indignation" at the scandalous action of the person who denigrated Paul, "alarm" over their behavior and its effects, "affection" for Paul, "concern" lest he should visit them with a rod (1Co 4:21: cf. 2Co 7:15; 13:2), and a "readiness to see justice done" by the punishment of the offender (cf. 2:6).

The second sentence in this verse probably means that by their favorable response to the "severe letter" the Corinthians had proved themselves "to be innocent."

12–13a Paul's principal aim in writing the "severe letter" was for the Corinthians to recognize "before God" how devoted to their spiritual father they really were (cf. 2:9) and to ensure their future loyalty to Paul. This statement of his aim was likely influenced by his knowledge of the letter's outcome. At the time he actually wrote that letter he was unsure of Corinthian loyalty and hence was restless (2:12–13; 7:5). But since God had prevented the letter from making the Corinthians resentful (v.9b), Paul was encouraged (v.13a).

Paul also hints at two subsidiary aims in this letter: the punishment of the guilty party (cf. 2:6, 9) and the vindication of "the injured party." The offender was probably not the man guilty of incest (see comments on 2:5–6, 10–11), but an anti-Pauline intruder in the church; the injured party was likely Paul himself.

3. The relief of Titus (7:13b–16)

13b–14 Through the "godly sorrow" of the Corinthians, Titus was as relieved and encouraged as Paul. He apparently had little occasion before his visit to Corinth as bearer of the "severe letter" to form an independent judgment about the Corinthians; so he was dependent on Paul's glowing recommendation. This would suggest that this visit was his first one (though he may have had a brief earlier visit to organize the collection; see 1Co 16:1–2; see comment on 2Co 8:6–7). Titus seems to have ventured on this visit with some trepidation. But now that the visit was over, "his spirit has been refreshed."

Paul's relief stemmed from the fact that his generous assurances to Titus about the Corinthians had not proved unfounded and therefore embarrassing to him (v.11). On the contrary, just as his own truthfulness had been vindicated at Corinth (cf. 1:18–20), so also his boasting about them had now proved fully justified.

15–16 The Corinthian Christians had originally received Titus "with fear and trembling," afraid (cf. v.11) that they would fail to meet their obligations toward an envoy from Paul. But they had all readily complied with demands Titus had made of them. As Titus recalled their obedience and respectful deference to him, his affection grew all the warmer (v.15). This gave Paul good reason for complete confidence in the Corinthians (v.16) and a secure base from which to propose the completion of the collection (chs. 8–9).

II. The Collection for the Saints at Jerusalem (8:1–9:15)

For a summary of the historical background and theological significance of the collection, see the introduction.

This was not the first time the Corinthians had heard of the collection for the poor at Jerusalem, for in 1Co 16:1–4 Paul gave them certain information and directions about the project that they had probably requested in their earlier letter (see comment on 1Co 16:1–4). Whether they had acted on Paul's instructions is uncertain. But in all probability progress on the collection soon stopped, particularly as the result of (1) the unfortunate incident alluded to in 2:5–11; 7:12 and its aftermath, and (2) the malevolent influence of the intruders from Palestine, who at least for a period gained their support from some Corinthian sympathizers (cf. 11:7–12, 20; 12:13–16). But when Paul sent Titus to deliver and reinforce the effect of the "severe letter," he probably told him to attempt to revive the flagging collection if the church responded favorably to the letter (cf. 8:6a). Now, with firm evidence from Titus of their loyalty to him (7:6–16), Paul can discuss the project again and press for its completion.

A. The Need for Generosity (8:1–15)

1. The generosity of the Macedonians (8:1–5)

1–2 Tactfully, Paul begins with an example, not a plea. Although they were facing a severe ordeal involving persecution (cf. 1Th 1:6; 2:14), the Macedonian churches (e.g., those at Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea) had contributed generously. As Paul expresses it, their "rich generosity" resulted from "overflowing joy" (v.2). Their "extreme poverty" no more impeded their generosity than their tribulation diminished their joy. This liberal giving by destitute Christians to fellow believers not personally known to them Paul traces to the influence of God's "grace" (charis; GK 5921; this word occurs 10 times in chs. 8–9, with varying meanings). The apostle was not concerned about the actual size of the gift but about the attitude of the givers (cf. Ro 12:8) and the relation between the size of the gift and the resources of the givers (cf. Mk 12:41–44).

3–5 In describing the nature of the Macedonians' generosity, Paul makes several observations. First, they gave far more generously than their slender means and adverse circumstances permitted. Their eagerness to contribute led them to surpass all expectations.

Second, acting on their own initiative, they "urgently pleaded" with Paul for the "privilege of sharing" (Gk. koinonia, "fellowship"; GK 3126) in the collection. Since 1Co 16:1 mentions only "the Galatian churches," not the Macedonian churches, and since 1Co 16:5 makes no reference to the collection, it seems likely that the collection in Macedonia began after the spring of A.D. 55. One reason for Paul's sending Timothy and Erastus into Macedonia (Ac 19:22) may have been to introduce the collection project there, though Paul was reluctant to encourage the poor Macedonians to contribute (v.2).

A third reason why the Macedonians exceeded Paul's expectations was that they did not restrict their contribution to financial aid. Rather, they dedicated themselves to Christ first and then also to Paul for the performance of any service in connection with the collection. They recognized that dedication to Christ involved dedication to his servants. All was part of God's will.

2. A plea for liberal giving (8:6–12)

6–7 The sterling example of the Macedonians encouraged Paul to ask Titus to make arrangements for the completion of the offering among the Corinthians. After all, unlike the Macedonians, they were not facing persecution, nor were they in desperate financial straits. How willingly they ought to contribute! Earlier Titus had "made a beginning" on the collection, though when this occurred is not clear. It may have been when he delivered the "severe letter," or at an even earlier time.

Titus had already brought to a successful completion an "act of grace" among them—likely his task as Paul's special envoy to Corinth to deliver the "severe letter" and to carry out its measures. But in Paul's judgment something more than another letter was needed to make sure the Corinthians now completed their offering. Thus Paul wants Titus to pay another visit.

A special visit from Titus, however, would not in itself guarantee the success of the collection. So Paul appeals to the Corinthians' desire to exhibit every sign of spirituality (cf. 1Co 1:5, 7; 12:31; 14:37). By using the word charis ("grace"; cf. comment on vv.1–2) of this virtue of giving, he makes it clear that generosity stands alongside faith, speech, knowledge, and love as an expression of divine grace in a person (v.7).

8 Although vested with full apostolic authority (10:8; 13:10), Paul declined to issue directives, preferring rather to request, suggest (cf. v.10), encourage, or appeal (cf. 1Co 7:6; 2Co 8:6, 10, 17). Spontaneity and warmth would be absent from the Corinthians' giving if coercion were present. But he did see in the enthusiastic generosity of the Macedonian churches a convenient standard for assessing the genuineness of the Corinthians' professed love for him and for all believers, as well as a compelling incentive to arouse them to action.

9 In encouraging the Corinthians to bring their contribution to a satisfactory completion (v.6), Paul has thus far appealed to the example of the Macedonians (vv.1–5, 8), to their own promising beginning (v.6), and to their desire for spiritual excellence (v.7). Now he turns to the example of Christ, in whom Paul saw the supreme example of one who showed eagerness and generosity in giving as a demonstration of love. If the sacrificial giving of the Macedonians did not stimulate emulation, the example of Christ's selflessness certainly would. Paul typically buttresses ethical injunctions with doctrine (e.g., Ro 15:2–3; Eph 5:2; Col 3:9–10).

Christ "became poor" by the act of incarnation that followed his preincarnate renunciation of heavenly glory (cf. Php 2:6–8). That glory is depicted as wealth, in contrast to the lowliness of earthly existence, which amounts to "poverty." Through his voluntary surrender of glory, others derived spiritual wealth (Eph 1:3). Unlike the Macedonians, who gave when they were poor (v.2), Christ gave when he was incalculably rich. In their present circumstances the Corinthians fitted somewhere between these extremes. Like the Macedonians (v.5), Christ gave himself. The Corinthians would do well to emulate these examples.

10–11 Again Paul emphasizes that he is not giving orders but offering advice (cf. v.8a), though an imperative follows in v.11! It is clear from 1Co 7:25, 40, however, that such a considered opinion came from one who regarded himself as worthy of trust. The apostle hints at several reasons why it was "best" for the Corinthians to bring their contribution to a speedy completion. (1) Considerable time had elapsed since they had expressed an "eager willingness" to help. (2 Since their enthusiastic intention had already been partially translated into action, it was incumbent on them, having put their hands to the plow, not to look back but to bring the project to a successful completion. (3) They thus enjoyed a twofold precedence over the Macedonians—both in deciding to contribute and then in beginning to collect money. But now the Macedonians themselves had completed their offering! (4) The Macedonians had contributed "even beyond their ability" (v.3); now the Corinthians were being asked to contribute "according to [their] means."

12 The phrase "according to your means" at the end of v.11 is now explained. Provided a gift is willingly given, its acceptability is determined solely on the basis of what a person might possess, not on the basis of what one does not own. God assesses the "value" of a monetary gift not in terms of the actual amount given, but by comparing what is given with the total financial resources of the giver (see Mk 12:41–44). No one is expected to give "according to what he does not have."

3. The aim of equality (8:13–15)

13–14 Perhaps one reason the collection project had been languishing at Corinth was an objection like this: "As if we had no financial problems of our own, Paul is imposing fresh burdens on us so that others can become free of burdens." Christian giving, Paul insists, does not aim at an exchange of financial burdens but rather at an equal sharing of them and an equal supply of the necessities of life. The rich are not called upon to give so lavishly that they become poor and the poor become rich. That would simply prolong inequality. But those who enjoy a greater share of material benefits are called upon to make certain that those who have a smaller share through no fault of their own are not in want.

If v.13 alludes to an equal sharing of burdens that will lead to equality of supply, then v.14 speaks of mutual sacrifice that will maintain equality. Paul here is not predicting economic plenty in Jerusalem and economic dearth in Corinth. But he saw that with the uncertainty of economic conditions in the first century, it was not inconceivable for the Jerusalem Christians some day to become the donors of financial aid and the Corinthian Christians the recipients. On the other hand, since chronic poverty existed in Jerusalem, perhaps Paul means that the Jerusalem believers would dispense nothing other than what they had already supplied to Gentile churches—namely, the spiritual blessings of the Gospel (cf. Ro 15:27).

15 Paul now illustrates this principle of equality of supply from the account of God's provision of manna to the Israelites in the wilderness (Ex 16:13–36; esp. v.18). Although some gathered more than others and some less, the needs of all were met. Miraculously there was equal provision, with neither surplus nor deficiency. But Paul's illustration also points to a contrast. The equality the Israelites miraculously experienced in the wilderness was enforced; the equality Christians are themselves to create in the church and the world is voluntary.

B. The Mission of Titus and His Companions (8:16–9:5)

1. The delegates and their credentials (8:16–24)

This section amounts to a "letter of commendation" (cf. 3:1) from Paul to the church at Corinth, giving the credentials of the three appointed delegates and encouraging the Corinthians to welcome them warmly.

16–17 Although Titus's affection for the Corinthians naturally developed as a result of his positive interaction with them (7:13–15), Paul could trace Titus's keen interest in their welfare to the providential working of God (v.16). Nothing could be more reassuring to the Corinthians than to know that the devotion and concern for them shared by Paul and Titus were simply a reflection of God's own affection for them—and it was concern for them, not for their money (cf. 12:14). Paul goes on to describe the intensity of Titus's concern. It was true that Paul had "urged" him (v.6; cf. "appeal" here; GK 4155) to arrange for the collection to be completed, but this invitation merely confirmed Titus's eager willingness; in reality he was going "on his own initiative."

18–19 The unidentified Christian brother whom Paul was sending with Titus had a double qualification. He was well known and highly praised in all the (Macedonian?) churches "for his service to the gospel" (probably a good administrator, maybe also an evangelist or teacher). Also, he had been selected and commissioned by an unspecified number of churches to travel with Paul on behalf of the collection. Paul adds a phrase to explain why he personally was supervising the administration of the collection. He sought to promote not his own glory but the Lord's and to prove his "eagerness to help" (cf. Gal 2:10).

20–21 Experience in Corinth had taught Paul that he must anticipate suspicions or accusations of his detractors and take the necessary precautions (e.g., 11:9, 12). As the prime mover behind the Jerusalem collection that he expected to be sizable (cf. "this liberal gift"), he was particularly susceptible to malicious charges that the whole project was designed to bribe the Jerusalem church fully to support his ministry or that he was quietly retaining a commission for himself. This explains, for example, his original uncertainty as to whether he would accompany the churches' delegates to Jerusalem (1Co 16:3–4; but cf. 2Co 1:16; Ro 15:25), his insistence that the Corinthians appoint their own accredited representatives (1Co 16:3), and his sending to Corinth (before he arrived!) two delegates along with his personal representative, Titus (vv.18–19, 22–23).

Paul was not one who sought human praise (Gal 1:10), but he recognized that the progress of the Gospel was hindered if its ministers for any reason acquired a reputation for dishonest dealings (cf. 1Co 9:12; 2Co 4:2; 6:3). Verse 21 is virtually a quotation of Pr 3:4 (in LXX).

22 The second anonymous representative who would travel to Corinth with Titus is identified simply as "our brother," i.e, a brother in Christ (see comment on 1:1). On many previous occasions Paul had proved this man's zeal, which in the present matter was all the greater "because of his great confidence" that this mission to Corinth would prove highly successful.

Why are the two "brothers" who would accompany Titus not identified? Either because both would be personally introduced by Titus when the present letter was first read at Corinth, or because both delegates, as renowned appointees of the Macedonian churches, were already well known at Corinth.

Why were three delegates chosen? Evidently Paul was more susceptible to misrepresentation at Corinth than in most of the other churches he had founded, so added precautions were necessary. To have sent one personal representative would have been to lay himself open to slanderous gossip (cf. 12:16–18), while two independent envoys would be able to testify to his honest intentions and conduct (cf. Dt 17:6; 19:15). Furthermore, it is not impossible that Paul wished to exert subtle pressure on the Corinthians (cf. 9:4), knowing as he did the somewhat erratic progress of the collection at Corinth thus far, the propensity of the Corinthians for disorderliness (cf. 1Co 14:33, 40), and the disturbing effect of the parasitical intruders from Palestine.

23 As he sums up the credentials of the three delegates, Paul draws a distinction between Titus, his "partner" and personally appointed representative, and the two "representatives of the churches." Titus, like Timothy (Ro 16:21), is described as Paul's "fellow worker." If anyone should raise questions about the two others, says Paul, three facts are relevant: they are "brothers" in Christ; they are the appointees and envoys of the Macedonian churches; by their life and service they are a credit (Gk. doxa, "glory"; GK 1518) to Christ.

24 Paul's short "letter of commendation" (vv.16–24) concludes with a warm appeal. The Corinthians were to give evidence of their love for Christ and for the members of his body (cf. v.8) by extending to the three delegates warm hospitality and by cooperating with their efforts to supervise the final arrangements for the collection. Also, they were to vindicate Paul's confident boasting about them (cf. 7:14) by contributing eagerly, promptly, and generously (cf. vv.7, 20). All was to be done openly, so that all the churches contributing to the collection could see it.

2. The need for readiness (9:1–5)

1 Having completed his letter of commendation, Paul resumes his discussion of the collection and states why he was convinced that his pride in the Corinthians and his boasting about them (8:21) would not prove to have been misguided.

2 In 8:10 (cf. 8:6) Paul dated the beginning of the collection at Corinth as "last year." Here he uses the same phrase to speak of his current boast to the Macedonians: since last year the Christians in Achaia, certainly including the Corinthians, were ready to give. But since Paul was writing here because of the presumed reluctance of the Corinthians to give, how can Paul now say that he used the example of their "readiness" in his effort to have the Macedonians contribute quickly and liberally?

In answer, we must draw a careful distinction between the Corinthians' ready desire to give and the actual fact of having completed the collection. This verse concentrates only on the former aspect, their enthusiastic eagerness to help out (cf. 8:11). From vv.3–5 it is clear that they had not yet been giving liberally. The relation, then, between chs. 8 and 9 is this: The Corinthian enthusiasm for participating in the collection (cf. 8:10–11) served as an example worthy of emulation by the Macedonians for their own contribution (9:2). Now, however, because the Macedonians had now successfully completed what they had enthusiastically begun under the stimulus of the Corinthian example (8:1–5), their exemplary action formed a basis for Paul's appeal to the Corinthians to complete their contribution (8:6, 10–11).

3–4 Although Paul knew that the Corinthians were so eager to help that further written reminders about the collection were superfluous (vv.1–2), he was sending a personal reminder in the form of the "brothers" (cf. 8:16–24). Paul wanted to avoid two situations. One was that his repeated and confident boast to the Macedonians about the Corinthians' "eagerness" and readiness (v.2) would turn out to be without foundation upon his arrival. The other was that when delegates from the Macedonian churches arrived at Corinth with Paul on his forthcoming visit (12:11; 13:1–2), the Corinthians would be still unprepared and this would lead to his (and their own) embarrassment.

5 To make certain that neither of these predicaments arose, Paul "thought it necessary to urge the brothers" to prepare for his coming to Corinth by supervising final arrangements for the collection there. He reminds the Corinthians of their earlier commitment ("the generous gift you had promised"). By a prompt response when the brothers arrived, they would be fulfilling an obligation they had voluntarily assumed and would ensure that the gift was not "grudgingly given."

Twice in this verse the Corinthian contribution is called a "generous gift" (Gk. eulogia, "blessing": GK 2330), a biblical word that refers either to an act of blessing or consecration or to some concrete benefit given by God or a human being. Here the latter meaning is more appropriate—"a benefit bestowed" by the Corinthian believers on the Jerusalem saints. But other ideas are also suggested. (1) The Corinthian contribution would be an act that produced the blessing of thanksgiving to God (cf. vv.11–13). (2) Paul hoped that the "collection" (Gk. logeia, 1Co 16:1) at Corinth would be a "first-rate collection" (eu-logia). (3) Since "blessing" implies generosity, the word may denote "a generous gift" (NIV).

C. The Results of Generosity (9:6–15)

1. The enrichment of the giver (9:6–11)

6–7 To emphasize the rewards of generous giving (v.5), Paul cites what appears to be a proverb (v.6): "scanty sowing, scanty harvest; plentiful sowing, plentiful harvest." No exact parallel to this maxim is extant, though a similar sentiment is expressed in several places (e.g., Pr 11:24–25; 19:17; 22:8–9; Lk 6:38; Gal 6:7). The image of the harvest naturally suggests the freedom of the sower to plant as much seed as he chooses—whether "sparingly" or "generously." Similarly, each person is responsible first to decide "in his heart" what he should give (cf. Ac 11:29; 1Co 16:2) and then to give what he has decided (v.7). Giving should result from inward resolve, not from impulsive or casual decision. Once the amount to be given has been determined, says Paul, the gift should be given cheerfully, since a cheerful giver always receives God's approval (cf. Pr 22:8 in LXX).

8–9 God shows his approval of the cheerful giver (v.7b) in his provision of spiritual grace and material prosperity ("all grace") that enable this person constantly and generously to dispense both spiritual and material benefits. As regularly as the resources of a cheerful giver are taxed by one's generous giving, they are replenished by divine grace. This gives that individual "all that you need," in dependence on an all-sufficient God (cf. Mal 3:10).

At this point Paul quotes Ps 112 to illustrate the generosity of "the man who fears the LORD" (112:1) and the positive results of one's giving. From "the wealth and riches . . . in his house" (112:3a), this God-fearing person freely distributes gifts to the poor (112:9a). As a result, such benevolent acts of piety will never be forgotten but rather will have permanent beneficial effects in this life and will gain one an eternal reward (112:9b).

10–11 In v.6 Paul observed that the person who sows sparingly will reap a meager harvest. Now he develops the imagery of sowing and reaping to reinforce the point that generosity pays handsome dividends. He argues from God's bounty in nature to his even greater liberality in grace. The crops of the generous person are always full and his harvests rich. If God supplies us with the seed needed to produce a harvest of grain, and thus food (cf. Isa 55:10), he certainly will supply and multiply all the resources needed to produce a full harvest of good deeds ("your righteousness"; cf. Hos 10:12).

Verse 11a restates v.8. God continues to enrich benevolent people so that they can go on enriching others by their generosity (cf. 1:4). The greater the giving, the greater the enrichment. The greater the enrichment, the greater the resources to give. Paul then adds a statement (v.11b) that he will develop in vv.12–15. The Jerusalem saints, as the grateful recipients of the liberal gift administered by Paul and his colleagues, would express their thanks to God, the source of all good gifts (cf. Jas 1:17).

2. The offering of thanks to God (9:12–15)

12–13 The believers at Corinth are now reminded of the encouraging results that will stem from their generous gift. Not only does "this service" of giving enrich the donor (vv.6–11) and help supply the needs of the recipients (v.12a), but above all, it promotes the glory of God by prompting "many expressions of thanks" to him. The saints at Jerusalem, as well as other Christians who heard of the collection, would praise God because this act of Christian service had proved the reality and vigor of the Corinthians' faith (v.13a), which may have come under suspicion at Jerusalem through reports of certain irregularities in their church. Then there would be two items for thanksgiving: (1) the Corinthians' obedience to the dictates of the Gospel that accompanied their "confession of the gospel of Christ"; (2) their sacrificial liberality demonstrated in sharing material benefits with the Jerusalem church and therefore in one sense with all Christians (cf. 1Co 12:26). Praise is offered less for the gift itself than for the spiritual virtues of the donors expressed in the gift.

14 As to further results of generosity, Paul is convinced the giving will be reciprocal. The Jerusalem believers will receive material benefits and in return will dispense the spiritual blessing of intercession for the Corinthians. As they pray, they will recall "the surpassing grace" (Gk. charis; see comment on 8:1–2) imparted to the Corinthians by God and evident in their liberality; as a result, their hearts will be warmed toward those at Corinth and they will long to see them and enjoy a closer relation with them.

15 This doxology is a final appeal to the lofty grandeur of divine giving (cf. 8:9; 9:8, 10–11). Since the gift here is said to be given by God and is beyond adequate human description, it can hardly refer to the Corinthian contribution or even the boon of Jewish-Gentile reconciliation in Christ alluded to in v.14a; rather, it must refer to the surpassing grace that God imparts (v.14b), especially the Father's gift of the Son (cf. Ro 8:32).

Were Paul's appeals to the Corinthians in these two chapters successful? The apostle paid his third visit to Corinth as planned (12:14; 13:1), spending three months (the winter of A.D. 56–57) in Greece (Ac 20:2–3), during which he wrote Romans (see Ro 16:23; 1Co 1:14). In Ro 15:26–27 he writes that the believers in Macedonia and Achaia eagerly made "a contribution for the poor among the saints in Jerusalem." Evidently in the five or so months between the writing of 2 Corinthians and Romans, the believers at Corinth had responded to Paul's appeals. Why then does Acts not refer to any delegate from Achaia (see comment on Ac 20:4)? Perhaps Titus was their representative, a man who for some reason is nowhere mentioned in Acts.

III. Paul's Vindication of His Apostolic Authority (10:1–13:14)

A. The Exercise of Apostolic Rights and Authority (10:1–11:15)

1. The potency of apostolic authority (10:1–11)

No commentator denies that an abrupt change of tone occurs at this point in the letter. Defenders of the unity of 2 Corinthians explain the change in various ways, some of which are the following: (1) Paul pauses in dictation and hears more disturbing news; (2) like chs. 1–7, chs. 10–13 are tempered polemic, with not a few tender expressions of affection (e.g., 11:2–3; 12:14–15a); (3) Paul intentionally reserves his criticism until after his commendation; (4) after consolidating his apostolic authority (chs. 1–7), Paul then exercises it (chs. 10–13); (5) the contrast between chs. 1–9 and chs. 10–13 has been overdrawn—all 2 Corinthians is polemical in tone; (6) Paul now addresses a different audience—in chs. 1–9 Paul addresses the whole church, in chs. 10–13 the intruders and their partisans; (7) on other occasions Paul is given to abrupt changes of mood (e.g., 1Co 4:8).

1–2 There is no evidence that Paul now addresses only a segment of the Corinthian church—those favorably disposed toward his adversaries from Palestine. On the contrary, throughout these next four chapters Paul regularly identifies the views of certain unnamed people (e.g., 10:7, 10–12; 11:4, 12–13, 15, 20–23; 13:2) who formed a recognizable subversive element at Corinth, thus alerting the entire church (cf. 12:19; 13:11–13) to the danger of becoming spiritually infected.

Paul had been accused of being courageous at a distance, shooting his epistolary arrows (e.g., the "severe letter"), but subservient and weak when personally present (cf. v.10; 1Co 2:3). This charge Paul ironically repeats in v.1b as a prelude to an appeal to all the Corinthians regarding a vocal minority ("some people"), who persisted in thinking that worldly standards and motives governed all his conduct and that he relied on human powers and methods in his ministry (cf. 1:17; 2:17; 3:5; 4:2; 7:2).

What Paul wished to avoid on his forthcoming visit was a display of boldness—boldness when present, not absent! Yet he is ready to exercise his apostolic authority, whatever the outcome, if the Corinthians do not repudiate his opponents and mend their ways (cf. 12:20–21; 13:11). His "meekness and gentleness" as a true servant of Christ (cf. Mt 11:29) should not be confused with timidity (cf. 13:10; 1Co 4:21).

3–4 Paul draws a clear distinction between existence "in the world" and worldly conduct and techniques. He does not deny his human weakness, yet he affirms that spiritual warfare demands spiritual weapons (vv.3–4a; cf. Eph 6:11–17). A successful campaign can be waged in the spiritual realm only as worldly weapons are abandoned and total reliance is placed on spiritual weapons, which can demolish apparently impregnable fortresses where evil is entrenched (v.4b).

5 What are these fortified positions that crumble before the weapons of the Spirit? Fanciful human sophistry and intellectual pretensions, otherwise called "the wisdom of this world" (1Co 3:19). The phrase "every pretension" refers to any human act or attitude that forms an obstacle to the emancipating knowledge of God contained in the Gospel of Christ and that keeps people in bondage to sin. Closely related is the expression "every thought," which means every human device that temporarily frustrates the divine plan; they must be forcibly reduced to obedience to Christ. Paul presents the picture of a military operation in enemy territory that seeks to thwart every single hostile plan of battle, so that there will be universal allegiance to Christ.

6 If circumstances forced Paul to turn from "meekness and gentleness" to a stern assertion of his authority, his plan of action has two stages. (1) He must bring the Corinthians' obedience to completion (cf. 2:9; 7:15), achieved only when they dissociate themselves from his opponents, fully recognize his apostolic authority, and make a total break with idolatry (6:14–7:1). (2) There is the (as yet undefined) punishment of "every act of disobedience" performed by his adversaries from Palestine or by any remaining insubordinate Corinthians.

In other words, Paul must secure a firm base in the Corinthian church before he will risk a face-to-face confrontation with those who still oppose him. Unless a church as a whole is willing to support spiritual discipline, that discipline will remain largely ineffective. Another important principle emerges when vv.5 and 6 are compared: Obedience to Christ entails submission to his appointed representatives.

7 Paul's opponents were not unaware that the most successful way to undermine his effectiveness was to cast doubt on the genuineness of his apostleship. If his converts could be persuaded that he lacked apostolic credentials, they would cease to believe his teaching.

In response, Paul does not discourage the testing of credentials (cf. 13:2–3) but casts doubt on the adequacy of the criteria the Corinthians were using. They were impressed by externals (cf. 5:12), with "the surface of things"—the confident claim of being an authorized apostle, commendatory letters (3:1), an authoritarian manner (11:20), spectacular visions (cf. 12:1–7), rhetorical skills (11:6), and "pure" Jewishness (11:22). Paul argues that the right to make a subjective claim based on personal conviction cannot fairly be granted his opponents and yet denied him; later in this section he will mention more objective criteria for testing apostolic credentials. In all this, his motive was not personal vindication but the desire to defend the Corinthian church from the danger of apostasy (cf. 11:2–3).

8 If the need for self-defense in the face of opposition compelled Paul to "boast [GK 3016] somewhat freely" about his apostolic authority, he was confident that he would not be embarrassed by a charge of exaggeration or deception, for the facts themselves spoke eloquently in his favor. Everyone knew that his service at Corinth had resulted in the upbuilding of the Corinthian church in faith and in harmony, while the presence of the false apostles had produced friction and division (cf. 1Co 3:17). He stresses the divine origin of his authority (cf. 3:5–6; 13:10) and its employment for the common good (1Co 12:7).

9–11 However legitimately Paul may have boasted about his God-given authority, he decides to refrain from expanding his simple claim in v.8 lest he appear to be frightening the Corinthians into submission by "weighty and forceful" letters (vv.9–10a). He has no desire to give substance to the charge that he is bold and impressive only when absent (cf. v.1). Those who compare unfavorably what they believe to be his epistolary boldness, "unimpressive" presence, or contemptible rhetoric (v.10) are reminded that when present with them he will act in precise accord with his letters (cf. 13:2, 10).

It is not difficult to understand the origin of the malicious accusation against Paul reported in v.10. Each of his earlier letters to Corinth had been "forceful." In fact, to judge by their contents, they seemed to be growing more forceful each time! Moreover, unlike his opponents (11:20), Paul avoided self-assertiveness and admitted the inferiority of his rhetorical skills (1Co 1:17; 2:1–5; 2Co 11:6). What he firmly resists, however, is the inference drawn from the claim about his personality and his manner of speaking—namely, that he is " 'timid' when face to face" (v.1).

2. Legitimate spheres of activity and boasting (10:12–18)

Behind Paul's continuing self-defense in this section lies an indirect attack on the intruders from Palestine. From his firm denials ("we do not," vv.12, 16; "we... will not," v.13; "we are not," v.14; et al.) we may deduce the content of his charges against his rivals (not, as elsewhere, the content of accusations made against him). Only in v.12b does Paul make a direct charge: the false apostles have trespassed on his legitimate area of authority at Corinth in defiance of the agreement of Gal 2:1–10. In addition, in their unrestrained self-commendation, his opponents are falsely claiming credit for work he has done in Corinth.

12 In one aspect of his conduct, Paul admits his timidity (cf. v.1). He lacked the boldness and temerity to compare himself with those who indulged in self-praise. Writing ironically, he asserts that in their folly his opponents were establishing their own conduct as normative and then finding great satisfaction in always measuring up to the standard. The implication is clear. If the Corinthians try to assess Paul's credentials against the artificial and subjective criteria established by his detractors, they will be just as foolish.

13–14 Unlike his adversaries, Paul refuses to boast of what has occurred beyond the limits of his own ministry as the apostle to the Gentiles (Ac 9:15; Gal 2:9). In boasting about his special "field" at Corinth and appealing by implication to the existence of the Corinthian church as a vindication of his apostleship (cf. 3:2–3), he is not overstepping his limits, since historically his God-ordained field included Corinth. In fact, he had been the first to reach the Corinthians with the Gospel of Christ (v.14b; cf. 1Co 3:6, 10).

It was the activity of the false apostles from Palestine at Corinth that encroached on Paul's legitimate "field" because it violated the concordat of Gal 2:1–10, which predated their arrival at Corinth (see comments in the introduction, sec. 5). Even if these opponents had no relationship with the Jerusalem church, they must have been aware of the agreement of Gal 2, particularly that the Jerusalem apostles recognized that Paul had been entrusted with special responsibility for propagating the Gospel among the Gentiles or uncircumcised (Gal 2:7–9). True, their presence at Corinth was not technically an infringement on any precisely defined apostolic "treaty," but it amounted at least to a repudiation of the spirit of this agreement concerning apostolic "division of labor," for they were not in Corinth to aid Paul (as Apollos had been, 1Co 3:5–6) but to supplant him.

15–16 Twice here Paul indirectly chides his opponents for priding themselves on work already done by others. They probably boasted that the spiritual vitality of the Corinthians was directly attributable to them. Paul, however, so far from boasting of "work already done" (v.15), made it his policy to avoid preaching the Gospel where Christ had already been named lest he build on another man's foundation (Ro 15:18–21).

As their spiritual father (1Co 4:15), he hoped that the growth of their faith would result in the enlargement of his influence among them and the improvement of their estimation of him. Then and only then could he contemplate fulfilling his eager desire to visit the Christians at Rome (Ac 19:21; Ro 1:11; 15:24) and to advance westward to Spain (Ro 15:24, 28). Paul felt he could not pursue pioneer evangelism in the western Mediterranean when his converts in the eastern Mediterranean were unsettled and in danger of apostasy (11:3). In this sense, Paul's future was in the Corinthians' hands. Consolidation had to precede advance; in other words, any evangelistic expansion would be the joyful outcome of his total acceptance at Corinth.

17–18 As in 1Co 1:31, Paul cites Jer 9:24. Boasting is illegitimate, whether it be of one's own accomplishments or status or of another person's achievements as though they were one's own (v.16). For Christians, only boasting "in the Lord" is legitimate—i.e., boasting of what Jesus Christ has done for them (Gal 6:14) or through them (Ro 15:18; cf. Ac 11:27), or of what they can do through him. So far from being an evidence or guarantee of divine approval, self-commendation (such as Paul's adversaries practiced) disqualifies them. Only those who boast in the Lord and so give God his due glory enjoy the Lord's commendation at his tribunal (cf. 5:9).

3. Paul's jealousy for the Corinthians (11:1–6)

1 Paul has firmly stated that self-praise is inadmissible and worthless (cf. 3:1; 5:12; 10:12), but he realizes that the present situation demands it if his converts at Corinth are to be preserved intact for Christ (v.2). His antagonists were indulging in self-praise (5:12; 10:7, 12–18) and the Corinthians were evidently sympathetic to that. Consequently his hand was forced (12:11); he must indulge in foolish boasting in order to win the Corinthians' attention and gain a fair hearing. Reluctantly, he decides to employ his opponents' methods; but unlike theirs, his motive is not personal gain but the Corinthians' welfare (v.2). He goes on to supply three grounds for his appeal to the Corinthians to bear with him: (1) his divine jealousy for them especially when they were endangered (vv.2–3); (2) their willingness to put up with rivals who presented an adulterated message (v.4); and (3) his claim not to be in the least inferior to the "super-apostles" (v.5).

2 With a "jealousy" (GK 2419) that sprang from God and was like God's own jealousy for his people (e.g., Hos 2:19–20; 4:12; 6:4; 11:8), Paul was jealous for his converts' undivided loyalty to Christ in the interval between their conversion (= betrothal to Christ) and their glorification (= presentation to Christ). He pictures himself as the father of the bride (cf. 1Co 4:15; 2Co 12:14), whose ultimate goal was to present "the church of God in Corinth" (1:1) as a pure virgin to her husband at his appearance (cf. 4:14; Eph 5:27; 1Jn 3:2–3). Human jealousy is a vice, but to share divine jealousy is a virtue. There is a place for a spiritual father's passionate concern for the exclusive and pure devotion to Christ of his spiritual children (11:29).

3 Prompting Paul's jealousy for Corinthian fidelity was his fear, based on disturbing evidence (v.4), that their minds and affections might be corrupted so that they would lose their single-minded faithfulness to Christ. He recognized the false apostles as Satan's agents (v.15), capable of repeating at Corinth what Satan had successfully achieved in the garden of Eden (Ge 3:13; 1Ti 2:14). The danger was intellectual deception leading to apostasy.

4 Paul's fear had a foundation in fact; the "if" as used here denotes an actual, not a hypothetical, situation (i.e., "if, as has happened, someone comes"). In justifying his plea for the Corinthians' tolerance of his enforced boasting (v.1), Paul ironically appeals to the ready welcome they gave visitors who came proclaiming a message other than the Gospel that they had embraced and that had brought them salvation. Surely they ought to show their father in the faith the same degree of tolerance they showed a newcomer preaching a different faith!

It is impossible to reconstruct the precise content of what these false apostles said; it is also uncertain whether "spirit" here alludes to the Holy Spirit or to a spirit of fear and slavery (Ro 8:15; 2Ti 1:7). What seems clear, however, is that the willingness of the Corinthian believers to entertain the eloquent preacher of an adulterated gospel (cf. Gal 1:6–9) that added human merit to divine grace illustrated their tendency to look "only on the surface of things" (10:7; cf. 1Co 1:17; 2:1, 4– 5; 2Co 10:10).

5 The third justification for the request of v.1 now appears (see comment). Still engaging in his "senseless" but pardonable self-praise, Paul maintains that he is in no way inferior to the "super-apostles." This expression is either the description of the Twelve used by Paul's opponents and here (as in 12:11; see comment) quoted by Paul, or the apostle's ironical description of the exalted view of the Twelve held by the "false apostles." In this verse, Paul claims to be in no respect inferior to the original apostles (see 1Co 9:1; 15:5–8, 10) with whom he was being unfavorably compared and whose authority his adversaries illegitimately invoked in support of their Judaizing program at Corinth.

6 Paul rates himself by the criteria used by the Corinthians to assess the credentials of apostles or visiting missionaries. With regard to his lack of professional training and skill in rhetoric, Paul is willing to admit his deficiency (cf. 10:10) and perhaps even his inferiority to the "false apostles." But in his judgment his expertise in knowledge, which he had made perfectly clear to the Corinthians, more than compensated for this deficiency.

4. Financial dependence and independence (11:7–12)

7–8 Itinerant teachers of the Hellenistic age commonly gained their financial support by charging a fee for their instruction. Traveling teachers who were concerned about their reputation, however, would often work at a trade. Under the influence of example set by Jesus in his instructions to the Twelve (Lk 9:3–4; 10:4, 7), early Christianity adopted a third method of support: a preacher accepted gifts from the community (something Paul refused to do; see 1Co 9:3–18). But the believers at Corinth had been influenced by the pseudo-apostles into thinking that such acceptance of remuneration for teaching was a criterion of true apostolicity. Their thought seemed to be: "If it is the apostles' right to get their living by preaching the Gospel, why did Paul refuse to accept support for preaching unless he considered himself inferior?"

In his defense, notable for its powerful irony, Paul makes two points. (1) He had committed no offense simply by waiving his apostolic right to support (1Co 9:12, 15, 18); rather, he did not want anyone to charge him with peddling God's word for profit (2:17). (2) His purpose in "humbling" himself in the Corinthians' eyes by doing manual labor while ministering to them (see Ac 18:3) was to "elevate" them above their inherited idolatry and vicious past (cf. 4:12; 8:9), just as his "robbing" other churches of money they could not really spare was motivated solely by his desire to serve the Corinthians more effectively (v.8).

9 During his initial visit to Corinth, Paul had at first supported himself by plying his trade as a "leather-worker" (Ac 18:3), but on the arrival of Silas and Timothy from Macedonia, "he began to devote himself entirely to preaching" (Ac 18:5), presumably because "brothers who came from Macedonia" brought monetary gifts from Philippi (Php 4:15) and possibly Thessalonica (cf. 1Th 3:6). Providentially the gift arrived just when his resources had failed and he had begun to feel need. Even in this extremity he had not been a burden to anyone in Corinth. Financial independence would continue to be his policy.

10–12 This policy, which enabled Paul to boast that he was preaching the Gospel free of charge (v.7; cf. 1Co 9:18), he refused to abandon (cf. 1Co 9:15). It was Christ's truth he was speaking when he affirmed that he would not bow to pressure from his opponents anywhere in Achaia regarding this issue (v.10).

But why did Paul not accept money for preaching? Two conflicting explanations are mentioned here. (1) Some had malevolently asserted that it was evidence of Paul's lack of affection for the Corinthians. He dismisses this by appealing to God's knowledge of his heart (v.11). (2) Like the wandering preachers of the day, the intruders at Corinth had apparently received remuneration for their instruction. Since they regarded themselves as in some sense apostles, they probably felt fully within their rights that they could accept or even demand wages as a validation of their apostleship. But Paul's stance was an acute embarrassment to them, for they could not boast as he did about preaching a message gratuitously. Thus Paul hoped to deprive his opponents of the opportunity of boasting that they were working at Corinth on precisely the same terms he had been. His financial independence would highlight his rivals' financial dependence and cause the Corinthians to rethink their attitude toward him.

5. False apostles (11:13–15)

13–15 Paul does not contest the right of his adversaries to support but rather lays against them a single all-embracing charge. Those who vainly sought equality with him were in fact "false apostles," apostolic pretenders who passed themselves off as righteous servants of Christ (cf. 11:23) while in reality they were agents of Satan. Like this arch-deceiver (Jn 8:44), whose habit was to masquerade "as a shining angel," they relied on disguise and deceit in carrying out their nefarious schemes (cf. vv.3–4). The destiny of these men would accord with the actual deeds they performed (cf. 5:10; Php 3:19), not the outward appearance they adopted (cf. 5:12). As preachers of "a different gospel" (v.4), they stood under the anathema of Gal 1:8–9.

When referring to the "super-apostles" (cf. 11:5; 12:11), Paul shows remarkable restraint; he is not their inferior in any respect. But he does not hesitate to attack ruthlessly the "false apostles," the Judaizing intruders from Jerusalem. Regarding the former Paul is defensive and mildly ironical; regarding the latter he is polemical and intensely serious. The solution to the problem of the Palestinian opponents was outright condemnation, since as minions of Satan they were trying to impose certain elements of Jewish teaching and practice on Gentile Christians as prerequisites for salvation.

B. Boasting "As a Fool" (11:16–12:13)

1. Justification for foolish boasting (11:16–21a)

16 After digressing to defend his policy about financial support (vv.7–12) and describing the true identity of his opponents (vv. 13–15), Paul now resumes from vv.1–6 the theme of boasting like "a fool" (GK 933). He has decided to boast like his opponents, since he knows the Corinthians' determination to compare him with his rivals and their vulnerability to those who commend themselves. From 11:16–12:13, therefore, he engages in ad hominem argumentation, boasting about things that are not "boastworthy" and answering fools according to their folly (Pr 26:5). There was a danger, however, that some Corinthians might not see or wish to see that Paul was simply playing a part, so he tells them so and solicits their indulgence as he does "a little boasting."

17–18 These two verses are likely a sort of parenthesis. Under normal circumstances, Paul claims, his conduct and words as a servant of Christ and of the Corinthians (4:5; 11:23) would have been marked by "the meekness and gentleness of Christ" (10:1), not the "self- confident boasting" of the fool (v.17). This was not the example of Christ, but he felt he had to follow the example of his opponents in order to win over the Corinthians, who had driven him to this desperate measure of self-exaltation.

Although hesitant to talk "as a fool," Paul partially overcomes his reluctance when he recalls that his converts have grown accustomed to self-advertisement—people boasting "in the way the world does" of personal privileges and achievements (as Paul himself is about to do; vv.22ff.).

19–21a Probably no verses in the letter are more scathingly ironical than these. Not only do the Corinthians humor fools; they do so "gladly," because the folly of the fool serves to highlight the wisdom of the "wise." Their tolerance seems to have no limits. They put up not only with the speech of fools but also with the despotism of tyrants. The intruding aliens had reduced them to slavery by robbing the Corinthians of their liberty in Christ and by seeking to reimpose the Mosaic law (cf. Gal 2:4; 5:1). They had exploited them by greedily devouring any and all maintenance offered them (cf. Mk 12:40). They had entrapped them with tantalizing bait (cf. Lk 5:5); they had put on airs of superiority and had gravely insulted and humiliated them.

None of Paul's readers would have failed to catch his message with its indictment of their inconsistency. Claiming to be followers of a meek, gentle Christ (10:1; cf. Mt 11:29), they were impressed by the aggressiveness and authoritarianism of false apostles (v.13); yet they were unimpressed by Paul's "weak" considerateness as a genuine "apostle of Christ Jesus" (1:1; 10:1, 10). Paul has to confess with shame (though really with biting irony) that his character had been too weak and his disposition too mild to use the tactics of the opposition (v.21a)!

2. Paul's heritage and trials (11:21b–29)

21b–22 Paul has already made several efforts to begin sustained boasting (see 10:8; 11:1, 16). Now he finally brings himself to this distasteful task. No bold claim made by his rivals will go unmatched (v.21b). So to the first three claims mentioned, he responds with the simple, disarming word, "so am I."

By "Hebrews" is meant Jews of Palestinian descent, especially those whose native tongue was Aramaic or Hebrew and whose intellectual and cultural heritage was within Palestinian rather than Diaspora Judaism. Whether he himself was brought up in Tarsus or in Jerusalem, Paul was a Hebrew of Hebrew parentage (Php 3:5). As an "Israelite" he was a member of God's people Israel. As a descendant of Abraham who had been "circumcised on the eighth day" (Php 3:5), Paul was an heir to the covenants based on God's promise (Eph 2:12). All in all, with regard to descent, citizenship, and heritage, he was the equal of his rivals.

23–25 When Paul turns from the matter of his nationality to that of achievement (vv.23–29), he lays claim to superiority over his rivals and begins to speak as a madman (v.23). Although he compares himself with both the "super-apostles" and the "false apostles," in the former case the comparison is negative ("I am not in the least inferior," 11:5; 12:11); in the latter case it is positive ("more," "much harder," "more frequently," "more severely," v.23).

In the light of v.13, it might seem unlikely for Paul to call his opponents "servants of Christ." But the question "Are they. . . ?" means "Do they claim to be. . . ?" He concedes his opponents' estimate of themselves only for the sake of the comparison that follows. As he begins his list of "accomplishments," he does not list triumphs but apparent defeats and refers not to strengths but "weaknesses" (cf. 11:30; 12:5, 9–10). This accords with his view that lowliness and weakness as seen in Christian service provide the only incontestable vindication of apostleship.

If we compare this list of Paul's sufferings (cf. 1Co 4:9–13; 2Co 4:8–12; 6:4–5) with the account of his experiences given in Acts, it immediately becomes clear how incomplete Luke's record is. Since Paul wrote this letter during his stay in Macedonia at Ac 20:2a, only the events recorded before this verse relate to the comparison. To be sure, Luke gives ample proof of Paul's hard work (v.23) and records his stoning at Lystra (v.25; Ac 14:19). But he mentions only one imprisonment (cf. v.23) before Ac 20—that at Philippi (Ac 16:23–40)—and only one of his three beatings with rods (v.25), also at Philippi (Ac 16:22–23). The other imprisonments and Gentile beatings, the Jewish whippings, the shipwrecks, are not recorded in Acts. Paul's life was even more colorful than Acts would lead the reader to believe!

26–27 From specific hardships (vv.24–25) Paul turns to the dangers he confronted (v.26) and the privations he endured (v.27; cf. 6:5). In speaking of "danger from rivers" and "danger from bandits," he could be thinking especially of crossing the Taurus range between Perga in Pamphylia and Antioch in Phrygia near Pisidia (Ac 13:14; 14:24), a journey made hazardous by the mountain torrents and the predatory Pisidian highlanders. Acts records several examples of early Jewish plots against Paul's life (e.g., Ac 9:23, 29; 14:19; 18:12) but only two incidents involving "danger from Gentiles" (Ac 16:16–40; 19:23–41). "Danger from false brothers" may point to Paul's being betrayed to local authorities by counterfeit Christians and the resulting reprisals.

Paul's "sleepless nights" could refer to insomnia because of physical discomfort or illness, but the phrase more likely alludes to voluntary sleeplessness from pressure of work. And Paul may have undertaken some of his voluntary fasts because of his determination not to accept support from the Corinthians (1Co 9:12, 15, 18; 2Co 11:7–12).

28–29 None of the afflictions mentioned in vv.23–27 was a continuous experience. Paul's crowning trial and privilege was, however, incessant—the daily pressure of his anxious "concern" (GK 3533) for all the churches (cf. Ac 20:18–21, 28–31). If his trials at Corinth were any indication, the total burden he always bore must have been well-nigh oppressive. But as a faithful "under-shepherd," he shared the constant burden of the chief shepherd with regard to all the sheep.

This total identification of shepherd with sheep, or of a spiritual father with his children in the faith, is illustrated in v.29. Paul was at one with all his converts (cf. 1Co 12:26), sympathizing with their weakness in faith, conduct, or conscience (cf. 1Co 8:7–13; 9:22). It is difficult to know what Paul means when he says, "I inwardly burn." The view that best suits the context is that he felt so ablaze with compassion for a person who was "led into sin" that he shared that person's deep remorse.

3. Escape from Damascus (11:30–33)

30–31 For a moment Paul pauses to reflect on what he has just written. Both he and his opponents might boast, but his boasting was distinctive, since, paradoxically, he prided himself on evidences of his weakness that became evidences of God's surpassing power in supporting and delivering him (cf. 1:8–10; 4:7, 10–11; 12:5, 9–10).

Because he had been so precise in describing his afflictions and perils, he realized that the record sounded not only incredible but also out of keeping for an apostle and that his rivals might easily dismiss it as gross exaggeration. Hence Paul's appeal to the divine omniscience (cf. 1:18; 11:10–11; also Ro 9:1; Gal 1:20; 1Ti 2:1) to confirm the trustworthiness of his word.

32–33 After the solemn invocation of v.31, the account of a nocturnal escape from Damascus might seem trivial and out of place. Why he mentions it here is not altogether clear; he is most likely recalling the first attempt on his life, one that was a significant reversal from his former life as persecutor (Ac 9:1–2). This episode forms a suitable backdrop for what follows: an embarrassing descent to escape the hands of people and then an exhilarating ascent into the presence of God (12:2–4).

Aretas IV, the father-in-law of Herod Antipas, ruled over the kingdom of the Nabataean Arabs from c. 9 B.C. to A.D. 40. Why did he or the governor in Damascus want to arrest Paul? Probably because Aretas had been offended by Paul's evangelistic activity in his kingdom (Gal 1:17). It is unlikely that Paul's sojourn in Arabia was simply a spiritual retreat, for Luke mentions that immediately after Paul's conversion he began to dispute in the synagogues of Damascus (Ac 9:20; see also Gal 1:22–23).

Luke's account of Paul's escape (Ac 9:23–25) reveals that the Jews were watching the gates in order to kill Paul; yet here we are told that the governor under King Aretas was guarding the city in order to arrest Paul. What was the relation between the Jews and the governor? Since it seems likely that Damascus was still under Roman rule, the governor was probably the head of a semi-autonomous colony of Nabataeans in Damascus. According to this view, a coalition of Jews and Nabataeans, acting through the governor, was trying to arrest and kill Paul. But it is possible that the Jews were watching for Paul inside the walls and the Nabataeans outside. What stands out, of course, is his providential deliverance.

4. A vision and its aftermath (12:1–10)

1 Once again Paul stresses that in this matter of boasting he has had no choice (see comments on 11:1–6). He feels forced to break a fourteen-year silence (v.2) and boast about a vision the Lord had given him. This will not edify the church or gain anything for him personally, but the Corinthians will see that he was not outmatched by his rivals in an important area of their boasting.

If Paul intended to distinguish between "visions" (GK 3965) and "revelations" (GK 637), then a vision is always seen, whereas a revelation may be either seen or perceived in some other way; i.e., all visions are also revelations, but not all revelations come through visions. From Acts it is clear that Paul frequently had visions (Acts 9:12; 16:9–10; 18:9–10; 22:17–21; 23:11; et al.).

2–4 None of the visions recorded in Acts can be identified with the one related here, since it occurred fourteen years before the time of writing—i.e., during the ten so-called "silent years" (A.D. 35–45) that Paul spent in Syria and Cilicia (Gal 1:21).

Paul's expression "a man in Christ" refers to himself. How do we know? (1) He knew the exact time the revelation took place (v.2) and that its content was beyond words, even if it were permissible to try to communicate it (v.4). (2) The revelation was directly related to the receipt of a "thorn," which was given to Paul (v.7). (3) Paul would not likely feel embarrassment (cf. v.1) about boasting on another person's behalf (cf. v.5a). (4) For Paul to relate a remarkable experience that happened to someone unknown to the Corinthians would scarcely fit the context.

The scene of the vision was the "hidden Paradise" of Jewish thought—the abode of the righteous dead that is here located within the third heaven. If Paul was quite certain of the location of the vision, he was uncertain about whether the experience happened to him in his body or apart from it (vv.2b, 3b). Consciousness of God totally eclipsed any awareness of the physical world of space and time.

What Paul heard (and saw?), human words were inadequate to relate (v.4b). Furthermore, he was not permitted to try to share the content of the revelation, perhaps because it had been designed for him alone, to fortify him for future service and sufferings (Ac 9:16; Ro 8:18). Glimpses the NT does give of the coming glory are intended to strengthen faith and promote holiness (cf. 2Pe 3:10–14; 1Jn 3:2–3), not satisfy curiosity.

5–6 The remarkable contrast between Paul and the certain "man in Christ" (v.2) comes into even sharper relief in v.5 and naturally prompts the question: If Paul is speaking of himself in vv.2–4, why does he speak about his experience in the third person? (1) He was clearly embarrassed at needing to boast at all (v.1). (2) He wished to avoid suggesting that he was in any sense a special kind of Christian. The revelation was given him as "a man in Christ"; the initiative had been not his but God's. (3) Although Paul recognized the honor involved in being the recipient of a vision, he wanted to dispel any idea that it added to his personal status or importance.

Concerning himself as a man in Christ who had received a special revelation, Paul was prepared to boast if circumstances demanded it. But concerning himself as a man of action and accomplishment, he refused to boast at all. Only experiences that showed his "weakness" (GK 819) he considered suitable material for any personal boasting (v.5). If, however, anyone asserted that Paul had not done anything worth boasting about, he adds a word of defense (v.6). If he were to boast of his strengths or things that were not inexpressible, he would not appear as some fool who was priding himself on imagined glories. Rather, he would be speaking truth. He had every reason to boast, but he refrains because he wanted the Corinthians' estimate of himself to be based on their recollection of his personal credentials (cf. 5:11b; 12:12). All this suggests that his rivals may have been boasting about imaginary visions or about exploits.

7 Others might be tempted, "because of these surpassingly great revelations" (v.7) accorded to Paul, to form an estimate of him that outstripped the evidence (v.6b). But he himself was in no such danger. For to keep him from becoming conceited there "was given" him a thorn in his flesh. Two inferences are fair. (1) The agent in the passive verb "was given" is God; he had given the "thorn" to Paul to achieve a beneficial purpose—the prevention of spiritual conceit (v.8). (2) The thorn was given immediately or shortly after the vision described in vv.2–4.

The efforts to identify Paul's "thorn" are legion. But paucity of information and the obscurity of Paul's language have frustrated all attempts to solve this problem. As it is, countless believers have been helped by this reference to his "thorn" to cope with "thorns" of their own.

It is remarkable that Paul could regard his affliction as given by God and yet be "a messenger of Satan." This may support the view that the affliction was some type of physical malady, for a recurrent and tormenting illness could be considered "a messenger of Satan" (cf. 1Co 5:5; 11:30; also Lk 13:16). Furthermore, a severe illness could bring Paul within the shadow of death (cf. 2Co 1:8–9) or hinder the advance of the Gospel. Be that as it may, behind all machinations of Satan, Paul discerned the overarching providence of a God who perpetually created good out of evil.

8 The "thorn" proved so tormenting to Paul that on three separate occasions he begged the Lord (Jesus) to remove it. In the NT, formal or liturgical prayer was customarily offered through Christ to the Father in the Spirit (Eph 2:18), but on occasion an individual (Ac 7:59) or a group (Ac 1:24) invoked the Lord Jesus directly.

9–10 The answer to Paul's prayer did not take the form he had expected. The thorn remained, but so did his recollection of the divine reply. In the distress inflicted at various times by his ailment, God promised that Paul would never lack sufficient grace to overcome it (cf. Ro 8:35–37). This grace of Christ (13:11) was adequate for him precisely because divine power finds its full scope and strength only in human weakness—the greater the Christian's acknowledged weakness, the more evident Christ's enabling strength (cf. Eph 3:16; Php 4:13). The cross of Christ forms the supreme example of "power-in-weakness" (see 13:4).

With this spiritual lesson well learned, Paul indicates he would prefer to boast about the sorts of things that exposed his weakness rather than to pray for the removal of the thorn. It was not, however, in the weaknesses themselves that Paul took delight but in the opportunity that such sufferings endured "for Christ's sake" afforded him for Christ's power to be effective in his life.

5. Proof of apostleship (12:11–13)

11 His boasting as a fool now virtually over, Paul again reiterates that it had been by coercion. It was not really the foolish boasting of his opponents that had driven him to boast but the folly of the Corinthians in heeding the boasting of his opponents. If any Christian community was qualified to write Paul's testimonial, it was the Corinthian church. Yet they had remained silent, forcing Paul to speak up. His action had been excusable, but not theirs.

They had every good reason to commend him, for, as they well knew, he was "not in the least inferior to the 'super-apostles' " at Jerusalem (see comment on 11:5). "Even though I am nothing" is either an ironical citation of his opponents' opinion of him or a serious disavowal of any personal merit that could have made him worthy of apostleship (cf. 1Co 15:8–10).

Words of Jesus Not Found in the Gospels

Passage	Description
Acts 1:4–5, 7–8	Jesus' words to his disciples shortly before his ascension
Acts 9:4–5; 22:7–8, 10, 18, 21; 26:14–18	Jesus' words to Paul at the time of his conversion
Acts 9:11–12, 15–16	Jesus' words to Ananias at the time of Paul's conversion
Acts 11:7, 9	Jesus' words to Peter in Joppa
Acts 11:16	Peter recalls Jesus' words about John the Baptist
Acts 18:9–10	Words of encouragement to Paul in Corinth
Acts 20:35	Saying of Jesus: "It is more blessed to give than to receive."
Acts 23:11	Words of encouragement to Paul imprisoned in Jerusalem
1Co 11:24–25	Record of Jesus' words about the Lord's Supper in the Upper Room
2Co 12:9	Jesus' words regarding Paul's thorn in the flesh
Rev 1:8, 11–12, 17–20	Jesus' words to John in exile on Patmos
Rev 2:1—3:22	Jesus' message to the seven church in Asia Minor
Rev 4:1	Jesus invites John to see visions of the last things.
Rev 16:15	Jesus' promise to return "like a thief"
Rev 22:7, 12–16, 20	Jesus' promise, "I am coming soon!"

12 Paul gently reminds his converts of certain characteristics of his ministry at Corinth that proved he was a genuine apostle. "Signs, wonders and miracles" (GK 4956, 5469, & 1539) does not describe three types of miracles but considers them from three aspects—their ability to authenticate the message, evoke awe, and display divine power. These, of course, were not the only marks of apostleship, for there was also faithfulness to the apostolic message (11:4) and conduct consonant with the example of Christ (10:1; 13:14), especially "great perseverance" in the face of opposition (for Corinth, cf. Ac 18:6, 9–10, 12–16). By using the passive voice in "were done," Paul disowns any credit for the supernatural signs accompanying his ministry.

13 Again indulging in gentle irony, Paul observes that the only respect in which the marks of an apostle were not evident in the apostolic church of Corinth was that of support. He never was a financial burden to them—an injustice for which he playfully pleads forgiveness! As in 1Co 9:1–18 and 2Co 11:5–12, Paul has moved naturally from a consideration of the signs of apostleship (vv.11–12) to the issue of apostolic rights, particularly support from the church or churches being served.

C. The Planned Third Visit (12:14–13:10)

1. A promise not to be burdensome (12:14–18)

14–15 The apostle announces that his third visit to Corinth is imminent and that his policy regarding support will not be altered. He is determined always to be financially independent of the Corinthians (cf. 1Co 9:15; 2Co 11:9, 12); they will have to continue bearing the "injury" he is inflicting on them (cf. v.13)! His affections were set on the Corinthians themselves (cf. 6:11–12; 7:2–3), not on their money. He craved their reciprocated love (6:13; 12:15b), their Christian maturity (cf. 1Co 3:1–4; Col 1:28–29), and their exclusive devotion to Christ (11:2–3).

In defense of this refusal to accept support, Paul appeals to the self-evident truth that it is not the responsibility of children to save up and provide for their parents, but only parents for children. The principle, however, is not universally applicable, for Paul had earlier defended the right of apostles to be supported by their spiritual children (1Co 9:3–11), and he later asserted, "If anyone does not provide for his relatives, and especially for his immediate family, he has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever" (1Ti 5:8).

Far from coveting the Corinthians' property, Paul planned to use all his own resources to achieve their highest good; he would spare nothing in his efforts to win their affection for Christ (cf. Ac 20:24). Yet he looked for a fair exchange (cf. 6:13): "If I love you more [intensely], will you love me less?" There may be an actual comparison here. If Paul's love for the Corinthians exceeded the love of a father for his children, how could they love him less than children love their father? In other words, Paul is seeking a response of filial love to his paternal affection (cf. 11:11).

16–18 Whether or not the Corinthians loved Paul the less for his intense love for them, all had to agree that he himself had not proved a financial strain on the church. Yet the rumor had circulated at Corinth that because Paul was unscrupulous by nature, he was exploiting the church's generosity and trying to gain surreptitiously through his agents what he had declined to accept personally. What Paul almost certainly has in mind here is the collection for the poor at Jerusalem, which some charged was a convenient way to fulfill his covert wish to live at the church's expense.

Since Paul knew the charge had been maliciously made and was couched in general terms, he refutes it first by indirectly appealing to the Corinthians to adduce specific evidence (v.17) and then by referring to a particular occasion on which his chief agent had been sent to Corinth on a mission involving finance (v.18a). If Titus was guiltless, so too was Paul, for all their conduct had been governed by the same principles (v.18b). Which visit of Titus does Paul refer to? Either the visit alluded to in 8:6a, when he commenced the collection, or the visit mentioned in 8:16–24 when he completed the collection.

2. Fears about the unrepentant (12:19–21)

19 Paul repudiates the suggestion, which might readily have occurred to any Corinthian, that he had all along been seeking to defend his conduct and reputation before a panel of Corinthian judges. It was to God, not to them, that Paul felt he was ultimately accountable (cf. Ro 14:10; 1Co 4:3–5; 2Co 5:10), so that self-defense before human beings was never his primary concern. He had been speaking as a man "in Christ" whose words and motives were open before God (cf. 2:17; 5:11). His aim in all his relations with the Corinthians was not personal vindication but their spiritual edification.

20–21 Paul expresses a threefold apprehension that the present letter might not be wholly successful and that the Corinthians, by harboring Judaizing intruders and persisting in sin, would contribute to weakening, not consolidating, their church fellowship. (1) Paul was concerned about the outcome of his impending visit to the Corinthians (v.20a). Would they be mutually disappointed and embarrassed—Paul by the church's questioning of his apostleship and their refusal to break with sins of the spirit (v.20b) and of the flesh (v.21b), and the Corinthians by Paul's vigorous exercise of church discipline (cf. 1Co 4:21; 5:3–5)?

(2) The apostle is fearful that the sins that seemed endemic to Corinth (cf. 1Co 1:11–12, 31; 3:3; 4:6; 5:2, 11; 8:1; 11:18; 14:33, 40) should still be rife as a consequence of the unrest and disorder created by the Palestinian intruders (v.20b).

(3) Finally, Paul fears a repetition of humiliation under God's hand that he had experienced on his second visit—i.e., the "painful visit" (2:1). Any future humiliation would stem from his acute disappointment at the Corinthians' preference for domineering false apostles (11:20) and their supercilious attitude toward him (cf. 1Co 4:18–19), as well as from his grief over those who had consistently rejected his call to holiness and were continuing unrepentant in their earlier gross sexual sins.

3. Warning of impending discipline (13:1–4)

1–2 After expressing his personal fears about the forthcoming third visit (12:20–21), Paul issues two direct warnings relative to this issue: "Every matter must be established by the testimony of two or three witnesses" (v.1), and "On my return I will not spare those who sinned earlier or any of the others" (v.2).

What are the "two or three witnesses"? Some believe Paul is referring to his three comings to Corinth (two actual, one promised) as three separate witnesses at whose testimony justice would certainly fall on the dissidents at Corinth. Another possible view sees a reference to the threefold warning that Paul would not spare the Corinthians: the first was either 1Co 4:21 or the warning given on the "painful visit"; the second is the warning given here; and the final one is the proposed third visit. In any case, the general import is clear: "Sufficient warning has been given; punishment is imminent."

"Those who sinned earlier" are the immoral persons of 12:21b who did not repent during Paul's "painful visit" and were evidently still indulging in their sexual sins. "The others" are probably those Corinthians who had been adversely influenced by the false apostles and were arrogantly fomenting unrest within the church (12:20b). Both groups receive their final warning here. If they remained unrepentant, he would be harsh in his use of authority (cf. v.10; cf. 1Co 5:5).

3 It seemed as if in their immaturity the Corinthians were unimpressed by Christlike gentleness and meekness (10:1) but were overawed by arbitrary displays of power (11:20). In their misguided judgment, Paul's gentle demeanor raised doubts about his claim to apostolic authority; he had to give them some proof that Christ in his resurrection power was speaking through him. His reply was that, though he had previously been "weak" in the Corinthian estimation (10:1, 10), his impending severity would provide sufficient proof that he was a spokesman of Christ and that Christ was powerful among them. The Corinthians had in effect challenged Christ, who would not disappoint them as he exhibited his resurrection power through his apostle.

4 The relationship between Christ and Paul with regard to weakness and power is now clarified. Jesus Christ was crucified because of "weakness" (GK 819); this weakness was not physical frailty or moral impotence, but the "weakness" of nonretaliation and the "weakness" of obedience to God. Christ's "weakness" in assuming the poverty of earthly existence (8:9) and in humbling himself and becoming obedient even to death on a cross (Php 2:8) was, however, the most perfect evidence of strength. But that "weakness" of Christ is past. Now he lives a resurrection life sustained by God's power, "the Spirit of holiness" (Ro 1:4).

As a result of being in Christ, Paul shared in the weakness of his crucified Master (cf. 12:7–10). As a result of his fellowship with Christ, he shared in the mighty power of his risen Lord, a power imparted by God. From a human standpoint, the nonassertiveness that had marked Paul's conduct on his second visit to Corinth (cf. 10:1, 10) was simply weakness. But on his forthcoming visit, God's power would be vigorously displayed through him in his dealings with the Corinthians.

4. A plea for self-examination (13:5–10)

5–6 Rather than demanding proof that Christ was speaking through Paul (v.3), the Corinthians ought to be examining themselves. Paul asks in effect: "Don't you know yourselves sufficiently well to recognize that Christ Jesus lives within each of you [cf. Ro 8:9] and that therefore you are in the faith?" Although for the sake of emphasis he adds "unless, of course, you fail the test," he does not really believe the Corinthians are counterfeit, and he knows that no Corinthian is likely to form such a conclusion about himself or herself.

To Paul, the Corinthians' belief in the genuineness of their faith carried with it the proof of the genuineness of Paul's apostleship and Gospel, for he had become their father in Christ Jesus (1Co 4:15). As men and women in Christ they themselves formed the verification of his credentials (cf. 2Co 3:2–3). Only if they doubted their own salvation should they doubt Paul's claim to be a true "apostle of Christ Jesus" (1:1). If they did not fail the test, then neither did he.

7 Once again (cf. 3:1; 5:12; 12:19) Paul anticipates and answers the objection that he had been commending or defending himself. His chief desire and his prayer to God were not for his vindication (though he was concerned about this, v.6) but for their avoidance of wrongdoing, including especially the refusal to repent of sin (12:20–21) and to repudiate the visitors from Palestine. It would be better that the Corinthians did what they knew to be good and right, even if this were to place Paul seemingly in the wrong, than that they should do something wrong. Paul did not expect to be shown up as counterfeit, but even such a price would be worth paying if it guaranteed that the Corinthians would do good (cf. Ro 9:3).

8 This verse, which reads like a proverb, bears one of two meanings in this context. (1) Paul's concern was that truth, especially the truth of the Gospel (cf. 4:2; 6:7), should prevail at all costs—even if it were to involve his exposure as a false apostle and counterfeit Christian (vv.6–7). (2) Paul did not need to exercise his apostolic authority where "truth" already existed, but was able and willing, if necessary, to act decisively to establish "truth," i.e., to restore the Corinthians to wholeness (v.9b).

9–10 Paul's sole concern was to further and consolidate the truth of the Gospel (cf. 1Co 9:16). Thus he was happy whenever his converts gave evidence of robust and mature Christian character. If the Corinthians were strong in Christ, he would not have to use his apostolic authority harshly but could come to them in the "weakness" of a "gentle spirit" (1Co 4:21). Such "weakness" as a result of "strength" on their part would make him rejoice. In fact, his prayer was precisely for the restoration of the Corinthians to spiritual strength and wholeness (cf. v.11; 1Co 1:10; Gal 6:1).

If 12:20–21 expresses Paul's fears about what he would find at Corinth on his arrival, 13:10 indicates his hope in this regard. But even here a veiled warning is registered. While the Lord had not invested Paul with apostolic authority primarily for the negative work of tearing down, if destruction had to be done before the positive task of construction, it would be reluctantly undertaken—and with the same authority (cf. 10:8).

Was Paul's final visit to Corinth actually an unpleasant one? Though direct evidence is lacking, we have several indications that it was not unsuccessful. (1) During the visit (which lasted three months; cf. Ac 20:2–3) he wrote the Epistle to the Romans. This letter betrays some apprehension for the future (Ro 15:30–31) but none for the present. (2) Paul would hardly have planned to visit Rome and then do pioneer evangelism in the west (Ro 15:24, 28), if the church in the city from which he was writing was in a state of disorder and disloyalty (cf. comments on 2Co 10:15–16). (3) It is clear from Ro 15:26–27 that the Corinthians heeded Paul's appeal in 2Co 8–9 and completed their collection for the saints at Jerusalem. Twice Paul notes that they "were pleased" to contribute, scarcely an appropriate description unless the church in Corinth was in harmony with the promoter of the collection. (4) The very preservation of this letter argues in favor of the success of the visit promised in it.

D. Conclusion (13:11–14)

11 Paul closes with several general instructions. He wants the Corinthian believers to strive to achieve that perfection for which Paul himself was praying (v.9b). They are to heed his "appeals"—for a break with all idolatry (6:14–7:1), for warm hospitality to be shown the three delegates, for a generous and prompt contribution to the Jerusalem relief fund (chs. 8–9), and for a changed attitude toward him (chs. 10–13). They are also to agree in the Lord (cf. 1Co 1:10; Php 4:2) and live in peace without divided loyalties (11:2–3; 12:20).

The second part of this verse has two possible senses. If Paul is stressing love and peace as characteristics of God (cf. Ro 5:8; 1Co 14:33), the meaning will be: "[If you] aim for perfection, etc., then the God of love and peace will be with you" (cf. Php 4:9). But if love and peace are here viewed as God's gifts (cf. Php 4:7), Paul is indicating the divine resources that will enable the Corinthians to follow his injunctions.

12 Evidently the early church invested the kiss, a common form of salutation in the Orient, with a special and sacred significance (cf. Ro 16:16; 1Co 16:20; 1Th 5:26; 1Pe 5:14). It expressed union and fellowship within the one family of God, and perhaps it was also a sign of mutual forgiveness and reconciliation that was exchanged before the Lord's Supper was celebrated (cf. 1Co 16:20b, 22).

13 The "saints" referred to may well be the Philippians, but they could be the Thessalonians or Bereans, depending on the place where Paul was when he wrote this letter. Like the holy kiss, this epistolary greeting expressed unity within the one body of Christ.

14 Paul grounds his pastoral appeal for unity of spirit and for the rejection of discord (vv.11–12) in the theological doctrine of the Trinity. The "grace" (GK 5921) of Christ banishes self-assertiveness and self-seeking, the "love" (GK 27) of God puts jealousy and anger to flight, while the "fellowship" (GK 3126) created by the Spirit leaves no room for quarreling and factions (cf. 12:21).

This embryonic Trinitarian formulation is noteworthy for the unusual order of Son, Father, and Holy Spirit. It is through the grace shown by Christ (8:9) in living and dying for humankind that God demonstrates his love (Ro 5:8) and the Spirit creates fellowship (Eph 4:3). This order also reflects Christian experience.

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
2Co 3013	Ex 34:33, 35	Veil of Moses
2Co 4:6	Ge 1:3	Creation of light
2Co 4:13	Ps 116:10	Faith and speech
2Co 6:2	Isa 49:8	God's day of salvation
2Co 6:16	Lev 26:11–12; Eze 37:27	God living with us
2Co 6:16	Jer 32:38	God and his people
2Co 6:17	Eze 20:41	Separate from the world
2Co 6:17	Isa 52:11	Touch no unclean thing
2Co 6:18	2Sa 7:14	Father and son
2Co 8:15	Ex 16:18	God provides enough
2Co 9:9	Ps 112:9	Gifts for the poor
2Co 10:17	Jer 9:24	Boasting in the Lord
2Co 13:1	Dt 19:15	Two or three witnesses

Galatians

INTRODUCTION

Not many books have made such a lasting impression on human minds as Paul's letter to the Galatians, nor have many done so much to shape the history of the Western world. This letter has been called the "Magna Carta of Christian liberty," for it maintains that only through the grace of God received through faith in Jesus Christ can a person escape the curse of sin and of the law and live a new life, not in bondage or license, but in a genuine freedom of mind and spirit through the power of God. This theme was the cornerstone of the Protestant Reformation. Luther especially loved Galatians, and in his hands it became a mighty weapon in the Reformation arsenal. The thesis of Galatians is no less important for our time.

1. The Historical Setting and Content of Galatians

In the decade or so surrounding the year A.D. 50, the infant church was drifting almost unnoticeably toward its first great doctrinal crisis. When the Gospel was being preached primarily to Jews by Jews, the development of the church progressed smoothly. But as the ambassadors of Christ pushed out into largely Gentile communities and the Gospel began to take root there, questions arose regarding a Christian's relationship to the law of Moses and to Judaism as a system. Was the church to open her doors wide to all comers, regardless of their relationship to the particularized traditions of Judaism? Or was she to be only an extension of Judaism to the Gentiles? In more particular terms, was it necessary for a Gentile believer to observe the law of Moses in order to become a Christian? Must a Gentile be circumcised?

Galatians is a record of the form this struggle took in one area of Asia Minor. But it is also a reflection of the way in which the issue was being debated and handled in Jerusalem and at Antioch in Syria. Acts supplements this information. Was it right for Gentile and Jewish Christians to have mutual fellowship by eating together? For a time, debate seemed to move in a direction destructive of Christian unity and of the survival of the Gospel of grace, but Paul almost singlehandedly withstood this trend and turned the tide. At Jerusalem the question was taken up formally in council, and Paul's approach was upheld (Ac 15:1–29).

As the apostle to the Gentiles, Paul deliberately did not bring up questions of conformity to Jewish law when presenting the Gospel in non-Jewish communities. He had followed this practice in Galatia on both occasions when he had preached there (cf. 4:13). To him, salvation is never to be achieved by conformity to rules and regulations, even if God-given, for law condemns. Consequently, salvation for sinners must come in another way—through Jesus Christ, who died for sin. Now God offers righteousness freely to all who put their trust in him.

Paul had taught this Gospel to the Galatians, and it had been well received. He had been detained in Galatia unexpectedly because of a repulsive illness, but instead of rebuffing him, the Galatians actually embraced both him and the Gospel willingly (4:13–15). These former pagans (4:8) were baptized (3:27) and received the Holy Spirit, who began to work miracles among them (3:5). After establishing churches in Galatia, Paul moved on.

Some time later, however, Paul received word that the Galatian believers were on the point of departing from the faith they had previously received so openly. Conservative Jewish teachers who were legalizers had arrived from Jerusalem claiming to be from James, the Lord's brother, and had begun to teach that Paul was wrong in his doctrine. They contended that Gentiles had to obey the law of Moses to be saved. To the grace of Christ must be added circumcision.

Paul was immediately filled with righteous indignation. He saw in a moment that if their views prevailed, grace and the cross of Jesus Christ would be emptied of all value

(5:2–4). Moreover, Christianity would soon lose its distinctive character and become little more than a minor sect of Judaism. Thus Paul wrote this letter to reprove legalism and regain the Galatian churches.

It is evident that Paul had heard of three distinct charges made by his Jewish opponents. (1) One was directed against Paul personally. He had been called by Christ as an apostle and had preached those doctrines that Christ had revealed to him. Now enemies were saying that he was not a genuine apostle and that the Gospel he preached had not been revealed by God. Paul had not lived with Jesus when Jesus was here on earth, as had the "true" apostles. He was not one of the Twelve. Actually, they asserted, he was merely an evangelist who, after he had received some knowledge of Christianity, turned to his own devices and, in order to please the Gentiles, taught an easy gospel opposed to that of the apostolic model (1:10). They said that Paul must teach as the disciples taught or be rejected.

Paul answers these accusations by retelling the story of his life, particularly as it was related to the other apostles (chs. 1–2). (a) His apostolic teaching is not dependent on other human authorities, for it came directly from God. (b) His authority had been acknowledged by the other apostles on each occasion on which they had come into contact. (c) He had proved his worth by remaining firm at Antioch when others, including even Peter and Barnabas, had wavered. Paul was therefore able to assert his own authority as an apostle without diminishing either the authority or reputation of those who were apostles before him.

(2) Another charge, closely related to the first, was that his Gospel was not the true gospel. Obviously, if Paul was a "false" apostle, his teaching could not be true teaching. He taught that the law could be set aside, but this was wrong, the legalizers said. God's law is eternal and it can never be set aside. All who have ever been saved have been saved by keeping the law. Moreover, it is perfectly evident from all that is known of the life of Jesus that Jesus himself kept the law. Who, then, was Paul to dismiss the requirements of the law for salvation?

Paul answers this charge by showing that the issue is not one of who does or does not keep the law, but rather of the true basis on which God reckons a sinful person righteous. At this point of his letter (chs. 3–4) Paul appeals both to the personal experience of the Galatians and to Scripture, showing, primarily from the case of Abraham, that God accounts a person righteous on the basis of faith rather than works. This imputed righteousness does not come from either the law or circumcision, for God had declared Abraham righteous on the basis of faith years before either was given.

(3) The opponents of Paul also charged that the Gospel he preached led to loose living. By stressing the law, Judaism had stressed morality. Jews looked down on Gentile sin and excesses. But what would happen if the law should be taken away? Clearly, lawlessness and immorality would increase, the legalizers argued.

Paul replies that this is not true (chs. 5–6). Christianity does not lead believers away from the law into nothingness. Rather, it leads them to Jesus Christ, who, in the person of the Holy Spirit, comes to live within them and furnishes them with a new nature that alone is capable of doing what God desires. The change is internal. So it is from within rather than without that the Holy Spirit produces the fruit that is "love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control" (5:22–23). Life in the Spirit is free from either legalism or license. It is true freedom—a freedom to serve God fully.

2. Who Were the Galatians?

There would seem to be few difficulties in relating a book with such a clear message to its time. But this is not true of Galatians. In fact, from the historian's point of view, few NT books contain so many problems. We do not know for certain when the letter was written, where it was written, or even (which is a more serious problem) to whom it was written. Each of these questions has been the subject of intense scholarly debate.

The word "Galatians" has two basic meanings. It has an ethnic meaning. The first people who became known as Galatians came from the barbarian tribe known in France as the Gauls, some of whom had invaded Macedonia and later northern Asia Minor (third century B.C.). Their region became known as Galatia; its principal cities were Ancyra, Pessinus, and Tavium.

The second meaning is a political one. The Romans conquered the Galatians in 189 B.C., though they were permitted to maintain much of their independence and to be governed in part by their own princes. This system worked so well that in 25 B.C., their territory was incorporated into a much larger Roman province to which the old ethnic name, Galatia, was extended. This province contained the districts of Lycaonia and Isauria as well as portions of Pisidia and Phrygia. In particular, the cities of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Derbe and Lystra—cities Paul visited on his first missionary journey—belonged to it.

To the Christians in which of these two areas did Paul write? Or, to state the question another way, in what sense does Paul use the name "Galatia"? Until the eighteenth century, no commentator ever seriously disputed the idea that Paul's letter was written to Christians living in northern (ethnic) Galatia, even though Acts does not record Paul's having founded churches in this area (but cf. Ac 16:6; 18:23). In the last century, however, beginning with William Ramsay, scholars questioned whether Paul ever visited northern Galatia at all and argued that he wrote this letter to Christians in the southern area of the Roman province, i.e., to Christians living in those cities Paul had visited on his first missionary journey. A number of impressive arguments were raised in support of this position (the south Galatia theory).

1. According to Acts, Paul did have a missionary journey in southern Galatia. Since he tended to go where there were major cities and since ethnic Galatia had few such cities, it seems unlikely that Paul did mission work there. Furthermore, during his second missionary journey, after revisiting churches in southern Galatia, Paul, Silas, and Timothy headed north but were forbidden by the Holy Spirit to preach either in Asia to the south or Bithynia to the north (Ac 16:6–7). Thus they ended up in Troas, where they encountered an open door before them into Greece. On this journey they would have had to take a most unlikely detour of about three hundred miles over rugged terrain to get to ethnic Galatia and preach there. If Paul did in fact establish a series of important churches in north Galatia, it would be unusual for Luke to neglect to say so.

2. Paul in his letters tends to use provincial, not ethnic, names—e.g., Macedonia (2Co 8:1), Asia (1Co 16:19), and Achaia (2Co 1:1). He also speaks of Judea, Syria, and Cilicia, but never of Lycaonia, Pisidia, Mysia, and Lydia (which are not names of Roman provinces). Thus the presumption that he is using the political rather than the ethnic meaning for Galatia is strong.

3. We know of no churches at all in northern Asia Minor at this early date, either mentioned in the NT or outside it, and what information we do have seems to point to the establishing of churches much later than Paul's time. By contrast, we do have a record of the founding of the strong, important churches of the southern region, into which all that Paul tells us about his initial preaching to the Galatians fits nicely.

4. It is more natural to suppose that the legalistic party would have pursued Paul first in the southern region of Galatia, where Paul had early established churches, than that they bypassed these bastions of "Paulinism" in order to push north to less important strongholds. We know from Acts that Paul did meet with Jewish opposition in southern Galatia. It seems most natural, therefore, that the legalists would first go there if Jews in any sizeable number were turning from Judaism to Christianity.

5. In writing to the Galatians, Paul mentions Barnabas several times without bothering to explain who he is (2:1, 9, 13), so presumably he is known to the Galatians. Since Barnabas accompanied Paul only on the first missionary journey, to southern Galatia, nothing but an identification of the Galatians with Christians in the cities of the south seems possible.

6. Paul argues that he did not give place to the legalizers at the council in Jerusalem even for an hour, so that "the truth of the gospel might remain with you [i.e., with the Galatians]." In other words, Paul must already have preached to the Galatians by the time of the conference, i.e., on his first missionary journey, which involved southern (but not northern) Galatia.

While the south Galatia theory has captured the attention of a majority of scholars today (and that is the position adopted in this commentary), there still are those who hold to a north Galatia theory. Their arguments are as follows:

1. Luke never refers to those living in the cities of Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Pisidian Antioch as Galatians when he describes Paul's work there. It is strange to think that he is not, therefore, still using geographical terminology when he refers to Paul passing through Galatia in Ac 16:6–7.

2. Paul assumes in his letter that all, or at least most, of the Galatians are Gentiles. This does not seem to fit conditions in the south, which had a large Jewish population. Moreover, if the churches of Galatia contained many Jews, it is hard to see how a later drifting into Judaism by Paul's converts could have occurred, particularly in a manner that seems to have surprised him. The issue of a Christian's relationship to the law of Moses would certainly have had to be faced from the start.

3. Paul's account of his work in Galatia does not tally with what Luke tells us of Paul's work in Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch; for example, there is no reference to his illness (Gal 4:13). So Paul must be speaking of another area.

In spite of these arguments, the weight of probability now lies on the side of the south Galatia hypothesis.

3. The Jerusalem Council

Another problem is which visit to Jerusalem Paul is referring to in 2:1–10. In Acts, Luke records three visits of Paul to Jerusalem prior to his final visit in Ac 21:17ff.: a visit shortly after his conversion (Ac 9:26–30), a "famine visit" (Ac 11:27–30), and a visit for the church council that decided the issue of Gentile adherence to the law (Ac 15). Paul, however, records only two visits to Jerusalem, the second of which seems to fit better with Luke's third visit than with the second. Consequently we must either identify Paul's second visit with Luke's second (with obvious difficulties involved) or with Luke's third—and then explain why Paul neglected to mention the second in writing to the Galatians. On the surface this neglect is difficult to understand, simply because Paul seems to be chronicling all contacts with the Jerusalem apostles in order to refute the charges of the legalizers.

In the opinion of this writer, the case for identifying the Jerusalem visit of Gal 2:1–10 with the council meeting of Ac 15 is strongest, above all because of the striking coincidence of circumstances. In both accounts, communications take place between Jerusalem and Antioch. The false brethren have their headquarters in the first city but cause trouble in the second. Also, in both accounts, Paul and Barnabas apparently go to Jerusalem from Antioch and return to Antioch after the council. The participants at the council are the same: the legalizers who are causing the trouble, Paul and Barnabas who represent the church at Antioch, and the Jerusalem apostles, primarily Peter and James. The subject of dispute is the same. Finally, the results are essentially the same, for in each case, the victory goes to Paul.

There are, however, obvious difficulties in linking Gal 2 with Ac 15. First, there are apparent discrepancies. Acts gives the impression that Paul and Barnabas presented their case publicly before an assembled council of apostles and elders, but Galatians tells of a private meeting in which the dispute seems to be resolved between a small group of those who were considered leaders. Galatians says Titus accompanied Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem, while Acts does not mention Titus. Finally, in Galatians Paul writes that he and Barnabas went up to Jerusalem by revelation, whereas in Acts Luke indicates that they were delegated by the leaders of the church in Antioch.

Although discrepancies should not be passed over lightly, it is not difficult to see how they may be resolved. Every great public meeting is accompanied by private meetings. Titus is not mentioned by Luke because he did not become an issue, which is precisely the point Paul makes in Galatians (Gal 2:3). And concerning how Paul was sent to Jerusalem, a "revelation" is simply an alternate way of telling what happened, since the church at Antioch undoubtedly prayed about who their representatives should be and believed that they were responding to God in commissioning Paul and Barnabas.

More serious is the failure of Paul to mention the decrees of the council. Wouldn't he have appealed to the council if, at the time of writing Galatians, he held such a trump card in his hand? Not necessarily. First, the decrees were not as significant as this line of arguing implies. They were addressed to "the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia" to start with, not to Gentiles throughout the whole Roman world. Second, the decrees were a compromise. They freed the Gentiles from adherence to the law, but they added certain restrictions for conscience' sake. Paul could very well have agreed with the decrees at the time they were devised but later, when writing to the Galatians, considered the restrictions a dangerous concession likely to be misunderstood. Finally, in quoting the decrees Paul would seem to be conceding the very thing his enemies were insisting on—i.e., the authority of the Jerusalem apostles as greater than his own. In any case, Paul shows that the other apostles did agree with him regarding circumcision and actually supported him.

But if Gal 2:1–10 refers to the council of Ac 15, why does Paul not mention the famine visit of Ac 11? It is impossible to say exactly why, but there may be an explanation in the historical circumstances. The time of the famine visit was a time of turmoil and political agitation against the apostles, in which James the son of Zebedee was killed by Herod and Peter was imprisoned (Ac 12). Because of that, it seems likely that every Christian of any rank had fled the city. In fact, Luke mentions that the money for famine relief was delivered into the hands of "the elders," not the apostles. Furthermore, that dangerous time was not an opportune occasion for discussing so momentous an issue as Gentile adherence to the law and to circumcision.

Finally, one should note that Paul's main goal in Galatians is not giving a full account of all his activities but answering specific criticisms directed against him by the legalizers. The first criticism is that he got his Gospel from others; Paul answers this by showing that in the early years he was not influenced by the Jerusalem apostles at all—either before, during, or after his conversion (see ch. 1). On the other hand, Paul was not preaching something different from the Gospel preached by the other apostles, as the legalists had also maintained (see ch. 2). Neither of these issues was relevant in the famine visit.

4. Date and Authorship

Adopting the south Galatia theory and the identity of Gal 2:1–10 and Ac 15, the earliest the letter could have been written is A.D. 49 (the date for the council in Jerusalem). Since Paul does not appear to be in prison while writing this letter, the latest date it could have been written is A.D. 58, when he was arrested in Jerusalem. Within these limits there are roughly eight or nine years in which Paul made two missionary journeys and during which the letter could have been written. This range can be narrowed somewhat by assuming that Paul had visited the Galatians twice before writing to them, once on the first missionary journey and once as he was setting out on the second (cf. Gal 4:13); in that case, Galatians must have been written after Paul's arrival at Corinth on his second journey (A.D. 50).

Galatians has almost universally been accepted as a genuine letter of Paul. He is mentioned as the author in 1:1 and in 5:2, and the entire letter from beginning to end breathes such an intensely personal autobiographical tone that only a genuine historical situation involving the true founder of the Gentile mission within the church accounts for it. Since very early in the history of the church, Galatians was included in canonical lists as a letter of Paul.

EXPOSITION

Introduction (1:1–10)

A. Salutation (1:1–5)

Most ancient letters, Paul's included, opened with a salutation containing the author's name, the name of those to whom he is writing, and an expression of good wishes. But Paul's opening remarks also generally breathe something of the content and tone of the letter or, at the very least, employ explicitly Christian terms as greetings. Galatians follows this pattern, beginning with the writer's name, the name of the recipients, and a wish for grace and peace on their behalf. But there are a brevity and vigor of expression that immediately plunge the reader into the heart of the letter, reflecting Paul's concern. Most surprisingly, there is no expression of praise for these churches, a normal procedure in his other letters. In these few verses the three major themes of the letter—the source of his authority, the doctrine of grace, and the promise of full deliverance from sin's power—are tied together in a way that relates all to the sovereign and gracious will of God.

1 By adding the word "apostle" (GK 693) Paul at once highlights his claim to be commissioned by Jesus to preach the Gospel with authority and to plant Christianity. It was this commission that was being challenged by the Galatian legalizers. Greek-speaking Jews had used the word "apostle" for authorized representatives. With the coming of Christ, Christians applied it to those commissioned by Christ as authoritative bearers of the Gospel.

It would seem from Ac 1:21–26 that two major prerequisites for being an apostle were: (1) to have been an eyewitness of Christ's ministry from the time of the baptism by John up to and including the resurrection, and (2) to have been chosen for the office by the risen Lord. At first the number of those so commissioned was twelve (Matthias was chosen to replace Judas), but there is no indication either in Acts or elsewhere that the number was always so limited. Paul obviously claimed to have fulfilled the conditions as the result of his Damascus experience; and Luke, who clearly endorses Paul's claim, also speaks of Barnabas as having this office (cf. also James, the Lord's brother, implied in 1Co 15:7; Silas and Timothy in 1Th 2:7, cf. 1:1).

The difficulty that Paul's enemies saw was not in the number twelve, but rather that Paul did not meet the proper conditions. They could claim that he had never met Jesus, and he had certainly had not been an eyewitness of Christ's ministry. They could claim too that he had never received a commission, at least not like the formal and official action when Matthias was chosen. Paul answered by entirely overlooking the matter of his not being an eyewitness of Christ's earthly ministry, though undoubtedly he considered his Damascus experience to be the equivalent of this, and by denying that his status required a human decision. Instead, Paul claimed that his apostleship came to him directly from and through God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ in his experience on the Damascus road. His reference to the resurrection stresses the important point that it was the risen and glorified Lord of the church who commissioned him.

2 From Paul's normal habit of including the names of his fellow missionaries at the beginning of his letters, it would appear that "the brothers" mentioned here are his fellow missionaries, though their actual identity cannot be known for sure. The interesting point is that Paul does not name these fellow missionaries, as he does elsewhere, not wanting to give the impression that his Gospel requires additional support. It was, after all, received directly from God. At the same time, he wishes to remind the Galatians that the Gospel that had been preached to them, far from being a Pauline oddity, is actually the received doctrine of all the Christian church and its missionaries.

3 Paul's nearly standard formula of Christian blessing and greeting seems particularly appropriate at the start of this letter. Normally, Paul alters the traditional Greek greeting (chairein) to the important Christian word "grace" (charis; GK 5921). This is always striking, but it is doubly striking here, inasmuch as it occurs in a letter to churches where the sufficiency of salvation by grace was being questioned and perhaps even denied. In the same way, "peace" (eirene; GK 1645), the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew greeting shalom (GK 8934), is appropriate, for it denotes that state of favor and well-being into which people are brought by Christ's death on the cross and in which they are kept by God's persevering grace. To choose law, as the Galatians were doing, is to fall from grace. To live by works is to lose the peace with God that was purchased for believers by Christ's atonement (cf. Ro 5:1).

Paul characteristically joins the names of the Father and Son together in the statement that they are the source of grace and peace (cf. Jn 17:21). But inverting the order, as he does here (from v.1 to v.3), heightens the effect.

4 To the doctrines of the Christian faith already stated in germinal form—the source of authority in religion, the person and character of God, the divinity of Christ, the resurrection, grace, and peace—Paul now adds a statement affirming the substitutionary death of the Lord Jesus Christ and its outcome in delivering humankind from sin. All this, he asserts, is according to the "will" (GK 2525) of the Father. It is hard to imagine a statement better calculated to oppose any intrusion of human will or merits in the matter of attaining salvation. This phrase, unique here in Paul's greetings, is undoubtedly added for the sake of the erring Christians in Galatia.

Salvation that began in the eternal will of God (cf. Ro 9:16) led to the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, who died as a substitute for sinners. Paul then articulates the goal of his death: to "rescue us from the present evil age." The word "rescue" (GK 1975) implies a "rescue from the power of." Thus, it strikes the keynote of the latter, ethical section of the letter, beginning in ch. 5. Believers are not rescued out of the present evil world (though that will also be true eventually), but from the power of evil and the values of the present world-system through the power of the risen Christ within the Christian.

5 Paul does not usually include a doxology at the beginning of a letter, but the doxology here serves an important purpose. It sets the Gospel, centering in the preeminence of the Lord Jesus Christ and his work, above any human criticism or praise. The fact that the glory of God and the giving of glory to God will last forever contrasts markedly with "the present evil age," which is passing away (cf. 1Co 7:31; Eph 2:2–7).

B. The Reason for the Letter (1:6–9)

At this point Paul would normally introduce an expression of praise for the Christians of the church to which he is writing. Instead, there is an abrupt and indignant cry of astonishment at what seems to be happening among the Galatians. Paul had delivered to them the one Gospel of salvation by grace through faith in Jesus Christ, and they had received it. But now, according to reports that had come to him, he has reason to believe that the Christians of Galatia are turning from this Gospel to embrace something that was no gospel at all, but only legalism. Paul pronounces a judgment upon any who would pervert this one Gospel of salvation by grace.

6 The agitation Paul feels is shown by the tone and vocabulary of these verses. But his words also show why he is so stirred. (1) The Galatians are "deserting" (GK 3572) the one who had called them to faith in Christ Jesus. The Greek word used here can be used of military revolt as well as of a change of attitude. Their revolt was not the result of outside influences, but something they were freely doing to themselves. The only ray of hope is that they were still in the process of deserting and could possibly be reclaimed.

(2) There is a tragic personal element in the way Paul describes their desertion. They are not just departing from an idea or a movement but from a person, from God the Father who had called them to faith. Embracing legalism means rejecting God, because it means substituting a human being for God in one's life. It is noteworthy that once again Paul reiterates the true nature of the Gospel: (a) it is of God, who does the calling, and (b) it is of "grace" rather than of merit.

(3) Paul is also agitated because the Galatians were deserting God and the Christian faith "so quickly," that is, so soon after their conversion.

(4) By embracing legalism the Galatians have actually turned their back on the Gospel in order to embrace "a different gospel," which, however, does not even deserve to be called by that name.

7 Paul now wants to explain or correct his phrase, "a different gospel." If left without any comment, that phrase might suggest that there are various gospels from which a Christian may choose. This is the opposite of what Paul is saying. So he adds that actually there cannot be another Gospel besides the one that describes God's way of salvation in Christ. The Gospel is one, and any system of salvation that varies from it is counterfeit.

For the first time now Paul mentions the false teachers, though not by name, presumably because he does not want anyone to think his remarks were originating from a dislike of certain personalities rather than from concern for the truth. He objects to two aspects of the conduct of these teachers: (1) they were perverting the Gospel, and (2) they were troubling the church. These two always go together.

8 The logical objection to the message Paul had been preaching is that it was not actually the Gospel, but only the gospel of Paul. If that is so, then the Galatians must evaluate the source of the teaching they had received, taking into account that the legalizers were the official representatives of the Jerusalem apostles, while Paul was not. Paul wards off this accusation, arguing that ultimately the human source does not matter, nor would it matter even if the source were an "angelic" one. Satan can disguise himself as "an angel of light," as can his ministers (2Co 11:14–15). So the Galatians must learn to evaluate their teachers, and they must learn that any attempt to alter the true Gospel is culpable and that any who go about teaching another gospel will be condemned.

Paul vehemently denounces those who teach another gospel, using the strong word anathema (GK 356), a word semantically related to the Hebrew word herem (GK 3051) and used of that which is devoted to God, usually for destruction. In spiritual terms it means "damnation." Paul is not venting his anger here, for he is impartial in his judgment and mentions no names. He even includes himself in the ban, should he do otherwise in his preaching than he has done thus far. Moreover, he is universal in his judgment; his words include "anybody" who should so teach.

How can it be otherwise? If the Gospel Paul preaches is true, then both the glory of Jesus Christ and the salvation of the human race are at stake. If people can be saved by works, Christ has died in vain (Gal 2:21); the cross is emptied of meaning. If people are taught a false gospel, they are being led from the one thing that can turn them away from destruction (cf. Mt 18:6).

9 No doubt Paul repeats the anathema primarily for the sake of emphasis. But the restatement involves three alterations that tie it more closely to the situation in Galatia: (1) "The one we preached" is changed to "what you accepted"; (2) the element of improbability is lessened—"we or an angel from heaven" being changed to "anybody"; and (3) the thought of future possibility—"if we ... should preach"—is replaced by present supposition.

C. Transition (1:10)

10 Before Paul moves to state his first important thesis (vv.11–12), he makes a brief transition. He had been accused of being a people-pleaser by his enemies, who no doubt also implied that he was such at the expense of the truth (cf. 2Co 10; Gal 6:12). Would his enemies dare to say this now, Paul asks, after he has written so sharply? Do people-pleasers pronounce anathemas against those who teach false gospels?

It is important to point out that Paul's words cannot be used to justify the belligerent and fault-finding attitude so often found among religious crusaders. For one thing, Paul did strive to please people sometimes (1Co 9:19–22), though not where the Gospel was at stake; he is merely saying here that he did not please people as opposed to pleasing God. Furthermore, the word "now" gives a limited sense to this verse, as if he were saying: "Have I made myself clear enough about Christ's Gospel? Can anyone now charge that I seek to please people in presenting it?"

The incongruity of charging Paul with being a people-pleaser is strengthened by the following sentence, in which Paul mentions being "a servant of Christ." Jesus had said, "No one can serve two masters" (Mt 6:24). Thus, when faced with the necessity of making a choice, Paul would choose to stand with Christ, not with other people. The choice of the word "servant" (lit., "slave"; GK 1528) is interesting because this letter is about freedom. It is an early indication of the paradoxical teaching that real freedom is to be found in bondage—bondage to Christ.

I. Paul's Defense of His Apostleship (1:11–2:21)

A. Thesis: Paul's Gospel Received Directly From God (1:11–12)

With these two verses the reader comes to Paul's first important thesis. He has spoken of the Gospel (vv.6–9), stating clearly that there is only one Gospel. But certain questions might be asked: "Why should your Gospel be normative, Paul? Why not another gospel? Or if it is true that there can be only one gospel, why should not some entirely different teaching be normative?" In his answer, Paul stresses the divine origin of his teaching, having been received by him directly from God. Throughout the rest of chs. 1–2 Paul defends this thesis by appealing to his own religious experience.

11 The verb introducing this verse means "to make clear," "to certify" (GK 1192), and has the effect of suggesting that a somewhat formal statement will follow, as indeed it does. Just as v.1 advanced Paul's claim to apostleship by denying alleged inadequate sources for that apostleship and affirming the true one, so this section denies inadequate sources for the gospel, while affirming that what Paul preached came directly from God by revelation.

Paul goes on to deny three possible sources for his teaching. First, it was not "something that man made up." This is patently true, for the centrality of a cross and a resurrection do not figure in man-made religion. People seem always to prefer what flatters them and affirms human goodness, not what judges them.

12 Paul also denies that his teaching was received "from any man." This is a different denial from that in v.11, for both "from" and "receive" (GK 4161) refer to the transmission of established religious teaching from one person to another. Paul uses the verb in this sense in 1Co 15:1, 3 to indicate that the basic facts of Christ's life—his death, burial, and resurrection—were received by him and passed on intact to his hearers. Important as this type of transmission may be, however, this was simply not the way Paul received his message.

Finally, Paul adds that he was not "taught" (GK 1438) the Gospel either. Instruction was not the channel through which he came to the truth. This may be the way the vast majority of Christians receive the Gospel, including the Galatians, since Paul had himself instructed them. But it was not the way Paul himself had received the truth.

He now asserts the positive side of his thesis, saying that the Gospel came to him by "revelation" (GK 637), an unexpected unfolding of what had been a secret—a distinctive experience paralleled only by that of those who were apostles before him. The Gospel that was revealed to Paul is unique, precisely because its source was not Paul but God himself. And Christians value it properly only when they make it an integral part of their lives and share it with others.

B. Paul's Personal History (1:13–24)

1. Paul's early years and conversion (1:13–17)

Paul has written that his Gospel did not have its source in a human being. But how could he prove this to the Galatian churches? The answer is by appeal to his personal history. Hence, in the remainder of the chapter Paul shows that the conditions of his life before his conversion, at his conversion, and within a reasonable period after his conversion were not such that he could have received the Gospel from others, particularly the Jerusalem apostles. On the contrary, the very isolation of his life at this period shows that the Gospel must have come to him directly from God, as he has just indicated.

13 The first part of this cumulative argument concerns Paul's former life in Judaism, before his conversion to Christianity. At this point, so far was he from coming under Christian influences that he actually was opposing the church and persecuting it.

The Judaism Paul practiced was an all-inclusive way of life, consuming his entire existence before his conversion. This brief reference to his former life is augmented by his lengthier descriptions elsewhere (see comments on Php 3:4–6). "You have heard" suggests that these facts were known to the Galatians long before any question had been raised about Paul's teaching.

Two aspects of his former life are specifically brought forward in his review of it here: he persecuted the church (v.13), and he advanced in the traditions of Judaism well beyond those of his own age among his countrymen (v.14). In both of these aspects Paul was fanatical, demonstrating his fanaticism against the church by the violence of his persecution and by his actual endeavor to "destroy" (GK 4514) it (cf. v.23; Ac 8:1–4; 9:1–2, 13–14; 22:4–5).

14 The zeal that later fired Paul in his missionary efforts existed before his conversion, for it was part of his personality. Before his Damascus experience this zeal was devoted to advancing as a Pharisee in Judaism. This he did beyond his own contemporaries. He undoubtedly spent much time memorizing the Torah and the rabbinical traditions. With such a background no one could claim that Paul did not know Judaism or the OT. Nor could anyone claim that during this period he had subtly received his instruction in Christianity from others.

15–16 No one with such a personality and with such zealous persecution of the church is about to be converted by another person or by human testimony. Only God himself could accomplish such a conversion. This is precisely what happened to Paul. Thus, Paul begins to speak of his conversion, stressing that God did it entirely apart from any human agent. The reference is to Paul's experience on the road to Damascus (see Ac 9:1–19; 22:1–16; 26:9–18). The contrast in subjects between vv.13–14 and vv.15–16 is interesting. In the first section Paul himself is the subject (cf. "I"). In the second section, "God" is the subject, and his grace is emphasized.

There are three things Paul says God did for him. (1) God set him apart "from birth." Paul's words parallel Jeremiah's description of his own calling (Jer 1:5) and may consciously reflect it. Paul emphasizes God's grace in electing him to salvation and to the apostleship. (2) God called Paul "by his grace." This is a reference to his conversion, the moment in which Paul became aware of God's work in him. (3) God "reveal[ed] his Son in [Paul]" (v.16). This phrase probably refers to the sudden realization of what God had done in Paul's life by placing the life of the Lord Jesus Christ within Paul. God did this in order that he might become the apostle to the Gentiles.

God's revelation of Jesus in Paul was essentially an inner revelation concerning who Jesus was and what his life, death, and resurrection meant. This became so much a part of him, even at this early stage of his Christian experience, that he immediately began to make the revelation of Christ known to others. What grace this demonstrates! Paul, the chief opponent of Christianity in the apostolic era, now turned preacher of what he once tried to destroy! Was this change accomplished by a human being? No! Hence, even in his conversion (as in the period before his conversion) Paul could not have received the Gospel that he preached from other people.

17 Finally, Paul did not receive his message from any person after his conversion. He insists that he did not consult anyone, particularly the Jerusalem apostles, but went instead into Arabia (probably occurring between Ac 9:22 and 23). Most likely that time was spent in thinking and studying. Not until three years later (v.18) did he go up to Jerusalem and meet Peter.

2. Paul's early years as a Christian (1:18–24)

18 The "three years" mentioned here are hard to define. It may have been three full years or only one full year plus parts of two others. Nor does Paul's wording here indicate the point from which the three years or parts of three years are to be reckoned. Was it from the time of his conversion or his return to Damascus? Most likely it was the former (i.e., his conversion), in which case this visit to Jerusalem would have been about A.D. 35 (cf. 9:26–29).

What is certain is the general drift of Paul's argument. He has been stressing that none of the apostles was in touch with him in order to impart the Gospel to him before, during, or immediately following his conversion. Now he is adding that a considerable length of time passed before he even met one of the Twelve in Jerusalem. What is more, even then he stayed no more than a fortnight and met only Peter and James.

Why did Paul go to meet Peter? No doubt they talked about Christ, and Paul used the occasion to enrich his already firm grasp of the Gospel by the stories Peter could tell of the life and actual teachings of Jesus. Paul undoubtedly valued knowing these things. But the wording of the text in Galatians suggests that Paul's main purpose for this trip was to "get acquainted" (GK 2707) with Peter. The word used here suggests the telling of a story. Paul would have told his story, Peter his. So these two leading apostles became acquainted and encouraged each other in their forthcoming work. For the point of Paul's argument, it is important to note that this was a private visit and not one designed to secure the support of any human authorities.

19 Perhaps Paul's legalizing opponents would take advantage of this admission of a visit to Peter to attempt to show that Paul was dependent on the Jerusalem apostles after all. Well, let them! Paul will even admit that he also saw James, the brother of the Lord (see comment on Mk 6:3), who later played an important part in the Jerusalem Council. A reading of Ac 9:26–29 might suggest that Paul was introduced to all the apostles by Barnabas, but he is affirming that, in point of fact, he met only two.

20 Paul swears (cf. Ro 9:1; 2Co 1:23; 11:31; 1Th 2:5; 1Ti 2:7) that this account of his relationship with the Twelve is accurate. He takes this solemn oath probably in order to answer a specific charge of misrepresentation made against him. That Paul is answering specific charges should be remembered throughout these first two chapters. Each historical event he mentions relates to a specific argument raised by Paul's opponents. It is important to realize that Paul is not trying to provide a full chronology of his life.

21 Strict chronology is certainly not the main concern in this verse; if it were, the correct order of the areas Paul visited would be Cilicia and then Syria (see Ac 9:30; 11:25–26). Actually, he is merely indicating that in the next period of his life he worked, not in Jerusalem and Judea, where one could argue he was under the authority of the other apostles, but far away in the regions of Syria and Cilicia where he was on his own. Tarsus, Paul's hometown, was in Cilicia. Barnabas went there to get Paul when he needed his help for the work in Antioch (Ac 11:25), the capital of Syria. There Paul carried on a long and fruitful ministry.

22 Because Paul had worked so long in relative obscurity in the north and had paid no new visits to Jerusalem, he was "personally unknown" to Christians in Judea. Only after many years did Paul begin his famed missionary journeys in response to the call of the Holy Spirit through the Christians at Antioch.

23–24 The word "only" (v.23) suggests that after his conversion, Paul dropped so completely from sight that he was almost forgotten. The only report heard was that the one who long ago had persecuted the church was now preaching the Gospel. Once again Paul stresses his isolation from everything going on in Jerusalem. Would that there were more such contentment among Christians today—the contentment to be unknown! There would be, if this were the goal—to have God glorified (v.24). Too often those in prominent places within the church seek their own glory in Christian service rather than the glory of God.

C. Paul's Relationship to the Other Apostles (2:1–21)

1. The council at Jerusalem (2:1–5)

Chapter 2 begins a different unit of Paul's argument. There is a connection, of course, for he is still speaking of his apostolic authority. But now he wants to demonstrate the essential unity between himself and the other apostles, whereas ch. 1 focused on his independence from them. There are four main differences between the first ten verses of this chapter and those preceding it: (1) There is a new subject—not the source of Paul's Gospel, but the nature of the Gospel as centered in the issue of circumcision for Gentiles; (2) there is a new aspect of Paul's relationship to the Twelve—not independence from them, but harmony and cooperation; (3) there is a new period of Paul's ministry and of early church history; and (4) there is a new conclusion—namely, that in the essential content of the Gospel and of the plan for missionary activity, Paul and the Twelve were one.

This is the first point historically at which Paul came into sharp conflict with the heresy that was troubling the Galatian churches. What was to be done about this distinct point of view? Was it a minor matter to be passed over quickly? Was it an issue on which to seek compromise? Should a battle be fought? Apparently few besides Paul and perhaps Barnabas recognized the full importance of the issue at the time. So it is to Paul's steadfastness in conflict that Christians everywhere owe, humanly speaking, the continuation of the full Gospel of grace.

1 The "fourteen years" are most likely to be reckoned from the end of the three years mentioned in 1:18. Paul's main point is not how long after his conversion he made this visit to Jerusalem, but how long after last seeing the apostles he went up to see them again. Besides, Paul undoubtedly thought of the years of labor in Syria and Cilicia as a set period of his ministry, and his point is that these years were broken only by the trouble from the legalizers and by the revelation that he had to go up to Jerusalem to argue the cause of Gentile liberty. The council in Jerusalem, therefore, likely took place in A.D. 49 (see comment on 1:18).

Barnabas and Titus accompanied Paul, though Luke does not mention the presence of Titus in his account of the council. The presence of Titus is best explained by Paul's desire for a test case (see vv.3–5).

2 Luke says that Paul and Barnabas went up to Jerusalem as the result of a decision by the believers at Antioch (Ac 15:2). Yet there is no real contradiction between this account and Paul's statement about going up "in response to a revelation." Either the church at Antioch prayed about what should be done and then commissioned Paul and Barnabas in response to what they believed God told them to do, or else the revelation was a parallel and confirming one to Paul. Undoubtedly, Paul mentions the matter of revelation only to emphasize once again that at no time was he at the call of the other apostles. On the contrary, his movements as well as his Gospel are to be attributed directly to the revealed will of God.

The discussion of Paul's experiences in Jerusalem goes as far as v.10, but the essence of the matter and its outcome are already suggested in the second half of this verse. Paul spoke privately to those who were the apparent leaders of the Jerusalem church, wishing to avoid public remarks or a decision that would seriously affect the work he was doing among the Gentiles. If the doctrine of grace were not boldly and clearly upheld, terrible consequences for the church's missionary outreach would ensue. What happened at the council, then? Obviously, Paul's point was upheld, for the present tense of the verb "to preach" shows that the Gospel preached by Paul in his early years was still being preached by him at the time of his writing.

3–5 In the context of relating his contacts with the apostolic leaders at Jerusalem Paul now introduces an instance in which he claims to have defended the purity of the Gospel from the encroachments of those who would have mixed aspects of the Mosaic law with grace as the way of salvation. This incident was the attempt of the Jewish legalists to force the rite of circumcision on Titus. The outcome of the struggle, as Paul said, was a successful defense of the Gospel.

These verses have generated a significant amount of discussion, both because the words "This matter arose" in v.4 are not in the original Greek (and thus v.5 is needed to complete the sentence of v.4 if the words are not added) and because some manuscripts omit the words "not" and "to them" in v.5 (this makes the passage say that Paul did in fact yield for a moment). Furthermore, one must face the question whether Paul is referring in v.5 to the apostles or to the false brothers of v.4.

It is the contention of this writer that the NIV has by and large correctly interpreted Paul's thought here. In other words, v.4 is related to the thought of pressure being applied to Paul by the leaders at Jerusalem in deference to the false brothers, yet it was successfully resisted by Paul in defense of Gentile liberty.

Historically the picture one gets is this. The apostles at Jerusalem were wavering on neutral ground, tending to advise compliance to the law on Paul's part, but they finally came out for Paul by declaring openly for freedom from the law. This wavering attitude is suggested in the following verses, both in the attitude of reserve Paul seems to have encountered at Jerusalem (vv.6, 9) and in the related wavering of Peter at Antioch (vv.11–14). Moreover, this fits in with what is most clear in this passage, namely, that the conflict was primarily between the false brothers and Paul and that in the end (whether wavering before that time or not) the apostles stood solidly with Paul and Barnabas.

The term "false brothers" (used here and in 2Co 11:26) defines those who are not in fact Christians, though they pretend to be so. Paul's reference to these men "infiltrating" and "spying" entails a military metaphor and suggests the subversive and militant nature of the evil that Paul was fighting. In Paul's mind, the desire of the legalizers "to make us slaves" occurred in a manner similar to those who would take a city by stealth or force in order to place the inhabitants in chains.

Defending the Gospel that Paul had received from God was not done for any personal or selfish reasons, but "so that the truth of the gospel might remain" with believers (v.5). The word "truth" (GK 237) stands in marked contrast to the falseness mentioned in the preceding verse. Therefore, it must mean "the true gospel" as opposed to "the false gospel" being taught by the false brothers. The issue at stake here is an either-or issue: either the true Gospel in its entirety, or that which is no gospel at all! The importance of this issue made Paul adamant in his relationship to all others, Christians and non-Christians; it should make all who know the Lord Jesus Christ and who love the Gospel equally adamant in their thought, speech, and writings.

2. Paul and the pillar apostles (2:6–10)

6 As in v.4, the construction is again broken, with the result that the first few words (followed by an interjection concerning God's refusal to judge by appearances) are left hanging. Undoubtedly, Paul intended to revert to the subject of v.2 in order to point out that, having laid before the pillar apostles the Gospel he had been preaching, they found it to be in accordance with the truth. But Paul's thought is interrupted, and he hastens to add that whatever the historical advantages of the original apostles might have been in that they knew the historical Jesus, this was not important either to him or to God—and they added nothing to his message.

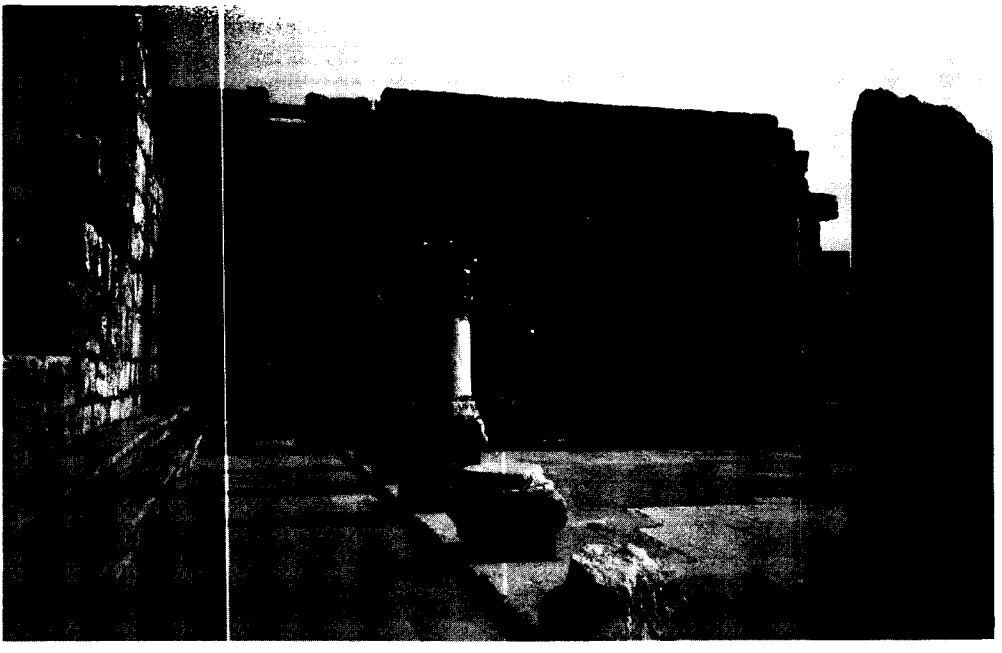
Three times in this chapter (vv.2, 6, 9) Paul refers to the three major figures at Jerusalem in an unusual way. The persons in question are James, Peter, and John (v.9), described as "those who seemed to be leaders," "those who seemed to be important," and "those reputed to be pillars." Why this unusual and perhaps even deferential way of referring to them? Though not all commentators agree, it does seem as if Paul is making a real (though balanced) note of disparagement of these three apostles. The very repetition of the phrase seems ominous, in the same way as Antony's repetition of the word "honorable" concerning Brutus in his eulogy at Julius Caesar's funeral in Shakespeare's play makes the conspirators seem dishonorable. Furthermore, each occurrence of the phrase seems to grow stronger with each repetition. Third, the story of Peter's conduct at Antioch in vv.11–14 lends credence to the feeling that Paul is disappointed with the conduct of those who should have been leaders in this great crisis of faith and doctrine but who failed to take the lead.



In other words, the delicate situation lying behind these verses explains the movement of Paul's thought. Paul is torn between a desire to stress the basic unity that did exist between himself and the Twelve and the need to be honest in indicating that, so far as he was concerned, the apostles did not perform well in the crisis. Thus, his initial allusion to the apostles in v.2 seems to him on second thought to be too vague. He breaks in with the Titus incident, but again not indicating clearly enough that it was the apostles who for the sake of harmony were urging that Titus be circumcised. Finally, Paul picks up the matter of the apostles again (v.6) and eventually names them (v.9), this time indicating that those who were reported to be "pillars" almost failed to do the work of supporting the Gospel.

Paul has therefore done the following: (1) recognized the position and authority of the Jerusalem apostles without diminishing his own authority in the slightest; (2) indicated, in opposition to the exaggerated claims about them made by the legalizers, that the apostles were men after all and hence not always perfect in their conduct; (3) decisively separated the Gospel and policies of the Twelve, for all their weaknesses, from the Gospel and policies of the legalizers; and (4) taken note of the fact that he and the Twelve, rather than the legalizers and the Twelve, stood together. Eventually, he will even show that the agreement between himself and the Twelve was cordial both in relation to their respective spheres of ministry (cf. v.9, "James, Peter and John . . . gave me and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship") and in regard to the special obligation of the Gentiles toward the Jerusalem poor (cf. v.10, "the very thing I was eager to do").

So far as the Gospel Paul preached was concerned, the Jerusalem conference had two results. Negatively, the Twelve "added nothing" to Paul; his Gospel was complete because it was received by revelation. Positively, the "pillars" recognized that all of them had been entrusted with the same Gospel and that they differed only in respect to the different fields they had been assigned to preach it in.

7–8 The phrase "they saw" implies a change of mind by the Twelve as a result of Paul and Barnabas's having reported on all that God had done through them among the Gentiles (cf. Ac 15:4). At first they were skeptical and uncertain, but later they came to stand with Paul on the issue of circumcision (cf. NIV text note). And just as the Gospel is one Gospel, no matter to whom it is preached, so also the commissioning and enabling of those who preach it are one—the reason being that the one who commissioned and empowered both Peter and Paul is God.

9 The exact use and order of the names of the leading apostles in this verse should not escape notice. First, the order obviously corresponds to the relative positions and work of James and Peter as recorded in Acts. Peter was a great missionary. Hence, when Paul is speaking of the ministry to the Jews, Peter is prominent (vv.7–8). But in dealing with a particular and official act of the Jerusalem church, James (who apparently presided at the council) is mentioned in the first position, with the names of Peter and John following.

James, Peter, and John are called "pillars" of the church. Pillars were used in ancient building techniques to support the superstructure. Here are the ruins of the synagogue in Capernaum, the town from which Peter and John came (see Mk 1:14–34).

10 Paul had already shown a concern for the poor at the time of the famine visit when he traveled to Jerusalem with Barnabas as a representative of the church at Antioch (Ac 11:27–30). At the time of the council he was reminded of this good work and encouraged to pursue it. Out of this request, with which he was in great sympathy, arose the collection from among the Gentile churches that occupied so large a part in Paul's later thought and writings (cf. Ac 24:17; Ro 15:26; 1Co 16:1–4; 2Co 8–9). The change from the plural first person ("we") to the singular ("I") may reflect Paul and Barnabas's parting company by the time the collection was actually taken up (see Ac 15:36–40).

3. Peter comes to Antioch (2:11–14)

The account of the Jerusalem Council is followed immediately by another historical incident, the last in Paul's series, in which he dramatically supports his claim to possess an authority equal to and independent of the other apostles. In the opening part of this chapter, Paul has demonstrated his essential unity with those who were apostles before him. Now he shows that he stood so firmly grounded in the Gospel that he opposed even Peter, contradicting him publicly when Peter's conduct at Antioch threatened to compromise that Gospel.

For some reason, Peter had left the Jewish community at Jerusalem and had gone to the Gentile city of Antioch in Syria. There he discovered a community of Jewish and Gentile Christians living together and, in particular, eating together in apparent disregard of Jewish dietary customs. This was probably against the practice then prevailing in Jerusalem even after the council, but God had already shown Peter what he was to do in such situations (see Ac 10:15). So Peter joined with other Jews for some time in eating with his Gentile brothers. In this decision, he went beyond the letter of the decrees of the council, for though the council had acknowledged the right of freedom from the law for Gentiles, it had nevertheless retained the observance of the law for Jews. Now Peter was declaring that the Jew as well as the Gentile was free from Mosaic legislation.

After a time, some influential Jews arrived in Antioch from Jerusalem, claiming to represent James. They were the legalists, and Peter's practice shocked them. Not only was his conduct not required by the Jerusalem agreement, they might have argued, it was actually contrary to it. These persons brought such pressure to bear on Peter that he gradually detached himself from the Gentile fellowship and began to eat with Jews only. Moreover, his conduct drew others away with him, so that when Paul returned to Antioch from wherever he had gone, he found a church divided and the Gentiles under an unwarranted pressure either to accept the division or to conform to the legalistic standards of Judaism as the means of avoiding it.

What did Paul do? Since the schism was public, Paul confronted Peter publicly, charging him with inconsistency and stating once again that observing the law has no place in God's plan of salvation. From this response, the Galatians could realize that Paul was not a self-appointed apostle, nor even a worker appointed and approved by the Twelve. He was rather a full apostle in his own right, who could therefore speak with full authority—even, if necessary, in opposition to another apostle.

11 It is not known exactly when Peter came to Antioch, but the flow of events suggests that it was after the council. The Antioch incident reflects an entirely new situation from the council. There was a new issue (foods rather than circumcision), a new area of the faith (Christian living rather than the basis of salvation), and a new subject (Jewish liberty rather than the freedom of Gentile Christians). This dispute could have followed naturally upon the compromise reached at the council.

12 Here is the reason why Peter stood condemned. He was not simply making an honest mistake. The Peter who had received a vision prior to going to the house of Cornelius (Ac 10) and who had defended Paul at the council (Ac 15:7–11) was not fooled by the arguments of the legalizers. Instead, he had gradually given in to the pressure exerted by the legalizers. In other words, Peter played the hypocrite.

13 Unfortunately, conduct such as Peter's is not inconsequential, neither in his day nor now, for he was a pillar apostle. Thus one is not surprised to read that other Jews, including Barnabas, were led away by his hypocrisy. If Peter had been a lesser man or less prominent, the defection would have seemed less serious. The greater one's position or responsibility, the more important one's actions become.

14 Paul has already shown that he opposed Peter to his face because he was wrong (v.11), but we are not to think that he did this because he loved exposing error or, even less, because he loved an argument or wanted to enhance his own prestige. Paul's real concern was for the truth of the Gospel, and he acted out of the very concern that Peter lacked.

This is the second time that Paul has spoken of "the truth of the gospel" (vv.5, 14)—the good news that men and women are not accepted with God because of anything they have done or can do but solely on the basis of God's grace shown in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Moreover, on the basis of this death all who believe are to be accepted equally. Peter's conduct compromised this principle, for it implied that there could be a superiority in some Christians based on race or traditions. It is not enough merely to understand and accept the Gospel, as Peter did, nor even to defend it, as he did at Jerusalem. A Christian must also practice the Gospel consistently, allowing it to regulate all areas of conduct.

4. Justification by faith alone (2:15–21)

The verses that conclude this chapter contain capsule statements of some of the most significant truths of Christianity. In particular, Paul clearly states the doctrine of "justification" (GK 1467–1470) by grace through faith and defends it over against the traditional objection that justification by faith leads to lawlessness. This message is central to the letter, to his Gospel, and indeed to Christianity generally. This statement flows out of the situation at Antioch and anticipates the fuller argument of the same doctrine in chs. 3–4.

15 It is impossible to say precisely where Paul's remarks to Peter on the occasion of Peter's hypocrisy at Antioch leave off and Paul's direct remarks to the Christians of Galatia begin. Some commentators end the direct quotation at v.14; others, like the NIV, carry it to the end of the chapter. Paul seems to be gradually moving away from commenting on the situation at Antioch, but he does it so naturally that he himself was unconcerned with the transition. In v.14, he speaks of "you" (meaning Peter) and in v.15 "we" (meaning himself, Peter, and other Jews), undoubtedly with the situation at Antioch in mind. Later he is probably thinking of the broader situation that faced the Gentile churches.

The argument in v.15 is addressed to those who are "Jews by birth," i.e., those who possessed the advantages of a privileged birth and a revealed religion (cf. Ro 3:1–2; 9:4–5). But such great advantages are inadequate for achieving a state of righteousness before God; even Jews must be saved through faith. It is folly, therefore, to attempt to reestablish Judaism as a base for Christianity. The phrase "Gentile sinners," used seriously by legalistic Jews, has an ironic ring in Paul's mouth.

16 This is one of the most important verses in the letter. It contains the first mention of the words "justify" and "law" (GK 3795), and is also the first place in which "faith" (GK 4411) is brought forward as the indispensable channel of salvation.

"Justify" (GK 1467) is a forensic term borrowed from the law courts. It means "to declare righteous or innocent"; the opposite is "to condemn" or "to pronounce guilty." Such a term involves an objective standard, and since righteousness is understood to be the unique characteristic of God, that standard must be the divine standard. In themselves, all persons fall short of this standard (Ro 3:23), but in Christ, God declares all who believe as righteous, imputing divine righteousness to them apart from human merit. In justification, the guilty are pardoned, acquitted, and reinstated as God's children and as fellow heirs with Jesus Christ.

This experience does not happen automatically to everyone. God justifies as he unites a man or woman to Christ, a union that takes place only through the channel of human faith. Faith is the means, not the source, of justification. Faith is trust. It begins with knowledge, so it is not blind. It builds on facts, so it is not speculation. It stakes its life on the outcome, so it is not impractical. Faith is trusting Christ and proving his promises. The expression in the middle of v.16 (lit., "we have believed into Christ") implies an act of personal commitment, running to him for refuge and seeking mercy.

It is also implied in this commitment that a person will turn one's back on the only other possibility—the attempt to be justified by works done in obedience to formal statutes from whatever source. Paul's emphasis here is not on the Jewish law (there is no article in Greek with the word "law"), though it includes it, but rather on any system of attempting to please God by good deeds.

The threefold repetition of the doctrine of justification by faith in this one verse is important, because it shows the importance the apostle gives to the doctrine. Besides, the three phrases increase in emphasis. The first is general: "A man is not justified by observing . . . law, but by faith in Jesus Christ." "A man" is anyone. The second phrase is particular and personal. "We, too, have put our faith in Christ Jesus that we may be justified by faith in Christ and not by observing . . . law." This phrase involves Paul himself, as well as all who stand with him in the faith. The final statement is universal: "By observing the law no one will be justified." The words are literally "all flesh," i.e., all humankind without exception. This final statement quotes Ps 143:2 (cf. Ro 3:20), adding the stamp of biblical principle.

17 In Paul's day, as today, arguments were directed against this way of salvation. So in this verse and the following ones Paul begins to answer these objections, first noting the main argument of his opponents and then revealing the argument by which he refutes theirs.

There have been many interpretations of this verse, because the wording contains several ambiguities. Is Paul speaking hypothetically or is he referring to actual experience? He obviously denies the conclusion that Christ is the minister of sin, but does he also deny that "we ourselves . . . are found sinners" (KJV)? In what sense is sin mentioned?

The best interpretation—one that reflects Paul's thought elsewhere (Ro 6–8) and best explains the following verses—is that Paul refers to the standard antinomian objection to the doctrine of justification by faith, namely, that eliminating the law entirely encourages godless living. The argument goes, "Your doctrine of justification by faith is dangerous, for by eliminating the law you also eliminate one's sense of moral responsibility. If people can be accounted righteous simply by believing that Christ died for them, why then should they bother to keep the law or live by any standard of morality? There is no need to be good. The result of your doctrine is that people will believe in Christ but thereafter do as they desire." Paul's reply is abrupt: "Absolutely not!" The form of his expression suggests that he was aware of the possibility that Christians can (and do) sin. But this is not the result of the doctrine of justification by faith, and therefore Christ is not responsible for it. Such a thought is abhorrent. If there is sin, as Paul acknowledges indirectly in the next verse, human beings themselves are responsible.

Why is it that Paul can reply so vigorously to the objection that his Gospel promotes lawlessness, especially since he seems to admit that those who have been justified by faith do sin? His answer is that the objection totally misunderstands the nature of one's justification. In the eyes of legalizers, justification by faith is nothing more than a legal fiction by which men and women are accounted righteous when in fact they are not. But justification is not a legal fiction. It is true that people are accepted by God as righteous when they are not, but this takes place only because God has first joined them to Christ and this in its turn implies a real transformation. They are "in Christ," says Paul. Consequently, they are "a new creation" (2Co 5:17; Gal 6:15). Obviously, to return to the old way of life after such a change is inconceivable.

18 The interpretation of this verse is not difficult in the light of the interpretation of v.17 given above. The legalizers had accused Paul of encouraging sin because his doctrine overthrows the law for God's grace. This Paul denied. Nevertheless, he replies, sin could be encouraged if having once come to God by faith in Jesus Christ the one coming should then return to law as a basis for the relationship. This is an argument e contrario. It refers to a situation precisely like that one into which Peter had fallen—he turned back to Jewish practices and ended up sinning against the Gentiles. In view of the following verses, Paul is likely thinking of the great sinfulness of turning from the Savior (whom the law anticipated) to mere ordinances (for a similar argument, see Heb 6:4–6).

19 The "we" of v.17 (which included both Paul and Peter) has changed to the "I" of v.18. This personal form of expression continues as Paul begins to unfold the full nature of the justification that is his because of his being "in Christ." In this verse "I" is emphatic by being in the first position in the sentence. It contrasts with the similar position given to "in Christ," which (in the Greek text) begins v.20.

Paul has argued that if he should return to law after having come to God through faith in Christ, he would make himself a transgressor. But this is not what he does. On the contrary, the opposite is true, for in coming to God in Christ he died to the law so completely that he could not possibly return to it. The law cannot bring life, for no one has ever fulfilled it. Law brings death, for by it all stand condemned. Nevertheless, the law does perform a good function, for in the very act of destroying all hope for salvation by human works, the law actually opens the way to discovering new life in God (for a more complete explanation of these issues, see comments on Ro 5:20; 7:1–13).

20 This same point Paul now repeats in greater detail, with the name of Christ prominent. He has died to law so that he might live for God, but this is true only because he has been joined by the Father to the Lord Jesus Christ. Jesus died; so did Paul. Jesus rose again; so did Paul. The resurrection life he is now living he is living through the presence of the Lord Jesus within him. By having died and come to life in Christ the believer actually participates in Christ's death and resurrection, conceived on the basis of the mystical union of the believer with the Lord (cf. Ro 6:4–8; Col 2:12–14, 20; 3:1–4).

What does it mean to be "in Christ"? It means to be so united to Christ that all the experiences of Christ become the Christian's experiences. Thus, his death for sin was the believer's death; his resurrection was (in one sense) the believer's resurrection; his ascension was the believer's ascension, so that the believer is (again in one sense) seated with Christ "in the heavenly realms" (Eph 2:6). When one died with Christ, one's "old self" (cf. Eph 4:25) died with Christ. This was arranged by God so that Christ, rather than the old Paul, might live in him.

True, Paul is still living. But he adds that the life he lives now is lived "by faith." It is a different life from the life in which he was striving to be justified by law. In another sense, it is not Paul who is living at all, but rather Christ who lives in him.

21 This last sentence of ch. 2 is introduced abruptly and from a new point of view. In the preceding verses Paul has answered the objections of his critics. Now he objects to their doctrine, showing that if they are right, then Christ has died in vain. The heart of Christianity lies in the grace of God and in the death of Jesus Christ. To insist on justification by works undermines the foundation of Christianity by nullifying God's grace.

Paul's logic is incontrovertible. Yet many still pursue the fallacious logic of the legalizers. They suppose that to earn their salvation is somehow praiseworthy and noble, when actually it is vainglorious and ignoble. True nobility (and humility) is to accept what God offers.

II. Paul's Defense of the Gospel (3:1–4:31)

A. The Doctrinal Issue: Faith or Works (3:1–5)

The apostle has been defending the Gospel of grace from the very beginning of this letter, but until now he has done so from the viewpoint of his own experience and calling. These had been challenged. So he has been insisting that God rather than another human being called him and gave him his message. In speaking of his own experiences, however, Paul has gradually worked around to talking about the Gospel itself, and this has brought him to the place where he is now set for a theological—or, better, a scriptural—defense of the Gospel. So he returns to the Galatians themselves and to the point at which the doctrine of justification through faith bore down upon their own experience.

1–2 This is the first time since 1:11 that Paul addresses the Galatians. Now it is by the impersonal term "Galatians" rather than by the word "brothers," and it sets a sober tone for the formal argument to follow.

Paul cites three things that are inexplicable in regard to the Galatians' conduct. (1) Their conduct is irrational or "foolish" (GK 485), a word that suggests the actions of one who can think but fails to use those powers of perception (cf. Lk 24:25; Ro 1:14; 1Ti 6:9; Tit 3:3). This term was suggested to Paul by the trend of his thought at the end of the previous chapter—namely, that a doctrine of salvation by works foolishly denies the necessity for grace and declares the death of Jesus Christ unnecessary. A doctrine leading to such a conclusion is irrational. Yet this is what the Galatians were on the verge of embracing. How can such nonsense be explained? Paul suggests facetiously that perhaps they have been placed under a spell by some magician.

(2) Paul cannot understand what is happening because the true Gospel had been so clearly preached to them. Undoubtedly, he is referring to his own preaching, arguing that the Gospel had been made as clear by him as if he had posted it on a public bulletin board. The heart of the Gospel that Paul preached is—and always must be—"Christ crucified" (cf. 1Co 2:2).

(3) The conduct of the Galatians is inexplicable because it was so totally contrary to their initial experiences of Christianity. How did they begin? This is what Paul would like to hear from them, and he is not interested in hearing anything other than the basic answer to this basic question. Did they receive the Holy Spirit by living up to some formal statutes? Or did they enter into the Christian life simply by believing and receiving what they heard concerning the death of the Lord Jesus Christ?

3 Paul presupposes their answer, which is obviously that they became Christians only through believing what they heard. The conclusion follows that, having begun by faith, they must continue in faith. It cannot be otherwise, because the two ways—faith versus works—are in conflict. Paul emphasizes this conflict by three sets of comparisons: (1) works versus hearing, (2) law versus faith, and (3) Spirit versus flesh. The last antithesis will come to prominence in the ethical section (5:13–26).

4 There is some ambiguity in the question "Have you suffered so much for nothing?" It may imply actual suffering, as is suggested in NIV. Or it may refer simply to the Galatians' previous spiritual experiences: "Have all your great experiences been in vain?" (NEB). Both views make sense in interpreting the letter as a whole, but the latter seems to fit the immediate context better. In this case, the experiences of the Galatians are further amplified by the reminder in v.5 that God was working miracles in their midst through the power of his Holy Spirit.

5 Nothing must be allowed to obscure the point Paul is making, so once more he voices the test question of v.2, but his emphasis now is on God's point of view, asking on what basis God is working miracles among them right up to the present. Paul anticipates here the end of the argument, for it is evident that blessing in the Christian life comes just as it began—through faith, and not as the result of any human attainments.

B. The Doctrinal Argument (3:6–4:7)

Many outlines have been given of these next verses. A helpful outline is to be found in the very antithesis that Paul develops in this section. Is a person justified by "observing law" or by believing what one has heard? With this question in mind, Paul begins to discuss the alternatives—dealing first with faith, then with law, then with faith, then with law, and so on. The following diagram suggests the flow of the argument.

The Test Question:

Believing what was heard	"observing the law"
The true Gospel	The legalizers' "gospel"
3:6-9 Faith ("Abraham")	3:10-14 Law (the "curse")
3:15-18 Faith ("covenant")	3:19-22 Law ("trangressions")
3:23-29 Faith ("heirs")	4:1-7 Law ("bondage")

1. Children of Abraham (3:6–9)

Paul turns to the first section of the alternating argument. The issue is scriptural, for he is concerned to show that not only the experience of the Galatians but also the words of the OT support his teaching that the means of entering into salvation is faith. Abraham is his example.

Paul's statements presuppose a knowledge of Abraham by the Galatians, and it is not difficult to imagine how the Christians of Galatia had learned it. If Paul had preached among the Galatians for any length of time, he would undoubtedly have taught Christian doctrine in part on the basis of Abraham's life. Furthermore, if (as we argued in the introduction) the churches of Galatia were the churches of the south, there was undoubtedly a large Jewish population in the area with which Christians must at least have had some contact and with whose history they must have been familiar. Most significant, however, is the probability that the obligation to become "children" of Abraham through circumcision formed the central argument of the legalizers' teaching. This argument would have focused on Ge 12 and 17; they would have claimed that no one could be blessed by God who was not part of the company to whom God's promises were made, and one entered this company solely through circumcision. These arguments Paul encounters head on, for he shows that even Abraham was blessed through faith, not circumcision.

6 Paul begins his argument by linking his OT example to the Galatians' spiritual experience, showing that what they had known to be true in their own lives (salvation by faith alone) was also true for others and is confirmed by Scripture.

To appeal to Abraham is more than to appeal to just any historical example, because Abraham was the acknowledged father and prototype of Israel. He was the man God started with. He had come from a pagan ancestry beyond the river Euphrates (Jos 24:1–2), but God had called him and had made a covenant with him. From Abraham the Jewish people came, and all Jews looked back to him as their spiritual father and example. How, then, did Abraham receive God's blessing? How was he justified? Paul answers by a quotation of Ge 15:6, noting that Abraham "believed God, and it was credited to him as righteousness."

What does Paul mean by faith being imputed to Abraham as "righteousness" (GK 1466)? The answer depends on the definition of "righteousness." This may be either a forensic term (denoting a right standing before the law) or aterm denoting a right relationship (in this case to God). If the latter definition is taken, Paul's point is that Abraham's trusting attitude toward God was accepted by God as righteousness. But if the forensic use predominates, then it must be God's own personal righteousness that was imputed to Abraham in place of his own, which was inadequate. If there were nothing else to go on than Ge 15:6, the second of these two uses might be preferable. But in view of Paul's development of the doctrine elsewhere, the first must be adopted. It is only by thinking of God's righteousness actually being credited to our account that Paul can say (2Co 5:21): "God made him [Christ] who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God." These two views are not in opposition, of course, for justification does bring one into a right relationship with God out of which ethical changes follow. The changes result from one's being placed "in Christ," as Paul has shown (2:20).

7 One example does not make a case, however. So Paul continues his argument with a sentence linking the situation of Abraham to the present. He means, "Since Abraham was saved by faith, his true children are, therefore, even now, those who are saved by faith, as he was." The background is undoubtedly the claim of the Judaizers that one became a genuine child of Abraham by circumcision and subsequent obedience to the law. This verse is an important one for linking the two covenants, that of the OT and that of the NT, for Paul stresses that Abraham's faith was of the same kind as Christian faith.

8 Paul now continues to use Scripture as evidence of what he has already concluded in v.7. His quotation from Ge 12:3 makes two points: (1) that the blessing promised to Abraham was from the beginning intended to include the Gentiles as well as the Jews, and (2) that the Gospel promise preceded everything else in God's dealings with his people, including the giving of the law (cf. v.17).

The unusual way the OT is cited here makes this an important verse in assessing the value given the OT by Paul and other NT writers. The Scriptures are personified here; they "foresaw that God would justify the Gentiles by faith, and announced the gospel in advance to Abraham." Paul views the Scriptures as if they were God speaking (cf. also Ro 9:17). Such verses highlight an absolute identification of Scripture with the words of God in the minds of the NT writers and are important biblical support for the historical Christian belief in the total inspiration of the Bible.

9 The reader is now at the peak of the first section of Paul's argument. It is a throwback to the question of v.5: Who are the ones who enter into spiritual blessing? The answer is: Those characterized by the approach of faith are blessed along with Abraham, who had faith. Since the blessing of Abraham is declared to have been intended for the Gentiles also, how could the Gentiles be blessed except by faith?

2. The law's curse (3:10–14)

Having established his doctrine of justification by faith positively, Paul now turns to its negative counterpart: the impossibility of being justified by law. Significantly, he rests his case on statements from the law itself, contending that those who wish to live by the law are bound by their own principles to these statements. Three points follow: (1) Those living under the principle of law are under the law's curse, for the law pronounces a curse upon all who fail to keep the law in its entirety; (2) no one is justified by law, since the law itself teaches that people are justified by faith; and (3) no mixture of these principles is possible, for they are mutually exclusive. To this argument Paul adds a reference to the twofold benefit of the work of Christ: redemption from the curse that the law has imposed on everybody and a blessing by which the promise of the Spirit made to Abraham is fulfilled for all who believe on Christ as Savior.

10 In the first four verses of Paul's formal argument (vv.6–9) he has cited two OT texts: Ge 15:6 and Ge 12:3. In vv.10–12 he quotes the OT three more times, in each case demonstrating that an attempt to live by law, rather than producing a blessing, actually brings a curse from God. Why? First of all, because the law demands perfection, as Dt 27:26 declares. The law is not a collection of stray and miscellaneous parts, some of which may be conveniently disregarded. It is a whole and must be kept in all its parts if it is to be considered kept at all. A curse is attached to any failure to keep it, no matter how small. Since all fail, all are under that curse and consequently under God's wrath (cf. Ro 3:23). That is, the law condemns a person and points human beings in their desperation to their need for a Savior (Ro 3:20–21).

11 One must not think that the law did nothing but condemn during all the centuries between the giving of the law through Moses and the coming of Jesus. On the contrary, the law itself showed the way of salvation. Paul proves this by a quotation of Hab 2:4—"The righteous will live by faith," one of the few OT verses in which faith is presented as the means of salvation. Paul does not misrepresent Habakkuk's meaning here, for if, as seems likely, "the righteous" in Hab 2:4 means those who are standing in a right relationship to God rather than those who are literally righteous before the law, then Habakkuk's view is essentially in accord with Paul's position here. One stands in a right relationship to God and lives before him by faith.

12 But perhaps both are needed, both faith and law? Not so, says Paul. For faith excludes law, and law by its very nature excludes faith. He quotes Lev 18:5 (part of the law) to support this position. Mentally we are to supply "the law says that" after "on the contrary."

13 If these principles are true and if they support the topic sentence of v.10, then the condition of humankind under law is obviously hopeless. If there is to be hope, it must come from a different direction entirely. Abruptly, therefore, Paul introduces the work of Christ through which the curse of the law has been exhausted and in whom all who believe find salvation.

This is the first time Christ has been mentioned since the opening verse of the chapter, but now both he and his work are prominent. Christ is the only possible means of redemption. Since the "curse" of v.10 implies the idea of divine disapproval of the entire human race, the "us" in "Christ redeemed us" refers to both Jews and Gentiles. Paul goes on to show that the purpose of Christ's death was that the blessing given to Abraham might come upon both Jew and Gentile.

To "redeem" (GK 1973) means "to buy out of slavery" by paying a price. Christ paid this price by dying (cf. Ac 20:28; 1Pe 1:18–19). An alternate way of saying the same thing is to say that Christ became "a curse for us," which Paul does. In what sense did Jesus do this? Paul's quotation from Dt 21:23—"Cursed is everyone who is hanged on a tree"—suggests that Jesus passed under the law's curse in a technical way by virtue of the particular means by which he was executed. Thus, having violated the law in one part—through no fault of his own—he became technically guilty of all of it and bore the punishment of God's wrath for every violation of the law by every person. But the curse of the law was not merely a technical thing; it was real. Jesus bore this real curse on our behalf when he died in our place. This can be understood in part both through the illustration of OT sacrifices (cf. the scapegoat taking away the curse of sin in Lev 16:5ff.) and in Christ's cry of dereliction from the cross—"My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Mt 27:46).

14 Paul concludes this section of the argument with a twofold statement of the purpose for which Jesus Christ redeemed us through his death: first, that the blessing of Abraham (i.e., justification, as in vv.8–9) might come to Gentiles as well as Jews, and second, that all might together receive the gift of the Holy Spirit. These two purposes are coordinate; i.e., they express the same reality from two perspectives. Both return to the point from which Paul's argument started—namely, that the blessing of Abraham, seen today in the reception of the Holy Spirit, is received through faith and through faith only.

3. The seed of Abraham (3:15–18)

At the close of the preceding section Paul introduced the idea of God's promise to Abraham. Now he picks up this idea once more and develops it in relation to the giving of the law. This is the beginning of the second unit of his alternating answer to the question of v.2: "Did you receive the Spirit by observing the law or by believing what you heard?" (see diagram above).

Paul's opponents were undoubtedly not ready to admit that Abraham was justified by faith in God's promise. But even if he were, they might argue, still the giving of the law at a later time changed the basis for a person's entrance into salvation. Anticipating this objection, Paul draws on the acknowledged character of human wills and covenants so as to show that no new development could change the promise made to Abraham.

15 "Brothers" introduces a change of tone on the part of the apostle, in contrast to the somewhat distant and formal beginning of ch. 3 (cf. 4:31; 6:1). It is as though he now invites the erring Galatians to reason along with him as he uses an analogy from everyday life. Paul is borrowing an illustration from human relationships (so also at Ro 3:5; 6:19; 7:1–3; 1Co 9:8).

Commentators have found difficulty in Paul's use of the word "covenant" (GK 1347) here because the word can mean either "agreement" or "will." But is it necessary to choose between the two meanings? Perhaps not. In English one has to choose between them simply because there are two separate words. But in the Greek language, it is possible to use both ideas. That this is the case here seems to be supported by: (1) Paul's custom of playing on words elsewhere (e.g., Gal 5:12), (2) the same double meaning in Heb 9:15–20, and (3) the particular nature of the "covenant" made by God with Abraham. Paul is alluding to the promise of a universal blessing both to Jew and to Gentile through Abraham's "seed" (Ge 12:2–3), which he conceives as the offer of justification to every human being through Christ. But if this is so, Paul certainly also has in mind God's formal unilateral enactment of the covenant by the ceremony recorded in Ge 15.

In Abraham's day an oath was sometimes confirmed by a ceremony in which animals were cut into two parts along the backbone and placed in two rows, the rows facing each other across a space marked off between them. The parties to the oath walked together into the space between the parts and spoke their promises there. This oath would be especially sacred because of the shed blood. But the ceremony in Ge 15 had this exception: In the case of God's covenant with Abraham, God alone passed between the pieces of the slain animals, thereby signifying that he alone stood behind the promises (cf. also Heb 6:13–15). It did not depend on any condition to be fulfilled by Abraham.

The idea of a will is not far removed from this type of covenant, except in the matter of the death of the testator, which obviously cannot apply to God. Paul's point is simply that the promise of justification through faith first made to Abraham is permanent. If a human will or agreement cannot be added to or annulled, how much less can the solemn promises made to Abraham and his seed be altered later by the living God!

16 This verse appears to be a parenthesis. But showing the scope of the promises made to Abraham is essential to Paul's argument. If those promises were made only to Abraham and his immediate descendants, they might well be considered fulfilled even before the giving of the law; the law would then inaugurate a new era in God's dealings with humankind. But the promises were not fulfilled in the period before the giving of the law, Paul argues. They were embodied in the coming Redeemer through whom the fullness of blessing was to come. That Redeemer was Christ. Consequently, God's blessing of justification by grace through faith spans the ages; and the law, whatever else one might think of it, served only an interim function. Paul's essential point is that the promises made to Abraham must be in effect eternally.

When Paul speaks of "seed" in the singular as opposed to "seeds," he poses a problem for commentators, especially since the singular form has a collective significance and often denotes more than one person. The nearest English equivalent is the word "offspring." What is the explanation? Obviously, Paul knew as well as anybody that "seed" generally referred to many persons (cf. Ro 4:16–18; 9:6–8). But he is simply pointing out that the singular word "seed" (rather than a plural word like "children" or "descendants") is appropriate, inasmuch as Israel had always believed that the ultimate messianic blessing would come through a single individual.

17 The 430 years comes from the LXX of Ex 12:40, defining the period between Abraham and Moses rather than (cf. the Hebrew text) the period during which the Israelites were slaves in Egypt. The difference is of no consequence for Paul's argument, however, because his point depends only on the historical sequence. If God had been blessing Abraham and his posterity through the way of promise for 430 years and if he was to do the same for all humanity through Christ, how could the giving of the law annul this promise? It could not, as even the human analogy of covenants and wills shows. Therefore, the law cannot add to, nor subtract from, God's first and only way of salvation.

18 This verse adds an objective as well as temporal reason why the giving of the law cannot change the promise. Promise and law are antithetical by nature. They can be neither mingled together nor combined (cf. also v.12). In the last phrase the words "to Abraham" are emphasized, thereby once again driving all discussion of how men and women enter into a right relationship with God to its original source. The word "gave" (GK 5919) is important, because it emphasizes that salvation is both a free gift and is permanent. Whatever may be said about the law, this much is certain: God saved Abraham through promise, not law, and the original way of salvation is still operative.

4. Law versus covenant (3:19–22)

Paul has proved, at least to his own satisfaction and perhaps even to that of the Galatians, that the only way of salvation is by means of the promise received through faith. But the legalizers might object that the approach he has taken has actually proved too much. If the way of salvation is by promise and the law brings a curse, it would seem to follow (1) that the law has no purpose at all in the scheme of salvation, or (2) that it is actually opposed to it. This would be an intolerable conclusion for most, particularly those Jews whose lives had been dominated by the law for centuries. Paul answers these charges by denying both conclusions and by establishing God's true purpose in giving the law: it was given not to save people but to reveal their sin, it was temporary, and it was inferior to the promise because, unlike the promise, it was given through a mediator.

19 To the question "What, then, was the purpose of the law?" Paul provides as his first answer that the law was added "because of transgressions" (GK 4126). That is, the law was given to make the transgressions known, perhaps even to encourage them or to provoke them to a new intensity (see also Ro 3:20; 4:15). Though sin was in the world before God gave the law, sin was not always known as such; it was the law that revealed sin as sin. Hence, it may be said that it is the law that turns sin into transgression—transgression of law—and even accentuates it (Ro 5:20). In this act, law performs the function of showing one's need of a Savior.

The second half of this verse carries the thought further by showing that the giving of the law was temporary ("until the Seed to whom the promise referred had come") and inferior (because it was "put into effect through angels by a mediator"). Here the mediator is doubtless Moses who, as an agent of a mediated revelation, is brought forward in contrast to Abraham, to whom God made promises directly. The role of angels in the giving of the law is suggested in Dt 33:2 and Ps 68:17 and is referred to explicitly in Ac 7:53 and Heb 2:2.

20 This verse is probably the most obscure verse in Galatians, if not in the entire NT. The difficulty lies in the abrupt, aphoristic character of the verse and in its relationship to Paul's context. The most important interpretations fall into three categories:

(1) Those that take Paul's reference to a "mediator" in a general sense. According to this approach, Paul is introducing a general principle in support of the point made at the end of the preceding verse. Mediators always act between parties. Hence, since Moses was a mediator of the law, it follows that he acted between God and the people and that the law thereby came indirectly. The last phrase suggests that in giving the promise to Abraham (see vv.15–18) God acted directly and unilaterally.

(2) Those that take the reference to a "mediator" as a specific reference to Moses, the mediator in the previous verse. This approach can obviously lead to an interpretation similar to that given above. However, it can also lead to other views, such one in which Moses is contrasted with Christ as one who was unable to be a mediator of "a perfectly united body."

(3) Those that refer "the mediator" to Christ (cf. 1Ti 2:5). This view does not relate well to the context. If it is right, Paul would be acknowledging that even in Christianity there is a mediator, Christ; but he would be adding that since Christ is God as well as human, in Christ God is still dealing with people directly.

Whatever the details of the interpretation, the general thought seems to be that the promise must be considered superior to the law because the law is bilateral. That is, it was mediated, and ; humankind was a party to it. The promise, on the other hand, is unilateral; humankind is not a party to it. This thought reinforces what Paul has said earlier about the unconditional and unilateral nature of the promises.

21 The second apparent conclusion the legalizers might take from Paul's doctrine of justification is that the law becomes evil because it opposes grace as the true means of salvation. But this does not follow, Paul replies. It is an abhorrent idea, for it suggests a conflict within the nature of God, who gave both the law and the promise. True, the law increases transgressions (Ro 5:20) and it can even kill (Ro 7:7–11). Still, the law is not bad; it is good—so good that if a person could do what the law requires, that person would find life (Lev 18:5; cf. Gal 3:12).

22 Because it is impossible to find life through law, however, the law fulfills its actual function by shutting all people up within the bounds of acknowledged sin. It condemns them, with the result that they turn from trying to please God through legalism and instead receive the promise of God through faith in Jesus Christ. In the first part of this verse Paul summarizes the major truths of Ro 1:18–3:20, that the law shows that all have sinned and need a Savior. The second half of the verse reminds us that there is indeed a Savior and that it had always been God's purpose to save a great company through faith in him. Seen from this angle, even the law flowed from God's grace, because it prepared people to receive the Lord Jesus Christ when he came.

5. Heirs with Abraham (3:23–29)

The closing section of ch. 3 begins the third unit of Paul's alternating answer to the question of v.2 (see diagram above). It follows directly on what Paul has said regarding the true purpose of the law. Still, a change has taken place. Before, he has been concerned with the law's true purpose, which is to lead people to Christ. Now, though he begins with this point, he moves on to the idea of a change of status for those who have passed from being under the bondage of the law to being sons and daughters in Christ. Before, we were prisoners, shut up under the law. Now we are sons and daughters, reconciled to God and made one with each another and with all who throughout history have been justified on the basis of God's promise.

23 The proper understanding of the phrase "before this faith came" is found in the fact that the definite article occurs before the word "faith." By "this faith" Paul means "the Christian faith," that faith he has just spoken of in v.22—faith in Jesus Christ as Savior (cf. 1Ti 4: 1 for a similar usage). This faith is like the faith exercised by Abraham, but it is different in that it relates to the explicit revelation of Christ in time and to the distinct Christian doctrines concerning him. Faith waited for this complete revelation. Paul's point is that the law was intended to function only during this 1,500-year period of anticipation.

While the law was here, however, it did serve a purpose: to hold us prisoner, locking us up until Christ should be revealed (cf. v.22). Paul is thinking here that the law, like a jailer, has kept people locked up and therefore out of trouble until Christ, the liberator, should come to set them free.

24 The phrase "put in charge" is the Greek noun paidagogos (GK 4080), which means "a child-custodian" or "child-attendant." The pedagogue was a slave employed by wealthy Greeks or Romans to have responsibility for one of the children of the family. He had charge of the child from about ages six to sixteen and was responsible for watching over his behavior wherever he went and for conducting him to and from school. Paul's point is that this responsibility ceased when the child entered into the fullness of his position as a son, becoming an acknowledged adult by the formal rite of adoption by his father (see on 4:1–7). The reference "to Christ" is temporal; it means "until we come of age at the time of the revelation of our full sonship through Christ's coming." The final phrase (lit., "in order that by faith we might be justified") gives the ultimate objective of the law in its role of pedagogue. The emphasis is on justification rather than faith, for Paul has already shown that faith is the only means to salvation.

25 The two most important points of the previous verses are repeated for emphasis: first, the time element—we were under the law as pedagogue until the faith should come; second, the reference to the fully revealed faith of Christianity. Paul is here thinking historically, stressing that the reign of law has ended for those believers who now through the coming of Jesus have become mature sons and daughters of God.

26 But what are the actual results of this passage from the reign of law to grace through faith in Jesus Christ? In the final verses of the chapter Paul lists three of them.

First, through faith in Christ all who believe become "sons of God"—i.e., they have passed through spiritual infancy into full maturity as justified persons. In view of Paul's previous reference to the pedagogue, the mention of full-grown "sons" is particularly appropriate. Still we must not think of this as a matter of growth alone. To be true children of God means to be justified by faith in Christ and to have therefore passed into a new and right relationship to God. Before, they were under law, but now they are under grace. In this verse emphasis falls on the word "all." All are included in these statements, the Galatians particularly.

27 This new relationship is not something that happens automatically to everyone. Not everyone is a child of God in the sense that Paul speaks of here. In fact, one can become a son or daughter only through union by faith with Christ Jesus.

Baptism signifies this transforming identification with Christ, so Paul refers to it here. Paul is not suggesting here that baptism now replaces circumcision as a saving sacrament. No one is saved by baptism. Indeed, Paul mentions baptism only once in the paragraph, but faith five times. Rather, baptism is an outward sign of the union that already exists through faith. To be "clothed with Christ" means to become like Christ.

28 The second result of passing from law to grace through faith in Jesus Christ is that all who believe become one with each other so that there is now "neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female," but all are "one in Christ Jesus." In what sense is this true? Clearly, it does not mean that differences of nationality, status, and sex cease to exist. A Jew remains a Jew; a Gentile, a Gentile. Instead, having become one with God as his sons and daughters, Christians now belong to each other in such a way that distinctions that had divided them lose significance.

Race is the first example. In Paul's day there was a deep division between the two, not only nationally but also religiously. Gentiles were uncircumcised and therefore not children of Abraham. They did not have the law or the ceremonies; they were not of the covenant. This barrier Paul now claims to have been broken down in Christ (cf. Eph 2:11–18). Today this principle must be extended to deny the significance of all racial barriers. In Christ there must be neither black nor white, Caucasian nor Oriental, nor any other such distinction.

Social status is a second example ("slave nor free"). Again, this is not meant to deny that in actual fact there are social distinctions among people. It is merely meant to affirm that for those who are united to Christ these things do not matter. On this pattern the ideal church should be composed of members from all spectra of society: wealthy and poor, educated and uneducated, straight and long-hair, management and labor, and so on. When Christians treat each other as true brothers and sisters in Christ regardless of their social standing, then the power of such distinctions is broken and a basis is laid for social change.

There is also the example of sex, for Paul declares that there is neither "male nor female." It is hard to imagine how badly women were treated in antiquity, even in Judaism, and how difficult it is to find any statement about the equality of the sexes, however weak, in any ancient texts except those of Christianity. Paul reverses this. Indeed, in this statement we have one factor in the gradual elevation and honoring of women that has been known in Christian lands.

When Paul concludes this breakdown of the distinctions that are superseded by Christianity, he speaks of the fact that all who are in Christ are "one," one unified personality as the living body of Christ. In this body all are truly one with one another. The only permissible distinctions are those of function (cf. 1Co 12).

29 The third result of passing from law to grace through faith in Jesus Christ is that all who believe become one with those who have been saved by faith throughout the long history of salvation. Thus, by union with Christ, believers become "Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." Here that which Paul had previously declared to be Christ's—the inheritance of the promise made to Abraham (3:16)—he now applies to the entire Christian church by virtue of its actually being Christ's body. The verse carries the thought back to the beginning of the chapter.

The use of the word "seed" without the article is of great importance, for it keeps the necessity of a union with Christ constantly before the Galatians. The prize the legalizers had been holding before the eyes of the Galatian Christians in their hope to win them to the ceremonial aspects of Judaism was the possibility of becoming part of the physical seed of Abraham. Paul now replies that what the legalizers were offering through circumcision was actually already theirs in Christ. He is the seed to whom the promises were made. Believers enter into the promises by entering into him and become spiritual seed to God as well.

6. Heirs of God (4:1–7)

Paul gives his final contrast between God's people before Christ's coming and the position they enjoy now. The difference between these verses and 3:23–29 is in emphasis. Paul has been stressing the temporal nature of the change. At this point he dwells on their status, moving from being slaves to becoming sons and daughters of their heavenly Father. This development flows from the thought of the pedagogue in vv.23–29.

1–2 The moment of growing up was a definite one in antiquity, and it involved matters of great religious and legal importance. For instance, in Judaism a boy passed from adolescence to manhood shortly after his twelfth birthday, at which time he became "a son of the law." In the Greek world the minor came of age at about eighteen, but there was the same emphasis on an entering into full responsibility as an adult. Roman law also had a time for the coming of age of a son, but the age when this took place does not seem to have been firmly fixed; the father apparently had discretion in setting the time of his son's maturity. It seems likely that Paul is referring primarily to the Roman custom as he observed a child "under guardians and trustees until the time set by his father." At that time the child was formally adopted by the father as his acknowledged son and heir and received special adult clothes.

When the child was a minor in the eyes of the law, his status was no different from that of a slave, even though he was the future owner of a vast estate. He could make no decisions, he had no freedom. But at the time set by his father, the child entered into his responsibility and freedom. The application of the illustration is obvious as Paul applies it to the inferior condition of people under law, both minors and slaves, and to the new freedom and responsibility that come to them in Christ.

3 Paul now applies the illustration as already indicated. Before Christ came we were children and slaves, slaves to the "basic principles" or "elemental spirits" (GK 5122) of the world (cf. v.9).

There has been much debate about what Paul means by this word here. Of the three major interpretations, the best one sees it as referring to the basic elements that the ancient world saw as making up the world—earth, fire, air, and water. These elements had been associated from the dawn of civilization with the gods. In Paul's time it seems that this exceedingly early view had been expanded so that the elements also referred to the sun, moon, stars, and planets—all of them associated with gods or goddesses and, because they regulated the progression of the calendar (cf. "days and months and seasons and years" in vv.9–10), also associated with the great pagan festivals honoring the gods. In Paul's mind these gods were demons (cf. "those who by nature are not gods" in v.8). Hence, he would be thinking of a demonic bondage in which the Galatians had indeed been held prior to the proclamation of the Gospel (cf. Ro 8:38–39; Eph 6:10–12). Thus, this whole issue takes on a cosmic and spiritual significance. The ultimate contrast to freedom in Christ is bondage to Satan and the evil spirits.

4–5 But God has set believers free! These are wonderful words, because they show that the entry of the Christian message is at the same time the turning point of history. Apart from these words, life offers no future hope for anyone. We are lost, without hope and without God (cf. Eph 2:12). But God has intervened in a way that brings an effective and complete salvation.

Paul goes on to spell out what God has done. First, he "sent his Son." From the historical point of view, the fact that "the time had fully come" suggests several factors. It was a time when the Roman peace extended over most of the civilized earth and when travel and commerce were therefore possible in a way that had formerly been impossible. Great roads linked the empire of the Caesars, and its diverse regions were linked far more significantly by the all-pervasive language of the Greeks. Add the fact that the world was sunk in a moral abyss so low that even the pagans cried out against it and that spiritual hunger was everywhere evident, and one has a perfect time for the coming of Christ and for the early expansion of the Christian Gospel. Viewed theologically, however, it may also be said that the time was full because God himself had filled it with meaning.

Specifically, God sent his Son "to redeem" those who were under the law's bondage and to provide the basis by which God is able "to adopt" them as sons and daughters. Redemption is mentioned here for the first time since 3:13 and is particularly appropriate in view of the imagery Paul is using. Redemption means "to buy out of slavery" (cf. comment on 3:13). People were slaves either to the law, as Jews, or to the "basic principles of the world," as Gentiles. Christ paid the price of their redemption and set them free. Moreover, it is through him that human beings have the adoption. That is, they move not only from bondage into freedom; they also move into the household of God, where all are free and are "heirs of God and co-heirs with Christ" (Ro 8:17). Observe the subtle link between the central ideas of this verse and the phrase "weak and miserable principles" in v.9. The opposing powers are "weak" because they cannot redeem and "miserable" (or "poor") because they cannot provide the adoption.

And who is the one through whom this great salvation comes? It is striking how much of the important Christian teaching about Jesus is revealed here. He is divine, for he is God's "Son." This speaks of an ontological relationship existing from eternity (Php 2:5–11; Col 1:15). He is human, for he was "born of a woman." He was "under law"; i.e., he was born into Israel and thus within God's historical stream of salvation. Paul may even be alluding here to the virgin birth.

6 Paul has already pointed out the first great redemptive act of God in history: God sent his Son. Here he adds the second act: "Because you are sons, God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, the Spirit who calls out, 'Abba, Father.'" In other words, to the other doctrines of the faith already spilling over from vv.4–5 Paul now adds Trinitarian teaching, for he is telling us that salvation consists in its fullness of acts by God the Father in sending both God the Son and God the Holy Spirit. Moreover, this salvation is both objective and subjective. God the Father sent the Son in order that believers might have the position of sons and daughters, and he sent his Spirit so that they might have the experience of the same reality. We should notice that the gift of God's Spirit is not something the children of God are to strive after as if, having been given salvation, they must now work to realize it or achieve it on a higher level. The Spirit is the gift of God to all believers because they are sons and daughters.

How do Christians experience what is theirs objectively? Paul suggests that this is primarily through the reality of God's presence made known to them in prayer. Before, they were alienated from God, who indeed did not even hear them. Now, being made members of his family, Christians are permitted and even urged to cry, "Father." "Abba" is the Aramaic word for "Father," suggesting an intimate relationship with God. "Father" was the word Jesus habitually used in his prayers to God (e.g., Mt 11:25; Mk 14:36; Jn 11:41; 17:1, 5, 21, 24–25) and which he passed on to those who through him became God's children (Mt 6:9).

7 This verse sums up all that Paul has said previously. Formerly slaves, Christians are now both children of God and heirs. It is connected with the previous verse in that the Spirit teaches us about our relationship with God as Father. The change from the plural of v.6 to the singular of v.7 brings the argument home to the individual reader. Each reader should therefore ask, "Do I know the reality of such an internal witness by God's Spirit? Am I assured of these things?"

C. Paul's Appeal to the Galatians (4:8–31)

1. A return to bondage (4:8–11)

At this point the formal argument for salvation by grace rather than by works is finished, but Paul seems unwilling to end the discussion without a direct and, indeed, lengthy appeal to the Galatians. He reminds his converts of their former bondage in paganism and expresses his astonishment that they could even consider a return to such slavery. In view of this possibility, he expresses concern that his labors among them may have been to no purpose.

8–9 For the third time (cf. 3:23ff.; 4:1ff.) Paul speaks of the former enslaved state of the Galatians. His reason this time is to establish the folly of their proposed action of returning to the law's bondage. In their former state of bondage and immaturity, they did not know the true God and worshiped instead those who were "no gods" (cf. Ro 1:18–23)—a clear reference to the idols of paganism.

Their former bondage was, of course, a matter of ignorance. But that they should voluntarily return to this bondage after having been delivered from such ignorance by God himself—this is astonishing and, indeed, totally incomprehensible. In essence, what Paul is saying here is this: "But how can it be that, on the one hand, having formerly been in ignorance of God and therefore enslaved to those who are not gods and, on the other hand, having come to know God or (which is more to the point) being known by him, you are now returning anew to those weak and bankrupt elements which once controlled you?"

There are three causes for Paul's astonishment: (1) the Galatians were going back to what they had already been through—i.e., not to a new error but to an old one; (2) they were turning from reality (the true God) to nonreality (non-gods); and (3) this was done after they had actually come to "know" (GK 1182) God in an intimate and personal way.

Paul understands total spiritual depravity and the electing grace of God in such a manner that he does not want to leave the impression that it is possible for anyone to come to know God by his or her own efforts. The truth of the matter is that God comes to know us. We come to know him only because we are first "known [GK 1182] by God"—i.e., through Christ a Christian has become an object of God's personal recognition and favor.

We have already seen why the elemental spirits or principles the Galatians were in the process of turning to are "weak and miserable" (lit., "powerless and bankrupt"); they are weak because they are unable to set people free, as Christ has done by redeeming them. They are bankrupt because they have no wealth by which they can provide an inheritance.

10 The Judaizers were probably not intentionally trying to enslave the Galatians, and it is even more probable that the Galatians did not regard their current drift toward legalism as a return to slavery. Yet that is precisely what it was, as Paul reminds them.

In the context of the struggle in Galatia, there is little doubt that the observances the Galatians were succumbing to were Jewish observances. "Days" refers to sabbath days and feasts that fell on specified dates; "months" refers to celebrations tied to the recurring monthly cycle; "seasons" refers to seasonal events, such as the feasts of Tabernacles, Passover, etc.; "years" most naturally refers to the recurring years of Jubilee. What is most significant, however, is not that Paul opposed these Jewish special days, in that observing them was but one step removed from a full Jewish legalism, but that he regards them in exactly the same light as the pagan festivals—i.e., as controlled by and interacting with demonic spirits (see comment on v.3).

This does not, of course, mean that Paul attributed the origin of the law, which includes the religious feasts, to Satan. Far from it. The law is good and comes from God (cf. Ro 7:12). Nevertheless, even the law, when distorted into a way of trying to earn salvation, can be used by Satan to increase human bondage. That Paul, the Jew, would even consider the Jewish observances in the same context as the pagan festivals shows the intensity of his estimate of the deadly character of legalism.

11 Can his readers have missed that point? If so, it comes to them once again as the same Paul who speaks elsewhere of the fact that nothing can ever separate Christians from the redeeming love of God (Ro 8:35–39) and who expresses confidence that the work begun in the Christian by God will be continued till the day of Christ (Php 1:6) now expresses the fear that his labor in bringing the Gospel to the people of Galatia might be wasted. This is not, to be sure, the same thing as saying that a Christian can lose salvation. Indeed, even the Galatians have not gone that far; they have only begun to observe the feasts and have not yet been circumcised (5:2). Nevertheless, they are wavering, and their wavering is inexplicable and inexcusable. It can only be that they are "nearsighted and blind" and have "forgotten" that they were cleansed from old sins (see 2Pe 1:9).

2. Their past and present relationships (4:12–20)

If the reader is inclined to think Paul has been impersonal in dealing with the problems at Galatia, the present passage should remove any suspicion. It is true that Paul has dealt with the issues facing the Galatians as doctrinal ones and has even been somewhat distant in addressing his converts, at best calling them "brothers" (cf. 1:11; 3:15). Now, however, all this changes, and his deep pastoral concern for the Galatians surfaces as he intensifies his appeal to them by again calling them "brothers" and then "dear children." Moreover, he bases his appeal on their past and present relationship to one another; first, their past relationship to him (vv. 12–16), and second, his past and present relationship to them (vv.17–20). He contrasts the former with their present actions; the latter he contrasts with the actions of the Judaizers.

12 The opening words of this verse are somewhat puzzling, for there is not enough said to know precisely what Paul is referring to. Most likely he is asking the Galatians to enter into the Christian freedom he knows, with the reminder that he had identified himself with them in order to preach the Gospel to them (cf. 1Co 9:20–22). That is, when Paul went to the Galatians, he did not stand on any special dignity or insist that the Galatians first come to him by becoming Jews. He became like them, in order to win them to Christ.

This is a principle of great importance for all who are trying to win other people for Christ. Our goal must be to make them like us, while the means to that end is to make ourselves like them. Witnessing involves doctrine, but it also involves the most personal involvement of the witness with those to whom he or she is witnessing.

13 "You have done me no wrong" (v.12) really belongs with vv. 13–15, verses describing Paul's original reception by the Galatians. They had received him graciously and with compassion (see v.14). And this was all the more remarkable since he had not been at his best when among them. He had been sick. In fact, illness had brought about his visit to Galatia in the first place. While many attempts have been made to identify the precise nature of Paul's illness (e.g., malaria, the physical abuse and resulting weakness he had suffered at Lystra [Ac 14:19], his "thorn in the flesh" [2Co 12:7], or bad eyesight), the only thing we can say with certainty is that some form of unpleasant sickness lay behind Paul's first visit to the Galatians and that, though they could have despised him because of it, they did not but, instead, received him favorably.

14 They actually received him as "an angel of God," i.e., "as if I were Christ Jesus himself." It is noteworthy that though Paul was well aware that he, like the Galatians, was a sinner, and though he had been careful when among them not to allow any conduct on their part that suggested worship of Paul (see Ac 14:8–18), nevertheless he does not suggest here that their respect for him as a messenger of God was in error. On the contrary, they were quite right to receive him in this manner. For he came among them as the approved messenger of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Today there are no apostles. But to the degree that ministers and teachers of the Word of God do teach the Word, to that same degree should they be received as the Galatians received the apostle Paul. Ministers should not be received and evaluated on the basis of their personal appearance, intellectual attainments, or winsome manner, but as to whether or not they are indeed God's messengers bearing the word of Christ.

15–16 In spite of their initial attitude toward Paul, their opinion of him had changed. The joy (lit., "blessedness," GK 3422) they experienced as a result of his preaching had vanished, and they were now apparently regarding him as their enemy. If one thinks that Paul possibly suffered from bad eyesight (cf. 6:11), then the expression "you would have torn out your eyes and given them to me" refers to actual conversations they had at the time.

Why had Paul become their enemy? The only possible explanation is that he had become an offense to them through telling them the truth. Unfortunately, this is often the case for those who are faithful to Christ's teaching.

17 Paul can appeal, not only to the former attitude of the Galatians or to the contrast between that and their actions in the present (vv.12–16), but also to his own attitude toward them. That attitude was guileless and in marked contrast to that of those who had since been attempting to woo the Galatians into legalism.

Paul notices two things about the actions of the legalizers: their zeal and their motives. Being "zealous" (GK 2420) is not bad in itself. This word can have two meanings: "to envy" and "to be deeply concerned for someone to the point of courting their favor"; both are implied here. Certainly Paul had been zealous with a godly jealousy (cf. 2Co 11:2) for the Galatians as he worked among them, and he encourages them to be zealous in regard to the Gospel. Zeal placed at the service of Christ is a fine characteristic. In the case of the legalizers, however, this zeal was misdirected, for it was a zeal for their own cause and glorification, and it was alienating the Galatians from both Paul and Christ.

There is here an interesting throwback to a previous verse. When Paul says that the Judaizers "want . . . to alienate you" (lit., "lock you up"), he is probably thinking of the function of the law in "locking" people up under sin (3:23). The locking up was the same action, but the purposes were different. The law served a proper function in locking people up as sinners so that they might find salvation in Christ. The legalizers, however, were trying to lock the Galatians up under law so that they might be separated from Christ and from Paul and serve their teachers. They must take note, for if that happens, the roles will be reversed, and the Galatians will find that they must court the legalizers. Failure to maintain Christian liberty always leads to ecclesiastical as well as other forms of bondage.

18 Though there are several possible meanings of this verse depending on who is exercising such zeal, it is best to refer the zeal to the Galatians, which Paul wishes was as intense now in pursuit of the right thing as it was when he was with them. This verse, then, makes a transition that, though somewhat abrupt, leads on to the thought of Paul's having been with them in the past and of his wish to be with them once again if possible (v.20).

19 Paul now comes to his main point about the actions and motives of the legalizers: his own attitude to the Galatians was quite different. He had not come to them in order to build up his own personal following, as the false teachers had. He had come to help them—to see that they were born again and to labor for them until Christ himself should be formed in them. In calling the Galatians his "dear children" and in speaking of his labor "pains" on their behalf, Paul pictures himself as a mother who went through the pains of childbirth when they converted to Christ; he is now in labor again as the result of their apparent defection. He wants them to know that his present pastoral concern matches his evangelistic fervor; indeed, neither has diminished because of the Galatians' listening to the legalizers.

20 We do not know why Paul was unable to visit Galatia again at this time, but if he could, he says he would change his "tone." This does not mean that he would change his teaching or have fewer expectations of them, but his approach would be different. He could ask questions. He could find out why they were in the process of turning from freedom to bondage, and so he would no longer be perplexed. Perhaps he could even speak to them differently as he continued to recall them to the Gospel.

3. An appeal from allegory (4:21–31)

Commentators are sometimes embarrassed because Paul's doctrinal argument in the central two chapters of Galatians concludes with an allegory based on what many consider an unjustified use of an OT story. But such embarrassment is unnecessary, as is the thought that the allegory was somewhat of an afterthought for Paul, who had, in fact, actually concluded his argument early in the fourth chapter. In one sense, the formal argument did conclude there; vv. 8–31 are mostly an appeal to the Galatians to remain in that freedom to which God has called them.

However, one may also argue that Paul has deliberately saved this argument for his capstone. The advantages are these: (1) The allegory allows Paul to end on a final citation of the law and, in particular, on a passage involving Abraham, who has been his primary example. (2) It allows him to use a method of argument which, we may assume, had been used by the legalizers, thus turning their own style of exegesis against them. (3) It illustrates and reviews all his main points—the radical opposition between the principle of law and the principle of faith, the fact that life under law is a life of bondage and the life of faith is freedom, and that the life of faith is a result of the supernatural working of God by means of the Holy Spirit. (4) The story contains an emotional overtone suited both to a wrap-up of the formal argument and to a final personal appeal. (5) It gives Paul a base upon which to suggest what he had undoubtedly thought but had apparently been reluctant to say previously—that the Galatians should obey God by casting out the legalizers (v.30). Therefore, the allegory effectively ties together the doctrinal section of the letter and the appeal based on it, and it leads into chs. 5–6, the ethical section.

Paul introduces the facts of the story itself (vv.21–23), develops the allegory (vv.24–27), and then applies the allegory to the Galatians and indeed to all believers (vv.28–31). The latter section speaks of the supernatural basis of the new life in Christ, the inevitability of persecution for those who stand by the Gospel, and the need to so stand.

21 Paul has already appealed to statements of the law to show that the law brings a curse to those who desire to be under it (3:10–14). But that was both indirect and negative. Now he appeals directly and demands that those desiring to be under law hear what the law actually says and retreat from their folly. He does not yet consider that the Galatians have actually rejected the Gospel, only that they are desiring to reject it for law.

22 For the final time Paul turn to Abraham, upon whom the legalizers had undoubtedly based a large part of their argument. Jews derived much satisfaction from their physical descent from Abraham and in many cases considered the promises and blessings of God to be theirs because of it (see comment on 3:6; see also Mt 3:6; Jn 8:31–41). The present passage deals with the same issue, only Paul's method of attack is slightly different from that of John the Baptist and Jesus. Instead of denying outright their descent from Abraham, Paul simply reminds his opponents that Abraham had two sons (Ishmael and Isaac) and asks, in effect, which of these two children the legalizers take after.

23 There were two main differences between these sons. (1) They were born of different mothers (v.22); one was a free woman, the other a slave. This, according to ancient law, also affected the sons' status. (2) In the manner of their conception, Ishmael's was entirely by natural means (Abraham was elderly at the time, but still the conception was natural), whereas Isaac's was by means of a miracle (by this time Abraham had passed the age at which it was normally possible to engender children and Sarah was long past the age of conceiving them). Isaac was brought into being "as a result of a promise" from God.

This contrast lends itself well to the distinction Paul is trying to make between natural or man-made religion and supernatural or God-made religion. The religion of works and law corresponds to the natural birth of Ishmael; the religion of the Spirit, which is Christianity, corresponds to the supernatural birth of Isaac.

24–26 This basic distinction between the two sons and in the manner of their conception and birth Paul now carries out in more complete spiritual terms, using the historical account as an allegory. This does not mean that Paul's exegesis is fanciful, as some have implied, but only that he uses the story for the sake of its major principle, which he then quite properly applies to the struggle between Judaism and Christianity. The best way to understand the allegory is to carry it through in parallel columns.

Hagar, the slave woman	Sarah, the free woman
Ishmael, a natural birth	Isaac, a supernatural birth
The old covenant	The new covenant
Earthly Jerusalem	Heavenly Jerusalem
Judaism	Christianity

In this arrangement Hagar, the slave woman, stands for the old covenant enacted at Mount Sinai, while her son, Ishmael, stands for Judaism with her center at earthly Jerusalem. On the other hand, Sarah, the free woman, stands for the new covenant enacted on Calvary through the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, and her son, Isaac, stands for all who have become part of the church of the heavenly Jerusalem through faith in Christ's sacrifice. On the most superficial level, Isaac and Ishmael were alike in that both were sons of Abraham. But on a more fundamental level they were entirely different. In the same way, Paul argues, it is not enough merely to claim Abraham as one's father (cf. Ro 9:6–9). The question is: Who is our mother and in what way were we born? If Hagar is our mother, then we were born of purely human means and are still slaves. If our mother is Sarah, then the birth was by promise, and we are free.

It is significant that when Paul contrasts "the present city of Jerusalem" with "the Jerusalem that is above" he mixes two metaphors so as to enrich his meaning. Strictly speaking, the phrase "the present city of Jerusalem" should be matched with "the Jerusalem that is to come," and the phrase "the Jerusalem that is above" should be matched with "earthly Jerusalem." These connotations are more or less evident. But by not actually saying "the Jerusalem that is to come," Paul suggests that while it is true that there is a Jerusalem to come (Rev 21:2), this Jerusalem is also now present in those born again by God's Spirit.

27 There is no evidence that the verse Paul now quotes (Isa 54:1) was ever associated with the story of Hagar and Sarah and their children; nevertheless, it is highly appropriate. This verse is a prophecy of Jerusalem's restoration following the years of exile and involves the thought that the blessing of the latter years will be greater than that enjoyed formerly. The pre-exilic Jerusalem and the post-exilic Jerusalem correspond, then, to Paul's distinction between the earthly and heavenly Jerusalems, and the promise to the blessings of God to Israel under the old covenant as contrasted with the greater blessings to the church under the new covenant. The element common to these verses is the supernatural intervention of God in order to establish Christianity. The new element is the suggestion, soon to be fulfilled, that the numbers of Christians will outnumber those within Judaism.

28–29 In the third section of this treatment of the Hagar and Sarah story, Paul applies the allegory to all Christians, pointing out that because they are like Isaac, who had a supernatural birth, rather than like Ishmael, their experiences will be consistently similar to that of the younger son.

In the first place, they must expect persecution from their brother. Paul is referring to Ge 21:8–13, when, at the weaning of Isaac (he was about two years old and his half-brother Ishmael about seventeen), Ishmael began "mocking" Isaac. Thus Sarah asked that Hagar and her son be sent away. So it is today, says Paul. True Christians will be persecuted (cf. Mt 5:10–12; Php 1:29; 1Th 3:1–4; 2Ti 3:12; 1Pe 4:12–13). And the remarkable thing is that this will not always be by the world but indeed more often by their half-brothers—the unbelieving but religious people in the nominal church. This is the lesson of history. It was the Jews who killed the prophets, not the Gentiles. It was the Pharisees and other religious leaders who opposed Jesus and instigated his execution, which was carried out by the Romans. Paul's fiercest opponents were the fanatically religious Judaizers. Today the greatest enemies of the believing church are found among the members of the unbelieving church, the greatest opposition emanating from the pulpits and church hierarchies.

30 Second, the Christians at Galatia must recognize the incompatibility of man-made and God-made religion and respond by casting out the legalizers. Those born after the flesh (v.29) will never share in the inheritance God has reserved for his true children, born after the Spirit. Therefore, Christians must reject both legalism and those who teach it. Taking a story from Genesis that the Jews undoubtedly interpreted as a statement of God's rejection of the Gentiles and applying it instead to the exclusion of unbelieving Jews from Christianity probably infuriated Paul's opponents, but his point was well taken. God does not look on physical descent but on spiritual affinity. The true sons of Abraham are those who are born of the Spirit.

31 Of such are the Galatians. The "therefore" of this verse sums up the whole allegory and indeed the entire section of Paul's doctrinal argument. The shift to the first person ("we") once again includes both Paul himself and all who embrace the true Gospel.

III. The Call to Godly Living (5:1–6:10)

A. Summary and Transition (5:1)

Paul has already reached two important goals in his appeal to the Galatians. He has defended his apostleship, including a defense of his right to preach the Gospel with or without the support of other human authorities (1:11–2:21), and he has defended the Gospel itself, showing that it is by grace alone, apart from human works, and that the Christian is freed from the curse of the law and brought into a right relationship with God (3:1–4:31). But Paul must make one more point before he concludes his letter: that the liberty into which believers are called is not a liberty that leads to license, as his opponents charged, but rather a liberty that leads to mature responsibility and holiness before God through the power of the indwelling Holy Spirit. This theme dominates his last two chapters.

1 Before plunging into this third section of his letter, Paul interjects a verse that both summarizes all that has gone before and serves as a transition to what follows. It is, in fact, the key verse of the entire letter. Because of the nature of the true Gospel and of the work of Christ on their behalf, believers must now turn away from anything that smacks of legalism and instead rest in Christ's triumphant work for them and live in the power of the Spirit. The first part of this verse aptly sums up the message of chs. 3–4, while the second part leads into the ethical section. Paul appeals for an obstinate perseverance in freedom as the only proper response to any attempt to bring Christians once more under legalism.

Since the Jews of Paul's time spoke of taking the yoke of the law upon themselves, Paul probably alludes to such an expression here. To the Jews taking up the law's yoke was the essence of religion; to Paul it was assuming the yoke of slavery. He may also be remembering Jesus' reference to Christians taking his yoke upon them (Mt 11:29–30), but his yoke was "easy" and "light."

B. The Danger of Falling From Grace (5:2–12)

The reader may think that in the opening verses of ch. 5 Paul reverts back to a theme he has already covered and so departs from his purpose to move on to the ethical section. But such reasoning misses an important point—that even the ethical life must begin by recognizing that the foundation of God's dealings with us is grace through faith rather than obedience to the law. "Do you wish to lead a holy life?" Paul seems to be asking. "Then begin with the principles of faith and shun legalism. Holiness will never come as the result of insisting on adherence to either man-made or even God-made regulations." He makes this point twice here: first, from the viewpoint of those who, like the Galatians, seem about to fall into legalism (vv.2–6) and, second, by referring to those who teach such false doctrines (vv.7–12).

2 Paul wants the Galatians to take careful note that if they allow themselves to be circumcised (the verb tense used here implies that they had not yet taken this step but were considering it), then Jesus Christ will profit them absolutely nothing. Circumcision was, of course, the particular form of legalism that was a problem in Paul's day; the choice was between Christ and no circumcision at all, or circumcision and no Christ at all.

This explains why Paul is so categorical in condemning the practice of circumcision for the Galatians. It is not that circumcision in itself is so important. In fact, Paul himself had once circumcised Timothy (Ac 16:3), and he would soon declare that "neither circumcision nor uncircumcision has any value" (v.6). Rather, what Paul condemns is the theology of circumcision, which makes works necessary for salvation and seeks to establish conformity to some external standards of behavior as a mark of spirituality.

Ones's motivation is the important thing. Paul was in no sense condemning those Jewish Christians who had been circumcised. His advice to such people is given in 1Co 7:17–20: circumcised Christians should remain circumcised; uncircumcised Christians should remain uncircumcised. Particular forms of legalism are not themselves the important issues; the critical issue is works versus grace, or, as we will soon see, spirit versus flesh. Paul's concern was that nothing should cloud perception of this central Christian doctrine.

3 Paul has already stated that to fall into circumcision is to lose the value of Christ's death both for salvation and for living the Christian life. Now he adds another reason why the Galatians should remain firm in the freedom Christ has given them: to choose circumcision is to choose legalism, which in turn involves taking on the burden of the entire law—something that the legalizers had probably not warned the Galatians about.

4 Paul again states his points, this time dropping the hypothetical "if" for the strong assertion that those who want to be justified by law have been alienated from Christ and have fallen away from grace. Christ is of no value to them and the burden of keeping the whole law is theirs.

What does "You have fallen away from grace" mean? Does it mean, as some claim, that salvation can be lost if a Christian falls into sins? Not at all. There is a sense in which to sin is to fall into grace, if one is repentant. But to fall from grace, as seen by this context, is to fall into legalism. Or to put it another way, to choose legalism is to relinquish grace as the principle by which one desires to be related to God.

5 The essence of that message of the Gospel is now brought forward in the last full statement of the principle of justification by faith in this letter. Up to this point Paul has been talking only of the Galatians (cf. the pronoun "you"), warning them about what they seemed to be doing. Now he changes to "we," emphasizing something like this: "But, on the other hand, we Christians do not choose legalism; rather, we wait in faith through the Spirit for the full realization of God's righteousness."

Each phrase in this verse is important and has already been defined. "By faith": this key word stands in contrast to human effort, as all should be aware from the arguments of chs. 3–4. "We eagerly await": Christians wait for the full realization of their salvation. They do not work for it; they wait for it. "Through the Spirit": this is a reminder of the electing grace of God in salvation. "The righteousness for which we hope": this does not refer to that imputed righteousness the believer has in the present through faith in Christ's death, but rather (in line with the ethical section to follow) to that actual righteousness in which believers grow and to which they will be perfectly conformed in glory. In the Bible, "hope" (GK 1827 & 1828) refers to that which, though certain, is not yet fully realized.

6 Paul makes two final points as he wraps up the first half of this section. In doing so, he comes close to giving a full and beautiful definition of true Christianity. (1) As hard as Paul has been on circumcision and as much as it would serve his purpose to downgrade it in preference to uncircumcision, he nevertheless acknowledges that neither circumcision nor uncircumcision in themselves counts for anything. This is further evidence that his concern is theological and not ceremonial (cf. a similar point made about eating meat offered to idols in 1Co 8:8).

(2) True faith, having an ethical side, works itself out "through love." This is what matters—this kind of faith! True, we are saved through faith rather than by works; but faith is no mere intellectual conviction, as if Christians can do as they wish as long as they believe the right doctrines. This is a horrible idea, as Paul writes elsewhere (Ro 6:1–2). To believe is to place one's personal confidence in Christ, who loves us and gave himself for us. Therefore, Christians must respond in a genuine and self-denying love for others.

In vv.5–6 the three great terms "faith" (GK 4411), "hope" (GK 1828), and "love" (GK 27) appear together (cf. 1Co 13; Col 1:4–5; 1Th 1:3; et al.).

7 Up to here in this section Paul has been contrasting those who desire to add circumcision to Christianity and true believers who trust Christ alone. Now the contrast changes to a false teacher or teachers, designated as "the one who is throwing you into confusion" (v.10), versus "I" (i.e., Paul, who is teaching correctly).

Paul was fond of using athletic imagery to describe the Christian life, often including himself as a competitor (1Co 9:24–27; Gal 2:2; Php 3:13–14; 2Ti 4:7). To him life is a race, demanding adherence to rules and discipline if the race is to be completed successfully and a prize obtained. Here he applies the imagery to his converts. The Galatians had begun the race well. They had both assented to certain truths and adopted a Christian lifestyle. In other words, theirs was both a head and a heart religion. This is the full meaning of the phrase "obeying the truth." In spite of this good beginning, however, something had obviously gone wrong. Someone had hindered them by setting up an obstacle in front of them. In Paul's analogy, this probably refers to the illegal interference of a runner who cuts in ahead of another and thereby disadvantages that runner. Thus, the situation at Galatia was one in which the Galatians had already ceased, in some measure, to obey the plain truth of the Gospel.

8 But what should be said regarding the false teacher(s)? Much indeed. In three succinct statements Paul traces the origin, results, and end of such doctrine. (1) Somewhat understating the case, Paul says that the origin of the doctrine of salvation by works does not lie in "the one who calls you" (i.e., God; cf. 1:6). Rather, it proceeds from that which is hostile to God's grace. Though Paul does not say that it originates with Satan, that may well be the case.

9 (2) As the present results of such teaching, Paul asserts that it spreads. It is permeating, insidious, and therefore dangerous. No doubt Paul is quoting a proverb at this point (cf. 1Co 5:6). False teaching, like yeast, grows and affects everything it touches. Therefore, this alone would justify Paul's alarm at the state of affairs in the Galatian churches.

10 (3) Even though evil spreads, God will not permit it to triumph ultimately. In fact, its end is the opposite. Paul concludes with an optimistic expression of his confidence that the Galatians will return to a right mind and that the false teacher(s) will suffer God's judgment. What does "no other view" refer to? Does it mean "no other view" than the true Gospel? Than their first opinions formed as the result of Paul's teaching? Or than what Paul has just said regarding the origin and danger of the legalizers' teaching? The answer is not given. Any of the three is possible, and indeed Paul may have all of them in mind.

11 Two personal remarks conclude the section. The first presents a difficulty. What does Paul mean by saying, "If I am still preaching circumcision"? This cannot refer to his pre-Christian days only, for there would be no point to the criticism in that case. Furthermore, Paul links his alleged preaching to times in which he was persecuted as a Christian. But could anyone have actually made that claim about Paul? The most likely explanation is simply that Paul's words are a reply to an accusation that he did preach circumcision when it suited him, however unfounded or unlikely that accusation was. That accusation could have originated from views such as those expressed in 1Co 7:18 or from Paul's circumcision of Timothy (Ac 16:3).

The "offense [GK 4998] of the cross" is an important concept in Paul and is an important reference in this context. Paul suggests that the preaching of the cross is so offensive to the natural mind that it arouses fierce opposition. But why should Paul link his refusal to approve circumcision for Gentiles to the offense of the cross? Obviously, for the same reason that he opposed it or any other human effort generally. All these things—feasts, circumcision, ceremonies, legal observances, or anything symbolizing external religion—are part of a system that seeks to attain standing before God through merit. In contrast, the cross proclaims our complete ruin in sin, so that nothing we do or can do can save us, and thus it also proclaims our radical need for God's grace. The natural self does not understand such teaching (1Co 2:14) and, in fact, hates it, because it strips away any pretense of spiritual achievement.

12 The second of Paul's personal remarks concerns the legalizers. It is his wish, expressed somewhat obliquely, that they would not stop with circumcision in their zeal for ordinances but rather would go on to castration. Sacral castration was known to citizens of the ancient pagan world. But for Paul to compare the ancient Jewish rite of circumcision to pagan practices even in this way is startling. Not only does it put the efforts of the Judaizers to have the Gentiles circumcised on the same level as abhorred pagan practices, but it actually links this desire to that which in Judaism disbarred one from the congregation of the Lord (Dt 23:1).

To many in our day Paul's expression sounds coarse and his wish reprehensible. But we may be sure that Paul did not speak out of a malicious spirit or in ill temper. He spoke out of a concern for the Gospel of grace and for God's truth. We too should wish that false teachers stop afflicting our churches.

C. Life in the Spirit (5:13–26)

Paul has already spoken of freedom several times in this letter (2:4; 4:26, 31; 5:1)—one of his central themes. But up to here, he has not defined it, at least not in practical terms dealing with the ethical life. Now he does so, showing not only what the true nature of Christian freedom is but also that only through the Spirit and by the Spirit's power can Christians live for God and not fulfill the desires of their sinful nature. Negatively, freedom in Christ is not license. Positively, it is service both to God and to other people and expresses itself in the great Christian virtues. This latter point is emphasized by two contrasting catalogs of the works of the sinful human nature versus the fruit of the Spirit.

One reason why Paul adds this section to his letter is to show what he means by "faith expressing itself through love" (v.6). A second reason is apparently to counter developing strife and divisiveness in the churches of Galatia, for the verses speak of a "biting," "devouring," and "destroying" of each other. The greatest reason, however, is undoubtedly Paul's desire to complete his portrait of true Christianity by showing that the freedom we have been called to in Christ is a responsible freedom that leads to holiness of life. Called to freedom? Yes! But this is a freedom to serve God and others as love dictates! Paul has in mind the fear within Judaism that a faith without law would not be sufficiently strong to resist the ethical debauchery of paganism.

1. Liberty is not license (5:13–18)

13 Like v.1, this verse is transitional and marks a new beginning. "You" is emphatic, showing that Paul is building on the confidence expressed earlier as to what side the Galatians are on (v.10). He echoes here the original challenge of v.1, but follows it up this time with a warning not to allow this freedom to become an excuse for sinful self-indulgence. Here the contrast is between indulgence and the serving of one another in love.

Christians must not allow their freedom in Christ to become a beachhead for the armies of indulgence to gain a foothold ("indulge," GK 929; cf. 2Co 11:12) in their lives. Paul's reference to "the sinful nature" (sarx; GK 4922) means all that a person is and is capable of doing as a sinful human being apart from the unmerited intervention of God's Spirit (see comment on v.16).

It is ironical that, having urged the Galatians not to become slaves to law, Paul should now encourage them to become slaves of one another, for that is what "serve" (GK 1526) means. It is a paradox, but the paradox is instructive. The Galatians are to be slaves of one another, though this slavery is not at all like the first. In fact—this is the paradox—it is the Christian form of being free. Slavery to sin is involuntary and terrible; a person is born into sin (Ps 51:5) and cannot escape it (Ro 7:18). Slavery to law, which comes by choice, is foolish and burdensome. On the other hand, slavery to one another is voluntary and a source of deep joy. It is possible only because Christians are delivered through the presence and power of the Holy Spirit from the necessity of serving sin in their lives.

14 Throughout his letter Paul has been arguing against law and in defense of the Gospel of pure grace. Now, in a most striking fashion, he returns to law and seems to speak favorably of it, stressing that when Christians love and serve others, the law is fulfilled. There is a play on two meanings of the Greek word translated "summed up" (GK 4444). On the one hand, it refers to the fact that the law can aptly be summarized by Lev 19:18 (a common rabbinic opinion, also endorsed by Jesus in Mt 22:39; Lk 10:25–28). On the other hand, the word can mean "fulfilled" (cf. Ro 13:8); in this sense Paul is suggesting that it is actually out of the new life of love made possible within the Christian community through the Spirit that the law finds fulfillment.

This use of the word "law" (GK 3795) is most instructive, because it shows that in spite of all Paul has said, there remains a sense in which the requirements of the law are a proper concern for Christians. This does not mean that the Christian is to make progress in holiness by once again setting up a system of rules and regulations. But the essential ends of the law will be met in those who, being called by God and being filled with the Spirit, allow God to produce the Spirit's fruit within them. Faith in Christ is the bond that forms the basis for the fulfillment of God's holy will in one's life.

15 It is not hard to imagine the kind of strife that may have been present in the Galatian churches, either strife parallel to that of the Corinthians (1Co 1:10–12; 3:1–4) or strife arising directly out of the conflict with the legalizers. Paul does not say precisely what it was, but intense strife was definitely going on among the Galatians.

16 What is the solution to such biting, devouring, and destroying that is all too common among Christian assemblies? The answer, Paul says, is to "live by the Spirit." Then, and only then, will one cease to gratify the desires of the flesh. It is the Spirit alone who can keep the believer truly free.

The contrast between sarx ("flesh"; NIV "sinful nature"; GK 4922), on the one hand, and pneuma ("spirit"; GK 4460), on the other, is one of the characteristic themes in NT, and particularly Pauline, theology. It is as important, for instance, as the contrast between the observance of the law and the hearing of faith that has thus far dominated the letter. Although sarx can mean the whole person as conditioned by a bodily existence and by natural desires, in Christian vocabulary (especially in Paul), it came to mean a human being as fallen, whose desires even at best originate from sin and are stained by it. Thus, sarx came to mean all the evil that one is capable of apart from the intervention of God's grace in one's life; i.e., it is synonymous with "the natural man," "the old nature," or "the sinful nature." Sarx also contains thoughts of human limitation, both intellectually and morally (Ro 7:18). Thus, that which is flesh is incapable of knowing God apart from special revelation and the redemption that removes the barrier of sin (cf. 1Co 2:14).

The other term is pneuma, usually translated "spirit." Its earliest meaning is "wind," "air," "breath," or "life." Later it came to refer to the incorporeal part of a person, which (like breath) leaves at death. These meanings do occur in the NT. But the main emphasis is always on "spirit" as the Spirit of God or related to the Spirit of God. Indeed, it is because God breathes his spirit or breath into a person that that person has breath (cf. Ge 2:7). The incorporeal part of a human being has God-consciousness. In distinctly religious terminology, the Spirit of God takes up residence in Christians to enable them to understand spiritual things (1Co 2:14), receive Christ as Savior and Lord, call God "Father" (Ro 8:15; Gal 4:6), and develop a Christian personality. The Spirit is thus the presence of God in a person, through whom fellowship with God is made possible and power given for winning the warfare against sin in the soul.

The Spirit is not natural to a human being in one's fallen state. But this does not mean that by the gift of the Spirit a redeemed person escapes the need to struggle against sin. The Spirit simply makes victory possible—and that only to the degree that the believer "lives by the Spirit" or "walks" in him.

17 A characteristic of the contrast between sarx and pneuma is that the two principles are in deep and irreconcilable conflict. In the sense in which Paul uses the words, the sinful nature does no good and does not desire good, whereas the spirit does no evil and, indeed, opposes anything that does not please God (see Ro 7 for a fuller discussion of this same principle).

The last clause of this verse probably means that the sinful nature keeps a person from doing the good he or she desires (see Ro 7:15–16). Some have maintained that there is no conflict within the Christian because the old nature governed by the "flesh" has supposedly been eradicated. But this is not true. Naturally, the sinful nature is to become increasingly subdued as the Christian learns by grace to walk in the Spirit, but it is never eliminated in this life. So the Christian is never released from the necessity of consciously choosing to go in God's way and to depend on his grace.

18 The final verse of this section is best taken as a summary in which Paul reminds the Galatians that, though he is now talking of the need to live a godly life, he is not thereby reverting to legalism. Life by the Spirit is neither legalism nor license—nor a middle way between them. It is a life of faith and love that allows a person to be led by the Spirit.

2. The works of the sinful nature (5:19–21)

That pneuma and sarx (see comment on v.16) are in conflict is now illustrated by contrasting lists of the works of the sinful nature and of the fruit of the Spirit. At the same time, the lists are more than a mere proof of what he has written earlier. For by raising these particulars of conduct, he also provides a checklist for measuring the conduct of those who consider themselves spiritual. If one's conduct is characterized by the traits in the first list, then he or she is either not a believer or else a believer who is not being led by God's Spirit.

19 When Paul says that the "acts of the sinful nature" are obvious, he does not mean that they are all committed publicly where they may be seen. Some are, some are not. Instead, he means that it is obvious to all that such acts originate with the sinful nature, not with the nature given believers by God. Here the full scope of the word sarx ("flesh") becomes evident, for the list not only contains the so-called "fleshly" sins, but it also contains sins that emanate from every part of human nature.

Four divisions of sin are obvious in his list: (1) three violations of sexual morality; (2) two sins from the religious realm; (3) eight sins pertaining to conduct in regard to other human beings—i.e., social sins; and (4) two typically pagan sins.

(1) The first three words cover sexual sins. They are obviously intended to be somewhat comprehensive and inclusive. "Sexual immorality" or "fornication" (porneia; GK 4518) is the broadest term, denoting any immoral sexual intercourse or relationship. In starting with this vice, Paul begins with what was acknowledged to be the most open and shameless vice of the Greek and Roman world. "Impurity" (GK 174) refers to a person who was either morally or ceremonially unclean. Paul uses it almost exclusively of moral impurity. "Debauchery" (GK 816; cf. also 2Co 12:21) is an open and shameless contempt of what is proper. In this regard it is a fitting term for what is probably intended to be a climax of several evils.

20 (2) Paul goes on to list two sins of religion: "idolatry" (GK 1630), the worship of the creature rather than the Creator (Ro 1:21–25), and "witchcraft" (GK 5758), a secret tampering with and at times a worship of the powers of evil. These two terms are arranged in an ascending horror of evil and indicate that the works of the sinful nature include offenses against God as well as against ourselves or our neighbors.

(3) Neighbors are in view in the third section of Paul's list, since it includes much of what would today be called social offenses. Most of the words are self-explanatory. "Hatred" (GK 2397) means "enmities," such as those between classes, nations, and individuals. It is these enmities that have been broken down for those who are in Christ (Gal 3:28; Eph 2:14–16). "Discord" (GK 2251) is the natural outcome of hatred both in the world and in the church. Four out of six of Paul's uses of the word are connected with church life. "Jealousy" (GK 2419) and "fits of rage" (GK 2596) can denote both good and bad qualities. There is a godly jealousy or zeal (see comment on 4:17) as well as righteous anger. When either originates from selfish motives and hurt pride, however, it is evil and harms others. "Selfish ambition" (GK 2249) may be translated in many ways: contention, strife, selfishness, rivalry, intrigues. Its basic meaning is a selfish and self-aggrandizing approach to work. "Dissensions" (GK 1496) and "factions" (GK 146) denote a state of affairs in which people are divided and feuds flourish.

21 "Envy" (GK 5784) is so closely related to "jealousy" that it is hard to tell the difference between them, except for the fact that this attitude is always bad. This third set of words shows the sinful nature to be responsible for the breakdown in interpersonal relationships seen in all strata of society.

(4) The final grouping is concerned with sins of alcohol: "drunkenness" (GK 3494) and "orgies" (GK 3269). They denote pleasures that have degenerated into debauchery. There are more items that could be mentioned, for when Paul adds "and the like," he indicates that the list is not exhaustive.

Paul adds a solemn warning, saying that those who habitually practice such things will never inherit God's kingdom. This does not mean that if Christians fall into an isolated lapse into sin through getting drunk or some such thing, they thereby lose their salvation. Rather, Paul is referring to a habitual continuation in sins of the sinful nature, and his point is that those who continually practice such sins give evidence of having never received God's Spirit. When he says that he warned the Galatians of this previously (presumably when he was among them), he reveals that his preaching was never what one might call mere evangelism but that it always contained a strong dose of the standard of morality expected from Christians.

The reference to the "kingdom [GK 993] of God" introduces an entirely new and large subject, one that is an important and complex idea in the New Testament (see comment on Mk 1:15). Here, however, Paul is doubtless thinking of God's kingdom only in an eschatological sense. The phrase "will not inherit" carries the thought back to Paul's words about Abraham in ch. 3. His point is that those who keep on living in the sinful nature give evidence that they are not Abraham's seed and therefore will not inherit salvation.

3. The fruit of the Spirit (5:22–26)

Paul continues his contrast between the natural productions of the sinful nature and Spirit that he had begun in v.19. Here, however, he speaks of the "fruit" (GK 2843) of the Spirit (using both a new term and the singular form) in contrast to the "acts" (v.19; GK 2240) or works of which the sinful nature is capable. The term "acts" already has definite overtones in this letter. It refers to what a human being can do, which, in the case of the works of the law (2:16; 3:2, 5, 10), has already been shown to be inadequate. The fruit of the Spirit, on the other hand, suggests that which is a natural product of the Spirit, made possible by the living relationship between the Christian and God through Christ (cf. 2:20; Jn 15:1–17). The singular form stresses that these qualities are a unity, like a bunch of grapes instead of separate pieces of fruit, and also that they should all be found in all Christians. In this they differ from the "gifts" of the Spirit, which are given one by one to different people as the church has need (1Co 12).

The nine virtues that are the Spirit's fruit hardly need classification, though they seem to fall into three categories of three each. The first three comprise general Christian habits of mind; their primary direction is Godward. The second set primarily concerns Christians in their relationship to others and are social virtues. The last three concern Christians as they are to be in themselves.

22 It is appropriate that "love" (agape; GK 26) should head the list of the Spirit's fruit, for "God is love" (1Jn 4:8), and the greatest of Christian qualities is love (1Co 13:13). In biblical texts it is the association of agape with God that gives the word its distinctive character. Divine love is unmerited (Ro 5:8), great (Eph 2:4), transforming (Ro 5:5), and unchangeable (Ro 8:35–39). It is this love that sent Christ to die for sinners and that perseveres with them in spite of their willfulness and desire to sin. Now because the Spirit of Christ is living within them, believers must show love both to other Christians and to the world. By this, people will know that Christians are indeed Christ's disciples (Jn 13:35).

"Joy" (GK 5915) is the virtue in the Christian life corresponding to happiness in the secular world. On the surface they seem related. But happiness depends on circumstances, whereas joy does not. In the NT a form of the word "joy" becomes a typical Christian greeting (Mt 28:9; Lk 1:28; Ac 15:23; 2Co 13: 11; Jas 1:1). Joy is particularly full when what was lost spiritually is found (Lk 15:6–7, 9–10, 32).

The second of the two most popular Christian greetings is "peace" (GK 1645; see comment on 1:3). Above all, peace is God's gift to us, achieved by him at the cross of Christ. It is peace with God (Ro 5:1) and expresses itself both in peace of mind (Php 4:6–7) and in a practical peace between all those who know God. This latter peace should be seen in the home (1Co 7:12–16), between Jew and Gentile (Eph 2:14–17), within the church (Eph 4:3; Col 3:15), and indeed in all relationships of believers with other people (Ro 12:18; Heb 12:14). Moreover, Christians are to strive for it (1Pe 3: 11). The importance of this word is evident in that it occurs in every NT book and eighty times altogether.

"Patience" (GK 3429) is the quality of putting up with others, even when one is severely tried. The importance of patience is evidenced by its frequently being used to describe the character of God, as in the great text from Joel: "Return to the LORD your God, for he is gracious and compassionate, slow to anger, and abounding in love, and he relents from sending calamity" (Joel 2:13).

"Kindness" (GK 5983) is the divine kindness out of which God acts toward humankind. It is what the OT means when it declares that "God is good," as it so frequently does. Christians should show kindness by behaving toward others as God has behaved toward them.

"Goodness" (GK 20) is hard to define. Though it is related to "kindness," it differs from it in being a more active term. The primary idea seems to be generosity that springs from kindness.

The last three virtues are concerned with Christians primarily as they are to be in themselves. They are to be characterized by "faithfulness" (GK 4411), a word that also means "faith," but undoubtedly here means that which makes a person one on whom others can rely—i.e., trustworthiness or reliability. This word describes a faithful servant (Lk 16:10–12), including servants of the Gospel and of Christ (1Ti 1:12; 2Ti 2:2). It describes the character of those who will die for their confession of Christ (Rev 2:10; 3:14). It goes without saying that it is also descriptive of the character of Christ, the faithful witness (Rev 1:5), and of God the Father, who always acts faithfully toward his people (1Co 1:9; 10:13; 1Th 5:24; 2Th 3:3).

23 "Gentleness" (GK 4559) describes those who are so much in control of themselves that they are always angry at the right time and never angry at the wrong time—e.g., Moses, who is praised for being the gentlest or meekest man on earth (Nu 12:3). This is the spirit in which discipline must be applied and faults corrected (Gal 6:1). It is also the virtue for meeting opposition (2Ti 2:25) and for giving a Christian witness (1Pe 3:15–16).

"Self-control" (GK 1602) is the quality that gives victory over sinful desires and is therefore closely related to chastity both in mind and conduct. This quality enables a person to live and walk in this world without getting one's garments spotted by the world.

These are the qualities of the life that has been claimed by Jesus Christ and is led by the Spirit. "Against such things there is no law" (v.23b). The last clause is most likely an understatement used for rhetorical effect. The law, as Paul has said, was given to restrain evil; but these qualities do not need to be restrained. Hence, no law opposes them. There may also be a sense in which Paul is suggesting that the law cannot be against those who live in this manner because by being so led, they are in principle fulfilling all that the law requires.

The Fruit of the Spirit

The aspects of the fruit of the Spirit advocated by Paul in Galatians 5:22–23 occur not only here but also elsewhere in the Scriptures. Most of the attributes are those by which God himself lives.

Aspect	GK number	Definition	Attribute of God	Attribute for Christians love	26	sacrificial, unmerited deeds to help a needy person	Ex 34:6; Jn 3:16; Ro 5:8; 1Jn 4:8, 16	Jn 13:34–35; Ro 12:9–10; 1Pe 1:22; 1Jn 4:7, 11–12, 21
joy	5915	an inner happiness not dependent on outward circumstances	Ps 104:31; Isa 62:5; Lk 15:7, 10	Dt 12:7, 12, 18; Ps 64:10; Isa 25:9; Php 4:4; 1Pe 1:8
peace	1645	harmony in all relationships	Isa 9:6–7; Eze 34:25; Jn 14:27; Heb 13:20	Isa 26:3; Ro 5:1; 12:18; 14:17; Eph 2:14–17
patience	3429	putting up with others, even when one is severely tried	Ro 9:22; 1Ti 1:16;1Pe 3:20; 2Pe 3:9, 15	Eph 4:2; Col 1:11; Heb 6:12; Jas 5:7–8, 10
kindness	5983	doing thoughtful deeds for others	Ro 2:4; 11:22; Eph 2:7; Tit 3:4	1Co 13:4; Eph 4:32; Col 3:12 goodness	20	showing generosity to others	Ne 9:25, 35; Ps 31:19; Mk 10:18	Ro 15:14; Eph 5:9; 2Th 1:11
faithfulness	4411	trustworthiness and reliability	Ps 33:4; 1Co 1:9; 10:13; Heb 10:23; 1Jn 1:9	Lk 16:10–12; 2Th 1:4; 2Ti 4:7; Tit 2:10
gentleness	4559	meekness and humility	Zec 9:9; Mt 11:29	Isa 66:2; Mt 5:5; Eph 4:2; Col 3:12
self-control	1602	victory over sinful desires		Pr 16:32; Tit 1:8; 2:12; 1Pe 5:8–9; 2Pe 1:6

24 It should be evident by this time that the warfare between the sinful nature and the Spirit is both intense and unremitting. The qualities of each are fundamentally opposite, and those who feel caught in this warfare cannot do the good they would like to do. How, then, is victory to be achieved? What must believers do to triumph? In the final verses of this chapter Paul gives two answers.

First, he reminds his readers that when they came to Christ, they repented fully of the works of the sinful nature and indeed turned their backs on them forever. This act they must sustain. In speaking of this radical repentance, Paul uses the vivid image of crucifixion, though in a different way from such passages as Ro 6:6 and Gal 2:20. In those instances, the verb is in the passive voice ("was crucified," "have been crucified"), and the reference is to what has been done for believers as a result of Christ's death. But in this passage the verb is in the active voice ("have crucified") and points rather to what believers have themselves done and must continue to do. The proper term to describe this act is repentance. Thus believers have already repented of their former way of life to the degree of actually having executed the old nature. This does not mean that the battle is thereby over, however. As in an actual crucifixion, life lingers even though the criminal has been nailed to the cross. Nevertheless, believers must regard the decisive act as having been done. They are not to seek to remove from the cross what has once been nailed there.

25 The second answer is Paul's reminder that since believers have been made alive by the Spirit, they must also walk by the Spirit. The Spirit leads; they must follow. Indeed, they are to get in line with him or keep in step with him.

26 It is hard to tell whether this verse belongs with the preceding section or with what follows. Certainly, it is the first of a number of specific actions that should characterize those who are being led by the Spirit. On the other hand, it is also a return to the theme of v.15 and, therefore, a summation. This verse probably refers to a situation Paul knew to be existing in Galatia and hence is a direct attempt to discourage pride and dampen party spirit. Walking by the Spirit is the ultimate solution to such evils.

D. Two Practical Exhortations (6:1–10)

1. Bearing one another's burdens (6:1–5)

In the closing verses of ch. 5, Paul contrasted the works of the sinful nature and the fruit of the Spirit, concluding that Christians must live Spirit-led lives. But what does it mean to live a life characterized by love, joy, peace, patience, and the other virtues? To those who might prefer a mystical experience or a flight of fancy, it comes as a shock to find Paul returning at once to the most down-to-earth subjects—personal relationships (vv.1–5) and the use of money (vv.6–10)—and to find him measuring spirituality by action in these areas. Christians need to learn that it is in concrete situations, rather than in emotional highs, that the reality of the Holy Spirit in their lives is demonstrated.

1 The first situation is one that, more than any other, reveals the real character and spiritual maturity of a believer. Paul imagines a hypothetical situation—which is, however, not at all infrequent—in which one believer unexpectedly learns that another believer is trapped in some sin. What should one do? Does love mean that one should overlook the sin and refuse to face the facts? Or should one expose the sin openly and so gain a reputation for superior holiness? To Paul, a Spirit-led person should not proceed in either of these ways; he then goes on to describe the proper course of action.

First, Christians should restore the person who has fallen into sin. The verb used here is a medical term used for setting a fractured bone; what is wrong in the life of the fallen Christian must be set straight. It is not to be neglected or exposed openly.

Second, the work of restoration must be done by those who are "spiritual" (GK 4461). This word cuts two ways. It is obviously related to Paul's use of it at the end of ch. 5, as if to say, "Do you consider yourself to be a spiritual instead of a carnal Christian? Well, then, here is a good test. Restoring an erring Christian is exactly the kind of thing that spiritual Christians do." But Paul is also reminding his readers that only those who are genuinely led by the Spirit have the maturity to deal with sin in others. Every Christian should desire such maturity.

Third, the restoration should be made "gently" (cf. 5:22), being aware that no one is immune to temptation and that everyone can fall. Such an attitude avoids unkind gossip, prevents more serious backsliding, advances the good of the Church, and glorifies the name of Christ.

2 The second practical example of spirituality is the bearing of one another's burdens. Paul refers to helping other Christians—sharing their load—whenever temptations oppress them or life depresses them. Here Paul deliberately returns to the thought of love being the fulfillment of the law, for the "law of Christ" is the new commandment (Jn 13:34) fulfilled in part by such actions. The burdens we do impose on ourselves should be the burdens of mutual sympathy.

3 Two errors might keep believers from fulfilling this role of mutual sympathy. The first is conceit, i.e., Christians thinking themselves to be more important than they are. The implication seems to be that if Christians neglect or refuse to bear another's burdens, it is because they think themselves above it. But this is to be self-deceived, for, measured by God's standards, no one amounts to anything. A positive statement of the same principle occurs in Ro 12:3.

4 The second error that might keep believers from bearing the burdens of another Christian is to be always comparing themselves and their own works with others. This can be harmful both in a positive sense ("I am doing better than they are") and in a negative sense ("I am unable to do anything; everyone else is much better"). To counter both these forms of the error, Paul suggests that each believer has a task from the Lord and is responsible only to the Lord for doing it. To use others as a norm for one's activities is a kind of escape. When Christians have their eyes on God rather than on other Christians, then in their own eyes they will at best be unprofitable servants (Lk 17:10) and God himself will receive glory (2Co 10:12–18).

5 In other words, the duty of each Christian is to carry his or her own load. There is no contradiction between this verse and v.2, for different words are used for what one is to bear. The word in v.2 (GK 983) means "heavy burdens"—those that are more than one person should carry. The word in this verse (GK 5845) denotes a person's "pack." Each Christian has his or her own work to do, so let each one take pride in how they do it.

2. The use of money (6:6–10)

The second area to which Paul seeks to apply the life of the Spirit in a practical way is the use of money; indeed, few things more clearly disclose the priorities of the heart than this. While many commentators hesitate to relate this entire section to the use of money, and while it is true that the section as a whole goes beyond that topic, at least three factors indicate that Paul was thinking primarily of money. First, the phrase "do good to all" (v.10) is certainly a euphemism for giving alms, so that a concern for financial matters never entirely leaves Paul's mind. Second, v.7 is a proverb that Paul used on at least one other occasion to encourage generous giving (2Co 9:6). Finally, giving was important to Paul at this time, for the collection for the Jerusalem poor was part of his policy and the admonition to proceed with it was fresh in his mind as a result of the Jerusalem council (Gal 2:10). This passage may even be alluding to the collection.

Three uses of money are mentioned: (1) the support of the teacher in a Christian congregation, (2) the use of money to build up the life of the Spirit rather than to feed the flesh, and (3) the spending of money to help others, particularly Christians. The principle that ties all three points together is that enunciated in the proverb: reaping is in proportion to sowing.

6 The reference to the one "who receives instruction" probably does not imply a fully developed catechetical system, but it does point to a class of paid teachers at a surprisingly early date. Paul's own policy was to preach the Gospel without receiving money, preferring to earn his living as a leatherworker. But this was in pioneer work. As soon as possible he seems to have established a more fixed structure. So here, as elsewhere (1Co 9:11, 14; 1Ti 5:17–18; cf. Lk 10:7), he asserts that a worker is worthy of his pay.

To support the Lord's servants is not, however, a grim duty. Instead, Paul speaks of it as mutual sharing. As the teacher shares the good things of the word, so the congregation is to share all good things with the teacher (cf. Ro 15:27).

7 The special advice of v.6 is now enlarged to benevolence in general, and the principle that ties everything together is stated: "A man reaps what he sows." This is an immutable law of God, which the phrase "God cannot be mocked" emphasizes. Consequently, though people may fool themselves (by sowing little but expecting much), they cannot fool God, and the results of their poor sowing will be manifest.

8 The principle of sowing and reaping is especially true of Christian living. Those who spend their money on what gratifies their fleshly nature will reap a fleshly harvest. And since the flesh is mortal and will one day pass away, the harvest will pass away also. On the other hand, those who use their money to promote spiritual causes and to feed their spiritual nature will have a bountiful harvest. While the primary application of this principle is to money, it also applies more broadly. For example, if congregations refuse to support ministers and so forfeit good teaching, preferring to spend their money on themselves, the results will be corruption. But if, on the other hand, they support good teachers, a spiritual harvest will result. The principle also applies to the use of time, the use of the mind, etc.

9 The great hindrance to good sowing is weariness that results in discouragement and eventually in giving up. Four months elapse between planting and harvest (Jn 4:35); and, while it is true that in spiritual sowing the results may occasionally come sooner, more often they take much longer. The best reason for resisting weariness and giving up is that if the necessary preparation is done, the harvest is certain.

One cannot help feeling that Paul may be talking to himself as he thinks of the extensive but thus far unrewarding efforts he had expended on the churches of Galatia. The change to the first person plural supports this supposition.

10 Finally, Paul speaks broadly about the obligation to do good to all people, returning again primarily to the thought of giving money. But suppose a Christian is limited in his resources? In that case, says Paul, he or she should give primarily to Christian causes, knowing that if they are not supported by Christians, they will not be supported at all. One with unlimited funds should give to every valid charity that comes along.

Two parts of this verse are of special interest. (1) Paul speaks of the "family of believers." This really means those who have become related to us by believing in Christ and points to a relationship transcending all others. Giving should not be unduly restricted by denominational or party loyalty. (2) Paul mentions "opportunity" (GK 2789; also translated "time" in v.9). This word denotes "the proper time" for anything; consequently a time that occurs only once before it is lost forever. No one can hope to reap a harvest before the time appointed for it by God (v.9). But if one does not seize the time appointed for sowing, he or she will never reap a harvest.

3. Conclusion (6:11–18)

The apostle has said nearly everything he wishes to say, and the letter is drawing to a close. He now takes the pen from the hand of his writing secretary and adds a summary in his own handwriting. It contains a fresh warning against the legalizers, a restatement of the basic principle that Christianity is internal and supernatural rather than external and human (as the legalizers were trying to make it), a final reference to his own suffering for the cause of Christ, and a benediction. The somewhat abrupt ending has the effect of leaving the great issue of the letter—faith or works—sharply before the Galatians.

11 There can be little doubt that Paul took the pen in his own hand at this point and that he did so for at least two purposes: (1) to authenticate the letter, as he seems also to have done on other occasions (cf. 1Co 16:21; Col 4:18; 2Th 3:17), and (2) to emphasize his main points. There is less agreement about the meaning of the words "large letters," though most now see this as referring to the size of his letters. But why write in large letters? It is generally assumed that Paul increased the size of his letters for emphasis, much as in contemporary printing a paragraph is italicized or set in boldface. Another possibility is that Paul's large letters were due to poor eyesight (cf. 4:15; perhaps also his "thorn in the flesh" in 2Co 12:7).

12 For the last time Paul speaks of the legalizers, this time warning the Galatians about what they were attempting to do and why they were doing it. The object of their legalism is "to make a good impression outwardly." The Greek for this phrase is richer than any single English translation can make it. For one thing, the verb translated "to make a good impression" carries overtones of insincerity; they were not what they seemed. The word "outwardly" is literally, "in flesh" (sarx; see comment on 5:16); it refers to people whom the legalizers wanted to impress, and to circumcision, which had become the touchstone of their religion. In contrast to this, Christianity consists in those who, as a result of his grace, have become new creatures (vv.14–15) desiring to please God.

But why did the legalizers persevere so strongly in their error if, indeed, as Paul claims, it is an error? There are two reasons. First, they desired to escape the persecution that is attached to Christ's cross. The cross on which the Son of God died presents three disquieting and humiliating doctrines: (1) human beings are sinners; (2) their sin brings them under the curse of God, which Christ bore; and (3) nothing they can do can earn salvation, for if this were possible, the cross would have been unnecessary. These doctrines humble people. Consequently, they hate the cross and actively persecute those who proclaim it.

13 Second, the legalizers persevered in their error because they desired to boast that they had been able to win over the Galatians to Judaism. There were two things wrong with this. (1) It was an attempt to win others to that which was itself bankrupt; for not even those who were circumcised (i.e., Jews) were able to keep the law. (2) It was based on pride; the legalizers wanted to boast in the "flesh" of the Galatians (i.e., in the number of circumcisions). They were trophy hunters and wanted to be able to report on mass "conversions" in Galatia. The humbling parallel would be in the tendency to take pride in counting the number of "decisions for Christ" or "baptisms" today.

14 Over against all such improper and sinful boasting, Paul sets an entirely different boasting of his own—a boasting "in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." So important is this cause of boasting that, says Paul, it is inconceivable that he could boast in anything else. It is striking how much of the Gospel is involved in this statement. The cross speaks of the atonement necessitated by human sin (see comment on v.12). The full name of the Savior speaks of the significance of his person and the role he played (lit., "God who saves, the Messiah"). Finally, the pronoun "our" speaks of the personal aspects of Christ's redemption, for it becomes "ours" through the response of faith.

The legalizers had a motive for their actions. Well, so did Paul—only his motive was not that of a fear of persecution or of a desire to boast in statistics; rather, he boasted in the cross of Christ because of what the cross had accomplished in his life. As Paul looks back on his life he realizes that before his conversion he was exactly like the legalizers. Once he, too, was ruled by externals and gloried in human attainment (Php 3:3–6). But when he met Jesus, all this passed for him, so much so that he is able even to apply the bold image of crucifixion to it. The world with its selfish attitudes was crucified to him and he to the world. In its place came Christ alone—Christ, who is everything.

15 The summary is brief. Neither circumcision nor uncircumcision counts for anything as a means of salvation (cf. 5:6; 1Co 7:19). The only thing that counts is to be born again, to become a new creation. This comes about not by observing the law in any form but by receiving the truth of the Gospel.

16 Has anyone yet missed the point? If so, Paul will state it once again in even starker language—"Peace and mercy to all who follow this rule, even to the Israel of God" (cf. the blessings of Pss 125:5; 128:6). This statement makes three points: (1) the peace and mercy of God are given only to those who adhere to this Gospel; (2) all who believe the Gospel have an obligation to continue walking in it; and (3) these, and these only, are the true Israel. "Rule" here clearly refers to the heart of the Gospel just enunciated, though it may also be applied to the "canon" of Scripture and to the whole of Christian doctrine. There can be no peace or mercy for the church when those responsible for following this "rule" depart from it.

17–18 Paul's last words are a request and a benediction. The request is that henceforth he be not troubled with the kind of problem that had erupted in the Galatian churches. He does not want them to trouble him any longer by giving way to the legalistic heresies, for he has suffered enough already. It would be far better if the churches he founded at such cost would assume their own share of suffering, above all by resisting the kind of teaching that the legalizers upheld and therefore, if necessary, by enduring whatever persecution might follow.

The "marks [GK 5116] of Jesus" refer to the scars Paul bore on his body as the result of the persecutions he had endured for the sake of his Lord (cf. 2Co 6:2–6; 11:23–30). These marks revealed his relationship to Christ, just as the marks of a slave revealed his ownership. These genuine and honorable marks in the body contrast strikingly with the ritualistic mark of circumcision the legalizers wished to impose on the Galatians.

Paul ends the letter as he had begun it, upon the single and glorious note of God's grace, expressing the wish that this grace might abide with the spirits of the Galatians. The church will always know great days when whatever external marks there might be (v.17) are not an effort to impress God ritualistically but are a natural result of true Christian service.

The Old Testament in the New

OT Text	NT Text	Subject
Gal 3:6	Ge 15:6	Faith of Abraham
Gal 3:8	Ge 12:3; 18:18	Gospel to Abraham
Gal 3:10	Dt 27:26	Curse of the law
Gal 3:11	Hab 2:4	The righteous live by faith
Gal 3:12	Lev 18:5	Living by the law
Gal 3:13	Dt 21:23	Curse of the cross
Gal 3:16	Ge 13:15; 24:7	Offspring of Abraham
Gal 4:27	Isa 54:1	Joy of the barren woman
Gal 4:30	Ge 21:10	Expulsion of Ishmael
Gal 5:14	Lev 19:18	Love your neighbor as yourself

Ephesians

INTRODUCTION

1. Authorship

The letter to the Ephesians was accepted as the work of the apostle Paul until about the beginning of the 1800s, when his authorship came under suspicion. Such denials have persisted to the present day among a considerable body of scholars. But a strong case can still be made for the traditional view.

First, Ephesians clearly claims to have been written by Paul. The writer begins by identifying himself and proceeds in typically Pauline fashion to ascribe his apostolic authority to the will of God (1:1; cf. 2Co 1:1; Gal 1:1; Col 1:1). Paul's name also reappears later (3:1). The writer often uses the first person singular, and the self-portrait that emerges from these passages corresponds with what we know about Paul from other sources.

The structure of Ephesians is in line with the rest of Paul's correspondence. We can trace the same sequence of salutation, thanksgiving, doctrinal exposition, moral appeal, final courtesies, and benediction. Particularly striking is the author's treatment of ethics as an extension of theology, so typical of Paul. Furthermore, the language used is sufficiently similar to that of the other letters of Paul to substantiate his authorship.

Furthermore, the doctrinal stance of this letter is characteristically Pauline. While it is true that fresh emphases appear (particularly in the doctrine of the church), the reader gains the overall impression of continuity with Pauline thought. These familiar themes recur: God's gracious sovereignty (1:3, 9, 11, 12; 2:4–7), the centrality of Christ's work of reconciliation on the cross (1:7; 2:13–18), the resurrection and exaltation of Christ (1:20–22), and the distinctive ministry of the Holy Spirit (2:18, 22; 3:5, 16; 4:1–4, 30; 5:18; 6:18). While there are differences in his treatment of these themes, these developments are consistent with Paul's other letters. In other words, in Ephesians Paul seeks to relate the great doctrines he has previously handled to the concept of the church as the body of Christ through which the purpose of God is fulfilled.

Regarding external evidence, Ephesians was widely circulated and accepted as one of Paul's letters by the middle of the second century. It was listed in the canon of Marcion (c. A.D. 140) and in the Muratorian Canon (c. A.D. 180). That is, this letter was unhesitatingly assigned to Paul from the time when the NT corpus began to be recognized in the mid-second century.

2. Destination

a. The problem

To whom was this letter addressed? The title "To the Ephesians" was supplied at least as early as the middle of the second century and appears on all subsequent Greek manuscripts. It was almost everywhere acknowledged as directed to the Christians in Ephesus; the only exception is Marcion, who referred to it as the Epistle to the Laodiceans.

But uncertainty as to the destination of Ephesians and the originality of the title arises from a textual problem in 1:1. The definitive place name "in Ephesus" is omitted from some of the oldest and most reliable manuscripts. If "in Ephesus" did in fact appear in the original text, then reasons would have to be sought to explain its omission in the earlier manuscripts.

Furthermore, an examination of the letter itself serves to deepen the suspicions aroused by the textual dilemma. Paul does not appear to be acquainted with his readers personally, or at least not with all of them. He has only heard of their faith and love (1:15), and they have only heard of the stewardship of God's grace entrusted to him (3:2). Paul seems only to be able to assume that they have been taught the truth about Jesus (4:21). Yet Paul had remained in Ephesus for no less than three years. Could he have written like this to the Christians there?

There is little trace of local coloring in the letter. Timothy, for example, was with Paul when he wrote Colossians and Philemon (Col 1:1; Phm 1), two letters written about the same time. Timothy was well known in Ephesus (Ac 19:22), yet he is not mentioned in Ephesians. Moreover, there are no personal greetings, nor is a single word of familiarity or affection to be found. Even the benediction is in the third person and not the second, as in every other instance in Paul's letters (6:23–24). These considerations compel us to subscribe to the general consensus today, which considers it most unlikely that the Ephesian church was exclusively or immediately addressed.

b. Possible solution

Various solutions have been proposed to the lack of "in Ephesus" in 1:1. Of these, the best is to see this letter as a circular letter. On this view Ephesians is a letter intended to be read by Christians living in the Roman province of Asia, of which Ephesus was the capital. It was not addressed to any particular local congregation, but to all. From Ephesus it was circulated throughout the churches of Asia, no doubt by means of a courier (possibly Tychicus; cf. 6:21; Col 4:7). An alternate acceptable view is that at some stage copies of this letter were sent to other churches with the original destination erased, so that the church could fit in its own name. A few manuscripts omit "in Rome" from Ro 1:7, giving rise to a similar conjecture that this letter was also used for more a general distribution.

3. Background

The foundation of the Ephesian church was laid by the apostle Paul on his return from his second missionary journey. On his route from Greece to Syria, the apostle paid a visit to Ephesus, accompanied by Priscilla and Aquila, whom he left behind in the city (Ac 18:18–21). It was only a brief stopover, for he was hurrying on to Jerusalem. He found time, however, to engage in dialogue with the Jewish leaders in the local synagogue. He so impressed them that they begged him to remain. He was unable to change his plans, though he promised to return if that was God's will for him.

Clearly this proved to be so, for he included Ephesus in his itinerary on his next missionary tour and actually extended his stay to a period of approximately three years, probably from A.D. 54 to 57 (Ac 19:8, 10, 21–22). Evidently the apostle realized the strategic potential of the metropolis, situated on the main highway between east and west. Ephesus was surrounded by 230 independent communities within the Roman province of Asia. If the Christian faith were firmly established in the capital city, it could be spread from the hub to the rim.

While in Ephesus, Paul began by resuming his previous confrontation with the Jews, but he soon aroused opposition. He took his converts with him and transferred to the lecture hall of Tyrannus, where he held daily conferences over a period of two years (Ac 19:9). From Ephesus, all the residents of provincial Asia, Jews and Greeks alike, heard the word of the Lord (Ac 19:10). Those who came into the capital on business or for pleasure could not fail to hear of what was happening. Some apparently became Christians and then went back to their own towns to communicate the gospel. The places in Asia explicitly named in the NT include the seven churches referred to in Rev 2–3, together with Troas, Assos, Adramyttium, Miletus, Trogyllium, and Hierapolis.

This remarkable expansion led to and was temporarily halted by the disturbance described in Ac 19:23–41, when Demetrius the silversmith rallied his fellow trade-unionists to riot against the Christian movement. Paul was already on the point of departure, and this was the signal for his withdrawal. On his last voyage to Syria, he landed at Miletus and there took leave of the Ephesian elders, committing the oversight of the flock to them in a solemn and moving charge (Ac 20:18–35). Paul was never to visit Ephesus again. Yet it is altogether credible that he would wish to write a circular letter to the church in Ephesus and to all the Christian communities established during the Ephesian mission.

4. Place of Origin and Date

Paul wrote Ephesians from prison (3:1; 4:1; 6:20). Since Tychicus was the bearer of this letter (6:21), as well as of Colossians (Col 4:7) and presumably of Philemon also (cf. Phm 24), it may be deduced that these three documents belong to the same time and place. But where was Paul imprisoned? Three possibilities present themselves: Rome (Ac 28:30), Ephesus (cf. 1Co 15:32; 2Co 1:8–10), and Caesarea (Ac 24:23)—see introduction to Philippians. Of these, the best (and the traditional) choice is Rome.

Paul was placed under house arrest in Rome for two years (Ac 28:30). The conditions of his free confinement allowed him scope to proclaim the gospel (Ac 28:16–17, 23, 31; Eph 6:18–20; Php 1:12–18; Col 4:2–4), and from prison he wrote Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon. A Roman imprisonment accords well with the personal references in each of these letters. The mention of the palace guard and the emperor's household in Php 1:13 and 4:22 favors it. The fact that Paul is conscious that he might have to face a sentence of death also confirms a location in Rome (Php 1:19–26; 2:17, 23). Aristarchus is associated with Paul's greetings in Col 4:10, and we are told in Ac 27:2 that he accompanied Paul on the journey to Rome. The presence of Luke (Col 4:14) during the Roman imprisonment is attested by Ac 28:14, 16.

The date of Ephesians is tied up with the question of its place of origin, and, of course, its authorship. If we are correct in our analysis of those two matters, then the letter was written sometime around A.D. 60, perhaps as late as 63. Almost certainly Ephesians was written shortly after both Colossians and Philemon.

5. Occasion and Purpose

While Paul was under house detention in Rome, he enjoyed certain privileges, such as the freedom to receive a constant stream of visitors. Representatives of the Jewish community came to inquire about Christianity (Ac 28:22–23), and some of Paul's intimate friends were with him (e.g., Luke, Aristarchus, and Timothy). From time to time he received messengers from churches that he had started, one of whom was Epaphras (see Col 1:7; 4:12; Phm 23). This man seems to have been instrumental in evangelizing the Lycus Valley region during the Ephesian mission and founded churches in Colosse, Hierapo-

Ephesus

In the Time of Paul

The province of Asia with its many splendid cities was one of the jewels on a belt of Roman lands encircling the Mediterranean.

Located on the most direct sea and land route to the eastern provinces of the empire, Ephesus was an emporium that had few equals anywhere in the world. Certainly no city in Asia was more famous or more populous. It ranked with Rome, Corinth, Antioch and Alexandria among the foremost urban centers of the empire.

Situated on an inland harbor (now silted up), the city was connected by a narrow channel via the Cayster River with the Aegean Sea some three miles away. Ephesus boasted impressive civic monuments, including, most prominently, the temple of Artemis (Diana), one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. Coins of the city proudly displayed the slogan Neokoros, "temple-warden."

Here in Ephesus Paul preached to large crowds of people. The silversmiths complained that he had influenced large numbers of people here in Ephesus and in practically the whole province of Asia (Ac 19:23). In one of the most dramatic events recorded in the NT, the apostle escaped a huge mob in the theater. This structure, located on the slope of Mt. Pion at the end of the Arcadian Way, could seat 25,000 people!

Other places doubtless familiar to the apostle were the Commerical Agora, the Magnesian Gate, the Town Hall or "Council House," and the Street of the Curetes. The location of the lecture hall of Tyrannus, where Paul taught, is unknown.

© 1985 The Zondervan Corporation

lis, and Laodicea. Epaphras came to Paul in Rome to bring a progress report about these congregations. There was much to rejoice about, but he also told Paul about a virulent heresy that was threatening Christians in Colosse and perhaps others (see introduction to Colossians).

Tychicus, another friend of Paul and a native of Ephesus, was also with Paul at this time. He was about to leave for the province of Asia, and Paul took advantage of using him as a courier for Colossians. Also, Onesimus (a fugitive slave from Colosse) had been befriended by Paul at this time and had confessed Christ. He had defrauded his master Philemon, and Paul was anxious that he be pardoned and possibly released for Christian service. Paul therefore decided to send Onesimus along with Tychicus (see introduction to Philemon).

But before Tychicus and Onesimus left, Paul finished a third letter to take along—one that he sent to Ephesus and to all the churches founded as a result of his mission throughout Asia. As befits a letter intended for more general circulation, Paul did not deal with particular issues (as in Colossians). His aim was not to combat error and expose false teaching. Rather, it was more detached and therefore more exalted. He rose above the smoke of battle and captured a vision of God's sovereign plan that transcends the bitterness of controversy and the necessity for the church militant to fight incessantly for its very existence. Consequently, he treated his doctrinal themes more broadly in terms of the fellowship of Christians in Christ's body, the church, and the reconciliation of the entire universe to him. Yet Paul's objective was not purely inspirational. He sought to relate his vision to the practical demands of Christians living in a hostile society.

6. Theological Values

Ephesians is above all a hymn of unity. Paul's conception of oneness in Christ extends beyond the church to include all creation. God's ultimate purpose is "to bring all things in heaven and on earth together under one head, even Christ" (1:10). Yet our Lord has been appointed as "head over everything for the church, which is his body, the fullness of him who fills everything in every way" (1:22–23). The corporate aspect of Christ's Saviorhood and Lordship, adumbrated in other letters and particularly in Colossians, is here expounded more thoroughly.

Unity was a topic of general interest in the first century A.D. The Stoic philosophers recognized an orderliness in the universe which they attributed to the cosmic Reason or Logos. The fact that much of the Mediterranean world was politically unified under the imperial government led to the vision of a universal commonwealth. At the same time the mystery cults, which were gaining in popularity as conventional religion declined, offered a certain sense of oneness in the common quest for deliverance from demonic forces and the achievement of personal integration.

In Ephesians Paul was able to demonstrate that this almost obsessive search for unity finds its ultimate goal only in Christ. It is he who represents the coordinating principle of all life. The ideal of world citizenship, cherished by the philosophers, is realized in the universal church. Human beings can be liberated from bondage to the principalities and powers that threaten their welfare only as they share the triumph Christ gained over them at the Cross (1:21; 2:2; 3:10–11; 6:12–13; cf. Col 2:15). Thus the distinctive theology of Ephesians is no academic abstraction. It was tuned to the contemporary mood of Paul's day, and in a deeply divided world today it still conveys a relevant word from God.

EXPOSITION

Salutation (1:1–2)

1 As in his other letters, Paul adopts the conventional form of address used in letters of the period. Usually a writer identified himself, named the prospective recipients, and added some expressions of greeting. Paul freely expanded or contracted these three items as circumstances required.

Each phrase of this salutation can be paralleled in other Pauline letters. Paul usually refers to his apostleship at the opening of his letters. "Apostle" (GK 693) is a comprehensive term for one who bears the NT message. It was applied first to the original disciples (Mt 10:2; Ac 1:2) and then to other Christian missionaries (Ac 14:14; Ro 16:7). Paul claimed that, like that of the Twelve, his commission came directly from Christ (Ac 26:16–18; 1Co 9:1). This title stresses the authority of the sender and the accountability of the one sent. Paul alludes to "the will of God," not in order to draw attention to his own status but to reflect his awareness that his mission did not arise from any qualifications he himself might possess.

Paul regularly addresses "the saints" (GK 41) in the church to which he writes. This word is the normal NT designation for Christians; it denotes inward, personal consecration to God. As in Col 1:2, he describes them as "faithful . . . in Christ."*"Faithful" (GK 4412) combines the ideas of trust and fidelity. This exercise of faith with its matching faithfulness is possible only "in Christ Jesus." On the particular question whether "in Ephesus" belongs in this letter, see the introduction.

2 "Grace" (GK 5921) and "peace" (GK 1645) reflect the standard greetings in Greek and Hebrew (cf. Ro 1:7b) Paul prefers to replace the Greek chaire ("rejoice") by charis ("grace") as embodying the essence of the gospel. For "peace" (Heb. shalom; Gk 8934), see Ezr 4:17; 5:7; 7:12; Da 4:1; 6:25, et al. Paul associates "the Lord Jesus Christ" with "God our Father" as the originator of these blessings. The name of Christ appears in each of the three clauses in this opening salutation. What follows in the body of Ephesians has to do with the relationship between "the saints" and their living Lord.

II. Doctrine: The Implications of Christian Faith (1:3–3:21)

A. An Act of Praise (1:3–14)

As in previous Pauline letters, the first part of Ephesians is doctrinal and the second part practical. In this case, however, the whole doctrinal section (1:3–3:21) is a thanksgiving expressed in the language of worship and prayer.

3 The focus of praise in vv.3–14 is what God has done in Christ. Christian faith and life have their center in God's Son, and the letter therefore opens with an expression of gratitude for all that is found in him. It is cast in the form of a Jewish blessing. Its structure is poetic and is ruled by parallelism, though scholars are not agreed as to how its stanzas are to be grouped.

"Praise be to" (or "blessed be"; GK 2329) is used exclusively of God (Father or Son) in the NT to indicate the One who alone is worthy of worship. "Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" is a distinctively Christian addition arising out of a unique relationship. God who is to be blessed has already blessed all his people in Christ through the saving events of his life, death, and resurrection. A blessing in the OT denotes the bestowal of good; it is often material and invariably specific. God's blessings for us in Christ are more exclusively spiritual but nonetheless definite. These benefits are "spiritual" (GK 4461) in nature because they are communicated to us through the Holy Spirit, whose function is to transfer to believers all that God has achieved in Christ. They have already been secured "in the heavenly realms" (cf. 1:20: 2:6; 3:10; 6:12) where Christ now reigns, having triumphed over "the spiritual forces of evil" (6:12) that threatened to usurp control. Their value is measured by the price that was paid to obtain them when on the cross the Son of God fought satanic opponents and disarmed them (Col 2:15).

4 Paul now traces the spiritual blessings of v.3 to their ultimate source in the eternal purpose of God. Christians have been selected in Christ prior to the work of creation. The verb "chose" (GK 1721) is the usual one employed in LXX in connection with God's choice of Israel. Before the foundations of the world were laid, God had determined that all who believed on his Son should be saved.

Election in Christ has a moral aim in view: to be "holy" (GK 41) and "blameless" (GK 320). "Holy" means to be set apart for God in order to reflect his purity; "blameless" means "free from blemish," like the sacrificial animals presented on the altar in the old dispensation. The latter word is applied to Christ himself (Heb 9:14), to the ideal church (Eph 5:27), and to Christians at the end of the age (2Pe 3:14; Jude 24) and also now (Php 2:15).

5 The NIV takes "in love" (v.4) as starting a new sentence, thus emphasizing the loving nature of predestination. Any interpretation of this mysterious doctrine that detracts from the love of God is rightly suspect. It has to do with those who through Christ are to be received into God's family by adoption. Under Roman law, an adopted son enjoyed the same status and privileges as a real son. Christ is God's Son "by nature"; believers are so by adoption and grace, yet they are co-heirs with him (Ro 8:17). The basis of this gracious action is in the character of God himself—his "pleasure" (GK 2306) and "will" (GK 2525).

6 The ultimate aim throughout the divine plan of redemption is that the recognition of God's merciful dealings with people should evoke unlimited praise. The "grace" (GK 5921) that evokes such praise finds its richest outlet in God's love-gift to us—his Son. It is the objective grace of God that is in view, indicating his favorable regard, rather than the further ethical effect of that grace in making us gracious.

The Son is referred to as the one the Father loves. "Beloved" is a title applied in LXX to Israel in its special role as God's chosen race, along with "Servant" and "Elect." Because of his filial obedience, Jesus gained the Father's approval.

7–8 Paul proceeds to list some of the blessings that flow from the matchless grace of God. It may be that an early Christian confession of faith underlies this text. These blessings are all "in Christ"; he is not only their source but also their sphere (cf. Col 1:14). They are enjoyed by the believer in the present.

"Redemption" (GK 667) has to do with the emancipation either of slaves or of prisoners. The term implies the payment of a ransom price, a factor frequently reflected in its usage. Here it is specified as being "through his blood" (cf. Col 1:20). The price paid for our redemption from bondage to sin was costly beyond measure; it was the very lifeblood of Christ himself, poured out in his death on the Cross. What was foreshadowed in the Levitical system of sacrifices was realized at the Cross when the Son of God laid down his life in death and ransomed us from sin.

"Forgiveness" (GK 912) means loosing a person from what binds him or her; it stems from a verb meaning "to send away" (GK 918). When God deals with our sin, it is dispatched into the wilderness like the scapegoat (Lev 16:20–22). Here, however, the reference is not to "sin" (GK 281), as in Col 1:14, but to "sins" (GK 4183). The first term denotes a sinful condition; the second, sinful acts or deviations from the right path. Forgiveness deals with both. The magnanimity of God displayed in redemption and remission of sins is in proportion to "the riches of God's grace" (a Pauline expression that also occurs in 1:18; 2:4, 7; 3:8, 16).

These riches of grace have been "lavished" (GK 4355) on us; God always gives generously. Paul then enumerates further blessings: every kind of "wisdom" (GK 5053; i.e., knowledge which sees things as they really are) and "understanding" (GK 5860; i.e., discernment that leads to right action).

9–10 What God has thus revealed is the mystery concerning his will. "Mystery" (GK 3696) is a recurring term in this letter (3:3–4, 9; 5:32; 6:19). Here, as in the rest of the NT, it simply means a truth once hidden but now made known (Ro 11:25; Col 1:26; cf. Mt 13:11, 35). For many Jews in Paul's day, the secret plan of God would become apparent at the end of the age. In the NT the unlocking of that mystery has now taken place by virtue of Christ's appearance in the flesh, and there is no need to wait till the last day. This affirmation may be intended to counteract the incipient Gnosticism appearing in Asia Minor (see introduction to Colossians). "Us" covers all believers (cf. "we" in vv.11–12).

All this is in accordance with God's "pleasure" (as in v.5), which has been set out in Christ (cf. v.11; Ro 1:13; 3:25). From all eternity, the Father cherished in his own mind a plan "to be put into effect" (GK 3873) in Christ (cf. 3:9). This has now been revealed to the church through Paul. In the rest of Ephesians the content of the plan is more fully elaborated. Here the apostle restricts himself to a brief summary.

This plan takes place when the messianic age is inaugurated. Salvation history is regarded as unfolding in a series of "times" (GK 2789) that reach their climax in the advent of Christ (Gal 4:4). The Christian era has still to run its course, however, and not until its close will God's eternal purpose come to full fruition (Ac 1:6). Then universal reconciliation will be achieved; God will "bring ... together under one head" (GK 368) everything in heaven and on earth under Christ (cf. 1Co 15:24–28; Php 2:10–11). This recognition of Christ's preeminence will ensure that the original harmony of the universe is restored (Ro 8:18–21). Christ's mission extends beyond the human race and assumes cosmic dimensions.

11 Paul now passes on to a further consideration—namely, that Christians have been "chosen [as heirs]" (GK 3103). Israel was regarded as the Lord's inheritance and portion. The church, the new Israel, now enters into the same privilege (Ro 8:17; Gal 3:29; Col 1:12). This apportionment stems from the divine foreordination (cf. vv.4–5). It is no accident that God has allotted to his new people in Christ the inheritance designed for those who recognize the Savior. But we must not think that Christians have somehow usurped Jewish privileges. Before time began, God marked out those in Christ to be co-heirs with his Son. Whatever he decides is put into effect, for he is the one who ensures that everything is worked out in line with his own will (cf. v.5).

12 So far, what Paul has written applies to Jews and Gentiles alike, united in the one body of Christ. Now he refers in turn to one class (v.12) and then to the other (vv.13–14). The "first to hope [GK 4598] in Christ" (lit., "the Christ" or "the Messiah") were Jews who recognized Jesus as their Messiah prior to the conversion of the Gentiles. This expectation of God's coming deliverer was distinctive to the Jews; the Gentiles had not entertained any such prospect (2:12). Paul earlier showed that the adoption of Christians as God's children furthers the praise of his glorious grace (v.6). Here he says that their participation in the divine inheritance will have a similar effect. The "glory," or revealed character, of God will shine out through them and evoke praise from the whole universe (3:10).

13 "You also," in contrast to "we," clearly identifies the Gentile Christians in Ephesus (cf. 2:19). They are only addressed in this specific manner in order to remind them that they are fully incorporated into the body of Christ. Jews can no longer cling to their former prerogatives; Gentiles are equal partners and in every respect share the inheritance. In the Christian community there are no second-class citizens.

It is the hearing of faith that brings salvation. The Ephesians had embraced "the word of truth"—i.e., the teaching that told them the truth because it was derived from the God of truth (4:21). The truth they needed to know was that they as Gentiles had a place in God's redemptive plan (2Co 6:7; Col 1:5; Jas 1:18). This was good news indeed, and through accepting it they were liberated from bondage to sin.

Hearing, faith, and salvation were immediately followed by the sealing of the Holy Spirit. At the moment they believed, the Ephesian Christians received the stamp of the Spirit (cf. Ac 19:2). Paul does not have water baptism primarily in mind here, but rather what water baptism symbolizes—the effusion of the Holy Spirit himself. He is made available to believers according to the promises recorded in the OT and confirmed by Jesus. The Holy Spirit is at once the one promised and the one in whom the promises are fulfilled.

A "seal" (GK 5381 & 5382) had various uses, all of which are instructive as applied to the Holy Spirit. It was affixed to a document to guarantee its genuineness. It was attached to goods in transit to indicate ownership and ensure protection. It also represented a designation of office in the state service.

14 Paul adds a further analogy: The Holy Spirit is a "deposit" (GK 775; cf. 2Co 1:22; 5:5). This word is borrowed from the commercial world and means a deposit or first installment in hire purchase. It is a token payment assuring the vendor that the full amount will eventually follow. Paul regards the Holy Spirit as the first installment of the Christian's inheritance. At the end of the age God will redeem his pledge and open the treasuries of heaven to all who are his in Christ. Meanwhile, the Spirit gives us the assurance that these things will one day be ours.

B. A Prayer of Intercession (1:15–23)

The Christian "blessing" in vv.3–14 has intervened between the opening salutation and the thanksgiving that normally follows it in Paul's letters. Although Paul uses the customary formula of gratitude in v.16, this section becomes a prayer of intercession from v.17 onward.

15 Paul's thanksgiving for the spiritual progress of the Ephesian Christians arises out of what he has just written in vv.13–14. News had been brought to him in Rome about the continuing "faith" and "love" displayed by those whom he now addresses (cf. Phm 5). Faith finds its focus in Christ and expresses itself in love to others (Gal 5:6). We need not assume that the reference in this verse is to their initial experience of Christ and that Paul therefore did not know them personally. On the other hand, if Ephesians is a circular letter, there may well have been some readers who were not actually known to him.

16 Paul assures the Ephesians of his unremitting remembrance of them in his prayers—both thankfulness and intercession. He had already taken on similar responsibilities in relation to other churches. "Remembering" (lit., "making mention") implies that those for whom Paul prayed were actually named before God.

17 The apostle addresses his constant prayer on their behalf to God, the only one who is capable of answering it (v.3). "Glorious Father" is a typical expression that points both to God's essential being and to what proceeds from it in mercy (v.7). Paul prays that his readers may be fully endowed with the Holy Spirit. God has already made provision for this, but it was necessary that they themselves should be quickened with the spiritual powers of wisdom and vision. "Revelation" (GK 637) refers here to the insight and discernment that the Spirit brings into the mysteries of divine truth (1Co 2:14, 16). All this is so that they may get to "know" God more completely.

18–19 Paul now employs an unusual and figurative expression ("the eyes of your heart") to denote an inner awareness, provided by the Holy Spirit, that realizes everything that God has made available to them. The "heart" (GK 2840) is the seat of thought and moral judgment as well as of feeling. Three items are selected for particular attention. (1) Calling ("called"; GK 3104) is regarded here as a pledge of "hope." This call has already taken place (2Ti 1:9) and yet represents an ongoing calling (1Th 2:12; 5:24); it looks to the future, since it is attached to the "blessed hope" (Tit 2:13) of eternal glory.

(2) Paul wants his readers to appreciate that they will inherit all the "riches" of God himself (cf. vv.11, 14). Old Israel was promised an inheritance on earth; new Israel is given an inheritance in heaven. The everlasting Canaan-rest of glory is assured all the saints, and God's faithfulness will be vindicated.

(3) Paul wants his readers to recognize the "incomparably great power" of God. The word "incomparably" (GK 5650) suggests an unimaginable divine potency that is directed toward all who believe. Paul then proceeds to collect all the synonyms he can lay hands on as he describes how the "power" (GK 1539) of God functions according to the "working" (GK 1918; cf. 3:7; 4:16) of the "strength" (GK 3197; cf. 6:10) of his might (GK 2709; cf. 6:10; a word used of bodily strength and muscular force).

20 Having piled up the vocabulary of divine power, Paul shows where it was most impressively exerted—in the resurrection of Christ and his subsequent exaltation to the place of authority. Paul has no hesitation in ascribing the resurrection of Jesus to the Father in accordance with other Scriptures. Yet Father and Son are so at one in this, as in all things, that our Lord could also claim in Jn 10:19 that he had authority both to relinquish his life and to resume it again.

Paul links with Christ's resurrection his ascension and his sitting down at God's right hand in heaven. God not only raised his Son from the grave but exalted him to the seat of power. Paul alludes here to Ps 110:1; the exaltation of the king of Israel as the Lord's anointed found its ultimate application in Christ's exaltation. Although spatial imagery is involved, we must not think of God's right hand as a place but as a symbol of authority. Similarly, the "heavenly realms" are not to be identified with outer space (cf. v.3).

21 "Far above" (cf. 4:10; Heb 9:5) is not a dimensional expression but simply indicates the superiority of Christ. "Rule" (GK 794), "authority" (GK 2026), "power" (see v.19), and "dominion" (GK 3262) no doubt reflect various degrees of angels in the Jewish hierarchy. They are not to be classified in a graded series, nor should we ask whether the ranks are arranged in ascending or descending order. Angels were thought to control human destiny, but Paul sees Christ as controlling them with absolute authority because he is infinitely superior.

Paul then proceeds to use a comprehensive phrase ("every title that can be given") to include not only those names known now by people living on earth but also those that will be used in "the [age] to come." The familiar contrast between the present era and the coming messianic age was adopted by writers in the early church who nevertheless recognized that for those in Christ the last days had already begun.

22 The apostle winds up this opening chapter by underlining the exaltation of Christ. The verb "placed . . . under" (GK 5718) refers not only to the supremacy of Christ but also to the subjection of all things to him (cf. 1Co 15:27). Psalm 8:6 (cf. Heb 2:8) is clearly in Paul's mind. The psalmist affirms humanity's dominion on earth; here Paul claims that Christ, as God's new man, has universal dominion. Human beings have largely forfeited their status through sin, but through Christ they are restored to their proper dignity. So far from constituting a threat to the realization of true humanity, the Christian gospel provides the only means by which it can be attained. Only at the end of the age will the consummation take place, when death itself will be finally overcome; yet even now the Christian becomes a new creation in Christ Jesus (2Co 5:17).

We might have expected the apostle to explain (cf. Col 1:15–20) that, as head over everything, Christ is head of his body, the company of believers. But that is not how he puts it. Instead, he says that Christ in his exaltation over the universe is God's gift bestowed on the church. In other words, the head of the church is also the head of all things. The church can thus overcome all opposition because of the absolute Lordship of Christ.

23 The church is described as Christ's body (Col 1:18). It is so not only in symbol but in fact (cf. 4:4, 12, 16; 5:30). The church is not an institution but an organism. It exists and functions only by reason of its vital relationship with the risen Lord as its Head. This picture of the church as a body deriving life and power from its Head is developed only in Ephesians and Colossians. In Paul's earlier letters the church is regarded as a body because its members are coordinated in a common function (see Ro 12:4–5; 1Co 10:17; 12:22–27; but cf. 1Co 11:3).

The church is further described as "the fullness of him who fills everything in every way." The precise significance of these enigmatic words has been widely discussed. "Fullness" (GK 4445) here suggests two things: (1) that which is filled with Christ; i.e., the church contains the fullness of Christ; (2) that which is filled by Christ; i.e., the church is filled by Christ not only with his own life and presence but also with the gifts and blessings he bestows. As his body, the church manifests Christ to the world, but it can do so only as he fills it with himself (Col 3:19) and with all his gifts of grace (Eph 4:7, 11; cf. 1Co 12:1–11). But this Christ also fills the whole universe. He is at once immanent within the church and transcendent over it, as he is both within and above the cosmos. This carefully balanced statement of Christ's role was designed to encourage the church militant here on earth.

C. Life from Death (2:1–10)

Ephesians 2 elaborates ch. 1. In vv.1–10 the theme of redemption (1:7) is developed in terms of God's raising of humanity from the death of sin to the new life in Christ (a theme that permeates Romans). From v.11 on, the theme of reconciliation (1:10, 22–23) applies to the relationship between Jews and Gentiles in the church. Throughout the chapter Paul contrasts humanity prior to the revelation of faith with humanity under faith.

1 "As for you" resumes the second person of 1:13, 15–18 and anticipates v.11 ("you who are Gentiles by birth"). However, as v.3 makes clear, the Jews are in no better condition, for the sinful human nature is shared by all alike (cf. Ro 2:1–3:20). Redemption has made it possible for human beings to be brought from death to life (v.5). Without God, people are spiritually dead (Col 2:13) and utterly unable to meet the requirements of the divine law (Ro 7:9). Paul is not speaking here about physical death nor only about the sinner's ultimate fate in the second death. What is meant is a real and present death. The most vital part of a person's personality—the spirit—is dead to the most important factor in life—God.

"Transgressions" (GK 4183) are lapses, while "sins" (GK 281) are shortcomings. This repetition simply serves to underscore the multiplicity of ways in which our spiritual death is evidenced.

2 Verses 2–4 are a typical Pauline digression. The mention of "transgressions and sins" in v.1 leads the apostle to supply a fuller account than he had intended of the Ephesians' former way of life. As a result, he does not pick up the thread of his original sentence until v.5.

To "live" (lit., "walk about"; GK 4344) is the customary word used in the Greek OT for one's manner of life. This use is carried over into the NT and is prominent in Paul's writings (cf. 2:10; 4:17; 5:2). The Ephesians' former walk-about, Paul adds, was in accordance with "the ways [lit., "age"; GK 172] of this world [GK 3180]" (cf. these same two words in 1Co 3:18–19). The terms represent the same idea from the standpoints of time and space respectively. The word "age" may even represent the devil (cf. 1 Cor 2:8).

In any case, the evil one is certainly identified in the two clauses that follow. He is the "ruler" (GK 807) of a realm said to be "of the air." Taken literally, this would signify the atmosphere around the earth, which, according to ancient cosmology, was the abode of demons. Paul may be adopting that term as a figure of speech to suggest Satan's dominion. Satan is also the unholy "spirit" (1Co 2:12) who apes the operations of his divine counterpart by being constantly "at work" (the same basic word as used of the Holy Spirit in Eph 1:19–20, implying a mutual rivalry). "Those who are disobedient" discloses the fact that rebellion against God and refusal to believe in him are inherent in humankind (Eph 5:16).

3 "Among them" refers to the "disobedient" rather than to "transgressions and sins" (v.1). So far Paul has been depicting the former lifestyle of Gentile Christians. Now he admits that Jewish believers were no better, for they too once "lived" an earth-bound life in the grip of sin. Nor does he exclude himself from this general indictment (cf. "all of us"), despite his claim to have been technically blameless under the law (Php 3:6; but cf. Ro 7:7–11).

The past life of Jewish Christians, like that of the Gentiles, was dominated by the appeal of fallen nature. The "sinful nature" (lit., "flesh"; GK 4922) is not merely the body but the whole person orientated away from God and toward one's own selfish concerns. Human beings have a multiplicity of sinful urges. "Thoughts" refers not to the mind itself but to the projects it entertains with uncontrolled abandon. The natural human being is altogether at the mercy of the tyrant self and its rash impulses.

Because of all this, the Jewish converts were just as much in danger of God's "wrath" and judgment as anyone. "By nature" (GK 5882) contrasts with "by grace" in vv.5, 8. Those who prefer to stand on their own and refuse to accept what God has done for them in Christ are self-condemned.

4 Over against humanity's churlish rejection of God, Paul sets God's gracious acceptance of human beings in Christ. Though he cannot approve of sin if he is to remain righteous, God is not hostile toward those he has created. He loves them and has made possible their reconciliation to himself. Had he decided to destroy his refractory children, he would have been entirely justified, and nothing could have averted the catastrophe (Hos 13:9). Instead, love led to "mercy" (GK 1799)—God's compassion for the helpless, issuing in action for their relief. There is an inexhaustible treasury of such mercy in the loving heart of God.

5 The main verb of this extended sentence in the Greek does not emerge until this verse (see comment on v.1). Paul's main point is that God "made us alive with [GK 5188] Christ" (cf. Col 2:15). This is the first of three verbs that describe what God has done in Christ for every Christian (the other two are in v.6). For those who were spiritually dead in transgressions, God gave new life together "with Christ." This is not the language of mysticism but of fact. The life Christians now possess is an effect of which Christ's resurrection was the cause.

Christ's revivification was by an act of God's power (cf. 1:19–20); the regeneration of believers is by an act of God's "grace" (GK 5921; a bold, definitive assertion that is reiterated in v.8). Salvation is viewed retrospectively. The Ephesians are now in the position of having been saved.

6 In addition to making us alive with Christ (v.5), God has "raised us up" with him (GK 5283; cf. Col 2:12) and has "seated us with" (GK 5154) him on his throne "in the heavenly realms." Jesus actually left the tomb in which he had been laid and appeared to his disciples; forty days later, he ascended into heaven (Ac 1:6–11) and sat down at the right hand of the Father (1:20–21). Both these

Comparison of Ephesians and Colossians

Paul wrote both Ephesians and Colossians about the same time, from prison in Rome. There are an amazing number of similarities in content between these two books.

Theme	Ephesians	Colossians
Paul's greeting	1:1–2	1:1–2
Holy and without blemish in God's sight	1:4; 5:27	1:22
Redemption through Christ's blood	1:7	1:14, 20
Wisdom, knowledge, and understanding from God	1:8, 17	1:9–10
Knowledge of God's will	1:9	1:9
All things (re)created through Christ	1:10	1:16
Paul heard about faith and gave thanks	1:15–16	1:3–4
Paul's continual prayer for Ephesians/Colossians	1:16	1:9
The believer's hope	1:18	1:5, 27
An inheritance for the saints	1:18	3:24
Strengthened by God's power	1:19; 3:16; 6:10	1:11
Christ's power over rule, authority, and dominion	1:21	1:13, 16; 2:10, 15
Christ as the head of his body, the church	1:22; 4:15–16	1:18, 24
Christ as God's fullness	1:23; 3:19	1:19; 2:9
Christ fills all things	1:23	3:11
Apart from Christ people are dead in sin	2:13	2:13; 3:7
God made us alive in Christ and in his resurrection	2:5–6	2:12–13
Reconciliation through Christ's blood	2:13	1:20
Christians called to peace	2:14–15	3:15
Christ abolished the law and its regulations	2:14–15	2:14
Being built up in Christ	2:20–22	2:7
Paul's call by God's grace to reveal God's mystery	3:2–4	1:25–27; 2:2
God's grace at work in Paul	3:7, 20	1:29
God's mystery hidden for centuries	3:9	1:26
Rooted in Christ and his love	3:17	2:7
Humility, gentleness, patience, and love	4:20, 31; 5:1	3:12–14 events have their counterpart in the experience of believers. Not only do they anticipate resurrection and glorification at the end of the age; they are matched by a present realization of the risen life in Christ and of our participation with him in his ascended majesty (Col 3:1–4).

7 All this was done by God in Christ with a single end in view: to demonstrate in successive ages "the incomparable riches of his grace" (cf. 1:7, 18; 2:4, 7; 3:8, 16). This was God's publicity program for the whole of history—and beyond. He planned a continuing exhibition of his favor toward humankind to cover all the centuries between the ascension and the return of Christ, and after that through all eternity (cf. Jude 25). This dimension implies that it will be for the benefit of angels as well as human beings. "Kindness" (GK 5983) is love in tender action, which God showed to humans when it was most needed (Ro 5:8).

8 Paul again reminds his readers (cf. v.5) that they owe their salvation entirely to the undeserved favor of God. "Grace" is the objective, operative, and instrumental cause of salvation. Paul expands v.5 by adding that the medium that apprehends salvationis "faith" (GK 4411), which is also its necessary condition. Faith, however, is not something a person can produce; it is simply a trustful response that is itself evoked by the Holy Spirit.

Lest faith should be in any way misinterpreted as our contributing in any way to our own salvation, Paul immediately adds a rider to explain that nothing is of our own doing; rather, everything is the "gift of God." The

Theme	Ephesians	Colossians
Encouragement to unity	4:3	3:14
Becoming mature/perfect in Christ	4:13	1:28
Obtaining fullness in Christ	4:13	2:10
Growth in Christ	4:16	2:19
Apart from Christ, alienation from God	4:18	1:21
Impurity and lust in unbelievers	4:19	3:5
Putting off the old self and putting on the new	4:22–24	3:9–10
Putting off falsehood and lies and speaking the truth	4:25	3:9
Putting away filthy language	4:29; 5:4	3:8
Speaking in order to help others	4:29	4:6
Getting rid of anger, malice, and slander	4:30	3:8
Being forgiving	4:31	3:13
Believers should allow no one to deceive them	5:6	2:4, 8
God's coming wrath	5:6	3:6
Doing what pleases the Lord	5:10	3:20
Walking carefully and making the most of every opportunity	5:15	4:5
Singing psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs	5:19	3:16
Giving thanks to God the Father	5:20	3:17
Instructions for wives	5:22	3:18
Instructions for husbands	5:25	3:19
Instructions for children	6:1	3:20
Instructions for fathers	6:4	3:21
Instructions for slaves	6:5–8	3:22–25
Instructions for masters	6:9–10	4:1
Praying and keeping watch	6:18	4:2
Praying for Paul, the missionary	6:19–20	4:3–4
Tychicus as Paul's messenger	6:21–22	4:7–8
Closing benediction	6:24	4:18

entire process of salvation comes from nothing that we have done (cf. Ro 10:17).

9 Paul firmly excludes every possibility of self-achieved salvation by adding to his emphasis in v.8, "not by works." The apostle does not specify these "works" (GK 2240) as those related to the law, since he is not thinking only of Jewish Christians. Any kind of human self-effort is comprehensively ruled out by this terse expression. The reason is immediately attached: it is to prevent the slightest self-congratulation. If salvation is by the sheer unmerited favor of God, boasting is altogether out of place.

10 This verse is the outcome of the whole process. It shows what salvation is intended for: to produce the good works that attest its reality. While works play no part at all in securing salvation, Christians will prove their faith by works. Here Paul shows himself at one with James (see Jas 2:14–26).

We are God's "workmanship"—his work of art, his new creation. "Created" (GK 3231; also in OT, 1343) is a verb used exclusively of God and denotes the creative energy he exerts. The creation takes place "in Christ Jesus" (cf. vv.6–7). The life of goodness that regeneration produces has been prepared for believers to "do" from all eternity. Here is a further reason why Christians have nothing left to boast about. Even the good they now do has its source in God, who has made it possible.

D. Jews and Gentiles Reconciled (2:11–22)

In vv.1–10 Paul considered the moral condition of the Gentiles before their conversion to Christianity. Now he reminds them of their previous deprivation in terms of their religious status as estimated from a Jewish point of view.

11 "Therefore" refers back not simply to v.10 but to the entire paragraph (vv.1–10), which presents a single sentence in the Greek text. Second-generation Gentile Christians, such as those now emerging, were apt to forget their former disadvantages. They had been and indeed still were "the Gentiles": the article specifies the underprivileged group to which they belonged. They were non-Jews or pagans so far as their physical descent was concerned. The rest of the verse elaborates on the distinction by citing the contemptuous nickname attached to them by the Jews: "uncircumcised." Paul does not himself use it in a derogatory manner: he simply reports its use. As a Jew, however, he points out that the self-styled circumcisionists have nothing to boast about, since an external man-made mark in itself holds no spiritual significance. Real circumcision is of the heart (Gal 5:6). Physical circumcision used to be a token of the covenant, but its function ceased when redemption was accomplished in Christ.

12 The apostle goes on to urge the Ephesians to recall what they once were in their heathen state. Four successive phrases depict their debit as compared with the Jews (cf. Ro 9:4–5). (1) They were "separate from Christ"—they had no expectation of a Messiah to light up their darkness. They knew nothing at all about him. (2) They had no rights of "citizenship" (GK 4486) in his kingdom by reason of their birth. This word contrasts with the more intimate expression "members of God's household" in v.19; it signifies a commonwealth or state. (3) The Gentiles were not entitled to the benefits accruing to the covenantal community. In this respect, they were in the position of "foreigners," who could not claim the prerogatives of nationals. (4) As a consequence, they lived in a world devoid of "hope" (1Th 4:13) and "God." This does not imply that they were forsaken by God, but that, since they were ignorant of him (Gal 4:8), they did not believe in him.

13 Quickly and eagerly Paul turns from the tragedy of the Gentiles' former desolation to the joy of their reconciliation in Christ. "But now" stands in sharp antithesis to v.12. They are no longer "separate from Christ" (v.12) but "in Christ Jesus." He is the sphere of their new possibilities. The historical name "Jesus" is added at this point to suggest that he is not only the anticipated Messiah of the Jews but the Savior of all (see comment on Mt 1:21). Those who trust in him possess a present salvation as well as a future hope.

"Far away" and "near" are words that describe the position of Gentiles and Jews (the original reference in Hebrew related to distance from Jerusalem). God's word of peace to both groups is recorded in Isa 57:19 and is fulfilled through the sacrifice of Christ on Calvary (cf. 1:7; 2:15–17).

14 Christ and no one else has solved the problem of our relationship with God and with other people. He draws people to God and to each other in his own person. It is not simply the message he proclaimed or even the message proclaimed about him that effects this reconciliation. It is himself (cf. Mic 5:5). That is, Paul announces that Christ is "peace" as well as "life" (Col 3:4) and "hope" (Col 1:27). The "I am" sayings recorded in the Fourth Gospel provided a foundation for such assertions.

Christ is both peace and peacemaker. He actually brought about the reconciliation of Jew and Gentile when he died on the cross. There he made both into one (cf. vv.15–16). Paul thinks of two parts being united as one whole. Then he personalizes it and speaks of "two" men being recreated as "one new man." Christ has thus removed "the hostility" that existed between these deeply divided groups. The battlement created by hatred has been broken down forever.

This hostility Paul describes as a "barrier" (GK 5850), a word that means simply a "fence" or "railing." It recalls the common rabbinic idea of the law as a fence dividing the Jews by their observance of it from all other races and thus arousing hostility. There may be a further allusion to Ps 80:12, where the word also occurs. The breaking down of the protecting wall that surrounded Israel the vine prepares the way for God's strong man (Ps 80:17).

The second word describing hostility is "dividing wall" (GK 3546); it is a much rarer word and literally means a "middle wall." Josephus used this term (as well as the previous one) to refer to the balustrade in the Jerusalem temple separating the court of the Gentiles from the temple proper. On it was an inscription that read: "No foreigner may enter within the barricade which surrounds the sanctuary and enclosure. Anyone who is caught doing so will have himself to blame for his ensuing death." When Jerusalem fell in A.D. 70, this partition was demolished along with the temple itself. But Paul saw it as already destroyed by Christ at the cross. Ironically enough, he himself had been wrongfully accused of taking an Asian Gentile, Trophimus, past this checkpoint (Ac 21:29).

15 The barrier between Jews and Gentiles was overthrown when Christ effectively disposed of the old law with its meticulously defined sanctions enshrined in its innumerable decrees. Paul does accept that in itself the law is right and good, but he insists that the unregenerate are incapable of complying with its legal demands (Ro 3:19–31; 7:7–12; 8:2–4). "Abolishing" (GK 2934) is a favorite Pauline verb not easy to translate. Literally it means "to make ineffective or powerless." In Lk 13:7 it refers to ground exhausted by a barren tree; it also sometimes meant "to bring to a standstill or to put out of action." Eventually it signified "to invalidate, nullify, quash." Paul is thinking of the abolishing of the totality of the law considered as a moral burden.

It was in his crucified flesh that our Lord accomplished the annulment of the law (cf. v.17), so that he might "create in himself" the new humanity of which he as the second Adam is the Head. The Christian is no hybrid but a new creation (v.10).

16 "To reconcile" (GK 639) is a uniquely Pauline verb (cf. Col 1:20, 22) that involves the idea of restoration to a primitive unity (Eph 1:10). The purpose of Christ's death was not simply that Jews and Gentiles should be reconciled to each other (v.15), but that both of them together should be reconciled to God. "This one body" is neither the crucified body nor the glorified body of Christ. Rather, it suggests that in addition to Jews and Gentiles, a third type of person has now appeared—Christians. This phrase therefore refers to the church (cf. 1:23; 3:6) as the place of peace (cf. Col 3:15). This reconciliation has been brought about "through the cross"; by it the death blow was dealt to the long-standing antipathy between Jew and Gentile and between human beings and God.

17 Another factor in the reconciliation is now added: the preaching of peace. When did Christ come to bring the good news of peace, so that Gentiles far away as well as Jews near at hand could hear it? Clearly it was not during his earthly ministry prior to the cross. Was it after the resurrection and before his ascension? No, it was by the Spirit and through the apostles, as the missionary program of the infant church was inaugurated in obedience to the Great Commission (Mt 28:19–20). Paul suggests that the once-alienated Gentiles are now accorded priority, even though the gospel was taken first to the Jews (cf. Ro 1:16).

18 It is solely through Christ that both Jews and Gentiles now have their "access" (GK 4643) to God the Father. This word was sometimes used to designate the official in an oriental court who conducted visitors into the king's presence. Is this approach to the Father ensured "by one Spirit" (i.e., the Holy Spirit; cf. 1Co 12:13) or "in one spirit" (i.e., the unity in the body of Christ created by the Holy Spirit)? While a case can be made for either, it is best to follow the NIV in referring it to the Holy Spirit, making the trinitarian implications of this verse obvious.

19 Paul now draws a conclusion from vv.14–18 and expands on v.13. Two technical terms commonly denoting inferiority of status are contrasted with "fellow citizens." "Foreigners" (GK 3828) refers in particular to short-term transients; "aliens" (GK 4230) to those who had settled in a country of their choice. These latter were sojourners who received protection and legal status by paying a small tax, though they had no intrinsic rights. Such had been the position of the Gentiles in relation to the kingdom of God before the coming of Christ. But now they enjoy all the privileges of God's new people. They are united with the saints of the past (1:18) as well as with contemporary Christians (cf. vv.21–22). In addition, the Gentiles are "members of God's household"; this phrase describes theocracy in its domestic aspect.

20 "Built" (GK 2224) allows Paul to develop a favorite metaphor of his. When the Gentiles became Christians, they were placed on a firm foundation. In 1Co 3:11 Paul calls Christ himself the foundation. Here, however, the apostles and prophets constitute the foundation as those who were closely associated with Christ in the establishment of the church. They were the witnesses of his resurrection appearances and the preachers of the good news. Filled with and guided by the Spirit, they had a unique role in establishing the church.

Apostles and prophets head the list of leaders in the church set out in Eph 4:11 (cf. 1Co 12:28–30). The apostles included Paul himself (cf. comment on 1:1). The prophets were those of the new Israel, not the old. Christ is the "the chief cornerstone" (GK 214). This word refers to the capstone or binding stone that holds the whole structure together. It covered a right angle joining two walls. Often the royal name was inscribed on it. In the East it was considered even more important than the foundation.

21 Paul expounds on the significance of the building. The function of the cornerstone (v.20) is precisely defined by "joined together" (GK 5274; cf. 4:16), a verb embracing the complicated process of masonry by which stones are fitted together.

Paul refers to "whole building" rather than to each separate building. It has no article in the Greek, implying that the work is still in progress—i.e., "all building that is being done." "Rises" strengthens the insistence on continuing progress and organic growth. The word used for "temple" (GK 3724) denotes not the entire holy precinct, but the inner shrine. This metaphor is applied in the NT to both the individual and the church (cf. 1Co 3:16–17; 6:19; 2Co 6:16). Without doubt, Paul had the Jewish temple in mind, but he may also have had in mind the famous temple of Artemis at Ephesus, which was one of the seven wonders of the world. Paul's mission in Ephesus had brought him into head-on collision with the cult of the goddess (Ac 19:23–41).

22 "In him" continues the theme of v.21 (cf. 1:11–12) and "you too" links with v.13. Once again Paul emphasizes continued building. The aim of this entire process is that the church should become God's "dwelling" (GK 2999), a frequent term in LXX to denote the divine resting place either on earth or in heaven. Formerly, God's earthly abode was thought to be on Mount Zion and in the Jerusalem temple. Now he makes his home in the church. All this is achieved not only by but also in the Spirit.

E. Grace and Apostleship (3:1–13)

Paul continues the prayer that he began in the opening chapter and has never really abandoned, despite asides and digressions. Once again, however, there is an interruption, for no sooner has he announced in v.1 that it is for the sake of the Gentiles that he finds himself under house arrest than he is diverted from his main theme (resumed in v.14) as he explains how his ministry as the apostle to the nations was given to him. What prompts this parenthesis in vv.2–13 is the mention of his imprisonment in v.1. He hastens to assure the Ephesians that his present circumstances are not to be regarded as a hindrance to his apostolate (v.13).

1 "For this reason" (repeated in v.14) connects immediately with 2:22, but Paul recalls 2:11–22 and perhaps what lies even further back than that. "I, Paul" is left suspended without a verb until v.14, where it is at last supplied—"I kneel." Having identified himself by name, Paul is reminded of his captivity in Rome. He refuses to regard himself as a victim either of the Jews or of the Roman emperor; rather, he is "the prisoner of Christ Jesus." He insists that his imprisonment is a mark of his apostleship.

Furthermore, it was his championship of the Gentile cause that had brought about his arrest in Jerusalem (Ac 21:21, 28). It was on account of an Ephesian convert, Trophimus, that he had eventually run afoul of the Jewish mob. "You Gentiles" follows on from Eph 2:11.

2 Paul elaborates on his ministry as a preacher to the Gentiles. He assumes that his readers are aware of his special commission, having heard about it either from Paul himself when he was with them or by report from others.

Paul refers to his ministry as an "administration [GK 3873] of God's grace." The term usually means stewardship or task (Col 1:25). Here and in 1:9, however, it means the implementation of a strategy. Paul is not referring here to saving grace as in 2:5, 8, but to what enabled him to fulfill his calling as a missionary to the Gentiles (cf. vv.7–8; 4:7–13). Despite his personal unworthiness as one who had persecuted the church, Paul was God's chosen instrument to carry his name before the Gentiles as well as to Israel (Ac 9:15).

Furthermore, Paul recognizes that the extension of gospel privileges to the Gentiles is itself an act of grace (Ac 11:23), a grace given him for their benefit.

3 The nature of this administration of grace now becomes clear. It has to do with the "mystery" or secret plan (see comment on 1:9) by which God determined to incorporate the Gentiles into the one body of the church (2:16) as equal partners with Israel (3:6). This was disclosed by means of direct "revelation" or spiritual enlightenment (1:18). No doubt Paul's reference here is to his experience on the Damascus road when he was commissioned as the apostle to the Gentiles. He adds that he has already dealt with this subject of the "mystery" in passing, presumably in the previous part of his letter (e.g., 2:11–22 or even 1:9–10). "Briefly" means in a few words or a short space.

4 As they reread the earlier portions of the letter, the Ephesians will be able to judge for themselves whether Paul has really grasped the essence of God's secret plan. "Understand" (GK 3783) is to receive into the mind or perceive; an element of intellectual discrimination is implied. "Insight" (GK 5304) results from the revelation (v.3) and represents the profound comprehension God grants his own. In Col 1:27, the "mystery" is Christ's residence in or among believers, giving them an expectation of future glory. Here it has to do with the inclusion of the Gentiles as those who now inherit such promises (cf. vv.3, 6).

5 Although God's blessing intended for Gentiles through the people of God was revealed in the OT from Ge 12:3 onward, it was not proclaimed so fully or so extensively as now under the new dispensation. In particular, OT saints did not clearly realize that the old theocracy would be superseded by the body of Christ composed of Jews and Gentiles forming "one new man" (2:15). "Men" in this verse is literally "the sons of men," a Hebraic phrase that means human beings in general, in contrast with "sons of Israel"— the normal designation of Jews. These people now form God's new community.

This further disclosure was made to the whole church of Christ (1:8–10, 17–18) through the "apostles and prophets" (2:20), of whom Paul was one. Indeed, he was the first to receive this truth that was not immediately recognized by the rest. The apostles and prophets are designated as "holy" because they were set apart for the special task of proclaiming Christ. Paul is not arrogantly assuming moral superiority here (cf. v.8), but displays a serene and modest objectivity.

The instrument of revelation, as always, is the Holy Spirit. There may well be a subtly ambiguous allusion here, as elsewhere in the NT (cf. Ro 1:4), to the interplay between the Holy Spirit and the human spirit (Eph 1:17; cf. 2:22; 5:18). This is particularly relevant in the context of revelation.

6 The content of the mystery is now stated, summarizing 2:11–22. It is that through the proclamation of the gospel, the Gentiles are received into the fellowship of Christ on an equal footing with Hebrew Christians. Paul describes this fellowship with three terms, each having the word "together." (1) The Gentiles now "are heirs together [GK 5169] with Israel." In Ro 8:17 Paul speaks of believers being "co-heirs with Christ." Here, as in Gal 3:29 and 4:7, he stresses that in Christ Gentiles are co-inheritors of the kingdom along with the Jews. This is how far the new witness of Jew and Gentile stretches.

(2) They are "members together of one body" (GK 5362) and hence enjoy a corporate relationship. Paul seems to have coined this term to meet the unique situation created by the gospel, for it is found only here in the NT and is afterward exclusive to Christian writers. No other society is comparable with the church, since Christ is its Head (Eph 4:15; 5:23; Co1:18).

(3) Because of Christ, they are "sharers together" (GK 5212) in the covenant promises originally made with Jews (cf. the contrast with 2:12). This union of Jews and Gentiles in one body is a logical consequence of the central doctrine of the gospel that God accepts all who believe.

7 Paul explains how he himself was enlisted in the service "of this gospel," not through any ambition or qualification of his own but solely through the gift and calling of God (v.2; cf. Col 1:23, 25). The important word here is "servant" (GK 1356). The NT rejects titles of high office and focuses on a word altogether unassociated with prestige. "Servant" designates a table waiter who is always at the bidding of his customers. In the NT, it denotes one who lives and works in the service of Christ and the church.

Paul again stresses that his apostolic function came from God (cf. vv.2, 8) and adds that it came "through the working of his power." He recognizes that the dramatic intervention which transformed him from an enemy into a friend of Christ was nothing less than an act of divine omnipotence. Now his apostleship reflects God's power at work in the church (1:19–20).

8 "Given me" forms a link with v.7 (cf. v.2). "Less than the least" is a unique combination of comparative and superlative. Literally it is "more least." Perhaps there is a playful allusion here to Paul's own name (v.1), meaning "little." In 2Co 12:11 Paul acknowledges that in himself he is a nobody, while at the same time recognizing that God has made him a somebody. Such humility is an essential qualification for effective service.

Paul's God-given commission is "to preach [lit., to announce the good news; GK 2294] to the Gentiles." In doing so, he is continuing Christ's own ministry (see 2:17, where the same verb is used). "Unsearchable" is that which cannot be traced out; the accent lies on the boundless treasury of riches in Christ.

9 Paul was called to "make plain" (GK 5894) to everyone the outworking of this mystery of God (see comments on vv.3–5). That is, he was to shed a flood of light on what had earlier been hidden, so that no one would need to be in the dark anymore. This mystery (v.6), now available to all, was for long ages consciously concealed in the mind of God so that not even angelic intelligences knew it (cf. v.10; Col 1:26). This was in accordance with God's deliberate policy. It was formed before time began (1Co 2:7), but the concealment dated from the inception of the ages (Ro 16:25). In his capacity as the universal Creator, God thus determined what his strategy would be, and the inference is that the world was brought into being with the realization of this purpose in view (1:9–10). "God, who created all things" may be directed against heretical teachers in Asia who anticipated the Gnostic dichotomy between creation and redemption, ascribing the former to subordinate agencies (see the introduction to Colossians).

10 The ultimate goal of both creation and redemption is the manifestation of the divine "wisdom" (GK 5053). This wisdom displayed in creation and embodied in Christ is a many-splendored thing, iridescent with constantly unfolding beauties. What had been screened from the angelic hierarchy (cf. 1:21) is now to be declared through the body of Christ on earth (2:6–7). The ecclesiological implications of such a verse as this are staggering indeed (cf. 1Pe 1:12). Through the mirror of the church, the angels of heaven see the glory of God.

11 Again Paul reverts to God's overall "purpose" (GK 4606) recognizable through all his dealings (1:11). This purpose is "eternal," suggesting not only the infinite length but also the complexity of God's age-long purpose (Heb 1:1). In v.9 the "ages past" appear to begin in time and end with Christ. This purpose God "accomplished in Christ Jesus our Lord." Paul has more than its conception and predetermination in mind here; he is also deeply concerned with its historical realization.

12 A practical conclusion is drawn from these considerations. The centrality of Christ has a bearing on the devotional life of believers. In Christ and on the ground of faith in him we can enter God's presence (2:18) without the inhibitions that might arise from any sort of self-reliance and self-consciousness. "Freedom" (GK 4244) is liberty of speech, a word that is normally used in relation to people (cf. 6:20), but here in relation to God. Such openness of speech leads to confidence before God, because he graciously accepts those who come to him through Christ. In turn, after enjoying such freedom of access to God, the Christian acquires a new boldness before other people (6:19).

13 Paul rounds off his account (begun in v.2) of the administration of God's grace that has been entrusted to him. He makes a request, arising from what he had said in v.1 about his imprisonment. There he had made it clear that what he endured was for the sake of the Gentiles. Now he repeats the assertion that his sufferings are for them, but he begs them not to lose heart because of his predicament. After all, he has learned to take his share of Christ's continuing passion (Col 1:24). Those sufferings are the price to be paid so that blessing may come to the Gentiles. Paul saw his trials as their glory, and they must learn to look at them like that too.

F. Knowledge and Fullness (3:14–21)

This section contains Paul's actual prayer. After his parenthesis in vv.2–13, he resumes his prayer, comprising three major petitions (vv.16–17a; 17b–19a; 19b), the first two of which lead into the next, with the last preparing for the closing doxology (vv.20–21). This prayer has a trinitarian outline, in which the apostle asks that his readers may possess the strength of the Spirit (v.16), the indwelling of Christ (v.17), and the fullness of God (v.19).

14 "For this reason" is repeated from v.1 as Paul proceeds along the line he had digressed from in vv.2–13. Because the Gentile Christians are now incorporated into the body of Christ, he prays that they may appropriate their spiritual privileges to the full. Paul says he "kneels." Standing was the more normal posture among the Jews but kneeling was not unknown (cf. Da 6:10). It symbolizes submissiveness, solemnity, and adoration. Paul turns in prayer "before the Father." The word for "before" indicates an intimate relationship; he addresses God as Father because through the redemptive act of Christ access is now made possible to him through the Spirit (2:18).

15 The Father is the One after whom "the whole family" is named. Paul confines the concept of family here to believers. This is altogether in keeping with the context and the inference drawn from 2:18–19 (cf. 2:20, 22; 3:6). This family of God is not confined to earth but embraces heaven as well. This may simply refer to the church triumphant, but could include the angelic hosts, described in rabbinic literature as "the higher family."

16 Paul now sets out the content of his prayer in three items: vv.16–17a; 17b–19a; 19b. As in 1:17–18, the prayer is concerned with the appropriation of God's provision in Christ through the Spirit. The divine resources that make this possible are described as "his glorious riches" (see comments on "glory" in 1:6, 17; "riches" in 2:4, 7; cf. Ro 9:23). Paul asks God to endow his readers with spiritual blessings on this lavish scale.

Earlier Paul used three terms to indicate aspects of God's power (see comment on 1:19). Now he reverts to them in the context of what is made available to the believer. The verbal form "strengthen" is the opposite of "be discouraged" in v.13. The Holy Spirit is the agent of this enablement, which is continually being provided to us (cf. Php 1:19). "Inner being" contrasts with the outward person that is wasting away (2Co 4:16), whereas the new self is daily renewed (Col 3:10).

17 The result will be that Christ takes up his residence in the hearts of believers. As the Christian keeps trusting (i.e., "through faith"), Christ continues to indwell. No static condition is in view here but a maintained experience. The "heart" is the focus of mind, feeling, and will; it stands for the whole personality.

"In love" properly belongs with "being rooted and established." Love will result from Christ's indwelling presence. Paul mixes biological and architectural metaphors (1Co 3:9), conjuring up two pictures. One is of a tree with deep roots in the soil of love (Col 2:7); the other is of a building with strong foundations laid on the rock of love (Col 1:23; 1Pe 5:10). Jesus himself spoke about trees and buildings (Mt 7:15–20, 24–27).

18 What Paul is praying for is not an isolated experience unique to Christians in Ephesus, but something that is shared by all God's people. In a letter so concerned with the church and its unity, we would not expect the corporate aspect of spiritual experience to be overlooked. The verb "may have power" (related to "mighty" in 1:19) suggests a relationship between divine empowerment and personal enlightenment; "grasp" here means "to perceive" or "comprehend."

The four dimensions Paul now presents as the object of such perception are closely linked with the knowledge of Christ's love. That love, exemplified in Christ's magnanimity to the Gentiles, is too large to be confined by any geometrical measurements. It is "wide" enough to reach the whole world and beyond (1:9–10, 20). It is "long" enough to stretch from eternity to eternity (1:4–6, 18; 3:9). It is "high" enough to raise both Gentiles and Jews to heavenly places in Christ Jesus (1:13; 2:6). It is "deep" enough to rescue people from sin's degradation and even from the grip of Satan himself (2:1–5; 6:11–12). The love of Christ is the love he has for the church as a united body (5:25, 29–30) and for those who trust in him as individuals (3:17).

19 Paul recognizes, however, that he is attempting to measure the immeasurable and so paradoxically prays that the Ephesian Christians may in fact come to know a love that is ultimately unknowable (cf. 1:19; 2:7; 1Co 8:1; Php 4:7). It is cast into a totally different realm where the normal faculties of rational apprehension are incapable of functioning.

The final item in Paul's prayer is introduced in v.19b, though some regard it simply as a consequence of knowing Christ's love. It seems preferable to treat it as the climax of Paul's intercession. He makes the bold request that his readers may be filled up to "the measure of all the fullness of God," meaning the fullness that God requires. The fulfillment that God intends for us is the maturity that is measured by the full stature of Christ (4:13).

20 The doxology is plainly the climax of the first half of Ephesians; it may be regarded as the climax of the whole letter, which rises to a spiritual peak at this point and then concentrates on practical outworkings in chs. 4–6. If chs. 1–3 are couched in the form of a traditional Jewish blessing (see comment on 1:3) and indeed contain echoes of some synagogue prayers, this parallelism extends to the doxology and Amen (cf. Ro 11:33–36).

The apostle has repeatedly insisted that the end of redemption is the glory of God (1:6, 12, 14, 18; 2:7; 3:10, 16). In the doxology he rehearses themes already touched on—the abundance of God's gift (1:18, 19; 2:7; 3:19), the power made available to the Christian (1:19; 3:7, 16, 18), and the indissoluble link between Christ and the church (1:22–23; 3:10). "Immeasurably more" (GK 5655) appears only here and in 1Th 3:10; 5:13. God's capacity to meet his people's spiritual needs far exceeds anything they can either request in prayer or conceive by way of anticipation (Php 4:7). It is actualized through "his power," which continually operates within the lives of believers 21 This liturgical ascription of glory is a recognition rather than an augmentation of what belongs to God alone. The close juxtaposition of "the church" (put first!) and "Jesus Christ" is arresting. For Paul, body and members form a single entity. The honor of Jesus is in the hands of his church. Paul closes by combining two common liturgical expressions (cf. Da 7:18), producing a stronger phrase than usual to describe eternity. Once again, the fact that the church is included here is remarkable. In Christ, the Bride will live forever (1Th 4:17; Rev 22:17), to which the response of all God's people must be "Amen" (i.e., "Yes indeed, Lord").

III. Practice: The Application to Christian Life (4:1–6:20)

A. The Unity of the Church (4:1–16)

The opening of ch. 4 marks the principal transition of the entire letter. As in his other writings, Paul turns from doctrinal concerns to practical ones. It must not be imagined, however, that the break is complete. Theology continues to be interwoven with the moral exhortations that make up the bulk of chs. 4–6. Nor does the liturgical style, so apparent in chs. 1–3, disappear altogether. The predominant hortatory element may reflect the content and method of Paul's sermons, set here in a context of praise and worship. Significantly, the first item on his agenda is the need for Christians to live together in love and unity.

1 Does the retrospective "then" connect only with 3:20–21 or with what precedes those verses? It is most probable that Paul has in mind certain references in chs. 1–3 to spiritual privileges and the Christian's calling (3:6, 12, 14–19; cf. 1:18; 4:4).

It is "as a prisoner for the Lord" (cf. 3:1; 6:20) that Paul makes his appeal. The verb "urge" (GK 4151) here means "to exhort." He urges the Ephesians to lead the sort of life that matches their Christian vocation. "Worthy" (GK 547; lit., "bringing up the other beam of the scales") suggests that there must be a balance between one's profession and one's practice. So Paul provides a criterion by which possible courses of action can be weighed. Christians will always seek to do what is most in keeping with their "calling." By definition this is a calling they have received, not one they have acquired by self-effort. Those who share such a divine call constitute the church (ekklesia; GK 1711), the "called-out company" of those who are in Christ.

2 The apostle now specifies four graces that evidence this essential proportion between calling and character: humility, gentleness, patience, and forbearance. These are all qualities necessary for good relations with others in the Christian community and beyond. "Humble" (GK 5425) occurs five times in Paul and only once elsewhere in the NT. In classical Greek this word was a derogatory term suggesting low-mindedness and groveling servility. The adjective was redeemed by the gospel to represent a distinctively Christian virtue and stands over against the admired high-mindedness of the heathen. Linked with being humble is being "gentle" (GK 4559) or considerate. The element of restraint is included so that it denotes controlled strength and not supine weakness.

Being "patient" (GK 3429) is a characteristic of God himself. It can mean steadfastness in the endurance of suffering, but more often in the NT it describes reluctance to avenge wrongs. It is to be displayed to other Christians and to everyone else (Ro 12:10, 18). Being patient finds its expression in "bearing with [lit., holding up] one another" (GK 462; cf. Col 3:18). Christians must put up with each other's faults and idiosyncracies, knowing that all of us have our own. "Love" (GK 27) is a recurring theme in Ephesians. The four graces Paul recommends here are all aspects of love and are exemplified to perfection in Christ (Php 2:2, 5).

3 The absence of these qualities may jeopardize Christian unity. That is why Paul presses his readers to exert all their powers to maintain the oneness in Christ that binds all believers to each other because they are bound by him and to him. "Make every effort" (GK 5079) suggests difficulty and a resolute determination to overcome it. It is assumed that unity between Christians already exists as given in Christ (2:13–18) by the Spirit. The "one Spirit" (v.4) is the agent of unity. Through the Spirit, Christians can attain a profound oneness. "Peace" (see comment on 1:2) is the clasp that ensures that this God-given unity will not fall apart.

4 The reasons why those who belong to Christ should be eager to preserve their unity are now supplied in a crescendo of nouns. In three groups of three items each, Paul's thought ascends from the realization of unity in the Spirit to the focus of unity in the Son and thence to the source of unity in the Father.

"One body" depicts the church as a single visible community. It is not simply a mystical concept; its unity is recognizable in that Jews and Gentiles are now seen to be reconciled in Christ (2:14–18). Christians are all members of the same body.

"One Spirit" indwells this body of Christ. By him the body lives and moves (1Co 12:13). The Spirit is its soul; apart from him it cannot exist. The same Spirit fell on the Jews at Pentecost and on the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius. This Spirit who has already spanned this widest of all gulfs will bring together all other diverse groups within the church.

The Holy Spirit, the pledge of our inheritance (1:14), is also the guarantor of the "one hope" (GK 1828) to which we are called (1:18; 2:12). This is not the hope that stems from the calling but the hope that belongs to the call (v.1). It is, of course, the hope of sharing Christ's glory at the end of the age (1Jn 3:2), a hope shared by both Jewish and Gentile Christians.

5 The second trio of unities is related to the "one Lord" or master to whom all Christians owe their allegiance. The three expressions may well be intended to convey a single idea, i.e., one Lord in whom we all believe and in whose name we are baptized. Certainly Christ is central. He is the sole Head of his body, the church. The pagan world spawned many lords; Christianity has only one whose claim is absolute. That is why believers cannot call anyone else Lord, even to escape death.

"One faith" in the one Lord unites all true believers. Faith here is personal commitment to Christ, though it is not purely subjective. It involves a recognition of who he is as Son of God and Savior of humankind.

"One baptism [GK 967]" is the external seal of incorporation into the body of Christ. Falling as it does in the second triad (related to Christ) and not in the first (related to the Spirit), it appears to indicate water baptism and not primarily the baptism with the Spirit of which water baptism is the sign. Baptism is the sacrament of unity. In the Christian church baptisms are not multiplied as with the Jews (Heb 6:2). There are not even two baptisms—one of John and one of Jesus.

There is "one baptism," symbolizing identification with Christ in his death and resurrection, sealing with the Spirit, and incorporation into the body of Christ, so that all Christians become one in Christ Jesus (1:13; 2:5–6; 3:15). Baptism provides the evidence that all Christians, without discrimination as to color, race, sex, age, or class, share the grace of Christ.

6 The last in the ascending scale is the "Father." He is not associated with other unities like the one Spirit and the one Lord. He stands alone. There is only "one God," not many as in pagan culture (1Co 8:5–6). He is the "Father of all," with particular reference to his redemptive paternity, though his creative fatherhood is not entirely ruled out in view of what follows. The triple note mentioned here divides up his modes of action. If the first "all" is exclusively personal, the rest are not necessarily so. God reigns "over" all in his transcendent sovereignty; he works "through" all in his creative activity; he dwells "in" all by reason of his immanent pervasiveness.

The trinitarian structure of vv.4–6 bears out the assumption that here we have an incipient creed. It was on the basis of such biblical passages that the historic affirmations of faith were developed.

7 The apostle has been considering the church as a totality. Now he focuses on the individual ("each one of us"). Within the body of Christ each member enjoys a share of God's grace. As in 3:2, it is equipping rather than saving "grace" (GK 5921) that Paul describes. This word denotes the grace provided for and manifested in the gift. The distribution of grace, and so the distribution of grace-gifts, is in Christ's own hands and apportioned as he decides.

8 Paul supplies biblical proof of the foregoing by a quotation from Ps 68:18. "It says" is not the apostle's usual formula to introduce Scripture, and some expositors infer "he" (i.e., God, see NIV note) as the subject. Which is assumed is immaterial, because for Paul Scripture cannot be separated from its Author.

The quotation itself, though undoubtedly biblical, is not without its difficulties, since Paul does not cite either the Hebrew or Greek OT. His major change is from "received gifts for men" to "gave gifts to men." Attempts have been made to account for the apparent discrepancy by conjecturing that Paul was quoting from memory and that his recollection was imperfect. With more plausibility some have claimed that, under the inspiration of the Spirit, Paul felt free to amplify the meaning of the Psalm, since the "giving" is implicit in the "receiving for." But it seems most probable that the apostle was drawing on an ancient oral tradition reflected in the Aramaic Targum on Psalms and in the Syriac version of the OT, both of which read, "Thou hast given gifts to men."

9 Ascension presupposes a prior descent, and Paul describes this as being made into "the lower, earthly regions." The rendering of the NIV understands this phrase as referring to the incarnation of our Lord. It was from the earth that he ascended into heaven, and it had been to the earth that he came (Jn 3:13). Others link this verse with the belief that Christ descended to the underworld during the interval between his death and resurrection (see 1Pe 3:19–20; 4:6). The obscure expression in this verse may also simply signify death and burial.

10 The apostle affirms the identity of the incarnate Savior with the ascended Savior. His exaltation is "higher than all the heavens." The Jews calculated seven heavens, but for Paul, higher than all of them is the rightful throne of Christ, to whom all things are one day to be subjugated (1:10; cf. 1Co 15:28). No one else is qualified thus to "fill the whole universe." This is more than the fulfillment of prophetic predictions concerning Christ's cosmic role or the accomplishment of every task entrusted to him by the Father. It is his filling all things with his presence.

11 The apostle now resumes the train of thought inaugurated in v.7 but interrupted by his excursus on the ascent and descent of Christ in vv.8–10. This diversion was necessary in order to stress that none other than the exalted Lord is the one who has endowed his church with gifts by grace, so that it may indeed be his body in the world (1:23; 4:4). Paul does not go on to list the grace-gifts, however, but only those who receive them. After "each one of us" in v.7 we might have expected him to include all the members of Christ's body (as in 1Co 12:4–11). Instead, we read only of those who are appointed to leadership, whose ministry is exercised for the sake of the whole community (vv.12–13).

"Apostles" and "prophets" have already been paired as providing a foundation for the Christian temple (see comment on 2:20). "Evangelists" (GK 2296) were missionaries who pioneered outreach in areas where the faith had not as yet been proclaimed (e.g., Philip in Ac 21:8; cf. 8:6–40; Timothy in 2Ti 4:5). With "pastors and teachers," Paul turns from itinerant to local ministry. These are grouped together, suggesting that the two roles were regarded as complementary and often coordinated in the same person. "Pastors" (or "shepherds"; GK 4478) probably included presbyters and bishops; they were entrusted with the nurture, protection, and supervision of the flock. "Teachers" (GK 1437) are linked with prophets in Ac 13:1 and follow them in the list in 1Co 12:28.

12 The aim of the ministries mentioned in v.11 is now disclosed: to equip all God's people for service. "To prepare" (GK 2938) is "to put right." In the NT this verb is used for the mending of nets (Mt 4:21) and the restoration of the lapsed (Gal 6:1). It may also signify the realization of purpose and the completion of what is already good as far as it goes (1Co 1:10; 1Th 3:10). Such preparation is needed to inspire God's people to do the work "of service" (GK 1355). Service is what unites all the members of Christ's body from the apostles to the most apparently insignificant disciple (1Co 12:22). Christ himself set the example (Mk 10:45; Lk 22:27). It is by this means that the body of Christ will be consolidated (cf. Eph 2:21).

13 The ultimate end in view is the attainment of completeness in Christ. "We all" clearly includes all believers, but not all people (3:9). In v.3 "the unity of the Spirit" is a gift to be guarded; here "unity in the faith" is a goal to be reached. Such a realization of unity will arise from an increasing knowledge of Christ as the Son of God in corporate as well as in personal experience.

In this way the church comes of age; it becomes "mature" (that is, "a perfect, full-grown man"). The singular is employed because the church as a whole is seen as "one new man" in Christ (2:15). Individualism is a mark of immaturity. This perfection or completeness is proportionate to the fullness of Christ himself. "Whole measure" or "perfection" can denote age (Mt 6:27; Jn 9:21) and may well be used here in this sense, since the context has to do with becoming adult. The meaning would be "attain to the measure of mature age" proper for Christians, who have left infancy behind (v.14). But the phrase may also refer to spiritual attainment (cf. Lk 2:52). "Fullness" (see comment on 1:23) is here related to Christ. Just as Christians may be "filled to the measure of all the fullness of God" (3:19), so together they are to aspire to "the full measure of perfection found in Christ."

14 The metaphor of maturity is carried over from v.13. There must be no symptoms of arrested development among believers, who are to abandon childish attitudes and act their age (1Co 13:11). Paul switches metaphors as he depicts the features of spiritual infantilism. Its victims will be tossed to and fro like a cork in a surging sea (Jas 1:6) and whirled around by every chance gust of fashionable false teaching, which creates dizziness in the mind. The source of this dangerous teaching is to be traced in the cleverness of people who craftily seek to lead us astray. "Cunning" is cheating at dice and so, by extension, trickery of every kind. "Craftiness" is unscrupulousness that stops at nothing. Error is organized with a deliberate policy to undermine the truth of God. Paul may well be thinking of emergent Gnosticism (see Col 2:8).

15 Paul contrasts the deception of heresy with the integrity of the gospel. The church cannot allow falsehood to go uncorrected, yet the truth must always be vindicated in the accents of love. This fundamental concern for the truth is the secret of maturity in the church. It is into Christ as the Head that the body grows up.

16 Christ is at once the One into whom all Christians grow and out of whom the church consolidates itself in love. This process depends on the interrelationship of the various parts of the body. The whole is continually being integrated and kept firm by each separate ligament. The precision with which these medical terms are employed makes us wonder whether Paul checked the details with Luke. It is only when each part is working properly that the body receives the support it

Ministry Gifts of the Holy Spirit

Gift	Definition	General References	Specific Examples
Apostle (Specific)	Those specifically commissioned by the resurrected Lord to establish the church and the original message of the gospel	Ac 4:33–37; 5:12, 18–42; 6:6; 8:14, 18; 9:27; 11:1; 15:1–6, 22–23; 16:4; 1Co 9:5; 12:28–29; Gal 1:17; Eph 2:20; 4:11; Jude 17	12 apostles: Mt 10:2; Mk 3:14; Lk 6:13; Ac 1:15–26; Rev 21:14 Paul: Ro 1:1; 11:13; 1Co 1:1; 9:1–2; 15:9–10; 2Co 1:1; Gal 1:1; 1Ti 2:7 Peter: 1Pe 1:1; 2Pe 1:1
Apostle (General)	Any messenger commissioned as a missionary or for other special responsibilities	Ac 13:1–3; 1Co 12:28–29; Eph 4:11	Barnabas: Ac 14:4, 14 Andronicus and Junias: Ro 16:7 Titus and others: 2Co 8:23 Epaphroditus: Php 2:25 James, Jesus' brother: Gal 1:19
Prophet	Those who spoke under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, bringing a message from God to the church, and whose main motivation and concern were with the spiritual life and purity of the church	Ro 12:6; 1Co 12:10; 14:1–33; Eph 4:11; 1Th 5:20–21; 1Ti 1:18; 1Pe 4:11; 1Jn 4:1–3	Peter: Ac 2:14–40; 3:12–26; 4:8–12; 10:34–44 Paul: Ac 13:1, 16–41 Various people: Ac 13:1 Judas and Silas: Ac 15:32 John: Rev 1:1, 3; 10:8–11; 11:18
Evangelist	Those gifted by God to proclaim the gospel to the unsaved	Eph 4:11	Philip: Ac 8:5–8, 26–40; 21:8 Paul: Ac 26:16–18
Pastor (Elder or Overseer)	Those chosen and gifted to oversee the church and care for its spiritual needs	Ac 14:23; 15:1–6, 22-23; 16:4; 20:17–38; Ro 12:8; Eph 4:11–12; Php 1:1; 1Ti 3:1–7; 5:17–20; Tit 1:5–9; Heb 13:17; 1Pe 5:1–5	Timothy: 1Ti 1:1–4; 4:12–16; 2Ti 1:1–6; 4:2, 5 Titus: Tit 1:4–5 Peter: 1Pe 5:1 John: 1Jn 2:1, 12–14 Gaius: 3Jn 1–7
Teacher	Those gifted to clarify and explain God's Word in order to build up the church	Ro 12:7; Eph 4:11–12; Col 3:16; 1Ti 3:2, 5:17; 2Ti 2:2, 2	Paul: Ac 15:35; 20:20; 28:31; Ro 12:19–21; 13:8–10; 1Co 4:17; 1Ti 1:5; 4:16; 2Ti 1:11 Barnabas: Ac 15:35 Apollos: Ac 18:25–28 Timothy: 1Co 4:17; 1Ti 1:3–5; 4:11–13; 6:2; 2Ti 4:2 Titus: Tit 2:1–3, 9–10
Deacon	Those chosen and gifted to render practical assistance to members of the church	Ac 6:1–6; Ro 12:7; Php 1:1; 1Ti 3:8–13; 1Pe 4:11	Seven deacons: Ac 6:5 Phoebe: Ro 16:1–2
Helper	Those gifted for a variety of helpful deeds	1Co 12:28	Paul: Ac 20:35 Lydia: Ac 16:14–15 Gaius: 3Jn 5–8

Ministry Gifts of the Holy Spirit (Continued)

Gift	Definition	General References	Specific Examples
Administrator	Those gifted to guide and oversee the various activities of the church	Ro 12:8; 1Co 14:3; 1Th 5:11, 14–22; Heb 10:24–25	Barnabas: Ac 11:23–24; 14:22 Paul: Ac 14:22; 16:40; 20:1; Ro 8:26–39; 12:1–2; 2Co 6:14–7:1; Gal 5:16–26 Judas and Silas: Ac 15:32; 16:40 Timothy: 1Th 3:2; 2Ti 4:2 Titus: Tit 2:6, 13 Peter: 1Pe 5:1–2 John: 1Jn 2:15–17; 3:1–3
Giver	Those gifted to give freely of their resources to the needs of God's people	Ac 2:44–45; 4:34–35; 11:29–30; 1Co 16:1–4; 2Co 8–9; Eph 4:28; 1Ti 6:17–19; Heb 13:16; 1Jn 3:16–18	Barnabas: Ac 4:36–37 Christians in Macedonia: Ro 15:26–27; 2Co 8:1–5 Christians in Achaia: Ro 15:26–27; 2Co 9:2
Comforter	Those gifted to give comfort by acts of mercy to people in distress	Ro 12:8; 2Co 1:3–7	Paul: 2Co 1:4 Hebrew Christians: Heb 10:34 Various Christians: Col 4:10–11 Dorcas: Ac 9:36–39 needs and will be able to grow as God intended it.

B. The Changed Life (4:17–24)

The practical section of this letter opened with an appeal to maintain Christian unity. Paul substantiated it by enlarging on the way in which the body of Christ is being built up. Now, before dealing with specific moral injunctions, he reminds his readers about the kind of life they once lived and the need to make a clean break with the past (cf. 2:1–3, 11–13).

17 "So" resumes the exhortation in v.3. In a solemn declaration the apostle strongly implores the Ephesians to abandon all their former practices, because both he and they are "in the Lord." In other letters Paul has not been slow to remind Hebrew Christians that they must not cling to Jewish legal practices. In similar vein he now urges Gentiles not to fall back into their old self-indulgent habits. Such permissive behavior springs from an aimless and futile attitude to life that cuts the nerve of moral endeavor.

18 This reprehensible attitude is traced to its source. Such people are impeded by a mental fog that blots out the divine light. They are cut off from contact with God (2:12) and the life he alone can impart. Such a condition arises in turn from deep-seated "ignorance." Although inborn (cf. 2:2–3), it was not irreversible and might have been removed had they followed such light as came to them. Instead, they steeled their hearts against the truth until they grew altogether impervious to its impact. "Hardening" (GK 4801) describes a state of petrifaction. It is used medically to denote the callus formed when a bone has been fractured and reset. Such a callus is even harder than the bone itself. This dreadful situation has affected the hearts of the pagans. Their whole personality is incapable of appreciating what God offers.

19 People like these have "lost all sensitivity." They can no longer respond to moral stimuli. Their consciences are so atrophied that sin registers no stab of pain. They have abandoned themselves to every sort of vice. From Ro 1:24–28 we learn that in such circumstances God leaves sinners to endure the full consequences of their tragic decision. "Sensuality" is license in the physical aspect of one's being, especially sexual excesses. This fearful self-abandonment leads to all kinds of filthy practices, which are so absorbing as almost to become a total preoccupation.

All this is pursued "with a continual lust" (GK 4432). This term is not necessarily associated with sexual misconduct, though the context here suggests it. It means the determination to gratify self-interest at all costs, regardless of the rights of others.

20 "You" stands in contrast to the insensitive, passion-dominated pagans who exist only to satisfy their lower nature. That was not how the Gentile converts in Ephesus came to "know Christ" for themselves. The expression implies more than receiving catechetical instruction; it means to learn in such a way as to become a devotee or disciple. It was Christ they thus came to know—God's anointed Son, no longer the prerogative of the Jews but shared by the Gentiles.

21 Paul now adds a note of certainty. In the preaching of the word Christ himself was present (2:17), and so those who heard were introduced to him and accepted him. They were also "taught in [Christ]." That is, as disciples remaining in him (Jn 15:4, 9–10), they received further instruction in the "truth" (GK 237), which is "in Jesus." Paul does not often employ the historical name "Jesus"; when he does, it is invariably connected with our Lord's death and resurrection. The truth in Jesus, then, has to do with the fact that the man from Nazareth was shown by his rising again to be the Son of God and the Savior of the world.

22 Paul now gives the content of the teaching his readers received. Their previous lifestyle was to be discarded completely. They must forsake their old behavioral haunts and indeed lay aside the costume of their unregenerate selves. The metaphor of doffing and donning garments is common in Scripture. There may also be an allusion here to the fact that baptismal candidates changed into white robes.

The old self is subject to an internal process of continuous disintegration. Moral degeneration has set in and the road to perdition lies ahead. "Deceitful desires" translates a phrase in which the treacherous duplicity of sin is almost personified.

23 In a contrasting positive statement, Paul reminds the Ephesians that instead of being subject to progressive deterioration, they were to be perpetually renovated in mind and spirit. "To be made new" (GK 391) possibly involves an element of restoration, since the image of God, impaired by the Fall, is fully reinstated in the new creation. As over against the futile thinking of the unregenerate Gentiles (v.17), Christian converts are to undergo a radical reorientation of their mental outlook. This can only take place under the influence of the Holy Spirit, acting on the human spirit as it affects the realm of thought.

24 The "new self" (3:16) assumed by the believer is the direct opposite of the worthless "old self" (v.22). It is not the former nature refurbished but a totally new creation (2:10; cf. 2Co 5:17). This is said to be "like God," as Adam was at first (Ge 1:27; 5:1). God is both the author and the pattern of this changed life (see also Col 3:10). The characteristics of the divine image are "righteousness and holiness." These are qualities in God that are reproduced in his genuine worshipers: his love of right and his aversion to sin. In the NT "righteousness" (GK 1466) often stands for the uprightness of those who are made right with God. "Holiness" (GK 4009) here is not the usual Greek word, but one that means "free from contamination" (also in Lk 1:25).

C. Christian Behavior Patterns (4:25–5:2)

In vv.17–24 the apostle contrasted the old life with the new without descending to particulars. Now he embarks on a series of detailed warnings against what "deceitful desires" (v.22) may produce. "Therefore" in v.25 makes the connection between principle and practice.

25 The first item included in the putting off of the "old self" (v.22) is "falsehood" (cf. Col 3:8–9). This is not lying in the abstract but "the lying"—falsehood in all its forms as over against "the truth that is in Jesus" (v.21) and "true righteousness and holiness" (v.24). All that belongs to "deceitful scheming" (v.14) and "deceitful desires" (v.22) must be left behind, for it has no place in the community of Christ. Because our Lord is himself the truth (Jn 14:6), his body must reflect the truth. Because each member belongs to the rest, the fellowship of the church must be marked by a refreshing openness; any kind of deception is a sin against the Spirit. The reference to the "body" makes it clear that fellow Christians are in view but, of course, the injunction has a universal application.

26 A quotation from Ps 4:4 introduces the next admonition: "In your anger do not sin." The meaning is, "Do not let your anger be mixed with sin." There is such a thing as righteous indignation, for anger is ascribed to God and to Jesus. Thus it is also legitimate for Christians to express anger. But it can easily degenerate into bitterness—hence, the appended prohibition. Under the Mosaic law all sureties were to be returned and all wages paid before sunset (Dt 24:13, 15). A Christian's exasperation or provocation, however justifiable, must not be allowed to simmer overnight.

27 If this advice is followed, the devil will be afforded no leeway. He will have no room to move. Instead, we must leave a place for the wrath of God, because vindication is his prerogative (Ro 12:19).

28 In this warning against breaking the commandment against theft, Paul is thinking of some convert who had been in the habit of stealing before he became a Christian. Stealing covers every kind of misappropriation. For the new self in Christ all this must stop. Christians should not be afraid to exert themselves to the point of exhaustion in manual labor (1Co 4:12; 1Th 4:11). Hands that used to pilfer the property of others must now be hardened like Paul's in honest toil (Ac 20:34–35). As a result believers should be in a position to help those worse off than they are. "To share" (GK 3556) means to distribute personally rather than through some agent or official.

29 Not only will Christians do "the good" (v.28); they will also speak "what is helpful." No unhealthy language will pass through their lips. "Unwholesome" is that which is itself rotten and disseminates rottenness. When joined with "talk" (GK 3364), it may signify not simply bad language but malicious gossip and slander; anything that injures others and sparks dissension is covered by this expression. Christians, however, will only say what is calculated to build up the church (Eph 2:21–22; 4:12, 16) by encouraging its members. This is to be done whenever the need arises, so that those who hear may receive a blessing. The ultimate source of all blessing is God himself. The channel may be human, and so even the everyday conversation of Christians may become a means of grace to others.

30 "And" indicates that, while there are various ways of bringing sorrow to the Holy Spirit, it is doing so through "unwholesome talk" (v.29) that Paul is rebuking here. Since the Spirit lives within Christians, their experience of his fullness will have its effect, among other things, in speech (5:18–19). Any kind of careless, unbecoming talk pains the Spirit, since it is incompatible with the holiness he conveys to those who belong to Christ. The moving anthropomorphism implicit in "grieve," combined with the full-length title "the Holy Spirit of God," serves to underline the gravity of the prohibition.

The clause beginning with "with whom" provides the basis for this prohibition. The Holy Spirit has sealed believers (1:13–14) for the final "day of redemption" (GK 667). This word involves the payment of a ransom (see comment on 1:7–9): Christ's death on the cross has purchased not only present but final liberation.

31 A condensed series of imperatives winds up this section about the Christian's attitude to one's neighbor. This verse is negative; v.32 is positive and leads into the next chapter. "Get rid of" (GK 149) is "let it be removed" and thus "have no more to do with it." Every trace of these blemishes is to be forsaken. "Bitterness" (4394; cf. Col 3:19) is the opposite not only of sweetness but of kindness. It is the spite that harbors resentment and keeps a score of wrongs (1Co 13:5). "Rage" (GK 2596) is what flows from bitterness in an outburst of uncontrolled passion and frustration. "Anger" (GK 3973) describes the wrath of God in 5:6 and of people in v.26. It signifies an unjustifiable human emotion that manifests itself in noisy assertiveness and abuse (cf. Col 3:8). The poisonous source of all these regrettable reassertions of the "old self" (v.22) is "malice" (GK 2798).

32 Having put aside these malicious traits, Christians will instead display kindness, compassion, and forgiveness. "Be" is really "become," for Paul realizes that his readers have not yet attained "the full measure of perfection found in Christ" (v.13). To be "kind" (GK 5982) is to show a sweet and generous disposition. "Compassionate" is a rare word, related to the intestines. The ancients located the seat of the emotions in the internal organs—liver, kidneys, and larger viscera.

Mutual forgiveness is a further mark of true Christian fellowship (Col 3:13); it requires a give and take. Paul sets forth the strongest possible motive: Christians must forgive one another because all of them have already been forgiven by God in Christ, when he became "the atoning sacrifice . . . for the sins of the whole world" (1Jn 2:2). "As" further implies that our forgiveness of others is to be like God's forgiveness of us. It must flow from ungrudging love (cf. Mt 18:23–35).

5:1 The apostle carries these injunctions over from the previous chapter and closes this section on Christian behavior patterns at v.2. "Be" ("become") confirms the close relation between this verse and the last where the same expression has been employed. Here it introduces a staggering conception: Paul invites his readers to imitate God! What follows elucidates his meaning. A child will show himself to be a true child by wanting to grow up like his father. In the same way, God's precious children will be eager to copy him, as he enables them. This was the teaching of Jesus himself.

2 God is love (1Jn 4:8), and the life that is like the life of God will be a life of love. Love is the essential of the Christian character. Paul has repeatedly emphasized love in this letter (1:4, 15; 2:4; 3:17–19; 4:2, 15–16). The model of love is Christ himself. Because he laid down his life for us, we are to love others to the point of sacrifice (cf. Jn 13:14; 15:12–13).

Paul borrows two technical terms in Jewish sacrificial vocabulary without differentiation. "Offering" (GK 4714) is the word used in the LXX for the "grain offering" (GK 4966). On the cross, Christ presented himself to God as an offering. Paul adds that it was "fragrant"—a phrase that occurs in a sacrificial context over forty times in the Pentateuch. This metaphor suggests that our Lord's self-sacrifice was pleasing to his Father and was thus accepted as a means of reconciliation. "Sacrifice" (GK 2602) indicates that the victim was slain; Paul has spoken of Christ's death on the cross (2:16) and his sacrificial shedding of blood (1:7; 2:13). Because it is identified with Christ in his death, the Christian's life will likewise prove an acceptable sacrifice to God.

D. Light in the Lord (5:3–20)

Paul has epitomized the Christian behavior pattern as "a life of love" (v.2). Now he turns to another theme: "Live as children of light" (v.8). But they can be "light in the Lord" only because Christ is the world's true light (v.14).

3 The apostle begins by speaking about the effect of light in a life of purity. He resumes the prohibitive character of 4:26–31, taking it further by declaring that such aberrations should not only be avoided but not so much as mentioned (v.12), since they are altogether unsuitable for those who belong to the consecrated community of God.

"Sexual immorality" (GK 4518) was tolerated in the permissive pagan society of Paul's day (Ro 1:24–32). "Impurity" (GK 174) has already been mentioned in 4:19 as a characteristic of secularized existence, along with "greed" (GK 4432). In Col 3:5 this word is conceived of as idolatry (cf. v.5), because it makes a god of what it seeks to possess.

4 Paul has already warned against "unwholesome talk" (4:29) because of the harm it does to those who are compelled to hear it. Now he attacks it from another angle, because it is unseemly for Christians and usurps the place of praise. "Obscenity" is broadly equivalent to "filthy language" (Col 3:8); "foolish talk" is stupid chatter or silly twaddle. Along with "coarse joking," these things must be repudiated. Instead, the Christian's mouth should be continually filled with thanks to God (2:7; 5:18; Col 2:7; 3:15).

5 The apostle warns his readers about the serious consequences of immorality. They must surely be aware that there is no room in the kingdom of God for those who blatantly continue in sensual sin. The three categories of v.3 are singled out again, with the rider that the greedy make an idol of their possessions. No such person has any place reserved in the eschatological kingdom. The "inheritance" (GK 3100) is a present title to a future position (1:14, 18); it cannot be acquired by the disobedient (v.6). In Col 1:13 Paul refers to "the kingdom of the Son" whom the Father loves (cf. Eph 1:6). But since it is God who "placed all things under his feet" (1:22), the kingdom is his as well as Christ's.

6 There were those then as there are now who protest that Christian standards are too demanding and that people must be allowed to live as they like (1Co 15:32). In the name of a spurious freedom, they attempt to bring converts into bondage to sin once again. The Ephesians must not to fooled by such futile arguments (4:17). They are promoted by the arch-deceiver himself (2:2). Paul's indictment includes all the propagandists of permissiveness.

It is on account of "such things"—the sins mentioned above rather than the deceptive teaching that encourages them—that divine retribution is already on its way. It will keep on coming till in the end it deals with the offenders.

7 An unambiguous admonition rounds off the paragraph begun at v.3. Christians are not to get mixed up with those who have excluded themselves from the kingdom by their impurity. The word "partners" (GK 5212) is the same one used in 3:6 to describe how Gentiles now share in the messianic promise.

8 Paul enlarges on the contrast between darkness and light. As in 2:1–3 and 3:17–24, he reminds his readers of what they once were. One word suffices by way of summary—"darkness." Not only did they live in darkness: they were darkness (cf. 4:18). But now they have been rescued from the dominion of darkness and inherit the kingdom of light (Col 1:12–13). They not only live in the light: they are light. This is possible only in union with Christ, who is himself the light (cf. Jn 8:12). Henceforth believers must behave as those who live in the light.

9 A parenthesis explains the command at the end of v.8. Light is known by its effects. When the light of Christ shines in the lives of believers it produces benevolence, fairness, and integrity. These three qualities counteract the dark influence of malice (4:31), injustice, and falsehood (4:25). "Goodness" is the achievement of moral excellence combined with a generous spirit. "Righteousness" was understood by the Greeks as giving all their due. "Truth" stands for genuineness and honesty; it is not only something to be said but something to be done (see comment on 4:25; cf. 1Jn 1:6; 3:18). A life lived in the light is found not only in all these qualities held in balance, but in every aspect of each.

10 The exhortation in v.8 is further supplemented by an instruction to "find out what pleases the Lord" (cf. v.17). "To find out" (GK 1507) has to do with the testing of metals and so can mean to discover by examination, to verify, or to approve. Those who live as "children of light" (v.8) will be continually trying to ascertain what the will of God is in every situation so that all they do may satisfy him.

11 Another exhortation is added to that in v.8. Christians are not to be involved in "the fruitless deeds of darkness." Paul is not advocating pharisaical separatism, for the "deeds" must be shunned, not the doers. Followers of Christ will go where their master went and meet those their master met. But though they do not withdraw from the world, they refuse to adopt its standards or fall in with its ways. They are concerned to produce "the fruit of the light" (v.9).

Far from participating in these practices, believers should "expose" (GK 1794) them. When the object of "expose" is a person, the verb means "to convince or reprove"; this is the distinctive work of the Spirit. But when the object is impersonal, the verb may signify "to bring to light or expose." This exposure is not effected by what is actually said by way of rebuke (cf. vv. 3, 12), but simply by letting the light of Christ shine through and show them up.

12 Paul reiterates the insistence of v.3 that the abominable things pagan profligates do under cover of secrecy must not be breathed among Christians. Sometimes sin can be publicized by a reaction against it. What has been done in the dark is best kept dark. Paul goes so far as to say that the shamefulness of these ugly vices may rub off on Christians if they are continually talking about them, even if it is to disapprove of them.

13 Paul appeals to the effect of light in the natural world. It penetrates wherever it shines, so that everything is lit up by it. In the same way, whenever the light of Christ appears, it shows up sin for what it is. Evil can no longer masquerade as anything else. Hidden wickedness thus revealed can no longer be obscured by darkness. It is also possible here to see a reference to the transformation brought about by light, so that the exposure and reproval of sin by the light of Christ lead to salvation, as it did for the Ephesians themselves (v.8).

14 The same introductory formula as in 4:8 prefaces a poetical quotation. The lines form a metrical triplet in a rhythm that was specially associated with religious initiation chants. This may well supply a clue in tracing their origin. They are not a direct quotation of OT Scripture (though they contain echoes of Isa 60:1 and possibly Isa 9:2; 26:19; 51:17; 52:1). Most likely this section is an early baptismal hymn based on Isa 60:1. Paul is soon to mention hymns in the context of worship (v.19), so that this may well have been a liturgical chant addressed to those about to be baptized (cf. 1Ti 3:16).

The exhortations "wake up" (GK 1586) and "rise [GK 482] from the dead" place the hymn firmly in the context of resurrection—possibly written for Easter day. The connection between resurrection and baptism is so close that there is no need to restrict the intention. Moreover, in the early church, baptism was described as an enlightenment (cf. Heb 6:4; 10:32). The verb translated "shine" (GK 2213) is applied to the rising of a heavenly body. Christ, as the morning star, has already risen and sheds his light on all who are raised to newness of life in him.

15 Further exhortations follow, backing up v.11. Because of their illumination, believers will pay scrupulous attention to their personal behavior (v.8b), in order that they may lead an irreproachable life. The metaphorical contrast between light and darkness is now replaced by that between wisdom and folly. Christians must no longer act like simpletons, since God's own wisdom is always available to them (1:8–9; 3:10).

16 Christians should be "making the most [GK 1973] of every opportunity." What is meant is simply to make the best possible use of all circumstances like prudent merchants and not waste opportunities as they present themselves. "The days are evil" in a moral sense, not necessarily by reason of hardship and distress, though this may accompany these sinful times.

17 "Therefore" resumes the thought of v.15 with its exhortation to be wise. "Foolish" (GK 933) here is a stronger word than "unwise" in v.15, alluding to stupid imprudence or senseless folly in action. To "understand" is to give the mind to something so as to get hold of or grasp it. The object of this determined attempt at apprehension is the Lord's will (v.10). Paul recognizes the divine will as the regulative principle of the Christian life (1:1, 5, 9). Here he refers to the will of the Lord (i.e., of Jesus Christ), perhaps because Christ left us an example.

18 A specific instance of the foregoing generalization follows. Quoting Pr 23:30, Paul warns against the folly of overindulgence in strong drink. Drunkenness was all too common in the pagan world, and cautions in the NT show that it presented a serious temptation to Christians. The danger of drunkenness (Gal 5:21) lies not only in itself but in what it may induce. "Debauchery" (GK 861) in the NT means the type of wild living that characterized the prodigal son (Lk 15:13). In classical Greek it signified extravagant squandering both of money and of the physical appetites. Christians will avoid all such excess.

Instead of continuing in drunkenness, believers must go on being "filled with the Spirit." That is a surprising alternative. We might have expected the apostle to plead for abstinence as over against intemperance. But he takes a more startling and positive line. He urges his readers to draw on the reinvigorating resources of the Holy Spirit. The Spirit produces a genuine exhilaration others vainly seek from alcohol. On the day of Pentecost the effect of such an experience was mistaken for drunkenness (Ac 2:13). "With the Spirit" is actually "in spirit"; the Greek text does not indicate whether the Holy Spirit is intended. However, it seems probable that Paul intended the Spirit, in view of the many other scriptural references to being filled with the Spirit.

The theological implications of "be filled" (GK 4444) are crucial for a biblical doctrine of the Holy Spirit. The imperative makes it clear that this is a command for all Christians. The Greek present tense used here rules out any once-for-all reception of the Spirit but points to a continuous replenishment (lit., "go on being filled"). Nor does it appear that Paul is urging his readers to enter into a new experience. Rather, he is inviting them to go on as they have already begun. Finally, the verb is passive: "Let yourselves be filled with the Spirit." This is not a manufactured experience, though it can be rejected (cf. Gal 3:2, 5). There may, therefore, be successive fillings of the Spirit; indeed, the Christian life should be an uninterrupted filling. What this verse will not substantiate is the claim that after becoming a Christian, a single, additional, definitive filling is essential for completion.

19 The outcome of being filled with the Spirit is described in vv.19–20 in a series of four participles that virtually amount to imperatives. Each of these expressions of the Spirit's fullness has to do with praise. The verb "to speak" (GK 3281) is not confined to normal conversation but covers utterance of any kind and so is perfectly applicable to the medium of psalms, hymns, and songs. Such communication is with "one another." "Psalms" seems to refer to the OT Psalter, which was integrated with Christian worship from the first. Christian hymns exalted the name of Christ (v.19) or God (v.20). Such canticles appear in the NT itself (as at v.14). "Spiritual songs" may be so designated either to differentiate them from secular compositions or to represent spontaneous singing in the Spirit. Paul is describing the heart's inner melody that keeps in tune with audible praise. If it is offered "to the Lord," it does not need to be heard by others.

20 The perpetual accompaniment of all these outlets of the Spirit in the Christian life is "giving thanks." The context is not restricted to that of the church's liturgy (cf. "always"), for such gratitude to God should cover every circumstance. It is to be addressed to God the Father—the Father of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ (1:3, 17), who is also "our God and Father" (Gal 1:4)—in the name of the Son as the one who fully reveals him.

E. Christian Relationships: Marriage (5:21–33)

The basic principle of Christian submissiveness (v.21) that governs the community life of the church applies also to social relationships. Paul selects the most conspicuous of these and shows how they are transformed when controlled by a prior obedience to Christ. In 5:22–33 he deals with wives and husbands; in 6:1–4, with children and parents; and in 6:5–9, with slaves and masters (cf. Col 3:18–4:1 for a close parallel). The gospel places such relationships as these on a revolutionary new footing, since all are subjected to the lordship of Christ.

21 Does this verse represent the conclusion of the previous section or the start of a new one? While grammatically it may be attached to v.20, its content coincides more naturally with what follows. The verb "to submit" (GK 5718) occurs twenty-three times in Paul and denotes subordination to those considered worthy of respect, either because of their inherent qualities or more often because of the position they hold. Christians are to submit to civil authorities, to church leaders, to parents, and to masters. The whole structure of society as ordered by God depends on the readiness of its members to recognize these sanctions. Without them anarchy prevails.

The Christian, however, observes them not merely for their own sake, or even because they are imposed by God, but out of "reverence" for Christ (cf. v.17). Moreover, within the fellowship of the church (Paul has this more prominently in mind than the community at large), submission to others is reciprocal ("to one another"). No one is to coerce another, for all voluntarily accept the discipline. Hence, any delusions of superiority are banished.

22 "Submit" is assumed here from the previous verse, since no verb appears. The fact confirms that v.21 fits more with what follows than with what precedes. It is to their own husbands that wives are to be subject (Col 3:18). The legally binding exclusiveness of the marriage relationship is thus underlined. "As to the Lord" suggests that in obeying her husband, the Christian wife is obeying the Lord who has sanctioned the marriage contract. It should be noted that Paul is speaking here about Christian marriage. He is not implying that women are inferior to men or that all women should be subject to men. The subjection, moreover, is voluntary, not forced. The Christian wife who promises to submit does so because her vow is "as to the Lord."

23 The marriage relationship is now set out as being a reflection of the relationship between Christ and his church. This raises it to an unimaginably lofty level. In 1Co 11:12 Paul had already marked out a hierarchy in which God is seen as the head of Christ, Christ as the head of the man, and the man as the head of the woman. Here he looks at it from another angle. If the head of the woman is the man and the head of the church is Christ (Eph 1:22; 4:12, 16), then it is permissible to draw an analogy between the wife's relationship to her husband and the church's relation to Christ. Marriage is thus interpreted in the sublimest terms; it is compared with the marriage of the Lamb to his bride.

Unless we take the next comment as an aside that bears no relation to the analogy Paul is presenting, it must be assumed that there is an intended parallelism. It remains true, of course, that Christ is the Savior of his body, the church, in a unique manner. The word "Savior" is never used in the NT except of Christ or God. But having recognized and safeguarded that vital truth, we may legitimately pursue the analogy and assume that Paul regards the husband, even if to an infinitely lesser degree, as the protector of his wife (cf. vv.28–29).

24 "Now" continues the same line of argument rather than reversing it. That is, Paul is pursuing a further likeness between the husband-wife relationship and the Christ-church relationship. Here the verb "submit" stands unambiguously in the text and does not have to be supplied (cf. v.22). The church as the bride of Christ readily acknowledges his authority and seeks to please him in every respect. When marriage is seen in the light of this higher relationship between Christ and his body, the wife finds no difficulty in submitting to her husband, for he too has obligations to her in the Lord (vv.25–33).

25 Paul turns to the reciprocal duties of the husband. Greco-Roman society held that wives had obligations to their husbands, but not vice versa. Christianity introduced a revolutionary approach to marriage that equalized the rights of wives and husbands and established the institution on a much firmer foundation than ever before. The word that sums up the role of the wife is "submit" (vv.22, 24); the word that does the same for the husband is "love" (GK 26). This is the highest and distinctively Christian word for loving. As over against words for "sexual passion" and "family affection," Paul chooses a verb that insists that the love of a Christian man for his wife must be a response to and an expression of the love of God in Christ extended to the church (cf. vv.1–2; see also Col 3:19).

The apostle again draws a comparison between the marriage relationship and the relationship of Christ and the church (cf. vv.22–24), this time emphasizing our Lord's sacrifice. On the cross Jesus gave himself up for the church, his bride. The analogy is all the more telling, since the word for "church" is feminine. This aspect of the atonement does not have much prominence in the NT. While Paul elsewhere declared that Christ laid down his life "for our sins" (Ro 4:25; Gal 1:4), or "for me" (Gal 2:20), or "for us all" (Ro 8:32), now he affirms that our Lord's sacrificial death was "for her," i.e., for the church.

26 In vv.26–27 Paul explains more fully the aim of Christ's atonement for the church. It was "to make her holy" and "to present her to himself as a radiant church" (v.27). "To make holy" (GK 39) is to set apart; by his death on the cross, Christ intended to separate for himself a people for his own possession. From the beginning the church has been called out in this way, but the ethical demands of such privilege require a response in every age.

If the church is to attain the actual holiness that alone befits her status as the bride of Christ, then "cleansing" (GK 2751) is essential. A need for such cleansing before the church begins to be holy clearly indicates that Paul's concept of holiness involves an immediate subjective change. While cleansing may assume a logical priority, however, the process is really simultaneous.

This essential cleansing is effected "by the washing [GK 3373] of water," which is said to be accompanied by a spoken word. The term "washing" emphasizes the action of bathing, not the bath itself.Beyond doubt the reference here is to baptism, thus being equivalent to "the washing of rebirth" in Tit 3:5. There is, however, no hint of any mechanical view of the sacrament, as if the mere application of water could in itself bring about the purification it symbolizes. Nowhere does the NT countenance baptismal regeneration in an ex opere operato sense.

What is "the word" that accompanies baptism? It is likely the formula used at the moment of baptism. In principle, this word was trinitarian in shape (Mt 28:19), but on occasion it simply invoked the all-sufficient name of Jesus. Possibly the candidate for baptism confessed faith in Christ and called on the Savior's name as he or she was being baptized.

27 The ultimate aim in view when Christ gave himself up for the church (v.25) was that at the end of the age he might be able to "present" her to himself in unsullied splendor as a bride adorned for her husband (Rev 21:2). The verb "present" (GK 4225) is used of the presentation of Christ in the temple (Lk 2:22). Paul himself applies it to the presentation of the church as a pure virgin to Christ her husband (2Co 11:2). Normally it was the friend of the bridegroom (Jn 3:29) who handed over the bride. But Christ dispenses with all intermediaries, and he alone introduces the bride to the bridegroom, who paradoxically is himself. As used here, this verb becomes almost equivalent to "make" or "render." The eschatological church is transformed by Christ so as to be made "all glorious" (Ps 45:13). No ugly spots or lines of age disfigure the appearance of the bride. The church becomes what it was intended to be—"holy and blameless" (cf. 1:4). All this is possible only because Christ is the Savior of his body (v.23).

28 Paul returns to his analogy and declares that just as Christ loves the church, so husbands ought to love their wives as being one flesh with themselves. Christ loves the church—not simply as if it were his body, but because it is in fact his body. Husbands therefore are to love their wives, not simply as they love their own bodies, but as being one body with themselves, as indeed they are. Lest the staggering implication of what he has affirmed should fail to register with his readers, Paul puts it in another way to avoid ambiguity. So intimate is the relationship between man and wife that they are fused into a single entity. For a man to love his wife is to love himself. She is not to be treated as a piece of property, as was the custom in Paul's day. She is to be regarded as an extension of a man's own personality and so part of himself.

29 The apostle appeals to a self-evident fact. It will hardly be denied that no one ever hates his or her own body (Ge 2:23; Eph 5:30–31). Rather, one devotes oneself to looking after it and provides for it in every way, supplying it with food to promote its development and maintain its health. Everyone cares for his or her own body and cherishes it. This is how Christ loves his body, the church (v.25), argues Paul. He appeals to the same principle when addressing husbands as he did when addressing wives. Just as wives are to submit to their husbands as the church submits to Christ, so husbands are to love their wives as Christ loves the church.

30 The reason why Christ thus cares for the church is now made clear. It is because Christians are living parts of his body. In 4:25 Paul has dealt with the relationship of the members to one another individually. Here he is concerned with their relationship to the whole. Earlier in the letter he has spoken about the church as a body whose head is Christ (1:22–23; 4:12, 16). Here he stresses the closeness of the Christian's communion with Christ as a part of himself, just as the branches are part of the vine.

31 Paul introduces Ge 2:24 at this point to substantiate his argument from Scripture, just as Jesus himself did (cf. Mk 10:7). "For this reason" is not a preface to the quotation but part of it. When Adam recognized that Eve was part of himself (Ge 2:23), the next verse adds: "For this reason a man will leave his father and mother and be united to his wife, and they will become one flesh." That is, the marriage tie takes precedence over every other human relationship and for this reason is to be regarded as inviolable. At the same time, what is basically a divine ordinance is graciously designed for mutual satisfaction and delight. "United" means closely joined and, taken in conjunction with the reference to "one flesh," can refer only to sexual intercourse, which is thus hallowed by the approval of God himself. It is because of this exalted biblical view of marital relations that the church has taken its stand on the indissolubility of the marital bond and the impermissibility of polygamy, adultery, or divorce.

32 This is a mystery of far-reaching importance. But what is meant by "mystery" here? Already we have seen that for Paul in this letter "mystery" means a secret of revelation made known through a special dispensation of grace (3:2–3). Usually it embraces the total sweep of God's purposes in Christ (1:9; 3:3–4, 9; 6:19), but it may also refer to some specific truth within that wider revelation (cf. Ro 11:25; 1Co 15:51). With regard to Ge 2:24, the more profound truth now revealed is that in order for Christ, the husband, to win his bride, the church, he had to sacrifice himself for her on the cross (v.25).

Paul does not add the words "but I am talking about Christ and the church" as if he has been diverted from his theme. Rather, he is saying that so far as he is concerned, he refers the mystery to the relation between Christ and the church—a mystery into which he himself had been given unusual insight because of the revelation entrusted to him.

33 The final word in this section is a practical one. Whether or not Paul's readers have fully understood his allusions to the "profound mystery" (v.32), they should at least get hold of the essential instructions he has been endeavoring to convey. Paul addresses every husband individually (lit., "you each, one by one"). Each one is to go on loving his wife as his very self (vv.25, 28–29). For her part, the wife is to give her husband the respect that is due him in the Lord (v.22)—a respect that is conditioned by and expressive of reverence for Christ. It also assumes that the husband will so love his wife as to be worthy of such deference.

F. Christian Relationships: Parenthood (6:1–4)

After dealing with husband-wife relationships, Paul considers the relationship between parents and children. He has the Christian family in mind; he assumes that both partners and their offspring recognize the lordship of Christ (vv.1, 4). He envisages no clash of loyalties in which God has to be obeyed rather than other people.

1 Paul addresses "children" directly, taking it for granted that they will be present in the congregations where the letter is being read. They belong to the total Christian family, the church. As in the previous paragraph on wives (5:22), the less-privileged and subordinate group in society of that time is given priority of treatment (cf. also slaves in vv.5–9). Social distinctions, rigidly observed in the Roman empire and even in Judaism, are transformed by the gospel so that those previously dispossessed acquire new rights.

Obedience by children consists in listening to the advice given by parents, an obligation supported by many passages in both OT and NT. In Col 3:20, Paul adds that this obedience is to be comprehensive in its scope. Isaac's willingness to be offered as a sacrifice is a model of such submission. Disobedience to parents is a symptom of a disintegrating social structure (cf. 2Ti 3:2), and Christian families have a responsibility not to contribute to the collapse of an ordered community. Both parents are mentioned, though in v.4 only fathers are given instructions as to reciprocal behavior. As head of the family, the husband acts representatively for his wife (as mother) as well as on his own behalf.

All this is "in the Lord," as are the other relationships (cf. 5:21–22; 6:5–9). Children are invited not simply to copy the example of Jesus when he was subject to his parents (Lk 2:51), but to realize that both they and their parents are under the authority of the living Christ. This is said to be the "right" thing for them to do, for such obedience "pleases the Lord" (Col 3:20). Obedience to parents is part of the divine law. Children need to recognize that some things have to be accepted even though at the time they themselves cannot understand them.

2 The fifth commandment is quoted as confirmation of v.1 (Ex 20:12; Dt 5:16). Paul appeals to what the children had already learned, for their Christian education began with the Decalogue. To "honor" (GK 5506) is more than to obey; it means to respect and esteem.

This is said to be "the first commandment with a promise." If we connect "first" and "promise," a difficulty arises because the fifth commandment is not the first of the ten to which a promise is attached. The second commandment against making idols also contains one. We should therefore separate "with a promise" from "first" and insert a comma after "commandment." But in what sense can this commandment be regarded as "the first"? It seems most likely that "first" here means first in importance. The rabbis regarded this commandment as the weightiest of all. Perhaps Paul meant to convey the fact that this is the most important commandment for children. Another likely explanation is to note the absence of the article before "first," suggesting that this is a primary commandment, i.e., one of foremost significance.

3 The promise attached to the fifth commandment in Dt 5:16 is not in itself appropriate to the church, so Paul stops short of the final clause, which speaks about the specific land God has given his people. What was originally a specific assurance to the Jews about Canaan becomes a generalization for Christians. The prospect of longevity is not held out elsewhere in the NT as part of the Christian hope, and commentators have tended to spiritualize the application by linking it with eternal life. "On the earth" rules out that interpretation. It is more likely that Paul wished to emphasize that by obeying their parents, children will live to prove that their true welfare depends on God (Dt 5:10).

4 The child-parent relationship is not one-sided. A standard feature of Paul's treatment of these domestic categories is that the stronger have obligations to the weaker. The gospel introduced a fresh element into parental responsibility by insisting that the feelings of the child must be taken into consideration. In a society where the father's authority was absolute, this was revolutionary.

Paul addresses "fathers" as the heads of their families, though the term could mean "parents." Above all else, he warns them against goading their children into a state of perpetual resentment (cf. 4:26). He is not thinking of extreme instances like disinheritance, but the everyday tensions of family life. Fathers must not make unreasonable demands. Otherwise children, being overcorrected, may lose heart (cf. Col 3:21). Children should be treated with tenderness.

Children are a heritage from the Lord (Ps 127:4); they are to be reared for him. The verb "bring up" (GK 1763) has to do in the first place with bodily nourishment (5:29) and then with education in its entirety. Paul mentions two aspects of such domestic education. "Training" (GK 4082) in the Greco-Roman world meant strict discipline; what Paul is referring to here is training in righteousness. "Instruction" (GK 3804) is correction by word of mouth. Remonstration and reproof are implied, but also advice and encouragement. What we have here is the beginning of Christian education in the home.

G. Christian Relationships: Employment (6:5–9)

The apostle deals finally with the relationship between slaves and masters. He is still concerned with the Christian household, for the majority of slaves were employed in the home. It is estimated that there were over sixty million of them in the Roman empire—about one-third of the total population—and more and more were becoming Christians. Most of them would be in pagan employment, though a few may have had Christian masters, like Onesimus (a slave of Philemon).

The fact that Paul has more to say to slaves than to masters (cf. Col 3:22–4:1) may reflect the social structure of these Asian churches. He addresses them on an equality with their masters and assumes that they have a Christian vocation. In a society that regarded slaves as no more than living tools, this was a sufficiently radical change of attitude. It did not immediately lead to emancipation but clearly paved the way. It is significant that, whereas marriage and the family are presented as divine ordinances, no such claim is made for the institution of slavery.

5 Slaves are to obey their masters whether they are good or bad. They are only "earthly" masters. The Christian slave has a heavenly Lord to whom he owes supreme allegiance. Because of this overriding relationship slaves can bear the burden of their servitude with equanimity, for in reality, they are free in the Lord.

"Respect and fear" must not be confused with craven servility but represent a sense of one's shortcomings and a desire not to make any mistake. "Sincerity" (GK 605) is the opposite of duplicity in thought or action. It implies openness and concentration of purpose, especially in the context of generosity. The Christian slave has one goal before him: to obey his human master as an expression of his commitment to the divine Lord.

6 Christian slaves were not merely to render eye-service by working hard when their master is watching them. They were under more temptation in this respect than paid workers, for they had nothing to gain materially from diligence. All the more reason, then, for Christian slaves to do their job well for its own sake and for Christ's sake. Paul may also be suggesting that Christian slaves should do more than what lies immediately before them. By showing some initiative, they would be acting as free agents and so transcend their social status.

Slaves should not be out simply to win favor with people. Rather, they should seek to please God as they seek to "obey Christ" (v.5) and to function as "slaves of Christ." The double reference to Christ is all the more relevant in the light of our Lord's own servanthood. He himself took the form of a slave and performed the menial task of washing his disciples' feet (Jn 13:1-11). As servants of the one who became the servant of humanity, Christian slaves will enthusiastically embrace the known will of God in this respect.

7 Such service must be rendered with genuine goodwill. Among papyrus letters found in Egypt was a will dated A.D. 157, in which the testator freed five slaves "because of their goodwill and affection." If even pagan slaves could display such qualities, how much more should Christians do so, without expecting their freedom as a reward. "As if" implies no fiction: they actually do serve the Lord rather than mere human beings.

8 Even though Christian slaves will not bank on any material reward, they can be assured of eternal gain (cf. Col 3:24). This is something they fully appreciate because of the catechetical instruction they have been given; it is from the Lord himself that each one will receive back the equivalent of whatever good he or she has done. This principle applies to both the slave and the master. The future tense looks forward to the final judgment when this compensation will be awarded. Like Jesus, Paul does not shrink from referring to rewards (Mt 5:12; Lk 14:12–14), for they are all of grace. They are undeserved, since a Christian's goodness is simply what God has enabled that person to do.

9 The idea that "everyone" will be rewarded for whatever good he or she has done provides a transition to dealing with the duties of "masters." The church did not include in its membership many people of higher social rank, and presumably the number of slaveowners in a local congregation was not large. But there must have been some who were masters, or it would have been pointless for Paul to address them. In fact, Paul wrote a personal letter to Philemon at Colosse about reinstating his fugitive slave, Onesimus.

The golden rule is extended to this most controversial of all relationships within the society of the day. Masters were to treat their slaves as they themselves expected to be treated. Though they gave the orders, they were to do so as themselves being under the authority of a heavenly Master. The common factor is that both were seeking to do the will of God (v.6). Masters must therefore refrain from browbeating their slaves by the threat of severe reprisals for unsatisfactory work. Vicious cruelty was rife among pagan slaveowners. Since their victims had no legal redress, they could be kicked around at will. Christian masters were to show themselves different by not cracking the whip but treating their slaves kindly and fairly.

Christian masters as well as Christian slaves (v.8) know that they all serve a heavenly Lord to whom they equally belong. With him no "favoritism" (GK 4721) exists. This word means literally to look to see who someone is before deciding how to treat that person. God has no "teacher's pets." Slaves are as precious in his sight as masters, and more is expected from those who are entrusted with greater responsibilities.

H. Into Battle (6:10–20)

This ringing passage sounds a call to arms. What Paul writes here concerning Christian warfare is the external counterpart of his emphasis on the inward growth and edification of the church (4:12, 16). The body of Christ must be united and built up so as to be ready for the inevitable encounter with evil, and each believer needs to be prepared for the fight. This passage may represent a kind of baptismal charge. Its text is "Be on your guard; stand firm in the faith; be men of courage; be strong" (1Co 16:13). It is taken for granted that the victory is already assured through what Christ accomplished by his death and resurrection (Eph 1:20–23). Christ the Lord is the mighty victor who routed all the hosts of wickedness. The Christian is identified with the deliverer in his conquest (Ro 13:14).

10 Paul now begins his final instructions in this letter. His addressees are to let themselves be strengthened in Christ himself (Php

4:13). Even though victory is secure, it has to be won through battle. All the resources that the Christian soldier needs are drawn from Christ and "his mighty power." Three of the four words for power in Eph 1:19 (see comment) are brought together again here. Paul's readers will recall that this is the same power that raised Jesus from the dead (1:20) and brought them to life when they were dead in trespasses and sins (2:1). Its adequacy cannot possibly be in doubt.

11 The call to "put on" (GK 1907) God's armor recalls a similar appeal in 1Th 5:8. This accoutrement is provided by God and modeled on what he wears himself (Isa 11:5; 59:17). It is a complete outfit ("full armor," also v.13). The soldier must be protected from head to foot, and his armor is made up of all the various pieces, both defensive and offensive.

"Stand" is a key word in this passage (cf. vv.13–14). It is a military term for holding on to one's position. The equipment enables the soldier to ward off the attacks of the enemy and to make a stand against him. Before any offensive can be launched, one must first of all maintain his own ground. The fourfold use of "against" stresses the determined hostility confronting the Christian soldier. The commander-in-chief of the opposing forces is the devil himself, the sworn enemy of the church. He is a master of ingenious stratagems and his tactics must not be allowed to catch us unawares. These stratagems probably reflect his deliberate attempts to destroy the unity of Christ's body (3:14–22; 4:1–16, 21) through the invasion of false doctrine and the fomenting of dissension (4:2, 21, 31–32; 5:6).

12 In military strategy one must never underestimate the strength of the enemy. Paul is certainly not guilty of such fatal misjudgment but gives a realistic report of its potential. The "struggle" (lit., "wrestling") is not merely against human foes but a war to the death against supernatural forces.

Four aspects of the corporate menace are presented here. The particular terms used are in themselves morally neutral, though in Paul they invariably indicate something sinister (1:21; 3:11). "Rulers" (GK 794) are "cosmic powers." Until the end of this age these demonic forces, already defeated by Christ on the cross (4:9), exercise a certain limited authority (here "authorities"; GK 2026) in temporarily opposing the purposes of God. The title "powers" (GK 3179) denotes those who aspire to world control. It was attached to savior gods in the ethnic religions and identified with the sun. The expression "the spiritual forces of wickedness" suggests the heavenly bodies, which were regarded as the abode of demons who held human lives in their grip. Pagans had no option but to resign themselves to an unalterable destiny. But Christians can fight against such malign influences. "The heavenly realms" probably denotes the unseen world in general, including both good and evil forces.

13 Because the warfare in which Christians are engaged is on the scale described in v.12, the command to take advantage of the "full armor of God" is reiterated from v.11. The verb, though translated "put on," is a different one from that in v.11; here it means "take up, assume" (GK 377). Thus, when the battle is at its fiercest, the soldiers of Christ will still be able to hold their line even against the most determined attack (i.e., "the day of evil"). When the emergency is over, it will be found that not an inch of territory has been yielded. Christians will "have done everything," not only in preparing for the conflict but also in pursuing it.

14 The exhortation to "stand" repeats the emphasis in vv.11, 13 on the need for immovable steadfastness in the face of a ruthless foe. In v.13 Paul talked about standing firm in the midst of battle. Now he writes at greater length about standing ready in anticipation of it.

The several items of the soldier's armor appear in the order in which they would be put on. Together they comprise "the whole armor" worn before taking the field. First, the "belt" tied tightly around the waist indicated that the soldier was prepared for action. A soldier slackened his belt only when he went off duty. It served to gather in the short tunic and helped keep the breastplate in place when the latter was fitted on. From it hung the scabbard in which the sword was sheathed (v.17).

In Isa 11:5 the Messiah is depicted as wearing the belt of righteousness around his waist and faithfulness as the sash around his body. Here "truth" (GK 237) is said to be the soldier's belt. "Truth" is to be interpreted both objectively as the truth of the gospel (1:13; 4:15) and subjectively as truth in one's inward being. Because Christians have accepted the truth of revelation and are now indwelt by the risen Lord, who is himself the truth, their lives have truth as its basis, and they display the consistency of character that springs from it.

The "breastplate" covered the body from the neck to the thighs. Usually it was made of bronze, though more affluent officers wore a coat of chain mail. The front piece was strictly the breastplate, but a back piece was commonly worn as well. In Isa 59:17 we are told that Yahweh himself put on righteousness like a breastplate. "Righteousness" (GK 1466) stands for uprightness and integrity of character—a moral rectitude and reputation for fair dealing that results directly from the appropriation of Christ's righteousness (see comment on 5:9). Christians should not seek protection in any works of their own but only in what Christ has done for them and in them.

15 Once the breastplate has been fitted into position, the soldier puts on his strong army boots; these ensured a good grip. The military successes both of Alexander the Great and of Julius Caesar were due in large measure to their armies being well shod and thus able to undertake long marches at incredible speed over rough terrain. What does "readiness" suggest (GK 2288)? It signifies a prepared foundation; that is, "the gospel of peace" with God through which believers have already been reconciled to God (2:17) affords them a sure foothold in the spiritual campaign in which they are engaged.

16 "In addition to all this," the Christian soldier is to "take up the shield of faith." The shield is the large oblong or oval scutum that the Roman soldier held in front of him for protection. It consisted of two layers of wood glued together, covered with linen and hide, and bound with iron. Soldiers often fought side by side with a solid wall of shields. But even a single-handed combatant found himself sufficiently protected.

For the Christian this protective shield is "faith" (GK 4411). We should regard faith here both as our faith in action and as the objective content of faith. Believing cannot be divorced from what is believed, and no rigid line should be drawn between these two aspects. Here only does Paul indicate the effect of a particular piece of armor. With such a shield believers can extinguish all the incendiary devices flung by the devil (v.11). In ancient warfare cane darts were sometimes tipped with tow, dipped in pitch, and then ignited. The Christian's shield effectively counteracts such diabolical missiles not merely by arresting or deflecting them, but by actually quenching the flames to prevent them from spreading.

17 Two more items remain. The "helmet" covered the head. It was made of bronze with leather attachments. In Isa 59:17 the Lord wears "the helmet of salvation" along with the "breastplate of righteousness." Christians share that divine equipment. The verb "take" reflects that the helmet and sword were usually handed to a soldier by his armorbearer. This verb is appropriate to the "givenness" of salvation. In 1Th 5:8 the helmet is identified with the hope of full salvation; this may well be the inference here (Eph 1:18).

The final weapon is the "sword," the short two-edged cut-and-thrust sword wielded by the heavily armed legionary. The "sword of the Spirit" is the Christian's only weapon of offense—meaning either the sword that is supplied by the Spirit or that is used by the Spirit. "The word of God" is the divine utterance or speech. In Isa 11:4 the Messiah is portrayed as one who strikes the ruthless with the rod of his mouth (i.e., by the authoritative impact of what he says).

But what specifically is this utterance of God? Some suggestions are the recorded words of Scripture in the OT, the remembered sayings of Jesus, or apostolic sayings that were incorporated into the NT. Others regard it as words given by the Spirit to meet the critical need of the moment (cf. Mk 13:11), or as prayer in which the Spirit speaks through the Christian (v.18). The best interpretation is probably the most obvious; it refers to those words that the Spirit has inspired so that Christians may use them to drive away Satan. It is significant that in Matthew's temptation narrative Jesus himself (quoting Dt 8:3) refers to "every word that comes from the mouth of God" (Mt 4:4) and employs relevant Scriptures to defeat the devil's stratagems.

18 This verse effectively rounds off the preceding verses. It commands believers with their full armor on to "be alert" by praying. "On all occasions" suggests that they will be in constant prayer in preparation for the battle as well as in the engagement itself. But it is in the critical hour of encounter that such support is most required (cf. "the day of evil" in v.13). "In the Spirit" means in communion with the Spirit or in the power of the Spirit. "Prayers" represents the approach to God in general and "requests" a special form of such prayers (supplication). Every avenue of such praying is to be thoroughly explored.

19 In other letters Paul asks his readers to remember him in their prayers. He recognizes his own dependency upon their intercessions despite his apostolic calling. He knows that only through what God himself supplies can he hope to fulfill his appointed ministry. So he invites his readers to pray that the gift of ready speech may be bestowed on him. To "open [one's] mouth" is a common phrase for making a public address or a long defense.

"Fearlessly" (GK 4244, repeated in a verbal form in v.20) is attached to "make known." As a favorite word of Paul, it means frankness and uninhibited openness of speech. Being "an ambassador in chains" (v.20), the apostle no doubt is thinking especially of his upcoming appearance before the imperial authorities—perhaps even the emperor himself—when he would have the opportunity to reveal the secret of the gospel. He had been chosen to carry the name of Jesus "before the Gentiles and their kings" (Ac 9:15), and this defense in Rome was to be the climax of his distinctive ministry. Meanwhile, as he awaited his trial, he wanted to make the most of every occasion that could be capitalized in the interests of the kingdom (cf. Ac 28:31).

20 Because of his faithfulness in preaching the Good News, Paul has been placed under house arrest. He is an ambassador on behalf of Christ, and yet paradoxically he is in chains. Ambassadors normally enjoyed diplomatic immunity, but Paul would be compelled to appear in the imperial court as a prisoner. Instead of wearing a golden chain of office he would be shackled to his guard (Ac 28:20; 2Ti 1:16). Once again, Paul says that he is counting on the prayers of the church so that he might speak out boldly "the mystery of the gospel" (v.19). "As I should" (Col 4:4) is not only "as it is incumbent upon me" but "in the way I ought."

IV. Conclusion (6:21–24)

21 This is almost a word-for-word parallel with Col 4:7–8. Nowhere is the connection between these two captivity letters closer than here. Paul had just completed Colossians, and Ephesians had been hurriedly concluded so that Tychicus could act as bearer of both letters. Since at this point he had exactly the same information to convey as to the Colossians, it is understandable that he employed the same terms.

Tychicus was the apostle's personal representative to the churches in Colosse (Col 4:7–9), Ephesus, and, assuming Ephesians to be a circular letter, other Asian churches. Later we find him with Paul again and named along with Artemas as a possible relief for Titus in Crete (Tit 3:12). Soon afterward he was dispatched to Ephesus (2Ti 4:12). The fact that he was entrusted with these important commissions reflects his reliability. Paul describes Tychicus as a loyal Christian servant and a brother dearly loved, not only by Paul but by all who knew him. He would pass on news Paul did not have time to include at the end of his letter, so that the readers may be brought up to date with details about his affairs and what he was doing.

22 Paul had only one aim in view as he commissioned Tychicus to visit the churches in and around Ephesus. It was to let them know what was happening in relation to him and to encourage them. They could easily become discouraged because of his sufferings on their behalf (3:13). Thus it would comfort them to learn that Paul was being well treated and was free to preach to those who visited him (Ac 28:17–31).

23 Ephesians finishes with a truly apostolic benediction, but one different in form from others in Paul's writings. Couched in the third person, not in the second, it has two parts instead of one. "Grace," which usually comes first, stands last. The three blessings that figure most prominently throughout Ephesians—peace, love, and faith—occupy the first half of the benediction. This is more than a farewell greeting; it is a prayer for reconciliation. Paul longs to see the whole brotherhood of believers in Ephesus and its environs—Jews and Gentiles alike—at "peace" with each other in the one body of Christ (3:15, 19; 4:3). This will only be brought about through mutual "love" (1:15; 3:17–18; 4:2, 16) combined with "faith," from which it is derived (1:15; 3:17; Gal 5:6). The ultimate source of these three essential features of Christian community life is God himself. The name of Christ the Son is associated with that of God the Father in perfect equality.

24 "Grace" is the hallmark of all Paul's benedictions. It is a recurring theme throughout Ephesians (1:2, 7; 2:5, 7–8; 3:2, 8; 4:7). Paul uses the article here ("the grace"), perhaps in order to emphasize that this grace is from "the Lord Jesus Christ" (2Co 13:13; Gal 6:18; Php 4:23) or to refer to the grace he has already written so much about in this letter.

"All who love our Lord Jesus Christ" means all believers (cf. Ac 5:14; 1Ti 4:12), for love is a necessary corollary of belief. Those who fail to love the Lord are anathematized in 1Co 16:22 as having no place in the church. Finally, Paul invokes grace on all who love our Lord Jesus Christ "with an undying love." That is the last and sealing word of the letter. The adjective in this phrase means "imperishable" or "unfading" and seems to indicate that Christian love will never die. An alternate meaning to this phrase signifies that lovers of the Lord are guaranteed, and indeed already enjoy, eternal life and immortality (cf. 1:13). As Christians put on the "new self" (4:24), they are recreated and assigned a seat in the heavenly realms (2:6).

This letter began with an ascription of praise "to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has blessed us in the heavenly realms with every spiritual blessing in Christ" (1:3). On this interpretation, it ends with a benediction invoking God's grace on all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in incorruption, because they are sealed with the Holy Spirit for the day of redemption (1:13–14; 4:30).

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
Eph 1:22	Ps 8:6	Everything subject to Christ
Eph 4:8	Ps 68:18	Ascension and gifts
Eph 4:25	Zec 8:16	Speaking the truth
Eph 4:26	Ps 4:4	Anger and sin
Eph 5:31	Ge 2:24	Institution of marriage
Eph 6:2–3	Ex 20:12; Dt 5:16	Fifth commandment

Philippians

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

Philippi was located in Macedonia about ten miles inland from the Aegean Sea. The original settlement was called Krenides, but in 356 B.C. the name was changed by Philip II, king of Macedonia, when he enlarged the city with many new inhabitants and considerable construction.

During the era of Roman rule, Philippi became a military colony in 42 B.C.; in 27 B.C., its status was again changed so that it received autonomous government, immunity from tribute, and treatment of its residents as if they actually lived in Italy. It was therefore one of the leading cities in the district of Macedonia (cf. Ac 16:12). The Via Egnatia, the main highway from Asia to the west, passed through Philippi and ran alongside the forum of the city. Near the city was the river Gangites.

The church at Philippi was founded in A.D. 50 in the course of Paul's second missionary journey (Ac 16). While the apostle was in Troas, he was instructed in a vision to proceed into Macedonia, and Philippi became the first European city in which he preached. Apparently the Jewish population in Philippi was small, for there was no synagogue. The missionary party, consisting of Paul, Silas, Timothy, and Luke, met first with some women at a Jewish place of prayer by the river bank outside the city. The first convert was Lydia, a "God-fearer" (a term denoting a Gentile who had become a partial adherent to Judaism), who responded to Paul by receiving Christian baptism and opening her home to the missionary party. Other significant incidents were the exorcism of the demon from a slave girl and the conversion of the jailer and his family. These early converts were a most diverse and unlikely group with which to found a local church, but the grace of God overcame their differences.

When the apostolic party moved on, Luke may have been left behind to guide the new work (the use of "we" in the narrative of Acts is dropped until 20:5–6, when Paul returns to Philippi). The new church did not forget its founder, however, for gifts were sent to Paul on several occasions (Php 4:15–16).

Paul made a second visit to Philippi in A.D. 55–56 on his third missionary journey (Ac 20:1–6). He must have passed through the city twice: on his outward trip toward Corinth and again on his return when he was on the way to Jerusalem. Luke apparently rejoined the party at that time. This visit to Jerusalem culminated in Paul's arrest and eventual imprisonment in Rome (Ac 21–28), which in turn brought about the occasion for this letter.

2. Authorship and Unity

That the apostle Paul wrote this letter to the Philippians is virtually unquestioned. The straightforward claim of the letter (1:1) is supported by the reference to Paul's acquaintances, the reflection of known circumstances in his life, and the many indications of Pauline thought. Even those who have questioned the unity of Philippians have usually concluded that Paul was the author of its various parts.

The case for a composite document has not commended itself to the majority of scholars. The rather abrupt break in tone and subject matter at 3:1 could have been due to the receiving of new information from Philippi as Paul was writing the letter or to an interval of several hours or even days between the several parts. The word "finally" in the middle of the letter (3:1) may simply mean "in addition."

3. Date and Place of Origin

Inasmuch as Paul was a prisoner at the time that Philippians was written (1:7, 13, 16), identification of this imprisonment would make possible the fixing of the date and place of origin of the letter. Three possibilities must be considered: Caesarea, Rome, and Ephesus.

1. Caesarea. Paul was a prisoner in Caesarea for two years (A.D. 57–59) and his friends had access to him (Ac 24:23, 27). The fugitive slave Onesimus could have fled there (this assumes that Colossians and Philemon came out of the same imprisonment as Philippians). The "praetorium" (1:13; NIV, "palace guard") could be understood of Herod's palace at Caesarea (Ac 23:35). Furthermore, the polemic against Jewish teachers (3:1–16) fits well the period of Jewish-Gentile controversy.

This theory has not been widely adopted, however, because there is not much evidence favoring it. Paul expected prompt release (2:24), but there was little reason for such optimism while he was at Caesarea, and this prospect was no longer possible after he had appealed to Caesar.

2. Rome. The traditional view places the writing of Philippians during Paul's first imprisonment in Rome during A.D. 59–61 (Ac 28:30). This is the most natural understanding of "palace guard" (1:13) and "Caesar's household" (4:22). Paul's trial was evidently going on during the writing, and its outcome could bring either life or death. Apparently there could be no appeal from its verdict (1:19–24). His circumstances reflected in the letter fit the Roman imprisonment better than the one at Caesarea, since he had freedom to arrange itineration for his associates and opportunity to carry on considerable correspondence. This view is the one that is most widely held; it will be assumed in this commentary.

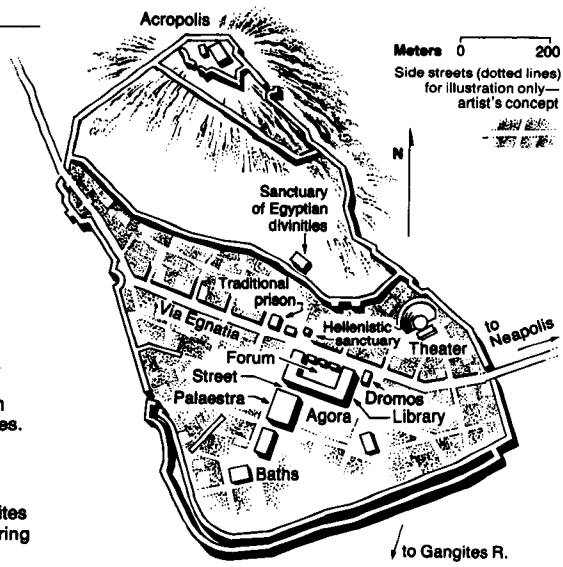
3. Ephesus. The case for the origination of this letter at Ephesus would place its writing in A.D. 53–55 during Paul's stay in Ephesus (Ac 19). While Acts mentions no imprisonment of Paul there, hints of it are found in Ro 16:4, 7; 1Co 15:32; 2Co 1:8–10; 11:23. But this is by no means established, for it demands treating the passages in Corinthians with wooden literalness rather than as the dramatic figures they are.

The letter to the Philippians presupposes several time-consuming journeys between Philippi and Paul's location. Consequently, some scholars hold that an Ephesus origin is more likely than one at Rome. As many as six trips may have occurred (requiring at least one month each between Philippi and Rome, but only one week between Philippi and Ephesus): (1) News of Paul's plight reaches Philippi; (2) Epaphroditus travels with a gift to Paul; (3) news of Epaphroditus's illness reaches Philippi; (4) the report of the Philippians' concern reaches Epaphroditus; (5) a trip was made by Timothy to Philippi; and (6) a return trip by Timothy to Paul was contemplated. Nevertheless, several factors weaken the force of this argument in favor of Ephesus. Not all of these trips necessarily originated after Paul was put in prison. Furthermore, two years in Rome would have provided sufficient time for these trips.

The Ephesus theory is also weakened by the fact that at Ephesus Paul could have appealed to Caesar as he did at Caesarea (contra 1:20, 23–24). Philippians also says nothing about the collection—a project Paul was engaged in while at Ephesus. Thus, the Ephesus theory does not seem to have sufficient foundation to dislodge the traditional view of Rome as the place of origin. It does seem, however, to be separated from the other prison letters (Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon), because it was carried by a different messenger and reflects circumstances apparently somewhat later than those relating to the other three. A date of A.D. 61 is suggested.

4. Occasion and Purpose

The Philippian church sent Epaphroditus to Paul with a gift from their congregation (4:18) and with instructions to minister to his needs through personal service (2:25). He also must have brought news of the progress and problems of the church. In the performance of his responsibilities, Epaphroditus became gravely ill, and the Philippians heard about it. For some reason, this latter circumstance greatly distressed Epaphroditus. Paul was therefore sending him back; his request that the church receive him with all joy and hold him in high regard (2:29) implies that some misunderstanding had occurred. He assures the church that Epaphroditus had been a real fellow soldier in the Lord's work (2:25), that his illness had been extremely serious (2:27–30), and that he was worthy of a hero's welcome (2:29).



The mention of the Philippians' gift (4:10–20) should not be regarded as Paul's first acknowledgment of their help. Too much time had elapsed since Epaphroditus's arrival for this to be a reasonable inference, nor would this mention have been delayed to the end if

Philippi In the Time of Paul

The Roman colony of Philippi (Colonia Augusta Julia Philippensis) was an important city in Macedonia, located on the main highway leading from the eastern provinces to Rome. This road, the Via Egnatia, bisected the city's forum and was the chief cause of its prosperity and political importance. Ten miles distant on the coast was Neapolis, the place where Paul landed after sailing from Troas, in response to the Macedonian vision.

As a prominent city of the gold-producing region of Macedonia, Philippi had a proud history. Named originally after Philip II, the father of Alexander the Great, the city was later honored with the name of Julius Caesar and Augustus. Many Italian settlers from the legions swelled the ranks of citizens and made Philippi vigorous and polyglot. It grew from a small settlement to a city of dignity and privilege. Among its highest honors was the ius Italicum, by which it enjoyed rights legally equivalent to those of Italian cities.

Ruins of the theater, the acropolis, the forum, the baths, and the western commemorative arch mentioned as the "gate" of the city in Ac 16:13 have been found. A little farther beyond the arch at the Gangites River is the place where Paul addressed some God-fearing women and where Lydia was converted.

© 1985 The Zondervan Corporation

it had been the occasion for Paul's writing the letter. Because of the several contacts between Philippi and Rome before this time, Paul had undoubtedly sent his initial thanks promptly. We may account for the additional mention of the gift as the apostle's grateful recollection of a very generous contribution.

Of all the letters Paul wrote to churches, this one stands out as being the most personal. No sharp rebukes of the congregation mar its joyful spirit, and no disturbing problems threaten the progress of the church. The warnings are of a cautionary and preventive nature. The frequent emphasis on Christ explains the underlying relationship of Paul to his readers.

EXPOSITION

Introduction (1:1–11)

A. Greeting (1:1–2)

1 "Paul and Timothy" are associated in the greeting, not because they were co-authors, but because Timothy was a well-known Christian leader, especially at Philippi, and was now with Paul. Paul alone was the author (see the singular verb and pronouns in 1:3–4 and the discussion in 2:19–23). Timothy had been present at the founding of the church at Philippi (Ac 16:1–12) and on several subsequent occasions (Ac 19:22; 20:3–6). Perhaps he served as Paul's amanuensis for the letter.

Both Paul and Timothy are designated as "servants [GK 1528] of Christ Jesus." This word is not a technical reference to a specific office, but emphasizes submission and dependence on their Lord and characterizes their willing service for Christ.

The addressees are "all the saints in Christ Jesus" who resided in the Macedonian city of Philippi. All believers are "saints" (GK 41) through their spiritual union with Christ, a fact Paul often expressed by the phrase "in Christ Jesus" (Ro 8:1–2; Eph 2:6, 10, 13; 3:6) or "in Christ" (Ro 12:5; 2Co 5:17). "Saints" here emphasizes not their personal holiness, though their conduct should correspond increasingly to their standing, but the objective status believers possess because the merits of Christ are imputed to them.

Though "overseers and deacons" were the two orders of officers in the local NT churches (1Ti 3:1–3), Philippians is the only letter to mention them in its greeting. The church at Philippi was organized, and this greeting endorses the officers' authority. "Overseers" (GK 2176) denotes the chief administrative officers ina local church; the term is interchangeable with "elders" (cf. Tit 1:5, 7). "Deacons" (GK 1356) were secondary officers in the church, charged with various temporal concerns (see comments on Ac 6:1–7). Because Epaphroditus had previously been sent with a monetary gift (Php 2:25), the deacons were equally involved in the project of aiding Paul (1:14-16).

2 The familiar blessing, "grace and peace," combines Greek and Hebrew expressions but transforms them into a thoroughly Christian greeting. God's "grace" (GK 5921) is his favor, needed by us in countless ways and bestowed without regard to merit. "Peace" (GK 1645) refers not to the cessation of hostilities between sinners and God (Ro 5:1), but to the inner assurance and tranquility that God ministers to the hearts of believers and that keeps them spiritually confident and content even in the midst of turmoil (4:7). The source of these blessings is "God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." To Paul, Jesus the Messiah is the divine Lord, ascended to the Father's right hand and equal to him in authority and honor. Just as Christ and the Father joined in the sending of the Holy Spirit (Jn 14:26; 15:26), so they jointly convey these blessings.

B. Thanksgiving (1:3–8)

3–4 Paul begins his letter by thanking God for his readers—a pattern followed in all his letters except Galatians. With the Philippians Paul had a warm relationship, and this tone is established at the outset of the letter. By stating his thanks to "my God," the author reveals his personal devotion. This was no stereotyped formula, but the natural outflow from the heart of a deeply spiritual man. The thanksgiving was prompted by the joyous memory Paul had of his Philippian friends. "Joy" (a word used five times in this letter, with "rejoice" occurring seven times) permeated his prayers even while he prayed for their needs.

5 What caused Paul the deepest satisfaction was the Philippians' "partnership [GK 3126] in the gospel." This term denotes participation or fellowship and expresses a two-sided relation. It includes the believer's participation in the life of God (1Co 1:9; 1Jn 1:3) and also the sharing of a common faith. Thus it assumes the existence of a brotherly relationship among believers (2Co 8:4; Gal 2:9; 1Jn 1:7). Their partnership certainly involved the Philippians' recent gift, but that was only one expression of it. Paul was filled with joy over the frequent evidences of their sharing in the work of the Gospel. These had been shown to him "from the first day" he had preached the Gospel in Philippi about ten years before. At that time he had experienced the hospitality of Lydia (Ac 16:15) and the jailer and his family (Ac 16:33–34). Later he had received gifts sent to him at Thessalonica (Php 4:16) and at Corinth (2Co 11:9), as well as the more recent one brought by Epaphroditus.

6 Of course, it was God who had produced their transformed lives by the work of regeneration. Even though Paul rejoiced in the Philippians' generous gift and their evidences of spiritual growth, his confidence did not rest ultimately on them but on God, who would preserve them and enable them to reach the goal. The "good work" refers to the salvation begun at their conversion. God not only initiates this salvation, but continues it and guarantees its consummation at the glorious coming of Jesus Christ, which will vindicate both the Lord and his people. Nothing in this life or after death can prevent the successful accomplishment of God's good work in every Christian.

"The day of Christ Jesus" is a phrase occurring six times in the NT (1Co 1:8; 5:5; 2Co 1:14; Php 1:6, 10; 2:16). This expression is similar to the "day of the Lord" (1Th 5:2) and the OT "day of the LORD" (Am 5:18–20). It will be the time when Christ returns for his church, salvation is finally completed, everyone's works are examined, and believers are rewarded.

7 Paul was right in regarding the Philippians so highly, because in a sense they had become partners in his imprisonment and his current legal obligations. To say they were in his "heart" (GK 2840) denotes not an emotional response on his part, but the essence of his inner consciousness and personality.

The reference to Paul's imprisonment belongs with the following rather than the preceding words, as giving evidence of the Philippians' partnership in God's grace. Even when it might have been dangerous to identify themselves openly with Paul, they had treated his misfortunes as their own and had come to his assistance with their gifts. "Defending and confirming the gospel" is legal terminology. "Defending" (GK 665) is used elsewhere in the NT of a legal defense (Ac 22:1; 25:16; 2Ti 1:16), and "confirming" (GK 1012) was a legal technical term (Heb 6:16) for guaranteeing or furnishing security. So

Paul is probably thinking of his approaching hearing in which he must give a defense of the Gospel he preached and in which he hoped also to offer clear proofs of its truth and validity. In Paul's view, all Christians were on trial with him, for the outcome could ultimately affect them all. The Philippians' assistance by their warm fellowship was a clear reminder that they felt the same way.

8 Only God could truly vouch for Paul's feelings about his Philippian friends, because they ran so deep. These yearnings for this church were prompted by the "affection of Christ Jesus," with whom Paul was in vital union. The indwelling Christ was producing the fruit of love in Paul by the Holy Spirit, enabling him to yearn for their welfare with the compassion of his Lord.

C. Prayer (1:9–11)

9 Paul's genuine thanks for the fellowship of the Philippian saints caused him to pray for their continued spiritual progress. Concern for others should express itself first in prayer, as one recognizes the importance of the divine factor in any lasting spiritual growth. The basic petition of Paul's prayer is that his readers' love might "abound more and more." "Love" (GK 27) is an aspect of the fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22), enabling all other spiritual virtues to be exercised properly (1Co 13:1–3). Without it no Christian is spiritually complete (Col 3:14). There is no reason to limit this to love for God, for each other, or for Paul. It is unrestricted and refers to any continuing demonstration of this spiritual fruit in any and all ways.

Love must be intelligent and morally discerning, however, in order to be genuine. It is based on knowledge, the intellectual perception that recognizes principles from the Word of God as illuminated by the Holy Spirit. Such spiritual knowledge enables believers to love what God commands. "Depth of insight" stresses moral perception and the practical application of knowledge to the myriad circumstances of life. Spiritual knowledge is thus no abstraction but is intended to be applied to life.

10 The atmosphere in which their love should operate requires the Philippians continually "to discern what is best." Some things are clearly good or bad. In others the demarcation is not so readily visible. In Christian conduct and the exercise of love, such factors as one's influence on others and the effect on oneself must be considered (1Co 10:32). The question should not only be "Is it harmful?" but "Is it helpful?" (1Co 10:23).

The goal in view is the "day of Christ," in which all believers must stand before the Lord and give an account of their deeds (2Co 5:10). This sobering and joyous prospect should have a purifying effect on their lives (1Jn 3:3).

11 The conduct that receives Christ's commendation is "the fruit of righteousness"—i.e., transformed lives as proof that God works in believers. Paul desires that when his readers stand before Christ, their lives will have been filled with the right kind of fruit. He is not talking about mere human uprightness measured by outward conformity to law (3:9). He is rather speaking of the spiritual fruit that comes from Jesus Christ, produced in them by the Holy Spirit (Gal 5:22). Consequently, all the glory and praise belong not to believers but to God, for he has redeemed them by the work of his Son and has implanted within them his Spirit to produce the fruit of righteousness (cf. Eph 1:6, 12, 14).

I. The Situation of Paul in Rome (1:12–26)

A. Paul's Circumstances Had Advanced the Gospel in Rome (1:12–18)

12 "I want you to know" typically introduces an important assertion and may imply that misunderstanding has arisen over a matter. In this instance, the significance of Paul's immediate situation was the important matter. On the assumption that the letter was written from a Roman imprisonment, Paul is saying that his recent circumstances had not been detrimental but advantageous to the Gospel. This event does not seem to refer to his imprisonment as such, about which the Philippians had been informed, but to more recent developments. Perhaps Paul had been moved from his hired house (Ac 28:30) to some place more accessible to the trial scene. This could easily have been interpreted as bad news, but it had "really served to advance the gospel." Paul does not imply that his case had been settled, nor that any official action favoring Christianity had been taken.

Nevertheless, his immediate circumstances should be viewed as a plus for the Gospel.

13 There were at least two ways in which the Gospel had been advanced through Paul's circumstances. The first was that it had been made clear throughout "the whole palace guard" that Paul's imprisonment was "for Christ." During the first century, prisoners sent to Rome in cases of appeal were entrusted to the care of praetorian guards. As these guards were assigned in succession to Paul, it soon became clear to them that he was no ordinary captive. The words "for Christ" are connected with "clear" in the Greek text; thus Paul was claiming that his relationship to Christ had been made clear to his guards.

Paul's bold testimony to the Gospel of Christ in spite of his imprisonment had also been borne "to everyone else" who came to his quarters, including members of the Jewish community (Ac 28:17ff.), at least one Gentile (Phm 10), and many Christian coworkers. Instead of falling into self-pity, he took every opportunity to make the Gospel known.

14 The second way the Gospel had been advanced was that Paul's circumstances had emboldened other Christians in Rome. One might suppose that his imprisonment would have dampened any evangelizing efforts and have caused believers in Rome to "go underground." Or if Paul had become depressed by these new developments, the others too would have lost enthusiasm for the Gospel. But exactly the opposite was true. They drew courage from Paul's example, laid their fears aside, and became more bold in proclaiming God's word. The present tense shows it was no momentary enthusiasm that quickly passed but was still the situation as Paul wrote his letter.

15 Not all of these newly encouraged "preachers" in Rome, however, were responding with the highest of motives. Some were proclaiming the message of Christ "out of envy and rivalry." In the light of vv.16–17, it is clear that their wrong spirit was directed against Paul. It is not difficult to imagine that even those jealous of Paul could well have been intimidated at first by his imprisonment and have kept quiet to protect themselves.

Who were these disappointing preachers? Some have identified them as the Judaizers of 3:1–16. But one can hardly imagine Paul commending such people for speaking "the word of God" (v.14) and "preach[ing] Christ" (vv.17–18) and then later denouncing them so strenuously (3:2). Furthermore, in Paul's view, Judaizers preached another gospel (Gal 1:6–9). More likely, Paul was referring to a part of the group mentioned in 1:14. They were doctrinally orthodox, but at the same time mean and selfish, using the occasion of Paul's confinement to promote themselves. Envious of Paul, they stirred up discord within the Christian community (see comment on v.17).

Others, to their credit, were moved by feelings of goodwill for Paul. Their renewed vigor in proclaiming Christ was a true joining with Paul in the great enterprise of the Gospel.

16 These nobler preachers recognized the apostle's sincerity and unselfishness. They realized that his present circumstances were part of a larger divine program and that he had never deviated from it. He had been "put here" not by his own miscalculations, nor by chance, but by the operation of God's sovereignty "for the defense of the gospel." By ways that could never have been humanly foreseen, God had accomplished within the short space of thirty years the spreading of the Gospel of Jesus Christ from its humble beginnings in obscure Judea to its defense before Caesar at the center of the Empire. No doubt it was with some sense of awe that Paul evaluated his situation in this manner. Recognition of the nature of Paul's imprisonment caused many stalwart Christians to respond out of love for him, to step into the breach, and to take their stand with him, eager to ensure that the Gospel did not fail to be proclaimed while Paul was in prison.

17 The former group of preachers (v.15a) were guilty of insincerity, particularly toward Paul. That they preached Christ and that Paul found no fault with the content of their message shows that their problem was not doctrinal but personal. They were self-seeking opportunists, promoting themselves at Paul's expense. Perhaps they had enjoyed some prominence in the church before he arrived, but had been eclipsed since he came to the city. By taking advantage of Paul's imprisonment, they may have hoped to recover their former popularity. They may have supposed that he would bitterly resent their success (just as they did his) and his imprisonment would become all the more galling to him. If so, they failed to reckon with the greatness of the man.

18 Paul's conclusion, "But what does it matter?" reveals his sense of values. The importance of the Gospel and its proclamation so outweighed any personal considerations that he would not cloud the issue by insisting on settling personal grievances. He was convinced that "Christ is preached" even by these preachers whose motives were suspect. To preach Christ meant to proclaim the good news of salvation provided freely by God's grace through the redemptive work of Christ and received by faith.

As long as the antagonism was only personal, Paul could rejoice that the greater purpose of disseminating the Gospel was being served. Even when some of the preaching arose out of "false motives," utilized to camouflage attacks on Paul, the apostle took the magnanimous view that affronts to himself could be ignored, and he could rejoice in the advance of the Gospel.

B. Paul's Circumstances Would Turn Out for Salvation (1:19–26)

19 Paul moves to the second encouraging aspect of his present situation in Rome—the prospect for his "deliverance" (GK 5401). Is this a reference to deliverance from his present imprisonment? It is true that Paul expressed confidence of release (1:25; 2:24), but the immediate context puts the "deliverance" as somewhat apart from physical life or death (1:21), and the inner struggle described in 1:22–24 makes it questionable whether he would have stated the anticipated result of his Roman trial with this sort of certainty. Thus "deliverance" has the sense of spiritual salvation. Paul viewed salvation as having several aspects—past (Eph 2:8), present (Php 2:12), and future (Ro 13:11). Here the present and future aspects are fused into one as the apostle looks to the unfolding of his Christian life and his ultimate hope of standing unashamed both before human judges and before his Lord (cf. v.20). He viewed his salvation as being accomplished by two means: the effective prayers of the Philippians on his behalf, and the support furnished by the Holy Spirit ("the Spirit of Jesus Christ"). These two are interrelated, inasmuch as Paul would have regarded the Philippians' prayers as being answered by the Spirit's increased activity on his behalf.

20 If "deliverance" has the above-mentioned sense, then Paul is saying that regardless of the outcome of his immediate physical circumstances, he has every reason to "eagerly expect" and "hope" for spiritual victory. These two words (nouns in the Greek text) are grammatically joined by a single article so as to indicate a single concept.

While waiting for the settlement of his case, Paul had a well-founded hope that he would "in no way be ashamed." This is a broad statement referring first to his appearance before the authorities for the final disposition of his case. There may also be overtones of his ultimate appearance before Christ, because he speaks of the possibility of death and of the advantage of being with Christ. He is confident that he will continue to maintain the sort of courage characteristic of his ministry in the past.

The expression "sufficient courage [GK 4244]" conveys the thought of openness, courage, boldness, or confidence, whether toward God or people. Prominent are instances in which this quality is viewed in relation to speech. Paul may be thinking in terms of his coming testimony before his imperial judges. It would not be as easy to give a courageous witness in those circumstances, apart from the help of the Holy Spirit.

Paul wants Christ "to be exalted," regardless of whether (physical) "life" or "death" would be the verdict on his "body." The passive voice of the verb "to be exalted" suggests that Paul was not relying on his own courage but on the action of the Holy Spirit, who would produce this result in response to the prayers of Paul and the Philippians (v.19).

21 "For to me" stresses that Paul's own faith was unshaken, regardless of the circumstances. No adverse decision from the court nor the alarm of his friends could alter his firm belief about his present or his future. "To live is Christ." The very essence of Paul's present life was Christ and all that this entailed. Paul's identification with Christ in a vital spiritual union (Gal 2:20) resulted in far-reaching practical implications. Christ had become for him the motive of his actions, the goal of his life and ministry, and the source of his strength. "To die" after such a life could only mean "gain." Not only would Paul's death be the gateway to Christ's presence (v.23), but the act itself of dying at the hands of Rome was no tragedy in his eyes. Such a death would bear added witness to the power of the Gospel.

22 If, however, he continued to live as a result of a favorable disposition of his case in Rome, he would have continuing opportunity to labor fruitfully in the cause of Christ. For Paul this never meant an easy life. His labors in establishing churches and nurturing them toward maturity were characterized by frequent opposition, physical hardships, and much spiritual anguish (cf. 2Co 11:23–29). Yet he looked on his apostolic ministry as a challenge to be grasped and as fruit to be harvested.

Paul did not know which option he would "choose" (GK 145) if he could. This word is used of the election of believers by God (2Th 2:13) and of Moses' choice in aligning himself with his own people (Heb 11:25). It does not mean that Paul could actually choose his fate, but it refers to his personal preference. The verb "know" (GK 1192) means "to make known" in all other NT occurrences, and it seems to have this sense here. Thus, the meaning is, "I cannot tell [you]" or "I cannot declare [to you]." Paul was so positively committed to the will of God that both life and death held certain attractions. If the choice were left to him, he would not be able to tell what he would decide. How fortunate that God does not force us to make such choices!

23 As Paul thought of his prospects, he felt himself in a dilemma ("I am torn"; GK 5309), though in his case either alternative (continued life or sudden death inflicted by Rome) was a good one. The verb used here is sometimes used of diseases that control their victims. Here the idea of distress seems to be present (cf. Lk 4:38).

From his view of what would be most advantageous to him, Paul desired to leave this life and "be with Christ." Death for him would not be a catastrophe. Paul's expression here indicates that he did not foresee a soul-sleep while awaiting the resurrection, nor any purgatory. As he had already explained to the Corinthians, absence from the body means immediate presence with the Lord (2Co 5:8). This was undoubtedly "better by far," because it would bring him rest from his labors (Rev 14:13) and the joy of eternal fellowship in the very presence of the Lord whom he loved.

24 Yet the apostle also recognized another standpoint from which his future might be viewed. By remaining alive he would offer a certain advantage to his Philippian readers. He does not state specifically what this advantage was, but the obvious reference is to the ministry he might still perform for them.

25 With his situation in the Lord's hands (1:19–24), Paul was confident that what occurred would bring glory to God, regardless of how it turned out. That confidence now prompted him to say, "I know that I will remain." This probably represents Paul's personal conviction based on what seemed to be most probable in the light of all the factors. The need of many for his apostolic ministry outweighed his own need to be with Christ immediately. Furthermore, he must have known that the case against him was not strong (Ac 23:29; 25:25; 26:31–32), and thus his hope of release was well-founded. Evidence from the pastoral letters, confirmed by early historical testimony, indicates that Paul was released from this first Roman imprisonment and began to travel, including a trip through Macedonia (and presumably Philippi), before being reimprisoned and suffering a martyr's death.

Paul's continued ministry among the Philippians would be aimed at advancing their spiritual growth and deepening their joy in the Christian faith. Believers should not be static in their faith but should grow in understanding of spiritual truth. This will increase their joy as they enter more fully into the understanding of their privileges and prospects in Christ.

26 The "joy" (lit., "boasting"; GK 3017) in Paul's thought here is that as the Philippians experienced the progress and joy that Paul's labors among them would produce (v.25), they would have new and greater reasons for overflowing with joy. Their ultimate reason for glorying would be found "in Christ Jesus," of course, but its immediate occasion would be "on account of me." His ministry among them would enable them to see more clearly the riches of their salvation in Christ.

II. First Series of Exhortations (1:27–2:18)

A. Exhortation to Unity and Courage in View of External Foes (1:27–30)

27 As citizens of a spiritual realm, the Philippians should stand firm in one spirit. This should be true "whatever happens" to Paul, for the responsibility for their spiritual growth rests ultimately with them and their appropriation of the riches in Christ (see v.26). Whether Paul would be released and thus enabled to visit them in person, or be forced to remain away from them and learn of their progress through the reports of others, his exhortation is the same. They must conduct their lives in a manner appropriate to the Gospel of Christ.

In this connection, Paul uses a verb that meant literally "to live as a citizen" for "conduct yourselves" (GK 4488). This was an apt term for a letter written to a church in a city whose inhabitants were proud of their status as Roman citizens (Ac 16:12, 20–21). The earliest members of the Philippian church would have remembered that Paul had used his own Roman citizenship to bring about a speedy and dignified release from imprisonment there (Ac 16:36–40). Out of this cultural background the readers were challenged to live as those who had a higher and vastly more significant citizenship (Php 3:20).

Paul then urges his readers to "stand firm in one spirit [GK 4460]." True unity can only be produced by the Holy Spirit, though the emphasis in this verse on the inner result, not the source. They should contend together in the faith "as one man" (lit., "soul"; GK 6034). It is doubtful whether Paul was trying to draw sharp psychological distinctions between "spirit" and "soul." If such are to be sought to any degree, the former term probably denotes one's highest center of motivation, and for the Christian this would be quickened by the Holy Spirit. The latter term would denote the area of sensory experience.

This exhortation to unified thought and action has in view the goal of "contending" (GK 5254) "for the faith of the gospel." Paul means here the objective faith (i.e., the body of truth) embodied in the Gospel message. "Contending" suggests their need to promote and protect the message of Christ, while at the same time implying that adversaries must be faced. Such work required joint effort, if we are to be victorious in the contest.

28 Paul does not want the Philippians to be terrified in any respect by their opponents. The noble character of their cause and the recognition that Christ is on their side should cause believers to avoid the unreasoning terror that prevents intelligent effort. Who were these opponents? Most likely the Jews, though it is not necessarily limited to them. Hostile Jews often dogged Paul's steps and caused trouble in the churches he founded (e.g., in Thessalonica: Ac 17:5; in Berea: Ac 17:13). In any case, it is virtually certain that these were external foes, not false teachers within the church. Whether Jewish or pagan enemies, they usually employed the same tactics, and the need for unity and courage among the believers was crucial.

Failure of the church to be intimidated by enemies was a token of the ultimate failure of God's enemies. The adversaries may not have recognized this, but it was nonetheless a "sign" that their attacks were futile and that the church would prevail. As a sign or token, it testified to two things: the ultimate destruction of the adversaries and the salvation of the believers. "And that by God" refers grammatically neither to "salvation" nor to "sign," but to the entire fact that believers have been granted courage from God to stand firm in their struggles and so are demonstrating their salvation.

29 The whole situation was part of God's gracious provision for those enlisted in the cause of Christ. The privileges enjoyed by Christians included the ability not only to believe in Christ initially at regeneration and subsequently throughout their Christian lives, but also to suffer for him. If we question the propriety of referring to suffering as a privilege and a gracious gift, we must remember that the NT regards suffering as God's means of achieving his gracious purposes both in his own Son (Heb 2:10) and in all believers (Jas 1:3–4; 1Pe 1:6–7).

30 In this matter of suffering, the Philippians were experiencing the same sort of "struggle" (GK 74) Paul had endured throughout his ministry. They had seen some of Paul's sufferings when he was in Philippi (Ac 16:19–24). They had heard of others he had undergone more recently in Rome (from reports of travelers or other messengers, including those who conveyed the information about Epaphroditus, 2:26) The word "struggle," often used in an athletic sense, developed a metaphorical use for any kind of conflict. It is consistent with the thought of "antagonists" in v.28.

B. Exhortation to Unity and Humility Toward Those in the Church (2:1–11)

1 The following exhortation also concerns unity, but this time the focus is turned on problems within the church. To encourage the fulfillment of this injunction, Paul listed four incentives. All are stated as "if" clauses, but the condition is assumed to be true (the "if" becomes almost synonymous with "since"). (1) As Christians, the Philippians were in a vital union with Christ, and this placed obvious obligations on them. They were responsible to heed the orders of Christ as issued by him either directly during his ministry or through his apostles. (2) The comfort and encouragement provided by love should prompt the Philippians to desist from divisiveness in any form and to join hands in common action. (3) The fellowship produced by the Holy Spirit should stimulate the practical exercise of unity. They have been made one by the Spirit (cf. 1Co 12:13) and thus are partners with him and with each other. (4) The existence of tenderness and compassion among them would make the unity that was being called for the normal and expected thing.

"Encouragement" (GK 4155) means either "exhortation" or "consolation." To understand the term in this context as implying more than just comfort is consistent with other Pauline statements on unity. In Eph 4:1–3 the unity of the believers is made the subject of an exhortation. The translation "encouragement" can convey both ideas.

2–4 Paul exhorts the Philippians to make his joy full by "being like-minded" (lit., "minding the same thing"). He was already experiencing joy because of his associations with this church (1:3–4; 4:10), but one attitude that was still needed to make his joy "complete" was like-mindedness. Of course, this was not a command for unity at the expense of truth, for "the same thing" is also "the right thing."

Paul now elaborates on his enjoinder to maintain unity in their thought and action. By complying with the next four instructions, his readers would create a climate where true unity could flourish. (1) Believers should possess a mutual love. Inasmuch as all were indwelt by the same Spirit (v.1), love as a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22) ought to be demonstrated in every life.

(2) Believers should set their minds on oneness "in spirit and purpose." This phrase repeats what was said in v.2 and reinforces the conclusion that there was a problem of disharmony within the congregation. It may be unfair to center the problem on Euodia and Syntyche (4:2), but they were at least involved.

(3) Believers should avoid "selfish ambition" (GK 2249) and "vain conceit" (GK 3029) and consider others above themselves (v.3). Paul himself had experienced adverse effects from selfish ambition among some unworthy preachers at Rome (1:17). Persons who seek to advance themselves usually enjoy glorying in their success. The Christian attitude should reveal itself in "humility" (GK 5425), a concept not highly regarded among the Greeks. Believers should be humble toward one another, mindful of their spiritual brotherhood and their ultimate subjection to Christ. In their exercise of humility, they should "consider others better than yourselves." This does not mean that we must have false or unrealistic views of our own gifts as compared with those of others. Rather, our consideration for others must precede concern for ourselves (Ro 12:10). This will go far toward removing their disharmony.

(4) Believers should be looking not only to their own interests but also to those of others (v.4). The self-centeredness that considers only one's own rights, plans, and interests must be replaced by a broader outlook that includes the interests of one's fellows Christians. "Not only . . . but also" indicates that believers should not neglect their own welfare or that of their families (1Ti 5:8) as they seek the good of others. Instead, Paul calls for a Christian concern that is wide enough to include others in its scope. When each member of the Christian community exercises this mutual concern, problems of disunity quickly disappear.

5 The great example of humility is Christ Jesus. Although vv.5–11 contain one of the outstanding Christologies in the NT, they were written to illustrate the point of humility and selflessness. Another place where Paul incidentally makes a sublime statement about Christ in illustrating a practical point is Eph 5:25–27.

The literary form of this beautiful passage has led many to regard it as an early Christian hymn that Paul incorporated into his letter. But Paul himself was quite capable of a highly poetic style (cf. 1Co 13), and he may well have composed these exalted lines. Regardless of their precise origin, the passage provides a masterly statement of Christology and serves well the author's purpose of illustrating supreme condescension.

The exhortation comes first: "Your attitude should be the same as that of Christ Jesus." Here the Greek text could literally be rendered, "Keep thinking this [attitude] among you, which [attitude] was also in Christ Jesus." Believers cannot duplicate the precise ministry of Jesus but they can display the same attitude.

6 Christ's preincarnate status is then stated. Two assertions are made: He was "in very nature God" (lit., "in the form [GK 3671] of God"), and he did not regard his existing in a manner of "equality with God" as a prize "to be grasped" or held onto. The word "form" denotes the outward manifestation that corresponds to the essence (in contrast to the noun "appearance" [GK 5386; v.8], which refers to what is outward and perhaps temporary).

The participle "being" (in the sense of "existing") is in the present tense and states Christ's continuing condition. By saying that he was existing in the essential metaphysical form of God is tantamount to saying that he possessed the nature of God. The phrase is elaborated on by the words "equality with God." This does not mean the same as "the form of God," for one's essential nature can remain unchanged, though the manner in which that nature is expressed can vary greatly through changing times and circumstances.

The expression "something to be grasped" (GK 772) has been variously interpreted. Does it mean something that has been seized or something to be seized? This uncertainty has led to three possibilities: (1) The preincarnate Christ already possessed equality with the Father and resolved not to cling to it; (2) Christ had no need to grasp at equality with God, for he already possessed it; (3) Christ did not reach for his crowning prematurely, as Adam had, but was willing to wait till after his suffering. That the preexistent state is in view seems evident from the movement of the passage (see also 2Co 8:9). Inasmuch as Christ already existed in "the form of God," the mode of his existence as equal with God was hardly something totally future but must rather be something he divested himself of. Hence, view 3 above does not fit the context so well as view 1. View 2, though expressing a truth, does not provide an adequate basis for the statements that follow.

7–8 The description then moves to Christ's incarnate state. Two clauses carry the main thoughts: "[he] made himself nothing" and "he humbled himself." The first clause is literally "but himself he emptied" (GK 3033); the Greek word used here has lent its name to the so-called kenosis theories that probe the nature of Christ's "emptying" himself. Although the text does not directly state that he emptied himself "of something," such would be the natural understanding when this verb is used. Furthermore, the context has most assuredly prepared the reader for understanding that Christ divested himself of something.

The one who was existing in the form of God took on the form or "nature of a servant." The word "taking" does not imply an exchange, but rather an addition. The "form of God" could not be given up, for God cannot cease to be God; but our Lord could and did take on the very form of a lowly servant when he entered human life in his incarnation. This passage emphasizes his condescension and humble station. What an example our Lord provides of the spirit of humility (cf. 2:3–5)! The statement goes on to make it clear that Christ became part of humanity: "being made in human likeness." The word "likeness" (GK 3930) stresses similarity but leaves room for differences. Thus Paul implies that even though Christ became a genuine man, there were certain respects in which he was not absolutely like the other men. He may have had in mind the unique union of the divine and human natures in Jesus, or the absence of a sinful nature.

In sum, Christ did not empty himself of the form of God (i.e., his deity), but of his manner of existence as equal to God. Christ's action has been described as the laying aside during the Incarnation of the independent use of his divine attributes. This is consistent with other NT passages that reveal Jesus as using his divine powers and displaying his glories upon occasion (e.g., miracles, the Transfiguration), but always under the direction of the Father and the Spirit (Lk 4:14; Jn 5:19; 8:28; 14:10).

Externally, therefore, Christ appeared as a mere human being; outwardly considered, he was no different from other people. This was indeed an act of great condescension for one who possessed the form of God. But Christ's incomparable act did not end here; he further humbled himself by "becoming obedient to death." He was so committed to the Father's plan that he obeyed it even as far as death (Heb 5:8). Nor was this all, for it was no ordinary death, but the disgraceful death by crucifixion, a death not allowed for Roman citizens, and to Jews indicative of the curse of God (Dt 21:23; Gal 3:13).

9 The final movement of thought in this sublime illustration describes Christ's subsequent exaltation. The nature of this exaltation was God's elevating Christ to the highest position and granting him the name above all names. "Exalted . . . to the highest place" (lit., "superexalted"; GK 5671) refers to the resurrection, ascension, and glorification of Jesus following his humiliating death, whereby all that he had laid aside was restored to him and much more besides. Implicit in this exaltation is the coming consummation mentioned in vv.10–11, when his triumph over sin and his lordship will be acknowledged by every being.

In view of the chronological pattern exhibited in this passage, the giving of "the name" must have been subsequent to the Cross. This would appear to be sufficient to rule out the identity of the name in view as being "Jesus." A more likely identification of "the name" is "Lord" (GK 3261), the equivalent of the OT "LORD" (Heb. "Yahweh"; GK 3378; cf. v.11). Christ's exaltation is expressly stated as manifesting his lordship in Ac 2:33–36. Another explanation takes "the name" in the sense of position, dignity, or office, similar to the OT use of that word (GK 9005; see that use elsewhere in the NT in Eph 1:21; Heb 1:4). There are also instances where "the name" is used alone as a reference to God or Christ (see Ac 5:41; 3Jn 7; cf. 2Sa 7:13; 1Ki 8:43–44).

10–11 The purpose of Christ's exaltation is that all beings might bow in acknowledgment of the name that belongs to Jesus and confess that "Jesus Christ is Lord." Because of what the name Jesus (i.e., "Savior"; see comment on Mt 1:21) represents, a time is coming when every knee will bow before him in recognition of his sovereignty. This statement is built on the wording of Isa 45:23 (cf. Ro 14:11; Rev 5:13). This universal acknowledgment will include angels and departed saints in heaven, people still living on earth, and the satanic hosts and lost humanity in hell. The phrases "in heaven," "on earth," and "under the earth" could possibly refer to all of creation, animate and inanimate (cf. Ro 8:19–22). However, the mention of "knee" (and "tongue") suggests that personal beings are in view here.

Submission will also be expressed by verbal confession. "Every" indicates a universal acknowledgment of Christ's sovereignty, even by his enemies. Paul does not imply by this a universal salvation, but means that every personal being will ultimately confess Christ's lordship, either with joyful faith or with resentment and despair.

This ultimate confession that "Jesus Christ is Lord" is apparently Paul's indication of the "name" granted Jesus at his exaltation following the Cross (v.9). That name with all the dignity and divine prerogatives this implies will eventually be recognized by every creature. Of course, the Son in his nature was always deity, but the exaltation following the Cross granted him the dignity of station commensurate with his nature and far superior to his humble state while on earth.

"To the glory of God the Father" is Paul's closing doxology to this remarkable Christology. He has never lost sight of the divine order and of the grand scheme in which the incarnation of Christ must be viewed. Recognition of Christ's lordship fulfills the purpose of the Father and so brings glory to God.

This picture of Christ's humiliation and subsequent exaltation was intended by Paul to encourage in his readers an attitude of Christlike humility (v.5). If they were to be identified as Christ's followers, they must demonstrate his characteristics. The appeal, however, was not only to a life of lowliness and hardship; it also contained the reminder that victory followed humiliation and that God's glory will ultimately prevail.

C. Exhortation to Work Out Their Salvation (2:12–18)

12 Paul now exhorts the Philippians to pursue their Christian progress without undue dependence on his presence. Perhaps he had noted a weakness along this line. Once before he had mentioned their need to be as diligent in his absence as they were when he was present with them (1:27). While the obedience he expects from them may be obedience to his commands, Paul ultimately wants them to obey the commands of God that he had taught them. They had always obeyed the commands of God implicit in the Gospel, beginning from the time when he first evangelized them, and it had been witnessed by him on all of his subsequent visits. But they must be just as careful to obey while he was away, especially if his circumstances should prevent a return.

Paul's specific exhortation is to "work out your salvation." The biblical concept of salvation needs to be understood in order to comprehend Paul's intent here. Salvation has many aspects, including a present one (see comment on 1:19). Regeneration initiates believers into a life with obligations, one of which is to obey Jesus our Lord. Hence, working out salvation does not mean "working for" salvation, but making salvation operational. Justification must be followed by sanctification, by which the new life in Christ is consciously appropriated and demonstrated. Moreover, the Christians in Philippi must not depend on Paul but must work out their own spiritual progress, because the same Lord who worked through Paul also worked in them (v.13).

In Bible times, the central square of Philippi was the hub of commercial activity in Macedonia. Courtesy Bastiann Van Elderen.

"With fear and trembling" does not contradict the joyful spirit permeating this letter. Christian joy is the experience of every believer in God's will, but holy fear of God that trembles at the thought of sin is also the attitude of the careful Christian (Jas 4:8–10).

13 The Philippian Christians can carry out the exhortation of v.12 because God himself produces in believers both the desire to live righteously and the effective energy to do so. God does not demand of us what we cannot do. Furthermore, the provision from God takes into account our every need. It is not always enough to "will" something, for good intentions are not always carried out. Our wills must be energized by God himself.

14 Compliance with Paul's exhortation should be "without complaining or arguing." "Complaining" (GK 1198) describes grumbling discontent in the congregation, and "arguing" (GK 1369) depicts evil reasonings and disputes that usually follow. Are these complaints directed against God or against each other? Neither alternative is foreign to the context. On the one hand, this passage is influenced by Dt 32:5; and the example of Israel's complaining, which was chiefly against God, was used elsewhere by Paul to instruct the church (1Co 10:10). On the other hand, the problem of disunity in the congregation has already been noted in this letter (v.2), and more is to come (4:2). Perhaps the command is sufficiently general to cover both meanings.

Emphasis in the command falls on the word "everything" (lit., "all things"). Most Christians are able to do some things without complaint. But when we are exhorted to be doing "all things" with a joyful spirit, the difficulty arises. Yet the outworking of our Christian faith in daily life lays this responsibility on us.

15 The purpose of the exhortation to work out their salvation was that the readers might be pure and uncontaminated light-givers in the world. By regeneration they had already become children of God in nature and position. Now as they progressed in sanctification, they would become "children of God without fault," particularly as viewed by the world around them. By faithfully adhering to the word of God as contained in Scripture and taught by Paul, their lives would be free from anything blameworthy. Thus their witness would not be disfigured.

The apostle is mindful of their location within a corrupt society. Using OT language (Dt 32:5) he depicts humankind generally as "a crooked and depraved generation." Amid this moral blackness, the children of God should stand out as stars at midnight. Believers are the possessors of Christ, the Light of the world (Jn 8: 12), and so are now light-givers to the world (Mt 5:14). "You shine" states the present fact. They are not told to shine, but are reminded that they already do. The challenge was to let the light shine out unhindered (cf. Mt 5:16).

16 As luminaries in a world of spiritual darkness, they were to "hold out [GK 2091] the word of life." This word means either "hold fast" or "hold forth." Those who regard the clause about shining as parenthetical adopt the meaning "hold fast"—i.e., holding fast the word of life in contrast to a "crooked and depraved generation." On the other hand, the figure of "stars" supports the idea of "holding forth." Furthermore, this latter sense assumes the former, for those who hold out the word of life to others are understood to have first received it themselves. The word of life is, of course, the Gospel, which brings eternal life when it is received by faith (Jn 6:68).

Faithful living by the Philippians will provide Paul with added reason to "boast" (GK 3017) when he appears before Christ. "The day of Christ" is the time when Christ will return for his church and when believers will have their works inspected and rewarded (see comment on 1:6). Paul wants the basis of his boast at that time to be that his labors for the Philippians had not been useless. He hopes all his efforts to win them to Christ and to nurture their faith will be vindicated at Christ's judgment seat by the victorious presence of the Philippian believers.

17 The prospect of standing before Christ reminds Paul that it might be soon. By the vivid metaphor of a "drink offering," he explains that even though he was presently in a dangerous situation that could lead to a martyr's death, it was the climax of his ministry and a cause for rejoicing. Jewish religious practice included the use of wine poured out ceremonially in connection with certain sacrifices (Nu 15:1–10). Paul regarded his own life as such a sacrifice as he sought the spiritual advancement of those whom he had led to Christ (cf. 2Ti 4:6). "The sacrifice and service" employs only one article with two nouns and probably means "sacrificial service." By this phrase, Paul is thinking of the various Christian ministries that the Philippians performed as a spiritual sacrifice to God (4:18; Heb 13:15), springing from their faith. Thus they and Paul were priests together.

Paul rejoiced in his present labors and sufferings. He was willing to lay down his life, and the prospect of being with Christ and of having his ministry among the Philippians seen as successful filled him with joy. Enduring his present danger would demonstrate that he had learned something of the attitude of Christ (2:5). Furthermore, he also rejoiced with the Philippians as he contemplated his relation to their faith. He was its planter and nourisher, and thus their victories were his also. For this reason he could "rejoice with all of you."

18 Likewise the Philippians should display the same attitude as Paul. They must not wring their hands nor bewail their own trials and Paul's. They must learn to find real joy as they work out their salvation and learn to share Paul's attitude about his situation.

III. Two Messengers of Paul to the Philippians (2:19–30)

A. Timothy (2:19–24)

19 The somber note sounded in the previous two verses is balanced by the more optimistic tone that follows. Paul planned to send Timothy to Philippi with a report and hoped to come shortly himself. His hope was "in the Lord Jesus." Every believer is "in Christ," and this vital union should influence every thought and activity. Thus Paul loves in the Lord (1:8); grounds his confidence in the Lord (2:24); rejoices in the Lord (3:3; 4:10); and desires that others rejoice in Christ (1:26; 3:1), welcome Christian leaders in the Lord (2:29), and always stand firm in the Lord (4:1). It may be that Paul was uncertain of the outcome of his case at Rome and therefore the more obviously submitted all his plans and hopes to the lordship of Jesus.

Paul refers to Timothy, named in the opening of the letter, and to his proposed trip to Philippi with graciousness and delicacy. One might suppose that Paul would have explained that the purpose of the trip was to tell the Philippians about his situation. But he only hints at that idea by the word "also" (and by the clause "as soon as I see how things go with me" in v.23), because his main goal is to hear about them. The spiritual advancement of the churches was always uppermost to Paul.

Paul apparently expected Timothy not to remain at Philippi but to bring him word about the church immediately. Conceivably, they could have planned to meet at Ephesus after Paul's release. At least, they seem to have met together at Ephesus subsequent to this time (1Ti 1:3). This would require that before leaving for Philippi, Timothy knew with certainty the date of Paul's release. Otherwise, Timothy would have been expected to return to Paul at Rome before he left the city.

20 Paul's glowing testimony about Timothy was not to introduce his young associate, for he was already well known at Philippi (see comment on 1:1). It did serve, however, to avert possible disappointment that Paul himself could not come at once, and he indicated that he had the fullest confidence in his younger associate. Paul's phrase "no one else like him" compares Timothy with Paul's other available associates. In the matter of "a genuine interest in your welfare," no one that Paul might conceivably have sent had the same interest in the Philippians as did Timothy. How appropriate that two of the pastoral letters were later written to him as he exercised his pastoral concerns in another city.

21 These words must be understood in harmony with other statements in the letter. Paul had already noted that some among his acquaintances at Rome were more concerned with furthering their own interests (1:14–17), though his reference to them was a temperate one (1:18). Furthermore, Paul must have been on good terms with many of the brothers included in this verse, for he conveys their greetings in 4:21. Nevertheless, we must restrict Paul's reference here to some extent, for he would surely not include Epaphroditus, Luke, or Aristarchus as not seeking the interests of Christ. Most likely Paul is only referring to those around him who might conceivably have undertaken the trip to Philippi. He may have asked some of them, but they had refused in favor of their own pursuits. Luke and Aristarchus were probably away on other missions and so were unavailable (cf. no mention of them in 1:1).

22 The proven character of Timothy, however, put him in a class apart. By the thorough test of his repeated presence and ministry in Philippi, as well as by his reputation achieved elsewhere, the Philippian Christians knew him as a man of God. Paul also vouches for him on the basis of many years of personal experience. He and the younger Timothy had a father-son relationship. Together they had served Christ for the furtherance of the Gospel, beginning with Paul's second missionary journey more than ten years earlier (Ac 16:1–4).

23 Paul now gathers up all that he has just said about Timothy and emphasizes that he is the one to be sent to Philippi. He will not be the bearer of the letter, however, because Paul wants to retain him until he has more definite information about the outcome of his case. This implies that Paul thinks there will soon be some kind of legal decision regarding him. This letter will alert the Philippians to Timothy's coming and will also let them know the reason why he did not come with Epaphroditus. They will also know that when Timothy does come, he will be bringing word about the crucial developments in Paul's legal case.

24 Although the decision could go either way, Paul was still confident that release was imminent and that he would fulfill his wish to visit the Philippians (cf. comment on 1:25). This confidence in the Lord must be similar to that implied in 2:19—"I hope in the Lord Jesus" (see comment on v.19). Everything we do should be consistent with, and submitted to, the Lord's will.

Evidence furnished by the pastoral letters supports the hypothesis of a release during which Paul did additional traveling in Crete, Asia Minor, Macedonia, and Achaia. There is good reason, therefore, to believe that Paul's hope was realized.

B. Epaphroditus (2:25–30)

25 The second of Paul's messengers to Philippi, and the one whose forthcoming trip was the immediate occasion for this letter, was Epaphroditus, mentioned only in this letter (2:25; 4:18). He had brought the Philippians' gift to Paul. He is identified by the apostle in a series of glowing terms. He was (1) "my brother," a sharer of spiritual life with Paul and so his brother in Christ; (2) a "fellow worker," a participant with Paul in the labors of the Gospel; (3) a 'fellow soldier," a sharer of the dangers involved in standing firm for Christ and in proclaiming the Gospel.

(4) With respect to the Philippians, he had acted as their "messenger" (lit., "apostle"; GK 693), the duly appointed and commissioned delegate to convey the Philippians' gift to Paul. This Greek word has a broader use than the twelve apostles and is applied to Barnabas (Ac 14:14), Silas and Timothy (1Th 2:7; cf. 1:1), Andronicus and Junias (Ro 16:7), and James the Lord's brother (Gal 1:19; 1Co 15:7). (5) In this capacity Epaphroditus had served as their representative "to take care of" (GK 3313) Paul's needs, functioning officially in performing a sacred service to Paul. This word (a noun in Greek) often connotes a priestly sort of ministry. It is used of Christ's priestly ministry in the heavenly tabernacle (Heb 8:2) and of Paul's sacred service in evangelizing Gentiles and presenting them to God (Ro 15:16). Hence, its use here also has overtones of a priestly act, that of Epaphroditus's presenting to Paul the Philippians' offering, "an acceptable sacrifice, pleasing to God" (4:18).

26 The verb "longs for" (GK 2160) expresses Epaphroditus's intense desire. It had been used to describe Paul's own feelings toward the Philippians in 1:8. Elsewhere it designates the Spirit's strong yearning for the total allegiance of one's heart (Jas 4:5) and of a newborn baby's longing for milk (1Pe 2:2).

The addition of "distressed" (GK 86) to the mention of Epaphroditus's longings emphasizes the intensity of his feeling (cf. the use of this word to describe our Lord's emotions in Gethsemane; Mt 26:37; Mk 14:33). Epaphroditus had become deeply distressed when he learned that the Philippians knew of his serious illness. Conceivably some misunderstanding had arisen in Philippi, and word of it had gotten back to Rome. Perhaps there were rumors that he was a malingerer, or that he had been more of a burden than a help to Paul.

27 Paul therefore said that Epaphroditus had "indeed" been "ill" and had "almost died" as a result of his labors in the Lord's service, perhaps from the hazards or the exertions of the journey to Rome (v.30). The illness was so severe that Paul regarded his recovery as an intervention of God. By healing him, God was displaying his mercy both on Epaphroditus and on Paul. The restoration of health to the sick man spared Paul "sorrow upon sorrow." He felt keenly the misfortunes of his friends, and though he had been distressed over the illness of this courageous emissary, he was spared the additional sorrow that his death would have brought.

28 The expression "I have sent" refers to his present sending of Epaphroditus with this letter (by the time they receive the letter, the "sending" will be past). In view of the circumstances noted above, Paul was sending him more hastily than he would otherwise have done. If the serious illness and the apparent misunderstanding at Philippi had not occurred, Paul might have retained him longer, perhaps till the end of the trial. It was important, then, that this letter should accompany Epaphroditus, so that the Philippians would rejoice at his safe return. The return of the messenger to the church, along with the true explanation of what had happened, should bring a happy conclusion to the whole affair and satisfy both them and Epaphroditus himself. At the same time, Paul himself would benefit by being relieved from further anxiety, for knowing that his friends were relieved always brought a lessening of his painful concern over problems in the churches (cf. 2Co 12:28).

29 Paul therefore exhorted the Philippians to welcome Epaphroditus with joy as fellow Christians should. He had fulfilled his mission with distinction and deserved an appropriate homecoming. Paul's words imply that more was involved in Epaphroditus's disturbed feelings than simple affectionate concern, otherwise no such urging from the apostle to "welcome him in the Lord" would have been necessary. Some sort of alienation had arisen. The church was to do more than refrain from criticism of Epaphroditus; they were to give him due recognition for his faithful and sacrificial service to Paul.

30 There were two reasons why Epaphroditus deserved a genuine welcome. First, he had been engaged in the work of Christ and had actually risked his life to accomplish it. Second, he had been trying by his labors to make up for the Philippians' absence from Paul, and so they owed him their gratitude. Epaphroditus's close call with death came about as a result of his sickness (v.27), not because of persecution or adverse judicial proceedings. Moreover, his ailment was directly due to his Christian labors on behalf of Paul. Inasmuch as 4:14–18 reveals that the Philippians had done more than other churches for the apostle, the lack of service mentioned here must be the lack of their physical presence with him (cf. 1Co 16:17). This Epaphroditus had supplied by his presence and personal care.

IV. Warning Against Judaizers and Antinomians (3:1–21)

A. The Judaizing Danger (3:1–16)

1 "Finally" seems to suggest that Paul is drawing his letter to a close. Inasmuch as over forty percent of the letter is yet to come, some assume that a combination of several letters makes up this letter and suggest that 3:1 is the conclusion of one of them. But Paul and other writers use this expression in a variety of ways. It is best to understand the meaning here in a nontechnical and natural way. A speaker may use the word "finally" as he passes the midpoint of an address, and will then continue on for a rather long time. This poses no real problem for the English listener, and even less for a Greek reader for whom the expression could also mean simply "furthermore" or "in addition" (cf. 1Th 4:1).

Paul's exhortation to "rejoice in the Lord" should be understood as belonging with what follows. The readers are to maintain the joyful spirit that has characterized this letter thus far, even though Paul now goes on to speak of some unpleasant matters. He repeats some of his former instructions, but this is "no trouble" to him, for it has in view the worthy goal of safeguarding them from entrapment in wrong doctrine.

How specifically should "the same things" be understood? Surely it does not refer to the command to rejoice, for this would not have been thought to be a troublesome task or a safeguard against something dangerous. Because there has been no earlier warning against Judaizers in this letter, some have referred "the same things" to prior correspondence with the Philippians. This is certainly possible, though little evidence exists to support it. If, however, Paul meant the words to refer to previous warnings against opponents generally, then 1:27–30 would be an earlier instance in this letter.

2 The verses that follow warrant the identification of these opponents with the Judaizers—those who dogged the trail of the apostles and endeavored to compel Gentile converts to submit to circumcision and other Jewish practices in order to be saved. Three epithets designate them. (1) "Dogs" denotes the wild, vicious, homeless animals that roamed the streets and attacked passersby. Used figuratively, it was always a term of reproach (cf. Dt 23:18; 1Sa 17:43; 24:14; Pr 26:11; Isa 56:10–11; Mt 7:6). Paul castigates the Judaizing teachers with the very term they probably used of others. (2) "Men who do evil" is literally "the evil workers." If the word workers is stressed, the epithet may emphasize their energetic labors and perhaps their concentration on performing deeds of law rather than trusting in God's grace for salvation. (3) By "mutilators of the flesh," Paul deliberately parodies the Judaizers' insistence on circumcision by sarcastically calling it mutilation. For those who had lost the significance of circumcision and insisted on it as a rite for Christians, it was nothing more than a mutilation of the flesh.

3 Paul follows the above warning with an explanation. Christians are the real "circumcision," not the Judaizers who insisted on the physical rite. He implies that they have received the circumcision of the heart (see Ro 2:25–29; Col 2:11)—a concept already referred to in the OT (Lev 26:41; Dt 10:16; 30:6; Jer 4:4; Eze 44:7). The Judaizers misunderstood OT doctrine as well as Christian teaching. Elsewhere Paul equates this circumcision performed without hands with the believer's removal from spiritual death to spiritual life (Col 2:11, 13). Thus it is virtually synonymous with regeneration.

Just as Paul characterizes the Judaizing teachers by three terms in the previous verse, so here he explains the true circumcision by three descriptive clauses. (1) Such persons "worship by the Spirit of God," not by human traditions or some external rite. (2) They "glory in Christ Jesus" (cf. Jer 9:23–24; 1Co 1:31; 2Co 10:17). Satisfaction comes from recognizing that their hope is found in Christ alone, not through meticulous conformity to the external demands of the Mosaic law. They have understood that Christ's sacrifice has fulfilled the law for them. (3) They "put no confidence in the flesh." This states the negative aspect of the previous positive phrase. "Flesh" (GK 4922) refers to what a person is outside of Christ; Paul often uses the term in controversy with Judaizers (e.g., Ro 3:20; 7:18, 25; Gal 2:16; 3:3; 5:19, 24). He teaches that sinful humanity has no grounds for confidence before God, because no one is able to achieve righteousness before God on one's own. True believers, however, put all of their trust in Christ and so remove any grounds for human pride or boasting.

4 In stating that true believers put no confidence in the flesh, Paul has in mind the contrary teaching of those opponents who stressed the importance of conformity to Jewish practices. For the sake of argument, therefore, he temporarily adopts one of their attitudes ("confidence in the flesh") and shows that his rejection of certain Jewish "advantages" was not because he was jealous that he did not possess them. If any one of these opponents should claim an advantage because of his Jewish heritage and practices, Paul wanted it known that in such matters he could stand on equal footing with any Judaizer. He personally disavowed such as reasons for confidence before God because he had found them inadequate to provide the righteousness God requires (cf. vv.7–9).

5 Paul now enumerates some of his reasons for confidence in the flesh. First on the list is physical circumcision, perhaps because the Judaizers stressed it so much. Paul had been circumcised as a Jewish boy in accord with the instruction given to Abraham (Ge 17:12) and in the law (Lev 12:3). Furthermore, he was born of Israelite stock. He belonged to the tribe of Benjamin, a fact he proudly acknowledged on more than one occasion (Ac 13:21; Ro 11:1). This tribe alone had been faithful to the Davidic throne at the time of the division of the kingdom. It had given the nation its first king, after whom Paul had been named by his parents. By calling himself a "Hebrew of Hebrews," he suggests he was of pure Jewish ancestry from both parents and possibly that he knew both Hebrew and Aramaic, even though he had been born in the Diaspora (Ac 22:2–3). In addition, by his own choice he belonged to the most orthodox of the Jewish parties, the Pharisees. This party contained the most zealous supporters and interpreters of OT law, and Paul had studied under Gamaliel, its most celebrated teacher (Ac 22:3; cf. 5:34).

6 When measured for its zeal, Paul's pre-Christian life had been noted for promoting Judaism and condemning Christians. He had become the archpersecutor of the church, and his reputation had gone far beyond Jerusalem (Ac 9:13, 21; Gal 1:13–14). Judged by human standards in accord with the righteousness the law demands, he had been blameless. As an earnest Pharisee, he had paid meticulous attention to the external requirements of the Mosaic law, and no one could have charged him with failure to keep it.

7 Through his conversion on the Damascus road, Paul had learned to count such "advantages" as liabilities because of Christ. "Whatever" indicates that the previous listing was not exhaustive but illustrative. He once had regarded such things as "profit" (or "gains"; GK 3046) toward his goal of achieving righteousness by the law, but now he has come to the conviction that they were actually a detriment and did not provide him with true righteousness at all. By trusting in human performance, he had not only failed to make any progress toward the righteousness God requires but had also let his Jewish "advantages" drive him to persecute the church, which proclaimed the message of the righteousness of God that is received by faith.

8 "What is more" introduces a clause stressing that Paul's experience on the Damascus road had produced a strong and lasting impression. The merits of Christ counted for everything. Paul now broadens his thought from his Jewish advantages to include "all things" that might conceivably be a rival to his total trust in Christ. The "surpassing greatness" can be understood of Christ in an absolute sense, though it likely includes at least a sidelong glance at the list of supposed advantages he had once trusted in. Christ is far superior to them in every respect—so much so that Paul had cast them away as nothing but "rubbish."

For Paul, the knowledge of Christ Jesus as his Lord meant the intimate communion with Christ that began at his conversion and had been his experience all the years since then. It was not limited to the past (as v.10 shows), but was a growing relationship in which there was blessed enjoyment in the present and the challenge and excitement of increasing comprehension of Christ in personal fellowship. Although at regeneration a person receives Christ, this is only the beginning of one's discovery of what riches this entails. In Christ all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hidden (Col 2:3), but to search them out and appropriate them personally requires a lifetime.

9 Paul's desire to "be found in him" probably has an eschatological aspect. He wants the divine scrutiny he will undergo at Christ's return to reveal unquestionably that he had been in vital spiritual union with Jesus Christ. For this to be so, it could not be on the basis of a "righteousness" he could call "my own" (i.e., the kind of righteousness one might achieve through conformity to the Mosaic law). Such obedience might win the admiration of other people, but it could never achieve the absolute perfection God requires (Gal 3:10–11; Jas 2:10). In strong contrast, to be found in Christ implies a righteousness that has its source not in humans but in God, who has provided Jesus Christ, the "Righteous One" (Ac 3:14; 1Jn 2:1).

This latter righteousness is received by us "through faith" and thus we acquire it "by faith" or "on the basis of faith." It is God's provision freely offered to us in Christ (Ro 3:20–22). "Faith" is the opposite of human works; it is the reception of God's work by those who admit the futility of their own efforts to attain righteousness.

10 The phrase "to know Christ" resumes the thought of v.8 and explains in more detail what is involved in "knowing Christ Jesus." Paul wants to know experientially the power of Christ's resurrection. He is not thinking only of the divine power that raised Christ from the dead, but of the power of the resurrected Christ now operating in the believer's life. This power enables us to "live a new life" (Ro 6:4) because we have been "raised with Christ" (Eph 2:5–6; Col 3:1).

Closely associated in the apostle's thought is "the fellowship of sharing in his sufferings." No reference to Christ's expiatory sufferings is meant, for those were Christ's alone. But each believer, by identifying himself or herself with Christ, incurs a measure of Christ's afflictions (Col 1:24). These may be of varying kinds and degrees, both inward and external, as believers find themselves in a world that is hostile because of their allegiance to Christ. Paul has already expressed this thought in 1:29, where he regards suffering in some sense as an inevitable consequence of believing in Christ (cf. Mt 16:24).

"Becoming like him in his death" further elaborates the previous phrase. For believers to share Christ's sufferings involves such a complete identification with him that it can only be explained as a death to the former life (cf. Ro 6:4–11). One's union with Christ must be experientially demonstrated in a life of sanctification, which is intended to bring the believer's present state into ever-increasing conformity to Christ (Ro 8:29; 2Co 3:18; Php 3:21). Therefore, those who died with him and rose with him (Col 2:20; 3:1–3) must exhibit this truth by separating from their old life and continually walking in the power supplied by Christ's resurrection life.

11 The form of this statement poses a problem for interpreters, perhaps suggesting that, though Paul is hopeful of experiencing the resurrection, he has some doubt about it. This is difficult to harmonize with his strong affirmations of faith elsewhere (e.g., 1Co 15:1–34). Some have explained the expression as an indication of Paul's humility. But it is also possible to regard the clause as expressing sincere expectation rather than doubt.

"The resurrection from the dead" is not the usual NT expression for this event. Its use here suggests Paul is thinking not in terms of a general resurrection of the righteous and the wicked, but of believers only (cf. Rev 20:4–15). He is uncertain whether he will participate in the resurrection because he will have died by then, or whether he will receive his transformed body without dying because the Lord comes before his death (see 1Th 4:13–17).

12 Having stated that his conversion brought about a new assessment of his goals and gave him the overwhelming desire to know Christ ever more fully, Paul then explains how his present life is a pursuit in this new direction. But he does not want to be misunderstood as claiming that his conversion on the Damascus road has already brought him to his final goal. He has not yet received all he longs for, nor has he been brought to that perfection to which he has aspired. Perhaps there were those in Philippi who were claiming to have acquired already the consummation of spiritual blessings. But Paul knows that he must continue to pursue the purposes Christ had chosen him for. Spiritual progress is ever the imperative Christians must follow.

13 Paul now addresses the Philippians by the endearing title "brothers" and repeats the thought of v.12. He did not regard himself as having obtained the final knowledge of Christ and the fullest conformity to him. One thing, therefore, was the consuming passion of his Christian life. Using the metaphor of a footrace, Paul describes it as involving the continual forgetting of "what is behind" and the relentless centering of his energies and interests on the course that is ahead of him. "Forgetting" did not mean obliterating the memory of his past (cf. vv.5–7), but was a conscious refusal to let it absorb his attention and impede his progress. He never allowed his Jewish heritage nor his previous Christian attainments (vv.9–12) to obstruct his running of the race. No present attainment could lull him into thinking he already possessed all Christ desired for him.

14 Continuing the metaphor, Paul likens his Christian life to pressing onward to the goal so as to win the prize. In applying the figure, the goal and the prize are virtually identical, though viewed perhaps from different aspects. Paul's goal was the complete knowledge of Christ, both in the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of his sufferings (v.10). When the goal was reached, this prize would be fully his. The calling "heavenward" may relate to the summons to the winner to approach the elevated stand of the judge and receive the prize. The word "called" (GK 3104) is always used elsewhere by Paul to denote the effective call of God that brings people to salvation (1Co 1:26; 7:20; Eph 1:18; 4:1, 4; 2Th 1:11; 2Ti 1:9).

15 In concluding this section, Paul exhorts those who are "mature" (GK 5455; cf. 1Co 2:6; 14:20; Eph 4:13; Col 1:28; 4:12) to think in harmony with what he has just said, and he promises that those who think differently about minor points will be enlightened by God if their attitude is right. By "mature," Paul is referring to a certain level of spiritual growth and stability in contrast to infants. If the Philippian believers are lax in their pursuit of spiritual goals or erroneously suppose they have already arrived, they need to understand Paul's declaration. And if they generally agree but still differ on some isolated point, Paul is confident that God will lead them to the truth.

16 No one, however, must wait for God to reveal the truth on all points before one begins to give oneself to spiritual growth. Each believer should exercise fully the degree of maturity already possessed. "Live up to" (GK 5123) calls for Christians to maintain a consistent life in harmony with the understanding of God's truth they already have. Paul recognizes that Christians, though proceeding along the same path, may be at different stages of progress and should be faithful to as much of God's truth as they understand.

B. The Antinomian Danger (3:17–21)

17 In the early years of the church, believers needed practical guides for conduct. So Paul urged the Philippians to join together in imitating his conduct (see also 1Co 11:1). Such advice was not egotism, for Paul's emphasis was always strongly Christological (e.g., 1Co 11:1; Php 2:5–8). Furthermore, Paul here includes others in this model by urging his readers to take note of those who were living in conformity with "the pattern we gave you" (v.17)—i.e., the high standard outlined in vv.7–16. And by "we," Paul includes not only himself but Timothy and perhaps Epaphroditus. Hence, he was not claiming a unique superiority.

18 Who were these "enemies of the cross of Christ"? While some regard them as the Judaizers of v.2 (whose emphasis on legalism undermined the Cross), they are more likely antinomians, who went to the opposite extreme from the Judaizers and threw off all moral restraints. By their lawless lives, they too were enemies of the Cross and the new life that should issue from it.

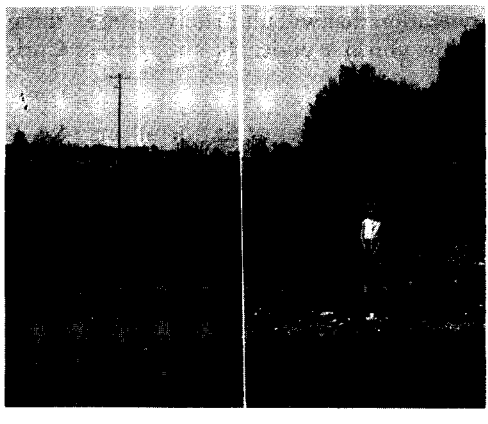
It is not likely that these people were simply pagans, of whom nothing much better was to be expected. Rather, they were probably professing Christians, but ones whose lives were so profligate that it was clear to Paul that they had never been regenerated. Presumably, they were not members of the Philippian church (the character of this letter would have been different if "many" such people were in that congregation), but because there were such in the Christian world as a whole, they posed a danger to every church (cf. Ro 16:17–18; 2Pe 2:10–22). Paul had already warned of them, perhaps in former visits or in other letters, and felt real anguish when the churches were threatened with falseness of doctrine or life.

19 The ultimate end for such persons is "destruction" (GK 724), i.e., eternal loss. "Their god is their stomach" suggests sensualists who indulged various physical appetites without restraint (Ro 16:18; 1Co 6:13; Jude 11). By their indulgence, they actually bragged about what they ought to have been ashamed of (Eph 5:12). The final description characterizes these "enemies of the cross" as continually minding earthly things. Their whole attention focused on physical and material interests, rather than on spiritual things.

20 The "our" is emphatic here, stressing the distinction between true believers, whose essential relationships belong to the heavenly sphere, and the sensualists just discussed, who are exclusively concerned with earthly things. The Christian's "citizenship [GK 4487] is in heaven," and for each believer earthly things must at best be secondary. The Philippians would find this a most apt metaphor, for in a political sense they knew what it was to be citizens of a far-off city (even though most of them had probably never been to Rome), and they were proud of that status (Ac 16:12, 21; see comment on Php 1:27). On an immeasurably higher plane, believers belong to the "city . . . whose architect and builder is God" (Heb 11:10) or to the "Jerusalem that is above" (Gal 4:26), and are themselves "aliens and strangers on earth" (Heb 11:13; cf. 1Pe 2:11). As such, their eyes should be heavenward, anticipating the coming of their Savior, who is not a mere earthly emperor but the Lord Jesus Christ. An eager expectation of his return does much to protect believers from earthly, sensual enticements.

21 Christ at his return will "transform" (GK 3571) believers' mortal bodies, so that they will conform to the character of his resurrection body. The present body is described literally as "the body of lowliness," a description calling attention to its weakness and susceptibility to persecution, disease, sinful appetites, and death. At Christ's coming, however, the earthly, transient appearance will be changed, whether by resurrection of the dead or by rapture of the living (1Th 4:13–17), and believers will be transformed and will receive glorified bodies that will more adequately display their essential character as children of God and sharers of divine life in Christ (1Co 15:35–57). This will be accomplished by the same effective operation that will ultimately bring all things in the universe under the authority of Christ (cf. Eph 1:10).

V. Second Series of Exhortations (4:1–9)



A. Exhortation to Stand Firm in Unity (4:1–3)

1 This verse is another of Paul's subtle transitions, so skillfully blended as to make it difficult to decide whether it should be placed with what precedes or what follows. A good transition, however, fits both segments. Inasmuch as the following statements discuss the need for unity among certain individuals, it is appropriate to treat v.1 as a general exhortation to the whole church to stand firm in the manner Paul has just been outlining (especially 3:17–21). The same verb "stand firm" (GK 5112) was used also at the beginning of the first series of exhortations (1:27).

The reference to the Philippians as "brothers, you whom I love and long for," shows the strong feeling of intimacy the apostle felt toward these readers. Their description as Paul's "joy and crown" echoes his earlier words to another Macedonian church (1Th 2:19). The Philippians were his present joy as he received favorable reports of their spiritual growth, and their presence with Christ at his return would be his future crown when Christ comes to reward his servants (cf. 2:16).

2 The apostle turns from his general exhortation to an application of it. Two women, Euodia and Syntyche, are instructed to bring their attitudes into harmony. Paul does not indicate which one was in the wrong but knows that if the attitude of each would be formed "in the Lord," the disharmony would vanish. Repetition of "I plead" may indicate the need for separate admonitions because the rift between them had become so great. Paul's method of handling the problem suggests that it was not a doctrinal issue, but a clash of personalities.

3 At this point Paul seeks to enlist the aid of a third party, "yokefellow" (likely a proper name, "Syzygus"; GK 5187; see NIV note), whom he challenges to live up to his name and bring these women together. (Another Pauline play on a personal name occurs in Phm 10–11.) Inasmuch as Euodia and Syntyche had once worked side by side with Paul, they should be able to do so again. Perhaps they had been among the original group of converts at Philippi, for women had been Paul's first hearers there (Ac 16:13–15). Their Christian labors had been in conjunction with Clement and others of Paul's co-workers. Even though some of these names are not recorded in this letter, Paul knows that their service has not been forgotten, for their names are recorded in the Book of Life, the heavenly register of those who are saved (Rev 3:5; 17:8; 20:12, 15; 21:27; 22:19; cf. Lk 10:20; Heb 12:23). Paul's memory of these happy associations prompted his concern that the present disunity might be ended so that faithful Christian activity could proceed and prosper.

When Paul came to Philippi on his second missionary journey, since it had no synagogue, he "went outside the city gate to the river" and "began to speak to the women who had gathered there" (Ac 16:13). Women played a prominent role in the church there. Courtesy Bastiaan Van Elderen.

B. Exhortation to Maintain Various Christian Virtues (4:4–9)

4 From his previous exhortation to unity and from his attempt to correct a case of disunity, Paul proceeds to urge the church to maintain certain positive Christian virtues. First, believers must "rejoice in the Lord always" (repeated for emphasis, perhaps implying a question asked of Paul, "How can we rejoice, in view of our difficulties?"). In all the vicissitudes of the Christian life, whether in attacks from errorists, personality clashes among believers, persecution from the world, or threat of imminent death, Christians are to maintain a spirit of joy in the Lord. They are not immune to sorrow, nor should they be insensitive to the troubles of others; yet they should count God's will their highest joy and so be capable of knowing inner peace and joy in every circumstance (cf. 1Th 5:16–18).

5 Second, believers are to show "gentleness" (GK 2117) to all. No single word is adequate to translate this word. Involved is the willingness to yield one's personal rights and to show consideration and gentleness to others. It is easy to display this quality toward some persons, but Paul commands that it be shown toward all—Christian friends, unsaved persecutors, false teachers, anyone at all. Of course, truth may not be sacrificed, but a gentle spirit will do much to disarm an adversary.

As an encouragement, Paul now reminds his readers that "the Lord is near," a reference to the Parousia (cf. 3:20–21; cf. Jas 5:8 for a similar connection between a longsuffering spirit and the Lord's coming). This statement is a reminder that at his arrival the Judge will settle all differences and bring the consummation that will make most of our human differences seem trifling.

6 Third, believers should be prayerful instead of "anxious" (GK 3534). This verb can mean "to be concerned about" in a proper Christian sense (cf. 2:20), but here the meaning is clearly that of anxiety, fretfulness, or undue concern (cf. Mt 6:25–34). Paul is not calling for apathy or inaction, for as we make plans in the light of our circumstances, it is our Christian privilege to do so in full trust that our Father hears our prayers for what we need. The answer to anxiety is "prayer" (GK 4666), a word that denotes the petitioner's attitude of mind as worshipful. "Petition" denotes prayers as expressions of need. "Thanksgiving" should accompany all Christian praying, as the supplicants acknowledge that whatever God sends is for their good. It may also include remembrance of previous blessings.

7 Paul attaches to this classic exhortation to pray the beautiful promise that when we turn from anxiety to prayer and thanksgiving, God will give us his own "peace." This peace is for those who are already at peace with God through justification by faith in Christ (Ro 5:1). This peace of God "transcends all understanding," for it is not only sufficient for us but far surpasses human comprehension. It acts as a sentry to guard our hearts and thoughts from all anxiety and despair.

8 Fourth, believers should keep on thinking and doing what is morally and spiritually excellent. This involves centering their minds on exalted things and then (v.9) putting into practice what they have learned from Paul's teaching and example.

Here (v.8) Paul sets forth in memorable words a veritable charter of virtues for Christian thought. "True" (GK 239) has the sense of valid, reliable, and honest—the opposite of false. It characterizes God (Ro 3:4) and should also characterize believers. "Noble" (GK 4948; cf. also 1Ti 3:8, 11; Tit 2:2) denotes a quality that makes people worthy of respect. "Right" (GK 1465) refers to what is upright or just, conformable to God's standards and thus worthy of his approval. "Pure" (GK 54) emphasizes moral purity and includes in some contexts the more restricted sense of "chaste." "Lovely" (GK 4713) relates to what is pleasing, agreeable, or amiable. "Admirable" (GK 2368) denotes what is praiseworthy, attractive, and true to the highest standards.

Suddenly Paul changes the sentence structure to conditional clauses, a rhetorical device that forces each reader to exercise his or her own discernment and choose what is "excellent" (GK 746) and "praiseworthy" (GK 2047). Paul knows that when we continually center our minds on such thoughts as these, we shall live like Christians.

9 Since Paul himself had been their teacher and example, what they had learned from him they were to keep on practicing. The four verbs in this verse form two pairs. The first pair, "learned" and "received," describes the Philippians' instruction by Paul, from whom they had been taught Christian doctrine and Christian living. The next pair, "heard" and "saw," depicts their personal observation of the apostle—both his speech and his conduct. In the early days of the church before the NT writings were written or widely circulated, the standards of Christian belief and behavior were largely taught by being embodied in the words and example of the apostles. Those who follow this apostolic guidance have the additional promise that God, who provides true peace (v.9; cf. v.7), will be with them.

VI. The Philippians' Gifts to Paul (4:10–20)

A. The Recent Gift (4:10–14)

10 As Paul begins to conclude his letter, he voices his joy over the Philippians' recent contribution to him. This is probably not his first note of thanks to them, for considerable time had elapsed since Epaphroditus had brought the gift and several contacts with the church at Philippi had already been made. Furthermore, it is doubtful that his expression of gratitude would have been left to the end of the letter. Paul retained a vivid memory of their generous act. "At last" should not be regarded as a rebuke, but merely as showing that communication had again occurred after a period of no contact. Paul makes it clear that the fault was not theirs but came from a lack of opportunity; perhaps no messenger had been available. In addition, the apostle's own circumstances had been highly irregular in recent years, in part because of imprisonment and shipwreck. Now the demonstration of concern had bloomed again, like plants in the spring.

11–12 Paul hastens to make clear that though he undoubtedly had a need, it was not relief of this need that primarily concerned him. He had "learned to be content" with what God provided, irrespective of circumstances. It is significant that Paul had to "learn" this virtue; contentment is not natural to most of us.

In Stoic philosophy, "content" (GK 895) described a person who accepted impassively whatever came. Circumstances that could not be changed were regarded as God's will, and fretting was useless. This philosophy fostered a self-sufficiency in which all the resources for coping with life were located within a person. In contrast, Paul locates his sufficiency in Christ, who provides strength for believers (cf. 2Co 12:7–10).

Paul truly understood what it was to be in want and "to have plenty." What he means by the latter we cannot tell; perhaps it was his earlier days as a rising figure in Judaism (Gal 1:14) or any of the times when he was not suffering privation (e.g., Ac 9:19, 28; 16:15, 33–34; 18:3; 21:8). He had learned how to trust God in every particular situation and in all situations as a whole.

13 Paul's outlook was no Stoic philosophy, however. He did not trace his resources to some inner fortitude that would enable him to take with equanimity whatever life brought him. Instead, his strength for "everything" lay in the One who continually empowered him. Although the name "Christ" does not appear in the Greek text, surely Paul has him in mind (cf. 1Ti 1:12). He was not desperately seeking a gift from the Philippians, for he knew that Christ would give him the strength for whatever circumstances were in store for him.

14 Nevertheless, the Philippians must not feel that their gift had been unnecessary. They had responded properly to his need, and Paul was truly grateful—not so much for what the gift did for him as for their willingness to share with him. They had accepted his affliction as their own and had done something about it.

B. The Previous Gifts (4:15–20)

15–16 In order to make it clear that he was not minimizing the Philippians' generosity toward him, Paul recalls some earlier demonstrations of their love for him. When the Gospel was first preached to them (approximately ten years before; Ac 16), they were the only church to contribute to him when he exited Macedonia (a better translation than "set out from"; GK 2002). This gift he received while he was in Corinth (2Co 11:9). Then, as he mentions this gift, he also recalls two earlier instances of their generosity when he was in Thessalonica. Presumably these earlier gifts were small and thus in a different category from the one mentioned in v.15. This interpretation is also implied by 1Th 2:9; 2Th 3:7–8, which show that Paul earned his own living in Thessalonica. Paul does not mean that no other churches ever assisted him (cf. 2Co 11:8), but that on the specific occasion referred to here, no other church had come to his aid.

17 Paul's readers must not suppose that he is primarily concerned with their gift as such, but rather in the development of the grace of giving among them. Using business terminology, he says that he regards such displays as interest "credited to [their] account." Their spiritual growth was the fruit Paul desired, and to this end he directed his ministry.

18 The financial language continues as Paul says, "I have received full payment and even more." The gifts brought by Epaphroditus (2:25–30) had completely met his needs, and Paul considers this contribution a sacrificial offering to God, made to further the Lord's work by helping his servant (cf. Mt 25:40). "A fragrant offering" is used in Eph 5:2 of Christ's sacrificial offering of himself to God on our behalf, reflecting such passages as Lev 1:9, 13, 17; 2:12. Such offerings pleased God, because they came from obedient hearts.

19–20 In words that countless Christians have relied on as one of the great Scripture promises, Paul now reminds his benefactors that "my God" will do what he himself is in no position to do; namely, reimburse his benefactors. This assurance of the divine supply of the Philippians' needs implies that they had given so liberally that they actually left themselves in some real "need." Those who share generously with others, especially to advance the work of the Lord, are promised a divine supply of anything they might lack because of their generosity (Pr 11:25; 19:17; Mt 5:7).

"According to" conveys the thought that God's supply of the Philippians' need will not be merely from his great wealth but in some sense appropriate to or commensurate with it. The source of that supply is the heavenly glorious riches that Christ now enjoys. Small wonder that Paul closes this beautiful passage with a doxology. The glory of God's providential care must always be recognized by his children. Even the eternal ages yet to come will not be sufficient to exhaust the praises that belong to him.

Closing Salutation (4:21–23)

21 It is likely that the remaining words of the letter were written by Paul's own hand, after the pattern announced in Gal 6:11; Col 4:18; 2Th 3:17. He sends greetings to every believer at Philippi, to be conveyed to them no doubt by the leadership of the church to whom the letter was initially delivered. Paul's associates also send their greetings; they are to be distinguished from the resident Roman Christians who are mentioned in the next verse. These "brothers who are with me" include Timothy and perhaps Epaphroditus (1:1; 2:19–30), and possibly even some of those mentioned in 1:14. The inclusion of these greetings is a caution against interpreting 2:21 as an indictment of all Paul's associates except Timothy (see comment on 2:21).

22 "All the saints" refers to members of the church at Rome, from where Paul is writing. He also extends special greetings from "those who belong to Caesar's household." This expression denotes those engaged in imperial service, whether as slaves or freedmen, in Rome or elsewhere. Among them may have been some of the palace guard (1:13). The expression could refer to persons of considerable importance on the emperor's staff. Paul does not say why they were singled out for special mention. Perhaps some of these government servants had come from Philippi or had once been stationed at that Roman colony.

23 The concluding benediction is exactly the same as Phm 25 and similar to Gal 6:18. It invokes on the Philippian church the continuing favor of Christ to be with their spirits. The realization of this benediction would increase the harmony of the congregation by causing the spirit of each believer to cherish the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and by bringing a joyous peace among them, fulfilling the apostle's opening wish (1:2).

Colossians

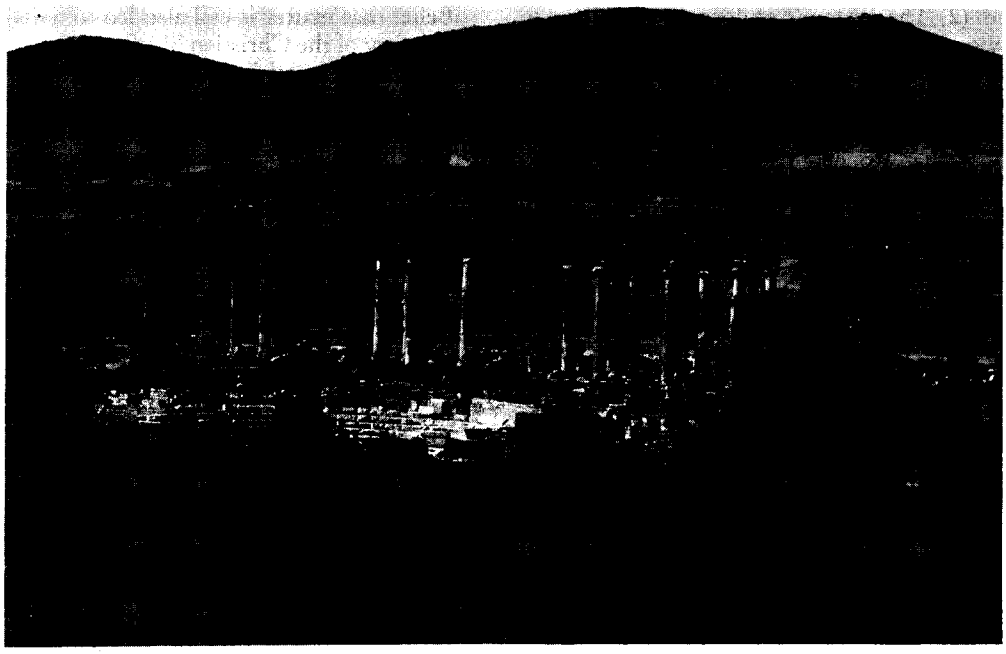
INTRODUCTION

1. Destination

Colosse was a small market town situated on the south bank of the Lycus River in the interior of the Roman province of Asia (an area included in modern Turkey). Located about a hundred miles east of Ephesus, its nearest neighbors were Laodicea and Hierapolis (both of these cities had communities of believers; cf. 2:1; 4:13). Colosse and Laodicea were probably evangelized during the time of Paul's extended ministry in Ephesus (Ac 19:10), though there is no record of it in Acts. All our information about the church must be found in this letter and in incidental allusions in the companion letter to Philemon.

2. Authorship

The authenticity of Colossians has been questioned, though today there is broad agreement that it is, as it purports to be (1:1; 4:18), from the hand of Paul. Evidence for this comes not only from within the letter but also from the witness of many early Christian writers. While the external testimony to Paul as the author of Colossians is not equal to that of some of his other letters, so far as we can determine, it was never doubted.



Pauline authorship was not seriously questioned until the mid-nineteenth century. Because of similarities with Ephesians, some scholars have accepted one of the two as genuine but not both, considering that one was dependent on the other. Others have denied the Pauline authorship of both Ephesians and Colossians because they thought both reflected second-century Gnosticism. But few today hold that the heresy opposed in Colossians was the fully developed gnostic systems of the second century. We have gained fresh knowledge of the bewildering variety of syncretistic religious movements of the Graeco-Roman world of the first century, and this has destroyed the earlier arguments.

In recent years doubts concerning the authenticity of Colossians have focused on vocabulary, style, and doctrine. (1) Vocabulary is no great problem, for the distinctive vocabulary is most apparent where Paul is dealing with the Colossian problem. Therefore, it is not unlikely that at least some of these words were borrowed from the errorists for purposes of refutation; naturally, then, they would not be used in other different contexts. Paul had new things to say in this letter and found new ways of saying them. (2) Regarding style, some of the unquestioned letters of Paul have passages that exhibit the same features of style found in Colossians. Where Colossians is stylistically distinct, it is bound up with the sustained note of thanksgiving that runs through the letter (especially ch. 1). (3) The doctrinal argument claims that this letter's teachings about Christ—especially the cosmic aspects of his redemptive work—are more fully developed than in other Pauline letters. Its overall Christology, it is sometimes argued, shows such a pronounced similarity to the Logos doctrine of John (Jn 1:1–18) that it betrays a post-Pauline date. But why could not two apostles share this exalted view of Christ's person and work? Moreover, this doctrine was not entirely new to Paul (cf. Ro 8:19-22; 1Co 8:6); it was only given greater prominence and a more systematic exposition in Colossians.

A strong argument for Pauline authorship is the relation of Colossians to Philemon. Both of these books, sent to the same town and in all likelihood conveyed by the same messenger, contain the names of Paul, Timothy, Onesimus, Archippus, Epaphras, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke. The consensus of scholarly opinion is that Philemon is incontestably Pauline, and it is the feeling of many NT scholars that this carries over to Colossians.

3. Date and Place of Origin

Colossians was obviously written during an imprisonment of Paul (4:10, 18), but it contains no indication as to the place of imprisonment. Three options present themselves: Ephesus, Caesarea, and Rome (see introduction to Philippians for more on this). Whether Paul was ever imprisoned in Ephesus is only hypothetical; moreover, Luke was with Paul when Colossians was written (4:14), but he was not with the apostle during his Ephesian ministry. Regarding Caesarea, it is unlikely that such a small city would have been the center of such vigorous missionary activity as 4:3–4, 10–14 seems to suggest. The traditional theory, and the one most generally held, is that Paul was in Rome when Colossians was written (see also introduction to Ephesians). The letter should therefore be dated about A.D. 62, during Paul's first Roman imprisonment (cf. Ac 28:30–31). Perhaps it was written before Ephesians, but surely not much time separated the two.

The site of Aphrodias in present-day Turkey is associated with the "God-fearers" of the early church. Aphrodias is near Colosse and was the site of an early Christian church.

4. Occasion

The immediate occasion for the writing of Colossians was the arrival of Epaphras (1:8) in Rome with disturbing news about the presence of heretical teaching at Colosse that was threatening the well-being of the church. This letter gives no direct account of the tenets of this strange teaching, and thus it is difficult to obtain a clear and consistent understanding of it. Yet from the many allusions to the heresy, we are able to sketch its leading features. (1) It professed to be a "philosophy," but Paul calls it a "hollow and deceptive philosophy" (2:8). (2) It placed much emphasis on ritual circumcision, dietary laws, and the observance of holy days (2:11, 14, 16–17). (3) Affirming the mediation of various supernatural powers in the creation of the world and the whole process of salvation, the false teaching insisted that these mysterious powers be placated and worshiped (2:15, 18–19). As a result of this, Christ was relegated to a relatively minor place in the Colossian system. (4) Some of the errorists were ascetic (2:20–23), teaching that the body is evil and must be treated as an enemy. (5) The advocates of this system claimed to be Christian teachers (cf. 2:3–10).

From these considerations we may conclude that the Colossian heresy was a syncretistic movement combining at least three separate elements: Judaism, paganism, and Christianity. (1) The insistence on legalism, ritualism, and the observance of holy days points to a Jewish element (though not a Pharisaic Judaism).

(2) The system's philosophical character, worship of angels, and perhaps ascetic tendencies point to a pagan element. This was probably an incipient form of what later became known as Gnosticism, a complex system that reached its zenith in the second century. This incipient Gnosticism was essentially a religio-philosophical attitude, not a well-defined system. It sought by its oriental myths and Greek philosophy to absorb any religion with which it came into contact. It lent itself to an air of exclusiveness, cultivating an "enlightened" elite for whom alone salvation was possible. Gnosticism, in all its forms, was characterized by belief in the evil of matter, in mediating beings, and in salvation through knowledge. Beginning with the assumption that all creation is evil, the Gnostics argued that God didn't create this world and that he has absolutely no contact with it. However, intellectual necessity did not permit them to break completely the bond between divinity and the material world. They therefore taught that God put forth from himself a series of emanations, called "aeons," each a little more distant from him and each having a little less of deity. At the end of this chain of intermediate beings there is an aeon possessing enough of deity to make a world but removed far enough from God that his creative activities could not compromise the perfect purity of God. The world, they argued, was the creation of this lesser power. These aeons were thought to inhabit the stars and rule human destiny. They therefore were to be placated and worshiped. Paul's references to "thrones," "powers," "rulers," "authorities" (1:16; 2:9, 15), and "the worship of angels" (2:18) are allusions to these supposed intermediate beings.

Belief in the inherent evil of matter made it impossible for the Gnostics to accept the real incarnation of God in Christ. Some of them explained it away by denying the actual humanity of Jesus, holding that he only seemed to be human. The body of Jesus, they taught, was an illusion. Other Gnostics explained away the incarnation by denying the real deity of Jesus. Both of these tendencies were perhaps present at Colosse in embryo form and both may be alluded to in the letter—for example, in the affirmation that "in Christ all the fullness of the Deity lives in bodily form" (2:9).

Belief that matter is evil also led to a distorted view of the Christian life. Some Gnostics turned to asceticism; they felt that they had to free themselves from the influence of matter (the body) by inflicting punishment on their bodies. Others turned to libertinism; they assumed an attitude of indifference to things physical and material, the idea being that only the soul is important and therefore the body may do what it pleases. Indications of both tendencies may be found in the Colossian letter, the former being opposed in 2:20ff. and the latter in 3:5ff.

Gnosticism—the word is related to gnosis, "knowledge" (GK 1194)—taught that salvation is obtained not through faith but through knowledge. Such knowledge, however, was knowledge acquired through mystical experience, not intellectual apprehension. It was an occult knowledge, pervaded by the superstitions of astrology and magic.

(3) There was a "Christian" element in the Colossian error as well. While at its heart it was a combination of Judaism and paganism, it wore the mask of Christianity. It did not deny Christ, but it did dethrone him. It gave him a place, but not the supreme place. This Christian facade made the Colossian error all the more dangerous.

That Paul found it necessary to write this letter to the community of Christians at Colosse is evidence that the false teachers had made a strong impression on them and that the threat to the well-being of the church was real. There are indications, however, that the errorists had not achieved complete success (cf. 2:4, 8, 20). Paul therefore can express gratitude for the Colossian Christians and rejoice over the order within their ranks and in their continued fidelity to Christ (cf. 1:3ff.; 2:5).

5. Purpose and Theme

Paul's purpose in writing Colossians was threefold: (1) to express his personal interest in the church, (2) to warn them against reverting to their old pagan vices (cf. 3:5ff.), and (3) to refute the false teaching that was threatening the Colossian church. The last named was undoubtedly Paul's major concern as he made a plea for the fuller knowledge found in Christ. He confronted the false representation of knowledge by positively setting forth the exalted nature and unmatched glory of Christ.

Colossians therefore proclaims the absolute supremacy and sole sufficiency of Jesus Christ (cf. esp. 1:18; 2:9; 3:11). He is God's Son (1:14), the object of the Christian's faith (1:4), the Redeemer (1:14), the image of God (1:15), the Lord of creation (1:15), the head of the church (1:18), and reconciler of the universe (1:20). In him dwells the fullness of the Godhead (2:9), and under him every power and authority in the universe is subjected (2:10). He is the essence of the mystery of God (2:3), and in him all God's treasures of wisdom and knowledge lie hidden (2:3). He is the standard by which all religious teaching is to be measured (2:8) and the reality of the truth foreshadowed by the regulations and rituals of the old covenant (2:17). By his cross he conquered the cosmic powers of evil (2:15), and following his resurrection he was enthroned at the right hand of God (3:1). Our life now lies hidden with God in Christ, but one day both he and we will be gloriously manifested (3:3–4).

EXPOSITION

I. Introduction (1:1–14)

A. Salutation (1:1–2)

Paul follows the standard form of greeting of first-century letters but puts a distinctly Christian content into it. He names himself, with appropriate Christian expressions, as the author (v.1), identifies the readers (v.2a), and then expresses the characteristic greeting of grace and peace (v.2b).

1 In designating himself as "an apostle of Christ Jesus," Paul gives his authority for writing. At its deepest level, an apostle (GK 693) denotes an authorized spokesman for God, one commissioned and empowered to act as his representative. Such is the meaning of the word when applied to the Twelve (e.g., Lk 6:13) and to Paul (see also comment on Php 2:25).

Timothy, who was with Paul at the time of writing and is here identified as a "brother" of Paul, was named as a matter of courtesy. He appears to have had no part in the actual writing of the book (cf. 4:18).

2 In the OT, holiness is ascribed not only to persons (Lev 20:7; Dt 7:6; 2Ki 4:9; et al.), but also to places (Ex 29:31; Lev 6:16, 26; Dt 23:14; et al.) and things (Ex 28:2; 29:6; Nu 5:17; et al.). This suggests that the root idea in "holy" (GK 41) is not excellence of character but dedication, the state of being set apart for the work and worship of God. The word "faithful" (GK 4412) implies not only that the addressees are believers, but they are also loyal to Christ, a quality especially appropriate for a church under fire.

"Brothers," a term of affection used of Christians in every letter of Paul, calls attention to the intimacy of the fellowship of the Christian community. Despite their differences of culture, social status, and racial background, the Colossian believers are bound together by a common bond of love and thus constitute one spiritual family—all spiritually begotten by one Father. "In Christ" emphasizes the spiritual position of believers. They are united with Christ, joined to him as closely as limbs are joined to the body of which they are a part.

The greeting takes the form of a prayer for "grace and peace" to be given the readers. "Grace" (GK 5921) denotes the favor of God; Paul uses this word to express the essence of God's saving activity in Christ. In our thinking, "peace" (GK 1645) usually suggests the absence of conflict. The NT concept, however, is richer and broader. It denotes wholeness or soundness and includes such ideas as prosperity, contentedness, and good relations with others.

B. Prayer of Thanksgiving (1:3–8)

The content of this thanksgiving is determined by the condition of the church and by Paul's relationship to it through Epaphras. In these verses we may observe the circumstances and character of the apostle's thanksgiving (v.3) as well as the grounds and occasion for it (vv.4–8). This passage, which expresses the apostle's own gratitude, shows that what he enjoined upon others he himself practiced.

3 Paul addresses his thanksgiving to God, thus recognizing that he is the one ultimately responsible for the virtues and graces of his people and for the success of the Gospel—both of which are mentioned in the verses that follow. God is identified as "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." The God to whom we pray is the God whom Jesus Christ made known to us as our Father.

4–5 Verses 4–8 express the grounds and occasion of Paul's thanksgiving. The apostle specifically mentions three things, the first being the good report that had come to him of the well-being of the Colossian Christians. His reference to "hearing" about their spiritual condition is in keeping with the fact that he had not personally visited Colosse (cf. 1:9; 2:1). The source of this information was probably Epaphras (cf. v.8), though we must not rule out the possibility that Paul's reference includes other previous reports of the faith of the Colossians.

The triad of "faith" (v.4a), "love" (v.4b), and "hope" (v.5a) appears with some degree of frequency in Paul's writings (e.g., Ro 5:2–5; 1Co 13:13; 1Th 1:3; 5:8). "Faith" (GK 4411), which is commitment to or trust in another person, is defined as being anchored "in Jesus Christ." Theirs was a Christ-centered faith.

"Love" (GK 27) is the fruit of faith and the proof of its genuineness (cf. Gal 5:6; Jas 2:14ff.; 1Jn 3:14). It means caring love, the love that counts no sacrifice too great for the one loved (cf. the verb used in Jn 3:16.) The Colossians' love was expressed toward "all the saints," i.e., toward all God's people. Perhaps the apostle was contrasting the broad goodwill of the Colossian believers with the narrow exclusiveness of the heretical teachers.

"Hope" (GK 1828) is sometimes subjective (what a person feels; cf. Ro 5:2), sometimes objective (denoting what believers hope for; cf. Gal 5:5; 1Pe 1:3). Here it is the latter, referring to the glorious reward and future heavenly blessedness of God's people. This hope is securely "stored up" for the Colossians in heaven, like a treasure. Moreover, their knowledge of hope came from hearing "the word of truth," the Gospel that had come to them when Epaphras originally preached the Gospel to them and they were converted. That message seems to be contrasted tacitly with the more recent and heretical preaching of the Colossian errorists.

How does the word "hope" tie into this sentence? One possibility is that along with their faith and love, the Colossians' hope gives a reason for Paul to be grateful. It is also possible, as in the NIV, to interpret hope as a ground for, or an incentive to, faith and love. Whatever construction one chooses, hope is a part of the total experience of the Colossians that Paul thanks God for.

6 Paul is now led to develop the thought of the progress of the Gospel in the world. This is brought out in such a way as to suggest that this, as well as the report of the Colossians' welfare, was for Paul a basis for thankfulness. Two ideas are stressed. (1) The Gospel was a fruit-bearing power in the many places where it was preached throughout the ancient world. Perhaps Paul means that the ever-widening scope and deepening influence of the Gospel on its recipients was a mark of its authenticity. "Bearing fruit" suggests that the Gospel is like a living organism whose seed is in itself. "Growing" denotes the rapid spread of the Gospel. Thus these two terms speak of the inner working and the outward extension of the Gospel.

(2) The Gospel conveys the knowledge of "God's grace in all its truth." This phrase suggests that the "gospel" that had been recently introduced to the Colossians by the heretical teachers was a travesty. Their so-called "gospel" was not a message of divine grace and truth; it was a system of legal bondage and human traditions.

7–8 A third item in Paul's expression of thankfulness concerns the work of Epaphras, through whom the Colossians had been instructed in the Gospel. What we know about this man is found only in this passage (vv.4, 7, 9), in 4:12–13, and in Phm 23. He was a native of Colosse and had ministered not only in that city but also in Laodicea and Hierapolis. In Philemon he is described by Paul as his "fellow-prisoner in the cause of Christ Jesus."

We learn three things about Epaphras in vv.7–8. (1) He was Paul's "dear fellow servant." He was, like Paul, a slave of Jesus Christ, and Paul looked on him as a valued comrade in the work of the Lord. (2) He was "a faithful minister of Christ on our [Paul's] behalf." Epaphras appears to have preached in Paul's stead in establishing the work at Colosse. Perhaps Epaphras was himself a convert of Paul during the Ephesian ministry, and Paul had delegated him to take the Gospel to the Colossians. Yet as a "minister of Christ," Epaphras had acted not under the authority of Paul but under that of Paul's Lord. The Greek word "minister" (GK 1356) here simply means "one who serves." (3) As a messenger from Colosse, Epaphras had communicated to Paul about the Colossians' love; the reference may be to the love they had for all the people of God (cf. v.4) or to the love they had for Paul. "In the Spirit" means that it was the Spirit of God who had awakened this love in Paul's readers. There were other matters not so favorable that Epaphras may have told Paul about the Colossians, but for the moment the apostle is concerned only with these positive features.

C. Prayer of Petition (1:9–14)

To the thanksgiving of vv.3–8, the apostle adds a fervent petition. He prays that the Colossians may be so filled with the knowledge of God's will (v.9) that they may be enabled to live worthily of the Lord, pleasing him in everything (v.10a). This worthy life involves fruitfulness in every good work (v.10b), growth in the knowledge of God (v.10c), patience and long-suffering (v.11), and gratitude to God for the blessings of redemption (vv.12–14).

9 The words "for this reason," referring back to vv.3–8, show that this petitionary prayer is Paul's response to the news that had come to him of the Colossians' experience in Christ. He was grateful for what had already happened to them and prays now for the further enrichment of their lives.

His prayer contains two requests. The first, and the one on which the rest of the prayer is based, is that God might fill the readers "with the knowledge of his will through all spiritual wisdom and understanding." The word "knowledge" (GK 2106) is used in the NT only of moral and religious knowledge. It denotes thorough knowledge, i.e., a deep and accurate comprehension. Such knowledge of God's will is the foundation of all Christian character and conduct. Already here Paul may be touching on the fact that some in Colosse were failing to attain true knowledge by engaging in wild speculations of a philosophical wisdom.

The "will" of God in its broadest and most inclusive sense is the whole purpose of God as revealed in Christ. In this passage the term perhaps has special reference to God's intention for the conduct of the Christian life.

To be "filled" (GK 4444) with the knowledge of the divine will suggests that such knowledge is to pervade all of one's being—thoughts, affections, purposes, and plans. There is an unusual emphasis on "fullness" in this letter. The recurrence of this idea suggests that the Colossian errorists claimed to offer a "fullness" of blessing and truth not found in the preaching of Epaphras. Paul answers by stressing the true fullness available only in Christ (cf. especially 2:9). We acquire knowledge of the will of God by "wisdom" and "understanding." These two words should be looked on as expressing a single thought, something like practical wisdom or clear discernment. The use of the two words gives completeness to the statement and thus deepens its impression on the reader.

10 Paul's second petition, built on and growing out of the request for knowledge of the divine will, is that the Colossians might "live a life worthy of the Lord"; living a worthy life is thus represented as a result of knowing God's desire for one's life. This suggests that knowledge of God's will is not imparted as an end in itself; it is given with a practical intent—so that one's conduct may be godly.

"Live a life" translates a single word (lit., "walk"; GK 4344), one that is often used in Scripture to depict life in its outward expression (cf. 2:6; 3:7; 4:4; et al.). To live a life "worthy of the Lord" probably means to live a life that is commensurate with what the Lord has done for us. It may also suggest acting in conformity with our union with Christ and with his purpose for our lives. The ultimate aim of all this is to "please him [God] in every way." To "please" (GK 742) suggests an attitude of mind that anticipates every wish. Believers want to do anything to meet the wishes of God; that is the surest path to our own highest development and gain.

Verses 10b–14 underline some of the constituent parts of the kind of life that is pleasing to the Lord. The leading ideas are expressed by four participles: "bearing fruit" (v.10b), "growing" (v.10c), "being strengthened" (v.11a), and "giving thanks" (v.12). (1)"Bearing fruit" (GK 2844; cf. v.6) means that the Christian life is to exhibit continual fruitfulness (cf. Gal 5:22–23). The fruit itself consists in "every good work"—Paul lays great stress on good works in his letters (cf. Eph 2:10; Gal 5:5; Tit 1:16; 2:7, 14; 3:8, 15; et al.). In his discussion on good works, he represents them as the fruit, not the root, of a right relationship with God.

(2) The Christian should also experience continual personal spiritual enlargement, an idea expressed in the words "growing [GK 889] in the knowledge of God." The preposition in suggests that the knowledge of God is the sphere or realm in which spiritual growth takes place. It is possible, however, to translate the phrase as "growing by the knowledge of God." When rendered like this, the text affirms that the knowledge of God is the means by which the Christian grows. What rain and sunshine are to the nurture of plants, the knowledge of God is to the growth and maturing of the spiritual life.

11 (3) "Being strengthened with all power" is the next element in the life pleasing to God. Christians are engaged in moral conflict with the cosmic powers of a darkened world (cf. Eph 6:12), and nothing short of divine empowerment can enable them to stand. "Strengthened" (GK 1540) translates the same root word used in Php 4:13: "I can do everything through him who gives me strength."

This empowerment is "according to his [God's] glorious might." That is to say, it is not proportioned simply to our need, but to God's abundant supply. "His glorious might" is literally translated "the might of his glory." We should probably retain this rendering and understand the thought to be the might of God's own manifested nature. In this interpretation "glory" stands for the revealed splendor or majesty of God—the sum total of his divine perfections.

The twofold issue of such empowerment is "endurance and patience." The first term (GK 5705) denotes the opposite of cowardice and despondency; it is the capacity to see things through. "Patience" (GK 3429) is the opposite of wrath or a spirit of revenge. It speaks of even-temperedness, the attitude that in spite of injury or insult does not retaliate.

It is debatable whether "joyfully" should be construed with "endurance and patience" or with "giving thanks." A distinctively Christian quality (cf. Gal 5:22; Php 1:18; 2:17; 3:1; et al.), joy is often associated in the NT with hardship and suffering.

12 (4) The crowning virtue of the worthy Christian life is "giving thanks." One reason for gratitude to God is that he has "qualified" believers "to share in the inheritance of the saints." In themselves believers have no fitness for sharing in the heritage of God's people. They can experience this only as God qualifies them for such a privilege. This God has done for the Colossians and does for any believer at the time of his or her conversion.

To "share in" the inheritance of the saints is to have a portion of the heritage belonging to God's people. There is an obvious allusion to the inheritance of ancient Israel in the Promised Land and the share of the inheritance each Israelite had. Christians, as the new people of God, also have an inheritance, and each believer has a share allotted to him or her.

"In the kingdom of light" seems to mark the inheritance as future and heavenly. But the following verse affirms that Christians have already been rescued from the dominion of darkness and are even now in the kingdom of God's Son. The kingdom of God is all around us—in our homes, our families, our businesses—in sum, in everything that makes up our lives.

13 The proof that God has qualified us for a share of the inheritance of the saints is that he has "rescued us from the dominion of darkness and brought us into the kingdom of the Son he loves." "Rescued" (GK 4861) means to liberate, save, or deliver someone from something; that from which Christians have been rescued is a "dominion of darkness" (Jesus used the same phrase at the time of his arrest in Gethsemane; see Lk 22:53). "Darkness" in Scripture is symbolic of ignorance, falsehood, and sin (cf. Jn 3:19; Ro 13:12). But Paul probably had the Colossian heresy in mind, because the principalities and powers to which the false teachers urged Christians to pay homage are designated by him "the powers of this dark world" (Eph 6:12).

God's action in behalf of his people does not stop with deliverance from the authority of darkness. He has also "brought [them] into the kingdom of the Son he loves." "Brought" (GK 3496) was a word used in reference to removing persons from one country and settling them as colonists and citizens in another country. This took place at the time of the Colossians' conversion. The "kingdom" (GK 993; see comment on Mk 1:15) is not to be interpreted as a future realm; it was for the Colossians a present reality (cf. Jn 3:3–5). Nor is the kingdom to be interpreted as an area designated on a map; it is the sovereign rule of the Lord Christ over human hearts. The expression "the Son he loves" is reminiscent of the words of the Father at the baptism and the transfiguration of Jesus (Mt 3:17; 17:5).

14 By virtue of union with Christ, redemption and forgiveness are ours. "Redemption" (GK 667), a term that speaks of a release brought about by the payment of a price, was used of the deliverance of slaves from bondage or of prisoners of war from captivity. "We have" teaches that the believer's redemption is a present possession. "Forgiveness" (lit., "a sending away"; GK 912) speaks of the removal of our sins from us, so that they are no longer barriers that separate us from God. By putting redemption and forgiveness in apposition to each other, Paul teaches that the central feature of redemption is the forgiveness of sins.

II. The Supremacy of Christ (1:15–23)

The most dangerous aspect of the Colossian errorists' teaching was its depreciation of the person of Jesus Christ. To them, Christ was not the triumphant Redeemer to whom all authority in heaven and on earth had been committed. At best he was only one of many spirit beings who bridged the space between God and humankind. This passage is part of Paul's answer to this heretical teaching. As one of several great Christological declarations in Paul (cf. 2:9–15; Eph 1:20–23; Php 2:5–11), it proclaims the unqualified supremacy of our Redeemer. The affirmations of this passage are all the more remarkable when we remember that they were written of One who only thirty years earlier had died on a Roman cross.

It is somewhat arbitrary to separate this passage from what precedes it. So imperceptibly does Paul move from prayer (vv.3–14) to exposition that it is difficult to know exactly where one leaves off and the other begins.

A. The Scope of Christ's Supremacy (1:15–18)

Three profound and sweeping statements concerning Christ are made, showing his relation to deity (v.15a), to creation (vv.15b–17), and to the church (v.18). In making these assertions, Paul refutes the Colossian errorists, in whose system angelic mediators usurped the place and function of Christ. His task in earlier letters (e.g., Romans and Galatians) had been to expound the importance of Christ for salvation; in the face of this new teaching at Colosse, he finds it necessary to affirm Christ's cosmic significance.

15 In regard to deity, Christ is "the image of the invisible God" (cf. 2Co 4:4). He is not the image of God in a material or physical sense. Nor should we, as some interpreters do, understand this as a reference to Christ's existence in the preincarnate state. The context strongly supports the view that Paul was thinking of Christ in his glorified state. To be sure, there is a very real sense in which Christ always has been, is, and always will be the "image" (GK 1635) of God. But that seems not to be the point here. The word expresses two ideas. One is likeness: Christ is the image of God in the sense that he is the exact likeness of God, like the image on a coin or the reflection in a mirror (cf. Heb 1:3). The other idea in "image" is manifestation: Christ is the image of God in the sense that the nature and being of God are perfectly revealed in him (cf. Jn 1:18). Therefore Paul can boldly say that we have "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ" (2Co 4:6) and that believers, reflecting the Lord's glory, "are being transformed into his likeness with ever-increasing glory" (2Co 3:18). Paul's statement leaves no place for the vague emanations and shadowy abstractions so prominent in the gnostic system.

In relation to the universe, Christ is "the firstborn over all creation." "Firstborn" (GK 4758; see also v.18; Ro 8:29; Heb 1:6; Rev 1:15) may denote either priority in time or supremacy in rank. In the present passage, perhaps we should see both meanings. Christ is before all creation in time; he is also over it in rank and dignity. The major stress, however, seems to be on the idea of supremacy. Some see in the word an allusion to the ancient custom whereby the firstborn in a family was accorded rights and privileges not shared by the other offspring. He was his father's representative and heir, and to him the management of the household was committed. Following this line of interpretation, Christ is his Father's representative and heir and has the management of the divine household (all creation) committed to him. He is thus Lord over all God's creation.

16 The apostle now states the ground for Christ's dominion over creation: he is firstborn (Lord) over creation because he made it. To him it owes its unity, its meaning, indeed its very existence.

Three prepositional phrases define the creative activity of Christ: All things came to be "in [NIV, by] him" (v.16a), "through [NIV, by] him" (v 16b), and "for him" (v.16c). Creation was in him in the sense that it occurred within the sphere of his person and power. He was its conditioning cause, its originating center, its spiritual locality. Creation is through Christ in the sense that he was the mediating Agent through whom it actually came into being. The entire life of the universe is mediated from God through Christ (cf. Jn 1:3, 10). Creation is for Christ in the sense that he is the end for which all things exist, the goal toward whom all things were intended to move. They are meant to serve his will and to contribute to his glory.

"All things" denotes the totality of things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible. The reference to "thrones," "powers," "rulers," and "authorities" is perhaps an allusion to the angelic hierarchy that figured so prominently in the Colossian heresy. Paul's mention of these things does not, of course, mean that he recognized the existence of a hierarchy of spirit beings, such as the errorists taught. His words do suggest, however, that whatever supernatural powers there may be, Christ is the One who made them and he is their Lord.

17 Verse 16 has stated the essential reason for Christ's lordship over creation, namely, that he is its creator. Verse 17 is a sort of summing up of the thought of vv.15–16. But in addition, it rounds out and completes the statement of Christ's relation to creation. "He is before all things, and in him all things hold together." That Christ is "before" all things means primarily that he is before all in time; yet the statement is general enough to include also the notion that he is above all in rank (cf. "firstborn over all creation" in v.15b). That all things "hold together" (GK 5319) in Christ means that he is both the unifying principle and the personal sustainer of all creation. It springs from him and finds in him its common cohesion and center (cf. Heb 1:3).

18 Paul's third affirmation concerning Christ's supremacy relates to the new creation: "And he is the head of the body, the church" (v.18a; cf. 2:19; Eph 1:22–23; 4:15). To be the "head" (GK 3051) of the church is to be its sovereign ruler. In the figure there may also be the suggestion that Christ is the source of the church's life, but this is not its primary significance. Christ, and no other person, is the chief and leader of the church. It is he who guides and governs it.

"Church" (GK 1711), which means "assembly" or "congregation," is best interpreted here as a term embracing all the redeemed people of God. The mention of the church as "the body" of Christ suggests at least three things: (1) that the church is a living organism, composed of members joined vitally to one another, (2) that the church is the means by which Christ carries out his purposes and performs his work, and (3) that the union that exists between Christ and his people is most intimate and real. Together they constitute one living unit, each, in a sense, being incomplete without the other.

Verse 18b gives one ground or basis of Christ's headship over the church: "He is the beginning and the firstborn from among the dead." "Beginning" (GK 794) may be interpreted in any one of three ways: (1) supremacy in rank, (2) precedence in time, or (3) creative initiative. There is, of course, truth in each of these, but it seems best to see in Paul's word the idea of creative initiative. In other words, Christ is the origin and source of the life of the church, the fount of its being.

"Firstborn" ((GK 4758; cf. v.15) defines more precisely what Paul means by Christ as beginning. In v.15, this term pointed to Christ's relation to creation, and we concluded that it suggested both precedence in time and supremacy in rank. In the present passage the idea of precedence is the more prominent. Thus, Christ was the first to come from the dead in true resurrection life (i.e., never to die again, cf. 1Co 15:20). And because he was the first to be born from the dead, he possesses in himself the new and higher life that his people, by virtue of their union with him, now share. Thus he establishes his place as the beginning, the origin of the church's life.

"So that in everything he might have the supremacy" in one sense is a summary of all that Paul has affirmed from v.15 to this point, but syntactically it must be seen as expressing the purpose of the immediately preceding statement about Christ's being the beginning, the firstborn from the dead. He rose from the dead in order that his preeminence might become universal, extending both to the old creation and to the new. He had always been first, but by his resurrection he entered upon an even wider and more significant sovereignty (cf. Ac 2:26; Ro 1:4).

B. The Basis for Christ's Supremacy (1:19–23)

Paul has ascribed unique supremacy to Jesus Christ. He has affirmed him to be image of God, Lord over creation, Head of the church—indeed, preeminent in all things. These next verses now state the grounds (cf. "for" in v.19) on which such supremacy is affirmed. The last phrase of v.18 implies that Christ has unshared supremacy because God has decreed it. This section states this in different terms, but still puts it within the context of the divine will. Two things that God willed are specifically set forth, one having to do with the fullness of God in Christ (v.19), the other with the reconciling work of Christ (vv.20–23).

1. The fullness of God in Christ (1:19)

19 God has willed that in Christ "all fullness" should dwell. The word "fullness" (GK 4445) is one of the key words of this letter, but also one of the most difficult to interpret (cf. also 2:9; Eph 1:23; 3:19; 4:13; see comments on Col 1:9; 2:9). The word seems to have been in current use by the false teachers, and was possibly employed by them for the totality of supernatural powers that they believed controlled people's lives. But to Paul, the totality of divine powers and attributes exists only in Christ; nothing of deity is lacking in him (cf. 2:9 for a similar view).

According to the Colossian errorists, many spirit beings filled the space between God and the world as intermediaries, and any communication between God and the world had to pass through them. They probably included Christ among these supernatural powers, admitting that he was of heavenly origin and that God was in some sense present in him. He was, however, only one aspect of the divine nature and in himself was not sufficient for all the needs of humankind. Paul, in contrast, declares that Christ is not just one of many divine beings. He is the one and only Mediator between God and the world, and all, not part, of the attributes and activities of God are centered in him. "Dwell" (GK 2997) suggests permanent residence as opposed to temporary sojourn. Paul may be refuting a Colossian notion that the divine fullness had only a transient and incidental association with Christ. To Paul, it abides in him permanently.

2. The reconciling work of Christ (1:20–23)

20 The Father was pleased "to reconcile to himself all things" through Christ. This statement sustains a close connection with v.19. For one thing, "reconcile" (GK 639) is parallel with the word for "dwell" (v.19), both terms being grammatically dependent on the verb rendered "was pleased." That is, the Father willed that all fullness should dwell in Christ and that he would reconcile all things to himself through Christ. "Reconcile" suggests removing all enmity between God and the human race and effecting in humankind a condition of submission to, and harmony with, God (cf. Ro 5:10–11; 2Co 5:18–20; Eph 2:14–15). This reconciliation is on the widest possible scale—"all things." The "things in heaven" is an inclusive term, taking in everything not belonging to the "earth" (i.e., the starry heavens). "Things on earth . . . things in heaven" thus denotes everything in God's universe.

One must be careful not to interpret this verse in such a way as to make it contradict the clear teaching of other Scriptures. Admittedly, the statement might appear, on its surface, to indicate that eventually everything will be brought into a saving relationship with God. Such universalism, however, is contrary to those passages that affirm that apart from personal trust in Christ there is no salvation. Our Lord spoke of the impenitent as going away into "eternal punishment" (Mt 25:46). This statement refers, therefore, to the cosmic significance of Christ's work, the thought being similar to, but not identical with, that of Ro 8:19–22. There the general sense is that the disorder that has characterized creation will be done away and divine harmony restored. Here the main idea is that all things eventually are to be decisively subdued to God's will and made to serve his purposes.

21 Verse 20 has presented the general aspect of the reconciling work of Christ; vv. 21–23 show how this applies personally and specifically to the Colossians. Prior to their conversion to Christianity they had been "alienated" or estranged from God and were "enemies" (GK 2398) in their minds. The latter word affirms the Colossians' hostility to God. This hostility, Paul explains, affected their "minds" (i.e., their thoughts and disposition) and was outwardly expressed in their wicked deeds.

22 God reconciled the Colossians "by Christ's physical body through death." The phrase "physical body" seems to emphasize (in contradiction to the views of the heretics) the reality of Christ's human body. To the errorists, reconciliation could be accomplished only by spiritual (angelic) beings; they attached little or no value to the work of Christ in a physical body. In opposition to this, Paul stressed the importance of Christ's body.

The result of Christ's reconciling work is the presentation of the Colossians as "holy in his sight, without blemish and free from accusation." Both the present and the future seem to be in view here. In reconciling believers, God brought them into his presence, no longer as stained by sin and bearing the burden of guilt, but as "holy" and "without blemish and free from accusation." That is their standing at the time of and by the death of Christ. But on the day of Christ's return, they will be officially presented as perfected in glory. In the meantime, they are progressing in holiness wrought in them by the Spirit of God.

"Holy" suggests consecration and dedication (see comment on v.2). "Without blemish" (GK 320), which translates a technical sacrificial term (Lev 22:21), was used of animals that were without flaw and therefore worthy of being offered to God. The use of this word gives support to the view that in this statement Paul was not thinking about our personal conduct but about our position in Christ. There has never been, nor will there ever be, a Christian life that is without blemish in actual conduct. But Christians' identification with Christ is such that his righteousness and his standing before God are theirs (2Co 5:21; 1Jn 4:17).

"Free from accusation" likewise expresses a condition possible only because people are in Christ, covered by and sharing in the benefits of his death for them.

23 Those who emphasize the future aspects of v.22 explain v.23 as a warning against indolence and complacency. The Colossians will be thus presented to God only "if [they] continue in [their] faith, established and firm," and so forth. Those who emphasize v.22 as a statement of the believer's present condition contend that the words of v.23 are proof of a past (and continuing) experience, not a condition of what is future. Paul is simply stating the absolute accomplishment of salvation in the past sufferings of Christ. It is significant for both interpretations that the condition is stated in such a way as to express the apostle's confidence in his readers.

"Faith" (GK 4411) here, as is usual in the NT, means one's personal faith, i.e., one's reliance on Christ. The words that follow "faith" explain what is involved in continuing in one's faith. "Established" suggests being founded securely, as on a rock. "Firm" depicts a steady and firm resolve. The "hope held out in the gospel" is in its fullest sense the expectation of ultimate, complete salvation that will belong to believers upon the return of their Lord. There may be an implicit contrast between the certainty of the Gospel and the delusive promises offered by the Colossian errorists.

In the closing words of v.23 Paul makes three statements to stress the importance of remaining true to the apostolic Gospel. (1) It is the message "that you heard." The reference is to the Gospel that had been initially preached to them by Epaphras (cf. 1:7) and was the instrument of their conversion. (2) It has been "proclaimed to every creature under heaven." The universality of the Gospel in all places of the Roman empire is a mark of its authenticity. Obviously there is an element of hyperbole in this statement. (3) Paul closes with the affirmation that he himself had "become a servant" of the Gospel. He does not designate himself in this fashion for the purpose of magnifying his office, but to impress on the Colossians that the Gospel heard by them from Epaphras and proclaimed in all the world was the same Gospel he had been preaching.

III. The Ministry of Paul (1:24-2:7)

This passage, which is somewhat parallel to Eph 3:1ff., comes as a sort of digression. Though decidedly autobiographical, it is not so much concerned with Paul the man as with the office he filled. In the course of his discussion, Paul mentions his suffering and its bearing on the Colossians (1:24), his commission to preach and its implications for them (1:25–29), and his personal interest in and concern for them (2:1–5). The passage closes with a direct appeal to the Colossians (2:6–7).

A. A Ministry of Suffering (1:24)

24 The interpretation of this verse is much disputed, but the general sense of it is clear. In it the apostle teaches that the sufferings he endured in the course of his work were in the interest of the Colossians, indeed, of the whole church; in that knowledge, he is able to rejoice (cf. Eph 3:13).

"Now" may be both temporal and transitional in force. In its temporal sense, the word indicates that Paul's joy and his suffering were both realities at the time of writing this letter. In its transitional sense, "now" shows that this paragraph is closely related to the thought of the preceding section. Looked at in this manner, the term is almost equivalent to "therefore" and shows that the thought of Christ's supremacy is a factor in Paul's ability to rejoice in the midst of suffering.

Three things are said in the verse about the sufferings of Paul. (1) They are for the sake of other people ("for you" and "for the sake of his [Christ's] body"). In both phrases "for" means "in the interest of." The first phrase alludes to the fact that Paul's imprisonment had come as a result of bringing the Gospel to the Gentiles, to which class the Colossians belonged. His sufferings, therefore, were for their sake in that they shared in the benefit of the ministry that brought on the sufferings. The second phrase affirms that the benefit of

The Colossian Heresy

Most scholars see in the letter to the Colossians evidence of a heretical group that was pressuring true believers there to adopt their teachings. Paul labels these teachings as "hollow and deceptive philosophy," based on "human traditions" (2:8). Judging from the content of this letter, the following appear to be the main tenets of the heretics and Paul's rebuttal to them.

Teaching of heresy	Paul's answer	Relevant texts
Emphasis on worship of angels, called "thrones," "rulers," "powers," and "authorities."	Christ created these powers and he rules over them; believers are delivered from their power.	1:13, 15–17; 2:9–10, 15, 18–19
Angels are intermediaries between God and human beings.	Christ is the only mediator we need.	1:13–23; 2:6, 9–10
Endorsed submission to the "basic principles of the world."	Christ rules over them, and Christians have died to them in Christ.	2:8, 20
Endorsed circumcision.	Believers undergo a form of circumcision in the death of Christ, experienced through baptism.	2:11–13
Endorsed special religious days and legalistic food rules.	Do not listen to such rules; believers have died to them and their power is cancelled.	2:14, 16–17, 20–23
Emphasis on a special, secret knowledge.	God fills all believers with his wisdom, knowledge, and understanding.	1:9–10, 28; 2:2–4, 22

Paul's sufferings extends not simply to those Colossians or even to the Gentile portion of the church; they in some sense have a bearing on the whole body of Christ. Indeed, his sufferings contribute even to our well-being, for had he not suffered imprisonment, this letter might never have been written, and we would have been deprived of its message.

(2) Paul's sufferings are identified with "Christ's afflictions." The words "I fill up in my flesh what is still lacking in regard to Christ's afflictions" have evoked a great amount of discussion. Many Roman Catholics, for instance, interpreting the "afflictions" of Christ as Christ's redemptive sufferings, have asserted that Christ's atonement is defective and that the sufferings of the saints are needed to supplement his work on our behalf. But whatever this verse means, we may be sure that Paul did not regard the death of Jesus as lacking in efficacy (cf. Col 2:11–15). That death was complete, once for all, and wholly adequate to meet our need.

The afflictions of Christ are undoubtedly those endured personally by him on earth, but the reference is to his ministerial afflictions, not his redemptive sufferings. "Afflictions" (GK 2568) is never employed in the NT of the sufferings of Christ on the cross; the reference, then, is to the tribulations our Lord endured in the course of his life and ministry. The sufferings his people endure are a continuation of what he endured, and in that sense they complete his afflictions. The church is built by acts of self-denial in Christ's servants; they continue the work he began.

The underlying principle is the believer's union with Christ. That union is so intimate—Christ the Head, his people the body—that he suffers when they suffer (cf. Isa 63:9). His personal sufferings are over, but his sufferings in his people continue (cf. 2Co 1:5; Php 3:10). Perhaps Paul was thinking of Christ's words to him on the Damascus road (Ac 9:4–5). "What is still lacking" is not an intimation of deficiency in Christ's own sufferings but a reference to what is yet lacking in Christ's suffering in Paul. In his experience as a prisoner, the apostle was filling up the sum or quota of suffering yet remaining for him to endure.

(3) They are the sphere of Paul's joy. The sufferings Paul endured for the Gospel seem never to have been to him a source of perplexity or of sadness. But his attitude had nothing in common with those ascetics of a later time who inflicted torture on themselves in the belief that they would thereby gain merit with God. Paul's joy was not in suffering as such, but in "what was suffered for you." That is to say, it was the distinctive character and circumstances of his sufferings that enabled him to find joy in the midst of them. He saw them as a necessary part of his ministry (see also Mt 5:12; Ac 5:41; Heb 10:34.)

B. A Ministry of Preaching (1:25–29)

A second feature of Paul's ministry was the proclamation of God's message. His statement concerning this is of great value to all who wish a better understanding of preaching. The thought revolves around four conceptions: Paul's appointment to the office of preacher (v.25a), the message he preached (vv.25b–28a), the method he employed (v.28b), and his ultimate aim (vv.28c–29).

25 Elsewhere Paul speaks of himself as a minister of the Gospel (v.23; Eph 3:7), of God (2Co 6:4), of Christ (2Co 11:23), and of a new covenant (2Co 3:6). Here he is the church's minister or "servant" (GK 1356; cf. 1:7, 23), and as such is bound to toil and suffer in whatever way the church's welfare requires.

Paul's appointment to his office was "by the commission God gave" him—lit., "according to the dispensation of God." The word translated "commission" (GK 3873) has a wide range of meanings; here it is perhaps best rendered by "stewardship" (cf. Lk 16:2–4). This rendering suggests that Paul conceived of the work to which God appointed him as both a high privilege and a sacred trust. He was a servant of the church, but in the deepest sense he was a steward of God (cf. 1Co 4:1).

The purpose of the apostle's stewardship was "to present the word of God in all its fullness." Some understand this to refer to the geographical extension of the Gospel (cf. Ro 15:19). But Paul probably means that his special ministry was to make clear the true nature of the Gospel as a divine provision intended for all.

26 The preceding verse has spoken of Paul's message as "the word of God," a general term that sums up the oral proclamation of the apostles. Verses 26–27 define the word of God more specifically in terms of a "mystery" (GK 3696), a word used in the NT of truth undiscoverable except by divine revelation (cf. 1Co 2:6ff.; 14:51); i.e., it denotes something that, though once a secret, has now been fully revealed in the Gospel. In Ephesians it is used six times—more often than in any other book of the NT: in 1:9, where it refers to the mystery of God's dealing with the world; in 3:3–9 (three times), where it has special reference to the inclusion of Gentiles in the privileges and blessings of the messianic salvation; in 5:22, where it speaks of the spiritual union of Christ and his church; and in 6:19, where it is practically equated with the Gospel. Here in Colossians the word occurs four times (1:26, 27; 2:2; 4:3).

Paul goes on to express two characteristics of this mystery: it was "hidden for ages and generations, but is now disclosed." "Ages" and "generations" are used together to refer to people living in former times. Now, however, "to the saints" (i.e., the people of God) the formerly hidden truth is "disclosed." Paul's expression here reflects an intense joy that the long silence has been broken.

27 God was pleased to reveal to his people how great is the glorious character of the gospel mystery. Paul's frequent use of "riches" (GK 4458) suggests that Christ had made available an inexhaustible treasure of goodness (Ro 2:4), glory (Ro 9:23; Eph 1:18; 3:16; Php 4:19), wisdom (Ro 11:33), and grace (Eph 1:7; 2:7). "Among [lit., in] the Gentiles" defines the sphere in which the wealth of glory has been especially displayed. Paul seems to have been thinking of the wonder of the unfolding of the divine mystery in the conversion of pagan people and in their being drawn into the one body of Christ. The inner content of the mystery is defined as "Christ in you," a phrase that refers to an inner, subjective experience of the indwelling of Christ.

"Christ in you" is now declared to be "the hope of glory." "Hope" is joyous expectation or anticipation; "glory" is that which will belong to the Christian in the heavenly state (cf. 3:4; Ro 5:2; 8:17). The general truth is that Christ living in the believer is the ground for certainty of complete salvation (cf. Eph 1:13–14, where the Spirit is designated as "the deposit guaranteeing our inheritance"). In this letter Christ himself occupies the sphere that Paul elsewhere gives to the Spirit.

28 In v.25 Paul has defined his message as "the word of God." In vv.26–27 he has used the term "mystery." Here his message centers in the Christ who indwells believers. At the deepest level, therefore, the apostle conceived of his message not as a system or as a collection of rules and regulations, but as a living and glorious Person who is the fulfillment of the deepest hopes of humankind and the source of new life for all his people. "We" distinguishes Paul and his fellow preachers from the Colossian errorists. "Proclaim" (GK 2859) suggests a solemn or public proclamation with authority. This term includes the idea of instruction and admonition.

"Admonishing" (GK 3805) and "teaching" (GK 1438) describe two attendant circumstances of Paul's preaching. The former word has to do with the will and emotions and connotes warning. Here it relates to non-Christians, the thought probably being that the apostle sought to awaken each of them to his or her need of Christ and to the necessity of repentance. The latter word, probably referring to a ministry for converts, stresses the importance of instruction in proclaiming the Word. "With all wisdom" seems to express the way the teaching was done.

"Everyone," stated twice for emphasis, shows that Paul's Gospel was not marred by the exclusiveness that characterized the false teachers. They believed the way of salvation to be so involved that it could be understood only by a select few who made up a sort of spiritual aristocracy. Unlike the errorists, Paul slighted no one. Every person was the object of his direct concern.

The aim of Paul's proclaiming, admonishing, and teaching was to "present everyone perfect in Christ." "Present" (GK 4225) refers to being brought into God's presence at the return of Christ (cf. 1Th 2:19–20; 5:23); only then will God's work in the believer be complete. "Perfect" (GK 5455) suggests attainment of the proper end of one's existence—maturity in faith and character (cf. Eph 4:13). Such maturity is possible "in Christ," i.e., by virtue of the believer's union with Christ.

29 Paul gave himself unstintingly to accomplishing this end. "Struggling" (GK 76) is a term from the athletic arena, signifying intense exertion. This struggle is "according to his [God's] working." In other words, the struggle is carried on, not through Paul's own natural powers, but by the supernatural power at work in him. The entire statement shows that through faith in Christ we can link our life with a source of strength that enables us to rise above our natural limitations.

C. A Ministry of Intercession (2:1–5)

A third feature of Paul's ministry was his pastoral concern for those he served. The concern expressed in these verses arose from Paul's anxiety about the response of the Colossian Christians to the error being propagated by the false teachers (cf. Php 3:18). Anyone sharing Paul's exalted concept of Christ (cf. Col 1:15ff.) can never be indifferent to the inroads of error.

1 The metaphor of the arena is implicit in this verse as Paul again uses the word "struggling" (a Greek word built on the same root as "struggling" in 1:29; GK 74). He indicates how strenuously he was exerting himself with deep and earnest solicitude. The powers that wrestled with Paul for the ruin of his work were real and resolute; he therefore had to meet them full force in Christ. The particular struggle Paul had in mind appears to have been that of prayer. At the time he wrote these words he could not move beyond the walls of his "rented house" (Ac 28:30), being continuously held by the chain linking him to a Roman soldier. But even under these circumstances he could engage in the combat of prayer and so exert himself strenuously in behalf of his readers.

This brings before us an aspect of Paul's prayers that we often overlook—namely, that they sometimes involved him in a truly awesome conflict, an intense struggle of the soul. This agony in prayer was "for" (i.e., in behalf of) the Colossians. But it was also in behalf of "those at Laodicea and for all who have not met me personally." Laodicea was an important banking center in ancient times and is mentioned elsewhere in the NT only in 4:13, 15–16; Rev 3:14. The wording of v.1 seems to suggest that the Colossians and the Laodiceans were among those who had not met Paul personally.

2 Paul's concern for his readers was that "they may be encouraged in heart and united in love." The Greek word for "encouraged" (GK 4151) means "to call to one's side," signifying such ideas as comfort, encouragement, and exhortation. The central thought here is being strengthened against the onslaught of error. "United" (GK 5204) suggests being welded into a genuine unity. The Greek construction suggests that the means by which the strengthening takes place is the readers' being knit together in love.

One consequence of being encouraged and united is attaining "the full riches of complete understanding." Heart encouragement and being united in love bring an inward wealth that consists in full or assured understanding. This in turn brings a deep and full knowledge (see comment on 1:9) of Christ, who is "the mystery of God" (see comment on 1:26).

3 This Christ is now described as the One "in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." This statement contains two thoughts. (1) All the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are in Christ. The false teachers claimed to have, through their relation with a supposed hierarchy of supernatural beings, a higher knowledge than that possessed by ordinary believers. Against this, Paul argues that all wisdom and knowledge are in Christ and that their treasures are accessible to every believer. (2) The treasures of wisdom are in Christ in a hidden way. "Hidden" does not, however, mean that they are concealed but rather that they are laid up or stored away as a treasure.

4 Paul now expresses the reason for his anxious concern. His words in vv.1–3 have been written so that the Colossian errorists will not "deceive" (GK 4165) the Christians in Colosse and lead them away from their convictions about Christ. "Deceive" implies leading astray by false reasoning; "fine-sounding arguments" has something of the same meaning, implying the attempt to convince someone by "fast talk."

5 Paul was no indifferent spectator of his readers' problems but had a sincere interest in them. Though not physically with them, he felt his spiritual oneness with them and rejoiced in their orderliness and in the firmness of their faith. "How orderly you are" contains a military term connoting the orderly array of a band of disciplined soldiers. "Firm" (GK 5106) also belongs to military parlance and means solidity and compactness. If this is the imagery Paul intended, he sees the situation of the Colossians as being like that of an army under attack and affirms that their lines were unbroken, their discipline intact, and their "faith in [reliance on] Christ" unshaken.

D. A Ministry of Exhortation (2:6–7)

It seems best to take these two verses as a kind of summary appeal made in light of the preceding discussion—an appeal for the readers to remain true to Christ as Lord.

6 "So then" links Paul's appeal with what he has just said. The Colossians had received Christ as the Anointed of God ("Christ"), as the historic Savior ("Jesus"), and as the sovereign "Lord." Now Paul appeals to them to "continue to live [GK 4344] in him" in the same manner. He wants their present conduct to conform regularly to the doctrine taught them at the beginning, the doctrine they had committed themselves to at their conversion.

7 In this verse four participles describe the walk in Christ. The first two, "rooted [GK 4845] and built up [GK 2224] in him," go together. The first expression suggests a once-for-all experience, i.e., a being permanently rooted in Christ; the second one indicates a continual process. The Colossians have been "strengthened [GK 1011] in the faith"; i.e., their strength has been in the body of truth or the faith system that they learned when they first became Christians. The final phrase, "overflowing [GK 4355] with thankfulness," means that for believers thanksgiving is to be a continual, habitual thing. Paul may be implying that those who lack a deep sense of thankfulness to God are especially vulnerable to doubt and spiritual delusion.

IV. Warning Against Error (2:8–23)

The apostle now makes his most direct attack against the Colossian heresy. The entire passage bristles with exegetical difficulties and calls for closer attention to its wording and argument than any other part of this letter. Its tone is both admonitory and affirmative, but admonition is the prevailing note sounded throughout. The affirmations, which mainly concern Christ and his sufficiency (cf. vv.9–15), form the basis on which the warnings are issued and give point and power to them.

It is characteristic of Paul in Colossians to use the vocabulary of his opponents, though often in a different sense. Instances of this in the present passage may be "philosophy" (v.8), "fullness" (v.9), "Deity" (v.9), "powers and authorities" (v.15), "humility" (v.18), "disqualify" (v.18), and "self-imposed worship" (v.23).

A. The Error of False Philosophy (2:8–15)

1. The warning stated (2:8)

8 Paul first warns against the danger of being taken captive through a false philosophy. The singular "no one" suggests that Paul may have had a particular person in mind, perhaps the leader of the heretical teachers. The words translated "that no one takes you captive" point to a real, not a supposed, danger. "Takes captive" (GK 5194), a word regularly used of taking captives in war and leading them away as booty, depicts the false teachers as "people-stealers," wishing to entrap the Colossians and drag them away into spiritual enslavement.

"Through hollow and deceptive philosophy" expresses the means whereby the errorists were attempting to do this. This is the only occurrence of the word "philosophy" in the NT. It would be a mistake to conclude that Paul intended his statement to be a condemnation of all philosophy. Here, because of the reference to the Colossian error, it has a derogatory connotation.

Paul uses three descriptive phrases to characterize this "hollow and deceptive" system; each constitutes a reason for its rejection. (1) It was according to "human tradition." By "tradition" (GK 4142) Paul likely means the various pagan theories current in that day. He asserts that these, not divine revelation, were the bases of the "philosophy" of the Colossian errorists.

(2) It was a philosophy that depends on "the basic principles of this world." "Basic principles" (GK 5122) has a variety of meanings. Originally it denoted the letters of the alphabet, its root meaning being "things in a row." The term then came to be used of the elements ("ABC's") of learning (cf. Gal 4:3; Heb 5:12), of the physical elements of the world (cf. 2Pe 3:10), and of the elemental spirits or supernatural powers believed by many ancients to preside over and direct the heavenly bodies (cf. Gal 4:3). The sense in the present passage may be either the elements of learning or the elemental spirits. If the former sense is intended, the statement means that the Colossian system was really only rudimentary instruction, the ABC's of the world—i.e., it was elementary rather than advanced. The rendering "elemental spirits" is, however, to be preferred. This philosophy probably had the elemental spirits of the universe as its subject matter. We know from 2:18, for example, that the Colossian heresy made much of the "worship of angels."

(3) It was a system not according to Christ. This is Paul's most telling criticism of the teaching at Colosse. The philosophy of the heretics did not accord with the truth as revealed in Christ. He is the standard by which all doctrine is to be measured, and any system, whatever its claims, must be rejected if it fails to conform to the revelation God has given us in him.

2. The warning justified (2:9–15)

Paul's warning rests on Christ's unshared supremacy (v.9) and his complete adequacy to meet human need (vv.10–15). Because of who he is and what we find in him, any system "not after Christ" must be wrong. The passage takes up the central phrase of 1:19 ("fullness") and draws out its consequences in relation to the Colossian heresy.

a. The full deity of Christ (2:9a)

9a Nearly every word in this statement is significant. "For," linking this and the following verses to v.8, shows that the warning in that verse rests on what is said here about Christ and his fullness. The phrase "in Christ" (see comment on 1:2) stresses that in Christ alone the fullness of deity dwells. "Lives" (GK 2997) suggests the idea of taking up permanent residence. The tense is present, stating a general truth and denoting continuous action. The full thought, then, is that in Christ the fullness of deity permanently resides, finding a settled home in him. The context suggests that the primary reference is to Christ in his present glorified state. "Fullness" (GK 4445; see comment on 1:19) is defined by the addition of "of the Deity" (GK 2540). This word is an abstract term, meaning not just divine qualities and attributes but the complete, inner essence of God that lives in Christ.

b. The real humanity of Christ (2:9b)

9b The preceding statement corresponds to the phrase in Jn 1:1, "the Word was God"; this present statement corresponds to Jn 1:14, "the Word became flesh." The fullness of deity dwells in Christ "in bodily form," i.e., in incarnate fashion. This fullness, to be sure, resided in the preincarnate Word, but not in bodily fashion.

c. The complete adequacy of Christ (2:10–15)

10 This statement crowns Paul's argument. Because Christ is fully God and really human, believers "are made full," i.e., share in his fullness; "in him" denotes our vital union with the Savior. In union with Christ, our every spiritual need is fully met. Possessing him, we possess all. There was no need, therefore, for the Colossians to turn to the "philosophy" of the errorists, the ritual of the Mosaic law, or the spirit-beings worshiped by the pagan world. All they needed was in Jesus Christ.

Paul goes on to affirm the all-sufficiency of Christ by stating that he is "the head over every power and authority." He is "the head" in the sense that he is the source of life for all that exists and sovereign Lord over it all (cf. 1:16, 18). Whatever powers there are in the universe, whatever ranks and orders of authority and government, they all owe their being to Christ and are under his lordship. It is important to observe that though Christ is here described as head, the powers and authorities are not called his body. That distinction is reserved for Christ's people.

11 Paul now expands on the idea of Christ's sufficiency. Our Lord has done three things for us: spiritual circumcision (vv.11–12), forgiveness of sins (vv.13–14), and victory over evil forces (v.15).

In union with Christ, believers have true "circumcision," i.e., they have found in him the reality symbolized by Mosaic circumcision. The Christian's "circumcision" is defined as "the putting off of the sinful nature." "Putting off" (GK 589) uses the picture of stripping off and casting away a piece of filthy clothing. The "sinful nature" (lit., "the body of the flesh") has been variously explained, but only two interpretations seem worthy of consideration. One understands "body" to be a reference to the physical body, "flesh" to be a description of the body as conditioned by our fallen nature. The other takes "body" to denote something like "mass" or sum total, "flesh" to denote our sinful nature (i.e., the entire carnal nature; cf. NIV).

The description of Christian circumcision as "not . . . done by the hands of men" is obviously intended to contrast the Christian's "circumcision" with that required by the Mosaic law (and advocated also by the errorists of Colosse). The circumcision prescribed by Moses, which represented the cutting away of a man's uncleanness and was the outward sign of participation in Israel's covenant with God, was made with hands (i.e., was physical), and it affected an external organ of the body. The circumcision that the believer experiences in Christ is spiritual, and it relates not to an external organ but to one's inward being. In short, it is what elsewhere in Scripture is called "circumcision of the heart" (Ro 2:28; cf. Php 3:3)—something that took place at the time of conversion.

12 Paul gives a further explanation of spiritual circumcision: Christian baptism is the outward counterpart to that experience and as such is the means by which it is openly declared. The emphasis of the verse, however, is not on the analogy between circumcision and baptism; that concept is soon dismissed, and the thought shifts to that of baptism as symbolizing the believer's participation in the burial and resurrection of Christ (cf. Ro 6:3ff.).

Being "buried" and "raised" with Christ conveys the thought not simply of burying an old way of life and rising to a new kind of life but of sharing in the experience of Christ's own death and resurrection. That Paul did not think of baptism as actually effecting participation in that experience is made clear when he adds that the Colossians were raised through their "faith in the power of God." Baptism, then, is not a magic rite, but an act of obedience in which we confess our faith and symbolize the essence of our spiritual experience. Faith is the instrumental cause of that experience, and, apart from real faith, baptism is an empty, meaningless ceremony.

13–14 In the closing words of v.12 Paul mentioned God's raising Christ from the dead. Now he assures his readers that in Christ they share the resurrection experience. In Christ's case it was a literal bodily resurrection from the dead. In their case, the death was spiritual ("dead in your sins," "uncircumcision"), and the being make alive is also spiritual. Eventually, of course, believers will experience a bodily resurrection (see 1Co 15).

The NIV translation "dead in your sins and . . . and in the uncircumcision of your sinful nature" suggests that "sins" and "uncircumcision" are the sphere in which death was manifested. It is perhaps better to follow ASV and read the text to mean dead by reason of trespasses and an uncircumcised (unregenerate or pagan) nature (cf. Ac 7:51).

The first part of v.13 affirms the readers' deadness through trespasses and their being made alive in union with Christ. The last part of this verse indicates that their being made alive involved the forgiveness of everything that had once alienated them from God. In other words, forgiveness and being made alive are two facets of the same act of divine grace.

Verse 14 vividly describes the attendant circumstances of forgiveness in Christ. One is the cancellation of "the written code." "Having canceled" (GK 1981) should be translated "canceling out" (lit., "wiping out"; cf. Ac 3:19; Rev 3:5; 7:17; 21:4); it specifies the act by which the forgiveness was carried out. What is canceled is called "the written code," an expression used of any document written by hand. This can be understood as an official written indictment or as a self-acknowledged state of indebtedness (like an IOU); in any case, it refers is to the Mosaic law. God has blotted it out so that it no longer stands against us.

Paul uses three expressions to describe the law: (1) It was written with "regulations" (cf. Eph 2:15). (2) It was "against us" (i.e., God's law had a valid claim on us). It was (if we follow the imagery of a "bond") like a promissory note having our signature attached as evidence that we acknowledged its claim and our debt. (3) It "stood opposed to us." This suggests that because we could not meet the claims of the law, it was hostile toward us or was an obstacle in our way.

Verse 14a has asserted that this bond or indictment has been "canceled out"; v.14b now adds that God (or Christ) "took it away, nailing it to the cross." In other words, the bond

(the Mosaic law) has been removed permanently, so that its claims against us can never again alienate us from God.

Paul's vivid metaphor of nailing the law to the cross has been variously explained. Some think it alludes to an ancient custom dictating that when decrees were nullified, a copy of the text should be nailed up in a public place. Others see here an allusion to the custom of hanging over the head of an executed person a copy of the charge on which he was condemned. When Jesus was crucified, the superscription nailed to his cross contained the words "The King of the Jews." Paul ignores the real superscription and imagines the law as nailed above the cross. That was, after all, the real reason why Christ was put to death—because of our sins against God's law. Still others understand the idea to be that the indictment was itself crucified.

To sum up, the great principle asserted in v.14 is the destruction of the law in and by the cross of Christ. The law, however, is viewed in a certain character (i.e., as a bond of indebtedness or as an instrument of condemnation).

15 The meaning of nearly every word of this verse is disputed. One of the key issues concerns the interpretation of "powers and authorities." The interpretation preferred here is that which sees these as hostile supernatural powers, i.e., as the hierarchy of spiritual forces that are in rebellion against God (see comment on 1:16; cf. 2:8; Eph 6:12). Paul affirms that Christ has "disarmed" (GK 588) these forces of evil. He has stripped the powers and authorities just as a conquered antagonist was stripped of his weapons and armor and put to public shame.

Paul goes on to say that God (in Christ) "made a public spectacle of them." That is to say, he exposed them to public disgrace by exhibiting them to the universe as his captives. The added words, "triumphing over them by the cross," expand this idea. The picture, quite familiar in the Roman world, is that of a triumphant general leading a parade of victory. The conqueror, riding at the front in his chariot, leads his troops through the streets of the city. Behind them trails a wretched company of vanquished kings, officers, and soldiers—the spoils of battle. Christ, in this picture, is the conquering general; the powers and authorities are the vanquished enemy displayed as the spoils of battle before the entire universe (cf. 2Co 2:14). To the casual observer the cross appears to be only an instrument of death, the symbol of Christ's defeat; Paul sees it as Christ's chariot of victory.

B. The Error of Legalism (2:16–17)

16 The false teachers at Colosse laid down rigid restrictions with regard to eating and drinking and with regard to the observance of the religious calendar. "Therefore" shows that this and the following warnings grow out of what Paul says of Christ's complete sufficiency in vv.10–15. He is particularly thinking of Christ's removal of the law and his triumph over the forces of evil (vv.14–15). In light of what Christ did, the Colossians were to let no one "judge" their standing before God on the basis of their observance or nonobservance of the regulations of the Mosaic law. In such matters the principle of Christian liberty comes into play (cf. Gal 5:1). The Christians at Colosse should assert their Christian liberty in the face of the errorists' attempts to undermine it (though see also Ro 14:13–21; 1Co 8:7–13).

"What you eat or drink" is probably a reference to the dietary rules in the Mosaic law about clean and unclean food, though it could also refer to the peculiar ascetic tendencies of the Colossian heresy that may have required abstinence from such things as meat and wine. The reference to "Sabbath day" points clearly to the Jewish calendar, for only Jews kept the Sabbath. That being the case, "religious festival" and "New Moon celebration" undoubtedly point to the ritual calendar of the Jews. Paul's thought is that the Christian is freed from obligations of this kind (cf. v.14; Gal 4:9–11; 5:1). No one, therefore, should be permitted to make such things a test of piety or fellowship (cf. Ro 14:1ff.).

17 All such OT legal stipulations were but "a shadow [i.e., an anticipation] of the things that were to come." Therefore to cling to the prophetic shadow is to obscure the spiritual reality of which those things were a prefigurement. "The reality" or the substance belongs to Christ. In him, the things to come have appeared (on this issue, see also Heb 8:5; 10:1). These two verses are an earnest appeal for "Christian liberty." But we should also note that the "liberty" Paul means is the opposite of license and has nothing akin to the miserable individualism whose highest ambition is to do just what it likes. Paul's whole aim is for the fullest, deepest, and most watchful holiness. He wants his Colossian converts above all things to be holy and to live a life in submission to their Redeemer.

C. The Error of Angel Worship (2:18–19)

18 Paul's third warning brings before us two of the most puzzling verses in the NT. The expression "disqualify [GK 2857] you" has been rendered in many different ways. A technical meaning of the clause is "let no one act as umpire against you," i.e., give an adverse decision against you. Perhaps it is only a stronger and more picturesque way of saying, "Let no one judge you" (cf. v.16). The essential meaning is, "Let no one deny your claim to be Christians."

The person attempting to make such judgment is described as one "who delights in false humility and the worship of angels." The context suggests that someone was seeking to impose these things on the Colossians, and that this was the means by which he was attempting to disqualify them for their prize. "False humility" may be a technical term for fasting, since in the OT this was the usual way for one to humble oneself before God. Whether this be so or not, the word in this context appears to denote a mock humility. "Worship of angels" is an allusion to the deference the heretical teachers paid to the hierarchy of spirit-beings who, in their system, filled the whole universe. Perhaps the "humility" and the "worship of angels" were closely related. That is to say, the heretics probably insisted that their worship of angels, rather than appealing directly to the supreme God of all grace, was an expression of humility on their part.

We see a further indication of the method of the false teachers in the words "goes into great detail about what he has seen." The heretical teacher possibly took his stand on imaginary or alleged visions; he "harped" on those visions, claiming more than he could prove. Paul goes on to depict the heretical teacher as inflated with conceit. "His unspiritual [lit., fleshly] mind puffs him up with idle notions." That mind is one dominated by the unrenewed nature, without spiritual enlightenment.

19 The false teacher lacked vital contact with Jesus Christ. This is profoundly serious because it is from Christ as Head that "the whole body [the church], supported and held together by its ligaments and sinews, grows." Each believer is thought of here as forming a vital connection with Christ the Head. Thus joined to him, they all become the joints and ligaments by which the church is supplied with energy and life. The heretical teacher, without this contact with Christ, has cut himself off from the source of spiritual vitality for God's people and cannot possibly contribute to their growth.

D. The Error of Asceticism (2:20–23)

Paul's fourth and final warning is against asceticism—the imposition of man-made rules as a means of gaining favor with God. For ascetics the body was a thing to be buffeted and punished, to be treated like an enemy. They saw the body as evil and concluded that the way to holiness was to deny all the body's desires, refuse its appetites, and cut its needs down to an irreducible minimum. Asceticism was apparently a prominent feature of the Colossian heresy—one that could easily lead to the deprecation of marriage, the exaltation of virginity and monasticism, and the devising of endless means of self-torture. Paul condemns asceticism and urges the Colossians to reject it as a way of life.

1. The Christian's death to the world (2:20–22a)

20 When one becomes a Christian, one's connection with the world of legal and ascetic ordinances is severed. Asceticism, then, is not in keeping with the nature and circumstances of the new life in Christ. Believers at the time of their conversion have "died" to all the rules and requirements of asceticism. In the mention of dying and rising (3:1) with Christ, there may be an allusion to Christian baptism (see comments on 2:12). However, baptism only pictures the death of believers to an old way of life and their rising to a new life; the actual change is effected when they are joined to Christ by faith.

As they enter into fellowship with Christ, they are delivered from "the basic principles of this world." "Basic principles" has the same ambiguity that marks it elsewhere (see comment on 2:8). It can be understood as referring to the supernatural powers of evil, but the passage also yields an acceptable meaning if it is interpreted as in the NIV. At any rate, to order life by ascetic rules is to revert to an inferior state supposedly abandoned at the time of conversion. To die to "the basic principles of this world" is to have all connections with them severed, to be done with them, to be liberated from their authority once for all. "Submit to its rules" (GK 1505) recalls v.14, where reference was made to the canceling out of the bond of ordinances against us. The Christian must not permit life to become a round of rules again.

21 The "rules" Paul had in mind are such decrees as "Do not handle! Do not taste! Do not touch!" The reference is to the dietary restrictions the errorists imposed as a means of attaining salvation. Some may have been reenactments of the Mosaic law; others were doubtless prohibitions stemming from pagan asceticism. There is a descending order in the terms, the climax being reached in the last word—i.e., "Don't even touch."

22a Parenthetically, Paul adds that all such things are "destined to perish with use." Dietary restrictions have to do with things made to be used; and with their use they perish, for food ceases to be food once it is eaten. The underlying thought, then, is that the restrictive regulations of the Colossian heresy deal with matters that are temporary and unimportant. Christ, in fact, has made all food clean (Mk 7:19).

2. The human origin of ascetic restrictions (2:22b)

22b Such regulative prohibitions as "Do not handle! Do not taste! Do not touch!" are "based on human commands and teachings." The rules of the ascetic are, both in origin and in medium of communication, strictly human.

3. The ineffectiveness of ascetic restrictions (2:23)

23 Ascetic rules masquerade as wisdom. On the surface, they seem to be reasonable and wise. But this is only an appearance of wisdom. In reality these rules are expressions of "self-imposed worship" and spurious "humility." The first expression denotes worship which people choose for themselves without authorization from God. The context suggests that the errorists engaged in such "worship" (cf. v.18) in the hope that they would thereby acquire superior merit before God.

"Humility" (GK 5425) must in this context refer to a mock humility (cf. v.18). The idea is that asceticism, while parading under the guise of humility, actually panders to human pride. "Harsh treatment of the body" is a reference to ascetic torturings of the body. "Lack any value in restraining sensual indulgence" translates a very difficult Greek construction. It suggests that the ascetics end up putting far more emphasis on the indulgence of the flesh than they ought to, and they are proud of it (cf. Gal 5:19–21).

To sum up, v.23 teaches that ascetic rules have the appearance of wisdom for many people in that they seem to be expressions of devotion to God, of humility, and of a commendable discipline of the body. Paul, however, declares that these regulations have nothing to do with real wisdom, and the worship and humility they seem to express are both spurious. His final appraisal is that asceticism is a dismal failure and not the way to spiritual victory. Christianity is not a religion of prescriptions but of a living relationship with Jesus Christ. This, of course, does not mean that once we are in Christ everything is permissible. That would amount to moral and spiritual anarchy, which is contrary to the very nature of the new life in Christ. It does mean that the controls of the Christian life spring from within and that genuine piety grows out of inward conviction generated by a consciousness of union with Christ. Indwelt by the Spirit, we walk by the Spirit and thus avoid carrying out the desires of the lower nature (Gal 5:16).

V. Appeal for Christian Living (3:1–4:6)

The apostle has refuted both the doctrinal and practical errors of the false teachers and, in the course of doing this, has given a profound exposition of the cosmic significance of Jesus Christ. In the present section, which is practical and ethical in its emphasis, he exhorts his readers to give outward expression in daily living to the deep experience that is theirs in Christ. The Christian life is a life "hidden with Christ in God," but it is still a life lived out on earth. Christians must therefore give attention not only to their inward experience with God but also to their outward relations with their fellow human beings.

A. The Root Principle of the Christian Life (3:1–4)

The opening verses of ch. 3 sustain close connection with the closing verses of ch. 2, where the apostle reminded the Colossians that ascetic regulations are of no real value in restraining the flesh. The only remedy for sinful passions is found in the believers' experience of union with Christ—a union by virtue of which the Christian dies to sin and to the world's way of thinking and doing. The opening verses of the third chapter, representing the positive counterpart of those verses, teach that this death with Christ involves also participation in his resurrection life. This releases into the believer's life a power that is more than adequate to resist the appetites and attitudes of the lower nature. These four verses, then, point to the believer's union with Christ as the root principle of the whole Christian life.

On the basis of this mystical but real experience with Christ, Paul urges the Colossians to seek heavenly things (v.1) and set their minds on them (v.2). As a further incentive, he reminds them that their lives are now securely hidden with Christ in God and thus belong to the invisible realm; they now live in a totally different sphere of being (v.3). Their lives, however, will not always be hidden in this way. When Christ appears, there will be a glorious manifestation of who they truly are (v.4).

1. Seeking the things above (3:1)

1 To set the heart on (lit., "seek"; GK 2426) things above is to desire and to strive for heavenly things. It is to see to it that one's interests are constantly centered in Christ, that one's attitudes, ambitions, and whole outlook on life are molded by Christ's relationship to the believer, and that one's allegiance to him takes precedence over all earthly allegiances. The description of Christ as "seated at the right hand of God" is another implied rejoinder to those who were seeking to diminish Christ's role as mediator, inasmuch as the right hand of God is a metaphor for the place of supreme privilege and divine authority.

2. Setting the mind on things above (3:2)

2 The NIV interprets the commands of vv.1–2 as essentially the same. There may, however, be a slight difference. Setting the heart on things above (v.1) is descriptive of one's aim for the practical pursuit of the Christian life. Setting the mind (v.2) on things above refers more to one's inner disposition. There is, of course, an intimate connection between the two.

To set the mind on (lit., "think on"; GK 5858) things above has the connotation of giving heavenly things a large place in one's thought life—seeing to it that the governing tendency of thought and will is toward God. This, of course, does not mean withdrawal from all the activities of this world to engage only in contemplation of eternity and heaven. The verses that follow make it quite clear that Paul expected Christians to maintain normal relationships in this world. But genuine Christians will see everything against the background of eternity.

"Earthly things" are not all evil, though some of them are. Even things harmless in themselves become harmful if permitted to take the place that should be reserved for the "things above." Here "earthly things" may be understood to include wealth, worldly honor, power, pleasures, and the like. To make such things the goal of life and the subject of preoccupation is unworthy of those who have been raised with Christ and look forward to sharing in his eternal glory.

3. The motivations for these actions (3:3–4)

3 One motive for seeking and setting the mind on the things above is the believer's union with Christ in death and in resurrection (2:20; 3:1). Verse 3 repeats and summarizes this theme. Since Christians have died with Christ, all that is alien to him should be alien to us. Death with Christ (2:20) is followed by resurrection with Christ (3:1), and so our lives are indeed "hidden with Christ in God." This suggests not only that our lives are secure, but also that they belong in a real and profound sense to the invisible spiritual realm. At the present time our connection with God and Christ is a matter of inner experience; one day it will come into full and open manifestation.

4 Another motivation to seeking and setting the mind on the things above is the prospect of the believer's future manifestation with Christ in glory. Christ is called our "life" because he is, quite literally, the essence of our lives. It is he who gives us life and nurtures it by his own continuing presence (cf. Ro 8:10).

"Appears" (GK 5746), one of several terms that refer to the return of Christ, emphasizes the open display of Christ at his coming. When Christ is thus manifested, believers also "will appear with him in glory." Then the world that persecutes believers will be blinded with the dazzling glory of his return.

B. Guidelines for the Christian Life (3:5–4:6)

Having reminded his readers of their vital union with Christ and the power and encouragement this gives to holy living, Paul now shows in a practical way how this principle of union with Christ is to be applied in daily life. In short, he teaches that the Christian's experience in Christ calls not simply for regulating the old earthbound life but for digging out its roots and utterly destroying it. In this way the new life in Christ will have full control over the believer. The underlying thought is: Let the life that is in you by virtue of your union with Christ work itself out and express itself in all your thoughts, actions, and relationships.

1. Sins of the old life are to be abandoned (3:5–11)

Paul speaks forthrightly about the demands of the new life and our urgent need to repress all the degrading tendencies of the old nature. The three imperatives of the paragraph ("put to death" in v.5, "rid yourselves" in v.8, and "do not lie" in v.9) are the pegs on which the thought hangs.

a. Sins to be put to death (3:5–7)

5 In principle when we became Christians, we died with Christ (cf. 2:20; 3:3). Now we are charged to "put to death" (GK 3739; lit., "to make dead") the old life in everyday practice. This verb suggests that we must not simply suppress or control evil acts and attitudes; rather, we are to wipe them out and completely exterminate the old way of life. The verb also suggests that we must do so in a vigorous, possibly painful act of personal determination (cf. the principle taught in Mt 18:8–9).

"Whatever belongs to your earthly nature" is defined by the list of sins placed in apposition with it in this verse. Paul is calling, then, not for the maiming of the physical body, but for the slaying of the evil passions, desires, and practices that root themselves in our bodies, make use of them, and attack us through them.

His catalog of sins is a grim one, and all of the sins, with the possible exception of the last, have to do with sexual vice. "Sexual immorality" translates the most general Greek word for illicit sexual activity (GK 4518). "Impurity" (GK 174), though sometimes used of physical impurity (Mt 23:27), here has a moral connotation. Including uncleanness in thought, word, and act, it has a wider reference than the previous word. "Lust" (GK 4079) means uncontrolled desire and has a negative connotation. "Evil desires" is similar to lust, but is perhaps more general in meaning.

"Greed" (GK 4432) suggests a desire to have more. It has a much wider significance than its English equivalent, denoting a ruthless desire for, and an intense seeking after, material things. Included in it is an entire disregard of the rights of others. This attitude is identified with "idolatry" because it puts self-interest and earthly things in the place of God.

6–7 Paul now mentions two factors that point out how improper it is for the sins listed in v.5 to exist in the lives of the Colossian believers. (1) Those sins incur "the wrath of God" (cf. Ro 1:18), a phrase that almost certainly refers to the eschatological wrath of God. "Is coming" (a present tense) may suggest that God's judgment on sin is already on the way, but more likely it depicts with vivid certainty that God's judgment will indeed someday fall on the disobedient. (2) Those sins characterized the pre-Christian experience of the Colossian believers (v.7). This kind of life belongs to the past, and Christians should be done with it. "Walk" (GK 4344) calls attention to outward conduct; "lived" (GK 2409), to the attitudes and feelings from which that conduct flows.

b. Sins to be put away (3:8)

8 Whereas the sins of v.5 had to do with impurity and covetousness, the catalog of v.8 concerns sins of attitude and speech. "But now" marks an emphatic contrast. The imagery in "rid yourselves" (GK 700) is that of putting off clothes—like stripping off from oneself a filthy garment. The believers in Colosse must shed the following sins from their lives.

The first three terms—"anger," "rage," "malice"—speak of sins of disposition. The first of these (GK 3973) may be the settled feeling of anger; the second (GK 2596), the sudden and passionate outburst of that feeling. "Malice" (GK 2798), a general term for badness, seems here to denote a vicious disposition, the spirit that prompts one to injure one's neighbor. "Slander" (GK 1060) denotes insulting and slanderous talk against one's fellowman. "Filthy language" (GK 155) may denote either filthy or abusive speech.

c. A sin to be discontinued (3:9a)

9a The sin of falsehood may be singled out because in it more frequently than in anything else we manifest ill-will toward our fellow human beings. Its being given separate treatment makes the condemnation of it more emphatic. The Greek construction used here suggests the translation "stop lying."

d. The reason: the new self (3:9b–11)

9b–10 Grammatically there is a strict connection between these verses and the prohibition against lying, though probably the "since" connects with the entire thought of vv.5–9a. The essence of it is that Christians have had a radical, life-changing experience in which they have put off the old self with its practices (i.e., habits or characteristic actions) and have put on the new self. The metaphor again is one of clothing. The "old self" is like a dirty, worn-out garment that is stripped from the body and thrown away. The "new self" (i.e., the regenerate self) is like a new suit of clothing that one puts on and wears. The picturesque language gives vivid expression to a great truth, but one must be careful not to press the imagery too far, for we are painfully aware that the old nature is ever with us.

The new self is described as "being renewed in knowledge." That is, the new self does not decay or grow old but by constant renewal takes on more and more of the image of its Creator. "Being renewed" (GK 363) expresses a continuous process of renewal. "Knowledge," the sphere of this process, denotes true knowledge (cf. 1:9).

11 The various groups mentioned reflect distinctions of national privilege ("Greek or Jew"), legal or ceremonial standing ("circumcised or uncircumcised"), culture ("barbarian, Scythian"), and social caste ("slave or free"). In the realm of the new self, where the image of God is truly reflected, these distinctions have no real significance (cf. Gal 3:28). Differences, to be sure, remain in the Christian community, but not in such a way as to be barriers to fellowship. To the extent that Christians do permit them to be barriers, they are acting out of character.

"Christ is all, and is in all" suggests that Christ is the great principle of unity. In him all differences merge, all distinctions are done away. Loyalty to Christ takes precedence over all earthly ties.

2. Virtues of the new life are to be cultivated (3:12–17)

a. Expressions of love (3:12–14)

12 Christians have already put on the new self (see comment on v.10). Now they must "clothe [them]selves" (GK 1907) with the garments that befit the new self. This verb should be compared with "put to death" (v.5) and "rid yourselves" (v.8). Those terms express the negative; this verse expresses the positive aspects of the Christian's reformation of character. The Greek verb suggests that this action should be undertaken with a sense of urgency.

Paul's appeal is based on this threefold fact: Christians are "chosen" of God, "holy" (set apart by and for God), and "dearly loved" by God. The three terms signify essentially the same great fact, but under different aspects. Used in the OT of Israel, they emphasize the favored position now enjoyed by Christians as the heirs of Israel's privileges.

Verse 12b contains five great Christian virtues: "compassion, kindness, humility, gentleness and patience." They point to those qualities of life which, if present in the community of believers, will reduce or eliminate, frictions. All of them are manifestations of love, mentioned in v.14 as the crowning virtue. "Compassion" (GK 5073 & 3880) betokens pity and tenderness expressed toward the suffering and miserable. The word for "kindness" (GK 5983) combines the ideas of goodness, kindliness, and graciousness. In Ro 11:22 it is contrasted with "severity," and in Gal 5:22 it is listed as a fruit of the Spirit. "Humility" (GK 5425) and "gentleness" (GK 4559), which are related terms, were not considered virtues by the pagan world. The NT, however, deepened and enriched their meanings and made them two of the noblest of Christian graces. Humility denotes a humble disposition (cf. Php 2:4–8). Gentleness is the opposite of pride and self-assertiveness and is the special mark of the one who has a delicate consideration for the rights and feelings of others. It is a characteristic of Christ (Mt 11:29), a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:23), and a distinctive trait of those who belong to Christ (Mt 5:5). "Patience" (GK 3429) denotes the self-restraint that enables one to bear injury and insult without resorting to retaliation. It is an attribute of God (Ro 2:4) and a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22).

13 Paul expands the idea of patience. Christians who are truly patient will willingly "bear with" (GK 462) those whose faults or unpleasant traits are an irritant to them, and they will "forgive" (GK 5919) those they have grievances against. "Forgive" is used in 2:13 of God's action toward us and has the sense of forgiving freely.

14 The final article in this description of Christian attire is "love" (agape, the distinctive Christian term for caring love; cf. 1Co 13; GK 27). All the virtues listed in vv.12–13 are, on the highest level, manifestations of love; but love is larger than any one of them, indeed, larger than all of them combined. The mention of love as a separate "article of clothing" is therefore not superfluous.

b. The rule of peace (3:15)

15 Those who see this verse as a continuation of the appeal for loving concern (v.14) among Christians are inclined to interpret "peace" to mean peace among the members of the Christian community. Those who understand it as introducing a new idea interpret "peace" as inward "heart" peace in the midst of life's adversities. Perhaps we should not limit the word but should understand it as denoting peace in the broadest sense. It is the peace "of Christ" because it is the peace he gives—peace that comes by way of obedience to him (cf. Jn 14:27).

The word for "rule" (GK 1093), an expressive term used only here in the NT, originally meant "to act as umpire." Scholars are not agreed whether in Paul's time the word retained the connotation of a contest or simply had the general sense of administering, ruling, or deciding (cf. also 2:18, where Paul used another form of it). Here it means that in all inner conflicts as well as in all disputes and differences among Christians, Christ's peace must give the final decision. We are to do nothing that would violate that peace.

The idea of being "thankful" (GK 2375) is added not as an afterthought but because gratitude is intimately associated with peace. The main idea here is being grateful for the peace Christ bestows on us. Thankfulness for this peace becomes an incentive for preserving it. Perhaps the injunction should be taken in its broadest sense: Be thankful—both to God and to others. Such gratitude surely promotes peace and harmony within a fellowship.

c. The indwelling of Christ's word (3:16)

16 All the preceding appeals (with the possible exception of that in v.15) have to do largely with duties Christians owe one another. Verses 16–17 focus attention on matters that have to do more directly with one's personal life. Even here, however, the thought of our duty to others is not entirely absent.

"The word of Christ" probably refers to the Gospel, i.e., the message about Christ (though it could also refer to Christ's own teaching as recorded or remembered by his apostles). We must submit to the demands of the Christian message and let it become so deeply implanted within us that it controls all our thinking.

In the remainder of this verse, "with all wisdom" belongs with "teach" and "counsel." The thought is that under the influence of the word of Christ Christians are to do two things: (1) Making use of every kind of wisdom, they are to teach and admonish one another. (2) Using psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs, they are to sing with gratitude in their hearts to God.

No rigid distinctions should be made between "psalms," "hymns," and "spiritual

Songs in the New Testament

Paul encourages believers to sing "songs, hymns and spiritual songs" (Eph 5:19; Col 3:16). The OT, of course, has an entire book of songs (the Psalms). But the NT also contains songs that God's creatures sing in praise of their Maker and Redeemer. This chart lists these songs; those about which scholars are uncertain are listed in italics.

Songs in the Gospels
The song of Mary	Lk 1:46–55
The song of Zechariah	Lk 1:68–79
The song of the angels at the birth of Jesus	Lk 2:14
The song of Simeon	Lk 2:29–31
The song of the crowds on Palm Sunday	Mt 21:9; Mk 11:9–10; Lk 19:31; Jn 12:13
Songs in NT Letters
Doxology to God	Ro 11:33–36
Hymn of love	1Co 13
Wake-up song	Eph 5:14
Hymn to the human and divine Jesus	Php 2:6–11
Hymn to Jesus as supreme Lord	Col 1:15–20
Hymn on the life of Jesus	1Ti 3:16
Songs in Revelations
Song of the four living creatures	Rev 4:8
Songs of the twenty-four elders	Rev 4:11; 11:17–18
Song of the four living creatures and the twenty-four elders	Rev 5:9–10
Songs of the many angels	Rev 5:12, 13; 7:12
Songs of the great multitude of saints	Rev 7:10; 19:1–3
Songs of the loud voice(s) in heaven	Rev 11:15; 12:10–12; 19:5
Songs of the seven angels (including the song of Moses and the song of the Lamb)	Rev 15:3–4, 6–8 songs." Paul is simply emphasizing the rich variety in Christian song. Essentially the three terms heighten the idea of joyousness called for in the passage. If any differences are made, "psalms" may be taken to refer to the OT psalter, "hymns" and "spiritual songs" to distinctly Christian compositions. The great periods of renewal in Christendom have always been accompanied by an outburst of hymnology. Christian hymns must express real emotion of the heart, adoration, and worship in a way that is worthy of our Savior.

d. The name of Christ (3:17)

17 Paul now gives us a kind of summary. There are various ways of interpreting "do it all in the name of the Lord Jesus." Some understand the meaning to be that everything a Christian does is to be undertaken in dependence on the Lord. Others think it means that everything a Christian does is to be done in recognition of the authority of Jesus' name. Still others take "in the name of the Lord Jesus" to mean "as followers of the Lord Jesus." This last interpretation reflects the thought that to act in the name of a person is to act as his representative. The last two interpretations are both acceptable, but the third is preferred. Paul is enunciating a general principle of Christian conduct, knowing that rules and regulations belong to a former dispensation and are not appropriate for the Christian life (see Gal 3:23–4:7). "Giving thanks" points to an essential accompaniment of acting in the name of the Lord Jesus—namely, that in everything we do we are to retain a sense of God's goodness and must thank him.

3. Family relationships are to be strengthened (3:18–4:1)

Several observations are in order as we approach this important paragraph. (1) We may see it as applying specifically to the general principle Paul set down in v.17. (2) The emphasis of the whole passage is on duties, not rights. (3) The duties are reciprocal—i.e., not all the rights are on one side and all the duties on the other. (4) The entire passage is remarkably similar to Eph 5:22–33, though it is much briefer. The chief difference is that in Ephesians, where Paul unfolds the Christian philosophy of marriage, he introduces a rather extended and beautiful statement about the church as the bride of Christ.

a. The wife's duty to the husband (3:18)

18 The one duty Paul enjoins on the wife is to "submit" (GK 5718), an attitude that recognizes the rights of authority. His main thought is that the wife is to defer to (i.e., be willing to take second place to) her husband. Yet we should never interpret this as if it implies that the husband may be a domestic despot, ruling his family with a rod of iron. It does imply, however, that the husband has an authority the wife must forgo exercising. In areas where one must yield—e.g., in the husband's choice of a profession or of a geographical location for doing his work—the primary submission devolves upon the wife.

Three things may be said about a wife's subjection to her husband. (1) The context shows that the wife's attitude is prompted and warranted by her husband's unselfish love. (2) The way in which Paul expresses this concept shows that the submission is to be voluntary. The wife's submission is never to be forced on her by a demanding husband; it is the deference that a loving wife, conscious that her home must have a head, gladly shows to a worthy and devoted husband. (3) Such submission is said to be "fitting in the Lord," i.e., it is becoming and proper not only in the natural order but also in the Christian order. This whole issue, then, is lifted to a new and higher level.

b. The husband's duties to the wife (3:19)

19 The ancient world was a man's world, and even among the Jews the wife was often little more than chattel. Paul's counsel in the present passage is in striking contrast to this. Husbands in that day often wielded an authority that others were bound to obey. While not openly challenging this assumption, Paul transforms it by the Christian principle of mutual love and deference.

Paul speaks of two responsibilities of the husband—one positive and the other negative. Positively, he urges husbands to "love [GK 26] your wives." This, of course, is their supreme duty. "Love" does not only denote affection or romantic attachment; it especially denotes caring love, a deliberate attitude of mind that concerns itself with the well-being of the one loved. Self-devotion, not self-satisfaction, is its dominant trait. Negatively, Paul urges husbands not to be "harsh" with their wives, using a word that suggests a surly, irritable attitude.

c. The duty of children to parents (3:20)

20 The one obligation Paul places on children is obedience to their parents. "Obey" (GK 5634) implies a readiness to hear and carry out orders; a child's ongoing responsibility is to listen to and carry out the instructions of his or her parents. Paul says two things about this obedience. (1) It is to be complete: "in everything." Paul, of course, sets this in a Christian context. He is dealing with the Christian home and presupposes Christian attitudes on the part of parents. (2) The obedience of children to their parents "pleases the Lord." In the Christian order, just as in the order under the law or in the natural realm, obedience to parents pleases God. The obedience of children is not, therefore, based on accidental factors, nor does it depend essentially on the parents' character. It is an obligation grounded in the very nature of the relationship between parents and children. It is a thing that is right in itself (see Eph 6:1–3). It is therefore especially pleasing to God when believing children are careful to fulfill this duty.

d. The duty of parents to children (3:21)

21 The specific mention of "fathers" suggests that the father as head of the household has a special responsibility for training the children. No slight toward the mother is intended, for Paul would surely have recognized her rights and the power of her influence in the home. In fact, "fathers" (GK 4252) occasionally has the broad meaning of "parents" (cf. Heb 11:23, where this word is used of the parents of Moses).

Fathers are not to "embitter" (GK 2241) their children. They must not challenge their children's resistance by an unreasonable exercise of authority. Firm discipline may be necessary, but it must always be administered in the right spirit. Parents should not give in to fault-finding, nor always be nagging their children.

The reason for this counsel is that "they will become discouraged" (GK 126). Parents can be so exacting, so demanding, or so severe that they create within their children the feeling that it is impossible for them to please. The Greek word used here has in it the idea of "losing heart" and suggests going about in a listless or sullen attitude. Paul may have had in mind the regimen of "don'ts" that loomed so large in the Colossian heresy.

e. The duty of slaves to masters (3:22–25)

22 Slavery, with all its attendant evils, was not only universally accepted in ancient times but also considered a fundamental institution, indispensable to civilized society. More than half the people seen on the streets of the great cities of the Roman world were slaves. And this was the status of the majority of "professional" people, such as teachers and doctors as well as menials and craftsmen. Slaves were people with few rights, mere property existing only for the comfort, convenience, and pleasure of their owners. Paul deals with their duty in the context of the family because slaves were considered a part of the household.

It is a matter of concern to some that neither Paul nor the other apostles denounced slavery and demanded its immediate overthrow. The apostles, however, were not social reformers; they were first and foremost heralds of the good news of salvation in Christ. Then again, the church was a very small minority in the Roman world, and there was no hope that its stance on the matter of slavery would influence Roman policies. We should be careful to understand, though, that they did not condone slavery. Indeed, they announced the very principles (such as that of the complete spiritual equality of slaves and masters) that ultimately destroyed the institution of slavery.

The one duty Paul presses on slaves is complete obedience—i.e., "in everything." He was obviously thinking of the Christian household and thus did not have in mind carrying out orders contrary to the principles of the Gospel. Christian slaves were not, of course, to obey such orders; no matter what their position in life, the Christians' highest duty is to God, and all lesser duties must give way to this (cf. Ac 5:29). The latter part of the verse insists that obedience of slaves is to be sincere, ungrudging, and rooted in "reverence for the Lord."

23–24 Slaves must see their service as a service rendered not to human beings but to the Lord. This would transform the most menial responsibilities and give dignity to all of their work. They would thereby be reminded of the reward that would be theirs for serving faithfully in Christ's name. On "inheritance," see comment on 1:12.

25 This verse, set in contrast to the preceding ones, shows that wrong will be punished, because "there is no favoritism" with God. Doubtless Paul meant this as a warning to Christian slaves not to presume on their position before God and to think that he would overlook their misdeeds, even if they were acting unscrupulously because of being treated unfairly. In the parallel passage in Ephesians it is the master who is reminded that there is no partiality with God (Eph 6:9).

The entire passage about the duty of slaves (vv.22–25) may seem completely irrelevant to our day. It contains, however, this enduring principle: Christians, in whatever work they do, must see it as a service rendered to the Lord. This is what motivates them to give honest, faithful, ungrudging work in return for the pay they receive. Moreover, passages such as this impart a sense of dignity in work, regardless of how unimportant that work may seem to be.

f. The duty of masters to slaves (4:1)

1 Now Paul turns to the duty of masters toward their slaves in terms of dealing justly and equitably with them. Though in the Roman world slaves had few rights, Paul does not hesitate to teach that duty is not all on the side of slaves. Masters too have obligations. Paul's reason for their being completely fair with their slaves is a compelling one: "because you know that you also have a Master in heaven." It is to God that Christian masters are accountable for how they treat their slaves. Both master and slave alike bow before one Master, with whom there is no "favoritism."

4. Christian duties are to be faithfully performed (4:2–6)

The immediately preceding paragraph (3:18–4:1) consisted of a series of special appeals based on the several relationships in the Christian household. Now Paul returns to advice that applies to the entire church. Most of what he says relates to the personal devotional life (vv.2–5), but the section closes with an appeal for wise behavior toward non-Christians (vv.5–6). The injunctions given in this paragraph touch the two extremes of life—the hidden life of prayer, and the outward, busy life of the marketplace and the street.

a. The duty of prayer (4:2–4)

2 Here is a general appeal for prayerfulness. The word for "devote yourselves" (GK 4674) is built on a root meaning "to be strong." It always connotes earnest adherence to a person or thing; here it implies persistence and fervor (cf. Ac 1:14; 2:46; 6:5; Ro 12:12). "Being watchful" (lit., "keeping awake"; GK 1213) suggests constant spiritual alertness. So Christians must be watchful and active in prayer, alive in the fullest sense, never careless, mechanical, or dull and heavy (cf. Mt 26:41; Mk 14:38; 1Th 5:6; 1Pe 5:8). "Being thankful" refers to the spirit in which prayers should be offered (cf. Php 4:6).

3–4 Paul requests prayer for himself while being imprisoned in Rome. His concern was that he and his associates might have clear opportunities for witnessing and that Paul might make clear the great secret ("mystery"; cf. 1:26; 2:2 with Eph 1:9; 3:1) of redemption in Christ in a worthy manner. There was no selfish motive behind this prayer; Paul's consuming interest was for the advancement of the Gospel, not for his own blessing.

b. The duty of witnessing (4:5–6)

These verses, with their call for discreet behavior in an unbelieving society, may reflect the fact that charges of misconduct on the part of Christians were being circulated. Therefore the Colossian Christians should be all the more cautious, living in so exemplary a way as to give the lie to such slander. In reality, Paul makes two appeals—one having to do with how. Christians are to live (v.5), the other relating how they are to speak (v.6). Careful attention to these matters will not only remove unfounded suspicions about Christians but also further the acceptance of the Gospel.

5 To "be wise in the way you act toward outsiders" is to show practical Christian wisdom in dealing with secular society. Paul's words imply that believers are to be cautious and tactful so as to avoid needlessly antagonizing or alienating their pagan neighbors. In a positive sense, these words also imply that believers should conduct themselves so that the way they live will attract, impress, and convict non-Christians and give the pagan community a favorable impression of the Gospel (see also 1Co 5:12–13; 1Th 4:12; 1Ti 3:7 for other passages where unbelievers are designated as "outsiders").

The verb in the statement "make the most [GK 1973] of every opportunity" is a market word that means "to buy out" or "purchase completely." So Christians, as an expression of practical wisdom, must buy up and make the most of every opportunity for witnessing to the faith. "Opportunity" (GK 2789) denotes either a specific point of time or a significant time, God's time. This latter meaning appears to be the preferred sense in the present passage.

6 Like his Lord and also like James the brother of the Lord, Paul knew how important the way Christians speak is (cf. Mt 12:36; Eph 4:24; Tit 2:8; Jas 3:1–12). Here he may well have had in mind the relation of the right kind of speech to witnessing. So their speech, he reminds the Colossians, must be always full of "grace" and "seasoned with salt." "Grace" (GK 5921), a word that usually denotes divine favor, seems here to be used in the broader sense of "pleasantness," "attractiveness," "charm," and "winsomeness." These ideas are all implicit in the word.

"Seasoned with salt" may mean that Christian conversation is to be marked by purity and wholesomeness. Some, however, understand "salt" in the sense of that which gives taste or flavor. Among the ancient Greeks "salt" could designate the wit that gives zest and liveliness to conversation. The remainder of v.6 tells why we should cultivate this kind of speech: "so that you will know how to answer everyone." Conversation must be appropriate for each person to whom we speak.

VI. Conclusion (4:7–18)

The body of the letter, in which Paul has met head-on the false teachers threatening the church at Colosse, is complete. By a powerful exposition of the sovereign lordship and complete sufficiency of Jesus Christ, Paul has refuted their so-called "philosophy" with all its attendant errors (1:15–2:23); he has set forth the nature of the Christian life, calling attention to its springs of power, its heavenly aspirations, and its distinguishing characteristics (3:1–17); he has shown how the lofty principles of the Gospel must affect relationships within Christian households (3:18–4:2); and he has earnestly exhorted his readers to pray (4:2–4) and given them practical advice for living in the pagan world (4:5–6). Now all that remains are some personal matters.

A. Commendations (4:7–9)

7 These commendations, given to ensure their welcome by the Colossian church, concern two men: Tychicus (vv.7–8) and Onesimus (v.9). The former, described by Paul as "a dear brother" and "a faithful minister and fellow servant in the Lord," was probably the bearer of both this letter and the one we know as Ephesians (cf. Eph 6:21–22). He was a native of the province of Asia and was earlier selected to be one of the two delegates of the churches who were to accompany Paul on his last visit to Jerusalem, probably as a custodian of the offering that was given by the churches for the needy in Jerusalem (Ac 20:4; 24:17; Ro 15:25–26; 1Co 16:1; 2Co 8–9).

"Dear brother" shows that Tychicus was a much-loved fellow Christian. "Faithful minister [GK 1356]" may identify him as a loyal servant of Christ, but more likely the expression marks his relation to Paul (i.e., "trusted assistant"). Earlier Paul had used the same noun of Epaphras (1:7) and of himself (1:23). "Fellow servant" (GK 5281) speaks of Tychicus both as a slave of Christ and as a comrade with Paul (cf. 1:7, where Paul used this word to designate Epaphras).

8–9 Paul explains a twofold purpose he had in sending Tychicus to the Colossians: (1) "that you may know about our circumstances," and (2) "that he may encourage your hearts." Accompanying Tychicus was Onesimus, the runaway slave who in the providence of God had met Paul in Rome and had apparently been led to Christ by him (see introduction to Philemon). Paul is now sending Onesimus back to Colosse—with no mention of his past, but with the heart-warming phrase that he is now "one of you."

B. Greetings (4:10–15)

10–11 In vv.10–15 six persons join in sending greetings to the Colossian church. Three of them—Aristarchus, Mark, and Jesus Justus—were Jewish Christians. Aristarchus, a native of Thessalonica who had been arrested at the time of the riot in Ephesus (Ac 19:29), accompanied Paul to Jerusalem (Ac 20:4) and later on was with him on the journey from Caesarea to Rome (Ac 27:2). Here Paul calls him his "fellow prisoner." This term may be interpreted either literally or spiritually (i.e., literally in prison with Paul or one who, along with Paul, had been taken captive by Christ). Mark, called here "the cousin of Barnabas," wrote the gospel that bears his name. He appears in the NT with some frequency, and we know more about him than about any of the others mentioned in this passage (cf. Ac 12:12, 25; 13:13; 15:37–39; 1Pe 5:13). Of Jesus Justus we know nothing beyond the mention of his name here.

There is a note of pathos in Paul's remark about these three: "These are the only Jews among my fellow workers for the kingdom of God." Paul felt keenly his alienation from his countrymen (cf. Ro 9:3; Php 1:15–17). But these three, he adds, "have proved a comfort to me," perhaps in a particular time of crisis when they stood by Paul.

12 Epaphras, mentioned in 1:7 as the founder of the Colossian church and as Paul's representative, is here described as "one of you" (cf. v.9) and as "a servant of Christ Jesus."

Paul reminds the Colossians that Epaphras was continually "wrestling" (GK 76; cf. 1:29 for the same word) for them in his prayers. He was concerned that they stand firm, mature, and fully convinced in relation to everything God wills. Undoubtedly he had in mind the possibility of their wavering under the influence of the heretical teaching at Colosse.

13 Paul confirms Epaphras's anxiety for the Colossians and assures them that "he is working hard for [them] and for those at Laodicea and Hierapolis." The expression used here suggests heavy toil to the extent of pain. Epaphras undoubtedly had experienced much emotional distress in reference to the people at Colosse.

Laodicea and Hierapolis were cities near Colosse. The former, which lay ten miles downstream to the west of Colosse, was situated on a plateau to the south of the River Lycus. On the other side of the river, six miles north of Laodicea, was Hierapolis. Laodicea was a city of great wealth and boasted a medical school. The church there received the sternest denunciation of all the seven churches of Asia in the book of Revelation (Rev 3:14–22). The name Hierapolis (the name literally means "holy city") suggests the city owed its initial importance to religion. In 133 B.C., this entire district became the Roman province of Asia.

14 Luke and Demas are mentioned next; no descriptive phrase is used of Demas (cf. Phm 24; 2Ti 4:10). Of Luke, Paul says very little. Interestingly enough, however, much of what we know about him is derived from this casual reference. It is here that we learn that Luke was a physician, and the context (cf. v.11) suggests that he was a Gentile. The adjective "dear" confirms what is implied in Acts; namely, that Luke—assuming that he was author of Acts—was a trusted friend of Paul.

15 Greetings are given to the Christian "brothers" of Laodicea, to "Nympha," and to "the church in her house." The reference to the church in Nympha's "house" is significant. There were, of course, no church buildings in apostolic times, and in the NT, "church" always designates an assembly of believers, never the place where they met. The location of Nympha's "house-church" is uncertain, though the context implies that it was in the vicinity of Laodicea.

C. Instructions (4:16–17)

These final instructions relate to three matters: the Colossian letter (v.16a), the letter from Laodicea (v. 16b), and advice to Archippus (v.17).

16 After reading this letter, the Colossian Christians were to see to it that it was read also in the Laodicean church. Perhaps they first made a copy of it to keep for themselves and then sent the original to the Laodiceans. In return, the Colossians were to read "the letter from Laodicea." Most likely Paul wrote to the Laodicean church a letter that has not been preserved (cf. also 1Co 5:9 and comment on that verse).

17 Archippus, to whom Paul sends a special message, appears again in Phm 2. From the context there some think he was a member of Philemon's household, perhaps even Philemon's son. The present verse implies that he had some ministerial responsibility in the Colossian church, though Paul gives no definite information about it. Perhaps he was serving as pastor in the absence of Epaphras. Paul tells the Colossian church to instruct Archippus to "complete" the work assigned him. Whether this implies a degree of failure on the part of Archippus or is written only to indicate Paul's full support of this man, we do not know.

D. Benediction (4:18)

18 When a stenographer's services were used to write a letter (as perhaps was Paul's custom; cf. Ro 16:22), it was normally the stenographer's task to compose the final greeting. Apparently, however, Paul regularly wrote the benediction in his own hand (cf. 2Th 3:11). So here at the end of this letter, he took the stylus and signed the letter in his own hand. The letter ends as it began, with the simple but profound prayer: "Grace be with you."

1 Thessalonians

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

First Thessalonians is most likely the earliest of Paul's letters. One may see a special appropriateness in this because these five chapters reveal so much of Paul's mind and heart. They contain a number of his characteristic doctrinal emphases and show the depth of his feeling for the Christians in Thessalonica.

Having been hindered by divine intervention from going into Asia and Bithynia, Paul arrived at Troas, probably in the spring of A.D. 49 (Ac 16:6–8). From there he was directed in a vision to cross the Aegean Sea into Macedonia and to take the Gospel there for the first time (Ac 16:9). That he did (Ac 16:10–11) is one of the crucial events in history because through it the Gospel moved to the west, and the evangelization of Europe began. The first stop of the missionary party of Paul, Silas, Luke, and Timothy was Philippi. After a successful mission there (Ac 16:12–40), lasting about two months, Paul and Silas left under pressure from the city officials and went westward along the Egnatian Way toward Thessalonica, a major center about one hundred miles away. It must have been a painful journey because of what they had suffered while in prison at Philippi (Ac 16:22–24; 1Th 2:2).

At Thessalonica they found circumstances suitable for settling down to preach for a time. The city was of good size, perhaps with a population of 200,000. Its location was conducive to commerce, having a good natural harbor. The city attracted sufficient Jewish merchants of the dispersion to account for the presence of a well-established synagogue (Ac 17:1). It was a free city ruled by its own council of citizens and administered by five or six "politarchs" (Ac 17:6). Since 146 B.C. it had been the seat of Roman government for all Macedonia.

The presence of a synagogue in Thessalonica offered Paul an obvious place to begin (Ac 17:1–4). So he pursued his approach of proving from the OT that the Messiah must suffer and be raised and that Jesus is this Messiah. In the meantime, he followed his own trade of manufacturing the goat's-hair cloth that was a prominent part of the local economy (cf. Ac 18:3; 1Th 2:9; 2Th 3:8).

For three consecutive Sabbaths Paul spoke in the synagogue, but met with the usual Jewish resistance. After those three weeks he was forced to leave the synagogue, but was still able to continue his ministry in the city for some time. Several factors point to this as the correct interpretation of Ac 17:1–4. (1) Paul engaged in gainful employment at Thessalonica (1Th 2:9; 2Th 3:8); two to three weeks are not sufficient time for settling into a trade. Furthermore, Paul used his working as proof of his self-sacrifice for them, something he could hardly have done during a limited stay. (2) Upon his departure from Thessalonica, he left a thriving church. This church included many Gentiles fresh from heathen idolatry (1Th 1:9). They could not have been won through a synagogue ministry. (3) Before leaving, Paul had received at least two special gifts from Philippi, a hundred miles away (Php 4:16). It is difficult to crowd the necessary trips into two or three weeks.

A good number of Jews, God-fearing Gentiles, and prominent women responded to the synagogue phase, including Jason at whose home Paul stayed (Ac 17:4–9). Many Gentiles became Christians in the weeks following (1Th 1:9). After approximately three months, the Christian assembly was of considerable size, and the Jews became unbearably jealous. So they instigated riots to force the politarchs to rule against the Christians, whom they accused of upsetting society and opposing Caesar's decrees (Ac 17:5–9). Jason and several other Christians were brought in for a hearing. The city officials, however, stood firm under pressure and eventually let Jason and the others go. Though not personally involved in this incident, Paul, Silas, and perhaps Timothy knew it was time to leave so as to avoid bringing additional hardship on their brothers in Christ (Ac 17:10).

From Thessalonica they traveled west fifty miles to Berea. Here their synagogue ministry was favorably received for about seven weeks, and it might have continued even longer if adversaries from Thessalonica had not heard of their success and come to disrupt their preaching. At this point Paul departed to Athens, but since Silas and Timothy had not been so conspicuous, they were able to remain at Berea (Ac 17:11–15). He sent instructions to Silas and Timothy to join him at Athens (Ac 17:15), which they did (1Th 3:1). The two were then sent back to Macedonia; Timothy's responsibility was to encourage the Thessalonian Christians and bring back a report about them. Paul had become concerned about the converts there because he knew they were suffering persecution (1Th 3:1–5). Silas was probably sent on a similar mission to Philippi.

While the two men were away, Paul had a relatively fruitless ministry at Athens (Ac 17:16–34). Leaving there, he went to Corinth (about January, A.D. 50), where he enjoyed a spiritually prosperous eighteen-to-twenty-month ministry. In the spring of 50 (Ac 18:5; 1Th 3:6–7), Timothy returned to Paul in Corinth and reported on Thessalonica; it was so encouraging that Paul wrote 1 Thessalonians almost immediately.

2. Authorship and Date

Few have questioned Paul's authorship of 1 Thessalonians. Ancient testimony favors Paul. The canons of Marcion and Muratori have this letter among Paul's works. Irenaeus quotes it by name, and Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria acknowledge it as Pauline.

Paul's initial visit to Corinth probably terminated shortly after Gallio became proconsul in that city (Ac 18:11–18). An inscription at Delphi, dated early in A.D. 52, calls Gallio proconsul of Asia at the time (a term that began in the summer of 51). Paul's trial before this man appears to have come when he was new to the city, because the Jewish accusers tried to take advantage of his inexperience (Ac 18:12–13). Paul's departure from Corinth was therefore in the late summer or early fall of A.D. 51. Since he spent eighteen to twenty months in Corinth (Ac 18:11, 18), he arrived there from Athens in late A.D. 49 or early A.D. 50.

Timothy joined him from Thessalonica a few months later. After Paul's departure from the Thessalonian city, news about the Christians there had spread far and wide (1Th 1:8–9). Also, a number of converts to Christ had died (1Th 4:13). From the late summer of A.D. 49 till the spring of A.D. 50 is enough time for these things to have happened,. Hence, we may place Paul's writing of 1 Thessalonians some time in the spring of A.D. 50.

3. Occasion and Purpose

Elements of Timothy's report (1Th 3:6–7) undoubtedly prompted Paul to write 1 Thessalonians. The most significant of these included (1) encouraging words as to the spiritual stamina of the Thessalonian converts in the face of fierce opposition (3:6–10), (2) an alarming report of efforts to undermine Paul's reputation and question his sincerity (2:1–12, 17–20), (3) confusion and discouragement regarding the Lord's return and the part of the dead in it (4:13–5:11), and (4) areas of individual and community life that needed improvement (4:1–12; 5:12–22).

In response to Timothy's report, Paul wrote this letter (1) to express satisfaction and thanks to God for the healthy spiritual condition of the church (1:2–10), (2) to make a strong case against the false insinuations against himself and his associates (2:1–3:13), and (3) to suggest specific ways in which the already strong Christian behavior of the Thessalonians could be improved as they lived a life of holiness (4:1–5:24).

4. Theological Values

The two Thessalonian Epistles contribute much toward our understanding of Paul's theological outlook. In them he touches briefly on a number of themes: the doctrine of inspiration and authority of Scripture (1Th 2:13; 2Th 2:15; 3:6, 17); the doctrine of one true God (1Th 1:9) existing in three Persons (1Th 1:1, 5–6; 4:8; 5:19; 2Th 1:1–2; 2:13); the doctrine of Jesus Christ's deity (1Th 3:11–12; 2Th 2:16–17); the doctrine of salvation based on Christ's death (1Th 4:14; 5:9–10; 2Th 2:13–14) and the believer's union and identification with Christ (1Th 1:1; 5:5; 2Th 1:1); and the doctrine of sanctification as it relates to personal purity (1Th 4:3–8), love (1Th 4:9–10), vocational diligence (1Th 4:11– 12; 5:12–15; 2Th 3:6–15), motivation (1Th 5:16–18), and other areas. Also, by example, he teaches lessons on discipling (1Th 2:1–12, 17–20; 2Th 3:1–5) and prayer (1Th 3:11–13; 5:23–24; 2Th 1:11–12; 2:16–17; 3:5, 16).

By far the largest theological contribution of these letters lies in what they say about eschatology. Perhaps the best way to summarize this is to survey Paul's use of various terms and themes relating to the end time. "Coming" or "presence" (parousia; GK 4242) is the most frequent term, sometimes referring to an examination of Christians before the Father and Christ (1Th 2:19; 3:13; 5:23), sometimes to the moment of the Lord's meeting Christians in the air (1Th 4:15; 2Th 2:1), and sometimes to Christ's triumphant conquest of "the lawless one" (2Th 2:8). From all this the dead in Christ will not be excluded (1Th 4:13–18). "Revelation" (apokalypsis; GK 637) occurs only once (2Th 1:7) and spans the entire period beginning with the Lord's coming from heaven for the saints till his appearance on earth to put down those who do not know God and those who do not obey the Gospel of Christ. Between these two points is a time of God's "wrath" (GK 3973) on earth (1Th 1:10; 2:16; 5:9). This outworking of God's vengeance against earth's rebels (2Th 1:8) is the initial phase of the "day of the Lord" and may come at any moment (1Th 5:2–3). It will mean "trouble" or "tribulation" (GK 2568) to the unrepentant (2Th 1:6)—a "sudden destruction," comparable to a pregnant woman's labor pains, that will culminate in "eternal destruction" or separation from the returning Lord and his glory (1Th 5:3; 2Th 1:9). While suffering through the period of wrath, the rebels will unite in a great apostate movement (apostasia; GK 686) and support the rise of a great figure who advocates opposition to God's laws (2Th 2:3–4). They will be captivated by his deluding words and activities (2Th 2:9–11). His high point in opposing God will be the abomination "that makes desolate" (Da 12:11) in the rebuilt Jerusalem temple (2Th 2:4).

The "righteous judgment" of God (2Th 1:5) assures a devastating penalty against the ungodly, but it also guarantees that believers will be counted worthy of God's "kingdom" (GK 993; 2Th 1:5; cf. 1Th 5:24), find rest from hardships (2Th 1:7), and experience salvation and glory (1Th 1:10; 5:9; 2Th 1:7, 10, 12; 2:13–14). Hence, they have every reason to persevere because they anticipate a deliverer who at any moment may summon them to meet him in the air (1Th 1:10; 4:15–17; 5:4, 9; 2Th 1:4–10). But anticipation that the Lord will return soon does not release Christians from everyday responsibilities. On the contrary, they must continue working and providing for themselves (1Th 4:11–12; 5:14; 2Th 3:6–15).

EXPOSITION

I. Salutation (1:1)

1 This salutation follows the form Paul used in all his letters and is in the same style as that of other letters of his time. It contains three elements: the writer, the recipient, and the greeting or salutation proper.

(1) Three names are given as the writer: Paul, Silas, and Timothy. Obviously absent is the official title "apostle" that Paul used in all his other letters to churches except 2 Thessalonians and Philippians. A reasonable explanation for this is that no note of authority was necessary in these letters, for in Macedonia his apostolic position never seems to have been questioned. There was, of course, opposition to Paul in Thessalonica (1Th 2–3), but it never became overt as in other places and his opponents never specifically attacked his right to apostleship.

The second name is that of Silas (spelled "Silvanus")—Luke consistently uses "Silas" (e.g., Ac 15:22; 16:19; 17:4; 18:5); Paul always uses "Silvanus" (2Co 1:19; 2Th 1:1). This colleague of Paul was most likely a Jew by birth, a gifted prophet, and one highly esteemed among the Jerusalem Christians (Ac 15:22, 32). He was inclined toward the Hellenistic wing of Palestinian Christianity, as evidenced by his concurring with the Jerusalem Council's decision concerning Gentile believers (Ac 15:22–32), his being a Roman citizen (Ac 16:37), and his being chosen as Paul's fellow worker on the second missionary journey (Ac 15:40–18:6). As an associate in the founding of the Thessalonian church, he endured cruel beatings, imprisonment, and pursuit by an angry mob (Ac 16:23–25; 17:5). Silas was known for his reliability and his faithfulness in risking his life in the service of Christ (Ac 15:25–27). He eventually became associated with Peter, especially in the composition and sending of 1 Peter (1Pe 5:12).

Paul's third colleague at this time was Timothy. This young man, having helped in Philippi, had apparently remained behind when Paul left that city (Ac 16:40). His name is not included in the account of the founding of the Thessalonian church (Acts 17:1-10), but he presumably joined Paul and Silas at Thessalonica later (for more on him, see introduction to 1 Timothy).

(2) Paul next refers to the recipients of the letter. "Church" (ekklesia; GK 1711) was applied to many types of public gatherings in the ancient Roman world, but after Pentecost it developed into a technical word for an assembly of believers in Christ. Literally, the word means "called out"; most likely something of this meaning is retained for the Christian "church" (Ac 15:14; Ro 9:24) as those "called out" from previous relationships in order to constitute a body with special relation to God (cf. 1Co 10:32). Sometimes ekklesia designates all Christendom and is a synonym for the body of Christ (Col 1:18, 24). At other times it is a particular assembly in a particular location (Ro 16:5; 1Co 16:19; Col 4:15). Finally, as here, it denotes all assemblies in a single city (Ro 16:1; 1Co 1:2).

This term is further defined as those "who are in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." This phrase tells of the spiritual quality of the believers. This is not a pagan or nonreligious assembly, nor is it a Jewish assembly; it is distinctly "in Christ Jesus" (2:14). Being in union with the Father and Christ meant a new sphere of life, on an infinitely higher plane. It should not be overlooked that the deity of the Son is taught here. Combining "God the Father" and "the Lord Jesus Christ" under one preposition ("in") demonstrates Jesus' equality with the Father and consequently his deity.

(3) Finally comes the official greeting. "Grace" (GK 5921) recalls the normal Greek greeting, and "peace" (GK 1645) the normal Hebrew greeting. "Grace" highlights unmerited benefits given by God to the believer in Christ. Through grace the lost are saved from their sins in the eyes of a holy God by a transaction completely free of charge. But grace does not cease here; it continually issues in privileges, one of which is "peace"—a word that has a deep and rich meaning. Differences separating God from his creatures had for centuries worked against peaceful relationships, but with Christ's introduction of the fullness of grace (Jn 1:17), the ultimate basis for resolving this conflict and establishing harmony between God and humankind was laid. Because of this harmony, human beings can also enjoy inward wholeness and tranquility.

II. Thanksgiving for the Thessalonians (1:2–10)

A. The Manner of Giving Thanks—Praying (1:2)

2 It was Paul's practice to begin his letters by thanking God for his readers. Paul found much in the lives of the Thessalonians to be grateful for. In fact, he kept on being grateful (cf. "always"). Nor was he alone in gratitude. The pronoun "we" includes Silas and Timothy as sharing his appreciation.

By thanking God at the beginning of the letter, Paul lifts the thought above the human level. He is not trying to win the Thessalonians over by rhetorical flattery (cf. 2:5). On the contrary, he is sincerely giving the ultimate credit to the One from whom spiritual progress comes. When Christians realize their complete dependence on God and keep this in clear focus, then and only then are they capable of moving on to greater spiritual exploits.

"All of you" expresses Paul's desire not to exclude any of the Thessalonian believers. Every single one of them, no matter how obscure, had certain qualities worth thanking God for.

Paul then begins to elaborate on this idea of thanksgiving. The means used to express their thanks was prayer. As he prayed with Silas and Timothy, they remembered the Thessalonian believers one by one with gratitude for their spiritual progress and with intercession for their advancement in the Gospel.

B. The Circumstances of Giving Thanks—Remembering (1:3)

3 Whenever Paul and his colleagues recalled the threefold nature of the Thessalonians' progress, they could not stop thanking God. Of course, Paul does not mean that they thought of nothing but the Thessalonians.

He rather uses the hyperbolic "continually" to indicate their intense interest.

The words "before our God and Father" show the sincerity and genuineness of this remembrance in prayer. Some in the Thessalonian church had questioned Paul's motives in dealing with them. So at the very outset, he dispels this suspicion, and he confronts it more directly in chs. 2–3 (cf. 2:5, 10; 3:9).

The substance of what Paul and his colleagues remember about the Thessalonians is summed up in three words: "work," "labor," and "endurance." In turn, these three reflect three qualities of Christian character: "faith," "love," and "hope."

The exact nature of the "work [GK 2240] produced by faith" is a combination of direct missionary work (cf. 1:8), acts of goodness toward others (cf. 4:9–10), and loyalty to Christ in the face of severe persecution (1:6; 3:3–4, 8). "Faith" (GK 4411) indeed manifests itself on a broad front. For Paul to appreciate works is not surprising. Even in Romans, so notable for its repudiation of any system of justification by works (Ro 3:20–21, 28; 4:4–6), Paul finds occasion to speak of "work" as the essential fruit of the believing life (Ro 2:7; 13:3; 14:20; cf. 1Co 3:14; Eph 2:10; Tit 3:1). This emphasis aligns him with James regarding Christian living and the absolute necessity of works accompanying faith to prove its vitality (Jas 2:14–26). Indeed, wherever genuine faith is present, it works (Gal 5:6).

"Labor" (GK 3160) that is "prompted by love" approximates the meaning of "work" but with a connotation of extraordinary effort expended. Love as it is meant here does not stop with ordinary effort, but goes the second mile and even beyond for the sake of another. "Labor" is more distinctly spiritual service—beneficial efforts to help the sick and hungry and intense devotion to spreading the Gospel despite persecution (cf. 1Co 3:8; 15:10, 58; 2Co 10:15; Gal 4:11; Php 2:16). However it showed itself, one thing is certain: a great spirit of self-sacrifice was present, because this is inseparable from Christian "love" (GK 27).

The supreme example of such loving self-sacrifice comes from no less than God the Father (Jn 3:16; 1Jn 4:10) and his Son Jesus (Jn 13:34; 15:12). This is no mere emotional response prompted by the desirability of the person loved, though feeling certainly is not absent from it. It is ultimately traceable to the will of the one who loves, for he or she determines to love and does so regardless of the condition of the one loved. Such is God's love for us, and so must be the Christian's love for others, if "labor" is to result. Remembering this attainment of their readers, Paul and his helpers had additional cause for thanking God.

"Endurance" (GK 5705) is the third visible fruit that evoked thanksgiving. This is an aggressive and courageous Christian quality, excluding self-pity even when one encounters severe trials in living for Jesus Christ. Endurance accepts the seemingly dreary "blind alleys" of Christian experience with a spirit of persistent zeal. It rules out discouragement and goes forward no matter how hopeless the situation. Such endurance is possible only when one is "inspired by hope in our Lord Jesus Christ." "Hope" (GK 1828), especially in the certainty of the return of Jesus Christ, is the only adequate incentive for this heroic conduct. Confidence about the future braces the child of God to face all opposition while persevering and continuing in the spread of the Gospel. Jesus' return and the encouragement it brings to believers are major themes in both 1 and 2 Thessalonian (1Th 1:10; 3:13; 4:13–5:11; 5:23; 2Th 1:4, 7, 10; 2:16).

These three Christian virtues—faith, love, and hope—occupy a large place in early analyses of Christian responsibility (cf. 5:8; 1Co 13:13; Gal 5:5–6; Col 1:4–5; et al.). The expectation was that in every life faith would work (Gal 5:6; Jas 2:18), love would labor (Rev 2:2, 4), and hope would endure (Ro 5:2–4; 8:24–25).

C. The Cause for Giving Thanks—Knowing (1:4–10)

1. The impressions of the missionaries (1:4–5)

4–5 If v.2b supplies the manner of thanksgiving and v.3 the occasion, v.4 gives its ultimate cause. Intuitive knowledge of the Thessalonian believers' having been selected by God was the source of the missionaries' constant prayer of thanksgiving.

A touch of tenderness, the first of many in these two letters, punctuates Paul's acknowledgment of the election of the Thessalonians. "Brothers" denotes the spiritual brotherhood into which all disciples of the Lord Jesus have been inducted (cf. Mt 12:46–50; Mk 3:31–35; Lk 8:19-21). That this form of address, a partial carryover from Judaism (cf. Ac 2:29, 37; 3:17), became frequent in early Christianity is attested by twenty-eight occurrences in these two letters. This address is intensified when "loved by God" is added to it (cf. Ro 1:7; 2Th 2:13). The specific form in which this expression occurs here lays emphasis on the active exercise of God's love as already consummated and resulting in a fixed status of being loved.

Though God is identified as the agent in loving, the agent of choosing is not specifically named. But the obvious inference is that God "has chosen" (GK 1724) them. "Loved by God" is suitable assurance that he also chooses, since his love and election are inextricably bound together (Ro 11:28; cf. 11:5). This is God's sovereign choice of certain individuals, including the Thessalonian believers, prior to Adam's appearance on earth (cf. Eph 1:4). Some would locate God's choice of the Thessalonians at their conversion or thereafter by defining the elect as those who continue in faith and persevere in obedience. But Paul speaks of their election as a thing of the past, not as dependent on any human response. Knowledge of this prior choice by God was the root of Paul's thanksgiving.

Paul cannot leave unproved so direct a statement regarding election. So vv.5–10 give two grounds for the knowledge just asserted. The former of these relates to the experience of the missionaries themselves when they first presented the Gospel (v.5). They had sensed an unusual divine moving such as occurred only in special cases.

Instead of writing, "We came to you," the apostle puts the messengers in the background by saying, "Our gospel came to you." The message deserved foremost attention. Eight times in two letters "gospel" (GK 2295) is used to refer to the good news of salvation through Christ. Once the good news is unqualified by any modifier (2:4). Three times it is called "the gospel of God" (2:2, 8–9), God being the author of the Gospel. Twice it is "the gospel of Christ [or our Lord Jesus]" (1Th 3:2; 2Th 1:8), Christ being the topic of the Gospel message. The other two occurrences (1Th 1:5; 2Th 2:14) use "our gospel," meaning "the gospel we preach." Paul makes no claim to having originated the Gospel; he claims only to be a staunch proclaimer of the glad tidings from the Father concerning his Son.

The Gospel made its way to the Thessalonians through the missionaries in a fourfold manner. (1) It came "with words." This is obvious, since words are basic to intelligent communication. But the Gospel's coming was not "simply" in word; speaking was only a part of the whole picture. Their preaching contained three other ingredients essential to the outworking of God's elective purpose.

(2) The Gospel came "with power" (GK 1539). This verse primarily points to the inward power with which the speakers were filled as they gave the message, a power that might show itself in a variety of ways. This made the speakers aware of God's special involvement in the Gospel and its presentation.

(3) The spoken word is also personal, for the message came "with the Holy Spirit." This Person certainly was behind the power just named. Yet he is much greater and more versatile than the subjective power he produces. He is part of the Godhead and supplies a sense of divine reality to the spoken message.

(4) Growing out of the Spirit's special activity is "deep conviction [GK 4443]," which means that the preachers possessed perfect assurance as to the truth and effectiveness of their message. Such subjective certainty, sensed by Paul and his associates, served as a major ingredient of this first proof that these readers had been chosen by God.

"You know how we lived among you for your sake" draws on the Thessalonians' innate awareness of what Paul, Silas, and Timothy became while with them, so as to substantiate the sort of inner transformation God had wrought. Throughout the letter Paul carries his readers along with him by such expressions as "you know," which he uses as a precaution against those who might disagree (cf. 2:2, 5; 3:4). The quality of life shown by the missionaries had in itself been sufficient vindication of their sincerity and of the message they preached. Their attitudes were completely unselfish.

2. The effect on the Thessalonians (1:6–10)

The second proof of election lies in the effect of the Gospel on those evangelized (vv.6–10): (1) They "welcomed the message" and were converted. (2) They did so "in spite of severe suffering." (3) In difficult circumstances they had a joy that could only be "given by the Holy Spirit." (4) They rapidly became "imitators" of Paul and also the Lord. (5) They grew to a point of becoming a "model to all the believers in Macedonia and Achaia." Such a complete transformation happens only when God's elective purpose is at work in people.

a. Their transformation (1:6–7)

6–7 In v.6, Paul introduces a new point in his explanation of how he knew God had chosen the Thessalonians (cf. v.4). In a relatively short time they "became imitators" (GK 3629). Now their lifestyle was completely different from what it was before the Gospel came to them, because their conversion led them to imitate Paul and his companions. Paul repeatedly encouraged this wholesome following of examples (1Co 4:16; 11:1; Gal 4:12; Eph 5:1; Php 3:17; 4:9; 1Th 3:12; 2Th 3:7, 9). He did not hesitate to present himself as one to be copied, for he patterned his own life after Christ's (1Co 11:1). That is why he added "and of the Lord" here. The notion of imitating God and Christ applies to holiness (1Pe 1:15–16), love (Mt 5:43–48; Lk 6:36; Jn 13:34; 15:12), and suffering (Mt 16:24–25; Mk 10:38–39; Lk 14:27; Jn 15:18–20; 1Pe 2:18–21)—three areas touched upon later in this letter: holiness in 3:13; 4:3, 7; love in 3:12; 4:9–10; and suffering in 3:2–4.

Spiritual advance was possible for the Thessalonians only after they first "welcomed the message" preached by the missionaries. Even after their conversion, their response to the message was just as enthusiastic, though this response entailed "severe suffering." "Suffering" (or "tribulation"; GK 2568) plays a large part in these letters (1Th 1:6; 3:3–4, 7; 2Th 1:4, 6–7) because persecution was so common (Ac 17:5–9) and grew so intense as to be comparable to the bitter opposition by the Jews against the Lord Jesus and the Judean church (1Th 2:14–16). Christ's enemies would do anything to make life miserable for Christians. Yet instead of misery the Thessalonians displayed a "joy given by the Holy Spirit"; such a response defies natural explanation. The same One who gave Paul and his companions power for proclaiming the Gospel (v.5) dwelt within those who received the Gospel and transformed them.

The greatest attainment for these new Christians was becoming for others what Paul and his companions had been for them (v.7)—"a model" (GK 5596) to Christians throughout Greece. This word suggests an exact reproduction. Christians in Philippi, Berea, Athens, Corinth, and elsewhere in Macedonia and Achaia did well to look to Thessalonica.

b. Their witness (1:8–10)

8–10 In describing how the Thessalonians were a model Christian community and giving further proof of the effect of the Gospel on them, Paul gives another indication of their election (cf. v.4): a vigorous propagation of their faith. Their progress was remarkable in that what Paul and his companions had preached (v.5) and the Thessalonians had received (v.6), they were now sharing on the widest scale possible. "The word [NIV, "message"; GK 3364] of the Lord" is used extensively in Acts to describe the spreading Gospel message (Ac 8:25; 13:44, 48–49; 15:35–36; 16:32; 19:10, 20). Paul affirms that these converts played a substantial part in this ever-widening scope of Christian witness.

With Thessalonica as the starting point, the message "rang out" (v.8) like trumpets that keep on sounding. The range of their persistent testimony was ever increasing—"not only in Macedonia and Achaia . . . everywhere." So impressed is Paul with how far the Gospel had progressed through the Thessalonians' faithful witness that he obviously indulges in a kind of hyperbole, for "everywhere" is clearly not worldwide in scope; e.g., in writing Romans some five years later, Paul said that Spain had not yet been evangelized (Ro 15:19–20, 24). Part of the Thessalonians' outreach stemmed from their location on the Egnatian Way and the Thermaic Gulf with access by sea to the whole Mediterranean world. But the largest factor was their diligence in communicating their faith to others. This was probably reported to Paul by Silas and Timothy on returning from Macedonia (Ac 18:5; 1Th 3:6).

So carried away with the Thessalonians' witness was Paul that he lengthened his sentence by adding, "Your faith in God has become known." News of this believing relationship constituted part of "the Lord's message" that had issued from them. So prominent was their witness that Paul and his companions did not need to speak of it, though Paul later did so (cf. 2Co 8:1–2).

Instead of Paul's telling others what had happened in Thessalonica, others were giving him a twofold report about this Macedonian city. They described how Paul, Silas, and Timothy had entered the city (cf. v.5), and how this church had turned to God from idols (v.9). Here Paul, who most often refers in a positive way to conversion as believing (cf. 1:7), uses a specific word for turning away from error and toward God (GK 2188; cf. Ac 14:15; 26:18, 20; 2Co 3:16). His mention of "idols" shows the Thessalonians' Gentile origin, since idol worship did not dominate the Jews after the Babylonian exile. It also raises the question as to whether these are the same "God-fearing Greeks" (Ac 17:4) who were among Paul's original converts. Normally "God-fearers" had already separated themselves from idolatrous paganism because of their affiliation with a Jewish synagogue. Yet their release from past darkness may not have been total until secured by their relationship to God through Jesus Christ. Also, probably included in the Thessalonian church were additional Gentile converts who had no previous contact with Judaism.

Two purposes in the Thessalonians' turning to God are given: "to serve [GK 1526] the living and true God" (v.9) and "to wait for his Son from heaven" (v.10). Service to God speaks of utter devotion and recognition of his rightful lordship over humankind. He alone is worthy of this, for he is "living," in contrast to lifeless idols, and he is "true," in contrast to counterfeit representations of himself.

The second purpose strikes a doctrinal note prominent throughout the remainder of the letter. In his second missionary journey Paul stressed eschatological events surrounding the return of Jesus Christ from the Father's right hand in heaven (cf. Ac 17:7, 31; 1Th 2:19; 3:13; 4:15; 5:2, 23; 2Th 2:1, 8). Early Christianity universally held that the resurrected and ascended Christ would return as King, and their expectancy of this event implied its nearness. For Paul to include himself and his readers among those to be rescued from the coming wrath (cf. "us," v.10) shows that they expected this to happen before their death. Had Jesus never been raised from the dead, he could never return; but since he had been raised, his future reappearance is guaranteed.

It is not some mystical spirit but the historical person "Jesus" who will return as rescuer of living Christians from the period of divine wrath at the close of the world's present age of grace. "Wrath" (GK 3973) is frequently used in the NT as a technical term for the period just before Messiah's kingdom on earth, when God will afflict earth's inhabitants with an unparalleled series of physical torments because of their rejection of his will (Mt 3:7; 24:21; Lk 21:23; Rev 6:16–17). That wrath is pictured as already on its way and hence is quite near. Throughout the letter, the events of Jesus' coming are imminent (cf. 4:15, 17). The world was on the brink of being plunged into an unexpected time of trouble (cf. 5:2–3). Such was the outlook of early Christendom and such is always a proper Christian anticipation.

Rather than fearing this time, however, Christians find an incentive to persevere (cf. comment on 1:3), because for them it will mean rescue rather than doom. Not even the stepped-up persecution of Christ's followers that will mark this future period will touch them, for their deliverer will remove them from the scene of these dreadful happenings.

III. Vindication Before the Thessalonians (2:1–3:13)

A. Vindication Through Methods (2:1–12)

Having explained why he and his colleagues were thankful (1:2–10), Paul now takes up one of the main purposes for writing the letter—a lengthy vindication of their character and ministry (chs. 2–3). Chapter 2 expands on ch. 1—especially on 1:5–10, for 2:1–12 looks into Paul's coming to Thessalonica and his conduct there (cf. 1:5, 9a) and 2:13–16 turns attention to the Thessalonians' response (cf. 1:6–8, 9b–10). Yet ch. 2 does not just repeat the same ground. In ch. 1 Paul's coming and the peoples' response are intended to show a knowledge of election (1:4), whereas in ch. 2 the same themes establish Paul's defense against insinuations about his alleged ulterior motives.

1. Preaching, replete with power (2:1–2)

1–2 The identity of Paul's Thessalonian opponents is a difficult puzzle to piece together.

Most likely they were the Jews who were continuing adversaries of Paul, even after he left Thessalonica (cf. 2:14–16). They were so intent on destroying the work he had started that they persistently hurled accusations at him and labeled him another self-seeking religious propagandist. They distorted his teaching by accusing him of treason while he was still in the city (Ac 17:7). Subjected to a constant barrage of accusations, Thessalonian Christians easily began to question Paul's sincerity. There is no evidence of organized opposition within the church, yet Timothy apparently brought back news (3:6) that some uncertainty had arisen within it as to whether Paul's concern for it was genuine. This is not to say that his relations with the readers of the letter were no longer cordial (cf. 3:6), but symptoms of estrangement had appeared that could have led to an open rift unless treated immediately.

In light of this development, Paul again addresses his readers as "brothers" and reminds them of conditions throughout his initial visit. Special concern that his readers recall certain matters for themselves is evident in the recurrence of "you know" (vv.1–2, 5, 11; cf. vv.9–10 as well).

They are called to witness that Paul's initial "visit" to them "was not a failure." The word for "failure" (GK 3031) suggests "void of content" or "empty," especially since v.2 contrasts their boldness and earnestness in ministry. The opposite of an empty ministry is one in which no obstacle or threat is sufficient to deter the speaker of God's Gospel (v.2). In Philippi, Paul and Silas had been beaten and severely flogged; they had been put in prison with their feet in stocks (Ac 16:22–24) and cruelly mistreated because they had rescued a slave girl in the name of Jesus Christ. They had also been insulted by being arrested unjustly, stripped of their clothes, and treated like dangerous fugitives. Their Roman citizenship had been violated, and for this Paul demanded restitution (Ac 16:37). Still staggering from these injuries and indignities, the two came to Thessalonica. Under such conditions, most people would have refrained from repeating a message that had led to such violent treatment, but not these men. With God's help, they mustered sufficient courage to declare in this new city their Gospel from God.

Here in Thessalonica they again encountered "strong opposition [GK 74]"—a word that pictures an athlete's struggle to gain first place in a race or contest. Paul's conflict came from outward persecutions and dangers originated by his Jewish opponents (cf. Php 1:30). While Luke does not mention such opposition in Thessalonica (Ac 17:1–10), it is clear from this letter that such did come. In spite of it, however, Paul's inner help from God produced a continuing proclamation of the Gospel.

2. Preaching, removed from untruth (2:3–4)

3–4 Not only was the preaching of Paul and his companions filled with power and earnestness when they evangelized Thessalonica (vv.1–2), but wherever they went it was above suspicion of any kind (vv.3–4). The boldness just described was possible because God, who tests a person's motives, had approved their fitness to preach the Gospel.

"Appeal" (GK 4155) hints at the gently persuasive form of Paul's preaching, which always addressed the will in quest of a favorable decision, but included the intellect as well. Persuasion, however, can be of various types, both wholesome and otherwise. Paul and his fellow workers had apparently been accused of appealing on wrong grounds. The damage from this accusation he was quite anxious to repair.

First to be corrected was the claim that his appeal arose from "error" (GK 4415). Paul maintains that his message agreed perfectly with truth. He next answers his opponents in the matter of "impure motives" (GK 174), a word that has connotations of sexual impurity. Doubtless, Paul's enemies were attacking him on many fronts, including this sin so prevalent among traveling religious teachers. The apostle disclaims anything of this type as a motive for his missionary activities.

He further denies any attempt to use deceit so as to "trick" his listeners, even though he was accused of doing so on more occasions than this (cf. 2Co 4:2; 12:16). In seeking intelligent decisions from his hearers, he presented facts in their true light. The missionaries were so open and honest that an omniscient God had found them worthy "to be entrusted with the gospel" (v.4). To be "approved [GK 1507] by God" entails a process of testing, success in completing the tests, and a consequent state of endorsement by God. After calling Paul on the Damascus road, God subjected him to necessary rigors in order to demonstrate his capability for his assigned task. Having thus prepared him, he committed to him the Gospel message to proclaim among Gentiles. On the basis of this commission, the missionary team spoke wherever they went. They did nothing superficial just "to please men." Ultimately, they sought God's approbation (cf. 1Co 4:2–5). This kind of goal excluded anything hidden from the eyes of him "who tests our hearts." The scrutiny of a God who is able to sound the depths of every thought (cf. Ro 8:27) is Paul's ultimate court of appeal to prove his absolute sincerity.

3. Preaching, reinforced by godly concern (2:5–12)

Godly concern for his listeners underscores more forcefully than anything else the legitimacy of Paul's missionary methods. Starting with v.5, he explains how his general policy of vv.3–4 was applied in Thessalonica. He begins by denying allegations against his character (vv. 5–7a), and he then goes on to present the true picture (vv.7b–12).

a. Evidenced by the absence of lower motives (2:5–6)

5–6 In the first of three denials, Paul calls his readers to verify his complete abstinence from any type of "flattery" (GK 3135)—the insidious practice of saying nice things in order to gain influence over others for selfish reasons. Paul wants them to confirm that he was never guilty of this practice.

Second, he denies putting on the kind of mask that "greed" (GK 4432) would wear. The greed of which he was accused includes more than just avarice or love of money. It denotes self-seeking of all types, a quest for anything that brings self-satisfaction. It grows out of complete disinterest in the rights of others—an attitude foreign to Paul and his helpers. Only God can verify inner freedom from greed, so Paul calls on God as witness.

Third, Paul disavows the desire for "praise [GK 1518] from men" (v.6). The world of Paul's time was filled with wandering philosophers, prophets of other religions, magicians, false prophets, and others seeking not only financial gain, but also the prestige of a good reputation. Divine approval (cf. v.4), not public esteem, was what motivated Paul and his companions.

Grammatically, it is best to see "as apostles of Christ we could have been a burden to you" as completing the sense of v.6, and it should begin with the word "although." The word "apostles" (GK 693) is used here in its nontechnical sense (see comments on Ro 16:7; Gal 1:1), and the word "burden" (GK 983) has primary reference to apostolic dignity. Paul, Silas, and Timothy could legitimately have claimed the dignity associated with their apostolic office. The important position of Paul and his colleagues as Christ's representatives earned for them the right to receive special respect, but they did not stand on this right. So this is further evidence that they were not prompted by lower motives.

b. Evidenced by the presence of higher motives (2:7–12)

7 Not only was the godly concern of Paul and his helpers proved by their freedom from lower motives (vv.5–6), but also by their higher motives (vv.7–12). The apostle now takes up a positive description that the Thessalonians were bound to agree with because of their own observations—"you remember" (v.9); "you are witnesses" (v.10); "you know" (v.11). When they were with these Macedonians, Paul and his helpers were gentle, not authoritarian (v.7). They demonstrated an utmost tenderness, comparable to that of a mother nursing her own children. The figure implies a special effort to protect one's children and to provide for their every need, even to the extent of great sacrifice.

8 The manner of gentle treatment involved a willingness to share with the Thessalonians both the Gospel of God and their own lives; that is how much they loved them. The missionaries constantly yearned for these people, so much so that they found it a continual delight to share their whole beings with them. "Lives" (GK 6034) conveys more than just their physical lives; in the depths of their being they cared "because [the Thessalonians] had become so dear" to them.

9 Paul now recalls the long hours, day and night, of extreme toil and hardship by which he, Silas, and Timothy supported themselves while preaching. He takes the single item of self-support as evidence of his broader concern for the Thessalonians. "Toil" (GK 3160;

cf. 1:3) emphasizes the fatigue they incurred in expending themselves, while "hardship" (GK 3677) highlights external difficulties encountered in the process. As in 2Th 3:8, the combination describes the apostles' efforts at providing their own upkeep, an example much needed by some in Thessalonica (1Th 4:11–12; 5:14; 2Th 3:6–15). Paul's work was tentmaking (Ac 18:3), probably meaning the production of tent material from animal hair or skins. Part of a Jewish child's upbringing was learning a trade, and Paul was no exception to this. He did receive some financial help from the Philippian church while he was in Thessalonica (Php 4:15–16), but not enough to permit him to stop working. Apparently his wages were so low that he needed gifts to enable him to take some time off for preaching (Ac 18:5). Though missionary service includes the right to support from others (1Co 9:3ff.), Paul did not always use that right (cf. Ac 20:34–35; 1Co 4:12; 2Co 11:8).

By this "around-the-clock" diligence Paul lifted the burden of support from his converts. His central purpose was to give people the Gospel of God. From this nothing should detract, and making the Gospel "free of charge" (1Co 9:18) eliminated charges of selfish motives.

10 Paul appeals to the Thessalonians as witnesses of how both the missionaries' religious piety and moral conduct among them could not be faulted. God also is called to attest to whatever was hidden to human eyes. All this was for the sake of the believers.

11–12 A further comparison enlivens Paul's expression of concern. He changes his metaphor from a mother's tender care (v.7) to that of a father dealing with his children individually. Christians need fatherly teaching and advice as well as motherly care.

The fatherly treatment included encouragement, comfort, and urging. "Encouraging" (GK 4151) can in some contexts signify a note of comfort, but here it has the hortatory flavor of "admonishing." "Comfort" (GK 4170) is covered by the next verb. "Urging" (GK 3458) adds a note of authority. These actions were more than mere requests. Their goal was a worthy lifestyle. "Live lives" represents the figure of "walking around" (GK 4344), a common way of designating one's conduct. In reference to the Christian life, it relates primarily to the moral sphere. Conduct should be on the plane of God's standards.

God calls (GK 2813) believers "into his kingdom and glory." This is an incentive to a high quality of life. Paul is looking back to the time when God first called his readers to salvation, a call that is always effectual. In one sense God's kingdom is already present (see comment on Mk 1:15), but ultimate realization of the messianic kingdom with its future glory is in view here (cf. Ac 17:7; 28:23). As frequently occurs in these two letters, those Paul is addressing are pointed to the bliss ahead as an incentive to godly living now. "Glory" is that unhindered manifestation of God's presence in which believers will share (Ro 5:2; 8:18).

B. Vindication Through Their Thanksgiving (2:13–16)

1. For the ready acceptance of the Word of God (2:13)

13 Having already thanked God in 1:2–3 for their progress, Paul now does so again by alluding to 1:5–10, which describes specifically how the Thessalonians so rapidly entered on a Christian way of life. Now he cites their ready acceptance of the word of God (cf. 1:6)—not in proof of their election as in ch. 1, but to show the reason for his sincere gratitude for them.

Because of the deep personal commitment that he and his helpers had to the work at Thessalonica, Paul could write, "We also thank God continually." "Also" connotes "on our part." The missionary team's reaction to the Thessalonians' ready response to the word was incessant thanksgiving. The spotlight now shifts from the evangelizers (vv.1–12) to those evangelized (vv.13–16).

The cause of thanksgiving having already been given in vv.1–12, the word "because" introduces the content of thanksgiving (the word for "because" should be translated "that"). Paul not only refers to an objective reception of the word of God, but also a subjective acceptance in their hearts. The latter, a wholehearted welcome, indicated their high estimate of God's word. They had heard the word preached by the missionaries, but ultimately it was the word of God that they heard. Here is indication of Paul's consciousness of his own divinely imparted authority

(cf. 1Co 14:37). His preaching was not the outgrowth of personal philosophical meanderings, but was deeply rooted in a message given by God himself. What had been delivered to him through others (e.g., 1Co 11:23; 15:1, 3) and from the Lord directly (e.g., 1Th 4:15), he passed on to others. Such traditions were in turn taught to still others. Some teachings were put in written form and became part of the NT canon (cf. 2Ti 2:2; 2Pe 3:15–16).

Once received, this word of God becomes an active power operating continually in the believer's life. When it is at work in believers, there is a change in behavior and constant fruitfulness.

2. For their endurance under persecution (2:14–16)

14 The word "for" confirms the principal statement of v.13—their ready acceptance of God's word. Welcoming the word and enduring sufferings because of it often go together. The stature of the Thessalonians as "imitators" had already been established in the past (cf. 1:6). Deliberate imitation of sufferings for sufferings' sake is an unworthy Christian objective, but imitation of a Christian lifestyle is legitimate and desirable. Persecution inevitably arises when Christians pattern their lives after the Lord.

Paul tenderly reminds these brothers that they were not the first to be afflicted. "God's churches in Judea, which are in Christ Jesus" had been the first, and through faithful endurance they had become an example of what Jesus had predicted about the suffering entailed in discipleship. Apparently the way these earliest Jewish Christians handled themselves had become widely known, even before Luke wrote Acts (about A.D. 62). Paul's sympathy toward and harmony with Judean Christianity, whose bitter opponent he had been before conversion, are hereby assured, and the unity of all Christians, no matter what their ethnic background or geographical locality, underlies this description of their common experience in suffering. Hearty acceptance of God's message, which is so often accompanied by adversity, is the very thing that ensures one against falling away when adversity arises (cf. Mt 13:20–21; Lk 8:13).

Both the Thessalonian churches and the churches in Judea suffered persecution from fellow-countrymen. For the Thessalonians these were predominantly Gentiles, though Jews also had been instrumental in stirring up opposition in that city (Ac 17:5–9). For the Judean churches, opposition had come from those of a Jewish background, who were also strong advocates of the Jewish religion that Christianity so strongly threatened.

15–16 Mention of "the Jews" (v.14) furnishes Paul an occasion to digress slightly and deliver a violent criticism of this persecuting element among them. Such harsh language is markedly out of character for Paul as we know him from his other writings. He is renowned for his desire to see the salvation of his blood relatives (Ro 9:1–3; 10:1), regardless of how much he had suffered personally at their hands (2Co 11:24, 26). Exactly what provoked this sudden outburst cannot be known with certainty. An accumulation of hostile acts probably played a part. The writer had been chased out of Damascus (Ac 9:23–25) and Jerusalem (Ac 9:29–30) by his own people not long after his conversion. His message was rejected and his party driven out of Pisidian Antioch by them (Ac 13:45–46, 50). At Iconium the Jews poisoned people's minds against Paul and Barnabas and ultimately forced them out (Ac 14:2, 5–6). They made a special journey to Lystra to instigate an uprising that produced Paul's stoning and being left for dead (Ac 14:19). Jewish opposition continued to hound the missionary band into the second journey, specifically at Thessalonica, again producing Paul's exit (Ac 17:5, 10). Even now as Paul pens these words from Corinth, a united attack has been mounted against him by the city's Jewish residents (Ac 18:6, 12–13). Couple with this the present plight of the Thessalonian Christians (1Th 3:3), ultimately traceable to Jewish opponents, and it is no wonder that Paul uses the occasion to recount their consistent opposition to the Lord Jesus.

The acme of the Jews' opposition is their part in the death of the Lord Jesus. Hence, Paul places this crime first among their offenses (v.15). By persuasion of the Jewish leaders, the Roman authorities crucified Jesus (Jn 19:16; 1Co 2:8). Though joint responsibility was shared by Gentiles and Jews (Ac 4:27), at this point Paul lays guilt for the crime on Israel. It was the exalted Lord of glory against whom this heinous crime was committed.

In the NIV, "the prophets" (v.15) are grouped with "the Lord Jesus" as murder victims of the Jews. It is true that many OT prophets died in this way (cf. 1Ki 19:10; Mt 23:31, 35, 37; Lk 13:34; Ac 7:52; Ro 11:3). More important in this connection is Jesus' parable of the vineyard, in which killing some of the servants (i.e., prophets) was preliminary to killing the son (Mt 21:35–39; Mk 12:5–8). On the other hand, it seems better to connect "the prophets" with "us" in v.15 and translate this part of the verse, "drove out the prophets and us." If the parable of the vineyard furnishes a valid background, connecting "the prophets" with "the Lord Jesus" is unsatisfactory, for a chronological order is not observed and not all the servants in the parable are slain. Of greater import in this parable is the idea of the persecution of the servants. In fact, Luke's account (Lk 20:9–16) does not even mention killing the servants. And to list the prophets alongside Paul's missionary band furnishes an excellent reason for the past action in "drove . . . out." Furthermore, it helps vindicate the missionaries by placing them alongside the honored OT prophets.

Paul concludes v.15 by listing two more characteristics of the Jewish antagonists. "They displease God and are hostile to all men." The former is clearly an understatement, since they were militantly opposed to God. Their zeal for God was not guided by knowledge (Ro 10:2). By opposing God's Messiah so strenuously, they became God's adversaries. This could not help but produce hostility to all people—a hostility not arising from a supposed racial superiority, but manifested in stubborn resistance to admitting Jesus' messiahship.

This is proved by their "effort to keep us from speaking to the Gentiles so that they may be saved" (v.16). The Jews were quite resistant to having Jesus' messiahship and saving work proclaimed among themselves (Ac 4:18–21; 5:27, 28, 40), but Paul's Gentile mission provoked even more indignation, for it implied God's forsaking of Israel (cf. Ac 13:46, 48–50; 17:4–5; cf. also Ro 11:11, 25). Thus they sought to eliminate preaching the message of salvation to the Gentiles. "They always heap up their sins to the limit" is the outcome of killing the Lord Jesus and all their subsequent adverse activity. The figure of "heap up . . . to the limit" (GK 405) points to a well-defined limit of sin appointed by divine decree. After generations of repeated apostasies and rebellion, Israel had arrived at that point. The climax had come especially with rejection of the Messiah himself, and their already-fixed judgment was biding its time till its direct consequences were released.

"The wrath [GK 3973] of God" is none other than the eschatological wrath for which the whole world is destined just before Messiah's kingdom arrives (cf. 1:10). But then why does Paul speak of this wrath as happening in the past ("has come")? The best explanation comes from comparing the only other NT combinations of the expression "come upon" (Mt 12:28; Lk 11:20), where Jesus speaks of the kingdom's arrival in comparable terminology. The unique force of this verb connotes an arrival on the threshold of fulfillment, not the actual entrance into that experience. That is, the wrath that will precede Christ's kingdom has come before the Jews' full experience of that wrath. All prerequisites for unleashing this future torrent have been met. God has set conditions in readiness through the first coming and the rejection of Messiah by this people.

A time of trouble awaits Israel, just as it does the rest of the world, and the breaking forth of this time is portrayed as an imminent condemnation. As soon as human conditions in the progress of God's program warrant, the Jews with the rest of the non-Christian world will be plunged into this awful future turmoil. "At last" should probably be replaced by the NIV note "fully," the latter meaning that the issue is now settled. The determination cannot be reversed, the obstinate blindness of the Jewish people furnishing obvious proof of this.

C. Vindication Through Their Separation (2:17–3:13)

1. Desire to go to them (2:17–20)

17 Turning from his digression about the Jews, Paul continues to stress his deep feeling for the Thessalonians. He pictures himself in contrast to the persecutors just mentioned (2:14–16). The affectionate "brothers" prepares for heartfelt words about his leaving them—a painful experience because of a consuming attraction for them, like that of a child who has prematurely lost his parents. After only a brief absence, he wants to be with them. "We made every effort" conveys a depth of feeling amounting to zeal, a zeal heightened by separation. Added to this deep emotion already portrayed is his "intense longing."

Paul's warm words about his feelings for the Thessalonians may reflect rumors that he did not really care for them. Apparently some had said that he had no interest in coming back to them and that he had come the first time only to satisfy selfish ambition.

18 Therefore, as if he were not satisfied with his already-overwhelming expressions of his feeling for the Thessalonians, Paul proceeds to prove his longing to see them. It is his personal inclination and purpose. The tug on his heart is manifest in the words "certainly I, Paul." Though Timothy and Silas had already returned to Thessalonica, Paul's failure to do so did not come from lack of intention; he had attempted a visit several times.

What could hinder such intense desire? It must be nothing less than Satanic hindrance. The hindrance was probably not the demands of missionary work elsewhere, since it is not the enemy's purpose to encourage such work. Restraint by civil officials in Thessalonica and opposition from local Jews are other possibilities, but these would hardly be sufficient to prevent Paul's return. A more plausible identification of the hindrance might be his illness (cf. 2Co 12:7), even though this would require the "us" to refer only to Paul. The real existence of a personal and supernatural devil is incontrovertible. His present activity in opposing God is only a foretaste of heightened opposition to be launched in the future through his special human representative just prior to Jesus' personal return to earth (2Th 2:3–12).

19 Paul's rhetorical questions tie the Thessalonians into his anticipation of the Lord Jesus' coming and presence. They will bring him joy and be a victor's wreath for him to glory in at that future moment of truth. As always with Paul, this is a boasting or glorying in what God has done (cf. 1Co 1:31), not in personal accomplishment (Ro 3:27; 4:2; cf. 2Co 1:14; Php 2:16).

Interrupting his own question, he anticipates the answer: "Is it not you?" This is Paul's answer to those who said he did not care for the Thessalonian Christians. The future event Paul is looking toward is identical with the appearance of every Christian before the judgment seat of Christ (2Co 5:10), where our works will be evaluated. Because of his converts' spiritual attainments, Paul feels that this will be an occasion of joy and victory.

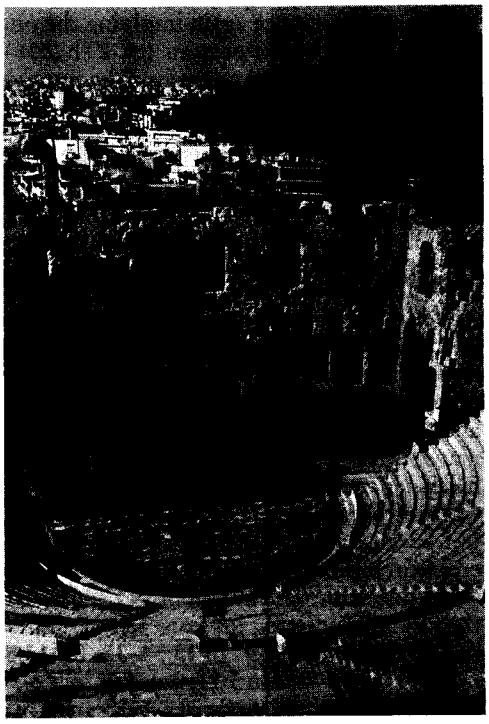
"When he comes" translates the literal meaning—"in [or at] his presence [or coming]." The noun is parousia (GK 4242), a word that in secular Greek sometimes meant a ruler's visit and in the NT applies to the return of Jesus Christ. The various facets of this future visit are defined by the contexts in which parousia appears. In this instance it is Jesus' examination of his servants subsequent to his coming for them (4:15–17) that is in view.

20 Finally, Paul declares that the Thessalonians are his "glory and joy." Not only will they be this when Christ returns; they are so right now. So he silences the insinuations about his lack of concern for his converts.

2. Sending Timothy to them (3:1–5)

Paul now sought another way to dull the pain of separation from his beloved Thessalonians: He sent Timothy, a valuable companion and effective servant, to serve in his place and bring back word about their afflictions and satanic temptation.

1 Paul gives as his reason for sending Timothy: "We could stand [GK 5095] it no longer." This verb has the metaphorical meaning of "hold out against." Paul was at this point unable to stand his ignorance of how his precious converts were faring in persecution. His personal trials meant far less to him than those for whom he suffered vicariously in Christ.



Paul's sincerity is therefore demonstrated by his willingness to do without his cherished co-worker Timothy and to remain alone in a strange city (Athens) dominated by pagan philosophy and animosity toward the Gospel (cf. Ac 17:16–34)—"we" here probably means Paul himself; cf. "I, Paul" in 2:18 and "I" in 3:5.

2 Some are troubled by the problem of harmonizing Timothy's movements with those recorded in Ac 17–18. But Luke does not write about everything in Paul's itinerary. In this case he omits the visit of Silas and Timothy to Athens. According to this verse, they came to Paul while he was in Athens and were sent back again to the Macedonian cities, Timothy going to Thessalonica (cf. v.1). With Silas's departure prior to or simultaneous with Timothy's, the apostle was subjected to an almost intolerable state of loneliness until their subsequent return when he was at Corinth (Ac 18:5; 1Th 3:6). And he was willing to endure this only for the sake of benefitting the Thessalonians and satisfying his thirst for news about them.

Timothy was valuable not only to Paul, but also to Christians more generally, for he was their "brother and God's fellow worker in spreading the gospel of Christ" (cf. Php 2:19–24). Timothy was a spiritual brother in the truest sense and an effective servant of God, and for Paul to choose him to go to Thessalonica demonstrates again his genuine concern for the Christians there.

Timothy's mission was "to strengthen and encourage" the Thessalonians in their "faith," as Paul himself usually did (Ac 14:22; 15:32, 41; 18:23; Ro 1:11; 16:25; 1Th 3:13; 2Th 2:16–17; 3:3). Dependence on God in faith was their only recourse in adversity. They could remain faithful only as they let him supply inner strength (see also v.10).

Paul remained in Athens while he sent Timothy and Titus back to Macedonia. This restored amphitheater in Athens is still in use.

3–4 Timothy told them not to be "unsettled by these trials." "Trials" (or "afflictions"; GK 2568) are the stiffest test of faith. Such is the inevitable lot of Christ's followers (e.g., Jn 16:33), just as it was for their Master (cf. Jn 15:18–16:4). These trials are not to be identified with the end-time tribulation just before Christ's parousia, which will mark the culmination of God's wrath against the ungodly (Mt 24:21; 1Th 2:16; 5:9; 2Th 1:6). Rather, they are part of the church's ongoing experience, as Paul indicates in v.4. Paul had already told them that trials are an inevitable part of Christian experience (3:3; cf. Ac 14:22); Timothy was to reinforce this message.

5 In this situation, Paul, speaking now only of himself at this point, was constrained to find out through Timothy the state of their faith. He knew that "the tempter" (i.e., Satan; cf. Mt 4:3) had been at work among them and that God permits the enemy this activity. What Paul did not know about the Thessalonians, however, was whether or not the tempter's solicitations had been successful, making his work and that of his colleagues "useless."

3. Delight over their progress (3:6–10)

Timothy finally returned from his Thessalonian mission with an opposite report from what Paul had feared. This cheering news greatly encouraged him and moved Paul to thanksgiving and prayer.

6 "Just now" shows that Timothy's arrival from Thessalonica immediately preceded the composition of the letter and probably provided its chief motivation. This arrival is the same as that in Ac 18:5, when Timothy and Silas came at approximately the same time. This substantiates the earlier conclusion that Paul was actually separated from both Timothy and Silas for a time (cf. 3:1). Doubtless he was refreshed by the return of his two associates, though by now he had moved from Athens to Corinth, where a new Christian fellowship had developed.

Timothy "brought good news" (GK 2294) about the Thessalonians. This verb is reserved almost exclusively for gospel preaching. That Paul places Timothy's report in this exalted category shows his high estimate of the Thessalonians. The report was both spiritual and personal. Spiritually, they had progressed in "faith"; their trust in God had been sufficient for their trials. Yet room for improvement remained (cf. v.10). Likewise their progress in "love" for others was uplifting news, though even here too there was room for growth (cf. 3:12; 4:9–10).

Timothy's report of the kindly feelings of the Thessalonians toward him ("pleasant memories," "long to see us") assured Paul that they had not written him off as an exploiter, disinterested in their welfare. They still maintained a warm spot for him, matching his own tender longing to see them (cf. 2:17; 3:10).

7–8 The report helped Paul in his adversity (cf. Ac 18:6, 9–10, 12–13). He was facing physical privations ("distress"; GK 340) and suffering inflicted by his antagonists ("persecution"; GK 2568). Like all Christians (3:3–4), he was called to suffer persecution (cf. 2Ti 3:12). It was their "faith" that encouraged him and the fact that they were "standing firm in the Lord." Since they were depending on God for help against impossible obstacles, Paul himself felt an additional incentive to do this in his own life (cf. Ro 1:12; 2Co 7:4, 13; Phm 7). Thus he felt rejuvenated—"for now we really live." He had been given a new lease on life.

9 The result was thanksgiving to God. Paul found words inadequate to express his appreciation for what had happened in their lives. The change in Paul's mood was radical; "all our distress and persecution" (v.7) has now become "all the joy we have" because of the steadfastness of the Thessalonians. His was no superficial happiness but heartfelt and sincere joy "in the presence of our God."

10 Along with his rejoicing, Paul prayed continually for the Thessalonians. "Night and day" does not mean once in the evening and once in the morning, nor that he did nothing else but pray. It rather points to the extreme frequency of his prayers, while "most earnestly" refers to the intensity of his prayers.

The thrust of Paul's petitions for the Thessalonians is twofold: that "we may see you" (cf. 2:18; 3:6) and "[may] supply what is lacking in your faith" (i.e., to correct, restore, and equip them in their faith). They had already been commended for "their work produced by faith" (1:3). Yet they had room for additional growth, and Paul felt his presence could foster it.

4. Seeking direction for them (3:11–13)

A transitional "now" introduces a related subject: Paul elaborates on his two petitions in v.10 for the Thessalonians. God is addressed indirectly in the third person, in keeping with a letter addressed to people (cf. 5:23; 2Th 2:16; 3:5, 16).

11 Paul recognizes the uselessness of personal efforts toward a revisit unless God "clears the way." At the moment, no return is possible (cf. 2:18), but he prays for the removal of the barriers. Two persons viewed as one (cf. Jn 10:30) possess power to open the way to Thessalonica once again; "our God and Father himself and our Lord Jesus" is the compound subject of a singular verb "may . . . clear"—probably an indication of the unity of the Godhead. "Himself," the first word in this prayer, possibly refers to both Father and Son, once again implying the one essence of these two persons (cf. 2Th 2:16). The Father and Son eventually did grant this request, for Paul returned to Macedonia approximately five years later (Ac 19:21; 20:1; 1Co 16:5; 2Co 2:13) and in all likelihood made a point of visiting Thessalonica.

12 Paul's second petition pertains to "what is lacking" in their faith (cf. v.10), specifically the outworking of that faith in a growing "love." Since "Lord" refers to Jesus in vv. 11, 13 and likewise in all Paul's writings for the most part, it is best interpreted in this way here. Paul seeks the "increase" (GK 4429) and "overflow" (GK 4355) of the Thessalonians' love. Combined, these two words mean "increase to overflowing." Paul prays this not because they lacked love (4:9–10a), but because Christians must continually increase in selfless devotion to others.

In line with the consistent NT emphasis, the prime objects of love are fellow Christians ("each other"; cf. Jn 13:34–35; Ro 13:8; 1Th 4:9; 1Pe 1:22; 1Jn 3:11, 23). But love also reaches beyond the circle of Christians to all other people ("everyone else"). Jesus warned against a narrow conception of one's "neighbor" (Mt 5:43–48; Lk 10:25–37; cf. Mt 19:19; 22:39; Mk 12:31). Paul dares to set himself up as a standard of love to be emulated, a step he could take only because of his imitation of Jesus (see comment on 1:6), who is the ultimate standard (Jn 13:34; 15:12).

13 The goal of Paul's prayer for the Thessalonians is that the Lord will grant them inner strength to be "blameless" in holiness "in the presence of our God and Father" when the Lord Jesus returns. He looks forward to the time of final accounting. An overflow of love (v.12) is the only route to holy conduct in which no fault can be found (v.13). Unless love prevails, selfish motives inhibit ethical development by turning us toward ourselves and away from God and blameless living. The holiness of God is the ideal we must seek (cf. Lev 19:2; 1Pe 1:16).

The final accounting Paul alludes to will take place before "our God and Father," as "in the presence of" (GK 1869) a judge (Mt 25:32; 27:11; Lk 21:36; 2Co 5:10). Earlier Paul had made "our Lord Jesus" the judge at this scene (1Th 2:19). But this is no contradiction. The unity of the Father and Son, just seen in v.11, allows a joint judgeship. The judgment seat of Christ (2Co 5:10) is also the judgment seat of God (Ro 14:10), because Christ in his present session is with the Father on his heavenly throne (Rev 3:21; cf. Ro 8:34; Heb 1:3; 10:12). This hearing will take place at the parousia (GK 4242) of the Lord Jesus (see comment on 2:19). For the Thessalonians Paul prays for a favorable verdict at that time.

Others present at this reckoning will be "all his holy ones." In the NT, this phrase almost exclusively means redeemed human beings (except possibly Jude 14). The redeemed are elsewhere associated with Christ at his return (2Th 1:10). Since human beings are the objects of judgment and their holiness is what is in focus, we must identify "the holy ones" as other Christians joined with the Thessalonians before the judgment seat of God and Christ.

What relation does this event mentioned here bear to the predicted future wrath (1:10; 2:16; 5:9) and the meeting of the saints with the Lord in the air (4:15–17)? If it is Christ's coming prior to the period of God's final wrath, it is identifiable with the meeting of 4:15–17. This interpretation, however, encounters obstacles, for if "all his holy ones" refers to the redeemed, they cannot come with Christ until he has first come for them. To interpret "all his holy ones" as the spirits of the dead in Christ is not satisfactory, because some of those in Christ will not yet have died. Furthermore, the readers have not yet been assured that their dead would participate in the parousia (4:15).

But if this event refers to Christ's coming after God's final wrath, we encounter other difficulties—primarily a disregard for the contextual emphasis on the judgment of saints. By the time of his return to earth after the wrath, this reckoning will have already taken place in heaven, for 4:15–17 relates the judgment of God and Christ to Christ's return in the air before the wrath.

In resolving this difficulty, we must consider the scope of the word parousia as indicated in these letters (see the introduction). The complexity of this term demands that it include an extended visit by Christ as well as the arrival initiating that visit. This is provided for adequately in the rarer meaning of parousia, "presence" (cf. 1Co 16:17; 2Co 10:10; Php 2:12). Included in Christ's visit is an evaluation of the saints (cf. 2:19; 5:23), which is the aspect in view here in v.13. This judgment cannot be completely dissociated from Christ's coming in the air (4:15–17), because this advent marks its initiation. Yet it must be conceived of as a session in heaven in some measure separate from the arrival itself. At this juncture the degree to which Christians have attained a "blameless and holy" character will be divinely ascertained.

IV. Exhortation to the Thessalonians (4:1–5:22)

A. Exhortation Regarding Personal Needs (4:1–12)

1. Continual improvement (4:1–2)

1 Paul now urges the Thessalonians on to greater spiritual attainments outlined in 3:10–13. His exhortations, introduced by "finally," are logically based on more than 3:10–13. The drastic change to a new line of thought implies that all of chs. 2–3 are in view. "Finally" also shows that the series of admonitions launched here will be the final part of the letter. With Paul a final word may be brief (2Co 13:11; Php 4:8; 2Ti 4:8) or extended (Php 3:1; 2Th 3:1). "Brothers" again shows his tenderness in approaching delicate subjects.

The nature of Paul's appeal is conveyed in "ask" (GK 2263) and "urge" (GK 4151). The former word is a gentle, friendly request and the latter an authoritative apostolic plea—more than a request, but less than a command. The words "in the Lord Jesus" form the context of the exhortations that are to follow.

The Thessalonians had already been given instruction about how they must "live in order to please God." Paul again views the Christian life as a "walk" (GK 4344; see comment on 2:12). He might have immediately requested compliance with earlier instruction, but he first interrupts himself, lest he appear to be condemnatory. He gives credit where it is due, in this case recognizing the substantial progress that the Thessalonian Christians have already made (similarly 1:3, 6–10; 3:6, 8). Yet the realization of the ultimate goal of pleasing God and receiving his commendation entailed continual improvement (cf. 3:12; 4:10).

2 So Paul stimulates his converts' memory of what he and his companions had told them. He characterizes their previous ministry as a delivering of "instructions" (or "commands"; GK 4132). These were binding because they were given "by the authority of the Lord Jesus."

2. Sexual purity (4:3–8)

3 Christian holiness requires total abstinence from "sexual immorality" (GK 4518). This word requires a broad definition as including all types of sexual sins between male and female. A year or two earlier a Christian council in Jerusalem had ruled decisively on a related issue affecting Gentile Christians (cf. Ac 15:20). It is not clear whether the Thessalonians were guilty of such immorality, so common among the pagans (v.5). Though Paul may have had in mind the temptation to indulge in it, his strong words probably imply some overt transgressions. Pagan moral corruption looked upon fornication either indifferently or favorably. That the Thessalonians slipped into it after their conversion would not have been strange. While Paul had congratulated them on their faith (cf. 1:3), this does not mean that there was no occasional misbehavior, even this kind, within the church (cf. 1Co 1:4–9; 5:1–5; 6:12–20).

4 The positive side of holiness requires one to "learn to control his own body" (or "learn to live with his own wife"; cf. NIV note). The choice between these two options surrounds the word "body" (lit., "vessel"; GK 5007). It is highly probable that this word does mean "wife" (cf. 1Pe 3:7 for a somewhat parallel use). If so, the word translated "control" (GK 3227) means "acquire" or even "keep on acquiring" (i.e., "live with" in the sense of cultivating a wife's favor; cf. 1Co 7:2–5). A wholesome marriage was thus Paul's antidote for "sexual immorality." "Holy and honorable" describes the way to maintain the right kind of marriage, holiness being due God (4:3; cf. 3:13) and honor due the wife.

5 Those "who do not know God" (i.e., the "heathen" Gentiles; cf. Gal 4:8; 2Th 1:8; also Ps 79:6; Jer 10:25) know nothing of such holy and honorable behavior based on the law of Moses and the commands of Christ. Their guiding principle is "passionate lust." Once removed from that realm into the church of God (cf. 1Co 10:32), believers are obligated to maintain much higher standards.

6 Wronging and taking advantage of a "brother" (probably a Christian brother) are other violations of holiness. Paul is continuing here the matter of sexual transgression. To have relations with a woman outside marriage is not just a trespass against God's law. It also defrauds some fellow Christian who eventually will take, or has taken, this woman as his own wife—an especially heinous sin because the one robbed is a spiritual relative of the robber. Paul does not allude to the other simultaneous injustice, which is obvious—namely, that the woman herself is an object of cruel abuse in such a situation. This too is especially repulsive in a Christian setting.

A reason for complying with the standards set forth in vv.4–5 relates to the Lord Jesus' future punishment of "all such sins." Paul is speaking of the future judgment of Christians at the parousia (2:19; 3:13; 1Co 3:10–17)—a judgment to be carried out by Christ (Jn 5:22; 2Co 5:10) in association with God the Father (Ro 14:10; see comment on 1Th 3:13). Paul's initial expedition to Thessalonica had informed and solemnly warned them of these dire consequences. We do not know what prompted him to put in writing this admonition about judgment. Perhaps urgency required stern words.

7 Another reason for compliance is the nature of God's calling. As in 2:12, this is God's effectual call, mediated through gospel preaching (2Th 2:14). Believers called by God have been inducted into a holy life (cf. 3:13; 4:3–4). They now belong to a community with values different from those of "the heathen" (v.5).

8 A final reason for compliance with the standards set forth in vv.4–5 is that they are God-given. Therefore rejection of them means rejecting not a human being, but God, "who gives [us] his Holy Spirit"; the Spirit lives in us and is inseparable from the kind of holy living demanded in this paragraph (cf. Ro 8:1–17).

3. Filial love (4:9–10)

9–10 "Now about" is a frequent Pauline formula for introducing a new subject (4:13; 5:1; cf. 1Co 7:1, 25; 8:1; 12:1; 16:1, 12). Paul is now responding to a different element of Timothy's oral report about Thessalonica (1Th 3:6). In vv.9–10a he acknowledges their practical compliance with a responsibility to love each other. This "brotherly love" (GK 5789) presupposes the close ties within the spiritual family of God. Paul views further writing on the subject as superfluous in that they are "taught by God" through the indwelling Holy Spirit (v.8; cf. Jn 6:45) to so love. At conversion, believers become lifelong pupils as the Spirit bears inner witness to the love within the Christian family (cf. Ro 5:5; Gal 5:22). No external stimulus is necessary; mutual love among Christians is an inbred quality.

Proof of this inner instruction was visible in the Thessalonians' love for all Christians of their province. Any contacts they had with churches in Berea and Philippi are unknown except for the implications of these verses. Groups of believers had possibly sprung up in other parts of the province since the beginning of Paul's Macedonian mission (Ac 16:9–12). With some allowance for Paul's hyperbolic "all," it is safe to assume that a goodly proportion of the believers in the province had been touched by the Thessalonians' unselfish concern. Otherwise, the missionary zeal reflected in 1:8 lacks clear substantiation.

As exemplary as the Thessalonians had been (1:3; 3:6), however, further progress remained a goal for them (3:12). Paul repeats and particularizes v.1 in the expression, "we urge you, brothers, to do so more and more." More love is always possible for Christians because the ultimate example of Christ himself (Jn 13:34; 15:12) is infinite and can only be approached, never fully reached.

4. Individual independence (4:11–12)

These verses stand in close grammatical connection with v.10b. Yet the logical connection is not immediately obvious. From the subject of love, Paul changes to something quite different—namely, the importance of industry and individual responsibility in Christian living. The two are not completely unrelated. Nothing disrupts the peace of a Christian community more than the unwillingness of members to shoulder their part of the responsibility for it. To disturb tranquility violates the love that permeates a truly Christian community. More specifically, some members of the Thessalonian church appear to have taken advantage of the liberality of other Macedonian Christians (cf. 2Co 8:1–5) in accepting financial help while making no effort at self-support, a condition that later grew worse (2Th 3:6–15).

We do not know the reason for this idleness. But since these two letters are so strongly eschatological, it is probable that the condition stemmed from their misapplying truths about the Lord's return to their daily living. Christians must never evade their daily responsibilities under the pretense of preparing for Christ's return. To do so is to distort this great hope.

11 That restlessness may have been a problem for the Thessalonians is implied by Paul's exhortation—"make it your ambition to lead a quiet life." His exhortation to "mind your own business" implies that the meddlesome spirit that often goes with restlessness was troubling them. Busybodies were active (2Th 3:11) and needed a reprimand. But Paul means more than telling them to stay out of other people's affairs; he also wants them to keep their own affairs in order. A third exhortation, "work with your hands," suggests that idleness was likely a problem among the Thessalonians. In a Greek culture that degraded manual labor, Christianity joined with Judaism in viewing work as an honorable pursuit. Most of the Thessalonian believers earned their living with their hands. Paul tells them to continue supporting themselves and thus avoid the pitfalls of idleness.

12 These exhortations find a twofold purpose. (1) The Thessalonians will "win the respect of outsiders," i.e., those who have no connection with Christ and hence are outside the family of God. Such people readily recognize proper conduct and are repelled by those who do not carry their share of social responsibility. (2) They will not "be dependent on anybody." Of course, independence in an absolute sense is neither possible nor even desirable. We must understand Paul's admonitions not to be dependent in the light of the situation described in this section.

B. Exhortation Regarding Eschatological Needs (4:13–5:11)

1. The dead in Christ (4:13–18)

Another issue raised by Timothy's report requires clarification: the part of the Christian dead in Christ's parousia (see comment on 2:19). Paul discusses this new subject in one of the classic NT passages on the Lord's return (vv.13–18). The Thessalonians' lack of knowledge concerning the part their fellow Christians who had died would have at the parousia led him to write this reassuring paragraph.

13 Paul's words "we do not want you to be ignorant" introduce his correction of false impressions (cf. Ro 11:25; 1Co 10:1; 12:1). The Thessalonians had concluded that "those who fall asleep" (GK 3121) would miss the victory and glory of the Lord's return. Paul chooses this phrase in lieu of the "the dead" because of death's temporary nature for Christians (cf. 1Co 7:39; 11:30; 15:6, 18, 20, 51; cf. also Jn 11:11). "Sleep" is an appropriate term for deceased Christians because of their assured bodily resurrection—a doctrine Paul had previously taught the Thessalonians. That this sleep refers to the physical body and not to a person's spirit (i.e., "soul sleep") is clear for several reasons. (1) Death for Paul did not mean a state of unconscious repose, but a condition of consciously being with Christ (Php 1:23). (2) "Those who sleep" thus continue their relationship with Christ in heaven while their bodies are in the grave. (3) The essential issue in this section is not the intermediate state before bodily resurrection, but the part that those who are raised bodily will play in the parousia.

Paul wants to deliver his readers from the grief experienced by "the rest of men" (cf. "outsiders," v.12). Non-Christians sorrow out of pity for the departed who have entered an unknown realm. For Christians, however, there need be no sorrow on behalf of those who are dead. Grief on behalf of the living and the loss sustained when a loved one dies is legitimate for Christians (Php 2:27), but that kind of grief is not in view here. Those who have died are better off than those left behind and will be equal participants in future resurrection and the glory of Christ.

14 For Christians, relief from sorrow is related to what the future holds. Just as "Jesus died and rose again," so will "those who have fallen asleep in him" be raised when God brings them to heaven with Jesus at his parousia. The fact of Jesus' death and resurrection guarantees as its sequel the eventual resurrection of the dead in Christ (see also 1:10).

It is significant that Paul does not refer to Jesus' death as "sleep." The difference between Jesus' experience and that of believers is that he really endured actual separation from God for the world's sins. Because of his real death, Christian death has been transformed into sleep.

Though we might expect Paul to write "God will raise" instead of "God will bring with Jesus," he used the latter because of an unexpressed connection in his mind between the two ideas. Being brought with Jesus presupposes a rising from the dead as part of the process (v.16)—a teaching Paul had presented to the Thessalonians. Their ultimate anticipation is not just that of being raised, but that of being "with Jesus" (4:14; cf. 4:17; 5:10). The words "God will bring" further point to a continuing movement heavenward after the meeting in the air (v.17), until the arrival in the Father's presence (3:13; cf. Jn 14:2–3). A more detailed analysis of the process follows.

15–17 The authority that validates Paul's affirmation in v.14 is nothing less than "the Lord's own word" (cf. 1:8). Various attempts have been made to identify this source more specifically. Some say Jesus spoke the words while on earth, their substance being recorded later in such places as Mt 24:30–31 and Jn 6:39–40; 11:25–26. Similarities between 1Th 4:15–17 and the gospel accounts include a trumpet (Mt 24:31), a resurrection (Jn 11:25–26), and a gathering of the elect (Mt 21:31). Yet dissimilarities between it and the canonical sayings of Christ far outweigh the resemblances. For example, (1) in Matthew the Son of Man is coming on the clouds, in 1 Thessalonians ascending believers are in them; (2) in the former the angels gather, in the latter the Son does so personally; (3) in the former nothing is said about resurrection, while in the latter this is the main theme; (4) the former records nothing about the order of ascent, which is the principal lesson here in 1 Thessalonians. Distinctions between this and the Johannine passages are just as pronounced.

Other suggestions about the source also seem unlikely, such as a saying of Jesus not contained in the canonical gospels (cf. Ac 20:35). Because of its relevance to early Christian circumstances, such a saying of Jesus as important as this one would hardly have been passed over by the gospel writers. Nor is it likely that Paul was claiming this special authority for his own personal utterances.

The best solution is to see "the Lord's own word" as a direct revelation to the church through one of her prophets—Paul himself or possibly someone else. The NT prophet's function was to instruct and console believers (cf. v.18 with 1Co 14:31), utilizing predictions about the future in the process (Ac 11:27–28; 21:11). Since these elements are prominent here and since 1Co 15:51 classifies this subject as "mystery" revelation, which is a characteristic of prophetic utterances, this explanation of Paul's external authority is quite satisfactory. Nowhere in these letters are the addressees reminded of having heard this teaching previously, though they were fully informed about "the day of the Lord" (1Th 5:2). How they could have been uninformed about this detail of the parousia (v. 13) is not disclosed. Conceivably it was a special revelation to Paul as he was answering their question through Timothy. Whenever it came, it was now the privilege of the Thessalonians to know certain details about the role of departed believers in the parousia.

The first part of Paul's prophetic revelation in vv.15–17 tells what will not happen. Believers who are still alive at the parousia will not go to meet Christ before the dead in Christ do so (v.15). When Paul uses "we," he apparently places this event within his own lifetime. How then can it be explained that the parousia did not precede Paul's death? To theorize that Paul was mistaken and to consider biblical inspiration in the light of such errors is to ignore Paul's avoidance of date setting (5:1–2). In view of Jesus' own teaching about our not knowing the day or hour of his coming (Mt 24:36; cf. Ac 1:7), surely Paul would not limit it to his own life span.

There is some plausibility to seeing Paul as establishing two categories—those alive and those asleep. Since he did not fit into the latter, he had to place himself with the former. But this view fails to explain the emphasis in the Greek on the word "we" or tell us why Paul did not speak impersonally in the third person.

The best solution is to see Paul setting an example of expectancy for the church of all ages. Proper Christian anticipation includes the imminent return of Christ. His coming will be sudden and unexpected, an any-moment possibility. No divinely revealed prophecies remain to be fulfilled before that event. Without setting a date, Paul hoped that it would transpire in his own lifetime. While entertaining the possibility of his own death (2Ti 4:6–8) and not desiring to contravene Christ's teaching about delay (Mt 24:48; 25:5; Lk 19:11–27), Paul, along with all primitive Christianity, reckoned on the prospect of remaining alive until Christ returned (Ro 13:11; 1Co 7:26, 29; 10:11; 15:51–52; 16:22; Php 4:5)—a personal hope of his (2Co 5:1–4; Php 3:20–21; 1Ti 6:14; 2Ti 4:8; Tit 2:11–13). Had this not been the Thessalonians' outlook, their question regarding the dead in Christ and possible exclusion from the parousia would have been meaningless. They were thinking in terms of an imminent return, expecting to see it before their death. They were not anticipating an intervening period of messianic woes or birthpangs. Hence, Paul believed and taught his converts that the next event on the prophetic calendar for them was their being gathered to Christ.

This teaching about a future parousia that will be a cosmic and datable event in world history is as valid for the twentieth century as it was for the first. Just as God intervened in history through his Son's first coming, so he will do at his return.

The principal assertion of v.15, then, concerns those who are alive and anticipating Christ's momentary return and their relation to "those who have fallen asleep." The former group "will certainly not precede" the latter. This strong assertion alleviates the Thessalonians' apprehension about their dead.

The positive chronology of vv.16–17 supports this strong statement (cf. "for" at the beginning of v.16). "The Lord himself will come down from heaven," where he has been since ascending to the Father's right hand. In so doing, he will issue "a loud command" in order to awaken "those who have fallen asleep." Associated with the command will be "the voice of the archangel," probably Michael (Jude 9), and "the trumpet call" (cf. 1Co 15:52). Immediately thereafter, "the dead in Christ" will rise. Far from being excluded from the parousia, they will be main participants in the first act of the Lord's return. This word of comfort must have brought great relief to the Thessalonians, and it has certainly done so for innumerable Christians after them.

Only "after that" (v.17) will living Christians "be caught up" for the meeting with Christ. The interval separating these two groups will be infinitesimally small by human reckoning. Yet the dead in Christ will be the first to share in the glory of his visit. Then the living among whom Paul still hoped to be (cf. "we") will be suddenly snatched away ("caught up"; GK 773; cf. Ac 8:39; 2Co 12:2, 4; Rev 12:5). This term in Latin, raptus, is the source of the popular designation of this event as "the rapture." So sudden will it be that Paul likens it to a blinking of the eye (1Co 15:52). In this rapid sequence the living will undergo an immediate change from mortality to immortality (1Co 15:52–53), after which they will be insusceptible to death. Both resurrected and changed believers will ascend, be enshrouded in the clouds of the sky (cf. Ac 1:9), and "meet" the Lord somewhere in the interspace between earth and heaven ("air"; GK 113).

The nature of this meeting deserves comment. Some feel that the technical force of the word "meet" (GK 561) is relevant here—i.e., a visitor is formally met by a delegation of citizens and ceremonially escorted back into their city (cf. its use in Mt 25:6; Ac 28:15–16). On this basis, they contend that Christians go out to meet the Lord and return with him as he continues his advent to earth. But this is debatable. It should be emphasized that the saints are being snatched away rather than advancing on their own to meet the visitor. A meeting in the air is pointless unless they continue on to heaven with the Lord who has come out to meet them. Tradition stemming from Jesus' parting instructions fixes the immediate destination following the meeting as the Father's house, i.e., heaven (Jn 14:2–3).

The location is secondary, however, in light of the final outcome. To "be with the Lord forever" represents the fruition of a relationship begun at the new birth and far outweighs any other consideration of time and eternity.

18 With this word of assurance, Paul gives a basis for his converts to "encourage [GK 4151] each other."

2. The day of the Lord (5:1–11)

a. The coming of the day (5:1–2)

1 With the perplexity about the dead in Christ resolved, Paul turns to a new subject, yet not one completely distinct from the previous one. The direct and affectionate address "brothers" marks the new discussion as an addition prompted by Timothy's report of the Thessalonians' situation. The nonarrival of the parousia had created another perplexity for them.

Despite their ignorance about the dead in Christ (4:13), they had received prior instruction regarding other eschatological matters. "We do not need to write to you" is Paul's attestation to this fact. "Times and dates" are well-known words describing the end times from two perspectives (cf. their use in Ac 1:7; 3:19–21). "Times" (GK 5989) conceives more of elapsed time and hence a particular date when predictions will be fulfilled. "Dates" (GK 2789; cf. Da 9:27, LXX; Mk 13:33; Eph 1:10; 1Ti 6:15; Heb 9:10; Rev 1:3; 22:10; et al.), while including some reference to extent of time, gives more attention to the character or quality of a given period, i.e., what signs will accompany the final events. During his first visit Paul had effectively communicated the basic features of precise times and accompanying circumstances of future events.

2 For this reason he could say to the Thessalonians, "You know very well" the features of "the day of the Lord." Their previous learning on this subject had been adequate and specific, including pertinent teachings of Christ (Mt 24:43; Lk 12:39).

The focus is on "the day of the Lord." This "day" (GK 2465) has multiple characteristics as described in the Bible. It is so associated with the ultimate overthrow of God's enemies (Isa 2:12) that it sometimes means "judgment" (1Co 4:3). It will be a day of national deliverance for Israel and a day of salvation (1Th 5:9), but it will also be a day when God's wrath puts extended pressure on his enemies (Isa 3:16–24; 13:9–11; Jer 30:7; Zep 1:14–18; 1Th 1:10; 2:16; et al.). By using "day of the Lord" terminology to describe the great tribulation, Christ includes the tribulation within its framework (cf. Mt 24:21 with Jer 30:7; Da 12:1; Joel 2:2). This time of trial at the outset of the earthly day of the Lord will not be brief, but comparable to a woman's labor before giving birth to a child (Isa 13:8; 26:17–19; 66:7ff.; Jer 30:7–8; Mic 4:9–10; Mt 24:8; 1Th 5:3). Growing human agony will be climaxed by Messiah's second coming to earth, a coming that will terminate this earthly turmoil through direct judgment. He cannot personally reappear on earth, however, until this preliminary period has run its course with Armageddon and other tribulation visitations (Rev 6–19). If Christ's triumphant return to earth (Rev 19:11–21) is part of the day of the Lord, as all admit, divine dealings preparatory to it must also be part of it.

But this earthly wrath does not pertain to those in Christ (v.9). They will meet Christ "in the air" and be separate from what God does with those on earth. The only way to hold that this meeting with Christ (i.e., the rapture) is an imminent prospect is to see it as simultaneous with the beginning of the divine judgment against earth. Only on that basis can both the Lord's personal coming and the "day's" coming be compared to a thief (cf. 2Pe 3:4, 10; Rev 3:3, 11; 16:15). They can arrive at any time (cf. 1:10), the "thief in the night" imagery marking the unexpectedness of both imminent events.

The Thessalonians had been instructed about these matters, though later they were to be deceived regarding them (2Th 2:1–2). Yet even with their present knowledge they had difficulty in applying the truths in a practical way while waiting for the day. So Paul seeks to alleviate this difficulty in the rest of this section.

b. Unbelievers and the day (5:3)

3 The surprise beginning of the day of the Lord has a twofold impact. For those who are not in Christ and therefore unprepared, the consequences will be far from cheerful. "People," "them," and "they" are identified only when v.4 contrasts them with the "brothers" who are the addressees. These "nonbrothers" compose an unbelieving world against whom the devastation of the coming day will be unleashed. Just as disaster overtakes the unsuspecting householder when set upon by a robber, so catastrophe will overcome the living who are spiritual outsiders.

Such people will be priding themselves on their secure lifestyles. "Peace" characterizes their inward repose, while "safety" reveals their freedom from outward interference. Yet when that tranquility seemingly reaches its peak, "destruction will come on them." "Destruction" (GK 3897) means utter and hopeless ruin, a loss of everything worthwhile, causing the victims to despair of life itself (Rev 9:6). Without being totally annihilated, they are assigned to wrath and denied the privileges of salvation (v.9).

Comparing the beginning of this period with a period of labor pains just before childbirth makes vivid the unexpectedness with which this day comes (cf. Isa 13:8–9; Jer 4:31; Hos 13:13; Mic 4:9). Pain is certainly involved in both (Isa 66:7) as are certainty and nearness, but "suddenly" points most prominently to the absence of any forewarning. Tribulation will become worldwide, rendering it impossible for non-Christians to escape.

c. Believers and the day (5:4–11)

4 In contrast to the non-Christians referred to in v.3 are the believers ("brothers") in Thessalonica. Continuing the figure of night (v.2), "darkness" (GK 5030) refers to the realm of wickedness and the darkened understanding and ignorance of impending doom that go with it. Such symbolical language occurs quite widely in biblical writings (cf. Dt 28:29; Job 19:8; Pss 11:2; 74:20; Isa 42:6–7; Jer 13:16; Mt 10:27; Jn 3:19; 8:12; Ro 13:12; Eph 5:8, 11; 1Jn 1:5–6; et al.). In reassuring his converts, Paul declares without qualification that believers in Christ belong to a realm different from that of the world. Thus they will not participate in "this day" of the Lord. It will not overtake them by surprise; their position in Christ guarantees their deliverance.

5 Paul's assertion that they are "all sons of the light and sons of the day" rules out living in darkness. "All" brings reassurance that none is excluded. The fainthearted may take heart as may those others who have been confused about the parousia.

To reinforce his point, Paul returns to the negative side. Putting light and day in inverse order, he excludes himself along with all Christians from the night of moral insensitivity. By a casual change from "you" to "we" he takes his place with his readers in accepting the exhortation of v.6. This dulls the edge of what would otherwise be a sharp rebuke. "The day" here has no reference to the eschatological day of the Lord, but is used metaphorically in association with spiritual light. Verse 5 guarantees the readers' participation in a spiritual environment entirely different from that of non-Christians.

6–7 Verse 5 provides a solid basis for the ethical behavior Paul now urges on the Thessalonians. Paul calls them to a lifestyle free from moral laxity. "Let us not sleep" represents the ethical insensitivity that besets people of the other realm. While it is impossible for the day of the Lord to catch Christians unprepared, it is possible for them to adopt the same lifestyle as those who will be caught unawares. Paul urges his readers not to let this happen.

Conduct in keeping with "the light" and "the day" also includes alertness. Inattention to spiritual priorities is utterly out of keeping for those who will not be subject to the coming day of wrath. Though the Thessalonians were, if anything, overly watchful to the point of neglecting other Christian responsibilities (4:11–12; 2Th 3:6–15), they were not to cease watching altogether.

Apparently being "self-controlled" (GK 3768) was a great need. This word denotes sobriety. To counteract what might become a state of wild alarm or panic, Paul urges self-control as a balance for vagaries arising from distorted views of the parousia. Undue eschatological excitement was a serious problem; spiritual sobriety was the cure.

To explain his exhortation in v.6, Paul appeals in v.7 to everyday experience. Sleep and drunkenness are most often associated with the night. So he illustrates his figurative use of "sleep" in v.6 by referring to the normal habit of sleep and uses "drunkenness" to point up his reference to sobriety.

8 Paul now resumes his exhortation but drops for the moment the need for alertness, speaking only of sobriety as a countermeasure against "spiritual" drunkenness. The idea of belonging to the realm of "spiritual" daylight goes back to vv.4–5 and becomes the motivation for self-controlled action. So Paul describes self-control in figurative language drawn from Isa 59:17 (cf. Eph 6:14–17). Though the breastplate and helmet were Roman military apparel, lexical similarity to the Isaiah passage points to the OT as the probable source for the reference to them here.

The relation of this soldierly figure of speech to sobriety has been a puzzle. Obviously soberness is a prerequisite to effective vigilance by a sentry on duty, though vigilance is covered in the earlier word on alertness (v.6). Intoxication prevents effective duty as a sentry, and this thought may supply the answer. To be armed against wild excitement with its disregard of normal Christian responsibilities requires soberness. Paul had earlier spoken of the need for calmness (4:11–12). The Thessalonians had already made significant progress in faith and love (1:3; 3:6), but additional improvement was still needed (3:10; 4:1, 10). So the breastplate of "faith and love" could furnish protection from the problems mentioned in 5:14. To these Paul added the indispensable helmet of the "hope of salvation" (cf. 1:10). These three (faith, love, and hope) strengthened them for their present trials and doubts. The Thessalonians could confidently anticipate a future deliverance not to be enjoyed by those in darkness (v.3), but assured to those in the realm of light (vv.4–5).

Paul used a fully dressed Roman soldier as a picture of the Christian warrior. Drawing by Rachel Bierling.

9 Paul now summarizes the reason for this guaranteed salvation. Negatively, "God did not appoint us to suffer wrath." Without question, this wrath is future and specific, being identified with the messianic era just prior to Christ's reappearance (1:10; 2:16) and with the sudden destruction mentioned in v.3. When God vents his anger against those who live on earth (Rev 6:16–17), the body of Christ will be in heaven as the result of the series of happenings outlined in 4:14–17. This is God's purpose.

The positive side of this purpose is that believers will "receive salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ." "Receive" (GK 4348) here carries the idea of "possession" or "adoption." As Christians have been elected (1:4), they have also been adopted. For them to be possessed by God as his very own is synonymous with the future salvation to come "through our Lord Jesus Christ." In the certainty of this provision the Thessalonians could find relief from the frantic activity and panic that had been disturbing their tranquil anticipation of the future.

10 This verse is noteworthy. Here for the first time in Paul's writings, he states the specific means by which Jesus Christ procures our salvation: "He died for us"—though the death of Christ had undoubtedly been presented as the basis of all his teaching about salvation (cf. Ac 17:2–3). Though Paul's purpose here does not call for an extended discussion of that death, it is important in establishing the definite historical basis of our salvation. His death was "for us" or "on our behalf"—i.e., it was the sole condition whereby God procured as his peculiar possession a people destined for salvation when the rest of the world is plunged into the wrath of the future day.

"Awake [GK 1213] or asleep [GK 2761]" can be interpreted as metaphorical terms for the living and the dead. This would be consistent with Paul's discussion in 4:13–18 and match Jesus' use of "sleep" in raising Jairus's daughter (Mt 9:24). Yet this use of "asleep" is rare. It is better to take these two words in an ethical sense as in v.6. Since future salvation has been so fully provided by Christ's finished work, it cannot be cancelled by lack of readiness. Moral preparedness or unpreparedness does not affect the issue one way or the other; believers are secure in their salvation. Though this suggestion seems to nullify Paul's earlier exhortation to alertness (v.6), it must be acknowledged that this meaning is well established in other places in Scripture (Mt 24:42; 25:13; Mk 13:35, 37; Rev 3:3; 16:15).

But what about the seeming nullification of the exhortation of vv.6–8? This is a problem only if these exhortations are understood as relating just to watchfulness. We have not, however, found this to be the case. The Thessalonians were already watchful, and Paul warns them against extremes of overreaction. "Self-control" or "soberness" (vv.6, 8) serves as a complementary emphasis. Paul seeks to restore a proper balance between future anticipations and present obligations. In helping the Thessalonians, therefore, he had to calm their fears by convincing them of their participation in the parousia regardless of their degree of watchfulness. Every contingency has been met through the work done at Calvary by God himself. Christians need not fear missing the Lord's return, because they are "sons of the light and sons of the day"

(vv.4–5). Their enjoyment of the future resurrection life in union with Christ is certain.

11 With such a guarantee, the Thessalonians are now equipped to "encourage one another and build each other up." As in 4:18, "encourage" (GK 4151) has more a consolatory than a hortatory meaning. Here is an unconditional pledge to strengthen even the weakest in faith. These teachings can also "build . . . up" (GK 3868) Christians. This word was later to become one of Paul's favorite ways of writing about growth in the church (Eph 2:20–22; 4:12). An intellectual grasp of the provisions Paul has been describing leads to individual as well as collective growth of the body of Christ. Paul is quick to acknowledge progress along this line: "just as in fact you are doing." Yet he also looks forward to even greater attainments (cf. 4:1).

C. Exhortation Regarding Ecclesiastical Needs (5:12–22)

1. Responsibilities to the leaders (5:12–13)

12–13 No more effective way of carrying out mutual edification (v.11) can be found than Paul's closing exhortations for improvement within the assembly (vv.12–22). Heading the list are the exhortations regarding the proper attitude toward leaders (undoubtedly the elders and overseers, whose qualifications are described in more detail in 1Ti 3:1–2; 5:17; Tit 1:5). Paul requests ("we ask"; GK 2263; cf. 4:1) that the Thessalonians "respect" (GK 3857) those who "are over" (GK 4613) them. This testifies to the presence of some form of church government in this early assembly; the leaders "stand over" the rest of the assembly in the Lord. Elsewhere "are over" bears the sense of "care for" (cf. Ro 12:6; 1Ti 3:4–5, 12; 5:17). Thus, Christian leaders must rule in such a way that the welfare of those ruled is uppermost in their minds (cf. Mt 20:26–28; 1Pe 5:2–3), though this element must not erode the authority of the office and the need to "respect" the office. The leaders were charged with guiding the congregation, and their decisions were binding (cf. Heb 13:17). It is important to note that this authority was not vested in one person.

In addition to caring leadership of the people, the leaders "work hard" among them—reminiscent of Paul and his colleagues with their unselfish toiling to support themselves while sharing the Gospel with the Thessalonians (2:9). It is appropriate for those who follow them in leadership to do the same. Thus they become local examples of how love works hard (1:3) in contrast to the problem group within the church that was doing practically nothing (4: 11).

Finally, the leaders "admonish" (GK 3805); this means correction administered either by word or deed. It implies blame on the part of the one admonished. Naturally, this process arouses resentment, since discipline is never pleasant. Still the apostle presents admonition as necessary for the congregation and requires respect for those who exercise it.

Another part of Paul's "request" regarding leadership is that the Thessalonians "hold them in highest regard in love" (v.13). They must hold these leaders in the highest possible esteem and give them wholehearted support in a spirit of love. No reservations are allowable.

Concluding the brief exhortation about leadership is a general command for both leaders and those led: "Live in peace with each other." That Paul included such a command shows that relations were not all they could have been. Perhaps there was trouble between the idle and those who were admonishing them. But no matter who was to blame, there had to be peaceful relations. Leaders were to guard against abusing their authority; idlers were not to disregard those over them in the Lord.

2. Responsibilities to all (5:14–15)

14 Paul now begins a new and stronger set of brief commands to all the Christians ("brothers"). "We urge" (GK 4151) is more authoritative than Paul's previous "we ask" (5:12; cf. 4:1).

"Warn" (GK 3805; cf. "admonish" in v.12) is an injunction to Christians in general, not just a limited few. The entire local body copes with practical situations by advising an errant believer. The only ones excused from the obligation to warn are those in need of warning, in this case described as "those who are idle" (GK 864)—i.e., those who by their idleness are disorderly in conduct (cf. 2Th 3:6–7). A certain amount of unbecoming behavior had already appeared in the Thessalonian church (1Th 4:11–12).

"Encourage [GK 4170; cf. "comfort" in 2:12] the timid" concerns a different need. Words of comfort to the fainthearted are also needed. In the light of ch. 4, those who needed comfort were both troubled over their friends who had died in Christ (4:13) and confused about what the parousia held for themselves (5:1–11). Within this letter Paul has given ample information for removing these misgivings.

"Help the weak" almost certainly relates to moral and spiritual debility. Whether it was weakness in shrinking from persecution (3:3–5), yielding to temptations to immorality (4:3–8), or something else cannot be precisely determined. It may well have been weakness in exercising full Christian liberty in doubtful matters (see Ro 14:1–15:6; 1Co 8–10). Whatever it was, the strong in faith were responsible to support those who were weak.

Summing up the previous three commands is a fourth general one: "Be patient [GK 3428] with everyone." This pictures the even-tempered response of one who is slow to anger. Dealing with the "idle," "the timid," and "the weak" requires this special disposition because they so often refuse to respond immediately to constructive counsel. Yet these are not the only ones requiring patient treatment. All Christians at one time or another provoke dissatisfaction through thoughtless or even intentionally hurtful acts. They too need patient treatment.

15 When tempers run short, the whole group has the responsibility for seeing that no member "pays back wrong for wrong." The natural tendency to retaliate and inflict injury for a wrong suffered must be strongly resisted, no matter what the injury. The Christian stand against retaliation crystallized very early, no doubt being formulated from principles established by Jesus in his Sermon on the Mount (see comments on Mt 5:38–42). Jesus emphatically set the tone for his followers in forbidding personal revenge altogether. Paul deals with this subject in more detail in Ro 12:17–21. Peter also shows the influence of this teaching (1Pe 2:19–23; 3:9). Nonretaliation for personal wrongs is perhaps the best evidence of personal Christian maturity.

Paul goes on to give a constructive alternative to retaliation: "Always try to be kind to each other and to everyone else." Eager expenditure of all one's energies is none too much in seeking to a be kind. Christians must diligently endeavor to produce what is intrinsically beneficial to others, whether other Christians ("each other") or unbelievers ("everyone else"). The seriousness of the abuse suffered is no issue. Some Thessalonians doubtless had been victims of unjustified harsh treatment, but regardless of this, a positive Christian response is the only suitable recourse. The welfare of the offender must be the prime objective.

3. Responsibilities to oneself (5:16–18)

16 Compliance with the social regulations of vv.12–15 is impossible apart from personal communion with God. So Paul turns to the believer's inner life. In the exhortation "Be joyful always," he voices a theme that is characteristic of the NT writings, beginning with Jesus' Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5: 11–12; see also Ac 5:41; 16:25; Php 1:18; 4:4). The uniqueness of Christian joy lies in its emergence under adverse circumstances. Paul states the paradox succinctly in 2Co 6:10: "sorrowful, yet always rejoicing" (cf. 2Co 12:10). The Thessalonian Christians had already suffered with joy (1Th 1:6) as had Paul himself (3:9). The challenge is for this joyful outlook to become constant. From a human perspective they had every reason not to be joyful—persecution from outsiders and friction among themselves. Yet in Christ they are to be more and more joyful.

17 Intimately related to constant joy is incessant prayer—the only way to cultivate a joyful attitude in times of trial. Uninterrupted communication with God keeps temporal and spiritual values in balance. "Continually" (GK 90; cf. 1:2–3; 2:13; Ro 1:9) does not mean nonstop praying. Rather, it implies constantly recurring prayer, growing out of a settled attitude of dependence on God. Whether words are uttered or not, lifting the heart to God while one is occupied with miscellaneous duties is the vital thing. Verbalized prayer will be spontaneous and will punctuate one's daily schedule, as it did Paul's writings (3:11–13; 2Th 2:16–17).

18 A final member of this triplet for personal development is "Give thanks in all circumstances." No combination of happenings can be termed "bad" for a Christian because of God's constant superintendence (Ro 8:28). We need to recognize that seeming aggravations are but a temporary part of a larger plan for our spiritual well-being. Out of this perspective we can always discern a cause for thanks. In fact, failure to do this is a symptom of unbelief (Ro 1:21).

"For this is God's will for you in Christ Jesus" justifies all three brief commands. Rejoicing, praying, and giving thanks do not exhaust God's will but are vital parts of it. "In Christ Jesus" is a significant qualification of God's will because only here can inner motives be touched. Paul's earlier rule, the Mosaic law, was strong on outward conformity, but was helpless to deal with human thoughts. It could not dictate an inner attitude even though it was a perfect expression of God's will. In union with Christ, together with an accompanying inward transformation (2Co 5:17), however, compliance with God's standards can extend to motives. These three commands penetrate the innermost recesses of human personality—the spring from which all outward obedience flows. The true victories in life are won by Christians who are joyful, prayerful, and thankful.

4. Responsibilities to public worship (5:19–22)

19 Paul now shifts from the personal life to communal worship (vv.19–22). "Do not put out the Spirit's fire" alludes to the Holy Spirit as a burning presence (cf. 2Ti 1:6). In particular, this is his impartation of specialized capabilities for ministry to people in the body of Christ. In his discussions of spiritual gifts elsewhere (Ro 12:6–8; 1Co 12:8–10, 28–30; Eph 4:11), Paul distinguishes eighteen such special abilities—half of which involve speaking publicly. When he commands, "Stop putting out the Spirit's fire" (lit. translation of v.19), he advocates stopping something already being practiced. Perhaps gifts other than prophecy (cf. v.20) had been abused, so that the more sober-minded leadership overreacted and prohibited Spirit manifestations altogether, with a resulting loss of spiritual benefit. Paul forbids such repression here. The proper course is to allow gifted people to share in a decent and orderly fashion what the Spirit can do through them for edifying of the body of Christ (1Co 14:12, 26, 40). Control is necessary, but overcontrol is detrimental. The leadership and the whole community must find the right balance.

20 Paul's next prohibition, "Do not treat prophecies with contempt," suggests that the Christians at Thessalonica, like those at Corinth (1Co 14:1), had underrated the gift of prophecy. This involved utterances of those who in their prophetic office proclaimed the will and command of God as well as predicted the future (Ac 11:28). Benefits from these utterances could build up a local church (1Co 14:3).

Apparently, however, certain "idle" brothers (v.14; cf. 4:11–12) had misused this gift by falsifying data regarding the Lord's return. This had soured the remainder of the flock against prophecy in general. Their tendency now was not to listen to any more prophetic messages, but to discount them in view of counterfeit utterances they had heard. Once again Paul warns against overreaction and urges the church to give prophecies their proper place in edifying its members (cf. v.11).

21 To balance the two prohibitions, Paul stipulates that all charismatic manifestations be tested with a view to accepting what is valid and disallowing what is not (vv.21–22). "Everything" is subject to the limitation of vv.19–20 (i.e., the exercise of spiritual gifts). The mere claim to inspiration is not a sufficient guarantee, because inspirations are known at times to come from below (1Co 12:2). The nature of the "test" (GK 1507) is not specified, but suggestions are forthcoming from related passages. In 1Jn 4:1ff. (cf. 1Co 12:3), the test is theological in nature, having to do with a proper view of Jesus as the Christ and Lord. In 1Co 12:10; 14:29, discernment is a specific spiritual function in combination with the gift of prophecy; it consists of an ability to discern whether another's prophetic speech is genuinely inspired. But perhaps these two tests are too specialized for the present context, and preference should be given to a more general criterion of whether a positive contribution to the body's edification and mutual love has been made.

Testing like this will identify some spiritual activities as attractive and conducive to a growing love and to Christian power (5:11; 1Co 13; 14:3–5, 12, 26). These are genuine gifts and should be clung to tenaciously. Regarding "hold on to the good," Paul speaks of a determined tenacity to retain what is beneficial to the church (cf. Ro 12:9). The Thessalonian church had been remiss in this (vv.19–20).

22 Allowance must also be made for professed spiritual manifestations that do not contribute but rather detract from the development of the local body. Paul designates this category by "every kind of evil." That is, spiritual gifts could be of an "evil" (GK 4505) variety, falsely attributed to the Holy Spirit (2Th 2:9–10). Paul clearly intends here an antithesis with v.21: "Hold on to" (GK 2988; v.21) what the Spirit reveals as good, but "avoid" (lit., "hold yourselves free from"; GK 600) every kind of evil that tries to parade as a genuine representation of the Spirit. Only then can the body of Christ achieve maximum benefit in local worship.

V. Conclusion (5:23–28)

A. Petition for the Thessalonians (5:23–24)

23 Having concluded his assorted suggestions for practical improvement, Paul looks to God to grant these objectives in the light of the Lord's return (cf. 3:12–13). Sexual purity (4:3–8), brotherly love (4:9–10), personal independence (4:11–12), understanding the parousia (4:13–5:11), respect for leaders, love for other people, rejoicing, prayer, thankfulness, and concern for public worship (vv.12–22) are possible only through God. "I have simply told you all these things to do," Paul is saying, "but God alone has power to make your efforts a success."

Paul addresses God as the giver "of peace" (cf. 1Co 14:33), who has provided for a harmonious relationship between himself and humankind through Christ's death. At this point, in light of exhortations that imply at least a trace of disharmony (4:6, 10–12; 5:12–22), he invokes God's intervention as peacemaker.

Throughout the letter Paul has been concerned with sanctification (3:13; 4:3–4, 7–8). Now he prays that God will indeed "sanctify" (i.e., separate to himself; GK 39) his readers "through and through." This expression speaks of the ultimate maturity of Christian character. It presents the qualitative side of spiritual advance in its final perfection.

The quantitative objective of the prayer is in the word "whole" (GK 3908). Wholeness pertains to three parts of the human make-up, "spirit, soul and body." Paul petitions that this wholeness may be "kept" (or "preserved"; GK 5498) and that it may be "blameless at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

The question arises as to how Paul conceives of the human being in the words "spirit, soul and body." Among the various explanations of this expression are these four: (1) Paul intends no systematic dissection of human personality. Instead, he uses a loose rhetorical expression emphasizing the totality of personality, reinforced by "through and through" and "whole" (cf. the comparable expression in Dt 6:5; Mk 12:30; Lk 10:27). (2) "Spirit" and "soul" are interchangeable, both referring to a person's immaterial substance. "Body" then completes the picture by referring to the material part: "your whole spirit (i.e., soul) and body." This sees the human being as dichotomous. (3) Others divide the last sentence of v.23 either into two independent parts or join "may your whole spirit" with the first part of the verse (both of these require adding words that are not in the Greek). (4) Paul saw a human being as a threefold substance, body, soul, and spirit.

Of the four options, this fourth one is by far the preferred interpretation, being generally recognized since the early fathers. The symmetrical arrangement of three nouns with their articles and their connection (in Greek) by means of two "ands" render this the most natural explanation. That Paul elsewhere does not make such a distinction is no argument against trichotomy. A trichotomous understanding of v.23 has so much to commend it that other interpretations cannot compete without summoning arguments from elsewhere. The difference between the material part ("body"; GK 5393) and the immaterial parts ("spirit"; GK 4460; and "soul"; GK 6034) is obvious in other places in Paul's writings (e.g., Ro 7:17–23; 1Co 2:14–15; 14:14; 15:44).

The "spirit" is the part that enables us to perceive the divine. Through this component we can know and communicate with God. This higher element, though damaged through the fall of Adam, is sufficiently intact to provide each individual a consciousness of God. The "soul" is the sphere of our will and emotions, the true center of personality, which gives us a self-consciousness that relates to the physical world through the body and to God through the spirit. The "body" is the physical side of the human person. This analysis of humankind had been Paul's training in the OT, though much unresolved mystery remains regarding the interrelationships between the different parts, including the body. How one affects the other is fully understood only by the Creator.

For such a composite creature Paul therefore prays, seeking an unblamable wholeness in the presence "of our Lord Jesus Christ" (cf. 2:19; 3:13).

24 To Paul, utterance of a prayer was not the end, but only the means to it. One who asks God for something can anticipate the fulfillment of that request because of God's character: "The one who calls you is faithful." He who issues an effectual call can be absolutely relied on to carry out his call (see comment on 2:12), including among other things the sanctification and preservation prayed for in v.23. Faithfulness is the characteristic of God that determines that he will do exactly as Paul has prayed. In his election of the Thessalonian church (1:4; 2:12), God had already determined to do so. This, however, did not render prayer for them superfluous, as human effort and application also have their place in carrying out the purposes of God.

B. Reciprocation by the Thessalonians (5:25–27)

25 Following his prayer, Paul offers his readers opportunity to reciprocate along three lines. First, he requests prayer for himself and his fellow missionaries. The scope of "brothers" presents two possibilities. On the one hand, Paul may be referring to the church leaders (cf. "all the brothers" in vv.26–27). But a strict distinction cannot be made between leaders and followers in vv.26–27. Moreover, vv.12–13 (which also have "brothers") address the congregation at large and even tend to exclude leadership. In each case where "brothers" is found earlier in the letter, the whole church is included. Hence, Paul probably follows his customary policy of requesting prayer from the total body, not just from a limited few (Ro 16:16; 1Co 16:20; 2Co 13:12).

Paul depended on his converts' spiritual support (Ro 15:30; Eph 6:19; Php 1:19; Col 4:3; 2Th 3:1; Phm 22). So now he asks for a continuing place in their prayers (v.17), similar to the place they have been given in his (vv.23–24).

26 A second closing request is for all the brothers to be greeted with "a holy kiss." Paul's usual "one another" (Ro 16:16; 1Co 16:20; 2Co 13:12; cf. 1Pe 5:14) is replaced this time by "all the brothers," an expression that may imply that the request is addressed to leaders only. This need not distinguish leaders from the rest of the assembly, however, as the letter will eventually find its way to all (v.27). In the meantime those receiving it first were to greet the rest with a holy kiss. This was not a kiss of respect as was used in ancient times to honor men of authority. Neither was it cultic as though copied from an ancient mystery religion. It most closely parallels the use of a kiss among members of the same family as a token of their close relationship. Christians have come into the family of God and have even closer ties than those of any human family (Mt 12:46–50). It was appropriate that a symbolic greeting be adopted. It was to be "holy," i.e., such as is becoming to saints; this may have involved the custom of men kissing men and women kissing women so as to forestall any suspicion of impropriety. A Jewish synagogue practice, it could easily have found its way into early Christian assemblies.

27 The third parting word is more than just a request. The formula "I charge you before the Lord" shows an unusual concern on Paul's part regarding the possibility of his letter's not being read. Invoking an oath and switching to the first person singular indicate his urgency. He may have feared that the contents of the letter might be limited to those interested in a particular issue (e.g., about those who had fallen asleep in Christ; 4:13–18). Perhaps he was aware that some were already at work attributing wrong teaching to his name and authority (2Th 2:2). Or he could have feared a breakdown in communications between the church's leadership and some of the communicants within the church (4:11–12; 5:12–13). Probably Paul sensed the far-reaching import of the teaching of the letter and its binding authority as part of a canon of Scripture (1Co 14:37). Whatever the case, this charge has implications of divine punishment for failure to comply. The first recipients of the letter, probably the church leaders, were bound under oath "to have this letter read to all the brothers."

Obviously it was to be read aloud, in line with the classical meaning of "read" (GK 336). With few people receiving a formal education, not all participants in Christian circles were able to read for themselves. The further limitation of insufficient copies and expense of writing materials prohibited distribution to all. The only solution was to give the letter a place in public worship alongside the OT Scripture, the consequence of which would eventually be ecclesiastical recognition of its authority as an inspired book.

C. Benediction (5:28)

28 This customary benediction was probably added in Paul's own handwriting (cf. 2Th 3:17–18). His distinctive farewell was always built around his favorite concept, "grace" (GK 5921), which replaced the farewell that was typically used in ancient letters (cf. Ac 15:29). This trait is distinctive in his letters whether his benediction is longer (2Co 13:14) or shorter (Col 4:18; 1Ti 6:21; 2Ti 4:22; Tit 3:15). The primacy of grace resulting from the saving work of "our Lord Jesus Christ" was a constant theme as the apostle sought the welfare of those whom he served (cf. 1:1).

2 Thessalonians

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

Paul's interest in his Thessalonian converts did not terminate with the dispatch of the first letter. His ministry was one of continual discipling of those he had won to Christ. This second letter was written only slightly later than 1 Thessalonians. Its background is therefore essentially the same (see introduction to 1 Thessalonians), with only slight additions. While he was still in Corinth, Paul received further word about this church's condition; this report prompted him to write 2 Thessalonians.

2. Authorship and Canonicity

The external evidence for the Pauline authorship of 2 Thessalonians is stronger than for 1 Thessalonians. Several of the Apostolic Fathers and some of the early church fathers clearly refer to it. In addition, the witnesses cited for 1 Thessalonians (see introduction) add their support to the Pauline authorship and early canonical recognition of 2 Thessalonians.

In spite of this, some scholars offer objections to Pauline authorship, mostly on internal grounds. (1) The objection most widely used finds in 2 Thessalonians an eschatology different from that of 1 Thessalonians, one that represents a Christian perspective that arose after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The principal difference cited is emphasis on certain signs prior to the parousia in 2 Thessalonians, in contrast to 1 Thessalonians' presentation of the event as something that may come at any moment. This commentary, however, will explain in detail why these two letters are not in conflict. A right understanding of the several phases of the parousia and of the meaning of 2Th 2:3 shows harmony between the two letters. Differing circumstances in Thessalonica called for emphasizing different aspects of end-time events.

(2) Paul's authorship is also questioned because of a supposed different view of the last judgment. The reversal of fates, with the persecutors receiving tribulation and the persecuted relief (2Th 1:5ff.), is not paralleled in Paul's acknowledged writings. This objection stereotypes Paul's thinking unreasonably to the point of prohibiting him from expressing his eschatology in added dimensions. Far from belonging to a later generation, vengeance in connection with the Lord's return is traceable to Jesus himself (Mt 24:15–22; 25:31–46; Lk 21:22) and to the OT (Isa 66:15). Paul simply developed it in 2 Thessalonians more than elsewhere (cf. also Ro 2:5–10).

(3) A third objection to its being post-Pauline is that it assigns divine attributes and functions to Christ. To some, the differences between the prayers of 1Th 3:11–13 and 2Th 2:16; 3:5 reveal that 2 Thessalonians could not have been written during Paul's lifetime. To affirm, however, that Paul never believed in the deity of Christ is precarious. Even 1 Thessalonians sees him as a source of divine grace (1:1; 5:28), as one to whom prayer is properly addressed (3:11–12), and as one to whom future accountability must be given (2:19). Both letters have a high view of Christ's person.

3. Date

If one accepts the accuracy of Acts 17–18, this letter must have been written during Paul's stay in Corinth, for Paul, Silas, and Timothy are not known to have been together after that. The conditions are still generally the same as those represented in 1 Thessalonians. That letter must have come earlier because its autobiographical portions leave no room for correspondence between Paul's departure from the city and the letter itself. A date shortly after 1 Thessalonians is most probable for the writing of 2 Thessalonians, perhaps late in the summer of A.D. 50.

4. Occasion and Purpose

Three main developments prompted the writing of 2 Thessalonians. (1) Persecution of Christians in Thessalonica had grown worse and was leaving victims at the point of despair. (2) A pseudo-Pauline letter and other false representations (see 2:2) were on the point of convincing believers that the end time was already present because of their increased suffering. (3) The nearness of Christ's return had been misused as a basis for shirking vocational responsibilities even more than at the time of 1 Thessalonians.

To meet the needs that occasioned this second letter, Paul pursued three broad purposes. (1) He provided an incentive for the Thessalonians to persevere a little longer by describing the reward and retribution issuing from the future judgment of God (1:3–10). (2) He clarified prominent events belonging to the day of the Lord to prove the falsity of claims that that day had already arrived (2:1–12). (3) He issued detailed instructions covering disciplinary steps the church was to take in correcting those who refused to work (3:6–15).

5. Theological Values

For the doctrines that are unique to 2 Thessalonians and those held in common with 1 Thessalonians, see the introduction to 1 Thessalonians.

EXPOSITION

I. Salutation (1:1–2)

1–2 After a period of several months, reports from Thessalonica about new conditions, especially some worsening problems, reached Paul while he and his missionary party were still in Corinth, leading him to write this second letter and to provide solutions.

The salutation is identical with that of the first letter (cf. comments on 1Th 1:1) except for two additions. The first is "our" in the expression "God our Father" (v.1). God is the Father of Christians. His being the Father of Jesus Christ is expressed elsewhere (e.g., 2Co 1:3; Eph 1:3; 1Pe 1:3).

The second addition is the phrase "from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" in v.2. Identifying the sources of "grace and peace" occurs in all other Pauline superscriptions except 1Th 1:1. The words make explicit what is already implicit: God is ultimately the only source of grace and peace. Two persons of the Godhead are specified: the Father and the Son. To Paul, Jesus was Deity in the fullest sense. This is the only justification for placing his name beside the Father's as co-author of the unmerited favor and harmonious relationship pronounced in this greeting.

II. Assurance of Repayment at God's Righteous Judgment (1:3–12)

A. Thanksgiving for Present Perseverance (1:3–10)

1. Healthy development (1:3–5a)

3 As is his practice in every letter but Galatians, Paul begins his remarks by thanking God for the spiritual progress of his addressees. Here his appreciation is marked by a feature found nowhere else except later in this same letter (2:13)—that he was obligated (cf. "we ought"; GK 4053) to express gratitude for what God had done in their lives. His thanksgiving Paul conceived of as his duty to God. Paul felt an intense compulsion to give gratitude to God for what Christ had done and was doing in believers. His own post-conversion service was invested as a partial repayment for the personal debt he himself incurred when God gave him salvation (see Ro 1:14; 1Co 9:16–17).

"And rightly so" anticipates Paul's description of the readers' sterling performance amid persecutions and supplies a second reason for thanksgiving. Paul habitually gave credit where credit was due. The conduct of his readers "under fire" was so commendable that he could not refraingiving credit again.

So great was Paul's excitement over their progress that he gives some details: "because your faith is growing more and more, and the love every one of you has for each other is increasing." Faith and love comprehend the total Christian walk (cf. 1Co 16:13–14; 2Co 8:7; Gal 5:6; Eph 1:15; 3:17; 6:23; 1Th 3:6). The absence of "hope" from this combination is not overly significant. "Faith," an area commended in the first letter (see comment on 1Th 1:3), was something that needed improvement (cf. 1Th 3:10); apparently it had grown during his absence. "Love" too was a quality he had not only already commended them for (1Th 1:3; 4:9–10) but also prayed to increase (1Th 3:12). It is no wonder, then, to find him rejoicing over their growth in faith and love.

4 In further reference to this radical improvement Paul says, "among God's churches we boast [GK 1595] about your perseverance and faith." Why this stress on the missionaries' boasting? Was Paul suggesting that those who establish a church normally do not brag about that church? Paul's intent here is probably to contrast the missionaries' boasting with the Thessalonians' self-evaluation. At least some of these Christians felt inferior because of failures (1Th 5:14) and so were not inclined to boast. Paul speaks to this discouragement when he says, "As far as we are concerned your progress has been tremendous, so much so that we boast about it to other churches." The churches to which Paul had boasted were probably more widespread than in the vicinity of Corinth. Churches everywhere had heard this report, either through letter or through personal contact with those visiting Paul in Corinth.

The boasting pertains to "your perseverance and faith in all the persecutions and trials you are enduring.' "Perseverance" (GK 5705) is the attitude that accepts trying circumstances without retarding progress (cf. also comment on "endurance" in 1Th 1:3). Accompanying the perseverance of the Thessalonians was their "faith" (GK 4411) or, perhaps better, their "faithfulness" (cf. Ro 3:3; Gal 5:22). Their tenacious loyalty to Christ in spite of fierce adversity is what Paul finds so remarkable. "Persecutions" (GK 1501) are sufferings incurred because of faith in Christ, while "trials" (GK 2568) are troubles of any kind. The believers were "enduring" (GK 462) these—but only for the time being; in God's plan such conditions were not to be permanent.

5a Instead of beginning a new paragraph, "all this is evidence that God's judgment is right" should probably be read with the end of v.4. The subject of Paul's boasting—i.e., their perseverance and faithfulness—is proof positive of God's righteous judgment. That he gives strength enough to face all the persecutions and trials victoriously shows that his "judgment is right." Withstanding present pressures demonstrates the rightness of God's future judgment. The phrase about righteous judgment here sets the tone for 1:5b–10, which describes what is to come.

2. Righteous judgment (1:5b–10)

a. Categorization of participants (1:5b–7a)

This section (vv.5b–10) expands on the reference to God's future righteous judgment in v.5a. Paul first describes what it will mean to victims of present persecution (v.5b). He then points out the fate of persecutors (v.6) and follows this with a second look at what will happen to the persecuted (v.7a).

5b Future reckoning assures a future recognition of the worthiness of those suffering for the sake of the kingdom of God. This recognition will not be self-earned but is graciously imparted by God as a result of their decision to believe in the Lord Jesus (1:3, 10; 2:13; 1Th 1:8), who himself earned the believer's forgiveness of sins and eternal life by dying a sacrificial death (1Th 5:10). The worthiness of the Thessalonian believers had already been established before persecutions came. Their firm stand in the face of persecutions (v.4) confirmed their relationship to God and was a pledge that their worthiness will be openly declared by God.

The Greek of v.5b has the word "also": "for which you also [untranslated in NIV] are suffering." That is, believers in Thessalonica were not the only ones suffering this kind of treatment; there were others, such as Paul, Silas, and Timothy (cf. Ac 17:5; 1Th 2:2; 2Th 3:2). With opposition behind them, all who are Christ's at his parousia (see comment on 1Th 2:19) will be welcomed into the messianic kingdom on the ground of their God-given worthiness.

6 On the other hand, those responsible for troubling Christians will be repaid proportionately for the suffering they have caused. This is only "just" (GK 1465; translated "right" in v.5) in God's eyes; i.e., this future judgment is righteous. The antagonists will thus receive "trouble" (GK 2568), a term not further defined at this point (cf. v.9). This word is often translated "tribulation." It is the present lot of Christians to undergo tribulation (v.4; 1Th 3:4). For the rest of the world, however, tribulation will be future and far greater in intensity (Mt 24:21; cf. Rev 3:10). In his first letter to this church, Paul described this period in relation to its source—God's wrath (1:10; 2:16; 5:9). But here he speaks of it from the standpoint of circumstances that engulf the victims. After the period of tribulation has passed, these troublers will be denied entrance into the messianic kingdom that welcomes the faithful followers of Christ (v.5; Mt 25:41, 46).

7a The other side of God's justice is full bestowal of rest on those who have been "troubled" (GK 2567), a reward awaiting Paul and his co-workers also. This will be the relief from tension and suffering that belongs to all who become Christ's disciples. Their rest and bliss in the future state (cf. Ac 3:19–20; Rev 14:13) are guaranteed by the justice of God. A sublime anticipation thus helps suffering Christians to maintain unwavering perseverance and faithfulness (cf. v.4).

Participants in God's righteous judgment, therefore, fall into these two classes: For the first class, the future holds a severe threat. Though their domination is tolerated for the present, at the proper time, the roles will be reversed. The second class, though under the heel of the other for the moment, will become the overcomers who will enjoy all privileges in God's kingdom.

b. Circumstances of fulfillment (1:7b)

7b "When the Lord Jesus is revealed" identifies the time of God's righteous judgment (see comments on vv.6–7a). As already suggested, the objects of Christ's revelation are twofold. (1) He will appear to those who are in Christ. It will be an appearance that means rest (1:7a) when he comes "from heaven" (cf. 1Th 4:16) to meet the dead and living in Christ in the air (1Th 4:17) and gather them to himself (2Th 2:1). This begins their unending fellowship with him (1Th 4:17; 5:10) and participation in his glory (2Th 1:10, 12). Paul hoped to be alive at this time (see comments on 1Th 4:15–17).

(2) The other group on whom God's righteous judgment and the revelation of the Lord Jesus will make their impact are their persecutors. The consequences for them will be prolonged and painful. Christ will begin by subjecting earth's rebels to a period of intense "trouble"—a time of human misery without parallel in the annals of history (Da 12:1; Mk 13:19). It will grow into a dominant factor during the time of "the rebellion . . . and the man of lawlessness" (2:3). As the period runs its course, it will witness the abomination of desolation (2:4; cf. Da 9:27; 11:31, 36; 12:11; Mt 24:15) and the Satanic deception of an unbelieving world (2:9–10). This is the initial phase of God's vengeance against a world that persists in rebellion (cf. Lk 21:22; Rev 6:10; 19:2).

As the period draws to its close, the Lord Jesus will be revealed personally to culminate this vengeance with "everlasting destruction" and exclusion from the Lord's presence and glory (v.9). That time is a day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God (Ro 2:5; 1Th 1:10; 2:16; 5:9), just before the revelation of Christ's glory in the world.

Afflicted Christians, on the other hand, are offered the brightest anticipation. They look forward to the Lord Jesus' revelation from heaven and to the prospect of immediate rest. They will not be present for the apostasy (2:3), the rule of the lawless one (2:3–4) or his "counterfeit miracles, signs and wonders" (2:9), because their promised rest in heaven will have begun by then. With a hope like this there is ample reason to continue in faithfulness to the Lord.

The "blazing fire" of his coming recalls the glory of OT theophanies (Ex 3:2; 19:18; 24:17; Dt 5:4; Ps 18:12; Isa 30:27–30; Da 7:9–10). It will be a revelation of glory in which the saints will share (1:10, 12). The Lord Jesus will be accompanied by "his powerful angels," who will draw on his power for their part in the revelation.

Many have chosen to limit this "revelation" (GK 637) of Christ to a single event at the close of the tribulation. The role of "his powerful angels" favors this understanding in the light of Mt 24:30–31; 25:31. It is more persuasive, however, to explain revelation as a complex of events, including various phases of end-time happenings. The present context associates the word with Christ's coming for his own as well as his coming to deal with opponents. Since the primary thrust of vv.5–10 is to encourage suffering Christians, the meaning of this revelation for them should receive the emphasis. God's dealings with the rest of the world are included only to enhance the "relief" experienced by believers at the righteous judgment of God.

c. Consideration of repayment (1:8–10)

8 Two types of repayment to be meted out at the righteous judgment of God deserve consideration in light of the Christian's present trouble. One is toward the troublers (vv.8–9) and the other toward the troubled (v.10). "He will punish" (GK 1689; lit., "render vengeance"—the word stem for "vengeance" is the same as that for "right" in v.5 and "just" in v.6) has no overtones of selfish vindictiveness or revenge, but proceeds from the justice of God to accomplish appropriate punishment for criminal offenses.

The recipients of God's avenging judgment will be in two groups. The first group is "those who do not know God." These people come from a Gentile background. They are "without God in the world" (Eph 2:12; cf. Gal 4:8; 1Th 4:5), being estranged from him (Ro 1:18–32). It is appropriate for Gentile persecutors at Thessalonica to be singled out in both letters (cf. 1Th 2:14) because of this church's history (Ac 17:5). Gentiles without any background in OT teaching about God are nonetheless culpable for their persecution of Christians.

The second group is those who "do not obey the Gospel of our Lord Jesus." These are those well-versed in OT Scriptures because of their Jewish backgrounds. Here Paul uses an apt description of unbelieving Jews (cf. Ro 10:3, 16). These are the persecutors against whom such strong feelings were evident in his first letter (1Th 2:14–16). Jews, like Gentiles, had been adamant in their opposition to Christians in Thessalonica and its vicinity (Ac 17:5, 13). Because of this, when the wrath of God makes itself felt at the revelation of the Lord Jesus, both classes of humanity will face dreaded agonies.

9 The most sobering experience of all will culminate God's righteous judgment against his enemies: "everlasting destruction [GK 3897]," the price paid in return for the suffering inflicted on God's people. This does not refer to annihilation, which cannot be "everlasting." Just as endless life belongs to Christians, endless destruction belongs to those opposed to Christ (Mt 25:41, 46).

The consequences of permanent separation from God come out forcibly in the phrase "from the presence of the Lord." Banishment from the Lord's presence is what Jesus taught about punishment (Mt 7:23; 8:12; 22:13; 25:30; Lk 13:27). Words cannot adequately express the misery of this condition. On the other hand, those in Christ can anticipate the very opposite: "we will be with the Lord forever" (1Th 4:17).

The parallel phrase, "from the majesty of his power," likewise signifies separation from God and its anguish. Instead of enjoying God's glory or majesty, an uncrossable gulf will preclude access for those destined to everlasting punishment (cf. Lk 16:24–26).

10 Thankfully, another side of God's repayment remains, that of glorification. "On the day he comes" further defines "when the Lord Jesus is revealed" (v.7). It is composed of two distinct parts: "when he comes" and "in that day." "That day" is a frequent OT designation for the day of the Lord (cf. Isa 2: 11, 17). Here it solemnly emphasizes a time coincident with "when he comes" (see also Mk 13:32; 14:25; Lk 21:34; 2Ti 1:12, 18, 4:8). Earlier Paul has disclosed how the day of the Lord will encompass in its initial stage a period of wrath and tribulation. The tribulation will be climaxed when Jesus Christ returns personally to judge and to inaugurate his reign on earth. In v.10, however, Paul has in view the very beginning of the day, before the wrath—the meeting of Christ with his saints in the air (1Th 4:17; 2Th 1:7a; 2:1). This is the moment of reward for those who have faithfully persevered in all their persecutions and trials (v.4).

The substance of their reward will be participation in the glory and marvel of the Lord's return. Our Lord intends to share his own glory and majesty "in [the midst of] his holy people and ... among all those who have believed." Here is a glorified assembly. Christ's glorification belongs to Christians also. The fact that we will be glorified constitutes more than sufficient incentive to endure life's present trials (cf. Ro 8:17–18; 9:23).

"Those who have believed" becomes very personal as Paul adds "because you believed our testimony to you." These words remind the troubled readers that they themselves will participate in the glory and amazement of that day. Enjoyment of the future glory of Christ's coming is the leading idea of the chapter and a prime incentive for faithfulness.

B. Prayer for Future Acceptance (1:11–12)

11 Not content with the certainty of coming glorification, Paul now prays for its realization. Human minds wrestle with the problem of praying for something already fixed in the unalterable purpose of God. Yet Paul has already done this in these letters (1Th 3:12–13; 5:23; cf. also Rev 22:20). It is God's pleasure for saints to cooperate with his ongoing program (Php 2:12–13).

The purpose of Paul's prayer is "that our God may count you worthy of his calling." This probably corresponds to their worthiness for the kingdom mentioned in v.5. No uncertainty of ultimate acceptance is implied in the prayer, for any uncertainty would undercut, not build, assurance for the fainthearted. On the other hand, certainty in the security of God's purposes does not diminish the need to keep on praying. Ultimate salvation rests on the sure foundation of God's faithfulness (1Th 5:24), but until its actual accomplishment, Paul continues praying for it.

"His calling" (GK 3104) is usually regarded by Paul as a past decree (Ro 11:29; 1Co 1:26). To construe it like this here could imply the possibility of falling away from it. Yet such cannot happen to those already assured of a future worthiness (v.5) based solely on the grace of God (v.12). It is reassuring to know that God's call is made effective quite apart from human merit (cf. Gal 1:13–15; see comment on 1Th 2:12). Instead of limiting the call to what happened before the foundation of the world, the present emphasis on Christ's return (v.10) and the eschatological kingdom of God (v.5) argues for extending the scope of "calling" to include its future outworking at God's righteous judgment (v.5).

Paul's other prayer objective is for God to "fulfill every good purpose of yours and every act prompted by your faith." "Good[ness]" (GK 20) is part of the fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22). Paul prays for the kind of desire that produces goodness—i.e., the active quality that constantly pursues what is right and beneficial for others. "Every act prompted by your faith" is what he had witnessed in them previously (cf. "work produced by faith," 1Th 1:3). What they had already attained was important, but room for growth was still there (cf. 1Th 3:10; 4:1). Realization of these objectives can come only by God's power.

12 Paul now states the purpose of his prayer—the glorification of Christ in the believers and they in him. This is an intermediate step toward the final recognition of the Lord's own worthiness and majesty and the saints' participation in these things with him. "Name" is a reference to the dignity, majesty, and power of the Lord's revealed character.

"In him" is a technical expression initiated by Jesus (Jn 15:4; 17:21); it was taken up by Paul and developed more completely (Ro 6:11, 23; 1Co 1:5; 2Co 13:4; et al.). The thought is that of reciprocity resting on the union of the Lord with his people. They are to share the future moment of glorification together.

Elsewhere Paul shows a continuing zeal to exclude merit from the salvation process (cf. Ro 4:16; 11:5–6; Eph 2:5, 8); so here also "grace" (GK 5921) from both Father and Son (cf. 1:2) is the source of everything. We pray for such things as these and our prayers are answered in harmony with the working of God's grace.

III. Assurance of Noninvolvement in the Day of the Lord (2:1–17)

A. The False Claim (2:1–2)

1–2 The hortatory words "we ask you, brothers" (cf. 1Th 5:12) provides a transition from what Paul has been saying about the day of the Lord to an acute problem related to it. This problem has to do with the eschatological events he has just described in ch. 1. In the interest of truth about this vital hope, Paul must set down accurately certain features of "the day of the Lord" as a corrective to what some were falsely claiming.

He must explain what he means by "the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ and our being gathered to him" or else the solution to the problem cannot be grasped. "Being gathered" (GK 2191) defines which part of the "coming" (parousia; GK 4242) Paul has in mind. This is the great event he described more fully in 1Th 4:14–17—i.e., the gathering of those in Christ to meet him in the air en route to the Father in heaven. This begins the day of the Lord. The relationship that this happening bears to the tribulation phase of the day of the Lord so frequently mentioned in these letters is important. Some limit the parousia to a single event and insist that it comes after the tribulation. It is hardly possible, though, to explain the variety of relationships belonging to the parousia in these letters if it is understood only as a single event. Even the meaning of the word suggests a longer duration.

Another problem is encountered if the parousia that initiates the day of the Lord is considered as the single event of Christ's return to earth following the tribulation. If Paul had given oral or written instruction to this effect, the false claim that the day of the Lord was already present could hardly have alarmed these Christians. According to this scheme, the day of the Lord could not begin without Christ's personal reappearance. His continued absence was obvious to all.

Yet the claim was made and accepted to the extent that the church was troubled. This implies Paul had not taught that a one-phase parousia after the period of wrath would begin the day of the Lord. He had told them that the coming of the Lord to gather his saints into heaven would initiate both the tribulation and the day of the Lord. They were promised immediate "rest" (1:7) and glorification with Christ (1:10), not increased persecution.

The false instruction had, however, denied them an imminent "rest." They would first have to undergo the severe persecution of the tribulation and possibly even suffer martyrdom before Christ's coming, according to these misrepresentations. They were even told that their current suffering indicated the arrival of the expected tribulation. Paul speaks in 2:3–4, 8–12 of this future period in terms quite similar to those of Rev 13 and 17. The man of lawlessness has a number of affinities with the beasts of Revelation, enough to show that the two books describe the same period. Though 2 Thessalonians does not specifically mention the beast's war with the saints and their martyrdom, Rev 13:7, 10 declares it explicitly. If this is a possibility for the church, why did Paul at no point teach this kind of anticipation? The answer must lie in the removal of Christians (including the Thessalonian believers) from earth before this persecution. It is another group of God's people, following the church's translation, who must face the terror of this archenemy.

Despite their "persecutions and trials" (1:4) these Thessalonian Christians were not living in the day of the Lord, as they had been erroneously told. A right understanding of "being gathered to him" reveals that they could not be so enmeshed, because for them Christ's parousia will antedate the awful period to come. In fact, their "being gathered to him" would be the event that signals the day's beginning.

As their friend and brother, Paul respectfully requests ("we ask," v.1; cf. 1Th 4:1) them not to become "unsettled or alarmed" (v.2). This might easily happen if they were led to believe that somehow the glorious coming had passed them by. "Unsettled" (GK 4888) means "to be shaken from your sensibleness [lit., mind]." Distorted teaching had "alarmed" (GK 2583) them. Paul cautioned them against hastily adopting something other than the instruction he had previously given them (cf. v.15).

False teaching that purported to have come from Paul had reached them through three possible avenues. (1) One was the spiritual gift of "prophecy" (lit., "spirit," v.2; GK 4460) or something like it (see also 1Th 5:19–20). Whatever the specific medium, the teaching was represented as having Paul's authority. (2) A second avenue was the spoken word ("report"; GK 3364). Though this did not claim the direct inspiration of prophecy, it too was based on an allegedly Pauline foundation. (3) The same basis was claimed for a third medium of communication—"letter." Someone had misrepresented Paul's views in a letter bearing his name, a mistake he will rectify in any future correspondence (cf. 3:17–18). It is not clear whether the readers had been misguided through one or all three channels, but in any case Paul denounces them all.

The false teaching consisted in the claim that "the day of the Lord has already come" (lit., "is present"; GK 1931). This word denotes actual presence. These readers who knew about the day (1Th 5:2) knew that its earlier phase would be a time of heightened persecution for the saints. Their suffering had already been so severe that someone tried to convince them that the period was already in progress, even though the Lord had not yet come to gather them to heaven. They knew of the time of trouble and the Lord's return to culminate it (1:7–9). They had been led to believe, however, that his coming for them would spare them the anguish of that hour (1Th 5:9). But here were people telling them, with Paul's apparent backing, that such a deliverance was not to be.

Therefore they were in great need of an authentic word from Paul assuring them that they had understood him correctly in his first letter. They needed to know that the parousia of Christ for his church would mark the beginning of the future day of trouble and consequently that the day had not yet arrived. To accomplish this, Paul proceeded to describe features, obviously not yet present, that would characterize the day's early stages.

B. The True Condition (2:3–12)

1. Defiance (yet to come) (2:3–4)

3 Paul supplements his request in v. 1 with a prohibition: "Don't let anyone deceive you in any way." Apparently those who willfully and maliciously troubled the Thessalonian believers had done this by deceiving anyone who would listen to them regarding the day of the Lord. Paul warns his readers not to be taken in by these speculations. He does not say what moved these promoters of error. Perhaps a misunderstanding of grace led them to teach that Christians must earn their part in the parousia by persevering through severe suffering. Whatever it was, Paul is determined to prove that his readers were not in the day of the Lord.

In the second part of this verse, the Greek sentence is not complete; it presupposes something to be added from the previous verse; i.e., "that day will not come" (lit., "that day is not present"). According to Paul's argument here, two conspicuous phenomena that will dominate the day's opening phase had not yet happened. That is, his readers had not missed the rapture (1Th 4:15–17) and were not in the day of the Lord (v.2) because two clear indicators of the earliest stage of this eschatological period had not yet appeared (cf. introduction to 1 Thessalonians).

Let us put it this way. Suppose the government of some country should announce, "In the near future on a date known only to us, Christianity will be suppressed. To mark the official beginning of this policy, on the appointed day the largest church in the country will be demolished and its pastor required to renounce Christianity publicly. Thereafter, all who admit they are Christians will be placed in jeopardy of imprisonment." At that time a foreigner might arrive in that country, having heard nothing more than that Christianity would be cruelly suppressed. He would doubtless find some Christians already experiencing certain hardships and, in his ignorance of the timing of the actual beginning of the policy of suppression, might assume that it was already in effect. A citizen who knew the details of the policy would have to tell him, "The period of suppression of Christianity is not yet present, because the largest church in the country has not yet been demolished and its pastor has not yet renounced Christianity publicly."

So far there is no logical problem. But some who have problems with the pretribulational view of the rapture ask, "How can the nonarrival of two events ('the rebellion' and the revealing of 'the man of lawlessness,' v.3) that initiate the day of the Lord, a period that will come after the believers have been raptured—how can the nonarrival of these events prove to the confused Thessalonian believers (who are to be raptured and thus will not be in the day of the Lord) that they are not actually in that day?" The answer still is that the absence of the phenomena demonstrates the nonpresence of the day of the Lord. Obviously, had "the rebellion" and the revealing of "the man of lawlessness" already taken place when Paul was writing this letter, then the teaching of the priority of the rapture to "the day of the Lord" would have been called into question. But here in ch. 2 Paul is not discussing the timing of the rapture. He is simply reassuring his readers that "the day of the Lord" had not come. Nor does he at any place in this context (vv.1–12) tell his readers that they will at some future time "see" the two initial phenomena of "the day of the Lord." Had he said that, there would indeed be a problem. But he did not speak of the Thessalonians' actually seeing the phenomena. He simply stressed the present nonarrival of the phenomena.

To sum up, let us return to the analogy of the newcomer to the country facing the suppression of Christianity. Suppose now that, arriving after the initial announcement, he is a short-term visitor due to leave before the official beginning of the anti-Christian policy. The answer to his confusion about being in the country with the policy already in effect would be corrected by his realizing that the largest church would have to be destroyed and its pastor publicly renounce Christianity before suppression of Christianity began. And this would be a valid answer, even though he would not be present when these things took place.

The troubled at Thessalonica could take heart in knowing they had not missed the gathering of those in Christ at the parousia (v.1). Their present persecutions were not identifiable with those to be inflicted by the man of lawlessness on a later group of saints after the eschatological day begins.

A closer look at the two phenomena accompanying the day of the Lord illuminates the characteristics of that day. "The rebellion" represents apostasia (GK 686), from which the English word apostasy comes. This word points to a deliberate abandonment of a former professed position. Attempts to identify the apostasy with some past or present movement are futile because of its contextual association with the Lord Jesus' second advent (v.1). Other passages in Scripture likewise anticipate a defection of professing Christians (see Mt 24:11–12, 24; 1Ti 4:1ff.; 2Ti 3:1–5; 4:3–4; 2Pe 2:1–22; 3:3–6; Jude 17–18). After the rapture of those in Christ (1Th 4:17), all who are truly in him will be gone. Conditions will be ripe for people, especially those who call themselves Christians but are not really such, to turn their backs on God. Then their insincerity will demonstrate itself outwardly. This worldwide anti-God movement will be so universal as to earn for itself a special designation: "the apostasy"—i.e., the climax of the increasing apostate tendencies evident before the rapture of the church.

Following and in conjunction with the apostasy will come the unveiling of a mighty figure embodying everything opposed to God. His whereabouts before his unveiling are not given. He will be alive for years before his unveiling, but his dramatic public presentation will occur after the rebellion begins.

Paul characterizes this figure in three ways. (1) He is "the man of lawlessness"; i.e., he is the epitome of opposition to the laws of God. Satan so indwells and operates through him that his main delight will be in breaking God's righteous laws. (2) He is "the man doomed to destruction" (lit., "the son of perdition"). That is, he belongs to this class of people. The same expression describes Judas Iscariot (Jn 17:12), another member of this class.

4 (3) This individual "opposes and exalts himself over everything that is called God or is worshiped." His direct and determined opposition to the true God will be a leading feature of the continuing apostasy. It will be especially marked by removal of the symbolic articles from the Jerusalem temple. The man of lawlessness will occupy the holy precincts in order to accept and even demand worship that is due God alone. This evidently is a Jewish temple to be rebuilt in Jerusalem in the future. Dependence of these words on Da 9:26–27; 11:31, 36–37; 12:11 (cf. Mt 24:15; Mk 13:14) demands such a reference. There is no impressive evidence for understanding "temple" (GK 3724) in a nonliteral sense. The well-known "abomination that causes desolation" (Mk 13:14) is sometimes regarded as a person and sometimes as an act of desecration by that person. The act of desecration to which this verse looks will transpire halfway through the seventieth prophetic week of Da 9:24–27, when the covenant made earlier with the Jewish people is broken. This will mark the climax of this lawless one's career. Historically, a foreshadowing of this blasphemous intrusion happened when Antiochus Epiphanes desecrated the temple in Jerusalem just before the Maccabean revolt.

The relationship of this portion of 2 Thessalonians to Christ's parousia confirms the impression that Paul must be referring to a single historical personage. Quests for such a person in the past and present have proved fruitless. Resemblances to Antiochus Epiphanes, Nero, Diocletian, one of the popes, and others may be admitted. But fulfillment of all details of the prophecy must await the future period of this man's prominence. "The man of lawlessness" will be a new historical figure whom Satan will energize to do his will in the world. As "man of God" in the OT regularly designates a divine prophet, the present "man of lawlessness" designates a false prophet, probably to be identified with the second beast of Rev 13:11ff. (cf. Rev 16:13; 19:20; 20:10). His primary function will be to preside over the religious apostasy in cooperation with the beast out of the sea (Rev 13:1ff.), who leads political opposition to God. As God's chief opponent in Jerusalem whose background is probably Jewish (cf. Da 11:36–37), the lawless one will give religious leadership to complement the dominance of his associate over governments of the world's nations.

The presence of such an apostasy and counterfeit god will not escape international observation. The nonpresence of these things when Paul wrote proves his thesis regarding the nonarrival of the day of the Lord.

2. Delay (presently in effect) (2:5–7)

5 A note of impatience may be detected in Paul's question. If the Thessalonian believers had recalled Paul's oral teaching, disturbing elements in the newly arisen false system could have been eliminated. Paul was certain about their previous familiarity with the substance of vv.3–4 because he had personally given them this information.

6 So he can declare, "You know what is holding him back." "Now" should be connected with "what is holding him back" rather than with "you know," to indicate that "holding back" is a present phenomenon. "What is holding . . . back" (GK 2988) is a neuter title for this restraining force. The word recurs in the masculine in v.7, where it is translated "one who . . . holds it back."

Proposed identifications of this phenomenon have been multiple. Because of inability to explain the neuter-masculine combination, such suggestions as the preaching of the Gospel, the Jewish state, the binding of Satan, the church, the Gentile world dominion, and human government are improbable as a referent for the restrainer. Moreover, to identify it with a supernatural force or person hostile to God is difficult because the restrainer is limiting Satan (vv.7–9), not cooperating with him. A popular understanding since early times has been that this is a reference to the Roman Empire (neuter) and its ruler (masculine). Paul had several times benefited from the intervention of the Roman government (Ac 17:6ff.; 18:6ff.). Though preferable to some other solutions, this explanation is disappointing in several ways. Paul nowhere else predicts the demise of the Roman Empire (cf. v.7). In addition, the Roman emperors sometimes precipitated anti-Christian activities rather than restrained them. Elimination of this solution is sealed when we remember that the Roman Empire has long since ceased to exist, and the appearance of Christ or the lawless one has yet to take place.

It is evident that the restrainer, to accomplish his mission, must have supernatural power to hold back a supernatural enemy (v.9). God and the outworking of his providence is the natural answer. Reference to God is favored by the restrainer's harmony with divine purpose and a divine timetable ("at the proper time," v.6). Yet to say that God is the restrainer is not quite enough to explain the variation in gender.

To one familiar with the Lord Jesus' Upper Room Discourse (Jn 13–17), as Paul undoubtedly was, fluctuation between neuter and masculine in reference to the Holy Spirit is common. Either gender is appropriate, depending on whether one thinks of natural agreement (masculine, because the Spirit is a person) or grammatical (neuter, because the noun pneuma [GK 4460] is neuter). This identification of the restrainer with deep roots in church history is most appealing. The special presence of the Spirit as the indweller of saints will terminate as abruptly at the parousia as it began at Pentecost. Once the body of Christ has been caught away to heaven, the Spirit's ministry will revert back to what he did for believers during the OT period. His function of restraining evil through the body of Christ (Jn 16:7–11; 1Jn 4:4) will cease similarly to the way he terminated his striving in the days of Noah (Ge 6:3). At that point the reins will be removed from lawlessness and the satanically inspired rebellion will begin. It appears that "what is holding back" was readily recognized at Thessalonica as a title for the Holy Spirit on whom the readers had come to depend in their personal attempts to combat lawlessness (1Th 1:6; 4:8; 5:19; 2Th 2:13).

God has a "proper time" for the lawless one's revelation, just as he does for the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven (1:7). No one knows that time, since it is part of the future day of the Lord (1Th 5:2; 2Th 2:2–3). Until the gathering of saints (2:1), the Spirit will continue his restraining work.

7 Further clarification ("for") is in order. The "secret power [lit., "mystery"; GK 3696] of lawlessness" was already evident in such things as their own persecutions (1:4), but lawlessness will be open when the rebellion arrives and the lawless one is unveiled (2:3, 8). The secrecy and limitation are attributable to "the one who now holds it back." Upon his removal, the rebellion will break out.

3. Deception and destruction (after the delay) (2:8–10)

Departure of the restrainer is the cue for the revelation (v.8) and coming (v.9) of the lawless one. That revelation, already mentioned in v.3 in conjunction with the rebellion and in v.6 as being delayed until the proper time by the restrainer's presence, is of satanic origin, though admittedly it can happen only by God's permission. Satan's present efforts to effect unhindered lawlessness are frustrated by divine restraint (v.7), but through cessation of the Spirit's indwelling ministry to the body of Christ, his lawless one will be granted a future interval to do his worst.

8 After this time has elapsed, the Lord Jesus will personally come to earth to "overthrow" (lit., "slay"; GK 359) the lawless one "with the breath of his mouth" and "destroy" (lit., "abolish"; GK 2934) him "by the splendor of his coming" (parousia; GK 4242). By putting the lawless one to death, the Lord will also bring to an end his program of deceiving the world. "The breath of his mouth" could be a figurative reference to a word spoken by Christ, but a literal sense is quite satisfactory. The breath of God is a fierce weapon according to the OT (Ex 15:8; 2Sa 22:16; Job 4:9; Ps 33:6; Isa 30:27–28). "The splendor [or "appearance"; GK 2211] of his coming" is his other means of conquest. The translation "appearance" is preferred, since in the Pastoral Letters this word is practically equivalent to parousia as a name for his coming (1Ti 6:14; 2Ti 1:10; 4:1, 8; Tit 2:13). This "appearance" phase of the parousia differs from the "gathering" phase (v.1). It concludes and climaxes the tribulation instead of beginning it. The visible presence of the Lord Jesus in the world will put an immediate stop to an accelerated diabolical program.

9–10a That Satan is the root of the lawless one's deception is explicit in a further elaboration. The word for "work" (GK 1918) is reserved for supernatural activities; i.e., a superhuman person will utilize supernatural means of "miracles, signs and wonders." These remarkable phenomena, which in the past were used so effectively in laying a foundation for the church (Ac 2:22, 43; 4:30; 5:12; 6:8; 7:36; 14:3; 15:12; Ro 15:19; 2Co12:12; Heb 2:4), will be redirected to purposes of deceit. They will be "counterfeit" (GK 6022) in the sense that they produce false impressions, deluding people to the point of accepting the lie as truth (cf. v.11). The motivation of the lawless one is to deceive; it is the nature of unrighteousness to palm itself off as righteousness. "Those who are perishing" will be particularly vulnerable to trickery. Not only will they confuse unrighteousness with righteousness; they will also attribute deity to this lawless one (v.4).

10b Their blindness will be self-imposed because of a prior refusal to "love the truth and so be saved." They lack a positive committal to the Gospel. This is just as blamable as indifference or even antagonism toward the truth. The right choice could have brought them salvation and deliverance from the lawless one's devices, but they elected not to receive God's salvation.

4. Delusion and divine judgment (because of present recalcitrance) (2:11–12)

11 By covering again the same ground in vv.11–12 as in vv.9–10, Paul reemphasizes the fate of rejecters of the truth and adds more information about them. Already he has shown Satan's part in getting them to believe lies and bewildering them with deceitful measures, and he has shown their refusal to love the truth. Because they deliberately reject God, he himself will send them "a powerful delusion"; this is another way of referring to the lie (v.9) and deceit (v.10) already predicted. The end result is that they will "believe the lie." This is their only alternative because they have refused to love the truth (v.10). They will be completely defenseless against the false claims of the lawless one (v.4) and his perversion of the true Gospel. The satanic promise that deceived Eve (Ge 3:5) will find its ultimate fulfillment in the end-time master of deceit. They will mistake someone else and his lying promises for God and his truth.

12 The ultimate consequences for them will be condemnation. Failing to appropriate the truth of the Gospel, they willingly choose wickedness instead; they cannot blame circumstances. Retrospect will show their own wrongly directed personal delight to be the cause of God's adverse judgment against them (cf. 1:9). What an incentive this powerful passage is for non-Christians to turn to God before the rebellion and delusion arrive!

C. The Truth's Continuance (2:13–17)

1. Thanks for divine deliverance (2:13–14)

13 Paul is thankful that God chose some to believe the truth and to be delivered from delusion and divine judgment. He and his co-workers can rejoice in looking forward to salvation for themselves and their converts, an anticipation drastically different from the outlook for those awaiting perdition (cf. v.10). The salvation viewed from its human side in 1:3ff. is now seen as an undertaking of God.

For Paul to address these "brothers" as those "loved by the Lord" (cf. 1Th 1:4) is appropriate, because God chose them to be saved. "From the beginning" refers to their pretemporal election (cf. 1Th 1:4); Paul usually places God's prior choice of people to salvation (v.13) alongside their historical call (v.14; cf. Ro 8:30). This salvation entails present benefits and also future deliverance from the doom that will befall the lost at Christ's return (cf. 1:6, 8–9; 2:8–12). God's choice operates in the realm of belief in the truth and of the Spirit's sanctifying work. "Belief in the truth" is the means of the beginning and continuing relationships of salvation (cf. vv.10–12). The role of the Spirit in sanctification looms large for Paul (Ro 15:16; 1Co 6:11–12; 1Th 4:7–8) as it does for Peter (1Pe 1:2).

14 God has fulfilled his foreordained purpose by calling the chosen to this salvation "through our gospel." The good news of divine truth conveyed through Paul's preaching was the means whereby God called these Thessalonian converts at a particular point in time. What God purposed in eternity was carried out in history, so that they might share "in the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ." God's design was to make them adopted children who participate in Christ's glory at the parousia (coming; cf. 1:10, 12). They do not earn this status or in any other way acquire it for themselves. It is accomplished solely by God.

2. Call to doctrinal adherence (2:15)

15 "So then" turns the discussion to a practical responsibility derived from God's elective purpose (vv.13–14). Against a background of such an imminent world crisis as described in vv.1–10, the beneficiaries of God's saving work cannot afford to lapse into lethargy, but must respond with loyal steadfastness ("stand firm"; GK 5112) and must keep a firm hold on the traditions ("teachings"; GK 1438) taught them by Paul and his associates. A continuation in basic Christian doctrines would have alleviated the instability and alarm that prompted the writing of this letter (cf. v.2). Paul himself received Christian traditions subsequent to his conversion (cf. 1Co 15:3–5), and through divine revelation he had originated other traditions (1Th 4:15). These he had passed on to his converts both "by word of mouth" and "by letter" in his previous contacts with them. In light of their inclusion in God's saving purpose (vv.13–14), he commands them to remain unmovable and cling tenaciously to these doctrines.

3. Prayer for practical compliance (2:16–17)

16–17 As Paul closes ch. 2 with a prayer, he recognizes that he and his co-workers cannot in themselves make the appeal effective. Only God himself, who initially chose them (vv.13–14), can do that. Addressing his prayer to the first two persons of the Trinity, Paul names the Son before the Father (contra 1Th 3:11), probably in line with the Son's worthiness of equal honor with the Father and his special prominence in the chapter's emphasis on future salvation and glory. Yet the two persons are one God, as shown by several structural features in vv.16–17: (1) The pronoun "himself" is singular and probably should be understood as emphasizing both persons—"our Lord Jesus Christ and God our Father himself" (cf. 1Th 3:11). (2) "Loved us and . . . gave us" (v.16) represents two singular participles whose actions are applicable to both the Son and the Father. The singular number is explained by Paul's conception of the two persons as one God. (3) "Encourage and strengthen" (v.17) are likewise singular in number, though they express the action of a compound subject. This grammatical feature is attributable to the oneness of essence among the persons of the Godhead (cf. Jn 10:30). Paul conceived of Jesus Christ as God in the same full sense as he conceived of God the Father.

Paul notes that the Son and the Father will answer this prayer because they "loved us" and graciously "gave us eternal encouragement and good hope"; this is shown by the incarnation and death of Jesus Christ, which are often referred to in terms of God's loving and giving (Jn 3:16; Ro 5:5, 8; 8:35, 37; Gal 2:20; 1Jn 4:10). Because of God's love displayed in Christ, Paul's readers had a source of unending "encouragement" (GK 4155) to offset their persecutions and accompanying doubts.

Paul prays that the encouragement provided in the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ may be appropriated inwardly and thereby give them strength for "every good deed and word." Disquiet regarding the coming of the Lord (v.2) was the need to be met. As God undertakes their cause, they can "stand firm and hold to the teachings" (v.15).

IV. Encouragement to Gainful Employment (3:1–15)

A. Prayerful Preparation for Encounter (3:1–5)

1. Prayer for Paul (3:1–2)

1 Eschatological matters were Paul's main concern in writing this letter. "Finally" indicates that these have in the main been dealt with. Yet an important and related matter needs to be discussed before the letter ends. Before discussing it, Paul makes one of his typical requests for prayer (cf. Ro 15:30–31; Eph 6:18–19; Col 4:3; 1Th 5:25; Phm 22). He desires the Gospel to "spread rapidly" (a picture of running) and "be honored" (a picture of triumph). As more people receive the good news, victories are being won and God is glorified. "Just as it was with you" recalls the amazing success of the message in Thessalonica (cf. 1Th 1:5–6, 8; 2:13). Paul wanted this repeated in other communities where he would preach Christ

2 Again, Paul asked prayer for deliverance "from wicked and evil men." "Wicked" (GK 876) labels them as capable of outrageous and harmful acts against others; "evil" (GK 4505) speaks of persons not only themselves thoroughly corrupted but intent on corrupting others and drawing them into their own slide toward perdition. Who were they? The best suggestion ties these "wicked and evil men" to unbelieving Jews in Corinth where Paul was encountering opposition as he wrote (Ac 18:5–6, 12–13). As Paul wrote this second letter, he was facing a severe crisis in Corinth.

Evil people exist because "not everyone has faith." This understatement effectively highlights the large number of those who have not responded to the Gospel by believing in Christ. That the persecutors had had the opportunity to believe but had rejected it accounts for their vicious reaction against the message and those who preached it.

2. Prayer for the people (3:3–5)

3 In contrast with the widespread lack of faith among people (v.2) is the faithfulness of the Lord Jesus. He can be relied on to "strengthen [GK 5114; cf. 2:17] and protect [GK 5875]" Christians "from the evil one." Here is assurance of inner security and an outward protection from the author of evil whose activity is so prominent in these letters (1Th 2:18; 3:5; 2Th 2:9). Jesus' faithfulness provides a defense against even the touch of the enemy (cf. 1Jn 5:18).

4 The faithfulness of the Lord is supplemented by the faithfulness of his people. That is why Paul can add this verse—he has confidence in Christian people. Their union with Christ counteracts the weakness of sinful human nature. Paul and his co-workers can rely on the Thessalonian believers to do what they have been taught (cf. 1Th 4:2). By this favorable opinion, he paves the way for further instruction (cf. 3:6–15).

5 Paul realizes that the Lord's help is indispensable. His compliment in v.4 does not imply that they are self-sufficient. Therefore he requests the Lord to direct them into a fuller appreciation of God's love for them and of Christ's perseverance on their behalf. To comply with Paul's instructions to discipline the idle believers (vv.6–15) will be difficult. Thus the strongest possible motivation—recollection of God's love and Christ's endurance of suffering—will undergird that discipline.

B. Proper Solution for Idleness (3:6–15)

1. Previous instruction and example (3:6–10)

6 Now Paul comes to his command regarding the idle. That he invokes "the name of the Lord Jesus Christ" shows the urgency of the command. All those who remain idle are to be denied the privilege of associating with their fellow Christians. "Idle" (GK 865) translates a word meaning "disorderly" (cf. 1Th 5:14). The disorder defined by the remainder of the paragraph is loafing, being remiss in daily work and conduct. This is contrary to the "teaching" that Paul had given them earlier (cf. 1Th 4:11–12; 5:14). No excuse could justify such misconduct. Paul therefore advocates the drastic discipline of keeping away from the "idle."

7–9 Paul himself was not idle. His readers could verify this claim ("you yourselves know," v.7; cf. 1Th 2:1; 3:3; 4:2; 5:2). In imitating Paul, they would be imitating the Lord himself (1Th 1:6) because Paul's life was so carefully patterned after his Lord's. He did not loaf at Thessalonica (v.7b), nor depend on others to supply him with free food (v.8a). He supported himself in spite of much fatigue ("laboring," v.8) and many obstacles ("toiling," v.8; cf. 1Th 2:9) in order to relieve the new Christians in Thessalonica of the burden of maintaining him.

Paul did not have to exert himself so tirelessly. As an apostle, he had "the right to such help" (v.9; cf. 1Co 9:4ff.; 1Th 2:7) from his converts. He decided, however, to forgo this privilege and leave an example for them to imitate.

10 Paul reinforced his example by this definite "rule." From a very early time denying food to the lazy was a traditional form of discipline in the church.

2. Renewed instruction (3:11–12)

11–12 Here the previously given rule (v.10) is repeated because of reports that the problem of loafing had recurred. People who came from Thessalonica to Corinth had reported this. Some of their number had stopped working, even since receiving the corrective of 1Th 4:11–12 and 5:14. They were using the extra time to interfere in other people's affairs.

"In the Lord Jesus Christ" Paul commanded such people to settle down and earn the bread they eat. He uses the common union of believers with Christ as ground for his appeal. He might well have addressed the idle ones pejoratively as "you loafers," but instead he tactfully refers to them as "such people," doubtless hoping to lead them back to earning their own food. Thus, order would replace the disruption caused by their idleness and meddling.

The apostle Paul supported himself in his missionary activity by working in leather (possibly making tents out of leather). In Corinth he joined the leather business of Aquila and Priscilla (see Ac 18:1–3). Drawing by Rachel Bierling.

3. Corrective separation (3:13–15)

13–15 Paul now describes specifically how the Thessalonian Christians should deal with loafers who disobey his instructions. First, they are urged to keep on "doing what is right." "Tire" (GK 1591) implies the possibility of their losing heart in struggling with their idle brothers. Exemplary conduct serves as a constant reprimand to wrongdoers and is an incentive for them to turn from their delinquency. Included in doing right is generosity toward those in need. Yet to keep on supporting those who have nothing because they refuse to work is wrong (v.10).

So the Thessalonians must deal firmly yet charitably with the mistakes of their fellow Christians. They were not to "associate" (GK 5264) with anyone refusing to comply with the work ethic set out in this letter, so that they might be ashamed of their behavior. Such people were not to be expelled from the church like the sinning brother referred to in 1Co 5. In Corinth the offense was so flagrant as to bring disrepute on the whole church. In Thessalonica, however, the lapse was not yet so aggravated as to bring the reproach of the pagans on the church. The erring people were allowed to continue in the meetings, but probably were denied participation in such things as the love feast and the Lord's Supper. Certainly they were not to be given food, because this would make the community appear to condone the offense.

To sum up, any recalcitrant idler was not to be treated as an enemy, cut off from all contacts, but was allowed to continue in a brotherly status. So lines of communication were kept open for continued warnings about his behavior.

V. Conclusion (3:16–18)

A. Prayer for God's Peace and Presence (3:16)

16 "Now" (or perhaps more accurately "but") once again marks a transition from command and exhortation to prayer. The prayer recognizes that ultimately God alone can bring about compliance with what Paul has asked of his readers. "Yet without the Lord's help all your efforts will be in vain" is the thought behind this petition. "The Lord of peace" alone can make harmony among believers a reality. While this is, first and foremost, peace with God, it provides the ground for believers' peace with one another (Eph 2:14–18; cf. 1Th 5:23). "At all times" asks that there be no break in the flow of Christ's peace (cf. Jn 14:27; 16:33; Col 3:15); "in every way" asks that the prevalence of peace continue no matter what the outward circumstances. "The Lord be with all of you" requests what was previously guaranteed for Christians; his promise never to forsake his own provides assurance of this (Heb 13:5). Here is an instance of the cooperation of prayer in fulfilling what God's purpose predetermines (cf. 1:11–12).

B. Personalized Benediction (3:17–18)

17–18 Paul has been dictating to an amanuensis (a secretary) up to 3:17 (cf. Ro 16:22; 1Co 16:21; Col 4:18). At this point he takes the pen into his own hand to add a closing greeting. Though he undoubtedly did this frequently, he calls attention to it only here, in 1Co 16:21, and in Col 4:18. The greeting in his own hand, "which is the distinguishing mark" in all his letters (v. 17), includes the benediction of v.18. Apparently Paul followed this practice consistently, expecting churches where he had served to recall his distinctive handwriting. It was particularly needed in this letter as a deterrent against any attempt to forge a letter in his name (cf. 2:2).

Even when Paul did not call attention to it, a closing benediction came in his own hand. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with all of you" or a near equivalent is found at the close of all Paul's writings. The present benediction agrees verbatim with that of 1Th 5:28 except for the "all" added here. Significantly, no one was excluded from Paul's good wishes toward this church, not even those he had rebuked at various points.

1 Timothy

INTRODUCTION

The letters 1 Timothy, Titus, and 2 Timothy—probably written in that order and commonly called the Pastoral Letters—form a rather closely knit unity. They are somewhat distinct from Paul's other ten letters and share common problems of authorship and date. It is logical, then, to treat some of these issues together (see also introduction to Titus).

1. Authorship

All three Pastoral Letters begin with Paul's name. Many scholars have questioned, however, whether the apostle Paul really wrote these letters. We must investigate this subject at some length. Four arguments have been commonly raised against the Pauline authorship of these three letters.

a. Historical

According to some, the events in the Pastoral Letters do not fit into the account in Acts. For example, nowhere in Acts do we read about Paul preaching in Crete and leaving Titus there (Tit 1:5). Nor does his leaving Timothy at Ephesus fit into the Acts account. On these points all scholars agree.

But was Paul put to death at the end of his Roman imprisonment described in the closing verses of Acts? Most likely not. Rather, he was released from this imprisonment and made further journeys, during which he wrote 1 Timothy and Titus. It was during a later imprisonment that he wrote 2 Timothy.

There is considerable evidence for this position. Many of the church fathers testify to the accuracy of this history. The most definitive statement comes from Eusebius, who writes (A.D. 325):

> Paul is said, after having defended himself, to have set forth again upon the ministry of preaching, and to have entered the city [Rome] a second time, and to have ended his life by martyrdom. Whilst then a prisoner, he wrote the Second Letter to Timothy, in which he both mentions his first defence, and his impending death.

b. Ecclesiastical

In the Pastoral Letters we read about overseers, elders, and deacons. It is claimed by some scholars that this shows a more advanced church organization than existed during the lifetime of Paul.

But a careful reading of Tit 1:5–9 shows that "elders" (GK 4565) and "overseers" (GK 2176) are terms used interchangeably. In Php 1:1 (a letter that most accept as a genuine letter of Paul), the apostle addresses the "overseers and deacons" in the church at Philippi (see comments on Php 1:1). Furthermore, the situation a generation later was quite different (see the letters of Ignatius, c. A.D. 115). Here each local church had one overseer, several presbyters, and several deacons. The evidence is clear that the Pastoral Letters reflect the type of church organization known to Paul rather than a later type. Thus, a second-century date for the Pastorals seems unrealistic.

c. Doctrinal

A third argument against Pauline authorship is the claim that the doctrinal emphases of the Pastorals are different from those in Paul's earlier letters, especially the recurring use of the expression "sound doctrine" (2Ti 4:3; Tit 1:9; 2:1).

However, the later Jewish-Christian Gnostic heresy seems to have been present in an early form during Paul's lifetime, and Paul apparently combats it in the Pastorals. It is generally acknowledged today that Gnostic ideas had penetrated Judaism before the advent of Christianity. This fact makes it conceivable that Paul would use different words and concepts in answering those concerns. Paul also opposed Gnostic ideas in his letter to the Colossians (see introduction to Colossians).

d. Linguistic

The most serious argument against the genuineness of the Pastoral Letters is their difference in style and vocabulary from Paul's earlier writings. This is the main point stressed today by negative critics. One scholar, for example, found 175 words used nowhere else in the NT and 130 words not used elsewhere by Paul but shared by other NT writers. These statistics have carried great weight with many twentieth-century scholars.

But such numbers assume that we know everything about Paul's language and do not take into account differences of subject matter, of circumstances, and of addressees—all of which may lead to new words. An accurate statistical study of words requires far more than the limited number we have in the other letters of Paul for comparison.

In recent years several scholars have been suggesting that Luke was the amanuensis (secretary) who actually composed the Pastoral Letters under Paul's dictation. The careful student can discover a considerable number of significant Greek words that occur in both Luke-Acts and the Pastorals but nowhere else in the NT. Amanuenses were sometimes given considerable liberty in writing manuscripts, and we know that Paul was in the habit of using them for the actual writing of his letters (cf. Ro 16:22).

The position of this commentary is that Paul wrote these three letters.

2. Date and Place of Origin

The date of Paul's first Roman imprisonment was perhaps A.D. 59–61. The early church unanimously testifies that Paul was put to death by Emperor Nero, who committed suicide in June of A.D. 68. Since Paul asked Timothy to come to him "before winter" (2Ti 4:21), it is obvious that 2 Timothy was written no later than A.D. 67, though it may have been as early as 65. This means that 1 Timothy and Titus were written between 62 and 66. Paul was in Macedonia when he wrote 1 Timothy (see 1Ti 1:3).

3. Destination and Occasion

Timothy was at Ephesus when the apostle wrote him the first letter (1Ti 1:3). Presumably he was still there when Paul wrote the second letter.

These letters are called "pastoral" because they are addressed to pastors of churches to outline pastoral duties. Their responsibilities were twofold: to defend sound doctrine and maintain sound discipline. In 1 Timothy, Paul urges Timothy to stay in Ephesus to make sure that certain men do not teach false doctrines (1Ti 1:3). He goes on to deal with numerous problems that were arising in the church and gives advice as to how Timothy should handle them.

4. Summary of 1 Timothy

Paul begins by warning the young pastor against false teachers, who seem to be Judaizers (1:3–11). He thanks "Christ Jesus our Lord" for his amazing grace to him, "the worst of sinners" (1:12–20). Chapter 2 is taken up with instructions for public worship and ch. 3 with the qualifications of the overseers and deacons in the church. In ch. 4 Paul gives personal instructions to Timothy, again warning him against false teachers (4:1–5) and admonishing him to maintain sound doctrine and sound discipline (4:6–16). Chapter 5 deals mainly with the place of widows in the church (5:3–16) and the treatment of elders (5:17–20). The last chapter has instructions for slaves (6:1–2) and more warnings against false teachers (6:3–5) and the love of money (6:6–10). After a personal charge to Timothy (6:11–16), Paul gives special instructions to the rich (6:17–19).

5. Theological Values

Because both 1 and 2 Timothy were written primarily to an individual whom Paul loved dearly, they provide us with some valuable insights into his life and character. Yet, through Timothy, Paul was speaking to the church at Ephesus, and indeed the letter still speaks to the church of Jesus Christ today.

There is a strong OT background to these letters. This is reflected in the use of the phrase "God our Savior," which occurs five times in the Pastorals (1Ti 1:1; 2:3; Tit 1:3; 2:10; 3:4; see comment on 1Ti 1:1–2) and nowhere else in Paul's letters. But we also find in the Pastorals the typically Pauline emphasis on "our Savior, Christ Jesus" (2Ti 1:10), "Christ Jesus our Savior" (Tit 1:4), and "Jesus Christ our Savior" (Tit 3:6). The significant Pauline expression "in Christ" occurs seven times in 2 Timothy and twice in 1 Timothy.

Furthermore, the fact that salvation is through God's grace rather than our own good works is clearly asserted (2Ti 1:9; Tit 3:5). Closely allied to this is the teaching that eternal life comes by faith in Jesus Christ (1Ti 1:16).

More precisely than anywhere else it is stated: "For there is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus" (1Ti 2:5). It is also declared that this Mediator gave himself "as a ransom for all men" (v.6). Here the doctrine of the atonement comes through clearly. By his coming, Christ "has destroyed death and has brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (2Ti 1:10).

The divine inspiration of the Scriptures is stated in the Pastorals more forcefully than anywhere else in the NT: "All Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness" (2Ti 3:16).

6. Special Problems

In most of Paul's letters he is concerned about the work of the Judaizers in hindering the progress of the Gospel. The mention of "myths and endless genealogies" (1:4) may refer to Judaistic or Gnostic emphases, or to both. But when Paul says that the troublemakers want to be "teachers of the law" (1:7), he is evidently talking about Judaizers (see also Tit 1:14).

There also seems to be a combination of Gnosticism and Judaism in those who "forbid people to marry and order them to abstain from certain foods" (4:3). The first of these prohibitions arose from a false asceticism, based on the Gnostic idea that all matter is evil.

Another troublesome topic concerned who should be enrolled as widows. Paul deals with this at some length and gives specific instructions about their qualifications (5:3–16).

EXPOSITION

I. Salutation (1:1–2)

1 In keeping with the custom of that day, every one of Paul's thirteen letters begins with his name. Born a Roman citizen (Ac 22:27–28), he had been given the Latin name "Paulus" in addition to his Jewish name Saul. At the beginning of his Gentile mission the apostle adopted the habit of using Paul (Ac 13:9).

Paul identifies himself as "an apostle" (GK 693). This word means "one sent on a mission." It was the title Jesus gave to his first twelve disciples (Lk 6:13). After the death of Judas Iscariot, Matthias was elected to take his place (Ac 1:23–26). Later the term was extended to take in Paul and Barnabas (Ac 14:14), the first two missionaries to the Gentile world. Paul's use of this word underscores the fact that he is writing with apostolic authority.

He was an apostle "of Christ Jesus." That is, Christ had commissioned and sent him as a missionary. It was not by his own choice but "by the command of God ... and of Christ Jesus." Paul was conscious of his divine call to the apostolic ministry. He had evidently expected to be a Jewish rabbi, but God had other plans for his life. Only the firm assurance of this could have carried him through all his hardships.

Why did Paul feel a need to mention his apostolic authority in writing to his two faithful colleagues, who never questioned his authority? The answer seems to be that he intended these letters to be read to local church congregations. He knew that both his recipients were being challenged by false teachers and he wanted to strengthen the hands of these two pastors.

The expression "God our Savior" occurs five times in the Pastorals and nowhere else in Paul's letters (see also 2:3; Tit 1:3; 2:10; 3:4). Elsewhere in the NT we find it only in Jude 25. A similar phrase, "God my Savior," occurs in Lk 1:47, in a hymn that is characterized largely by OT language. It is possible that Luke as the amanuensis may have had some influence on the apostle's language at this point (see introduction). It may be, too, that Nero's claim to the title "Savior of the world" caused Paul to assert emphatically that the only real Savior is God, the Supreme Being.

Another unique feature is the designation of Christ as "our hope" (see also Col 1:27). Jesus Christ is the only one in whom we may place our hope for this life and the life to come.

2 The letter is addressed to "Timothy my true son in the faith." Elsewhere Paul refers to him as "my son whom I love, who is faithful in the Lord" (1Co 4:17; see also Php 2:22). The word "true" (GK 1188) means "genuine, true-born." Perhaps the thrust here is twofold: Timothy was a true believer and he was also a genuine convert of Paul's ministry.

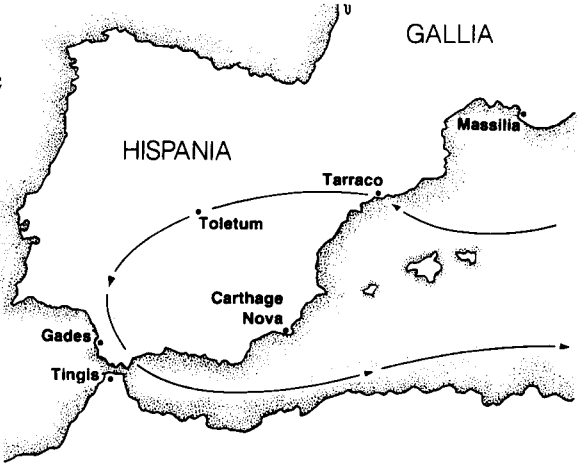
We first meet Timothy in Ac 16:1–3. There we are told that on Paul's second missionary journey he found at Lystra a young disciple named Timothy, the son of a Jewish Christian mother and a Greek father. Paul was so impressed with the young man that he asked him to join the missionary party. It seems clear that Timothy had been converted under Paul's preaching at Lystra on the first missionary journey (about A.D. 47). He had matured so well as a Christian that only two years later (A.D. 49) he was ready to become an apprentice to the great apostle. He became one of Paul's most trusted helpers, so that the apostle could write, "I have no one else like him, who takes a genuine interest in your welfare" (Php 2:20). The life of Timothy is a constant challenge to every young Christian to imitate his devotion and faithfulness.



After the name of the writer (v.1) and the recipient (v.2a) comes the greeting (v.2b). In all ten of Paul's previous letters the greeting is twofold—"grace and peace." Here and in 2 Timothy it is "grace, mercy and peace," which come to us "from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord."

Two things may have suggested the addition of "mercy" (GK 1799). One would be Timothy's frail health (see 5:23); as a loving father, the apostle wishes mercy for his son. The other would be the difficulties that Timothy was encountering at Ephesus; he was in need of God's mercy and help.

"Grace" (GK 5921) is a favorite word with Paul, occurring nearly one hundred times in his letters. First meaning "gracefulness" and then "graciousness," it is used in the NT for the divine favor that God bestows freely on all who believe. "Peace" (GK 1645) has always been the typical greeting of the East (shalom; GK 8934). It is one of God's best gifts to people. In a world of war, hate, and disharmony, this term is particularly significant. In Christ we have peace of heart and mind.

Paul's Fourth Missionary Journey

c. A.D. 62—68

It is clear from Ac 13:1—21:17 that Paul went on three missionary journeys. There is also reason to believe that he made a fourth journey after his release from the Roman imprisonment recorded in Ac 28. The conclusion that such a journey did indeed take place is based on: (1) Paul's declared intention to go to Spain (Ro 15:24, 28), (2) Eusebius's implication that Paul was released following his first Roman imprisonment (Ecclesiastical History, 2.22.2-3) and (3) statements in early Christian literature that he took the gospel as far as Spain (Clement of Rome, Epistle to the Corinthians, ch. 5; Actus Petri Vercellenses, chs. 1-3; Muratorian Canon, lines 34-39).

The places Paul may have visited after his release from prison are indicated by statements of intention in his earlier writings and by subsequent mention in the Pastoral Letters. The order of his travel cannot be determined with certainty, but the itinerary at the right seems likely.

1. Rome—released from prison in A.D. 62
2. Spain—62-64 (Ro 15:24,28)
3. Crete—64-65 (Tit 1:5)
4. Miletus—65 (2Ti 4:20)
5. Colosse—66 (Phm 22)
6. Ephesus—66 (1Ti 1:3)
7. Philippi—66 (Php 2:23-24; 1Ti 1:3)
8. Nicopolis—66-67 (Tit 3:12)
9. Rome—67
10. Martyrdom—67/68

© 1985 The Zondervan Corporation

II. Timothy's Task at Ephesus (1:3–11)

1. Suppression of False Teachers (1:3–8)

3a When Paul went into Macedonia—at exactly what time we do not know—he urged Timothy to remain in Ephesus. As noted in the introduction, it appears that Paul was released from his first Roman imprisonment of two years (cf. Ac 28:30) and that he made another visit to Ephesus. There he discovered some conditions that needed extended attention. So he left Timothy as pastor of this important church.

3b–4a What was the problem that concerned Paul? We find the answer here in the purpose for which Timothy was to remain: "that you may command certain men not to teach false doctrines any longer nor to devote themselves to myths and endless genealogies." The church has always had false teachers—they appeared on the scene in the very first generation, within thirty-five years of the church's birth at Pentecost (A.D. 30–65).

What was the nature of these "false doctrines," and what is meant by "myths and endless genealogies"? There are two possible answers. (1) The reference could be to the vagaries of what became known as Gnosticism, with its endless genealogies of intermediary beings (aeons) between God and humankind. (2) But v.7 suggests that these were Jewish teachers, who were caught up in the mythological treatment of OT genealogies, and Tit 1:14 speaks of "Jewish myths." There is abundant evidence that both these features were found in the Judaism of that day.

4b Paul declares that such teachings "promote controversies rather than God's work— which is by faith." The word translated "work" (GK 3873) means "stewardship" or "dispensation." God's dispensation of truth does not produce whimsical fables but true faith.

5 The "goal" (GK 5465) of this instruction of Paul (and really, all of Paul's teaching and preaching can be included here) is "love" (GK 27). The highest goal of true religion is the unselfish love of full loyalty to God and boundless goodwill to our fellow human beings. This must be our ultimate goal in life.

This love comes "from a pure heart and a good conscience and a sincere faith." Our hearts must be cleansed from self-centered thoughts if we are going to obey the two greatest commandments enunciated by Jesus (Mt 22:37–40). Then we must maintain a good conscience if love is to function properly. And all this is based on "sincere" (lit., "unhypocritical"; GK 537) faith. All love comes from God, and it comes to us only as we are united to him by faith.

6 Unfortunately, some at Ephesus had "wandered away" (lit., "missed the mark"; GK 1762) from a sincere life of faith and had turned to "meaningless talk." They were doing much talking, but saying nothing of value.

7 Paul criticizes these would-be teachers of the Law heavily. His verdict was: "They do not know what they are talking about or what they so confidently affirm." Their self-confidence was empty pretense. They spoke many words, but had little substance.

8 Having identified the false teachers at Ephesus as self-appointed teachers of the Law of Moses, the apostle now points out the true purpose of that law: It is "good if one uses it properly [i.e., lawfully]."

2. The Purpose of the Law (1:9–11)

9a "Law" in this verse has no definite article and probably refers to law in general. The apostle indicates that the purpose of law is not to police good people but bad ones. In other words, we need law for the punishment of criminals and the protection of society.

The list that follows is typically Pauline (cf. Ro 1:24–32). It starts with more general terms, in three pairs: "lawbreakers and rebels, the ungodly and sinful, the unholy and irreligious." These represent attitudes or states of mind. "Lawbreakers" are those who ignore the law, and "rebels" are people who are insubordinate and refuse to be ruled. The word for "ungodly" means one who is deliberately guilty of irreverence. The adjective "irreligious" means having no sense of what is sacred—a common sin of secular society.

9b–10a The sins that follow covers the fifth to the ninth commandments. "Those who kill their fathers . . . mothers" refers especially to dishonoring one's parents. For this outrageous violation of the fifth commandment the punishment of death was provided in the Mosaic Law (Ex 21:15). The fact that "murderers" (cf. the sixth commandment) immediately follows suggests that the sin of murder is also included in this sin concerning the "smiting" of one's parents.

Paul goes on to say that law was made "for adulterers and perverts" (the last term means "male homosexuals"; GK 780; see also 1Co 6:9); both of these sins are against the seventh commandment. Despite its being condoned by some church leaders today, homosexual practices are categorically condemned in both the OT and NT. It is this particular sin that led to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. It is widely recognized as one of the causes for the downfall of the Roman Empire, and its rapid increase today in Europe and North America poses a threat to the future of Western civilization.

"Slave traders" may also be translated "kidnappers" (GK 435). Jewish rabbis specifically applied the eighth commandment about stealing to kidnapping—a crime that has greatly increased in the last few years.

Finally, "liars and perjurers" are both sins that relate to the ninth commandment about honesty and truth-telling.

10b–11 Lest he miss any other important item, Paul adds a general comment about any other sin that opposes "sound doctrine that conforms to the glorious gospel of the blessed God." "Sound" (GK 5617) is one of the key words of the Pastoral Letters. It means "be in good health, to be healthy or sound." It refers to physical health in the Gospels, but an ethical, metaphorical usage as here is widely paralleled in Greek literature.

Does "sound" mean "healthy" or "healthful" (i.e., conducive to good health)? Really, both are included in the meaning. The Gospel is like healthy food, and the law is a sort of medicine that is only applied when one's moral nature is diseased.

"The glorious gospel of the blessed God" is the Gospel that displays God's glory, showing his moral character and perfections as they are exhibited in the person and work of Christ. Paul declares that this Gospel was "entrusted to me" (see 1Co 9:17; Gal 2:7; 1Th 2:4). It amazed him that God should have placed such trust in him—the one who had formerly opposed the Gospel and persecuted the church (cf. vv.12–14). The last clause of this paragraph is therefore a fitting introduction to the next section, in which he thanks God for choosing him.

III. Thanksgiving to God (1:12–17)

1. God's Abundant Grace (1:12–14)

12 Usually the thanksgiving in Paul's letters follows the salutation. But in this case the apostle has inserted between them a statement of his purpose in leaving Timothy at Ephesus. Now we find the familiar expression of thanks. In previous letters, thanksgiving was usually directed to God; here it is to "Christ Jesus our Lord." The lordship of Jesus finds increasing emphasis in Paul's later letters.

Christ has "given me strength" (lit., "empowered me"; GK 1904). He did so because the Lord considered him "faithful" (GK 4412), and he appointed Paul to his "service" (GK 1355). This last word is often a technical word in the NT for Christian ministry.

13 Formerly Paul had been "a blasphemer," meaning that in his opposition to the Christian movement he cursed the name of Jesus. Now he realizes that this was blasphemy, because Jesus is divine. He was also "a persecutor" (see Ac 8:3; 9:1–2, 4–5; 22:4–5; 26:9–11; Gal 1:13). In his zeal to protect Judaism, the young Saul believed that he must destroy Christianity. Third and even worse, he was "a violent man" (GK 5616); this word refers to insolence and extreme violence (cf. Ac 8:3).

In spite of these characteristics, Paul was "shown mercy" (GK 1796) because he "acted in ignorance and unbelief." He was sincere in believing that he was serving God through his violence against the Christian movement. When brought later before the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem, he testified, "I have fulfilled my duty to God in all good conscience to this day" (Ac 23:1). This apparently included his pre-Christian life.

14 It was more than mercy that Paul received from God. He also received "the grace" of God poured out on him, "along with faith and love that are in Christ Jesus." This is another of the apostle's great triads. "Grace" provided his salvation, "faith" appropriated it, and "love" applied it.

2. The Worst of Sinners (1:15–17)

15–16 "Here is a trustworthy saying" is literally "faithful the word" (GK 4412 & 3364);

this formula is found only in the Pastoral Letters (see 3:1; 4:9 2Ti 2:11; Tit 3:8). Here and in 4:9 we find the added words: "that deserves full acceptance." This repeated formula is always attached to a maxim relating to either doctrine or practice, on which full reliance can be placed. The saying here is "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." This is the good news, the heart of the Gospel.

Paul claims that of all sinners he was "the worst"—lit., "first" or "chief." He felt this way because he had persecuted Christ's followers so vigorously. As far as morality was concerned, young Saul had been a strict Pharisee, living a life that was blameless before the law (Php 3:5–6). Yet in his case as chief sinner, Christ's "unlimited patience" had been displayed as an example to all who would believe in Jesus and thus receive eternal life. Paul's life was a powerful demonstration of what divine grace can do.

17 This verse is typical of Paul's habit of breaking out spontaneously into praise (see also 6:16; Ro 11:36; 16:27; Gal 1:5; Eph 3:21; Php 4:20; 2Ti 4:18).

IV. Timothy's Responsibility (1:18–20)

18–19 "Instruction" (GK 4132) is the same word that is translated "command" in v.5. The aged apostle is giving his son in the faith a solemn charge "in keeping with the prophecies once made about you"—perhaps prophecies made at the time of Timothy's ordination or of his induction into missionary work (though this phrase can also be translated, "according to the prophecies leading me to you"—there may have been prophetic utterances that pointed Timothy's way into the ministry). Paul urges Timothy to "fight the good fight [a term from warfare], holding on to faith and a good conscience." Paul was concerned that he and his colleagues should have a good "conscience" (GK 5287) always. Those who reject this "shipwreck" their faith.

20 Paul names two examples of those who have shipwrecked their faith: Hymenaeus and Alexander. The former is mentioned again as a heretical teacher in 2Ti 2:17; the latter is probably "Alexander the metalworker," who did Paul a great deal of harm (2Ti 4:14). The apostle had handed these two ringleaders "over to Satan to be taught not to blaspheme" (cf. 1Co 5:5, where this phrase indicates excommunication from the church). The purpose was to jolt the offenders to repentance, induced by the fearful thought of being turned over to Satan's control. Its purpose, therefore, is remedial, not punitive.

V. Worship and Conduct (2:1–3:16)

1. Prayer (2:1–7)

1 Paul now begins giving instructions for public worship. He was concerned that divine worship should be carried on in Ephesus most effectively and helpfully. So he says, "I urge" (GK 4151; also translated "exhort"); it indicates the urgency of Paul's admonition. "First of all" emphasizes primacy in importance rather than in time. In other words, the most essential part of public worship is prayer.

The NT has seven different Greek nouns for prayer, four of which occur in this verse. (1) "Requests" (GK 1255): This word basically carries the idea of desire or need. All true prayer begins in a sense of need and involves a deep desire, although it should never stop there. God wants us to bring our "requests" to him, and he always has a listening ear. (2) "Prayers" (GK 4666): This word always signifies praying to God. It is used for both private and public prayers (here public). (3) "Intercession" (GK 1950): This word was used in the sense of "conversation" and then of "petition." Perhaps it suggests the idea that prayer should be a conversation with God, but it also implied boldness of access to God's presence. We must come to God with full confidence and enter into close communion with him in a conversational atmosphere if we want to experience depth and richness in our prayer life. And only those who really commune with God in private can edify others in their public prayers. (4) "Thanksgiving" (GK 2374): This word suggests that giving of thanks should always be a part of our praying. Thanking God for what he has done for us in the past strengthens our faith to believe that he will meet our needs in the future.

2 Prayers of these varied types are to be made "for everyone" (v.1), but especially "for kings and all those in authority." The term "king" applies both to the emperor at Rome and to lesser rulers. When one remembers that the Roman emperor when Paul wrote this letter was the cruel monster Nero—who later put Paul and Peter to death—one realizes that we should pray for our present rulers, no matter how unreasonable they may seem to be. Prayer for "all those in authority" in various levels of government should have a regular place in all public worship.

The purpose of this is logical and significant: "that we may live peaceful and quiet lives in all godliness and honesty." The fact that we are permitted to assemble peaceably for public worship is dependent on our rights under law—law as upheld and enforced by our legislators, administrators, and judicial leaders. We ought to pray for them, and also thank God for them.

"Peaceful" has the basic idea of restfulness not marred by outward disturbance; "quiet" suggests inner stillness that accompanies restfulness. The word for "godliness" (GK 2354) basically means "piety" or "reverence"; anyone who is irreverent is living an ungodly life. "Holiness" (GK 4949) suggests reverence, seriousness, and respectfulness (cf. also 3:4; Tit 2:7).

3–4 Such a life is "good" (GK 2819; also meaning "beautiful" or "excellent") and "pleases God our Savior" (see comment on 1:1). He "wants all men to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth." This statement accords well with Jn 3:16 and with the declaration in 2Co 5:14–15 that Christ died for all. Salvation has been provided for all, but only those who accept it are saved. "Knowledge" (GK 2106) means precise and accurate knowledge. Such knowledge of God's truth is both the root and fruit of salvation. Paul here sounds a frequent note of the Pastorals—true knowledge saves one from error.

5 This is one of the most significant verses of the NT. It declares first of all that "there is one God." This is a primary affirmation in the OT, in opposition to the polytheism of Paul's day. The fact that there is only one God (monotheism) is the basic premise of both Judaism and Christianity.

But then comes a difference, for Christianity goes on to assert that "there is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." "Mediator" (GK 3542) occurs only once in LXX (Greek translation of the OT). Job was frustrated by the fact that God was not a man with whom he could converse. In despair he wished that there might be someone to arbitrate between himself and God (Job 9:33). Christ is the answer to this ancient cry for help. A "mediator" is someone who intervenes between two parties, either to make peace and restore friendship, or to form a covenant. In keeping with this, Christ by his death restored the harmony between God and human beings which sin had broken.

To be of any use, a bridge across a chasm or river must be anchored on both sides. Christ has closed the gap between deity and humanity. He has crossed the grand canyon, so deep and wide, between heaven and earth. He has bridged that which separated us from God. With one foot planted in eternity, he planted the other in time. He who was the eternal Son of God became the Son of Man. And across this bridge, we can come into the very presence of God, knowing that we are accepted because we have him as a Mediator.

6 This Christ "gave himself as a ransom for all men." The word "ransom" (GK 519; cf. also 3389) means that which is given in exchange for another as the price of redemption. In the first century it applied especially to the price paid to free a slave. So Christ paid the ransom to free us from the slavery of sin. Because of this we are rightfully his possession. Jesus gave his life as a ransom "for all men." The Greek word translated "for" means "on behalf of." Christ died on behalf of all people, but only those who accept his sacrifice are set free from the shackles of sin.

This message of Christ's redemptive death was the distinctive apostolic witness—"the testimony given in its proper time." Christ's sacrifice for sin took place at God's appointed hour.

7 For the purpose of giving this witness, Paul was "appointed" (lit., "placed"; GK 5502) as "a herald and an apostle." "Herald" (GK 3061) was used in Paul's day to designate a messenger vested with public authority, who conveyed the messages of public officials or who gave a public summons; in the NT it signifies the one who proclaims the divine word. Thus a "preacher" is someone who makes a public proclamation for the King of kings. He is not to air his own opinions or debate other people's ideas but to proclaim the Word of God. What a glorious privilege and what an awesome responsibility! On apostle, see comment on 1:1.

Paul adds, "I am telling the truth, I am not lying." This suggests that some of the church members at Ephesus were challenging his apostolic authority, as had happened at Corinth (2Co 10:10).

In addition, Paul was "a teacher of the true faith to the Gentiles." This was his special assignment from the Lord (Ac 9:15; Eph 3:2–8). Though he was "a Hebrew of the Hebrews" and brought up a strict Pharisee (Php 3:5), he had been born in Tarsus, one of the three main centers of Greek learning (after Athens and Alexandria), and was therefore suited to this assignment. The Christian leaders at Jerusalem agreed that he should evangelize the Gentiles (Gal 2:9).

2. Men (2:8)

8 Getting back specifically to the matter of public worship, the apostle wants "men everywhere to lift up holy hands in prayer, without anger or disputing." Lifting up one's hands in prayer is often mentioned in the OT (e.g., 1Ki 8:22; Pss 141:2; 143:6). It is a natural gesture, indicating earnest desire. The word "holy" here means devout, pious, and pleasing to God. Linked to lifting up holy hands is the idea of moral purity. We cannot pray effectively unless our lives are clean and committed to our Lord Jesus Christ. Nothing does more to alienate the mind from sincere prayer than an attitude of anger and a quarrelsome spirit.

3. Women (2:9–15)

9–10 In v.8 Paul desires that men pray; in v.9 he has some instructions for women and how they should conduct themselves in church services.

First, they are to "dress modestly." An expansion of the phrase used here is: "adorn themselves in modest clothes." This remains a much needed admonition today. "Decency" (GK 133) suggests a modesty that does not overstep the limits of womanly reserve. This should apply to both dress and deportment, although the rest of the verse suggests that the primary reference here is to one's clothing. Women are also to dress with "propriety" (GK 5408), a word that suggests good judgment. Paul hints at the snare of participating in the extreme forms of current fashions.

"Braided hair" means hair that is woven or braided (cf. 1Pe 3:3). The Christian woman is not to adorn herself with "gold or pearls or expensive clothes" so as to draw attention to herself. At worst, this is what the prostitutes did. At best, it shows pride and self-centeredness, both of which are contrary to the spirit of Christ. Such dress is especially unbecoming in church. Rather, Christian women are to adorn themselves "with good deeds, appropriate for women who profess to worship God." We must express our faith through good deeds. This thought is more dominant in the Pastoral Letters than in Paul's earlier letters—perhaps because the need for such emphasis was more apparent.

11–12 The teaching of these two verses is similar to that found in 1Co 14:33–35. There Paul tells the women that they are not allowed to talk out loud in the public services; here he says that they are to "learn in quietness and full submission." "Submission" (GK 5717) does not mean surrendering one's mind and conscience or abandoning one's private judgment. It does mean, however, that a woman must be submissive to her husband (cf. Tit 2:5)—though it may well have the wider application of submission to the officials and regulations of the church.

Paul goes on to say, "I do not permit a woman to teach or to have authority over a man." Some have said that the apostle's prohibition excludes women even from teaching Sunday school classes. But he is talking about public assemblies of the church. Paul speaks appreciatively of the fact that Timothy himself had been taught the right way by his godly mother and grandmother (2Ti 1:5; 3:15). He also writes to Titus that the older women are to train the younger (Tit 2:3–4). Women have always carried the major responsibility for teaching small children, in both home and church school. And what could we have done without them!

"Silent" (GK 2484) is exactly the same phrase that is rendered "in quietness" in v.11. This is an important Christian virtue. Paul was especially opposed to confusion in the public services of the church (1Co 14:33).

13–14 The apostle adds that the wife's role of submission to her husband is inherent in creation. Adam was created first, and then Eve (the story of Ge 2:21–23, where God made Eve from a rib taken from Adam). Many commentators have noted regarding this story that Eve was not made out of Adam's head to rule over him, nor out of his feet to be trampled upon by him, but out of his side to be equal with him and near his heart to be loved by him. This expresses perfectly the ideal of a happy married life. The husband who has this concept will usually find his wife eager to please him.

Paul makes one further point. It was the woman who was deceived by Satan and who disobeyed God (cf. Ge 3:1–6). Since she was so easily deceived, she should not be trusted as a teacher.

15 This verse is difficult to explain. Literally, the passage reads: "But she will be saved through the childbirth, if they continue in faith. . . ." The verb "save" (GK 5392) is used in the NT for both physical healing (mostly in the Gospels) and spiritual salvation (mostly in the letters). Perhaps it carries both connotations here. The wife may find both physical health and a higher spiritual state through the experience of bearing and rearing children.

Three interpretations of this verse have been suggested. (1) Since there is a definite article with "childbirth," some have suggested it refers to the birth of Christ, through whom salvation has come to the world. (2) Closely related to this is the interpretation that connects this statement with Ge 3:15. The seed of the woman would crush the serpent's head and bring salvation to humankind. (3) By begetting children and thus fulfilling the design God appointed for women, a woman will be saved from becoming a prey to the social evils of her day and will take her part in the local church. This third interpretation fits best with the context and the main emphasis of this letter.

4. Overseers (3:1–7)

Paul now gives the qualifications for overseers in the church (see also Tit 1:6–9).

1 "Sets his heart on" (GK 3977) means "aspires to." The word "overseer" (GK 2175) is based on a verb that means "to look upon," and so "to oversee, care for." The reference here is to the office of overseer in the church (elsewhere, an overseer is identical to an "elder"; see comment on Tit 1:6). Anyone who aspires to such a position "desires a noble task"—and, we might add, a place of heavy responsibility. One needs to be sure that such a desire is not an expression of pride, but rather that it reflects a deep commitment to the work of the church.

2 For the church organization that we know in the NT, it is apparent that churches had several overseers (see Ac 20:28; Php 1:1). The older translation of "overseer" (GK 2176) as "bishop" has led to misunderstanding, for the NT knows nothing of a single diocesan bishop, such as some contemporary churches have.

Paul lists fifteen specific qualifications of an "overseer" in vv.2–7. The first is that he must be "above reproach" (GK 455). This word describes someone against whom no charge of wrong doing can be brought. Because it stands at the head of his list, Paul suggests that an overseer should not be subject to criticism in any of the listed characteristics.

The second qualification is that he must be "the husband of but one wife" (cf. also v.12). While some have interpreted this as meaning "married only once," most commentators agree that it means monogamy—only one wife at one time—and that the overseer must be completely faithful to his wife.

The third qualification is "temperate" (GK 3767). In classical Greek this word meant "not mixed with wine"; in later writers it came to have the broader sense of "temperate" or "sober."

The fourth qualification of an overseer is "self-controlled" (GK 5409), a word that originally means "of sound mind." Thus it carried the sense of "self-controlled" or "sober-minded."

Fifth is "respectable" (GK 3177)—the same word as is translated "modestly" in 2:9. The basic meaning of the word is "orderly," but Greek writers used it in the sense of "respectable" or "honorable." That fits well here.

The sixth qualification is "hospitable" (GK 5811); this word means literally "loving strangers." Christians traveling in the first century avoided the public inns with their pagan atmosphere and food that had already been offered to idols (cf. 1Co 8). They would therefore seek out a Christian home in which to stop for the night. A valuable by-product was that believers from widely scattered areas would get to know each other, thus cementing lines of fellowship. So hospitality was an important Christian virtue in that day. Even in our modern hotel-motel age, it can have its place.

The seventh item is "able to teach" (GK 1434). This implies not only a readiness to teach, but also having the spiritual power to do so, after the overseer has prayerfully reflected on God's Word and its practical application.

3 The eighth qualification for an overseer is that he must not be "given to drunkenness" (GK 4232). Aristotle's use of this and related words suggests that it meant "tipsy" or "rowdy." It is a sad commentary on the culture of that day that such a warning would have to be given concerning church overseers.

Ninth on the list is "not violent" (GK 4438); the person who drinks too much wine is apt to become involved in drunken brawls.

Paul now gives another positive quality: "gentle" (GK 2117). This word is difficult to translate with one English word; gracious, kindly, forbearing, considerate, magnanimous, and genial are all included (cf. 2Co 10:1; Php 4:5).

The eleventh item is "not quarrelsome" (GK 285). This word means "abstaining from fighting." Here it is used in the metaphorical sense of "not contentious." A contentious leader is a sad feature in any church.

Next is "not a lover of money" (GK 921). The love of money (cf. 6:10) is one of the greatest dangers confronting every Christian worker. One who finds that he can make big money in part-time secular work is apt to be diverted from an effective ministry.

4–5 The final three stated qualifications are developed in greater length. The first concerns the relationship of an overseer to his family—he must be one who can "manage his own family well." His children must be obedient and respectful. This implies that the overseer would normally be a married man. Paul follows this up with the logical statement that if one cannot manage his own house, he should not be expected to take proper care of a local congregation. It is an argument from the lesser to the greater.

6 The overseer must not be "a recent convert" (GK 3745), for there is the danger that such a person might "become conceited" (GK 5605) or puffed up with pride. When this happens, the person will "fall under the same judgment as the devil." We believe that only God is uncreated, that he created all life, and that he pronounced everything he created as "good." Satan was therefore created by God as a good creature. At some time in history he fell, and the cause of his fall was pride. All proud people are subject to the same judgment as he is (see Rev 20:10).

7 The fifteenth and last qualification of an overseer is that he must "have a good reputation with outsiders." When a leader in the church has a bad reputation in the community, it often brings irreparable damage to the local congregation and indeed to the entire cause of Christ. Moreover, a church leader must have a good reputation "so that he will not fall into disgrace and into the devil's trap." Most commentators feel that this phrase means the trap that the devil lays for unsuspecting Christians (cf. a similar expression in 2Ti 2:26).

Paul's careful concern for the right choice of leaders in the church and the extensive qualifications listed here should serve as guidelines for those who are charged with the responsibility of such selection today.

5. Deacons (3:8–13)

8 Paul now moves to the qualification for "deacons." The word "deacon" (GK 1356) often means "servant," and it is used that way many times in the Gospels. Specifically, it was used by various writers of that period for those who wait on tables. This leads us to Ac 6. The apostles as overseers of the church in Jerusalem did not have time to take care of the material needs of the poorer members, such as the widows (cf. Ac 6:2, where the verb form of this word is used). So the church chose seven men to assume this responsibility, while the apostles gave their attention to public "prayer and the ministry of the word" (v.4). Although the term deacon is not used in this connection, it would seem that these men were the forerunners of the deacons in the church. The term is first used in a technical sense in Php 1:1, and it probably means those who supervised material affairs of the church.

Paul says that the deacons, like the overseers, are to be "worthy of respect" (GK 4948; cf. 2:2; 3:4). This word combines the ideas of gravity and dignity.

Second, they are to be "sincere" (lit., "not double-tongued"; GK 1474). This adjective has the idea of saying something twice, with the bad connotation of saying one thing to one person and something else to another.

The third qualification is "not indulging in much wine" (a longer and stronger expression than that found in v.3).

Next is "not pursuing dishonest gain" (GK 153). This is understandable for people charged with handling money to give to the poor.

9 Fifth, deacons must have a grasp of "the deep truths [lit., "mystery"; GK 3696] of the faith." "The faith" must be taken in an objective sense, referring to the truths of the Christian religion, rather than as subjective, having to do with one's personal faith in Christ. This letter has a strong emphasis on a pure "conscience" as well as a pure faith (cf. 1:5, 19). A "clear conscience" is one that has been cleansed by the blood of Christ (Heb. 10:22) and does not offend God or other people (Ac 24:16).

10 Deacons "must first be tested" (GK 1507). This verb has three stages: (1) to test, (2) to prove by testing; and (3) to approve as the result of testing. Perhaps all three are in mind here. Before being accepted to serve as deacons, prospective deacons had to prove themselves beyond reproach before the community.

11 In the Greek language the same word is used for "woman" and "wife" (GK 1222). Since this word is found here for "their wives," there are three possible interpretations as to what group Paul is talking about. (1) These women were the wives of the deacons, though the word "their" is missing in Greek. (2) Another possibility is that Paul is speaking of women in general; the context of vv.8–12 would seem to rule this out. (3) The third choice is a reference to deaconesses, of whom Phoebe (Ro 16:1) is an example. We know that there were deaconesses in the church in later centuries, but whether such an order existed in the first century is debatable.

We are inclined to favor the idea that the reference is to "their wives." Paul talks about the qualifications of the deacons in vv.8–10 and again in vv.12–13. It would seem natural to assume that he is talking about their wives in v.11. What he says that these women is that, whoever they are, they must, "in the same way" as the deacons, be "worthy of respect" (cf. v.8).

They are also not to be "malicious talkers" (GK 1333), i.e., those who slander other people. This note was a needed warning in the early church and is still needed today.

On "temperate," see the comment on v.2. Both husbands and wives were have this virtue.

"Trustworthy in everything" is a comprehensive requirement. Church workers must not be lax in taking care of their assigned duties.

12 Now Paul returns to the specific qualifications of deacons. Like an overseer (v.2), a deacon must be the husband of one wife, and he must also "manage his children and his household well" (cf. v.4, where "household" [GK 3875] is translated "family").

13 Those who serve well in their assigned duties in the church gain for themselves "an excellent standing." They should be able to maintain great respect in the eyes of the church as well as in God's sight. Likewise, "great assurance [GK 4244]" relates to confidence both before God and before other people.

6. The Mystery of Godliness (3:14–16)

14–15 Paul was hoping to visit Timothy soon. But just in case he was delayed, he wants his young associate to know "how people ought to conduct themselves in God's household." The apostle's rules for church members and their leaders are what we find in chs. 2–3. God's "household" (GK 3875) or "the church of the living God" has primary reference here to the local congregation, although the general church of Jesus Christ may also be in view.

This church is "the pillar and the foundation of the truth." "Pillar" (GK 5146) and "foundation" (GK 1613) both emphasize the certainty and firmness of "the truth" that is revealed in God's Word. Each local church must support and strengthen the truth by witnessing to the faith and by living exemplary lives.

16 The "mystery of godliness" is revealed in a Person, even Jesus Christ. The creedal hymn in this verse speaks particularly about the incarnate Christ. (1) The eternal Son of God, existing as pure spirit, was made visible in his incarnation, when he became a human being. (2) Christ's profound claims were vindicated by his miracles, climaxing in his resurrection; these were sure evidences that he was the sinless Son of God. (3) During his earthly ministry angels watched over him (Mt 4:11; Lk 22:43). (4) After Jesus' death and resurrection, the message of Christ (cf. 1Co 1:23) and of salvation in his name was proclaimed among the Gentile nations of the world. (5) People all over the world believed in Christ as they heard the preached message. (6) Finally, he "was taken up in glory"—a reference to his ascension in Acts 1:1–11. This was the climax of his earthly ministry. Preaching Christ means preaching his life, death, resurrection, and ascension as the glorified Lord.

VI. Special Instructions to Timothy (4:1–16)

1. False Asceticism (4:1–5)

1 Paul now gives instructions to Timothy on a variety of subjects, beginning with the matter of ascetic teachings (vv.1–5).

The Holy Spirit explicitly says that in later times some people will "abandon" (GK 923) the faith, i.e., become apostate. Instead of being led by the Holy Spirit, these apostates give their attention to deceiving spirits and the teaching of "demons" (i.e., evil spirits who are led by the devil). The expression "in later times" is not as strong as the phrase "in the last days" (2Ti 3:1); the conditions that Paul is discussing here evidently took place during his lifetime.

2 The apostle uses strong language in describing the teachers of the false doctrines he is about to mention. He declares that they are "hypocritical liars"; this implies that they know better, but they have deliberately forsaken the faith and teach falsehood. They are people whose consciences "have been seared as with a hot iron," so that they have become unfeeling about their willful wrongdoings.

3 Paul now mentions two of their false teachings: forbidding marriage and ordering people "to abstain from certain foods." This ascetic emphasis crept into the church in the first century and was widely felt in the second century under the influence of Gnosticism. The Gnostics taught that all matter is evil and that only spirit is good; thus all physical pleasure is sin.

What these false teachers forgot is that marriage is an institution that God established as the normal thing in human society (see Ge 2:24). The idea of abstaining from certain foods goes back, of course, to the Mosaic law. But Christ has freed us from the Law (Gal 5:1–6), so that we are no longer under its restrictions regarding certain kinds of food, "which God created to be received with thanksgiving by those who believe and who know the truth." Only those whose faith is weak avoid eating meat and restrict themselves to a vegetable diet (Ro 14:1–2). In spite of this, some still advocate and practice vegetarianism in the name of Christianity. Paul deals much more severely with this heresy in 1 Timothy than he did in Romans. Evidently the false teaching of asceticism was spreading in the church and the apostle struck out forcefully against it as a negation of our freedom in Christ.

4–5 The simple fact is that "everything God created is good" (echoing a statement made six times in Ge 1 [Ge 1:10, 12, 18, 21, 25, 31]). It is true that vegetarianism may have prevailed before the Flood (cf. Ge 2:9, 16), but God clearly told Noah that animals could also be eaten as food (Ge 9:3).

Paul then declares that "nothing is to be rejected if it is received with thanksgiving." This underscores the importance of "offering thanks" always before we eat, and this is reinforced by v.5: "because it is consecrated [GK 39] by the word of God and prayer." Food thus becomes "holy" to the eaters—not that they are inherently unclean, but some people's scruples or unthankfulness might make them unclean to them. "The word of God" suggests the use of Scripture phrases when saying a prayer at the table.

2. Superiority of the Spiritual (4:6–10)

6 Paul tells Timothy that if he calls the attention of the believers to these truths, he will be a good "minister" (lit., "servant"; GK 1356). To be "a good minister of Christ Jesus" should be the aim of every pastor today. Timothy had been trained or nurtured "in the truths of the faith." His earliest training was in Judaism, but he had been converted as a young man to Christianity (Ac 16:1–3). He had closely "followed" (GK 4158) its teachings.

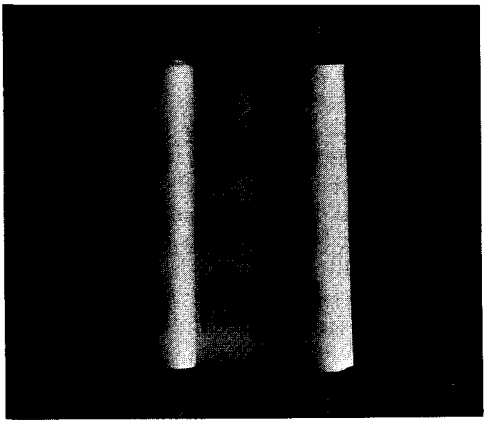
7–8 Timothy is to avoid "godless myths" and tall "tales" such as elderly women love to tell children. That is the way Paul describes the Jewish legends of his day (cf. Tit 1:14). Rather, Timothy is admonished to "train" (GK 1214) himself to be godly. "Physical training" clearly refers to athletic discipline, and it does have some value, at least for life on this earth. But spiritual exercise is far more important, for it has value for eternity—"holding promise for both the present life and the life to come."

9–10 Again we find the formula, "This is a trustworthy saying that deserves full acceptance" (cf. comment on 1:15). In this case, it most likely refers to the preceding statement (v.8). "Labor" (GK 3159) and "strive" (GK 76) are both strong terms. The first means "grow weary" and implies working with effort; the second was used for competing in an athletic contest, implying "struggle." Just as athletes exert what seems to be their last ounce of energy to win a race, so Paul was giving the ministry all he had.

God is "the Savior of all men, and especially of those who believe." In what sense is he the Savior of all men? To interpret this in terms of universal salvation would be contrary to the whole tenor of Scripture. What Paul means is that God is potentially the Savior of all men because of Calvary, but actually the Savior of only those who believe.

3. Pastoral Duties (4.11–16)



11–12 Timothy must keep on commanding and teaching the things Paul has been writing about, exercising his authority as pastor. Moreover, he must conduct himself in such a way that no one will look down on him in a condescending way because of his young age. A person could be a "young man" until his fortieth year. Timothy was probably about thirty years old at this time.

On the positive side, he must be "an example" (GK 5596). He is to present the proper image of the Christian and to be a pattern for other believers to follow. This is an awesome responsibility for those who enter the ministry. They must set an example in what they say, in how they live their lives, and in what they believe. The five nouns used at the end of this verse are vital constituents of all Christian living. Carelessness in any one of these areas can spell failure and even disaster.

13 Until Paul comes, Timothy is to devote himself "to the public reading of Scripture." The early church followed the example of the Jewish synagogue in publicly reading the Scriptures at every service. He is also to give himself to "preaching" (lit., "exhortation"; GK 4155). Every pastor must not only read the Word of God to the people but also exhort them to obey it. The third important function of the pastoral ministry is "teaching" (GK 1436). The people need instruction in Christian living, and the pastor should give it to them.

14 Furthermore, Paul advises his younger colleague not to neglect his gift (GK 5922). This word, charisma, occurs sixteen times in Paul's letters and only once elsewhere in the NT (1Pe 4:10). It comes from charis ("grace"), and so means a free gift, especially an extraordinary working of the Holy Spirit in a person. "Neglect" (GK 288) means to be careless about something; being careless about God's gifts is a sin.

The specific gift Paul has in mind was given to Timothy "through a prophetic message" when the elders of the church placed their hands on him. We are not told when or where this happened—perhaps at Ephesus, when Paul left Timothy there (cf. also 1:18; 2Ti 1:6).

When the Scriptures were read in either a synagogue or a church (4:13), the reading took place from a scroll.

15 "Be diligent" means "care for"; it was used frequently in the sense of "practice, cultivate, take pains with," though it is also possible for this phrase to mean "ponder these things." Timothy must also give himself completely to what Paul has been writing, so that everybody might see his "progress." Timothy was to make progress in his own spiritual life and in his effectiveness in the ministry.

16 The first thing that every Christian worker must watch is his or her own life—not only one's outward life but also one's inner thoughts and feelings. No matter how straight people may be in their doctrine or how effective they may be in their teaching, if there is a flaw in their inner or outer lives, it will ruin them. This is where many ministers have failed tragically. While watching over others, pastors must keep an eye on themselves.

To "persevere" (GK 2152) means to persist in doing something. Paul is instructing Timothy to keep on doing the things he has been writing about. By so doing, he will save both himself and his hearers. For a soul-winner to save others and lose his or her own soul is an unmitigated tragedy. To save one's own soul and have one's hearers lost is no less tragic.

VII. Special Groups in the Church (5:1–6:2)

1. The Older and the Younger (5:1–2)

1–2 "Exhort" (GK 4151) also means "encourage"; this verb carries through to the end of v.2. The young man Timothy should treat the older men with gentleness and kindness, as he would a father; he must treat the "younger men" as brothers and the "older women" as mothers. Fortunate is the young pastor who has godly "mothers in Israel" in the congregation. In relation to "younger women," a needed caution is added. They are to be treated as sisters—because the Christians are all one family in the Lord—but "with absolute purity." The pastor who does not heed this warning will soon be in trouble.

2. Widows (5:3–16)

3 "Give proper recognition to" (GK 5506) reflects a word that means first "price" and secondarily "honor" or "reverence." In view of the following context, it could possibly mean "give proper compensation to" widows in real need. Timothy is to look after widows who genuinely have no other means of support.

4 The case is different with a widow who has "children or grandchildren." In that case, they are to take care of her. "To put their religion into practice by caring for their own family" is literally "to show piety toward one's own household." In so doing they would be "repaying" (GK 625) those who brought them up. This is "pleasing" (GK 621) to God.

The Jewish synagogues gave careful attention to the care of their widows, and the early church followed that custom (Ac 6:1). This was due to the fact that in the culture of those days, a widow could not ordinarily find any employment and so would need financial support. Today, with insurance income, social security, and job opportunities, the situation is very different. But each church should still see to it that no widow in its congregation is left destitute. Christian love demands this, and it is especially appropriate in view of the NT concept that all believers are one in Christ, fellow members of the family of God. We should care for each other.

5 This verse gives the characteristics of a true Christian widow. She must be one who is "left all alone," i.e., she is childless. Such a woman puts her hope in God, for she has no earthly hopes. She continues in her supplications and her prayers night and day. One is reminded of the widow Anna, who was eighty-four years old. "She never left the temple but worshiped night and day, fasting and praying" (Lk 2:37).

6 In contrast with that picture is this statement: But the widow who lives luxuriously or self-indulgently "is dead even while she lives."

7–8 Timothy is to "give the people these instructions." The purpose of the instruction is that they may be not "open to blame" (lit., "irreproachable"; GK 455).

Paul goes on with strong words on this matter of caring for the needy. Those who do not "provide for" (lit., "think of beforehand"; GK 4629) their own relatives, especially those of their own immediate family, fall below the best heathen standard of family affection and are more blameworthy, for they have not followed what they have been taught about the supreme example of love in Jesus Christ.

9–10 Having defined a real widow as one bereft of all relatives to take care of her, Paul now restricts the matter further by saying that no widow under sixty years of age should be "put on the list." It seems evident that an official list of widows was kept by each church and that only these received material support.

Furthermore, she must have "been faithful to her husband" (lit., "the wife of one man"). This is the same sort of expression as is found in the qualifications for overseers (3:2) and deacons (3:12). As we noted there, this does not mean "only once married," especially since Paul goes on in v.14 to instruct younger widows to remarry.

To qualify for enrollment, a widow must also be well known for her good deeds, several of which are spelled out as essential if she were going to be supported by the church. The first is "bringing up children" (GK 5452). This would most naturally refer to her own children but could also include the care of orphans. The second is "showing hospitality" (lit., "welcoming strangers"; GK 3827). Next is "washing the feet of the saints"; this was an important courtesy whenever guests entered a house. The last two duties are "helping those in trouble and devoting herself to all kinds of good deeds."

11–12 Regarding the widows under sixty years of age, Paul instructs Timothy not to put them on the official list. Most of them will become restless against the limitations of Christian widowhood and will want to marry. If they do, they incur "judgment" (GK 3210), because they will have broken "their first pledge" (GK 4411), i.e., the solemn promise to be devoted only to Christ that they made when they joined the list of widows.

13 Another risk with younger widows is that "they get into the habit of being idle" or inactive. Instead of working, they go from house to house as "gossips [GK 5827] and busybodies [GK 4319] " That is, they pick up private matters and spread them abroad, and they meddle in things that do not concern them (cf. 1Th 3:11). The consequences of such meddling can be tragic.

14–15 In view of these dangers, Paul advises "younger widows to marry, to have children, to manage their homes," in order that they may "give the enemy no opportunity for slander." "Enemy" (GK 512) means "adversary." Most think that the reference here is to a human adversary, not to Satan (who is mentioned in v.15). "Slander" (GK 3367; cf. 1Pe 3:9) is a strong term meaning "abuse" or "railing." Paul fears that the unfortunate conduct of younger widows might bring serious reproach on the church. Some younger widows have already turned away to follow "Satan."

16 The female believer who has widows dependent on her "should help them," so that the church will be free to spend its time, money, and energy helping those who are truly needy widows (cf. v.3).

3. Elders (5:17–25)

17 Paul now addresses concerns about "elders" in the church (i.e., those who officially "direct the affairs of the church"). It was the responsibility of these earliest church officials (cf. Ac 14:23) to supervise the work of the local congregation.

Those who performed their functions well were worthy of "double honor [GK 5507]." Since this word was often used in the sense of a price paid for something, it has been suggested that here it might be translated "honorarium." But that raises the problem of "double"—double what was paid to the widows, or double what the other elders received? Perhaps we should allow both "honor" and "honorarium." Highest honor is to be given to "those whose work is preaching and teaching." Some have found here a distinction between ruling elders and teaching elders. But this is doubtful. Probably some elders gave themselves to preaching and teaching in addition to their regular duties—as was the case with Stephen and Philip as deacons (Ac 6–8).

18 This verse, as well as the preceding discussion of support for widows (vv.3–16), suggests definitely that the "double honor" for elders was to be a financial remuneration. Quoting Dt 25:4 (cf. 1Co 9:9) and Lk 10:7, Paul makes the point that a worker should receive compensation. As usual, Paul quotes the OT as "Scripture." But does the introductory formula, "For the Scripture says," apply also to the second quotation? Scholars are divided on this question, but if it does, this is probably the earliest instance of the Lord's words being quoted as Scripture.

19–20 Paul sounds a salutary warning that an "accusation" (GK 2990; cf. Tit 1:6) concerning an individual elder was not to be "entertained" (lit., "received"; GK 4138) as a charge against him unless it was supported by two or three witnesses. The last part of this verse is almost a verbal quotation from Dt 19:15 (cf. Dt 17:6; see also comment on 2Co 13:1). If there are any elders whose sins are substantiated, such offenders Timothy is to rebuke "publicly." Does this mean before the whole church or only before the other elders? The next clause seems to favor the latter: "so that the others [i.,e., the rest of the elders] may take warning."

21 The mention of "elect angels" in this charge is typical of Paul (cf. 3:16; 1Co 4:9). Timothy is solemnly charged to keep these instructions without showing any partiality. He is to do nothing out of favoritism. That is, he is not to permit his personal prejudices tip the scales of justice.

22 What is meant by "the laying on of hands"? While some commentators feel that the context favors the idea of laying hands of reconciliation on repentant fallen elders when they are received back into the church, most view this as a reference to ordination. In other words, this passage prohibits hasty ordination. That fits in well with the main discussion of this chapter. The laying on of hands in the Pastoral Letters seems to be regularly associated with ordination (cf. 4:14; 2Ti 1:7).

What about "Do not share in the sins of others"? Whenever Timothy ordained an elder, he became in a measure a surety for that person's character and thus was implicated in any sins the man might commit. So the young superintendent is warned, "Keep yourself pure"—primarily by being cautious about ordaining candidates, though the more general application to the whole of life may also be intended.

23 Apparently for medicinal purposes, Timothy is told not to restrict himself to drinking water but to "use a little wine because of your stomach and your frequent illnesses." The word for wine (GK 3885) is sometimes used in LXX for unfermented grape juice. Furthermore, it is generally agreed that the wine of Jesus' day was usually rather weak and, especially among the Jews, often diluted with water. Moreover, safe drinking water was not always readily available in those eastern countries.

24–25 The sins of some people are clearly evident; these precede a person to judgment. The less obvious sins of others "trail behind them"—but finally catch up. Similarly, good deeds are clearly evident, "and even those that are not cannot be hidden." In the context about avoiding hasty ordination, Paul is saying that some people's sins are so evident that there is no question about rejecting them as candidates. Their sins precede them to judgment—first Timothy's judgment and finally divine judgment. The sins of others do not show up so soon but careful investigation will discover them. In the same way, the good deeds of qualified candidates will be easily seen. Those that seem less obvious will still appear on further search; they cannot be hidden.

4. Slaves (6:1–2)

1 Paul now has a word for servants or slaves. Their servitute is further emphasized by the phrase "under the yoke." About half the population of the Roman Empire in the first century was composed of slaves. This would undoubtedly have included Christian households (cf. the book of Philemon). Slaves are admonished to give full respect to their masters. Paul was always concerned that the conduct of Christians should be such as to bring glory to God and not bring reproach on his name and on the Gospel.

2 Not all Christian slaves had "believing masters." But those who did were not "to show less respect [GK 2969] for them." Instead, they were to serve them even better, realizing that they were benefiting their brothers in Christ; their masters were "dear to them" (lit., "beloved"; GK 28). This would give added incentive to their service.

The last sentence can be seen either as a specific instruction to Timothy about what to say to slaves, or else a general command regarding all that Paul has written to Timothy. Either makes good sense.

VIII. The Danger of the Love of Money (6:3–10)

3–5 A false teacher is someone who "teaches false doctrines" (i.e., doctrines other than the ones Timothy has been taught). Furthermore, he does not assent to "sound" (GK 5617) or healthy instruction, such as Paul has been writing in this letter.

Having defined the false teacher, Paul goes on to describe him in vv.4–5. Bluntly he declares that such a person "is conceited [GK 5605] and understands nothing." In spite of this ignorance, the false teacher has a morbid craving for endless "controversies and quarrels about words." The first of these two nouns (GK 2428) can mean the legitimate investigation of religious and theological problems, though here it indicates debates or disputes (cf. 2Ti 2:23; Tit 3:9). Even well-intentioned theological discussions sometimes have a tendency to degenerate into word-battles or exercises in semantics.

Five things are mentioned as the result of the disputes and arguments. The first two are "envy" (GK 5784) and "strife" (GK 2251; cf. also Ro 1:29; Gal 5:21). Envy always produces quarreling and strife. "Malicious talk" (GK 1060), when directed against God, means "blasphemy," but when directed against other people, as here, it means "abusive speech" or "slander." The fourth result is "evil suspicions."

The fifth result is spelled out at considerable length, comprising all of v.5. "Constant friction" refers to the continual wrangling that occurs between those whose minds are corrupt. In spite of whatever good intentions they may have, these men "have been robbed of the truth." They think that godliness is merely a way to make a lot of money.

6 Although "godliness" or "piety" should never be used as a means of securing financial gain, it is nevertheless true that "godliness with contentment is great gain." The word for "contentment" (GK 894) was used in classical Greek in a philosophical sense for a situation of life in which no aid or support is needed (also used in 2Co 9:8). But here it is used subjectively for a mind that is contented with its situation in life (cf. Php 4:11). Contentment is one of the greatest assets of life.

7–8 The reason we should be content is that "we brought nothing into the world, and we can take nothing out of it." That is, nothing in the entire world can add to the inner person. Thus, if we have food and clothing (and we may also include shelter here), we should be content with these things.

9 Those who are determined to become rich fall into temptation and "a trap" (GK 4075) and into many desires that are senseless and harm people. Wrong desires plunge people into "ruin [GK 3897] and destruction [GK 724]." Both words mean "destruction," but the second is stronger, implying eternal condemnation. The combination of these two words here suggests that Paul is speaking of destruction for time and eternity.

10 It is not money that is a root of all kinds of evil, but "the love of money" (GK 5794). Some people are always grasping at money. This is the curse of too much of modern living. Some Christians, unfortunately, have been trapped in this way and are led astray from the faith. In straying from the straight path, they have been caught in the thorn bushes and have "pierced themselves with many griefs." Some have questioned the validity of the first part of this verse. But this proverbial statement echoes what had already been said by both Greek and Jewish writers. There is no kind of evil to which the love of money may not lead people, once it starts to control their lives.

IX. Paul's Charge to Timothy (6:11–16)

11 In contrast to such people, Paul addresses Timothy as "man of God." This is a common designation for prophets in the OT (e.g., 1Sa 9:6; 1Ki 12:22; 13:1). There has been much discussion as to whether it carries that connotation here or is used as a general title for all Christians (cf. also 2Ti 3:17). In any case, it refers to someone who is in God's service, represents him, and speaks in his name. "Pursue" means "keep on making [these things] your lifelong pursuit." Paul then names six Christian virtues.

12 "Fight the good fight" (GK 76 & 74) is a phrase taken from the field of athletics, such as "contend in the gymnastic games." In the NT both words are used to describe the struggles of the Christian life (cf. 2Ti 4:7). The background of the words suggests exerting every ounce of energy to win.

Timothy is then told to take hold of the eternal life to which he was called when he made the good profession of faith. This probably refers to Timothy's confession of faith in Christ at his baptism, when "many witnesses" were no doubt present.

13–14 Typically, Paul appeals to God, who "gives life to everything," and to Christ Jesus, who himself made a good confession while testifying before Pontius Pilate. In their sight he solemnly charges Timothy to keep what he has been instructing him in a blameless way and without reproach (cf. 3:2).

There has been much discussion as to whether "without spot or blame" modifies "commandment" or "you." Elsewhere in the NT these adjectives are applied to persons, but here they are more closely attached to "commandment." Perhaps the best way is to try to combine the two ideas. If Timothy keeps himself unspotted and blameless, the commandment itself, so far as he is concerned, will be maintained flawless.

Timothy is to keep the commandment until the "appearing" (GK 2211) of our Lord Jesus Christ. This word occurs five times in the Pastoral Letters (cf. 2Ti 1:10; 4:1, 8; Tit 2:13) and only once elsewhere in the NT (2Th 2:8; see comment on that verse). It is found in late Greek writers and in the inscriptions of that period for a visible manifestation of an invisible deity. It is also used frequently in the LXX for manifestations of God's glory. In 2Ti 1:10 it refers to the first coming of Christ; elsewhere (including this verse) it is used for the Second Coming.

15–16 God will "bring about" (lit., "display"; GK 1259) this Second Coming "in his own time." The return of Christ will be God's final display to the world that Jesus is the Son of God and Savior (cf. the use of this same verb in Jn 2:18). "Time" (GK 2789) means a fixed or definite time. In the NT it is often used in a prophetic sense for God's appointed time, especially in relation to the Second Coming and the future judgment.

The rest of vv.15–16 form a doxology, such as we often find in Paul's letters (cf. 1:17; 2Ti 4:18). Much of the language is derived from the OT. God is first described as "the blessed and only Ruler [GK 1541]." The last word indicates a sovereign person, one who possesses power.

The next two titles, "King of kings and Lord of lords," are applied to Christ in Rev 17:14; 19:16. They are used for God in the OT (Dan 4:34 in LXX; cf. Dt 10:17; Ps 136:3). God alone is "immortal" (cf. 1Co 15:53–54), i.e., not subject to death. The idea of immortality is not clearly expressed in the OT. But the NT teaches that God alone has inherent immortality; ours is derived from him. It is in the resurrection that the true believer receives an immortal body (1Co 15:53), so that the whole person, body and soul, becomes immortal.

We are next told that God lives in light "unapproachable" (a word that other Jewish writers also apply to God). Paul adds that no person has ever seen God or can see him (cf. Ex 33:20; Jn 1:18). The doxology ends with the ascription: "To him be honor and might forever. Amen." It is typical of Paul to inject a doxology in the midst of a discussion (cf. 1:17; Ro 1:25; 11:36).

X. Closing Instructions (6:17–21)

1. Admonitions to the Wealthy (6:17–19)

17 Timothy is to command the wealthy not to be high-minded or proud. It is evident that in the wealthy city of Ephesus there were some church members who had money. Timothy is to warn them not to put their hope in "wealth, which is so uncertain." The uncertainty of wealth has been commented on from ancient times. It takes to itself wings and flies away (Pr 23:5). Even great fortunes have disappeared almost overnight (cf. the book of Job).

Instead, one should put one's hope in God (cf. Ps 52:7). He is the one who "richly provides us with everything for our enjoyment." Physical pleasure in itself is not sinful, but divinely ordained when sought within the structure of God's will.

18 The wealthy are to use their money "to do good" (GK 14; cf. Ac 14:17) and are "to be rich in good deeds." Wealth imposes a heavy responsibility on its possessor. The greater our means for doing good, the greater our obligation. What an opportunity wealthy people have for benefiting the needy!

So the rich must be "generous [GK 2331] and willing to share [GK 3127]." This second word is related to the word koinonia (GK 3126), meaning "fellowship, communion." Paul's use of this word suggests that wealthy Christians should share their hearts as well as their money. This combination is what pleases God and imparts a double blessing to the recipient. Paul rejoiced that the generous Macedonians first gave themselves (2Co 8:1–5). It is easier to give money than to give ourselves, but love requires both.

19 By following these instructions the well-to-do will "lay up treasure . . . as a firm foundation for the coming age." This is in line with Jesus' teaching in Mt 6:19–21 about not storing up treasures on earth but storing them up in heaven. "For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also." In place of the uncertainty of earthly riches (v.17), Christians have a "firm foundation" (v.19) of treasure laid up in heaven. The purpose of this is that believers may take hold of "the life that is truly life," i.e., eternal life.

2. Admonition to Timothy (6:20–21a)

20–21a Paul concludes with a personal admonition to Timothy: "Guard what has been entrusted to your care" (cf. 2Ti 1:12, 14). Here the context suggests the sound doctrine that had been entrusted to Timothy, i.e., the revelation of Jesus Christ in all its fullness.

Timothy is to turn away from "godless chatter" or empty babbling. This is how Paul characterizes what the false teachers were saying (cf. 4:7; 6:3–5). The "opposing ideas" intimated here are likely rival teachings, such as those taught by Gnostics or Judaizers, in contrast to the truth of Christianity. This opposition consisted of "what is falsely called knowledge." We have already seen several times in this letter that Paul is combating the false teachings of Gnosticism—those who professed a superior knowledge and believed that salvation comes to those who have this secret, intellectual treasure (see also introduction to Colossians). This is the kind of false gospel that some have "professed" (GK 2040; cf. 2:10) and so have deviated from the sound doctrine of the Christian faith.

3. Farewell (6:21b)

In the closing benediction, "you" is plural, thus including the church along with Timothy.

The Old Testament in the New

NT Text	OT Text	Subject
1Ti 5:18	Dt 25:4	Not muzzling an ox

2 Timothy

INTRODUCTION

1. Authorship

See introduction to 1 Timothy.

2. Date and Place of Origin

See introduction to 1 Timothy. Paul was in prison in Rome, shortly before his death, when he wrote 2 Timothy.The date is thus sometime in A.D. 67.

3. Destination and Occasion

Timothy was at Ephesus when the apostle wrote him the first letter (1Ti 1:3). Presumably he was still there when Paul wrote this second letter. The occasion of this letter is stated rather fully. In prison at Rome, Paul is expecting execution. He longs to see his "son" Timothy (2Ti 1:4). He is getting cold in the dungeon and urges him to come before winter (4:21) and to bring the warm coat Paul left at Troas. Paul also wants the young pastor to bring Paul's books and parchments. perhaps to do some further reading and perhaps writing (4:13).

4. Summary of 2 Timothy

This second letter of Timothy is much more personal than 1 Timothy, written near the close of Paul's life. Paul talks directly to Timothy, urging him to maintain the spiritual glow (1:1–7) and to be a faithful partner of his in suffering for the Gospel (1:8–2:13). The apostle warns against the false teachers (2:14–19) and urges Timothy to be a noble servant of Christ (2:20–26). The third chapter contains a description of conditions in the last days (3:l–9). Then the aged apostle gives his final charge to his son in the faith (3:10–4:5) and his own testimony (4:6–8). The letter closes with personal remarks about his current situation (4:9–18) and the final greetings (4:19–21) and benediction (4:22).

5. Theological Values

See introduction to 1 Timothy.

EXPOSITION

I. Salutation (1:1–2)

1–2 This salutation is similar to the one found at the beginning of 1 Timothy (see comments on 1Ti 1:1). Paul adds something here: "according to the promise of life that is in Christ Jesus." All spiritual life comes to us only "in Christ." And the more fully and consciously we live in him, the richer that life becomes.

In his first letter Paul greeted Timothy as "my true son in the faith." Here it is "my dear [GK 28] son." Paul had a warm affection for his young convert and colleague. The actual greeting (v.2b) is exactly the same as that in 1 Timothy (see comments on 1Ti 1:2). Everything we have comes to us from God through Christ.

II. Thanksgiving (1:3–7)

A. Timothy's Heritage (1:3–5)

3 In contrast to his first letter, where Paul began by informing Timothy about his urgent task at Ephesus, even before his thanksgiving to God, Paul here follows his regular custom of having a thanksgiving right after the greeting. Paul was serving God "as my forefathers did." He greatly appreciated his religious heritage (cf. Ac 22:3; 24:14), and so today should all those who have been brought up in a Christian environment. The apostle served God with a clean or pure conscience (see the note on 1Ti 1:5.); Paul had maintained a clear conscience even in his earlier years (Ac 23:1).

"Night and day" Paul was "constantly" remembering Timothy in his prayers (cf. Ro 1:10; 1Th 1:2; 3:6). He must have had a large heart to carry such a loving concern for so many people.

4 "Long" (GK 2160) is a word expressing intense desire. Recalling Timothy's tears, probably when they last parted, Paul deeply longed to see his son in the faith, that he might be "filled with joy." In Paul's letters we see this man of God's real humanity. He was a stalwart soldier, but he had a tender heart.

5 Some external occasion, perhaps a message from Timothy, had brought his faith to Paul's remembrance. That faith was genuine and "sincere" (lit., "unhypocritical"; GK 537). As this verse testifies, Timothy had a godly mother and grandmother.

B. God's Gift to Timothy (1:6–7)

6 Because of his sincere faith and spiritual heritage, Timothy is urged to "fan into flame the gift [GK 5922] of God" that was given to him when Paul laid his hands on him (see comments on 1Ti 4:14). This would most naturally be taken as the time of Timothy's ordination. The tendency of fire is to go out and it must be stirred occasionally. This provides a spiritual metaphor of what believers must do with God's gifts to them.

7 Paul is fond of making a negative statement and then following it with three positive ideas (cf. Ro 14:17). God has not given us a spirit of "timidity" (GK 1261) or cowardice, but a spirit of "power" (GK 1539), of "love" (GK 27) and of "self-discipline" (GK 5406). The effective Christian worker must have the power of the Holy Spirit (cf. Ac 1:8). But that power must be expressed in a loving spirit, or it may do damage. And often the deciding factor between success and failure is the matter of self-discipline.

This is one of the several passages in these two letters that hint at Timothy's naturally timid nature. He had been brought up by his mother and grandmother, and now Paul was taking the place of a father to him.

III. Suffering for the Gospel (1:8–18)

A. Plea to Timothy (1:8)

8 In view of the spirit that has been divinely given to Timothy (cf. v.7), apparently Paul felt that his young colleague needed to have his courage strengthened. Thus he urges him not to be ashamed "to testify about our Lord," nor "of me his prisoner." The aged apostle was now a prisoner of the emperor (probably Nero) and was facing almost certain death. Timothy must not be so fearful as to be ashamed to visit Paul in prison. Instead, he is told to "join with me in suffering" (GK 5155) for the sake of Christ and the Gospel.

B. Paul's Testimony (1:9–12)

9 Paul's personal testimony begins with a confession that God saved him and called him "to a holy life." Paul typically says that believers are called to a life of holiness (see 1Th 4:7).

The next part of this verse picks up Paul's central theme in Romans—"not because of anything we have done but because of his own purpose and grace . . . given us in Christ Jesus." Grace (GK 5921) is central to his theology; only through grace can we be united with Christ. This grace was given to us long before we were born.

10 This hidden grace has now been "revealed" (GK 5746) to the human race "through the appearing [GK 2211] of our Savior, Jesus Christ." The word "appearing" normally refers to the second coming of Christ (see comments on 2Th 2:8; 1Ti 6:14; cf. also 2Ti 4:1, 8; Tit 2:13), but here it obviously refers to his first coming. At his first coming Christ "destroyed death" through his own death on the cross (cf. Heb 2:14). The preaching of the cross offers all people life and immortality; this is the good news Christ came to bring.

11 For the proclamation of this Gospel Paul was appointed "a herald and an apostle and a teacher." We find the same three functions, together with exactly the same introductory formula in 1Ti 2:7 (see comments on that verse).

12 Paul's appointment as a preacher of the Gospel had cost him much in "suffering" and persecution. But he was not ashamed, because he knew the Person in whom he believed, and he was persuaded that God was able to guard until the day of the Lord what was "entrusted to him" (see comments on 1Ti 6:20). That is, God would guard Paul's teaching, his apostolic work, his converts, and his life, even if there should be death.

C. Paul's Admonition (1:13–14)

13 What Timothy has heard from Paul he is to keep as the "pattern [GK 5721; cf. 1Ti 1:16] of sound teaching." But this was to be done "with faith and love in Christ Jesus." The only way to keep doctrine is to both live and proclaim it with faith and love.

14 Similar to what Paul has done (v.12), Timothy is to "guard the good deposit that was entrusted to" him. Paul had entrusted the Gospel to Timothy to preach and the doctrine to preserve. This goal could not be accomplished in one's own human strength, but only "with the help of the Holy Spirit who lives in us."

D. Paul Deserted (1:15)

15 "Asia" in the NT means the Roman province of Asia, at the west end of Asia Minor. It was made into a province by the Romans about 133 B.C., and Ephesus finally became its capital. On his third missionary journey Paul had spent three years in Ephesus (Ac 20:31), longer than anywhere else. While he was there, the preaching of the Gospel reached every part of the province (Ac 19:10). There is deep pathos, then, in this verse: "You know that everyone in the province of Asia has deserted me"—i.e., turned away from me. Paul singles out two men for special mention among the deserters, perhaps because they were well known to Timothy. But of "Phygelus and Hermogenes" we know nothing further.

When did the Christians of Asia turn away from Paul? Perhaps it was when he was arrested and taken to Rome for his second and final imprisonment. If so, one can understand the "tears" (v.4) Timothy shed at that time.

E. Paul Befriended (1:16–18)

16–18 In contrast to the attitudes and actions of the majority was the kindness of Onesiphorus. He had lived up to his name, which means "help-bringer." This man had often "refreshed" Paul and had not been ashamed of the apostle's chains, as the others had been. When he went to Rome, Onesiphorus had "searched hard" for Paul until he finally found him. There were many prisoners in Rome, and it was not an easy task to locate this particular one. Paul prays that mercy may be shown to Onesiphorus "on that day"—presumably the day of judgment. Then he adds that Timothy knew very well how this faithful Christian had often helped Paul when the latter was in Ephesus.

Those must have been lonely hours for the aged apostle in prison, facing almost certain death and forsaken by his friends. It is difficult for us to understand why God's servants who have given themselves in sacrificial service to others should suffer like this at the end. But Paul knew that the glory of the next life would repay it all.

IV. Three Symbols of the Christian (2:1–7)

A. Introduction (2:1–2)

1–2 After exhorting Timothy to "be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus," Paul sounds his frequent note in the Pastorals about preserving and transmitting the tradition of truth (cf. 1:13–14). As Paul had entrusted the Gospel to Timothy (1:14), so now Timothy must pass it on to "reliable men who will also be qualified to teach others."

B. The Soldier (2:3–4)

3 "Endure hardship" (GK 5155) suggests pain and suffering as part of the Christian's lot in life (see comment on 1:8). That will inevitably happen as one engages in warfare against evil. So Timothy must be "a good soldier of Christ Jesus." Paul uses this figure for ministers of the Gospel (Php 2:25; Phm 2).

4 No one "serving as a soldier" gets entangled in the affairs of this life. The soldier must lay aside all secular pursuits, and the Christian minister must be willing to do the same. "His commanding officer" (lit., "the one who enrolled him as a soldier") is Jesus Christ. When Christ enrolls us as full-time soldiers in his army, we should seek to please him by giving ourselves to his service without distraction.

C. The Athlete (2:5)

5 In addition to military metaphors, Paul is also fond of athletic metaphors. The Christian, and especially the minister, must be spiritually a good athlete (see also comment on 1Ti 6:12). The goal of an athlete is to "receive the victor's crown" (cf. Heb 2:7, 9), the wreath given to the winner. But the winning athlete does not receive this crown unless he competes "according to the rules." Anyone who breaks the rules is disqualified.

D. The Farmer (2:6–7)

6–7 The Christian ministry can also be compared to farming. The pastor must sow the seed and cultivate the growing plants. One of Paul's main emphases here is on hard work and diligence, which he hopes will be a part of Timothy's pattern as pastor. Paul winds up this section by saying, "Reflect on what I am saying." If Timothy does this, he will understand what it is all about.

The three metaphors that Paul uses here—soldier, athlete, farmer—are also found together in 1Co 9:6, 24–27. The closest parallel between these two Scriptures is in the case of the athlete, who must go into strict training if he is going to win the prize. So Christians must have intense devotion and firm self-discipline if they are to win out for the Lord.

V. Suffering and Glory (2:8–13)

8 Now Paul urges Timothy to keep on remembering Jesus Christ. "Raised from the dead" emphasizes his deity; "descended from David," his humanity (cf. Ro 1:3–4). It is not the dead Christ that Timothy is to contemplate, but the risen living Lord. This is Paul's "gospel" (lit., "good news"; GK 2295).

9 For preaching this Gospel, Paul is suffering like a chained criminal. But he rejoices that "God's word is not chained." The preacher is in prison, but the Word of God is still moving on and transforming lives.

10 Because of this, the apostle is patiently willing to "endure" (GK 5702) everything for the sake of the "elect" (GK 1723). God has set apart from among the rebellious human race those who are dear to himself; them he has made, through faith in Christ, citizens in his kingdom. The whole purpose of Paul's ministry was that people might "obtain the salvation that is in Christ Jesus," and the ultimate goal of this salvation is being with Christ in "eternal glory."

11–13 For "here is a trustworthy saying," see comment on 1Ti 1:15. In this case, the trustworthy saying is the following three verses, which may be an early Christian hymn. It is in the typical form of Hebrew poetic parallelism—four "if" clauses, each followed by a balancing conclusion. The first two are positive, the other two negative.

The implications of "if we died with [GK 5271] him" is spelled out by Paul in Ro 6:3–6. It is only as we die with Christ, by identification with him in his death, that we can have spiritual life in him. "We will also live with him" does not refer to our future resurrection, but to our present life in Christ (cf. the parallel in Ro 6:8, 11). Right here and now we are to count ourselves "dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus." The Pauline formula is "You have to die in order to live."

Paul goes with "if we endure, we will also reign with him." It is only as we keep on enduring to the end that we will be saved in time of persecution (Mt 10:22; cf. context).

The third proposition is negative: "If we disown him, he will also disown us." This is a serious warning: We cannot reject Christ without being rejected ourselves.

"If we are faithless" (GK 601) is in the present tense, indicating a settled state of refusing to believe in Jesus and to obey him. But whatever we do, "he will remain faithful, for he cannot disown himself." God's faithfulness is eternal.

VI. Contrasts in the Church (2:14–26)

A. True and False Teachers (2:14–19)

14–15 In these two verses Paul challenges Timothy to be an approved workman. He is to "keep reminding" the believers of the things about which Paul has been writing. He is also to warn them before God against "quarreling about words" (GK 3362; see comment on 1Ti 6:4). Fighting over mere words is a waste of time; "it is of no value" and only brings ruin to the listeners.

"Do your best" (GK 5079) refers to a person being zealous or eager. Timothy must put forth every effort to be a Christian minister approved by God. When his work is inspected by God, he will then have no reason to feel ashamed. "Who correctly handles" (GK 3982) suggests a plowman making a straight furrow in the soil. As Timothy teaches the Scriptures, he is to guide the word of truth along a straight path and not turn aside into the devious paths of deceiving interpretations.

16–18 In these three verses the apostle describes the heretical teachers. He warns Timothy to "avoid [GK 4325] godless chatter" (cf. 1Ti 6:20), such as some were engaged in their godless myths and hair-splitting controversies (cf. 1Ti 4:7; 6:3–5). He says that their "teaching will spread like gangrene [GK 1121]." This word was used by medical writers of that day to indicate a sore that eats into the flesh.

Hymenaeus is probably the man mentioned in 1Ti 1:20; nothing is known about Philetus. These two had "wandered away [GK 846; see 1Ti 1:6; 6:21] from the truth." Their specific teaching was that the resurrection had already taken place, and thereby they were destroying the faith of some people. They were evidently explaining the resurrection in a spiritual sense, equating it with regeneration or the new birth. Paul gave an extended answer to this false teaching in 1Co 15.

19 The apostle now emphasizes the solid foundation of truth. He declares that in spite of the subversion, God's "solid foundation stands firm." This foundation is either Christ Jesus (see 1Co 3:11) and his apostles (see Eph 2:20; Rev 21:14) or, more widely, the church (see 1Ti 3:15), which stands firm in spite of the waywardness of some of its members. The foundation is "sealed" with two inscriptions, two mutually complementary aspects. The first is the objective fact of God's knowledge of those whom he has chosen; the second is the recognition in the consciousness of each individual of the relationship that he or she has with the Lord, together with his call to holiness (cf. 1:9).

B. Noble and Ignoble Vessels (2:20–21)

20–21 Having drawn at some length the contrast between true and false teachers (vv. 14–19), Paul now points up a second contrast—that between noble and ignoble vessels. Both will be found in the church. "In a large house," where a wealthy man lives, "there are not only articles of gold and silver, but also of wood and clay." Those that are gold certainly receive honor by the owner. Some less eminent articles are "of silver." But others are of "wood" (e.g., wooden bowls for holding flour) or "clay" (e.g., pottery). The latter two have a more mundane use.

We find the same two expressions in Ro 9:21. In the verses that follow there we find that the former vessels are "objects of [God's] mercy, whom he prepared in advance for glory" (v.23), whereas the latter are "objects of his wrath—prepared for destruction" (v.22). On the basis of this, as well as the context here in 2 Timothy, some scholars feel that the articles for ignoble purposes are the false teachers in the church (vv.16–18), who are destined for eternal destruction. In that case, "if a man cleanses himself from the latter" (v.21) means that Timothy must expel from the church the ignoble members.

Another interpretation is less drastic. It holds that in the local congregation are members who are prepared for "noble purposes" and others who are fitted for more menial tasks. Both have their place and function in the church. Verse 21 would then mean that the individual who cleanses himself from "the latter" (perhaps false teachings) will be "an instrument for noble purposes." He will be "made holy" (GK 39), will be "useful to the Master," and will be "prepared to do any good work."

Both of these interpretations seem valid. Since we cannot be sure which one Paul had in mind, we can make both applications.

C. The Kind and the Quarrelsome (2:22–26)

The last of the three "contrasts in the church" is that between kind people and quarrelsome people (vv.22–26). Unfortunately, both types are often in the visible, organized church.

22 Timothy was still a rather young man, probably in his early thirties, and so the aged apostle warns him: "Flee the evil desires of youth." The implication is that he must keep on fleeing youthful lusts and pursuing positive virtues instead. It is not enough to run away from wrong; we must run after what is good. This is the only way to escape temptations to evil (cf. Ro 12:21).

Timothy must pursue four things: "righteousness, faith, love and peace" (see also 1Ti 6:11). Although Timothy must purge the church of false teachers, he had to be careful to promote "love and peace" among the Christian believers committed to his care. "Faith" (GK 4411) may also be translated "faithfulness"; both ideas fit well here.

23 Paul goes on to instruct Timothy again to avoid and even refuse to get involved in senseless and ignorant "arguments" (GK 2428). If such questions are brought before Timothy, he should refuse to discuss them. Sometimes the wise pastor has to do this, because they only produce fights. These tend to divide the church and so destroy it.

24 "The Lord's servant"—i.e., every Christian, but particularly the pastor of a church—must not "quarrel." Rather, they must be "kind" (GK 2473) to everyone, "apt to teach" (cf. 1Ti 3:2), and "not resentful." Christians must have this sort of attitude toward those who oppose them.

25–26 At the same time, a good minister must "gently instruct" such people, in the hope that God will give them "repentance" (lit., "a change of heart"; GK 3567), leading to a full "knowledge" (GK 2106) of the truth, and that "they will come to their senses" and be set free from the snare of the devil.

VII. Characteristics of the Last Days (3:1–9)

A. Love of Money and Pleasure (3:1–5)

1 The expression "in the last days" comes from the OT (e.g., Isa 2:2; Mic 4:1). In Peter's quotation of Joel 2:28 on the day of Pentecost (Ac 2:17), it clearly refers to the whole messianic age, for he declared that the prophecy was being fulfilled that very day. Some insist that "in the last days" has the meaning here, but it seems more natural to take it as applying especially to the last days of this age, just before the Second Coming (as in 2Pe 3:3; Jude 18). This does not at all deny that these conditions have been and will be present throughout the church age. It is simply to say that the characteristics enumerated here will be more intensive and extensive as the end approaches. Paul declared that the last days will see troublesome and dangerous times.

2–4 In these three verses we find a list of no fewer than eighteen vices that will characterize people in the last days. These conditions have always existed in some measure but they have become more marked in recent decades. People will be selfish and greedy (cf. 1Ti 6:10), and they will be "boasters" or braggarts. They will also be "proud" (lit., "showing oneself above others"; GK 5662). Originally used in a good sense in Greek literature for truly superior persons, this word soon took on the bad connotation that it always has in the NT; a person with this characteristic treats others with contempt.

"Abusive" (GK 1061) means slanderous. And it may well be questioned whether children and young people were ever more "disobedient to their parents" than they are today.

"Ungrateful" (GK 940; cf. Lk 6:35) is the opposite of being thankful. "Unholy" (GK 495; cf. 1Ti 1:9) describes the person who has no fellowship with God and so is living a merely "secular" life. "Without love" (GK 845; cf. Ro 1:31) means "without family affection." "Unforgiving" (GK 836) originally indicated one who was irreconcilable.

"Slanderous" is diaboloi (GK 1333). This usually occurs in the NT as word meaning "the devil." But the adjective connotes "prone to slander" or "accusing falsely."

"Without self-control" (GK 203) has a wide sense, but it is especially applicable to no control regarding bodily lusts. It describes the weak person who is easily led into sin. "Brutal" means one who is savage and fierce. "Not lovers of the good" (GK 920) is a word that is found nowhere else in the ancient Greek literature.

"Treacherous" is a noun meaning "traitor" or "betrayer"; it is used for Judas Iscariot (Lk 6:16). "Rash" describes one who is reckless. On "conceited," see comments on 1Ti 3:6; 6:4. "Lovers of pleasure [GK 5798] rather than lovers of God [GK 5806]" is a play on two similar Greek words. They describe those who put self in the place of God as the center of their affections.

5 Yet they are religious—"having a form of godliness but denying its power." Timothy is told to turn away from such hypocrites.

B. Depraved Living and Thinking (3:6–9)

6–7 In the first five verses of this chapter Paul has been pointing out the characteristics of the false teachers in their love for money and pleasure. Now he criticizes them for their depraved living and thinking. He says that they "worm their way into homes." "Gain control over" (lit., "take captive," as in war; GK 170) may mean only "deceive." "Weak-willed women" (GK 1220) are those who are overwhelmed with sins and "swayed by all kinds of evil desires." Such women become an easy prey for false teachers. Verse 7 suggests that these women wanted to pose as learned people, but actually they remained ignorant of the truth.

8–9 Jannes and Jambres are not mentioned in the OT, but there was a Jewish tradition that they were two of the Egyptian magicians who withstood Moses and Aaron. They are mentioned in an Aramaic paraphrase of Ex 7:11. Paul likens the false teachers at Ephesus to these ancient magicians. He describes them as men of utterly corrupted minds. As far as the faith is concerned, they are "rejected" (GK 99); they cannot be trusted to teach the truth. But they will not get far. As in the case of Jannes and Jambres, their "folly" (GK 496) will be clearly seen.

VIII. Persecution and Steadfastness (3:10–17)

A. All Christians Persecuted (3:10–13)

10–11 In sharp contrast to the above-mentioned people, Paul now addresses Timothy directly. "Know all about" (GK 4158) means to follow closely; Timothy has been faithfully following the life of the apostle. He was familiar with Paul's "teaching" (GK 1436), his "way of life" (GK 73), God's "purpose" (GK 4606; cf. 1:9) in him, his "faith" (GK 4411), his "patience" (GK 3429) shown toward his opponents, the constant, steadfast "love" (GK 27) that God implanted in his heart, and his "endurance" (GK 5705) or brave patience with which he handled the various hindrances and persecutions that happened to him.

In v.11 Paul adds two more things that Timothy knew about: "persecutions" and "sufferings." These things had happened throughout his missionary career (cf. 2Co 11:23–29), beginning in Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra (Ac 13:50; 14:2, 5, 19)—cities in the Roman province of Galatia where Paul had founded churches on his first missionary journey. In Lystra, he was actually bombarded with stones and left for dead. Since Timothy was a young man in Lystra at that time and had evidently just been converted under Paul's ministry, he had poignant memories of this incident. But out of them all the Lord had delivered Paul, even reviving him from the stoning.

Early Christians could expect persecution for their faith (cf. 3:10–13). Many (likely including Paul; cf. 4:6–7, 16–18) were persecuted under Nero in the Coliseum of Rome.

12–13 Paul was not alone in his sufferings. He declares that everyone who desires "to live a godly life in Christ Jesus will be persecuted." Meanwhile, "evil men and impostors will go from bad to worse"; such people have been deceived by false teachers, and they are now deceiving others.

B. The Adequacy of Scripture (3:14–17)

14–15 Rather than being led astray by these impostors, Timothy must continue in the teachings that he had learned and of which he had "become convinced." These Scriptural teachings he had learned from his grandmother Lois and his mother Eunice (1:5) right from the time he was a baby. Jewish children were customarily taught the law at an early age, and they had to commit parts of it to memory. "The holy Scriptures" renders "the sacred writings," i.e., what we now call the OT Scriptures, which were able to make him "wise" in preparation "for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus." They disciplined him in obedience to God and also pointed forward to the coming Messiah, through whom salvation by faith would become available.

16–17 "All Scripture is God-breathed." The adjective used here is theopneustos (GK 2535), which is a combination of two other Greek words: theos ("God"; GK 2536) and pneo ("breathe"; GK 4463). This is one of the greatest texts in the NT describing the inspiration or the "God-breathed" aspect of the Bible. Another outstanding passage is 2Pe 1:21, which describes how divine inspiration took place (see comments on that verse).

Inspired Scripture is "useful" or "profitable" in various areas: "teaching" (GK 1436) us Christian truths; "rebuking" (GK 1791) or convicting us of sin; "correcting" (GK 2061) us where we have gone wrong; "training" (GK 4082) us in how to live both inwardly and outwardly in righteous living.

The purpose of all this is so that Christians will be completely ready to meet the demands of discipleship.

IX. Preach the Word (4:1–5)

1 Here Paul speaks of Christ Jesus as the one who will "judge the living and the dead"—a clause found in all the early creeds of the church (cf. 1Th 4:16–17). Using language reminiscent of a legal setting, Paul solemnly charges Timothy to be governed in his thinking, not just by the present life, but also by the coming judgment and the eternal kingdom of Christ.

2 The basic charge is: "Preach [GK 3062] the Word." Preachers are not to air their own opinions but to proclaim God's eternal, authoritative Word of truth as contained in the Scriptures. The minister has to be on duty constantly, ready for any emergency at any time. In addition to preaching the Word, Timothy is to "correct" (GK 1794) or reprove, "rebuke" (GK 2203) or admonish, and "encourage" (GK 4151) or comfort and exhort. That is, both the positive and the negative must be included. But preachers must do these things with great "patience" (GK 3429) and careful "instruction" (GK 1439).

3 Timothy is now warned that the time will come when people will not be able to tolerate "sound doctrine" (a key phrase in the Pastorals; cf. 1Ti 1:10; Tit 1:9; 2:1). Timothy's major task in Ephesus is to defend and proclaim doctrines in accord with the truth of God's Word (v.2). He must do this constantly, since the time will come when people will not listen to the truth. Instead, "to suit their own desires, they will gather around them" many teachers who will say what they want them to say, in order to gratify their self-willed hearts.

4 People like this will "turn away" (GK 695; cf. 1:15) their ears from the truth and will "turn aside" (GK 1762; see 1Ti 1:6; 5:15; 6:20; 2Ti 2:16–18) to senseless "myths" (see 1Ti 1:4; 4:7).

5 "Keep your head" (GK 3768) is from a verb that often means "be sober, abstain from wine." But in the NT (cf. 1Th 5:6, 8; 1Pe 1:13; 4:7; 5:8) it has the metaphorical sense of being self-controlled or self-possessed—Timothy is to keep his self-control under all circumstances. He is then again urged to "endure hardship" (GK 2802; cf. 2:3). He must do the work of an "evangelist" (cf. Ac 21:8; Eph 4:11), which means to announce the good news of salvation in Christ. This word may well refer to an itinerant preacher, but the established pastor must also be an evangelist, pointing sinners to Christ.

The summary of Paul's solemn charge to Timothy is this: "Discharge all the duties of your ministry." He is to fulfill his calling by packing his ministry to the full with the things Paul has been exhorting him to do in these two letters.

X. Paul's Final Testimony (4:6–8)

6 In Php 2:17 Paul wrote, "But even if I am being poured out like a drink offering on the sacrifice"; here he says, "For I am already being poured out as a drink offering." In both passages "I am being poured out like a drink offering" (GK 5064) presents the picture of a drink offering poured on the lamb of sacrifice just before it was burned on the altar (Nu 28:24). In the earlier letter, written during his first Roman imprisonment, Paul was expecting to be released soon and revisit Philippi (Php 2:24). But now the case is different. He is nearing the end of his second and final imprisonment at Rome. He is conscious that his fate is sealed, for he adds, "And the time has come for my departure." Paul was about ready to leave his physical body and forsake this earth for the presence of his Lord.

7 There are two ways of interpreting this verse. One is to assume that we have here three figures of speech: the first military, the second athletic, the third religious. But the three clauses of the verse may all be taken as related to athletics. The verb translated "fought" (GK 76) can have a military meaning (cf. Jn 18:36), but it can just as clearly relate to athletics (1Co 9:25). All in all, it seems more natural to understand Paul as speaking in the athletic sense in all of them (cf. especially 1Ti 6:12). If so, then we can paraphrase the verse like this: "I have competed well in the athletic contest [of life], I have finished the race, I have kept the rules"—not "fouled out" and so been disqualified from winning.

8 One of the main reasons for preferring the athletic interpretation in v.7 is that it fits in perfectly with v.8, where Paul says a "crown" (GK 5109) awaits him. The word for "crown" is not the one used for a royal crown but for the laurel wreath that was given to the winner of the Marathon race (cf. 1Co 9:25). The Lord, the righteous Judge (of the contest) was ready to "award" this prize to Paul at the end of the race, his victorious life. The same reward awaits all who run the Christian race successfully to the finish and long for "his appearing" (the Second Coming).

XI. Paul's Final Plea (4:9–13)

9 Paul had already said that he longed to see Timothy (1:4). Now he urges him to come speedily.

10 Verses 10-12 give the reasons for this: Paul was left almost alone. Demas, his trusted associate, had deserted him. During the apostle's first Roman imprisonment, he twice mentioned Demas as one of his fellow workers (Col 4:14; Phm 24). Some have tried to put a good construction on the reference to Demas here, suggesting that he had gone on a missionary errand to Thessalonica. But Paul uses the same verb for "deserted" (GK 1593) as in v.16. And we are told that Demas left "because he loved this world." He was not willing to pay the price of hardship and suffering that Paul was paying.

Crescens (mentioned only here) had gone to Galatia, and Titus to Dalmatia, presumably to do missionary work. The latter place was on the eastern shore of the Adriatic Sea, north of Macedonia.

11 "Only Luke is with me." There is pathos in these words. Luke was probably the one who acted as the apostle's secretary in the actual writing of this letter (see introduction). Perhaps Luke's own loneliness is also reflected here. He stayed with Paul to the end perhaps because the aged, ailing apostle needed the care of a doctor (Col 4:14) in his closing years and because Luke's deep personal devotion to Paul would lead him to stay right with him.

"Mark" had had a checkered career. We first meet him in Ac 12:12. When Peter was miraculously delivered from prison, he went to Mark's home. Barnabas and Paul took him to Antioch (Ac 12:25) and then took him with them as their assistant on the first missionary journey (13:5). But the young Mark left and returned to Jerusalem (13:13). Because of this, Paul refused to take him along on the second journey (15:36–40). Later Mark matured and was with Paul in his first Roman imprisonment (Col 4:10). Now the aging apostle gives his young associate his highest accolade: "Get Mark and bring him with you, because he is helpful to me in my ministry."

12 "Tychicus" was from the province of Asia and accompanied Paul on his last journey to Jerusalem (Ac 20:4). He was the bearer of the letters to the Colossians (Col 4:7–8) and to the Ephesians (Eph 6:21). In both places he is described as a "dear brother" and "faithful servant in the Lord." It is obvious that Paul had high regard for Tychicus. "I sent" may well mean "I am sending." If so, Tychicus was the bearer of this letter and was being sent by Paul to take Timothy's place as supervisor of the work at Ephesus. The apostle wanted his "dear son" (1:2) with him in the closing days of his life. We can only conjecture as to whether Timothy reached Paul before the latter's death.

13 It is evident that Timothy was not to go by ship directly to Rome from the large seaport of Ephesus, for he is requested to pick up the cloak Paul had left with Carpus at Troas. Nothing further is known about Carpus. The "cloak" was probably a traveling cloak with long sleeves, which would keep Paul warm while in prison.

Timothy was also to bring Paul's "scrolls," written documents probably made of papyrus. Paul especially wanted his "parchments," i.e., scrolls or codices written on animal skins. These may have been leather scrolls of OT books.

XII. Human Opposition and Divine Support (4:14–18)

14–15 We know nothing further about "Alexander," who is called a "metalworker." Alexander was a common name in the NT world. We do not know when, where, or in what way Alexander did Paul "a great deal of harm." One good guess is that he had been responsible for the apostle's arrest and imprisonment. Paul prophesies that the Lord Jesus "will repay" him. Paul warns Timothy to be on guard against this malicious enemy who "strongly opposed our message." This opposition may have included not only Paul's preaching but also his defense before the court (cf. v.16).

16 Paul now reflects on his first "defense" (GK 665), when no one came to his support but everyone deserted him. Older commentaries usually refer this to Paul's first Roman imprisonment (Ac 28:30), which resulted in his release. But most scholars today feel that the language here is too strong for that earlier event, when in accordance with Roman custom, he may have been automatically released without trial at the end of two years. Rather, the reference is to Paul's first hearing in court.

Paul's magnanimous Christian love is revealed in the last sentence of this verse: "May it not be held against them." He could and did forgive his deserters for their weakness in fearing to stand by him.

17 But he did not lack support. Triumphantly and gratefully he cries, "But the Lord stood at my side and gave me strength." The result was that the Gentiles in Caesar's court heard the Gospel, which thereby got wider publicity in Rome. When was Paul "delivered from the lion's mouth"? If we accept the reference to his first imprisonment, the answer seems simple. But was he threatened to the extent implied by this vivid figure? The only alternative would be that his first trial had seemed to go well for him, with perhaps a temporary reprieve. The "lion" would then be Nero. If so, it was this same emperor who later, according to the unanimous tradition of the early church, condemned him and put him to death.

18 "Rescue" and "delivered" (v.17) translate the same verb (GK 4861; cf. also Mt 6:13, where it is used in the Lord's Prayer). Paul trusts that the Lord will bring him safely through anything that comes his way. "His heavenly kingdom" is probably identical to the phrase "the kingdom of heaven," found thirty-two times in Matthew, though the reference here is to the future kingdom in the eternal realm.

Paul is fond of breaking out into spontaneous praise now and then in his letters. One of his many doxologies occurs here: "To him [the Lord, i.e., Christ] be glory for ever and ever. Amen."

XIII. Closing Greetings, Farewell 4:19–22)

19 Priscilla and Aquila figured prominently in Paul's life. When he first arrived in Corinth—evidently short of funds and disappointed at the meager results of his ministry in Athens—he found both employment and lodging with Aquila and Priscilla. Like him, they were leather workers (Ac 18:2–3). When Paul left Corinth, this couple sailed across the Aegean with him to Ephesus and stayed there (Ac 18:18–19). They performed a useful function by instructing Apollos (v.26). From there they, and the church that met in their home, sent greetings to the Christians at Corinth (1Co 16:19). Later we find them back in Rome (Ro 16:3); Paul sent greetings to them there and referred (Ro 16:4) to an occasion when they had "risked their lives" for him. But now they are once more in Ephesus. In those days prosperous Jews traveled a great deal from city to city. In four of the six places where Priscilla and Aquila are mentioned, Priscilla's name comes first. Evidently she was the stronger character of the two. It may well be that their moves were due as much to her missionary concern as to her husband's trade.

The "household of Onesiphorus" is mentioned with great appreciation in 1:16–18 (see comments there).

20 When Paul wrote to Rome from Corinth, he sent greetings from "Erastus, who is the city's director of public works" (Ro 16:23). There was also an Erastus who, along with Timothy, was Paul's helper at Ephesus (Ac 19:22). We have no way, of course, of knowing whether these three passages refer to the same person. At any rate, "Erastus stayed in Corinth," possibly when Paul left there for the last time.

The apostle had "left Trophimus sick in Miletus" (near Ephesus). This man came from the province of Asia and was one of Paul's associates in carrying the offering from the Gentile churches to the poor saints at Jerusalem (Ac 20:4). There he became the cause, unintentionally, of Paul's being mobbed and arrested (Ac 21:29).

21–22 Paul is beginning to feel the cold and dampness in his prison cell. So now he speaks with fresh urgency: "Do your best [GK 5079; cf. v.9] to get here before winter." If not, he will suffer desperately in the cold weather.

Finally, Paul sends greetings from four members of the church at Rome—Eubulus, Pudens, Linus, and Claudia—"and all the brothers." Church tradition says that Linus became the first bishop of Rome after the death of Peter and Paul. About the others, we have no certain knowledge.

Paul pronounces a personal benediction on Timothy ("your" in "your spirit" is singular), before concluding comprehensively with "Grace be with you all."

Titus

INTRODUCTION

As the shortest of the Pastoral Letters, Titus has often been overshadowed by the longer letters to Timothy. But it is rich in doctrinal and practical values and is worthy of study in its own right.

1. Authorship

The Pauline authorship of the letter was not questioned in the early church. Arguments against its authenticity are of modern origin. Its claim to Pauline authorship is here accepted without reserve (see introduction to 1 Timothy).

2. Recipient

The letter is addressed to "Titus, my true son in our common faith" (1:4). The appended identification marks a close and affectionate relation between Paul and Titus. He was probably a comparatively young man when Paul wrote to him (cf. 2:6–7). Scriptural references to Titus are surprisingly rare. Although he was closely connected with Paul, his name never occurs in Acts and, aside from the letter addressed to him, his name is found in only three Pauline letters (2Co 2:13; 7:6, 13–14; 8:6, 16, 23; 12:18; Gal. 2:1, 3; 2Ti 4:10).

Chronologically, the first mention of Titus is in Gal 2:1–3. When Paul went from Antioch to discuss "his" Gospel with the leaders in Jerusalem, he took along Titus, an uncircumcised young Greek, as a worthy specimen of the fruits of his ministry to the Gentiles. "My true son" (1:1) implies that he was Paul's convert, perhaps won during the ministry in Ac 11:25–26. At Jerusalem Paul's position that Gentile believers were not under the Mosaic law was vindicated when Titus was not compelled to be circumcised (Gal 2:3–5). Paul's selection of this young convert to test this crucial issue speaks well of his spiritual vitality.

We hear nothing further of Titus until the time of Paul's ministry at Ephesus on the third missionary journey. Perhaps Paul took him along to Ephesus from Antioch (Ac 18:22–19:1). He was an unnamed member of the group of assistants to Paul there (Ac 19:22; cf. 2Co 2:13; 7:6, 13–14). On three separate occasions Paul seems to have sent Titus to Corinth on important missions.

About a year before the writing of 2 Corinthians, Paul sent Titus to Corinth to enlist Corinthian participation in the collection for the Judean saints (1Co 16:1–4; 2Co 9:2; 12:18). Apparently shortly after writing 1 Corinthians, Paul again sent Titus to Corinth to help straighten out the tangled affairs in that church and to counter the work of Paul's opponents there. Plans called for a reunion at Troas where Paul was to engage in missionary work (2Co 2:12–13). The failure of Titus to return as planned caused Paul much anxiety. Terminating the inviting work at Troas, Paul went into Macedonia, hoping in this way to meet Titus sooner. Eventually Titus appeared in Macedonia with the good news that his difficult mission to Corinth had been successful (2Co 7:5–7). Paul rejoiced in this success and was encouraged by the personal joy of Titus at the response of the Corinthians (2Co 7:6–7, 13–15). Cheered by these developments, Paul wrote the second letter to the Corinthians and sent it back with Titus, instructing him also to complete the collection at Corinth (2Co 8:6–7, 16–22). Paul gave Titus and the two men sent with him (2Co 8:18–22) his strong recommendation (2Co 8:23–24), assuring any critical Corinthian that Titus could be fully trusted as one motivated by Paul's own spirit (2Cor 12:17–18).

When Paul came to Corinth for three months (Ac 20:2), the difficulties there had been resolved and the collection completed (cf. Ro 15:25–27). But Titus was no longer at Corinth when Paul wrote to the Romans, for his name does not appear among those of Paul's co-workers who sent greetings to the Roman saints (Ro 16:21–23). Nothing further is heard of Titus until the time of the Pastoral Letters.

When Paul wrote to Titus, he was working on the island of Crete (1:5). Their joint labors there were long enough for Paul to realize the deplorable conditions of the local churches. Apparently Titus had been working there for some time when Paul wrote. He informed Titus that as soon as a replacement arrived, he was to rejoin Paul at Nicopolis (3:12), a city in western Greece. Paul was formulating further plans for Titus.

We get a final fleeting glimpse of Titus in 2Ti 4:10, where Paul informed Timothy that Titus had gone to Dalmatia. This implies he had been with Paul during his second Roman imprisonment. Although the reason for the trip is not given, we may assume that he went there at the call of Christian duty.

These references to Titus reveal that he was a trustworthy, efficient, and valued young co-worker. He possessed a forceful personality, was resourceful, energetic, tactful, skillful in dealing with difficult situations, and effective in conciliating people.

3. Occasion and Purpose

The external occasion for the letter to Titus was the trip through Crete planned by Zenas and Apollos (3:13). They conveyed the letter to Titus. The internal occasion for writing was Paul's concern to strengthen the hand of Titus as his personal representative in Crete in carrying out a difficult assignment. Paul knew that Titus would face opposition (1:10–11; 2:15; 3:10). He aimed to encourage Titus and reinforce his authority in working among the churches in Crete. The letter would serve as written authorization for this task, proof to them that he was working in accordance with Paul's own instructions.

The origin of the Cretan churches is unknown. They had evidently been in existence for some time when Paul visited Crete. Their condition was discouraging. They were inadequately organized, so Titus was directed to appoint morally and doctrinally qualified elders in the various churches (1:6–9). In view of the operation of false teachers (1:10–16), this was essential.

The prevailing moral conditions in the churches were far from what they might be. The Christians were adversely influenced by the prevailing low moral standards in Crete. Perhaps the Gospel of the grace of God had been misinterpreted to mean that salvation was unrelated to daily conduct. Titus was urged to insist on the need for sound doctrine and a high level of moral and social conduct (2:1–10; 3:1–3). Christian behavior must be grounded in the basic truths of the Gospel (2:11–14; 3:4–8).

The letter also conveyed personal information for Titus. The instruction to join Paul at his winter quarters at Nicopolis after a replacement arrived (3:12) apprised Titus of the fact that Paul was formulating further plans for their joint labors.

4. Date and Place of Origin

The date assigned the letter depends on the reconstruction accepted for Paul's journeys following his release from the first Roman imprisonment, as well as the dating for that imprisonment, commonly accepted as A.D. 61–63, though it may have been as early as 59–61. Since this letter makes no mention of the Neronian persecution, which apparently began in October 64, it seems best to date it between the time of Paul's release and the commencement of that persecution. The journeys to the east indicated in 1 Timothy and Titus were apparently made as soon as he was released. The letter to Titus may have been written during the fall of A.D. 63, not long after Paul left Crete.

The place of origin can only be conjectured. The remark in 3:12 indicates that Paul had not yet reached Nicopolis. Any suggested place will depend on the reconstruction of Paul's movements following his release. A case can be made for Corinth.

5. Theological Value

The letter of Titus covers the same general ground as 1 Timothy but is more compact and less personal. Its greater part deals with ministerial duties and social relations, yet it contains no fewer than three summary passages that are theological gems (1:1–3; 2:11–14; 3:3–7). In 1 Timothy Paul stresses sound doctrine; in Titus he stresses worthy Christian conduct and insists that Christian conduct must be based on and regulated by Christian truth. Nowhere else does Paul more forcefully urge the essential connection between evangelical truth and the purest morality than in this brief letter. Here the basic truths of the Gospel are displayed in the abiding glory of their saving and sanctifying appeal. The regenerating work of the Holy Spirit is the experiential basis for Christian conduct (3:3–7).

EXPOSITION

I. Salutation (1:1–4)

The salutation is remarkably long and weighty for such a brief letter. Only Romans has a longer salutation. It displays the usual three parts of an epistolary salutation of that day—writer, reader, greeting. Each part could be expanded according to the occasion and the writer's purpose.

A. The Writer (1:1–3)

1 The length of this salutation is due to the expansion of the first part, where Paul emphasizes his authoritative message. While this solemn self-identification was not needed by Titus, it effectively stressed the authoritative commission and message of the one for whom Titus acted in Crete. This letter was written to preserve and further that message, which was closely linked with godliness in daily life.

To his name Paul added two credentials. "A servant of God" occurs only here in Paul; elsewhere it is "servant of Jesus Christ" (Ro 1:1; Gal 1:10; Php 1:1). "Servant" (GK 1528) is the common term for "slave" and its use implies Paul's acknowledged ownership by God and complete dependence on him. "Servant of God" was used of Moses (Jos 1:2) and the prophets (Jer 7:25; Am 3:7) to denote their use by God to accomplish his will. Paul is nothing less than God's agent. Furthermore, he is Jesus Christ's "apostle" (GK 693), having been called, equipped, and sent forth as his authoritative messenger.

"For the faith of God's elect and the knowledge of the truth" describes his apostolic office. "For" as used in the NIV denotes purpose; Paul's mission was to promote Christian faith and knowledge. It can also be translated "according to," so that Paul's apostleship is in full accord with the faith and knowledge that God's elect have received. His apostleship is not regulated by their faith (cf. Gal 1:11–17) but is wholly in accord with it. The Cretan Christians needed to evaluate their faith by that fact.

"God's elect" (GK 1723) are those who have responded to God's call through the Gospel. The expression embodies a true balance between the divine initiative and the human response. Although surrounded with mystery, the biblical teaching on election is for the benefit of believers and is intended as a practical truth. It assures faithful, struggling Christians that their salvation is all of God from beginning to end.

Christian faith is linked with the full apprehension of truth, the inner realization of divine reality as revealed in the Gospel. Faith is a heart response to the truth of the Gospel, but it must also possess the mind. God never intended his people to remain intellectually ignorant of the truth of the Gospel.

Christian truth has a moral aspect; it "leads to godliness." Conduct must be evaluated by the demands of godliness, that reverential attitude that leads to conduct pleasing to God. Those gripped by God's truth walk in harmony with such demands. There is an intimate connection between a vital possession of truth and genuine godliness—a lesson the Cretan church needed to learn.

2 The intended connection of v.2 is not quite certain. The NIV translators have added the words "a faith and knowledge" to make explicit their understanding of the connection—that the Christian life is grounded in the hope of eternal life. As with all of God's elect, Paul's life and service were firmly rooted in "hope" (GK 1828), which eagerly and confidently awaits the realization of "eternal life"—life not only endless but having an eternal quality. Believers already possess eternal life (Jn 5:24), but its full and perfect realization awaits the return of the Prince of Life.

This hope is not a vague, pious aspiration but is sure because it is grounded in the absolute trustworthiness of God. The character of the God "who does not lie" (GK 950) assures the fulfillment of his promise. This characterization places God in contrast with the notorious deceptiveness of the Cretans (1:12).

God promised this eternal life before the ages of time, begun at creation, started to roll (cf. 2Ti 1:9). This promise existed within the Godhead before he created the world. In other words, it is rooted in God's eternal purpose for humankind.

3 The reliability of the above-mentioned promise was demonstrated through the clear, public revelation it received in the preaching of the Gospel. "His word" is not the personal Christ, the Logos (cf. Jn 1:1), but rather the saving message of the Gospel. This message was made known "at his appointed season," the opportune time established by God in his eternal wisdom. All history was the preparation for that revelation. The historical appropriateness of the time is evident from the existence of the Roman peace that gave a favorable setting for the preaching of the Gospel and the development of Greek as the linguistic medium of its proclamation throughout the entire world.

The message was brought to the world "through the preaching entrusted to me." This refers, not to the act of preaching, but to the message that was heralded, the message of the Gospel. There is no substitute for that message, and Paul was writing so that its purity might be preserved on the island of Crete. That life-giving message was committed to Paul personally as a divine trust. He could never escape the wonder that this assignment should be given to him, unworthy as he was (1Co 15:9; Eph 3:8; 1Ti 1:11–13).

The assignment came to him "by the command of God our Savior." It is a vigorous assertion of his divine commission, underlining the authority behind this letter. The One who saves and preserves us is none other than God; we must personally appropriate and publicly confess him in this capacity. Paul's usage of "God our Savior" suggests that his reference here is to the Father. In the Pastorals the term is applied to both the Father (1Ti 1:1; 2:3; 4:10, Tit 1:3; 2:10; 3:4) and the Son (2Ti 1:10; Tit 1:4; 2:13; 3:6). As the ultimate source of all salvation, the designation is appropriately applied to the Father.

B. The Reader (1:4a)

The recipient is tersely described as "my true son in our common faith." This phrase reveals the intimate and endearing relationship between Paul and Titus; it also implies that Titus was Paul's convert. The adjective "true" (GK 1188) means "legitimately born or genuine" and acknowledges that Titus was running true to his spiritual parentage and thus represented Paul's position. "Common" (GK 3123) reaches farther than writer and reader to denote a faith mutually held by God's elect.

C. The Greeting (1:4b)

The greeting with "grace and peace" is Paul's usual greeting. "Grace" (GK 5921) is the unmerited favor of God at work in the life of the believer, while "peace" (GK 1645) is the resultant experience of harmony and well-being in the life of the reconciled. This double blessing comes "from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Savior." Since Paul viewed Father and Son as one source of blessing and the one object of every Christian aspiration, "from" is not repeated. "Our Savior," applied in v.3 to the Father, is here transferred to the Son; both are involved in bestowing the same salvation. "Our" again signifies the common testimony of believers.

II. Concerning Elders and Errorists in Crete (1:5–16)

The first major division, designed to further the welfare of the Cretan churches, falls into two parts. Verses 5–9 give instructions concerning church officials, whereas vv.10–16 deal with the needed refutation of false teachers in Crete. The presence of the false teachers made more imperative the appointment of qualified leaders.

A. The Appointment of Qualified Elders (1:5–9)

1. The duties of Titus in Crete (1:5)

5 "I left you in Crete" asserts the joint labors of Paul and Titus on that island for a brief time. Paul's labors there cannot be fitted into Ac 27:7–9 or before. The alternatives are to reject Pauline authorship of the Pastorals or to accept that the reference is to a time following his Ac 28 imprisonment. The latter alternative is probable scripturally and is asserted by tradition.

"Left" (GK 657) implies that Titus was deliberately left behind in Crete to carry out a specific assignment. Before Paul's departure, the commission was orally delivered; now it is restated concisely in writing. Titus's task was comprehensive: to "straighten out what was left unfinished." "Straighten out" (GK 2114) denotes that his task was personally to set things in order. "What was left unfinished" points to several serious defects that still needed Titus's attention. Organization was lacking (1:5), false teachers were unchecked (1:10–11; 3:10–11), and instruction in doctrine and conduct was needed

(2:1–10; 3:1–2). Paul had observed and had begun to correct these matters; Titus must now complete the work.

An initial duty was to "appoint elders" in each place where there was a group of believers. Such a plural leadership in the local congregation continued Paul's own earlier practice (Ac 14:23). Probably the congregation chose the elders with the encouragement of Titus, who in turn had the responsibility of formally appointing them to office. "As I directed you" recalls that this was in accord with his previous orders. In this way, Titus would carry out Paul's ideal for these congregations.

2. The qualifications of the elders (1:6–9)

This list of qualifications corresponds closely to that given in 1Ti 3:1–7, yet the differences indicate that it was realistically applied to a contemporary situation. The fact that no deacons are mentioned suggests that the organization of these churches was more primitive than at Ephesus.

6 "An elder must be blameless" marks the basic qualification, demanding an irreproachable reputation in the community. This demand is elaborated in what follows, which begins with two domestic qualifications. The precise implications of "the husband of but one wife" have been debated through the centuries (see comment on 1Ti 3:3). Most natural is the view that an elder must be the husband of only one living woman.

Since older men would be chosen for leadership, it is assumed that the elder would have children. The latter must share their father's Christian faith by having made a personal decision. Their remaining pagan would throw into question the father's ability to lead others to the faith. Moreover, the children must personally fulfill the ethical requirements of the Christian life. They must not be chargeable as being "wild" (self-indulgent and wasteful in their manner of life, like the prodigal son) or "disobedient" (refusing to bow to parental authority). An elder's inability to train and govern his children would also place in question his ability to train and govern the church.

7 The leader's true position and personal qualifications are given in vv.7–9. The switch in v.7 from "elder" (GK 4565) to "overseers" (GK 2176) shows that these two terms are interchangeable (cf. also Ac 20:17 and 20:28). Yet both these words have a different connotation. "Elder" implies the maturity and dignity of the man, while "overseer" indicates his work of overseeing God's flock.

Again Paul stresses that the overseer must be "blameless" (GK 441). This time the stress is on "it is necessary," because of the elder's position as being entrusted with "God's work" (lit., "God's steward"; GK 3874). A steward was the manager of a household or estate, appointed by and accountable to the owner. The picture of the steward embodies one of Paul's favorite concepts of the ministry (1Co 4:1–2; 9:17; Eph 3:2; Col 1:25). The Christian minister is not merely the servant of the church; he exercises his office under God's authority and is directly accountable to him. This high office makes high demands on the character of the man.

Five negative and six positive personal qualifications are listed in vv.7–8. The overseer must not be (1) "overbearing" (GK 881), arrogantly disregarding the interests of others in order to please himself; (2) "quick-tempered" (GK 3975), readily yielding to anger, for pastoral work demands much patience; (3) "given to drunkenness" (GK 4232); i.e., he must not be an alcoholic; (4) "violent" (GK 4438), ready to assail an opponent, either with fists or by bellicose behavior; (5) "pursuing dishonest gain" (GK 153), using his office to profit in an underhanded and shameful way. The laborer is worthy of his hire (cf. 1Ti 5:17–18), but he must not turn his office into a money-making business.

8 "Rather" introduces the contrasting positive qualifications. An overseer must be: (1) "hospitable" (lit., "lover of strangers"; GK 5811), ready to befriend and lodge traveling or fleeing believers; (2) "one who loves what is good" (GK 5787), an ally and zealous supporter of the good, including people as well as deeds and things; (3) "self-controlled" (GK 5409), in control of his mind and emotions so that he can act rationally and discreetly, a virtue much needed on Crete and one stressed in the Pastorals (cf. 1Ti 2:9, 15; 3:2; 2Ti 1:7; Tit 2:2, 4–6, 12); (4) "upright" (GK 1465), conforming his conduct to right standards; (5) "holy" (GK 4008), denoting his personal piety, an inner attitude of conforming to what is felt to be pleasing to God and consistent with religious practices; and (6) "disciplined" (GK 1604), having the inner strength that enables him to control his bodily appetites and passions, a virtue listed in Gal 5:23 as one quality of the fruit of the Spirit. These last three characteristics may be viewed as looking toward others, God, and self, respectively.

9 Doctrinal fitness is also necessary. The overseer must be known to "hold firmly to the trustworthy message," clinging to it despite the winds of false teaching and open opposition. "Trustworthy" (GK 4412) underlines that the Christian Gospel is perfectly reliable and completely worthy of one's confidence. Overseers must adhere to the Word "as it has been taught" and be in accord with the teaching of the apostles.

Unfaithfulness to the biblical revelation disqualifies people from leadership in God's church. On the other hand, doctrinal fidelity enables them to perform a twofold task: (1) They can appeal to others to adhere to and advance in their Christian faith. This can be done by proclaiming "sound doctrine"—teaching that is biblically correct and promotes spiritual health—in contrast to the unhealthy false teaching. (2) Their work also demands that they "refute those who oppose" the true Gospel and speak against it as the advocates of error. They must expose the errors of others and try to convince them that they are wrong.

B. The Refutation of False Teachers (1:10–16)

"For" introduces the justification for the requirement that elders must be able to expound and defend the truth (v.9). This is essential because of the false teachers described in vv.10–13a. Verses 13b–14 state the necessary action, while vv.15–16 present the evidence condemning these errorists.

1. The picture of the false teachers (1:10–13a)

10 "There are many rebellious people" is a general statement of the external danger facing the Cretan churches. These false teachers, most likely Cretans by birth, are apparently gnosticizing Judaists who as professed Christians seek to infiltrate the churches with their misguided teaching. They try to fasten onto Christianity various aspects of Judaism and to present the hybrid as a teaching containing higher philosophical insights.

Three terms describe these "many" false teachers: They are (1) "rebellious" (GK 538), refusing to subordinate themselves to any authority and rejecting the demands of the Gospel on them; (2) "mere talkers" (GK 3468), fluent and impressive in speech that accomplishes nothing constructive; and (3) "deceivers" (GK 5855), those whose glib tongues exercise a fascination over the minds of their dupes and lead them astray. "Those

Qualifications for Elders/Overseers and Deacons

Self-controlled	ELDER	ITi 3:2; Tit 1:8
Hospitable	ELDER	ITi 3:2; Tit 1:8
Able to teach	ELDER	ITi 3:2; 5:17; Tit 1:9
Not violent but gentle	ELDER	ITi 3:3; Tit 1:7
Not quarrelsome	ELDER	ITi 3:3
Not a lover of money	ELDER	ITi 3:3
Not a recent convert	ELDER	ITi 3:6
Has a good reputation with outsiders	ELDER	ITi 3:7
Not overbearing	ELDER	Tit 1:7
Not quick-tempered	ELDER	Tit 1:7
Loves what is good	ELDER	Tit 1:8
Upright, holy	ELDER	Tit 1:8
Disciplined	ELDER	Tit 1:8
Above reproach (blameless)	ELDER DEACON	ITi 3:2; Tit 1:6 ITi 3:9
Husband of one wife	ELDER DEACON	ITi 3:2; Tit 1:6 ITi 3:12
Temperate	ELDER DEACON	ITi 3:2; Tit 1:7 ITi 3:8
Respectable	ELDER DEACON	ITi 3:2 ITi 3:8
Not given to drunkenness	ELDER DEACON	ITi 3:3; Tit 1:7 ITi 3:8
Manages his own family well	ELDER DEACON	ITi 3:4 ITi 3:12
Sees that his children obey him	ELDER DEACON	ITi 3:4-5; Tit 1:6 ITi 3:12
Does not pursue dishonest gain	ELDER DEACON	Tit 1:7 ITi 3:8
Keeps hold of the deep truths	ELDER DEACON	Tit 1:9 ITi 3:9
Sincere	DEACON	ITi 3:8
Tested	DEACON	ITi 3:10

© 1985 The Zondervan Corporation

of the circumcision group" were the most active offenders.

11 Paul demands that these people "be silenced" (GK 2187)—a word that means "to close the mouth by means of a muzzle or gag." The offenders must be refused opportunity to spread their teachings in the churches; the term also includes silencing them by a logical refutation of their views.

Their suppression is necessary because of their seductive work. They belong to that class of people who are "ruining whole households," disturbing and turning upside down the faith of entire families. They achieve these disastrous results by teaching things that simply must not be presented as Christian truth.

"For the sake of dishonest gain" unveils their materialistic motives (cf. v.7), the desire to enrich themselves at the expense of the spiritual welfare of their victims.

12 These Cretan false teachers were all the more dangerous because of the known nature of the people on whom they preyed. As evidence, Paul quotes a line from Epimenides (a 6th-5th century B.C. Cretan poet and religious reformer). This man had intimate knowledge of his own people and was esteemed by them as a "prophet." Paul was willing to accept this evaluation in order to underline the authority of his own judgment. The quotation establishes the picture without exposing Paul to the charge of being anti-Cretan. It put the Cretans on the horns of a dilemma. They must either admit the truthfulness of his verdict concerning them or deny the charge and brand their own prophet a liar.

The triple charge that "Cretans are always liars, evil brutes, lazy gluttons" is supported by other writers. So notorious was their reputation for falsehood that the Greek word kretizo ("to Crete-ize") meant "to lie." "Evil brutes" stigmatizes them as having sunk to the level of beasts, unrestrained in their brutality. "Lazy gluttons" underlines their greed as idle sensualists who desired to be filled without exerting personal effort to earn an honest living.

13a Paul's own observations confirm the adverse judgment. Probably he had some unpleasant experiences on the island that verified the verdict.

2. The response to the situation (1:13b–14)

13b "Therefore" introduces the action demanded by this situation. Titus must continue to "rebuke them sharply," dealing pungently and incisively with the danger, like a surgeon cutting away cancerous tissue. "Rebuke" (GK 1794) may be rendered "convict," effectively showing the error of the teaching that is being opposed. "Them" refers directly to the false teachers, who must obviously be dealt with whenever they seek to gain a hearing in the church. But it seems clear that the action demanded also includes those church members who were known to be receptive to the claims of the false teachers.

The positive result aimed at is "that they will be sound [lit., healthy; GK 5617] in the faith," i.e., in the truth embodied in the Gospel they have personally accepted. Their personal spiritual health will be impaired if they feed on unhealthy doctrine.

14 As a result of this positive aim, the Cretan Christians will be led to a position where they "pay no attention to Jewish myths" (cf. 1Ti 1:4). These myths were seemingly speculative and fanciful inventions drawn from the OT records, such as are found in the apocryphal and pseudepigraphical writings of Judaism. The rejected teaching is further characterized as "the commands of those who reject the truth." These commands were evidently Jewish-Gnostic ritual observances that the false teachers sought to make binding on Christians (cf. 1Ti 4:3–6). They are to be spurned because they are merely unauthorized human commands of people who have rejected the truth. There is a close connection between false doctrine and evil character.

3. The condemnation of the false teachers (1:15–16)

15 The test of character condemns these false teachers. This is stated in the form of a double maxim. "To the pure, all things are pure" embodies a principle enunciated by Jesus himself in dealing with Jewish food laws (Mt 15:10–11; Mk 7:14–19; Lk 11:37–41) and forcefully impressed on Peter in his vision at Joppa (Ac 10:9–15, 28). These Cretan teachers apparently were engrossed in perpetuating ceremonial distinctions between the pure and the impure. They tended to lay emphasis on outward appearance and judged others on the basis of their own external criteria. Paul teaches that true purity lies not in adherence to nonmoral external rites and regulations but in the inner purity of the regenerated heart. Material things receive their moral character from the inner attitude of the user. This maxim does not, however, invalidate the revelation that certain things are morally wrong.

The converse of the principle carries the attack into enemy territory. Their attribution of impurity to nonmoral things reveals both their own inner state of corruption or defilement and their unbelief. A moral perversion has taken place in their whole being. Their "minds" have become polluted, and their conscience has lost its ability to make correct moral judgments, leaving them unable to make true distinctions between good and evil.

16 The false teachers also stand condemned by the test of conduct. They publicly confess that they are fully informed about God and stand in intimate relations with him (because of either their Jewish religious privilege or their Gnostic claim to an esoteric knowledge of God). But their vaunted claim is belied by their evil conduct. Moral quality of life is the determinative test of religious profession (1Jn 2:4) and by it true character is exposed. Three terms describe the corrupt and unbelieving. They are (1) "detestable" (GK 1008) or loathsome, causing horror and disgust because of their hypocrisy; (2) "disobedient" (GK 579), insubordinate to God's truth because of their willful adherence to their man-made rules and regulations; (3) "unfit for doing anything good," disqualified by their impurity from performing any morally good deed. They are like coins found, upon testing, to be spurious, utterly to be rejected as worthless.

III. Concerning the Natural Groups in the Congregations (2:1–15)

Chapter 2, concerned with the pastoral care of the Cretan Christians, is the second main division. Verses 1–10 give ethical instructions for the different groups in the congregations; vv.11–14 unfold the grace of God as the motivating power for Christian living; and v.15 summarizes the duty of Titus on Crete.

A. The Instructions for the Different Groups (2:1–10)

Paul here stresses the importance of building up the inner life of believers as the best antidote against error. Sound doctrine must lead to ethical conduct in the lives of all the groups in the congregations. Emphasis falls on the family groups, where the false teachers had apparently done their greatest damage (1:11).

1. The instructional duty of Titus (2:1)

1 The opening "you" contrasts Titus with the false teachers. He must show the difference by continuing to communicate orally "what is in accord with sound doctrine," i.e., teaching that promotes spiritual health and requires conduct consistent with the teaching professed. Correct doctrine must result in good behavior.

2. The instruction to different age groups (2:2–6)

2 The term "older men" (GK 4566) denotes age, not office. The senior male members are named first as natural leaders. The value of their example will depend on their moral character. Four qualifications are insisted on; they must be (1) "temperate" (GK 3767), basically meaning "abstaining from wine," but having a wider meaning, such as "clear-headed"; (2) "worthy of respect" (GK 4948), revealing a personal dignity and seriousness of purpose that invite honor and respect; (3) "self-controlled" (GK 5409), possessing self-mastery in thought and judgment (cf. 1:8); and (4) "sound in faith, in love and in endurance," revealing a Christian healthiness of heart and mind. In v.1 "sound" (GK 5617) is applied to doctrine, here to character. "Faith" may be objective, as the doctrinal content of the faith professed, but the following two items suggest that it is subjective, their personal faith in the Lord. They must be mature in their exercise of genuine "love," not bitter and vindictive, and they must display active "endurance" (GK 5705), that steadfast persistence that bravely bears the trials and afflictions of life.

3 "Likewise" indicates that the same kind of deportment is expected of the "older women," although the demands on them are related to their own station in life. The basic demand is that they "be reverent in the way they live." Their conduct must reveal that they regard life as sacred in all of its aspects.

Their reverential behavior requires that they "not be slanderers or addicted to much wine." As mature Christians, they must not be given to gossip, repeating vicious and unfounded charges against others, and must not overindulge in wine. The union of the two negatives suggests the close connection between a loose tongue and intoxicating drink.

Positively, the older women must "teach what is good." By personal word and example, they must teach what is morally good, noble, and attractive. The reference is not to public instruction, but to their teaching function in the home.

4 The training of the younger women is the duty, not of Titus, but the older women, qualified to do so by position and character. "Train" (GK 5405) means to school in the lessons of sobriety and self-control (cf. vv.2, 5). "Younger" suggests a reference to the newly married. Paul then lists seven characteristics that must be commended to such women (vv.4–5a). "To love their husbands and children" forms a pair of instructions. It means "devoted to husbands and devoted to children." Such domestic affection stands at the very heart of any Christian home.

5 "To be self-controlled [GK 5409] and pure [GK 54]" forms another pair. The former is a standing duty for all Christians (cf. 1:8; 2:2, 6); the latter denotes not only chastity in their sex life but also purity of heart and mind in all their conduct.

"To be busy at home, to be kind" designates a third pair. The first describes the many domestic activities of the housewife that she must willingly accept as part of her position as queen of the home. The devoted wife and mother finds her absorbing interest in the innumerable duties of the home (cf. Paul's condemnation of idleness in 1Ti 5:13–14). These demand unsparing self-giving and may subject her to the temptation to be irritable and harsh in her demands on members of her household. She must therefore cultivate the virtue of being "kind" (GK 19), i.e., benevolent, heartily doing what is good and beneficial to others.

The seventh item for a younger married woman stresses her acceptance of the established relationship between husband and wife as her Christian duty. "To be subject to" (GK 5718) suggests the voluntary acceptance of the headship of the husband (cf. Eph 5:22–24). In declaring the spiritual equality of the woman before God (Gal 3:28), Christianity immeasurably elevated her status but did not thereby abolish her functional position as the complement and support of her husband as the head of the home.

The concluding purpose clause apparently relates to all seven items. It is the first expression of Paul's strong sense of a religious purpose behind these ethical demands. If Christian wives ignore these demands and flout the role their culture demanded of good wives, the Gospel will be maligned, criticized, and discredited by non-Christians. Christianity will be judged especially by the impact that it has on the women. It therefore is the duty of the women to protect God's revelation from profanation by living discreet and wholesome lives. No lifestyle is justified that hinders the message of God's salvation in Christ.

6 The requirement for the young men is brief but comprehensive: self-control. As a young man, Titus must fittingly convey his instructions for the young women indirectly, but his age was an advantage in dealing directly with the young men. "Encourage" (GK 4151) is stronger than "teach" in v.1; it may be rendered "urge" or "admonish." Since young men are inclined to be somewhat impetuous and unrestrained in conduct, their basic need is to be "self-controlled" (GK 5404), cultivating balance and self-restraint in daily practice. It was a quality of which Paul found it necessary to remind the Cretan believers (1:8; 2:2, 4–5).

3. The personal example of Titus (2:7–8)

7 In concluding instructions to the different age groups, Paul reminds Titus that his own conduct must confirm his teaching. There is no word for "them" in the Greek, so that his example is not to be restricted to the young men. "In everything" underlines the comprehensiveness of the duty. It is expanded in what follows. "Doing what is good" places the initial stress on his conduct, reflecting his noble deeds. Personal example must precede effective teaching, but his "teaching" in its manner and content must be of the highest quality and must be characterized by "integrity" (GK 917) and "seriousness" (GK 4949).

The former stresses his purity of motive, revealing that he himself is uninfected by the evil conduct and erroneous views of the false teachers; the latter points to his outward dignity, reflecting the high moral tone and serious manner appropriate to his sacred task.

8 Titus must also demonstrate "soundness of speech that cannot be condemned." The content of his teaching and ordinary conversation must have two characteristics. (1) It must have "soundness" (GK 5617), conforming to healthful doctrine (cf. 1:9, 13; 2:1–2). (2) Such soundness will ensure that no critic will be able to point out anything in it justly open to censure or rebuke. Paul hints at the picture of a courtroom where the judge can find no basis for the accusation of the plaintiff.

Paul concludes his personal remarks to Titus with another purpose clause. The expression "those who oppose you" is apparently left intentionally vague to leave room for all types of critics. When the objections are examined, the anticipated result is that the critic "may be ashamed," i.e., made to look foolish because he is shown to have no case. An accusation of something morally "bad" or worthless "about us" (including Paul and Christians generally) will be found to be groundless.

4. The instructions to the slaves (2:9–10)

Paul's ethical instructions are now addressed to a distinct social group that overlaps groups divided by age and sex. Slaves formed a significant element in the apostolic churches and the welfare of the faith demanded that they too accept their spiritual responsibility as believers. Paul here makes no distinction between slaves who had Christian masters and those who did not (see comments on 1Ti 6:1–2).

9 Since the Greek has no opening command in v.9, we must substitute either "teach" from v.1 or, more likely, "encourage" from v. 6. The fundamental duty of slaves is voluntarily to accept subjection to their masters as a matter of principle to everything. "Masters" (GK 1305) denotes that as owners they had complete authority over their slaves. This command stresses the comprehensiveness of this duty, though a Christian slave could not submit when a pagan master demanded things contrary to Christian conscience.

In their voluntary subjection, slaves must "try to please" their masters. Instead of having a sullen disposition, they should aim to be well-pleasing. The word "please" (GK 2298) elsewhere refers to our relationship with God; it is the distinctive contribution of Christianity that slaves should govern their relations to their masters by this high principle.

Paul continues with three further phrases, two negative and one positive, that describe the slave-master relationship. The first is "not to talk back to them," i.e., not to dispute their commands and by deliberate resistance seek to thwart their will.

10 The second negative demand is "not to steal from them"—not underhandedly to divert to themselves part of anything their masters had not intended for them. Petty theft was common among slaves in Roman households. Employment in various trades and occupations offered slaves ample opportunity to resort to the various tricks of the trade for their own advantage.

Their positive duty is "to show that they can be fully trusted," demonstrating "good faith" in their whole relationship to their masters. They must not only be Christians but actively show this by proving themselves dependable in everything "good" or beneficial to their masters.

Such ethical conduct Paul again undergirds with a profound spiritual motive, "so that in every way they will make the teaching about God our Savior attractive." For a Christian there can be no higher motive. Slaves' acceptance of the teaching about "God our Savior" must find expression in their transformed conduct in every aspect of their lives. The very difficulty of their position would make such conduct a powerful recommendation of the Gospel, proving to the master the power of the Gospel.

B. The Foundation for Godly Living (2:11–14)

"For" begins Paul's masterly summary of Christian doctrine as the proper foundation for the ethical demands just made on the various groups and as an explanation for "God our Savior" in v.10. Christian conduct must be grounded in and motivated by Christian truth. The vitality of doctrinal profession must be demonstrated by transformed Christian conduct.

1. The manifestation of God's grace (2:11)

11 God's program of redemption is rooted in his "grace" (GK 5921), his free favor and spontaneous action toward needy sinners to deliver and transform them. This grace has been manifested as a historical reality in Christ's birth, life and ministry, atoning death, and resurrection. "Appeared" (GK 2210) conveys the image of grace suddenly breaking in on our moral darkness, like the rising sun (this verb is used of the sun in Ac 27:20).

The effect of the manifestation was redemptive, not destructive. The adjective rendered "that brings salvation" (GK 5403) asserts its saving efficacy; this salvation is available to all people, though its personal application is dependent on one's response of faith. Its universal scope justifies the application of its ethical demands to all classes of its professed recipients.

2. The training by God's grace (2:12)

12 Grace also goes to work in the lives of the saved. Grounded in God's nature, it makes ethical demands of Christians consistent with his nature. It instructs the believer in the things "in accord with sound doctrine" (2:1). The verb "teaches" (GK 4084) comprehends the entire training process—teaching, encouragement, correction, and discipline.

The negative pedagogical purpose of grace is to train us to renounce our past by saying "'No' to ungodliness and worldly passions." "Ungodliness" (GK 813) denotes the impiety and irreverence that characterizes the unsaved life; "worldly passions" are those cravings characteristic of the world in its estrangement from God. Such renunciation, standing at the beginning of a life of Christian victory, must be maintained in daily self-denial.

This negative work clears the field for its positive aim for believers: "to live self-controlled, upright and godly lives." Our entire course of life should be consistently characterized by the three stated qualities. They look in three directions, though sharp distinctions need not be pressed: (1) inward ("self-controlled"; GK 5407), already stipulated for different groups (1:8; 2:2,5) and now demanded of every believer; (2) outward ("upright"; GK 1469), faithfully fulfilling all the demands of truth and justice in our relations with others; (3) upward ("godly"; GK 2357), fully devoted to God in reverence and loving obedience.

Such a life is a possibility and a duty "in this present age" (Gal 1:4), which holds dangers for the believer (Ro 12:2; 2Ti 4:10) and stands in contrast to the anticipated future.

3. The expectation of Christ's return (2:13)

13 Those being trained by God's grace, having renounced their sinful past and living disciplined lives in the present, now "wait for" (GK 4657; cf. 1Th 1:9–10) the future.They anticipate "the blessed hope," the personal return of Christ who will consummate our bliss in eternal glory.

The Greek connects "blessed hope" and "glorious appearing" under one article, suggesting that the reference is to one event viewed from two aspects. For believers, it is indeed the blessed hope and the longed-for consummation of that hope. For Christ himself, this anticipated return will vindicate his character as the Lord of glory. "Glorious appearing" points to his present glorification in heaven. Now unrecognized and disregarded by the world, his glory at his return will be manifested in all its splendor.

Grammatically, the glory to be revealed relates either to Christ alone or to both the Father and Christ, but the former is to be preferred. (1) This is the most natural view, since both nouns are connected by one article as referring to one person. (2) The combination "god and savior" was familiar to the Hellenistic religions. (3) The added clause in v.14 refers to Christ alone, and it is most natural to take the entire preceding expression as its antecedent. (4) In the Pastorals the coming appearance is referred to Christ alone. (5) The adjective "great" of God is rather pointless but highly significant if applied to Christ. (6) This view is in full harmony with other passages such as Jn 20:28; Ro 9:5; Heb 1:8; and 2Pe 1:1. This view takes the statement as an explicit assertion of the deity of Christ.

4. The purpose of Christ's redemption (2:14)

14 From the future, Paul reverts to the historical work of Christ as Savior as the foundation for present sanctification. "Who gave himself for us" summarizes that work as voluntary, exhaustive, and substitutionary. His giving of himself was the grandest of all gifts. Because of our sinfulness, his atoning work had a dual aspect.

Its negative aspect was "to redeem us from all wickedness" (or "lawlessness"; GK 490), our assertion of self-will in defiance of God's standard that is the essence of sin (1Jn 3:4). This expression stresses not our guilt as rebels but rather our deliverance from bondage to lawlessness through Christ's ransom. "From" indicates effective removal from that sphere and our deliverance from "all" aspects of its domination.

This negative work is the necessary prelude to the positive work of sanctification, "to purify for himself a people that are his very own." Behind "purify" (GK 2751) is the moral defilement that the rebellion of humankind has produced. Sin makes us not only guilty but also unclean before a holy God. The blood-wrought cleansing (1Jn 1:7) enables us to be restored to fellowship with God as "a people that are his very own." Since we have been redeemed by his blood (1Pe 1:18–21), Christ wants us voluntarily to yield ourselves wholly to him. Such a surrender is our only reasonable response to divine mercy (Ro 12:1–2). "Eager to do what is good" delineates what this relationship involves. "Eager" (GK 2421) means one who is "a zealot, an enthusiast"; for those who have been redeemed from the doom of sin and death and brought into a unique relationship with God, the true voluntary response is to be enthusiastic "to do what is good." He who eagerly awaits the return of the Savior will be eager also to further his cause by good works until he comes.

C. The Restatement of the Duty of Titus (2:15)

15 "Teach" looks back to 2:1, where the same word is used. As his central duty, Titus must continually present practical instructions to the various groups in their proper doctrinal setting. As part of his teaching he must "encourage" (GK 4151) or exhort the hearers to appropriate and practice the instruction, and "rebuke" (GK 1794) or convict those who are slack or fail to respond. He must perform these duties "with all authority," for the message is apostolic and authentic and its authority must be stressed. The Gospel must not be presented as an optional opinion to be accepted or rejected as its hearers may please. The minister's authority rests in the nature of his message; he is not raised above the truth but the truth above him.

As the apostolic representative in Crete, Titus must "not let anyone despise" him or belittle his message and authority. He must not permit his message and work to be disdainfully rejected. Since this letter would be read in the churches, the remark was intended as much for the Cretans as for Titus himself.

IV. Concerning Believers Among People Generally (3:1–11)

Having dealt with church leaders (ch. 1) and the conduct of believers as members of the Christian community (ch. 2), in this final section Paul insists that believers also have duties to the government and to the non-Christian world.

A. Their Obligations As Citizens (3:1–2)

1 Christians have a duty to government. "The people" refers to the members of the churches, not to all Cretans in general. "Remind" indicates that the duties now insisted on are not new to them; Titus must repeatedly press these duties upon their consciences. Early Christian preaching was never limited to the way of salvation but included instructions concerning the practical implications of that salvation for daily living. Paul wants believers to make a favorable impression on the non-Christian world.

The duty of believers is "to be subject to rulers and authorities." "To be subject" (GK 5718) implies voluntary acceptance of this position of submission. "Rulers and authorities" signifies not the individual rulers but the various forms of human government (cf. also Ro 13:1–7; 1Pe 2:13–17); the known turbulence of the Cretans made such an instruction particularly appropriate here.

"To be obedient" (GK 4272) states the result and visible demonstration of their attitude of submission. The context implies obedience to the particular demands of government, though the practice of obedience is not to be limited to these areas. It is assumed that the obedience demanded does not contradict explicit Christian duties.

As good citizens, believers must also "be ready to do whatever is good"—be prepared and willing to participate in activities that promote the welfare of the community. They must not stand coldly aloof from praiseworthy enterprises of government but show good public spirit, thus proving that Christianity is a constructive force in society.

2 Believers also have obligations to pagan neighbors. Negatively, they must "slander no one," i.e., abstain from hurling curses and vicious epithets at those offending or injuring them. The demand requires inner grace but is appropriate for followers of Christ, who did not revile when he was reviled (1Pe 2:23). Furthermore, they must be "peaceable" (lit., "nonfighting"; GK 285), refusing to engage in quarrels and conflicts. The Christian must not adopt the arts of the agitator.

Positively, Christians must be "considerate" (GK 2117) or gentle, not stubbornly insisting on their own rights but acting in courtesy and forbearance. Another positive duty is continually "to show true [lit., all] humility," an attitude of mind that is the opposite of self-assertiveness and harshness. Humility is not to be exhibited only in dealing with fellow believers but must be shown "toward all men," including those who are hostile and morally perverse. It is a difficult test of Christian character but one that effectively proves the genuineness of Christian profession.

B. The Motives for Such Godly Conduct (3:3–8)

The conduct required in vv.1–2 is undergirded by weighty reasons. Paul's masterly summary of evangelical teaching in these verses reminds his readers that such conduct is necessary and possible in view of God's transforming work in their own lives. He advances three supporting motives: their own pre-Christian past (v.3), the saving work of God in believers (vv.4–8a), and the necessary connection between Christian truth and conduct (v.8b).

1. The motive from our own past (3:3)

3 The remembrance of our own past should be a powerful motive for gentleness and consideration toward the unsaved. "We were," standing emphatically at the opening of the sentence, implies that what was once true of us is still true of the unsaved neighbor. The added "too" stresses that the condition described in retrospect applied to Paul and Titus as well as to the Cretan Christians; it is, in fact, true of all believers everywhere. It is salutary to remember our own past moral condition when dealing with the unsaved in their degradation.

The picture of our past is vividly and concisely drawn. We were "foolish" (GK 485)—without spiritual understanding and lacking discernment of spiritual realities because of the darkening effect of sin on the intellect (Eph 4:18). As outward evidence of our alienated condition, we were "disobedient"—willfully disregarding authority, refusing obedience to God's law, and fretting under human authority. "Deceived" pictures active straying from the true course by following false guides. By allowing our conduct to be dictated by a wide variety of personal "passions and pleasures," we inevitably became enslaved to them. Never finding true personal satisfaction in their pursuit, we lived our lives in the grip of the antisocial forces of "malice and envy," harboring an attitude of ill-will toward others and enviously begrudging others their good fortune. "Being hated" denotes being odious, repulsive, and disgusting to others. "Hating one another" marks the climax in the active operation of mutual antagonisms that hasten the dissolution of human society.

2. The motive from our present salvation (3:4–7)

"But" introduces the familiar Pauline contrast between what we once were and now are (cf. Ro 6:17–23; 1Co 6:9–11; Eph 2:2–13; 5:7–12; Col 1:21–22; 3:7–10). God's marvelous salvation, summarized here, must motivate our dealings with the unsaved.

a. The manifestation of salvation (3:4)

4 Our salvation roots in a definite historical event, "when the kindness and love of God our Savior appeared." "Appeared" (cf. 2:11) looks back to the salvation manifested in the incarnate Christ. The salvation embodied in him manifested two aspects of the nature of "God our Savior": (1) his "kindness" (GK 5983) that prompted him to bestow forgiveness and blessings; (2) his "love" (GK 5792) or affection for us that he displayed in spite of our sin and degradation. These two concepts are closely connected and form one whole. Through his action in Christ, God is now revealed as "our Savior." "Our" is strongly confessional and associates Paul with all those who have appropriated this Savior as their own (cf. Gal 2:20).

b. The basis of salvation (3:5a)

5a "He saved us" simply records the historic fact of his saving work in all who have accepted salvation in Christ. We now possess his salvation, although it is still incomplete, awaiting its consummation at Christ's return.

The basis of this experienced salvation is never due to personal merit but to God's sovereign grace. The negative clause repeats Paul's well-known denial of salvation by works (Ro 4:4–5; Gal 2:16–17; Eph 2:8–9). Our salvation did not arise out of works that we ourselves had performed in righteousness, for as sinners, we were not able to perform any righteous deeds. Positively, God saved us "because of his mercy" (GK 1799). In our wretchedness he graciously withheld deserved punishment and freely saved us.

c. The means of salvation (3:5b–6)

5b–6 God's salvation was mediated to us "through the washing of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit." "Washing" (GK 3373) denotes an act that cleanses us from the defilement of sin. This washing is the means of our "rebirth" (GK 4098), the spiritual regeneration of the individual believer. Most commentators take the washing as a reference to water baptism. But if water baptism is the means that produces the spiritual rebirth, we then have the questionable teaching of a material agency as the indispensable means for producing a spiritual result (but cf. Mt 15:1–20; Ro 2:25–29; Gal 5:6). Thus the washing is properly a divine inner act, although the experience is symbolically pictured in Christian baptism. In the NT the inner experience is viewed as openly confessed before people in baptism.

The expression 'through the washing of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit" is open to two interpretations grammatically. (1) Both "rebirth" and "renewal" may be regarded as dependent on "washing" to form one concept. Then the washing of rebirth is further described as a renewal wrought by the Spirit. (2) The other view holds that the preposition "through" must be repeated with "renewal." This view sees two separate aspects of salvation, in which case the washing is viewed as producing an instantaneous change that ended the old life and began the new, while the work of renewal by the Spirit, beginning with the impartation of the new life, is a lifelong activity in the experience of the believer. In Ro 12:2 this renewal is viewed as a continuing process; in Eph 5:26–27 the act of cleansing of the church is followed by the work of sanctification until no spot or wrinkle remains. This process of renewal in the believer is the work of the Holy Spirit. He alone can produce a new nature that finds active expression in an entirely new manner of life.

"Whom he poured out on us generously" stresses that God has made ample provision for the development of this renewed life. "Poured out" (GK 1772) had its primary fulfillment at Pentecost, but "on us" marks the pouring out as individually experienced at conversion (Ro 5:5). The Spirit's work in each believer as a member of the body of Christ is a continuation of the Pentecostal outpouring. Every faulty or inadequate experience of renewal is always due to some human impediment, never to God's inadequate provision. "Through Jesus Christ our Savior" states the channel through which the Spirit's renewing presence was bestowed—a bestowal based on the finished work of Christ as Savior (Jn 7:38–39; 15:26; Ac 2:33). The "our" is again confessional. Our acceptance of Christ as Savior is the human condition for the bestowal of the Spirit. Note the Trinity in vv.5b–6: "the Holy Spirit," "he" (the Father), and "Jesus Christ." Each member of the divine Trinity has his own special function in the work of human redemption.

d. Its results (3:7)

7 "So that" here denotes not only purpose but also result; the aim of salvation has been accomplished. "Having been justified by his grace" records the result of salvation in our past. Sin had brought guilt and condemnation, but when we received Christ as our Savior, we were "justified" ("declared righteous"; GK 1467) and given a standing of acceptance before him. Justification is always the act of the Father, motivated by his grace, his free unmerited favor bestowed on the basis of Christ's perfect work. This condensed comment assumes knowledge of Paul's doctrine of justification.

The second stated result comprehends our present standing in relation to the future. "Might become heirs" denotes not just a future prospect but a present reality. As members of God's family, we now are heirs, but entrance upon our inheritance belongs to the future. Our standing as heirs is in full harmony with "the hope of eternal life" (cf. 1:2). Our present experience of salvation can give us only a tantalizing foretaste of the nature of our future inheritance.

3. The necessary connection between doctrine and conduct (3:8)

8a "This is a trustworthy saying" clearly looks back to the doctrinal statement in vv.4–7 as a unified whole and stamps it as worthy of full approval. Confined to the Pastoral Letters (see comment on 1Ti 1:15), this is the sole occurrence of this formula in Titus. Scholars generally accept the view that the writer is citing a hymn or confessional statement, but there is no agreement about the extent or exact contents of the assumed quotation. Whether it is a quotation or Paul's own composition, no nobler doctrinal statement is found in any Pauline letter.

8b It is Paul's definite intention that Titus, as his personal representative in Crete, continue insistently "to stress [GK 1331] these things" (i.e., the trustworthy truths contained in vv.4–7). Titus must stoutly and confidently affirm them. The orthodox preacher must proclaim his message with confidence and ringing certainty.

Such insistent preaching must aim at a definite result in the lives of believers. "Those who have trusted in God" pictures not only the believers' initial acceptance of these truths but also their present personal faith relationship to God. Because of this present relationship, they are obligated to "be careful to devote themselves to doing what is good." Again Paul emphasizes that the Gospel message of free forgiveness for sinners on the sole basis of faith must find expression in a life characterized by the performance of excellent deeds. The practice of good works is the logical outcome of a true apprehension of the grace of God.

Paul concludes with a summary evaluation of the instructions just given. "These things" could refer to his final demand that believers combine faith and practice, but more probably the reference is to the true teachings that Titus must insist on in his work in Crete. By their very nature they are "excellent" (GK 2819), i.e., good, attractive, and praiseworthy. They are also "profitable [GK 6068] for everyone," meaning that they have a beneficial impact on humankind. The beneficial effects of Christian ethical standards are not limited to believers only. A vital Christianity unites the beautiful and the profitable.

C. The Reaction to Spiritual Error (3:9–11)

9 "But" introduces the necessary reaction of Titus to matters contrary to the teaching insisted on in v.8. They are described as "foolish controversies and genealogies and arguments and quarrels about the law." The picture looks back to 1:10–16; "about the law" marks the Jewish coloring. The same sort of problems also existed at Ephesus (cf. 1Ti 1:3–7). They comprise various "foolish" or senseless inquiries, involving speculations about the OT genealogies, and resulted in sharp dissensions and open quarrels. All such matters Titus must "avoid" (GK 4325), i.e., deliberately shun and stand aloof from, because they produce no spiritual benefits and lead to no constructive results.

10 Paul now passes from these reprehensible opinions to their perverted advocates. The adjective "divisive" (GK 148) essentially characterizes what is a self-chosen opinion or viewpoint; because of their insistence on their opinions, devoid of a true scriptural basis, the dissidents stir up divisions. Those who persist in these opinions form heretical parties.

Any such person Titus must "warn" (GK 3804) or admonish by faithfully and lovingly pointing out the error. If a second effort to deal with him proves ineffective, let Titus "have nothing to do with him." Further efforts would not be a good stewardship of his time and energies and would give the offender an undeserved sense of importance.

11 Stubborn refusal of admonition will assure Titus that the person is "warped" (GK 1750), i.e., in a state of twisted perversion, wholly out of touch with truth. The passive voice seems to point to the satanic agency behind his condition. This person is also sinful, deliberately missing the divine standard by a persistent refusal to receive correction. It reveals an inner moral condition of being "self-condemned." That individual knows that in his deliberate refusal to abandon self-chosen views, he is wrong and stands condemned by his own better judgment.

V. Conclusion (3:12–15)

A. The Concluding Instructions (3:12–14)

