31–39 The third and last of the three representatives to meet David at the Jordan is Barzillai the Gileadite. In some respects the presence of Barzillai at the Jordan is more significant than that of either Shimei or Mephibosheth. It is not only that he symbolizes the vast Transjordanian regions, the control of which was crucial to any Israelite king, but also that with respect to David he has the prestige (he is eighty years old; cf. Ps 90:10) and sufficient means to send him back to Jerusalem. He it was, after all, who along with others "had provided for the king" during the royal exile in Mahanaim (see 17:27–29). David makes it clear, however, that he wants to repay Barzillai's kindness by inducing his friend to take up residence with him in Jerusalem so that the king can "provide" (GK 3920) for him as he had earlier "provided" for the king.

But Barzillai protests that the number of years left in his life is limited at best and that therefore it would make no sense for him to move to Jerusalem. Like Hushai (15:13–37), Barzillai does not want to be a burden to David, perhaps in the sense that he would require constant care and attention. He wants only to accompany the king across the Jordan for a short distance; he will then return to Rogelim, where he will die and be interred in the family burial site. If the king agrees, Kimham (probably one of Barzillai's sons) will be Barzillai's surrogate at the royal court. David agrees to this proposition, adding that he is prepared to do for Barzillai anything his friend desires.

Formalities concluded, the crossing of the Jordan by the king and his party takes place opposite Gilgal. Before Barzillai returns to his home, David kisses him and gives him his "blessing" (GK 1385).

40–43 David's escort had consisted of all the troops of Judah and half those of Israel. The acrimony between the two groups increases when the men of Israel complain to the king that the men of Judah might as well have kidnapped him and his men to keep as many as possible of them from sharing the privilege of accompanying the king to Jerusalem.

The men of Judah have a ready answer, of course. David is from their tribe; thus there is no need for the men of Israel to be angry over what seems to the men of Judah to be perfectly natural. Nor have the latter taken advantage of their relationship to the king. Indeed, they strongly deny that they have taken any of the king's provisions.

But the men of Israel reject all such explanations. Judah is only one tribe, while Israel has ten "shares" in the king—i.e., ten tribes in the overall kingdom. They conclude that it logically follows that they have a greater claim on David than Judah has. They want to know why the men of Judah treat them with such contempt, and they conclude their part of the debate by reminding the Judahites that they were the first to speak of returning David to his rightful place in Jerusalem (v.20).

The words of the men of Israel, however, cause the men of Judah to respond more "harshly" still, which not only echoes the earlier fears of David as he anticipated King Saul's wrath (cf. 1Sa 20:10) but also foreshadows the foolish attitude of Rehoboam as he—king of Judah and potentially king of all Israel—irrevocably alienates the northern tribes (cf. 1Ki 12:13).

19. Sheba's rebellion (20:1–22)

1–2 Sheba is introduced as a "troublemaker." Reference to him as a Benjamite marks him as a northerner and perhaps a Saulide partisan as well (cf. 1Sa 9:1). The way in which his story is introduced suggests that Sheba picks up the baton dropped by Absalom.

Sounding a ram's-horn trumpet, Sheba delivers a brief but powerful statement that would become a rallying cry for future secessionists (cf. 1Ki 12:16). He declares that he and his compatriots have "no share" in David's realm and no "part" in "Jesse's son." Having lost patience with David, he orders "every man to his tent." Despite the fact that David had been divinely anointed king over Israel, Sheba apparently suspects that David's loyalties basically lie in the south and therefore urges the representatives of the northern tribes to recommend secession. Although the men of Judah remained with their king, escorting him all the way to Jerusalem, the "men of Israel"—following Sheba's lead—deserted David. The time to secede is not yet ripe, however.

3–7 Before his flight from Jerusalem in the wake of Absalom's conspiracy, David had left ten concubines to take care of the palace. Upon his return he takes the concubines and puts them in a house under guard, virtually incarcerating them. He no longer sleeps with them, as Absalom had done (see 16:21–22). They are forced to remain as widows for the rest of their lives.

David's second step is to order Amasa, his new army commander, to summon the men of Judah (for military action) to come to Jerusalem within three days; Amasa is to be there personally as well. Amasa, however, takes longer than the time allotted. Apparently losing patience with him (and perhaps also fearing that he may have defected), David gives a command to Abishai, another of his generals. After describing the danger if Sheba is left to do as he wishes, David insists that Abishai muster David's men and pursue Sheba before he goes into a fortified city and so escapes from him.

That David ignores Joab in his planning is noteworthy (see 19:13). "Joab's men" now march out "under the command of Abishai," who is also over the Kerethites and Pelethites (David's mercenary troops) and all the "mighty warriors" (perhaps also mercenaries). The immediate task of Abishai's substantial army is to pursue Sheba.

8–13 The story of Amasa's death is eerily reminiscent of several other violent episodes recorded in chs. 2–4. Amasa belatedly joins Abishai's army at Gibeon. Joab is there, and he wears a "military tunic," which included a type of belt often used to hold a sheathed dagger. Not concealed, the dagger was fastened on over the tunic and was therefore in plain view.

Joab steps forward and contrives to allow his dagger to fall out of its sheath. With a natural movement in such circumstances, he picks it up with his left hand and continues to greet Amasa, referring to him as his brother. Joab then takes Amasa "by the beard" with his right hand, ostensibly to "kiss" him, but in reality to kill him. Amasa is not on his guard against the "accidentally" dropped dagger. Before he realizes what is happening, Joab has "plunged" the dagger into his "belly" (see 2:23; 3:27; 4:6), and Amasa dies. Joab and Abishai then continue the pursuit of Sheba.

One of Joab's men attempts to rally his comrades to the chase by linking loyalty to the discredited Joab with loyalty to David. The corpse of Amasa lies wallowing in its blood in the middle of the road, and it is an unacceptable distraction that slows their progress. Seeing this, the man drags the body into a field and covers it with a garment. All the men finally join Joab in pursuit of Sheba.

14–22 The account of Sheba's defeat, which parallels the attempt of David to foil him (vv.3–7), is divided into two unequal sections. The first episode (vv.14–15) describes the violent siege of Abel Beth Maacah by the ruthless Joab. The second episode (vv.16–22a) relates the story of the subtler and more nuanced approach of the wise woman of Abel and illustrates the truism that less is more.

Trying to drum up support for his secessionist cause, Sheba stays one step ahead of his pursuers as he passes throughout Israel, eventually arriving at Abel Beth Maacah. Since the city was at the northernmost end of the land, Sheba had to travel through all Israel to reach it. Apparently, however, he was able to enlist only the "Berites." Compared to those who were ready to follow Joab (v.11), the number of men following Sheba is pitiable indeed.

Lacking neither confidence nor desire when it comes to besieging cities (cf. 11:1), Joab leads his troops against Sheba in Abel Beth Maacah. He builds a "siege ramp" at Abel, which serves as a means of access for attackers to pull down the city wall itself.

At this point a "wise woman" (unnamed) makes her appearance. Calling out from the city (perhaps from the top of the wall), she pleads for patience and asks to speak to Joab. Having confirmed his identity and gained his attention, she submissively refers to herself as his "servant." He in turn indicates he is listening.

The wise woman establishes the credentials of her city, her fellow citizens, and herself—not only as purveyors of wisdom, but also as peacemakers. The woman therefore rebukes Joab for besieging the city and accuses him of trying to destroy a city that is a "mother in Israel" (cf. Jdg 5:7). She wishes to know why Joab would want to swallow up "the LORD's inheritance," a phrase referring either to the land and people of Israel or to the share of Abel Beth Maacah in that land.

Impressed by the logic of the woman's arguments as well as by her sincerity, Joab relents. He categorically denies that it is his intention to destroy the city. He assures her that he is interested only in apprehending Sheba, whom he characterizes as being from the "hill country of Ephraim" and who has rebelled against King David.

Joab tells the wise woman that if the citizens of Abel will release Sheba to him, he and his men will pull back. Promising Joab that Sheba's head will be thrown to him from the wall, the woman relays her proposal to the people of the city. Impressed by her wise advice, they proceed to cut off Sheba's head and toss it out to Joab. Thus the rebellion of Sheba comes to an inglorious end—all because of the calming advice of the wise woman of Abel. Joab calls off the siege of Abel and returns to Jerusalem. With this, the so-called Court History of David (9:1–20:26) reaches its conclusion for all practical purposes.

20. David's officials (20:23–26)

23–26 Since the roster of officials does not begin with the statement that David "reigned over all Israel" (cf. 8:15–18; 1Ki 4:2–6), this may reflect David's weakened position in the wake of the rebellions of Absalom and Sheba. All rivals for power now eliminated, Joab is commander of "Israel's entire army," while Benaiah (not Abishai, v.7) retains formal control over the Kerethite and Pelethite mercenaries.

A new and ominous figure, Adoniram, makes his appearance in the royal cabinet; he is in charge of the institution that put prisoners of war into "forced labor" on public works projects (cf. Dt 20:10–11).

Jehoshaphat is still David's recorder (see 8:16), but Sheva has replaced Seraiah as secretary. Ira the Jairite is probably "priest" in the sense of "royal adviser" (see comment on 8:18).

II. Epilogue (21:1–24:25)

The basic theme of 1 and 2 Samuel is the beginnings of Israel's monarchy in the eleventh century B.C. (its prelude, advent, establishment, and consolidation). The last four chapters of 2 Samuel, which conclude the magisterial history of the judgeship of Samuel, the reign of Saul, and the reign of David, function as an epilogue to the two books of Samuel as a whole.

A. The Lord's Wrath Against Israel (21:1–14)

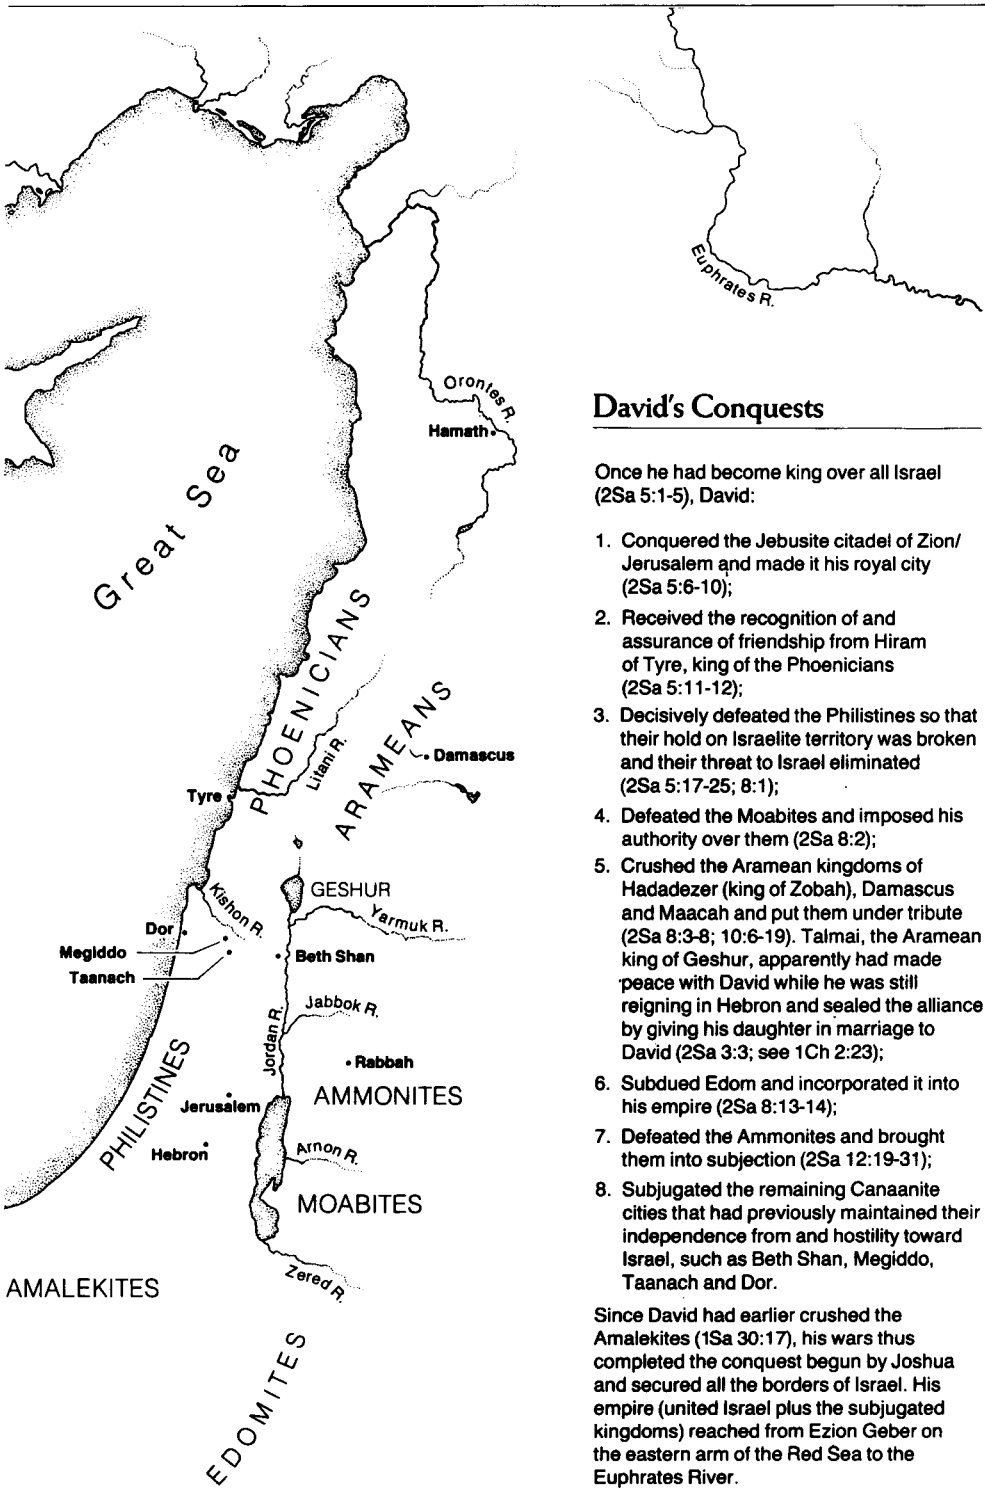
1–4 Lengthy famines were common in the ancient world, and it is therefore not surprising that at least one famine of unusual severity should occur at some point during the forty-year reign of David. Since it is often only "in their misery" that God's people pray to him (Hos 5:15), perhaps David has not "sought the face of the LORD" (v.1) until the catastrophe is fully upon Israel. David thus makes his way to the divine throne room, perhaps entering the tabernacle itself, in order to receive mercy and help for his people.

The Lord's answer is not long in coming: Saul was to blame because of his bloody rule (cf. Nu 35:33; cf. Dt 19:10). He had killed the Gibeonites and thus violated the age-old treaty made with them by Joshua (Jos 9:16), one of the provisions of which was that the Israelites would "let them live" (Jos 9:15, 20–21). David is determined to right this wrong of Saul, so he summons them to discuss the matter with them.

Wanting to rectify the situation, David asks the Gibeonites whether there is anything he can do to "make amends." The Gibeonites begin by indicating to David that they are not asking either for money from the clan of Saul or for the execution of Israelites in general. Only when David expands his initial question to "What do you want me to do for you?" do the Gibeonites become more specific in their demand.

5–6 The Gibeonites' desire for vengeance concerns one "man" and, since he is now dead, focuses on his descendants. They therefore request that seven of Saul's male descendants be turned over to them—seven suggesting full retribution (see 1Sa 2:5). Saul's "bloodstained house" would now be completely avenged (cf. Nu 35:33). They are to be killed and exposed "before the LORD," perhaps so that his blessing might be sought. Ironically, the act is to take place at "Gibeah of Saul," the hometown of the one who had "put the Gibeonites to death" (v.1) in the first place. David acquiesces to their request.

7–9 Because of the "oath before the LORD" sworn long ago between David and Saul's son Jonathan (see 1Sa 20:42), the king spares Jonathan's son Mephibosheth, whose future is presumably now secure. Although he is



David's Conquests

Once he had become king over all Israel (2Sa 5:1-5), David:

1. Conquered the Jebusite citadel of Zion/ Jerusalem and made it his royal city (2Sa 5:6-10);
2. Received the recognition of and assurance of friendship from Hiram of Tyre, king of the Phoenicians (2Sa 5:11-12);
3. Decisively defeated the Philistines so that their hold on Israelite territory was broken and their threat to Israel eliminated (2Sa 5:17-25; 8:1);
4. Defeated the Moabites and imposed his authority over them (2Sa 8:2);
5. Crushed the Aramean kingdoms of Hadadezer (king of Zobah), Damascus and Maacah and put them under tribute (2Sa 8:3-8; 10:6-19). Talmai, the Aramean king of Geshur, apparently had made peace with David while he was still reigning in Hebron and sealed the alliance by giving his daughter in marriage to David (2Sa 3:3; see 1Ch 2:23);
6. Subdued Edom and incorporated it into his empire (2Sa 8:13-14);
7. Defeated the Ammonites and brought them into subjection (2Sa 12:19-31);
8. Subjugated the remaining Canaanite cities that had previously maintained their independence from and hostility toward Israel, such as Beth Shan, Megiddo, Taanach and Dor.

Since David had earlier crushed the Amalekites (1Sa 30:17), his wars thus completed the conquest begun by Joshua and secured all the borders of Israel. His empire (united Israel plus the subjugated kingdoms) reached from Ezion Geber on the eastern arm of the Red Sea to the Euphrates River.

never again mentioned in the OT, his namesake—a son of "Aiah's daughter Rizpah," Saul's concubine (see 3:7)—has the misfortune of being one of the seven descendants of Saul to be handed over to the Gibeonites. The other six are Rizpah's son Armoni and the five sons of Saul's daughter Merab (1Sa 14:49; 18:19).

After being delivered over to the Gibeonites by David, the seven are "killed and exposed . . . before the LORD" on a hill where they could be easily seen. The time of year is carefully specified as the beginning of the barley harvest (i.e., late April).

10 Rizpah, bereft of two sons (cf. v.8), spreads "sackcloth" (a sign of mourning; cf. 3:31) on a rock, where she will stay day and night for the foreseeable future. She intends to remain there at least until the "rain" comes down—probably meaning an unseasonable late-spring or early-summer shower. She refuses to leave the exposed bodies of her sons and the other five victims until the drought ends as a sign that Saul's crime has been expiated. Furthermore, to allow the "birds of the air" and the "wild animals" to feast on the carcasses would be to subject them to the most ignominious treatment possible.

11–14 Upon being told of Rizpah's vigil—and perhaps also of her implied desire to make sure that the remains of Saul's seven descendants be given a proper burial—David is conscience-stricken to follow her example. He makes the long journey to Jabesh Gilead to retrieve the bones of Saul and Jonathan from its citizens, who had buried them there (see 2:4b) after having taken them secretly from Beth Shan's "public square" (see 1Sa 31:8–13). Reinterment of bones was not uncommon in ancient times (cf. Ge 50:25–26; Ex 13:19; Jos 24:32), and David now intends to give those of Saul and Jonathan an honorable burial. The bones of the seven male descendants of Saul who had been "killed and exposed" are also gathered up, perhaps to be interred near (or even with) the bones of Saul and Jonathan. And so Saul and his son Jonathan arrive at their final resting place, the tomb of "Saul's father Kish."

The three-year "famine" (v.1) caused by drought came to an end when God sent rain on the land. The execution of the seven had atoned for Saul's sin and propitiated the divine wrath.

B. David's Heroes (21:15–22)

15–17 Battles between Israel and the Philistines, Israel's agelong enemy, were not uncommon during the early years of the united monarchy period. It was often necessary for David and his troops to go "down" from the heights of his capital city to the Philistine foothills and plains. On this occasion the long march and the rigors of battle leave him "exhausted."

Ishbi-Benob decides to take advantage of David's situation and kill him. The weight of his bronze spearhead marks him as a man of unusual size and strength. Despite this, Ishbi-Benob faces a formidable opponent in "Abishai son of Zeruiah," who, totally in character, comes to David's "rescue" by killing the Philistine. Sensing that the king has just experienced a close shave, his men swear to him that he will never again accompany them when they go out to battle. They want to make sure that David, the "lamp" (GK 5944) of Israel—he who, with God's help, has brought the light of continued prosperity and well-being to the whole land—will not be "extinguished" (see 14:7). The lamp imagery is probably derived from the seven-branched lampstand in the tabernacle.

18 Another battle takes place at "Gob" (perhaps "Nob," the "town of the priests" whose citizens Saul had massacred; see 1Sa 21:1; 22:18–19). The Rephaite Saph is killed by David's hero Sibbecai the Hushathite (cf. 2Sa 23:27).

19 A third battle against the Philistines also takes place at Gezer/Gob. This time the Israelite hero is "Elhanan son of Jair" (cf. 1Ch 20:5). In the light of the well-known fact that David son of Jesse killed Goliath (cf. 1Sa 17:51, 57; 18:6; 19:5; 21:9), it seems most likely the original text referred to the fact that Elhanan slew the brother of Goliath (see 1Ch 20:5). As the text was copied through the centuries, errors somehow crept in. The main weapon of Goliath's brother, "a spear with a shaft like a weaver's rod," matched that of Goliath himself (see 1Sa 17:7).

20–21 A fourth battle against the Philistines takes place at Gath, the hometown of Goliath, located about twelve miles from Gezer. A nameless Rephaite, a "huge" man (cf. Nu 13:32; 1Ch 11:23; Isa 45:14) with an extra digit on each hand and foot, taunts Israel (see 1Sa 17:10). He is soon dispatched, however, by David's nephew Jonathan.

22 Thus "four" Rephaite giants are killed by David's men. If there is no indication in the text that David personally did battle with them, he nevertheless shares the credit for their death because he is king and his men act under his command.

C. David's Song of Praise (22:1–51)

1 Ps 18 agrees with ch. 22 that the psalm recorded in both books originates with David. The Lord is the eminently worthy recipient of David's song.

If God's people tend to believe that the ark of the covenant (cf. 1Sa 4:3) or the king of Israel saves them from the hand of their enemies, David knows full well that the Lord is the one who has "delivered him" (GK 5911). Exactly when the psalm was first recited is uncertain, although it must have been after the prophet Nathan had announced God's covenant with him.

2–4 In his introductory words of praise, David affirms that the Lord is everything to him, that he is all he needs. Nine epithets underlining God's protecting presence are divided into three sets of three each: "my rock," "my fortress," "my deliverer"; "my rock," "my shield," "the horn of my salvation"; "my stronghold," "my refuge," "my savior."

The Lord as "shield" (GK 4482) not only protects David from his enemies but also ensures the safety of all who are godly (cf. v.31). "Stronghold" (GK 5369), a secure, lofty retreat that the enemy finds inaccessible, is a frequent metaphor for God in the Psalms (cf. e.g., Pss 9:9; 59:9, 16, 17). As such he is the "refuge" (GK 4960) of his chosen one. That the Lord is therefore eminently able to save him from "violent men" is a theme to which David returns at the end of the poem (v.49), and that God delights to "give victory to" his people, to "save" (GK 3828) them from all their enemies and from every calamity, is a prominent thread running throughout the books of Samuel.

Having described at length the God who is strong to save, David states for the record what has become his habitual exercise: "I call to the LORD"—a practice he shares with saints of all times and places. Such a God, supremely "worthy of praise," specializes in assuring his people that they will ultimately be saved from their enemies (cf. Nu 10:9).

5–7 Among the reasons David gives for praising the Lord is the fact that God has already delivered him from his enemies. Whether in images watery or terrestrial, "death" threatened to swallow David. The metaphor of "waves" as an instrument of divine judgment occurs elsewhere in psalmic literature as well (cf. Pss 42:7; 88:7). "Swirled about" and "coiled around"can be equally used with reference to the sea (Jnh 2:5) and the land (Pss 40:12; 116:3; cf. Pss 22:12, 16; 49:5; 118:10–12). "Overwhelmed" is used of divine visitants again and again in Job (cf. 3:5; 9:34; 13:11, 21; et al.); and just as the snares of death "confronted" David, so did days of suffering confront Job (cf. 30:27).

In v.6, death is pictured as a hunter setting traps for his victims. Just as calling to the Lord should be our lifelong response to an all-sufficient God (vv.2–3), so also calling to the Lord should be our immediate reaction when we are threatened by nameless dread or mortal danger. When in "distress" (GK 7639), David knew to whom to turn (cf. Pss 66:14; 102:2). From his "temple," his heavenly dwelling, God heard the plea of David, whose cry for help reached the ears of the Lord.

8–16 Situated at the center of David's paean of praise to God for having delivered him from his enemies is a magnificent theophany. The "foundations of the earth" answer to the "foundations of the heavens," reminding us of God's greatness through the vast reaches of his creation. If the opening section concentrates on God's majestic being, the theophany focuses on his mighty omnipotence.

The poetic description of the divine self-manifestation is cast in terms of natural phenomena related to earthquake and storm. An earth set to quaking and trembling by the power of God is a common motif. Serving as an appropriate counterpoise to the quaking earth is the shaking of the "foundations of the heavens." Earth and heaven alike tremble when the Lord is "angry" (cf. Isa 13:13) at the enemies of his people (cf. 1Sa 14:15). Unlike the altar smoke and fire in the Isaianic theophany (cf. Isa 6:4, 6), the present context seems to define the "smoke" as storm clouds and the "fire" and "burning coals" as flashes of lightning. "Smoke" in the Lord's "nostrils" depicts the judgment of divine wrath against his enemies (cf. Isa 65:5), and "burning coals" can metaphorically represent instruments of divine punishment (cf. Eze 10:2).

In theophanic splendor the Lord "parted the heavens and came down" (cf. Ps 144:5). When God descends from heaven, his appearance is awesome indeed (cf. Ex 19:11, 18, 20; Ne 9:13). Although on occasion he comes down to rescue, usually his descent is for the purpose of judgment (cf. Ge 11:5; 18:21; Isa 31:4; 64:1, 3; Mic 1:3). At such time his "feet" are planted on "dark clouds," which signal the ominous approach and destructive power of a violent thunderstorm (cf. Dt 4:11; Ps 97:2–4).

One or more "cherubim" are the means of transportation that the Lord "mounted." If above the ark of the covenant the cherubim (winged sphinxes) support the throne from which God reigns over his people (see 6:2; 1Sa 4:4), in storm theophanies the cherubim support (or pull) a chariot, pictured in the form of swift clouds that scud across the heavens (cf. Ps 68:4, 33).

Darkness shrouds the middle verse (v.12) of the theophany. The God of wind and rain is pictured as if dwelling in storm clouds, which form his "canopy" and from which he thunders. Interfacing with the darkness is the "brightness" of the Lord's presence, a "brilliant light" (Eze 1:4, 27) that surrounds him. Thunder, lightning, and their effects round out the theophany, the final three verses of which provide its only explicit references to the name of "the LORD."

"Arrows" as a figure of speech for "bolts of lightning" appear also in Hab 3:9 (cf. 3:11) and Zec 9:14. Together with thunder, lightning is a common accompaniment of theophanies (cf. Ex 19:16; Ps 77:18; Eze 1:13–14). And as thunder "routed" the Philistines in the days of Samuel (1Sa 7:10), so lightning has "routed" David's enemies.

With its emphasis on cosmic phenomena, the closing verse of the theophany (v.16) reprises its opening (v.8). If the heavens respond to the earth in v.8, the "earth" answers the "sea" in v.16. However firm and stable the foundation of the heavens and the earth may be in the normal course of events, the Lord of the universe can shake them and lay them bare in accordance with his sovereign will (cf. Ps 82:5). Severe dislocation and exposure take place "at the blast of breath" from his nostrils, a display of divine wrath (cf. Ex 15:7–8; Job 4:9). The rebuke of the Lord as an index of his anger brings the theophany full circle.

17–20 David concludes his overall description of deliverance from his enemies (vv.5–20) by asserting that the self-revealing, all-powerful Sovereign of the universe reached down from heaven and saved him on earth. The Lord "drew" David out of "deep waters," a cosmic metaphor that symbolizes a threatening peril (cf. Pss 32:6; 144:7).

Although powerful, David's enemies were no match for God, who rescued him. In speaking of the "day of my disaster," David uses a common expression that elsewhere refers to an experience of divinely sent judgment, punishment, or vengeance (cf. Dt 32:35; Job 21:30). The background is perhaps the widespread practice of the "river ordeal," a form of legal trial in which a suspected criminal was thrown into a river and his success or failure in attempting to swim to shore was interpreted as a divinely sent index of his guilt or innocence. In the present context the case for such a relationship is strengthened by the proximity of "day of my disaster" to the "deep waters" that threatened David. Through every trial, the Lord himself was David's "support."

That the Lord safely brought David out of the ordeals through which he had gone (cf. Ps 66:12) implies that he is the God who "sets [his chosen ones] free" from the worst their enemies can do to them (v.49).

21–25 That the Lord "delighted" (GK 2911) in David (v.20) leads to his description of the two bases of God's saving deliverance: the righteousness of those who are rescued by God (vv.21–25) and the justice of God himself (vv.26–30). Is David saying that his "righteousness" (GK 7407) has earned God's favor? Hardly. Far from taking matters into his own hands, David had "kept the ways of the LORD" and had waited for divine vindication against his enemies.

"Cleanness" of hands, while intended here in a moral and spiritual sense (cf. Ps 24:4), is an idiom that derives ultimately from the practice of washing one's hands with "soda" (cf. Job 9:30). That the Lord was a God who "rewarded" people according to their righteousness was a principle David had embraced long before he became king (cf. 1Sa 26:23).

David is determined to keep God's laws before him so that he may not be tempted to turn away from the divine "decrees" (v.23; cf. 1Ki 11:11). His testimony that he has been "blameless" before the Lord is echoed later not only in the statement that God shows himself "blameless" to those who are "blameless" (v.26) but also in David's realization that the God whose way is "perfect" (v.31) makes "perfect" the way of his chosen one (v.33).

26–30 The second main factor that served as a basis of God's deliverance is the Lord's justice, which is evident in his actions. To the "faithful" (GK 2883), those who have appropriated the (covenant) love demonstrated to them by the Lord, God shows himself faithful. To the "blameless" (GK 9459), the one who has been made perfect in God's eyes, the Lord shows himself blameless. To the "pure" (GK 1405), God shows himself "pure." But to the "crooked" (GK 6826), the one whose words are "perverse" and whose paths are littered with traps for the unwary, the Lord shows himself "shrewd." At the hinge of the poem, David acknowledges himself (and his God) to be "faithful," "blameless," and "pure," whereas his enemies are "crooked."

The contrast established between the godly and the godless is summarized in v.28. Continuing to address God in the second person, David asserts that the Lord saves the "humble" but that his eyes bring low the "haughty." David as the "lamp" of Israel (see 21:17) merely reflects the blinding light of the glory of God, who is the "lamp" of David himself (cf. Ps 18:28).

With God on his side, David feels invincible. Since "scale a wall" is clearly the meaning of the second line of v.30 (cf. SS 2:8; Isa 35:6), the alternative NIV translation ("run through a barricade") provides a more suitable parallel in the first line than "advance against a troop."

31–37 The psalm's third major section (vv.31–46), which expounds the outworking of God's saving deliverance, begins by describing the Lord as the enabler of his servant David. God's name is placed front and center. The Lord, whose works and ways are "perfect" (GK 9459), makes David's way perfect by providing him with everything he needs to ensure victory over his enemies. The Lord, whose word is "flawless" in the sense that like precious metals in a refiner's furnace it has been "tested" to the point of proving its purity (Ps 119:140), is a "shield" (GK 4482) who protects all who "take refuge" in him.

The Lord's irresistible and omnipotent ability is linked to his absolute incomparability. David's two rhetorical questions demand the uncompromisingly negative answer "no one." There is no god "besides the LORD"; there is no "Rock" apart from our God. Uniquely beyond compare, the Lord brooks no rivals.

Next David glorifies the God who readies him for battle. The Lord "arms [him] with strength," making him physically, mentally, and spiritually powerful.

David is grateful to the Lord for giving him the surefootedness of a deer, enabling him even to stand on the perilous "heights" without fear of falling (cf. Dt 32:13; Isa 58:14; Hab 3:19). The Lord also "trains [David's] hands for battle" and strengthens his arms so that they are powerful enough to bend a bow of "bronze" (a hyperbole).

The last two verses of David's description of God as enabler address the Lord directly. He gives David a shield that guarantees victory, and he condescends to stoop down in order to make David great. He broadens the path beneath David's feet, so that his ankles do not turn.

38–43 Adequately strengthened and properly equipped by the Lord (vv.31–37), David was able to gain victory over his enemies with God's help. As he describes the thoroughness of his triumph, he virtually exhausts the lexicon of Hebrew verbs that have to do with annihilation.

God has "armed" David "with strength" and "made" his enemies "bow" before him in craven submission (cf. Ps 17:13). David's "adversaries" will "rise" no more. If the Lord has broadened David's path "beneath" him (v.37), and if his enemies have fallen "beneath" his feet (v.39), David joyfully confesses that the Lord has caused them to bow at his feet. The Lord has made David's enemies turn their backs in flight, and David has thus "destroyed" his "foes."

Although the enemy tried to find relief from David's onslaught, there was "no one to save them." Giving his enemies no quarter, David beat them as fine as the dust of the earth. He "trampled" them with his feet (cf. Eze 6:11; 25:6) as though they were "mud in the streets." Thus David's enemies are portrayed as objects of humiliation and contempt.

44–46 Again, David gives credit to God for enabling him to gain the victory over his enemies. He acknowledges that God has "delivered" (GK 7117) him from "attacks of my people" (better translated, "of the people," i.e., his enemies).

David's conquests resulted in large numbers of people he "did not know" becoming "subject to" him. Since the enemies of God can be expected to "cringe" before him, there is no reason why foreigners under David's control should not "come cringing" to the Lord's anointed. Indeed, "as soon as they hear" they obey him. David's power and reputation strike terror in subject and foreigner alike, and they all "lose heart." Their only recourse is to "come trembling" from their "strongholds." Utterly dejected, the peoples in and around David's realm cower before him and his God.

47–51 "The LORD lives!" echoes David's description of the Lord as "the living God" decades earlier (see 1Sa 17:26). From this fact springs the rest of his words of exultation. He begins with a common outburst of praise to which he is no stranger (see 1Sa 25:32), directing it to the omnipotent Lord who is his "Rock" (GK 7446). The God who is himself "exalted" (GK 8123) has "exalted" his servant David. "Rock" and the reference to God as "Savior" (GK 3829) remind his people that his mighty power works hand in hand with his redemptive grace. When the Lord "avenges" (GK 5935) his chosen king, he puts the nations under him and sets him free from his enemies. Indeed, David is exalted above his "foes" (cf. Ps 140:1, 4, 11).

Because of all that God has done for him, none of which he can possibly repay, David speaks to the Lord directly and announces he will "praise" him "among the nations"; he will praise the "name" of him who alone is worthy of praise (cf. Ps 8:1, 9). That the nations of the world would share in David's praise to the Lord was a firm belief of the apostle Paul, who in Ro 15:9 quotes 2Sa 22:50.

David ends with parallel references to the Lord's "king" and the Lord's "anointed." To his king the Lord gives great victories, and to his anointed—to David and his descendants—he shows "kindness" (GK 2876). God's covenant with David guarantees that the "kindness" here affirmed would continue to bring untold blessing to the Davidic line for all future generations (see 7:15). The "messenger of the covenant" (Mal 3:1), the Lord's representative and Messiah, would confirm and establish the Davidic covenant; the Lord's messianic servant, himself a "covenant for the people" (Isa 42:6; 49:8), would fulfill the Davidic covenant as king through unending days (cf. Isa 9:7; Luke 1:31–33). It is thus significant and satisfying that the Song of David, a psalm of impressive scope and exquisite beauty, should begin with "The LORD" (v.2), the Eternal One, and end with "forever" (v.51).

D. David's Last Words (23:1–7)

1 The phrase "last words" need not be understood in the sense of the last words David spoke during his lifetime but is doubtless used in a way analogous to "last will and testament" or the like. Verses 1b–7 summarize his final literary legacy to Israel.

David begins by identifying his poem as an "oracle" (GK 5536) and by providing us with a laudatory self-description. After calling himself the "son of Jesse," he awards himself three titles that appear grandiose, two of which give the Lord the glory for his success. David considers himself a man exalted by the Most High, anointed by the God of Jacob (cf. Pss 20:1; 24:6), and designated as "Israel's singer of songs."

2–4 David next ascribes divine origin to the revelation that comes to him. "The Spirit of the LORD spoke through" him and delivered to him the message that God wanted him to receive. David is conscious of the fact that the "word" of the Lord was on his "tongue" (cf. Ps 139:4) and that the mighty "Rock of Israel" had spoken to him.

"Qualities of an Ideal King" could well be the caption of the Lord's portrait of royalty mediated through David. "Fear [GK 3711] of God," the generic term for "religion, piety" in ancient Israel, was a common wisdom motif (see 1Sa 12:14). Thus he who rules in the fear of God rules "in righteousness" (GK 7407; lit., "as a righteous one," an epithet that has clear messianic connotations; cf. Jer 23:5; Zec 9:9).

The first half of v.4 compares the rule of the righteous king to the benefits of sunlight, the second half to the fertilizing effects of rain. It is remarkably similar to Ps 72, where the ideal ruler, characterized by "righteousness" (72:1–2), will endure as long as the "sun" (v.5) and will be like "rain" that waters the earth (v.6). The righteous king is like the first light of morning, just after dawn (cf. 17:22; 1Sa 14:36).

The image of "brightness" is continued into the latter half of v.4—now related to the lightning that accompanies thunderstorms. As the fructifying influence of rain helps the grass to grow (cf. Dt 32:2), so also the benevolent rule of a righteous king causes his people to flourish (cf. Ps 72:6–7). If the presence of the ideal king produces health and prosperity, the absence of royal rule guarantees famine and drought.

5 Encouraged by the possibilities for righteous leadership implied in the Lord's words, David speaks positively of his "house" (i.e., his family and dynasty), of the everlasting covenant that God had made with him, of the fruition of his salvation, and of the fulfillment of all his desires. He had been convinced that his "house" would be "established" in God's presence (7:26), and he is now sure that his "house" is "right with God."

6–7 David now describes the fate of "evil men." All of them are to be cast aside like "thorns" (GK 7764), whose sharp-pointed branches make them too dangerous to pick up with unprotected hands. Anyone touching them is well-advised to use a tool of "iron" or the "shaft of a spear"—both offensive weapons that can be used to kill an enemy. A parallel way of destroying thorns (or enemies) is to burn them up "where they lie." If evil men are "cast aside," the anointed of the Lord, God's Messiah, is "exalted" (v.1).

And thus David's "last words" (v.1) come to an end. Along with all his other poems, they represent a legacy and variety of hymns that are unparalleled elsewhere in Scripture. Israel's ideal king was indeed Israel's beloved singer.

E. David's Mighty Men (23:8–39)

8–12 The parallel in 1Ch 11:10–41 is introduced with the statement that David's mighty men and/or their chiefs "gave his kingship strong support to extend it over the whole land." Since the context is the anointing of David as king over Israel after his seven-year reign in Hebron (1Ch 11:1–3) followed by the conquest of Jerusalem (1Ch 11:4–9), vv.8–39 doubtless represent the organization of David's military command at a time relatively early in his reign over all Israel. "Mighty men" is a general term for unusually strong and courageous soldiers (cf. 1Sa 2:4).

First to be mentioned is Jashobeam (1Ch 11:11). Among others during David's long reign, he was "chief of the Three." In terms of David's military administration, the regular regiment of four hundred to six hundred men was divided into three units: Two fighting units and one unit to guard the weapons (see 1Sa 25:13; 30:9–10). Like Abishai (cf. v.18), the courageous Jashobeam "raised his spear against" a large number of men, whom he succeeded in killing in a single encounter.

Next to Jashobeam was Eleazar, the second of the "three mighty men." He was from a Benjamite clan. Unlike other Israelite troops, who retreated from a second epic battle against the Philistines near "Pas Dammim," Eleazar "stood his ground" and joined David as, tit for tat, they "taunted" the enemy. Eleazar struck down the Philistines with such fierceness that his hand "froze to the sword." But there was victory nonetheless—a "great victory" that was brought about by the Lord.

Third and last of the "three mighty men" was "Shammah son of Agee." As fear of the Philistines had struck panic in the hearts of Israel's troops on other occasions, so also the Israelites fled when the Philistines "banded" together (cf. v.13) in a field full of "lentils." Depending on divine help for victory, however, Shammah took his stand in the middle of the field and defeated the enemy.

13–17 The story of David and the three mighty men at the cave of Adullam is one of the most familiar and best loved in the entire corpus. An act of loyalty and unselfish bravery is matched by an act of gratitude and self-effacing chivalry, and the result is an account that highlights the most admirable qualities in all four men.

The "thirty chief men" are doubtless to be equated with the "Thirty" (vv.23–24) who were already a part of David's growing military force when he was at Ziklag (cf. 1Sa 27:6–12; 29:1–30:26). Early on, the Thirty had apparently formed a kind of supreme command under David. Three of them had now come to him at the "cave of Adullam" (1Sa 22:1), while a detachment of Philistines was camped in the "Valley of Rephaim" (see 5:18).

At David's hometown of Bethlehem in Judah (see 1Sa 16:1; 17:12), the Philistines had established a "garrison." His throat parched, David expressed aloud his wistful longing for a drink of water from the well near Bethlehem's gate, where as a boy he had doubtless slaked his thirst on many occasions. So loyal were David's three mighty men that his wish became their command: Heedless to the danger facing them, they marched the twelve miles from Adullam to Bethlehem, "broke through" the Philistine lines, drew water from the well, and carried it back to David.

Instead of drinking the water, David "poured it out" before the Lord as a libation offering (cf. Ge 35:14; Nu 28:7). Instead of quenching his thirst, he solemnly and emphatically denied that he would even think of doing such a thing as he declared that the water symbolized the very blood of his men, who had served him at the risk of their lives. The exploits of the courageous warriors would be remembered for all future generations.

18–23 "Abishai the brother of Joab son of Zeruiah" is well known as a brave if impetuous fighting man (see 1Sa 26:6; 2Sa 2:18; 3:30; 16:9; 18:2; 19:21; 21:17). Like Jashobeam (see v.8), Abishai was more likely chief of the "Three" than of the "Thirty." Also like Jashobeam, Abishai "killed" a large number of men. His prodigious feat of courage made him as "famous" as the Three themselves and doubtless contributed to his being "held in greater honor" than the Three. Indeed, although he was not included among them, he became their commander.

"Benaiah son of Jehoiada" was a "valiant" fighter who performed a number of exploits. He struck down "Moab's two best men" and, in the midst of adverse circumstances, killed a lion (see 1Sa 17:34–37). The most formidable of Benaiah's accomplishments was apparently his encounter with a huge Egyptian. Armed with only a club, Benaiah snatched the Egyptian's spear from him and killed him with it.

Since Benaiah was for a while "over the Thirty" (1Ch 27:6), it is not surprising that he should be held in greater honor than the Thirty were (v.13). King David rewarded Benaiah by putting him in charge of his "bodyguard," a position similar to that once occupied by David himself in the days of Saul (see 1Sa 22:14).

24–39 A roster of notable warriors is the second of the two main segments comprising the literary section that preserves the names and the exploits of David's mighty men. If the first segment (vv.8–23) focuses on the Three, the second concentrates on the Thirty.

The parallel list in 1Ch 11:26–41 often varies from that in Samuel, especially in the last few verses. Many of the differences consist of minor spelling or transcription errors.

Some of the names in vv.24–39 are very familiar, some are less so, and some are otherwise unknown. Joab's brother Asahel was killed by Abner (cf. 2:23), Saul's cousin (cf. 1Sa 14:50–51). Elhanan son of Dodo is not to be confused with the Elhanan who killed Goliath's brother (see 21:19). Likewise Shammah the Harodite is not to be confused with other leaders named Shammah (see v.11).

Especially interesting is the listing of "Eliam son of Ahithophel the Gilonite" (v.34). Father of Bathsheba (see 11:3), Eliam was also the son of Ahithophel, David's counselor who defected to Absalom (see 15:12)—perhaps inclined to do so because of David's sin against Ahithophel's granddaughter.

If Asahel the brother of Joab (v.24) came to an untimely end at the hands of Abner (cf. 2:23), Uriah the Hittite (v.39) met his tragic death because an adulterous king could find no other way to cover his sinful tracks (see 11:14–17). None would doubt that in virtually every other respect David, who often genuinely sought to do God's will, was an ideal king—"except in the case of Uriah the Hittite" (1Ki 15:5).

F. The Lord's Wrath Against Israel (24:1–25)

The books of Samuel close with the account of a plague sent by God against Israel because of David's sin in ordering a census of his troops, providing a fitting conclusion to the story of David by calling attention, once more and finally, not only to his ambition and pride, but also to his humility and remorse.

1–9 The anger of the Lord "burned against" Israel because of an unspecified sin. If the subject of "incited" (GK 6077) in v.1 is surely the Lord, it is just as surely Satan in the parallel text of 1Ch 21:1. Thus the Lord through Satan "incited" David against Israel by commanding him to "take a census" of Israel and Judah. Since census-taking was not sinful in and of itself (cf. Ex 30:11–12; Nu 1:1–2), what was the nature of David's transgression? Apparently by taking a census David was impugning the faithfulness of God in the keeping of his promises—a kind of walking by sight instead of by faith.

David tells Joab and the army commanders with him to go throughout the entire land of Israel and count the "fighting men." He is also to "enroll" them, an act with purposes more military than statistical.

Joab, sensing David's hidden agenda, immediately expresses his reservations. His hope that the Lord will "multiply" the troops a hundred times over and that David's eyes will see it is doubtless voiced with reluctance since he wonders how the king could possibly "want" to do such a thing. Joab is positive that David's precipitous action will "bring guilt on Israel" (1Ch 21:3). But the king is adamant. "Overruled" by David's word, Joab proceeds to carry out his orders.

Territories conquered by David are not included in the census. As leader of his team, Joab transmits to David the results of their efforts. He reports the number of "able-bodied men" who can "handle a sword." The tally of fighting men recorded in Joab's report differs from that in 1Ch 21. According to v.9, the figures in Israel and Judah are 800,000 and 500,000 respectively, while in 1Ch 21:5 they are 1,100,000 and 470,000. Apparently v.9 refers simply to "Israel" whereas 1Ch 21:5 covers "all Israel" and therefore Chronicles' first sum is greater because the regular army of 288,000 (1Ch 27:1–15) is included. As for the difference between the 500,000 men of Judah in v.9, it is likely that the figure in Samuel is rounded off while that in Chronicles is more precise.

A second problem relates to the hugeness of the numbers themselves. For a discussion of this problem, see the introduction to the book of Numbers.

10–17 Eventually coming to the realization that his command to take a census of Israel's fighting men had been not only "repulsive" to Joab (1Ch 21:6) but also "evil in the sight of God" (1Ch 21:7), David is "conscience-stricken." He now confesses to the Lord: "I have sinned greatly" (see 12:13), having become sensitive to the enormity of willful rebellion against God (cf. Ps 19:13). Not waiting for a prophetic word of absolution this time, David begs the Lord to take away his guilt, realizing he has done a "very foolish thing."

Although David may not have needed a prophet to mediate the assurance of divine forgiveness to him, he apparently does need a prophet to outline for him his future options. As the "word of the LORD" had come to the prophets Samuel and Nathan in critical situations, so also it comes to the prophet Gad, who is David's "seer."

The Lord's "three options" turn out to be "three punishments": "three years of famine," "three months of fleeing," "three days of plague." As the suggested periods decrease in length, the specific punishment linked with each period increases in severity. The choice is David's to make, however. Before Gad can bring back to the Lord an answer from the king, David must "think it over and decide."

Since David is forced to choose among these three evils, he is in "deep distress" no matter what he does. But because the people of God have always confessed that his "mercy is great" (cf. Ne 9:19, 27, 31; Ps 119:156), David expresses his desire to fall into the hands of the Lord rather than of other people. David chooses the three-day plague.

Divine judgment in the form of a plague was not long in coming. Indeed, it began "that morning." In all, "seventy thousand . . . died." If David, bent on conquest, had planned the census as a military muster (see v.2), the Lord's response is not unexpected.

Who, precisely, are the hapless victims of the plague? The NIV considers them to have been ordinary Israelite "people" (GK 6639). But based on contextual reasons, the word should be translated "fighting men" (cf. v.9).

The "angel of the LORD" is the instrument of the divinely sent plague. Since the Hebrew word for "angel" (GK 4485) also means "messenger," most likely the angel of the Lord here is a special messenger from the court of heaven who bears all the credentials of the King of heaven and can therefore speak and act on his behalf. Thus when the angel of the Lord appears, the Lord himself is symbolically present. In any event, surely the angel and the Lord are not simply to be equated, for in v.16 they are clearly distinguished from each other.

Having already killed a large number of men throughout the rest of the country, the angel now stretches out his hand to destroy the capital city itself. At this juncture, however, the Lord is "grieved" because of the severity of the punishment, and thus he says, "Enough!"

Visible to David's eyes, the angel and his destructive actions in striking down the men repulse the king. He again confesses his sin and wrongdoing. The men who are being killed are merely "sheep," he says, who are not guilty and for whom David feels responsible. David's loving concern for and care of "sheep," whether literal or metaphorical, has characterized him from his first appearance in the books of Samuel to his last. Rather than witness the further destruction of his men, he calls the wrath of God down on himself and his own family.

Significantly, the angel of the Lord is at the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite. Threshing floors in ancient times were often places of sanctity.

18–25 In response to David's urgent prayer, the angel of the Lord (see 1Ch 21:18) orders the prophet Gad to tell David to "go up" to Araunah's threshing floor. There David is to build an altar to the Lord. Prompted by the divine command, David obeys.

Araunah leaves the threshing floor and pays homage to David, his acknowledged superior, by bowing down before him with his "face to the ground" and calling himself David's "servant."

To Araunah's query concerning the purpose of David's visit the king says that he wants to buy the threshing floor from him as a suitable place where he can "build" an altar to the Lord. "Burnt offerings and fellowship offerings" will propitiate the divine wrath and bring the plague to an end (cf. Nu 25:7–8; Ps 106:30).

Although they usually toiled as draft animals (cf. 6:6), "oxen" were also commonly sacrificed as burnt offerings and fellowship offerings. Although oxen, threshing sledges, and ox yokes constitute the material of his livelihood, Araunah is prepared to give them to David for a higher purpose and expresses his hope that the Lord will "accept" David.

To Araunah's gracious (though perhaps not totally disinterested) offer David replies in characteristic fashion, pointedly referring to the Lord as "my" God: "I will not sacrifice to the LORD my God burnt offerings that cost me nothing." His emphatic "No" resonates with the sound of authority as he insists on paying for the threshing floor. The transaction is finalized as David agrees to pay Araunah "fifty shekels of silver" for the threshing floor and the oxen, an amount that balloons in the Chronicler's parallel to "six hundred shekels of gold"—a price, however, that doubtless includes the entire "site."

And so David king of Israel and Judah buys a threshing floor and builds an altar on it. He then sacrifices his offerings as a means of seeking divine favor. The Lord "answered prayer in behalf of the land." The angel of death having "put his sword back into its sheath" (1Ch 21:27), divine judgment is "stopped."

Although David appears content simply to build an altar on the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite, his son Solomon would eventually build the temple there (cf. 1Ch 22:1) on the hill called Moriah (cf. 2Ch 3:1; also Ge 22:2).

INTRODUCTION

1. Historical Background

The events of Israel's history from the latter days of King David till the capture of Jerusalem are selectively recounted in the two books of Kings, to which two short footnotes are appended, one concerning an incident in the early days of the Exile (2Ki 25:22–26), the other concerning the release of the captured Judean king Jehoiachin after the death of Nebuchadnezzar (2Ki 25:27–30). The historical details span 971 to 562 B.C.

The involved period moves from the politically powerful and luxurious days at the close of the united kingdom under Solomon to the division of the kingdom under Rehoboam; it then traces the fortunes of the northern and southern kingdoms to their demise in 722 B.C. and 586 B.C., respectively. Numerous references to the external political powers and peoples of the times—e.g., the Egyptians, Philistines, Phoenicians, Arameans, Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, Assyrians, and Chaldeans—are integrated into the inspired record. In particular the Israelites were to experience the Aramean threats and Assyrian pressures of the ninth century B.C., the great Assyrian invasions of the eighth century B.C., together with the resultant Assyrian peace in the seventh century B.C., and the fall of the Neo-Assyrian Empire at the hands of the rising power of the Chaldeans under their brilliant king Nebuchadnezzar II.

Kings is, however, more than an account of the political and social history of this period. It records Israel's spiritual response to their God, who had taken them into covenant relationship with himself (2Ki 17:7–23), and who had bestowed great privileges on them through the promise made to David (1Ki 2:2–4). Accordingly, within its pages is found a detailed summary of their spiritual experiences—particularly their kings, prophets, and priests, whose activities largely point to the need for the advent of the one who would combine the intended ideal of these three offices in himself.

2. Unity, Authorship, and Date

The inclusion of the material on but one scroll shows that the Hebrews considered the books of Kings to be one book. Thematically the continuity of the Elijah narrative (1Ki 17–2Ki 2), itself part of the prophetic section dominating 1Ki 16:29–2Ki 9:37, and the recurring phrase "to this day" (1Ki 9:13; 10:12 ["since that day"]; 2Ki 2:22; 10:27; 14:7; 16:6; 17:23, 34, 41; 21:15) clearly indicate that the two books of Kings form a single literary unit.

The author of the book mentions using several source documents, such as: (1) "the book of the annals of Solomon" (1Ki 11:41), drawn from biographical, annalistic, and archival material contemporary with the details of 1Ki 1–11; (2) "the book of the annals of the kings of Israel," mentioned some seventeen times in 1Ki 14:29–2Ki 15:31 and drawn largely from the official records of the northern kingdom that were kept by the court recorder (cf. 2Sa 8:16; 20:24; 1Ki 4:3; 2Ki 18:18, 37; 2Ch 34:8); and (3) "the book of the annals of the kings of Judah," mentioned fifteen times (1Ki 14:29–2Ki 24:5), being a record of the events of the reigns of the kings of the southern kingdom from Rehoboam to Jehoiakim.

Other unnamed sources may likewise have been drawn on for the book's final composition, such as the court memoirs of David (1Ki 1:1–2:11), a cycle involving the house of Ahab and the prophets Elijah and Elisha (1Ki 16:29–2Ki 9:37), the records of the prophet Isaiah (Isa 36–39), and two concluding historical abstracts (2Ki 25:22–26, 27–30).

At least the majority of the book bears the impress of being the product of one author, who, as an eyewitness of the Jewish nation's final demise, was concerned to show the divine reasons for that fall. In so doing he utilized many sources, weaving the details together into an integrated whole that graphically portrayed Israel's covenant failure. Despite the lack of dogmatic certainty, a reasonable case can be made for Jeremiah as the author. Since he was descended from the priestly line of Abiathar, and since in all probability his father, Hilkiah, was active in communicating both the traditional facts and the teaching of Israel's past, it is very likely that Jeremiah had access to historical and theological source materials. Furthermore, he would have had more ready entree to the royal annals than any other prophet. Certainly no other prophet was so intimately involved in the final stages of Judah's history. If so, Jeremiah may have been active in composing the greater part of the history of the book of Kings (1Ki 14–2Ki 23:30) during the so-called silent years of his prophetic ministry after his call in 627 B.C., during the long reign of the godly Josiah. Certainly the contents of all but the last appendix (2Ki 25:27–30) could have been written by Jeremiah. Perhaps the appendix was added by Baruch or one of the prophets within the Jeremianic tradition; 2Ki 25:22–26, which was drawn from Jer 40–44, possibly also was written by the same writer as a bridge to the later historical notice concerning Jehoiachin.

3. Origin, Occasion, and Purpose

The origin of the basic collection itself would clearly be Jerusalem. The book gives the impression of having been written by an eyewitness to those climactic events closing the checkered histories of Israel and Judah, those dramatic affairs providing the occasion and purpose of the book. Contemplating the tragedy taking place before his very eyes, the author sets forth an accurate record of the events of his own day and those that had transpired since the glorious days of the time of Solomon. As such, Kings forms a sequel to 1 and 2 Samuel.

Kings is, however, more than a chronicle of events. Selecting his sources and utilizing his own experiential knowledge in a masterly way, the author writes to demonstrate conclusively to his readers both the necessity of believers keeping their covenantal obligations before God and the history of those most responsible for leading God's people in their stewardship of the divine economy: Israel's kings and prophets. Hence Kings everywhere bears the twin marks of redemptive history and personal accountability.

4. Theological Values

The main theological interest is the relationship of a sovereign God to a responsible people, Israel. In striking such a balance, the author of Kings draws particular attention to the Mosaic and Davidic covenants. Indeed, the redemptive history and theological perspective of Kings are largely developed through David and Israel's appropriation of God's blessing in accordance with her compliance with the standards of the Law (cf. 1Ki 2:4–5).

From the first chapter to the last, God is seen in sovereign control of the world governments. He alone is the living God who is the Creator and Provider of life. Both transcendent and immanent, he is the omnipresent, omnipotent, and omniscient God to whom the angels minister and with whom all the world has to do. A God of love and goodness, he is also a God of justice and righteousness.

Although human beings are sinners, God is the author of redemption and graciously forgives those who humble themselves before him. Moreover, he hears and answers prayer and faithfully keeps his promises. We ought to worship him and follow him completely. Accordingly, great prominence is given to the temple and its institutions. Believers should make God's inviolable Word and standards the center of their lives and live so as to be concerned for God's sacred reputation.

God has revealed himself in many ways, but especially to Israel, that nation he had granted great covenant promises to, especially through David, his servant. Although God has redeemed Israel and patiently guided, cared for, and suffered with his people, they had rejected him despite his repeated warnings. Because of Israel's unique relationship to God, the sin of idolatry is severely denounced. On the positive side, great place is accorded to prophecy.

Thus Kings is not only history but redemptive history, built around the twin themes of divine sovereignty and human responsibility, particularly as they were operative through God's covenant people, Israel. In this regard comparison may be drawn between Kings, Samuel, and Chronicles. Whereas 1 and 2 Samuel feature human responsibility in the stewardship of the divine economy and 1 and 2 Chronicles emphasize the divine sovereignty, 1 and 2 Kings attempt to effect a balance between the two.

5. Chronology

Because the OT writers utilized only relative reference points in affixing their time-sequence structure, an absolute dating of a given event on the basis of OT data is largely impossible. Moreover, the complexity of methodology and lack of uniformity in determining dated events greatly hamper the quest for precision. Thus in some eras Israel began its new year in the fall; in others, in the spring. In some cases the nonaccession-year system, by which the remaining days of a calendar year in which a king was crowned were counted as that king's first year, was used; in others, the accession-year reckoning was employed, in which case the king's first year would begin with the first day of the calendar year following his inauguration. Furthermore, adding the reign of years of all Israelite kings yields too high a total for the period between Solomon and the fall of Jerusalem.

Accordingly, recourse must be made to secular dates in the ancient Near East that have been established with greater precision. The Canon of Ptolemy (the Greek geographer and astronomer of Egypt, c. A.D. 70–161) has been particularly helpful. Ptolemy made a list of the rulers of Babylon from 747 B.C. until his own day. Also the finding of the ancient Assyrian lists, by which a given year was named for the person who occupied the office of limmu (eponym), has been of great importance. These lists also often mention important historical or astronomical details, such as an eclipse of the moon or sun. One such solar eclipse has been scientifically computed to have occurred on 15 June 763 B.C. The dating of the whole list can therefore be affixed, resulting in a reliable series of dates for the period 892–648 B.C. Interestingly enough, the accession year of Sargon II of Assyria as king over Babylon in both the Assyrian lists and the Ptolemaic Canon comes out to 709 B.C., providing a cross-check on the reliability of these two external sources. Dates for the period before 892 B.C. must be sought from Mesopotamian data drawn from the various Assyrian and Babylonian lists, from synchronous histories, and from Egyptian sources. Dates for the period after 648 B.C. can be gleaned both from Ptolemy's Canon and from the annals of the later Babylonian kings. This latter source yields a series of precise dates within the period of 626–566 B.C.

These sources provide a fairly accurate time sequence for dating the events of the ancient Near East, particularly so for the period represented by Kings (971–566 B.C.). Therefore where OT events are actually mentioned in external records, they may be assigned precise dates. Since several events are common both to Kings and external sources, the general time framework of much of the period from Solomon to the fall of Jerusalem can be acknowledged as well established.

The position taken here follows basically that of J. Barton Payne ("Chronology of the Old Testament," ZPEB, 1:829–45), which, though a modification of the coregency theory, maintains a high regard for the Hebrew text. Payne affirms that the nonaccession-dating system was used in the northern kingdom (by which the year of a king's enthronement is considered as both his first year and the last year of his predecessor) and that the new year always began in the fall. The southern kingdom, however, began its year in the fall and used the accession-year system until 848 B.C., when, under the influence of Athaliah, Jotham changed Judah to the nonaccession system. However, both kingdoms utilized the accession-year system from the early eighth century B.C., probably under the influence of Assyria.

EXPOSITION

I. The United Kingdom (1Ki 1:11–11:43)

A. Solomon's Exaltation as King (1:1–2:11)

1. Adonijah's plot to seize the crown (1:1–10)

The book of Kings begins with the rather sad circumstances surrounding the accession of Solomon to the throne of his father, David. Two primary factors are involved: (1) David's feebleness and apparent laissez-faire attitude toward government in his later years, and (2) Adonijah's self-willed ambition to succeed his father, based on the fact that he was the oldest of David's surviving sons. In this ambition he was supported by some influential members of David's government, despite David's clearly expressed designation of Solomon.

a. David's feebleness (1:1–4)

1 This brief account of David's feebleness and apparent inability to act decisively is given as the backdrop to Adonijah's attempted coup. It is somewhat startling to see the once so vigorous king now, at scarcely seventy years of age (cf. 2Sa 5:4–5), in such a state of debilitation. One thing that did more than anything else to sap David's strength and will to govern decisively in his latter years was the series of disasters let loose on him and his family following his disgraceful act of adultery with Bathsheba and the indirect murder he committed in an attempt to cover up his sin. This shattering chain of events included Amnon's rape of his half-sister Tamar; Amnon's subsequent murder by Absalom, Tamar's full brother; Absalom's revolt with its severe disruptions, followed by his death, with its great emotional impact on David (2Sa 18:32–19:8); David's ill-judged census with the resultant plague; and then Shibni's brief revolt.

2–4 The suggestion made by David's ministers conforms to a type of diatherapy attested in later literature. A virgin was chosen because she had the status of a concubine, though in actual fact she served David as a nurse. The whole point of the paragraph is to show (1) how David's feebleness encouraged Adonijah to believe he could successfully force David's hand in his favor, and (2) why Adonijah's later request to Solomon brought about such severe consequences.

b. Adonijah's attempted coup d'état (1:5–10)

5–6 Adonijah, encouraged by David's feebleness and aided and abetted strongly by Joab, David's military chief of staff, and by Abiathar, one of the two high priests, thought he could force David's hand by presenting David and the people with the accomplished fact that he already was king. Adonijah no doubt felt justified in his claim to the throne in that he was probably the oldest surviving son, thus putting him in the line of succession. He surely knew that this attempt was in direct contravention of God's will and David's explicit wishes (2Sa 12:24–25; 1Ch 22:9–10; 28:4–7). Adonijah, however, was like Absalom, his brother, in being willful and self-centered, though a naturally attractive person and a born leader. Verse 6 notes David's failure in the matter of disciplining Adonijah as a boy. One wonders how much of this failure was due to the loss of his own moral credibility because of the Bathsheba affair. Amnon and Absalom showed a similar willfulness.

7 Joab, the most powerful of Adonijah's supporters, had always been fiercely loyal to David, but not to David's wishes (see comment on 2:5). In supporting Adonijah's pretensions to the throne, Joab was acting in keeping with his character. It is likely that the planning and execution of the attempted coup was as much Joab's doing as Adonijah's. He was not consciously disloyal to David, but he opposed David's (and God's) choice of Solomon as David's successor and did his best to frustrate David's will.

Abiathar, the other named active supporter of Adonijah, had been the only survivor of Saul's massacre of Ahimelech the high priest and his family. He fled to David at Keilah, bringing the ephod with him (1Sa 22:20–22; 23:6, 9). He served as high priest during David's reign and seems to have been senior to Zadok (1Ki 2:26–27; Mk 2:26). It seems, though, that at least from the time David returned the ark to Jerusalem, Zadok gained in prominence since he presided as priest in the tabernacle at Gibeon (1Ch 16:39). It is tragic to see one who had been with David in his difficult years, and who had, like Joab, remained faithful, now opposing what he knew to be David's—and, more important, God's—wishes.

8–10 There were those, however, who did not support Adonijah. Zadok was the son of Ahitub (2Sa 8:17), a descendant of Eleazar, the third son of Aaron. In 1Ch 12:26–28 he is listed as a warrior of the house of Levi and one of those who came to David at Hebron to offer him the rulership over all Israel. He is cited in eight passages as serving along with Abiathar as chief priest under David's rule (e.g., 1Ch 15:11). After the ark was restored to Jerusalem, Zadok is described in 1Ch 16:39 as serving at Gibeon, where the tabernacle was situated. Later, when David was forced to flee Jerusalem before his son Absalom, it was Zadok who had charge of the ark (2Sa 15:24–25). Both he and Abiathar were loyal supporters of David.

Benaiah of Kabzeel, son of Jehoiada, was renowned as one of the greatest of David's thirty mighty men (2Sa 23:20–23; 1Ch 11:22–25). David put him in charge of his bodyguard, the Kerethites and Pelethites (2Sa 8:18; 20:23; 23:23).

Nathan was a "non-writing" prophet who played an important role in David's reign. David had gone to him to indicate his desire to build a temple for the Lord, and it was through Nathan that God responded with the Davidic covenant (2Sa 7). Later God sent Nathan to deal with David over the matter of his sin with Bathsheba (2Sa 12). Nathan was also sent by God to David on the occasion of Solomon's birth to declare God's special love for Solomon (2Sa 12:24–25). Solomon was there shown to be a symbol of God's forgiving grace (that David recognized this is seen in the choice of the name Solomon ["peace"; GK 8934]—i.e., the rift between God and David was healed—as well as in the appellation Jedidiah). But the passage also clearly implies God's choice of Solomon as David's successor. Nathan apparently had David's full confidence as God's spokesman, and he demonstrated here again his sensitivity to God's will as well as to David's wishes regarding the succession to the throne.

Shimei and Rei are otherwise unknown, though Shimei may well be the Shimei, son of Ela (4:18), who was appointed by Solomon as one of twelve district governors (4:7). Also absent was David's "special guard" (vv.8, 10).

Adonijah's attempted usurpation of the throne began with a ceremonial gathering of his supporters. Absalom had begun his coup in a similar manner (2Sa 15:11–12). The participation of Abiathar and Joab in the ritual sacrifice and communal meal lent an aura of legitimacy to the occasion.

En Rogel was located slightly southeast of Jerusalem, near the confluence of the Hinnom and Kidron valleys. This place was farther removed from the palace than Gihon, the normal place for such festivities. As such, it was ideally located for Adonijah's purpose of presenting David with an accomplished kingship, counting on David's illness to render him incapable of overturning Adonijah's plans.

2. The counterplan of Nathan and Bathsheba (1:11–31)

Nathan's prompt and decisive action foiled Adonijah's plot by rousing David to take the steps necessary to ensure the public proclamation of Solomon as king. By so doing Nathan not only worked out God's will but also saved Solomon's life. Despite the urgency of the situation, however, Nathan displayed once again the ability to act tactfully and judiciously, just as he had done when he brought to David's attention the enormity of his sin in connection with Bathsheba and Uriah.

11–31 Nathan proposed to send Bathsheba in first. Her status as favored wife would ensure a quick hearing, and immediate action was indeed necessary. Her role was to rouse David to action by asking him how he could allow Adonijah to become king when he had solemnly sworn that Solomon should reign after him. Nathan would then confirm her statements and tactfully urge David to act.

The validity of Solomon's claim to the throne was not in question here. Both Bathsheba and Nathan knew David's disposition in the matter. The danger was that Adonijah would succeed to the throne through David's inaction. Thus they made three points: (1) Adonijah was making a determined bid for the throne; (2) "The eyes of all Israel are on you, to learn from you who will sit on the throne of my lord the king after him" (v.20); and (3) if Adonijah should become king, the life of Solomon and Bathsheba would be in serious danger.

David responded vigorously and promised to carry out that very day the oath he had made with regard to Solomon.

3. Solomon's anointing (1:32–40)

32–40 The men that David called to carry out the public anointing of Solomon were Benaiah, the commander of David's special guard; Zadok, the priest; and Nathan, the prophet. The "servants" are identified in v.38 as the guard composed of Kerethites and Pelethites.

Gihon, the site of the anointing, was just outside the city in the Kidron Valley, on the east bank of Ophel. It was at that time Jerusalem's major source of water and was therefore a natural gathering place of the populace.

That Solomon was mounted on David's royal mule demonstrated to the populace that this anointing had David's blessing. Thus there could be no doubt whatever in the public mind as to David's wishes in the matter of the succession. Had David not acted with decision, the people might well have supported Adonijah's claims. As it was, they followed David and supported Solomon with great spontaneous rejoicing.

4. Adonijah's submission (1:41–53)

41–53 David's response to the coronation was both touching and typical of him. David saw in this event the beginning of the fulfillment of God's promise to him as described in 2Sa 7, and he was profoundly grateful to a gracious and loving God. The kingdom would not be removed from David at his death as was the case with Saul. Rather, in Solomon there began the long line of David's descendants that would ultimately lead to the promised Messiah, who was both the son of David and the Son of God.

The swelling sound of the public rejoicing and of the instruments reached the ears of Adonijah's supporters at En Rogel. Their initial puzzlement soon turned to alarm as they learned from Jonathan, son of Abiathar, that Solomon had been publicly proclaimed king and that this had been received with great enthusiasm. This effectively put an end to Adonijah's plot as the participants quickly scattered.

Adonijah's response was to seek asylum by grasping the horns of the altar. He expected Solomon to execute the rival claimant to the throne, as he himself would have done had he been successful in gaining the throne. Solomon was more gracious, however, guaranteeing Adonijah's safety as long as he conducted himself properly. To be a "worthy man" in this context simply meant that Adonijah would renounce any claims to the throne, that he would avoid seditious intrigue, and that he would support Solomon's rights with regard to the kingship over Israel. Solomon as coregent acted here with the full authority of kingship.

5. David's charge to Solomon (2:1–11)

1 David's last charge to Solomon has to do with Solomon's spiritual life; he also gives instruction concerning the disposition of matters pertaining to Joab, to the sons of Barzillai, and to Shimei. There can be no doubt that much of Solomon's early spiritual vitality and dedication to God may be attributed to David's deep personal relationship to his Lord and his desire to honor him. It is probable that since David knew from the time of Solomon's birth that he was to be his successor, he gave him special instructions to prepare him for kingship.

It is clear from 1Ch 22–29 that David did everything in his power to smooth the way for Solomon to follow him as king, not only in drawing up the plans (cf. 1Ch 28:11–19) for the temple, amassing the necessary materials and funds (cf. 1Ch 22:14–16) and soliciting the help and cooperation of Israel's leadership (cf. 1Ch 22:17–19), but also in admonishing and encouraging Solomon to carry out faithfully the task committed to him (cf. 1Ch 22:6–13; 28:9–20). In Solomon, David found a responsive and humble heart. Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah, Solomon's three older brothers, were spiritually and morally deficient; but Solomon had a heart prepared by God, and he responded willingly to David's instruction.

David's legacy to Solomon was thus much more than a great kingdom with secure borders, tributary nations, and considerable wealth and prestige. Far more important, he instilled in Solomon a love for God and his Word. He gave to Solomon a proper orientation to life and leadership and was himself an outstanding role model, despite his failures, of a man whose heart truly beat for God.

2–3 David's final words of admonition echo those of God to Joshua (Jos 1:6–9) as the latter was about to begin in his role as commander of the hosts of Israel (cf. also Dt 31:6–8, 23). His basic injunction was that Solomon should conduct himself in his personal life, and in his role as leader of God's people, in accordance with God's law. Solomon was to be strong and to show himself to be a man (cf. 1Sa 4:9).

4 These words hark back to 2Sa 7:12–13 and point to Solomon's responsibilities in the matter of the Davidic covenant. This involves primarily a mental and spiritual attitude in which there is a wholehearted devotion to God. Though the covenant is unconditional with respect to its ultimate goal of bringing in the Messiah from the line of David, each individual king had to heed God's law from the heart if he wanted to experience the blessing of God.

5–6 The second part of David's last words left Solomon with some matters that he considered to be unfinished business. First was Joab, the commander of David's armies. Joab had been a mixed blessing to David—fiercely loyal, but not always faithful in carrying out his wishes. On the good side it can be said for Joab that he was an outstanding general, an example of his ability being the initial capture of Jerusalem for David (1Ch 11:6, 8). He never wavered in his loyalty to David's kingship. He also had occasional flashes of spiritual insight, opposing the census (1Ch 21:3–4) that brought grief to David.

On the other hand, there were many problems that Joab created for David. He had a repeated history of taking matters into his own hands, often creating embarrassing situations for David and even forcing his hand. Joab had killed Absalom against David's express command. In 2 Sa 3:22–27 he killed Abner in an act of treachery.

After the revolt of Absalom, David appointed Amasa (Absalom's field commander) to muster the men of Judah to track down Sheba who had led ten tribes in a secessionist move (2Sa 20). When Amasa failed to meet the appointed deadline, David turned to Abishai, Joab's brother, to lead the punitive expedition. But Joab took matters into his own hands and treacherously killed Amasa (who had come belatedly) and then took command of the armies. Now once again Joab was trying to force David's hand, supporting Adonijah's attempted usurpation of the succession to the throne.

Why had not David dealt with Joab before this? The answer is probably that David felt under obligation to Joab, and though David was certainly not lacking in courage, he was not able to cope with the mixture of Joab's loyalty and his misdeeds. Yet he realized that Joab's murder of Abner and Amasa, at least, must not go unpunished. Solomon was the natural one to deal with the matter, since Joab had been guilty of sedition in attempting to forestall the succession to the throne of the man of David's choice.

7 In the matter of the sons of Barzillai, David was simply asking Solomon to continue to carry out his own promise to Barzillai as a reward for his loyal support during David's brief exile during Absalom's revolt (2Sa 19:31–39).

8–9 The matter of Shimei was more difficult. He had clearly acted in a death-deserving way during David's flight from Absalom (2Sa 16:5–14). Yet on his return to Jerusalem, David had pardoned Shimei (2Sa 19:18–23). Perhaps David felt the pardon had been rash. At any rate he knew that Shimei's "repentance" was not a sincere one and that he was a potential troublemaker. David now left the matter in Solomon's hands, trusting in Solomon's wisdom to deal properly with the situation.

10–11 Having made all the preparations possible for a successful reign for his son, David died, having ruled a total of forty years, including the first seven years at Hebron over Judah alone. Just how long the coregency lasted cannot be stated with any degree of certainty. Estimates range from two to three months (because of the extreme senility described in 1:1–4) to several years.

B. Solomon's Establishment of the Kingdom (2:12–3:28)

1. The assumption of the throne (2:12)

12 However long or short the coregency was, v.12 states that when David died, Solomon's rule was firmly established. There was no question in anyone's mind who was king, and Solomon had firm control over the kingdom.

One matter that is usually lost sight of is that during Adonijah's attempt to preempt the throne, Solomon himself did not indulge in plotting to make the throne certain for himself. He exercised remarkable restraint. But once he was formally declared to be king, he acted firmly and with decision and dispatch.

2. Adonijah's further plot and execution (2:13–25)

13–17 That Adonijah was ambitious and not yet done with his hopes for securing the throne for himself is seen in this section. In asking for the hand of Abishag, he was almost certainly not pursuing romantic interests but trying to secure for himself a claim to the throne. Although 1:4 states clearly that David had no marital relations with Abishag, her function being a therapeutic one, she was officially regarded as being one of David's wives. As such, she would provide an additional argument for Adonijah's royal pretensions. He informed Bathsheba that the kingdom had been as good as his and that all Israel had regarded him as king, thus clearly indicating that his aspirations were not really dead.

18–22 Bathsheba, realizing Abishag's true status, saw no harm in the request and went to Solomon to intercede for Adonijah. But Solomon saw through the scheme and, probably startling his mother considerably, spoke rather vehemently: "You might as well request the kingdom for him!"

23–25 Solomon reacted swiftly to Adonijah's ploy and ordered Benaiah to execute him. Though this may seem harsh, it was clearly necessary since Adonijah was evidently still hoping to establish himself on the throne. To leave him alive with such ambitions would leave a festering sore in the kingdom.

3. The deposition of Abiathar (2:26–27)

26 Abiathar was banished to his home in Anathoth (a few miles north of Jerusalem). He deserved to die because he opposed not only David's will but also God's will in the matter of succession. But since he had served faithfully, having been loyal to David in his hard times and having borne the ark (2Sa 15:24, 29; 1Ch 15:11–15) in his capacity as high priest, Solomon allowed him to live. The reprieve from execution, however, was dependent on continued good behavior.

27 The removal of Abiathar from the active priesthood and the sole tenancy of Zadok as high priest werea fulfillment of God's word to Eli (1Sa 2:30–33).

4. The execution of Joab (2:28–34)

28–29 Solomon now began to carry out David's injunctions with regard to his own "unfinished business." Having heard of Solomon's actions with regard to Adonijah and Abiathar, Joab knew that judgment would not be long in coming. In seeking sanctuary by grasping the horns of the altar, he no doubt was thinking only of his involvement with Adonijah's plot. It would be in keeping with Joab's character to have dismissed from his mind any thought of blame, much less punishment, in regard to the two murders. In any case, Joab's act of seeking sanctuary would put Solomon's execution order in as bad a light as possible by making him appear to be violating a commonly accepted sanctuary. Solomon would have to contend with strong emotions on the part of many of the people.

30–33 Joab's refusal to leave frustrated Benaiah's mission since he hesitated to touch Joab while he clung to the altar. When Solomon sent Benaiah back to execute Joab at the altar, he justified the order as an act of justice to remove bloodguiltiness from David and his descendants. Solomon was carrying out his father's wishes. This matter was of great importance to David's conscience and the integrity of his reign because the murders were not a private matter. One might term Joab's murders as political assassinations. The national interest and conscience were involved.

34 Benaiah carried out Solomon's order. No public outcry is recorded. On the contrary, the last sentence in the chapter states that "the kingdom was now firmly established in Solomon's hands" (v.46).

5. The elevation of Benaiah and Zadok (2:35)

35 The two chief conspirators as well as Adonijah were now removed. It should be clearly understood that though Solomon's actions strengthened his hand and fixed him firmly in the rulership, his acts were not acts of personal vengeance or political expediency. These men had actively and with deliberate forethought opposed God's will. It must also be made clear to all the people that Joab's willful acts could not be condoned, even though they were perpetrated in the name of David's government. Joab and Abiathar were now replaced by Benaiah and Zadok.

6. The execution of Shimei (2:36–46)

36 Shimei was not one of the conspirators with Adonijah, but he had considerable potential for stirring up opposition to the house of David. His attitude toward the latter is seen in 2Sa 16:5–13. In a gesture of generosity, David forgave him for his cursings and acts of hatred. Yet David no doubt realized the insincerity of Shimei's repentance and the very real probability of a return on Shimei's part to active hostility at the earliest sign of weakness. But he also felt that justice had not been served. Shimei was a scoundrel and needed to be dealt with. David was powerless because of his promise. It was up to Solomon to see to it.

37 Solomon's wisdom and ability to govern are demonstrated at the very outset of his reign. By forbidding Shimei to cross the Kidron Valley on pain of death, Solomon kept him from his kinsmen, who had been the spearhead of the revolt against David under Sheba (2Sa 20).

38–40 For three years Shimei obeyed the restriction of the king; but when two of his slaves fled to Achish of Gath, he violated his parole and went after his slaves personally. Had Shimei taken the conditions of his confinement seriously and been an honest man, he should have gone to Solomon and requested either that the latter regain his slaves for him or else allow him to make the trip.

41–43 Solomon calls Shimei to account for his breach of an oath to God. He had already been the recipient of a gracious pardon from David. But now Solomon was going to mete out justice on the exact terms of the oath. Shimei had taken grace lightly and demonstrated his unrepentant heart. For this he would die in strict accord with the terms of their agreement. He was unworthy of another pardon.

44 With Shimei's execution justice was fully served; yet Solomon astutely allowed Shimei to condemn himself.

45–46 The last opponent of the Davidic dynasty was now gone, and David's throne had been securely established. David had his detractors; but God caused him to prevail, not only in his own rule, but in seeing his son Solomon sitting on his throne as God had promised. The Davidic covenant was now on its way toward fulfillment. Solomon—granted by God's grace a kingdom of peace and prosperity—is, in this and in his extraordinary insight, a type of the coming Son of David, the Messiah.

7. The spiritual condition of Solomon's kingdom (3:1–3)

1 Solomon's marriage to Pharaoh's daughter was the seal of a political alliance with Egypt. That such a marriage came about gives some indication of the importance of the kingdom Solomon inherited from his father as well as the decline of Egyptian power at this time. Formerly Egyptian Pharaohs consistently refused to allow their daughters to marry even the most important and powerful foreign kings. In this instance it appears that Pharaoh felt it to be advantageous to ally himself with Solomon, giving him not only his daughter but also Gezer as a wedding gift. This would give him clear trade routes through Palestine. Solomon, on the other hand, could by this means secure his southern border.

The rendering "made an alliance with Pharaoh" reflects accurately the Hebrew (lit., "became Pharaoh's son-in-law"), which stresses the relationship between father-in-law and bridegroom rather than that between the bride and the bridegroom. This was a rather common practice for cementing and maintaining international agreements and securing a nation's borders.

The city of David was located on the southern portion of the eastern ridge of Jerusalem. This lies between the Kidron Valley on the east and the (now nonexistent) Tyropoeon Valley on the west. It slopes down into the Valley of Hinnom at the point where it joins the Kidron Valley. This was the site of Jebusite Jerusalem and David's Jerusalem. Solomon extended the city to the north, where he also built the temple.

Solomon kept Pharaoh's daughter in the older city of David until he had completed his building projects. Then he built a palace for her (1Ki 7:8; 9:24; 2Ch 8:11), presumably as part of his palace complex. According to 2Ch 8:11, Pharaoh's daughter was not housed in David's palace. She was not to live in David's palace "because the places the ark of the LORD has entered are holy." Thus, though Pharaoh's daughter temporarily resided in the city of David, it would not have been in the palace itself.

2 The "however" is intended to point out that, though conditions generally were very good, there was one matter that needed correcting, the practice of sacrificing at the "high places" (GK 1195). These were open-air sanctuaries that were mostly found on hilltops (1Ki 11:7; 2Ki 16:4), but also in towns (1Ki 13:32) and in valleys (Jer 7:31; Eze 6:3).

The high places were a constant sore point in Israel, and the prophets of God frequently spoke out against them. There were two basic problems with them: (1) they detracted from the principle of the central sanctuary (Dt 12:1–14); and (2) since worship at high places was a Canaanite custom, syncretism was not only a very real danger but an all too common occurrence. Israel was specifically forbidden to utilize pagan high places and altars (Dt 12:2–4, 13), and as soon as God had established his people in the Promised Land, they were to worship at a sanctuary in the place appointed by God.

The latter half of the verse gives the reasons for the common use of various "high places" for worship: the temple had not yet been built. Before Eli's time the tabernacle had been at Shiloh; but with the Philistines' capture of the ark, Shiloh lost its significance as the place of God's presence among his people. Even after the ark was returned by the Philistines, it remained for years in the house of Abinadab (1Sa 7:1), until David removed it to Jerusalem (2Sa 6) to a tent he had prepared for it there (v.17). In the meantime, the tabernacle was removed from Shiloh after the capture of the ark.

The ark next appears at Nob (1Sa 21), where it remained until Saul massacred the priests there (1Sa 22). At some point after this event, it was moved to Gibeon, where it is mentioned in connection with Zadok's high priestly ministry (1Ch 16:39–40). There were then, in effect, two tabernacles during David's reign. The one in Gibeon was without the ark; the one in Jerusalem had the ark but not the original trappings of the tabernacle (2Ch 1:3–5). This state of affairs matched that of the double priesthood of Zadok and Abiathar.

3 High commendation is here given to Solomon. He loved the Lord and showed it in his walk. He truly feared the Lord and obeyed David's instruction with regard to his walk before God. David himself had loved God from the heart and was deeply aware of the grace of God at work in his life. Solomon, the son of Bathsheba, as the least likely candidate to be God's choice as David's successor, must have been conscious of God's gracious hand in his life.

8. Solomon's sacrifice at Gibeon (3:4)

4 According to 2Ch 1:2–3, the entire leadership of the nation went with Solomon to Gibeon to bring a great offering to God. One thousand burnt offerings were brought, indicating that this was an especially important occasion. The purpose was clearly to bring thanksgiving for establishing Solomon in the kingdom and also to seek God's blessing on his reign.

9. Solomon's dream and prayer for wisdom (3:5–15)

5 God's appearance to Solomon in a dream indicated clearly that God had not only graciously received the sacrifices but was prepared to do great things for Solomon and his people. Solomon was later once again favored with an appearance of God (1Ki 9:1–9). That God had in such a remarkable way declared himself willing to pour out his blessing on Solomon and his work makes the king all the more culpable in his later apostasy (cf. 1Ki 11:9). With great privilege comes great responsibility.

6 Solomon responded to God's gracious offer by a heartfelt expression of gratitude for God's great kindness demonstrated toward David during his lifetime and now also after his death in providing David a son as successor, the first in the line from which Messiah would come. God was able to exercise kindness and express his love toward David because of his responsiveness in seeking God and walking in his ways. The emphasis is on God's kindness rather than on David's righteousness.

7 Solomon's declaration here showed his true humility before God, as God's pleased response demonstrates. The term "little child," or young lad (GK 5853), relates both to his relative youth and to his inexperience in government.

8 The responsibilities facing Solomon were all the greater in that Israel was God's chosen nation. She had to be governed in accordance with God's precepts if the people were to experience his blessing. Thankfulness and praise are added for the faithfulness of God in respect to the Abrahamic covenant. The words "too numerous to count or number" reflect the words of God to Abraham in Ge 13:16. God had greatly blessed and increased Abraham's people in stature and numbers.

9 Solomon asked for an understanding or "discerning" (GK 9048) heart so that he might govern God's people justly. In seeing the need for these qualities and in seeking them for himself, Solomon is a type of the Messiah, the Son of David par excellence.

10–13 Solomon bypassed the kind of request that most men would commonly make—prosperity, a long life, victory over enemies, etc. He sought the more essential thing, and because of this God promised him the wisdom that he sought in such measure that he would stand alone among men (cf. Mt 6:33). In addition God granted him what he had not requested—wealth and honor unequaled in his lifetime. In granting Solomon "a wise and discerning heart," God gave him the ability to judge and rule well. But God here also went beyond Solomon's request and opened up his understanding in areas beyond those having to do with rulership (see 1Ki 4:29–34; 10:1–25).

14 God reminds Solomon of his continued responsibility to walk righteously before him as David had done and as David had enjoined him to do. God's faithfulness to the Davidic covenant remained fixed; but if Solomon wished to enjoy God's fullest blessing, he must walk in accordance with God's will.

15 When Solomon awoke, very much aware that God had spoken to him in a dream, he returned to Jerusalem and brought burnt offerings and fellowship offerings. By so doing the king was expressing his thanks for God's goodness. He brought all his officials together for a feast so that they also might rejoice in thanksgiving at this renewed manifestation of God's grace toward Israel and the house of David.

10. Solomon's wisdom: the smothered baby (3:16–28)

16–27 Since there were no witnesses, it was impossible to prove by conventional means which litigant here had a just case. Solomon displayed his extraordinary insight into human nature as well as shocking boldness of action in exposing fraud. The mother of the dead baby wanted a baby of her own. This desire for a baby to mother was stronger than her grief and love for her dead baby. In trying to attach to herself the other woman's baby, she was motivated equally strongly by her envy of the other woman who still had her baby. It was this underlying motive that was the target of Solomon's startling edict: "Cut the living child in two." Thus the Gordian knot was cut and true justice was done.

28 Solomon's verdict and the way it was achieved soon became common knowledge, and the people held him in great awe. Here was clear evidence to an unusual degree of a God-given ability to rule wisely and justly.

C. Solomon's Organization of the Kingdom (4:1–34)

1. His officials (4:1–19)

1 Considerable changes were made in Israel during the reigns of the previous two kings. When Saul became king, there was a loose confederacy among the tribes. Through his early victories he welded the nation into a kingdom. But his governmental style was modest and simple. He made no great demands on the people. There was no great central bureaucracy and no lavish court. There is no record of any system of taxation.

David developed a kingdom in a truer sense. His rule was much stronger than Saul's, and he had far greater and more lasting success in defeating Israel's enemies. By the time he died, he had established a great and powerful empire, extending Israel's borders and exercising control over vassal states from the Gulf of Aqaba and the River of Egypt to the northwestern part of the Euphrates. He captured Jerusalem from the Jebusites and made it a strong and permanent capital. His court, though not lavish, was far more extensive than Saul's. His chief officials were almost as numerous as Solomon's. David seems to have had some system of internal taxation, and he certainly received tribute from his various vassal states. One matter of organizational development that was particularly dear to David's heart was that of the temple ministry. He laid the groundwork for an elaborate worship service, including music, in preparation for the time when the temple would be built.

Solomon inherited a great kingdom. His role was one of consolidation and increased internal strengthening. He established a well-organized and strong central government, much stronger than ever before. He developed a system of taxation and forced labor to support a much admired and elaborate governmental structure and to pay for his great building projects, the foremost being the temple and the palace.

Verses 2–19 list Solomon's officials (vv.2–6 his chief administrators, vv.7–19 his district governors). Verses 11, 15 indicate this list was compiled at about the midpoint of Solomon's reign, since two of the officials are sons-in-law of Solomon. In addition, the names of especially prominent men who served in the earlier part of Solomon's reign are included. This is certainly true of Abiathar, who was deposed almost immediately, and probably of Zadok, who had already served at length under David and most likely didn't live long into Solomon's reign. In Abiathar's case, it is of course possible that he still carried the title of priest even though he was no longer permitted to function as such.

2–3 Various suggestions have been made with regard to Azariah and the office held by him. The best view appears to be that this Azariah was the grandson of Zadok (1Ch 6:8–9) and became the high priest after the death or incapacitation of Zadok. (The designation "son" for "grandson" is common OT usage.) Ahimaaz, Azariah's father, had apparently died or else could not serve for some reason.

The two "secretaries" served as private secretaries as well as secretary of state. Their father had served in the same office under David. The "recorder" (lit., "the one who calls, names, reminds, reports"; GK 4654) was also a high official. He was in charge of palace ceremonies, the chief of protocol. He reported public needs to the king and in turn was the king's spokesman.

4 Benaiah, formerly commander of David's special guard, now became the "commander-in-chief" of all the armies. As stated earlier, Zadok probably did not serve long under Solomon, being elderly at Solomon's succession to the throne. Abiathar was almost immediately deposed. They are listed here because of the outstanding roles they had played in the kingdom.

5 Azariah son of Nathan was in charge of the twelve district governors named in vv.7–19. Zabud was another son of Nathan. His function as priest may have been to assist the king in the exercise of his spiritual and ceremonial concerns. He was also called the "personal adviser" (GK 8291) of David. This seems to have been a title of honor and distinction and indicated one who was a close and trusted friend of the king (cf 2Sa 15:37).

6 Ahishar was "in charge of the palace." Under Solomon his functions were apparently restricted to that of chief steward of the palace, but his office gradually gained in importance until it was comparable to the office of the Egyptian vizier, the first minister of state. A good example of the importance that this office took on is found in Isa 22:15–24, in which Shebna, the one "in charge of the palace," must be deposed because he had misused his power in self-aggrandizement. His replacement would "be a father ... to the house of Judah." He would have the key of the house of David on his shoulder. "What he opens no one can shut, and what he shuts no one can open."

Adoniram was in charge of the forced labor or corvée. This system was widely practiced in the ancient Near East as a means of carrying out public building projects. Samuel (1Sa 8:12–17) warned that this would be one of the evils of instituting a monarchy. Its extensive use by Solomon, even though lighter demands seem to have been made on Israelites than on foreign subjects and vassals, eventually created great bitterness and dissatisfaction. This was one major reason given by the northern ten tribes for their secession from the kingdom.

7 The responsibility of these "governors" (GK 5893) was to supply provisions for the royal court. Each was responsible for these provisions for one month out of the year. The twelve divisions coincided only in part with the old tribal divisions. In only six instances are tribal names mentioned. The twelve officers were under the general supervision of Azariah (v.5).

8–19 The order of the districts is most likely the order in which supplies were to be sent. The territory of Judah is not explicitly mentioned. "The land" would refer to Judah, which had an unnamed governor, perhaps because he was part of the court itself (i.e., perhaps the Azariah of v.5). The NIV rendering—"he [i.e., Geber] was the only governor over the district"—reflects the interpretation that, despite the size of the district governed by Geber, there was only one governor. It would appear that Judah may have received special privileges, which would tend to foster resentment on the part of the other tribes.

2. His kingly splendor (4:20–28)

20 This and the following verse hark back to the Abrahamic covenant and give testimony to the faithfulness of God in carrying out his promises. The growth of the nation, numerically and territorially, the prosperity of the people, and their happiness all attest to the blessing of God. Solomon's kingdom in its broad outlines and at the acme of its greatness was a foretaste, a type, of the yet future and far greater fulfillment of God's promise in the millennial reign of Christ. Essential here is the rulership of both David and Solomon. David in his passionate love for the Lord, in his great victories over the enemies of God's people, and in his establishment of a great kingdom is a type of the coming Messiah. Solomon also is such a type, in his wisdom and reign of peace.

21 The countries that David had conquered remained subject to Solomon and brought him tribute throughout his reign. This was one noteworthy sign of God's blessing in keeping with the Davidic covenant. The usual experience of ancient empire builders was that when the old king died, the subject nations would withhold tribute and challenge the new king in rebellion. This necessitated repeated punitive expeditions to reinforce the former king's terms and to prove the ability of the new king to enforce his will. Solomon did not have to do this. God granted him a peaceful reign in which he could focus his energies on the temple and other building projects. He was also able to devote himself to administrative matters, to the building up of extensive and expanding foreign trade, and to his pursuit of wisdom and knowledge.

22 The magnificent court of Solomon as well as his fabled wisdom stirred great interest throughout the surrounding world (cf. v.34; 10:1–9). The provisions noted were daily requirements. The "cor" was a large measure of capacity. It was equivalent to the homer ("a donkey load"). Estimates vary considerably as to the exact amount involved—from forty to one hundred gallons. The daily requirement of fine flour amounted to between 150 and 280 bushels, that of coarse flour or meal, 300 to 560 bushels.

23 In addition to the large numbers of domesticated animals, game animals were also brought in. The exact identity of the "choice fowl" is not clear.

24–25 Solomon's kingdom was peaceful and prosperous. With control over all the kingdoms west of the Euphrates, Solomon was able to provide peace and security for his people. The statement that "each man [sat] under his own vine and fig tree" speaks of undisturbed prosperity and became a favorite catch phrase to indicate the ideal conditions prevailing in Messiah's kingdom (Mic 4:4; Zec 3:10). To enjoy the fruit of the vine and the fig tree meant there was a complete absence of warfare and economic disruption.

26–28 The reading "four thousand" reflects 2Ch 9:25. The Hebrew here reads "forty thousand" and is considered an old copyist's error. (Because of early systems of numerical abbreviation, transmission errors with numbers were more likely than in other portions of the text.) The twelve thousand horses may also indicate horsemen. Possibly the horse and rider as a unit is in view.

3. His superior wisdom (4:29–34)

The one attribute most characteristic of Solomon is "wisdom" (GK 2683). Interest in wisdom was widespread in the ancient world. In the Gentile world wisdom was primarily associated with the ability to be successful. It was not a speculative discipline but intensely practical. It pertained to all walks of life: priests (regarding proper practice in ritual), magicians (regarding skill in the practice of their arts), craftsmen of all sorts (regarding skillful workmanship), and administrators (regarding good management), etc. It did not usually deal with pure moral values. Though frequently associated with religious activity, its concern had to do with ritual and magical skills.

In the OT "wisdom" is frequently used in the broad sense of skill in craftsmanship or administration. An outstanding example is Ex 31:3, in which the two craftsmen appointed to make the tabernacle were given "skill" (lit., "wisdom") in carrying out their work. This kind of practical wisdom is applied to life as a whole—the art of being successful, i.e., how best to make one's way through life. Wise men were those who had unusual insight into human nature and in the problems of life in general. Thus they were sought as advisers to kings and rulers. At the very heart, however, of the concept of wisdom lies the recognition that God is the Author and End of life and that a meaningful or successful life is one that has its focus in him (cf. Job 28:28). True wisdom gives discernment in spiritual and moral matters.

29 The expression "breadth of understanding" means a comprehensive understanding and is illustrated by the numerous areas of knowledge in which Solomon was at home (vv.32–33).

30 The "East" here probably refers to Mesopotamia generally, which was commonly regarded as a major seat of culture and learning (cf. Isa 2:6). It produced a great body of literature, most of it mythological, but also much wisdom material.

31 Solomon's wisdom was recognized to be greater than that of any other man. He is compared in particular with four men noted for their wisdom as expressed in proverbs and songs. Ethan is the author of Ps 89, Heman of Ps 88. Calcol and Darda, apart from their appearance in 1Ch 2:6, are otherwise unknown. It seems likely that the expression "sons of Mahol" is a designation of membership in a guild or profession, i.e., "singers" (GK 4689; lit.,"dance," but sacred dance and song were closely related).

32 Many of Solomon's proverbs are preserved in the book of Proverbs. These were not only unusually sagacious but were inspired by the Holy Spirit. Besides the Song of Solomon, two songs or psalms are similarly preserved in Scripture (Pss 72; 127).

33 Solomon was skilled and learned in many areas. He was an astute observer of life and nature and from his careful observations was able to illustrate various facets of human nature and activity. God had granted Solomon great insight and a great thirst for knowledge.

34 The name Solomon soon became synonymous with a superior wisdom, so much so that kings of distant nations sent representatives to Jerusalem. This involved more than curiosity. It was a mark of respect and perhaps in many instances a desire to profit from his wisdom and learning (cf. ch. 10, which gives a concrete example in the visit of the queen of Sheba).

D. Solomon's Building Program (5:1–8:66)

1. Preparations for building the temple (5:1–18)

a. The league with Hiram of Tyre (5:1–12)

After he had firmly established himself and his administration, Solomon began laying the groundwork for carrying out what was perhaps the major achievement of his reign—building the temple and the palace complexes. The planning and oversight of the construction program of a project of such magnitude required considerable managerial skill, and Solomon demonstrated here again the unusual gifts granted him by God (cf. Da 1:30).

1 Hiram of Tyre, who had made peace with David and was his best friend, sent an embassy to extend his best wishes to Solomon on his accession to the throne. This king now offered Solomon a continuation of friendly relations.

2 Solomon responded in kind and in a preliminary to a trade agreement disclosed to Hiram his intentions with regard to the building project.

3 "You know" is a good indication that Hiram's relationship to David was more than one of peaceful coexistence or even of healthy commercial relations. David had let Hiram know what his intentions had been in regard to the building of the temple, a matter that had been very much on David's heart (2Sa 7:1–17; 1Ch 17:1–15). He felt it to be inappropriate that he should live in a fine palace when God's "house" was in reality a tent. Even after he was told that he would not be allowed to build the temple, he did all he could in the planning and preparation for the temple (1Ch 22; 29) to give Solomon as much help as possible.

4–5 God firmly established Solomon in the kingdom. There was peace within the kingdom, and there were no threats from the outside. The new king was prepared to carry out his father's wishes (cf. 1Ch 22:11–16; 28:9–21). Solomon could not help but be impressed by David's intensity and sense of purpose. He was very aware of his great responsibility, both toward God and toward his father. This is made quite clear by his quoting God's word to David.

6 Solomon asked Hiram for a trade agreement similar to the one that had existed between David and Hiram, but on a much larger scale (cf. 2Sa 5:11; 1Ch 22:4). The cedars of Lebanon were famed for their beauty and were greatly desired by rulers of Mesopotamia, Egypt, and Syro-Palestine for their building projects. Hiram's work force, skilled in felling and transporting timber, would be supplemented by labor sent by Solomon. The payment for goods and services was to be set by Hiram.

7 On receiving Solomon's message, Hiram acted enthusiastically. Solomon's request would initiate a major trade agreement beneficial to both parties.

8–9 Hiram agreed to Solomon's proposal and stated that he would be responsible for shipping the timbers by log rafts to the port that Solomon would designate. From that point they would be Solomon's responsibility. In return Solomon was to provide Hiram with provisions for his court.

10–11 There was an ample supply of timber for Solomon. In return he provided Hiram with wheat and olive oil, commodities not found in abundance in mountainous Phoenicia, whose economy was primarily based on an extensive shipping trade and export of timber.

12 The quality of wisdom is once again attributed to Solomon, seen here as a fulfillment of God's promise. The aspect of wisdom referred to is that of managerial and diplomatic prowess. Solomon in 1Ki 3 humbly recognized his deficiencies, and God granted him an abundant measure of wisdom so that he might be able to deal successfully with the various problems that might arise from his large undertaking.

b. The levy on the people (5:13–18)

13–14 The following verses give information on the labor force that Solomon raised to carry out the great task of gathering materials and then building the temple. The thirty thousand conscripted laborers were taken from all the tribes of Israel and sent in shifts of ten thousand to help the Phoenicians in the felling and transporting of the timbers from Lebanon. Each shift stayed one month at a time, so that each man worked for Solomon four months per year. The other eight months he worked on his own fields. This method of providing labor (called corvée) for large public projects was common in the ancient world but a fairly new innovation in Israel. In the list of David's officials, Adoniram is said to be over the forced labor. This would indicate that David used the corvée system to a limited degree, but nothing further is said about it. Solomon, however, used it extensively. The more splendid the royal court, the greater the demand on the people.

15–16 The 70,000 carriers and 80,000 stonecutters were non-Israelites (2Ch 2:17–18). They constituted a permanent "slave labor force" (1Ki 9:22), with the more onerous tasks to perform. The dressing of the stones was done by Israelite and Phoenician craftsmen. The stone was quarried in Israel, probably much of it in Jerusalem itself. The 3,300 foremen and overseers here were mostly Canaanites, with a smaller group of Israelites acting as higher supervisors.

17 The "large blocks of quality stone" for the foundation of the temple were squared off so that each stone would fit perfectly. According to 6:7 these large ashlar blocks were cut and squared at the quarry.

18 Other stones were prepared along with wood beams by skilled craftsmen, some from Israel, but most from Phoenicia. The city Gebal (Byblos) is particularly mentioned as providing a large part of these artisans. Again, according to 6:7, these men performed their craft at a place apart from the building site itself. This required careful planning and measuring and illustrates how well organized the whole program was and how skillfully the work was done.

2. The building of the temple (6:1–38)

a. Introduction (6:1)

The temple was in reality a permanent tabernacle as far as its symbolism and typology are concerned. It is basically the dwelling place of God with his people. There is a spiritual and symbolic continuity that transcends the structure itself. This is seen, for example, in the exchange between David and God in 2Sa 7, in which God is described as living among his people in a tent, moving with them from place to place. From God's perspective there is no essential difference, whether the house be a tent or a splendid structure of stone and cedar.

1 Solomon began the actual building of the temple in the fourth year of his reign. Since this event is linked to the Exodus of Israel from Egypt, this verse is one of the major pieces of internal evidence for the dating of the Exodus. The end of Solomon's reign is 931/930 B.C. This puts the beginning of his forty year reign at 971/970 and the fourth year at 967/966 and the date of the Exodus at 1447/1446. This date accords well with other biblical evidence (Jdg 11:26 and the length of the time of the Judges) as with external historical evidence.

The site of the building of the temple is not given here, but 2Ch 3:1 states that it was "on Mount Moriah, where the LORD had appeared to his father David. It was on the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite, the place provided by David." This was also the site of the (aborted) sacrifice of Isaac by Abraham (Ge 22:2). It lay on the rocky platform just to the north of the city of David on the eastern ridge of Jerusalem.

b. The outer structure (6:2–14)

2 Verses 2–10 give the general dimensions of the temple. These are inside measurements and do not include the thickness of the walls. The temple is here the main, central structure of the temple complex. Its dimensions were sixty cubits long by twenty wide by thirty high. (The cubit was approximately eighteen inches in length.) This was exactly twice the size of the tabernacle proper.

3 There was a portico (or porch, vestibule) attached to the front of the "main hall of the temple." It measured ten by twenty cubits, its long side going along the breadth of the temple proper.

4 The "clerestory windows" were probably on the side walls above the side chambers (cf. v.5). The exact nature of the windows is not known. Some have suggested slatted or latticed windows. Others suggest windows narrower outside than in.

5–6 Against the outside walls of the temple proper (main hall and inner sanctuary), Solomon built a three-tiered structure divided into an unspecified number of rooms (cf. Eze 41:5–11). Verse 10 gives the height of these rooms as five cubits each. At each level of the side rooms, the thickness of the wall was decreased by a half cubit on the outside wall and similarly on the inside wall so that the floor beam rested on the resulting offset ledge. Thus the width of each successive story increased by one cubit. By this means the beams had supports without being "inserted" or bonded into the inner temple wall. They were not structurally a part of the temple.

7 It is not necessary to see here a concession to the long-standing prohibition in Israel against using iron in the construction of the altar (Ex 20:25), since iron was indeed used at the quarries. It does indicate excellent organization and planning. The erection of the temple could go much faster and with far less confusion by utilizing precut and prefitted materials. In addition, the relative quiet would be consistent with the sacredness of the undertaking.

8 The entrance to the side room was on the right (south) side, probably in the middle. Access to the second and third levels is most often understood to have been by means of a spiral staircase that led through the middle story to the third floor.

9–10 Apart from the statement that the roof was constructed of beams and cedar planks, no details are given. The use to which the "side rooms" were put is not mentioned, but they were undoubtedly intended for storage.

11 According to 9:2, after the dedication of the temple, the Lord appeared to Solomon a second time (the first time being at Gibeon, ch. 3), referring to direct personal appearances of the Lord. In the present passage God evidently spoke to Solomon through a prophet.

12–13 These are encouraging words, putting God's blessing on the building of the temple. God was with Solomon in this massive undertaking, and he would recognize the temple as his dwelling place among his people. This promise takes in two aspects of the Davidic covenant. (1) God established for David a lasting dynasty and declared that his son Solomon would be the one to build the house for the Name of the Lord that David had desired to build. (2) Solomon, in order to experience the blessings of the Davidic covenant, had to exhibit the faith and obedience of David toward the Word of God. The same holds true for each generation of Israelites. Thus the temple in all its splendor and ritual is by itself not sufficient. God requires obedient hearts.

14 This concludes the exterior structure. The next verses describe the work done in the interior.

c. The inner structure (6:15–35)

15 When the exterior structure was complete, Solomon lined the interior walls with cedar planks from floor to ceiling. The floors were also covered with wood, in this case pine or fir. Whatever the exact identity of this wood, it was often used together with cedar. The two were highly regarded and became a symbol of luxuriousness and stateliness. It is evident that Solomon was sparing no expense in building the temple, using the finest and costliest materials available. His prayer in ch. 8 makes it clear that in doing this Solomon was giving expression to his sincere love for and devotion to God. Though God could not be enriched, Solomon was demonstrating in a practical way that nothing but the best is good enough for God.

16–18 The inner sanctuary or "Most Holy Place" was partitioned off from the main hall by cedar planks. The dimensions were twice those of the inner sanctuary of the tabernacle. This left forty cubits for the main hall, likewise twice as large as those of the Holy Place in the tabernacle. No stone was visible anywhere in the temple. Not only was everything lined with cedar, but the wood paneling was covered with fine, delicate carvings.

19 The inner sanctuary was the Most Holy Place or Holy of Holies because it housed the Ark of the Covenant, a symbol of the presence of God (cf. 1Sa 4:4; 2Sa 6:2). In Ex 25:21–22 God told Moses that he would meet with him there and give him all his commands for the Israelites. The top of the ark could be called "the mercy seat" or "atonement cover," in view of the annual sprinkling by the high priest of the blood of atonement. It was from between the cherubim that the glory of the Lord began his departure from the temple (Eze 10:4). Thus the ark in the Most Holy Place is the focal point of the temple and its ritual—not as an object of worship or superstitious awe, but as the place where God manifested his presence in his converse with his people.

20–22 This holy room was a perfect cube, overlaid in its entirety with gold, as was the cedar altar of incense. This altar was physically placed in the main hall or Holy Place directly before the entrance into the Most Holy Place (Ex 30:6), but functionally and symbolically it was associated with the Most Holy Place. Thus v.22 notes that it "belonged to the inner sanctuary" (cf. also Heb 9:4). By means of this altar, the priest could daily burn incense in the worship of God who was symbolically enthroned between the cherubim in the inner sanctuary.

Not only the inner sanctuary, but all the inside walls of the temple were overlaid with gold. The gold chains, stretched across the front of the inner sanctuary, served to strengthen the concept of the inaccessibility of this Most Holy Place.

23–28 Two cherubim made of olive wood and covered with gold were placed in the inner chamber. Each had a wingspan of ten cubits. They were so placed that they faced the door (2Ch 3:13). Thus their combined wingspan reached from one wall to the other. (By contrast, the two cherubim on the ark faced each other.) These composite figures (cf. Eze 1:4–14) represented the cherubim associated with the throne and government of God (Eze 1:22–28). They were also the guardians of the way to God (Ge 3:24). The impact to the beholder of these representations of the cherubim would be to impress on that person the awesomeness of God's holiness. Approaching God is not a light or frivolous matter and must be undertaken in the exact way he has prescribed—through the blood.

29–35 Doors of olive wood were made for the entry to the inner sanctuary and larger, double-leaved doors of pine or fir for the entry to the main hall. The jambs for both sets of doors were of olive wood. The doors as well as the walls (vv.20–22) and even the floors were covered with gold, with gold hammered into the carvings on the door. The covering of the floors with gold has often been scoffed at as being preposterous; yet it is in keeping with Solomon's desire to show forth in the temple, as much as humanly possible, the glory of God. It was his testimony to the greatness of God, and indeed the fame of this temple was spread far and wide so that honor and glory accrued to God as a result.

d. The court (6:36)

36 An inner court, called in 2Ch 4:9 the court of the priests, was built with three courses of dressed stone and then one layer of trimmed cedar beams (cf. Ezr 6:4). The author describes another court that enclosed the whole temple and palace complex (7:9–12).

e. Conclusion (6:37–38)

37–38 Seven years were required to complete the temple. An enormous amount of hours and a lavish expenditure of funds were involved. All the plans and specifications of David were carried out. It must have been a moment of great satisfaction to Solomon to see the fulfillment of his father's dream; and when God acknowledged the temple by filling it with his glory, Solomon's joy knew no bounds.

3. Solomon's other buildings (7:1–12)

1 It took Solomon almost twice as long to build his palace complex as to build the temple. This was due to the numerous public and private building units that were constructed, six of which are briefly described in this passage. Also, in the case of the temple, there had been extensive advanced planning and acquisition of materials. This was not the case with the palace. The temple and the palace were included in one large complex and were enclosed within one courtyard (v.12), perhaps to give visual expression to the fact that the king was to act on behalf of God. He himself was to walk in God's ways and, as shepherd of the people, lead them and direct them to God. As such, he was a type of Christ.

2–5 The Palace of the Forest of Lebanon was a separate building, so named because of its cedar construction. It was an imposing structure one hundred cubits long, fifty cubits wide, and thirty cubits high. Its exact function is not perfectly clear, though it is referred to in 10:17 as the repository of three hundred shields of gold (cf. Isa 22:8). This latter passage is in a context of warfare, so real weapons, not ceremonial shields, are involved. This indicates that the building was at least in part an armory.

6–7 The five building units described in vv.6–9 may have been part of one grand structure. The colonnade was a magnificent porticoed entry hall, through which one entered the Hall of Justice. There was a throne hall or royal audience chamber where the king personally heard complaints and meted out justice in cases that could not be handled by lesser officials (cf. 3:16–28). The layout of this throne room was most likely similar to that of contemporaneous throne rooms in Syria and Assyria. Usually the throne was placed at the end of the hall left of the entry. The throne itself is described in 10:18–20.

8 As to the private residence of Solomon as well as the one for Pharaoh's daughter, nothing is said except that they were similar in design and set away from the public building.

9–12 The stones used in the palace complex were high quality, precisely cut, and trimmed on both inner and outer faces. The foundation stones were large, measuring twelve to fifteen feet in length. Similar ashlar stones have been found above the foundations of the southern "palace" in Megiddo. The large outer court enclosed both the temple and the palace works of Solomon. The construction, three layers of stone and one of cedar beams, was the same as for the wall of the inner court. This typically Phoenician construction style is represented at Megiddo in the Solomonic gate as well as in the gate of the court to the southern palace.

4. The vessels of the temple (7:13–51)

a. Hiram the craftsman (7:13–14)

13–14 Hiram ("Huram"; so also in 2Ch 2:13; 4:11) was an outstanding master craftsman brought in from Tyre. He is obviously to be distinguished from the king of the same name. He was half Phoenician and half Israelite, his mother being from the tribe of Naphtali. He was skilled in bronze work; and 2Ch 2:14 adds that he was likewise skilled in working with gold, silver, iron, stone, wood, and various dyes and fine linen (cf. Ex 31:2–3; 35:30–31). Literally, Hiram was "filled with wisdom [GK 2683] and understanding [GK 9312] and knowledge [GK 1981] in doing every kind of bronze work." This illustrates the broad semantic range of the words "wisdom" and "understanding." Hiram's wisdom consisted in his practical skills. Solomon not only utilized the finest materials, but also spared no expense in hiring the finest workmen.

b. The two bronze pillars (7:15–22)

15 These two ornamented bronze pillars are the first of the objects made by Hiram for the temple. Every indication is that they were not structurally part of the temple but were freestanding. They were placed "at" or "near" the portico (v.21; cf. 2Ch 3:17). Numerous examples have been found of similar pairs of freestanding pillars in the ancient Near East. These pillars were quite large, eighteen cubits high with a circumference of twelve cubits. They were hollow, four fingerbreadths thick (Jer 52:21), and were cast in molds (v.46).

16–20 The "capitals," also bronze, were cast separately and were five cubits in length. They were bowl shaped (v.42; 2Ch 4:12–13) and were adorned with pomegranates, lily petals, and a network of interwoven chains.

21–22 The pillar placed on the right or south side of the entrance to the portico was named Jakin ("he established"). The other, on the left or north side, was named Boaz ("by him is he mighty"). These twin pillars may well have been a memorial in which David (the planner) and Solomon (the executor) give humble testimony to the grace of God in establishing for David a perpetual dynasty; the pillars also testified to the king's dependence on God for a successful reign. In practical terms the pillars were to be an ever-present reminder to each successive king of the fact that he was ruling by God's appointment and by his grace, and that in God lay his strength.

c. The bronze Sea (7:23–26)

23–26 The great Sea, made of cast bronze, was another marvelous example of the superb craftsmanship of Hiram. It was cast in one piece, including the lilylike rim and the two rows of gourds below the rim. The bronze bulls were cast separately, since they were later removed by Ahaz and replaced with a stone base (2Ki 16:17). The exact shape is not known.The Sea, together with the ten movable basins, served as the basin had in the tabernacle, for ceremonial cleansing. The Sea was used by the priests for their washing, while the basins were used for the rinsing of the burnt offerings (2Ch 4:6). The ceremonial stipulations for the priesthood with regard to the cleansing were intended to teach a truth that transcends mere ritualism, namely, that one who would approach God and serve him needs to be cleansed from the pollution of the world.

d. The ten bronze basins and their stands (7:27–39)

27–37 Ten mobile stands were constructed to carry the basins. They were four cubits square and three cubits high. There were lavishly engraved panels all around the stands, every available space being utilized in depicting cherubim, lions, and palm trees. The wheels were like chariot wheels. The word "handles" is probably better rendered "supports." The axles went through the bottom of these supports. These stands were mobile so that the basins could be moved to wherever they were needed.

38–39 The basins were also bronze, each holding forty baths (c. 230 gallons) and measuring four cubits (c. six feet). Though they were mobile, their normal placement was in the main hall of the temple, five on the right side and five on the left. Their purpose was to supply water for rinsing the burnt offerings (2Ch 4:6). The Sea was placed at the southeast corner of the temple (cf. Eze 47:1–2).

e. Summary of Hiram's bronze work (7:40–47)

40a The small bronze implements are listed, starting here. The basins are small vessels used for carrying away the ashes from the altar (cf. 2Ki 25:14; 2Ch 4:11). The shovels were for the actual removal of the ashes from the altar, and the sprinkling bowls were large bowls used at the altar of burnt offering, probably for catching blood.

40b–45 A summary of the items of bronze fashioned by Hiram begins at this point. Our account does not mention the bronze altar (2Ch 4:1).

46–47 The casting of the bronze was done in the lower Jordan Valley. Succoth was on the east side of the Jordan on the Jabbok River as it comes into the Jordan Valley. Zarethan is not as certainly located but is perhaps downstream on the Jabbok River, closer to the Jordan. This general area shows abundant evidence of having been an active center of metallurgy during the period of the Hebrew monarchy. There is an abundance of good clay; and with available wood for charcoal and a prevalent north wind, this area was an ideal center for metalsmiths.

The casting method used by Hiram was the lost-wax process, used from 2500 B.C. in Egypt until the Middle Ages. It is still often used for high quality sculptures. First a clay core is made, then covered with wax to the desired thickness. The wax is molded according to the intended design, then overlaid with specially prepared clay. The whole mold is then evenly baked for a period of time, possibly several days. During this time the wax is withdrawn through the outer mold through vents. Then molten bronze is poured into the same vents. Huge furnaces must have been used by Hiram, and great skill was required to ensure a uniform flow and distribution of molten metal and proper escape of gases. Only a master craftsman could have successfully carried out so huge an undertaking as was required here.

f. The furnishings of the temple (7:48–50)

48 A list of golden furnishings and implements begins here. On the golden altar, see comments on Ex 30:1–4. On the table of the bread of the Presence, see comments on Ex 25:23–30. The present passage does not mention the number of tables, but 2Ch 4:8 informs us that there were ten tables of the Presence. Later, in 2Ch 29:18, after Hezekiah had the temple purified, the priests reported to him that "the table for setting out the consecrated bread, with all its articles" had been purified. It would seem from these accounts that, though there were actually ten tables, they were often considered as a unit (one table in ten parts, so to speak), which they were as far as their function and symbolism were concerned.

49 On the golden lampstands, see comments on Ex 25:31–40. Here again, as with the table of the Presence, the one lampstand of the tabernacle became ten, yet so far as their function and symbolism were concerned, they were one unit. The symbolism of the earthly sanctuary as described in Heb 9 is based on the OT descriptions of the tabernacle, which served as the basic model for the temple.

50 It is noted that even the sockets of the doors of the Most Holy Place and of the main hall were of gold.

9. The treasures of the temple (7:51)

51 With the completion of the temple, Solomon brought into the treasury (possibly the side rooms of ch. 6) the great wealth of gifts David had dedicated to the Lord (1Ch 29). David had, in his great love for the Lord, given freely and gladly his "personal treasures of gold and silver for the temple" of his God, "over and above everything" he had provided for the temple (1Ch 29:3). His love for God and his great enthusiasm encouraged his officials to give in a commensurate way. David's infectious joy affected the whole nation. His praying in 1Ch 29:10–20 is a model that is difficult to surpass, of joyous thanksgiving for the privilege of being allowed to give to the Lord. His prayer that God might give Solomon the wholehearted devotion to keep God's commands and to build the temple had now been answered. One cannot help but feel that, just as David's officials caught the joy of giving, so did Solomon catch the enthusiasm of carrying out the great program of building the temple. This is an excellent illustration of one of the great principles of leadership.

5. The dedication of the temple (8:1–66)

a. Moving the ark and the tabernacle to the temple (8:1–11)

1–2 With the completion of the temple and with all the furniture in place, the crowning event was about to take place, the placement of the ark into its permanent home. For Israel it marked the beginning of a new era. Now, more than ever before, there was a feeling of permanence. The ark was no longer housed in a temporary shelter in Jerusalem; the dichotomy in the sanctuary, with the ark in Jerusalem and the tabernacle at Gibeon, was ended.

To mark this great occasion with the dignity and solemnity it deserved, Solomon assembled all the elders of Israel with the tribal and family chiefs. As God's anointed shepherd, he involved all Israel through its elders and chiefs in the moving of the ark and the dedication of the temple. This involved more than mere pomp and ceremony. Solomon was serious about the spiritual significance of this occasion; and he desired that the heart of all Israel be knit together in the dedication of the temple and, more important, in the dedication of their hearts to God.

The Feast of Booths was the last in the series of yearly feasts and was also known as the Feast of Ingathering. It was a harvest feast, but, more important, it celebrated the end of the desert wanderings and God's bringing his people home into the Promised Land (Dt 12:8–11). Zechariah 14:16–21 singles out this feast as mandatory for surviving Gentiles as well as redeemed Israel in the Messianic Age. This is consistent with the understanding that it celebrates the fulfillment of God's promise, the establishment of Israel in the land under God's Messiah.

For Solomon the completion of the temple symbolized the fulfillment of God's promise, not only to establish Israel, but also to live in their midst and be their God (cf. Rev 21:3). Without God's presence Israel's possession of the land would be an empty blessing (cf. Ex 33:12–16). It is God's presence that makes Israel uniquely blessed among all nations.

3–5 It was the priests who took up the ark in the prescribed manner. Before the ark was a great procession of the assembled chiefs and elders, led by Solomon. In keeping with the solemnity of the occasion, sheep and cattle were sacrificed in such numbers that no one could keep track. The participial form "sacrificing" indicates that the sacrifices were being made as the ark progressed the short distance from the city of David to the temple (cf. 2Sa 6:13). We should note that the Tent of Meeting (traditionally called the tabernacle) was also brought up. This was the original tent that had been at Gibeon. It, with its furnishings, was evidently stored somewhere in the temple.

6–8 The priests, who alone were permitted in the temple proper, placed the ark in its appointed place, under the outstretched wings of the golden cherubim, the representations of those highly exalted angelic beings associated with the throne of God and his rule (see 6:23–28). The ark was placed crosswise to the door, in a north-south alignment. The staves, which were extended lengthwise along the ark, were also aligned in the same direction, crosswise to the door. This accounts for the statement that the wings of the cherubim, which stretched north to south, overshadowed the ark and its staves. These staves, or carrying poles, were so long that the ends could only be seen if one were to look into the Most Holy Place from a place near the opening (i.e., the staves extended considerably beyond the doorway). The statement about the staves shows that Ex 25:15 was complied with, that the staves were not to be removed from the ark. Even though the ark was now in its permanent home, the staves remained in place, a reminder to God's people of their journeys in the desert. Though all the other furnishings had been newly made, the ark, representing the ruling presence of God, was still the same as that made while Israel was encamped at Sinai.

9 The ark had in it only the two stone tablets from Horeb, the witness of the covenant God had made with his people. It was for this reason that the ark was called the "ark of the covenant of the Lord" and also the "ark of the testimony." Here was the abiding witness to God's solemn purpose with regard to Israel, to make it a "kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Ex 19:6). It was also a sobering reminder to Israel of her responsibilities before God. With regard to this latter aspect of the ark of the testimony or witness, it must be remembered that were it not for the blood of the atonement, the ark must of necessity be a throne of holy and terrible judgment, for "there is no one righteous, not even one" (Ro 3:10). But by God's gracious provision, the ark became a throne of mercy for the one who by faith approached in God's appointed way. Thus while the ark was too holy for even the priests to touch, and while it spoke of the awesome holiness and majesty of a sovereign God, it became through the atoning blood a witness to the forgiving, protecting, and comforting presence of God for the believer.

10–11 When the priests had placed the ark in the Most Holy Place and had withdrawn, the cloud of the glory of God descended and filled the temple, just as had been the case at the inauguration of the tabernacle (Ex 40:34–35). God was thereby graciously acknowledging Solomon's handiwork and indicating his intention of dwelling with his people. The glory cloud was the visible manifestation of the presence of God. The concept of the manifested glory of God (sometimes called his "shekinah glory") is a pervasive and important theme in the OT and extends into the NT (see comments on Joel 3:20–21).

b. Solomon's address (8:12–21)

12–13 Solomon recognized the glory cloud for what it was and saw in it God's approval and promised presence. God said that he would "dwell [GK 8905] in a dark cloud." This is not his normal, regular habitation, but he manifested himself in this form for Israel's sake. Solomon's response to this gracious manifestation was that he had built a "magnificent [lit., princely; GK 2292] temple" for the Lord so that he might sit enthroned in regal splendor as befits his majesty. Solomon was under no illusions, as though God needed the temple for his own sake. But just as God is enthroned in heaven, so he has seen fit to use Solomon's temple as his throne on earth.

14 Solomon had been speaking to God. He now turned to the people and blessed them. As king and shepherd, Solomon was to be both the civil leader and the spiritual leader. Solomon, having been graciously put on the throne by God, having been allowed to carry out the great task of building the temple, and having experienced the entering of the glory cloud into the temple, blessed the people. He did so on God's authority, as the representative of the Lord.

15–21 The blessing takes the form of praise to God for fulfilling his promise to David (cf. 2Sa 7). What God has promised he has also carried out. The "hand" (GK 3338) is the biblical symbol for sovereignty. Two aspects are mentioned by Solomon: (1) God has raised up Solomon to sit on David's throne, as he had promised, and (2) God has allowed Solomon to build the temple. Since the Davidic covenant implied benefit to Israel through God-appointed leadership and ultimately the coming Messiah, God had clearly begun the fulfillment of the covenant; and Israel could expect to receive the bounty of God's blessings if the people walked in his ways.

c. Solomon's sevenfold prayer of dedication (8:22–53)

The theme of the prayer (vv.22–30). The theme of Solomon's dedicatory prayer is that as God had seen fit to honor his word up to that time, he would continue to do so in accepting the prayers of his people and in granting forgiveness. These prayers are seen as being directed to God through the temple. Solomon was praying, in effect, that God might always recognize the temple as the way for sinful people to approach a holy God.

22 Solomon stood before the whole assembly, on a bronze platform, three cubits high (2Ch 6:13). He stood facing the assembly with his hands outstretched in prayer, a common attitude in the ancient world (cf. Isa 1:15). Solomon stood as the representative and shepherd of his people, leading them in public worship and acting as intercessor. His prayer stands as one of the great public prayers of Scripture (cf. Ezr 9:5).

23–24 Solomon's opening great confession shows that he was greatly moved on this occasion. It was a day of fulfilled desires and prayers, a day in which God had graciously manifested himself in the glory cloud, a day of bright hope for Israel and the house of David in their covenant relationship with God. When Solomon extolled the greatness and uniqueness of the Lord, it was with a full and overflowing heart. What particularly moved Solomon was the faithfulness of God in carrying out his promise.In citing the faithfulness of God in maintaining his covenant and his love, Solomon did not lose sight of the human responsibility to respond to God and to love him wholeheartedly.

25 Solomon's confidence in praying was bolstered by previously answered prayer. A second ground of confidence was God's own promise. His servants had frequently claimed his promises when they prayed, and God honored these requests (cf. Ex 32:13; Da 9:1–18). In making this petition, Solomon recognized his own responsibility and tacitly rededicated himself to walking after God.

26 The major point, however, of these verses is a plea that God, who had so far been faithful in every way to his covenant with David (as evidenced in the completion of the temple and the rulership of Solomon), might always accept this temple and condescend to dwell there, receiving those who approach him by way of the temple.

27 Solomon made it clear that he was under no illusions as to the meaning of the temple, nor was it, properly speaking, a home for God. He acknowledged that it would be utterly impossible to build a house that could even begin to be commensurate with the majesty of the Lord. God does not need the temple, but the temple needs God! God does not need Israel, but Israel needs God!

28 Solomon realized that on the actual merits of the case, he would have no right to pray as he did, were it not for God's own promise given by his grace. The only claim Solomon had on the Lord was God's own word, freely given; but God's word is a bond that cannot be broken, so that Solomon was able to pray with assurance and confidence.

29 This verse forms the core of the entire prayer. God had condescended to allow a temple to be built for his name (5:5). He had by this means identified himself with his people. The temple provided a place of contact between human beings and God, a way for sinful people to approach a holy God, to have their sins forgiven, and to live in fellowship with him. Solomon prayed that God might continue to acknowledge the temple and the one who comes to him by way of the temple, as he had promised.

30 Solomon anticipated various situations in which a sinful people, suffering calamity because of God's judgment, would repent and pray. Solomon's earnest request was that God would not close his ears to repentant and believing prayer that was directed to God by way of the temple. God's own dwelling place, or place of enthronement, is in heaven. The temple, as the place on earth where his name is enthroned, is a type of the true heaven and at the same time the way of approach to God.

Seven specific requests (vv.31–53). The background to most of the various calamities described in the following verses is found in Lev 26 and Dt 28–30. Both passages begin with the description of the blessing that would be Israel's portion if God's people walked in his ways. The bulk of the material describes the curses in the form of various calamities that would befall the people if they did not obey God. Each calamity was designed to bring the people to repentance; but if they still would not repent, then worse would come. In both passages the final blow was exile from the Land of Promise. But in Lev 26:40–45 and Dt 30:1–10, God promised that when they were cast out of the land, if they would then take to heart what had befallen them and repent, God would listen to their prayer and restore them to the land.

31–32 Solomon's first request involves cases in which an oath was brought before the Lord in attesting to the truth of a claim (cf. Ex 22:11), cases in which there were no human witnesses (e.g., Ex 22:6–12; Lev 6:1–5). These had to do with damage or loss of property entrusted to another, dispute over whether a piece of property has been found by another, or when fraud of some sort has been perpetrated. Solomon prayed that when an oath was brought before the Lord in such a case, he would judge between the guilty and the innocent, judging the one and establishing the innocence of the other. Solomon's concern was not only for upholding justice, but perhaps chiefly for the sanctity of an oath brought before God, so that his holiness might not be taken lightly.

33–34 Solomon's second request involved prayer for forgiveness after a defeat by the enemy (cf. Lev 26:17; Dt 28:25). This defeat was caused by sin and the repeated refusal to listen to God's admonitions. It entailed subjugation by the enemy with considerable hardship and the taking of prisoners (not here a mass removal of population). The conditions of restoration are here given as (1) turning back to God (repenting), (2) confessing God's name (i.e., acknowledging his lordship), and (3) prayer in the temple. This last element implied a coming to God in the way prescribed by him. The answer looked for is the forgiveness of sin and restoration of the captives to the land.

35–36 Solomon's third request concerned the drought brought on the land by the sin of the people (cf. Lev 26:19; Dt 28:23). Israel's crops depended on good and well-timed fall and spring rains. The Canaanites thought that they would ensure for themselves fertility for their land and abundant rains by worshiping Baal, the supposed god of the storm. The Israelites were prone to emulate their neighbors in the licentious worship of this idol. As a consequence God did withhold rain (cf. chs. 17–18) so that his people might realize that the Lord alone is the provider of all blessing. This passage gives the same three conditions of restoration as v.33. Restoration involved answered prayer in the forgiveness of sin and the restoration of rain. In addition, Solomon prayed that God might teach Israel how to walk before him so that they might enjoy the fullness of God's blessing.

37–40 Solomon's fourth request dealt with famine, various kinds of plagues, and enemy incursions that brought about severe economic disruptions (cf. Lev 26:16, 19–26; Dt 28:22–23, 38, 59–61). The emphasis was on individual recognition and acknowledgment of sin. It put the stress on personal and individual responsibility before God; first, in each person recognizing his or her own guilt and responsibility; and, second, in turning to God in sincere prayer. The emphasis here was on the heart, i.e., the inner person, rather than on ritual alone. God, who knows the heart, would respond to a person's prayer in accordance with the reality of one's repentance. The object was that people would fear God.

41–43 Solomon's fifth request recognized God's wider purpose in his dealings with Israel, namely, that as Gentiles saw God working in and through Israel, they might desire to know Israel's God. Solomon prayed that as the foreigners approached God through the temple, God might hear them so that they too would truly come to fear God.

44–45 Solomon's sixth request involved situations where the people did not have access to the temple because they were in a foreign country. In this instance it involved soldiers sent to battle in distant places. Under these circumstances they were to pray to the Lord, toward the temple. It was not the temple per se that rendered prayer effective; it was the Lord who saw fit to dwell there who answered prayer.

46–51 Solomon's seventh request dealt with the last in the series of calamities God promised to bring on Israel if the people persisted in disobedience (Lev 26:27–39; Dt 28:45–68). But just as God provided hope for a repentant Israel in Lev 26:40–45 and Dt 30:1–10, so did Solomon, on the basis of these passages, pray that God would continue to show himself a faithful and forgiving God. A mass deportation of the nation as a whole, with resultant scattering through many nations, would normally spell the end of the nation. In Israel's case, however, God would use calamity and distress to bring the people to an awareness of their sin so that they would turn to God, receive forgiveness, and be restored. The conditions of restoration were clearly outlined: a change of heart, i.e., a repentant spirit that led to confession of their sin; a turning back to God with all their heart and soul; and a praying toward the land of their fathers and the temple (trusting in God's promise; cf. Da 6:10). For those who responded as indicated, there would be complete restoration and vindication. God, who loved his people enough and was strong enough to bring them out of the iron-smelting furnace of Egypt, would also bring about his full and sovereign purposes with his people.

52–53 Though throughout his prayer Solomon put great stress on the centrality of the temple, this was not for reasons of vainglory, as being his special accomplishment. His basic concern was for his people. God had singled them out from all nations to be his special inheritance, and he had delivered them from Egypt. May he continue to care for his people until his complete purpose is fulfilled!

d. Solomon's benediction (8:54–61)

54–56 As Solomon stood before the people to bless them, his heart was filled with praise; and once again he spoke of God's faithfulness in fulfilling all his promises. The key word here is "rest" (GK 4957), which has important soteriological connotations. In Dt 12:9–10 "rest" was described as Israel's living in security in the Land of Promise. In the following verses, Israel is told to bring her sacrifices to the place (temple) where God would cause his name to dwell. Then would the people rejoice before the Lord (Dt 9:12). There can be no doubt that Solomon saw the temple as the completion of the picture of rest as portrayed in Dt 12. Not only was Israel living in peace and security, enjoying the fruitfulness of the land, but God was formally dwelling in their midst. This made everything complete.

The rest enjoyed by Solomon and his generation was not complete, nor was it final. Psalm 95:7b–11 gives sad expression to the fact that Israel had not entered God's true rest because of unbelief and rebellion (see Heb 3:7–4:11).

57–61 Solomon here expresses a twofold wish with a twofold purpose: (1) May the Lord always be with us and never forsake us so that he may turn our hearts to him! (2) May the Lord always remember to uphold our cause so that all peoples may know that the Lord is God! The first speaks of a continued internal working of God to make his people conformable to his will. The second speaks of a continued external working of God to bring about a change in the Gentiles, that they too may come to a saving knowledge of God. These verses also illustrate the balance between God's work in the human heart and life on the one hand and man's responsibility on the other.

e. Solomon's dedicatory sacrifice (8:62–66)

62–63 All Israel joined Solomon in bringing sacrifices on this grand occasion. The large number was appropriate both to the occasion and to the number of people present to participate in the fellowship offerings. For these offerings the fat, blood, and entrails belonged to the Lord, while the flesh was eaten by the offerer. These offerings were brought over a period of fourteen days, since the normal period of seven days for the Feast of Tabernacles was extended by another seven days. The fellowship offering was a voluntary act of worship and was intended to testify to the fellowship between God and the one whose sins had been forgiven. After those portions belonging to God had been offered, a communal or fellowship meal was held for the offerer and his family and for the Levites.

64–66 To accommodate the large numbers of sacrifices, the whole middle part of the court in front of the temple was consecrated. The large number of sacrifices and the involvement of the people attest to the unity of purpose and the wholeheartedness of the devotion of people and king.

The Feast of Booths was in itself a grand occasion for rejoicing and for an enhanced spirit of community among all Israelites. The dedication of the temple made this occasion all the more joyful and memorable, and the time of celebration was suitably extended. When the people left, they went home rejoicing and with a great feeling of satisfaction in the realization that God's blessing was on the king and on the nation as a whole. This was indeed a memorable and significant occasion.

E. The Activities of the Solomonic Era (9:1–11:43)

1. The Lord's second appearance to Solomon (9:1–9)

1–2 God had already signally honored Solomon by appearing to him at Gibeon. Now once again God appeared to him to encourage him to remain faithful and to walk in God's ways. This made Solomon's later declension all the more reprehensible (cf. 11:9–10). The time of this appearance was after the completion of Solomon's major building projects—the temple and palace complexes. Though it might seem strange that the Lord waited thirteen years after Solomon's prayer of dedication to reply, there are three considerations that make this entirely feasible.

(1) God did indeed respond immediately to Solomon's prayer. The Chronicler records the consuming of the sacrifices by fire sent from heaven immediately after Solomon's prayer, followed by the filling of the temple once again with the glory cloud (2Ch 7:1–7). This must certainly be considered as both an answer from God and a clear endorsement of the temple and of Solomon's dedicatory prayer. At this point no other answer was really necessary.

(2) There is no reason why there could not have been an unreported message through a prophet. This would have gone unrecorded because of the much more momentous appearance of God himself with essentially the same message. The recording of this appearance was important because of 11:9–10.

(3) The final consideration seeks to provide an answer to the question of the reason for the Lord's appearance to Solomon at this point in time if it was not in direct response to his dedicatory prayer. The answer may be that Solomon had come to a spiritual crossroads. It is significant that the year in which he completed the palace (his twenty-fourth year, twenty years after he began the temple) is mentioned three times (7:1; 9:1, 10). Apart from the notations on the year that he began building (6:1) and finished building the temple (6:38), this is the only event linked to his regnal calendar.

A second matter that points to a crossroads at this time is the remark in 11:4, that as Solomon grew older he began to follow after other gods, despite God's two appearances to him (11:9). This declension obviously began after his twenty-fourth year, since God did not condemn him in ch. 9. It was certainly a gradual thing that began in the heart and only slowly began to appear openly. It would be in keeping with the character of God to speak forcefully and urgently to Solomon, warning him against turning from his walk with God (cf. vv.6–9).

3 God acknowledged the temple, consecrating it by putting his name there. Neither the ritual nor the splendor of the building made it the dwelling place of God. Rather, it was God's sovereign and gracious choice to dwell among his people and to acknowledge them as his own. Solomon had asked (8:29) that God's eyes might be on the temple. God replied that not only his eyes but also his heart would be there. The following verses state the conditions.

4–5 These words reiterate the responsibilities of those who would come after David. Again it is emphasized that more than ritual observances were in view. It was the integrity of the heart that he demanded. Unfortunately, this was where Solomon failed later in life. It was not that he rejected God, but that his heart became divided in his loyalties (11:4) so that the passion for God that characterized his father and Solomon himself in his younger years was no longer there.

6–9 These verses give dire warning as to the disastrous consequences that resulted from apostasy. Solomon's history (ch. 11) shows that this warning was needed, particularly at this time in his life. This appearance of God was an act of grace and was intended as an urgent reminder to Solomon to guard his heart. A second thing to note here is that the consequences of disobedience were far-reaching. As kings, Solomon and his successors were responsible for the whole nation. Failure on the king's part affected all the people. Israel's subsequent history amply illustrates this principle. As the king went, so went the people.

There are two interrelated consequences that would result from disobedience. One was the exile of the people; the other was God's rejection of the temple, leading to its destruction. This state of affairs would lead in turn to a twofold reaction on the part of Gentile observers: (1) ridicule of Israel, and (2) questions as to the reasons for such a disaster.

Verses 8–9 describe the lesson to be learned from this by the Gentiles as they asked one another why this destruction had come about. The destroyed temple would become an object lesson in disobedience. In the answer given as to the reason for this destruction—namely, that it is because Israel has forsaken God and turned to idols—there is implied amazement that a people could be so foolish as to reject the God who had taken them out of bondage and made them into a great nation, proving himself in the process with great and mighty deeds.

2. The business relation between Solomon and Hiram (9:10–14)

10–14 This paragraph relates a business transaction between Solomon and Hiram involving the transfer of twenty border towns. These towns were in Galilee in the western part of the territory of Asher. They lay generally east and southeast of the city of Acco. In the arrangements made in ch. 5, Solomon traded wheat and oil for timber. Hiram also sent 120 talents of gold (equivalent to about four and one-half tons) to Solomon. Apparently more payment was required than what Solomon could provide in grain and oil; so he ceded these border towns. Hiram, after inspecting the area, was not happy with the towns and, according to 2Ch 8:2, returned them to Solomon (presumably in favor of payment of a different kind), who then rebuilt the towns and settled Israelites in them.

3. The levy of forced labor and urban development (9:15–24)

15 "Supporting terraces" is traditionally and generally known by the name "Millo" (basically a transliteration from the Hebrew). The most widely held view is that this consisted of architectural terracing and buttressing along the northeastern slope of the east hill of Jerusalem, the city of David. Such buttressing would have filled a considerable depression between the city of David and the temple and palace complex to the north. The purpose would have been to allow the construction of more buildings in the area and, perhaps more important, adequate fortifications as near to the water supply as possible. Its construction was a major undertaking (cf. 11:27), ranking in importance with the fortification projects of Jerusalem, Hazor, Megiddo, and Gezer.

In addition to the expanding and strengthening of Jerusalem, three key cities were selected for rebuilding (Gezer) or for enlargement and strengthening of fortifications (Hazor and Megiddo). Recent work has demonstrated that these three cities had certain characteristics in common with regard to their fortifications attributable to the Solomonic era. Noteworthy are distinctive casemate walls with the outer wall measuring five feet and the inner wall four feet thick. The interior chambers are seven feet wide (similar walls from this era have been found in numerous cities throughout Israel).

Most distinctive are the gate complexes, which are identical in plan and virtually of the same dimensions in all three cities. These gates feature a four-entry, six-chamber inner gate, with twin towers at the first entry. Most of the gate extends inward from the casemate wall, with only the twin towers extending out from the wall. At both Megiddo and Gezer an outer double-entry gate has been found.

Hazor was strategically placed in the north (c. three miles north of the Sea of Galilee), being situated at the juncture of the two major highways approaching from the north. It became Israel's chief bulwark against northern invaders until it was destroyed in the eighth century by Tiglath-pileser III.

Megiddo was the great fortress that controlled one of the major passes from the Plain of Sharon on the coast into the Valley of Jezreel through the Carmel range. It figures in prophecy as the staging area for the last great battle (Armageddon) in which Christ will defeat the forces of the Antichrist.

16 Gezer, on the road from Joppa to Jerusalem, had been a powerful Canaanite city. Though it was included in the tribal territory of Ephraim, it was not occupied by the Israelites until the time of Solomon. Then it was given to Solomon as a wedding gift by Pharaoh to his daughter. He had burned the city and killed its inhabitants, giving it to Solomon to rebuild and inhabit with Israelites.

17 Upper and Lower Beth Horon were strategically placed, controlling the access to the highlands of Judea from the coastal plain through the Valley of Aijalon. The lower city, being about one and one-half miles farther west, was fortified by Solomon to guard against enemy approach from its vulnerable western side.

18 Baalath was the designation of several cities in Canaan. The one in question here is most likely the city also known as Kiriath Jearim, where the ark was kept for some time after its return from the Philistines. This assumes that the names Baalath and Baalah (by which name Kiriath Jearim was also known) are interchangeable. This would then be a fortress guarding another of the western approaches to Jerusalem.

19 Solomon built up an extensive network of supply centers and towns to house his chariotry. These places are not specified but certainly included the cities just mentioned in addition to other strategic locations throughout the kingdom. Though he was a man of peace, Solomon was well prepared militarily to defend his kingdom.

20–23 On the forced labor or corvée, see comments on 4:6 and 5:13–18.

24 On Pharaoh's daughter, see comment on 3:1. Since the work on the Millo (or "supporting terraces"; cf. v.15) was not begun until after the queen had been moved, likely the Millo had to be located near or in the city of David and the construction activities would have been at or near the site of her temporary home. It also appears likely that existing structures may have been razed to allow the construction over a large area of this buttressing work.

4. Solomon's religious activities (9:25)

25 This note is added to show that once the temple had been built, Solomon's practice of sacrificing at the various high places (3:2–4) ceased. Presumably the people followed him in this. As king he led the people, as on the day of dedication, in bringing before the Lord the burnt offerings and fellowship offerings on the three great feast days.

5. Solomon's commercial activities (9:26–28)

26–27 A completely new approach to international trade began here as far as Israel was concerned. Phoenicia was the major shipping power in the Mediterranean, while Israel controlled the major inland trade routes in the Levant. With Israel newly exercising control of the Negev as far as the Gulf of Aqaba, new possibilities opened up. Solomon made a treaty with Hiram of Tyre that was apparently mutually attractive. Both kings would be able to conduct extensive trade throughout the Red Sea area. In this venture Hiram supplied the seamen and shipping and shipbuilding skills, and Solomon gave Tyre access to the Red Sea and probably undertook a major share of the financing.

28 Ophir was fabled for its fine gold (Job 22:24) and as a center for the obtaining of exotic goods. It provided a rich source of revenue for Solomon and Hiram. Its location is still debated.

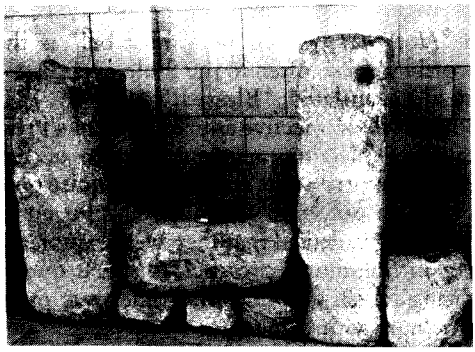
6. Solomon and the queen of Sheba (10:1–13)

The visit of the queen of Sheba is a graphic illustration of the fame of Solomon and of the awe that the reports of his wisdom and splendor inspired. The many legends and highly embellished accounts that have grown around this visit among Arabs, Jews, and Abyssinians attest to the widespread knowledge of the event and to the interest it created.

1 Sheba was in southwest Arabia, present-day Yemen. It is the best-watered and most fertile area of Arabia. By employing an extensive irrigation system, it developed a strong agricultural economy. But its chief strength lay in its being a center of trade. Its location kept it fairly secure from the power struggles in the Fertile Crescent and at the same time enabled it to be a convenient trade depot for traffic involving Africa, India, and the Mediterranean countries. It was famous for its trade in perfumes, incense, gold, and precious stones.

Solomon's fame reached the queen, probably through the caravan traders that regularly passed through Israel on their way to Damascus or to Gaza. His fame was associated with the name of the Lord. It was well known that he was an enthusiastic and faithful servant of the Lord and that he humbly attributed his wisdom and success to the

The upper picture is a model of Megiddo on location, showing what scholars for many years believed were Solomon's stables (more recent study suggests that the stables were from the time of Ahab, though Solomon's stables may be located underneath Ahab's. The picture to the right shows a portion of a Megiddo stable with a manger or feeding trough for the horses (located in Rockerfeller Museum).



Lord. Possibly the real reason for the queen's going to Solomon was for purposes of making trade agreements, but this is not stated. Undoubtedly business was transacted under the polite fiction of an exchange of gifts. Our passage makes it clear, however, that she did come to see for herself whether the glowing reports had been exaggerated or not.

"Hard questions" (GK 2648) is generally translated "riddles," which were enigmatic sayings or questions that cloaked a deeper philosophical, practical, or theological truth. They were a favorite sport and a way to test one's mettle. No doubt the "hard questions" posed by the queen were not mere frivolous tests of mental quickness but a genuine seeking for truths hidden in some of the enigmatic sayings known to her.

2 The queen came with a large caravan of camels carrying the trade goods for which Sheba was noted. Spices (Arabian balm) were native to South Arabia and were thus perhaps the most valued item in the whole inventory. Though v.10 mentions 120 talents of gold and many precious stones, the spices are singled out for special comment. Never again were so many spices brought in as on that occasion. When she arrived, she put before Solomon all the questions on her mind.

3–5 Solomon's wisdom was not exaggerated. The queen was not disappointed in his ability nor in the wisdom he displayed. Not only his wisdom, but the splendor of his court and the manner of the temple ceremonies overwhelmed her. She was totally undone.

6–7 The queen had thought the reports about Solomon to be exaggerated, that no person could be as great as he was reputed to be. Yet now she freely confessed that his fame had not even begun to do him justice.

8 "How happy your men must be!" is the word found so often in the Psalms (cf. Ps 1:1 et al.) translated "Blessed!" (GK 897). It stresses the subjective appreciation of a great favor or blessing, an experience to be enjoyed, savored to its fullness. It is quite possible that Solomon's servants had begun to take for granted all that they were experiencing in Solomon's presence. But the queen, seeing all this for the first time, was overwhelmed with wonder.

9 A wise and good king is a blessing to his people, and God's choice of Solomon as king was a mark of his love and favor for Israel.

10–12 On v.10, see comments on v.2. The wealth of precious materials brought to Solomon from Sheba caused the writer to insert at this point the mention in particular of a very precious wood that was imported in unheard of quantities (just as with the spice or balsam that had just come from Sheba). The identity of this almugwood is not known today. Traditionally it has been thought to be a type of sandalwood, but there is no certainty on the matter. Solomon used it for "supports" (steps?) in the temple and his palace and for musical instruments.

13 Solomon gave the queen all she asked for (in trade for the items she had brought?). In addition he bestowed lavish gifts on her in keeping with his majesty.

7. The wonders of the Solomonic era (10:14–29)

14–15 The 666 talents (twenty-five tons) represent Solomon's yearly income in gold from all sources, including commerce and taxes. In addition there was an unspecified amount of income from tolls or tariffs from the various merchants and business agents that traveled through the land, as well as tribute from conquered kings. The "Arabian kings" were tribal chiefs of miscellaneous peoples living in the desert to the south and to the east. The governors were probably the district governors (4:7–19).

16–17 These verses describe the ceremonial shields that Solomon kept in the Palace of the Forest of Lebanon. They were wood or basket-work, covered with gold plate instead of leather. The large shield was either oval or rectangular to cover the whole body. The small shield was carried by archers (2Ch 14:8). The weights per shield were about seven and one-half and three and three-fourths pounds respectively.

18–21 The ivory throne, overlaid with finest gold, was a large and imposing object, in keeping with the symbolism of the seat of justice and rulership of a great kingdom. The armrests were flanked by lions, as were each of the six steps. Verse 21 well illustrates the wealth of Solomon's kingdom.

22 The "trading ships" (lit., "ships of Tarshish") most likely were large merchant ships designed to carry ore. They were seaworthy enough to travel long distances under difficult weather conditions. These ships came to be used for other types of cargo as well. It is likely that refined metals were shipped out of Ezion-geber in return for the exotic items listed in our passage (cf. Eze 27:12).

23–25 To the statement in 4:29–34 extolling the breadth of wisdom and knowledge of Solomon, this passage adds, first, that he was wealthier than any king on earth and, second, that "the whole world sought audience with Solomon to hear the wisdom God had put in his heart." This is in accordance with God's promise of 3:13.

26 This passage brings to mind the three prohibitions of Dt 17:16–17 for the anticipated kings—he must not acquire many horses, take numerous wives, or amass for himself great amounts of gold and silver. For his failure regarding the second prohibition, Solomon is taken to task in ch. 11. He is not taken to task, however, for the other two prohibitions. In the matter of horses, there seem to be two concerns: (1) the false reliance on chariotry (the most potent weaponry of the day) as a means of preserving and/or expanding the kingdom, and (2) making some of the Israelites go back to Egypt for the horses (cf. Isa 31:1–3).

On amassing personal wealth, one must remember that wealth was one of the bonuses God had promised Solomon (3:13). It was God's gift, and he should not be criticized for it. No doubt the prohibition in Deuteronomy has to do with motivation and priorities, in which personal gain is the issue.

27 That which is considered a "precious" metal, silver, became a "common" metal because of its abundance. Cedar, which had to be imported from Lebanon, became as common (in buildings) as the indigenous sycamore-fig trees.

28–29 Solomon not only acquired chariots and horses, he became a trader in these items. They were imported from Kue (probably Cilicia) and Egypt. The Cilicians had been known for some time as breeders of fine horses. Solomon's agents were active in seeking out the best horses and values available.

8. Solomon's many wives (11:1–13)

Considering the grand heights of Solomon's spiritual fervor and the great wisdom granted him by God, it seems impossible that he could have been so foolish as to succumb to idolatry. Yet it did happen, not overnight, but by slow degrees. First it was tolerated in his household. Once he became accustomed to it and comfortable with it, he also began to participate in idolatry with his wives. Solomon never renounced the Lord, but his heart was not entirely devoted to the Lord either. The syncretism that he began to display was a curse that plagued Israel through the years and ultimately led to the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple and to the exile of the people. Solomon's life stands as a solemn warning against ungodly alliances and relationships that can only destroy the believer's spiritual vitality (cf. Ne 13:26).

1–3 Solomon was a great man, but he had feet of clay. He was spiritually unable to survive his disobedience to God's prohibition in Dt 17:16–17 on taking more than one wife (see 10:26–29). In the Pentateuch God frequently warned Israel against intermingling and intermarrying with the Canaanites. Part of the reason was the extreme moral degeneracy of the Canaanites. Intermarriage inevitably led to toleration and finally observance of Canaanite religious practices (Ex 34:12–17; Dt 7:1–5). Another danger was that there was great similarity in some of the religious terminology; and though the theology behind the terms was radically different, it was very easy to adopt by degrees a comfortable syncretism and ultimately to forget the Lord and to serve idols.

If anyone should take these warnings seriously, it should be the king, who should lead by example. Yet Solomon apparently considered himself above the law and paid a bitter price. Though some of his many marriages may originally have been entered into for the cementing of diplomatic alliances and others merely for the purpose of increasing the royal harem to add to the splendor of the king, vv.1–2 point out that Solomon "loved" many foreign women and that he "held fast to them in love." This speaks of strong emotional attachment, which is normal and desirable in a husband. But because Solomon was attached to the wrong women, he was led astray. The seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines, though they added to the splendor of Solomon's kingdom, were his downfall.

4 As Solomon grew older, his resistance wore down, and he became increasingly vulnerable. His service to the Lord became more and more perfunctory. The writer here measures his love for the Lord by the standards of David, who, with all his faults, loved God with a passion throughout his lifetime.

5–8 "Ashtoreth" is a deliberate distortion of Ashtart, the Canaanite fertility goddess. The revocalization is based on the word for "shame." "Molech" (or "Milcom," as the text reads here) is a deliberate distortion of the word for "king." In not only allowing these practices in his own household but participating in them to some degree, Solomon sinned grievously against the Lord. Apparently Solomon showed no favoritism but treated all the gods alike, even to the honoring of "Chemosh," the Moabite equivalent of the Ammonite Molech or Milcom.

9–10 Solomon's sin was all the greater because of the special privileges he had enjoyed. God had singled Solomon out by appearing to him twice (see comments on 9:1–2). Solomon lacked neither proof nor evidence of God's love and power. He had abundantly tasted God's love (1) by being chosen, contrary to custom and expectation, as David's successor; (2) in being given the special, personal name "Jedidiah" (i.e., "loved by the Lord"); (3) in receiving every benefit imaginable; and (4) in being visited by God twice for encouragement and admonition. He had also abundantly seen the power of God in that (1) he was put on the throne in the face of the power and influence of Adonijah's followers (Joab in particular), (2) he was granted unchallenged power and prestige as king, and (3) he was given success in his endeavors beyond all expectation. This should have created in Solomon a lifelong love and devotion of the deepest kind.

11–13 The second special privilege that was Solomon's was his relationship to David and the covenant God had made with him. He had not earned it; he was born into it. He had also been thoroughly instructed and trained by David (and possibly Nathan) in preparation for the high calling that was his (see comment on 2:2). As much as he could, David had poured into him his own love and passion for the Lord and his dreams for the house that would reflect the glory of the Lord. Solomon threw aside all these privileges when he followed after idols. He frittered away the continued joy and fellowship with God that could have been his for life. The punishment would be in accordance with the terms of the covenant with David. Yet even there God exercised mercy for David's sake. The kingdom was not taken from Solomon during his lifetime, nor was the kingdom to be totally removed from the line of David. God would keep the tribe of Judah for the descendants of David to rule and would eventually fulfill all his promises to David.

9. Solomon's adversaries (11:14–40)

a. Hadad the Edomite (11:14–22)

14–22 Hadad was the first of three men raised up by God to be adversaries against Solomon. It appears that as Solomon's reign drew to a close, these three men became increasingly worrisome to him. Hadad was of Edom's royal family, the only survivor of a severe slaughter when David's army under Abishai, son of Zeruiah, defeated the Edomites with a slaughter of eighteen thousand men (2Sa 8:13–14; 1Ch 18:12–13). This slaughter seems to have taken place over a period of six months when for some unknown reason Joab sought to destroy the Edomite army. Hadad managed to escape and found his way to Egypt with a number of servants. There he was given Pharaoh's sister-in-law as his wife. He continued in Pharaoh's favor, and Hadad's son was raised with the royal household. Hadad, however, continued to harbor strong bitterness against Israel; and the moment the news came that David and Joab had died, Hadad returned to Edom. There, in some unspecified way, he created trouble for Solomon, presumably not being very effective until Solomon's later years.

b. Rezon of Damascus (11:23–25)

23–25 The second adversary was Rezon, who had served under Hadadezer, king of Zobah. After David defeated Hadadezer (2Sa 8:3–9), Rezon, who had escaped, formed a group of raiders and bandits who ultimately gained control of Damascus. Since David had thoroughly defeated Zobah and Damascus, put garrisons in the latter city (2Sa 8:6), and reduced it to a tributary, it seems likely that Rezon's seizing of Damascus did not take place until later in Solomon's reign. At some point, probably after he had finished his palace, Solomon defeated Zobah and Hamath and went as far as Tadmor, making it a fortified outpost. Thus it is unlikely that Rezon made his move into Damascus until Solomon's declining years. However that may be, he was Solomon's troublemaker in the north while Hadad caused problems in the south.

c. Jeroboam (11:26–40)

26–28 The third and by far most serious problem for Solomon in his latter years was Jeroboam, an Ephraimite of considerable ability and energy. The story of his rebellion, or "lifting his hand against the king," starts with v.27. He was part of the Ephraimite labor force working on the Millo (see 9:15) and filling in a breach in the wall of the city of David. Jeroboam did his work so well that he attracted Solomon's attention and was put in charge of the contingent from Ephraim and Manasseh. He was evidently a charismatic leader.

29–32 About this time, while still overseeing this construction project (which took place sometime after Solomon's twenty-fourth year [9:10–15]), Jeroboam met Ahijah the prophet from Shiloh. This of course was a planned meeting on Ahijah's part. When they were alone in the open country, Ahijah symbolically told Jeroboam what God's plans were for him and Solomon. He tore his own new cloak into twelve pieces, told Jeroboam to take ten, and then explained the meaning of the prophecy.

33–36 On vv.33–35, see comments on vv.7–13. With the words "that David my servant may always have a lamp before me in Jerusalem" (v.36), God expressed the unconditional aspect of the Davidic covenant: He would at some future time reestablish the throne of David in full glory—in the person of the Messiah, the Anointed One. The symbolism is striking and beautiful. Not only would the line of David be perpetuated just as a light is kept burning, but this light was in Jerusalem, the city where God chose to put his name. There was in view, then, a future for God's city, Jerusalem.

37–38 God gave Jeroboam the grand opportunity of establishing a lasting dynasty. The conditions were the same as those imposed on the sons of David. The standard of the godly walk is once again David. Unfortunately, though Jeroboam was extremely able, he was an unworthy man. He proved to be an ambitious and greedy opportunist. Chapter 12 shows that he had the ability of playing on people's emotions to achieve his ends. All his subsequent actions demonstrate the mentality of a man who was determined to achieve his own ends, ignoring God and his ways in the process.

39 Here is both a reaffirmation of the enduring nature of God's promise to David and a clear statement to Jeroboam and his successors that the house of David would win in the end. Starting with Rehoboam's loss, first, of the ten tribes, then the deprivations of Shishak (ch. 14), Judah became both the smaller and generally the weaker kingdom. It was indeed a shock for Rehoboam and the tribe of Judah to be reduced overnight from the most powerful tribe in an illustrious and world-renowned kingdom to a small state that was soon stripped of what wealth it had left. But God said that it would not always be thus. There seems to be an implication here that in the future the tribes would all once again be under the leadership of Judah.

40 At some point after the prophecy of Ahijah, the attempt at rebellion spoken of in v.26 took place. No details are given. Presumably, Jeroboam was busily fanning the flames of dissatisfaction on the part of the northern tribes with the leadership of the house of David and, in particular, the oppressive requirements imposed on them to maintain the splendid style of Solomon's government. There is a contrast here between Jeroboam and David, both of whom became kings after a disobedient king. David waited on God, but Jeroboam took matters into his own hands. Solomon, also, was disappointing. Rather than bowing humbly before the will of God as David had done under God's chastening hand, Solomon reacted in the manner of Saul, causing Jeroboam to flee into exile.

10. Solomon's death (11:41–43)

41–43 The royal annals of Solomon contained a far more complete record of the events surrounding his administration, but the account recorded in Scripture is God's inspired message, given for the instruction and benefit of the reader. Solomon left a big mark in history. His memory and fame live on. He represents the first stage in the fulfillment of the Davidic covenant; and, despite his faults, he foreshadows the coming Christ, the true Son of David. In addition, his inspired words of wisdom as recorded in Scripture have challenged, taught, and inspired people throughout the ages

II. The Divided Kingdom (1Ki 12:1–2Ki 17:41)

A. The Division and Early Kings (12:1–16:14)

1. The accession of Rehoboam and secession of the ten tribes (12:1–24)

1–2 "All the Israelites" manifestly refers to the representatives of the northern tribes. The basic differences between the northern and southern tribes had never been fully resolved even in the strong administrative periods of David and Solomon. That Rehoboam consented to go to Shechem for the inaugural ceremonies underscores the critical nature of the times and the insecurity of his position on the throne.

Jeroboam, mindful of his previous anointing (cf. 11:26–40) and confident that the time was ripe for him to make a move toward securing the throne, returned to lend his weight to the negotiations. Perhaps the ten tribes had actually gathered at Shechem expressly to make Jeroboam their king.

3–5 Jeroboam was well received by the delegation and accompanied them to the meeting with Rehoboam, where their demands for social reform were voiced. Particularly burdensome were the corvée, or compulsory service (over which, interestingly enough, Jeroboam had been appointed by Solomon [see 11:28; see also comments on 4:6; 6:14]), and the taxation that Rehoboam's father levied on the land. Both lay on the people like a heavy yoke. After hearing the northern tribes' demands, Rehoboam obtained a three-day period for considering the terms of their requests.

6–11 Calling in the elder counselors who had served through the difficult Solomonic years, Rehoboam was advised to grant the demands of the northern tribes so as to gain their loyalty. Next Rehoboam turned to his own contemporaries for advice. This group may have served as an administrative advisory body, perhaps concerned with national preparedness. The young men gave Rehoboam the counsel he wished to hear. They advised him to follow a harsh line. Was Solomon too hard on them? He would be tougher. His little finger would be thicker than Solomon's loins!

12–15 When the northern delegation returned on the prescribed day, Rehoboam followed the advice of the younger men implicitly, delivering the harsh ultimatum. The author of Kings interrupts the narrative to point out that the decision of Rehoboam and his counselors was in accordance with a turn of affairs arranged by God's sovereign disposition, as prophesied previously by Ahijah (cf. 2Ch 10:15).

16–17 After Rehoboam's unfavorable reply to their request, the delegation delivered its formal note of secession. That the delegates were prepared for the worst seems obvious from their carefully composed poetic reply. The reply itself is drawn largely from the traitorous words of Sheba, who led an unsuccessful rebellion in the days of David (2Sa 20). The long-standing jealousy between the tribes, coupled with the hostility of the northern tribes to the Davidic covenant (2Sa 7), comes to the surface in all its ugliness and fateful consequences. Consequently, the kingdom became divided. Rehoboam retained the rule only over Judah and Benjamin, which Rehoboam's forces managed to occupy as a much needed buffer zone between Jerusalem and the north.

18–24 Rehoboam quickly tested the decision of the delegates by sending Adoniram, his chief tax collector, to gather the taxes; he gathered only stones for his effort. With Adoniram dead and the people gathered into a bitter mob, Rehoboam fled for his life. There remained only the formal invitation to Jeroboam to become king of the northern tribes, followed by the coronation ceremony before the assembled multitude. The schism was complete and was to be permanent, despite a long period of incessant warfare between the two states. Having failed to acquire the north's willing subservience, Rehoboam decided on an outright invasion of the new kingdom; thus he gathered a large army (cf.

2Ch 11:1–4). However, Shemaiah the prophet warned Rehoboam not to attempt to undo what God had decreed; Rehoboam wisely abandoned the attack.

2. The reign of Jeroboam in the northern kingdom (12:25–14:20)

a. The condemnation of Jeroboam's religion (12:25–13:34)

25–30 Jeroboam's plans for the administration of the new kingdom are now detailed. It was imperative that he act wisely, lest the people become dissatisfied and return their allegiance to Rehoboam. No doubt much of the administrative machinery (minus the hated corvée established by David and Solomon) was utilized. His years serving Solomon in a responsible position probably aided Jeroboam's leadership in this area. Shechem was refurbished and made the capital. Peniel received his attention also and may have served subsequently as an alternate royal residence.

The people, however, had to be cared for not only administratively but also religiously. Here Jeroboam miscalculated and substituted human wisdom for divine direction. Although God may have allowed the kingdom to be divided politically, he intended no theological schism. Fearing that a continued adherence to the established faith with its center of worship in Jerusalem might bring about a return to the south in the people's affection, Jeroboam established an alternate and more convenient religious experience. Rather than making the long trip to Jerusalem, the people of the north could now select one of the two more accessible worship centers: Dan, in the northern sector of the northern kingdom, or Bethel, in the extreme south, both of which had long-standing traditions as religious cities. Bethel was to be especially prominent throughout the rest of the history of the northern kingdom (cf. Am 7:13).

At each cult center Jeroboam erected a temple, probably to house the sacred image and altar. The golden calves he caused to be erected were probably not intended to be construed as pagan images per se but representations of animals on whose back stood the invisible god, unseen by the eye of the worshiper. Similar practices involving the worship of the Canaanite god Baal Hadad are well documented in the literature and art of Ugarit. It was inevitable that religious confusion and apostasy would soon set in.

31–33 To further his religious goals, Jeroboam instituted a new religious order drawn from non-Levitical sources. Indeed, the Levitical priests refused to have any share in such unscriptural procedures, choosing rather to leave their homes and go over to Rehoboam and the southern kingdom where the true faith was retained (2Ch 11:13–17). In this they were followed by many other believers from the north. Completing his religious innovations, Jeroboam instituted an annual feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, no doubt rivaling the Feast of Tabernacles in the seventh month in Jerusalem.

13:1–3 God sent his prophet out of Judah to rebuke Jeroboam and his apostate religion. How tragic that no prophet could be found in the north who could speak for God's cause! The man of God came to the altar where Jeroboam was leading in the false sacrifices and prophesied by the authority and power of the word of the Lord that a coming prince of the house of David, Josiah by name, would one day burn the bones of Jeroboam's priests on that altar, thereby defiling it forever (cf. 2Ki 23:15–20). In confirmation of his prophecy, the prophet gave a sign: the altar would be split apart and its ashes poured out. According to the Levitical regulations, the ashes were to be carried off carefully to a clean place for disposal (Lev 1:16; 4:12; 6:10–11). Their pouring out, together with the destruction of the altar, would signify God's invalidating of the sacrificial service being held at Bethel.

4–6 Infuriated, Jeroboam pointed his hand at the prophet and gave orders that he be seized. But the very hand, stretched out in condemnation, was itself rebuked by being instantly withered. The king who would himself "take a hand" in the religious ceremony of his people found that strong hand totally impotent. Moreover, the prophesied sign descended on the altar with a lightninglike stroke. Terrified and humbled Jeroboam pled with the man of God that his hand be restored; whereupon the prophet interceded with God, and the king's hand was restored to its former condition. Another miracle had occurred!

7 Finally Jeroboam was convinced by the twin miracles of the altar's destruction and the restoration of his withered hand that the prophet was indeed from the Lord, hence a man whose authority and power were to be reckoned with; so he invited the prophet to dine with him. Whether Jeroboam intended the dining hall of the sanctuary or that of his own home in Bethel is not certain. Whether or not Jeroboam hoped to win such a holy man over to his side, he clearly intended to try both to mollify the prophet's stand and to save face before the multitude.

8–10 The man of God, however, would not be so easily manipulated. He refused most stringently. Nothing the king could offer enticed him. God had laid on him three rules of conduct for the road: he was neither to eat nor to drink nor ever to return by the way he had come. So holy was his mission that the very way he had traveled had been rendered sacred (cf. Mt 2:12; Jas 2:25). Rejecting the king and his offer, he departed by another road.

11–22 Learning of the incident in Bethel from his sons and recognizing that the man of God must be a true prophet, an aged prophet of Bethel set out to overtake the man of God. Probably the old prophet hoped for fellowship and encouragement. When heat finally overcame Jeroboam's rebuker, the old prophet invited the man of God to dine with him, assuring him that his previous instructions against eating and drinking had been superseded by a subsequent revelation. Was not he also a prophet?

The prophet from Judah was too easily convinced by the old man's deception. Perhaps a fundamental flaw in his character can herein be detected: his carrying out of God's charge may have been sheerly from command, not conviction. At any rate, he went with the prophet of Bethel. While they were dining, the word of the Lord truly did come to the old prophet. Because the man of God had disobeyed the full counsel of God, he would not be buried in the tomb of his father; this meant that he would meet a violent death along the way home.

23–30 As soon as the meal had ended and the man of God had taken his leave, a lion met him on the road, killed him, and stood over his fallen body. Eventually the news of the tragedy reached the aged prophet. Surmising that the events were the fulfillment of the Lord's prophetic judgment, he went and found that all was as it had been reported: the body of the man of God lay on the road with the lion yet standing guard beside it. The body had not been eaten, nor had the prophet's donkey, which stood beside his fallen master. This could only be the judgment of God! Striding past the sentrylike lion, the prophet tenderly picked up the body of the man of God, brought it back to town, and after proper mourning, laid it to rest in his own tomb.

31–32 After the burial, the old prophet gave instructions that when he died he should be laid to rest beside the man of God. So powerful an effect had the whole series of events produced on him, and so assured was he that all the man of God had predicted would surely come to pass, that the old prophet longed, at least in death, to be united with this holy man. The prophecy that the man of God had made was fulfilled minutely in the reform of Josiah (2Ki 23:15–18).

33–34 One would think that the foregoing events would have influenced Jeroboam to turn to God. Such was not to be the case. Having had his hand restored and being rid of the irksome prophet from Judah, Jeroboam only intensified his apostate religious policy, a program that was to become the ruin of the northern kingdom and for which his name was to live in infamy. Thus it was to be repeatedly said of the wicked kings of the northern kingdom: "He walked in all the ways of Jeroboam son of Nebat and in his sin"(e.g., 16:26).

b. The consequences of Jeroboam's religion (14:1–20)

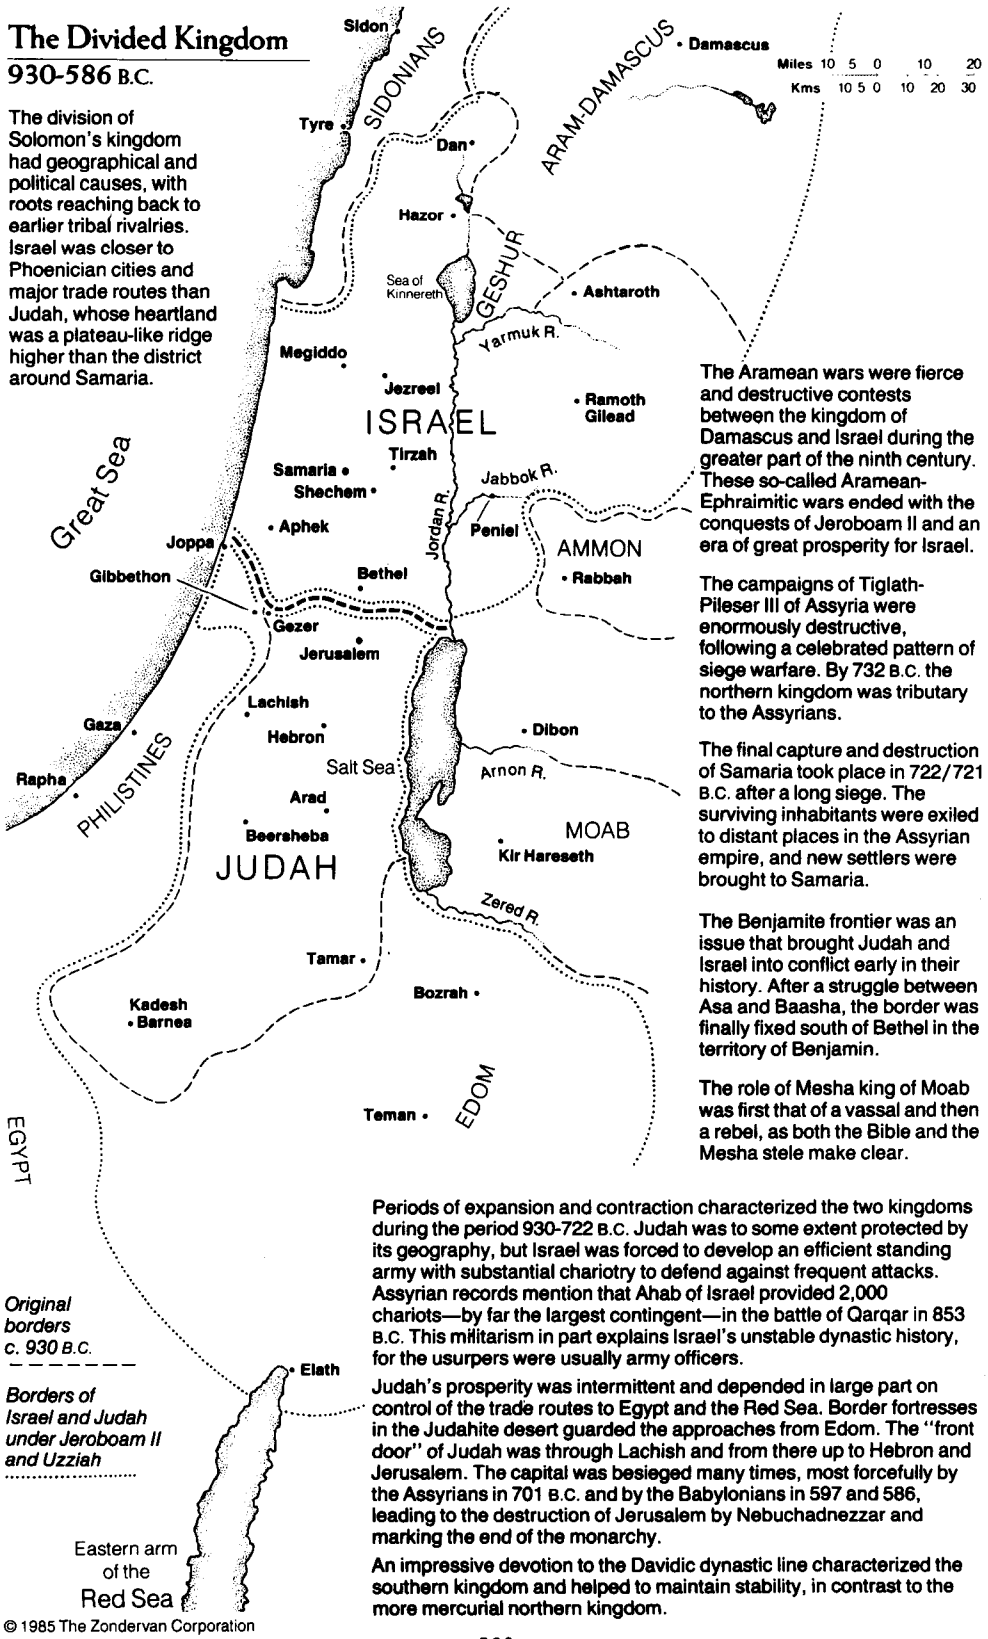
1–3 When Jeroboam's son fell critically ill, the king sent his wife in disguise to Ahijah to learn whether the prince would recover. Since Ahijah had successfully predicted his kingship (11:29–39), Jeroboam doubtless hoped that the old prophet might once again have good news. Perhaps he sent his wife because he himself felt convicted that he had not heeded Ahijah's admonitions (11:38).

4–16 Since Ahijah was now aged and blind, there was every hope that the subterfuge might succeed. But God had disclosed King

The Divided Kingdom

930-586 B.C.

The division of Solomon's kingdom had geographical and political causes, with roots reaching back to earlier tribal rivalries. Israel was closer to Phoenician cities and major trade routes than Judah, whose heartland was a plateau-like ridge higher than the district around Samaria.



The Aramean wars were fierce and destructive contests between the kingdom of Damascus and Israel during the greater part of the ninth century. These so-called Aramean-Ephraimitic wars ended with the conquests of Jeroboam II and an era of great prosperity for Israel.

The campaigns of Tiglath-Pileser III of Assyria were enormously destructive, following a celebrated pattern of siege warfare. By 732 B.C. the northern kingdom was tributary to the Assyrians.

The final capture and destruction of Samaria took place in 722/721 B.C. after a long siege. The surviving inhabitants were exiled to distant places in the Assyrian empire, and new settlers were brought to Samaria.

The Benjamite frontier was an issue that brought Judah and Israel into conflict early in their history. After a struggle between Asa and Baasha, the border was finally fixed south of Bethel in the territory of Benjamin.

The role of Mesha king of Moab was first that of a vassal and then a rebel, as both the Bible and the Mesha stele make clear.

Periods of expansion and contraction characterized the two kingdoms during the period 930-722 B.C. Judah was to some extent protected by its geography, but Israel was forced to develop an efficient standing army with substantial chariotry to defend against frequent attacks. Assyrian records mention that Ahab of Israel provided 2,000 chariots—by far the largest contingent—in the battle of Qarqar in 853 B.C. This militarism in part explains Israel's unstable dynastic history, for the usurpers were usually army officers.

Judah's prosperity was intermittent and depended in large part on control of the trade routes to Egypt and the Red Sea. Border fortresses in the Judahite desert guarded the approaches from Edom. The "front door" of Judah was through Lachish and from there up to Hebron and Jerusalem. The capital was besieged many times, most forcefully by the Assyrians in 701 B.C. and by the Babylonians in 597 and 586, leading to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar and marking the end of the monarchy.

An impressive devotion to the Davidic dynastic line characterized the southern kingdom and helped to maintain stability, in contrast to the more mercurial northern kingdom.

Jeroboam's hypocrisy to Ahijah so that with her first footstep he greeted her instantly as Jeroboam's wife and delivered to her God's dire message of rebuke. Despite God's goodness to him, Jeroboam had utterly despised God and committed gross sin. Jeroboam's contemptuous attitude is emphasized by the phrase "thrust me [the LORD] behind your back" (cf. Eze 23:35).

Ahijah added a further message: not only would Jeroboam's dynasty quickly be cut off, but because the sin condition initiated by Jeroboam would permeate all Israel, the kingdom itself would one day fail, and its people would be scattered abroad. One of Jeroboam's most besetting sins was the setting up of "Asherah poles," sacred to the worship of the goddess Asherah. This fertility goddess was worshiped throughout Canaan, often by using sacred poles or trees that symbolized life and fertility.

17–18 As soon as Jeroboam's wife reached Tirzah, true to Ahijah's prophecies, the lad died. A period of great mourning followed. Those with spiritual insight who knew the circumstances probably realized that the lad's death served as a guarantee of the full completion of all that Ahijah had prophesied.

19–20 The history of Jeroboam I concludes with the summary of his reign in accordance with the usual stylized formula.

3. The reign of Rehoboam in the southern kingdom (14:21–31)

21–25 The notices of Rehoboam's reign in Judah begin with a spiritual evaluation. Tragically, Rehoboam's record was little better than Jeroboam's. He, too, allowed rival worship centers and pagan fertility practices to spread throughout the land. While Rehoboam seems to have begun his reign well (cf. 2Ch 11:5–17, 23), he soon abandoned the law of the Lord (2Ch 12:1). As a result, in Rehoboam's fifth year (926 B.C.), God sent punishment in the form of an invasion by Shishak I, the Egyptian Pharaoh.

Shishak had an interesting history. Toward the end of Egypt's weak and divided Twenty-First Dynasty, mention is made of a Libyan who through marriage and favorable dealings with the high priest finally gained control of the government, founding the Twenty-Second Dynasty as Sheshonq I (biblical Shishak). He was able to reunify the country and restore a certain amount of stability to the crown. Egypt could now once again look beyond her borders. Having renewed the old ties with Byblos and having regained economic supremacy in Nubia, this king saw an opportunity to deal with Palestine. Probably he had advised Jeroboam—whom he had harbored for many years awaiting the demise of Solomon—in his quest for the northern throne. So, perhaps through some border incident, pretext was found for a full invasion.

26–28 On the basis of the biblical account and the archaeological data from ancient Egypt, it is clear that Shishak swept through much of both Israel and Judah, taking heavy spoil. Shishak lists 150 cities he took in the campaign. The Chronicler records that Jerusalem itself was severely looted; only the repentance of Rehoboam and his leaders at God's rebuke through Shemaiah, the prophet, saved the land and people from total destruction. Significant among the spoil treasures were Solomon's golden shields (see 10:16–17), kept in the Palace of the Forest of Lebanon (see 7:2). To replace the shields that were used at state ceremonial functions, Rehoboam had bronze shields made and entrusted them to the commander of his royal bodyguard, who stored them in the guardhouse.

29–31 The chapter closes with the additional notice of strained relations between the northern and southern kingdoms throughout Rehoboam's reign. Since Rehoboam had complied with the divine prohibition against overt warfare (cf. 12:21–24), more than likely this reference is to a "cold war" or to occasional border skirmishes. Rehoboam was succeeded by his son Abijah.

4. The reign of Abijah in the southern kingdom (15:1–8)

1–5 Attention is focused on the short-lived reign of Abijah in but few details: (1) the continuing prominence of the dowager queen Maacah, (2) the continuance of apostasy in the southern kingdom, and (3) the continuing war with the north.

Maacah was apparently the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah (2Ch 13:2) and Tamar (2Sa 14:27), hence the granddaughter of Absalom, David's rebellious son. The favorite of Rehoboam's eighteen wives, she was the mother of Abijah and the grandmother of Asa. Her continued prominence testifies to her strong personality.

Rehoboam's spiritual example was reflected in his son. Abijah's imitation of his father's religion stands in bold contrast to that of his forefather David, with whom God had entered into covenant relationship (2Sa 7:4–17). Although Abijah was a poor representative of the house of David (cf. 11:4), yet God, who remains faithful (2Ti 2:13), would honor the man after his own heart in preserving his heir (cf. 1Sa 13:14; Ps 89:19–29; Ac 13:22). Furthermore, God was to take a hand in turning the religious situation in Judah around—he would raise up a godly son to the throne of Judah.

6–8 Abijah inherited his father's continued friction with Jeroboam and the northern kingdom, only now it took the form of open warfare between the two Hebrew states. Fortunately for Judah, Abijah's underlying faith could rise to the surface in times of crisis. In a major battle between the two antagonists, Abijah and his few troops were delivered from certain defeat when the Lord intervened for them on behalf of Abijah's prayer (cf. 2Ch 13:3–22).

5. The reign of Asa in the southern kingdom (15:9–24)

9–15 When Asa assumed the kingly office in the twentieth year of Jeroboam's reign (910 B.C.), the influence of Maacah, his grandmother and the dowager queen, was still pronounced. Although Asa's long forty-one year reign was to be eventful, during his first ten years he enjoyed a time of peace (cf. 2Ch 14:1), perhaps the benefit of Abijah's victory over the north.

Asa used these ten years wisely, expunging idolatry and enforcing the observance of true religion, securing the defenses of the country and strengthening the armed forces (2Ch 14:2–8). In all this "he did what was right in the eyes of the LORD." His piety and wise preparations would put the country in good stead, for shortly after this period he faced and defeated an invasion led by Zerah the Ethiopian (2Ch 14:9–15), probably a commander of the Egyptian Pharaoh Osorkon I (914–874 B.C.).

In the third month of the fifteenth year of his reign, Asa, encouraged by the prophet Azariah (2Ch 15:1–7), convened an assembly in which all true Israelites were invited to renew the covenant with the Lord. The meeting was attended with great praise and joy (2Ch 15:9–15). At the same time Asa instituted stringent spiritual reforms, aimed at removing the remaining vestiges of idolatry and fertility rites (2Ch 15:8). Even the politically and religiously powerful Maacah was disposed of once and for all. No doubt she had used the outbreak of the war as an occasion to reintroduce the public worship of Asherah (cf. 2Ch 15:16). While Asa stopped short of a total cleansing of the land, he was a God-fearing man who led the way for his people in public dedication to God (cf. 2Ch 15:17–18).

16–17 Meanwhile in the northern kingdom Jeroboam had died and was succeeded by Nadab, his son (vv.25–32). Nadab reigned only two years before he was assassinated by Baasha, who instituted the short-lived second Israelite dynasty. Baasha's ascension year was the third year of Asa's reign. Throughout Asa's early years, Baasha had been occupied with securing the throne and other internal affairs. However, he had probably looked on disapprovingly at the turn of events in Judah. But with a victorious and strengthened Judah whose renewed vitality had succeeded even in drawing away many of his citizens, Baasha could no longer remain inactive. Moving swiftly into Judah, Baasha seized Ramah, only four miles north of Jerusalem itself. This action not only stopped the further drawing away of Baasha's subjects, but also cut off the main road north out of Jerusalem, thus shutting down all communications between Judah and Israel. This gave Baasha control of the trade routes.

18–19 Asa's reaction was singularly strange. Despite God's great deliverance from Zerah and Asa's own religious reforms, Asa turned suddenly to human devices to deal with the new crisis. Perhaps his own forces had suffered heavy losses in the past war. Perhaps the many years of success had encouraged him to rely on himself in political affairs while trusting God for spiritual matters. Asa did not even bother to pose the problem to God as Rehoboam had done (cf. 12:22–24). Stripping the temple and palace of treasures, Asa sent a delegation to the Aramean king Ben-Hadad, proposing that he break his treaty with the northern kingdom and put military pressure on it so that the Israelite incursion into Judah would be recalled.

A long-standing hostility had existed between the Arameans and the Hebrews. David had subdued the chief Aramean tribes, occupying the main area of Syria itself (cf. 2Sa 8:3–12; 1Ch 18:3–11); and although these regions largely remained subservient to Solomon, already in Solomon's day Rezon ben Eliada had managed to establish himself in Damascus, being "Israel's adversary as long as Solomon lived" (11:23–25).

Apparently a new dynasty had gained control in Damascus and, with the division of the united monarchy, had supported the northern kingdom. Ben-Hadad, who first appears here in history and was to play a major role in the affairs of the Near East in subsequent years, had a treaty alliance with Baasha. But seeing Asa's treasure and sensing the gain that was to be had from a new league with Judah and from a military venture against Israel, Ben-Hadad was only too happy to help. He may have followed Asa's suggestion of appealing to a prior treaty between Damascus and Jerusalem as a pretext for coming to Judah's aid against Baasha.

20–22 Moving swiftly, Ben-Hadad ravaged Baasha's northern sector, not only gaining for himself access to the international caravan routes that led from Egypt through Phoenicia and on to Damascus, but giving Asa the desired relief in Judah. For in order to meet the new emergency on his northern flank, Baasha was forced to abandon his operations at Ramah.

Asa, for his part, quickly mobilized Judah's forces and retook Ramah, dismantling Baasha's fortifications and using the building material to fortify Mizpah and Geba, thus providing strongholds for his reestablished control in Benjamin.

Needless to say, Asa's actions did not solve the relations with the north, but they did give him respite from further invasions throughout the rest of his reign. Although we hear of no more wars in Asa's day, it was a time of spiritual defeat. His self-assertedness took its toll. The Chronicler reports that when God sent his prophet Hanani to rebuke him for having forsaken God to trust in human beings in the war, Asa both threw that seer into prison and dealt harshly with any who dissented with state policy. Thus began a long and checkered history of the persecution of God's prophets (2Ch 16:7–10; cf. 2Ki 17:13–14).

23–24 The parting notices concerning Asa deal with the loathsome disease in his feet that served only to harden his heart. For his funerary observance, Asa had the air filled with sweet spices (2Ch 16:12–14); but no amount of man-made perfume can hide the noxious stench of the life of a believer alienated from God! How far he had fallen and from what great spiritual heights! Asa's life remains as an exemplary admonition to believers to abide humbly in Christ, lest their lives become totally unproductive for God.

6. The reign of Nadab in the northern kingdom (15:25–31)

25–31 Jeroboam's son Nadab succeeded him, reigning in Tirzah. In his second year Nadab attempted to capture the important Philistine city of Gibbethon (cf. 16:15–17). However, in the midst of the siege he was assassinated by Baasha (probably one of his military officers), who seized the throne. Baasha immediately liquidated all the royal house, thus confirming Ahijah's prediction that God would judge the sins of the house of Jeroboam (cf. 14:9–16).

7. The second dynasty in Israel (15:32–16:14)

a. Baasha (15:32–16:7)

32–34 Political change did not signal a change in spiritual outlook. The founder of the second dynasty proved to be as wicked as Jeroboam and Nadab before him. Baasha compounded his murder of Nadab and the remainder of the first dynasty by walking in the spiritual prostitution that Jeroboam had introduced.

16:1–4 Accordingly, God sent Jehu the prophet to reprimand Baasha and announce his demise. Jehu told him that although God had exalted Baasha to be king (though not sanctioning Baasha's means of getting there), hoping for a change in the spiritual climate of Israel, Baasha had sought only his own ends and had perpetuated the persistent sins of his predecessors. Therefore he and his house would fall like that of Jeroboam, and beasts and birds of prey would feed on their fallen bodies.

5–7 Baasha had come from lowly origins. Except for his war with Asa (15:32), little is heard of him; and the scriptural account quickly passes on to Elah, his son. God's denunciation of Baasha adds further explanation to the subsequent condemnation of Asa for not leaving his war with Baasha in God's hands.

b. Elah (16:8–14)

8–14 As in the case of Jeroboam's son, so Baasha's son, Elah, reigned but two years and was also assassinated. Like Nadab, Elah was interested in Gibbethon and had sent his army commander, Omri, to put it under siege. He himself remained behind in Tirzah. During a drinking bout at the house of Arza, Elah's official, Zimri a military officer, killed him. Zimri thereupon assumed the kingship, subsequently murdered all Elah's descendants, and finished the second dynasty, as Jehu had prophesied. The Lord's judgment on the house of Baasha had come quickly.

B. The Era of the Third Dynasty (1Ki 16:15–2Ki 9:37)

1. Interregnum: Zimri and Tibni (16:15–22)

15–20 Zimri's fiery ambitions were to go up in flame. As soon as the encamped army at Gibbethon heard of the coup d'état, they proclaimed their commander, Omri, king and marched on Tirzah. Having retreated to the inner recesses of the palace citadel, Zimri set fire to it, burning himself to death. The author notes that Zimri's spiritual condition had been no different than those leaders who had preceded him.

21–22 In the wake of Zimri's unsuccessful rebellion, loyalties in Israel remained divided, half supporting Omri and half supporting a certain man named Tibni.

2. The reign of Omri in the northern kingdom (16:23–28)

23–24 After a four-year struggle Omri succeeded in gaining control of all the northern kingdom. He immediately undertook the building of a new capital that would lie in neutral ground (as David had done in selecting Jerusalem) and would be militarily defensible. He selected a strategic and centrally located hill site overlooking the chief commercial routes of the Esdraelon Plain. There he built his new capital city and named it Samaria, after Shemer, its former owner.

25–28 Despite Omri's forward-looking vision for restoring Israel's strength and his many accomplishments, spiritually he was more destitute than all his predecessors. Not only did he perpetuate the spiritual sins of Jeroboam, but his ties with Phoenicia were to unleash on Israel the common pagan social band religious practices known to the ancient world. Thus the scriptural record concerning Omri is both brief and condemnatory.

3. The reign of Ahab in the northern kingdom (16:29–22:40)

a. The accession of Ahab (16:29–34)

29–30 Ahab's twenty-two year reign marked the depths of spiritual decline in Israel. No more notorious husband and wife team is known in all the sacred Scriptures (cf. 21:25–26). Ahab built on his father's foundation, not only in bringing Israel into the arena of international conflict, but causing the people to serve and worship Baal.

31–33 Ahab was a man of complex character. The remainder of this chapter makes it clear that he was unconcerned with true, vital faith (cf. 21:20). Not only did he participate personally in the sins of Jeroboam, but having willingly married Jezebel, he followed her in the worship of Baal-Melqart, officially instituting and propagating Baal worship throughout his kingdom.

34 An example of his spiritual infidelity is seen as he granted to Hiel of Bethel the authority to rebuild Jericho as a fortified town, despite Joshua's long-standing curse. The undertaking was to cost Hiel the lives of his eldest and youngest sons, in accordance with Joshua's prophetic pronouncement (Jos 6:26).

The subsequent chapters of 1 Kings show that Ahab was selfish and sullen (20:43; 21:4–5), cruel (22:27), morally weak (21:1–16), and concerned with luxuries of this world (22:39). Though he could display real bravery (ch. 20; 22:1–39) and at times even heeded God's word (18:16–46; 20:13–17, 22, 28–30; 21:27–29; 22:30), nevertheless he was basically a compromiser as far as God's will was concerned (20:31–34, 42–43; 22:8, 18, 26–28).

The divine estimation of his character stands as a tragic epitaph: "There was never a man like Ahab, who sold himself to do evil in the eyes of the LORD" (21:25).

b. The prophetic ministry of Elijah (17:1–19:21)

(1) Elijah's call (17:1–6)

1 In those dark times God raised up a light, the prophet Elijah. Reared in rugged Gilead, Elijah was a rugged individualist, a man of stern character and countenance, zealous for the Lord. Elijah sought Ahab and delivered the Lord's pronouncement. In contrast to those who were not gods, whose idols Ahab ignorantly worshiped, the living Lord, who was truly Israel's God, would withhold both dew and rain for the next several years.

Already the drought had lasted some six months (cf. Lk 4:25; Jas 5:17 with 1Ki 18:1); now the reason for it all was to be revealed to Israel's apostate leadership. The message was clear: Israel had broken the pledge of its covenantal relationship with God (Dt 11:16–17; 28:23–24; cf. Lev 26:19; 1Ki 8:35). Therefore God was demonstrating his concern for both his people's infidelity and their folly in trusting in false fertility gods like Baal. No rain! There would not even be dew until God's authentic messenger would give the word! Unknown to Ahab, Elijah had agonized over the sin of his people and had prayed to the Lord for corrective measures to be levied on his people. Accordingly, Elijah was God's logical choice.

2–6 To impress the message and its deep spiritual implications further on Ahab and all Israel, God sent Elijah into seclusion. Not only would Ahab's frantic search for the prophet be thwarted, but Elijah's very absence would be living testimony of a divine displeasure (cf. Ps 74:1, 9). Moreover, Elijah himself had much to learn, and the time of solitude would furnish needed moments of divine instruction. Obeying God's directions implicitly, Elijah walked the fifteen miles from Jezreel eastward to the Jordan River. There in Kerith, one of the Jordan's many narrow gorges, Elijah took up his residence. Alone and relying solely on divine provision, Elijah was nourished by the available water of Kerith and by ravens sent from God.

(2) Elijah and the widow at Zarephath (17:7–24)

7–16 When the heavy rains of late autumn and early winter, which were needed to prepare the earth for cultivation, failed to materialize, God set the second stage of caring for his prophet into operation. He sent him to a certain widow of Zarephath in Phoenician Sidon, Jezebel's own homeland. On arriving there, Elijah was led to the widow whom God had mentioned. The prophet put a severe test before her. If she would first bake a small loaf for Elijah before seeing to her family's needs, God would honor her faith with a supply of flour and oil so long as the drought should last. Taking the prophet at his word, she obeyed; and all came to pass, even as he had promised.

The incident must have served not only as a source of great comfort for the simple, godly non-Jewish woman (cf. Dt 10:18–19), but also as a strengthening to Elijah's faith in God's providence (cf. Ps 37:3–4; Isa 41:10). This episode also stands impressed in the pages of history as a lasting memorial to the availability of God's full provision to all who believe, whether Jew or Gentile (Mt 10:41–42; Lk 4:25–26).

17–24 With the passing of time, the widow's little lad, who had been thus rescued from death through Elijah's miracle, fell fatally ill. Gently taking the lad from his mother's arms, the prophet carried him up to his own quarters. Elijah was puzzled as to the Lord's purpose in all this. Pleading with the Lord for the lad's life, he followed prayer with active faith, stretching himself out on the boy three times. Perhaps the widow had already experienced some hope in giving the body of the boy to the prophet. Elijah, too, was confident that God would yet do another miracle. Their expectation was rewarded. Life returned to the lad, and Elijah returned him to the widow's arms.

God's purpose was now evident. The widow's sin was not at issue, but the testing had come so that her newly found faith might be brought to settled maturity. The Lord was not only the God of the Jews but of all those who believe; he was not only the God of the living but the God of resurrection (cf. Lk 20:38; Jn 11:25–26) Furthermore, the Lord's word once again proved true in the mouth of the prophet.

(3) Elijah and Obadiah (18:1–15)

1–6 During the third year of Elijah's stay in Zarephath, God commanded Elijah to present himself before Ahab; he, not Baal, would send rain on the land. By now the effects of the drought were severe. A heavy famine lay on the land. Ahab then summoned Obadiah, the royal chamberlain, and revealed his plans for a sweeping survey of the land to see whether there would be any fodder available at all for the animals. Presumably Ahab would take one route and Obadiah another.

7 Obadiah was a believer. He had even risked his life to hide and sustain one hundred of the Lord's prophets from Jezebel's purge. As Obadiah proceeded on the king's commission, Elijah met him. Though he could scarcely believe his eyes, Obadiah recognized Elijah and bowed respectfully to God's great prophet.

8–15 Elijah gave Obadiah a higher commission: he was to inform Ahab that Elijah was back and wanted an audience with the king. Obadiah protested that such a mission might cost him his life. Since Ahab had scrupulously sought Elijah everywhere, and since God might conceivably send Elijah off at a moment's notice, should Obadiah report to Ahab that he had found Elijah? For if he should come and not find the prophet, Ahab's wrath might be vented on the faithful Obadiah. After Elijah had assured him that he would surely remain to meet Ahab, Obadiah sought the king.

(4) Elijah and the prophets of Baal (18:16–46)

16–19 Ahab, hoping to deal with Elijah from a position of strength, greeted him with the charge of being a troublemaker in Israel. Possibly the king was implying that the famine was all Elijah's fault; because of Elijah's hostile attitude, Baal had become angered and so had withheld rain for the past three years. Elijah's reply is particularly instructive. Not he, but Ahab and his family were the real troublers, because they had made Baal worship the state religion. Did Baal have the power to withhold and bring rain? Let the priests of Baal and Asherah (Baal's consort) be brought together at Mount Carmel, Baal's stronghold. Let it be seen once and for all who truly is God!

20–21 When Ahab had assembled the priests of Baal on Mount Carmel to confront the Lord's prophet, Elijah addressed the many people who had gathered to see the contest. The choice Joshua had given the people (Jos 24:15) was now theirs to make: Serve God or serve another god (cf. Mt 6:24). But unlike the people at the time of Joshua, Elijah's audience held its peace.

22–24 To this hesitant multitude Elijah proposed a test in accordance with the scriptural precedent established by Aaron (Lev 9). The 450 prophets of Baal were to choose two bulls, one for their offering and the other for Elijah, who would oppose them by himself. After each contestant had prepared an altar, each would wait for his god to ignite the wood under the sacrifice. The multitude agreed to this.

25–29 Elijah deferred the first opportunity to Baal's prophets. Despite all their plaintive wailing and ecstatic dancing, when morning gave way to noon and still Baal had failed to provide the necessary fire, Elijah began to taunt his antagonists. Was Baal not a god? Perhaps he was lost in deep thought or preoccupied with his many cares or had gone to care for his many commercial interests. All these activities were characteristic of the duties attributed to the pagan gods. Perhaps, like many of the gods of the ancient Near East, he was asleep and needed to be awakened by cultic ritual.

The prophets of Baal became more frantic. In renewed frenzy they lacerated themselves with swords and spears, the blood flowing freely down their perspiration-soaked bodies. The ritual went on and on at an increasingly feverish pitch. As the time for the evening sacrifice came, there was still no response.

30–32 Turning from Baal's prophets, Elijah called the people to an altar of the Lord that was in ruins. Selecting twelve stones according to the number of the tribes of Israel (a fact that underscored the divine displeasure concerning Jeroboam's schism), Elijah rebuilt the altar and then dug a spacious trench around it.

33–35 When the wood had been arranged on the altar and the sacrifice cut and placed on the wood, Elijah amazed his audience by commanding that four large jars of water be filled and poured on the offering and wood. He had this done a second and a third time so that not only the altar but the sacrifice and the wood were thoroughly drenched, and water filled the surrounding trench.

36–38 At the precise moment when all hope of igniting the wood seemed totally lost, Elijah stepped forward and called on God. He pleaded with the covenant God of Israel to validate that he alone was still God in Israel and that this Elijah, who had prophesied the drought and was now calling for a miracle, was truly his servant. He asked God to answer him so that all would know that the Lord was ever anxious for their repentance and return to him. Striking with lightninglike power, God answered; and such an answer! Heavenly fire fell and consumed not only the wood and sacrifice but the stones, the soil, and even the surrounding water. What a contrast! The prophets of Baal had kept up their wailing and wild ritual for the better part of a day and met with dead silence. Elijah's petition had lasted less than a minute but produced spectacular results. The difference lay in the One addressed.

39–40 The people responded in true belief and worship. Falling to the ground, they confessed that truly the Lord alone was God! But Elijah wanted total commitment from those who were gathered there. He commanded that these prophets of Baal be seized and executed. Their wicked crimes against humankind and God demanded the death penalty. The people reacted instantaneously; they took Baal's prophets in charge to the Kishon Valley and executed them there. Elijah himself remained behind; the people would see to the execution.

41 Then Elijah sought a private audience with the king, for he had an important message to deliver. Ahab could break from the fast of the day and take nourishment, for God would soon send the long withheld rain.

42–46 While the king went away rejoicing to eat and drink, Elijah climbed farther up the mountain to pray and observe God's working. While Elijah buried his head between his knees in full and reverential concourse with God, he sent his servant to the mountain's peak to herald the approaching rain. The servant, however, quickly brought back the report: "No rain in sight." Again and again as Elijah persevered in heartfelt prayer, the servant was sent to the summit. On the seventh trip he returned with the good news. A small cloud, the size of a person's hand, could be seen on the distant horizon.

Elijah did not hesitate. He sent word to Ahab that he should leave now lest a torrential rain overtake him on the way. Nor did Ahab tarry. As he made haste for Jezreel and Jezebel, the sky grew black with heavy clouds, and strong winds began to blow. As he rode along, the downpour fell on him.

What a momentous day it had been for the king! How his head must have reeled with the thoughts of the contest: the pitiful screams of the helpless priests of Baal, the calm and yet awe-inspiring petition of Elijah, the terrifying and spectacular holocaust that followed, the repentance of the people, and the execution of the pagan prophets! As Ahab rode along through the gathering downpour, the Spirit-empowered prophet through whom God had effected his great triumph, ran ahead of the royal chariot like a specter.

(5) Elijah and Jezebel (19:1–9a)

1–3a On his arrival at Jezreel, Ahab recounted to Jezebel all that Elijah had done. The words are significant. Although Ahab had witnessed God's power in the famine and in the consuming of the sacrifice and the sending of the rain, before the imposing presence of Jezebel he attributed it all to Elijah, even blaming him for the death of the prophets of Baal. Her reaction was predictable. She sent a message to Elijah, giving him twenty-four hours to leave Jezreel or be killed. The threat was effective; Elijah ran for his life.

Probably Elijah had played into Jezebel's hands. Had she really wanted Elijah dead, she surely would have seized him without warning and would have killed him. What she desired was that Elijah and his God be discredited before the new converts who had aided Elijah by executing the prophets of Baal. Without a leader revolutionary movements usually stumble and fall away. Just when God needed him the most, the divinely trained prophet was to prove a notable failure.

It has often been asked how a man could experience such divine provision, perform such great miracles, single-handedly withstand 450 pagan prophets and the king himself, and yet cower before feminine threats. It must be remembered, of course, that Jezebel was anything but a "mere woman." She was of royal blood and every bit a queen. She could be ruthless in pursuing her goals. Her personality was so forceful that even Ahab feared her and was corrupted by her (16:31; 21:25). Both the northern kingdom (16:32–33) and the southern kingdom, through the marriage of her daughter Athaliah to the royal house of Judah (2Ki 8:16–19; 11:1–20; 2Ch 21:5–7; Ps 45), experienced moral degradation and spiritual degeneracy through her corrupting influence.

Yet Elijah was not without blame. God's subsequent tender dealings with his prophet were to bring his spiritual problem to light. His God-given successes had fostered an inordinate pride that had made him take his own importance too seriously. Moreover, Elijah had come to bask in the glow of the spectacular. He may have fully expected that because of what had been accomplished at Mount Carmel, Jezebel would capitulate and pagan worship would come to an end in Israel—all through his influence!

The great spectacle had failed to melt Jezebel's icy heart and, worse, she wanted to take his life. Thus, Elijah's pride was shattered, and he became a broken man. What Elijah needed to learn, God would soon show him. God does not always move in the realm of the extraordinary. To live always seeking one "high experience" after another is to have a misdirected zeal. The majority of life's service is in quiet, routine, humble obedience to God's will.

3b–9a When the fleeing prophet had reached Beersheba, some ninety miles to the south, he dismissed his servant. There was no need to jeopardize his life further. In his extreme dejection, Elijah wished only to be alone. Nor, for that matter, could he be safe in Beersheba, for Jezebel's influence could reach even this southernmost city. Accordingly, Elijah turned still farther southward, journeying out into the desert.

Taking refuge under the scant shade of a broom tree, Elijah prayed for death. He, the mighty prophet, had stood for God as boldly as any of those who had gone before him. Yet here he was, alone and seemingly deserted in this desert wasteland, the very symbol of a wasted life. Yet God would tenderly nourish and lead his prophet to a place where he would get some much needed instruction. After a forty-day trek, Elijah found that he had been drawn by divine providence to Mount Sinai, the sacred place of God's self-disclosure.

After arriving at Mount Sinai, Elijah located a cave and fell fast asleep. He may have been in a spot more sacred than he realized. The Hebrew text says, "He came there to the cave," possibly the very "cleft of the rock" where God had placed Moses as his glory passed by (Ex 33:21–23).

(6) Elijah and the Lord (19:9b–18)

9b–10 At length the word of the Lord aroused Elijah. The penetrating interrogation called for minute self-evaluation. Did Elijah yet understand his failure and God's gracious guidance in bringing him to this place? Elijah's reply indicated that he did not. Like Phinehas of old, he alone had been very zealous for the Lord in the midst of gross idolatry (cf. Nu 25:7–13). His soul was somewhat bitter at having served God so earnestly and spectacularly and yet having experienced rejection and solitary exile.

11–14 The Lord did not comment on Elijah's self-justification but offered instruction. He was to come out of the cave and stand before the Lord, for he would soon pass by. Suddenly a rock-shattering tempest smote the mountain around Elijah. Surely this would announce the divine Presence. But the Lord was not in the wind. There followed a fearful earthquake, but still God was not there. A sudden fire followed; yet God had not come. All these physical phenomena were known to be frequent precursors of God's coming (Ex 19:16, 18; Jdg 5:4–5; 2Sa 22:8–16; Pss 18:7–15; 68:8; Heb 12:18). There followed a faint whisper, a voice quiet, hushed, and low. Elijah knew it instantly. It was God! What a lesson for Elijah! Even God did not always operate in the realm of the spectacular!

Pulling his prophet's cloak over his face, Elijah made his way reverently out of the cave. Again came the divine question: "What are you doing here, Elijah?" Elijah's reply was the same (cf. v.10). How slow he was to learn! Yet much of what he said was true. Though he had failed, at the last he had been faithful; and truly persecution was rampant in Israel. It was understandable why he would feel quite alone.

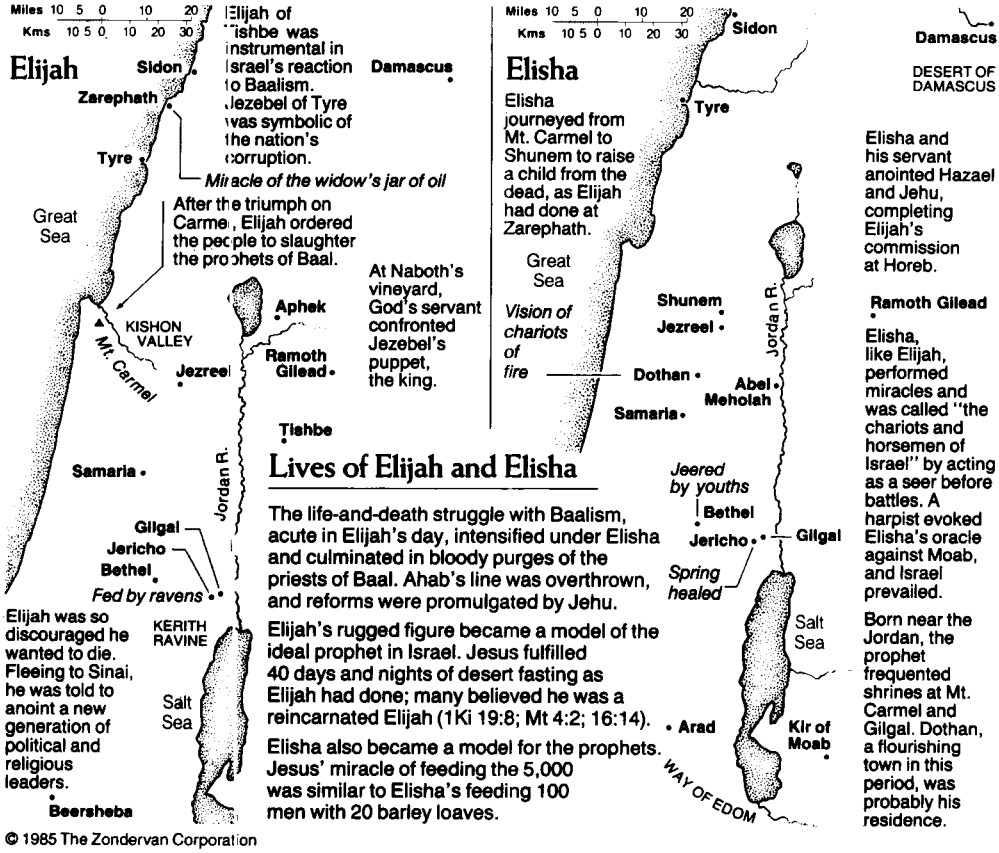
15–18 God again dealt graciously with his prophet. He was to go back to the northern kingdom, the place where he had veered off the track with God in his spiritual life. Elijah still had work to accomplish for God. That task was threefold: (1) in the realm of international politics, he was to anoint Hazael to succeed Ben-Hadad, Israel's perennial adversary in Damascus; (2) in national affairs, Jehu was to be anointed as the next king; and (3) in the spiritual realm, Elisha was to be commissioned as his own successor.

The threefold commission was singularly interrelated. Jehu's work would supplement that of Hazael, that is, any who fell to Israel to escape Hazael's purge would be dealt with by Jehu. In turn those who survived Jehu's slaughter must face the spiritual judgment of Elisha. To encourage his restored prophet further, God set the record straight: there were still seven thousand true believers in Israel.

(7) Elijah and the call of Elisha (19:19–21)

19–20 Since the key figure in Elijah's threefold commission was Elisha, Elijah sought him out first. He found Elisha busily engaged in plowing. Coming on him suddenly, Elijah threw his mantle over Elisha, a symbol of Elisha's call to the prophetic office. Elijah himself continued on without a word. When Elisha was able to collect his wits, he ran after Elijah, asking only that he be allowed to take leave of his family. Elijah's reply indicates that he himself had not called Elisha; it was God's call. Whether Elisha would follow that call was his own decision.

21 Elisha meant business for God. Taking his leave of Elijah, Elisha returned home to enjoy a farewell meal with his family and friends. The meat was cooked over Elisha's



Lives of Elijah and Elisha

The life-and-death struggle with Baalism, acute in Elijah's day, intensified under Elisha and culminated in bloody purges of the priests of Baal. Ahab's line was overthrown, and reforms were promulgated by Jehu.

Elijah's rugged figure became a model of the ideal prophet in Israel. Jesus fulfilled 40 days and nights of desert fasting as Elijah had done; many believed he was a reincarnated Elijah (1Ki 19:8; Mt 4:2; 16:14).

Elisha also became a model for the prophets. Jesus' miracle of feeding the 5,000 was similar to Elisha's feeding 100 men with 20 barley loaves.

own plowing equipment. Thus he had burned his past behind him. Henceforth he would serve God. However, this first meant learning more of him through Elijah.

c. Ahab and the campaign for Samaria (20:1–43)

1–6 Ben-Hadad, the king of Israel's perennial enemy around Damascus, saw his opportunity to eliminate a famine-weakened Israel. Gathering a coalition of some thirty-two kings, he swept southward, quickly putting Samaria itself under siege. To humiliate Ahab further, he sent messengers demanding silver and gold and the choicest of his wives and children. When Ahab agreed to his terms readily, Ben-Hadad demanded the additional right to unlimited search of the palace and the houses of Ahab's officials so as to carry away anything of value.

7–12 Ahab was alarmed at this demand and convened his council of elders. Advised by the elders not to capitulate, Ahab sent back a refusal to Ben-Hadad. The Aramean king sent a third note to Ahab, threatening to destroy Samaria so thoroughly that there would not be enough left of it to make a handful of dust for each of his men. Ahab's proverbial reply is a classic illustration of Near Eastern colloquial wisdom: "One who puts on his armor should not boast like one who takes it off" (cf. v.11). Ben-Hadad "got the message." Infuriated, he gave orders to prepare for the attack.

13–14 While Ben-Hadad and his men reinforced their courage with strong drink, Ahab received a divine messenger. An unknown prophet of God advised the king that if he would call on the select officers of his provincial commanders to lead the attack, God would give him the victory.

15–21 Setting out at noon with the young officers in the lead, the Syrian (Aramean) forces were, in accordance with the prophecy, easily routed. The Arameans suffered heavy losses of men and material, Ben-Hadad himself barely escaping with his life. Surely such a divine deliverance against impossible odds should have convinced Ahab of God's continuing concern for him and the people of Israel. But this was not the case.

22–25 After Ahab's victory, the prophet returned to warn the king to strengthen his defenses, for Ben-Hadad would surely return next year. The warning was well-taken, for even then Ben-Hadad's counselors were advising him that since Israel's gods were mountain gods, Israel could be defeated in the plains. Ben-Hadad only needed to replace the defeated officers with new commanders, raise another army, and choose a battle site in the plains.

26–31 Following their respective counselors' advice, both kings faced each other in battle in the valley before Aphek. Although the Israelite forces were vastly outnumbered, God promised Ahab through his prophet that because the Arameans considered his power to be limited to the mountains, he would see to their defeat.

In the ensuing fray, Ben-Hadad's army suffered almost total annihilation. Even most of those who escaped the battlefield died under the collapsing walls of Aphek. Within the citadel of Aphek, where Ben-Hadad and his counselors had taken refuge, the Aramean king was advised of a new plan. Since the Israelite kings were reputed to be tenderhearted, if the royal party put on garments of repentance and approached Ahab, perhaps he would be merciful.

32–34 Accordingly, Ben-Hadad's counselors went to Ahab with pleas of mercy. They were not disappointed, for Ahab commanded that Ben-Hadad be summoned for conciliation. When Ben-Hadad offered to return the Israelite territory that his father had previously taken (cf. 15:20) and establish new trade concessions, Ahab effected a treaty with Ben-Hadad and released him. In so doing Ahab was trusting in his own appraisal of his needs and the world situation rather than in God, who had given him the miraculous victory. One reason for Ahab's leniency toward Ben-Hadad may lie in his appraisal of the troublesome political situation of those days. Aleady Assyria was on the move against the Aramean tribes. By joining in forces with Ben-Hadad, Ahab hoped to have a sufficiently large force of chariots and infantry to stand up to the Assyrians.

35–40a Ahab's leniency toward Ben-Hadad and self-trust were not to go without divine rebuke. God again raised up a prophet to deal with Ahab. This prophet, by divine command, asked one of his companions to smite him. Because the second prophet refused to obey the divine direction, he was immediately killed by a lion. The first prophet then got another man to strike him. Thus wounded he waited in a disguise for Ahab. When the king passed by, the prophet represented himself as a soldier who had been wounded in battle and had been assigned to watch a prisoner, on penalty of his life or the payment of a large sum of money. Unfortunately, he had inadvertently allowed his prisoner to escape.

40b–43 Merciless Ahab confirmed the sentence. At that point the prophet revealed himself to the king. The prophet's action had been symbolic. Ahab was that one who had allowed the prisoner to escape; therefore, as he himself had judged to be right, the king would pay with his life and Israel would suffer loss. It was a sullen and angry Ahab who returned in triumph from the battle to his palace in Samaria.

d. Ahab and the conscription of Naboth's vineyard (21:1–29)

1–5 Ahab's covetous eye became enamored with a choice vineyard that lay next to his palatial retreat in Jezreel. He desired to turn this vineyard into a vegetable garden; so he offered to buy it from its owner, Naboth, or give him another in exchange for it. When Naboth declined to part with his paternal inheritance because of his allegiance to God's law (cf. Lev 25:23–28; Nu 36:7–12), Ahab returned indignantly to the palace. There Jezebel found him, sulking in bed with his face turned to the wall and refusing to eat.

6–8 Jezebel's inquiry revealed Naboth's refusal to grant Ahab's wishes. Having assured him that she knew how to handle such situations, even if the king did not, Jezebel had letters sent in Ahab's name to the elders of Naboth's village, in a conspiracy against him.

9–10 On a given day the elders and nobles, who comprised a sort of local senate (cf. Dt 16:18), were to call an assembly for solemn fasting, as though the city had committed some great sin (cf. 1Sa 7:6) whose penalty needed averting (cf. Lev 4:13–21; Dt 21:1–9; 2Ch 20:2–4; Joel 1:14–15). Naboth was to be given a conspicuous place so that the two accusers could easily single him out. It may be that Naboth was an influential person anyway; so his prominent position at the meeting would not arouse suspicion.

The charge against Naboth was twofold: he had blasphemed both God and the king. The penalty for such action was death by stoning (Dt 13:10–11; 17:5), outside the city (Lev 24:14; Dt 22:24). Proper procedure called for the witnesses to lay their hands on the accused and cast the first stones. Since death by stoning was the responsibility of the whole community, the rest of the people were to take up the stoning.

11–16 The queen's directive was duly carried out. Naboth's sons were also put to death at this time (cf. 2Ki 9:26), so that no living heir could lay claim to that land. When word was taken to Jezebel that Naboth was dead, Ahab immediately took possession of the property. Tragically, the Scriptures do not indicate that Ahab was concerned enough to ask how Naboth had died or how the property was suddenly available for royal claim.

17–20a Once more Elijah was summoned by God to confront Ahab. Ahab no longer called Elijah "the troubler of Israel" but "my enemy." Doubtless his guilt weighed so heavily on his own conscience that he knew Elijah was there to condemn him.

20b–24 Elijah gave God's message plainly: because Ahab had sold himself to do only evil, God's sure judgment would come on him. In the very place where the dogs had licked up Naboth's blood, they would do likewise to Ahab. Yes, Ahab and his house would be cut off like those of the first two dynasties, his spiritual predecessors in idolatry. The divine sentence envisioned a terrible slaughter and carnage. Nor would Jezebel escape; the dogs would eat her flesh by the wall of Jezreel.

25–26 The divine estimation of Ahab is clearly rendered: Ahab was the vilest of all the Israelite kings. Completely under the domination of his wicked, pagan wife, he was unmatched in evil and spiritual prostitution in Israel.

27–29 Ahab reacted strongly to the Lord's rebuke by clothing himself in sackcloth and fasting. Therefore God again sent Elijah word concerning the king: because he had humbled himself, the threatened punishment would be delayed until the lifetime of his son. However, no stay of execution would be granted for the villainous Jezebel.

The king's remorse was sincere; paradoxically Ahab could be influenced for good by the divine message. Therefore the Lord in his longsuffering bore with the king yet further. There is little indication, however, that Ahab's basic character was altered so as to produce that godly repentance and genuine faith that lead to a real conversion experience. To the contrary, there is no indication that he changed his idolatrous ways, much less restored the ill-gotten vineyard. How gracious is an ever-loving God who deals in boundless mercy even with a thankless and thoughtless generation!

e. Ahab and the campaign for Ramoth Gilead (22:1–40)

1 Some three years after the last Syrian (Aramean) war (ch. 20), probably late in the same year that the combined Aramean and Hebrew forces had withstood Shalmaneser III at Qarqar (853 B.C.), Ahab became concerned for the recovery of Ramoth Gilead to the east of the Jordan. Although the territory had been ceded over to Israel by Ben-Hadad in his submission to Ahab, the affair with Assyria had probably kept the Israelites from reoccupying the territory. With the threat of hostilities somewhat relaxed, however, and with Ben-Hadad once again flexing his military muscles, the strategic importance of Ramoth Gilead became all too apparent.

2–5 When Jehoshaphat king of Judah arrived in the north to visit his brother-in-law Ahab, possibly to evaluate the international situation now that Qarqar was past, he found a concerned Ahab. Having shared his worries concerning Ramoth Gilead with his official staff, Ahab asked Jehoshaphat whether he would join him in a campaign to reoccupy the area. Jehoshaphat instantly put himself and his forces and supplies at Ahab's disposal, but quickly added that he would like to have the Lord's mind as to the venture.

6–14 Accordingly Ahab called in his prophets. He had gathered another four hundred prophets, probably belonging to the state religion established by Jeroboam. These all prophesied victory for Ahab in the projected campaign. One of them, a certain Zedekiah son of Kenaanah, had even cast a pair of iron horns to symbolize that the allied Israelite forces would surely gore the Arameans to death at Ramoth Gilead. Jehoshaphat, however, failed to be assured by these pseudo-prophets of an unlawful cult and asked whether a prophet of the Lord were available for consultation. Ahab could produce only one—a certain Micaiah son of Imlah, whom he hated because he seemed always to prophesy evil against the king. Nevertheless, at Jehoshaphat's insistence Micaiah was summoned. As he was brought to the waiting kings, he was informed that the "other prophets" had all given a favorable prognostication and so was warned to be agreeable. Micaiah, being a true prophet of the Lord, replied that he could speak only what the Lord told him to say.

15–23 At first Micaiah told Ahab to "attack and be victorious." Ahab sensed the sarcasm and demanded the truth. Micaiah answered with two parabolic visions. In the first Israel was likened to shepherdless sheep scattered on the mountains, which must find their own way home. In the second Micaiah described a heavenly scene in which the Lord and his hosts discussed the best way to get Ahab to Ramoth Gilead so that he might fall in battle. It was decided that false prophets, possessed by a lying spirit, would feed Ahab's ego by assuring him of victory in the projected battle.

24–25 Micaiah's message was clear: Ahab's prophets were wrong; Ahab would go up to defeat and death. At this point Zedekiah son of Kenaanah decided on a face-saving measure: he slapped Micaiah on the face, inquiring as to how the Spirit of the Lord had gone from himself to go to Micaiah. Micaiah had a prophecy for Zedekiah, also. Zedekiah would understand Micaiah's prophecy fully in that day when he would hide himself from the enemy in an inner room.

26–28 Ahab demanded that Micaiah be put in prison on minimum rations until the king should return. Micaiah had one last word for the king and all the assembled people: If Ahab returned at all, then the Lord had not spoken through Micaiah!

29–33 Despite Micaiah's warning, Jehoshaphat accompanied Ahab to the battle. Although he disdained Micaiah's prophecy, Ahab obviously did not take it lightly; for though Jehoshaphat went into battle in full royal regalia, Ahab disguised himself. Jehoshaphat's compliance with Ahab's plan nearly cost him his life, for Ben-Hadad had given strict order to his commanders to search out the king of Israel. Thus he repaid Ahab's leniency (cf. 20:34, 42) with severity. Mistaking Jehoshaphat for Ahab, Ben-Hadad's men were on the verge of killing the Judean king when his cry convinced them that they were pursuing the wrong man.

34-36 Ahab was not to escape the prophecy, however. A "random" arrow found its mark, inflicting a mortal wound so that Ahab was wheeled out of the battle. Although he had many shortcomings, cowardice in battle was not one of them. So that the soldiers would not become discouraged by his death, Ahab had his dying body propped up in his chariot. As the sun set on the day's battle, Ahab's life blood gave out. When it was known that the king was dead, as Ahab had feared and as Micaiah had predicted, the army scattered.

37-40 The dead king's body was returned to Samaria and buried. While his blood-stained chariot was being washed at a pool frequented by prostitutes, true to the various prophecies (20:42; 21:19; 22:17, 20), dogs licked up his blood. Thus did the notorious Ahab leave his famed ivory palace behind him; he was succeeded by Ahaziah, his son.

4. The reign of Jehoshaphat in the southern kingdom (22:41–50)

41–42 Jehoshaphat, who had ruled three years as coregent with his father, Asa, came into independent rule in the fourth year of Ahab of Israel (874–853 B.C.) or 870 B.C. His total reign was some twenty-five years (873–848 B.C.). The record of Jehoshaphat's reign is greatly abbreviated by the author of Kings, containing only a short sketch of his lengthy reign, a brief evaluation of his spiritual condition and activities, and a few notices of international events before recording his death. A fuller discussion of the events of Jehoshaphat's reign can be found in 2Ch 17:1–21:1.

43–46 Jehoshaphat's spiritual condition was basically sound and largely commended by God (cf. 2Ch 17:3–4; 19:4–7; 20:3–13, 32). His concern for spiritual things (2Ch 17:7–9) manifested itself in religious and social reforms (cf. 2Ch 17:6; 19:3–11). Accordingly God blessed his reign (2Ch 17:1–6, 12–18:1) and gave him respite and respect with all the lands round about (2Ch 17:10–11; 20:28–30). He did, however, stop short of a full purging of idolatry (2Ch 20:33); and the marriage of his son Jehoram to Athaliah, Ahab's daughter, was to bring about a tragic condition in Judah (2Ki 8:18–19; 11:1–3; 2Ch 21:6–7, 11).

Three other tragic areas are singled out in the divine record: (1) Jehoshaphat went with Ahab to the battle of Ramoth Gilead, despite Micaiah's warning (cf. 2Ch 18:28–19:3); (2) he subsequently entered into an ill-fated commercial venture with Ahaziah (2Ch 20:35–37); and (3) still later he went with Jehoram on his Transjordanian expedition (2Ki 3:6–27).

47–49 The historical notice is probably intended to explain how it was that Jehoshaphat could have renewed commercial activities in Ezion Geber. The Edomite weakness may be attributable to Jehoshaphat's victory over the Transjordanian coalition, as detailed in 2Ch 20. Jehoshaphat's commercial alliance with Ahaziah was denounced by the Lord through his prophet Eliezer (2Ch 20:36–37). Because Ahaziah was an apostate, God had sent a storm to destroy the fleet before it could set sail. Evidently Jehoshaphat was wise enough to refuse a second trading proposal put forward by Ahaziah.

50 The notice of Jehoshaphat's passing is amplified by the fact that his further life and history were recorded in the historical records of Jehu son of Hanani (cf. 2Ch 20:34).

5. The reign of Ahaziah in the northern kingdom (1Ki 22:51–2Ki 1:18)

51–53 The chapter closes with a notice of the accession of Ahab's son, Ahaziah, and a note that he "provoked the LORD, the God of Israel, to anger, just as his father had done."

OT Text	NT Text	Subject
1Ki 19:10, 14, 18	Ro 11:3–4	A saved remnant

2 Kings 1:1–4 Ahab's son Ahaziah (853–852 B.C.) perpetuated his father's wickedness, incurring God's judicial anger (1Ki 22:51–53). The divine judgment took numerous forms: (1) politically, Moab found in the death of Ahab occasion to rebel against Israel; (2) economically, God thwarted Ahaziah's attempted commercial enterprise with Jehoshaphat (1Ki 22:47–48; 2Ch 20:36–37); (3) personally, the circumstances of Ahaziah's life were allowed to proceed in such a way that Israel's new king suffered a serious fall through the latticework of the upper chamber to the courtyard below.

Ahaziah was aware of the seriousness of his physical condition. In such circumstances a person's basic spiritual temperament will often surface. Immersed in the Baalism of his father, Ahaziah naturally sent messengers to inquire of the oracle at Ekron whether he would recover from his injuries. Scarcely had they begun their mission when suddenly an austere-appearing man, dressed in a rough animal-hide garment girded at the waist with a leather belt, interrupted them. Before they could gather their composure, this man sternly announced the answer to their message, together with a denunciation of the whole mission. The king had erred in seeking information from the false god of the Philistines; and he was wrong in hoping that he might recover, for surely he would die in his wickedness.

5–8 The fearful appearance and awful message caused the messengers to return instantly to the king, where they reported to Ahaziah the whole episode. The king recognized at once that the stern rebuke was from none other than Elijah the Tishbite. In at least this he was correct, for God had caused Elijah to meet the king's messengers and deliver the divine sentence. The secret mission and the hidden desires of the royal chambers were not unknown to the true King of the universe. What an awesome realization that must have been for Ahaziah! Yet there is no hint in the scriptural record that Ahaziah repented. Rather, all that follows speaks of an obdurately stubborn and sinful heart.

9–10 It seems that Ahaziah knew well the whereabouts of Elijah and immediately sent off a contingent of soldiers to bring him (by force if necessary) to the king. Ahaziah apparently picked a commander and squad that shared his insolent ungodliness; for on arriving where Elijah was located, they demanded the prophet's surrender. Elijah seized on the aptness of the prophetic title "man of God"; he was indeed God's man! Since that was so, such ungodliness—even in the line of duty—would be judged. Instantly, at Elijah's bidding, heavenly fire consumed the commander and all his men.

11–14 When the captain and his fifty men did not return, Ahaziah sent a still more arrogant commander together with his fifty-man squad, who met the same judgment. Doubtless word of the fate of those soldiers had by now become known to the king, so that he selected a third commander and his fifty; this selection was of a man of greater wisdom. As this commander and his men dutifully placed themselves before Elijah, they respectfully petitioned him both for their lives and for the prophet to kindly consent to accompany them back to Samaria and to the king.

15–18 In accordance with God's instructions, Elijah went with the commander to Ahaziah where he repeated clearly in the king's ear the divine sentence. Ahaziah's case was settled. Because of his stubborn disbelief and settled wickedness, the king would surely die. And so it happened, his brother Joram succeeding the childless Ahaziah in what was the second year of the reign of Jehoshaphat's son, also named Jehoram (852 B.C.), of the southern kingdom.

6. The eras of Jehoram of the northern kingdom and Jehoram and Ahaziah of the southern kingdom (2:1–9:37)

a. Prophetic transition: Elijah and Elisha (2:1–25)

1–2 The account of Elijah's last journey on earth begins with the aged prophet walking with his trusty aid, Elisha. The two departed from a certain Gilgal, probably not the well-known Gilgal of Joshua's day, but one located some eight miles north of Bethel in the hill country on the way to Shiloh. As they proceeded southward toward Bethel, Elijah indicated to Elisha that the Lord wanted him to go all the way to Bethel to visit his prophetic school there and so urged Elisha to stay on in Gilgal. The polite form of Elijah's command indicates that the prophet's words were permissive rather than prohibitive.

The reason for the command is not explicatively stated. Elijah no doubt knew that this was the day God would take him to be with himself (cf. vv.1, 10) and that he would leave his work to others—especially to Elisha (1Ki 19:16). Perhaps he sought an assurance of the Lord's will with regard to that succession by putting Elisha to the test. More likely the test was primarily for the strengthening of Elisha's faith. It would appear from the narrative that Elijah had disclosed to his various students that his ministry was nearing a close and that one day soon he would pass by for the last time.

Elisha either knew from separate divine communication or strongly suspected that this day might be Elijah's last. Strongly desirous of God's will for his life and concerned that he would indeed succeed Elijah as the Lord's prophet to Israel, Elisha was determined to be with his tutor until the end. Accordingly he would not be dissuaded; he would go where Elijah went.

Even though Elijah knew this was to be his last day on earth, his life was so ordered that he was humbly going about his normal duties when the Lord decided to take him. Moreover, his last concern was that the Lord's work would continue after his passing; so he wanted to assure himself of the progress of his "seminary students."

3 When Elijah and Elisha reached Bethel, the company of prophetic students perhaps wondered whether this would be the expected day. Not wishing to impose themselves on Elijah, they delicately drew Elisha aside to inquire of him whether this was that day. Elisha was convinced of it and indicated as much to them but commanded them strongly not to speak of it. Elijah would have no self-gratifying show of form toward himself. Whatever glory would occur on that day would be to God, not to his prophet. Nor would there be tears of sorrow, for it would be a day of joyous triumph for the Lord. Elijah's wish was for God's work to go on uninterrupted, with or without his presence.

4 As Elijah prepared to leave for the school at Jericho, about fourteen miles to the southeast, he again gave permission to Elisha to remain behind. Once more Elisha steadfastly refused.

5–7 The scene at Bethel was replayed at Jericho. Again the members of the prophetical school asked Elisha about Elijah's departure; again Elisha demanded their silence; again Elijah instructed Elisha to stay behind, this time as he headed for the Jordan River, some five miles away. Once more Elisha averred that he would not leave Elijah's side. Three times Elijah had tested his successor; thrice Elisha stood the test (cf. Mt 4:1–11; Lk 22:31–62; Jn 21:15–27). When the two prophets left for the Jordan, fifty of the prophetical students followed at a distance, anxiously awaiting the Lord's dealing with Elijah. What a contrast these fifty spiritually concerned young men formed with the squads of fifty that Ahaziah had recently sent to Elijah (cf. ch. 1)!

8 The two great prophets, master and successor, stood at the banks of the Jordan. Taking his prophet's mantle and rolling it up rodlike (cf. Ex 14:16–28), Elijah smote the river. Immediately the waters on one side piled up in a heap, the waters on the other side running off toward the Dead Sea. As long ago, the Jordan again parted; and the two passed through on dry ground. Only here the order is reversed. Whereas Israel had crossed into Canaan to take possession of her God-appointed earthly heritage and Elisha, too, must return there to the place of his appointment, Elijah passed out of Canaan through the boundary waters of Jordan to his heavenly service, there to await his future renewed earthly appearance (cf. Mal 4:5; Mt 17:4; Mk 9:5; Lk 9:33). In this regard his ministry anticipated that of his Messiah who came incarnate to an earthly service (Jn 1:12) and subsequently as resurrected Savior ascended again into heaven, there to await his triumphant, glorious second advent (cf. Zec 14:3, 9; Mt 24:30; Ac 1:9–11; 1Ti 3:16; Rev 19:11–17).

9 Elijah, sensing the imminency of his departure, asked what further thing he could do for his successor. To the very end he remained concerned for others and for the continuance of God's work.

Elisha's reply suggests that he caught the intent of his master's question. He asked for a double portion of Elijah's spirit. Undoubtedly Elisha did not ask this simply for the privilege of being Elijah's successor in terms of the Deuteronomic legislation concerning the eldest son's inheritance (Dt 21:17), for such both he and Elijah knew him to be (cf. 1Ki 19:16–21). Nor was this simply to give some confirmatory sign for Elisha's appearance, for this is scarcely a "difficult thing." Rather, the enormity of the loss of Elijah, that Spirit-filled and empowered prophet, must have so gripped the humble Elisha that, claiming his position as firstborn, he asked for the firstborn's "double portion"—i.e., for especially granted spiritual power far beyond his own capabilities to meet the responsibilities of the awesome task that lay before him. He wished, virtually, that Elijah's mighty prowess might continue to live through him.

10 All this lay beyond Elijah's power to grant. Nonetheless it was not beyond the divine prerogative. Indeed, doubtless by divine direction, Elijah told Elisha that if God so chose to allow Elisha to see Elijah's translation, then (and only then) would the full force of Elisha's request be granted. The sign would indicate to Elisha that God, who alone could grant such a request, had done so.

11–12 And so it would be! Suddenly, as the two walked and talked together, a fiery chariot swooped between them and took Elijah along in its terrific wind up into heaven. It was over in an instant. Elisha could but cry out in amazed tribute to his departed master. The translated prophet had been a spiritual father to Israel and as such, spiritually, her foremost defense. Elisha would doubtless be pleased at the same testimony given to him at his death (13:14). Elijah was now gone. One era had ended; another had begun.

13–14 In joy mixed with sorrow, Elisha turned from viewing the heavenly spectacle that had assured him of his request to Elijah and saw yet a further sign—Elijah's fallen mantle lay at Elisha's feet. The younger prophet had once had that mantle symbolically laid on his shoulders (1Ki 19:19); now it would rest there permanently. All he need do was pick it up. As he did so, "he picked up" as well the load of service that Elijah had left for him to do. With that very same mantle, he retraced his steps and reached the Jordan. Repeating Elijah's actions, he cried out for divine intervention on his behalf. Once again the Jordan parted, bringing not only full confirmation of his prophetic office to Elisha, but divine accreditation for him before the eyes of the fifty students who had witnessed the entire event.

15–18 The fifty instantly recognized the transferral of prophetic prominence to Elisha and accepted his leadership. The maker of Elijah's actual translation to heaven without seeing death was more difficult to comprehend, as was the mysterious doings of the Spirit of God with humankind (cf. 1Ki 18:12). To their repeated insistence that they be allowed to search the existing countryside to be sure that Elijah was truly no longer in the vicinity, Elisha at last gave in. When they were fully satisfied that Elijah was nowhere to be found, they returned to Elisha, doubtless with greater resolve to listen to their new leader.

19–22 The chapter closes with two miracles of Elisha. These immediately established the character of his ministry—his would be a helping ministry to those in need, but one that would brook no disrespect for God and his earthly representatives. In the case of Jericho, though the city had been rebuilt (with difficulty) in the days of Ahab (1Ki 16:34), it had remained unproductive. Apparently the water still lay under Joshua's curse (cf. Jos 6:26), so that both citizenry and land suffered greatly. Elisha's miracle fully removed the age-old judgment, thus allowing a new era to dawn on this area. Interestingly, Elisha wrought the cure through means supplied by the people of Jericho so that their faith might be strengthened through submission and active participation in God's cleansing work.

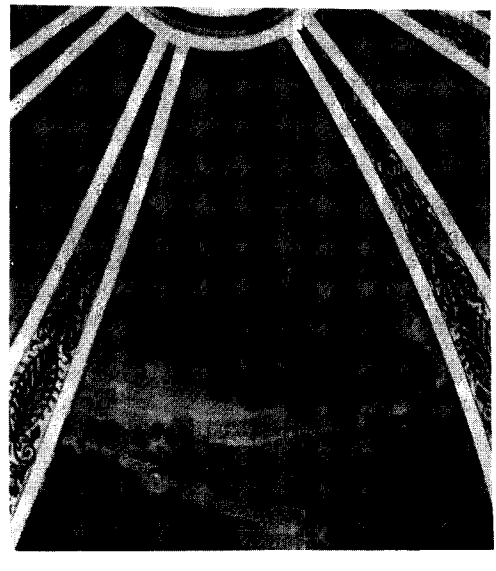
23–25 Elisha's sweet memories of Jericho received a souring touch at Bethel. The public insult against Elisha was a mocking caricature of Elijah's going up into heaven, aimed ultimately at the God whom he represented. Indeed, Elisha's whole prophetic ministry was in jeopardy; therefore the youths' taunt had to be dealt with decisively. The sudden arrival of the two bears who mauled forty-two youths to death would serve as both an awful sentence on unbelievers—and thus, too, on Jeroboam's cult city—and a published reminder that blasphemy against the true God and his program would be met with swift and certain consequences. With these two miracles Elisha's position as successor to Elijah as God's chief prophet to Israel was assured.

b. Jehoram and the Moabite campaign (3:1–27)

1–5 The notice of Jehoram's (Joram's) accession over Israel is accompanied by a spiritual evaluation. Although he had torn down the stele to Baal that Ahab and Jezebel had erected, his perpetuation of the state cult of the golden calves that Jeroboam had established was condemnable. Thus he led Israel in continued apostasy. Within a few years of the beginning of Jehoram's twelve-year reign (852–841 B.C.), Mesha, the Moabite king, refused to send the required tribute of wool and rebelled against Israel.

6–9 Quickly mobilizing his forces, Jehoram also enlisted Jehoshaphat of Judah to join with him in the expedition against the Moabites. Jehoshaphat remained a relative of Jehoram of Israel; for his son (and coregent), also named Jehoram, was married to the Jehoram of Israel's aunt, Athaliah. Jehoshaphat quickly agreed. Moreover, he probably felt that he had a score to settle with Moab for the previous Moabite-Judean war (2Ch 20:1–29). In that campaign Judah had regained mastery over previously held Ezion Geber and apparently had control over Edom itself; for when Jehoram asked his advice in planning the expedition, Jehoshaphat immediately proposed a route through Edom. Not only would this have the element of surprise to commend it, but it would gain the allied help of the Edomite forces. Moreover, it would ensure the invaders not only protection for the rear, but the advantage of avoiding a head-on assault across the Arnon River and into the Moabite strength that a northern invasion would necessitate. Nevertheless a week's trek through the eastern Edomite watershed nearly accomplished what the Moabites desired: the wasting of the total armed forces of the allies together with their water supply. The allies seemed at the point of extinction.

10–14 The king of Israel was terrified, seeing only certain doom. Jehoshaphat, whatever his shortcomings, was concerned with spiritual things, and, as on another occasion (1Ki 22:7), he asked for a true prophet of the Lord. One of Jehoram's attendants reported that the prophet Elisha was available. Recognizing that God's presence was with Elisha, Jehoshaphat led the other two kings to God's prophet. At their approach Elisha addressed Jehoram—whose war with the Moabites the campaign really was—with words of strong rebuke. Why had Jehoram come to God's prophet and not to those of Baal, whom Israel's royal house served? But for King Jehoshaphat's sake, Elisha promised the kings that he would seek God's mind in this situation.



The ascension of Elijah into heaven in a fiery chariot has captured the hearts of artists throughout the centuries. The picture above is a depiction of this event that is found in the Roman catacombs (second to third century). To the right is a painting of the same event on the ceiling of the Carmelite monastery on Mount Carmel.

15–19 Having called for a harpist, Elisha went to prayer. God's answer came: there would be ample water for the physical needs; moreover the Lord would give them victory over the Moabites. The revelation included directions for human response. The kings' men were to dig ditches; for though they would see no storm, yet the Lord would send water in abundance.

20–25 At the time of the morning sacrifice, the area was filled to overflowing with water that ran down out of the mountains of Edom. God had sent necessary, life-giving water. Flash flooding in otherwise dry wadis is common enough in arid portions of the world. Not only the timing of the heaven-sent waters, but the total effect of their arrival bespeak the miraculous fulfillment of Elisha's prophetic message.

These waters were to spell death for the Moabites. Viewing that same water, reddened by the soil and gleaming all the redder in the rising eastern sun, the enemy mistook it for blood and, surmising that the three former antagonists had had a falling out that had led to their near mutual extermination, they rushed to the Israelite camp intent on plunder. Too late they realized their mistake. The disorganized Moabite soldiers were met by the well-stationed allies who not only turned them back but, in turn, invaded Moab, effecting a great destruction. The Moabites fell back in disarray as far as Kir Hareseth, where they determined to make a final stand.

26–27 As the desperate struggle of the siege of Kir Hareseth continued, the frenzied Moabite king sacrificed his firstborn son and the heir to the throne so that the anger of his gods might be appeased and the city delivered. While Moab's god could never deliver the king and the city, the act had the desired effect. Sickened by the maddened spectacle of senseless human sacrifice, the allies lifted the siege and returned to their homes.

c. Elisha's miracles (4:1–6:7)

(1) The replenishing of the widow's oil (4:1–7)

1 Chapters 4–7 make up the heart of what is frequently known as the Elisha cycle (chs. 2–13), being a collection of Elisha's miraculous deeds and ministry. The first of these records the special case of a widow who, because her husband had been a prophet, came to Elisha for aid. The death of her husband had brought on desperate circumstances: an outstanding indebtedness she was unable to meet had occasioned her creditor's insistence that her two children be taken as slaves to work off the debt. However inhumane this might seem, the creditor was within his rights; for Mosaic Law allowed him to enslave the debtor and his children until the Year of Jubilee in order to work off a debt (Ex 21:2–4; Lev 25:39; Ne 5:5; Isa 50:1; Am 2:6; 8:6; cf. Mt 18:25).

2–4 Having learned from the woman that she had nothing that could provide sustenance for the family except a small flask of oil (for anointing the body), Elisha instructed her to borrow utensils from her neighbors and, having done so, to shut herself up in her house and fill them with the oil that would come from the flask. She could thus repay her creditor and use the overabundance for her family's needs.

5–7 The woman responded in faith and, miraculously, all came to pass as Elisha had promised. The fact that she herself was to act in faith would enlarge her faith; the fact that Elisha would not be there when the miracle took place would display the power of God alone and thus encourage her to still greater faith. Devout obedience can produce brimful spiritual blessings!

(2) The revivification of the Shunammite's son (4:8–37)

8–14 The course of Elisha's ministry often took him through Shunem, where certain kind friends lived. Accordingly, at the wife's suggestion, the husband prepared special quarters for Elisha wherein he might rest. On one such journey Elisha wondered how he might repay the Shunammite woman's many kindnesses to him. When she indicated that she lived comfortably among her own people and had no special needs, Gehazi, Elisha's attendant, pointed out that the couple was childless; and, since the husband was old, the woman's longing for a child seemed hopeless. Jewish tradition asserts that Gehazi's motives were engendered by lust. Certainly the suggestion may have been innocent enough; but as the story unfolds, it does appear that the woman surely did not trust Gehazi.

15–28 Under divine direction Elisha acted at Gehazi's suggestion and informed the Shunammite woman that in the next year she would give birth to a son. So it came to pass, at the appointed time the child was born and in time grew into a young lad. One day as he helped his father in the field, the lad was taken suddenly critically ill and died. After placing the lad's body on the bed in the chamber of the prophet who had first announced his life, the Shunammite lady immediately set out for Mount Carmel where Elisha was ministering. Her faith convinced her that somehow Elisha could be instrumental in again doing the seemingly impossible. He had previously announced life for her who had no hope of producing life; perhaps he could once more give life to her son. Bypassing Gehazi whom Elisha had sent to meet her, she made directly for Elisha; and grasping tightly his feet, she poured out the details of the tragedy.

29–30 Elisha quickly sent Gehazi ahead with instructions to lay the prophet's staff on the dead lad. Although the author of Kings assigns no reason for Elisha's instructions and actions, Elisha surely did not send Gehazi on a hopeless mission. Because he was young, Gehazi could cover the distance to Shunem quickly; and it was imperative that a representative of God arrive there as soon as possible. Very likely Gehazi's task was preparatory and symbolic of the impending arrival of Elisha himself.

But the woman, who apparently had never trusted Gehazi, would entrust neither herself nor the final disposition of her son to him but rather stayed with Elisha until he could reach Shunem. Her faith and concern for her son's cure were totally centered in God's approved prophet.

31–37 As Elisha and the mother approached the city, Gehazi reported that, though he had carried out Elisha's bidding, nothing at all had happened. Perhaps Gehazi had expected something extraordinary. But the merely routine fulfilling of one's duties will never effect successful spiritual results. Elisha went straight to the dead lad and, putting all others out and shutting the door, besought the Lord for the lad's life. His prayers were followed with prophetic symbolic actions, doubtless learned from his teacher Elijah's experience with the widow of Zarephath (cf. 1Ki 17:17–22). Elisha stretched his body on the lad's so that his mouth, eyes, and hands correspondingly met those of the lad; and the boy's body grew warm again. After rising and walking about in continued prayer, he repeated the symbolic action. This time the lad sneezed seven times and opened his eyes. Having sent Gehazi for the mother, Elisha delivered the recovered lad to her. The woman gratefully thanked the prophet, joyfully took up her son, and went out.

As in the case of Elijah and the widow of Zarephath, both Elisha and the Shunammite woman had seen their faith successfully tested; and they were rewarded with the desires of their hearts and corresponding increase in their faith.

(3) The rectification of dinner problems (4:38–44)

38–41 This chapter closes with two incidents relative to Elisha's miraculous help in food matters in the prophetic school at Gilgal. In the first instance, a student who had been sent to gather wild vegetables brought an unknown type to them and cut the gatherings into the stew. Its bitter taste convinced the diners that the stew was poisoned; so immediately they cried out to Elisha. He called for flour to be brought; and when he had stirred it into the pot, the stew was found to be both tasteful and safe. Elisha's faith effected a miraculous cure. As had been the case with Elijah his teacher, Elisha had used flour to demonstrate the concern of God for one's daily provisions (cf. 1Ki 17:14–16).

42–43 The second case involves the multiplication of a score of small loaves of fresh barley bread and some ears of new grain. These had been brought to Elisha as firstfruits. Normally these portions were reserved for God (Lev 23:20) and the Levitical priests (Nu 18:13; Dt 18:4–5). Because the religion in the northern kingdom was apostate, the loaves had been brought by their owner to one whom he considered to be the true repository of godly religion in Israel. Elisha did not hesitate. He ordered them distributed to the young prophets, despite the protest of his servant (probably Gehazi) who realized that, humanly speaking, the gift was insufficient to feed everyone. Nevertheless Elisha ordered their distribution, telling his servant that there would surely be sufficient for all—in fact, some would be left over.

44 As Elisha had promised, so it came to pass. Elisha's faith in the miracle-working God had again been rewarded; and he, on whom the believer is to wait for daily bread, had supplied richly (cf. Mt 6:21).

(4) The restoration of Naaman (5:1–27)

1–7 The latter days of the reign of Israel's king Jehoram were marked by hostilities with the Aramean king Ben-Hadad II. Probably due to Israel's failure to participate in the continued Syro(Aramean)-Assyrian confrontation that marked most of the sixth decade of the ninth century B.C., the Arameans continually chastened the northern kingdom with systematic raids (cf. 2Ki 6:8), culminating in an all-out military excursion into Israel (cf. 2Ki 6:24–7:20).

During the course of one such raid, an Israelite maiden had fallen into the hands of Ben-Hadad's field marshal, Naaman. Although Naaman was a brilliant commanding officer, he suffered from a serious and incurable skin disease. On one occasion when Naaman was home from fighting and relations were stabilized somewhat between Damascus and Israel, the Israelite servant girl informed her Aramean master that there was a prophet in Israel who could effect Naaman's cure. When Naaman was advised of such a hope, he spoke to Ben-Hadad who, in turn, sent Naaman with rich gifts and a letter of introduction to Jehoram so that the Syrian (Aramean) general might be healed. Jehoram, believing the situation to be impossible, thought that Ben-Hadad was seeking an occasion for renewed warfare. Evidently no mention was made of Israel's prophet in the correspondence, so that Jehoram was unaware of the context of the request.

8–14 News of the whole affair reached Elisha, who sent word to Jehoram that God was still at work in Israel and could work through his authoritative prophet. Accordingly Naaman was sent to Elisha, who, rather than receiving him, sent his servant to meet Naaman. He must understand that Elisha served a greater king than did the Syrian (Aramean) general. However Elisha's message through Gehazi was one of great hope. If he would but wash himself seven times in the Jordan, he would be cleansed. Naaman, angered by his poor reception and thinking Elisha was a quack, strode away angrily. Yet God was at work in the proud, self-reliant Gentile's life; he used Naaman's own Aramean aide, who suggested that since Elisha's instructions were simple enough, they ought to be tested. What did he have to lose? Naaman followed the advice and was instantly cured.

15–19 Gratefully Naaman returned to Elisha and offered him rich gifts. Although Naaman urged them on him insistently, the prophet refused. Naaman had become convinced that Israel's Lord alone was God. Naaman asked Elisha whether two mule loads of Israelite soil might be taken with him back to Syria so that whenever circumstances forced him to bow ceremonially to the Aramean gods with his king, he might in reality be placing his knees in the soil of the true God of Israel. Thus he might be a true, though secret, believer. His request granted, Naaman set out for home.

20–21 The story next focuses on Gehazi, who saw an opportunity to gain some of the proffered commodities for himself. Slipping away stealthily, he overtook the Syrian (Aramean) general. What a contrast can be seen in the meeting between Naaman and Gehazi! Naaman's descent from his chariot to meet Elisha's servant was a mark of his being a changed man. No longer a proud, arrogant person, the grateful, reverent, and humble Aramean came down from his honored place to meet a prophet's servant. He who had been a fallen, hopeless sinner displayed the true believer's grace. Contrariwise Gehazi, who had enjoyed all the privileges of his master's grace, was about to abuse them and fall from that favor.

22–26 Having convinced Naaman that Elisha had experienced an unexpected need, he extracted from the grateful Syrian (Aramean) commander a handsome sum of gifts, which he subsequently concealed until he could have opportunity to retrieve them. He then attempted to steal back to Elisha's house unnoticed—only to be confronted by the prophet. His master knew all that had transpired! Gehazi's lies only worsened the situation.

27 Accordingly, Elisha announced Gehazi's punishment: Naaman's leprosy would become Gehazi's. Elisha's privileged aide was banished in disgrace, for he had misused his favored position in an attempt to acquire wealth for himself. Gehazi needed to learn that the ministry has no place for those who would make merchandise of it. The moral and spiritual flaws in his character that one senses in the previous record have surfaced. His basic spiritual insensitivity had betrayed him in the time of testing so that rather than his character being refined, his work was refused.

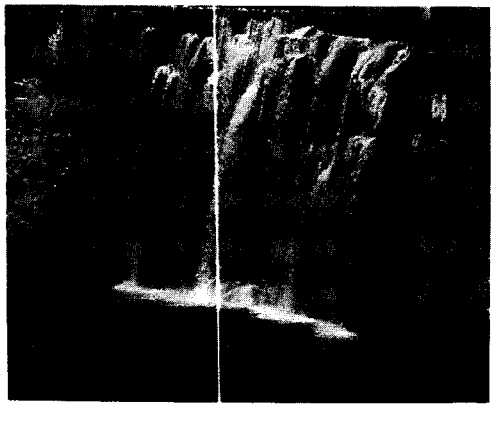
(5) The recovery of the axhead (6:1–7)

1–7 In contrast to Gehazi who had received the reward of his unfaithfulness, the account unfolded here is a demonstration of the reward of faithful labor. During the evil days of Jehoram's reign and Elisha's prophetic ministry, a certain meeting place for the sons of the prophet's instruction proved too small for their assembly. This school apparently was located in Jericho near the Jordan, a known center of prophetic instruction (cf. ch. 2). Accordingly Elisha acceded to the request to build larger quarters and even went with them to the work. In the course of their labor, one student lost the iron axhead of his borrowed ax and cried out to Elisha. In the power of God, Elisha then caused the submerged axhead to surface and instructed the pupil to retrieve the ax; thus he would personally participate in the miracle. Attempts to explain fully or to explain away the miracle are fruitless.



Naaman was told by Elisha's servant to wash in the River Jordan seven times. This is a waterfall that is found on the river.

d. Elisha's ministry (6:8–8:15)

(1) Prelude to war: the Aramean incursion (6:8–23)

8–12 The account now returns to the intermittent warfare between the Arameans and Israelites. Time after time the Israelite king and his forces were delivered from ambush because of Elisha's warning, for by divine revelation Elisha was party to the Aramean king's secret plans. Elisha's aid to Jehoram became common knowledge and was duly reported to the Aramean king, who had suspected a traitor within his own court.

13–20 Accordingly, having learned that Elisha had gone to Dothan, the Arameans surrounded the city by night to take Elisha by force. Doubtless Elisha knew about all this, too, but allowed himself to be trapped so that the subsequent entrapment of the Arameans might work to God's glory and for his good. When Elisha's servant awakened and saw the great Aramean force, he cried out in dismay to Elisha. Elisha, however, assured him that the forces of God outnumbered the forces of the enemy. In accordance with Elisha's prayer, the servant's eyes were enabled to behold the company of an innumerable angelic host that stood ready to intervene for Elisha. However, this incident would not be one of protracted battle but another case of miraculous deliverance. In accordance with Elisha's prayer, the enemy army became totally blind and was led away by Elisha to Samaria, about ten miles away. Once inside the city, the army discovered that instead of taking Elisha captive, they were prisoners of Jehoram!

21–23 At Elisha's directions, rather than killing their enemies, the Israelites treated them to a sumptuous feast and, having given them provisions for the journey home to Syria (Aram) , sent them away. Elisha's intercession and instructions proved ultimately to be the divine remedy for the momentary ills of Israel: the Arameans reported Israel's kindness, and their guerrilla raids ceased.

(2) The siege of Samaria (6:24–7:20)

24 At a later date war broke out again between Ben-Hadad II and Jehoram. Perhaps the miraculously arranged temporary lull had been divinely designed to teach Israel God's abiding love and concern for his people, to whom he had sent his duly authenticated prophet, Elisha. But with no evidence of repentance by Israel, God withdrew his protective hand; and Israel faced a full-scale Syrian (Aramean) invasion. The Arameans were eminently successful, penetrating to the very gates of Samaria itself and putting the city under a dire siege.

25–29 The lengthy siege evoked a severe famine that, in turn, produced highly inflated prices for the humblest commodities. So scarce had food become that one day, as the king was on a tour about the embattled city's wall, he stumbled on a case of cannibalism. By agreement two women had eaten the son of one of them; but when it came time for the second woman to surrender her son to the fire, she had hidden him, thus occasioning the first woman's complaint to the king.

30–33 Jehoram's reaction was one of anguished horror. He tore his robes, revealing his sackcloth garments of grief underneath. Enraged and blaming Elisha for the whole affair, he dispatched a messenger to seize and behead Elisha. When he had come to himself, however, he ran after his messenger, hoping to stay his hand. By divine insight Elisha knew the details of the whole episode and instructed certain elders who were with him to bar the door of the house until Jehoram could overtake his executioners. When the king arrived, he was admitted into the house. Convinced that the Lord had pronounced the doom of the city, Jehoram had all but given up any hope of the Lord's deliverance. Yet perhaps his realization that all that had transpired was from the Lord carried with it the faintest hope that God would yet miraculously intervene. The restraint of the messenger and the king's words hint at the faint hope of divine consolation. Such comfort Elisha would proceed to give.

7:1–2 Elisha seized on the king's last glimmer of hope. By the next day conditions would so improve that products would be available again, even though at a substantial price. Jehoram's chief aide found such a statement preposterous. Even if the Lord should open the windows of heaven and pour down a flood of flour and grain, so dire had the famine been that even this would not suffice to effect Elisha's prediction.

The aide's words are filled with ridicule and heaped with sarcasm, as if to say, "Oh sure, The Lord is even now making windows in heaven! So what? Could this word of yours still come to pass?" Whether the aide thought of the biblical phrase (Ge 7:11) or of the heavenly windows of the Baal fertility cult is uncertain. In any case he was skeptical of the whole thing.

The prophet assured Jehoram's aide that not only would the prophecy come true, but the officer would see it with his own eyes. However, he would not eat any of it! His faithless incredulity would cause him to miss God's blessing on the people.

3–5 God moves mysteriously. His means of effecting the fulfillment of Elisha's prophecy were perhaps no less amazing than the aide's taunts. Four leprous men who lived outside the city gate knew that their situation was desperate. Accordingly, they resolved to surrender to the Arameans. Death already stared them in the face; they had nothing to lose by going over to the Syrians (Arameans). Slipping away at twilight they traveled circuitously to the far end of the besieger's encampment. As they moved cautiously into the camp, to their surprise they met not one man—the camp was totally deserted.

6–7 The author of Kings explains that the Lord had miraculously caused the Arameans to hear what seemed to them the approach of a great army to liberate the besieged Israelites. Throwing caution to the wind, they had abandoned the camp with its supplies, running for fear of their lives. Precisely how the Lord produced the desired effect is not stated; but whatever the method, the Lord had once again miraculously intervened for his undeserving people.

8–14 The four rushed about eating and drinking their fill, gathering and hiding their booty. When the exhilaration of the moment had worn off, they realized that as Israelites it was their duty to tell the good news to others. Accordingly they hurried on the shortest way to the city and informed the gatekeepers that the Arameans had suddenly left. The good news reverberated throughout the city, reaching even the ears of the sleeping king. A cautious Jehoram was not so certain of the state of affairs. Perhaps the Arameans had withdrawn a bit to lure the Israelites into the camp so as to fall on them unawares and thus gain entrance into Samaria. Acting on the advice of his officers, he sent two chariot teams to scout out the whereabouts of the Arameans. While Jehoram could scarcely spare them, yet if they were overtaken by the enemy, their plight would be little worse than what seemed inevitable should they remain in Samaria.

15 The scouting party soon returned with the staggering news. It was all true. For some reason the Arameans had fled in panic, leaving the road strewn with equipment and clothing as far as the Jordan River.

16–20 The king commanded the people to go to the Aramean camp and plunder it. By day's end Elisha's amazing prophecy stood fulfilled, including the portion that dealt with Jehoram's aide. For in their mad rush for spoil, the people trampled him to death in the gateway he had been assigned to guard.

(3) Postscript to war: the restitution of the Shunammite's land and the coup d'état of Hazael (8:1–15)

1–6 Chapter 8 opens with a last glimpse of Elisha's former servant, Gehazi. Apparently King Jehoram of Israel had summoned Gehazi to learn from a reliable source something of the great prophet whose miraculous prediction had just come to pass. The wise deployment of divine providence is also in evidence; for the Shunammite woman (probably widowed by this time) had just returned after the seven-year famine that she had fled from at Elisha's warning, only to find her property had been appropriated by someone else.

A woman of strong resolve, she immediately determined to take her case directly to the king, to whom she was going when she happened on Jehoram talking with Gehazi. God hadso arranged the details of life that Gehazi could identify the woman and so aid in the verification of her claim; and she, in turn, would be living proof of Gehazi's account to the king of Elisha's mighty deeds. The king acceded to her request.

7–8 The next incident from the Elisha cycle both closes the wars with Ben-Hadad II and initiates the critical circumstances that would culminate in the crucial events of 841 B.C. Ben–Hadad II, the Aramean king (860-842 B.C.), lay ill. News reached him that his old antagonist, Elisha, was at that very moment traveling in the area. Feeling that Elisha's arrival might be fortuitous, he sent Hazael, one of his trusted officials, with an appropriate royal escort to inquire of Elisha whether or not he would recover from his sickness. He could not know, of course, that Elisha had come to carry out the Lord's instructions to Elijah relative to dynastic change, both in Damascus and in Samaria (1Ki 19:15–17).

9–11a Hazael dutifully carried out his master's instructions. Elisha's reply to Hazael was an enigmatic one: the answer to the king's question was both yes and no. Yes: if left to normal circumstances of healing, the king would recover; and no: Elisha, who was at that moment anointing Hazael as king, knew that this treacherous man would use the king's illness to effect his coup d'état. Accordingly Hazael could testify truthfully to the king. The illness was not a fatal one of itself. Elisha's reply and icy stare indicate that Hazael had already plotted the king's demise through the situation and that Elisha knew his secret thoughts. Hazael blushed in shame.

11b–13 Elisha's stares soon turned to weeping. In answer to Hazael's question, Elisha indicated that he wept for the great barbarity that Hazael, as Aram's next king, would inflict on Israel. Despite Hazael's protests to the contrary, such would indeed be the case (cf. 10:32–33; 13:3).

14–15 Doubtless Elisha's assurances to Hazael that he would be the next king of Damascus gave pretext to him that he had a mandate to be carried out. When he returned to the palace, he told his master the good news: the king would surely recover. However, the next day opportunity came to carry out the long-standing purpose. Having smothered the king, he assumed the throne.

e. The reign of Jehoram of the southern kingdom (8:16–24)

16–18 The author of Kings now shifts his attention to the southern kingdom and to the two sons of Jehoshaphat. The synchronism of v.16 records the year of Jehoram's assumption of full power of state. Jehoram's ungodly character is noted along with the primary factor in the spiritual apostasy: his marriage to Ahab's daughter. The Chronicler (2Ch 21:11) adds that Jehoram made the entire nation of Judah to sin according to the religion of the Canaanites.

19–24 The perverse nature of Jehoram is further evidenced in that after his father's death he slew all his brothers and any possible claimant to the throne (2Ch 21:2–4). Despite Jehoram's spiritual and moral bankruptcy, God honored the covenant with the house of David (cf. 2Ch 21:7) and did not destroy the kingdom. Nevertheless Jehoram and Judah did experience judgment in the form of three military engagements (cf. 2Ch 21:10): (1) Edom revolted successfully, a rebellion that nearly cost Jehoram his life in attempting to suppress it (cf. 2Ch 21:8–10a); (2) simultaneously Libnah revolted (cf. 2Ch 21:10b); and (3) the Philistines and Arabians launched a massive attack that reached Jerusalem itself and cost the king all his sons except Ahaziah (cf. 2Ch 21:16–17 with 2Ch 22:1). Judah and its kings were smitten with the plague (2Ch 21:12–15), Jehoram himself succumbing eventually to an incurable disease in the bowels (2Ch 21:15, 18–19). Thus an unfortunate period of Judah's history, in the form of a wicked and apostate son of the house of David, passed, wicked Jehoram himself being excluded from the royal sepulcher (2Ch 21:20b).

f. The reign of Ahaziah of the southern kingdom (8:25–29)

25–26a Ahaziah succeeded his father, Jehoram, in the critical year 841 B.C. He was not to survive the momentous waves of political events that were to inundate the ancient Near East in that year. Indeed, in 841 B.C. Shalmaneser III of Assyria (859–824 B.C.) at last was able to break the coalition of western allies with whom he had previously fought a long series of battles (853, 848, 845). While all these complex details were part of God's teleological processes in the government of the nations and his dealing with Israel, doubtless the long-standing controversy and the growing specter of Assyrian power could be felt in the political intrigues that brought about the death of Ben-Hadad II of Damascus and the downfall of the Omride Dynasty in Israel. Before 841 had ended, Hazael would be master of Damascus (where Shalmaneser had set him up after having defeated him in battle), the pro-Assyrian Jehu would initiate the fourth dynasty in Israel (chs. 9–10), and the wicked Athaliah would sit as usurper on the throne of Judah (ch. 11).

26b–29 Ahaziah, too, was under the pagan spell of wicked Athaliah (cf. 2Ch 22:3–5) and perpetuated the Baalism that his father had fostered. Likewise, at the first opportunity he joined Ahab's son Jehoram in renewed hostilities with the Arameans in Ramoth Gilead (1Ki 22:1–40). Once more the battle went badly for Israel and Judah, for in that battle King Jehoram was sorely wounded and returned to Jezreel for rest and recovery from his wounds (cf. 9:11–16). The chapter ends with a concerned Ahaziah going to visit Jehoram in Jezreel. He would not return to Jerusalem alive (cf. 9:16, 24–29).

g. The reign of Jehoram of the northern kingdom (9:1–37)

1 In those critical days when King Jehoram remained at the royal retreat in Jezreel recuperating from his wounds suffered in the battle against the Arameans at Ramoth Gilead (8:28–29; 9:14), Elisha summoned his trusty attendant, who was one of the "company of the prophets," in order to send him with a commission to anoint the next king of Israel. The scene of this anointing would be that same Ramoth Gilead where the Israelite troops remained stationed in prolonged confrontation with the Damascene Arameans.

2–3 Once there the young prophet was to single out Jehu, the ranking army commander, take him aside privately into a room, pour a flask of oil on his head, and pronounce that God had anointed him as the next king of Israel. Having accomplished his task, the prophet was immediately to hasten from the house so as to avoid any diminishing of the act itself. God's work is often best done and left to have its own impact.

4–10 The young prophet duly did as he was instructed. Arriving in Ramoth Gilead, he sought out Jehu; and, having brought him into the house, he anointed his head and delivered God's solemn words to him. Jehu's divine commission was twofold: (1) he was to annihilate all the wicked and apostate house of Ahab and (2) thereby avenge the blood of God's own who had been martyred for their faithfulness. In this, Jehu was to be God's instrument of divine vengeance against Jezebel's bloody persecutions. When he had finished these words in obedience to his orders, he literally ran from the house.

11–13 After the young prophet had fled, Jehu went out to the court where his fellow officers were sitting. They, of course, wanted to know what had occasioned the arrival of "this madman" (GK 8713). The term betrays the low spiritual condition of the soldiers and carries with it their contempt for God's prophets. When Jehu replied rather nonchalantly that this sort of character was liable to say anything, the officers, suspecting something important had occurred, pressed him all the harder. Jehu then revealed the gist of what had happened: God had sent the prophet to anoint him as king! Perhaps recalling the similar past anointings of Saul and David and assuredly sporting for insurrection, the officers responded immediately, spreading their cloaks under Jehu as a sign of submission. Having blown the trumpet, they proclaimed to all the army that Jehu was the next king of Israel.

14–16 The enthusiastic response to the prophet's pronouncement by his men prompted Jehu to take an active lead in a formal coup d'état. Having doubtless left a security force to continue the defense of Ramoth Gilead and having given instructions that none be allowed to slip out of the city and go with a warning to Jehoram in Jezreel, Jehu took a select group of troops and set out for Jezreel and the recuperating Jehoram. In God's providence (cf. 2Ch 22:7), Ahaziah of Judah was at Jezreel visiting his ailing relative (cf. 8:29).

17–21 The scene switches to Jezreel. As Jehu rode swiftly toward the city, the watchman announced the approach of troops. Jehoram sent a messenger on horseback to intercept the column and inquire as to its mission. When the horseman reached Jehu and asked him whether all was well, Jehu bid him to fall in with his troops, which he did. When the watchman reported all this to Jehoram, a second horseman was sent out—with the same result. When the watchman next reported that the approach of the chariot looked like the wild driving of Jehu, Jehoram and Ahaziah rode their chariots out to meet him. Significantly, they met Jehu at the plot of ground that Ahab had purloined from Naboth.

22–24 A third time Jehu was asked whether he had come in peace. The royal query was greeted in a still rougher manner than the preceding two. Jehoram's espousal of the idolatry and witchcraft instituted by Jezebel had rendered any talk of "peace" impossible. Jehoram realized that Jehu's reply meant that a coup d'etat was taking place. Having warned Ahaziah of the treachery, Jehoram attempted to flee but was struck dead in his chariot by Jehu's well-aimed arrow.

25–29 In fulfillment of Elijah's prophetic threat (cf. 1Ki 21:19–24), which apparently Jehu and his chariot officers had heard, Jehu instructed his aide to throw Jehoram's fallen body onto Naboth's field. Ahaziah's attempt to escape Jehu was also abortive. Taken at face value, this account seems to say that Ahaziah was wounded on the ascent to Gur and died in Megiddo, from which his body was taken to Jerusalem for burial. In 2Ch 22:8–9, Ahaziah was overtaken in Samaria where he had sought refuge with relatives and was brought to Jehu and executed, his body being interred with honor by Jehu's men. One possibility of reconciling the accounts is to suggest that although Ahaziah was wounded at the ascent to Gur, he was apprehended by Jehu's men in Samaria (where he lay recovering from his wounds) and then taken to Megiddo, where he was put to death, his body being given to his servants who took him to Jerusalem for burial (v.28; cf. 2Ch 22:9).

30–34a News of all this had no doubt reached Jezebel. Sensing her own imminent demise, she arranged herself in queenly fashion and went to the window to await Jehu's arrival. As Jehu entered the gate below, she called tauntingly to him with words calculated to cut Jehu down to size. Jehu is called a "Zimri," a name that had become synonymous with "traitor," the implication being that usurpers usually do not last too long themselves. Jehu was fully up to the occasion. Looking up to the window where Jezebel was, he called out for anyone who would stand with him. When some of the eunuchs responded to Jehu's bidding, Jezebel was thrown to the courtyard below. Jehu subsequently rode over the fallen body and went in to dine in the banquet hall of his predecessor.

34b–37 Later, on thinking over the events that had recently transpired, Jehu gave instructions that Jezebel's body be given a proper burial, since she had been a king's daughter. But his second thoughts were too late. The servant found precious little of Jezebel's remains. When this was reported to Jehu, he recognized immediately the full force of Elijah's awful prophecy (cf. 1Ki 21:23).

C. The Era of the Fourth Dynasty (10:1–15:12)

1. The reign of Jehu in the northern kingdom (10:1–36)

1–8 With the deaths of Jehoram (9:24–26), Ahaziah and his attendants (2Ch 22:8–9), and Jezebel (2Ki 9:32–33), Jehu next moved to eliminate any competitive threat to his newly won crown from the surviving members of the royal family who had taken refuge in Samaria, the capital city. He warned those officials who cared for them to prepare for battle. The heads of state in Samaria felt that resistance was futile and sent Jehu a letter of submission. With this concession in hand, Jehu sent a second letter, demanding that the heads of Jehoram's surviving heirs be brought to him in Jezreel. Again the officials complied and sent the severed heads to Jehu, who then had them placed in two piles before the gate of Jezreel. This gruesome deed was often practiced in the ancient Near East.

9–11 On the next day Jehu addressed the assembled people, absolved them of any guilt, and again proclaimed his divine mission. While it was true that he had slain his master, the heads of the slain sons of the house of Ahab had come there through other means and so were a further sign that all of Elijah's prophetic threats were coming to pass. Having said that, Jehu ordered the seizure and execution of any who might yet remain of Ahab's descendants in Jezreel, as well as any of Jehoram's officials, aides, and friends. Even the state priests who served them were put to death.

12–14 With affairs settled to his liking in Jezreel, acting on the favorable response of the leaders of Samaria, Jehu set out for Israel's capital city. As he traveled southward, he met a party of forty-two of Ahaziah's relatives who were coming to pay their respects to the royal family of Israel and Samaria. They would fare no better than the deceased Judean king. Jehu ordered their instant seizure and execution. As ordered, there were no survivors. Jehu's reason for this mass murder is not given. Perhaps it was intended to be further evidence of his goal to stamp out Baalism everywhere. Perhaps he even held wild hopes of someday being able to lay some claim against Judah as well. Jehu was taking no chances. Since the two royal houses were related (cf. 8:16–18), no possible claimant would be allowed to live. Furthermore, their demise might pose some question as to proper succession to the Judean throne.

15 On leaving yet another bloody scene, Jehu encountered a mysterious figure, one Jehonadab the Recabite, who, having heard of Jehu's anti-Baal crusade, had apparently come to meet the new Israelite king. Jeremiah (Jer 35) records that Jehonadab was the leader of an ascetic group that lived an austere, nomadic life in the desert, drinking no wine and depending solely on the Lord for their sustenance. Separatist to the core and strong patriots, they lived in protest to the materialism and religious compromise in Israel. Accordingly, Jehonadab was extremely interested in Jehu's reputed desire to purge the nation of its heathenism. Perhaps he hoped that in Jehu a sense of national repentance and longing for the Lord God of Israel would now take place.

16–17 Jehu recognized Jehonadab immediately and, having greeted him with the usual blessing, inquired whether he was in agreement with him. When Jehonadab replied that he was, Jehu gave him his hand, both in friendship and to receive him into his chariot so that he might witness Jehu's further zeal for the Lord. One wonders what Jehonadab must have felt when, on their entrance into Samaria, Jehu's first order of business was the execution of any who might be in any way related to the house of the preceding dynasty. Nevertheless he continued with Jehu in his further purgation. With the death of the "sons of Ahab," the divine sentence had been carried out to the fullest (1Ki 21:21).

18–24 Jehu's continued purge of Baalism in Israel next took the form of deception. Feigning that he himself was a devotee of Baal, he ordered a great assembly for sacrifice to be held in Samaria and ordered all the priests and ministers of Baal to come, on penalty of death. On the day set for the feast, the various ministers arrived. To readily identify them as Baal's faithful, each was given a special robe. With the temple of Baal crowded with Baal's priests, and with the temple guarded securely by eighty selected guards, Jehu and Jehonadab entered the temple to see the opening sacrifices.

25–27 When the ceremonies had begun, Jehu and Jehonadab stepped outside; then Jehu gave the prearranged signal for the guards to enter the temple and slay the worshipers. This they did, penetrating even into the ruined shrine of the temple. None escaped. After the execution had been accomplished, the wooden images and stone statues of Baal were carried outside and demolished; then the temple itself was torn down and burned. To desecrate the site and mark the contempt attendant to it, Jehu converted it into a place for public convenience.

28–36 Jehu had exterminated the worship of Baal in Israel. For this the Lord commended him and promised him a royal succession to the fourth generation. Yet Jehu was to prove a disappointment to God; for his reform was soon seen to be political and selfish rather than born of any deep concern for God. Not only did he not keep the law in his heart, but he perpetuated the state cult of the golden calf established by Jeroboam I. Despite his comet-like beginning, spiritually speaking, Jehu was a falling star; so his reign is largely passed over in silence.

Because of his idolatry, God allowed the Arameans to plunder and reduce systematically the size of Israel, beginning with the loss of Israel's Transjordanian holdings. Although defeated by the Assyrians, the Arameans had managed to retain independence. Hazael took advantage of Assyria's preoccupation with affairs in the east and with revolution at home to take over Israel's holding in Transjordan and to actually march into Israel and Judah. Only the emergence of a new strong Assyrian king in 841 B.C. checked Hazael's relentless surge.

2. The reign of Athaliah in the southern kingdom (11:1–16)

1 On the news of the death of her son Ahaziah, Athaliah, the dowager queen, took whatever measures were necessary to seize the throne for herself, including the murder of her own grandchildren and all that remained of the royal family. With all natural heirs put out of the way, she ascended the throne, inaugurating a seven-year reign.

2–3 As in other desperate times, a godly woman would be used of God to stem the tide of apostasy. This ninth-century "Jochebed" was named Jehosheba. A princess in her own right—being the daughter of Jehoram and sister of Ahaziah—she was also the wife of the high priest Jehoiada (2Ch 22:11). Conspiring with her nurse (and doubtless the high priest as well), Jehosheba hid the baby, at first in one of the palace chambers, then subsequently smuggled him into her temple quarters where she managed to conceal him for six full years.

4–12 In the seventh year, with the child now older, Jehoiada mustered his courage (2Ch 23:1) and laid plans to dislodge the usurping queen from her ill-gotten throne. First, he secured the allegiance of the military officials and temple personnel. Second, he summoned the Levites and heads of families throughout the southern kingdom to Jerusalem and swore them to loyalty to the true king (cf. 2Ch 23:2). Third, on a set day he had the temple personnel seal off the temple area at the changing of the guard and had trusted guards deployed in strategic fashion. Then, with everyone in place, Jehoiada led the king to the appointed spot, perhaps in the innermost court between the temple and the altar, and anointed him as king, to the shouts of acclamation of the gathered throng. By putting the crown on the young king's head and a copy of God's law in his hand, Jehoiada was acting in accordance with ancient scriptural precedent, a move calculated to strengthen the hand of the supporters of the rightful king of the people.

13–16 When the clamor of the people reached the ears of Athaliah, she made her way to the scene of jubilation. The sight that greeted her eyes doubtless made her heart sink. There, on the royal dais at the eastern gate of the inner court to the temple, stood a newly crowned king, surrounded by the high officials both in the religious order and in the military, amid great fanfare and the joyous shouts of the people. She shrieked out her condemnation: it was treason. But her cry was to have as little effect as that of Israel's Jehoram to Athaliah's son Ahaziah (9:23). At Jehoiada's command she was seized and escorted to the gate used for the palace horses and put to death by the sword. Thus Athaliah, the most infamous queen of Judah, died at the hands of her executioners, much as did her mother Jezebel, queen of Israel (9:27–37).

3. The reign of Joash in the southern kingdom (11:17–12:21)

17–21 After the departure of the deposed Athaliah, Jehoiada led the king and the people in a twofold ceremony of covenant renewal: on the one hand, the king and the people swore their unswerving allegiance to God; on the other, the people affirmed their unfailing support of the reconstituted Davidic line. In attestation to their vows, a thorough cleansing of the land followed. Baal's temple was torn down, his priest Mattan slain before the images, and the altar thoroughly pulverized (2Ch 23:17). Not only was the pagan worship of Baal put away, but a reorganization of the temple worship followed that was in accordance with the law of Moses and that followed the order instituted by David.

That day was capped with a thrilling scene. With Jehoiada in the lead, the royal bodyguard escorted the young king toward the palace, followed by the high officials representing the military, civil, and religious orders, with the joyous people bringing up the rear. From the eastern temple the ecstatic entourage swept majestically out the inner temple court and, moving southward through the middle court, entered through the upper gate into the palace. Eventually the throng reached the throne room, where the king was duly enthroned. It had been a memorable day—a day when Jerusalem and Judah ascended to the spiritual heights. Yet while the fire of spiritual reforms had been ignited and was to burn brightly for a time, in the very dependence of the king on others could be seen a flicker that would one day cause the fiery zeal for the Lord to sputter before the chilling winds of apostasy. This same Joash and many of the same officials would, on another day, bring Judah down to the dregs of the degraded Canaanite religion that they had just rendered dormant. Merely programmed religion is perilous; genuine faith must be personal.

12:1–6 Chapter 12 begins with a notice of Joash's matrilineage. Then follows a favorable evaluation of his earlier years as king, together with the notice that nevertheless worship at the various high places continued. Next is an account of the preparations for and repair of the temple. Joash's first edict in this regard (doubtless made early in his reign; cf. 2Ch 24:5) called for the setting aside of money collected as a result of the payment of special religious taxes and voluntary offerings. The Chronicler adds that the Levites were to gather such funds personally, collecting them from the cities of Judah. Although all haste was bidden in the matter, yet by the twenty-third year of Joash's reign the task was still not done (cf. 2Ch 24:5). No formal reasons are cited for this seeming lack of effort by the Levites. Whatever the problem was, the system was not working.

7–16 Accordingly Joash decided to take matters into his own hands and decreed that a chest be set outside the wall to the inner court at the southern gate on the right side of the entrance into the temple, so that all who passed through might cast their contributions in for the temple's repair (cf. 2Ch 24:8). Joash also had a proclamation read throughout Judah as to the need and intent of the box, urging all citizens to participate willingly in accordance with Moses' ancient institution (cf. Ex 25:2–3; 30:12–16; Lev 27:2–8 with 2Ch 24:9). The response was tremendous (cf. 2Ch 24:10). Soon there was ample money to begin the work and the workers were commissioned (cf. 2Ch 24:11–13). So successful had been the king's program and so well did all concerned carry out their duties that there was even money left over for the provision of sacred vessels for the sanctuary service (2Ch 24:14).

17–21 The narrative quickly shifts in time, noting that the Aramean king Hazael had renewed his pressure against Israel and Judah, penetrating down the coast as far as Philistia and turning then inland to make a direct attack against Jerusalem. A siege of Jerusalem was averted only when Joash stripped the royal treasury and the wealth of the temple as payment to Hazael.

The reason for this drastic turn of events can be gleaned from the supporting details in 2Ch 24:14–22. Regular temple worship had continued throughout the days of Jehoiada; but after the death of the godly high priest, Joash fell into the hands of godless advisors who turned his heart to Canaanite practices. Although the Lord continually warned the king and his confidants, his pleadings fell on deaf ears. Indeed, in one instance the king and his staff went so far as to stone Jehoiada's son Zechariah for delivering the Lord's pronouncement against them.

Accordingly, when God's patience had run full course, he delivered Joash and Judah into the hands of the Arameans. The plight of the northern kingdom (cf. 2Ki 13:1–3) also descended on the south. Hazael, though equipped with an inferior army, was under God's direction immediately successful, defeating Judah suddenly and sending much booty back to Damascus (2Ch 24:23–24). The campaign brought death to many in Judah. Even the king was sorely wounded (2Ch 24:25). The narrative in Kings joins the historical report at this point. With total defeat imminent, Joash bribed Hazael and so delivered Jerusalem. Nothing, however, is recorded of any repentance on Joash's part. So obdurate did he remain in his sin that he was to die in a palace intrigue. Even though he was interred in Jerusalem, he was excluded from burial in the royal sepulcher (2Ch 24:25).

4. The reign of Jehoahaz in the northern kingdom (13:1–9)

1–9 In the very year that Joash launched his campaign to repair the temple, Jehoahaz, son of Jehu (10:35), ascended the throne in the northern kingdom. He was to reign sixteen years (814–798 B.C.). Because Jehoahaz perpetuated the sins of his father in following the long-standing state religion instituted by Jeroboam I, God allowed the Aramean king Hazael (843–798 B.C.) to afflict the northern kingdom directly. Hazael's affliction of Israel was to trouble Jehoahaz throughout his reign, though, apparently, the earlier part of Jehoahaz's rule was most severely affected (cf. v.32). So sore had the Aramean encroachment been that the northern kingdom was at one point left with but fifty horses, ten chariots, and ten thousand infantry—a far cry from the time when Ahab alone could muster two thousand chariots for the allied forces at Qarqar.

In such lowly circumstances Jehoahaz at last sought the Lord's favor. While his repentance was seemingly genuine, the state religion of the golden calves was allowed to remain, as was the cult connected with the Asherah pole in Samaria. Nevertheless God in his covenant mercy did so arrange the circumstances as to send relief to Israel (probably in the person of Adad-Nirari III, 811–783 B.C., of Assyria), with the result that the closing years of Jehoahaz's reign were free of Aramean intervention.

Little else is reported of Jehoahaz's reign, Jehu's son going to his reward in 798 B.C. and being succeeded by his son, Jehoash.

5. The reign of Jehoash in the northern kingdom (13:10–25)

10–13 The account of the sixteen-year reign of Jehoash of Israel begins with a typical notice of his evil character, a mention of the most important event in his reign (his war with Amaziah), and a statement as to his demise. A record of an incident in which Jehoash met with the dying Elisha follows.

14 Jehoash addressed Elisha with words reminiscent of the venerable prophet's own testimony at Elijah's translation (cf. 2:12). While they were full of respect, the words were less than full of faith. Yet because of the very fact that Jehoash had at least come to Elisha and had addressed him courteously, the Lord was to use the occasion to attempt to increase Jehoash's slim faith.

15–20a Elisha instructed Israel's king to pick up his bow. When he had done so, the prophet placed his own hands on those of the king, thereby indicating that what he was about to do would be full of spiritual symbolism. That act was the shooting of an arrow out the east window—toward Aram. Elisha explained the deed: Jehoash would win a total victory at Aphek against Arameans. But the divine promise was to be augmented by personal participation. Accordingly, Jehoash was told next to shoot arrows into the ground; obviously victory at Aphek was to be followed by subsequent victories over the hated Arameans. Jehoash obediently complied, but with his own reasoning powers. He struck the ground three times with his arrows rather than using the five or six arrows that he had with him. Elisha was justifiably angry with the king. Had he used all his arrows, the Arameans would have been completely vanquished. Now Jehoash would gain but three victories. With this pronouncement the aged prophet had finished his earthly course.

20b–21 One last miracle would attend God's faithful prophet. In those last dark days before stability was restored to the area by Adad-Nirari III, bands of Moabite marauders ravished the land at the beginning of the harvest season. Evidently Elisha had died at such a time. On one occasion, as a funeral procession made its way to the burial place, a looting party swooped down on them. In their need for swift flight, the members of the procession quickly halted and hastily placed the body of the dead man in the first available tomb—which happened to be Elisha's. When the burial party lowered the linen-wrapped body of the dead man into the tomb, it came into contact with the remains of Elisha. Instantly the man was revived. The juxtaposition of this event with the account that precedes makes it clear that herein was another divinely intended sign for Jehoash and Israel: God was the God of the living, not the dead, not only for Elisha and the man who had been restored to life, but for Israel as well. Israel could yet "live" if she would but appropriate the eternally living God as her own. The entire episode was, further, a corroborative sign that what Elisha had prophesied would certainly come to pass. Only a living God could guarantee such a thing (cf. Isa 44).

22–25 The chapter closes with some historical notices concerning the strained Aramean-Israelite relations during the reign of Jehoahaz and Jehoash. Conditions improved during Jehoash's reign in that the Israelite king, in accordance with Elisha's prophecy, defeated the Aramean king Ben-Hadad III, son of Hazael, three times. The growing preoccupation of Adad-Nirari III with the affiars in the east and Joash's treaty link with him, along with the growing weakness of Aram in the days of Ben-Hadad III, provided the historical framework for the outworking of Elisha's prophecy. This record is a further indication of the inviolability of God's word and God's continued faithfulness to the basic covenant made with the patriarchs.

6. The reign of Amaziah in the southern kingdom (14:1–22)

1–7 If those who conspired against Joash, Judah's eighth king, had hoped for a dramatic change in governmental leadership, they were to be disappointed. Amaziah did indeed carry out his office in accordance with the demands of orthodoxy, as witnessed by his stringent treatment of the sons of his father's assassin. Yet the Scriptures record that he did not serve God "wholeheartedly" (2Ch 25:2). Certainly he was no David; rather, he was another Joash; for he perpetuated the state policy of allowing sacrifice and offerings in the high places.

Two dramatic events were to mark Amaziah's reign: (1) his God-given victory over Edom and (2) his self-inflicted loss to Israel. The first is dismissed in a single verse but receives expanded treatment in 2Ch 25:5–15, where the basic weakness in Amaziah's character is readily shown.

According to the Chronicler, Amaziah laid careful plans for the reconquest of Edom (lost in the days of Jehoram [8:20–22]). He began with a general census and conscription of able-bodied men twenty years of age and upward (2Ch 25:5). He added to the three-thousand-man army by raising another one hundred thousand mercenaries from Israel (2Ch 25:6), which, however, he subsequently dismissed when rebuked by one of the Lord's prophets (2Ch 25:7–10, 13). Thus encouraged that his cause was just and that God would give him the victory, Amaziah invaded Edom and inflicted a crushing defeat.

Life's successes are not, however, always the victories they seem to be. A notable defeat for Amaziah occurred here (2Ch 25:14–16). Having vanquished Edom and carried off booty and captives, he foolishly worshiped their captive gods. For this the man of God again rebuked Amaziah. This time, however, Amaziah no longer "needed God," for he considered that he himself had won the battle. So he threatened the prophet and sent him away. Yet before he left that prophet announced Amaziah's doom for his spiritual callousness and self-will.

8–10 This knowledge of Amaziah's character and the information that the dismissed and disgruntled Israelite mercenaries had looted the northernmost Judean cities on their way back home to Israel (2Ch 25:13) set the background for the second major event of Amaziah's time—the contest with Jehoash of Israel (cf. 2Ch 25:17–24). Still irked by the strong prophetic rebuke, Amaziah sought the advice of those who would indulge his self-will (2Ch 25:17). Angry over the conduct of the Israelite mercenaries, he used their actions as a provocation for war. Moreover, having defeated Edom with ease, Amaziah overestimated his own abilities and reasoned that he would have little trouble with his northern brother (cf. 2Ch 25:19).

To Amaziah's arrogant battle challenge, Jehoash returned a reply couched in parabolic fable. For Amaziah to presume to challenge Jehoash was like a lowly thistle making pretentious demands against a great Lebanese cedar, only to be trampled under foot by a passing animal. How empty the boasting of such a puny antagonist! Similarly Amaziah ought not to let success over a tiny nation go to his head. In locking horns with Jehoash, the renowned victor over the Arameans, Amaziah was inviting personal and national disaster.

11–16 Amaziah's headstrong ambitions nevertheless knew no bounds. Throwing caution to the wind, he moved his troops to a confrontation with Jehoash at Judean Beth Shemesh. In that battle Jehoash emerged the victor, routing Amaziah's army (2Ch 25:22) and taking Judah's king captive. Jehoash followed up his triumph with a thrust against Jerusalem that resulted in the loss of some six hundred feet of city wall, the confiscation of the temple furnishings and palace treasures, and the taking of many prisoners of war. Amaziah's lesson in self-will had cost his nation dearly. The Chronicler (2Ch 25:20) reports that behind it all lay the wise hand of divine providence that arranged the details of the lives of all concerned, in order to teach Amaziah and Judah the folly of trusting in foreign gods.

17–22 The account of Amaziah's life closes with a further note that he outlived Jehoash of the northern kingdom by some fifteen years and apparently was then released to return home by Israel's next king, Jeroboam II. Such a move would cause an unsettling factionalism, for Judah would now have two kings: Azariah, whom Amaziah had made coregent before his battle with Jehoash, and the restored Amaziah. Amaziah's apostasy had already brought him many adversaries; his return only aroused old antagonisms and, doubtless, new political enemies. The tension of having two kings was resolved in a conspiracy against Amaziah that first caused his flight and then ended with his death in Lachish.

7. The reign of Jeroboam II in the northern kingdom (14:23–29)

23–29 The chapter closes with a brief notice of the forty-one year reign of Jeroboam II (793–752 B.C.). The era of Jeroboam (northern kingdom) and Azariah (southern kingdom) would mark a significant change in the fortunes of God's people. These would be days of unparalleled prosperity for the twin kingdoms, both economically and politically. Indeed, together they would acquire nearly the same territorial dimensions as in the days of the united monarchy. However, God's blessings are too often taken for granted. And so it proved to be in Israel-Judah of the eighth century B.C. Spiritually the lives of God's people degenerated into open sin in the northern kingdom and into an empty formalism in the south. In such an era God therefore raised up the great writing prophets, one of whom, Jonah, is mentioned here.

Great responsibility for Israel's spiritual problem lay with her leadership. Jeroboam II, while a capable administrator and military leader, had no concern for vital religion (cf. 1Ch 5:11–17; Hos 4:6–5:7; 7:5). He simply carried out the ritual of the standard state religion begun by Jeroboam I. Nonetheless Jeroboam's external accomplishments were many. In accordance with an unrecorded prophecy of Jonah, Jeroboam restored fully the borders of Israel so that they extended from the entrance of Hamath (located in the great Beqa Valley amid the Lebanese Mountains south of Hamath) to the Sea of Arabah (or Dead Sea). Apparently even Hamath and Damascus came under Israelite control. Amos (Am 6:13–14) indicates that the Transjordanian territories were probably also recovered at this time.

In all this the faithfulness of God, despite Israel's unfaithfulness (cf. Hos 2:2–3:5; 11:1–14:8; Am 3:1–15), is evident. Because Israel had fallen into such desperate spiritual conditions, a merciful God had acted on behalf of his people. As he had granted them deliverance from external pressures by sending Adad-Nirari III of Assyria against the Arameans (cf. 13:5, 22–23), initiating a period of recovery under Jehoash (13:25; 14:14–15), so now in a grander way he culminated that deliverance with full victory over the Arameans, one that included Israel's recovery of its former boundaries.

When Jeroboam II died in 752 B.C., he left behind a strong kingdom, but, unfortunately, one whose core foundation was so spiritually rotten that the edifice of state would not long withstand the rising tides of international intrigue and pressure.

8. The reign of Uzziah in the southern kingdom (15:1–7)

1–4 Judah's tenth king was Azariah ("The LORD has helped"), known also as Uzziah ("The LORD is my strength"), the latter name possibly being assumed on the occasion of his independent reign. Azariah had been made coregent at the time of Amaziah's ill-conceived campaign against Jehoash (14:8–14; 2Ch 25:17–24). After Amaziah's release at the death of Jehoash in 782 B.C. and subsequent assassination in 767, Azariah took the throne in his own right and ruled until 740. Thus, counting his coregencies, Azariah ruled some fifty-two years.

Several reasons may be found for such a lengthy reign besides the longevity of the king. First, Israel's perennial enemy, Assyria, was in a state of severe decline. After the death of the vigorous king Adad-Nirari III (810–783), Assyria was ruled by three weak kings—Shalmaneser IV (782–774), Assur Dan III (773–756), and Assur Nirari V (755–746)—who strove desperately to maintain themselves against the advance of their hostile northern neighbor, Urartu, and campaigned mainly to the south and east. Moreover, Assyria was rocked internally by plagues in 765 and 759 and by internal revolts (763–759).

The time of Jeroboam II was one of great wealth in the northern kingdom of Israel. This ivory pendant found at Tell Gezer is a piece of jewelry that only the rich could afford. Courtesy Tell Gezer Excavations.

Second, relations between Jeroboam II of Israel and Azariah remained cordial so that together the two nations were able eventually to acquire nearly the same territorial dimension as in the days of the united monarchy. Indeed, the Chronicler makes it clear that the era of the early eighth century B.C. was one of great expansion militarily, administratively, commercially, and economically, a period whose prosperity was second only to that of Solomon (2Ch 26:1–15).

Third, and more basically, Azariah was noted as a man who utilized well the spiritual heritage that he had gained from his father (cf. 2Ch 26:4–5). Accordingly, God's abundant blessing was shed on him (2Ch 26:6–15) so that his fame spread throughout the Near Eastern world (2Ch 26:8, 15).

The mention of the continued worship at the "high places" indicates a state policy of noninterference with competing religious forms that had been in force since at least the time of Joash (cf. 12:3; 14:3–4). The apparent compromise is indicative of a basic spiritual shallowness in Israel and Judah that was to surface in the prophecies of the great writing prophets of the eighth century B.C.

Times of plenty and ease too often lead to spiritual lethargy. God's abundant blessings can all too readily be taken for granted and become commonplace. In such circumstances a people's religious experience can degenerate into an empty formalism or, worse, erupt into open apostasy and moral decadence. So it was in eighth-century Israel. Hosea (775–725 B.C.) warned of the misuse of wealth and the twin dangers of apostasy and loose morality. Joel (770–765) cried out against Judah's superficial religion. Amos (765–755) spoke a similar message, while also emphasizing Israel's moral and social corruption. The collective prophetic challenge to repent and return to making God primary in the believers' lives reflects the low spiritual tone of the times.

5–7 Great earthly success is seldom well-managed to spiritual benefit. As with Solomon before him, Azariah's successes proved to be his undoing. His great power fostered such pride and haughtiness that about 750 B.C. he sought to add to his vast power by usurping the prerogatives of the sacred priesthood. Challenged to his face by the priests as he attempted to make an offering at the altar of incense, he was also instantaneously judged by God, who smote him with leprosy. Driven from the temple forever, Azariah remained a leper thereafter, dwelling in isolation until his death (2Ch 26:16–21). During Azariah's last decade, due to his leprosy, his son Jotham was made coregent and public officiator, though doubtless Azariah remained the real power behind the throne.

9. The reign of Zechariah in the northern kingdom (15:8–12)

8–12 Little is recorded of Zechariah, the fourth descendant of Jehu to assume the throne of Israel, except the familiar evaluation that he did evil in perpetuating the idolatrous sins of Jeroboam I and that he died in an assassination plot. With the passing of Zechariah, the Lord's prophetic promise to Jehu (10:30) stood fulfilled (cf. Am 7:9).

The shortness of Zechariah's reign and that of Shallum, his murderous successor, doubtless points up the great contrast in their abilities with those of Jeroboam II and underscores the weakness of the northern kingdom. The openness of Shallum's deed was expressive of Israel's social degradation.

D. The Era of the Decline and Fall of the Northern Kingdom (15:13–17:41)

1. The reign of Shallum in the northern kingdom (15:13–15)

13–15 Shallum's designation "son of Jabesh" may mark either a clan name or indicate that he was the leader of a Gileadite reaction against the crown. His minimal reign of but one month was terminated by a retaliatory raid by Menahem, who, in turn, usurped the throne.

Menahem, who may have been a military commander under Zechariah, brought his forces against Shallum in Samaria from Tirzah, an ancient Canaanite city important for its strategic commercial location and noted for its surpassing beauty (SS 6:4). Tirzah had served as a royal retreat (1Ki 14:17) and as a national capital (16:8–10) and had remained an important city.

From Tirzah, Menahem launched a savage campaign against Tiphsah for its failure to open its gates to him. This latter city, whose exact location remains uncertain, may have withstood Menahem and Shallum or may have contested Menahem's attempt to reassert Israelite strength in the area. Although Tiphsah is otherwise insignificant in OT history, its importance to Menahem lay in its attitude toward him at a time when he could allow no rebellion to his authority if his quest for the throne was to be carried out smoothly. Menahem thus served notice that he would brook no resistance from any quarter.

2. The reign of Menahem in the northern kingdom (15:16–22)

16–22 Menahem's decade of rule is characterized as one of total sinfulness. In addition to further prostituting Israel's religious experience, he compromised her independence by becoming a vassal to Pul (or, more properly, Tiglath-pileser III, 745–727 B.C.) of Assyria. His motive in doing so was not one of patriotic concern for Israel's survival. Rather he hoped that the Assyrian alliance would solidify his hold on the throne of Israel. In order to gain the Assyrian king's backing, he levied a tax of fifty shekels of silver on the wealthy men of the realm so that the assessed levy of one thousand talents of silver might be gathered. Since a talent then weighed about seventy-five pounds, this was obviously a tremendous sum.

Nevertheless, the sum was fully met, and Tiglath-pileser "withdrew and stayed in the land no longer." While Menahem thus bought the crown for himself and respite from Assyria, the hard stipulations were to cause further internal friction that was to ignite the fires of insurrection soon after his son, Pekahiah, succeeded him. Although Menahem had thought to buy time, perhaps even Israel's independence, his policy was to spell out the beginning of the end. A totally apostate Israel was to reap the harvest of her spiritual wickedness at the hands of the very ones whom Menahem had trusted for deliverance.

To understand the complex events of the late eighth century B.C., a word must be said concerning the Assyrians. After nearly a half century of decline, Assyria reawakened with the usurpation of the throne by Tiglath-pileser III in 745 B.C. Indeed, he and his successors in the Neo-Assyrian Empire were to effect a drastic change in the balance of power in the ancient Near East. Having solidified the kingdom in the east, Tiglath-pileser turned his attention to the west in 743. Although the exact course of his western campaign is difficult to follow, it seems clear that all of Syro-Palestine submitted to the Assyrian yoke. Among those nations and kings whose tribute is recorded in his annals is the name Menahem of Israel, thus confirming the biblical account.

3. The reign of Pekahiah in the northern kingdom (15:23–26)

23–26 Few details are recorded of the two-year reign of Menahem's son Pekahiah except the notice of his evil spiritual condition and the coup d'état that took his life. The insurrection originated with the king's own personal bodyguard. While two of the chief officers (Argob and Arieh) remained loyal to the king, even laying down their lives for him, the third, Pekah (apparently an influential Gileadite), found an occasion to trap the king in the citadel of the royal palace. Having slain him, Pekah seized the throne.

The usurpation and troubled times that were to follow make it clear that there was an anti-Assyrian party that had remained submerged during the rule of the fiery Menahem. Indeed, the notice of a twenty-year reign for Pekah would seem to indicate that this Gileadite strong man had laid claim to the crown some twelve years earlier and had been prevented from taking the throne only by Menahem's swift action in those unsettled times during Shallum's conspiracy. Pekahiah's appointment of Pekah to be a chief officer among his bodyguards may thus have been an attempt to placate the rival party.

4. The reign of Pekah in the northern kingdom (15:27–31)

27–31 The chronology of Pekah's time is beset with serious problems. To Pekah is attributed a twenty-year reign, beginning with the end of the fifty-two-year reign of Azariah of Judah. Further, v.30 indicates that his reign was terminated by Hoshea's conspiracy in the twentieth year of Jotham's rule. Verse 33, however, indicates that Jotham reigned but sixteen years. Moreover v.32 notes that Jotham himself began to rule in Pekah's second year. Further synchronisms occur in v.8, where the thirty-eighth year of Azariah is marked as Zechariah's accession year; in 16:1, where the seventeenth year of Pekah and the accession year of Ahaz are equated; and in 17:1, where the twelfth year of Ahaz is given as the first of Hoshea's nine years.

Because the fall of Samaria can be assigned confidently to 722 B.C. on the basis of both biblical and secular history, and because Azariah's fifty-second year can be shown to be 740 B.C., it would appear that there is no room for a twenty-year reign for Pekah, particularly in that due allowance must be made for the reigns of Zechariah (six months), Shallum (one month), Menahem (ten years), Pekahiah (two years), and Hoshea (nine years) in the same interval of time.

The resolution of these data, while difficult, is not impossible. Probably because Pekah carried out a consistent anti-Assyrian policy, the chronicles of the southern kingdom gave full credit to Pekah's regnal claims. It would seem that already at the death of Zechariah in 752 B.C., Pekah had claimed the kingship and was recognized as king in Transjordanian Gilead. However, the swift action of the Israelite military forces through Menahem prevented Pekah from furthering his aspirations for the next decade. In 742, when the powerful Menahem died, the problem of Pekah again surfaced, Pekahiah solving the problem by bringing Pekah into a position of prominence within his own bodyguard. After two years Pekah was able to find an opportunity to dispose of Pekahiah and rule in his own right over all Israel until the troublesome international events associated with Tiglath-pileser III's second western campaign (743–732) forced his demise at the hands of a pro-Assyrian faction led by Hoshea (732).

Pekah's stormy beginning was to characterize his short independent rule. In 734 Tiglath-pileser III swept out of Assyria on a second western campaign that was to break the anti-Assyrian coalition headed by the Aramean king Rezin and Pekah of Israel. By 732 the alliance was thoroughly broken and Damascus had fallen. All the western Fertile Crescent, from the Taurus Mountains on the north to the border of Egypt on the south, lay in Assyrian hands. The Syrian (Aramean) states were divided into five provinces, Israel into three.

and Hazor all being known Galilean cities. The text also adds significantly that Tiglath-pileser III swept into Pekah's center of power, Gilead (cf. 1Ch 5:25–26). Because the cities lay in a general north-south direction, the biblical account may well preserve the Assyrian king's line of march. The mention of Janoah may indicate that after the victory over Kedesh, Tiglath-pileser divided his forces, half proceeding southward against Hazor and on to Gilead, and the other half moving southwest to Janoah and then on to Phoenicia.

With the loss of Galilee and Gilead and with the presence of Assyrian troops all along Israel's western frontier, it seemed evident that Pekah's anti-Assyrian policy had brought Israel to the point of extinction. Accordingly, while Tiglath-pileser was concluding the siege of Damascus in 732, a pro-Assyrian party, led by Hoshea, succeeded in defeating and displacing Pekah, an insurrection that cost the controversial Gileadite his life. By dispatching Pekah and submitting to Tiglath-pileser, the ultimate demise of Israel was postponed for a decade. But her end was sure, for her corruption was total, permeating all levels of society. In vain God's prophets had pleaded with an unrepentant and apostate people (cf. Isa 1–5; Mic 1–3; 6–7).

5. The reign of Jotham in the southern kingdom (15:32–38)

32–33 The reign of Jotham was a continuation of that of his father, Azariah (Uzziah). Already coregent for at least a decade, political and religious conditions remained largely as they were in Azariah's day; the country's prosperity continued as well (2Ch 27:1–4). Regrettably, that prosperity was to lead, as it so often does, to spiritual neglect (cf. Isa 1–5), a condition that was to make Judah ripe for open apostasy in Ahaz's day. Although the Chronicler (2Ch 27:6) gives Jotham a clear record, one cannot but wonder at the extent of the effect that Azariah's sin had had on Jotham and that, in turn, on the young Ahaz.

34–35 Jotham turned his attention to his country's internal needs. He rebuilt the Upper Gate at the northern entrance of the temple and did extensive work on the wall of Ophel (2Ch 27:3; cf. 2Ch 26:9). He also turned his attention to urban planning, constructing cities in the highlands of Judah that, together with a system of towers and fortification in the wooded areas, could serve the nation of Judah both economically and militarily.

At the onset of his reign, the Ammonites, from whom Azariah had exacted tribute (2Ch 26:8), refused to acknowledge Jotham's overlordship. This occasioned successful campaigns against the Ammonites so that they once again paid their tribute (2Ch 27:5). Jotham thus proved himself to be a mighty warrior. The notice that this tribute continued into the second and third year may correlate with the probability that Jotham had turned over the reigns of government to his coregent son, Ahaz, about the year 736, possibly because of some failure in health or rising international tensions.

36–38 Toward the end of Jotham's days, political storm clouds began to appear on the international horizon. The Chronicler speaks of "all his wars" (2Ch 27:7); and the author of Kings notes that Rezin, the Aramean king, and Pekah, Israel's king, began their incursions into Judah. The issue was designed by the Lord to test the young Ahaz in spiritual things, but there would be no repentance in this third generation.

6. The reign of Ahaz in the southern kingdom (16:1–20)

1–2 The account of Ahaz's wicked reign as given by the author of Kings centers around three main subjects: (1) his character (vv.1–4), (2) his war with Rezin and Pekah (vv.5–9), and (3) his further apostasy as consequence of his reliance on Tiglath-pileser III (vv.10–18). Other details concerning his life and times (cf. vv.19–20) can be found in 2Ch 28 and Isa 7–12.

Ahaz's reign forms a stark contrast with that of his father and grandfather, and yet they had sown the seeds of the apostasy that would fructify in Ahaz's day. The luxury and ease of the time of Uzziah and Jotham had produced a spiritual indolence in Judah that would allow Ahaz's open sin to flourish.

3–4 Not content to continue the standing state policies of limited religious compromise (see 15:5–7), Ahaz transgressed the bounds of propriety by imitating the idolatrous heathen practices of Israel. Most nefarious of all was his participation in the debased Molech rites, even going so far as to send his own son through the sacrificial fires (cf. Lev 18:21; 20:1–5; Dt 12:31; 2Ki 21:6). These rites took place at the confluence of the Hinnom and Kidron valleys in a sacred enclosure known as Topheth (cf. 23:10; Isa 30:33; Jer 7:31). The exact nature of the sacrifices and the divinities involved have been the subject of much discussion. The finding, however, of the same type of sacred place with the same name in the transplanted Phoenician colony of Carthage, where the sacrificial offering was called by a name made up of the same Semitic consonants (MLK) contained in the name "Molech," would seem to argue that there was no deity named Molech to whom the Judeans sacrificed. Rather, the real god involved was the old Canaanite deity Baal, with human sacrifice made to him called mlk (cf. Jer 19:5; 32:35). The rites were heinous and a total defilement of the God-given sacrificial service. The later spiritual reformation of Josiah was to bring an end to these sinister proceedings, a judgment Jeremiah utilized in picturing God's coming judgment on his sinful people (Jer 2:23; 7:30–33; 19:5–6).

The valley's reputation for extreme wickedness gave rise to the employment of its name as a term for the eschatological place for punishment of the wicked, a designation confirmed by Christ himself (Mt 5:22; 10:28; 13:42, 50; 18:9; 23:15, 33; 25:41).

5–6 The causes of Ahaz's war with Israel and Syria (Aram) were at least fourfold. (1) On the human level, Rezin of Syria and Pekah of Israel were doubtless desirous of Judah's support in their planned insurrection against Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria. (2) The two leaders may have had a personal dislike for Ahaz. (3) On the spiritual plane, the whole affair seems to be a concentrated satanic effort to put an end to the Davidic line on the throne in Jerusalem (cf. Isa 7:5–7). (4) God was superintending the whole complex undertaking. He would deal with an apostate Israel (cf. 17:5–18; 18:11–12), thwart the satanically inspired plans against the house of Israel by bringing defeat to Rezin and Pekah (Isa 7:5–16), and bring chastisement to a spiritually bankrupt Ahaz (2Ch 28:5, 19).

The full details of the complex international situation must be gleaned not only from ch. 16 but also from 15:37; 2Ch 28; and Isa 7:1–16. These sources show that the Syro (Aramean)-Israelite alliance had been operative against Judah already in Jotham's day (15:37). The allied attack against Judah was two-pronged. Rezin came along the eastern portion of Judah, driving down to the key seaport of Elath and taking it (2Ch 28:5). Pekah launched an effective general campaign against northern Judah that resulted in the death of thousands of Judeans and the capture of hundreds of others (though the captives were later granted their freedom and returned to Jericho through the intercession of the prophet Obed; cf. 2Ch 28:6–15). Moreover, the newly liberated Edom took the opportunity to strike back, carrying away some Judeans into captivity (2Ch 28:17). As well, the Philistines found the time ripe to make renewed incursions into the western Shephelah and take captive certain cities in southern Judah.

Then a new attack, aimed at taking Jerusalem itself and installing a client king on the throne, took place (Isa 7:2–6). Surrounded by hostile enemies on all sides Ahaz received God's prophet Isaiah. He assured Ahaz that the enemy would fall; God himself would see to that. Ahaz could ask any confirmatory sign that he wished, and it would be granted (Isa 7:7–11). Ahaz, with a flare of piety, refused Isaiah's words (Isa 7:12), preferring to rely on his own resourcefulness. (God nevertheless gave Ahaz a sign, the prophecy associated with the virgin birth of the Messiah, Isa 7:13–16; cf. Mt 1:22–23.)

7–9 Ahaz sent away to Tiglath-pileser III and hired his deliverance from what seemed certain defeat (cf. 2Ch 28:16, 21). Tiglath-pileser complied all too readily, eventually thoroughly subduing the Arameans, taking Damascus and deporting its inhabitants, and executing Rezin. Israel was spared only through Hoshea's coup d'état and swift submission to Assyria, a takeover that cost Pekah his life (15:29–30).

God's message through Isaiah (Isa 7:7–9, 16) had come true, though the total picture was not in accordance with God's desires for Ahaz. Accordingly, Judah, far from being actually delivered, would also soon feel the heel of the oppressor marching through her land and streets (cf. Isa 7:17–20). What had been an opportunity for spiritual victory had become a first step into a quicksand bog that would ultimately swallow Judah in defeat and deportation.

10–11 After Tiglath-pileser III had secured Damascus, he apparently summoned his new vassals there to receive their tokens of submission, among whom was Ahaz. While at Damascus Ahaz was much impressed with a type of altar in use there and sent back instructions to Uriah, the priest, for its construction, a task duly completed before the king's return.

12–13 When Ahaz returned he had his daily offerings presented on this new altar, thereby dedicating the altar's use to the Lord. The offerings that were made were all of the sweet savor type, expressing the maintenance of the believer's communion with God: the burnt and meal offerings symbolizing dedication and service, the fellowship (peace) offering symbolizing fellowship, and the drink offering emphasizing the joy of life poured out to God in Spirit-led obedience. What a parody of piety! He who knew nothing of genuine godliness would feign his devotion to God—and that via an alien altar!

14–16 The following verses catalog Ahaz's further religious innovations, all of which speak clearly of his deepening apostasy. The prescribed bronze altar was transferred from facing the sanctuary entrance to the north. Accordingly, all future offerings would be made on the recently dedicated Damascene altar. The bronze altar would henceforth be used by Ahaz in connection with his divination practices, indicating Ahaz's involvement in Assyrian cultic rites.

17 Ahaz went even further. The high stands holding the altar were appropriated by him for their bronze. Likewise, he lowered the molten sea by taking away the bronze bulls that supported it and placed it on a low stone pedestal.

18 Not content with these "reforms" in the ceremonial furnishings, Ahaz went still further. The king's own covered stand that opened into the inner court, together with his private entrance to that place, were removed "in deference to the king of Assyria." The exact impact of these words is difficult to ascertain. Whether Tiglath-pileser wanted less prestige to be held by his new vassal or felt that such a special royal place might indicate too close a tie to an established religion that might later foster a spirit of independence against Assyria is uncertain. At any rate, the wholesale changes were either made at the Assyrian king's suggestion or were done to gain his pleasure.

19–20 Ahaz went yet further in his apostasy. According to 2Ch 28:24–25, he went so far as to mutilate the temple furniture and close the temple itself so that the services within the Holy Place were discontinued. "Worship services" would henceforth be held only in connection with the new altar or at one of the several altars erected throughout Jerusalem or at the high places dedicated to the various gods that were established throughout Judah by royal edict (v.4). All this not only speaks of Ahaz's depraved spiritual condition but was probably carried out as an expression of his goodwill toward Tiglath-pileser. Officially nothing offensive to the Assyrian king would henceforth be practiced. Thus did Ahaz go to his reward, clothed, spiritually speaking, in an Assyrian mantle.

7. The reign of Hoshea in the northern kingdom (17:1–23)

1–3 Hoshea had been granted the throne by the military in a purge that was largely a placating move toward Assyria. That such was the case can be seen in that when the opportunity presented itself, Hoshea quickly attempted to throw off the Assyrian yoke by entering into an anti-Assyrian coalition. That effort, however, failed, a failure that would seal the fate of the northern kingdom.

When Tiglath-pileser III died in 727 B.C. and was succeeded by his son Shalmaneser V (727–722), the time seemed ripe for certain western states to renounce their vassal status. Moreover, a seemingly important ally lay southward in the delta of Egypt, one Tefnekht, the Pharaoh of the Twenty-Fourth Dynasty. Tefnekht had succeeded in bringing the decadent Twenty-Second Dynasty to an end and was even then vying for prominence in Egypt with Piankhy, the Pharaoh of the Ethiopian-based Twenty-Fifth Dynasty (which had dispatched the Theban Twenty-Third Dynasty).

4 The mention of "So king of Egypt" has occasioned a good deal of controversy, for there is no known Egyptian king by that name. Attempts have been made to identify this "So" with Osorkon of the Twenty-Third Dynasty or with Shabako of the Twenty-Fifth Dynasty, or to assign to him merely a field commander's status. The simplest answer is that Sais, the Egyptian capital of the Twenty-Fourth Dynasty, would be pronounced sa in Akkadian (the lingua franca of the ancient Near East) but so in Hebrew. Thus understood, v.4 would read, "He had sent envoys to Sais, even to the king of Egypt" (see NIV note).

5–6 Hoshea (as well as Judah, 18:21) was to learn that Egypt was indeed "a splintered reed." Tefnekht could not even survive Egypt's internal struggle. Nor was Hoshea to succeed against Shalmaneser. The Assyrian monarch marched quickly into Israel, secured its submission, and imprisoned Hoshea himself. Subsequently he again invaded the land, devastating its length and breadth, and he placed Samaria under siege in the year 725 B.C.

Ultimately the Israelite capital fell (722), and its surviving inhabitants were deported to Mesopotamia and Media. The natural reading of the biblical record would seem to be that Shalmaneser is to be identified with "the king of Assyria." Sargon (Shalmaneser's successor), however, claimed that he had captured Samaria. The problem may possibly be resolved by holding that though Shalmaneser was still king, he was not personally present at Samaria's fall, the culmination of the campaign being accomplished by his general Sargon.

7–8 The author rehearses the causes that necessitated the divine punishment. His indictment of Israel begins with a reminder that God alone had released the Israelites from their oppression and bondage in Egypt and had brought them to the Promised Land. Their historical foundation was essentially a spiritual one. Having brought Israel from bondage to glorious freedom, God had every right to expect them to walk in newness of life, as befitting a redeemed people (cf. Dt 5–6; 10:12–11:32).

9–17 The opposite, however, had been the case. The shameful record of Israel's spiritual prostitution is catalogued (cf. Isa 5; Mic 6:3–5, 9–16). Against the clear prohibitions of God (Ex 20:2–6; Lev 18:4–5, 26; 20:22–23; Dt 5:6–10), the people had entered into the worship patterns of the pagan nations that God had driven out of the land. This apostasy had been formally initiated by Israel's own kings, and all Israel had followed their devious plan to pretend to worship God in the official state religion.

Matters had grown even worse. The external rites had become more openly false. Israel's worship included setting up sacred shrines and Asherah poles, the following of pagan incense customs, worshiping at cultic high places, and even open idolatry. Divination and deliberate sorcery had further corrupted their spiritual experience. Like the surrounding nations, they followed worthless idols and became useless to God. Most basic of all, they had not only denied God's covenant with them but had refused the God of the covenant, rejecting his rightful sovereignty over them. God had sent prophets to warn the people to turn from this wickedness, but they consistently refused to listen to them. Therefore, the Israelites appropriated the punishment that God had meted out against the Canaanites when he drove them out of the Promised Land: he drove Israel out (vv.18–20, 23) into exile (v.23).

18–23 Israel had aroused God's righteous wrath. In accordance with the set terms of the inviolable covenant, God must punish her. This he did, by allowing Israel to fall into the hands of the Assyrian invader. Judah had been left to ponder her own spiritual condition before God. Unfortunately, she would not learn from the lesson of Israel.

8. The repopulation of Samaria (17:24–41)

24 To the demise of Israel and her indictment, a historical note is appended. In accordance with the deportation system used so fully by Tiglath-pileser III and followed by his successors, a vast transplantation of populaces occurred. Israelites were sent to Mesopotamia and even beyond; Babylonians and Arameans were transferred to Israel. Not only did the Assyrian monarchs hope to make the repopulated and reconstituted districts more manageable, but they hoped to train and encourage the citizenry to transfer their loyalties to the Assyrian Empire.

25–27 The new settlers in Samaria, however, soon encountered difficulties. Perhaps because many unburied bodies still remained after the bloody warfare and due to the depopulating of the land, voracious lions began to roam freely through the area. When the immigrants arrived, they faced this menace, and many of them lost their lives. They immediately suspected that "the god of the land" was punishing them because of their failure to worship him. Therefore, they sent a report to the Assyrian king for some religious leadership. There was some truth to their evaluation of things. Although God had sent his people into exile because of their failure to live up to the stipulations of the covenant with God, he would not leave the land without any witness to himself. The lions were a reminder of the broken covenant and of God's claim on the land (Lev 18:24–30).

28 The Assyrian king granted the request. Accordingly, one of Israel's exiled priests returned to the land and reinstituted the worship of the Lord at Bethel, the traditional cult center of the northern kingdom. The religion, however, that such a priest taught was the false worship instituted by Jeroboam. The result was a mixture of truth combined with the corrupted experience of Israel (now deepened by two centuries of growing apostasy) and the pagan rites brought by the new settlers.

29–31 Moreover the various immigrants continued the worship of their own gods in the places where they settled. Those from Babylonia worshiped Succoth Benoth, probably a deliberate scribal pun on the Babylonian Sarpanitu, Marduk's wife. Those from Cuth continued their worship of Nergal, the god of pestilence.

Those from Syrian (Aramean) backgrounds worshiped the deities associated with their cults. The Syrian (Aramean) gods that are recorded here are likely all deliberate misspellings. Ashima is possibly an abbreviated form of the goddess Malkat Shemayin or the Canaanite Asherah (cf. Am 8:14, NIV note). Some have suggested a connection with the late Syrian (Aramean) goddess Sima or with the Phoenician god Eshmun. Nibhaz is otherwise unknown, the most usual conjecture being that it is a corruption of the word for altar, now deified. Tartak is possibly a miswriting of Atargatis, the familiar Syrian goddess. Adrammelech and Anammelech are similar corrupt names probably representing Canaanite forms of the important Phoenician deities Baal and Anat, known from Phoenician and Ugaritic names.

32–41 Thus this Samarian worship from the onset was syncretistic. While the various people observed the worship of the Lord (in its Jeroboamic corrupt form), they also continued their own religious practices. The author of Kings evaluates the situation as being one of total confusion. Above all he makes it clear that the new Samarian worship did not represent the true faith; not only was it syncretistic, but it violated the clear commands and stipulations contained in Israel's covenant with God.

With this summation the divine case against Israel has been made. Despite all that the great Redeemer had done for his people, their thankless, hardened, and apostate hearts had led them into spiritual, moral, and social corruption and thus to their own demise. Israel's checkered history should have provided a lesson for Judah; it remains an example for the church today (cf. 1Co 10:11–13).

III. The Southern Kingdom (18:1–25:30)

A. The Reign of Hezekiah (18:1–20:21)

1. Hezekiah's accession and early deeds (18:1–12)

1–2 Perhaps the knottiest of all scriptural chronological problems occurs in this chapter. The data are these: the third year of Hoshea is the accession year of Hezekiah's twenty-nine-year reign (cf. v.1 with 2Ch 29:1); v.9 equates Hoshea's seventh year with Hezekiah's fourth year; and v.10 places Hoshea's ninth year in juxtaposition with Hezekiah's sixth year. Thus the dating of the early years of Hezekiah's reign is inextricably tied with Hoshea's rule. Since Hoshea came to the throne in 732/731 B.C., Hezekiah would appear to have begun his rule in 729/728.

Verse 12, however, records the invasion of Sennacherib that led to the famous Battle of El Tekeh as being in Hezekiah's fourteenth year. Since that date can be accurately determined as being 701 B.C., this verse would seem to place Hezekiah's accession date at 716/715 (cf. Isa 36:1). Adding to the difficulties is the scriptural notice in 16:1–2 that Ahaz reigned sixteen years after Pekah's seventeenth year (736/735), making Ahaz's final date to be 720/719.

Despite the many ingenious attempts to resolve these difficulties, the harmonization of these data remains a thorny problem. Obviously we are not yet able to grasp fully the details and principles that the Hebrew writers used in making these chronological correlations. While definite resolution of the details cannot be made at present, it may be simplest to view 729/728 as Hezekiah's first year as coregent with Ahaz, a joint rule that he was to share until 720/719. After Ahaz's death in 716, Hezekiah would then have ruled independently from 715 onward, or fourteen years before the Assyrian campaign of 701. Since the commencement of Hezekiah's independent rule began only in 715 and Ahaz's reign must have terminated in 720/719, the actual reins of government must have passed to Hezekiah some three or four years before Ahaz's death, just as Jotham lived on until 732 after committing governmental control to Ahaz in 736.

3–4 Hezekiah's godly character is sketched at the onset of things. He was concerned about the things of God, following in the footsteps of David his forefather in performing righteous deeds. This took the form early in his reign of a thorough reformation of the idolatrous practices of Ahaz. Not only did Hezekiah take away the high places and destroy the cultic stone pillars and Asherah poles, but his iconoclastic purge singled out Moses' bronze serpent (cf. Nu 21) that had lately become an object of veneration.

5–7 The divine evaluation is a favorable one: (1) there was none who equaled Hezekiah in his trust of the Lord; (2) he followed the Lord faithfully; and (3) he obeyed implicitly the law of God. Hence God was with him and blessed him with success. Hezekiah's character stands as a reminder that living for God's glory is for the believer's good also (cf. v.7 with 2Ch 31:20–21).

While the writer of Kings concentrates on the political events of Hezekiah's reign, the author of Chronicles gives supplemental information as to Hezekiah's continuing reformation. Hezekiah's spiritual concern brought about a cleansing of the temple, thus undoing the evil deeds of Ahaz (2Ch 29:3–19). This was followed by a reconstruction and rededication of the temple (2Ch 29:20–36), accomplished with proper sacrifices (vv.20–24), with sincere worship (vv.25–30), and with glad service to God (vv.31–36). Hezekiah's further reforms included the reinstituting of the Passover (2Ch 30), an observance performed with careful forethought (vv.1–12) and in accordance with the divine command, tempered with mercy (vv.13–22) and with protracted festivity (vv.23–27). The author of Chronicles tells of still later iconoclastic purges in which all the people of Israel participated (2Ch 31:1) and of Hezekiah's further attention to spiritual details and provisions (2Ch 31:2–19), closing with the notice that Hezekiah characteristically lived out his life in utter devotion to God and so was successful in all that he did (2Ch 31:20–21).

8–12 After the writer of Kings has familiarized his readers with Hezekiah's godly faculties, qualities undergirding him in the many crises of his life, he immediately turns his attention to one of the most critical episodes of Hezekiah's existence and of the southern kingdom as well. As an example of his godly concern and good success, he points out that Hezekiah rebelled against the king of Assyria. Not only that, but he turned against "the great king's" vassal, Philistia, defeating it from one end to the other. All Hezekiah's deeds, even his military accomplishments, thereby stand in stark contrast to the example of fearful Israel that perished because of unbelief and disobedience.

The time of Hezekiah's rebellion and occupation of Philistia must lie late in his reign, probably near the middle of the last quarter of the eighth century B.C. Hezekiah's early years were doubtless devoted to religion and internal affairs. Indeed, Sargon's western expeditions in 717/716 and again in 712, the latter of which was centered in Philistia and involved military action against Egypt and Transjordania, would make any military move by Hezekiah most unlikely until much later. However, Sargon's last half-decade (710–705) was occupied with troubles nearer home. Restless Arameans applied constant pressure in southern Mesopotamia; there was also the ever-present menace of Merodach-Baladan (cf. 20:12–13), the perennial king of Bit-Yakin and claimant to the throne of Babylon. Accordingly, Hezekiah's growing boldness and military operations had to fall within Sargon's last years, probably occurring at his death in 705, the usual occasion for such actions.

2. The Assyrian invasion (18:13–37)

13 The date of Sennacherib's campaign must be calculated from the time of Hezekiah's independent rule in 715, a date that harmonizes well with the data from Assyrian sources. Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.) was at first occupied with affairs close to home and so was not free to deal with Hezekiah. His first two campaigns were launched against the nearer menace, the continuing presence of Merodach-Baladan and the pesky Arameans, problems he inherited from his father. But having secured things in the south and east, Sennacherib was free to deal with the west, against which he launched his famous third campaign. His annals record the might of his all-out attack. Swooping down from the north, Sennacherib quickly dispatched the Phoenician cities and then unleashed his fury against Philistia. He notes that the citizens of Ekron had thrown in their lot with the Egyptians and Hezekiah of Judah, even going so far as to deliver their king (and Sennacherib's vassal) into the hands of Hezekiah for confinement. Apparently by-passing Ekron for the moment, Sennacherib marched down the Philistine coast as far as Ashkelon. Having secured the submission of that key city and having deported its king to Assyria, Sennacherib turned his attention inland in a thrust that would not only secure the key city of Judean Lachish but would effectively separate the remaining Philistines and Judeans from Egyptian help.

14–16 Verse 14 joins Sennacherib's campaign at this point. Sennacherib has taken Lachish and is busily engaged in mopping up the nearby fortified cities of Judah. With Phoenicia and most of Philistia laid waste, and with Sennacherib's forces already in the land, Hezekiah sensed the enormity of his impending doom. Overwhelmed by a sense of certain tragedy, he acted out of human propriety and sent a letter of submission to Sennacherib, indicating that he would agree to whatever terms of tribute Sennacherib would demand. In meeting Sennacherib's levy, Hezekiah went beyond the terms, emptying the coffers of both temple and palace and even stripping off the gold from the doors and door posts of the temple.

17–18 Hezekiah's generosity served only to whet Sennacherib's appetite. Doubtless he reasoned that these could only be a token payment; surely immense stores of wealth must lie hidden within the fortified walls of Jerusalem. Accordingly, as he continued operations in the Lachish area and laid plans for the capture of Ekron, Sennacherib sent a strong contingent under the direction of senior members of his staff to place Jerusalem under siege.

The Assyrian delegation came to the aqueduct of the Upper Pool, on the road to the Washerman's Field (cf. Isa 7:3). There they sent for Hezekiah, who, rather than appearing himself (probably considering it improper protocol to do so), sent three chief officials to deal with the three Assyrian delegates: Eliakim, son of Hilkiah, the palace administrator (cf. Isa 22:20–21); Shebna, the scribe; and Joash, son of Asaph, the king's herald.

The location of the meeting place of the two delegations has been much discussed. Similarly, the precise identification of the various pools mentioned in connection with the Assyrian menace (cf. 20:20; 2Ch 32:4, 30; Isa 22:9, 11; 36:2) and Hezekiah's plans for the defense of Jerusalem (2Ch 32:1–8; Isa 22:8–11) have been subjects of much controversy.

The available data seem to point to a northwest Jerusalem location for the meeting place, at a spot where the enemy might easily enjoy a commanding view of the city. If so, the Upper Pool of v.17 and the pool of 20:20 (cf. 2Ch 32:30; Isa 8:5–8) are to be differentiated. Certainly Hezekiah would have taken steps to ensure the security of both pools, as well as the cutting off of all the water sources available to Sennacherib's army (cf. 2Ch 32:3–4; Isa 22:9–12). Further evidence for differentiation between the pools comes from the scriptural indication that the Upper Pool was in existence before Hezekiah's siege preparations, being the scene of Isaiah's earlier meeting with Ahaz (Isa 7:3). What a contrast in circumstances this spot was witnessing! Here Isaiah had carried the encouraging message of the God of the universe to a godless king; now the emissaries of the great king of Assyria bore a distressing dispatch to the God-fearing Hezekiah.

19–25 The Assyrian message to Hezekiah was couched in terms of brilliant psychological warfare. Sennacherib's warning is given in two stages: in vv.19–22 he pointed out that Hezekiah's tactics and trust were ill conceived; in vv.23–25 he suggested that Hezekiah's supposed strengths were really weaknesses.

Thus Sennacherib cautioned Hezekiah that his military preparations and faith in Egypt's power to deliver Jerusalem were doomed to failure. Relying on Pharaoh, as a matter of fact, is like trusting one's weight to a splintered staff! Even Hezekiah's professed confidence in God was ill taken, since Hezekiah's iconoclastic purge had destroyed many opportunities of additional divine help. Surely the Judean king's insistence on worshiping only one God at one altar in Jerusalem was sheer bigotry!

Beginning with v.23 the Rab Shakeh ("field commander") reiterated the folly of Hezekiah's course of action. Did Hezekiah trust in military strength? What real strength did he have? Sennacherib had the resources to put two thousand horses at Jerusalem's disposal, but there would not be enough trained horsemen in Judah to ride them! The implication was that wars were won with chariotry, precisely the point where Hezekiah was lamentably weak. How, then, could Hezekiah have thought to repulse even the least of Sennacherib's officials? Any reliance on puny Egypt for chariots was nonsense. Further, as for Hezekiah's reputation for trusting in the Lord for deliverance, this again was folly; for it was the Lord himself who had told Sennacherib to attack and destroy Judah!

26–27 The answer of Hezekiah's embassy was scarcely one of strength. Fearing the effect of the Assyrian official's words on the populace that lived on the wall, he requested that the field commander switch his speech to Aramaic. The Assyrian's haughty retort was that those on the wall had a stake in all this, as well as Hezekiah. After all, when the Assyrians really placed the city under heavy siege, the common Jerusalemites would take the brunt of the attack. So great would be the hunger and so scarce the provisions that Jerusalem's citizenry would be reduced to consuming their own bodily issues. They had a right to hear!

28–32 As the field commander continued his remarks, he shouted all the louder. He told the people that Hezekiah was not to be trusted. Hezekiah could not deliver them from the Assyrians, and the Lord would not do so. The Assyrian official lashed out at Hezekiah's previous words of encouragement and categorically denied their truthfulness (cf. 2Ch 32:7–8). Rather than believing their king, they should align themselves with the rising star of Sennacherib. They should conclude a peace treaty with "the great king"(v.28) by surrendering and coming out to him. Then they could enjoy the fine things of their own land in abundance. Furthermore, the Assyrian king would take them to a new and better life in another land, which he had especially set aside for them. Rather than the grim prospects that faced them, theirs could be a life of peace and plenty, of life and not death.

The field commander's words were carefully chosen and highly emotive. By their acquiescence to the Assyrian king's demands, the Judeans would thereby conclude an agreement with him that would effect blessed conditions for all concerned.

33–35 Having urged the people to reject Hezekiah's promises and choose those of Sennacherib, the field commander gave the people incentives for doing so by citing evidence of Sennacherib's victories. Hezekiah was only misleading them with his talk of deliverance by the Lord their God. None of the gods of the many leaders that had opposed Sennacherib had delivered his people. Could they expect more?

The Assyrian official viewed all gods alike. The proof of their capability was in their power to deliver their people. This they had not done, neither the gods of the Arameans nor those of Jerusalem's sister, Samaria. The implication was clear: The Lord, like the other gods, was unable to stop Sennacherib.

36–37 The field commander's words were not received in the way that he had hoped. Faithful to Hezekiah's instructions, his delegates remained stonily silent. They came back sadly to the king, however, and told him of the enemy's words.

3. The continued siege of Jerusalem (19:1–13)

1–2 When Hezekiah heard the report of his delegation, he was filled with grief. Tearing his clothes and donning sackcloth (traditional symbols of mourning), he went with heavy heart to the temple to pour out his soul before God. God's very name and reputation were at stake in this time of national crisis! Desiring to do all that was within his power to know God's will, he sent Eliakim, Shebna, and the leading priests, all dressed in sackcloth, to meet with Isaiah so that he might hear God's word through his prophet (cf. Dt 18:18).

3 In briefing Isaiah as to the present emergency, the king's delegation also explained Hezekiah's deep concern in the matter. This was a day of "distress" (GK 7650). This word connotes not only the idea of trouble because of the Assyrian menace, but the anguish of heart that every true Israelite must have felt. Furthermore, it was a day of "rebuke" (GK 9349) or correction; Hezekiah sensed that the Lord was even now chastising his people (Hos 5:9–15). As well, it was a day of "disgrace" (GK 5541) or contempt; perhaps God was even now about to reject and cast off his people completely (cf. Dt 32:18–43; Jer 14:12; La 2:6).

4 It is to Hezekiah's credit that he realized the deeper spiritual issues involved in the crisis. It was not enough to bring the stated services and religious practices up to standard; God must be a living reality in every believer's life. Despite his zeal for holiness, perhaps he had erred in the way he, as king, had led the people in the realm of international politics. Had he perpetuated the policies of Ahaz in depending on his own wisdom and the strength of others in dealing with national affairs rather than depending on God? Far greater than the danger of the Assyrian at the walls was divine displeasure.

Hezekiah realized that God was the living God, in contradistinction to any of the so-called gods that the field commander had mentioned. Moreover, Hezekiah knew that God was jealous for his own name and would intervene on behalf of a people whose heart was right toward him. Further, he was "your God"; that is, Isaiah was his personal spokesman. Hezekiah therefore urged Isaiah to join him in prayer for the remnant of God's people.

5–7 Hezekiah's trust in God and confidence in Isaiah were not misplaced. Isaiah indeed did have a message for the repentant Hezekiah. He was not to fear the blasphemous words of Sennacherib's underlings—nor of Sennacherib himself. Indeed, "the great king," rather than adding Jerusalem to his list of conquests, would himself be given a spirit of fearfulness, so that when distressing news came to him out of Assyria, he would give up the siege and head for home immediately. Once there he would be killed. God assured Hezekiah that he was in control of the entire situation, superintending the details in accordance with his purposes.

God did not disclose to Hezekiah how all this would come about. It was enough for him to know and to believe that God would deal with the Assyrian threat. Thus Hezekiah's faith could mature as he continued to pray and wait for God to effect his plan. What a wondrous experience awaits those who trust in God completely!

While the Scriptures do not say so, Hezekiah obviously returned a negative reply to Sennacherib's demands. Accordingly the field commander set out to deliver Hezekiah's refusal to his master.

8–9 Learning that Sennacherib had moved on to join his siege forces at Libnah, the field commander joined him there with his report. The reason for Sennacherib's removal follows in v.9: it had been reported to him that the Egyptian army under Tirhakah was even now advancing through the Philistine coast to aid the Philistine city of Ekron. Apparently by-passing Ekron, the Assyrian king was able to bring his forces safely to El Tekeh, where he met and defeated the Egyptian troops. After the victory at El Tekeh, Sennacherib turned back inland to capture Timnah and then Ekron itself.

While Sennacherib was thus engaged in fighting, he sent a siege contingent to Jerusalem so that Hezekiah could not attack from the rear. He also sent his field commander back to Jerusalem with a message for Hezekiah designed to continue the psychological warfare.

10–13 Understanding clearly that Hezekiah's previous reply indicated a firm belief that the Lord would deliver Jerusalem and his people from the Assyrian king, Sennacherib concentrated his message on the absurdity of such a belief. Hezekiah certainly knew that Assyria had destroyed all those countries that had opposed him, and none of their gods had been able to deliver them. To make Hezekiah take even more notice and fear, he added that the kings of those countries had paid the price of oblivion. Hezekiah had better take care!

4. The deliverance of Jerusalem (19:14–37)

14–15 Sennacherib's letter was duly delivered and reached Hezekiah's hands. When he had read it, he took it along with him to the temple and spread it out before the Lord. Hezekiah's action was one of simple faith that God still planned to intervene even as he had promised. As a child bringing his broken toy to his father for repair, so Hezekiah laid the issues in God's sight for resolution. Hezekiah then poured out his soul's concern to his heavenly Father. He addressed God as the personal God of Israel who was his possession and the One who in infinite mercy meets with his people from his dwelling place between the cherubim above the ark of the covenant. While he is Israel's God, he is also the only true God who sovereignly controls the destinies of all nations. He is nothing less than the Creator—and Consummator—of all things.

16 Hezekiah next pleaded with God to take notice of the way Sennacherib had blasphemed him. The figures are full of intensity. A person who wishes to hear more distinctly turns one ear toward the source of the sound. Those who desire to see more clearly must open both eyes. The prayer, like that of Daniel (Da 9:17–19), is concerned most of all about the reputation of the living God.

17–18 Yet Hezekiah understood not only the truth but also the limits of Sennacherib's remarks. To be sure the Assyrian king had laid waste the aforementioned nations together with their lands. Certainly he had destroyed the powerless gods of those nations. But they were mere idols—not gods at all! None of that proved anything, for Sennacherib now stood in the presence of the only true God.

19 Having assured God that he understood the issues at hand, Hezekiah closed his prayer with a plea for God's deliverance of Israel so that all people might know that the Lord alone is God. True believers are concerned in every situation that the character and reputation of God not be brought into disrepute; rather, they long that God be glorified for who he is as well as for what he has done.

20 The Lord's answer was not long in coming. Isaiah sent a message from God to Hezekiah, assuring him that his prayer had been heard. The major portion of that message is composed within a threefold poetic utterance: (1) for Sennacherib there is a reply to his misguided boasting (vv.21–28); (2) for Hezekiah God gives a sign that he would deal with Sennacherib and deliver his people (vv.29–31); and (3) for all there is a prophetic declaration that Sennacherib would not even begin the battle of Jerusalem, let alone conquer it (vv.32–34).

21 The first of the utterances is given in the ancient taunt-song form, designed so as to humiliate Sennacherib by casting his own words in his teeth, thus showing him how ridiculous they sounded. Did Sennacherib despise and degrade all nations and their worship? Jerusalem, in turn, would disdain him, tossing her head at him as he fled in cowardice. The term "virgin" (GK 1435) emphasizes that Jerusalem would not be violated by Sennacherib. By the use of a rhetorical question, God pointed out that Sennacherib had not wisely considered his course of action. His pride and arrogance had caused him to insult the Holy One of Israel. God's own holiness had been manifested clearly through his chosen people Israel, however much they may have failed him or poorly represented him. What Sennacherib needed to understand was that a holy God would not countenance sin, whether in his own people or in those nations whose destinies he controls.

22–24 God next dealt with Sennacherib's many boasts, in which he took such pride and on the basis of which he considered himself above other humans or God. Sennacherib had many chariots in which he had personally scaled rugged and previously inaccessible mountain passes. He had felled the finest timbers of Lebanon. On the one hand, he had dug wells in foreign soil; on the other, he had dried up the streams of Egypt.

The language here is highly figurative, the point being that in Sennacherib's mind no obstacle of humanity or nature was sufficient to withstand him. The words repeat Sennacherib's inner musings, ideas known only to himself, or so he thought. But God knows the innermost intents of all people (Ps 44:21), and his word penetrates a person's deepest being (Heb 4:12). The revelation of these hidden desires ought to have struck terror into Sennacherib's heart, convincing him that the Lord was truly God.

25–26 God then confronted Sennacherib with that which he had apparently not considered: Sennacherib's successes were foreordained by God. Moreover God's purposes had not been done in secret; he had proclaimed them through his prophets of all ages and even then was bringing them to pass. The result had been that Sennacherib had been able to wreak havoc on people who were totally powerless and as helpless as tender herbage and plants before the blasts of the sirocco. No, Sennacherib should not boast as though what he had done was either self-generated or self-accomplished. It was God's divine government that was at work; Sennacherib was but God's instrument of correction for Israel and the nations.

27–28 Having revealed to Sennacherib that he knew his innermost thoughts and desires and that in his sovereign administration of the flow of history he had ordained Sennacherib's past successes, God then informed Sennacherib that he was aware of his every action, including his blasphemous insolence. Sennacherib had enjoyed God-given success; now he would learn of defeat. He would be subdued like an animal and return to his own land.

29–31 God next turned to Hezekiah with a reassuring sign. God had similarly offered Hezekiah's father, Ahaz, a sign (Isa 7:11), which, when refused, was given to the people. The sign would be one of extreme importance to besieged Jerusalem. In what remained of the present year, there would be food enough from that which had been spilled accidentally in the sowing and had sprung up by itself as an aftergrowth. Since military campaigns were regularly planned to coincide with the harvest so that the armies might live off the land, and since Israel's year began in early fall, there would be little left of "this year." Accordingly, as the new year dawned, due to the extent of the devastation, they would again largely depend on grain that came up of its own accord in random fashion.

For the third year, however, there was a direct divine command: "Sow and reap, plant vineyards and eat fruit." Here was direct assurance that the people might resume normal agricultural activities with full expectation of eating the fruits of their labor. When in the harvest of the third year the people ate in abundance, they would know assuredly that God had been in the entire crisis. He had allowed the Assyrians to chastise his people for their own good. But because of Judah's godly leadership, he had delivered them, as a testimony both to the godless Sennacherib and to his spiritually slack nation. From this they should learn their lesson that God was dealing with a backsliding people. The experience should serve as a further sign of that future remnant that the Messiah will deliver at his coming.

32–34 God closed his utterance with a final message to the Assyrian king. Sennacherib would not only not enter Jerusalem but would not even lay a full-scale siege against it. No arrow would fall into the city; neither shield nor siege ramp would appear before it. Quite the contrary, Sennacherib would turn around and go home; for God himself was defending and would deliver Jerusalem, not only for his own name's sake (vv.4, 19), but on the basis of his standing promise to David (cf. 2Sa 7; 1Ki 11:13, 34–39; 2Ki 8:19).

That Sennacherib failed in his attempt to take Jerusalem is apparent from the annals of his third campaign. Although he claimed the capture and despoiling of some forty-six Judean cities, when it came to Jerusalem, he could only report that he had made Hezekiah a prisoner in his palace in Jerusalem. The only validity to Sennacherib's face-saving claim can be seen when he surrounded Jerusalem during his protracted campaigning in Judah and Philistia.

35–36 That very night the prophetic utterance was fulfilled. As the Assyrian army slept, the angel of the Lord slew 185,000 of the soldiers. When Sennacherib and those who survived arose the next morning, they were greeted by a veritable graveyard. All around them lay bodies, dead bodies! Having already just received alarming news from home (cf. v.7) and with his army now decisively depleted, Sennacherib broke camp and returned to Nineveh. Though he would yet fight another five campaigns, he would never again return to Judah. The Israelites' God was the living God!

37 Some twenty years later (681 B.C.), two of Sennacherib's own sons assassinated him and successfully escaped to Urartu. Another son, Esarhaddon (681–668), succeeded Sennacherib as king. The last vestige of the divine prophecy stood complete. While God's program may seem to tarry (cf. 2Pe 3:4–9), it will be accomplished.

5. Hezekiah's miraculous recovery (20:1–11)

1 Taken at face value, the opening phrase—"in those days"—seems to place the events of this chapter near the time of Sennacherib's invasion in 701 B.C. In the light of chronological difficulties, it seems best to take the phrase to be a general statement referring to some time in the reign of Hezekiah. Thus the events of ch. 20 (cf. Isa 38–39) probably belong chronologically before those of 18:7b–19:37, these latter verses being recorded beforehand simply as the example par excellence of Hezekiah's trust in God (cf. 18:7a). If Isaiah's prophecy in chs. 36–39 forms the basis for the text in Kings, and if the events of Isa 36–37 (cf. 2Ki 18:7b–19:37), though occurring later, are given first to round off his discussion dealing with the Assyrian period of his ministry before moving on to the Babylonian period (Isa 40–66), then the author of Kings may be following the thematic order of Isaiah.

In those critical days, then, when Sargon was moving toward Ashdod to deal with the western rebels (among whom Hezekiah himself had been somewhat implicated), Isaiah delivered God's message to a sick Hezekiah. It was time for Hezekiah to put his house in order; for as things stood, he would surely die. Hezekiah needed to be certain that not only were the affairs of state in order, but that he and his house were on proper terms with God.

2–3 Hezekiah was a man of faith. Turning his face to the wall, thereby both dismissing Isaiah and entering into solitary communion with God, Hezekiah poured out his heart to his Lord. Hezekiah reminded God of his faithfulness, both in his personal conduct and in his righteous deeds, and of his wholehearted devotion to God. Hezekiah then wept bitterly. In accordance with God's own promises, Hezekiah had a right to expect a longer life (cf. Ex 20:12; Dt 5:29; 30:16). But Hezekiah's concerns were deeper than any personal desire for added years. What would become of that nation? His reforms were barely yet in progress. What would become of Judah? There was so much more to be done. Deeper still, he would die without a male heir, for no son had yet been born to him. What, then, would become of the house of David? The program and person of God were at stake, and Hezekiah believed that somehow he was vitally involved in them. How could it end like this?

4–6 Isaiah had not yet cleared the palace when God sent him back with a message for Hezekiah: the Lord God of his father David had heard Hezekiah's righteous prayer and justifiable concern and had seen his tears. Therefore God would heal him and give him fifteen additional years of service. Moreover, for his own name's sake and because of the promise made to David, God would deliver Jerusalem throughout Hezekiah's lifetime. The mention of Hezekiah's going into the temple on the third day is both a recognition of his godly habit of life and a reminder of his obligations to render thanks to the Lord for his healing.

7 Not only did Isaiah have spiritual news and instructions for Hezekiah, he also had directions for the king's physical recovery. In accordance with those orders, a poultice of figs was mixed and applied to Hezekiah's ulcerated sore, and he recovered. Although God chose to work through the accepted medical standards of the day, it is certain that ultimately the healing was effected by the divine word.

8–11 Hezekiah asked for a confirmatory sign that what Isaiah had said was true (cf. Isa 7:12). Isaiah asked Hezekiah whether the sun's shadow should go forward or return ten places. Hezekiah reasoned that going backward would be the greater sign, since that would contradict the natural processes. In accordance with Hezekiah's choice, Isaiah prayed to the Lord, and so it came to pass. By whatever means the deed was accomplished, it was a miracle effected by the sovereign power of God alone and intended to be a sign to Hezekiah that he would recover and serve his Redeemer yet another fifteen years. What a comfort this knowledge ought to have been to Hezekiah throughout his remaining years! Yet the author of Chronicles records that Hezekiah did not fully respond to God's kindness toward him. Rather, he became proud so that God's wrath came on him and his people, a judgment that was averted only when Hezekiah humbled himself and repented (2Ch 32:25–26; cf. 2Ki 18–19).

6. Hezekiah and Merodach-Baladan (20:12–21)

12 During his newly acquired years, God soon allowed Hezekiah's intentions to be put to the test (cf. 2Ch 32:31). The Babylonian king, Merodach-Baladan, hearing of Hezekiah's miraculous recovery together with the supernatural sign, sent an embassy to Hezekiah, ostensibly to deliver a message of congratulations and a gift to him. The checkered career of Merodach-Baladan, however, makes it clear that his motives were politically engendered, hoping to find in Hezekiah a new ally in his struggles against Assyria.

13 Hezekiah received the messengers warmly. Doubtless he told them the whole story of his healing and the remarkable incident of the retreating of the sun's shadow. But he went beyond this. To impress his guests still further, he showed them the vast store of riches contained in the palace complex.

14–18 When the Babylonian embassy had left, Isaiah immediately confronted Hezekiah, who was still dazzled by the fact that he could have been so well known in distant Babylon. He freely told Isaiah all that had transpired. Rather than earning the prophet's commendation, Hezekiah drew his condemnation. Hezekiah had been foolish. Not only would the extent of Jerusalem's wealth now be known and desired by all (cf. Sennacherib's demands in 18:13–16), but one day this same Babylon would invade the land and carry off its populace and all its treasures. Yes, even Hezekiah's own descendants would be taken captive and employed in the service of a Babylonian king (cf. 24:12–16; 2Ch 33:11; Da 1:3–5). Quite out of keeping with his righteous character, Hezekiah's folly would prove to be a contributing factor in the fulfillment of the ancient prophecies (Lev 26:33; Dt 28:64–67; 30:3). Hezekiah's experience remains a stern warning to all the perils of pride (cf. Pr 16:5, 18; 28:25–26; 29:23). At the same time, Hezekiah did receive one assurance through Isaiah's words: he would have a son to succeed him.

19 Hezekiah responded with humility and genuine godliness, acknowledging the propriety of Isaiah's God-given message. Hezekiah's last words contain a touch of pathos. While he was thankful that God would keep his promise not to surrender Judah and Jerusalem in his day (cf. v.6), yet he realized that his own actions had put his nation and his posterity in danger.

20 The chapter closes with a notice of Hezekiah's many achievements. The extent of his success is enlarged on by the author of Chronicles, from whom we also learn that the water conduit mentioned here dealt with the waters of Gihon (2Ch 32:27–31). These waters were directed within Jerusalem's walls via a specially constructed tunnel leading to a reservoir, known as the Pool of Siloam. The completion of this 1,777-foot tunnel made the waters of Gihon inaccessible to an enemy but were readily available to a besieged population.

21 Thus passed the king who was unsurpassed in his trust of the Lord (cf. 18:5). He was buried with full honors by the citizenry of Jerusalem in the upper section of the tombs of the sons of David (2Ch 32:33).

B. The Reign of Manasseh (21:1–18)

1–6 Manasseh came to the throne of Judah at the age of twelve, reigning for some fifty-five years (698/697–642 B.C.), the longest reign in Judah's history. Born soon after the crisis with Sargon, Manasseh must have seen God's great deliverance at Jerusalem. Nevertheless, with his father's death, he soon plunged into every manner of spiritual wickedness. The high places Hezekiah had destroyed were rebuilt, the Canaanite religious practices relative to Baal and Asherah were reintroduced, and he established and participated in a state astral cult. So far did his spiritual prostitution take him that Manasseh introduced pagan altars in both the outer and the priest's courts and even in the temple itself. Ultimately the hated Asherah pole was placed in the temple, the very abode of the sacred name. Moreover, he went so far as to involve his own son in the loathsome and detestable rites of infant sacrifice; he practiced sorcery and divination and consulted purveyors of demonic activity.

7–9 Manasseh's great evil provoked the Lord to anger; placing the Asherah pole within the temple was especially offensive. God had promised to dwell in peace among his people forever (cf. 2Sa 7:13; 1Ki 8:16; 9:3), if they would but serve him in righteousness (cf. 2Sa 7:10; 1Ki 9:6–9). But the people indulged themselves with the lustful Manasseh rather than harken to their Redeemer. Accordingly, Manasseh's Judah exceeded in spiritual degradation the original Canaanites whom God had driven out before Israel (cf. Am 2:9–10). What a tragedy! How superficial had been the nation's compliance with Hezekiah's reforms! Without a strong spiritual leader, the sinful people quickly turned to their own evil machinations. The judgment of God could not be far away.

10–11 Throughout Manasseh's wicked reign God warned of the grave consequences of the king's sin, sending repeated warnings to his prophets. Yet neither king nor people paid any attention to God's denunciations (cf. 2Ch 33:10).

12–13 God therefore set in motion those forces that would bring destruction on Jerusalem and Judah (cf. Jer 15:1–4). In rehearsing the coming judgment, God used three well-known literary figures: (1) the tingling ears, (2) the measuring and plumb lines, and

(3) the dish wiped clean. By the first he emphasized the severity of the judgment: it would be of such untold dimension that it would strike terror into the hearts of all who heard of its execution (cf. 1Sa 3:11; Jer 19:3–9). By the second God used a figure often associated with building (cf. Zec 1:16) but employed also of the measuring of destruction (Isa 34:11; Am 7:7–9). Just as God had taken the measure of Samaria so as to destroy it, so Jerusalem would fall. Even as the Lord had plumbed the house of Ahab in order to exterminate it, so the people of Jerusalem would be executed. By the third literary figure, the complete destruction of Jerusalem was emphasized. As one wipes a dish clean, turning it over so that no drop of water is left, so Jerusalem's destruction would be total. None would remain.

14–16 Because Israel had forsaken God and provoked him to wrath time without end since he had redeemed them from Egypt, he would forsake wicked Judah, the last vestige of his inheritance. He would give them over for a prey to be looted and plundered (cf. Dt 28:49–68; Isa 42:22; Jer 30:16; Hab 1:5–11). The wicked reign of Manasseh had become the capstone of the wall of sin that Israel had built between herself and God. God now hadtaken its measure and marked Judah for destruction.

17–18 The writer of Kings brings Manasseh's history to a close by indicating further source material for the details of his infamous life and by noting that at his death he was buried in his private garden called "The Garden of Uzza." The picture thus presented by our author is bleak, portraying the dominant themes of the vast majority of Manasseh's long reign. This critical evaluation is a proper one. Manasseh's personal example and leadership in sin were to have a permanent effect, bringing on Judah's demise despite the temporary reforms of Josiah.

The author of Chronicles records that the Lord humbled Manasseh by allowing him to fall into the hands of the king of Assyria, an event that brought about Manasseh's repentance and a short period of religious reformation (2Ch 33:11–17). Although the time of Manasseh's capture, release, and repentance is nowhere indicated in 2 Kings, the fact that this record presents such a uniform description of Manasseh's bad character suggests that this experience must have occurred late in his reign.

The widespread revolts during the reign of Ashurbanipal, which occurred from 652–648 B.C., may have provided the occasion for Manasseh's summons to Babylon and imprisonment. If so, his subsequent release and reform were apparently far too late to have much of an effect on the obdurately backslidden populace.

C. The Reign of Amon (21:19–26)

19–22 The short reign of Amon was a replay of the earlier period of his father, Manasseh. The author of Kings notes simply that he was as evil as his father and so perpetuated all of Manasseh's earlier idolatry. The author of Chronicles (2Ch 33:21–23) adds that Amon failed to humble himself but rather "increased his guilt."

23–26 In 640 B.C., the wicked Amon was assassinated by his own officials who, in turn, were executed by the populace. Amon's son Josiah was established as the next king. Although the Scriptures give no reason for the conspiracy, its cause may lie within the tangled web of revolts that Ashurbanipal suppressed from 642–639 and that caused him to turn his attention to the west. Certainly his menacing advance took him as far as Phoenicia. At this time, too, he may have resettled newly deported elements in Samaria (cf. Ezr 4:9–10). Amon's death may thus reflect a power struggle between those who wished to remain loyal to the Assyrian crown and those who aspired to link Judah's fortunes to the rising star of Psammetik I (664–609) of Egypt's Twenty-Sixth Dynasty. At any rate, in 640 B.C. Amon's body was interred in the Garden of Uzza; and his eight-year-old son, Josiah, acceded to the Judean throne.

D. The Reign of Josiah (22:1–23:30)

1. Ascension and early reforms (22:1–7)

1–2 A mere lad of eight years of age when he came to the throne, Josiah probably owed much of his spiritual concern to his mother, Jedidah, and probably to the guidance of pious men in prominent positions. He quickly demonstrated himself to be one who followed his ancestor David in godliness, walking circumspectly before God and other people.

3–7 The author of Kings quickly moves to the most outstanding example of Josiah's godly fidelity: his repair of the temple in his eighteenth year (622 B.C.). According to 2Ch 34:3–7, however, this example of piety was preceded by a time of definite committal to the Lord at the age of sixteen and, beginning some four years later, by a thorough iconoclastic purge in which he not only attacked the idolatry of Judah but eventually took it on himself to extend his efforts to Israel. Accordingly, Josiah's action here in his eighteenth year was quite in keeping with his true spiritual character.

At this time Josiah sent his secretary Shaphan to Hilkiah the high priest with a royal command to utilize the freewill offerings of the people for the appropriation of supplies and the paying of the laborers so as to begin the repair of the temple.

2. The Book of the Law (22:8–13)

8–10 When the royal commission arrived, Hilkiah also had news for them: he had found a copy of the Book of the Law. Although scholars have often argued as to the contents of that manuscript, the king's later reaction when he heard the law read and the subsequent further reforms (23:4–20) and religious observances (2Ch 35:1–19) indicate that it included at least key portions, if not the whole, of Deuteronomy (e.g., Dt 28–30).

The royal commission stayed long enough to be assured that the king's wishes had been carried out (2Ch 34:10–13), during which time Shaphan had an opportunity to examine the new scroll. When the commission returned, Shaphan reported to the king. His orders had been carried out and the work begun. He also told the king about the exciting new discovery that he had brought back with him and proceeded to read selected portions of it to the king.

11–13 The king's reaction at the reading of the law was one of immediate contrition, as expressed in the sign of lamentation and grief—the tearing of his robes. The basis of his grief was twofold: Judah's guilt and her coming judgment. The nation had sinned grievously in breaking God's covenant in both its idolatry and its social injustices; therefore, in accordance with the terms of that violated covenant, judgment must come. With repentant and sorrowful heart, Josiah sent a commission made up of trusted officials and the high priest Hilkiah to the prophetess Huldah, who lived in the second district of Jerusalem (cf. Zep 1:10), to inquire as to the Lord's present intention regarding Judah.

3. The advice of Huldah (22:14–20)

14–20 Huldah faithfully rendered the Lord's message for the people and Josiah. Because Judah had persisted in its idolatry and wickedness, the sentence of judgment recorded in God's Word, which the king had just heard, would surely come to pass. As for the king himself, because he had responded to God's Word and humbled himself, and because he had grieved over Judah's sinful conditions, he would be spared the anguish of seeing God's devastating judgment carried out.

At first sight the promise seems to be at variance with the fact that Josiah died in battle (23:29–30). However, though the words in v.20 might be construed as indicating peaceful death, such need not be the case. The phrase "be gathered to one's fathers" simply points to the fact that people die and are buried, not to the manner of their death. The point here is that Josiah would die at peace with God before his awful sentence would descend on the nation.

4. Further reforms (23:1–23)

1–3 On receiving Huldah's answer, the king convened his elders for consultation. As a result of that meeting, all levels of Judean society were called together in public assembly so that they might hear a reading from the newly found scroll. When that had been accomplished, the king led his people in a ceremony of covenant renewal wherein they pledged themselves to follow the Lord and his commands unswervingly. Like Moses and Joshua of old, Josiah took his place as a virtual mediator of the covenant between his people and their sovereign Lord.

4–7 The covenant renewal was followed by renewed religious reforms. In accordance with the royal command, the priests conducted a thorough search of the temple to remove anything that spoke of heathen worship. In accordance with the scriptural standards, the pagan cult articles were taken outside Jerusalem to the Kidron Valley and burned—their ashes being subsequently taken to Bethel, where paganism first had its official sanction in Israel. In taking the detested pagan abominations to the Kidron, Josiah followed the lead of the earlier royal reformers Asa (1Ki 15:13) and Hezekiah (2Ch 29:16; 30:14). The removal of the ashes to Bethel constituted a public denunciation of the place.

8–9 Josiah also recalled all the Levitical priests from their duties at the various high places throughout Judah. While those priests were admitted to the fellowship, their previous service had rendered them ineligible to officiate in the temple services; hence they were put on a status with those priests who had bodily defects (Lev 21:17–23). The high places were then desecrated so that those spurious centers of worship might no longer be maintained. Likewise, the altar at the high place that was situated at one of Jerusalem's own gates was torn down.

10–12 Josiah's reforms were thoroughgoing. Topheth, the sacred precinct in the Valley of Hinnom, sacred to the Molech rites, was desecrated. The horses dedicated to the sun, which were quartered at the very entrance to the temple, were disposed of and their chariots burned. His reforms likewise turned to the altars used in astral worship, located on the roof of the upper room built by Ahaz. These doubtless had been restored by Manasseh and Amon, along with the construction of the pagan altars (cf. 21:5). The pulverized debris from these objects was cast into the Kidron Valley.

13–18 Even those cult places that had enjoyed a long existence, having escaped the thoroughgoing reforms of Hezekiah, were now dismantled and desecrated. The pagan altars near Jerusalem had been built by Solomon himself. The altar at Bethel, which Josiah's reform also reached, had been established by Jeroboam at Solomon's death; but in the course of time a purely Canaanite worship had apparently replaced the earlier worship of the golden calf. In the former cases Josiah defiled those cult places by filling them with human bones (cf. Nu 19:16). In the latter instance, not content with destroying the high place and burning the Asherah pole, he exhumed the human bones from the graves situated on the mountain and burned them on the altar, thus defiling it forever. This action fulfilled the words of the unknown prophet of Judah of old (1Ki 13:26–32). The remains of that prophet, along with those of the misguided prophet of Bethel (1Ki 13:11ff.), however, were left undisturbed.

19–20 Indeed, not only Bethel, but all the high places of the former northern kingdom were to feel the wrath of Josiah's purge. The various high places were destroyed and the priests of those illicit rites were slaughtered on their altars, which were further desecrated by the burning of human bones on them (cf. 2Ch 34:6–7).

21–23 Josiah's attitude toward spiritual reform was not purely negative. He also gave instructions that the Passover be held as soon as it could be done in strict accordance with the law. Accordingly, in the eighteenth year of his reign, the Passover was celebrated in Jerusalem, the likes of which had not been seen since the days of Samuel. Not only was it observed as the law prescribed (2Ch 35:1–19), but it was celebrated by all Judah and Israel (2Ch 35:18).

5. Latter days (23:24–30)

24–25 The author of Kings approaches the end of Josiah's just reign. The thought of Josiah's strict piety in keeping the laws of the Passover leads to the further observation that he was ever consistent in his application of the law. As Josiah had meticulously fulfilled the requirements of the law relative to Israel's ceremonial worship with his many reforms, his repair of the temple, and his reinstituting of the Passover, so had he put away the evils of false personal religion. This included both those who dealt in spiritism and all sorts of objects of detestable idolatry. In summary it could be said of Josiah that none of the kings of Israel and Judah was his equal in zeal for the law. As Hezekiah had been unequaled in faith among the kings (18:5), so Josiah knew no rival in uncompromising adherence to the Law of Moses.

26–28 The account of Josiah's godly life ends on a note of sadness. Despite all that he had done to remove Judah's idolatry, Manasseh's gross spiritual wickedness had had a permanent effect. Although Judah's outward worship experience had been set in order, the people's confession had been a mere externality. With the passing of Josiah, the internal condition of their obdurately apostate heart quickly surfaced (cf. Jer 5). Accordingly, God's just wrath would yet reach his sinful people. If the prophets and righteous Josiah had not been able to turn the people from their wicked ways, only God's judgment could have the desired effect.

29–30 Josiah's death at Megiddo can be attributed to his part in the complex international events of the last quarter of the seventh century B.C. With the death of Ashurbanipal in 626, the already decaying Neo-Assyrian Empire began to crumble quickly away. By 625 the Chaldean king Nabopolassar had been able to achieve independence for Babylon. From that point onward throughout the course of the next two decades, the Assyrian territory was systematically reduced, especially as Nabopolassar found common cause against Assyria. In 614 the time-honored capital of Assyria, Asshur, fell to the Medes. In 612 Nineveh itself fell to the coalition of Chaldeans, Medes, and Ummanmande, the surviving Assyrian forces under Ashur-u-ballit fleeing to Haran.

In those critical times concerned with the rising power of the new Mesopotamian coalition, Egypt's Twenty-Sixth Dynasty Pharaoh, Neco, honored the previous diplomatic ties with Assyria. As Neco's predecessor, Psammetik I, had come to the aid of Assyria in 616 B.C., so Neco moved to join the surviving Assyrian forces under Ashur-u-ballit. It was to prevent this movement of Egyptian aid that Josiah deployed his forces in the Valley of Megiddo in 609. That action cost Josiah his life, though it did delay the Egyptian forces from linking with their Assyrian allies before Haran fell to the Chaldeans and Medes. A subsequent attempt to retake Haran failed completely; and the best Egypt could give the doomed Assyrians was a four-year standoff, the opposing armies facing each other at Carchemish, on the western Euphrates.

The Chronicler (2Ch 35:20–25) reports that Josiah had refused Neco's attempts to avoid the affair at Megiddo and rather, having disguised himself, had personally fought against the Egyptians until he was mortally wounded. At that point Josiah was rushed back to Jerusalem where he was buried in his own tomb. Quite understandably he was lamented by all the people, including the prophet Jeremiah. Thus passed one of God's choicest saints and one of Judah's finest kings. Josiah's determined action had brought about his tragic death, but he was thereby spared the greater tragedy of seeing the ultimate death of his nation a scant twenty-three years later.

E. The Last Days of Judah (23:31–25:21)

1. The reign of Jehoahaz (23:31–33)

31 At the death of the courageous and pious Josiah, the people of the land selected his third surviving son, Shallum, who took the throne name Jehoahaz (cf. 1Ch 3:15 with Jer 22:11–12), to be the next king. The selection of Jehoahaz is beset with problems. According to 1Ch 3:15, Johanan, not Jehoahaz (or Shallum), was Josiah's eldest son. Because nothing further is known of Johanan, he had probably died much earlier. Jehoiakim, the next eldest son, was passed over, the kingship being conferred on Jehoahaz, who was two years younger (cf. v.36).

Just why Jehoahaz was selected instead of Jehoiakim is not certain, though the reason may lie in the fact that they had different mothers, Jehoahaz being Josiah's son by Hamutal, whereas Jehoiakim's mother was Zebudah. Perhaps Hamutal enjoyed a favored status.

32–33 Jehoahaz was no Josiah, however; nor, indeed, was any of his sons. His deposition was swift in coming. Within three months Pharaoh Neco summoned Jehoahaz to meet him in Riblah of Syria, his base of operations and staging area for the Assyrian campaigns.

2. The reign of Jehoiakim (23:34–24:7)

34–37 At Riblah, Neco replaced Jehoahaz with Eliakim, Josiah's second son, giving him the throne name Jehoiakim (cf. 2Ch 36:4). Neco then took Jehoahaz as a captive to Egypt, where he remained until his death (cf. Jer 22:10–12; Eze 19:1–4). Neco imposed a severe tribute on the new Judean king, a sum Jehoiakim raised by levying a heavy taxation on the citizenry. Judah had appeased her new overlord, and she had a new king. A far cry from his godly father, Jehoiakim was to lead Judah into still deeper trouble spiritually and politically.

Jehoiakim's rule was like that of the wicked kings who preceded Josiah. Jeremiah represents him as a monster who despoiled his own people (Jer 22:13–14); opposed the Lord's servants (Jer 26:20–23; 36:21–23); filled the land with violence, apostasy, and degradation (Jer 18:18–20; cf. 11:19); and led his people into open apostasy and degradation (Jer 8:4–12, 18–9:16; 10:1–9; 11:1–17; et al.).

24:1 Jehoiakim and Judah were soon to change masters. After the final defeat of the combined Assyrian and Egyptian forces at Carchemish, Nebuchadnezzar overtook the remaining Egyptian forces at Hamath. Those Egyptian troops that managed to escape fled to Egypt (cf. Jer 46:2ff.). Nebuchadnezzar boasted that he thus took "the whole land of Hatti" (i.e., Syro-Palestine); so doubtless our text is correct in reading that Judah and Jehoiakim became his vassal. This is further corroborated in Nebuchadnezzar's own chronicles when, after reporting his succession to the kingship in 605 B.C., he recorded for the following year the submission and tribute of "all the kings of Hatti."

Although Jehoiakim served Nebuchadnezzar for the next three years, he apparently awaited an opportunity to throw off the Babylonian yoke. When in 601 Neco turned back Nebuchadnezzar's forces at the Egyptian border, Jehoiakim assumed that his moment had arrived and so rebelled. Once again Judah would lean on the broken reed of Egypt.

2–7 War had cost both the Chaldeans (Babylonians) and the Egyptians so dearly that Nebuchadnezzar was unable to mobilize the troops and equipment to deal with impudent Judah, now newly allied to his Egyptian adversary, Neco. Accordingly, Nebuchadnezzar spent the next few years in rebuilding his armed might in anticipation of the time when he could deal with the insurgents. Meanwhile he moved against the Arameans and Arabians, thus strengthening his hold on Judah's Egyptian flank. This also put him in a position to utilize the Transjordanian tribes to send raiding parties into Judah. The author of Kings reports that that harassment found its ultimate origin in God's command to bring judgment to a wicked Judah that had followed in the train of Manasseh's wickedness, a judgment the prophets had repeatedly warned about (cf. Jer 15:1–9; Hab 1:2–6; Zep 1:4–13; 3:1–7).

In 598 B.C., Nebuchadnezzar was ready. Gathering his huge force, he set out for Jerusalem and the impenitent Jehoiakim. But Nebuchadnezzar was not to avenge himself on the Judean king personally; for even as he set out for Judah, Jehoiakim lay dead, succeeded by his son, Jehoiachin.

3. The reign of Jehoiachin (24:8–16)

8–9 With his father dead, young Jehoiachin was faced with the awesome specter of the advancing armies of Nebuchadnezzar. Certainly he would get no help from Egypt, for Neco was in no position to challenge Nebuchadnezzar again (cf. v.7). Nor did the lad have the spiritual maturity to be able to utilize godly wisdom.

10–16 The armies of Nebuchadnezzar soon arrived and placed Jerusalem under a siege. At the appropriate time, Nebuchadnezzar himself appeared before the beleaguered city, to whom Jehoiachin, the royal family, and the officials of state made their surrender. Having taken his hostages in charge, Nebuchadnezzar stripped the royal palace and the temple of their treasures as spoils of war. He had previously taken part of Jerusalem's smaller treasures (2Ch 36:7; Da 1:2). This time, his despoilment was a major one, with only a few smaller gold and silver items left behind (cf. 25:15), along with the larger brass vessels (cf. 25:13–17; Jer 27:18–22). Moreover, he perpetuated the deportation system made famous by the Assyrians, seizing ten thousand of Jerusalem's leaders from every walk of life (including the prophet Ezekiel; cf. Eze 1:2; 33:21). With only the poor and unskilled people of the land remaining, it might be assumed that Jerusalem would cause no further trouble.

4. The reign of Zedekiah (24:17–25:21)

17–20 Nebuchadnezzar left the city standing; installed Josiah's remaining son, Mattaniah (whom he renamed Zedekiah), on the throne; and in due time returned to Babylon. While Jerusalem had been spared momentarily, its demise was certain. Not only was Zedekiah no better than the other descendants of Josiah, but even this latest judgment of God through the Chaldeans had had no effect on an obdurately apostate people. All that God had done both previously and currently to Judah and Jerusalem had been because of his settled wrath against their sin. Yet nothing had helped. Twice wicked Judah fought on against the divine chastisement (cf. Jer 37:1–2). The final blow would not be long in coming.

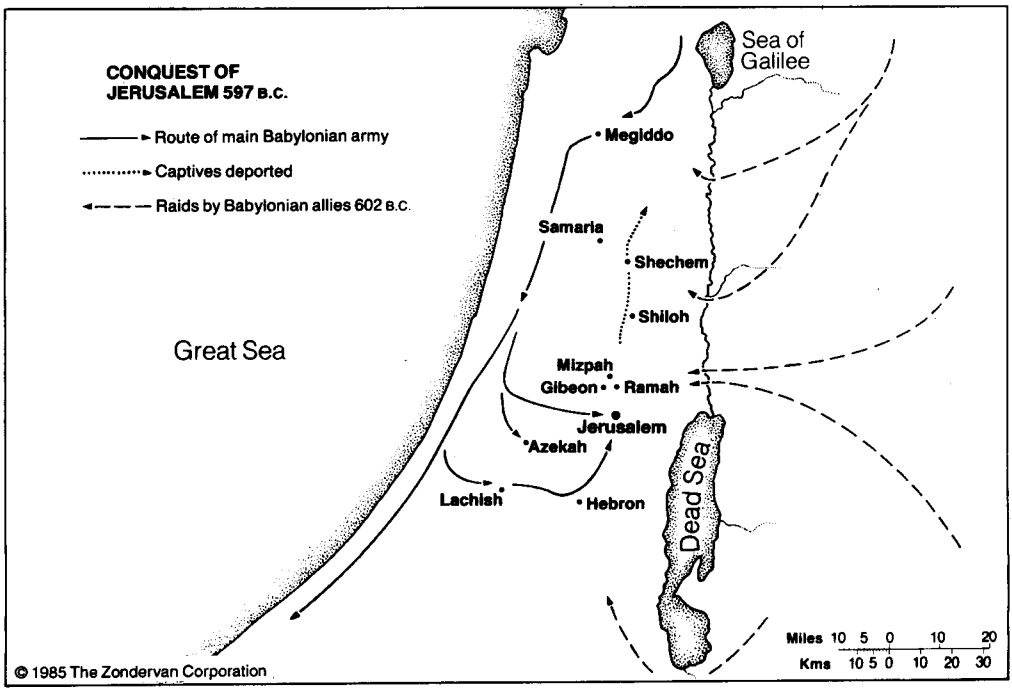
25:1–4 Late in 588 B.C., Zedekiah, like other Judean kings, was lured into the foolish mistake of rebelling against Babylon. There seems little doubt that his decision to do so was related to a renewed confidence in Egypt, on whom Israel and Judah had relied mistakenly so many times before. Zedekiah's confidence was ill-placed, however, for the Egyptian king possessed neither the strength nor the sagacity to merit such trust. The Egyptian king's own life was marked by a series of political and military difficulties that ended in his death.

Nebuchadnezzar immediately responded, this time sending the full weight of his mighty army. After setting up headquarters in Riblah, Jerusalem was placed under total siege (cf. Jer 39:1; 52:4; Eze 24:2). With Jerusalem securely blockaded (cf. Jer 21:3–7), Nebuchadnezzar proceeded to reduce the Judean strongholds systematically (cf. Jer 34:7), thereby cutting off both military relief and economic replenishment. At one point Nebuchadnezzar's forces were forced to withdraw momentarily to deal with an Egyptian relief column under Apries (Jer 37:5), much to the joy of the misguided Jerusalemites, who prematurely assumed that they had been delivered from the siege (Jer 37:6–10). Nonetheless Jerusalem's beleaguered defenders were kept enclosed by the Chaldeans almost continuously until July of 586 B.C. Finally, when strength and provisions were completely exhausted, the Neo-Babylonian troops breached the walls and poured into the city (cf. Jer 39:2–3). The prophesied tragedy had occurred (cf. Jer 19–20; 27–28; 37:8–10, 17; 38:17–23).

5–7 Still further prophetic details were to be realized; for when Zedekiah and the remaining Judean army attempted to gain their freedom by slipping through a secluded gate near the king's garden, they were soon overtaken by their Chaldean pursuers (cf. Jer 32:5; 34:3; Eze 12:12–13 with Jer 39:3–5; 52:7–8). Zedekiah was taken captive to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah. There, being forced to witness the execution of his own children—so that the last thing he would remember seeing was the end result of his foolish disobedience—his eyes were put out. He was then led away in bronze fetters to Babylon, where he remained a prisoner until his death (cf. Jer 52:11).



8–12 About one month later, Nebuzaradan, the commander of Nebuchadnezzar's own imperial guard, arrived in Jerusalem to oversee its despoliation and destruction. Having set fire to all of Jerusalem's permanent buildings, including the temple and palace (cf. Jer 52:13), the Chaldeans demolished the city's walls. Then they deported certain valued elements of the citizenry of Jerusalem and the populace of the surrounding countryside, some of whom apparently willingly defected to the invaders (cf. Jer 39:9; 52:15). Only the poorest of the people were left. These were to work the nearby fields and vineyards so that a stratum of inhabitants unlikely to cause further insurrection might be left to care for the basic needs of the remaining people of the land (cf. Jer 39:10; 52:16).

13–17 Particular notice is given to the temple furniture and furnishings that the Chaldeans carried away as spoils of war. Primary focus is on those heavy bronze items that had to be broken into smaller pieces to be removed: the pillars, the movable stands, and the Sea. Indeed, the bronze gained from those items—together with the bronze bulls under the bronze Sea (cf. Jer 52:20) was incalculable. A comparison of this account with the fuller inventory in Jer 52:17–23 reveals a thorough looting of all the gold, silver, and bronze utensils in the temple

18–21 The disposition of the chief religious, military, and government officials as well as sixty of the notable men is given next. Among these were Seraiah the high priest, Zephaniah the next highest ranking priest, the commander-in-chief of Jerusalem's fighting men, and the secretary for the mobilization of Judah's citizenry. All these prominent officials and people were taken to Riblah and executed. Nebuchadnezzar would brook no further interference with the established order that Nebuzaradan had left behind. With the officialdom and leadership either put to death or taken captive into exile, it could be expected that the remaining populace would passively submit to their Chaldean overlords, especially since many of Judah's formerly landless people were now land holders.

Interestingly, Seraiah's sons were not executed but merely deported. Ezra the scribe was a descendant of Seraiah (Ezr 7:1).

F. Historical Appendixes (25:22–30)

1. Judah in exile (25:22–26)

22–24 The captivity of God's disobedient people, begun in 605 B.C., was completed: Seventy years would go by until the exiled Judeans would again see their homeland (2Ch 36:15–21). To the history of the united and divided kingdoms is appended a note regarding the establishment of the new Judean vassal state. Fuller details are given in Jeremiah, from where these data are perhaps drawn. Of the prominent men of Jerusalem, only Jeremiah and Gedaliah were left behind (cf. Jer 39:11–14). Jeremiah's stand on the Babylonian issue was doubtless well known. Gedaliah's attitude was probably that of Ahikam, his father and a noted official (2Ch 34:20), who had supported Jeremiah (Jer 26:24). Accordingly Gedaliah, who probably had the needed training, seemed the logical choice to be Babylon's governor-designate over the newly formed district.

The choice was a popular one, and at first things went well (cf. Jer 40:1–12). Because of their confidence in Gedaliah, many of the surviving little guerrilla bands made their way back to Jerusalem to lay down their arms and take up residence there, as did many of the Judeans who had fled to the Transjordanian lands (cf. Jer 40:11–12). Even Jeremiah at first went to Mizpah to lend his assistance to Gedaliah (Jer 40:6).

25–26 Trouble soon arose, however, in a conspiracy hatched by Baalis, the Ammonite king (Jer 40:13–15), and a young noble named Ishmael. Ishmael was successful in assassinating Gedaliah together with his invited banquet guests, both Jews and Babylonians (cf. Jer 41:1–3). Although Ishmael was dealt with severely by Johanan ben Kareah, he succeeded in making his escape to Ammon (Jer 41:11–15). Because the refugees feared reprisal for Gedaliah's murder, Johanan led a large contingent of them into Egypt, including Jeremiah, whom the fleeing Jews took along despite his counsels and warnings (Jer 41:16–43:7).

2. The later history of Jehoiachin (25:27–30)

27–30 The account of the fortunes of the Judeans is brought to a close with a postscript concerning the later lot of Jehoiachin, son of Jehoiakim. Since he was seemingly considered by the Judeans as the last legitimate king, news of his later condition would be of great significance. After the death of Nebuchadnezzar in 561 B.C., his son and successor, Evil-Merodach (561–560), released the Judean king from prison and accorded him due royal recognition. This included a place at the king's table and a regular allowance for the rest of his life (cf. Jer 52:31–34).

Thus the final curtain falls on the drama of the divided monarchy. What had been a note of dark despair is illuminated by the light of God's gracious concern for his own. Although God's people had been judged as they must, yet God would be with them even in the midst of their sentence. Jehoiachin's release and renewed enjoyment of life thus stand as a harbinger of the further release and return of all the nation, in accordance with God's promises (cf. Jer 31:18; La 5:21). The spiritually minded believers perhaps would see in this incident an assurance of God's greater redemption from bondage of those who looked forward to him who gives release and eternal refreshment to all who love his appearing.

KINGS OF ISRAEL AND JUDAH

This chart depicts the reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah from Jeroboam of Israel and Rehoboam of Judah until the fall of Jerusalem. As best can be determined, the dates reflect the official reign of each king and not any years of his co-regency with another king. The center column is divided into increments of twenty years; the outside columns give the passages in 1 and 2 Kings and 2 Chronicles where the reign of each king is described. By using this chart, you can see at a glance both the length of each reign and the kings in Israel and Judah who were contemporaries. The final column depicts when the major prophets lived and ministered.

1 Chronicles

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

God used the history of the ancient kingdom of Israel to reveal truths about himself and his relationship to humankind. But while he inspired the OT writers of the books of both Kings and Chronicles to interpret this history, their theological messages are distinct. If 1 and 2 Kings, composed after the final collapse of the kingdom in 586 B.C., concentrates on how sin leads to defeat (2Ki 17:15, 18), then 1 and 2 Chronicles, coming after the two returns from exile in 537 and 458 B.C., recounts, from the same record, how "faith is the victory" (2Ch 20:20, 22). Readers today may therefore find strength from God, knowing that his moral judgments (Kings) are balanced by his providential salvation (revealed in Chronicles).

2. Date and Authorship

While Chronicles contains no direct statement about the circumstances of its own composition, still a fairly clear picture does emerge from the biblical data. The last-recorded event in 2 Chronicles is the decree of Cyrus in 538 B.C., permitting the Jews to return from their exile in Babylon (36:22–23). One genealogy in 1 Chronicles (3:17–21) includes King Jehoiachin's grandson Zerubbabel, who led this return in the following year, and it goes on to name two of Zerubbabel's grandsons—Pelatiah and Jeshaiah—thus extending the time to about 500 B.C. The sons of four other men are then mentioned, but without indication of their place in the genealogy. The last of these is Shecaniah, whose line reaches down to seven great-great-grandchildren (3:24). So if Shecaniah belongs to the same general period as King Jehoiachin (born 616), these four additional generations would again suggest a time around 500 B.C. as the earliest possible date for Chronicles.

Recent discoveries have produced external evidence by which the latest possible date for the books may now be set. The discovery of fragments of an actual manuscript of Chronicles among the Dead Sea Scrolls makes a third-century date difficult to maintain; thus it is imperative to place the Chronicler's activity in the Persian period (c. 538–333 B.C.). More specifically, if we accept the tradition that the OT canon was finalized during the general period of the Persian monarch Artaxerxes I, who died 424 B.C. (cf. Ne 12:22, where the reference to Darius II—who was crowned in 423—is the last historical allusion to appear in the OT), then Chronicles would have to have been written before 420. If its composition, moreover, is associated with the work of Ezra, the Aramaic language found in the book that bears Ezra's name matches that of the Elephantine papyri, which likewise belongs to the fifth century B.C.

Relationships between the books of Chronicles and Ezra provide the most important single clue for fixing the date and also the authorship of the former volume. Since Chronicles appears to be the work of an individual writer, who was a Levitical leader, some identification with Ezra the priest and scribe (Ezr 7:1–6) appears possible from the outset. This conclusion is furthered, moreover, by the personal qualities that the writer displays. The literary styles of the books are similar, and their contents have much in common: the frequent lists and genealogies, their focus on ritual, and their joint devotion to the law of Moses. Most significant of all, the closing verses of 2 Chronicles (36:22–23) are repeated as the opening verses of Ezra (1:1–3a). Jewish tradition affirms that Ezra wrote Chronicles, along with the book that bears his name.

For those, therefore, who accept the historicity of the events recorded in Ezra—from the decree of Cyrus in 538 down to Ezra's reform in 458–457 B.C.—and the validity of Ezra's autobiographical writing within the next few years, the date of composition for both books as one consecutive history must be about 450 B.C., and the place, Jerusalem.

3. Sources

If Ezra the scribe is the man responsible for the present book of Chronicles, his "scribism" may well account for the careful acknowledgment of historical sources that appears through the volume. These fall into the following categories.

a. Genealogies

For the tribe of Simeon, the author of Chronicles explains, "They kept a genealogical record" (1Ch 4:33); and for Gad he identifies his sources even more closely: "These were entered in the genealogical records during the reigns of Jotham [751–736 B.C.] king of Judah and Jeroboam [II, 793–753] king of Israel" (5:17). He refers to similar official genealogical lists for Benjamin (7:9), Asher (7:40), "all Israel" (9:1), the Levitical gatekeepers (9:22), and the family of Rehoboam (2Ch 12:15); and the very nature of his book suggests numerous others that just did not happen to be so mentioned.

b. Documents

Since the Chronicler not only describes how the Assyrian king Sennacherib "wrote letters" against Judah but then goes on to cite excerpts from them (2Ch 32:17–20), these too seem to represent a literary source (cf. an immediately preceding message that is quoted as deriving from this same monarch, vv.10–15). The book also concludes with a proclamation made by the Persian king Cyrus, which he "put in writing" (36:22–23). Another kind of documentary source underlies the detailed descriptions of the Solomonic temple in Jerusalem, because references are made to the plans "of all that the Spirit had put in his [David's] mind" for it (1Ch 28:11–12)—and not just in his mind, but "'All this,' David said, 'I have in writing from the hand of the LORD upon me'" (v.19).

c. Poems

The author alludes to songs of praise in the words of David and Asaph in 2Ch 29:30 (cf. the titles to Pss 50; 73–83), and in 35:25 to laments for Josiah that were chanted by Jeremiah (not to be identified with his later, canonical Lamentations over Jerusalem). Neither is actually quoted, though the allusions suggest the author's use of poetic sources (cf. David's reemployment of Pss 95:1–5; 96; and 106:1, 47–48, which Ezra did quote in 1Ch 16:8–36).

d. Prophecies

Among its sources Chronicles refers to at least eleven different prophetic books: those by the earlier prophets Samuel, Gad (1Ch 29:29), Nathan (1Ch 29:29; 2Ch 9:29), Ahijah (2Ch 9:29), Shemaiah (12:15), and Iddo, including both the "visions of Iddo" (9:29) and his "annotations" (13:22); and those by the later prophets Jehu son of Hanani (20:34), Isaiah, including both his "vision" (the OT book, 32:32) and his last history of Uzziah (26:22), and Hozai (33:19, perhaps meaning simply a book of "the seers"). Second Chronicles alludes (36:22) to the fulfillment of Jer 29:10, and the author seems to quote from Jer 29:13–14 in 2Ch 15:4 (unless both are drawing on Dt 4:29).

e. Other histories

Ezra's major reference work was "the book of the kings of Israel and Judah" (2Ch 27:7; 35:27; 36:8; et al.). He also refers at one point to the "annals of King David" (1Ch 27:24, which may have been part of the same work) and to the "annotations on the book of the kings" (2Ch 24:27). But though much material from the canonical books of 1 and 2 Kings does reappear in Chronicles, these cannot be the source here cited, since passages such as 1Ch 9:1 and 2Ch 27:7 refer to "the book of the kings" for additional data on genealogies and wars, about which nothing further actually occurs in our canonical books. So while Ezra did use this major reference work directly, it must have been some larger court record—authentic but now lost—from which both Kings and Chronicles drew.

All in all, 57.8 percent of the text of Chronicles exhibits verbal parallels with other portions of the OT. These include especially the Pentateuch and Joshua for the genealogies and other such listings, and 2 Samuel and 1 and 2 Kings for the history.

4. Occasion and Purpose

When Ezra returned from Babylon in 458 B.C., his heart was set on enthroning God's law in the postexile community of Judah (Ezr 7:10). He took immediate steps to restore temple worship (7:19–23, 27; 8:33–34) and to eliminate a number of mixed marriages that had arisen between certain Jews and their pagan neighbors (chs 9–10). Based on powers granted him by the Persian king (7:18–25), Ezra seems to have been the one who commenced the refortification of Jerusalem (4:16), though subsequently thwarted by bitter Samaritan opposition (vv.17–23; cf. Ne 1:3–4). Not until 444, when Ezra was joined by Nehemiah, were the walls actually finished (Ne 6:15–16) and the law of Moses formally recognized by the community (ch. 8). Yet if Ezra was the Chronicler, then the appearance of his book about 450 becomes explainable as a concrete literary means to aid in the achievement of his purpose of rebuilding the theocracy (i.e., the acknowledgment of God as their king).

5. Theology

Ezra honors the transcendent majesty of God (1Ch 29:11) and quotes statements from past history describing him as above all gods (2Ch 2:5), dwelling in heaven (6:18; 7:14), and ruling all earth (20:6). The Lord's presence must be mediated, therefore, by his "name" (which carries the force of his person, 12:13), especially in the temple (1Ch 22:7; 29:16), and by his Spirit, especially for communications (1Ch 12:18; 2Ch 15:1; 24:20). Angels occupy a greater place in Chronicles than in the corresponding parts of the other OT histories (1Ch 21:12 or 21:18, 20, 27), as does also the Lord's mediation through Satan (21:1).

Yet God can be immanent as well, intervening into history (1Ch 12:18; cf. 2Ch 20:13) in answer to human prayers and songs (2Ch 14:11; 18:31; 20:9–12). The continuity of his concern is emphasized by the phrase "God of [the] fathers," used in quotations (1Ch 29:20; 2Ch 20:6) and by the Chronicler himself (2Ch 13:18; 15:12); and his covenant love for Israel (6:14) is recognized even by foreigners (2:11; 9:8). The Lord is the God of revelation, who fulfills his predictions (10:15; 36:21) and keeps his promises (1Ch 17:26; 2Ch 1:9; 6:15). Prophets of God who appear in Chronicles (but not in Kings) include Iddo (2Ch 13:22), Azariah son of Oded (15:1, 8), Eliezer (20:37), and Jeremiah (35:25; 36:12, 21–22). Corresponding attention is given to the written Mosaic Law, which must be taught (17:9) and honored (31:4, 21).

6. Theological Themes and Interests

A careful reading of Chronicles shows that the author has certain recurring theological interests that he promotes throughout his work.

a. Promise of God

The Lord takes center stage and leaves no doubt as to who is in charge. Thus, rather than giving political, sociological, military, or economic explanations—or stating immediate causes for events—the author presents God as the Lord of history and the cause of its events.

The prominence of God may be seen in several incidents. God put Saul to death and gave the kingdom to David (1Ch 10:14); God routed the armies of Jeroboam when he attacked Abijah (2Ch 13:13–16); God destroyed the mighty army of Zerah when it battled Asa and his smaller forces (2Ch 14:12–13); the Lord established the kingdom of Jehoshaphat (2Ch 17:5) and defeated a military alliance of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir even before the Hebrew army began to fight (2Ch 20:22–23).

Perhaps the finest example of God's direct, divine intervention in history may be seen in the way he utterly destroyed the mighty army of Sennacherib when that proud Assyrian ruler dared to challenge the power of the Almighty and to compare him to the gods of the other nations (2Ch 32:16–22).

b. Retribution

The idea of sowing and reaping is hardly new to Chronicles, but it is modified in at least two ways. (1) The burden of obedience lies primarily on the shoulder of the king of the nation. (2) The principle does not work automatically or mechanically. The sovereign ruler is often warned by a prophetic word; hence the ruler can repent and avert a calamity or military defeat (cf. 2Ch 7:14).

c. Vocabulary

The author's third theological interest is his constant use of standard vocabulary and expressions like "seeking God," "pure heart," "faithfulness," and "forsaking the LORD." Because seeking God and being faithful to him bring about his blessings, it is not surprising to find many exhortations and injunctions to do so.

d. Things used in worship

A fourth interest is the ark, the temple, and the priesthood. Two chapters cover the transporting of the ark to Jerusalem; eight chapters deal with the preparation for building the temple. Three chapters describe the actual construction of the temple, and three more cover its dedication. Furthermore, three chapters cover Josiah's reforms, with special emphasis on the restoration of the central sanctuary and its functions.

e. Worship

A fifth interest is closely related to Israel's worship at the temple. The Chronicler is concerned about the nature of true worship as opposed to correct ceremony. This concern for the right attitude of the heart may be traced in two ways. First, the word "heart" (GK 4222) is used some thirty times in Chronicles. Thus the activity of seeking God should be accompanied with the right inner attitude. A second way of tracing the Chronicler's concern for true worship may be seen from his treatment of Hezekiah's reform. Hezekiah is portrayed as one of the godliest Judean kings.

f. Kingdom

A sixth interest is the kingship in Israel. The kingdom of God and the kingdom of Judah are often treated as if they are one and the same entity (cf. 1Ch 28:5; 29:23). The kingdom is important as the guardian of the temple. After the division of Solomon's kingdom, the Judean kings regularly expressed their commitment to God in terms of religious reforms (cf. reigns of Hezekiah and Josiah). True worship in Israel was not preserved by godly priesthood but by godly kingship.

g. History

A seventh interest is seen from the way the Chronicler records historical events. For example, it is not enough for him to describe the building of the temple; he must go beyond that and point out the striking resemblance of this event to the construction of the tabernacle in the desert.

h. Omissions

A final interest of Chronicles is in the material that he chose to omit from his discussion of Israel's history. From the reign of David, he deleted three main blocks of material. He left out the events found at 1Sa 15–31. Also deleted is the material found in 2Sa 1–4. The third block of omitted material involves David's sin with Bathsheba and the problems that followed it (2Sa 11–1Ki 2, with the exception of the census).

Concerning the reign of Solomon, Chronicles omitted the struggle between Solomon and Adonijah for the throne, the steps Solomon took to solidify his position, and the material dealing with Solomon's many foreign wives, with the resultant spread of idolatry and God's punishment of the king for this sin (1Ki 11).

After the division of Solomon's kingdom, the Chronicler did not deal with the northern kingdom on its own terms and for its own intrinsic interest. Instead he dealt with it only as it came into contact with the kingdom of Judah.

The Chronicler recorded a history of Israel in which he chose both to emphasize certain points and to delete some material. This was no plot or attempt to suppress the truth. In developing his theological commentary on the events of the past, he left out certain elements that did not contribute to the point he was emphasizing. Those who want another perspective on history can read the former prophets or recite the facts that were well known to Israel.

EXPOSITION

I. Genealogies (1:1–9:44)

A. Patriarchs (1:1–54)

Chronicles begins with nine chapters of genealogies. Their purpose was to show the place that the 450 B.C. postexilic community of Judah occupied within total history. They serve two practical functions. (1) For the immediate situation, genealogies were important in providing the framework within which true Hebrews could establish their genealogical roots and by which religious purity could be maintained against outside groups and influences.

(2) For the church's overall perspective, the genealogies reflect the providential design that marks the sweep of history from Eden onward. Particular names serve as reminders of God's dealings in the past; and the genealogies' focus on David and his dynasty embodies the OT hope for the future Messiah, with the meaningfulness that this provided for Ezra's generation.

1–4 Ezra's survey commences with Adam, not just Abraham, the father of the Hebrews. This points to the unity of the race (Ac 17:26) and to the universality of God's redemptive program within history (Ge 3:15). Verses 1–4 are compiled from Ge 5. Seth's brothers, Abel and Cain, with the latter's line (Ge 4:17–25), are omitted as irrelevant.

5–7 Verses 5–23 are drawn from the "table of nations" in Ge 10:2–29. The seven sons of Japheth founded the people of Europe and northern Asia (e.g., from Javan comes Greek Ionia; from Gomer, the ancient Cimmerians of the Russian plains; and from Madai, the Medes and Persians of Iran. Tubal and Meshech were ancestors of the eighth-century Tabali and Mushki, who inhabited the Turkish plateau, according to contemporary Assyrian inscriptions). Areas proposed for the first two Greek subgroups in v.7 include Elishah (in south Greece) and Sardinia; the latter two—"Kittim and Rodanim"—denote the islands of Cyprus and Rhodes.

8 The four sons of Ham founded ethnic groups in Africa and southwestern Asia (e.g., Put in Libya on the Mediterranean coast of Africa west of Egypt; and Cush, or "Ethiopia").

9–11 Yet the five listed sons of Cush founded tribes that extended eastward from the coast of the Red Sea, across southern Arabia, to the Kassites in the Tigris-Euphrates Valley. The second river of Eden can thus be said to border Cush (Ge 2:13), and Babylon and Assyria pertain to the Cushite leader Nimrod (10:8–11).

12–16 The Hamitic Philistines were "sea peoples" before settling in Palestine, coming from the Casluhim, who were of Egyptian origin but are related to the Minoan culture of Caphtor (Crete) and the southern coast of Asia Minor (Am 9:7).

17 The five sons of Shem produced the peoples who remained closest to humankind's original home in west-central Asia. Yet they ranged from Elam, north of the Persian Gulf, to Aram in Syria and Lud (Lydia) in central Turkey.

18 The name Eber forms the root of "Hebrew"; but this patriarch was ancestor not only of Abraham (v.27), but also of a number of other unsettled people, known in ancient history as Habiru or Apiru.

19–23 The only "dividing up" of the earth to which Genesis makes reference in its post-diluvian context is that which occurred at the confusion of languages at Babel (Ge 11:1–9). The name Peleg seems to have been derived from this event (see NIV note).

24–27 The list of names from Shem to Abram sums up the table of Ge 11:10–26. Both men constitute significant reminders of God's special relations with his people: the first, as the initial example of the Lord's association with a particular part of humanity, i.e., the Semites (Ge 9:26), and Abraham as a climactic witness to divine election (12:2; 17:7). The latter's change of name is explained in Ge 17:5.

28–34 The information on the families of Abraham and Isaac is identical with that found in Ge 25:1–4, 9, 13–16. Abraham's nomadic Arabian descendants through his two subordinate wives, Hagar and Keturah, are given first, before the biblical record focuses on Sarah's son, Isaac, who was the child of promise. Arabs became increasingly influential in Judah (cf. Ne 4:7–6:1) after occupying Ezion Geber at the northeast end of the Red Sea in 500 B.C.

35 The remainder of ch. 1 summarizes the "table of Edom" in Ge 36:4–5, 11–13, 20–28, 31–43—with few scribal corruptions in spelling. The subject of the rest of 1 and 2 Chronicles is Jacob (Israel) and the Twelve Tribes that descended from him; but before the record focuses on this younger of Isaac's twin sons, it lists the elder brother, Esau, and the Edomite tribes that he founded. They were Israel's closest "brothers" (Ob 10, 12) and near neighbors, after Arab pressure forced them into southern Judah fifty years prior to Ezra.

36–37 Timna, a daughter of Seir (v.39), became a subordinate wife of Esau's son Eliphaz (Ge 36:12) and was later honored by having her name bestowed on an Edomite chieftain and his district (36:40; cf. 1Ch 1:51).

38–41 Seir belonged to a group called "Horites" (Ge 36:20), the ancient Hurrians, a major people of Mesopotamia. Some had settled in Edom (= Seir) before the coming of Esau (Dt 2:12, 22).

42 Uz was the name of the home of the patriarch Job (Job 1:1), who may thus have been an early Edomite descendant of Esau (cf. La 4:21). Similarly, Esau's son Eliphaz, the father of Teman (v.36), seems to have been in the ancestry of Job's friend Eliphaz the Temanite (Job 2:11).

43–54 The death of King Hadad (v.51) is not mentioned in Ezra's biblical source (Ge 36:39), perhaps because Hadad II was still living when Moses wrote this part of the Pentateuch, a thousand years before the writing of Chronicles.

B. Judah (2:1–4:23)

1. The clan of Hezron (2:1–55)

Chapter 2 resumes the specific development of the nation of Israel. It continues from 1:34, where the two sons of Isaac had been introduced. Since the line of the elder, Esau, was summarized in 1:35–54, Ezra can now concentrate on the younger of the twins, Israel. But while our Chronicler lists all twelve of the sons of Israel-Jacob, his attention quickly focuses on Judah (v.3), the description of whose tribe occupies the next two and one-half chapters. Indeed, after a supplement on those portions of the tribe of Simeon that remained as neighbors to southern Judah (4:24–43), the genealogies of Chronicles devote themselves principally to Benjamin (chs. 8–9) and the priestly tribe of Levi (ch. 6). Only chs. 5 and 7 are left, for outlines, respectively, on the tribes of Transjordan and north Israel. The land that was occupied by the Jews who returned from the Babylonian exile consisted primarily of the tribal territories of Judah and Benjamin. Also, the people who made up Ezra's community were largely from these same two tribes (Ezr 1:5; 10:9), which had composed the former southern kingdom. In his effort to maintain national purity, it was therefore natural that the Chronicler should concentrate on these particular genealogies. Judah was especially prominent (Ezr 4:4, 6): from it the very name "Jew" is derived.

Among the ten-listed grandsons of Judah (1Ch 2:5–6; 4:21–22), the primary interest of this chapter (from 2:9 onward) rests on Hezron, the elder son of Perez, from whom were descended some of the leading elements of Judah's later population. Hezron's third son, Caleb, in his turn received major attention in two sections (vv.18–20 and 42–55; cf. 4:1–4), though Hezron's second son, Ram, is presented first, because he embodies the messianic hope of Israel: from him comes the family of David (2:10–17).

1 Verses 1–2 are drawn from Ge 35:22–26 and Ex 1:1–5. All the passages list in first place Jacob's six sons by his wife Leah (from Reuben through Zebulun), in the order of their birth; and the Pentateuchal sources place the four sons of the handmaids (Dan through Asher, in their order of birth) after Jacob's younger son by his wife Rachel, namely, Benjamin.

2 Chronicles, however, follows Genesis in placing Joseph before Benjamin; and before them both it puts Dan, following Zebulun, perhaps because these last two receive no further treatment in Chronicles.

3–4 These verses reflect the sordid dealings that Judah, his sons, and his Canaanite daughter-in-law Tamar had with each other (Ge 38; esp. vv.2–7, 29–30; cf. 46:12). Yet God in his grace used Tamar to be an ancestor of David and of Jesus Christ (Mt 1:3)!

5 Since Judah's first two sons died without issue, and since his third son is taken up in ch. 4 (vv.21–23), the present section focuses on the remaining two, as listed in Ge 46:12 and Nu 26:21.

6 Except for Zimri, these Zerahites can be identified from 1Ki 4:31 as later descendants, not immediate "sons," of Zerah. Ezra singled them out as examples of God-given wisdom (cf. v.20) during the Solomonic period. Heman and Ethan, moreover, became authors of inspired psalmody (Pss 88–89), with which Ezra's concern for proper worship caused him to be involved. These authors must not, however, be confused with David's musicians, Heman, Asaph, and Ethan (1Ch 15:19), who were from the tribe of Levi, not Judah (cf. 6:33–44).

7 Carmi is another Zerahite, identifiable from Jos 7:1 as an immediate son of Zimri. While the latter has been equated with Zerah's son Zimri, he really appears (in Jos 7:17–18) to belong to the time of his direct grandson Achan. The last named is here called Achar ("disaster") because he was a "bringer of disaster" on Israel. The name reminds us of his sin under Joshua at Jericho and how God's judgment may bring consequent disaster on his people (Jos 7:25; cf. 6:18 and the naming of the place as Achor in 7:26).

8–10 Verses 9–12 are drawn from Ru 4:19–22. This passage furnishes the chief links in the ancestry of David, but it is by no means complete: three centuries elapse between Ram son of Hezron and Nahshon son of Amminadab, whose leadership "of the people of Judah" dates to the days of Moses in the desert (Ex 6:23; Nu 1:7; 2:3) and whose son Salmon married Rahab the prostitute after the fall of Jericho (Mt 1:5).

11–12 Another three centuries elapse before we reach Boaz the husband of Ruth, who were the grandparents of Jesse the father of David.

13–15 These verses supplement 1Sa 16:6–9 on Jesse's family. Following his sixth son, Ozem, this source mentions another brother (1Sa 16:10; 17:12) before David, but he is not named; he may have died soon after these events.

16–17 The genealogies of these four warriors, made famous under their half-uncle David (cf. 2Sa 2:18–19; 19:13), are drawn from 2Sa 2:18 and 17:25; but apart from this latter passage, we would not have known that their mothers, Zeruiah and Abigail, were stepdaughters of Jesse, born to David's mother by her presumed earlier marriage to Nahash.

18–19 The remainder of ch. 2 (vv.28–55) tabulates the descendants of the other sons of Hezron, through lists that have not been preserved elsewhere in Scripture. Some of the names that follow designate whole communities that sprang from his line; e.g., Tekoa (v.24), Beth Zur (v.45), Kiriath Jearim, Bethlehem, or Beth Gader (vv.50–54). Hezron's son Caleb is not to be confused with Moses' spy of the same name (1:15), who appeared three hundred years later.

20 Bezalel is recalled as the Calebite whose craftsmanship, given by the Spirit of God, equipped him to superintend construction for the Mosaic tabernacle (Ex 31:2–5; cf. 2Ch 1:5). An interval of centuries seems again to separate his father, Uri, from their ancestors, Caleb's son Hur. The last named should thus be distinguished from their contemporary, the leader Hur, who joined Aaron in upholding the hands of Moses (Ex 17:10, 12; cf. 24:14).

21–22 The Transjordanian conquests of Jair, a later descendant of Hezron's son Segub, also occurred under Moses. These are documented in Nu 32:41 and Dt 3:14, where Jair is called a son of Manasseh, through Segub's mother, the daughter of Makir (vv.21, 23), rather than through his father, Hezron.

23–24 The total of sixty towns includes Jair's twenty-three plus a remaining thirty-seven at Kenath (Nu 32:42); they may also be combined under Jair's name (Dt 3:4, 14; Jos 13:30). Their loss to the Arameans may have occurred in the early ninth century, since by King Ahab's day (853 B.C.) Ramoth Gilead lay on the frontier (1Ki 22:3).

25–40 The descendants of Jerahmeel (vv.25–41) came to occupy a broad area in the Negev of southern Judah. Some critics dismiss the Jerahmeelites as aliens; but while they can be mentioned with the Kenites (1Sa 30:29), who had a truly foreign origin, and can even be described in parallel with Judah (1Sa 27:10), Jerahmeel himself is stated to be the firstborn son of Hezron, into whose clan foreign elements may subsequently have come to be incorporated. Sheshan's daughter who married Jarha (v.35) is probably the Ahlai mentioned in v.31.

41 The Elishama here named represents the twenty-third generation after Judah. With a lapse of some eight hundred years, this would bring us to about 1100 B.C., or to the generation of Jesse the father of David. Proposed identifications of Elishama with the priest of that name (2Ch 17:8), in about 850 B.C., are thus unlikely chronologically and impossible because of the latter's tribe (Levi, not Judah).

42–46 The closing verses of the chapter revert to the family of Caleb. The line of descent shows that individuals are intended, though their associated groups did occupy such centers in Judah as Hebron, Mareshah, and Ziph.

47 The relationship of the six sons of Jahdai to Caleb is not given.

48–49 Caleb's "daughter" Acsah was only a distant descendant of Caleb the son of Hezron, though she was an immediate daughter of Caleb the son of Jephunneh, the faithful spy (listed in 4:15). She is remembered as the bride of Othniel, the first of the judges (Jdg 3:9–11), having been promised to him for his conquest of Debir (Jos 15:15–19; Jdg 1:11–15).

50–53 Ephrathah (v.50) is a variant form for the name of Caleb's wife Ephrath (v.19).

54–55 The Kenites were originally a foreign people (Ge 15:19), some of whom, by marriage or by adoption, became incorporated into the tribe of Judah (cf. the instance of the family of Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses, Nu 10:29–32; Jdg 1:16, 4:11). There is always room among the people of God for those who come to him by faith (Ex 12:38, 48; Eph 2:19).The clan of Recab later included the reformer Jehonadab (2Ki 10:15, 23), who preserved the purity of his descendants by retaining their primitive forms of nomadic life (Jer 35:6–10).

2. The family of David (3:1–24)

This chapter chronologically follows ch. 2, which had traced several of the branches of the tribe of Judah down to the time of Israel's united kingdom. At this point, however, the record restricts itself to the royal line of David (2:15) and carries it through five centuries, to about 500 B.C. The prophecy of Jer 22:30 in 597 had made it clear that no purely human descendant of his line could ever legitimately again occupy the throne; and when the Persians authorized the restoration of the Jewish community from Babylon in 538, they permitted no kingship.

Yet the Davidic family maintained its importance. It was represented in the return to Palestine, it supplied civic leaders for Judah (including her first two governors, down through 515 [Ezr 5:2, 15]), and Zechariah prophesied that it would continue to do so (Zec 12:7–10). This house held the ultimate hope of Israel. The Messiah would someday arise from it, that Son of David whom post-exilic prophecy identified as more than human. He would be God's "fellow" (Zec 13:7, KJV), pierced as a man but acknowledged as deity (12:10). He would bring redemption from sin (13:1) and God's kingdom on earth (14:9).

1–9 This listing of David's children repeats and supplements 2Sa 3:2–5; 5:13–16; and 13:1. Daniel, his son by Abigail, is named, alternatively, Kileab in 2Sa 3:3.

The list of younger sons (vv.5–8) is repeated in 14:3–7. Solomon was chosen to succeed David (22:9) rather than one of his older brothers, at least three of whom were murdered in inner-family struggles. The third son listed in v.6 (omitted in 2 Samuel) is Elpelet (cf. 14:5); his early death may account for David's choice of a longer form of this same name for his younger brother, Eliphelet (v.8). The next to last son (v.8) was originally named Beeliada (14:7), meaning "The (divine) Master knows." But this was changed (both here and in 2Sa 5:16) to Eliada ("God knows"), to avoid the idolatrous implications of Baal. In 2Sa 13 is a report of the scandal of Tamar's rape by her half-brother Amnon and the vengeance by her brother Absalom.

10–16 The remainder of the chapter lists the Davidic line of succession, first to the throne (vv.10–16, following the order that is in 1 and 2 Kings), and then, during the Exile and beyond, to such nonkingly leadership as they may have enjoyed (vv.17–24, which are new).

Azariah (v.12), as used here (and in 2 Kings), represents the throne name of Uzziah, as is used elsewhere in Chronicles (cf. Isa 6:1). Similar is the name Shallum (v.15; cf. Jer 22:11) for Jehoahaz (2Ch 36:1–4; 2Ki 23:31–34). Though younger than Jehoiakim, he was preferred to him for the throne, following Josiah's death in 609 B.C; and though older in fact than Zedekiah (2Ch 36:2, 11), he is here listed after him, probably because his reign was so much shorter. Josiah's firstborn son, Johanan, is not mentioned elsewhere and may have died young.

The name Jeconiah (v.16; shortened to Coniah in Jer 22:24, 28; 37:1; see NIV note) means "Establishes (does) the LORD"; it usually has its elements transposed into Jehoiachin (2Ch 36:9–10; 2Ki 24:8–17), which means "The LORD establishes."

17 Shealtiel was the physical son of Neri (Lk 3:27) but must have become the legal (adopted) son of Jeconiah soon after the latter's captivity in March 597 B.C., since five out of the seven sons are mentioned on a Babylonian ration receipt dated to 592.

18 Shenazzar has been equated with Sheshbazzar ("prince of Judah," at the return in 538–537, Ezr 1:8); both seem to be shortened forms of the Akkadian Sin-aba-usur.

19–20 Shenazzar was succeeded as the first Persian governor of Judah (Ezr 5:4, 16) by his nephew Zerubbabel (2:2), physically the son of his next older brother Pedaiah, but reckoned as the legal son of the oldest brother, Shealtiel (Ezr 3:2, 8; Hag 1:1, 12; Mt 1:12; Lk 3:27). Shealtiel may have died without having children, so that his brother would have raised up seed to his name according to the custom of the levirate (Dt 25:5–10). The authenticity of many of the names that follow is confirmed by archaeological evidence from sixth and fifth centuries seals and letters.

21 The Hebrew text does not have "and" to introduce "the sons of Rephaiah, of Arnan. . ." These are not stated to be further grandsons of Zerubbabel but are presumably contemporaries of Jeconiah the captive whose relationship to him has not been preserved.

22–24 Since only five names now appear in the list of Shemaiah's six sons (v.22), one must have fallen out.

3. Other clans of Judah (4:1–23)

None of the genealogies of Judah recorded here appears elsewhere in Scripture. Verses 1–8 supplement ch. 2 on the clan of Hezron, a son of Judah's fourth son Perez. In particular they concern four sons of Hur (cf. v.4), who were grandsons of Hezron's third son Caleb, and eight branches of his fifth son Ashhur. Verses 9–20 describe the situations of eight leaders in Judah: Jabez, Kelub, Kenaz, Jehallelel, Ezrah, Hodiah, Shimon, and Ishi. However, while they too might be classified under Hezron, their exact relationship to him remains unknown, either because of gaps in Ezra's own sources or because of a lack of care in subsequent scribal transmission. Verses 21–23 outline the clan of Judah's third son Shelah (cf. 2:3).

1 Author Ezra expected his readers to recognize (from 2:5, 18, 50) that the five descendants of Judah, from Perez to Shobal, were not brothers but successive generations. "Carmi" must therefore be a scribal error (caused by 2:7?) for Caleb (Kelubai; cf. NIV note on 2:9).

2 These data supplement 2:52 on Hur's first son Shobal, where Haroeh had appeared as a variant for Reaiah.

3–5 Similarly v.3 on Hur's fourth son and v.4 on his fifth and sixth sons supplement 2:19; and vv.5–8, on the family of his uncle Ashhur, supplement 2:24.

6–8 "Haahashtari" is not a proper noun but is adjectival and designates "one descended from A(ha)shtar."

9–10 Jabez's prayer of faith became an occasion of grace, so that God kept and blessed him, rather than causing him "pain" ("Jabez" means "he causes pain").

11–12 Ir Nahash (v.12; cf. NIV note, "city of copper," or "coppersmith") is Khirbet Nahas, on the west side of the Arabah, south of the Dead Sea.

13–14 Though originally a foreign Kenizzite (whether of Canaan, Ge 15:19, or of Edom, 36:42), Othniel was adopted into Israel's tribe of Judah and became the first of the judges (see 2:49, 55). He who is adopted into the people of God can even become a leader.

15 Caleb was Othniel's brother; but he was sufficiently older (Jdg 1:13; 3:9), having belonged to the previous desert generation, among whom he was honored as one of the two faithful spies (Nu 13–14).

16 The settlement of Jehallelel's descendants, with those of Calebite Mesha, at Ziph (cf. 2:18, 42) in the southeastern part of Judah (Jos 15:24), confirms the preexilic authenticity of Ezra's source, since in his own day Judah's southern border failed to reach even to Hebron.

17–20 The wife of Mered intended in v.17 is Bithiah (v.18). Her identification as a daughter of Pharaoh would locate this event during the early part of Israel's sojourn in Egypt (before 1800 B.C.), the union probably being made possible because of Joseph's prominence.

21–23 Mareshah, in southwest Judah, experienced dual settlement (cf. v.16), both from these descendants of Judah's third son, Shelah, and from his fourth, Perez (2:4).

Over long periods Israel's genealogical clans could be associated with particular places, be organized into particular guilds—whether of linen workers (here), of potters (v.23), or of scribes (2:55)—or be maintained by particular royal patronage (4:23), a situation that has been confirmed archaeologically by means of distinctive pottery marks.

C. Simeon (4:24–43)

Because of their massacre of Shechem (Ge 34:24–30), the patriarchs Simeon and Levi were condemned to have their tribes scattered among Israel (49:5–7). The subsequent faithfulness of the Levites (Ex 32:27–29) converted their situation into one of blessing and of priestly leadership (Dt 33:8–11). But the Simeonites remained accursed (omitted altogether in the tribal blessings of Dt 33). Simeon was granted lands in Palestine only within the arid southwestern portions of Judah (Jos 19:1–9; cf. 15:26, 28–32, where these appear among territories that Joshua had previously assigned to Simeon's more favored neighbor); and it campaigned cooperatively with Judah in their conquest (Jdg 1:3).

Chronicles records first the primary genealogy of Simeon (4:24–27), then its list of towns (vv.28–33), and finally a summary of two of its later migrations (vv.34–41, 42–43). For after the division of Solomon's kingdom in 930 B.C., elements of Simeon either moved to the north or at least adopted its religious practices (cf. the inclusion of Beersheba along with the shrines of Ephraim that are condemned in Am 5:5), so that they are counted among the northern tribes (2Ch 15:9; 34:6). Other Simeonites carried on in a semi-nomadic life in isolated areas that they could occupy, such as those noted at the close of this chapter (v.41 dates to Hezekiah, 726–697 B.C.).

24 This list of Simeon's sons comes from Nu 26:12–13, which reflects Ge 46:10 and Ex 6:15, though with variations in spelling and with the omission of a third son, Ohad. The next son's name, Jarib, has been corrected by the Syriac to read Jachin, as in the other lists.

25–37 These verses constitute a supplement preserved only in Chronicles. Mibsam and his son Mishma should not be confused with Ishmaelites of the same names (1:29–30).

Beth Biri (v.31) is the Chronicler's postexilic designation for Beth Lebaoth (Jos 19:6), and for Shaaraim we should read (with Jos 19:6) Sharuhen, a historically significant city located in this area.

38–40 The name Gedor has been emended, with the LXX, into Gerar, a city south of Gaza toward Philistia in the west (cf. 2Ch 14:13–14). Yet the presence of Meunites (see below on v.41) and the direction of Simeon's other recorded attack, toward Seir (vv.42–43), suggest a Gedor "overlooking the Dead Sea" to the east.

In v.40 the Canaanites, as a branch of the Hamites (1:8), seem to be intended here.

41–43 The Meunites constitute an Edomite tribe; see 2Ch 20:1 (cf. 26:7). The phrase "remaining Amalekites" (v.43) implies some previous avenging work, i.e., of Saul (1Sa 14:48; 15:7) and of David (1Sa 30:17; 2Sa 8:12), against these ancient enemies of God's people (cf. Ex 17:8–13; Dt 25:17–19). Yet the tribe of Simeon was motivated as well by economic factors of overpopulation (v.38) and shortage of pasture (vv.39, 41).

D. Transjordan Tribes (5:1–26)

Though the OT's postexilic restoration centered in Judah, the population included elements from all twelve tribes, whose identity the Chronicler was anxious to perpetuate (cf. Ezr 6:17; 8:35). Chapter 5 concerns those once settled east of the Jordan rift. Even prior to Joshua's conquest of Canaan in the west, Moses' people had suffered a series of unprovoked attacks from the kings in Transjordan (Nu 21:21–23, 33). But all this had been of God (Dt 2:30) and resulted in the Israelites' acquisition of the whole territory from the Arnon (midway on the east shore of the Dead Sea) northward, and on through Gilead and Bashan. Moses then granted these areas (Nu 32:33–42), respectively, and at their own request, to Reuben (the subject of 1Ch 5:1–10), Gad (vv.11–17), and half of the tribe of Manasseh (vv.23–24; cf. 7:14–19, on their western half).

The remaining verses of ch. 5 describe an early, joint military campaign (vv.18–22, elaborating v.10)—in which God rewarded their faith and their prayers with a great victory over the Ishmaelites—and their later deportation to Assyria (vv.25–26), as the result of collective apostasy.

1 Reuben's crime of incest with his father's subordinate wife Bilhah (Ge 35:22) cost him his rights of the firstborn (49:4), which involved a double portion of inheritance (Dt 21:17). This was transferred to Joseph, first son of Rachel, the wife whom Jacob-Israel loved (Ge 49:25–26; cf. 48:20–22, on Joseph's double-tribed status, through his sons Ephraim and Manasseh). Joseph's leadership was first exercised personally (Ge 50:21), then later through Joshua (an Ephraimite), and thus for three more centuries (cf. Jdg 8:1–2; 12:1–6).

2 Yet Judah eventually became strongest: Jacob's prophecy of this tribe's preeminence over the other (Ge 49:8), and even of a scepter (v.10), was fulfilled in David's kingship (2Sa 5:1–3; cf. 7:8), which entailed the effective rejection of Joseph (Ps 78:67–70), and was rendered eternal through David's Greater Son, who was also God's Son (2Sa 7:14), Jesus the Messiah (Mt 1:1).

3 Reuben's four sons are listed just as in the Pentateuch (Ge 46:9; Ex 6:14; Nu 26:5–6), but Ezra's data in the rest of the chapter are unique to Chronicles.

4–5 The text does not say from which of Reuben's sons Joel was descended.

6 The Assyrians exiled the Israelite border tribes in 733 B.C. (vv.22, 26; 2Ki 15:29).

7–9 The settlement in the areas mentioned here (named also in Nu 32:38) preceded 850 B.C., since they are claimed as Moabite in Mesha's inscription, as well as subsequently (Jer 48:1, 22; Eze 25:9).

10 Saul himself fought in Transjordan (1Sa 11:1–11), but with the Ammonites instead of the Hagrites, and at Jabesh Gilead, not far east of the river.

11 The plains of Bashan, extending from the gorge of the Yarmuk and thence north and east of Galilee, pertained to Manasseh (v.23). By wide scattering Gad's outposts reached them; but its major settlements lay in Gilead, south of the Yarmuk (cf. v.16).

12–15 The Gadite Buz is not otherwise known and is not to be confused with Abraham's nephew, Buz, the son of Nahor (Ge 22:21).

16 Sharon refers here, not to the coastal plain north of Philistia (Jos 12:18), but to broad pasturelands somewhere in Transjordan.

17 The reigns of Jotham and Jeroboam II extended from 793 to 731 (to 753, for the latter, in Israel; and 750–731, for Jotham, in Judah).

18–19 Hagar was the mother of Ishmael, whose twelve sons, in turn, included Jetur (NT "Iturea," Lk 3:1) and Naphish (Ge 25:12, 15; cf. the presence of such Arab tribes with Moab in Ps 83:6). Though "the battle was God's" (v.22), his people still had to initiate it!

20–22 God's divine presence did not mean that his people would not have to cry out in the battle; but when they did, he vindicated the prayers of those who trusted in him. The great numbers taken, including one hundred thousand people, shows this to have been no mere raid but a total, permanent occupation.

23 Senir was the Amorite name for Mount Hermon (Dt 3:9).

24–26 Since Pul was the private name of Tiglath-pileser III prior to his accession in 745 B.C., the NIV has properly translated: "God stirred up the spirit of Pul . . . that is, Tiglath-Pileser." The Lord used even Assyrians to accomplish his purposes (Isa 10:5–6).

E. Levi (6:1–81)

The tribe of Levi became Israel's hereditary religious leaders (see comments on 4:24–43). Ezra took special pains to ensure their presence within the second return, which he led back in 458 B.C. (Ezr 8:15–20); and from the very start, postexilic Judah depended on their proper service (1:5; 3:8; 6:18–20). Levi included the priesthood, so that Ezra himself was careful to present his Levitical credentials (7:1–5), going back to Aaron, Israel's initial high priest. Authentic genealogy, indeed, was essential for investiture (cf. 2:59–63)—hence the practical relevance of this chapter to the Chronicler's own day.

Yet a deeper and more abiding significance lies in the nature of Israel's priesthood as types. Their service in the sanctuary reflected a heavenly pattern (Ex 25:9, 40; Heb 8:2, 5); and the atoning acts performed by Aaron's descendants were but foreshadows of that ultimate sacrifice, accomplished by Jesus Christ, our Great High Priest, by the offering up of himself once and for all (Heb 9:14, 24–25). Chapter 6 commences with Pentateuchal citations and concludes with territorial lists taken from Joshua, but it consists primarily of materials not found outside Chronicles.

1–2 Levi's sons always appear in this order based on age (Ge 46:11; Ex 6:16; Nu 3:17; 26:57). Kohath is singled out (Ex 6:18; Nu 3:19) as the ancestor of the priestly group.

3 This Amram is a family ancestor, separated by some 250 years and nine generations from the father of Moses and Aaron (cf. Ex 6:20; Nu 26:59) and from about five thousand Amramites living in their day (cf. Nu 26:62). Of the sons of Aaron (derived from Ex 6:23; Lev 10:1; Nu 3:2; 26:60), the first two died for their sacrilege (Lev 10:2; Nu 26:61); and the succeeding line of priests is here traced only through Eleazar (cf. Ex 6:25; Nu 25:7).

4–7 Some links have been omitted from the priestly genealogy: the twenty-one generations after Eleazar, down through Jehozadak at the Exile (v.15), span more than eight hundred years; and forty years per generation seems overly high. The list includes no descendants of Eleazar's younger brother, Ithamar, who held office during the last of the judges and the early kingdom—e.g., Eli, Phinehas III, Ahitub, Ahimelech I (= Ahijah?), Abiathar, and Ahimelech II (1Sa 14:3; 22:20; 2Sa 8:17). Other preexilic high priests are not listed either.

8 Serving under David in 1000 B.C. was Zadok (2Sa 8:17; 15:24), son of Ahitub II (not to be confused with Ahitub I, noted above as the grandfather of David's other priest, Abiathar, who was of the Ithamar branch). Some critics reject Zadok's Hebrew genealogy and label him a Jebusite, perhaps to be associated with Melchizedek (see Ge 14:18).

9 Zadok's grandson Azariah I became high priest under Solomon, 970 B.C. (1Ki 4:2).

10 Azariah II, "who served as priest in the temple Solomon built," would thus belong later and, allowing for gaps to include the long-lived Jehoiada (2Ch 24:15), could be the high priest who resisted Uzziah's trespass against the temple and its priesthood in 751 (26:17).

11–15 Hilkiah (v.13) discovered the Book of the Law of the Lord given through Moses (2Ch 34:14), the event that led to Josiah's reformation of 622. Seraiah (v.14) suffered martyrdom to the Babylonians in 586 (2Ki 25:18); but his son Jehozadak was father of Jeshua (or Joshua), Judah's famous high priest of the return from captivity fifty years later (Ezr 3:2; 5:2; 10:18; Hag 1:1; Zec 3:1; 6:11).

16–30 The divisions of the three Levitical clans are those found in Ex 6:17–19 and Nu 3:18–20 (cf. Nu 26:58). Since Korah (v.22) is known to have come from the clan-patriarch Kohath through the branch of Izhar (vv.37–38), Amminadab could possibly be an alternative name for it. Korah was the leader who rebelled against Moses and whom the earth swallowed (Nu 16:32). Assir, Elkanah I, and Ebiasaph were then his sons (Ex 6:24) and not successive generations.

Uriel (v.24) may be the Levite who led the entire Kohathite clan in David's day (15:5). Comparisons of v.25 with vv.35–36 show that this is not the Elkanah of v.23 but rather the great-great-great-great-grandson of his brother Ebiasaph, i.e., Elkanah II.

Zophai, Nahath, and Eliab (vv.26–27) appear to be variant names for Zuph, Toah, and Eliel (vv.34–35). The Levite Elkanah IV is the husband of Hannah and the father of Samuel, the judge and prophet.

31–32 In his zeal for the proper worship of God, Ezra makes affirmations about the Davidic musicians (cf. Ezr 2:41). The "Tent of Meeting" was for God's meeting Israel (Ex 29:42–43), not for the people with each other!

33–38 David's musician Heman, 1000 B.C., is eighteen generations removed from Moses' adversary Korah, in 1445.

39–43 The name of Asaph's ancestor Shimei (v.42), the immediate son of Gershon (v.17), seems here to have been transposed with that of Jahath. The similarity then of five out of the six names of his descendants—from Jahath through Ethni (v.41)—to those of his brother Libni—Jehath to Jeatherai (vv.20–21)—has led some interpreters to assume that this must be an erroneous doublet, drawn from a single tradition. Yet 23:10 confirms the existence of Jahath as a legitimate, parallel branch of Gershon's younger son Shimei; and a deliberate reuse of names among brothers' sons is not infrequent (cf. the name Mahli, vv.19, 47, or how the Mahli of v.19 took for his child the name of this same older son of Gershon, i.e., that of his cousin Libni, v.29).

44–53 Ethan and Kishi (v.44) appear also as Jeduthun and Kushaiah (15:17). Verses 50–53 repeat vv.4–8 on the priestly line from Aaron, down to Zadok and Ahimaaz. This confirms that the Zadokite priests, alone among the Levitical divisions in David's day, had the authority to make a sacrificial atonement (v.49). It also furnishes a transition to the subject of the priestly cities that follows.

54–55 The remainder of ch. 6 lists the forty-eight towns that were assigned to the various branches of the tribe of Levi. As Jacob had predicted, they did become scattered among Israel (Ge 49:7). The list is taken from Jos 21. Ezra's reference to "the first lot," which went to the Aaronic priests, confirms the record that when Joshua distributed the land in 1400 B.C. among the western nine and one-half tribes and Levi, he accomplished it by means of a lottery (Jos 4:2; 21:10).

56–60 The lands of Hebron (v.56) had been promised to Caleb by both Moses and Joshua (Jos 14:6–15). On the six cities of refuge (v.57), see Nu 35; Dt 19:1–10; Jos 20. Hilen (v.58) is the Chronicler's postexilic name for Holon (Jos 15:51; 21:15).

61–81 The nonpriestly Kohathites (v.61) also received towns out of Ephraim (v.66) and Dan (Jos 21:5, specifically Eltekeh and Gibbethon, 21:23). The latter are required in v.68 to make up the subtotal of ten, where they are missing due to textual corruption. Jokmeam (v.68) is the Chronicler's postexilic name of Kibzaim (Jos 21:22).

F. Benjamin and Five Other Tribes (7:1–9:44)

1. Summaries (7:1–40)

Just as in the case of the two and one-half tribes of Transjordan (cf. the introductory discussion to 5:1–26), Ezra was concerned to perpetuate clan frameworks for other members of the former northern kingdom. Some representatives had associated themselves with Judah at the Fall of Samaria in 722 B.C. (cf. 2Ch 30:1–2), or even previously (11:13–16); and Josiah's expansion a century later embraced many more (34:6; cf. 1Ch 9:1). Others regained their place among God's people during the Exile of 586–538 (cf. Eze 37:15–23) and were able to return to Judah under Zerubbabel or under Ezra himself (cf. the casual allusion in Lk 2:36 to Anna of the tribe of Asher, one of the "ten lost tribes"). In the buffer zone between north and south lay Benjamin, which could include even the northern religious center of Bethel (Jos 18:22). It is summarized in ch. 7, along with the Ephraimite tribes, but is treated in greater detail in chs. 8 and 9 as Judah's major ally, both in the preexilic kingdom and postexilic restoration (1Ki 12:21, or the "two-twelfths" implied in 11:30–31, and Ezr 4:1).

This chapter outlines the clan structure that characterized Benjamin and five other tribes. Its sources are Ge 46 and Nu 26, but most of the later genealogies and other data lack biblical parallels. No mention is made of either Dan or Zebulun. Possibly these tribes had little influence or relevance among the Jews who made up Ezra's community.

1 The sons of Issachar appear as listed in Nu 26:23–24, with Puah as a variation on Puvah. Issachar's sons are also listed in Ge 46:13 and Nu 26:24.

2 Among the valiant descendants of Tola may have been the later judge who bore that clan name (Jdg 10:1).

3–5 For Izrahiah and his four sons, even with "many wives," to have "36,000" warriors seems unlikely, as does the total of 145,600 for just one tribe of the twelve. This appears to be the first of nine passages in Chronicles where "thousand") might better be translated as "chief" (a similar Hebrew word). Hence we should read in v.2: 22 chiefs, 600 (men); in v.3: 36 chiefs; and in v.5: 87 chiefs.

6 Among the sons of Benjamin, Bela and Beker correspond to Ge 46:21 (cf. Nu 26:38). The third, Jediael, is not mentioned elsewhere. Other sons appear in 8:1–2.

7–12 The figures, as in v.3, should best be read: v.7, as 22 chiefs, 34 men; v.9, as 20 chiefs, 200 men; and v.11, as 17 chiefs, 200 men. Ir and Aher (v.12) may be shortened forms for the names of Bela's youngest son Iri (v.7) and younger brother Aharah (8:1; cf. Nu 26:38).

13 Naphtali's sons correspond to those listed in Ge 46:24 and Nu 26:48–49, with minor changes in spelling. Bilhah was the servant of Rachel and the mother of Naphtali (Ge 30:3–8).

14 That Manasseh had an Aramean concubine may have reminded Ezra's readers of the racially mixed Samaritans in their own day (2Ki 17:24, 29; Ezr 4:2–3). As appears from the more complete record of western Manasseh in Nu 26:29–33, Asriel and Shemida (v.19) were the immediate sons of his grandson Gilead (cf. Jos 17:2).

15–19 Zelophehad (v.15) came three centuries later. His was the case raised by his daughters that prompted Moses' laws about female inheritance rights (Nu 26:33; 27:1–11; 36:1–12).

20–24 Of Ephraim's four sons noted in vv.20–21, 23, only Shuthelah had been recorded previously (Nu 26:35); Ezer and Elead had probably joined the families of their grandfather Joseph's brothers, who had settled in Goshen, only to be slain there on the northeastern border of Egypt by Palestinian raiders who came down from their birthplace in Gath.

25–29 Joshua is listed eight generations after Rephah. Taking Rephah's father as Ephraim's fourth son Beriah (v.23), we perceive Joshua's birth (c. 1500 B.C.; cf. Jos 24:29) to have been eleven generations after Joseph's, corroborating the approximately four-century interval that separated these two leaders.

30–40 The list of Asher's children plus two grandsons reproduces Ge 46:17 (cf. Nu 26:44–46). Shomer's brother Helem (v.35) appears in v.32 as Hotham. Father-son sequences between verses suggest that Ulla (v.39) may be a variant name for Ara in v.38. In v.40 the numeral "thousand" should probably be read "chief"; hence, 26 chiefs (see comment on v.3).

2. Benjamin (8:1–40)

First Chronicles 8 forms a major supplement to the summary of Benjamin given in 7:6–12. Its opening verses, however, on his first generations in Egypt, are based on Nu 26:38–40 (rather than on Ge 46:21, as in ch. 7). Verses 6–28 are almost without biblical parallel; they outline the genealogy of two family groups as these developed after the Hebrew conquest and resettlement of Canaan: the Benjamite household of Ehud, Israel's second judge (vv.6–7), and that of Shaharaim, some of whose great-grandchildren lived in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (v.28). The remainder of the chapter concerns the relatives who lived near them and who formed the ancestry of Saul, part of whose descent had been given in 1 Samuel.

Chronicles elaborates on this material, not simply because of the significance of King Saul and his family, as it continued a dozen generations after him, but primarily because of the importance of Benjamin as a tribe, which ranked second only to Judah in post-exilic society, and because of the status it provided for many within its clan framework (cf. introductory discussion on ch. 2, and Ne 11:4, 7, 31, 36).

1–2 The name of Benjamin's third son, Aharah (Aher, 7:12), corresponds to Ahiram in Nu 26:38 (Ehi, in Ge 46:21), as do also those of the grandsons Addar (= Ard) and Naaman (v.3).

3–5 The second name in the list of Bela's sons (Gera) reappears as the seventh name (v.5); the former may have died prematurely.

6–7 Some five hundred years separate the latter Gera from his descendant Ehud, the left-handed Benjamite judge (Jdg 3:15). The nature of the civil rivalry that led Ehud's son Gera to deport his own clansmen remains unknown.

8–13 Though Shaharaim's movement to Moab seems to locate him in Palestine in Ehud's general period (cf. the Benjamite towns mentioned in vv.12–13), his exact ancestry is lacking. The divorce of his first two wives demonstrates even further the moral deterioration of Israel during c. 1300 B.C. (cf. the previous Benjamite outrages condemned in Jdg 19:22–28; 20:12–14). The victory over the men of Gath (v.13) preceded their major Philistine reinforcement in 1200 B.C.

14–27 Meshullam, Heber (v.17), Ishmerai (v.18), and Shimei (v.21) seem to be variants for the names of Elpaal's sons Misham, Shemed, Eber, and Shema, as listed earlier (vv.12–13).

28 The phrase "all these" then identifies Beriah's and Shema's sons (vv.14–16, 19–21), brothers (vv.17–18), and grandsons (vv.22–27) as the ones living about Jerusalem.

29–32 When Mikloth and his son Shimeah (v.32) are said to live not only (following the lit. Heb.) "over against" their brothers (Mikloth's immediate family, in vv.30–31), but also "with" their relatives, we conclude that Mikloth's otherwise unidentified father Jeiel (cf. 1Sa 9:1 and the variant form, Abiel) should be grouped with the sons of Beriah and Shema.

33 Jeiel's fifth son, Ner, was the grandfather of Saul, the first king of Israel (1043–1010 B.C.), and also the father of Abner, Saul's military commander and uncle (1Sa 14:50–51). Abinadab (1Sa 31:2) appears elsewhere (1Sa 14:49) as Ishvi. Abinadab's brother's name, Esh-Baal (meaning "man of the [divine] Master"), is changed throughout 2Sa 2:8–4:12 to Ish-Bosheth ("man of shame"); for the Hebrew word baal could be treated as a proper noun designating the shameful idol of that name.

34 Similarly Merib-Baal ("warrior of the Master") appears in 2Sa 4:4–21:7 as Mephibosheth ("one who scatters [?] shame").

35–40 The warriors' "grandsons" (v.40) represent the thirteenth generation after Mephibosheth, who was five at the death of Saul and Jonathan in 1010 B.C., which brings us to the Exile of 586.

3. Jerusalem's inhabitants (9:1–44)

Chapter 9 continues the Chronicler's discussion of preexilic Benjamin (begun in 7:6) by cataloging the family groups that lived in Jerusalem just prior to its capture and destruction in 586 B.C. In addition to Benjamin (vv.7–9), these included clans from Judah (vv.4–6) and especially from Levi because of its key functioning in the temple services: whether from among the priests (vv.10–13), the nonpriestly Levites in general (vv.14–16), or the more specialized gatekeepers (vv.17–19). This in turn leads into a description of their duties (vv.20–34). Jerusalem did, however, lie within the tribal boundaries of Benjamin (Jos 18:16, 28), and it had already received some discussion in the preceding chapter (8:28, 32); hence its inclusion at this point. Such information about former population groups and activities, in what was still the nation's capital city, was of prime importance to Ezra and his colleagues in their efforts to restore legitimate theocracy to Judah in their own postexilic situation.

1 This transition verse shifts the reader's attention away from the tribal registers that have gone before. "The book of the kings" designates a court record now lost (see the introduction).

2 The NIV's phrase "the first to resettle" represents words that are, literally, "the dwellers, the first ones." In the present context the event that separates the Chronicler from "the first ones" is defined as the Babylonian captivity (v.1); hence the dwellers should probably be understood as the former, preexilic Jerusalemites (cf. the introduction to this chapter).

The "temple servants" (GK 5987) were literally "given ones." They might consist of captives who had been spared but enslaved to temple service. Early Hebrew examples include certain Midianite women (Nu 31:35, 47) or the people of Gibeon (Jos 9:22–23), but their organization as a class is credited to David (Ezr 8:20).

3 Individual Jerusalemites who had come from Ephraim or other northern tribes receive no further mention, since the list that follows cites only major clan leaders.

4–9 For "Shilonites" (v.5), read Shelanites, as in Nu 26:20, since Perez (v.4), Shelah, and Zerah (v.6) make up the divisions of Judah (2:3–4).

10–13 Jedaiah, Jehoiarib, and Jakin, with Malkijah and Immer (v.12), are the names of the second, first, twenty-first, fifth, and sixteenth of the twenty-four priestly courses established by David (24:7–18), rather than names of individuals.The fact that Azariah IV (v.22) is the son of Hilkiah (see 6:13) dates this listing to shortly after 622 B.C.

14–16 Shemaiah came from Merari, the third of the three Levitical clans. Mattaniah belonged to the first, Gershon, through Asaph, one of David's chief musicians. Obadiah was again of Merari, through the chief musician Jeduthun (= Ethan; cf. 6:44), while Berekiah's ancestor Elkanah bears a frequently reappearing Kohathite name.

17–18 Since the temple faced east, the "King's Gate" was the main gate (cf. Ac 3:2, in NT times), i.e., the king's entrance (Eze 46:1–2) and most honored station. Ezra's phrases "camp" of the Levites and God's "Tent" (v.19; cf. NIV note) recall how Levi once encamped on the four sides of the tabernacle (Nu 3:25–38).

19–20 Though Korah had been slain (see 6:22), his line continued. Coming from Kohath—the second clan but also that of Moses, Aaron, and the priests—the Korahites were even honored, by appointment as gatekeepers under Aaron's faithful grandson, Phinehas I, on whom God bestowed the Levitical covenant of peace (Nu 25:11–13). Their status continued, through Kore, whether denoting Korah's immediate grandson of this name (1Ch 26:1) or a later Kore in 725 B.C. (2Ch 31:14), down to this Shallum a century later.

21 Since both Meshelemiah and Zechariah served under David (26:8–11), this "Tent of Meeting" (cf. 6:32) would seem to refer to the curtained form of God's house (16:1; 17:1; cf. 22:1 and Ps 30 title) erected prior to Solomon's permanent temple (see v.19, NIV note).

22–24 It was appropriate that Samuel, himself a Korahite (6:27) and one of the doorkeepers in his youth (1Sa 3:15), should have anticipated David in their final organization (1Ch 26). The way Israel could commit to them "their positions of trust" indicates something of how the righteous live by faith, or trust, in God (Hab 2:4; Ro 1:17).

The number of their chiefs could vary: 94 under David (26:8–11); compare 139 among the first return (Ezr 2:42) and 172 under Nehemiah (Ne 11:19).

25–29 Twenty-four guard stations (26:17–18) and 216 chosen gatekeepers (212, v.22, plus the 4 leaders of vv.26–27, who stayed permanently in Jerusalem) works out exactly to nine people for each post. If we assume eight-hour shifts, this would require seventy-two men on duty, one week out of every three; twelve-hour shifts would require forty-eight on a week's duty, once every four or five weeks.

30 Reference seems to be to spices used for the holy anointing oil, for those who mixed it were a closely restricted group (Ex 30:33, 38).

31 "The offering bread" refers to the flat cakes that were used in the grain offerings (Lev 2;6:14–18; 7:9–10).

32 "The bread" refers to "the bread of the Presence" that was set out in rows on the golden table to symbolize the communion of the redeemed with God (Lev 24:5–6).

33 The musicians mentioned here are the leaders named in vv.14–16.

34 This verse then sums up all the Levitical inhabitants of Jerusalem (vv.10–33).

35–44 The rest of ch. 9 reverts to reproducing the lines of Benjamin that lived near Jerusalem. It virtually repeats 8:29–38 on the family of Saul; but its purpose here is to introduce the tragic conclusion to his reign (ch. 10).

II. The Reign of David (10:1–29:30)

A. Background: the Death of Saul (10:1–14)

Having established Israel's historical setting and ethnic bounds in the preceding genealogies (chs. 1–9), the Chronicler now enters his main subject, the history of the Hebrew kingdom, with its theological conclusions. His central character is David, on whom the remainder of 1 Chronicles focuses (chs. 10–29). David's devotion led him to set up the institutions of public worship that Ezra was so eager to maintain. David's heroic personality exemplifies the success that God bestows on those who trust in him. His posterity, moreover, constitutes the ruling dynasty of Judah throughout the rest of its independent history (the content of 2 Chronicles) and would bear its ultimate fruit in the eternal kingdom of Jesus the Messiah. Practical aims like these also explain why Ezra omitted the less edifying events of the reign of Saul; for he moves directly from the king's Benjamite genealogy (9:35–44) to his death (ch. 10), which precipitated David's rise to the throne (v.14). First Chronicles 10:1–12 derives directly from 1Sa 31, with slight differences in the choice of the details described; vv.13–14 then point up the chapter's negative doctrine: God condemns those who forsake him to failure.

1 The Philistines were a Hamitic people, but of Minoan background rather than Canaanite (see on 1:12). Before the year 2000, some had settled on the southern coast of Palestine (the very name of which means "Philistine land") and encountered Abraham (Ge 21:32; cf. 26:14). They remained after Joshua's conquest in 1400 (Jos 13:2–3) and only temporarily lost certain of their cities to Judah (Jdg 1:18). Shamgar's skirmish with them in 1250 (3:31) was successful but simultaneously demonstrates Israel's material disadvantage to their presence (cf. 1Sa 13:19–22). With the Fall of Crete to widespread barbarian movements in 1200, the "remnant . . . of Caphtor" (Jer 47:4) reinforced the earlier Philistines on Asia's Canaanite mainland.

For a century, following a crushing defeat of the Peleset (generally conceded to be the Philistines) by Pharaoh Rameses III, the Philistines seemed content to consolidate their city-states; but then in three waves they almost overwhelmed Israel. The first extended for forty years, including Samson's time (Jdg 10:7; 13:1; 1Sa 4), but was broken in 1063 B.C. by Samuel at the second battle of Ebenezer (1Sa 7:13); and the second wave, for perhaps ten years, by Saul at the battle of Micmash in 1041 (14:31). Now 1Ch 10, which dates to 1010 B.C., marks the onset of the Philistines' last major advance and period of oppression, which would be broken some seven years later by David (1Ch 14:10–16).

Mount Gilboa lay at the head of the great east-west Valley of Esdraelon, below Galilee, so that its loss by Israel enabled the Philistines to penetrate to the Jordan and even beyond (1Sa 31:7).

2 On Saul's sons, see 8:33.

3–4 Saul's fear of "abuse" (GK 6618), if the Philistines should take him alive (cf. Jdg 16:21), drove him to suicide, which was unprecedented in the OT (though cf. later occurrences in 2Sa 17:23; 1Ki 16:18). This testifies to the Philistines' cruelty despite material culture (cf. v.9 and today's use of "Philistine" as a byword for barbarism).

5 The context makes clear that Saul's death occurred at his own hands (see also comments on 2Sa 1:6–10, where an Amalekite reported to David that he had killed Saul, probably hoping for a reward).

6 Those of Saul's house who stood with him ("all his men," 1Sa 31:6) died together at Gilboa; others, however, both of his sons and troops, did survive (1Ch 8:34–40; 2Sa 2:8; 21:8). Alternatively, this may be the Chronicler's way of intimating the otherwise omitted data in 2Sa 1–4 on Ish-Bosheth.

7–10 According to 1Sa 31:10, the Philistines hung Saul's body on the walls of Beth Shan, a major city between Gilboa and the Jordan; the deity in whose temple they put his armor was Ashtoreth, goddess of sex and war. Saul's head was placed in another's temple, that of the vegetation god Dagon (cf. 1Sa 5:2–5). The validity of the two buildings has been attested archaeologically by the discovery of both temples in Beth Shan's ruins of this period.

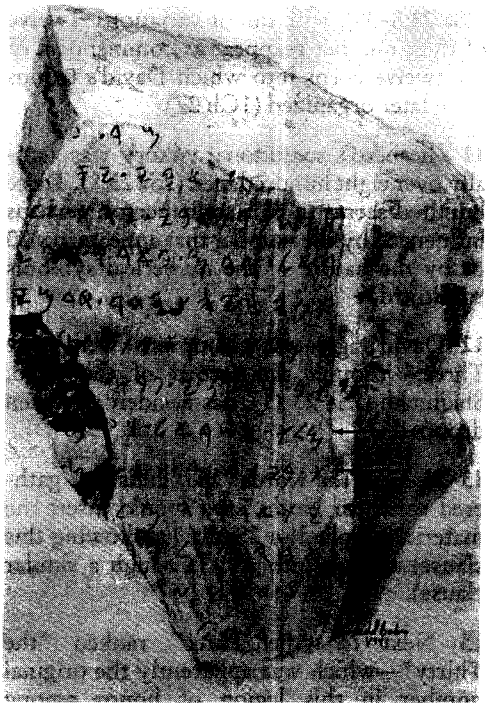
11–12 The men of Jabesh Gilead in Transjordan remained faithful to Saul, their deliverer thirty years earlier (1Sa 11:1–11).

13–14 Saul's unfaithfulness consisted of disobeying God's words through Samuel (1Sa 13:8–9; 15:2–3) and of consulting the spiritist at Endor (28:7–13) instead of persevering—he had made some inquiry of him (v.6)—in prayer for divine grace.

B. David's Rise (11:1–20:8)

In this section, the author covers the period between 1003 and about 995 B.C., during which David rose to the zenith of his power. The seven and one-half years of disputed succession, civil war, and Philistine domination (2Sa 1–4) that followed Saul's death in 1010 (cf. 2Sa 5:5) are passed over. But they are not denied: Ezra's observation in the opening verse of the section (11:1), that Israel came to "Hebron" to anoint David, constitutes a tacit recognition of his initial installation there, but only by his own tribe of Judah (2Sa 2:4,10b); of the rejection of his appeal to the other tribes to the north and east (vv.5–6); and of their eventual choice of Saul's son Ish-Bosheth, 1005–1003 (vv.8–10a).

Instead, Chronicles amplifies the record of 2Sa 5–10, which includes David's capture of Jerusalem and its establishment as a new political capital for him and his supporters (1Ch 11–12); his achievement of independence from the Philistines (ch. 14); his return of the ark of the covenant, which made Jerusalem the religious capital of united Israel (chs. 13; 15–16); and the triumphant advance of his armies in every direction (chs. 18–20). Only the account of David's personal kindness to Jonathan's lame son Mephibosheth (2Sa 9) is omitted.



This is a drawing of the first clear reference in stone to the House of David (found in 1993 at Tel Dan). The lines with the arrows read: "the king of Israel . . . of the house of David." Drawing by Rachel Bierling.

The heart of this section is found in God's prophecy to David through Nathan (ch. 17): "I have been with you wherever you have gone. . . . I will subdue all your enemies" (vv.8, 10). The Lord's "great promises" (v.19) applied not only to David, but to "my people Israel" as a whole (v.9)—not only in the early tenth century B.C., but for "the future of the house of your servant" (v.17). Its assurances are applicable to Ezra's struggling postexilic community; to the present church of Jesus, whom David predicted: "He will be my son" (v.13; cf. Ps 110:1; Mt 22:42–45); and to that yet future kingdom of the Messiah, whose "throne will be established forever" (v.14).

1. David established in Jerusalem; his heroes (11:1–12:40)

The section's initial subdivision documents David's ascendancy. Following his consecration as king over a reunited Israel (11:1–3), one of his first acts was to capture and then to strengthen Jerusalem (vv.4–9; cf. 2Sa 5:1–10). The Chronicler then proceeds to describe David's heroes: "the Three" (vv.10–19), two of the major commanders (vv.20–25), and "the Thirty" (vv.26–47; cf. 2Sa 23:8–39). The concluding list in ch. 12, however, is unique to 1 Chronicles. It describes the military leaders and tribal officers who came over to David before his final anointing and who played a primary role in his eventual elevation to the kingship (v.38). It suggests David's growing popular support beyond the four hundred men of 1Sa 22:2 (later six hundred, 27:2).

1 The phrase "all Israel" is characteristic of the Chronicler's concern for the unity of God's people. Emphasis here falls on the portions of Israel that had so far not recognized David's kingship.

2 The Lord's appointment of David dates back some twenty years to his first anointing, in the privacy of his family, by Samuel (1Sa 15:28; 16:1–13). As David then demonstrated his ability for leadership (18:5, 16), he was increasingly recognized as standing in line for the throne (23:17; 25:30), even by Saul himself (24:20; 26:25). At Saul's death David had received a second anointing, over Judah (2Sa 2:4); and Abner had started the preparation for his total rule (3:10).

3 This third anointing was preceded by a "compact" (lit., "covenant"; GK 1382) before the Lord, by which both king and people acknowledged their mutual obligations under God. Such a "constitutional monarchy" was unique in the ancient Near East, for the only effective curb against despotism is one's personal belief in God and commitment to his higher kingship. Contrast the reputation for clemency and the religious scruples of even a weak Hebrew monarch like Ahab (1Ki 20:31; 21:3–4, 27–29) with the natural (unrestrained) ruthlessness of his Canaanite wife, Jezebel (21:7–10).

4–5 Allusions to Jerusalem appear first in the Ebla tablets of 2400 B.C. The city is described as Salem in reference to Abraham in 2000 (Ge 14:18) and as Urusalim in the Egyptian Amarna letters, which may confirm the Hebrew conquest in 1400. Jerusalem had led a southern Canaanite alliance against Joshua (Jos 10:1–5), who defeated its army and executed its king (10:10, 26; 11:7, 10). The tribe of Judah overran the defenses of the city itself (Jdg 1:8), but the Jebusites soon reoccupied it. For almost four centuries Judah had been unable to win back Jerusalem and drive out its Canaanite inhabitants (Jos 15:63; Jdg 1:21; 19:10–11), which helps explain the latter's overconfidence against David (1Ch 11:5; 2Sa 5:6). David had posted notice long before of his intention against the haughty city (1Sa 17:54).

While 2Sa 5:6 identifies the attackers only as "David's men," Chronicles includes "all the Israelites" (cf. v.10 and 12:38, which concede the primary role exercised by David's particular followers).

6 The king's offer that whoever "leads the attack," i.e., first penetrated Jerusalem, would become commander over the armies of united Israel may represent an attempt on his part to replace his effective but self-willed nephew Joab, who had been leading the forces of Judah up to this point (cf. 2Sa 3:39). Joab nevertheless retained his post by bravely achieving the initial entrance, ascending a concealed watershaft from the Gihon spring so as to end up within the city walls.

7 David's relocation to Jerusalem was a strategic move. It provided him not only with an impregnable citadel militarily, but also with a neutral site politically as a capital, lying as it did on the border between Judah and the northern tribes (cf. Washington, D.C.). He called it "The City of David." Near Eastern conquerors not infrequently named cities after themselves.

8–9 "Terraces" (GK 4864; lit., "Millo"; cf. NIV note) means "filling." These "terraces" had been built so that the city's eastern walls could extend far enough down the steep Kidron slope to encompass the Gihon watershaft, and they suffered a continuing need for repair (1Ki 11:27; 2Ch 32:5).

10 The remainder of the chapter is a catalog of David's mighty men, introduced at this point because of the significant role they played in his rise to the kingship and in his establishment at Jerusalem. Their listing, down through Uriah the Hittite (v.41), corresponds to one of the appendices in 2 Samuel (2Sa 23:8–39), with minor variations. Twelve of their number reappear as commanders of the twelve corps into which David's troops were later organized (1Ch 27).

11 The hero's sensational victory was actually over eight hundred men (2Sa 23:8). Three hundred seems to be a scribal error, perhaps influenced by the number that appears in v.20 or by the nature of the numerical symbols employed.

12 David's greatest champions were "the Three," though the record of the third, Shammah (2Sa 23:11), has accidentally been dropped.

13–14 After the words "the Philistines gathered there for battle," we should insert the material supplied in 2Sa 23:9 (following this clause) and on into v.11 (through a similar clause).

15 Next to "the Three" ranked "the Thirty"—which was apparently the original number in this legion of honor among David's men. Second Samuel 23:24–39 actually lists thirty-seven, including the outstanding "Three" and the two commanders; and 1Ch 11:41b–47 adds sixteen more, as new heroes were added to the group. Which ones of the "Thirty" performed the deed that follows is not stated.

The Valley of Rephaim, where the Philistines encamped, lies southwest of Jerusalem. Its mention connects this event with their first campaign against David (14:8–9), even before his capture of the city. David had thus retreated to his old outlaw stronghold at Adullam (1Sa 22:1; 2Sa 5:17). Its citation constitutes another allusion to David's difficult rise to power, which the Chronicler never seeks to conceal.

16–18 David poured out the water he had longed for as a libation offering to the Lord (Lev 23:37), showing both how precious he considered his men, who had risked their lives to get it, and how centrally he placed God in his own life.

19 David called the water their "blood," since life does depend on its presence (cf. Ge 9:4; Lev 17:14; Dt 12:23).

20–21 Abishai was David's half-nephew. His heroism was demonstrated by his having volunteered to go down at night with David into Saul's camp (1Sa 26:6–7). He had also been a joint commander, with his brother Joab, against the forces of Ish-Bosheth and Abner (2Sa 2:24). He was later to lead divisions in the wars against the Ammonites (10:10), Absalom (18:2), and Sheba (20:6). The locale of this incident has not been preserved, but it may have occurred when Abishai commanded an expedition against Edom (1Ch 18:12).

22 The NIV phrase about Moab's "best men" reads in the Hebrew the "'ari'el [GK 738] of Moab." 'Ari'el must here be used, not in its impersonal sense of "the altar-hearth of God" (Isa 29:1–2, 7), but in its personal sense (lit., "the lions of God)"; that is, Benaiah overcame "the mighty lions (of Moab)," with the superlative use of "God."

23–25 When the spear of Benaiah's Egyptian opponent is said to be like "a weaver's rod," the reference is to the heavy shaft of a loom that holds the threads taut; i.e., this was a massive weapon. For such heroism he became commander of David's professional Cretan and Philistine troops (1Ch 18:17) and later of Solomon's entire army (1Ki 4:4).

26 The roster of the Thirty begins at this point and must have been first formulated some time before David became king of all Israel; Asahel, the youngest of David's half-nephews, was killed pursuing Abner in his uncle's war against Ish-Bosheth (2Sa 2:18–23). Elhanan, son of Dodo, should not be confused with Elhanan son of Jair, the hero who slew the brother of Goliath (1Ch 20:5).

27 The phrase "the Harorite" has two scribal errors and should read "the Harodite," i.e., "a man from Harod," the pool near Mount Gilboa where Gideon tested his men (Jdg 7:1–7). But while the place names are subject to a measure of control, a number of the personal names (vv.27–38) differ from those found in the parallel list in 2Sa 23:25–36, perhaps partly because of later spelling patterns in Ezra's day, some 475 years after the writing of 2 Samuel.

28–31 Benaiah from Pirathon (v.31) is not to be confused with Benaiah the commander (vv.22–25) from Kabzeel, near Beer Sheba, in the south.

32–47 "Ahijah the Pelonite" (v.36) should read "Eliam [= Ammiel, 1Ch 3:5] the Gilonite" (cf. 2Sa 23:34), the father of Bathsheba and a son of David's counselor, Ahithophel (2Sa 11:3), who did come from Giloh (15:12).

12:1 Among those who supported David prior to his rise over all Israel (11:3), the first group listed in 12:1–7) is datable to the sixteen months just before Saul's death in 1010 B.C. They came to Ziklag, the town on the southwestern border of Judah, over which David had been appointed as a vassal ruler by Achish, the Philistine king of Gath (1Sa 27:5–7).

2 The warriors were from Benjamin and were significant both for their individual prowess and for the fact that even though they were Saul's fellow tribesmen, they recognized David as God's appointed sovereign.

3–7 Though Ishmaiah (v.4) is not listed among the Thirty, at one time he served as their commander (cf. also v.18 and 11:21). The five Korahites (v.6) were of Levi (see 6:22; 9:19) but probably lived in Benjamin.

8–15 Those listed from Gad joined David even earlier while he was still in Judah in his desert stronghold, presumably the cave of Adullam (11:15; 12:16; cf. 1Sa 22:1). Jeremiah (v.13), the tenth Gadite leader, differs from the fifth (v.10) in that his Hebrew name has a longer form. During the first month (March/April), the Jordan is in its spring flood (cf. Jos 3:15; 4:18), which makes the Gadites' achievement in vv.14–15 all the more noteworthy.

16–18 The Holy Spirit literally "clothed himself with" Amasai (v.18). So inspired, his devotion to David as God's chosen servant is then expressed in Hebrew poetry.

19–22 The leaders from Manasseh arrived just before Saul's death at Gilboa, which lay in the western part of Manasseh's territory. David, however, was sent away from the actual battle, as explained in 1Sa 29. The Philistine commanders' mistrust and fear of David are stated clearly in 1Sa 29:4–5. The Manassites' help against the raiders is explained in 1Sa 30.

The NIV rendering "like the army of God" (v.22) reflects a Hebrew phrase that is literally "like the camp of God" (cf. 11:22). It may be connected to the idea expressed in the divine name "LORD of hosts [= armies]" in 11:9 (NIV, "LORD Almighty"), which can refer to the armies of Israel. Here, however, David's multitude may be compared, poetically, with the heavenly hosts, whether of stars (Dt 4:19; Ne 9:6; Ps 33:6) or of angels (Ge 32:1–2; Ps 103:20–21).

23 The chapter concludes by enumerating the officers who came to Hebron seven and one-half years later to turn over the entire nation to him (bringing us back to 11:1).

24–37 Although some have defended the accuracy of the large numbers given in these verses or have suggested that they are deliberate hyperbole, since these delegations are limited to specially equipped leaders "famous in their own clans" (v.30; cf. v.25), presumably the same that are cited at the beginning of the next chapter as "commanders of thousands and commanders of hundreds" (13:1)—the numbers given should probably not be read as bare totals but, in v.24, for example, as "six (commanders of) thousands, eight (commanders of) hundreds." There were, as we might say, 6 colonels and 8 captains, for a total of 14, not 6,800. Notice what would otherwise be the incongruously small totals in v.28 with Zadok and 22 officers, or v.32, the apparently large delegation of 200 chiefs from Issachar. The number of officers assembled thus amounts to 398 (not 340,800 in Hebron at one time!).

Among the warriors from Levi (vv.27–28), Jehoiada the priest seems to have been father of Benaiah, the major commander (11:22; 27:5), while Zadok, still young at this time, may be the Aaronite who became the colleague of Abiathar and later, under Solomon, his successor as high priest (29:22; 1Ki 2:35; 4:4).

The men of Issachar (v.32) "understood the times" and thus cast their lot with David rather than Saul.

38–40 The three-day feast at David's accession was an immediate, historic celebration; but it points to the doctrine of the future, messianic feast (Ps 22:29; Isa 25:6; Rev 19:7).

2. The ark sought (13:1–14)

This chapter (esp. from v.6 onward) parallels the first part of 2Sa 6:1–11. Chronologically the events it describes followed David's wars with the Philistines (2Sa 5:18–25), and perhaps the construction of his palace as well (5:11–12; cf. 1Ch 14:1). But to the Chronicler the account of David's search for the ark of God takes precedence over these other matters, to which he turns in the next chapter (14:1–2, 8–17). Logically in his mind, piety has greater significance than civil action. Ezra's primary concern was to lead the members of his postexilic Jewish community into an enthusiastic commitment to the faith and the practices enjoined in the law of Moses (Ezr 7:10). He therefore describes next the king's attempt to bring the Ark of the Covenant to Jerusalem, which illustrates a renewed desire on Israel's part to seek God (1Ch 13:3) and to worship him (v.8). Even the temporary suspension of David's attempt (vv.9–13) became a demonstration of the necessity for exact conformity to the divine standards for worship, while the blessing that attended Obed-Edom's care for it (v.14) exemplified God's positive reward for one's devotion.

1 David consulted the military leaders, as in 2Sa 6:1.

2 But the Chronicler adds other details, whether of a more democratic character, i.e., calling in "the whole assembly" ("all the people," v.4), or of a more religious, including "priests and Levites," those consecrated to "the will of the LORD our God." The phrase "the rest of our brothers" is literally "our brothers that are left." This may reflect something of the seriousness of the third major Philistine oppression against Israel, 1010–1003 B.C. (see 10:1), which David had just broken (2Sa 5:20, 25).

3–4 The ark was a gold-covered chest, which contained among other items the stone tablets of the Decalogue (cf. Heb 9:4), which witnessed to God's covenant with his people. The ark was the most holy object in the whole system of Mosaic worship, for it served primarily as a sacramental symbol of the very presence of God, whose glory cloud was enthroned above it (v.6; Ex 25:22; cf. 1Sa 4:7). Israel, however, lapsed into a mechanical concept, that God was necessarily present with the ark. To overcome such superstitious notions about their having "God in a box," the Lord thus allowed his holy ark to be captured at the disastrous first battle of Ebenezer, about 1085 B.C. (1Sa 4:10–11). But once this lesson had been absorbed, he resumed his manifestations of power from over its golden cover, the mercy (atonement) seat.

Disrespect toward the holy object led to divine plagues, first against the pagan Philistines and then against the men of Judah at Beth Shemesh, who felt compelled to remove this fearful presence from their sight (1Sa 6). For eighty years, therefore, it rested in the house of Abinadab at Kiriath Jearim (1Sa 7:1), some eight miles west of Jerusalem on the border between Benjamin and Judah.

Characteristic of the religious insensitivity that marked the entire period of David's predecessor, the ark had not been sought in the days of Saul. One possible exception is noted in 1Sa 14:18; and even at this point the ark may not have been brought out but only asked for.

5 David assembled "all the Israelites," specified in 2Sa 6:1 as thirty thousand men. They gathered from Lebo Hamath in the north, in the valley between the Lebanons, to as far away as "the Shihor," traditionally understood as an Egyptian word meaning "pool [or stream] of Horus," perhaps here identifying a watercourse in Egypt's eastern delta.

6–9 "Baalah of Judah" (from 2Sa 6:2)—or here, lit., "Baalath ... that [belongs] to Judah"—is a Canaanite name for Kiriath Jearim (or Kiriath Baal, in Jos 18:14). Uzzah and Ahio were sons, or descendants, of Abinadab (2Sa 6:3). The locations of "the threshing floor of Kidon" (called by the variant name "Nacon," 2Sa 6:6) and of "Perez Uzzah" (v.11; cf. NIV note) remain unknown.

10 The severity of the divine judgment against Uzzah, even though his action had been well-intentioned, provided an illustration to all future generations of the necessity for reverence and for absolute conformity to God's directives concerning his holy objects. The transgression in this instance was twofold. (1) The ark should not have been placed on a cart but carried by hand, as David himself later acknowledged (15:13). True, the Philistines had previously transported it on a wagon (1Sa 6:11), but they had acted in heathen ignorance. (2) It should not have been touched. Even its authorized carriers, Levites of the clan of Kohath (cf. 15:2)—which Abinadab may or may not have been—had long ago been warned against this by Moses, on pain of death (Nu 4:15).

11–12 David's anger is psychologically explainable, if not ethically justifiable; for it was he who had the overall responsibility for the course of these events. But his anger rapidly turned to fear. His unwillingness, as he said, to "bring the ark of God to me," meant, in effect, that he did not want to bring it to his capital in Jerusalem, the city of David, that was so closely identified with himself.

13–14 Obed-Edom the Gittite (i.e., a resident of Gath) was indeed a Levite of the clan of Kohath, family of Korah (26:1, 4). As a Korahite gatekeeper (15:18, 24, and also a musician, v.21), he met the requirements of the law for service as a caretaker of the ark; and he was signally blessed.

3. Independence from the Philistines (14:1–17)

On the whole ch. 14 reflects its source in 2Sa 5:11–23, with a few additions. The events it describes do not seem to fit the three-month interval that elapsed between chs. 13 and 15, during which the ark remained with Obed-Edom (13:14; 15:25). They rather precede this (cf. introductory discussion to ch.

13). After summarizing certain aspects of his family (vv.1–7), Ezra delineates the king's first international crisis, that of his confrontation with the Philistines (vv.8–17). For when David had finally fled from Saul's kingdom (c. 1012 B.C.), he had become a Philistine vassal (1Sa 27:1–28:2); and during his years at Hebron, which parallel the period of their third major oppression of the Hebrews (1010–1003; see 10:1), the Philistines probably considered him as just another client king. Yet with his anointing as monarch over the reunited Israel, David became a threat they could no longer ignore (v.8). They attacked immediately, even before David had been able to occupy Jerusalem (11:7; see 11:15). But because he looked to the Lord for his strength and for his strategy, he was able to beat back two Philistine offenses, to secure the independence of God's people, and to terminate forever the threat of Philistine conquest and oppression. The teaching of ch. 14 has a valid principle for Christian believers: "God has gone out in front of you to strike the Philistine army [i.e., your enemies]" (v.15).

1–2 Some scholars have dated Hiram's kingship over Tyre to about 969–936 B.C., which is in the time of Solomon rather than of David (cf. 2Ch 2; cf. 8:18; 9:10, 21). But Chronicles (and 2Sa 5:12) associates the construction of David's palace with David's being "established . . . as king" before the ark came to Jerusalem (15:1); so it may not be out of place to think of earlier dealings with Hiram of Tyre (who would subsequently become king) or even that David had entered into some kind of relationship with Hiram's father Abibaal, which was renegotiated with Hiram and continued into the reign of Solomon. In any event, this palace witnesses to how a pagan monarch may be used to serve the people of God (cf. Isa 23:18).

3 David's taking "more wives" was a historical fact but a moral failure, directly contrary to the law (Dt 17:17). This sin led to a whole series of disasters later on (2Sa 11:27; cf. the implications of 13:4, 32, and even 1Ki 1:5–6).

4–7 The list of David's younger sons has appeared also in 3:5–8.

8 The statement that David "went out to meet" the enemy summarizes several preceding events, including raids by the Philistines (v.9), his own initial retreat to the stronghold of Adullam (2Sa 5:17), and the exploit of his heroes at the well of Bethlehem (1Ch 11:15).

9 The Valley of Rephaim lay southwest of Jerusalem and formed part of the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15:8). It may correspond to the "Valley of Baca" (Ps 84:6), due to the balsam trees that were there (vv.14–15). These are named, literally, "weepers" (beka'im) because of their drops of milky sap.

10–12 Trusting in God's promise of victory, David completely routed the Philistines at Baal Perazim (cf. NIV note), so that he and his men took away their idols (2Sa 5:21) and burned them, as required in the law (Dt 7:5, 25).

13–15 Against the Philistines' renewed invasion, the Lord guided David into an encircling movement. The signal for springing this ambush was a supernatural "sound of marching in the tops of the balsam trees," perhaps similar to the miracle recorded in 2Ki 7:6.

16–17 David's striking the Philistines down "all the way . . . to Gezer," on the Philistine border, signified their total expulsion from Israelite territory.

4. The ark brought to Jerusalem (15:1–16:43)

While the transfer of the ark from Kiriath Jearim to Jerusalem occupies but ch. 6 in 2 Samuel, it takes up three in this book: ch. 13, which carries the account up to its turning aside to the house of Obed-Edom, and chs. 15–16, on its final move into Jerusalem. This latter section parallels 2Sa 6:12–20, but with a number of additions. These include David's elaborate preparations, both to prevent any recurrence of the tragedy that had brought about Uzzah's death (15:1–15), and also to ensure an appropriate retinue of singers (vv.16–24); his provision of a model psalm of thanksgiving, that was used on the occasion of the ark's actual installation into its new tent-abode (16:7–36); and his establishment of a permanent Levitical organization to maintain the regular services of worship before the ark in its Jerusalem sanctuary (vv.4–6, 37–42).

By the time of Ezra, Jerusalem had become more important religiously than politically; and so it has remained, even up to the present. Our Chronicler therefore resumes the narrative, begun in ch. 13, on how the ark came to be brought inside the city; for it was this event that started the transformation of Jerusalem into the religious capital of Israel. It remained only for an angelic revelation to David—that Mount Moriah, on its north side, was to be the site for the altar of God (= "the house of God," 22:1; 2Ch 3:1)—to establish the Lord's ultimate centralization of Hebrew religion at this sanctuary. It became the fulfillment of what Moses had long before predicted, that the Lord God would choose a place out of all their tribes for his name to dwell; to his holy hill his people were to come for pilgrimage and sacrifice (Dt 12:5–7, 11–12).

1 It was the time needed for constructing these Davidic "buildings," clearly more than the three months during which the ark remained with Obed-Edom (13:14), that causes 14:1 to be dated before ch. 13 (cf. 14:1 and 2).

At this point David "prepared . . . a tent for the ark" (cf. v.12). His primary reasons are given later (16:1–4). For it was not simply that reports had reached him of God's blessing on the household of Obed-Edom (2Sa 6:12)—indicating both that the danger surrounding Uzzah had passed and that similar blessings might now be anticipated for Jerusalem as well (!)—but he had a religious motivation, seeking to establish a center of prayer and praise to the Lord (16:4).

2 Chapter 15 (here and in v.13) gives a further explanation for Uzzah's disaster (cf. 13:10): the Levites should have carried the ark, as prescribed in Dt 10:8.

3–4 So when David assembled Israel to bring the ark the rest of the way into Jerusalem, he was careful to ensure the presence of priests and Levites (named in v.11). The latter are then particularly enumerated in vv.5–10, along with the total number of their followers, some 862 in all.

5–10 In addition to the three major clans of Levi—Gershon, Kohath, Merari (vv.5–7)—there appear three subgroups within Kohath: those of his third and fourth sons, Hebron and Uzziel (vv.9–10), and of Elizaphan (here), who in particular was one of the three sons of Uzziel (Ex 6:22; Lev 10:4). With the passage of generations, these must have gained sufficiently in numbers or in importance to warrant their separate representation.

11–15 David's order to the Levites to "consecrate themselves" (GK 7727) involved certain prescribed ritual washings and the avoidance of any form of ceremonial defilement (Ex 19:10, 14–15; Lev 11:44).

16 The worship of God frequently takes the appropriate form of joyful song; and this occasion, on which the ark of the covenant was conducted into Jerusalem with a glad procession, marked the historical beginning of the ministry of the Levitical singers in Israel. Concerning the musical instruments specified, the second, the "harp" (GK 4036), was more of a zither; the third, "cymbals" (GK 5199), literally means "those which cause [people] to hear" (cf. v.19). Their function seems to be that of marking time, by sounding clearly and loudly.

17–19 From the prominent clan of Kohath, Heman son of Joel, who was in turn a son of the prophet Samuel (6:28, 33; 1Sa 8:2), was in first place among the musicians appointed for the occasion by the Levites themselves (also in v.19, but contrast 16:5–7). With Heman were Asaph and Ethan, from the other two clans—all three of whom continued on, serving as the chief musicians under David's subsequent permanent arrangements (16:37, 41–42).

20 Aziel is a shortened form of the name Jaaziel (v.18). The phrase "according to alamoth" occurs also in the title to Ps 46. Since this noun means "maidens, virgins," such as are mentioned as beating tambourines in ceremonial processions of singers and other musicians (Ps 68:25), it may indicate music produced in a soprano register.

21 The phrase "according to sheminith" occurs also in the titles to Pss 6 and 12. The word is derived from the root for "eight" and is usually thought to indicate music in a lower octave, in contrast to the preceding verse, though it might indicate an instrument that had eight strings.

Obed-Edom the Gittite was, in his hereditary position, a gatekeeper (v.18; or "doorkeeper," v.24). But in recognition of his faithful care for the ark during the preceding three months (13:14; cf. also the attendant risk, v.12), he was honored with a place among the zither players; and his post was subsequently made permanent (16:5, 38). Berekiah and Elkanah then took over some of the "keeping," and carrying, duty en route.

22–23 The position of Kenaniah is uncertain. Though not listed in v.11 with the Levitical leaders, he is still designated "the head Levite." The NIV joins him with the preceding musicians as in charge of the singing. Yet the chief musicians have already been designated (v.17); and it seems better here to join Kenaniah with the following "keepers" (vv.23–24) and to translate the word rendered "singing" (GK 5362) in its more basic sense of "burden" or "load" (cf. v.27, "carrying the ark"). Verse 22 (and v.27) then says that Kenaniah was the head Levite in charge of the central task of transporting the ark. The thought of 26:29—where Kenaniah was "assigned duties away from the temple," over external and material affairs rather than directing in worship—corresponds to this.

24 Seven priests are singled out as trumpeters (cf. 16:6). Blowing on silver trumpets was the one aspect of ceremonial music that had been legislated through Moses and was a function reserved for them (Nu 10:8). Jehiah is probably the gatekeeper Jeiel of vv.18, 21, and 16:5, though why he should be singled out for honor along with Obed-Edom is not explained.

25–26 The whole assembly, including the elders and commanders, sacrificed seven bulls and seven rams; that is, David personally was responsible for the offering up of just one animal of each of these kinds (cf. 2Sa 6:13). God is said to have "helped the Levites," i.e., they were not struck down, as Uzzah had been (13:10).

27–29 The "ephod" (GK 680) was a surplice, or cape, worn in worship (Ex 28:6; 1Sa 2:18). Beneath it David wore a robe of white linen—as did also the Levites—but in his enthusiastic devotion, dancing, and celebrating with all his might before the Lord, he seems to have removed an outer garment and uncovered himself in a way that his wife Michal considered "unkingly" (2Sa 6:20). David's uninhibited love for God stands in stark contrast to the rigid, unsympathetic attitude of this daughter of Saul (cf. 2Sa 6:21–23).

An evidence preserved in writing of the "shouts" (GK 9558) with which the ark was brought up to Jerusalem may be found in Ps 24. Composed by David, it could hardly have had a more fitting occasion for those cries of praise: "Lift up your heads, O you gates . . . that the King of glory may come in" (v.7; cf. also Ps 132:8).

16:1 The statement that "they," i.e., the qualified Levites, "presented . . . offerings," just as "they" constituted the ones who "brought . . . and set" the ark in its place, provides background for clarifying the words in the next verse about "David . . . sacrificing" (see also in 2Sa 6:13, 17). While each OT worshiper, according to the law of Moses, was expected to lead his own sheep to the sanctuary and slay it (Lev 1:3–5a; 3:2a), only the Aaronic priests were entitled to offer up the blood or other portions on the altar (1:5b; 3:2b, 5).

In addition to burnt offerings, there were "fellowship offerings." The latter not only symbolized atonement, as choice parts were burned in sacrifice on the altar, but also depicted the restored fellowship with God that comes as a result of the reconciliation. Most flesh from the fellowship offerings was eaten by the people themselves, sitting down, as it were, as guests at God's table, celebrating the restoration of their peace (fellowship) with him (Lev 7:15).

2 Though David's sacrifice was accomplished through the mediation of qualified priests, he still invoked God's blessing on the people (cf. v.43 and Solomon's similar act in 1Ki 8:55–60). Some of those matters often associated with priests—such as praying for blessings (Nu 6:24–26) or wearing linen robes and ephods (cf. 15:27)—were not necessarily restricted to the sons of Aaron.

3 The king's gifts to the people consisted of bread, eshpar (GK 882), and raisins. Eshpar occurs only here and in 2Sa 6:19. It may mean "a cake of dates," but the present contextual reference to the flesh of animals, as used in Israel's feasting, could favor a "portion of meat."

4 David's appointment of Levites to minister in music and praise to God marks a significant advance in the history of Israel's worship (cf. 15:16). His previous arrangements for music (15:16–21, 24, 27–28) had been devised for just the one occasion; but now a continuing service is envisioned (cf. 16:37–42). The initial experiment must have proved to be eminently successful! But David acted on divine command, conveyed through the prophets Nathan and Gad (2Ch 29:25). For with the ark permanently enshrined in Jerusalem (though cf. 2Ch 35:3), those Levites who had formerly been charged with its transport could now be reassigned to other appropriate duties, such as gatekeepers; and in particular the "singers" came to assume a leading role in Judah's public devotion. Their presence constitutes a distinctive stress within Chronicles.

5 The king's elevation of Asaph to be the chief musician, confirmed in v.37, denotes a shift away from the Levites' own choice of Heman as the leader, up to this point (see 15:17). No reason is given, though Asaph did represent the senior Levitical clan of Gershon (6:39–43). Personal ability may also have been a contributing factor, for Asaph and his descendants are listed as composers for twelve of the inspired OT psalms (Pss 50, 73–83). The name "Jeiel" represents "Jaaziel" in 15:18, 20.

6 Of the seven priestly trumpeters who participated in the procession into Jerusalem (15:24), only the sixth, Benaiah, to whom was added a Jahaziel, was permanently assigned to service before the ark; the others probably returned to their duties at the tabernacle, which remained still at Gibeon (see v.39).

7 This verse introduces a model psalm of thanksgiving that has, with only slight modifications, been taken over from the OT Psalter of the period, as follows: vv.8–22 = Ps 105:1–15; vv.23–33 = Ps 96; and vv.34–36 = Ps 106:1, 47–48. That the king "committed" (GK 5989) his poem "to Asaph" sheds light on the phrase found in so many of the psalm titles: "For the chief musician." What David composed, the Levitical musicians were to perform in worship.

8–12 After four introductory verses exhorting God's people to praise him, the call to "remember" (GK 2349) his "wonders" of old summarizes the message of Ps 105. This psalm, one of the OT's great surveys of the Lord's faithfulness, is a reminder that was particularly appropriate at this turning point in Israel's history.

13 One of David's few changes in the text of Ps 105 (v.6) occurs here, where he substitutes the name Israel for that of the grandfather, Abraham. He may have felt that his reference to the immediate ancestor of the twelve Hebrew tribes was more fitting on this national occasion.

14–17 The "covenant" (GK 1382) was God's legal instrument for the redemption of his people. Through it he graciously bequeathed an inheritance of reconciliation with himself to those who were its qualified heirs, i.e., those who met its condition of sincere faith in his promise (Ge 15:6; Heb 11:6). Though the instrument of redemption was first revealed in Eden to fallen Adam (Ge 3:15), it was confirmed to Noah (9:9) and to Abraham (1Ch 16:16) and his chosen seed (Ge 17:7; Ex 19:5–6; Gal 3:29) for a "thousand generations." Its ultimate accomplishment depended on the death of Jesus Christ, the divine testator (Heb 9:15–17), an event symbolized under the anticipatory older testament by the shedding of sacrificial blood (Ex 24:6–8; Heb 9:18–22).

18–22 The Hebrew patriarchs wandered without a home of their own; for though they had been promised Palestine, it was in fact only their descendants who received it (Heb 11:9): David's contemporary audience. The titles by which the patriarchs are described possess, at this early period, more generalized meanings than those they came to have later. They are called "anointed" (GK 5431) in the sense of being set apart by God's Spirit—a phrase elsewhere used specifically for prophets (1Ki 19:16), priests (Ex 29:7), and kings (1Sa 2:35), with whom the presence of the Spirit was symbolized by a visible anointing with oil, and ultimately for Jesus (Christ = Messiah = "Anointed One"; 1Sa 2:10; Ps 2:2; Ac 10:38).

The patriarchs are also called "prophets" (GK 5566), in the sense of being recipients of God's special revelation—a title later used specifically for those who proclaimed God's revealed will (cf. Ex 7:1–2). Abraham was thus designated a "prophet," at the time of God's special protection against Abimelech, the Philistine king of Gerar (Ge 20:7); others of the patriarchs did, however, make specific predictions (e.g., Jacob, Ge 48:19; 49:1). Psalm 105:16–45 then continues Israel's history on into the career of Joseph, the descent into Egypt, and the Lord's deliverance of the Hebrews in the Exodus, on the desert journey, and right up to the conquest of Canaan; but David now turns to another source.

23–26 With its appeal for "all the earth" to honor the Lord, Ps 96 identifies itself as one of a series of six liturgical hymns (Pss 95–100) stressing the Creator's royal majesty. A recurring and key phrase, quoted in 1Ch 16:31, is this: "The LORD reigns" (Ps 96:10, but also 97:1; 99:1). Such a theme was of course particularly relevant on this occasion, during which "the King of glory" (Ps 24:7–10) entered Jerusalem—and David quoted the entire psalm.

27–28 David's expression "in his [God's] dwelling place" represents a change from the original phrase in Ps 96:6, "in his sanctuary," appropriate enough for use before the tabernacle at Gibeon (1Ch 16:39), but less so before the ark was in its new location in the city of Jerusalem.

29–32 The idea of people coming "before him" (v.29) took on fresh reality with the arrival of the ark, over which the cloud of God's presence rested (Nu 7:89). All people are told to worship the Lord in (lit.) "an adornment of holiness." The NIV's "his holiness" adds an unwarranted pronoun and shifts the phrase into a characteristic of God rather than of his worshipers (cf. NIV note).

33 While earlier messianic prophecies had foretold our Lord's universal, millennial reign (Ge 49:10; Nu 24:17; 1Sa 2:10), these words—"he comes"—may be the first in all of written Scripture (though Job 19:25 may well have been spoken earlier) to set forth the doctrine of the glorious second coming of Jesus Christ.

34–36 Having quoted all of Ps 96, David concluded his model hymn with the opening and closing verses of Ps 106. Like Ps 105, with which he began, Ps 106 too is a historical psalm. It has less emphasis, however, on God's faithfulness and Israel's waywardness and its results, up through the period of the judges (106:34–47), truths still very much needed by those who had witnessed the fate of Uzzah.

The prayer "gather us and deliver us from the nations" (v.35) was particularly fitting in light of the third Philistine oppression, just ended (cf. 10:1; 13:2; 14:8, 16); this release may in fact account for David saying, "O God our Savior," whereas the original in Ps 106:47 had been, rather, "O LORD our God."

Midway in v.36 the quoted model hymn ceases and Ezra's narrative resumes, with the response of "all the people," those who were present then at that time with David. Yet what they responded is itself a continuation of the quotation from Ps 106:48, demonstrating that the quoted material belongs to the time of David and not simply to that of Ezra (cf. v.7).

The people's first exclamation, "Amen" (lit.,"firm, steady"; GK 589) could be rendered "True indeed!" Their second, "Praise the LORD" represents the familiar plural contracted form of Ps 106's halleluyah (i.e., "Hallelu Yah)."

37 A daily ministry, now before the ark, was fitting, since this holy object represented the continuing presence of God with his people. It was "the ark of the covenant," with its testamentary promise, "I am the LORD [Yahweh, 'the One who is present'; GK 3378; cf. Ex 3:12, 14] your God" (v.4; cf. v.15, or Ge 17:7–8).

38 Hosah had not been mentioned previously. He was another doorkeeper, though of the clan of Merari (26:10–11), compared to Obed-Edom of Kohath (vv.1, 4). Obed-Edom's father is also named for the first time and is not to be confused with Jeduthun (alternate name for Ethan) the chief musician (vv.41–42), both because Ethan belonged to the clan of Merari, and because the name as given here in the consonantal text is really Jedithun. Obed-Edom continued in his double post of both musician (v.5) and doorkeeper (cf. 15:21).

39–40 Zadok (see comment on 6:8), however, was sent back (cf. 15:11) to Gibeon to serve as high priest at the tabernacle, which continued to exist as Israel's primary sanctuary for sacrifice (v.40) till Solomon's construction of the Jerusalem temple (2Ch 1:13; 5:5). Abiathar, on the other hand, seems to have remained at the capital (cf. 27:34), which may account for David's double high-priesthood (18:16).

41–43 God's "love" (GK 2876; also in v.34) refers to his loyalty to the provisions embodied in the covenantal relationship (see comment on 19:2; cf. Ge 21:23; Ps 136:10).

5. Nathan's prophecy (17:1–27)

As indicated in the introductory analysis of chs. 11–20, the heart of 1 Chronicles is to be found in ch. 17. Its substance is drawn from 2Sa 7 and largely corresponds to it, as it sets forth the abiding significance of the person and work of David. Chronologically ch. 17 came after the termination of the wars chronicled in ch. 18 (cf. 17:8, and as explicitly stated in 2Sa 7:1); and it should be dated about 995 B.C.

The chapter contains three major sections. (1) David desired to erect a permanent temple for the ark, which was not granted (vv.1–6). (2) God promised that even though David could not build a house for him, the Lord would still build a house for the king (vv.7–15). Just as God had prospered David up to this point, so he would continue to prosper his kingdom. The next member of the dynasty would construct the temple (vv.11–12). Then, in what was eschatological time for David (NT times for us), his ultimate successor in this human dynasty would also be acknowledged as the Son of God (v.13); and in time to come, the Son of David would establish God's kingdom on earth (v.14). (3) The king praised God for such incredible grace (vv.16–27).

1 By quoting David's full statement, "the ark of the covenant of the LORD" (cf. 2Sa 7:2, simply, "the ark of God"), the Chronicler calls initial attention to the significance of this chapter within the history of covenantal thought (cf. v.12). Nathan the prophet had already been God's agent to guide David in organizing the Levitical musicians (cf. 16:4), and he is best known for how he would later rebuke David for his sin with Bathsheba (2Sa 12). Nathan aided Solomon in the latter's rise (1Ki 1:10–11) and recorded some of the historical sources on which Ezra was able to draw for his own work (1Ch 29:29; 2Ch 9:29).

2–3 In reply to David's inquiry about building a temple, Nathan did tell him to "do it." But this was his immediate, human reaction: unofficial, noninspired (God's word did not come to him till that night), and, as it turned out, wrong.

4 While 2Sa 7:5 had been content to record God's question, "Are you the one to build me a house?" Chronicles includes his strong prohibition: "You are not the one to build me a house." The reason, given only later (in 22:8; 28:3), lay in David's ruthless warfare (cf. 2Sa 8:2). Yet Chronicles preserves another addition over 2 Samuel: the Hebrew text says literally, "build me the house." The idea of there being such a house was legitimate, just that David was not the one to build it.

5–6 Historical precedent shows that since the days of the Exodus, God had not "dwelt in a house," except briefly in Eli's building at Shiloh (1Sa 3:3); and this had been destroyed by the Philistines after the first battle at Ebenezer (Jer 7:12).

7–9 For v.9, the context (cf. 2Sa 7:1) suggests, and the Hebrew permits, a past rather than a future rendering: "I have provided . . . and have planted them so that they have a home . . . and are no longer disturbed." God's words that the wicked do not oppress Israel "as they did at the beginning" serve as a reminder of the sufferings of the Hebrews in Egypt (Ex 1:13–14).

10–11 God's promise to "build a house" for David is a play on words: the king could not build God a house, i.e., a structure "of cedar" (v.6); but God would build him one, i.e., a dynasty of descendants ("offspring").

12 While God did not here employ the term covenant, what he revealed was one; and it is so designated subsequently (2Sa 23:5; Pss 89:3, 34; 132:11–12). This Davidic covenant was the sixth, and last, to be established in OT times (see ZPEB, 1:1007–10), the new covenant of Jer 31 not being established until NT times. God's plan had moved onward from the Edenic (Ge 3:15), Noachian (9:9), Abrahamic (15:18), and Sinaitic covenants (Ex 19:5–6), through the Levitical (Nu 25:12–13; cf. 1Ch 9:19), down to this revelation; and it involves three stages.

(1) God promised David a successor, the "one who will build" the temple, i.e., Solomon, an identification confirmed by God's words in v.11: "one of your own sons." (2) God promised to "establish his throne" as a continuing dynasty. (3) That throne would be established "forever," a feature made possible by Jesus Christ, who, as God's Son (see the next verse), is the only one to possess a rule that is endless (Lk 1:32–33); and in this lay David's own salvation (2Sa 23:5). As Messiah he would set up his kingdom, in human hearts, at his first coming (Da 2:44a; Lk 17:21), though its external realization over the world awaits his second coming (Da 2:44b; Lk 17:24).

13 This verse along with Ps 2:7, 12, is one of the major OT revelations on the deity of the Messiah. It foretells Jesus' being uniquely God's Son (Heb 1:5; cf. Ac 13:33; Heb 5:5), for it is not really applicable to Solomon (cf. 22:10) or to any other of David's more immediate successors (by some sort of "double fulfillment"). Jesus, however, combined in his own Person a perfect humanity and full deity (Mt 22:42–45; Php 2:9), so that he might, by the one, become an accredited substitute for sinful people in his death (Heb 2:17–18; 1Pe 2:24), and yet, by the other, be able to compensate infinitely for their sins and restore them to heaven and to God the Father by his resurrection (Jn 1:18; 14:6).

14–15 Unlike David's predecessor, Saul, whom God removed (v.13), Jesus would possess a permanent status over God's kingdom. Here again the Chronicler brings out more of the personal messianic character of God's words to Nathan (2Sa 7:16 had included only his speaking in the more impersonal terms of David's "kingdom" and "throne").

16 The king's sitting "before the LORD" suggests that he went to the tent that was enshrining the ark (16:1).

17–21 In the phrase "as . . . the most exalted of men" (v.17), the first word in the Hebrew is a rare noun meaning a "turn"; the correct rendering may be "the turn of mankind to come," i.e., "the generation to come." David was expressing his awe at God's favor, compared to his own lowly origin (v.7).

22–26 That Israel is the Lord's "people" and that he is "their God" (v.22) restates the central promise of the Lord's reconciling testament (cf. 16:15 and 37), found from Ge 17:7 to Rev 21:3.

27 David's conclusion is one of faith in God's words: claiming the immediate blessing and affirming its eternal outcome.

6. Conquests and administration (18:1–17)

The order of chapters in this part of Chronicles (cf. 18:1; 19:1) is based on the sequence found in 2Sa 8, which is topical rather than chronological. The subject of the chapter is twofold: David's wars of conquest—to the west, against Philistia (v.1); to the east, against Moab (v.2); to the north, against the Arameans of Syria (Aram; vv.3–11); and to the south, against Edom (vv.12–13)—followed by a descriptive survey of his administration (vv.14–17). The theme, twice repeated (vv.6, 13), is one of encouragement to all believers: that the Lord gave victory to David wherever he went.

1 The NIV's "In the course of time" actually indicates no more than a succession of topics. By strict chronology ch. 18 precedes ch. 17, and ch. 19 (introduced by the same phrase) likewise precedes ch. 18 (cf. v.3). David was now able to take the offensive and capture Gath, the most inland of the five Philistine cities (2Sa 8:1), which made it the one most threatening to Judah (20:6, 8; cf. 1Sa 5:8; 17:52).

2 Though the Chronicler does not seek to cover up David's acts of vengeance (cf. 20:3), he does omit the details about his harsh treatment of Moab (2Sa 8:2).

3 Zobah was an Aramean state of Syria lying northeast of Damascus and south of Hamath. The attempt of its king Hadadezer to "establish his control along the Euphrates" could refer to some early, eastward campaign but seems rather to be based on the situation in 19:16, his gathering of forces along this river, with the aim of recouping the losses that he suffered because of his first defeat by Israel (detailed in 19:6–15).

4 Seven thousand is probably the correct number for the "charioteers" (cf. 19:18) that David took captive (cf. 2Sa 8:4). To preserve the peace David took the strong measure of hamstringing most of the enemy's chariot horses.

5–8 The towns of Tebah (cf. NIV note to v.8) and Cun (called Berothai, 2Sa 8:8) lay in the Coele Syria valley between the Lebanons. The tribute that David gained (cf. v.11) contributed to the vast resources (outlined in 22:2–5, 14–15) that he furnished to Solomon

Major Covenants in the Old Testament

COVENANTS	REFERENCE	TYPE	PARTICIPANT	DESCRIPTION
Noahic	Ge 9:8-17	Royal Grant	Made with "righteous" (6:9) Noah (and his descendants and every living thing on earth—all life that is subject to man's jurisdiction)	An unconditional divine promise never to destroy all earthly life with some natural catastrophe; the covenant "sign" being the rainbow in the storm cloud
Abrahamic A	Ge 15:9-21	Royal (land) Grant	Made with "righteous" (his faith was "credited to him as righteousness," v. 6) Abram (and his descendants, v. 16)	An unconditional divine promise to fulfill the grant of the land; a self-maledictory oath symbolically enacted it (v. 17)
Abrahamic B	Ge 17	Suzerain-vassal	Made with Abraham as patriarchal head of his household	A conditional divine pledge to be Abraham's God and the God of his descendants (cf. "As for me," v. 4; "As for you," v. 9); the condition: total consecration to the Lord as symbolized by circumcision
Sinaitic	Ex 19-24	Suzerain-vassal	Made with Israel as the descendants of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and as the people the Lord has redeemed from bondage to an earthly power	A conditional divine pledge to be Israel's God (as her Protector and the Guarantor of her blessed destiny); the condition: Israel's total consecration to the Lord as his people (his kingdom) who live by his rule and serve his purposes in history
Phinehas	Nu 25:10-13	Royal Grant	Made with the zealous priest Phinehas	An unconditional divine promise to maintain the family of Phinehas in a "lasting priesthood" (implicitly a pledge to Israel to provide her forever with a faithful priesthood)
Davidic	2Sa 7:5-16	Royal Grant	Made with faithful King David after his devotion to God as Israel's king and the Lord's anointed vassal had come to special expression (v. 2)	An unconditional divine promise to establish and maintain the Davidic dynasty on the throne of Israel (implicitly a pledge to Israel) to provide her forever with a godly king like David and through that dynasty to do for her what he had done through David—bring her into rest in the promised land (1Ki 4:20-21; 5:3-4).
New	Jer 31:31-34	Royal Grant	Promised to rebellious Israel as she is about to be expelled from the promised land in actualization of the most severe covenant curse (Lev 26:27-39; Dt 28:36-37, 45-68)	An unconditional divine promise to unfaithful Israel to forgive her sins and establish his relationship with her on a new basis by writing his law "on their hearts"—a covenant of pure grace

Major Types of Royal Covenants/Treaties in the Ancient Near East

Royal Grant (unconditional)
A king's grant (of land or some other benefit) to a loyal servant for faithful or exceptional service. The grant was normally perpetual and unconditional, but the servant's heirs benefited from it only as they continued their father's loyalty and service. (Cf. 1Sa 8:14; 22:7; 27:6; Est 8:1.)

Parity
A covenant between equals, binding them to mutual friendship or at least to mutual respect for each other's spheres and interests. Participants called each other "brothers." (Cf. Ge 21:27; 26:31; 31:44-54; 1Ki 5:12; 15:19; 20:32-34; Am 1:9.)

Suzerain-vassal (conditional)
A covenant regulating the relationship between a great king and one of his subject kings. The great king claimed absolute right of sovereignty, demanded total loyalty and service (the vassal must "love" his suzerain) and pledged protection of the subject's realm and dynasty, conditional on the vassal's faithfulness and loyalty to him. The vassal pledged absolute loyalty to his suzerain—whatever service his suzerain demanded—and exclusive reliance on the suzerain's protection. Participants called each other "lord" and "servant" or "father" and "son." (Cf. Jos 9:6,8; Eze 17:13-18; Hos 12:1.)

Commitments made in these covenants were accompanied by self-maledictory oaths (made orally, ceremonially or both). The gods were called upon to witness the covenants and implement the curses of the oaths if the covenants were violated.

for making "the bronze Sea," etc. (cf. 2Ch 4:2–5, 18).

9–13 Instead of Abishai (cf. 11:20) overcoming the eighteen thousand Edomites (v.12), 2Sa 8:13 speaks of David's supreme leadership; and the title to Ps 60 names Joab (the senior commander, v.15; cf. on 11:6) as a conqueror of twelve thousand.

14–15 Within David's "cabinet" some of the civil officers seem to have followed the pattern of Egyptian administration. The post of Jehoshaphat the "recorder" (lit., "one who reminds"; GK 4654) corresponds to the Egyptian "chief of protocol," whose responsibilities included audiences and communications.

16–17 Shavsha (Seraiah, 2Sa 8:17), with no father listed, seems himself to have been foreign; his office was "secretary [of state]" (GK 6221). Benaiah (cf. 11:23), in contrast to Joab (v.15), who led the general Israelite militia, commanded David's standing force of professional, foreign troops: the Kerethites, a people connected with the Philistines (1Sa 30:14; Eze 25:16), probably Cretans, and the Pelethites, seemingly a shortened name for the Philistines themselves.

7. Victories over Ammon (19:1–20:3)

The climax of David's international struggles came in 995 B.C. (before the birth of Solomon, 2Sa 12:24) and arose out of two campaigns against the Ammonites. These people were related to the Hebrews (cf. v.1) and lived directly east of them in the portion of Transjordan that lies east of the Jabbok River (Dt 3:16), as it flows northward before bending west to enter the Jordan. A major teaching value to be found in 19:1–20:3 is summarized by Joab's words of trust and encouragement in v 13: "The LORD will do what is good in his sight."

1 On "in the course of time," see comment on 18:1. "The Ammonites" were descendants, by incest, of Abraham's nephew Lot (Ge 19:36–38). During the chaotic days of the Hebrew judges, they had been guilty of repeated incursions against the Israelite tribes to their west (Jdg 3:13; 10:7–9, 17–11:33; 1Sa 11:1); but they had been first repelled and then subdued by Saul (1Sa 11:11; 14:47).

2 Their late king "Nahash" would hardly have been the same oppressor who had precipitated Saul's elevation half a century earlier (1Sa 11:1) but may have been his son. The latter's relationship to David had been one of hesed (GK 2875), meaning not so much "kindness" as "loyalty" to covenanted treaties and their obligations (cf. 16:41). These may have had their origin in the common threat that both men faced in Saul, perhaps when David had been fleeing from him some twenty years earlier. One might compare the help that David received from the neighboring king of Moab (1Sa 22:3).

3–5 Hanun's shaving of David's emissaries is explained in 2Sa 10:4 as involving half their beards. For an Oriental this was an insult of the worst sort, and particularly after David's expression of faithful concern (v.2; cf. the vengeance in which it resulted, 20:3).

6 The quantity of silver paid out by Hanun for mercenary support amounts to over thirty-seven tons. The value, however, represents a unique, once-and-for-all payment, sent in desperation. "Aram Naharaim" occupied land between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers; this was area that provided reinforcements for the second Syrian (Aramean) advance (v.16). The Chronicler uses its more general name to include the states of Beth Rehob and Tob, mentioned in 2Sa 10:6, 8 (cf. Ge 36:37).

7 In the light of 2Sa 10:6, the total of 32,000 mercenaries seems to include foot soldiers and horsemen (cf. v.18) as well as charioteers. The same verse has 1,000 in the contingent from Maacah. Their gathering point was near "Medeba" in north Reuben in Transjordan (Jos 13:16), though why they selected this location southwest of the Ammonite border is not known.

8–9 Joab's battle with Ammon was finally engaged before the gates of "their [capital] city," i.e., Rabbah (v.15; 20:1), the modern city of Amman.

10–13 After appealing to his men to do their utmost for their people and their God (cf. 1Co 16:13), Joab in faith committed the outcome to the will of the Lord (cf. the same sort of balance that is stresses in one's spiritual salvation (Php 2:12–13).

14–15 Joab did not at this time follow up the victory by laying siege to Rabbah; it may have been too late in the year (cf. 20:1).

16 This regathering of Aramean forces beyond the Euphrates seems to provide the setting for 18:3.

17–18 In the light of 18:4, the Chronicles figure of 7,000 charioteers seems to be the original that lies behind the seven hundred in 2Sa 10:18. Likewise, Chronicles' identification of 40,000 as "foot soldiers" is the correct reading, as opposed to Samuel's "horsemen" (see NIV note), because the figure approximates the total of 20,000 plus 22,000 foot soldiers given in 18:4–5.

19 The "vassals" of Hadadezer included his client kings (2Sa 10:19).

20:1 Springtime marked the end of the rainy season and permitted the resumption of warfare. The Chronicler's statement that "David remained in Jerusalem" suggests to his readers, without having to retrace all the sordid details, what 2 Sa 11:2–27 records on David's shameful adultery with Bathsheba and the murder of her incorruptible husband, the king's hero Uriah (1Ch 11:41).

2 –3 Joab did, however, summon David to Rabbah in time for its capitulation (2Sa 12:27–29), so that his ruler was present to take the crown from the head of Ammon's national idol, Milcom (NIV note; cf. 1Ki 11:5, 33; Zep 1:5)—its very weight in gold ("about 75 pounds," NIV note) precluded any wearing of it by a person. The author of 2Sa 12:31 adds "work at brickmaking" to the labor with saws, picks, and axes.

8. Philistine wars (20:4–8)

Ezra's treatment of David's ascendancy (1Ch 11–20) concludes with the record of three incidents that occurred during battles with the Philistines. Even as the preceding section (19:1–20:3) had elaborated on one aspect of the survey of David's conquest (ch. 18)—namely, the Ammonite struggle, as the basis for the Aramean wars that were introduced in 18:3—so the present, brief section elaborates on David's Philistine wars and capture of Gath, which had been mentioned in 18:1 (cf. the references to Gath in 20:6, 8). The first two incidents are not pinpointed historically but also seem to belong to the period between the two initial Philistine offenses against David in 1003 B.C. (14:8–17) and the rest that God granted him from his enemies about 995 (17:8; 2Sa 7:1).

4 On "in the course of time," see comment on 18:1. "Gezer" may indicate the general location of the otherwise obscure place-name Gob (2Sa 21:18); the former identifies the border city the Philistines had retreated to after David's victories in his war for independence (cf. 14:16).

The champion "Sibbecai," from the Judean town of Hushah (4:4), was one of David's "Thirty" heroes (11:29) and the commander of his eighth corps (27:11). The Philistine "Sippai" ("Saph," 2Sa 21:18), whom he overcame, is traced back to the "Rephaites," an ancient people (Ge 14:5) noted for their large size (Dt 2:21). Except for those remaining in the kingdom of Og in Bashan, the Rephaites had generally died out by the time of Moses (Dt 3:11).

5 This second battle too took place in Gob (2Sa 21:19). "Lahmi" was brother to Goliath, the well-known victim of David's heroism (1Sa 17). But perhaps because of his unfamiliar and indeed unique name, a later copyist of the parallel passage in 2Sa 21:19 introduced a small but far-reaching corruption, as if Elhanan had killed Goliath himself. On the "weaver's rod," see comment on 11:23.

6–8 The use of the article with "Rapha" (also in v.8) suggests that this is not a personal, individual name, except perhaps in the sense of an eponymous ancestor of "the Rephaites" (v.4).

C. David's Latter Days (21:1–29:30)

1. The census (21:1–30)

After 995 B.C., about twenty years elapsed between the concluding events in David's rise to power (chs. 11–20) and the resumed narrative of deeds performed in the latter part of his reign, which occupies the balance of the book (chs. 21–29). The intervening period was one of crisis and personal failure on David's part, triggered by his sin of adultery with Bathsheba (2Sa 11). This in turn set off a chain reaction of crime: the king's murder of Uriah (ch. 11) and a series of similarly wanton acts on the part of Amnon (ch.13), Absalom (chs. 14–19), and even such less obviously motivated rebels as Sheba (ch. 20).

Since Absalom's revolt occupied a total of eleven years (2Sa 13:23, 38; 14:28; 15:7, variant reading), or about 990–979, 1 Chronicles brings us down to about 975. Here our Chronicler takes up his account with David's census (see also 2Sa 24). His reasons for a gap of this length are not difficult to surmise: little of what transpired during those two decades would encourage a postexilic Judah, before whom Ezra was seeking to portray a piety that characterized David at his best.

With the census (1Ch 21), however, a chain reaction of a different caliber was inaugurated. Despite its sinful inception, it provided the immediate setting for God's revelation of the site of his temple and for the preparation that ensued (ch. 22). This in turn leads into David's administrative arrangements, whether in matters of religious (chs. 23–26) or civil organization (ch. 27). First Chronicles concludes with a final charge from David that both Solomon and all Israel would continue faithful to their God (chs. 28–29). Events like these definitely were germane to the purpose of the Chronicler. Beyond the opening chapter, however, there is no direct parallel elsewhere in the OT.

For the events of ch. 21, Scripture presents us with no less than four explanations (see vv.1, 3). Yet however complex the motivation for Israel's census and for the disaster that followed, Ezra's record now serves a double function. On the one hand, the various aspects of David's repentance remain exemplary for readers up to this moment (cf. vv.8, 13, 17, and 24). On the other hand, the decision of God to establish his altar and temple at Moriah in Jerusalem have affected all history (cf. Rev 11:1); for this mountain became the focus of the Holy City (v.2), where his Son was crucified (v 8). And it will continue to affect history; for from this "city he loves" (Rev 20:9), he will someday rule the nations of earth (v.4; cf. Isa 2:2–4) and then eternally heal the dwellers of his new earth (Isa 65:17–19; Rev 21:1–2; 22:2).

1 For the first time in Scripture, the word "Satan" (GK 8477) appears without the definite article as a proper noun. He is still "the adversary" (as in Job 1–2; Zec 3:1–2), with his changeless malice toward God and human beings; but Satan has now become his name. David's numbering of his people was thus brought about, in the first instance, by the devil's hatred of God's people and of God himself (cf. Job 1:11; 2:5).

Yet 2Sa 24:1 goes deeper and shows that Satan, the instrument (cf. 1Ki 22:22–23; Job 1:12; 2:6), was actually being used to accomplish "the anger of the LORD . . . against Israel." That is, the disaster that was brought on because of the census served to punish the nation (1Ch 21:7) for her sins, including repeated revolts against God's anointed king, David. The last revolt under Sheba had terminated only shortly before (cf. the introductory discussion to ch. 21). Furthermore, there were God's ultimate and positive goals, ensuring that the results of it all would mean the establishment of his altar and temple (cf. above).

2–3 There was also the immediate, human factor—meaning David's own motivation—that was evil (vv. 7–8, 17) and, as Joab dared point out to the king, contributed to "bring guilt on Israel." A census was not in itself wrong (cf. the God-directed census in Nu 1 and 26). But on this occasion David seems to have ordered this because he was placing his trust in "multiplied troops" rather than in the promises of God (contrast 27:23 with Ps 30:6, the title of which indicates its composition at this time; cf. 22:1).

4 The route of Joab and his officers "throughout Israel" is outlined in 2Sa 24:4–6; and v.8 adds that it took almost ten months.

5 The total figures that they gathered require clarification in two directions. (1) In comparison with those given in 2Sa 24:9, Ezra's sum of 1,100,000 for all Israel is larger than Samuel's 800,000, which probably did not include the regularly organized army (note the lack of an "all" before "Israel") of 288,000; but his sum of 470,000 for Judah is a bit smaller than Samuel's 500,000, which may here simply be a round number. (2) On the basis of the noun that means either "thousands" or "chiefs" (cf. 7:3–4; 12:24), we should probably think in terms of a muster of 1,570 outstanding military figures and not necessarily of over a million and a half "men . . . who could handle a sword."

6–7 Joab's exemption of Levi from this census (the tribe was numbered in 23:3) had precedent, because of that tribe's special religious status (Nu 1:49–50). This fact may also explain his deliberate exclusion of Benjamin, since both Jerusalem (with God's ark) and Gibeon (with the tabernacle, v.29) lay within its borders (Jos 18:25, 28). We do know that his work was interrupted by God's "wrath [that] came on Israel" (1Ch 27:24), in this very Benjamite area (21:15).

8 David's confession resulted from his troubled heart or conscience (2Sa 24:10), perhaps pricked by Joab's rebuke.

9 "Gad" the "seer" had already counseled David, both before he became king (1Sa 22:5) and after (2Ch 29:25), and was later to compose one of the source documents for his reign that was used by Ezra (29:29).

10–12 The alternate punishments set before David were of approximately equal severity. God's instrument for executing the plague would be "the angel of the LORD." Compare the similar situations both before (1Sa 6:3–6) and after (2Ki 19:35). But while those cases may have involved the divine angel of the covenant (cf. Ex 23:20–21; Mal 3:1), presumably preincarnate appearances of Christ, this one apparently did not; it was simply an ordinary "angel."

13 The king's submission to the word of the Lord through his prophet is both commendable and sets apart Hebrew religion from the lack of such ethical restraint within paganism generally (cf. 11:3). David wisely chose punishment from God (a plague) rather than that from other people (an invasion).

14 Punishment as such, however, remained inescapable; and "seventy thousand men of Israel fell"—a tragically appropriate sentence on a king whose sin had been that of trusting in the numbers of his troops (see v.3).

15–16 David and his civic officials, "the elders," were already in penitence ("sackcloth"), perhaps on their way to the tabernacle at Gibeon (vv.29–30), when they saw the destroying angel with his drawn sword facing Jerusalem. But his hand was withdrawn (2Sa 24:16).

17 David's second confession (cf. v.8) is recorded more fully here than in 2Sa 24:17. It illustrates his willingness to accept full responsibility and to sacrifice himself for his people's sake. The latter he calls "sheep," and Scripture frequently compares leader and people with a shepherd and his flock (11:2; cf. Ps 23; Jer 23:1–4). But while the king was indeed to blame for having "sinned and done wrong," the plague in question was not entirely a case of an innocent nation suffering for the crimes of its leader.

18–22 The Chronicler omits Araunah's opening question (2Sa 24:21) and moves directly to David's words, which show his compliance with Gad's instructions to build an altar there on his threshing floor.

23 The "oxen" would have been present to pull the wooden "threshing sledges" over the wheat. The grain offering always had to accompany the sacrifices of flesh (Ex 29:40–41; Lev 23:18; Nu 15:4).

24 By refusing to present an "offering that costs me nothing," David confirmed the truth that God takes no pleasure in the man who yields only what involves no sacrifice. He requires of his followers a totally surrendered life (Ro 12:1; cf. Lk 21:1–3).

25 So David bought "the site"—which may have included the whole area of Mount Moriah—for 15 pounds of gold (cf. NIV note)—an enormous sum (cf. 2Sa 24:24, which notes a much smaller amount [20 ounces of silver] for the threshing floor itself).

26 God's answer of "fire from heaven on the altar" publicly attested his acceptance both of the king's repentance and of the altar site (cf. Lev 9:24).

27–30 Furthermore, the angel's sword was sheathed and the plague ceased (2Sa 24:25). On the tabernacle's contemporaneous location at Gibeon (v.29), see 16:39.

2. Temple preparations (22:1–19)

The Chronicler was vitally concerned to ensure support for the Jerusalem temple in his day (Ezr 7:15–17; 8:25–30, 33–34). No more fitting stimulus for dedication in this regard could then be found than in the example set by David when he made preparations for the construction of that temple; and this is the subject of 1Ch 22 (cf. also chs. 28–29). Ezra first summarized David's own efforts (vv.2–5) and then recounted the words of exhortation by which he privately encouraged Solomon to carry through in its building (vv.6–16); he publicly charged the leaders of Israel to assist his son in this task (vv.17–19).

Though no parallels to the chapter now appear in Scripture, Ezra must have been able to use sources that are no longer available for us today.

1 In view of the revelations of God's presence that occurred in the preceding chapter (cf. esp. 21:15, 26), David announced that his new altar on Araunah's threshing floor had become the designated place for Israel's burnt offerings, and that this site on Mount Moriah (2Ch 3:1) was in fact "the house of the LORD God," even though the building had yet to be erected. Such words therefore explain how the title to Ps 30 can simultaneously claim authorship by David and yet also be an occasion for its composition at "the dedication of the temple." That psalm does fit historically at this point (compare Ps 30:5–6 with David's attitudes and experiences in 1Ch 21).

2 The king began by drafting the resident "aliens" to work as stone cutters. This situation is attested by the existence of a cabinet post on corvée labor, held by Adoram (2Sa 20:24), and is confirmed by Solomon's similar arrangements later on (2Ch 2:17–18 and 8:7–9).

3 The king's provision of "a large amount of iron" reflects how conditions had changed during his time—known archaeologically as Iron Age I—because of the incorporation of iron-producing Philistines within the sphere of Hebrew control.

4 To handle the "cedar logs," Solomon was later forced to draft a considerable number of Israelites (1Ki 5:13–14), though foreigners were used for the stonework.

5 Nowhere does Scripture connect Solomon's age with some historically datable point. As a result we do not know exactly how young Solomon was about 975 B.C. After reigning forty years (2Ch 9:30), Solomon was succeeded by his son Rehoboam, then aged forty-one (12:13); and Solomon could well have had a one-year-old son at his accession in 970, if Solomon himself had been born about 990. This would make him twenty at the time. Furthermore, though David's relationship with Bathsheba dates from about 995 (cf. the introductory discussions to chs. 17 and 19), Solomon was apparently not the first son that she bore to David but the fourth (1Ch 3:5), which brings us once again to about 990 for his birth.

6–7 That the temple was to be built "for the Name of the LORD" means more than his reputation or honor; ultimately, it means his Person. Specifically, God's "Name" stood for the glory-cloud of his presence in the tabernacle or the temple (Dt 12:11; 2Ch 6:20).

8 The "word of the LORD" David referred to had been brought to him by the prophet Nathan, before Solomon's birth (17:4). But the king here first revealed why God had refused him permission to build the temple: he had "fought many wars" (stated again in 28:3). The point was not simply that warfare had preempted his energies (cf. 1Ki 5:3), but that it had polluted his hands with undue bloodshed. David had become guilty of excessive violence (e.g., in 2Sa 8:2). His explanation carries serious ethical implications for us today (Mt 5:9).

9 Though Solomon's succession was later disputed by his older brother Adonijah (1Ki 1:5–13, 24–25), he had been divinely favored, even before birth (2Sa 12:24–25); and he is here designated to "reign" over Israel, as David himself proceeded to acknowledge to Bathsheba on oath (1Ki 1:13, 30). God moreover promised Solomon a reign "of peace" (shalom; GK 8934). Fulfillment came by his having to engage in only one known battle (vs. Hamath, 2Ch 8:3).

10 In this verse David directly quotes from Nathan's prophecy in 17:12–14 (cf. 28:6). As predicted in the first clause, Solomon did "build a house" for God's name; and, as in the last, "the throne of his kingdom" did come to be established "over Israel forever." The middle clause, however, where God prophesies, "He will be my son," must he read in the light of a condition that was attached and that demanded a faithfulness that Solomon failed to achieve; it was, however, accomplished in Jesus Christ. David seems to have quoted the entire passage, including its middle part, so as to identify the more immediately relevant promises that both preceded and followed it in context.

11–13 David's blessing on his son, in its various aspects, set a pattern for subsequent benedictions. In v.11 he particularly invoked success for Solomon as he should "build the house" (cf. 28:10). In vv.12–13 David (harking back to Jos 1:7–8) emphasized how he should keep "the laws . . . that the LORD gave Moses."

14–16 The tremendous quantities of gold and silver that David provided add up to over forty thousand tons, a fabulous amount, with a far greater ancient purchasing value. This, together with smaller but related amounts given in 29:4, 7, constitutes the one place in Chronicles where its figures are large enough to justify invoking God's special providence to account for them.

17–19 David's goal, expressed here to the leaders of Israel, of bringing "the ark of the covenant . . . into the temple" was in fact accomplished in 2Ch 5:7; this act would mark the achievement of all his various efforts on its behalf, and on God's behalf, as so far described throughout chs. 13; 15–17; 22.

3. Levitical organization (23:1–26:32)

David's concern for the worship of God in the temple went beyond the material preparations that he made for the construction of its building, just described (ch. 22). Of even more lasting significance were the arrangements that he made for the organization of its ministering personnel, the Levites (chs. 23–26). Guided by the Lord through his prophets (2Ch 29:25), the king exercised his administrative genius to establish a system of procedures that helped maintain legitimate worship under his successors, that provided the operational framework for promoting the revival of Mosaic theocracy in the days of Ezra the Chronicler (see the introductory discussion to ch. 6), and that continued to meet the needs of God's worshiping people on into NT times (cf. 24:10 as reflected in Lk 1:5, 8).

In 970 B.C. (26:31; cf. v.1), David took a census of the male Levites aged thirty and above; and he found that they numbered 38,000 at that time. His fundamental idea was to divide the men of the tribe into four operational units (23:1–5). The remainder of ch. 23 pauses to review the Levitical genealogies (cf. ch. 6) by outlining the main clans and family groups (vv.6–23), and this is followed by a brief survey of their duties (vv.24–32). The four units are then enumerated: a main body of 24,000 were assigned "to supervise the work of the temple of the LORD" (ch. 24; cf. 23:4), and this chapter proceeds to describe how the priestly descendants of Aaron were organized into groups (23:6), as were also the nonpriestly Levites who assisted them (vv.20–31); 4,000 others were appointed as musicians (ch. 25); 4,000 worked as doorkeepers, under whom were incorporated a variety of positions such as the temple treasurers (26:1–28); and the remaining 6,000 "were assigned duties away from the temple, as officials and judges over Israel" (26:29–32). The priests, the musicians, and presumably the temple Levites as well, were specifically assigned to twenty-four different courses. These subdivisions provided a means for rotating them in service on a monthly basis.

1 David's full life is witnessed to by the fact that these events are dated in the fortieth, i.e., the last, year of his reign (26:31; 29:27); they are identified, indeed, as being his "last instructions" (23:27).

The process by which Solomon was then "made . . . king" is passed over in Chronicles. The unhappy details of his disputed succession (see 22:9; cf. 1Ki 1) and of the ruthless consolidation that followed on his recognition as ruler (1Ki 2) were common knowledge and contributed little to the purposes Ezra was seeking to achieve.

2–4 The Levites "thirty years old or more" were numbered, as in Moses' day (Nu 4:3, 23), but also those down to twenty years of age. The total of 38,000 has, like so many of the figures in Chronicles, been roundly criticized, but unnecessarily so. Under Moses in the desert, a more limited enumeration of the Levites—only those who were between the age of thirty and fifty, and who were able to do the work of transporting the tabernacle—had produced a sum of 8,580 (Nu 4:47–48); and the Hebrew tribes as a whole had averaged over 50,000 warriors each (1:46; 26:51). Under David the main Levitical body of 24,000 was divided into twenty-four monthly courses; and 1,000 on duty at any one time, considering the work, is not unreasonable.

5 The instruments the king "provided" exhibit another aspect of David's musical prowess, which was long remembered in Israel (Am 6:5).

6 The review of the genealogy of Levi, which extends from this point down through v.23, is paralleled by the listings in 6:16–30 and by those in 24:20–30. Minor variations exist in the spellings of some of the names and in other details.

7 The fact that the Gershonite "Ladan" is listed in first place connects him with Libni, which was the senior subclan of Gershon. No allusion is made to Libni's son Jahath (as in 6:20), since the purpose of ch. 23 is not that of providing a complete genealogy but rather of marking out those divisions within the clans of Levi on which the Davidic organization was based.

8 Jehiel, Zetham, and Joel were ancient Levitical patriarchs. They should not be confused with the division chiefs of David's day, as listed in 24:20–30 (cf. Jehdeiah, descended from the patriarch Shubael, v.20), though at certain points in ch. 24 only the patriarchal family-founders are listed, without the current chiefs (as in v.23).

9 Since the "Shimei" of this verse belongs to "the families of Ladan," he should probably be distinguished from the Shimei of vv.7 and 10, his great-uncle (after whom he seems to have been named), the brother of Libni (6:17).

10–11 By combining the senior Shimei's latter two families into "one assignment," or course, David secured nine Levitical courses organized out of the clan of Gershon: six from Ladan and three from Shimei.

12–14 As in Dt 33:1 and in the title to Ps 90, Moses is set apart as "the man of God." He ranks as perhaps the greatest human figure in the OT (Dt 34:10–12).

15–20 From the four sons of Kohath (not including the priestly descendants of Aaron, v.13), nine more courses are derived, though "the [Davidic division] chiefs" (NIV, "the first") are specified for only the first three.

21–22 The sons of Mahli's son Kish "married their cousins," the daughters of Eleazar. The property of the subclan of Mahli was thus preserved intact, according to Moses' regulation (Nu 36:6–9; cf. v.11); but this left it with only one course, of Kish.

23 The sons of Mahli's brother, Mushi, account for three more. So to bring Merari's courses up to six, and thus to gain a total for all Levi of twenty-four (nine, nine, and six), two more were probably derived from the four sons of the Merarite Jaaziah (24:27).

24–27 David's Levitical census actually extended to those "twenty years old or more" (cf. Moses' limit of thirty, v.3). Yet even Moses had later included in the tribe's assigned work force Levites down to the age of twenty-five (Nu 8:24); and David lowered it five years further. His reasoning may have been that with the permanent establishment of the tabernacle and the ark in Jerusalem, physical requirements for the service were no longer so demanding (v.26); or it may have been that he simply anticipated increasing needs in manpower for the construction and operation of the new temple.

28–30 "The bread set out on the table" was "the bread of the Presence" (cf. 9:32). On "the grain offerings," see 21:23. The daily services of praise by the Levites accompanied the regular sacrifices that were prescribed for every morning and evening and were offered up by the priests (Ex 29:38–39; Nu 28:3–8).

31 More elaborate sacrifices were required for the weekly sabbaths, for the beginnings of months, and for the annual feasts (Nu 28:9–29:39). The last named involved Israel's five set celebrations, the "appointed feasts" of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles (which was preceded by Trumpets and the Day of Atonement; cf. Lev 23). The first three were also designated pilgrimage feasts, for which the presence of every adult Israelite male was expected at the central sanctuary (Ex 23:14–17; Dt 16:16).

32 The author, Ezra, made it clear that the main body of the Levites were "under their brothers the [priestly] descendants of Aaron." They were to be the priests' helpers (v.28) in such matters as preparing the sacrifices and other matters of service and in maintaining the sanctuary, just as Moses had prescribed (Nu 3:6–9; 4:23–33).

24:1 Ezra now takes up the priests. This followed logically on his presentation concerning the Levites as a whole (ch. 23), of which they formed a part (v.13). The primary subject of the first nineteen verses of ch. 24 is how David organized the priests of his time into "divisions" or courses (GK 4713). Ezra does, however, grant this a priority in treatment, before he describes the corresponding set of courses for the rest of the Levites in vv.20–31.

2 The deaths of Aaron's two older sons, together with the reasons involved, are recorded in Lev 10:1–2.

3 The men who advised David in establishing the courses were official representatives of the branches of Aaron's two surviving sons: for Eleazar it was the high priest Zadok; for Ithamar, however, it was no longer Abiathar (as in 15:11), who was too old to be bothered with administrative details, but (as in 18:16) his son Ahimelech II (24:6), grandson of that Ahimelech I who had served as high priest prior to David's own kingship (1Sa 22:9–20; 23:6).

4 By dividing the priests into "sixteen" courses taken from the descendants of Eleazar and "eight" from those of Ithamar, David secured a total of twenty-four. This made possible either a system of monthly shifts or a system of fortnightly shifts once each year.

5 The king's impartiality is significant. Even though Eleazar, as senior surviving son, had been designated leader of the Levites and of those who worked in the sanctuary (Nu 3:32), and even though he had eventually succeeded his father Aaron as high priest (20:28), it was only the physical fact of the "larger number" (v.4) of priests who traced their ancestry to him that gave Eleazar numerical superiority in courses; those of Ithamar received an equal standing (cf. the even-handedness of Ex 28:1, 40–43).

6 Assignment was objective, by lot (v.7); it was witnessed by the king, Zadok, and Ahimelech—all three; and it was recorded by an unbiased (and otherwise unknown) non-priestly Levite, Shemaiah. Indeed, while the Hebrew of this verse is not completely clear, it would appear that the lots alternated between Eleazar and Ithamar for the first sixteen courses, with half of Eleazar's descendants having to accept the remaining eight.

7–19 Listings of the actual divisions appear not simply here but also at three later points in the OT, in postexilic times (Ne 10:2–8; 12:1–7; 12:12–21); and there are several incomplete references as well. The eighth course is specifically cited in the NT (cf. Lk 1:5); the names of the first, second, fourth, ninth, and twenty-fourth have been found in a manuscript at Qumran.

With the passage of time, some of the Davidic courses died out or had to be consolidated with others, and new ones were formed to take their places. At the first return from exile in 537 B.C., only four courses were registered: David's second, third (Ezr 2:36–39; Ne 7:39–42), fifth (if Pashhur had come to represent the older Malkijah; cf. 9:12 and Ne 11:12), and sixteenth. By 520 twenty-two were again operative (Ne 12:1–7), but only half of them were the courses as originally organized by David.

Jehoiarib (v.7), who received the first assignment, headed the course that later produced the Maccabees (1Mc 2:1; 14:29). The seventh course, of Hakkoz (v.10), is documented down into the days of the Maccabees (1Mc 8:17). The eighth, Abijah, was the one under which Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, performed his priestly ministry (Lk 1:5). The family of the seventeenth course, Hezir (v.15), was prominent in intertestamental times; and the name appears on one of the major tombs in the valley to the east of Jerusalem.

20 The phrase "the rest of the descendants of Levi" identifies the bulk of the Levites, who were not descended from Aaron and who served as temple assistants. Verses 20–31 proceed to describe their allocation into divisions that corresponded to the priestly courses, just listed. For some reason the nine divisions of the clan of Gershon (23:7–11) are not discussed. The next nine (24:20–25) correspond to the family groups that arose from Levi's second son Kohath, through his four sons, Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel (23:12–20). For each of their courses, Ezra also listed the name of the man who served as division chief during the time of David—e.g., for "Shubael" the chief was Jehdeiah—except for the four courses of Hebron, the names of whose Davidic chiefs may simply not have been available to Ezra when he was writing.

21–30 For the clause "Isshiah was the first [GK 8031]," we should read, "Isshiah was the chief" or "leader." "Shelomoth" (v.22) is a variant of the name "Shelomith" (23:18). The last four courses listed for the clan of Merari (vv.29–30) correspond to the four Merarite family divisions as described in 23:21–23, though the only chief's name to appear is that of Jerahmeel, representing in David's day the Mahlite group of Eleazar and Kish, which had been consolidated into one (cf. 23:22). Two other courses, however, should probably be assigned to the groups descending from Jaaziah (cf. 23:23). Jaaziah is stated to have been a Merarite (24:27) and yet is distinguished from Mahli and Mushai, the actual sons of Merari (v.26). He may have been a later member of the clan, the numerical growth of whose offspring had reached such proportions that by the time of David they achieved separate recognition among the Levitical courses.

31 The subject of the clause "they also cast lots" must be the chiefs of the divisions of the nonpriestly Levites (cf. vv.20–30). The stated correspondence of their method of organization with that of "their brothers the descendants of Aaron" favors a similar division of their followers into twenty-four rotating courses, even though not spelled out, as it was for the latter.

25:1 Chapter 25 concerns David's organization of the four thousand Levitical musicians (23:5) into courses of service that correspond to those of the priests and temple Levites (ch. 24). Division heads for the musicians consisted of "the sons of Asaph, Heman and Jeduthun," the chief musicians who belonged, respectively, to the Levitical clans of Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. David had commissioned them some thirty years earlier to minister before the ark in Jerusalem (16:4–7, 37, 41–42). Their service, moreover, is identified as a form of "prophesying" (cf. Heman's description as "the king's seer," v.5). The association is legitimate. On the particular musical instruments, see comments on 15:16. It was with specific reference to the Levites who performed on these instruments that God, through Nathan and Gad, gave David his instructions for their designated stations (2Ch 29:25).

2 Asaph "prophesied" (GK 5547) to a degree beyond that of simply recreating the hymns of others, as directed "under the king's supervision." Asaph and his descendants were directly inspired to compose at least twelve of the canonical psalms (50; 73–83; cf. 1Ch 16:5).

In Jerusalem today entertainers dress in ancient garb and play replicas of ancient instruments, such as the harp.

3 Jeduthun (as in 9:16; 16:41–42), also called Ethan (see 6:44), was twice singled out in titles to the psalms as the chief musician responsible for the public presentation of King David's compositions (Pss 39; 62).

4 The name of the Kohathite musician Heman's fourth son, Shubael, of the subclan of Izhar, is not to be confused with the Kohathite course of the same name but drawn from the senior subclan of Amram (23:16; 24:20).

5 Heman's status as "seer" received further witness, if he was perhaps the inspired composer of some of twelve other psalms, which were written by "the sons of Korah" (Pss 42–49; 84–85;87–88), of whom he was one (1Ch 6:33, 37). God's blessing Heman with "fourteen sons" would be, to the Oriental mind, nothing short of a doubly perfect heritage of power. The mention of his "three daughters" reminds us that women shared in musical services (cf. Ps 68:25).

6–8 The singers "cast lots" to determine without prejudice the arrangement of the twenty-four courses, serving under the sons of Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun. Yet all took part, whether "teacher" (GK 1067), probably referring to the 288 skilled musicians of v.7 (twelve per course), or "student" (GK 9441), which suggests that all 4,000 of the Levitical musicians were involved in the allocation.

9–31 As it worked out, the third, second, and fifth courses did go, respectively, to Asaph's three oldest sons.

26:1 The first twenty-eight verses of ch. 26 describe King David's third unit of Levites (cf. the introductory discussion to ch. 23), i.e., the 4,000 "gatekeepers" (23:5; cf. 9:19; 15:21; GK 8788). These were the temple guards (vv.1–19); and with them were included certain other officials, such as treasurers, who were responsible for the physical operation of the sanctuary (vv.20–28). The temple itself had not yet been built; but the king seems to have made these arrangements in anticipation, while the actual casting of lots "for each gate" (v.13) may have come later, after the structures were completed. God's assignment here to "businessmen" suggests something of the importance he attaches to each person's part in the kingdom, material and spiritual.

The Chronicler had already identified two groups of gatekeepers, appointed by David when the ark was first brought to Jerusalem (16:38); and a number of later listings occurred as well, either shortly before the Exile (9:17–29) or after (Ezr 2:42; Ne 11:19; 12:25). A remarkable persistence is exhibited in the names of some of the Levitical gate-keeping families. An example appears in the first and leading group, of (Me)shelemiah (vv.1, 14), though also cited simply as Shallum (9:17, 19 [though cf. v.21]; Ezr 2:42) or Meshullam (Ne 12:25).

The name "Asaph," father of Kore, is an abbreviation for Ebiasaph, who was a son of the rebellious Kohathite, Korah (cf. 6:22; 9:19). He should therefore not be confused with David's contemporary Asaph, the more famous chief musician, who belonged to the clan of Gershon.

2–8 Obed-Edom (v.4) was another Kohathite descendant of Korah, who is best known for the divine blessing that he received for having faithfully cared for the ark, following the death of Uzzah (13:13–14). Though he had gained appointment as a Levitical musician, he continued also to maintain his status as a doorkeeper (cf. 15:21; 16:38). In the thirty years since the ark first came to Jerusalem, the number of those associated with Obed-Edom exhibited a net decrease of six, down to sixty-two (cf. 16:38).

9 Yet with the 18 "sons and relatives" of Meshelemiah, plus 13 more of Hosah (v.11), the total number of hereditary leaders for the sanctuary guards totals 93. By the time of Jerusalem's fall in 586 B.C., the figure had risen to 212 (cf. 9:22), though the number of Levites available to serve under them may have become much less than the 4,000 present in David's day (23:5).

10–11 The king had commissioned Hosah of Merari to be a gatekeeper along with Obed-Edom (16:38).

12–13 The purpose of the "lots" that "were cast" was to assign the gatekeepers to locations about the sanctuary, not, at this point, to determine periods for their rotation, as had been the case for the priests, temple Levites, and musicians (chs. 24–25).

14 "Shelemiah" (cf. NIV note) represents an abbreviated form of the name Meshelemiah (vv.1–2, 9). Together with his son Zechariah, he and his associated leaders received responsibility for two of the gates, east and north, leaving one each for Obed-Edom and Hosah.

15 Because the palace complex lay to the south of the Mount Moriah sanctuary, some have questioned the possibility of a south gate. Most of the palaces, however, were erected after David's time (1Ki 7:1–12); and even then their presence would seem to suggest the need for such a gate, for both the rulers and the people (Eze 46:9–10). Obed-Edom was honored with this assignment toward the south and its palaces (cf. 15:21).

16 The "Shalleketh Gate" is known only to have faced west and to have been located on the "upper [or ascending] road," probably one coming northward up through the Tyropoeon Valley from the lower city to the higher elevation of Mount Moriah. The word "Shalleketh" itself is a proper noun. "Shuppim" is not otherwise identified, but his association with Hosah suggests that he may have been another leading gatekeeper from the clan of Merari.

17 Because the east gate was the main one, six guards were assigned to it, as compared with four to the north (and to the other directions). This gave Meshelemiah ten guard posts.

18–19 With Hosah's four posts at the west gate and two at the "court" (a term of uncertain meaning, but probably denoting a colonnade or court), his group of six stations yields a total of twenty-four guard posts that were assigned by lot (cf. chs. 24–25).

20–21 The gatekeepers' positions of trust (see 9:22) included two major treasurerships: the one over the treasuries of the temple, with their offerings and valuable equipment (cf. 9:28–29), and the other over the treasuries of dedicated objects (vv.23–28). The former were placed in the charge of "Jehieli," which is an adjectival form meaning "Jehielites" (the group of Jehiel). This identifies the Gershonite course number 1 of temple Levites.

22 The treasurers chosen from "Zetham and . . . Joel," which are Gershonite courses numbers 2 and 3 (23:8), are then called "sons of Jehiel"; for the leadership was recognized as pertaining to the senior branch.

23–24 The latter treasuries were placed under the care of Levites chosen from the clan of Kohath and, particularly, from within its four listed subclans, from the "Amramite" sons of Moses. These belonged to the courses numbers 10 ("Shubael") and 11 ("Rehabiah").

25 In David's day the individual treasurer for the dedicated objects was from Rahabiah, i.e., "Shelomoth" (instead of "Shelomith," NIV). His name is not to be confused with Shelomoth, Gershonite course number 4 of the temple Levites (23:9), or with Shelomith, Kohathite course number 12, from the subclan of Izhar (23:18; cf. 24:22).

26–28 Examples of "the things dedicated by King David" (v.26) are cited in 18:11 and 2Ch 5:1.

29 The latter four verses of ch. 26 describe David's fourth and last major operational unit of Levi, the six thousand external officials and judges (23:4). Moses himself had first directed that the Levites, who would be responsible to teach the Word of God (Dt 33:10), should perform the corresponding function of interpreting it in judgment (Dt 17:9; cf. 2Ch 19:8–11). These officers were then drawn primarily from the second and third subclans of Kohath, namely Izhar and Hebron. On the Izharite Kenaniah, King David's "head Levite," see 15:22.

30–31 Among the Hebronites, Hashabiah is probably that son of Kemuel who served as David's "officer over the tribe of Levi" (27:16–17); and Jeriah identifies the senior course number 13, belonging to the subclan of Hebron (23:19). These two, between them, accounted for 4,400 (1,700 plus 2,700, v.32) of the 6,000 Levitical judges.

32 The statistic that 2,700 Levites maintained the laws of "God and . . . the king" among the tribes west of the Jordan (v.30) seems strange but indicates the importance of the district of Gilead.

4. The civil organization (27:1–34)

Having outlined David's religious organization (chs. 23–26), the Chronicler adds ch. 27 on his civil arrangements. The year 970 B.C. had constituted a high-water mark in Israel's political experience; and its splendor was a far cry from the impoverished condition of the Jewish subprovince that existed in Ezra's day (cf. Hag 2:16–17; Zec 14:10). But even though it could have had little organizational relevance for the returned exiles in 450—and even less for us today—this rehearsal of past glories must have thrilled Ezra's discouraged people with the truth that tangible political results are included in God's decree for his faithful servants (cf. Rev 2:26).

This chapter surveys three aspects of the Davidic regime: its military system of twelve army corps, each with its own commanding general and twenty-four skilled chiefs (cf. v.1), who were committed to a term of active duty one month each year (vv.1–15); the ethnic organization of twelve listed Hebrew tribes (cf. v.17) in their various geographical regions, each with its responsible officer (vv.16–24); and the royal administration, including both the central "cabinet" executives and the overseers of the king's properties in the field (vv.25–34).

1 A significant key to our understanding of these first fifteen verses appears in the Chronicler's introductory emphasis on the "commanders of thousands." When the verse concludes by referring to each "division's 24,000 men" (there is no word for "men" in the original), the word for "thousand" (GK 547) may indicate "chief" (who could command a thousand troops) rather than numerical "thousands" (cf. 7:3–4, and the stress in 27:3 on leaders of "all the army officers for the first month"). For while the idea of a national militia of 288,000 organized into twelve corps of "24,000 men" each is reasonable enough (cf. over 600,000 in Moses' day, Ex 12:37; Nu 1:46; 2:32; 11:21; 26:51), the alternative rendering of "24 chief men" (throughout vv.1–15) has two advantages: negatively, it relieves the capital of the congestion of some 48,000 rotating troops, who, literally, "came in and went out month by month" (NASB); and positively, it would allow the king to keep in touch with his military leaders.

2 Each "lieutenant general" who commanded one of the twelve army corps was a distinguished military figure in his own right and is cited in the roster of David's heroes (11:11–47; cf. 2Sa 23:8–39), though with occasional variations in spelling and with facts of family information added here. "Jashobeam" was the first of "the Three" great champions (11:11).

3 Jashobeam's ancestor "Perez" was the fourth son of Judah and founder of its major clan.

4 "Dodai" was the father of Eleazar, the second of "the Three" (see 11:12). "Mikloth was the leader," or, as we might say, executive officer, for this second corps.

5–6 The exploits of "Benaiah" son of Jehoiada the priest (see 11:22–25; cf. 12:27–28) elevated him to the leadership of David's Cretan guard (see 18:17). This probably explains why "his son Ammizabad" exercised actual command over the third corps. On Benaiah's position in respect to "the Thirty," see 11:25 and the comments on 11:15 and 12:4.

7 Holding the title of commander of the fourth corps was Asahel, the first man to be named in David's legion of honor, which made up "the Thirty." "His son Zebadiah was his successor," due to Asahel's untimely death at the hands of Abner (see 11:26).

8 Over the fifth corps was "Shamhuth the Izrahite." This defining adjective really means "of Zerah," the other leading clan of Judah (cf. v.3 and the equivalent term "Zerahite," vv.11, 13). His name appears third among the Thirty (11:27).

9–15 The remaining seven generals were selected from among the next nine members of the Thirty (11:27–31). "Heldai," commander of the twelfth (27:15), was a descendant of Othniel, the first Hebrew judge (Jdg 1:13; 3:9–11).

16–17 While most of the tribes of Israel had one outstanding individual chosen to be the ethnic "officer" (vv.16–25), two were appointed for Levi: the high priest "Zadok," to represent its Aaronic or priestly branch (cf. 6:8; 12:27–28; 16:39), and "Hashabiah," for the remainder (see 26:30–31). Manasseh also had two officers, corresponding to its two regional halves, west (v.20) and east (v.21) of the Jordan. The tribes of Gad and Asher remain unlisted, either because the names of their tribal officers were not available to Ezra, or because they were dropped from the text by later copyists' mistakes.

18–20 Judah's representative, Elihu, is called "a brother of David" (v.18). This could possibly identify the unnamed brother born between Ozen and David; but it then becomes difficult to explain why his name was not mentioned in 2:15, if he did survive (cf. 2:15). Elihu may actually have been a more distant "brother" (= relative); or the name might be a variant for Jesse's oldest son, Eliab (2:13).

21–22 The tribal officer for Benjamin was "Jaasiel," a "son of Abner," who had commanded the troops of his nephew King Saul and had been the power behind Saul's son Ish-bosheth (26:28; cf. 8:33 and 11:2).

23 The Lord's promise "to make Israel as numerous as the stars" dates back to Abraham (Ge 15:5; 22:17; cf. 12:2; 13:16), over a thousand years before David. The king, therefore, did not order a total numbering of Israel (including minors); for that might have seemed to cast doubt on the prophecy. He did, however, sinfully decree a census of the men of fighting age, apparently through a lack of faith in God's protection of his kingdom (cf. 21:3).

24 The Hebrew of this verse says simply that Joab "began to count but did not finish."

25–32 In the remainder of the chapter, with its list of royal administrators, Azmaveth must have had charge of the central stores in Jerusalem, which contrasts with Jonathan's similar post "in the outlying districts."

The "western foothills"(v.28) constituted the piedmont area between the Philistine coastal plain and the Judean hill country. The king depended on his personal properties in all the areas such as these, rather (as far as we can tell) than on taxes, to support his growing administration. A concluding list of major counselors (v.32) supplements the earlier outlines of David's cabinet as presented in 18:15–17 (cf. 2Sa 8:15–18; 20:23–26).

33 Hushai's post of "king's friend" (cf. 2Sa 15:37) may have begun on an informal and personal basis; but it became an official advisory position (cf. 1Ki 4:5). Ahithophel was the ill-fated "counselor" who deserted David for his son, the rebel Absalom (2Sa 15:12, 31; 16:20–23), but whose advice was subverted by Hushai (15:32–37; 17:1–16).

34 After his suicide (17:23), Ahithophel "was succeeded by Jehoiada," son of the commander Benaiah (cf. 27:5); he was also the grandson of his namesake, the militant priest (see 12:27–28).

5. Final words (28:1–29:30)

The occasion for the final chapters of 1 Chronicles is a continuation of what was introduced in ch. 23: the assembling by the king of the leaders of Israel (23:2 = 28:1 and 29:1). The date is still 970 B.C. (26:31), and the subject is a final portion of "the last instructions of David" (23:27). The king's purpose has been not simply to organize the Levites on a permanent basis (chs. 23–26), but also to arouse the whole nation to the momentous task of erecting God's temple in Jerusalem (cf. 22:6, 11, 19). Now David once again charged the people (28:2–8) and his son Solomon (vv.9–10) to consecrate themselves to this holy effort. David then presented his son with the inspired, written plans for the temple (vv.11–19) and encouraged him for the work that lay ahead (vv.20–21). He turned also to the nation, represented by its assembled leaders, and urged on them an all-out campaign of giving for the building (29:1–5). They rose to the challenge (vv.6–9), and David praised the Lord for their devotion (vv.10–22). Solomon was then confirmed on the throne of Israel by a second ceremony of anointing (cf. v.22), and David passed on to his eternal reward (vv.22–30).

1–2 On the king's previous desire to build a temple, see 17:1–4. The structure is here identified as "a place of rest for the ark" (Ps 132:8, 14; i.e., a more permanent one than the tent in which it had been kept heretofore, 1Ch 16:1) and as God's "footstool" (Ps 132:7; La 2:1). The latter term points specifically to "the place of atonement" or "mercy seat" (v.11; i.e., the golden cover of the ark, over which the glory-cloud of God's presence was enthroned; Ex 25:20–22; 2Sa 6:2).

3 David's desire to build the temple, however, had been denied because of his excessive bloodshed (cf. 22:8). The king's public explanation here corresponds to what he had already told Solomon privately (22:7–16).

4 David's statement that God "chose me from my whole family to be king over Israel forever" must refer, not to him personally, but to his "family," i.e., his dynasty (cf. vv.5, 7), which would culminate in Jesus Christ, who would reign forever (17:14). The divine choice had been revealed through a process of progressive elimination: from the whole of national "Israel," through the tribe of "Judah," down to the Davidic "family" in particular (Ge 28:14; 35:10–11; 49:10; 1Sa 16:1–3; 1Ch 17:16–17, 23–27). Compare its earlier stages of clarification: from "the seed of woman," through Noah and Shem, to Abraham (Ge 3:15; 6:17–18; 9:26; 12:1–3).

5 Yet, in a deeper sense, what David acknowledged was not his own kingship but "the kingdom of the LORD over Israel." He, and all of earth's rulers, are but vice-regents, deputies who act as representatives of God to uphold his standards (29:23; 1Sa 12:14; Ro 13:1–6).

6–8 Solomon did build God's "house" (cf. 2Ch 5:1), but as far as being "established" (GK 3922) or being "chosen" (GK 1047) to be God's "son" is concerned, v.7 states an explicit condition: "if he is unswerving in carrying out my commands and laws"—which Solomon was not (1Ki 11:1–11). This brought about the admonition in v.8. Moreover, between God's words "Solomon ... will build my house" and "I have chosen him to be my son," the full prophecy, through Nathan, had originally included an intervening statement that shifted the point of reference beyond Solomon to the more distant future, i.e., "and I will establish his throne forever" (1Ch 17:12). That is, the fulfillment of true sonship to God the "Father" was not achieved by Solomon (cf. 22:10); it was an ideal that was actualized only in Christ.

9–10 David's appeal to his son to serve God with his whole heart and a "willing mind" parallels his similar final admonition recorded in 1Ki 2:2–4.

11 The Hebrew phrase underlying the words "the place of atonement" is literally "the house of the atoning cover" (or of the "mercy seat"; cf. v.2). It denotes the room that housed the ark of the covenant, designated in the tabernacle as "the most holy place" and in the temple as the "inner sanctuary" (2Ch 5:7, 9).

12–18 "The plans of ... the temple" were directly revealed to David by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit (cf. v.19), even as those for the tabernacle that preceded it had been given to Moses (Ex 25:9, 40; 27:8). The major pieces of its furnishings (vv.14–18) were symbolic of the great truths of God's salvation; and some—e.g., the altar, sea, ark, and even certain of the priestly garments—typified the atoning sacrifice, moral purity, incarnate presence, and holiness of Jesus Christ (Heb 8:5; 9:8–12, 23–24).

Ezra referred to "each table" (v.16) because, in contrast to the single table of bread of the Presence (9:32) made for the Mosaic sanctuary (Ex 37:10), the Solomonic would have ten of them (2Ch 4:8).

Since the Lord could poetically be said to ride on cherubim as on a chariot (Ps 18:10; Eze 1), they are here designated simply "the chariot" (v.18). The Chronicler's reference is probably not to the small golden cherubim that formed part of the ark's holy cover, which had been made long before, but rather to those larger wooden but gold-plated cherub-angels of the inner temple, which were to "shelter the ark" as a whole (2Ch 3:10–13). They emphasized the real presence of God in the temple.

19 Because the words "he gave me understanding" have no "and" before them in the Hebrew but are connected with the first part of the verse rather than its latter part, we should preferably read: "the LORD gave me understanding in writing." David was saying that not only were the temple plans revealed by God (v.12), but that they were given to him in written form from God, to be handed to Solomon (v.11), an ultimate testimony to their divine character.

20–21 David's final charge to Solomon (cf. vv.9–10; 22:11–16; Pss 27:13–14; 31:23–24), that he should "be strong and courageous" because the Lord would "not fail ... or forsake" him, reflects the stirring charges of Moses to Joshua (Dt 31:7–8, 23), and of the Lord himself (Jos 1:5–9,18; cf. 1Co 16:13).

29:1–3 David had expressed concern before about Solomon's youthful inexperience and about his own need to compensate for this by preparing materials for the temple (v.2; cf. 22:5 and 14). The "stones of various colors" (v.2) were probably mosaic pebbles. "Over and above" (v.3) the great amounts he had already prepared (cf. 22:14), David next contributed his personal treasures.

4 Israel's finest gold was imported from "Ophir" (cf. 2Ch 8:18). This amounted to about 110 tons of gold and 260 tons of silver.

5 The king's appeal for each giver to "consecrate himself" (lit., "to fill his hand"; GK 3338 & 4848) was a technical phrase used to describe ordination to the priesthood; and Scripture, significantly, places the act of giving on this same level of devotion.

6–7 The "daric" was a Persian gold coin, first issued by Darius I in the century before Ezra; in David's day this figure—the equivalent of about two and one-half talents—would have represented the corresponding weight in small pieces of the precious metal. The weight of gold contributed by David's leaders comes to about 190 tons, and there were about 375 tons of silver. David's example (v.4) thus incited a gift on the part of his officers that was half again as large as his own. Since it was a rarer commodity then than it is today, 3,750 tons of iron are also mentioned. The total of just the silver and gold adds up to an enormous sum by contemporary values. While the sum is only one twenty-fifth of the quantity tabulated in ch. 22, it still amounts to so much, particularly in ancient purchasing power, that it too should be recognized as the other large figures in Chronicles; it is to be accounted for through an act of divine providence. (cf. 22:14).

8–9 On "Jehiel" and course number 1 of "the Gershonite" temple-Levites, see 26:21. A "willing response" to the needs of the Lord's worship produced great rejoicing on the part of both the king and the people; and, still today, God loves cheerful givers (2Co 9:7).

10 David's reaction to his people's devotion was to praise the Lord (vv.10–20). The phrase "our father Israel" here signifies the patriarch Jacob (Ge 32:28); he too (cf. v.15) had had occasion to praise God for his goodness (Ge 32:10; 33:11). The Hebrew word order could suggest divine fatherhood—"The LORD, God of Israel, our Father"—rather than a patriarchal characteristic; but see v.18.

11 This verse supplies the conclusion to the Lord's Prayer: "For thine is the kingdom" (Mt 6:13, KJV).

12–19 The truth that "everything" we have "comes from" God is the foundation for the doctrine of stewardship. Its basis is this: since our property is his (Ps 24:1), and since we hold it only temporarily and in trust (1Ch 29:15–16), it should therefore be used for him (Lk 17:10).

20–21 When Ezra spoke of the "sacrifices in abundance for all Israel," he probably intended fellowship offerings, the one major category of sacrifice in which all the worshipers participated, feasting as guests around the table of the Lord (cf. v.22 and 16:1).

22 The "great joy" of those at this gathering, particularly in respect to Solomon's being "acknowledged" (GK 4887), is reflected also in 1Ki 1:40. By stating that David's son was acknowledged for "a second time," the Chronicler makes no attempt to conceal but rather recalls to his readers the well-known facts that he does not recount about Solomon's first induction to the throne. This had been precipitated by the attempt of his older half-brother Adonijah to displace him (1Ki 1:25, 39). Such confirmatory rites, even to the point of reanointing, had value, particularly in cases of disputed succession (cf. 1Sa 10:1, 24; 11:14–15; 16:13, 2Sa 2:4; 5:3).

The position Solomon acceded to is here defined as that of "ruler" (v.22; GK 5592) or "leader" (lit., "a conspicuous one"). It was a characteristic title among the early sovereigns of Israel (1Sa 9:16; 13:14; 25:30; 1Ch 5:2; 11:2; 17:7). Zadok too (cf. 6:8; 16:39) was reanointed, though for him it was to the position of sole high priest, his previous colleague Abiathar having been disqualified in connection with Adonijah's plot (1Ki 1:7; 2:26).

23–30 In his concluding summary of David's reign, the Chronicler itemizes those aspects of his success that had the greatest appeal to Oriental thought: "long life, wealth and honor" and a "son" who "succeeded him," which form a not inappropriate incentive for seeking the blessing of God in Occidental thought as well. First Kings, unhappily, adds specific features to David's final characterization that are of a less complimentary nature (1:1–4, 15; 2:5–6, 8–9).

Ezra's closing reference to his written sources, and particularly to the way Samuel, Nathan, and Gad recorded the circumstances of "Israel and the kingdoms of all the other lands," probably relates to those kingdoms that immediately surrounded Israel, so many of whom David had been enabled to incorporate within his own realm (cf. ch. 18).

2 Chronicles

INTRODUCTION

See introduction to 1 Chronicles.

Just as 1 Chronicles paralleled and drew on 1 and 2 Samuel (starting at 1Sa 31), so 2 Chronicles parallels 1 and 2 Kings. Its first nine chapters constitute the third out of the four major divisions into which the Chronicler's history naturally falls. These chapters are devoted to the reign of Solomon (970-930 B.C.), the son of David, and correspond to 1Ki 1–11. Even more so than in 1 Kings, the Solomonic record in 2 Chronicles shows a greater concern for Solomon's temple—six out of the opening nine chapters (chs. 2–7)—than it shows for Solomon's kingship (as compared to 1Ki 5:1–9:9). The third division of Chronicles does commence and conclude (chs. 1 and 8–9) with basic facts about Solomon's reign.The final division is about Judah's history down to the destruction of Jerusalem and the Exile.

II. The Reign of Solomon (2Ch 1:1–9:31)

A. Solomon's Inauguration (1:1–17)

Chapter 1 concerns the king's inauguration. Shortly before his death in 970 (1Ch 29:26), King David had seen his son Solomon safely seated on the throne of a united Israel (cf. 23:1); and, by means of a second anointing, he had ensured the allegiance of the nation's leaders to him (see 29:22). Solomon's personal career as monarch, however, was inaugurated when God appeared to him in a dream at Gibeon (2Ch 1:1–13, paralleling 1Ki 3:4–15). This event, perhaps more than any other in history, brings to mind the biblical principle of Jas 1:5.

1 The opening verse of 2 Chronicles draws together two other references: (1) that Solomon was "established firmly" recalls the struggle at his accession as this was recorded in 1Ki 1 (cf. 1Ch 29:22), and (2) that God made him "exceedingly great" picks up the thought of 1Ch 29:25.

2–4 Ezra, the author, clarifies 1Ki 3:4 by identifying the various elements that made up Solomon's "whole assembly," those who represented "all . . . Israel" and who accompanied him to Gibeon. At the time Moses' tabernacle, "God's Tent of Meeting," was located at this center, seven miles northwest of Jerusalem (see 1Ch 16:39). With the ark now at the Jerusalem capital, these two cities became the only legitimate places for divine atonement. First Kings 3:2 does recognize the reality of deviation in popular practice; but the principle of centralized worship, of services of sacrifice only where God revealed himself, had been established by Moses almost five hundred years earlier (Ex 20:24; Lev 17:3–9; Dt 12:5). Other "high places," even if used in the name of the Lord God of Israel, were necessarily excluded. This was because of their contamination through association with Canaanite Baal worship: they stood under God's ban (Nu 33:52; Dt 12:2). Indeed, Solomon's first drift toward sin became apparent by his recognition and use of such unauthorized high places.

5–6 The "bronze altar" made by Bezalel (see 1Ch 2:20) had a frame of acacia wood, but it was overlaid with bronze (Ex 38:1–2).

7–8 When that night God "appeared to Solomon," it was in the form of a dream (1Ki 3:5, 15; cf. 1Sa 28:6). The "kindness" that God showed Solomon was his hesed (GK 2875; lit., faithfulness to what he had previously covenanted; cf. 1Ch 16:41): in this instance, that Solomon should succeed David as king (see 22:9).

9 God's "promise to . . . David"—primarily as revealed in 1Ch 17:11–14—that Solomon prayed might "be confirmed" (GK 586) included the permanent establishment of David's seed on the throne of Israel and the erection of the temple at Jerusalem. The Lord had already fulfilled his promise to Abraham, that he should have descendants "as numerous as the dust of the earth" (Ge 13:16; 22:17; cf. 1Ki 4:20; 1Ch 27:23).

10 The central teaching of ch. 1 lies in Solomon's selfless prayer for wisdom, which was the precise characteristic that his father David had already invoked for him (1Ch 22:12). The newly inaugurated king's desire to have it so that he might "lead this people" Israel reads, literally, that he might "go out and come in before this people." Such words referred originally to military leadership (1Ch 11:2; cf. 1Sa 18:13) but are here broadened into representing good governmental administratorship in general.

11–13 God granted Solomon's request. His factual knowledge was to some extent limited by his cultural environment; but his "wisdom," in the sense of that divinely given ability that can apply knowledge to life situations (as shown by his authorship of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs; cf. 1Ki 4:29, 32), has never been surpassed (1Ki 3:12). God also granted him an unparalleled concentration of wealth (v.15; cf. 1Ch 22:14) and honor (1Ch 29:25; Mt 6:29), which illustrates Christ's teaching: "Seek first his kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things will be given to you as well" (Mt 6:33).

14 Chapter 1 concludes (vv.14–17) by adducing historical evidences for the fulfillment of God's promises. King Solomon's "chariot cities" and other urban constructions have been validated archaeologically by excavations at cities of his period from Hazor in the north to Gezer in the southwest. Megiddo too contains Solomonic structures, including an intricate gateway complex, a palace area, and perhaps even its well-known subterranean water system. Two huge, stone stables holding about 450 horses were formerly attributed to the wise king—and may still be based on his planning—but, at least to the level to which they have been so far recovered, they seem now to be datable to King Ahab in the next century. (Currently there is some doubt as to whether these were even stables, but perhaps were grain storage bins.)

15 Solomon's silver, "and [his] gold," too (which does not receive mention in the parallel passages: 9:27; 1Ki 10:27), were as common as "stones"—whose abundance are plainly evident to any tourist to the Holy Land. Solomon also made cedar as plentiful as the sycamore-fig trees, which abound in "the foothills" (cf. 1Ch 27:28).

16 Kue is probably Cilicia, in what is now southern Turkey, at the east end of the Mediterranean; it was a prime ancient supplier of horses.

17 The price for chariots and horses ran about fifteen pounds and three and three-fourths pounds of silver each, respectively. Each chariot cost four times as much as each horse, because of the craftsmanship required and because the wood itself had to be imported into Egypt. The law of Moses, significantly, forbade excess in these very matters (Dt 17:16); they were, in fact, the sorts of sins that Solomon's prosperity eventually precipitated.

B. Solomon's Temple (2:1–7:22)

1. Preparations (2:1–18)

Despite the greatness of King Solomon's armies, wealth, and material possessions (1:14–17), it is not these things that are the most important for us today; nor were they for Ezra in his day. It was Solomon's temple that captured the greatest concern. This building was, after all, the place where the people worshiped God (but see John 4:21; cf. Mt 27:51).

To the Jews of 450 B.C., the temple overshadowed every other aspect of the career of Solomon. Through the rites of atonement that were performed at its altar, God brought Israel into reconciliation with himself (cf. 2Co 5:18); and continuously these rites symbolized the presence of the Lord in the midst of his redeemed people (2Ch 7:1–2; Ex 29:45–46). Salvation was bound up in the temple, even if in a preliminary and anticipatory way. For even as its altar and priests were a figure that pointed forward to Christ's sacrifice on the cross (Heb 7:27; 8:4–5; 9:9–12), so the structure itself was a type, a material prophecy of that day when the Word of God would become flesh and "tabernacle" among us (cf. Jn 1:14). Still today it serves as a type of that future glorification that awaits us in the heavenly presence of God himself (Ex 24:18; Heb 9:24).

Solomon's preparations for the temple possessed considerable antecedents. King David had already prepared in many ways: providing the design for the whole complex, gathering supplies, and enlisting personnel (1Ch 22; 28–29). Solomon, however, still needed to organize the labor force (2Ch 2:2, 17–18). A further aspect, and perhaps the most significant of his preparations, lay in the young king's search for technical assistance from Hiram king of Tyre (cf. v.12). This way Solomon could gain an experienced superintendent of construction and also a supply of timber from the incomparable cedars of Lebanon (vv.3–10). A suitable contract was soon negotiated (vv.11–16).

1 In addition to the temple, Solomon is said to have constructed a palace for himself (cf. v.12). Though repeatedly mentioned, little is known about it except for the time involved in its building and for some of the costly wood used in its construction (8:1; 9:11; cf. 7:11). It seems to have lain south of the temple on Mount Moriah, but north of the older city of Jerusalem on Mount Zion (cf. 1Ch 26:15), in the space that existed between them.

2 The distribution of the king's "conscripted" laborers between "carriers and . . . stone cutters" is based on the total of 153,600 given in v.17. These workers were drafted from the alien population that was resident in Israel, according to plans that had already been formulated by David (see 1Ch 22:2). The total figures are validated by 1Ki 5:15–16 (cf. 2Ch 2:18). Solomon also conscripted some 30,000 men out of Israel to labor in relays of 10,000 men each, one month out of every three (1Ki 5:13–14). Precedent for such monthly rotation appears in Egypt, where the system grew out of the three-month period for the annual inundation of the Nile.

3 The king then sent a communication, the text of which appears in vv.3b–10, to "Hiram [a shortened form of Ahiram] king of Tyre." This city was a Phoenician port, newer and lying to the south of its counterpart Sidon, and situated on an island off the Mediterranean coast. Tyre lies, indeed, just north of the white cliffs that marked the northern border of Israel and specifically the tribe of Asher. It possessed the finest harbor in the area, and its inhabitants were noted for their ship building and commerce.

The occasion for King Solomon's writing had been furnished by the arrival of a Phoenician delegation sent by Hiram to console Solomon over the death of his father, David, who had been Hiram's friend, and to congratulate him on his own accession (1Ki 5:1). The new king's request that Hiram send him "cedar logs as you did for my father David" (cf. 1Ch 14:1) must not be misunderstood as implying either that the logs were to be used for a palace, as had been the case with David (cf. v.4), or that they were the first timber to be provided for the temple (cf. David's previous accumulations in this regard, 1Ch 22:4, 14).

4 Concerning the activities projected for accomplishment within the temple, the "burning [of] fragrant incense" before the Lord was an act that was performed twice daily on the altar of incense (Ex 30:6–8). In reference to the "consecrated bread," see 1Ch 9:32; on the daily "burnt offerings," 23:30; and on the "appointed feasts," 23:31.

5 Solomon's affirmation that "our God is greater than all other gods" testifies to his religious commitment, even when dealing with a powerful pagan king. The latter's response then indicates a corresponding willingness on Hiram's part to recognize the Lord.

6 Even though the temple was designed to house the glory cloud of God's presence (5:13–14), Solomon, from the very outset, acknowledged that it could not "contain him," in the sense of restricting or in any way confining his infinitude to this one location (cf. 6:18; Ac 7:48–49). God in his grace has seen fit, on various occasions, to manifest himself for purposes of revelation and redemption; the supreme demonstration of this fact lies in the incarnation of Jesus Christ (Jn 1:14). Yet in all such cases, significant qualifications are present that prevent any reduction in the Lord's glory or any manipulation of God on the part of men. Such localization is always voluntary on his part, undertaken on his initiative alone (6:5–6); it is paralleled by his continuing and simultaneous omnipresence (16:9); and it is revocable at his will, capable of termination whenever he may deem it to have become detrimental to his purposes.

In the light of the greatness of God, Solomon confessed his own inadequacy: "Who then am I?" His humility becomes all the more noteworthy in view of his own unsurpassed wealth, wisdom, and power (cf. 1:12, 14–15).

7 Solomon requested from Hiram a skilled workman and in fact hired a number of experienced Phoenicians (vv.8, 14) to work with his own men. For despite a growing number of "skilled craftsmen" in Israel, their techniques remained inferior to those of their northern neighbors, as is demonstrated archaeologically by less finely cut building stones and by the lower level of Israelite culture in general.

8–9 The materials that the king requested consisted preeminently of "cedar logs." The fragrant cedars of Lebanon were famed throughout the ancient world. They were resistant to decay and superior to any timber native to Palestine. This valuable resource was particularly squandered under Turkish rule, so that today only a few isolated groves of magnificent trees survive. The further product, rendered "pine," probably refers to the Phoenician juniper, while the "algum" (GK 454) or almug (not mentioned in the parallels that occur in 1Ki 5:6, 8, 10) was a foreign import. It has been traditionally translated as "sandalwood," because it was brought in from Ophir (9:10) and used for ornamental woodwork and for musical instruments (9:11). Sandalwood, however, does not grow in Lebanon; and the term seems here, as indicated by the NIV note, to represent another variety of juniper.

10 Solomon's payment to the Phoenicians was based on the charges that he had asked them to quote (1Ki 5:6). First Kings goes on to speak of his delivering an identical "twenty thousand cors of wheat" but of only twenty cors of "pressed" oil (5:11, NIV note; cf. the listing here of "twenty thousand baths of [ordinary] olive oil"). Ten baths are contained in one cor; but the Chronicles figure still represents 115,000 gallons (NIV note), as compared to 1,200 gallons in Kings. The latter makes no mention at all of the "barley" and "wine." Kings puts a limitation both on the product—in respect to the oil, it is speaking of a special, luxury kind—and on its recipients; for Kings refers only to the royal household of Hiram and not, as in Chronicles, to the larger group of Phoenician "servants, the woodsmen who cut timber." Furthermore, Kings concerns an annually repeated delivery, while in Chronicles it is a one-time payment. Seen in this light, the differing figures suggest no unreasonable proportions.

As to the actual amounts involved, the 125,000 bushels of the two different grains and the 120,000 gallons of the two liquids (cf. NIV note) represent considerable quantities; but they are not beyond the magnitude either of Solomon's resources or of the temple project that he was financing. Such payments constituted a heavy drain on the economy of Israel. When they were prolonged, because of Solomon's private building projects (cf. v.1 and 1Ki 7:1–2), they exhausted the kingdom (1Ki 9:10–11).

11–12 Hiram's answer to Solomon includes words of praise to the Lord and of appreciation for his love to Israel, which are not recorded in 1Ki 5. This speech is appropriate, not simply theologically, but also practically, coming from the lips of an accomplished businessman, who was dealing with a promising prospective customer—whatever may have been Hiram's individual doctrinal commitments, or lack of same.

13 The name of the master craftsman whom Hiram sent to Solomon is "Huram-Abi." This may be rendered "Huram, my father," not in the sense of a physical relationship (Hiram's father is known to have been Abibaal), but of social status, meaning, "my (trusted) administrator," or "adviser" (as in Ge 15:8; Jdg 17:10).

14 Huram-Abi's mother was, by tribal descent, (lit.) "a woman from the daughters of Dan," but by immediate situation, "a widow from the tribe of Naphtali" (1Ki 7:14). Yet the fact that his father came "from Tyre" gave Huram-Abi a combined Phoenician-Hebrew endowment, which enabled him to deal both linguistically and culturally with the two nationalities of workmen who would be responsible to him.

This superintendent's diversified skills included the capacity to handle precious metals, wood, stone, and fabrics. He thus presents a parallel to the wide-ranging abilities of Bezalel, the master builder of the Mosaic tabernacle (Ex 31:2–5). The "purple" cloth that he could employ was produced from what was actually a deep red dye, obtained from the murex shellfish of the Phoenician coast. Such material was called "royal purple" because of its quality, scarcity, and cost.

15–16 Despite limited facilities, Joppa had a small projecting point of rocks that set it apart from the generally unprotected sands and beaches of southern Palestine. It is mentioned in Egyptian documents as early as the time of Thutmose III, who was probably the Pharaoh of the Hebrew oppression, dying just before the Exodus in 1446 B.C. (Ex 4:19). Joppa served as the port (cf. Jnh 1:3) for inland Judah and for the city of Jerusalem. Before one reached Solomon's capital, however, there were some thirty-five miles of flat, then hilly, and finally rugged terrain.

17–18 Ezra here itemizes "3,600 foremen" out of the total of 153,600 aliens. There were, in addition, 250 chief Israelite officers (8:10), making a total of 3,850. The parallel passages in 1 Kings list only 3,300 foremen (5:16) but then have a correspondingly larger number of chief officers, "550" (9:23), again making a total of 3,800. Since Kings does not distinguish the aliens from the Israelites, the differences in figures would seem to be due to the ways the respective authors distinguished the "chief" officers.

2. Construction (3:1–4:22)

Having explained something of Solomon's preparations for the temple (ch. 2), the Chronicler moves into a description of its actual construction (chs. 3–4). His material forms a parallel to and represents an abridgment of 1Ki 6–7.

1 "Mount Moriah" was the summit, in the area of that same name on which Abraham had shown his willingness to sacrifice his son Isaac (Ge 22:2), over one thousand years earlier. "The threshing floor" of Araunah, which was located on Mount Moriah, was then sanctified even further by David's encounter with God at that place (1Ch 21:18–22:1).

2 Construction on the site did not begin till "the fourth year" of Solomon's reign, probably because of the planning and preparation that had to precede it (2Ch 2). This particular regnal year extended from the fall of 967 B.C. to the fall of 966; but since "the second month" begins in April/May, the exact date must have fallen in the spring of 966.

3 Cubits "of the old standard" represented an earlier, sacred measure. These ran about three inches longer than the ordinary cubit, which was a trifle under eighteen inches (see Eze 40:5; 43:13). On this basis the temple building measured about 105 feet by 35 feet, rather than 90 by 30; and it had doubled the dimensions of the tabernacle.

4 Along the entire front of the temple stretched a porch, or portico, that was open on the front. Its depth was 10 cubits (1Ki 6:3; c. 15 feet); the present text tells how high its side walls rose, namely, 20 cubits (30 feet).

5 "The main hall" refers to the temple proper, and particularly to its outer room, which corresponded to the "Holy Place" in the tabernacle. Compare the reference in v.8 to the inner room as the "Most Holy Place," called elsewhere the "oracle" (v.16). As for the wood that the king used (i.e., pine), see 2:8; and cedar was employed as well (1Ki 6:9).

The paragraphing in the NIV connects Solomon's provision of a layer of "pure gold" for "the inside" (v.4) with this same main hall. The expenditure was enormous. But it was with these very projects in mind that David had proceeded with his earlier, massive preparations (cf. 1Ch 22:14; 29:4, 7).

6 The reference to "precious stones" may suggest mosaics, inlaid in the floor (cf. 1Ch 29:2). The gold "of Parvaim" seems to denote a place name, perhaps in southeastern Arabia; or it may be a variant name for Ophir.

7 The term rendered "doorframes" usually is limited to the "threshold" or "sill"; but the present context of beams overlaid with gold favors a broader meaning. The carved decorations included palm trees and flowers (1Ki 6:29) but especially "cherubim." The appropriateness of depicting these angelic creatures lay in their association with the holy and majestic presence of God (Ge 3:24; cf. their major function in vv.10–14, concerning the inner room). They appear normally in human form but with wings (Eze 1:5–6).

8 The "six hundred talents of fine gold" with which the interior of the oracle was overlaid are not mentioned in 1Ki 6. They consumed only a fraction of what David had provided (1Ch 22:14) but still constituted about twenty-three tons of gold.

9 The "nails" which fastened the gold sheets to the walls involved a much smaller amount of gold, totaling only twenty ounces (one and one-fourth pounds, NIV note).

10–13 The two large cherubim, when placed side by side, had a total wingspread of thirty-five feet. They are thus not to be confused with the small cherubim on the ark but were great gold-plated figures of olive wood (1Ki 6:23), which filled the Most Holy Place and overshadowed the whole ark.

14 The temple's "curtain" (GK 7267) corresponds to the curtain that separated the two rooms in the Mosaic tabernacle (Ex 26:31); it was supplementary to the wooden doors mentioned in 4:22 and 1Ki 6:31–32. It emphasized the fact that even though the awesome presence of God, represented by the glory cloud in the Most Holy Place, was present with human beings, it was at the same time separated from them. The curtain portrayed the spiritual truth that the way to God was not yet open (Heb 9:8) and that it would not be till Christ would perform the true atonement to reconcile God and humankind. This then would end the anticipatory forms of the older covenant, including the curtain (Mt 27:51).

15–17 The "two pillars" were freestanding, set up at the portico in front of the temple (1Ki 7:21). Their size, "thirty-five cubits long," seems to be the result of a copyist's error. The whole building was only twenty cubits high (cf. v.3); 1Ki 7:15 specifies that they were eighteen cubits each (twenty-seven feet), a figure confirmed by 2Ki 25:17 and Jer 52:21.

Each pillar had an ornamented capital, which added "five cubits" (c. nine feet) to its height. The existence of ornamental pillars has been repeatedly attested by archaeology; subbases for such pillars were found in front of the temple at Hazor, and obelisks constitute an Egyptian illustration of the same sort of thing. Their very names symbolized the sustaining power of God, concretely exhibited by the permanence of the temple.

4:1 Turning in ch. 4 to the furnishings of the temple, Ezra first describes its main "altar." It was large—about thirty feet square (NIV note)—made of "bronze," and apparently in stages, with connecting stairs, since it rose to a height of fifteen feet. Just as in the tabernacle, the altar was the first main object to be met as one entered the sanctuary court. It demonstrates that God may be approached only through sacrifices, i.e., through the substitutionary and testamentary death of Christ (Heb 8:2–3; 9:12).

2 The "Sea of cast metal" corresponded to the more modest bronze basin of the tabernacle (Ex 30:18). It was used by the priests for washing (v.6; cf. Ex 30:21) and taught the necessity for purity on the part of those approaching God. It pointed typically to the washing of regeneration and sanctification provided in Christ (Tit 3:5; Heb 9:10). The circumference of the Sea, given as forty-five feet, was only approximate; for its diameter was a full fifteen feet (ten cubits).

3 The "cast figures of bulls . . . in two rows," "below the rim," are called simply "gourds" in 1Ki 7:24. Unless this is a copyist's mistake due to the similarly sounding words, the explanation may lie in a more general description in Kings of these ornamental bands of round-shaped animal heads.

4 Distinct from these cattle were the "twelve bulls" that stood under the Sea and served as its base. They probably denoted the twelve tribes of Israel (cf. Ex 24:4), just as the tribes had once camped, three on each side of the tabernacle (Nu 2).

5 That the Sea was "a handbreadth" thick refers to a person's four fingers held together (i.e., a little over three inches). The capacity stated in the present Chronicles text of "three thousand baths" should be read with 1Ki 7:26 as "two thousand." Chronicles' larger number could have arisen through an unclear reading of the numerical symbols.

6 The large reservoir that constituted the Sea then supplied the "ten" smaller "basins" (holding 40 baths, or 230 gallons each) on their wheeled carts or bases (cf. 1Ki 7:27–39). Their function was for rinsing the offerings, a point not brought out in 1Ki 7:38–39.

7 As compared with the one golden lampstand in the tabernacle, the temple had "ten," and they were no doubt made "according to the specifications" as in Ex 25:31–40. Once again (cf. v.1) vv.7–10 find no corresponding, parallel passages in 1Ki 7, though Kings does mention the contents of vv.7–10 in its concluding summary (1Ki 7:48–49 = 2Ch 4:19–20). The lampstands, each one with its seven branches, continue to symbolize the perfection with which God's church must unceasingly shine for him (Lev 24:3–4; Mt 5:14), as supplied by the oil of God's powerful Holy Spirit (Zec 4:2–6).

8 Of the "ten tables" (only one was made for the tabernacle; cf. 1Ch 28:16), it seems that only one table at a time (13:11; 29:18) was used for displaying the bread, as it was set out fresh every Sabbath, to symbolize Israel's re-established communion with God and their life in his Presence (v.19; Lev 24:5–8; cf. 1Ch 9:32; 28:16). The "sprinkling bowls" were not particularly associated with the tables but seem rather to have been used for collecting the blood of sacrifices, which was then sprinkled about the altar in the temple services of atonement (cf. Ex 24:6; 29:16; Lev 1:5; 3:2).

9–11 Moses' tabernacle had only a single court. The more developed ritual of the temple led to a division between the inner courtyard of the priests (1Ki 6:36; 7:12)—also called the upper court, because it was elevated, so that the priests would be more visible as they performed their sacred duties (Jer 36:10)—and the outer "larger court" for Israel's general worshipers. Yet this very division into two courts (2Ki 23:12) gave concrete expression to the fact that under the old covenant there had not yet been achieved that universal priesthood of believers that would come about through Jesus Christ. In him all the people of God have direct access to the Father (Jer 31:34; Gal 3:28; Heb 4:14–16). A later distinction of a separate "court of the women" arose only between the OT and NT.

12–15 In the summary of the work performed by Huram (cf. 2:14) for the temple, the first items to be mentioned are the two bronze pillars (cf. 3:15) with their "bowl-shaped capitals" (see 1Ki 7:17–20). Their bulbous lower capitals were covered by an ornamented network or grating, while the upper sections consisted of a flaring crown, like opened lilies.

16 The name "Huram-Abi" connotes "Huram my administrator" (see comment on 2:13).

17–18 The places at which Huram cast the bronze articles for the temple were located "in the plain east of the Jordan," about halfway between Galilee and the Dead Sea. The deep clay located at "Succoth" and "Zarethan" provided suitable molds for the great metal objects.

19–21 In the summary of the temple furnishings, the "gold floral work" refers to the ornamentation on the lampstands (Ex 25:33).

22 The "gold doors" were made of carved olive wood, which was in turn overlaid with gold (3:7; 1Ki 6:31–35). The "doors of the main hall" opened onto the portico and the courts and led from the "Holy Place," which was the outer room of the temple. The inner doors to the oracle provided protection additional to the curtain for sealing off this Most Holy Place (cf. 3:14).

3. Dedication (5:1–7:22)

After having described the construction of Solomon's temple in chs. 3–4, the Chronicler devotes his next three chapters to events connected with its dedication. The material makes up a single unit that extends from the king's summons to the men of Israel in 5:2 down through their dismissal in 7:10, together with an introductory verse and an appended but related answer of God to the dedicatory prayer (7:11–22). These three chapters present a close parallel to their source in 1Ki 8:1–9:9. Much of their theological importance lies in the light that Solomon's ceremonies of dedication throw on the significance of the temple concept as a whole.

When he had assembled the representative leaders of Israel, the king's first act was to conduct the ark of God's covenant into the temple and to enshrine it in the Most Holy Place (5:1–10). He thus constituted the structure on Mount Moriah as the successor to Israel's previous sanctuaries; and God confirmed the validity of Solomon's procedure by taking up his own, localized dwelling within the temple and filling it with the "shekinah," the cloud of his Presence (vv.11–14; see comment on 1Ki 8:10–11).

Chapter 6 consists primarily of two utterances by King Solomon: his blessing on the people, which is actually a testimony of praise to the Lord for his faithfulness in prospering the temple project up to this point (vv.3–11), and his long prayer to God, dedicating the building for his sanctuary and imploring his favorable response when Israel should submit their petitions toward his Presence within the structure (vv.12–42). This action too was visibly confirmed by the Lord, as he sent down fire from heaven on the new altar (7:1–3). Two weeks of extensive dedicatory sacrifices and feasting followed (vv.4–10).

A final section, sometime after Solomon had completed his own palace, describes how the Lord appeared to the king by night and verbally confirmed his agreement to the request that he would dwell in the temple and answer the prayers that were addressed to him there. His blessing, however, was conditioned on Israel's continued faithfulness; and he threatened exile and the temple's destruction if the nation should become apostate (7:11–22).

1 A preliminary action of Solomon was to bring into the temple "the things his father David had dedicated" (cf. 1Ch 18:10–11; 22:14; 26:26–27; 29:2–5). Some of David's treasures must have remained, even after the great outlays for erecting the temple. The "treasuries" themselves may have been located in the "upper parts" (3:9) of the building, in some of the rooms that surrounded the sanctuary proper (1Ki 6:5–10).

2 The first step in the activities of dedication was for the king and the assembled national leaders to bring the ark up from the old citadel of Zion to the temple area situated on the more northerly ridge of Moriah (cf. 3:1; Ps 48:2). For forty years the ark had remained in the tent that David had first pitched on its arrival in Jerusalem (cf. 1Ch 15:1; 16:1).

3 The assembly was delayed until "the festival in the seventh month," i.e., until the Feast of Tabernacles (cf. 7:8–10). The work on the temple structure as such had been finished (5:1) in the eighth month of Solomon's eleventh year (1Ki 6:38), i.e., in Sept./Oct. 960 B.C. (cf. 3:2). This entails a lapse of eleven months (until the fall of 959) for the official dedication ceremonies; but there were doubtless other matters that had to be arranged after the completion of the building.

4 In transporting the ark Solomon took the added precaution of employing the priests, taken from among the total group of Levi, to perform this work (vv.5, 7; 1Ki 8:3; cf. 1Ch 13:10; 15:4).

5 Also "brought up" was the "Tent of Meeting," or tabernacle (cf. 1:3), from its previous location at Gibeon (cf. 1Ch 16:39).

6 The large number of sheep and cattle sacrificed followed the more modest precedent set by David when he first brought the ark to Jerusalem (1Ch 15:26; 16:1–3).

7–8 The holy object was placed in the temple's "inner sanctuary." The name of this place derives from an Arabic word meaning "back," i.e., the shrine that was situated in the innermost, or back, portion of the temple, "the Most Holy Place" (cf. 3:5). On "the cherubim," under whose wings it rested, see comment on 3:11.

9 Though the curtain (cf. 3:14) concealed the ark itself from view, the poles by which the ark was carried must have projected on one or both of its sides, so as to be visible from the door. The statement that "they are still there today" must have been quoted by Ezra from his sources (9:29), particularly from 1Ki 8:8, out of those portions that were written before the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. The ark had been gone for over a century by Ezra's day.

10 The fact that by Solomon's time "there was nothing in the ark except the two tablets" of the Decalogue shows that the golden pot of manna (Ex 16:32–34) and Aaron's rod that budded (Nu 17:10–11; Heb 9:4) must have been lost during the intervening vicissitudes through which the ark passed. The Chronicler's reference at this point to the Lord's Sinaitic covenant may be attributed to the fact that the Ten Commandments, as engraved on Moses' two tablets of stone, expressed the basic response that God expected from his covenant people, whom he had already redeemed (Ex 20:2; cf. 19:4–6). The tablets could in a sense be called "the testimony" (25:16, 21) to his covenant.

11 In the ceremony during which God granted his confirmation to this new home for the ark, Ezra's word that the priests were present "regardless of their divisions" refers to the way they had been organized by David into their twenty-four hereditary courses (1Ch 24:3–19). But the normal rotations in service could be disregarded on an occasion as significant as this, in which all were present.

12 The Chronicler is the first OT writer to refer to the "fine linen" worn by the Levites (cf. 1Ch 15:27). The "120 priests sounding trumpets" (cf. 15:24) may suggest a figure of five drawn from each of the twenty-four priestly courses (cf. 1Ch 24:4).

13–14 The idea expressed by hesed (GK 2876), here rendered as God's "love," means more specifically his "faithfulness" (cf. 1Ch 16:41). The "cloud," which was in fact "the glory of the LORD," had first guided the people of Israel out of Egypt (Ex 13:21–22) and then through the desert (40:36–38); and it is associated with the angel of God (14:19; 23:20–23), presumably the preincarnate presence of Christ. At the dedication of the Mosaic tabernacle, almost five hundred years before Solomon, the cloud of God's glory had filled that earlier sanctuary (40:34–35). In the days just before the Exile, Ezekiel had envisioned the sin of Israel as driving the glory cloud out of the sanctuary (Eze 10:18–19; 11:23); and it had not returned to the second temple, of Ezra's day. The "shekinah," as it came to be called (see comment on 1Ki 8:10–11), meant God's "glorious dwelling." It appeared during Christ's first coming (Mt 17:5; Ac 1:9), and it will accompany his glorious second advent (Ac 1:11; Rev 1:7; 14:14).

6:1 The first two verses of ch. 6 reflect on the immediately preceding event, when God had demonstrated his approval of the king's relocation of the ark in the new temple. The Lord's words that he mentions, about dwelling "in a dark cloud," refer to God's presence on the top of Mount Sinai, shrouded in a cloud (Ex 19:9; 20:21), and also in the Mosaic tabernacle, as veiled off in its Most Holy Place (Lev 16:2).

2 Though the purpose of the temple was for the Lord "to dwell" there "forever," there was still the attached condition that Israel must continue faithful (7:19–20; Mt 23:37–38). They did not; and the temple was twice destroyed (586 B.C. and A.D. 70). But Christ has promised that he will yet reign on Mount Zion (Mt 23:39) and rule forever in the New Jerusalem (Rev 21:2).

3 While he was speaking with God, Solomon had been facing the temple and the cloud of the divine Presence that filled it. Now, for his address with its blessing on the people, Solomon turned around and faced east, toward the crowd that stood beyond the altar.

4 Solomon's blessing on Israel consisted of a recalling of God's verbal promises to David—that the temple would be built and David's dynasty established (v.10; cf. 1Ch 17)—and of God's material fulfillments of them "with his hands," i.e., in history.

5–6 These promises included God's choice of Jerusalem (cf. 1Ch 22:1), that his "Name" might be "there" (vv.8, 20; cf. v.33), which meant his very Presence (cf. 1Ch 22:7).

7–9 Solomon's thoughts on David's relationship to the temple repeat the latter's own words from 1Ch 28:2–3.

10–11 God's covenant could be said to be in the ark, insofar as the two tablets of the Decalogue that the ark contained did constitute "the testimony" to it (cf. on 5:10). This covenant is identified in 1Ki 8:21 as the Sinaitic covenant (cf. 1Ch 16:15 and 17:12), the one that God "made with our fathers when he brought them out of Egypt."

12 For making his major prayer to God in ch. 6 (vv.12–42), Solomon turned back from facing the people (cf. v.3) and, as he stood "before the altar," again faced west, toward the temple.

13 This verse forms an insertion made by Ezra and is not found in 1Ki 8, between v.22 and v.23. It seems to clarify that Solomon was not "before the altar" to perform a priestly function. He stood rather on an elevated "bronze platform" so that his prayer could be better seen and heard by the people. The term for "platform" (GK 2257) normally designates a "basin" but here denotes a "stage." The way that the king "then knelt down" (cf. 1Ki 8:54) gave public acknowledgment to the fact that he too was only God's servant, administering a kingdom that was not his own (cf. 1Ch 28:5).

14–17 The prayer itself through v.39 closely approximated 1Ki 8:23–50a. It consists of praise to the Lord for his faithfulness to his covenant and of petition for its preservation (vv.16–17). Then come more words of praise, for God's infinity in space (v.18), and yet of petition, for his attention to the king's and people's prayers when made toward the temple (vv.19–42). God keeps his "covenant" and the "love." These synonymous expressions are rightly rendered "covenant of love"

(NIV; cf. 5:13, 1Ch 16:41). In other words, God's covenantal love, made efficacious through the death of Christ, is the source of all blessings, both for believers today and for those who received 'the promised eternal inheritance . . . under the first covenant" (Heb 9:15). He reserves these blessings, moreover, for those who are his "servants" (GK 6269; v.14), because faith must always be manifested by obedience (v.16; Jas 2:17–26).

18 In reference to Solomon's constant recognition that "even the highest heavens" cannot contain the infinite Person of the Lord, see 2:6.

19–21 It was because the king recognized God's infinity that he prayed concerning the requests people make toward "this place," toward the earthly temple, that they may be answered by God "from heaven, your dwelling place." He proceeded to identify seven concrete situations for which he requested the Lord's intervention from heaven, as follows:

22–23 (1) Swearing to an "oath . . . in this temple." Testimony in doubtful cases was confirmed by an oath at the sanctuary (Ex 22:10–11; Lev 6:3–5); so God is petitioned to intervene in order to "establish innocence."

24–25 (2) "Defeat" and exile "by an enemy." Prayer was needed in such calamities because both of them could be the result of God's punishing their sin (Lev 26:17, 23; Jos 7:11–12; cf. Dt 28:48).

26–27 (3) Lack of "rain." The phenomena of nature sometimes have moral causes; specifically, Israel could suffer drought in times of apostasy (Lev 26:19; Dt 11:10–15; 1Ki 17:1).

28–31 (4) "Disease" or other "disasters." "Plagues" of various sorts could likewise result from sin (Lev 26:16, 20, 25–26; cf. Dt 28 passim), because God "knows" what is in "the hearts of men" (cf. 1Sa 16:7).

32–33 (5) "Foreigners" coming to pray "toward this temple." From its outset Israel's sanctuary was thus designed to be "a house of prayer for all nations" (Isa 56:6–8). The goal of the nation's election was a universal knowledge of God (cf. Ge 12:3; Eph 2:11–13, 19); and even in OT times aliens who would come in faith to the Lord were assured of reception as proselytes into Israel (Ex 12:38, 48; Ru 1:16; 2:12). They would be attracted by God's "great name," which involved his actual Presence in the temple (cf. v.6).

34–35 (6) In "war." God will fight for his own, who cry to him in the battle (14:11–12; Dt 28:7; 1Ch 5:20).

36–39 (7) In "captivity," caused by "sin." Solomon's confession that there is no one who does not sin emphasizes the consistent biblical teaching on humanity's total depravity (cf. Dt 28 passim; Jer 13:23; 17:9; Eph 2:3). The resulting exile to "a land far away," as well as Israel's subsequent restoration on repentance, had been predicted as early as Moses (Lev 26:33, 44–45); and it all came about (2Ch 36:16, 22–23), even as Solomon had prayed.

40 At this point Chronicles omits most of the king's prayer that is recorded in the parallel passage of 1Ki 8:50b–53, since it was less relevant for a Judah that was no longer in exile in Ezra's time.

41 Solomon drew his last two verses from Ps 132:8–10 (not included in the parallel passage in 1Ki 8, after v.53). This royal psalm, while anonymous, seems to have been written by David or by one of his associates, for that similar occasion forty years before when the ark was first installed in Jerusalem in its tent (cf. this verse and Ps 132:8 with Nu 10:35, and Ps 132:13–14 with 1Ch 16).

42 In his prayer "do not reject your anointed one," the king now meant himself, though in subsequent usage it would express Israel's hope in the coming Messiah, as the climax of Solomon's line. In Ps 132:10 it had referred to his father, David. Furthermore, to the original wording of the psalm, and as the basis for his own blessing, Solomon added the request for God to "remember the great love" promised to David (see comments on vv.14–17). This same basis was later validated when it was taken up by God himself in words given through the prophet Isaiah (Isa 45:3).

7:1–2 Divine approval that rested on the temple services (cf. vv.1–3) and on Solomon's prayer of dedication in particular (ch. 6) was shown by "fire" that "came down from heaven" on the altar. It was in this same way that God had inaugurated the sacrificial services at the Mosaic tabernacle (Lev 9:24) and at the Davidic altar on Moriah some forty years earlier (1Ch 21:26).

3 Now all the people also saw "the glory of the LORD above the temple," which constituted a greater manifestation of what had already been revealed to the priests inside (5:13–14). Thus they knelt on "the pavement," which was associated with the outer, lower court (Eze 40:17; 42:3), and repeated the familiar refrain about the Lord's faithfulness to his covenant promises (v.6; cf. 5:13). King Solomon then added a blessing of his own on the congregation (1Ki 8:55–61; omitted here, perhaps because by the time of Ezra the only priests did this).

4–5 In the festivities that followed, the large numbers of animals sacrificed—22,000 cattle and 120,000 sheep (cf. 35:7)—are confirmed by 1Ki 8:63. They are defined as "fellowship offerings" (v.7), to be eaten by the people (cf. 1Ch 16:1; 29:21). They provided the basis for fifteen full days of feasting (2Ch 7:9–10).

6 The Levitical musicians stood east of the altar (5:12) away from the temple (cf. 1Ch 6:31; 16:4; 25). The priestly trumpeters were stationed "opposite" them and were therefore west of the altar, between it and the temple.

7 "The fat" of the fellowship (= peace) offerings, along with certain other choice pieces, was presented as a token sacrifice to God, prior to the feasting on the part of the people (Lev 3). Concerning the "burnt offerings" (Lev 1) and "grain offerings" (Lev 2), see 1Ch 21:23.

8 Solomon had delayed the temple's dedication for a number of months (cf. comment on 5:3) so that it might be celebrated along with the harvest Feast of Tabernacles, when at the latter season all Israel would be coming in pilgrimage to Jerusalem (Ex 23:16–17). They therefore gathered "from Lebo Hamath" in Lebanon, toward the Euphrates River in the northeast (cf. on 1Ch 13:5), down "to the Wadi of Egypt," i.e., the Wadi el Arish, midway between Palestine and Egypt to the southwest (Jos 15:5, 47).

9 The "eighth day" marked the final convocation of the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 23:36; Nu 29:35), on the twenty-second day of the seventh month. The special dedication feast, in other words, had lasted "for seven days," from the eighth of the month to the fourteenth, including the great Day of Atonement on the tenth (Lev 16), which was followed by the regular Feast of Tabernacles "for seven days more," from the fifteenth to the twenty-second.

10 The Chronicler's statement that "on the twenty-third day" Solomon "sent the people to their homes" constitutes a summary of the more detailed information of 1Ki 8:66, that on the eighth "day he sent the people away. They blessed the king and then went home, joyful."

11 Chapter 7 concludes with the Chronicler's description of the Lord's appearance to the king, so as to assure him personally that his prayers on behalf of the temple would be answered. But this event occurred only after the king had also completed his "royal palace" (cf. on 1Ch 14:1), some thirteen years later (1Ki 7:1; 9:10). The interval brings us down to Solomon's twenty-fourth year, or to 947/946 B.C.

12–13 This was the Lord's second appearance to Solomon (1Ki 9:2), the first having occurred at Gibeon at the start of his reign (2Ch 1:3–13). God's speaking of times when he would "shut up the heavens," etc., specifically recalls the wording of the petitions in Solomon's dedicatory prayer (e.g., 6:26, et al.), which the Lord here promised to answer.

14–15 For a comment on the expression "my people, who are called by my name," see comment on 6:32. The sentence, as it continues, forms what is probably the best known and most loved verse in all Chronicles. It expresses the stipulations that God lays down for a nation to experience his blessing, whether that nation be Solomon's, Ezra's, or our own. Those who have been chosen to be his people must cease from their sins, turn from living lives of proud self-centeredness, pray to the Lord, and yield their desires to his Word and his will. Then, and only then, will he grant heaven-sent revival.

16 Concerning the significance of God's "Name" being "there," see comments on 6:6; 1Ch 22:7.

17–18 The Lord's promise that the Davidic dynasty would "never fail to have a man to rule over Israel" emphasizes the messianic hope that characterizes the Chronicler's eschatology. This same wording reappears elsewhere (e.g., in Mic 5:2). God's covenant to "establish" (GK 7756) the throne of David harks back to 1Ch 17 (vv.12, 14); but in the remaining verses of the present revelation, the divinely imposed condition of faithful obedience, which was first revealed in 2Sa 7:14b, is made just as explicit as in the parallel passage of 1Ki 9:6–9.

19–22 The possibility that Solomon and his successors (cf. NIV note) might "go off to serve other gods" was what actually happened (1Ki 11:1–8; 2Ch 36:16); and it led to the very results (vv.20–22; 36:20) that the king had himself anticipated (6:36).

C. Solomon's Kingdom (8:1–9:31)

1. Its achievements (8:1–18)

The Spirit of God guided Ezra to encourage his people by rehearsing in 1 Chronicles the history of King David's God-given power (cf. introduction to 10:1–20:8). This book now contains a corresponding presentation of the results of serving God as these are exhibited by Solomon with all his glory. The Chronicler thus concludes his record about David's son by outlining the achievements of his kingdom (ch. 8), followed, in turn, by illustrations of the splendor that surrounded his rule (ch. 9). Ezra's account corresponds to the material found in 1 Kings, except that he omits the following sections about the king's enlarged but bureaucratic organization (1Ki 4), his extravagant palace complex (7:1–12), the idolatry that resulted from his gross polygamy (11:1–8), and the political deterioration that resulted during his latter years (vv.9–40)—probably because they would not have contributed to his goal of strengthening Judah's theocracy. The present chapter parallels 1Ki 9, with its catalog of Solomon's successful enterprises. These include his expansion, both civil and military (vv.1–6); his organization of manpower (vv.7–10); his guidance of public worship (vv.11–16); and his commercial achievements (vv.17–18).

1 The date, after "twenty years," was 946 B.C. (cf. comment on 7:11).

2 The reference to "villages that Hiram had given" to the king assumes without further comment the unhappy record preserved in 1Ki 9:11–13, about how Solomon had previously had to surrender twenty non-Israelite towns in Galilee to the Tyrian, apparently because of unpaid building debts (cf. 2Ch 2:10, 15). Hiram, moreover, found this collateral so poor that Solomon seems to have had to take back the territory. He did then alleviate the poverty of the towns by "settling Israelites in them" and thus succeeded in expanding his borders.

3 Solomon's only recorded military campaign resulted in his conquest of "Hamath" in Lebanon, perhaps for having abandoned its former friendship (1Ch 18:9–10) and breaking the peace. Hamath bordered on "Zobah," which had already been occupied by the Hebrews (see 18:3); and the two place names are combined, since by Ezra's day they had been joined into the one Persian province.

4 "Tadmor in the desert" lay 150 miles northeast of Damascus, midway on the caravan route to Mari on the Euphrates River. It thus controlled the trade on this desert "cut-off" to Babylon.

5 The two "Beth Horons" were located on the border between Ephraim and Benjamin and controlled a major pass, northwest of Jerusalem, that led down to the port of Joppa.

6 "Baalath" lay nearby in Dan (Jos 19:44; cf. 1Ch 13:6), and other cities rebuilt by Solomon are listed in 1Ki 9:15–18. Concerning his chariot cities, see comment on 1:14.

7–10 On Solomon's force of "conscripted" Canaanite labor, see comment on 1Ch 22:2.

11 Early in his reign (1Ki 3:1), Solomon had married a daughter of "Pharaoh." But despite the attendant prestige and political advantages, such marriages introduced foreign idolatries and, eventually, apostasy into Israel (11:1–4). At this point Solomon still retained enough spiritual sensitivity to keep her residence out of "places" made "holy."

12–13 Solomon "sacrificed," but only through priestly mediators (cf. comment on 1Ch 16:1). He would not have assumed the right to do so directly, any more than he personally would have "built the altar" (cf. vv.1–6). The "requirement for offerings" on special days had been spelled out by Moses (Lev 23:37–38).

14–16 Solomon was careful to maintain the organization of the priests, Levites, musicians, and others, in their twenty-four respective "divisions," as these had been developed by David (1Ch 23–25; cf. 26).

17 "Ezion Geber and Elath" were ports at the north end of the Gulf of Aqaba that provided a strategic commercial access southward into the Red Sea and beyond. While earlier archaeological judgments about the presence of copper smelters at the former site have had to be revised, some final refining may have indeed been performed here on metals that were mined farther north in the Arabah valley.

18 Solomon's refineries provided a product for export, to be exchanged for gold from "Ophir." Ophir (location uncertain) was thus reached via the Gulf of Aqaba and the Red Sea. The statement that "Hiram sent him ships commanded by his own officers" means that the Tyrians constructed ships from materials that had been sent overland to Ezion Geber. They then guided the less experienced Hebrews so they could navigate the ships, making an expedition in three years (9:21). The revenue from each trip amounted to about seventeen tons of gold.

2. Its splendor (9:1–31)

Jesus spoke of "Solomon in all his splendor" (Mt 6:29), and 2Ch 9 documents his glorious rule with a series of historical illustrations: the visit he enjoyed from the queen of Sheba (vv.1–12); the revenue he obtained, together with the shields, throne, and other luxury items that this produced (vv.13–21); and the extent of the fame and power that he achieved (vv.22–28). The chapter concludes with a summary of his reign as a whole. It closely parallels 1Ki 10.

This island, south of Eliat in the Gulf of Aqaba, is one of the possible locations for Solomon's port of Ezion Geber.

1–3 The partly Semite and partly Hamite kingdom of "Sheba" (1Ch 1:9, 22) lay at the southwestern point of the Arabian peninsula and on across the Red Sea into eastern Ethiopia. Excavations at Marib, its capital at this time, and elsewhere have confirmed its cultural developments. Sheba was famed for its commerce in gold and spice, and it simply could not allow Israel's expanding trade from Ezion Geber (described in 8:18) to go unnoticed. Its queen, accordingly, visited Solomon, with commerce as an underlying issue, but also "to test" his God-given wisdom (1Ki 10:1; cf. 4:29–34) "with hard questions." Such verbal interchange remains a familiar Arabic custom up to the present.

4–6 The NIV reading—of the "burnt offerings [Solomon] made" (cf. 8:12)—is based on the ancient versions and on 1Ki 10:5; it is probably the preferred reading. The Hebrew of Chronicles seems to suggest a procession by the royal party for temple worship. On "the greatness" of the king's "wisdom," see v.23 and 1:12.

7–8 Even Solomon's pagan visitor was led to recognize that "the LORD" was the one by whom Solomon had been placed on Israel's throne and for whom he was ruling (cf. on 1Ch 28:5). The king's desire "to maintain justice and righteousness" had, indeed, been the purpose of his request for wisdom in the first place (cf. comment on 1:10).

9 The queen's gift, also recorded in 1Ki 10:10, amounted to over four and a half tons of gold.

10–11 On "Ophir" see 8:18. "Algumwood" is probably a variant for almugwood (see 2:8).

12 The Hebrew that underlies the NIV wording "he gave her more than she had brought" (to the king) is compressed and difficult; but it should probably be rendered either "every wish she desired, he gave her a return for," or, according to what "she had brought" (cf. 1Ki 10:13). The statement has usually been interpreted as describing the completion of a satisfactory commercial transaction or as an expression of Solomon's munificence. In Ethiopic and Jewish tradition, it is maintained that the queen of Sheba subsequently bore a son to Solomon.

13–14 Solomon's annual revenue in gold was approximating twenty-five tons, as had been previously mentioned in 1Ki 10:14.

15–16 The unit of weight, by which the gold that was applied to the king's "large" and "small shields" was counted, does not appear in the Hebrew text. The NIV assumes the "beka," or half-shekel, so that the figure of 300 for the smaller shields would approximate the amount recorded in 1Ki 10:17. Yet unstated weights in Hebrew usually assume the unit of "shekels." Furthermore, since Kings and Chronicles are in exact agreement on the amount of gold in the large shields, it is probable that they agree on the amount (half as much) in the smaller as well—though in Kings this is expressed in a differing unit of measure, i.e., the heavy mina, equaling 1000 shekels. Solomon's "Palace of the Forest of Lebanon," where the shields were placed, was located in Jerusalem but received its name from its rows of Lebanese cedar pillars (1Ki 7:2–5).

17–21 Solomon's fleet of "trading ships" (v.21) are designated in 1Ki 10:22 as "ships of Tarshish" (NIV note). Since, according to 1Ki 9:26–27 they actually navigated the Red Sea, it seems unlikely that they "went to Tarshish," in the western Mediterranean (perhaps referring to Sardinia). Perhaps they were "Tarshish-type" ships (cf. NIV note; see 20:36). As is usual in Semitic time-reckoning, the "three years" occupied by the expedition need include only the last part of the first year and the first part of the last year, so that the minimum trip time need have consumed only a little over one year.

22–24 Solomon was wealthy by anyone's standard. The term for "weapons" (v.24) describes "armor" as well.

25 Solomon's "four thousand stalls for horses" accords well with both the archaeological evidence (cf. 1:14) and the reference in 1Ki 10:26 to "fourteen hundred chariots" (cf. 1Ki 9:19). The parallel passage in 1Ki 4:26, however, which reads "forty thousand stalls," should probably be attributed to scribal corruption.

26 The observation that Solomon's rule extended as far as the Euphrates "River" (cf. NIV note; see comment on 1Ki 4:21, 24) corresponds to the limit that God had promised to Abraham over a millennium earlier (Ge 15:18).

27 Concerning the "foothills," see 1Ch 27:28.

28 On Solomon's imported horses, see 1:16.

29–31 The Chronicler's references to documents by Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo are taken up in the introduction. In 1Ki 11:41, "The book of the annals of Solomon" is mentioned by the author.

IV. The Kingdom of Judah (10:1–36:23)

The work of the Chronicler falls into four major parts. The last of these, which makes up chs. 10–36, concerns the kingdom of Judah. After Solomon's death in 930 B.C., the southern area, Judah, became separated from the northern area, Israel. This section of Chronicles has three unequal sections: (1) on the division (chs. 10–11); (2) on the rulers, good and bad, of the people of Judah (13:1–36:16); and (3) on its ultimate fate of exile into Babylon (36:17–23).

The final editor of 1 and 2 Kings, writing midway in the Exile, recognized this tragedy as the outworking of the moral righteousness of the Lord, as he rendered to his faithless people exactly what their deeds deserved (2Ki 17:7–23; 24:1–4). But the Chronicler, writing after the restoration of 538–536, recognized how God had been at work throughout these four centuries of Judah's decline, sovereignly accomplishing his holy purposes. The Lord's faithfulness to David continued steadfast (1Ch 17:13; cf. 2Ch 7:18).

A. The Division of the Kingdom (10:1–11:23)

Even in chs. 10–11, on the initial division, Ezra could say of Rehoboam's refusal to grant reforms, and of the rebellion at Shechem that resulted: "This turn of events was from God" (10:15; cf. Ge 50:20; Ac 2:23); and on the young king's attempt to resubdue Israel, he could quote God's word through the prophet, by which he prevented any such reunion: "This is my doing" (11:4). The overriding divine purpose was to separate the godly in Judah from the apostate in Israel (vv.6–22) and to concentrate in the south those who remained faithful out of the northern tribes: thus "they strengthened the kingdom of Judah" (v.17). The two chapters of this section draw largely on 1Ki 12; but see the comments on 10:19, which calls attention to the omission of the history of the north. Furthermore, 11:5–12 and 18–23 utilized some different, and later lost, source; for they now stand without parallel in the OT.

1 Solomon's son "Rehoboam went to Shechem" to be crowned ruler of Israel. He had already succeeded his father in Judah (9:31); but even though the Davidic dynasty had been constituted by the Lord's appointment (1Ch 17:14), each king was still subject to popular confirmation (v.4, cf. 1Ch 11:3). Rehoboam could reign only as a "constitutional" monarch and servant of the people (cf. comment on v.7) under God (cf. comment on 9:8 and 1Ch 28:5). Shechem lay thirty miles north of Jerusalem in Ephraim, on the border of Manasseh (Jos 17:7). It formed a center for the northern tribes and after this event became their first capital (1Ki 12:25).

2 Some years before, Jeroboam I ("son of Nebat") had been divinely anointed to be ruler over ten-twelfths of the nation of Israel (1Ki 11:26–40). It was because of this that he was "in Egypt," having "fled from Solomon."

3–4 The "heavy yoke" to which the northerners objected had resulted from Solomon's extravagances (1:17) at the expense of his people (cf. Dt 17:17, 20).

5 Without acceding to their request, Rehoboam remained, so far, fair and prudent in his conduct.

6–7 The parallel passage in 1Ki 12:7 quotes even stronger advice by the elders to the king: not simply that he "be kind" and "favorable" to the people, but that he "be a servant" and "serve" them.

8 The "young men" to whom Rehoboam preferred to turn were probably some of Solomon's many sons, rendered callous by upbringing in the luxurious harem and court at Jerusalem.

9 By his words "How should we answer these people," Rehoboam already identified himself with autocracy.

10–15 The whole course of events "was from God" (v.15), who had, through his prophet "Ahijah the Shilonite," ordained the division of the kingdom of Israel as a punishment for Solomon's decline into idolatry (1Ki 11:29–33).

16–17 The rebellious spirit of the northern Israelites against the Davidic dynasty that God had established was equally sinful (13:5–7). Their cry, literally, of "Every man to your tents," had been employed before, against David (2Sa 20:1). The situations of life in Palestine are naturally those of geographical isolation; its broken terrain encourages political disruption.

18 In his position over the "forced labor," Adoniram hardly constituted a wise choice for quieting Israel. He was probably one of the most hated figures in the land, an embodiment of oppression.

19 After this verse that summarizes "Israel's rebellion" (paralleled by 1Ki 12:19), 1Ki 12:20 proceeds to describe how the northern tribes made Jeroboam their king. Chronicles, however, omits it. Ezra dismisses the history of Israel from this point onward and concentrates on the faithful remnant in Judah.

11:1 As had been prophesied by Ahijah (see 10:15; cf. 1Ki 11:31–32), only the two tribes of "Judah and Benjamin" remained loyal to the Davidic dynasty (vv.3, 12). Their muster of 180,000 men seems to be the largest troop total found in Chronicles (granting the possibility that at some points the term rendered "thousands" may mean "chiefs"; see comments on 1Ch 7:3–4; 12:27), and it corresponds to the sum given in 1Ki 12:21. The figure is a plausible one, in light of the carefully enumerated listing of over 600,000 for the whole nation in Nu 1:46; 26:51. That, of course, was in the days of Moses; but the population would hardly have been less under Solomon than then (cf. the similar expressions of populousness given in Dt 1:10; 10:22; 1Ki 3:8; 4:20).

2 "Shemaiah the man of God" was the same prophet who later confronted Rehoboam, after his unfaithfulness and defeat by Egypt (12:5–7). He also composed one of the source records for his reign (12:15).

3 Ezra's phrase "all the Israelites in Judah and Benjamin" includes what 1Ki 12:23 specifies as "the rest" of the other tribes, i.e., the godly survivors out of a larger, apostate group (Lev 26:39, 44; Isa 20–23).

4 On the Lord's word "This is my doing," see comment on 10:15.

5 Having been prohibited from retaking Israel, Rehoboam proceeded to refortify "towns" in the territory that he still had "in Judah." In light of the unsettled times that lay ahead for Rehoboam (cf. 12:2, 15), he acted wisely.

6–12 The fifteen cities that Ezra lists lie toward Judah's southern and western borders. Their choice seems to have been dictated by threat from Egypt (12:2–4).

13–14 Jeroboam had rejected the Levites (cf. 1Ki 12:31) as part of his total policy of separating Israel from religious dependence on Judah (1Ki 12:26–28). The expression "Jeroboam and his sons," i.e., his successors, indicates that migrations by the faithful to Judah was a process that continued down through the years.

15 In addition to his golden "calf idols" (1Ki 12:28–29), this Ephraimite also set up images of goats (cf. Isa 13:21; 34:14).

16–17 Jeroboam's idolatries, though they were sinful in their goal of seeking to supplant the true worship of God in Jerusalem, still accomplished a providential function by driving the godly southward, so that they "strengthened the kingdom of Judah." The reason their migrations to the south were limited to a period of "three years" may have been simply because the godly became depleted in the north, but it may also have been due to Rehoboam's own lapse in the south (12:1–2).

18–20 In a summary of the royal family, with which the chapter concludes, Rehoboam's wife "Maacah" seems to have been a granddaughter of Absalom, through his immediate daughter Tamar, the wife of Uriel (13:2; cf. 2Sa 14:27; 18:18). Mahalath was thus, simultaneously, Rehoboam's second cousin (via Eliab) and half-cousin (via her father Jerimoth's unnamed mother), while Maacah was the king's half-cousin once removed.

21 By taking "eighteen wives" Rehoboam willfully disregarded the law of God, in respect to both kingly abuse (Dt 17:17) and polygamous marriage (Lev 18:18), not to mention his disregard of the disastrous precedent set by his father, Solomon.

22 The king's appointment of Abijah (see comment on 12:16) "to be the chief prince" may imply some form of coregency; compare a similar elevation received by Abijah's grandfather Solomon, when threatened by a disputed succession (cf. 1Ch 23:1; 29:22).

23 Rehoboam "acted wisely," not simply by delegating to some of his other sons a measure of the authority for national defenses that the divided kingdom of Solomon now required—and by providing them with property and wives—but particularly by "dispersing" them. It was a step that helped ensure the smooth transfer of power to Abijah (v.22).

B. The Rulers of Judah (12:1–36:16)

In the three and one-half centuries between the division of Solomon's kingdom in 930 B.C. and the Babylonian exile in 586, Judah experienced twenty rulers. The nineteen men and one woman varied in their abilities, from the strongest and best to the weakest and worst. The destiny of any country depends to a great extent on the character of its leaders; and this was particularly the case among the Hebrews, into whose history God chose to intervene more directly than he has for other nations. The Chronicler could thus stimulate the people of his day to a greater devotion by pointing them back to his nation's more faithful monarchs and to those earlier miracles by which the Lord had delivered Judah.

Yet at the same time, and out of the same historical data, Ezra warns his people against compromise with the world, against disregard for the law of God, and against apostasy from the Lord himself. Judah's overall history was one of religious decline. Sin became so ingrained that even a ruler like Josiah could not reverse its downward courses. In respect to any particular generation, God "can" cast away his people whom he foreknew (cf. Ro 11:1–2).

By and large 2Ch 12:1–36:16 corresponds to 1Ki 14:22–2Ki 24:20; but significant differences remain. Much of the material found in Kings is omitted from Chronicles, specifically the detailed lives of some of the prophets and, most obviously, the entire history of the northern kingdom (cf. 10:19). To the history, however, of Judah in the south, considerable material from other sources is added. Chronicles thus supplies us with inspiring (and inspired) examples of faith and deliverance that find no echo within the summaries provided by Kings.

1. Rehoboam (12:1–16)

The first ruler of the divided kingdom of Judah was Solomon's son Rehoboam, who reigned from 931 to 913 B.C. His kingship is the topic of 1Ki 14:21–31 and 2Ch 12. The latter chapter commences with his establishment (v.1a), after the division of Solomon's kingdom had become permanent (chs. 10–11). Chapter 12 then describes Rehoboam's punishment for abandoning the law of God (vv.1b–6) and the restoration that followed on his resubmission to him (vv.7–12). It concludes with a summary of the king's seventeen-year reign (vv.13–16).

1 The term "all Israel" now shifts from pointing to the entire nation (9:30) (1) to its northern half (in contrast to Judah, 11:1), (2) to "all the Israelites in Judah and Benjamin" (11:3), or, (3) as here (cf. NIV note), to Judah alone as constituting the true Israel. Rehoboam "abandoned" God's law by turning to the immoralities and polytheism of the surrounding Canaanites (1Ki 14:23–24; 15:12). Herein lay the ultimate cause for Egypt's invasion of Judah.

2 In the king's "fifth year" (925 B.C.), "Shishak attacked." Known in Egyptian history as Sheshonk I, he was the founder of the Twenty-Second Dynasty and its most energetic Pharaoh. This particular campaign is documented by a list of conquered Palestinian cities that stands to this day carved on the wall of his temple of Amon at Karnak, Thebes. An immediate cause lay in his desire for plunder, which was directed even more against his former protégé, Jeroboam, in the north (see 10:2) than against Judah.

3 The details preserved in vv.3–8 have no parallel in 1Ki 14. They would seem to derive from Ezra's special sources, particularly from the records of Shemaiah (v.15). Among Shishak's troops, the "Sukkites" were likely foreign mercenaries.

4 Concerning Judah's "captured . . . fortified cities," the destruction of Lachish is particularly attested by archaeology.

5 On "Shemaiah" see comment on 11:2.

6–7 "When . . . they humbled themselves," deliverance came soon (v.12). This principle possesses permanent validity for Christian living (cf. 1Pe 5:6), though Rehoboam seems not to have taken his own experience to heart (v.14).

8 The point that God wanted them to grasp was "the difference" between what results from serving the Lord and from serving the world (Mt 11:28–30).

9–11 Rehoboam's "bronze shields," with which he was forced to replace the gold ones (cf. 9:15–16), dramatically illustrate how his faithlessness reduced his condition to a mere imitation of the glory that had once been his.

12–14 Concerning God's putting his Name in Jerusalem (v.13), see 1Ch 22:7 and 2Ch 6:32.

15–16 Of the two literary sources cited by the Chronicler for this reign, it was the "records . . . of Iddo" that particularly dealt "with genealogies." The son who succeeded Rehoboam, "Abijah" (cf. 11:22–23), appears in 1Ki 14:31; 15:1; et al., under the name "Abijam." The latter may have been his personal name, as contrasted with his throne name in Chronicles (cf. 1Ch 3:12, 15).

2. Abijah (13:1–14:1a)

Chapter 13 concerns the second man who ruled over post-Solomonic Judah, Rehoboam's son Abijah (cf. on 12:16). The one prominent event of his three-year reign (913 to 911 B.C.) was his war with Jeroboam (1Ki 15:6–7). But while the parallel record about Abijah that appears in 1Ki 15:1–8 contains only the briefest of summaries, Ezra's independent sources (cf. 2Ch 13:22 on Iddo) furnished him with the details unique to Chronicles. They describe the bravery against great odds of Judah's new king, which sprang from his trust in the God whose law he obeyed (vv.3–12), and the triumph over Israel that came as a result (vv.12–21): "The men of Judah were victorious because they relied on the LORD, the God of their fathers" (v.18). The book of Kings does, however, include a negative evaluation of Abijah (1Ki 15:3–5), not reflected in Chronicles, "that his heart was not fully devoted to the LORD."

1–4 The exact location of "Mount Zemaraim" (v.4) is uncertain. The town of Zemaraim lay within the territory of Benjamin (Jos 18:22); so the battle must have occurred on the border between the "country of Ephraim" (Israel) and Judah, perhaps near Bethel (v.19), on the northern boundary of Benjamin.

5 The Lord had indeed "given the kingship of Israel to David and his descendants" and this was to be "forever" (1Ch 17:14), which seems to be the meaning of the phrase "a covenant of salt." Salt is well known as a preservative, hence the idea of "everlastingness."

6–7 The term "scoundrels" represents "the sons of Belial" (GK 1175 & 1201). But even though Belial, by NT times, had come to refer specifically to Satan (2Co 6:15) or the Antichrist (2Th 2:3), this OT word should be taken simply as a common noun, in its literal meaning of "worthlessness." Abijah recounts how such men "opposed Rehoboam ... when he was young." In point of fact his chronological age was forty-one (12:13); but he still was "indecisive," i.e., immature in his understanding and experience (cf. 10:8–15), so that he was not "strong enough to resist them."

8–9 Scripture says that Jeroboam made the golden calves to be gods; they were "other gods, idols made of metal" (1Ki 14:9). Jeroboam's own words in 1Ki 12:28—"Here are your gods, O Israel"—show his attitude toward them.

10 While at this point Abijah's affirmation "The LORD is our God" rings with sincerity, a longer view of his history requires some modification in evaluation; for "he committed all the sins his father had done before him" (1Ki 15:3, witness his polygamy, described in 2Ch 13:21; cf. Ezra's earlier evaluation of Rehoboam in 12:1). Also noteworthy is that the prophets of the northern and southern kingdoms had sanctioned the division. So Abijah used religious arguments for his own political ends. Yet since the northern kingdom had acted in unbelief and apostasy, his words carried some conviction.

11 Concerning the king's loyalty to the ceremonial laws of Moses, see the following comments: on the daily "offerings," see 1Ch 23:30; 2Ch 4:1; on the "fragrant incense," 2Ch 2:4; on the "bread" and its "table," 1Ch 9:32; 2Ch 4:8; on the "gold lampstand," 2Ch 4:7. Actually, Solomon's temple contained ten such tables and lampstands (4:7–8); but one of each of these may have been the original article dating back to Moses, hence the singular terminology.

12–14 The "priests with their trumpets" were to "sound the battle cry," specifically to call the Lord to their rescue (as in fact it came about, vv.14–15; cf. Nu 10:9). The king's final appeal, "Men of Israel, do not fight against the LORD," was particularly appropriate for Ezra to include, in light of the opposition that the Jews of his day faced from the Samaritans, in this same area of northern Israel. Jeroboam then attacked.

15 So "God routed Jeroboam," though whether this was through direct supernatural intervention or through the courage of his embattled people as they saw themselves surrounded by the enemy is not stated.

16–18 The slaughter inflicted on Ephraim of "five hundred chiefs," even if this term is not rendered as "thousands" (cf. comment on v.3), still represented the loss of over half "among Israel's" particularly "able men," a staggering blow for the limited northern kingdom.

19 Abijah "took ... Bethel," the actual center for Jeroboam's calf worship (1Ki 12:29, 33), though the idol itself had probably been removed for safe keeping to some place farther north before the city's capture. Significantly, some eighteen years later Bethel was reoccupied by the Ephraimites (cf. 16:1). "Jeshanah and Ephron" were located four miles north and northeast of Bethel respectively.

20 Judah's victory may have encouraged the Arameans of Damascus to enter into a treaty with Abijah (cf. 1Ki 15:19), which would further have impeded Jeroboam from "regaining power." The details on how "the LORD struck him down" are not elaborated elsewhere. His death occurred in 910 B.C., three years after Ahijah's own.

21–14:1a This particular volume of "the prophet Iddo" (cf. 9:29; 12:15) is called his "annotations" (GK 4535, meaning a "commentary," perhaps on the king's official court record).

3. Asa (14:1b–16:14)

This section concerns Asa son of Abijah (cf. 1Ki 15:9–24, the parallel section that has only sixteen verses and does not touch on major sections in 2Ch 14:3–15:15; 16:7–10). Out of the history of Asa's long reign, 911–870 B.C., Ezra selected four outstanding events for his record: (1) the king's first reform, dating to his initial ten years of peace (14:1b–8); (2) his victory over Zerah the Cushite in 897 (vv.9–15); (3) Judah's second reform that came as a result (ch. 15); and (4) the hostile moves made against Asa by Baasha of Israel in 895 and his series of religious deviations that followed (ch. 16). Asa, however, was still the most godly monarch to arise in Judah from the division of Solomon's kingdom up to this point (1Ki 15:11).

14:1b When Chronicles describes the country as being "at peace for ten years," this era would cover the first decade of Asa's rule, from 910 to 900 B.C., i.e., until the days before Zerah's invasion in 896 (cf. 15:19). Nine years of this period overlapped the reign of Baasha in Israel (909–886). In 1Ki 15:16 we read of war between these two rulers "throughout their reigns."But since 2Ch 4:1b explains that he built the cities "since the land was at peace," his actual conflict with Baasha must have broken out only subsequently. The peace, which may be traced back, in part, to Abijah's crushing defeat of Israel (13:17, 20), stemmed primarily from Asa's first reform (14:3–5) because, as he said, "We have sought the LORD our God . . . and he has given us rest" (v.7).

2–6 The king "removed . . . the high places," in obedience to Dt 12:2–3; but the people seem to have continued to resort to them, despite the royal purge (15:17). The "sacred stones" were Canaanite in origin and were thought quite literally to contain the local fertility gods, the Baalim. The "Asherah poles" were wooden and were associated with Baal's goddess-consort who bore this name. Both, when carved, became idols (cf. 1Ki 14:15).

7–8 As a conclusion to his description of Asa's initial reform and of the prosperity that resulted, the Chronicler enumerates Asa's army, with its three hundred specially trained men from Judah (the word "thousand," GK 547, should be translated "chief, officer, specially trained warrior") with "two hundred and eighty" special warriors "from Benjamin" (notice the contextual emphasis on their specialized weapons and their distinction as "brave fighting men").

9 Turning to the Cushite invasion (vv.9–15), Ezra enumerates the enemy as embracing, by contrast, "a thousand specialists" (cf. NIV note) "and three hundred chariots." "Cushites" (i.e., Nubians; cf. 1Ch 1:8) served as Egyptian mercenaries and, by the close of the next century, had come to rule all Egypt, as the Twenty-Fifth Dynasty (cf. on 2Ch 32:1). The name "Zerah" may be Osorkon I, second Pharaoh of the Twenty-Second Dynasty, who tried to duplicate the invasion and pillaging of his predecessor Sheshonk (cf. comment on 12:2). His forces may have attracted a mixed following of bedouin Arabs as well (cf. the reference to "camels" in v.15). But the results this time, against godly Asa, were quite the opposite of what had permitted the easy plundering of Rehoboam (12:9).

10 The "Valley of Zephathah" remains unidentifiable; but it did lie "near Mareshah," which was a town that marks the entrance into the Judean hills and was situated between Gaza and Jerusalem, lying twenty-five miles farther along to the northeast. It was one of the points that Rehoboam had fortified in anticipation of just such an attack as this (11:10).

11 This climactic verse may express the idea, as in the NIV, that "there is no one [person] like you" who can help the powerless but also the mighty. Yet fully as meaningful is the idea (so KJV) that it is no harder for God to help the powerless than the mighty (cf. 1Sa 14:6). The point is that for God the humanly impossible is as nothing (Ge 18:14); and Asa had the faith to commit himself to the Lord and to expect the impossible (cf. Mk 9:23).

12 Thus "the LORD struck down the Cushites," though again (cf. comment on 13:15) the detailed means that he employed are not stated.

13–14 Asa's army "pursued them as far as Gerar," located southeast of Gaza, on their presumed flight back to Egypt. History attests to the fact that "they could not recover": Israel experienced no more interference from the decadent Twenty-Second and Twenty-Third Egyptian dynasties. Not until 160 years later did Egypt reappear to trouble Israel (2Ki 17:4).

15 Judah also attacked "the camps of the herdsmen" (lit., "tents of cattle") that belonged to the Philistinized semi-nomadic cattle-tenders who were found in the area (cf. comment on v.9).

15:1 Asa's second great period of reform (cf. 14:2–8, on his earlier efforts) occupies 2Ch 15. His actions came as a result of the victory in 896 B.C. over the Cushites (14:12–15), and particularly because of the preaching of "Azariah son of Oded," a prophet who remains unknown apart from this passage.

2 The clause "If you seek him" recalls David's admonition to Solomon (1Ch 28:9); and Azariah went on to illustrate its truth from Israel's past history.

3 His words about the "long time" when "Israel was without the true God" probably refer to the lawless, and often faithless, days of the judges (Jdg 21:25). Their being "without the law" was closely connected with their being "without a priest," since one of the latter's major functions was "to teach" the law that God had given through Moses (Lev 10:11).

4–7 On God's being "found by them" when "they sought him" (v.4), see Jdg 2:18. On their situation being such that "it was not safe to travel about," see Jdg 5:6. The prophet concluded by appealing for resolute faith on their part, with the promise of reward from God.

8 Asa's renewed reformation involved the removal of Judah's "detestable idols," and also of the sexual immoralities that accompanied such originally Canaanite worship (1Ki 15:12). Much had already been accomplished earlier (14:3); but this second stage of reform took care of the yet remaining idolatrous abominations. It was also a more extensive removal, "from the whole land"; for it included areas Asa "had captured in the hills of Ephraim" during the five years of hostility that had immediately preceded (v.10; cf. 14:1). This in turn implies the accomplishment of certain Judean victories, not otherwise recorded, even as there must have been defeats too (cf. on 13:19; 16:1).

9 The statement that "large numbers had come over to him from Israel" illustrates how God's purpose in dividing Solomon's kingdom was in fact being achieved (cf. introduction to chs. 10–11; comments on 11:3, 14): a faithful "remnant" was being gathered and preserved. It may also help to explain, however, why Baasha of Israel proceeded to his acts of reprisal soon thereafter (16:1). On the coming of "people from . . . Simeon," see comments on 1Ch 4:24–43.

10–11 The "third month of" Asa's "fifteenth year" was May/June 895 B.C. The people may have "assembled at Jerusalem" at that time so as to observe the Feast of Weeks (Pentecost), one of Israel's three annual pilgrimage celebrations (cf. 1Ch 23:31; also Lev 23:15–21). This assembly probably took place in the year following Zerah's attack (v.19), since the pursuit, the gathering of plunder (v.11), and the occupying of the surrounding territories by Asa's forces (14:13–15) must have consumed several months.

12 The "covenant" (GK 1382) referred to here is the one great, everlasting testament of the Lord (see comment on 1Ch 16:15) that he decreed for the redemption of his people. The succeeding verses on Asa's "covenant renewal" bring out some of its basic features. First, on the objective side God provided for the restoration of fallen people back into fellowship with himself. The reality of this restoration is indicated by the fact that he had become "the God of their fathers." God thus entered into a saving relationship with his elect (Ge 17:7; Jer 31:34; Jn 17:6).

13–14 Second, on the subjective side, the people were to respond to him in faith and obedience. They therefore swore to "seek the LORD, the God of their fathers, with all their heart and soul" (v.12). Conformity on this particular occasion was enforced on pain of "death" (cf. Dt 17:26). It is preferable for a person to be restrained in this life than for him or her to be lost for eternity (Dt 13:12–15; Mk 9:43–48).

15 Third, the result is an inheritance of peace: "the LORD gave them rest on every side." The immediate rest granted to Judah was one of relief from her enemies, but it was indicative of a more fundamental rest that comes to all who have been accepted by God. Covenant rest embraces all the joys of redeemed life in the present (Ps 103), of heavenly life beyond the grave (Ps 73:23–26; Heb 4:9–11), and of ultimate life in the kingdom of God on earth (Ps 96:12–13; Rev 20:6; 22:5).

16 For the remaining verses of ch. 15, the parallel in 1Ki 15:13–16 resumes, thereby attesting to the reality of Asa's reform. Rehoboam's second wife, "Maacah" (see 11:20), was not only still living but must have been an influential figure at the Jerusalem court. Asa, however, has left a significant example to us through the way he placed religious loyalty above family loyalties, when he "deposed her from her position." The Kidron Valley, in which he burned her Asherah pole, is the gorge that lies between the east wall of Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives.

17 That Asa "did not remove the high places from Israel" is a commentary, not on the commendable programs of reform as instituted by the king himself (see comment on 14:3), but on the sad facts of the people's spiritual condition.

18 The treasures Asa "brought into the temple" (see 5:1) included "articles that he and his father had dedicated," namely, Abijah's spoils from Jeroboam (13:19) and his own from Zerah and his allies (14:13–15).

19 The NIV translation of this verse is subject to criticism on two counts. (1) The Hebrew lacks the word "more" and says simply, "There had not been war." (2) It is known that the king was involved in a serious conflict with Baasha (ch. 16), who died in the twenty-sixth year of Asa's reign (1Ki 15:16, 33). Baasha had thus been dead for almost a decade before Asa's thirty-fifth year. Perhaps Ezra's reference is to the thirty-fifth year after the division of the Solomonic kingdom in 930 B.C. and this verse relates then to Zerah's invasion in 896. It could thus be rendered, "There had not been war until the thirty-fifth year," which had reference to Asa's reign. However, the expression "the thirty-fifth year of Asa's reign" is exactly the same expression as in 16:1. Thus, it seems unlikely that 15:19 dates from the beginning of the kingdom and 16:1 from the beginning of his own reign. Another suggestion views the figures here and in 16:1 as twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth, respectively (cf. 1Ki 16:8).

16:1 Despite the king's two reforms and remarkable victory that are recorded in the two preceding chapters, ch. 16 proceeds to describe a series of religious deviations of which he became guilty in his later life: in relation to Israel (vv.1–9), to the prophet Hanani and others of his own people (v.10), and to his final illness (vv.11–14).

The "thirty-sixth year," which had reference to "Asa's reign" (see comment on 15:19), was 895 B.C.; and the event in question probably occurred after the assembly in May/June of that year (15:10). At this point Judah was confronted by "Baasha king of Israel." The latter had overthrown the dynasty of Jeroboam I, usurped the crown, and then reigned in Ephraim from 909 to 886 (1Ki 15:27–29, 33). He had been consistently hostile toward Asa (1Ki 15:16) and now became particularly aroused against him, probably because of the defection of many of his people south to Judah (2Ch 15:9). He advanced southward, apparently capturing Bethel at this time (cf. on 13:19). Baasha then "fortified Ramah," which lay on the main north-south highway along the Palestinian central ridge, only five miles north of Jerusalem. He thus effectively blockaded all movement into Judah.

2 Asa's response was to take "silver and gold"—all that he had (1Ki 15:18)—from the Jerusalem temple and palace to purchase help from the Aramean king, Ben Hadad I in Damascus. At one stroke Asa thereby sacrificed the results of his own piety (cf. 2Ch 15:18) and of God's blessing (14:13–14); he induced a pagan ruler to an act of perfidy (v.3) and precipitated a pattern of Syrian (Aramean) intervention into the affairs of Israel that would have disastrous results throughout the succeeding century (cf. 2Ki 10:32–33; 12:17–18); and, in the most serious deviation of all, he departed from the Lord by placing his primary dependence "on flesh" (Jer 17:5).

3 The earlier Syro-Judean treaty Asa referred to must have existed between Ben-Hadad's father Tabrimmon, the son of Hezion (1Ki 15:18), and Asa's father Abijah (cf. comment on 2Ch 13:20). This earlier ruler Hezion may perhaps be Rezon, the adversary of Solomon and the founder of the current kingdom in Damascus (1Ki 11:23–25); so the Arameans themselves had a history of switching allies at their convenience.

4 Ben-Hadad therefore conquered "Ijon," located east of the Leontes River, as it flows southward out of the Syrian Beka Valley between the Lebanon ranges, shortly before its course turns west into the Mediterranean; Ijon thus lay on a natural route south into Israel. Eight miles farther south, on the headwaters of the Jordan, was "Abel Maim"; and four miles east of it lay "Dan." The Arameans, indeed, took "all the store cities of Naphtali"—specified in 1 Kings as "all Kinnereth," meaning the plains on the northwest side of Galilee.

5 Faced with such losses in Israel's far north, "Baasha abandoned" his operation against the kingdom of Judah in the south, so that for the moment Asa's stratagem appeared to have succeeded.

6 The men of Judah reused the materials from Ramah to "build up Geba and Mizpah." Since we do not know the exact location of these cities, Asa was either counterattacking by pushing Judah's borders northward again or defensively drawing in his lines to the south.

7 Verses 7–10 are unique to Chronicles. "Hanani the seer" was father to Jehu the seer, who would later serve Asa's son Jehoshaphat (19:2; 20:34). He not only condemned Asa's loss of faith (see comment on v.2) but went on to speak of the success the king would have enjoyed had he not deviated from trusting God: the Aramean army would have been his. The point is that "Aram," as Baasha's ally (v.3), would presumably have joined with Israel in attacking Judah; and God would then have delivered over the entire enemy force to Asa.

8–9 Hanani also reminded the king of the fate of the "Cushites" (see NIV note) and of their accompanying Libyans (cf. 12:3; 14:9, 11). Hanani's reference to the "eyes of the LORD," as ranging "throughout the earth" was later repeated by God himself, speaking through a postexilic prophet Zechariah (Zec 4:10). The emphasis is that no problem can arise for God's people of which the Lord is not aware and from which he cannot deliver them (cf. Ro 8:32), provided their hearts are "fully committed" in respect to him.

But King Asa, from then on, would "be at war"—immediately with Baasha (1Ki 15:32), and, after the latter's death in 886, with his successors; for the state of constant belligerency between Israel and Judah seems to have terminated only in the reign of Asa's son Jehoshaphat (18:1), shortly before 865 (cf. comments on 18:2; 22:2).

10 Asa's reaction was to compound his sin by putting Hanani "in prison." This is the OT's first recorded royal persecution of a prophet, but many such instances were to follow (18:26; 24:21; Mk 6:17–18). One sin, moreover, leads to another; and he also "brutally oppressed some of the people."

11 Ezra here makes his first reference in 2 Chronicles (cf. 1Ch 9:1) to his primary literary source, "the book of the kings of Judah and Israel." This work cannot be our present 1, 2 Kings, which, instead of providing a fuller description of "the events of Asa's reign, from beginning to end," contain only a fraction of what appears in Chronicles (cf. introduction to chs. 14–16). This document seems to have been some extensive court chronicle that is now lost.

12 In his thirty-ninth year (871 B.C.), Asa deviated in still another direction, by seeking help for his foot disease "only from the physicians." While these may have been pagans, Scripture usually speaks positively of those who heal (Ex 21:19; Jer 8:22); medicine is God's gift (cf. 2Ki 20:7). The king's sin lay in having recourse to them only and not seeking "help from the LORD," who is the ultimate healer of diseases (2Ki 20:5; Ps 103:3).

13–14 Chronicles clarifies the general statement of 1Ki 10:24 that Asa "was buried with [his fathers] in the city of . . . David" by speaking of "the tomb" that he had cut out for himself. The "huge fire," with "spices" and "perfumes," was not for cremation but "in his honor."

4. Jehoshaphat (17:1–20:37)

The regnal years of Asa's son Jehoshaphat reached from 873 to 848 B.C. (cf. comment on 17:7–9). Many of the features, moreover, that the Chronicler records of Asa's reign reappear in his description of the reign of his son. These parallels extend even to its organization under four major headings (cf. introduction to chs. 14–16), which, for the career of Jehoshaphat, correspond to the textual divisions found in chs. 17–20. The first of these (ch. 17) reminds one of the account of Asa's first reform, as it describes how his son in 866 B.C. removed idolatry from Judah, taught God's law, and strengthened the kingdom. But even as Asa had entered into an unholy alliance with an Aramean king, Ben-Hadad I, so Jehoshaphat allied himself with the Ephraimite ruler, Ahab, and was thereby drawn into a nearly fatal campaign against Ramoth Gilead in 853 (ch. 18).

Furthermore, even as the prophet Azariah had preached to Asa and inaugurated the earlier king's second reformation, so Jehu son of Hanani directed Jehoshaphat into a further reform in religion and into reorganization in the administration of justice (ch. 19). Finally, just as Asa had had to face the invading Cushites from the southwest, so Jehoshaphat met and overcame a vast army from the east (20:1–30), by trusting in the Lord. A concluding section then summarizes Jehoshaphat's reign and speaks to the failure of his commercial alliance with Israel (20:31–37). Out of these portions only ch. 18, together with the concluding remarks in 20:13–37, finds a parallel in 1Ki 22:2–49.

1 Jehoshaphat's strengthening of "himself against Israel" was directed specifically against Ahab (874–853), second king of the dynasty founded by the military leader Omri, infamous for the Baal worship advocated by his wife Jezebel. Asa's hostility with the northern kingdom thus continued, at least initially, under his son (see comments on 16:9; 18:1).

2 The Ephraimite "towns . . . captured" by Asa included not simply the bastion of Ramah (cf. 16:1), but other communities as well (cf. 15:8).

3 The verse is perhaps better rendered "Jehoshaphat walked in the former ways" of his ancestor David, the Chronicler's implication being that David's latter ways were less exemplary (cf. 2Sa 11–21). Concretely Jehoshaphat disdained "the Baals"; each individual field had its own guiding master (baal; GK 1251), i.e., its own fertility spirit.

4–5 The practice of Israel, which Jehoshaphat also avoided, included Jeroboam's deviations in respect to the priesthood and the calendar, as well as his calf worship (cf. comment on 13:8; cf. 1Ki 12:28–33).

6 Concerning "the high places and the Asherah poles" that Jehoshaphat removed, see comment on 14:3. The introductory adverb "furthermore" is more normally rendered "and again he removed the high places." That is, Jehoshaphat renewed his father Asa's earlier opposition to local shrines (14:3; cf. 1Ki 22:46). Yet just as with Asa (see 2Ch 15:17), the king's official act was not sustained by his subjects: "The people continued to offer sacrifices and burn incense there" on the high places (1Ki 22:43).

7–9 Though Jehoshaphat's "reign" is said to have covered twenty-five years (20:31), i.e., 872–848 B.C., it can also be said to have terminated in only twenty-two years (eighteen, in 2Ki 3:1, plus four more, in 8:16), i.e., from the death of his father, Asa, in 869. Jehoshaphat must therefore have enjoyed an additional three-year coregency, commencing in 872, a procedure that was probably necessary because of Asa's illness, which became increasingly serious in the following year (see 16:12). Yet his dispatch of a religious teaching mission (17:7–9) seems sufficiently independent to suggest that what v.7 calls his "third year" must have been that "of his" sole "reign," or 867.

Jehoshaphat "stationed troops in all the fortified cities of Judah" (17:2). This is the ruins of one of Judah's fortresses in the 10–9th centuries B.C. They are only 25–70 meters in diameter, and most of the fortresses are on hills within eyesight of each other.

The mission consisted of five government officials, nine Levites, and two priests, as named. For Jehoshaphat seems to have recognized how important it was for all the leaders of God's people (cf. Mt 28:20) "to teach" them "the Book of the Law of the LORD" (the Pentateuch, at least Deuteronomy, though it could by this time have included the historical books through 2 Samuel and much of Psalms and Proverbs as well). Teaching was not limited to the professional Levites (Dt 33:10) and priests (Lev 10:11). They "went around to all the towns . . . and taught" (cf. the traveling evangelists mentioned in NT times, 3Jn 7–8).

10–18 The king's "experienced fighting men" (v.13) that he "kept in Jerusalem" involved five groups, that consisted respectively of 300, 280, 200, 200, and 180 specially trained leaders (reading in each verse "leader," rather than "thousand"; see comments on 1Ch 7:3–4 and 12:27). The total was thus 1,160 (not 1,160,000).

19 Yet even here, "these . . . who served the king" in the city of Jerusalem were specifically the five commanders, as listed. Portions of their followers would then have been stationed "in the fortified cities throughout Judah."

18:1 Chapter 18 is taken from 1Ki 22:2–35 and is the only extract from the records of Israel used by Ezra. His reason seems to have been because it involved King Jehoshaphat almost as much as King Ahab of Israel, and also because the message of the prophet Micaiah, about which the chapter centers, had spiritual applications that extended far beyond the career of Ahab (cf. esp. vv.7, 13, 19–20, 27).

Jehoshaphat "allied himself with Ahab." This act is not only condemned (19:2), but it is also seen as the root of far-reaching consequences, made all too clear by a series of disasters that followed (18:31; 20:37; 21:6; 22:7, 10). Initially it entailed the "marriage" of Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram to Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab. Their marriage, in turn, furnishes an approximate date for the alliance (c. 865 B.C.), because a child of this union (Ahaziah) was twenty-two at his own accession in 841 (22:2). A major cause that led to the alliance may be found in the growing threat of Assyria in the north. Its ruthless monarch Ashurnasirpal II (884–859) was already pressing into Lebanon; and his successor, Shalmaneser III, is known to have fought a drawn battle against a coalition of western states, including Damascus and Israel, at Qarqar on the Orontes River in 853.

2–3 Ahab urged Jehoshaphat to join him in a campaign to recover Ramoth Gilead. This was a key city on the eastern edge of Transjordanian Israel, south of the Yarmuk River, astride the Gilead trade route that went north to Damascus and beyond. It had been seized by the Aramean king of Damascus (16:4, or perhaps subsequently; cf. 1Ki 20:34); but Ahab may have felt that the Arameans had been sufficiently weakened by their losses at Qarqar to permit its recapture at this time, later in 853.

4 Though Jehoshaphat had already committed himself to the enterprise and he went on to disregard the divine guidance that was given him (v.28), he still retained the religion of the Lord to the extent that he insisted on seeking "the counsel of the LORD."

5 Jehoshaphat put little confidence in Ahab's four hundred court prophets (cf. v.6). These were men who confessedly spoke in the name of the Lord and not of Baal (vv.5, 10). But it was the Lord in the corrupted form of a golden calf (cf. 13:8); and their words were false (v.22), couched in terms that were calculated simply to please the hearers (v.12; cf. Mic 3:5, 11).

6–8 "Micaiah" remains unknown, apart from this incident. He never prophesied anything good about Ahab—because of the character of Ahab. The true prophets of Israel were, indeed, distinguished by the fact that they consistently warned their nation of the results of its sin (Jer 23:22; Mic 3:8).

9 The two kings sat on their thrones at "the gate of Samaria," the traditional place for rendering judgment (Ge 23:10; Ru 4:1).

10–11 The "iron horns" made by the false prophet Zedekiah were designed to symbolize victory for Ahab (Dt 33:17), but perhaps also to accomplish it, insofar as they were superstitiously believed to contain magical potency.

12–13 The true prophet Micaiah, by contrast, could tell the king "only what . . . God says." The revelations that he transmitted were objectively received and were distinguishable from the subjective thoughts and desires of his own heart (Jer 14:14; cf. 42:4, 7).

14–15 Micaiah's words "Attack and be victorious" were spoken in irony, as the tone of his voice must have immediately indicated to Ahab.

16–17 Micaiah's serious but figurative words "These people have no masters" continue the analogy of flocks and shepherds (cf. Nu 27:16–17); they were a prediction of Ahab's death in battle (2Ch 18:34). But the Hebrew troops would be free to "go home in peace," as brought about by the very orders of the Aramean king Ben-Hadad II, that his men were to fight only against Ahab (v.30).

18–19 As "Micaiah continued," with his vision of heaven itself, he spoke of "the host," or army, that was standing on either side of the Lord, which consisted of angelic spirits (cf. the "sons of God" in Job 1:6). The Lord's question in v.19, "Who will lure Ahab . . . to his death?" testifies to the truth that God can work through spirits to incite evil people like Ahab to manifest their sin and thus be led either to punishment or to repentance (cf. 1Sa 16:14–15; 18:10–11).

20–21 The Hebrew that underlies the phrase rendered "a spirit came forward" reads literally, "the [well-known] spirit came forward," i.e., Satan the tempter (as in Job 1:6–12). Apparently Micaiah seems to have assumed among his hearers a working knowledge of the book of Job, as already recorded in the days of Solomon.

22 The seer's emphatic phrase "these prophets of yours" underlines their differentiation from God's true prophets.

23 The way Zedekiah "slapped Micaiah on the face" indicates in itself that the Holy Spirit was not present with him (Jas 3:17; but cf. 2Ki 1:10–12). Yet his brazen claim to possess "the Spirit of the LORD" (NIV note) need not be watered down—though he may not have been personally aware that his optimistic message had in fact been supernaturally implanted in his mind, by Satan. Zedekiah's next words are difficult. He seems to be acknowledging Micaiah's claim that the Lord's Spirit had come "to speak to" him; but he asks, "Which way did the Spirit" actually "go when he went from me?" Not, presumably, to Micaiah!

24 Micaiah's rejoinder was to predict that Zedekiah would "go to hide in an inner room." Its fulfillment is unknown; but the prophecy seems to suggest an attempt on his part to escape pursuit, perhaps as Ahab's family would take vengeance on the false prophets, after the king's death.

25–26 Ahab's orders to send Micaiah back to the magistrate "Amon" imply that the prophet had already been put in custody at the time. A precedent for persecution of prophets had been set under Asa (cf. comment on 16:10).

27 The prophet's final statement, "Mark my words, all you people," was addressed to a plurality (lit., "peoples, nations"; GK 6639). He was calling all the world to serve as his witness (cf. Mic 1:2).

28–29 Ahab's plan to "enter the battle in disguise" was a futile attempt to escape the decree of God (v.16), and it failed (v.33).

30 Ben-Hadad's plan, in turn, to concentrate on no one "except the king of Israel" assumed that if Ahab could once be taken, the war would be won (cf. 2Sa 21:17)—and it was also the means for fulfilling Micaiah's prophetic vision.

31–32 The words "and the LORD helped [Jehoshaphat]. God drew them away from him" are an addition by Ezra, not found in 1Ki 22:32. However, they (1) show the seriousness of Jehoshaphat's deviation, how he would have reaped a fatal fruit from his sinful alliance with Ahab, had God not intervened; (2) suggest the reality of his faith, that when "Jehoshaphat cried out," this was not just an expression of fear on his part but apparently a prayer for divine help; and (3) demonstrate the greatness of the grace of God, rescuing people without a need for man-made alliances, or even, as in this case, in spite of them.

33–34 The arrow then struck King Ahab in a vulnerable spot—between the "scaly mail" armor and its "appendages," i.e., penetrating the abdomen. With his death, 2Ch 18 closes; 1Ki 22 has five more verses (vv.36–40) with further details, which Ezra omitted as less relevant for his particular audience.

19:1 Jehoshaphat's safe return from Ramoth Gilead fulfilled a final detail in Micaiah's prophecy (see comment on 18:16).

2 Hanani the seer had confronted King Asa half a century earlier (see comment on 16:7); and his son Jehu the seer had already condemned the dynasty of Baasha in Israel, some thirty-five years before this occasion in 853 B.C. (1Ki 16:1, 7). Jehu's message was once again a negative one, opposing Jehoshaphat's alliance with Israel (see comment on 18:1). But he went beyond the specific matter of this alliance and raised a more general ethical question, "Should you ... love those who hate the LORD?" (cf. Mt 5:44).

Jehu therefore announced to the king, "The wrath of the LORD is upon you." In fact, it already had been (18:31), and it still would be (20:1, 37; 22:10). Unlike his father, Asa, however, who had refused to humble himself before God when confronted by Jehu's father Hanani (cf. 16:10), Jehoshaphat did submit to the judgment of God as conveyed by Jehu. This encounter, indeed, seems to have precipitated the king's second great reform, both in its religious aspect (v.4) and in its judicial implications (vv.5–11).

3 Jehu himself seems to have anticipated the king's positive response by his balanced acknowledgment, both of "some good" in him (cf. the approval soon to be granted Jehoshaphat by Elisha, 2Ki 3:14) and of some of the values that had emerged from his first reform, particularly the elimination of the "Asherah poles" (17:6; cf. 14:3).

4–7 Jehoshaphat's admonition to the newly appointed judges, that they were "not judging for man but for the LORD," is a standing reminder that good government springs from commitment to God.

8 "In Jerusalem ... Jehoshaphat appointed some of the Levites" to serve on the central court of appeals and "to settle disputes." If the chronological order here is correct, Jehoshaphat's new judges were not appointed at the time the king had gone out (v.4) among the provinces (so as to be able to "return" with him); rather, they were already "in Jerusalem."

9–10 Israel's faithful judges were not simply to decide cases and render verdicts but were also to "warn" (GK 2302) their "brothers" against sin in the sight of God. They too were responsible to the Lord, and their ultimate motivation was to live so that divine "wrath" would not "come on" either them or their fellow Hebrews.

11 In the Pentateuch religious, civil, and moral law are juxtaposed, often without differentiation. Among the earlier prophets Samuel had begun to insist on certain priorities: that to obey was better than to sacrifice (1Sa 15:22), though Moses himself put love of God (Dt 6) and faith (Dt 7) before detailed legislation (Dt 12–26). Now, however, a distinction is explicitly made (though perhaps based on Dt 17:9, 12) between matters "concerning the LORD" and "matters concerning the king." Among the later prophets the difference between moral law and ceremonial law was sharply drawn (Isa 1:11–17; Am 5:21–24). Under Jehoshaphat's judges, Levites were to "serve as officials" (GK 8835).

20:1 Soon after 853 B.C. (see comments on 18:3; 20:35), Jehoshaphat faced an unexpected invasion by the combined forces of Moab, Ammon, and "the Meunites" (cf. 1Ch 4:41; 2Ch 26:7). These last were a people of Mount Seir in Edom (cf. vv.10, 22–23), perhaps from Maon, near Petra.

2 The enemy forces attacked by means of a little-used route, advancing around the south, or the Edomite end "of the [Dead] Sea," for they took "En Gedi," about midway on its western shore.

3–4 Jehoshaphat "proclaimed a fast" to emphasize in the presence of the "LORD" Judah's distress (cf. Jdg 20:26). Fasting did not exist as an official part of preexilic Hebrew religion (but cf. Lev 16:29–31); yet from the time of Samuel on, it had been employed to stress the sincerity of the prayers of God's people when they were facing special needs (1Sa 7:6; cf. Ac 13:2–3).

5 The "new courtyard" the king stood before was the temple's "large court" (see comment on 4:9); and it was probably called this because it was one of the innovations in Solomon's structure. Under him it had for the first time been separated from the "court of the priests." It is also possible that Jehoshaphat had recently restored it (cf. 17:12).

6–9 The king's plea, "If calamity comes upon us," was a quotation from Solomon's prayer that had been offered at the temple's dedication (6:28–30; cf. 7:13–15).

10–11 By referring also to Dt 2:5, which recorded how God would not "allow Israel to invade" the lands of Seir, Jehoshaphat was in effect calling on the Lord to honor Israel's obedience in this regard. He spoke also of God's specific bestowal on Israel of the very land that these enemies were in the process of invading.

12 Jehoshaphat's conclusion—"We have no power . . . but our eyes are upon you"—embodies a faith similar to that demonstrated by his father Asa (14:11).

13–15 Jahaziel's words, "The battle is not yours, but God's," reflect the spirit of David against Goliath (1Sa 17:47).

16–17 From a point seven miles north of En Gedi, "the Pass [ascent] of Ziz" wound inland, up to the Valley of Beracah (v.26), west of Tekoa, which was located south of Bethlehem toward Hebron. "Jeruel" lay on this same route, southeast of Tekoa. Jahaziel's further words, "Stand firm and see the deliverance the LORD will give you," reflect the speech of Moses at the Red Sea (Ex 14:13).

18–20 The "Desert of Tekoa" occupies a sharp drop-off, immediately to the east of the town. Jehoshaphat's words, "Have faith in the LORD your God and you will be upheld" were quoted a century later by Isaiah to King Ahaz (Isa 7:9; cf. 28:16; Mk 9:23).

21 At this point singers "went out at the head of the army," just as the ark of God and the priestly trumpeters had at Jericho (Jos 6:9). They praised the Lord "in [their] holy array" (cf. 1Ch 16:29), a rendering that seems preferable to that found in the NIV text.

22–30 The "ambushes" that the Lord then set against the invaders are not identified; but they may have consisted of some of the more rapacious Seirites (Edomites), since the men of Ammon and Moab proceeded to turn on the men of Mount Seir. The result was that "they helped to destroy one another," just as had occurred at the triumph of Gideon (Jdg 7:22). On the location of the Valley of "Beracah" ("blessing" or "praise"), see comment on v.16.

31–33 Here alone, for the concluding portion of ch. 20 (vv.31–37), information parallel to 1Ki 22 appears (vv.41–49). On the acknowledged failure to eliminate Judah's "high places," see comment on 17:6.

34 On "the annals of Jehu" being "recorded in the book of the kings," see comment on 32:32.

35 Jehoshaphat's "alliance with" Ahab's son "Ahaziah" belongs to the brief period of the latter's reign over Israel, 853–852 B.C.

36 On ships being "built at Ezion Geber," see 8:17. Archaeology indicates that after the demise of the original Solomonic settlement there, the site's second occupational level dates to the days of Jehoshaphat in the ninth century, though it seems soon to have fallen into Edomite hands (cf. 21:8). The phrase "trading ships" interprets a more literal rendering of the Hebrew, i.e., "ships that could go to Tarshish" (NIV note). The thought is that these vessels belonged to the class of ships that went to Tarshish (see comment on 9:21); their actual destination was Ophir (see comment on 8:18; cf. 1Ki 22:48).

37 The prophet "Eliezer . . . of Mareshah" is unknown apart from this passage. But because of Jehoshaphat's sin in allying himself with the wicked Ahaziah (v.35), which Eliezer condemned, the ships were wrecked; for God will not honor a compromising alliance. The NIV text says that they were therefore "not able to set sail to trade," which represents the general idea of the Hebrew; but it may be rendered more closely that they were "never fit to sail to Tarshish" or to anywhere else, including their particular goal of Ophir (cf. v.36). First Kings 22:49 adds that Jehoshaphat then refused Ahaziah's offer for a joint sailing endeavor.

5. Jehoram (21:1–20)

The sole reign of Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram extended from 848 to 841 B.C. and forms the subject of 2Ch 21. Dominating the chapter is the sad fact that Jehoram was married to Ahab's daughter and that he "walked in [their] ways" (v.6). It therefore describes, on the one hand, his viciousness and apostasy (vv.1–11) and, on the other, his condemnation, delivered through the prophet Elijah, and his overwhelming failures, both national and personal that came as a result (vv.12–20). Much of the first half of the chapter corresponds to the same information (though cf. v.2) found in 1Ki 22:50 and 2Ki 8:17–22, with some elaboration by the Chronicler; but the second half (except for a few words in the king's death notice; cf. 2Ki 8:24) is without biblical parallel.

1 "Jehoshaphat . . . was buried . . . and his son succeeded him" as sole monarch, in 848 B.C. But since Jehoshaphat's eighteenth year (2Ki 3:1), four years before his death (see comment on 17:7), can simultaneously be designated as his son Jehoram's second year (2Ki 1:17), it appears that the latter must have been associated with his father on Judah's throne since 853.

2 Because vv.3–4 have no parallel in Kings, their context would seem to have been drawn from the lost court chronicle mentioned elsewhere by Ezra (20:34; 25:26; cf. comment on 16:11) or from other literary sources.

3 Jehoshaphat's giving his six younger sons "many gifts," but also dispersing them throughout the "cities in Judah," shows that he was following the wise policy established by his great-grandfather Rehoboam (cf. 11:23).

4 When Jehoram, however, proceeded to massacre his brothers (cf. 22:10; Jdg 9:5), along with certain "princes" (or "prominent officials"), he was already demonstrating the unholy influence of his ruthless wife, Athaliah. The latter herself became the instigator of the crime of 22:10 (cf. 1Ki 18:4; 19:2; 21:7–15). The king's personality had thus become twisted to the point that he apparently suspected others of acting as he would have, if they were given the opportunity. Yet his brothers' principles were, in fact, much higher than his own (v.13).

5–7 God's unwillingness "to destroy" the dynasty of David was what had preserved Judah previously as a kingdom, despite Solomon's sin (1Ki 11:12–13). God had made a covenant with David.

8 At this time, and "because Jehoram had forsaken the LORD" (v.10), "Edom rebelled" against its Hebrew governors (1Ki 22:47); indeed Moab, to Edom's north, had already become independent (2Ki 1:1).

9 When the king attempted to use force to reimpose his authority, "the Edomites surrounded his chariot commanders," almost overwhelming the Judean army. Jehoram then not only "broke through"; he also "struck them down" at Zair (2Ki 8:21), a few miles south of the site of his father's victory at Beracah (2Ch 20:26).

10 Jehoram failed, however, to quell Edom's "rebellion." His campaign thus parallels Israel's failure shortly before, when it had attempted to resubdue Moab (2Ki 3:6–27). Also in revolt at this time was "Libnah," a semi-Philistine city in the vicinity of Gath.

11 Jehoram built up the "high places," the very shrines that his father and grandfather had tried to eradicate (cf. 14:3; 17:6), where the people "prostituted themselves." Though the Canaanite worship thus reintroduced did involve sexual immorality (cf. 1Ki 22:46), the emphasis here is on how the king "led Judah astray" into faithlessness with respect to the Lord, her divine husband.

12–15 That Jehoram "received a letter from Elijah" has been labeled a product of the imagination, on the basis that Elijah had nothing to do with the southern kingdom and clearly was not living at this time (2Ki 3:11 [i.e., before Jehoshaphat's death and Jehoram's installation in 848 B.C.]). However, Elijah's career did involve the south, specifically "Beersheba in Judah" (1Ki 19:3); his flight took him, indeed, as far south as Sinai (v.8). Also, though Elijah's last dated act occurred in 852 (2Ki 1:3, 17), his translation to heaven (2:11) still need not have occurred till after Jehoram's accession as sole monarch over Judah and his crimes of slaughtering his brothers and his officials, in the year 848 (8:16). Elijah may, however, have been gone by the time of the delivery of his letter, so that its sentence of doom could have had the force of a voice coming from the dead.

16–17 The land's fortunes suffered a complete reversal; for "the Philistines," who had rendered tribute to Jehoram's father (2Ch 17:11), now "invaded Judah." They were joined by "the Arabs who lived near the Cushites," i.e., by nomads from the borderlands between Philistia and Egypt. In the outworkings of God's justice, the man who began by massacring his own brothers (v.4) ended by suffering the loss of his sons and wives (cf. 22:1).

18–20 The king's "incurable disease of the bowels" seems to have been some extreme form of dysentery. In further contrast to his father (cf. 16:14), he died without "fire in his honor." Jehoram's death was unmourned, without even normal burial "in the tombs of the kings" (cf. 24:25).

6. Ahaziah (22:1–9)

The reign of Jehoram's son Ahaziah ran its course during the one year of 841 B.C. (cf. v.2). Its theme is once again that of retribution (cf. 21:17); and, in Ahaziah's case, it was his sinful alliance with the wicked house of Ahab in Israel that brought about its own punishment (22:4) in the form of premature death for the young monarch (v.9). The sequence of events is explained in more detail in the parallel passage of 2Ki 8:25–10:14, though 2Ch 22 adds unique details from its own special sources (vv.1, 9b), as well as certain observations by Ezra (vv.4b, 7a) that are not found in Kings.

1 The Chronicler's supplementary notice that Ahaziah was made king by "the people of Jerusalem" suggests that there was some uncertainty about the succession (cf. 23:13; 2Ki 23:30), perhaps because of the threat of Ahaziah's own mother, the ruthless Athaliah (cf. v.10). Concerning "the raiders who . . . had killed all" Jehoram's "older sons," see 21:17.

2 The reading found in the LXX and 2Ki 8:26 for Ahaziah's age (NIV note) of "twenty-two years" is to be adopted, rather than the Hebrew text's "forty-two," which would make him older than his father (cf. 21:20). His reign of "one year" fell entirely within the twelfth year of Joram of Israel (2Ki 8:25; cf. 3:1), whose death occurred at the same time as his own (9:24, 27), so that his rule must actually have been only a few months.

3–4 The way that Ahaziah's mother "encouraged him in doing wrong" is explained by this queen's patronizing of the Phoenician Baal worship of her stepmother Jezebel (cf. 23:17), and is a further testimony to the dominating influence of both these evil women (21:6; cf. 21:4 and Dt 7:3). Ahaziah was not only encouraged to do evil by his mother, but he also followed the bad advice of the members of the house related to him through his mother. This was "to his undoing."

5 The Transjordanian Israelite city of "Ramoth Gilead" had been seized by the Arameans (18:2), and Ahab's attempt at its recovery in 853 had led instead to his own death (18:34). Yet with the murder of the Aramean king Ben Hadad II by Hazael some ten years later (2Ki 8:7–15), Ahab's son "Joram" recaptured the city, but only to be attacked in 841 by Hazael (2Ki 9:14), who wounded Joram there.

6 Joram returned from Ramoth to Jezreel, at the head of the Esdraelon Valley, where his father Ahab's palace was located (1Ki 21:1) and where his nephew Ahaziah "went down to see him."

7 The full record of how "the LORD had anointed Jehu to destroy the house of Ahab" is contained in 2Ki 9.

8 It was only after Ahaziah's own death (v.9) that Jehu killed the forty-two relatives of Ahaziah (2Ki 10:12–14).

9 This verse should probably begin "he also [not he then] went in search of Ahaziah." The final movements of Ahaziah are difficult to trace but may perhaps be reconstructed as follows: he fled south from Jezreel so as to hide "in Samaria. He was brought to Jehu," who fatally wounded him near Ibleam (between Jezreel and Samaria); he fled by chariot northwest to Megiddo, where he died (2Ki 9:27); and his body was carried by Ahaziah's servants to Jerusalem (9:28), where they buried him.

8. Athaliah (22:10–23:21)

This section draws on its canonical source in 2Ki 11 and follows it rather closely. It shows how Jehoshaphat's marriage alliance with the house of Ahab (18:1) eventually resulted in an attempt to exterminate the dynasty of David and in the official paganizing of Judah. For after the death of her last remaining son (22:1, 9), Athaliah proceeded to slaughter her own royal grandchildren—so as to ensure the throne for herself—and to establish the sort of Baal worship her mother Jezebel had been devoted to as the state religion of the southern kingdom. Under the protection, however, of the high priest Jehoiada, a single, one-year-old son of Ahaziah, named Joash, survived (22:10–12). Finally, when the land had become seven, Jehoiada carried through a revolt that brought about the coronation of Joash (23:1–11), the execution of Athaliah (vv.12–15), and the extirpation of her false worship (vv.16–21).

10 The reign of Israel's only queen, Athaliah the mother of Ahaziah, extended for six full years, from 841 to 835 B.C. (cf. 22:12; 23:1).

11–12 "Jehosheba" (cf. 2Ki 11:2), a sister of the late king Ahaziah, rescued her infant nephew Joash by hiding him "in a bedroom," i.e., in one of the palace rooms where mattresses and bedding were stored. Chronicles reveals the fact, otherwise unrecorded, that she was also the "wife of the [high] priest Jehoiada," who must have been many years her senior (cf. 24:15). The two of them later removed Joash to "the temple of God" for safety.

23:1 As explained in 2Ki 11:4, the five "commanders of units of a hundred" were the officers of the Carites (cf. the Cherethites, 1Ch 18:17) and of other elements of the royal guard.

2 The gathering of "the Levites and [clan] heads" is not mentioned in 2Ki 11, but such an action is not thereby rendered suspect. It must have been accomplished with considerable secrecy, since the uprising caught Queen Athaliah wholly by surprise (v.13).

3 "The covenant with the king" was made specifically with Jehoiada as his protector (v.1; 2Ki 11:4). Once again we see the requirement of popular confirmation, which played so prominent a part in the history of the succession of Israel's "constitutional monarchs" (cf. 1Ch 11:3; 2Ch 10:1).

4–7 The situation of the "priests and Levites" as "going on duty on the Sabbath" was that which concerned the changing of the Levitical courses in their temple service (cf. 1Ch 24:4, 20). The sentence reads literally, "the third [of you priests . . .]"—with the definite article in the Hebrew—since, as 2Ki 11:5–7 makes clear, this group contrasts with the other two-thirds, who were going off duty. The former were "to keep watch at the doors," both of the palace (2Ki 11:5) and of the temple, to prevent any unauthorized, non-Levitical personnel from entering the sanctuary (2Ch 23:6).

Verse 5, as shown by 2Ki 11:5b–6, constitutes a parenthesis that identifies the three parts of the third who were coming on duty: (1) those "at the royal palace" (which might mean simply "the house of the king," i.e., his chamber in the temple, 22:12, for Athaliah's palace remained open, 23:12); (2) those "at the Foundation Gate" (called the Sur Gate in 2Ki 11:6, a temple gate of uncertain location); and (3) those "in the courtyards of the temple" (specified in Kings as stationed at the gate behind the guard).

8–9 Ezra here introduces the two companies of Levites "who were going off duty": they had not been released but instead were assigned to guard the temple for the king (2Ki 11:7) with the weapons that were being kept there.

10 When Jehoiada is said to have "stationed all the men," this company must have included the non-Levitical clan heads (v.2) and such of the royal guard as may have been considered faithful by the five commanders who had entered into the covenant with him (v.1).

11 The "copy of the covenant" that Joash was given (lit., "the testimony"; GK 6343) may have been simply the terms of the contract under which he was to rule but was more likely the required scroll of the law of Moses, which testified both to his royal position under God and to his responsibilities for godly conduct while in office (Dt 17:18–19). Chronicles adds to 2Ki 11:12 that it was the high priest "Jehoiada and his son" who "anointed" Joash.

12–13 In support of Joash there came "all the people of the land," who are here distinguished from the military officers. They did not form a party or a social class (though in postexilic times the expression did come to designate the non-Jewish inhabitants of Palestine, who hindered the work of restoration by the returning exiles).

14–16 Along with Jehoiada's political revolution came a corresponding religious revival—that king, priest, and citizenry would together "be the LORD's people" (v.16). This included their reaffirmation of the southern kingdom's limited monarchy, in which all its social elements pledged allegiance to God as their ultimate Sovereign (cf. vv.3, 11).

17 The execution of "Mattan the priest of Baal" carried out the requirement of God's Word directed against those who should lead others into false religion (Dt 13:5–10).

18–21 The priests then reestablished the true worship, according to the prescriptions of Moses and of David for the Levitical priests (1Ch 23) and for the singers (ch. 25).

8. Joash (24:1–27)

Joash, the young son of Ahaziah and grandson of Athaliah, reigned over Judah for forty years, from 835 to 796 B.C. His rule, moreover, serves as a characterization in miniature for the historical course of his entire nation. During the earlier years of his reign, Joash lived uprightly, honoring the Lord and providing for the temple, whose structure and sacrificial services depicted God's eternal plan of salvation (vv.1–14). But in later years he departed both from the Lord and from his sanctuary (vv.15–19; cf. Mt 21:13); he murdered the prophet who rebuked him, who was the son of the very priest who had preserved, enthroned, and guided him up to this point (vv.20–22; cf. Mt 21:38); he suffered a humiliating subjugation to the forces of Damascus (vv.23–24; cf. Lk 19:43–44); and he died incapacitated by battle wounds and slain by his own officials for his crimes (vv.25–27; cf. Mt 21:41). Just as Asa's rejection of the prophetic word resulted in God's judgment, military troubles, downfall, and, ultimately, death (presumably from his diseased foot), so was the fate of Joash. This chapter stands in general parallel to 2Ki 12, but with supplements of varying length—ranging from the one verse summary of Joash's family (v.3) to the four paragraphs concerning his lapse at the death of Jehoiada (vv.15–22)—which probably derived from Ezra's special source called the "annotations" (cf. v.27).

1–2 Joash began his career by doing "what was right in the eyes of the LORD," except that he had no success in removing Judah's high-place shrines (cf. 14:3; 2Ki 12:3); and he continued in his uprightness "all the years of Jehoiada" (cf. v.14), i.e., until some time after the twenty-third year of his reign, datable to 813 (2Ki 12:6). Following the death of his protector, however, he fell into serious sin (vv.17–18).

3 The fact he had "two wives" was censurable (cf. Dt 17:17), though Jehoiada may have felt that this was an improvement over the state of some of his royal predecessors (cf. 1Ch 14:3; 2Ch 11:21).

4–5 After the acts of vandalism and sacrilege committed under Athaliah (v.7), it had become necessary "to restore the temple." For this purpose he collected "money" (lit., "silver"; GK 4084); coinage entered the ancient world only during Israel's exilic period. "But the Levites did not act at once," both because of natural inertia (still true even of Christian workers) and because of the priestly demands that seem to have exhausted the normal revenues for current operations and for their own support (2Ki 12:7; cf. Nu 18:19). Yet the Chronicler, at least at this point, seems to view the priests in an overall better light than the Levites.

6 Concerning the "tax imposed by Moses," 2Ki 12:4 specifies three sources of revenue: "money collected in the census," a half-shekel per head (Ex 30:14; 38:26; Mt 17:24; cf. Ne 10:32); "money received from personal vows," in substitutionary redemption payments, varying from three to fifty shekels (Lev 27:1–8; Nu 18:15–16); and "money brought voluntarily to the temple."

7 On "the Baals," see comment on 17:3.

8 So Jehoiada (as stated in 2Ki 12:9) "made a chest," with an opening in its lid to receive the donations. The priests agreed to surrender responsibility, both for taking collections and for making repairs for the temple (12:8); their needs were henceforth to be met by "the money from the guilt offerings and sin offerings" (12:16; cf. Lev 5:16). The high priest then had it "placed outside, at the [south] gate of the temple," that is, to the right of the altar (2Ki 12:9).

9–12 A "proclamation was then issued" to publicize the new procedures (v.5) and to insure the payment of the Mosaic tax (v.6).

13–14 Thus "they rebuilt the temple"; for none of the precious metal that was received was converted into sacred equipment (2Ki 12:13), at least not till the repairs were finished. The author of 2Ki 12:15 brings out the commendable honesty and faithfulness of the workers.

15 The notice of the death of Jehoiada "at an age of a hundred and thirty" has led some to charge the Chronicler with a fictitious figure. But the literal count corresponds to actual history. The precise placement of this priest within the gap that occurs in the Aaronic genealogy (cf. 1Ch 6:10) between Ahimaaz's grandson Johanan (born c. 960 B.C.) and Azariah II (in 751, 2Ch 26:17) is unknown. If Jehoiada succeeded the high priest Amariah II (in 853, 2Ch 19:11; cf. 1Ch 6:4) at an age of 85, he would have expired in 808, some time before the death of his protégé Joash in 796. Jehoiada's span of life was unique at this period, but not impossible, particularly for a man specially blessed of God.

16 Jehoiada had become by marriage a brother-in-law to Joash's royal father Ahaziah (2Ch 22:11); but burial "with the kings" was still a marked honor, which stands in distinct contrast to Joash's own eventual fate (24:25).

17–18 The "officials of Judah," to whom Joash now listened, were of the class most attracted by the materialism of Baal worship (cf. Zep 1:8). They were also the first to suffer God's penalty for it (cf. v.23). Concerning "Asherah poles," see comment on 14:3.

19 Among the prophets sent to testify against Israel, some of the earlier ones, such as Shemaiah and Jehu, had been heeded (11:2; 12:5; 19:2); but the later ones—Hanani, Micaiah, and now Zechariah (16:7; 18:16; 24:20)—increasingly were not.

20 The expression that the Spirit "came upon" Zechariah means literally that he "clothed himself with" him (cf. 1Ch 12:18).

21–22 The expression that Joash did not remember Jehoiada's "kindness" (GK 2876) means the latter's "faithfulness." The king owed his power and position, and indeed his very life, to this priest's loyalty (ch. 23). Joash's murder of Jehoiada's son Zechariah has sometimes been interpreted as the event to which Jesus referred (Lk 11:51) as the last-recorded martyrdom in the OT canon; but this appears improbable. Our Lord's allusion most likely was to Zechariah the son of Berekiah (Mt 23:35; cf. Zec 1:1), coming at the close of the minor prophets.

Zechariah's dying prayer, "May the LORD see this and call you to account," is one of imprecation rather than of forgiveness; but it is justified because of Zechariah's position as the Lord's prophet and because of the king's wickedness in going against the Lord.

23–24 The invading Arameans are first said to have killed Judah's "leader" (GK 8569). They then sent to Damascus "all the plunder" of Jerusalem. Joash had stripped from the temple all the treasures that had been accumulated since the days of Asa (cf. 2Ki 12:18), whose sin thus reaped its final reward (cf. comments on 2Ch 16:2, 9). "Only a few" Arameans overcame "a much larger" Judean army, just as Moses had threatened (Lev 26:17).

25 The king's "officials" then assassinated him "in his bed" at the house of Millo (2Ki 12:20), probably in Jerusalem (cf. 1Ch 11:8). Chronicles adds that the reason for the conspiracy was to avenge Zechariah. But their act was still murder and is condemned (cf. 25:3). In 2Ki 12:21 Joash's s burial is described as being "with his fathers in the City of David"; but while Chronicles confirms this as to its general location, Ezra also specifies that it was "not in the tombs of the kings" (contrast v.16).

26–27 The "many prophecies" about Joash probably refer to such prophetic threatenings as are noted in vv.19–20. The Chronicler's literary source for this reign, "the annotations on the book of the kings," suggests some interpretation of the more basic court chronicle (cf. 13:22).

9. Amaziah (25:1–28)

This chapter concerns the reign of Joash's son Amaziah (796–767 B.C.). Except for an introduction on Amaziah's succession (vv.1–4) and a conclusion on his death (vv.25–28), it concentrates on two wars that he undertook and on the lessons to be learned from them: (1) his reconquest of Edom, through obedience to the Lord (vv.5–16); and (2) his ensuing defeat by Israel, in punishment for engaging in a form of idolatry to which he succumbed after his earlier victory (vv.17–24). His demise repeats a familiar theme: Rejecting God's prophetic word results in divine judgment, military defeat, downfall, and ultimately death. These data depend on and closely follow 2Ki 14:1–20. They are considerably augmented, however, by fresh material concerning the king's Ephraimite mercenaries (vv.5–10, 13) and his Edomite idolatry (vv.14–16, 20), presumably as drawn from the Chronicler's larger source cited in v.26.

The Edomite capital city of Sela (later called Petra; see comment on 25:11–12) was cut out of sheer rock. The only entrance into that city was through a narrow passageway in the rocks, making it one of the most secure cities in the ancient world.

1–2 Amaziah "did what was right" (cf. vv.4, 10), "but not wholeheartedly" (see vv.14, 16, 20). Notice also 2Ki 14:4, on how he allowed the high places to remain standing.

3–4 Though Amaziah executed his father's murderers, he spared "their sons," as had been prescribed by Moses (Dt 24:16).

5 Because of such losses as had been suffered under his father, Joash (24:23), Amaziah's muster of able men with "spear and shield" fell considerably short of the enumerations made under Asa and Jehoshaphat (see comment on 14:8; 17:14–18); but it still recorded the "three hundred" specially trained warriors (cf. comment on 1Ch 7:3–4; 12:37, that "thousand" should be rendered "chief").

6 Amaziah then "hired a hundred" more "from Israel," at the cost of an equal number of silver "talents." At twelve hundred ounces each, this sum meant something over three and three-fourths tons. But no support that is purchased from the ungodly, such as these Ephraimites were, could enjoy the Lord's blessing.

7–10 A man of God confronted the king, reminding him that it is God who has the controlling "power to help or to overthrow." Amaziah then asked what he should do with his hired mercenaries. On the prophet's advice, Amaziah dismissed them, who, despite their payment, were furious over the loss of what they had anticipated as further plunder. But the king was placing his trust in God, just as his fathers had done (cf. 14:11; 20:12).

11–12 "Seir," or Edom, had now continued independent from Judah for half a century (21:8); and it was ruthlessly subjugated. The decisive battle occurred at "the Valley of Salt," which had been the scene of David's victory two hundred years before (1Ch 18:12). It probably lay at the southern end of the Dead Sea. Amaziah eventually occupied the Edomite capital of Sela (2Ki 14:7)—the later famed city of Petra.

13 The Ephraimite mercenaries "that Amaziah had sent back" proceeded to vent their rage by pillaging Judah's frontier towns in northwestern Benjamin. Thus Amaziah's initial reliance on human beings (vv.6–7) brought about its own punishment.

14–15 The futility of "gods, which could not save their own people" should have been obvious, but people still often tend to worship that which is demonstrably inadequate.

16 The king's silencing of the Lord's prophet at least involved no more than threats (contrast 16:10; 24:21).

17–19 Amaziah's pride over defeating Edom led him to challenge the far stronger kingdom of Jehoash (798–782) in Israel, the senselessness of which the latter proceeded to portray by his fable.

20–21 The battle was joined at "Beth Shemesh," fifteen miles west of Bethlehem, on Amaziah's own picked ground. This town lay "in Judah" on its Danite border (Jos 15:10).

22–24 The disaster that resulted for the king included the destruction of the least defensible portion of Jerusalem's wall, namely, the part facing north, "from the Ephraim Gate," on its west side, "to the Corner Gate," facing northeast. It also included the loss of the temple treasures that were "in the care of Obed-Edom," i.e., of the old Levitical family of gatekeepers and musicians that bore his name.

25–27 As a further divine punishment on Amaziah (cf. v.20), these losses led to a mounting conspiracy "against him in Jerusalem." At a preliminary stage his sixteen-year-old son Uzziah was elevated first to a twenty-three year coregency in 790 (26:1). A final stage was precipitated by Amaziah's flight to Lachish, twenty-five miles southwest of Jerusalem on the route to Egypt, in 767. If this represented an attempt by the ex-ruler to recover his throne, it failed; for his pursuers "killed him there."

28 Amaziah was buried in the "City of Judah" (i.e., Jerusalem), a later term for "the City of David" (2Ki 14:20).

10. Uzziah (26:1–23)

This chapter concerns Amaziah's son Uzziah, whose total reign extended from 790 to 739 B.C. His career runs parallel to those of his father, Amaziah, and grandfather, Joash: for the earlier portion of all three of these long reigns was marked by piety and by a corresponding prosperity (see vv.1–15). But the latter part of each introduced some more or less serious religious deviation, which in Uzziah's case resulted in his suffering a stroke of leprosy, a banishment from his own palace, and, eventually, death (vv. 16–23). Yet his failure was less far reaching than the outright idolatry practiced by his immediate predecessors, and his achievements mark him off as one of the half-dozen leading monarchs of Judah. The content of most of ch. 26 is unique to Chronicles, since 2Ki 14:21–22; 15:1–7 present little more than a summary of his reign.

1 The new king's designation, "Uzziah," was apparently his throne name. His personal name, Azariah (NIV note), appears in eight of the twelve references that are made to him in Kings, and also in the genealogical recapitulation found in 1Ch 3:12, perhaps because the use of his personal name may have been resumed after he became a leper. Since he was sixteen years old at his accession as coregent in 790 (see comment on 25:25–27), he must have been born when his father was fifteen (25:1). Early marriages were not uncommon in the ancient Near East.

2–3 The "Elath" that Uzziah "rebuilt" has been identified with Period III of Tell el Kheleifeh. The statement that this occurred only after Amaziah's death (in 767) confirms the reconstruction of Uzziah's accession, noted under 25:27, as occurring some time prior to the demise of his father.

4 "He did what was right," even though 2Ki 15:4 cautions that the high places still remained. Furthermore, below the surface prosperity that was enjoyed by both kingdoms at this time, the contemporaneous preaching of Hosea and Amos indicates the presence of serious moral and spiritual decay.

5 Uzziah's mentor, Zechariah, though apparently familiar to Ezra, can no longer be identified today. The God-given success that resulted for Uzziah is borne out historically. The four decades that marked his overlapping reign with Jeroboam II in the north, from 790 to 750 B.C., have been called Israel's "Indian summer" (cf. vv.8, 15): a time when the Assyrians, who had weakened Israel's Aramean enemies at Damascus on its northeastern border (cf. 2Ki 12:17–19; 13:3–5), had not yet begun their own destruction of the Hebrew states (cf. 15:19, 29). Yet by the time of Uzziah's death, the prophets were expressing forebodings about what lay ahead (Isa 6:1, 11–12).

6 In his western offensive, the king overpowered three Philistine centers: "Gath," the most inland city (and the most exposed to Hebrew attack), whose destruction left the Philistines with only four main cities thereafter (cf. Am 1:6–8; Zep 2:4); "Ashdod," near the Mediterranean, the one that lay almost directly west of Jerusalem; and the smaller town of "Jabneh," which stood about ten miles farther north, between Ekron and the Sea (Jos 15:11).

7–8 "The Arabs" from the unknown site of "Gur Baal" and "the Meunites" seem to have been nomadic enemies of Judah, inhabiting its southeastern border.

9 "The Corner Gate" (25:23), "the Valley Gate," and "the angle of the wall" were located at northeastern, southwestern, and eastern points, respectively, of Jerusalem's fortifications (Ne 3:13, 19, 31).

10 The reality of Uzziah's "towers in the desert" (of arid southern Judah) has been validated by the discovery of an eighth-century tower at Qumran. Concerning "the foothills," see comment on 1Ch 27:28. "The plain" then refers to the plateau of Transjordan; for though this area had formerly been under Ephraimite control, Uzziah seems to have regained it from the Ammonites, who had occupied it (v.8).

11–12 To muster Judah's troops, Maaseiah held the post of "officer" (GK 8853), a scribal or mustering official (Ex 5:6).

13–14 While a figure of 2,600 for the "family leaders" placed "over the fighting men" (v.12) seems appropriate for a strong kingdom like Uzziah's, the enumeration of his more professional soldiers should probably be taken to read 300 special warriors (the same number as Amaziah's; see comment on 25:5), together with 7,500 "men trained for war."

15 The description of his "machines . . . on the towers . . . to hurl stones" has been interpreted to mean devices from which to hurl stones; i.e., they were shielding mantles, used to cover defending troops as they repelled enemies seeking to scale the walls; for question exists about the use of catapult machines at this time.

16 In the chapter's latter section, on Uzziah's religious deviation, his sin in entering the temple to burn incense consisted not simply in usurping what was an exclusively priestly prerogative (v.18; Ex 30:7–8; cf. Nu 18:7), but perhaps also in arrogating to himself a Canaanite type of office, of semi-divine priest-king (see Ge 14:18; cf. Nu 12:10).

17–18 "Azariah the priest," who withstood the king, is probably Azariah II, as listed in 1Ch 6.

19–21 The "separate house" Uzziah as a leper had to stay in is literally "house of [the] freedom" (cf. NIV note). His son "Jotham" assumed coregency in the palace. The date of this transfer of power is 751 B.C., since Jotham's twentieth year (2Ki 15:30) was equivalent to his son Ahaz's twelfth (16:2), which is 732.

22 "The prophet Isaiah" recorded the other events of Uzziah's reign, though this work is now lost, even as Isaiah later did for those of Hezekiah's reign (see comment on 32:32).

23 Rather than suggesting that Uzziah was buried only "near" his fathers because "he had leprosy," one might more naturally render the Hebrew as that he was "buried with" them, and then conclude the thought either negatively—"in a field for burial . . . for" he was a leper—or more positively—"with them, although" he was a leper; that is, he was honored in death despite his malady.

11. Jotham (27:1–9)

The official sixteen-year kingship of Uzziah's son Jotham extended from 751 to 736 B.C., but it overlapped the reigns of his predecessor (cf. comment on 26:19–21) and successor (see comment on v.8) to such a degree that he himself is left with little independent notice in Scripture. The nine verses here furnish some elaboration on the even briefer notices that relate to this monarch in the parallel passage of 2Ki 15:32–38; and they most notably concern his victory over the Ammonites, together with its evaluation (vv.5–6). Jotham was a good king, and God rewarded his righteousness (vv.2, 6).

1 Since Jotham's reign lasted for a total of "sixteen years," the reference to its "twentieth year" in 2Ki 15:30 must be prophetic—for Jotham's successor had not yet been introduced in Kings at this point, or even Jotham himself.

2 The "corrupt practices" of his people are explained elsewhere in Scripture as consisting of sacrificial services carried out on Judah's high places, with accompanying immoralities, idolatries, and superstitions (2Ki 15:35; cf. Isa 1–6, which pertains to this period).

3–4 The temple's "Upper Gate" (cf. 23:20), which "Jotham rebuilt," was situated on its north side (Jer 20:2; Eze 9:2). The "hill of Ophel," on the other hand, lay to its south, in the upper part of the old city of David.

5 Included in the tribute that the king gained from Ammon was a considerable sum of silver.

6 A testimony to Jotham's "power" has been the discovery of his official seal at Ezion Geber, Judah's outpost that continued under Hebrew control throughout his reign.

7 The reference to "all" Jotham's wars suggests that prior to the Ammonite campaign (v.5), for which as king he had sole responsibility, he may have served as field commander for the alliance that was conceived by his quarantined father, Azariah-Uzziah (26:21), and which is mentioned in Assyrian annals (but not in the OT) as overcome by Tiglath-pileser III about 743 B.C.

8–9 Though "he reigned sixteen years" (cf. v.1), it was after only eight of these, in 743, that Jotham seems to have associated his son Ahaz with him on the throne (comment on 26:21), perhaps because of his defeat by Tiglath-pileser (see comment on 28:5; cf. 2Ki 15:37).

12. Ahaz (28:1–27)

The official reign of Jotham's apostate son Ahaz extended from 743 to 728 B.C. He was, indeed, one of the weakest and most corrupt of all the twenty rulers of Judah. His record in 2Ch 28 is illumined by the prophecies of Isaiah that belong to this period (chs. 7–12), and it runs parallel to the history in 2Ki 16. But apart from the opening four verses and the concluding formula in vv.26–27 (cf. 2Ki 16:19–20), and a few words in v.16 (2Ki 16:7), the composition of these two historical chapters remains distinct. Both report the reign of Ahaz through two stages: (1) his apostasy from the Lord and the defeat that he suffered as a result, at the hands of Syro (Aramean)-Ephraimite attacks (2Ch 28:1–7); and (2) his subsequent appeal and capitulation to Assyria, which led him into even further corruption and idolatry (vv.16–25). Between these sections, however, the Chronicler inserts a discussion of how the prophet Oded succeeded in rescuing a group of Judean captives out of Ephraim (vv.8–15), though none of this has been preserved in 2 Kings.

1 Since "Ahaz was twenty years old" when he acceded to coregency in 743 (cf. on 26:21; 27:8), and since his father, Jotham, had been twenty-five at his own accession eight years previously (27:1), the time interval separating their births must have been only thirteen years. Jotham, and then Ahaz himself, have the lowest ages of paternity that are recorded for the Hebrew kings (cf. comments on 26:1; 29:1).

2–4 On the "Baals" see comment on 17:3. The "Valley of Ben Hinnom" descended eastward below the southern edge of the city of Jerusalem; and it became noted as the scene of Judah's most revolting pagan practices (33:6). It was later defiled by King Josiah and converted into a place of refuse for the city (2Ki 23:10); thus the perpetual fires of "Gehenna" became descriptive of hell itself (Mk 9:43). While 2Ki 16:3 had recorded that Ahaz "sacrificed his son [sing.] in the fire," Ezra adds that it was sons (pl.); that rendered his conduct even worse. The Canaanite practice of child sacrifice had been forbidden to Abraham (Ge 22:12), and under Moses it was made a capital offense (Lev 20:1–5). For the "high places" (v.4), see comment on 14:3.

5–7 The kings of "Aram" and of "Israel" to whom God handed Ahaz over were, respectively, Rezin and Pekah (752–732 B.C.). These two may have turned against Judah because of the failure of the alliance that Uzziah had directed against Assyria (see comment on 27:7) and because of the sufferings that had resulted for them and their people (2Ki 15:19; cf. v.37), but from which Judah had escaped unscathed. In what has been called the Syro (Aramean)-Ephraimite counteralliance, they besieged but could not capture Jerusalem (2Ki 16:5; Isa 7:1). Rezin did, however, take Elath (2Ki 16:6; cf. the comments on 2Ch 26:2; 27:6); and it was not regained by Israel till A.D. 1948.

8 Even as v.6 should probably be understood as recording that in one day Pekah killed 120 specially trained warriors (cf. comments on 1Ch 7:3–4; 12:27), so too v.8 should best be treated as stating that the Israelites took captive from their kinsmen 200 trained warriors, plus "wives, sons and daughters"—a more plausible rendering than to think of 200,000 women, etc.

9–11 The northern prophet "Oded" is otherwise unknown, but he was God's spokesman for warning the Ephraimites that those who serve as the Lord's instruments for punishment must not exceed their appointed mission (cf. Isa 10:5–19). Their own standing, he observed, was hardly guiltless (2Ch 28:10, 13).

12–14 The fact that Pekah's "soldiers gave up the prisoners and plunder" (v.14) testifies to the feelings of brotherhood that still existed between the two Hebrew kingdoms, to the authority of Israelite prophecy, and to the grace that God employed in his treatment of the nation of the worthless Ahaz.

15 Those who were "designated" to be responsible then "provided" for the prisoners, in accordance with the OT standard of showing love, even toward one's enemies (Ex 23:4; Pr 24:17; 25:21; cf. Mt 5:44).

16 In 734 B.C., in an act that amounted to a breach of faith with God (cf. comments on 16:2, 9; 25:6, 10), Ahaz threw himself at the feet of Assyria's rulers for rescue and help. Isaiah had opposed this ill-advised act as being both useless and faithless (Isa 7:4–7). What Ahaz really did was to place Judah under the iron heel of Tiglath-pileser, to cause the deportation of three and one-half of the tribes of Israel to Assyria in 733 (2Ki 15:29), followed by the remaining six and one-half tribes eleven years later (17:6), and eventually, in 701, to bring about Judah's own devastation by the armies of Sennacherib (18:13).

17 Again "the Edomites . . . attacked Judah," for they seemed ever on the alert to capitalize on Judah's calamities (cf. 20:10–11; 21:8). Their incursions of 735 B.C. and their seizure of prisoners may have been the occasion for the prophecies of Obadiah (v.11) and Joel (3:19).

18–21 "The Philistines" did not simply rebel from Judean control, but they also "raided towns in the foothills . . . of Judah." Even a gift to the Assyrians "did not help" Ahaz; for though the rebellions were put down, the states involved were not returned to Judah but organized into Assyrian provinces.

22–23 The reverence Ahaz paid "to the gods of Damascus" took a particular form; he sacrificed on an altar patterned after the one found there (2Ki 16:10–13). Since "the kings of Aram" were by this time Assyrian (16:10a), interpreters until recently had assumed that the price of a nation's submission to the empire of Assyria included their compulsory worship of its deities. Recent studies, however, have indicated that such was not necessarily the case.

24–25 The paganism of Ahaz was designed not simply to supplement the worship of the Lord, but to supplant it and close the Lord's temple.

27 The death of Ahaz occurred in the same year as that of "the rod that struck" the Philistines, i.e., of Tiglath-pileser III (Isa 14:28–29); and the official accession of "his son Hezekiah" is thus dated to 727/726 B.C. (cf. comment on 31:1). Yet since Ahaz's sixteen-year reign actually terminated in 728, it would appear that popular dissatisfaction must have forced his abdication and Hezekiah's assumption of de facto rule at least a year prior to the end of the king's life (cf. 2Ki 18:9–10). Correspondingly, even though Ahaz "rested with his fathers and was buried in . . . Jerusalem," his body "was not placed in the tombs of the kings" (see comment on 24:25).

13. Hezekiah (29:1–32:33)

The twenty-nine-year reign (see comment on 29:1) of Ahaz's son Hezekiah was counted officially from 726 to 697 B.C. (see comment on 28:27). Hezekiah's trust in the Lord (2Ki 18:5) and strength of character, moreover, formed an exact antithesis to the apostasy and surrender to expediency that had stigmatized his father's rule. In the area of religion, where Ahaz had converted Jerusalem into a center for idolatry and its accompanying immoralities and atrocities, Hezekiah's first official act was to cleanse the Lord's temple of its pollution (ch 29). He celebrated an epoch-making Passover (ch. 30); and he campaigned far and wide to stamp out the idolatrous high places and to establish the pure religion of the OT (ch. 31). Then in the area of politics, where Ahaz had shortsightedly surrendered himself and his kingdom to the empire of Assyria, Hezekiah planned and fought for Judah's welfare and freedom—not always wisely, but with eventual success (ch. 32).

1 Hezekiah's "twenty-nine year" reign includes a divinely granted extension of fifteen years (2Ki 20:6), revealed to him in his fourteenth year (712 B.C., 18:13; 20:1), just before Merodach-Baladan's embassy, and embracing God's promise to deliver Jerusalem from Assyria (an event that occurred eleven years later, in 701). The king's recorded accession is thus placed at 726; for even though this specification leaves a technical interregnum (actually, a regency by Hezekiah; cf. 2Ki 18:1) that lasted over a year following the removal of Ahaz (see comment on 2Ch 28:27), it also allows for Hezekiah, whose age was then twenty-five, to have been born when his father was about thirteen (cf. comment on 28:1).

2 Hezekiah not only did "what was right," but he so trusted in the Lord (cf. Isa 26:3–4) that "there was no one like him among all the kings of Judah, either before him or after him" (2Ki 18:5).

3 "The first year of his reign" must refer to the one that followed his official accession in 726 rather than to the one at the time of his rise to power two years before (see comments on v.1; 28:27). "His first month" would then have been March/April 725. He then "opened the doors of the temple," which had been shut up by the apostate Ahaz (v.7; 28:24), "and repaired them," a project that included overlaying them with gold (2Ki 18:16).

4 After this initial act, the king's cleansing of the temple proceeded through four stages: (1) reconsecrating the Levitical personnel (vv.4–14); (2) directing them to purify the temple itself (vv.15–19); (3) rededicating the sanctuary and altar (vv.20–30); and (4) encouraging the populace to renew their presentation of sacrifices (vv.31–36). To institute the first stage, he assembled the priests and Levites "in the square on the east side," presumably in the wide space in front of the temple (Ezr 10:9).

5 Concerning the Levites consecrating themselves (also in v.15), see comment on 1Ch 15:12.

6–11 The places to which Hezekiah could say that God had scattered the sons of Judah "in captivity" (v.9) included Damascus, Samaria, Edom, and Philistia (28:5, 8, 17–18). What the king desired is summed up as "a covenant" renewal (see comment on 15:12). Hezekiah proceeded to address the Levites and priests paternalistically as "my sons." He reminded the former that God had chosen them to serve him (Nu 3:7–8; Dt 10:8) and the latter that they possessed the special function of "burning incense" or, more properly rendering the Hebrew, of offering sacrifices (cf. v.21).

12–14 Kohath, Merari, and Gershon were the three clans that made up the tribe of Levi (1Ch 6:1). Separate mention, however, is given to "Elizaphan," a man who had been the leader of the Kohathites in the days of Moses (Nu 3:30) and whose family had subsequently developed to almost assume the status of a subclan (cf. 1Ch 15:8). "Asaph," "Heman," and "Jeduthun" were the founders of the three families of the Levitical musicians (1Ch 25).

15 Hezekiah's orders for cleansing the temple are said to have followed "the word of the LORD," for they were issued in conformity to the inspired Mosaic law (cf. Dt 12:2–4).

16–17 When the priests are said to have "brought out . . . everything unclean" that they found in the temple, this included not simply accumulated rubbish, but specifically the filthy idols and their accompanying equipment that King Ahaz had introduced (2Ki 16:15). The Levites then "carried it out to the Kidron Valley," east of the temple. This was the same place where Asa had burned his queen-grandmother's repulsive

Asherah object over a century and a half before (cf. comment on 15:16).

18–19 The faithless "Ahaz" had "removed," and even partially destroyed, "the articles" used in the Lord's worship (28:24; 2Ki 16:17).

20–22 On the "sin offering" and its ritual that marked the temple's rededication, see Lev 4:1–5:13. On the sprinkling of the blood of the slain animals, see Lev 17:6; Nu 18:17.

23 For the assembly to lay their hands on the goats of the sin offering was to designate these as substitutes for their own lives and to transfer their sins to the animal victims (Nu 27:18–21; cf. 8:18–19). The goats thus served as types of Christ's death in the sinner's stead (2Co 5:21).

24 The blood of the slaughtered offerings was effective "to atone for all Israel" (as in Lev 4:13; 16:30). The verb Ezra used (GK 4105) means basically to "appease" or "pacify" (Ge 32:20; Pr 16:14), and hence to avert punishment by paying a ransom. Ultimately what saved the Israelites was their anticipation of Christ's death on the cross, who bore the wrath of God that had been incurred by all human beings as sinners (Mk 10:45; Ro 3:25).

25–26 On the "instruments" of David, see comment on 1Ch 23:5.

27–30 On the "burnt offering," see Lev 1. The Hebrew that lies behind the phrase "singing to the LORD" is literally "the song of the LORD," which suggests a specific writing, i.e., perhaps including the canonical Psalms that were then available for use in worship. By Hezekiah's day this would have included the Psalter's Davidic Books I and IV and its Solomonic Book II (Pss 42–72). Also mentioned are some of the compositions "of Asaph the seer" (whose name appears with Pss 50; 73–83).

31–33 Concerning the final resumption of sacrifice (cf. v.4 comment), the Chronicler observes that those who were particularly "willing brought burnt offerings" (v.31); for these were wholly consumed on the altar. In contrast were the more numerous "sacrifices" (the "consecrated" offerings of v.33, or "fellowship offerings" of v.35), which were largely eaten by the sacrificers in feasts that followed the services of presentation (cf. comment on 1Ch 29:21). The "thank offerings" were a subcategory within the fellowship offerings (Lev 7:12–15).

34 The lower-ranked Levites, somewhat surprisingly (see 24:5; Eze 48:11), now showed themselves "more conscientious . . . than the priests" (but cf. 30:3 and the lack of principle evinced by the high priest Uriah only nine years before this, 2Ki 16:10–11). The truest faith is often found among the humble; and throughout history "professional" religious leaders have too often been among those least willing to submit to Christ and to the Word (cf. Jn 7:48).

35 The choice, and burnable, "fat of the fellowship offerings" was presented to God on the altar prior to the time of the people's feasting. On the "drink offerings," see Nu 15:5, 7, 10.

36 Thus Hezekiah and the people rejoiced at what the Lord had brought about, for in the last analysis all spiritual achievements find their origin in God's grace (30:12; 1Ki 18:37; Ac 11:18).

30:1 Chapter 30 concerns Hezekiah's epoch-making Passover Feast: first the preparations for it (vv.1–12) and then its observance (vv.13–27). The king "sent word" throughout Judah, but also sent letters inviting Ephraim and Manasseh, i.e., Israel, to come to Jerusalem for its celebration. Any such compliance had been prohibited during the two centuries that had followed Jeroboam's division of the Solomonic empire (vv.5, 26; 1Ki 12:27–28). But now King Hoshea's capital in Samaria was subject to Assyrian siege (v.6; 2Ki 17:5), and the northern ruler was powerless to interfere. The Assyrians, furthermore, would probably have encouraged anything that suggested defection from their rebelling vassal. The sincerity of Hezekiah's concern for Israel is suggested by his subsequent naming of his son and crown prince Manasseh.

2 A Passover celebrated in the second month would be a month late. But such a delay had been authorized by Moses himself when circumstances made it necessary (Nu 9:10–11), as was indeed the case here (cf. 2Ch 29:17).

3–5 The people were not able to celebrate the Passover during the first month (29:3), and particularly on its prescribed fourteenth day

(cf. 29:17). Concerning the priests' not consecrating themselves see comments on 29:34 and 1Ch 15:12. That the feast "had not been celebrated in large numbers" (v.5) meant, among other things celebrated as a united kingdom (see v.1).

6–9 The ruler wrote, "Come to the sanctuary" (v.8); Passover was one of the three annual pilgrimage feasts that required the presence of every male at the temple (see comment on 1Ch 23:31). His word of assurance that their exiled brothers "will be shown compassion ... and will come back" was based on this same prediction, as made by Moses (Lev 26:40–42).

10–12 Many of the northerners—particularly those of Ephraim—still "scorned and ridiculed" the king's appeal (but see vv.11, 18): human depravity is so total that people will resist a gospel call even on the brink of disaster (cf. Am 4:10; Rev 9:20).

13 The "Feast of Unleavened Bread" continued for a full seven days beyond the actual date of the Passover (Lev 23:5–6). It served to remind the Israelites of their hasty departure from Egypt and of their perpetual need to maintain lives separated from sin (Ex 12:11, 34; 1Co 5:7).

14 Jerusalem's idolatrous "altars" (28:24) were thrown "into the Kidron Valley" (cf. comment on 15:16; 29:16).

15 The ceremony of the "slaughtered ... Passover lamb" functioned as (1) a memorial to God's past deliverance of Israel from the tenth plague in Egypt (Ex 12:27); (2) a symbol of his present and continuing claim over sinners, which was met by a rite of redemption (Ex 13:15); and (3) a type of his future, ultimate justification for his people procured through the substitutionary death of Christ, the Lamb of God (1Co 5:7). The religious leaders apparently were put to shame by the zeal of some of the people and responded accordingly.

16 "The priests sprinkled the blood" as it was "handed to them by the Levites," though normally it would have been presented to them directly by the head of each household (cf. Lev 1:11).

17 But here "the Levites had to kill the Passover lambs," because "many in the crowd had not consecrated themselves," so that they could not stand before God in ritual purity (cf. Nu 9:6). The value of the sacrificial service, as a propitiation of God, depended on its typifying the perfect ransom of Christ (Heb 9:14).

18–20 "Yet they [did eat] the Passover": because of Hezekiah's prayer of intercession, the people were to this extent enabled to share in the feast. If they really sought God in their hearts, their failures in regard to outward conformity—at least on this first occasion—could be "healed" (v.20; GK 8324), i.e., pardoned. The situation reflects the biblical principle that faith takes precedence over ritual (Jn 7:22–23; 9:14–16).

21–23 The extension of "the festival" for "seven more days" (v.23) parallels the way Solomon joined a special seven-day celebration for dedicating the temple with the regular week for the fall Feast of Tabernacles (see comment on 7:9).

24 The generous quantity of animals provided by the king and his officials for the fellowship offerings (see comment on 29:31) may even have contributed to the decision to extend the feast. The Chronicler's combined totals of two thousand bulls and seventeen thousand sheep, have been criticized as too big. Yet on a similar (but less hurried) occasion, King Josiah and his officials were able to provide twice this number (35:7–9).

25–27 The phrase "the priests and the Levites" (v.27) may here be rendered as "the Levitical priests," since these were the priests whom Moses had authorized "to bless the people" (Nu 6:23–27; cf. Lev 9:22).

31:1 Chapter 31 moves on to describe Hezekiah's campaign to eradicate Canaanite idolatry from Israel and to reestablish true OT religion. The majority of its contents (vv.4–19) concern the king's efforts to ensure material support for the Levites, who constituted the nation's religious personnel. Only the opening sentence (v.1a) finds a parallel in 2 Kings (18:4); but just as in the Chronicler's two previous chapters (cf. introduction to ch. 29), this lack furnishes no warrant for questioning its authenticity. In his reforms the king had the support of his contemporary Judean prophets, Micah and Isaiah (Isa 13–27 applies particularly to Hezekiah's reign between 728 and 712 B.C.). They were respected by the kings (32:20; cf. 2Ki 19:2; Jer 26:18–19), and their writings illumine the entire period (cf. Isa 22:1–14; 24:1–13).

The monarch's crusade in Judah against "the Asherah poles" and "the high places" is attested by the summary in 2Ki 18:4a. He was also compelled to destroy Nehushtan, the brazen serpent of Moses, which the people had perverted into an object of idolatry (18:4b). His campaign extended northward as well; for some of the Ephraimites had repented, after two centuries of apostasy (30:11, 18), and the presence of Assyrian troops rendered those who remained obdurate incapable of opposing Hezekiah.

2 The Hebrew for Hezekiah's assigning the priests to divisions is definite: he "appointed the divisions of the priests" (NASB, emphasis mine). He reestablished the twenty-four rotating courses (see comment on 8:14; 23:4) that had been set up by David (1Ch 25) to ensure orderly worship. The word used for the Lord's "dwelling" (lit., "camp"; GK 4722) reflects the desert situation under Moses (see comment on 1Ch 9:18).

3 Just as Solomon had done (see comment on 2:4), "the king contributed" the regular "burnt offerings" for the temple. Specifications in this regard had, indeed, been set forth by Moses (Nu 28–29). Concerning "the morning and evening burnt offerings" and those for the "appointed feasts," see comment on 1Ch 23:29–31.

4 Remuneration for "the priests" was derived primarily from certain designated parts of the sacrifices (cf. Lev 6–7) and from "the best of the firstfruits of your soil" (Ex 23:19; cf. Nu 18:12), while that for the "Levites" came from tithes that were contributed by the other tribes (Lev 27:30–33; Nu 18:21–24; cf. v.5). They "could devote themselves" to God's work, unhindered by secular pursuits, only if they received these portions regularly (cf. Ne 13:10).

5 Though the other commodities listed among the dedicated "firstfruits" could be used in Israel's offerings, the "honey" could not, even in the grain offerings that accompanied the other (animal) sacrifices (Lev 2:11). But it was still an acceptable gift for supporting the priests.

6 The "tithe of the holy things" may be a general term for these token portions of the offerings that became the property of the priests who presented them (cf. Nu 8:8–11).

7–8 The Israelites began bringing their contributions "in the third month" (May/June), the time of the Feast of Pentecost and of the grain harvest (Ex 23:16a), and they finished in the seventh month (Sept./Oct.), the time of the Feast of Tabernacles and of the ingathering of the fruit and vine harvests at the end of the agricultural year (Ex 23:16b).

9–10 The high priest Azariah III (also mentioned at the end of v.13; cf. 1Ch 6:4) is probably not the Azariah (II) who resisted Uzziah (2Ch 26:17) almost thirty years prior to this.

11–13 Conaniah's office (v.12) dated back to David, who had first organized some of the temple gatekeepers so as to have charge of the dedicated gifts (see 1Ch 26:20, 26).

14 The gatekeeper "Kore" (cf. 1Ch 9:19) was the Levite responsible for "distributing the contributions"—whether of the "consecrated gifts" (cf. v.4) or of the additional "freewill offerings"—to their legitimate priestly recipients (Lev 7:14).

15 Deputy administrators carried out a final distribution locally, "in the towns of the priests," as these had been determined by Joshua, throughout the tribes of Israel (Jos 21:9–19). A more precise rendering of the statement that they "assisted him faithfully" might be that they "assisted him in their positions of trust" (cf. 1Ch 9:22).

16 Portions were granted to "males three years old or more . . . who would enter the temple to perform the . . . various tasks." Assignments for work within the operational units of the Levites had originally been based on a minimum age of thirty (1Ch 23:3); but if there is not a copyist's error here, the priests' children as young as three must have accompanied their fathers in the service and so received their portions, directly, in the temple.

17 Such reestablished distributions obviously gave a renewed, practical significance to "the genealogical records." On the reasons for service by "Levites twenty years old or more," see comment on 1Ch 23:24.

18 Thus Kore and his associates consecrated themselves, and the Hebrew adds "in holiness" (GK 7731). It was no light responsibility, particularly in view of the numbers of women and children involved (cf. Ac 6:1), as they fulfilled "their positions of trust" (cf. comment on v.15).

19–21 "In everything" the king "worked wholeheartedly" (v.21), in obedience to the law of Moses; "so he prospered" (cf. 2Ki 18:6–7).

32:1–3 After recounting all of Hezekiah's religious reforms (chs. 29–31), the Chronicler summarizes his political activity, generally on the assumption of the reader's knowledge of the more detailed accounts that are found in 2Ki 18:7–20:21 and Isa 36–39. He records how in 701 B.C. Sennacherib king of Assyria "invaded Judah"; but behind this deed lay a whole sequence of events.

Assyrian domination had come about in 734, through the specific invitation of Hezekiah's father, Ahaz (28:20–21). In 715 Ashdod and certain other Palestinian states had rebelled, urged on by Egypt (cf. 2Ki 17:4) and by Babylon; for Ezra also records the latter's embassy to Hezekiah (2Ch 32:31). But in 711 the Assyrians resubdued Ashdod (Isa 14:28–31, 20:1); and Hezekiah yielded to the will of God (20:2–6) by submitting to Sargon II, who called himself the subjugator of Judah.

On Sargon's death in 705, Hezekiah disregarded the Lord's word through Isaiah and became involved in plots with Egypt (Isa 30:1–5; 31:1–3). He assumed leadership in a western revolt and even imprisoned the Philistine king of Ekron, who had refused cooperation (2Ki 18:8). The result was the invasion by Sargon's son Sennacherib. His "thinking to conquer" Judah's "fortified cities" did in fact succeed (2Ki 18:13; Isa 36:1), except in the case of Jerusalem.

4–5 To aid in their capital's defense, the Hebrews blocked all the springs, especially the Gihon (see v.30), directly east of city, "and the stream that flowed" from it into Jerusalem. Concerning the king's "reinforced supporting terraces," see NIV note; comment on 1Ch 11:8.

6–7 The Hebrew words for "he . . . encouraged them" are literally "he spoke to their heart." The king's statement that "there is greater power with us than with" Sennacherib recalls an earlier assurance made by Elisha (2Ki 6:16); it reflects the basic meaning of the name of Israel's covenant God, Yahweh ("He is present [with us]," Ex 3:12, 14; cf. Isa 7:14; Mt 1:23).

8 Hezekiah's disparagement of the Assyrian, that "with him is only the arm of flesh," seems traceable to Isaiah (Isa 31:3), and was later quoted by Jeremiah (Jer 17:5). But Hezekiah's own "hard work" (v.5) had been criticized by Isaiah (Isa 22:9–10) because of the king's reliance on human beings rather than on the Lord (22:11; 30:15–16). In his annals for 701, Sennacherib was thus able to boast that he "shut up [the king] like a caged bird inside Jerusalem"; that Hezekiah was deserted by his Arabian mercenaries and compelled to release Sennacherib's pro-Assyrian Philistine vassal so as to be restored to his throne in Ekron; and finally that Hezekiah himself had to capitulate, paying a huge indemnity and surrendering over two hundred thousand captives to Assyria. These facts are assumed without comment in Chronicles, though the last two elements are elaborated by other Scriptures.

9–11 "Later," i.e., after Hezekiah's payment of the stipulated tribute (2Ki 18:14), the treacherous Assyrian proceeded to scrap the just negotiated peace treaty (cf. Isa 33:7–8), to lay "siege to Lachish," twenty-five miles southwest of Jerusalem, and to make further demands on the beleaguered Hezekiah. To enforce them Sennacherib "sent his officers," including his supreme commander (2Ki 18:17), with a large army "to Jerusalem." In view of the final results (v.21), it is not surprising that Sennacherib's annals say nothing further about this later aspect to his campaign. Indeed, the very insolence of his message that follows (cf. vv.10–15 with 2Ki 18:19–25, 28–35; Isa 36:4–10, 13–20) begins to provide justification for the stirring hopes expressed earlier by Hezekiah (vv.7–8; cf. v.11).

12 By his question, "Did not Hezekiah himself remove this god's high places?" Sennacherib must have been hoping to take advantage of any popular dissatisfaction that was felt against Hezekiah's reforms.

13–15 More straightforward was Sennacherib's blasphemy against the Lord—as if God were no more "able to save his people" from Assyria than had been the false deities of those nations that the aggressor's ancestors had already destroyed (cf. v.19; Isa 10:15).

16–19 "Sennacherib's officers spoke further against the LORD," excerpts of which appear in vv.18–19 (cf. the fuller record in 2Ki 18:27–35). Sennacherib "also wrote letters," since he had had to withdraw his troops attacking Jerusalem (see comment on v.9) to meet an advance by an Egyptian force under Tirhakah, younger brother of the current Twenty-Fifth Dynasty ruler and himself later to become Pharaoh, from 690 to 664 B.C. (2Ki 19:8–9).

20 For details on the anguished pleas and yet ringing affirmations of faith with which Hezekiah and Isaiah "cried out in prayer," see 2Ki 19:1–7, 14–34. This verse, it should be noted, is the only reference in Chronicles to the deeds of the prophet Isaiah (26:22 and 32:32 refer to his writings about Uzziah and Hezekiah).

21–23 Then "an angel . . . annihilated all the fighting men . . . of the Assyrian king," specifically, 185,000 in one night (2Ki 19:35). The proposal has been advanced that a plague carried by rodents was what struck down the invaders. This is based on an Egyptian legend—which does confirm the general fact of a miraculous deliverance—that Tirhakah (and Hezekiah) owed victory to field mice that ate up the Assyrians' weapons.

But while God can indeed make use of natural means for delivering his elect (cf. Ex 14:21; 1Sa 6:4), the rapidity and intensity of this disaster render the plague proposal inadequate as an explanation for what happened in 701 B.C. The event ranks, in fact, with Israel's crossing of the Red Sea as one of the two greatest examples of the Lord's intervention to save his people. So Sennacherib "withdrew to his own" land and was slain (2Ki 19:36–37; Isa 37–38).

24 "In those days"—fifteen years before his actual death (2Ki 20:6), or in 712—Hezekiah, seriously ill, prayed. "The LORD . . . answered him," promising him recovery (2Ki 20:4–6), "and gave him a miraculous sign" of the shadow that moved backward (2Ki 20:8–11).

25–26 "But Hezekiah's heart was proud" (cf. v.31); and the result was "the LORD's wrath," as declared through Isaiah's threat of impending exile to Babylon (2Ki 20:16–18; Isa 39:6–7). But because "Hezekiah repented . . . the LORD's wrath did not come upon them" in his days (cf. 2Ki 20:19; Isa 39:8; Jer 26:19).

27–30 To ensure a permanent water supply within his capital's walls, "Hezekiah . . . channeled" the flow of "the Gihon spring" through a 1,700 foot tunnel cut into the rock beneath Jerusalem (v.30). Archaeological confirmation of this engineering feat came in 1880, with the discovery, at its lower portal, of the Siloam Inscription, written in old Hebrew by the very workers who accomplished it.

31 The envoys of Babylon, to which Ezra here refers, were those sent by Marduk-apal-iddina, the Merodach-Baladan of 2Ki 20:12–13. Their mission appears to have been not simply to inquire about the king's illness and about its accompanying "miraculous sign" (v.24)—of understandable interest to astrologers such as the Babylonians—but also to arrange practical measures against Sargon's aggression, which did overpower Ashdod and the West in the following year and drove Marduk-apal-iddina from his throne in the East two years after that. The experience served "to test" (GK 5814) Hezekiah, whether he would place his trust in human treaties or in God; and it was his eagerness for the treaties that incurred the Lord's wrath (v.25).

Water still flows through the tunnel that Hezekiah built to bring water from the Gihon Spring into the city of Jerusalem.

32 Ezra's description of his main literary source as being "the vision of the prophet Isaiah" (cf. Isa 1:1) "in the book of the kings" (cf. 20:34) indicates that at least chs. 36–39 of Isaiah (which are reproduced within 2Ki 18–20) must have been incorporated into that larger court chronicle from which both he and the writer of Kings, prior to him, were accustomed to draw 33 The NIV translation that Hezekiah was buried "on the hill where the tombs . . . are" is literally, "in the going up [or ascent] of the tombs of." But this expression could as well be rendered "in the upper section of the tombs," on the hypothesis of some additional excavation at a higher level, when the lower tombs had become occupied.

14. Manasseh (33:1–20)

Manasseh, evil son of the godly Hezekiah, had the longest reign of all the Hebrew monarchs, from 697 to 642 B.C.; and he more than any other single person was responsible for the final destruction of the kingdom of Judah (2Ki 23:26; 24:3; Jer 15:4). Most of his fifty-five-year reign was devoted to thoroughgoing paganism, religiously, and to a renewed subjection to Assyria, politically. This part of his record (vv.1–10) closely parallels its literary source in 2Ki 21:1–10. During his closing years, a personal crisis did bring back Manasseh to repentance; but it was too late to produce a significant national effect (2Ch 33:11–20). Most of this material, moreover, is unique to the Chronicler.

1–3 Concerning the "high places . . . Baals, and . . . Asherah" poles, see comments on 14:3; 17:3. The king's apostate worship of "the starry host" had evil precedents going as far back as the time of Moses (Dt 4:19; Ac 7:42), but such practices were a particular sin of Assyro-Babylonians, with their addiction to astrology. Whether the Assyrians made it a policy to force their religion on the nations that became subject to their empire is open to question (cf. 28:23), but it is a fact that when Sennacherib's son Esarhaddon advanced westward against Egypt, Manasseh did weakly submit himself to him, in 676, which must have provided some stimulus for the astral worship in Judah.

4–5 On the Lord's "Name" remaining in Jerusalem forever, see comments on 1Ch 22:7; 2Ch 6:2, 6; on the two temple "courts," see comment on 2Ch 4:9.

6 Manasseh "sacrificed his sons in the fire in the Valley of Ben Hinnom," just as his grandfather Ahaz had (28:3); and he "practiced sorcery," etc., attempting to communicate with the dead by using "mediums"—which Scripture uniformly condemns as contrary to faith in God (Ex 22:18; Dt 18:10–12). The Hebrew word for "spiritist" (GK 3362) is literally "a knowing one." It referred originally to ghosts, who were supposed to possess superhuman knowledge; but it came to be applied to those who claimed power to summon them forth, i.e., to witches. The king also engaged in tyranny, shedding "much innocent blood" (2Ki 21:16).

7–9 The Lord had promised not to remove the Israelites but stipulated: "if only they will . . . do everything I commanded them . . . through Moses" (see comment on 7:14, 19).

11 The occasion on which "the king of Assyria . . . took Manasseh prisoner . . . to Babylon" may have arisen in the year 648, when Ashurbanipal finally overcame a revolt that had been led in that city for four years by his own brother. Egypt, under a new dynasty (the twenty-sixth), had taken this opportunity to escape the Assyrian yoke; and Manasseh may have been tempted to try the same thing. But because Judah lay closer to Assyria, or because it lacked Egypt's greater resources, this attempt failed.

12–13 In any event, "in his distress he . . . humbled himself greatly before God"; for it sometimes takes a crisis to drive a person to God and to become converted (cf. Ac 9:3–5).

14 On "Gihon" and "Ophel," see comments on 32:30; 27:3. The king's rebuilt fortifications extended as far as "the Fish Gate," in Jerusalem's north wall (Ne 3:3).

15–17 In his remaining years, Manasseh did what he could to reverse his years of apostasy. Ezra explains that "the people, however, continued to sacrifice at the high places," because half a century of paganism could not be counteracted by a half dozen years of reform. It is true that Judah presented the offerings "only to the LORD their God," but the high places were still contrary to Moses' law for a central sanctuary (cf. comment on 1:2–4). In practice, moreover, worship on those sites meant little more than applying a new name to the old Baal worship, with all its debased rites.

18–20 The king's "prayer to his God" is no longer preserved. This text did, however, provide a basis on which someone shortly before the time of Christ composed the fifteen verses that make up the apocryphal Prayer of Manasseh, a book that appears in some manuscripts of the LXX.

15. Amon (33:21–25)

The remainder of ch. 33 deals with the brief reign of Manasseh's son Amon (642–640 B.C.). This man was the reflection of his father's essentially pagan life, not of his repentant last years and death. Under the new king, Judah quickly relapsed into the superstitious practices of Manasseh before his conversion. After only two years Amon died at the hands of his own courtiers. His record follows and somewhat abbreviates its earlier source in 2Ki 21:19–26.

21–23 When the Chronicler says that "Amon worshiped ... all the idols Manasseh had made," this seems to suggest either that their removal (v.15a) had not involved their destruction, or that Manasseh's concentration on bringing about reform in Jerusalem (v.15b) had left intact those relics of his former paganism that characterized the local high places (v.17).

24–25 Concerning "the people of the land," who took vengeance on Amon's assassins and restored order to Judah, see comment on 23:13.

16. Josiah (34:1-35:27)

In contrast to his father, Amon, Josiah proved to be a good king over the people of Judah (640–609 B.C.). He was the last such, sad to say; but he was also in some respects their greatest (v.2). Josiah instituted the most thorough of all the OT reforms, dating to 622, and one that restored Israel's commitment to God's book. It was this faith in holy Scripture that was then able to keep the nation's hope alive during the Exile through most of the succeeding century (cf. Da 9:2), during the difficult century of restoration that followed (Ezr 7:10; Mal 4:4), and during the next four hundred, silent years until the appearance of John the Baptist (Mal 3:1; 4:5–6) and the kingdom of Jesus the Messiah, God's personal Word, who fulfilled the written Word (Mt 5:17–18).

Within 2 Chronicles Josiah's record occupies the two chapters that immediately precede the closing chapter of the book; and they deal with four primary topics: (1) the earlier stages of the king's reforms (34:1–7); (2) the great reformation that occurred in the eighteenth year of his reign, beginning with the repair of the Jerusalem temple and climaxing with the discovery of the Mosaic Book of the Law and with Judah's responses to it (34:8–33); (3) Josiah's unsurpassed Passover observance (35:1–19); and (4) his tragic death (35:20–27).

1–2 Josiah "did what was right," particularly in his devotion to "all the Law of Moses" (2Ki 23:25), so that in this respect (see comment on 29:2, on the "trust" that was Hezekiah's area of strength) "neither before nor after Josiah was there a king like him" (2Ki 23:25).

3 In the "eighth year" of his rule, in 632 B.C., when "he was still young," just sixteen, he began to seek the Lord personally; and in his "twelfth year," in 628, he began to purify Judah nationally of its high places and related paganisms (see 33:3). The latter date identifies a particular time of chaos that occurred throughout the ancient Near East, one that was precipitated by an invasion from the north of barbaric, nomadic horsemen known as the Scythians (628–626 B.C.). Their incursions wrought terror among complacent Jews (Jer 6:22–24; Zep 1:12); and, though they never actually raided much beyond the open plains of coastal Palestine—where they were eventually stopped by the Egyptians—they did produce two major effects that concerned Judah.

(1) In the area of religion, the Scythian presence seems to have conditioned the calls of the contemporary prophets Jeremiah (Jer 1:2, 14) and Zephaniah (Zep 1:2, which refers to local Judean threats, vv.3–4). It further correlates with the above noted second stage of Josiah's revival; but this latter went far beyond the momentary fear usually associated with superficial "fox-hole" type religion (cf. 2Ch 34:3–7).

(2) In the area of politics, the Scythian hordes succeeded in sweeping away the Assyrian imperial domination that had been Judah's nemesis throughout the preceding half century. Indeed, after Ashurbanipal's death about 631, and as a result of the barbarian tidal wave in 628, the way was cleared for Josiah to reestablish a united kingdom of Israel to the extent that it had occupied when it had first chosen David almost three centuries before. Whether the king's achievement of political freedom involved a corresponding religious repudiation of Assyrian idolatry is open to question; only Canaanite forms appear as the objects of Josiah's purge.

4 The term for "idols" means ones "cut out, carved," while the "images" were "cast."

5–7 Josiah's campaign against idolatry included not simply Judah and Jerusalem, but extended also into "Manasseh" and "Ephraim," just as Hezekiah's reform had a century earlier. On "Simeon" see the introductory discussion to 1Ch 4:24–43. That Josiah's endeavor "reached as far as Naphtali" in Galilee shows that he recovered most of the formerly Assyrian province of Israel (cf. v.9), a fact that is archaeologically attested by seventh-century inscriptions from the land itself.

8 On Joah's position as "recorder," see comment on 1Ch 18:15. "Shaphan" is identified in 2Ki 22:8 as "secretary" (see comment on 1Ch 18:16).

9–10 The officials gave Hilkiah the high priest the money the Levitical doorkeepers had collected from the people of Ephraim, etc. Presumably the people brought the silver as far as the temple gate (2Ki 22:4)—perhaps to deposit it in a chest similar to the one once provided by King Joash (see 2Ch 24:8); the Levites collected it from there.

11–13 The builders did the work so faithfully that no audit was required (2Ki 22:7), just as had been true under Joash (2Ki 12:15).

14–15 At this point in the year 622, Hilkiah found "the Book of the Law"—called the "Book of the Covenant" in v.30, which suggests Ex 19–24 (cf. 24:7). Yet the curses that the book contained (2Ch 34:24) suggests Lev 26 and Dt 28; and the ensuing stress on the central sanctuary (2Ki 23:8–9) implies Dt 12. "The Book" thus was at the least the book of Deuteronomy. It is called "the covenant" in Dt 29:1, for example. It contained the curses (Dt 28); it alone called for a central sanctuary that was stored at the temple, usually by the side of the ark (Dt 31:25–26). "The Book" seems to have become misplaced during the apostate administrations of the previous kings, Manasseh and Amon, under whom the ark had been moved about (2Ch 35:3).

The book is described as "the Law of the LORD that had been given through Moses" (lit., "by the hand of" Moses). For though all the passages in the Pentateuch do not claim to have been written down (cf. Ex 17:14; 24:4; 34:27; Lev 18:5 [Ro 10:5]; Nu 33:2; Dt 31:9, 22) or even spoken by Moses (compare Dt 33 with 34), Scripture is nevertheless clear that all its contents do belong to a historical period no later than his (Dt 4:2; 12:32), and that they were composed under the guidance of Moses. Indeed, our Lord declared that those who refuse to believe Moses' words cannot consistently accept his own either (Jn 5:47).

16–19 In response to hearing what was written in "the Book," the king "tore his robes," personally convicted by the immediate and terrifying relevance of threats such as those inscribed in Dt 28:36 (cf. Lev 26:32–33; 2Ch 34:21, 24, 27), prophecies that were "written there concerning us" (2Ki 22:13).

20–22 Ezra's almost casual reference to the "Huldah" prophetess indicates how foreign the idea of discrimination based on sex was to the spirit of the OT (cf. Jdg 4:4; 2Sa 20:16). Huldah's location in the second district can no longer be identified; but the name suggests one of the extensions to Jerusalem, either to the north or to the west.

23–25 The Lord confirmed that he would "bring disaster on . . . Judah," that he would "not turn away from the heat of his fierce anger . . . because of all that Manasseh had done to provoke him" (2Ki 23:26).

26–28 Josiah, however, was told that his eyes would "not see all the disaster" (v.28). Postponements of divine wrath had been granted previously to King Hezekiah (cf. on 32:26) and even to King Ahab of Israel (1Ki 21:29), when they too displayed humility and repentance. Josiah would "be buried in peace," i.e., before the disastrous fall of Judah that constitutes the point at issue here. Though the king was buried in honor, he did, in fact, die from battle wounds (35:23–24).

29–31 "The covenant" that Josiah "renewed" was the one contained in the Book of the Covenant, specifically the revelation of God's older testament—the pre-Christian revelation that was the Lord's eternal instrument for the redemption of his elect people. During this rite in the temple, the king stood "by his pillar," as in 23:13.

32–33 The Chronicler reports briefly that "Josiah removed all detestable idols." For more details on his thorough purging of the land of its high places—with their accompanying immoralities—of its astral worship, of its spiritism, and of its other paganisms, see 2Ki 23:4–14, 24. His field of action included "all the territory belonging to the Israelites" (cf. its enumeration by tribes in v.6). In particular the king destroyed the altar of Jeroboam I at Bethel, along with the other high places of Samaria, and he killed such of the priests as remained (2Ki 23:15–20, exactly as had been predicted in 1Ki 13:2, over three hundred years before).

In summary Ezra says of the Israelites under Josiah that "as long as he lived, they did not fail to follow the LORD." Yet the testimony of Jeremiah, who actively supported the king's reform (Jer 11:1–5), shows that for many this "following" may have consisted more in external compliance than in commitment from the heart (11:9–13).

35:1 The Chronicler's third major topic concerning the reign of Josiah (cf. introduction to chs. 34–35) describes how the king celebrated a great Passover (35:1–19). Its observance served to provide a public confirmation to his reform as a whole; it resulted, indeed, from Judah's obedience to that same rediscovered divine Law, "as it is written in the Book of the Covenant" (2Ki 23:21). "The first month," to which the celebration is dated, is March/April within Josiah's climactic eighteenth year (2Ch 35:18), namely 622 B.C.; contrast the way in which Hezekiah had had to postpone the keeping of his Passover to the second month (cf. 30:2).

2–3 On the teaching office of Judah's "Levites," see comment on 17:7. Josiah told them to "put the sacred ark in the temple," because during the dark days of Manasseh and Amon (33:7; cf. 28:24) it seems to have been removed by these faithful ministers and carried elsewhere for its protection (cf. comment on 34:14).

4 Concerning their "divisions, according to the directions written by David . . . and by . . . Solomon," see 1Ch 24:4, 20; 2Ch 8:14.

5–6 By directing the Levites to "slaughter the Passover lambs," the king continued the practice that had been worked out by Hezekiah (see comment on 30:17). Josiah's goal was to prevent the sort of confusion that had arisen during the more precipitous reform and Passover of his great-grandfather, some 103 years earlier (cf. 30:16–18).

7–9 The historicity of the quantities of animals provided by Josiah has been even more criticized than for those recorded in reference to Hezekiah's celebration (see comment on 30:24). Yet when one considers that Josiah had careful advanced planning, that the animals were prepared for "all Judah and Israel who were there," and that it was an unprecedented affair, which "none of the kings of Israel had ever celebrated . . . as did Josiah" (v.18), then his "thirty-thousand sheep and goats . . . and also three thousand cattle" appear to fall well within the category of the explainable. Furthermore, when compared with the numbers of sacrificial animals that the Chronicler quotes from other Scriptures (cf. 2Ch 7:5's citation of 1Ki 8:63, about Solomon's dedication of the temple as requiring 120,000 sheep and 22,000 cattle), his own unique listing here for Josiah pales into relative insignificance.

While the flocks of sheep and goats provided for the paschal lambs, the cattle must have served for fellowship offerings, for the feasting throughout the days of Unleavened Bread that followed the Passover (see comments 30:24; 1Ch 23:21).

10–15 Ezra's statement that "they set aside the burnt offerings" (v.12) suggests that the Levites saved certain choice parts of the Passover lambs "to offer to the LORD" (cf. v.14), somewhat after the pattern of the fellowship offerings (Lev 3). Then the people roasted and ate the Passover itself (as in Dt 16:7).

16–19 Concerning "the Feast of Unleavened Bread," see 30:13. To the time span of v.18, that "the Passover had not been observed like this . . . since the days of . . . Samuel," 2Ki 23:22 adds what could be an even longer interval, "since the days of the judges." The point is that Josiah's feast came up to the Bible's ceremonial standards as no others had since those in the era of Moses and Joshua.

20 The phrase "After all this" introduces Ezra's final topic on Josiah: the king's death, dated 609 B.C. The cause lay in a military advance by "Neco King of Egypt," a leading Pharaoh of the Twenty-Sixth Dynasty, as he made an active bid to succeed to the rule of the Assyrian Empire in the west. Nineveh had fallen three years before, in 612; and the Egyptians opposed the rival claims of Babylon by going up the Euphrates River "on behalf of" the king of Assyria (2Ki 23:29). Neco's immediate objective was to cross the river and retake the city of Haran. This town lay east of Carchemish, which constituted in its turn a key center on the westernmost bend of the Euphrates.

21 The Pharaoh addressed Josiah: "It is not you I am attacking"; for Neco desired, without further delay, to march along the Palestinian coast and so meet "the house with which I am at war," namely, the Babylonian army under the capable crown prince Nebuchadrezzar. His words for persuading Josiah, that "God has told me to hurry," would have had a special appeal for a godly king concerned about keeping God's word.

22 Josiah, like King Ahab at Ramoth Gilead, then "disguised himself" for protection against his fate (cf. 18:29). For though this next truth might have come as a surprise to the king, "what Neco had said" actually had come "at God's command." The Lord's consistent message to his people had been that they must rely on him and, correspondingly, keep themselves from involvement in the international power politics of their day (cf. on 16:2, 9; 28:16; 32:1, 5).

The reality of the contest at "Megiddo" has received archaeological confirmation from the ruins of the site's Stratum II. This level belonged to an unwalled town during the time of Josiah, and it evidences a measure of contemporaneous destruction. Megiddo lies on the strategic pass through the ridge that separates Palestine's coastal plain from the Esdraelon Valley to its northeast. It has been the scene of key battles from the fifteenth century B.C. down to World War I. The conflict of the ages, against Christ at his second coming, will be joined at "Armageddon" (Rev 16:16)—lit. translated, "the mountain of Megiddo."

23–27 Josiah died in the conflict. "Jeremiah composed laments for Josiah," whom he highly esteemed (Jer 22:15–16). These dirges are then said to be "written in the Laments"—a book that is no longer extant and which must not be confused with the prophet's later laments over Josiah's sons (22:10, 20–30) or Jerusalem's fall (Lamentations).

17. Jehoahaz (36:1–4)

The reign of the godly king Josiah's son Jehoahaz lasted only three months (609 B.C.), following the death of his father in battle (35:24). But while the Chronicler includes no direct moral evaluation of Jehoahaz, the fuller account in 2Ki 23:30–35, which served as Ezra's source, makes it clear that the young sovereign "did evil in the eyes of the LORD" (v.32). He, in fact, established a pattern of wrongdoing that characterizes the rest of the kings who make up the subject of this concluding section of 2 Chronicles (12:1–36:16). As a mark of divine justice, it was the removal of Jehoahaz that marked the end of independent government in Israel.

1–2 At his accession in 609, Judah's new leader, Jehoahaz, "was twenty-three years old," which made him two years younger than King Jehoiakim, his brother, who succeeded him (v.5). The "people of the land"—its free citizens (see comment on 23:13)—apparently saw more hope in Jehoahaz than in his older brother. His three-month reign continued only till Pharaoh Neco (II) of Egypt could find opportunity to replace him (cf. 35:20–21).

3 Neco also "imposed on Judah" an indemnity of silver and gold (cf. similar amounts listed in 25:6; 27:5), amounting to about three and three-fourths tons and seventy-five pounds respectively.

4 The Egyptian changed the name of Jehoahaz's brother from "Eliakim," meaning "God raises up," to "Jehoiakim," which means "Jehovah (the LORD) raises up." This seems to indicate his willingness to continue the status of the religion of the Jews. More tangibly the Pharaoh's control over the king's name demonstrated his lordship over his person; indeed, it would be four and a half centuries before the Jews would again be able to exercise political freedom, under the Maccabees. Neco then carried Jehoahaz off to Egypt, where he died (2Ki 23:34; cf. Jer 22:10).

18. Jehoiakim (36:5–8)

The Chronicler's record about the kingship of Jehoahaz's older brother Jehoiakim (vv.5–8) again represents an abridgment of the previously written biblical history (2Ki 23:36–24:7). On this occasion Ezra does include a moral judgment against Judah's new ruler (v.5); and in the political sphere his reign (609–598 B.C.) marked the transference of the Hebrew kingdom from Egyptian control to its ultimately fatal Babylonian domination.

5 During his "eleven years" Jehoiakim "did evil." As explained in Ezra's more detailed sources, this king first taxed his land to provide tribute to the Pharaoh (2Ki 23:35)—though he himself lived in luxury (Jer 22:14–15). He perverted justice and oppressed the poor (Jer 22:13, 17); and he persecuted the prophets that God sent to reprove his sin (cf. 2Ch 36:8, 16; Jer 26:21–24; 32:36).

6 After four years the Babylonian leader "Nebuchadnezzar" (whose name is more accurately rendered as Nebuchadrezzar, see Jer 21:2 note) "attacked" westward. In the spring of 605, he and his forces won a decisive victory over Neco at Carchemish (cf. comment on 35:20; Jer 46:2). As a consequence the Egyptians were driven back to their own borders; and the whole western Fertile Crescent, including Palestine, was given into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar (2Ki 24:7). The victor proceeded to bind Jehoiakim "with bronze shackles" to carry him into captivity; such a threat may, however, have been sufficiently effective to render unnecessary his actual removal to Babylon.

7 The fact that "Nebuchadnezzar took to Babylon articles from the temple," together with an initial captivity of selected Jewish hostages, including the prophet Daniel (cf. Da 1:1–3), marks the beginning of Israel's seventy-year Babylonian exile, 605–536 B.C. (Jer 29:10).

8 While Ezra refers only to his primary source (Israel's major court record) for "the other events of Jehoiakim's reign," it is known that these events included three years of serving Nebuchadnezzar (until 602), which were followed by a rebellion (2Ki 24:1–2). This presumably occurred in connection with a renewed rivalry between Egypt and Babylon, who fought a battle in the following year that resulted in a draw. Jehoiakim died on December 9, 598, just before his punishment could be meted out.

19. Jehoiachin (36:9–10)

In these two verses the Chronicler summarizes the more extensive data about the reign of Jehoiakim's young son, Jehoiachin, which is found in 2Ki 24:8–17. Like his uncle Jehoahaz of eleven years before (see 2Ch 36:1–4), the current world power permitted Jehoiachin to be king, but only for three months, at the close of 598 and at the beginning of 597 B.C. He thus reaped the bitter fruit of the rebellion that his father had instigated (see comment on v.8).

9 Since Jehoiachin had at least five children by the year 592 (see 1Ch 3:17), the variant reading (cf. NIV note) must be adopted, which says he "was eighteen years old when he became king"—not "eight." His reign of "three months and ten days" terminated on March 16, 597.

10 On April 22, 597, King Nebuchadnezzar had Jehoiachin deported from Jerusalem; he was "brought . . . to Babylon" along with a second and more extensive deportation (see comment on v.7). This included the prophet Ezekiel and ten thousand of the leaders and skilled workers that made up the backbone of Jewish society (cf. 2Ki 24:10–16).

20. Zedekiah (36:11–16)

"Jehoiachin's uncle, Zedekiah" (v.10) was appointed to rule over the remnant of Judah by King Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon. As the last of the twenty monarchs of the southern kingdom, his eleven-year reign extended from 597 to 586 B.C. Through acts of infidelity toward his imperial master, he unwisely touched off the final revolt that brought down the vengeance of the Babylonians on Judah and Jerusalem; and thus both the state and the city were destroyed. Yet ultimately Nebuchadnezzar served only as an instrument for accomplishing the sentence of God against his guilty nation: "The wrath of the LORD was aroused against his people and there was no remedy" (v.16).

11 Being only "twenty-one" at the time of his appointment, Zedekiah was by far the youngest of Josiah's sons to occupy the throne (see 1Ch 3:15). Furthermore, though "he reigned in Jerusalem," the fact that seals have been discovered with the inscription "Eliakim steward of Yaukin" indicates that, at the least, his nephew Jehoiachin continued to wield influence as a recognized possessor, even if an absentee one, of royal property and, at the most, that Zedekiah may have ruled to some extent as a regent for his exiled predecessor.

12 The statement that Zedekiah "did not humble himself before Jeremiah" sums up a complex relationship that existed between the king and the prophet. Zedekiah first disregarded Jeremiah's messages (Jer 34:1–10); he came in time to direct his inquiries to this same prophet (Jer 21); and he finally pled with him for help (Jer 37). But at no point did he sincerely submit to the requirements of the Lord that Jeremiah transmitted to him. King Zedekiah was a weak man, largely controlled by a few vicious nobles who were left, along with the inferior remnant of Judah (Jer 38:1–5).

13–16 At the instigation of Hophra, a new Pharaoh (589–570 B.C.) of the Twenty-Sixth Dynasty in Egypt (cf. Jer 37:5; Eze 17:15), Zedekiah "rebelled against King Nebuchadnezzar, who had made him take an oath in God's name." Zedekiah had been bound as a vassal to the Babylonian monarch; and it was his faithlessness that became his own undoing (Eze 17:13–19).

C. The exile (36:17–23)

Unlike the book of Kings, with its central message of stern moral judgments, Chronicles exists essentially as a book of hope, grounded on the grace of our sovereign Lord. The chapters on Judah's rulers (12:1–36:16) describe some great military victories and reforms, which sprang out of faith in God, even in the midst of the nation's overall spiritual deterioration. Then after having demonstrated that the Lord could, and did, reject his people for their disobedience (36:17–21), the Chronicler moves on to identify the groundwork by which Judah's postexilic restoration was effectuated, through the Persian king Cyrus's decree of 538 B.C. (vv.22–23). Thus, in a repopulated land with a rebuilt temple—that still depicted God's changeless way of salvation—a nation refined by its trials could more adequately celebrate the Lord's continuing providence together with his anticipated triumph in the messianic kingdom that yet must come into being. History is a process, not of disintegration, but of sifting, of selection, and of development. When decades of exile had removed the dross, a remnant of purer gold would respond to the appeal for return to the Promised Land: "The LORD his God be with him . . . let him go up" (2Ch 36:23)

17 On January 15, 588, the Lord "brought up" against Judah "the king of the Babylonians"; and on July 28, 586, Jerusalem fell. For greater detail on the city's capture and pillage, see 2Ki 25:1–21; Jer 39:1–10; 52:4–27. This destruction of Judah is also the subject of the biblical prediction that involves more verses than any other direct prophecy that is to be found within Scripture—608, distributed among seventeen different books of the Bible.

18–19 "The articles from the temple" were "carried to Babylon," and on August 14 the sanctuary itself was burned.

20 In describing "the remnant [GK 8636], who escaped from the sword," Ezra omitted, as less relevant to the restored, postexilic community, discussion about the regathering of refugees under Gedaliah and the flight of their remnant to Egypt (2Ki 25:22–26; Jer 40–44), about the small fourth deportation of 582 B.C. (Jer 52:30), and about "the poorest people of the land" who were left scattered in Palestine (2Ki 25:12). He speaks rather of those "carried into exile" in the third and great deportation of 586 (cf. the first and second deportations in vv.7, 10). Correspondingly, archaeology has demonstrated the thorough depopulation of Judah at this time.

Thus the exiles came "to Babylon," where "they became servants"; and yet, after an initial period of discouragement (Ps 137) and oppressive service (cf. Isa 14:2–3), at least some Jews gained favor and status (2Ki 25:27–30; Da 1:19; 2:49; 6:3). Those who were among the more worldly grew indifferent and drifted away from their faith (Eze 33:31–32), but the more godly increased in their spiritual maturity (cf. Ne 1:4; Est 4:14–16; Da 1:8).

21 The statement that for "seventy years . . . in fulfillment of the word of the LORD spoken by Jeremiah" (see comment on v.7) "the land enjoyed its sabbath rests" seems to correlate the full span of the Exile with an equivalent number of sabbatical years (Lev 25:1–7; 26:34). This produces a total figure of 70 times 7 or 490 years; and the idea is that of making up for half a millennium of neglected sabbatical rests.

22 In October 539 Babylon fell to "Cyrus king of Persia," as he overthrew Nabonidus and his son Belshazzar, who were its last native rulers (Da 5). Cyrus's policy of cooperating with local religions and of encouraging the return of exiles has received explicit archaeological confirmation from the inscriptions of the king himself (cf. the famous Cyrus Cylinder).

23 The words authorized by Cyrus, "The LORD, the God of heaven, has given me all kingdoms," should be recognized, from the viewpoint of Scripture, as constituting inspired truth, though from the viewpoint of contemporary Persian government they were probably understood as diplomatic language. Cyrus could thus address a Babylonian audience, saying, "Marduk, king of the gods [confessedly, the leading deity of the pantheon of Babylon, but not of Persia!] . . . designated me to rule over all the lands" (Cyrus Cylinder; see comment on v.22). But this monarch was still God's instrument for the providential restoration of Israel (Isa 44:28–45:5).The next book of the Bible, Ezra, picks up the narrative at precisely this point.

Ezra

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

The Babylonian exile in the sixth century B.C. was preceded by earlier deportations beginning in the eighth century by the Assyrians from both Israel and Judah. Deportation began with Tiglath-pileser III, who attacked Damascus and Galilee in 732 (2Ki 15:29), carrying off at least 13,520 people to Assyria. Then Shalmaneser V and Sargon II besieged Samaria in 722 (2Ki 17:6; 18:10). Sargon boasted that he carried off 27,290 (or 27,280) persons from Israel, replacing them with various other peoples from Mesopotamia and Syria.

Whereas Israel's population in the late eighth century B.C. has been estimated at 500,000 to 700,000, Judah's population in the eighth-to-sixth centuries has been estimated at between 220,000 and 300,000. Jerusalem's population likely was swelled by refugees from the north when Samaria fell in 722. At the time of Nehemiah, however, the city had contracted to 6,000 persons. Judah had escaped the attacks of Tiglath-pileser III when Azariah (Uzziah) paid tribute to the king, though Gezer was captured. But when Sennacherib attacked Judah in 701 B.C., he deported numerous Jews, especially from Lachish. His annals claim that he deported 200,150 from Judah, but this may be an error for 2,150.

The biblical references to the numbers deported by the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar are incomplete and somewhat confusing, giving rise to conflicting interpretations as to the actual number of Judeans deported. Until 1956 we had no extrabiblical evidence to confirm the attack on Judah in Nebuchadnezzar's first year. Either in that year or soon after, Daniel and his companions were carried off to Babylon.

In 597 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar carried off "all the officers and fighting men, and all the craftsmen and artisans—a total of ten thousand" (2Ki 24:14). According to v.16, "the king of Babylon also deported to Babylon the entire force of seven thousand fighting men . . . and a thousand craftsmen and artisans." If these figures represent only the heads of households, the total may have been closer to thirty thousand. On the other hand, Jeremiah enumerates for 597 B.C. but 3,023 captives (Jer 52:28) and for 586 only 832 captives from Jerusalem (v.29). In 582, after the murder of Gedaliah, 745 were deported, for a grand total of 4,600 (v.30). The smaller figures of Jeremiah probably represent only men of the most important families. Depending on one's estimate of the numbers deported and the number of returning exiles, we have widely varying estimates for the population of postexilic Judah. An estimate of 150,000 is probably correct.

An important difference between the deportations by the Babylonians and by the Assyrians is that the Babylonians did not replace the deportees with pagan newcomers. Thus Judah, though devastated, was not contaminated with polytheism to the same degree as was Israel.

According to the biblical record, the Babylonian armies smashed Jerusalem's defenses (2Ki 25:10), destroyed the temple and palaces (2Ki 25:9, 13–17; Jer 52:13, 17–23), and devastated the countryside (Jer 32:43), killing many of the leaders and priests (2Ki 25:18–21). The severity of the Babylonian devastation has been amply confirmed by archaeology, evidences of which have been uncovered at such places as Beth-Shemesh, Eglon, En Gedi, Gibeah, and Jerusalem. Thousands must have died in battle or of starvation (La 2:11–22; 4:9–10). After the deportations only the poor of the land—the vine-growers and farmers—were left (2Ki 25:12; Jer 39:10; 40:7; 52:16), occupying the vacant lands (Jer 6:12; see comment on Ezr 4:4). A few refugees who fled to different areas drifted back (Jer 40:11–12). For the next fifty years these people eked out a precarious existence under the Babylonian yoke (La 5:2–5), subjected to ill treatment and forced labor (vv.11–13).

During this time some limited forms of worship were continued in the ruined area of the temple (Jer 41:5). The Scriptures themselves pass over developments in Palestine and stress the contribution of the returning exiles from Babylonia.

In light of the fact that the intellectual and spiritual leaders were the ones who were deported, the Scriptures must reflect the historical situation. Judging from earlier Assyrian reliefs and texts, the men were probably marched in chains, with women and children bearing sacks of their bare possessions on wagons as they made their way to Mesopotamia. The exiled Judean king, Jehoiachin, was maintained at the Babylonian court and provided with rations (2Ki 25:29–30).

After several years of hardship, the exiles made adjustments and even prospered (Jer 29:4–5). They were settled in various communities—e.g., on the river Kebar near Nippur, sixty miles southeast of Babylon (Eze 1:1–3; cf. Ezr 2:59–Ne 7:61). When the exiles returned, they brought with them numerous servants and animals and were able to make contributions for the sacred services (Ezr 2:65–69; 8:26; Ne 7:67–72).

With the birth of a second and a third generation, many Jews established roots in Mesopotamia and wanted to remain there. The spiritual life of the Jewish community in Mesopotamia is documented by Ezekiel, who was in exile either after 597 or 586. Ezekiel 8:1 refers to the prophet "sitting in my house and the elders of Judah were sitting before me" (cf. Eze 3:15; 14:1; 20:1; 24:18; 33:30–33). Deprived of the temple, the exiles laid great stress on the observation of the Sabbath, on the laws of purity, and on prayer and fasting. It has often been suggested that the development of synagogues began in Mesopotamia during the Exile (but see Ne 8:18). The trials of the Exile purified and strengthened the faith of the Jews and cured them of idolatry.

The exiles who chose to return to Judah found their territory much diminished. The tiny enclave of Judah was surrounded by antagonistic neighbors. North of Bethel was the province of Samaria. South of Beth-Zur, Judean territory had been overrun by Idumaeans (cf. on Ezr 2:22–35). The eastern boundary followed the Jordan River, and the western boundary the Shephelah (low hills). The Philistine coast had been apportioned to Phoenician settlers. The Persians did make Judah an autonomous province with the right to mint its own coins.

2. Reign of Artaxerxes I

Nehemiah served as the royal cupbearer of Artaxerxes I (Ne 1:1; 2:1), the Achaemenid king who ruled from 464 to 424. The traditional view places Ezra before Nehemiah in the reign of Artaxerxes I, the third son of Xerxes and Amestris. His older brothers were named Darius and Hystaspes. Their father was assassinated in his bedchamber, between Aug and Dec 465, by Artabanus, a powerful courtier. In the ensuing months Artaxerxes, who was but eighteen years old, managed to kill Artabanus and his brother Darius. He went on to defeat his brother Hystaspes in Bactria. His first regnal year is reckoned from Apr 13, 464 B.C.

From 461 Artaxerxes I lived at Susa. He used the palace of Darius I till it burned down near the end of his reign. He then moved to Persepolis, where he lived in the former palace of Darius I. He completed the Great Throne Hall begun by Xerxes.

When Artaxerxes I came to the throne, he was faced with a major revolt in Egypt that was to last a decade. The Egyptian leaders defeated the Persian satrap Achaemenes, the brother of Xerxes, and gained control of much of the Delta region by 462. The Athenians, who had been at war with the Persians since the latter had invaded Greece in 490, helped the rebels capture Memphis, the capital of Lower Egypt, in 459. This situation may have led the Persians to support Ezra's return in 458 in order to secure a loyal buffer state in Palestine.

In 456 Megabyzus, the satrap of Syria, advanced against Egypt with a huge fleet and army. During eighteen months he was able to suppress the revolt. A fleet of forty Athenian ships with six thousand men sailed into a Persian trap. In spite of promises made by Megabyzus, the Egyptian leader was impaled in 454 at the instigation of Amestris, the mother of Artaxerxes I. Angered at this betrayal, Megabyzus revolted against the king from 449 to 446. If the events of Ezr 4:7–23 took place in this period, Artaxerxes I would have been suspicious of the building activities in Jerusalem. How then could the same king have commissioned Nehemiah to rebuild the walls of the city in 445? By then both the Egyptian revolt and the rebellion of Megabyzus had been resolved.

Artaxerxes I ended his long forty-year reign by dying from natural causes in the winter of 424 B.C.—a rarity in view of the frequent assassinations of Persian kings.

3. Authorship and Date

As in the closely related books of Chronicles, one notes the prominence of various lists in Ezra-Nehemiah. Evidently obtained from official sources, these comprise (1) the vessels of the temple (Ezr 1:9–11); (2) the returned exiles (Ezr 2:1–70; Ne 7:6–73); (3) the genealogy of Ezra (Ezr 7:1–5); (4) the heads of the clans (Ezr 8:1–14); (5) those involved in mixed marriages (Ezr 10:18–43); (6) those who helped rebuild the wall (Ne 3); (7) those who sealed the covenant (Ne 10:1–27); (8) residents of Jerusalem and other cities (Ne 11:3–36); and (9) priests and Levites (Ne 12:1–26).

Also included in Ezra are seven official documents or letters (all, except the first, in Aramaic; the first is in Hebrew): (1) the decree of Cyrus (Ezr 1:2–4); (2) the accusation of Rehum et al. against the Jews (4:11–16); (3) the reply of Artaxerxes I (4:17–22); (4) the report from Tattenai (5:7–17); (5) the memorandum of Cyrus's decree (6:2b–5); (6) Darius's reply to Tattenai (6:6–22); (7) the king's authorization to Ezra (7:12–26).

Certain characteristics common to both Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah have led many to hold that the author of Chronicles was also the author/compiler of Ezra-Nehemiah. The verses at the end of Chronicles and at the beginning of Ezra are identical (see comment on Ezr 1:1). Both Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah exhibit a fondness for lists, for the description of religious festivals, and for certain phrases. Especially striking in these books is the prominence of the Levites and of temple personnel. Because of his interest in the temple and the cult, it is assumed that the "Chronicler" was a Levite, or even a singer.

Though there are many complex relationships between Ezra-Nehemiah and Chronicles, we regard Nehemiah as the author of the Nehemiah memoirs and Ezra as the author of both the Ezra memoirs and the Ezra narrative, with a later follower of Ezra's circle as the Chronicler. We would date the composition of the Ezra materials about 440, the Nehemiah memoirs about 430, and 1 and 2 Chronicles about 400.

4. Purpose and Values

Ezra and Nehemiah record the return of the Jewish exiles from Babylonia and the rebuilding of the temple and the walls around Jerusalem. These accounts highlight the importance of the temple and its personnel. Of vital importance were the attempts to keep the community pure from the syncretistic influence of the neighbors who surrounded it. In some cases Jewish communities compromised and were assimilated out of existence, as at Elephantine in Egypt. The measures taken by Ezra and Nehemiah to safeguard the Jews from commingling with non-Jews may appear harsh to modern society, but in the light of history they were necessary.

a. The book of Ezra

The book of Ezra reveals the providential intervention of the God of heaven on behalf of his people. In ch. 1 the Lord is sovereign over all kingdoms (v.2) and moves even the heart of a pagan ruler to fulfill his will (v.1). He accomplishes the refining of his people through calamities like the Conquest and the Exile. He stirs the heart of his people to respond and raises men of God to lead his people (v.11). Ezra 3 shows that the service of God requires a united effort (v.1), leadership (v.2a), obedience to God's Word (v.2b), courage in the face of opposition (v.3), offerings and funds (vv.4–7), and an organized division of labor (vv.8–9). Meeting these requirements resulted in a sound foundation for later work (v.11), tears and joy (vv.11–12), and praise and thanksgiving to the Lord (v.11).

Ezra 4 teaches that doing the work of God brings opposition: in the guise of proffered cooperation from those who do not share our basic theological convictions (vv.1–2) to complete work that we alone are responsible for (v.3); and from various groups of opponents, such as those who would discourage and intimidate us (v.4), professional counselors who offer misleading advice (v.5), false accusers (vv.6, 13), and secular authorities (vv.7, 21–24). Far from being discouraged, however, we need to be alert and vigorous, knowing that by God's grace we can triumph over all opposition and accomplish his will with rejoicing (6:14–16).

Ezra experienced the good hand of God. As a scribe he was more than a scholar—he was an expounder of the Scriptures (7:6, 12). He believed that God could guide and protect from misfortune (8:20–22). As an inspired leader he enlisted others and assigned trustworthy men to their tasks (7:27–28; 8:15, 24). He regarded what he did as a sacred trust (8:21–28). Ezra was above all a man of fervent prayer (8:21; 10:1), deep piety, and humility (7:10, 27–28; 9:3; 10:6).

b. The book of Nehemiah

The book of Nehemiah, perhaps more than any other book of the OT, reflects the vibrant personality of its author. (1) Nehemiah was a man of responsibility; he served as the king's cupbearer (1:11–2:1). (2) Nehemiah was a man of vision. (3) He was a man of prayer (1:5–11; 2:4–5). (4) He was a man of action and cooperation (2:16–18; ch. 3). (5) He was a man of compassion (5:8, 18). (6) He was a man who triumphed over opposition. (7) Finally, Nehemiah was a man with right motivation who sought to please and serve his divine Sovereign.

EXPOSITION

I. The First Return From Exile and the Rebuilding of the Temple (1:1–6:22).

A. The First Return of the Exiles (1:1–11)

1. The edict of Cyrus (1:1–4)

It had been nearly seventy years since the first deportation of the Jews by the Babylonians to Mesopotamia. Though the initial years must have been difficult, the second and third generation of Jews born in the Exile had adjusted to their surroundings. Though some had become so comfortable that they refused to return to Judah when given the opportunity, still others, sustained by the examples and teachings of leaders like Daniel and Ezekiel, retained their faith in the Lord's promises and their allegiance to their homeland.

1 Ezra 1:1–3a is virtually identical with 2Ch 36:22–23. "In the first year" means the first regnal year of Cyrus, beginning in Nisan 538, after his capture of Babylon in October 539. Cyrus, the founder of the Persian Empire, reigned over the Persians from 559 till 530 B.C. He established Persian dominance over the Medes in 550, conquered Lydia and Anatolia in 547–546, and captured Babylon in 539. Isaiah 44:28 and 45:1 speak of Cyrus as the Lord's "shepherd" and his "anointed."

Daniel (Da 1:21; 6:28; 10:1) was in Babylon when Cyrus captured it. "The word of the LORD spoken by Jeremiah" was the prophet's prediction (Jer 25:1–12; 29:10) of a seventy-year Babylonian captivity. The first deportations had begun in 605, in the third year of Jehoiakim (see Da 1:1). The seventieth year would be 536.

"Proclamation" (GK 7754) was an oral announcement in the native language in contrast to the copy of the decree in 6:3–5, which was an Aramaic memorandum for the archives.

2 The phrase "the God of heaven" occurs primarily in the postexilic books (i.e., Ezra, Nehemiah, Daniel). The city of Jerusalem and the house of God are both prominent subjects in Ezra-Nehemiah. "A temple for him at Jerusalem in Judah" is literally "a house for him in Jerusalem that is in Judah." The formulation "Jerusalem that is in Judah" is characteristic of Persian bureaucratic style. Cyrus instituted the enlightened policy of placating the gods of his subject peoples rather than carrying off their cult statues as the Assyrians, Elamites, Hittites, and Babylonians had done before. His generosity to the Jews was also paralleled by his benevolence to the Babylonians. Ultimately, however, it was the Lord who had "moved" his heart.

3–4 The religious orientation of the Achaemenid kings—Cyrus and his successors—is a controversial issue. "Where survivors may now be living" (lit., "everyone who remains over") refers to survivors of the capture and deportation (cf. Ne 1:2). The Hebrew word for "living" (GK 1591) is cognate to the word for "resident alien." The deportees continued to be regarded as aliens, as were the Susians and Elamites who were "resident" in Samaria years after their deportation (4:10, 17). "The people of any place" probably designates the many Jews, especially of the second and the third generation, who did not wish to leave the land of their birth. "Freewill offerings" were voluntary gifts (vv.4,6; 2:68–69; 3:5; 7:13–16; 8:28) and voluntary service (v.5; 7:13), the keys to the restoration of God's temple and its service.

2. The Return under Sheshbazzar (1:5–11)

5–6 The Lord stirred not only the heart of the Persian king but also the hearts of many of the exiles who had maintained their faith in the Lord in spite of the devastation of their homeland. A vivid attestation to this faith is an inscription carved at Khirbet Beit Lei, five miles east of Lachish, which can be translated: "I am the Lord your God: I will accept the cities of Judah and will redeem Jerusalem," perhaps incised by a refugee to express his trust in God's faithfulness despite the desolation of the Holy City (cf. La 3:22–24).

7 Conquerors customarily carried off the statues of the gods of conquered cities. The Philistines took the ark of the Jews and placed it in the temple of Dagon (1Sa 5:2). The Hittites took the statue of Marduk when they conquered the city of Babylon. As the Jews did not have a statue of the Lord, Nebuchadnezzar carried off the temple goods instead (cf. 2Ki 25:13; Jer 52:17).

Jeremiah spoke of false prophets who prematurely predicted the return of these vessels (Jer 27:16–22; 28:6); he prophesied their ultimate return (27:22). Belshazzar had the audacity to drink from some of the temple vessels (Da 5:23).

8 The Persian name "Mithredath" means "given by Mithra." Mithra(s) was the Persian god whose mystery religion became popular in the Greco-Roman world. Another official with the same name appears in 4:7. Sheshbazzar, who had a Babylonian name, was probably a Jewish official who served as a deputy governor of Judah under the satrap in Samaria (cf. Ezr 5:14).

9–11 When the Assyrian and Babylonian conquerors carried off booty, their scribes made a careful inventory of it. The actual figures in the Hebrew text add up to 2,499 rather than 5,400, perhaps because only the larger and more valuable vessels were specified. The exact meanings of the Hebrew words for the objects are uncertain. We know nothing about the details of Sheshbazzar's journey, which probably took place in the spring of 537. Judging from Ezra's later journey (7:8–9), the trip probably took about four months. The caravan would have proceeded from Babylonia up the Euphrates River and then south through the Orontes Valley of Syria to Palestine.

B. The List of Returning Exiles (2:1–70)

1. Leaders of the return (2:1–2a)

1 The list of returning exiles in vv.1–70 almost exactly parallels the list in Ne 7:6–73. The list of localities indicates that people retained their memories of their homes and that exiles from a very wide background of tribes, villages, and towns returned. A comparison of Ezr 2 with Ne 7 reveals a number of differences in both the names and the numbers that are listed. Though the lists of temple personnel show few variations, there are differences in about half the cases of the lists of the laity. Many differences may be explained by assuming that a cipher notation was used with vertical strokes for units, horizontal strokes for tens, and stylized mems (Heb. letter "m") for hundreds.

2a The KJV's colon after Zerubbabel implies that all those who followed were among those returning with Zerubbabel in 537. The NIV, NRSV, et al., place a comma after Zerubbabel, leaving open the possibility that the list may include those who returned to Judah at a later date. The list of eleven leaders in Ezr 2 is increased by the addition of "Nahamani" inserted before the name of Mordecai in Ne 7:7.

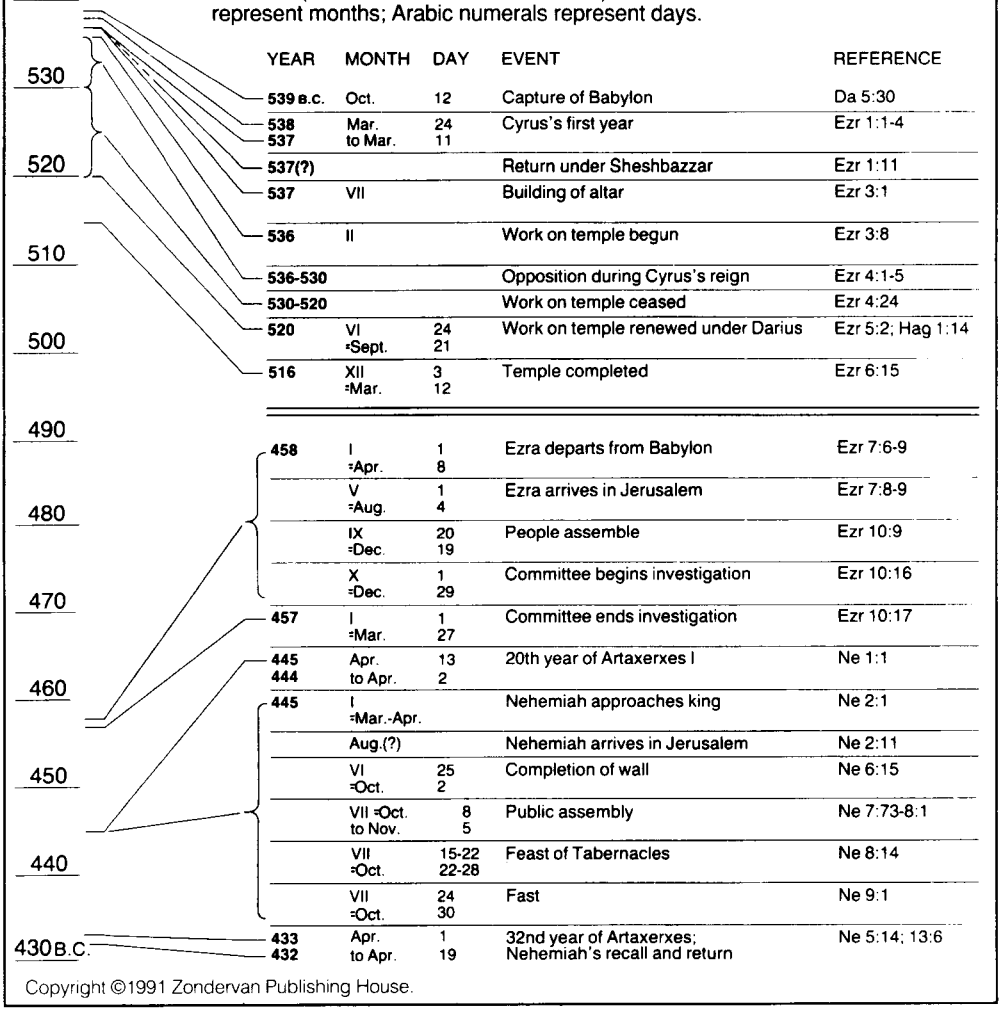
On "Zerubbabel" see 5:2. "Jeshua" is a name similar to "Joshua" (Ne 8:17) and to the Greek "Jesus"; it means "The LORD [Yahweh] is salvation." If he is the same as the Joshua of Hag 1:1, he was the son of Jehozadak, the high priest carried into exile (1Ch 6:15) and the grandson of Seraiah, the high priest put to death by Nebuchadnezzar (2Ki 25:18–21). "Nehemiah" was not the same person as the king's cupbearer. "Seraiah" means "The LORD is Prince." "Reelaiah" is paralleled in Ne 7:7 by "Raamiah." "Mordecai" is based on the name of the god of Babylon, Marduk (Jer 50:2). It is the name borne by Esther's uncle. "Mispar" is paralleled in Ne 7:7 by "Mispereth." "Bigvai" is a Persian name meaning "happy."

2. Families (2:2b–20)

2b "The list of the men of the people of Israel" may have been of males only over the age of twelve.

3 "The descendants of Parosh" represented the largest family of priests returning from Babylon. Members of this family returned

CHRONOLOGY: EZRA-NEHEMIAH



Dates below are given according to a Nisan-to-Nisan Jewish calendar (see chart on Hebrew Calendar). Roman numerals represent months; Arabic numerals represent days.

YEAR	MONTH	DAY	EVENT	REFERENCE
539 B.C.	Oct.	12	Capture of Babylon	Da 5:30
538 537	Mar. to Mar.	24 11	Cyrus's first year	Ezr 1:1-4
537(?)			Return under Sheshbazzar	Ezr 1:11
537	VII		Building of altar	Ezr 3:1
536	II		Work on temple begun	Ezr 3:8

with Ezra (8:3); some of them assisted in rebuilding the wall (Ne 3:25). "Parosh" (GK 7283) means "flea" (cf. GK 7282) and may connote insignificance (cf. 1Sa 24:14). Insect and animal names were common among the Hebrews.

4–12 "Shephatiah" means "The LORD has judged." Other members of the family returned with Ezra (8:8). "Arah" means "wild ox." "Pahath-Moab" means "governor of Moab" (cf. 8:4; 10:30; Ne 7:11; 10:14). These may be the descendants of the tribe of Reuben who were deported from the province of Moab by Tiglath-pileser III (cf. 1Ch 5:3–8). "Elam" was the name of the country in southwestern Iran in the area of Susa (cf. v.31; 8:7; 10:2, 26; Ne 7:12; 10:14).

"Zaccai" may mean "pure" or may be a shortened form of Zechariah ("The LORD has remembered"). "Bani" is a shortened form of Benaiah ("The LORD has built"); Ne 7:15 has Binnui. "Azgad" ("Gad is strong") is either a reference to Gad, the god of fortune, or to the Transjordanian tribe of Gad. The greatest numerical discrepancy occurs here: Ezra lists 1,222 whereas Nehemiah lists 2,322.

13–20 "Adonikam" means "my Lord has arisen." "Ater" means "Lefty" (cf. Jdg 3:15; 20:16). "Hezekiah" means "The LORD is my strength." "Bezai," a shorted form of Bezaleel, means "in the shadow of God."

3. Villagers (2:21–35)

Verses 21–35 list a series of villages and towns, most of them in Benjamite territory north of Jerusalem. Significantly, no references are to towns in the Negev south of Judah. When Nebuchadnezzar overran Judah (Jer 13:19), the Edomites (cf. Obadiah) opportunistically occupied the area. By the fifth century B.C., Nabataean Arabs (Mal 1:2–5) were pressing on the Edomites, who moved west and occupied the area south of Hebron, later known as Idumaea.

21–25 "Bethlehem"—among the returnees may have been the ancestors of Jesus (Mic 5:2). "Netophah," a city south of Jerusalem, was settled by Levites (1Ch 9:16). "Anathoth," a village named after the Canaanite goddess Anath, was located three miles north of Jerusalem and was the home of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer 1:1). "Azmaveth" was two miles farther north. "Kiriath Jearim" means "village of the woods," (cf. Ne 7:29). This was the site eight miles northwest of Jerusalem where the ark rested (1Sa 6:21; 7:1). "Beeroth" means "wells," a site located twelve miles north of Jerusalem.

26–28 "Ramah" ("the height") was five miles north of Jerusalem. "Geba" was located east of Ramah. "Micmash," eight miles northeast of Jerusalem, was the scene of Jonathan's exploit (1Sa 13:23). "Bethel" ("the house of God") was located twelve miles north of Jerusalem. As a border town, it probably became a part of Judah in Josiah's reign. Bethel, however, was destroyed in the transition between the Babylonian and Persian periods. Excavations have revealed a small town on the site in Ezra's day.

29–35 "Nebo" was perhaps the same as Nob, which has been located on Mount Scopus, just to the east of Jerusalem. "Harim" means "dedicated to God." "Lod," modern Lydda, ten miles southeast of Jaffa, is today the site of the Israeli International Airport. "Jericho" is the famous oasis city just north of the Dead Sea. "Senaah" means "the hated one." The largest number of returnees (3,630) is associated with Senaah, which is perhaps not a specific locality or family but a low-caste people.

4. Priests (2:36–39)

Four clans of priests are named with a total of 4,289, or about one-tenth the total. They may have been inspired by the hope of serving in a rebuilt temple.

36–39 "Jedaiah" ("The LORD has known") was a family of priests noted during the time of David (1Ch 24:7). "Immer" means "lamb" (cf. 1Ch 24:14). On "Harim" see comment on v.32

5. Levites and temple personnel (2:40–42)

40 The Levites, descendants of Levi (Ge 29:34), may have originally been regarded as priests (Dt 18:6–8); but they became subordinate to the priestly descendants of Aaron, brother of Moses (Nu 3:9–10; 1Ch 16:4–42; 23:26–32). The Levites were then prohibited from offering sacrifices on the altar (Nu 16:40; 18:7). As the Levites had no inheritance in land, they lived in forty-eight Levitical cities and were supported by tithes (Dt 12:12, 18; 14:29). They were butchers, doorkeepers, singers (1Ch 15:22; 16:4–7), scribes and teachers (2Ch 35:3; Ne 8:7, 9), and even temple beggars (2Ch 24:5–11).

41 On "the singers," see Ne 11:22–23; 12:29; 13:10. "Asaph" (lit., "he removed") was one of the three Levites appointed by David over the temple singers.

42 "Gatekeepers" (GK 8788) are mentioned thirteen times in Ezra-Nehemiah, nineteen times in Chronicles. They are usually regarded as Levites (1Ch 9:26; 2Ch 8:14; 23:4; Ne 12:25; 13:22) but are sometimes differentiated from them (2Ch 35:15). At times as many as four thousand gatekeepers were mentioned (1Ch 23:5). Their primary function was to tend the doors and gates of the temple (1Sa 3:15; 1Ch 9:17–32), though they were also expected to perform other menial tasks (2Ch 31:14). The psalmist said he would rather be a doorkeeper in the house of his God than to dwell in the tents of the wicked (Ps 84:10). The 139 gatekeepers listed here belonged to six small clans. "Shallum" means "complete"; "Talmon" means "brightness"; "Akkub" means "protected."

6. Temple servants (2:43–58)

43–45 A long list of names (thirty-five in Ezra, thirty-two in Nehemiah) follows the heading "temple servants"; but the clans must have been very small, averaging about nine members. The temple servants and the sons of Solomon's servants together numbered 392 (v.58)—more than the total of the Levites, gatekeepers, and singers (vv.40–42). Though of a very menial status, they must have served God with true devotion. The Hebrew word for "temple servants" ("Nethinim"; GK 5987) occurs only in 1Ch 9:2 and in Ezra-Nehemiah. They occupied a special quarter in Jerusalem (Ne 3:26, 31; 11:21) and enjoyed exemption from taxes (Ezr 7:24). They participated in the rebuilding of the wall (Ne 3:26) and signed Nehemiah's covenant (Ne 10:29).

46–54 "Hanan" ("[God] is gracious") is derived from the verb for "to be gracious." The name "Johanan" ("The LORD is gracious") has given us the name John. "Giddel," a shortened form of Geddeliah, means "The LORD has made great." "Rezin" is an Aramaic name that means "prince" (cf. Pr 14:28). "Meunim" seems to be related to the Maonites (Jdg 10:12), an Arab tribe south of the Dead Sea subdued by Uzziah (2Ch 26:7). A city near Petra is named Maan. "Nephussim" refers to a Bedouin tribe descended from Ishmael (Ge 25:15; 1Ch 1:31; 5:18–22). "Neziah" is "faithful"; "Hatipha" means "snatched," as a captive in childhood.

55–58 The phrase "the descendants of the servants of Solomon" occurs only in this passage and in Ne 7:60; 11:3. These may be the descendants of the Canaanites whom Solomon enslaved (1Ki 9:20–21). "Hassophereth" is a feminine form that means "the scribe"; women scribes were rare. An analysis of the figures in these lists yields the following percentages of the total (v.64): families, 53.2; villagers, 29.6; priests, 14.7; Levites, 0.2; singers, 0.4; gatekeepers, 0.5; temple servants and descendants of the servants of Solomon, 1.4.

7. Individuals lacking evidence of their genealogies (2:59–63)

59 The Hebrew word tel (GK 9424) designates hilllike mounds that cover the remains of ruined cities. "Tel Melah" ("mound of salt") is possibly a mound strewed with salt (cf. Jdg 9:45). "Tel Harsha" is "mound of potsherds." Tel-Abib (Eze 3:15) means the "mound of a flood," i.e., a place destroyed by a flood.

The Jewish exiles were settled along the Kebar River (Eze 1:1) near the city of Nippur, a city in southern Mesopotamia that was the stronghold of rebels. Of the exiles who returned, members of three lay families and three priestly families were unable at this time to prove their descent. Some may have derived from proselytes; others may have temporarily lost access to their genealogical records.

60 "Delaiah" is "The LORD has drawn." "Tobiah" ("The LORD is good") was the name also of one of Nehemiah's chief adversaries (Ne 2:10, 19). The total of 652 could not prove their genealogies.

61 "Hobaiah" means "The LORD has hidden." "Barzillai" ("man of iron") of Gilead in Transjordan helped David during his flight from his son Absalom (2Sa 17:27–29; 19:31–39; 1Ki 2:7). That the bridegroom took the name of his wife's father reflects a marriage arranged by a father who had only daughters. The children from this marriage belonged to the wife's family (cf. Ge 29–31; 1Ch 2:34–36).

62 Genealogies figure prominently in Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah. The knowledge of relationships was highly regarded in ancient times.

63 "The governor" probably refers here to either Sheshbazzar or Zerubbabel. "The most sacred food" refers to the most holy part of the offering—the portion of the priests. "The Urim and Thummim," objects kept in the breastplate of the high priest, were used for divining God's will (cf. Ex 28:30; Lev 8:8; Nu 27:21; Dt 33:8). They were probably two small objects made of wood, bone, or stone, perhaps of different colors or with different inscriptions, that would give a yes or no answer.

8. Totals (2:64–67)

64 The given total of 42,360 is considerably more than the sum of the actual figures given from the figures in Ezr 2 and Ne 7. To account for the difference of about twelve thousand presents problems. Were these unspecified people women and/or children? If there were relatively few women among the returnees, the pressures for intermarriage would have been considerable.

65 The ratio of slaves—one to six—is relatively high; that so many would return with their masters speaks highly of the relatively benevolent treatment of slaves by the Jews. The male and female singers listed here may have been secular singers who sang at weddings, funerals, etc. (2Ch 35:25) as distinct from the male temple singers of v.41.

66 "Horses" in the OT are usually associated with royalty and the military. The horses listed here may have been a donation from Cyrus for the nobility. "Mules" are hybrid offspring of donkey stallions and mares. They combine the strength and size of the horse with the patience and sure-footedness of the donkey. They were not originally bred in Palestine; Solomon had to import them (1Ki 10:25; 2Ch 9:24). As precious animals they were used by the royalty and wealthy (1Ki 1:33; Isa 66:20).

67 The "camels" mentioned in the OT were the one-humped Arabian camels as distinct from the two-humped Bactrian camels. The camel can carry its rider and about four hundred pounds and can travel three or four days without drinking. "Donkeys" were sure-footed and able to live on poor forage. They were used to carry loads, women, or children. Sheep, goats, and cattle are not mentioned. They would have slowed the caravan.

9. Offerings (2:68–69)

68 The caravan probably followed the Euphrates River north to a point east of Aleppo, crossed west to the Orontes River Valley, then traveled south to Hamath, Homs, and Riblah. They would then have either passed through the Beqah Valley in Lebanon (cf. Jer 39:5–7; 52:9–10, 26–27) or have proceeded east of the Anti-Lebanon Mountains to Damascus and then to Palestine. As the people were expending most of their savings, their giving demonstrated a true spirit of dedication to God's service (cf. Ex 36:5–7; 2Co 9:6–7).

69 The parallel passage in Ne 7:70–72 gives a fuller description than the account in Ezra. In Ezra the gifts come from the heads of the clans but in Nehemiah from three sources: the governor, the chiefs of the clans, and the rest of the people.

The "drachma" (GK 2007) was the Greek silver coin worth a day's wage in the late fifth century B.C. More likely the coin intended here was the Persian daric, which was a gold coin, named probably after Darius I, who began minting it. The coin was famed for its purity, which was guaranteed by the king. Its value equaled the price of an ox or a month's wages for a soldier. Since the coin was not in use until the time of Darius I (522–486 B.C.), its occurrence here in 537 B.C. has been labeled anachronistic. Its use is better viewed as a modernization by terms current at the time of the book's composition of earlier values, perhaps the Median shekel.

A "mina" equaled 1.26 pounds of silver; five thousand minas would be 6,300 pounds of silver. A mina equals five years' wages.

10. Settlement of the exiles (2:70)

70 Later Nehemiah would be compelled to move people by lot to reinforce the population of Jerusalem, as the capital city had suffered the severest loss of life at the time of the Babylonian attacks. The survivors, who came for the most part from towns in the countryside, naturally preferred to resettle in their hometowns.

C. The Revival of Temple Worship (3:1–13)

1. The rebuilding of the altar (3:1–3)

1 "The seventh month" is Tishri (Sept–Oct), about three months after the arrival of the exiles in Palestine. Tishri is one of the most sacred months of the Jewish year. The first day is the New Year's Day (Rosh Hashanah) of the civil calendar, proclaimed with the blowing of trumpets and a holy convocation (Lev 23:24). Ten days later the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur) is observed (Lev 23:27). From the fifteenth to the twenty-second day, the Feast of Tabernacles (Succoth) is celebrated (Lev 23:34–36). "Assembled as one man" and similar expressions of the unity of Israel are found in Nu 14:15; Jdg 6:16; 20:1, 8, 11; 1Sa 11:7; 2Sa 19:14.

2 Jeshua, the high priest, took precedence over Zerubbabel, the civil leader, in view of the nature of the occasions (cf. v.8; 5:2; Hag 1:1). During their long stay in Babylon, the Jews were not able to offer any sacrifices, as this could only be done in Jerusalem. Instead they were surrounded by a myriad of pagan temples. Thus the exiles' first task in the midst of hostile neighbors was to erect once more an altar to sacrifice to the Lord.

The Jews' "enemies" did not have anything to fear from the rebuilding of the temple, as they did later from the rebuilding of the wall. Sincerely or not, they at first offered their help to rebuild the temple.

3 "Despite their fear" is literally "for with fear" or "for in fear." The Hebrew word means a terror inspired by people (Pr 20:2) or by animals (Job 39:20). "The peoples around them" is literally "peoples of the lands."

2. The Festival of Booths (3:4–6)

4 The original Hebrew word for "tabernacle" (GK 6109) refers to the "huts" constructed for this feast, which is sometimes simply called "the feast" or "the feast of the Lord." It was originally a joyous harvest celebration (Ex 23:14–16; 34:22–23; Lev 23:33–43; Nu 29:12–40; Dt 16:13–16; cf. 1Sa 1:1–3; 1Ki 12:32).

Jews today celebrate the feast by building a hut covered with an open roof of branches, decorated with fruits and vegetables. Following Lev 23:40, Jews also use the palm, the willow, and the myrtle as the "lulav" ("a shoot or young branch") and the "ethrog" (a yellow citron known in Israel only from Hellenistic times). During each of the nine days of the feast, the lulav and the ethrog are held in the hands and waved in all directions. The "burnt offerings" (GK 6592) were those sacrifices prescribed for morning (Lev 1:13) and evening (Nu 28:3–4).

5–6 The new moon marked the first day of the month and was a holy day (Nu 28:11–15; cf. Col 2:16). "The appointed sacred feasts" include such festivals as the Passover, Weeks (Pentecost), and the Day of Atonement (Lev 23). The renewal of the "freewill offerings" (cf. 1:4; GK 5607) fulfilled the promise of Jer 33:10–11. Notice that the revival of the services preceded the erection of the temple itself.

3. The beginning of temple reconstruction (3:7–13)

7 As with the first temple, the Phoenicians (of Tyre and Sidon) cooperated by sending timbers and workmen (1Ki 5:7–12). The latter were paid in "money" (lit., "silver") that would have been weighed out in shekels (see comment on 2:69). Ancient Phoenicia (modern Lebanon) was renowned for its cedars and other coniferous trees. Both the Mesopotamians and the Egyptians sought to obtain its timbers either by trade or by conquest. Cedars, mentioned seventy-one times in the OT, can grow to a height of 120 feet with a girth of 30 to 40 feet. Their fragrant wood resists rot and insects. The wood was floated on rafts down the coast and unloaded at Joppa (cf. 1Ki 5:9; 2Ch 2:15–16).

Sidon, twenty-eight miles south of modern Beirut, was one of the greatest of all the Phoenician cities (Ge 10:19; 1Ki 5:6; 16:31; 1Ch 22:4). After the conquest of the island of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar following a thirteen-year siege, Sidon became prominent. Renowned for its maritime trade (Eze 26:4–14), Tyre was later transformed into a peninsula by Alexander the Great.

8–9 The second month, Iyyar (Apr/May), was the same month when Solomon began his temple (1Ki 6:1). As the Jews probably returned to Palestine in the spring of 537, the second year would be the spring of 536. Previously the age limit for the Levites was thirty (Nu 4:3) or twenty-five years (Nu 8:24). It was reduced to twenty (1Ch 23:24, 27; 2Ch 31:17), no doubt because of the scarcity of Levites. Zerubbabel and Jeshua were involved in laying the foundation of the second temple, though 5:16 describes Sheshbazzar as also laying the foundation.

10 The "trumpets" (GK 2956) were made of beaten silver (Nu 10:2). Except perhaps for their use at the coronation of Joash (2Ki 11:14; 2Ch 23:13), trumpets were always blown by priests (Nu 10:8; 1Ch 15:24; 16:6). They were most often used on joyous occasions such as here and at the dedication of the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Ne 12:35; cf. 2Ch 5:13; Ps 98:6). "Cymbals" (GK 5199) were also played by priests and Levites.

11 "They sang" may be antiphonal singing by a choir divided into two groups, i.e., singing responsively (see Ne 12:8–9). "He is good," a constant refrain in Scriptures (1Ch 16:34; 2Ch 7:3; Pss 106:1; 136:1; Jer 33:10–11), implies the goodness of a covenant-keeping God. "Love" (GK 2876) means "steadfast love."

12–13 The loud shouting expressed the great jubilation of the people (cf. 10:12; cf. Jos 6:5, 20; 1Sa 4:5; Ps 95:1-2). The tears and outcries expressed the deep emotion of the occasion. Traditionally, Hebrews show their emotions by weeping out loud (cf. 10:1; Ne 1:4; 8:9). Whereas the elders were overcome with the memories of the splendors of Solomon's temple, the younger returnees shouted with great excitement at the prospect of a new temple. The God who had permitted judgment was also the God who had brought them back and would enable them to complete this project.

D. The Opposition to the Rebuilding (4:1–24)

1. Opposition during the reign of Cyrus (4:1–5)

This chapter summarizes various attempts to thwart the efforts of the Jews. In vv.1–5 the author describes events under Cyrus (539–530 B.C.), in v.6 under Xerxes (485–465), in vv.7–23 under Artaxerxes I (464–424). He then reverts in v.24 to the time of Darius I (522–486), when the temple was completed (cf. Hag 1–2). The author drew on Aramaic documents from v.8 to 6:18, with a further Aramaic section in 7:12–26.

1–2 As most of the exiles were from Judah, their descendants became known as Jews. Benjamin, the small tribe occupying the area immediately north of Judah, was the only tribe beside Judah that remained loyal to Rehoboam when the ten northern tribes rebelled. Saul, the first king of Israel, came from this tribe, as did Saul of Tarsus (Php 3:5).

The people who proffered their help were evidently from the area of Samaria, though they are not explicitly described as such. After the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C., the Assyrian kings kept importing inhabitants from Mesopotamia and Syria "who worshiped the LORD, but ... also served their own gods" (2Ki 17:24–33). The newcomers' influence doubtless diluted further the faith of the northerners, who had already apostasized from the sole worship of the Lord in the tenth century.

Even after the destruction of the temple, worshipers from Shiloh and Shechem in the north came to offer cereals and incense at the site of the ruined temple (Jer 41:5). Moreover, the northerners did not abandon faith in the Lord, as we see from the names given to Sanballat's sons, Delaiah and Shelemaiah (the "iah" refers to "Yah" or "Yahweh"). However, they retained Israel's Lord, not as the sole God, but as one god among many gods; Sanballat's name honors the moon god Sin.

3 The Jews tried tactfully to reject the aid proffered by the northerners by referring to the provisions of the king's decree. Nonetheless their response understandably aroused hostility and determined opposition.

4 "The peoples around them" (lit., "the people of the land") began "to discourage" (lit., "to weaken the hands"; cf. Jer 38:4) of the Jews. "Make them afraid" (GK 987) often describes the fear aroused in a battle situation (Jdg 20:41; 2Sa 4:1; 2Ch 32:18; Da 11:44; Zec 8:10).

5 On the hiring of counselors, compare the hiring of Balaam (Dt 23:4–5) and the hiring of the prophets to intimidate Nehemiah (Ne 13:2). "Down to the reign of Darius king of Persia" passes over the intervening reign of Cambyses (529–522), who conquered Egypt in 525 B.C., and that of the usurper, the Pseudo-Smerdis, who seized power in 522 for seven months.

2. Opposition during the reign of Xerxes (4:6)

6 "Xerxes" (Heb. "Ahasuerus"; cf. NIV note; the king mentioned in Esther) was the son of Darius. When Darius died at the end of 486, Egypt rebelled; and Xerxes had to march west to suppress the revolt. The Persians finally regained control by the end of 483. "Accusation" (lit., "hostility"; GK 8478) occurs only here and in Ge 26:21, where it is the name of a well the herdsmen of Isaac and Gerar quarreled over.

3. Opposition during the reign of Artaxerxes I (4:7–23)

a. The letter to the king (4:7–16)

7 There were three Persian kings named "Artaxerxes": Artaxerxes I (464–424), Artaxerxes II (403–359), and Artaxerxes III (358–337). The king in this passage is Artaxerxes I.

The author of the letter was Tabeel, writing with the approval of Mithredath (on "Mithredath," see comment on 1:8). "Tabeel" means "God is good" (cf Isa 7:6). Near-Eastern kings used an elaborate system of informers and spies. But God's people could take assurance in their conviction that God's intelligence system is not only more efficient than any king's espionage network but is omniscient (cf. 2Ch 16:9; Zec 4:10).

8 "Rehum" ("merciful") was an official with the role of a "chancellor" or a "commissioner." "Shimshai" means "my sun" (cf. Samson). Rehum dictated and Shimshai wrote the letter in Aramaic. It would then have been read in a Persian translation before the king (v.18).

9 "Associates" (GK 10360) were persons supported by the same fief, often children of the same parents. Persian bureaucracy reflected prominently the principle of collegiality; each responsibility was shared among colleagues. "Erech" was a great city (Ge 10:10) of the Sumerians, famed as the home of the legendary Gilgamesh. Excavations at the site have produced the earliest examples of writing. Susa was the major city of Elam in southwest Iran. Because of Susa's part in a major revolt against the last great Assyrian king (669–633 B.C.), Ashurbanipal, the city was brutally destroyed in 640. So thorough was the Assyrian destruction of Susa's ziggurat that only recently have excavators recognized its location.

10–11 Ashurbanipal was famed for his large library at Nineveh. He is not named elsewhere in the Bible but was probably the king who freed Manasseh from exile (2Ch 33:11–13). He may be the unnamed Assyrian king who deported people to Samaria according to 2Ki 17:24. The descendants of such deportees, removed from their homelands nearly two centuries before, still commonly stressed their origins. Probably the murder of the Israelite king Amon (640–642 B.C.) was the result of an anti-Assyrian movement inspired by the revolt in Elam and Babylonia. The Assyrians may then have deported the rebellious Samaritans and replaced them with the rebellious Elamites and Babylonians.

11 "Trans-Euphrates" (lit., "across the river") is a phrase that first appeared in the reign of Esarhaddon. Palestinians defined the "land across the River" as Mesopotamia (Jos 24:2–3, 14–15; 2Sa 10:16). Mesopotamians, on the other hand, saw it as including Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine (1Ki 4:24). When Cyrus conquered Babylon in 539, he appointed Gubaru governor of Babylon and the "land beyond the River." This became the official title of the Fifth Satrapy (5:3; 6:6; Ne 2:7; et al.).

12–13 The Aramaic word for "repairing" (GK 10253) is from either the root "to repair" or the root "to lay." "Taxes" (GK 10402) designates a fixed annual tax paid by the provinces into the imperial treasuries. "Tribute" (GK 10107) was the rent tax in Babylonia. Estimates are that between twenty to thirty-five million dollars worth of taxes were collected annually by the Persian king. The Fifth Satrapy, which included Palestine, had to pay the smallest amount of the western satrapies. The Persians took much of the gold and silver coins and melted them down to be stored as bullion. Very little of the taxes returned to benefit the provinces.

14 "We are under obligation to the palace" is literally "we eat the salt of the palace." Salt was used in the ratification of covenants (Lev 2:13; Nu 18:19; 2Ch 13:5). The English word "salary" is derived from the Latin ration of salt given to soldiers (cf. the expression "a man who is not worth his salt").

15–16 "The archives" is literally "book of the records" (cf. 6:1–2; Est 2:23; 6:1). There were evidently several repositories of such documents at the major capitals.

b. The letter from the king (4:17–23)

17–20 "Greetings" is the Aramaic shelam (GK 10720; cf. Heb. shalom; GK 8934). As the king was probably illiterate, documents would be read to him (cf. Est 6:1); those written in Aramaic were "translated" into Persian (cf. comments on 4:8; Ne 8:8). There was some truth in the accusation mentioned here. Jerusalem had rebelled against the Assyrians and the Babylonians in 701, 597, and 587 B.C. (2Ki 18:7, 13; 24:1; etc.). According to the Hebrew text of 1Ki 9:18, Solomon rebuilt Tadmor, the important oasis in the Syrian desert that controlled much of the Trans-Euphrates area. His international prestige is reflected in that he was given a pharaoh's daughter in marriage (1Ki 3:1; 7:8).

21–23 After provincial authorities had intervened, the Persian king ordered a halt to the Jewish attempt to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (see comment on Ne 1:3). Most scholars date the episode of vv.7–23 before 445 B.C. The forcible destruction of these recently rebuilt walls rather than the destruction by Nebuchadnezzar then becomes the basis of the report made to Nehemiah.

4. Resumption of work under Darius (4:24)

24 The writer, after a long digression detailing opposition to Jewish efforts, returns to his original subject—rebuilding the temple (vv.1–3). According to Persian reckoning the second regnal year of Darius I began on 1 Nisan (Apr 3), 520 B.C., and lasted till Feb 21, 519. In that year the prophet Haggai (Hag 1:1–5) exhorted Zerubbabel to begin rebuilding the temple on the first day of the sixth month (Aug 29). Work began on the temple on the twenty-fourth day of the month—Sept 21 (Hag 1:15). The date is significant. During his first two years, Darius fought numerous battles against nine rebels, as recounted in his famous Behistun Inscription. Only after the stabilization of the Persian Empire could efforts to rebuild the temple be permitted.

E. The Completion of the Temple (5:1–6:22)

1. A new beginning inspired by Haggai and Zechariah (5:1–2)

1 Beginning on Aug 29, 520 B.C. (Hag 1:1) and continuing till Dec 8 (Hag 2:1–9, 20–23), the prophet Haggai delivered a series of messages to stir the people to commence work on the temple. Two months after Haggai's first speech, Zechariah joined him (Zec 1:1). Haggai 1:6 describes the deplorable situation: housing shortages, disappointing harvests, lack of clothing and jobs, and inadequate funds—perhaps as a result of inflation (see on comments Ne 5). Haggai rebuked the people and proclaimed that because the Lord's house had remained "a ruin" (Hag 1:4, 9), the Lord would bring a drought (Hag 1:11) on the land. This implies that very little progress had been made in the sixteen years since the first foundation was laid.

2 "Zerubbabel" is a Babylonian name that means "seed of Babylon"; it refers to the man's birth in exile, probably before 570 B.C. Here and in Ezr 3:2, Ne 12:1, and Hag 1:1, he is described as the son of Shealtiel—son of Jehoiachin, penultimate king of Judah (1Ch 3:17). Though Jehoiachin was replaced by Zedekiah, he was regarded as the last legitimate king of Judah. Zerubbabel was the last of the Davidic line to be entrusted with political authority by the occupying powers. In 1Ch 3:19, however, Zerubbabel is listed as a son of Pedaiah, another son of Jehoiachin and brother of Shealtiel. Pedaiah may have married the widow of his dead brother, Shealtiel, in a levirate marriage (Dt 25:5–6). On Jeshua and Jozadak, see comment on 2:2.

2. The intervention of the governor Tattenai (5:3–5)

3–5 A document that can be dated to June 5, 502 B.C., cites Ta-at-tan-ni as the "governor" who was subordinate to the satrap over Ebirnari. Shethar-Bozenai may have functioned as a Persian official known as the "inquisitor" or "investigator." "Structure" (GK 10082) suggests an advanced stage in the rebuilding of the temple. The Persian governor gave the Jews the benefit of the doubt by not stopping the work while the inquiry was proceeding. On the "elders" see v.9; 6:7–8, 14; Jer 29:1; Eze 8:1; 14:1.

3. The report to Darius (5:6–17)

6–7 That such inquiries were sent directly to the king has been vividly confirmed by the Elamite texts from Persepolis, where in 1933–34 several thousand tablets and fragments were found in the fortification wall. Dating from the thirteenth to the twenty-eighth year of Darius (509–494 B.C.), they deal with the transfer and payment of food products. In 1936–38 additional Elamite texts were discovered, dating from the thirtieth year of Darius to the seventh year of Artaxerxes I (492–458 B.C.).

8 The interpretation of the phrase "large stones" is uncertain. The LXX has "choice" or "splendid" stones (cf. 1Ki 7:9–11). The translation "large" (lit., "rolling"; GK 10146) is suggested because the size of the stones was such that they were likely placed on rollers to move them. "Placing the timbers in the walls" may refer to interior wainscoting (1Ki 6:15–18) or to logs alternating with the brick or stone layers in the walls (1Ki 6:36).

9–12 According to 1Ki 6:1, Solomon began building the temple in the fourth year of his reign, in 966 B.C. The project lasted seven years (1Ki 6:38). In response to the challenge of the Persian authorities, the Jewish elders declared that they were the servants of the God of heaven and earth and recounted the building of the first temple by Solomon, which must have been an object of national pride. They then confessed that because of their fathers' sins, God had been provoked into using the pagan Babylonians in chastising them, just as Jeremiah had warned.

The Chaldeans inhabited the southern regions of Mesopotamia and established the Neo-Babylonian Empire (626–539 B.C.). Their origins are obscure. There may have been some original kinship with the Arameans, though they were consistently distinguished from the Arameans in Assyrian documents (cf. 2Ki 24:2; Jer 35:11). In the late seventh century B.C., the Chaldeans with the Medes, led by Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, overthrew the Assyrians. Of the fall of Jerusalem on March 16, 597, extant Chaldean chronicles laconically report: "He then captured its king [Jehoiachin] and appointed a king of his own choice [Zedekiah]" (cf. 2Ki 24:17).

13 For the title "king of Babylon," see comment on Ne 13:6. In cuneiform contracts in Mesopotamia and in Syria, Darius is also designated "king of Babylon."

14–15 Cyrus appointed Sheshbazzar "governor" (cf. 1:8, 11). Both Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel (Hag 1:1; 2:2) were "governors." Both are said to have laid the foundation of the temple (v.16; 1:3; 3:2–8; Hag 1:1, 14–15; 2:2–4, 18). Probably Sheshbazzar was an elderly man about fifty-five to sixty at the time of the return, whereas Zerubbabel was a younger contemporary about forty. Sheshbazzar may have been viewed as the official Persian "governor" whereas Zerubbabel served as the popular leader (3:8–11). This may be why the Jews mentioned Sheshbazzar here when speaking to the Persian authorities. Whereas the high priest Joshua is associated with Zerubbabel, no priest is associated with Sheshbazzar.

With God all things are possible. Consider the fate of the temple and its vessels. How desperate and hopeless the situation of the Jews must have seemed from the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar to the desecration of the temple vessels by Belshazzar in a feast the night Babylon fell to Cyrus (Da 5)! Prior to that night there was utter destruction, deportation, and desecration; after that night reconsecration, return, and rebuilding. For those who could lift their hearts above the dismal prospects of earth to the God of heaven, a promise of an anointed one by the name of Cyrus had been made (Isa 44:28–45:1) long before the capture of Babylon by the Persians. What mere human prognosticator could have guessed such a turn of events?

16–17 It was important that the temple be built on its original "site" (v.15). Though Sheshbazzar presided over the laying of its foundation in 536, so little actually was accomplished that Zerubbabel evidently had to preside over a second foundation some sixteen years later (cf. 6:3). The fate of Sheshbazzar is uncertain. In view of his advanced age, possibly he died soon after his return to Jerusalem.

4. The search for the decree of Cyrus (6:1–5)

1 "The archives" is literally "house of books." The phrase then reads "in the house of the books where the treasures were laid up." Many Elamite documents were found in the so-called treasury area of Persepolis, along with other artifacts.

2 Persian officials wrote on scrolls of papyrus and leather, as discoveries in Egypt show. "Citadel" is probably from the Akkadian word for "fortress." Media was the homeland of the Medes in northwestern Iran. After the rise of Cyrus in 550 B.C., this Indo-European tribe became subordinate to the Persians. "Ecbatana" was the capital of Media.

The Aramaic "memorandum" of the decree of Cyrus in vv.3–5 is comparable to the Hebrew version of the king's proclamation in 1:2–4. In contrast with the latter, the Aramaic is written in a more sober, administrative style without reference to the Lord.

3–5 "Ninety feet high and ninety feet wide" is literally "60 cubits its height and 60 cubits its width" (see NIV note). The cubit was the distance from the elbow to the finger tip, or slightly less than eighteen inches. No length is given here. These dimensions contrast with those of Solomon's temple, which was 20 cubits wide by 30 cubits high by 60 cubits long (1Ki 6:2). The dimensions here in v.3 are probably not descriptions of the temple as built, but specifications of the outer limits of a building the Persians would support. The second temple was manifestly not as grandiose as the first (3:12; Hag 2:3). On "large stones," see comment on 5:8 (cf. also 1Ki 6:36; 7:12). Such use of timber beams with masonry is attested at Ras Shamra and elsewhere. On the vessels of the temple, see comment on 5:14–15.

5. Darius's order for the rebuilding of the temple (6:6–12)

6–7 "Stay away from there" is literally "be distant from there." When Babylonian kings like Nebuchadnezzar and Nabonidus rebuilt temples, they searched carefully to discover the exact outlines of the former buildings.

8 "Treasury" (lit., "possessions," "properties"; GK 10479) occurs frequently in extrabiblical Aramaic with a wide variety of meanings. Here it seems to mean royal "funds," which could mean that the rebuilding was to be done at government expense, with a hint of government subsidies for the offerings. Ancient documents indicate that the Persians paid for temple repairs out of royal funds.

9 A lamb was offered every morning and evening; two were offered on the Sabbath, seven each at great feasts and at the beginning of each month, and fourteen every day during the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 1:3, 10; Nu 28). The "burnt offering" (GK 10545) was a sacrifice that was wholly consumed on the altar (in contrast to the fellowship offering; cf. Lev 3; 7:11–36). "Wheat" was offered as fine flour, either alone (Lev 5:11–13), mixed as dough (Lev 2:1–3), or as cakes (Lev 2:4). "Salt" was offered with all oblations (Lev 2:13; Mk 9:49). "Wine" was poured out as a libation (Ex 29:40–41; Lev 23:13, 18, 37). "Oil" was used in the meal offerings. Other ancient documents demonstrate that Persian monarchs were interested in foreign cults.

10 "Sacrifices pleasing" is literally "sacrifices of sweet smell" (cf. Ge 8:21; Da 2:46). In pagan religions the sacrifices were viewed literally as nourishment for the gods, but not in the worship of the Lord (Eze 44:7). Darius also commanded that the Jews be allowed to "pray for the well-being of the king and his sons."

11 Decrees and treaties customarily had appended a long list of curses against anyone who might disregard them. Anyone who would change Darius's decree would be "impaled" on a beam from his own house. The OT cites the hanging or fastening of criminals (Ge 40:22; 41:13; Nu 25:4; cf. Est 2:23; 5:14; 9:14; et al.). According to Dt 21:22–23, a criminal was stoned and his corpse hung on a "tree" (cf. 2Sa 21:6, 9).

12 At the end of his famous Behistun Inscription, Darius warned: "If thou shalt behold this inscription or these sculptures, (and) shalt destroy them and shalt not protect them as long as unto thee there is strength, may Ahuramazda be a smiter unto thee, and may family not be unto thee, and what thou shalt do, that for thee may Ahuramazda utterly destroy!"

6. The completion of the temple (6:13–15)

13–14 Work on the temple made little progress because of opposition and the preoccupation of the returnees with their own homes (Hag 1:2–3). Because they had placed their own interests first, God sent them famine as a judgment (Hag 1:5–6, 10–11). Spurred by the preaching of Haggai and Zechariah, and under the leadership of Zerubbabel and Joshua, a new effort was begun (Hag 1:12–15). The reference to "Artaxerxes" seems out of place because this king did not contribute to the rebuilding of the temple. His name may have been inserted here because he contributed to the work of the temple at a later date during the time of Ezra (7:21–26).

15 "Adar," the last Babylonian month, was February-March. The temple was finished on March 12, 515 B.C., a little over seventy years after its destruction. As the renewed work on the temple had begun Sept 21, 520 (Hag 1:4–15), sustained effort had continued for over four years. According to Hag 2:3, the older members who could remember the splendor of Solomon's temple were disappointed when they saw the smaller size of Zerubbabel's temple (cf. 3:12). Nonetheless the second temple, though not as grand as the first, lasted much longer.

The general plan of the second temple resembled the first. But "the Most Holy Place" was left empty as the ark of the covenant had been lost through the Babylonian conquest. The "Holy Place" was furnished with a table for the showbread, the incense altar, and one menorah instead of Solomon's ten.

7. The dedication of the temple (6:16–18)

16 For the dedication of Solomon's temple, see 1Ki 8. This verse and v.19 emphasize that the leadership of the returned exiles was responsible for the completion of the temple. This dedication of the temple was a joyous occasion. The Jewish holiday in December that celebrates the discovery of pure oil, its prolongation, and the rededication of the temple captured by the Jews by the Maccabees is known today as Hanukkah.

17 The number of victims sacrificed was small compared to the thousands in similar services under Solomon (1Ki 8:5, 63), Hezekiah (2Ch 30:24), and Josiah (2Ch 35:7). Nonetheless, they represented a real sacrifice under the prevailing conditions.

18 This ends the Aramaic section that began in 4:8; another Aramaic section begins at 7:12. The priests were divided into twenty-four courses, each of which served at the temple for a week at a time (cf. Lk 1:5, 8).

8. The celebration of the Passover (6:19–22)

19 The date would have been about Apr 21, 515 B.C. Since the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70, Jews have not sacrificed Passover lambs but have substituted eggs and roasted meat. Only the Samaritans continue to slaughter lambs, for their place of worship is on Mount Gerizim (cf. Jn 4:20), though their temple has also been destroyed.

20 "Ceremonially clean" (GK 3196) is used almost exclusively of ritual or moral purity, especially in OT passages relating to the priests. Priests and Levites had to be cleansed in order to fulfill their ritual functions. In 2Ch 29:34, the Levites in the time of Hezekiah are described as more upright in heart in sanctifying themselves than the priests (2Ch 30:17–19).

21 The returning exiles were not uncompromising separatists; they were willing to accept any who would separate themselves from the syncretism of the foreigners introduced into the area by the Assyrians. "The unclean practices" are literally "uncleanness," "filthiness." Idolatry had defiled the land (Eze 36:18; cf. Ge 35:2), and the Israelites were unclean because of it (cf. Eze 22:4; 36:25).

22 The joy experienced here was more than a political celebration or a displaced person's gladness at his return home. This was a deeply religious joy "because the Lord had filled them with joy." "King of Assyria" is a surprising title for Darius, the Persian king. Assyria was originally in the area in northeastern Mesopotamia along the banks of the upper Tigris River, centering around its capital, Nineveh. After the fall of that city in 612 B.C., the term "Assyrian" was used for formerly occupied territories. Persian kings adopted a variety of titles, including "king of Babylon" (cf. 5:13; Ne 13:6). In Ne 9:32 "kings of Assyria" could signify, not only Assyrian, but also Babylonian and Persian kings. The latter meaning may be intended here.

II. Ezra's Return and Reforms (7:1–10:44)

A. Ezra's Return to Palestine (7:1–8:36)

1. Preparations (7:1–10)

1 "After these things" refers to the completion and dedication of the temple in 515 B.C. (cf. ch. 6). The identity of the Artaxerxes mentioned here has been disputed. If this was Artaxerxes I, as the traditional view maintains and which we believe is correct, Ezra arrived in Palestine in about 458. This view assumes a gap of almost sixty years between the events of chs. 6 and 7. The only recorded event during this interval concerns opposition in Xerxes's reign (485–465 B.C.; cf. 4:6).

The genealogy of Ezra given in vv.1–5 is an extraordinary one that lists his ancestors back to Aaron, brother of Moses. "Ezra" is a shortened form of Azariah, a name that occurs twice in the list of his ancestors. "Seraiah" ("The LORD is Prince") was the high priest under Zedekiah who was killed in 587 B.C. by Nebuchadnezzar (2Ki 25:18–21; Jer 52:24), some 129 years before Ezra's arrival. "Azariah" ("The LORD has helped") is the name of about twenty-five OT individuals, including one of Daniel's companions (Da 1:6–7). "Hilkiah" ("My portion is the LORD") was the high priest under Josiah (2Ki 22:4).

2 On "Shallum" see comment on 2:42. "Zadok" ("righteous") was a priest under David whom Solomon appointed chief priest in place of Abiathar, who had supported the rebel Adonijah (1Ki 1:7–8; 2:35). Ezekiel regarded the Zadokites as free from idolatry (Eze 44:15–16). The Zadokites held the office of high priest till 171 B.C. The Sadducees were named after them, and the Qumran community looked for the restoration of the Zadokite priesthood.

3–4 "Amariah" means "The LORD has spoken"; "Zerahiah," "The LORD has shone forth"; "Uzzi," "[The LORD is] strength"; and "Bukki," "vessel [of the LORD]."

5 "Abishua" ("My father is salvation") was the great grandson of Aaron (1Ch 6:4–5); "Phinehas" ("the Nubian"), his grandson. "Eleazar" means "God has helped."

6 "A teacher" (lit., "scribe"; GK 6221) is a person who served as secretary, such as Shaphan under Josiah (2Ki 22:3). Others took dictation, as Baruch, who wrote down what Jeremiah spoke (Jer 36:32). From the exilic period the scribes were scholars who studied and taught the Scriptures. In the NT period they were addressed as "rabbis." "The hand of the LORD his God was on him" is a striking expression of God's favor.

7–9 Most scholars assume that the seventh year of Artaxerxes I should be reckoned according to the Persian custom of dating regnal years from spring to spring (Nisan to Nisan, which was also the Jewish religious calendar). Thus Ezra would have begun his journey on the first day of Nisan (Apr 8, 458) and arrived on the first day of Ab (Aug 4, 458). The journey took 119 days (including an eleven-day delay, cf. 8:31), or four months.

Spring was the most auspicious time for such journeys; most ancient armies went on campaigns at this season. Though the direct distance between Babylon and Jerusalem is about five hundred miles, the travelers would have had to traverse nine hundred miles, going northwest along the Euphrates River and then south. The relatively slow rate is explicable by the presence of children and the elderly. The full phrase "the gracious hand of his God was on him" occurs here, in 8:18, 22, and in Ne 2:8, 18. This phrase denotes God's permanent help and grace that rest on a person or a congregation.

10 Ezra was learned in the law of Moses (v.6), as a "teacher of the Law of the God of heaven" (v.12). He not only studied the Scriptures but taught and interpreted them (Ne 8). Bible study was not merely an intellectual discipline butit was also a personal study for his own life and for the instruction of his congregation.

2. The authorization by Artaxerxes (7:11–26)

11 Many scholars regard the letter of Artaxerxes I permitting Ezra's return in 458 (or 457) as the beginning point of Daniel's first 69 weeks (Da 9:24–27). If each week represented a solar year, then 69 times 7 years equals 483 years, added to 457 B.C. equals A.D. 26, i.e., the traditional date for the beginning of Christ's ministry. Others, however, regard the commission of the same king to Nehemiah in 445 B.C. as the starting point (Ne 1:1, 11; 2:1–8). From this date, by computing according to a lunar year of 360 days, the same date of A.D. 26 is reached.

12 The text of the decree in vv.12–26 is in Aramaic. The phrase "king of kings" was used by Assyrian kings, as their empires incorporated many kingdoms. It was then adopted by Neo-Babylonian kings like Nebuchadnezzar (Eze 26:7; Da 2:37, 47). The rabbis applied to God the title "King of the king of kings."

13–14 The king used the term "Israelites" rather than "Judeans." Ezra's aim was to make a united Israel of those who returned. "Seven advisers" corresponds with known Persian tradition. Many scholars believe that "the Law" Ezra brought with him was the complete Pentateuch in its present form.

15–17 Critics ask whether the Persian king would be so generous. The Persian treasury had ample funds, and such benevolence was a well-attested policy. The custom of sending gifts to Jerusalem from the Jews in the Diaspora continued down through the Roman Empire till the Jewish-Roman War, when the Romans diverted these contributions to the temple of Jupiter instead.

18–19 See comments on 5:17 and 6:1.

20–21 There are over three-hundred travel texts from Persepolis, which report the daily operations of a highly developed system of travel, transport, and communication. Other Elamite texts from the treasury at Persepolis give examples of the royal disbursement of supplies and funds. Haggai 1:8–11 indicates that work on the temple was delayed because of a lack of contributions from the Jewish community. Perhaps the provincial officials did not cooperate in carrying out the royal commands.

22 A "talent" (lit., "circle"; GK 3970–71) in the Babylonian sexagesimal system was 60 minas, with a mina being 60 shekels. A talent weighed about 75 pounds. A hundred talents was an enormous sum, about 3 3/4 tons of silver. This amount, together with a talent of gold, was the tribute that Pharaoh Neco imposed on Judah (2Ki 23:33). A "cor" was a donkey load, about 6 1/2 bushels. The total amount of wheat, 650 bushels, was relatively small. The grain would be used in meal offerings. A "bath" was a liquid measure of about 6 gallons; therefore, the amount of oil was 600 gallons. "Salt without limit" is literally "salt without prescribing [how much]" (see comments on 4:14; 6:9).

23 The Persian king expressed urgency in his command. "Wrath against the realm of the king" hints at Egypt's revolt against the Persians in 460 B.C. and Egypt's temporary expulsion of the Persians in 459 with the aid of the Athenians. In 458 (457) when Ezra returned to Palestine, the Persians were involved in suppressing the revolt. We do not know how many "sons" the king had at this time, but he ultimately had eighteen.

24 In the ancient world, priests and other temple personnel were often given exemptions from enforced labor or taxes.

25 Royal judges under the Persians had life tenure but were subject to capital punishment for misconduct in office. Ezra was told to administer justice according to Jewish (OT) laws.

26 The extensive powers given to Ezra—"must surely be punished by death"—are striking. Possibly the implementation of these provisions involved Ezra in much traveling, which would explain the Bible's silence about his activities between 458 and 445. Other documents show that it was Persian policy to encourage both moral and religious authority that would enhance public order.

3. Ezra's doxology (7:27–28)

27–28 Here is the first occurrence of the first person for Ezra, a trait that characterizes the "Ezra Memoirs" that continue to the end of ch. 9. "Praise" (lit., "blessed"; GK 1384) opens the prayers that Jews recite today: "Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God." Ezra recognized fully that the ultimate source of the favor granted by the king was the sovereign grace of God (cf. 6:22). "To bring honor" can mean "to glorify." Human beings can beautify, but only God can endow with true glory. Later passages show that Ezra was primarily a priest and scholar rather than an administrator. Yet the assurance that God had called him and had opened the doors gave Ezra the courage and strength to undertake this great task.

4. Returnees with Ezra (8:1–14)

1 Verses 1–14 list those who accompanied Ezra from Mesopotamia, including the descendants of 15 individuals. The figures of the men listed total 1,496, in addition to the individuals named. There were also a considerable number of women and children (v.21). An additional group of about 40 Levites (vv.18–19) and of 220 "temple servants" (v.20) are also listed.

2 On "Phinehas" see 7:5. "Gershom" ("sojourner") was also the name of the elder son of Moses and Zipporah (Ex 2:22). "Ithamar" ("isle of palms") was also the name of the fourth son of Aaron (Ex 6:23).

3 "Shecaniah" means "The LORD has taken up his abode." "Zechariah" ("The LORD has remembered") was the name of about thirty individuals in the Bible, including the prophet and the father of John the Baptist (Lk 1:5–67).

4–6 "Jahaziel" means "May God see!" "Ebed" (lit., "slave") is probably a shortened form of "Obadiah" ("slave of the LORD"). "Jonathan" ("The LORD has given") is the name of sixteen individuals in the OT.

7–9 On "Elam" see 2:7. "Jeshaiah" means "The LORD has saved." "Athaliah" ("The LORD is exalted") was also the name of a famous queen, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel (2Ki 11). On "Shephatiah" see 2:4. "Zebadiah" means "The LORD has given." "Michael" ("Who is like God?") is the name of ten OT individuals, including the archangel. "Joab" means "The LORD is father." "Jehiel" means "May God live!"

10–12 "Josiphiah" ("May the LORD add!") appears only here, but it is a name closely related to Joseph. On "Zechariah" see v.3. On "Azgad" see 2:12.

13–14 "The last ones" probably implies that these followed earlier members of the family who came with Zerubbabel. "Eliphelet" means "my God is escape." "Jeuel" is "The LORD has stored up." "Shemaiah" ("The LORD has heard") is the name of twenty-eight individuals in the Bible. On "Bigvai" see 2:2.

5. The search for Levites (8:15–20)

15 "The canal that flows toward Ahava" probably flowed into either the Euphrates or the Tigris. "Three days" would be from the ninth to the twelfth of Nisan, as the actual journey began on the twelfth (cf. v.31). The "Levites," who had been entrusted with many menial tasks, may have found a more comfortable way of life in exile.

16 "Eliezer" means "my God is help." "Ariel" ("Lion of God") appears only here as a personal name (cf. 2Sa 23:20; 1Ch 11:22); elsewhere it is a cryptic name for Jerusalem (Isa 29:1, 2, 7). "Meshullam" ("rewarded") is the name of nineteen OT individuals. He may be the same person who opposed the marriage reforms (10:15). "Men of learning" is literally "those who cause to understand" (cf. 1Ch 25:8; 2Ch 35:3; Ne 8:7–9).

17–18 "Iddo" means "strength." "Sherebiah" possibly means "The LORD has sent scorching heat." "A capable man" is literally "a man of insight." "Mahli" means "shrewd."

19 "Hashabiah" ("The LORD has taken account") is the name of eleven OT individuals, primarily Levites. "Merari" means "bitterness." Only about forty Levites from two families were willing to join Ezra's caravan. The service of God requires dedication and sometimes moving from a comfortable situation.

20 On "temple servants" see comment on 2:43. Humanly speaking, the dedication of this group is remarkable. Socially they were a caste of mixed origins and were inferior to the Levites in status. But God's Spirit had motivated them to respond in larger numbers than the Levites.

6. Prayer and fasting (8:21–23)

21 For the association of fasting and humbling oneself, see Ps 35:13. Ezra prayed for a journey unimpeded by obstacles and dangers (cf v.31). "Children" designates those younger than twenty, with a stress on the younger ages. Such "little ones" are most vulnerable in times of war (cf. Dt 20:14; Jdg 21:10; Eze 9:6). The vast treasures they were carrying—"our possessions"—offered a tempting bait for robbers.

22 Scripture speaks often of unholy shame (Jer 48:13; Mic 3:7) and sometimes of a sense of holy shame. Ezra was quick to blush with such a sense of holy shame (cf. 9:6). He had gone out on a limb by proclaiming his faith in God's ability to protect the caravan. Having done so, he was embarrassed to ask for human protection. Grave dangers faced travelers between Mesopotamia and Palestine. Some thirteen years later Nehemiah was accompanied by an armed escort (see comment on Ne 2:9). For the phrase "everyone who looks to him," see 1Ch 16:10–11; 2Ch 11:16; Pss 40:16; 69:6; 70:4; 105:3–4.

23 Fasting implies an earnestness that makes one oblivious to food. For the association of fasting and prayer, see Ne 1:4; Da 9:3; Mt 17:21 (NIV note); Ac 14:23.

7. The assignment of the precious objects (8:24–30)

24 This rendering implies that Sherebiah, Hashabiah, and ten others were the twelve leading priests. But according to vv.18–19, they were the leaders of the Levites at Casiphia. The verse can be rendered "I set apart twelve of the leading priests besides Sherebiah, Hashabiah, and ten of their brothers" (emphasis mine). According to v.30, both priests and Levites were entrusted with the sacred objects.

25 "Offering" literally means "what is lifted" (i.e., "dedicated" or "given for the cult"; cf. Ex 25:2; 35:5; Lev 7:14; Dt 12:6). The offerings came not only from the Jews but also from the king.

26–28 For comparison "650 talents" equals 49,000 pounds or close to 25 tons of silver (cf. 7:22). "100 talents" equals 7,500 pounds. These are enormous sums, worth millions of dollars. On "darics," see comment on 2:69 (cf. Ne 7:70–72). "Polished bronze" may have been orichalc, a bright yellow alloy of copper highly prized in ancient times.

29–30 Both people and objects were sacred and "consecrated" (GK 7731) to God. Ezra carefully weighed out the treasures and entrusted them to others. He instilled a sense of the holiness of the mission and the gravity of each individual's responsibility. Each was responsible to guard his deposit, his "talent." The data were carefully recorded and rechecked at the journey's end (v.34).

8. The journey and arrival in Jerusalem (8:31–36)

31–32 "We set out" means literally "to pull up stakes" (i.e., of tents). After an initial three-day encampment (v.15), another eight days elapsed while Levites for the caravan were gathered. The actual departure was on the twelfth day. The journey was to take four months (see comment on 7:9). Nehemiah also "rested three days" after his arrival in Palestine (Ne 2:11).

33 "Meremoth son of Uriah" later repaired two sections of the wall (Ne 3:4, 21) and signed the covenant established through Nehemiah (Ne 10:5). "Eleazar" is "God has helped." "Jozabad" means "The LORD has given." "Noadiah" means "The LORD has kept his appointment."

34 According to Babylonian tradition, almost every transaction, including sales and marriages, had to be recorded in writing. Ezra may have had to send back a signed certification of the delivery of the treasures.

35–36 The animal sacrifices were made as a thanksgiving to God for his mercies and as a sin offering to acknowledge their unworthiness for such mercies. Compared with the offerings of the returnees under Zerubbabel, when many more exiles were involved (6:17), the offerings on this occasion, except for the identical number of male goats, were far less.

B. Ezra's Reforms (9:1–10:44)

1. The offense of mixed marriages (9:1–6a)

1–2 Ezra had reached Jerusalem on the first day of the fifth month (7:9). The measures dealing with intermarriage were announced on the seventeenth day of the ninth month (cf. 10:8 with 10:9), or four and a half months after his arrival. Those who brought this problem to Ezra's attention were probably the ordinary members of the community rather than the leaders, who were themselves guilty. When those in positions of responsibility fall, they lead others astray. Humanly speaking there may have been reasons for such intermarriages, such as a disparity between the number of returning men and available Jewish women.

"The neighboring peoples" (lit., "peoples of the lands") included the pagan newcomers who had been brought into Samaria by the Assyrians and had infiltrated south, and Edomites and others who had encroached on former Judean territories. The eight groups listed designate the original inhabitants of Canaan before the Hebrew conquest (Ex 3:8, 17; 13:5; 23:23, 28; Dt 7:1; 20:17; Jos 3:10; 9:1; 12:8; Jdg 3:5; 1Ki 9:20). Only the Ammonites, Moabites, and Egyptians were still extant in the postexilic period (cf. 2Ch 8:7; Ne 9:8). "Perizzites" is perhaps a designation for villagers. The "Jebusites" occupied the city of Jerusalem (Jos 15:8; 18:16, 28), which was known as the city of Jebus (Jdg 19:10; 1Ch 11:4–5) before its capture by David.

"Ammonites," the descendants of Lot by an incestuous union with his younger daughter (Ge 19:38), occupied the area around Rabbath Ammon, modern Amman in Transjordan. "Moabites," the descendants of Lot by his elder daughter (Ge 19:37), occupied the area east of the Dead Sea. Ruth was a Moabite woman (Ru 1:4). According to the Pentateuch intermarriage with Egyptians was legitimate.

On "mingled the holy race [lit., holy seed]," compare Ps 106:35. The "officials" probably served the Persian government as tax collectors. These leaders were indeed leading the people, but in the wrong direction (cf. 10:18; Ne 6:18). Marrying those who did not belong to the Lord was infidelity for the people of Israel, who were considered to be the bride of the Lord.

3 Ezra continues to write in the first person: "When I heard this, I tore my tunic and cloak." Rending one's garments commonly expressed distress or grief (cf. Ge 37:29, 34; Est 4:1; Job 1:20; Isa 36:22; Jer 41:5; Mt 26:65). Ezra's act of pulling out his own hair is unique in the Bible; elsewhere the head is shaved (Job 1:20; Eze 7:18; Am 8:10). Nehemiah's personality was significantly different from Ezra's: when confronted with the same problem of intermarriage, instead of pulling out his own hair, he pulled out the hair of the offenders (Ne 13:25)! Ezra's influence was not due to his official position but to the moral outrage he demonstrated.

4 Those with a proper perception of God's holiness will tremble at his word (see Heb 12:18–29, esp. v.21). The "evening sacrifice" took place about three P.M. (cf. Ex 12:6; Ac 3:1). The informants had probably visited Ezra in the morning, so that he must have sat in this position for many hours. The time of the evening sacrifice was also the appointed time for prayer and confession.

5–6a "Self-abasement" (GK 9504) means "mortification," "humiliation." "With my hands spread out" means with palms upwards (cf. Ex 9:29; 1Ki 8:22; Isa 1:15).

2. Ezra's confession and prayer (9:6b–15)

6b On "I am ashamed," see comment on 8:22. "Disgraced" (GK 4007) means "to be humiliated or confounded," connoting the pain that accompanies shame. Ezra felt both an inner shame before God and an outward humiliation before others for the sins of his people.

7 "From the days of our forefathers"—the Hebrews were conscious of their corporate solidarity, unlike the individualistic emphasis of modern Christianity. Ezekiel 21:16 vividly describes "the sword" (cf. Ne 4:13b) of the Lord at work as an instrument of his judgment; though the king of Babylon wielded the sword, it was actually the Lord himself who exercised divine judgment. After the conquest of Judah by the Babylonians in 605 B.C., the Jews—except for about a century from the Maccabean Revolt in 165 B.C. till Pompey's intervention in 63 B.C.—did not enjoy autonomy until the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948.

8 "Has been gracious" signifies the Lord's grace or mercy for the "remnant" of his people. "A firm place" is literally a "nail" or a "peg," as a nail driven into a wall (cf. Isa 22:23) or a tent peg into the ground (Isa 33:20; 54:2). An increase in light suggests vitality and joy (1Sa 14:27, 29; Pr 15:30; 29:13).

9 The Persian kings were favorably disposed to the Jews: Cyrus (539–530 B.C.) gave them permission to return (Ezr 1). Darius I (522–486) renewed the decree of Ezra (Ezr 6). His son Xerxes (485–465) granted Jews privileges and protection (Est 8–10). Artaxerxes I (464–424) gave authorizations to Ezra (Ezr 7) and Nehemiah (Ne 1–2).

"New life" (GK 4695) is the same word translated "relief" (v.8). "A wall of protection" is used of a low fence around a sheepfold (Nu 32:16) or of a wall bordering a path (Nu 22:24). The qualifying phrase "in Judah and Jerusalem" indicates a metaphorical reference in the sense of "protection."

10–11 On these two verses compare Lev 18:24–26; Dt 7:1–6; 2Ki 17; 23:8–16; Eze 5:11; Ro 3:19. "Polluted by the corruption" refers to both the corruption of Canaanite idolatry and the immoral practices associated with it (cf 2Ch 29:5; La 1:17, Eze 7:20; 36:17).

12 Verses 10–12 are not drawn from a single quotation but from many passages (Dt 11:8–9; Pr 10:27; Isa 1:19; Eze 37:25). In the NT era the problems of interfaith marriage were recognized by Christians as they had been by Jews. Marriages with unbelievers were condemned (2Co 6:14); widows were explicitly advised to marry within the faith (1Co 7:39).

13–14 "Angry" (GK 647) is related to the word that means both "nose" and "anger" (cf. Eze 38:18). When God's anger came on the Israelites, it was because they had failed to perform their covenant responsibilities (cf. Dt 7:4; 11:17; 29:25–28; Jos 23:16).

15 A proper sense of God's holiness sheds light on our unworthiness (cf. Isa 6:1–5; Lk 5:8). For comparable passages of national lament, see Pss 44, 60, 74, 79, 80, 83, et al.

3. The people's response (10:1–4)

Verse 9 indicates that the people assembled on the twentieth day of the ninth month (Kislev) of the first year (i.e., Dec 19, 458), in the cold, rainy season. The examining committee began its work ten days later (v.16). The committee completed its work in three months (v.17), on March 27, 457.

1 Hereafter Ezra is spoken of in the third person. "Weeping," not silently but aloud (cf. on 3:12; Ne 1:4; Joel 1:12–17), like laughing, is contagious. The people also "wept bitterly" (lit., "wept with a great weeping"). "Throwing himself down" implies that Ezra kept on throwing himself on the ground. The prophets and other leaders used object lessons, even bizarre actions, to attract people's attention (Isa 7:3; 8:1–4, 18; Jer 19; 27). The women and children are mentioned. Entire families were involved.

2 Ezra, the wise teacher, waited for his audience to draw their own conclusions about what should be done. Shecaniah (different from that of 8:3) led the way. His father is possibly the same Jehiel mentioned in vv.21 and 26, as he also was of the family of Elam (see 2:7). Perhaps Shecaniah was grieved that his father had married a non-Jewish mother. Six members of the clan of Elam were involved in intermarriages (v.26).

3 "Make a covenant" (lit., "to cut a covenant") derives from the practice of cutting a sacrificial animal. Originally it may have involved passing between the pieces with the implied curse that whoever did not keep the covenant should be cut up like the animals (Ge 15:9–18). "All these women and their children" reflects the fact that in ancient societies, as often in ours, mothers were given custody of their children when marriages were dissolved (cf. Ge 21:14). In "the counsel of my lord" is perhaps better rendered in "the counsel of the Lord" (cf. Ps 33:11; Pr 19:21; Isa 19:17; Jer 49:20; 50:45).

4 Shecaniah gave a clarion call to action. Weeping was not enough. Courageous and painful decisions had to be made. The people themselves had to respond.

4. The calling of a public assembly (10:5–15)

5 Ezra first enlisted the aid of the leaders of the priests, Levites, and laity and had them swear an oath. The oath, a solemn declaration made under divine sanction, could be assertive, exculpatory, or promissory. An assertive oath called God to witness the truth of a statement (1Ki 18:10; Ro 1:9; Php 1:8). An exculpatory oath sought to clear a person from an accusation. A promissory oath, like the one here, related to future undertakings. In biblical oaths the implied curse for nonfulfillment is often expressed in the vague statement, "May the LORD deal with me, be it ever so severely, if . . ." (Ru 1:17; 2Sa 3:35; 1Ki 2:23). On rare occasions the full implications of the curse are spelled out (Nu 5:19–31; Job 31; Pss 7:4–5; 137:5–6).

6 Complete fasting (i.e., abstaining from food and drink; cf. Ne 1:4) was twice observed by Moses (cf. Ex 34:28; Dt 9:18; cf. also Jnh 3:7). Ordinary fasts involved abstaining from eating only (1Sa 1:7; 2Sa 3:35). "He continued to mourn" describes the reaction of those who are aware of the threat of deserved judgment (Ex 33:4; Nu 14:39; 1Sa 15:35; 16:1). "The room" typifies certain chambers in the temple area that were used as storerooms (8:29; Ne 13:4–13).

7 While Ezra continued to fast and pray, the chiefs and elders ordered all the exiles to assemble in Jerusalem. Though Ezra had been vested with great authority (7:25–26), he used it sparingly and influenced the people by his example.

8 As the territory of Judah had been much reduced, the most distant inhabitants would not be more than fifty miles from Jerusalem. All could travel to Jerusalem "within three days." "Forfeit" means to ban from profane use and to devote, either to destruction (e.g., Ex 22:20; Dt 13:13–17) or for use in the temple, as here (cf. Lev 27:28–29; Jos 6:18–19; 7:1–26).

9 Usually Judah alone is mentioned, but a few passages also refer to the exiles who came from or who settled in the area of Benjamin north of Jerusalem (1:5; 4:1). The plaza or square where they assembled was either in the outer court of the temple or more probably in the open space before the Water Gate (Ne 3:26; 8:1). The trepidation of the people was caused by two separate reasons: their transgressions and the weather.

"The rain" indicates heavy torrential rains. The ninth month, Kislev (Nov.–Dec.), is in the middle of the rainy season, which begins with light showers in October and lasts to mid-April. December and January also cold months in Jerusalem, with temperatures in the fifties and even forties; sometimes it even snows (2Sa 23:20; Ps 147:16–17; Pr 31:21). The assembly sensed a sign of divine displeasure in the abnormally heavy rains (cf. 1Sa 12:17–18; Eze 13:11, 13).

10 Ezra was not only a scribe (7:11–12, 21) but also a priest. The sins and failures of the exiles were great enough; they had added "to Israel's guilt" (cf. 2Ch 28:13) by marrying pagan women.

11 "Confession" (GK 9343) almost always means "thanksgiving," except here and in Jos 7:19. A better translation than "foreign wives" might be "pagan wives," implying not only a different nationality but also adherence to a different religion.

12–13 The Lord so convicted the hearers that what Ezra had said was right that they spontaneously and unitedly responded in an extraordinary manner, "with a loud voice" (cf. 3:12; 2Ch 15:14; Ne 9:4), acknowledging their need to do something about the situation. A spokesman for the people, however, pointed out the practical difficulties in view of the inclement weather. "Sinned" (GK 7321) connotes an act of revolt or rebellion (cf. 1Ki 12:19).

14 The "elders" were the older men of the community who formed a governing council in every village (cf. 1Sa 30:26–31). Those at the gate of a town served as magistrates (Dt 19:12; 21:3, 19; Ru 4:1–12). There were also "judges" (cf. Dt 16:18–20). "The fierce anger" is a phrase used only of God's wrath (cf. 9:14; cf. also Ex 32:12; Nu 25:4; Dt 13:17; Jos 7:26; Ne 13:18; et al.).

15 The truth of the narrative is indicated by the candor with which the opposition to the reform measures is recorded. Why these four men opposed the measure is unclear. Perhaps they were protecting themselves or their relatives, or they viewed the measures of separation as too harsh. On Meshullam, see comment on 8:16. If he is the son of Bani in v.29, he himself had married a pagan wife.

5. Investigation of the offenders (10:16–17)

16–17 The committee began its work ten days after the assembly had met in the rain. They completed their work three months later, on March 27, 457. The investigating elders and judges did their work carefully and thoroughly. They discovered that about a hundred couples were involved.

6. The list of offenders (10:18–43)

18–19 Among those involved were the descendants of Jeshua, the high priest (see comment on 2:2). For the symbolic handshake, see 2Ki 10:15; La 5:6; Eze 17:18. According to Lev 5:14–19, a "ram" was the guilt offering for a sin committed unwittingly. Though the offenders may not have fully realized the gravity of their offense, they had no excuse; the Scriptures plainly set forth God's standards on marriage.

20–24 The list continues of all those who had married pagan women. Only one singer and three gatekeepers were involved. There is no representative of the Nethinim (2:43–54) or of the descendants of Solomon's servants

(2:55–57). The lowest classes were the least involved in intermarriage; the pagan women were probably not attracted to them.

25–43 The names in this part of the list concern those who were not priests or who were not involved in any sort of priestly activity.

7. The dissolution of the mixed marriages (10:44)

44 Some of the marriages had produced children, but this was not accepted as a reason for halting the proceedings. As it was just under eight months from the time of Ezra's arrival to the committee's findings, the offspring mentioned here must be either the offspring of mixed marriages contracted in Mesopotamia or the offspring of mixed marriages contracted by those who had returned earlier to Palestine. The percentage of those who intermarried in that community of 30,00 people was 0.4 percent (ranging from 8.1 percent among the Levites, to 2.2 percent among the gatekeepers, to 0.3 percent among the laity).

EXPOSITION

I. Nehemiah's First Administration (1:1–12:47)

A. Nehemiah's Response to the Situation in Jerusalem (1:1–11)

1. News of the plight of Jerusalem (1:1–4)

The walls of Jerusalem that had been destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, despite abortive attempts to rebuild them (Ezr 4:6–23), remained in ruins for almost a century and a half. Such a lamentable situation obviously made Jerusalem vulnerable to her numerous enemies. Yet from a mixture of apathy and fear the Jews failed to rectify this glaring deficiency. They needed the dynamic catalyst of an inspired leader, a man named Nehemiah.

1 Though the books of Ezra and Nehemiah were bound together from the earliest times, "the words of" indicates the title of a separate composition (cf. Jer 1:1; Am 1:1). The name "Nehemiah" means "the comfort of the LORD" or "The LORD has comforted."[1]"Hacaliah" is contracted from "wait for the LORD" (cf. Zep 3:8). The reference to his paternal sepulchers in Jerusalem (2:3, 5) may mean that Nehemiah came from a prominent family.

"Susa," a major city of Elam in southwestern Iran, was located in a fertile plain 150 miles north of the Persian Gulf. At this time it served as a winter palace for the kings, but the area became intolerably hot during the summer months. Daniel (Da 8:2) saw himself in a vision at Susa. It was the site of the story of Esther. Ezra 4:9–10 refers to the men of Susa who were deported to Samaria.

2 Hanani was a brother of Nehemiah. "Jews" became the name of the people of Israel after the Exile.

3 The lack of a city wall meant that the people were defenseless against their enemies. Most likely Nehemiah's distress was not caused by the condition of walls torn down 140 years before his time but by the episode of Ezr 4:7–23. According to this passage Jews had attempted to rebuild the walls earlier, in the reign of Artaxerxes I. But after the protest of Rehum and Shimshai, the king ordered the Jews to desist.

4 Nehemiah "sat down" (cf. Ezr 9:3), "mourned" (cf. Ezr 10:6; Da 10:2), and "fasted." During the Exile fasting became a common practice, including solemn fasts to commemorate the taking of Jerusalem and the murder of Gedaliah (Est 4:16; Da 9:3; 10:3; Zec 7:3–7). On "the God of heaven," see comment on Ezr 1:2.

2. Nehemiah's prayer (1:5–11)

5 God is the One to be feared (cf. Dt 7:21; Da 9:4). "Who keeps his covenant of love" is literally "who keeps covenant and steadfast love." The latter word (GK 2876) means the quality that honors a covenant through thick and thin (cf. Ezr 3:11).

6 Nehemiah did not exclude himself or members of his family in his confession of sins. A true sense of the awesomeness of God reveals the depths of our own sinfulness (Isa 6:1–5; Lk 5:8).

7 "Commands" (GK 5184) is the usual word for commandment, as in the Ten Commandments (Ex 24:12). "Decrees" (GK 2976) indicates something prescribed, such as the statute of Joshua (Jos 24:25) and the commandment to keep the Passover (Ex 12:24). "Laws" (GK 5477) indicates legal decisions or judgments (Zec 7:9).

8 "Remember" (GK 2349), a key word, recurs frequently in the book (4:14; 5:19; 6:14; 13:14, 22, 29, 31). After the Babylonian conquest, Jews were scattered farther and farther. In the NT period there were more Jews in the Diaspora than in Palestine (Jn 7:35; Ac 2:9–11; Jas 1:1; 1Pe 1:1).

9 "I will gather them" is a frequently made promise (Dt 30:1–5; Isa 11:12; Jer 23:3; et al.). The phrase "a dwelling for my Name" recalls Dt 12:5.

10 Though they had sinned and failed, they were still God's special people, by virtue of their redemption (cf. Dt 4:34; 9:29).

11 "Cupbearer" literally means "one who gives (someone) something to drink." An indefinite article here suggests that there were several. Often they had other responsibilities as well.

B. Nehemiah's Journey to Palestine (2:1–20)

1. The king's response (2:1–8)

1 On a Nisan calendar "the twentieth year" was Apr 13, 445, to Apr 1, 444. On the calculation of Daniel's seventy weeks (Da 9:25) from the decree of Artaxerxes I to Nehemiah, see comment on Ezr 7:11.

Four months passed from Kislev, when Nehemiah first heard the news (1:1), to Nisan, when he felt prepared to broach the subject to the king. Even though Nehemiah was a favorite of the king, he would not have rashly blurted out his request (cf. Ge 40:20; Est 5:6; Mk 6:21–25). He carefully bided his time, constantly praying to God to grant the proper opening. "When wine was brought for him, I took the wine"; i.e., it was now Nehemiah's turn to pour the wine.

2 Regardless of one's personal problems, the king's servants were expected to keep their feelings hidden and to display a cheerful countenance before him. So far Nehemiah had managed to do this; now his burden for Jerusalem betrayed itself, no doubt in his eyes. Artaxerxes seemed to trust Nehemiah to such a degree, however, that no suspicious thought crossed his mind. He was concerned to discover what was distressing his cupbearer. Anxiety must have gripped Nehemiah, not so much for the king's question, but in anticipation of the request that he was to make, knowing full well that the king himself had stopped the Jewish efforts at rebuilding the wall (Ezr 4:17–23).

3 "May the king live forever!" was a common form of address to kings (1Ki 1:31; Da 2:4; 3:9). Notice that Nehemiah did not mention Jerusalem by name, as he wished to arouse the king's sympathy by stressing first the desecration of ancestral tombs.

4 "Then I prayed to the God of heaven" is the most beautiful example of spontaneous prayer in the Scriptures. Before turning to answer the king, Nehemiah uttered a brief prayer to God. Despite his trepidation, he knew that he stood not only in the presence of an earthly monarch, but before the King of the heavens. One of the most striking characteristics of Nehemiah was his recourse to prayer (cf. 4:4, 9; 5:19; 6:9, 14; 13:14).

5 Fortified by his appeal to God and confident in the quality of his past service, Nehemiah was encouraged to make his bold request to the king. He still did not mention Jerusalem by name but referred to it as "the city in Judah."

6–7 Though the word for "queen" (GK 8712) may simply mean a concubine, the definite article indicates that she was the queen or the chief woman of the harem. According to Da 5:2, royal women could be present on a public occasion.

In addition to safe-conduct letters, Nehemiah probably asked for a brief leave of absence, which was later extended. Nehemiah spent twelve years on his first term as governor of Judah (5:14). He then returned to report to the king, and later returned to Judah for a second term (13:6).

8 The chief forester's name, "Asaph," means "The LORD has gathered." The location of the king's forest, where Nehemiah was to obtain timber for the gates, is unclear. Some place it in Lebanon, famed for its forests of cedars (cf. 1Ki 5:6, 9; 2Ch 2:8–9, 16; Ezr 3:7). Others believe it is Solomon's Garden at Etham, about six miles south of Jerusalem, well-known for its fine gardens (cf. 2Ki 25:4; Ecc 2:5–9; Jer 39:4; 52:7); this seems more probable. In the construction of city gates, indigenous oak, poplar, or terebinth (Ge 12:6; Jos 19:33; Jdg 4:11; Hos 4:13) would most likely be used, rather than costly imported cedars from Lebanon.

2. The journey to Palestine (2:9–10)

9 Nehemiah apparently set out immediately. Unlike Ezra (Ezr 8:22), he was accompanied by an armed escort, though not because his faith was weaker than Ezra's. Rather, because of his position as official governor of Judah, it was in accordance with custom that he should have an escort assigned him.

10 The identity of Sanballat as "the Horonite" most likely identifies him as coming from either upper or lower Beth-Horon, two cities twelve miles northwest of Jerusalem (Jos 10:10; 16:3, 5). Sanballat was the chief opponent of Nehemiah (v.19; 4:1, 7; 6:1–2, 5, 12, 14; 13:28). Although not called governor, he had that position over Samaria (cf. 4:2).

"Tobiah" means 'The LORD is good." He may have been a Judaizing Ammonite, but more probably he was a believing Jew, as indicated by his name and that of his son, Jehohanan (6:18). "Official" (GK 6269) is literally "slave" or "servant" (cf. v.19; 13:1–3), a term often used for high officials (cf. 2Ki 22;12; Jer 36:24; Lam 5:8). Tobiah was married to the daughter of Shecaniah (cf. 3:29; 6:18); and his son Jehohanan married the daughter of Meshullam, son of Berekiah, leader of one of the groups repairing the wall (cf. 3:4, 30; 6:18). Tobiah also was closely related to the priest Eliashib (13:4–7). He was no doubt the governor of Ammon or Transjordan under the Persians. The reason Sanballat and Tobiah "were very much disturbed" was not basically religious but political. The authority of the Samaritan governor in particular was threatened by Nehemiah's arrival.

3. Nehemiah's nocturnal inspection of the walls (2:11–16)

11–12 After the long journey three days of rest were necessary (cf. Ezr 8:32). Nehemiah took only a few men into his confidence at first. He acted with great care, going out at night—no doubt by moonlight—to inspect the situation firsthand.

13 Nehemiah did not make a complete circuit of the walls but only of the southern area to see how much was preserved. Jerusalem was always attacked where she was most vulnerable, from the north; thus there was probably little preserved in that direction. According to 2Ch 26:9, Uzziah fortified towers in the west wall, on the Tyropoeon Valley. "Jackal Well" (lit., "spring of the dragons") may have been the major spring of Jerusalem, the Gihon, its name being derived from the serpentine course of the waters of the spring to the Pool of Siloam. "The Dung Gate" (cf 3:13–14; 12:31; 2Ki 23:10), situated near the Valley Gate, led to the rubbish dump in the Hinnom Valley (cf. 3:13).

14 "The Fountain Gate" was possibly in the southeast wall facing toward En-Rogel. According to 2Ki 20:20 (2Ch 32:30), Hezekiah diverted the overflow from his Siloam Tunnel to irrigate the royal gardens (2Ki 25:4).

15–16 Nehemiah retraced his steps and reentered the city at the Valley Gate on the west slope of Ophel. The "nobles" were the notable men who directed public affairs.

4. Nehemiah's exhortation to rebuild the walls (2:17–18)

17 The walls and gates of Jerusalem had lain in ruins since their destruction by Nebuchadnezzar some 140 years before, despite attempts to rebuild them. The leaders and people had evidently become reconciled to this sad state of affairs. It took an outsider to assess the situation and rally the people to renewed efforts.

18 Nehemiah could personally attest that God was alive and active on his behalf. He had come, moreover, with royal sanction and authority. What was required and what Nehemiah provided were a vision and decisive leadership. Nehemiah was clearly a shaker, a mover, and a doer.

5. The opposition of Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem (2:19–20)

19 Various documents indicate that Arabs became dominant in the Transjordanian area from the Assyrian to the Persian periods (cf. Ge 25:13; Isa 60:7; Jer 49:28–33). They enjoyed a favored status under the Persians. "Ridiculed" (GK 1022) means "showed contempt for" (cf. 2Sa 6:16; 2Ki 19:21; Est 3:6).

20 Nehemiah appealed to historical claims to reject the interference of the Samaritan, Ammonite, and Arabian leaders in the affairs of Jerusalem. By his great confidence and dependence on God for success, he inspired the leaders and the people to a task they had considered beyond their abilities.

C. List of the Builders of the Wall (3:1–32)

This chapter is one of the most important in the OT for determining the topography of Jerusalem. Though some locations are clear, others are not. Opinions differ widely about whether the wall enclosed the southwest hill, today called "Mount Zion" (2 1/2 miles, enclosing 220 acres), or only the original settlement—including the temple area—of the southeast hill of Ophel (just under 2 miles, enclosing 90 acres).

The list, which was probably preserved in the temple, proceeds in a counterclockwise direction about the wall. Some forty-one parties are named as participating in the reconstruction of forty-two sections. The towns listed as the homes of the builders seem to have represented the administrative centers of the Judean province. All together, ten gates are listed. Most of the rebuilding was concerned with the gates as the enemy's assaults were concentrated on these structures. Certainly not all the sections of the walls or buildings in Jerusalem were in the same state of disrepair.

1. The northern section (3:1–7)

1 "Eliashib the high priest" was the son of Joiakim (see 12:10; Ezr 10:6). His house is mentioned in vv.20–21. It was fitting that the high priest should set the example. "The Sheep Gate" (cf. v.32; 12:39) was no doubt located in the northeast section of the wall near the Birah fortress; Jn 5:2 locates it near the Bethesda Pool. What "the Tower of the Hundred" (cf. 12:39) refers to is unclear: perhaps its height (one hundred cubits) or one hundred steps or a military unit (cf. Dt 1:15). "The Tower of Hananel" (see Jer 31:38; Zec 14:10) was the most northern part of the city. The towers were associated with "the citadel by the temple" (2:8) in protecting the vulnerable northern approaches to the city.

2 "Zaccur" (short for "Zechariah"), was a Levite who later signed the covenant (10:12).

3 "The Fish Gate" (cf. 12:39) was known in the days of the first temple (Zep 1:10) as one of Jerusalem's main entrances (2Ch 33:14). It may be the same as the Gate of Ephraim, which led out to the main road north from Jerusalem that then descended to the coastal plain through Beth-Horon, likely close to the site of the present-day Damascus Gate. It was called the Fish Gate because merchants brought fish from either Tyre or the Sea of Galilee through it to the fishmarket (13:16).

4 Meremoth repaired a second section (v.21) and later signed the covenant (10:5); likewise Meshullam (v.30; 10:20). Nehemiah complained that he had given his daughter to a son of Tobiah (6:18)—perhaps one of the men who accompanied Ezra (Ezr 8:16).

5 "Tekoa" was a small town five miles south of Bethlehem, famed as the home of the prophet Amos (Am 1:1). Tekoa does not appear in the list of those who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:21–35). The "nobles" (lit., "exalted ones"; GK 129) were aristocrats; they disdained manual labor and "would not put their shoulders to the work."

6 "The Jeshanah Gate" was situated in the northwest corner and is identified with the Corner Gate of 2Ki 14:13 and Jer 31:38. This gate probably led to the area of expansion of the city of Jerusalem (Zep 1:10).

7 "Mizpah" ("Lookout Point") is identified with Tell en-Nasbeh. Along with Gibeon, this town was under the jurisdiction of the governor of Trans-Euphrates.

2. The western section (3:8–13)

8 "One of the goldsmiths" means a member of a goldsmith guild. The industrial district of the goldsmiths and perfumers may have been located outside the walls (cf. vv.31–32). "The Broad Wall" is usually understood as a thick wall. Such a wall was discovered in 1971.

9–10 "Rephaiah" had charge of half the central district, one of the five districts of Judea. It made sense for Harumaph and others to repair the wall nearest their homes.

11 "Hasshub," short for "Hashabiah," was one who sealed the covenant (10:23). "Another section" clearly indicates that our list is only partial, as no first section is mentioned. "The Tower of the Ovens" is mentioned only here and was located on the western wall, perhaps in the same location as the one Uzziah built at the Corner Gate (2Ch 26:9). The ovens may have been those situated in the bakers' street (Jer 37:21).

12 "Hallohesh" is not a proper name but means "whisperer," in the sense of a snake charmer or an enchanter (Ps 58:5; Ecc 10:11). "With the help of his daughters" is a unique reference to women working at the wall.

13 "Five hundred yards" (lit., "a thousand cubits"—about 1,720 feet) is an extraordinary length, but probably most of the section was less damaged. On the "Dung Gate," see comment on 2:13.

3. The southern section (3:14)

14 Recab was also the name of the father of an ascetic clan, the Recabites (Jer 35). "Beth Hakkerem" is mentioned in Jer 6:1 as a fire-signal point.

4. The eastern section (3:15–32)

15 "The Fountain Gate" may also be translated "Spring Gate." This may have faced the En-Rogel spring (see comment on 2:13). "Col-Hozeh" (lit., "everyone a seer") may indicate that the family practiced divination. The "Pool of Siloam" was likely a water channel (cf. Jn 9:7), and "King's Garden" was located outside the walls where the Kidron and Hinnom valleys converge (2Ki 25:4).

16 "Beth Zur" was a district capital, twenty miles south of Jerusalem. On David's burial, see 1Ki 2:10; 2Ch 21:20; 32:33; Ac 2:29. "The House of the Heroes" may have been the house of David's mighty men, which served later as the barracks or the armory.

17–19 "Keilah" was a city southwest of Jerusalem and eight miles northwest of Hebron, situated near the border with the Philistines. It played an important role in David's early history (1Sa 23:1).

20 "Baruch" is literally "blessed." "Zealously" is from the root "to glow," "to burn," usually used of anger but also of zeal.

21 The residences of the high priest and his colleagues were located along the eastern wall of the city, corresponding with the retaining wall of the temple area above the Kidron Valley.

22–24 The name "Hasshub" also occurs in v.11, which means that we have either two men with the same name or the same man with two sections.

25 "The upper place" was probably the old palace of David. Like Solomon's palace, it would have a guardhouse (Jer 32:2). The "Gate of the Guard" (12:39) was probably located nearby.

26 "Ophel" ("swelling" or "bulge," hence a hill) was specifically the northern part of the southeast hill of Jerusalem that formed the original city of David, just south of the temple area (2Ch 27:3; 33:14). "The Water Gate" was a gate, not of the city, but of the palace-temple complex. It was called this because it led to the main source of water, the Gihon Spring. It must have encompassed a large area, for the reading of the Law took place there (8:1, 3, 16; 12:37). Other gates of the palace-temple were the East Gate (v.29), the Inspection Gate (v.31), and the Gate of the Guard (12:39). "The projecting tower" was on the crest of the Ophel Hill.

27 The common people of Tekoa did double duty, whereas the nobles of Tekoa shirked their responsibility (see v.5).

28–30 Athaliah entered "the entrance of the Horse Gate on the palace grounds" (2Ch 23:15) and was slain there. This gate, in the easternmost part of the city, was one through which a person could reach the Kidron Valley (see Jer 31:40). The "East Gate" (see comment on v.26) may have been the predecessor of the present "Golden Gate."

31 Some of the goldsmiths apparently inhabited an area to the east of the walls of the temple area; others, however, worked on sections in the west (see v.8 above). "The Inspection Gate" was in the northern part of the temple (see comment on v.26).

32 This verse brings us to the northeast corner of Jerusalem, the point of departure near the Sheep Gate (v.1). We know from ch. 5 that there were deep economic differences in Judean society. With the exception of the nobles of Tekoa (v.5), everyone pitched in, from the high priest (v.1) to goldsmiths and perfume-makers (vv.8, 31) and even women (v.12), to accomplish a common task. Some, like the commoners of Tekoa, even did more than their share (v.27). What an inspiring example of what can be done when God's people work together under dynamic leadership!

D. Opposition to the Rebuilding of the Walls (4:1–23)

1. The derision of Sanballat and Tobiah (4:1–5)

1 Sanballat (see 2:10) "became angry" (lit., became hot"; GK 3013) and mocked the Jews when he saw what was happening in Jerusalem (cf. his initial reaction in 2:19).

2 Disputes between rival Persian governors were quite frequent. Sanballat rapidly fired five derisive questions to taunt the Jews and discourage them from their efforts. Regarding his last one, fire had damaged the stones, which were probably limestone, and had caused much of the stone to crack and to disintegrate.

3 "Fox" (GK 8785) is also translated "jackal" (cf. Ps 63:10; La 5:18; Eze 13:4). The jackal usually hunts in packs, whereas the fox is normally a nocturnal and solitary animal. The context therefore suggests that a fox is intended: the point of the sneer is that any wall the Jews built would be so flimsy that even the light footsteps of a solitary fox would collapse it.

4–5 Nehemiah did not personally take action against his opponents but called down the vengeance of God. His prayer uses the language of Jeremiah (Jer 12:3; 17:18; 18:21–23).

2. The threat of attack (4:6–15)

6 The people kept diligently working on the city wall, in spite of the mockery of their opponents.

7 On the Arabs, see comment on 2:19; on the Ammonites, see comment on Ezr 9:1. Ashdod was one of the five major Philistine cities (Jos 11:22; 13:3); it was overrun by the Assyrians in the eighth century B.C. (Isa 20:1). The numerous enemies of the Jews became even more angry (see comment on v.1) as they heard of the progress on the repair of Jerusalem's walls.

8–9 The mockery of the enemies now turned to their plotting together to fight against the Jews. Notice the balance between prayer and posting a guard as Nehemiah's answer to this threat.

10 "Is giving out" (lit., "to stumble, totter"; GK 4173) depicts a worker tottering under the weight of his load and ready to fall at any step. The complaint may reflect a song sung by the builders.

11–12 Nehemiah must have had good sources of information to learn of these plots. The vigilance of Nehemiah and his fellow Jews forestalled any attempt at violent attack. "Ten times over" is an idiomatic expression for "again and again" (Ge 31:41).

13 Nehemiah posted men conspicuously in those areas most vulnerable along the wall—"the lowest points." The "sword" is the most frequently mentioned weapon in the OT (see Ezr 9:7).

14–15 The best way to dispel fear—"Don't be afraid of them" (cf. Dt 3:22; 20:3; 31:6)—is to remember the Lord who alone is to be feared.

3. The rebuilding of the walls (4:16–23)

16 "Spears" (GK 8242) designates lances or spears with long shafts used as thrusting weapons (Nu 25:7–8; 1Ki 18:28). "Shields" (GK 4482) were small and round and were made of wood and wickerwork, for they were combustible (Eze 39:9). From 2Ch 18:33 it seems that "armor" (GK 9234) primarily designated breastplates of metal or more probably of mail, which were joined to a lower appendage. In some cases such cuirasses may have been made of leather (cf. 1Sa 17:38; 1Ki 22:34; 2Ch 26:14).

17 Each person bringing material for building carried his load with one hand and a "weapon"with the other.

18–20 The "sword" (GK 2995) was worn in a sheath (1Sa 17:51) hung on a girdle (1Sa 17:39; 18:4; 25:13; Ps 45:3). The trumpet is the shofar (GK 8795) or ram's horn (Jos 6:4, 6, 8, 13), used for signaling as in times of attack (Nu 10:5–10). A single trumpeter accompanied Nehemiah, though other sources imply that trumpeters were placed at varying intervals. For the concept of the "Holy War" in which God fights for his people, see Jos 10:14, 42; Jdg 4:14; 20:35; 2Sa 5:24.

21 Work usually stopped at sunset (Dt 24:15; Mt 20:1–12). To work "till the stars came out" (cf. Job 9:9) indicates the earnestness of the people's efforts.

22 Apparently each builder had a "helper" (lit., "young man, servant"; GK 5853). These people were probably young assigned assistants, not personal servants of the workers. Even those who lived outside Jerusalem stayed in the city at night so that some of them could serve as sentries.

23 The last three words of this verse are literally "each man his weapon the water." The NIV rendering suggests a pattern similar to the way in which Gideon's selected men drank their water with weapons in hand as an indication of their vigilance. Though the precise meaning is not clear, the implication is that constant preparedness was the rule.

E. Social and Economic Problems (5:1–19)

1. The complaints of the poor (5:1–5)

The economic crisis faced by Nehemiah is described in ch. 5, in the middle of his major effort to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem. Since the building of the wall lasted only fifty-two days (6:15), it seems unlikely that Nehemiah would have called a great assembly (v.7) in the midst of such a project. More likely the assembly was called only after the rebuilding of the wall, taking v.14 as retrospective. On the other hand, the economic pressure created by the rebuilding program may have brought to light problems long simmering that had to be solved before work could proceed.

Those affected by the economic crisis were (1) the landless who were short of food (v.2); (2) the landowners who were compelled to mortgage their properties (v.3); (3) those forced to borrow money at exorbitant rates because of oppressive taxation (v.4); and (4) those forced to sell their children into slavery (v.5).

1 The gravity of the situation is underscored in that the wives joined in the protest as the people ran short of funds and supplies to feed their families. Their complaints were not lodged against foreign authorities but against their own fellow countrymen who were exploiting the poor at a time when both were needed to defend the country. The cry of the oppressed people is a cry to God for justice (cf. Ex 3:7; 22:22–23; Ps 9:12; Isa 5:7).

2–3 Economic conditions forced even those with considerable property to mortgage to the aggrandizement of the wealthy few (cf. Isa 5:8). The rich got richer, the poor poorer. The economic situation was aggravated by conditions in nature that had produced a famine. Such hardships were expressions of God's judgment (Isa 51:19; Jer 14:13–18; Am 4:6). In times of dire need the wealthy usually have enough stored up to feed themselves. It is the poor who suffer because of the huge rise in prices caused by scarcities.

4 On taxes see Ezr 4:13, 20; 6:8; 7:24. It is estimated that the Persian king collected the equivalent of twenty million darics a year in taxes. Little of this was returned to the satrapies. Rather, it was the custom to melt down the gold and silver and to pour it into jars that were then broken and the bullion stored. At Susa alone Alexander found nine thousand talents of coined gold (about 270 tons) and forty thousand talents of silver (about 1,200 tons) stored up as bullion. As coined money was increasingly taken out of circulation, inflation became rampant. The acquisition of land by the Persians and its alienation from production helped produce a 50 percent rise in prices.

5 In times of economic distress, families would borrow funds, using members of the family as collateral. If a man could not repay the loan and its interest, his daughters, sons, wife, or even the man himself could be sold into bondage. A Hebrew who fell into debt would serve his creditor as "a hired servant" (Lev 25:39–40). He was to be released in the seventh year (Dt 15:12–18), unless he chose to stay voluntarily. The ironic tragedy of the situation for the exiles was that at least in Mesopotamia their families were together. Now because of dire economic necessities, their children were being sold into slavery.

2. The cancellation of debts (5:6–13)

6 Nehemiah "was very angry." There are times when we must speak out against social injustices (cf. Mt 21:18–19; Mk 11:12–18; Lk 19:45–48; Eph 4:26).

7 After reflecting on the issue, Nehemiah called a meeting with the "nobles and officials." "Usury" means to impose a burden or claim for repayment of debt. The OT passages prohibiting the giving of loans at interest (Ex 22:25–27; Lev 25:35–37; Dt 23:19–20; 24:10–13) were not intended to prohibit commercial loans but rather the charging of interest to the poor so as to make a profit from the helplessness of one's neighbors.

8 Though one could use a poor brother as a bond servant, one was not to be sold as a slave (Lev 25:39–42). The sale of fellow Hebrews as slaves to Gentiles was a particularly callous offense and was always forbidden (Ex 21:8)—though it was sometimes done (see Joel 3:6). The people's guilt was so obvious that "they kept quiet," having no rebuttal or excuse.

9 Failure to treat others, especially fellow believers, with compassion is an insult to our Maker and a blot on our testimony (cf. Pr 14:31; 1Pe 2:12–15).

10 The granting of loans is not condemned, nor is the making of profit. But the OT condemns the greed and avarice that seeks a profit at the expense of people (Ps 119:36; Isa 56:9–12; 57:17; Jer 6:13; 8:10; 22:13–19; Eze 22:12–14; 33:31). In view of the gravity of the situation, Nehemiah urged the creditors to relinquish their rights to repayment with interest.

11 The interest being charged was "the hundredth part," i.e., one percent per month.

12–13 "Amen" (GK 589) means "to believe or trust." It is used in passages that praise God (e.g., 1Ch 16:36; Ne 8:6; cf. 1Co 14:16), in doxologies (e.g., Pss 41, 72, 89, 106), and as an assent to an oath and its curse formula (Nu 5:22; Dt 27:15–26).

3. Nehemiah's unselfish example (5:14–19)

14 Nehemiah served his first term as governor for twelve years before being recalled to the king's court (13:6), after which he returned for a second term of indeterminate length. Provincial governors normally assessed the people in their provinces for their support, e.g., "food allotted to the governor." But Nehemiah bent over backwards and sacrificed even what was normally his due to serve as an example to the people (cf. 1Co 9; 2Th 3:8).

15 "Governors" is the plural of the word used of Sheshbazzar (Ezr 5:14), Zerubbabel (Hag 1:1, 14; 2:2), and various Persian officials (Ezr 5:3, 6; 6:6–7, 13; et al.), though Nehemiah was certainly not referring here to Ezra and Zerubbabel. Persian practice usually exempted temple personnel (cf. Ezr 7:24), which made the burden on the laity much heavier. If the governors themselves were extortionate, their "assistants" often proved even more oppressive (cf. Mt 18:21–35; 20:25–28).

16 Nehemiah's behavior as governor was guided by principles of service rather than by opportunism—unusual in the ancient world.

17–18 When Solomon became king, he sacrificed 22,000 oxen and 120,000 sheep and held a great seven-day feast for the assembly (1Ki 4:22–23; 8:62–65). As part of his social responsibility, a governor or ruler was expected to entertain lavishly. The people of Judah were afraid to present a defective sheep to Nehemiah's predecessor, but they were not above offering such an animal to the Lord (Mal 1:8). The meat listed here would perhaps be sufficient to provide one meal for up to 800 persons, including the 150 Jews and officials mentioned in v.17.

19 Some have suggested that Nehemiah's memoirs were inscribed as a memorial set up in the temple (cf. 13:14, 22, 31).

F. The Completion of the Walls Despite Opposition (6:1–19)

1. Attempts to snare Nehemiah (6:1–9)

1–4 "Ono" was located seven miles southeast of Joppa near Lod. It was in the westernmost area settled by the returning Jews (Ezr 2:33; Ne 7:37; 11:35). It may have been proposed as a kind of neutral territory, but Nehemiah recognized the invitation as a trap (cf. Jer 41:1–3). Nehemiah's sharp reply may seem like a haughty rebuff to a reasonable invitation, but he correctly discerned the insincerity of his enemies and their evil designs. His own utter dedication to the great enterprise of the wall made that his top priority. He refused to be distracted with lesser matters that would divert and dissipate his energies. Nehemiah's foes were persistent, but he was equally persistent in steadfastly resisting their blandishments.

5–7 Letters during this period were ordinarily written on a papyrus or leather sheet, rolled up, tied with a string, and sealed with a clay bulla (seal impression). The latter was intended to seal the letter and to guarantee its authenticity. Sanballat obviously intended that the contents should be made known also to the public at large. The Persian kings did not tolerate the claims of pretenders to kingship. Usurpers such as Jeroboam (1Ki 11:29–31) and Jehu (2Ki 9:1–3) hired false prophets. Such mercenary prophets were condemned by Amos (7:10–17).

8–9 Nehemiah did not mince words in his reply. He called the report a lie. He may well have sent his own messenger to the king to assure him of his loyalty. The Hebrew idiom "to cause the hands to drop" means to demoralize (cf. Ezr 4:4). Jeremiah was accused of "weakening the hands of the soldiers" (Jer 38:4; NIV, "discouraging the soldiers").

2. The hiring of false prophets (6:10–14)

10 Since he had access to the temple, Shemaiah was probably a priest, possibly one of those who were particularly friendly with Tobiah. He likely had shut himself up in the temple as a symbolic action to indicate that his own life was in danger and to suggest that both must flee to the temple. Most likely Shemaiah's words were a ruse in which he pretended to be in personal danger and tried to get Nehemiah to take refuge in the temple. Shemaiah could legitimately have proposed that Nehemiah should take refuge in the temple area at the altar of asylum (Ex 21:13; 1Ki 1:50–53; 2:28–34; 8:64; 2Ki 16:14), but not for him to take refuge in "the house of God," the temple building itself.

11–13 Even if his life was genuinely threatened, Nehemiah was not a coward who would run into hiding. Nor would he transgress the law to save his life. As a layman he was, of course, not permitted to enter the sanctuary (Ex 29:33; 33:20; Nu 18:7). That Shemaiah proposed a course of action contrary to God's word revealed him as a false prophet (Mt 24:3–10). Had Nehemiah wavered in the face of the threat, his leadership would have been discredited, and morale among the people would have plummeted.

14 In the OT only three other women are mentioned as being prophetesses: Miriam (Ex 15:20), Deborah (Jdg 4:4), and Huldah (2Ki 22:14; 2Ch 34:22). The prophets and prophetesses may have favored a policy of accommodation and objected to Nehemiah's work as divisive (cf. Isa 9:15; 28:7; Jer 2:26; 27:9–10; et al.).

3. The completion of the walls (6:15–19)

15 Most likely on Oct 27, 445 B.C., the walls of Jerusalem were completed. Remarkably, though neglected for nearly a century and a half, they were rebuilt in less than two months under Nehemiah's leadership. One might have expected a description of the celebration and the dedication of the wall immediately on its completion, but we do not encounter this until 12:27.

16 The rapid completion of the wall despite such overwhelming odds could only have been accomplished with God's aid, and knowledge of this fact thoroughly discomfited Nehemiah's enemies (cf. 1Ch 14:17).

17–18 Tobiah was doubly related to influential families in Judah. He was married to the daughter of Shecaniah, and his son Jehohanan was married to the daughter of Meshullam, who had helped repair the wall of Jerusalem (3:4, 30).

19 Tobiah's friends and relatives acted as a Fifth Column. They attempted both to propagandize on behalf of Tobiah and to act as an intelligence system for him. Tobiah himself kept on trying to frighten Nehemiah.

G. The List of Exiles (7:1–73a)

1. Provisions for the protection of Jerusalem (7:1–3)

1 The gatekeepers normally guarded the temple gates (1Ch 9:17–19; 26:12–19); but because of the danger in the city, they were appointed to stand guard at the city gates, along with the singers and the Levites (see comments on Ezr 2:40–42).

2 Hanani, Nehemiah's brother (cf. 1:2), is a shortened form of the name Hananiah. He was placed in charge of Jerusalem, i.e., over Rephaiah and Shallum who were over sections of the city (3:9, 12). The "Hananiah" mentioned here is likely another individual (cf. NIV note). "The citadel" (see 1:1) was a fortress located at the northwest corner of Jerusalem. Theoretically garrisons were directly controlled by the king, and their commanders were enrolled upon the king's list. In practice, however, governors like Nehemiah could appoint their own men.

3 Normally the gates were opened at dawn, but this was to be delayed until the sun was high in the heavens (Ge 18:1; Ex 16:21; 1Sa 11:9). The OT distinguishes the sun from the stars, not by its great light, but by its heat (Ex 16:21; 1Sa 11:9; Ps 121:6; Isa 49:10). Inhabitants of the Near East are conscious of the sun's heat, especially during the summer (Ps 32:4). The gates were to be shut and bolted before the guards went off duty.

2. Nehemiah's discovery of the list (7:4–5)

4 The enclosed area of the city of Jerusalem was "large and spacious" (lit., "wide of two hands and large," an expression that means extending to the right and left). As the actual circuit of the walls of the city had been contracted from the earlier dimensions of the city, this expression must be relative to the number of people who were to be housed, once the damaged houses were rebuilt.

5 On "registration by families," compare v.64; see Ezr 2:62 and 8:1, 3.

3. The list of exiles (7:6–69)

a. Families (7:6–25)

6–25 The following list of names is essentially the same as that found in Ezr 2:1–70. See also the commentary on that section for the nature of the list and for some of the variations in names and discrepancies in numbers. "Raamiah" (v.7) means "The LORD has thundered" (Ezr 2:2 has "Reelaiah"). "Nahamani" is a variant form for Nehemiah; it does not occur in Ezr 2:2. "Nehum" is probably an error for Rehum, which appears in the Ezra list. For "Gibeon" (v.25), Ezr 2:20 has Gibbar, probably a corruption of Gibeon.

b. Villagers (7:26–38)

26–38 There are variations in the numbers between this section and Ezr 2:21–35.

c. The priests (7:39–42)

39–42 The names and numbers are identical with the parallel passage in Ezr 2:36–69. Perhaps the lists of priests were kept more accurately than those of the laity.

d. Levites (7:43)

43 The small number of Levites who returned is striking. As Ezra was about to leave Mesopotamia, he found not one Levite in the company; so he delayed his departure until he could enlist some Levites (Ezr 8:15–20).

e. Temple staff (7:44–60)

44–60 Again there are variations in numbers and names between this section and Ezr 2:41–58. Ezra 2:50 includes Asnah, which is lacking here in v.52. Ezra 2:55 has Hassophereth and Peruda instead of Perida (v.57).

f. Individuals without evidence of genealogies (7:61–65)

61–65 On the towns in v.61, see Ezr 2:59.

g. Totals (7:66–69)

66–69 See also Ezr 2:64–67. Ezra 2:65 lists 200 men and women singers, rather than 245.

4. Offerings for the work (7:70–72)

70 "Drachmas" were Greek coins weighing about 3/10 of an ounce; "1,000 drachmas" would weigh about 19 pounds. As a drachma was ordinarily a silver coin, the Hebrew word may designate the Persian daric (see comment on Ezr 2:69).

71–72 The weight of "20,000 drachmas" would be about 375 pounds; "2,200 minas," about 2,550 pounds; and "2,000 minas," about 2,500 pounds.

5. Settlement of the exiles (7:73a)

73a Many returning exiles were not from Jerusalem, whose population no doubt suffered the greatest casualties in the Babylonian attacks. These naturally returned to their own hometowns, leaving Jerusalem underpopulated (cf. 11:1–24).

H. Ezra's Preaching and the Outbreak of Revival (7:73b–10:39)

1. The public proclamation of the Scriptures (7:73b–8:12)

Chapters 8–11 seem to interrupt the narrative of Nehemiah's work on the wall. The traditional view sees the reading of the Law by Ezra as the first reference to him in about thirteen years, since his arrival in 458 B.C. Since Ezra was commissioned to teach the Law (Ezr 7:14, 25–26), it seems strange that there was such a long delay in the proclamation of it.

7:73b–8:1 The phrase "all the people assembled as one man" is identical with Ezr 3:1, which also refers to an assembly called in the seventh month of the year. The object of that meeting, however, was to restore the altar of burnt offerings and sacrificial worship. Possibly Ezra had instituted the practice of holding such assemblies on the seventh month, Tishri, the beginning of the civil year.

"In the square before the Water Gate," which gate led to the Gihon Spring, may be the same as the broad place before the house of the Lord (Ezr 10:9). Assemblies were held by the city gates (Jdg 19:15; 2Ch 32:6). "The Book of the Law of Moses" was most likely the Pentateuch. Ezra could certainly have brought back with him the Torah (i.e., the Pentateuch).

2–3 "The first day of the seventh month" was the New Year's Day of the civil calendar (Lev 23:23–25; Nu 29:1–6), celebrated also as the Feast of Trumpets with a solemn assembly and cessation from labor. "Women" did not participate in ordinary meetings but were brought together with children on such solemn occasions (Dt 31:12; Jos 8:35; 2Ki 23:2). The people evidently stood for about five hours attentively listening to the exposition of the Scriptures.

4 The "platform" was capable of holding Ezra and thirteen others. "Shema" is a shortened form of Shemaiah (see Ezr 8:13). "Anaiah" ("The LORD has answered") was one of those who signed the covenant (10:22). "Mishael" ("Who is what God is?") was also the name of one of Daniel's friends (Da 1:6).

5 The "book" was actually a scroll rather than a codex or book, which did not become popular till the early Christian centuries. The rabbis concluded from "the people all stood up" that the congregation should stand at the reading of the Torah.

6 "Praised the LORD" is literally "blessed the LORD." In Jewish synagogues a benediction is pronounced before the reading of each scriptural section. On "the great God," cf. 9:32; Dt 10:17; Jer 32:18; Da 9:4. The Jews customarily "lifted their hands" in worship (cf. Ezr 9:5; Pss 28:2; 134:2; 1Ti 2:8). The repetition "Amen! Amen!" connotes the intensity of feeling behind the affirmation (2Ki 11:14; Lk 23:21). The Amen as a congregational response is known from the time of David (cf. 1Ch 16:36). It was later used in the synagogue and in the church (1Co 14:16).

"Bowed down" (GK 7702) is always followed by the verb "to worship"; it may mean "kneel down." Originally "to worship" (GK 2556) meant to prostrate oneself on the ground. The verb is used relatively rarely of an individual's worship of God (Ge 22:5; 24:26, 48). Such private acts often involved actual prostration "to the earth" as with Abraham's servant (Ge 24:52), Moses (Ex 34:8), Joshua (Jos 5:14), and Job (Job 1:20). There are also three cases of spontaneous communal worship in Exodus (4:31; 12:27; 33:10). In 2Ch 20:18 Jehoshaphat and the people "fell down in worship before the LORD" when they heard his promise of victory.

7–8 On "the Levites," see comment on Ezr 2:40. "Instructed" (GK 1067) literally means "causing to understand." Reading in the ancient world was normally done aloud (cf. Ex 24:7; Dt 17:19; 2Ki 5:7; Ac 8:28). "Making it clear" (GK 7300) has been understood, since the time of the rabbis, as referring to translation from Hebrew into an Aramaic Targum (cf. NIV note). Ezra wanted to make sure everyone understood God's law.

9 The powerful exposition of the Word of God can bring deep conviction of sin. But repentance must not degenerate into a self-centered remorse but must issue into joy in God's forgiving goodness (cf. 2Co 2:5–11).

10–11 "Choice food" means delicious, festive food prepared with much fat. The fat of sacrificial animals was offered to God as the tastiest element of the burnt offering (Lev 1:8, 12), the fellowship offering (Lev 3:8–10), and the guilt offering (Lev 7:3–4). "Send some to those who have nothing prepared" reflects the Jews' tradition of remembering the less fortunate on joyous occasions (2Sa 6:19; Est 9:22). This was one example of the social conscience and concern of the Jews (Ex 23:11; Lev 19:10; 23:22; Dt 14:28–29; 26:12–13; et al.). "The joy of the LORD" (i.e., joy in the Lord as they ate and worked before him) would sustain them.

12 Even today, the day after Sukkoth (Feast of Tabernacles), the Jews celebrate a festival called Simhat Torah ("rejoicing over the Torah"), in which they parade in a circle inside the synagogue seven or more rounds with a different person holding the scrolls of the Torah each time. Children carry flags with inscriptions extolling the Word of God.

2. The Festival of Booths (8:13–18)

13–14 The people in this revival had an insatiable appetite to learn more about the Scriptures. "Booths" (GK 6109) were made out of branches. This feast, celebrated from the fifteenth of Tishri (Sept-Oct) for seven days (Lev 23:39–43), was one of the three great feasts (along with Passover and Pentecost) during which all Jewish men were to assemble in Jerusalem. It was a joyous agricultural festival that celebrated the completion of the harvest (see Ex 23:16; Dt 16:13; Ezr 3:4; the feast of Jn 7 was probably the Feast of Booths).

15 With the exception of palm trees and other leafy trees, the trees mentioned here are not the same as those prescribed in Lev 23:40. The "olive" tree is widespread in Mediterranean countries. According to Dt 8:8 it was growing in Canaan before the Conquest. It takes an olive tree thirty years to mature, so its cultivation requires peaceful conditions. The "wild olive tree" (lit., "tree of oil") is more likely a resinous tree like the fir. "Myrtles" are evergreen bushes with a pleasing odor. "Palms" are date palms; such trees were common around Jericho (Dt 34:3; 2Ch 28:15). "Shade trees" means literally "leafy trees." On present-day celebration of the Feast of Booths, see comment on Ezr 3:4.

16 "Roofs" in Palestine were flat so that one could walk on them (Jos 2:6; 1Sa 9:25–26; et al.). Near-Eastern houses were built around a court. "The Gate of Ephraim" was a gate of the oldest rampart of Jerusalem, four hundred cubits east of the Corner Gate (2Ki 14:13; 2Ch 25:23). It was restored by Nehemiah (12:39).

17 The statement "from the days of Joshua son of Nun" hardly means that no celebration of the Feast of Booths had taken place since then, as such celebrations are mentioned after the dedication of Solomon's temple (1Ki 8:65; 2Ch 7:9) and after the return of the exiles (Ezr 3:4). It must mean that the feast had not been celebrated before with such exceptional joyousness or strictness of observance. The great joy compares to that experienced at the renewal of the Passover under Hezekiah (2Ch 30:26) and at the revival under Josiah (2Ki 23:22; 2Ch 35:18).

18 "Assembly" is "a solemn or festal assembly" (cf. Lev 23:36; Nu 29:35; Dt 16:8; 2Ki 10:20; Joel 1:14).

3. A day of fasting, confession, and prayer (9:1–5a)

Interestingly, the ninth chapter of Ezra, of Nehemiah, and of Daniel are each devoted to confessions of national sin and prayers for God's grace.

1 Many scholars find it strange to have a day of penance following a festival of joy and consider the events of this chapter to have originally followed Ezr 10. There would thus have been a three-week interval between Ezr 10:17 and Ne 9:1. The text, however, refers to events that occurred two days after the end of the Feast of Booths, which took place from 15 to 22 Tishri. Five days after this feast began was Yom Kippur or the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:29), on which everyone searched his or her own heart. Though not held on the tenth day, this day of penance resembles the spirit of the Day of Atonement. The month of Tishri was particularly a month of "fasting" (Zec 7:5). "Sackcloth" was a goat-hair garment that covered the bare loins during times of mourning and penance. The placing of "ashes," often rendered "dust," on one's head as a sign of sorrow is mentioned in Jos 7:6, La 2:10, and Eze 27:30 (cf. also 2Sa 13:19; Job 2:12).

2–3 "Those of Israelite descent" is literally "the seed of Israel" (cf. Ezr 9:2). On "had separated themselves," see comments on Ezr 9:1; 10:8, 11, 16. On "confessed," see comment on 1:6. The congregation spent about three hours in the study of Scriptures and three hours in the worship of the Lord (see 8:6).

4 The "stairs" perhaps led to the platform mentioned in 8:4. On "loud voices" see comment on Ezr 10:12.

5a Five of the eight names are the same as five names in the previous verse. "Stand up and praise [lit., bless] the LORD." Jews begin their prayers with "Blessed" and stand for the benediction.

4. A recital of God's dealings with Israel (9:5b–31)

5b "Your glorious name" is literally "the name of your glory." The Hebrew word for "glory" (GK 3883) comes from a root that means "weighty," and then by extension "honored." The prayer reviews God's grace and power in creation (v.6), in Egypt and at the Red Sea (vv.9–11), in the desert and at Sinai (vv.12–21), at the conquest of Canaan (vv.22–25), through the judges (vv.26–28), through the prophets (vv.29–31), and in the present situation (vv.32–37). Ezra's prayer is a marvelous mosaic of Scriptures.

6 Ezra's prayer begins notably with the affirmation "You are alone the LORD," which, though not in the same words as the famous Shema of Dt 6:4, expresses the central monotheistic conviction of Israel's faith. "Starry host" (lit., "army," "warriors"; GK 7372) may mean stars, but seems more likely to mean angels (cf. 1Ki 22:19; Pss 103:20–21; 148:2). Not only people, but also "the multitudes of heaven" worship before the Lord. These include the "sons of gods" (Ps 29:1–2), which also probably means angels (cf. Ps 89:6). According to Ps 97:7 even "all gods" bow down before him.

7 "Ur of the Chaldeans" is found only here and in Ge 11:28, 31; 15:7. Ur is usually identified with the famous Sumerian city in southern Mesopotamia, occupied in the first millennium B.C. by the Chaldeans. "Abram" ("the father is exalted") was changed to "Abraham" ("the father of a multitude"), according to Ge 17:4–5.

8 "Faithful" (GK 586) is used only a few times of individuals (e.g., Moses in Nu 12:7). Whether the reference alludes to Abraham's faith in believing that God would grant him a son (Ge 15:6) or in being willing to sacrifice Isaac (Ge 22) is unclear. On the different people, see v.24 and Ezr 9:1; the latter lists surrounding populations and so includes also Ammonites, Moabites, and Egyptians. "Girgashites," a Canaanite tribe listed seven times in the OT, is of uncertain identity. On "because you are righteous," see Ezr 9:15; Ps 119:137; La 1:18.

9 The "Red Sea" ("Sea of Reeds") was probably one of the Bitter Lakes that the Suez Canal now passes through.

10 "Miraculous signs" (GK 253) is often coupled with "wonders," especially of events connected with the plagues of Exodus (Ex 7:3; Dt 4:34; 6:22; 7:19). On "you made a name," compare v.5, also 1:9, 11; Isa 63:12, 14.

11 On "you divided the sea ... and they passed through it," see Ex 14:21–29; Ps 78:13; 1Co 10:1–2; Heb 11:29; and on "you hurled their pursuers," see Ex 15:4; Isa 43:16–17.

12–13 On "with a pillar of cloud you led them," see v.19 (cf. Ex 13:21–22; Nu 14:14; Dt 1:33; et al.). On regulations and laws, see comment on 1:7.

14–16 On "your holy Sabbath," compare Ex 20:8–11; 31:13–17; Dt 5:15; Eze 20:12. "Bread from heaven" (Ex 16:4, 10–35; Pss 78:24; 105:40; Jn 6:32, 51, 58), "water from the rock" (Ex 17:6; Nu 20:8; Ps 105:41), and "take possession" (see v.23; Dt 11:31; Jos 1:11) recall significant events from Israel's past. "Became arrogant and stiff-necked" is a figure borrowed from the driving of stubborn oxen who resist guidance.

17–18 The forefathers "refused to listen" (cf. 1Sa 8:19; Jer 11:10) and "failed to remember the miracles" (cf. Mk 6:52). Numbers 14:4 reports the proposal of "appointed a leader." God is "gracious" (cf. v.31) and "forgiving" (cf. Ps 130:4; Da 9:9). The "image of a calf" recalls Ex 32:4–8 and Dt 9:16.

19–21 "Compassion" (GK 8171) renders a word that is cognate with "womb," which connotes a deep and tender feeling toward those who are dear to us or need our help. The "good Spirit" and the "manna" recall Nu 11. On "their thirst" see v.15. In the desert wanderings the people "lacked nothing" (cf. Dt 2:7; 8:4), and their "clothes did not wear out" (cf. Dt 29:5). The absence of natural deterioration evidenced God's special guidance.

22 "The remotest frontiers" probably refers to Transjordan. Sihon refused the Israelites passage through his land, which was in Transjordan between the Jabbok and the Arnon (Nu 21:21–33; Dt 2–3; Jdg 11:19–21). "Og" was the Amorite king of Bashan with sixty cities (Dt 3:3–5; Jos 13:12). His defeat was one of the great victories of the Israelites (Jos 9:10). "Bashan" was the fertile area north of Gilead in Transjordan.

23–24 On God's promise to Abraham, see Ge 22:17; 26:4; et al. "Their sons went in and took possession" recalls Ge 22:17; 26:4; Ex 32:13; Dt 1:8; 10:22; et al. On "you subdued before them the Canaanites," see v.8; Dt 9:3; Jdg 1:4. On "along with their kings," see Dt 7:24; Jos 11:12, 17.

25 The list of land, cities, houses, etc., corresponds to the lists in the Sinai covenant and its renewal (Dt 6:10–11; Jos 24:13). "Fortified cities" designates such sites as Jericho, Lachish, and Hazor. The lack of rainfall during much of the year made it necessary for almost every house to have its own well or cistern to store water from the rainy seasons (2Ki 18:31; Pr 5:15). By 1200 B.C. the technique of waterproofing cisterns was developed, permitting the greater occupation of the central Judean hills. The chief cultivated trees of Palestine were the olive, fig, apple, almond, walnut, mulberry, sycamore, and pomegranate (cf. Dt 8:8; 2Ki 18:32). Date palms grew in the Jordan Valley (see comment on 8:15). When they entered Canaan, God warned his people not to cut down any fruit trees (Dt 20:20). As to their physical needs, the Israelites had enough, and they enjoyed life.

26–27 Putting the law "behind their backs," the forefathers "killed [the] prophets" (see 1Ki 18:4; 19:10, 14; 2Ch 24:20–22; Jer 26:20–23), thus committing "awful blasphemies." When God "handed them over . . . they cried out to" him (cf. Jdg 4:3; Ps 107:6, 28); and "from heaven [he] heard" (see 2Ch 6:21, 23, 25, 30, 33). He gave them "deliverers," i.e., judges like Gideon and Samson, who were great military leaders.

28 The history of the "judges" is a cyclical story of deliverance, apostasy, and then deliverance again (Jdg 3:7, 12; 4:1; 6:1; 8:33–34; et al.).

29–31 The ordinances of God are such that "a man will live if he obeys them." The people "stubbornly . . . turned their backs" (lit., "they presented a stubborn shoulder"). By his "Spirit" (cf. Zec 7:12) and through his "prophets," God appealed to the people; but they "paid no attention." So he "handed them over." Yet God "did not put an end" to the erring people (see Jer 4:27, 30:11, 46:28). Nehemiah's long recital of Israelite history significantly excludes any reference to the reigns of Saul, David, and Solomon.

5. Confession of sins (9:32–37)

32 "Now" marks the transition from a survey of the past to a supplication for the present situation. God is "mighty," and he "keeps his covenant" (see 1:5; Dt 7:9; 1Ki 8:23; 2Ch 6:14). The nation had suffered "hardship" (cf. Ex 18:8; Nu 20:14; La 3:5).

The first of the "kings of Assyria" to affect Israel was Shalmaneser III (858–824 B.C.; not mentioned by name in the OT). He reported that he defeated Ahab at the important battle of Qarqar in 853. The great Tiglath-pileser III, also known as Pul, expanded the Assyrian empire to the Mediterranean. He attacked Phoenicia in 736, Philistia in 734, and Damascus in 732. Early in his reign (752–742) Menahem of Israel paid tribute to him (2Ki 15:19–20). During his campaigns against Damascus, Pul also ravaged Gilead and Galilee and destroyed

Hazor and Megiddo (2Ki 15:29). King Shalmaneser V (727–722) laid siege to the city of Samaria—a task completed by Sargon II (721–705). Sargon's commander carried on operations against Ashdod (Isa 20:1). Sennacherib (704–681) failed to take Jerusalem in 701 (2Ki 18:13–17) but captured Lachish. Esarhaddon (681–669) conquered Egypt and extracted tribute from Manasseh of Judah (2Ki 19:37; Isa 37:38; Ezr 4:2). Ashurbanipal (669–633) was probably the king who freed Manasseh from exile and restored him as a puppet king (2Ch 33:13; Ezr 4:9).

33–34 In everything that happened God had "been just," but the people still "did not pay attention."

35–37 "Goodness" (GK 3206) is an attribute of God's covenant faithfulness, in a "spacious" (see 7:4; cf. Ex 3:8; Jdg 18:10; 1Ch 4:40) and "fertile" (see v.25) land. Yet the people did not turn from their "evil ways." They became "slaves" (see Ezr 9:9; Ne 5:5) in the fruitful land God had given their forefathers (see 10:35, 37). Persian rulers drafted their subjects into military service.

6. A binding agreement (9:38)

38 "Making" is literally "cutting"; see comment on Ezr 10:3. The word here rendered "a binding agreement" (GK 591) in 11:23 is "a royal prescription"; it is related to "Amen," and its root has the connotation of constancy. The usual word for "covenant" (berith; GK 1382) appears in 1:5; 9:8, 32; 13:29; and Ezr 10:3.

a. A list of those who sealed it (10:1–29)

1–8 This is a legal list, bearing the official seal and containing a roster of eighty-four names arranged according to the following categories: leaders, priests, Levites, and laymen. Verses 2–8 contain twenty-one names, most of which reoccur in 12:1–7. In Ezr 2:36–39 four priestly families are listed; in the later list of 1Ch 24:7–18, we have the arrangement of twenty-four courses that served as the basis of the rotation for priestly service (Lk 1:8).

9–13 Of the Levites seventeen are mentioned by name. "Associates" is literally "brothers."

14–27 Of the leaders of the people listed here, twenty are also found in the lists of Ezr 2 and Ne 7. "Anathoth," a name derived from the Canaanite goddess Anath, is also the name of the city of Jeremiah (Jer 1:1); as a personal name, it occurs only here and in 1Ch 7:8. "Hezir" means "swine" (cf. 1Ch 24:15; on animal names as nicknames, see comment on Ezr 2:3).

28–29 On Levites, gatekeepers, singers, and temple servants, see comments on Ezr 2:40–43. On wives and children, see comment on Ne 8:2–3. Verse 29 recalls Dt 27–29 (see comments on 5:13; Ezr 10:5). "A curse" (GK 460) means an adjuration with an imprecation of grievous punishments in case of a failure to keep the oath.

b. Provisions of the agreement (10:30–39)

30 The first provision was not to contract any mixed marriages (see Ezr 9–10).

31a The provisions of vv.31–34 may have been a code drawn up by Nehemiah to correct the abuses listed in ch. 13 (e.g., vv.15–22). Though the Sabbath passages in the Torah (Ex 20:8–11; Dt 5:12–15) do not explicitly prohibit trading on the Sabbath, this is clearly understood in Jer 17:19–27 and Am 8:5.

31b According to the Mosaic legislation (Ex 23:10–11; Lev 25:2–7), in the seventh year the land was to lie fallow; and the collection of debts was not to take place (Dt 15:1–3).

32 The rest of the provisions of the contract dealt with offerings for the temple and its staff. According to Ex 30:13–14, a "half shekel is an offering to the LORD" from each man twenty years old and older as a symbolical ransom. Later Joash used the annual contributions to repair the temple (2Ch 24:4–14). In the NT period Jewish men everywhere sent an offering of a half-shekel (actually its equivalent) for the temple in Jerusalem (Mt 17:24). One explanation why the offering should be "a third of a shekel" rather than a half shekel is that the later shekel was based on a heavier standard; thus one-third of the later shekel was equal to one-half of the earlier shekel.

33 "The bread set out on the table" was the twelve cakes of fine flour arranged in two rows of six set out each Sabbath (Lev 24:6–7). On "regular grain offerings" see Ex 29:38–41; Nu 28:3–8. On "burnt offerings" compare Ezr 8:35. "The Sabbaths, New Moon festivals and appointed feasts" recall Nu 28:9–16. "To make atonement" (GK 4105) means "to cover" or "to wipe away" one's sin; hence to expiate. It describes the effect of the sin and trespass offerings (Lev 4:20; Nu 5:8).

34 "Lots" were used among God's people to determine the will of the Lord (1) to apportion the land among the tribes (Nu 26:55; Jos 14:2; 18:10); (2) to detect a guilty person (Jos 7:14; 1Sa 14:42; Jnh 1:7); (3) to choose the first king, Saul (1Sa 10:19–21); (4) to settle disputes (Pr 18:18); (5) to determine the courses of the priests, singers, gatekeepers (1Ch 24:5; 25:8; 26:13; Lk 1:9); (6) to determine who should dwell in Jerusalem (Ne 11:1); and (7) to choose the replacement of Judas Iscariot (Ac 1:26). Though there is no specific reference to a wood offering in the Pentateuch, the perpetual burning of fires would have required a continual "contribution of wood" (cf. 13:31; Lev 6:12–13).

35 The offerings of the "firstfruits" were brought to the temple for the support of the priests and Levites (Ex 23:19; 34:26; Lev 19:23–24; Nu 18:13; Dt 26:1–11). Actually, the law stipulated only seven kinds of plants for the firstfruits. The promise to bring the firstfruits of "every tree" was an act of exceptional piety.

36 The firstborn of men and beasts and the firstfruits of field and garden (Lev 19:23–25) were to be given to God. They could be set free for secular use only by redemption (Ex 13:13, 15; 34:20; Lev 27:26–33; Nu 3:44–51; 18:15–17; Dt 14:23–26).

37 On "storerooms," see comments on Ezr 8:29; 10:6. On "offerings," see Ezr 8:25; Ne 10:39; 12:44; 13:5. These contributions were for the maintenance of the priests. "New wine" can refer to freshly pressed grape juice (Isa 65:8; Mic 6:15), but it can still be intoxicating (Hos 4:11). "A tithe of our crops" is literally "tithe of our land." The practice of giving a tenth was an ancient one (Ge 14:20; 28:22). The law decreed that a tenth of the plant crops was holy to the Lord (Lev 27:30; Nu 18:23–32). There is no reference here to a tithe of cattle (as in Lev 27:32–33). Tithes were meant for the support of the Levites (13:10–12; Nu 18:21–32). "Towns where we work" were perhaps agricultural towns.

38–39 The Levites were to give in their turn "a tenth of the tithes" they received (Nu 18:25–32). Chambers in the outer courts of the temple were used as "storerooms" for silver, gold, and other objects. The people pledged themselves to "not neglect" God's house. The prophet Haggai (1:4–9) had accused the people of neglecting the temple.

I. The New Residents of Judah and Jerusalem (11:1–36)

1. Selection of the new residents (11:1–2)

1 "Lots" (see comment on 10:34) were made out of small stones or small pieces of wood. They were shaken (Pr 16:33) and cast (Ob 11; Na 3:10) on the ground (1Ch 24:31; Eze 24:6; Jnh 1:7). "The holy city" (cf. v.18) is a rare use of the phrase in a historical narrative that is usually found in prophetic texts (e.g., Isa 48:2; 52:1; Da 9:24; Joel 3:17; cf. Mt 4:5; 27:53; Rev 11:2). The practice of redistributing populations often involved the forcible transfer from rural settlements to urban centers.

2 In addition to those chosen by lot, some people volunteered, from a sense of duty, to live in Jerusalem. Evidently most would have preferred to stay in their native towns and villages (cf. Ezr 2:1). "Commended" (lit., "blessed") is a word usually used of God but at times of people (cf. 1Ch 16:2; 2Ch 6:3; 30:27).

2. The provincial leaders (11:3–24)

a. A topical statement (11:3–4a)

3–4a These verses succinctly preview the specifics of vv.4b–36. Verses 3–19 are a census roster that can be compared with the list in 1Ch 9:2–21 of the first residents in Jerusalem after the return from Babylonia. About half the names in the two lists are identical.

b. From Judah (11:4b–6)

4b–6 For "Shelah" the Hebrew has Shilonite, i.e., an inhabitant of Shiloh, which belonged to the northern kingdom rather than to Judah. The word therefore probably indicates a descendant of Shelah, Judah's third son (Nu 26:20). "Able men" (lit., "men of valor") were originally valiant, free men whose later descendants became wealthy and served in the armed forces (cf. v.14; 2:9; 4:2; 2Ki 15:20; Ezr 8:22).

c. From Benjamin (11:7–9)

7–9 On the role of "Benjamin" in the returning exiles, see comment on Ezr 4:1. Benjamin provided twice as many men (928) as Judah (468) to protect the city of Jerusalem. "The Second District" was a new suburb to the west of the temple area.

d. From the priests (11:10–14)

10–14 "Seraiah" was the descendant of the high priest who was taken prisoner by Nebuchadnezzar (2Ki 25:18–21). "Supervisor" (GK 5592) denotes a chief or leader among the priests.

e. From the Levites (11:15–18)

15–18 "The outside work" refers to work that took place outside the temple (cf. 1Ch 26:29). Asaph and Jeduthun were two of the three leaders of the temple choirs (cf. 1Ch 16:42; 25:1–2; Pss 39; 50, 73–83). The relatively small number of Levites (284) compared to the priests (a total of 1,192 in vv.12–13) is striking.

f. From the temple staff (11:19–24)

19–24 On "the gatekeepers" see comment on Ezr 2:42. "Ancestral property" designates the inalienable hereditary possession including land, buildings, and movable goods acquired either by conquest or inheritance (Ge 31:14; Nu 18:21; 27:7; 34:2; 1Ki 21:3–4). In the OT it describes the land of Canaan as the possession of both the Lord and Israel, including the individual holdings of tribes and families. The Lord's inheritance is Israel herself (Dt 4:20; 9:26, 29; 1Ki 8:51–53). On "the temple servants" see comment on Ezr 2:43; on "Ophel" see comment on Ne 3:26. On "the singers" see comment on Ezr 2:41. David regulated the services of the Levites, including the singers (1Ch 25).

3. Places settled by those from Judah (11:25–30)

This is an important list, which corresponds to earlier lists of Judean cities. All these names also appear in Jos 15 except Dibon, Jeshua, and Meconah. The list, however, lacks a number of cities listed in Ezr 2:20–34 and Ne 3. The limits of the Judean settlement after the return from Babylon have been confirmed by archaeological evidence; none of the coins minted for Judah have been found outside the area demarcated by these verses.

25 "Kiriath Arba" ("city of four [giants]") was the archaic name of the city of Hebron (Ge 23:2; Jdg 1:20), the important city twenty miles south of Jerusalem. Hebron is the traditional site of the burial of Abraham, Sarah, and other patriarchs. "Its settlements" is literally "its daughters" (cf. Nu 21:25, 32; 32:42; Jos 15:45, 47; 1Ch 2:23; 2Ch 13:19).

26–27 "Jeshua," "Moladah," and "Beth Pelet" were all near Beersheba (cf. Jos 15:26), a city about forty miles southwest of Jerusalem. "Beersheba" means "well of the seven" or "well of the oath" (Ge 21:25–31). This city represented the southernmost limit of Israel's population (cf. Jdg 20:1; 1Ch 21:2).

28–29 "Ziklag" is celebrated as the town given to David by Achish, king of Gath (1Sa 27:6) and taken by the Amalekites (1Sa 30:1). "En Rimmon" was probably nine and a half miles north northeast of Beersheba (cf. Jos 15:32; 19:7; 1Ch 4:32). "Zorah" was the home of Manoah, Samson's father (Jdg 13:2). "Jarmuth" was one of five Canaanite cities in the south that attempted to halt Joshua's invasion (Jos 10:3–5).

30 "Zanoah" was a village in the Shephelah district of low hills between Judah and the area of Philistia (Jos 15:34). The men of this town repaired the Valley Gate (Ne 3:13). "Adullam" was the city between Jerusalem and Lachish where David hid in a cave from Saul (1Sa 22:1). "Lachish" was a great Judean city midway between Jerusalem and Gaza. The Assyrian king Sennacherib failed to take Jerusalem in 701 B.C. but did capture Lachish. Later the city was captured by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 34:7); it was then resettled during Nehemiah's time. "Hinnom" is the valley southwest of Jerusalem.

4. Places settled by those from Benjamin (11:31–35)

31 "Geba" was six miles northeast of Jerusalem (cf. Jos 18:24; Ezr 2:26; Ne 7:30). The traditional northern limit of Judah (2Ki 23:8; Zec 14:10), Geba was fortified by Asa (1Ki 15:22). "Micmash," seven miles northeast of Jerusalem (cf. Ezr 2:27; Ne 7:31), was the location of the strategic pass to the Jordan Valley, where Saul and Jonathan fought the Philistines (1Sa 13–14). "Aija," an alternative name for "Ai," was just three miles southeast of Bethel (cf. Jos 7–8). "Bethel" ("house of God") was the northernmost town listed here for the Benjamites but was not listed among the people rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem.

32 "Anathoth," three miles north of Jerusalem, was the birthplace of Jeremiah (Jer 1:1). At "Nob" (probably Mount Scopus), just north of the Mount of Olives, the sanctuary was established after the destruction of Shiloh (Jer 7:14). "Ananiah" was probably Bethany, two miles east of Jerusalem.

33–35 "Hadid" was three to four miles northeast of Lydda, near the mouth of the Aijalon Valley (cf. Ezr 2:33; Ne 7:37). "Zeboim" was possibly north of Lydda and "Neballat" east. Lydda itself (here "Lod") is today the site of Israel's international airport, ten miles from the coast (cf. Ezr 2:33; Ne 7:37). Peter healed Aeneas in this town (Ac 9:32–38). "Ono" was five and a half miles northwest of Lydda. The enemies of Nehemiah tried to lure him to a conference there (Ne 6:2; cf. Ezr 2:33; Ne 7:37). "The Valley of the Craftsmen" may be the broad valley between Lod and Ono. The oak trees of the nearby Sharon plain were undoubtedly useful to artisans working in either wood or iron.

5. Transfer of Levites from Judah to Benjamin (11:36)

36 Certain divisions of Levites, who had been located in Judah, were now transferred to Benjamin to rectify the disproportion presumably discovered in Nehemiah's census.

J. Lists of Priests and the Dedication of the Wall (12:1–47)

1. Priests and Levites from the first return (12:1–9)

1–6 "Shealtiel" was the father of Zerubbabel according to this verse and Ezr 3:2, 8; Hag 1:1; but 1Ch 3:17–19 lists him as the uncle of Zerubbabel (see Ezra 5:2). "Jeshua" was the high priest about 560–490 B.C. (cf. Ezr 2:2; Ne 7:7, 12:10, 26). "Seraiah" (cf. 11:11; 12:12) is called Azariah in 1Ch 9:11 (cf. comment on Ezr 2:2). The "Ezra" listed in v.1 is, of course, not the same Ezra who returned eighty years later.

7 The rotation of twenty-four priestly houses may have been established at the time of David. There are twenty-two heads of priestly houses mentioned here in vv.1–7. Inscriptions listing the twenty-four courses of the priests presumably hung in hundreds of synagogues in Palestine.

8–9 The singing was in antiphonal fashion, with two sections of the choir standing opposite each other (cf. v.24; 2Ch 7:6, Ezr 3:11).

2. High priests and Levites since Joiakim (12:10–26)

10–21 All but one of the twenty-two priestly families listed in vv.1–7 are repeated in this later list that dates to the time of Joiakim, the high priest in the late sixth and early fifth century B.C.

22 "Darius the Persian" was either Darius II (423–404 B.C.) or, less probably, Darius III (335–331 B.C.), the king whose empire Alexander the Great conquered.

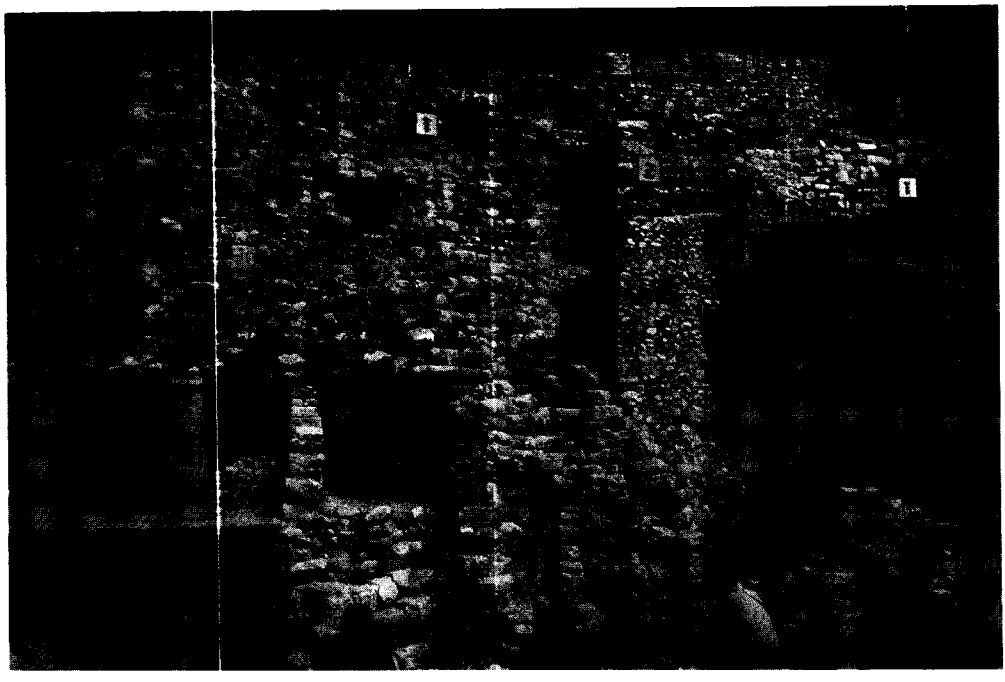
23 The "book of the annals" (cf. Ne 7:5) may have been the official temple chronicle containing various lists and records. Compare the annals of the Persian kings (Ezr 4:15; Est 2:23; 6:1; 10:2); "the book of the annals of the kings of Israel," mentioned eighteen times in 1 and 2 Kings; and "the book of the annals of the kings of Judah," mentioned fifteen times in 1 and 2 Kings.

24–26 On "who stood opposite," see comment on v.9. For "David's directions," see 1Ch 16:4; 23:27–31; 2Ch 8:14. From 11:17 we would have expected Mattaniah and Bakbukiah to be associated with the leaders of the choirs mentioned in v.24, rather than with the gatekeepers of v.25. On "gatekeepers," see comment on Ezr 2:42 (cf. Ne 3:1).

3. Dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (12:27–43)

27 Earlier, Solomon had dedicated the temple he built (1Ki 8), as had Zerubbabel (Ezr 6:16). The "dedication" (GK 2853) of the wall culminates the efforts of the people under Nehemiah's inspired leadership. Great enthusiasm must have characterized their march to the joyful music.

"Cymbals" (GK 5199) were used for religious ceremonies (2Sa 6:5; 1Ch 16:42; 25:1; 2Ch 5:12; 29:25; Ezr 3:10), as were "harps"



Extensive archaeolc gical excavations continue in the City of David (part of present-day Jerusalem). In this picture, the wall labelled "1" is from the time of Nehemiah.

(GK 4036; e.g., 1Sa 10:5; 2Sa 6:5; 1Ch 15:16, 20, 28; Ps 150:3). The harp was an instrument with strings of varying lengths. The "lyre" (GK 5575) was an instrument with strings of the same length but of different diameters and tensions.

28–29 "Netophathites" were from Netophah, a town near Bethlehem (1Ch 2:54; 9:16; Ezr 2:22; Ne 7:26). "Beth-Gilgal" was perhaps the Gilgal near Jericho (Jos 4:19–20) or the Gilgal of Elijah (2Ki 2:1), some seven miles north of Bethel.

30 The verb "purified . . . ceremonially" (GK 3197; cf. 13:9, 22, 30; Ezr 6:20) is used most frequently of the purification necessary to restore someone who had contracted impurity to a state of purity so that that person might participate in ritual activities (Lev 22:4–7). The Levites are said to have cleansed all that was holy in the temple (1Ch 23:28) and the temple itself (2Ch 29:15) during the times of revival. Ritual purification was intended to teach God's holiness and moral purity (Lev 16:30).

31 There were two great processions, starting probably from the area of the Valley Gate (2:13, 15; 3:13) in the center of the western section of the wall. The first procession led by Ezra (v.36) and Hoshaiah (v.32) moved in a counterclockwise direction on the wall; the second with Nehemiah moved in a clockwise direction. They met between the Prison Gate and the Water Gate and then entered the temple area (cf. Ps 48:12–13). The literal rendering "to the right" is misleading, as this procession went left to the south. Since Semites oriented themselves facing east, the right hand often represented the south.

32–37 "Ezra" in v.33 is not Ezra the scribe (v.36). Each choir was composed of seven priests blowing "trumpets" (see comment on Ezr 3:10) and Levites playing on other musical instruments. "Asaph" was the founder of one of the three guilds of Levite musicians (1Ch 25:1–2). "On the "Fountain Gate," see comment on 3:15; on the "Water Gate," see comment on 3:26. The procession went around the southern end of the walls, then turned north up the eastern wall to the Water Gate.

38 The second choir, led by Nehemiah, moved "in the opposite direction" from Ezra's choir (lit., "to the left," but meaning northward; see comment on Ne 12:31). That procession went in a clockwise direction around the northwestern sections of the wall. On the "Tower of the Ovens," see comment on 3:11; on "Broad Wall," see comment on 3:8.

39 On the "Ephraim Gate," see comment on 8:16. This gate is not mentioned as in need of repair in ch 3. On the "Jeshanah Gate," see comment on 3:6; the "Fish Gate," 3:3; the "Tower of Hananel" and the "Tower of the Hundred," 3:1; the "Inspection Gate," 3:31.

40–43 "The choirs sang" (v.42) is literally "the singers made [themselves] heard." "Great sacrifices" were offered because "God made them rejoice with great joy" (cf. 1Ch 29:9; Jnh 4:6). "The women" (see comments on 8:2; 10:28) "could be heard far away" (see Ezr 3:13; cf. 1Ki 1:40; 2Ki 11:13).

4. Regulations of the temple offerings and services (12:44–47)

44–45 On "storerooms" and "contributions," see comments on 10:37, 39. The people of Judah were "pleased" (i.e., it gave them great joy) to contribute their offerings to support the priests and Levites (cf. 2Co 9:7).

46–47 Asaph, a founder of one of the three musical guilds, was a Gershonite Levite to whom David entrusted the "service of song" in the tabernacle (cf. 1Ch 6:39; 2Ch 29:30; 35:15; Pss 50, 73–83). On "Zerubbabel," see Ezr 2:2; 3:2, 8; 4:2–3; Ne 7:7; 12:1. "Contributed" (GK 5989) translates a participle implying continued giving. On "the Levites set aside," see comment on 10:38–39.

II. Nehemiah's Second Administration (13:1–31)

A. Abuses During His Absence (13:1–5)

1. Mixed marriages (13:1–3)

1 The reference to "the Book of Moses" is to Dt 23:3–6 (cf. Nu 22–24). On marriages to Ammonites and Moabites, see comment on Ezr 9:1.

2 "Balaam" was the seer summoned by Balak, the king of Moab, to curse Israel (Nu 22–24). He came from Pethor in northwestern Mesopotamia (Nu 22:5). An Aramaic inscription from Deir 'Alla in Transjordan refers to Balaam. Though hired to curse the Israelites, through the inspiration of the Lord he blessed them instead. Later, however, he helped lead Israel to worship the Moabite god at Peor (Nu 25:1–3; 31:16; cf. Rev 2:14). In the NT his name is symbolic of avarice (2Pe 2:15; Jude 11). Curses had a power of their own; once uttered they could not simply be recalled. They could, however, be canceled by blessings (cf. Jdg 17:1–2).

3 The same term for "foreign descent" (GK 6850) is used in Ex 12:38 ("other people"). There, however, the mixed multitude was welcomed as they had agreed to the worship of the Lord, whereas it is implied that this was not the case here.

2. Tobiah's occupation of the temple quarters (13:4–5)

4 Some scholars identify "Eliashib" with the high priest of that name (cf. 3:1, 20; 13:28). Others argue that it is unlikely for a high priest to have been placed in charge of storerooms. The word rendered "closely associated" is used in Ru 2:20 to indicate that Boaz was related to Naomi and Ruth. We do not know Tobiah's exact (cf. 2:10) relationship with Eliashib.

5 During Nehemiah's absence from the city to return to the Persian king's court, Tobiah had used his influence with Eliashib to gain entrance into a chamber ordinarily set aside for the storage of tithes and other offerings (Nu 18:21–32; Dt 14:28–29; 26:12–15). These storerooms were evidently in the inner court of the temple (those mentioned in 10:38–39 and Zec 3:7 were parts of the outer court). Frankincense (NIV, "incense"), like myrrh, is a resin derived from trees that grow only in Somalia and Arabia.

B. Nehemiah's Return (13:6–7)

6–7 The thirty-second year of Artaxerxes I ran from Apr 1, 433, to Apr 19, 432 B.C. This verse and 5:14 indicate that Nehemiah's first term ran for about twelve years, until 433/432. We do not know the exact length of his second term, but it must have ended before 407 B.C., when other sources inform us that Bigvai was governor of Judah.

C. Nehemiah's Expulsion of Tobiah (13:8–9)

8–9 Nehemiah was a man of a volcanic temperament who expressed his indignation by taking quick action (vv.25–28; cf. 5:6–13; cf. contrast with Ezra in Ezr 9:3). On "to purify," see comment on 12:30 (cf. Lev 12; 14:4–32; 17:15–16). Though only a single chamber used by Tobiah has been mentioned before (vv.5, 7–8), the plural "rooms" here shows that other chambers were involved.

D. Reorganization and Reforms (13:10–31)

1. Offerings for the temple staff (13:10–14)

10 Nehemiah seems to be correcting an abuse of long standing. Strictly speaking the Levites had no holdings (Nu 18:20, 23–24; Dt 14:29; 18:1), though some may have had private income (Dt 18:8). The Levites were thus dependent on the faithful support of the people. This may explain the reluctance of many Levites to return from Exile (see comment on Ezr 8:15).

11–12 Nehemiah's rebuke of the officials here recalls his earlier rebuke of the selfish wealthy who exploited the less fortunate in granting them usurious loans. On tithes, see comment on 12:44.

13 On the nature of the profession "scribe," see comment on Ezr 7:6. Of the four treasurers put "in charge of the storerooms," one was a priest, one a Levite, one a scribe, and one a layman of rank. They all needed to be "trustworthy" (cf. 9:8, "faithful") in distributing the necessary supplies. This would ensure that supplies were distributed equitably.

14 Nehemiah was concerned that God would remember him (v.31; cf. 5:19) and "not blot out" (see Ex 17:14; 32:32) what he had done "faithfully," i.e., his good deeds inspired by steadfast love (cf. 1:5).

2. The abuse of the Sabbath (13:15–22)

15 Grapes were, of course, trodden by foot, but not normally on the "Sabbath." There was always the temptation on the part of merchants to violate the Sabbath rest (cf. Isa 58:13; Eze 20:13, 16; 22:8, 26; 23:38); this was especially true of non-Jewish merchants. The high regard for the ideal of the Sabbath was, however, expressed by those parents who called their children Shabbethai (cf. Ezr 10:15; Ne 8:7; 11:16).

16 Tyre (see comment on Ezr 3:7) was located only a dozen miles north of the border between Israel and Lebanon. The Tyrians supplied some of their famous cedars for the rebuilding of the temple (Ezr 3:7). It was renowned for its far-flung maritime trade (Eze 26:5, 14) and its export of fish (Eze 26:4–14). Most of the fish were either dried, smoked, or salted. Fish were an important part of the diet. They were sold at the market by the Fish Gate (2Ch 33:14; Ne 3:3; 12:39).

17–18 Nehemiah rebuked especially the nobles who were the leaders (cf. vv.11, 25; cf. 5:7). "Desecrating" (GK 2725) means to turn what is sacred into common use, to profane.

19 The gates began to cast long "evening shadows" even before sunset, when the Sabbath began. The Israelites counted their days from sunset to sunset. The precise moment the Sabbath began was heralded by the blowing of a trumpet by a priest.

20–21 When the gates were shut on the Sabbath eve, the persistent merchants carried on their activities outside the gates for two weeks until Nehemiah noticed them. Nehemiah was not a man of idle words. He meant what he said and was not averse to backing up his words by force (v.25).

22 The Sabbath was sanctified, not just by a negative cessation of ordinary labor, but by a consecration of that day to joyous gatherings. Fasting and mourning were not to be observed on the Sabbath. Once again, Nehemiah speaks a brief prayer to God.

3. Mixed marriages (13:23–29)

23–24 Ezra had dealt with the same problem of intermarriage some thirty years before. On "Ashdod" see comment on 4:7. Ammon was across the Jordan River (see comment on Ezr 9:1). Tobiah, Nehemiah's enemy, was influential in that area (cf. comment on Ne 2:10). The Ammonites worshiped the god Molech (Milcom) by sacrificing children in the fire (Lev 18:21; 2Ki 23:10, 13). The Moabites worshiped Chemosh, to whom they sacrificed their children (Nu 21:29; 2Ki 3:27). The Hebrews recognized other people as foreigners by their languages (cf. Ex 21:8; Dt 3:9; Jdg 12:6; Ps 114:1; Isa 33:4–19; Eze 3:5–6).

25 On Nehemiah's rebuke of others, see vv.11, 17 (see also comment on Ezr 9:3 for contrast between Ezra and Nehemiah). Plucking the hair from another's beard was an action designed to show anger, to express an insult, and to mark someone to scorn (2Sa 10:4; Isa 50:6). Nehemiah's action was designed to prevent future intermarriages, whereas Ezra dissolved the existing unions.

26–27 Solomon was Israel's outstanding king in wealth and political achievements (1Ki 3:12–13; 2Ch 1:12). He reigned for forty years (1Ki 11:42), built the magnificent temple (1Ki 6:1–38), and constructed an even more splendid palace for himself (1Ki 7:1). His fame spread beyond his borders so that the queen of Sheba in southwestern Arabia traveled fourteen hundred miles to test his fabled wisdom (1Ki 10:1–3). His international prestige is demonstrated in that he was given the daughter of a pharaoh in marriage (1Ki 3:1; 7:8; 9:16, 24; 11:1; 2Ch 8:11).

According to 1Ki 11:1–3, Solomon had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines, among whom were Moabite, Ammonite, Edomite, Sidonian, and Hittite women. He began his reign humbly by asking for wisdom from the Lord (1Ki 3:3–15). In later years, however, his foreign wives led him to worship other gods, so that he built a high place for Chemosh, the god of the Moabites on the Mount of Olives (1Ki 11:7).

On the phrase "terrible wickedness," compare 2Sa 13:16; Jer 26:19.

28 We do not know the name of "one of the sons of Joiada son of Eliashib the high priest." The phrase "the high priest" could refer to either Joiada or Eliashib, though more likely it designates Joiada (cf. 12:10). The offending son would then have been a brother of Johanan, the man who succeeded Joiada as high priest (12:22–23). He was married to a daughter of Sanballat.

According to Lev 21:14, the high priest was not to marry a foreigner. The expulsion of Joiada's son may have followed this special ban or the general interdict against intermarriage. Such a union was especially rankling to Nehemiah in the light of Sanballat's enmity (see comment on 2:10).

29 Nehemiah's prayer to "remember them" implied a prayer that God would judge them accordingly (cf. 6:14).

4. Provisions of wood and firstfruits (13:30–31)

30 "Duties" (lit., "divisions"; GK 5466) refers to the assignment of particular duties to groups of priests and Levites, possibly on a rotating basis.

31 On the wood offering and firstfruits, see comments on 10:34–35. The last words of Nehemiah—"Remember me with favor"—recapitulate a repeated theme running through the final chapter (vv.14, 22). His motive throughout his ministry was to please and to serve his divine Sovereign.

Nehemiah provides us with one of the most vivid patterns of leadership in Scriptures:

1. He was a man of responsibility, as shown by his position as the royal cupbearer.

2. He was a man of vision, confident of who God was and what he could do through his servants. He was not, however, a visionary but a man who planned and then acted.

3. He was a man of prayer, who prayed spontaneously and constantly even in the presence of the king (2:4–5).

4. He was a man of action and cooperation, who realized what had to be done, explained it to others, and enlisted their aid. Nehemiah, a layman, was able to cooperate with his contemporary, Ezra the scribe and priest, in spite of the fact that these two leaders were of entirely different temperaments.

5. He was a man of compassion, who was moved by the plight of the poorer members of society so that he renounced even the rights he was entitled to (5:18) and denounced the greed of the wealthy (5:8).

6. He was a man who triumphed over opposition. His opponents tried ridicule (4:3), attempted slander (6:4–7), and spread misleading messages (6:10–14). But through God's favor Nehemiah triumphed over all difficulties.

Esther

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

Five books that are found together in the third division of the Hebrew Bible (Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther) collectively are called the five Megilloth ("Scrolls"). The book of Esther is generally the last of the five, probably because it is read during Purim, the last festival of the Jewish year. In our English Bibles it is found after Ezra and Nehemiah, probably because of the role of Persia in the three books.

The book of Esther has continued to be controversial. Reactions range from ecstatic delight for the victory of the Jews over their enemies to violent dislike and rejection because of what appears to be indefensible moral conduct and because of the absence of any reference to God.

Esther is one of two OT books named for a woman, the other being Ruth, and one of several not quoted in the NT. Like Song of Songs, it does not mention God; like Exodus, it deals specifically with persecution of the Hebrew people.

Esther contains the account of the origin of the Feast of Purim, one of two festivals adopted by the postexilic Jewish community that are not found in the Mosaic law; the other one is Hanukkah, a festival that began during the time of the Maccabees (i.e., between the OT and NT). The events of Esther are set in Susa during the reign of Xerxes, king of Persia (486–465 B.C.), whose empire reached from India to Ethiopia. Esther is the only OT book in which the entire narrative takes place in Persia.

Against a background of centuries of persecution, it is understandable why Purim has become such a favorite of the Jews. It recalls a time when they were able to turn the tables on those who wanted to destroy them. Purim is celebrated today amid a carnival-like atmosphere, with masquerade parties, noisemaking, and revelry. The story is reenacted in synagogues with the audience hissing Haman and cheering Mordecai.

This book is a profound statement about the heroic resistance necessary for survival in the face of violent anti-Semitism that continues to the present day.

2. Authorship and Date

The text of Esther nowhere names the author nor gives the date of its writing. Authorship of the book has often been attributed to Mordecai. However, it is unlikely that Mordecai would have penned the paean of praise about himself in 10:3. Augustine suggested Ezra as the author. But the most that can be said is that the identity of the author remains unknown.

Because of this, there can be no absolute certainty about the date of its composition. It cannot have been written earlier than the death of Xerxes (465 B.C.), as 10:2 suggests that his reign had ended, but that is the most that can be said for certain. Two principal periods have been proposed as the likely date: an early date (450–300 B.C.) and a late date (175–100 B.C.).

Arguments for the earlier date include the numerous Persian names and loanwords. It is unlikely that so many words of this type would have occurred in a composition written in the late Greek period without modification. Another argument for the early date is the author's intimate knowledge of Persian customs and the topography of Susa and the Persian royal palaces. Such familiarity with Persian life argues for a date in the Persian period and perhaps not long after Xerxes' reign, for this kind of knowledge would not likely have survived till the Maccabean period. If the earlier date is accepted, the author was probably a Persian Jew. If it was written in the second century, he was probably a Palestinian Jew.

3. Purpose

Many interpreters take the position that the major purpose of the book of Esther was to explain the origin of Purim, to justify its celebration (since it is not mentioned in the Torah), and to regulate its manner of observance. Some believe that the purpose of Esther was to record the remarkable deliverance of the Jewish people at a critical time in their history and to keep the memory of that deliverance alive through the annual observance of Purim, in order to kindle their nationalistic fervor. An immediate purpose served by the book was to assure the Jews who did not return to their homeland after the Exile that God still loved them and would protect them from unjust oppression.

Most commentaries overlook what may well be the actual intent of this book—to teach God's providential care of his people (see Theological Values). This oversight is understandable because the doctrine of providence is presented so subtly in Esther; God's name is not even mentioned. The possibility of another purpose is suggested under Special Problems—i.e., to show that God's displeasure may be manifested by his silence.

4. Special Problems

Three problems are especially associated with the book of Esther: lack of a single mention of God's name in the book; moral and ethical practices by Mordecai and Esther; and a number of what appear to be historical inaccuracies.

a. Absence of God's name

The book of Esther's failure to mention God is glaring. The explanation can best be seen in the providence of God and his hiddenness (see Theological Values). Many believe that there is an indirect reference to Esther's faith when she spoke of fasting (4:16; cf. 4:3; 9:31). The statement "relief and deliverance ... will arise from another place" (4:14) comes very close to being an acknowledgment of God and probably should be understood that way.

b. Moral and ethical practices

The nationalistic and vengeful spirit of the book of Esther caused many problems among early Jewish and Christian readers and continues to do so. The leading characters do not consistently exhibit noble qualities. Xerxes was cruel, sensual, and capricious. Esther was willing to hide her identity to become queen and did not appear reluctant to marry a Gentile. Mordecai advised her to conceal her identity in order to become queen. Esther showed no mercy when Haman pled for his life and even demanded that his sons be hanged. Not content with deliverance of her people, she and Mordecai with the king's permission wrote a decree authorizing their people to slaughter and plunder their enemies. Mordecai insolently refused to bow to Haman.

The author never explicitly condemns any of the moral shortcomings of Esther or Mordecai but seems to describe their triumph with approval. Perhaps only someone who has experienced severe persecution can understand, without necessarily approving, the unrestrained exultation evoked by victory over one's persecutors.

The best approach to the moral problems of Esther is neither blind defense nor blanket condemnation. If immoral practices among the Israelites are found in the preexilic period (idolatry, adultery, lying, etc.), why should anyone be surprised to find other expressions of ungodly conduct in the postexilic period?

There is an explanation that addresses both the omission of God's name and the moral problems of the book (and that at the same time reveals a link between the two). The entire book should perhaps be seen as a subtle but powerful reminder that God's people sometimes fail to consult him prior to acting, do things that are contrary to his will, and consequently experience his displeasure by his silence. The disturbing ethical practices of Esther and Mordecai resulted in the deliverance of the Jewish people from a terrible pogrom, but their success does not prove that the means used were pleasing to God. There are numerous examples in the Bible of great men and women of God committing immoral acts (e.g., Ge 12:10–20; 19:8, 30–38; 2Sa 11).

In these examples, there is no explicit rebuke by God—only his silence. However, the silence of God—the feeling that he is very distant—can express his disapproval just as powerfully as his open rebuke through the prophets. What is usually interpreted as the providence of God working silently but effectively on behalf of his people should be reexamined to see whether God's silence should be interpreted as evidence that the people were working out their own affairs without consulting him. There is no evidence that the Jewish people entered into a period of blessing after the events of Esther, a blessing that might have been expected if God were guiding their actions. His clear promise, after all, was that if they obeyed him, they would be blessed (Dt 28). Mordecai's elevation (10:3) may not have been God's stamp of approval on his actions; it may instead show that if we use human means to achieve our purposes, we will receive human rewards (cf. Mt 6:5).

The real message of Esther may well be that God's people are prone to use the same means as ungodly people for achieving their goals rather than taking a bold step of faith that God will work out his purposes without human initiative, least of all resorting to immoral acts in a crisis situation.

c. Alleged historical inaccuracies

Scholars have long debated the historicity of the events described in Esther. An unbiased examination of all the arguments, however, leads to the conclusion that there is no valid evidence for denying the historicity of any of the people or events found in the book. Admittedly, the lack of confirmation of Vashti or Esther is a difficult problem, but all the facts are still not in. There is nothing in Esther that could not have happened.

5. Theological Values

The omission of God's name does not detract from the theological worth of Esther. It could be interpreted as his hiddenness as he works out his purposes. This hiddenness can sometimes be explained as evidence of his displeasure, which may be the key to the ethical problems of Esther that disturb many sincere Christian exegetes. In the OT God sometimes spoke out to show his displeasure toward his people's sins (e.g., Isa 1:15; Jer 17:1; Am 6:8). Sometimes he expressed his displeasure by withdrawal and silence (e.g., Eze 11:23). The Jews in Esther's time did not deserve God's favor (no one ever does). Mordecai and Esther were not blameless.

Esther implicitly teaches God's providential care of his people. Vashti's deposition, Esther's selection as her successor, and Mordecai's discovery of the plot against the king and his subsequent reward are only a few of the many "chance" happenings that are better explained by God's way of effecting the deliverance of his people from their persecutors. The book implies that even when God's people are far from him and disobedient, they are still the object of his concern and love, and that he is working out his purposes through them (4:14). There is also a reminder that if one fails to carry out God's tasks, he will work out his purposes through another. The sovereignty of God is implicit in the events of the story. The fast-moving events that seem to be under the control of men such as Xerxes and Haman prove in the end to have been directed by God for the benefit of his people. Even the law of the Medes and Persians, which should have brought about the slaughter of the Jews, was overruled.

The book of Esther teaches (1) the law of retribution for sin by the hanging of Haman on his own gallows, (2) the reward for faithfulness, and (3) the value of standing for one's convictions even in the midst of a dangerous situation.

EXPOSITION

I. Esther Elevated to Queen of Persia (1:1–2:23)

A. The Great Banquets of Xerxes (1:1–9)

1 The story of Esther is said to have taken place during the reign of the Persian monarch Xerxes. The Hebrew word used throughout the book is transliterated as "Ahasuerus" (see NIV note on v.1), a variant of Xerxes' name. As grandson of Cyrus the Great (550–530 B.C.) by Atossa, Cyrus' daughter, Xerxes inherited an empire from his father, Darius I (520–486 B.C.), that stretched east to west from India (probably a reference to the northwestern part of the Indus River region) to Cush ("Ethiopia," i.e., the Upper Nile region). Xerxes was the Persian monarch who made an ambitious but disastrous attempt to conquer Greece in 480–479 B.C. He divided much of his energy during the remaining years of his reign to an ambitious building project at Susa and Persepolis. He was murdered by his vizier Artabanus, who then placed Artaxerxes I (cf. Ezr 7:1; Ne 2:1) on the throne.

For purposes of governing, Xerxes' empire was divided into 127 provinces and twenty satrapies (according to Herodotus) or as many as thirty-one (according to other sources). "Provinces" were political subdivisions of the "satrapies" (cf. 3:12).

2 "At the time King Xerxes reigned" suggests the beginning of his reign, but v.3 says it was in the third year. It may only mean that Xerxes took up his residence in Susa, the royal winter residence and capital of ancient Elam. In the summer Susa was unbearably hot. Susa was both the name of the city and the name of the royal fortress or citadel that occupied a separate part of the city. Fire destroyed the royal buildings during the reign of Artaxerxes I (465–424 B.C.), but they were rebuilt by Artaxerxes II (404–358). Susa's location made it a center of traffic on the roads to Persepolis, Sardis, and Ecbatana.

3 In the third year of his reign, Xerxes gave a great banquet to display his wealth and glory. Its purpose may have been to make plans for his Greek campaign. All his nobles and the military and political leaders of Persia and Media were present. Historical sources confirm huge numbers of guests (as many as 69,574) at banquets put on by the Persian kings.

4 For 180 days (six months) Xerxes displayed his vast wealth and royal regalia to his guests. A question has been raised as to whether the guests could have exercised their administrative duties and also all have been present during the entire 180 days or whether they might have come by rotation until all had experienced the king's hospitality. Possibly the king displayed his wealth for 180 days and then gave a feast that lasted seven days.

5 The context indicates that a seven-day banquet was given for all the men who were in the citadel of Susa, from the greatest to the least (i.e., both nobles and commoners were included). The banquet was held in the king's enclosed garden. Persian palaces usually stood in a park, surrounded by a fortified wall.

6 With eyewitness accuracy the author described the white-and-blue linen hangings in the garden that were fastened with cords to silver rings on marble pillars. He described couches of gold and silver placed on a mosaic pavement of porphyry, marble, mother-of-pearl, and other costly stones. Archaeologists have found the remains of Xerxes' palace and have verified the accuracy of the opulence described in this verse.

7 Wine was served in golden goblets, no two alike. The king's "liberality" assured an abundant supply of wine for all the guests.

8 The guests were served according to Persian law; the word for "command" (GK 2017) here may mean the special rule made for this feast. No one was compelled to drink; at the same time, no restrictions were placed on what a guest could consume. The king's wine stewards had been instructed to serve each man whatever he wanted, however much or little.

9 At the same time the men were being entertained by the king, Queen Vashti gave a banquet for the women in the royal palace, though such separation of the sexes at banquets was not required by Persian custom. The queen's name has raised a question about the historicity of the book of Esther, as the only known name of Xerxes' queen was Amestris, a cruel and imperious woman.

B. Vashti's Dethronement (1:10–22)

1. Vashti's refusal to obey the king (1:10–12)

10–11 On the seventh and last day of the feast, when the king was in high spirits, he sent his seven eunuchs (seven was a sacred number to the Persians as well as to the Hebrews) to bring the queen before him, wearing the crown, so that he might display her beauty to the assembled guests. The name of the eunuchs are all Persian in origin. Eunuchs are usually associated with the king's harem, but they also played important roles in many political and administrative affairs (cf. Jer 29:2; Da 1:7; Ac 8:27).

12 The queen refused to answer the king's summons, and he became enraged. His male ego had suffered a public affront. Though the motive for her refusal is not stated, she probably did not choose to degrade herself before the king's drunken guests.

2. The wise men's advice (1:13–22)

13–14 Angered by Vashti's disobedience, the king consulted his wise men, "who understood the times," to determine what should be done to her. Like their Babylonian counterparts, these wise men were astrologers and magicians who gave counsel according to their reading of celestial phenomena. The king normally consulted experts in matters of law and justice and heard their opinions before he acted on any matter. There were seven wise men, all with Persian names, called "the seven nobles of Persia and Media" (cf. the Council of Seven in Ezr 7:14). Their high rank allowed them "special access" into the king's presence.

15 The king wanted to know what could be done legally to the queen for disobeying his command. It seems strange that he would have to consult others before dealing with a rebellious wife, but apparently the law protected her from his caprice.

16 Memucan, one of the seven nobles and perhaps their spokesman after they had discussed the matter, advised the king that Vashti had not only done "wrong" to the king but also to all the nobles and all the people throughout all the provinces of the kingdom. Apparently there was no existing law to deal with the situation, hence the consultation between the king and his nobles.

17–18 More was involved than the queen's affront to the king. With keen perception Memucan saw that if left unpunished, Vashti's rebellious attitude toward her husband would influence other women in the kingdom to rebel against their husbands' authority. The nobles anticipated there would be no end of disobedience, disrespect, and discord in their own homes.

19–20 Memucan advised immediate and drastic action to deal with the situation. He advised Xerxes to issue a "royal decree" to be included among the laws of the Persians and Medes that could never be repealed, forbidding Vashti from ever again entering the presence of the king; her position should be given to someone better than she. The advisors wanted to be sure that Vashti could never again be restored to the king's favor, lest she take vengeance on them. Memucan further advised the king to proclaim the decree throughout the empire so that all women from the least to the greatest would respect their husbands.

21–22 Memucan's advice pleased the king and the other nobles. Xerxes ordered dispatches sent to every part of the kingdom, to each people in their own language. He wanted to be sure that all his subjects understood the decree. The decree proclaimed that every man should be ruler over his own household.

C. Choosing a New Queen (2:1–23)

1. The search (2:1–4)

1 After Xerxes' wrath "had subsided," he remembered the deeds of Vashti and his decree that deposed her. It is uncertain whether he now regretted his rash action and wished to reinstate her but was prevented because his decree was irrevocable (cf. Da 6:14–15), or whether his thoughts now turned to a replacement for the queen. The king divorced Vashti in the third year of his reign (1:3) and did not marry Esther till the seventh year (2:16). Between the events of 1:3 and 2:16, Xerxes made his disastrous expedition to Greece. Returning from his naval defeat at Salamis in 480 and his humiliating rout at Plataea in 479, he turned his thoughts to remarriage, through which he hoped to find solace.

2 The king's personal attendants proposed that the king choose another wife from among the beautiful young virgins. They may have seen and felt more than others the king's unhappiness that the putting away of Vashti had caused him.

3–4 In all the provinces officials were to be appointed to locate all the beautiful young virgins and bring them to the harem in Susa. There they would be placed under the care of Hegai, the king's eunuch. Beauty treatments of all kinds of ointments and cosmetics would be applied to each of the virgins for twelve months (cf. v.12) in preparation for her presentation to the king. The one who pleased the king would be made queen in the place of Vashti. The courtiers' suggestion pleased the king; so he ordered that the search begin. Fathers apparently did not voluntarily present their daughters as evidenced by the king's appointment of officials to search for the candidates.

2. Esther as a candidate (2:5–11)

5–6 At this juncture in the narrative, Mordecai is introduced for the first time. His name is the Hebraized form of the Babylonian god Marduk. Idolatrous names for devout Jews grew out of a practice during the Diaspora of giving both a Babylonian and a Hebrew name to the same person (cf. Da 1:6–7). He is called a "Jew" (GK 3374), a word derived from "Judah" that was used from the time of the Exile to refer to an Israelite. Possibly Mordecai was a eunuch because no wife or family is mentioned (v.7) and because he had access to the women's quarters (v.11). His ancestry is traced through his father and grandfather to his great-grandfather, Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin.

Verse 6 begins "who had been carried into exile from Jerusalem . . . with Jehoiachin." If the antecedent of "who" is, as seems likely, "Kish," this man was carried away into captivity with King Jehoiachin in 597 B.C.

7 Mordecai "brought up" his cousin (other sources say Mordecai was Esther's uncle), whose Hebrew name was Hadassah ("myrtle"). She is better known by her Persian name Esther, which is derived from the Persian word for "star," or from the name of the Babylonian deity Ishtar (known in Hebrew as Ashtoreth). Her age at the time of the death of her parents is not given, but Mordecai took her as his own daughter; he probably adopted her. The author describes her as "lovely in form and features."

8 After the king's edict had been proclaimed, girls from all over the empire were brought to Susa, including Esther. They were placed in the care of Hegai, who was in charge of the harem.

9 Hegai must have discerned that Esther had the qualities that would please the king, for she "won his favor." Immediately he began to provide her with beauty treatments and special food so that the required twelve months of preparation could be completed without delay. Esther apparently did not object to breaking the Jewish dietary laws. Hegai assigned seven maids from the king's palace to take care of her and transferred Esther and her maids to the best quarters of the harem.

10 Mordecai forbade Esther to reveal her Jewish nationality, and she dutifully obeyed him. Obviously she would have stood little chance to be selected queen if she were not Persian, but why would Mordecai want her to marry a Gentile? Such a marriage was a violation of Jewish laws (cf. Ezr 9:1–4, 14, 10:3, 11, 18–44; Ne 10:30; 13:23–27). Also, there was no threat by Haman or known antipathy to the Jews at the time to warrant his secrecy. Mordecai has been accused of ambition for political advancement that could be realized if his cousin were queen. The author expresses no disapproval of the subterfuge.

11 Mordecai was careful to keep close check on Esther. Every day he walked near the courtyard of the harem to try to gain information about his cousin.

3. The traditional procedure (2:12–14)

12 Further information is given about each candidate's beauty treatment. The treatment required twelve months before a candidate was allowed into the king's presence. For six months oil of myrrh was applied to her and for six months, perfumes and cosmetics.

13 When each candidate was ready to be presented to the king, whatever she desired to take with her from the harem to his palace was given to her (i.e., jewels, clothing, etc.).

14 The maiden chosen would go into the king's presence in the evening to spend the night with him. The next morning she would return to another part of the harem and be placed under the care of Shaashgaz, the king's eunuch who was in charge of the concubines. She never returned to the king again unless he was pleased with her and summoned her by name. Those rejected lived the rest of their lives like widows (cf. 2Sa 20:3).

4. Esther chosen as queen (2:15–18)

15 When Esther's turn came to be taken to the king, she did not request any of the usual ornaments or cosmetics to enhance her beauty. She only took the things that Hegai, the king's eunuch, had suggested. She trusted him to know what would please the king. Her modesty and humility impressed everyone who saw her. Her father's name is given in this verse as Abihail. This name occurs in the OT twice as a woman's name (1Ch 2:29; 2Ch 11:18).

16 It was the tenth month and the seventh year of Xerxes' reign when Esther was taken to the king; it was four years after Vashti had been deposed (cf. 1:3; see comment on 2:1).

17 None of the previous candidates had attracted the king sufficiently for him to make her his wife; but he immediately loved Esther and placed the royal crown on her head, thereby making her queen in place of Vashti. After seeing Esther the king had no desire to continue the search for a queen.

18 A great wedding feast was given by the king for all his nobles and officials. As a generous gesture to mark the occasion, he proclaimed a holiday, i.e., a release from work, throughout the provinces. He distributed "gifts" liberally, as befitted such a monarch.

5. An attempt on the king's life thwarted (2:19–23)

19–20 All the virgins were assembled again. At that time Mordecai was sitting at the king's gate. No reason is given for the assembly. Esther had been careful to keep her nationality secret, as Mordecai had instructed her. From the time she first came under his care, she had been obedient to his commands and continued to listen to him, even after being elevated to the position of queen. Her continued obedience to Mordecai becomes important to the plot. Mordecai's position at the gate was not that of an "idler" but represented some kind of duty or official position he occupied. He may have been appointed to this position by Esther to give him easier access to the royal quarters. Men who "sat at the gate" were frequently elders and leading men, respected citizens who settled disputes that were brought to them.

21–22 During the time he was sitting at the king's gate, Mordecai either overheard or was informed about a plot to kill Xerxes by two of the king's officers, Bigthana and Teresh (cf. 6:2). They were eunuchs, guards of the door—i.e., men who protected the king's private apartment—who had become angry with Xerxes. Mordecai got word to Esther about the plot; and she relayed the information to the king, giving credit to Mordecai, without mentioning their relationship. Plots against Persian monarchs were not uncommon. Xerxes was in fact assassinated in his bedroom in a similar situation in 465 B.C. in a conspiracy led by his chiliarch Artabanus.

23 When Mordecai's report was investigated and found to be true, the two men were hanged on a "gallows" (lit., "tree"; GK 6770). The entire event was recorded in the "book of the annals" (i.e., official court records of memorable events). It is hard to understand why Xerxes forgot to reward Mordecai at that time.

II. The Feud Between Haman and Mordecai (3:1–8:17)

A. Haman's Plot to Kill Mordecai (3:1–15)

1. Haman's anger with Mordecai (3:1–6)

1 Sometime later the king elevated Haman by giving him a place of honor above all the other nobles of the empire. It was probably the same office that was later given to Mordecai (cf. 10:2). This is the first mention of Haman. The text identifies him as the son of Hammedatha the Agagite (otherwise unknown). Jewish tradition considers him to have been a descendant of the Amalekite king Agag, an enemy of Israel during Saul's reign (cf. 1Sa 15:7–33). The Amalekites were ancient enemies of the Jews (cf. Ex 17:8–14; Nu 24:7; Dt 25:17–19). Saul failed to destroy the Amalekites completely as God had ordered him to do, and consequently the kingdom was taken from him (cf. 1Sa 15:23).

2–4 By command of the king, all the royal officials at the king's gate knelt down and paid honor to Haman. Mordecai, however, refused to kneel before Haman or to honor him. In spite of repeated appeals by the royal officials, Mordecai refused to obey the king's command. Apparently he had told them that as a Jew he could not bow before any human being. The officials informed Haman of Mordecai's insolence to see whether it would be "tolerated." There are many examples of God's people prostrating themselves before a king or other superiors (cf. Ge 23:7; 27:29; 1Sa 24:8; 2Sa 14:4; 1Ki 1:16). It is unlikely that Mordecai could have been elevated next to the king if he had refused to kneel before Xerxes. The most probable reason was Mordecai's pride; no self-respecting Benjamite would bow before a descendant of the ancient Amalekite enemy of the Jews.

5–6 On learning that Mordecai refused to kneel before him or to pay him honor, Haman was enraged. So great was his wrath and injured pride that he determined to destroy all the Jews in Xerxes' kingdom. Haman was not satisfied with killing only Mordecai but was determined to succeed where Saul had failed (cf. 1Sa 15:9); Haman would destroy all his enemies.

2. A day of revenge chosen by lot (3:7–15)

7 In the twelfth year of Xerxes' reign (474 B.C.), five years after Esther had become queen (2:16), "the pur (that is, the lot)" was cast in Haman's presence to determine the day for the slaughter of the Jews. The purpose of the lot may have been only to determine an auspicious day for Haman to go before the king to make his request to kill the Jews. The non-Hebraic word pur anticipates the institution of Purim (i.e., "lots") in ch. 9.

8 To gain the king's support for his plan, Haman described the Jews, who were scattered in all the provinces of Persia, as a people who kept themselves aloof, who had different customs, and who would not obey the king's laws. Haman reasoned that it was not in the king's best interest to "tolerate them." Haman did not mention Mordecai as the special object of his wrath.

9 To obtain the king's permission to destroy the Jews, Haman appealed to the monarch's greed, offering to put ten thousand talents of silver of his own private fortune into the royal treasury to pay the men who would carry out the pogrom. The value of the silver was a fabulous sum, estimated to weigh approximately 375 tons. It has also been estimated to represent the equivalent of two-thirds of the annual income of the Persian Empire. Perhaps Haman planned to acquire such a large sum by confiscating the Jews' property.

10–11 The proposal apparently was immediately acceptable to the king. He removed the signet ring from his finger and gave it to Haman with instructions to keep the money and to do whatever he pleased with the Jews. The signet ring was a symbol of royal authority and in ancient times was used instead of a written signature to seal official documents. Thus Haman was given unlimited authority to carry out his plan. The king was unaware that by giving blanket authority to Haman to execute the Jews, he had also placed his own wife under a death sentence. The king's rejection of Haman's silver may have been only an example of Oriental politeness that did not actually mean he rejected the payment (cf. 4:7, where it seems that the bribe was paid).

12 On the thirteenth of the first month (Nisan), the royal secretaries were summoned to write out in the script of each province and in the language of each people Haman's orders to the satraps, governors, and nobles. The orders were written in the king's name and sealed with his ring. Three echelons of officials are named—"satraps" (GK 346), who ruled over the twenty major divisions of the empire; "governors" (GK 7068), who ruled smaller subdivisions of the satrapies; and "nobles" (GK 8569), who served under the governors and were perhaps chiefs of the conquered peoples.

13 Dispatches were sent by "couriers" to all the provinces with orders to annihilate all the Jews, young and old, and to plunder their goods on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month (Adar). No reason is given for the lapse of almost a year from the time of the decree till its implementation. With so much advance notice, the Jews would have had time to escape. The piling up of verbs—"destroy, kill and annihilate"—expresses the idea of thoroughness.

14–15 The decree was to be made law in every province, and all were to know about it so they would be ready for the day. The couriers departed in haste for the provinces at the king's command. The edict was also circulated in the citadel of Susa. Then the king and Haman sat down to drink, unconcerned about the tragedy soon to be inflicted on the Jews. The people of Susa were bewildered by what was happening. Apparently they did not share Haman's passionate anti-Semitism.

B. Mordecai's Plan to Save His People (4:1–17)

1. Reaction to the edict (4:1–3)

1 On learning what Haman was plotting, Mordecai expressed his grief and humiliation in typical Oriental fashion. He tore his clothing, put on sackcloth, and sprinkled ashes on himself. Then he walked about the city wailing loudly.

2–3 Mordecai went no farther than the king's gate, as no one was permitted within the gate who was wearing sackcloth. Apparently a person in mourning was considered ceremonially unclean. Perhaps Mordecai hoped to attract Esther's attention (cf.4:4). Not only was Mordecai in mourning, but in every province where the edict was announced, it was greeted by the Jews with fasting, weeping, and wailing. Many of them lay down on sackcloth and ashes.

2. Mordecai's appeal to Esther (4:4–17)

4–5 Some of Esther's maids and eunuchs must have seen Mordecai at the king's gate; so they reported his behavior to Esther. No reason is given why they felt one Jew's grief should be reported to their queen since they apparently did not know about her relationship to Mordecai, though they did know the two were acquainted (cf. 2:11, 22). Esther was distressed to learn of Mordecai's sorrow. She sent clothes for him to wear in place of the sackcloth, probably so that he could enter the palace; but he refused to accept them. This may have indicated to Esther that his actions were not caused by personal sorrow but by a public calamity. Since Mordecai would not come to her, Esther sent Hathach, one of the king's eunuchs who had been assigned to attend her, to find out what was troubling Mordecai.

6–7 Hathach looked for Mordecai in the open square of the city in front of the king's gate, probably the marketplace. There Mordecai told the eunuch what had happened that caused him to be in mourning. He told Hathach how much money Haman had agreed to pay into the royal treasury for the privilege of destroying the Jews (cf. 3:11). We are not told how Mordecai learned about the transaction between the king and Haman.

8 Mordecai had a copy of the edict for the Jews' annihilation that was being circulated in Susa. He asked the eunuch to give it to Esther and to explain it to her. He told Hathach to urge Esther to go to the king to plead for mercy for the Jews. Mordecai's request would require that the queen reveal her Jewish identity.

9–11 After Hathach told the queen what Mordecai had said, she instructed him to return to her cousin to remind him that no one could approach the king in the inner court without a royal summons, upon penalty of death. On occasion the king had been known to extend his golden scepter to an uninvited person as a gesture of mercy. According to historical sources, a person could send a letter to the king asking for an audience. Why this procedure did not occur to Esther can only be surmised. Since she had not been summoned by the king for a month, Esther did not know whether he would forgive her if she approached him without a royal summons. She may have concluded that she had lost the king's favor. It appears that initially Esther was more concerned about her own welfare than about her people.

12–14 Mordecai responded by telling Esther that she would not escape Haman's edict against the Jews because she was in the king's house. If she remained silent, deliverance of the Jews would come from another source; but because of her cowardice, she and her father's family would perish. Not even royal status could protect her from the king's edict. Then Mordecai asked the question that has become the classic support of the doctrine of providence as a key to the understanding of the book of Esther: "Who knows but that you have come to royal position for such a time as this?" Her exaltation as a queen may have been God's way of obtaining a savior for his people. In the phrase "from another place," "place" may be a veiled reference to God.

15–16 Esther sent a reply to Mordecai, affirming her willingness to risk her life in behalf of her people. She asked him to assemble all the Jews who were in Susa to fast for her for three days and nights. She and her maids would also participate in the fast. Afterward she would go to the king, even though to do so was contrary to the law. In a final expression of courage and willing submission, she said, "If I perish, I perish." Prayer and fasting before God were customary concurrent practices in times of sorrow, anxiety, or penitence. The author makes no mention of God or prayers being made to him.

17 Mordecai departed from the open square in front of the king's gate and carried out Esther's instructions.

C. Esther's First Banquet (5:1–8)

1 "On the third day," i.e., when the fasting was completed (cf. 4:16), Esther dressed in her royal splendor and went to the inner court of the palace in front of the king's hall. Xerxes was sitting on his throne in the hall, facing the entrance. From this position he could see Esther standing in the court. She had waited to see what he would do, as she had already violated the law by entering the inner court (cf. 4:11).

2 Esther's beauty evidently pleased the king; so he did not rebuke her. Instead, he held out the golden scepter in his hand as a gesture of favor toward her. Esther approached the throne and touched the tip of the scepter.

3 The king wanted to know why she had come to him. He assured her that any request she might make, even up to half the kingdom, would be granted. He realized that only a pressing need could have caused Esther to risk coming to him unsummoned. The offer of half the kingdom was probably an example of Oriental courtesy that was not intended to be taken too literally (cf. Mk 6:23).

4 Instead of forthrightly pleading for her people, Esther invited the king and Haman to a banquet she had prepared that day. She undoubtedly realized that it was not a psychologically propitious moment to plead for her people. Perhaps Esther included Haman in the invitation so that he would be present when she made her accusations against him.

5–6 The king ordered Haman to be summoned at once. The two men then went to Esther's banquet. While they were drinking wine, the king again asked to know the nature of Esther's request.

7–8 For a second time Esther postponed giving a direct answer to the king. Instead she invited the king and Haman to a second banquet the following day. She indicated that she would present her petition to the king at that time.

D. Haman's Plot Against Mordecai (5:9–14)

9–10 Haman left the banquet happy and in "high spirits" because of the honor that had been accorded him by the invitations to the queen's private banquets. When he encountered Mordecai at the king's gate, however, Haman was filled with rage against the Jew because Mordecai did not stand up or show fear in his presence (cf 3:2). But Haman controlled himself and went to his home and called his wife, Zeresh, and his friends together to tell them about the great honor accorded him by the king and the queen. Mordecai had apparently heard that Esther had been favorably received by the king and was encouraged by this turn of events; thus he had removed his sackcloth.

11–12 In an expansive mood Haman boasted about his wealth, his many sons, and the honor shown him by the king. He also exulted about the invitation to Esther's private banquet to which only he and the king had been invited. Haman's boasting only accentuated his later humiliation and fall from favor (cf. Pr 16:18). An early OT interpretation (in a Targum) records that Haman had 208 sons in addition to the ten who held government offices (cf. 9:10).

13 In spite of the things that should have brought him happiness, Haman had no satisfaction as long as he saw Mordecai sitting at the king's gate. Haman's wealth and honors could not satisfy him when he thought of one Jew who failed to show him the proper respect he felt he deserved!

14 Haman's wife and friends suggested a plan that would remove the source of his irritation. She told Haman to have a gallows erected seventy-five feet in height and then to ask the king to have Mordecai hanged on it. With that business out of the way, Haman could go with the king to Esther's banquet and be happy. His wife's suggestion delighted Haman, and he had the gallows built, confident that the king would approve his request. The height of the gallows was exorbitant, but it is consistent with what we know of Haman's vanity and obsessive desire for revenge.

E. Haman's Humiliation (6:1–13)

1. Discovery of an unrewarded deed (6:1–5)

1 The same night of Esther's first banquet, the king was unable to sleep; so he ordered the royal annals (see comment on 2:23) to be brought in and read to him. No doubt God was behind the king's sleeplessness. This entire chapter shows how circumstances fit together to overrule the evil intentions of Haman.

2–3 In the course of reading the annals, the record of Mordecai's exposure of the plot of Bigthana and Teresh against the king was found. On inquiring what "honor and recognition" had been bestowed on Mordecai, the king was told that nothing had been done to honor him. The oversight must have disturbed Xerxes, as it was a reflection on him for not rewarding one of his benefactors.

4–5 Though the hour was late, the king inquired if anyone was in the court. He intended to set the matter right without further delay. As if by chance, Haman had just entered the outer court to speak to the king about having Mordecai hanged on the gallows he had erected. The attendants advised the king of Haman's presence; so the king ordered that he be brought to his bedchamber at once. It seems strange that Haman came in the middle of the night to make his petition, but perhaps he knew the sleeping habits of the monarch.

2. Mordecai honored (6:6–11)

6 The text suggests that abruptly and without an exchange of greetings the king asked Haman what should be done for a person whom the king delighted to honor. Haman assumed the king meant to honor him. It is one of the great ironies of the story that Haman was to decide how the man he desired to hang would be honored.

7–9 The vain Haman, not needing additional wealth, suggested that the one to be honored be given a royal robe that had been worn by the king, along with a horse the king had ridden, and that had a royal crest be placed on its head. Horses wearing crowns or head ornaments are depicted on both Assyrian and Persian reliefs. Haman further suggested that one of the king's most noble princes lead the "honoree," garbed in the king's robe, on the horse through the city streets. As he led horse and rider through the streets, the prince was to proclaim, "This is what is done for the man the king delights to honor!" Haman must have been ecstatic in anticipation of the high honor he thought was about to be accorded him before all the people of Susa.

10 The suggestion delighted the king. He ordered Haman to carry out the plan at once. Then for the first time the king named the man who was to be honored—Mordecai, Haman's adversary! The king warned Haman not to "neglect" any of the honors he had proposed. It seems strange that the king would knowingly honor a Jew so soon after enacting an edict to destroy all the Jews in his kingdom.

11 Haman had no choice but to carry out the king's orders. No writer, however gifted, could adequately describe the chagrin and mortification Haman must have experienced as he robed Mordecai and led him through the streets. One wonders what brought the greatest enjoyment to Mordecai—his being remembered by the king, the people's adulation, or Haman's humiliation!

3. Haman's wife affirms his downfall (6:12–13)

12 Afterward Mordecai returned to the king's gate, where he had been sitting before Haman had been forced to lead his foe through the streets of Susa mounted on the king's horse. The honor had not changed Mordecai's position before the king as a Jew awaiting the execution of Haman's edict. Haman, however, rushed home with his head covered, an expression of his grief and wretchedness. Covering the head was a way of expressing mourning (cf. 2Sa 15:30; Jer 14:3–4). Haman must have hoped to find solace from his wife and friends.

13 Haman told his wife and friends all the details of his humiliating experience. If he expected comfort from them, he did not receive it. Instead they, seeing the handwriting on the wall, warned Haman that the Jew had been responsible for the beginning of his downfall. They were convinced that he could not stand against Mordecai; Haman's ruin was already assured. They seem to have conveniently forgotten that his humiliation was largely the result of their suggestion (cf. 5:14).

F. Esther's Second Banquet (6:14–7:10)

1. Haman summoned to the banquet (6:14)

14 The conversation between Haman and his friends was interrupted by the appearance of eunuchs sent by the king to escort Haman to Esther's banquet. The fact that they "hurried" to bring him suggests that as the result of his humiliating experience with Mordecai (cf. 6:11), Haman had either forgotten about the queen's banquet or he did not want to attend it.

2. Haman exposed and executed (7:1–10)

1–2 The king and Haman went "to dine" with Esther at her invitation. At her second banquet, the king once again sought to discover the nature of Esther's petition (v.2). Again he assured her that it would be granted, "even up to half the kingdom" (cf. 5:3, 6). He made his inquiry while they were drinking wine, which was customarily served after the meal.

3 The queen no longer withheld her request from the king. She began courteously by asking whether she had "found favor" with the king. She dared not presume on the goodwill of Xerxes. She unmasked Haman, but by doing so she revealed her own identity without knowing what the king's reaction would be. The king must have looked at her in stunned silence when she asked for her life and also for the lives of her people. It probably took him some time to grasp the fact that she also was a Jew.

4 Without waiting for the king to speak, Esther hastened to explain that she and her people had been sold for destruction, slaughter, and annihilation. She added that if it had been a matter of selling them as slaves rather than killing them, she would not have troubled the king with such a petty problem. But their destruction would be an economic loss to the king.

5 The king's reaction was immediate and wrathful. He demanded to know who had dared to do such a thing. He must have felt that the plot to kill the Jews that also encompassed his wife was a personal affront. Either he ignored his complicity in the affair, or he felt that he had been duped into agreeing to the Jews' destruction. A careful reading of ch. 3 shows that Haman did not mention the Jews by name; so perhaps the king was unaware of the full contents of the decree he had signed.

6 Without hesitation Esther identified Haman as the enemy. Haman was struck with terror by the accusation, for he knew that his fate was automatically sealed by Esther's words.

7 The enraged king arose abruptly and went into the palace garden. The situation created a dilemma for the king because he could hardly condemn Haman for carrying out orders that bore his royal seal. Xerxes probably needed some time to collect his thoughts before acting. Haman, knowing that the king had already decided his fate, remained to beg Esther for his life.

8 Haman's timing could not have been worse. Just as he fell on the couch where Esther was reclining to plead for his life, the king walked in. Angrily he accused Haman of attempting to molest the queen even while she was with her husband. As soon as the words left the king's mouth, servants or court officials covered Haman's face. The king's angry words were a sentence of death. Although there is no evidence that it was a Persian custom to cover the face of a condemned criminal before he was led away to execution, that was probably its meaning here. Esther looked on in silence as her enemy was led away.

9 One of the king's eunuchs, Harbona, remembered the gallows that Haman had just erected for the execution of Mordecai and so informed the king. If the king had been considering mercy for Haman, the reminder that Haman had knowingly plotted the death of a man who had saved the king's life was sufficient to seal his fate. The king's immediate response was "Hang him on it!"

10 No mention is made of the time that elapsed between the pronouncement of the sentence and its execution, but Haman was probably carried away and hanged immediately. The king's wrath "subsided." As an act of poetic justice, Haman lost his life on the very gallows that he had anticipated would bring him such joy at Mordecai's execution.

G. Mordecai's Elevation (8:1–17)

1. Exaltation over the house of Haman (8:1–2)

1–2 On the same day that Haman was executed, King Xerxes gave Haman's entire "estate" to Esther, probably as compensation for all she had suffered. Persian law gave the state the power to confiscate the property of those who had been condemned as criminals. The queen revealed her relationship to Mordecai, whereupon the king invited him into his presence. Xerxes removed from his finger the signet ring that he had "reclaimed" from Haman and gave it to Mordecai, thereby making him prime minister with power to act in the king's name (cf. 3:10). Mordecai became one of the select group of courtiers who had the right of access into the king's presence. Esther placed her kinsman in charge of Haman's estate. Haman's wealth, title, and power now belonged to his enemy Mordecai.

2. Reversal of Haman's decree (8:3–14)

3 With a great show of emotion, Esther fell at the feet of the king and begged him to "put an end" to the evil plan Haman had devised against the Jews. Haman's overthrow and Mordecai's elevation could not give Esther comfort so long as Haman's decree against the Jews remained unrevoked.

4 The king extended his scepter after her emotional plea. His gesture was intended to encourage her to rise from her prostrate position before continuing to speak.

5–6 With proper deference to the king and an expressed hope that she enjoyed the king's favor, Esther petitioned him to issue an order "overruling" Haman's dispatches. She reminded him that Haman's orders had been sent with the explicit purpose of destroying the Jews in all the king's provinces. Esther expressed her grief in face of the impending disaster about to fall on her kin, thus revealing her true character—that she was not merely self-serving. Esther was careful to place the blame on Haman for the wicked plot and not on the king.

7–8 The king responded by first reminding Esther and Mordecai that he had executed Haman and given his estate to her. The king then told them to write another decree in his name in behalf of the Jews. He gave them permission to word the decree as seemed best to them. He reminded them that he could not write the new decree himself, as no prior document written in his name and sealed with his ring could be "revoked," even by the king himself. It could only be neutralized by another decree.

9 The royal secretaries were summoned "at once." It was the twenty-third day of the third month, two months and ten days after Haman had issued his order. They wrote out Mordecai's orders to the Jews and to the other government officials of the 127 provinces. The orders were written in every language spoken in the provinces. Therefore no one in the Persian Empire would be able to plead ignorance of Mordecai's orders.

10 Because of the authority granted him by Xerxes, Mordecai wrote the orders in the king's name and then sealed the dispatches with the king's signet ring. They were then sent throughout the empire by "mounted couriers." Fast horses were used to carry Mordecai's message throughout the empire without undue delay.

11–12 Mordecai's edict granted the Jews the right to "protect themselves" against anyone who might attack them, to slaughter women and children, and to plunder the property of their enemies. The day set apart for the Jews to take revenge on their enemies was the thirteenth day of the twelfth month (cf. 3:13). The decree was almost a paraphrase of Haman's edict. It is difficult to understand why the Persian ruler would allow a Jewish minority to massacre his subjects at will. Yet we have already observed Xerxes' indifference to the value of human life (cf. 3:11), and it was the only way to neutralize the preceding edict.

13 Mordecai's edict was to be issued as law in every province of the empire and made known to all the subjects, regardless of their nationality. Everyone would realize that the Jews would be ready on the designated day to take vengeance on their enemies.

14 Riding the royal horses, the couriers hastened to deliver the edict to all parts of the kingdom, knowing it was a royal decree. The decree was also circulated in the citadel of Susa.

3. Popular reaction (8:15–17)

15 Mordecai left the king's presence wearing royal garments of blue and white that befitted his new position. He also wore a large crown of gold and a purple robe of fine linen. The verse closes with the statement that the city of Susa had a "joyous celebration." As it is difficult to understand why the Persian residents of Susa would rejoice at a decree that could be used against them, the statement probably refers to the joy of the Jewish residents of Susa.

16–17 When the edict became known throughout the provinces, there was great joy among the Jewish people, accompanied by feasting and other celebrations. "People of other nationalities" became Jews out of fear of what the Jews might do to them. The statement that they "became Jews" may mean that they pretended to be Jews or took the side of the Jews. The tables had turned so completely that it was now dangerous not to be a Jew.

III. The Jews' Day of Vengeance (9:1–19)

A. A Great Slaughter (9:1–10)

1 The thirteenth day of the month Adar arrived for the carrying out of both edicts. The nine months that elapsed since the second decree was signed are passed over in silence. The Jews now had "the upper hand" over those who hated them. This chapter assumes a universal hatred of the Jews (cf. vv.2, 5, 16) that was not expressed previously.

2 The Jews gathered in their cities throughout the provinces to "attack" anyone who tried to destroy them. Fear seized the people of other nationalities; no one was able to stand against the Jews.

3–4 The nobles and other political leaders "helped" the Jews because of their fear of Mordecai and the influence he had with the king. Mordecai was not only prominent in the palace, but "his reputation spread" throughout the empire. He had become increasingly powerful during his brief months as prime minister.

5 The Jews showed no mercy to their enemies. They massacred those who hated them; there were no restraints imposed on them by the king. The Jews did not limit themselves to self-defense. They hunted out and destroyed those who might harm them. Their fury can only be understood by those who have experienced a long history of persecution.

6–10 In the citadel of Susa, the Jews killed five hundred men and also killed the ten sons of Haman, who shared in their father's guilt. The Jews did not, however, take any plunder in Susa, though the edict granted them this right (cf. 8:11); their restraint shows their motive was not personal enrichment.

B. Vengeance in Susa (9:11–15)

11–12 The king was informed of the slaughter taking place in the citadel of Susa. He reported the figures to Esther and asked whether she knew what the Jews were doing elsewhere in the provinces. He also encouraged her to make any other request of him that she desired, and it would be granted. Xerxes' only desire was to please his queen; he showed no concern for his subjects who were being killed.

13 Esther asked for a second day for the Jews in Susa to continue killing their enemies. She also asked that Haman's ten murdered sons be hanged on gallows as an additional act of degradation on Haman's house. She may have hoped the deed would serve as a deterrent against further Jewish persecution.

14–15 The king granted Esther's request for a second day and issued an order to hang Haman's ten sons. On the next day, the fourteenth of Adar, the Jews killed an additional three hundred of their enemies in Susa but did not take any plunder.

C. Celebration in the Provinces and in Susa (9:16–19)

16–17 Elsewhere in the Persian provinces, the Jews killed seventy-five thousand of their enemies on the thirteenth of Adar but took no plunder. On the fourteenth day they rested and celebrated their victory with feasting and rejoicing.

18–19 The author added these verses to explain why in his time Jews living in the city kept the Feast of Purim on the fifteenth of Adar whereas Jews living in the country observed it on the fourteenth. The Jews in Susa were permitted two days for killing their enemies and therefore celebrated their victory on the fifteenth. Jews elsewhere had only one day for slaughtering their enemies and therefore celebrated their victory on the fourteenth. In addition to feasting, they gave presents to one another.

IV. Institution of the Feast of Purim (9:20–10:3)

A. Mordecai's Letter (9:20–28)

20–21 When Mordecai learned that the Jews were celebrating their victory on two different days, he recorded what had happened and then sent letters to all the Jews in all the provinces of the kingdom. In the letter he authorized them to celebrate their victory over their enemies thereafter on both the fourteenth and fifteenth days of Adar.

22–23 The two-day celebration would be observed as a memorial to the time when the Jews "got relief" from their enemies. Their sorrow and mourning had been transformed into joy and celebration by the turn of events. Mordecai instructed them to observe the days by feasting and by giving food to one another and gifts to the poor. The Jews agreed to observe their celebration every year in the same way as they did that first time and in accordance with the instructions given them by Mordecai.

24–25 The narrator now begins a summary of the events that led to the establishment of the Jewish festival of Purim. Haman, the Jews' enemy, had cast the pur to determine on which day he would destroy the Jews (see comment on 3:7). When the plot was brought to the king's attention, "he issued written orders" that Haman's evil scheme should come back on his own head. He also ordered the death of Haman and his sons on the gallows (though not at the same time; cf. 7:10; 9:14).

26–27 In the first explicit reference to the Jewish festival of Purim, the author explains that the name finds its origin in the word pur (cf. 3:7; 9:24). As a result of the instructions given them in Mordecai's letter, the Jews took it on themselves to observe the fourteenth and fifteenth days of Adar every year in the way prescribed and at the time appointed. The festival would be observed by their descendants and "all who join them" (i.e., proselytes to the Jewish faith). Thus Purim became the first Jewish festival for which there is no basis in the Torah, but it is considered just as binding as the other festivals.

28 The author makes a final exhortation for the Jews to remember the days of Purim in every generation by every family wherever they may live. The days of Purim should never cease to be celebrated by the Jews nor forgotten by their "descendants."

B. Esther's Confirmation (9:29–32)

29–30 Esther, together with Mordecai, wrote with the full authority of her position to confirm "this second letter concerning Purim." This letter to all the Jews in the 127 Persian provinces is most likely the letter described in vv.29–31, which was intended to add authority to Mordecai's first letter (vv.20–22).

31–32 The purpose of the letter was to establish the days of Purim at the times decreed by Mordecai and Esther (i.e., the fourteenth and fifteenth days of Adar). Esther's decree confirmed the regulations about Purim. It was written down "in the records" to be available to future generations for verification.

C. The Greatness of Mordecai (10:1–3)

1 Even as it had begun, the book closes with a statement that reveals the imperial power and wealth of Xerxes. He was able to impose "tribute" (i.e., forced taxation or involuntary labor; cf. Ex 1:11; 1Ki 5:13; ;9:21) to the most distant shores of his empire. It is unclear as to what the relevance of this verse is to the rest of the book. Perhaps Mordecai was a factor in augmenting the king's power over the other nations under his control (cf. Joseph in Ge 41).

2 The reader is told that the mighty acts of Xerxes as well as a full account of the greatness of Mordecai were recorded in the book of the official annals of the kings of Media and Persia (cf. 6:1; 1Ki 11:41; 2Ch 25:26). Media is mentioned first here, whereas it follows the mention of Persia in 1:3, 14, 19.

3 The book closes with a paean of praise to Mordecai, who rose to be second in rank to King Xerxes and "preeminent" among the Jews. He was held in "high esteem" by his fellow Jews because he worked for their good "and spoke up for the welfare of all the Jews" (cf. Ps 85:8; Zec 9:10).

Job

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

The uniqueness of the book of Job derives from its depth and thoroughness in dealing with the relationship of human suffering to divine justice, commonly called theodicy (from Gk. theos ["god"] and dike ["justice"]). Numerous documents, especially from ancient Mesopotamia and Egypt, demonstrate that this type of wisdom writing was well established in the OT world; but none touch on these matters so eloquently and fully as this OT book.

The book of Job cannot be forced into any single literary classification. It is generally called Wisdom literature, but that describes more the subject matter than the form. The book is largely poetry of various genres (lament, wisdom, proverbs, hymns, etc.), and in places it is more difficult to understand than any other part of the OT. Job abounds in words occurring only once. The grammar, syntax, and orthography (spelling) often stand outside the regular forms of classical Hebrew.

2. Authorship

It is quite possible that in the composition of the book of Job the author used source materials, and that the book went through some kind of literary development. But any attempt to know exactly what that was is sheer guesswork. We do not know who wrote the book, but his work has witnessed to the spirits of the faithful throughout the ages that he was divinely inspired.

Presumably the poet based the material on wisdom poetry passed down through the generations. The wisdom poetry of the speeches in Job includes poetic genres such as laments, hymns, proverbs, and oracles. As in all Semitic poetry, parallelism is foremost. This comes from an artistic urge toward symmetry through balanced lines and other units of composition. The poet, however, was a free spirit; so he created unique and intricate patterns of relationship between thought and form parallelism.

3. Date and Source

As is true with much Wisdom literature, the actual composition of the book of Job as we have it is hard to date with precision. It is possible that the book, or perhaps parts of the book, existed outside Israel for a long time as oral tradition or perhaps even in written form until an unknown Israelite author under divine inspiration gave it its present literary form. This would account for the non-Israelite flavor of the book as well as for its unquestioned place in the Hebrew canon.

It seems likely that Job himself lived in the second millennium B.C. (2000 to 1000 B.C.) and shared a tradition not far removed from that of the Hebrew patriarchs. Job's longevity of 140 years, his position as a man whose wealth was measured in cattle and who acted as priest for his family, and the picture of roving Sabean and Chaldean tribesmen fit the second millennium better than the first. The book, however, may not have reached its final form until the first millennium. Anywhere in the OT biblical period is a possible date, though attempts to place its time of writing as late as the second or first century B.C. have been dealt a decisive blow by the discovery of parts of a Targum of Job among the Dead Sea scrolls.

The exact place of origin is as difficult to determine as the exact date. The book shows considerable Aramaic flavor, suggesting that Job and his friends lived near centers of Aramaic influence. At the end of the second millennium, some Aramean tribes moved south and settled on the borders of Babylonia and Palestine, but they continued to control the caravan route through the Khabur River area. This was when Aleppo and Damascus became Aramean centers and when the Chaldean tribes invaded Babylonia.

Job himself lived in the land of Uz (1:1). Genesis 10:23 ties Uz with the Arameans, as does Ge 22:20–22. The latter passage also ties in Kesed (the Chaldeans) with the Arameans and the Uzites but does not make them identical. These passages refer to nations or tribes that were related, sometimes mainly by their proximity. The land of Uz was east of Palestine, but its precise location cannot be determined. Job had great influence in an unnamed town (29:7). According to La 4:21, Edom was in the land of Uz. It seems then that Uz was the name of a region east of Palestine, including the Edomites and adjacent tribes.

4. Purpose

The purpose of the book of Job cannot be reduced to a single simple statement. The author appears to have had a multifaceted purpose under the general theme of wisdom teaching about God and human suffering. The various parts of the book speak with somewhat different purposes in mind. The Prologue teaches the wisdom of one's total submission to the will of the Creator. The readers view the drama from the divine perspective where they learn of God's secret purpose to expose the falsehood of the Accuser and to prove Job's faith. The Dialogue, on the other hand, gives the human perspective. Job knows nothing of what transpired in the heavenly council. The author's purpose is to teach the believing community some profound lessons positively and negatively about honesty and reality in our relationship with God and about a person's limited knowledge of the divine purposes.

The author of the Job intends to show how the theological position of Job's friends represents a shallow and only partial observation of life; i.e., human suffering is always in proportion to one's sins. Overall there is no studied attempt to justify God with regard to the suffering of the innocent. But the author finally demonstrates that God does not abandon the sufferer but communicates with him at the proper time.

Another subsidiary purpose of the book is to show that though human beings are often sinful, weak, and ignorant, they can, like Job, be relatively pure and upright even when in the midst of physical distress, emotional turmoil, and spiritual testing. The divine speeches demonstrate to Job that God is Creator and Sustainer of all things and yet is willing to communicate with Job as his friend and not his enemy, as Job had imagined him to be. While this does not answer all Job's questions, it is really all Job needs to know.

Satan was permitted to afflict Job and then test him through the instrumentality of would-be helpers who used all the words of traditional piety. Job's major problem was this vexing question of theodicy (see above). How can God be both good and sovereign in the light of the suffering of the innocent and the prospering of the wicked? The book pursues a middle course between the concepts of an evil deity on the one hand and a limited deity on the other. But there is no attempt to give a rational or philosophical solution. The picture is the same as that given in Genesis where the Serpent (Satan), as a creature of God subject to his will, is also in rebellion. Here the Accuser bears the responsibility for Job's trouble, though he is permitted to do so by God. The problem of theodicy is left on the note that God in his omnipotence and omniscience can and does use secondary means to bring about his higher and perfect purposes. One such purpose in Job's suffering is to humiliate the Accuser, proving Job's devotion to God is pure.

Initially Job stands the test even when his wife says, "Curse God and die!" (2:9). But as his troubles multiply, Job has second thoughts; he wrestles with God, challenges God, and sinks into depths of despair, with moments of trust and confidence, only to fall again into despair. Throughout the book Job defends his own essential innocence (not sinlessness) against the view of his friends, who rarely move from the single theme that suffering is the immediate corollary of sin, and that because Job has grievously sinned, God has become his enemy. But Job's own view of why he is suffering is in a state of flux. So he says many unfortunate things; yet in it all he does not do what Satan said he would—he does not curse God to his face (2:5).

While the counselors make no progress in their arguments, Job gradually grows somewhat less belligerent. He appears to us to be self-righteous in his peroration (chs. 29–31), but this must be understood in its cultural context. He persistently calls for an audience with God to argue his case. He also calls for a friend in heaven to plead his cause at the divine tribunal. He is confident he will be vindicated (13:18; 19:26). The counselors consistently stand on God's side, sometimes uttering beautiful hymns; but they could not seem to move from their fallacious notion that the righteous always prosper and sinners always suffer and, conversely, that suffering proves sinfulness and prosperity proves righteousness.

Eliphaz is not quite so crass; but he still insists that though the righteous suffer a little and the unrighteous prosper a little, the righteous never come to an untimely end (4:7; 5:16–19), and the wicked—even when they prosper—are in dread of calamity (15:20–26). Bildad is convinced that Job's children died for their sins and warns Job that he will receive the same fate unless he gets right with God (8:4–6). Zophar is bent on denouncing Job as a mocker of God. Job's suffering is ample proof of his sinfulness, and repentance is his only hope (11:13–15).

Much of what Job's counselors said is theologically sound and true in the abstract, but it did not necessarily apply to Job. It is not so much what they say but what they leave out that makes their counsel so shallow. They all finally reach the conclusion that Job is obstinate and that his refusal to humble himself and repent proves he has committed sins of great enormity (but cf. Jn 9:3).

The book does not attempt to formulate a rational solution to the problem of evil, especially that aspect that tries to relate God's goodness and sovereignty to the suffering of the innocent. Although Job is exercised about God's justice, his ultimate concern is more practical than theoretical. His practical concern is not healing and restoration but his own vindication as an upright man. Job does not ask for rational answers; nor does God give such to him when he appears, though Job is finally vindicated (42:7–9). There were no heinous sins for which he was being punished. When God does rebuke Job, it is for his ignorance (38:2) and presumption while arguing his case (42:2), not for a profligate life. God is apparently telling Job in chs. 38–41 that human beings do not know enough about God's ways to make judgments concerning his justice.

In his appearance to Job, God ignores the problem of theodicy. He gives no rational explanation or excuse for Job's suffering, but Job is not crushed; he is only rebuked and then shown to be basically right while the friends are condemned for their presumptive and arrogant claim to a knowledge of God's ways (42:7). Job thus realizes that God does not need human advice to control the world and that no extreme of suffering gives one the right to question God's wisdom or justice, and on this he repents (42:2–6). On seeing the power and glory of God, Job's rebellious attitude dissolves and his resentment disappears. Job now gets what he sought for. His friends do not see him pronounced guilty; so their view of his suffering is refuted.

Job is not told why God tested him. He comes to accept God on God's own terms; and while we know the full story, Job had to walk by faith even after he was vindicated. That God never impugns Job's character proves that Satan has failed and that Job's testing has come to an end. Though he has not demanded restoration, God, having achieved his higher purpose through Job, now restores him. Job in his suffering, despite moments of weakness, surpassed in righteousness his detractors who had not suffered as he had. After all his doubts and bitterness, Job arrived at that point of spiritual maturity where he could pray for those who abused him (42:10).

The issues raised in the book are among the most profound and difficult of human existence. The answer was already on Job's lips in the Prologue when he said, "The LORD gave and the LORD has taken away; may the name of the LORD be praised" (1:21b); and "Shall we accept good from God, and not trouble?" (2:10). The truth Job learned was that God must be God and that of all values and all existence only God and his glory must ultimately prevail.

5. Major Characters

a. Job

Apart from the Bible nothing is known of Job. He was not an Israelite and showed no knowledge of the covenant between the Lord and his chosen people. Indeed, there is not in the book the slightest hint of any acquaintance with the history of the Hebrew people. There is, however, no good reason to question Job's historicity as a well-to-do patriarch who lived east of the Jordan at a time before the emergence of the Hebrews as a nation.

Job assumes two roles. The author presents him as a truly righteous man whose commitment to God is total, yet who can still struggle with God to the point of rage over the mystery of God's ways. Job does not know what the reader knows—that God honors him by testing, thus expressing his total confidence in Job. But Job must remain ignorant of this for it to be genuine. For the intended message of the book, the raging Job is just as important as the patient Job. In his suffering Job served God supremely, not as a stoic, but as a feeling man who had to come to terms with the mystery of the divine.

b. Eliphaz

Based on a variety of passages, we have good reason to believe Eliphaz was an Edomite. According to Ge 36:4, a man named Eliphaz was the firstborn of Esau, the progenitor of the Edomites, and Teman was his son (v.11). A number of prophets mention Teman as an Edomite city or district (Jer 49:7, 20; Eze 25:13; Am 1:12; Ob 8–9). Jeremiah assumes Teman was known for its wisdom. Apparently Eliphaz was the senior member since he spoke first. Throughout his speeches, at least until his final speech in ch. 22, he shows a broader spirit than the others, accepting Job as a pious man gone astray. Though failing in compassion, he alone of the three showed some consideration and respect.

c. Bildad

This non-Hebrew name is not mentioned in any other OT book. Bildad considers Job's struggle over the justice of God as blasphemy, and he uses his erudition and knowledge of ancient wisdom tradition to prove to Job that his family got what they deserved and warns him about a similar doom. Genesis 25:2, 6 provides some helpful information about his tribe, the Shuites. They were descendants of Abraham through Keturah and inhabitants of "the land of the east." Apart from a possible phonetic problem, Ge 25:3 suggests this tribe lived near Dedan, which Jeremiah locates near Tema and Buz (Jer 25:23), far from the Euphrates. Bildad's name is probably a combination of Bil (baal, "Lord") and Adad, a well-known storm god (cf. Ben-hadad, the Aramean royal name, and the names of the Edomite kings Hadad the son of Bedad (Ge 36:35) and Baal-Hanan.

d. Zophar

Zophar is from Naamah, but not the little Israelite town in the western foothills (Jos 15:41). Scholars cannot agree on either the derivation of Zophar's name nor the location of the place. But it must have been somewhere in north Arabia or Edom. Zophar was the most caustic of the counselors. His message to Job was repent or die the horrible death the wicked deserve.

e. Elihu

Elihu appears only in chs. 32–37. He has the distinction of having his father's name recorded. "Barakel the Buzite" (32:2) seems to identify Elihu as one whose father was a leading figure in a clan more closely related to Job (Uz and Buz were brothers; cf. Ge 22:21). Elihu's name means "He is my God"; it is the only name of the five characters that was used by Israelites (cf. 1Sa 1:1; 1Ch 12:20; 26:7; 27:18). The Aramaisms in Elihu's speeches fit the statement that Buz was the son of Abraham's brother Nahor, whose son Laban spoke Aramaic (Ge 31:47). Elihu gives his youth as the reason he dared not speak while the older men held forth.

EXPOSITION

I. The Prologue (1:1–2:13)

The Prologue introduces us to Job as a man of faith and shows how his fortunes on earth were directed by heavenly forces beyond his control. But its full purpose lies even deeper. It is a deliberately planned foundation on which the spiritual message of the book is based. Without this prologue the Job of the dialogues and monologues might justly be considered a man with an insufferable self-righteousness, and the reader would be left without a heavenly perspective, much as in the other theodicies of the ancient Near East. With this Prologue the purpose of the book is clarified—to show that in a world where evil is a reality, good people may appear to suffer unjustly, but that such injustice is precipitated by the Accuser and, though permitted by God, it is an expression of God's total confidence that the faith of his servant will triumph.

A. Job's Felicity (1:1–5)

1–5 Job is presented as a man who worshiped ("feared"; GK 3710) God and "shunned" (GK 6073) evil and whose life was crowned with great prosperity. Fearing the Lord and shunning evil are the controlling principles of wisdom (28:28). Although the author does not use the term wisdom (hokmah; GK 2683) here, this repeated description of Job (1:1, 8; 2:3) labels him a truly wise man. That Job was "blameless" (GK 9447) and "upright" (GK 3838) should not be construed to imply he was sinless (cf. 13:26; 14:16–17). The former, from the root "be complete," usually refers to a person's spiritual maturity and the integrity of one's inner being. The latter, meaning "straight," "right," is used in many contexts dealing with human behavior that is in line with God's ways. Together they provided an idiomatic way to describe Job's high moral character.

Job lived in Uz, a land somewhere east of Canaan on the edge of the desert (vv.1, 19). He lived in an area where farming could be carried on (v.14) but also near a town (29:7). Job's wealth is described in terms similar to those used of the patriarchs, the stress being on animals and servants. Job was greater (richer) than any of the people of the East. This shows he was a well-known sage among the easterners. According to v.5, Job, like the patriarchs, functioned as a priest for his family. He took his sacrificial obligation seriously, viewing it as expiation for sin. To Job this included even sins of the heart, for he made special offerings just in case his sons had secretly cursed God. The matter of cursing God is to be a key theme in the development of this drama.

Job was the owner of large flocks and herds of sheep, camels, oxen, and donkeys, cared for by a large number of servants (1:2–3).

B. Job Tested (1:6–2:13)

1. Satan's accusations of Job (1:6–12)

6–12 There are two scenes in heaven, each depicting the divine council (cf. 2:1–6). Each is followed by a series of events that result from the encounter between the Lord and Satan. The divine council is made up of "the sons of God" (NIV, "angels"), supernatural beings who are above human beings but created by God (Ps 8:5). The Hebrews otherwise called them the Lord's messengers (Ge 19:1; 24:7; 48:16; Ps 104:4; Mal 3:1; et al.). The Accuser (lit., "the Satan"; GK 8477) is such a being, whose business is to roam the earth as the Accuser of those committed to serving God (1Pe 5:8; Rev 12:10). Here we find him questioning Job's motive for religious devotion: "Does Job fear God for nothing?" It is not the Accuser but the Lord who initiates the testing of Job; for the Lord's statement that Job is his servant implies more than mere servitude; it means God and Job are in a covenant relationship based on solemn oaths.

As in Ge 3, God sets the stage and allows a person to be put to the test. Here the Lord uses secondary means to accomplish his purpose. That purpose is not just to test Job as an end in itself but to give him the opportunity to honor his Lord, to whom he has pledged his allegiance with a solemn oath. That allegiance becomes a significant part of the cosmic struggle between Job's adversary and the Lord. Will Job curse God or not?

Understanding this struggle is basic to understanding the book of Job as well as the whole historical-religious drama of the Bible (Ge 3:15 Ro 16:20). The Accuser insinuates that Job's allegiance is hypocritical. If only God would remove the protective hedge he has placed about Job, this "devout" servant would certainly curse God to his face. The attack is on God through Job, and the only way the Accuser can be proven false is through Job. So Satan is given limited but gradually increased access to Job—first to his possessions, then to his family, and finally to his physical well-being. But through it all, the primary purpose of Job's suffering, unknown to him, was that he should stand before other people and before angels as a trophy of the saving might of God.

2. Job's integrity in loss of family and property (1:13–22)

13–19 According to v.5 Job's custom was to make offerings for his family. The very day he made these offerings, this devastation took place. The coming of the messengers of misfortune, each on the heels of the other, all on that one fateful day, has its dramatic effect heightened by the narrator's style. We are informed, however, that it is really the work of the Accuser, this master of evil, who can and does use both the elements of nature and humankind to accomplish his purpose. Satan is a great juggler and has manifested himself as such in Paradise (Eden) and in the temptation of Jesus Christ.

20–22 Tearing one's outer garment and cropping one's hair were common gestures of violent grief in the biblical world. Such response to grief included weeping and wailing (Ps 42:3; Jn 11:33–35).

The wisdom quatrain (v.21) introduces us to the poetic parallelism found in all the speeches beginning in ch. 3. Here the attitude of Job, in contrast to that in the Dialogue, is one of supreme faith and total resignation to the sovereign will of God. Job did not understand why but believed that his trouble came from God. Job was ignorant of what had taken place in the divine council—that God allowed the Accuser to strike thus far. But Job was right, it was the Lord who had taken away. The use of secondary means does not solve the problem of evil, nor is it the purpose of the book of Job to solve this logical dilemma.

When Job said, "May the name of the LORD be praised [GK 1385]," he was using the same word that Satan used in v.11 as a euphemism with the opposite meaning ("curse"; GK 1385). The play on words stresses how the Accuser is foiled at this point. Instead of cursing God to his face, Job praised him.

Here the author, being a Hebrew, uses that special covenant name ("LORD"; GK 3378) for God. Job and his friends were not Hebrews; so they use other Hebrew epithets for God. Here in the Prologue the composer of the book carefully identifies the Job of faith and wisdom as the same Job with questions and defiance in the Dialogue and Monologue. But more important is his identification of the God of the Dialogue with the true God whom the Hebrews worshiped.

Up to this point, though deprived of family and possessions, Job did not sin with his lips (cf. 2:10) by accusing God of "wrongdoing" (GK 9524).

3. Satan's further accusations (2:1–6)

1–3 At a special time set aside for it, the Accuser again appeared with "the sons of God" and as a subordinate presented himself before the Lord. The Accuser continued to roam the earth, obviously looking for those he would take "captive to do his will" (2Ti 2:26). He lost the first round of this contest. For the third time the Lord triumphantly described Job as a unique servant (no one like him), a pure and devout man who has become even stronger as a result of the testing. "He still maintains his integrity."

As if to add a bit of irony, the Lord said to the Accuser, "You incited me against him to ruin him without any reason." The words should not be used to imply that God can somehow be stirred up to do things that are against his will. On the contrary, God suggested Job to the Accuser (1:8; 2:3) in the first place. All Job's suffering was part of the divine purpose, as God says in 38:2: "Who is this that darkens my counsel with words without knowledge?" But when God uses a secondary cause to affect the life of a human, even Satan can be said to stir him up.

The phrase "without any reason" (GK 2855, a word elsewhere translated "without cause") needs some clarification. Satan had a cause or reason for doing what he did—to discredit God; and certainly God was accomplishing his own cause or purpose. In 1:9 Satan used the same word to accuse Job of having an ulterior purpose for serving God. Now God taunts the Accuser with the counteraccusation that Satan himself is the one who wants to see injustice done. The translation of this key word as "without any reason" is good at this point. It means there was no immediate sinfulness in Job that called for punishment.

4–6 Satan did not consider his energy to have been wasted. His next move was to obtain permission to attack Job's body. With the adage "Skin for skin! A man will give all he has for his own life," Satan suggested that even Job's triumphant faith expressed in his doxology (1:21) was only a ploy by which he was purchasing his personal well-being. He was even willing to sacrifice the skin of his loved ones to save his own. If God would send his hand against Job's body (i.e., permit Satan to do so), Job's verbal piety would prove to be a sham; and he would curse God to his face. The contest was about to take on a new intensity. God placed Job in the hands of their mutual adversary but limited his power—"you must spare his life." The suffering of the innocent is a mystery that defies all human logic.

4. Job's integrity in personal suffering (2:7–10)

7–8 It is not important for us to know about Job's disease. The symptoms were many. The "painful sores" all over his body, from the soles of his feet to the tip of his head, were perhaps only the initial stage of the malady. Job speaks of other complications in 30:17, 27, 30. The Semitic root for "sores" (GK 8825) denotes fever and inflammation, but in the OT it describes diseases that have symptoms appearing on the skin (Ex 9:9; Lev 13; Dt 28:27, 35). The scratching Job did with the potsherd was because of the nature of his disease. He used this only as a counterirritant and not for the ancient practice of laceration as a sign of mourning for the dead (Dt 14:1).

9–10 Not knowing the limitation God had put on the Accuser, Job's wife at this point diagnosed the disease as incurable and recommended that he curse God and die. Job's mental anguish was certainly intensified by his wife's advice. Had he followed it, the contest would have ended with the Accuser as the victor.

Job's reply is remarkable in the compassion he showed toward his wife and in his total acceptance of God's will for his life. He might have accused his wife of blasphemy but chose to accept it as a statement of desperation. Her "talking like a foolish woman" does not refer to intellectual foolishness but to religious apostasy (as in Pss 14:1 and 53:1). To curse God was essentially a way of denying he is God. Job was willing to believe that his wife was only talking like a blasphemer. Job's wisdom, on the other hand, was to receive with meekness whatever prosperity or disaster God might send. Such wisdom was not rooted in his intellectual capacity but in his fear (worship) of God.

Now the author repeats practically the same testimony of Job's verbal innocence given in 1:21. Despite all that has happened to him, up to this point Job did not err with his lips. This section of the Prologue provides the basis of the NT description of Job as a man of perseverance (Jas 5:11).

5. The coming of the counselors (2:11–13)

11–13 It took time, possibly months, for the news to pass by word of mouth and for the three sages, friends of Job, to come (cf. 7:3). Teman, an Edomite city and a center of wisdom (Jer 49:7), is the only place of the three that can be definitely located. The friends arranged a meeting so they could join together to console Job. Shuah was the name of an eastern tribe (Ge 25:2, 6).

When the counselors join together near Job's home, they are stunned by what they see. Like the Suffering Servant of Isa 53, Job is disfigured beyond recognition, at least from a distance. The three friends had come to show grief and console Job; they may have come largely to go through the proper motions. It does not appear that they were ready for what they encountered.

The friends immediately went into a drastic form of mourning usually reserved for death or total disaster. They tore their robes of nobility, wailed, and threw dust into the air. Then they sat in silence before Job for seven days and nights. Like the elders of fallen Jerusalem in La 2:10, Job's friends sat on the ground with dust on their heads and kept silent. For one of them to speak prior to the sufferer would have been in bad taste.

II. The Dialogue–Dispute (3:1–27:23)

A. Job's Opening Lamentation (3:1–26)

The spiritual tone of Job's life changes dramatically here. The man of patience and faith sinks into a state of despondency and spiritual depression, so frequently a major problem to those who endure severe physical illness or impairment. In ch. 3 Job establishes an attitude that largely colors all that he says in the succeeding chapters. In all his many words of despair, nowhere will he come closer to cursing God to his face (cf. 2:5) than here in ch. 3. By cursing the day of his birth, he is questioning the sovereign wisdom of his Creator. At this point the drama is intense, for the Accuser, whom we will never see again, seems to have triumphed. Whether he has or not will be determined by what follows.

1–2 The words "After this" introduce the Dialogue, a major division of the book. In fact, the entire third chapter, though a part of the Dialogue, is transitional.

3–10 The way Job curses the day of his birth has two interesting features. First, he expresses a desire for the annihilation of that day, a would-be negation of God's creative act in bringing such a day into being. As God had said in Ge 1:3, "Let there be light," so Job, using the same terminology in v.4, says, "As for that day, let there be darkness" (lit. tr.). Job intends to give full vent to his feelings. He wishes that day could be so annihilated that even God would forget it. Job wants the day lost in total darkness, not even numbered anymore as a day in the calendar.

The second feature is Job's use of personification. He personifies both the night of his conception and the day he was born. That night speaks about what it has witnessed, the birth of a boy. It is more vivid to imagine the day perishing as a person than as a span of time. A barren night unable to conceive results in a literal night in which no shout of joy will be heard.

Contemporary mythology used the term "Leviathan" (GK 4293) for a monster of chaos who lived in the sea, and the Sea itself was a boisterous deity who could be aroused professionally. But to Job, a strict monotheist (31:26–28), this was simply vivid imagery, the use of proverbial language tailored to his call for the obliteration of that day. The figure may be of an awakened monster of chaos who could perhaps swallow that day or even usher in the end of days.

11–26 Job continues his pitiable complaint with a series of rhetorical questions. There is a progression in his thought. Since the day of his birth did happen (v.10), the next possibility was a stillbirth. But since he was alive, he longed for a premature death. In vv.13–19 Job conceives of death as falling into restful sleep (v.13). It is clear that he does not consider it annihilation. The dead are in a place where there is no activity, where everyone finds rest; even the wicked stop making trouble there.

In addition to the progression of thought, there is also a symmetry of ideas in these verses. Job wishes he had been a stillbirth and then imagines himself joining the great (kings, counselors, rulers) who rested in Sheol. Then in v.16 he repeats the issue and follows with a description of the small (the wicked, the weary, the captives) who also rested in Sheol. A concluding line wraps it up with the thought that the small and great are all alike in Sheol, where even the slave is freed from his master.

The last of Job's rhetorical questions comes in vv.20–23. To paraphrase: Why is light given to a man who is miserable? Why is life given to a man who has no future? His suffering is so intense both physically and mentally that death in comparison would be an exquisite pleasure, like finding hidden treasure. The very thing he dreads the most happened. It thus appears to him that the very God who had put a hedge of protection and blessing about him (1:10) subsequently hemmed him in with trouble and distress.

What does this chapter teach us? Job's attitude is certainly not normative—just the opposite. What we can see is how even a man of great faith can fall into the slough of despond. That one as great as Job should have such a struggle of faith is a source of support to those similarly afflicted, especially when viewed in the light of the rest of the book of Job. God prefers we speak with him honestly, even in our moments of deepest gloom.

B. The First Cycle of Speeches (4:1–14:22)

1. Eliphaz (4:1–5:27)

With artistic flare Eliphaz sounds the keynote for all else that he and his companions will say. Job in ch. 3 was so obviously wrong that it was not hard for Eliphaz to appear to be right. But we must keep in mind that the counselors were basically wrong, even though their words were often right (see 42:7–8).

1–11 Eliphaz, a man from Teman, an Edomite city noted as a center of wisdom (Jer 49:7), on the surface spoke as if he thought Job was basically righteous and that his sufferings were temporary. But in reality Eliphaz was not convinced of this. Later he openly agreed with the harder line against Job used by his friends (22:1–11). Eliphaz's opening statement sounds like he was truly concerned for Job's welfare but could not resist the temptation to give Job some "proper" instruction. Some compliments are offered. Job is called a "wisdom teacher"—like himself. But the compliment is followed by a warning to Job, who had instructed and strengthened those in trouble, that he must be careful lest he fail to apply to himself the lessons he taught others.

In v.6 Eliphaz affirmed that Job was basically an upright man who only needed the wisdom to see that all deserve some punishment for sin, for no one is completely pure (v.17).

According to Eliphaz, Job's faith in God and blameless conduct (1:8; 2:3) should have saved him. Verses 8–11 may be an excursus about the fate of the wicked without reference to Job, or they may reveal that he really was not all that certain about Job. Moreover, Job's experience did not support the idea that the innocent never perish. With the perspective of the Prologue, the reader has insight that proves Eliphaz's statement is shallow. But Eliphaz would also say things that were not so shallow. For example, he would admonish Job to be patient and see the disciplinary aspect of suffering (5:17–18).

12–21 At this point Eliphaz bolstered the authority of his words by an appeal to the supernatural—an eerie and hair-raising experience in which he received a divine oracle. Uncertain about what it was he saw, he claimed "a form" (GK 9454) spoke in the silence of the night.

Eliphaz went on to tell how inferior the angels are to God. More so a human being, whose body, like a house of clay, is as fragile as a moth. It is clear that Eliphaz saw mortals as almost zero in God's sight—hardly more than an insect that may perish unnoticed. Like collapsing tents people "die without wisdom." This is no mere statement about the death of the ignorant. Eliphaz is saying, "They die, and it is not by (of) wisdom." That is, there is no special purpose in it. To a God so transcendent that he does not even trust the angels, the death of a sinful person is of little consequence.

It hardly seems possible to stress too much that God is transcendent. Eliphaz, however, succeeds in taking this important truth and misapplying it. In fairness to Eliphaz, the verbs in vv.19–21 may only express possible consequences of human sinfulness, not what happens to every sinner. Eliphaz's point then is that since all deserve this, we should be patient when temporary suffering comes.

5:1–7 Eliphaz next directed his words more explicitly toward Job. There was no mediator among the holy servants of God (the angels) who would dare answer a plea from Job. Why? Because he was behaving like a fool. Fools pay no proper heed to God (Ps 14:1). Their houses are cursed, their children crushed, and their wealth depleted (cf. 1:13–19). Eliphaz was not quite explicit, but Job no doubt got the point. He was establishing a connection between moral and physical evil. Trouble does not sprout up like weeds in the field; one must sow and cultivate trouble.

The "sparks" that fly upward are literally "the sons of Resheph" (GK 1201 & 8404). This name is used seven times in the OT, mostly for flames or lightning (Dt 32:23–24; 1Ch 7:25 [proper name]; Pss 76:4; 78:48; SS 8:6; Hab 3:5). This imagery from the contemporary mythology need not imply anything about the theology of the speaker or author. Eliphaz was probably saying that human beings, like the sons of this colorful and pestering figure, stir up their own trouble or are the victims of uncontrollable natural forces such as disease, plague, and death.

8–16 Verses 9–16 are in the form a creedal hymn on the nature of God as the Lord of creation and salvation. So Eliphaz admonished Job to appeal to God who does only what is right. He punishes the unjust and delivers the lowly. This is of course exactly what Job believed, but such advice did not help him understand why he was suffering so intensely. On the contrary, since it implied he was getting just what he deserved, it only added to his confusion.

These lines are a fine example of hymn genre in OT poetry. That is why the apostle Paul could cite a line from v.13 in 1Co 3:19: "He catches the wise in their craftiness." But in Eliphaz's case, what is absolutely true is misapplied—the sick room is not the place for theological strictures that may turn out to do more harm than good. Eliphaz as a counselor is a supreme negative example. Great truths misapplied only hurt more those who are already hurting.

17–27 Eliphaz continued his lofty words with another unit of fine poetry. The purpose of his creedal poem in vv.9–16 was to show sinners (fools) how transcendent and holy God is. Sinners get what they deserve, and only the righteous have hope. It is a terrifying statement that God, because he is a holy God, hates sinners. But as a man dedicated to wisdom, Eliphaz balanced this with another poem addressed to anyone who understands God's "discipline" (GK 4592). Typical gnomic truth maintained that the correcting wounds of God were temporary—truly good people will always be rescued. The very God who injures them will heal them; they will be blessed and again enjoy the good things of life.

But in the light of Job's experiences—the loss of his family, his economic ruin, his sickness—there is a thoughtless cruelty inherent in applying the words of vv.19–26 to him. For example, if Job benefits from God's discipline, then "his children will be many"—but Job's children were dead. It is not what Eliphaz knew that is wrong; it is what he was ignorant of—God's hidden purpose—that made all his beautiful poetry and grand truth only a snare to Job. Moreover, while things he said are good even for a sufferer to contemplate—such as the disciplining aspect of suffering—even these words, we know from the Prologue, do not apply to the case in hand.

Eliphaz's patronizing attitude revealed in his closing sentence must have been galling to Job, his peer.

2. Job's reply (6:1–7:21)

1–7 The two themes of Job's speech are introduced here. In vv.1–4 Job complained against God and in vv.5–7 against the counselors. First he attempted to justify his own "impetuous" words with an appeal to his overwhelming misery brought on by the arrows of God. Then he claimed the right to bray like a donkey or bellow like an ox deprived of fodder and left to starve. Job starved for the right words that, like food (Am 8:11), could bring strength and nourishment. The food Eliphaz dished out was absolutely tasteless; worse, it turned Job's stomach. Despite his bodily misery, Job's major concern was for the needs of his spirit. If only he could hear words that would nourish his soul rather than sicken him more!

8–10 Again (cf. 3:21) Job earnestly asked God to bring an end to his suffering by bringing an end to his life—a mercy killing! He would then have some joy even in pain. He would have one consolation left before he died—that he had not denied the words of the Holy One, though he emphatically rejected the words of Eliphaz. Verses 1–10 form a unit based on a theme about the use of words: Job's words (v.3), Eliphaz's words (vv.6–7), and God's words (v.10).

11–13 Job complained that he had no reason to be patient, for he had nothing to look forward to. As a vulnerable creature made of flesh, he had no human resources left. Even his natural ability, the gifts that contributed to his success, had been driven from him. This is a reply to Eliphaz's words in 4:2–6.

14–21 Turning in despair to his friends, Job pled for kindness ("devotion"; GK 2876), even though they may have thought that he no longer feared God. Instead he found them like wadis that run dry. Verse 21 is the climax of Job's reaction to his friends' counsel. They offered no help.

22–23 Job never asked his friends for anything tangible. It was not as if they were being asked to pay a ransom to save him. The thought goes back to v.14, where he asked only for what would cost them nothing—their faithful love and kindness, despite what they thought he had done.

24–27 Job's words are a challenge and an indictment. His friends needed to be specific about his sins and be sure they were right. He insisted that they speak the truth just as he affirmed a compelling desire to speak only the truth before God. His words may have been painful, but they were honest, even though his friends treated them as wind. In his mind it was their arguments that were specious. He labeled them as men of such severe cruelty that they could have cast lots for an orphan or bartered away a friend.

28–30 Here Job softened his tone and appealed to his friends as men of compassion. He pled for justice, for a reconsideration of their indictment of him. His integrity was at stake, and that was more important to him than life itself. In v.30 Job again employed the figure of words as morsels of food. He reaffirmed the honesty of his own words and claimed for himself a discriminating taste for the truth.

7:1–2 These verses form a complaint to God: The life of a human being, so full of toil and suffering, is like hard military service, like a toiling slave longing for the shade, or like a hired person working for mere pittance.

3–10 These are the words of a chronic sufferer. There had been months of futility and nights of tossing in misery, nights that seemed to drag on endlessly. Yet almost in the same breath Job described his purposeless life as passing with incredible speed, a complaint heard on the lips of the aging or any who feel their days are numbered. In v.5 Job described one of the symptoms of his disease—scabs that crack and fester. Worse than the disease itself, Job lost all hope of being healed. He believed his only release from pain was death.

Beginning in v.7 Job addressed God directly, and this continues throughout the chapter. His words are an empirical view of the human lot on this earth. Human life is only a breath. One goes down to the grave and never returns. Death is so final—a person disappears like a cloud, and his family sees him no more.

11–21 Again Job asserted his determination to cry out in agony of spirit over the apparent injustice of God who, it seems, would not leave him alone. Even when sleep did come, he blamed God for his terrifying dreams. This brings up several theological issues. First, does the book of Job teach a lesson about God's willingness to allow for Job's rage? Job's extreme language fits his cultural setting but was a source of great offense to postbiblical Jews who sometimes felt the need to theologically correct his words. That is exactly what was done in v.20. Both an ancient scribal tradition and the LXX show the original reading of the final line to be "Have I become a burden to you?" (cf. NIV note). The present MT reads "I have become a burden to myself"—an early attempt to remove what was thought blasphemous. If Job's raging attitude was reprehensible in the eyes of later interpreters, it was accepted by God (though not desired, cf. 38:2) as part of the struggle of a man who was determined to open himself wholly to God.

Second, was Job giving a parody of Ps 8? Like the psalmist, Job asked, "What is man that you make so much of him?" The biblical answer is, of course, that humanity is the work of God's hands, created in his own image. God's purpose for the world centers around the human race, his crowning creation, to whom he gave the world. God makes much of them, for they are meant to be God's surrogates on earth. But Job, in his current condition, believed God's interest in him was only negative—as if God's only interest were to torment him for his sin, not letting him alone long enough to swallow his spittle. God even used him as a target for his arrows.

Contrary to all this, the reader knows from the Prologue that a loving God waited for that moment when Job's test would be over and the hand of the tormentor (the Accuser) would be removed. But at this moment it appears to Job that God is the tormentor. The reader knows God was using a secondary means and that Job's conception of God as tormentor was askew. The reader also knows that because God is sovereign, the problem remains logically unresolved. This age-old dilemma between divine sovereignty and divine goodness is a permanent backdrop throughout the book of Job. The dilemma is there, but it is not the purpose of this book to attempt to solve the problem.

It would be a mistake to think that Job was wrestling with a purely intellectual problem. His concern was more experiential, though he was also seeking a way to make his experience (suffering) agree with his theology (the justice of God). Job's pathetic words at the end of this chapter show that he still entertained doubts about his own blameworthiness, but they also suggest that he felt God was being unjust. These are words he would eventually regret (40:4).

3. Bildad (8:1–22)

Bildad's speech contains an important negative lesson about human nature in general and about the qualities of a good counselor. He heard Job's words with his ears, but his heart heard nothing. This truth should be viewed in the light of Job's plea for compassion in ch. 6. All people under the most ordinary circumstances need compassion; how much more Job in his extremity! Repeatedly in ch. 6 Job called himself a helpless (v.13) and despairing man (vv.14, 26) in need of the devotion of his friends. It seems almost incredible that Bildad would reply so callously. There is not only steely indifference to Job's plight but an arrogant certainty that Job's children got just what they deserved and that

Job was well on his way to the same fate. The lesson we must learn is that there are such people in the world and that they do their heartless disservice to humankind under the guise of being the special friends of God.

As he appears in the Dialogue, Job becomes a man whose frame of mind is not totally conducive to loving relationships with others. Anyone who curses the day of his birth and looks on death as preferable to life is in need of help. His three friends were there for that purpose, but Job came to view them as part of his problem rather than as those who offered therapy. Their view that people do suffer for their sins and need to be brought face-to-face with that reality was not wholly wrong. The assumption that Job was one of these is what led them astray as counselors.

The lessons we learn from Job's friends about counseling are negative, but the three are not alike. The book presents three counselors instead of one because each had his own approach and message for Job. Eliphaz began somewhat sensitive to Job's needs but eventually lost patience (ch. 22). The other two were aloof and superior. None of them was able to accept Job unconditionally. It is true that Job was a stubborn patient, but they were unable or unwilling—or both—to become involved with him. Their advice was well-meant and often accurately and artistically stated, but it succeeded in making Job even more stubborn and resistive to them. No doubt a large part of the problem was their academic commitment to a viewpoint they refused to alter, namely, that sin brings suffering and suffering is evidence of sin.

Job forced his counselors to accept or reject his contention that he was not suffering for his sins. In 6:24 he had said, "Teach me, and I will be quiet; show me where I have been wrong." That they did not accept Job's contention made them unwilling to listen and hence miserable as counselors. Bildad could only reply, "God does not reject a blameless man" (v.20). However, had they accepted Job's contention, the book would have lost a major part of its message, a message that centers around the mystery of God's purposes in dealing with his creatures. An important lesson to be learned from the book is that counselors must be willing to listen, to become involved, and to have respect for the integrity of the human personality they are trying to help. And they must always bear in mind that they may not fully understand the nature of the case.

1–10 Bildad was blunt. "Your words are blustering wind," he said as a preface to his one and only theological point: Job's suffering was the proof of his sinfulness. Since God cannot be unjust, there is only one conclusion—Job and his family had received the punishment they deserved. Job should plead for mercy. Then, if he deserved it, God would restore him. Bildad failed to see that mercy implies the forgiveness one receives even though one does not deserve it. Eliphaz had appealed to revelation; Bildad appealed to tradition. To Bildad nothing less than the teachings of the ancients proved the orthodoxy of his viewpoint. If Job would only take the time to consider ancient tradition, he would find that God only does right. Sinners get just punishment, and good men are blessed with health and prosperity.

11–19 This poem on the destruction of the wicked has a literary quality similar to that demonstrated by Eliphaz in his masterly poem on the good man in 5:17–26. Those who ignore God, Bildad called "godless" (GK 2868); the word means something like our word "hypocrite."The hope of these persons is unreliable. Like a spider's web (v.14), it provides no support. The godless are like papyrus plants without water (vv.11–12) or like vines with shallow roots clinging to rocks, destined to be pulled up or left to wither and die (vv.16–18).

20–22 Bildad thought he heard Job say that God perverts justice (v.3). Job did have problems about divine justice; but he had not yet blatantly accused God of being unjust, though he came close to it (6:20). Job found it difficult—if not impossible—to understand God's justice. Although Job did not claim perfection, he considered himself a blameless man. This was also God's view of him in the Prologue (1:8; 2:3), but Bildad was sure that God had rejected Job. Since God does not reject blameless people, Job could not be one. Therefore, he must be a hypocrite. The situation, however, could be remedied: if only he would turn to God, Job's lips might laugh again.

4. Job's reply (9:1–10:22)

In these chapters Job's words move from extolling God (9:1–13)—perhaps as a display of theological acumen to impress the counselors—to blaming God. Would God ever treat him justly? He doubted it (vv.14–31). Does God mock the innocent? Job thought probably so (vv.21–24): "If it is not he, then who is it?" (v.24). These are hard words, but his question instead of a statement implies doubt. These words are followed in vv.32–35 with a yearning for someone strong enough to take up his cause with God. But in ch. 10 Job decided to plead his own cause and direct all his words to God. How could God who created him want to destroy him—and that without any formal charges?

1–24 In vv.1–13 Job intended to show that his problems were not due to gross ignorance of God's ways. Those ways are past finding out, but he knew as much about them as they did. His opening remark—"Indeed I know that this is true"—is a grudging admission that what Bildad had said contained the right theology. But he had more than Bildad's words in mind. Job immediately called to mind Eliphaz's rhetorical question in 4:17: "Can a mortal be more righteous [GK 7405] than God?" Eliphaz and Job seem to use the word "righteous" in a slightly different sense. The former is thinking of ontological superiority, whereas Job is thinking of legal vindication (i.e., innocence).

Bildad's accusations in ch. 8 turned Job's mind to the subject of legal vindication. In 8:20 Bildad had said, "Surely God does not reject a blameless man." To Bildad God's justice required punishing the guilty and blessing the innocent (see also 8:3–6). Job fervently believed that he was innocent of any sin that would warrant the kind of punishment he was enduring. But he was frustrated in his attempt to vindicate himself. God's wisdom was too profound and his power too great for Job to debate in court.

Verses 4–13 constitute a hymn in which Job describes God's awesome power. God shakes the earth from its place and makes its pillars tremble; he speaks to the sun, and it does not shine, he stretches out the heavens and treads on the waves of the sea—the creation and control of all natural forces.

Job closed the hymn with the words that Eliphaz used in 5:9: "He performs wonders that cannot be fathomed, miracles that cannot be counted." But Job was applying these words in a way opposite to how Eliphaz used them. Eliphaz was trying to show how God does what is good and right. He lifts to safety those who mourn and delivers the poor from the clutches of the powerful. But Job saw God's power as if it were amoral, a sovereign freedom, an uncontrollable power that works mysteriously to do whatever he wills so that no one can stop him and ask, "What are you doing?" (v.12). Yes, God's anger makes even the armies of Rahab (the boisterous demonic power associated with the sea; cf. Isa 51:9) cower at his feet. Job thought such a God would overwhelm him in any attempt to show his innocence. Job could only plead for mercy; even worse, Job doubted God would give him a hearing.

In vv.21–24 this God of Job's imagination was worse than morally indifferent; he even mocked the despair of the innocent and blocked the administering of justice. Since everyone gets treated the same way—the blameless and the wicked—Job threw all caution to the wind: "I have no concern for myself; I despise my own life." He added, in effect, "If God is not responsible for this, then who is?" (cf v.24).

These are words of a sick and desperate man. They are a forceful reminder to anyone who has to counsel the sick, that people who face deep trials often say irresponsible things in their struggle to understand their suffering in the light of God's compassion. Not all Job's words are wrong, but it is a mistake to try to make them all represent valid theology rather than the half-truths of a person struggling to understand. They deal with the mystery at the very heart of the book of Job: the problem of evil for which no human being has a logical explanation. So Job reasoned, as many have, that if God is sovereign, truly sovereign, he is responsible for all evil.

Job did not mention the corollary: If there is evil beyond God's control, then he is not truly sovereign. Job stressed only God's irresistible might; and it appears to him that if God held him to be guilty, there was nothing that he could do to establish his innocence. Yet he believed he was innocent and was concerned with disproving the contention of his friends that God only destroys the wicked and always cares for the righteous. Job's experience told him that sometimes God crushes the innocent for no reason at all (v.17). We who are privileged to see the drama from the divine perspective know that Job was innocent and that God did have a cause, a cause beyond the purview of Job, a cause that could not be revealed to Job at that moment.

25–35 Verses 25–31 fall together as an expression of deep despair. Job was unable to suck sweetness from a single day; there was not a glimpse of joy, not a smile, only one unending blur of suffering. Since God arbitrarily chose to treat him as a criminal, what could he do to purge himself? Even if he were able to purge himself, God would plunge him again into a slime pit so that even his clothes would detest him.

In vv.32–35 Job went back to the theme of vv.14–20. He was frustrated over the immenseness of God! What Job did not realize was that in wrestling with God he was moving in the direction of a right relationship with his Maker. If he only understood what God was doing, that would have made his suffering bearable. But as it was then, he bore a burden that was even greater than his suffering—his apparent inability to stand in God's presence as an upright and blameless man.

In v.33 Job touched on the mystery through which God would eventually provide godliness for man. He yearned for a mediator ("someone to arbitrate"; GK 3519) between himself and God. Such a person does not have to be one who stands over both God and Job in order to judge between them. As "one who argues a case," he is a negotiator who is able to bring parties together. We should not infer from this that the book of Job here is directly predictive of the NT doctrine of Christ as mediator. For one thing Job was not looking for a mediator to forgive him of his sins so that he might be received by God; Job was yearning for a mediator who could prove that he was innocent and could somehow be effective with God despite his infinite power and wisdom. But having said that, we have here a rudimentary idea that is certainly evocative of that NT concept. This idea will move on to greater ramifications in 16:20–21 and 19:26–26.

10:1–22 In ch. 10 Job continued to bewail his sorrowful condition. Life had become an unbearable burden. In his bitter anguish he determined to speak out, once again directing his words to God. He called on God, though not for healing and restoration (which, incidentally, he nowhere ever asked for); but he wanted to know again why he was suffering: "Tell me what charges you have against me" (v.2). Job could not understand how God, the Creator, who looked on his original creation and considered it good (Ge 1:31), could turn his back on the work of his hands. Had not Job dedicated his life to God, in contrast to the wicked who received God's smile? Job knew that God was not limited like human beings who have mere eyes of flesh and a certain number of years. Did God have to search out Job's faults when he knew that he was innocent? Job put God on the witness stand and plied him with questions. Job could not understand how the God who so marvelously made him in the womb could be willing to destroy him.

The NIV takes v.13 with what follows; if this is correct, then in v.13 Job was saying that God brought him into being so that he might hound him over his sin and let no offense go unpunished. Apparently Job was saying that it did not make any difference whether he was innocent or guilty, because he was full of shame and drowned in affliction anyhow. No matter how much he tried to assert his integrity, it seems that God insisted on stalking Job like a lion, showing his awesome power in wave after wave of oppression.

Poor Job, the God whom he imagined was so angry with him was not angry with him at all; but in his current state of mind, he reverted back to his original wish to have died at birth, to have been carried straight from the womb to the tomb (vv.18–19). In ch. 3 Job saw Sheol as a place where he might have found some rest from his troubles; here in ch. 10 he longed for a few days of release on earth before he had to go to that place of no return, which he envisioned as a land of gloom and deepest night.

Job had reached about as far as a human being can go into the depths of depression and despair, but it would do us well to be reminded that even the apostle of hope said in 2Co 1:8–9: "We were under great pressure, far beyond our ability to endure, so that we despaired even of life. Indeed, in our hearts we felt the sentence of death. But this happened that we might not rely on ourselves but on God, who raises the dead." In his despair Job still wrestled with God, but it was still to the living God that his cry was lifted up. An important question yet to be faced is, Did Job have any hope that transcended this life?

5. Zophar (11:1–20)

Zophar was a severe man. Like Bildad he lacked compassion and was ruthlessly judgmental. He thought Job, who was suffering to the point of despair, was getting much less than he deserved.

1–12 Zophar considered Job's words pure mockery, for he thought Job was claiming flawless doctrine and sinless perfection. Job has steadfastly maintained his innocence or blamelessness in contrast with wickedness (9:22), but he did not claim to be perfect (7:21). Though he complained bitterly of the treatment God appeared to be giving him, to this point he has not been sarcastic, nor has he mocked God or even ridiculed his friends. He has accused them of being shallow in their arguments and callous in the way they have dealt with him (6:24–27).

Zophar spoke with eloquence about God's infinitude (vv.7–8), justice, and omniscience (vv.10–11). Job needed a stiff rebuke from God because God had favored him by forgetting some of his sin, or at least had allowed Job to forget some of his sin. Either way, the words were designed to suggest the enormity of Job's sin. Zophar's only reason to believe Job had sinned to such an extent was derived from the extent of Job's suffering, which he took to be God's way of exposing secret sin. That Job would not admit it was taken to be additional evidence of his pride and hardness of heart. So Job needed to be humbled. The best way to humble him was to bring him face-to-face with the immensity of God. If the limits of the created cosmos were beyond Job's understanding (vv.7–9), how much more the mysteries of God!

In vv.10–11 Zophar touched on the omnipotence and omniscience of God who sees through the deceit of people like Job and keeps a permanent record of it. All this was designed to humble Job, but Zophar apparently doubted that it would. He then attempted heavy-handed shock treatment to get through to Job. Sharply sarcastic, Zophar labeled Job a witless, empty-headed man with as much chance to become wise as a wild donkey has to be born tame.

13–20 Job's only hope was to stretch out his hands to God and repent. This is good advice for a person who has lived a life of sinful indulgence, but to Job's ears it was pious arrogance. It was arrogant for Zophar to assume he knew why Job was suffering; he had reduced the solution of this very complex human problem to a simplistic formula—every pain has a sin behind it. Zophar erroneously suggested that if one repents and gets right with God that the struggles and troubles of life will dissolve. This common error is made by many well-meaning Christians who fail to distinguish between forensic forgiveness that cancels the guilt of sin and the immediate consequences of a profligate life, bringing trouble and distress. But we know from the Prologue that Job's troubles were not the result of a profligate life; so Zophar was wrong on both counts. Job's troubles did not come as a penalty from God; and even if they did, Job's repentance would not guarantee that life from then on would be "brighter than noonday" and that people would stop molesting him and instead "court his favor."

6. Job's reply (12:1–14:22)

There is good reason to question the chapter division in this long speech. The most natural break comes in 13:20. Job first answered his counselors (12:1–13:19), then addressed God (13:20–14:22). With patience running out, he chose to match Zophar's harshness with sarcasm—"Doubtless you are the people, and wisdom will die with you" (12:1). Job was sure he knew as much as they did and begged to differ with their view of suffering. Being comfortable themselves, they could afford to be contemptuous toward him. If only he were treated justly, Job would not be suffering the way he was. He repeated the unanswerable question: Why did God treat him so badly? Why should a man who is righteous and blameless be made a laughingstock (v.4) when sinners and idolaters go undisturbed (v.6). This is the kind of question that made them brand Job as a man whose feet were slipping (v.5).

1–25 This poem breaks neatly into three stanzas. The first (vv.4–6) states Job's problem: "Why me, God, and not those who really deserve misfortune?" In the second (vv.7–12) Job complained that the whole world was afflicted with the same apparent injustice. Why should this be when all things, including the very breath of humankind, are in God's hands? Bildad had already accused Job of attributing evildoing to God (8:3) and had appealed to the authority of past generations to prove Job was wrong. Now Job appealed to the experience of humankind and all creation to support his view that it makes no difference whether people are good or bad. God does not use morality as the basis for granting freedom from affliction. Job's counselors were so superficial that they had not yet struggled with this difficult problem. Their thoughts on the subject were simplistic. Job considered their words bland and superficial, certainly not a worthy part of the wisdom of elders. He had already accused them of serving tasteless food (i.e., thoughts; cf. 6:6–7).

In the third stanza (vv.13–25), Job expounded on God's sovereign freedom—with his power and wisdom he does whatever he wishes. Job stressed the negative use God makes of his power. God tears down what humans build, sends drought and flood, makes fools out of judges, sends priests and nobles into captivity, and deprives kings of their reason.

What Job was saying may be a mockery of the lopsidedness of Eliphaz's creedal hymn in 5:18–26, where everything good happens to the righteous. It is hardly a parody on God's wisdom since in v.13 Job ascribed wisdom to God in conjunction with his purpose and understanding. In this context Job's problem is with the counselor's wisdom, not God's. He was attempting to answer Zophar's question: "Can you fathom the mysteries of God. . . ? What can you know?" (11:7–8). He was saying that God's actions were indeed mysterious and strange. Job could not figure them out, but he knew as much about them as the others.

In other words, Job believed the mystery was profound; and he was amazed that the "sages" would be so shallow. Job saw God as so wise and powerful that he cannot be put in a box. He has sovereign freedom. Job illustrated this by drawing a word picture of the mystery of God's acts in the history of the human race. God humbles great people and nations, showing himself to be the only truly sovereign being.

13:1–27 Job continued to show his irritation at Zophar's remark about his being an inane, witless person (11:12). His friends talked about God—Job maintained he could do that as skillfully as they. He was confident that given the opportunity he could prove his case before God, for he knew their accusations were false. Despite the unfortunate things he had said earlier about God—"He would [not] give me a hearing" (9:16) but "multiply my wounds for no reason" (9:17), and "he destroys both the blameless and the wicked" (9:22)—Job still believed all this could be reconciled if only he could argue his case directly with God (v.3). But his counselors smeared him with lies. They were quacks who could show their wisdom only if they kept quiet.

Job's argument in vv.6–12 has the following interesting twist. How dare his friends argue God's case deceitfully and use lies to flatter God? Job warned them about lying even while they uttered beautiful words in defense of God. If they were going to plead God's case, they had better do it honestly. God would judge them for their deceit even if they used it in his behalf. This proves what Job believed about God. We know from the Epilogue (42:7) that Job's assessment was right. Job's friends' words about God may have been true, but they were worthless because they were empty maxims, mere clichés. Moreover, their assessment of Job was wrong. If God would have examined their lives, they would not have been able to deceive him the way they deceived other people. For their hypocritical partiality toward God and their dishonest charges against Job, God would surely punish them.

On the other hand, Job was so sure he would be vindicated that he repeated his desire for a hearing before God (vv.13–19). He viewed this boldness on his part as one of the evidences that what they said about him was not true. If Job were a hypocrite, would he be willing to put his life in jeopardy in this way? Such a man would not dare come before God. Even if slain, Job would not wait but would remain in "hope" (v. 15; GK 3498) and would defend his ways before God; he was sure God would vindicate him. Although certain that his friends' charges were false, Job did not claim sinless perfection. He admitted the sins of his youth for which he hoped he had been forgiven. Why, then, did God keep frightening him with his terrors and treating him as an enemy, indeed, as an enslaved prisoner of war whose feet were branded? He saw himself as helpless, as swirling chaff, or as a windblown leaf. If God would only stop tormenting him and communicate, Job felt all would end well.

13:28–14:22 Job's mercurial mood changed again. At the end of ch. 13 he again lost grip on his confidence and regressed to a hopeless feeling. From 13:28 to 14:6 Job mused on the misery of human beings in their pathetically brief life, uttering a brief but structured poem, designed to introduce the theme of the plight of the human race. People are impure; so they are worthy of punishment. Job, however, uttered a plea that the sovereign God, who gives to each a short span of numbered days, would let his poor creatures alone until their hard labor on earth was over. Again we must be reminded that a key factor remained a mystery to Job—the presence and power, albeit limited, of the Accuser who understandably is not mentioned at all in the dialogue.

In 14:7–22 Job turned again to death as the only way out of his impasse. A tree may be cut down and its stump appear to be dead; yet at the scent of water it springs to life and sends out new shoots. Such an observation cannot be asserted for human beings. They are more like a lake run dry. When one's lifetime runs out, it cannot be renewed. But Job suggested that God could provide a remedy by simply taking his life till his anger was over and then, by resurrection, call him back from Sheol.

This chapter proves that Job believed in the possibility of resurrection, though he saw humanity differently from the tree that can be cut down and immediately renewed. Human beings lie down and do not rise until the heavens are no more. But the assumption is that humankind will be raised. Job was saying that if God wanted to, he could hide Job in Sheol till his anger passed and then raise him. Job's pessimism arose, not from a skepticism about resurrection, but from God's apparent unwillingness to do anything immediately for him. Therefore his hopes were dashed; his life had become a nightmare of pain and mourning—with nothing to look for but death.

Job knew that eventually God would cover all his offenses, and he longed for him as the beneficent Creator who delights in those whom he has made. But despite his faith in God's power over death, Job was convinced that God would not even allow him the exquisite release of death. The waters of suffering continued to erode until his bright hope was a dim memory and nothing mattered anymore but the pain of his body and the continual mourning of his soul.

C. The Second Cycle of Speeches (15:1–21:34)

1. Eliphaz (15:1–35)

In vv.1–13, Eliphaz plied Job with questions designed to shame him into silence. Verses 14–16 form an apex about which his words hinge. They derive from his vision in 4:17–19 and here state his thesis: God's holiness versus human corruption. The remaining half of the chapter is a dramatic description of the dreadful fate of the wicked.

1–6 Eliphaz was angry. He had run out of patience. The time to be polite (4:2) and indirect was over. He considered Job's words not only valueless but deceitful and irreverent. In his opening lines he accused Job of belching out a hot wind of useless words. Worse, his mouth spoke as it did because of the sin in his heart. Job had condemned himself by his ungodly talk. Such irreligion made him a dangerous person, able to lead others astray (v.4).

7–13 Eliphaz now chided Job for arrogance. Was Job wise enough to sit in the council of God's angels? In reality he was not even wise enough to be in harmony with the elders and wise men on earth. "God's consolations" (v.11) are the gentle words Eliphaz tried to use with Job (see 4:1–6), only to receive a raging response.

14–16 Eliphaz repeated the thought that came to him by "revelation" (4:17–19)—that human beings are too vile to stand before God. The oracle had made a deep impression on him.

17–20 Eliphaz bolstered this "revelation" with wisdom that came from tradition—the wicked never escape the torment they deserve; and even if they do for a moment, trouble is just around the corner.

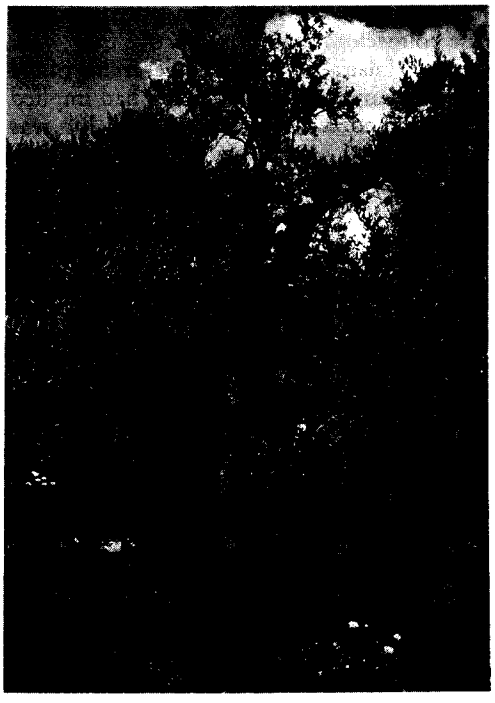
21–35 Eliphaz next presented a poetic discourse on the fate of the wicked. To the counselors Job's idea that the wicked prosper was a great heresy; his poem refutes this notion (cf. 4:17–26). He refused to believe that any wicked person prospers, except perhaps for the briefest moment. Eliphaz believed that wicked people always suffer distress and anguish. They know disaster is stored up for them. He pictured the wicked man as a quixotic figure who uselessly attacks God with full armor and thick shield. No doubt it is all a caricature of Job, whose "eyes flash" as he "vents [his] rage against God" (vv.11–12).

In vv.27–35 the caricature continues with a variety of figures—the fat, rich, wicked man who finally gets what he deserves. He is like a grapevine stripped before its fruit is ripe or an olive tree shedding its blossoms. As long as Eliphaz rejected the notion that the wicked prosper and its corollary that the innocent sometimes suffer, he would never have to wrestle over the disturbing mystery of how this fits with the justice of God. Eliphaz viewed humankind as either all good or all bad. He allowed no room for a good man to have doubts and struggles, and those who are bad Eliphaz wanted to reduce to zero.



The olive tree is often used metaphorically in the Bible. Eliphaz uses it in his caricature of the wicked (15:33).

In his query "What is man, that he could be pure?" (vv.14–16), Eliphaz's view of humanity comes through clearly. There is nothing in his words that would lead one to the conclusion that God has any love for sinful human beings. Indeed, the deity Eliphaz worshiped was mechanical; he behaved like the laws of nature, so that sinners could expect no mercy. The sinner always gets paid in full—trouble and darkness, terror and distress, the flame and the sword. God will see to it.

In describing such a fate, Eliphaz made sure that all the things that had happened to Job were included—fire consumes (vv.30, 34; cf. 1:16), marauders attack (v.21; cf. 1:17), possessions are taken away (v.29; cf. 1:17), and houses crumble (v.28; cf. 1:19). Although the modern reader often misses the point that these barbs are all directed at Job, we can be sure that Job himself felt their sting.

2. Job's reply (16:1–17:16)

In these chapters we find a direct contradiction of what the counselors have said. Job's thoughts match, by means of contrast, those of Eliphaz in ch. 15; but his opening words are an answer to the opening words of all three (cf. 8:2; 11:9–3; 15:2–6). In 15:12–13, 25–26, Eliphaz accused Job of attacking God, but Job claimed the reverse was true; God assailed him (16:8–9, 12–14). Eliphaz saw all people as vile and corrupt in God's eyes (15:14–16), but Job believed he had been upright and would be vindicated (16:15–21). Eliphaz thought the words of the wise supported him (15:17–18), but Job was convinced that there was not a word of wisdom in what he had to say (17:10–12). Because God had closed their minds to understanding (17:4), they were incapable of doing anything but scold him (16:4–5; 17:2).

1–5 Job, with purpose, chose in the word "miserable" (GK 6662) the same word that Eliphaz used to suggest Job had conceived his own misery ("trouble" in 15:35; GK 6662), and he threw it back at him when he called them "miserable comforters." He affirmed how he would have given genuine encouragement to them if the tables were turned, but all he got were arguments and scoldings. The opening words of ch. 16 are full of meaning for all who aspire to counsel others. It is a powerful negative example. The counselors had become gadflies, pestering Job who was certain that they had no understanding of his real problem.

6–14 In v.6 Job turned again to the enemy—the god his mind had created—the one who wore him out and tore him in his anger. He viewed himself as one whom God had seized by the scruff of the neck and thrown into the clutches of the wicked. God had made Job his target, an object of attack; like a warrior he pierced him without pity. The figure was no doubt suggested by Eliphaz's description of the wicked man (meaning Job) who shakes his fist at God, defiantly attacking the Almighty (15:25–26). Job saw the situation as just the reverse of that in vv.12–14. Job recognized that God could do whatever he wished, but Job was anguished by the thought that God acted like his enemy. So Job and Eliphaz were polarized in their respective views. Was God attacking Job or Job attacking God?

There was no question in Job's mind that God sent the pain—'you have devastated my entire household." So in vv.6–8 Job said that it did not make any difference whether he spoke or did not speak, his pain was still there. It wore him out and had become the major witness against him, for on it his detractors had based their arguments. To them it was proof of his sinfulness. As if that were not bad enough, he thought God had assailed him, crushed him, and turned him over to his detractors.

15–17 Here we see a pathetic figure in sackcloth, sitting with brow in the dust, eyes sunken and face bloated with tears, avowing innocence. From this sad figure arises a baneful cry, but one that has not totally lost hope, as vv.18–21 show.

16:18–17:2 Verses 18, 22, and 17:1 indicate that Job thought he would die before he could be vindicated before his peers; so he was concerned that the injustice done to him should never be forgotten. That is what he meant when he called on the earth never to cover his blood or bury his cry. In Ge 4:10–11 Abel's innocent blood was crying out to God as a witness against Cain. So Job was consoled to think his cry would continue after his death. And there is one in heaven who would listen to it. He firmly believed that he had a friend, an advocate, an intercessor on high who would plead his cause.

There are indications that Job considered this advocate to be greater than a human being. He was in heaven. In 9:33 the one "to arbitrate" was a mere wish, but he was also described as one who could put his hand on both God and Job. In 19:25 the "Redeemer" who lives must also be a heavenly figure since Job made a special point of how he would eventually stand on the earth (dust). Certainly God gave Job this hope in the midst of his darkest hours to point to the one who would ultimately fulfill it. But Job probably understood only a limited part of its fullest meaning.

3–5 What "pledge" or guarantee was Job asking for? The translation of v.3 is difficult. The following paraphrase may help clarify the meaning: "Give attention (O God) to becoming my guarantor (that I am right) with you, for who else will shake my hand to prove it?" If God put up such a guarantee for Job, it would not only silence his mockers (the counselors) but would prove they were guilty of false accusation and deserving of the sanctions and punishment they had implied Job deserved. Verse 5 is a proverb. Job was reminding his counselors of the dire consequences of slander.

6–9 Unfortunately such a guarantee from God was not evident. On the contrary, Job saw God as the one who made him suffer humiliation. There were few who believed he was innocent. Most people thought they were doing God a favor by spitting in Job's face; at least that is how Job felt. But in vv.8–9 he was saying that truly good men can pity him in his suffering without turning away from what is right. This is what his counselors could not understand. To them every pain had a sin behind it, and God could not be doing this to Job unless he deserved it. Another interpretation of vv.8–9 is that Job was being sarcastic. He was saying, "You upright men are appalled at this." He had already accused them of having contempt for sufferers like him (12:5).

10 Job was outraged at his friends' attitude, which he considered completely devoid of wisdom. The verse lends added weight to the interpretation of vv.8–9 as sarcasm.

11–16 The counselors had said that night would be turned to day for Job if only he would get right with God (cf. 11:17). In vv.12–16 Job made a parody of their advice. It is was like going to the grave with the notion that all you have to do is treat it like home where warmth and loved ones are and it will become so. No, Job's fondest desires were shattered; he had no hope but death. He closed this section as he opened it, with the despair of the grave (16:22–17:2). This despair was not quite as reprehensible as was their faulty advice.

3. Bildad (18:1–21)

Following the pattern of Eliphaz and Zophar, only Bildad's opening lines were directly addressed to Job (cf. 15:2–3 and 20:2–5 with vv.2–4 here). In the rest of the speech, with typical redundant and discursive rhetoric, he launched into a poem on the fate of the wicked. In this chapter Bildad made no attempt to admonish Job as he had done in 8:5–7, 20–22.

1–4 Bildad considered Job beside himself, a man no longer acting fully responsible. He resented Job's attitude toward them as belittling and accused Job of being irrationally self-centered. The world was going to remain the same no matter how much Job ranted against the order of things.

5–21 Bildad felt Job did not really understand the doctrine of retribution. He probably considered Job weak on this subject because Job kept harping on how the righteous suffer and the wicked prosper. Bildad's concern was to establish in Job's mind the absolute certainty that every wicked person gets paid in full, in this life, for his or her wicked deeds. He said nothing of a final judgment but was sure the lamp of the wicked would be snuffed out. As their step weakens, they are trapped and devoured. "Terrors startle him on every side and dog his every step." Death is part of the punishment, not a dividing line after which punishment comes. The only after-death retribution for Bildad was having one's memory (name) cut off, with no offspring or survivors. Death is personified in vv.13–14.

4. Job's reply (19:1–29)

The chapter divides into four logical stanzas. In the first Job shows increasing irritation over his counselors' shameless attacks and his impatience with their superior claims (vv.2–5). Then follow Job's feeling of abandonment by God and his perception that God's attack on him is wrong (vv.6–12). Then he blames God for alienating his kinsmen and household, even his wife (vv.13–20). In vv.21–27 he ends this lament, to our amazement, with a triumphant expression of faith in the one who will ultimately champion his cause and vindicate him (vv.23–27). This stanza is bracketed by words to his friends whom Job does not believe will ever have pity (v.21). So he warns them of the dire consequences of their false accusations (vv.28–29).

1–12 Verse 4 literally reads "my error lives [remains] with me." Job implied his friends had no right to interfere, no right to behave as if they were God (cf. v.22).

Job's words in v.6—"God has wronged me"—are the very thoughts that elicited Bildad's retort, "Does God pervert justice?" (8:3), and later Elihu's words, "It is unthinkable that God would do wrong, that the Almighty would pervert justice" (34:12). The only way to handle Job's words is that it was Job's faulty perception that caused him to perceive things in this way. He did not know God's plan (42:2). But even without heavenly knowledge, Job's perception was better than Bildad's, who also lacked the heavenly knowledge that it was God who was permitting the Accuser to strike Job.

In a sense the Accuser was acting as the hand of God, for he had said to God, "But stretch out your hand and strike his flesh" (2:5). And God had replied, "Very well, then, he is in your hands" (2:6). So Job was not totally wrong when he said, "The hand of God has struck me" (19:21). Bildad could not begin to appreciate Job's predicament. And because he had reduced God and his actions to an impersonal formula, Bildad was incapable of showing any mercy toward Job.

In Job's mind God was at war with him. God's troops laid siege as if Job were a fortified city; but, alas, he was only a tent. In a series of largely military images, the tension of Job's lament rises with each succeeding verse; but the chronological sequence is in reverse of the way it really happened. In v.8 his paths are blocked or walled up, that is, he is taken in captivity. In v.9 he suffers royal dethronement—stripped of his honor and crown as a defeated king (see his words in 29:14, where Job claimed righteousness and justice as his robe and turban). In v.10 he is torn down (like a wall) and uprooted (like a tree, more drastic than the figure in 14:7). And finally in vv.11–12 God's troops advance and build a siege ramp against him. Reverse this order and you have a step-by-step description of what happened in siege warfare.

13–19 Leaving this compelling figure, Job spoke quite literally of how his family and friends had turned against him. In any society nothing hurts more than rejection by one's family and friends, but what could be worse in a patriarchal society than to have children ridicule the patriarch?

20 What does escaping with only the skin of one's teeth mean? The NIV suggests that only Job's gums were left unaffected by his ailment. The KJV made a literal translation of it and thereby created an idiom for a narrow escape. But is Job talking about a narrow escape here?

Up to this point Job had come to the conclusion that he was soon to die (10:20; 16:22–17:1). His experience created in him a sense of amoral chaos in the world and in his life. His sense of being crushed caused him to look repeatedly toward death as a kind of hopeless release (14:18–22; 16:11–16). He knew he was innocent and sought above all else to be vindicated. His compassionless counselors had reiterated their impersonal theology that declared him guilty. He felt that God was angry with him and had become the enemy who attacked and crushed him. He perceived that he was alone in a cruel and amoral world. There was no one left who understood, no one to plead his cause or bear witness to his innocence. And this was what he wanted most of all, not release, not retribution, but only justice, someone to vindicate him.

In two earlier chapters (9; 16) where he expressed deep bitterness toward God, Job also touched on this same "Advocate" theme. In ch. 9 it was only a desire—"If only there were someone to arbitrate between us" (9:33). But in chs. 16 and 19 it becomes a firm conviction—"my witness is in heaven" (16:19) and "I know that my Redeemer lives" (19:25). As in 13:15, here in ch. 19 this hope extends to include Job himself as a participant in the process of vindication—"I myself will see him on my side" (v.27).

21 Deserted by loved ones, Job needed radical friendship, not theological banter. This was not the first time Job called for pity (cf. 6:14). It is necessary to feel with Job his sense of total desertion if we are to understand the passage. It is within this context that he turned to God in vv.25–26.

22 Job's appeal failed. He thought his counselors had joined forces with God as "the hound of heaven" to sniff him out and to be in on the kill (cf. 16:9). Although Job's perception of God may have been wrong (not understanding the role of Satan, the Accuser), his perception of them was correct. They had presumed to take on themselves the role of divine judicial authority (e.g., see 15:11a, where Eliphaz assumed his words were God's words). As part of the "Chase" metaphor, in v.22b Job included a typical Semitic idiom for slander—they devour his flesh.

23–24 These words arise from Job's desire to defend his integrity. Believing that he was at the point of death, Job felt he had nothing to lose by speaking out (7:7–11; 10:1; 13:3, 13–28; 16:18). But they are also a direct response to Bildad's taunt in 18:17, suggesting Job would be permanently forgotten (cf. Pr 10:7). With no hope left of proving his righteousness, Job looked to the future, leaving his case with posterity (Ps 102:18). His wish to inscribe his words was uttered with poetic expansiveness that contemplated possible ways—in a scroll or on a rock. Whether the lead was to be used on the rock or was another medium is not clear. Permanency is the issue—inscribed forever.

25–29 Are these the only words Job wanted inscribed or did he mean all his words where he had over and over proclaimed his innocence? The conjunction that begins v.25 (not reflected in NIV) may be the word "but." This would mean that Job was leaving the thought of inscribing his words permanently to the even more favorable situation of having a living "Redeemer" who would champion his cause even after he was gone. Job's hope in the midst of despair reached a climax.

Slandered by his friends and with death imminent, Job looked to the future where his Defender waited. This time it seems as if the "Redeemer" is God himself, for there is no mention of his Defender pleading with God (as in 9:33–35; 16:19–21).

The meaning of the word goel ("Redeemer"; GK 1457) is fundamental to understanding this passage. The word had both a criminal and a civil aspect. As "blood avenger," a goel had a responsibility to avenge the blood of a slain kinsman (Nu 35:12–28). Such a person was not seeking revenge but justice. On the civil side he was a redeemer or vindicator (cf. "kinsman-redeemer" in Ru 3–4). Here such a person had the responsibility to "buy back" and so redeem the lost inheritance of a deceased relative. This might come by purchasing from slavery or marrying his relative's widow in order to provide an heir. As such he was the defender or champion of the oppressed. A goel also delivers individuals from death, as is testified of the Lord in Ps 103:4.

Here Job had something more in mind than one who would testify to his integrity. In 16:18 he cried, "O earth, do not cover my blood." Job saw himself a murder victim. He depended on his goel to testify for him but also to set the books straight. God, who had become his enemy, would become his friend, and those who had joined in the kill would be punished (vv.28–29).

In Hebrew the emphatic position of the pronoun "I" in v.25a shows Job had a settled conviction: "I, yes I know." The words "my Redeemer [Vindicator]" indicate a personal relationship, and the word "lives" (GK 3782) must mean more than merely "alive" but implies he would continue his work of vindicating Job's integrity and avenging Job's death, as Job implied in vv.28–29.

Does "upon the dust [GK 6760]" mean "upon the earth" (NIV) or does it mean "upon my grave" (cf. NIV note)? The term refers to the grave in 7:21; 17:16; 20:11; 21:26 (cf. Ps 22:29; Isa 26:19); but it can mean "the earth," as in Job 41:33. So Job may have meant merely that the human arena here on earth is where his Vindicator would testify; but since the context is about Job's decaying body, it may be a specific reference to his grave. Are, then, vv.26–27 a reference to Job's resurrection? In 14:10–14 Job said nothing about general eschatological resurrection; but he believed in God's power to raise the dead and had a desire and hope that God would set a time and raise him. Similarly here in ch. 19,we may see a resurrection in which Job would see God with his own eyes and as his friend. While he was anticipating the doctrine of resurrection, he was not spelling out the teaching of a final resurrection for all the righteous.

Verse 26a is a most difficult line. Literally it reads "after my skin they have struck off—this!" The general meaning alludes to the ravages of Job's disease. Verse 26b is clearer. Job expected to see God. Job was convinced that even if he died, he would live again to witness his own vindication.

At the end of ch. 16 Job was obsessed with the notion that someone in heaven would stand up for him and plead his case. But here in ch. 19 he expected to witness his own vindication on earth. Indeed, his own eyes would gaze on his Vindicator. As it turned out, Job did not need the intermediary mentioned in ch. 16 because his idea that God was against him proved to be without foundation. The lesson that suffering does not show that God is alienated is one of the most enduring themes in the book. Job's feelings of alienation and the condemnation by his friends produced in him a consequent feeling of need for a Redeemer (Vindicator), which is strongly evocative of a sinner's basic need before a holy God (cf. 1Ti 2:5–6). But in Job's case, as an innocent sufferer, he finally realized that God himself would appear to him, whom he would see with his own eyes (cf. 19:27 with 42:5); then Job would learn that his God was not alienated or unconcerned but was both his Vindicator (goel) and his friend.

5. Zophar (20:1–29)

1–3 Zophar took Job's words, especially his closing words in 19:28–29, as a personal affront. Job had dared to assert that on Zophar's theory of retribution, Zophar himself was due for punishment. To him such could only happen to the wicked. Zophar was the most emotional of the three; and he was not about to let Job's rebuke go unanswered, though in ch. 19 Job had earnestly pled for a withdrawal of their charges. Here he had nothing new to say to Job but said it with passion. The speech is full of terrifying imagery.

4–11 Zophar could not abide the thought that the wicked prosper. Underneath the words lie the comfortable fact that he was a healthy and prosperous man, which, in his view, was itself proof of his goodness and righteousness. To him the joy and vigor of the wicked would always be brief and like a fantasy. Oppressing the poor is the mark of the truly wicked (vv.10, 19). On this subject Job had no quarrel with Zophar (see 31:16–23). But, of course, he denied being that kind of person.

12–19 The evil person's wicked deeds, especially robbing the poor, are tasty food that pleases the palate but turns sour in the stomach. God will force such a one to vomit up ill-gained riches. In his peroration (chs. 29–31) Job would stress his own social conscience and strongly deny Zophar's veiled accusation.

20–28 When a wicked person's belly is filled and there is nothing left for him to devour, God then vents his anger against him. The man flees from an iron weapon only to be shot in the back by a glittering bronze arrow that must be pulled out of his liver. Such attention to figurative detail is often overlooked as meaningless. On the contrary, the more eloquently it could be said, the more the ancient speaker was able to convey how deeply he felt and how sincerely he was trying to make his point. But Zophar, despite his eloquence and sincerity, had no compassion. He left no room for repentance and put all his stress on the importance of material possessions, while Job at this point was increasingly concerned over his relationship with God, no matter what happened to his body or possessions (19:23–27).

29 Like Bildad in 18:21, Zophar concluded his speech with a summary statement in which he claimed all he had said was in accord with God's judicial order for the wicked.

6. Job's reply (21:1–34)

In this closing speech of the second cycle, Job was determined to prove that he had listened to what his counselors had said. This he did by quoting or otherwise alluding to their words and then refuting them.

1–3 If the counselors could give Job no other consolation, they should have at least paid close attention to his words. Evidently he sensed that the dialogue was about to break up since he implied the other parties were not even listening.

4–6 Job was appalled at the counselors' failure to have any compassion; but if his complaint were only against them as human beings, he thought his bitterness would not be justified. His rage was based on the idea that God may be responsible. Job was terrified because he knew how awesome a task it is to complain against God. Yet in all honesty, he could find no other way out of his predicament. Job's anguish over not understanding what God was doing is proof that he was not indifferent or arrogant. It was the counselors who assumed they knew what was going on.

7–15 The counselors had elaborated on the horrible fate of the wicked (15:20–35; 18:5–21) against Job's claim that the wicked often prosper. Those who wish to know nothing of God's ways, who even consider prayer a useless exercise, flourish in all aspects of their lives. Far from dying prematurely, as Zophar said in 20:11, they live long and increase in strength. Bildad's claim that the wicked have no offspring or descendants to remember them (18:19–21) was flatly denied by Job. Job painted a word picture in vv.7–13, illustrating the domestic pleasantness and prosperity often enjoyed by godless people who dare to defy the Almighty.

16 The NIV has not caught fully the correct interpretation. The way Eliphaz used these same words in 22:17–18 helps interpret Job's words. What Job was saying was, in effect, "Look, the prosperity of the wicked is from God, despite the fact that their counsel is far from him" (cf. Ps 1:1). "Why do the wicked live on . . . increasing in power?" (v.7; emphasis mine).

17–21 Job alluded directly to Bildad's words in 18:5, with the retort "How often. . . ?" And if children have to pay for their father's sins as Eliphaz (5:4) and Zophar (20:10) said, then the wicked being evil are encouraged to say, "What do we care?" (cf. v.21). Job was disturbed at the apparent injustice of it all. He felt that immediate punishment for the wicked would be the only just procedure; but he found just the opposite in life. Again failure to understand fully God's ways had led both Job and the counselors astray; yet Job did not pretend to understand, but they did. Moreover, Job was suffering physically and emotionally, and they were not.

22–26 Job admitted that his knowledge of God's ways was defective, but it was precisely his high view of God that had created a problem. Those who do not believe in an absolutely sovereign God cannot possibly appreciate the depth of the problem Job presented. Even with all our additional revelation (Ro 8:28), we often stand in anguish over the apparent injustice and seeming cruelty of God's providence.

27–33 Job realized his counselors were going to repeat the same worn-out clichés that implied he was a wicked man. He called these clichés schemes by which they wronged him. He challenged them to investigate the total experience of people throughout the world to determine whether he was right. He was saying that it is impossible to derive a just law of retribution from what we observe in this present world. Their simplistic view was wrong, claimed Job, for all too often there is no one to denounce the wicked for what they have done, and there is no one to punish them. Contrary to the description of the wicked in chs. 8 and 20, the ungodly are often buried with the highest honors.

34 Job opened this discourse with a plea for a kind of consolation based on his counselors' quiet listening. He closed by returning to that thought with a blast at what they had offered as consolation, their answers riddled with falsehood and nonsense.

D. The Third Cycle of Speeches (22:1–26:14)

1. Eliphaz (22:1–30)

Eliphaz, the least vindictive, was provoked to agree with his friends that Job had been a very wicked man (vv.4–5). He did not even attempt to answer Job's shocking statements in ch. 21 but moved on to accuse Job of various social sins (vv.6–11) and of failing to appreciate the wonderful attributes of God, especially God's omniscience (vv.13–14) and his justice, goodness, and mercy (vv.16–18). All Eliphaz felt he could do for Job was to make a final plea for repentance (vv.21–30).

1–3 Eliphaz was here reacting to Job's notion that God allowed human wickedness to go unpunished (ch. 21), and in his reactionary mood he went to the opposite extreme of suggesting there is nothing that people can do to benefit God. This is the now familiar unbalanced stress on divine transcendence: the concept that human beings are nothing in God's eyes and that even their virtue is useless. God does not need us; it is we who need him. Since everything has its origin in God, our giving it back—even in service—does not enhance God in any way.

Verse 3 carries the thought a step further. A translation that fits well into the context might be: "Would it please the Almighty if you were vindicated? Would he gain anything if you did live a blameless life?" Two observations are in order. (1) Eliphaz did not know of God's contest with the Accuser over Job's former blameless life (chs. 1–2). The Almighty had especially chosen Job to be an instrument through whom he would gain glory and the Accuser be humiliated. (2) Eliphaz seemed so convinced of Job's wickedness—even to the point of exaggeration (v.5)—that he did not believe he could be vindicated. So in his mind Job's blamelessness was hypothetical nonsense. For Job to be vindicated would be a lie; so how could God take pleasure in that?

4–11 Verse 4 is pure irony. In 4:6 Eliphaz had been sincere about Job's "piety" (GK 3711), but here he spoke of it tongue-in-cheek. He no longer believed Job was basically a God-fearing man. Job's troubles were God's rebuke. That they were great testified to the extent of his sin. So Eliphaz felt free, perhaps obligated, to expound on the possible nature of those sins. Job's sins are described in terms of social oppression and neglect. In other words, Eliphaz felt Job had deceived himself by trusting in his ritual piety (what he had done for God) while his real sin was what he failed to do for his fellow human beings. For this God sent snares and peril, darkness and floods. These were not literal but commonly used figures of trouble and distress.

12–20 As noted, Eliphaz's tone had been more positive and sympathetic than the others, but here he threw the weight of his argument with Bildad and Zophar, though not completely. Having become convinced Job was a man who followed the path of the ungodly, Eliphaz used Job's own words to refute him. Had not Job complained that the blessing of the wicked was God's doing (21:13–16)? Eliphaz turned that around by saying that the wicked are destroyed before their time, i.e., before they can fully enjoy the good things God provides.

21–30 Eliphaz was, no doubt, sincere in this his last attempt to reach Job through a call to repentance. This call for Job to submit; to be at peace with God; to hear God's word and hide it in his heart; to return to the Almighty and forsake wickedness; to find delight in God rather than in gold; and to pray, obey, and become concerned about sinners could not be improved upon by any prophet or evangelist.

There are some problems, however, that beset these powerful words. They assume Job was an ungodly man and that his major desire was a return to health and prosperity. But Job was not ungodly, and he had already made clear his desire to see God and be his friend (19:25–27). Job's words have not always sounded friendly toward God, and Eliphaz did not have the capacity to understand the nature of Job's wrestling with God where Job expressed to God his deepest feelings of fear and his bafflement over what appeared to be an unjust and cruel providence. To Eliphaz's black-and-white mentality, those words (backed by Job's troubles) were sad proof of Job's need to repent and "get right" with God. His assumption that Job did not know how to pray aright would eventually be controverted by God himself, and Eliphaz would have to depend on Job's prayers (42:8).

2. Job's reply (23:1–24:25)

While the meaning of ch. 23 is quite clear, scholars have seen serious problems in ch. 24. In addition to the difficulties in making sense of the text, there is the issue of determining whose words these are. Since there is no agreement, it seems wiser to let the text stand and above all refuse to force modern categories of logic and rhetoric on it.

In the final verses of ch. 23, Job made his apology for his emotional language, which had been so misunderstood by his friends. He had been terrified by what he came to accept as God's plan for his life (vv. 14–16). The mystery, however, was still there. Job did not understand what God was doing. So in all honesty he still needed to speak out and call for the thick darkness to be removed (v.17).

1–2 Job was becoming less fractious. A play on words in v.2 leaves somewhat open the question of whether he was still rebellious or just bitter.

3–7 Job's spiritual movement during this dispute is evident again when we compare his attitude about a hearing with God in ch. 9 with his thoughts on the same subject here. Job still wanted a fair trial, for he was certain he was blameless, i.e., above the charges that had been made. He doubted in 9:14–20 that God would even give him a hearing and that even while pleading for mercy he would be crushed. At this point he admitted he was not totally innocent (9:15–20), though he still considered himself blameless (9:21). After Zophar's abuse in ch. 11, where he was flatly labeled a wretched sinner (11:5, 14), Job reacted with a bolder assertion of his blamelessness (13:13–15). In ch. 22 we noticed how Eliphaz, the least accusatory of the three, had moved closer to the others with his quip, "Are not your sins endless?" (22:5). So here Job reasserted his claim to be an upright man with renewed confidence that God agreed with him. This is why having an audience with God was very important to Job. He continued to be positive (13:18) about the outcome of such an encounter (23:6–7).

Our knowledge of the doctrine of justification by faith with its premise of human depravity (cf. Ro 1–3) makes it difficult for us to understand this part of the message of the book of Job. It is helpful to look on Job as illustrative of Christ, who also suffered unjustly to fulfill the purpose of God (cf. Joseph, Ge 37–50). We have seen how Job's upright life was so rooted in the fear of God that even God himself used Job as an example of godliness (1:8; 2:3). So Job was not wrong in calling for his own vindication (Pss 17:2–3; 26:1–3; et al.).

8–12 Job was still frustrated, however, over the matter of finding God (cf. v.3). He could not find him (but cf. 42:5). Though he wrestled with God verbally, he had no immediate sense of God's presence nor of God's voice communicating with him. Yet in reply to Eliphaz (22:21), Job claimed to have heard God's words and treasured them in his heart.

He rejected Eliphaz's call for him to return to God (22:23), for he felt he had never turned away from God in the first place. Job did not think God was testing him as a means to purge away his sinful dross. It was rather to prove he was pure gold. Job's words have to be the words either of a terrible hypocrite or of a deeply committed believer.

13–17 The literal Hebrew expression in v.13 is a monotheistic affirmation: "He [God] is the unique [one]." Job's God was the same as Israel's God—he is the only one; there is no other (Dt 6:4). As the all-powerful sovereign Deity, God did what he pleased. Job's fear (vv.15–16) was the necessary corollary to the truth that God was sovereign and therefore could not be put in a box and be told what he could and could not do by human beings. What might this God who does what he pleases have had in mind for Job? A real part of the living faith Job expressed in vv.8–12 was his determination not to be silenced despite the darkness he felt over the intention of God, who had no one to answer to for his behavior.

24:1 Job now expressed the mood that dominates in this chapter—a complaint on why God did not set straight the balance of justice. Job felt God should demonstrate his justice by openly punishing the wicked. In the divine speeches God would teach him a tremendous lesson about this, which he did not now understand: The principle of retribution does not operate mechanically in this world but according to the divine will.

In this chapter Job presented a picture of a world that was still a deep enigma to him. His courageous honesty led him to expound on the mystery of how the wicked get by unpunished while they perform their evil deeds against the innocent.

2–12 The wicked are so brazen they pasture stolen flocks on stolen land. Since the orphan is without inheritance, his donkey represents all he owns. Job appreciated those ancient civil laws that protected widows and the orphans (cf. Ex 22:22). Job cited the pitiful case of the destitute who had to carry food while they themselves went hungry and had to tread the winepress while they suffered thirst. The great enigma is that all this was going on and God did nothing (cf. Ps 73:2–3; Hab 1:13; Mal 3:15).

13–17 The murderer, the adulterer, and the thief share a characteristic that is self-condemning: they all love darkness rather than the light (cf. 38:12–15; Ps 82:5).

18–24 Although these words may not sound like Job's sentiments about the wicked, Job never claimed the wicked always prosper or never come to a bad end. His problem was that God treats the good and bad alike.

25 It is strange that Job spoke as if he had just made an argument against the views of his friends rather than partially agreeing with them. After developing a series of vignettes about the deeds of the wicked and the sufferings of their victims (vv.1–17), Job finally mouthed the view of his friends about God's judgment on the wicked. Job may have been either quoting them with irony or complaining that this judgment comes piecemeal, a little here and a little there (see esp. vv.23–24).

Eventually the wicked die and are forgotten; they lack security and have their day only for a little while (22:16–18)—but where are the great days of stored-up judgment so the righteous can be sure that justice for such horrors is meted out? Job was not convinced that piecemeal judgment was truly just, since the righteous often suffered the same. There is no direct teaching of final judgment to set right the balance of justice, but there is a concept here that anticipates the teaching that God must have his day.

3. Bildad (25:1–6)

This is the last we hear from Job's three counselors. Perhaps they had exhausted their arguments.

1–3 Bildad did not bother to answer Job's recent argument. He only repeated what had already been said by Eliphaz (4:17–21; 15:14–16). Bildad wanted to show how God's power established order in the heavenly realm and that his dominion extends to all created beings.

4–6 God's majesty palls everything (moon and stars), and it reaches everywhere. So how can any person be considered righteous or pure in God's eyes? Bildad's point was that human beings are maggots in God's eyes.

Eliphaz was the first to question the possibility of anyone's purity before God (4:17). In ch. 8 Bildad's words left the door open only for those who were truly blameless (8:20). Job, repeating the issue in 9:2, wanted to know how he could prove his blamelessness since God was so inaccessible. In 15:14–16 Eliphaz came very close to a nihilistic view of the human race—they are hopelessly "vile and corrupt, who drink up evil like water!" But in ch. 22 Eliphaz left the door open for Job to be restored, but not on the basis of mercy, for he must bear the penalty for whatever he has done. Then if there is repentance, Job could be restored (22:21–23). But Bildad repeated the old question of 9:2 with an implied negative answer. If God is inaccessible, it is because he is too pure; and a human being, like Job, is a hopeless worm.

4. Job's reply (26:1–14)

1–4 Bildad struck a most sensitive nerve. In all Job's speeches nothing had been more important to him than his determination to be vindicated, to be shown blameless in God's tribunal. Bildad has just labeled that impossible. Job could not restrain himself. He leveled a sarcastic reply directly at the speaker. He had nothing but contempt for Bildad's wisdom. In his colorful ironic exclamations, he considered himself powerless, feeble, and without wisdom, but not a maggot. If Bildad would only impute to him the dignity every human being deserves, he could have some compassion.

Job wanted to know who "wrote" Bildad's material. He certainly knew Bildad was mouthing Eliphaz's words (4:17). Job considered inane Bildad's argument that the majesty and power of God are the reasons why humanity cannot be righteous before him. It is proof of the poverty of his thought. It angered Job because he knew they all agreed that he was a reprobate sinner and so had given up the idea that he was an upright person temporarily suffering for sins. No, he was a worm whose case was hopeless. So Job dared to remind them that they too were hopeless as counselors.

5–6 The term translated "the dead" (GK 8327) means "shades or spirits of the dead." Here they tremble as God casts his eye on them in Sheol. But who are those that "live in the waters"? Job's earlier allusion to Sheol as "the land of gloom and deep shadow" (10:21) is like this passage. It is possible that those "beneath the waters" are those conceived of as buried in "the lowest pit, in the darkest depths" (Ps 88:6). The thrust of these verses is that there is no place hidden from God. Job's remark was an emphatic rejoinder to Bildad's statement (25:3) that the light of God shines on everyone. Even "Sheol" (see NIV note; GK 8619) and "Abaddon" (see NIV note; GK 11) provide no hiding place from the searching eye of God (cf. Pr 15:11).

7–8 The word "skies" is a justifiable insertion in v.7. Although saphon means "north" (GK 7600), the verb "spreads out" is never used of the earth but is often used in reference to the heavens (cf. 9:8). This imagery is continued by the words "over empty space." It is difficult to postulate what "empty space" might be intended by Job if he were referring to a northern region of the earth where the majestic mountains rise.

Job was pointing to God's power as incomprehensible. The heavens are visible; yet they do not fall to earth; there is no visible means of support. Even the earth itself can be said to hang on nothing. That God can spread out the heavens over empty space, hang the earth on nothing, and fill the clouds with water without their bursting is intended to make us stand in awe. Job was boldly expressing in poetic terms the marvelous and majestic power of God.

9 God uses the clouds to enshroud him in his lofty abode (Ps 104:3–13; Am 9:6). He appears in heaven in golden splendor and awesome majesty. But people can no more look at him directly than they can look at the sun (37:21–22).

10 The NIV interprets the literal Hebrew "he draws a circle" as God's establishment of the horizon, which acts as the line of demarcation between light and darkness (day and night). Job was ascribing to God, and not to the incantations and rituals of the nature cults, the authority and dominion over night and day.

11 Here the mountains are called the "pillars of the heavens" while in 9:6 they are the "pillars of the earth." They are pillars because their foundations go beneath the waters of the sea (Jnh 2:6) and reach to the clouds as if supporting the vault of the sky. The thought was common that the earth would shake at its foundations when God expressed his anger (Ps 18:7, 15; Isa 2:19, 21; et al.). Such phenomenological language was based on volcanoes and earthquakes. The force exerted by a thunderclap (Ps 77:18) is perceived as "the blast of the breath from your [God's] nostrils" (Ps 18:15).

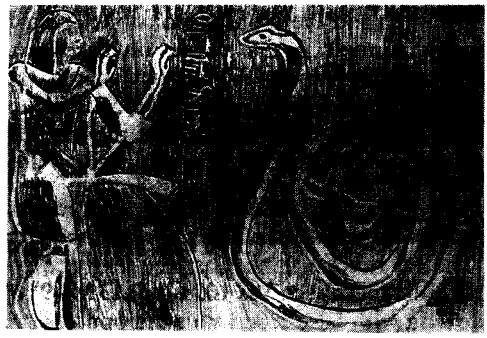
12–13 Job continued his exaltation of God as Creator and Ruler of all nature. In the process he demythologized the language of the popular myths that described creation as the overcoming of chaos. Job's intent to demythologize is quite evident. Here the sea that God subdues is not the pagan deity Yam. Job depersonalized Yam by using the definite article ("the sea"), thus expressing his innate monotheistic theology. The Akkadian hero god Marduk employed seven winds to overthrow Tiamat (the chaotic goddess of the Deep); here God's own breath clears the heavens. All the power of the wind is his breath. Further, by his own wisdom, skill, and power he "cut Rahab to pieces" and "pierced the gliding serpent," unlike the pagan Marduk who depended on the enablement of the father-gods.

A study of the OT names for the well-known Canaanite mythological sea monsters like Rahab shows how purposefully the OT authors used that language to enrich their own poetic conceptions of the supremacy of the one and only true God. This is especially true of poetry that deals with cosmological, historical, and eschatological themes (cf. Ps 89:9–10).

Making the heavens beautifully bright by his breath could be a reference to the creation account of Genesis, when God separated the light from the darkness of the initial chaos (Ge 1:2–4); but it more likely refers to the clearing of the skies after a storm. Job, then, demonstrated God's authority over the domain of Mot (the god of death) in vv.5–6 and over the domain of Baal (the cosmic storm god) in vv.7–10. And in vv.12–13 Job drew attention to God's awe-inspiring power over the domain of Yam (the stormy sea god; cf. Mt 8:23–27, where Jesus demonstrated his divine power over storms as the Son of Man).

14 For Job these manifestations and deeds are but mere shadows or whispers of the smallest part of God's might. How beautifully and humbly Job asserted the majestic omnipotence of God! But he ended the poem convinced of the mystery that surrounds that omnipotence.



The sea monster Rahab is often equated with Egypt. In Egyptian mythology, the serpent Apep (depicted here) is Ra/Re's most dangerous foe; Apep is also slain and cut up. Likewise in Job 26:12, Rahab is cut up by the Lord. Drawing by Rachel Bierling.

E. Job's Closing Disclosure (27:1–23)

The change from "Then Job replied" to "And Job continued his discourse" marks a separate discourse (ch. 27), probably as a concluding statement by Job to balance the introductory statement in ch. 3. This poem is mainly about God's just punishment of the wicked. Job opened by denying he was such, though his counselors had so labeled him.

1–6 An oath based on the existence of God was the most extreme measure available (the last resort) in Job's society for a condemned person to plead innocent. Either he was innocent, or he would suffer the divine sanctions; for if Job was a liar, he was blaspheming God. He was saying that his integrity (blamelessness, not sinlessness) was more important to him than life itself. But Job did not fear death because he spoke the truth. He knew he could swear before God without forfeiting his life. He felt God had denied him justice but inconsistently still knew that somehow God was just; so he could swear by his life.

We have little difficulty agreeing that God never does wrong—until tragedy comes into our lives. Then we may begin to ask ourselves what we have done wrong, or we may even question God's goodness. Deep down we know that neither question is right. So Job too emphatically denied either alternative. He was throwing the mystery into God's lap, as it were, and leaving it there. Here at the very heart of the problem of evil, the book of Job lays the theological foundation for an answer that Job's faith anticipates but which Job did not fully know. God, the Sovereign and therefore responsible Creator, would himself in the person of his eternal Son solve this human dilemma by bearing the penalty of the sins of humankind, thus showing himself to be both just and the justifier (vindicator) of all who trust in him (Ro 3:26).

7–10 Job's oath is followed by an imprecation against his detractors. The imprecation had a juridical function and was frequently a hyperbolic means (cf. Pss 109:6–15; 139:7–9) of dealing with false accusation and oppression. Legally the false accusations and the very crimes committed are called down on the perpetrator's head. Since the counselors had falsely accused Job of being wicked, they deserved to be punished like the wicked. They knew nothing of mercy though Job pled for it (19:21). They spoke only of God's justice and power; yet they would soon become the objects of God's mercy despite Job's imprecation, which was later changed to prayer on their behalf (42:7–9). The imprecation was a dramatic means by which Job, as a blameless man, declared himself on God's side.

11–12 Here Job added a warning and made an application directly to his "friends." He was reminding them of an issue on which they all agreed—that the wicked deserve God's wrath. But they had put Job in that category falsely. He did not have to explain to them about God's ability to set things straight.

13–23 Job expounds here eloquently the subject the counselors know so much about—the fate of the wicked—to dramatize the punishment they deserved for their false and arrogant accusation. The reference is to God in v.23, not to the storm in the preceding verse. Also, "his place" at the end of v.23 means "heaven," God's place. The verse should read: "He claps his hands against them and hisses at them from his dwelling [heaven]."

III. Interlude on Wisdom (28:1–28)

This poem stresses a typical theme: the inaccessibility of wisdom except through piety. But it appears to be more than that. No speaker is identified at the beginning of the poem, though one might assume the author meant it to be Job. Job was frustrated and unable to find a wisdom solution to the mystery behind his sufferings. The counselors had been only a hindrance. The change in style and the irenic tone may be the Hebrew author giving his judgment on the previous speeches. So the theme—"Where can you find wisdom?"—is certainly not extraneous. The poem develops the theme with skill by first concentrating on the inquisitive nature and technological ability that enable a person to find the riches of the earth no matter how difficult they are to obtain (vv.1–11). The second stanza dwells on the value of wisdom and its scarcity compared with even the greatest treasure on earth (vv.13–19). The third stanza (vv.21–28) finally addresses the question asked in the refrain. Wisdom has a source, but it is so elusive that only God knows the way to it. We can find it only when we fear God and honor him as God (v.28).

1–11 Earth's material riches have a source. The first two verses accomplish a rhetorical purpose; they set the tone without explicitly stating the theme (see comment on vv.12–14).

Verses 3–11 illustrate ancient technological ability in mining. Searching in the blackest darkness required light. This could be accomplished by cutting a shaft and letting in sunlight or by torches. The ability to cut shafts through rock is seen in the elaborate "waterworks" in cities like Jerusalem and Megiddo, long before the tunnel of Hezekiah, whose Siloam Inscription tells of the rigors of boring through hard limestone. Copper was mined in Edom and the Sinai Peninsula.

While there was no gold in Palestine, Egypt controlled rich mines in Nubia. As for iron, it was not used widely in Palestine till shortly before 1200 B.C., but there is evidence of working terrestrial iron (as opposed to meteorite iron) back to about 6000 B.C. The OT reflects Israel's lack of technical knowledge in smelting and smithing iron before the time of David. The Philistine monopoly is mentioned in 1Sa 13:19–21. Iron mining was developed on the plateau east of the Jordan Valley, and clay in the floor of the valley was used in making large bronze castings for Solomon's temple (1Ki 7:46).

Apart from the translation difficulties at the beginning of v.4, we now have knowledge of miners being lowered down deep shafts in cages or baskets. Verse 5 could be a reference to volcanic action, but there is ancient evidence of shaft mining where fire was used to split rocks and to reach ore. In their search for treasure, human beings reach paths that even a falcon's eye (one of the best in nature) cannot see. Where beasts at the top of the food chain cannot set foot, human hands touch as they lay "bare the roots of the mountain."

12–14 These verses are a refrain that states the main theme and is followed by a response. The response in v.13 is clearer when the Hebrew translated "comprehend its worth" is rendered "know its abode." Observe how as a refrain, vv.12–14 are parallel in form and meaning with vv.20–22. In v.14 "the deep" and "the sea" give the same negative response as do "Destruction" and "Death" in v.22. The thrust is that even if one were able to probe these inaccessible places, wisdom could not be found.

15–19 Here wisdom is given substance and objectivity so that the author could compare the search for it with the human search for treasures of gold, etc. Human intelligence and determination may enable people to accomplish amazing feats of technical ingenuity, but left to themselves they cannot find wisdom. The author piles up words for precious metals and stones to lay stress on how exceedingly rare and costly wisdom is. Humans may be clever, even ingenious and wealthy, but they are rarely wise.

20–22 Verses 12 and 20 are clearly the same refrain. Verses 13 and 21 give the same answer to the questions, though in different terms: v.13 stresses human ignorance of wisdom and v.21 nature's blindness to wisdom. That Destruction and Death have a rumor about wisdom probably means those who reach that place have a belated understanding they missed in life (cf. Lk 16:19–31).

23–27 The poem reaches its climax. God alone knows where the wisdom is, for he is omniscient. Human beings must search for their treasure, but God sees everything without searching. When he brought order out of the primeval chaos, he used wisdom to do it. Wisdom is the summary of the genius God used to fashion the universe (cf. Pr 3:19–20).

28 We must look to God for wisdom. To acknowledge him as God and to live within the sphere of his life-giving precepts is wisdom for us (Dt 4:5–6; Ps 111:10; Pr 8:4–9; 9:10). In the process of studying God's revelation, we will learn that the price of wisdom—perfect obedience to God—is still beyond our reach (cf. Ro 11:33). In the spirit of Job 28, the apostle Paul assures us this mystery is hidden in Christ (Eph 3:8–10; Col 2:2–3).

IV. The Monologues (29:1–42:6)

A. Job's Peroration (29:1–31:40)

Like a lawyer summing up his case, Job began his monologue with an emotional recall of his former happiness, wealth, and honor (ch. 29) and proceeded to lament, not the loss of wealth, but the loss of his dignity and God's friendship (ch. 30). He completed this trilogy with a final protestation of his innocence (ch. 31). This chapter is an oath of innocence that effectively concludes with Job's signature in 31:35. There is no more Job could say; the case rested in God's hands. Job had to be shown to be a liar and suffer the punishment he called upon himself or be vindicated.

1. His past honor and blessing (29:1–25)

Chapter 29 deals with both active and passive aspects of Job's former life. He was blessed by God and honored by other people. But he was also socially active, a benefactor and leader. His benevolence was an important part of the high position he held in his society where social righteousness was expected of every ruling elder. So a description of Job's benevolence is in the climactic position in this oration, with the key line (v.14) in the exact middle of the poem. Such benevolence established his right to the honor and blessing the surrounding verses describe. This chapter then sets the stage for ch. 30.

1–6 Job longed for the precious days when he had enjoyed God's watchful care and guidance. God had been his friend. Job had enjoyed the blessings of family and wealth. Verse 6 sums up the blessing in figurative language that reminds us of the words used to describe Israel's blessing in the land of promise—there it was "milk and honey," here "cream" and "olive oil." Job had such abundance that only hyperbole can describe it—"drenched with cream" and "streams of olive oil."

7–11 The public square was the business center, town hall, and courthouse combined. We have no idea what city this was, but any city that had a gate and public square was a major urban center. Job was a city father who occupied a prominent seat. The reaction to Job in the square is fully in keeping with his culture and times. This deference to Job from young and old, princes and nobles, shows he was a ruler (cf. 1:3). Correct protocol demanded silence until the most honored person had spoken. Hushed, with their tongues sticking to the roof of their mouths, all waited in silence for Job to speak. Verse 11 implies that he had spoken and registers the effect.

12–17 These verses are a stanza about Job's social benevolence. Verse 14 stands in its center, and the entire stanza is the climax because it presents the reason he was so honored and blessed. In these few verses Job covered a large area of the social responsibility of rulers who aspired to be godlike (Ps 68:5). Literally Job said, "I put on righteousness and it robed me," implying a veritable incarnation of righteousness.

This passage should be read as instruction, as a stimulus to our social conscience. Job responded to the poorest of the poor, gave comfort to the dying and joy to widows, assisted the blind and lame, and assumed the role of father and advocate for those who had no one else to look to. He was not just a protector but militantly opposed the wicked. Job did not concentrate on religious responsibilities but on that area where humans most often fail—in their response to the sufferings of others. Although this stanza is idealistic—Job no doubt failed in some ways—it is to be accepted, not as self-righteousness, but as an eloquent testimony to the tenor of Job's life as "a blameless and upright" man who "feared God and shunned evil" (1:1, 8; 2:3).

18–20 The man who had provided for others faced the prospect of a shortened life instead of the patriarchal ideal of 110 years with family gathered about (cf. Ge 50:22). He had hoped to flourish "like a tree planted by streams of water" (Ps 1:3) and to remain strong and virile. But was Job thinking of his family in v.18? Perhaps not. The verse reads literally: "I thought, 'With [in] my nest I will expire [die].'" Translating "nest" as "house" (GK 7860) impairs the poetic effect.

In v.20 Job reflected on his former "glory" as a warrior and hunter. His "glory remaining fresh" means his continued prowess, vehemence, and splendor with weapons.

21–25 To bring to a balanced conclusion this first of the three connected poems, Job now returned to the theme of vv.7–11. His effect on others was charismatic. People waited expectantly to drink in his words. Even his smile carried a blessing (cf. Nu 6:24–25; Ps 4:6). So in this way Job again was godlike, so much so that his counsel was valued, his approval sought, and his leadership accepted with gratitude.

2. His present dishonor and suffering (30:1–31)

The threefold use of "But now" in 30:1, 9, 16 stresses the contrast with ch. 29. Job now dwelt on the negative side of the three themes of ch. 29 in the following order: honor, blessing, and benevolence. The removal of God's blessing is far worse than affliction by other human beings; so it was put in the climactic central position.

1–10 The conceptual correspondence with 29:7–11 is striking. Notice the emphasis on the young and old (29:8) and on the chief men and nobles (29:9–10). The highest strata in society had stood hushed in respect (29:9–10) and then had spoken well (29:11) of Job. Here the lowest riffraff mocked him. Indeed, they could not be kept quiet, for he had become a byword among them. There people had commended him (29:11); here they detested him. There they had covered their mouths with their hands (29:9); here they spit in his face.

11–15 These verses begin by taking us right back to 29:20, where Job had mused on his former life as a hero with his bow ever new in his hand. But here God has unstrung his bow. Earlier Job's tribe had gathered about to hear every good word that fell from the lips of their benevolent leader. But here he was no longer leading the way like "a king among his troops" (29:25). Instead he saw himself like a city under siege (civil war?). Verses 12–14 use the terminology of siege warfare. Job thought of himself as a city with a wide, gaping breach in its wall. The stones come crashing down, and amid the rubble the instruments of siege warfare roll through. The tranquility and dignity he had so enjoyed have vanished like a cloud.

16–23 Job shifted from this sorry relationship with his fellow human beings to an even sorrier subject, the removal of God's blessing from his life. He cried out to God but got no answer. When God was his friend, it was like having a light over him in the midst of darkness (29:3). But at this time his days were full of suffering and his nights full of misery. These verses show us that Job's basic complaint still remained. It was not only God's silence but his violent treatment of Job that had become the sufferer's greatest problem. It would be no problem at all if Job's concept of God were limited. That not being the case, in Job's mind it must have been God who was responsible for all this.

The NIV translation of v.18 does not do justice to the key word it renders "becomes" (GK 2924). It can mean "to disguise oneself" ("let oneself be searched for"; cf. 1Sa 28:8). Since God is all powerful, he can do anything. He can even disguise himself as Job's clothing and bind Job's neck at the collar. But the use here is more like Ob 6, where Esau "is plundered" or "exposed." Here perhaps Job's clothing "is ripped off," and in the process he is choked by the collar of his tunic and hurled into the mud.

Job saw his problem with God as twofold: God would not answer him, and God actively afflicted him. Job's only prospect for the future was death. What was so devastating to him was not the fear of death, for he had already asked for it as a relief (6:8–10; 14:3), but that he should have to face it with God as his enemy (13:24). God's constant attack, his ruthless might, was so completely the opposite of Job's "intimate friendship" with God in those bygone days when he had still perceived that God was on his side (29:4–5).

24–31 Here Job was in the position of those poor wretches to whom his heart and strength went out in 29:12–17. As a summation of his case, he packed his argument with emotion and righteous indignation. Justice was all on his side. The very benevolence he so freely had dispensed he now looked for in vain. Verse 26 also reminds us of his expectations in 29:18–20. So here he presented himself to the court as he was, his body marred and burning with fever; he himself was exhibit A. As he often did, Job closed the stanza with a strong figure of speech (cf. 29:6, 14, 17, 25; 30:15). His "path had been drenched with cream" (cf. 29:6), now his "harp is tuned to mourning and [his] flute to the sound of wailing."

3. His negative confession and final oath (31:1–40)

We now arrive at the climax of the peroration. This chapter is a negative testament by which Job closes the matter of whether he was being punished for his sins. After such a statement, in the jurisprudence of the ancient Near East, the burden of proof fell on the court. That is why v.40 says that "the words of Job are ended." Each disavowal had to be accompanied by an oath that called for the same punishment the offense deserved on the basis of the principle of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." Since the charges against Job were wide and varied, he needed to give a similarly wide disavowal. Here he specified and called for condemnation and punishment from both God and other people if he was guilty of any of those sins.

1–4 The covenant ban on Job's eyes parallels God's all-seeing eye (v.4), and these verses enclose vv.2–3, which speak of God's judgment on the wicked whose sins he sees. The lines are an introduction to Job's catalog of oaths protesting his loyalty to God. So Job, by declaring a covenant ban on his own eyes, appropriately brought to the fore the covenant theme that underlies and gives meaning to the oaths he was about to make.

Job's making a covenant with his eyes was not merely a promise not to lust after "a girl" (GK 1435). The sin he had in mind was more fundamental, or it would not have commanded this position in the poem. Job was emphatically denying an especially insidious and widespread form of idolatry: devotion to "the maiden," i.e., the goddess of fertility. As the Venus of the Semitic world, she was variously known as the Maiden Anat in Ugaritic, Ashtoreth in preexilic Israel (Jdg 2:13; 10:6; 1Sa 7:3–4; 1Ki 11:5, 33), and Ishtar in Babylon. She is probably the Queen of Heaven in Jer 7:18 and 44:16–19. Even token worship of the sun and moon is disavowed in the middle of the poem (vv.24–34); so a disavowal of the temptation to even look at the sex goddess is rendered likely when we keep in mind that "the maiden" in Ugaritic is precisely the word used here. The Hebrews were constantly warned about this ubiquitous fertility cult (cf. Dt 16:21–22; Hos 4:14).

The covenant-ban language of v.1 was a forceful way for Job to stress his allegiance to God, and the divine sanction in vv.2–3 was equivalent to the self-imprecation in the oath format (vv.6, 8, 10, 14, 22). Indeed that is the force of the imprecations, as may be seen by the references to God's judgment in almost every case.

5–8 In Job's world there were no atheists or even secularists. Everyone believed in the validity of divine sanction. This made the oath the ultimate test of integrity. Job opened the series of oaths by clearing himself of being false and deceitful. In v.6 he mentioned commercial dishonesty and moved on to clear himself of avarice. Clearly v.7 is talking about any evil deed his hands may have done; the verb translated "defiled" (GK 1415) really means "cling to." With God's honest scales in mind, Job completed the oath with a self-imprecation that would balance the scales: May he not get any gain from what his hands may plant!

9–12 From here to v.23 Job cleared himself of social sins. The sin of adultery heads the list. Adultery was heinous because it struck at the roots of the family and clan. In the Mosaic Law it was a capital offense (Lev 20:10). Here Job's hypothetical sin calls for "eye for eye" justice—the same would happen to his wife. The moral observation that follows states that adultery was an offense punished both by human law and by the law of God. In v. 12 Job used a striking figure also found in Dt 32:22, in which fire kindled by God's wrath "burns to Sheol" and "devours the earth and its harvests." "It" refers to the sin but by metonymy means "God's wrath on the sinner."

13–15 We may truly stand amazed at Job's egalitarian spirit, for he took seriously the rights of his servants (slaves?). He did not just admit their right to have grievances but to openly express them and expect justice. Even more amazing, in terms of what we know about slavery in the OT world, Job based this right on the principle that all human beings are equal in God's sight, because he who created them all is both their Master and his, and that this Master shows no favoritism. So Job considered any act of injustice to those under him as an affront to God.

16–23 Eliphaz had already accused Job of gross sins against the poor in 22:6–9, and in 29:12–17 Job had spoken positively about the depth of his social conscience. Here he closed the issue with a series of oaths of clearance enforced by a final fierce self-imprecation. In v.16 "the desires of the poor" parallel "the eyes of the widow" and present a touching picture suggesting sensitivity to their wants beyond merely meeting basic needs for survival. In v.20 "his heart" really means "his loins." The force of the parallelism is lost unless one can feel the pathos of a shivering body thankfully warmed by Job's fleece. In v.21 the verb "I have raised" means literally "cuffing" the fatherless with impunity because of one's political power.

The breaking off of the offending arm creates a dramatic imprecation (cf. Mt 5:29–30). Verse 23 is meant to be a statement that applies to all the oaths; for it contains an absolutely necessary ingredient for such clearance oaths to have meaning—the fear of God, i.e., complete faith in his power to effect the curses. Thus such terror of God set Job to trembling.

24–28 Job began again with another firm denial of idolatry. But here the temptations are different. Instead of the appeal of the ever popular sex goddess, it is the appeal of gold and the apparent luster of two of the most commonly worshiped astral deities, the sun and moon. Job denied even secret homage to them.

29–34 Verses 31–32 can best be understood as Job's oath that his servants never complained about his lack of generosity. He had freely shared food and home with all who came his way. Despite the inconvenience, Job's servants were of one mind with him.

Job denied hypocrisy (i.e., hiding one's sins) in vv.33–34. That he admitted to sin is important to see since one might easily assume he was claiming perfection in this chapter. Reading behind the lines, one can appreciate how important an issue general knowledge of his sins might be and how great the temptation would be to maintain his public image (cf. v.21).

35–37 Job strategically brought his oration to its climax with a sudden change in tone. In 13:14–16 he was not so certain about his innocence and thought he might even put his life in jeopardy by calling for a hearing. He was now sure of his innocence, so confident of the truthfulness of these oaths that he affixed his signature and presented them as his defense with a challenge to God for a corresponding written indictment.

How does this brash attitude toward "his accuser" fit the statements accompanying the oaths about Job's fear of God's terror? This strange paradox in Job's mind that God, to whom he appealed for support, was also his adversary is the main point of the chapter. Fearing the terror of God (v.23) is meant for those who break covenant with him. Job knew he had not done this. But he could not deny the existential reality that he stood outside the sphere of covenant blessing. Something was wrong.

There was only one way Job knew to make this absurd situation intelligible. That was to appeal to his just and sovereign Lord as a vassal prince who had been falsely accused. Even though he had repeated it often, he obstinately refused to accept as final that God was his enemy. Job wanted God to reply to his defense with a list of the charges against him, so that whatever doubts were left may be publicly answered.

The opening words of the theophany (God's answer to Job in chs. 38–41) throw some light on the posture of Job in these verses. God rebuked Job's brashness (38:2–3) as a darkening of his counsel. And as for the proud prince wearing the indictment like a badge of honor, God set aside his majesty and assumed a human stance calling on Job to brace himself and prepare to wrestle with the Almighty.

38–40 These verses are clearly anticlimactic, but that does not mean they belong in another place in this chapter (cf. 3:23–26; 14:18–22). Job denied avarice. He had not eaten of the produce of his land by not paying for the labor or by cheating the tenant farmers. The second line of v.39 might mean "causing the death of the owners." In that case it is something similar to Jezebel's illegal seizure of Naboth's vineyard in 1Ki 21. That the land personified as a witness cries out and weeps over the horrible deeds done there lends support that murder as well as avarice is in mind. And that in turn is why the primeval curse on the land is invoked (cf. Ge 4:8–12).

B. Elihu Speeches (32:1–37:24)

The speeches of Elihu are skillfully woven into the fabric of the book and have a legitimate role. They give another human perspective in which we find a more balanced theology than that of the counselors. But we need not assume everything he said is normative even though he claimed a special inspiration (32:8, 18). Elihu's attack on Job was limited to his statements during the dialogue. He did not accuse Job of a wicked life for which he was being punished. So Elihu was not guilty of false accusation, and that may be reason he was not rebuked by God (42:7).

Elihu tried to be sensitive to Job but deserves some criticism for a weakness common to many—his overconfidence in his ability to do what the others could not. This makes him sound sanctimonious; but once Elihu got into his message, he seemed to improve as he went along. His poems in chs. 36–37, while at points difficult to understand, have a masterly quality similar to other great poems in the book.

Another purpose behind Elihu's speeches was to deal with Job's extreme language. Job was extreme at times (cf. 9:14–24), but it was due to his determination to be honest. He was also inconsistent. He questioned God's justice on the basis of his experience but was deeply committed to it since he laid all his hope for vindication on it. Elihu sensed this inconsistency and scored Job for wanting vindication while also accusing God of indifference to human behavior (35:2–3). Elihu assured Job that God's wisdom coupled with his power to carry out his wise purposes guaranteed that his discipline would ultimately prove redemptive (36:11–16). Despite his anger (32:2–3) and wordy lecturing style, Elihu never got bitter as did Bildad and Zophar. Nor did he stoop to false accusation about Job's earlier life (cf. Eliphaz in 22:4–11). He presented God as a merciful teacher (33:23–28; 36:22–26). Suffering is disciplinary (33:19–22), not just judgmental. The counselors glorified God with their hymns but remained cold and detached. Elihu had a warmer personal response to the greatness of God (37:1–2). He included himself as one who should be hushed in awe before God. Elihu said God reveals both his justice and his covenant love in his sovereign control of the world (37:13, 23); and this is the reason the wise of heart should worship him. That is a fitting note of introduction for the Lord's appearance.

1. Introduction (32:1–5)

1–5 Job had closed his peroration with a final flourish of bravado. He was so certain of his blameless life that he would be willing to march like a prince into the presence of God and give an account of his every step. The attempt of his friends to convince him of his sinfulness had failed. Job could have no more to say, having challenged God. The friends had no more to say because they considered him a hopeless hypocrite (22:4–5).

The book at this point introduces Elihu, a young man who in deference to age has waited with increasing impatience for the opportunity to speak. Four times in the Hebrew text we are told he was angry. First at Job for justifying himself rather than God and then at the friends because of their inability to refute Job. We are not told explicitly why or under what circumstances he was there. The Prologue says nothing of bystanders, though it implies Job sat in an open public place where the friends could see him at a distance (2:12). These verses simply imply that Elihu was among bystanders who listened to Job and his counselors.

Elihu's speeches are presented as a human reaction the apparent "self-righteousness" of Job and to the counselors' ineptitude. His concern was not that the latter falsely condemned Job but that in failing to disprove Job's claims about his blameless life they succeeded in condemning God. After all, they had claimed that God never afflicts the innocent and always punishes the wicked. Verses 4–5 reveal clearly that Elihu's major target was Job. He "waited before speaking to Job." Elihu's reply to the counselors was secondary, as is evident in his speeches.

2. The first speech: part 1 (32:6–22)

6–14 Elihu's reason for daring to intrude on ground usually reserved for sages was that wisdom comes from God—the old may lack it, the young may have it—if the Spirit of God grants it. Obviously Elihu believed he had been thus blessed. The counselors' reasoning had not impressed him. He caricatured them as groping for words and unable to handle bombastic Job. In v.13 Elihu seemed to be accusing them of using a falsely pious appeal to let God handle Job as a way out of their responsibility to refute him. But they had not made any such statement. In v.14 Elihu avowed that he would have used a different set of arguments had he been in the Dialogue with Job.

15–22 Elihu launched out on a soliloquy all about words—his words. Words have failed Job's counselors, but here he was standing by with so many words inside him that he was fairly bursting at the seams. There was no way that he could hold them back. He promised himself (and anyone listening) that he would be absolutely impartial. In usual Semitic rhetoric, he carried the matter of impartiality to an extreme. He would not even use honorific titles, something he had never learned to do skillfully for fear of God's punishment.

To us Elihu is insufferably wordy. It takes him twenty-four verses to say, "Look out! I'm going to speak." Elihu meant to be eloquent; and in his culture, wordiness was the essence. He intended to present a human viewpoint free of the acrimony that ultimately bound the thoughts of the three friends. His intention was noble.

3. The first speech: part 2 (33:1–33)

1–7 Elihu spoke directly to Job, appealing to him by name (vv.1, 31). The counselors studiously avoided even mentioning Job's name, which indicates how formal their relationship was. From ch. 12 on Job had lost all confidence in the sincerity of his friends (cf. 12:2; 13:4–5; 16:2–5; 19:2–6, 28–29; 21:3, 34; 26:1–4). Elihu was aware of this; so he opened his speech stressing his own honest intent.

Having in mind Job's earlier words to God in 13:21—"Withdraw your hand far from me, and stop frightening me with your terrors"—Elihu said that he, like Job, was only a creature of God nipped from clay; so Job needed to have no fear in marshaling arguments against him. But the words "if you can" in v.5 belie an attitude of superiority despite his attempt to allay Job's fears.

8–22 Finally Elihu began his argument. He had already shown an awareness of Job's precise wording. Now with some freedom he quoted the sufferer, picking out lines from various speeches. In 9:21 Job had claimed to be "blameless." In 10:6–7 he had complained, asking why God had to probe for sin in him when God knew he was not guilty. In 13:19 he had challenged anyone to bring charges against him, and in 13:23 he had requested God to show him his sin. We can be sure ch. 13 is referred to because 33:10b–11 are virtually identical to 13:24b and 27a.

Some of Job's words, especially out of context, sound like a claim to sinlessness (e.g., 23:10–12). Eliphaz certainly had that impression from Job's words (15:14–16). But the precise words of v.9 were not uttered by Job, and on occasion Job admitted to being a sinner (7:21; 13:26). He claimed nothing more for himself than what (unknown to him) God had already pronounced him to be (1:8; 2:3). Elihu then did not understand what was happening from the divine perspective. His defense of God was like that of the counselors, especially in their earlier speeches, but without their rancor against Job's person.

In v.12 Elihu appealed to God's transcendence as the reason Job was wrong to dispute with him. His words sound banal, for hymns have already been uttered about God's greatness (4:8–16; 9:2–13; 11:7–9; 12:13–25; 25:2–6); but his purpose is commendable. God's thoughts and purposes are beyond human ability to comprehend; so how can anyone know what God is doing? But for the moment, beginning in v.13, Elihu set aside the issue of Job's guilt or innocence and of God's transcendence (both of which he would return to) to answer Job's frequent complaint, that God would not give him a hearing (cf. 9:16, 35; 13:22; 19:7; 23:2–7).

God did communicate with humankind in various ways and often. Elihu expounded on two of these—dreams and illness. Elihu tailored the possibility of this kind of revelation to Job's case. Job had already experienced dreams and visions from God, but they had only terrified him (7:14). This was, however, just the kind of revelation Elihu thought Job needed. And Job should have interpreted this as God's instruction to keep him from ultimate destruction. Unfortunately, Elihu overlooked the real question about which Job wanted an audience with God, namely: What are the sins I am accused of?

The second way Elihu found God revealing himself is even more tailored to Job's case: "Or a man may be chastened on a bed of pain" (v.19). God's purpose in suffering is to chasten people for their own good lest they find themselves face-to-face with death. But Elihu did not make the crude claim so often on the lips of the counselors—that Job's sufferings were the proof of a wicked life.

Elihu's message is not exactly new, for Eliphaz had touched on the disciplinary aspect of suffering in 5:17–18. The subject, however, has not been broached again till now. Its emphasis by Elihu is commendable, but it is not the kind of communication from God Job has had in mind. After each description of how God communicates with humankind, Elihu ended on the theme that God does so to redeem a person's life from the pit. Elihu depicted the sufferer at the edge of the pit—exactly where Job found himself—about to go on "the journey of no return" (16:18–22). There can be no question that Elihu had in mind ch. 16 as he picked up the subject of an interceding angel.

23–30 Eliphaz was convinced that there was no heavenly mediator who would listen to Job (5:1). In 16:18–21 Job had dared to suggest that he had such a witness, an advocate in heaven who would intercede for him, pleading "as a man pleads for his friend." The life of the "hypothetical" sufferer here hangs in the balance; no mere mortal can save him. Elihu considered such an event only a possibility, and even then this heavenly mediator would be "one out of a thousand"—a rare one indeed—who might do the job. His job was first "to tell a man what is right for him." So in a sense this "angel" became a third means of revelation from God to humankind. He also provided for mercy in behalf of the suffering and even provided a ransom to save their lives. All this would happen only if people listened to the revelation and turned to God for grace. Such redeemed persons would openly admit their sin and praise God for his grace.

So Elihu had both agreed and disagreed with Job and with the counselors. He had added the element of God's mercy, a subject avoided by the counselors who constantly appealed to God's justice. Elihu felt there was a place for grace. A ransom may have to be paid, but people are restored and only then come to make their public confession. Those who have truly had a conversion experience have joyous communion with God; they are thankful and contrite.

In vv.29–30 Elihu made a case for the patience of God who will favor a person even when he or she falls away two or even three times. This should encourage Job who had not yet even experienced it once.

31–33 Unfortunately, like so many well-meaning messengers of grace, Elihu was so completely convinced of his good intentions toward Job that he became insufferably overbearing.

4. The second speech (34:1–37)

Elihu claimed he wanted Job to be cleared. It seems Elihu had repentance in mind as he called on Job "to speak up" (33:32) or else listen and learn wisdom. He saw himself as a teacher of wisdom (33:33). As he proceeded to do that in ch. 34, he believed even the wise could benefit from his chosen words (vv.2–4). Once again his method was to quote Job (vv.5–6), and his purpose was to show that Job's words were theologically unsound. Like the counselors, Elihu picked out only those words of Job that he needed to prove his point.

Elihu, however, was not in all respects like the counselors. He did not express their view of suffering. He considered suffering to be one of the ways God communicates with humankind. Unlike the counselors, Elihu did not totally condemn Job. He thought Job, through association with the wicked, had picked up some of their views (vv.8–9). Elihu accused Job of talking like a wicked person (v.36) and of being rebellious rather than submissive (v.37). But in 33:23–28 he had shown some understanding of God's free grace in dealing with human waywardness.

Elihu had a compelling desire to uphold the truth that God always does what is right (vv.10–12). While the counselors saw this only in terms of black and white, Elihu presented the sovereign Creator as one who intentionally and momentarily exercised benevolence toward all humanity (vv.13–15). Elihu was zealous to counter Job's complaint that God treats the wicked and the righteous alike, for this would mean God does evil (vv.10–30). Elihu was convinced Job needed to repent over such a rebellious notion (vv.33–37). He, like Job and the counselors, revealed no knowledge of the events in the divine council. So it appears Elihu was not an angelic messenger from God, for he had a limited perspective and presented, therefore, only a human estimate of Job's spiritual condition.

1–4 In 12:11–12 Job was sarcastic about the bad "food" the counselors had been dishing up to him under the guise of "the wisdom of the aged." Elihu here was determined to show where real wisdom lay, where food may be found that was really good. He called for all who were wise to join him in his banquet of words to find out how good they were.

5–9 The quote in v.5 is accurate. Job had used these very words about himself (cf. 12:4; 13:18; 27:2, 6); but he never labeled himself as a person "without transgression" (i.e., "guiltless"). Despite Elihu's claim in 33:32 that it would please him if Job were shown to be in the right, Elihu had already made up his mind; he was angry at Job for justifying himself rather than God (32:2). Here his anger surfaces.

In v.7 Elihu drew again from the words of Eliphaz. The latter had said Job "drinks up evil like water" (15:16) and had censured Job for venting his rage against God and shaking his fist at the Almighty and defiantly attacking him (15:25–26). Elihu did not go as far as Eliphaz in accusing Job of this, but it is enough that Job kept company with such people. Verse 9 is not a direct quote from Job. Job had imagined the wicked saying this in 21:15 and then had complained that calamity did not come very often on them (21:17). So it is only by implication that Elihu could accuse Job. His accusation was based on Job's sentiment that the righteous get the same treatment as the wicked.

10–15 Intrinsic to v.9 is the accusation that God is not just. From this point on throughout the next twenty-one verses, Elihu expounded on the theme "God only does right." Job had wailed "that those who provoke God are secure" (12:6) while one who is "righteous and blameless" is made "a laughingstock" (12:4; cf. 10:3; 21:7–8; 24:1–12). To Elihu this could mean nothing else than an accusation that God does wrong, and it is unthinkable that God would do wrong. But that does not solve the mystery. Job was probing when he questioned, "Why do the innocent suffer?" Job saw that "the fatherless child is snatched from the breast, the infant of the poor is seized for a debt" (24:9), "the murderer ... kills the poor and needy" (24:14), "but God charges no one with wrongdoing" (24:12). "No!" said Elihu, "God repays a man for what he has done." Whether Job saw it or not, Elihu insisted on that most basic truth. "It is unthinkable" that God would perpetrate evil.

Elihu's next words (v.13) get us deeper into the mystery. They infer that God is the Creator and therefore not accountable to Job. Further, in vv.14–15 he asserts a person's complete dependence on the continuing exercise of God's free grace to continue one's existence.

16–20 From all this Elihu maintains that human beings are not in a position to stand as God's judge. Without God's impartial judgment, especially on those who hold power, the world would dissolve into hopeless anarchy. Because of his omnipotence, no one can influence him as he actively governs.

21–30 Such impartial governance of the world is typified by God's punishment of the wicked rulers who disregard his ways. This justice lies behind all the order there is, and it is confirmed and guaranteed by God's omniscience as well as his omnipotence. Job had complained over the delay of justice (21:19–24:1). Elihu maintained that God does not have to set times for inquiry and judgment. His omniscience enables him to judge all the time. God hears the cry of the poor and needy and punishes the wicked openly, but it is his prerogative to remain silent if and when it pleases him. Even then he keeps his control over individuals and nations for the common good. And even then he may use the wicked to punish the wicked and so keep the godless from ruling.

31–37 Having closed his defense of God, Elihu resumed admonishing Job. He was apparently trying to show Job how untenable his position was by means of an illustration. If someone should repent after God has disciplined him, must God be subject to human wishes as he governs the world? The implied answer is "Of course not!" Elihu was certain that any wise person he might consult would agree that Job's behavior was like the wicked who multiply words against God. So Job deserved to be tested.

The illustration in vv.31–32 is probably given to shame Job for lack of contriteness. The question in v.33 could be meant to startle Job. Must God recompense him for unfair treatment? Obviously not. Again Job's sin was that he arrogantly made himself equal with God and played the part of a rebel.

5. The third speech (35:1–16)

Job had raised questions that really disturbed Elihu. In this speech he dealt with several very important issues that arose out of Job's problem about God's justice. Elihu began (vv.1–3) by showing Job how inconsistent he was to claim in one breath that God would vindicate him and then in another to complain he got no profit out of not sinning (cf. 34:9). In other words, if God is so unjust, why did Job want to be vindicated by him? Elihu had missed Job's point, that he wanted to be vindicated because he did believe God was just. Of course Job, in his struggle to understand what God was doing, had sent out two signals, one of which Elihu, like the others, had not been able to hear.

In answer to Job's inconsistency (vv.4–8), Elihu claimed it was God who got no benefit from Job whether he did right or not. God is far too transcendent for human beings to affect him by their little deeds. Job's righteousness or lack of it affected only people like himself (v.8).

Another issue grows out of that last statement and centers around Job's concern over God's apparent indifference to the cries of the oppressed (cf. 24:1–12). Elihu maintained that God is not indifferent to people, but people are indifferent to God. People want God to save them; but they are not interested in honoring him as their Creator, Deliverer, and Source of wisdom (vv.9–11). Human arrogance keeps God from responding to the empty cry for help (vv.12–13). That is why God had not answered Job. The deafness from God derived from Job's complaints, questions, and challenges that reveal the same kind of arrogance (vv.14–15). They are words without knowledge (v.16).

1–3 Job did not use these very words, but Elihu tried to reproduce two of Job's viewpoints. Job was sure he would be vindicated (cf. 13:13–19), but where did he say, "What do I gain by not sinning?" Job felt that, according to the principle of retribution, his suffering was not just. He was found guilty without charges. So to Job a desire to be cleared made sense. But Elihu could only see in Job's words the accusation that God is unjust.

4–8 The relationship between divine transcendence and human behavior was often on Job's mind. He saw God as too attentive—the Watcher of men (7:17–20)—and yet so transcendent that he could say to God, "If I have sinned, what have I done to you?" (7:20). To Elihu God was too transcendent to be either helped by righteousness or hurt by sin. This is further refined by alluding to two kinds of sin, omission and commission, which can neither deprive God nor hurt him in any way.

There was no place in Elihu's theology for doing God's will out of love for him. What we do affects our fellow human beings by being good or bad (v.8). And though God may punish or reward us as Judge, there is no place for him in the role of a Father who can be hurt or pleased by us.

9–16 Job had devoted an entire speech to the subject of God's apparent indifference to his plight (ch. 23) and the plight of all who suffer and are oppressed (ch. 24). Elihu stated the issue in v.9 and then set about to give an answer. He had already said that God's purpose in human suffering was to teach (discipline) and to warn (33:16–22). Or he may remain silent because he was using a tyrant as his instrument of punishment (34:29–30). Or he may only be restraining his wrath in hope for repentance (33:29–30). Elihu was not totally rigid in his moralistic justice since he allowed for the possibility of a mediating angel who could provide a ransom for the sinner and plead for grace (33:23–24). There is the possibility that those who cry for relief are also sinful and unwilling to bow before God as their Creator and Savior. They cry only because of physical pain and not out of spiritual hunger.

The "songs in the night" are most likely songs of praise as a result of deliverance (cf. Ps 42:8). Verse 11 refers to the capacity of the divine-image bearer (man and woman) to hear the voice of God in contrast to brute beasts. As Elihu saw it, God does not listen to the cry of people when it comes to him as the empty sound of a brute beast.

Elihu felt that failure of the suffering to see that their Maker is also the author of wisdom and joy is a sign of arrogance on their part. Job might not be wicked, but he shared this arrogance and so got no answer. Elihu seems to have been offended by the idea that Job should consider himself a litigant at God's court.

With his multiplicity of empty words, Job should not have expected to be heard. Even worse was Job's rebellious spirit—chiding God for hiding his face (13:24; 23:3; cf. v.14) and seeking to march into his presence as an impatient litigant (13:15; 31:35–37). Now, with his case before God, Job dared to complain about waiting for an answer and continued to accuse God of injustice.

6. The fourth speech (36:1–37:24)

Elihu needed a little more time to develop fully his defense of God's justice. First he presented his premise that God is mighty and firm of purpose (v.5), that he will not grant life to the wicked but always grants the rights of those who are wronged (v.6). He then proceeded to tell how that purpose is carried out (vv.6–10). No matter what life may bring, whether chains or affliction, God never takes his eyes off the righteous but uses their troubles for disciplinary instruction and to call them to repentance (vv.7–10). Responding to his call determines the course of a person's life and fate—obey and live under his blessing; disobey and die in bitter resentment (vv.11–14).

Having forsaken his condemnatory spirit (35:14–16), Elihu sought to comfort Job with the possibility of deliverance (v.15a). It was time Job saw the hand of God in his suffering. Job must understand that God was wooing him from the jaws of adversity, from slavery and oppression to freedom and comfort (vv.16–17). Verses 18–21 are a further warning to Job probably about the dangers of prosperity and of turning to evil.

In v.22 Elihu completed his theme on God's purpose in human suffering by returning to his original premise: the greatness of God's power and the uniqueness of his ways (vv.22–23). He is also the perfect teacher who makes no mistakes. Job would do well to sit at the Master's feet and learn that his hand never does wrong. Then Job would be prepared to extol God and his work (vv.24, 26). Elihu was so overwhelmed by the greatness of God that he burst forth into a hymn of praise. Its theme is the mystery of God's ways in nature. But Elihu's real purpose was to impress Job with the mystery of God's ways in providence. The two sometimes coincide (37:13).

The hymn extols the work of God in the autumnal rain. His hand distills the drops, pours out the moisture on earth, and thus provides for the needs of humankind (vv.27–28). With flashing lightning and the crash of his thunder, God ushers in the winter season with its drenching rain and driving winds, its ice and snow, so that human beings and all God's creatures see his power on display (vv.29–30).

After this hymn Elihu asked Job a series of humbling questions about the mysteries of nature (37:14–18). If Job could not understand how God performs these marvels much less assist him, how then could he understand the far less obvious mysteries of God's providence (vv.19–20).

A final lesson from nature captured Elihu's imagination. When the winter is past and the skies are swept of clouds, the sun reigns supreme, and so does God in his golden splendor (vv.21–22). With this suggestion of divine theophany, Elihu returned again to his original premise about God's power and good purpose for man (v.23) as the reason for us to worship him (v.24). When all is said and done, therefore, Elihu's speech prepares for the appearance (theophany) of God that follows.

1–4 Elihu was apologetic over the fact that he had even more to say in defense of God. The words "one perfect in knowledge" likely refer to God (cf. 37:16). Elihu would hardly claim for himself the same perfection he attributes to God. Probably Elihu was claiming to be one "perfect of utterance" because his speech derived from God, who is the source of perfect words.

5–14 Everything Elihu said from here on rests on the affirmation in v.5. God's power assures the fulfillment of his purpose. He will never grant life to the wicked but will always see that those who are afflicted receive justice. Verses 6–7 reflect God's ultimate purpose since vv.8–12 are conditional. Elihu was making room for Job's complaints about the suffering of the righteous and the prosperity of the wicked. He was also answering Job's frustration over God's surveillance. God never takes his eyes off the righteous. But to eventually enthrone them, he must discipline them for their own good.

God's unfainting purpose is to reach the hearts of people, if necessary by "cords of affliction." He makes them listen "to correction"; that is, he gets their attention and then calls for repentance. Once attention is gained, obedience leads to life and disobedience leads to death.

15–21 Elihu disapproved of Job's contention that the wicked prosper; and even though he agreed that the righteous suffer, it was only because of their waywardness, which needs correction. So there was hope for Job. He could be rescued by his suffering if he heard the voice of God wooing him away from the jaws of distress.

Verses 17–20 are a sharp rebuke of Job for being unjust and for misuse of his power and wealth. Elihu was admonishing Job to learn the lesson God was trying to teach him through his suffering. Job would someday realize his affliction was of more value to him than his wealth and all his efforts to justify himself. Verse 20 is difficult but seems to mean that Job should not long for the night when God's terrible justice will be meted out but should learn the lesson of submission, which God was teaching Job through his affliction.

22–26 In a real sense these verses are both the climax of the preceding section and the first stanza of a hymn of praise. Elihu returned to the theme he began with—the power of God. He considered God's power and wisdom as the themes Job should dwell on rather than on God's justice. The wisdom of the great Teacher assures the justice of his actions, and his power makes certain that his wise purposes will be fulfilled. God's ways derive from his sovereign freedom. This rules out one's right to question God's moral conduct. Because human beings see God's work at a great distance, they cannot understand it completely; so those who are wise will look on it with delight and praise. Elihu was here preparing the way for the theophany when Job would finally see his sovereign Lord and learn about his dominion.

27–33 The hymn continues by extolling God's great power in the elements. Having admonished Job about praising God for his work (v.24), Elihu here illustrated God's work in nature. Following the hymn Elihu closed his speech with admonitions to Job based on its contents (37:14–24).

God's greatness in his creation is demonstrated by the rain cycle. Rain was considered one of the most needed and obvious blessings of God. Condensation and precipitation, while not technically understood, were certainly observable. But evaporation is not. Elihu did not need a knowledge of physics since God is the one who does this.

The Hebrew word for "his pavilion" (v.29; GK 6109) is rendered "his canopy" in Ps 18:11, which the parallel line in the psalm clearly defines as "the dark rain clouds of the sky." "Bathing the depths of the sea" might be rendered "lights up the depths of the sea," since "to cover [bathe]" (GK 4059) with lightning is equivalent to lighting up. The NIV note on v.31 suggests "by them [the showers] he nourishes the nations" rather than "governs" (better rendered "to judge or punish"). Judging or punishing by the storm is conceivable in terms of God's use of lightning. So when the lightning performs God's purpose in striking its mark, it is against those he chooses to punish (37:13).

37:1–13 Elihu was impressed with God's voice as his word of dominion and power. By fiat he controls the snow and rain, and thunder is nothing less than the roar of his voice (cf. Ps 29). Elihu's heart pounded as God put on an awesome display of his power. The passage continues to reveal a keen observation of atmospheric conditions and their effects. The clouds are reservoirs of moisture and arenas of lightning. In their cyclonic movement they are subject to God's commands and perform his will. Elihu saw a direct relationship between God's rule over nature and his dominion over human affairs.

Verse 13 is a thematic climax that lists ways God may use the storm. Elihu wanted to do more than impress Job with God's power in nature. Thus he showed how the mystery of God's ways in nature coincide with the mystery of his ways in providence. When God's purpose is corrective, as punishment for the wicked, the storm is often connected with the deliverance of his people, thus demonstrating his covenant love (Jos 10:11; 1Sa 7:10–11; Ps 105:32–33). God may also, however, demonstrate his covenant love by sending the rain in season (Dt 11:13–17). Therefore, there appear to be three different purposes for the storm: to punish, to show his love, and for his own pleasure (cf. 38:26). Some things that God does have no other explanation than that they please him. Having arrived at this amazing point, Elihu was prepared to apply this truth to Job's situation.

14–20 The questioning format anticipates the divine method in the upcoming speeches. Job needed to stop and think of how absurd his position was. He was asked to supply knowledge he obviously did not have and was chided for his abysmal ignorance in the light of God's perfect knowledge. Sweltering in the heat of the dry season with the sky like a brazen mirror, Job sat helpless. He could do nothing about the weather but endure it. How then can a mere creature, so lacking in knowledge and strength, expect to understand God's justice? Had Job not drawn up his case, affixed his signature, and called for an audience with God?

21–24 Elihu shifted his attention from his moral application back to a contemplation of the elements. But it was only to make an even more forceful moral application. After the storm, with the clearing skies, comes the sun in its brilliance; likewise, in golden splendor and awesome majesty God comes from his heavenly abode. Elihu admonished Job that he needed to see God as God, almighty and morally perfect, and to prove he was wise in his heart by worshiping (fearing) him.

C. The Theophany (38:1–42:6)

God offers Job no theological explanation of the mystery of his suffering. The book, however, is teaching us through the divine theophany that there is something more fundamental than an intellectual solution to the mystery of innocent suffering. Job's greatest anguish was over the thought that he was separated from God. Normally sin is the reason, as the counselors perceived. But Job learned through the theophany that God had not abandoned him. And it gradually dawned on Job that without knowing why he was suffering he could face it, so long as he was assured that God was his friend. Job's past experience with God was nothing compared with the experience that he found through the theophany. Such an experience was like hearing about God compared with the joy of seeing him (42:5)—by which he meant something not literal but of the heart.

Job had the high privilege here of sitting at the feet of the Lord. He needed to learn something about the character of God by walking through all creation with him and contemplating his natural marvels. Job would be made wonderfully aware of who God is in a universe full of paradoxes for humankind and yet filled with joy and wonder. In this way Job learned to take God at his word without understanding hardly any of the mysteries of his universe, much less the reason why he was suffering.

One of the purposes of the Lord's speeches is to show that neither the counselors nor Job possessed complete knowledge. Indeed, the speeches show how very limited human knowledge is. On the surface it would appear that the speeches concentrate only on the natural world, but careful reading reveals something else. In the first speech (chs. 38–39) God's works in the natural creation are in view. Then follow two chapters of proof that Job—and we today—know little of God's world. Job then agreed that his words were based on ignorance: "I put my hand over my mouth. . . . I will say no more" (40:4–5).

The second speech begins on an entirely different note. The introduction (40:8–14) tells about God's power and ability to crush the wicked and to look on those who are proud and to humble them. The purpose goes beyond showing Job that God is creator and sustainer of the natural world. It is to convince Job that God is Lord also of the moral order, and appropriately Job's response this time was repentance (42:1–6).

1. God's first discourse (38:1–40:2)

38:1 Job saw no "golden splendor" or even the "awesome majesty" imagined by Elihu (37:22). Indeed, it seems he saw nothing but the storm from which he heard the voice of "the LORD" (GK 3378), This Israelite covenant name for God appears in the Prologue, in the Divine speeches, and in the Epilogue; but "the men of the east" (Job's friends) do not know God by this name. The reason, of course, is that those intervening chapters preserve the authentic vocabulary of that earlier generation or at least of a non-Israelite society.

2–3 How did Job "darken" (GK 3124) or obscure God's counsel? Undoubtedly this refers to the extreme language of Job during his moments of poetic rage when he struggled with concepts of a deity who was his enemy—a phantom deity, one his own mind created. Here he needed to brace himself and wrestle with God as he really was. God chose to ply Job with questions, but strangely he said nothing about Job's suffering; nor did he address the problem of theodicy. Job did not get the bill of indictment or verdict of innocence he wanted. But neither was he humiliated with a list of the sins he had committed for which he was being punished. So by implication Job's innocence was established, and later it was directly affirmed (42:7–8).

It was important for Job to know that God was not his enemy as he had imagined. This encounter with the Lord to learn the lesson that God is God was Job's assurance that all was well. Job did not learn why he was suffering; but he did learn to accept God by faith as his Creator, Sustainer, and Friend. To learn this lesson he needed to learn who God really was. This Job was about to do by walking with God through his created universe and being questioned about his limitations as a creature in comparison with God's power and wisdom in creating and sustaining the universe. The speeches succeeded in bringing Job to complete faith in God's goodness without receiving a direct answer to his questions concerning God's justice.

4–7 The irony in the Lord's words "Surely you know" is sharp and purposeful. Job had dared to criticize God's management of the universe. Had he been present at the Creation (an obvious absurdity), he might have known something about God's management of its vast expanses. But even the angels who were there could only shout for joy over the Creator's deeds. And here Job, an earthbound man, has lost sight of who this Creator is. As a man full of words and often questioning what the Lord was doing, he was told of the celestial chorus that celebrated God's creative activity, which was beyond any mere creature's ability to improve on by comment. That Job was learning this lesson we may infer from his response in 40:4–5.

For personification of the stars (v.7) in parallel with "the sons of God," see Ps 104:4, where the winds are God's messengers (angels) and the lightning bolts his servants (cf. Heb 1:7).

8–11 In the ancient Semitic world, control of the boisterous sea was a unique symbol of divine power and authority. The Lord controls the sea by his spoken word (cf. Lk 8:24–25). That message is conveyed by the "doors" being the bounds the Lord sets for the sea.

12–15 The morning and dawn are personified. Surely Job did not give orders that caused these servants of the Lord to rise and seize "the earth by its edges and shake the wicked out of it." The figure is based on the idea that daylight catches the wicked in the act and disperses them like one who shakes dirt from a blanket. The dawn flashes across the earth from east to west; and this, in the figure, is like seizing it by its edges and shaking it out. Verse 14 pictures the long, deep shadows of early morning when the earth reminds us of clay taking the shape of the seal pressed into it or of the folds of a garment. Daylight deprives the wicked of the kind of "light" they need. Here we have a subtle figure, for "the light" the wicked are denied is certainly "the darkness" that is their element, indeed, "deep darkness is their morning" (24:17). The wicked "put darkness for light and light for darkness" (Isa 5:20).

16–18 Here God turned to mysteries of created things not visible to the human eye. Note the progression: journeying, then seeing, and then understanding what you see. Each step is increasingly impossible for Job. The Lord's control over this unseen netherworld is just as real as his control over the sea or the land of the living (cf. 26:5–6). What did Job know about those realms where no living human being had ever been?

19–21 What did Job know about the mystery of light and darkness? Again personification creates a vivid figure of God's cosmic control. The irony that focuses on Job's creatural nature gives the clue to one of the purposes of the divine speeches—to show Job that God is God. To have been born before Creation in order to know all this is a patent absurdity.

22–30 Again the Lord questioned Job about his ability to journey to those inaccessible places (cf. vv.16–17) where he could see the sources of nature's rich supply. The term "storehouses" is used in Jer 50:25 as a place for storing weapons (armory). In this case the arsenal figure carries out the thought that snow or hail are often God's weapons (Pss 78:47–48; 148:8; Isa 30:30). Sometimes with them he controls the destiny of nations.

After querying Job about these cosmic mysteries, the Lord made a statement that sounds trite on the surface but demands the attention of every human being. Elihu spoke of God's use of the elements to punish or bless (37:13), and there he hinted at the point that the Lord made here—that he has the right to display his power for no other reason than his own good pleasure. When he "waters a land where no man lives," God demonstrates that human beings are not the measure of all things. He waters the desert only because it pleases him to do so.

Could Job give the Lord realistic answers to questions Job's contemporaries had simplistically answered? Does the rain have a father or the ice a mother? The rhetorical question is to impress on Job that these apparent male and female aspects of nature are God's doing and his alone.

In v.30 the freezing of the surface of the deep was a phenomenon unknown by common experience in and around the lands of the Bible. Like other passages in Job (cf. 26:7–10), this text reveals an expanded knowledge of natural phenomena.

31–33 Job had moved with the Lord from the "recesses of the deep" and "gates of death" (vv.16–17) to heavenly constellations. The terminology draws on the interpretation of those fanciful figures the ancients saw in the celestial constellations. Our language in this space age still uses the same terms. The antithesis of binding and loosening the imagined fetters that hold together the cluster of stars called Pleiades or the belt of the hunter Orion rests on poetic license and literary convention. The message is about God's cosmic dominion of these stars as they seasonally move across the sky. Job understood neither the laws of the heavenly bodies nor God's "inscription [signature]" in the earth, and that is exactly what the Lord was talking to Job about.

34–38 These verses all refer to meteorological phenomena and related matters. The difference between them and vv.22–30 seems to be the time, place, and purpose of the weather. Verse 38 indicates that the seasonal rain is in view. After the long months of the dry season, the Lord is the one who orders the clouds to release their moisture. Job and all humanity can only raise their voices in prayer to him who controls the former and the latter rain, that extension of the rainy season that provides a greater harvest.

The language used here has a playful humor. Imagine Job, if he were able, giving the clouds an order and suddenly being inundated with water. Or Job might decide to dispatch the lightning bolts, if he could, and they would report like lackeys to him and say, "Here we are." So even these seasonal rains are the result of the Lord's bidding, who numbers every cloud and measures every jarful of rain.

39–41 These verses begin a new aspect of the Lord's control over nature. From 38:39 to 40:30 the focus is on creatures of the animal world that are objects of curiosity and wonder to people. The choice is somewhat random. It has never crossed Job's mind to hunt prey for lions or to stuff food into the outstretched gullets of the raven's nestlings. But are not their growls and squawks cries to God, on whom all these creatures ultimately depend?

39:1–4 Through the wild kingdom and its rich variety of creatures, God informs Job of his creative and sustaining activity. He provides for each species its own gestation period and ability to bear young in the field—without assistance and with a divinely ordered wisdom to provide for themselves and their young. The offspring of an ibex doe, unlike human infants that need years of care, can stand within minutes of birth and soon gambol off to thrive in the wild.

5–8 One of the most admired animals of the OT world was the wild donkey—admired for both its freedom and its ability to survive under the harshest conditions. While its relative the domesticated donkey suffers the noise pollution of the crowded cities and the abuse of animal drivers, the wild donkey can laugh at that and somehow find green morsels in places humans cannot survive, the salt flats and the barren leeward hills.

9–12 Here there is an explicit contrast between the "wild ox" (GK 8028) and the tame ox. This animal is believed to be the now-extinct aurochs. Next to the elephant and rhino, it was the largest and most powerful land animal of the Bible world. Most of the nine OT occurrences of the word make reference to it as a symbol of strength (cf. Nu 23:22; 24:8; Dt 33:17; Ps 29:6; et al.). It was already rare in Palestine in the time of Moses. Once again it is a bit of divine humor to even mention the possibility of this fearsome creature harnessed to Job's plow, working his fields, or tethered in his barn.

13–18 The question format is dropped, and the stanza speaks of God in the third person. The question format was used to impress on Job his impotence in performing deeds that take divine power and wisdom. But since the ostrich appears to be ridiculous in its behavior, it simply was not appropriate to ask Job whether he could match God's strength or wisdom because neither is in view.

The ostrich has a tiny brain but is well programmed with instincts that assure its survival. It does not forsake its eggs. The seeming cruelty to her young (cf. La 4:3) derives from the practice of driving off the yearlings when mating season arrives. The ostrich has exceptional eyesight—the largest of any land animal with 360-degree vision. But the text concentrates on the bird's most incongruous feature: tremendous legs. One kick from this bird can tear open a lion or a human being.

The lesson is that God can and does make creatures that appear odd to us if that pleases him. Imagine a bird that can't fly. Though it has wings, it can run faster than a horse. Job could not understand what God was doing in his life, and God was telling him the created world is just as difficult to rationalize.

19–25 The horse is the only animal in this poem that is domestic. This unexpected feature still serves the Lord's purpose, for only one kind of horse is viewed—the charger, the war-horse. The creatures of the wild in their proud freedom and curious behavior are obviously beyond Job's control, but even a creature that people have tamed can display fearsome behavior that excites our imagination. The lines burst with the literary energy needed to do justice to the performance of this amazing creature during the height of the frenzy of battle.

26–30 In v.26 the marvel for Job to contemplate is one we still view with amazement—the migratory instincts of birds. Our knowledge that some birds fly thousands of miles each year (cf. the arctic tern) serves to validate this particular choice of God's faunal wonders. The two words used in vv.26–27 are the Hebrew generic names that include several species. The first appears to be the sparrow hawk, a bird not resident to the Holy Land but known because it stops off there each year in its migration. The griffon vulture is the largest bird of the area. The same word is used for the true eagle (NIV), but here a carrion eater is in mind. Several interesting characteristics of this bird are mentioned: its soaring ability, its aerie (nest) high on the crags, and its phenomenal eyesight.

40:1–2 These two verses conclude the first speech. Since Job has said nothing, a small problem arises because "the LORD answered Job and said" (lit. Heb.). This idiomatic expression announces a hortatory line (v.2). Here the Lord gets to the point. Job had set himself up arbitrarily as God's accuser. How could Job assume such a lofty position in the light of who God is? After this front-row seat surveying the marvels and mysteries of God's created universe, was Job still ready to make his proud insinuations and accusations about the nature of God's lordship over all things? It was Job's turn to speak again. But there would be no long speeches, no more rage, no more challenging his Creator.

2. Job's humbling (40:3–5)

3–5 Job, the challenger, in a hand-over-mouth posture, realized how complex and mysterious God's ways were. Job's reply was based not so much on his being "unworthy" (GK 7837) as on his insignificance. God had not crushed Job but had cured Job's presumption. The Hebrew verb translated "unworthy" means "to be light" or "lightly esteemed" and in that sense "contemptible."

Job had been so moved by this experience that he was released from his problem—his concern to be vindicated. And yet God had given him no explanation of his sufferings. Job had gone beyond it to see and trust God as his friend, to a full realization that he must reckon with God as God. And yet Job still did not know how God had put himself on trial when he allowed Job to be afflicted under Satan's instigation. So Job was humbled and thereby prepared for the Lord's second speech, which pulls together some important threads and brings the drama to a climax.

3. God's second discourse (40:6–41:34)

The prologue in vv.8–14 shows how the lengthy descriptions of the two creatures "Behemoth" (42:15; GK 990) and "Leviathan" (41:1; GK 4293) serve the purpose of the book in a subtle and yet forceful way. This time God would accomplish more than he had in the first speech, where he humbled Job by showing him how he was Creator and Sustainer of the natural world. Here God would convince Job that he was also Lord of the moral order, one whose justice Job could not discredit. And appropriately Job's response this time was repentance (42:1–6).

The concentration on these two awesome creatures, placed as they are after the assertion of the Lord's justice and maintenance of moral order, lends weight to the contention that they are symbolic, though their features are drawn from animals like the hippopotamus and crocodile. Both words are used often in the OT without symbolic significance. But Leviathan sometimes symbolizes evil political powers (cf. Ps 74:12–14; the monster here is Egypt). The same is true of Isa 27:1, where again Leviathan is historicized to represent the final evil power in the end time. Imagery similar to Job is found in Rev 12–13, where we see a beast (Behemoth) as well as a dragon (Leviathan), both of whom only God can subdue.

Those who regard these creatures as literal animals must admit that the description given here in Job is an exaggeration of the appearance and power of hippopotamuses and crocodiles. Both creatures share two qualities. First is the open (on the surface) quality of a beast with oversize bovine or crocodilian features. This meets the needs of the uninformed (as to events of the Prologue) Job, who was learning a lesson about the Lord's omnipotence. Second is the hidden quality of a cosmic creature (the Accuser of the Prologue), whose creation preceded (40:19) and whose power outranks (41:33) all earthly creatures.

6–14 Using the same formula of challenge (v.7), God presented to Job another barrage of questions designed to bring him back to reality. After all, Job's last words were a challenge (31:35–37) that threw into question God's integrity by suggesting that any indictment God might bring against Job would prove to be false. But all such was hypothetical nonsense. It came straight from Job's imagination. God had no such indictment of Job in the first place; but Job's attitude had to be corrected, for he wrongly assumed that he had to be vindicated by God. To do this the Lord reminded Job of who he (God) was. Did Job have an arm like God's? Was he almighty? And where were Job's majesty and glory? Job began to realize why God had in his first discourse taken him through his garden of natural wonders. Could Job by his power and glory create and sustain all that? Obviously not! So Job needed also to leave to his Creator supremacy in the moral realm: Job had no power to crush wickedness finally; so obviously he needed to leave that ultimate exercise of justice to God and trust him to do right.

These verses are presented as an aggressive challenge to Job. "Unleash your fury . . . crush the wicked . . . then I myself will admit that your own right hand can save you." But they are lovingly designed to shake Job's spirit into realizing that God is the only Creator and the only Savior there is. Job needed to learn to rest quietly and trustfully in that truth. To confirm this truth the Lord proceeded to paint the word pictures of these awesome creatures that defied God and humankind. Indeed, the second is so awesome nothing on earth is his equal (41:33).

15–24 Only one other place in the OT (Ps 73:22) uses the word behemoth as a singular. The oth ending normally marks the plural when the singular word simply means beast. Here the ending has an intensive force, meaning the beast par excellence; i.e., the beast becomes a monster. But if Behemoth is a mere beast in Job 40, the language, apart from hyperbole, is difficult to understand. In v.19a it is labeled the "first among the works of God." We suggest this is mythopoeic language (cf. Ps 74:13–14), intended as another way of referring to a unique cosmic creature such as the Accuser in the Prologue. He is beyond the pale of mere human strength, just as the Accuser was. But this information cannot be revealed to Job, and that explains the extravagant language. The use here of Behemoth and Leviathan is a poetic repetition, just as Ps 74 refers to the breaking of the heads of the monster and the heads of Leviathan, both referring to the power of Egypt at the Red Sea.

41:1–34 Verses 1–9 develop the thought that Leviathan is far too powerful for a human being to handle. The first eight verses are addressed to Job; and they assert that any relationship Job may attempt to have with the Leviathan will be doomed to failure—whether by treaty or by force. At this point God states that he alone has the power to control Leviathan; therefore he is the only Supreme Being. In these verses we reach the climax of the stanza. Before this climax the stress was on human impotence before the Leviathan. After the climax (vv.12–34) the poem becomes a masterly description of this creature that goes beyond anything ascribable to a mere crocodile or whale. Swords, javelins, arrows, clubs, slingshots—all are ineffective against him according to vv.26–29. Is this merely a crocodile or should it be understood in light of Isa 27:1, etc.?

By telling of his dominion over Behemoth and Leviathan, the Lord is illustrating what he has said in 40:8–14. He is celebrating his moral triumph over the forces of evil. Satan, the Accuser, has been proved wrong, though Job does not know it. The author and the reader see the entire picture that Job and his friends never knew. God permitted the Accuser to touch Job as part of his plan to humiliate Satan. But now that the contest is over, God still did not reveal his reason to Job. Because Job did not find out what the readers know, he could be restored without destroying the integrity of the account. To understand this is to understand why the forces of moral disorder are veiled underneath mythopoeic language about ferocious, uncontrollable creatures. Again we emphasize that if the specific and ultimate reason for his suffering had been revealed to Job—even at this point—the value of the account as a comfort to others who must suffer in ignorance would have been diminished if not cancelled.

D. Job's Closing Contrition (42:1–6)

1–2 Job's immediate response shows that he understood clearly the thrust of the second divine speech. Job opened his mouth to tell God that he had gotten the message: God's purpose is all that counts; and since he is God, he is able to bring it to pass. There is nothing else Job needed to know—only, perhaps, that this Sovereign of the universe was his friend (42:7–8).

3–4 There are two unannounced quotations in these verses. In v.3 Job appropriately agreed with the quote from 38:2. He admitted that he did, indeed, obscure God's counsel through ignorance. Chastened thus by the wonders of God, he quoted in v.4 the line God himself had seen fit to use twice on Job (38:3; 40:7, at the opening of each speech). The question is expressive of the nature of the divine discourses. God took the witness stand in his own behalf and cross-examined Job, who now records the final effect of this proceeding.

5–6 Job had heard about God. Finally his often-requested prayer to come into his presence has been answered—the result: withdrawal of his rash statements when he fantasied about God's failure to be just and loving. Concerning the phrase "and repent" (GK 5714), Job did not need to repent over sins that brought on his suffering since his suffering was not the result of his sin. But that is not to say that Job had nothing to be sorry for. His questioning of God's justice, for which God chided him in 38:2 (quoted in v.3), is enough to call forth a change of heart and mind. Besides, the word translated "repent" has a breadth of meaning that includes not only "to be sorry, repent" but also "to console oneself" or "be comforted." So it may be that Job was saying that because he had had this encounter with God—since he has really "seen" God—he now understood that God was his friend, not his enemy. So he was consoled and comforted though still suffering.

V. The Epilogue (42:7–17)

Job has learned that human beings, by themselves, cannot deduce the reason why anyone suffers. Still unknown to Job was the fact that his suffering had been used by God to vindicate God's trust in him over against the accusations of the Accuser. So without anger toward him, God allowed Job to suffer in order to humiliate the Accuser and provide support to countless sufferers who would follow in Job's footsteps. Once the purpose of the book had been fulfilled, Job's suffering could not continue without God's being capricious. We see here the heart of the difference between the suffering of the wicked as punishment and of the righteous to accomplish God's higher purpose. This lavish restoration (double all he had) is not based on Job's righteousness but on God's love for him as one who had suffered the loss of all things for God's sake and for no other reason.

A. The Verdict (42:7–9)

7–9 Why did God commend Job for "speaking of him what is right" and condemn the counselors, who had always taken God's side, often with beautiful creedal hymns? God had just rebuked Job for his many wrong words during his dispute with the counselors; in what sense, then, was he here commended for saying what was right? The counselors certainly lacked the right information about why Job was suffering. Job spoke without understanding (v.3) and was often fiery and emotional in his remarks (15:12–13; 18:4). His opinions and feelings were often wrong, but his facts were right. He was not being punished for sins he had committed. But the friends were claiming to know for a certainty things they did not know and so were falsely accusing Job while mouthing beautiful words about God. Job rightly accused them of lying about him and trying to flatter God (13:4, 7–11).

In v.8 the counselors, no longer with Job, are ordered by God to go back to Job with sacrificial animals sufficient to atone for their transgressions. The sacrifice performed by Job was an integral part of the worship in which Job prayed for them. Praying for your enemy was already taught and practiced in the OT (Ps 35:12–14; 109:4–5). And showing mercy to one's enemies was a faith principle clearly required in Ex 23:4–5. Since God had a high purpose for Job's suffering, the counselors had made themselves enemies of God by accusing Job. The large sacrifice shows how grave the Lord considered their sin; nevertheless, he accepted Job's intercession. Job did not fail to love those who had spitefully abused him when he was most helpless. This lofty and practical truth is a fitting theological finale to a book that calls forth a rigorous exercise of both soul and mind.

B. The Restoration (42:10–17)

10 When Job received again his prosperity, righteousness was rewarded and his whole case defeated. All things being equal, sin brings suffering and righteousness blessing. Since Job had successfully endured the test and proved that his righteousness was not rooted in his own selfishness, there was no reason for Job to continue to be tested; his sufferings needed to cease. God created humans so that he might bless them, not curse them. Job had been declared innocent of all those false accusations; so he could not continue to suffer as punishment. And God's higher purpose had been fulfilled; so there was no reason why Job should not be restored.

11 Job's relatives, who had kept their distance from the suffering spectacle (19:13–15), here proved themselves to be fair-weather friends. Their comforting and consoling came a little late, but their presents were expensive: a "ring of gold" (for the nose [Ge 24:47; Isa 3:21] or the ears [Ge 35:4; Ex 32:2]) and a "piece of silver" (cf. Ge 33:19; Jos 24:32). The latter was not money in the sense of coinage but an early designation of weight like the shekel (Ge 23:16).

12–15 Verses 12–13 highlight the twofold increase of Job's possessions as compared to the Prologue (1:3). Everything is twofold except Job's sons and daughters. It is curious that the author ignores the sons and concentrates on Job's daughters. The daughters are named and granted an inheritance even when sons are available. The stress on the great beauty of Job's daughters is characteristic of the epic tradition. Their names are indicative of their beauty: Jemimah means "turtledove"; Keziah is probably an aromatic plant as in the name Cinnamon ("cassia" in Ps 45:8); and Keren-Happuch means "a jar (horn) of eye paint."

16–17 Job's longevity was in keeping with patriarchal tradition (possibly double the normal span of Ps 90:10). Certainly the wisdom ideal of seeing one's grandchildren is fulfilled twice over to the fourth generation (cf. Ge 50:23), and the patriarchal formula "old and full of years," expressive of a completely fulfilled life, is used (cf. Ge 25:8; 35:29).

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

The English designation "psalm" comes from the Latin Psalmi and the Greek psalmoi (GK 6011; "songs sung with musical accompaniment"), a translation of the Hebrew mizmor (GK 4660; "a song accompanied by musical instruments"). The Hebrew title (tehillim) signifies the contents of the book: "songs of praise." In the 150 psalms the Holy Spirit has given us more than a book of Israel's prayer and praise. The book of Psalms is a cross section of God's revelation to Israel and of Israel's response in faith to the Lord. The Psalms invite us to experience how God's people in the past related to him. They witness to the glory of Zion, to the Davidic covenant, to the fidelity of God, to the Exodus and Conquest traditions, to God the Creator-Redeemer-King, and to the Lord as the Divine Warrior. The book of Psalms is God's prescription for a complacent church, because through it he reveals how great, wonderful, magnificent, wise, and utterly awe-inspiring he is. If God's people before the Incarnation could have such a faith in the Lord, witnessing to his greatness and readiness to help, how much more should this be true among twentieth-century Christians. The book of Psalms can revolutionize our devotional life, our family patterns, and the fellowship and the witness of the church of Jesus Christ.

The book of Psalms is first and foremost God's Word to his people. We hear the voice of God in each individual psalm. Its purpose is the same as that of any part of Scripture; the Psalms are "useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness, so that the man of God may be thoroughly equipped for every good work" (2Ti 3:16–17). The Psalms are nevertheless unique. In them not only does God speak to his people, but the people speak to God. God encourages us to use the language of the Psalms in our individual and communal prayers and praise. By applying these ancient psalms to a new situation, the life of faith, hope, and love of the individual Christian, the Christian family, and the Christian church may be greatly enhanced.

The values of the Psalms to the individual and to the Christian community are many: (1) It is a book of prayers, of a human being's communion with God. (2) It expresses one's praise to God for acts fulfilled in the past. God's goodness in fulfilling his past promises becomes the occasion for a greater hope in the future. (3) The Psalms have a distinct place in Christian liturgy, having been sung by Christians throughout the centuries. (4) The Psalms inspire the believer with hope of the kingdom of God: the new state of justice, righteousness, and bliss. (5) The Psalms reflect the faith experience of the "community" of God's people. Their expressions of frustration, impatience, anger, and joy reflect the tension between promise and alienation. (6) In the Psalms God addresses both the individual and the community. (7) The value of the Psalms lies in their connection between the OT and the NT. Strictly speaking, they belong to the OT. Yet the psalmists longed for the day of redemption. From the early church we have inherited a new perspective of reading the Psalms in the light of Jesus' mission and work.

2. The Study of the Book of Psalms

The books of Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, and Lamentations make up the poetical books in the English OT. However, poetic forms are found throughout the OT, especially in the books of the prophets.

The Psalms usually carry a heading. The heading or superscription may contain any or all of the following categories of information: identification with a person, association with a historical event, musical and liturgical details, and the type or genre of the psalm.

The psalms were gathered in separate collections that were eventually brought together into one book under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Several collections arose over the centuries: smaller ones, such as the psalms associated with the sons of Korah (42–49; 84–85; 87–88), with Asaph (50; 73–83), the second Davidic psalter (51–71), and the Hallelujah psalms (146–50). The larger collections consisted of the psalms associated with David (3–41; cf. 72:20) and the Elohistic psalter (42–83)—itself a collection of smaller collections: the Korahite (42–49) and Davidic (51–71) psalms; the Asaphite psalter (73–83); and the Songs of Ascent (120–34). The process of collection began with smaller collections, to which individual psalms or other collections were added, resulting in a final collection of 150 psalms.

Hebrew poetry does not have meter or "rhyme" as in English. Rather, Hebrew uses various literary devices. Distinctive of Hebrew literature is parallelism. Today we distinguish between synonymous, antithetic, synthetic, climactic, and emblematic parallelism. Parallelism is a most fundamental Hebrew literary device.

In synonymous (identical) parallelism the members of a line express the same basic idea in several different ways (1:1). Emblematic parallelism is a form of synonymous parallelism in which one member of the line contains a figurative (metaphor or simile) development of the same thought (44:19, 22). In antithetic parallelism the members of the line are set in contrast to one another (44:3). In synthetic parallelism the members of a line complement one another harmoniously to create the desired effect (12:1). Climactic (step or chain) parallelism is a further development of synthetic parallelism. Not only do the members of the line harmonize, they also develop the thought colon upon colon. The finest example of this type is Ps 44 (see the commentary).

Internal parallelism is parallelism treated in isolation from other verses. External parallelism denotes the kind of parallelism when two or more verses are compared with one another (Ps 30:8–10). Standardized phrases or paired synonyms are common in Hebrew poetry. Certain synonyms recur in the same or in a different order (cf. 44:24).

Hebrew poetry employs many literary devices. Acrostic refers to the poetic practice of opening each line, verse, or stanza with a different letter of the alphabet (e.g., 25; 34; 37; 111; 112; 119; 145). Alliteration is the phenomenon of repeating similar sounds at the beginning of words (e.g., 22:4). Apostrophe results from a development of personification (see below). For example, in Ps 68:15–16 the psalmist describes the mountains and addresses them rhetorically. Assonance is the phenomenon of repeating similar sounds within words (cf. 44:7). Chiasm changes the order of the members of a line. Its frequency is so great that the commentary cannot call attention to the many occurrences.

Ellipsis is the phenomenon of leaving something out of the text that must be read into the colon from the context. The resultant ambiguity forces readers to involve themselves with the text, as they have to choose between two or more options. Hendiadys is a figure of speech in which two expressions are intended to be understood as one. Hyperbole or exaggeration creates a picture in the mind that shuns literalism (cf. 40:12). Inclusion is a form of repetition in which the beginning and end of the section (verse, strophe, or psalm) close the unit by the restatement of the same motif or words or by a contrastive statement (cf. 70:1, 5). Merismus is a coordination of nominal phrases, expressive of totality (e.g., in 105:14, "man" and "kings" denote any and everybody). Metonymy refers to meaning by association. Onomatopoeia describes a word whose sound creates the effect intended by the speaker. Paronomasia is a play on words or, better, a use of two or more identical or similarly sounding words with different nuances in meaning.

Refrain is a form of repetition. Repetition is inherent in the concept of symmetry, according to which words and phrases are repeated in the same, synonymous, or antonymous ways. Repetition is the most important element in Hebrew poetry, for it conveys symmetry and asymmetry, harmony and dissonance. Synecdoche is a figure of speech in which the part stands for the whole or the whole for the part. For example, the "hand" of the Lord denotes all his being.

There are several categories of psalms. One is the psalms of praise, with two subcategories: descriptive and declarative praise. Additionally there are lament psalms, of which are the individual and the communal lament psalms. In the individual lament and praise psalm, the poet confides in his God

Types of Hebrew Parallelism

Type	Characteristic	Example
I. Synonymous	Repetition of same thought
Identical	Each element is synonymous	Ps 24:1: The earth is the LORD's, and everything in it, the world, and all who live in it.
Similar	Each element is similar	Ps 19:2: Day after day they pour forth speech; night after night they display knowledge.
Incomplete	Second element of previous line is repeated	Jer 17:9: The heart is deceitful above all things and beyond cure. Who can understand it?
Continued	Second element is repeated and built upon	Ps 24:5: He will receive blessing from the LORD, and vindication from God his Savior.
II. Antithetic	Parallel by contrast (by use of the opposite)	Ps 1:6: For the LORD watches over the way of the righteous, but the way of the wicked will perish.
III. Synthetic—	Building on a thought
Completion	Completes a thought	Ps 2:6: I have installed my king on Zion, my holy hill.
Comparison	Draws an analogy	Pr 15:17: Better is a meal of vegetables where there is love than a fattened calf with turmoil.
Reason	Gives a reason	Pr 26:4: Do not answer a fool according to his folly, or you will be like him yourself.
Conceptual	Use of theme element	Ps 1:1: Blessed is the man who does not walk in the counsel of the wicked or stand in the way of sinners or sit in the seat of mockers.
IV. Climactic	Builds on same word	Ps 29:1: Ascribe to the LORD, O mighty ones, Ascribe to the LORD glory and strength.
V. Emblematic	Use of simile or metaphor	Ps 42:1: As the deer pants for streams of water, so my soul pants for you, O God. Pr 25:25: Like cold water to a weary soul is good news from a distant land.

amid difficulty. In this dialogical relationship the psalmist freely expresses his frustration with God's slowness in answering him.

Other types of psalms are enthronement psalms, which celebrate the Lord's kingship, and wisdom psalms, which show clear affinity with the wisdom literature. Other literary forms are Zion Songs (46; 48; 76; 84; 87), Triumphal Hymn (68), Pilgrimage Songs (120–34), and Creation Praise (8; 104; 139). Several other categories are not literary designations but have grown out of the liturgical use of the Psalms.

The Hallel psalms too are not to be confused with a literary genre. Instead they form three separate collections: the "Egyptian Hallel" (113–18); the "Great Hallel" (120–36 or 135–36 or 136; Jewish sources vary on extent); and the concluding Hallel psalms (146–50). The Hallel psalms had a significant part in the praise (hallel) of the Lord. The Egyptian Hallel and the Great Hallel (most of which are pilgrimage songs: 120–34) were sung during the annual feasts. The concluding Hallel psalms (146–50) constituted a part of the daily prayers in the synagogues after the destruction of the temple (A.D. 70).

EXPOSITION

Book I: Psalms 1–41

Psalm 1: God's Blessing on the Godly

The first psalm with its pronouncement of blessing on all who respond in fidelity to the God of the covenant appropriately introduces the book of Psalms. The placing of this psalm is significant because it both invites and encourages God's people to live godly lives. It also provides the assurance that the righteous will be rewarded and that, in the end, God "knows the way of the righteous." The first psalm sets the tone for the entire Psalter because of its concern for God, for godly living, and for the hope of the godly in the realization of the promises of the covenant.

Psalm 1 is a wisdom psalm and shares many features common to the book of Proverbs and to other psalms designated as wisdom psalms (34; 37; 49; 73; 111–12; 119; 127–28; 133). Psalm 1 holds forth the blessedness of godliness and encourages wisdom as the way of life.

I. The Discriminating Way of the Godly (1:1–2)

1 The opening phrase of the psalm is an appropriate introduction to the book of Psalms. The formula "Blessed is the man" evokes joy and gratitude, as man may live in fellowship with his God. The word "happy" is a good rendition of "blessed" (GK 897), provided one keeps in mind that the condition of "bliss" is not merely a feeling. Even when the righteous do not feel happy, they are still considered "blessed" from God's perspective. Such happiness is promoted by two kinds of activities: dissociation from the wicked and association with and devotion to God. The godly do not (1) walk in the counsel of the wicked, (2) stand in the way of sinners, or (3) sit in the seat of mockers. Rather, they reflect on the Lord in their walking, standing, and sitting (cf. Dt 6:7). The parallelism is synonymous and profoundly portrays the totality of evil.

In contrast, the "mockers" (GK 4370) have no regard for God and his commandments. They do not respond to instruction (9:7; 15:12) but stir up strife by their insults (22:10). Thus the way of folly entails a devotion to self and to the group in all areas of life.

2 The righteous are positively identified by their association with "the law of the LORD." The "law" (torah; GK 9368) signifies primarily instruction that comes from God for the purpose of helping us to live in harmony with God's will. The believer's delight is not only in knowing, studying, and memorizing the Word of God but especially in doing God's will.

"Delight" (GK 2914) expresses all that makes the child of God happy. The law is more than a delight; it is the believer's chief desire. The fear of the Lord, as the beginning of wisdom, is expressed as a delight in God's law (112:1). The delight of the godly in doing God's will on earth (Mt 6:10) is the result of a special relationship with the Lord.

The godly person "meditates" (GK 2047) on the law of God day and night. Since the Bible was generally not available to God's people, they memorized and meditated on the word (cf. 119:11), the perfections of the Lord (63:6), and his mighty acts (77:12; 143:5). The one who meditates continually reflects God's word in life.

II. The Future of the Godly and the Wicked Contrasted (1:3–5)

3 The happiness of the godly is likened to a tree. Unlike trees growing wild or planted in the fields, where the amount of rainfall varies, the tree the psalmist envisions has been planted purposely by irrigation canals.

The imagery of leaves and fruit assures the godly that they will receive God's blessing and will enjoy life as a gift of God (cf. Eze 47:12). The "prosperity" of the righteous is God's blessing on their words and works (cf. 90:14–17). The psalmist thus encourages the godly to pursue the way of wisdom. The prosperity of the righteous—guaranteed or limited to the godly—is a gift of God, a by-product of wise living.

4–5 How different is the end of the wicked! The metaphor of chaff reveals both the uselessness of the wicked and the ease with which God will deal with them. Even as the winnower casts the chaff to the afternoon breeze, so the Lord will drive away the wicked.

The end of the wicked may not be clear while they are alive, but from God's perspective they have no future. They cannot withstand the judgment of God. They are judged by being alienated from the congregation of the righteous, i.e., those who have a relationship with God and enjoy his presence—both now and in the life to come.

III. The Discriminating Way of God (1:6)

6 The reason for the certainty of the judgment lies in God's knowledge of the affairs of humankind. God's "knowledge" is a deep commitment to, love for, and care of his own; hence the translation "the LORD watches over." The Lord offers no protection to those who are not reconciled to him; rather, their end is destruction (cf. Mt 7:23; cf. vv.15–27).

Psalm 2: The Messianic King

Since its subject concerns the anointing and coronation of a Davidic king (cf. 2Ki 11:12), Ps 2 is classified as a royal psalm. This psalm is one of the most quoted in the NT. It was favored by the apostles as scriptural confirmation of Jesus' messianic office and his expected glorious return with power and authority. The first-century church applied the second psalm to the Messiah as an explanation of the crucifixion of Christ by the rulers (Herod and Pontius Pilate), the nations, and Israel (the priests, scribes, and Pharisees), who had conspired together against the Messiah of God (Ac 4:25–28). Paul applied it to Jesus' ministry: his sonship, resurrection, and ascension to glory, which confirmed God's promises in Jesus as the Messiah (Ac 13:32–33; cf. also Heb 1:3, 5–6; Rev 12:5; 19:15).

The theological significance of Ps 2 lies in the hope that it entails. The anointed king rules by God's appointment. The wise response of repentance is a victory for the Messiah and a token of the final victory over his enemies, the opponents of God's kingdom (cf. Rev 19:19–21; 20:7–10). From the perspective of typology, Jesus is the fulfillment of the psalm. The psalm offers a special hope for the church as we look forward to the day of our redemption, to the era of peace and victory (Isa 65:20–25).

I. The Rebellious Nations (2:1–3)

1–2 "Why" expresses the irony of the tumultuous efforts against the Lord and his anointed. The psalmist expressed astonishment that the rulers of the earth even tried to counsel together against God, but it is clear that the nations' attempt is in vain.

The rebellion of "the kings" is an outright rejection of the Davidic king, constituting a threat to the universal rule of God. The rebellion is against the Lord and "his Anointed One" (GK 5431). The "Anointed One" refers to any anointed king who was seated on the throne of David.

3 The goal of the rebellion is lordship. The kings of earth are trying to break away from their required allegiance to the King of kings. "Chains" and "fetters" refer to the manner in which the yoke of a cart or plow is placed on the necks of animals. Thus the yoke of God's kingship is not merely rejected; it is insolently thrown off. The kingdoms of this earth are by nature opposed to the rule of God and his Messiah.

II. God's Rule in Heaven (2:4–6)

4 In this section the scene shifts from earth to heaven, where we catch a glimpse of God mocking the feeble attempts of the rulers. Above the turbulence of the nations, God sits and reacts to their rebellion against him with laughter. His laughter is an expression of ridicule, for he knows their end (cf. 37:13).

5 In his appointed time, God speaks with words as well as with acts so that the nations will be terrified by his anger. The "anger" (GK 678) of God is an expression of his "jealousy" (Na 1:2–6). He tolerates no opposition or competition but requires absolute loyalty (vv.11–12).

6 The emphatic "I" introduces the words of God's decree to appoint to the throne a Davidic ruler who will bring the nations to submission. God's reaction to the stirring on earth is the installation of an anointed king. The Davidic king ruled in Zion, God's chosen dwelling place. God had sanctified the city by his presence; therefore Zion was his "holy hill."

III. God's Decree (2:7–9)

7 The "decree" (GK 2976) of the Lord deals with the Davidic king and the establishment of God's kingdom on earth. The divinely appointed king speaks about the Lord's promise, publicly proclaiming his own relationship with God, the Great King. This decree determines his relationship to the king and to the nations. The Davidic king is by birth and by promise the "son of God," and God is the Davidic king's "father" (cf. 2Sa 7:14). In actuality this relationship is confirmed at the moment of the coronation. Therefore the theocratic king must respond to the interests and desires of his father and represent God's will to his people. Jesus is the Christ, the "Son" of God by the Father's proclamation (Mt 3:17; Mk 1:11; Lk 3:22).

8 The privilege of kingship lies in the relationship between God and the king. As the "son" of God he may freely ask for an extension of his rule, because it fits within God's planned universal rule. The father graciously grants to his son the promise of the worldwide rule as his "inheritance" (GK 5709). Since God is the Ruler of the world, he authorizes the Davidic king to extend his kingdom to "the ends of the earth."

9 The rule of God's messiah brings stability, even if he has to use force. His sovereignty may be expressed as an "iron rule" in which rebels are crushed like fragile clay vessels (cf. Jer 19:11). The "scepter" (GK 8657) is a symbol of rule. It is the means of discipline and judgment. As the scepter of a monarch, it symbolizes here the authority granted by God to rule with great power over the nations.

IV. The Rule of the Messiah on Earth (2:10–12)

10–12 The universal rule of God is expressed by his patience, calling for kings and rulers to assess their situation. If they are wise, they will respond favorably. The wise response includes both a spirit willing to receive God's revelation about the anointed and his kingdom and a joyous spirit of submission to the Lord. Submission is expressed by the word "serve" (GK 6268). The "fear" (GK 3711) of the Lord in this situation is not a sign of emotional instability but a mark of wisdom. It is expressive of the day of his wrath on the nations. Because God requires submission to himself and to his son and blesses those who trust in him, "the LORD" may well be the subject of the verbs, "worship the LORD with reverence; tremble, and kiss the king, lest the LORD be angry with you . . . for his anger flares up in a moment" (NEB). This would fit in with the conclusion of the first psalm. He will most surely bless those who find refuge in him, whereas the sinners will perish.

Psalm 3: Quietness Amid Troubles

This is the first psalm included in the collection of psalms ascribed to David (Pss 3–41, with the exclusion of Pss 10 and 33). The mood of the psalm is established by its genre. It is an individual lament psalm in which the main speaker expresses confidence in personal and individual deliverance by God (vv.3–8). The historical situation reflected in the psalm finds David at a low moment in his life. Because of his sin with Bathsheba (2Sa 11–12), his life was torn apart by family troubles (2Sa 12:15–14:33), and his kingdom was wrenched from his grasp by Absalom's rebellion (2Sa 15:1–19:43). The hearts of Israel were with Absalom (2Sa 15:13). The anointed of the Lord (cf. Ps 2:6) was forced to flee Jerusalem and wait out the crisis at an encampment across the Jordan (2Sa 17:24). Thus the psalm reflects the national situation as well as the personal feelings of David.

The theological significance is that the Lord will redeem his anointed one, establish his kingdom, and bless his people! Since Jesus is the Messiah, the Anointed One, the believer joins with Israel in the assurance of God's promise, the reception of the benefits of the people of God through the Messiah, the hope of the Messiah's complete victory, and the desire for the establishment of the age of blessing.

I. Lament Over the Enemies (3:1–2)

1–2 David laments over his many adversaries, who comprise a united front. They mock David and exclaim that his God will not take care of him! They curse the king (cf. 2Sa 16:7–8) and conclude that he has been abandoned by the God whom he has served so diligently and in whom he has put his trust.

In the midst of this tragedy, the king prays, "O LORD." The psalmist addresses God by his revealed covenant name, "Yahweh." In the language of prayer in the OT, this address has the same connotation as "Abba, Father" in the NT. For the people of God, the name of the Lord is the assurance that his promises to David will be fulfilled (cf. 2:7–9). He is the Father of Israel and particularly of David (and his sons) as the anointed king.

II. Prayer to the Lord (3:3–4)

3 God is so different from the "many" who oppose him. David is certain of God's promises confirmed in the covenant (cf. 2:6–9). Therefore, his confidence rests in the nature of God, described here as a "shield" (GK 4482). He is convinced that God's kingship is forever. And although the kingship has been forcibly removed from the Lord's anointed, he is still protected by God's kingship.

The power of the Great King is referred to by the word "glory" (GK 3883). Even as a king can be described as glorious because of his vast armies, so the Lord is glorious because he can marshal the angelic host to aid his children (34:7; 91:11). The king puts his confidence in the protection that God alone can provide, because his glory is greater than any human power. He has power to raise up the humble and abase the mighty (1Sa 2:7–8; Ps 103:7–9). He exalts whom he wills and when he wills.

4 Even when he was removed from the presence of God in Jerusalem, the king knew that the Lord would answer him when he called. Leaving Jerusalem weeping, barefoot, and with his head covered (2Sa 15:30), he now raises up his "voice" to the Lord. The confidence that God will answer him is based on the father-son relationship that the Lord promised to his anointed (cf. 2:7). David's confidence in prayer lies, not in righteous deeds done in the flesh, but in the gracious promises of God.

III. Trust in the Lord (3:5–6)

5–6 Lying down to sleep expresses David's confidence in God's response to his plea. The psalmist knows that God "sustains" (GK 6164). He looks up to God while facing the "tens of thousands" who have surrounded him as a city under siege. David's commitment to God results in an abandonment of his problem to God. Though David has been moved by the "many enemies" (vv.1–2), prayer renews his confidence in the One who will be victorious over the many, and with this thought he consoles himself and goes to sleep.

IV. Prayer for Deliverance and Expression of Hope (3:7–8)

7 At this point the psalm moves with a quickening rhythm. The prayer's intensity is marked by the words "Arise, O LORD! / Deliver me, O my God!" The psalmist freely seeks to rouse the Lord to action. The skeptics have already concluded that "God will not deliver him" (v.1). Here he calls for deliverance and uses his enemies' word for God—but in a personalized way ("my God")—as he petitions God to prove his adversaries wrong.

Striking the enemies on the jaw is an expression of humiliation (cf. 1Ki 22:24; Isa 50:6). The metaphor of the breaking of teeth likens the enemies to wild animals whose strength is taken away when their teeth are crushed (cf. Ps 58:6). The psalmist has hope that regardless of what enemies may arise from within or from without the kingdom of God, God will be victorious (cf. 1Co 15:24–28; 2Th 1:5–10).

8 Victory belongs to the Lord, and he grants it to his beloved. That the psalmist is not only concerned for himself and the security of his kingship is evident by the conclusion. His prayer is that, through the victory granted to the Lord's anointed, God's blessing may return to his people. The spirit of the shepherd-king is revealed by his concern for the welfare of his people.

The blessing of God is the result of his gracious deliverance. He granted the "blessing" of his presence, protection, and prosperity to Abraham (Ge 12:2–3) and confirmed it to Israel (Dt 26, esp. vv.5–10). To David, God has promised the removal of wicked people and external enemies as well as the subsequent peace of his people (2Sa 7:10–11, 29). David looks forward to the time of full blessing. In his hope lies ours, for in Jesus' promises the victory and blessings of God are assured.

Psalm 4: An Evening Hymn (in Despondency)

The psalm is an evening hymn (v.8) and forms, together with the morning psalm (Ps 5; cf. 5:3), avenues for believers to come to their heavenly Father in prayer. As an expression of confidence in God, the psalm helps the reader to meditate on God's fatherly care and to leave the troubles and causes of anxiety in his hands.

The literary genre of the psalm fits the individual psalms of lament, with motifs characteristic of the subgenre, psalms of confidence. The mixture of the genres may account for the lack of consensus in determining the structure.

I. Prayer (4:1)

1 In his need the psalmist David turns to his "righteous God." He believes that regardless of his innocent suffering, God will act triumphantly on behalf of his servant. The word "righteous" (GK 7406) expresses the relation between God and his people. It signifies more than an absolute standard or norm. He has promised them his presence and victory over adverse circumstances.

Faith in God's righteousness is based on God's covenant promise that he will come to the rescue of his children in need (Ps 25:4–5; Isa 45:13). Calling boldly on God is a privilege that belongs to his children. It is to this end that the psalmist calls on God as "my righteous God." He calls on the Lord in his "distress," though the nature of this distress is not clear. Boldly, yet humbly, he casts himself on the "mercy" (GK 2858) of God, who has covenanted to be loving and faithful to his own. Prayer is a form of communication in which children of God cast themselves on the mercy of God.

II. Call for Trust in the Lord (4:2–5)

2 The "men" belong to the class of prominent citizens. As a class they form the landowners, the wealthy, and the powerful in Israel's society. The leadership has gone astray. (1) They have scoffed at the Lord's "glory"; i.e., they have despised the position of the king. "Glory" (GK 3883) is bestowed by God on his anointed king (3:3). (2) They characterize themselves by a diligent pursuit of what is vain ("delusions") and deceptive ("false gods"). They have trodden the king's glory into the ground by betraying it for an unspecified worthless cause.

3–5 In a series of seven imperatives, the enemies are called on to respond in a more constructive way. (1) They should recognize that the Lord has chosen David to be his friend. He is "the godly" set apart by the Lord, who has bestowed on him his steadfast love, confirmed to him by covenant (cf. 2Sa 7:15a).

(2) The command to "[be] angry" (GK 8074) seems strange in light of Eph 4:26, 31. The verb can also be translated as "be disturbed" or "tremble." Though the enemies may have strong feelings of enmity, they must learn to submit themselves. The sense of the clause is "tremble with fear, and stop sinning."

(3) The prohibition "Do not sin" is an exhortation for the enemies to repent from their evil way of life. Hatred of God's people is always wrong (cf. Jas 3:9), but it is especially reprehensible when directed toward God's anointed.

(4) If the enemies persist in their way, David exhorts them to do so secretly, while they lie on their beds. "Search your hearts" signifies thinking and planning. The wicked may think their perverse thoughts to themselves, if they have to, but they should not be expressed publicly.

(5) The enemies should wail over their past hostility. "Be silent" (GK 1957) has the sense of keeping still like a stone (Ex 15:16). Since the verb is parallel with "tremble" (i.e., "in your anger"), it is preferable to assume that David calls on his opponents to "wail" over their sin against him and against the Lord.

(6) and (7) The last two imperatives call for true repentance: "Offer right sacrifices and trust in the LORD." The enemies are to present the sacrifices to the Lord in accordance with his ordinances and with the attitude of commitment, because he does not delight in mere sacrifice (1Sa 15:22; Ps 50:14). They must be "sincere" sacrifices, presented as an expression of submission to him.

III. Prayer (4:6–7)

6 As a true shepherd of Israel, David knows the hearts of the people. It is a time of turmoil and frustration because of unfulfilled expectations regarding the covenant blessings. It is not clear who the "many" are. Regardless, David prays for them and calls on God to make his covenant blessings evident both to the nation and to himself. He does this first by an allusion to the priestly benediction (Nu 6:24–26). They asked, "Who can show us any good?" David responds by pointing away from himself and to the Lord as the author of blessing.

7 David continues his prayer that the Lord may restore to the nation the fullness of his blessing. The disgrace of the king has brought an end to God's blessings. While the people lament, David prays, because the Lord had "filled [his] heart with greater joy." God-given joy is vastly more important than all the food the world can give.

IV. Expression of Trust (4:8)

8 The enemies diligently pursued vanity and deception in an attempt to frustrate the king and bring down his glory (cf. v.2). David is not worried about the outcome. He commits his way to the Lord as he goes to sleep. The enemies may have vexed themselves on their beds (v.4), but he experiences "peace" (GK 8934), the peace that comes as a blessing from God (Nu 6:26). His confidence in the Lord "alone" is the reason for his peaceful sleep. The expression "make me dwell in safety" connotes not only the absence of enemies and hostilities but also the presence of peace.

Psalm 5: A Morning Prayer (in Anticipation of God's Presence)

This psalm is generally categorized as an individual lament psalm. It shares elements of the psalms of confidence (vv.1–3; 8–12) and also of a community lament (vv.11–12). There is no agreement on the original life situation.

I. Prayer for God's Justice (5:1–3)

1 The lament is an expression of a great need felt by the psalmist. He expresses himself with audible sounds. In his state of mind he does not think about the formalities of prayer, because he knows that the Lord hears both inner thoughts ("sighing") and audible "words." As an oppressed person, he is revealing his need to find someone who can redeem and deliver. The psalm presupposes that an injustice has been done.

2 Because of the apparent injustice, David prays to no one other than his "King." The phrase "my King and my God" recognizes that while God is the sovereign King and able to deliver, he is close enough to his children that they may call him "my God," the equivalent of "Abba."

3 With the dawn of each new day, prayer is renewed with the hope that the Lord will soon respond. The "morning" is symbolic of a renewal of God's acts of love (cf. La 3:23). The change from darkness to light brings with it the association of renewed hope. In the early morning hours the psalmist seeks the Lord in prayer because he knows that God will not forsake him. During the day he waits with "expectation" (GK 7595) to see what the Lord will do for him.

II. Affirmation of God's Hatred of Evil (5:4–6)

4–6 Whereas other religions bring together good and evil at the level of the gods, God has revealed that evil exists apart from him and yet is under his sovereign control. The psalmist shows a clear conviction that God hates in the most radical way any form of evil and denies lawless persons any right to his presence.

God's absolute hatred of evil is revealed in how he will quickly judge unfaithful people as well as those who oppress the poor (Mal 3:5). The negative statements "cannot dwell" and "cannot stand" are complemented by the phrase "you destroy."

God hates both the sin and those who sin against him. The particular sins are examples of a way of life. The liar is only a hairbreadth away from the murderer. Though a liar may claim that he only goes so far with his deception, when he is caught, the liar is a dangerous person, because he may attempt to cover his tracks. The "bloodthirsty" are not necessarily guilty of murder but no longer know the limits between "mine" and "thine" and thus twist and pervert justice, even at the cost of human lives or dignity. Instead of "taking pleasure" in evil, the Lord "abhors" all who practice wickedness.

III. Hope in Fellowship With God (5:7)

7 In contrast to the wicked who will not be able to "stand" or "dwell" in God's presence (vv.4–5), the psalmist prays with expectation that the Lord will permit him to enjoy his presence. The hope of fellowship with God is based, not on his own righteousness, but on God's sovereign "love" or "mercy" (GK 2876). For the psalmist the hope of entering into the temple is much more than the physical walking into the courts of the temple. He seeks the affirmation of God's love for him in an evil world and, hence, the assurance of God's presence with him. Because he knows that God is "holy," he prostrates himself in the direction of the temple with the prayer of hope that the Lord will answer him. His submission to his covenant God is further brought out by the manner of his approach: He bows down "in reverence."

IV. Prayer for and Hope in God's Righteousness (5:8–12)

8–9 The psalmist prays for the Lord to "make straight" (GK 3837) his path by leading the godly in his "righteousness" (GK 7407). This prayer has two components. On the one hand, he prays for the Lord's presence to guide him by leveling the obstacles from the way of life (cf. 27:11). On the other hand, he prays for the Lord to show himself righteous because his divine order is challenged by the ungodly.

The wicked are further described as instruments of destruction and death. By their reign of terror, they are opposed to the God of life and truth. The heart of the wicked is full of "destruction." Their mouths, filled with lies and deceit, are likened to "an open grave," because of their deadly words. With their slippery tongues they sow discord, hatred, and death.

10 At the root of the evildoers' actions is their rebellion against God. The chaos caused by the evildoers requires a response from the Lord. For this reason the psalmist prays for their demise. The phrase "declare them guilty" calls on the Lord both to declare a guilty verdict and to judge them with an appropriate sentence. That is, the psalmist prays that the Lord will hold the wicked culpable for their acts and will remove them from the covenant community. The seeds sown in unrighteousness and unfaithfulness must bear their fruits by bringing calamities on the wicked. God's justice must cause the schemes of the wicked to backfire on themselves.

11–12 The just acts of God leading to the conviction and the destruction of the wicked give the godly community a reason to rejoice in his righteousness. The righteous acts of God include the preservation of the godly, "who take refuge" in him, and their glorification, as they praise him for the establishment of his righteousness and justice on earth. The psalmist hopes that God's judgment of the wicked will provide the righteous with a greater reason to rejoice in the marvelous powers of salvation and victory, which he shares with his own. The "righteous" are the same as those "who love your name." The Lord protects his own under the cover of his wings (cf. 91:4).

The grand conclusion exalts the Lord as the God who deals graciously with the righteous. Their hope lies in the Lord, who will constantly guard his own "as with a shield." "You surround [GK 6496] them" may also be translated as "you crown them." On the one hand, the Lord extends his protection and favor, likened to a "shield." On the other hand, he bestows his royal glory on the godly.

Psalm 6: A Prayer (in Deep Anguish)

This psalm is one of seven penitential psalms (6; 32; 38; 51; 102; 130; 143) of the early church. In a strict sense, however, it is not a penitence psalm, for there is no confession of sin or prayer for forgiveness. The psalm can be categorized as an individual lament psalm. It is not possible to be certain of its original setting. Throughout the first part the psalmist speaks of personal suffering so intense that he may collapse. He prays that God may heal him and no longer be angry.

With a sudden twist he turns to the wicked and, in an assured voice, announces that they, instead, will be disgraced (v.8).

I. Prayer for God's Favor (6:1–3)

These first three verses express the perplexity of the psalmist during a period of depression. The tragedy is intensified by the semblance of God's anger; for the psalmist, his suffering is nearly more than he can bear, and there is no end in sight. He asks for God's grace to sustain him.

1 The verbs "rebuke" (GK 1722) and "discipline" (GK 3579) are often synonymous. The discipline of the Lord may seem so harsh that it seems he is angry. David prays that the Lord will not discipline him in wrath. His discipline is indeed there, but the psalmist does not understand why it has come or how long it is going to last. God's discipline is for the purpose of sanctification; however, in David's present experience it almost works the opposite result. God seems to have forsaken him (v.3).

2 In his suffering (cf. vv.8–10), David turns to the Lord as if to say, "Father, my covenant faithful God." He does not confess his sins but asks the Lord to demonstrate his covenant promises: restoration (v.2) and loyalty (v.4). In a manner characteristic of the OT, he identifies suffering with judgment and judgment with God's wrath (cf. 38:1–3)—a wrath that can have terrible effects (cf. Isa 66:15–16; Jer 10:10; Mic 1:2–4; et al.).

The verb "faint" (GK 583) is sometimes used to express the process of withering of leaves and crops; metaphorically it signifies the weakness of strong people and of fortifications (Isa 24:4; Jer 14:2; La 2:8). For this psalmist it shows how his vigor (spiritual, psychological, and physical) has been brought down. The word "bones" suggests the depth of his depression, which has affected his most inner being.

3 The "anguish" is even more intense because it seems that the discipline has no regard for the psalmist's frailty and has no apparent end in sight. He wants the Lord to "be merciful" (GK 2858; v.2) so as to restore him. If not now, when? Verse 3 is incomplete with its final cry "how long?" Because of the intensity of his emotions, he cannot complete his thought (cf. 31:1; 35:17; 74:10; et al.).

II. Prayer for God's Love (6:4–5)

4 David boldly calls on the Lord to "turn" (or "return"; GK 8740). At this moment, in the depth of his suffering, he needs his God—who has promised not to leave him—to extend his "unfailing love" (GK 2876) to him and thereby deliver him. Only the Lord can take a person out of deep depression so as to give a sense of personal well-being.

5 What is a human being when he is dead? This does not mean that the OT denies life after death, but it puts the emphasis on the present life, lived in relationship to God. There is still time for the psalmist to praise his Creator. The combination of "remembers" (GK 2352) and "praises" (GK 3344) suggests that "remember" is more than an intellectual act of mental representation. It is an intense spiritual act of bringing to mind what God has done as a basis for gratitude (cf. 111:4).

III. Need of God's Love (6:6–7)

6–7 Suffering produces tears. David does not know how much longer he can bear the anguish, insomnia, and tears. He is alone at night in his bed, but his foes are there too, in his thoughts. He cannot renew his strength by himself! The failing eyesight he refers to is not the result of old age but of deep sorrow.

IV. Prayer for God's Favor (6:8–10)

8–10 These verses mark a radical change in tone. Instead of the lament there is a renewal of strength by which the psalmist proclaims to the enemies that the Lord has been victorious in him and that, consequently, they need to prepare themselves for God's vindication of him. Such a transition from lament to victory occurs in other psalms (e.g., 20:6; 22:22; 28:6; 31:19; 69:30).

The Lord has come to the rescue of his servant. He has heard his child crying for favor. He will now deal with the enemies who "do evil" by bringing on their heads the terrible fate they brought on David: shame, agony, and sudden disgrace. Confidence springs up only from conditions changed by the Lord, not from a mere psychological lift or personal effort. When grace penetrates into the depth of an anguished soul, joy in the Lord anchors faith.

Psalm 7: The Righteous God Loves the Righteous

The specific genre of Psalm 7 has been difficult to determine because it contains elements of an individual lament (vv.1–2), an oath (vv.3–5), a psalm of the Lord's kingship (vv.6–12), and a thanksgiving hymn (v.17).

I. Prayer for Refuge (7:1–2)

1–2 The first phrase ("O LORD my God") expresses the confidence that the heavenly Father cares for his child on earth. "I take refuge in you" amplifies the closeness of the psalmist's relationship with God. In the deepest need, the anguished soul cries out to the Father, confident that only the Lord can deliver him from those who pursue him (cf. 1Sa 23:28; 24:14; 25:29; 26:18). David feels as if he is being mauled by a lion and torn to pieces. His predicament reveals the tension between knowing that he is innocent (vv.3–5) and experiencing the apparent judgment of God.

II. Oath of Innocence (7:3–5)

3–4 The psalmist appeals again to his heavenly Father using the same words as in v.1. The repetition of "if" (three times in Hebrew) together with his readiness to suffer for any wrong he may have done show that he is confused. He is astonished that the Lord permits him to be treated as an evildoer. He swears in the presence of God that he is innocent, though not perfect!

5 David argues that he has not done anything to friend or foe to deserve this treatment! If he were a man of treachery, he would gladly permit his enemy to trample him to death. He willingly suffers the curses of the covenant, knowing that the wicked do not deserve "life" and "glory" as do those who are blessed with the covenant promises.

III. God's Righteous Judgment (7:6–13)

6 The psalmist puts forth request after request as he pours out his heart before the Lord. He calls on God to act now in judgment and in wrath. He appeals to God's sense of justice and integrity (v.8). He believes that when God is provoked, "justice" (GK 5477) will be done. Hence the repetitive prayer requesting the Lord to act: "Arise . . . rise up . . . Awake."

7–8 When the Lord comes in his indignation, the nations can no longer escape their due. He calls them to account because he rules over them. He has searched his heart to see whether he has been disloyal to God or to any human being. In the depth of his heart, he knows that while he is not sinless, he is a man of "integrity" (GK 9448). Because of the gravity of his suffering and alienation from God, only God can graciously renew their relationship.

9–11 The affirmation of God as "righteous" (GK 7404) and as one who "searches" is no cause for the righteous to be afraid. They have taken "refuge" in his grace. Their faults are not hidden from his sight, because he tests "minds and hearts," i.e., a person's innermost being. The righteous depend on the gracious relationship initiated and confirmed by God.

God "expresses his wrath" against those who have been tested and are found wanting. He is the "righteous judge" who protects the godly with his saving shield, for they are "the upright in heart," and judges the wicked in his wrath. The "upright" (GK 3838) are full of integrity; in their loyalty to God they can ask him to judge them and search their hearts. But before the judgment occurs, the Lord takes the judgment seat and gathers the nations around him (vv.7–8a).

12–13 David's conviction that God will judge evil grows as he portrays the Lord as a righteous "warrior" (GK 1475) with sword, bow, and arrows. His lightnings are the "flaming arrows." The reference is to arrows dipped in flammable material, such as oil or pitch, and set aflame before being shot. If the wicked do not repent, their judgment is sure. The sharp sword, deadly weapons, and flaming arrows are metaphors of his inescapable judgment. God is preparing himself for judgment at his appointed time.

IV. Judgment of the Guilty (7:14–16)

14–16 Evil is metaphorically portrayed in these verses in the language of conception and birth. The wicked are filled with evil, as a pregnant woman about to give birth. Once wickedness is born, it grows into "trouble" and "violence" (cf. Mk 7:21–22; Jas 1:14–15). The certainty of judgment (vv.12–13) and the prevalence of evil find their point of contact in the doctrine of the retribution of evil (cf. Pr 26:27; Mt 26:52).

V. Praise of God's Righteousness (7:17)

17 The righteous rejoice in the righteousness of God. His righteous judgment affects both the wicked and the righteous. The wicked fall, whereas the righteous experience deliverance in God's acts of judgment. The attribute of God's "righteousness" (GK 7406) is what he does or will do on behalf of his own. He is a victorious God who triumphs over evil and will avenge his children. Despair is thus transformed into hope, and hope is expressed in the singing of praise to the Lord.

The "name" of the God of Israel is Yahweh ("the LORD"; GK 3378). He alone is "God Most High." "Most High" is an epithet of deity and first occurs in the interaction between Melchizedek and Abraham, where it refers to the "Creator of heaven and earth" (cf. Ge 14:18–20, 22). Here the "Most High" describes the universal rule of God, to whom his subjects sing praise (cf. 9:2; 50:14; 92:16). The hope of the godly is in the final removal of evil. Therefore, their praise must include affirmations of God's righteousness and the victory of our Lord Jesus.

Psalm 8: The Glory of the Creator and of Humankind

The hymnic quality of this psalm has been observed by many. The difficulty of classification is due to the many elements woven together in a poetic blend. For our purpose we shall consider it as a hymn of praise and, more particularly, a hymn of creation praise. The Lord is the object of praise (vv.1, 9). Therefore the praise is not an expression of joy in creation apart from the Creator but looks at God as the good Creator, Ruler, and Sustainer of the world.

The significance of Ps 8 lies in its approach to Creation and its application to the Messiah. The biblical account of Creation was intended to help Israel praise the Lord as the sole Creator of everything in heaven, on earth, and in the sea. The NT applies the glory of humankind to the Messiah, as he has subjected everything to himself (Heb 2:6–9; cf. 1Co 15:27; Eph 1:22). In Jesus' victory the Christian has received the glorious renewal of which the psalmist speaks (Heb 2:10–11)!

I. Ascription of Praise (8:1a)

1a The introductory and concluding ascriptions of praise form an inclusion within which the glory of the Creator is the object of celebration. The Redeemer-God is Lord over his people. The name "our Lord" addresses God as king (cf. 97:5). The Redeemer-King of Israel is the Creator! His "name" ("LORD") is glorious over all the earth by virtue of his creative activities (cf. Ge 1:1–31). The word "majestic" (GK 129) is a royal attribute denoting his victories (Ex 15:6), his might in judgment (1Sa 4:8; Ps 76:4), his law (Isa 42:21), and his rule over creation (Pss 8:1, 9; 93:4). All creation reveals the power and glory of God's name (Ro 1:20).

II. The Glory of the Great King (8:1b–2)

1b–2 The Lord's glorious rule over heaven is no surprise from a theistic perspective (19:1). But the marvel is that his creation not only reveals but is glorious (cf. Isa 6:3). The discordant note sounded by the enemies in his creation is silenced by the praise of children (cf. Mt 21:15–16). Regardless of how the wicked assert themselves, they cannot outdo the evidence of God's glory on earth and in heaven. His glory is established ("ordained"; GK 3569), and no enemy can overcome his kingdom. The continuity of the human race is God's way of assuring the ultimate glorification of an earth populated with a new humanity (Hab 2:14).

III. God's Interest in Humanity (8:3–4)

3–4 The Creator has established two spheres of rule: heaven and earth. He has established the celestial bodies in the firmament and has given them the rule over day and night (Ge 1:17–18), whereas he appointed humankind to govern the earth (Ge 1:28). The heavenly bodies all have their appointed place. In relation to the vastness of space, the order and the importance of the heavenly bodies, "what is man"? The word "man" (GK 632) is a poetic word for a human being in his frail human existence (9:20; 90:3; 103:15), whereas "son of man" (cf. 80:17; 144:3) is contrasted with "God" ("heavenly beings"). Human beings are by nature earthlings, and yet they are the particular objects of God's attention. The Creator has invested glory and honor on them. The verbs "mindful" (GK 2349) and "care for" (GK 7212) convey the care of God, who remembers positively by acting on behalf of the human race. Instead of "visiting" persons with judgment, as their sins deserve, God's goodness extends to all creatures in his care (Mt 5:45).

IV. Humanity's Derived Glory (8:5)

5 The significance of human beings is not to be limited to their existence before sin came into the world. They still are "crowned" with glory. The sequence of verbs expresses poetically the status that God, by his divine decree, has given to humankind. The verses could be rendered as "You made [perfect] him a little lower than the heavenly beings and crown [present] him with glory and honor. You make [present] him ruler over the works of your hands; you put [past] everything under his feet."

"Glory and honor" are attributes of God's kingship (29:1; 104:1) that are extended to a human being's royal status. Yet people are not divine; they are in "the image and likeness of God" (Ge 1:26–27). In this exalted status they may be said to be "less than God" (NIV note) or less than "the heavenly [angelic] beings" (the Hebrew allows for either translation).

V. Humanity's Glory as Ruler (8:6–8)

6–8 Humanity's position over creation was granted before the Fall (Ge 1:28), but it was not taken away after the Fall (Ge 9:1–3, 7). Human beings are God's appointed governors (vassals) over creation. Their function on earth is to maintain order, to shine God's light on creation, and to keep a beneficent relationship with all that God has created on earth and in the sea. The Great King has appointed the human race to maintain dominion over creation and not be controlled by creation.

VI. Concluding Ascription of Praise (8:9)

9 See verse 1 above.

Psalm 9: Prayer and Praise for God's Just Rule of the Nations

This psalm is an incomplete acrostic psalm (aleph-kaph) and seems to have formally belonged together with Ps 10 (lamed-taw). It is an individual lament psalm, combining prayer with praise and telling of God's just rule over the nations. The next psalm is an individual lament psalm in which prayer focuses on the enemies of the covenant, who have at one time belonged to the faithful.

I. Individual Praise (9:1–2)

1–2 In response to a distressing situation, the psalmist brings himself to praise God in anticipation of the hour of deliverance. He exhorts himself to such praise, not only as a therapy to forget his troubles for a moment, but also to deepen his trust in the Lord. The depth of gratitude and joy finds expression in five synonymous verbs expressive of praise: "I will praise . . . tell . . . be glad . . . rejoice . . . sing praise." He praises God with all his "heart," for he loves the Lord without reservation.

The various verbs for praise express the intensity of the psalmist's love for God. His God is none other than the God of "wonders" (GK 7098), i.e., God's marvelous acts of redemption and judgment. These acts were regularly rehearsed as a reminder of God's goodness and love, especially for comfort in time of need. The psalmist praises the "name" of God ("LORD"), who is also the "Most High," in hope that the name of God will protect his servant and that the Lord will manifest again a "wonder" on his behalf.

II. Judgment on the Wicked (9:3–6)

3 The psalmist now prays that the Lord will "turn back" (GK 8740) his enemies so that they will be no more. When God makes the enemies to flee, they will stumble and perish. "Before you" may be interpreted as "from your presence," "because of your presence," or "in your presence."

4–6 The prayer contains a request that the Lord will uphold his own, rule righteously, and rebuke the nations, so that ruin and destruction will overtake them and their memory may perish. The child of God may freely present his "right" or "cause" to his or her Redeemer-God. The "right" is the case lodged against the wicked. Belief in God's justice is liberating because God is both Advocate and Judge. Freedom from worry is God's gift to his child, because God judges "righteously."

The "righteous" judgment of God is guaranteed by his rule. He is the Great King over all and, thereby, has authority to judge effectively. To this end the psalmist prays that God will "rebuke the nations and destroy the wicked" (cf. v.5). The "rebuke" (GK 1721) of God is both his wrath against the enemy and his defense of the righteous. In the end it will seem as if the wicked have never existed. He will blot out their name.

III. Hope in God's Just Rule (9:7–10)

7–10 The ground of hope in prayer is the belief that the Lord rules! The hope of the godly during duress remains in the presence of God's kingdom. Though not always transparent, the Lord is King! Belief in his kingship affirms one's conviction of the difference between his rule and that of the nations and gives hope in the biblical teaching that he shall establish righteousness on earth. Because he reigns, there is hope. He is the "refuge" and "stronghold" for his children. God as a "refuge" (GK 5369) is a metaphor for the power and goodness of the Lord for the "oppressed," an OT equivalent of "poor in spirit" (cf. 10:17; 74:21). He will "never" forsake those who rely on him!

The psalmist is confident that God's rule is beneficial to the godly, i.e., to those who "know" the name of the Lord. He cares for them (1:6), and they trust in his "name" to deliver them from distress. They "seek" him with their whole being and are not like the nations that forget God (v.17).

IV. Communal Praise and Individual Prayer (9:11–14)

11–12 The praise of the godly rises out of their conviction that God cares. The psalmist calls on them to join with him in singing a hymn, the focus of which is God's just rule. He is "enthroned in Zion" (cf. 2:4, 6). Zion is his "footstool," or the earthly manifestation of his heavenly rule (cf. 2:4; 76:2; 132:13–14). This Great King serves his people, vindicating the needy. Even when they were in distress and it seemed as if God was not present, the nations were to understand that his nature will never tolerate injustice done to his elect. He does not forget the atrocities suffered by the poor; he cares for "the cry of the afflicted."

13–14 The enemy causes the affliction, and the gravity of the experience often gives rise to a prayerful cry for help (cf. v.12; 88:13) with the hope that God may "see" and "have mercy." The intensity of the suffering is comparable with death. David feels as if hell ("the gates of death") is here. Life has turned into a trial of alienation, affliction, and disaster, and he cannot dig his way out. Only in "Zion" may the godly find rest because God dispenses his righteousness to them where he is. The "Daughter of Zion" stands for God's people (Mic 4:8) or for Jerusalem, the city of God (Isa 1:8; 10:32).

The praise of God is a recounting of the "salvation" (GK 3802) of God. The psalmist looks forward to God's deliverance and to the end of the rule of the wicked. He also looks forward to the time when he will "declare" the "praises" of the Lord. The public proclamation involves a remembrance of God's "wonders" (v.1), of his "praises" (i.e., his praiseworthy acts), and of his glorious acts of "salvation."

V. Judgment of the Wicked (9:15–18)

15–18 These four verses are to be regarded as the hymn of praise the psalmist spoke of in v.14. The trust of the godly is grounded in their conviction that "the needy will not always be forgotten, nor the hope of the afflicted ever perish." Therefore they can anticipate the time when the principle of retribution takes effect and the afflicted find relief. The song includes hope pertaining to the end of the wicked, as if it already had taken place, much the same as the song "Fallen! Fallen is Babylon the Great!" (Rev 18:2). (Higgaion is a musical notation (cf. 92:4). Combined with Selah, it may indicate a meditative mood in which vv.17–18 are to be sung.)

VI. Hope in God's Just Rule (9:19–20)

19–20 The mood changes from pensive meditation on God's faithfulness to the elect (v.18) to a rousing cry for immediate deliverance. "Terror" is not an indication of complete alienation and doom; rather it is an act by which the nations may "fear" the Lord, recognizing their human frailty. The cry comes out of a broken spirit and shows no evidence of enmity or a desire for revenge. The issue is God's justice and faithfulness to his own. If he does not judge the nations, they will never realize that they are revolutionaries against their Creator-King. They are but "men," i.e., weak and human. The "terror" of the acts of God strikes the ungodly with a sense of hopelessness, but God's vengeance on the wicked signifies hope and redemption for the godly!

Psalm 10: Human Rule and God's Kingship

The focus of Ps 10 lies on the problem of theodicy, i.e., the justice of God in face of the prosperity of the wicked Israelites. The psalm gives a moving picture of the development of evil within the covenant community.

I. Questions (10:1)

1 The assurance of God's kingship and justice is missing in the opening note of the psalm. The tone is set by the interrogative "Why?" The psalmist does not accuse God of having forsaken his own; rather it seems to him as if "the times of trouble" are too much a burden to carry. His prayers for deliverance are unheard. He needs God's help, but it is as if God keeps his distance by keeping himself well-hidden. The question also introduces the riddle of the prosperity of the wicked and the suffering of the righteous (cf. Ps 73). The riddle is not resolved but is refocused on the God who cares for his own (v.14).

II. The Rule of the Wicked (10:2–11)

2 In their pride the wicked act as "gods" in this world. Their vile words and despotic acts offend and hurt the people of God. But God does not always react swiftly to protect the honor of his name. The people whom the psalmist describes were familiar with God and his law, but they openly rejected the godly way of life in favor of freedom and power. The ways of evil and righteousness are inconsistent. Evil cannot tolerate godliness but pursues the godly with an unholy zeal. The righteous, whom the wicked attempt to trap, are not "weak" but "afflicted." The translation "hunts down" (GK 1944) brings out the "hot pursuit" of the wicked. But it is not clear whether the godly are actually "caught" by their crafty schemes or whether the psalmist prays that the wicked may be caught by their own plots.

3–4 The evil man's hatred of the godly expresses a total disregard for the Lord and his commandments. He is filled with self. The wicked "boasts" that whatever he desires, he can accomplish by his scheming. This greedy man has no regard for God or his commandments. He "praises" himself but spurns the covenant God. His goal in life is a purposeful avoidance of God. He is not an atheist, but instead he has conveniently chosen to live without God. The rejection of the Lord is evident from the greedy man's warped sense of justice and concern (v.5), his false confidence (v.6), his foul language (v.7), his perverse acts (vv.8–10), and his utter disregard of accountability to God (v.11)

5 Success may crown injustice. The prosperity of the godly (1:3) is guaranteed by God, but the wicked make every effort to take their share. They flaunt the "judgments" ("laws") of God. Because God has not yet come in judgment, the wicked become more brazen in their selfish, despotic rule. They have contempt for any who get in their way and count them as their "enemies" (cf. Mal 1:13).

6 In their prosperity the wicked presumptuously take to themselves the privileges of the righteous—those whom God has promised will not be moved. The wicked do not need God. Moreover, they are "happy" with themselves. In their pride they may live without a sense of accountability, for they do not expect retribution. Moreover, they take measures never to experience "trouble" as they autonomously attempt to avoid God's righteous judgment.

7–10 The wicked may appear not to be dangerous, but they use their tongues as a weapon. They intimidate with their curses and threats; his oath is worthless because it is a lie. But they are so powerful and persuasive in their speech that they always seem to get their way. Their speech reflects their scheming (vv.3–4, 6), and his intent is to work destruction. "Trouble and evil" are a way of life for them. They lie in wait like wild animals to ambush and gain control over innocent victims. Once the wicked have their victims, they carry them off like a "lion." The psalmist also compares the wicked to the hunter who pursues his prey and traps it in a net. Thus the victims are overpowered by brute force. They receive no justice or mercy.

11 The psalmist returns to his starting point (cf. vv.2–4). The arrogance of the wicked expresses itself in injustice, but their root problem is their utter disregard for the Lord. They have rejected the covenant God by speech and actions. They mistake God's patience with evil for God's lack of interest in justice and the innocent victims. Their boldness grows as they no longer sense any accountability to God for their actions.

III. Prayer for Deliverance (10:12–15)

12–15 Verses 12 and 15 together form the prayer for God's intervention. In between these two verses the psalmist reflects on the folly of the wicked. He asks with amazement "why" or "how" the wicked dare to revile God and imagine that God does not see evil (cf. v.11). He answers his own question, calming his feelings of disturbance and anxiety at the presence of evil. God does after all see their evil exploits.

The wicked may spurn God and his judgments (vv.3–5), while the innocent victims seek protection from their heavenly Father. The emphatic use of "But you" and "you" implies that the sole hope of the victims is in their abandonment to their God, who has promised to help the fatherless and all his children in need (cf. vv.17–18). God's patience explains the delay in justice.

IV. The Rule of God (10:16)

16 The hope of the righteous in a just world lies in the Lord. His kingship is established "for ever and ever." How can the wicked think that they will last "from generation to generation" (cf. v.6)? Together with the nations, they will perish from "his land," so as to leave God's people at rest. The concern of the psalmist here is with the "land" of Israel, where anarchy prevailed. The word "nations" refers to the wicked in Israel, who act like the nations.

V. Resolution (10:17–18)

17–18 God's kingship was revealed to Israel (Ex 15:18) and came to expression in Israel. Because God is faithful to the covenant, he has promised to judge the needy. "The fatherless and the oppressed" is a reference to the class of people who were most easily wronged but were protected by God's law (Ex 22:22–24; Dt 10:18; 16:11, 14). God gives the needy what they desire by stopping the reign of terror by those who act like gods. The idiom "who is of the earth" expresses the weakness of humankind.

Psalm 11: Refuge in the Righteous King

The psalm is an individual lament with an emphasis on confidence in the Lord. The lament is expressed in the words of the friends who despair of evil (vv.1c–3).

I. Refuge in God (11:1–3)

1–3 The wicked are fully intent on making anarchy their way of life. They haunt the "upright in heart," i.e., the godly, who know and love the Lord and therefore do his will. The wicked are bent on ridding themselves of those who do God's will on earth. There are two responses to the immediate threat: escape or refuge. Reason dictates escape. The godly seem to be powerless against such treachery. In view of this, the psalmist asks, "What can the righteous do?" The psalmist has already answered this counsel by his personal expression of trust: "In the LORD I take refuge." Trust and confidence in the Lord mark this psalm (cf. vv.4, 7).

"Flee like a bird" is an expression of quick escape in search of quietness (cf. 55:6; 124:7). The psalmist quickly dismisses escape. His advisors argue against him with facts. The wicked slander him as they stalk like predators for the kill. Their tongues are bent like bows; their words are "arrows" against the string. They lie in ambush and lurk in the dark, and their "tongues" hurl sudden abuse at the godly. The wicked are deceptive and filled with treachery. They seek to destroy the very "foundations" (GK 9268)—a metaphor for the order of society (75:3; 82:5; Eze 30:4). This order has been established by the Lord at creation and is being maintained. God's justice and law are being replaced by human autonomy and its resultant anarchy.

II. The Lord Is the Righteous King (11:4–6)

4–5 The psalmist looks beyond both his advisors and his enemies to the Lord, raising his eyes to heaven. The "holy temple" is God's palace in heaven (18:6; 29:9). God is "holy," and from his throne in heaven he sees all humankind. The "throne" is a symbol of his royal rule and authority to judge (cf. 9:7; 47:8). The Lord's eyes "test" humankind as he patiently observes their feverish activities. It may seem as if God, by his inactivity, does not care; but he sees and examines the wicked together with the righteous. "Examine" (GK 1043) denotes the activity of the smith in the process of purifying gold or silver (cf. Jer 6:27–30; 9:7). The holy God may not immediately judge the wicked, but his holiness excludes any love for those who "love violence."

6 In his own time God will judge the wicked with "fiery coals and burning sulfur," just as Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed (cf. Ge 19:24). Another image of judgment is the "scorching wind." The hot desert wind blows over the Middle East during the changes in season from spring to summer and from summer to fall. Its effects are devastating, as the beauty of vegetation changes over night into parched, withered plants (cf. Isa 21:1; 40:7–8). The wicked will be like the flowers of the field, which are here today and gone tomorrow. Destruction will be their "lot" (GK 3926 & 4987; lit., "portion of their cup"). This term reminds one of the head of a household who gives each member a cupful to drink at a meal. Thus God gives the wicked a "cupful" of his wrath (cf. Isa 51:17, 22; Eze 23:31–33; cf. Mt 26:39).

III. God Is the Refuge of the Righteous (11:7)

7 God loves those who do righteous acts. He who sees and examines everyone promises that only the "upright" of heart will see him (cf. 17:15; 63:2). To see the face of God is an expression of deliverance from adversity, of close communion, and of the reality of God's blessed presence in this world and in the world to come.

Psalm 12: Lying Tongues and the Truthfulness of God's Word

This psalm, a community lament, is a prayer on behalf of or by the people of God for deliverance from the deceptions and scheming of the godless (vv.1–4). The Lord promises to protect his own (v.5), but he expects his children to live with the tensions resulting from a walk in faith. The psalm also includes a statement of confidence in God.

I. Prayer for Deliverance (12:1–4)

1 The description of the prevalence of evil is a connecting link with Ps 11:2–3. The intent of the wicked was to rid themselves of "the upright in heart" (11:2; cf. v.7). The psalmist observes that the godly, characterized by their faithfulness to the Lord, have vanished. Of course, this is hyperbolic language, but it is a manner of bringing before the covenant God his promise to free his people.

2–4 The wicked disobey God with their tongues. They pervert and twist truth. Their goal is to gain power by flattery, deception, and clever schemes. They do not tolerate authority but prefer autonomy and anarchy. The wicked are "double-hearted" (lit., "with deception") by the very way they speak (cf. Jas 3:10–12). Their aim is power, and that end justifies any means. They do not shrink from flattery, boasting, denying God's way, and exalting their own way. The psalmist cries out to God that perverse speech will cease and that righteousness thereby may be established.

II. Promise of the Lord (12:5)

5 The Lord answers the cry of the needy, even as he has promised. He hears their groaning (79:11; 102:20) and prepares himself to act on their behalf. The exaltation of God must bring the abasement and removal of the wicked (Isa 33:11–12); God protects the afflicted from their oppressors. The last clause in Hebrew is literally "he will blow at him." The NIV rendering describes the wicked as "those who malign them." It may also refer to the afflicted as those who "pant for" deliverance (cf. NEB).

III. Reflection on God's Promises (12:6)

6 The assurance of the godly ultimately lies in God's promises. His "words" are pure ("flawless"), refined like silver that has been subjected to a sevenfold process of purification (cf. 18:30; 119:140). Over against the lies, deceptions, treachery, perverse speech, and scheming of the wicked is God's word!

IV. Prayer for Deliverance (12:7–8)

7 In response to the assurance of God's word, the psalmist brings his lament to a peaceful conclusion. Regardless of the circumstances of life, God's children are assured of the special protection of their heavenly Father. The wicked may turn the world upside down, but God will guard his own. As he has promised (Nu 6:24–26), he keeps them "safe" from the wicked, "from such people" (lit., "from this generation"). The word "generation" (GK 1887) signifies here a group of people who live at the same time; i.e., contemporaries.

8 God's guarding his people is a reality even when the wicked walk around as kings. When vv.1, 7–8 are read together as an inclusion, the comfort lies in God's protection from an evil generation that is, after all, characterized by human frailty. Therefore the hope of the psalmist lies in the Lord, his covenant God. The psalm contains no resolution to the problem of evil, but it recognizes that evil is under the full sovereignty of the Lord.

Psalm 13: Waiting for God's Salvation

This psalm, a deeply moving picture of despair and trust, realistically depicts the anguish of the soul, yet a soul that also experiences a deep faith. The psalm is classified as an individual lament, but it is also expressive of the needs of the community of God's people. The situation that brings the psalmist to the point of despair may be illness.

I. Expression of Despair: How Long? (13:1–2)

1–2 The fourfold repetition "how long" emphasizes the intensity of emotions. David looks first at God as the source of his trouble, when he asks, "Will you forget me forever?" (here "forever" means "continually" or "utterly"). For some reason unknown to David, God has removed his covenant mercy from him (cf. 10:1, 11). The hiding of God's face is an expression for alienation and curse. The psalmist is alone, and suffering in loneliness aggravates the anguish. He searches his thoughts as to what has happened.

God is displeased, but why? When the psalmist turns to the people around him, he sees his enemy. The enemy is on the periphery of his concern, and yet he is always there. Is the enemy death, the presence of evil in the world, or oppressors who have nearly "overcome him" (v.4)? There seems not to be sufficient reason for limiting the situation to illness and death, because the clause "sleep in death" (v.3) may be a metaphor for deep depression and suffering. The psalmist is disturbed in his deepest being by God's lack of interest, by the adversaries (adversities), and by his own feelings.

II. Expression of Prayer: Give Me Light! (13:3–4)

3–4 The psalmist believes that God has hidden his face from him; therefore he asks, "Look on me." Divine abandonment and alienation made the psalmist experience despair, but God's "look" (GK 5564), expressive of favor, renews life. The psalmist asks for God to "answer" (GK 6699) him. The answer is a positive message of God's favor by which the Lord frees his servant from the causes of the anguish of soul. The psalmist believes that only by God's favor will he receive "light" for his eyes. Anyone who is relieved from troubles and blessed with God's protection, peace, and favor shows his or her inner spiritual condition in outward appearance (cf. 36:8–9). One's eyes sparkle with God's grace.

The psalmist's prayer here contains an urgent appeal for God's covenant favor. If he were to be vexed and overcome by "death," the enemies would have cause to gloat. Their joy expressed not only pleasure in the fall of the godly but also in God's failure to be faithful to his covenant promises. The "fall" (GK 4572) is a stumbling under a load too heavy to carry. Before more trouble comes, and before the godless have reason to rejoice over the defeat of the godly, God must act to protect his honor.

III. Expression of Hope and Trust: Let Me Sing! (13:5–6)

5–6 Though he has experienced deep despair, the psalmist does not give up. His feet did not slip. He held on to the promise of God's covenant love. He was not overwhelmed by his troubles. The emphatic "But I" is a surprising response from the heart of a depressed person. Because life may be so bitter for some, it is only by God's grace that the heart of faith may groan, "but I."

The effect of God's love for which the psalmist longs is the experience of salvation. "Salvation" (GK 3802) signifies the whole well-being of God's child. He needs the assurance that God cares (v.1), as well as the experience of victory over his enemy and over adverse circumstances (vv.2, 4). He also needs the healing in his thoughts of anguish and self-pity (v.2). God's "salvation" takes care of all his needs. He will therefore rejoice in the Lord when God shows his fatherly care.

Psalm 14: God Deals With Foolish Evildoers

This psalm is parallel to Psalm 53. The language is similar except on a few points, which may be explained by the context in which each was finalized. The genre has been disputed. Because of its affinity with the lament psalms against the wicked, it has been categorized as an individual lament. However, the contrast between the fool and the one with understanding is representative of the wisdom psalms. Another representative element is the prophetic motif, incorporated in a liturgical prayer.

I. The Fool (14:1)

1 The "fool" (GK 5572) is neither ignorant nor an atheist. The word is synonymous with the wicked, who aggressively and intentionally flouts his independence from God and his commandments (cf. 53:1; 74:18, 22). The "fool" in his heart denies the practical import of God's existence. He shuts off the affairs of this world from divine intervention and denies any personal accountability to God for his actions (cf. 10:4; 73:11). Within the congregation he may mimic the sounds of faith, but his true self shows disregard for God, his commandments, and his people. He is characterized by an absence of concern or love for others, but he is occupied with himself.

Three phrases describe the perniciousness of the wicked. (1) "They are corrupt." (2) "Their deeds are vile"; i.e., detestable acts are done out of complete disregard for God's the majesty. (3) "There is no one who does good" is a summary statement about the absence of godliness.

II. The Lord's Perspective (14:2–3)

2 The Lord "looks down" as witness and judge on his creatures and observes the affliction of his children. The wise (in contrast to "the fool") are those "who understand [and who] seek after God." They love to do the will of their covenant God on earth.

3 As God observes humankind, he is overwhelmed by the evil he sees. It seems as if "all have turned aside" and have "become corrupt," as if no one "does good." The negative picture of the fool (v.1) is reinforced by the totality of human evil. Humankind has become apostate because it has "turned aside" (cf. 53:3; cf. Ro 3:11–18).

III. The Prophetic Perspective (14:4–6)

4–6 The Lord is the "refuge" (GK 4726) of the wise—called "my people," "the company of the righteous," and "the poor." Fools are not numbered among them because they are "evildoers" who do not know the Lord intimately or care about his looking down from heaven. They busily pursue their self-interests and, in so doing, "devour" (GK 430) God's people. Their hatred of righteousness and the vulnerability of the righteous combine to make the wise easy prey. They "devour" the possessions of others and add them to their own, completely disregarding the rights of their subjects (cf. Isa 5:8).

Suddenly, God's judgment will come on the wicked. Their power and terrorizing will come to an end when the Lord intervenes on behalf of his "people." Then "dread" will overtake the fools, while the righteous will enjoy the presence of their covenant God. The wicked may for a time heap abuse on "the plans of the poor." But even in their persecution, God is "the refuge" of his children.

IV. The Hope of the Righteous (14:7)

7 The conclusion is a most appropriate prayer for "salvation" (GK 3802). The phraseology "restore the fortunes" is characteristic of the prophets as they describe the era of restoration when Israel, restored to the land, will again enjoy the blessings of God (cf. Eze 16:53; Zep 2:7). After the Exile God demonstrated his faithfulness by his renewed blessings, by restoring Israel to the land, and by permitting his temple to be rebuilt. The psalmist anticipates an era when God will vindicate his people and deliver them from the fools who oppress them. In Jesus' coming Jews and Gentiles are further assured of God's concern, vindication, and presence with his people (cf. Ro 11).

Psalm 15: Who May Live in God's Presence?

This psalm begins with a question and concludes with God's promise. The question-and-answer method, coupled with the concluding promise, suggests that it is a wisdom psalm.

I. The Question (15:1)

1 The repetition of the interrogative particle "who" is not so much a question of the identity of those entering into God's presence as it is of what kind of a person may enjoy his fellowship. The verbs "dwell" and "live" are metaphors for communion with God. The complementary usage of "sanctuary" and "your holy hill" suggests the background of a pilgrimage to Mount Zion, God's holy hill. As the pilgrims approached Jerusalem—the city of God, where his "sanctuary" was located on the "holy hill"—they had to examine themselves before entering the courts of God's sanctuary.

II. The Response (15:2–5a)

2–5a The wise are primarily characterized by the word "blameless" (GK 9459). It is not synonymous with "perfect" but with an attitude of the heart desirous of pleasing God. The blameless are people of integrity in relationship to God and others. In their personal relations, they express a righteous and faithful lifestyle. Regardless of what God requires, the blameless do God's will on earth.

The words "righteous" (GK 7406) and "truth" (GK 622) are synonymous with "blameless." The righteous do what is right, living in accordance with God's expectations. The phrase "truth from his heart" reveals the fidelity between one's "heart," as the seat of one's being, and one's speech, which expresses one's inner being.

The activities of walking, doing, and speaking are not to be isolated as separate expressions of the righteous path but express synthetically that everything the wise do is in harmony with the expectations of God and humankind. The three negative conditions in v.3 give examples of what a blameless person does not do. The word for "neighbor" (GK 8276) is somebody with whom one frequently associates. The wicked have no sense of loyalty and lay traps for anyone to fall into. The wise, on the other hand, do not purposely hurt their fellow human beings, let alone their friends.

The wise neither initiate nor rejoice in the reproach of their associates; they empathize in their hurt. The "vile man" is a "reprobate," known for his evil deeds. The godly, in other words, are not free to "despise" any sinner, only those who are hardened in their perver-sities. They ably distinguish between those who "fear the LORD" and those who are reprobates. In their self-respect they respect the rights, gifts, and status of others.

When they promise, make a vow, or swear to do something, the wise remain true to their word (cf. Ecc 5:1–7; Mt 5:33–37). They have a deep sense of integrity and must often make material sacrifices to be honest. Their honor is more important than their wallet.

The concern of the wise shows up also in their relationship to the poor and to those who need justice. The poor at times need a loan to keep themselves from being sold into slavery. "Usury" (GK 5968) was the practice of charging high interest. It was prohibited because of the need of the poor not to get further into debt. The law instructed Israelites not to take advantage of the adversities of a fellow Israelite who had fallen on hard times (Ex 22:25–27; Lev 25:35–36; Dt 23:19).

Often the poor were dragged into court and taken advantage of by the well-to-do, who could easily afford to pay a bribe to thwart justice. Bribery was strictly prohibited in the law (cf. Ex 23:8; Dt 16:19). The godly witness or judge should refuse any bribe as being a perversion of justice. Although the law clearly prohibited usury and bribery, it did not prohibit receiving equitable compensation. The godly person does not discriminate against the poor in favor of the rich, powerful, and influential.

III. The Promise (15:5b)

5b The reward of God ensures that the wise will "dwell" with the Lord (v.1; cf. 23:6). They may experience adversities, but they will never fall, as will the wicked. They will never be "shaken" (GK 4572; cf. 16:8). This is God's promise. Clearly the ethics of God's people are not a system of morality independent of the Lord but have a theological basis (cf. Mt 5–7).

Psalm 16: Refuge in the Lord

The confession of confidence in God exemplifies a deep trust in the Lord in both life and death. The life-setting of this psalm is difficult to determine. The psalm may at least be viewed as a composition made during a time of peace and quiet.

I. Confidence in the Lord (16:1–4)

1 The psalm opens with words of trust in God, who alone is able to give shelter. The expectation of safe-keeping is grounded in God's promise to keep and to guard the members of the covenant community who seek "refuge" in him (cf. 7:1; 11:1; 17:7).

2 The psalmist approaches God as "my Lord" (Adonai, GK 151) and as "my good" ("I have no good thing"). "My Lord" reveals the psalmist's submission to God as "Master" and "Ruler" (see 8:1) over against those who run after other gods (v.4). Hence his confidence is in God's care for him. He further describes his relationship to his God as the source of all his benefits. The sovereign God is "my good," i.e., the reason for his existence and joy (cf. 73:25).

3 Delight in God also finds expression in a joyful acceptance of "the saints" (GK 6221). The "saints who are in the land" are the godly on earth, not angelic beings; they are consecrated to the Lord (cf. Ex 19:6). The "saints" are also known as "the glorious ones" (GK 129), as the Lord himself bestows glory and majesty on his own (cf. 8:1, 9; 93:1, 4). The psalmist thus expresses the importance of the community of the saints.

4 The ungodly's idolatrous acts are described as pouring of "libations of blood" and swearing by the names of the idols. "Of blood" may refer to human sacrifices (Isa 57:5–6) or to guilt due to bloodshed (Isa 1:15; 66:3). The psalmist strongly states his antipathy to such idolatrous practices. Paganism is a way of life completely inconsistent with trust in God as the sovereign Master. The psalmist makes no mention of their idols, in keeping with his declaration that he will not "take up their names" on his lips (cf. Hos 2:17).

II. The Experience of Faith (16:5–6)

5–6 Having demonstrated his abhorrence of idolatry and his decision not to join in with those who poured out a drink offering, the psalmist now recognizes how good the Lord is to his own. Loyalty to the Lord is in response to his acts of beneficence. Using language reminiscent of the conquest of Canaan, the psalmist reflects on all that the Lord has done. However, he goes beyond the occupation of Canaan in considering God's benefits. The Lord promised the members of the priesthood to be their share and inheritance (Nu 18:20; Dt 10:9; 18:1). Israel as a whole was his inheritance (Jer 12:7–9). But the godly can join in with the experience of the psalmist, wherever and whenever they live. God deals kindly with his children in that he bestows on them his covenant blessings and promises.

The nature of God's benefits are described as "pleasant" (GK 5833) and "delightful" (GK 9182). Even as God gave his people a pleasant land as an inheritance, so the psalmist rejoices in the bounty of God's goodness to him. However, his joy is not first and foremost in God's gifts but in the Lord himself.

III. Confidence in the Lord (16:7–8)

7–8 The theocentric focus is further supported by the psalmist's response of praise. He shows his loyalty to the Lord in "praise" (lit., "bless"; GK 1385) and in obedience. In life situations the psalmist is not easily moved by the idolaters (v.4), because his chief goal in life is to love God and live for him. By day he can say that the Lord gives him counsel, which aids him to live wisely. At night God "instructs" him through the meditation with his inner self. God is always present at his "right hand." Therefore, his confidence in the Lord is the result of his experience of God's goodness, grace, and fatherly instruction. As a sage, the psalmist can claim God's promise that the wise and righteous "will not be shaken" (cf. 15:5; 21:7; 62:2, 6; 112:6).

IV. The Experience of Faith (16:9–11)

9–10 The basis for the psalmist's joy is twofold. (1) His God is the sovereign Master to whom he has fled for protection (vv.1–2). (2) The Lord has been good to him (vv.2b, 5–8). His conclusion to this psalm of confidence begins with "Therefore"; but the "therefore" introduces additional, though related, reasons for his confidence. The Lord cares for him in life and in death. In life the Lord gives him security (vv.5–6) and in death, protection. He may go into "the grave," but the Lord will not permit his beloved ("Holy One") to suffer eternal alienation; even in death his relationship with God continues. The phrase "see decay" is a metaphor for total isolation and abandonment from God's presence.

In the apostolic preaching this verse had a particular apologetic significance, as both Peter (Ac 2:27, 31) and Paul (Ac 13:35) quoted v.10 as proof of the resurrection of our Lord. They appropriately argued that since David died and did not rise from the grave, the psalm received a special significance in view of Jesus' death and resurrection. Jesus, as the Son of David, arose from the dead, "because it was impossible for death to keep its hold on him" (Ac 2:24). The resurrection of our Lord gives a ground for the confidence of all believers since they too will not suffer corruption. The Father will crown his beloved with life.

11 The psalmist develops further the nature of life with God. Its origin is with God, and its goal is the presence of God, even to be at "your right hand." It produces "joy" and "eternal pleasures." "The path of life" signifies the way that leads to life. It is a wisdom term for the fullness of life that only the wise can achieve (Pr 5:6; 6:23; 10:17; 15:24). The psalmist conceives of life in fellowship with God both in this world and in the hope of everlasting fellowship with God.

Psalm 17: A Prayer for God's Justice

The concern for righteousness dominates this psalm from beginning to end. It concludes with the hope that the psalmist will see God "in righteousness" (v.15). The prayer is a psalm of innocence under the general category of lament psalms.

I. Prayer of a Righteous Man (17:1–5)

1 The psalmist uses three intense expressions to call on the Lord ("Hear . . . listen . . . give ear"). Being in deep distress, he confidently approaches God in prayer. The psalmist's "cry" (GK 8262) is a desperate call for help and an intense form of prayer. His cry is "a righteous plea"; that is, the psalmist prays as an innocent man who is not to be charged with the deception of his contemporaries. He has lived in accordance with God's righteous law and can say that his prayer "does not rise from deceitful lips." Prayer requires an attitude of sincerity, without hypocrisy (cf. Jas 5:16–18).

2 The content of the prayer is twofold: for vindication and for investigation. In the belief that God is sovereign and faithful, David rests his case with God and looks forward to his goodness in this life and in the life to come (v.15). In his second petition, the psalmist prays that the Lord will examine his integrity ("what is right"). He is not claiming perfection but addresses God out of the sincerity of his heart and presses for a resolution to his difficulty.

3 The psalmist believes that he has done nothing to deserve his suffering and that he has not transgressed with his lips against God's commandments. His prayer is confident, but it is a godly confidence, expressive both of the deepest trust in and of a tender walk with God. Therefore he requests God to "test" (GK 7671) his heart, i.e., to put him through every conceivable examination to determine the purity and integrity of the heart. The psalmist wants the Lord to examine him especially at night, for at that time he is isolated from his occupation and social relations and is alone with God. That examination involves a self-examination, as one reflects on one's attitude, loyalty, and obedience to God's commandments.

4–5 The psalmist is confident of his integrity even when the Lord enlarges the scope of his examination to his actions and words. He has paid careful attention to wise living by not associating with the "violent" (GK 7265), i.e., with those who have no consideration of God or his commands. The violent were the gangsters of the OT, who robbed and murdered without blinking an eye (cf. Jer 7:11; 18:10). David had held onto the way of God, without slipping into the way of thieves. The "paths" (GK 5047) of the Lord refer to the ways of godliness, in opposition to the "ways of the violent."

II. Prayer for Protection (17:6–9)

6–9 David appeals to God to respond to his petition. His urgency is based on the confidence that God will answer him. The boldness in his calling on God expresses the close relationship, further described by the metaphors "the apple of your eye" and "the shadow of your wings." These metaphors express the love of God in his acts of care and protection for those who are dear to him (cf. Dt 32:10–12). Since the enemies have become a real threat, intent on assailing him and destroying him, David calls on God to act again on behalf of his beloved.

However, God answers prayer, provides "refuge" to those who seek it, and delivers the godly with his "right hand," which signifies the strength by which he sustains and redeems his own from trouble. He looks to God to demonstrate his promised acts of love and loyalty. Because the need is now, the psalmist prays for God's deliverance with great intensity. God stoops down to deliver his children.

III. The Wicked (17:10–12)

10–12 The psalmist, overwhelmed by the thought of his foes, elaborates on their evil. The wicked are "like a lion" in their pursuit of the godly. The "lion," a symbol of brute strength and a ferocious appetite (cf. Jdg 14:14), presents a powerful picture. Their beastlike nature finds expression in their callous hearts, arrogance, pursuit to the death, and violence. They are greedy, self-loving, and insensitive to others (cf. 73:7; 119:70). The outward expression of the wicked is consistent with their inner being. They speak "with arrogance," which excludes God and concern for others. Without mercy they track down, surround, and finally destroy those weaker than themselves.

IV. Prayer for Deliverance (17:13)

13 The mood shifts as David gazes away from the threat of the wicked and looks to his God. He prays that God will act, not in the future, but now. The call to "rise up" (GK 7756) and act in deliverance and vindication is common to other psalms (3:7; 7:6; 9:19; et al.). Instead of directly confronting evil himself, he expects the Lord to "confront" it in his stead. The Lord will not tolerate their opposition; rather he will make the wicked bow down. This is not an act of worship but of total destruction by the "sword" of the Lord.

V. The Wicked (17:14)

14 The description of the wicked as "men of this world whose reward is in this life" interprets the enigmatic Hebrew "from a world their portion in life." Clearly the psalmist prays for God to act against the wicked and to rescue his own. The second part of this verse relates back to the metaphor of the wings under which the psalmist found refuge; God provides for the needs of his cherished ones.

VI. Hope in Righteousness (17:15)

15 God will confront the wicked in judgment, but the godly will see his "face." The wicked will be forced to bow down and will be destroyed, whereas the godly will enjoy God's presence "in righteousness." "Righteousness" (GK 7406) has the sense of victory and joy procured by the Lord and shared with his beloved. The wicked were self-satisfied (v.10) and shared their wealth with their descendants so that they too would "be satisfied." But the godly do not comfort themselves with the thought of transitory "blessings." They will be "satisfied" with the "likeness" of God! "When I awake" suggests that this prayer is an evening prayer (4:8). At the same time, however, the psalmist by inspiration is looking for a greater experience with God that can only be a part of the postresurrection world.

Psalm 18: Royal Thanksgiving

This psalm has been variously categorized. Some have divided the psalm into two units: an individual lament (vv.1–30) and a royal thanksgiving psalm (vv.31–50). However, based on a careful study of the parallel psalm in 2Sa 22, scholars today generally agree that the psalm is a psalm of thanksgiving.

I. The Lord, the Rock of Israel (18:1–3)

1 A unique verb expressive of "love" (GK 8163) for God opens the psalm. This verb is usually used to affirm God's compassion for humankind. It implies the need of the one who receives the compassion and is associated with the mother's care for her children. David thus expresses his commitment to the Lord who is his source of strength, comfort, and sustenance. The phrase "I love you" communicates an intimacy of his relationship based on experience. The further description of the Lord as "my strength" (GK 2619) supports this argument. David has seen the "strength" of God in his adversity.

2 The divine epithets used in this verse are derived from David's familiarity with battle and with the geographical scenery of Canaan. These metaphors convey the intensity of David's love for his God as the all-sufficient One. God is the Great King who is able to deliver those who call on him. He is the "rock" (GK 6152) of Israel (Dt 32:4, 15, 18, 31, 37), who is faithful from generation to generation. The Lord provides a "refuge" (GK 2879) for his own. The "refuge" was an isolated high place in a mountainous region, whose natural relief provided excellent strategic advantages (e.g., Jerusalem, Masada). Because God is the Redeemer of his people in physical and spiritual needs (cf. v.48), the psalmist knows that he can always find refuge in him.

The Lord protects his servant as with a "shield" (GK 4482) so that the adversities of life may not penetrate and destroy his child. Instead, he elevates him with "the horn of salvation." The word "horn" (GK 7967) is a symbol of strength; theologically it denotes the vertical intrusion of the Lord's power and victory over against the kingdoms of humanity. The imagery of a high place lies also behind the phrase "my stronghold" (GK 5369). It is a place of refuge in the rocks (cf. Isa 33:16).

3 The outburst of metaphors affirms David's confidence in the Lord's ability to deliver. Therefore, he is praiseworthy (48:1; 96:4). Whenever he calls on the Lord in prayer, David tastes the sweetness of his deliverance. This reminder of "the enemies" forms a transition to his reflections on God's deliverance in great adversity (vv.4–19).

II. Affliction (18:4–6)

4–6 The psalmist recalls the intensity of his anguish as if ropes were wrapped around him and as if death, personified as "cords of death" and "cords of the grave" (Sheol; GK 8619), were pulling him downward. Another metaphor is that of rushing streams ("torrents") that threaten to destroy him (cf. 30:1; cf. 2Sa 22:5). He cannot escape because he is trapped by "the snares of death." Paganism seems to triumph, as chaos rules and God's deliverance is not forthcoming. But at this point David turns to the Lord. After his prayer, he portrays the Lord's coming with great power and glory, in order to establish order and justice and to redeem his servant.

III. The Lord's Coming to Help (18:7–15)

7–15 God is concerned with the distress of his children. His reaction in his heavenly glory is couched in the language of theophany. The earthquake is an expression of his anger. The smoke and the fire represent his readiness to avenge his enemies. Thus he mounts the cherubim, soars as a bird on "the wings of the wind," and swoops quickly downward. The clouds are his chariot (cf. 68:33) and the wind makes up the wings (cf. 104:3–4) with which he flies downward on the rescue mission. The darkness of the clouds heightens his brightness. As the Divine Warrior moves closer to the enemies, he announces his coming with "hailstones," "bolts of lightning," and "thunder." Then he shoots forth "his arrows" in the form of lightning and thus rids himself of his enemies. No opposition can stand his presence because he penetrates even the sea (v.16) and "the foundations of the earth."

He is the glorious and victorious King over heaven, earth, and sea. His rule is established, and there is no question as to his sovereignty and supremacy. But because the rebellious forces are on earth, the earth "trembles and quakes" as it anticipates the fear of the guilty who are seized with "terror and dread" and tremble with anguish at the prospect of his judgment.

IV. The Lord's Deliverance (18:16–19)

16–19 The portrayal of God's indignation and readiness to vindicate gives comfort to the psalmist. He does not fear God's coming in anger, because his Father comes to his rescue. Though the enemy forces are strong (vv.4–5), the Lord prevails over their great strength. He delivers the psalmist from the adversity and provides a new dimension of life. Instead of "disaster," he experiences the Lord to be his "support." Instead of the enmity of his foes, he experiences the redemption of the God who delights in him.

V. God's Faithfulness to the Faithful (18:20–29)

The triumph of faith is expressed here in the realization that the Lord has been faithful, that he has kept his word, and that he rewards the faithful. The psalmist has argued that the love of God moves heaven and earth for the sake of his own. Now he instructs the hearers (readers) what God expects of his children.

A. Human Faithfulness to God (18:20–24)

20–24 Loyalty to the Lord shows itself in practical ways, but in essence it is an internal spiritual response. The psalmist's attitude to God is described as "righteousness" (GK 7406)—that response to God that adheres to his decrees and shuns evil. Righteousness is the joyous expression of love to God for all his mercies. Therefore he is devoted to "the ways of the LORD" (cf. Dt 8:6) and to "his laws." God's laws regulate all of life and help his servant to respond appropriately to the challenges of life. David's hands are clean and he has "integrity" before the Lord. He praises the goodness of God who has dealt with him faithfully.

B. God's Faithfulness to His Own (18:25–29)

25–26 The Lord helps his own, those who are concerned with being "faithful," "blameless," and "pure." Faith, loyalty, and sanctification are inseparable. God responds with deep concern to his covenant children, whereas he deals in kind with the "crooked." Even as God deals lovingly with those who love him, he lets the crooked acts of the wicked boomerang on their own heads. They receive their just deserts. Thus the psalmist rejoices in God's justice, as he deals with each in accordance with his works.

27–29 These affirmations of God's goodness and justice are the basis for hope. Even in adversity the "humble" hope in God; even in "darkness" the saints look to him for light. The "haughty" (GK 8123) are those who have little or no regard for the Lord (10:5–6). They often oppress or disregard the rights of the godly. But the Lord graciously turns the misfortunes of his saints and grants them the joy of life. Thus the psalmist expresses a spirit of confident joy. There is no barrier that the Lord cannot overcome, whether it be a "troop" or the wall of an enemy city. The presence of the Lord gives confidence of victory.

VI. The Lord's Goodness (18:30–45)

A. The Divine Perfections (18:30–36)

30–36 The Lord's ways are "perfect" (GK 9459). His perfections are those qualities by which he relates to his creation. He is full of "integrity" (cf. v.25b) to those who respond to him with "integrity." His word, likewise, is "tested" and found to be "flawless" (GK 7671; cf. 12:6; 119:140).

Because of God's commitment to protect his loyal children by word and work, he is their "shield" (cf. 3:3) and "Rock," with the result that they are victorious, strong, and free. They "take refuge in him." The ascriptions of goodness to God lead the psalmist to exclaim, "Who is God besides the LORD?" The answer is no one!

The Lord "arms" (GK 273) the psalmist with strength. The verb signifies giving support or strengthening at a time of need (cf. v.39). Since God is the Rock of Israel, he alone can give strength. The strength of the Lord results in success. David compares this strength to the sure-footedness of an ibex ("deer"), whose agility permits it to walk on narrow ledges in mountainous and rocky terrain. He also compares himself to a warrior with special strength. In God's strength he is free.

B. The King's Victory Over the Enemies (18:37–42)

37–42 With the help of the Great King, the messianic King need not be afraid of the enemies. The emphasis lies on his prowess in battle as he aggressively beats back his enemies. He expects nothing less than their total destruction. The enemy, being in dire straits, calls for help from allied forces, but none dare fight against the divinely anointed King! It is apparent that the Lord is with the psalmist, strengthening him and giving him complete victory. The enemies' strength is reduced so that they are no more than useless "dust."

C. The Glorious Deliverance (18:43–45)

43–45 With gratitude to the Lord, the psalmist summarizes the effects of his campaigns. First, he is victorious over the enemies. They have responded to him, just as the enemies of God did in earlier times to God's presence as the Divine Warrior (cf. Ex 15:14–16; Jos 2:11, 24). The nations submit themselves to his sovereignty (cf. Ps 2:8–12). Second, the nature of the messianic rule is glorious. The Lord has made his anointed king to be "the head" of nations in fulfillment of his word to Israel (Dt 28:13).

VII. The Lord, the Rock of Israel (18:46–50)

46–50 The psalmist returns to an affirmation of his confidence in "the Rock" of Israel (cf. vv.1–3). The Rock is no other than the Divine Warrior who is the "Savior" (GK 3829) of the messianic King. The acts of deliverance involve complete subjugation of the enemies and exaltation above the nations as expressions of divine vindication. He is the God "who avenges" (94:1) and "who saves" (94:19–23).

The psalmist reflects on the acts of God to encourage God's people to look at the messianic King as the divinely chosen instrument of deliverance. The Divine Warrior has chosen the anointed King of David's lineage to establish his kingdom. Every Christian knows that this King is none other than Jesus the Messiah. In him we receive God's "love," and in him we are victorious.

Psalm 19: God's Perfections Revealed in Work and Word

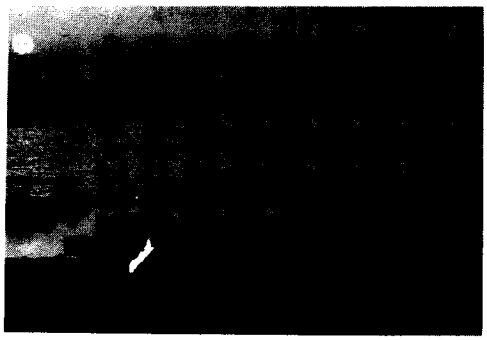
This psalm reflects, more than any other, the beauty and splendor of the Hebrew poetry found in the Psalter. The psalm comprises three separate motifs brought together into a unified wisdom hymn: creation praise (vv.1–6), a wisdom psalm (vv.7–11), and a prayer for God's forgiveness and acceptance (vv.12–14).

I. The Revelation of Creation (19:1–6)

A. The Revelation of the Skies (19:1–4b)

1 The glory and wisdom of God are evident in the vastness of space. The psalmist calls attention to "the heavens" (GK 9028) as he begins the first verse and concludes with the synonym "the skies" (GK 8385). These words signify the place where God put the sun, moon, and stars for the purpose of giving light and for distinguishing "day" from "night" (Ge 1:14–19). The universe is a revelation of God's creation of the magnificent heavenly bodies, which are characterized by radiance and regularity. The verbs "declare" and "proclaim" express the continuous revelation of the heavens. The wars and disturbances on earth often camouflage God's glory, as they divert attention away from the created heavenly bodies. God alone is the Creator; the heavenly bodies are "the work of his hands" (cf. Dt 4:19; 17:3).

2 The alternation of "day" and "night" reveals the constancy of God's creation. The cycle of day and night contribute to the regularity of the seasons and thus to the regular-



Sunsets, such as this one over the Mediterranean Sea, remind us of the glory and power of our God (19:1–6).

ity of the agricultural calendar (Ge 8:22). They reveal "knowledge" (GK 1981) in their own distinct "speech." The "knowledge" is not only knowledge about God but also a special kind, best understood as God's wisdom, revealed in his creation (cf. Pr 8:22–31).

3–4b Being unrestricted by the division of languages, natural revelation transcends human communication without the use of speech, words, and sounds. To those who are inclined to hear, revelation comes with no regard for linguistic or geographical barriers.

B. The Revelation of the Sun (19:4c–6)

4c–6 Life on earth depends on the regularity of the sun. The psalmist did not know all that we know today about the solar system. His concern was to portray in a phenomenal way how the sun rises, as it were, from "a tent." The sun is metaphorically compared to a "bridegroom" and a "champion." The joy of the bridegroom, coming from the wedding canopy or the bridal chamber, represents the radiance of the sun. The "champion," rejoicing in his strength as he sets out to run his course, represents the power of the sun, as it seems to move through "its circuit." The sun also reveals God's glory, power, and wisdom. One does not have to listen for words, because the effect of the sun is evident, as "nothing is hidden from its heat."

II. The Revelation of God's Law (19:7–11)

7–11 The revelation of God's law is clearer than the revelation in nature. It is greater because it is given by the covenant God, whose name is Yahweh (tr. "LORD," vv.7, 8, 9); nature reveals the glory of the Creator-God (see v.1). It is also greater because of the comprehensive nature of the revelation. This is brought out by the choice of the synonyms for God's revelation: "law" (GK 9459), "statutes" (GK 6343), "precepts" (GK 7218), "commands" (GK 5184), "fear" (GK 3711), and "ordinances" (GK 5477); for an extended treatment of these terms, see EBC, 5:184–87. The synonyms are not to be studied in abstraction but give a comprehensive emphasis that all the words of the Lord are beneficial. Although the benefits of natural revelation are with us on a daily basis, the comprehensive benefits of God's revelation in the law are so much greater.

The list of four benefits is given to encourage the godly to embrace the law of God as an expression of his wisdom. (1) God's word "revives" (GK 8740). Its restorative quality gives healing to the whole person by assuring forgiveness and cleansing and by giving life to the godly. (2) God's word is the source of "wisdom" to all who are ready to receive it. Both the inexperienced ("the simple") and the wise develop as they begin with "the fear of the LORD" and embrace the will of God in all aspects of life. (3) God's word gives "joy" (GK 8523). Heartfelt joy is equivalent to inner peace and tranquility, as one loves God with all one's heart, i.e., with one's innermost being. (4) God's word gives "light to the eyes." The internal joy radiates through the eyes. It expresses the joy of being alive and of receiving God's blessings. Thus the Lord has made the sun for light in creation and has given his word for light in redemption.

God's word reflects his own integrity, uprightness, and fidelity. It is "trustworthy" (GK 586) in the sense that his statutes are true in principle and are verifiable in the situations of life. It is "right" (GK 3838) in the sense of straightforward and just. God's word is not perverse or crooked but encourages the godly to be upright. It is "radiant" (i.e., "pure"; GK 1338), and its purity effects the clean and upright way of those who are "pure." It is "enduring forever," as it does not change with the times. It is "sure" (i.e., "faithful"; GK 622), as it reflects the fidelity and loyalty of God. It is "righteous" (GK 3838) as it reflects God's righteousness. It is sweet like the finest honey. These metaphors refer to the great value of God's word in terms of its effects on those who observe them. It causes integrity, loyalty, uprightness, purity, and growth in righteousness.

Because of its revelatory qualities and its transforming effects in the godly, the word of God is of greater value than the most valuable objects of human striving: money and fine food. It keeps the wise on the narrow path by forewarning them of possible pitfalls and by guiding them on to the benefits of godliness. The word "servant" (GK 6269) bears out the willingness of the psalmist in doing God's will. It applies to one who by appointment, office, or choice commits himself or herself to doing someone else's will—in this context, the will of the covenant Lord.

III. Prayerful Reflection (19:12–14)

12–13 The psalmist reflects on himself in relation to God and his revelation. In Ps 8 he looked at the dignity of humanity (8:4a). Now he reflects on humanity's sinfulness and limitations. Human beings are such insignificant parts in the vastness of space. Just as nothing is hidden from the heat of the sun (v.6), and even as the "voice" of the natural revelation penetrates to "the ends of the earth" (v.4), so God's word with all its perfections (vv.7–9) penetrates and examines a person. The godly stand, therefore, in fear before their Creator-Redeemer, knowing that they may have "hidden faults" or "errors" that he has not yet discovered.

The psalmist is concerned about these faults because he aims to live "blameless" before God. Therefore he asks for forgiveness and an ability to express humility and contrition. "Willful sins" are those often attributed to the "arrogant," who have no regard for God. "The great transgression" could be idolatry, adultery, or any other sin against the moral law of God.

14 The heavens "declare," "proclaim," "pour forth," and "display" without the benefit of human speech; yet they speak clearly of the glory, power, and wisdom of God. The Lord has revealed his word in speech and written forms accessible to people. In turn the psalmist, as a redeemed creature of God, prays that his expressed and unspoken words may be acceptable to his God, his Rock and his Redeemer; namely, the Lord, the covenant-loving God.

Psalm 20: Prayer for Victory

Concern for God's blessing on the king in facing national distress dominates this psalm. It contains a beautiful expression of solidarity between the people and their king, as all are involved in imploring the Lord's favor. It is a royal psalm.

I. Prayer in Need (20:1)

1 The people pray for God's covenant blessings on the king as their representative. God has promised to protect, to be gracious to, and to give peace to his people (Nu 6:24–26), thus placing his "name on the Israelites" (v.27). But now that the "distress" is here, they invoke the "name of the God of Jacob" to protect the king. "The God of Jacob" refers to the Redeemer who delivered Jacob (= Israel) from Egypt (Ex 19:3–4) and who promised to deal justly with his people (cf. Ps 146:5–10). The Lord has promised to bring about all the promises made to the patriarchs.

II. Prayer for God's Royal Help (20:2–4)

2 The word "sanctuary" (lit., "holy thing," "holiness"; GK 7731) is not the usual term. Apparently the psalmist has in mind Zion, God's holy hill, where the temple was located. God's holy place was localized at Jerusalem but was not limited there. Jerusalem was an earthly reflection of "his holy heaven" (v.6)—a phrase that denotes the universal rule of God. The "help" and "support" the people pray for are evidence of God's presence as the Great King. "Support" (GK 6184) may indicate provision of food and drink (104:15) or a demonstration of God's loving acts (94:18), by which God strengthens (18:35), restores (41:3), and delivers his people (119:117). The "support" of the Lord takes care of all the king's needs as he goes out to battle.

3 God's favor was sought by means of the "sacrifices" and "burnt offerings." The Israelite practice of presenting sacrifices and offerings before a military campaign was an act of devotion and submission to the Lord (1Sa 7:9–10; 13:9–12). Their purpose was not primarily to atone for sin but to seek God's favor and to consecrate oneself for war. As dedicatory offerings, they were burned on the altar so as to make "an aroma pleasing to the LORD" (Lev 1:13). The offerings did not inevitably guarantee the Lord's favor, because he delights in loyalty more than offerings (1Sa 15:22–23).

4 The prosperity of the king is dependent on God's presence and favor (vv.2–3). The king's "heart" had to show a walk of integrity with his God in order for "plans" to come to fruition. As the king received counsel before battle, it was important to discern God's will (cf. 2Sa 16:20; 1Ki 22:7).

III. Rejoicing in Anticipation (20:5)

5 When the Lord responds to the prayer, he will demonstrate his presence and favor by giving victory to the king. The people pledge loyalty to the king by affirming their joy in his victory. They also pledge loyalty to the Lord by raising their banners "in the name of our God." Moses raised a "banner" (GK 1838) to the Lord after the war with the Amalekites as a token of perpetual war as long as the Amalekites existed as a people (Ex 17:15–16). Here the raising of the banners signifies God's victory over the enemies. The people conclude their prayer with the petition for the Lord's blessing.

IV. Confidence in God's Royal Help (20:6–8)

6–8 The psalmist reflects on the nature of Israel's warfare in contrast to warfare in the ancient Near East. Kings multiplied for themselves horses and chariots to secure victory, power, and control. Israel's kings were prohibited to "acquire great numbers of horses" (Dt 17:16) but were required "to revere the LORD" (v.19). Underlying this contrast is the belief in God's sovereign kingship over the nations and his readiness to deliver his own people.

Israel's strength is in the name of their God rather than in the numbers of chariots and horses. The Lord is the source of power, because his name is "the LORD," because he is the Great King who dwells in "his holy heaven," and because he is able to deliver with "the saving power of his right hand."

The phrase "Now I know" is an emphatic expression of confidence in the Lord and in the victory that formed the substance of the prayer (vv.1–5). God's commitment is to "his anointed" by covenant (2Sa 7; cf. Ps 2:2b, 7–9), and therefore the "anointed" king is the divinely appointed means of the Lord's deliverance. The outcome will be complete victory.

V. Prayer in Need (20:9)

9 The psalm begins and closes with a prayer for the king. "Answer us when we call!" forms a symmetric relation with "May the LORD answer you when you are in distress" (v.1). People and king call on the Lord, await an answer, and are dependent on the Lord's act of salvation. The prayer "save the king" must be understood as a prayer for his victories.

Psalm 21: The Rule of God Through His King

This psalm, in contrast to Ps 20 which pleads for victory, celebrates the victory already achieved (cf. 20:4; 21:1–2). Psalm 21 contains elements of thanksgiving (vv.1–7) and confidence (vv.8–12).

I. The King's Joy in the Lord's Strength (21:1)

1 The theocratic king knows that the victories are God's gracious gifts and that they are the evidence of God's "strength" (GK 6437). In 20:5 God's people were looking forward to the time when they could "shout for joy." Here the king leads the people in praise, addressing God as the gracious and victorious King by whose strength the people have been delivered. Therefore the king "rejoices" and even expresses his exuberance.

II. God's Gifts to His King (21:2–6)

2 The king had prayed for victory, and his people had joined in imploring the Lord to give the king "the desire of his heart" (20:4). The king had counseled in his heart, formed his plans, and had spoken about the execution of his plans before the Lord. The Lord has blessed those thoughts and spoken requests. The king's ways were aligned with God's plans; therefore he was successful.

3–6 The Lord of glory comes to welcome the king as if he were the sole victor. The king is treated as the commander-in-chief of God's army on earth. His victory was the Lord's doing, but the king receives his reward. In reward for his loyalty, the Lord bestows on his servant great gifts: his presence, rich blessings, a crown of pure gold, a long rule, great glory, and honor. These gifts are symbolic of the divinely decreed rule of David and his descendants, as promised in 2Sa 7:12–16. The Lord himself comes out to bless the king with his "presence" and to crown the victor with great joy.

The assurance of these promises lies in God's recognition of his anointed king. He bestows "life," i.e., the establishment of the Davidic dynasty (2Sa 7:16; cf. Ps 72:17). The Lord guarantees the continuation of the Davidic dynasty by the "crown of pure gold." Kingship is by divine right, and this right is symbolized by the placing of a beautiful crown on David's head.

III. The King's Response (21:7)

7 The king confirms his loyalty to the Lord. His commitment strengthens his relationship. The king declares his loyalty to the Lord as a "trust" or dependency, and the Lord assures him that his "love" will not depart. The "unfailing love" (GK 2876) is God's gratuitous expression of loyalty to the king who looks expectantly for his blessing. Therefore, "he will not be shaken."

IV. The People's Expectations of the King (21:8–12)

8–10 The people look for a demonstration of the royal power and glory bestowed on the king by the Lord. They view the anointed king as God's means of establishing God's kingdom on earth by ridding the earth of the enemies. To him belong the blessings of the covenant (vv.3, 6). The Lord has given the king the keys to the kingdom, because it is through the "hand" of his anointed that the foes will be removed. The covenant curses pertain to the enemies of God's people (cf. Ge 12:3) and to the ungodly within the covenant community (cf. Ps 3:1, 7). The Lord will destroy the king's enemies "in his wrath." The execration will be so complete that their offspring will be no more.

11–12 All who do not submit to the rule of God's anointed king are included among those who "plot evil." The messianic kingship requires absolute loyalty to the Lord and his anointed King (Ps 2). All the adversaries of the king will be subjugated and annihilated. The rebellious people will not succeed with their "wicked schemes"; instead they will be routed because of the bow that is aimed at them. There is no enemy force that can stand up against the king, because God has strengthened his "right hand" by which he delivers his people (v.8) into the victorious kingdom of Jesus Christ, by whom all enemy powers and forces—even death—will be "swallowed" (cf. Isa 25:8; 1Co 15:54–57). His kingdom will be forever!

V. The People's Joy in the Lord's Strength (21:13)

13 The psalm appropriately concludes with an ascription of praise to the Lord. He is the source of "strength" and "might." The king and his people rejoice in God's kingship and the blessings he has bestowed on them. The king led in praise (v.1), and now the people join in. We can experience even greater joy since the coming of our Lord. He is our King, and he will bring in the fullness of promise.

Psalm 22: Anguish and Joy

Psalm 22 is an individual lament psalm in which the assembly of the righteous is invited to participate both in giving thanks and in the communal meal, associated with the votive offering (vv.25–26). Because of the reference to Ps 22 in the Passion narrative of our Lord, it is tempting to treat this psalm as messianic, predicting our Lord's suffering (cf. Mt 27:39–46; Mk 15:29–34).

I. God's Abandonment, Rule, and Praise of Israel (22:1–5)

1 The prayer begins with a cry to "my God" with three questions. The psalmist pours out his heart. In the intensity of his suffering, there is no other recourse than to cast himself on God. But at the same time he shows his amazement by the three questions: Why has the Lord "forsaken" me, made no attempt at "saving" me, and not listened to my "groaning"? God's absence becomes unbearable.

Abandonment or alienation is the experience of suffering, when one hopes for deliverance but no help is forthcoming. Even though the psalmist feels abandoned, because he is a child of the covenant, he has great expectations that his covenant God, who has promised to hear and to deliver, will come to his aid.

2–3 The psalmist keeps on bringing his prayers before God "by day" and "by night." He is not silent, but God is! Then he reflects on who his God is. He is holy in his kingship ("enthroned") and is the object of Israel's constant praise. The psalmist's "Yet you" indicates a tension in his experience with God and in God's dealings with Israel. His God has abandoned him and is the object of questions (vv.1–2), whereas God has saved his people and is the object of their praise (vv.3–5).

4–5 The history of redemption reveals God as loyal and able to save. Israel's trust in him was not put to shame, because when they cried, they were delivered. The psalmist was familiar with the glorious acts of God in history. But it seems as if God does not care to deliver him, "yet" (v.3). Whereas the "fathers" and Israel had occasion for praise, the psalmist feels himself cut off. The faith of the ancestors and the faith of the psalmist are one, but their experience is far different. God delivered his people, but the psalmist is left abandoned.

It is in this light that we can more deeply appreciate our Lord's cry on the cross, "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani?" ("My God, my God, why have you forsaken me," Mt 27:46; Mk 15:34). On the cross our Lord was forsaken by and alienated from the Father. In this experience, symbolized by darkness, he was cut off from God's mighty acts of deliverance done for his people. He was alone, separated from God the Father and from his people.

II. Public Spectacle (22:6–8)

6–7 As the psalmist reflects on his own situation, God's absence dwarfs his self-image. In contrast to the emphatic "you" (v.3), he refers to himself emphatically: "But I." God is enthroned, but he is "a worm and not a man." He feels less than human. God is holy and receives the praise of Israel, but the psalmist is the object of scorn and reviling. Unwanted, alone, and full of anguish, he cannot enjoy the presence of others. Out of disregard for his feelings, they apply their "theological" measuring sticks to his situation and conclude that if he truly were to trust God, he would not suffer. They mock him, shaking their heads—a sign of either rejection or astonishment.

8 The unpious mock the psalmist with their argument against his kind of piety. They question his suffering in the light of their myopic view of God's love and his promises of deliverance. They conclude that either the psalmist had boasted of trusting in God but was hypocritical or that God does not love him. These ancient mockers pose the issue of the problem of evil and suffering in a most agonizing way. The hope of the godly was in God's "delight" (GK 2911) in his saints, especially during times of adversity (cf. 37:23). The support of the Lord's hand (37:24) is not there, and the mockers make the most of this occasion.

III. God's Covenantal Responsibilities (22:9–11)

9–11 In reflecting on his own desperate situation, the psalmist moves his eyes from the mockers around him to God with an emphatic "Yet you." The problem of suffering finds some focus in God's sovereignty and love for his own. From birth he has owed his life to God, and from birth the Lord has been his covenant God and has shown him his love. God is his father by the covenant and had taken it on himself to be his guardian and protector. How can God leave his child alone, now that he is in trouble and needs help? The psalmist prays for God not to be far away. In his past experience the Lord had been close to him, but now he is distant.

IV. Abandonment and Prayer for Covenantal Favor (vv.12–21)

A. The Enemies (22:12–13)

12–13 The strength and ferocity of the enemies is compared to that of the "bulls of Bashan" and to "roaring lions." The bulls of Bashan were proverbial for their size because they were well fed on the lush vegetation of the Bashan (cf. Am 4:1; Mic 7:14)—the region known today as the Golan Heights. As they encircle the psalmist, their "horns" (v.21) are all too evident and inspire fear.

Similarly, the psalmist is unnerved by the enemies who "open their mouths wide against [him]." This action describes the activity of lions. The strength, pride, and deadly intent of the enemies is matched by their cruelty, abuse of power, and hatred of godliness.

B. Personal Anguish (22:14–15b)

14–15b The psalmist feels the impact of the alienation deep within his inner being. Great fear is likened to "water" (cf. Jos 7:5; Eze 7:17; 21:7) and to "wax" (2Sa 17:10). These express formlessness and bring out the inner feelings of an anguished man. He can no longer function as a human being. The "bones," "heart," 'strength," and "tongue" fail him, not because of any serious disease, but because of a traumatic response to being hated and alienated. Lack of resilience and inability to cope any longer with the trauma of life is brought out in the image of the dried-out and useless "potsherd." Sherds are pieces of broken pottery. The psalmist is a "broken" man.

C. Severity of the Situation: Life Itself (22:15c)

15c Because of his deep suffering, the absence of hope, and the ever-present reality of evil around him, the psalmist prepares himself for death. Implicitly, he holds the Lord responsible for his suffering ("you lay me").

D. The Enemies (22:16a)

16a The psalmist briefly returns to consider his enemies. They are nothing but "dogs." Dogs in David's day came in many kinds and in great numbers to garbage dumps, ate whatever was thrown away, carried diseases, and transmitted them to humans. The dog was not a pet in the ancient Near East.

E. Personal Anguish (22:16b–17)

16b–17 Just as the imagery of the enemies as bulls and lions evokes feelings of fear and powerlessness, so also the imagery of the dogs creates a picture of a powerless, righteous sufferer on the heap of ashes. The dogs viciously attack him, gnawing at and biting into his feet and hands. He is but skin and bones and is unable to ward them off. His misery is the source of gloating and entertainment.

F. Severity of the Situation: Life Itself (22:18)

18 The division of the garments by lots continues the same picture as in v.15c. The psalmist feels as if he is about to die; therefore the wicked are waiting to swoop down on him like vultures. The "garments" ("clothing") are divided up like the spoils from battle.

G. Cry for Help (22:19)

19 The scene changes, as the psalmist again opens his prayer with an emphatic "But you" (cf. v.3). The sudden shift away from his terrifying condition leads him to confront his covenant God, as he prays, "But you, O LORD." This name for God evokes memory of God's promises to be near, to support his people, and to protect them from adversities. He, and he alone, is the psalmist's "Strength" (GK 394).

H. Severity of the Situation: Life Itself (22:20a)

20a The psalmist implores God to listen to his prayer, because of the utter despair and meaninglessness of his situation. There seems no way out. In view of the absence of any alternative, he prays that the Lord may spare his "life" (see comments on vv.14–15). But he is not ready to die. Only the Lord can deliver him and restore life.

I. Enemies and Cause of Anguish (22:20b–21)

20b–21 The psalmist concludes by returning to the imagery of the enemies as dogs, lions, and oxen, but now in reverse order. They had succeeded in terrorizing him so as to rob him of any desire to live. Yet, as he concludes with the petition, "save me," his hope rests in the Lord who has thus far not answered him (v.2).

V. Public Praise (22:22–24)

22–24 The mood changes after the cry for deliverance (vv.19–21). The psalmist declares "the name" of the Lord in the congregation of the faithful. The Lord has responded to his prayer and has removed the suffering from his servant. No longer need he ask why his God has forsaken him, because the Lord has blessed him by not hiding his face. The Lord has been faithful. The "brothers" may be the psalmist's relatives, friends, or, better, members of the congregation. The "congregation" [GK 7702] is here a technical term for the congregation of the righteous, which excludes the ungodly and mocking Israelites (cf. vv.7–8). They are further identified as "you who fear the LORD."

The taunts of the mockers are now drowned out by the songs of the faithful. The true sons of Jacob are those who fear the Lord (cf. 24:6). They will honor him with devoted hearts. The verbs "praise," "honor," and "revere" form the outward expression of the fear of the Lord. Those who love the Lord will rejoice in the Lord. These words constitute an encouragement to all the godly: the Lord will rescue those who trust in him (v.8).

VI. God's Presence and Rule: The Praise of Israel and the Nations (22:25–31)

25 The psalmist affirms the importance of public worship in terms of praise and the presentation of freewill offerings. A vow was often made during a period of distress (cf. 50:14; 61:8; 66:13) and was fulfilled after God had shown his loyalty (65:1).

26 The psalmist shares his freewill offerings (cf. Lev 7:16–21) by a communal meal with the poor and afflicted so as to give them a sense of relief, which he has so recently experienced. He blesses them with the comfort that even as food has strengthened their bodies, so shall the Lord strengthen their hearts, enabling them to endure the period of their affliction with patience.

27–28 The psalmist now looks beyond the congregation of the righteous in Israel to "the ends of the earth." Here the theme of God's lordship over all people is emphasized. He has "dominion" (GK 4867) over all the earth (v.3) and those who live in it. Therefore the nations—included in the Abrahamic covenant as "all the families of the nations" (Ge 12:3; Ps 96:7)—will "remember" (GK 2349) the Lord. The act of remembrance is an act of obeisance and worship.

29 Among the worshiping community the psalmist sees the prosperous and "all who go down to the dust," i.e. those who are faint-hearted, sickly, dying, and filled with anguish, even as the psalmist once lay "in the dust of death" (v.15). Both well-fed and poor people will join in the worship of God.

30–31 The praise of God will extend from generation to generation, throughout history. The object of the proclamation is God's "righteousness," i.e., his acts of deliverance whereby he demonstrates his sovereign, gracious, and victorious rule. Each generation will join in with the telling of the story of God's kingship (cf. vv.3–5) and will add what God has done for them. This is the essence of redemptive history.

Psalm 23: The Goodness of God

Psalm 23 is a psalm of trust and confidence. It expresses confidence in God's goodness—in this life and in the life to come. The personal way in which the psalmist speaks of God, the imagery of God's soothing guidance, and the ensuing confidence in God have all been factors in making this one of the most charming and beloved of the Psalms.

I. The Lord Is My Shepherd (23:1–4)

1 The first word of the psalm, "The LORD," evokes rich images of the provision and protection of the covenant-God. The emphasis of the psalmist is on "my." The temptation in ancient Israel was to speak only about "our" God (cf. Dt 6:4), forgetting that the God of Israel is also the God of individuals. The metaphor of the shepherd is not only a designation or name of the Lord, but it points toward the relation between God and his covenant-children: "I shall not be in want."

2–4 The image of "shepherd" arouses emotions of care, provision, and protection. A good shepherd is personally concerned with the welfare of his sheep. Because of this the designation "my shepherd" is further described by various aspects of God's care: "he makes me lie down . . . he leads . . . he restores . . . he guides"; and by the resulting tranquility, "I will fear no evil."

The shepherd's care is symbolized by the "rod" and the "staff." A shepherd carried a rod to club wild animals and a staff to keep the sheep in control. These two represent God's constant vigilance over his own and bring "comfort" (GK 5714) because of his personal presence and involvement with his sheep. The "green pastures" are the rich and verdant pastures, where the sheep need not move from place to place to be satisfied. The fields, even parts of the desert, would green during the winter and spring. But in summer and fall the sheep would be led to many places in search of food. God's care is not seasonal but constant and abundant. The sheep have time to rest, as the shepherd makes them to "lie down." The "quiet waters" are the wells and springs where the sheep can drink without being rushed. Through these means, God renews the sheep so that they feel life in his presence is good and worth living. The word "soul" in v.4 denotes the same as "me" in v.2, i.e., "he restores me."

Bedouin still care for sheep on the hills of the Holy Land (cf. Ps 23). This flock is located south of Hebron near Beersheba.

The nature of the shepherd's care also lies in guidance. He leads his own in the "paths of righteousness." "Righteousness" (GK 7406) here signifies "right" in the sense of "straight," i.e., the paths that bring the sheep most directly to their destination. He does not unnecessarily tire out his sheep. Even when the "right paths" bring the sheep "through the valley of the shadow of death," there is no need to fear.

The idiom "shadow of death" portrays death as a deep shadow or as deep darkness. This imagery is consistent with the shepherd metaphor because the shepherd leads the flock through ravines and wadis where the steep and narrow slopes keep out the light. The darkness of the wadis represents the uncertainty of life. The "straight paths" at times need to go through the wadis, but God is still present. The shepherd who guides is always with the sheep. The presence and guidance of the Lord go together. He is bound by his name ("for his name's sake") to be present with his people (cf. the meaning of "LORD" in Ex 3:12).

II. The Lord Is My Host (23:5–6)

5 The Lord is the host at a banquet "table" laden with food and drink. Before entering the banquet hall, an ancient host would anoint the honored guests with oil made by adding perfumes to olive oil. The overflowing "cup" symbolizes the care and provisions of God, previously represented by "green pastures" and "quiet waters." Moreover, the Lord vindicates his servant "in the presence of [his] enemies," expressing both the adversities of life as well as God's love toward his own. In the presence of God, the guests forget their troubles and tears.

6 The "goodness" (GK 3202) of God is demonstrated in his abundant care and promises, evidence of his blessing. The "love" (GK 2876) of God is his covenantal commitment to bless his people with his promises. Instead of being pursued by enemies who seek his destruction, God's "goodness and love" follow the psalmist. He need not fear, because God's loving care follows him throughout life. The psalmist's experience of God's "goodness and love" is equivalent to dwelling "in the house of the LORD," a phrase that signifies abiding in the environs of salvation. The believer gets a taste of everlasting fellowship with God.

Psalm 24: The King of Glory Is Our God

This psalm consists of three parts. Each part brings out a different consideration of God: (1) the Creator-God (vv.1–2), (2) the holy God (vv.3–6), (3) the glorious King (vv.7–10). The hymn celebrates God's kingship as it relates to his people. God is King by virtue of having created all things, but he desires to rule over the people who open themselves to him by living clean, pure lives in his presence.

I. The Great King (24:1–2)

1–2 The psalm first introduces us to the Creator-King, who rules over the earth. The Lord owns "the earth" and "everything" on it. His rule is established particularly because he has made the world habitable (Isa 45:18). "Seas" and "waters" may have reflected the forces of chaos in Canaanite cosmogony; but in Israelite usage they are not hostile, chaotic forces, but fully under the Lord's dominion (cf. 136:5–6). The earth is "established."

II. The Hill of the Lord (24:3–6)

3 The psalmist expresses the nature of fellowship with God as ascending "the hill of the LORD" (Mount Zion, cf. 2:6; cf. also 15:1; 24:3) and standing in "his holy place." Those who seek his favor need to prepare themselves, not only ceremonially, but also by sanctifying their lives.

4 The Lord expects purity and singleness of heart from all who seek his presence (cf. Mt 5:8). Purity of "hands" and "heart" is the condition of living before God in accordance with his precepts and out of the desire of his heart. Singleness of devotion is expressed by the godly person refusing to dishonor the Lord's name by idolatry or by hypocrisy.

5 The Lord rewards believers for their walk of integrity. The "blessing" (GK 1388) is the status of God's favor extended to his loyal servants, who enjoy the promises of the covenant. They also receive "vindication" (GK 7407) from their Savior-God. The Redeemer will help, provide justice, and grant the ultimate vindication only to those who are faithful to him.

6 The group of people ("generation") with whom God is pleased walks with integrity, not because of outward constraint, but by an internal desire to please him. To "seek [GK 2011] him" is an expression of a sincere desire to live in accordance with God's standards, in the presence of his "face." The "generation" of the upright are, thus, the true descendants of Jacob.

III. The Divine Warrior (24:7–10)

7 It is difficult to be sure of the original setting of the psalm. This difficulty raises the question of the referent of "heads," "gates," and "doors." "Lift up your heads" is possibly an idiom for rejoicing by the godly. Similarly, "gates" may be symbolic of the people collectively (cf. Isa 14:31). The sense then would be: "Rejoice greatly, O you people [who live within the gates]" (cf. Zec 9:9). On the other hand, the psalmist may be literally addressing the gates of the temple to open up. Or since the temple itself was not yet erected in David's time, the psalmist may be referring to the "ancient doors" of Jerusalem. Consequently, both the city and the people are called on to receive with joy and anticipation the Great King. The repetition in v.9 bears out the importance of proper preparation for "the King of glory."

8–10 "The King of glory" is "the LORD strong and mighty, the LORD mighty in battle," and "The LORD Almighty." He is the God of the covenant people, who brings blessing, victory, and vindication to his people (v.5). "Strong and mighty" and "mighty in battle" portray him as the Warrior for his people. He is not coming to fight against them but for them. He is "LORD Almighty" (lit., "of hosts"; cf. GK 7372) as he commands both the heavenly beings and the host of stars and constellations.

Psalm 25: A Prayer for Deliverance, Guidance, and Forgiveness

This psalm is an individual lament with strong similarities to a prayer of confidence, especially vv.1–3, 8–15. The setting cannot be determined with certainty. As a psalm of David, it may fit in the period of his adversities after his sin of adultery. Forgiveness forms a motif throughout. The adversities the psalmist details classify the psalm as a community lament. The emphasis lies on the personal effect of adversity in the areas of self-examination, guidance, and submission to the Lord. The psalm is acrostic with a few irregularities.

I. Prayer for Deliverance and Guidance (25:1–3)

1–3 Distressed by his ever-present adversaries, the psalmist turns to the Lord in prayer. He sets forth his joyful confidence in the Lord, with an attitude of submission and anticipation. The close relationship between the Lord and the psalmist is set forth by the phrase "O my God" and "I lift up my soul." He prays that the wicked will not overpower him. From his perspective evil cannot be victorious, because it is an insult to those who trust in the Lord. Others have trusted in the Lord and have not been disappointed (cf. 21:7; 22:4–5; 26:1). He affirms the confident hope of the godly, that they will receive God's protection and never be "put to shame." However, "the treacherous," who have no regard for the Lord, receive their just reward for their faithlessness.

II. Prayer for Guidance and Forgiveness (25:4–7)

4–5 The psalmist needs guidance, because he desires to imitate God. He reveals an earnest desire to do God's will by praying to know "your ways," "your paths," and "your truth"—expressions that pertain to a manner of life consistent with God's law. The imitation of God requires a submissive spirit to divine instruction. True godliness is not outward conformity to God's law but a spiritual application of God's law to one's life. Thus the psalmist prays for the internalization of God's word. He does not submit to a set of principles or to a legal system but to the "Savior," in whom he has put his "hope."

6 The psalmist prays for God's covenant "mercy" and "love," which he has extended "from of old" to his covenant people: Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, et al. David reflects on the actual demonstrations of the Lord's mighty acts on behalf of Israel. An expression of God's mercy is his readiness to forgive sin (cf. Ex 34:7).

7 The psalmist now prays that the Lord will not remember his past sins, shortcomings, and rebellious spirit. He wants the Lord to deal with him, not in accordance with his lack of loyalty, but according to God's own commitment of loyalty. The ground of forgiveness is God's goodness toward his people. Forgiveness is that act of grace whereby God extends his love, as if the sin had never taken place!

III. Assurance of Guidance (25:8–10)

8–10 God's acts on behalf of his covenant people are characterized by several qualities: "good," "upright," "right" (or "just"), "loving," and "faithful." His divine perfections are revealed for the sake of sinners, so that they may learn the ways of the Lord. The Lord is the Master-Teacher who in a gracious and upright manner "instructs . . . guides . . . and teaches" sinners. The "humble" (GK 6705) are those sinners who have already submitted themselves to his covenant lordship in the fear of the Lord (vv.12, 14). They have learned "all the ways of the LORD." Because God deals with his children justly, lovingly, and faithfully, he expects them to keep the "demands of his covenant."

IV. Prayer for Forgiveness (25:11)

11 The petitioner rises to a new confidence as he reflects on the name "LORD." Great though his sin is, God's forgiveness "for the sake of [his] name" is greater.

V. Assurance of Guidance (25:12–14)

12–14 The "fear of the LORD" is an inner responsiveness and willingness to learn of the Lord. The humble (v.9) continually seek his mercy, forgiveness, and instruction. Maturity in godly wisdom leads to godliness, communion with God, and covenantal bliss. How great the benefits are! First, the Lord has a distinct way for the godly to walk, for he guides them on "the paths of righteousness." Second, the godly enjoy his fellowship. Those who do his will are his confidants, as was Abraham (Ge 18:17), and they receive full enjoyment of the covenantal relationship. Third, the covenantal blessedness is summarized by two promises: "prosperity" (cf. 34:10; 37:28–29) and continuity of "seed" and "land" (Ge 15:7; Dt 1:8, 21, 39; 4:1; 6:1–2; et al.). By these Israel was assured of the establishment of God's kingdom.

VI. Prayer for Deliverance and Protection (25:15–22)

15–22 The psalmist returns to the motif of the enemies as he prays with fervor that the Lord will deliver him from "the snare" of his adversities. He is entrapped and cannot untangle himself from his difficulties. He hopes longingly for help and, while waiting, has committed himself to "integrity and uprightness." As he receives God's instruction in humble fear of the Lord, the psalmist develops in godliness.

The psalmist's dependency is brought out by "lonely and afflicted" and "I take refuge in you." The exact nature of his suffering is not clear, but it seems to be related to his awareness of and sensitivity to his "sins." The effects of sin are great; and though the psalmist sees a correlation between sin and suffering, he casts himself on God for forgiveness and deliverance. The heart of God's saint shows "integrity and uprightness" by demonstrating a deep concern for Israel as a whole.

Psalm 26: The Innocent Plea for Redemption

In this psalm the psalmist casts himself on the Lord with the request that the Lord pay attention to his circumstances. His troubles are undeserved. Because of the strong pleading with God, it has characteristics similar to the individual lament psalms. However, the absence of the clear circumstances of his adversity and the emphasis on his innocence have led scholars to view it as a protective psalm.

I. Prayer for Vindication and Affirmation of Innocence (26:1–3)

1–3 For God to "Vindicate" (GK 9149) someone is for him to declare his servant to be innocent and to avenge himself of the wicked. In his own heart the psalmist knows that he has walked with God in integrity. Linked with this prayer for vindication is a petition for God to examine his deepest and innermost recesses, his "heart" and "mind." The psalmist offers himself completely for a total examination and desires divine approval. Thus vindication is not primarily an expression of God's righteous wrath and indignation against the wicked but a reassuring word from God.

The psalmist believes that God has motivated and enabled him to walk in God's truth with integrity of heart. God's presence is an authentic experience for him. He is not a man of self-confidence, for he has trusted "in the LORD." "Without wavering" and "continually" describe the kind of trust the psalmist has in his God.

II. Dissociation From Evil (26:4–5)

4–5 In his devotion to the Lord, the psalmist has demonstrated a hatred of evil in any shape or form. He does not "sit" (cf. 1:1) with wicked people—described as "deceitful men" (GK 8736; i.e., people who have given themselves to the pursuit of vanity), "hypocrites" (GK 6623; i.e., those whose ways and motives are hidden from others), and an "assembly of evildoers."

The assembly of evildoers is in stark contrast to the "great assembly" of v.12. The word "assembly" (GK 7736) often denotes Israel as the "congregation" of the Lord (cf. Ex 12:6; Lev 16:17; Nu 14:5; et al.). However, within God's people there was a segment who refused loyalty to the Lord. They established an "assembly" within an assembly, those who were really separate from the Lord. The psalmist affirms his hatred of evil and his complete dissociation from it.

III. Affirmation of Innocence and Love for the Lord (26:6–8)

6 The psalmist reflects on his joy in participating in the worship of God and affirms that in the integrity of his heart he is privileged to draw near to God. "Wash my hands in innocence" need not refer to the ritual of washing one's hands (cf. Ex 30:18–21) but may express purity of heart (cf. 73:13) or a declaration of innocence (cf. 24:4; Mt 27:24).

7 In spite of his troubles, the psalmist looks forward to bringing his offerings of devotion, while proclaiming to his fellow worshipers the acts of God's goodness. His "praise" (GK 9343) consists of words of thanksgiving for what the Lord has done. The reason for that thanksgiving is the history of salvation in which the psalmist shares.

8 The psalmist's concern with integrity, devotion, and praise flows out of a heart filled with "love" for the Lord and for God's house. "The house" consists of more than brick and mortar: the Holy One of Israel lives in the midst of his people. He made his "glory" to dwell among his people (Ex 40:34–35; 1Ki 8:11).

IV. Dissociation From Evil (26:9–10)

9–10 The psalmist sets himself off from sinners whose lot is in the hands of an angry God. His prayer "Do not take away" is a prayer for divine favor and a prayer that he may not be condemned by God's judgment together with the wicked. The sinners are those who have given themselves to a life of sin and rebellion against God. But the psalmist is not one of them. Therefore he has a reason to hope that the Lord, in his anger, will yet spare him.

V. Affirmation of Innocence and Prayer for Redemption (26:11–12)

11a In contrast to bloodthirsty and evil men, the psalmist affirms his determination to continue in his walk with the Lord. Evil presents no temptation for him. He knows the One in whom he believes and is determined to cling to him in devotion, regardless of external circumstances.

11b–12 The psalmist prays that the Lord's examination will turn into evidence of his mercy. He sees himself with the godly in Israel. Among them he will praise the Lord for the evidences of his goodness. Thus he will reassure other believers of what God can do in the lives of his children. The test of faith is public and so should be the celebration of God's sustaining grace. The psalmist knows that the One who loves him will not permit his feet to stumble. Therefore he says that his "feet stand on level ground." His confidence is in the Lord.

Psalm 27: Confidence in the Lord

This psalm is related to the previous psalm by a common concern for God's tabernacle (cf. 26:8; 27:6), by an expression of dependence on the Lord (cf. 26:1–2; 27:3–8), by a prayer for vindication (26:1, 9–10; 27:2–3, 12), and by the hope in divine deliverance (26:12; 27:13–14). There is no general agreement on the genre, but the heading ("of David"), the reference to war (v.3), and the concept of sonship (v.10) favor this as a royal psalm.

I. Confidence in God's Presence (27:1–3)

1–3 The confidence of the psalmist lies in the Lord. He has experienced the Lord's presence and describes it as "light" and a "stronghold." "Light" (GK 240) pertains to the experiences of "salvation" and the confidence of the joyous and glorious victory God has promised to his people. The Lord is "the light" of his people (cf. 4:6; 18:28; 43:3; Jn 1:4, 9; 8:12; 1Jn 1:5).

Moreover, God is likened to a "stronghold" (GK 5057). He is the strength of his people, providing a place of refuge for them. The intimate knowledge of God's protecting presence gives confidence and banishes fear. Regardless of how great his adversities, the psalmist looks at the greatness of the Lord in relation to the insignificance of his own problems. The "evil men" are individual enemies in contrast with the national enemies. Opposition and outright "war" do not touch him because his "heart" is strengthened by the Lord.

II. Prayer for God's Presence (27:4–6)

4 The psalmist's longing for God's temple expresses the intensity of his seeking after God himself (cf. v.8; Mt 6 33). He desires to dwell in the temple of God for the rest of his life and to "gaze" on the Lord's beauty and to "seek" (inquire after) him. The "beauty" of the Lord is his favor toward his own.

5 The psalmist seeks the Lord in his "day of trouble," whatever it may be. He anticipates finding protection for himself and his people in God's "dwelling," i.e., the "tabernacle." With the assurance that he is in God's protective hands, he further likens this protection to being placed "high upon a rock." God is that rock for those who trust in him.

6 Confident of God's care and help in trouble, the psalmist anticipates victory over those who have troubled God's people. He vows to sacrifice to the Lord to express his devotion, while singing a hymn to his God. Doubtless he proclaims the mighty acts of God's redemption in his "shouts of joy" and song, in anticipation of victory. His expressions of loyalty result from a trusting heart.

III. Prayer for God's Presence (27:7–12)

7–10 The mood changes suddenly. The depth of anxiety is expressed in "hear my voice," "be merciful to me," "do not hide your face," and "do not turn. . . . Do not reject." The repetitious language communicates the intensity of the soul's searching and the greatness of his need. He is praying for immediate deliverance out of the adversity. The grounds for his prayer are the covenant name of the Lord, the devotion of the psalmist to his loving God, the acts of God's past loyalty as the "helper" and Savior, and the Father-son relationship.

Through his prayer the psalmist develops a deeper sense of dependence on the Lord. Adversity often masquerades as God's lack of interest or outright anger. When God hides his face, he removes his blessings. But the psalmist knows that the Lord is his heavenly Father. He looks for the intimacy of a relationship with his Father in heaven even in the experience of God's wrath; he expects the Lord to "receive" him.

11–12 Having prayed for God's mercy and in fellowship with the Lord, the psalmist hopes that he will again enjoy God's protection. The "straight path" signifies that all obstacles have been removed. Only the Lord can take the psalmist and God's people out of their distress and lead them into safety. The psalmist prays also for victory over the enemies. If God is with his people, no force is sufficiently powerful to oppose them. At issue is whose "desire" will be granted: the psalmist's or his enemies'? According to 41:2, the Lord protects his own and does not hand them over to "the desire of [his] foes." The submissiveness of the psalmist to God's guidance contrasts to the "violence" of the ungodly.

IV. Confidence in God's Presence (27:13–14)

13–14 The psalm concludes on a triumphant note. In spite of his difficulties, the psalmist is strongly convinced that the Lord will come to the rescue of his people. He believes that he will taste God's "goodness" (GK 3206) in fellowship, protection, guidance, and victory. "The land of the living" denotes "life" on earth over against the state of death. The words of encouragement are reminiscent of Moses' words to Joshua (Dt 31:7), of God's commission of Joshua (Jos 1:6, 7, 9, 18), and of Joshua's words to the people (10:25). Redemptive history did not conclude with the Conquest. It continues as long as God's people "wait for the LORD" and do his will.

Psalm 28: Prayer to the Lord, My Strength and My Shield

The psalmist begins with an urgent prayer in the form of an individual lament (vv.1–5) and concludes with an expression of confidence in the Lord, his strength (vv.6–9). The hymnic thanksgiving to the Lord contains both a blessing and a prayer. The psalm is associated with David and portrays the Lord as caring for his people through his "anointed one" (v.8). It is not clearly a messianic psalm, nor is it a royal psalm. However, it shares with the royal psalms the expectation that the Lord will rule victoriously over his people.

I. Personal Prayer (28:1–2)

1–2 The prayer is directed emphatically to the Lord—"to you." This phrase is symmetric with the last clause of v.2: "toward your Most Holy Place." Prayer is an expression of dependence on the Lord for help. He alone is the "Rock" who gives strength and sustenance to his people. Prayer is also a privilege that belongs to his covenant people—addressed to "the LORD." This prayer arose out of an urgent need whose specific nature is not important enough to be remembered.

In his prayer, the psalmist makes two petitions. (1) He calls on the Lord to act now. Though he may have suffered for some time, the psalmist calls on him to "not turn a deaf ear." The silence of God aggravates the psalmist's suffering to the point of becoming unbearable. It is as if he is ready to die. The "pit" is synonymous with "Sheol" (cf. 22:29; 30:3–4; 88:4; see GK 1014 & 8619). Instead of blessing, the psalmist experiences adversity. But before the testing becomes too severe, he petitions the Lord to be sensitive to his needs.

(2) The second petition, a "cry for mercy," underscores the first. The psalmist calls for God's grace to extend to him. As he cries out in his distress, he prays that the All-Merciful may come to his help. To this end he lifts up his hand in prayer, a symbolic expression of his utter dependence on the Lord. The psalmist conforms to an ancient practice of raising his hands to the Most Holy Place (cf. 63:4; 134:2; 141:2), the dwelling place of God on earth.

II. Prayer for Justice (28:3–5)

3 The psalmist's true concern is with God's honor. But the psalmist suffers from the apparent lack of justice. Therefore he prays that the Lord may lift him out of his troubles (cf. 26:9–12) so that he will not be likened to nor judged with the wicked. The wicked are those whose hearts persist in practicing evil and in speaking deceptively.

4–5 The psalmist goes on to prays for God's judgment on the wicked. His concern for retribution does not arise out of some morbid sense of joy in their suffering. He submits himself to the Lord who will requite (Mt 16:27; 2Ti 4:14; Rev 20:12–13; 22:12). The wicked have had their chance; but instead of accepting their responsibility to the Lord, they showed their disregard for him. They have not learned how to respond to God and to his mighty acts. Instead they have occupied themselves with the works of their own hands. Since the wicked do not show a proper regard for the "works" of the Lord or "what his hands have done," their due punishment is destruction.

III. Trust in God's Justice (28:6–8)

6–8 In anticipation of his righteous judgment and the experience of vindication, the psalmist bursts out in a hymn of praise to God. He knows that the Lord has heard his prayer for mercy and looks forward to an even greater deliverance. The psalmist calls the Lord "my Rock" (v.1), "my strength," and "my shield." No longer does he feel threatened to the point of despair; he is now overjoyed and jubilant. He trusted in the "rock" of his salvation, and that "Rock" proved to be a reliable, covenant-faithful God. His confidence in God's justice goes beyond his own experience. The Lord is the God of his people. Since the Lord takes care of the individual, he will most certainly prove himself to be the "strength of his people" and the "fortress" or "stronghold" of his anointed king. "Salvation," i.e., the victory, belongs to him.

IV. Personal Intercession (28:9)

9 In a truly theocratic fashion, the psalmist prays, not only for himself, but also for the people. People and king, nation and individual belong together. He closes his prayer of lament and thanksgiving with a prayer for deliverance from oppression, for the Lord's blessing on his own people, and for God's royal kingship over his own.

Psalm 29: The Victorious Kingship of the Lord

In a grand hymn of praise, the psalmist sets forth a portrait of the Lord as the victorious King. The hymn of praise focuses on a particular aspect of the rule of God. Because of the metaphorical significance of the thunder, the hymn evokes a response of awe at the revelation of God or at his demonstration of victory over the enemies.

I. In Praise of the Lord's Kingship (29:1–2)

1–2 Three times the "mighty ones" are called on to give praise to the Lord. The "mighty ones" (i.e., the divine assembly of heavenly beings who surround the throne of God) are to show due honor to his "glory and strength" and to his "name." The "name" of God is a respectful reference to "the LORD" in the demonstration of his "glory and strength"—a combination that stresses his powerful acts in creation and redemption. The psalmist praises the Lord for his rule, sovereignty, and majesty in relationship to his people and to all his works.

II. The Glorious Voice of the Lord (29:3–9)

3–4 The glory of God rests on all his creation: sky, sea, land, and wilderness. The thunderstorm is a powerful illustration of the majesty and power of God—even at sea. The Mediterranean Sea was a mighty force whose powerful waves could cause great destruction. But the Lord is sovereign over the terrible forces of the sea (cf. 93:3–4).

5–6 The glory of God is also evident in the mountains (114:4, 6). In his presence they are shaken like small objects. These mighty mountain ranges, rising to an altitude of ten thousand feet above sea level, are dramatically portrayed as skipping like a calf and like a wild ox. By the effect of God's power, the grand cedars on Mount Lebanon are felled and splintered to pieces.

7–9 The "voice of the LORD" resonates in heaven and on earth. The psalmist associates the thunder so intimately with the lightning that he reflects on the terrible effects of a lightning bolt. The glory of God reveals itself in the desert regions, over which the Lord also rules. The proper response of God's heavenly creatures is their ascription of glory to the Great King. Everyone in his heavenly temple cries out, "Glory!"

III. In Praise of the Lord's Kingship (29:10–11)

10–11 Though the storms rage and the mountains quake, the Lord is king. His enthronement over "the flood" assures his children that great as his power is, he is sovereign. As in the days of the Flood, so it is at any time that God's glory can be expressed in severe judgment. He rules over nations and peoples that inhabit and traverse land and sea. The demonstration of God's glory in nature gives a sense of tranquility and awe. The Lord, our God, is powerful in his glory. He can and does protect his people.

Psalm 30: Praise for God's Faithfulness in a Time of Need

Praise constitutes the key motif of this psalm. The manner of description of the psalmist's suffering and his exhortation to the "saints" (v.4) to praise the Lord suggest that it is an individual psalm of thanksgiving. If the psalm is Davidic, it may have been composed at the dedication of David's palace or of the building materials of the temple (cf. 1Ch 22:2–19).

However, the word used here for "dedication" connotes the completion of the temple (cf. 1Ki 8:63); so it is preferable to view the psalm as an individual thanksgiving psalm associated with David, and to consider the superscription a later addition.

I. Praise for God's Wonderful Acts (30:1–3)

1–3 The psalmist experienced a terrible sickness that brought him to the edge of life. Instead of feeling abandoned by the Lord, he witnessed God's goodness in answering his prayer and by healing him. He exalts God because he brought him up from near death, listened to his prayer, and did not allow the wicked to rejoice. The phrase "you lifted me" means "you saved me." The particular circumstances of the trouble are not relevant, but the experience of deliverance was important to the psalmist. The enemies had no occasion to "gloat."

The psalmist praises the Lord for answered prayer, calling God by his revealed name: "O LORD my God." In the intimacy of communion lies the secret of answered prayer. Since the Lord has brought him up from the "grave" (GK 8619) and saved him from descending into the "pit" (GK 1014, 1071), he praises him as the Exalted One.

III. God's Favor and Anger (30:4–7)

4–7 The praise of God goes from individual praise to a communal celebration. The "saints" (GK 2883) are all those who are loyal to the Lord. They praise "his holy name" for forgiveness and restoration. The psalmist confesses within the assembly that he has sinned against the Lord by a haughty, independent spirit. When everything was going well with him, he "felt secure," even to the point of self-confidence. Apparently he had come to a point of practical atheism.

In his "anger" the Lord had afflicted the psalmist, who in his despair cast himself on the Lord. The period of anguish was like "night" to him, because of the intense experience of weeping. His sorrow resulted both from the suffering and from repentance. The psalmist then returned to the Lord his God (cf. v.2) and experienced his forgiveness. The Lord then restored him—a restoration or healing that is compared to morning light. Such restoration changes weeping into joy. The psalmist knows that it was by the "favor" (GK 8356) of the Lord that he was restored—a word that signifies a renewal of love, forgiveness, restoration, and blessing. The psalmist now feels himself more secure and likens his renewed dependence on the Lord to a "mountain." In his own strength, he was weak; but in God's healing, he became like a mountain.

IV. Praise for God's Wonderful Acts (30:8–12)

8–10 How different is the psalmist's relationship with his God from the time that he felt himself secure within himself! He states emphatically that he looks toward the Lord "for mercy" (GK 2858). He then reflects again on the desperate situation in which he found himself (vv.9–10; cf. comments on vv.3–5).

11–12 The Lord was faithful in changing circumstances. He effectually changed wailing into dancing, mourning into joy, and a deathly cry into a song of joy. Such is the goodness of God. Because of the mercy of the Lord, the psalmist vows to continue in the praise of God. The NIV translates "glory" (GK 3883) as "heart." The word often occurs in parallelism with "soul" (7:5; NIV, "life") and so frequently refers to the whole human being or existence. He will glorify the Lord!

Psalm 31: How Great Is Your Goodness!

The tone of the psalm vacillates between lament and thanksgiving, but the nature of the troubles is unclear. The psalmist make extensive use of repetition as a literary device.

I. Prayer (31:1–18)

A. Prayer for the Lord's Righteousness (31:1–5)

1–5 The prayer opens with an emphatic declaration of trust. The psalmist has taken refuge in "the LORD," i.e., the covenant-keeping God (cf. Ex 3:15; 6:3; Ps 20:1). In these words he pours out his heart before his Father, who has promised to take care of him. He trusts in the Lord because he knows that he will not be put to shame. The Lord will deliver for the sake of his name, and he is the "rock" (GK 7446) and "fortress" (GK 5181) of his covenant people. The Lord identifies with them; his honor is at stake when they hurt, collectively or individually.

As the Great Shepherd of his people, the Lord leads and guides (v.3; cf. 23:2–3). In his prayer the psalmist seeks a demonstration of the Lord's "righteousness" (v.1; GK 7407), a divine perfection by which the Lord assures his own that he cares for their well-being. The nature of his problem is not specified but involves the enemies who are waiting to "trap" him.

There is an urgency in the psalmist's request "come quickly." In spite of the travail of his soul, he submits himself to God's righteousness because he is "the God of truth." As such, he is "refuge" (GK 5057) for his people. Even in his great need, the psalmist has not lost heart. His trust in the Lord is an act of abandonment: "Into your hands I commit my spirit" (cf. Lk 23:46). God's expectation of his people, before and after Christ, remains the same.

B. Expression of Trust (31:6–8)

6–8 The phrase "worthless idols" can be rendered "vanities of vain," emphasizing the total worthlessness of idolatry. How different is the Lord, whose "love" (GK 2876) finds expression in his acts of deliverance from the enemies! That the Lord "saw" and "knew" is enough, because this is the first stage of his deliverance. The psalmist thus rejoices in anticipation of God's act of deliverance, who will guide him into "a spacious place," far away from his enemies.

C. Prayer for the Lord's Favor (31:9–13)

9–10 The feelings of confidence ebb away in a flood of tears as the psalmist details his troubles in the center part of his prayer. The enemies he has thus far alluded to take on a real shape. They create "distress" by their ridicule and shunning. They are agents of death. The psalmist casts himself on the mercy or favor of the Lord. He knows that by covenant he has a right to expect the Lord to act, but his situation is so desperate that he cannot wait. His cry for mercy is an expression of deep despair. His joy in life is gone; his mental anguish has sapped his physical strength to a point approaching death. The references to "soul," "body," "life," "years," "strength," and "bones" refer to the whole human being, physical and spiritual.

11–13 The psalmist's life ebbs away because of his enemies. He knows that the Lord has promised him life, but he is downcast and disgraced. The enemies have deeply affected him by their slanderous schemes and mockery. The phrase "I am forgotten by them" expresses the depth of despair. His enemies dread him like a disease and act as if he does not exist. He has become useless, "like broken pottery." "And plot to take my life" sums up his concern with life over against death, with justice in opposition to injustice, and with the Lord's fidelity in contrast to the treachery of others.

D. Expression of Trust (31:14–18)

14–18 In broad strokes the psalmist repeats the various elements already introduced as a transition to the hymn of thanksgiving (vv.19–24). The repetition reveals his heightened sense of confidence in his Redeemer. (1) He affirms his basic confidence in the Lord, his God. (2) He commits his circumstances to God's sovereign control. (3) He commits himself to the love of God. (4) He prays for a resolution to the drama: the end of his adversaries. The psalmist trusts that the Lord will honor his prayer so that he need no longer stand shamefaced in the presence of his enemies. When the Lord extends his love in his covenant blessing, the treachery and scheming of the wicked will end.

II. Thanksgiving (31:19–24)

19–22 The Lord is "good" by working things out righteously for those "who fear [him]." Even when they are oppressed like a "besieged city," they are kept safe in "the shelter of [his] presence." While he may "hide them," he nevertheless makes it clear "in the sight of men" that the godly are under his protection. In the context of injustice and adversity, he manifests his "wonderful love" in loneliness and abandonment. The formula of blessing "praise be to the LORD" expresses the joy of the redeemed after having experienced his salvation.

23–24 The psalmist confesses his frailty in having questioned God by despairing in his "alarm." But he was proven wrong, and the Lord triumphed. He did hear and did come to his rescue! The psalmist thus encourages the godly to learn from his experience. He exhorts them to hope and trust in Lord regardless of their circumstances. Faith is not a one-time commitment but an abandonment to the living God, who has promised to "preserve" his own. The life of faith lets God be God—by responding to him in "love," by living in the strength of faith, by observing his word, and by waiting in the "hope" of redemption.

Psalm 32: The Blessing of Forgiveness and Wise Living

Psalm 32 has a special significance in the life of the church and the Christian. It is one of the seven penitential psalms (6; 32; 38; 51; 102; 130; 143), and its association with David encourages the Christian to use the psalm as an assurance of God's forgiveness. Yet this psalm is more than a penitential psalm. Because it includes elements of thanksgiving (vv.3–8) and wisdom (vv.1–2, 9–11), we conclude it is an adaptation of a thanksgiving psalm to the wisdom tradition.

I. Blessing of Forgiveness (32:1–2)

1–2 Forgiveness is freely and graciously given by God regardless of whether there be a "transgression," "sin," or "iniquity" (NIV, "sin"). "Transgression" (GK 7322) is an act of rebellion and disloyalty; "sin" (GK 2631) is an act that misses—often intentionally—God's expressed and revealed will; and "iniquity" (GK 6411) is a crooked or wrong act, often associated with a conscious and intentional intent to do wrong.

Three verbs express the absoluteness of divine forgiveness: (1) "are forgiven" (lit., "carried away"; GK 5951) is the act of removal of sin, guilt, and the remembrance of sin; (2) "are covered" (GK 4059) is the gracious act of atonement by which the sinner is reconciled and the sin is a matter of the past, so that the Lord does not bring it up anymore; (3) "does not count" (GK 3108 & 3110) expresses God's attitude toward those forgiven as "justified." The voice of wisdom is heard in the last phrase, where the blessedness of forgiveness is contingent on integrity.

II. Lesson From Experience (32:3–5)

3–5 The description of the anguish of suffering is compared to the wasting away of "bones" and the sapping of physical strength. God's discipline weighed so heavily that the psalmist nearly succumbs under its pressure. God's discipline, like the hot, dry Mediterranean summer climate, dries up the psalmist's vigor like a plant in the heat of summer. In a truly repentant spirit, the psalmist confesses his sin. The three synonyms for sin associated with three synonyms for forgiveness are now associated with three verbs for confession: (1) he "acknowledged" (GK 3359), (2) he "did not cover up" (GK 4059), and (3) he did "confess" (GK 3344).

III. God's Protection (32:6–7)

6–7 The psalmist encourages the "godly" to draw near to God in his affirmation of God's ability to protect and to deliver from adversity. Even in great adversity, likened to the rush of water through the narrow confines of a wadi, the Lord will protect those who seek refuge in him; he is their "hiding place." Their joy in deliverance expresses itself in joyful shouts as a tribute to God's fidelity.

IV. Promise of Wisdom (32:8)

8 There is a sudden shift from the encouragement of God's protection to the exhortation to wise living (vv.9–11) as the psalmist quotes the Lord, who has promised to instruct his children, give them wisdom, and watch over them. The pattern of "three" is resumed in the promise of God to "instruct," "teach," and "counsel."

V. Lesson From Experience (32:9)

9 Some animals must be bridled to be useful. God gives the godly freedom on the highway of godliness. They draw near to him out of a personal desire for holiness. Those who do not draw near are like animals that have to be held in check.

VI. God's Protection (32:10)

10 This section repeats essentially the assurance of God's protection and love to those who trust in him. The requirement of "trust" (GK 1053) is equivalent to the expression of reliance on the Lord. The wicked may experience endless adversities, whereas the wise will experience the constancy of God's love and protection.

VII. Rejoicing in Forgiveness (32:11)

11 The encouragement to wise living concludes with an exhortation to rejoice. The godly who are mindful of all the benefits (forgiveness, protection, guidance) of the Lord will rejoice! The benefits are limited to the "righteous," who are "upright in heart."

Psalm 33: The Lord Is a Sovereign and Gracious Ruler

Although Ps 33 is commonly classified as a hymn of praise to the Lord "as Creator," the principal theme appears to be praise of God's creative activities in the realms of nature and human history. The structure reveals a cyclical pattern by which each generation is encouraged to praise the Lord for past and present evidences of his love. Consequently, each generation is to expect the Lord to give further reason for praise as the eyes of faith are fixed on him and on a renewal of his love.

I. Song of Praise (33:1–3)

1–3 Singing praises to the Lord was a joyous occasion. The community of worshipers consisted of the "righteous" and "upright." The call to praise assumes that the godly know the Lord, submit themselves to his lordship, and affirm a renewal of hope and trust in his love and deliverance (vv.20–22). Every time they meet together for the praise of the Lord, they have further reasons for singing to him. The renewal of his loving acts on behalf of his own gives rise to a response of gratitude in a "new song"—"new" in the sense that it celebrates a new act of God's redemption.

II. Perfections of the Lord (33:4–5)

4–5 The nature of the Lord is the major reason for the celebration. The word "right" (GK 3838) is the same the word "upright" (v.1). An upright person is without deception, full of integrity of heart, and the opposite of the perverse (Pr 8:8). The Lord's verdicts, rule, and relationship with his people are all characterized by a working out of his plans. The rule of faith is that whatever God decrees is right, and whatever he brings to pass is faithful and true. The Lord's love is evident in his works on earth.

III. The Lord Is the Creator-Ruler (33:6–11)

6–8 By his word God established order on earth and in heaven. Space with its "starry host" is awe-inspiring; the Lord made it and rules over it. He contains the seas as easily as a farmer keeps the grain in a storehouse. Since the Lord made everything and rules over the universe, all nations should recognize that he alone is the Creator-Ruler.

9 The nations must also know that the order in the world is not the result of a harmonious coexistence of the gods. Everything reflects God's wise decree and sovereign rule. Whatever he spoke came into being.

10–11 The nations are fully under his control. Creation and providence are the timely operations of God's purposes. Nothing will "thwart" his plans, which he has purposed for the encouragement of the godly.

IV. The Lord Is the Ruler Over Humankind (33:12–17)

12–17 The Lord freely chose to be the God of his people and appointed them to be his "inheritance" (GK 5709). Israel received a special status out of all the nations (cf. Ex 19:5; Dt 4:20; 9:26, 29; 32:9; et al.). God sees everything that happens on earth. As he is seated on his throne, he not only knows what happens but also understands what humans are doing and planning because he has created them. Everyone is accountable to him. Moreover, people can never thwart God's purposes, because in and through all their planning and affairs, God works out his own goals. Human beings may look at military stratagems ("army," "warrior," "horse"), but the Lord is sovereign over them all. He alone can save, and he alone can bring to nothing.

V. The Lord's Love for His People (33:18–19)

18–19 God's favor rests on those who "fear him" and who "hope" in his "unfailing love" (GK 2876). Therefore, God's people have reason to celebrate. They alone are "blessed" by the very privilege of being a covenant people (v.12). The nations depend on military power. Regardless of how powerful or how threatening an enemy may be, the godly need not fear because "the eyes of the LORD are on those who fear him." They know that he will deal with them with "unfailing love" and will deliver them from any adversity.

VI. Hope in the Lord's Love (33:20–22)

20–22 Regardless of circumstances, each generation of God's people witnesses the new acts of his love. He is their "help" and "shield." They trust in his "holy name," with which they associate past acts of deliverance. Trust requires submission, a willingness to let God be God. The believing community looks expectantly to the Lord, who will work out his plans for the establishment of his kingdom and the renewal of the earth.

Psalm 34: Wise Counsel for the Poor of Heart

This psalm is an irregular acrostic. It is generally categorized as an individual thanksgiving hymn, but the wisdom element (vv.8–22) may well argue in favor of its being a wisdom psalm. Two basic themes unfold: thanksgiving and wisdom.

I. Thanksgiving for God's Goodness and Justice (34:1–7)

A. Individual and Communal Praise (34:1–3)

1–3 The psalmist opens with personal praise in the form of a hymn. His praise of God is continual, God-centered, and the product of a grateful heart. This is the kind of an offering the Lord will not reject. His own response to adversity and deliverance is to encourage the "afflicted" (GK6705), i.e., the people of God who seek him diligently (v.11). The great chorus of all God's saints joyfully celebrates what God has done on behalf of his own.

B. Individual and Communal Experiences (34:4–7)

4–5 The wise and experienced author teaches from his own experience. He knows what "fears" are, those horrid experiences in life as well as the dread of the unknown. He has also witnessed how God's saints radiate confidence and joy. They look for the light of his countenance and are blessed with the abundance of his goodness and blessing.

6–7 The psalmist may actually point to someone in the audience as he says, "this poor man" (or "humble"). God's people know that the Lord has delivered them from all adversities. The psalmist assures the godly that the "angel of the LORD" protects his beloved. This may indirectly refer to the Lord or allude to the host of angels God has charged with protecting his own. However, protection and deliverance are predicated on evidence of allegiance in the form of "fear of God."

II. In Praise of Wisdom (34:8–22)

A. Exhortation to Wisdom (34:8–14)

8–10 The wise "taste" (GK 3247) God's goodness for themselves by taking "refuge" in him and by submitting their way of life to his. "Blessed" (GK 897) are those who find refuge in the Lord, because they will taste and see that the Lord is good (cf. 1Pe 2:3). Blessed also are those who "fear" him, because they will lack nothing. The psalmist encourages godliness by contrasting the situation of the godly with young lions who may suffer want. The godly are encouraged to seek the Lord because he provides for all our needs (cf. Mt 6:33).

11–14 In wisdom literature the students of the sages are known as their "children" (cf. Pr 1:8; 4:1). The first lesson in that school is "the fear of the LORD," which expresses itself in submission to his way. The next lesson consists in doing the will of God: integrity of language versus deception, practice of good versus evil, and pursuit of peace versus trouble. The reward of wisdom is enjoyed in this life, because God is good to those who seek him. He looks on them with favor and is responsive to their needs.

B. The Rewards of Wisdom (34:15–22)

15–22 The "ears" of the Lord hear the cry of the righteous. His "face" is close to the "brokenhearted" and "crushed." They need not be overcome by their troubles. The way of wisdom assures those who walk by it that God is present, even when they suffer "many troubles." But they do not need to be afraid, because the Lord will deliver his own. The protection of "bones" symbolizes the Lord's care for his own. The wicked will perish, but the godly will find the Lord to be faithful. Those who trust in him will not perish.

Psalm 35: A Prayer for Vindication

With great emotion and urgency, David prays this prayer. The context in which the psalm arose is not certain as its language shifts between legal and military. It may be classified as an individual lament.

I. Call on the Divine Warrior (35:1–10)

1–3a The psalmist boldly opens his case with an appeal to God's justice. "Contend" (GK 8189) is a legal term. The legal imagery is further developed in the confession of God's justice in v.10. In need of help, the psalmist casts his burden on the Lord and asks him to represent his case as counselor and prosecutor. The metaphor of a lawsuit changes to that of warfare. The Lord is likened to a warrior who fights on behalf of his own. He comes with a small shield and a "buckler" (a large, possibly rectangular, shield often carried by a shield-bearer; cf. 1Sa 17:7, 41), together with a "spear and javelin."

3b The psalmist is in need of the reassuring words: "I am your salvation." The pronoun "I," when referring to the Lord, signifies the God who has promised to be the Deliverer of his own (Ex 6:6–8). The psalmist is not only looking for divine assurance but also for a new act of God: "salvation" (GK 3802). This word signifies more than reconciliation with God. The biblical view of life is that a threat to the well-being of soul or body requires a divine act of deliverance.

4–8 Prayer for God's deliverance is followed by a prayer for God's vengeance. The psalmist calls for God's judgments to fall on the enemies in the forms of "shame" (i.e., military defeat), "chaff" (i.e., worthlessness), "dark and slippery" paths (i.e., troubles and uncertainties), and "ruin." The psalmist affirms his innocence of any wrongdoing. The statement of unjust treatment is followed by three more imprecations and a climactic statement of the anticipated deliverance.

The face of this Israelite soldier, with a shield and a spear (cf. 35:2–3), is that of King Jehu of Israel. Drawing by Rachel Bierling.

9–10 When the Lord's justice is expressed against the wicked and the righteous witness the Lord's salvation, they have cause for rejoicing. David's exclamation "Who is like you, O LORD?" arises out of anticipation of the divine deliverance; he knows that the Lord is his Helper and Savior. He may have to wait; but in the meantime he confesses that the Lord is just to the needy. When the Redeemer-Warrior comes to bring in righteousness, all the redeemed will join together in songs of praise because he has delivered them from their troubles and afflictions.

II. The Troubled Soul (35:11–18)

11–16 The psalmist feels himself betrayed by those he has done good to in the past. He had shown concern for their affliction by tokens of mourning and by intercessory prayer. In his own adversity the psalmist found out that his allies were unreliable friends, who brought him low. They used false witnesses to accuse him, to slander him, and to express their anger against him.

17–18 The psalmist also experienced that the Lord was far from him. He laments to his God, "O Lord, how long will you look on?" The "Lord" (GK 123; Master [of the universe]) must have seen all that the rogues have done, but how long will it be before he will act justly? This question of God's justice is an expression of hope in God's ultimate faithfulness. The psalmist has become an international spectacle, and the honor of his people and of his God is at stake. When the Lord has shown his mercy on the king, he will lead the congregation in proclaiming publicly the mighty works of the Lord.

III. Prayer for Vindication (35:19–25)

19–25 The psalmist returns with a final portrayal of injustice. He has been innocently betrayed by his allies. They have turned against him in their speech, betrayed their ill-feelings with their eyes, and rejoiced in his misfortunes. Their words sound harsh as they claim to have evidence against him. The witnesses have stood up and have testified, "with our own eyes we have seen it."

In view of the injustice of his former allies, who are filled with treachery and twist the truth to their advantage, the psalmist entrusts his case to the Lord. He too has seen what both the psalmist and his enemies have done, and he will not remain quiet. Thus the psalmist cries out to the Lord to vindicate him. The "righteousness" of God is at stake. The psalmist prays that the Lord will act on his behalf so that his enemies will not be overcome with feelings of victory. David is convinced that God's speedy trial will end their irritating joviality.

IV. Joy of Deliverance (35:26–28)

26–28 The psalmist prays that justice and righteousness may triumph. He contrasts the wicked and the godly by praying that the enemies of God may suffer the curses of the covenant. He also prays for the Lord's people, who suffered disgrace when their anointed king was disgraced. His ultimate hope is in the redemption of God's people.

When justice returns to earth, God's people will be filled with joy. They will pray for the enlargement of God's kingdom over the self-exaltation of the enemies. The triumph of the Lord's justice evidences his love for his servant David, his concern for his well-being, and—by means of the Lord's anointed—his loyalty to Israel's well-being (v.20). Then the "tongue," which has thus far been the instrument of petition and imprecation, will again praise the Lord for his "peace" ("well-being") and "righteousness."

Psalm 36: The Blessedness of the Wise

This psalm has a variety of genres: individual lament, wisdom, and hymn. The final product is best understood as a wisdom psalm, of which the first four verses set the mood.

I. The Nature of the Wicked (36:1–4)

1–4 The ungodly lives with no concern for the fear of God (Pr 1:7). They deceive themselves into thinking that God neither knows nor cares about evil in the world. Evil is their companion, even when they are in bed. They think of getting ahead, of their own good, without concern for justice and righteousness. They take a firm stand (cf. 1:1) in their commitment to wrongdoing. Their speech reflects their inner being in that their words are "wicked and deceitful." Their thoughts, speech, and acts harmoniously mirror the inner "evil" of their being. By rejecting wisdom, they no longer reject "what is wrong."

II. The Wisdom of God (36:5–6)

5–6 The Lord's wisdom is reflected in his "love," "faithfulness," "righteousness," and "justice." His "faithfulness" (GK 575) guarantees the constancy of his "love" (GK 2876) for his own. God's "righteousness" (GK 7407) will effect "justice" (GK 5477) on earth so that the righteous will experience his salvation and the wicked his judgment. God's wisdom affects everything he has created, particularly his own creatures, "man and beast." By his love and justice they live and enjoy living.

III. The Joys of Wisdom (36:7–9)

7–9 God is truly concerned for all humankind (cf. the phrase "low among men"). The Creator protects, feeds, and gives drink. All exist by his goodness. Yet from the context we should limit the privilege of God's special protection to godly people. They alone have a right to find protection under the "shadow of his wings." They alone have access to his "house," enjoying the communal meals as a token of his goodness and provisions for them (Isa 65:13). They are given to drink, as it were, from the "river of delights" and the "fountain of life." The Lord, the source of wisdom, grants his children all their needs. "Life" and "light" speak of the fullness of salvation in the presence of God.

IV. Prayer of Protection From Evil (36:10–12)

10–11 Because the godly live by God's unfailing love and righteousness, the psalmist prays that the qualities of God's wisdom may continue toward the "upright in heart," i.e., those who "know" the Lord. He prays for them and exhorts them to persevere in the knowledge of God. This requires trust in and fidelity to the Lord. For their part, the godly desire to be like God. To this end they pray that they may be kept from evil (cf. Mt 6:13). If evil prevails, the "gifts" of life and home, material and spiritual blessings, may be taken away, allowing the "proud" to be victorious and drive them from their blessings.

12 The concluding prayer petitions the Lord to care for his children in the confidence that evil will cease. Evil cannot coexist with God's rule. It must fall. When that moment comes, the joy of God's blessed presence, protection, and provisions will be precious to the godly.

Psalm 37: Wise Living in a Crooked Generation

In a moving way the psalmist deals with the issues of life and death, wisdom and folly, and reward and punishment. At issue is the power, greed, and prosperity of the wicked and the suffering of the righteous. This issue and the manner of resolution provide sound reasons to approach Ps 37 as a wisdom psalm.

I. Exhortation to Hope in the Lord's Deliverance (37:1–6)

1–6 The wise must carefully watch their response to the wicked. It is all too easy to be adversely affected by their prosperity. Regardless of how well off the evil are, they are nothing but mortals who live on an earth under God's just and sovereign rule. The wicked may thrive like grass and plants, but they will not stand up under adversity. As the lush spring vegetation may quickly lose its beauty in the face of a hot, dry desert wind, so too the wicked will quickly fade away.

Instead of giving in to self-pity and envy, the wise trust in the Lord, submitting to his will in the resolution of the dilemma. In this spirit they delight themselves in the Lord. This "delight" (GK 6695) is a more positive reaction than "jealousy," as the wise learn to enjoy all their blessings with contentment. Those who "trust" (GK 1053) in the Lord (i.e., wait for him to act) will "dwell in the land" and do their work ("enjoy safe pasture") with the assurance that the Lord's blessing rests on them. He will grant the desires of those who put themselves completely under his fatherly care.

Because the Lord is righteous and just, the wise have the assurance that he will extend "righteousness" (GK 7406) and "justice" (GK 5477) to his own. These two words refer to the evidences of God's rule over this world, when he establishes the righteous order and glorifies his children. That glory will be unveiled like the rising sun at dawn and like the bright light at noon. The righteous may suffer from evildoers (v.1) but they live in the hope of the day when God will deal justly with evil.

II. The Comfort of Divine Retribution (37:7–11)

7–11 Wise living deals first with negative emotions—anger, fretting, and jealousy. These lead to sin against God, self, or others. Wise living resists evil by trusting in the Lord and doing good. A righteous person begins by being "still before the LORD" and by waiting for his deliverance. Living faith knows that God will act.

God's justice against the wicked is their premature end and ultimately the complete annihilation of evil. They will perish like grass on the day God has determined for them (v.13b). Then his own people will "inherit the land." This refers first to Canaan, but the promise extends to all God's people and to the whole earth (cf. Mt 5:5). The promises of God are only for the "meek" (GK 6705), who trust God "in hope" of justice and who actively do his will on earth. Theirs is the kingdom! They will "enjoy great peace." "Peace" (shalom; GK 8934) stands for the beneficence of the godly, in contrast with the life of suffering.

III. The Contrastive Ways of the Righteous and the Wicked (37:12–26)

12–17 The wicked "plot" to get the upper hand. Their godlessness is expressed in an obsession with evil and a hatred of good. They "gnash their teeth" in bitter jealousy. Like soldiers in a desperate battle, they use any trick to overcome the godly. They rule with "sword" and "bow," symbolic of their strength and abuse of power, and they eagerly await the destruction of the godly. Their victims are the "poor and needy," i.e., the destitute and those robbed of justice. Their goal is a chaotic autonomy, a world in which injustice is law. There is no place for those "whose ways are upright" in their world.

In contrast to the wicked, the wise man knows that a "little" with godliness is preferable to plenty with godlessness (cf. Pr 15:16; 16:8, 19). Above the wicked is a just God who does not act immediately but "laughs at the wicked." He sees the end from the beginning and assures the godly that "their day is coming." It will be that terrible "day of the LORD," when "the power of the wicked" (symbolized by the piercing swords and broken bows) will be broken. They will get their just desert.

18–22 The Lord knows "the days of the blameless," i.e., the many days of their lives. Whereas he sees "the day" (sing.) of the wicked, he will bestow his covenant favors on his own in the days (pl.) to come. They will continue even in the "days of famine," but the wicked come to an end. The godly may suffer adversities, but, unlike the wicked who "wither," they will "enjoy plenty." The righteous are "blessed" by the Lord and are therefore guaranteed his covenant mercies: life and its full enjoyment. In contrast to the wicked, who hoard for themselves, the righteous are like God and "generously" help the poor.

The demise of the wicked comforts the righteous. They are like sacrifices going up in smoke or beautiful flowers that readily disappear. They certainly will "vanish" because of God's curse. They may even come to poverty in this life so that they have to borrow to stay alive, being unable to pay back; but ultimately they will be "cut off" from the presence of God and all his benefits.

23–26 The focus moves from the contrasts between the godly and the wicked to the various blessings of the godly. (1) The Lord establishes the godly, even in times of adversity. They may "stumble," but they will not fall, for the Lord keeps them from falling. (2) The Lord takes care of the physical needs of his children. He gives life to his people and supports the righteous with "bread." They are not "forsaken." They have God's promise that he will not completely forsake his own (Ge 17:7; 28:15; Mt 28:20). (3) God gives to his own because they, like him, are gracious stewards (v.26). God's blessing also extends to the next generation, as "their children will be blessed" (Ac 2:39).

IV. Call for Wise Living in View of the Belief in Divine Retribution (37:27–33)

27–31 The psalmist has given the godly much reason for encouragement as well as a wise perspective on life. However, the righteous must persevere in doing God's will. Thus they have a responsibility to their children, because God will protect his descendants and will permit them to dwell in the land, whereas the offspring of the wicked will be cut off.

The ground for all the blessings is the love of God. He "loves [GK 170] the just" (Pr 2:8) and therefore will never forsake "his faithful ones" (i.e., "his saints"; GK 2921). The Lord loves the wise, who promote justice and are loving. They fear the Lord, revere God, and desire to do his will. The law is written on their heart. In harmony with their "heart" (GK 4213), they speak wisely and thus establish justice and do "not slip" by giving in to the evildoers or by envying them.

32–33 The ungodly cannot tolerate true piety. They can readily dismiss the hypocrite, the fake, and the enthusiast, but the living faith of the wise evokes furious reprisal. The wicked are pictured as thugs who lie in ambush to destroy the wise. The righteous, however, are not forsaken by the Lord. He will not suffer them to be tried unjustly by the unjust. Even when it seems that the wicked hold power and pervert justice, God promises to establish justice and to rid the earth of evil.

V. Exhortation to Hope in the Lord's Deliverance (37:34–40)

34–40 Facing evil in the world, the wise response of the godly comprises (1) hope in the Lord, (2) loyal obedience to him, and (3) faith in his justice. God exalts the righteous, gives them the land, gives them a future (or posterity), delivers them and protects them from troubles, and crowns them with victory ("salvation"). However, he brings down the wicked, even when it seems as if they would live forever. The godly will live to "see" that judgment of the wicked. The psalmist concludes the psalm by calling the godly to look to the Lord for protection, deliverance, and victory. Help is promised to those who "take refuge in him." He is their "stronghold."

Psalm 38: A Prayer for Reconciliation

In this individual lament the psalmist calls on the Lord for healing from a crippling disease. He is overwhelmed with guilt, abandonment, and a desire for renewed fellowship with God. Because of the themes of sin, guilt, judgment, and hope in God's salvation, Ps 38 has been used as a penitential psalm (cf. Pss 6; 32; 38; 51; 102; 130; 143).

I. Prayer for Reconciliation (38:1–4)

1–4 Not all disease results from individual sin. But the affliction of the psalmist is associated with "my guilt" / "my sin" and "your anger" / "your wrath" / "your wrath." The ferocity of the Lord's anger is so great that the psalmist feels himself to be the object of his attacks. It is as if he has been set up to be pierced by God's "arrows." The idiom "your hand has come down upon me" symbolizes the extent of alienation, resulting from a severe form of discipline. God's rebuke penetrates deep into the psalmist's being so as to bring him down. Suffering can be a form of God's discipline for the righteous.

The intensity of God's discipline has affected the psalmist's capacity to enjoy life. No part of his being has been left unaffected; there is no "soundness" (lit., "peace"; GK 8934) in his bones (i.e., his body; cf. 6:2). The psalmist does not question God's justice. Throughout the lament he recognizes his own sinfulness. He has come to the breaking point because the consequences of his sin and guilt have "overwhelmed" him like a flood. Therefore, he lifts himself up to the Lord with the prayer for relief, compassion, and reconciliation.

II. Pain of Anguish (38:5–12)

5–8 The experience of suffering is all around the psalmist. He sees and feels the pain of his wounds, his back aches, and he is "utterly crushed." The anguish results from his mental and spiritual pain as he reflects on the reason for his sufferings—his sin. He calls sin "folly" (GK 222) because it has found him out. Sin is sin; but when it is done conscientiously, it is "folly." All joy of life is far from the psalmist. He is bowed down and mourns. He despairs within himself; all he can do is "groan" within himself.

9–10 In the state of depression, one's thoughts are not coherent. "Longings" here signifies "sighing" of the heart. The psalmist looks up to God with the hope that he will understand the meaning of his groans. Thus even in his state of depression, the psalmist does not doubt his relationship with the covenant Lord but calls on the One who heard Israel's groaning (Ex. 2:25) to listen also to him. He desperately wants to do something about his situation. But he feels that he no longer has the proper perspective—"even the light has gone from my eyes."

11–12 The psalmist's personal sense of abandonment is aggravated by his being shunned. His friends are afraid of associating with a sick person or with a sinner. His enemies do not leave him at peace; they aggravate the situation by adding to his troubles and speaking lies.

III. Prayer for Vindication (38:13–16)

13–14 In his loneliness the psalmist feels himself isolated from the world like a deaf or mute person. He has no words or interest in defending his innocence. He is silently absorbed in his suffering, knowing that he has sinned; and he waits for God to initiate reconciliation.

15 In his total abandonment the psalmist cries out to God as his sole refuge. Because of his sin, guilt, and the consequences of sin, he has no argument against his foes. However, even in his darkest moments there is still the glimmer of light borne out of a living faith. He knows that God can answer, and he still addresses God as "Lord my God." The psalmist claims that the Ruler of the universe is his God.

16 The psalmist has no other hope left than waiting for the Lord. There is little time left. The foes are using every opportunity to remind him of their strength and power and of his weakness. Their self-exaltation increases at the cost of his life.

IV. Pain of Injustice (38:17–20)

17 The psalmist is concerned with the enemies who desire to glory over the death of one of the godly so that they may exalt themselves over God. And he is concerned with the promise of God that he would not permit the righteous to stumble (15:5; 37; 112:6). His "pain" in forms of physical suffering and anguish of mind is ever-present, inescapable.

18 The psalmist confesses his sins again (cf. vv.3–4). Troubled by guilt and the consequences of sin, he clings to the Lord for his assurance. But as long as he is suffering, there remains a lingering doubt about the efficacy of God's forgiveness, just as Christians who in their suffering from sin continue to plead with God for full pardon and restoration.

19–20 In his soul-searching experience, the psalmist has found himself to be innocent of wrongdoing against those who gloat over his adversities. Instead he has treated them well. Yet he is overwhelmed by the number and the enthusiasm of his opponents. It is possible that he is speaking hyperbolically or that in his distress a few troublers seem many.

V. Prayer for Reconciliation (38:21–22)

21–22 In conclusion the psalmist calls on the Lord as "LORD" (the covenant God), "my God" (equivalent to "my Father"), and "Lord my Savior" (Master of the universe, powerful and able to save). Since the Lord has promised to be near, he prays, "Do not forsake me." Since a child of God needs the presence of his heavenly Father, he prays, "Be not far from me, O my God." Since he submits himself to the sovereignty of God, he prays, "Come quickly to help me, / O Lord my Savior." Thus he commits his cause to this great God, his Father.

Psalm 39: A Stranger to Life and an Alien With God

In a moving way the author of this psalm draws us into the reality of life with its vexing problems and the unresolved quest for meaning. This psalm is in the form of an individual lament.

I. Silence Before the Lord (39:1–3)

1 In view of his internal and external circumstances, the sacred author has determined not to speak anymore. He has made a personal commitment to control himself. He intends to scrutinize his behavior, especially his speech, to see whether there is any unbecoming action. He has found it difficult to "muzzle" his mouth, but he has come to the point where it is necessary. The external circumstances that necessitate his determination are due to the ungodly.

2 The psalmist desires to speak forthrightly about his internal problems but fears that he may be misunderstood or that he may speak irreverently and give occasion to the enemy. For the sake of God, he vows to be silent in his suffering. He becomes intensely aware of his limitations; and in his self-awareness he is vexed with life.

3 In his silence the psalmist learns more about himself, especially how difficult it is to control himself. The metaphors "my heart grew hot" and "the fire burned" express anger. The more he reflects on his situation, the more he becomes exasperated. His whole being is aflame. He has to speak.

II. Prayer for Divine Illumination (39:4–6)

4 Unable to resolve his problem, the psalmist turns to the Lord for instruction. The purpose of knowing life's end is not that he may plan for every day of his life. In the greater awareness of the brevity of life, he hopes that the Lord will guide him in an understanding and acceptance of this brevity.

5–6 The psalmist compares his life to a "handbreadth" (about four inches). In his heart he feels that life is like a mile, but in reality it is a brief span of time. Even when a person seems strong and self-assured, from God's perspective he or she is little more than a "breath." Human existence and future are filled with uncertainties; a person is "a mere phantom." People may go about busily and gain status and wealth, but they are mortal and cannot control affairs after death.

III. Prayer for Deliverance (39:7–8)

7–8 The psalmist concludes that nothing in life is important or reliable unless one's hope is secured in God. In searching for the meaning of human life, he has come to a renewed commitment to God. He is also more aware of his own shortcomings in the presence of God. More than ever, he realizes his need for God's forgiveness, reconciliation, and healing. His hope is in the Lord, for whose deliverance he waits anxiously. When the Lord vindicates his servant, the foolish scoffers will have no more occasion to rejoice.

IV. Silence Before the Lord (39:9)

9 When he was silent (v.2), the psalmist was deeply disturbed and feared that he might say something disrespectful about or to his God. Now he realizes that his condition is the Lord's will. Thus he willingly accepts it from God's hand. He does not understand everything; but at least he knows that a personal God is in charge of his life,not an impersonal force.

V. Prayer for Divine Sustenance (39:10–11)

10–11 The psalmist is vexed by the discipline of the Lord in his life. Human frailty and God's discipline hedge him in. For the child of God, disappointments, adversity, and fatherly discipline are reminders of God's father's concern. While the discipline is like a "scourge," yet the psalmist learns through anguish the meaning and brevity of life. Human beings are not divine.

VI. Prayer for Deliverance (39:12–13)

12–13 In submission to God's will and in recognition of his humanity, the psalmist returns to the Lord with a renewed spirit, addressing him as "the LORD," the covenant God. Even though he feels himself a stranger in God's presence (as his fathers were), is a sinner, and suffers adversities, he has no doubts about belonging to God's community. He prays for the Lord to remove his judgment and to again renew his joy, so that he may have a foretaste of the Lord's covenant presence.

Psalm 40: The Joyful Experience and Expectation of Salvation

This psalm is composed of two themes: thanksgiving of the individual (vv.1–10), followed by an individual lament (vv.11–17). It may be a prayer based on God's past acts of deliverance, i.e., a royal prayer.

I. Personal Experience of Salvation (40:1–3)

1–2 The experience of salvation is the story of what God has done. The psalmist recounts what happens when one waits "patiently" for the Lord (cf. Ps 27). The allusions to death and dying in the words "slimy pit," "mud," and "mire" suggest that David was seriously sick, even to death. Healing was then a salvation from the netherworld (cf. 69:2, 14), out of which the Lord "lifted" him. But the metaphors may also express the threat to Israel's national existence by an enemy attack. The king personified the severity of the crisis by the imagery of his own suffering and the Lord's deliverance.

3 In proper response to God's help, David renewed his praise to him. The newness of the song lies in the event of salvation history. The recent victory was one additional chapter in a long series of God's involvements with his people, inspiring the people of God with the renewed sense of awe for their covenant God.

II. Blessedness of God's Protection (40:4–5)

4–5 David speaks of the blessedness of those who put their confidence in the covenant God, whose acts of protection are innumerable. Indirectly he exhorts people not to depend on human strength or idolatry. The mighty acts of the Lord are "wonders" (GK 7098), i.e., acts of supernatural and providential deliverance that are too numerous to recount (cf. 104:24; 106:2; 139:17–18; John 21:25); they are the manifestations of "the things you planned for us." The history of redemption shows an inner cohesiveness and movement, unfolding the "thoughts" of the Lord that will ultimately result in the restoration of heaven and earth.

III. Expression of Commitment (40:6–8)

6–8 David is aware that the Lord is not pleased with mere sacrifice (cf. 1Sa 15:22–23). He is opposed to mere formalism and declares his personal commitment to the Lord in the form of "open ears." He has heard the law of God—especially the requirements of kingship. Thus David, the Lord's anointed, presents himself as a dedicatory offering to the Lord. Commitment is a wholehearted desire to conform one's way of life to the will of God, as prescribed in the Word of God.

IV. Proclaiming God's Perfections (40:9–10)

9–10 David proclaims the good news of the Lord's perfections to the congregation assembled for worship. He must speak by an inner compulsion; he cannot be quiet. He explains that his commitment is correlative to the perfections of the Lord's rule: "righteousness . . . faithfulness . . . salvation . . . love . . . truth." The Lord's righteousness is expressed in any act ordered on behalf of his people's welfare and the execution of his kingdom purposes. The nature of God's righteous acts is that he is faithful to his covenant people, resulting in their salvation. That faithfulness is a corollary to his unfailing love and truth, i.e., fidelity.

V. Prayer for God's Perfections (40:11)

11 The psalmist then prays that the Lord will continue to bestow his covenant "love" (GK 2876) and fidelity or "truth" (GK 622) on his anointed servant and through him on the nation. Because of the great need (cf. v.12), he also implores God to have compassion or "mercy" (GK 8166, 8177) on him.

VI. Confession of Sin (40:12)

12 The king is troubled by the adversities caused by his enemies (cf. vv.14–15). Though he speaks of "my sins," as a theocratic leader he takes on himself the sin of the nation and pleads with the Lord to have compassion on nation. The consequences of sin had a paralyzing effect on him and his ability to rule God's people. So great was the affliction that he felt overwhelmed like a flood (cf. 2Sa 22:5; Jnh 2:5).

VII. Prayer for God's Protection (40:13–16)

13–15 David prays that the Lord will "quickly" help him out of the crisis. He affirms that it must be God's will and his act of deliverance. He also prays that those who rejoiced in his and the nation's misery may be proven wrong in their assumption that the Lord lacked power to redeem his people. He prays for his enemies' fall and shame in accordance with the principles of justice and with the promise of God to curse those who cursed his own (Ge 12:3). The enemies liked taking potshots at God's people, shouting contemptibly, "Aha! Aha!" David prays that the Lord will change their fortunes so that they will know who is God.

16 When the Lord demonstrates anew his righteous act of deliverance, God's people will rejoice in his salvation. They are characterized by their "seeking" the Lord and "those who love your salvation." David prays here, not for himself, but for his people who have joined him in waiting for the salvation of the Lord.

VIII. Personal Need of Salvation (40:17)

17 The psalmist concludes on a note of urgency. The last three words express the need: "do not delay." He is in desperate need and humbly casts himself and his people before the Lord. The Lord remains "my help and my deliverer" and "my God" even in crises. It is on this ground that David prays for speedy deliverance.

Psalm 41: God's Blessings in Adversity

This psalm has elements in common with an individual lament (vv.4–10). Yet the introductory (vv.1–3) and concluding (vv.11–12) verses set the mood of thanksgiving for the psalm in such a way that it is best treated as a thanksgiving of the individual.

I. Affirmation of God's Blessings (41:1–3)

1–3 The phrase "blessed is" begins (see comment on 1:1) and closes the first book of Psalms. God's children are blessed as they receive grace upon grace! But his blessings are not automatic. He looks for those who wisely conform to his heavenly kingdom on earth, who are concerned for those in need (cf. Mt 5:7; Jas 1:27). The Lord has promised to protect his people from harm and bless them with a long life of good health, prosperity in their promised land, and sustenance in time of need (cf. Ge 12:2–3; Ps 72; 2Co 1:20).

II. Prayer for Healing (41:4)

4 The psalmist's prayer for healing and restoration is based on God's promises. The emphatic use of "I" is for the purpose of contrasting the words of his prayer with the words of the foes (v.5). There is no note of despair. He is not depressed by the weight of his sin; he confesses his unwitting sins and asks for the Lord's mercy.

III. The Words of the Enemies (41:5–9)

5–6 The psalmist laments over the reaction to his sickness from his enemies. Their words were filled with hatred and were void of sympathy. They slandered, hoping that evil would triumph and the righteous and their seed would perish from the earth. They remain filled with deception, hypocrisy, and selfishness.

7–9 Even on his sickbed the psalmist imagines hearing the whisperings of his adversaries. They describe his sickness as "a vile disease." "Vile" (GK 1175) is a translation of "Belial" and can also be rendered as "a sickness from the devil." While the psalmist thinks of himself as innocent of known transgression (vv.11–12), his adversaries hope he will die! They think that his sins have found him out and that he is accursed. The rumors become so malicious that his "close friend," whom he regards as a member of the family, turns against him. The idiom "has lifted up his heel against me" signifies a treacherous act (cf. Ge 3:15; Ps 55:12–14). Thus both friend and adversary malign his name, believing that his death is justified (cf. Jn 13:18).

IV. Prayer for Healing (41:10)

10 The prayers of vv.4 and 10 frame the lies of the enemies. The psalmist cannot respond to their accusations but wholeheartedly trusts in the Lord and in his promise to protect him against his enemies. He prays that the Lord will be gracious to him and restore him and that he will "repay them." This prayer is not vindictive but shows a concern with the honor and justice of God, who has promised to sustain the godly in sickness and in health.

V. Confidence in God's Blessings (41:11–12)

11–12 Even in his adversity the psalmist is confident that the Lord will be true to his promises. Within his heart he knows himself to be a man of "integrity." He also claims the promise that the Lord supports those who love him—especially in their adversities. He longs for the moment when the Lord will deal kindly with him in the presence of his enemies and that he will enjoy God's presence and the experience of his blessings forevermore (cf. 23:5–6).

Concluding Doxology to Book I (41:13)

13 The Lord is "blessed" (GK 1385; translated here as "praise be to") in the sense that he is praiseworthy. The Lord, the God of Israel, has covenanted to be their God and the God of their children. Since he is blessed forever, God's people have assurance that he will continue in his care. To this Israel responds with a twofold "amen."

Book II: Psalms 42–72

Psalms 42–43: Hoping in the Lord's Salvation

The literary unity of Pss 42 and 43 is such that they should be treated as one psalm because of (1) the absence of a superscription above Ps 43; (2) the repetition of a refrain (42:5, 11; 43:5); (3) development of thought from remembrance (42:4, 6) to a specific hope of restoration (43:3); and (4) the lament form. Each psalm is an individual lament. Even though the life-situation remains controversial, it is evident that the psalmist was isolated from the temple worship. He may have been a refugee, but it is more likely that he had been exiled to Aram, Assyria, or Babylon and was in the hands of taunting captors (vv.3, 10).

I. Lament (42:1–4)

1–3 The simile of the "deer" expresses the intense yearning of the psalmist for a taste of God's presence. As usual "soul" (GK 5883) does not denote the spiritual aspect of a person exclusively. The psalmist's longing is for "God," then "the living God," and finally "the face of God" (NIV, "meet with God"). He wants to "meet with God" in the temple on Mount Zion. He is hemmed in by his own question, by his longing for God's presence, and by his enemies who tauntingly ask, "Where is your God?" Down deep in his heart he asked the same question, "Where is my God?" The depth of his sorrow is expressed by "tears" as his "food." Not knowing where else to turn, he looks to God for the answer to his despairing feeling.

4 In adverse conditions the psalmist cannot do much more than to "remember" (GK 2349). He meditates on the pilgrimages to the temple, the festive celebrations, and God's triumphs in the history of salvation. During the three annual pilgrimage festivals (Passover, Firstfruits, and Tabernacles; cf. Lev 23:4–44; Dt 16:1–17; et al.), the pilgrims gathered in Jerusalem and presented their offerings and sacrifices with great rejoicing. The pouring out of the soul is an expression of the intensity of one's emotions.

II. Hope (42:5–6a)

5–6a The psalmist analyzes his feelings and asks questions of himself, expressing both despair and hope in God. In his alienation, faith is tried and triumphs! Faith and doubt are twins; and when doubt seems to triumph, true faith calms its questions. Hope leads the psalmist away from despair. His hope is focused on the glorious acts of salvation and victory. He anticipates the fulfillment of God's promises, even when help is far off.

III. Lament (42:6b–7)

6b–7 In spite of the psalmist's expression of hope, he is still "downcast." Therefore he returns in his memories to the Promised Land, symbolized by "the land of the Jordan, the heights of Hermon," and the water imagery with which the psalm began. But this time the memories of water are overshadowed by a deep sense of despair. The waterfalls with its rocks, breakers, waves, and awesome noise metaphorically portray his condition. Instead of enjoying the "living water" of the "living God," he is continually faced with an expression of God's judgment.

IV. Hope (42:8)

8 By day and night the psalmist experiences the evidences of God's care, protection, and blessing. The very experience of communion made the Lord as "real" to him as "the God of my life." In contrast to the past, his "love" (GK 2876) seems to be lost; and the psalmist's praise of God's love has changed into continual mourning for God's absence (cf. v.3).

V. Lament (42:9–10)

9–10 In his moments of doubt and reflection on God's absence, the psalmist remembers that his God is "my Rock." He is the place of refuge. He asks twice "why" God has forgotten him. In the present situation, he has no other recourse than to mourn because he has been abandoned to godless people, who taunt him continually. He is like a dying man, and his God is silent. His whole being ("my bones") is distressed.

VI. Hope (42:11)

11 These reflections bring the psalmist again to a point of despair, self-examination, and an affirmation of hope in the future saving acts of God (see comments on v.5).

VII. Lament (43:1–4)

1–2 The psalmist now intensifies his prayer for redemption and for the enjoyment of fellowship with the Lord. He has demonstrated his love (42:8) in the past, but the psalmist is not satisfied until he is fully restored to his God. In his distress he calls the Lord "God my stronghold." Not only is he the Rock of refuge (v.9), but also he is the Deliverer of his people in need. This God is powerful to "vindicate" him. The psalmist has gone around as in "mourning" because of the absence of God and the antagonism of the ungodly. The questions are similar to those of 42:9.

3–4 In the darkness of the adversities, the psalmist asks God for his "light" and "truth." The "light" (GK 240) of God is the experience of the fullness of his redemption (36:9). The "truth" (GK 622) of God is the expression of his covenantal fidelity (40:10; 57:3). If only God will send these two personified expressions of his love to "guide" him back, then he will experience restoration. The psalmist's concern is for a return to Jerusalem, "your holy mountain," God's dwelling. The anticipation to return to "the altar of God" and the temple relates back to the pilgrimage festivals (42:4). Redemption will result in great joy. The God who is "my stronghold" becomes "God, my joy and my delight."

VIII. Hope (43:5)

5 The refrain returns to the conflict between faith and doubt, to the contrast between the present and the future, and to the hope that "I will yet praise him" (see comments on 42:5).

Psalm 44: Redeem Us Because of Your Unfailing Love

The mood of the two previous psalms also dominates Ps 44. These three are examples of the lament genre and reflect a period of God's rejection of his people (42:9; 43:2; 44:9, 24). They also express the hardship experienced by the reproach of the nations (42:3, 10; 43:2; 44:13–16). Psalm 44 is a national lament reflecting defeat in battle.

I. God's Past Acts of Deliverance (44:1–3)

1–3 God's people had heard the story of what he had done for their ancestors "in days long ago," including the era of the Conquest. Against all odds Israel inherited the land, because God fought on their behalf. Israel's victories were not their own. Though they used their swords and were valiant in battle, they realized that the fulfillment of the land-promise was God's. He had "planted" them and had let them "flourish" like the branches of a tree. They were the recipients of his favor—"the light of [his] face," by which they had been victorious in the past.

II. Confidence in God (44:4–8)

4–8 This section begins with an emphatic confession of God as the Great "King" and also the Commander of Israel's "victories." Only when the Israelites had put aside their confidence in weaponry and bravery could they become instruments in God's hands. They had cause to "boast" in the "name" of the Lord, when they had fought in his "name." Each participant in this prayer confesses his personal reliance on the Lord in v.6.

III. Suffering and Disgrace (44:9–16)

9–16 These reflections on the traditions of God's past victories and on the national and personal confidence in God's triumphant kingship are shattered by the reality of the present. From the evidence presented in the charges, seemingly the Lord had "rejected" and humiliated his people. They have been allowed to be conquered, plundered, scattered like sheep, and enslaved by their enemies. Consequently the name of Israel has been disgraced among the nations. At the heart of the charges is the feeling that the Lord cares little for his people. Why else did he sell them out so easily and cheaply to the enemy? The consternation of the people is an expression of their concern with the present reality. Faith in God, the Divine Warrior-King, was being tested in the current crisis.

To this situation each godly person joins in a personal expression of agony. The disgrace of the nation affects each citizen; each one speaks of "my disgrace." The sounds of the "taunts" of enemies and neighboring nations are heard "all day long."

IV. Claim of Innocence (44:17–22)

17–22 In spite of all their suffering, the hearts of the people are right with God. They cling close to him with a strong determination to remain faithful by keeping his covenant, by remaining completely devoted to his way, and by not giving themselves over to idolatry. Yet God continues to permit devastation and darkness to oppress them. The adversities are likened to a place made desolate by war, i.e., "a haunt for jackals." "Deep darkness" is a metaphor for adversities, often resulting in despair.

The people's suffering is not because of their sins. Rather, they suffer "vicariously" like "sheep to be slaughtered." In their fidelity to the Lord, they receive greater abuse than if they had conformed to the pagan world. In suffering for the honor of God, they need reassurance of his love (cf. Ro 8:36–39).

V. Prayer for Deliverance (44:23–26)

23 The questions of faith express the conviction that a chasm exists between the promises of God and reality. Out of their deeply felt need, the people of God ask, "Why do you sleep?" Not that they believe God is asleep, but because they seek his immediate attention to their plight, they plead with him to "awake" (GK 6424).

24–26 The present adversity has created a darkness, because "the light" of God's face, which their forefathers had experienced (v.3), is hidden. In dependency on God's favor, they prostrate themselves to the ground. They do not have the power to rise up, but in prayer they implore God to rise up on behalf of them. Redemption pertains to the welfare of God's people in body and soul, who petition him to look again at their low estate. In conclusion they submit themselves to the love of God. He covenanted himself to the people and promises them his "unfailing love" [GK 2876].

Psalm 45: The Wedding of a Son of David

The psalm is a royal psalm and functioned as a wedding song at the occasion of the wedding of a royal couple. Because of the theological significance of the wedding and the function of the Davidic king within God's order, the wedding song in a special way applies to our Lord, who rules as the Son of David (cf. Heb 1:8). This psalm extols the privileged position of God's people and sets forth God's expectations of the king, his appointed vassal on earth (cf. Pss 2; 110).

I. Introduction (45:1)

1 Having been moved by "a noble theme," the sacred composer adds his own word of tribute to the king. It may be that he has received a word from the Lord and writes or recites the psalm to bless the royal couple. As an artist in his own right, he speaks the words of a "skillful writer."

II. The Royal Groom (45:2–9)

A. Address to the King (45:2–5)

2 The description of the Davidic king is idealized, as the poet projects a conception based on theocratic expectations. He is the one blessed by the Lord because of the promise given to David (2Sa 7:11–16). The king's "excellence" (GK 3636) lies in God's presence with him. It is God's divine blessing manifested in his speech, his royal valor, his concern for establishing God's kingdom on earth, and the continuity of his dynasty. The king's speech is wise, as his words are "anointed with grace."

3–5 The poet wishes the king success in his military pursuits. When he goes out with sword on his side, he confidently leads his troops to victory. The "splendor and majesty" speak of his past victories and the confident expectation of additional victories every time he marches at the head of his troops. He does not rest until his enemies recognize his authority. The success of the king is due to his concern for what is important to the Lord and his covenant people—"truth, humility and righteousness." His concern for "truth" keeps him loyal to God and to his people. His concern for "humility" keeps him continually dependent on his covenant. His concern for "righteousness" is demonstrated in his ordering the affairs of state to correspond with God's plans. The kingdom of the son of David is an expression of the kingdom of God on earth.

B. The Glory of the Bridegroom (45:6–9)

6–7 The throne of David is assured by covenant. Each king on that throne is reminded that he is king by "divine right." The "scepter of justice" is a royal symbol of his authority to establish a rule of integrity based on the laws of God. In his deep love for "righteousness," he opposes all forms of "wickedness." God's rule will be established on earth. Our Lord as the descendant of David inherited the royal throne (cf. Heb 1:8–9). As the "Son" of God, his kingdom is everlasting.

8–9 The inspired poet turns his attention to the preparations for the wedding ceremony. The descriptions and references to the robes, spices, music, the royal daughters, and the royal bride all reinforce the rightness of the moment and of the anointing of this son of David. The evident blessing of God on the king assures the continuity of the dynasty (cf. 2Sa 7:16).

III. The Royal Bride (45:10–15)

A. Address to the Bride (45:10–12)

10 The bride is seated to the right of the king and is adorned with the valuable gold of Ophir, a proverbially fine gold. The queen is of foreign descent, having left her father's house (cf. Ge 12:1). The psalmist encourages her to be loyal to the people of God by forgetting her own loyalty to her native land. He also encourages her to submit herself fully to her husband, the king, to show that she belongs to the people of God (cf. Ru 1:16).

11 The king is God's anointed representative. Submission to him implies submission to the God of Israel. So while the king delights in the physical beauty of his wife, she respects him as her "lord" (GK 123). It would be wrong for her to compare him to the kings of the nations with their powers of state, cultural refinements, and idolatrous ways.

12 The people of Tyre are personified as "the Daughter of Tyre." They, as well as other rich nations, will bring tribute to Jerusalem. During Solomon's regime precious gifts were brought to Jerusalem because of his international reputation. The prophets envision the era of restoration as a time when the nations will bring gifts to signify the special position God's people have among the nations (Isa 60; Zec 14:14; cf. also Rev 21:24, 26). So the young bride is comforted with words that bring out the advantages and the honor of being a member of God's people, especially of the royal household.

B. The Glory of the Bride (45:13–15)

13–15 The scene suddenly shifts from the throne room to the beautiful bride as she prepares herself for the wedding and enters the royal palace with her maids of honor. She is adorned in a magnificent gown made of gold-embroidered fabric. She and her wedding party are carried into the palace as if on floats of "joy and gladness."

IV. Conclusion (45:16–17)

16–17 The poet moves from the queen to the king as the most prominent member of the wedding party (vv.2–9). The bride is most blessed by marrying into a family blessed by God's promise of continuity of leadership. If the king will fulfill God's expectations, then the Lord himself will "perpetuate" the memory of the king for generations. Moreover, the nations will sing his praise as an expression of their continued respect (cf. 1Co 15:24–26; Heb 10:12–13).

Psalm 46: The God of Jacob Is Our Fortress

This psalm has been popularized by Martin Luther's rendition in "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God." As a song of Zion (cf. 48; 76; 84; 87; 122), it celebrates the presence of God. The combination of the hymnic and the oracular genres has made it virtually impossible to identify the original life situation. The change from a hymn to a prophetic oracle (vv.8–10) suggests that the original psalm of confidence was transformed into an eschatological psalm.

I. Confession (46:1, 7, 11)

1, 7, 11 The threefold confessional statement presents Israel's great God in a personal way. They call him "God," "the LORD Almighty," and "the God of Jacob." The Lord is the Great King over the world, but he is particularly and fondly confessed as "the God of Jacob" because he has covenanted himself to be the God of Israel. God's people need not fear his presence, because the "for us" and "with us" assure them of the meaning of his covenant name, Yahweh ("LORD"; cf. Ex 3:13–17). He is Immanuel, "God with us."

This great God is "ever-present" with his people. He is the source and effectiveness of Israel's "strength." He is like a "refuge" (GK 4726) where one finds rest and asylum (cf. 14:6; 61:3; 91:2, 9). He is like a "fortress" (GK 5369) in an isolated, elevated place (cf. Isa 33:16), where people built a stronghold against the enemy. When the people are in distress, they need his special protection. Then he is close to them.

II. Theophany (46:2–6)

2–3 Israel's confession is that they will not fear even when God's coming in judgment is preceded by radical cosmic phenomena: earthquakes and floods. The world catastrophes are the "woes" of the Day of the Lord heralding the messianic age. Nations and kingdoms may cause great consternation and create havoc on earth (v.6), but they will fall quickly when the Lord speaks his word of judgment (cf. Rev 11:18).

4–6 Surrounded by a world aflame, the people of God are "the city of God." They need not fear but have reason to be glad because God, the "Most High," has identified himself with them and now dwells with them. They will always be assured of his readiness to help them. The "river" is a metaphor of blessing and restoration. The help of God "at break of dawn" suggests that in the darkness of distress the people of God know that the Lord will not let them suffer unduly long. His acts of unfailing love are renewed each morning (La 3:22–23).

III. Prophetic Oracle (46:8–10)

8–9 In this oracle, the psalmist first exhorts the godly to be wise and discerning by considering the works of God. The recitation of the mighty acts of God plants deep in the memory of his people the evidences of his care, protection, and providential rule. Those who are wise enough to remember and look at the world around them have tokens of God's faithfulness toward his people. They know that the Lord's plan for humankind includes the cessation of wars and the era of peace. Since God's people have reason to be glad in distress because of God's presence (vv.4–6), how much greater will be their joy when the causes of distress are no more!

10 The psalmist then encourages the godly to "be still" (GK 8332) and to "know" (GK 3359) that the Lord is God. Though it was tempting to ally themselves with foreign powers, to rely on military strength, or to give themselves over to idolatry and pagan ways, the godly must learn to persevere to the end. The "knowledge" of God includes a factual knowledge about him, his past acts, and his promises. The life of faith is lived in commitment to God's sovereignty, rule, and ultimate exaltation over all the nations.

Psalm 47: The Lord Is the Victorious King

This psalm celebrates the kingship of God (cf. Pss 93–100). Within the present context it provides a connection with the two hymns of Zion (Pss 46; 48), as it adumbrates the victorious rule of the Lord over all the earth. Its genre conforms to the psalms celebrating the Lord's kingship. It also has a prophetic, eschatological dimension as the psalmist longs for the full establishment of God's rule on earth.

I. Praise of the Lord's Mighty Acts (47:1–2)

1 In anticipation of God's kingship, the nations must joyfully acclaim the Lord as the Great King by clapping their hands. The heavenly beings already sing praises to him (cf. 29:1). The kingdom of God will only be established when the "nations" on earth join with the heavenly choirs, celebrating his universal and everlasting kingship. While clapping the people "shout" joyously a victory cheer.

2 The people are struck with awe on account of the mighty works of the Great King. Here the emphasis is on God, who is "the LORD Most High, the great King over all the earth." Kings in the ancient Near East loved to designate themselves by this title since with it were associated superiority, suzerainty, and the power to grant vassal treaties. Any king assuming this title could not tolerate competition. So it is with the Lord. He alone is the Great King over all the earth!

II. The Lord's Mighty Acts (47:3–4)

3–4 The psalmist reflects on the Lord's mighty acts in salvation history. He has subdued the nations (cf. 135:8–11; 136:10–20) and given their land to his people as an "inheritance" (GK 5709; cf. 28:9; 105:11; 135:12; 136:21–22) because of his deep love for them. The term "the pride of Jacob" denotes here the reasons for Israel's joy in the Lord.

III. The Lord's Victorious Kingship (47:5–6)

5–6 The Lord is victorious! He has "ascended" to his heavenly palace with "shouts of joy" and "the sounding of trumpets." His victory march is acknowledged by his subjects on earth. They could rebel because of the return of the Great King to his heavenly abode. But instead they are encouraged to continue doing homage to him by singing his praises. The psalmist stresses the urgency of responding to the Lord's heavenly reception with earthy songs of praise.

IV. The Lord Is King (47:7–8)

7–8 The psalm returns to the reflection of God's kingship on earth. His ascension into his heavenly palace and his rule over earth emphasize his universal dominion. The Lord is King over "the nations"; they too must acclaim his sovereignty and discern that he is different from all other gods, as he is "seated on his holy throne." Although his throne is in heaven (103:19; Isa 66:1), his footstool extends to earth (99:5; 132:7). Since he is "holy," those who approach him consecrate themselves (cf. Rev 4:9–10; 5:1, 7, 13; 6:16; 7:10, 15; 19:4).

V. Universal Acknowledgment of the Lord's Kingship (47:9)

9 At this point the prophetic, eschatological element distinguishes itself. The psalmist prays that all the "nobles" and "kings" of the earth may acknowledge the Lord's kingship. They are accounted as one with "the people of the God of Abraham." That is, the Gentiles join together with Israel in the worship of God (cf. Ge 12:3; Jn 12:32; Ro 4:11; Gal 3:7–9). The psalmist further explains that all nations are the subjects of God's rule, whether they recognize it or not. God is "exalted"; truly he is "the LORD Most High."

Psalm 48: The Beautiful City of God

In Ps 47 the Lord receives praise as "the great King." In Ps 48 the greatness of God is shared with his people, who are likened to "the city of God." Whereas Ps 46 could be categorized as either a song of Zion or a psalm of confidence, Ps 48 is more clearly a song of Zion. The stress is on proclamation of the good news of God's presence that results in the joy of God's people.

I. Our God Is the Great King (48:1–3)

1–3 The hymn begins with an ascription of praise to God because of his accommodation to humankind. God is the Lord ("the LORD") of his covenant people and the Great King of the universe. He is sovereign, powerful, and glorious; and he alone is worthy of human praise. However, God's people, who are citizens of "the city of our God," have additional reasons for praising him: his presence, protection, love, and righteousness.

The Great King has chosen to reside among his own people in "the city" on "the holy mountain"—a reference to Jerusalem and Mount Zion. Only because God condescends to dwell there may she be called "beautiful" in her elevation and "the joy of the whole earth." The beauty and joy are not inherent in Mount Zion, because it is surrounded by higher mountains offering a better panoramic view. The godly looked on the city, mountain, and temple as symbols of God's presence with his people.

II. The Perfections of Our God (48:4–11)

4–7 The description of the hostile forces is reminiscent of Ps 2. The kings of the nations have united together in their warfare against God. Their united effort gave them confidence. The description of God's response inspires his people. The bold, confident, and strong opposition was broken miraculously. It is likened to the destruction of the "ships of Tarshish" that were the pride and glory of seafaring nations such as Phoenicia. Although strong and majestic, a strong wind could easily toss them about on the open sea and destroy the vessels, people, and cargo!

The ease with which the Lord destroys the opposition terrifies the nations. They were overcome with fear, and their strength melted away (cf. Ex 15:14; Jos 2:11). It was as if they had seen a theophany (cf. 46:2–3). Their anguish is likened to a woman in labor. Great is the power of our God.

8–11 When God shows himself to be the fortress of the godly, they "see" what he has done and are even more convinced that God makes his city "secure forever." The mighty acts of God evidence the presence of "the LORD Almighty," the Ruler of heaven and earth. The identification with the history of redemption is expressed by the verbs "hearing" and "seeing." God's people have witnessed his presence in ordering the events of the world and in working out the redemption of his people.

In response, the godly "meditate" on God's mighty acts and reflect on the long history of God's involvement with Israel and of the evidences of his "unfailing love." Their reaction of "praise" is a positive response in contrast to the dread that fell on the nations. They declare God's "righteousness" (GK 7406), the benefits of his victorious and glorious rule in which they share. The "right hand," of God includes power, justice, righteousness, and love. The people also "rejoice" in his "judgments," the ways he establishes his kingdom by bringing defeat to the opposing forces.

III. The Great King Is Our Shepherd (48:12–14)

12–13 The psalm concludes with an invitation to walk around in Jerusalem and to observe her defense system: "her towers," "her ramparts," and "her citadels." It is possible that the pilgrims made a procession around Jerusalem as part of a sacred rite. The kings of Judah received their significance on two counts: their loyalty to the Lord and their concern with the security of Jerusalem and Judah. Because the temple was in Jerusalem, the defense of Jerusalem was an expression of loyalty to the Lord.

14 Those who had seen the defense system of Jerusalem had a picture of a greater truth: the protection of God. They could tell their children and grandchildren about the beauty, strength, and history of Jerusalem, reminding them that the Lord is "our God for ever" and that he, like a good shepherd, will continue to "guide" (or "protect"; GK 5627) his own "to the end."

Psalm 49: The Folly of Riches Without Wisdom

The problem of the prosperity of the wicked is difficult, but the psalmist gives us a ray of light on resolving this problem in this wisdom psalm.

The image of the citadel (cf. 48:13) was a familiar one in Bible times, and it still is today. This fortress is that of Montfort, built in medieval times.

I. Introduction (49:1–4)

1–2 The introduction reflects the combination of two traditions: the tradition of the prophets (cf. Mic 1:2) and the tradition of wisdom (cf. Pr 1:8). The psalmist invites everybody from all nations in the "world" to listen to his lesson in godly wisdom. The voice of wisdom goes out to all people: "low" (people without a sizable estate) and "high" (people with a substantial estate); that is, "rich and poor alike."

3–4 The psalmist draws the interest of his hearers, impressing on them the importance of the discussion by using four words for wisdom: "wisdom" (GK 2684), "understanding" (GK 9312), "proverb" (GK 5442), and "riddle" (GK 2648; cf. Pr 1:1–6). The first two words are plural and may be used to intensify the ideas: "great wisdom" and "great understanding." The second pair of words may express the means by which wisdom is to be communicated: by "proverb," i.e., more particularly by a reflection on the "riddle" of life and death, accompanied by the music of a "harp."

II. Question (49:5–6)

5–6 The inspired teacher of wisdom begins his lesson on wisdom by asking a relevant question. Why should one not fear old age and the uncertainty of the future? People try to cushion themselves by heaping up wealth with the hope that this will continually provide an income and keep them from harm and abandonment. But the response to fear is not found in the fleeting sense of well-being that wealth may provide. Those who put their confidence in wealth are all too often those who trouble and deceive the poor, aged, and lonely. There is a certain sense of assurance here, as if he is saying, Do not be afraid of those who take advantage of adversities for selfish gains!

III. The Certainty of Death (49:7–12)

7–9 Because "death" is the common experience of humankind, the rich cannot boast of any advantages over the poor. They cannot use their money to redeem themselves from death or to send a substitute for themselves. They may live on a grandiose scale so as to give the impression that they will live forever; but they too must ultimately face death for what it is: a separation from the land of the living, from the comforts of life, and from social and economic distinctions.

10–11 A careful study of life confirms his conclusion that death is a leveler. All people die, whether wise or foolish. The "foolish and the senseless" have hoarded up wealth for themselves. Those who have made any attempt to perpetuate their own memory by naming property after themselves may only be remembered by the names engraved on their tombs. Their end is in death, and they are forever cast out from their wealth and real properties.

12 The inevitable conclusion is presented in the form of a "proverb." Human beings cannot use wealth to their advantage in death. One end overtakes all people and animals alike, namely, "death" (cf. Ecc 3:19). The very nature of "life" is that it has a built-in obsolescence.

IV. The Folly of Riches (49:13–14)

13 The Bible is not against riches as such but the attitude of self-sufficiency and self-confidence so often associated with riches. The rich come under condemnation for their insensitivity, scheming, deception, and attitude that they rule the world (cf. Jas 5:1–6). Those who agree with their words, often benefiting from their power and prestige, will also die.

14 Death is personified as a shepherd who leads the rich as sheep to the slaughter. Those who have cared for themselves in life will waste away in death. But the righteous will be victorious. When their night of darkness is over, there will be "morning," and their lot will be changed.

V. Resolution of the Question (49:15–20)

15 The confidence of hope breaks through with the affirmation of the resurrection and of fellowship with God. The Lord will intervene on behalf of the godly and redeem them from the clutches of "death." No money can buy these privileges (v.7).

16–19 The triumph of faith gives no ground to fear what is transitory. Riches, splendor, or praise of self makes no difference in the grave. The tragedy of riches is that they give a false sense of security. Yet the godless rich will die like animals without the hope of the dawning light. Death is described as a place of absolute darkness, where not a single ray of light (hope) penetrates—ever (cf. 88:11–12).

20 The purpose of the psalm was to instruct everyone, including the rich, in the path of wisdom. The psalmist did not intend to disparage the godly rich who received their wealth as a blessing from God. The difference between human and animals lies in the degree of "understanding." If one has no understanding of himself as a human being, of his mortality, and of his God, he lives and dies "like the beasts that perish."

Psalm 50: A Heart of Gratitude

This psalm is concerned with true loyalty to God. Loyalty is antithetical to formalism and hypocrisy, as the Lord requires a heart of gratitude. The psalm encompasses features of theophany, accusation, warning, and an invitation to repent. The references to the covenant and to the laws suggest a setting around the Feast of Tabernacles.

I. The Righteous Judgment of God (50:1–6)

1 None other than God himself summons the inhabitants of the earth to prepare themselves for the great judgment to come. The great Creator-Redeemer-Covenant God has made a covenant with creation (Ge 9:8–17; cf. Hos 2:18) and with the nation Israel. His rule extends far beyond Israel to the whole earth, poetically described as "from the rising of the sun to the place where it sets."

2 God's relationship with his people, however, is special to him, as expressed in the portrayal of Zion: "perfect in beauty." The God who at one time revealed himself at Mount Sinai "shines forth" from Jerusalem, where he had made his name dwell. The light of God's presence was evident in the glory-cloud in the desert (Ex 13:21–22; Nu 9:15–23); the same God repeatedly showed Israel the light of his presence (cf. 4:6; 18:28; 27:1; 36:9; 43:3).

3–4 This great Ruler of the universe appears, attended by phenomena designed to inspire "fear" in people. He is like "a consuming fire" (cf. Heb 12:29) and an angry "tempest" when he comes in judgment. His message is not consoling to Israel, because he summons "the heaven above and the earth" as witnesses against his own people. In their presence, the Lord commands all his covenant people to be gathered for judgment.

5–6 The covenant people were consecrated by covenant (Ex 19:5–6; 24:5–8) and sealed by "the blood of the covenant" (24:8). The earth gathers up all the members of the covenant community while the heavens declare that God is the Righteous Judge. It was a great temptation of God's covenant people to believe mistakenly that everything was in order between them and God. The proclamation of "righteousness" affirms that God, the Righteous Judge, will order everything on earth in accordance with his will. He does not tolerate anything that does not satisfactorily meet his requirements.

II. Warning to the Godly (50:7–15)

7–8 The people used to present their sacrifices and offerings to the Lord in Jerusalem. They imagined God as being in need of food, and they complied with his requirements (cf. Lev 1–7). But, unlike pagan religions, God needs nothing from his subjects. The God who spoke to Israel through Moses and the prophets in the words "Hear, O Israel" (Dt 5:1; 6:3–4; 9:1; Isa 39:5; Jer 22:2; Am 7:16) again speaks to his people of his covenantal rights. The words are a prophetic indictment against his own people.

9–11 God does not need offerings—not even dedicatory ones—if they do not express true gratitude and joy from the givers. Everything belongs to him! What are the tens of thousands of animals from Israel's stalls and pens compared with the millions of animals in the forests and fields, on the hills and mountains, that already belong to him?

There is a note of sarcasm in the use of "your" in "your stall" and in "your pens." It is as if God has heard them proudly say, "This is my bull / goat from my stall / pen!" To this boastful claim God responds with an emphatic "mine" and concludes his claim with a restatement of his ownership. His rule extends to all creation.

12–13 The next step in the argument presents Israel with the inescapable folly of their thinking. Many thought that they were feeding God and that God needed them to keep him well fed and therefore content. To this he responds that if he were in need, he could take care of himself, because he is the Ruler of the world and of every living creature. He did not reveal his laws on offerings and sacrifice in order to be "fed." The "flesh" and "blood" of animals had another significance, which had escaped the people.

14 The "thank offerings" and "vows" (i.e., votive offerings) belong to the category of voluntary offerings in which the offerers shared by eating from the offering (cf. Lev 7:12; 22:29). God desired communion with his people. Instead of presenting "dedicatory offerings" in a spirit of pride, they had to learn that the "Most High" invites them for a banquet to enjoy his presence. Of course, the offering must reflect the true intent: "thankfulness."

15 The Lord will graciously move his people to gratitude if they humble themselves and call on him in their need. When the spirit of pride is broken and their trust in God restored, they will again enjoy the benefits of answered prayer and experience the Lord's deliverance of those who call on him. In response they are expected to give "honor" (GK 3877) to him.

III. Warning to the Wicked (50:16–21)

16–17 The renewal of the promise of deliverance (v.15) is not without obligation. Those who are really want to be his "consecrated ones" (v.5) will wisely respond, whereas the wicked will foolishly cast away God's requirements of faith and repentance. God hates the hypocrites who parrot the law yet abandon it at any opportunity to promote their self-interests. Those who do reject the divine instruction are called "wicked" or "foolish." To the psalmist, one either keeps the covenant or rejects it.

18–20 The particular charges are representative of the whole Decalogue. It is true that those who have broken the seventh, eighth, and ninth commandments have broken the whole covenant. But those who associate with covenant breakers fall under the same condemnation!

21 Too often God's silence is taken as his approval. The people mistook God's patience for an inability to do anything about the evil on earth. They did not understand that the Lord is the Wholly Other One who cannot be boxed in by humans. In his own time God will judge his people openly.

IV. The Righteous Judgment of God (50:22–23)

22–23 The grace of God is manifest in his patience. Though his people continue to have problems, he is still patient with them. He invites them to repent and to devote themselves to a life of godliness. He will reject those who do not repent, treat them as noncovenant people, and judge them severely. But the remnant that heed the word of prophecy and honor God will witness the fullness of his "salvation" (GK 3829).

Psalm 51: Forgiveness and the Community

This psalm is classified as one of the seven penitential psalms (Pss 6; 32; 38; 51; 102; 130; 143), a subdivision of the psalms of individual lament. The superscription relates the context of this psalm to David's heinous sin with Bathsheba (2Sa 11:1–12:25), after he had been rebuked by the prophet Nathan. The lament form suitably fits the spirit of contrition and prayer for restoration.

I. Prayer for Individual Restoration (51:1–2)

1 In desperate need of divine forgiveness, the sinner can do nothing but cast himself on God's mercy. The verb "have mercy" (GK 2858 & 2859) occurs frequently in psalms of lament (cf. 4:1; 6:2; 31:9; 41:4, 10; 56:1; 86:3). When sin disrupts fellowship with the covenant-Lord, the sinner has no right to divine blessings. However, the Lord has promised to forgive, a forgiveness based solely on his "unfailing love" (GK 2876) and "great compassion."

2 Forgiveness is an act of divine grace whereby sin is blotted out and the sinner is "cleansed" by the washing away of sins (vv.2, 7, 9; cf. Ex 32:32; Nu 5:23; Ps 32:2). The OT sacrifices and ritual washing symbolized the removal of sin and the renewal of fellowship with the Lord.

II. Confession and Contrition (51:3–6)

3–4 In his search for forgiveness, the psalmist opens his sinful heart. The variety of words he uses for sin expresses its seriousness (see comments on 32:1–2). He knows himself intimately and sees how rebellious he has been.

His confession is more than introspection, as he knows that he has sinned against the Lord. The psalmist does not reject or argue with divine justice (Ro 3:4), because the Lord's verdict is "right."

5–6 Confronted by God's righteous verdict, the psalmist is more deeply pricked by his own sinfulness. His confession of depravity is not an excuse for his treachery but serves to heighten the distance between the Lord and himself. God is just, whereas human beings are so corrupt that their whole being cries out for help. In their sinfulness they cannot respond in confession unless the Lord sends "wisdom" from or high, which alone can bring a remedy to the sinful heart. Only by receiving revelation from the outside ("you teach me") can the inside become whole.

III. Prayer for Restoration (51:7–12)

7–12 In his prayer for forgiveness, the author employs two verbs, used in vv.1–2, in reverse order: "wash" and "blot out." He prays that the Lord, like a priest, cleanse him from his defilement. The Israelites were to present themselves before the priest on the occasion of their purification The priest, satisfied that the unclean person had met the requirements for purification, would take a bunch of "hyssop" and sprinkle the person with water, symbolic of ritual cleansing. Here the psalmist petitions the Lord to be his priest by taking the hyssop and by declaring him cleansed from all sin. The metaphor "whiter than snow" was applied to clean garments and by extension signifies forgiveness, cleansing, and newness.

Even as God's displeasure with sin brings judgment, metaphorically described as broken bones, so his pleasure brings joy of heart. The joy is more than an emotional expression; it is a contented resting in God. Hence it is known as "the joy of your salvation."

Forgiveness and cleansing are prerequisites for communion with God. Wisdom maintains communion. For this reason the psalmist renews his prayer for divine wisdom and sustenance. In the spirit of true contrition, the psalmist prays for a "pure heart," a "steadfast spirit," the "Holy Spirit," and a "willing spirit." Without the internal renewal, the psalmist fears the possibility of divine rejection (cf. 1Sa 16:14). Spiritual renewal always leads to godliness and wisdom.

IV. Thanksgiving (51:13–17)

13 Sinners who have experienced a deep sense of their own sinfulness, the forgiveness of God, and the sweetness of restored joy show concern for others. The psalmist who prayed "restore to me" also prays that he may be instrumental in restoring sinners to the "ways" of the Lord.

14–15 "Praise" is an appropriate response to divine deliverance. Deliverance from "blood-guilt" (GK 1947) signifies either the judgment resulting from a grave sin requiring the death penalty (cf. Eze 18:13) or the sin that led to the death of an innocent person. One who has tasted the grace of God in life cannot but praise him for a new lease on life. God's "righteousness" (GK 7407) manifests itself, not only in judgment (v.4), but also in forgiveness (cf. 1Jn 1:9), when he sets aside the just penalty for sin. The psalmist looks to the Lord for renewed favor, so that he may freely praise him for his grace ("open my lips").

16–17 A deeper commitment results from a heart of gratitude. The Lord "delights in" truth rather than "sacrifice." The psalmist is not opposed to sacrifices per se (see v.19), but he senses God's concern for inner loyalty as a prerequisite for the presentation of animals for sacrifice. He commits himself unreservedly to the Lord by presenting "a broken and a contrite heart." The prerequisite for spiritual renewal (vv.10–12) is humility—which is also the prerequisite for a walk with God (cf. Mic 6:8).

V. Prayer for National Restoration (51:18–19)

18–19 The canonical significance of these verses lies in the community identification with David's sin, the need for grace, and the anticipation of divinely bestowed joy. The people of God pray for another manifestation of God's love (these verses may have come from the exile). Jerusalem's walls have been breached and the sacrifices have ceased. The Lord's "good pleasure" ("favor"; GK 8356) made Zion prosper under the postexilic leadership of Zerubbabel and Nehemiah. In the days of Nehemiah, when these prayers had been answered (cf. Ne 12:43), the people were again filled with joy.

Psalm 52: An Uprooted and a Sprawling Tree

This psalm contrasts the godless and the godly. The superscription relates it to an episode in David's life, when Doeg had betrayed and executed the priests of Nob who had helped David (1Sa 22:17–23). The genre of the psalm is complex, with elements of lament (vv.1–7), thanksgiving (v.9), wisdom (vv.6–7), an oracle of judgment (vv.1–7), and a mocking saying (v.7). On the whole, the positive tone at the end sets the tone of the psalm as a psalm of trust. The righteous will prevail, regardless of the opposition.

I. The Folly of Evil (52:1–4)

1–2 By means of a question followed by a series of accusations, the folly of evil is shown for what it is. In life the wicked may act as a "mighty man" (GK 1475), who autonomously "boasts" of his power, exploits, and accomplishments. Evil appears in acts but also in words, both expressing the internal plotting of an evil heart. The wicked are con artists. Deception is their trademark, and they are bent on destruction of the godly.

3–4 The values of the wicked are completely distorted. They love anything that is twisted, perverted, and corrupt. Falsehood and aggressive words aim at the undoing of others. They stand for whatever is against God's standards of goodness and "righteousness." In the end the psalmist rebukes the wicked with "O you deceitful tongue!" (cf. James's discussion in Jas 3:1–12).

II. God's Complete Judgment (52:5)

5 The righteous God cannot forever tolerate evil. The wicked will be demolished like a structure. They will be castaways and vagabonds, homeless and without family. Moreover, they will be like an uprooted tree. In the end they will be cut off from "the land of the living" (cf. 27:13).

III. Wisdom Derived From God's Judgment (52:6–7)

6–7 The reaction of the godly to God's judgment is first characterized by awe and terror. They "see" and "fear" the acts of God. Gradually they realize that his judgment was for their encouragement, and their fear changes into joy. They are filled with a triumphant derision for their former oppressors. Righteousness triumphs over evil! Furthermore, they learn a lesson from this judgment. Those who live and act independently from God and trust in themselves will be brought down. The wicked may turn away from the Lord as their stronghold and turn to the fleeting security of power, riches, and ill-gotten gains. But when these are taken away, their lives fall apart.

IV. The Blessing of Righteousness (52:8–9)

8–9 In contrast to the "mighty" (v.1), whom the Lord uproots like a tree and destroys like a building (v.5), are the godly. They are likened to a tree flourishing within the house of the Lord. The imagery of the tree brings out the blessedness of the godly (cf. 1:3; 92:12–13; Jer 11:16). They are like a luxuriant, productive olive tree. The olive tree may last for hundreds of years, and a productive olive tree supplies about six gallons of oil per year.

The godly prosper to the extent that they depend on the "unfailing love" (GK 2876) of God for their nourishment and fellowship. Their response to God's righteousness is praise, and they boast in the Lord. As long as they trust in his love "forever and ever," they have many reasons to praise the Lord "forever." The "name" of the Lord assures the godly that God is righteous and loving.

Psalm 53: God Deals With Foolish Evildoers (53:1–6)

1–6 This psalm parallels Ps 14 (see comments on that psalm). Psalm 53's position favors an ancient tradition relating to the life of David. Psalm 52 relates to the story of Doeg (cf. 1Sa 22) and Ps 54 to the incident of the Ziphites (cf. 1Sa 23; 26). The term "fool" (nabal); GK 5572 is suggestive of Nabal, who acted foolishly to David and his men (cf. 1Sm 25). This psalm encourages God's people to pray for restoration on the basis of God's historic acts.

Psalm 54: Surely God Is My Help!

As in Ps 52, the superscription connects the psalm with David's flight from Saul. The spirit of the psalm reflects that of an individual lament.

I. Prayer for Deliverance (54:1–2)

1–2 "Save [GK 3828] me" and "vindicate [GK 1906] me" express the source and the nature of David's deliverance. "God" alone can deliver him from the troubles stated in v.3. He must come to protect and rescue his child from evil. David's confidence lies in his reliance on the Lord's revelation of himself in the past. He has revealed his "name" (cf. v.6; 20:1) and his "might" to Israel (cf. 21:13; 66:7). The "name" (GK 9005) of the Lord signifies his covenant protection and his blessing.

II. Occasion of the Prayer (54:3)

3 This verse is nearly identical to 86:14. David's opponents are called "strangers" and "ruthless men," who have no "regard for God." "Strangers" (GK 2424) may denote those who had become estranged from God and the covenant community (cf. Isa 1:4) or non-Israelites (1Sa 23:11–12). They had little regard for God or other people, as they were "ruthless" individuals who insisted on their rights and desires.

III. Affirmation of Trust (54:4)

4 In a hymnic manner, the psalm shifts from worry over the arrogant to a confident trust in the Lord. Triumphantly the psalmist exclaims, "Surely God is my help," acknowledging that the Lord is the only one who grants support to his people. He looks forward to enjoying his God-given life (cf. 51:12).

IV. Resolution of the Prayer (54:5)

5 The resolution of David's prayer lies in the conviction that God is just. He will not permit his children to suffer without vindication. Evil must and will be repaid. The Lord is faithful in his relationship to his people; therefore the psalmist is calm, trusting that his God will protect him from his adversary.

V. Thanksgiving for Deliverance (54:6–7)

6–7 The resolution of the psalm shines forth in a victory hymn of thanksgiving. A votive offering is presented before the Lord but enjoyed in the fellowship of family and friends. The godly will hear all the Lord has done for his child, and his praise will resound. His "name" will be exalted, because he has brought deliverance and will continue to bring deliverance. The Lord is "good." He is our Helper and Sustainer.

Psalm 55: The Lord Sustains the Righteous!

This psalm is an individual lament. It moves from despair, to complaint, to a note of confidence in the Lord.

I. Despairing Prayer (55:1–3)

1–3 The injustices heaped on our psalmist cry out for divine retribution. This battered victim turns to the Lord, asking him to "listen" to and "answer" his "prayer." God's silence is surprising because the Lord had decreed to Israel that he would not "ignore" their problems (Dt 22:1, 3–4). The psalmist is full of inner turmoil. Instead of the roaring of the sea, he hears the "voice" (lit., "noise"; GK 7754) of his enemies threatening his existence. They cause him to suffer grievously.

II. Personal Reflections (55:4–8)

4–5 How the psalmist yearns to escape his situation! His heart is palpitating like a woman in labor ("in anguish" is elsewhere translated "in labor"; GK 2655). He is full of "fear" and "horror." The fear of death overtakes him as he reflects on his present condition.

6–8 Another manner of expressing the psalmist's deep despair is in the escape imagery, as he wishes to be like a dove, free to fly to a high and far-away place! He wishes to find quiet serenity in the desert or protective shelter as in a sudden storm.

III. Prayer for Justice (55:9–15)

9–11 Injustice, unrighteousness, and deception in word and deed are prevalent in the city of the human race. The psalmist sees no righteousness wherever he turns; rather, evil is king. "Confound" (GK 7103) may contain an allusion to the Tower of Babel (Ge 11:1–9; cf. 10:24). Even as the wicked cause harm with their words, the psalmist prays that the Lord will bring "harm" ("confuse") on the ungodly.

12–14 The adversary is not "an enemy" or "a foe" from whom he could expect trouble and from whom he could hide. "But it is you" identifies the betrayer as one equal in status, "a man like myself," a "companion," a "close friend." He has been betrayed by one with whom he has enjoyed "sweet fellowship" within a circle of like-minded people. He reflects on the pleasant memories of spiritual unity they had among the throngs of pilgrims in the temple.

15 The magnitude of the friends' treachery and apostasy explains the severity and impetuosity of this prayer. The former friends can no longer be dissociated from the adversaries; they must come to an end, together with the evil perpetrated by them. The psalmist prays that the Lord will remove them from the land of the living and bring them down in their physical vigor ("alive") into Sheol ("the grave"; GK 8619).

IV. Assurance of Justice (55:16–21)

16–18 The perversity of evil by "day and night" (v.10) evokes regular prayer three times a day (i.e., throughout the day). The salvation of the Lord contrasts with his judgment on the wicked (v.15) and is in response to the psalmist's prayer. The answer brings the wicked to their doom and the godly to their experience of triumph and freedom. The net result will be peace ("unharmed"; GK 8934), even though the opposition has been great.

19 The basis for hope lies in the confessional statement. God, "enthroned forever" as the Great Judge, will bring judgment on those who trouble his people and do not respond to him in godly fear.

20–21 In contrast to the Lord's fidelity is the treachery of the wicked. They stab their friends in the back. They have no regard for commitments and promises. They are hypocrites in that they know how to win friends but in their heart have no loyalty, loving "war" rather than peace.

V. Reflection on the Lord (55:22–23b)

22–23b Confident that the Lord is enthroned (v.19), the psalmist encourages the godly to reflect on his justice. In contrast to the treachery of human beings, the Lord will "sustain" the righteous so that they will not be overcome. The oracle of salvation encourages the godly to "cast [their] cares" on the Lord. On the other hand, the justice of God requires vindication on the evildoers. After all, they have no respect for life and veracity. They shall die in the vigor of life.

VI. Hopeful Trust (55:23c)

23c The psalm concludes on a note of confidence in the Lord. "But as for me" expresses the psalmist's submission to the will of God regarding the current circumstances and the future of the ungodly. His trust is in the Lord, the Redeemer-Divine Warrior (cf. 26:1; 37:5).

Psalm 56: Walking in Darkness With God's Light

This psalm expresses the lament of an individual. The psalmist cries to the Lord on account of his opponents who twist his words against him. He himself trusts in the Lord.

I. Lament (56:1–2)

1–2 The lament begins with a characteristic prayer for "mercy" (GK 2858 & 2859). The psalmist pours out his heart as he paints his adversity in rapid strokes: it is continual ("all day long"; cf. v.5) and varied (cf. "pursue"; "attack"; "slanderers"). The opposition is fierce and will not be satisfied until its goals are achieved. The opponents are only "men" (GK 632), but their strength and violence are not to be underestimated.

II. Trust in God (56:3–4)

3–4 Difficult as life is, the psalmist has learned to "trust" (GK 1053) in the Lord. Fear is there, but he neither feels it nor stares at his problems but looks to his Redeemer who will deliver him. He knows that his attackers are only "mortal man" (lit., "flesh"; GK 1414) and that the Lord is God. His promise is secure and will come true.

III. Affliction and Imprecation (56:5–9a)

5–6 With confidence in the Lord's justice as promised in his Word, the psalmist presents his case more clearly before the Lord. His adversaries "twist [his] words" by distorting his intentions in order to ruin him. They plot so as to undo whatever he has planned to do right. Moreover, they set him up like an enemy-at-war. They continually gather together ("conspire"), wait ("lurk"), and prepare for the kill.

7 The psalmist turns to the Lord in a petition for justice. How could the Lord let them get by ("escape")? The psalmist invokes God's judgment on all who may consider themselves members of the covenant community together with "the nations."

8–9a The reason for hope in God's justice lies in his divine nature and in his promise to vindicate his children. Thus the psalmist adds a personal note about the extent of his suffering. His "lament" is known to the Lord, recorded in his "record" (lit., "book"; GK 6225). He has also put the "tears" into a "wineskin" (cf. NIV note), to bring to remembrance all the occasions of suffering. The psalmist rests his case. When the Lord comes to the rescue of his people, the enemies will be routed.

IV. Trust in God (56.9b–11)

9b–11 The emphatic "by this" summarizes the psalmist's confidence in God's acts of vindication, compelling proof of the covenant relationship. The psalmist looks for the demonstration of God's love for him so that he may "know" again how much God cares for him. He rests on the promises ("word") of the Lord, as he praises the Lord of promise. With this certainty of relationship, fear of other human beings has no place.

V. Thanksgiving (56:12–13)

12 Instead of ending with lament and petition, the psalmist concludes with ringing thanksgiving and victory. In anticipation of the deliverance, the suffering saint has made a vow to present a "thank offering" to the Lord as an expression of his devotion.

13 The Lord receives praise because he is true to his promises, especially his promises to not let his beloved stumble on account of the wicked, to avenge himself on the wicked, and to give "the light of life" to his children. In response to God's goodness, the psalmist desires to walk "before" the Lord (cf. Ge 17:1). Only life in God's presence gives meaning to his children. It is as if "the light of life" is shining brightly like the sun!

Psalm 57: The Exaltation of the Lord in the Midst of Alienation

Psalms 56 and 57 portray confidence in the Lord during adversity. Psalm 57 is an individual lament psalm that, like the previous one, ends in thanksgiving.

I. Lament and Refrain (57:1–5)

1–5 The phrase "have mercy on me" is common to psalms of lament (cf. 6:2; 56:1). Because his need is great, the psalmist seeks asylum with the Lord. He goes from a general reference ("disaster") to a specific expression of his need ("those who hotly pursue me"). Though his enemies persecute him unjustly, he seeks God's protection. The "disaster" is like a violent storm, but the Lord can give him "wings"—a metaphor for protection and refuge.

The name "Most High" (GK 6610) signifies that the Lord is exalted in his rule over all that he has created (cf. Ge 14:22; Pss 46:4; 47:2). The Israelites believed that there was no one like their God (cf. Ex 15:11) and that he was the only One who could help people. This God brings judgment on his enemies and deliverance to his own. He "fulfills" his plan by bestowing "his love and his faithfulness" as a positive grace and by delivering the psalmist from oppression. The need is great. The enemies "hotly pursue," like "lions" greedy to devour. They are on a war path: "spears and arrows . . . sharp swords."

II. Thanksgiving (57:6–11)

6 The Lord is true to his word. The wicked receive their due punishment, and the righteous draw comfort from God's rule over the earth. The wicked, like hunters who catch their prey with a net or by digging a pit or hole, use any scheme to exhaust the righteous. The psalmist readily admits that they had nearly succeeded. He trusted in the Lord's promise to lift up those who are bowed down and to keep the godly from slipping. He rejoices in God's goodness to him because the wicked are entrapped in their own scheming.

7–11 The wicked did not rely on the Lord and were found out, whereas the psalmist experienced inner transformation. Out of a grateful heart, he sings songs of praise and makes a joyful noise. He will "awaken the dawn" with the song of the redeemed, signifying a new era of the Lord's salvation. So great is his gratitude that he prays that all the nations may know and fear the Lord. The psalmist articulates his marvel at the vastness of the "love" (GK 2617) and "faithfulness" (GK 622) of the Lord.

Psalm 58: Surely the Righteous Still Are Rewarded

One of the seven imprecatory psalms (cf. Pss 6; 35; 58; 69; 83; 109; 137), this is a lament psalm; but it is unclear whether it belongs to the individual or the communal type of laments. It may well be classified as a prophetic type of lament in which David speaks prophetically of God's judgment on evil (cf. Ps 14).

I. Concern for Justice (58:1–2)

1 David confronts the rulers with their lack of sensitivity to justice. They do not render a judgment characterized by "righteousness" (GK 7406) and "equity" (GK 4797; NIV, "uprightly"). The rule of the wicked seldom reflects God's standards of governance and justice.

2 The reason for the unjust rule lies in the nature ("heart") of the wicked judges. They are evil in the very core of their being, as they act out the "injustice" of their hearts and continually cause "violence" wherever they go.

II. The Lies of the Wicked (58:3–5)

3 The nature of the wicked is amplified in two ways. First, they are wicked from birth and begin to devise evil from their very youth. They "go astray" from what is right; they are deceptive, selfish, and bend the rules in their favor.

4–5 Second, the wicked are likened to "the venom of a snake." The snake had been trained by a charmer but has since become unresponsive to the "tune" of the charmer, who is highly skilled as an "enchanter." The wicked are as dangerous as the venomous cobra that bites his trainer when touched and handled by him. They are insensitive to God, justice, and the cries of the poor and needy (cf. 36:1–4; 140:3).

III. Prayer for Justice (58:6–8)

6 Even in his prayer for justice, David illustrates the aggressiveness of the wicked by the metaphor of "the lions" (cf. 10:9; 22:13, 21). The radical nature of evil requires a response from the God of justice. True to the analogy, the psalmist prays that the Lord will smash the teeth of the lions and knock out their "fangs."

7–8 The author changes his analogy to an inanimate object: "water." Fear inspired by God causes the courage of his opponents to "vanish" like water that ebbs away. David further prays that the arrows of the wicked may be "blunted" and that they themselves may be "like a slug," whose trail is nothing but a slimy track, or like a "stillborn child." Neither ever sees the sun. So the psalmist prays that the wicked may perish.

IV. Expectation of Justice (58:9)

9 This verse is problematic. The mood changes from a prayer to an expectation of justice (introduced by "before"); something is surely going to happen (cf. Isa 7:16; 8:4). But exactly what is unclear because of the present ambiguity of the Hebrew text (see the NIV note).

V. The Joy of the Righteous (58:10)

10 The joy of the righteous comes to full expression when they see evidences of God's justice. The imagery of feet in blood portrays the victory (cf. Isa 63:1–6; Rev 14:19–20; 19:13–14). It is not so much that they are bloodthirsty but rather that they delight in justice. The reign of terror must come to an end! It is better to understand the word "avenged" (GK 5934) as "victorious."

VI. Affirmation of Justice (58:11)

11 With the triumph of God, the righteous are vindicated and God and his kingdom are being established. "Men" (GK 132), who have experienced the oppressiveness of evil, will testify that God rules ("judges") with righteousness and equity (cf. v.1). God is concerned with the "righteous" (GK 7404), who will "be rewarded" for their loyalty (cf. 2Ti 4:8).

Psalm 59: My God Is My Champion

Because of style and vocabulary, this psalm's categorization has been difficult to define. It is a lament psalm, but what sort? The motifs of God's rule, the nations, and God's judgment of the nations may argue in favor of a national lament—or it may even be classed as a royal lament.

I. Prayer for Deliverance (59:1–3)

1–3 Common to the language of the lament is the repeated call on the Lord to "deliver,"

"protect," and "save" the godly from the wicked. The prayer for deliverance discloses both hope in the Lord's ability to fully deliver and the urgent need for deliverance. The occasion for the lament is the presence of adversaries, who are evil through and through, having no regard for human life. They thrive on alienation and enjoy bringing calamity on others. Like soldiers in ambush, they secretly wait to catch the godly.

II. Innocence and Protestation (59:4–5)

4–5 The psalmist protests that this trouble is unjust. He has not provoked his enemies; yet they have come out against him as public enemy number one. They prepare for a public assault. The psalmist's protestation of innocence serves to intensify his reliance on God's intervention. Though evildoers may plan evil and create chaos on earth, God has promised to protect his covenant people. The Divine Warrior is "LORD God Almighty [GK 7372]."

III. The Wicked and God (59:6–8)

6–8 The wicked are like "dogs" that terrorize the streets of the city. They bring anarchy, enjoy chaos, and speak arrogantly. Their mouths are like "swords" as they mock and scoff, challenge God's sovereignty, and belligerently ask, "Who can hear us?" In spite of the commotion on earth, the Lord is not moved. From his perspective evil is ridiculous; it is self-destructive. He will see to it that the rule of oppression will end and that his own will be vindicated (cf. Ps 2).

IV. Hope in God (59:9–10a)

9–10a The Lord is stronger than the enemy. They are "fierce men" (v.3), but he is the "Strength" (GK 6437) of his people. Though evildoers may prowl the streets of the city and promote anarchy, the Lord is the "fortress" (cf. v.1). In the face of the hatred shown by the enemies, the Lord is the "loving God" by whose love his people thrive.

V. Imprecation on the Wicked (59:10b–13)

10b–13 Evildoers must be held accountable for their sins. They are utterly deceptive and crooked; hence the evil they have plotted must come on their own heads. Whatever lot befalls the wicked comes to them as an expression of God's "wrath" for their many sins.

Purposefully the psalmist prays that the judgment of the wicked will be gradual so that the power of the Lord may become more evident. On the one hand, the mighty acts of God encourage the godly, as they rejoice that the Lord goes "before" them in combat with evil. The assurance renews the spirit of God's servant, as the humiliation of the wicked gives him reason to hope. On the other hand, the just judgments of the Lord are instructive to the nations, who must know that they cannot taunt the God of Israel. Any time God acts on behalf of his people, his acts witness to his sovereignty and his care for "Jacob," even "to the ends of the earth." He is the "shield" (GK 4482) who provides protection for those who submit to his lordship.

VI. Confidence in God's Response (59:14–17)

14–17 The wicked are terrorizing like a pack of dogs (cf. v.6). But the godly, encouraged by the vision of God's laughter and by the assurance of his love, "praise" the Lord instead, who is the "Strength," "love," and "fortress" of his own during times of adversity. Since the Lord's love is new every morning (cf. La 3:23), his servants can renew their song "in the morning." Thus the noise of evil "at evening," a metaphor of affliction, will be exchanged for the song of the redeemed in the morning. Such a vision of God's rule over the world, of his love for Israel, and of the protection of his people transforms the lament into a song of confidence.

Psalm 60: Has God Forgotten Us?

There are sad moments in the history of the people of God. This psalm raises the issue of apparent divine abandonment and challenges the godly to abandon themselves to the love and compassion of a wise God. The psalm is a national lament, composed of two laments (vv.1–5, 9–12) and an oracle (vv.6–8).

I. Rejection (60:1–3)

1–3 It is evident that adversity has strained the covenant relationship between God and his people. They feel that his temporary abandonment of them has brought nothing but trouble. Rejection is serious because it results from God's anger. God's people live a meaningless existence without his presence. The psalmist likens abandonment to a state of war ("burst forth"), to an earthquake ("you have shaken . . . it is quaking"), and to a state of intoxication ("wine that makes us stagger").

The lament is occasionally interrupted by brief prayers for relief and restoration: "restore us!" and "mend its fractures."

II. Confidence of Victory (60:4)

4 The Lord has raised a "banner" (GK 5812), designating a place where the godly may find refuge under the protection of the Divine Warrior. Those who "fear" him will find protection from the attacks of the enemy, who are symbolized by the "bow."

III. Prayer (60:5)

5 The familiar cry of the lament songs is "save us" (or "me"). The people pray to be saved out of their desperate situation. The petitioner asks for nothing less than divine intervention in avenging the enemy and vindicating the godly. The ground of the petition is God's promise to his people, who are "those you love."

IV. Oracle: God's Response (60:6–8)

6–8 Answering the prayers of his people, the Lord gives an oracle of hope. He thunders "from his sanctuary" and reminds his people of his promise that the earth is his and that no enemy will survive against him! God is sovereign over Israel, as he alone "parcel[s] out" the portions: Shechem, Succoth, Gilead, Manasseh, Ephraim, and Judah. The geographical references represent all the regions that make up the heritage of Israel in Palestine and Transjordan. He is also sovereign over the nations: Moab, Edom, and Philistia.

Ephraim is called a "helmet" (lit., "the strength of my head"), symbolic of force; Judah is a "scepter" (cf. Ge 49:10), symbolic of dominion and governance. The Lord's authority over the nations is symbolized by Moab coming with a washbasin to have his feet washed, by Edom being tossed the sandal of the victorious Warrior, and by a victory "shout" over Philistia. All nations must submit themselves to his rule (cf. 46:8–9; 72:8).

V. Rejection (60:9–11)

9–11 The lament resumes in the light of the oracle of hope. The pain of the defeat and hence of God's apparent rejection is still real. The questions evoke a strong positive response, as the Lord alone will lead the armies into battle and victory. The king is not looking for a human solution to his problems, because he knows that such "help . . . is worthless." He looks to the Lord in hope that he will bring about the victory over the enemy.

VI. Confidence of Victory (60:12)

12 Here the confidence of divine protection flows over into confidence in victory. The oracle of God (vv.5–8) was sufficient to inspire the people not to fear the enemy or to be troubled by the setback. The Lord is still with them, and he will bring them through this adversity with renewed strength, joy, and victory. The psalm opens with God's treatment of his people as his enemies (vv.1–3) and closes with his enmity against the enemies of his people. Truly the Lord is just in his rule!

Psalm 61: A Prayer From a Fainting Heart

The psalmist's longing for God is a familiar motif in the Psalms. The genre of this psalm is debatable. It may be categorized as an individual lament or a royal lament.

I. Prayer for Protection (61:1–2)

1–2 The psalmist hopes to find divine protection from adversity. The nature of the misery is not spelled out, but it wears him out so that he becomes weary of life to the point of despair. It seems that he is so far from God that he speaks to him from a great distance. "From the ends of the earth" here is most likely a metaphor for despair, alienation, and spiritual separation from the Lord. "The rock" (GK 7446) is a metaphor for protection, denoting a fortified or strategic place where one can find refuge (27:5). The confession "the rock that is higher than I" expresses faith in the Lord's exalted position and his ability to deliver.

II. Expression of Confidence (61:3–5)

3 In the past the psalmist has found the Lord to be a "refuge" (GK 4726) from trouble and

"strong" (GK 6437) like a "tower." "Towers" were used for military purposes; in the case of a siege, people could find protection in them (cf. Jdg 9:51–52). Even in the present affliction caused by "the foe," the psalmist encounters the protection of the Almighty.

4 The psalmist longs for the moment when the Lord will invite his suffering saint to fellowship with him. The imagery of the tent goes back to the desert experience (cf. Ex 33:7–11; Nu 11:16–17) when the Lord resided among the tribes of Israel in a tent. The psalmist longs to be a welcome guest with the Lord "forever." Another metaphor for divine protection and recognition is "the shelter of your wings" (cf. 36:7; 57:1; 91:4).

5 The psalmist has learned to face the future with confidence, knowing that the Lord will answer and already has answered his vows, made during times of duress as a part of a prayer for deliverance (cf. 50:14–15). The Lord will be true to his covenant promises in response to the cry of those who fear his name (cf. 34:7, 9; 103:11, 13, 17). The "heritage" (GK 3772) refers both to the land (cf. Dt 2:19; 3:18) and to the enjoyment of the benefits of covenant life (cf. Ps 37:9, 11, 22, 29, 34; cf. Mt 5:5).

III. Prayer for Protection (61:6–7)

6 The prayer for a long life suggests both the prosperity of the reigning monarch as well as for the preservation of his dynasty (cf. 2Ki 20:6; Ps 45:6). The latter thought is amplified in the second part of this verse.

7 The monarchy in ancient Israel was established and maintained by the promise of God's "love and faithfulness" (2Sa 7:28; 15:20; Pss 40:11; 89:14). The Lord had promised that David's dynasty would be "enthroned . . . forever" (cf. 89:36). These promises of the Lord have found their focus in Jesus (Eph 4:7–13).

IV. Expression of Confidence (61:8)

8 The prayer vacillates between lament and confidence. The vows were to be fulfilled as an expression of gratitude as soon as the prayers were answered (cf. v.5). The "praise" of the Lord would be continual ("day after day").

Psalm 62: Rest and Reward

While facing calamity, the psalmist shows a strong reliance on the Lord, for rest is found in him. This psalm arises out of a context of great adversity and may be categorized as a psalm of confidence.

I. Confidence in the Lord (62:1–2)

1–2 The psalmist's whole being receives consolation from the conviction that the Lord is sufficient. He can give "rest" (GK 1957) to all who seek quietness of heart. Resting in God requires waiting and patience. The Lord is the strength of his people ("rock," "fortress") and the source of "salvation" (GK 3802); the latter signifies the whole process of redemption extending to vindication and to the enjoyment of covenant privileges. The psalmist's faith rises to a new height in believing the promise of God that the righteous "will never be shaken."

II. Human Beings Are Unreliable (62:3–4)

3–4 In contrast to his great confidence in the Lord, the psalmist has little faith in human beings, who are destructive, selfish, and deceitful. Yet faith in the Lord overcomes the strongest opposition, as is borne out in the question "How long?" which is an indignant challenge of the confidence of the ungodly. These devise many forms of evil. They attack with words and deeds and will not rest until those who were seated on a "lofty place" are toppled. They intend to bring ruin and destruction by anarchy and insurrection, by delighting in deception, and by hypocritical speech.

III. The Lord of My Salvation (62:5–7)

5–7 Facing this enmity, the psalmist finds his strength in the Lord alone. He explains that his "hope" for "salvation" lies in the Divine Warrior who fights for him. Faith is the antidote to despair (cf. 37:7). Silence in the presence of the Lord will speed the deliverance he offers.

IV. Exhortation to Trust in the Lord (62:8–10)

8–10 The emphatic confession of trust in the Lord (vv.5–7) transforms into an even bolder proclamation, calling on all the godly to put their trust in God. Human beings are unreliable; they are but "breath," lacking in lasting perfections. Their riches and power are all too often the result of "extortion," deception, and theft. But even when riches are gained legitimately, there is an inherent danger in self-reliance. The godly know that their hope lies only in the Lord. Though they may have to wait for salvation, they know that God provides a "refuge" (GK 4726).

V. Confidence in the Lord (62:11–12)

11–12 The psalmist's confidence probes further into the promises of God to his people. He is reminded of two divine promises that he has heard—that God is "strong" and that he is "loving." That is, he is able to deliver his people, and his deliverance is an act of love. The covenant God will richly reward the godly who trust in him and who shun human deceptive power. The wicked will also receive their deserts.

Psalm 63: The Excellence of God's Love

This psalm reflects the genre of individual laments with its characteristic complaint, expression of confidence in the Lord's ability to help, and anticipation of public praise.

I. Longing for the Lord (63:1)

1 The emphatic "O God" signifies the same as "LORD" (GK 3378), the covenant-faithful God. The psalmist yearns for fellowship with the Lord like one who thirsts for water in the desert.

II. Vision of God's Beneficence (63:2–3)

2–3 The psalmist changes metaphors from desert to a prophetic vision of God's beneficence: holiness ("in the sanctuary"), "power," "glory," and "love." The God he worships is the Great King who promised to dwell among his people in the ark of the covenant (cf. 1Sa 4:21; Pss 78:61; 132:8). His yearning for God is heightened by the past experience of fellowship and by the evidences of his covenantal love. Hence he seeks to "glorify" the Lord.

III. In Praise of the Lord (63:4–5)

4–5 Even if the psalmist were to endure adversity throughout the rest of his life, he commits himself to the "praise" (GK 1385 & 2146) of God and to a life of trust in his deliverance. His praise is the response of faith to God's perfections and anticipates the deliverance. The "name" of the Lord is the ground of hope and trust, because he has signed and sealed his covenant with his "name." The psalmist expects the Lord to come through to provide abundantly for his needs. He expresses the bounty of deliverance in the metaphor of a banquet.

IV. Longing for the Lord (63:6–8)

6 The psalmist reflects on the Lord during the "watches" of the night. According to OT practice, the night was divided into three watches of four hours each (cf. Jdg 7:19; 1Sa 11:11). He remembers the Lord's past acts and draws comfort during the night when the shadows of adversity haunt him.

7–8 "In the shadow of your wings" expresses God's acts of fellowship and protection. The Lord has promised to be close to his own, but he also expects his children to draw close to him as they seek his help and support. "My soul clings to you" is a human response to God's invitation to "hold fast to" him. The psalmist has learned to "sing" while awaiting the Lord's "help" and a new demonstration of the strength of his "right hand."

V. Vision of God's Judgment (63:9–10)

9–10 His newly gained perspective of the Lord's power to deliver inspires the psalmist by the hope of the Lord's vindication. The Divine Warrior will triumphantly subdue the enemies. They had planned to destroy the righteous, but the Lord will bring them down to the lowest parts of the earth. The psalmist expresses his hope in the final triumph of God's justice.

VI. In Praise of the Lord (63:11)

11 The vision of divine vengeance and justice causes the king-psalmist to rejoice. In his present suffering (vv.1, 6–8), he longed for God to come through in triumph. He will be then happy ("rejoice") and "praise" (lit., "boast"; GK 2146) with all those who swear by the divine "name." The deception of the adversaries will cease and the praise of the Lord alone will be heard!

Psalm 64: Prayer for Protection

The psalm is an individual lament, expressive of an unwavering belief in divine retribution (lex talionis).

I. Petition (64:1)

1 The prayer begins with an emphatic "hear" (GK 9048). "God" has promised to be near to his people (Dt 4:7), but the psalmist experiences that God's presence is elusive. Hence he prays for God's preservation from "the threat [lit., fear; GK 7065] of the enemies." He greatly fears that his adversary has the power to take his life. But he also knows that the Lord has the power to preserve the physical life of his people.

II. Prayer for Protection From the Enemies (64:2–6)

2–3 The "conspiracy" results from the enemies banding together in their council of war (cf. 2:1). They have no regard for God. In their secret assembly and noisy provocations, they are like an army preparing for war. Their speech is as lethal as a sharpened sword and as "deadly arrows."

4 The wicked, intent on exterminating the godly, lie in "ambush" and wait for the opportune moment to make a kill. They "shoot . . . without fear" of God or other people. The unprovoked extermination of the "innocent man" (i.e., one blameless in character) must come to the attention of God.

5–6 The wicked are rebels who, like gangsters, undermine the establishment. They "encourage" one another with their "evil plans," scheming together to lay snares for the righteous. They foolishly believe that they are not accountable to anyone (see their confident question, 'Who will see?"). They believe the plans they have made will be successful. In spite of their boldness and invincible spirit, the psalmist trusts in the Lord, who knows the thoroughly evil "mind and heart of man."

III. God's Protection and Vengeance (64:7–9)

7–8 Just as the wicked suddenly ambush the godly (v.4), so the Lord will "suddenly" bring his judgment. Their punishment will be based on the "law of retaliation" (lex talionis), i.e., their sins will boomerang on them (cf. 62:12). The Lord will shoot them down, as it were, with "arrows." The shame they had planned to bring on the godly will come on them.

9 The bold challenge of autonomy and anarchy (vv.3–6) has its counterpart in the fear imposed by God's judgment on humankind. The wicked asked, "Who will see us?" and were unafraid. But God did see them, and when all "mankind" sees the power of God, they will "fear." Then justice will triumph! The psalmist encourages all to "proclaim" and to "ponder" (lit., "learn from"; GK 8505) the acts of God.

IV. Rejoicing and Encouragement (64:10)

10 The psalmist encourages the godly to hope in the Lord during adversity. God will vindicate his servants, who are "upright in heart." The sound of their lament will give way to the sound of praise in honor of the Lord. He alone establishes justice on earth!

Psalm 65: The Bounty of Our Savior

The psalmist ascribes praise to the Lord in this hymn of thanksgiving.

I. In Praise of God's Presence (65:1–3)

1 In an august way this psalm calls on the community of God's people to join together in order to praise the Lord. They have come to "Zion," the city of God, to fulfill their vows and to present their offerings. The vows express gratitude to God for fulfilling his promises.

2–3 Praise is appropriate because of the Lord's many beneficent acts and because of his unmerited favor to his people. They had sinned grievously against him. Their guilt and acts of rebellion ("transgressions"; GK 7322) weighed heavily on them. Yet the Lord "forgave" (lit., "atoned," "covered"; GK 4105) their sins so as to remove both the sin and its consequences. Though undeserved, the Lord does answer prayer. The evidences of his gracious rule witness to "all men" and lead them to seek God's favor.

II. The Blessedness of God's Presence (65:4)

4 The Lord hears particularly the prayers of those whom he "chose" (GK 1034) and whom he has brought "near" to enjoy his presence. Whoever is loyal to the Lord is blessed with "good things." God's gifts include spiritual benefits both in this life and in the life to come.

III. In Praise of God's Rule (65:5–8)

5–7 God has revealed his "awesome deeds" in delivering his people from adversity, enemies, and famine. But the demonstration of his power is not arbitrary. He is righteous and he acts with "righteousness" (GK 7406), which guarantees the establishment of his rule. He is the God of our salvation ("O God our Savior"). But more than that, he is also "the hope" (GK 4440) of all humanity! The universality of the gospel finds expression in the phrases "all the ends of the earth" and "of the farthest seas." This God is the Creator, the One who formed the mountains. The great Creator-God is still "armed . . . with strength," protecting his people (symbolized by his stilling the seas with their roaring waves). The "nations" represent a challenge to God's sovereignty, but he rules over them as well.

8 Great and majestic are God's "wonders" in nature and in history. People everywhere must recognize God's power and respond in "fear" (GK 3707). His rule extends from east ("where morning dawns") to west ("evening fades"). The nations will rejoice with "songs of joy" when the Lord brings justice and peace to earth.

IV. The Blessedness of God's Rule (65:9–13)

9–11 All the covenantal benefits are blessings of God to his people. Water is one such blessing. People prepare the land before the fall rains by making "furrows" and "ridges." They rejoice when after the gentle rains vegetation grows. They rejoice even more when they see the latter rains in the spring, which permit the crops to mature and to produce abundant harvests. It is as if God's "carts" (i.e., clouds) overflow.

12–13 God's blessings extend to uncultivated land and to the flocks. He blesses the "desert," the "hills," and the "valleys." So abundant is his goodness that creation rejoices together with God's people in the beneficence of his redemption. Truly the Lord is Creator and Redeemer!

Psalm 66: Come and See What God Has Done

This psalm is composed of two independent but related units. The first unit (vv.1–12) is a hymn, which may be further divided into two separate hymns. The second unit (vv.13–20) contains an individual thanksgiving psalm.

I. Universal Praise of God's Kingship (66:1–7)

1–4 The psalmist calls on the whole earth to respond with acclamation to God's royal majesty. The occasion of the universal praise is the revelation of his "glory" (GK 3883). His glory and his "power" attend his mighty "deeds." The works of the Great King evoke "awe" (GK 3707) among the worshiping community. But God's "enemies" too will bring homage ("cringe"), though not from the heart. All peoples of the earth, willingly or unwillingly, will "bow down" before the Lord, singing praise to his holy name.

5–7 When the Israelites came out of Egypt, they crossed through the Red Sea as on "dry ground" (cf. Ex 14:21–15:18). They had witnessed God's mighty deeds and, with Moses, responded in acclamation, "The LORD will reign for ever and ever" (Ex 15:18). Having witnessed his "awesome" acts, they were assured that the Lord's "eyes watch the nations." Israel's praise also contains a warning. If the enemies of the Lord continue to oppose and ignore the past, they too will be the object of his terror. God will not tolerate any obstacle to the full revelation of his glorious rule on earth (cf. Isa 2:6–22).

II. Community Praise of God's Kingship (66:8–12)

8 The goodness of God in the history of redemption occasions a renewed outburst of praise. The community of God's people invokes the "peoples" to listen to the good news of what the Lord has done and to "praise" his name for his new acts of redemption together with Israel.

9–12 God's people confess that the Lord is sovereign in testing and refining his people like silver. The trials are likened to "prison," a metaphor for alienation and duress. They endured great affliction, as if "burdens" had been placed on their "backs." The Lord, nevertheless, had permitted all these things to take place. It seemed as if mortal "men" (GK 632) were prevailing. But its purpose was for trial. During their testing God's people looked for his grace with greater zeal. He was faithful, and he "preserved" them and brought them into "a place of abundance."

III. Individual Thanksgiving (66:13–20)

13–16 As a personal expression of gratitude, the last portion of this psalm leads the individual worshiper to personalize the experience of God's people throughout the history of redemption. The psalmist speaks of himself, as he comes to the temple to present burnt offerings of "fat animals" in fulfillment of his "vows," as he praises the Lord before "all . . . who fear God," and as he tells the story of the personal acts of deliverance from trouble ("what he has done for me").

A "vow" (GK 5624) often arose in a period of adversity, promising an action to be accomplished as soon as God had answered one's prayer. The nature of the sacrifice was carefully specified (Lev 22:18–21).

17–20 The celebration of deliverance from trouble includes (1) lament ("I cried out"); (2) a declaration of commitment or fidelity ("his praise was on my tongue"); (3) a declaration of innocence in suffering ("if I had cherished sin"); and (4) praise ("God has surely listened").

Psalm 67: Grant Your Blessing on All Your Creation

This psalm contains elements characteristic of the psalms of blessing and of the psalms ascribing kingship to the Lord.

I. Prayer for God's Blessing and for the Inclusion of the Nations (67:1–3)

The blessing, reminiscent of the priestly benediction (Nu 6:24–26), pertains to three aspects of blessing: (1) protection (Nu 6:24); (2) favor (grace, v.25); and (3) peace (v.26). The allusion to the benediction was sufficient to remind Israel of God's blessings in their totality.

1 God's grace is the basis of his blessing, making life on earth not only possible but even enjoyable. He removes the curse and judgment of the created world since the Fall. He delights in his own, assuring them that he receives them and cares for them with joy.

2 The purpose of God's blessing is so that the nations may "know" (GK 1977) his way. From observing God's blessing on his people, they should be able to deduce his royal sovereignty and acknowledge Israel's God as God. Thus they too may enjoy the fullness of his "salvation" (GK 3802), which pertains to all the benefits of God: his kingship, rule, blessings, and promises.

3 The blessing of God gives rise to "praise." Israel's praise lies in the expectation that the nations too will join in the praise of God. When salvation is extended to the nations, they too will join in praising God.

II. Prayer for the Rule of God (67:4)

4 As he rules the nations, God does not exclude them from sharing in the joy of his presence. They must acknowledge him as the Giver of all good things. To Israel he granted his oracles (Ro 3:2; 9:4–5); and through the Jews came the Savior as the final revelation of the "way" of God (Ro 9:5; cf. Ac 4:12; 9:2). As the gospel goes out to the nations, they must come to the Father through the Son.

III. Prayer for Inclusion of the Nations (67:5)

5 For v.5 see the comment on v.3 above.

IV. Prayer for God's Blessing (67:6–7)

6–7 The psalm concludes with a prayer for God's blessings. The prayer reiterates the element of hope in God's universal rule. Without pointing to the Messiah, the psalm anticipates a glorious messianic era in which Jews and Gentiles share in the glorious presence of God. When God blesses his people, it is with the goal of provoking the nations to jealousy so that they too might come to know him, share in his blessings, and have reason to praise him.

Psalm 68: God Is a Father to the Oppressed

The psalm includes prayers, hymnic praise, thanksgiving, and oracles. If there is one unifying theme, it is centered around the Lord as the Divine Warrior, who comes to deliver his people in Mount Zion.

I. Prayer for God's Coming as the Divine Warrior (68:1–3)

1–3 In God's presence no foe can stand. The impotence of the opposition is likened to "smoke" and to "wax." The "wind," "smoke," and "fire" are manifestations of God's presence (theophany). The theophany does not instill "the righteous" (GK 7404) with dread. Instead, the perishing of the "wicked" is an answer to their repeated prayers, and God's people will rejoice greatly in that hour of vindication (cf. 2Th 1:5).

II. In Praise of Divine Vindication (68:4–6)

4 The community is convoked to celebrate the acts of divine vindication. To this end they remember what "God"—the one "who rides on the clouds," whose name is "the LORD" (GK 3378)—has done for his people. The focus is on the "name" that God revealed to Israel (Ex 3:15), signifying his fidelity to fulfilling his covenant promises (cf. Ex 6:6–8). This God is all that Israel needs. The ascription "who rides on the clouds" contrasts the God of Israel with Baal, whom the Canaanites worshiped as "the rider on the clouds." Here the "clouds" signify the chariot of God racing through the sky bringing blessing and curse, vindication and vengeance.

5–6 From "his holy dwelling" in heaven, the Lord watches all humankind. His eyes focus on the destitute and the oppressed, whose rights are trampled by the powerful and the rich. In hymnic language the psalm refers to the Lord as "father," "defender" (GK 1908), "restorer" (NIV, "sets"), and redeemer ("he leads forth"). He acts on behalf of those who look for protection and vindication: the fatherless, the widows, the lonely, and the exiles ("prisoners"). Wherever there are oppressed people, whether they belong to the people of God or not, the Lord's rule brings transformation from injustice to justice and from oppression to vindication. He changes their sorrow to "singing" by judging the rebellious.

III. A Reflection of the Divine Warrior (68:7–18)

A. Exodus, Desert Wandering, Mount Sinai, and Settlement (68:7–10)

7–8 As the Divine Warrior, the Lord led Israel out of Egypt and through the desert. He appeared at Mount Sinai in a theophany, attended by earthquake and storm (cf. Ex 19:16–17). Awesome was his coming. The Lord is the God of Mount Sinai by revelation and the God of Israel by covenant.

9–10 As Israel's covenant King, the Lord also provided the "abundant showers" of water, manna, and meat in the desert and continued to shower the land of Canaan with his blessed rains. The "weary inheritance" seems to be the people whom the psalmist calls "your people" (cf. 2Sa 23:13). The Lord provided abundantly for his people; he established them in the land and provided bountifully for all "the poor," i.e., those who had been afflicted in Egypt.

B. Conquest of Canaan and Subjugation of the Nations (68:11–14)

11 The Lord is the Divine Warrior. He spoke and his oracle was realized in the conquest of the land. The women celebrated his great acts in song and dance (cf. Ex 15:20–21; Jdg 5; 11:34; 1Sa 18:6–7).

12–13 In the Hebrew text, the women sang of how the kings of Canaan fled with their armies, leaving their spoils behind. The men who stayed behind did not share in the spoils, whereas their wives shared in the booty.

14 The victory of "the Almighty" (GK 8724) was so great that it resembled "snow" on Mount Zalmon (one of the mountains by Shechem; cf. Jdg 9:48). The psalmist is metaphorically highlighting the power of the Lord, who is victorious in destroying the opposition. The corpses of the victims and their weaponry are lying like scattered snowflakes on the mountains.

C. The Establishment of the Theocracy in Jerusalem (68:15–18)

15–16 The psalmist adumbrates the glory of Mount Bashan, but stresses that its glory is dwarfed by the majesty and holiness of Mount Zion. Mount Bashan looks with "envy" at Mount Zion, because the Lord has chosen to establish his "reign" there.

17 The Lord who went ahead of his people (v.7) is portrayed as surrounded by an entourage of thousands of "chariots," representative of his heavenly servants. He who revealed his "holiness" (GK 7731; NIV, "his sanctuary") on Mount Sinai is "the Lord" (GK 151; cf. v.11), who also went ahead of his people to protect and to bless them (vv.7–10).

18 On the victorious completion of the Exodus, the Desert Wanderings, and the Conquest, the Lord returned as it were to heaven ("on high") to celebrate his kingship on earth. The Divine Warrior had successfully subjugated his enemies, having made them "captives" and having received tribute from the conquered nations. In commemoration of his mighty acts, he chose Jerusalem among the mountains to establish his abode, where the "LORD . . . might dwell forever" (cf. 2Co 2:14; Eph 4:8).

IV. In Praise of Divine Vindication (68:19–20)

19–20 The comfort of God's presence occasions a renewal of praise. He is "the Lord" (GK 151), who promised deliverance and victory (v.11) and now cares deeply for his people and leads them out of "death." He is "God our Savior" and his nature sets in motion the history of redemption, because "our God is a God who saves." His rule extends over all angels in heaven and to all the earth. He is known to the believing community as "Sovereign LORD."

V. An Oracle From the Divine Warrior (68:21–23)

21–23 The community also rejoices in having received an oracle from the Lord, the thrust of which is comfort in adversity and an assurance of God's vindication. The godly believe that the Lord will avenge the enemy—expressed poetically by reference to "the heads of the enemies" and to "the hairy crowns." Though the enemy trouble Israel on land or at sea, though they escape to the escarpments of the rocks or try to hide at sea, the Lord will bring them down and share his victory with his people.

VI. Joyful Anticipation of God's Coming as the Divine Warrior (68:24–35)

A. Processional Hymn (68:24–27)

24–27 The oracle inspires the people with greater hope as they await the Lord's "procession." Ahead of everybody is the Lord, whom the psalmist addresses personally as "my God and King." Previously the whole community was involved in thanksgiving (vv.19–20). This time the personal pronoun ("my") involves each worshiper as he or she anticipates the coming of the procession. The Lord is viewed returning victoriously from battle to his "sanctuary." This processional language reflects the customs of battle. The princes and leaders of the tribes join in singing the victory hymn. For purposes of brevity and representation, the poet has selected the southern tribes (Judah and Benjamin) and the northern tribes (Zebulun and Naphtali). Together they form one people, "the great congregation."

B. Prayer (68:28–31)

28–29 With renewed enthusiasm the people of God call on the Lord to demonstrate his "power" and "strength." He has revealed the terror and majesty of his strength in his past victorious acts; but by his own decree, and by his nature as the Redeemer-God, the community expects him to act again. The Lord has established his majesty in his temple in Jerusalem. The subject nations, led by their kings, bring him homage (cf. 76:11; Isa 18:7; 60:3–7; 66:20; et al.).

30–31 The prayer contains a petition to strike those nations that will not submit to the Lord They are likened to "the beast among the reeds" and a "herd of bulls," both of which denote oppressors and troublers of the nations. They must come to an end, as the same nations that have loved warfare and tribute are "humbled" and despoiled. Even mighty Egypt and Cush, who often formed a power base with Egypt, will submit to the Lord.

C. Triumphal Hymn (68:32–35)

32–33 Since the kingdom of the Lord extends to all nations, and since the nations must one day submit to him, the Lord calls on the "kingdoms of the earth" to respond appropriately to his sovereignty. The phrase "the ancient skies above" suggests the excellency of the Lord whose rule extends to the highest heaven. The thunder reveals the majesty and power of his rule.

34–35 The praise of the subject nations must include an ascription of his sovereignty ("the power of God"). He has shown his dominion ("majesty") over Israel. This God is "awesome" in his deeds but still present with his people. He alone is their source of strength. This God is "blessed" (GK 1385; NIV "praise be") and is to be praised.

Psalm 69: The Zeal for Your House and God's Love for His Own

This is an imprecatory psalm of the individual lament genre. Because of its many NT references, this psalm has been interpreted messianically.

I. Lament (69:1–28)

A. Prayer Out of Personal Need (69:1–4)

1–3 The adversity of the wicked is like deep "waters," coming up to the psalmist's "neck," so that he is losing his "foothold." The psalmist is "worn out" and his "throat" seems to be burning ("parched") from repeatedly calling, "Save me"; for the Lord has not yet responded to his cry. He can go no farther, because his eyes also "fail" him.

4 The psalmist is the object of fierce hatred—but "without reason." His enemies deal in "treachery," accusing him of stealing and requiring him to restore what he has not taken. They are out to destroy him (cf. Jn 15:25).

B. Affirmation of God's Knowledge (69:5)

5 God knows that the psalmist has acted without wisdom, i.e., foolishly, and that he has committed "acts of wrongdoing" ("guilt"; GK 873). Thus he humbly admits his humanness in the presence of the Lord.

C. Disgrace for the Sake of God (69:6–12)

6 The psalmist speaks on behalf of all the godly as he addresses the Lord as "Lord, the LORD Almighty." This phrase includes three designations for God: He is the "Lord" (GK 151) of the universe, the "LORD" (GK 3378) of the covenant, and the Divine Warrior ("Almighty," GK 7372). This is the "God of Israel," the Great King of the whole world.

7 Because God must be true to his promises, David prays that God's people will never be overtaken by calumny. As David turns to the particular, himself, the problem gains a new perspective. For God's sake he is being disgraced with "shame."

8–12 For the sake of God, David has become like a "stranger" and an "alien" to his own kin. While he prays and fasts on account of his adversity and the prevalent godlessness, people respond with laughter, mocking, and drinking songs. Dear to his heart is the "house" of the Lord. He was so desirous of pleasing God in the face of ignominy that his "zeal" consumed him, like "a devouring flame."

D. Deliverance for the Sake of God's Servant (69:13–18)

13 The psalmist casts himself even more forcefully on the mercy of the Lord. The phrase "time of your favor" is a technical phrase for God's restorative graces: full forgiveness, deliverance, and restoration to the full benefits of God's relationship with his people. David further specifies what he understands by "favor": deliverance (vv.14–18); God's love and blessings ("the goodness of your love," v.16); "sure salvation"; and "your great mercy" (v.16; cf. 103:8, 17–18).

14–18 The "mire" and the "floodwaters" are about to overtake the psalmist. As he prays, he becomes more intense: "Rescue me. . . . Do not let the floodwaters engulf me . . . or the pit close its mouth over me." In his misery he renews his petition for God's love and mercy as expressions of God's presence. The time for deliverance is now; hence urgency is expressed in staccato-like terseness: "Do not hide . . . answer me quickly, for I am in trouble. Come near." Because of the numerous enemies and their deceptiveness and mocking, he prays that his redemption be near.

E. Affirmation of God's Knowledge (69:19–21)

19–21 Again David quiets himself with the thought that God knows everything about him—including his scorn, disgrace, and shame. He looks for those who identify with him, but there is no sympathy or comfort. Instead, they make things worse for him. They do their best to aggravate his troubles (cf. the metaphors "gall" and "vinegar").

F. Prayer for God's Judgment on the Wicked (69:22–28)

22 Characteristic of the imprecatory psalms, the psalmist hurls God's curses on the enemies. They have made life intolerable for him. As a matter of justice and concern, David prays that the Lord may deal equitably with his enemies. The wicked who had ruined his table will find that their table will be "a snare . . . and a trap."

23–28 The psalmist's eyes and strength have been failing because of his long wait for God's redemption. He prays that his enemies may suffer divine wrath and may lose courage and strength. Since he is forsaken by family and friends, he prays that the wicked may be homeless, childless, and without a future. They have enjoyed their lives and are guilty. In the end they should have no part in the community of God's people on earth nor in the hereafter. To this end he prays that their names be removed from "the book of life," i.e., God's record of the "righteous" (cf. 56:8; 87:6; Ex 32:32–33; Isa 4:3; Da 12:1; Mal 3:16; Rev 3:5; 13:8; et al.). "Salvation" in v.27 is literally "righteousness" (GK 7407), paralleling v.28b.

II. Hymn (69:29–36)

A. Personal and Communal Praise (69:29–32)

29 This verse forms a transition between the lament and the hymn. The "salvation" (GK 3802) of the Lord extends to the complete protection of his own, both body and soul. "Salvation" is a synonym of "righteousness" (GK 7407). Both denote a complete vindication of the godly by their righteous God, who will "protect" his own.

30–32 David looks forward to the time when he can record his deliverance by praising his God in a song of thanksgiving. The sacrifice of the lips in such thanksgiving is better than the sacrifice of a bull. Thus the "poor" and those "who seek God" will take heart, join with him in gladness, and be satisfied.

B. Affirmation of God's Present Care (69:33)

33 Literally translated this verse reads: "Surely, the LORD hears the needy." The "needy" (GK 36; i.e., "his captive people"), will be assured that the God of the covenant listens to and answers their prayers.

C. Cosmic Praise (69:34)

34 All creation joins with the salvation of God's people (see also Isa 44:23; 55:12; cf. Ro 8:18–22). The interrelationship of the welfare God's covenant people and nature is also found in Isaiah (e.g., 44:23; 55:12; cf. Ro 8:18–23).

D. Affirmation of God's Eschatological Deliverance (69:35–36)

35–36 The psalmist prays for the speedy deliverance of Zion, her cities, and her people. The attack of the enemies on God's people is an attack on God's kingdom. Whether Judah was under attack or had just come out of a period of war and desolation, the Lord promises to restore his people, strengthen them, and permit them and their children to enjoy his benefits.

Psalm 70

This psalm is virtually identical with the prayer in 40:13–17. The main differences lie in the absence of the divine name and in the addition of "hasten" at the very beginning of the psalm. Possibly this psalm was adapted from Ps 40 for a special occasion.

Psalm 71: Longing for the Lord's Righteous Acts

The combination of lament and thanksgiving indicates that this is an individual lament psalm.

I. Prayer of Confidence (71:1–4)

1–4 The psalmist repeatedly prays for deliverance from his present affliction. The ground for hope lies both in his trust in God and in his belief that the Lord is "righteous" (GK 7407). This conviction that God rules and acts righteously upholds him in his faith that the Lord will deliver him from the wicked, from those who are devoted to evil and unrighteous acts. The Lord is his "rock," his "refuge," and his "fortress."

II. Affirmation of Confidence (71:5–8)

5–8 The Lord has been the psalmist's "hope," "confidence," "praise," "strong refuge," and "splendor" from his "birth." His God is no other than Yahweh (LORD; GK 3378), the covenant-redeemer God. Although he has become a "portent" (GK 4603; i.e., a sign of trouble and divine retribution) to his contemporaries, he nevertheless throws himself on God as his refuge. The Lord has been close to him in deliverance and protection throughout his life. Based on this affirmation of trust, he has had reasons to declare the Lord's royal praise in the past and looks forward to ascribing the powers of royalty to the Lord in the future.

III. Prayer in Old Age (71:9–13)

9–11 Lament shapes the petition. The psalmist prays that the Lord will not abandon him in old age. "Cast away" and "forsake" signify a state of condemnation and curse. The vile enemies are all too ready to condemn him to death, to accuse him as a sinner worse than them, and to justify their evil course of action.

12–13 The prayer calls on the Lord to vindicate his servant speedily by giving him "help" and by bringing retribution on God's enemies. His enemies are "evil and cruel" (v.4) "accusers." The psalmist awaits the Lord's judgment.

IV. Hope in Old Age (71:14–18)

14–16 In response to his lament, the psalmist affirms that his "hope" (GK 3498) is in the Lord. He expects the Lord to vindicate him, resulting in a new declaration of "praise." The nature of vindication will be nothing less than an expression of his "righteousness" (GK 7407). His "mighty acts" and "marvelous deeds" (v.17) establish his "righteous" kingdom. These are the acts of the psalmist's "Sovereign LORD."

17–18 The psalmist has devoted himself to God since his youth. He has praised him and anticipates proclaiming his praise to another generation. The "power" of God is the demonstration of his "might" and an expression of his fidelity. All who "come" will hear this gray-haired saint retell the story of the Lord's mighty deeds.

V. Affirmation of Confidence (71:19–21)

19 Faith triumphs as the psalmist leads to a grand vision of the Lord's "righteousness," reaching to "the skies." It is nothing less than his perfection as evidenced in the "great things." There is no God in heaven above or being on earth who is like the Lord!

20–21 Great have been the psalmist's troubles. Yet the Lord's power is so great that he can extend his love into the deepest depths. He alone has the power over life and death. Instead of shame (v.1), the psalmist will receive "honor" (lit., "greatness"; GK 1525; i.e., the Lord's saving acts). Instead of "troubles" (v.20), he receives "comfort" from the Lord God.

VI. Thanksgiving With Confidence (71:22–24)

22–24 The psalm concludes on a vow to praise the Lord publicly for his "faithfulness," as expressed in his "righteous acts" of deliverance. The Lord delivers his children and avenges those who harm them. He is "the Holy One of Israel" in his acts of redemption.

Psalm 72: The Glory of the Davidic Kingdom

This psalm is a royal psalm, wherein petition is made for the prosperity of the Lord's anointed. The psalm begins with a prayer for the messianic kingship of David's dynasty and ends on an ascription of praise to the universal kingship of the Lord.

I. Prayer for Davidic Kingship (72:1)

1 Petition and praise well up from the heart of faith, as the psalmist invokes God's blessing on the Davidic dynasty. To be an instrument of God's kingship on earth, the monarch must conform to the divine standards of "justice" (GK 5477) and "righteousness" (GK 7406). The king, talented as he may have been, had to live in accordance with the revelation from God.

II. Hope for Righteousness and Justice (72:2–4)

2–4 The king is an instrument of God's blessing to his people. He must "judge" the cases before him in accordance with "righteousness" and "justice." Thereby the people will share in the benefits of theocratic rule, knowing that their king is working for them. The "afflicted," "the children of the needy," and the people at large will benefit from his upholding their rights and avenging the "oppressor." Vindication ("the fruit of righteousness") brings "prosperity" as a sense of well-being to the people.

III. Prayer for Longevity and Universal Rule (72:5–11)

5–6 The hope is that the wise king will remain a blessing for a long time. The duration probably refers to the length of the royal dynasty rather than the individual ruler. The prosperity is likened to rain showers on "a mown field" and on "the earth"—a picture of new growth.

h. From Habakkuk	Hab 2:6–11
i. From Zechariah	Zec 7:8–14; 10:2–3
j. From Malachi	Mal 3:5

7–8 As long as the Davidic dynasty is responsive to divine wisdom, the Lord guarantees that righteousness and peace will flourish. The effects of his administration will last, and its benefits on the population will long be enjoyed. The rule of the Davidic dynasty will not only extend in time but also in space. The Lord's messianic government spreads out over seas, rivers, and land. The world belongs to God.

9–11 Kings and nations will submit to the divinely appointed ruler. The nations will present their tribute as acts of submission. The nearby nations are represented by "the desert tribes" and the "enemies," the distant nations by kings of "distant shores": Tarshish, Sheba (modern Yemen), and Seba (in Africa). The imagery reflects the Solomonic era of peace, righteousness, and international diplomacy (cf. 1Ki 4:21, 34; 10:1–29).

IV. Hope for Righteousness and Justice (72:12–14)

12–14 The psalmist returns to the theme of hope in an era of righteousness and justice. The divinely appointed king represents God's concern for the oppressed. The destitute, disadvantaged, and social outcasts are his subjects; but more than that, they are also his concern. Those against whom others discriminated are the very people whose concerns the king takes to heart. His "pity" (GK 2571) is the ground for action, transforming sympathy to empathy. The king loves them and values their very lives as his own. He will "rescue" (GK 1457) the destitute from their adversaries and from their prosecutors. He will grant them life by taking away the pangs of death.

V. Prayer for Longevity and Universality (72:15–17)

15–17 This prayer includes a petition for the longevity of the king and the perpetuity of the dynasty. The concern for the "name" of the king relates to the continuity of his regime as well as to the continuation of the blessings of his regime. The security and perpetuity of his kingship are advanced by the subject nations who bring him tribute and pray for his welfare. The prosperity of the king blessed by the Lord extends to all realms, represented here by "grain" and "fruit." The psalmist petitions the extension of blessing to all the subject nations. They too will be "blessed" (GK 1385; cf. Ge 12:2–3; 22:18; 26:4).

VI. Praise of God's Kingship (72:18–20)

18–20 The concluding doxology closes Book II of Psalms. The Lord is to be praised. He is God, "the LORD," "the God of Israel," who has done and will continue to do "marvelous deeds" on behalf of his people. Through them he has demonstrated his "glorious name" in all the earth (cf. Isa 6:3; cf. Lk 1:68).

The congregational response to the doxology is a twofold "Amen" (GK 589; cf. 41:13; 106:48; Ne 8:6). They confess that these words are true. The final verse separates the psalms associated with David from those of Asaph (73–83).

Book III: Psalms 73–89

Psalm 73: The Suffering of God's Children and the Goodness of God

The psalmist struggles within himself as to the appropriate response to evil and injustice in the world. This psalm is best categorized as a wisdom psalm in which lament is the vehicle of communication.

I. Experience and Belief (73:1–3)

1 The psalmist has learned from his own experience that God is good. The "pure" (GK 2342) are not perfect but live in loyalty to God in speech and action, thus evidencing their "pure" motives. They are without hypocrisy. The word "heart" occurs six times in vv.1–26.

2–3 The psalmist readily and publicly admits that he "envied the arrogant" and ungodly in their "prosperity." Engaged in self-pity and questioning God's justice, he was filled with resentment and could easily have joined those he envied. He nearly failed, but God sustained him and kept him.

II. Prosperity of the Wicked (73:4–12)

4–12 The wicked seem to be carefree and unconcerned about tomorrow. They are doing well, as their wealth and power increase. They seem like "gods" who do not suffer from the frailties, adversities, diseases, and toilsome labor common to most people.

Their eyes sparkle because everything is going well for them. They do not regard God and his commandments. Instead, they are puffed up with "pride." They leave behind a trail of violence, living at the expense of others. The wicked rule with their tongues. By intimidation they instill fear in others, and they act as if they can get by without responsibility to God. They decree how things are to be done on earth and what God can do in heaven. Most distressing to the psalmist is that it seems as if God lets the wicked get by with their wickedness.

III. Personal Reaction (73:13–17)

13–14 The psalmist confesses that he doubted the value of his own concern with sanctification. Keeping his heart "pure" and his hands "washed . . . in innocence" express his concern for justice and righteousness. The psalmist confesses his self-doubt and envy. Being "plagued" and "punished" probably refers to his mental turmoil.

15–17 The psalmist confesses a deep concern for the people of God. He had thought about removing himself for the sake of the prosperity and peace of his soul, but he could not sever ties with God's people. He further confesses that though he cannot understand the ways of God, he did experience God's peace when he entered into the sanctuary. Overwhelmed by the greatness, glory, and majesty of God, the psalmist rediscovers that the Lord is just! In the end evil is not and never will be victorious.

IV. Affirmation of God's Justice (73:18–20)

18–19 Whereas the Lord had not permitted the psalmist to slip into sin, the wicked are doomed to fall. It may take several generations before they are brought down to God's judgment, but the assurance of Scripture is that they will be judged "suddenly" and "completely."

20 The wicked are like "a dream," which has a sense of reality when one is asleep but is gone at the moment of awakening. God's righteous judgment brings all things into perspective. The psalmist's experiences of anguish of mind will turn out to be little more than a nightmare, a bad dream.

V. Evaluation of the Psalmist's Reaction (73:21–22)

21–22 The psalmist was deeply affected by envy and anguish. Deep inside he was grieved and embittered, resulting in a state of depression. In this state he was irrational (cf. 94:8), not ruled by wisdom.

VI. The Desire of the Godly (73:23–26)

23–26 Because of God's presence, the psalmist is assured of his protection and guidance. God protects him by holding his "right hand," by giving him internal fortitude, and by providing for all his needs. God guides his servant by giving him wisdom and insight as he travels on to everlasting glory. The "glory" (GK 3883) of God is his blessed presence, which affects one's whole way of life. There is no one but God, his Sustainer in heaven, with whom the psalmist longingly desires to fellowship. Therefore he is more prepared to face his present existence with all its problems. He is prepared to grow older and experience failing health and even adversity because God is his "strength," "portion," and "refuge" (v.28). "The Rock" (GK 7445; NIV, "strength") of Israel is present with him.

VII. Experience and Hope (73:27–28)

27–28 In anticipation of God's just acts of vindication, the psalmist declares his hope in his God. The wicked must perish in the end because they are "unfaithful" to God. These verses are a fitting conclusion to the psalm. Envy has turned to hope, and God's goodness to Israel is also experienced at the individual level. "It is good to be near God."

Psalm 74: The Destruction of the Temple

God's people in exile weep over the destruction of the temple (586 B.C.), the symbol of the presence and the protection of God. In this community lament the godly nevertheless affirm the creative and redemptive powers of their covenant God as the ground for their petition to be redeemed.

I. Prayer for Remembrance (74:1–3)

1–3 With God's sanctuary in ruins, the psalmist calls on the Lord to investigate the fate of Jerusalem. It seems as if the ruins are everlasting, because every moment of God's anger is like an eternity. The "why" arises because of the present alienation of God's "sheep" in the context of their past relationship with him. How can God be angry with his own people forever? With "turn your steps" (GK 3727; lit., "lift up"), the psalmist petitions the Lord to look with pity on the ruins of the city of God and to remember when he redeemed his people from Egypt, formed them to be his "inheritance," and maintained a relationship of grace with them.

II. Destruction of the Temple (74:4–8)

4 The presentation of Jerusalem's destruction is given in moving detail, focusing on the desecration of the temple by hostile forces. The enemies "roared" like lions as they captured the temple area itself. Instead of witnessing the "signs" of God's presence and forgiveness (sacrifices, priestly rituals), the people had seen the pagan "standards" that symbolized their victory.

5–7a The enemy behaved like mad men as they used their axes on the woodwork of the temple. The beautiful carved work (cf. 1Ki 6:23–35) was destroyed by pagan implements of destruction. The gold overlay (1Ki 6:19–22) was stripped (2Ki 25:13–17) off the wood. Then they burned the temple to the ground (cf. 2Ki 25:9).

7b–8 The lament focuses on the act of defiling the temple, emphasizing that the symbolic place of God's covenant and his mercies was desecrated by hostile Babylonians. Their evil intent is clearly expressed in by the words "They said in their hearts." Their goal was to destroy the meeting place of God with his people and thus change Israel's destiny and remove any reminder of God's past loyalty and worship.

III. Feeling of Abandonment (74:9–11)

9–11 This section concludes the lament and forms a transition to the confession of God's kingship. God's people are disturbed at his apparent absence. They no longer witness any "miraculous signs" (GK 253), see the symbols of Israel's worship, or hear the oracles of God. Instead they hear the scoffing of the enemies. In their abandonment the godly show a deep concern for the honor of God's name, reviled by the pagans. Thus, on behalf of the community of God's people, the psalmist asks, "How long?" and "Why?"

IV. God's Past Involvements (74:12–17)

12–13a The laments give way to a hymn in which the psalmist represents the community in its worship of the great "king." He has shown himself to be Israel's king "from of old," i.e., since he redeemed them from Egypt. He has done acts of "salvation," being victorious over Israel's enemies. As King, God has led his people heroically from victory to victory.

13b–17 The current victory of the pagans and the seeming power of their deities require a powerful demonstration of the Lord's sovereignty. The psalmist chooses the language of Canaanite mythology to celebrate the Lord's victory over the nations. His absolute power is vividly expressed in the language of crushing the heads of Leviathan and of feeding them to the wild animals. The "monster" symbolizes the wild, uncontrolled forces of the sea. The Creator-God has made and now sovereignly rules over the waters, the earth, day and night, the heavenly bodies, and the seasons of the year. The Lord, the covenant Redeemer, had also demonstrated his sovereignty in history by redeeming his people from Egypt.

V. Prayer for Remembrance (74:18–21)

18–21 The confessional hymn, celebrating God's creative and redemptive powers, revitalizes the godly with hope. They petition the Lord to "remember" (GK 2349) the conduct of the enemies ("wild beasts") and the afflictions of his covenant people ("your dove"). The enemies have mocked and reviled the Lord's name, "the LORD." While they thought they had autonomy over God's people and therefore over the God of Israel, they are nothing but "foolish people" for denying the power of the Lord.

VI. Destruction of God's Enemies (74:22–23)

22–23 In conclusion the lament renews a bold appeal for the Lord to act. As long as the foolish mocking continues, the enemies have reason to boast in their strength. As long as their loud noise "rises continually," it seems that the Lord has rejected his people "forever." But their power is nothing compared to the Lord's, when he rises to defend his cause.

Psalm 75: Justice Is the Lord's

In view of the strong opposition of the arrogant, the godly community looks to God for deliverance. The genre of the psalm appears to have characteristics of a communal thanksgiving hymn.

I. Thanksgiving (75:1)

1 The community of God's people burst out in a song of thanksgiving. The godly recall the "wonderful deeds" (GK 7098) of the Lord, his acts in creation and in the salvation of his people.

II. Oracle of the Lord (75:2–5)

2–3 Though God may let wicked individuals and nations go unpunished and even the godly may pray for their deliverance for long periods of time, the Lord will suddenly introduce "the appointed time" for judgment. The "upright" (GK 4797) judgment of God pertains to both aspects of his righteous rule: vengeance on the enemies and vindication of the godly. The Lord is in control, even when it seems that everything is falling to pieces. The "pillars" shore up the moral order, preventing his creation from collapsing.

4–5 The Lord's word comes directly to those who cause chaos, anarchy, and immorality on the earth. The "arrogant" (GK 2147) live without regard of God and his commandments. They speak insolently and are impatient with the distinction between the divine and the human. They are no different from the "wicked," who boast in their power and autonomy—expressed by the word "horns" (GK 7967), which they lift up "against heaven."

III. Prophetic Oracle (75:6–8)

6–8 God's judgment will be universal. Since his rule extends "from the east or the west" and includes deserts and mountains, no one can escape it. Whoever exalt themselves against the Lord will be brought down. Like a cup of spiced wine, the Lord pours out his judgment on the wicked (cf. Rev 15:7; 16:19).

IV. Thanksgiving (75:9–10)

9–10 The psalmist takes it on himself to perpetuate the story of God's mighty acts. In retelling the story of salvation in song, the redeemed will forever remember what the Lord, the "God of Jacob," has done. He is committed to protect and help his people. Since God is opposed to the "horns" of the wicked, he vows to bring them to destruction. He will vindicate the righteous, however, by raising their "horns."

Psalm 76: The Lord Is the God of Jacob

The adoration of the Divine Warrior by his own people includes both a reflection on past victories and a hope for the full establishment of his kingdom on earth. The psalm is in the form of a victory hymn.

I. God's Relationship With His People (76:1–3)

1–2 God had graciously established a relationship with his people, who had come to "know" (GK 3359) him by his gracious condescension to dwell in the temple of Solomon ("the tent"). The Lord has chosen "Salem" (cf. Ge 14:18) as his royal city so that both Judah (the southern kingdom) and Israel (the northern kingdom) may comfort each other with the assurance that the Divine Warrior is in their midst.

3 Jacob and Israel experienced the triumphs of the Lord. He is the Warrior who goes ahead of his people. Nothing can stop him. The collection of weapons taken from the enemy witnesses to his power.

II. The Divine Warrior (76:4–7a)

4 The Divine Warrior is "resplendent" (i.e., enveloped by light) as he shoots forth the thunderbolts. He is the "majestic" One.

5–7a The kings and rulers of the nations are the "valiant men" who rebel against God and against his anointed king (cf. 2:1–2). They rely on "horse and chariot," i.e, political power and military strength. But human warriors pass away into "their last sleep" and are powerless to raise their strong "hands." The enemies are felled by the "rebuke" of the Lord. The God of Jacob is "awe-inspiring" (NIV, "to be feared"; GK 3707).

III. The Divine Judge (76:7b–9)

7b–9 The rhetorical question "Who can stand?" should shock the reader! No one can stand before him in his anger! The Lord rules over the nations. He is the Great Judge of the universe speaking "from heaven." The purpose of the "judgment" is twofold. First, it lets the nations know that the Lord is the sovereign King. Second, it gives comfort to the people of God in that he rises to help "all the afflicted of the land." The "afflicted" (GK 6705) are those who await the deliverance of the Lord.

IV. The Relationship of the Nations With God (76:10–12)

10 All acts are under God's sovereign control. Even the most hostile acts against his rule will bring him "praise." The Lord turns a person's rebellious expression of anger to his glory. When he goes out as a man of war (Isa 59:17–18), his opponents must submit to his lordship.

11–12 In view of the dreaded judgment of the sovereign Lord over all people, all must respond wisely, being careful to pay their vows to the Lord. God's people must be examples to the nations of loyalty to him, but the nations too have an opportunity to respond to the awe-inspiring nature of the Lord. He will crush the hostile opposition of the nations to his rule.

Psalm 77: A Remembrance of God's Greatness

The mood of the psalm changes from lamentation to reflection and ultimately gives way to a joyful hymn celebrating the greatness of the God of Israel. The psalm may be read as an individual lament psalm.

I. Cry for Help (77:1–2)

1–2 The psalmist repeats the words "I cried out to God" by way of emphasis; his prayer is intense because of his "distress." He longs for a renewal of communion with the Lord, inaugurated by new acts of God. To this end he "sought the Lord." He "stretched out" his hands in prayer and continued to lift up his hands "at night." Yet even in his laments he remains restless on account of the distance between him and God. He looks to God as the sole comforter of his soul.

II. Remembrance of God in Hymns of the Night (77:3–6)

3–6 In his remembrance the psalmist recalls the acts of God. But such remembrance gives him groaning and spiritual exhaustion rather than comfort. He reflects on "the former days," when the songs sung at night were comforting, permitting him to sleep quietly even in great adversity. But these night hymns comfort no longer, for his eyes are kept "from closing." The psalmist troubles himself further as he "muses" and "inquires."

III. Questions (77:7–9)

7–9 Doubts and questions are expressed by the greatest saints of God (cf. Ps 22:1; Mt 27:46). The psalmist asks whether God will "reject" (GK 2396) his people forever by not extending to them his "favor" (GK 8354). The "favor" is his willingness to be reconciled with his people by forgiving their sins and by blessing them with his grace. The psalmist continues with the questions as to why the "unfailing love" (GK 2876) of God is gone and why "his promise" has become ineffective. He further ponders the question why God does not forgive and show mercy on his people.

IV. Remembrance of God's Mighty Deeds (77:10–12)

10–12 The remembrance of the age-old acts of God is the basis for faith. The name of God "Most High" (GK 6609) goes back to Abraham (Ge 14:22). This God, the Creator and Protector of creation, is none other than "the LORD," the covenant God. The psalmist remembers his "mighty deeds," "miracles," and "works."

V. Confidence in God's Help (77:13–20)

13–15 The hymn ascribes power to God. His holy "ways" pertain to what he has done on behalf of his people. They exclaim with the psalmist, "What god is so great as our God?" Only the Lord demonstrates his holy power "among the peoples" on behalf of his people, "the descendants of Jacob and Joseph." The nations witnessed his mighty "miracles," performed by his "mighty arm," and they trembled (cf. Ex 15:14–16; Ps 66:8).

16–20 The drama of creation and redemption is depicted with great literary imagination. The powers of the waters and the mysterious forces of the depths of the seas tremble in the presence of God. The Lord's power was displayed in clouds, rain, thunder, and lightning. God led his people through the Red Sea. Though his presence ("footprints") was not "visible" to them, it was apparent in his awesome power by which Israel passed to Sinai. They were led "like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron" through the desert.

Psalm 78: Lessons From Israel's History

The wisdom motif of vv.1–4 introduces a didactic psalm. The psalmist is concerned to show how Ephraim lost its special status of blessing and prominence in favor of Judah.

I. Call to Wisdom (78:1–4)

1–4 The importance of the "teaching" lies in the insights gleaned from Israel's history. "The words of my mouth" are words of wisdom, expressed in "parables" (GK 5442; proverbial forms of teaching) and in "hidden things" (GK 2648)—"hidden" in the sense that humans cannot comprehend that God continues to be merciful and patient with a "rebellious people" (cf. Mt 13:35). The wisdom communicated from the fathers to each new generation pertains to the Lord's "praiseworthy deeds" and the demonstration of his "power" and "wonders." The history of redemption is revelatory.

II. Lessons From Israel's History (78:5–64)

A. Past and Future Generations (78:5–8)

5–8 Each generation must remember that the Lord revealed the divine oracles to Israel as an expression of the covenant relationship that he had sovereignly and graciously established between himself and Israel. Israel was expected to teach this revelation from generation to generation so that each generation might "put their trust in God" by remembering "his deeds" and by keeping "his commands." The "hearts" of the desert generation were "not loyal" (i.e., not established: GK 3922), and their "spirits were not faithful" to God. Instead, they were thoroughly rebellious.

B. Israel in Egypt and in the Wilderness (78:9–16)

9 The spirit of "the men of Ephraim" represents the spirit of Israel as a whole. They were richly blessed with an extensive patrimony among the tribes of Israel (cf. Ge 48:15–20; 49:22–26; Dt 33:13–17). "Armed with bows" fits well with their aggressiveness (cf. Jdg 8:1–3; 12:1–6). However, they also lost because they had to flee in war, perhaps referring to the Philistine incursion and victory at Ebenezer (1Sa 4:1–11).

10–12 The people were defeated because of flagrant disobedience and disregard of God's covenant and law. They were no longer moved by the history of redemption, because they had forgotten God's expressions of loving concern, the "wonders" and "miracles" performed in Egypt and in the desert.

13–16 The Lord had led Israel through the Red Sea, whose waters congealed like a wall (cf. Ex 15:8; Jos 3:13, 16). Throughout their desert sojourning, he showed his presence with them in the pillars of "cloud" and "fire." Moreover, he supplied them miraculously and abundantly with water (cf. Ex 17:6; Nu 20:8–11).

C. Israel in the Desert (78:17–31)

17–31 In response to the evidences of God, the people rebelled. They refused to believe, even in the face of the evidence. They were skeptical about God's ability to provide food in the desert. He demonstrated his powers by giving Israel manna and meat, but the unbelieving generation was condemned because the people were not overwhelmed by God's ability to deliver. They were not concerned with God or the wonders of God but were fleshly in their basic orientation to life. They "craved" food and died in their lust. True faith looks beyond the gifts to the giver, the Lord of Glory.

D. God's Mercy on a Rebellious People (78:32–39)

32–33 The people had seen God's "wonders" (GK 7098), but "they did not believe" in them. They rejected the very evidences that should have led them to faith in God. Consequently he abandoned the generation of the desert to "futility" and "terror." Life became nothing but "futility" (GK 2039; cf. Ecc 1:2), filled with sudden catastrophes. At the end the desert generation passed away (Nu 14:22–23).

34–35 God punished the people for their sins. They did respond on that particular occasion with all the evidences of true repentance by returning to him "eagerly." They wanted to get the discipline over with and return to normal life. In their return they made mention of God as "their Rock" and of "God

Most High . . . their Redeemer." All too often their sole purpose of recognizing God is to derive benefits such as victory in war and provision of food.

36–39 The people's repentance was true contrition but was intentionally deceptive. They may have worshiped the Lord outwardly but not with their hearts. They "would flatter" (GK 7331) him, thinking they could lure God into their schemes, but every prayer was deceptive. In "their hearts" they had determined not to be loyal to the Lord. But the Lord was true to his character; his compassion found expression in his forgiveness of their sins, in his forbearance with their stubborn spirits, and in his empathy with the human condition, so that his full anger did not destroy them. He remembered that they were, after all, "flesh" (GK 1414; i.e., mortal).

E. Israel in Egypt and in the Wilderness (78:40–55)

40–41 Israel's history of frequent rebellion stands in stark contrast to all the evidences of God's goodness. Humanly speaking, the Israelites as his children caused great grief to their heavenly Father in the desert. They "rebelled," tried his patience, and "vexed the Holy One of Israel."

42–51 The Lord had shown his fatherly care in Egypt and in the desert. In turn he had expected his people to sanctify his holy name by remembering him (Ex 3:15). But "they did not remember" all the evidences of his power, such as his turning the rivers of Egypt into blood and troubling the Egyptians with the ten plagues. Death in Egypt was an expression of God's "hot anger, his wrath, indignation and hostility." He was sovereign over Egypt's adversities by sending the messengers ("angels") of adversity, resulting in the death of the "firstborn" of all the males in Egypt.

52–55 Instead of adversity, God brought great blessings to his own people like "a flock"/"like sheep," a metaphor for Israel. He drowned the Egyptians in the Red Sea, while guiding his own people so they needed not be afraid; he brought them safely to the Promised Land; he drove out the Canaanites; and he gave each tribe its allotted patrimony.

F. Judgment on a Rebellious Generation (78:56–64)

56–58 The psalmist returns to the refrain of Israel's rebelliousness. The people in the land were essentially no different from the desert generation. Though the Lord had given them his statutes to live by, they provoked him with cultic "high places" and with "idols." In this they were unreliable, like a "faulty bow" that springs wrongly when needed.

59–64 Because of Israel's treachery, God removed his glorious presence from them. Ephraim could have been a leader among the tribes but turned out to be self-serving, bellicose, and idolatrous. God's anger came to concrete expression in the destruction of the tabernacle at Shiloh and in the capture of the ark (1Sa 4–5), symbolic of his might and "his splendor." Young men and priests were killed in battle, leaving behind unmarried maidens and widows, who were too greatly afflicted to "weep" over the dead.

III. Good News: God Has Chosen David (78:65–72)

65–72 While the Philistines prevailed over Israel, it seemed as if the Lord was asleep. The renewal of his acts of mercy to Israel was so overwhelming that the psalmist likens God to a "hero" (GK 1475; NIV, "man"), who feels himself more heroic when intoxicated with wine. In his valor he overcame the enemies of his people and gave the honor of victory and peace to David, from the tribe of Judah, thus rejecting the supremacy of Ephraim. The favored position of Judah was further symbolized by the choice of Jerusalem (Mount Zion) as the place for his temple.

The temple on earth was "like the heights," which may denote the high mountains or the heavenly temple. God's presence on earth is connected with the Lord Jesus, who himself said that he is the temple of God (Jn 2:19–21). David was taken from shepherding the flocks to take care of God's flock, "his inheritance." He proved himself wise by being upright in the midst of a stubborn people. He guided their national, political, and religious interests with "understanding." The promises pertaining to God's kingdom, messianic rule, and presence find their focus in Jesus the Messiah. All who receive him as the Messiah of God find in him the "bread . . .

from heaven" (Jn 6:41), the water of life (Jn 7:37–39), and life everlasting (Jn 11:25–26)!

Psalm 79: Lord, Remember the Sheep of Your Pasture

This lament was written probably on the occasion of Jerusalem's fall and the subsequent exile of Judah. Its structure reflects the characteristic elements of the national lament: questions, prayer, and hope.

I. Lament (79:1–4)

1–2 The lament focuses on the grief caused by the enemies. They showed no respect for the land and people of God or for the city of God. The psalmist laments over the unburied bodies of those who fell by the ravages of warfare. Because their relatives were too busy trying to survive the siege or were in exile, the dead were left to the wild animals and the birds of prey. The lack of burial was considered a terrible fate.

3–4 The enemies of Judah had no regard for God or for his people. Blood, i.e., human lives, was like run-off water. Those who were left had no reason to rejoice. They carried the reproach and scorn of their oppressors.

II. Question (79:5)

5 The heart-rending "how long" is a cry from a wounded people. Having received a severe blow, they ask not why but how long they must suffer. God is angry because of their sins. His jealous anger is so great that it is likened to a consuming fire.

III. Prayer for Vindication and Forgiveness (79:6–9)

6–7 Justice must be done because of the conduct of the heathen. They had no regard for God, nor did they call on his name (cf. 75:1). Instead they desecrated and destroyed God's land and people.

8 The remnant in exile believed that they had been spared for a reason. The prayer "Do not hold against us" is a humble petition for forgiveness, a request for God to blot out any memory of the accumulation of iniquities of the past generations. They were in "desperate need" of God's mercy, which brings reconciliation, forgiveness, and restoration.

9 Hope looks to God as "our Savior" (GK 3829). He is the Deliverer of his children, but they have to submit themselves to him as they await his salvation. They appeal to his glorious name, which he has revealed to Israel. The idea of redemption means deliverance from the enemies and forgiveness for sins "for [his] name's sake" (i.e., by his grace). The sins are not only those of their ancestors but also those of the present generation.

IV. Question (79:10a)

10a The psalmist renews his reflection on the reproach and the scorn caused by the heathen nations. In view of their atrocities and the glory of the Lord's name, why should their taunt be tolerated any longer?

V. Prayer for Vindication and Restoration (79:10b–13)

10b The prayer of the godly is that the Lord will deal justly and speedily with those who have disgraced his people. Those who have witnessed the spilling of the innocent blood around Jerusalem (v.3) are not filled with hatred and bitterness. Rather, their words express the cry of a needy and suffering people who look toward their heavenly Father for deliverance.

11 At the time of the Exodus, God had seen the affliction of his people and had heard their groanings (Ex 2:24; 6:5). The people in exile, feeling like prisoners "condemned to die," are not unlike those in Egypt. They too groan for the moment of their deliverance and pray that the Lord will rise up and deliver them with his strong "arm."

12–13 The sevenfold restitution expresses a concern for full justice. The judgment must be equal to the severity of the reproach of God's name! The psalm concludes on a note of hope, as God's people are still "the sheep" of his pasture. They anticipate praising God for their redemption from the oppressors and for their forgiveness.

Psalm 80: Make Your Face to Shine on Us

The psalm is a community lament. Its origin may be associated with the last days of Israel (c. 732–722 B.C.).

I. Prayer for Deliverance (80:1–3)

1–2 God's judgment on Israel ("Joseph") is not because he has not shown his regard or love for them. He cared for the northern tribes as much as he cared for the southern tribes. He is the Great Shepherd who dwelt in the midst of his people. The psalmist prays that the Lord may open his ear and "shine forth" in his glorious array as the Divine Warrior. The Lord has the "might" to show his "salvation" (GK 3802; NIV, "save") to his people.

3 God's people are the objects of his wrath. Only he can "restore" (GK 8740) them by forgiveness of their sins, by renewal of the covenant, and by driving out the enemies. When the face of the Lord shines on his people, they are blessed with his presence and favor and will be "saved."

II. The Lord's Present Anger (80:4–7)

4–7 The "LORD God Almighty" (GK 7372; lit., "of hosts") can marshal all the hosts of heaven to the aid of his people. However, he can also use the hosts on earth to judge the nations, including Israel. God is angry with his people; though they pray for his grace and blessing, it is without avail. Instead, they suffer from oppression and ridicule. Their food and drink are nothing but "tears" in great abundance. Their enemies "mock" at them. The godly ask how long the Lord's anger will linger, as they long for divine salvation.

III. The Lord's Past Mercy (80:8–14a)

8–11 Israel is frequently likened to a vine (cf. Isa 5:1–7; 27:2–6; et al.). The Lord brought them out of Egypt and into the land of Canaan. He cared for him like a vinedresser as he cleared the ground, planted the vine, and nurtured it. Israel occupied the land, subdued the people, and controlled the nations from the Euphrates ("the River") in the east and "the mighty cedars" of the Lebanon mountains in the north to the Mediterranean on the west. The people had enjoyed the full possession of the land during the days of David and Solomon (2Sa 8:3; 1Ki 4:21).

12–14a Though God had extended much care to Israel in fulfillment of his promises, he had permitted his vineyard to be taken over by "boars" and by wild creatures. The people pray that "God Almighty" may look again with kindness on his vine with his mighty acts of salvation and rule.

IV. Prayer for Deliverance (80:14b–19)

14b–19 Israel is like a "root." However, the people have become a useless vine. They perished by the "rebuke" of God's anger. They pray that the Lord will sustain them in their hour of need so that the renewal of his favor will lead to a new commitment for Israel. The ground of hope in restoration lies in "the man at your right hand," also called "the son of man." These allusions to the Davidic dynasty focus the hope of the godly in the continuity of God's redemptive purposes.

Psalm 81: If My People Would But Listen to Me

The psalm is associated with a feast appointed by the Lord. The feast is a part of a complex of festivals beginning with the New Year's festival on the first day of the seventh month (Tishri), followed by the Day of Atonement on the tenth day and the Feast of Tabernacles on the fifteenth. This psalm was an appropriate "invitation" to covenant renewal during the feast, when God's people reflected on all his acts in the past and on their hope for the future.

I. Festal Hymn (81:1–5)

1–5 In hymnic form the covenant community is called on to celebrate the festivals corporately. Together they sing joyously to the accompaniment of musical instruments. The "full moon" fell on the fifteenth of the lunar month and coincided in the seventh month with the Feast of Tabernacles. This festival was of the greatest import in the OT and was also known as "the feast" (here "our Feast"). Its purpose was to proclaim aloud the mighty acts of the Lord in the history of salvation, beginning with the Exodus. The Lord ordained his people to observe this Feast, together with the other festivals, as his "decree," "ordinance," and "statute."

II. Oracle of the Lord (81:6–16)

A. God's Past Care (81:6–7)

6–7 The Lord had freed Israel from the oppressive tasks in Egypt, where they had carried "baskets" with clay and bricks in various building projects (cf. Ex 1:11). Israel had groaned under the burdens and prayed for deliverance (Ex 2:23–24; 6:5), and the Lord had saved them. In addition, he had also spoken to them at Mount Sinai "out of a thundercloud" (cf.18:7–15; also Ex 19:18–19; 20:18). Without comment, the Lord reminds his people of the tragic incident at Meribah (Ex 17:1–7; Nu 20:1–13).

B. Exhortation to Listen (81:8–10)

8–10 The Lord expected his redeemed and consecrated people to conform to his likeness by listening to and obeying his commandments. Throughout the wilderness experiences he had supplied all their needs and had promised rich blessings for those who would respond wholeheartedly to him. The Lord is always ready to "fill" the needs of his people.

C. God's Judgment on Rebellious Israel (81:11–12)

11–12 Instead of loyalty to the Lord, born out of gratitude for their redemption and for the promises of the future, the Israelites continued in rebellion. They did not listen or submit to the Lord. Therefore God abandoned his own people. They were treated as "stubborn" children.

D. Exhortation to Listen (81:13)

13 The grace of God is so great that he cannot abandon his people completely. He again laments his people's obdurateness. Their problems can be resolved only by the direct intervention of the Lord. To this end he holds out the glorious future before them as a real possibility (vv.14–16).

E. God's Future Care (81:14–16)

14–16 The Lord is able to deliver his people. If they commit themselves to him, he will protect them and subjugate their "foes." His deliverance will be quick and lasting because his "hand" will press hard on their enemies and cause them to suffer punishment "forever." The Lord will richly supply the needs of his repentant people. He will lavish on them the best care ("the finest of wheat" and "honey from the rock").

Psalm 82: The Judgment of God in the Great Assembly

The psalm declares that all powers, real and imagined, are subject to God.

I. God's Judgment Over the Gods (82:1)

1 God is ready to judge, "presiding" (GK 2205) as the Great Judge. For Israel there is no other God than the Lord. He embodies within himself all the epithets and powers attributed to pagan deities. There are three options for explaining "the great assembly" of the "gods." The gods are: (1) human judges who are condemned by the Great Judge for being unjust; (2) the principalities and the powers of other nations that oppress Israel; (3) pagan deities judged by God, who rule the darkness of the world.

II. Judicial Questioning (82:2)

2 God calls "the gods" of the nations to account, indicting them on two counts: they are unjust, and they are evil.

III. God's Expectations of Justice (82:3–4)

3–4 The Lord accuses the gods of irresponsibility to his just rule, for they do not show concern for justice. The gods of the nations have failed. Failure to observe God's decrees inevitably leads to his condemnation.

IV. God's Condemnation of Evil (82:5)

5 The "gods" stand condemned by their folly, moral darkness, and destruction of God's order. Their rule is nothing but "darkness," i.e., "evil." The "gods" further their own powers by destroying the "foundations of the earth," a metaphor for God's rule on earth. Even in pagan nations the Lord has established some order by common grace, and he holds the ungodly accountable for their reign of terror and self-aggrandizement at the expense of his order.

V. Judicial Sentence (82:6–7)

6–7 Though the gods were known as "the sons of the Most High" in Canaanite mythology, they cannot be! They do not reflect the concerns of God with justice, morality, and order. In this pretend trial the Lord declares the "gods" to be nothing more than "mortals," i.e., "mere men" (GK 132). Hence, God implicitly condemns all humans who adopt the pagan way of life.

VI. God's Judgment Over the Earth (82:8)

8 The godly respond by anticipating that one day the God who judged the nongods to extinction will advance his judgment on earth. Our Lord's prayer ("your kingdom come") is most appropriate whenever we experience injustice. The Lord alone is God; there is no other!

Psalm 83: A Lament Concerning the Presence of Evil

This psalm is a national lament in which the psalmist prays for the Lord's intervention against many enemies. This is the last psalm in the collection of psalms attributed to Asaph (50; 73–83).

I. Prayer for God's Action (83:1)

1 The psalmist addresses the only true God, who is none other than "the LORD," the "Most High" (v.18). With this in mind, he prays that God may act on behalf of his people.

II. Plottings of the Enemies (83:2–4)

2–4 The enemies "are astir" like armies preparing for an attack. They "rear their heads" as an expression of overt hostility and confidence. Their enmity is against God and his people, wanting nothing less than their total annihilation.

III. Greatness of the Opposition (83:5–8)

5 The psalmist rephrases the intent and the manner of the opposition. The nations are "against" the Lord himself and not just against God's people. They have made an "alliance" against him as an expression of solidarity.

6–8 The psalmist further specifies ten nations who "hate" the Lord: (1) Edomites (the descendants of Esau); (2) Ishmaelites (descendants of Ishmael; cf. Ge 16:15–16; 25:12–18); (3) Moabites (descendants of Lot); (4) "Hagrites" (a nomadic tribe living east of the Jordan); (5) the people of Gebal (uncertain); (6) Ammonites (also descendants of Lot); (7) Amalekites (a nomadic tribe descended from Esau; cf. Ex 17:8–13; Jdg 6:3); (8) Philistines; (9) the people of Tyre; (10) Assyrians (Israel's enemy to the north).

IV. Great Acts of God in Israel's History (83:9–12)

9–12 The future judgment of God is mirrored in the great acts of the Lord in Israel's history. The psalmist selects events from the period of the judges (cf. Jdg 4–8). The omission of the names of the judges indicates that the primary deliverer was the Lord himself! The victory over the Midianites and their rulers was a reason for the Israelites to rejoice.

V. Shaming of the Enemies (83:13–16)

13–15 The psalmist likens the enemies' lot to that of "tumbleweed," "chaff," and "forest." The psalmist prays that the Lord will destroy their enemies like "fire" destroys forests and the vegetation on the mountains. He also prays that the Lord will confound the plotting of the wicked as by a "tempest" and "storm."

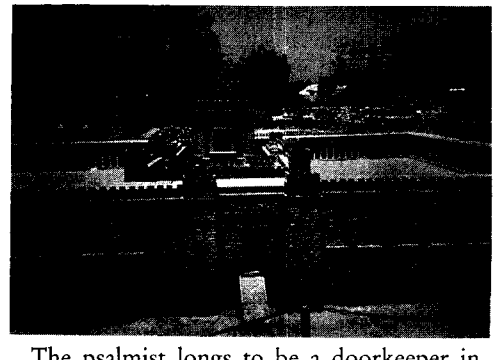
16 The confidence of the nations will be shaken by God's sovereign presence. The psalmist prays for the Lord to change their pride and boasting to "shame" (GK 7830). However, he shows a deep awareness of God's gracious nature as he opens a door to those among the nations who will seek the "name" of the Lord.

VI. Prayer for God's Action (83:17–18)

17–18 The psalmist trusts that the Lord will confound the wicked who scheme against him and the chosen people of God. He also prays that the nations may come to "know" the Lord as sovereign Ruler and as the covenant Lord. "Name" (GK 9005) signifies not only the benefits of forgiveness, grace, and mercy to those who love him but also his powerful acts of judgment.

Psalm 84: A Deep Longing for the Presence of God

This psalm contains a collage of diverse genres: hymn, prayer, lament, and a song of Zion. Its setting may reflect a festive procession to Jerusalem during one of the festivals.



The psalmist longs to be a doorkeeper in the house of the Lord, i.e., in the temple courts (84:10).

I. Longing for the Courts of the Lord Almighty (84:1–4)

1–4 The love for the "dwelling place" (GK 5438) of the Lord is foremost in the heart of the psalmist as he reflects on the temple proper as the place of God's symbolic presence, together with "the courts," where the worshipers and pilgrims assembled. He physically longs for the experience of God's presence. His total attention is on the "LORD Almighty," the Great King, who is the "living God."

Reflecting on the temple courts, the psalmist pictures the birds that make their nests in the temple eaves. The common birds have their nests and raise their young close to the "altar" of the Lord Almighty. The thought of these lowly birds in such a glorious place overwhelms the psalmist, who expresses his awe in the form of a blessing. As God's blessing was not limited to the temple courts, the blessing on those "who dwell" (GK 3782) in the house of the Lord may well be extended to all who do the will of God.

II. The Blessing on the Pilgrims (84:5–7)

5–7 The psalmist blesses all who have put their confidence ("strength") in the Lord. They trust the Lord for refuge, especially in times of need. The second part of the description is far from clear; as the NIV interprets it, it suggests a pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

The blessedness of God's presence and help finds expression in the processional imagery of a road, a desert, and the abundance of water as the people of God pass from adversity (exile) to the blessedness of his presence in "Zion" (v.7). Faith in God is the ultimate goal, transforming weak people into those who "go from strength to strength" and the Valley of Baca into springs and pools (both images of God's blessings).

III. Prayer for God's Blessing on the King (84:8–9)

8–9 The psalmist turns to the Lord in a prayer for the king ("your anointed one"; GK 5431), who is the "shield" (i.e., protector) of his people. Since he too is dependent on the Lord's blessing, the psalmist prays that the Great King may extend his goodness to the earthly ruler.

IV. Hymnic Praise (84:10–11)

10–11 The psalmist esteems one day of fellowship with God in service as a temple guard a thousand times better than receiving public recognition and wealth. The "sun" is symbolic of the era of restoration, often referred to by the words "light" and "brightness." "Favor" (GK 8354) is God's expression of grace by which he draws near to his own and shares his "glory" with them. As a result of this fellowship, he will shower all his "goodness" on those who walk in a "blameless" manner.

V. The Blessing of God (84:12)

12 The psalm ends by encouraging everybody to seek the Lord by putting their trust in him. "Blessed" (GK 897) are those who submit to the Great King, who grants his blessings to those who find their refuge in him.

Psalm 85: Surely His Salvation Is Near!

In the context of some national catastrophe, the people of God cry out for deliverance from adversity. This psalm is a national lament.

I. Proclamation of God's Past Acts (85:1–3)

1–3 Restoration for Israel resulted from God's sovereign acts of grace: removal of wrath and his forgiving of sin. The "wrath" and "fierce anger" of God occurred when his holiness had been offended by the sin and transgression of his people. They had been dispossessed of their lands, bereft of children and loved ones, and despoiled by the enemies. But the Lord graciously forgave the sins of his people. His forgiveness implies the removal of both sins and the consequences of sin. God exchanged his wrath for his "favor" (GK 8354). The "land" is his land and the people his people!

II. Laments and Prayer for Restoration (85:4–7)

4–7 The psalmist laments the recent problems that have deprived God's people of enjoyment of God's favor. He interprets them as expressions of God's "displeasure" (GK 4088). The lamenting community prays that the Lord will "restore" (GK 8740) them by extending the benefits of his "unfailing love" (GK 2876)—which is synonymous with the enjoyment of God's "salvation" (GK 3829), because salvation extends the benefits of God to his people: victory, peace, and enjoyment of this life and the life to come.

III. Anticipation of God's Salvation (85:8)

8 In submission to the Lord, the people await his response. They receive assurance that the Lord "promises peace" and will thus grant them relief from their grief. After all, they are "his people, his saints."

IV. The Oracle of Hope (85:9–13)

9 God's "salvation" is "near," but only those "who fear him" in the spirit of wisdom will inherit his benefits. The fullness of salvation brings his people "glory" (GK 3883), as they share in the benefits of God's victory. God shares his glory with his own.

10–11 God alone can send "love" (GK 2876), "faithfulness" (GK 622), "righteousness" (GK 7406), and "peace" (GK 8934) as his messengers to accomplish his purpose. The four divine attributes are portrayed here as meeting and kissing one another. The Lord is the source of unfailing love. His love is faithful and his faithfulness is expressed in love. The new era establishes his "righteousness," expressive of the evident kingship of God in and over his people. The extent of these benefits is further guaranteed by the contrastive complementary usage of "earth" and "heaven" in the sense of "everything."

12 The promises of God extend to the enjoyment of the land. His blessings result in the enjoyment of "what is good," i.e., the "harvest."

13 The psalm began by reflecting on God's past acts of salvation, and it ends by looking forward to final redemption. "Righteousness" (GK 7406), personified as a messenger, denotes God's final victory and salvation. Those who fear him will enjoy the benefits of his kingdom of "righteousness."

Psalm 86: Give Me a Sign of Your Goodness

This is the only psalm associated with David in the third book of Psalms. It is an individual lament psalm. His plea for mercy is based on his own needs, the lordship of God, his unique status as God's servant, and the nature of God.

I. Prayer for Mercy and Confession of Confidence (86:1–5)

1–5 In his confession of need, David humbles himself in the presence of his God as a needy creature. He prays that the Lord will "hear" and answer his prayer by guarding his "life" (lit., "soul"; GK 5883, a word signifying the whole person). Hope begins with submitting oneself fully to the protection of God and is demonstrated by absolute loyalty to him. The psalmist trusts in the Lord and waits for his gracious response. He alone can transform adversity into "joy." The Lord has promised to extend his benefits to all who call on him: his goodness, forgiveness, and love.

II. Prayer for Mercy (86:6–7)

6–7 The prayer is for God's "mercy." The phrase "cry for mercy" (GK 7754 & 9384) is a prayer from a needy heart. The prayer exudes confidence in the Lord's help in the "day of my trouble."

III. Hymn of Confidence in the Lord (86:8–10)

8–10 The anticipation for God's favorable response leads into a hymnic expression of the greatness of God. There is no other God like the Lord, whose "deeds" are "marvelous" and "great." David affirms his confidence in his God by proclaiming his great acts, by affirming his wholehearted commitment to the God who "alone" can do these wonders, and by expressing his belief that all people will one day submit themselves to the Lord and join with Israel in worshiping the Lord. They too will "bring glory" by bringing him their offerings and by obeying him. The Lord alone is God, and the gods of the nations are worthless.

IV. Anticipation of Deliverance (86:11–13)

11–12 In the confidence that the Lord will have mercy on him, the psalmist looks beyond the present troubles to his own renewed commitment to the Lord. In his desire to walk wisely in the presence of God, he asks for guidance and a new heart—an "undivided heart." He longs for inner renewal so that he may walk "in your truth" and "fear your name" (i.e., gain a heart of wisdom; cf. Pr 1:7). This renewed commitment finds expression in words of praise to the Lord and glorious acts of obeisance to him.

13 The affirmation of confidence presupposes that this great God will and does deliver those who call on him. He remains true to his nature (vv.5, 13, 15), i.e., his "love" (GK 2876). Adversity is like "the depths of the grave" (or better "of Sheol"). Though "Sheol" (GK 8619) may denote the realm of the dead, it also connotes the experience of adversity that ultimately may be likened to death.

V. Prayer for Deliverance (86:14–17)

14–15 The "arrogant" and "ruthless men" may be a personification of adversity. In this world of alienation, the godly are often are the object of persecution. Confidence is in the covenant God, who is known by his qualities of compassion, grace, patience, love, and fidelity.

16–17 The psalmist repeats the prayer for divine "mercy" (cf. vv.3, 6). He looks as a "servant" for the "strength" of the Lord. He is "the son of your maidservant" (or "your faithful son"; see NIV note). The "sign" (GK 253) of God's goodness is some evidence of the Lord's care for his servant. He has cast himself on the promises of God, on his past great and marvelous acts, and on his attributes. He prays that his faith will triumph and that the enemies of God may witness the evidences of the Lord's fidelity so as to shame them.

Psalm 87: Glorious Things of Thee Are Spoken

As rich as the theology of this psalm is, its exegesis has raised many issues. It is usually associated with the Zion Psalms (48; 76; 84; 122; 137).

I. Hymn in Praise of Zion (87:1–2)

1–2 Zion, the city of God, symbolizes God's kingdom presence. He has established it on earth (cf. Heb 11:10) by entering into a covenant relationship with Israel (cf. 114:2). Jerusalem was located on a mountain, often designated as Mount Zion or God's "holy mountain" (99:9; cf. 3:4; 15:1; Isa 11:9; 65:25). The special quality of Jerusalem did not reside in her natural holiness but in the "love" of God. The phrase "the gates of Zion" is a poetic reference to "Zion." "Dwellings of Jacob" may denote the Israelite cities that have not been chosen as the religious center.

II. God's Register in Heaven (87:3–6)

3–6 The psalmist suddenly changes his focus from the earthly Jerusalem to the glorious future of the "city of God," about which he is ecstatic. The Lord himself has revealed the glories of Zion through his prophets. Among the nations he records are Rahab (meaning Egypt), Babylon, Philistia, Tyre, and Cush. These nations represent the various powers that dominated much of Israel's history as oppressors, troublers, and enticers. Regardless of the past, individuals from these nations may still participate in God's "city." The participants are "those who acknowledge" (GK 3359) him, i.e., who worship the Lord as the living God. On this confession their names are recorded as having been "born in Zion." Thus Zion here goes beyond the city on earth to the city of God, where all the names of the godly are recorded.

III. The Joy in Zion (87:7)

7 The psalmist concludes with a scene on earth. The crowds in the earthly Jerusalem are celebrating the glory of Zion: "All my fountains are found in you." Zion is associated with "the fountain of life," of "salvation" (Isa 12:3), "a river whose streams make glad the city of God" (Ps 46:4).

Psalm 88: A Prayer in the Darkness of Despair

This is an individual lament psalm in which the psalmist knows nothing but sorrow. However, even in the darkness of his grief, he turns to the Lord for deliverance.

I. Prayer for Help (88:1–2)

1–2 In the midst of tribulation, faith holds on to the God who has promised to deliver. In his suffering and perpetual anguish, the psalmist prays day and night with the hope that the Lord will respond to his prayer. This prayer is a deeply piercing shout for divine help.

II. The Experience of Dying in Life (88:3–5)

3–5 The psalmist's adversity has been with him for so long that he is satiated, but not with God's blessings. He is so deeply galled that he feels his life ebbing away from him. He exists like a shade, "a man without strength." He further compares himself with an unknown soldier who together with "the slain" was buried in a mass grave. He experiences the absence of God, like those who are dead. He does not deny God's remembrance and care but is speaking the way adversity often appears to people.

III. It Is the Lord's Doing (88:6–9a)

6–9a The lament turns into an accusation. He feels like a dead man, having been placed by God in "the lowest pit" and in "the darkest depths." God has treated him like the wicked. Therefore he indicts God with oppressing him unjustly and with removing even his "closest friends." God's "wrath" has overpowered him like "waves," leaving him utterly helpless. His situation is like that of Job.

IV. Prayer for Help (88:9b–12)

9b–12 In his "grief" the psalmist continually entreats the Lord. The Lord had shown to his people his "wonders," "faithfulness," "love," and "righteous deeds"; the psalmist, however, feels far removed from God's righteous deeds. If he were to go to "the grave," he would be unable to praise God. He speaks about death as a place where there is nothing but "darkness." He longs for the Lord's full deliverance and his covenant mercy.

V. It Is the Lord's Doing (88:13–14)

13–14 In his torment the psalmist he has called on the Lord "every day" (v.9), and he keeps on bringing his petitions before him "in the morning." His persistent prayers mark him as a godly man who believes in the Lord's righteousness and fidelity, but he still feels rejected. The depth of despair is most acutely experienced by those who have tasted the goodness of God and the closeness of communion with him.

VI. The Experience of Dying in Life (88:15–18)

15–18 The lament concludes by tying together the major themes. (1) The psalmist has suffered for a long time. (2) He is completely engulfed by adversity and sees no way of escape. (3) He is exhausted to the point of "despair" (GK 7041) because of his inability to cope with the Lord's "terrors." (4) He knows that the Lord is sovereign even in calamity. (5) He is abandoned to himself and to his God. He prays for deliverance all alone, separated even from his "closest friend." Though the psalm ends on a lament, faith triumphs, because in everything the psalmist has learned to look to "the God who saves" (v.1).

Psalm 89: Will You Reject Us Forever?

There is little agreement on the type or genre of the psalm.

I. A Hymn of the Lord's Kingship (89:1–18)

A. Individual Praise of the Lord's Kingship (89:1–2)

1–2 The theme of this portion of the psalm is in praise of the Lord's "great love" (GK 2876). That love is constant, as promised and confirmed in the covenant. His commitment to David is guaranteed by God's rule over "heaven." The Lord has established his "faithfulness" to David far from the changes of this earthly scene.

B. the Lord's Fidelity to David (89:3–4)

3–4 The Lord is committed to David, his "chosen one" and "servant." "Chosen one" (GK 1040) emphasizes the special "covenant" (GK 1382) relationship as the king is elected by the Lord himself to serve in his behalf. "Servant" (GK 6269) emphasizes the special role of being the Lord's representative to the people. Even when the party with whom the Lord makes his covenant breaks it, its binding nature obligates the Lord to fulfill its terms. He himself will "establish" (GK 3922) the rule of Davidic dynasty.

C. Heavenly Praise of the Lord's Kingship (89:5–8)

5–8 The Lord has established his love in heaven. Rather than being jealous of David's special privileges on earth, heaven rejoices in God's kingship. His rule is unquestioned by "the holy ones" (the "heavenly beings"). They praise God for his "wonders" and "faithfulness." He is "greatly feared," "awesome," and "mighty." The heavenly hosts serve him willingly as "God Almighty." They constantly stand in awe of the splendor of the Lord.

D. The Lord's Universal Rule (89:9–13)

9–13 The Lord's rule is also found on earth, extending even to the wild and foaming sea. Rahab, possibly identical with Leviathan (cf. 74:14; 104:26), represents any overt expression of hostility, such as that of the Egyptians (cf. 87:4; Isa 30:7; Eze 29:3; 32:2), who were defeated at the Red Sea (cf. Ex 14:15). The Lord's sovereignty over the earth was established when he created everything. Mounts Tabor and Hermon join together with all creation in praising the Lord. All creation witnesses to his dominion, strength, and victorious rule, symbolized by "your arm" and "your hand."

E. The Lord's Fidelity and Congregational Praise (89:14–18)

14 The Lord's rule is full of "righteousness and justice." More than that, he is also full of "love and faithfulness."

15–18 The subjects of his rule are "blessed" under his administration, joining with creation in praise of their Redeemer. Unlike creation God's people benefit from his personal presence, "righteousness," exaltation, and protection. The true subjects have learned to exult in his name, rely on his favor, acknowledge his sovereignty, and respond to his holy presence.

II. The Covenant With David (89:19–37)

These verses share words and thoughts with 2Sa 7:4–17. The covenant with David was a further development of the Abrahamic and Sinaitic covenants.

A. Word of Promise (89:19–29)

1. Choice of David (89:19–23)

19–20 The Lord revealed through the prophet Nathan "in a vision" (cf. 2Sa 7:4) that he had chosen David to be his "servant . . . anointed" with "sacred oil." The Lord "exalted" him, bestowing on him "strength."

21–23 The real source of David's power and authority lay in the Lord's presence and purpose. The mighty "hand" and "arm" of the Lord strengthened David in all his exploits. No one could say that David was strong by himself. The goal of the Lord's succor was to extend his dominion over earth. Since his purposes stand, no power on earth can thwart him.

2. Promise of universal reign (89:24–25)

24–25 The Lord himself will increase David's regime and cause it to flourish. His love and fidelity will surround David. In his name all the Lord's promises toward David will be fulfilled. The glory bestowed on David will ultimately be recognized by all nations.

3. Promise of messianic reign (89:26–27)

26–27 The messianic ruler will be treated as a son rather than as a vassal or servant. In this relationship he will more fully experience God's power of deliverance as "the Rock my Savior." The primacy over the nations is given to the Davidic king. He is recognized as "my firstborn," even as Israel is the "firstborn" of the Lord (Ex 4:22; cf. Jer 31:9; Rev 1:5). Furthermore, he is "the most exalted" king among the nations.

4. Choice of descendants (89:28–29)

28–29 The Lord renews his commitment to David in affirming his "covenant" of "love" and "faithfulness," which extend "forever," as long "as the heavens endure."

B. Word of Warning (89:30–37)

In assuring the Davidic dynasty glory, divine support, and continuity, these promises are conditional. The responsibility lies on each king to fulfill his role as a representative of God's rule on earth.

1. Warning (89:30–32)

30–32 The Lord expects the Davidic king to be loyal to him by keeping his law, statutes, decrees, and commands. "Sin" and "iniquity" are expressions of rebellion against the Lord. The penalty for disobedience was severe: The Lord would not withhold "the rod" (GK 8657), a symbol of authority and an instrument of inflicting wounds.

2. Affirmation of love (89:33–34)

33–34 Yet the "love" (GK 2876) of God outweighs his judgment. Though he may discipline severely, he will still extend his love to David's offspring. The Lord will never "violate" his own covenant; what he has promised by oath stands.

3. Affirmation of promised word (89:35–37)

35–37 The emphasis here lies on the fidelity of God. His commitment to David's place in the history of redemption is such that it is on a par with the heavens (cf. v.29). The covenant with David is so important to the Lord that he has sworn by himself that David's lineage will be seated on the "throne" (GK 4058), symbol of divinely granted authority over the earth.

III. A Lament (89:38–51)

A. Complaints Against God (89:38–45)

38–40 The God who decreed the Davidic covenant (v.19) has "rejected" (GK 2396) his "anointed one" (GK 5431). In his anger he seems completely unconcerned with his covenant. The acts of casting the crown into the dust, spurning the covenant, and destroying the fortifications are usually associated with the activities of Israel's enemies. Here, however, God is the perpetrator of the hostile acts. The Lord has abandoned his people and rejected the covenant of "love," i.e., the covenant with David.

41–45 Instead of coming to the support of his own people, the Lord has given victory to Israel's enemies because the Lord raised their "right hand." With Israel's defeat David's crown and honor are cast to the ground. It appears that the Lord has flouted every promise made to David, including the perpetuity of his dynasty. The image of the "mantle of shame" denotes the disgrace of the Davidic dynasty.

B. Questions and Petitions (89:46–51)

46–51 The questions here bring out the intensity of the psalmist's agony. If the Lord continues to hide his face and to maintain his "wrath," faith and hope may yield to despair. Hence the psalmist prays to the Lord to remember that his people are human. The phrase "how fleeting is my life" underscores that need, as the psalmist pleads with the Lord to renew his "love" during his lifetime. Instead of enjoying God's acts of his "former great love" sworn to David, the people are perishing and the "anointed one" is mocked. The psalm ends on a note of disorientation, a paradox with the opening affirmation of God's love. What a shocking contrast!

IV. Doxology (89:52)

52 The third book of Psalms concludes on a doxology. In spite of the concluding questions raised by Ps 89, the doxology affirms the necessity to praise the Lord as an appropriate response to all circumstances in life.

Book IV: Psalms 90–106

Psalm 90: Teach Us to Number Our Days

This psalm is a reflection on the transience of life. The superscription attributes it to Moses.

I. The Lord Is God (90:1–2)

1 The psalm begins with and ends on an affirmation of God as "the Lord" (GK 151), the Creator and Ruler of the universe. The Lord himself has been Israel's "dwelling place" (GK 5061), the oasis of refreshment and encampment for his people for many generations. The metaphor is related to the imagery of God's protection.

2 The psalmist expresses the greatness of God's fatherly care in the imagery of birth. It is not entirely clear who is giving birth: God or the earth? More likely it is the earth giving rise to mountains, but not apart from the creative role of the Lord in the process of the formation of the earth (cf. Ge 1:11, 20). The confessional statement "you are God" affirms both God's kingship over creation and his otherness.

II. God's Authority Over Humanity (90:3–6)

3–6 In comparison with God, humanity is nothing but "dust." In comparison with God's eternity, a person's brief span of life is likened to "new grass," which shoots up only shortly to be parched. "Morning" and "evening" depict the brevity of life. Even if someone were to live to a thousand years, in God's reckoning it would be but "a day" or, even less, "a watch in the night" (i.e., a four-hour period). We may look at our fellow beings as strong; but as far as God is concerned, they may be swept away as by the waters of the flood.

III. God's Wrath (90:7–10)

7–10 The psalmist explains that human frailty and anxiety are an expression of God's judgment. The Lord's "anger" and "wrath" create a barrier between the Lord and us, as we become more aware of our "iniquities" and "secret sins." "Iniquity" (GK 6411) denotes our awareness of sin, and "secret" (GK 6623) sins are those hidden from the public eye but seen by the Lord. Since the Lord sees every sin we commit, his wrath is always there. Our lives are therefore marked by brevity and by vexation.

IV. Proper Response to God's Wrath (90:11–12)

11–12 Human beings generally do not pay attention to the divine law of sin and retribution. The question "Who knows. . . ?" is to be understood as a strong affirmation: "Nobody knows. . . !" But those who fear the Lord are fully aware of the fierceness of his anger. To "number" (GK 4948) one's days is an act of recognition of the vast difference between God and finite humanity. The wise reckon continually with God's existence and human accountability. They pray for "a heart of wisdom" and are receptive to divine revelation/instruction: "teach us." Wisdom begins and ends with the fear of the Lord (cf. 111:10; Pr 1:7).

V. Prayer for God's Mercy (90:13–16)

13–16 The psalmist's prayer consists of three elements. (1) He prays for restoration to God's favor. Though they are suffering, they are still his "servants," and they are waiting patiently for a new beginning (cf. "in the morning") of the "compassion" of their Master. The favor of God is particularly known as his "unfailing love" (GK 2876). (2) The psalmist prays that the Lord will restore the joy of his people's salvation. They have sung and will continue to sing of God's "deeds," longing for a renewed demonstration of them. (3) God's people long for the continuity of divine blessings rather than an occasional evidence of his love.

VI. May the Lord Be Our God (90:17)

17 In conclusion the psalmist prays that God's "favor" may rest on his people and "establish" (GK 3922) them as having value. The Lord's acceptance of his own assures a certain permanence of their work. Life under the sun may be vain; those under God's judgment can accomplish no ultimate good. But frail and sinful as human beings are, the love of God can transform what is weak to his own glory.

Psalm 91: In the Shelter of the Most High

Psalm 91 contains both a wisdom psalm (vv.1–13) and a divine oracle (vv.14–16).

I. Invitation to the Protection of God (91:1–2)

1–2 The blessings of godliness and the pursuit of wisdom are for all who seek God as their highest good in life. To this end the psalmist employs several names for God: "Most High" (GK 6609), "the Almighty" (GK 8724), "the LORD" (GK 3378), and "my God" (GK 466). These names evoke confidence in the power of the Creator God and in the endearing love of the covenant Lord.

The description of God's protection contained in this psalm is couched in metaphorical language. "Shelter" and "shadow" suggest the imagery of a mother bird under whose wings baby birds find safety. "Refuge" and "fortress" suggest a military installation. Thus, those who trust in the Lord enjoy his hospitality and protection.

II. Forms of Protection (91:3–8)

3–4 The Lord protects his people from any adversity by evil people, likened to "the fowler's snare" and "the deadly pestilence." He protects them as with feathers (cf. "his wings"). The "shield" and "rampart" develop the imagery of "refuge" and "fortress." The Lord's care is both tender and sufficient because he is faithful to his people.

5–7 The protection of God extends to both day and night. He gives security from all natural and supernatural causes of "fear." Afflictions come on the wicked as just expressions of God's provocation, but those who fear him need not be afraid of the "arrow" that brings diseases. There is no limit to his protection because he has full authority over all things that happen on earth. The greatness of God's protection is further amplified by the ratio of "a thousand" or even "ten thousand" to one.

8 Seeing God's salvation with the eye of faith further encourages the godly, whom the Lord has promised to protect and bless. The godly will witness the justice and fidelity of the Lord as well as the punishment of the wicked.

III. Invitation to the Protection of God (91:9–10)

9–10 The psalmist's personal experience encourages people to embrace the way of wisdom by making "the Most High" one's "dwelling" (GK 5061). In him they find "refuge," and they can be confident that whatever happens on earth is with his knowledge. Nothing happens outside his will, whether "harm" or "disaster."

IV. Forms of Protection (91:11–13)

11–13 The Lord charges "his angels" with the protection of the godly, wherever they may be. They have been charged with lifting the godly out of danger and delivering them. The Lord may permit many things to happen to his children, but they know that no power is outside God's control.

V. The Oracle of Salvation (91:14–16)

14–16 The Lord announces his salvation oracle to all who "love" him and "acknowledge" (GK 3359) his name. "Love" (GK 3137) signifies a deep longing or desire for the Lord. The fullness of his redemption becomes real in those who long for it. The relationship finds expression in communion, in answered prayers, and in the rewards due to wise living. The Lord assures his own that they will enjoy themselves in this life and in the life to come. They will see his "salvation" (GK 3802).

Psalm 92: In Praise of the Lord

Psalm 92 embodies a hymn (vv.1–3) and an individual thanksgiving (vv.4–15).

I. Hymn in Praise of the Most High (92:1–3)

1–3 "Praise," "make music," and "proclaim" all accent the place of praise as an external response to the acts of God. The Lord expects his people to respond in exclamation of his "name" (GK 9005) with which all of his beneficent acts are associated. As always, the occasion for praise is the evidence of the Lord's "love" (GK 2876) and "faithfulness" (GK 575). As the priests and Levites prepared the morning and evening sacrifice (cf. Ex 29:39–41), the Levitical singers led God's people in worship, using a "ten-stringed" instrument, a "harp," and a "lyre."

II. Hymn of Thanksgiving (92:4–14)

A. Joy in God's Works (92:4–5)

4–5 The acts of God must not to be separated from his "love" and "faithfulness," because his "deeds" are expressive of his inner nature. The "deeds" are his mighty acts of deliverance. He abases the wicked and exalts the righteous.

B. Judgment on Folly and Exaltation (92:6–8)

6–8 There are two responses to God's works in redemptive history. The wicked respond like wild animals (the word "senseless" [GK 1280] is expressive of animal-like behavior). They begin and end with themselves, with no respect for God. Even when they increase in power and prestige, they are nothing but grass, which quickly perishes in the heat.

In contrast, the psalmist leads the people of God in a response of faith. "Exalted" (GK 5294) connotes the Lord's authority as the supreme Judge. Because the Lord rules and judges, the psalmist sings praise to him for bringing down the wicked and for sharing his exalted glory with his saints.

C. Judgment and Exaltation (92:9–11)

9–10 The Lord's exaltation will vindicate his people, removing completely and suddenly any opposition to his sovereignty. In contrast to his judgment on evildoers, the Lord bestows his favor on the godly. "Exalted" (GK 8123) expresses how God's people are rewarded richly by the supreme Judge. It is uncertain what kind of an animal the "wild ox" is, but its power and ferocity are proverbial. The imagery of "horn" evokes the metaphor of "oil," as oil was poured from a horn (cf. 1Sa 16:13).

11 God's justice in life is one aspect of the hope of the godly. Another aspect is the complete cessation of evil. Evil and God cannot coexist. In the affirmation of God's past acts lies hope for a greater future!

D. The Prosperity of the Righteous (92:12–14)

12–14 The wicked are easily swept away whereas the "righteous" are likened to a "palm tree" and to "a cedar of Lebanon." Both symbolize strength, longevity, and desirability. The representation of trees growing and bearing fruit "in the courts" of the Lord suggests the closeness of the righteous to their God. Whereas the wicked perish prematurely, the godly rejoice in the promise that the Lord's favor rests on them even in old age.

III. Praise of the Lord (92:15)

15 The godly "proclaim" in hymns of praise and thanksgiving the mighty deeds of the "upright" Lord. They exclaim that he is their "Rock" (GK 7446), on whom they rely for sustenance and stability. He does not disappoint his children, because "there is no wickedness in him."

Psalm 93: The Lord Reigns Gloriously

This psalm belongs to a group of psalms (47; 93–100) that affirm the Lord's rule over the earth.

I. The Lord's Glorious Kingship (93:1a–b)

1a–b God's reign is evident in his creation. His rule is visible, as his glorious mantle spreads out all over his kingdom. His works reveal the nature of the Great King: his glory and strength.

II. The Lord's Kingship on Earth (93:1c–2)

1c–2 The Lord established his kingship on earth when he created the "world." The nations may rage against his rule, but it will not fall. The Lord is "from all eternity."

III. The Lord's Kingship Over the Seas (93:3–4)

3–4 The "seas" is a metaphor of the nations (cf. Ps 89:9–10). Though the waters rise up and "pound" with great force, the Lord is "mightier." He has also established his kingship over the seas.

IV. The Lord's Glorious Kingship in Jerusalem (93:5)

5 God's "statutes" are symbolic of the covenant relationship, as they testify to the people of Israel of the revelation entrusted to them. God's glory radiates throughout the created order, as the revelation of his hiddenness (i.e., his "holiness"). God's covenant is "firm," as are his presence and promises, "for endless days."

Psalm 94: The Lord Is the Judge of the Earth

Psalm 94 is made up of two parts: a national lament (vv.1–15) and an individual lament (vv.16–23), which bring together the individual and the community in their common concern.

I. The God of Vengeance (94:1–2)

1–2 The Lord, the covenant God, is "the God who avenges"! His vengeance is not vindictive but a response to the evil perpetrated by the wicked. Evil has its own rewards, namely, "what they deserve." The prayer for the Lord to "shine forth" is a prayer for a theophany, when the Lord appears in his royal splendor to bring justice into a world of anarchy. When he appears, he will "rise up" in judgment as the "Judge of the earth."

II. The Arrogant Words of the Wicked (94:3–7)

3–7 The questions bubble forth as the psalmist reflects on the arrogance of the wicked. They excel in boastful rejoicing in their power. Their speech is like a spring, gushing forth nothing but insolent words. When the ungodly harass God's children, they brazenly affront the Lord. Any deprivation, prejudice, injustice, or trampling on the rights of God's people is a throwback on the Lord, who has promised to care for his people.

III. Rebuke of the Wicked (94:8–11)

8–11 The psalmist addresses the folly of evil by a rebuke. The wicked foolishly establish their little kingdoms on earth, believing that there is no God who will call them to account. They need to know that the Lord knows what is in the hearts of all humans. His hearing and seeing may result in judgment and in deliverance (cf. Ex 2:24–25).

IV. Blessing of the Wise (94:12–15)

12–15 All wisdom comes from God, even the wisdom found among the nations. However, the Lord has given his own people a clearer form of revelation, and those who respond wisely to his instruction are "blessed" (GK 897). They receive his protection from whatever disasters others may plot against them. God's commitment extends to "his people" by covenant. Theirs is the promise of the kingdom, characterized by the order of God, which "all the upright in heart" seek (cf. Mt 5:6; 6:33).

V. The Lament on Account of the Wicked (94:16–21)

16–19 The psalmist returns to the prayer for divine vindication. He knows that the Lord alone will "rise up" and "take a stand" as the royal Judge. He admits that he nearly slipped away into the netherworld. Yet he experienced the presence of the Lord by the support of his "love" (GK 2876). He further confesses that he was nearly overwhelmed with despair, but the Lord came to his rescue.

20–21 It seems as if the reign of corruption, unjust decrees, and oppression of the righteous live side by side with the reign of God. But the psalmist knows that human autonomy can never exist together with God's purpose of establishing his kingdom on earth. A human kingdom is destructive, whereas the kingdom of God is restorative.

VI. Confidence in the Vengeance of the Lord (94:22–23)

22–23 The psalmist closes by calling on the godly to cast their lot with his God. He is the "fortress" and "rock" for all who "take refuge" in him. He will repay the wicked for their boastful words and oppressive acts. The godly hold firm that the kingdom is the Lord's and that he will vindicate them by destroying the wicked and by removing all forms of evil from this world.

Psalm 95: Let Us Kneel Before Our Maker

Though this psalm is not explicitly a psalm ascribing kingship to the Lord, its theme is nevertheless in harmony with the spirit of these psalms.

I. Call to Worship (95:1–2)

1–2 The community is summoned to come together for the purpose of celebration. The object of the joyous ceremony is no other than "the LORD" (GK 3378), and the occasion is an act of deliverance. "The Rock of our salvation" defends and delivers his people, and the people respond with "thanksgiving." The community worships the Lord in word and music.

II. Hymn to the Lord the Creator-King (95:3–5)

3–5 The exaltation of the Lord is due him because he is "the great King" who alone rules over all his creation. The nations may have their deities, but the God of Israel is exalted over all the "gods" of the nations. The Lord's creative acts constitute the ground of his kingship.

III. Call to Worship (95:6)

6 "Worship" (GK 2556) is a concrete act of obeisance, expressive of one's devotion to the Lord. The reason for worship is placed within the context of God's universal kingship and his covenant love.

IV. Hymn to the Lord, the God of the Covenant (95:7a–c)

7a–c The people of God approach him with a hymn celebrating God's commitment. As their "Maker" he is also their shepherd, and they are "the people of his pasture," i.e., "the flock under his care."

V. Response and Reflection on the Lord's Judgment (95:7d–11)

7d–9 God's relationship with his people has been marred by apathy and outright disobedience. "Today" is still the moment of grace. At "Meribah" ("contending") and "Massah" ("testing") Israel had acted wantonly against the Lord. These places symbolize a whole generation of faithless Israelites who dared to challenge the Lord, even though they had witnessed all the mighty works in Egypt, by the Red Sea, and in the desert.

10–11 The Lord cared for generation of the desert for "forty years," though their "hearts" were corrupt and they repeatedly proved that they did not love the ways of God. The psalmist reminds his audience of the Lord's anger with his people. He loathed them as a righteous person loathes sin. Thus they could not and did not enter into the "rest" of God (see Heb 3:7–4:11).

Psalm 96: The Lord Will Judge the World in Righteousness

This psalm belongs to a group of psalms (93–100) that affirm the Lord's rule over the earth and form a subcategory of the descriptive praise psalms.

I. Proclamation of Universal Praise (96:1–3)

1–3 The contents of the praise is "the new song," i.e., a fresh outburst of praise to God, occasioned by a new act of "salvation" (also known as "his marvelous deeds"). The exact nature of the salvation may include all acts in redemptive history: creation and redemption. The people of God must give leadership by giving "praise" to his name every day.

II. The Majesty of the Lord (96:4–6)

4–5 The hymn exclaims the Lord's greatness, his being "worthy of praise," and his awe-inspiring nature. The Lord alone is God. The pagans may claim that their gods have power over the heavenly realms, but this is excluded by virtue of the Lord's sole claim to having created "the heavens."

6 God's royal glory is evident in creation. We are surrounded by the evidences of his royal presence: "splendor and majesty . . . strength and glory."

III. Proclamation of Universal Praise (96:7–9)

7–9 The ascription of "glory" (GK 3883) to God may be in the form of the praise in worship or the presentation of an offering in the temple. The combination of "glory" and "strength" brings out the nature of his powerful acts. They reveal his royal "splendor." The entire earth is invited to participate. The Lord expects reverence, submission, holiness, and awe of his divine majesty and presence.

IV. The Rule of the Lord (96:10–13)

10–12 The second hymn ascribes dominion to the Lord. He has established his rule on earth by his creation and his rule with "equity." The coming of God as Judge is a cause for all nature to rejoice and be glad.

13 The Lord comes to establish "righteousness" and "truth" on earth. The hymn closes on the same motif that it began with: the affirmation of God's rule–both his vengeance on the ungodly and deliverance for the godly.

Psalm 97: The Joys of Zion

This psalm belongs to a group of psalms (93–100) that celebrate the Lord's kingship and form a subcategory of the descriptive praise psalms.

I. The Revelation of the Lord's Glory (97:1–6)

1 The psalm opens on a positive affirmation of the reign of the Lord, which extends to all "the distant shores" of the earth. The nature of the Lord's reign is much more important than the fact that he reigns.

2–6 The magnificent portrayal of the Lord's coming in "clouds and thick darkness" is reminiscent of Israel's experience at Mount Sinai; it also designates the awesome nature of the Day of the Lord (cf. Joel 2:2; Zep 1:15; Rev 11:5). His coming is so great that it "lights up the world," shakes the earth, and melts the mountains. The revelation of God's glory is overwhelming.

II. Exhortation to Worship (97:7)

7 The nations must come to the true worship of the Lord. If they persist in idolatry, they will be put to shame. Idols are be proven worthless on the day of the Lord's coming.

III. Zion's Worship (97:8–9)

8–9 The people of God rejoice in his rule. They confess that "truly" the Lord is "the Most High" over the earth and above all angels.

IV. The Effects of the Lord's Glorious Rule (97:10–12)

10–12 The godly "love the LORD"; they are wise in that they hate anything tainted by evil. They need not fear the day of the Lord's appearance, because he will protect them from the wicked. They will enjoy the benefits of the rule of God. "Light" (GK 240) signifies the blessed state of redemption and victory. The "righteous" and "upright in heart" will enjoy the new age of restoration as the dawning of light. The exhortation to rejoice anticipates the Lord's coming with his blessings.

Psalm 98: A New Song to the Lord

This psalm reflects on the reasons for God's universal praise. This psalm also anticipates the universal restoration of all things, when God's kingdom will be established on earth.

I. Joyful Celebration of Past Acts of Deliverance (98:1–3)

1–2 The "new song" celebrates the Lord's victory. The worshiper moves from a reflection of one specific event to the worship of the Redeemer-God. The "marvelous things" (GK 7098) are the acts of the Lord done in his own power. The nations witness that the Lord is victorious as he blesses his people.

3 The motivating factors for the demonstration of God's power are his "love" (GK 2876) and his "faithfulness" (GK 575) to his covenant people. They who asked to be "remembered" in love and compassion at the time of the Exile have experienced that the Lord does remember. Though the primary focus is on Israel, the Lord provokes the "ends of the earth" to jealousy.

II. Worship of the Great King (98:4–6)

4–6 All the inhabitants on earth must prepare themselves for God's coming by an open welcome, shouting "for joy," bursting "into jubilant song," and making "music." This praise is in response to the expectation that his salvific acts will benefit all who rejoice.

III. Joyful Anticipation of God's Coming (98:7–9)

7–9 Nature echoes and reverberates the joy of God's people as they anticipate the coming of the Great King. The rejoicing of animal and plant life in the sea and on earth constitutes the totality of all of created life. The "groaning" of nature (Ro 8:19–21) will give way to rejoicing. At his coming, the Great King will fully establish his victorious dominion over the created world in "righteousness" and "equity."

Psalm 99: The Lord Is the Revealer-King

This psalm belongs to a group of psalms variously designated as the enthronement psalms or the psalms celebrating the Lord's kingship (93–100).

I. The Exaltation of the Lord in Israel (99:1–5)

1–5 The Lord is highly exalted in heaven, as he "sits enthroned between the cherubim." The imagery of the cherubim derives from the ark of the covenant, whose lid was a gold slab on which two cherubs with spread wings stood (Ex 25:17–22). The ark of the covenant signified the establishment of God's kingdom on earth and as such became known as his "footstool." The sovereign and glorious rule of the Lord should inspire all inhabitants of the world to "tremble" and "shake." The nations must praise the "name" with which the acts of redemptive history are associated—the name "LORD" (GK 3378).

The nature of the King's rule is like his character: "holy" (GK 7705), "mighty" (GK 6437), and "just" (GK 5477). He has "established equity" and done what is "right" for the sake of his people ("Jacob"). Because the Lord is "exalted" over the nations, the people of God must lead the nations in "exalting" the Lord.

II. The Revelation of the Lord to Israel (99:6–7)

6–7 The word "priests" (GK 3913) should not be taken too narrowly, because in the strict sense Moses was not a priest. The noun is here loosely used for "servants" or "intercessors." Moses, Aaron, and Samuel interceded on Israel's behalf. They "called" on his "name" in intercessory prayer, and he responded to their prayers. He performed mighty wonders on behalf of his people and he also revealed himself as "he spoke to them from the pillar of cloud."

III. The Exaltation of the Lord in Israel (99:8–9)

8 The psalmist restates that the Lord has been good to Israel, as he "answered them." He is a consuming fire to those who deprive him of his rights, but he is gracious in that he readily forgives the people.

9 Because of the Lord's greatness, holiness, and justice, the people of God must submit themselves to his lordship by exalting him. Thus they may give leadership to the nations. Worship is an act of submission to his kingship and a proper response to his awe-inspiring presence.

Psalm 100: The Lord Is God and He Is Good

In hymnic form the worshipers sing about the Lord and his covenant relationship with his people.

I. Call to Give Thanks (100:1–2)

1–2 The psalmist calls on "all the earth" to come before the Great King. The nations must recognize that the Lord is God, by whose grace and blessings his people exist. Submission to his rule comes out of a response of joy and gratitude for his covenant promises. The "gladness" (GK 8525) reflects the joy in living in harmony with the Creator, Redeemer, and King.

II. Celebration of the Covenant (100:3)

3 The imperative "know" (GK 3359) signifies acknowledgment or confession. The people confess him as covenant Lord, their only true God. They also confess their accountability to him and their privileged position. The Lord, in turn, cares for them (cf. the shepherd imagery used here).

III. Call to Give Thanks (100:4)

4 The communal confession arouses another invocation to give thanks to the Lord. The worshiping community enters the temple courts through the gates. They come "with thanksgiving" and "with praise," appropriate sacrifices for all the benefits they have received.

IV. Celebration of the Covenant (100:5)

5 God's people adumbrate God's name on account of his goodness to them. He is "good," full of "love" (GK 2876) and "faithfulness" (GK 575). He remains faithful to his people because he has covenanted to do so.

Psalm 101: Commitment to Excellence

Clearly the psalm belongs to the royal psalms, and further it is in the form of a declaration of commitment.

I. The King's Commitment to God's Kingdom (101:1–3a)

1–3a Because of the Lord's constancy in his "love" (GK 2876) and his administration of "justice" (GK 5477), the psalmist breaks forth into thanksgiving and is motivated to lead "a blameless life" before God. His loyalty is to the Lord and not to the ways of this world. The brief prayer "when will you come to me" suggests a need, either personal or for the people, though there is no indication of the original situation.

II. Hatred of Evil (101:3b–5)

3b–5 The godly leader shuns evil in any form. In his law, the Lord required his covenant people to put him before their eyes, to cling to him with all their heart, and to know him (cf. Dt 11:18, 22; 30:20). Slander, gossip, and false witness bring out the heart condition of people. A false testimony may injure someone's reputation or even bring a wrong verdict. A royal judgment will rest on those who are not acting rightly within the covenant community.

III. Love for God's People (101:6)

6 The king recognizes all those who are "faithful" and "blameless." He invites only people of integrity to "dwell" with him and serve in his presence as appointed courtiers.

IV. Hatred of Evil (101:7)

7 The king excludes from dwelling in his house and joining his administration all who do not conform to God's high standards of integrity.

V. The King's Commitment to Justice (101:8)

8 The king further vows that in his daily routine of dispensing justice he will further advance the theocratic goals. The "wicked" and the "evildoer" have no place in Jerusalem, "the city of the LORD." He will bring an end to their reign of terror.

Psalm 102: You Remain, but I....

This psalm is classified as one of the seven penitential psalms (Pss 6; 32; 38; 51; 102; 130; 143). In an individual lament, the psalmist emphasizes the suffering and discipline often associated with sin.

I. Introductory Prayer (102:1–2)

1–2 The psalmist roots his introductory prayer in the vocabulary of the liturgical traditions of his time.

II. Lament (102:3–11)

3–11 The psalmist compares his life to "smoke," "glowing embers," withered "grass," birds, and "an evening shadow," which all express the transitoriness of life. In the tension of being and not-being, the psalmist despairs. He is full of feverish anxiety, experiences adversity, and is alone in his suffering. In his depressed condition, he forgets to eat and drink. Consequently he wastes away to mere "skin and bones." His enemies look at him as having been abandoned by his God. Yet the psalmist knows that the Lord has not rejected him because of his sin. He suffers from the full brunt of God's "great wrath."

III. Promises (102:12–22)

12 The psalmist has been reduced to little more than a fleeting existence. On the other hand, the Lord's fame remains from generation to generation. As long as his rule lasts, his fame will be told and retold.

13–14 The Lord's sovereignty extends over all creation and time. In his freedom he will rise from his throne and show mercy to his people. The Lord had decreed seventy years for Judah's exile in Babylon, and thereafter it would fall. Then would come the "time" of God's favor, a new era marked by forgiveness, renewal of the covenant, and the restoration of the people to the land. "Zion" symbolizes the covenant relationship and all the privileges entailed by it, material and spiritual. God's people are the "servants," who yearn for the reestablishment of Jerusalem.

15–17 The city's future is completely dependent on the Lord, who has promised to "rebuild" it and to endow it with the glory of his personal and royal presence. The new era will mark a renewal of his covenant love as evidenced in answered prayers of his servants, "the destitute," and the universal reverence for and worship of the Lord.

18–22 The promises of vv.12–17 must be recorded for the sake of all generations to come. When those promises are realized in God's acts of redemption and the restoration of Zion, there will be greater confidence on the part of "a people not yet created," as they will "praise the LORD."

The Lord's response to the suffering of his servants is that he "looked down from his sanctuary on high" to respond to their needs. Those who were oppressed are likened to "prisoners" and "those condemned to death." Out of the ruins of Zion/Jerusalem and the "groans" of the exiled population, the Lord promised to raise up a new people and resettle them in Zion. The nations too would join in the worship of "the name of the LORD," in fulfillment of the many prophetic oracles.

IV. Lament (102:23–27)

23–27 Occupied with the brevity, vanity, and anguish of life, the psalmist laments that his vitality is cut off "in the course of my life." He contrasts his transitory existence with the great work of creation and with the Lord himself. He believes that only God has the power to cut short his ordeal rather than to take his life. The eternal God is the Creator of heaven and earth; he will remain forever, whereas they will some day "perish" (cf. 2Pe 3:8). He is the "first and last," and he does not change.

V. Concluding Perspective (102:28)

28 The future of the godly is tied up with God himself and with his promises. The psalmist praises the Lord in that he will be true to "the children of your servants." They and their descendants will "dwell" and be "established" in the Lord's presence.

Psalm 103: His Compassions Fail Not!

In hymnic fashion the psalmist praises the Lord for the many benefits bestowed on him, characteristic of the individual thanksgiving psalm.

I. Individual Praise (103:1–2)

1–2 Praise of God begins with the self. As the psalmist exhorts himself to praise the Lord with his "soul" (GK 5883) and "inmost being," (i.e., his whole person), he has nothing else in mind than a full commitment to the act of giving thanks. The "name" (GK 9005) of the Lord calls to remembrance all his perfections and acts of deliverance. "Praise" (GK 1385) is the response of awe for God, while reflecting on what the Lord has done for his people. The opposite of "praise" is forgetfulness. To "forget" (GK 8894) the "benefits" of the Lord is to disregard his covenantal lordship.

II. Praise for the Lord's Goodness to Individuals (103:3–5)

3 The forgiveness of "sins" is God's gracious act of removing the consequences of sin as well as the sin itself. The "diseases" (GK 9377) may be sicknesses, but are more likely a metaphor for adversities or setbacks.

4 Instead of letting his beloved be taken by adversity, the Lord redeems by exalting him to royalty with his "love and compassion." "Love" (GK 2876)) is the assurance of the constancy of his fidelity toward his own. The complement of "love" is divine "compassion" (GK 8171), that quality by which God as the heavenly Father empathizes with human frailty.

5 The Lord forgives, redeems, sustains, and fully restores all the covenantal benefits, even though sin has breached the covenant. The Lord "satisfies" his children with all the blessings of the covenant so as to "renew" them like an "eagle." The "eagle" symbolizes vigor and freedom.

III. Praise for the Lord's Kingship Over Israel (103:6–19)

6 The Lord does not tolerate injustice in the world. His rule is characterized by "righteousness" (GK 7407), his righting what is wrong. This word relates to God's deliverance of his people from evil and oppression and to his punishment of oppressors.

7–10 The psalmist reflects on God's "ways" and "deeds," revealed to Moses (cf. Ex 34:6–7). Though the Lord may be justly angry because of sin, he does not maintain his anger for long. Great as his wrath may be, his mercy is greater. God's rule is characterized by grace.

11–14 The love of God is not indiscriminate. He loves those "who fear him." He will forgive them, have compassion for them, and treat them as his children. Though he expects godliness, he is also understanding of their frailty. All of them are but "dust."

15–18 From the perspective of God's universal rule, "man" is nothing more than human. His existence is "like grass" or "like a flower of the field." Over against the brevity and weakness of human existence is the greatness of God's love for those who fear him. His "love" (GK 2876) and "righteousness" (GK 7407) last forever. Those who respond to the Lord in "fear" will enjoy the fullness of the covenant relationship, and their children will see the salvation of the Lord (cf. 102:28).

19 The psalmist calls on the community to recognize the Lord's kingdom. His "throne" may be in heaven but his kingdom extends to all creation. This affirmation is both the conclusion of the hymn and the transition to a universal call to worship the Lord.

IV. Universal and Individual Praise (103:20–22)

20–22 The psalm concludes with the psalmist calling on all heavenly creatures ("angels," "mighty ones," "heavenly hosts," and "servants"), serving the Lord on high, to join together with all creation in the praise of God. Those heavenly hosts are always loyal to the Lord, and he expects the same from his creatures on earth.

Psalm 104: Great Is Your Faithfulness to All Creation

Psalm 104 is a psalm of praise describing God's greatness in ruling and sustaining his vast creation. It is complementary to the prose account of creation in Ge 1.

I. In Praise of God's Royal Splendor (104:1–4)

1 The exclamation "praise the LORD" arises out of the heart of those who consider themselves blessed to know the covenant Redeemer-God, whose name is Yahweh ("the LORD"). Praise is expressed in two ways: direct ("you"; v.1) and indirect ("he"; vv.2ff.). The nouns "splendor and majesty" amplify the royal nature of his rule.

2 Light is vital to life. The psalmist portrays God as covered with light. The light reveals something of his glory, because God is light (1Jn 1:5). God's second creative act is "the firmament" or "the heavens" (Ge 1:6–8), described here as a "tent" stretched out over the earth. As a camper pitches a tent, so God prepared the earth for habitation.

3–4 The imagery of the firmament gives occasion to reflect on the divine glory above the firmament. The "beams" on the water above the firmament provide the support for his royal palace. The "chambers," built above the first story of a house for the purpose of privacy and seclusion, represent God's involvement with and separation from his world. The Lord sovereignly controls the elements, as if he "rides" on a "chariot," using the wind, clouds, and lightning ("flames of fire") for his purposes. The Lord is surrounded by his servants, whether they be created like the angels or be powers inherent in his created order (winds, lightning).

II. The Material Formation of the Earth (104:5–9)

5–6 These verses focus on the third day of Creation: the formation of the land (cf. Ge 1:9–10). The waters covered the whole earth, forming a vast "deep" and covering both mountains and valleys as if with "a garment." The "foundations" were already there by divine creation, awaiting God's act of separating the waters so as to make the dry land appear.

7 The word God spoke at creation is poetically transformed to a "rebuke" and "the sound of your thunder." The Lord limited the power of the water by a show of his power. He is sovereign over all powers.

8–9 "The waters" (v.7) flee over the mountains, down the valleys, into their allotted place. Since the Flood the Lord determined that water should never again cover the earth.

III. The Glory of the Animal Creation (104:10–18)

10–12 Through the bountiful rain the Lord provides richly for his creation. God is the source and sustainer of life! Water provides drink for the wild animals, of which "the wild donkeys" are representatives. It also provides for growth of trees and shrubs, in whose branches the birds nest and sing.

13–15 Water also provides for domesticated animals and especially for humankind. The Lord satisfies all the needs of his creation, for he has the power and wisdom to water mountains and to sustain plant and animal life. He supplies human needs indirectly through providing fodder for "the cattle" and directly through supplying people with "food." In his free grace, the Lord richly blesses "man" with ample provision. "Wine" is given for the uplifting of one's spirit and oil for one's appearance.

16–18 The Lord waters the mountains so that the lofty trees have their needs fully provided for. Lebanon was proverbial for its cedars. The birds find nesting places in the trees. Even as the cedar and pine are selectively chosen as samples of majestic trees, so the "stork" is a stately bird. The mountains are also a hideout for "the wild goats"—a kind of ibex—and the "coneys"—a Syrian coney or rock badger.

IV. The Regularity in the Created World (104:19–23)

19–23 The moon and sun are also in God's hands. The "moon" represents the lunar calendar by which the "seasons," the festival days of Israel, were determined. Sun and moon denote the regular order of day and night, when animals and humans have an opportunity to provide for themselves.

V. The Glory of the Animal Creation (104:24–26)

24–26 The world of creation reveals the power, wisdom, and creative diversity of the Lord. He has multiple "works" all over his world. All of life belongs to him, on "the earth" and in "the sea." The Lord provides for the great number of sea creatures that inhabit the seas; the "leviathan" is here only a large sea animal, one of God's creatures.

VI. The Spiritual Sustenance of the Earth (104:27–30)

27–30 The very source of the well-being of God's creation is in the providence of the Lord. All creatures, including human beings, have their being in God. He gives and sustains life by his life-giving Spirit. But he also takes away the life-spirit from his creatures.

VII. In Praise of God's Royal Splendor (104:31–35)

31–35 The Lord has bestowed his "glory" (GK 3883) on his creation. His handiwork will flourish as long as he sustains it. One's response to the Lord's presence should be praise, devotion, and concern with pleasing the Lord. Those who do not join in with a grateful response are outside the covenant of grace. They have no place on God's earth. The psalmist longs for a world that is fully established and maintained by the Lord. The hymn concludes on the same note of thanksgiving and praise with which it began: Hallelujah!

Psalm 105: The Lord's Acts in Salvation History

The hymnic celebration of the history of redemption from Israel's sojourn in Egypt to the Conquest is the theme of this psalm. Its motif complements the creation hymn (104) and the hymn of God's faithfulness (106).

I. Invocation to Praise (105:1–6)

1–6 The Lord is the object of worship. From the phraseology we learn about "what he has done," "all his wonderful acts," and "the wonders ... his miracles, and the judgments." He acts marvelously on behalf of his people, so as to pass "judgments" on their enemies. His acts reveal the Divine Warrior in his holiness and "strength." The name of this God is none other than Yahweh ("the LORD"; GK 3378), on whose "name" the people call with shouts of joy and with gratitude.

The subjects of worship are the people for whom the Lord has done his wonderful and mighty acts: the descendants of Abraham and Jacob. Through Abraham his descendants have become God's "chosen ones" (GK 1040). They are expected to "seek the LORD" in his holy temple with a true spirit of devotion. In the acts of praise, public rejoicing, and remembrance of God's acts in redemptive history, the people of God express a unity as heirs of the Abrahamic covenant and of Jacob's election over against Esau.

The goal of praise is threefold. (1) Praise magnifies the Lord. (2) Praise intensifies Israel's appreciation of the history of their redemption. (3) Praise witnesses to those outside the covenant community.

II. The Covenant of Promise (105:7–11)

7–11 In hymnic language the psalmist ascribes covenant fidelity to "the LORD." He is the "God" of Israel by covenant, but his authority extends to "all the earth." He made an eternal "covenant" (which is equivalent to "the oath" and to "a decree") with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The covenant is a sovereign administration of grace and promise.

III. The Protection of the Lord (105:12–15)

12–13 God's protection is transparent in the patriarchal narratives. The psalmist begins describing Israel's beginnings at the stage when there were few members of the covenant and when the covenant community was not stable. They were continually vulnerable to the jealousy of the kings, subject to pagan immorality, and contingent on the ever-changing political environment (Ge 12–35).

14–15 Abraham's descendants did not succumb to political and moral pressures. Their strength did not lie in numbers but in the Lord's protection. He had promised to curse all those who curse Abraham and his seed, for they were the Lord's "anointed ones" (cf. Ge 12:2–3). They are also designated as "my prophets." By plagues and dreams the Lord "rebuked" kings.

IV. The Providence of the Lord (105:16–23)

16–19 The episodes of famine, Joseph's enslavement and exaltation in Egypt, and migration to Egypt evidence divine providence. The Lord was as much involved in Israel's protection as he was in bringing the adversity of famine on the land. To this end he led Joseph into enslavement in Egypt. He was humiliated in his unjust imprisonment, but he was finally greatly exalted through his God-given ability to interpret dreams (Ge 40–41).

20–23 Through the order of Pharaoh, Joseph was released from prison and elevated to the high office of "master of his household" (cf. Ge 41:14, 40) and administrator over all Pharaoh's possessions (cf. Ac 7:10). The king became an instrument of God's plan. This again is providence. All recognized the "wisdom" given to Joseph so that he, a Hebrew, was given full liberty to instruct leaders and elders. Then through divine providence Israel (Jacob) entered Egypt (here called "the land of Ham") as "an alien."

V. The Protection of the Lord (105:24–36)

24–27 The first two verses summarize Ex 1: Israel's multiplication and Pharaoh's jealousy and hatred. The Lord blessed, providentially created Israel's adversity, and was all too ready to protect his people. He then chose Moses ("his servant"; GK 6269) and Aaron (his "chosen" one; GK 1047)—both men instruments of redemption and of demonstrating his power in the form of "miraculous signs" and "wonders."

28–36 The psalmist selects eight out of the ten plagues. The omission of two plagues and the variation in order have no bearing on the historicity of what happened in Egypt. The plagues are framed between the ninth and the tenth affliction on the Egyptians: darkness

(Ex 10:21–28) and the death of the firstborn (Ex 11:4–8; 12:29).

VI. The Fulfillment of Promise (105:37–45b)

37–41 The Lord then brought his people out of Egypt (vv.37, 43). He took marvelous care of them, sustaining them by his presence, protecting them, and providing for them in fulfillment of his covenant with Abraham. The people left Egypt with supplies of silver and gold to provide for their needs in the Promised Land. As they exited Egypt, the Israelites were glad and sang songs of victory. Egypt too was happy when Israel left, because with the departure of Israel came the end of the plagues. In the desert, the Lord continued to provide them with food and drink.

42–44 The exodus from Egypt and God's presence, protection, and provision reveal his concern for the covenant. Abraham is God's "servant" (GK 6269) and his descendants are God's "chosen ones" (GK 1040). He brought them with great joy out of Egypt into the Promised Land. By right of conquest they freely inherited all the benefits of the Promised Land of Canaan.

45a–b The emphasis throughout the psalm lies on God's goodness. However, God's purpose for his people was nothing less than to have a responsive people. The author reminds God's people of their responsibility: keeping the precepts of the Lord. In doing so they express joyous gratitude for all the benefits the Lord has provided for his people.

VII. Concluding Praise (105:45c)

45c The psalm begins with a call to praise and ends on a fitting conclusion: "Hallelujah."

Psalm 106: Remember the Lord's Love and Israel's Disobedience

This psalm favors the hymnic genre in its thematic approach to Israel's history, revealing Israel's unresponsiveness to all of the Lord's mighty acts.

I. Invocation to Praise (106:1–2)

1–2 The doctrine of God shines through significantly even in the complaint, prayer, and history of rebellion. The doxology and invocation extol the Lord for his goodness and for his enduring "love." Praise is linked to the revelation of God in history, given for "his mighty acts." This God is none other than the powerful Divine Warrior.

II. Prayer for God's Salvation (106:3–5)

3 In view of the goodness, love, and mighty acts of the Lord, "blessed" (GK 897) are all those who enjoy his benefits. As in Ps 1, the blessing is conditioned on pleasing the Lord and doing what is right.

4–5 In desperation and in a spirit of contrition, the author prays that the Lord may again bestow his blessing on the godly and "remember" (GK 2349) his covenant; the synonym for "remember" is "come to my aid." The effect of God's remembrance is salvation and restoration for individual members of the covenant people. They look to the change from alienation to salvation and from wrath to "favor" (GK 8356). God's salvation results in renewal of his blessing, "joy," and participation in the worship of the Lord.

III. Acts of God's Love: Salvation (106:6–12)

6–7 The Divine Warrior is known to Israel for his mighty acts, as from the beginning of Israel's history he displayed his power to deliver and fulfill by "miracles." But Israel often went astray and acted corruptly. God delivered a people who resisted his authority and kingship, for "they rebelled" against him immediately after their deliverance from Egypt.

8–12 The Lord's deliverance from Egypt discloses his fidelity to his covenant, his rule over the nations, and his "mighty power." His power extends to his word, because by his "rebuke" (GK 1721) he brought the sea to submission. The Red Sea became an instrument of deliverance and judgment. (1) The Lord led his people to freedom, when the sea bed was dry, "as through a desert." The Divine Warrior freed them from their foe, who vanished from sight. (2) The Lord judged the Egyptians as none of them survived. Israel saw the hand of the Lord in the great wonders and praised him for "his promises."

IV. History of Israel's Unbelief and God's Judgment (vv.13–43)

A. Impatience: Wasting Disease (106:13–15)

13–15 Israel's faith faltered quickly. They readily gave in to impatience when he did not anticipate their needs. Their refusal to submit to his counsel signified an independence that would develop into their becoming stiff-necked and stubborn. They "put God to the test" with their selfish spirit. He gave them what they wanted; but the consequences were severe.

B. Jealousy: Death and Fire (106:16–18)

16–18 Korah (a Levite), Dathan and Abiram (Danites), and 250 leading men of Israel challenged Moses and Aaron in a most insolent manner. They were "envious" of their closeness to the Lord and argued in favor of the sanctity (priesthood) of all believers. The three leaders went down into the earth, whereas the company of 250 wicked men were destroyed by fire.

C. Idolatry: Near Destruction (106:19–23)

19–20 At Horeb Israel made the golden calf as a symbolic representation of deity, in violation of the second commandment. They worshiped the material rather than the resplendent "glory" of God. "Their Glory" is none other than their Savior-God.

21–23 Idolatry denies the nature of the God of revelation and the God of salvation. Too easily did the people overlook the manifestation of his mighty acts in Egypt (i.e., "the land of Ham") and by the Red Sea. Thus the Lord was ready to "destroy them." But Moses, their leader, interceded for Israel. "Stood in the breach" pictures the bravery of a soldier who stands in the breach of the wall, willing to give his life in warding off the enemy. The Lord responded to Moses' intercession by not destroying the people.

D. Unbelief: Death (106:24–27)

24–25 At Kadesh Barnea the people rebelled again. This time they did not believe that the Lord could lead them into the Promised Land. "His promises" no longer seemed valid. Instead of praising him, they "grumbled" and "despised" his promise of the land.

26–27 The oath of God pertained both to that generation and to the generation of the Exile. In the desert the Israelites died without entering the Promised Land; in the Exile they were scattered "throughout the lands."

E. Idolatry: Plague (106:28–31)

28–29 In their idolatrous practices the Israelites even devoted themselves to "the Baal of Peor," a local Moabite god. They participated in the communion sacrifices devoted to "lifeless gods." Thus they made God jealous and provoked his wrath, resulting in his immediate judgment.

30–31 Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron, killed an Israelite who had joined with a Midianite woman (Nu 25:7–8). This heroic act of devotion checked the plague. His faith was richly rewarded with a covenant promising a perpetual priesthood.

F. Rebellion: Trouble (106:32–33)

32–33 Less than a year before Israel was to enter the Promised Land, Moses too provoked the Lord. At Meribah he was to speak to the rock. Instead, he hit it, having been thoroughly provoked by Israel in their rebellion "against the Spirit of God." But Moses' "rash words" against Israel were not justifiable. Consequently he was punished in not being permitted to enter the land. This is what the psalmist calls "trouble."

G. Idolatry and Acculturation: Exile (106:34–43)

34–38 Because of their commitment through marriages to the indigenous Canaanite population, the Israelites could not be faithful to doing what "the LORD had commanded." The Canaanite "customs"—idolatry, sacrificial rites, human sacrifice, murder—entrapped them away from the revealed religion of Sinai. They "worshiped" the gods of the nations by the sacrifices of Israelite children, thus shedding "innocent blood."

39 These various practices "defiled" (GK 3237) the people, rendering them ritually unclean for the worship of God. The pagan way of life was a form of religious prostitution. The people were unclean, and the land was equally defiled by the sinful practices.

40–43 Consequently Israel suffered the greatest humiliation in her history: Exile. God had sworn to scatter the rebellious people among the nations but had patiently waited. He had helped them many times. But their ancestors had not waited for his counsel in the desert, and the generation of the Exile rebelled by following their own counsel. Yet even in his anger the Lord still considered Israel as his own people!

V. Acts of God's Love: Restraint (106:44–46)

44–46 The Lord permitted nations to invade, control, and oppress his people from time to time. On the other hand, he still heard their "cry" of "distress" and acted on their behalf. His "great love" is grounded in his "covenant" with the patriarchs. His anger is tempered by his great love.

VI. Prayer for God's Salvation (106:47)

47 The whole community has sinned (v.6). Thus no one can fully enjoy God's benefits until he restores his favor to his "chosen ones . . . [his] nation" (v.5). To this end the psalmist prays, "Save us." God alone is able to restore his people from adversity and affliction, because he is "LORD our God," i.e., he has covenanted himself to be the God of Abraham and his descendants. His salvation will result in thanksgiving and praise.

VII. Invocation to Praise (106:48)

48 The last verse forms an appropriate conclusion to the fourth book of the Psalms (90–106). The doxology declares the praise of God as "the God of Israel." As his "love endures forever" (106:1), so will his praise from his people be "from everlasting to everlasting." In hope of deliverance and prosperity, the people of God respond with an "Amen!"

Book V: Psalms 107–150

Psalm 107: Lessons From the Experience of the Saints

This psalm is the first of the fifth book of psalms, a thanksgiving-wisdom psalm, and complements the confession of sin and prayer for divine favor and restoration (Ps 106).

I. Invocation to Give Thanks (107:1–3)

1–3 The congregation is called on to confess God's covenant faithfulness, affirming his goodness and love toward the redeemed. This is a common liturgical formula, much like a confession of faith. "The redeemed of the LORD" have experienced adversity in exile and have been delivered by the Lord. He has delivered them from "adversity" (NIV "foe," but preferably "trouble"; GK 7640). The Lord gathers his people, as it were, from all directions, wherever they are found.

II. Reasons for Thanksgiving (107:4–32)

A. Wanderers in the Desert (107:4–9)

4–5 The reference to the "desert wastelands" could be an allusion to the wandering of Israel in the desert or to the experience of the Exile (though "wandered" can also denote profligate living; GK 9494). The desert is a place to cross through, not to aimlessly wander in. There is no city for protection, and one's supplies of food and water may readily be depleted. Life loses its meaning as one experiences purposelessness.

6–9 God heard the prayer of people in "trouble" (GK 7639). His deliverance was full of surprises, as he supplied all the needs of his people. He straightened the way; led them into the city; and provided for their shelter, food, and drink. This God is the object of the thanksgiving hymn, because he manifests his "unfailing love" (GK 2876) in his "wonderful deeds" (GK 7098). His mercy is not limited to the covenant people, because the Creator-God is kind to "men."

B. Prisoners (107:10–16)

10–12 Suffering also comes in the form of captivity. The language of "darkness," "gloom," and "iron chains" connotes despair, deprivation of rights, and the judgment of God. Their misfortune was not accidental but resulted from an intentional breach of faith with the Lord. They "rebelled" against his revelation and despised his royal authority. "God . . . Most High" denotes the Creator-God, who sovereignly rules over his creation. Israel defied his authority, but he broke their rebellious spirit, forcing them to submit to his sovereignty by "bitter labor." When they could not endure their lot, they "stumbled" like people without God.

13–16 Yet the Lord cannot forget his own people. He delivered them, regardless of their rebellious spirit, from every adverse condition. For this the "redeemed" may give thanks.

C. Sick People (107:17–22)

17–18 This is another description of God's judgment on those who were "rebellious" against him. They were "fools" (GK 211) because they went astray in their love of wrong. Their "affliction" was sickness to death. They "loathed" their "food," as they felt that death was nearby.

19–20 What the people deserved they did not get. The Lord "saved" them too when they cried to him in their "distress." The "word" against which they rebelled became the word of promise, comfort, and restoration. The "word" (GK 1821) is personified here as God's messenger of healing and deliverance from "the grave."

21–22 The people must render thanks to the Lord. Thanksgiving is not an empty platitude but consists of a concrete expression of loyalty to the Lord by the giving of "thank offerings," accompanied by "songs of joy."

D. Sailors on the Sea (107:23–32)

23–24 Merchants who crossed the seas in search of fortune witnessed the marvels of God's creation at sea. The Lord's power is so great that he can easily stir up "mighty waters" and then calm them.

25–27 By the word of the Lord, he lifted up the waves of the sea, which frightened the merchants as they rose "up to the heavens" and "went down to the depths." As the ship was being tossed about as a plaything, the seafarers, unable to do anything about their lot, became dispirited and terrified. They tried to hold on to something solid, like "drunken men" who stagger and try to find stability. All their skills at navigation were ineffective so that they became desperate.

28–32 The sailors too prayed in their distress, and the Lord responded to their prayer. He silenced the sea and brought the sailors safely to their destination, thus making them "glad." Their joy brought them to expressions of devotion to the Lord. The proper response of thanksgiving finds its fullest development here. The merchants must publicly declare what God has done in communal worship and in places of leadership.

III. Reasons for Praise (107:33–42)

33–34 The hymn of praise ascribes to the Lord the power to change things. His authority is limitless. He can reverse the condition of anything and therefore the way of life of everybody! The wicked who prosper in their God-given land may find their land useless, parched, and "a salt waste," as happened to the area of Sodom and Gomorrah.

35–38 The Lord can also transform the desert into a well-populated area. The "desert" was "parched ground" that, when supplied by the abundance of the Lord's "pools of water" and "flowing springs," blossomed into fields of harvest. Where there are water and good land, people may come and benefit from God's good land. Their bounty is by the blessing of God, even as is their increase in number.

39–40 The people whom the Lord has blessed with fields, homes, and families are not dependable. In their prosperity they may exalt themselves. But in time God's judgment will find them out. The people may suffer from "oppression, calamity, and sorrow." Their "nobles" will be abased.

41–42 "The needy" (GK 36), i.e., the "upright" who wait for the Lord, draw comfort from seeing the justice of God. In his power he blesses them and silences the ruthless power and great evil of "the wicked."

IV. Invocation to Gain Wisdom (107:43)

43 The conclusion to this psalm transforms the hymn of thanksgiving to a wisdom psalm. The righteous will become "wise" by studying the acts of "the great love of the LORD" in the affairs of humankind.

Psalm 108: Praise and Prayer

This psalm consists of two parts (vv.1–5, 6–13), each of which has its duplicate in another psalm. Verses 1–5 derive from Ps 57:7–11 and vv.6–13 are parallel with Ps 60:5–12. See these psalms.

Psalm 109: The Lord Loves the Needy

This is one of the imprecatory psalms. Its genre reflects the individual lament type.

I. Invocation to the God of Praise (109:1)

1 The noun "praise" (GK 9335) is not an attribute of the Lord but serves as a catch-all for all the reasons God is worthy of the praise of his people. The psalmist prays that the God who has responded in the past will act again on behalf of his covenant child by not remaining silent.

II. The Words and Acts of the Ungodly (109:2–5)

2 David charges his enemies because their words are untrustworthy. The threefold description of the speech of the wicked seems to be uppermost in his mind: it is "wicked," "deceitful," and "lying."

3–5 The deceptiveness of the wicked comes out of a heart of "hatred." In his friendship the psalmist had done acts of kindness, but the wicked had returned "evil for good." During his friendship and even in his adversities he remained "a man of prayer," in constant communion with God.

III. Imprecation (109:6–15)

A. Guilty on Earth (109:6–8)

6–8 The psalmist hopes that an evil person may be found guilty by "an evil man," whom he also calls "an accuser" (lit., satan; GK 8477). Through the instrumentality of human institutions and by means of wicked people, other wicked people are condemned, and in this process God's righteousness is vindicated. The "accuser" stands "at his right hand" (cf. Zec 3:1, but cf. v.31) for the purpose of bringing accusations against one of their kind. The verdict must be "guilty" (GK 8401; the same word as "evil man"). When oppression, evil, and godlessness are cut short, the Lord establishes his rule over the earth by a built-in obsolescence of human structures.

B. Family (109:9–10)

9–10 The psalmist further prays that the family of the wicked man may be without support and comfort. The reduction of his wife to widowhood and his children to being orphans is a disgrace to the family name, as they would be at the mercy of others. The guilt of the father would thus affect his whole family. Out of destitution they would have to be "wandering beggars" and homeless.

C. Possessions (109:11)

11 The psalmist also prays that the family of the guilty man may never enjoy "the fruits of his labor." The forfeiture of the family fortune by equally ruthless men ("strangers") would further reduce the survivors to dependency and indebtedness.

D. Family (109:12–13)

12–13 In their destitute state, the widow and orphan had legal rights and claims on expressions of "kindness" Gk 2876). The psalmist's imprecation extends to any who extend a helping hand to the survivors of the guilty. No "kindness" or "pity" was to be shown. The disgrace should even be greater, as the psalmist prays that the family name will be removed from the face of the earth. Sin does have consequences!

E. Guilty Before God (109:14–15)

14–15 The psalmist asks God to be just by always remembering the guilt of the whole family. Even when "their names" are "blotted out," the psalmist prays that the Lord will never permit the memory of their sins to be "cut off." While forgiveness is possible for repentant sinners, hardened sinners are beyond salvation. Unforgiven sins are viewed as "memorials" that "remain before the LORD."

IV. The Acts and Words of the Ungodly (109:16–20)

16 The harshness of the psalmist's attitude to the wicked was because they hated, cursed, oppressed, and harassed "the poor and the needy and the brokenhearted." The psalmist himself is "poor," "needy," and "brokenhearted" (v.22) and is the object of the attack! The purpose of the hounding is the "death" of the righteous.

17–20 The wicked reject "friendship" (vv.4–5) and love in favor of "curse" (GK 7839), which was intended to destroy a human being, his position, his family, and the remembrance of his name. Their love for cursing became so much a part of them that it was as if they "wore cursing as [their] garment." The wicked are evil through and through. It is "wrapped" about them and "tied forever" around them. The psalmist repeats the need for justice and vindication on the principle of lex talionis (retaliation).

V. Prayer for God's Love and Judgment (109:21–29)

21 David, in his desperate need, attempts to move the Lord on the basis of the Lord's nature, his own need, and a reminder of the wicked. The Lord, unlike the wicked, is good and full of "love" (GK 2876). His "name" is "LORD," and he is the "Sovereign" over all of life. To this covenantal God he prays: "deal well with me" and "deliver me."

22–24 David reminds the Lord that he is "poor and needy" and his "heart is wounded within" him (see comments on v.16). It is as if life flows out of him, like the disappearance of "an evening shadow." He is shaken "like a locust," like farmers would shake locusts off trees and shrubs and destroy them. Psychologically and physically the psalmist falters. His body no longer sustains him.

25–29 The psalmist reminds the Lord of the adversaries, who seek his downfall by heaping "scorn" on him and by rejecting him. His principle is clearly that of just retribution: shame and disgrace. He wants them to be "wrapped in shame as in a cloak." They must know that the deliverance of God's "servant" is the Lord's doing and that their judgment is also his work!

VI. Benediction of the God of Praise (109:30–31)

30–31 David concludes his prayer for deliverance and judgment with a fervent expectation of standing among the throngs of worshipers, filled with praise for the Lord. The Lord stands "at the right hand of the needy" as a protector. To this end the psalmist concludes on the note with which he began: the praise of God.

Psalm 110: The Kingdom of the Lord

This psalm may be classed with the royal psalms. Apostolic usage reveals a strongly messianic motif (cf. Mt 22:44; 26:64; Ac 2:34–35; Ro 8:34; et al.).

I. Promise (110:1)

1 The psalmist speaks of the promise of God pertaining to David and his dynasty. The Davidic king is a theocratic ruler in the sense that he rules over God's people under the Lord and yet is very close to him, at his right hand. The Lord promises to extend his dominion by subjugating the enemies. To make the enemies a "footstool" signifies absolute control, as when a victorious king placed his feet on the necks of his vanquished foes.

II. Victory (110:2–3)

2 The Lord will give strength to his king, symbolized by the "scepter from Zion." He has decreed that the Davidic king shall "rule" over the enemies.

3 We may infer from the military language that the royal troops are young, numerous, and valiant. The people come voluntarily on the day of battle. They consecrate themselves, are fully prepared, and place themselves at the service of the king. They will be as abundant as "dew" at dawn.

III. Promise (110:4)

4 From the priestly laws it appears that there is a clear distinction between Israel's three theocratic officers: king, prophet, and priest. However, David was dressed as a priest (2Sa 6:14), was in charge of the sacrifices (2Sa 6:17–18), and gave a priestly blessing to the people (2Sa 6:18). This was also true of Solomon (1Ki 8:14, 55, 62–64).

The irrevocable oath is none other than what the Lord promised to David pertaining to his dynasty (2Sa 7:13). Here the Davidic king serves as God's priest "in the order of Melchizedek." Melchizedek was a priest-king over Jerusalem (cf. Ge 14:18), who worshiped the Creator-God as supreme. The Davidic king is charged with responsibility over the true worship of the Lord.

IV. Victory (110:5–7)

5–6 When the king goes out to war, "the Lord," as the Master of the universe, supports him by being at his right hand. He furthers the king's power by crushing the resistance of kings. A day of accountability has been appointed, and on that day the Lord will "judge the nations," causing a great defeat for his enemies, symbolized by their "corpses" and "heads."

7 The theocratic king enjoys victory because of the God who fights for him. The king will tire himself out in battle but will be refreshed by a brook along the way of pursuit. The reason for the king's lifting up of his head in triumph is because of God's help.

Psalm 111: Celebration of God's Faithfulness

Psalms 111 and 112 form a unit. Psalm 111, celebrating the wonders of the Lord, is in the form of a hymn but has a clearly defined concern with wisdom.

I. Public Praise for God's Mighty Acts (111:1–3)

1 The psalmist calls on the community to praise the Lord. His praise is from the "heart," and he encourages the people of God to join in. The people of God belong to the "upright" (GK 3838) only because they do not belong to the category of "the wicked" (112:10). The "assembly" is the gathering of Jacob's descendants who fear the Lord.

2–3 The acts of God are marvelous and awe-inspiring. They bear further investigation, not to be fully comprehended, but to "ponder" and "delight in." His works are also "glorious and majestic." His royal splendor is particularly evident in his great acts of redemption on behalf of his people. They reveal his "righteousness," which is unfailing.

II. The Works of the Lord in Redemption (111:4–9)

4–9 The Lord has ordained the remembrance and proclamation of his redemptive acts—particularly the Exodus, the desert wanderings, the Conquest, and the revelation at Sinai—in the calendar of Israel. His name is "holy" and "awesome." The Lord has shown himself to be "gracious and compassionate" in his providential care of his people. His acts reveal his commitment to the "covenant" made with the patriarchs and confirmed at Mount Sinai. They also reveal that he is "faithful" and "just."

The "precepts" of God were to give order to God's people, that they might reflect the nature of their King in their national existence. God's word is "trustworthy" (GK 586) in that all of his promises come to pass. They reflect his "faithfulness" (GK 622) to his people. Thus the inspired author brings out the coherence between the Lord's acts and words. They all reflect his divine nature.

III. Response to God's Mighty Acts (111:10)

10 The revelation of the Lord's character and his fidelity to the covenant call for a response of wisdom in which God's people will "fear" (GK 3711) him, submitting to his rule and following his precepts. The fear of the Lord is "the beginning of wisdom." The wise have "good understanding." Another response is perpetual praise to the Great King.

Psalm 112: The Triumph of Faith

Psalm 112 is a wisdom psalm. It is an acrostic; it uses the "blessed is the man" formula, the vocabulary and concerns of wisdom literature, the contrast between the righteous and the wicked, and the blessings of wisdom.

I. Blessedness of Those Who Delight in Wisdom (112:1)

1 Those "blessed" (GK 897) by the Lord show themselves to be in active pursuit of godly wisdom. They begin with the fear of God and end with finding "great delight in his commands." These commands reflect "grace and truth" as exemplified by Jesus (Jn 1:14).

II. Blessings of Righteousness (112:2–3)

2–3 The blessed are righteous, and they make every effort to establish God's righteous kingdom on earth, for their way of life shows a concern for God's majesty, glory, and greatness (111:2–3). The Lord rewards them with many and blessed descendants, wealth, and honor. They enjoy success in life, and their children share in the blessing of their godly parents. Thus godliness has its rewards in this life, in future generations, and in the life to come.

III. Blessing in Adversity (112:4)

4 The realism of the psalm breaks through. Adversity also comes on the path of the godly. When it does, however, they receive light. Their godly character is a "light" in darkness. They are "gracious and compassionate" like God.

IV. Blessings of Being Gracious and Compassionate (112:5)

5 Here "good" (GK 3202) is the quality of the righteous. They are "good" in that they are concerned about those in need and generously lend out money. They do not give their money away but invest it in the unfortunate, expecting to get it back only without interest. They show themselves a people of "justice" (GK 5477). They know God's revealed will.

V. Blessing in Adversity (112:6–8)

6–8 Because the wise hold to the precepts of God, they are "steadfast" in that they "will never be shaken," they "will have no fear," and their "heart is steadfast" and "secure." The wise may experience all kinds of surprises in life, but they will persevere in doing good. In all situations of life, they trust is in the Lord, knowing that "in the end" God will turn the gloatings and fortunes of the wicked. Godliness has its rewards in this life and in the life to come.

VI. Blessings of Righteousness (112:9)

9 The psalmist has singled out generosity and compassion as the hallmarks of wise living. Such living leads to lasting success. The work of the godly endures; their reward is in the exaltation and honor of their children.

VII. The Curse on the "Longings" of the Wicked (112:10)

10 The wicked, as they see God's reward on the righteous (vv.6, 9), are filled with anger, bitterness, and jealousy. However, such anger will not last, for they will destroy themselves in their resentment. The wicked will not succeed. All their schemings and plans "will come to nothing."

The Egyptian Hallel: Psalms 113–118

The Hallel psalms are found in three separate collections: the "Egyptian Hallel" (113–118), the "Great Hallel" (120–136), and the concluding Hallel psalms (146–150). The Hallel psalms had a significant part in the "praise" (Heb. hallel; GK 2146) of the Lord. The Egyptian Hallel and the Great Hallel were sung during the annual feasts (Lev 23; Nu 10:10). The Egyptian Hallel psalms received a special place in the Passover liturgy, as 113–114 were recited or sung before and 115–118 after the festive meal (cf. Mt 26:30; Mk 14:26). The concluding Hallel psalms (146–150) were incorporated in the daily prayers in the synagogue after the destruction of the temple (A.D. 70).

Psalm 113: The Lord Is Exalted in His Saving Acts

Psalms 113 and 114 are both in the form of descriptive praise psalms.

I. Call to Praise the Lord (113:1–3)

1–3 The "servants of the LORD"—i.e., his loyal people together with the priests and the Levites—comprise everyone who know the Lord. The threefold repetition of the "name of the LORD" calls attention to the acts and the self-revelation of the Lord. The praise of the Lord, who acted and revealed himself in creation and in redemption, is to be a lasting "praise" (GK 2146). Furthermore, the worship of the Lord is to be universal. With the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, the true worship of God has been extended to all the globe.

II. The Sovereignty of the Lord (113:4–6)

4–6 The Lord is sovereign over everything. This bold statement evokes a rhetorical question: "Who is like the LORD our God?" The Lord is exalted in his rule, "enthroned on high." Yet he has also accommodated himself to the needs of his people; he "stoops down" to his needy children! What a marvellous God—high and mighty, and yet deeply caring about people.

III. Call to Praise for His Acts of Deliverance (113:7–9)

7–9 The Lord takes care of the needs of the "poor" and "needy" by moving them from being outcasts of society to having a position of prominence. A barren woman in ancient society was a social outcast. However, the goodness of the Lord extends to blessing his people with children. The psalm concludes on the note it began with: "Praise the LORD."

Psalm 114: We Are the People of God!

Psalm 114 is one of the Egyptian Hallel Psalms (see Ps 113). By genre it is a hymn of descriptive praise.

I. The Covenant People (114:1–2)

1–2 Israel was marvelously delivered out of a foreign land, from a people who spoke a different language. It was this nation that the Lord chose for his "sanctuary" (GK 7731; often translated "holy") and "dominion" (GK 4939). These two words echo God's promises to all the Twelve Tribes. In Ex 19:5–6 he promised Israel that they would become his "treasured possession," a "kingdom of priests and a holy nation." The whole people became "holy" to the Lord; Israel had become his "sacred dominion." The references to "Judah" and to "Israel" in v.2 are not contrastive but parallel. All Twelve Tribes had become the "sacred dominion" of the Lord by covenant at Mount Sinai.

II. The Witness of Nature (114:3–6)

3–6 The wonder of Israel's election as the covenant people has its effect on the world of nature. The psalmist chooses the motif of Israel passing through the Red Sea and the Jordan River as a background for a celebration of the wonder of God's revelation to Israel. The mountains and hills "skipped" upon hearing about the victorious power of the Lord in these redemptive events (first stated positively, then by a series of rhetorical questions). It is as if the psalmist calls on nature to bear witness to that great event, when God established his kingdom on earth.

III. The Covenant God (114:7–8)

7–8 The repetition of "at the presence of" introduces the answer to the questions and the climactic conclusion. The God of Israel is "Lord" (GK 123), and the Master of the universe is no other than "the God of Jacob." His powerful and marvelous way has not ceased, for he continues to turn (lit. tr.) "the rock into a p ɔol, the hard rock into springs of water."

Psalm 115: We Are the Servants of God!

Psalm 115 may be classified as a psalm of communal confidence. These psalms are closely related to communal thanksgiving songs and to communal laments.

I. Community Prayer for Help (115:1–2)

1 The community has suffered. With the adversity of God's people, the glory of the Lord is at stake. Consequently, they are concerned about the honor and glory of the name of the Lord. Only after making their protest with an appeal to his glory do the godly remind the Lord of his promised "love and faithfulness."

2–3 Because of the present adversity, the "nations" were quick in casting aspersions on the honor of Israel's God. The godly firmly believe that God is "in heaven" and that he can do whatever "pleases him"; but out of concern for his reputation among the nations, they raise this argument.

II. Impotence of Idols (115:4–8)

4–8 Whereas the Lord has the creative powers, the idols are "made" by human beings. They are limited in power because they are human artifacts, share in human limitations, and are made of materials that come out of the earth. They have human anatomical features, but they are powerless. Ultimately divine revelation is the difference between human religions and the true religion of the Lord. Not only are idols worthless, those who worship them are also vain. False worship is not innocent but demoralizing, and ultimately the worshipers will perish together with their perishable idols.

III. Confidence in the Lord (115:9–11)

9–11 How different is the religion of revelation! The people of God, led in worship by the priests, do not come to him with images. He comes to them with the promise of blessing ("help") and protection ("shield"). In response to his covenant, he expects nothing but loyalty from his people. The threefold call "trust in the LORD" has a corresponding threefold assurance of God's protection.

It is unclear whether those "who fear him" are a separate class from the house of Israel (i.e., the "God-fearers" or proselytes), or a synonym for "house of Israel," or a euphemism for all Israel (i.e., laity as well as priests). But the conclusion is the same, as the psalmist calls on everyone to "trust in the LORD" by abandoning false worship.

IV. Blessing of the Lord (115:12–15)

12–13 The godly are assured that the Lord will always "bless" (GK 1385) his own. Though they may experience affliction and testing, he "remembers" (GK 2349) those with whom he has made a covenant. The Lord does not discriminate between the tribes of Israel, between the laity and priesthood, or between the important and the social outcasts. He is the God of his people, and all his own will be the recipients of his blessing.

14–15 The blessing as a word of promise holds out a great future for God's people. In accordance with his promise to Abraham (Ge 12:2), the Lord will bless his people with fruitfulness in descendants. During periods of adversity, the people were concerned with their future. The Lord renews the promise through these words of benediction.

V. Power of the Lord (115:16)

16 The certainty of blessing, increase, and protection (vv.9–15) lies in Israel's belief in who God is: He is "the Maker of heaven and earth" (v.15), who sovereignly rules over everything he has created. He is enthroned in "the highest heavens," though he has graciously given the dominion of the created earth to humans—in the service of the Lord.

VI. Community Praise (115:17–18)

17 Humans must be submissive to the Lord alone. However, if the adversities of God's people persist, more and more may die. They will go down to "silence" in the grave and can no longer join in the processions, annual feasts, and liturgies.

18 Those singing this psalm pray for the opportunity to fulfill their calling to praise the Lord. Regardless of the outcome of their present dilemma, they know that their God will deliver them, because he has elected them to praise him on his earth. They affirm their commitment to "extol" him "both now and forevermore." The concluding exhortation "Praise the LORD" is the usual conclusion of each of the Egyptian Hallel psalms.

Psalm 116: Be at Rest, for the Lord Is Good

This psalm is the fourth of the Egyptian Hallel psalms (see Ps 113). By genre the psalm belongs to the classification of individual thanksgiving hymns.

I. Thanksgiving (116:1–2)

1–2 An emphatically placed "I love" opens the psalm. The psalmist's reason for the expression of endearment is motivated by answered prayer. The Lord has heard the "cry for mercy." God's attentiveness to prayer is restated in v.2, and the psalmist is encouraged to call on him "as long as I live."

II. The Need for Deliverance (116:3)

3 "Death" and the "grave" (GK 8619) are personified as hunters lying in wait with "cords" to entangle the godly. The psalmist had been in great distress; life had become like "hell."

III. God the Deliverer (116:4–6a)

4–6a In this terrible situation the psalmist resorted to his only hope: the "name" of the Lord, which signifies everything a human needs in life and death. He is fully aware that the Lord is "gracious" in his forgiveness and in sustaining his children, "righteous" in keeping the covenant, and "full of compassion" in his understanding of the limits of his children. This affirmation of the character of God is why he gives thanks.

IV. Thanksgiving (116:6b–7)

6b–7 The description of the character of the Lord evokes from the psalmist an affirmation of how the Lord "saved" him. The psalmist called on the Lord, "Save me" (v.4), and the Lord was true to his promise. Then reflecting on his past misery, he can speak words of comfort to himself because of God's goodness. He can be "at rest" because he knows his God.

V. God the Deliverer (116:8–11)

8–9 Only the Lord can change "death," "tears," and "stumbling" into a "walk before the LORD" and a joyful celebration of life "in the land of the living."

10–11 Especially in his distress, the psalmist learned the lesson of true faith: "I believed even when I said . . ." (see NIV note). He admits that in his "dismay" he became more aware of human limitations as he saw "men" (GK 132) for what they really are: "vain" (i.e., "liars").

VI. Vows of Thanksgiving (116:12–14)

12 The Lord was faithful, and the psalmist responds to his acts of goodness with a question that has only one answer. There is no way to "repay" the Lord.

13–14 As a token of his thanksgiving, the psalmist brings "a thank offering" (v.17), together with a drink offering, which he calls "the cup of salvation." At that time he called again "on the name of the LORD," this time to thank him and praise his holy name for his fidelity to his promises. The thank offering was a fulfillment of the "vows" made during the distress.

VII. God the Deliverer (116:15–16)

15–16 The psalmist confesses the great love of the Lord for his "saints" in that he does not lightly permit adversity or an early death. They are "precious" to him. The psalmist is God's "servant," born within the household of faith. Again he affirms the Lord's faithfulness to him.

VIII. Vows of Thanksgiving (116:17–19)

17–19 In the presence of the godly, the psalmist will show his gratitude to the Lord for his deliverance. He will present a "thank offering" (see comment on vv.13–14). As prescribed in the priestly laws, he had to present his offering in the courts of the temple in Jerusalem.

Psalm 117: Great Is His Love Toward Us

Psalm 117 is the fifth of the Egyptian Hallel psalms (113–118; see Ps 113). It is the shortest psalm, consisting of only two verses.

Its genre resembles that of the hymns of descriptive praise.

1–2 The usual "praise the LORD" in the Egyptian Hallel psalms is directed to the covenant community. However, this time the psalmist calls on the Gentiles ("nations"; GK 1580) to praise the Lord. The reason for the universal praise lies in the Lord's relationship to Israel: he reveals a constancy of "love" and "faithfulness." These two perfections are often paired, as God's love is always faithful.

Psalm 118: Open the Gates of Righteousness

Psalm 118 is the last of the Egyptian Hallel psalms (see comments on Ps 113). The psalm exhibits features of communal and individual thanksgiving.

I. Call to Communal Thanksgiving (118:1–4)

1–4 All Israel had enjoyed the benefits of God's "goodness" and his unfailing "love": the congregation of Israel, the priests, and "those who fear the LORD."

II. Thanksgiving (118:5–21)

5 Apparently here an individual worshiper represents the people in giving testimony to the Lord's goodness. Originally the worship leader may have been the king or a priest, but anyone of God's people may recite God's acts in response to the prayers of God's people. The worshiper thanks the Lord because he has heard his cry of "anguish." He was without perspective and in dire straits, but the Lord answered him by "setting [him] free."

6–7 The psalmist knew that the Lord was with him in all circumstances of life; based on that conviction he was not afraid of troubles caused by his fellow human beings. The presence of the Lord is personal. He comforts with his support and gives a new perspective on the future.

8–9 In a hymnic celebration, the individual worshiper confesses his confidence in the Lord. Such confidence is far superior to relying on flesh and blood. The mention of "man" in parallelism with "princes" is a literary manner of including all of humanity, both lowly and exalted.

10–12 The language of the troubles may be interpreted literally or metaphorically. If a king is the speaker, the reference to "all the nations," the repetition of "surrounded me" and "I cut them off," as well as the metaphorical comparison ("bees," "burning thorns") may be interpreted as a great victory over the enemies. On the other hand, this can also be interpreted as a hyperbole of great adversity. Great as the adversity was, the psalmist overcame his feeling of anguish "in the name of the LORD," which is powerful indeed.

13–14 The adversity was so great that the psalmist felt himself pushed and was "about to fall." However, the Lord was faithful to his promise to keep his own from falling or stumbling (121:3). The word "strength" (GK 6437) denotes his power in saving while "salvation" (GK 3802) suggests the whole process of his mighty acts, his judgment on the adversaries, and his help to his children. "Song" may mean "victory song."

15–16 The victory of the Lord provides the occasion for communal rejoicing. The godly join in the celebration of God's mighty acts. They sing a chorus or refrain whose subject is the Lord's "right hand."

17–18 The psalmist has individually experienced the Lord's power to restore and sustain life. The troubles are likened to death, but the Lord's favor is life. "Live" (GK 2649) signifies here the joyful proclamation of "what the LORD has done": his acts of discipline (cf. Heb 12:5–11).

19–20 In the festal procession only the "righteous" (GK 7404) are permitted entrance to the presence of the Lord, symbolically guarded by "the gates of righteousness." The psalmist strongly confesses his unswerving loyalty to and trust in the Lord. Those who enter into the Lord's presence must meet this requirement of covenant loyalty and trust.

21 In this company of the righteous, the psalmist shares his testimony of "thanks" for the Lord's victory. The emphasis is on the Lord's "salvation," which is consistent with the emphasis in this psalm on the Lord's gracious and complete deliverance of his people. The Lord has been with the individual as he was with Israel of old, in the days of Moses.

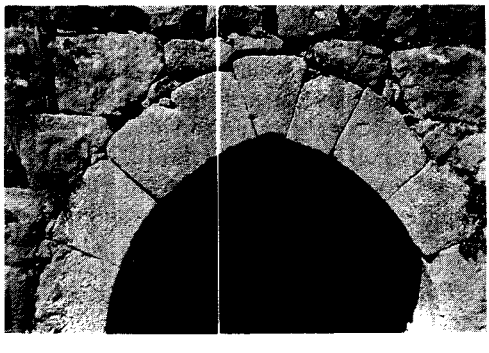
III. Thanksgiving Liturgy (118:22–29)

22–23 The Lord has given prominence to his suffering servant like a "capstone." This was an important stone that held two rows of stones together in a corner ("cornerstone") or stabilized the stones at the foundation. The Lord changed the speaker's adversity, likened to the throwing away of a capstone, into a "marvelous" demonstration of himself.

24–25 The day of thanksgiving is the day of salvation. The songs of rejoicing encourage the godly to renew their prayers for God's help. The phrase "save us" (Hosanna; GK 3828) is related to the noun rendered "salvation." The congregation requests the Lord to continue to do his wonderful acts so that they will "prosper."

26–27 In response to the people's trust in the Lord, the king or priest blesses all who come to the Lord in his "name." The people respond to this blessing with a confession that "the LORD is God," by whose "light" they exist and are protected from the darkness of famine, war, and exile. They also renew their thanksgiving to the Lord in making a procession to the temple in Jerusalem. They demonstrate their commitment in concrete acts, whether they come with "boughs in hand" during the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 23:40) or with "festal sacrifices" (see NIV note).

28–29 The worship leader leads the community in the affirmation that the Lord alone is God. Israel must give thanks to him, because "he is good; his love endures forever" (cf. v.1).



The most significant stone in a doorway was the capstone, the top stone that was shaped like the letter "V." If that stone were removed, the entire archway would collapse. Jesus is the capstone of our lives (118:22).

Psalm 119: The Joy of God's Law in Distress

This longest psalm in the Psalter is well known for its teaching on God's law. Yet the beauty of this psalm lies in the psalmist's absolute devotion to the Lord. The genre corresponds most closely to that of the wisdom psalms. Yet the psalm also reflects elements of lament, thanksgiving, innocence, praise, and confidence. Psalm 119 is an alphabetic acrostic psalm, consisting of twenty-two stanzas of eight verses each.

The psalmist uses eight words for God's law:

1. "Law" (torah; GK 9368) occurs twenty-five times. In the broad sense it refers to any "instruction" flowing from the revelation of God as the basis for life and action. In the narrow sense it denotes the Law of Moses, whether the Pentateuch, the priestly law, or the Deuteronomic law.

2. "Word" (dabar; GK 1821) is any word that proceeds from the mouth of the Lord. It is a general designation for divine revelation.

3. "Laws" (mishpatim; GK 5477) pertain to particular legal issues ("case laws") that form the basis for Israel's legal system. God himself is the Great Judge.

4. "Statute(s)" (eduth/edoth; GK 6339) derives from the word that means "witness," "testify"; "testimony" is often synonymous with "covenant" (cf. 25:10; 132:12). The observance of the "statutes" of the Lord signifies loyalty to the terms of the covenant between God and Israel.

5. "Command(s)" (mitswah/mitswoth; GK 5184) is a frequent designation for anything that the Lord, the covenant God, has ordered.

6. "Decrees" (huqqim; GK 2976) is derived from the root for "engrave," "inscribe." God reveals his royal sovereignty by establishing his divine will in nature and in the covenant community.

7. "Precepts" (piqqudim; GK 7218) occurs only in the book of Psalms and appears to be synonymous with "covenant" (103:18) and with the revelation of God (111:7). Its root connotes the authority to determine the relationship between the speaker and the object.

8. "Word" or "promise" (imrah; GK 614) may denote anything God has spoken, commanded, or promised.

I. The Aleph Strophe (119:1–8)

1–8 The blessing of God (see 1:1) rests on those who give themselves to wise living. They are people of integrity ("blameless"), whose walk follows the path set out in God's revelation, "the law" (torah). In his "statutes" (edoth) God sets down how he is to be loved, and his loving children respond to his wishes. The "decrees" (huqqim) of the Lord give order to human lives, even as they uphold order in the created world. Negatively, the people of integrity "do nothing wrong."

The hope of the godly lies in the Lord. The psalmist prays that his response to God's revelation may be acceptable and that no "shame" or ultimate disgrace may overtake him. "Shame" (GK1017) connotes a state of being abandoned by the Lord and condemned to utter ruin. Thus he prays that the Lord will have mercy on his servant and "not utterly forsake" him.

The psalmist looks for God's favor by which he may again praise his God "with an upright heart." The "laws" (mishpatim) of God are "righteous" in that they establish divine order in this world, granting the godly a sense of deliverance and freedom. As a final expression of commitment, the psalmist stresses that he will "obey" the "decrees" of God.

II. The Beth Strophe (119:9–16)

9 The young man may keep his way "pure" (GK 2342) by the practice of godliness by living according to God's "word" (dabar).

10–16 The teacher exemplifies the wise response to God's revelation in vv.10–16. He demonstrates his sincere love for God by treasuring his "word" of promise (imrah) in his "heart." The act of "hiding" (GK 7621) God's word is not only memorization but extends to living in devotion to the Lord.

The teachable spirit begins with a proper regard for God. Little instruction in godliness takes place unless the heart is full of praise. The psalmist declares repeatedly that his inner "delight" and joy are in God and his revelation, not material acquisition. The external expression of this inner loyalty to the Lord is joyful obedience. Part of his practice of godliness is to speak positively about God's "laws" (mishpatim), which he treasures as having come out of the "mouth" of the Lord.

III. The Gimel Strophe (119:17–24)

17–20 In difficulty and distress, the Lord and his word are a comfort to the godly. The prayer for help presupposes a close relationship between the Lord and the psalmist. As a "stranger," his yearning for God and his word is so strong that he feels as if crushed in his alienation from God. He prays that he may "live" a life of fellowship with God and in obedience to his "word" (dabar), and he longs to see the "wonderful things in [God's] law."

21–24 God's blessing rests on those who submit themselves to the law of God, whereas his curse comes on all those who "stray" deliberately from it. The "arrogant" despise God and godliness with their "scorn and contempt." By contrast, God's "servant" shows his loyalty to God's "statutes" (edoth) by observing them and by "meditating" on his "decrees" (huqqim). In spite of opposition from the community and her "rulers," the psalmist receives joy and guidance from God's "statutes" (edoth) as his "counselors."

IV. The Daleth Strophe (119:25–32)

25–27 The psalmist's experience of mortality forces him even closer to the Lord. Only God can deliver him and through his "word" (dabar) give him a new lease on "life." In his adversities he becomes more teachable. He opens his life to God, believing that the Lord answers prayer. In his devotion to God, he desires to understand and apply God's word and thus deepen his dependence on the Lord. The word opens up the greatness of God's acts in creation and in redemption.

28–32 The word of God has the power to "strengthen" those overwhelmed with "sorrow." The word of God also keeps one from the ways of the world, as it renews an inner, burning desire to live a life of devotion to God. Such devotion focuses on doing God's will. On the one hand, the psalmist fully depends on the Lord for life, sustaining grace, and illumination (vv.25–29); on the other hand, he is fully responsible in "seeking" the kingdom of God by choosing and living a life of loyalty to God and his word.

The psalmist further prays that his lifestyle will keep him from anxiety and adversity ("shame"). He will not only "walk" (vv.1, 3) in the "path of your commands," but he will "run." The Lord has given him a sense of freedom from anxiety and care.

V. The He Strophe (119:33–40)

33–37 The purpose of God's positive direction and protection from evil is to encourage the psalmist to keep the law. Keeping the law was not a matter of external conformity in the OT but required "a heart" of absolute devotion to God. By God's help he will "follow" his "decrees" (huqqim) and receive God's reward. His "delight" of radical loyalty from the heart is a work of grace. He prays that the Lord may "preserve" him as he walks in the way of God.

38–40 The mood of the prayer changes abruptly to a call for action. The psalmist asks the Lord to "fulfill" his "word" or "promise" (imrah) of "righteousness" (GK 614) to his servant. In his righteousness God delivers, frees, preserves life, and removes a dreaded "disgrace." The delight in God's laws is in direct relationship to his prayer that the Lord's righteousness be established for him and for all of God's servants.

VI. The Waw Strophe (119:41–48)

41–42 This strophe continues the elements of prayer and commitment. The words "unfailing love" and "salvation" explicate the prayer for renewal "in your righteousness" (v.40). The "righteousness" of God extends to deliverance and vindication from one's adversaries. The dreaded "disgrace" will be removed, and the psalmist will rebuke the one who "taunts" him. Hope in salvation is grounded in God's word of "promise," and his promise calls for "trust."

43–45 The psalmist pleads with the Lord to be true to his promises. The psalmist promises to remain loyal to the Lord throughout life. His devotion is a free expression of his love for God, and in this walk he experiences the Lord's blessing and bounty.

46–48 The psalmist vows to speak about God's "statutes" (edoth) unashamedly, even in the presence of "kings." He is so full of love for God and so filled with joy in the prospect of salvation that he strongly asserts his "love" and "delight" as he prays and meditates.

VII. The Zayin Strophe (119:49–56)

49–56 The psalmist knows that the Lord's promises are sure; therefore he has "hope" and "comfort" even in suffering. The "arrogant mock" him, but he gets more provoked at their apostasy from God than at the suffering they cause him. They drive him to greater loyalty. The word of the Lord sustains and restores life. He can therefore sing the praises of God's "decrees" (huqqim) day and night. This lifestyle does not develop overnight but comes from habitual practice.

VIII. The Heth Strophe (119:57–64)

57–64 The strophe begins with a familiar formula of trust and ends on an exclamation of God's cosmic and unfailing "love" (GK 2876). The psalmist promises a deeper commitment "to obey" God's words. His petition for God's grace is urgent and corresponds to his diligence toward God's law. Even if the Lord delays his redemption, permitting the wicked to triumph for a while, the psalmist affirms his loyalty as being of primary importance. Faith in God's "righteous" laws triumphs and brings out a song of thanksgiving, freeing him from the "ropes" of the wicked (a metaphor for their reign of terror). The psalmist shows his love by his attentiveness to the word of God and by associating with the godly, who "fear" the Lord and "who follow [his] precepts." The world of creation witnesses to his love.

IX. The Teth Strophe (119:65–72)

65–72 The Lord is "good" because he is faithful to his word. "Knowledge" (GK 1981) primarily denotes the knowledge of God in one's communion with him and secondarily the response to the life of fellowship with the Lord. The psalmist's experience of humiliation and affliction, caused by "the arrogant," was good. Because of it he has given himself more to "learning," applying, and loving of God's "precepts" (piqqudim), "law" (torah), and "decrees" (huqqim). The discipline of the Lord has changed his life; he used to "go astray," but now he obeys God's word and is restored in fellowship.

X. The Yodh Strophe (119:73–80)

73–74 The psalmist believes that God has "made" him for the purpose of having "understanding" to fulfill his "commands"

(mitswoth). Since he has initiated the relationship, the psalmist is confident that the righteous may soon rejoice.

75–80 The psalmist can say, "I know" that God's "laws" (mishpatim) are "righteous" and faithful, because he has an experiential knowledge of God, of his "unfailing love," and of his "compassion." God's purpose for affliction is to refine the relationship with his children. When he looks at humans, the psalmist sees the "arrogant," who have wrongfully dealt with him and must get their just deserts. While waiting he continues to "delight" in God's "law" (torah), to "meditate" on the Lord's "precepts" (piqqudim, v.78), and to walk in a "blameless" way before God. The psalmist also prays that they who "fear" the Lord may be encouraged and rejoice at God's vindication.

XI. The Kaph Strophe (119:81–88)

81–88 In his despair the psalmist looks only to the Lord for his "salvation," as promised in his "word." He is being persecuted "without cause," and his endurance is wearing down. His soul "faints," his "eyes fail," and he feels as if he is near the end of his strength. He feels himself to be "like a wineskin in the smoke," i.e., useless, shriveled, and unattractive because of being blackened with soot. In his loneliness he wonders when God will comfort him, and he asks the Lord to execute "justice" (mishpat). In contrast to the "arrogant," he loves God and his word. Thus he also submits himself to the Lord's "help" for preservation of life.

XII. The Lamedh Strophe (119:89–96)

89–93 The nature of the Lord is reflected in everything he has created, and "all things serve" him. The psalmist found "delight" in the "law" (torah) of the Lord. Had he not found meaning in his "affliction," he feels that he would have perished like a falling star. Therefore he will not forget the "precepts" (piqqudim) of the Lord, for they give order and preservation of life.

94–96 The psalmist knows that he belongs to God. Therefore he prays that the Lord will continue to sustain his life, in spite of the opposition of "the wicked." As their violence increases, he seeks refuge in a diligent study of the "statutes" (edoth) of the Lord. The "commands" (mitswoth) of the Lord liberate him and give him a new lease on life.

XIII. The Mem Strophe (119:97–104)

97–104 The love of God's law derives from love for God. "Meditation" (GK 8491) is a form of devotion. The psalmist delights in his understanding of God's law. He reflects on his devotion in relation to the "enemies," "teachers," and "elders," and he rejects the way of the wicked. He was obedient to the Lord and did not "depart" from his laws. The "words" of promise (imrah) are likened to "honey"; God's instructions are sweet, and they lead to understanding and obedience.

XIV. The Nun Strophe (119:105–12)

105–12 The psalmist who hates "every wrong path" thanks the Lord that he has given him his "word" (dabar) as a guide and life-sustaining source ("light") as he walks on the "path" of life. The "laws" (mishpatim) of God are "righteous" and are comforting even in adversity. The psalmist affirms that the Lord alone can "preserve" life. Even in affliction he has learned to give the Lord "willing praise."

The wicked attempt to hunt down the psalmist and catch him. But he is determined to be loyal to the Lord. Thus far he has not yet strayed. His joy and determination to please the Lord are much greater than the affliction with which he lives constantly.

XV. The Samekh Strophe (119:113–20)

113–20 The ways of the righteous and the wicked are clearly divergent. The wicked are "double-minded," "evildoers," disobedient to God's word, and deceptive. The psalmist "hates" that lifestyle, but he "loves" the law of the Lord. He draws near to God for "refuge," for he is the psalmist's "shield" or protection. He thus prays that the Lord will "sustain" and "uphold" him so that he may "live." He also believes that the Lord's righteous judgment will come on the wicked. The Lord will "discard" them like "dross," the scum that forms when a precious metal is being refined. How different are the godly! They have hope. They draw near to God and find delight in his word.

The psalmist concludes with a final affirmation of godly fear. He stands in "awe" of the Lord and "trembles."

XVI. The Ayin Strophe (119:121–28)

121–28 The psalmist has done what is "righteous and just." Now he expects the Lord to conform to his "righteous promise," according to which the godly will be delivered from all adversities. God's "salvation" extends to all the needs of his people, as they look for a renewal of God's "love" (GK 2876) and deliverance from the "arrogant." The godly psalmist also reveals that he has a teachable spirit.

The psalmist affirms his love for the Lord's "commands" (mitswoth) and compares them favorably with "gold, more than pure gold." He also affirms his commitment to the Lord by expressing loyalty to his "precepts" (piqqudim). Together with the psalmist's affirmation of devotion is a righteous indignation at the way the ungodly have broken God's "law" (torah).

XVII. The Pe Strophe (119:129–36)

129–31 The psalmist considers the many benefits of God's word. His "statutes" (edoth) are "wonderful"; through them he gains insight into God's revelation. The psalmist uses the metaphor of "mouth" to suggest that he has a great appetite for the "commands" (mitswoth) of the Lord. He "pants" for them as he waits with great anticipation.

132–36 The Lord's blessing brings "mercy," directs and protects from sin and adversities, and extends God's favor to all of life. The psalmist's prayer for God's blessing is in accordance with God's own promises. He gives himself with greater commitment to do God's will and weeps over the continuation of rebellion and transgression. "Streams of tears" is a hyperbole for deep sorrow and anguish of soul.

XVIII. The Tsadhe Strophe (119:137–44)

137–44 The conviction that the Lord is "righteous" and "trustworthy" evokes a response of "zeal," which increases as the psalmist's adversities increase. His adversaries "ignore" God's laws, whereas he does not "forget" them. Instead, he "loves" them and finds his "delight" in them. Yet he feels that his loyalty to the Lord and his devotion to godliness have been unrewarded. Instead, troubles have come his way. But he holds on to faith in the Lord, praying humbly that he may "understand" so as to be revived in his inner being.

XIX. The Qoph Strophe (119:145–52)

145–49 Out of the conviction of God's righteousness, the psalmist cries out for God's help. He feverishly presents his lament before the Lord that he may "answer" him in delivering him from adversity. While waiting for God's deliverance, he faithfully holds to God's expectations. His longing for God is so intense that he prays "for help" throughout the night. At that time he also "meditates" on God's "promises" (imrah). He waits for the Lord to come through, having put his "hope" in God's word and in renewal of God's "love" (GK 2876).

150–52 Though the wicked hunt the psalmist down, the Lord is nearby. Moreover, his relationship with the Lord has been well established. His "statutes" (edoth) are constant.

XX. The Resh Strophe (119:153–60)

153–60 The psalmist again affirms his loyalty to the Lord as the godless haunt him and flaunt the commandments of the Lord. As he looks at them, he also affirms his innocence in that he has purposefully avoided their influence (cf. 1:1). They are "the faithless" (GK 953), i.e., they have broken the covenant relationship with the Lord and their words and acts are unreliable.

There is the deep cognizance that only the Lord can "deliver" and "redeem." Therefore the psalmist prays for the Lord to "defend my cause." The very nature of his existence is in jeopardy. His adversaries are many, but God's "compassion" (GK 8171) is "great." The expression "all your words" means that from the beginning God's word is true, even as his "laws" (mishpat) are forever "righteous" (GK 7406). The fidelity and righteousness of his word sustain the psalmist.

XXI. The Sin and Shin Strophe (119:161–68)

161–65 The context of adversity is unchanged, as the "rulers" of the people continually "persecute . . . without cause." But the psalmist rejoices in the "promise" of the Lord and in God's instruction, like a warrior returning with "great spoil." He praises the Lord many times a day for his "righteous laws." The godly magnify God's name because they know he will vindicate them. Therefore they have "peace." Though surrounded by adversity, they are confident that with the Lord's help they will not "stumble."

166–68 In anticipation of that great day of "salvation," the psalmist gives himself to hopeful waiting and to the practice of godliness. He obeys God's precepts from a committed heart. He keeps God's laws out of "love," for God discerns all his activities, emotions, hopes, and fears.

XXII. The Taw Strophe (119:169–76)

The last strophe of this lengthy psalm contains a prayer for the Lord's salvation. The issues have not been resolved, but the design of the psalm is such that it raises the spirit of expectation in those who love God's word.

169–72 The psalmist comes before the Lord with a broken spirit, crying out for mercy. He appeals for "understanding" to discern how best to respond to his adversities with hope in the promises. He also asks for deliverance. In anticipation of that moment of redemption, he contemplates the joyful expressions of thanksgiving. Then he will bubble forth with "praise" and will respond in song to God's fulfilled "word."

173–76 Verses 173–75 repeat the motifs of prayer, a commitment to God's word, and an anticipation to praise the Lord for his redemption. "Hand" is a metaphor for God's powerful deliverance, for which the psalmist "longs," because God's deliverance preserves life. The last verse of the psalm is a cry from a broken spirit, not a confession of apostasy. The psalmist feels helpless, like a "lost sheep," and cries to his Good Shepherd to "seek" him, for he has not neglected God or his word.

Psalm 120: The Lord, I, and They

Psalms 120–134 form a collection known as the "Songs of Ascents," which in turn is a major part of the Great Hallel psalms (120–36; see comment on Ps 113). The meaning of the designation "song of ascents" is not clear. Likely the songs were sung in the three annual festival processions, as the pilgrims "ascended" to Jerusalem (cf. Ex 23:14–17; Dt 16:16). Though not beyond dispute, Ps 120 is an individual lament.

I. Assurance of Answered Prayer (120:1)

1 "On the LORD" expresses the sole dependence on God in the hour of distress. It is more natural to understand v.1 as having taken place in the past. The psalmist has already received assurance from the Lord that he will deal with his problem.

II. Prayer for Help (120:2–4)

2–4 The psalmist prays for relief and deliverance from false accusations and treachery. As the wicked have spoken deceptively, he prays that God will bring on them the fulfillment of their own words. The "deceitful" tongue is compared to a bow whose arrows are the words. The wicked must be uprooted for the sake of God's honor.

III. Expression of Desperation (120:5)

5 The psalmist laments his present condition, as he still dwells like a stranger "in Meshech," "among the tents of Kedar." Meshech is located in Asia Minor by the Black Sea; Kedar denotes the Arab tribesmen who lived in the Arabian Desert. In essence the psalmist is saying that his enemies are no better than hostile barbarians. He himself does not feel at home among an ungodly people.

IV. Longing for Peace (120:6–7)

6–7 The psalmist reminds the Lord that he has suffered long enough in his present situation. He has "lived" among apostates who "hate peace." They malign, slander, and make every aspect of life difficult for the godly. Tired of his affliction, he asks the Lord to establish peace.

Psalm 121: The Lord Is My Guardian

Psalm 121 is one of the fifteen "Songs of Ascents" (120–134; see Ps 120).

I. The Lord Is the Creator (121:1–2)

1–2 The psalmist is looking with great anxiety or longing to the hills. Perhaps he expected robbers to be hiding there. Or he may have looked with great anticipation if he were on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem (125:2). The "help" (GK 6469) the psalmist is concerned with pertains to protection, guidance, and blessing, which can only come from the Lord. He comforts himself with the thought that the Lord is "the Maker of heaven and earth." The creedal statement originally signified an apologetic statement on the Lord's sovereignty over all realms, thereby excluding any claims by pagan deities.

II. The Lord, the Guardian of Israel, Is "Your" Guardian (121:3–6)

3–6 The ground for the psalmist's confidence lies in the further development of the doctrine of God: the guardian ("he who watches") of Israel is the guardian of every believer. He protects, guides, and blesses his own. He will be their "shade" as he protects them day and night. The intensity of his care is further amplified as he never sleeps nor slumbers. The Lord is always there to help and to protect his people.

III. Blessing (121:7–8)

7–8 The Lord's care extends to all adversities, as he is sovereign over all affairs of life, especially the "life" (lit., "soul"; GK 5883) of his own child. Whatever his children do—whether they arrive at Jerusalem, go on a far journey, or return home—the Lord will "watch" over their affairs, "now and forevermore."

Psalm 122: May There Be Peace in Zion

This is one of the "Songs of Ascents" (120–134; see Ps 120). It is a Song of Zion by genre (46; 48; 76; 84; 87; 132), psalms that have much in common with the royal psalms as they celebrate the glories associated with Jerusalem: temple and kingship.

I. The Pilgrim's Joy (122:1–2)

1–2 The psalmist is reflecting on the many times that he has heard the call to go to the house of the Lord. At this point he is standing in Jerusalem and rejoicing—with the thousands of other pilgrims during one of the three pilgrimage feasts, Passover, Firstfruits, and Booths. These held a special redemptive-historical significance, as they commemorated God's goodness in the Exodus, the Conquest, and his continual care (cf. Dt 16:16).

II. The Pilgrim's Praise (122:3–5)

3–4 In praise of Jerusalem the psalmist looks above the heads of the throngs, where the walls and buildings of the city rise, giving the sense of being joined together. The Israelite tribes came together to praise "the name of the LORD" as an act of loyalty to his command (cf. Dt 12:5–6; Ps 81:3–5).

5 Jerusalem was not only the religious center, symbolized by the "house of the LORD" (v.1), but also the political center, symbolized by "the thrones for judgment." The kings of Judah upheld God's kingship to the extent that they were faithful in dispensing justice.

III. The Pilgrim's Prayer (122:6–9)

6–9 The psalmist longs for "the peace [shalom; GK 8934] of Jerusalem." The city whose name means "city of peace" did not always experience peace; nor did she provide "security" (GK 8932) and "prosperity" (GK 3202) to her population. The psalmist thus prays that Jerusalem may truly be a city of peace to all who love her, i.e., for "my brothers and my friends." In his reflective prayer on the peace of Jerusalem, the psalmist mentions her "walls" and "citadels," as well as "the house of the LORD."

Psalm 123: Have Mercy, O Lord

This is one of the "Songs of Ascents" (see Ps 120). It is a combination of individual lament and community lament.

I. Dependence on the Lord (123:1–2)

1–2 The Lord, to whom the psalmist looks dependently, rules sovereignly. He is exalted on the throne. This God is faithful to his people. They are threatened by the "arrogant" (v.4), and they look to the Lord for his intervention and mercy.

II. Prayer for Mercy (123:3–4)

3–4 The need for "mercy" arises out of a deep awareness of injustice done to God's children. They have unjustly "endured" great "contempt" and "ridicule" from the "proud" and "arrogant" of the world.

Psalm 124: Our Helper Is the Maker of Heaven and Earth!

This is one of the "Songs of Ascents" (see Ps 120). Its genre reflects that of the communal thanksgiving songs.

I. The Presence of the Lord (124:1–2a)

1–2a The repetition here is for the purpose of emphasis. Because the Lord has been with his people, they have not perished. The OT saints had a grateful awareness of God's presence in their midst.

II. Protection From Dangers (124:2b–5)

2b–3 The presence of God results in his blessings, which includes protection from enemies and dangers. Throughout her short history Israel was attacked from all sides. It often seemed as if enemies vented their anger with the living God against his people. The nations intended to destroy "life," which God had given to his people. However, life granted by the Lord cannot be smothered to death.

4–5 The violent acts that threatened to overwhelm God's people are likened to "the flood," "the torrent," and "the raging waters." The metaphor of water as a destructive force is common because of the torrential rains known to that part of the world. God's people nearly succumbed to its power, but the Lord was on their side (vv.1–2).

III. Praise to the Lord for Protection From Dangers (124:6–7)

6–7 The praise of the Lord is a transition between the confession of God's past acts of protection (vv.1–5) and the confession of confidence in the Lord. The song of thanksgiving praises God for delivering his own from the wicked, who, like wild animals, devour their prey. This is the Lord's doing; therefore he is to be praised!

IV. The Presence of the Lord (124:8)

8 The motif of God's presence begins and concludes this magnificent psalm. He is our "help," and he protects us by his "name." We need not fear, for the Maker of heaven and earth is in full control.

Psalm 125: Peace Be on Israel

This is one of the "Songs of Ascents" (see Ps 120). It is a mixture of confidence and lament, hence it could be either a communal psalm of confidence or a communal lament.

I. Internal Strength (125:1)

1 Mount Zion symbolizes God's power and help, his presence in blessing and protecting his people, and the privileges of the covenantal relationship. Because of their unshakable confidence in the Lord, the people are strong like Mount Zion.

II. Confidence in the Lord's Help (125:2)

2 Surrounded by mountains, Jerusalem was secure by its natural defensibility. So the psalmist compares the Lord to the hills around the city and the people to Mount Zion. The hills connote endurance and a sense of assurance and protection. God is "around" and present with his people.

III. Confidence in the Triumph Over Evil (125:3)

3 The "scepter [a symbol of rule] of the wicked" cannot coexist with the presence of God. Israel knew that the Lord had promised never to permit the wicked to prevail over the righteous, and this promise included the promise of "the land" of Canaan. If evil were to prevail, it might be an occasion for some of the godly to be tempted, to lose heart, and to fall away. For the sake of God's people, wickedness must come to an absolute end!

IV. Prayer for the Lord's Help (125:4–5b)

4–5b The people ask the Lord to remember them by doing good. He delivers "those who are good," i.e., "those who are upright in heart." Good works are expressions of an "upright heart." The "evildoers" are apostates who have turned "to crooked ways."

V. Peace (125:5c)

5c The benediction of God rests only on those who trust in him. They will receive God's "peace" (shalom; GK 8934).

Psalm 126: The Restoration Is Here!

This is one of the "Songs of Ascents" (see Ps 120). Its form reflects the genre of the community laments.

I. Joy of God's People (126:1–2a)

1–2a The restoration of "the captives to Zion" took place in 538 B.C. The people knew about the promises of restoration; but when the actual moment came, it was an overwhelming experience—they were like those "who dreamed." Great had been the sorrow of God's people in exile; but the restoration from exile filled their hearts with happiness, and they proclaimed with "laughter" and "shouts of joy" what God had done for them.

II. Proclamation Among the Nations (126:2b)

2b So great was the act of restoration that the "nations" (GK 1580) heard about it, too. Whenever the Lord "has done great things," his mighty works witness to his glorious ability to deliver his own.

III. Thanksgiving (126:3)

3 The wonder of deliverance is precious to God's people. First, they are in shock (v.1), but then they are overwhelmed with "joy."

IV. Prayer (126:4)

4 The returnees' prayer reflects on the harshness of their existence. Though they were restored, "nature" was not smiling kindly on the people. They pray for a restoration of their well-being in the land, like "streams in the Negev." The wadis in Canaan are generally dry; but when it rains, the water runs down its "streams" with great rapidity.

V. Assurance of Answered Prayer (126:5–6)

5–6 The short but intensive prayer of v.4 is answered. The Lord will turn their "tears" into "songs of joy." That assurance of blessing also encourages them to be responsible. The people are to go out and sow whatever little they have left, because the Lord will bless them. They must "lose" their seed before they can gain. The psalm concludes on the expectation of another divine miracle to take place: the people will "return" singing "songs of joy," because of the plentiful harvest.

Psalm 127: The Blessing of the Lord

In this song of ascent (see Ps 120), a wisdom psalm, the futility of life and the blessing of God are two contrastive themes.

I. Futility and Blessing (127:1–2)

1 The building of the house may refer to construction of a house or the raising of a family. In the OT it is usual to speak of a family as a "house" (cf. Ge 16:2; Ex 1:21; Ru 4:11; et al.). A second concern is the protection of the city—the Lord himself guards it. Thus the psalmist suggests that human efforts in the construction of one's house and involvement in the community's welfare are useless unless one trusts in the Lord.

2 The psalmist does not depreciate the importance of hard work. But he decries this as an inferior way of life if the hard work is only to provide daily food and clothing for oneself and the family. The higher way of life begins with trusting the Lord in one's work. With his blessing on their labor, the godly can rest without anguish.

II. God's Blessing on the Family (127:3–5)

3–5 The blessings of the Lord on the godly family are many. He gives children as an inheritance, and he also gives them a sense of security and protection. The psalmist likens the children of one's youth to "arrows." As the arrows protect the warrior, so the godly need not be afraid, when blessed with "sons." A house full of children, born before one becomes old, serves as a protection against loneliness and abandonment in society. These children have received a godly example at home; and when they come together in the city gate (the place where court was held), they will speak on behalf of their aging father in the presence of their enemies.

Psalm 128: The Family Blessed by the Lord

This psalm of ascent (see Ps 120) is a wisdom psalm (see Ps 127).

I. The Blessing of a God-Fearing Family (128:1–4)

1–2 The wise man is primarily concerned with walking in the ways of the Lord. The one who fears the Lord is a man of integrity; he receives a blessing from the Lord in all his labors.

3–4 The blessing mentioned in this psalm extends to the man's home. He will enjoy the warmth of wife and family around his table as he eats the fruit of his labors. His wife is compared to a fruitful vine, a plant that expresses tranquility, peace, and prosperity. His children are likened to olive shoots; the olive tree is a symbol of longevity and productivity. These images remind one of the eras of David and Solomon and of the messianic era. The blessedness of the godly man will extend to other generations.

II. The Benediction (128:5–6)

5–6 Blessing is not to be limited to a few days or years but to one's entire life. God's blessing goes with his people everywhere, even when they are not in Jerusalem. For the NT people of God, the blessing of God is on all those who are indwelt by his Holy Spirit.

The godly in the OT were concerned about the worship of God, the defense of Jerusalem, and the welfare of the Davidic dynasty. They knew that if a godly king were ruling over Jerusalem and if godly priests were serving in the temple, God's blessing would extend to his people. To see one's children's children is equivalent to "all the days of your life." The final blessing, "Peace be upon Israel," is equivalent to the prayer that the godly may see "the prosperity of Jerusalem" (cf. 122:9).

Psalm 129: The Lord Is Righteous

This is one of the "Songs of Ascents" (see Ps 120). The psalm reflects the genre of a communal confidence psalm.

I. Prayer for Divine Deliverance (129:1–4)

1–2 The psalmist has effectively brought together the individual in relation to the people of God. Difficult as certain moments in Israel's history have been, the people have been miraculously spared.

3–4 The psalmist likens the enemies to a farmer who plows the fields with long rows. The "plowmen" are the warriors, the long furrows are the wounds and adversities, and the field is "the back" of Israel. In spite of all their troubles, the Lord has delivered his own. The "cords" denote the yoke whereby the plow was attached to the neck of an animal.

II. Prayer for Divine Judgment (129:5–8)

5–8 The enemies who "hate Zion" are those who have no regard for God and his promises. "Zion" denotes the Lord's presence among his people, his covenant and blessing, and the hope in the victorious establishment of God's kingdom. The people pray that the wicked may wither like "grass on the roof," which is soon forgotten.

The enemies of Zion include not only the wicked of the world but also the Israelites who do not fear the Lord (cf. 125:5). They may feign piety, but in reality they are against God. The psalmist particularly singles out the godless Israelites who enjoyed hearing the greetings "The blessing of the LORD be upon you" and "we bless you in the name of the LORD" but whose lives were far from the Lord.

Psalm 130: May the Blessing of the Lord Be on You!

This psalm is classified as one of the seven penitential psalms (6; 32; 38; 51; 102; 130; 143). It also belongs to the "Songs of Ascents" (see Ps 120). Its genre reflects some features of the individual lament.

I. Lament (130:1–2)

1 To the godly, sin, guilt, and God's fatherly discipline are like being cast into "the depths" of the sea, a metaphor of adversity and trouble (cf. Jnh 2:2, 5), connoting a feeling of alienation from God. In his dire situation the psalmist calls on the "LORD," his covenant God.

2 The psalmist prays that the Lord may "be attentive" to his petition for "mercy" (GK 9384). This presupposes a servant-master relationship in which the "servant" petitions his "master" ("Lord") for a particular favor.

II. Confession of Sin (130:3–4)

3–4 The mercy of the Lord is found in forgiveness. He does not "keep" our "sins" in mind. If he did, even the most godly could not "stand" (GK 6641) in his presence, i.e., pass through his judgment and enjoy the benefits of his presence. God is feared, not only because of his great judgment and harshness, but also because of his great love in forgiving.

III. Waiting for the Lord (130:5–6)

5–6 The psalmist hopes in the Lord. He has learned to be submissive to God, the fountain of grace. From his concern with waiting like a watchman, who waits to be released from guard duty at the dawning of a new day, and from the concluding assurance that the Lord will redeem his people from their sins, we deduce that the anticipated "word" (GK 1821) denotes a new act of salvation by which the godly are upheld. The repetition in v.6 creates a deep sense of longing, dependence, and assurance.

IV. Confidence in Redemption (130:7–8)

7–8 Confidence in the Lord inspired the psalmist to call on all Israel to renew their submission to the Lord. The call "put your hope in the LORD" flows out of his own experiences (v.5). God's "unfailing love" (GK 2876) and "redemption" (GK 7014) are unmerited favors, which he sovereignly bestows on his children. His "full redemption" is so great that he can even forgive all his people from all their sin and free them from its consequences.

Psalm 131: Contentment With God

This is one of the "Songs of Ascents" (see Ps 120). In form it is an individual psalm of confidence.

1 The psalmist has experienced how wonderful complete submission to God is. The godly know that true godliness begins in a "heart" that is not proud, with eyes that do not envy, and with a walk of life that is humble rather than being preoccupied with "great matters."

2–3 David has enjoyed his walk with God in which he "stilled" himself and "quieted" his soul. He was like "a weaned child." This is a picture of contentment. Based on his wonderful relationship and walk with the Lord, David calls on Israel to trust in the Lord forevermore.

Psalm 132: The Tabernacling of the Lord

This psalm is one of the "Songs of Ascents" (see Ps 120). It is a tenth-century composition, celebrating the bringing of the ark of the covenant into Jerusalem (cf. 2Sa 6:12–19; Ps 132:6–10). The literary genre seems closest to a Song of Zion, especially because of its emphasis on the temple and on God's election of Zion.

I. Prayer for David (132:1, 10)

1, 10 The psalmist or a grateful congregation prays that the Lord will kindly remember all the acts of David's devotion. David had endured great "hardships" in the conquest of Jerusalem (2Sa 5:6–12) and in bringing the ark to Jerusalem. Verse 10 complete the thought of v.1. The prayer upholds David by the special designations "your servant" and "your anointed one" (GK 5431). These designations apply to David and to all his descendants who were anointed as kings over Israel or Judah.

II. David's Devotion (132:2–5)

2 Though the "oath" and "vow" to the God who had protected, guided, and blessed Jacob are not recorded in 2 Samuel, David was determined to bring the ark to Jerusalem and to have a temple built. When he heard that God had blessed Obed-Edom, the guardian of the ark (2Sa 6:12), he immediately made efforts to bring the ark to Jerusalem.

3–5 David strongly desired to build a temple for the Lord, a "place" for God's "dwelling." He made a temporary structure for the tabernacle and later desired to build a more permanent structure. That latter one had to wait until Solomon's reign to be constructed.

III. David's Concern for God's Presence (132:6–9)

6–8 David and his men heard of the whereabouts of the ark when they were at Ephrathah, "in the fields of Jaar." The people joined in the festal procession as the ark was led from Obed-Edom's house to Jerusalem, "his dwelling place," also known as God's "resting place." The placement of the ark in Jerusalem ushered in a new era in God's rule over Israel: the Davidic era.

9 The priests who served in the presence of the Lord were his instruments for dispensing "righteousness" This word (GK 7407) is synonymous here with "salvation," signifying victory, blessing, and deliverance. This blessedness resulted in great joy to God's loyal servants.

IV. Prayer for David (132:10)

10 See the comments on v.1.

V. God's Reward to David (132:11–12)

11–12 The Lord responded to David's "oath" (v.2) with his own "oath." David's concern and effort in establishing a "dwelling" (v.5) for the Lord were symmetric with the Lord's concern to establish the throne of David. The promises to Abraham (Ge 17:6) came to fulfillment during that grand era of David's and Solomon's kingship. David was the divinely appointed "seed" by whom the promises of the covenants were fulfilled.

God's promises must be balanced by responsibility. The king by his unique office must keep the "covenant," i.e., "the statutes" of the Lord. Only if the kings remained loyal to the covenant God would the dynasty of David rule.

VI. God's Presence in Zion (132:13–18)

13–14 The presence of the Lord on earth is related to his choice of Zion. In Zion, the earthly city of the Great King, God made his "dwelling" and "resting place." David prayed that the Lord might establish a "place" for "his footstool" in Jerusalem (vv.5, 7); and the Lord assured him that he "has chosen" and "desired" to establish his kingdom there.

15–16 The presence of the Lord guarantees his beneficence in "salvation," "abundant provisions," and "joy." The "poor" and the "priests" will share in this new age.

17–18 The "horn" (GK 7967) denotes the great vigor of the Davidic dynasty, by whom the Lord planned to rule over the earth (89:24–29; cf. Lk 1:69–75). David was further assured that his "lamp" (cf. 2Sa 21:17) had been "set up" and would be kept burning by the Lord. Through his dynasty ("crown") God's kingship was established, because God subdued his enemies. God's word of promise contains the Christian hope in the majesty, rule, and dominion of our Lord Jesus Christ, who as David's son will put down all of God's enemies (cf. Rev 19:17–21).

Psalm 133: The Communion of the Saints

This is one of the "Songs of Ascents" (see Ps 120). The metaphors, images, and blessing formula favor the classification of wisdom psalms.

I. Blessing (133:1)

1 The psalmist pronounces a blessing on those who "live together in unity." During the pilgrimages, the pilgrims came to Jerusalem from many different walks of life, regions, and tribes. Their unity was in conformity with the regulations for the three annual feasts (Ex 23:14–17; Lev 23:4–22, 33–43; Nu 28:16–31; 29:12–39; Dt 16:1–17). During these feasts the Jews celebrated their common heritage: redemption from Egypt and encampment around the tabernacle in the desert (cf. Nu 2).

II. Comparison With Oil and the Aaronic Ministry (133:2)

2 Fellowship of God's people on earth is an expression of the priesthood of all believers (cf. Ex 19:6; cf. 1Pe 2:9–10). The psalmist compares the expression of harmonious unity to the special, fragrant oil used by the priests (cf. Ex 30:22–33). Only the high priest and the other priests could be anointed with this oil. Aaron as the "head" of the priestly clan is representative of all the priests. Through the priestly institution the Lord assured his people of forgiveness and blessing.

III. Comparison With Dew (133:3a)

3a Because of its high altitude and abundant precipitation of rain, snow, and dew, Mount Hermon was proverbial for lush greenery even during the summer months (cf. 89:12) and for its dew that sustained the vegetation. The experience of the pilgrims is like that of the refreshing dew of Hermon. During the summer months virtually no precipitation falls on Jerusalem. During these months at least two pilgrimages were held: the Feast of Firstfruits in May/June and the Feast of Booths in September. Regardless of how harsh the conditions of the pilgrimage, the fellowship of the brotherhood of God's people was refreshing.

IV. Blessing (133:3b)

3b Where God's people live together "in unity," "there" the Lord sends blessing—"even life forevermore." "Life" (GK 2644) is a gift of God, not as an end in itself, but for communion with the people of God.

Psalm 134: May the Lord Bless You From Zion!

This is the last of the "Songs of Ascents" (see Ps 120). It is a liturgical hymn.

I. Call to Worship (134:1–2)

1–2 The psalmist calls on the priests to lead the people in worship. The priests are "the servants of the LORD," who "minister" (lit., "stand"; GK 6641) in the temple ("the house of the LORD"). They praise the Lord in song and with musical instruments both day and night. They also offer up prayers with hands lifted up "toward" the sanctuary, i.e., toward the Most Holy Place (cf. 1Ki 8:30).

II. Priestly Benediction (134:3)

3 These words are reminiscent of the priestly blessing (cf. Nm 6:24–25). The blessing extends to all of life, wherever the people of God may go or live, because the Lord is "the Maker of heaven and earth."

Psalm 135: The Lord Is Free in His Marvelous Acts

This psalm is a hymn of descriptive praise of God the Creator and Lord of history.

I. Israel's Praise (135:1–4)

1–2 Verse 1 is practically identical to 113:1 and together with v.2 is a continuation of 134:1–2 (see comment on 134:1–2). The "praise" (GK 2146) of God included a recitation of his mighty acts in creation and in redemptive history as an expression of devotion to the covenant God.

3–4 The praise of the Lord celebrates that he is "good" (GK 3202) to his covenant people and "pleasant" (GK 5833) to those who have experienced his electing love. The joyous proclamation of the name of the Lord evolves out of a relationship initiated (cf. "chosen") and maintained by him.

II. The Lord's Greatness as Creator (135:5–7)

5–7 The confession of God's greatness is expressed in the personal language of faith—"I know." His greatness pertains to his rule over all creation, to the exclusion of any other deities. The Lord is God over all realms because he is the Creator of all; his authority is unlimited. His greatness even extends to the elements of nature. Only the Lord has powers to "the ends of the earth."

III. The Lord's Acts in Redemptive History (135:8–14)

8–12 The power of the Lord is displayed in nature and in Israel's history. His greatness in the Exodus and Conquest motif is portrayed in climactic strokes: the tenth plague (Ex 12:29) as the last of his "signs and wonders" in Egypt and the victory over the "many nations" and "mighty kings" in Transjordan and the Promised Land. These lands he sovereignly gave to his people Israel as their "inheritance."

13–14 The psalmist celebrates the name and the remembrance of the Lord in this liturgical conclusion. The "name" of the God of Israel is Yahweh ("the LORD"; GK 3378), as revealed to Moses (Ex 3:15; 6:3, 6–8). That name increased in significance as the Lord increased his activities throughout the history of redemption and revealed more and more of himself. God promises to "vindicate his people" from their adversaries and thus to "have compassion on his servants."

IV. The Inability of Idols (135:15–18)

15–18 The affirmations of God's acts in creation and in redemption—together with his promise to continue to act in history—are set in the polemical context of the exclusive powers of the Lord. The psalmist illustrates the vanity of idolatry by an extensive quotation from Ps 115:4–8.

V. Israel's Praise (135:19–21)

19–21 The only appropriate response the message of this psalm is to "praise the LORD," for he is the source of Israel's blessing. As a part of the liturgical significance of this psalm, the psalmist celebrates the promise of the Lord to be present in Zion (= Jerusalem).

Psalm 136: The Lord Is Good!

This is the last of the Great Hallel psalms (see Ps 120) or, according to some Jewish authorities, the only Hallel psalm. It was associated with the Feast of Passover. The literary form is that of an antiphonal hymn.

I. Hymnic Introit (136:1–3)

1–3 The hymn opens on a note of thanksgiving familiar from other psalms. However, this psalm is different in that it repeats the liturgical formula "His love [GK 2876] endures forever" after every colon. The reason for praising the Lord lies in his beneficent acts. Since he is "the God of gods" and "the Lord [GK 123] of lords," he alone is to be thanked for all the acts in creation and in redemption.

II. Creation Hymn (136:4–9)

4–6 Since the Lord alone is God and King, he alone is to be praised for his "great wonders" (GK 7098). His work of creation reveals his great "understanding." In his wisdom he made the heavens and "spread out" the earth on the waters of creation like a tent or curtain.

7–9 Though God's creation on earth reflects great glory, his work in space has always seemed overwhelming. Heaven, with the sun and moon, affects life on earth and hence is evidence of God's goodness to all on earth.

III. Redemption Hymn (136:10–22)

10–15 Of the many wonders in Egypt, the tenth plague receives particular mention. The Lord brought Israel out of Egypt "with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm," a metaphor for God's great and personal strength on behalf of his people. In Egypt and at the Red Sea, the Lord showed up Pharaoh and his forces by judging them, while he delivered the Israelites.

16–20 The Lord guided his people through the desert. Not only did the Lord strike down the firstborn in Egypt, he also struck down the great and mighty kings, beginning with Sihon and Og. The psalmist is selective in his choice of events, for he makes no mention of the giving of the law and the covenant at Mount Sinai, nor does he mention Israel's many rebellions.

21–22 The conquered land became Israel's "inheritance" (GK 5709). In 135:12 Israel is called "his people Israel," whereas here the term is "his servant Israel" (cf. especially Isa 41:8; 44:1–2).

IV. Redemption Hymn (136:23–24)

23–24 The mighty acts of God in Egypt, in the desert, and in the conquest of the land are a sampling of his power and his purpose. Israel hereby confesses that the Lord is a Redeemer-King, who alone is able to deliver them from their enemies. He remembers his people in their distress.

V. Creation Hymn (136:25)

25 The hymn returns to a reflection of God's goodness as the Creator. His love is evident in that he continually cares for his creatures.

VI. Hymnic Conclusion (136:26)

26 The hymn concludes on a note of thanksgiving. In vv.2–3 the psalmist referred to the Lord as "the God of gods" and "the Lord of lords." Here he adds a related concept: "the God of heaven."

Psalm 137: If I Forget You, O Jerusalem

This psalm has a mixed classification: communal lament (vv.1–4), a song of Zion (vv.5–6), and a curse (vv.7–9). Strictly speaking, it is a communal lament, the genre being determined by the opening of the psalm.

I. The Lament (137:1–4)

1–2 For many Judeans life in Babylon was good. They lived by the Tigris and Euphrates rivers and enjoyed regular harvests because of a complex system of irrigation canals. But that does not mean that the godly were happy in Babylon, being far removed from Jerusalem. In the midst of plenty, they "wept," mourning the loss of Zion.

3–4 The dainties of Babylon were tainted with the taunts of the captors, who "demanded songs of joy." These taunts may have focused on the magnificent "songs of Zion," celebrating the majesty and protection of the Lord over his people. The Israelites could not sing of the glories of Zion and the strength and protection of their God, because the city lay in ruins and the people were captive in a "foreign land."

II. The Confession of Confidence (137:5–6)

5–6 For the exiles the love for God and for Jerusalem was intertwined because of the temple. Loyalty lies in remembering instead of forgetting. The godly vowed never to forget God's promises and to persevere, waiting for the moment of redemption. As part of the vow, the godly took on themselves a formula of self-cursing.

III. Prayer for Divine Intervention (137:7–9)

7 As the psalmist reflects on the moments of Judah's fall, he remembers the Edomite involvement. They had done everything to disgrace Judah and to keep the Judeans from escaping (cf. La 4:21; Eze 25:12–14; 35:5–15; Ob 11–14). They also encouraged the Babylonians to "tear [Jerusalem] down to its foundations!" The word "foundations" (GK 3572) also pertains to the God-established order in creation, in his rule, and in the election of his people. The Edomites hoped for the destruction of the Lord's rule on earth.

8 The psalmist prays that Babylon, personified as the "Daughter of Babylon," will come to an end. A blessing ("happy"; GK 897) will lie on anyone who helps bring down Babylon. That is, the idiom of blessing is used here for the purpose of imprecation ("curse").

9 The psalmist prays that the Lord will bring on Babylon's head the atrocities they had committed in Judah and elsewhere. Wars were very cruel in the OT, and the Babylonians were famed for their cruelties. The psalmist relishes the thought that some day the proud Babylonian will be rendered so defenselessness that they are unable to defend even their infants.

Psalm 138: The Lord Delivers the Humble

This psalm has the distinctive features of the individual thanksgiving psalms.

I. Individual Thanksgiving (138:1–3)

1–3 The praise of the Lord is both an expression of devotion and a witness against the impotence of idols. Praise of the "name" of the Lord involves a personal experience of God's covenant perfections: his "love" (GK 2876) and "faithfulness" (GK 622). The Lord is constant in his love toward his children, and so great is his faithfulness that the psalmist exclaims that whatever the Lord has done in the past is dwarfed by what he is still doing! His praise ends with a confession as to what the Lord has done. He not only answers prayer but strongly encourages the psalmist, revitalizing his life.

II. Communal Thanksgiving (138:4–6)

4–6 The nations together with their gods and kings will some day pay homage to the Lord. The psalmist's confidence lies in his conviction of the Lord's faithfulness to "the words" of promise to his people. The fulfillment is evident in "the ways of the LORD" at the sound of which the nations will respond with song. Exalted as the Lord is in his kingship, he deals favorably with "the lowly" so as to deliver them out of their affliction. Pride is offensive to him because he alone is the Exalted One.

III. Confidence in the Lord's Presence (138:7–8)

7–8 Confident of his God, the believer confesses his indubitable faith in the Savior-King. He anticipates "trouble" because the life of a believer is not immune from adversities. However, he rests assured. The Lord will keep him alive, delivering him from his "foes." The psalmist portrays the Lord as reaching out his "hand" as an expression of help, while dealing in judgment with those who cause his adversity.

The psalmist's confidence also comes from a recognition that the Lord has a purpose that includes individuals. His concern is of the most profound and lasting kind, as it is nothing less than his enduring "love" (GK 2876).

Psalm 139: The Lord Knows Me!

The various components of this psalm expose us to the intensely personal relationship between the psalmist and his God. The psalm defies the canons of genre criticism.

I. The Lord's Discernment of Individuals (139:1–6)

1–6 The Lord "knows" (GK 3359) his own—a word that means complete divine discernment. In his prayer (vv.23–24), the psalmist prayed for the Lord to examine him as in a judicial case and to declare him to be innocent of all charges. Now that the ordeal is over and he has been justified by the Lord, the psalmist testifies that the Lord is a righteous judge. The Lord knows him through and through.

The accused is not afraid of his judge, for the Judge is more than an arbiter; he is the one in whom the psalmist has found protection. The knowledge of God referred to here is a knowledge that graciously discerns in favor of those who are loyal to the Lord. By grace humans are blessed. The psalmist exclaims that God's favorable acts toward him are "too wonderful" and "too lofty" to apprehend.

II. The Lord's Perception of Individuals (139:7–12)

7–12 The "presence" (parallel with "Spirit") of God is everywhere; hence he perceives all things in all places. We cannot hide from the all-seeing eye of the Lord. Unlike pagan deities, the Lord's authority extends to "the heavens . . . the depths . . . the wings of the dawn . . . the sea." The Lord's hand protects his children wherever they are, even in "darkness." There is only light with God, and his light brightens up the darkness so that the psalmist can say affirmatively, "The night will shine like the day, for darkness is as light to you" (v.12).

III. The Lord's Purpose for Individuals (139:13–18)

13–14 Confidence in the Lord's ability to discern the nature and needs of his people comes from a belief in God's purpose. He is the Creator, and his creative concerns include individuals! All of God's "works" are "wonderful," but the believer senses more than any other part of God's creation that he personally is "fearfully and wonderfully made." He lives with a personal awareness of God's gracious purpose. The psalmist reveals a unique awareness of God's grace toward him and responds with thanksgiving.

15–16 Even in the early stages of formation in the womb, the Lord had a purpose for the undeveloped embryo. God's writing in the book refers to his knowledge and blessing of his child "all the days" of his life. His life was written in the book of life, and each of his days was numbered.

17–18 The "thoughts" of God are too magnificent, too numerous, and too exalted for a human being to comprehend, whose "thoughts" are fully known to the Lord. But the Lord's love is real. When awake the psalmist knows that he still enjoys God's presence.

IV. Prayer for Vindication (139:19–24)

19–20 Overwhelmed as he is with gratitude for God's purpose in him, the psalmist sees no purpose in the existence of the wicked. They foil God's purposes by their rebellious ways. They are destructive, scheming, and rebellious to the rule of God. The ascription "bloodthirsty" (GK 1947) denotes a lack of respect for life and a disregard for justice and righteousness. The psalmist commits the wicked into God's just hands.

21–22 Devotion to the Lord excludes any loyalty to those who hate him and rebel against him. The psalmist hates, abhors, and shuns the enemies of God. In doing so, he affirms his own devotion to the Lord.

23–24 The psalmist asks for God to discern his motives and his actions, especially in the context of vv.21–22. This prayer comes out of a situation when evil people had accused him. Instead of directing himself to his adversaries, he raises up his voice in lament to God, who alone as the righteous Judge can discern his "heart" and "thoughts." He desires nothing less than conformity to God's will. He closes by acknowledging that there are only two ways that a person can follow: one leading to destruction and the other to life and fellowship with God.

Psalm 140: You Are My God!

The psalmist has been falsely accused and turns to the Lord for deliverance, because he is the righteous Judge. The psalm exemplifies the spirit of the individual lament.

I. Prayer for Deliverance From Evil (140:1–5)

1–5 The psalmist's lament arises out of a real situation, in which wicked people perpetrate their evil. They are "evil men" because of their violent acts. They also sow discord with their speech ("their tongues"). They devise wicked schemes in their evil hearts, leading to intentional anarchy and perpetual agitation.

The psalmist prays for God's deliverance, lest the wicked control him. Because of the intensity of evil, he casts himself wholly on the Lord. Those who are violent scheme maliciously and act viciously. They are intent on entrapping and destroying the righteous, like a fowler ensnares animals with the "snare," the "net," and the "traps."

II. Confidence in God's Deliverance (140:6–8)

6–8 In contrast to the lying speech of the wicked, the psalmist declares, "I say to you, 'You are my God'" He seeks protection from no other than the "LORD," the covenant God and Master of the world. This God will avenge and deliver his people. He is "strong" in his salvation. In v.8, the psalmist renews his lament, pleading for God to act, lest evil succeed and wickedness be lifted up arrogantly.

III. Prayer for Divine Justice (140:9–11)

9–11 This imprecation is an expression of concern for God's just rule. The psalmist prays that the Lord will boomerang on the heads of the wicked what they have spoken with their lips. The "burning coals," "fire," and "miry pits" are metaphors for divine judgment. As long as there are "slanderers," justice is not established. Hence the psalmist prays that the wicked may not have a place among the people of God. The "men of violence" should find no rest.

IV. Confidence in God's Deliverance (140:12–13)

12–13 The psalmist's lament changes to a victory cry: "I know." In v.6 the psalmist speaks confidently, "You are my God," being fully persuaded in his whole being that the Lord is the just Judge who will interpose for his people. His people are "the poor" (or "the humble"; GK 6714), as they are dependent on him for deliverance. At the time of the divine intervention, "the righteous" will alter their prayers for deliverance to songs of triumph, sung in the presence of the Lord.

Psalm 141: May My Prayer Be Like Incense!

The spirit of this lament resembles that of Ps 140.

I. Prayer for Deliverance (141:1–2)

1–2 With great urgency the psalmist raises his hands in prayer to God—an act symbolizing dependence on and praise to the Lord. The repetition of "call" and the different verbs for God's intervention express the frequency of prayer and the urgency of the situation. Though David is in a precarious situation, his "prayer" is like a sweet-smelling offering to the Lord. Incense was presented on the altar of incense every day to the Lord as a pleasing offering (cf. Ex 30:7–8). Gradually incense became associated with prayer (cf. Rev 5:8).

II. Prayer for Wisdom (141:3–5c)

3–4 Evil comes in many forms: the sins of speech, of the heart, and of action. The psalmist asks the Lord to help him in his struggle with any form of temptation. Speech especially indicates one's relationship to the Lord. The wise trust in him to guard "over the door" of their lips.

The word "men" (GK 408) denotes men of land, rank, and status within the community. However, these members of the aristocracy are "evildoers" who practiced "wicked deeds." Their riches permit them the enjoyment of the "delicacies" in life.

5a–c Instead of receiving encouragement and privilege from the well-to-do but godless members of the community, the righteous receive joy from the discipline and words of rebuke by the wise. A wise person responds to wisdom as an expression of "kindness" (or "love"; GK 2876) and welcomes it like "oil," a symbol of honor extended to a welcome guest (cf. Pr 27:9).

III. Prayer for Vindication (141:5d–7)

5d–7 This prayer is an imprecation against the godless aristocracy. The psalmist prays that they may die a cruel death, being thrown down the cliffs. The shock of God's judgment on their despotic regime will affect their followers and may bring them to their senses.

IV. Prayer for Deliverance and Vindication (141:8–10)

8–10 The psalmist's "eyes" of faith are toward the "Sovereign LORD," who provides "refuge." He prays for deliverance on the one hand and for vindication on the other. God's deliverance brings life. The wicked destroy life, as they set "traps" and "snares" for the righteous. God's vindication comes in the form of retribution on them.

Psalm 142: The Lord Alone Is My Portion in the Land of the Living

This psalm is an individual lament.

I. Lament of the Individual (142:1–2)

1–2 In two parallel expressions the psalmist makes his lament known to the Lord. These phrases illustrate the tension between anguish of soul and dependence on the Lord.

II. Loneliness in Suffering (142:3–7a)

3–4 The psalmist's adversity and prayers have brought him to the point of total exhaustion. Nevertheless, he relies on his God, who knows his situation. At the present time, he is walking on a "path" that is repressive and full of entanglements. Regardless of where he looks, the Lord is not at his "right" hand. He has no one to defend him against his adversaries. He yearns for the path of the Lord, which leads to salvation.

5–7a The psalmist cries from his heart for relief. At the same time he confesses that the Lord is his "refuge" and his hope. He then remembers his present situation, his "desperate need." "Prison" may denote actual imprisonment or may be a metaphor for his desperate condition. The psalmist further prays that the Lord's deliverance will give him a renewed opportunity to praise his name.

IV. Public Thanksgiving (142:7b)

7b The resolution to his despair will not only bring him to thanksgiving but will serve as an encouragement to the righteous community. They too will hear the psalmist's thanksgiving and will be edified. God's acts of deliverance are acts of "goodness" (GK 1694).

Psalm 143: Lead Me on Level Ground

This psalm is classified as one of the seven penitential psalms (6; 32; 38; 51; 102; 130; 143). It is an individual lament.

I. Prayer for God's Righteousness (143:1–2)

1 In an urgent appeal David throws himself on the "faithfulness and righteousness" of the Lord. Both qualities connote the absolute fidelity and perfection of God in keeping his promise with his covenant children.

2 Another reason for the urgency of God's response lies in the psalmist's awareness of his own unrighteousness. He knows that God's judgment could find him guilty and thus condemn him to remain in his troubles.

II. Lament (143:3–6)

3–4 The adversity is described in general terms. The enemy hunts the psalmist down so that he feels as if he lives "in darkness," like those who have been "dead" for a long time. Having no apparent reason for living, the psalmist is discouraged to the point of despair.

5–6 David's alienation and despair grow as he reflects on what God has done in the past. He does "remember," "meditate," and "consider" the acts of God in creation and in the history of redemption. He turns to the Lord for help with outspread hands. His need for God is so great that he likens himself to "a parched land."

III. Petitions and Prayer (vv.7–12)

A. Petitions for Deliverance (143:7–8a, 9a)

7–8a, 9a Out of his deep despair the psalmist calls on the Lord to renew his "unfailing love" (GK 2876) and to "rescue" him speedily. He waits for God's deliverance as a watchman waits for dawn. As long as God hides his face, he feels cut off from God's favor and is like "those who go down to the pit," i.e., as good as dead.

B. Expressions of Confidence (143:8b–c, 9b, 10b)

8b–c Even in the depth of his despair, the psalmist is confident of the Lord. He has put his trust in him ("for to you I lift up my soul").

9b, 10b The reason for the psalmist's trust is that the Lord is his refuge and his covenant God. He is sustained by the Lord's promise to be the God of his people (Ex 6:7).

C. Petitions for Guidance (143:8b, 10a, c)

8b, 10a As an expression of humility and hope in the future, the psalmist desires to know "the way" he should go, i.e., the way of the Lord's "will." Doing that will as revealed in God's word implies complete submission, so that what we do is acceptable in his sight.

10c The psalmist believes that if the Lord instructs him and guides him on a level path, he will experience divine illumination by the Spirit of God. The presence of the Spirit will further guarantee God's protection.

D. Concluding Prayers (143:11–12)

11–12 These verses form a proper conclusion. (1) The psalmist petitions the Lord for deliverance for his 'name's sake," returning to the promises of his "faithfulness and righteousness" (v.1). (2) All of "life" is before the Lord, but the psalmist feels as if he is dead. Therefore, he prays that the Lord will preserve his "life" by delivering him from "trouble." (3) He prays that the Lord may deal righteously with his adversaries by silencing them. (4) He himself vows to remain God's "servant."

Psalm 144: The Lord Is My Warrior

In this psalm the king prays for the Lord's help for himself and for God's blessing on his people.

I. Hymn of Praise (144:1–2)

1–2 The king praises the Lord his God in the language of Ps 18: "my Rock"; "my fortress, my stronghold and deliverer"; and "my shield." According to his promises to David, the Lord gives military success so that the nations will be subject to him. The jubilant praise motivates the king to boldly petition the Divine Warrior to act on his behalf.

II. Human Need (144:3–4)

3–4 David knows his God and is convinced that the Lord does "care for him" and "think of him." In his praise of God, he exclaims that human beings, finite and unreliable, are unworthy of the love of the Lord. They are unstable and short-lived. The "care" of the Lord is nothing less than his commitment to be gracious and to fulfill his promises.

III. A Prayer for God's Involvement (144:5–8)

5–8 The psalmist calls on the Lord to appear as he did at Mount Sinai, where in the midst of smoke, lightning, and earthquake he came down to his people (cf. Ex 19:11, 18–19). The enemies are the object of the "lightning," also called "arrows," so that their power will be effectively eliminated. Their words and intimating actions are nothing but "lies." The people of God are the object of his deliverance, as he puts forth his right hand to "deliver . . . and rescue." The marvel of grace is that the exalted God condescends to "come down" to the aid of his own!

IV. Hymn of Praise (144:9–10)

9–10 Despite the calamity the king confidently sings praise to the Lord. He expects God to be faithful in giving "victory" to him and the "kings" that follow. Subsequent to the victory, "a new song" will be raised to the Lord, celebrating the new acts of God.

V. Prayer for God's Involvement (144:11)

11 This verse is a repetition of vv.7–8 and appears to be here for the purpose of symmetry.

VI. Prayer for Blessing on God's People (144:12–15)

12–15 David prays unselfishly for the blessing of the Lord on his nation. He prays that their "sons" may grow to be strong like verdant plants, that their "daughters" may become pleasing maidens, like richly decorated "pillars" adorning a Near-Eastern palace, and that the Lord may lavish riches on them by increasing the fields, flocks, and herds without fear of foreign invaders. Blessed are the people that experience the Lord's ability to save, protect, and bless.

Psalm 145: Great Is the Lord's Universal Kingdom!

This psalm is an alphabetic acrostic, except for the letter nun.

I. In Praise of the Lord's Kingship (145:1–3)

1–3 Synonyms for "praise" set the mood for the psalm. The object of the praise is "my God the King." The psalmist calls on the community to praise God unceasingly. The reason for praise lies in God's greatness. As the "great" King he deserves human "praise." In his presence, we must admit our limitations, for no one can fully understand God's purposes and his ways.

II. In Praise of the Lord's Faithfulness to the Covenant (145:4–9)

4–9 The unceasing praise of the Lord comes from the grateful instruction of the new generation by the older generation. The process of transmission of salvation history from one generation to another is by the telling of God's "mighty acts" of deliverance. The "works" of the Lord reveal his "might," his "glorious splendor," his "power," his awe-inspiring nature, his greatness, his "abundant goodness," his "righteousness," and his relational perfections (i.e., that he is "gracious and compassionate, slow to anger and rich in love"). God's kingship is magnificent, his sovereignty beneficent, and his redemptive acts manifold. His is the kingdom, the power, and the glory!

III. In Praise of the Lord's Kingship (145:10–13a)

10–13a The meditation on the mighty acts of God occasions a renewed praise of the Lord's kingship. All his works, including the "saints," praise the Lord and give thanks for the expressions of his "glory," "might," and "kingdom." The marvel of divine condescension lies in his magnificence and eternal dominion.

IV. In Praise of the Lord's Covenant Fidelity (145:13b–21)

13b–16 The Lord is "faithful" (GK 586) and "loving" (GK 2883) to "all he has made," including his creation. His love evidences itself in his acts of restoration and in acts of provision. He satisfies the needs of every living creature as the master of a house opens his hand to all who are dependent on him.

17 These observations lead the psalmist to a renewed reflection on the nature of God. He is "righteous" (GK 7404) and "loving." His acts of restoration, redemption, and vindication extend to his whole creation.

18–20 Members of the Lord's fellowship are special because they "call on him," "fear him," and "love him." He hears the prayers of those who submit to his will "in truth"; i.e., they respond to his faithfulness with faithfulness. The Lord delivers his own in their time of need. He preserves those who love him, but he will avenge the "wicked."

21 The psalmist appropriately concludes this section with a vow to praise the Lord. Because the kingdom of God extends to all creation and because the Lord's acts are to all his creation, it is only appropriate that all humankind should respond to his "holy name."

Psalm 146: The Lord Reigns Forever and Ever

Psalms 146–150 constitute the last Hallel ("praise") collection (see comment on Ps 113). These five psalms are in the characteristic genre of the hymn of descriptive praise.

I. Call to Praise (146:1–4)

1–2 The communal call (v.1a) serves as the basis for the psalmist's determination to join in. He speaks to his own soul, "Praise the LORD, O my soul." His personal commitment to praise the Lord issues from the understanding that life is to be lived for the purpose of praising God.

3–4 The commitment to praise the Lord requires a dissociation from dependency on other people. The negative exhortation here is a positive way of renouncing humanism and of affirming a God-centered way of life. Humankind is unable to "save" because a person may die at any time, whenever God removes the "spirit" of life. A "man" (adam; GK 132) is mortal and to the "ground" (adamah; GK 141) he must return (cf. Ge 3:19). At death, all of his "plans" for help go down with him.

II. God the Creator (146:5–6)

5 The blessing of "the God of Jacob" rests on those who look to him for "help" (GK 6469). The psalmist may be alluding to the Songs of Zion, reminding God's people that the Lord, whose dwelling is in "Zion" (cf. v.10), is their "help" (cf. Ps 46:7, 11; 76:6). His kingship is established.

6 The "God of Jacob" is "the Maker of heaven and earth." He uses his power and control over all of his created universe, including the sea, to bless every creature. He is "faithful" (GK 622) to his people "forever."

III. God the Sustainer (146:7–9)

7–9 In hymnic style the psalmist celebrates the many acts of God. The Maker of heaven and earth "upholds . . . gives . . . sets free . . . gives sight . . . lifts up . . . loves . . . watches . . . sustains." The psalmist does not introduce anything new in this description of the Lord's mighty acts, but the manner in which he brings the various ways of divine sustenance together is most creative, including the conclusion.

IV. God the Great King (146:10a)

10a The reference to the Lord's rule in Zion has already been anticipated by the allusions to the Songs of Zion (cf. v.5). God's people expect him to be faithful, so that he will sustain them "forever."

V. Call to Praise (146:10b)

10b The hymn appropriately concludes with a renewed call to "praise the LORD" (cf. v.1).

Psalm 147: The Blessedness of the People of God

See the introduction to Ps 146.

I. In Praise of God's Restoration, Creation, and Redemption (147:1–6)

1–3 God's people praise God because of his fatherly goodness to his children, as well as to all his creation. First, the Lord is good in bringing restoration to his people. He restores "Jerusalem" by permitting its walls and institutions to be rebuilt after they had been lying in ruins. He will see to it that his people, the scattered "exiles" (GK 5615), who are further described as those who are "brokenhearted" and "wounded," will prosper within the walls of Jerusalem (cf. Isa 65:18). The Lord also "heals" the wounds of his grief-stricken children.

4–5 Second, the Lord is good to his creation. The Great Creator "determines" (GK 4948; i.e., takes an interest in and knows) the number of the stars. The psalmist exclaims how "great" God's royal sovereignty is in "power" and wisdom!

6 Third, the Lord is a good judge in the vindication of his people. He "sustains" the needy but judges the wicked.

II. In Praise of God's Creation and Love for His People (147:7–11)

7 The psalmist renews the imperatival call to praise with the emphasis on "thanksgiving" and the instrumental accompaniment. The verb for "sing" (GK 6702) belongs to the semantic field of praise.

8–9 Praise is due God because he is the good King. He sustains everything he has created: the "cattle" and "ravens"—representatives of two realms of the animal kingdom. The Lord is sovereign over and concerned with not only the magnificent stars but also the lowly creatures on earth.

10–11 The Lord rewards those who "fear [GK 3710] him," i.e., those "who put their hope in his unfailing love" (GK 2876). They know the vanity of military, logistical, or human power, because the "strength of the horse" or "a man" is nothing in comparison with the Lord's "power" (v.5).

III. In Praise of God's Restoration, Sovereignty, and Revelation (147:12–20)

12–14 The praise of the Lord begins with Zion, because the Lord has promised to be her God, to dwell in her, and to rule over her. He "builds up Jerusalem" (v.2) by fortifying her, by blessing her population with secure borders, and with prosperity.

15–18 The praise of God is evoked by a further reflection on his power in the world of nature. He orders and ordains everything in his created order, whether it be "snow," "frost," "ice," "hail," or "water." His "word" (GK 1821) is true and constant in nature.

19–20 Therefore God's people have hope! They too have received his "word" (GK 1821). Therefore they praise him. This word is first and foremost "his laws" by which Israel had to order their ways. God's word is to have the same effect on his people as it has on nature—order and constancy. The psalm closes with a call to communal praise of the Lord.

Psalm 148: Praise to the Lord, the Wise Creator

See the introduction to Ps 146.

I. Call on Heaven to Praise the Lord (148:1–6)

1 The psalm begins and ends on the familiar call, "Praise the LORD." The very "heights above," where God rules, together with outer space and the atmosphere of the earth, are invoked to join in Israel's praise.

2–4 In their order of closeness to the Lord, the psalmist addresses rhetorically the "angels," the starry hosts, and the elements to praise God. "His heavenly hosts" most likely refers to the angelic hosts that surround the throne of God. The "shining stars" could well be "the morning stars"; these are the planets visible at dawn. The "waters above the skies" refers to various forms of precipitation, which join in God's praise.

5–6 Praise of the Lord is due him because he is the Creator. The creative acts of God are marked by three characteristics. (1) The Lord created everything by his word. (2) He permanently ordered and regulated the world of nature. (3) The order and regularity of the heavenly bodies and of the forms of precipitation are due to his creative involvement.

II. Call on Earth to Praise the Lord (148:7–12)

7–8 By poetic license the psalmist put the "sea creatures" at the beginning of this list. The "sea" and its mysterious depths were associated in the Canaanite religion with the powers of Baal. Thus the psalmist is demonstrating the supremacy of the Lord over all objects of pagan worship, whether they be the starry hosts above or the "depths" of the sea.

9–10 The Lord has also fashioned the relief of the earth (mountains and hills). On it he has planted trees good for food, for building materials, and for nesting. He has made the animals that may find refuge and food on the mountains and hills.

11–12 The psalmist now portrays the world of people, consisting of kings and nations, old and young, male and female. The Lord created them all, all are subject to his bidding, and all owe him praise.

III. Rationale for Praising the Lord (148:13–14)

13–14 The psalmist restates the universal obligation of all creation to demonstrate their allegiance to God by praising him. The praise is to be given in the "name of the LORD." He is the exalted Ruler, sovereign over all. His kingship is endowed with "splendor." He is also to be praised because of his unique concern for his own people, who do his bidding on earth. This is the climax of the psalm. God loves and cares for all his creation, but he has a special affinity for "his people," "his saints," "Israel," also known as "the people close to his heart." He has endowed them with glory, symbolized by "a horn." He has raised them up for the purpose of giving him "the praise."

Psalm 149: The Lord Delights in His People

See the introduction to Ps 146. Psalm 149 celebrates a victory. Since it also shares the language and hope of the imprecatory psalms, it seems best to take it as an eschatological hymn.

I. The Present Joy of the Saints (149:1–5)

1–5 This psalm opens with the characteristic ascription of praise. This song is "new" because of the present occasions for praising the Lord: restoration and eschatological expectation of the Lord's full victory over evil (vv.6–9). The beneficiaries are the "assembly of the saints," a designation for the godly within the larger covenant fellowship.

The object of praise is "the LORD." He is their "Maker" (GK 6913), for he has elected, redeemed, and fashioned the descendants of Jacob into a community characterized by holiness and royalty. He is also their "King"; he has established his residence among his people, symbolized by "Zion." The "delight" (GK 8354) of the Lord guarantees his forgiveness, blessing, and restoration. He "crowns" his people with glory and splendor, thus sharing the benefits of his victory. "Salvation" and "honor" are synonymous.

The resultant expression on the part of the godly can only be joy. They are portrayed as "dancing." The people of God regularly celebrated the Lord's victory and blessing in dance (cf. Ex 15:20; Jdg 11:34). Also at home "on their beds," they rejoice in the glory bestowed on them by the Lord.

II. The Hope of the Saints (149:6–9)

6–9 "The praise of God" goes together with "a double-edged sword," as the one denotes a spirit of trust and confidence and the other a spirit of watchfulness. The Lord will grant victory to his people. He will avenge, punish, and bind in accordance with his "sentence written against them." The "sentence" (GK 5477) decrees that on the Day of the Lord, the wicked (individuals, nations, and kings) will be fully judged for the deeds done against God and against his people (cf. Isa 24:21–22; 41:15–16; Eze 38–39; Joel 3:9–16; Mic 4:13; et al.). The Lord will "inflict vengeance" by punishing the nations, by defeating their kings, and by dishonoring the nobles of the nations.

The psalmist returns to the motif of "glory" (GK 2077) as a reminder of the occasion for rejoicing. All the acts of God in judgment are to assure his own of his love and must evoke a response of divine "praise."

Psalm 150: Praise the Lord

See the introduction to Ps 146. In contrast to other hymns, Ps 150 is an enlarged introit, lacking the descriptive praise. It functions as a final doxology, bringing the Psalter to a solemn and joyful conclusion.

I. Praise the Lord in Heaven (150:1)

1 The psalm begins and concludes with "Praise the LORD" (Hallelujah), like so many other Hallel psalms (113–118; 120–136; 146–150). The angels in his heavenly "sanctuary" and in the heavenly bodies together with the waters "above the skies" are summoned to praise "God." The "mighty heavens" have been made by him and assure the order and well-being of humankind on earth.

II. Praise the Greatness of God (150:2)

2 The voices in heaven and on earth join together in the praise of the Lord's mighty acts. His "firmament" (NIV "heavens") together with "his acts of power" reveal how great he is.

III. Praise the Lord With Great Intensity (150:3–5)

3–5 The greatness of the Lord is celebrated with a corresponding devotion to him by wind, string, and percussion instruments, as well as by dancing.

IV. Praise the Lord on Earth (150:6)

6 All of God's creation that "has breath"—particularly humankind—is summoned to praise the Lord. The word "breath" (GK 5972) denotes all living creatures endowed with life by the Creator (Ge 1:24–25; 7:21–22), but always in distinction from the Creator (cf. Isa 2:22).

Proverbs

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

The book of Proverbs is a marvelous collection of wise sayings and instructions for living a useful and effective life. The collection forms part of the larger group of biblical writings known as "wisdom literature"—literature that gives instructions for living while pondering the difficulties of life. Proverbial wisdom is characterized by short, pithy statements; but the speculative wisdom, such as Ecclesiastes or Job, uses lengthy monologues and dialogues to probe the meaning of life, the problem of good and evil, and the relationship between God and people. This type of literature was common throughout the ancient Near East.

2. Authorship and Date

The traditional view that Solomon wrote the entire book of Proverbs is supported by the titles in 1:1; 10:1; and 25:1. Moreover, Solomon was a wise man, writing proverbs and collecting sayings from other wise men (see 22:17–24:34). Proponents of this view have usually assumed that Agur (30:1) and Lemuel (31:1) were pseudonyms of Solomon.

This general view, however, stands in need of some revision. It is now recognized that Agur and Lemuel were probably not pseudonyms for Solomon and that 22:17–24:34 forms a separate collection of proverbs because it has a distinct form, separate title and purpose, and seems to be directly related to the "Instruction of Amenemope," an Egyptian document written between 1580 and 1100 B.C. It is impossible to determine who added this material to the collection of Proverbs. Furthermore, the title of 1:1, which has generally been taken to head up 1:1–9:18, may not actually refer to these chapters; it may simply be the heading of the whole book in its final form and may not necessarily indicate that the first nine chapters are from Solomon.

An examination of the titles in the book is important to the study of its authorship. The heading in 10:1 clearly credits Solomon for the subsequent material. In 10:1–22:16 there may be two collections (chs. 10–15; 16:1–22:16) due to the difference in style. The heading in 25:1 also affirms that Solomon was the author (or editor) of a larger collection from which the scribes of Hezekiah's court excerpted the proverbs in chs. 25–29. Once again there are differences of style between chs. 25–27 and 28–29.

In conclusion, then, Solomon is responsible for 10:1–22:16 and perhaps all or part of chs. 25–29. Most scholars, including many conservatives, see some dependence of 22:17–24:34 on the "Instruction of Amenemope." Presumably Israel knew these sayings by the time of Solomon. Most scholars also see chs. 30–31 as non-Solomonic and from a later date, perhaps from a contemporary of Hezekiah. The prologue to the book (1:8–9:18) would have been added to form an introduction, certainly by the time of Hezekiah, and possibly in Solomon's time. Finally, 1:1–7 headed up the final collection as a title.

3. Literary Forms

A casual reading of the Proverbs reveals the general form of a proverb. It is a short, pregnant sentence or phrase whose meaning is applicable in many situations. A thorough analysis of the proverbs reveals that these short sayings follow many patterns and constructions that have bearing on the meanings.

As with all Hebrew poetic discourse, the proverbs use different types of parallelism. Synonymous parallelism expresses one idea in parallel but slightly different expressions: "A fool's mouth is his undoing, / and his lips are a snare to his soul" (18:7). In antithetical parallelism the second line contrasts with the first: "The plans of the righteous are just, / but the advice of the wicked is deceitful" (12:5). Emblematic parallelism uses a figurative illustration as one of the parallel units:

"As vinegar to the teeth and smoke to the eyes, / so is a sluggard to those who send him" (10:26). Another helpful category is the general one of synthetic parallelism, in which the second line amplifies the first in some way: "The LORD works out everything for his own ends— / even the wicked for a day of disaster" (16:4). Lastly, proverbs whose second line simply completes the idea begun in the first are said to exhibit formal parallelism. One part may contain the subject and the second the predicate (15:31); the first line may state a condition and the second its consequences (16:7), its cause (16:12), or its purpose (15:24); and one part may state a preferred value or course over the other: "Better a little with the fear of the LORD / than great wealth with turmoil" (15:16).

Proverbs are essentially didactic, whether they follow the pattern of a formal instruction using imperatives or prohibitions (16:3; 23:9), are expressed in didactic sayings that observe traits and acts that are to be followed or avoided (14:31), tell an example story (7:6–23), make a wisdom speech (8:1–36), or develop numerical sayings (6:16–19).

Instructions often use motivations—reasons for complying. The most common form of motivation is a subordinate clause stating the purpose, result, or reason for the instruction: "Listen to advice and accept instruction, / and in the end you will be wise" (19:20). Sometimes the motivation is implied in a general observation: "My son, do not despise the LORD's discipline / and do not resent his rebuke, / because the LORD disciplines those he loves, / as a father the son he delights in" (3:11–12).

4. Theological Values

This collection of wise sayings is not exclusively religious; its teachings apply to human problems in general and not primarily to the problems of the religious community or to major theological themes such as election, redemption, and covenant. Rather, the teacher concerns himself with plain, ordinary individuals who live in the world. Accordingly, the sayings exhibit several distinctive characteristics. (1) They focus attention on individuals rather than on the nation, setting forth the qualities needed and the dangers to be avoided by people seeking to find success with God. (2) They are applicable to all people at any period in history who face the same types of perils and have the same characteristics and abilities (1:20; 8:1–5). (3) They are based on respect for authority, traditional values, and the wisdom of mature teachers (24:21). (4) They are immensely practical, giving sound advice for developing personal qualities that are necessary to achieve success in this life and to avoid failure or shame, and warning that virtue is rewarded by prosperity and well-being but that vice leads to poverty and disaster.

It would be wrong, however, to conclude that Proverbs is a secular book; its teachings are solidly based on "the fear of the LORD" (1:7), making compliance with them a moral and spiritual matter. In fact, the book teaches that this fear of the Lord is the evidence of faith; for the wise teacher enjoins people to trust in the Lord whose counsel stands (19:21) and not their own understanding (3:5–7). The purpose of proverbial teaching, then, is to inspire faith in the Lord (22:19). Such reverential fear requires a personal knowledge of the Lord ("fear" and "knowledge" are parallel in 9:10)—to find this fear is to find knowledge (2:5), a knowledge that comes by revelation (3:6). Ultimately, however, the fear of the Lord is manifested in a life of obedience, confessing and forsaking sin (28:18), and doing what is right (21:3), which is the believer's task before God (17:3). Since the motivation for faith and obedience comes from the Scripture, Proverbs relates the way of wisdom to the law (28:4; 29:18). In the final analysis we must conclude there are no secular proverbs that can be contrasted with religious ones; everything on earth serves the purposes of God and is potentially holy.

5. Content

Proverbs 1:8–9:18 is an organized introduction to the book with many admonitions and prohibitions as well as example stories and personified wisdom-speech. This section runs in cycles: the purpose of Proverbs is to give wisdom (1:1–7), but folly may interrupt this purpose (1:8–33); there are advantages to seeking wisdom (2:1–4:27), but folly may prevent one from seeking it (5:1–6:19); there are likewise advantages to finding wisdom (6:20–9:12), but folly may prevent this too (9:13–18).

Proverbs 10:1–22:16 is a collection of some 375 unrelated proverbs. Then, after the sayings patterned after the "Instruction of Amenemope" (22:17–24:22), another collection of proverbs is included (chs. 25–29). The last two sections include among other things the numerical sayings of the wise (30:10–33) and the acrostic poem on wisdom (31:10–31).

The book of Proverbs covers a wide variety of topics, most of them connected with daily living. Topics include such areas as wisdom in general, personal conduct, human attitudes (dangers of negative ones and value of positive ones), child-rearing, marital relationships, business tactics, use of money, friendship, instructions for rulers and judges, and use of alcohol. For a topical index on this book, see EBC 5:897–903.

EXPOSITION

I. Introduction to the Book of Proverbs (1:1–7)

A. Title: The Proverbs of Solomon (1:1)

1 This verse provides the general heading for the entire book, even though the proverbs of Solomon probably do not begin until ch. 10. What is a "proverb" (GK 5442)? A proverb may be described as an object lesson based on or using some comparison or analogy. It may be a short saying that provides a general truth (Eze 16:44), a lesson drawn from experience (Ps 78:2–6), a common example (Dt 28:37), or a pattern of future blessing or cursing (Eze 21:1–5). Its purpose is to help one choose the best course of action among those available—the foolish way is to be avoided and the wise way followed.

B. Purposes: To Develop Moral Skill and Mental Acumen (1:2–6)

2 The book of Proverbs has two purposes: to give moral skillfulness (developed in vv.3–4) and to give mental discernment (developed in v.6).

The first purpose is that the disciple will develop skillfulness and discipline in holy living (v.2a). "Attaining" (lit., "to know"; GK 3359) encompasses an intellectual and an experiential acquisition of wisdom and discipline.

"Wisdom" (GK 2683) basically means "skill." This word describes the "skill" of the craftsmen who worked in the tabernacle (Ex 31:6), the "wits" of seasoned mariners (Ps 107:27), administrative abilities (1Ki 3:28), and the "wise advice" of a counselor (2Sa 20:22). In Proverbs "wisdom" signifies skillful living—the ability to make wise choices and live successfully according to the moral standards of the covenant community. The one who lives skillfully produces things of lasting value to God and to the community.

The other object to be acquired is "discipline" (GK 4592; cf. 3:5), the necessary companion of wisdom. This word denotes the training of the moral nature, involving the correcting of waywardness toward folly and the development of reverence to the Lord and personal integrity.

The second major purpose of the book of Proverbs is for the disciple to acquire discernment (v.2b). "To understand" (or "discern"; GK 1067) means to distinguish between things, to compare concepts, form evaluations, or make analogies. Proverbs will train people to discern lessons about life, such as distinguishing permanent values from immediate gratifications.

3 The first purpose statement is now developed. The disciple will receive something worth having: a "disciplined" (GK 4592) and "prudent" (GK 8505) life. Discipline produces prudent living. To act prudently means "to act circumspectly." The three terms that follow express how prudent acts manifest themselves. (1) "What is right" ("rightness" or "righteousness"; GK 7406) means basically conformity to a standard (cf. Dt 25:15)—in this case, the standard of God's law (see Dt 16:18–20). (2) "What is . . . just" (GK 5477) signifies a "decision" like that of an arbiter (see Dt 16:18). It is applied to litigation (2Sa 15:2) and the precedent established by such (Ex 21:9). The term also connotes that which is fitting or proper (Jdg 13:12). Proverbs will develop a life that has a sense of propriety in making decisions. (3) "What is . . . fair" ("equity"; GK 4797) can describe what is pleasing (cf. Jdg 14:3). The book will instruct a lifestyle that is equitable, one that incorporates the most pleasing aspects.

4 The first purpose statement is now developed from the teacher's point of view—he will give shrewdness to the naive or "simple" (GK 7343). This naive person is one who is gullible (14:15), easily enticed (9:4, 16), and falls into traps (22:3). The instructor wants to give such a one a sense of "prudence" (GK 6893), the ability to foresee evil and prepare for it (13:16; 22:3).

The second half of the verse parallels "simple" (or "naive") with "[immature] youth," and "prudence" (or "shrewdness") with "knowledge" and "discretion." This latter expression refers to devising plans or perceiving the best course of action for gaining a goal. Such ability is crucial for the immature youth in this world.

5 Before elaborating on the second purpose statement for the book, the writer digresses to make an exhortation. The first verb advises the wise to hear and the second gives the purpose—"[to] add to their learning." Parallel to this advice is the counsel for the "discerning" to get guidance. This person has the capacity of one who is discerning. The "guidance" (GK 9374) to be obtained may be illustrated by the rope-pulling done by sailors to steer or guide a ship; it is the discernment to steer a right course through life. Proverbs is not simply for the naive and the gullible; everyone can grow by its teachings and learn how to conduct themselves in life.

6 The second major purpose of the book is to give mental acumen to the student (see comment on v.2). The teachings will develop one's ability in discerning "proverbs" and "parables" (GK 4886). This latter term may refer to a saying that has another sense to it that needs uncovering.

The disciple must understand also the "sayings" of the wise—the words that come from the sages. Their teachings at times take the form of "riddles" (GK 2648). This word may refer to what is obscure or indirect, such as the riddles of Samson (Jdg 14:13–14) or of the queen of Sheba (1Ki 10:1).

C. Motto: The Fear of the Lord (1:7)

7 Reverential "fear" (GK 3711) of the Lord is the prerequisite of knowledge. This term can describe dread (Dt 1:29), being terrified (Jnh 1:10), standing in awe (1Ki 3:28), or having reverence (Lev 19:3). With the Lord as the object, this word captures both aspects of shrinking back in fear and of drawing close in awe. It is not a trembling dread that paralyzes action, but neither is it a polite reverence. "The fear of the LORD" ultimately expresses reverential submission to the Lord's will and thus characterizes a true worshiper. In this context it is the first and controlling principle of knowledge. Elsewhere in Proverbs the fear of the Lord is the foundation for wisdom (9:10) or the discipline leading to wisdom (15:33); it is expressed in hatred of evil (8:13), and it results in a prolonged life (10:27).

On the other hand, fools disdain wisdom and discipline. The term "fools" (GK 211) describes those who lack understanding (10:21), do not store up knowledge (10:14), fail to attain wisdom (24:7), talk loosely (14:3), are filled with pride (26:5), and are contentious (20:3). They are morally unskilled and refuse any correction (15:5; 27:22). Fools are people who "despise" (GK 1022) wisdom and discipline; they treat these virtues as worthless and contemptible (cf. Ge 25:34; Ne 4:4).

II. A Father's Admonition to Acquire Wisdom (1:8–9:18)

A. Introductory Exhortation (1:8–9)

8 The disciple is exhorted to heed parental guidance. "My son," the customary form of address for a disciple, derives from the idea that parents are primarily responsible for moral instruction (Dt 6:7; Pr 4:3–4). Here the disciple is to respond to ("Listen," with the attitude of "taking heed to"; GK 9048) "instruction" (GK 4592) that is normally the father's responsibility (except in 31:1, where it is the warning of the mother).

The son is also to follow his mother's "teaching" (GK 9368). This word may be cognate to a verb meaning "to point or direct," so that the idea of teaching might be illustrated as pointing in the right direction (see Ge 46:28). In Proverbs this instruction is for ordering the life (see also 6:20; 31:26).

9 For heeding the instruction of the law, the disciple is promised an attractiveness of life. "Grace" (GK 2834), the charm that teaching brings to the disciple, refers to those qualities that make him agreeable. The metaphor compares these qualities to an attractive wreath worn round the head. Obedience will thus improve the disciple. The one who loses the rough edges through disciplined training will present a pleasing presence to the world.

B. Admonition to Avoid Easy But Unjust Riches (1:10–19)

10–11 The summary statement warns the son not to consent to the enticement of moral misfits. The term for "entice" (GK 7331), related to the root of "simple" or "naive," means "to allure, persuade, entice, or seduce." Here the enticement is to do evil because it comes from "sinners" (in this context professional criminals, a gang of robbers). That is, the young man is being offered a part in a life of crime. He is being asked to join a vicious ambush; the verb for "to lie in wait" (GK 741) is used elsewhere of hostile purposes such as murder (Dt 19:11), kidnapping (Jdg 21:20), or seduction (Pr 23:28). Here the aim is bloodshed. The attack is also evil. The wicked lie in wait for the innocent, and their attack is without a cause.

12–14 The criminals assure the novice of swift success: they will swallow up victims who are in the vitality of life as surely and swiftly as death opens and swallows its victims (cf. Nu 16:32–33). By sharing the stolen wealth, they will fill their houses with "plunder" (GK 8965; a word used elsewhere for spoils from war). So the offer made to the youth is to pursue with the roustabouts a life of easy but ill-gotten gain.

15–16 The young man's parents strongly advise him to avoid such evil companions because their lifestyle, though it may appear prosperous, leads to destruction. The advice "do not go" counters the allurement of the wicked—"Come along with us" (v.11). The primary reason for not going is that the sinners' purpose is bloodthirsty; therefore their retribution is sure (cf. v.18). In the final analysis, then, the trap the wicked lay for others in reality will catch them.

17–19 There are two ways to interpret v.17 within the context. One is to see a comparison with the folly of birds who fall into a snare even though forewarned—likewise the wicked fall into the snare God lays because they are driven by lust. The other is to see a contrast between the natural behavior of birds when forewarned and the irrational greed of robbers. In other words, it is futile to spread out a net for birds that are watching, but these men are so blinded by evil that they fail to recognize the trap. The blind folly of greed leads to their doom—retribution is the law that will take away their lives.

C. Warning Against Disregarding or Despising Wisdom (1:20–33)

20–21 Wisdom personified stands in the public space, exhorting the ignorant and the scornful to listen, warning of destruction if they refuse. The book has three such personifications—in 1:20–33; 8:1–36; and 9:1–6. Here the term "wisdom" is in the plural to signify the intensity and comprehensiveness of it all. In addition, the verb "call aloud" (GK 8264) expresses an excited exhortation.

The location of this exhortation is in the public places—"the street ... the public squares ... the gateways"—suggesting that wisdom is readily available for the business of living: it is for the common person, not the scholar exclusively. These places were the centers for all activities: daily affairs (2Ki 7:1), justice (Ru 4:1), employment (Mt 20:3), and even playing (Zec 8:5; et al.). Since wisdom touches all aspects of life, the setting is appropriate. In this setting wisdom, like a prophet, calls out.

22 Wisdom offers a complaint—"How long ... ?" Three types of people are addressed by this: the "simple" (GK 7343), the scoffers or "mockers" (GK 4370), and the "fools" (GK 4067). The first is the naive person or the simpleton, the second the defiant and cynical freethinker, and the third the morally insensitive fool. Each is satisfied with one's ways and does not listen to reason.

23 The invitation takes the form of a conditional clause—"If only you would respond." Wisdom is firmly resolved to pour out her spirit, her active power, on those who respond. Like a copious spring she will gush forth to them.

24–28 There is grave danger, however, in disregarding the invitationgiven by wisdom. If the call has been extended for some time—"How long?" (v.22)—then this warning is given for a prolonged refusal. Because wisdom has been continually rejected, wisdom will laugh at the calamity of those who have rejected it. This retributive justice is expressed figuratively as wisdom's mocking at their distress. But then v.28 explains the meaning of the mocking—wisdom will not be there to help when the fools cry out from their distress. The figure of laughing reveals the absurdity of choosing a foolish way of life and being totally unprepared for disaster.

29–33 This section closes with a denunciation for despising wisdom. Not only had these foolish ones preferred their folly, but they had also despised the knowledge of ethical and religious principles for life. Moreover, they continually spurned wisdom's reproofs.

The punishment for such indifference and antagonism takes the form of retribution. The term "fruit" is used metaphorically for the consequence of actions—likened to growth that culminates in produce. Their way—their life and what it produces—stands in contrast to the way of wisdom that they had spurned.

The teaching of retribution is confirmed in v.32. The "turning away" ("waywardness") and the "complacency" will be the ruin of these people. But those who heed the teachings of wisdom will live in safety and security. The expressions used suggest a permanent, settled condition free from the sense of danger or dread. Such is the contrast between the false security of the wicked and the true and lasting peace of the righteous.

D. The Benefits of Seeking Wisdom (2:1–22)

1. The admonition to receive wisdom (2:1–4)

1–4 This chapter is a long poem in six parts: the appeal for wisdom followed by a fivefold blessing.

The teacher again makes the appeal: To attain wisdom requires constant meditation and a rigid discipline. The requirement of meditation begins with receiving the teaching. "Accept" is paralleled with "store up," a figure that implies that most teaching cannot be used immediately but that some time will pass before education's effects are felt. In the meantime the teachings will develop attitudes in their pupils that will influence their future actions. Such a perspective calls for patience by the students, making both heart and mind attentive ("ear" and "heart" represent the mental faculties).

The other requirement is the diligent search for wisdom. On their own initiative disciples are to summon or "call out ... for" understanding. The elevation in the lines from "call out" to "cry aloud" suggests that, if understanding does not come immediately, one should put forth greater efforts. So the ear hears the teaching, the mind understands what is said, and the voice is used to inquire for true knowledge. This search for wisdom and understanding should be as diligent as the search for precious metal ("silver"), suggesting both the value of the treasure and the diligence of the search. The starting point is revelation—specific words and commandments—and the method is not one of free speculation but of exploring and treasuring the teachings.

2. Consequences of receiving wisdom (2:5–22)

a. Knowledge of God and his protection (2:5–8)

5 The point of this first consequence is direct: When you seek wisdom, you find God. The "knowledge of God" refers to more than intellectual opinion; it also encompasses religion and ethics. Coupled with the fear of the Lord, this knowledge means that the disciple will follow God's moral code; for to know God is to react ethically to his will, to follow his principles.

6–8 The reason the one who seeks knowledge will find God is that God is the source of wisdom and knowledge. Moreover, God has stored wisdom up as a protection for his saints. The word translated "victory" means "sound wisdom"; it includes the ideas of its effect: abiding success, achievement, and deliverance. So the verse states that God holds in store sound wisdom that is powerful for his saints.

b. Discernment for living (2:9–11)

9–11 The disciple will develop the intellectual capacity and moral insight to discern the path of what is "right," "just," and "fair" (cf. 1:3). "Path" (GK 5047) is used metaphorically for the course of a person's actions. The word is related to the verb for "to roll" and the noun for "cart"; so the noun literally means "the track of a wagon wheel." Thus "every good path" is a lifestyle that regularly leads in the direction of what is morally good.

Wisdom will take up its abode in the inner life, and knowledge will be pleasant to the soul. "Pleasant" (GK 5838) describes a quality that attracts one to an object—so knowledge is attractive and attracting. For those who assimilate wisdom, doing right becomes attractive and delightful; for they see its advantage. In addition, this assimilated wisdom will manifest itself in discretion and discernment that protect from evil or save the good man from the consequences of naiveté.

c. Protection from evil men (9:12–15)

12–15 These verses present the first of two specific examples of protection from evil—from the "wicked men." The adjective "wicked" (GK 8273) describes what is unpleasant, bringing pain and misery. Evil ways bring harm to others by speaking perverse things, i.e., things contrary to what is right and proper.

Verses 13–15 describe the wicked's purpose, pleasure, and perverted paths. Their purpose is to walk in the ways of darkness; they abandon the straight way to follow an evil way that can only be described as "dark"; it is devoid of ethical illumination. Their "delight" is in doing what is morally evil. This activity may not be due to an abnormal or sadistic delight but rather to dullness of conscience. Verse 15 then describes their perverted ways, using a variation of the expressions of the preceding verses—evil men are twisted and devious in the path they follow, constantly turning aside to the wrong ways. The disciple needs wisdom for protection from those who turn the Lord's ways upside down and try to draw others in by creating ethical chaos.

d. Protection from evil women (2:16–19)

16–19 (3) Another class of evil persons from whom wisdom delivers is the licentious woman. Whereas the evil man brings pain and perversion, the evil woman brings moral ruin through a more subtle temptation. Prostitutes and adulteresses existed in Israel from the earliest times (Jdg 11:1; 1Ki 3:16; Hos 3:1). In this passage the licentious woman is first described; then her ruin and that of those who submit to her are presented as a warning.

The word "adulteress" literally means "strange [GK 2424] woman"; it describes this woman as outside the framework of the covenant community (though she is an Israelite woman, for her marriage is called a "covenant," and she offers communion sacrifices; cf. 7:5, 14). She is estranged from the corporate life of the community with its social and religious conventions. She is acting outside the legal bounds of marriage within the covenant.

The subtlety of the appeal comes from flattering speech—the adulteress talks smoothly (see 5:3). An example of such talk is found in 7:14–20. Acquiring discernment will protect the disciple from the smooth, seductive speech of a temptress. Seductive talk is evil, not only because it reveals a brazen character, but also because the adulteress is guilty of marital infidelity: she leaves the companion of her youth (here and in Jer 3:4 for the husband) and is unmindful of the covenant.

"Covenant" (GK 1382) probably refers to the temptress's marriage vows (Mal 2:14) but could mean the covenant law that prohibited adultery (Ex 20:14). If the marriage vows are meant, such a covenant was entered into at betrothal, when the dowry was established. The adulteress violates her pledge of fidelity.

The effective warning against this type of evil derives from understanding the result of such infidelity—it leads to destruction, the very opposite of the happy and prosperous life. "Her house" could be taken as "she with her house sinks down to death," but "she sinks down to death, which is her house," may have better support; for 9:18 states that the dead are in her house and that her guests are in the nether world. Her paths lead to the "shades" (NIV, "the spirits of the dead"). The "shades" are the inhabitants of Sheol; the term describes the shadowy continuation of those who have lost their vitality and strength. So the inevitable fate of her course of life is to be among the departed in the realm of the dead. The expressions may carry a figurative rather than a literal meaning: Get entangled with her, and you may find only estrangement from the living community, among outcasts, moral lepers who have taken a journey into the land of no return.

e. Enablement for righteous living (2:20–22)

20–22 The passage ends on the more positive note that wisdom will enable people to do what is right and to enjoy God's blessing. Here the text brings in the Deuteronomic emphasis on the land—God's supreme gift being the fulfillment of the promises. The upright will enjoy security and prosperity in it, but the wicked will be rooted out in divine judgment.

E. Admonition to Follow the Way of Wisdom in Relationships With God and People (3:1–35)

1. Introductory exhortation (3:1–4)

1–2 The first exhortation is to follow the father's "teaching" (lit., "law"; GK 9368), because it will bring a long and peaceful life. Here the verbs "do not forget" and "keep" remind the disciple of general educational discipline. The result is a life worth living, free from danger and trouble.

3 The second exhortation is to be faithful and trustworthy because it brings honor with God and man. "Love" (GK 2876) and "faithfulness" (GK 622) are the two basic covenant terms in Israel. The former is essentially fidelity to obligations arising from a relationship; the latter is essentially that which can be relied on, that which is stable. The two words together form a hendiadys, meaning "faithful love." These words, coupled with the allusion to Dt 6:8 and even Jer 31:3, show that the content of this disciplined life is faith in the Lord. By "binding" and "writing" the teacher is stressing that the teachings become a part of the disciple's nature. The ramifications of this terminology are that the disciple is actually subject to the Lord, not the teacher, and that the requisite "discipline" is respect and obedience for the Lord and his teaching, not merely for a human instructor.

4 Verse 4 provides the final motivation: favor and a good name. Parallel to 13:15, this difficult line probably signifies that the disciple will have a reputation for good understanding, meaning that he will be respected by God and other people.

2. Admonition to be faithful to the Lord (3:5–12)

5–6 Several specific instructions compose this general admonition to be faithful. The first is to trust in the Lord and not in oneself, because he grants success. "Trust" (GK 1053) carries the force of relying on someone for security; the confidence is to be in the Lord and not in human understanding. Such trust must be characterized by total commitment—"with all your heart," "in all your ways." "Understanding" (GK 1069) is now cast in a sinful mode (cf. 1:2, 6); so there is to be a difference between the understanding that wisdom brings and the natural understanding that undermines faith. When obedient faith is present, the Lord will guide the believer along life's paths in spite of difficulties and hindrances. The idea of "straight" contrasts to the crooked and perverse ways of the wicked.

7–8 The second instruction is to revere the Lord and avoid evil. Here too there is a difference between human wisdom and the new wisdom from above (cf. Isa 5:21). There must be a higher source—"fear the Lord and shun evil." Compliance with this is therapeutic: it will be health to the body and nourishment for the frame. The healing that the fear of the Lord and avoidance of evil bring is first and foremost spiritual. Scripture often uses the physical body to describe inner spiritual or psychical feelings.

9–10 The third piece of advice is to give back to God some of one's wealth as a sacrifice in recognition that God gave it (cf. Ex 23:19; Nu 28:26–27; Dt 18:4; 26:1–2). The admonition reminds the faithful of their religious duties to God. Then follows the promise of blessing in the "barns" and the "vats."

11–12 The final specific instruction warns the disciple not to rebel against the Lord's discipline, because it is an evidence of his love. Wisdom literature knows that the righteous do not receive uninterrupted blessing; suffering remains a problem for everyone, and this text records one of their solutions. This motivation recalls the language of the Davidic covenant (2Sa 7:14; Ps 89:32–33), which mentions discipline in love. Indeed, it is the father-son relationship that provides insight into the nature of that discipline (cf. Heb 12:5–6).

3. Commendation of the way of wisdom (3:13–26)

a. Wisdom the most valuable possession (3:13–18)

13 Verses 13–18 appear to be following a hymnic style, for "blessed" (GK 897) replaces the imperative. The statement "Blessed is the man," which begins the section, is followed by a series of motive clauses giving the reasons for this happy estate. "Blessed" describes heavenly bliss stemming from being right with God; it depicts the human condition of well-being that comes with God's blessing or as a divine reward for righteousness.

14–18 The statement concerning the blessedness of finding wisdom is now validated. Wisdom is better than wealth and riches; for her yield is power, influence, and respect—the gifts of life. She is compared to "a tree of life," the symbol of vitality and fullness of life. This figure, drawing on Ge 2–3 (cf. Ge 3:22), signifies that wisdom is the source of a long and beneficial life.

b. Wisdom essential to creation (3:19–20)

19–20 Wisdom, understanding, and knowledge are also valuable to God; for by them he created the universe. How wisdom was used in Creation and how it pictures Christ, the Wisdom of God, is discussed in the comments on 8:22–23. This section shows that the wisdom that directs life is the same wisdom that created the universe (see 8:20–31); to surrender to God's wisdom is to put oneself in harmony with creation, the world around one. The two verses concentrate first on the foundation of heaven and earth and then on the provision of waters on earth and from heaven, making a fine parallel to the nature of wisdom as the foundation and blessing of life.

c. Wisdom and a long and safe life (3:21–26)

21–26 This section forms an admonition to keep on the way of wisdom along with promises for such compliance. If disciples diligently preserve sound judgment and discernment, they can be confident that the Lord will guide and protect them. But they cannot let them out of sight for a moment. Whoever trusts and follows sound judgment in their life of righteousness will find not only strength and beauty in wisdom but also preservation in action and repose—in normal life and in times of disaster. In other words, their lives will be enriched, safe, secure, and without fear. True spiritual discernment that places its confidence in the Lord will not be disappointed.

4. Warning to avoid unneighborliness (3:27–30)

27–30 A succession of instructions now follows with regard to neighborliness. These ideas, expressed in the negative, follow naturally from the emphasis on love and faithfulness in v.3. Verses 27–28 exhort doing acts of kindness to those in need; for it is wrong to withhold help from a needy neighbor—people ought to be good neighbors. The father also prohibits plotting maliciously against an unsuspecting neighbor. Malice is a crime; it ruins community. Neither should anyone bring a groundless litigation against an innocent neighbor.

5. Warning against emulating the wicked (3:31–35)

31–35 In dealing with neighbors, one should avoid envying or emulating a violent person (cf. Ps 73:3–5). This warning is followed by the reasons, expressed in a series of contrasts. On the one side, the Lord detests the perverse, curses the house of the wicked, mocks proud mockers, and holds fools up to shame. But with the upright he is pleased, blesses their home, gives grace to the humble, and bequeaths honor to the wise. So wise and upright behavior pleases God and results in his blessing.

F. Admonition to Follow Righteousness and Avoid Wickedness (4:1–27)

1. Traditional teaching and its benefits (4:1–9)

a. Exhortation to acquire traditional wisdom (4:1–4a)

This chapter is comprised of three discourses on the value of wisdom, each including the motifs of instruction, exhortation, command, and motivation.

1 The first discourse begins with a double call, stressing the importance of receiving the teaching. This "instruction" is the moral instruction introduced previously (cf. 1:2); it adds self-control and guidance to the wisdom.

The significant feature of this first discourse is that the teaching is traditional. The plural "sons" suggests that disciples are in view and that the father is a teacher. However, the use of "mother" in v.3 and the fact that the teacher-pupil relationship was modeled on the parent-child relationship suggest that this is a father-children relationship.

2 The tradition being passed on is "sound" (GK 3202)—it is the voice of experience. But it must be received, the word "learning" (GK 4375) implying that it requires taking. Accordingly, this teaching is designated better as tradition.

3–4a The concern that these traditional teachings be received is reinforced by personal experience—they were lovingly handed down by the child's parents. They were ingrained in his soul; he has seen them shape his life and prove reliable. So the home continues to be the prominent arena of learning as the parents in turn pass on the traditions (see Dt 6:6–9). In this section, then, the one teaching strengthens his credibility by informing his sons that it is a shared experience.

b. Benefits of acquired wisdom (4:4b–9)

4b Receiving this traditional wisdom wholeheartedly will bring life. "You will live" must mean experiencing life with all its blessings, life as opposed to the whole realm of death with which it is in conflict. Deuteronomy 30 captures the contrast forcefully—people are in a life-and-death struggle; choosing life means obeying the commandments in order to enjoy God's bounty. This theme of life appears in each of the discourses (4:4, 10, 22–23). Of course, the sage uses this motivation in the general sense, for there are always exceptions like Job.

5–6 A second benefit of traditional wisdom is security. After reiterating the exhortation to acquire wisdom and understanding, the teacher uses feminine verbs to promise protection and safety. Wisdom is personified as a woman, like a bride that is to be loved and embraced (v.8), but also having the qualities of an influential patron who can protect. Wisdom personified as a virtuous woman contrasts to the strange woman. If those being instructed gives her wholehearted devotion, she will watch over them.

7–9 A third benefit is "honor." Using an implied comparison with a valuable object (cf. 3:14–15), the teacher implores the disciple to obtain this wisdom at all costs; for it is of supreme value. The personification continues in these verses, showing that embracing wisdom will bring honor like a wreath on the head. This honor essentially has to do with the character that wisdom produces; such virtue is readily recognized in the community (11:10–11).

2. Admonition to live righteously (4:10–19)

a. Pursuit of a righteous lifestyle (4:10–13)

10 The section begins with the repeated admonition to listen carefully to the instruction so that the life might be extended. The parallelism explains that the disciple must appropriate ("accept") wisdom's life principles.

11–12 That this teaching must be appropriated is underscored by the use of "I guide you." The figure of a road is now used. Living according to wisdom is like walking or running on a safe road, a course that will be free of obstacles, so that progress will be certain (see on 3:5–6). Verse 12 uses two synonymous, temporal clauses to fill out the image: when one lives by this teaching (walking and running), nothing will impede progress.

13 Not only is wisdom the means of making progress in life, it is life itself. Anything so essential must be enthusiastically maintained.

b. Avoidance of a wicked lifestyle (4:14–19)

14–15 The warning is to avoid evil ways and evil men by not even starting on the wicked path of life. Don't take the first step! The rapid sequence of imperatives in these verses stresses the urgency of the matter. And the expressions used continue the comparison of lifestyle with a path that can be traveled—only now the lifestyle is evil.

16–17 The first reason that one should avoid such a lifestyle is that it is enslaving. By using hyperboles the teacher portrays the character of the wicked as those who are addicted to evil (cf. Ps 36:4). They are so completely devoted to evil conduct that they cannot sleep until they find expression for it. Moreover, evil is their diet. This hyperbole stresses how powerful the influence of evil is in their life—it is like food and wine to the wicked.

18–19 In addition to being enslaved by evil, one should realize that becoming involved with evil is dangerous. Similes are now used to make the contrast vivid. The path of righteousness is secure and clear like the bright light of the daytime that shines brighter and brighter. On the other hand, the way of the wicked is insecure and dangerous, like darkness in which people stumble.

3. Admonition to concentrate on righteous living (4:20–27)

a. Exhortation to the father's teaching (4:20–22)

20–21 The exhortation in this third discourse uses several terms for parts of the body: the disciple must use ears to listen closely to the teacher's words, eyes to watch them closely, and the heart to determine to do them. By using ears, eyes, and heart, the teacher is exhorting the whole person to receive the traditions.

22 The reason for giving heed to instruction once again is that the words of wisdom provide life—a life of health. The health that is promised here is physical, emotional, and spiritual—the whole person. It is made possible because of God's words that bring deliverance from the evils that harm and hinder life.

b. Concentration on righteousness (4:23–27)

23 In this instruction for righteousness, the parts of the body that are used are those involved with expression or action. First, the "heart" (i.e., the mind; GK 4213) must be guarded diligently. Verse 21 instructed the disciple to guard wisdom in the heart. Now the heart must be guarded; for it is "the wellspring of life." The heart is the starting point of the activities of life (16:9; 23:19); it determines the course of life.

24 Righteousness will control the tongue, avoiding twisted and crooked speech. This is the next logical step; for words flow out of the heart. Wisdom produces truthful speech (8:13; 10:32; et al.).

25 Next, the eyes must be focused on proper goals. The wise person will have an unswerving directness, but the fool is easily distracted (17:24).

26–27 The imagery of the level, firm, and straight path is used again in these final verses to advise the disciple to avoid evil actions.

G. Admonition to Avoid Seduction to Evil (5:1–23)

1. A father's warning about deadly seduction (5:1–6)

a. Exhortation for discretion (5:1–2)

1–2 In this chapter we have a man-to-man warning to avoid liaisons with loose women, a theme that is fairly common in the wisdom literature of the ancient Near East. The initial exhortation is for the son to listen carefully to this warning that he may keep "discretion" (GK 4659) and knowledge, which will be basic for avoiding temptation to such disastrous folly.

b. Motivation: With wisdom seduction may be avoided (5:3–6)

3 The reason that the disciple should guard discretion is that the adulteress is seductive. "Adulteress" (lit., "strange woman"; see comment on 2:16) is here a married woman. But the main point the text makes is that her words are flattering. The images of dripping honey and smooth oil refer to her words, not her kisses (cf. SS 4:11).

4 The teacher uncovers corruption under the adulteress's charm. Afterward she is "bitter" as "gall" (Heb. word is "wormwood," an aromatic plant in sharp contrast to the sweetness of honey; GK 4360). The image of the two-edged sword (lit., a sword with more than one mouth) signifies that a liaison with this woman brings pain and destruction. The flattery conceals for a time the harmful side of this sin.

5–6 In fact, the wayward woman's lifestyle is the pathway to death. Sheol ("grave"; GK 8619) is not just the realm of the unblessed; for it is paralleled with "death." Although these terms could be hyperbolic for a ruined life, they probably convey a note of the real consequences that exist for a life of debauchery. The sadder part of this description is that she does not know how unstable her life is.

2. A father's warning to avoid ruin and regret (5:7–14)

a. Exhortation for prevention (5:7–8)

7–8 The second discourse begins with a warning not to turn aside from one's father's teaching. Going to the adulteress would be such a turning aside, and so the writer clearly warns against that—"Keep clear"; do not even go near her door.

b. Motivation: Obedience will avoid ruin and regret (5:9–14)

9–10 The writer warns that consorting with an adulteress will rob a person of health and prosperity. One's hard-earned substance could pass over to "strangers." The "strength" may refer to health and vigor that might be relinquished to a cruel enemy, perhaps an offended husband as in ch. 7 (although husband is not mentioned here). The "years," the best years in the prime of life, would signify what those years produced, what he had worked for. Likewise the "wealth" would refer to the produce that laborious toiling had gained. The point of these verses is clear: The price of infidelity may be high; for everything one works for—position, power, prosperity—could be lost either through the avaricious demands of the woman or the outcry for restitution by the community.

11–14 When the foolish participant is ruined in such a way, there will be regret for not heeding the warnings. This theme is introduced with "You will groan" (GK 5637), a term used elsewhere for the loud groaning of the poor and distressed (Eze 24:23). Here the verb conveys an elemental cry of anguish when the guilty finds himself destitute. The use of both "flesh" and "body" underscores the fact that the whole body is exhausted.

3. Advice to find satisfaction at home (5:15–23)

a. Avoiding sharing love with strangers (5:15–17)

15–17 By using high figures the wise teacher instructs the son to find sexual satisfaction with his own wife and not strange women. These figures are not common in instruction material. But what is at issue is private versus common property. The images of a cistern, well, or fountain are used of a wife (see SS 4:15) because she, like water, satisfies desires. Channels of water in the street would then mean sexual contact with a lewd woman. According to 7:12, she never stays at home but is in the streets and the property of many. So the young man is advised to spend his sexual energy at home, producing children, rather than giving himself to "strangers."

b. Finding satisfaction with one's wife (5:18–19)

18 The advice is now plainly given—the proper course of action is to find pleasure in a fulfilling marriage. The first line, calling for the "fountain" to be blessed, indicates that sexual delight is God-given. Therefore one should rejoice in the wife who has from the vigor of youth shared the excitement and satisfaction, the joy and the contentment of a divinely blessed, monogamous relationship (see Mal 2:15).

19 The imagery for intimate love in marriage is now drawn from the animal world. The "doe" and the "deer" illustrate the exquisite gracefulness of a loving wife. Women frequently were named after pretty and graceful animals, such as the corresponding Tabitha and Dorcas (cf. Ac 9:36). The husband should be "captivated" (GK 8706) by the love of his wife. The word signifies a staggering gait and so here expresses the ecstatic joy of a "captivated" lover. It may even suggest "be intoxicated always with her love."

c. Motivation: Adultery is sinful folly (5:20–23)

20 Now the teacher shows the folly of adultery by raising rhetorical questions. Here he repeats the verb "captivated," but with the connotation of foolish delirium: "Why be captivated, my son, by an adulteress?" Common sense would say that such brief liaisons with strangers give no time for intimacy—that requires a lifelong bonding with the wife of one's youth.

21 Moreover, a person's ways are in clear view of the Lord who examines them. No matter how careful someone might be to conceal sin, one cannot conceal anything from God. Anyone who does not reckon on God's omniscience will get entangled in sin.

22–23 In sum, the lack of discipline and control in the area of sexual gratification is destructive. The one who plays with this kind of sin will become ensnared by it and led off to ruin. Verse 23 uses "led astray" this time to underscore that the crime spawns the punishment: "in the greatness of his folly he will reel" (pers. tr.). In other words, if the young man is not captivated by his wife but becomes captivated with a stranger in sinful acts, then his own iniquities will captivate him; and he will be led to ruin.

H. Admonition to Seek Release From a Foolish Indebtedness (6:1–5)

1. Conditions of indebtedness (6:1–2)

1–2 It was fairly common for someone to put up security for someone else—i.e., to underwrite another's debts. Here the guarantee of surety is graphically represented by the image of striking hands (cf. 11:15; 17:18; 22:26). But the pledge is foolish because the debtor is a neighbor who is a misfit. He would be under no obligation to do this—it was merely an impulsive act of generosity. A gullible young man might lack judgment and be easily swept in, only to realize too late that he was "trapped" and "ensnared." Such a rash act of generosity might take a lifetime to pay.

2. Exhortation to obtain release (6:3–5)

3–4 The advice for an indebted person is to try to get released from the pledge as soon as possible. Freeing oneself may be a humiliating process, but it is far better than the debt. The verb "humble yourself" (GK 8346) may have behind it the literal idea of allowing oneself to be trampled on (perhaps, "prostrate yourself"). The pledge can be released if one begs the creditor, and one should lose no time in pressing the appeal.

5 The exhortation is then repeated and enhanced by two similes that suggest the motif of the person's being entrapped by the pledge.

I. Admonition to Avoid Laziness (6:6–11)

1. Lesson in diligence (6:6–8)

6 The teacher next directs a lesson to the sluggard, using the activities of the ant to make the point (cf. 24:30–34). Since the ant is a lowly creature, this comparison is somewhat degrading. But the sluggard can learn diligence from its ways.

7–8 The description of the ant's activities shows that although it appears to have no leader (even though it actually does have organization and cooperation), it provides for the future with great industry. The classic example of such foresight and industry is Joseph in Ge 41.

The author of Proverbs frequently uses illustrations from nature, such as this gazelle (6:5).

2. Danger of poverty (6:9–11)

9–11 These verses provide the motivation for the admonition—there is the danger of poverty. The rhetorical question—"How long will you lie there, you sluggard?"—is designed to rebuke the laziness in a forceful manner. Then, using effective irony, the instructor mimics the lazy person's speech. His point is that too much sleep will lead to poverty—it will rob the lazy person of potential increase.

Two similes illustrate the onslaught of poverty. The first—"like a bandit"—uses a difficult term that has been interpreted as a "dangerous assailant" or a "highwayman," i.e., a bandit that robs. The term "an armed man" is probably connected to the military ideas of "shield" and "deliver." It is perhaps to be connected with the Arabic word for "bold," "insolent," and interpreted here as "beggar" or "insolent man."

J. Warning Against Deviousness (6:12–15)

1. Description (6:12–14)

12–14 The subject matter is now the "scoundrel" (GK 1175) and the "villain" (GK 224). These terms describe one who is both wicked and worthless. A survey of use shows the word to describe people who violate the law (Dt 15:9; Jdg 19:22; 1Ki 21:10, 13; Pr 16:27; et al.) or act in a contemptuous and foolish manner against cultic observance or social institutions (1Sa 10:27; 25:17; 30:22). The instruction focuses on the devious activities of this type of person.

The description moves from the scoundrel's perverse sayings to his sinister sign language to his disruptive plots developed through deceit. The expressions in v.13 seem to refer to any look or gesture that is put on and therefore a form of deception if not a way of making insinuations.

2. Destruction (6:15)

15 Disaster will befall the troublemaker suddenly. It is uncertain whether "he will be . . . destroyed" refers to death or not. Probably the line means that a character like this will be ruined when exposed.

K. Conduct the Lord Hates (6:16–19)

1. Introductory statement (6:16)

16 The verses that follow condemn certain characteristics and activities; the terms "hate" and "detestable" show that these are taboo, for they deny the divine element in humanity. Verse 16 uses what is known as a numerical ladder, paralleling "six things" with "seven things" (see also 30:15, 18, 21, 24, 29; Job 5:19; Ecc 11:2; Am 1:6, 9, 13; 2:1, 4, 6; Mic 5:5). The point of such a poetic arrangement is that the present enumeration does not exhaust the list.

2. Delineation (6:17–19)

17–19 The seven things that the Lord hates are specific personal attitudes and actions. There is something of a contrasting parallel arrangement with the Beatitudes in Mt 5, which has seven blessed things to answer these seven hated things; moreover, the first beatitude ("Blessed are the poor in spirit," Mt 5:5) contrasts with the first hated thing ("haughty eyes," v.17; i.e., "a proud look") and the seventh ("peacemakers," Mt 5:7) with the seventh abomination ("stirs up dissension," v.19).

The first in the list, "haughty eyes," refers to a proud look suggesting arrogant ambition. This term "high" is similarly used in Nu 15:30 for the sin of the high hand, i.e., willful rebellion or defiant sin. Usage of "haughty eyes" in the OT is telling: it describes the pompous Assyrian invader in Isa 10:12–14 as well as the proud king in Da 11:12 (NIV, "pride"). God will not tolerate anyone who thinks so highly of oneself (see Pr 21:4; Isa 2:11–17).

The second description is "a lying tongue." The term is used in Jer 14:14 to portray false prophets who deceive people and in Ps 109:2 to describe the deceiver who betrays—a passage that the disciples applied to Judas in Ac 1:20. Deception in speech is harmful (Pr 26:28), but in the end truth will prevail (Pr 12:19).

The third description focuses on hands as the instruments of murder. Genesis 9:6 prohibited shedding human blood because people are made in the image of God—no matter what one might think of them. But shedding "innocent blood" was an even greater crime. King Manasseh had filled the streets with innocent blood (2Ki 21:16; 24:4). Princes did it for gain according to Ezekiel (22:27). Even King David was prohibited from building the temple because he had shed much blood (1Ch 22:8).

The fourth phrase concerns the heart that "devises wicked schemes." The "heart" (GK 4213) represents the will most often. Here it plots evil. God early on declared that the human heart was capable of this (Ge 6:5); and Proverbs elaborates on the theme, showing that the heart that schemes wickedness is also deceitful (12:20; 14:22).

The fifth description uses the figure of "feet that are quick to rush into evil." This captures the enthusiastic and complete involvement in activities that bring pain to all concerned.

The sixth abomination returns to the theme of deception. Here the focus is on perjury ("a false witness"), a direct violation of the Decalogue. This character pours out "lies" (GK 3942; cf. Ps 40:4; Am 2:4; Mic 1:14).

The final description is general—God hates one "who stirs up dissension." "Dissension" (GK 4506) is attributed in Proverbs to contentious, quarreling people (21:9; 26:21; 25:24) who have a short fuse (15:18). Paul, on the other hand, warns against envy, malice, and strife (1Ti 6:4). These things, then, God will not tolerate. If he hates these things, then conversely he must love and desire (1) humility, (2) truthful speech, (3) preservation of life, (4) pure thoughts, (5) the eagerness to do good things, (6) honest witnesses, and (7) peaceful harmony.

L. Warning About Immorality (6:20–35)

1. Reminder to heed instruction (6:20–24)

20–21 Youth are now exhorted to cling fast to the teachings of their parents. Implicit in these verses is the basic understanding that a good home life—i.e., father and mother sharing the rearing of the children together—will go a long way to prevent youth from falling into immorality.

22–24 The motivation for keeping these commands is that they will bring protection from the adulteress. Verse 22 strengthens the instruction by using language similar to Dt 6:7, and v.23 uses metaphors that are also used of the law (see Ps 119:105). But beside the general ideas of protection and direction, the specific benefit of the teaching will be in keeping the youth from the loose woman. She is described as an "immoral woman" and a "wayward wife." The context shows that this immoral woman is another man's wife.

2. Warning to avoid seduction (6:25–35)

25 The admonition warns against lusting in one's heart for the immoral woman's beauty or charm. The verb for "to lust" (GK 2773) is used in the Decalogue to warn against coveting. Lust, according to Jesus, is a sin of the same kind as the act, not just the first step toward sin (Mt 5:28). Playing with temptation is only the heart reaching out after sin. So one should not dwell on the woman's seductive charms in one's heart. "Eyes" are singled out here because the painted eyes and the luring glances are symptoms of seduction (see 2Ki 9:30).

26 The summary motivation for the admonition is that such sin has a high price—it may even ruin one's life. The parallelism in this verse is difficult. It is not meant to say that prostitution is better than adultery because it only impoverishes whereas adultery preys on the very life. Both are costly sins to be avoided.

27–35 The motivation now elaborates on the motif that punishment is inevitable. Playing on the word ish ("man"; GK 408) and ishshah ("woman"; GK 851), the instructor introduces the figure of "fire" (esh; GK 836). Scooping coals into one's lap would represent holding the adulteress, and walking on coals would signify further sexual contact with her. The self-evident answer to the questions is that the adulterer will "get burned"; he will not go "unpunished" ("touches her" is probably a euphemism as in Ge 20:6). The rest of the passage reasons that no restitution is acceptable for adultery as there might be with thievery. A thief, when caught, pays dearly. But the adulterer will be humiliated and ruined. Nothing will satisfy the husband but revenge.

The expression "destroys himself" stresses that the guilty one destroys his own life. He could be given the death penalty (Dt 22:22); but he apparently continues to live in ignominy, destroyed spiritually and socially (see 2:18; 1Ti 5:6). In a morally healthy society the adulterer would be a social outcast.

M. Admonition to Avoid the Wiles of the Adulteress (7:1–27)

1. Important teaching of the father (7:1–5)

Once again the theme of seduction surfaces in the instruction of the father (see 2:16–19; 5:1–23; 6:20–35). Here it takes the form of a narrative about an individual woman who draws a youth into adultery. It is a didactic narrative that serves to make an earnest warning. The adulteress is probably not a personification of evil in this chapter; that is fully developed in ch. 9. However, referring to wisdom as a sister certainly prepares for the personifications of chs. 8 and 9. Wisdom will obviate temptations, the greatest being the sexual urge.

1–4 The section begins by repeating the instruction for the son to preserve and practice the authoritative teachings in order to "live." The expression "the apple of your eye" is literally "the little man" in the eye, having reference to the pupil, where the object focused on is reflected. The point is that the teaching is so precious it must be guarded that closely. Verse 3 strengthens the admonition by alluding to the instruction for heeding the law given in Dt 6:8.

5 The reason for following these teachings carefully is to give protection from the wiles of the loose woman. She is called an "adulteress" and a "wayward wife," who has "seductive words" (lit., "smooth words").

2. Description of seduction (7:6–23)

a. The victim (7:6–9)

6–9 The narrative unfolds with the observation of an unwary youth strolling along the streets at night. He is described as "a youth who lacked judgment" (lit., "a youth lacking of heart," i.e., one void of common sense or understanding). He is young, inexperienced, and featherbrained. His evening stroll takes him intentionally down the street to her house. And then, if all this activity of the naive young man takes place under the cover of night, only trouble can follow.

b. The temptress (7:10–12)

10 The narrative next introduces the seductress who comes out to meet the innocent youth. She is "dressed like a prostitute" and has "crafty intent." This latter expression is difficult; the ancient versions took it with the meaning of causing the youth's heart to flutter or of bewildering or capturing his heart. The expression literally means "guarded in heart." She has locked up her plans and gives nothing away. This, interestingly, contrasts with her attire, which gives her away.

11–12 The text further describes this wayward woman as "loud and defiant," with a roving desire. "She lurks" at every street corner, waiting for the gullible young man to pass her way.

c. The seduction (7:13–20)

13–15 The steps in the seduction are carefully calculated to ensnare the inexperienced youth. First, she boldly grabs him and kisses him. This is followed by her flattering invitation, in which she explains that she has "fellowship offerings" at home and came out especially looking for him (only a fool would believe that she was that interested in him). These offerings refer to the meat left over from votive offerings made in the sanctuary (see Lev 7:11–21). Apparently the sacrificial worship meant as little to her spiritually as does Christmas to modern hypocrites. Her reference to these fellowship offerings may mean nothing more than that she has fresh meat for a meal or else that she is ceremonially clean, perhaps after her period. At any rate, it is all probably a ruse for winning a customer.

16–17 The third step is the report of her careful preparation. She is not poor; for she has a bed, and it is ready.

18 The fourth step is the direct proposition: "Come, let's drink deep of love." Her invitation speaks of complete satiety and sheer enjoyment in physical love.

19–20 The final step is the adulteress's disarming reassurance. She explains that "my husband" is not at home. He conveniently is gone on a journey; and judging from his taking a money bag and staying till the next full moon, they would be perfectly safe in their escapade (he might even be gone for a fortnight, if a comparison of v.9 and v.20 can give clues to the chronology). At any rate, her appeal is bold, exciting, and apparently safe. It would take someone with the wisdom and integrity of a Joseph to resist such an appeal (cf. the important motifs in Ge 39, esp. v.8).

d. The capitulation (7:21–23)

21–23 The fall of the simpleton, after a brief pondering, is sudden, because she seduces him with her enticing speech. Using the similes of an ox for the slaughter and a deer for the noose, the teacher warns of the complete ruin that can come to one guilty of allowing himself to be seduced. This sin could "cost him his life"—he needs to know this. The meaning of the verse may refer to moral corruption rather than a literal death. The arrow piercing the liver may refer to the pangs of a guilty conscience that the guilty must reap along with spiritual and physical ruin.

3. Deadly results of consorting (7:24–27)

24–27 With a final flurry of exhortations, the teacher warns his sons to stay away from the seductress's paths because consorting with her leads to death. The language is startling in its force; but the ruin that such evil brings is as devastating as death and may, of course, end in actual punishment. He stresses that she has been the death of many and that her house is the way that leads to the "chambers of death." Her house is not the grave. It is, however, surely the way to it, and the one who takes that way is pathetic indeed. A man's life is not destroyed in one instant; it is taken from him gradually as he enters into a course of life that will leave him as another victim of the wages of sin.

N. The Appeal of Wisdom (8:1–36)

In this chapter wisdom continues to be represented as a person (cf. ch. 7). The material combines 1:20–33, in which wisdom proclaims her value, and 3:19–26, in which wisdom is the agent of Creation. This personification of wisdom does have affinities with other ancient Near Eastern wisdom literature. But wisdom here is not presented as a god; rather, it is presented as a self-conscious divine being distinct from but subordinate to the Lord. It personifies the attribute of wisdom displayed by God.

Many have equated wisdom in this chapter with Jesus Christ. This connection works only so far as Jesus reveals the nature of God the Father, including his wisdom, just as Proverbs presents the personification of the attribute. Jesus' claims included wisdom (Mt 12:42) and a unique knowledge of God (Mt 11:25–27). He even personified wisdom in a way that was similar to Proverbs (Mt 11:19; Lk 11:49). Paul saw the fulfillment of wisdom in Christ (Col 1:15–20; 2:3) and affirmed that Christ became our wisdom in the Crucifixion (1Co 1:24, 30). So the bold personification of wisdom in Proverbs certainly provides a solid foundation for the revelation of divine wisdom in Christ. But because wisdom appears to be a creation of God in 8:22–31, it cannot be identified with Jesus Christ.

1. Introduction (8:1–3)

1–3 It is now wisdom's turn to exhibit her attractions—in the open, not lurking in secret. Wisdom continually attests to her value: the rhetorical questions show that she is ready to call out. But this crying out is in the high roads, at the doors of the city where people gather.

2. First cycle (8:4–9)

a. Invitation: Listen and gain understanding (8:4–5)

4–5 The invitation from wisdom embraces all classes of people: v.4 includes "men" and "mankind"; v.5 uses "simple" and "foolish." The invitation for the "simple" and the "foolish" is to gain "prudence" and "understanding."

b. Motivation: Wisdom is noble, true, and just (8:6–9)

6 Wisdom begins her motivation by declaring that she has noble things to say. The term "worthy" (GK 5592) means excellent things. When wisdom opens her mouth, she speaks what is upright. So what she has to say is excellent and right.

7 The things that wisdom says are also reliable ("true"; GK 622), i.e., firm and dependable; it is the reflection within the heart before the speech. This speaking truth is derived from detesting wickedness (e.g., wickedness is taboo for wisdom).

8–9 The motivation further indicates that wisdom's appeal is "just" and "right," which is contrasted with "crooked or perverse" and faulty. There is no hidden agenda and no deception in wisdom's teachings. Its teachings are in plain view, intelligible to all who have some discernment or who find knowledge (the theme of "to find" is introduced here; NIV, "have").

3. Second cycle (8:10–21)

a. Invitation: Receive instruction and knowledge (8:10)

10 The second cycle begins with the invitation to "take" (NIV, "choose"; GK 4374) "instruction" and "knowledge" over silver and gold. True wealth derives from the former, not the latter.

b. Motivation: Wisdom is valuable (8:11–21)

11 The reason one should choose wisdom over wealth is because wisdom is more "precious," more desirable than anything else. The goodness of wisdom is based on its incomparable value in life.

12–16 The value of wisdom may be found in its practical use, especially by those in power. Wisdom claims now to dwell with "prudence" (GK 6893), i.e., right knowledge in special cases. She also has knowledge and discretion. Parallel to this quality is the fear of the Lord, which leads to rejection of evil, pride, and perverse speech. Counsel, judgment, and understanding belong to wisdom; and that is power. Power naturally forms the transition to the practical side of these qualities—people in power use wisdom to govern the earth (see Isa 11:1–4, which prophesies how the Messiah will use wisdom in governing the world). Their government must be "just" and must derive from godly wisdom.

17–21 Wisdom rewards those who love her. The emphasis of this section is that wisdom is accessible only to those who seek it. Loving and seeking point up the means of finding wisdom. Those who find it obtain honor and wealth. This honor and wealth come along the way of righteousness.

4. Third cycle (8:22–36)

a. Motivation: Wisdom preceded and delights in Creation (8:22–31)

22–23 In this third cycle, the motivation for receiving wisdom precedes the invitation. The first two verses provide a summary: the Lord possessed wisdom before the creation of the world. The verb qanah (GK 7865) can mean either "possess" or "create." The older versions chose "possess"; otherwise it might sound as if God lacked wisdom and so created it before the world began. They wanted to avoid saying that wisdom was not eternal. The verb qanah occurs twelve times in Proverbs with the idea of "acquire"; the LXX and Syriac, however, have the idea of "create." Although the idea is that wisdom existed before Creation, the parallel ideas in these verses ("brought me forth," v.22; "I was appointed," v.23; and "I was given birth," v.24) argue for "create/establish" here.

24–31 The summary statement is now developed in a lengthy treatment of wisdom as the agent (or "craftsman"; GK 570) of Creation. Verses 24–26 reiterate that wisdom was established before Creation ("oceans" [v.24] or "deeps," recalling Creation); vv.27–29 declare that wisdom was present when God created (notice the same progress of preexistence to world-creating acts for the Logos ["Word"] in the NT [Jn 1:1–3; Col 1:15–16]); and vv.30–31 tell how wisdom rejoiced in God's creation ("delight day after day" [v.30] recalls that "God saw that it was good" in Ge 1).

b. Invitation: Listen to wisdom and be blessed (8:32–36)

32–36 Verses 32–33 offer the explanation to the sons to listen, for a blessing is in store for all who live by wisdom's teachings. The explanation of this follows in vv.34–36. The alternatives could not be more striking—it is a choice between life and favor and harm and danger. This contrast is further marked out by the verb "finds me" and "fails to find me" (lit., "misses me").

O. Consequences of Accepting the Invitations of Wisdom or Folly (9:1–18)

Chapter 9 forms the conclusion of the lengthy nine-chapter introduction to the book. Both wisdom and folly will make their final appeals; and both appeal to the simpletons, those who need to live by wisdom but who are most easily influenced by folly. Wisdom offers life with no mention of pleasure; folly offers pleasure with no mention of death.

1. Accepting wisdom (9:1–12)

a. Invitation to wisdom (9:1–6)

1 The text makes a transition now from the previous passage; wisdom was last seen as the director of work on the cosmic level (8:30–31), but now wisdom is portrayed among humans. She has prepared a house and established it on seven pillars (probably a reference to the habitable world, which is spacious and enduring; cf. 8:29–31; Job 38:6; Ps 104:5). The "seven pillars" seem to be part of the imagery of the house but may have cosmic references. The phrase has given rise to expressions like "the seven pillars of wisdom" or "the house that wisdom builds." Since seven is a sacred or ominous concept, the point seems to be that wisdom produces a perfect world.

2–3 Wisdom has prepared a sumptuous banquet in this house and sends out her maids to call the simple to come and eat. The figures of meat and wine represent the good teaching of wisdom that will be palatable and profitable (cf. Isa 55:1–2; Jn 6:51, 55). It is uncertain whether the mixing of wine here refers to the practice of mixing wine with spices or mixing it with water as the Greeks did. So just as one would prepare a banquet and invite guests, wisdom prepares to press her appeal. All this imagery lets the simpleton know that what wisdom has to offer is marvelous.

4–6 The call goes out to the simple, to those "who lack judgment," to turn aside to wisdom. Carrying the figure of eating forward, the writer invites people to eat the food and drink the wine, i.e., to appropriate the teaching of wisdom. This acceptance would necessarily prompt the simpleton to abandon the "simple ways" (or perhaps "simpletons") and "live." The proper direction is on the way of understanding.

b. Description of responses (9:7–11)

7–8a The "mocker" (GK 4370) has been met before in the book (1:22; 3:34). They are those who will not live by wise and moral teachings and are not content to let others do so without their cynical mocking. The author warns that anyone who tries to rebuke and correct a mocker is asking for trouble; "insult," "abuse," and "hatred" are second nature to this cynical heckler. Thus the warning is put forth: "Do not rebuke."

8b–11 The authentically parallel idea forms the contrast—the wise person will love the one trying to correct him. "Love" (GK 170) has the idea of choosing and embracing; so this is the profitable response to corrective teaching. The parallelism of "wise" and "righteous" underscores the interrelationship between these qualities and shows the predisposition of those who are teachable. Moreover, the theme of the fear of the Lord is brought forward here, because this is the foundation of all wisdom and all righteousness (see comment on 1:7). The epithet "Holy One" is plural, suggesting the majestic nature of the Lord—he is "All-holy." In the final analysis those who fear the Lord, add to their learning, and receive discipline will look forward to a long and productive life.

c. Consequence: Reward (9:12)

12 The conclusion of the matter is expressed by the antithetically parallel ideas: Wisdom rewards the wise, but mockery suffers alone. "Your wisdom will reward you" is literally "you are wise to yourself," meaning that wisdom brings its own reward; it is sufficiently satisfying to be worth pursuing. Conversely, "if you are a mocker, you alone must bear it [NIV, 'you alone will suffer']." These words anticipate the teachings of James (cf. Jas 3:1–12), that words we speak will haunt us through life.

2. Accepting the invitation of folly (9:13–18)

a. Invitation (9:13–17)

13 Now the rival "woman Folly" (GK 4070) presses her appeal for the naive to come and eat from her provision. She is the counterpart of the personification of wisdom. Her character is described as "loud," "undisciplined," and "without knowledge." "Loud" suggests riotous and portrays her as foolish and simplistic. To these troubling qualities is added the idea of ignorance, which must mean moral ignorance in Proverbs.

14–15 Folly's position is prominent in the city streets. We should note how she often imitates wisdom (cf. v.3), so that only the cautious and discerning are able to make the right choice. Her invitation, likewise, is to the passersby, here described as those "who go straight" on their ways. This would identify them as quiet and unwary.

16–17 Folly's invitation parrots wisdom's (see v.4). This competing voice, albeit louder and more appealing to those who "lack judgment," likewise invites people to eat. "Stolen water" is now offered to passersby instead of mixed wine from wisdom. The "water" is only sweeter than "wine" because it is stolen, much as food that is unjustly gained seems more delicious. The figures here are similar to those in the section on wisdom: the words and ways of folly are compared to food and drink. Compare 5:15–16 (water) and 30:20 (bread) to see the specification as sexual folly.

b. Consequence: death (9:18)

18 The contrast with Wisdom's banquet continues, but now the consequence for Folly's "guests" is startling. The naive who enter her banquet hall do not know that the "dead" (GK 8327; often translated "shades") are there. This word refers to the dead who lead a shadowy existence in Sheol (see comment on 2:18–19; cf. Job 3:13–19; Ps 88:5; Isa 14:9–11). The verse approximates the "as if" motif of wisdom literature—those ensnared by folly are as good as in hell, for that house is a throat to hell. Many "eat" on earth what they "digest" in hell. The point is that the life of folly—a lifestyle of undisciplined, immoral, riotous living—runs counter to God's plan of life and inevitably leads to death. Jesus warns people to avoid this broad way and follow the straight and narrow path of righteous, wise living (Mt 7:13–14).

III. The First Collection of Solomonic Proverbs (10:1–22:16)

Beginning with ch. 10 there is a notable change in the form of the material. No longer do we find the forceful admonitions to seek wisdom, the lengthy poems, or the developed pictures and personifications. Instead we find what more closely corresponds to the title "Proverbs"—a collection of independent, miscellaneous aphorisms, dealing mostly with the consequences of right or wrong actions on various topics.

The proverbs in chs. 10:1–22:16 seem to defy an orderly arrangement or outline, but they are indeed a collection of proverbs. With this in mind, yet still endeavoring to make this section as accessible and usable as possible to the reader, I give a topical heading to each of the proverbs in boldface type.

Chapter 10

1 Effect of wisdom on others. This antithetical saying declares that the consequences of wisdom or folly in the child affects the parents accordingly (cf. 17:21, 25; 23:24–25; 28:7; 29:3).

2 Value of righteousness. The sage asserts that "righteousness" (GK 7407) has far greater value than ill-gotten wealth. This word takes on the meaning of honesty in this contrast. Wealth in general can only be enjoyed for a while, but righteousness delivers from mortal danger ("death").

3 Rewards, satisfaction of needs. In another antithetical saying, the general observation is that the Lord rewards the righteous with the satisfaction of their needs. The text literally says that he will not leave unsatisfied "the appetite [lit., soul] of the righteous," which here includes the inner urge toward success.

4 Wealth through diligence. This saying attributes wealth to diligence. "Lazy hands" refers to the careless work that such hands produce.

5 Diligence, opposite of idleness. Once again idleness, which leads to ruin, is contrasted with diligence. The wise son seizes the opportunities with keen insight into the importance of the season.

6 Rewards, words of blessing. The focus of this contrast is on rewards. We would expect a curse to be the antithesis of "blessings." But the point is rather that behind the speech of the wicked is aggressive "violence," so he cannot be trusted.

7 Good reputation. Likewise, a reputation is determined by righteousness or wickedness. "Name" and "memorial" are often paired as synonyms. "Name" refers to fame; the name of the wicked will eventually disappear, and it will leave a bad memory that excites abhorrence.

8–10 Conduct of wise and foolish. These sayings contrast the wise person with the fool. The first exhorts compliance with "commands" from superiors—a fool talks too much to be attentive to them. The second holds out the promise that security goes with those who have "integrity," but the insecurity of retribution awaits the perverse. Verse 10 departs from the normal antithetical pattern to form a comparison: shifty signs, although grievous, are not as ruinous as foolish talk. Both are to be avoided.

11–12 Good and evil conduct. What the righteous say is beneficial to life, unlike the aggressive violence of the fool (cf. v.8b). The idea of the "fountain of life" may come from Ps 36:9 (see also Pr 13:14; 14:27; 16:22; Eze 47:1–12; Jn 7:38). As to attitudes, the wicked are motivated by hatred that brings dissension but the righteous by love that is harmonious. Love's covering wrongs is harmonious with forgiveness (see 1Pe 4:8).

13–14 Wise and foolish speech. Attention now turns to wisdom and folly. The critically perceptive person speaks wisdom, unlike the fool who constantly needs correction (cf. Ps 32:8–9). The second proverb extols the wisdom of silently storing knowledge rather than foolishly talking prematurely (see Jas 3:13–18).

15 Wealth and security. A contrast is provided here between rich and poor: Security comes with wealth. The image used is of a "fortified city," protecting its inhabitants against all adversity.

16 Rewards of life. Rewards are determined by moral choices--righteousness bringing life, wickedness, punishment (see Ro 6:23). The point seems to be that what one receives in life depends on a wise use of gifts and a righteous character. Don't blame poverty for the quality of life. The point again is to live righteously.

17 On discipline. Learning to accept ("heed"; GK 9068) discipline is wise because it will benefit others. This word means holding fast to discipline as a path of life. Unfortunately, abandoning correction influences others too.

18–21 On speech. In v.18 two errors are given, the second being climactic: hypocrisy is bad enough, slander is worse. At least in the first one—the "lying lips"—one keeps hatred to himself. In the ancient world much wisdom literature condemns lying and slander. Controlling the tongue (v.19) helps avoid sin (see Jas 3:1–12).

What the righteous say is infinitely more valuable than what the wicked intend (v.20). The contrast is between the tongue (i.e., what is said) and the mind ("heart," i.e., what is determined). Righteous speech, like silver, is valuable and treasured. Moreover, what the righteous say is edifying—it enhances ("nourishes") common life. "Fools," characterized by a lack of discipline and little wit, ruin their lives and others as well.

22 Wealth as a blessing. God brings wealth to those whom he blesses—and without anxiety ("trouble"). In Ps 127:1–3, the psalmist stresses how the Lord gives to his beloved prosperity and safety as well as peace of mind. The proverb is also a warning against self-sufficiency.

23 On pleasure. One's character is revealed in what one enjoys. Evil conduct to the fool is "like sport" ("pleasure"); like child's play, it is so easy. This evil conduct is contrasted with wisdom, the delight of those who have understanding.

24 Hopes and fears for the future. This little contrast declares the working out of the fear of the wicked and the desire of the righteous. What the wicked fear will come on them, so that there is no security for them; the "desire" of the righteous, i.e., what they long for in their righteous lifestyle, will be given to them.

25 Confidence in calamity. Survival in catastrophes of life is reserved for the righteous, for they are properly prepared to meet the real tests of life. Matthew 7:24–27 addresses the same point: If people base their lives on temporal values, they must know that they can be quickly swept away.

26 Lazy servants. Vinegar to the teeth is an irritant that is unpleasant to experience, and smoke to the eyes is a hindrance to progress. This little proverb portrays the aggravation in sending a lazy servant on a mission—it could be a confusing, unpleasant ordeal.

27 The fear of the Lord. The fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom (1:7), contributes to a long and prosperous life. This is a saying that is generally true. Why the righteous suffer and even die young is a problem that perplexed Israel's sages (cf. Job; Pss 49; 73).

28 Hopes and fears for the future. This is a contrast of expectations: the righteous will experience the joyful fulfillment of their hopes, but what the wicked hope for will be dashed. The proverb is a general maxim based on God's justice.

29 Security in the way of the Lord. The "way of the LORD" refers to God's providential administration of life. Thus divine justice will be security for the righteous and disaster for the wicked.

30 Security of the righteous. This proverb concerns the enjoyment of covenantal promises, i.e., living in the land of Israel. It is promised to the righteous (see Lev 26; Ps 92). If the people lived in righteousness, they would enjoy the land; if not, they would be exiled.

31–32 Wise and perverse speech. Righteous speech can be beneficial to others and pleasing to God; good people use few words and choose them well. No one wants to listen to perverse words—words that the wicked say, generally without prior consideration and beyond prudent limits. The bold image of cutting out the tongue is hyperbolic.

Chapter 11

1 Honesty in business. Honesty pleases the Lord. This contrast between what the Lord abhors and delights in elaborates on the point. The Scriptures throughout condemn dishonesty in business (see Lev 19:35–36; Dt 25:13–16; Am 8:5; et al.). Whatever the Lord "abhors" must be avoided. Thus to be accepted by God in one's transactions, one must deal honestly (see 16:11; 20:10, 23).

2 Pride and Humility. "Humility" (GK 7560) describes those who know their place; the humble avoid disgrace and find wisdom. "Pride" (Gk 2295) is literally a boiling up; thus an overstepping of the boundaries and insubordination is meant. The proud are inflated to the level of self-bestowed divinity; they will have their egos deflated.

3 Integrity. Here is another proverb affirming the value of integrity. The contrast is between the upright and the unfaithful; those who use treachery (lit., "the crookedness of the unfaithful") are destroyed rather than guided by it.

4 Righteousness better than wealth. Righteousness is pleasing to God and more valuable than wealth when the "day of wrath" (i.e., divine punishment in this life; see Job 21:30; Eze 7:19; Zep 1:18) strikes.

5–6 Righteous and wicked conduct. These two proverbs contrast the righteous with the wicked. The first teaches that the righteous enjoy security and serenity through life; the second, that the sins of the wicked catch up with them.

7 The hope of the wicked. The expectations of the wicked perish with them (see Ps 49). Any hope for long life or success borne of wickedness will be disappointed.

8 Just retribution. Here is an expression of confidence in God's justice in bringing recompense into the world. The antithesis shows the consequences of actions with an unusual twist—the "trouble" the righteous escape falls on the wicked.

9 Safety from slander. This antithetical verse stresses that a righteous person can escape devastating slander through knowledge. The "godless" (i.e., the hypocrite or flatterer) is the one who "destroys" a neighbor. The righteous have sufficient knowledge and experience to identify and end the slander.

10 On joy. The common theme of this verse is joy; it comes from either the success of the righteous or the ruin of the wicked (cf. 2Ki 11:20; Est 8:15).

11 Helpful or harmful speech. The "blessing of the upright" is the beneficent words and deeds that bring enrichment to a community. But the words of the wicked have a disastrous effect on society, endangering, weakening, and ruining it with demoralizing, slanderous, and malicious criticism.

12–15 On speech. One should hold one's tongue rather than deride a neighbor. The wise man is a "man of discernment"; the other one "lacks judgment." How one treats a neighbor is significant in Proverbs—one was expected to be a good neighbor.

Verse 13 is a contrast between the gossip and the "trustworthy man." Talebearers go from one to another and speak disparagingly about someone in a malicious manner (see Lev 19:16; Jer 9:3). Such people are despised in society because they cannot be trusted.

In v.14, advice is essential for the stability of a nation. The term for "guidance" is comparable to steering a ship, here a ship of state; without it the nation is in danger. This saying assumes that the counselors are wise and intelligent, if "victory" is sure.

Verse 15 instructs people to avoid pledges with strangers if they want to remain financially solid. It focuses on the consequences of the action. The "stranger" (NIV, "another") refers to any unknown person, someone from another clan or family or even from another nation.

16–17 On kindness. Two contrasts are here juxtaposed: "a kindhearted woman" and "ruthless men," and "respect" (or "honor") and "wealth." The idea seems to be that one can seize wealth by any means, but "honor" is the natural reward for the gracious person.

Verse 17 contrasts the consequences of dispositions: "kindness" (GK 2876) is healthy, but anger brings trouble. One's well-being is at risk if the personality is volatile. "Trouble" (GK 6579) may recall Jos 7:25–26, where Achan troubled Israel.

18 Rewards justly earned. Ultimately, rewards are appropriate for different character traits. The second line extols the benefits for one "who sows righteousness," i.e., one who inspires righteousness in others while practicing it himself. What is sown will yield fruit (1Co 9:11; 2Co 9:6; Jas 3:18).

19 Conduct bringing life or death. Since life and death result from moral choices, righteousness must be pursued. "Life" and "death" describe the vicissitudes of this life but can also refer to beyond the grave.

20 Conduct pleasing to God. This contrast records certain things that the Lord either detests or delights in. The "perverse heart" is a twisted mind, i.e., the whole spiritual being is influenced toward evil; it is an abomination to the Lord. Conversely, to please God one should follow a blameless course of life (see 2:21; 17:20).

21 Certainty of retribution. God's just retribution is certain; one can depend on it. Those who escape it are the "righteous" (lit., the "seed of the righteous"; i.e., the righteous as a class of people, cf. Isa 1:4; 65:23).

22 Beauty without discretion. This proverb uses emblematic parallelism to describe a beautiful woman without "discretion." The description is probably of a woman with no moral sensibility or propriety—unchaste. She is compared to a pig with an ornament. Why join a beautiful ornament and an unworthy body? The pig will not know its value.

23 Prospect for life. The consequences of hope are determined by moral character. God rewards the righteous with prosperity; wrath eventually comes on the wicked.

24–25 Rewards for generosity. The paradox presented here does not refer to financial investments. Rather, in God's economy generosity often determines prosperity: one must give in order to gain (see Ps 112:9; 2Co 9:6–9). In v.25, those who are generous toward others will be provided for themselves. The first description, "a generous man," is literally "the soul of blessing." "Blessing" (GK 1388) describes a "present" (Ge 33:11) or "special favor" (Jos 15:19). The verb "made rich" (NIV, "prosper"; GK 2014) means "to be made fat," drawing on the standard comparison between fatness and abundance or prosperity (Dt 32:15). The second line makes a comparison between providing water for the thirsty with generously providing for those in need (see Jer 31:25; cf. La 3:15). The kind act will be reciprocated.

26 Socially responsible business. This proverb reveals how a merchant's response to supply and demand will influence the customer's opinion of him. Some merchants hoard up the produce to raise the prices when there is a great need for the produce. Merchants must have a social conscience, too.

27 Prospect for life. One generally receives the consequences of the kind of life one pursues, whether good or evil. There is a divine justice. The expression "seeks [NIV, finds] goodwill" may refer to seeking God's favor (see Ps 5:12; Isa 49:8): Whoever diligently seeks good is seeking divine favor.

28 Security. Security and prosperity are determined by the object of faith. The righteous trust in the Lord and flourish. The image of the "green leaf" is a figure of prosperity and fertility throughout the ancient Near East. The image of falling uses the analogy of the physical act to portray coming to ruin in life.

29 Laziness. An avaricious man deprives his family of livelihood and brings them to nothing but distress. He gains nothing for his efforts, "wind" signifying that which cannot be grasped (27:16; Ecc 1:14, 17). The second line suggests that those who foolishly mismanage their accounts may have to sell themselves into slavery to the wise. So the ideas in the verse are complementary.

30 Righteousness brings life. Both "fruit" and "tree of life" are metaphorical, the first image signifying what the righteous produce and the second identifying that as a healthy, long life. The idea of "winning souls" means capturing or laying hold of people with ideas or influence (2Sa 15:6).

31 Certainty of retribution. Retribution for sin is certain, for the righteous and especially for the sinner. The proverb uses a "how much more" argument—argument from the lesser to the greater. Divine justice deals with all sin; and if the righteous suffer for their sins, certainly the wicked will.

Chapter 12

1 On discipline. Those who wish to improve themselves must learn to accept correction and learn from it. This proverb adds the contrast that to refuse it is brutish ("stupid" [GK 1280] is descriptive of a dumb animal). It is as if one distinction between humans and animals is this feature of receiving discipline.

2 Conduct pleasing to God. Obtaining the Lord's favor is the result of virtue. A "good man" is contrasted with a "crafty man."

3 Righteousness brings stability. Only righteousness brings stability in life—true of both society and individuals. Society cannot long endure if established on evil principles (see 10:25).

4 Character of a noble wife. The moral character of a woman affects her husband's enjoyment of life. "A wife of noble character" is a "crown," a symbol of honor and renown. A "disgraceful wife" (lit., "one who puts to shame," i.e., lowers one's standing in the community) will eat away her husband's strength and destroy his happiness.

5 Just and unjust plans. Righteous people are fair and honest. The thoughts (i.e., intentions) of good people are directed toward what is right. The wicked give deceitful advice, which can lead only to evil.

6 Skillful defense. The righteous are able to make a skillful defense against false accusations. The vivid picture of "lying in wait for blood" conveys that the wicked make a trap by their false accusations. The righteous, who through discipline and instruction have gained knowledge and perception, are able to avoid this danger.

7 Security of the righteous. The righteous are stable in times of trouble (cf. Mt 7:24–27). The image of the fate of the wicked being "overthrown" is forceful and may allude to Ge 19:21—they will be destroyed completely, like Sodom and Gomorrah.,

8 Appreciation of wisdom. This saying makes a point about the appreciation of clear thinking. In proportion to wisdom a person receives praise. "Wisdom" here (lit., "intelligent," as in 1Sa 25:3; GK 8507) refers to the capacity to think straight. The "warped mind" lacks the ability to see things as they really are and so makes wrong choices. No praise exists for this.

9 On humility. One should be satisfied with comfort at the expense of pretension. The point seems to be that some people live beyond their means in a vain show ("pretend to be somebody"), whereas, if they lived modestly, they could have some of the conveniences of life, e.g., a servant. Another way to read v.9a is "Better is the lowly that serves himself."

10 Compassion for animals. Compassion for animals is an indication of one's character. The righteous are kind to all God's creation (see Dt 25:4) because they have received his bounty.

11 Diligence prospers. One ensures income through diligent work and not through unfounded speculation.

12 Prosperity for righteous pursuits. This proverb is difficult to interpret. The verse seems to be saying that there are good rewards for the righteous, but the wicked are dangerous and perhaps get caught in their own devices.

13 Dangerous speech. Righteous people avoid evil talk because it is dangerous. The point of the parallel expression is that the "evil man" catches himself in his words (lit., "the transgression of his lips"). People who are righteous will not get themselves into a bind by what they say.

14 Prosperity through words and work. Proper speech and diligent work result in good things. If one's conversation is wise, intelligent, and honoring to God, it will result in blessing.

15 Wisdom takes advice. People demonstrate their maturity by how well they respond to sound advice. Reasonable (i.e., "wise") people will recognize and accept good advice, even if they themselves often give advice to others. "Advice" (GK 6783) is an application of wisdom and knowledge to a specific situation, either by astute observation or well thought-out opinion. Fool, on the other hand, are set in their own way and will not listen to advice.

16 Wisdom overlooks insults. Mature people are able to handle criticism without responding instinctively and irrationally. The wise do not give the enemy that satisfaction. It is not so much that the wise repress anger or feelings but that they are more shrewd in dealing with it.

17 True and false witnesses. The true witness is reliable because he tells the truth, always uttering what is right. The contrast is with the false witness and his lies.

18 Healing speech. Those who are wise do not cause harm by speaking hastily and inadvisably (see Lev 5:4; Nu 30:7). Such talk is like a piercing sword—it wounds. Conversely, the tongue of the wise brings "healing." Their words heal because they are faithful and true, gentle and kind, and uplifting and encouraging.

19 Truth outlasts lies. Truthfulness will outlive lies—forever. The little expression "only a moment" is literally "till I wink again."

20 Plans for evil or peace. The contrast here is between plotting evil and promoting peace with a view to the consequences. Plotting evil produces only sorrow and trouble, because "evil" (GK 8273) has the idea of pain in it. "Peace" (GK 8934), on the other hand, refers to social wholeness and well-being (see Pss 34:14; 37:37). The "counselors of peace," as the text literally reads, will reap both inner contentment from doing what is right and the pleasure of seeing positive results.

21 Security of the righteous. Here is a relative truth about the contrast between the righteous and the wicked with respect to calamity. "No harm befalls the righteous" means that decent people do not have frequent trouble of their own making.
