Acknowledgments

The publisher of The Zondervan NIV Bible Commentary wishes to thank the two editors who undertook the massive task of reducing eleven volumes of Bible commentaries into two: Richard Polcyn, who did the Old Testament, and Verlyn D. Verbrugge, who did the New Testament. Thanks also to Dr. Kenneth L. Barker and John R. Kohlenberger III, who offered invaluable assistance as consulting editors.

The publisher also deeply appreciates the assistance of Neal and Joel Bierling, who served as consultants for, and provided, most of the pictures used in this two-volume commentary. Unless otherwise noted, all pictures are theirs. Finally, thanks to the Bible Department of Zondervan Publishing House for allowing us to use many of the charts and maps from their bestselling study Bibles.

Preface

The NIV Bible Commentary has been in the making for a long time. In 1976 the first volume of The Expositor's Bible Commentary (Volume 10) was released, containing commentaries on Romans to Galatians, under the general editorship of Frank E. Gaebelein. The final volume in this series was published in 1992, with commentaries on Deuteronomy to 2 Samuel.

Contributors for The Expositor's Bible Commentary were solicited from among the best evangelical scholars on both sides of the Atlantic. Each expositor was committed to the divine inspiration, complete trustworthiness, and full authority of Scripture as God's Word. Each author's work aimed to provide preachers, teachers, and students of the Bible with insights into the Scriptures that were scholarly yet practical to everyday life. The full text of the New International Version of the Bible was printed along with the commentary section. The units of discussion were often followed by technical notes of interest mainly to scholars.

The Expositor's Bible Commentary has fulfilled its goal admirably, judging from the positive reviews it has received, the awards it has earned, and the tens of thousands of sets that have been purchased. It was felt that this excellent series could serve well as the basis for a two-volume commentary set designed primarily for lay persons. Consequently, the commentaries from Genesis to Revelation in the Expositor's Bible Commentary have now been abridged, retaining all the important interpretative material of the larger set but without the text of the NIV and the detailed scholarly notes and discussions.

This two-volume commentary has two additional features not found in the original set. First, both volumes are replete with maps, charts, tables, and pictures that are relevant to the passages under discussion. Secondly, throughout the commentary, where specific biblical words are discussed at some length, the Goodrick-Kohlenberger numbers (abbreviated GK) have been added. These numbers, which appeared first in The NIV Exhaustive Concordance, are based on the numbering system for each Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek word in the Bible developed by Edward W. Goodrick and John R. Kohlenberger III (a numbering system similar but superior to the ever-popular Strong's numbering system). An index of the words that are referred to is found in the back of each volume.

It is the hope of the publisher that just as The Expositor's Bible Commentary has served so well the needs of pastors and teachers, this two-volume commentary will serve the needs of average lay persons in the church who want to learn more about the Bible in their personal study or prepare themselves to lead a Bible lesson in a small group study.

The Bible is the greatest and most beautiful book of all time, the primary source of law and morality, the fountain of divine wisdom, the infallible guide to life, and above all, the inspired witness to Jesus Christ. May this work fulfill its function of expounding the Scriptures with grace and clarity, so that its users may find that both Old and New Testaments do indeed lead us to our Lord Jesus Christ, who alone could say, "I have come that they may have life, and have it to the full" (John 10:10).

Genesis

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

Little is known about the origin and authorship of the book of Genesis. It is part of the Pentateuch, which Jewish tradition and the NT have ascribed to Moses (cf. Jn 1:17; 5:46; 7:19, 23). Generally, the question of the authorship of Genesis is taken up within the context of theories regarding the literary history of the Pentateuch as a whole.

We must distinguish at least two kinds of background material in the book of Genesis: (1) the historical background in which the book was written, and (2) the historical background of the context of the events recorded in the book. The first concerns a specific time and place for the composition of the book. The second covers a wide-ranging array of settings (e.g., the Garden of Eden, the Flood, the city of Babylon, Canaan, and Egypt).

Genesis records two types of events: those that happened on a global or even cosmic scale (e.g., Creation, the Flood) and those that happened in a relatively isolated, localized way (e.g., Noah's drunkenness, Abraham's vision). By far most events in Genesis happened in a limited sphere of time and location and can best be described as "family matters."

2. Unity

The book of Genesis is characterized by both an easily discernible unity and a noticeable lack of uniformity. Much like the writers of the NT Gospels and the later historical books of the OT, the writer of Genesis appears to have composed his work from "archival" records of God's great deeds in the past. We know from references within the early historical books that such records were maintained at an early stage in Israel's history (Ex 17:14; Nu 21:14; Jos 10:13); so perhaps similar records were kept at far earlier stages within the individual households of the patriarchs and their tribal ancestors. The narratives within Genesis appear to be largely made up of small, self-contained stories worked together into larger units by means of various geographical and genealogical tables. Thus one should not expect to find absolute uniformity of style, vocabulary, etc., among all the individual narratives, any more than an absolute uniformity can be expected in the later historical books. Indeed, we would more likely expect the writer, working under the direction of God, to have preserved his records just as he had received them, sacrificing uniformity for the sake of historical faithfulness.

3. Authorship

The question naturally arises as to who wrote or composed the final account of the book of Genesis. Who put all the narratives together? The composer of Genesis, which is part of the Pentateuch, seems most likely to be the same as that of the Pentateuch as a whole. Nowhere in the work does the author refer to himself or identify himself. Early and reliable tradition has ascribed the authorship to Moses; and it is a fact that throughout the pentateuchal narratives it is Moses who is most closely associated with the writing of the material contained in the Pentateuch (Ex 17:14; 20:1; cf. also Jos 8:31–32). It appears certain that Jesus and the writers of the NT believed that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch (e.g., Jn 5:46).

4. Purpose

Since the purpose of the book of Genesis is intricately bound up with the purpose of the Pentateuch, we shall address briefly the question of the overall purpose of the Pentateuch. The task of discovering the purpose of a work that is so large and diverse is best achieved by means of compositional analysis, which basically describes the method and techniques used by an author.

The final shaping of the canonical Pentateuch involved the sorting and placement of material consisting of at least four distinct literary types: narrative, poetry, law, and genealogy. The genealogical texts play an important role in the early sections of the Pentateuch, especially in the book of Genesis, but do not lead to fruitful conclusions about the shape or structure of the Pentateuch as a whole. A similar verdict can be drawn from a consideration of the large legal collections within the Pentateuch. The importance of such collections is beyond dispute, but they do not appear to be the means by which the whole of the Pentateuch has been shaped.

A close study of the author's use of narrative and poetic texts, however, sheds considerable light on the final shape of the work. The technique of using a poetic speech and a short epilogue to conclude a narrative is well known in biblical literature and occurs frequently within recognizable segments of the Pentateuch itself. The Creation account in Ge 1 and 2 concludes with the short poetic discourse of Adam (2:23) followed by an epilogue (v.24). The account of the Fall in ch. 3 concludes with a poetic discourse (vv.14–19) and an epilogue (vv.20–24). The account of Cain in ch. 4 concludes with a poetic discourse (vv.23–24) and an epilogue (vv.25–26).

That this same pattern can be found throughout Genesis suggests that it was an important part of the compositional technique of the author. Most notable is the occurrence of this pattern in the Joseph story (chs. 37–48), which concludes with the poetic discourse of Jacob's blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh (48:15–16, 20). More importantly, however, the poetic speech–short epilogue pattern recurs at a much higher level within the entire Pentateuch, suggesting that the technique was extended as part of the structure embracing the whole of the five-volume work.

Another literary seam in the Pentateuch can be expressed by the term narrative typology. One cannot read the Pentateuch without recognizing definite similarities among narratives (e.g., Ge 12:10–20; 20:1–18; and 26:1–11). It is even possible that the sojourn of Abraham in Egypt and later in Gerar (both because of a famine), and Isaac's sojourn in Gerar (also because of a famine), foreshadow Ge 41–Ex 12, Israel's sojourn in Egypt that came about as a result of the famine recorded in the Joseph story. What the author wants to show is that the events of the past are pointers to those in the future.

5. Literary Form

Except for scattered poetic sections in Genesis, its overall literary form is historical narrative, which is the re-presentation of past events for the purpose of instruction. Two dimensions are always at work in shaping such narratives: the course of the historical event itself and the viewpoint of the author who recounts the events. Thus we must not only look at the course of the event in its historical setting, but we must also look for the purpose and intention of the author in recounting the event.

No historical narrative is a complete account of all that occurred in a given event or series of events. The author must select those events that most effectively relate not only what happened but also the meaning and significance of what happened.

A close study of Ge 1:1–2:4a shows that the author made a careful and purposeful selection in the composition of the Creation account. Rather than give details about the creation of the angels, stars, and galaxies, the author has chosen to concentrate on the creation and preparation of the land. In fact, he has only three specific subjects in his account of Creation: God, man and woman, and the land. Although the creation of the sun and moon is given considerable attention, neither of these bodies is mentioned in its own right but only as it relates to the affairs of humans on earth (1:14–15). What, then, does Ge 1:1–2:4a tell us about the land? It tells us that God is its owner. He created and prepared the land, and he can give it to whomever he chooses (Jer 27:5).

Another interrelationship between structure and selection that Ge 1:1–2:4a shows is in the view of God. He is the Creator of the universe. Because Israel came to know God in a close and personal way, a certain theological pressure existed that tended to localize and nationalize God as the God of Israel alone (Mic 3:11). Over against this lesser view of God stands the message of Ge 1 with its clear introduction to the God who created the universe and who has blessed all humanity. From the point of view of the author of the Pentateuch, the Creator of the universe has a plan of blessing for all people. This is the theological foundation of all subsequent missionary statements in the Bible.

Finally, Ge 1:1–2:4a serves as a backdrop for the central theme of the Pentateuch. The most prominent event and the most far-reaching theme in the Pentateuch is the covenant between God and Israel established at Mount Sinai. That covenant relates directly back to God's initial desire to bless the human race. About that theme we can say three things: (1) The covenant at Sinai was God's plan to restore his blessing to the human race through the descendants of Abraham (Ge 12:1–3; Ex 2:24). (2) However, the covenant at Sinai failed to restore that blessing because Israel failed to trust God and obey his will. (3) But the author goes on to demonstrate that God's promise to restore the blessing will ultimately succeed because God himself promised to give Israel, at some future date, a heart that would trust and obey him (Dt 30:1–10). In other words, the entire outlook of the Pentateuch is "eschatological," for it looks to the future as the time when God's faithful promise (blessing) would be fulfilled.

To summarize, therefore, Ge 1:1–2:4a: the author of the Pentateuch intends his Creation account to relate to his readers that God, the Creator of the universe, has prepared the land as a home for his special creature, the human race, and that he has a plan of blessing for all of his creatures.

EXPOSITION

I. Introduction to the Patriarchs and the Sinai Covenant (1:1–11:26)

Chapters 1–11 introduce both the book of Genesis and the Pentateuch. They set the stage for the narratives of the patriarchs (Ge 12–50) as well as provide the appropriate background for understanding the central topic of the Pentateuch: the Sinai covenant (Ex 1–Dt 34).

A. The Land and the Blessing (1:1–2:24)

1. The God of creation (1:1)

1 The Creator is identified as "God" (Heb. Elohim; GK 466), the God of the Fathers and of the covenant at Sinai. The proper context for understanding 1:1 is the whole of the book of Genesis and the Pentateuch. By identifying God as the Creator, a crucial distinction is introduced between the God of the Fathers and the gods of the nations (i.e., idols). This verse also explains the origin of all that exists in the universe, affirming that God alone is eternal and that all else owes its origin and existence to him. The term "beginning" marks a starting point of a specific duration (cf. Dt 11:12), namely, the beginning of the story of God and his people.

2. Preparation of the land (1:2–2:3)

a. First day (1:2–5)

2a Verse 2 describes the condition of the land just before God prepared it for the human race. The immediate context suggests that the land was "formless [GK 9332] and empty [GK 983]" because "darkness" was over the land, and it was covered with water. It was in its "not-yet" state, i.e., not yet inhabitable for humankind (cf. Isa 45:18). Thus the remainder of the account portrays God's preparing the land for man and woman. When Israel disobeyed God, the land became again "uninhabitable" (GK 9332), and the people were sent into exile: "I looked at the earth, and it was formless [GK 9332] and empty [GK 983] and at the heavens and their light was gone. . . . the fruitful land was a desert" (Jer 4:23–26). In other words, the land after the Exile was depicted in the same state as it was before God's gracious preparation of the land in Creation. The land lies empty, dark, and barren, awaiting God's call to light and life.

2b The second part of v.2 describes the work of God, or the Spirit of God, in the initial stages of Creation, hovering over the "not-yet" world like an eagle "hovering" (cf. Dt 32:11) over its young with great concern. There is an interesting parallel between the Creation account (Ge 1) and the account of the construction of the tabernacle in Exodus. In both the work of God (Ge 2:2; Ex 31:5) is to be accomplished by the "Spirit of God." As God did his "work" of creation by means of the "Spirit of God," so Israel was to do their "work" by means of the "Spirit of God."

3–5 Verse 3 has often been taken to mean that God created light before he had created the sun, since not until v.16 does the narrative speak of God making the sun. But the sun, moon, and stars are all to be included in the usual meaning of the phrase "heavens and the earth," and thus according to the present account these celestial bodies were all created in v.1. Verse 3 describes the appearance of the sun through the darkness (cf. 44:3; Ex 10:23; Ne 8:3). The division between "the day" and "the night" leaves little room for an interpretation of the "light" in v.3 as other than that of the sun.

The frequent repetition of "And God saw" (vv.4, 10, 12, et. al.) describes the "seeing" activity of God. This is obviously an element that the author wishes to emphasize about God. The first name given to God within the book is that of Hagar's: "El Roi" (the "God who sees," 16:13; cf. 22:1–19, where the verb "to see" is rightfully translated in its secondary sense of "to provide"). Other significant places where the author records God seeing are 6:5; 11:5; 18:21; these verses, however, record a tragic reversal of Ge 1, where God sees what is good.

The "good" (GK 3202) is that which is beneficial for the human race. On the second day (vv.6–8) the narrative does not say that "God saw that it was good," for on that day nothing was created or made that was directly "good" or beneficial for humankind. The heavens were made and the waters divided, but the land where people were to dwell remained hidden under the "deep." Only on the third day, when the sea was parted and the dry land appeared, does the word "good" (GK 3202) again appear (v.10). Throughout ch. 1 God is depicted as the one who both knows what is "good" for the human race and is intent on providing the good for them. Thus the author prepares the reader for the tragedy of ch. 3, where the rebellious attempt by man and woman to gain the knowledge of "good and evil" for themselves is seen not only as sin but also as folly.

b. Second day (1:6–8)

6–8 The sense of the account of the second day is largely determined by one's understanding of the term "expanse" (GK 8385). Does it reflect a cosmological perspective or an immediate, everyday experience (e.g., the "clouds" that hold the rain)? The text assigns it the meaning "to separate water from water" and calls it the "sky" (GK 9028), a term that refers not only to the place of the sun, moon, and stars (v.14) but also to where the birds fly (v.20). Is there a single word or idea that would accommodate such uses of the term "expanse"? The word "sky" appears to cover this sense well. The "waters above" the sky is likely a reference to the clouds (cf. 7:11–12; 2Ki 7:2; Pss 104:3; 147:8; 148:4).

c. Third day (1:9–13)

9–13 There are two distinct acts of God on the third day: the preparation of the dry land and the seas, and the furnishing of the dry land with vegetation. Unlike the work of the second day, both acts are called "good," doubtless because they are for the benefit of humankind. Both acts relate to the preparation of the land (see comment on vv. 3–5), a central concern of the author (cf. 12:7; 13:15; 15:18; 26:4). Water is an obstacle standing in the way of inhabiting the dry land; it must be removed before humans can enjoy God's gift of the land (cf. the Flood, chs. 6–9, and the parting of the "Red Sea," Ex 14–15).

In his second act on the third day, God furnished the land with bushes and fruit trees. If in fact the author intended a connection to be drawn between God's furnishing the land with fruit trees in ch. 1 and his furnishing the "garden" with trees "good for food" in ch. 2, the focus of the Creation account, then, is on the part of God's creation that ultimately becomes the location of the Garden of Eden. The selectivity of the Creation account can be seen in the fact that it focuses only on the "seed-bearing plants" and "fruit trees," plants that are designed for human food. No other forms of vegetation are mentioned.

d. Fourth day (1:14–19)

14 The narration of events on the fourth day raises several questions. If the text states that the sun, moon, and stars were created on the fourth day, how could "the heavens and the earth," which would have included the sun, moon, and stars, have been created "in the beginning" (v.1)? Could there have been a "day and night" during the first three days of Creation if the sun had not yet been created? Were there plants and vegetation on the land (created on the third day) before the creation of the sun? A common viewpoint is that though "the heavens and the earth" were created "in the beginning," they were not completed until the fourth day or were even possibly obscured by the waters until the fourth day.

There is another way to look at this text that provides a coherent reading of 1:1 and 1:14–18. First, if "the heavens and the earth" means "universe" or "cosmos," as is most probable, then (as already suggested) the whole of the universe—including the sun, moon, and stars—was created "in the beginning" and not on the fourth day.

The second step concerns the syntax of v.14. Verse 6 suggests that when God said, "Let there be an expanse," he was in fact creating an expanse where there was none previously ("creation out of nothing"). So clearly the author intended to say that God created the expanse on the second day. In v.14, however, God does not say, "Let there be lights . . . to separate," as if there were no lights before this command and afterward the lights were created. Rather the Hebrew text reads, "And God said, 'Let the lights in the expanse of the sky separate.' " In other words, God's command assumes that the lights were in existence and that in response to his command they were given a purpose, namely, "to separate the day from the night" and "to mark seasons and days and years."

15–19 A third observation comes from the structure of vv.15–16. At the end of v.15, the author recounts, "and it was so." This expression marks the end of the author's "report" and the beginning of his "comment." Thus v.16 is not an account of the creation of the sun, moon, and stars on the fourth day but a remark that draws out the significance of what has previously been recounted: "So God [and not anyone else] made the lights and put them into the sky" (pers. tr.). Behind this narrative is a concern on the part of the author to emphasize that God alone created the lights of the heavens, and thus no one else (and certainly no other god) is to be given the glory and honor due only to him.

e. Fifth day (1:20–23)

20–23 The creation of living creatures is divided into two days. On the fifth day God created the sea and sky creatures. On the sixth day (vv.24–28) he created the land creatures—including man and woman. The word for "created" (GK 1343) is used six times in the Creation account (1:1, 21, 27; 2:3). Elsewhere the word "to make" (GK 6913) is used to describe God's actions. Why is "created" (GK 1343) used with reference to the "great creatures of the sea" (v.21)? One suggestion is that here we have the beginning of a new stage in Creation, namely, of "living beings" (cf. vv.1, 2, 26). The orderliness of the account is evident, as the author shows the creation of all living creatures in three distinct groups: on the fifth day, sea creatures and sky creatures, and on the sixth day, land creatures.

For the first time the notion of "blessing" (GK 1385) appears. The blessing of the creatures of the sea and sky is identical with the blessing of the human race, with the exception of the notion of "dominion," given only to man and woman. As soon as "living beings" are created, the notion of "blessing" is appropriate because the blessing relates to the giving of life.

f. Sixth day (1:24–31)

24–25 The account of the creation of the land creatures on the sixth day distinguishes two types: the "living creatures" that dwell on the land and humanity. In turn, the former are divided into three groups: "livestock," "creatures that move along the ground," and "wild animals" (v.24). Humanity is distinguished as "male" and "female" (v.27).

Once again the author begins with the divine command—"And God said"—and then follows with a comment—"God made." Verse 25 adds the important clarification that although vegetation was produced from the land, the living creatures were made by the Lord God himself (cf. ch. 2).

26–27 The beginning of the creation of the human race is marked by the usual "And God said." However, God's command that follows is not an impersonal (third person) "Let there be . . . " but rather the more personal (first person) "Let us make." Second, whereas throughout the previous account the making of each creature is described as "according to its kind," in the account of the creation of humankind it is specified that the man and the woman were made "in our [God's] image," not merely "according to his own kind." Their image is not simply that of the human being; they share a likeness to the Creator. Third, the creation of humankind is specifically noted as a creation of "male and female." Previously gender was not considered to be an important feature of the creation of the other forms of life, but for humanity it takes on importance. Thus the fact that God created "man" as "male and female" is stressed. Fourth, only human beings have been given dominion in God's creation. This dominion is expressly stated to be over all other living creatures: sky, sea, and land. Thus the text portrays humanity as a special creature different from the rest of the creatures but like God, made in the image and likeness of God.

Many attempts have been made to explain the plural forms: "Let us make man in our image, in our likeness": e.g., (1) the plural is a reference to the Trinity; (2) the plural is a reference to God and his heavenly court of angels; (3) the plural is an attempt to avoid the idea of an immediate resemblance of humans to God; (4) the plural is an expression of deliberation on God's part as he sets out to create the human race. The singulars in v.27 ("in his own image" and "in the image of God"; cf. 5:1) rule out explanation 2, since in the immediate context the creation of man and woman is said to be "in his image," with no mention of them in the image of the angels. Explanations 3 and 4 are both possible, but neither explanation is specifically supported by the context. Verse 27 states twice that "man" was created in God's image and a third time that man was created "male and female." The same pattern is found in Ge 5:1–2a. The singular "man" is created as a plurality, "male and female." In a similar way the one God ("And God said") created humankind through an expression of his plurality ("Let us make man in our image"). Following this clue the divine plurality expressed in v.26 is seen as an anticipation of the human plurality of the man and woman, thus casting the human relationship between man and woman as a reflection of God's own personal relationship with himself.

28–31 The importance of the "blessing" (GK 1385) cannot be overlooked since it remains a central theme throughout the book of Genesis and the Pentateuch. The living creatures have already been blessed on the fifth day (v.22); thus the blessing here extends to the whole of God's living creatures, including human beings. The blessing itself is primarily posterity. Thus already the fulfillment of the blessing is tied to man's "seed" and the notion of "life"—two themes that will later dominate the narratives of Genesis.

g. Seventh day (2:1–3)

1–3 The seventh day is set apart from the first six because God "sanctified" it. On this day God does not "speak," nor does he "work" as he had on the previous days. On this day he "blessed" (Gk 3385) and "sanctified" (NIV, "made it holy"; GK 7727), but he did not "work." The reader is left with a somber and repetitive reminder of only one fact: God did not work on the seventh day. While little else is recounted, it is repeated three times, emphasizing God's "rest." If the purpose of pointing to the "likeness" between humans and their Creator was to call on the reader to be more like God (e.g., Lev 11:45), then the seventh day stresses the very thing that they elsewhere are called on to do: "rest" on the seventh day (cf. Ex 20:8–11; cf. Ps 95:11; Heb 3:11).

3. The gift of the land (2:4–24)

a. Creation of man (2:4–7)

4–6 This account begins with a description of the condition of the land before the creation of the first man (cf. 1:2). The focus is on those parts of the land that will be directly affected by the Fall (3:8–24). The narrative points to the fact that before man was created (in v.7), the effects of his rebellion and the Fall had "not yet" been felt on the land. In the subsequent narratives, each part of the description of the land in vv.4–6 is specifically identified as a result of the fall of humankind. The "shrub of the field" and "plant of the field" do not refer to the "vegetation" of ch. 1 but anticipate the "thorns and thistles" and "plants of the field" that come (in 3:18) as a result of the curse. Similarly, when the narrative states that the Lord God had not yet "sent rain on the earth," we can sense the allusion to the Flood narratives (7:4).

The reference to "no man to work the ground" points to the time when the man and the woman are cast from the garden "to work the ground" (3:23). Thus, as an introduction to the account of man's creation, we are told that a land had been prepared for him. In the description of that land, however, we catch a glimmer of the time when humans would become aliens and strangers in a foreign land.

7 At first glance the description of the creation of the first man here is quite different from that of ch. 1. No two descriptions could be more distinct. Though made in God's image, man did not begin as a "heavenly creature"; he was made of the "dust of the ground." This anticipates his destiny in the Fall, when he would again return to the "dust" (3:19). In Creation man arose out of the dust; in the Fall he returned to the dust.

b. Preparation of the garden (2:8–14)

8 An inordinate amount of attention is given to the description of the "garden." We are told that the Lord God planted the garden and "put" man there. Later this is repeated with significant differences. Then, too, the garden was planted "in the east, in Eden." The word "Eden" (GK 6359) appears to be a specific place; it means "delight" and evokes a picture of idyllic delight and rest. "In the east" is striking because elsewhere in Genesis "eastward" is associated with judgment and separation from God (e.g., 3:24; 11:2; 13:11). For example, when the man and woman were expelled from the garden, the cherubim were placed "on the east side" (3:24) of the garden, giving the impression that the garden itself was not in the east. Such an apparent difficulty in the coherence of the passage may account for the fact that in v.8 the garden is not actually called the "garden of Eden" but rather the "garden in Eden," a designation found only here. Thus the garden was planted in Eden, which apparently was a location larger than the garden itself; and, if "in the east" is taken with reference to Eden itself, the garden was on its eastern side.

9–10 In the garden were beautiful, lush trees, including the elusive "tree of life" and "tree of the knowledge of good and evil," as well as a river with four "headwaters." Care is given to locate the rivers and to describe the lands through which they flowed. The lands were rich in gold and precious jewels, and their location was closely aligned with the land later promised to Abraham and his descendants. Later on associations were made between the Garden of Eden and the land promised to the fathers (cf. Isa 51:3; Eze 36:35; Joel 2:3).

11–14 The location of the Garden of/in Eden has long been a topic of debate. Two rivers mentioned can be identified with certainty, the Euphrates and the Tigris. It is difficult to identify the other two. Since the "land of Cush" is identified in the Bible as Ethiopia, the "Gihon" is most likely the river that passes through Ethiopia, perhaps the "river of Egypt." "Havilah" cannot be identified.

Most attention in the narrative is given to the "Pishon," but there is little certainty about its identification and location. On the other hand, the narrative merely states that the River Euphrates is the fourth river. The mention of the Euphrates and Tigris rivers can be linked to the identification of the Garden of Eden and the Promised Land. It can hardly be a coincidence that these rivers, along with the "River of Egypt," again play a role in marking boundaries of the land promised to Abraham (15:18).

c. Man's place in the garden (2:15–24)

15–24 The author had already noted that God "put" (GK 8492) man into the garden (v.8b). Now he gives the purpose for this. Two important points are in danger of being obscured by the English translations. The first is the change from the Hebrew word for "put" to a term that the author elsewhere has reserved for God's "rest" or "safety" (GK 5663), a safety that he gives to people in the land (e.g., Ge 19:16; Dt 3:20; 12:10; 25:19), and the "dedication" of something in the presence of the Lord (Ex 16:33–34; Lev 16:23; Nu 17:4; Dt 26:4, 10). Both senses appear to lie behind the word here. Man was "put" into the garden where he could "rest" and be "safe," and he was "put" into the garden "in God's presence" where he could have fellowship with God (3:8).

A second point is the specific purpose for which God put man in the garden. Most translations have "to work it and take care of it." Although that translation is as early as the LXX (2d cent. B.C.), there are serious objections to it. For one, the suffixed pronoun in the Hebrew text rendered "it" in English is feminine, whereas the noun "garden" is masculine. Only by changing the pronoun to a masculine singular, as the LXX has done, can it have the sense of the EVs, namely "to work" and "to keep." Moreover, later in this same narrative (3:23) "to work the ground" is said to be a result of the Fall, and the narrative suggests that the author had intended such a punishment to be seen as an ironic reversal of the man's original purpose. If such was the case, then "working" and "keeping" the garden would not provide a contrast to "working the ground."

In light of these objections, a more suitable translation would be "to worship and to obey." Man is put in the garden to worship God and to obey him. His life in the garden was to be characterized by worship and obedience; he was a priest, not merely a worker and keeper of the garden. Such a reading not only answers the objections raised against the traditional English translation, it also suits the larger ideas of the narrative. Throughout ch. 2 the author has consistently and consciously developed the idea of man's "likeness" to God along the same lines as the major themes of the Pentateuch as a whole, namely, the theme of worship and Sabbath rest.

A further confirmation is the fact that in v.16 we read for the first time that "God commanded" (GK 7422) the man whom he had created. Enjoyment of God's good land is contingent on "keeping" God's commandments (cf. Dt 30:16). The inference is that God alone knows what is good for the man and what is not good for him. To enjoy the "good" man must trust God and obey him. If he disobeys, he will have to decide for himself what is good and what is not good. To people today such a prospect may seem desirable, but it is the worst fate that could have befallen the human race; for only God knows what is good for them.

Having put this in general terms in vv.16–17, the author turns in the remainder of the chapter to set forth a specific example of God's knowledge of the "good"—the creation of the woman. When he sees man alone, God says, "It is not good for the man to be alone." At the close of ch. 2, the author puts the final touch on his account of what it means for man to be "in God's image and likeness." In the first chapter the author intimated that the creation of the human race in the "image of God" somehow entailed being male and female (v.27). In the narrative of the creation of the woman in ch. 2, the author returns to develop this theme by showing that man's creation "in God's image" also entails a "partnership" (NIV, "a suitable helper [GK 6469]") with his wife. The "likeness" that the man and the woman share with God in ch. 1 finds an analogy in the "likeness" between the man and his wife in ch. 2.

For the first time since the account of the creation of the man and the woman in ch. 1, there is divine deliberation. The plural "Let us make" is replaced by the singular "I will make," perhaps because only the woman is being created. In ch. 1 the divine plurality found its analogy in the creation of "male and female," whereas here the divine singular appears to be a curious reflection of man's being alone. The divine intention for the woman is that she be a "partner." The point is that there is no helper to correspond to man. A special act of creation of the woman is necessary. Man needs a helper to care for the garden and to provide support in a general sense. But in light of the importance of the blessing in 1:28, most likely the "help" envisioned is in the bearing of children. Furthermore, the woman's judgment relates specifically to her role in bearing children (3:16).

Just as at other crucial points when a new relationship is initiated (e.g., 15:12; 28:11), the recipient of God's provision sleeps while God acts. The purpose of the sleep is not merely anesthetic but portrays a sense of passivity and acceptance of the divine provision (cf. Ps 127:2). A homiletic midrash says that "just as the rib is found at the side of the man and is attached to him, even so the good wife, the rib of her husband, stands at his side to be his helper-counterpart, and her soul is bound up with his." The man's jubilant response—"bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh"—goes beyond the narrative account in vv.21–22, where only "rib" is mentioned. "One of the ribs" anticipates "bone of my bones." Moreover, the mention of the closing of the "flesh" anticipates "flesh of my flesh," and "the rib and the flesh" show the woman to be in substance the same as the man.

Clearly the naming of the animals is part of the story of the creation of the woman, for in the conclusion of v.20 the author remarks, "But for Adam, no suitable helper was found." The author saw in man's naming the animals his search for a suitable partner. That no suitable partner was found shows that man was not like the other creatures. In contrast, his words "bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh" show that he recognized his own likeness in the woman.

B. The Land and the Exile (2:25–3:24)

1. Disobedience (2:25–3:7)

A more-studied attempt to treat the problem of evil and temptation to sin cannot be found in all the Scriptures.

a. The transition (2:25)

25 Verse 25 clearly links the account of the land and the blessing (1:1–2:24) with that of the Fall (2:25–3:24). The reference to the "two of them" (NIV, "both") looks back to the previous narrative, while their description as "naked, and . . . no shame" anticipates the central problem that follows.

Two different but related words are used to describe the "nakedness" of the man and his wife. The choice of arom ("naked"; GK 6873) at the beginning of the narrative is likely motivated by the alliteration between arom and arum ("crafty," 3:1; GK 6874). This provides an immediate connecting link with the previous narrative and a presage to the events and outcome of the subsequent story. It also gives an immediate clue to the potential relationship between the serpent's "cunning" and the innocence implied in the "nakedness" of the couple.

Second, there is a difference in meaning between arom ("naked"; GK 6873) in 2:25 and erom ("naked"; GK 6567) in 3:7. The latter is used in Dt 28:48 to depict Israel's exiles who have been punished for their failure to trust and obey God's word (cf. Eze 16:39; 23:29). In distinguishing the first state of human nakedness from the second, the author introduces a subtle yet perceptible clue to the story's meaning. The effect of the Fall was not simply that the man and the woman came to know they were "naked" but that they were "naked" in the sense of being "under God's judgment."

b. The tempter (3:1)

1 The author discloses an important clue about the snake: he was more "crafty" (GK 6874) than any of the creatures. This word is not primarily a negative term but suggests wisdom and adroitness. This description suggests a relationship between the Fall and humankind's quest for wisdom. Man's disobedience is not so much an act of great wickedness or a great transgression as much as it is an act of great folly. He had all the "good" he would have needed, but he wanted more—he wanted to be like God.

The forbidden tree is the tree of the knowledge of "good and evil." When the woman and the man took of the tree and ate, it was because she "saw that the tree was desirable for gaining wisdom" (v.6). Thus even the serpent is represented as a paragon of wisdom, an archetypical wise man. However, the serpent and his wisdom lead ultimately to the curse (v.14). It should not be overlooked that the serpent is said to be one of the "wild animals" that God had made (cf. 1:25; 2:19). It was not a supernatural being.

c. The temptation (3:2–7)

2–7 The story of the temptation is told with subtle simplicity. The snake speaks only twice, but that is enough to offset the balance of trust and obedience between the man and the woman and their Creator. The centerpiece of the story is the question of the knowledge of the "good and evil." The snake implied that God was keeping this knowledge from the man and the woman, while the sense of the narratives in the first two chapters has been that God was keeping this knowledge for the man and the woman (e.g., 1:4, 10, 12, et al.). In other words, the snake's statements are a direct challenge to the central theme that God will provide the "good" for the human race if they will only trust and obey him.

The woman's thoughts in the last moments before the Fall were that she "saw that the . . . tree was good." Up until now the expression has only been used of God. Thus the temptation is not presented as a general rebellion from God's authority but rather a quest for wisdom and "the good" (GK 3202) apart from God's provision. How quickly the transgression comes once the decision has been made! The thrust of the story, with all its simplicity, lies in its tragic and ironic depiction of the search for wisdom. Ironically, that which the snake promised did, in fact, come about: the man and the woman became "like God" as soon as they ate of the fruit. The irony, however, lies in the fact that they were already "like God" because they had been created in his image (1:26).

The possibility that they would know only the "evil" and not the "good" is not raised in the narrative prior to their eating the fruit. Yet when they ate of the fruit and their eyes were opened, it was not the "good" that they saw and enjoyed. Their new knowledge was that of their own nakedness. Their knowledge of "good and evil" that was to make them "like God" resulted in the knowledge that they were no longer even like each other: they were ashamed of their nakedness, and they sewed leaves together to hide their differences from each other. They sought wisdom, but found only vanity and toil.

2. Judgment (3:8–20)

a. The scene (3:8)

8 The judgment scene opens with the "sound" (GK 7754) of the Lord's coming, a common form of expression for the Lord's call to obedience (cf. Dt 5:25; 8:20; 13:18; et al.). Appropriately the scene of the curse opens with a subtle but painful reminder of the single requirement for obtaining God's blessing.

The coming of the Lord at the mountain of Sinai is foreshadowed here. There too the people "heard the sound of the LORD our God." In both instances fear prevailed. In the present instance, Adam and his wife fled at the first sound of the Lord in the garden. They fled to the trees. Trees play a central role in depicting humanity's changing relationship with God. In chs. 1–2 fruit trees symbolize God's bountiful provision. In ch. 3 they become the ground for inciting the man and the woman to rebellion and the place where they seek to hide from God. Finally, when the man and the woman are cast out of the garden, their way is barred from "the way to the tree of life" (v.24; cf. Dt 21:22–23; Gal 3:13).

b. The trial (3:9–13)

9–13 Before meting out the judgment, God's only words to the rebellious pair come as questions (cf. 4:9–10; 18:21). Skillfully, by the repetition of "naked," the author allows the man to be convicted with his own words. Then, to show that alienation between the man and the woman as a result of their sin went far beyond the shame that each felt in the presence of the other, the man cast blame on the woman and, obliquely, on God. The man's words are an ironic reminder of God's original intention in 2:18. As a measure of the extent of man's fall, he now sees God's good gift as the source of his trouble.

c. The verdict (3:14–20)

Although much can be said about the curse of the snake, the woman, and the man, very little is written. We get the impression that this is not their story but the story of humankind. With great skill the author presents these three participants as the "heads" of their race. The snake, on the one hand, and the man and the woman, on the other, are as two great nations embarking on a great struggle, a struggle that will find its conclusion only by an act of some distant "seed" or "offspring."

14–15 Whereas once the snake was "crafty" (arum, v.1; GK 6874), now he was "cursed" (arur; GK 826). His "curse" distinguished him "above all the livestock and all the wild animals"—he must "crawl on [his] belly and . . . eat dust all the days of [his] life." This curse does not necessarily suggest that previously the snake had walked as the other land animals. The point is rather that for the rest of his life, when the snake crawls on his belly, he will "eat dust," an expression of "total defeat" (cf. Isa 65:25; Mic 7:17).

As representatives, the fates of the snake and the woman embody the fates of their seed. At first in v.15 the "enmity" (GK 368) is said to be between the snake and the woman and between the "seed" (NIV, "offspring"; GK 2446) of the snake and the "seed" of the woman. The second half of v.15, however, says that the "seed" of the woman ("he") will crush the head of the snake ("your head"). The woman's "seed" is certainly intended to be understood as a group (or individual) that lies the same temporal distance from the woman as the "seed" of the snake does from the snake itself. Yet in this verse it is the "seed" of the woman who crushes the head of the snake himself. That is, though the "enmity" may lie between the two "seeds," the goal of the final crushing blow is not the "seed" of the snake but rather the snake itself; his head will be crushed. In other words, it appears that the author seems intent on treating the snake and his "seed" together, as one. When that "seed" is crushed, the head of the snake is crushed. More is at stake in this brief passage than the reader is at first aware of. No attempt is made to answer the question of the snake's role in the temptation over against that of a higher being—Satan. Later biblical writers, however, certainly saw Satan behind the deed of the snake (cf. Ro 16:20; Rev 12:9).

Verse 15 contains a puzzling yet important ambiguity: Who is the "seed" of the woman? The purpose of this verse has not been to answer that question but rather to raise it. The remainder of the book is the author's answer.

16 The judgment against the woman relates first to her sons and then to her husband. She will bear sons (children) in increased pain or toil. Her "desire" will be for her husband, and he will "rule over" her. The sense of this judgment within the larger context of the book lies in the role of the woman that is portrayed in chs. 1 and 2. The woman and her husband were to have enjoyed the blessing of children (1:28) and the harmonious partnership of marriage (2:18, 21–25). The judgment relates precisely to these two points. What the woman once was to do as a blessing—be a marriage partner and have children—had become tainted by the curse. In those moments of life's greatest blessing—marriage and children—the woman would sense most clearly the painful consequences of her rebellion from God.

We should not overlook the relationship between the promise of v.15 and the words to the woman in v.16. In that promise the final victory was to be through the "seed" of the woman. In the beginning, when the man and the woman were created, childbirth was at the center of the blessing that their Creator had bestowed on them (1:28). Now, after the Fall, childbirth is again to be the means through which the snake would be defeated and the blessing restored. In the pain of the birth of every child, there was to be a reminder of the hope that lay in God's promise. Birthpangs are not merely a reminder of the futility of the Fall; they are as well a sign of an impending joy (Ro 8:22–24; cf. Mt 24:8).

17–20 Because of the curse the man could no longer "freely eat" of the "good land" provided by the Creator. Throughout chs. 2–3, humankind's ongoing relationship with the Creator is linked with the theme of "eating." At first God's blessing and provision for man are noted in 2:16. Then it was exactly over the issue of "eating" that the tempter raised doubts about God's ultimate goodness and care for the man and his wife (3:1–3). Finally, the pair's act of disobedience is that "she ate it . . . and he ate it" (3:6). Significantly, then, "eating" is related to the judgment on the man. (On "eating" and the relationship of man to God, see Lev 11 and Dt 14 on clean and unclean food and Lev 23 on eating as participation in the feasts of God.)

The description of the "land" is a reversal of that in ch. 2. The present condition of the land is not the way it was intended to be but is the result of human rebellion (see comment on 2:4–6). This opens the way for the motif of "a new heaven and a new earth" (Rev 21:1; cf. Isa 65:17; Ro 8:22–24). Similarly, v.19 shows the reversal for the man's condition. Before the Fall he was taken from the ground and given the "breath of life" (2:7). Now he must return to the dust he was taken from. Thus the verdict of death had come about (2:17). A further reminder of the effect of the Fall is the connection between the man's name, "Adam" (adam, v.20; GK 134), and the "ground" (adamah; GK 141) from which he was taken. Adam again named his wife, this time calling her "Eve" (GK 2558) and pointing to her destiny ("the mother of all the living [GK 2645]"), whereas her previous name (cf. 2:23) pointed to her origin ("out of man").

3. Protection (3:21)

21 The mention of the type of clothing that God made—"garments of skin," i.e., tunics—is perhaps intended to recall the state of the man and the woman before the Fall: "naked" and "no shame" (2:25). The author may also be anticipating the notion of sacrifice in the animals slain for the making of the skin garments (cf. Ex 28:42).

4. Exile (3:22–24)

22–23 The verdict of death consisted of being cast out of the garden and barred from the tree of life (Ex 31:14), cut off from the protective presence of the community in the garden (cf. Ge 4:14). Ironically, when the human race, who had been created "like God" (cf. 1:26), sought to "be like God" (vv.5–7), they found themselves after the Fall no longer "with God." Their happiness does not consist of their being "like God" so much as it does their being "with God" (cf. Ps 16:11).

In 2:15 (see comment) the man was put into the garden for "worship" (leobdah; GK 6268) and "obedience" (leshomrah; GK 9068); but here in v.23, after the Fall, he is cast out of the garden "to work [laabod; GK 6268] the ground," and he is "kept" (lishmor, NIV, "to guard"; GK 9068) from "the way to the tree of life" (v.24).

24 The depiction of the garden and of the tree of life after the Fall guarded by cherubim anticipates God's plan to restore blessing and life to the human race in the covenant at Sinai and in the law (Ex 25:10–22; cf. Dt 31:24–26).

Only through the covenant can human fellowship with God be restored (Ex 25:22). In the covenant humans return to the state enjoyed in Ge 2:15, as people who serve God, obey his will, and enjoy his blessing. At this point in the narrative, "east" only signifies "outside the garden" (but cf. 11:2; 13:11).

C. Life in Exile (4:1–26)

1. Worship (4:1–8)

1–2 Eve's first words after the Fall raise many questions. Her acknowledging God's help makes it look as though she were hopeful that the promise of a 'seed" to crush the head of the serpent (3:15) might find its fulfillment in this son. Her words, however, can also be read in a less positive light as a boast that just as the Lord had created a man, so now she had created a man, expressing her confidence in her own ability to fulfill the promise of 3:15. The latter interpretation is more likely. First, the recurring theme in the narratives of this book is that of human effort in obtaining a blessing that only God can give (cf. ch. 11; 16:1–4). A second consideration is the contrast in Eve's words. At the beginning Eve said, "I have brought forth a man," whereas at the close of the narrative she acknowledged, "God has granted me another seed"(v.25). Moreover Eve did not say that Seth was given to replace Cain, but he was to replace Abel, which suggests that she had not placed her hope in Cain but in Abel.

3–4 The narrative of Cain and Abel teaches a lesson on the kind of worship that is pleasing to God—that which springs from a pure heart. How does the narrative teach a lesson about a pure heart? The difference between the two offerings is not explicitly drawn out by the author. Contrary to the popular opinion that Cain's offering was not accepted because it was not a blood sacrifice, it seems clear from the narrative that both offerings, in themselves, were acceptable—they are both described as "offerings" (GK 4966) and not "sacrifices." Furthermore, they were both "firstfruits" offerings; thus Cain's offering of "fruits of the soil" was as appropriate for a farmer as Abel's "firstborn of his flock" was for a shepherd.

5–7 Whatever the cause of God's rejection of Cain's offering, the narrative focuses our attention on Cain's twofold response: (1) anger against God (v.4b) and (2) anger against Abel (v.8). By stating the problem in this way, the author surrounds his lesson on "pleasing offerings" with a subtle narrative warning: "by their fruit you will recognize them" (Mt 7:20). God pled with Cain to "do what is right" or face the consequences of shedding innocent blood and exile from the land (cf. v.12; cf. Jer 7:5–7).

8 Possibly the present narrative is to be read in light of the legislation of the "cities of refuge." The purpose of the cities was to ensure that "innocent blood will not be shed in your land" (Dt 19:10), which, of course, is the central point of the Cain and Abel narrative (v.10).

The law (Dt 19:11) specifies that a guilty murderer is one who lies in wait for his neighbor, "rises up" (NIV, "assaults") against him, and slays him. Here it states that "while they were in the field, Cain attacked [lit., rose up (against)] Abel and killed him." According to Deuteronomic law, Cain's offense was punishable by death. That God showed mercy on Cain and that later in the story God's mercy was connected with Cain's building a city suggest more than coincidental relationship between the story of Cain and the cities of refuge.

2. Repentance (4:9–15a)

9–12 Again (cf. ch. 3) when the Lord came in judgment, he first asked questions (v.9) and then meted out the punishment (vv.11–12). The picture of Cain's judgment is remarkably similar to the exile Israel was warned of in Dt 28:16–18 (cf. Isa 26:21; ch. 27).

13–14 Both the sense of "bear" (GK 5951) and the Lord's response to Cain in v.15 suggest that his words are not to be understood as a complaint about his punishment but rather as an expression of remorse over the extent of his "iniquity." In v.14 Cain acknowledged that God's punishment (v.12) would result in his own death since he would not have the protection of an established community. Like his parents, Adam and Eve, who were driven out of their home, the penalty of death was to be carried out against Cain by banishment from a protective community.

15a By themselves Cain's words do not necessarily suggest repentance, but the Lord's response implies that Cain's words in v.13 are words of repentance.

3. Protection (4:15b–24)

15b–18 The background of the cities of refuge (Nu 35:9–34) may provide a clue to the sense of the "sign" or "mark" (GK 253) given to Cain. Its purpose was to provide Cain with protection from vengeance. Most English versions state that the "mark" was put "on" Cain, though the passage states that the sign was given "to" or "for" Cain (lit., "and he appointed to Cain a sign"; cf. 21:13, 18; 27:37; 45:7, 9; 46:3 with 21:14; 44:21). Though the sign is not explicitly identified, the narrative continues with an account of Cain's departure to the land of Nod, "east of Eden," where he built a city. In light of the purpose of the later cities of refuge, it may be significant that the "sign narrative" is followed by the "city narrative." Cain's city may have been intended as the "sign" that gave divine protection to him, since the purpose of the "sign" was to provide protection for Cain from anyone who might attempt to avenge Abel's death (cf. Nu 35:12). Even in Lamech's day Cain's city was a place of refuge for the "manslayer" (see comments below). Thus Cain's city may be viewed as a "city of refuge" given to him by God to protect him and his descendants from blood revenge (see Dt 19:11–13). The remainder of the chapter is devoted to the "culture" that developed in the context of the "city" that Cain built.

19–24 The primary components of city life were animal husbandry (Jabal, v.20), arts (Jubal, v.21), craftsmanship (Tubal-Cain, v.22), and, apparently, law (Lamech, vv.23–24). Lamech's words to his two wives are frequently read as an example of a boasting arrogance and rebellion. But in the context of the Mosaic law and the teaching regarding the cities of refuge, Lamech's words appear to be an appeal to a system of legal justice. The Mosaic law provided for the safe refuge of any "manslayer" until a just trial could be held (Nu 35:12). Lamech, by referring to the "avenging of Cain" (cf. v.24), made it known that in his city he too had been "avenged."

To show that he had not shed innocent blood, Lamech appealed to the fact that he killed a man "for wounding" and "for injuring" him. He did not "hate his neighbor, lie in wait for him, rise up against him, and kill him" (cf. Dt 19:11), as Cain had done, but rather based his appeal on a plea of self-defense. Lamech's appeal bears striking resemblances to the principle of lex talionis (Ex 21:25). The force of the principle was to ensure that a given crime was punished only by a just penalty. Thus Lamech killed a man for wounding him, not because he "hated him" (Dt 19:4–6). If Cain, who killed his brother with malice, could be avenged, then Lamech would surely be avenged for a killing in self-defense, that is, for "wounding" him. The point is not that Lamech's sense of justice was correct or even exemplary but that Cain's city and descendants had a system of law and justice representative of an ordered society.

4. Blessing (4:25–26)

25–26 Though Cain's sons have prospered and have become the founders of the new world after the Fall, the focus turns from the line of Cain to the new son born "in place of Abel." In such narratives as these, the author betrays his interest in the "seed" of the woman. A pattern is established that will remain the thematic center of the book. The promised seed will come not through the heir apparent but through the one whom God chooses. Cain takes his place as one of those who were not to become a part of the line of the "seed" (cf. Japheth, 10:2–5; Ham, 10:6–20; Nahor, 11:29; 22:20–24; Ishmael, 17:20; Lot, 19:19–38; Esau, ch. 36). The importance of the line of Seth is underscored by the fact that in his days people already practiced true worship of God.

D. The Story of Noah (5:1–10:32)

A major break is signaled at the beginning of ch. 5 by the new heading: "This is the written account of Adam's line." This section, which concludes at 9:29, is built around a list of ten of the descendants of Adam, concluding with Noah. After the death of Noah is recorded (9:29), a new list of his sons begins, ending with the birth of Abraham (11:26). Several narrative passages, varying greatly in size, are interspersed within these lists of names. The interweaving of narrative and genealogical lists is a characteristic feature of Genesis.

1. Prologue (5:1–3)

1–3 The prologue first redirects the reader's attention back to the course of events in ch. 1, reiterating the "likeness" of God motif. Second, vv.1–3 tie ch. 5 together with 4:25–26 by continuing the pattern of "birth" and "naming." There is a similarity between the picture of the first parents and their sons and that of God and Adam. God's naming of Adam appears here for the first time in Genesis, casting God in the role of a father who names his son. This role of God as a father is heightened even further by the parallels between his creating Adam "in the likeness of God" and Adam's giving birth to a son "in his own likeness, in his own image." Clearly, although Adam is the father of Seth and Seth the father of Enosh, etc., God is the Father of them all. The return to the theme of God's "blessing" (GK 1385) humankind (cf. v.2) recalls a father's care for his children, a recurring theme in Genesis. The picture that emerges is of a loving father ensuring the future well-being of his children through an inherited blessing. God's original plan of blessing, though thwarted by human folly, will be restored through the seed of the woman (3:15), the seed of Abraham (12:3), and the "Lion of the tribe of Judah" (49:8–12; cf. Rev 5:5–13).

2. The sons of Adam (5:4–32)

4–32 The genealogical list in ch. 5 is nearly identical in form to that of 11:10–26, the genealogy of Shem. A comparison of the two shows that the only difference between them is the inclusion of the clause "and then he died" (ch. 5). The reason is because Enoch did not die. The death of each patriarch in ch. 5 is underscored to highlight the exceptional case of Enoch. He "walked [GK 2143] with God." The phrase is used of Noah (6:9) and of Abraham and Isaac (17:1; 24:40; 48:15).

In Enoch the pronouncement of death is not the last word. A door is left open for a return to the tree of life. Enoch found that door by "walking with God" and has become a paradigm for all who seek to find life. Significantly, this theme recurs at the opening of ch. 17, where God establishes his covenant with Abraham. "Walking with God" is the way to life, not just a mere "keeping" of a set of laws. This theme is associated with those who could not have had a set of "laws," which shows that there is a better way to live than merely a legalistic adherence to the law.

The genealogical list in ch. 5 has been purposefully restructured at its conclusion to accommodate the Flood narrative, which has been inserted into the genealogy between the notations of Noah's age at the time he begat his three sons (5:32) and the total length of his life and his death (9:29). Two points in particular call for attention. First, we are told that Noah will bring comfort from the labor and painful toil of the curse (v.29). Likely the comfort Noah brought was the salvation of humankind in the ark as well as the reinstitution of the sacrifice after the Flood (cf. 8:21). Second, it is then significant that the narrative of the Flood is inserted into the genealogical list just before the final word about Noah's death, where it, in effect, is part of the following table of nations (ch. 10). The same explanation for Enoch's rescue from death ("he walked with God") is made the basis for Noah's rescue from death in the Flood.

By means of a brief genealogical note, the story of Noah's drunkenness is appended to the close of the Flood account (9:18–27). This strikingly different picture of Noah provides a basis for the final word concerning him: "and he died" (v.29). Noah's deed was one of disgrace and shame (he took of the fruit of his orchard and became naked), which parallels that of Adam and Eve (who took of the fruit of the garden and saw that they were naked).

1–2 At the conclusion of the list of patriarchs and before the account of the Flood, the author summarizes the state of affairs of Adam's descendants (cf. 10:31–32; 11:27–32; Ex 1:7.) Historically there have been three primary views of vv.1–4. The "sons of God" are (1) angels (the oldest); (2) royalty (also very old); and (3) pious men from the "line of Seth." The first view has not been widely held since it appears to contradict Mt 22:30. The commonly accepted view is that the "sons of God" refer to the godly line of Seth. This assumes that vv.1–4 introduce the account of the Flood and are to be understood as its cause. If, however, vv.1–4 summarize ch. 5, there is little to arouse our suspicion that the events recounted are anything out of the ordinary. This little narrative, therefore, is a reminder that Adam's children had greatly increased in number, had married, and had continued to have children; i.e., a picture of everyday affairs (cf. Mt 24:38–39).

3 The sense of v.3 is clear if read within the context of what precedes and follows. After creating humans as male and female, God "called them man [adam; GK 134]" (5:2), which obviously had a wider scope than the personal individual of ch. 4. In the remainder of ch. 5, the focus was on the lives of individual men again. Here in v.3 God speaks a second time, again speaking of "man"(GK 132) as "humankind." Between these two statements of God about humankind is the list of ten great individual men, whose length of life stands in stark contrast to the "one hundred and twenty years" of the life of humankind. The inference is that it was God's Spirit dwelling with these men that gave them their long lives. The sad reality is that such long lives belonged to another age and that they were exceptions rather than the rule. The shorter life marks humankind's fall and separation from the Creator. Thus the author continues to show the ages of the men of the book and notes that generally their ages grow increasingly shorter (cf. 11:10–26). At the close of the Pentateuch we finally reach an individual who is specifically mentioned as dying at the age of 120 years (Dt 34:7).

The 120 years was taken by Luther and others to refer to a time of reprieve granted by God to humankind before sending the Flood. This apparently is an attempt to resolve the discrepancy between the limit of 120 years and the record of 11:10–26. The reprieve interpretation may also reflect the influence of 1Pe 3:20, which many take to refer to the period of 120 years in Ge 6:3.

4 "Nephilim" (GK 5872) elsewhere in the Pentateuch refers to the great men who were in the land of Canaan at the time of the Exodus (Nu 13:32–33). Here "Nephilim" appears to refer to the great men of antiquity. Since the author has just referred to ten such great men (ch. 5), perhaps these were the "men of renown." Numbers 13:33 indicates that there were still survivors of the "Nephilim" in the days of the Exodus, which would appear to conflict with our taking them as the ten great men of ch. 5, unless the word is a generic term that means "great men."

4. The Flood (6:5–9:17)

a. The decree (6:5–12)

5–8 These verses form the introduction proper to the Flood story. The cause for the Flood is tied directly to the earlier account of the fall of humankind (ch. 3). Although humans had obtained the "knowledge of good and evil," it had not been beneficial. They were far better off when they had to trust God for "the good." The grief and pain of human sin were not something that only people felt. God himself was grieved over it. The purpose of v.8 is to say no more than that Noah found favor with God. Verses 9–12 explain why God found him to be an exception.

9–12 The Flood account begins with the description of Noah's being "righteous" (GK 7404). It seems that the main purpose of the story is not to show why God sent a flood but rather why God saved Noah. Noah's "righteousness" is contrasted with the "violence" of "all flesh." The message is quite straightforward. God saved Noah because he "walked with God" and did not "corrupt" God's way (cf. 5:22–24). The picture of Noah that emerges becomes a model of the kind of life that finds grace in the sight of God. It is simple obedience to God's commands and trust in his provision by faith (cf. Heb 11:7).

b. The command to build the ark (6:13–22)

13–15 The list of specifications for the ark is not so much that we might be able to see what the ark looked like but rather that we might appreciate the meticulous care Noah exercised as he obeyed God's will. The size and shape are described only in general terms. The word rendered "ark" here is an Egyptian loan word that means "palace" (not "chest" or "coffin") and is a different word than "ark" in Ex 2:3, 5. The term focuses on the structure as an abode.

The exact nature of the material the ark was made from is unknown. NIV's "cypress wood" rests on the doubtful association of a Latin word and a Hebrew word as well as on the fact that such wood was commonly used for shipbuilding. The exact meaning of the term remains a mystery. This wood was sealed with "pitch," another rare word found only here. For a wooden vessel, the ark was enormous. By modern standards it is comparable to a small cargo ship.

16 The ark was constructed with three stories, or decks, of "rooms" (v.14) or separate compartments; it had an opening for light and a door in its side. Obviously the structure consisted of more features than those enumerated in this brief description. We should not conclude from the brevity of the narrative that Noah and his sons built such a vessel on their own.

c. The command to enter the ark (7:1–5)

1–5 The command to make the ark had been given and followed to its completion (6:22). The next scene opens with the command to enter the ark before the coming rains. The emphasis of the section lies in the special provisions for the "clean animals" to be taken into the ark. The specific mention of the "clean animals" suggests that while in the ark Noah and his family ate only "clean meat" (cf. Lev 7:19–21). As entrance into the tabernacle was possible only with an offering of unblemished animals, so too Noah's entry into the ark is tied to his taking with him "seven pairs" of every clean animal. The sacrificial importance of these "clean animals" is seen in 8:20–21.

d. The floods (7:6–24)

6–24 What is most apparent in the description of the onset of the Flood is the focus on the occupants of the ark. With great detail the procession of those entering the ark passes by the impatient eyes of the reader. Facts like Noah's age, the month and the day of the beginning of the rain, the source of the waters, the kinds of animals and their number suggest that first and foremost this is a picture of Noah's salvation. It is only at the conclusion of ch. 7, when the ark is resting safely over the highest mountains in the surging flood, that the author casts his glance in the direction of those who did not seek refuge in the ark (vv.21–23). But even then the author's attention on those who did not survive the Flood is motivated by the reason why they perished: "Only Noah was left, and those with him in the ark" (v.23). Thus when it is repeated four times that those who survived the Flood were those who had done "as God had commanded" (7:9, 16; cf. v.5; 6:22), the point is clear. Obedience to the Lord is the way to salvation.

e. The floods abate (8:1–14)

1 While those in the ark may have been safe, they had not yet been saved. The author does not finish his story until Noah and his family are back on dry ground (v.14). But those in the ark had to wait before God sent his deliverance. So the story passes over the time of waiting in the ark and proceeds immediately to the decisive moment when "God remembered Noah and all . . . that were with him in the ark."

2–14 Again it is noticeable how the author has prolonged the picture of God's deliverance. God is depicted at work stopping the flow of the waters and removing the sources of the floods. But it still takes time before Noah can be back on dry land. He still has to wait. With this picture of God at work as background, the author turns his attention to Noah inside the ark and focuses on his patience as he waited on God's deliverance. At the end of forty days, Noah began to look for signs of his impending deliverance. He sent out a raven and a dove, but no signs of dry land appeared. Noah continued to wait. When the sign of the return of the dry lands finally appeared and the dove did not return, Noah had waited exactly one year (cf. 7:6, 11 and 8:13–14). But even then Noah could only open the window to look out of the ark. He still had to wait for God's command before leaving the ark (vv.15–17).

The image that emerges from this portrait of Noah is that of a righteous and faithful remnant ("Only Noah was left," 7:23), patiently waiting for God's deliverance (cf. Isa 8:17–18; 40:31; Jas 5:7–11). Henceforth "the Flood" is synonymous with eschatological judgment (Isa 8:7–8), and Noah's deliverance is an image of the salvation of the faithful (Mt 24:37–39).

f. The command to exit the ark (8:15–19)

15–19 Noah left the ark only at God's command. The description, though condensed, closely follows the Creation pattern in Ge 1. The picture is of a return to the work of Creation "in the beginning." Significantly, at this point the author takes up a lengthy account of the covenant (8:20–9:17). The restoration of God's Creation was founded on the establishment of a covenant.

There is a striking thematic parallel between the picture of God's calling Noah out of the ark (8:15–20) and the call of Abraham (12:1–7). Both Noah and Abraham represent new beginnings. Both are marked by God's promise of blessing and his gift of the covenant.

g. The altar and the covenant (8:20–9:17)

8:20–9:17 In the account of Noah's altar and covenant, the author continues his close associations with ch. 1. As a result ofthis altar and offering, the whole of the state of humankind before the Flood is reestablished. The human race is still fallen (9:21), but through an offering on the altar they may yet find God's blessing. It is significant that just as in Ge 1, the focus of the author's interest in "man" after the Flood is his creation in God's image (9:6).

Just as significant as the associations of this passage with the Creation account, however, are the several close associations between Noah's altar and Moses' altar at Mount Sinai following the Exodus (Ex 24:4–18). These similarities between God's "covenant" (GK 1382) with Noah and the covenant at Sinai suggest that God's covenant at Sinai is not a new act but rather a return to God's original promises. The covenant with Noah plays an important role in the restoration of blessing, for it lies midway between God's original blessing of all humankind (1:28) and God's promise to bless "all peoples on the earth" through Abraham (12:1–3).

5. Noah's drunkenness (9:18–29)

18–19 These verses conclude the Flood story and introduce the short episode of Noah's drunkenness. What should not be overlooked in this particular transitional unit is the identification of Canaan as one of the sons of Ham. This is crucial to what follows (cf. vv.22, 25).

20–21 Just as in the Creation God planted a garden for people to enjoy, so now Noah plants an orchard. The outcomes are remarkably similar. Noah ate of the fruit of his orchard and became naked. That is, even after the salvation from the Flood, enjoyment of God's good gifts by the human race could not be sustained. Noah, like Adam, sinned, and the effects were felt in the generations of sons and daughters to follow. As in ch. 3, the effect of Noah's sin is seen in his "nakedness" (cf. 2:25; 3:7).

22–29 Ham looked on his father's nakedness. Shem and Japheth instead covered it without looking on him. All speculation concerning the nature of Ham's sin aside, what the author apparently wants to show is simply the contrast between the deeds of Ham and those of Shem and Japheth. That contrast becomes the basis for the curse and the blessing that follow. The significance of the contrast between the actions of the sons is seen from the author's account of the Fall in ch. 3. In covering their father's nakedness, Shem and Japheth were like Adam and Eve (3:7) and God (3:21), who did not look on human nakedness but covered it (cf. 2:25). Ham did not follow that lead. His actions were more like those of whom God warned later in the Torah, those who "expose their own nakedness" before God and others (cf. Ex 20:26). Since some scholars interpret Ex 20:24–26 as a prohibition of Canaanite forms of worship, there may be an intended link between Ham and the Canaanites in the notion of "nakedness." The sons of Noah belong to two groups of humankind, those who like Adam and Eve hide the shame of their nakedness, and those who like Ham, or rather the Canaanites, have no sense of their shame before God. To the one group, the line of Shem, there will be blessing (v.26); but to the other, the Canaanites (not the Hamites), there can only be curse. These three sons—as later the "seed of Abraham" and the "nations"— represent two responses to human guilt and disobedience. It is not simply because one is born into a certain family line that he or she is blessed or cursed.

6. The line of Noah (10:1–32)

The author's purpose in giving a list of names at this point can be seen in the statement at 10:32. These names give a panoramic view of the nations as a backdrop for the rest of the book and beyond. There are exactly seventy nations represented in the list, which symbolizes the totality of nations. In other words, "all nations" find their ultimate origins in the three sons of Noah.

Though he is on the verge of narrowing his focus to the "seed of Abraham" and the "sons of Israel," the author first lays a solid foundation for his ultimate purpose in God's choice of Abraham: through his "seed" God's blessing will be restored to "all people on earth" (12:3). It is not without purpose that the author reminds his readers that the total number of Abraham's "seed" at the close of Genesis is also "seventy" (46:27; cf. Ex 1:5). Before Abraham, the nations numbered "seventy." After Abraham, at the close of Genesis, the seed of Abraham numbered "seventy." He who was taken from the nations has reached the number of the nations.

a. The sons of Noah (10:1)

1 Chapter 10 is bracketed at either end with an identification of the list of names as "Noah's sons" and the temporal marker "after the flood." The author was concerned that the list in ch. 10 not be read outside its context. Such conspicuous attention to context is another indication that the author has a plan to unfold and that he did not want the reader to lose sight of it.

b. The sons of Japheth (10:2–5)

2–5 The list begins with those nations that are considered the "islands of the nations" (cf. v.5), i.e., those that make up the geographical horizon of the author, a kind of "third world" over against the nations of Ham

(Canaan) and Shem. Later, when the focus is on the establishment of God's universal kingdom, these nations again come into view to show that his plan includes all peoples (Ps 72:8, 10).

A pattern in the author's selection is clearly discernible in the list of the sons of Japheth. Fourteen names are listed in all: seven sons of Japheth, then seven grandsons. The author has omitted the sons of five of the seven sons of Japheth (Magog, Madai, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras). He lists only the sons of Gomer and Javan. Thus his intention is not to give an exhaustive list but rather a "complete" list, one that for him is obtained in the number "seven."

c. The sons of Ham (10:6–20)

6–12 The list of the sons of Ham begins as the list of the sons of Japheth does, with the simple naming of Ham's four sons. Then, as also in the Japheth list, the grandsons of the first listed (Cush) are given. But before going on to the next son (Mizraim), the great grandsons (sons of Raamah) are listed. The end result is a list of "seven sons"—a complete list. Immediately following are the exploits of Nimrod and his cities, introducing the city of Babylon, the subject of 11:1–9.

The deliberate association of Assyria with Babylon is significant because it takes Assyria out of its natural associations with Shem and identifies it with Babylon. Thus the way is opened for an association and identification of any city with the city of Babylon (Isa 13–14; Rev 17:5). The prophet Micah can already speak of Assyria as the "land of Nimrod" (Mic 5:6).

13–20 The genealogy of Ham continues with a list of the sons of Mizraim, again seven names. This is the last list of the numerical pattern "seven." The remainder of the lists of names appear to be influenced by no particular numerical pattern except that of the total number of "seventy nations" that dominates the list of names as a whole. The focus of the "non-seven" lists (vv.15–29) is more comprehensive because the Canaanites and the sons of Shem play prominent roles in the book of Genesis and the Pentateuch. The exact boundaries of the area of Canaan are singled out since that area lay at the heart of the purpose of the book. This was the land promised to Abraham, though "at that time the Canaanites were in the land" (12:6).

d. The sons of Shem (10:21–31)

21–31 The reference to Shem and Japheth without Ham recalls Noah's blessing of Shem and Japheth in 9:26–27, where there also Canaan is excluded. The mention of the "sons of Eber" anticipates the genealogy that yet lies ahead and results in the birth of Abraham (11:10–26).

The list of descendants of Shem is also highly selective, going to the two sons of Eber and then following the line of the second son, Joktan. Significantly, another genealogy of Shem is repeated after the account of the building of Babylon (11:1–9), and there the line is continued to Abraham through the first son of Eber, Peleg (11:10–26). Thus a dividing line is drawn through the descendants of Shem on either side of the city of Babylon, falling between the two sons of Eber, Peleg and Joktan. One line leads to the building of Babylon and the other to the family of Abraham. A hint to this division is in v.25. Typically, the "earth" refers to the "inhabitants of the land." Thus not only is the land divided in the confusion of languages (11:1), but two great lines of humanity diverge from the midst of the sons of Shem: those who seek to make a name (shem; GK 9005) for themselves in the building of the city of Babylon (11:4) and those for whom God will make a name (shem, 12:2; GK 9002) in the call of Abraham.

e. Epilogue (10:32)

32 The final verse of ch. 10 again takes up the theme of the division of the nations, providing a context for the narrative of the city of Babylon that follows. What has been described "geographically and linguistically" in ch. 10 is described "theologically" in ch. 11, namely, God's judgment of Babylon and his dispersion of the nations.

E. The City of Babylon (11:1–9)

1–9 The oneness of the people up to this point divides in the two sons of Eber (10:25). One line ends in Babylon, the other in the Promised Land. The first scene opens with a movement "eastward" to the "plain in Shinar." Thus the starting point of the events of the story was a land west of Babylon. Both the man and woman and Cain moved eastward after being cast out from the presence of God (3:24; 4:16). When Lot divided from Abraham, he moved "toward the east" (13:10–12). When a man goes "east," he leaves the land of blessing (Eden and the Promised Land) and goes to a land where his hopes will turn to ruin (Babylon and Sodom).

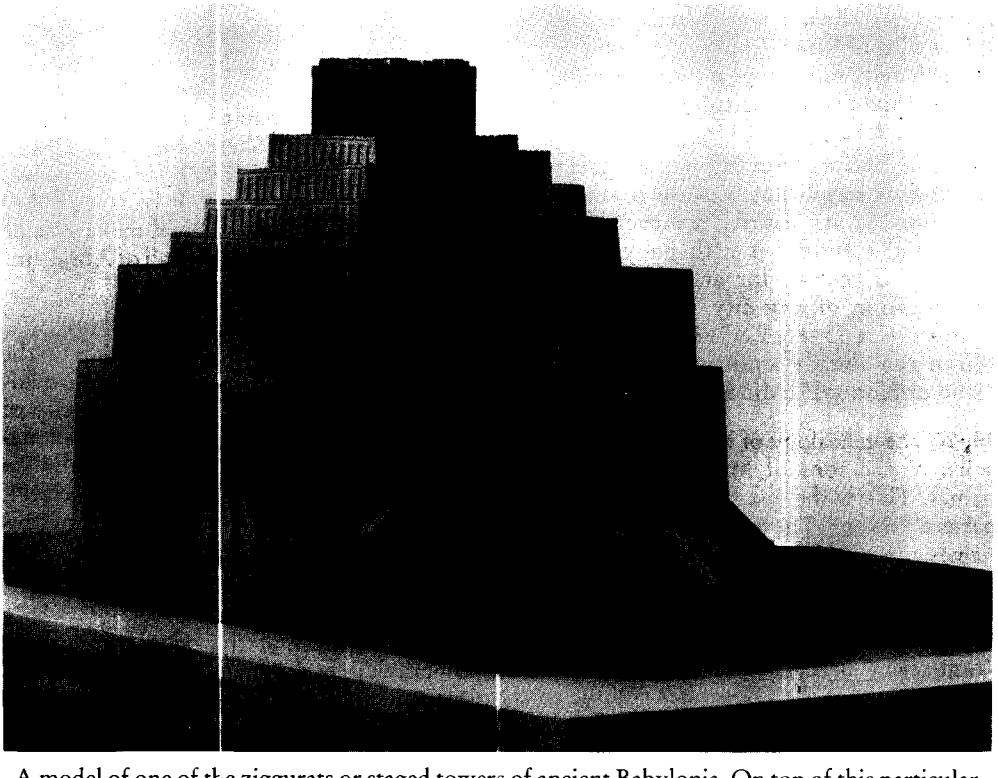
The word "name" (shem; GK 9005) plays a central role here. First, the builders of the city wanted "to make a name [shem]" for themselves. Second, the conclusion of the story returns to the "name" (shem) of the city, ironically associating it (Babylon/Babel) with the confusion of their language. "Scattered" (GK 5880) is another key word. The purpose of the city was so that its inhabitants would not "be scattered over the face of the whole earth." Ironically, at the conclusion of the story it is the Lord who "scattered" the builders from the city "over the face of the whole earth," a fact repeated twice at the conclusion. The expression "the whole land" is a third key term in the story. The people had left "the whole land [NIV, world]" to build a city in the east. The purpose of the city was to keep them from being scattered throughout "the whole land." But in response the Lord reversed their plan and scattered them over "all the land."

The focus of the author since the beginning chapters of the book of Genesis has been both on God's plan to bless humankind by providing them with that which is "good" and on human failure to trust God and enjoy the "good" God had provided. The characteristic mark of this failure has been the attempt by humans to grasp the "good" on their own. The author has centered his description of God's blessing on the gift of the land (1:28). The good land is the place of blessing. To leave this land and to seek another is to forfeit the blessing of God's good provisions. It is to live "east of Eden."

F. The Line of Shem (11:10–26)

10–26 This list of ten descendants of Shem, like that of Adam in ch. 5, draws the line of



A model of one of the ziggurats or staged towers of ancient Babylonia. On top of this particular tower stood the temple of Marduk, the chief god of Babylon in 600 B.C. These ziggurats were later counterparts to the Tower of Babel. Courtesy Oriental Institute of University of Chicago.

the "faithful" (Noah to Abraham) and bypasses the "unfaithful" (10:26–30). In ch. 5 the list of ten patriarchs from Adam to Noah provided the link between the "offspring" promised to the woman (3:15) and the offspring of Noah, the survivor of the Flood (7:23). Not only does the list mark the "line of the promise," it also bypasses the line of Cain (4:17–22)—the line of the builders of the city (v.17) and the civilization (vv.20–24) that was destroyed in the Flood.

Verses 10–26 show that God's promise concerning the seed of the woman cannot be thwarted by the confusion and scattering of the nations at Babylon. Though the seed of Noah were scattered at Babylon, God preserved a line of ten great men from Noah to Abraham.

II. Abraham (11:27–25:11)

A. The Line of Abraham (11:27–32)

27–32 The genealogy that precedes the narrative of Abraham provides the necessary background for understanding the events in his life. Thus far the author has followed a pattern of listing ten names between important individuals, but this short list has only eight names. This raises the question of who the ninth and, more importantly, the tenth names will be. As the narrative unfolds, the ninth and tenth names are shown to be the two sons of Abraham, "Ishmael" (16:15) and "Isaac" (21:3). The genealogical introduction, then, anticipates the birth of Isaac, the tenth name.

Interspersed in the list of names is the brief notice that Terah and his family, including Abraham and Lot, had left Ur of the Chaldeans and traveled as far as Haran, en route to the land of Canaan. There is no mention of the call of God until 12:1, and that appears to be after the death of Terah (v.32b). The initial impression is that while in Haran Abraham was called to leave his homeland—after the death of his father, Terah, and not while in Ur of the Chaldeans. That impression is further sustained by the narrative in 12:4–5, which recounts Abraham's obedient response to the call of God and explicitly states that he "set out from Haran," not mentioning Ur of the Chaldeans. A second look, however, suggests that the author intended us to understand the narrative differently.

Verses 27–32 show that it was Ur of the Chaldeans, not Haran, that was the place of Abraham's birth. Thus the command given to Abraham to leave the place of his birth (12:1; NIV, "your country") could only have been given at Ur of the Chaldeans. Putting the call of Abraham within the setting of Ur aligns this narrative with themes in the later prophetic literature and connects the call of Abraham (12:1–3) with the dispersion of the city of Babylon (11:1–9), thus making Abraham prefigure all those future exiles who, in faith, wait for the return to the Promised Land (cf. Mic 7:18–20).

Marked similarities are evident between the introductions to the Abraham and the Isaac narratives (25:19–26). Abraham's brother, Haran, died "before" his father; Isaac's brother Ishmael died "before his brothers" (25:18b). Abraham took a wife, and she was barren; Isaac took a wife, and she was barren (25:20–21). Both narratives contain an element of struggle between brothers. Abraham was accompanied by Lot from birth, and Jacob was accompanied by Esau from birth (25:22–24). In the struggles that ensued, Abraham was "separated" from Lot (13:9, 11, 14) and Jacob was "separated" from Esau (25:23).

B. The Call of Abraham (12:1–9)

1–5 Abraham, like Noah, marks a new beginning as well as a return to God's original plan of blessing "all peoples on earth" (cf. 1:28). Notable is the frequent reiteration of God's "blessing" throughout the narratives of Abraham and his descendants (12:1–3; 13:15–16; 15:5, 18; et al.). Abraham is here represented as a new Adam, the seed of Abraham as a second Adam, a new humanity. Those who "bless" (GK 1385) him, God will bless; those who "curse" (GK 826) him, God will curse. The way of life and blessing, which was once marked by the "tree of the knowledge of good and evil" (2:17) and then by the ark (7:23b), is now marked by identification with Abraham and his seed.

The identity of the seed of Abraham is one of the chief themes of the following narratives. At the close of the book (49:8–12), a glimpse of the future seed of Abraham is briefly allowed. This one seed who is to come, to whom the right of kingship belongs, will be the "lion of the tribe of Judah" (cf.

49:9); and "the obedience of the nations is his" (49:10).

6–9 The account of Abraham's entry into the land of Canaan is selective. Only three sites are mentioned: Shechem, a place between Bethel and Ai, and the Negev. Significantly, these are the same three locations visited by Jacob when he returned to Canaan from Haran (chs. 34–35), as well as the same sites occupied in the account of the conquest of the land under Joshua.

C. Abraham in Egypt (12:10–13:4)

12:10–13:4 Verse 10 opens with a notice that a famine forced Abraham to seek refuge in Egypt. The recurring theme of the threat to God's promise in 12:1–3 is first noted in the present story. In nearly every episode that follows, the promise of a "numerous seed," "blessing to all peoples on earth," or the "gift of the land" is placed in jeopardy by the actions of the characters of the narrative. The promise looks as if it will fail. In the face of such a threat, however, God remains faithful to his word and safeguards the promise. God can bring about his promise, despite human failures.

The account of Abraham's sojourn in Egypt parallels in many respects the account of God's deliverance of Israel from Egypt (Ge 41–Ex 12). Both passages have a similar message. The past is not allowed to remain in the past. Its lessons are drawn for the future. That is, Abraham's stay in Egypt prefigures Israel's later stay in Egypt (both initiated by a famine). Behind the pattern stands a faithful, loving God. What he has done with Abraham, he will do for his people today and tomorrow. In light of such parallels we should also understand the close similarity between the accounts of Abraham's sojourns in Egypt (ch. 12) and Gerar (ch. 20) and Isaac's in Gerar (ch. 26). The similarities have long been recognized, though not always appreciated.

D. The Lot Narratives (13:5–19:38)

1. Abraham and Lot (13:5–18)

5–18 The narrative here is governed by the theme of "struggle" and shaped around the "separation" (vv.9, 11, 14) that ensues. At its conclusion stands the second statement of God's promise to Abraham. Just as the first statement of the promise was preceded by Abraham's separation (10:32; 12:1), so the second statement of the promise is put in the context of Abraham's separation from his closest kin, Lot. Significantly, the final statement of the promise to Abraham comes immediately after he has demonstrated his willingness to be separated from his only son and heir, Isaac (22:15–18).

Abraham's separation from Lot also carries the theme of the promise into jeopardy. Ironically, Abraham is on the verge of giving the Promised Land to Lot, who later (19:37–38) became the father of the Ammonites and the Moabites. These people throughout Israel's subsequent history (Dt 23:3–6; Ezr 9:1) were the primary obstacle to the fulfillment of the promise. Thanks to Abraham the promise seems to teeter on the whim of the father of the Moabites. But Lot "chose" to go "east"; so Abraham remained in the land. Thus God's promise was secure, in spite of Abraham's passivity.

The land Lot chose was "like the garden of the LORD" and "like the land of Egypt," a positive description within the context of Genesis. But there is a subtle foreshadowing of the fatal results of Lot's choice in the geographic marker "toward Zoar." That was where Lot fled for safety from the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (19:22). Lot's choice of a land "toward the east" forebodes disaster.

Definite ties connect Lot's separation from Abraham to the separation (10:32) of the nations at Babylon (11:1–9) and the judgment of the nations at Sodom (19:1–29). The ties between ch. 13 and the destruction of Sodom (ch. 19) can be seen in v.10b and vv.12b–13.

The account of the dispersion of the nations closes in 10:32b with a reference to the nations being "spread out [i.e., separated; GK 7233] over the earth after the flood." Then the narrative of the dispersion of Babylon opens with the people of the land traveling "eastward" (11:2). Similarly, Lot traveled "toward the east" when he "parted" (GK 7233) from Abraham (13:11). Following the separation of the nations at Babylon, the narrative resumes with Abraham traveling throughout the land of Canaan, receiving it as a promise, and then building an altar in response to God's promise (12:1–9). So also, after Lot separated to Sodom, Abraham traveled throughout the land of Canaan, received it a second time as a promise, and built an altar in response.

2. Abraham and the nations (14:1–24)

1–11 At first glance the ties between chs. 13 and 14 seem meager. Abruptly the narrative begins in the time frame marked as "In the days of Amraphel" (NIV, "At this time Amraphel"). Just as abruptly the location moves from Hebron (13:18) to an international arena and the wars of four kings. Again, Lot is the link between the two accounts. Immediately following the report of Lot's capture, the narrative returns to Hebron (14:13b). At that point Abraham is brought into the center of the account of the battle with the four kings (vv.14–17). The mention of "Mamre" at v.24 returns us to the scene at the close of ch. 13.

"The LORD" (GK 3378), the God Abraham worshiped at Hebron (13:18), is the "Creator of heaven and earth" (14:22) who delivers the four kings of the east into Abraham's hands. Abraham, who asks nothing and wants nothing from the kings of this world (vv.22–23), is the only one who proves able to dwell peacefully in the land. As 12:3 has forecast, those who join with Abraham (v.13b) will enjoy his blessing (v.24b); but those who separate from him, as Lot had done (13:12), will suffer the same fate as Sodom and Gomorrah (14:11–12).

Shinar has already been identified as Babylon (10:10; 11:2, 9). The author has deliberately put the king of Shinar's name first in the narrative, thus aligning the account with the theme of "Babylon" introduced in chs. 10 (v.10) and 11 (v.2). Elsewhere throughout the chapter Kedorlaomer is always first among the four kings (vv.4, 5, 9, 17).

Although very little information is given about the actual battles other than that the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah were soundly defeated and completely routed, the account is overladen with geographical and political details. What emerges as certain from this feature of the narrative is that the events recounted were global in scope and ended in the disgraceful defeat of the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah.

12 The perspective changes markedly from the war with the four eastern kings to the fate of Lot. The ultimate cause of Lot's unfortunate fate was that "he was living in Sodom," a reminder of the blessing in the land (12:1–3; 13:14–17) and the fate of all those who separate themselves from Abraham.

Lot's fate is the first stage in a lesson that will bring him still further in need of the intercession of Abraham (18:23–32). Twice Abraham intercedes for Lot: here he rescues Lot in the war with Babylon, and later (chs. 18–19) Abraham's intercession (18:23–32; 19:29) effects Lot's deliverance. The picture of Abraham that emerges here is the same as that in 20:7: "He is a prophet, and he will pray for you and you will live."

13–16 The scene returns to Abraham and his three friends at Hebron, strangely unaffected by the events of the previous narrative. In this brief scene Abraham musters a select army, defeats the four kings, and returns Lot with the rest of the captives.

17–20 After his return from battle, Abraham was met by two kings in the "King's Valley." Suddenly Melchizedek appears as if out of nowhere and just as quickly is gone, not to be encountered again or subsequently explained. The insertion of the encounter with Melchizedek into the section dealing with the king of Sodom suggests that it is to be read as the background to the encounter with the king of Sodom. Thus a contrast is established between Abraham's responses to the king of Salem and the king of Sodom. One is positive, the other negative. Lying behind Abraham's responses is the contrast between the offers of the two kings. The king of Salem brings "bread and wine" as a priestly act and acknowledges that it was the "God Most High, Creator of heaven and earth," who delivered the adversaries into Abraham's hand. The king of Sodom offered Abraham the booty of the battle (v.21; see next comment). Abraham's response to Melchizedek is an appropriate recognition of the validity of his offer as well as of his priesthood: Abraham paid a tithe (see Nu 18:21).

21–24 The king of Sodom offered Abraham all the "goods" recovered in the battle. Abraham would have nothing to do with an offer of reward from him. Abraham's reward would come from "the LORD, the Creator of heaven and earth" (cf. 15:1, 14b). Although he rejected the offer from the king of Sodom, Abraham laid claim to rightfully own what his young men had eaten (cf. Dt 20:14b). Abraham also recognized that his three friends had their own rightful share in the spoil. But Abraham flatly refused to take anything from the king of Sodom (cf. Dt 20:17). Abraham is a man of faith.

3. Abraham and the covenant (15:1–21)

1–4 God's address to Abraham is in the elevated style typical of later prophetic literature (vv.1, 4; cf. Jer 34:12). Like the seer Balaam (Nu 24:4, 16), Abraham saw the word of the Lord "in a vision." For the first time it is recorded that Abraham spoke to God. Previously when God spoke to him, Abraham obeyed but did not speak in return. Abraham raised a question of how the promise would be fulfilled. In fact, he raised so many questions that we are reminded of his unwavering faith (v.6).

Abraham's questions provide the backdrop for the central issue of the chapter: God's apparent delay in fulfilling his promises. The issue at stake is the same one faced by Jeremiah. God's people, instead of enjoying the promised blessing, would find themselves about to enter captivity in Babylon. The promise appears to have come to naught (cf. Jer 25:11). But in Jeremiah's warning there is the promise of ultimate blessing. The time of exile has a limit (v.12). Abraham's predicament is like that of later generations of God's people. He too must wait in faith for the fulfillment of the promise, being counted righteous in his faith (v.6), but realizing that the promise was far off to another generation (vv.15–16; cf. Heb 11:13).

What was Abraham afraid of? What "reward" (GK 8510) did God have in mind? Were the military events in ch. 14 still posing a threat to Abraham? Since ch. 15 makes a major break with ch. 14 ("after this"; cf. 22:1; 39:7; 40:1), God's first words to Abraham probably do not relate to the immediate context of ch. 14. Apparently Abraham had begun to fear for the final outcome of God's promise to make his "offspring like the dust of the earth" (13:16; cf. v.2).

The questions Abraham raised betray the fact that such a fear lay behind God's first words of comfort. Not only do his questions betray the fear that lay within him, but also the Lord's continued assurances point in the same direction (v.4). From all appearances around him, Abraham has little to give him hope that God will remain faithful to his word. It is significant that the next words Abraham spoke to the Lord (17:18) appear to reveal doubt. On the other hand, when he is silent, his actions always exhibit faith.

5 The appeal to the number of the stars of "the heavens" recalls Abraham's own words in 14:22, where his hope for reward was based solely on the "Creator of heaven and earth." If the Lord was the Creator of the great multitude of stars, he was able to give Abraham an equal number of descendants (cf. 22:17; 26:4; Ex 32:13; Dt 1:10; 28:62). God's faithfulness in the past was the basis for Abraham's trust in the future.

6 God was about to enter a "covenant" (GK 1382) with Abraham that would be the basis of all God's future dealings with him and his offspring (vv.7–21). Verse 6 sets the record straight: Abraham had believed in the Lord and had been accounted righteous. The "covenant" did not make in him "righteousness" (GK 7407); rather, it was through his "faith" that he was reckoned righteous.

7–16 These verses recount the establishment of a covenant between the Lord and Abram. The opening statement is virtually identical to that of the Sinai covenant (Ex 20:2). "Ur of the Chaldeans" refers to 11:28 and 31, grounding the present covenant in a past act of divine salvation from "Babylon" (cf. Ex 20:2). The coming of God's presence in the awesome fire and darkness of Mount Sinai (Ex 19:18; 20:18; Dt 4:11) appears to be intentionally foreshadowed in Abram's pyrotechnic vision (vv.12, 17). In the Lord's words to Abram, the connection between Abram's covenant and the Sinai covenant is explicitly made by means of the reference to the four hundred years of bondage of Abram's descendants and their subsequent exodus.

17 The act of dividing the animals and walking through the parts was apparently an ancient form of contractual agreement (cf. Jer 34:18). While the meaning of the details may remain a mystery, fortunately the writer of Genesis has explained the custom: "On that day the LORD made a covenant with Abram."

The sudden and solitary image of the birds of prey that Abram must drive away (v.11) give a fleeting glimpse of the impending doom that awaits Abraham's seed but in the same moment points to the protective care of God's promises (cf. Mt 24:28). The imagery of the birds of prey surrounding the carcass is followed by a reference to the darkening of the sun (Ge 15:12; cf. Mt 24:29) and the promise of future redemption (Ge 15:14; cf. Mt 24:30).

18–21 The author again draws the promise of the land back into the narrative by concluding with a description of the geographical boundaries of the covenant land. The borders of the Promised Land appear to coincide with those of the Garden of Eden (cf. 2:10–14).

4. Hagar (16:1–16)

1–6 The mention of Hagar's geographical origin ("Egyptian") links this account to 15:18b–21. Twice we read that Hagar, the Egyptian, "despised" Sarai (cf. 12:3). As a consequence, Hagar was forced into the "desert" (v.7), where she was to stay until she submitted herself again to Sarai. Only then did the Lord offer Hagar a blessing (v.10; cf. 17:2, 20).

To deal with her barrenness, Sarai's plan of offering her maid to Abram to bear him an heir was apparently acceptable within the social custom of the day. Sarai's plan, however, was one more example of the futility of human efforts to achieve God's blessing. Although successful, Sarai's plan does not meet with divine approval (17:15–19; cf. 11:1–9; 12:10–20; 13:1–12; 14:21–24).

7–12 The location shifts to the wilderness, to the "spring that is beside the road to Shur." Hagar was returning to Egypt (see 25:18). The angel of the Lord greets Hagar with a question (cf. comment on 3:9). Then he offers a blessing to the distraught handmaid. The child to be born to her will be named "Ishmael" because the Lord "has heard" (a play on words, since both terms are built on the same Heb. root) her "misery" (GK 6715). The key term throughout the chapter is "misery," which occurs as a noun in v.11b and as a verb in v.6 ("mistreated"; GK 6700) and v.9 ("submit"; GK 6700). Hagar was afflicted by Sarai (v.6); she was told to put herself back under that affliction (v.9); and the Lord heard her affliction (v.11).

The second half of Hagar's "blessing" did not portend well for her son: he would be a "wild donkey of a man." There is a wordplay between "donkey" and "Paran," the later location of the tribes of Ishmael. The sense of the last statement in the blessing can perhaps be gained from 21:21, where it is said that Ishmael "was living in the Desert of Paran." Ishmael was to dwell on the outskirts of civilization, i.e., in the wilderness.

13–16 The final section of the narrative consists of Hagar's naming of God and the birth of Ishmael. The two events go together in that the birth of the child was the confirmation of the name given to God in this section: "the God of seeing."

5. Abraham, Sarah, and Ishmael (17:1–27)

1a Abram was eighty-six years old when Ishmael was born (16:16). At the beginning and close of ch. 17, his age is given as ninety-nine. Thus his age functions as a framework.

1b–2 The Lord's first speech to Abram establishes the interpretive boundaries for the rest of the chapter and establishes the fact that the events of the chapter represent the making of a covenant between the Lord and Abram. The substance of the covenant is the promise of abundant descendants.

God is immediately identified as the "LORD" (GK 3378), the God of the covenant at Sinai (Ex 3:15). Within the narrative, however, God identified himself to Abram as "God Almighty." An insight into the faith of Abram is that he worshiped the covenant God, "the LORD," but knew him as "God Almighty" (see Ex 6:3). After identifying himself, the Lord gives a brief synopsis of the covenant, stressing Abram's obligation: "Walk before me and be blameless" and the divine promise: "[I] will greatly increase your numbers." Had not God already "made" a covenant with Abraham in 15:18? Why did he establish a covenant with Abram a second time? The two covenants are, in fact, two distinct aspects of God's covenant with Abraham—one stresses the promise of the land (15:18–21) and the other the abundance of descendants (17:2).

3a The report of Abram's response is also brief: Abram "fell facedown," a sign of deep respect. Comparing Abram's response to the Lord's second speech (v.17), we see that he not only "fell facedown" but also "laughed." When Abram heard that God would greatly increase his descendants, he responded with respect and submission. But when he heard how God would carry out his plan, his respect contained a tinge of laughter.

3b–16 The second divine speech is divided into three sections by the clause "and God said." Each section deals respectively with one of the parties of the covenant (the Lord, Abram, and Sarai). The substance of each section is memorialized by a specific sign within that section: the change of Abram's name, the circumcision of all males, and the change of Sarai's name. God's part of the covenant consists of two promises: abundant descendants and eternal faithfulness. The descendants of Abraham who belong to this covenant will owe their existence to God alone. The promise of abundant descendants is memorialized in the change of Abram's name to "Abraham," which is interpreted to mean "father of many nations."

The choice of the word "be fruitful" (GK 7238) in v.6 and "multiply" in v.2 ("increase your numbers"; GK 8049) recalls the blessing of all humankind in 1:28 and its reiteration in 9:1, showing the covenant with Abraham to be the means God uses to channel his blessings to all people.

A new element is added in v.6b: "kings will come forth from you." This anticipates not only Abraham's descendants recorded in Samuel and Kings but, more importantly, provides a link between the general promise of blessing through the seed of Abraham and the subsequent focus of that blessing in the royal house of Judah (Ge 49:8–12; Nu 24:7–9). The notion that the blessing would come from a king is not new (cf. 14:18–19), but the idea that this king would come from the seed of Abraham is.

The focus of vv.7–8 lies in the repetition of the term "everlasting" (GK 6409). The covenant promised is "everlasting" and the possession of the land is "everlasting." The promises in these verses were given before (cf. 13:14–15; 15:18–21); however, here the everlasting nature of promises is in view. Eternality was certainly implied in the "forever" of the land promise (13:15); but when the covenant was granted in ch. 15, there was no mention yet of its being "eternal." Thus as God reiterated his role in the covenant, the focus was centered on his everlasting faithfulness.

Abraham's part in the covenant consisted of his obedience to the covenant. What this involved immediately was that "every male among you shall be circumcised." To keep the covenant was to faithfully practice circumcision; to "break" the covenant was to be "uncircumcised." But the whole of the covenant was not simply the rite of circumcision, for that was to "be the sign of the covenant."

Sarai's part in the covenant was to be the mother of nations, and "kings of peoples will come from her." As with Abraham, her new name—Sarah—was a sign of her part in the covenant. In Hebrew "Sarah" means "princess."

17–18 Abraham's response—"fell facedown" and "laughed" (GK 7464)—is unexpected. Abraham's own words uncover the motivation behind his laughter. In 18:12, when Sarah also responded to God's promise with laughter, her laughter was met with divine disapproval. The absence of such a rebuke here suggests that Abraham's laughter does not so much reflect a lack of faith as it does a limitation of his faith. Abraham's faith must grow if he is to continue to put his trust in God's promise. One clear purpose in Abraham's laughter is that the Hebrew expression "he laughed" foreshadows the name "Isaac."

The irony of Abraham's response is evident. His laughter became a verbal sign marking the ultimate fulfillment of the promise in Isaac. Throughout the remainder of the narratives surrounding the birth of Isaac, a key word within each major section is "laughter." Sarah "laughed" (18:12); Lot's sons-in-law laughed (19:14); all who heard of Sarah's birth to Isaac would "laugh" (21:6); the son of Hagar laughed (21:9b; NIV, "was mocking") at Isaac. Finally, Isaac's own failure to trust in God (26:7) was uncovered when the Philistine king saw him "laughing" (26:8b; NIV, "caressing"). Thus the power of God and the limitations of human faith are embodied in that most ambiguous of human acts, laughter.

19–22 The third divine speech extends the covenant to include Isaac, who is to be born of Sarah, and consequently excludes Ishmael, the son of Hagar. Thus Isaac is here brought to the level of a participant in the original covenant, and the identification of the covenant "offspring" of Abraham is made more specific. The descendants of Abraham who are heirs of the covenant are those through Sarah, that is, the "offspring" of Isaac, anticipating 26:3b.

Although Ishmael has been excluded from the covenant with Abraham, Ishmael and his descendants are still to live under the blessing of God. In fact, in his blessing of Ishmael, God reiterated both his original blessing of all humanity in 1:28 and his blessing of Abraham in 12:2. Just as the "offspring" of Isaac would form a great nation of twelve tribes (49:1–27), so the "offspring" of Ishmael, under God's blessing, would form a great nation of twelve rulers (cf. 25:13–15).

23 Abraham's final response shows that he obeyed the covenant; he circumcised all the male members of his household "as God told him." Abraham's obedience reflects the injunction given in v.1: "Walk before me and be blameless." "Blameless" (GK 9459) occurs in Genesis only here and in 6:9 (Noah). "Walk before God" occurs more frequently (5:22, 24; 6:9; 17:1; 24:40; 48:15). Thus Abraham and Noah are examples of those who obeyed the covenant and were therefore "blameless" before God.

24–27 The ages of Abraham and Ishmael mark the closure of an inclusio (see comment on v.1). The final word at the close restates Abraham's obedient response to the covenant.

6. Three visitors (18:1–33)

a. Abraham's hospitality (18:1–8)

1a The narrative begins in the same way as ch. 17, with the report that "the LORD appeared to Abraham." The importance of this comment should not be overlooked, for it helps clarify who the three men were who visited Abraham and what their mission was. In some (albeit unexplained) way, the three men represented the Lord's "appearing" to Abraham.

The mention of the "great trees of Mamre" reestablishes the location of Abraham during these events (cf. 13:18). Since the identification of "Abraham" within ch. 18 does not occur until v.6 (in v.1 NIV supplies his name but the Heb. has only "to him"), the opening of ch. 18 is closely bound with the end of ch. 17 and the account of the circumcision of Abraham and his household.

The final verse (v.33)—which recounts that after the Lord had finished speaking, "he left"—shows that the whole chapter is to be understood within the context of the Lord's appearance to Abraham (cf. 17:1 and 22; 35:9 and 13).

1b–8 The narrative of the arrival of three men at Abraham's tent is complicated by several uncertainties. First, the relationship between the three men and the appearance of the Lord (v.1a) is not explicit. Second, there appears to be a conscious shift in the verbal forms between v.3 (sing. masc.) and vv.4–9 (pl. masc.). Finally, there is the question of the nature of the relationship between the uncertainties just raised in ch. 18 and their apparent counterparts in ch. 19, where the relationship between the "two angels" (or "messengers," 19:1a; GK 4855) and the Lord ("LORD"; GK 3378) remains unexplained (e.g., the two "men" [19:12] tell Lot they will destroy Sodom [19:13], but the text states that "the LORD rained down burning sulfur on Sodom and Gomorrah" [19:24]). The verbs and pronouns in Lot's greeting are all plural masculine (19:2) and continue to be so until the end of the story, where the same sort of unevenness found in ch. 18 reappears (e.g., 19:17: "as soon as they [pl. masc.] had brought them out, one of them said [sing. masc.]"; or 19:18: "Lot said to them [pl. masc.], . . . Your servant ['your' is sing. masc.]"). Also, unlike 18:3b, the Masoretes' vocalization of "my lords" (NIV) in 19:2 reflects an address to persons other than God, whereas when the same persons are addressed in 19:18, the Masoretic form of "my lords" (NIV; GK 123) is again the form used only to address God (see NIV note).

Such irregularities as exist in the narrative are the result of a conscious attempt to stress at one and the same time the theological relevance of the promise of God's presence along with his transcendent, sovereign power. Thus the final unevenness results from the need to reconcile two equally important views of God.

There are close similarities between the account of Abraham's visit by "three men" and Lot's visit by the "two angels/men" (19:1–2). In ch. 18 Abraham is sitting "at the entrance to his tent," whereas in ch. 19 Lot is "sitting in the gateway of [Sodom]" (v.1). Second, when Abraham "saw" the men, he ran "to meet them" and "bowed low to the ground" and said, "O Lord, if now" (see NIV note); so also Lot in ch. 19, when he "saw" the angels/men, he got up "to meet them" and "bowed down with his face to the ground" and said, "Behold now, my lords" (NIV, "My lord"). One primary difference between the two accounts is the way the visitors are greeted. Abraham addressed them as "Lord" and appropriately used the singular to address all three men in v.3 (see above). Lot, however, addressed the visitors as "lords" and thus used the plural to address the two angels/men. Abraham, who had just entered the covenant (ch. 17), recognized the Lord when he appeared to him, whereas Lot, who then lived in Sodom, did not recognize the Lord. Abraham knew God, but Lot did not.

The interchange between the singular and plural in v.3 and vv.4ff. appears to be one way to clarify the nature of the divine-human relationship. God makes himself known intimately and concretely to his covenant people through "speaking," "in a vision" (15:1), or through his "angel" (16:7) who speaks for him. He even can "appear" to individuals (12:7; 17:1; 18:1). Those narratives that speak of God's making himself known through words, visions, and angels pose no difficulty in light of the strict prohibition against the presentation of God in any physical form (Dt 4:15). But passages where it is expressly stated that God "appeared" to someone (12:7; 17:1; 18:1) would naturally raise difficult questions. How is it that God can "appear" and yet his form not be seen (Dt 4:15)? How can God "appear" and yet say "my face must not be seen" (Ex 33:23)? By carefully identifying and distinguishing the characters in the narrative by means of the singular and plural verbal forms, the author is able to show that the Lord's appearing to Abraham and the visit of the three men are one and the same event. God appeared to Abraham, but not "face to face" in his own physical form. Rather, the singular and plural forms are so arranged that the three men always represent God's presence and can be identified with his presence but at the same time remain clearly distinct from him.

The explanation seems to be that the three men, as such, are to be understood as the physical "appearance" of the Lord to Abraham. Although God himself did not appear to Abraham in physical form, the three men are to be seen as representative of his presence (cf. Ex 3:2–3). In such a way the actual presence of God among his covenant people was assured but without leaving the impression that God may have a physical form.

b. The promise of a son (18:9–15)

9–11 The three men inquired about Sarah but spoke only to Abraham. Abraham and Sarah were too old to have children. Sarah, as all women her age, no longer was physically capable of even conceiving a child. Thus, although Abraham's age was a factor to be reckoned with, the main obstacle to the fulfillment of the promise was Sarah's age (cf. 25:1–4). The primary importance of her age can also be seen in v.12, where she listed her limitation first and then that of Abraham's. Finally, Sarah's thoughts are revealed in v.13 with no mention of Abraham's old age. Thus it is repeatedly stressed that for her to have a child was not simply unlikely; it was impossible (v.14; NIV, "too hard")!

12–15 The key to the sense of this short passage lies in the Lord's question to Abraham about Sarah's laughter. The subtle changes in the wording of Sarah's thoughts reveal that the Lord was not simply restating her thoughts but was interpreting them as well. First, the Lord restated Sarah's somewhat ambiguous statement—"After I am worn out, . . . will I now have this pleasure?"—as simply "Will I really have a child?" Then he took Sarah's statement about her husband—"my master is old"—and reshaped it into a statement about herself: "now that I am old." Finally, he went beyond her actual words to their intent: "Is anything too hard for the LORD?" The underlying issue, then, is the physical impossibility of the fulfillment of the promise through Sarah.

Once the physical impossibility of Sarah's giving birth was firmly established, the Lord repeated his promise to Abraham. At this point Sarah, who had only been "listening," entered the conversation with a terse reply: "I did not laugh." The author then quickly puts her response aside as a lie and states that she lied because "she was afraid." This brief narrative concludes with the Lord's reiteration of what the reader by now certainly knows to be the truth—Sarah did in fact laugh.

c. Sodom in the balance (18:16–22)

16 As the three men arose and looked out toward Sodom, Abraham accompanied them to send them off. With a seemingly insignificant gesture, the three men "looked down toward Sodom," the doomed city of the next chapter.

17–19 The Lord's words reveal the inner motivation for his actions ("what I am about to do"). Verse 18 looks back to the original promise that Abraham would become a "great . . . nation" (cf. 12:2a) and that "all the nations on earth will be blessed through him" (cf. 12:3b).

Verse 19 seems to be an expansion on the ideas of 17:1. The Lord puts into words what has been a central part of the narrative, namely, Abraham's election: "I have chosen him" (GK 3359). Second, the Lord expresses his purpose in choosing Abraham. Here attention is directed internally ("to keep the way of the LORD") with the end in view that Abraham and his descendants do "what is right and just." Only then will the Lord fulfill what he had promised to Abraham. The notion of an internalized obedience is remarkably close to the terms of the "new covenant" (Jer 31:33) and is deeply rooted in the theology of Dt 30:6.

20–21 Apparently in vv.17–19 the Lord was speaking to himself. Here, however, Abraham was most certainly the one being addressed. The Lord's words answer the question in v.17. Thus the Lord revealed to Abraham that he would go down to investigate the wickedness of Sodom and Gomorrah.

22 Notice that the narrative first states that the "LORD (GK 3378) said, "I will go down and see" (v.21); then "the men turned away and went toward Sodom." Once again the Lord and the men are brought into close association. If "the men" are the emissaries of the Lord and represent his presence amid everyday affairs, then when they journey to Sodom and Gomorrah, it can rightly be said that the Lord himself was visiting these cities.

As has been the case throughout this narrative, "the men" represent the Lord's appearance but are not actually identified as the Lord. Thus the fact that the Lord remained behind after two of "the men" had left is no more a surprise than the fact that the Lord was again present with Lot in Sodom along with two of "the men" (19:12, 16). So when the Lord said, "I will go down and see," it stands to reason that, as in ch. 18, "the men" in ch. 19 represent the Lord's presence with Lot.

One question remains, however. If the three men left Abraham, why did only "two messengers" (19:1) arrive in Sodom? Clearly the two messengers who visited Lot are two of the "three men" who visited Abraham, especially since in ch. 19 the "messengers" are subsequently referred to simply as "the men." But what happened to the other "man"? The most common explanation is that the "man" is a "christophany," i.e., an appearance of the Second Person of the Trinity in human form, before the Incarnation. Thus when the text says that "the men turned away and went toward Sodom" and that the Lord remained with Abraham, and then further that only "two messengers" (19:1) came to Sodom, one of the men must have stayed behind with Abraham. Since we know that the Lord stayed behind, that man must have been the Lord. Abraham was then visited by the preincarnate Christ who was accompanied by two "angels."

Clearly the two men in Sodom represent the carrying out of the Lord's intention to "go down and see if what they have done is as bad as the outcry." But how did the Lord investigate the "outcry of Gomorrah"? Since the narrative records only the events of the men's visit to Sodom, and since at the conclusion of ch. 19 the mention is made not only of the Lord's destruction of Sodom but also of Gomorrah (v.24a), apparently the third man went to Gomorrah and carried out a similar task in that city. By specifying the number of men who visited Sodom, the author has left us with an answer to the question of the Lord's righteous and just treatment of Gomorrah. Thus "the Judge of all the earth" (v.25) has "dealt justly" (cf. 19:15b).

d. Abraham's intercession (18:23–33)

23–33 The central issue of the discourse between Abraham and the Lord is expressed in Abraham's question at the end of v.25. The Lord's answer is a resounding yes. Abraham started with a question about fifty righteous people in a city and concluded with the question of ten righteous ones. Why stop at ten? Did he not care about Lot and his family who only numbered four? One possible solution is that the sequence fifty down to ten, in units of ten, would naturally end with ten. Abraham would not have gone to zero righteous people, since he was concerned only with the salvation of the righteous amid the unrighteous, not with the destruction of the wicked. Abraham had his answer in general terms and did not need to pursue the question to the exact number.

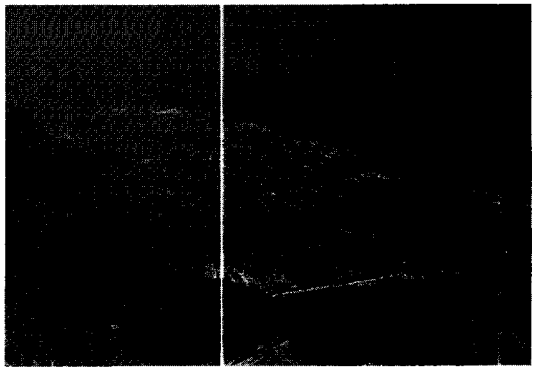
In Abraham's concern for Lot, the narrative addresses the larger issue of God's treatment of any righteous person in his judgment of the wicked. While the city of Sodom was destroyed, Lot was taken out of it. Thus we have the answer to what God would do if less than ten righteous were found in the city. It should also be pointed out, however, that though Sodom was not spared for Lot's sake, the little city of Zoar was spared on Lot's behalf (see comments on 19:17–22).

7. Lot and Sodom (19:1–38)

a. Two angels at Sodom (19:1–14)

1a According to vv.10, 12, 15–16, the two "angels" were "men" (v.10), specifically, the men who had visited Abraham (18:3). More important is that toward the end of the narrative, the men are represented as a visitation of the Lord (v.18; cf. NIV note). They came to carry out the Lord's retribution against the wickedness of the city (v.13b); but in response to Abraham's prayer for the righteous (18:23–32), they also had come to rescue Lot (19:29).

Below is an overview of the southern end of the Dead Sea with a fertile oasis—the most likely location for Sodom and Gomorrah. To the right is a memorial by the Dead Sea, with salt visible on the water in the background.

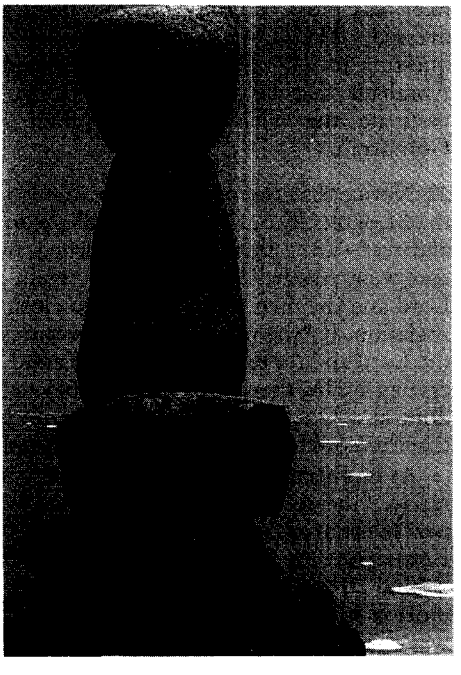


1b–11 The depiction of the events at Lot's house on the eve of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah justifies the divine judgment on the two cities. Even Lot, the righteous one who was ultimately rescued, was tainted by his association with Sodom. Unlike Abraham, Lot appears quite insensitive to God's presence with the messengers, addressing them only as "sirs" (v.2; NIV, "lords"; GK 123). Though Lot was just as hospitable as Abraham and can certainly not be put in the same class as the men of Sodom, his suggestion that the men of the city take his own daughters and do with them what they please can hardly be taken as a sign of his good character. In fact, in an ironic turn of events, Lot himself later inadvertently carried out his own horrible proposal (vv.30–38).

12–14 The messengers clearly stated their twofold purpose: they had been sent to destroy the city and to rescue Lot and his family. The response of the two "sons-in-law" shows that they are at one with the rest of the men of the city. This provides a further vindication of the divine punishment that was to follow.

b. Lot's deliverance (19:15–28)

15–16 In contrast to the men of Sodom who blindly groped for the door of Lot's house,



Lot and his family were taken by the hand and led out of the city to safety at the break of day. The rescue of Lot was in response to the prayer of Abraham, for the angels' words explicitly recall the words Abraham used (cf. 18:23; 19:15, 17; see esp. 19:29).

This section pictures Lot as a righteous man living amid the unrighteous, who is rescued from the fate of the wicked through the intercession of God's chosen one. Surprisingly, however, the basis of God's saving Lot was not his righteousness but because "the LORD was merciful." Lot's "righteousness" (cf. 2Pe 2:7) comes only from the connection established between Abraham's prayer "for the righteous" in ch. 18 and the events of Lot's rescue in ch. 19. In the account of the rescue itself, the emphasis is on God's compassion. Lot acknowledges in v.19 that he had found "favor" and "kindness" before God.

17–22 At the conclusion of Lot's rescue, he requested shelter in the nearby city of Zoar. In granting the request, the Lord saved that city from destruction. Thus Lot's rescue is a result of prayer—Abraham's and his own. God had promised not to destroy the city "on behalf of" the righteous in it. So now, though Sodom was destroyed, Zoar was saved from the destruction on account of Lot, the righteous one living in it.

23–28 Before the onset of the description of God's judgment, we are reminded of two things. First, "the sun had arisen over the land," and second, "Lot reached Zoar [safely]." The mention of the sun ties this section together with Lot's early morning rescue (v.15) and with the larger biblical picture of the "sunrise" as an image of divine salvation for the righteous and divine judgment on the wicked (Isa 9:2; Mal 4:1–2). With that as an introduction, we come to the classic image of the fate of every wicked person: "The LORD rained down burning sulfur on Sodom and Gomorrah."

Lot's wife and Abraham both "looked" at the destruction of the cities, but with very differing consequences. Lot's wife became a "pillar of salt" because she "looked back," thus disobeying the words of the rescuers (v.17). Abraham, on the other hand, looked from a vantage point consistent with the men's words in v.17. They said, "Don't stop anywhere in the plain," and so Abraham "returned to the place where he had stood before the LORD. He looked down toward Sodom and Gomorrah, toward all the land of the plain" (vv.27–28). Unaware of the warning to Lot and his family, Abraham obeyed and escaped the destruction.

c. Lot's incest (19:29–38)

29–38 Verse 29 is a clear reminder of Abraham's role in Lot's rescue. This carries through the theme of God's promise—in Abraham and his offspring "all peoples on earth will be blessed" (12:3). Ironically, in his own drunkenness Lot carried out the shameful act that he himself had suggested to the men of Sodom (19:8): he lay with his own daughters. The account is remarkably similar to the story of the last days of Noah after his rescue from the Flood (9:20–27). There, as here, the father becomes drunk and uncovers himself in the presence of his children with negative consequences. Thus at the close of the two great narratives of divine judgment, those who were saved from God's wrath subsequently fell into a form of sin reminiscent of those who died in the judgment.

Lot is mentioned as the father of the Moabites and the Ammonites in Dt 2:9, 19, the passage that stresses their relationship to Israel, and not in Dt 23, where they are excluded from the congregation. Both the Moabites and the Ammonites continued to play an important role in later biblical history.

E. Abraham and Abimelech (20:1–18)

The focus of chs. 20 and 21 is the relationship between Abraham and the nations. Abraham's role is as a prophetic intercessor, as in the promise "all peoples on earth will be blessed through you" (12:3). He prayed for the Philistines (20:7), and God healed them (v.17). In the narrative Abimelech plays the role of a "righteous Gentile" with whom Abraham could live in peace and blessing. There is an implied contrast in the narratives between chs. 19 (Lot, the one who pictures the mixed multitude) and 20 (Abimelech, the righteous sojourner).

1 Abraham left the "great trees of Mamre" (18:1, 33) and traveled into "the Negev" (i.e., "southward") to sojourn in Gerar, which is in the "land of the Philistines" (21:34).

2 Sarah was taken into Abimelech's house. The narrative here is much briefer than the similar event in ch. 12. Clearly the focus is not so much the fate of Sarah as it is that of the Philistines. Many of the details are withheld until Abraham is given an opportunity to speak on his own behalf (vv.11–13). At that point his actions cast more light on the Philistines' inner motives than on his own. Abraham's words show that he had mistakenly judged the Philistines to be a wicked people, but their actions proved otherwise.

3–16 The narrative goes to great lengths to demonstrate the innocence of Abimelech, making it clear that "Abimelech had not gone near her." Thus Abimelech's claim to be "innocent" (lit., "righteous"; GK 7404) and his appeal to his innocence contrast sharply with Abraham's deception. Indeed, in v.6 God himself concurred with Abimelech's plea of innocence. Abimelech, however, was in immediate need of a warning lest he lose his innocence by his mistreatment of Abraham's household. Abraham's wife was to be returned, and Abraham the prophet must pray in behalf of the life of Abimelech. The surprising outcome of God's visit of Abimelech is that he responded immediately by rising early in the morning and declaring his dream to his servants and then to Abraham. The Philistines responded quickly and decisively to God's warning (cf. Jnh 3:6–9).

Abraham's reply seems intended not only to justify his action with Sarah in the present narrative but also to provide a larger picture for understanding his similar actions while in Egypt in ch. 12. At the same time, by tracing the plan back to the very beginnings of his sojourning from his father's house, he showed that the plan in this instance was not based on an actual assessment of the Philistines' religious life; rather, it was simply a part of a larger scheme. Thus an explanation is given as to why Abraham misjudged the Philistines. Though we have followed the life of Abraham closely since he left his father's house in ch. 11, this is the first we have heard of such an overarching strategy on Abraham's part or of this aspect of his relationship with Sarah. In the last analysis we are left only with the opinion of Abimelech himself, who undoubtedly accepted Abraham's explanation and faulted only himself in this unfortunate situation. Just how sincerely Abimelech accepted Abraham's story can be seen in the fact that in speaking to Sarah he called Abraham "your brother," showing that he accepted the explanation and in turn was attempting to restore the broken relationship with expensive gifts.

17–18 Abraham accepted the gifts from the Philistines and offered a prayer on their behalf in return. Only at this point do we discover the nature of God's words to Abimelech in v.7. The Lord had "closed up every womb in Abimelech's household."

F. Abraham and Isaac (21:1–25:11)

1. The birth of Isaac (21:1–7)

1–7 Verse 1 picks up a central line of narrative from 18:10. Strangely, the news of the birth of Isaac has been delayed and treated anticlimactically. More attention was paid to the announcement of the birth of the son in ch. 18 than to the report of the accomplished fact. The birth of Isaac came about "as [the LORD] had said," stressed three times within the first two verses. Thus the narrative calls attention to God's faithfulness to his word and to his careful attention to the details of his plan.

The importance of the announcement of Isaac's birth is seen in the statement that "the LORD was gracious," which focuses on his attentive care and concern. Also important is the reminder that Isaac was the "son . . . in [Abraham's] old age" and that he was born "at the very time God had promised him," reiterating the key themes of the earlier promise narratives (e.g., 18:10–14). The narrative also emphasizes Abraham's obedience (cf. 17:12). Abraham was a hundred years old when Isaac was born (cf. 17:1, 24). Sarah's words in v.7 emphasize his age.

2. Hagar and Ishmael (21:8–21)

8–21 The celebration of Isaac's coming of age was the occasion for the expulsion of Ishmael. The similarities between this chapter and the events in ch. 16 are notable. The writer's close attention to the similar details in the two chapters is perhaps best explained by his frequent use of "foreshadowing" to draw connections between important narratives. In this case the Lord's promise to Hagar (16:11–12) was recounted in a strikingly similar fashion to that of the fulfillment of the promise (vv.18–21). The promise foreshadows the fulfillment.

3. Abraham and Abimelech (21:22–34)

22–34 The recurrence of Abimelech shows that Abraham was still living with the Philistines (cf. v.34). This is a reminder that Abraham did not live out all his days in the Land of Promise but spent many days in exile. Even Isaac, the son of the promise, was not born in the Land of Promise. He was born in exile and had to sojourn there with his father who "wandered from nation to nation, from one kingdom to another" (Ps 105:13). Hebrews 11:8–13 recalls that though Abraham had left his father's land and had come to the Land of Promise, he lived there "like a stranger in a foreign country. . . . They were aliens and strangers on earth." Abraham in exile typifies God's care of the righteous who must suffer while waiting to enter the land. The servants of Abimelech had stolen Abraham's wells. But because God was with Abraham in all that he did, Abraham made a covenant with their king; and all was restored to him.

4. The binding of Isaac (22:1–14)

1–14 The clear statement that "God tested Abraham" reveals the Lord's real purpose in this incident. There is no thought of an actual sacrifice of Isaac in the narrative, though in the mind of Abraham within the narrative that was the only thought that was entertained. The abruptness of God's request surprises us as much as it would have Abraham. Without any further explanation, the request is made in three simple imperatives: "Take," "go," and "sacrifice him."

Although, unlike Abraham, we know that this was a test, we are as much in the dark about the intention of God's ways as Abraham was. Noteworthy is the way the narrative excessively and deliberately details Abraham's preparation for the journey and the journey itself. Without explicit commentary, we are left to ponder the thoughts of Abraham as he so matter-of-factly carried out God's directions. When at last someone in the narrative speaks, it is Isaac, not God, who breaks the silence; and the question he raises serves only to heighten the anguish of the Lord's request. When Abraham finally speaks, his reply to Isaac's question anticipates precisely the final outcome of the story: "The LORD will provide."

Abraham's words cast a new light on his silence. Amid the anguish that can be read into his silence emerges a confidence in the Lord who will provide. Abraham's words are not merely an attempt to calm the curious Isaac but are a settled expression of his trust in God. Few narratives can equal the dramatic tension of the last moments before God interrupts the action and calls the test to a halt. Abraham's every action is described in exaggerated detail. At the last dramatic moment the Lord intervened and, as Abraham had already anticipated, provided a substitute. Abraham therefore named the altar he had built "The LORD will provide."

5. The angel of the Lord (22:15–19)

15–19 At the end of the narrative is a "second" encounter between Abraham and the angel of the Lord. Since in v.19 Abraham returns to the two young men who had accompanied him, apparently this "second" encounter occurred on the same occasion as the first, though at a separate time (after Abraham had finished the burnt offering). The reason why it is called a "second" encounter is to show that the renewal of God's original promises to Abraham was not based on Abraham's specific actions in carrying out the test but on the faith and obedience of Abraham that showed through this test.

The promise reiterated here is similar to that of the earlier chapters. The promise of "blessing" recalls 12:2. The increase of Abraham's "descendants" is similar to 13:16; 15:5; and 17:2. The view of the "nations' " enjoyment of and participation in Abraham's blessing is similar to 12:3 and 18:18. The reference to Abraham's act of obedience as the basis of the promise is similar to 18:19. Perhaps, also, the reference to Abraham's descendants possessing the "cities of their enemies" (v.17) is to be taken as a reference to the gift of the "land" (12:7; 13:15; 15:18; 17:8).

6. The relatives of Abraham (22:20–24)

20–24 Immediately after the reiteration of the promise of a great multitude of descendants comes a notice regarding the increase of the family that Abraham and Sarah had left behind in their homeland. The twelve names in the list suggest that the writer intended to draw a comparison of these names with the twelve sons of Jacob or the twelve sons of Ishmael in 25:12–15. In any event, the central purpose of listing the names is to introduce the future bride of Isaac, Rebekah, and to show that she was of the lineage of Milcah and not of her concubine.

7. Machpelah and Sarah's death (23:1–20)

1–20 Sarah died in Hebron, and Abraham apparently came there from Beersheba (cf. 22:19) to mourn her death. The point of ch. 23 is to show how Abraham fairly and squarely first came into legal possession of a parcel of land in Canaan. Through what appears to be a hard bargain, Abraham bought not only a cave for the burial of his wife but also a large field with many trees. This became an important burial site for the patriarchs and their wives (cf. 49:30–32; 50:13). As Abraham would not accept a gift from the king of Sodom lest it be said that the king had made Abraham wealthy (14:23), similarly here Abraham refused to accept the parcel of land as a gift. Apparently against the wishes of the Hittites, he paid the full price. God, not a human being, was the source of Abraham's hope of blessing. He would not seek to become wealthy or to own land apart from the promises of God. Abraham's purchase of land embodied his hope in God's promise that one day all the land would belong to him and his descendants (cf. Jer 32:6–15).

8. A bride for Isaac (24:1–67)

1–9 Abraham's concern that God's promise come to the descendants of Isaac is evidenced in the oath Abraham made with his servant. Two important points are made regarding the future of Abraham's descendants. First, they were not to be mixed with the inhabitants of Canaan, which appears to be a further expression of the notion of the two lines of blessing and curse (cf. 9:25–27). The seed of Abraham must be kept separate from the seed of Canaan. Second, Abraham's descendants are not to return to the land of their fathers. Canaan is their home, and Abraham is careful to ensure that Isaac not be taken back to the ancestral home.

This section once more portrays the faith of Abraham. The questions raised by the servant provide the occasion. As so many times before, Abraham's reply proves to be both prophetic (anticipating the final outcome of the story) and thematic (providing the central motive of the narrative): "The LORD, the God of heaven, . . . will send his angel before you so that you can get a wife for my son from there." The key idea is God's going before the servant to prepare his way.

10–27 The servant spelled out specifically the nature of the sign he sought from the Lord. God prepared the way, bringing the young girl in question on the scene even before the servant finished speaking. All the details of her background are given as soon as she enters the picture. While the servant is unaware of the actual identity of the girl, we know that she is Rebekah, the daughter of Bethuel, the son of Milcah. Clearly, the Lord has answered the servant's prayer. From the type of information given, there is no doubt that this was the girl the servant had asked for and that God had indeed sent his messenger out ahead of him to prepare the way. Such divine preparation for the descendants of Abraham and the line of the blessing must be accompanied by the kind of appreciation seen in the servant in vv.26–27.

28–49 After meeting Laban and his household, the servant retells the episode. Rather than a mere repeating, however, the retelling reasserts the central points of the first narrative. Originally Abraham is recorded as saying, only generally, that God would send a messenger and that the servant would find a wife for Isaac (v.7). When he retold the story, however, the servant included the idea that God would send the angel and also added that the angel would make his journey a success by gaining a wife for Isaac from his own family. The further details make the miracle of God's provision even more grand than suggested in the original incident itself.

50–61 At the conclusion of the servant's account, Laban and Bethuel acknowledge that it was the Lord who prepared the way for the servant to meet Rebekah. Thus several witnesses testify that these events were the work of God: the narrator (vv.15–16), the servant (vv.26–27), and Laban and Bethuel (v.50). The final witness is Rebekah herself, who, against the wishes of her brother and her mother, returned with the servant to Isaac. The simplicity of her response (v.58) reveals the nature of her trust in the God of Abraham (cf. Ruth 1:16).

62–67 The importance of the blessing of Rebekah by her family lies in the similarity of this blessing to that given to Abraham by the Lord in 22:17. This reveals the careful attention to detail the Lord has shown in choosing this wife for Isaac. In God's plan the same blessing is given to both Isaac and his bride.

For the first time in the story, Isaac enters the narrative, just as the servant is bringing the young woman to him. They both lift up their eyes and see the other in the distance. The narrator, along with the readers, knows who it is that Isaac and Rebekah see, but they themselves do not.

Verse 66 shows that the writer knows just how long to tell the story and stops short of going beyond that point. He says merely that the servant "told Isaac all he had done." The final remarks again show that God's guidance in the mundane areas of life is good for those who put their trust in him. When Isaac took Rebekah as his wife, he loved her and was comforted with her after the death of his mother. So Rebekah follows Sarah in the line of the descendants of Abraham.

9. Abraham's death (25:1–11)

1–6 The narrative reads as though after the death of Sarah, Abraham took another wife by the name Keturah. Because the Chronicler called Keturah a "concubine" (1Ch 1:32), some have suggested that she was one of the "concubines" mentioned in v.6, and hence these sons were born to Abraham and Keturah while Sarah was alive. Though Keturah is called a "concubine" in Chronicles, she is called a "wife" here, which seems to preclude her from being a mere concubine during the time Sarah was alive.

The picture that emerges of Abraham's life after the death of Sarah is that of a complete rejuvenation of the old man of the previous narratives. He continued to be rewarded with the blessing of many offspring. But only Isaac had any share in the promised blessing.

7–10 Surprisingly little attention is given to the details of the death of Abraham. The length of his life is given, which connects him to the patriarchs (cf. 11:32). That Abraham died "at a good old age" recalls the word of the Lord in 15:15. The mention of Abraham's "good old age" contrasts to Jacob's "few and difficult" (lit., "evil") years (47:9). This narrative thus picks up the "good" and "evil" theme begun in the first chapters of the book and carried through to the end (cf. 50:20). The final resting place of Abraham was in a portion of the Promised Land that he rightfully owned—the field that he purchased from Ephron the Hittite.

11 There are relatively few narratives devoted to the theme of "blessing" in the life of Isaac. Most are woven into the busy tapestry of ch. 26. All the more important, then, is this brief statement that God blessed Isaac, a reminder that his was the line of the divine blessing (cf. 17:21).

III. The Account of Ishmael (25:12–18)

12–18 The Isaac stories open (cf. v.11) with a final statement regarding the line of Ishmael. The statement consists of a genealogy of the twelve leaders of Ishmael's clan, a report of the length of Ishmael's life, and a report of his death. The number twelve appears again to be a deliberate attempt to set these individuals off as founders of a new and separate people (see comment on 22:20; cf. 17:20). No mention is made of the blessing of Ishmael recounted in 17:20, and we hear nothing more about him in Genesis. The descendants of Ishmael, however, continue to play a part in the Genesis narratives (28:9; 36:3; 37:27–28; 39:1).

IV. The Account of Isaac (25:19–35:29)

A. The Birth of Jacob and Esau (25:19–28)

19 The "account of Abraham's son Isaac" almost immediately turns out to be about the sons of Isaac rather than Isaac himself. Although an important link in the line of Abraham, as an individual character Isaac is given little attention (but cf. ch. 26).

20–28 Isaac, like Esau (26:34), was forty years old when he took a wife, Rebekah. Like Sarah (11:30), Rebekah was barren. Like Abraham (20:17), Isaac prayed for his wife, the Lord answered, and she bore two sons. The barrenness of both Sarah and Rebekah, as well as Rachel (29:31) and Leah (29:35), reiterates the point that the promised blessing through the chosen seed of Abraham is not to be accomplished merely by human effort. The fulfillment of the promise at each crucial juncture requires a specific act of God.

A central theme of Genesis—the struggle between brothers—occurs here in the womb of Rebekah. The conflict between brothers began with Cain and Abel and continues throughout the book (cf. 9:20–27; 13:7–12; 21:9; chs. 29–31; 37–50), perhaps stemming from the first words of judgment in the book (3:15). The point is not that the struggles were necessary for the accomplishment of the will of God but that God's will was accomplished in spite of the conflict.

Another important motif is that "the older will serve the younger." From ch. 4 the narrative has portrayed God choosing and approving the younger and the weaker through whom he would accomplish his purpose and bring about his blessing (cf. 4:1–5, 26–5:8; 17:18–19; 29:18; 37:3; 49:8). The blessing was not a natural right but was extended solely by God's grace (cf. Mal 1:1–5; Ro 9:10–13).

B. Selling the Birthright (25:29–34)

29–34 The story of Esau's rejection of his birthright is a narrative example that God's choice of Jacob over Esau did not run contrary to the wishes of either. Esau "despised" (GK 1022) his birthright, while Jacob went to great lengths to gain it. Esau, though he had the right of the firstborn, did not value it over a small bowl of stew. Thus, when in God's plan Esau lost his birthright and consequently his blessing, there was no injustice dealt him.

C. Isaac and Abimelech (26:1–35)

There are several similarities between the events of this chapter and those in the life of Abraham (12:10–20; 20:1–18). Each brief narrative of Isaac parallels a similar situation in the life of Abraham. The short span of one chapter shows how the whole life of Isaac is a retelling of what happened to Abraham. The lesson conveyed is of God's continuing faithfulness.

1–5 The present famine was not the one that forced Abraham to go to Egypt (12:10). At first we are told only that Isaac went down to Gerar to Abimelech; but in the warning Isaac received in the vision of v.2, we are informed that he was on his way to Egypt. No explanation is given why he should not go to Egypt, except that he is to "live in the land." The Lord's warning, however, became the occasion for a formal restatement of the blessing. In the face of the impending famine, the Lord promised to be with Isaac, to bless him, and to bring about all that had been promised to his father, Abraham. Essentially the same promise given to Abraham was given to Isaac. His seed would be great in number (cf. 12:2), the land would be his (12:7), and all the nations of the land would be blessed in him (12:3).

The Lord then added a remarkable note: Abraham "kept my requirements, my commands, my decrees and my laws" (cf. Dt 11:1). Did Abraham know the law? If so, how? If not, what was the meaning of the Lord's words? At several points Abraham acted in accordance with the law—particularly the law as recorded in Deuteronomy; yet he never actually had a knowledge of the law itself. For example, in ch. 14 Abraham's actions followed quite closely the stipulations of Dt 20; he obeyed the law from the heart (cf. Dt 30:6; Jer 31:33). He is the ultimate example of true obedience. Thus, Abraham, a man who lived in faith, could be described as one who kept the law.

6–11 There are several similarities between Isaac and Abraham in this section. Just as Abraham "stayed in Gerar" (20:1), so also did Isaac. Just as Abraham once devised a scheme with his wife Sarah, calling her his "sister" (20:2), so also did Isaac with Rebekah. Just as Abraham was rebuked by the Philistine king, Abimelech, for the great shame he might have brought on his people (20:9), so also was Isaac. Such similarities can hardly be coincidental. Unlike the same incident in the life of Abraham, however, it was not God who warned Abimelech not to touch Abraham's wife (20:6); Abimelech himself forbade anyone to touch Isaac's wife. It was not God who protected the wife with the threat of capital punishment (20:7); Abimelech himself said that anyone who molested Isaac or his wife "shall surely be put to death."

Though earlier Abimelech was said to have been "pure of heart" (20:6; NIV, "clear conscience"), in ch. 26 his actions alone show that his heart was right. Abimelech did not need to be warned in the dream. All that was necessary was to discover that Rebekah was not Isaac's sister; that was enough for him to fear that a great shame (NIV, "guilt") may come upon his people. Clearly the picture of the Philistine king that emerges is of a righteous, even pious, Gentile who did what was right; by contrast, Isaac is shown to be less righteous than he. A wider picture of the nations emerges here—both as wicked and deserving judgment and as righteous and capable of entering into covenant with the chosen offspring (21:27, 32; 26:28). The Philistines also caused great hardship for Isaac in the controversies over the wells (vv.14–22).

12–13 Just as Abraham prospered while sojourning among the Gentiles (12:16; 20:14), so Isaac prospered while sojourning with Abimelech. The source of Isaac's prosperity was that "the LORD blessed him." This is the second reference to Isaac's blessing, apparently to underscore the connection between Isaac's prosperity and God's promise to Abraham in 12:2. What God had promised to Abraham was fulfilled with Isaac.

14–22 Just as Abraham's prosperity became the occasion for the conflict between his shepherds and Lot's (13:5–7), so Isaac's wealth angered the Philistines. The statement that "the herdsmen of Gerar quarreled with Isaac's herdsmen" (v.20) parallels the narrative of the "quarreling" (13:7) that broke out between the herdsmen of Abram and of Lot. As the name that was given to the well—"Rehoboth"—shows, there was a progressive resolution of the conflict as Isaac continued to move away from the Philistines and dig new wells. After finding no conflict at Rehoboth, they said, "We will flourish in the land" (cf. 1:28).

23–25 Just as the Lord had spoken to Abraham after he had separated from Lot (13:14–17) and renewed his promise of land and great prosperity, so now after Isaac had returned to Beersheba, the Lord appeared and renewed the promise. For a third time it is said that the Lord would bless Isaac (vv.2, 12). Like his father (12:7; 13:3–4), Isaac responded by building an altar and worshiping God.

26–31 Earlier Abimelech, acknowledging God's presence with Abraham (21:22), sought to enter into a covenant with him. Likewise, Abimelech acknowledged the Lord's presence with Isaac and sought to enter into a covenant with him. Isaac, like Abraham, was the source of blessing to those who sought him out. Isaac, like Abraham, trusted God and lived "in peace" with his neighbors.

32–33 The final picture of Isaac here concludes with the account of the discovery of a new well "on the same day" (NIV, "that day") that Isaac had made peace with his neighbors. Consequently the writer associates the name of the city, "Beersheba" (lit., "well of the seven/oath"; cf. 21:31), with the "oath" (NIV, "[they] swore an oath").

34–35 Initially the short notice of Esau's marriage to two Hittite women seems insignificant. But as an introduction to ch. 27, it casts quite a different light on the events of that chapter. Just before the account of the mischievous blessing of Jacob, we are told that Esau, from whom the blessing was stolen, had married Hittite women and that they were a source of grief to both Isaac and Rebekah. These verses, along with vv.29–34, form the background to the central event of ch. 27, the blessing of Jacob. These preliminary notices put into perspective the cunning deed of Jacob and Rebekah and demonstrate that Esau was not fit to inherit the blessing.

D. The Stolen Blessing (27:1–40)

1–26 In recounting this story of Isaac's "blessing" (GK 1385), close attention is given to those elements that heighten the suspense and highlight the deception of Jacob. Thus Jacob's name, which means "the deceiver" (cf. v.36), has been appropriately chosen. Isaac is depicted as too old and too blind to distinguish between his two sons. Perhaps this is an attempt to ease Isaac's culpability. Isaac's insistence on a "good meal" before the blessing recalls Esau's own trading of the birthright for a pot of stew and thus casts Isaac and Esau in similar roles. Isaac's blindness makes the story more believable and more suspenseful. Thus the events of the story make sense and the suspense is real. The suspense is carried right to the end, where Jacob is shown leaving "at the same moment as" (cf. v.30) Esau returns from the hunt. The plan is in danger of not succeeding right up to the end.

27–29 The goal of Jacob's strategy was to wrest the blessing from Isaac. Although he did not appear completely convinced, in the end Isaac blessed Jacob. The theme of "blessing" points out the relationship of this narrative both to those that precede and those that follow. The promise to Abraham (12:2–3) is alluded to in the final words of the blessing.

Similarly, Isaac's blessing foreshadows Jacob's later prophecy concerning the kingship of the house of Judah (cf. 49:8). Thus the words of Isaac are a crucial link in the development of the theme of the blessing of the seed of Abraham. So too Jacob's daring scheme is a link in the chain connecting the blessing of the offspring of Abraham with the rise of kingship in the house of Judah.

30–40 The reverse side of the blessing of Jacob is the disappointment and anger of Esau. He is presented as a tragic figure, a victim of his more resourceful and daring brother. His anguish on hearing about his misfortune of losing the blessing recalls the events of 25:21–34 and his loss of the birthright. Esau lost everything, and Jacob gained it all. Within the narrative, Isaac recounted the main points of the blessing a second time, underscoring the fact that he had blessed Jacob rather than Esau. Finally, weepingly, Isaac answered Esau's pleas for a blessing with a third reiteration of the central point of Jacob's blessing: "You will serve your brother." These reiterations underscore the irretrievability of the lost blessing and hence the certainty of the fulfillment of the blessing itself.

E. Jacob's Flight From Beersheba (27:41–28:5)

27:41–28:5 Jacob's scheme not only resulted in his obtaining the blessing that Isaac had intended for Esau, it also became the occasion for Jacob's journey to the house of Laban in search of a wife. The picture of Esau at the conclusion of this story is that of a bitter, spiteful brother and son. He made plans to kill Jacob and regain by force his birthright and blessing. Again Rebekah thwarted the plans, having Isaac send Jacob back to her homeland to find a wife. As in many of the narratives of Genesis, Isaac's words of blessing to the departing Jacob precisely anticipate the eventual outcome of the ensuing story: Jacob would visit Laban "for a while," Esau's anger would subside (see ch. 33), and Jacob would find a wife and return as a great assembly of people. Within Isaac's farewell blessing is a final reiteration of the central theme of the preceding narrative: The blessing of Abraham was to rest on the family of Jacob. The promises of Abraham and the promises of Isaac were now the promises of Jacob.

F. Esau's Bitterness (28:6–9)

6–9 The final picture of Esau in this narrative is that of a bitter son seeking to spite his parents through deliberate disobedience. The marriage of Esau to the daughter of Ishmael reminds us that the promised offspring of Abraham was determined, not by the will of human beings, but by the will of God. The families of the two "older" sons (Ishmael and Esau) were united in the marriage, but neither received the blessing promised to Abraham. The families of the "younger" sons (Isaac and Jacob), however, did.

G. Jacob at Bethel (28:10–22)

10–22 Jacob, like Abraham (ch. 15), received a confirmation of the promised blessing while asleep in the night. Abraham received God's word "in a vision" (15:1), and Jacob saw the Lord in a dream. Both times a divine confirmation was given regarding the establishment of the same covenant of promise. In a remarkably similar fashion, both chapters turn to the future "exile" of Abraham's descendants and the promise of a "return." Abraham's vision looked forward to the sojourn of God's people in Egypt and also to the Lord's deliverance in the Exodus. Jacob's dream looked forward to his own sojourn in Haran and to the Lord's eventual return of Jacob to the land promised to Abraham. In both cases the promise was that God would not forsake them and would return them to their land.

The Lord's words in v.15, "I am with you and will watch over you wherever you go, and I will bring you back to this land," become the guiding principle that governs the course of the narrated events. So when Jacob returned from Laban's house after many years, he went back to the same place, Bethel, where God again blessed him and promised to give him the land he had already promised to Abraham (35:12); God also reaffirmed his promise to make Jacob's descendants into a great nation (35:11). Just as Jacob erected a "pillar" at the outset of his journey and then named the place "Bethel," so also when he returned, he erected another "pillar" and named the place "Bethel" (35:14–15). At either end of the Jacob narratives is the reminder that God was with him in all that he did and that God was faithful to his promises.

H. Jacob and Rachel (29:1–14a)

1–14a In keeping with the picture of Jacob's sojourn as an exile from the Promised Land, the account opens with the words "Jacob continued on his journey and came to the land of the eastern peoples." Jacob's journey to find a wife was similar to that of Abraham's servant who sought a wife for Isaac. In ch. 24 the words of the servant guide the narrative and show that it was God alone who directed him to the right young woman for Isaac. In this chapter Jacob is relatively silent. He does not reflect on God's guidance nor on the Lord's promise to be with him wherever he goes (28:15). It is Jacob's actions, not his words, that tell the story of God's help and guidance. First, as with the servant in ch. 24, God directs Jacob to the well where Rachel is watering her flocks.

The description of the size of the rock covering the well and the number of shepherds already on hand hint that Jacob was going to do a mighty deed. Only when all the shepherds are present are the men able to lift the rock from the well and water the flocks, because the rock was big. When Jacob saw Rachel, however, and the shepherds identified her as the daughter of Laban, he singlehandedly removed the rock and watered her sheep. Then, in a great show of emotion, Jacob kissed Rachel and cried with a loud voice. Clearly Jacob saw in these circumstances the guiding hand of God (cf. 24:27). Jacob's physical strength was perhaps meant as further evidence that God was with him and that he had not forsaken his promises (28:15; cf. 24:27).

I. Jacob's Marriages (29:14b–30)

14b–30 For the first time Jacob was the object of deception. Laban turned the tables on him. In the case of the blessing (ch. 27), Jacob was able to exchange the younger for the older, whereas here Laban reversed the trick and exchanged the older for the younger. Jacob was getting what he deserved. The seven extra years that Jacob had to serve Laban appear as a repayment for his treatment of Esau.

Jacob was indignant. But he was left speechless by Laban's reply in v.26. After that the narrative says only that Jacob conceded. Unknown to him, Laban's words had deftly expressed the very circumstances that had led Jacob on his present journey. Jacob's past had caught up with him, and he could do no more than accept the results and serve Laban seven more years. At first it had looked as if Jacob's journey was in fact following the course that Rebekah had anticipated (27:44). Thus we are not surprised to read that Jacob's first seven years of working for Laban seemed as if they were "only a few days." But with the discovery of Laban's trick, seven more years are added to Rebekah's "few days"; and Jacob's—and Rebekah's—plans begin to unravel.

J. The Birth of Jacob's Sons (29:31–30:24)

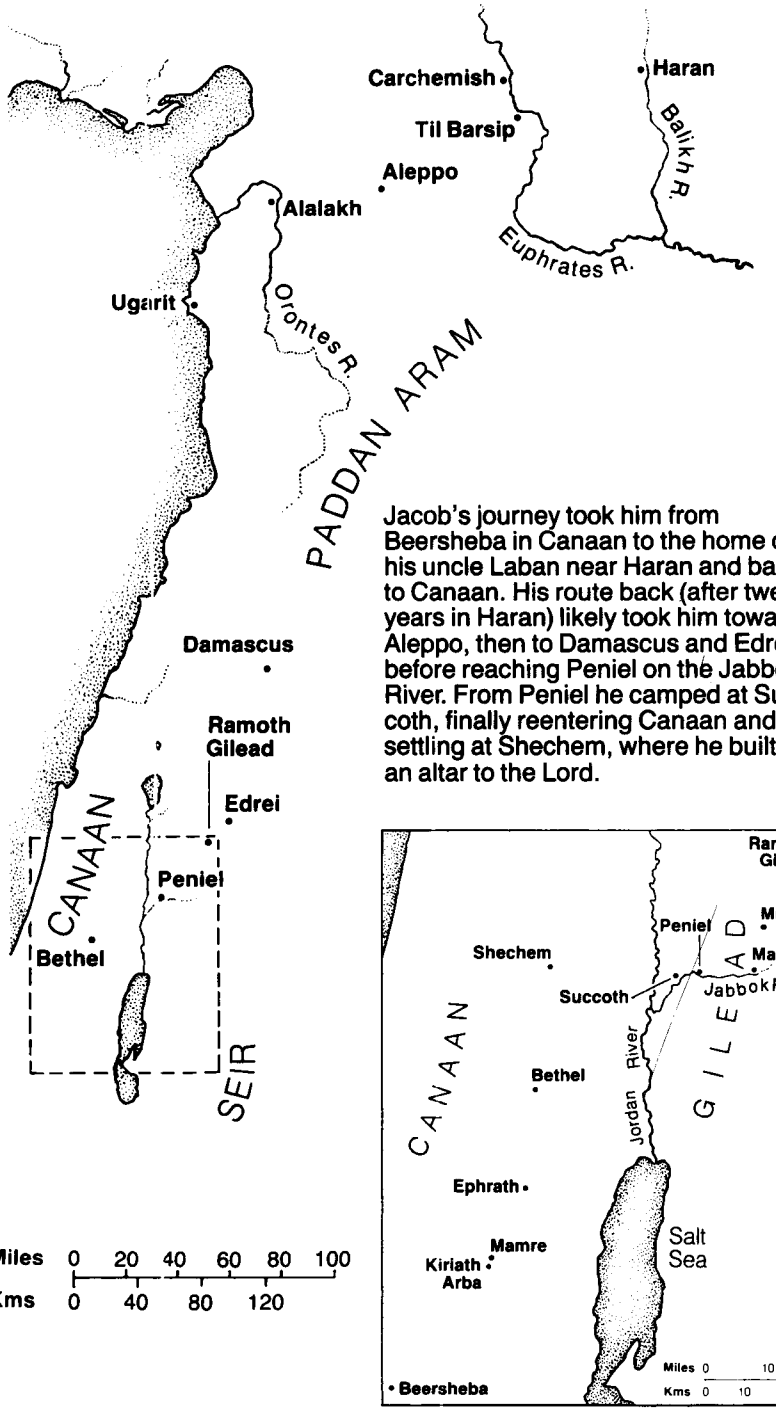
29:31–30:24 In a way that recalls the beginning of the Abrahamic narratives (11:30), the central problem is introduced: The Lord opened Leah's womb, "but Rachel was barren." It is at first surprising that the Lord was behind Rachel's barrenness. In the preceding chapter God had promised that Jacob's descendants would be more numerous than the "dust of the earth." Now Rachel, Jacob's intended wife, was barren; and it appeared to be the Lord's doing. Again Jacob's plans have come to naught. He had planned to take Rachel as his wife, but God intended him to have Leah. Jacob sought to build a family through Rachel, but she was barren; and God opened Leah's womb.

Jacob's schemes, which had brought him fortune thus far, were beginning to crumble. Schemes will not be sufficient to carry out the plans of God. Jacob too will have to depend on God to bring about the divine blessing. In the conflict that ensued between Jacob and his two wives over the birth of their sons, the pattern is set for the remainder of the narratives in Genesis. One of Leah's sons was Judah, while Rachel was the mother of Joseph.

Though all twelve sons are important, Joseph and Judah stand out markedly in the narratives that follow. Both are used by God in important ways, but each has a different role to play in the accomplishment of God's blessing. Here, at the beginning, it appears that ultimately Judah, the son of Leah, was given the place of preeminence. Counter to Jacob's plans, God had opened the womb of Leah and not Rachel.

In the end the Lord did hearken to Rachel, and her son Joseph was born (30:22). But as Jacob's words to Rachel underscore, God had withheld sons from Rachel so that the descendants of Abraham would be built from Leah (30:2). Even after Leah had ceased bearing children, she managed to have two more sons and a daughter by Jacob. Just as Jacob had purchased the birthright for a pot of stew (25:29–34), so also Leah purchased the right to more children by Jacob with the mandrakes of her son Reuben. All the conflict and tension that existed between Joseph and his brothers—and particularly Joseph and Judah—in the narratives that follow are anticipated and foreshadowed here.

JACOB'S JOURNEYS



Jacob's journey took him from Beersheba in Canaan to the home of his uncle Laban near Haran and back to Canaan. His route back (after twenty years in Haran) likely took him toward Aleppo, then to Damascus and Edrei before reaching Peniel on the Jabbok River. From Peniel he camped at Succoth, finally reentering Canaan and settling at Shechem, where he built an altar to the Lord.

K. Jacob and Laban's Sheep (30:25–43)

25–43 After the account of the birth of the sons, we have the first mention of Jacob's departure from Haran. Laban, seeking the Lord's blessing on behalf of Jacob, attempted to settle his account for the work Jacob had done for him over the years. So Laban asked Jacob to name his wages. Laban's offer apparently contained a request that Jacob stay on with him and continue to watch over his herds. Jacob struck a bargain with Laban that resulted in great blessing and wealth for Jacob.

The blessing did not come from Laban; rather, it was a gift from God (cf. 14:21). What Jacob took instead was the right to stay on and shepherd Laban's flocks and to keep part of the herd that he raised. After the deal was struck, Jacob was to keep all the speckled or spotted goats and all the black sheep. From this he would build his own herds.

The passage is surely to be read as an example of the Lord's promise in ch. 28 to be with Jacob during his sojourn in the East. Jacob's clever use of the peeled poplar branches was not so much intended to demonstrate his resourcefulness as it was to further the theme of God's continued faithfulness to his word. The clue to the meaning of the passage is in v.43, where a summary of the whole narrative is given. The summary recalls quite clearly God's blessing of both Abraham (12:16) and Isaac (26:14); it thus puts the events of this chapter within the larger context of the themes developed throughout the book, namely, God's promise of blessing and his faithfulness to that promise. Jacob's wise dealings with Laban then are an example of the way God caused him to prosper during this sojourn. Further confirmation that such is the sense of the narrative comes from the words of Jacob himself in the next chapter. Looking back he told his wives that it was God who had taken Laban's herds and given them to him (31:9).

L. Jacob's Flight From Laban (31:1–21)

1–3 Just as Isaac's wealth had made the Philistines jealous (26:14), so Jacob learned that Laban was now angry and jealous of his wealth. At this time the Lord also directed Jacob to return to the land of his fathers. We are again reminded of the Lord's promise to be "with" (28:15) Jacob on his journey; and thus the direction of Jacob's life again points toward Bethel, the place of the original promise.

This seems to be the middle point of the narrative and life of Jacob. He was on his way back to Bethel. Later on (32:10), when Jacob looked back at this point, he repeated the Lord's words of comfort and promise. However, instead of the promise "I will be with you," Jacob recalled God's words as "I will make you prosper" (32:10). Thus Jacob's own words offer an expansion and commentary on the sense of God's promise to be "with" him.

4–13 Jacob's words of explanation repeat the primary events of the preceding chapter. Though the events of ch. 30 give the appearance that Jacob was getting the best of Laban, from another perspective Jacob's actions are to be understood as the Lord's enabling him to be repaid for Laban's mistreatment. The events were all part of the outworking of God's plan, the plan that began with Jacob's vow at Bethel and the Lord's promise to be with him. Now even Laban's change of attitude toward Jacob and the jealousy of his sons are seen as part of the plan of God.

14–21 Jacob's wives were willing to leave their own family and go with him to the land of Canaan (cf. 24:58; Ruth 1:16). More important, they were ready to put their trust in God and seek his blessing. Despite the wives' positive response to Jacob, an ominous note is sounded about Rachel's stealing of Laban's "household gods." It is unclear whether Rachel's actions are to be viewed favorably or reveal a weakness of character. There is a similarity and contrast between Rachel's stealing her father's "household gods" when fleeing from home with her husband and Jacob's stealing his father's blessing when fleeing from home to find a wife (ch. 27). In both cases the younger stole what rightfully belonged to the elder. As we see later (v.32), Jacob did not know that Rachel had taken the gods. It is through Rachel's resourcefulness alone that Laban's prized possessions were successfully taken. In addition, Rachel's covert action is matched by Jacob's deception in departing from Laban secretly.

M. Jacob Overtaken by Laban (31:22–55)

22–42 The dispute over the stolen household gods gives an occasion for the writer to restate his central theme, which is expressed in Jacob's words to Laban in v.42: Jacob's wealth had not come through his association with Laban but through God's gracious care during Jacob's difficult sojourn.

43–55 The narrative concludes with an account of a covenant between Jacob and Laban. Just as Isaac parted ways with Abimelech by entering into a covenant (26:28–31), so also Jacob and Laban parted ways with a covenant.

N. Jacob's Meeting With Angels (32:1–2)

1–2 The events of this chapter are couched between two accounts of Jacob's encounter with angels (vv.1, 25). Jacob's meeting with angels on his return to the land recalls a similar picture of the Promised Land in the early chapters of Genesis, when the land was guarded on its eastern borders by angels (3:24). It can hardly be accidental that as Jacob returned from the east, he was met by angels at the border of the Promised Land. This brief notice may be a clue to the meaning of Jacob's later wrestling with the "man" at Peniel (vv.25–30), who too may have been an angel.

O. Messengers Sent to Esau (32:3–22)

3–12 The emphasis of this chapter and the next is on the wealth of Jacob and the restoration of Jacob and Esau. Much suspense surrounds Jacob's reunion with his brother, Esau. Like Jacob, we are not sure of Esau's intentions in gathering four hundred men to meet Jacob on his return. The last we heard from Esau, his intention was to slay Jacob in revenge for the stolen blessing (27:41). Jacob's fear that Esau had now come to do just that seems well founded. In light of this, Jacob's prayer plays a crucial role in reversing the state of affairs. Jacob prayed for safety and then appealed to the covenant promises God had made earlier.

13–22 True to form, Jacob made elaborate plans to save himself and his family in the face of Esau's potential threat. He provided his servants with abundant gifts for Esau and instructed them carefully on how to approach Esau when they met. In it all his desire was to "pacify" Esau and deliver his family from his hand. Again we see Jacob the planner and the schemer. As he had taken Esau's birthright and blessing, as he had taken the best of Laban's herds, so now he had a plan to pacify Esau. However, it was not Jacob's plan that succeeded but his prayer. When he met with Esau, he found that Esau had had a change of heart. Running to meet Jacob, Esau embraced and kissed him and wept (33:4). Jacob's plans and schemes had come to naught, for God had prepared the way.

P. Jacob's Wrestling Match (32:23–32)

23–32 Jacob's wrestling with an angel epitomizes the whole of Jacob's life. He had struggled with his brother (chs. 25, 27), his father (ch. 27), and his father-in-law (chs. 29–31), and now he struggles with God (ch. 32). Jacob's own words express the substance of these narratives about him: "I will not let you go unless you bless me." Here is a graphic picture of Jacob struggling for the blessing—struggling with God and with a man (v.28).

Significantly, Jacob emerges victorious in his struggle. His victory, even in his struggle with God, came when the angel "blessed him." The importance of the name "Peniel" is that it identifies the one with whom Jacob was wrestling as God. Jacob's remark that he had seen God face to face did not necessarily mean that the "man" he wrestled with was in fact God. Rather, when one saw the "angel of the LORD," it was appropriate to say that he had seen the face of God (e.g., Jdg 13:22; but cf. Hos 12:2–4).

Q. Jacob's Meeting With Esau (33:1–17)

1–17 When Jacob saw Esau and the four hundred men approaching, he divided his entourage again (cf. 32:7–8). He showed his preference for Rachel and Joseph by putting them last. Esau's greeting was totally unexpected. Jacob had expected revenge from Esau, or, if not revenge, then heavy bargaining and appeasement. But, seemingly in response to Jacob's prayer (cf. 32:11), Esau had had a change of heart.

The change in Esau is depicted graphically in the contrast between Jacob's fearful approach and Esau's eager excitement to see his brother. All of Jacob's plans and preparations pale in the light of Esau's joy. Ironically, the four hundred men accompanying Esau turned out not to be for battle with Jacob's household and for taking his spoils, but for safeguarding the final stage of Jacob's journey. Once again Jacob is portrayed as one who has gone to great lengths to secure his own well-being but whose efforts have proved pointless. Jacob continued to scheme and plan; yet God's own plans ultimately made Jacob's worthless.

This reconciliation of the brothers and Esau's partaking of the blessing that Jacob had received (v.11) picture the ultimate fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham: "All peoples on earth will be blessed through you" (12:3).

R. Jacob at Shechem (33:18–34:31)

33:18–20 These last verses form a transition in the narrative between Jacob's sojourn in the east and the events of the later years of his life in the land of Canaan. As he left Canaan in ch. 28, Jacob vowed that if God would be with him and watch over him so that he returned to the land "in peace" (NIV, "safely" GK 8969), he would give to God a tenth of all he had (28:20–22). The narrative has been careful to follow the events in Jacob's life that have shown the Lord's faithfulness to this vow. Thus Jacob returned "safely" to the land of Canaan. God had been faithful.

Jacob returned to Bethel in ch. 35 and built an altar there (v.7). No mention is made of Jacob's giving a "tenth" to the Lord. But perhaps the erection of an altar here and in ch. 35, along with the offerings, represented his "tenth." It may be also that the "hundred pieces of silver" represent a part of that "tenth." The portion of land purchased by Jacob plays an important role in the later biblical narratives. This was the land where the Israelites buried the bones of Joseph (Jos 24:32) and thus represented their hope in God's ultimate fulfillment of his promise of the land.

34:1 The birth of Dinah was recorded without much comment in 30:21. But once Jacob and his descendants had departed from Paddan Aram and settled in the vicinity of Shechem (vv.18–20), Dinah became the center of the conflict between Jacob and the inhabitants of Canaan. The point of the narrative is to reiterate the portrait of Jacob that has been central throughout these stories: he was a man who planned and schemed for what appears to be his own ends, but who in the end actually accomplished God's purposes. In the present narrative God's purpose in setting apart the descendants of Abraham comes into jeopardy with the proposal of marriage between Dinah and Shechem. Twice we are informed that the purpose of the marriage was that the family of Jacob should become "one people" (vv.16, 22) with the inhabitants of Canaan. This runs counter to Abraham's admonition (24:3), Rebekah's fear (27:46), and Isaac's command (28:1).

While the story operates at a level of family honor and brotherly concern for a ravished sister, it nevertheless also carries along the theme that God works through and often in spite of the limited, self-serving plans of human beings.

2–4 Though the Hivite son genuinely loved Dinah, the point is that he lay with her, apparently against her will, and thus humiliated her. Simeon and Levi's final words express clearly how they viewed the situation: "Should he have treated our sister like a prostitute?" (v.31).

5–24 Jacob was curiously silent about the incident. When he heard what had happened to Dinah, he waited for the return of his sons. The reason behind Jacob's silence is not clear at the beginning of the story. It is significant that it was the sons of Jacob, not Jacob himself, who carried out the deception; and at the end of the story Jacob admonished his sons for their actions. The plans and schemes no longer were Jacob's; they were the plans and schemes of his sons. Jacob's last words to Simeon and Levi concerning the events of this chapter were very harsh: "Let me not enter their council, let me not join their assembly, for they have killed men in their anger. . . . Cursed be their anger, so fierce, and their fury, so cruel!" (49:6–7).

That Simeon and Levi had a plan of deception to repay the offense is suggested in the report of their anger at hearing the news of Dinah. The bitterness of their anger shows that they would not let such an act go unpunished. In ch. 17 the rite of circumcision was to be a sign (v.11) of the unity of the covenant people and their separation from the rest of the nations. Circumcision was not limited to Abraham's descendants but was rather given as a sign of one's joining in the hope of God's promises to Abraham. It was, in fact, a sign given of the covenant promise that Abraham would become the father of "many nations" (17:5). But in the way the sons of Jacob carried out the request that these Canaanites be circumcised, it offers a curious reversal of God's intention. They offered circumcision as a means for the two families to become "one people." The Canaanites were not joining the offspring of Abraham; rather, the descendants of Abraham were joining with the Canaanites. This point is stressed in Hamor and Shechem's report to their countrymen: "Won't their livestock, their property and all their other animals become ours?"

25–31 When the sons of Jacob carried out their deception to the end, their actions did not go unrebuked. Jacob's words in v.30 express his final judgment on their actions. That the sons' reply stands as the last words of the narrative shows that their motive had not been mere plunder but the honor of their sister.

S. Jacob's Return to Bethel (35:1–15)

1–5 The chapter opens with a reference back to the appearance of the Lord to Jacob at Bethel (28:10–15). As Jacob had once fled to Bethel to escape the anger of his brother Esau, so now the Lord has told Jacob to return to Bethel and dwell there in the face of the trouble that his two sons, Simeon and Levi, had stirred up. When Jacob obeyed and went to Bethel, the Lord delivered him from the anger of the Canaanites who dwelt nearby. It is significant that Jacob called God the one "who answered me in the day of my distress and who has been with me wherever I have gone." That epithet is a fitting summary of the picture of God that has emerged from the Jacob narratives. Jacob was in constant distress; yet in each instance God remained faithful to his promise and delivered him.

The only previous mention of the "gods" that Jacob's household might have had is the "household gods" (31:19) that Rachel stole from her father. These may be included in the term "foreign gods"; but in light of the fact that the writer mentions that they buried the "rings in their ears" along with these "foreign gods," it is likely that Jacob's household had picked up other religious objects while living in Shechem. The point is that Jacob and his family were leaving such things behind and purifying themselves in preparation for their journey to Bethel.

6–15 The arrival at Bethel marked the end of Jacob's journey and the final demonstration of the faithfulness of God. He had been with Jacob throughout his journey, and now Jacob had returned to Bethel in safety. As Abraham and Isaac had done on numerous occasions, Jacob built an altar and named it in commemoration of the Lord's appearing to him there when he left for Haran (cf. 28:10–22). In response the Lord appeared again to Jacob and "blessed him." For a second time Jacob's name was changed to "Israel" (cf. 32:28). The point of the second renaming was to give the name "Israel" a more neutral or even positive connotation. It does so by removing the notion of "struggle" associated with the wordplay in 32:28 and letting it stand in a positive light, contrasting it with the name "Jacob," a name frequently associated throughout these narratives with Jacob's deceptions. Jacob's successive names reveal his standing before God.

The importance of God's words to Jacob in vv.11–12 cannot be overemphasized. First, God's words recall clearly the primeval blessing of Creation (1:28) and hence show God to be still "at work" in bringing about the blessing to all humanity through Jacob. Second, for the first time since 17:16, the mention is made of royalty in the promised line. Third, the promise of the land, first given to Abraham and then to Isaac, was renewed here with Jacob. Thus within these brief words several major themes come together. The primeval blessing of humankind was renewed through the promise of a royal offspring and the gift of the land.

In the course of the narrative, this section represents a major turning point and thematic focus. Two lines that have thus far run parallel are about to converge, and out of them both will emerge a single theme. Jacob has two wives, each representing a possible line through which the promise will be carried on. Just as Abraham had two sons and only one was the son of promise, and just as Isaac had two sons and only one was the son of the blessing, so now Jacob, though he has twelve sons, has two wives (Leah and Rachel), and each has a son (Judah and Joseph) who can rightfully contend for the blessing. As the Jacob narratives have already anticipated, in the end it was Judah, the son of Leah, not Joseph, the son of Rachel, who gained the blessing (49:8–12).

T. Benjamin's Birth and Rachel's Death (35:16–20)

16–20 Rachel, Joseph's mother and Jacob's favorite wife, died giving birth to her second son, Benjamin. The account of the birth of this youngest son is separated from the rest of the sons in 29:32–30:24, but it follows closely on that passage. The last son to have been born was Rachel's first son, Joseph. At the time of his birth, Rachel had said, "May the LORD add to me another son" (30:24). Apparently looking back to that request, Rachel's midwife said, "Don't be afraid, for you have another son." As she was about to die, Rachel named the son "Ben-Oni," meaning "son of my trouble." Jacob, however, making a wordplay on "Oni," which can mean either "trouble" or "wealth," named him "Benjamin" (lit., "son of my right hand"), reinterpreting the name given by Rachel to mean "son of my wealth or good fortune."

The site of Rachel's burial, Ephrath, was clearly identified with the city of Bethlehem, an important place in biblical history (cf. 1Sa 17:12; Mic 5:2). This site is further identified by the pillar that Jacob set up to mark Rachel's grave (cf. 1Sa 10:2). This passage continued to play an important role in later biblical texts (cf. 48:7; Jer 31:15; Mic 5:2; Mt 2:18).

U. The Sons of Jacob (35:21–26)

21–26 Because of their horrendous conduct, the three oldest sons of Jacob fell from favor. The writer has already recounted the violence of Simeon and Levi (ch. 34); now he briefly notes the misconduct of Reuben. As the list that follows shows, the next brother in line was Judah, the son of Leah. With the older sons out of the way, the stage is set for the development of the lines of Judah and Joseph, which continues throughout much of the rest of the OT. The Genesis narratives that follow are devoted primarily to Joseph, but that is no indication of the final outcome. The last word regarding the future of these two lines of Abraham's descendants is not heard until chs. 48 and 49.

V. The Death of Isaac (35:27–29)

27–29 The end of the Jacob narratives is marked by the death of his father, Isaac. This notice is not simply to record Isaac's death but to show the complete fulfillment of God's promise to Jacob (28:21). According to Jacob's vow, he had asked that God watch over him during his sojourn and return him safely to the house of his father. Thus the conclusion of the narrative marks the final fulfillment of these words as Jacob returned to the house of his father, Isaac, before he died.

V. The Account of Esau (36:1–43)

1–8 The separation of Jacob and Esau is cast in the same form as the separation of Abraham and Lot (ch. 13). The possessions of the two brothers were too great, and the land was not able to sustain both of them (cf. 13:6); so just as Lot parted from Abraham and went eastward, so Esau parted from Jacob and went to Seir. The heirs of the promise remained in the land, and the other sons moved eastward. The parting of ways was beneficial to both Jacob and Esau.

In the remainder of this chapter, the writer shows the progress and well-being of the line of Esau. He is particularly careful to note that Esau is, in fact, "Edom" (GK 121). The repeated identification of Esau as "that is, Edom" throughout the chapter prepares us for the future importance of Edom during Israel's later history.

9–19 The unusually long "genealogy" of Esau is made up of several smaller lists. The first list, of the sons of Esau, is largely dependent on the brief narratives regarding Esau's wives (26:34; 28:9; 36:3). Verse 10 divides the sons of Esau into two groups: the sons of Adah and the sons of Basemath. Adah's sons (and grandsons) are listed in vv.11–12, then Basemath's in v.13, and finally Oholibamah's in v.14. Verses 15–19 list the tribal "chiefs" of the sons of Esau, beginning with the eldest,

Eliphaz, and again grouped according to their mothers. The term "chief" (GK 477) is used in the Bible only for the tribal leaders of Edom, with the exception of Zec 12:5–6, where it is also used of the leaders of Judah. Outside the Bible the word refers to the leaders of foreign nations. The title then would have denoted primarily a political or military function.

20–30 To the two above lists is added a list of "the sons of Seir the Horite, who were living in the region," and then a list of their tribal "chiefs." Seir is ordinarily the name of the geographical territory occupied by the Edomites, but here it refers to an individual. He and his descendants are listed here because they occupied the territory of Edom. In 2Ch 25:11, 14, the "sons of Seir" are called "Edomites." The list identifies Seir as a "Horite," which earlier commentators interpreted as "cave dwellers"—deriving the sense from the similarity of the word "Horite" to the Hebrew word meaning "cave."

31–43 The list of Edomite kings is introduced by the heading, "These were the kings who reigned in Edom before any Israelite king reigned." This presupposes a knowledge of the kingship in Israel, or at least an anticipation of the kingship. Thus it is a part of those texts (e.g., 17:6, 16; 35:11) that look forward to the promises of Ge 49:10; Nu 24:7, 17–18; and Dt 17:14–20 (cf. 1Sa 2:10).

The chapter closes with a final list of the tribal "chiefs" of Esau's clan. Several names in this list overlap with those in vv.10–14.

VI. The Account of Jacob (37:1–49:33)

A. Jacob in the Land (37:1)

1 Jacob is back in the Land of Promise but is still dwelling there as a sojourner, like his father (and grandfather) before him (cf. Heb 11:13). As his ancestors, he was awaiting the fulfillment of the promises of God. The verse is a fitting transition to the narratives that trace the course of events by which the sons of Jacob left the Land of Promise and entered the land of Egypt. According to 25:11 Jacob's father, Isaac, dwelt in Beer Lahai Roi, which evidently is where Jacob lived at this time.

B. Joseph's Dreams (37:2–11)

2–3a The formal title "This is the account of Jacob" obscures teh fact that the remaining narrative is not about Jacob but about Joseph and, later, Judah. Joseph, at seventeen years of age, is (along with his brothers) a shepherd of his father's sheep. He is only a young lad compared with his other brothers. We are told that Joseph brought a "bad [GK 8273] report" about his brothers to his father and also that his father, Jacob, loved him more than the other brothers because he was the son born to him in his old age. Jacob's special love for Rachel (29:30) has carried over to that of her son, Joseph. Since the story of Joseph is filled with wordplays and reversals, it seems likely that the reference to the "bad report" foreshadows the brothers' intended "evil" (NIV, "harm"; same word in Hebrew) spoken of in 50:20.

3b–11 The "richly ornamented robe" Jacob made for Joseph illustrates the father's preferential love for Joseph. The repeated references to the coat throughout the story remind us that Joseph's preferred status was the central problem that angered his brothers and turned them against him. Eventually their anger resulted in a plan to do away with him altogether. But first, adding to their hatred, Joseph recounted two dreams, both of which end with the image of his brothers "bowing down" to him. This foreshadows the conclusion of the story where, because he is ruler of the land of Egypt, his brothers "bowed down" (42:6) to him, and Joseph "remembered his dreams about them" (42:9).

The reason for the two dreams is to be understood in light of Joseph's own words in ch. 41, where he explained to the Pharaoh that the twofold occurrence indicates that the matter has been firmly decided by God (41:32). So too here God will surely bring to pass the fulfillment of Joseph's dream. The significance of the dreams is seen in the words of Joseph's brothers: "Will you actually rule us?" This reveals the sense of the "bowing down" to be an acknowledgement of royalty and kingship. The irony of the narrative composition is that in the end such royal honor does not reside in the house of Joseph but in the house of Judah (49:10).

C. Joseph's Journey to Egypt (37:12–36)

12–18 After a minor difficulty in which he temporarily lost his way and had to seek help from a stranger, Joseph found his brothers in Dothan. The purpose of this small account can be seen by comparing it with the brief and similar prelude to the second part of the story, where he met his brothers in Egypt (chs. 42–44). The symmetry reinforces the sense that every event is providentially ordered. Here at the beginning of the Joseph story, when Joseph's brothers "saw him" approaching, they "plotted to kill him." In the same way midway through the narrative, when Joseph first "saw his brothers" in Egypt (42:7), he eluded them by disguising himself so that they did not recognize him and then planned a scheme that, at least on the surface, looked as if he intended to kill them.

19–36 Both the details of the brothers' plans and their motivation are given. Behind those plans lie Joseph's two dreams. Little did they suspect that the very plans that they were then scheming were to lead to the fulfillment of those dreams. The first plan was simply "to kill him," throw his body in a pit, and then tell their father that a "ferocious" (lit., "evil"; GK 8273) animal had eaten him. Again, the brothers punctuated their plan with a reference to Joseph's dreams in an obviously ironic statement: "We'll see what comes of his dreams" (cf. 42:9). This initial plan is interrupted by Reuben, who saved Joseph from their hands.

The reference to Reuben is countered later by a similar reference to Judah. It was not merely Reuben who saved Joseph from the plan of his brothers, but Judah also played an important role. Again we can see the central importance of Jacob's last words regarding Judah in 49:8–12. In the end it is Judah who is placed at the center of the narrative's focus on the fulfillment of the divine blessing. It is the descendants of Judah who will ultimately figure in the coming of the Promised Seed. Reuben's plan is to persuade the brothers merely to throw Joseph into a pit and, apparently, leave him to die. His actual plan, however, was to return later and rescue Joseph. Reuben's plan was partly successful. The brothers threw Joseph into the pit alive and left him there. The reference to Joseph's coat highlights the central point of the story, that the present plan is part of a larger divine plan foreshadowed in Joseph's dreams.

An important turn of events occurs with the arrival of the "Ishmaelites." They become the occasion for Judah to enter the story with the suggestion that the brothers could "sell [Joseph] to the Ishmaelites." Only a cursory account of Joseph's fate follows in the text. The Ishmaelites, who are also called "Midianites" in this narrative, arrive, and Joseph is sold to them for twenty shekels. They then take him to Egypt with them.

When the focus of the narrative returns to Reuben and to the outcome of his plan to deal with Joseph, ironically it serves only to underscore the role of Judah in the actual rescue of Joseph. Verse 29 suggests that Reuben had no part in the plan to sell Joseph to the Ishmaelites. He returned to the pit, expecting to find Joseph there and to rescue him, but Joseph was not there. He was surprised and angry that Joseph was gone. Thus in no uncertain terms we learn that it was Judah, not Reuben, who saved the life of Joseph. Ultimately the brothers must fall back on their original plan of telling their father that a "ferocious" (lit., "evil") animal had killed Joseph.

Once again the coat provides the narrative link in the story. The symbol of the brothers' original hatred for Joseph becomes the means of the father's recognition of his loss. In the end the blood-stained coat is all that remains of Joseph; on seeing it Jacob tore off his own coat and exchanged it for sackcloth. Thus Jacob's own fate and that of his sons are briefly sketched out in this opening narrative. What happens to Joseph foreshadows all that will happen to the sons of Jacob. They will be carried down into Egypt and will be put into slavery. In this sense, then, Jacob's final words set the focus of the narratives to follow: "in mourning will I go down to the grave [Sheol] to my son." Ironically, the Joseph narratives conclude with Jacob's going down (46:3–4) to Egypt to see his son and then to die (50:24–26).

D. Judah and Tamar (38:1–30)

1–11 The narrative of ch. 38 has only a loose connection with the Joseph story. The first verse notes only that these events occurred "at that time." Without this remark we would have little basis for relating these events to the story of Joseph. In the overall strategy of the book, however, this chapter plays a crucial role.

The narrative begins with the mention of three sons (cf. the three sons of Adam, Noah, and Terah). Two sons died because of the evil they did. The point of this introductory information is to show that the continuation of the house of Judah lay in Judah's hands. The narrative that follows shows that he does nothing to further his own household. It takes the "righteousness" (GK 7405) of the woman Tamar (v.26) to preserve the seed of Judah. The story is much like the other patriarchal narratives outside the story of Joseph, which show the promised offspring in jeopardy and the patriarch showing little concern for its preservation. Just as in ch. 20, where the seed of Abraham was protected by the "righteous" (NIV, "innocent") Abimelech, here it is the woman Tamar, not Judah the patriarch, who is ultimately responsible for the survival of the descendants of the house of Judah.

The text is not clear from whose house Jacob originally took Tamar for his son's wife. Since we are told that Judah's own wife was a Canaanite, had Tamar also been a Canaanite, a similar statement presumably would have been mentioned. Since she was likely not a Canaanite, this introduction shows another point at which the promise to Abraham was in jeopardy. By marrying the daughter of a Canaanite, Judah had realized the worst fears of Abraham (24:3) and Isaac (28:1); so the promise regarding the descendants of Abraham and Isaac was in danger of being unfulfillable. Through Tamar's clever plan, however, the seed of Abraham was preserved by not being allowed to continue through the sons of the Canaanite, the daughter of Shua. The line was continued through Judah and Tamar. The genealogy at the close of the narrative underscores this point.

12–26 Tamar's plan resembles that of Jacob and Rebekah (ch. 27). Through a disguise she obtained a part in the blessing of the firstborn. In so doing, just as with Jacob and Rebekah, she obtained what the patriarch should have rightfully given. Shelah, the son of Judah, was of age, and Tamar should have been given to him as a wife. Thus, in the end, the continuation of the line of Judah was not due to the righteous actions of the patriarch Judah, but lay in the hands of the "righteous" Tamar.

27–30 The whole of the Jacob narratives reaches a fitting summary in this brief account of the birth of the two sons Perez and Zerah. As the Jacob narrative began with an account of the struggle of twins (25:22), so now the conclusion of the Jacob narrative is marked by a similar struggle. In both cases the struggle resulted in a reversal of the right of the firstborn and the right of the blessing. The result of both struggles was that the younger gained the upper hand over the elder. As Jacob struggled with Esau and overcame him, so Perez overcame Zerah, the elder, and gained the right of the firstborn (cf. Nu 26:20, where Perez is regarded as the firstborn). The brevity and austerity with which the narrative is recounted leaves the impression that the meaning of the passage is self-evident to the reader. Indeed, coming as it does on the heels of a long series of reversals in which the younger gains the upper hand over the elder, its sense is transparent.

E. Joseph in the House of Potiphar (39:1–23)

1 Fully conscious of the intervening Judah narrative, the text resumes the account of Joseph, taking up where ch. 37 left off. As in 37:27, those who have brought Joseph into Egypt are called "Ishmaelites," while in 37:28, 36, they are known as "Midianites."

2–6 Verse 2 establishes the overall theme of the narrative: "The LORD was with Joseph and he prospered." Verses 3–6 relate the theme to the specific series of events to follow: Joseph's blessing from the Lord is recognized by his Egyptian master, and Joseph is put in charge of his household. Joseph's sojourn in Egypt, like that of his father, Jacob (30:27), has resulted in an initial fulfillment of the Abrahamic promise that "all peoples on earth will be blessed [GK 1385] through you" (12:3). Thus we are told that "the LORD blessed [GK 1385] the house of the Egyptian because of Joseph." Such a thematic introduction alerts the reader to the underlying lessons intended throughout the narrative. This is not a story of the success of Joseph; rather, it is a story of God's faithfulness to his promises. The last note about Joseph in this introductory section sets the stage for what follows.

7–20 This story about Joseph reverses a well-known plot in the patriarchal narratives. Whereas before it was the beautiful wife (12:11; 26:7) of the patriarch who was sought by the foreign ruler, now it was Joseph, the handsome patriarch himself who was sought by the wife of the foreign ruler. Whereas in the earlier narratives it was either the Lord (12:17; 20:3) or the moral purity of the foreign ruler (26:10) that rescued the wife, rather than the patriarch, here it was Joseph's own moral courage that saved the day. Whereas in the preceding narratives, the focus had been on God's faithfulness in fulfilling his covenant promises, in the story of Joseph attention is turned to the human response.

Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob repeatedly fell short of God's expectations, though, of course, they continued to have faith in God. Joseph, however, is a striking example of one who always responds in total trust and obedience to the will of God. The Joseph narratives give expression to that part of the promise found in 18:19: "that they may do righteousness and justice so that the LORD may fulfill what he has promised to Abraham" (pers. tr.). There was a human part to be played in the fulfillment of God's plan. When God's people respond as Joseph responded, then their way and God's blessing will prosper. Significantly, in all the book of Genesis only Joseph is described as one who was filled with the Spirit of God (41:38). In fact, the narrative is explicit in its emphasis on his total uprightness throughout the attempted seduction by the Egyptian's wife. He was in jail because of false witness brought against him.

21–23 The emphasis of the epilogue is clear. God has turned an intended evil against Joseph into a good. God was with Joseph and prospered his way. Lying behind the course of events is the lesson that all the Joseph narratives teach: "You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good" (50:20). Like Daniel during the Exile, Joseph suffered for doing what was right, but God turned the evil into a blessing.

F. Joseph in Jail (40:1–23)

1–23 Chapter 40 represents an intermediate stage in the development of the plot of the Joseph story. Joseph had been cast into jail and had risen to a position of prominence there. Apparently Joseph's position was responsible for his being assigned to wait on the two incarcerated royal officials. They each had a dream that Joseph correctly interpreted, but ultimately to no avail, since the surviving official soon forgot the matter. Later, when the Pharaoh himself had a dream, the butler remembered the events of this chapter and told the king about Joseph. The picture of Joseph that comes through these events is of one who, like Daniel, is an interpreter of dreams and mysteries. He discerns the course of future events that to others lies in total darkness.

The sense of the cupbearer's dream may seem self-evident, but as the sense of the baker's dream shows, such apparently self-evident meanings are by no means certain. Who could, on the face of it, discern between the meanings of the two dreams? One is favorable and the other is not. There is clearly more to the dreams than a plain reading of each would suggest. The picture of Joseph that emerges from this narrative is precisely that which the Pharaoh himself later expresses: Joseph is "one in whom is the spirit of God" (41:38). Joseph knows the interpretations of dreams, which, in his own words, "belong to God" (40:8). He is set apart from all those who have preceded him in the book. He is "discerning and wise" (41:39), and "things turned out exactly as he interpreted them" (41:13). Whereas Abraham was a "prophet" (20:7), Joseph is a "wiseman" (cf. 41:39). Whereas Abraham sees the course of future events "in a vision" (15:1), Joseph discerns (41:39) the course of the future in the mysterious dreams of others.

G. Joseph's Interpretation of Pharaoh's Dreams (41:1–36)

The central theme of ch. 41 is expressed by Joseph in v.32: "The matter has been firmly decided by God, and God will do it soon." "Two" dreams with the same meaning show that God will certainly bring about what was foreseen in the dreams. In the previous chapter the "two" officials of the king each had a dream. One dream was good, the other bad. The dreams and their interpretations are repeated twice, once in the narrative of ch. 40 and then again by the cupbearer before the Pharaoh in vv.9–13. After "two years" the king himself had "two" dreams; one part of each dream was good (v.29) and the other bad (vv.27, 30). Within the narrative, each dream is repeated twice, once by the writer and again by Pharaoh. Such symmetry in human events is evidence of a divine work.

1–8 Pharaoh's two dreams are more transparent than those of the two officials. The sense of the two dreams can be seen in the elements of the dream. Seven good cows and seven good heads of grain are seven good years. Seven ugly cows and seven blighted heads of grain are seven bad years to follow. To show that the dreams' simplicity conceals rather than reveals their meaning, the writer tells us that all the king's magicians and wise men were unable to give their meaning (cf. Dan 2:4–12). Joseph not only had to forecast from the dreams what was to happen, but, more important, he advised Pharaoh how to prepare for what was to come. Joseph's wisdom in dealing with the situation forecast in the dreams is portrayed as of equal importance to the interpretation of the dreams. His wisdom consisted more in planning and administration than in a knowledge of secret mysteries.

9–13 Though the cupbearer had forgotten about Joseph, he now recalled that Joseph's interpretation had stood the test of time. As it turns out, even the cupbearer's forgetfulness worked in Joseph's favor since just at the opportune moment he remembered Joseph and recounted his wisdom before the king. By drawing the reader's attention to the events of the previous passage, both the wisdom of Joseph and the sovereign workings of God are emphasized. Joseph's wisdom is highlighted by the fact that in contrast to the wise men of Egypt, the interpretation of Joseph, "a young Hebrew," proved true. God's sovereign power is highlighted in the fact that though the cupbearer did forget Joseph at the time, he remembered just at the right moment and thus served as the means for Joseph's ultimate rise to power.

14–36 When the Pharaoh repeated the dreams, he added only two major parts—the comments about the ugly cows and these cows looking just as "ugly" (lit., "evil"; GK 8273) after they ate the good cows as before. In both cases the repetition seems to stress the "evil" of the appearance of the cows in contrast with the "good" cows of the first group.

The emphasis on the "good" and "evil" represents Joseph's ability to distinguish between the "good" and the "evil." It is clear that ultimately such knowledge comes only from God (v.39). Thus the lesson of the early chapters of Genesis is artfully repeated in these last chapters. In light of such considerations, it can hardly be accidental that Joseph's plan seemed "good" to the Pharaoh and all his servants.

H. Joseph's Exaltation Over Egypt\ (41:37–57)

37–57 The account of the king's appointment of Joseph over all his kingdom presents a picture of Joseph that recalls Adam in Ge 1. Just as Adam was dependent on God for his knowledge of "good and evil," so Joseph also is portrayed here in the same terms. Just as Adam is made God's "vicegerent" to rule over all the land, so Joseph is portrayed here as the Pharaoh's "vicegerent" over all his land. As Adam was made in God's image to rule over all the land, so the king here gave Joseph his "signet ring" and dressed him in royal garments. Just as God provided a wife for Adam in the garden and gave the man all the land for his enjoyment, so the king gave a wife to Joseph and put him over all the land.

At many points in the story, Joseph appears to be represented as an "ideal" of what a truly wise and faithful man is like. He is a model of the ideal man, the ideal king. He accomplishes all that Adam failed to do. The story of Joseph is a reflection of what might have been had Adam remained obedient to God and trusted him for the "good." At the same time the picture of Joseph anticipates what might yet be, if only God's people would, like Joseph, live in complete obedience and trust in God. The picture of Joseph, then, looks back to Adam, but even more looks forward to one who was yet to come, the one from the house of Judah to whom the kingdom belongs (cf. 49:10). Thus the tension between the houses of Joseph and Judah is resolved by making the life of Joseph into a picture of the one who is to reign from the house of Judah.

I. Joseph's Brothers in Egypt (42:1–28)

The preceding chapter recorded Joseph's rise to power. The present chapter turns to the divine purpose behind his miraculous rise.

1–2 The narrative returns to Jacob, who has been out of the picture since 37:34. As so frequently in biblical narratives, the words spoken at the beginning of a story foreshadow the outcome. Jacob, sending his sons to Egypt, said, "Go down there . . . so that we may live and not die" (cf. 45:5).

3–13 The "twelve" sons of Jacob are divided into two groups throughout the narrative. There are the "ten of Joseph's brothers" and then the "two" sons of Jacob by Rachel—Joseph and Benjamin. These two sons are contrasted with the two sons of Leah—Reuben and Judah. Both Reuben and Judah play an important and similar role in the narrative. They speak on behalf of the other brothers and are the catalysts in the resolution of the plots instigated by Joseph. It was Judah, however, who saved the day by offering himself as a pledge for the young lad Benjamin; and it was Judah who repeated Jacob's own thematic words "that we and you and our children may live and not die" (43:8; cf. 42:2). Finally, it was Judah who spoke before Joseph and offered himself as a substitute for Benjamin, lest he cause any evil to come on his father, Jacob (44:33–34).

Throughout the narrative the plot is woven around the interplay between Joseph and Judah, and in the end it is Judah who resolved the conflict. By the same token it is Joseph who created the conflict and tension throughout the narrative. When his brothers approached him to buy grain, he "pretended to be a stranger" and spoke harshly, accusing them of being spies. Verse 9 reveals that Joseph's schemes and plans against his brothers were motivated by the dreams of the earlier narratives and not by the things his brothers had done to him.

In response to Joseph's accusation that they were spies, the brothers defended their integrity by saying, "Your servants are twelve brothers"; but lest their integrity be gainsaid, they were forced to add: "and one is no more." Joseph's schemes have provoked the first hint that their evil deed accomplished long past may yet rise up against them. When the brothers recounted this event to their father (v.32), they reported their own words in a different order than that of the narrative in v.13. Here they mentioned first the "one who is no more"; but when they tell their father about Joseph's accusations and their response, they mention last the "one [who] is no more" and then tell of Benjamin who is home with their father. Though subtle, such a reversal suggests that the memory of what they did to Joseph was beginning to rub on their consciences.

Another reminder that reveals Joseph's motives in perplexing his brothers is the conclusion they draw from his trick of having their money returned to them in their grain sacks. When they saw their money, they asked, "What is this that God has done to us?" (v.28). However they might have meant it, their words have a ring of truth about them. Though we know it was Joseph who had had the money put back into their sacks, their words point us to the work of God, confirming the direction the narrative as a whole appears to be taking.

14–24 Joseph devised two plans to test his brothers. The first was that "one" of the brothers should return for the youngest and the rest remain in prison. After three days the second plan was announced; "one" of the brothers was to remain behind and the others were to return to get the youngest. The focus is on the "one" brother who rescues the others. Within the narrative this "one" brother appears to be an echo of the "one [who] is no more." No wonder, then, that the brothers' own conclusion is that their present distress has been caused by the distress that they had brought on Joseph. When they begin to talk about this distress, we catch a glimpse of where Joseph's plans are leading. Reuben's words focus on the central point: "Now we must give an accounting for his blood." Joseph's plans were not in revenge for how his brothers once treated him; rather, they were to show how, in God's world, the "guilt" of the brothers came back on them and called for justice. The remarkable message of the narrative, however, is that Joseph had already forgiven his brothers of the evil they had done to him, for he had to turn away from them to hide his sorrow for the distress his plan caused. What awaited the brothers was not the "evil" they intended for Joseph but the "good" God intended for them through Joseph (50:20).

25–28 Joseph's next plan was to fill the brothers' sacks with the money they had brought to buy grain (see comment on vv.3–13). God was behind it all, and through it all was working out his purposes.

J. Joseph's Brothers Return for Benjamin (42:29–38)

29–38 The events of this chapter are now retold in an abbreviated form by the brothers. Their focus was on the plan of Joseph for the return of the youngest son. As if he knew all that had in fact happened between his sons and Joseph, Jacob's words in v.36 ring truer than he would ever have suspected. The brothers had deprived him of Joseph, and it was because of them that Simeon was not now with them and that Benjamin was to be taken away. Thus in the words of their father, there was a reminder of the guilt that lingered over their treatment of Joseph.

In the face of Jacob's words, Reuben's response was unusual. He certainly meant his words to ensure confidence in his own resolve to return Benjamin; but within the context of the narrative, it appears only to add insult to injury. Jacob's reply to Reuben not only summarily dismissed Reuben's pledge, but it raised one more time the matter of the loss of Joseph.

K. Joseph's Identity (43:1–45:28)

1. The second trip to Egypt (43:1–34)

1–14 In keeping with the general motif of "pairs" of events throughout the Joseph narratives, the story now begins the "second" journey of the sons into Egypt. The famine was still in the land, and the grain purchased earlier was gone; so the father sent his sons back for more. This time Judah insisted on taking Benjamin back with them in accordance with Joseph's demands.

In persuading his father, Judah offered to take full responsibility for Benjamin if he was allowed to accompany the brothers to Egypt. That both Reuben and Judah had suggested ways Benjamin could be safely taken to Egypt recalls the events of ch. 37 and the brothers' maltreatment of Joseph. There both Reuben and Judah attempted to save Joseph's life (37:21, 26). Here they attempt to save Benjamin from the plan Joseph had initiated against the brothers. Judah expresses his impatience with Jacob by making explicit reference to the fact that this was the "second" time a journey to Egypt had been made (cf. 41:32).

Jacob gave in. Just as it was Judah's plan that ultimately saved the life of Joseph (37:26), so now his plan saved the life of Simeon and, in the end, of Benjamin. Jacob's farewell words in v.14 (note especially the word "mercy") provide the narrative key to what follows. At the conclusion of the narrative, when the sons reached Joseph and he saw Benjamin, we are told that "his mercy" (v.30; part of "deeply moved" in NIV) was kindled toward his brother. It is important that in these words of Jacob the compassion that Joseph was to find toward his brothers was given by "God Almighty."

15–25 Curiously, the whole problem of the brothers' being "spies" (42:9) is not raised again. Their fears and misgivings as they were ushered into the royal house of Joseph reveal their conviction that nothing good was going to come of this. We are told at the start, however, that the brothers were being taken into the house for a great feast. We know that their fears in v.18 were misguided. They need not have feared becoming Joseph's slaves.

When the brothers repeat to the steward how they found the money in their grain sacks, we see why they were so anxious and just how misguided they actually were. The purpose of the retelling is to get the steward's response. Joseph's steward brushed off their explanation. The reader surely knows that the steward's words cannot be taken seriously, for there was no mention of money given to the steward. Apparently the steward has been in on Joseph's secret plan all along. But unwittingly the steward expresses one of the central themes of the book: "Your God, the God of your father, has given you treasure."

26–34 Joseph was conspicuously careful to ask about the well-being of the brothers' father and the lad, Benjamin, whom they had brought back with them. It is only when we see Joseph hurry to another room to hide his tears that we are sure his identity was still unknown. One wonders what the brothers themselves thought about Joseph's questions and their treatment in his house. They had come expecting to be made into servants, but it was they who were being served. The text simply states that the brothers were "dismayed" (NIV, "in astonishment"). They asked no questions and seemed to accept the words of Joseph's steward (v.23) and Joseph's words to Benjamin (v.29) as the most plausible solution.

2. The silver cup (44:1–34)

1–13 Once more Joseph tricked his brothers by having his cup and Benjamin's money returned in Benjamin's sack of grain. The purpose is clear from what Joseph instructed his men to say. If we are to judge by the brothers' response when the servants reached them with Joseph's message, the word that the servants spoke was more detailed than what we are given in the narrative. The brothers immediately made reference to the silver and gold that were supposedly in their sacks. Perhaps Joseph's words were reported only in general terms because they expressed the central issue of the Joseph narratives: the contrast between the "evil" done by the brothers and the "good" intended and accomplished by God (cf. 50:20).

Joseph's question appears to include the issue of the brothers' treatment of him in ch. 37, which raises again the matter of their guilt in their treatment of Joseph. A residue of guilt still hung over their heads; and almost everywhere they turned, they heard an echo of their mistreatment of Joseph.

Joseph's plan worked as if every detail had been carefully planned out ahead of time. Not knowing that the cup and money were in Benjamin's sack, the brothers made a rash vow, putting the life of Benjamin and their own freedom in jeopardy. When the cup was discovered, their response was one of complete hopelessness. "They tore their clothing in a rage" (lit. tr.) and returned to the city. There was nothing else to do. Curiously, their response mirrored their father's response to hearing their earlier report of the loss of Joseph (37:34). The grief they had caused their father had returned on their own heads.

14–17 While it had looked as if Joseph was working a slow revenge on his brothers, his purpose was not revenge but repentance. Through his schemes his brothers were coming to an awareness of their guilt and were ready to acknowledge it. Their utter frustration is expressed in their questions and their expression of guilt. The rhetorical answer to their questions is that they have nothing to say or cannot show themselves to be right. Thus the conclusion they drew was that "God has uncovered your servants' guilt."

Though the brothers have only the immediate issue of the lost "cup" in mind, within the compass of the whole of the Joseph narrative, their words take on the scope of a confession of their former guilt as well. We know that the brothers did not take the cup; Joseph had it put into Benjamin's sack. We also know that the brothers know they did not take the cup. So when they speak of God "uncovering [their] guilt," we are forced to generalize their sense of guilt within the context of the entire narrative. In his response Joseph steered the matter in a direction that even more closely resembles his brothers' treatment of him. The young lad was to be sold into slavery in Egypt, and the brothers were to return to their father.

18–34 In Judah's final speech, he retold the whole of the Joseph story. His own retelling reveals the brothers' perception of the events as well as the hopelessness of their situation. The overall sense of Judah's version is that the brothers have been mistreated. He implies that if anyone was to blame, it was Joseph. According to Judah's version, Joseph had initiated the series of mishaps that led to the present predicament. All the brothers had done was follow his instructions and the instructions of their father. Judah's words, however, reveal something more to the reader than even he intended; they show that the fault did not lie with Joseph but with the "evil" intention of the brothers toward Joseph. Once again his words raised the issue of the brothers' mistreatment of Joseph.

Curiously, at this point Judah said of Joseph, "[He] is dead," rather than what was said of him on other occasions, namely, that "[he] is no more" (42:13). The meaning of "he is no more" does not imply that one is dead (cf. 5:24; 42:36). Thus, in retelling the story Judah added a dimension that was not previously there. The story now resembles the original intention of the brothers (37:18), and it corresponds to the story that the brothers gave to Jacob. What in real life would have perhaps been a "slip of the tongue" is a clue to the state of mind of the brothers as well as to their guilt.

But Judah's account raises even further the issue of the brothers' guilt regarding Joseph when he recounted Jacob's response to the demand that Benjamin be taken to Egypt. On that occasion Jacob had said, "You know that my wife bore me two sons. One of them went away from me, and I said, 'He has surely been torn to pieces.' " How could Judah recount the story this way? He surely knew that Jacob's words were mistaken. It was not a wild animal that killed Joseph; the brothers themselves had sold him into slavery. But to tell the story the way it actually happened would be to admit to a guilt even greater than that of which they were presently accused. Thus even when retelling the story to demonstrate his own innocence, Judah gave testimony of his own guilt and the guilt of his brothers. Though it is through Judah's speech that the reader is again reminded of the brothers' guilt, it was Judah who intervened on behalf of Benjamin and ultimately his words that saved the day.

After this speech Joseph could contain himself no longer. He felt compelled to unveil his identity to his brothers.

3. Joseph's revelation (45:1–28)

1–8 Joseph had taken no personal enjoyment in deceiving his brothers. When he could hold back no longer, he revealed his true identity. In his words of explanation and comfort to his brothers, Joseph returned once again to the central theme of the narrative: though the brothers were responsible for Joseph's being sold into Egypt, and though they intended "harm," God was ultimately behind it all and had worked it out for the "good." As he told his brothers, "It was to save lives that God sent me ahead of you," and, "God sent me ahead of you to preserve for you a remnant on earth and to save your lives." In the narrative thus far, this theme has been expressed by Jacob (42:2) and Judah (43:8) and has also been indirectly alluded to by Joseph himself (42:18). Here, however, and in 50:20, the theme is given its full expression in the words of Joseph.

Furthermore, it was not the brothers who sent Joseph to Egypt; it was God. And God had a purpose for it all. Joseph, the one ultimately responsible for initiating the plots and subplots of the preceding narratives, reveals the divine plan and purpose behind it all. Through it all he saw God's desire to accomplish a "great deliverance." In describing how God had taken care of him, Joseph alluded to the brothers' initial question regarding his dreams as a young lad (37:8). He reminded them that he had been made "ruler of all Egypt."

9–20 In the second part of his speech, Joseph made plans to bring his father to Egypt. He twice repeated that the brothers were to go to Jacob and with all haste bring him down to Egypt. In the midst of the famine, the sons of Israel were to be well provided for in Goshen. When the Pharaoh restated Joseph's offer and "twice" gave the brothers the "good" (vv.18, 20; NIV, "best") of the land of Egypt, it is hard not to see an allusion to the "good" (1:31) land given to Adam. Joseph pictures restoration, not just of the good fortune of Jacob, but of the blessing that was promised through the offspring of Jacob.

21–28 At first, when Jacob heard the news that Joseph was alive, "his heart grew numb" (NIV, "Jacob was stunned") and "he did not believe." But when he heard everything that Joseph had said and saw all that he had sent to take him back to Egypt, "the spirit . . . of Jacob revived," and he set out to go to him. A new dimension in Jacob's faith is the contrast between his "numbed heart" and his "revived spirit." Jacob's lack of faith is identified with his "numbed heart"; when his spirit was renewed, however, he believed.

L. Jacob's Journey to Egypt (46:1–7)

1–4 Before Jacob went to Egypt, he traveled to Beersheba, built an altar there, and offered sacrifices to the God of his father, Isaac. The patriarchs all worshiped the same God. The Lord had said to Isaac, "Do not go down to Egypt" (26:2); but he now said to Jacob, "Do not be afraid to go down to Egypt." Such a change in attitude toward the patriarchs' traveling to Egypt indicates that the Lord was following a specific plan with regard to his people.

The words spoken to Jacob in the night vision reiterate the promise to Abraham (12:2), but they also add that God would perform this in Egypt. He would bring his people into Egypt and be with them there; and after they had become a great nation, he would bring them back to the Promised Land. This was the second "vision" in which God revealed his future plans with the offspring of Abraham (cf. 15:1, 13–14).

5–7 Special attention is given to the journey of Jacob and his household into Egypt. Just as Abraham had left Ur and journeyed to Canaan (12:4–5), so now Jacob left Canaan and journeyed to Egypt. Both men were leaving the land of their birth in obedience to the will of God, and the obedience of both plays a pivotal role in God's election of the seed of Abraham. Thus vv.6–7 emphasize by repetition that "all his offspring" went with Jacob into the land of Egypt. To graphically demonstrate the importance of this point, the writer lists the names of "all his offspring," numbering them at "seventy" (see next comment).

M. Jacob's Sons in Egypt (46:8–27)

8–27 The list of names in these verses appears to have been selected so that the total numbers "seventy" (v.27). It can hardly be coincidental that the number of nations in Ge 10 is also "seventy." Just as the "seventy nations" represent all the descendants of Adam, so now the "seventy sons" represent all the descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the sons of Israel. What we see is a demonstration of the theme in Dt 32:8, that God apportioned the boundaries of the nations (Ge 10) according to the number of the sons of Israel. Thus the new nation of Israel is portrayed as a new humanity and Abraham as a second Adam. The blessing that is to come through Abraham and his offspring is a restoration of the original blessing of Adam, a blessing that was lost in the Fall.

N. Settling in Goshen (46:28–47:12)

28–34 Curiously, it was Judah, not Joseph, who led the sons of Israel into the land of Goshen. Once again Judah is singled out for special attention over against Joseph. Although in the Joseph story as a whole it was Joseph who was responsible for the preservation of the sons in Egypt, here, within this detail of the passage, it is Judah who "pointed out the way" (NIV, "to get directions") to the land of Goshen. Such a special focus on Judah highlights his crucial role in God's plan to bring about Israel's deliverance. The prominence of Judah is seen most clearly in Jacob's words of blessing to his twelve sons (49:8–12).

The chapter ends with Joseph's plan to secure the land of Goshen as a dwelling place for the sons of Israel. The plan was simply to tell the Pharaoh that they were shepherds. The Egyptians hated shepherds and thus would allow the Israelites to dwell by themselves in Goshen. Joseph's plan succeeded, and his family was given the land of Goshen. In these two brief narratives, Joseph and Judah are placed in marked contrast. Judah led the brothers to the land of Goshen, but it was Joseph's wise plan that resulted in their being able to live there.

47:1–12 Joseph's wisdom resulted in the sons of Israel dwelling safely in the land of Goshen while there was severe famine in the land of Canaan. Pharaoh's response was even more generous than the previous narrative would have suggested. Not only did he grant their wish and allow Joseph's brothers to settle in Goshen, he also put the brothers in charge of his own livestock, a result reminiscent of Joseph's own rise to power in the house of Pharaoh (cf. 41:41). Thus Joseph's fortune was duplicated in the fortune of his brothers. The land of Goshen is called the "best part of the land," which perhaps is a wordplay on the "good" that God intended in all of these recorded events (50:20).

Significantly, the central concern of this narrative is to show that Jacob "blessed Pharaoh" (vv.7, 10) when he was brought before him. Lying behind such an emphasis is God's promise to Abraham that he would bless those who blessed the offspring of Abraham. The passage shows that in Joseph and Jacob, the promise to Abraham was being fulfilled with the nations around them.

Jacob's words to the Pharaoh in v.9 sound unusual in the way they contrast with the two accounts of his blessing Pharaoh. They seem a deliberate contrast to the later promise in Deuteronomy that one who honors his father and mother should "live long and that it may go well with you in the land" (Dt 5:16). Jacob, who deceived his father and thereby gained the blessing, must not only die outside the Promised Land, but we also learn here that his years were few and difficult, perhaps a recompense for his earlier actions. Abraham obeyed God and lived long in the land (Ge 26:5), but Jacob's years were short and difficult. In spite of such a final verdict, Jacob lived out his remaining years "in the good [NIV, best part] of the land," though not the Promised Land; and Joseph, his son, provided for him and his household.

O. Joseph's Rule in Egypt (47:13–27)

13–27 The narrative returns to the story line of 41:57 with an account of the affairs of Joseph in Egypt and his work on behalf of the Pharaoh. The brothers are no longer the center of attention; the focus is on Joseph and his sons.

Perhaps the account of Joseph and his brothers (chs. 42–46) is inserted in the midst of the narratives dealing with Joseph's rise to power in Egypt (chs. 39–41, 47) because of the way this final narrative resembles the story of Joseph and his brothers. Throughout those narratives the theme was repeatedly expressed that Joseph's wisdom and administrative skills saved the life of his brothers and father. Thus at the beginning of the story, Jacob had told his sons to go down to Egypt to buy grain "that we may live and not die" (42:2). Then Judah, "in the second year" (45:6), told his father to let them return to Egypt "that we may live and not die" (43:8). Finally, when he revealed himself to them, Joseph told his brothers that God had sent him to Egypt "to save life" (45:5; NIV, "to save lives").

In keeping with that emphasis, the present narrative opens with the statement of the Egyptians to Joseph as they seek to buy grain from him: "Why should we die before your eyes?" Then it continues with the account of their return to Joseph "the second year" (NIV, "the following year"), when they again said, "Why should we perish?" and then again, "that we may live and not die." Such repetitions suggest that a thematic strategy is at work. First with his brothers and then with the Egyptians, Joseph's wisdom is seen as the source of life for everyone in the land. Furthermore, through God's wisdom given to this descendant of Abraham, the nations are receiving a blessing (cf. 12:2–3).

A further evidence of a distinct strategy behind the present narrative in ch. 47 can be seen in the ironic twist given the earlier narratives by the outcome of this chapter. The whole of the story of Joseph and his brothers began with Joseph being sold (37:28) into slavery (39:17) for twenty pieces of silver (37:28). Now, at the conclusion, Joseph is shown selling the whole of the land of Egypt into slavery and taking their "money" (v.18). In the end, because of the wisdom of Joseph, the offspring of Abraham became "fruitful," "increased greatly in number," and were dwelling safely and prosperously in the "region" of Goshen. Such a picture appears to be an obvious replication of the intended blessing of the early chapters of Genesis (1:28).

P. Jacob's Deathbed (47:28–49:33)

1. Jacob's burial instructions (47:28–31)

28 The initial impression from this verse is that the Jacob narratives are coming to a close, but such is not the case. Two crucial chapters remain. Verse 28 provides continuity within the Jacob narrative that had been broken into by the account of Joseph's further rise to power (vv.13–27); it also moves the narratives to a new time frame, seventeen years later. Perhaps the underlying assumption is that by now the famine was over and Joseph's position in Egypt has been well established.

29–31 As he approached death, Jacob's only request was that he not be buried in the land of Egypt. The manner of the request alludes back to Abraham (cf. 24:2). As he approached death (24:1), Abraham did not want his son to take a wife from among the people in the land where he was then dwelling (24:3–4). In the same way, as Jacob approached death (v.29), he did not want to be buried among the Egyptians but with his fathers in his own land. The same theme is taken up in ch. 50, when Joseph makes his sons swear that they will carry his bones back to the Promised Land, a request carried out in Jos 24:32.

A central element of the covenant with Abraham was the promise of the land. The request of the patriarchs to be buried in the land "with their fathers" emphasizes their trust in the faithfulness of God to his word. Henceforth a key symbol of Israel's faith in the promises of God is the bones of the faithful offspring that lie buried in the Promised Land. One other chapter of the Bible, Eze 37, with its prophecy of the "dry bones," pays specific attention to this symbol.

As early as the rivalry between Leah, Judah's mother, and Rachel, Joseph's mother (ch. 30), the question of the preeminence of one of the brothers over the other has occupied a central role. In chs. 48 (the blessing of Joseph) and 49 (the blessing of Judah) the issue comes to a final resolution in the choice of one from the tribe of Judah who will reign over the rest of the brothers (49:8–10). Similarly in Eze 37 the prophet returns to the theme of the Joseph narratives and the rivalry between the brothers. There, as here, the brothers are reunited under the king from the tribe of Judah, David (Eze 37:15–17, 22–24).

2. Ephraim and Manasseh blessed (48:1–22)

The phrase "some time later" suggests an important break from the events that have preceded. Chapter 48 fittingly concludes the Joseph narratives. As in the earlier patriarchal narratives, the blessing of the father is passed along to the next generation. Two features stand out. First, as earlier, it was the younger son, Ephraim, who was blessed as the firstborn rather than the older, Manasseh (v.19), thus continuing the well-worn theme that the blessing did not follow the lines of natural descent or natural right. The blessing was a gift bestowed on those who could not claim it as a right. Second, the blessing recorded here is largely subordinated and superseded by the blessing of Jacob in ch. 49.

Curiously, Judah rather than Joseph ultimately gained preeminence among his brothers. As important as Joseph is in the structure of the Genesis narratives, his role is subordinate to that of Judah. Consequently, not the blessings of the sons of Joseph, but the blessing of Judah plays the dominant role in the continuing story of the promise and the blessing. From Judah comes the house of David, and from David comes the Messiah. Ephraim and Manasseh play an important role in the texts dealing with the divided northern kingdom, but the importance of that kingdom, which ultimately was exiled and lost in the Dispersion, pales quickly in the light of the rising star of David.

1–4 The frailty of Jacob foreshadowed that his life was drawing to a close. As soon as he saw Joseph and his two sons, however, Jacob was revived, and he prepared to bestow God's blessing on the house of Joseph. Jacob's recollection of God's promise to him at Bethel (35:9–13) is significant. He repeated the Lord's words almost verbatim; but in the minor alterations we can see not only Jacob's assessment of the promise but also the writer's perspective. As he had acknowledged in 35:9, so now Jacob recalled that God had "blessed him." When he recounted what God had said, Jacob brought out a nuance to God's words that helps clarify our understanding of the Lord's promised blessing.

In 35:11 the Lord had said, "Be fruitful and increase in number. A nation and a community of nations will come from you." In essence he was saying, "May you be fruitful and increase," as in Ge 1:28. But as Jacob retold the story to Joseph here, he stressed that God was the one who would bring about all that had been promised: "I am going to make you fruitful and will increase your numbers. I will make you a community of peoples, and I will give this land as an everlasting possession to your descendants after you." As he reflected back on the blessing and recounted it to his sons, Jacob brought out just that aspect of the blessing that had been the theme of the Joseph narratives: God ultimately will bring about all that he has promised.

A second nuance noticeable in Jacob's recounting God's promise of the land is that he again did so verbatim: "I will give this land . . . to your descendants after you" (cf. 35:11). But there is a significant addition to Jacob's retelling. He has added "as an everlasting possession." Only one other time is the promise of the land called an "everlasting possession" (17:8; cf. 13:15).

5–7 Ephraim and Manasseh were taken into the family of Jacob and were to be treated as his own. They, along with the other sons of Jacob, would inherit the promise of Abraham. Henceforth the families of Ephraim and Manasseh were counted among the sons of Jacob and later became two of the most important tribes of Israel. Later these two names became synonymous with the northern kingdom of Israel, which stood in bitter opposition to the kingdom of Judah.

The mention of Rachel and her burial site could be prompted by the fact that just as she had borne Jacob "two sons" (44:27, Joseph and Benjamin) at a time when he was about to enter (48:7) the land, so also Joseph had given Jacob "two sons" just at the time when he was about to enter Egypt. Such symmetry suggests that Ephraim and Manasseh are seen as replacements of Joseph and Benjamin, which furthers the sense of divine providence behind Jacob's life.

Furthermore, Jacob's recollection is virtually verbatim to that of the account of Rachel's death in 35:16–19. Both passages stress the site of "Ephrath," which is identified as Bethlehem. As in the earlier cases of the concern for the burial of the patriarchs in the Promised Land, Jacob's mention of Rachel's burial is tied to the promise that the land would be an "eternal possession" of the seed of Abraham, a reminder of the faithfulness of God to his covenant promise.

8–14 The blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh is recounted in great detail. In the account of Jacob's blessing his sons (ch. 49), these two sons are not mentioned. In other words, the present account augments ch. 49. Great care is taken to emphasize that in the blessing of these two sons, Ephraim, the younger, was given the blessing of the firstborn (v.20b).

The first blessing (vv.15–16) appears to be of Joseph rather than the two sons ("Then he blessed Joseph," v.15). In the blessing itself, however, reference is made to the "young sons" (v.16), and the blessing of Joseph ultimately focuses on them. Before Jacob went on to address the two sons specifically in the blessing, Joseph interrupted him, attempting to get his father to place his right hand on Manasseh rather than Ephraim, thus giving the right of the firstborn to Manasseh, the older son. After objecting to Joseph's attempt (v.19), Jacob went on to bless the two sons specifically ("He blessed them," v.20), thus giving Ephraim preeminence over Manasseh.

15–16 Jacob's blessing is a storehouse of key thematic terms. God is identified as the "God before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac walked." Not only does the mention of Abraham and Isaac connect Jacob's faith in God to his immediate forefathers, but it also helps tie together the faith of the earliest patriarchs in Genesis with that of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. At two earlier points in the book, the faith of the primeval patriarchs is described as those who "walked with God" (5:22, 24; 6:9). The faith of the early fathers was at one with that of the patriarchs—they walked with God.

God is also described as the "God who has been my shepherd all my life to this day" and as the "Angel who has delivered me from all harm." It is unusual that God himself should be described as "the Angel," since earlier in the book it is said that God sent "his angel" (24:7) or simply that one of the patriarchs was visited by "the angel of the LORD" (22:11).

The blessing of the two sons picks up the theme of the promise to Abraham. They are to be called by Jacob's "name" and the "name" of Abraham and Isaac, just as God had promised Abraham: "I will make your name great" (12:2). They were to "increase greatly," just as God had promised Abraham, "I will make you into a great nation" (12:2).

17–20 The central concern here is to underscore that Ephraim, the younger son, was given preeminence over Manasseh. Though nearly blind himself (v.10), Jacob appeared to be making the same mistake that his father, Isaac, had when Jacob deceived him in ch. 27. When Joseph attempted to correct him, he stated his intentions clearly: "His younger brother will be greater than he." Why so much concern over whether Ephraim or Manasseh was put first, especially since neither Joseph nor his two sons but Judah received the preeminence? The issue of preeminence is meant to address the larger question that receiving the blessing offered by God does not rest with one's natural status in the world. On the contrary, it is based solely on God's grace. The one to whom the blessing did not belong has become heir of the promise.

21–22 Throughout these narratives Jacob has been pictured, not as a man of "sword and . . . bow," but as "a quiet man, staying among the tents" (25:27). Elsewhere Jacob has said of the inhabitants of the land of Canaan, "If they join forces against me and attack me, I and my household will be destroyed" (34:30). Now, suddenly, on his deathbed, Jacob revealed another picture of himself as he bequeathed to Joseph the portion of land he had taken by force. Though he spoke to Joseph, his use of the plural pronouns ("with you," pl. Heb.) shows that he was addressing a larger audience. That larger audience appears to be the house of Joseph that was to be represented in the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh.

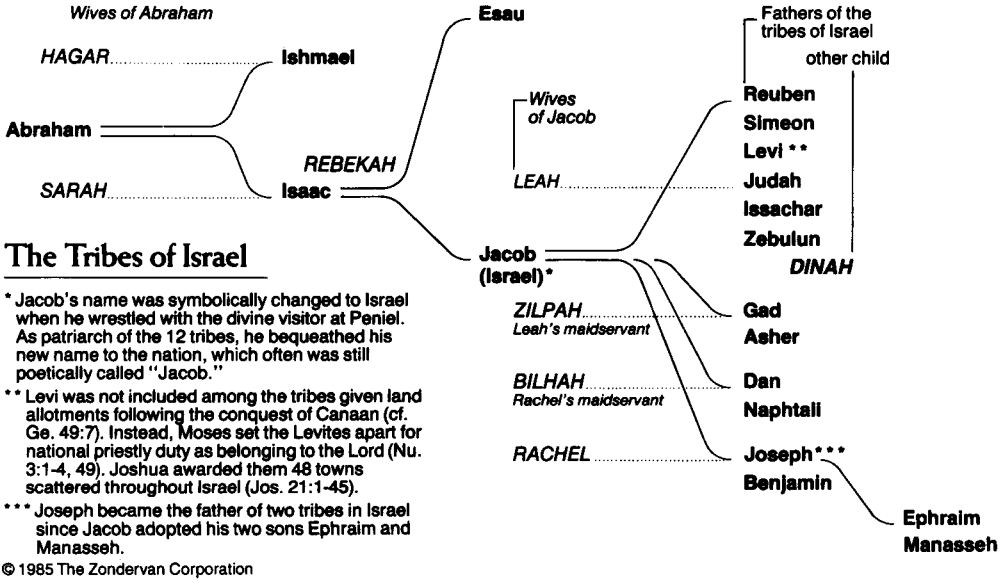
3. Jacob's sons blessed (49:1–28)

1–2 Jacob's last words to his sons are the occasion for a final statement of the book's major theme: God's plan to restore the lost blessing through the offspring of Abraham. The key to the writer's understanding of Jacob's last words lies in the narrative framework that surrounds them. We are explicitly told that Jacob was speaking about those things that would happen "in the last days" (NIV, "in days to come"; see also Nu 24:14–24; Dt 31:29). On all three occasions the subject matter introduced by the phrase "in days to come" is that of God's future deliverance of his chosen people. At the center of that deliverance stands a king (Ge 49:10; Nu 24:7; Dt 33:5). In Ge 49 that king is connected with the house of Judah.

At the close of Jacob's discourse (v.28), the writer draws a line connecting Jacob's words in this chapter to the theme of "the blessing" that has been a central concern of the book since 1:28. He does this by repeating the word "blessing" (GK 1385) three times in the short span of v.28, which literally reads: "And he blessed them; each according to his blessing he blessed them." Jacob's last words look to the future—"in days to come"—and draw on the past—God's blessing of humanity. The order of the sons follows roughly the order of the record of their birth (chs. 29–30). The sons of Leah lead the list, followed by the sons of the handmaidens, Bilhah, Zilpah, and again Bilhah, and then the sons of Rachel.

3–4 The key to the saying regarding Reuben is the statement "you will not excel" (NIV, "no longer excel"). The word "excel" (GK 3855) is a play on the two statements that have preceded it: "excelling in honor" and "excelling in power." Though Reuben has excelled, he will no longer excel. The reason given is brief but to the point: "for you went up onto . . . my couch and defiled it" (cf. 35:22). Reuben no longer had the right of the firstborn because he violated the honor of his father (cf. 1Ch 5:1–2 for the right of the firstborn being transferred to Joseph).

5–7 Simeon and Levi are grouped together because they instigated the bloodshed against the city of Shechem (34:25). At that time Jacob protested vehemently against the two sons and their attack on the defenseless city (34:30). Here Jacob gave his final verdict on their action: the two tribes of Levi and Simeon would not have their own portion in the inheritance of the land. The fulfillment of Jacob's words can be found in the facts that the tribe of Simeon virtually disappears from the biblical narratives after the time of the Conquest (because they "received their territory within the territory of Judah"; Jos 19:9) and the tribe of Levi was given the responsibility



The Tribes of Israel

* Jacob's name was symbolically changed to Israel when he wrestled with the divine visitor at Peniel. As patriarch of the 12 tribes, he bequeathed his new name to the nation, which often was still poetically called "Jacob."

 Levi was not included among the tribes given land allotments following the conquest of Canaan (cf. Ge. 49:7). Instead, Moses set the Levites apart for national priestly duty as belonging to the Lord (Nu. 3:1-4, 49). Joshua awarded them 48 towns scattered throughout Israel (Jos. 21:1-45).

of the priesthood and hence received no inheritance in the apportioning of the land.

8–12 Having eliminated the older brothers as rightful heirs of the blessing, Jacob foretold a future for the tribe of Judah that pictured him as the preeminent son. We have seen that the right of the firstborn, according to Ge 48:5, belonged to Joseph (see above and 1Ch 5:1–2). Though not having the right of the firstborn, Judah had been chosen over all the others as the royal tribe. According to 1Ch 5:2, Judah "prevailed" (NIV, "was the strongest") over his brothers and thus became heir to the throne (cf. Ps 78:67–68).

Unlike the imagery used of the other sons, the words of Jacob regarding Judah are transparent. Judah is described as a victorious warrior who returns home from battle and is greeted by the shouts of praise from his brothers. The parallelism of v.8 is extended by the statement "your father's sons will bow down to you." It is difficult not to see in this an intentional allusion to the dream of Joseph (37:10). What happened to the house of Joseph has been picked up by way of this image and transferred to the future house of Judah.

The image of the victorious warrior is extended with the picture of Judah as a "young lion" (NIV, "lion's cub"). The young lion is pictured as sleeping in its den after having just devoured its prey. The question at the end of v.9 speaks for itself. In v.10 the picture is filled out with a description of the young warrior as a king. He is the one who holds the "scepter" and the "ruler's staff." The point of Jacob's words is that Judah will hold such a status among the tribes of Israel until one comes "to whom it belongs" (Heb. shiloh; cf. Eze 21:27).

The most startling aspect of the description of this one from the tribe of Judah comes next: "and the obedience of the nations is his." The use of the plural word "nations" rather than the singular "nation" suggests that Jacob had in view a kingship that extended beyond the boundaries of the sons of Israel to include other nations as well. There may be an anticipation of this view in the promise of God to Jacob in 28:3 and 48:4: "I will make you a community of peoples." In any case, later biblical writers were apparently guided by texts such as this in formulating their view of the universal reign of the future Davidic king (e.g., Ps 2:8; Dan 7:13–14; Rev 5:5, 9).

Verses 11–12 draw an extended picture of the reign of this one from the tribe of Judah. In his day there will again be plenty for everyone. Poetically this idea of plenitude is expressed with the images of the donkey tethered to the choicest of vines and clothing washed in vintage wine. The sense of the imagery is that wine, the symbol of prosperity and blessing, will be so plentiful that even the choicest vines will be put to such everyday use as tethering the animals of burden and vintage wine will be as commonplace as wash water. Verse 12 returns to the picture of the king of Judah. His eyes are darker than wine and his teeth whiter than milk. He is a picture of strength and power. Later writers drew heavily from the imagery of this short text in their portrayal of the reign of the coming Messiah (cf. Isa 63:1–6; Rev 19:11, 13, 15).

Jacob's words regarding the remaining sons, with the exception of Joseph, are noticeable not only for their brevity, but also for their cryptic allusions to epic events that at the time lay yet in the future. The destinies of the remaining sons are, in most cases, based on a wordplay of the son's name. The central theme uniting each image is that of prosperity. Just as the victorious king from the tribe of Judah will reign over all nations in a time of rich blessing, so also each of the remaining brothers will experience the same sort of prosperity and blessing.

13 Zebulun, whose boundaries in Jos 19:10–16 do not touch the sea, will extend its borders to the sea as far as Sidon. The Hebrew name Zebulun, which means "lofty abode," has become a cipher for the extension of the Promised Land into the "far recesses" (NIV, "his border") of Sidon. There is apparently an intended wordplay between "abode" and "abide" (NIV, "will live").

14–15 Issachar, whose name is a play on the word "wages" (cf. 30:18), is pictured as a strong donkey who sees that his land of rest is good and applies his back to the burden. The expression "he sees how good is his resting place" is perhaps an allusion to ch. 1, where the similar expression—"and God saw that it was good"—is a constant reminder that God's purpose in Creation was to provide the "good" for humankind. The use of the term "resting place" or "land of rest" aligns the words of Jacob with the theme of the future rest that God will give his people in the Promised Land (cf. Ps 95:11).

16–18 Dan, whose name is a play on the expression "he will judge," is the one who will judge his people. He is likened to a snake along the path that attacks the heels of the horse and cunningly defeats the horseman. Though the sense of the image itself is unclear, Jacob's final words regarding Dan show that the image was meant in a positive way: "I look for your deliverance, O LORD" (v.18). Breaking in, as it does, on the increasingly terse poetic images, this expression of hope in the Lord's deliverance provides the much-needed clue to the meaning of Jacob's words. In the individual and future destiny of the sons is embodied the hope of all Israel. That hope is of a future prosperity for the nation and a future victory over their enemies. At the center of that hope is the king from the tribe of Judah.

19 The brief statement regarding Gad contains a wordplay on nearly every word: "Gad [gad] will be attacked [yegudennu] by a band of raiders [gedud], but he will attack [yagud] them at their heels." Again, though it is very brief, the saying falls in line with the others, following in the path of the prophecy regarding Judah in that it gives expression to the hope of the final defeat of the enemy.

20 The statement regarding Asher has no clear wordplays, and its meaning is self-evident. In the future Asher's sons will enjoy great abundance and rich delicacies.

21 The words regarding Naphtali are also brief. The picture they present, which is similar to the others, is of a time of great future prosperity and abundance.

22–26 Jacob has much to say about the future of the tribe of Joseph. In substance Jacob's statements repeat much of what was said about the other brothers after Judah. The difference, however, is the repetition of the word "blessing." Whereas Jacob's words regarding the other brothers paint a picture of the future well-being of the sons and thus figuratively speak of a future blessing, Jacob's words to Joseph explicitly refer to this future well-being as a "blessing." These words to Joseph, therefore, fall in line with all those earlier passages that speak specifically of the promised "blessing" and prepare the way for the final remarks about Jacob's words in v.28: "he blessed them; each according to his blessing, he blessed them" (lit. tr.). The reference to the "Shepherd" in v.24 appears to be an allusion to Jacob's earlier blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh (48:15).

27 The picture of Benjamin is similar to that of Judah. Both depict the patriarch's future in terms expressing a victorious conquest over the enemy. In both the conqueror is a vicious predator, the lion and the wolf. The stark simplicity of these words to Benjamin, however, brings out the sense of sudden victory and conquest in much stronger terms than the imagery of Judah.

28 The writer sums up Jacob's words to his sons. They are an expression of the theme of the blessing that was to be passed along through the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Within Jacob's words to each son (after Judah), the theme of blessing has been evident in two primary images. First, the reverse side of the blessing is stressed in the imagery of the victorious warrior. The defeat of the enemy is the prelude to the messianic peace. Second, the positive side of the blessing is stressed in the imagery of great prosperity and abundance. Behind such imagery is the Garden of Eden—the Paradise lost. The focus of Jacob's words has been the promise that when the one comes to whom the kingship truly belongs (v.10), there will once again be the peace and prosperity that God intended all to have in the Garden of Eden.

4. Jacob's burial instructions repeated (49:29–33)

29–33 As he lay dying, Jacob once more made a request that his sons bury him in the Land of Promise with his fathers. The specific place he had in mind was "Machpelah," the burial place purchased by Abraham in ch. 23. Although Jacob had made a similar request earlier (47:29–30), this final one was far more specific. He wanted to be buried with Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebekah, and Leah. The request renews our awareness of the promise of the land—that Jacob's seed would live in peace in the land promised to Abraham and Isaac. Jacob's faith in God's promises remained firm to the end. With such an expression on his lips, "he . . . breathed his last and was gathered to his people."

Q. Jacob's Death and Burial (50:1–14)

1–14 Over half of the final chapter is occupied with a description of the mourning for and burial of Jacob. Joseph himself mourned and then the Egyptians. Great preparations were made both by Joseph and the Egyptians. A special request was granted by the Pharaoh to bury Jacob in his homeland, and a large entourage was provided as a burial procession to carry Jacob's body back to Canaan. "All Pharaoh's officials . . . and all the dignitaries of Egypt" along with Pharaoh's chariots and horsemen accompanied Joseph on his journey back to Canaan. Even the Canaanites recognized this as "a very large [lit., heavy; NIV, solemn] ceremony of mourning."

Why such detail over the burial of Jacob when the deaths of the other patriarchs are simply recounted in the bare facts that they died and were buried? Even the account of the death of Joseph consists only of the brief notice that he died and was embalmed and entombed in Egypt (v.26). It is appropriate to seek a motive for such an emphasis within the narrative.

The writer has been focusing on God's faithfulness to his promise of the land and on the hope of God's people in the eventual return to the land. In later prophetic literature, a recurring image of the fulfillment of the promise to return to the land pictures returning Israel accompanied by many from among the nations. The prophets of Israel saw the return as a time when "all the nations will stream to" Jerusalem, and "many peoples will come and say, 'Come, let us go up to the mountain of the LORD, to the house of the God of Jacob' " (Isa 2:2–3; Zec 8:23).

It is difficult not to see the same imagery at work in the present narrative. Jacob, in his final return to the Land of Promise, was accompanied by a great congregation of the officials and elders of the land of Egypt. With him also was the mighty army of the Egyptians. Thus the story of Jacob's burial in the land foreshadows the time when God "will bring Jacob back from captivity and will have compassion on all the people of Israel" (Eze 39:25).

VII. The Final Joseph Narrative (50:15–26)

A. Joseph's Forgiveness (50:15–21)

15–21 The narrative turns once more to the scene of Joseph and his brothers and to the central theme of the Joseph narratives: "You intended to harm [lit., evil; GK 8288] me, but God intended it for good . . . [to] the saving of many lives." Behind all the events and human plans recounted in the story of Joseph lies the unchanging plan of God. It is the same plan introduced from the very beginning of the book, where God looks at what he has just created for humankind and sees that "it is good" (1:4–31). Through his dealings with the patriarchs and Joseph, God had continued to bring about his good plan. He had remained faithful to his purposes.

The last description of Joseph's dealings with his brothers is the statement that "he comforted [NIV, reassured; GK 5714] them and spoke kindly to them." It is again difficult not to see in this picture a foreshadowing of the future community of the sons of Israel in exile awaiting their return to the Promised Land (cf. Isa 40:1–2).

B. Summary of Joseph's Life and Death (50:22–26)

22–26 Though his words are few, the final statement of Joseph to his sons gives the clearest expression of the kind of hope taught in these narratives. As had his father Jacob, Joseph wanted his bones returned to the Promised Land. Also like Jacob, he saw to it that his sons swore to return his bones when they returned to the land. Though he knew he would die and not see the time when his sons returned to the land, he nevertheless expressed clearly the hope and trust that he had in God's promise: "God will surely come to your aid and take you up out of this land to the land he promised on oath to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob." As has been characteristic of the literary technique of the Joseph narratives, Joseph repeated a second time (cf. 41:32) his statement of trust in God's promise: "God will surely come to your aid, and then you must carry my bones up from this place."

The book of Genesis ends with the Israelites "in Egypt." The narrative, however, does not end here. As in earlier segments of the book, the death of the patriarch is followed immediately in the next book by a list of names that begins a narrative of the events in the lives of the next generations (cf. Ge 50:26–Ex 1:5 with Ge 35:29–36:43).

Exodus

INTRODUCTION

1. Title

The name "Exodus" means "exit," "departure." In the Hebrew, this book begins with the conjunction "and"; this emphasizes that it was thought of as a continuation of Genesis and an integral part of the five books making up the first division of the Hebrew canon, the Torah (meaning "law," "instruction," "teaching"; GK 9368). Since the second century A.D., these first five books have been called "the Pentateuch" (i.e., "the five books").

2. Authorship

The several internal claims that directly ascribe authorship to Moses (17:14; 34:4, 27–29; 24:4; 20:22–23:33) are supported by a strong association of Mosaic authorship with these same materials in other OT books (cf. Jos 1:7; 8:31–32; 1Ki 2:3; 2Ki 14:6; et al.). The NT writers likewise support Mosaic authorship (cf. Mk 12:26 and Ex 3:6; Lk 2:22–23 and Ex 13:2; Mk 7:10 and Ex 20:12; 21:17).

3. Date of Writing

Since Moses first became involved with leading the Israelites after his eightieth birthday (7:7), the date for the composition of the book of Exodus must fall between his eightieth birthday and his one hundred and twentieth birthday, when he died, just as the wilderness wandering was drawing to a close (Dt 34:7). Thus the approximate date for the composition rests on the date set for the Exodus from Egypt.

4. Date of the Exodus

The book of Exodus nowhere gives us enough data to link definitively biblical events with Egyptian chronology. We only know about "a new king, who did not know about Joseph" (1:8) or an anonymous "Pharaoh" (1:11, 19, 22; 2:15), or a "king of Egypt" (1:15; 2:23). It is noteworthy that "Pharaoh," which means "great house" and designates the king's residence and household, became, for the first time in the Eighteenth Dynasty of Egypt, a title for the king himself. Thus, even though Ex 2:23 tells us that the king or "Pharaoh" of the oppression died and therefore could not have been the Pharaoh of the Exodus (cf. 4:19), we have no internal evidence to identify either of them specifically.

The identity of these two Pharaohs has generally centered on two views: (1) placing the Exodus under the Pharaohs of the Eighteenth Dynasty (c. 1580–1321 B.C.) and (2) placing it under Pharaohs of the Nineteenth Dynasty (c. 1321–1205 B.C.). For a discussion of this issue, see either EBC, 2:288–91 or ZPEB, 2:432–36. Generally, conservative scholars have held to the earlier date for the Exodus, which is the position taken here.

5. Theology

Exodus contains some of the richest theology in the OT. Preeminently, it lays the foundation for a theology of God's revelation of his person, redemption, law, and worship. It also initiates the great institution of the priesthood and the role of the prophet, and it formalizes the covenant relationship between God and his people.

Exodus contains detailed disclosures of the nature of God and the significance of his presence (as given by his name Yahweh ["the LORD"] and his glory). His attributes of justice, truthfulness, mercy, faithfulness, and holiness are highlighted.

God is also the Lord of history, for there is no one like him, "majestic in holiness, awesome in glory, working wonders" (15:11). Thus neither the affliction of Israel nor the plagues in Egypt were outside his control. In this book God begins to fulfill the promises that he had uttered centuries ago to the patriarchs.

The theology of deliverance and salvation is a strong emphasis of the book. The heart of redemption theology, as acknowledged by the NT (see Jn 1:29; 1Co 5:7), is best seen in the Passover narrative (ch. 12) along with the sealing of the covenant (ch. 24).

Exodus also tells us how we should live. The foundation of biblical ethics and morality is laid out first in the gracious character of God and then in the Ten Commandments and the ordinances of the Book of the Covenant.

The book concludes with an elaborate discussion on the theology of worship. The tabernacle was very costly in time, effort, and monetary value; yet in its significance and function it pointed to the chief end of human beings: to glorify God and to enjoy him forever.

EXPOSITION

I. Divine Redemption (1:1–18:27)

A. Fulfilled Multiplication and Forced Eradication (1:1–22)

1. The promised increase (1:1–7)

The three prominent subjects of Exodus are (1) God's plan for deliverance, (2) God's guidance for morality, and (3) God's order for worship. As the book opens, another prominent fact is immediately set forth: vv.1–7 are a virtual commentary on the ancient promise made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob about their seed (Ge 15:5; 22:17).

1–4 In the Hebrew, the book of Exodus begins with the words "And these are the names of" (which is the Heb. name for the book; cf. Ge 46:8). This is the first example of a practice common to most of the historical books of the OT: the use of the simple copulative "and" to begin a book (cf. Joshua, Judges, Ruth, 1 and 2 Samuel, et al.), which indicates an ongoing sequence of revelation and narration. The sons of Jacob's wives, Leah and Rachel, are placed in order of their seniority ahead of the sons of his two concubines, except for Joseph, who is omitted because he was already in Egypt.

5 The family list in Ge 46 gives this tally: the six men of Leah had twenty-five sons and two grandsons, totaling thirty-three; the two sons of Rachel had twelve sons, totaling fourteen; Bilhah's two sons had five sons, contributing seven to the sum; and Zilpah's two sons had eleven sons, one daughter (apparently counted here), and two grandsons, making sixteen; therefore, thirty-three plus fourteen plus seven plus sixteen equals "seventy." Genesis 46:26–27 starts with the figure of sixty-six (apparently dropping out Er and Onan, since they died in Canaan, as well as deleting Joseph and his two sons, since they were already in Egypt, but adding Dinah, feeling she could not be deleted). To this total of sixty-six, it added Joseph, his two sons, and Jacob himself, for a total of seventy.

6–7 With the vocabulary of God's promised blessing of multiplication and increase as given to Adam (Ge 1:28), Noah (Ge 8:17; 9:1, 7), Abraham (Ge 17:2–6; 22:17), Isaac (Ge 26:4), and Jacob (Ge 28:3, 14; 35:11; 48:4), Moses recorded that God had been fulfilling his plan during the 430 years Israel was in Egypt.

2. The first pogrom (1:8–14)

8 The "new king" who was ignorant of Joseph's contribution to Egypt has been variously identified. The most logical choice favors a Hyksos king. The Hyksos were foreign invaders who drove the Egyptians south and did not use Egyptian hieroglyphic writing on their scarabs. They too were Semites.

9–10 Israel was called "a people" (GK 6639) for the first time here. The situation called for an extremely delicate balance: Pharaoh needed to maintain the Israelite presence as an economic asset without thereby jeopardizing Egypt's national security.

11 The term "masters" (sar; GK 8569) is common to both Hebrew and Egyptian. The same official Egyptian name appears on the famous wall painting from the Thebean tomb of Rekhmire, the overseer of the brick-making slaves during the reign of Thutmose III. The painting shows such overseers armed with heavy whips. Their rank is denoted by the long staff held in their hands and by the Egyptian hieroglyphic determinative of the head and neck of a giraffe. The two storehouse cities Israel built were for the storage of provisions and perhaps armaments. The location of Pithom may be equated with Tell er-Retabeh ("Broomhill"), which some equate with Heliopolis (cf. ZPEB, 4:803–4). Rameses has most recently been located at or near Qantir ("Bridge").

12–14 Pharaoh's challenge—"or they will become even more numerous" (v.10)—was quite foolish in view of v.12. The result was a frightful dread that came over the Egyptians. Ironically, the God-intended instrument for the salvation of both nations (cf. Ge 12:3) became instead, through the hardness of human hearts, the source of crippling fear. Thus the Egyptians "made [Israel's] lives bitter," a fact later commemorated in the Passover meal's "bitter herbs" (12:8). The emphasis of vv.8–14 falls on the "ruthlessness" of the work and servitude imposed on Israel.

3. The second pogrom (1:15–22)

15–16 The two midwives were probably representatives of or superintendents over the whole profession. The delivery stools were literally "two stones" (dual form).

17–21 The midwives "feared God" more than they feared the king of Egypt. If they were not Hebrews but Egyptians, their God-fearing ways reveal the presence of God's common grace and the residue of earlier divine revelation that their ancestors shared but had gradually left in whole or part (cf. Ge 20:11; Dt 25:18; Mal 3:5). The midwives had respect for life, as God wanted them to have. Even though they lied to Pharaoh, they are praised for their outright refusal to take infant lives. Their reverence for life reflected a reverence for God. Thus God gave them "families." The midwives may also have attempted to avoid answering Pharaoh's question directly, and therefore they commented on what was true without giving all the details.

22 A single concluding and transitional verse summarizes ch. 1. Pharaoh needed to openly command by decree what had proved abortive by mere speeches. "All his people" were made agents of this crime in order to nullify the divine work of increased Hebrew children (cf. Herod's action at the birth of Christ). Thus the third pogrom began.

B. Preparations for Deliverance (2:1–4:26)

1. Preparing a leader (2:1–10)

1–4 An unnamed couple from the family of Levi became the parents of Moses. Moses was not the firstborn, for his brother Aaron was three years older and his sister Miriam was a young girl already. That he was a "fine child" may relate to his physical appearance (cf. Ge 39:6) as well as to the qualities of his heart. When Moses' mother could hide him no longer, she fashioned a basketlike watertight boat from papyrus reeds. Clearly, Moses' mother had something else in mind besides child abandonment or exposure, for her actions denoted love and hope.

5 The Hebrew text does not say the royal party went "into" the river (as did Naaman in 2Ki 5:14) but that they were "at" or "by" the river, since normally royal personages did not bathe in a river. Ancient historians tell us that the waters of the Nile were regarded as sacred, and such washing was more of an ablution with its health-giving and fructifying effects.

6–9 The princess discovered the reed basket and opened it to find a beautiful Hebrew baby boy, crying. Her heart was immediately moved with compassion. Miriam emerged from her hiding place, perhaps acting as if she were just casually passing by. If her words were not according to the careful plan and instruction of her mother, then her inward prompting must have come from God—not a moment too soon or too late, with not a word too many or too few! Not only was the child returned to his own mother, but she was paid wages for nursing the child she feared she might never see alive again. Thus Moses' mother and father had an opportunity to teach him about the God of his fathers.

10 When the Hebrew lad "grew older," he was brought to Pharaoh's daughter, who adopted him and named him Moses. The name is generally considered to be Egyptian, but the attached phrase—"I drew him out of the water"—points to a Hebrew origin. However, since the Egyptian princess is credited with naming him, and because of the similarity of Egyptian names such as Ptahmose, Thutmose, Ahmose, and Ramose, it is now universally regarded as Egyptian. The Hebrew root "to draw out" (GK 5406) is used perhaps because of the assonance it shared with the Egyptian name.

2. Extending the time of preparation (2:11–22)

11–12 In time Moses became aware of his Hebrew descent. When he was forty years old (Ac 7:23; cf. Heb 11:24–25), he struck and killed an Egyptian for beating a fellow Hebrew. It was his impetuosity that was wrong, not his sense of justice or his defense of the downtrodden. This cost him another forty years of education before he was ready for the task of delivering Israel. Moses' conscience revealed that he had no legal authority to do what he did, for he first looked "this way and that" and then buried the corpse in the sand. The very impulse that led Moses to avenge wrongdoing apart from due process of law was developed to do the work of God.

13–14 The champion of the oppressed and underdogs went forth the next day—this time to settle a dispute between two of his own people. But Moses was thoroughly rebuffed and his motives impugned by the one who ought to have been practicing neighborly love. He thoroughly disarmed Moses by announcing that he knew what Moses had done on the previous day—he was a murderer, and now he was meddling in someone else's business! Moses surmised that it must have become public information, and he wisely decided to leave Egypt as quickly as possible.

15–19 Pharaoh's wrath was not so much to avenge the death of an Egyptian as it was to deal with his discovery that Moses was acting as a friend and possible champion of his sworn enemy, the oppressed Israelites. So Moses fled to Midian, in the Arabian Peninsula along the Gulf of Aqaba, only to be aroused by another scene of injustice. The seven daughters of a Midianite priest named Reuel were being harassed and chased from watering their flocks at the troughs by unscrupulous shepherds, but Moses rescued them. Since Moses still had his Egyptian clothing on, they judged him to be Egyptian.

20–22 The offer of hospitality led to Moses' marriage to Reuel's daughter Zipporah (which means "bird"; i.e., "Lady Bird"). Subsequently she gave birth to a son. Moses betrayed his loneliness by naming his son Gershom; for he explained, "I have become an alien in a foreign land."

3. Preparing a people for deliverance (2:23–25)

23 The king of Egypt who died was probably the same one who sought Moses' life for murdering an Egyptian (2:15; 4:19). The only pharaohs who ruled for more than thirty years in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Dynasties were Thutmose III (1483–1450 B.C.), Amenhotep III (1410–1372 B.C.), Haremhab (1349–1315 B.C.), and Rameses II (1301–1234 B.C.). Thutmose III was probably the pharaoh of the oppression who had gained control after the death of his aunt-stepmother-mother-in-law.

Misery finally found a voice, and so the pain of bodily senses of the Israelites preceded their recognition of the poverty of their spiritual condition. Thus God prepared the audience and people who would be delivered while he prepared the deliverer himself. No longer did Egypt symbolize delightful foods, wealth, and fatness; instead, it now meant slave-masters, forced labor, and bondage. So Israel cried out to God.

24–25 God was pleased to respond to even those first lisps of faith, but he was also moved by his own word that he had promised to the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Ge 17:7, 19; 35:11–12; et al.). It was a remembrance that was more than a mental act; it also included a performance of his word (cf. Ge 8:1; 1Sa 1:19). In four consecutive verbs, the divine action is charted: God heard, God remembered, God looked (i.e., considered), and God knew (i.e., was concerned).

4. Calling a deliverer (3:1–10)

1–4 While Moses was actively engaged at one task, God called him to another—the very one he had felt himself so eminently qualified for forty years earlier, when he had struck out against the abuses of power he had witnessed in Egypt.

The valley of el-Raha lay between the three summits traditionally identified with the "mountain of God" (so named in retrospect because God had appeared there). There the Lord appeared "in the form of a flame of fire." What took place was a "strange sight" to Moses. The burning bush was not consumed; that was the miracle.

God chose the small and the despised burning bush as his medium of revelation, and he waited to see how sensitive Moses was toward the insignificant things of life before he invested him with larger tasks. The fire symbolized God's powerful, consuming, and preserving presence (cf. 19:18; 24:17; et al.). When Moses went over to inspect this unusual sight, God issued his call by repeating Moses' name to express the urgency of the message (cf. 1Sa 3:10).

5–6 The presence of God demanded a holistic preparation of the one who would aspire to enter his presence. Therefore, to teach Moses this lesson, God set up admittedly arbitrary boundaries—"Do not come any closer"—and commanded that he should also remove his sandals. This was to prevent him from rashly intruding into the presence of God and to teach him that God was separate and distinct from humans (cf. 19:10–13; 2Pe 1:18). Because God was present, what had been ordinary became "holy ground" and consequently "set apart" for a distinct use. The place where sheep and goats had traveled just a short time ago was transformed into "holy ground" by God's presence. This is the first occurrence of the noun "holy" (GK 7731) in Scripture (cf. Ge 2:3 for the verb form).

When the condition for meeting God had been satisfied, he revealed himself as the "God of your father." The collective singular "father" had a special point in that it was through the one man of promise that the many were to receive the blessing of God. Thus God assured Moses that the God of his father had not forsaken his repeated word of promise (Ge 15:1–21; 26:2–5; 35:1–12) or his people.

7–10 The anthropomorphisms of God's "seeing," "hearing," "knowing" (i.e., "be concerned about"), and "coming down" are graphic ways to describe divine realities in terms of partially analogous situations in the human realm. But these do not imply that God has limitations; rather, he is a living person who can and does follow the stream of human events and who can and does at times directly intervene in human affairs.

Three times v.8 mentions the "land." The often-repeated promise to the patriarchs was about to become a reality after over half a millennium! Two facts described the land: it was a good land and a spacious land (cf. Dt 8:7–9)—good because it was "flowing with milk and honey," and spacious because six nations were living there. And Israel would possess it all.

The call of Moses comes to a double conclusion in vv.9–10 with the phrase "And/so now." Verse 9 essentially repeats v.7 by summarizing the preceding speech and by restating the grounds on which this divine call is issued: namely, Israel's present need and God's solution. Verse 10, however, is the bottom line to the whole incident of the burning bush: It is the formal commissioning of Moses as God's emissary to lead Israel out of Egypt.

5. Answering inadequate objections (3:11–4:17)

a. Who am I to go to Pharaoh? (3:11–12)

The first of five protests against accepting God's commission reflects the great change that had come over Moses after forty sobering years of reflection and development. He who had been only too eager to offer himself as a self-styled deliverer earlier was now timid, unsure of himself, and devoid of any self-assertiveness that his divine commission demanded of him.

11 Moses repeated the twofold divine commission of v.10: that he should personally go to Pharaoh and that he should bring Israel out of Egypt. He prefaced this comment with the familiar idiom of the Near East that stresses the magnitude of the inequity between the agent and the mission, "Who am I?" (cf. 6:12; 1Sa 18:18; et al.).

12 God's response to Moses was twofold: he would personally accompany him, and he would give him a sign. As God had promised fourteen times to be "with" the patriarchs Isaac and Jacob, he now assured Moses that he would be actively present as he continued to fulfill his promised word of blessing.

This "sign" (GK 253) given to Moses is confirmatory and appeals to faith rather than to immediate evidence or to the presence of the miraculous. It is not the same as Gideon's (Jdg 6:17), for Gideon requested the sign; Moses did not. Moses' sign belongs in the same class as other signs about the future (1Sa 2:34; 10:2, 3, 5; 2Ki 19:29, et al.). Thus while God gave "signs" as "proofs" to the people (Ex 4:1–9), interestingly enough he gave no such "signs" to Moses himself but asked him to believe and trust in his word and promised to be present (cf. Mt 28:20). There was also more than a hint in this sign that the mission of Moses went beyond a mere deliverance of a nation from bondage; Israel was to be set free to "worship" God.

b. What if they ask what your name is? (3:13–22)

13 Moses did not anticipate being asked, "By what name is this deity called?" Rather, he feared that if he announced that the God of their fathers, the patriarchs, had sent him to them, the people would bluntly ask him, "What is his name?" The Hebrew seeks the significance, character, quality, and interpretation of the name. Therefore, what they needed to know was "What does that name mean or signify in circumstances such as we are in?"

14–15 God gave two answers to the problem posed by Moses. The second answer builds on the basic explanation of the meaning of the Lord's name and links that name with previous and all future generations.

Perhaps the most natural explanation that does fullest justice to the meaning of "I AM" is that this name is connected with some form of the verb "to be" and is to be seen as expressing the nature, character, and essence of the promise in v.12: "I will be with you." What, then, was his name? The answer was that "[my name in its inner significance is] I am, for I am/will be [present]." While it may sound to Western ears that God was deliberately trying to avoid disclosing his name, the context shows that he was actually doing the opposite. Often this construction is used to express a totality, intensity, or emphasis. Therefore, the formula means "I am truly he who exists and who will be dynamically present then and there in the situation to which I am sending you."

This was no new God to Israel; it was the same God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob who was sending Moses. His name was Yahweh (= LORD; GK 3378). For the first time God used the standard third-person form of the verb "to be" with the famous four consonants YHWH. This was to be his "name" (GK 9005) forever. His "name" was his person, his character, his authority, his power, and his reputation. So linked was the person of the Lord and his name that both were often used interchangeably (e.g., Dt 28:58; Ps 18:49). This name was to be a "memorial"; it was to be for the act of uttering the mighty deeds of God throughout all generations.

16–18a The "elders of Israel" were the heads of various families (6:14–15, 25; 12:21; Nu 2) or tribes. Moses was to deliver God's message to this body of men and to get them to accompany him when he went to Pharaoh. The message came in the name of "the LORD," who was the same as the God of the patriarchs. It began with a repetition of the words used by Joseph on his deathbed: lit., "I have surely visited you" (NIV, "I have watched over you"), and "I have promised to bring you up out of your misery in Egypt." Joseph had prophesied the very deliverance announced by Moses (see Ge 50:24). Thus the repetition here was equivalent to saying that the Lord would complete and fulfill what he had begun to do as spoken by Joseph. In fact, the very word used for misery in v.17 was used in the original promise to Abraham in Ge 15:13 that the Egyptians would "mistreat" them for four hundred years. Moses was assured of a sympathetic hearing from the elders, for the hearts of human beings are in the hands of God.

18b–20 Moses and the elders were instructed first to make only a moderate and limited request of Pharaoh for a temporary leave to offer sacrifices to the Lord their God. This was not an example of a half-truth or a ruse and an attempt to deceive Pharaoh. God deliberately graded his requests of Pharaoh from easier (a three-day journey with an understood obligation to return) to more difficult (the total release of the enslaved people) in order to give him every possible aid in making an admittedly difficult political and economic decision. God certainly knew this king of Egypt well enough to know what his reactions would be. Therefore Moses was cautioned not to misconstrue any rejection he received as a sign that God had not called him or that God was not with him—all to no avail; for Moses later raised those very complaints (5:22–23).

21–22 God had promised Abram that after Israel had served for four hundred years, they would "come out with great possessions" (Ge 15:14). Thus the early chapters of Exodus systematically record the fulfillment of one patriarchal promise after another to make the connection clear. The taking of spoils from the Egyptians was to be explained by a simple request and by granting divine favor to the Israelites' request. The Israelites themselves were to live by this same principle of providing a present to a slave who was to be released every seven years (Dt 15:13). Charges of fraud, deception, deceit, and villainy against Israel are all misplaced. The fact is that the ignominy of their slavery is reversed in this sign of the recovery of their personhood—why even the children were to be decked in the jewels and the gifts of clothing!

c. What if they will not believe me? (4:1–9)

1 Moses did not flatly contradict God's assurance in 3:17. Both the Hebrew and the LXX make his question a hypothetical situation. But it does indicate that Moses was by no means a shining model of faith and trust in God. At the same time, neither could Moses have been certain as to the response of his fellow Israelites in Egypt. Moses stalled for time by posing further nuances to what he had already been told.

2–5 The first sign. God's prophets were accredited by "signs and wonders" (cf. Dt 13:1–3) with the sole purpose of validating the messenger and the message—that both were truly from God. Accordingly, Moses was given a "sign" (see comment on 3:12) to perform "so that they may believe that the LORD . . . has appeared to you."

The staff in Moses' hand was ordinary and unspectacular, but when it was thrown on the ground, as God commanded, it became a snake. It is perhaps too much to connect this snake directly with the uraeus (or cobra) worn on the headdress of Pharaoh (as if Moses had Egypt's king by the tail). In order to underscore its supernatural nature, Moses was instructed to grasp the serpent by its tail to further prove the divine source of this miracle; for one would normally pick up a serpent by the neck.

6–7 The second sign. The Hebrew word for leprosy covered a number of assorted diseases. Actually, leprosy, or Hansen's disease, was known in antiquity. But leprosy in the Bible apparently also covered cases of psoriasis, vitiligo, ringworm, syphilis, mildew, and the rot—all affecting garments and houses as well as people in some cases. Which was involved here is uncertain, but the condition of the skin was such that its color resembled snow. Any small or ordinary skin annoyance would hardly be of any "sign" value. It had to pose a greater threat to the life and health of Moses if the instantaneous cure was also to reflect the greatness and majesty of God's power. The significance of this power to take away the health of the body and then to restore it again so that the affected part was "like the rest of his flesh" was to warn Pharaoh that this God, who had sent Moses, had the power to inflict or to save whatever he wanted with just a word or a gesture from his ambassador.

8–9 The third sign. The Lord next seized the initiative by using almost identical terms to those used by Moses in v.1. What was not being heeded in each case was literally "the voice" of these two signs. But their "voices" would leave Israel just as accountable as the "voice" of the words of Moses (v.1). Israel was to be confronted by God through the "voice" of his word and the "voice" of his miracles. This indicates that an appropriate significance would attach itself to each sign.

In this third sign Moses was to take some water from the river (the first plague would later be performed in the Nile) and turn it into blood. The Nile, which flowed with the blood of innocent Hebrew victims, would itself witness to its involuntary carnage with this miracle. Would the point of the "sign" be wasted on any Hebrew—or Egyptian? Like Abel's blood that cried out from the ground, so would the infants' whose lives had been demanded by Pharaoh (1:22). Egypt's mighty god, the Nile, was dominated by the Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

d. What about my slow tongue? (4:10–12)

10 Moses began with yet another objection: "I have never been eloquent" (lit., "a man of words"). Then in a truly Oriental phrase, he added, literally, "not since yesterday and not since the third day," which adds up to simply "never before." Not even the experience at the bush had remedied this problem. Moses summed it all up: he was "slow of speech and tongue." Scarcely could this imply that he had a natural speech impediment or that he was a stammerer (cf. Ac 7:22). Thus Moses' complaint was not in a defective articulation but in his inability to take command of Hebrew and Egyptian with a ready and copious supply of words and thoughts to beat back all objections from his brothers and Pharaoh—though he does quite well with God!

11–12 God answered Moses with a question that takes on proverbial status (Ps 94:9). The gifts of speech, sight, and hearing are from the same Lord who was sending this hesitant leader. While God was not to be blamed for directly creating any defects, his wise providence in allowing these deprivations as well as his goodness in bestowing their ordinary functions mirror his ability to meet any emergency Moses might have suggested. So God announced, "I will help you speak" (lit., "I will be with your mouth") "and will teach you what to say."

e. Why can you not find someone else? (4:13–17)

13–14a Moses' groundless opposition angered God. Moses could think of no more good objections, for God had met every one point by point. So God's unwilling servant revealed the true nature of his heart: literally he said, "Send, I beg you, by the hand [of whom] you will send," which is a delightful Hebraism for "choose any other man, not me!" (NIV, "please send someone else").

14b–17 Nevertheless, God mercifully decided still to use his reluctant servant by sending his brother, Aaron, to supply any deficiency Moses might have felt. However, Moses had a price to pay for his intransigence: Aaron would receive the honor of leading the priesthood, which appears to be the reason for including this reference to "the Levite" (cf. 1Ch 23:13). Once more the omniscience of God is seen in that Aaron was "already on his way to meet [Moses]," having begun at the special prompting of God (v.27). Whether Aaron came with the news that the king who sought Moses' life was dead (2:15) or for some other reason is not known.

The arrangement was that Moses was literally "to become God" to Aaron, and Aaron was to become Moses' mouth (or "prophet," according to 7:1). Nothing defines more accurately the intimate relationship between God and his prophet than 4:16 and 7:1. There were to be no more excuses or discussions: "You shall speak to him and put words in his mouth." Further, God would teach both of them what they were to do. As for action and deeds, it would be the very humble staff in Moses' hand that God would use to perform the miracles he already had begun to speak about (3:20) and to show to Moses (4:2–8).

6. Preparing a leader's family (4:18–26)

18 Moses left the region of Sinai and went to Midian to ask Jethro's permission to return to Egypt. Even the call of God did not erase the need for human courtesy and respect. Interestingly, Moses did not share the real reason for his desire to return to Egypt. The reason he gave was "to see if any of [my own people] are still alive." So Jethro granted Moses permission to go and wished him well.

19–20 This short section informs us that Moses' conversion took place in Midian, not in Sinai where God had appeared to him, and that Moses had made his decision to return before he heard that the Pharaoh who had sought his life had already died. The news of the passing of his enemies may have influenced him to decide to take along his wife, Zipporah, and their two sons. Up till now only one son, Gershom, has been mentioned (2:22). Eliezer, though unmentioned in this text, probably had been born (18:4); thus the plural is correct here. Moses' family is not mentioned again until Jethro's visit with Moses and the Israelites camped at Sinai (ch. 18).

Moses took along the "staff of God." What had once been ordinary became extraordinary by virtue of its use in the service of God. So equipped, Moses prepared to return to Egypt.

21–23 By way of summary, the Lord rehearsed the key features of his previous directives to Moses: (1) you will perform miracles before Pharaoh; (2) Pharaoh will harden his heart and not release the people; (3) you are to inform him that since Israel is "my firstborn son," the Israelites must be set free so that they might worship me; and (4) Pharaoh's refusal will lead to the death of his firstborn son.

The expression "I will harden [Pharaoh's] heart so that he will not let the people go" is used here for the first time. In all, there are ten places where "hardening" (GK 2616 & 3877) of Pharaoh is ascribed to God (4:21; 7:3; 9:12; 10:1, 20, 27; 11:10; 14:4, 8, 17). But it must be stated just as firmly that Pharaoh hardened his own heart in another ten passages (7:13, 14, 22; 8:15, 19, 32; 9:7, 34, 35; 13:15). Thus the hardening was as much Pharaoh's own act as it was the work of God. Even more significant is the fact that Pharaoh alone was the agent of the hardening in the first sign and in all the first five plagues. Not until the sixth plague was it stated that God actually moved in and hardened Pharaoh's heart (9:12), as he had warned Moses in Midian that he would have to do.

The announcement that Israel was God's "son" (GK 1201), yes, even his "firstborn" (GK 1147), may have stunned Pharaoh; for he was accustomed to regarding himself alone as the "son of the gods." But for a whole people to be a "son" of the deity was a little surprising. Added to this filial relationship was the declaration that Israel was God's "firstborn," which does not mean "first" in chronological order, because Jacob (renamed Israel) was actually born after his twin, Esau. Here God meant "first in rank," firstborn by way of preeminence, with all the rights, privileges, and responsibilities of a "firstborn." Thus what had previously rested on natural rights of primogeniture now rested on grace. With it went the privilege given by God to the seed of Abraham, namely, that by means of this "firstborn" all the nations of the earth would be blessed. The penalty that Pharaoh would ultimately pay for his refusal to acknowledge Israel as the Lord's son and firstborn, however, would be aimed at his own firstborn. Just as 3:12 had included an adumbration of Moses' return to Sinai, so vv.21–23 intend to show the future work of God, beginning with the "wonders" of the plagues and ending climactically with a threat to Pharaoh's firstborn.

24–26 This paragraph has continued to baffle interpreters. The place to begin to solve these problems is with the explanation given in the text itself. Verse 26b explains that this whole episode—what Zipporah did, what she said, and on whom she operated—all have reference to the rite of circumcision. The link with the context must revolve around Pharaoh's "son," his "firstborn" (v.23), and Moses' "son," perhaps also his "firstborn," along with the fact that all Israel was God's son, his firstborn. The Lord had attacked Moses as he was en route to accomplish the mission of God in Egypt. The nature of this nearly fatal experience is not known. That Moses was the object of the divine action is clear from the fact that the otherwise unspecified son would need to be identified as belonging to someone other than Moses. The sudden introduction of Zipporah's action leads us to believe that she instinctively connected her husband's peril (a malady so great that it left only her hands free to act) with their failure to circumcise their son. This she immediately proceeded to do. But her words of reproach indicate that the root of the problem of not circumcising the boy earlier lay in her revulsion and disgust with this rite.

The narrative was included at this point to demonstrate that an additional factor was needed in the preparation of God's commissioned servant: the preparation of his family. In Ge 17:10–14 God had commanded Abraham to circumcise every male on the eighth day as a sign of the covenant; any uncircumcised male was to be cut off from his people. However, in this case the father was suffering for his refusal to circumcise his son. Thus for one small neglect, apparently out of deference to his wife's wishes, or perhaps to keep peace in the home, Moses almost forfeited his opportunity to serve God and wasted eighty years of preparation and training! To further underscore this connection between Moses' grave condition and the circumcision of his son, Zipporah took the excised prepuce and touched Moses' feet. The Lord let Moses go, and the grip of death was lifted.

C. First Steps in Leadership (4:27–7:5)

1. Reinforced by a brother (4:27–31)

27–28 At God's command Aaron, now eighty-three years of age, was to meet Moses midway en route to Egypt at the "mountain of God" (i.e., Horeb; see 3:1). As predicted in v.14, Aaron "kissed" Moses. The men had much to share as to what had happened during the forty years they were apart, but Moses' words about God's liberating directives and miraculous signs were most prominent.

29–31 Immediately the narrative jumps ahead to the meeting with the elders that Moses had been instructed to convene when he arrived in Egypt. Evidently God wished to see duly constituted authority respected; therefore an appeal needed to be made to Israel's existing leadership and their consent obtained before initiating any requests of Pharaoh. Aaron acted as chief spokesman in relaying all that God had said to Moses. In addition, though Moses alone had been told (v.17) to perform the signs God had given in vv.1–9, both Moses and Aaron performed the miracles.

Since the elders represented the people and subsequently reported to them what they had heard and seen from Moses and Aaron, the text quickly compresses each of these steps in v.30 by saying all this was done "before" (lit., "in the sight of") the people. The response was just as had been predicted in 3:18—"they believed." The pressure of physical hardship had made this people more receptive than would be their custom in later years. Whether the signs were needed, as Moses had feared in v.1, the text has no comment. Especially heartening was the fact that God cared about them and their misery. Their response was immediately to worship the Lord, for he was the One who had "visited" (NIV, "was concerned about") them and "had seen" their trouble.

2. Rebuffed by the enemy (5:1–14)

1–2 Some time later Moses and Aaron, perhaps accompanied by the elders (cf. 3:18), went to Pharaoh and boldly demanded that he release the people. They wished to celebrate a festival to this God in whose name the demand was being made, namely, "the LORD, the God of Israel" (see comment on 3:14–15). Pharaoh's retort to this affront to his sole right to command these slaves was crisp and cynical. Indeed, if God chose to identify himself with such a hapless and hopeless lot of slaves, and if he was so powerless to effect their deliverance, why should Pharaoh fear him or obey his voice? Pharaoh's answer was clear: "No!"

3 Perhaps stunned by Pharaoh's insolence and arrogance, Moses and Aaron recast their request in milder terms. Acting now as representatives of the people and in language given at the burning bush, the demand is changed to a humble request. God's servants warned Pharaoh that should he disallow this temporary release, he could suffer untold losses; for this God might allow all sorts of pestilence to break out, or he might even send an invader across the eastern frontier where Israel lived in vulnerable exposure.

4–14 Pharaoh was unmoved by any of these requests or threats. In his judgment the people were much too lazy or too idle, and Moses and Aaron were disturbers of the peace at best and plotters of sedition against the throne at worst. His question to them was in essence, "Why are you encouraging this?" There were already too many people (another witness to God's covenantal faithfulness), and should he give them rest from their labors to further increase their numbers?

The Egyptian slave drivers were to instruct the Israelite "foremen" that straw would no longer be provided for the bricks Israel had to produce. From then on Israel was to rummage the countryside for what stubble and straw they could find without decreasing their daily quota of bricks. Chopped straw was mixed in with the clay to make the bricks more pliable and stronger. So the people were scattered all over Egypt while the slave drivers kept beating the Israelite foremen and pressuring them to meet their daily quota of bricks.

3. Rebuffed by the enslaved (5:15–21)

15–16 The Hebrew foremen, unaware of the total deterioration of their position due to Moses and Aaron's request of Pharaoh, personally appealed the "No straw policy." In a courteous but bitter complaint, they asked, "Why have you treated your servants this way? We are given no straw; we are constantly pressed to keep making bricks; we are beaten—and the fault, sir, lies with your own people." This last charge seems to deferentially use the words "your people" in a circumlocution for Pharaoh himself.

17–18 Pharaoh's analysis of the situation has been reduced to a single word: "lazy." He repeated the word for emphasis (cf. v.8). If their request was "Let us go . . . now," then he was ready to render his conclusion: "Get to work." No straw would be supplied, and no falling behind in quotas would be allowed either.

19–21 Only now did the real untenability of their position begin to come home to the foremen. Moses and Aaron had deliberately "stationed" (NIV, "waiting") themselves so as apparently to be the first to debrief the men as they emerged from their meeting with Pharaoh; for they had had a fairly good idea of what would be the outcome of the foremen's audience with the king of Egypt. What they may not have expected was the full venting of the foremen's anger when they "found" them.

Instead of earning respect from these Hebrew foremen for all their efforts to alleviate their brutal condition, Moses and Aaron felt, in no uncertain terms, the heat of the foremen's anger. They asked God to judge these two troublemakers, for they were making Israel's reputation to stink. The words of vv.20–21 reflect those of v.3. Instead of a plague "striking" Israel and a "sword" coming, Moses and Aaron, not an enemy, had put a sword in Pharaoh's hands. So it happened that they "struck," or as we would say, "happened to bump into," Moses and Aaron.

4. Revisited by old objections (5:22–23)

22–23 Even though Moses had been forewarned from the start that Pharaoh would not accede to God's requests, he was not prepared for the effect this refusal would have on his own fellow Israelites. Filled with an "I told you so" attitude, it was Moses' turn to ask "Why?" (cf. Pharaoh in v.4, the foremen in v.15): "Why did you ever send me [in the first place]?" (lit. tr.). Fortunately, Moses did not vent his wrath on the foremen, but he did pour out to God the keenness of his resentment. Moses did not charge God directly with authoring this evil, for the idiom only means that God allowed and permitted such trouble as Pharaoh had thus spawned.

The clincher for Moses was v.23. His prayer (in essence) was, "O Lord, why is all this happening? Why did you ever send me?" Then he concluded: "Besides, you haven't done what you said you would anyway—deliver them! I've done nothing but bring/make trouble since I arrived here!" Obviously, Moses was again wrestling with some of his old objections (cf. 3:11–4:17). In his estimation things were moving too slowly, and the suffering was intensifying rather than letting up.

5. Reinforced by the Name of God (6:1–8)

1 There were no direct answers to Moses' questions, for these were to be gathered from his experience as their leader. But Moses' complaint about the time could now be answered, for God announced his "now"—he would delay no longer. The promised show of God's power would commence immediately with a show of his "mighty hand" (cf. 3:19).

2–5 The heart of God's response to Moses and the people was a fresh revelation of God's character and nature. One phrase stands out: "I am the LORD," which appears four times from v.2 to v.8. Once again God reminded Moses that he was the God who had promised the land of Canaan to the patriarchs and that he had also seen the affliction of his chosen people. Moreover, whereas in the past the patriarchs had known him in the character of and in his capacity as El Shaddai ("God Almighty"; cf. Ge 17:1; 28:3; et al.)—the name that disclosed his power to impart life, to increase the goods of life, and to deal with all unrighteousness—now he would be known as "the LORD" (i.e., Yahweh; GK 3378).

Moses and Israel (and even the Egyptians later) would shortly know what "I am the LORD" meant. This would not be the first instance of the use of that name, for it had already occurred some 162 times in Genesis. Significantly, people "began to call on the name of the LORD" as early as Ge 4:26. The Lord is the God who would personally, dynamically, and faithfully be present to fulfill the covenant he had made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The patriarchs had only the promises, not the things promised. The fullness of time had come when God was to be known in the capacity and character of his name Yahweh, as he fulfilled what he had promised and did what he had decreed. These deeds are further enumerated and spelled out in the seven promises of vv.6–8.

6–8 The contents of God's ancient promises are brought together and arranged so as to explain what "I am the LORD" means.

1. There were three first-person verbs with God's promise of redemption (v.6): (1) "I will bring you out"; (2) "I will free you"; (3) "I will redeem you." God promises to "redeem" Israel with the same "mighty acts of judgment" he had alluded to in 3:20 and 4:23 and had predicted long ago to Abraham in Ge 15:14. The plagues were to be judgments for crimes as well as spectacular wonders to instill faith.

2. Two more first-person verbs detailed God's promise to adopt Israel as his own people (v.7): (1) "I will take you as my own people"; (2) "I will be your God." These two promises will serve as two parts of the tripartite formula to be repeated in the Old and New Testaments almost fifty times: "I will be your God, you shall be my people and I will dwell in the midst of you" (cf. Ge 17:7–8; 28:21; Ex 29:45–46; et al.).

3. The last two promises focused on God's promise of the land (v.8): (1) "I will bring you to the land"; (2) "I will give it to you." This he pledged with the oath of his uplifted hand (cf. Ge 22:16; 26:3) so that by two immutable things—his word of promise and his oath—Israel (and all subsequent believers; cf. Heb 6:17–18) might have a strong encouragement and a solid confidence in the future. Then, as if to remind Israel once again, God concluded with his signature: "I am the LORD."

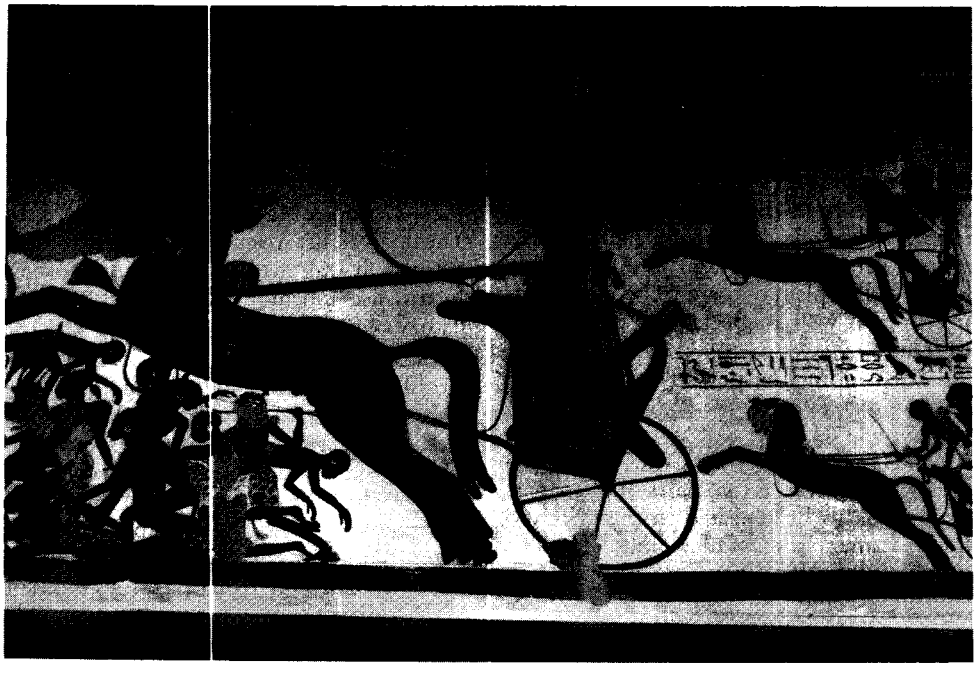
6. Reminders of Moses' lowly origins (6:9–7:5)

9–12 In spite of the grandeur of what "I am the LORD" meant for Israel, the people did not listen "for shortness of breath" (NIV, "their discouragement"). It was the inward pressure caused by deep anguish that prevented proper breathing—like children sobbing and gasping for their breath. This made such an impact on Moses that he had another attack of self-distrust and despondency. How could he persuade Pharaoh when he failed so miserably to impress his own countrymen who presumably would have had a naturally deep interest in what he had to say, given their circumstances. Anyway, his lips were "faltering" (cf. NIV note, "uncircumcised") in the job they had been given to do. Thus Moses returned to his fourth objection (4:10).

13–30 The stage has been set in 1:1–6:12 for the main action to begin. However, before that happens, it is important to know just who were "Aaron and Moses to whom the LORD" had spoken. In fact, the whole genealogy of vv.14–25 is surrounded and framed by the near verbatim repetition of vv.10–13 in vv.26–30 and v.14a in v.25b. Therefore, the genealogical list concentrates on two men and how it was that they happened to be at this precise and momentous juncture in the history of humans and nations.

Everything in the list suggests that God's choosing of Moses had nothing to do with natural advantage or ability. The list stops after naming only three of Jacob's sons—Reuben, Simeon, and Levi—for its object had been reached. Moses and Aaron sprang, not from the "firstborn," Reuben, but from Levi, Jacob's third son, and not even then from Levi's oldest son but Kohath, his second son. And Moses was not even the oldest son of his father, for Aaron was older. Moses' calling and election of God were a gift of grace and not based on rights and privileges of birth.

So wicked were Jacob's three older sons that they each inherited a curse: Reuben lost his birthright as "firstborn" (Ge 49:3–4), and Simeon and Levi were denied an inheritance with the tribes and were scattered instead (vv.5–8). But while Reuben's and Simeon's descendants did morally follow in their fathers' footsteps, Levi's descendants, with devotion to God, turned what was a curse into a blessing and used their dispersion through the tribes as an avenue of blessing to all through the priesthood and service at the sanctuary of God. This honor, however, did not prevent Levi's descendant Korah (vv.21–24) from destroying himself by his own rebellion (Nu 16); yet his descendants were not thereby forever adversely determined for evil, for they later rose to a place of high position in the temple and in composing Pss 42–49, 84–85, and 87. So the making of "this same Moses and Aaron," as well as the uses they were put to after they were made, were totally the work of God. Nevertheless, the record also made plain that there was a congruity between the experiences and all the endowments that had accrued to Moses during these eighty years of life; thus election worked in the natural realm as well as the spiritual.



Pharoah Ramses II, one of the proposed pharaohs of the time of the Exodus, here shown in a wall relief indicating victory over an enemy.

The text returns to repeat the words of vv.10–13 in vv.26–30, as if to say, "Look who is talking back to God! A man of few credentials except those given him in the providence and grace of God!" But never mind that, v.28 seems to affirm; it is now a whole new game. The hour had come, and the name of the LORD would be all the equipment Moses would need.

7:1–5 While the LORD had made Moses as "God" to Aaron and Aaron in turn as his "prophet" (GK 5566) to the people, Moses was also ordained as "God" to Pharaoh in that he would speak and act with authority and power from above and Aaron would be Moses' "prophet" addressing Pharaoh (cf. 4:15–16). But again this team was warned that Pharaoh's heart would be "hardened" (see comment on 4:21), even though God would graciously provide him with supporting evidence by way of signs and wonders. Nevertheless, after God had judged Egypt with his "mighty acts of judgment," Israel would come out by its "divisions."

Not only would Israel know what was meant by the name "LORD," but so would the Egyptians. In addition to understanding the significance of that name (Heb. YHWH or Yahweh), these miracles would also be an invitation for the Egyptians to personally believe in Israel's Lord. Thus the invitation was pressed repeatedly in 7:5; 8:10, 22; 9:14, 16, 29; 14:4, 18—and some apparently did believe, for there was "a mixed multitude" (12:38 KJV) that left Egypt with Israel.

D. Judgment and Salvation Through the Plagues (7:6–11:10)

1. Presenting the signs of divine authority (7:6–13)

6–9 After eighty years of preparation, Moses began his life work. He and Aaron were directed to reappear before Pharaoh, who in turn would request them to perform a miracle, presumably to assure him that they were messengers of Israel's God.

Significantly, Scripture judges Pharaoh's demand for validation of such claims as reasonable. The Lord informed Moses to use the first of the three signs he had drawn on to convince Israel that he was indeed an accredited messenger of God (see 4:2–9, 30–31). However, in this instance Aaron's staff (it was the same as Moses' staff or the staff of God; cf. 4:17; 7:15, 17, 19–20), when cast down, became a tannin (GK 9490; "great serpent," "dragon," or "crocodile"; in 4:3–4 it became a nahash, "snake"; GK 5729). The connection of the name tannin with the symbol of Egypt is clear from Ps 74:13 and Eze 29:3.

10–13 Moses and Aaron did exactly as God instructed them—only to learn that Pharaoh's wise men, sorcerers, and magicians were able to imitate the same feat by their magical arts. The use of magic in Egypt is well-documented in the Westcar Papyrus, where magicians are credited with changing wax crocodiles into real ones only to be turned back to wax again after seizing their tails.

The relation between Aaron's miracle and the magical act of the magicians, whom Paul knew by the names of Jannes and Jambres in 2Ti 3:8, is hard to define. Possibly by the use of illusion and deceptive appearances they were able to cast spells over what appeared to be their staffs but which actually were serpents rendered immobile (catalepsy) by pressure on the nape of their necks and by the use of magical spells. Or perhaps it was by demonic power. However, as evidence of God's greater power, Pharaoh's magicians lost their "staffs" when Aaron's "swallowed [them] up." But Pharaoh was unaffected. His heart "became hard."

2. First plague: water turned to blood (7:14–24)

14–18 Moses was instructed by God to go early (so in 8:20) in the morning with his brother, Aaron, to intercept Pharaoh and his officials as they went out to the Nile (cf. v.20). Pharaoh's purpose for going here remains unknown, perhaps to worship the Nile River god, Hapi. Moses and Aaron, however, were there to remind Pharaoh that "the LORD, the God of the Hebrews" had sent them (5:1); yet the king of Egypt remained resolute in his defiance of this Lord. Therefore God would help Pharaoh "know" who he was (cf. 5:2). God would change the water of the Nile River into blood when Moses struck the Nile with his staff.

19–21 When Aaron stretched out his staff and struck what the Egyptians regarded as sacred, the Nile and the water all over Egypt turned to blood. What was the "blood" (GK 1947)? Some scholars suggest that since all the plagues followed a natural cycle and all happened in one year, this first plague could be connected with an unusually high Nile flood in July and August. The sources for the Nile's inundation are the equatorial rains that fill the White Nile, which originates in east-central Africa (present-day Uganda) and flows sluggishly through swamps in eastern Sudan, and the Blue Nile and the Atbara River, which both fill with melting snow from the mountains and become raging torrents filled with tons of red soil from the basins of both these rivers. The higher the inundation, the deeper the color of the red waters. In addition to this discoloration, a type of algae, known as flagellates, comes from the Sudan swamps and Lake Tana along the White Nile, which produces the stench and the deadly fluctuation in the oxygen level of the river that proves to be so fatal to the fish. Such a process, at the command of God, seems to be the case for this first plague rather than any chemical change of the water into red and white corpuscles (cf. Joel 2:31: "the moon [will be changed] to blood"; or 2Ki 3:22, where, however, the water looked "like blood"). Unlike other plagues and in agreement with this natural phenomenon, this plague did not stop suddenly. This change affected the "streams" (= seven [in Herodotus] branches of the Nile), the canals (to fertilize the fields), the ponds (left from the overflowing Nile), and the reservoirs (artificially made to store water for later use).

22–24 Once again Pharaoh's magicians applied their "secret arts" and imitated the miracle sufficiently to blunt the force of it on Pharaoh's conscience. The question where they found any unblemished water if the fourfold water system in "all Egypt" (vv.19, 21) was affected, is answered in v.24—from subterranean water from freshly dug wells. But Pharaoh remained unmoved and merely returned to his palace from the bloody river's edge: his heart grew rigid and hard in spite of this evidence.

3. Second plague: frogs (7:25–8:15)

25–8:5 Seven days after the first plague had begun, Moses and Aaron were instructed by God to take their demands to the king's palace. If he refused to grant their repeated request to go to the desert to worship the Lord, they were to announce in the set formula, "I will plague your whole country with frogs." This was not to be a "sign" but a "plague" only. In comparison with what was to come, this was only a trivial annoyance.

6–7 On Aaron's signal the frogs emerged from the water and "covered" the land. These pesky creatures, though regarded as sacred to the Egyptians, were God's scourge to whip the Egyptians into facing the living God. The intensification of the nuisance by Pharaoh's magicians was totally ignored by him. The fact was that tons of croaking, crawling, creeping intruders were everywhere.

8–15 Why should the frogs so suddenly abandon their natural habitat in August during a high Nile and invade the homes, bedrooms, ovens, kneading troughs, and even the palace itself? And why should they likewise die off so suddenly? Perhaps the frogs abandoned all the polluted and overflowing waterways (cf. 7:19) and sought cover from the sun on dry land in homes where possibly the presence of some unadulterated water attracted them. However, since they had already been exposed to spores of bacillus anthracis from the death spread along the waterways, the frogs also suddenly collapsed and died.

Pharaoh had finally been forced to acknowledge the power of the Lord, not by human armies, but by squadrons of loathsome little frogs. Now he knew who this "LORD" was (cf. 5:2), and he acceded to Moses and Aaron's request—only to renege later on.

Moses' response to Pharaoh's desperate or, as some think, cynical plea was to dare Pharaoh to test his prophetic credentials and, more important, the power of God by setting the time when he wished to be rid of this plague. Pharaoh's quick response of "tomorrow" led Moses to enter into some intensely earnest prayer. Moses' freedom to negotiate on his own terms and then, as it were, to have God back him up is remarkable. The frogs dropped dead all over the place—in the houses, fields, and open courtyards. Frogs were piled up in heaps, and there was a firm reminder to aid Pharaoh's wavering memory—the stench of dead frogs. Nevertheless, that faded and so did Pharaoh's permission. This "relief" was worse than the plague for this proud king. People do not often learn the righteousness of God when he grants them his mercy and his favor (Ps 78:34–42; Isa 26:10).

4. Third plague: gnats (8:16–19)

16–17 The third plague began without warning to Pharaoh or his magicians. God again used the outstretched staff in the hand of Aaron to initiate this plague. Aaron struck the dust of the ground, just as he had struck the Nile in the first plague (7:20), and "all the dust throughout the land of Egypt became gnats." The word "gnats" occurs five times in this passage and nowhere else except in the parallel passage of Ps 105:31. It is debatable whether this word means "lice" (so KJV et al.) or "gnats" or "mosquitoes," as we favor (with most interpreters).

18–19 On their fourth attempt to duplicate the miracles of Moses and Aaron, the Egyptian magicians admitted defeat. In spite of what success they did or did not experience in the previous three encounters (and it could well have been through sleight of hand—given the advance notice of the nature of the plague or sign in those cases—or perhaps it was just plain demonic, supernatural empowerment to mimic God's power), they now realized that the plague of the gnats was the "finger of God," i.e., the result of his power. But Pharaoh was not so persuaded in his heart and mind—he remained adamant and opposed to any Israelite demands.

5. Fourth plague: flies (8:20–32)

20–21 As in the first plague, Moses was sent to intercept Pharaoh again as he went down to the Nile early in the morning. This time Pharaoh and all his people and their houses were threatened with a plague of "flies." It seems best to say that the fly Stomoxys calcitrans best fulfills all the conditions of the text. This fly multiplies rapidly in tropical or subtropical regions (hence the delta with its Mediterranean climate would be exempt) in the fall by laying its six hundred to eight hundred eggs in dung or rotting plant debris. When it is full grown, the fly prefers to infest houses and stables, and it bites both humans and animals, usually in the lower extremities. Thus it becomes the principal transmitter of skin anthrax (see plague six), which it contracts by crawling over the carcasses of animals that have died of internal anthrax.

22–24 By inaugurating a "distinction" (GK 7151) between Moses' people and Pharaoh's people, God intended to aid those hardened Egyptian hearts who suspected that nothing more than chance or difficult times had been involved in the preceding three plagues. This distinction is found in the fourth, fifth, seventh, ninth, and tenth plagues. The purpose of this preferential treatment to Israel was to teach Pharaoh and the Egyptians that the Lord God of Israel was in the midst of this land doing these works; it was not one of their local deities. Gods were thought by ancient Near Easterners to possess no power except on their own home ground. But not so here! The innocent were being delivered and the guilty afflicted because this God was in their midst. He would again do a "miraculous sign" designed to evoke faith in him from the Egyptians and the release of Israel.

In another innovative feature Moses announced in advance when the plague was due to strike, giving the Egyptians time to repent. This advance notice is found in the fourth, fifth, sixth, eighth, and tenth plagues. Moreover, Pharaoh and his court were again singled out as the first victims of this plague because of the heavy responsibility they bore for their intransigence.

25–32 Moses' claim—that if Israel sacrificed animals in Egypt, it would be extremely offensive to the Egyptians—has been challenged by some commentators as a clever ruse on Moses' part. Thus Moses rejected Pharaoh's counteroffer to allow Israel to sacrifice in Egypt. Finally Pharaoh conceded the long-denied permission. With a note of self-importance he pontificated, "I will let you go . . . but you must not go very far." And as if to show what his real thoughts were all along, he quickly added, "Now pray for me."

Moses was not to be put down, for his mission likewise had dignity; so he too began with the pronoun "I": "I am leaving you, and I will pray" (lit. tr.). Moses, with an obvious rebuke, said in effect, "Don't you 'however' me when you are in such a poor bargaining position." But then on a courteous note, with a switch to the third-person form of address, he continued, "Only be sure that Pharaoh does not act deceitfully again."

The plague was removed through Moses' prayer (cf. 1Ki 18:42; Am 7:2, 5). So effective was the power of prayer and the evidence that God was in their midst that "not a fly remained." But Pharaoh once again (cf. second plague, 8:15) returned to his hard-nosed stand once he obtained the physical relief he desired.

6. Fifth plague: cattle murrain (9:1–7)

1–4 The fifth plague was patterned after the second: Moses was to go to Pharaoh's palace and announce the next pestilence. A "terrible plague" would be brought, not by God's "finger," as the Egyptian magicians had put it in 8:19, but by his "hand." It would fall on all the cattle in the field. There is no need to press the expression "all the livestock" to mean each and every one and then find there are no Egyptian cattle left for the seventh plague (vv.19, 25), for it is already plain in v.3 that the plague affected only those cattle "in the field." Normally the Egyptian cattle were stabled from May through December, during the flood and the drying-off periods when the pastures were waterlogged. Thus some of the cattle were already being turned out to pasture down south; so it must have been sometime in the month of January. These cattle were then affected when they came into contact with the heaps of dead frogs left from the second plague and died of bacillus anthracis, the hoof and mouth disease.

The Israelite cattle were exempted from the plague, possibly because the delta would have been slower in recovering from the effects of the flood, which was farther downstream. Also, the Israelites' different attitude toward corpses—they took precautions to deal with the heaps of dead carcasses—may have spared their own cattle. This was the second plague where God placed a distinction between the Egyptians and the Israelites.

5–7 The interval between the announcement and the morrow, when the fifth plague was to take effect, was to allow time for a believing response from Pharaoh and the Egyptians. Presumably some believed and attempted to rescue their animals by bringing them in from the fields. Others purposely delayed turning their cattle out to pasture.

When Pharaoh heard that all the Israelite cattle had miraculously escaped the cattle plague, he sent envoys to Goshen to investigate. The rumor was true. Pharaoh must have had his own explanations and rationalizations, for his position and heart again became resolute and unyielding. Meanwhile, another part of Egypt's wide array of gods was hard hit: the Apis, or sacred bull Ptah; the calf god Ra; the cows of Hathor; the jackal-headed god Anubis; and the bull Bakis of the god Mentu. The evidence was too strong to be mere coincidence: (1) the time was set by the Lord, the God of the Hebrews; (2) a "distinction" was made between the cattle of the two peoples; and (3) the results were total: all Egyptian cattle "in the field" died; not one head of Israelite livestock perished.

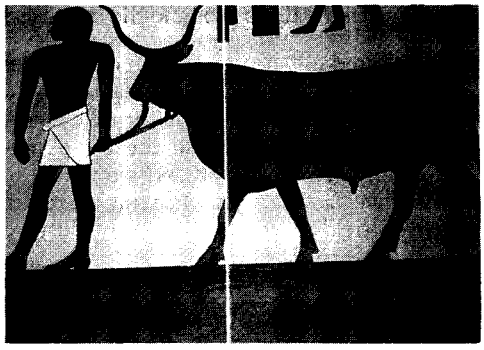
7. Sixth plague: boils (9:8–12)

8–9 Like the third plague, this one was sent unannounced. For the first time human lives are attacked and endangered, and thus it was a foreshadowing of the tenth and most dreadful of all the plagues. With a touch of divine irony and poetic justice, Moses and Aaron were each to take two handfuls (the form is dual) of soot from a limekiln or brick-making furnace, the symbol of Israel's bondage (see 1:14; 5:7–19). The soot must have been placed in a container and carried to Pharaoh's presence, where Moses then tossed it into the air. The act was to be a symbolic action much like those of the latter prophets (Jer 19 or Eze 4–5). There was also a logical connection between the soot created by the sweat of God's enslaved people and the judgment that was to afflict the bodies of the enslavers.

10–12 When the soot was tossed skyward, festering boils broke out on all the Egyptians and their animals. Attempts to identify this malady have produced various suggestions: (1) small pox, (2) Nile-blisters similar to scarlet fever, (3) skin anthrax, and (4) inflammations or blains that become malignant ulcers. Skin anthrax seems the most probable, since Dt 28:35 limits this plague principally to the lower extremities of the body. Furthermore, the black soot is especially suited, for anthrax (cf. anthracite coal) is a sort of black, burning abscess often occurring with cattle murrain.



The bull, an important animal to the Egyptians, experieneced one of the plagues. This relief shows an Egyptian leading a bull.

The flies of the fourth plague have generally been blamed as the carriers of the anthrax spores, but they were totally removed at the conclusion of that plague. Presumably this was another generation of flies (depending on the temperature, another batch can come in twenty-seven to thirty-seven days). After animals or humans are bitten on the legs by these flies, a small bluish-red pustule with a central depression in the middle of the swelling appears after two or three days. The center of the boil dries up only to have new boils swell up, and the skin festers as if it had been burnt and then peels off.

In a humorous aside, v.11 notes that the magicians (who bowed out in plague three and are unnoticed, though possibly present, in plagues four and five) literally (and vocationally) "could not stand" before Moses. The same could be said for all the Egyptians. Here for the first time God hardened Pharaoh's heart—a seconding, as it were, of his own motion made in each of the preceding five plagues.

8. Seventh plague: hail (9:13–35)

13–19 As in the first (7:15) and the fourth (8:20) plagues, Moses was to begin this plague by rising early in the morning to confront Pharaoh with the Lord's message. From these early days in February until the time of the tenth and climactic plague, Pharaoh would spend approximately eight of the most dreadful weeks he had ever known.

To further underscore the theological significance of these weeks and their events, Moses was prompted by God to preface his latest announcement of divine judgment with a long message filled with doctrinal instruction. This unprecedented message was calculated to move Pharaoh and his subjects from rebellion to belief in the God of the Hebrews. Its ominous contents included (1) an announcement that God would vent the "full force" (i.e., "all the remaining plagues") of his plagues on Egypt so that no one would doubt that there was anyone like this God in all the earth; (2) a reminder that previous pestilences and plagues might well have swept both king and people off the face of the earth had not God deliberately and purposely spared them for one very important reason: that God's power and name would be heralded throughout the earth by means of Pharaoh's stupidity; (3) a declaration that in denying the release of Israel Pharaoh had acted as an obstructionist against Almighty God himself; (4) a threat that Egypt would experience the worst hailstorm it had ever seen in its history; and (5) an extraordinary feature that provided for those Egyptians who believed Moses' words were a means of escape from the effects of the storm.

The seventh plague was to be judgment with the expectation that it might result in the blessing of belief and trust. Had not Abraham been given this mission to be a means of blessing to "all peoples on earth" (Ge 12:3)? And has not the theme "that the Egyptians might know that I am the LORD" (or slight variations) appeared frequently in the midst of these plagues (7:5; 8:10; 9:14, 16, 29–30; and later in 14:4, 18)? Moses, like his Lord, would sigh of Israel (Nu 14:11): "How long will these people treat me with contempt? How long will they refuse to believe in me, in spite of all the miraculous signs I have performed among them?" The same words could apply just as well to Egypt.

The months of leniency were about over. Now the full blast of the ensuing plagues would penetrate directly to Pharaoh's "heart" (v.14; NIV, "against you"). The "heart" (GK 4213) does not signify "his person" but rather his inner being, nature, and seared conscience. His pride and arrogance would be tossed to the wind as the terrors of these new plagues forced him in perplexed and desperate sorrow of soul to literally beg that the Israelites leave his presence immediately. Yet Pharaoh was no mere pawn to be toyed with at will, for the object was that he too might come to experience personally and believe ("know") the incomparability of God's person and greatness. The very superlative rating of his deeds—none "like it" (of the hailstorm in vv.18, 24; of the locusts in 10:6)—should have led the king and his people to the identical rating of God's person (no one "like you" in 15:11 and "like me" in 9:14).

20–26 Rainfall comes so occasionally in Upper Egypt that the prediction of a severe hailstorm accompanied by a violent electrical storm must have been greeted with much skepticism. Only the delta receives on the average about ten inches of rainfall per year while Upper Egypt has one inch or, more often, none. But there were some who "feared the word of the LORD" and acted accordingly. Some Egyptians must have received Moses' words as being from God himself; for they became a part of that mixed company who left Egypt with Israel (see 12:38).

Moses apparently lost his shyness and diffidence, for he was the one who now stretched forth his staff and his hand (cf. Aaron's leading role in the first three plagues: 7:19–20; 8:6, 17). Hail joined by unannounced thunder and balls of fire that ran along the ground provided Egypt with the most spectacular display in her history. The destruction was devastating. Five times in vv.24–25 the word kol ("all," "everything") is used; yet it is used hyperbolically and not literally because the first two kols ("in all Egypt," vv.24–25a; NIV, "throughout Egypt") are immediately qualified to exempt the land of Goshen where Israel lived. Nevertheless, even though the storm did not take every single tree, herb, or creature in the field, it was tragic enough to impress the most callous individual.

27–30 Pharaoh, obviously shaken, conceded the point: "I have sinned," though he included the face-saving qualifier "this time." What made this plague any different from the rest—except its severity? Only when the Lord began to hurt Pharaoh did he (momentarily) seek him (cf. Ps 78:34). Like Jeremiah (Jer 12:1), Pharaoh declared that "the LORD" (i.e., Yahweh, not Elohim!) was in the right and that he and his people were in the wrong!

Moses' reply was simple, confident, and noble. He would spread out his hands in prayer (a gesture of request and appeal to God) once he was back with his own people, and the hail and thunder would stop—to prove once again (in this repeated apologetic and evangelistic refrain) that the whole earth belongs to the Lord. "But," Moses added, "I know that you and your officials still do not fear the LORD God."

31–35 Since in Egypt flax is usually sown in the beginning of January and is in flower three weeks later while barley is sown in August and is harvested in February, both would be exceedingly vulnerable if this plague occurred in the beginning or middle of February (probably a little later than usual with a high Nile year). Wheat and spelt were also sown in August but were not ready for harvest until the end of March. That Goshen was unaffected by this storm matches the agricultural observations; for the Mediterranean temperate zone has these storms only in late spring and early autumn but not from November to March. Flax, of which there were several kinds, was used for linen garments. The vicinity of Tanis was ideal for producing it. Barley was used in the manufacture of beer (a common Egyptian drink), as horse feed, and by the poorer classes for bread.

After Moses' prayer was answered, Pharaoh once again rescinded his offer and forgot all about his confession of sin and wrong.

9. Eighth plague: locusts (10:1–20)

1–2 For the first time we are told that Egypt's officials were also as obstinate as Pharaoh; therefore the Lord had hardened all of them as well. But Moses was to find a lesson in this divine work of hardening. There follows, then, another theological preface to the eighth plague, just as Pharaoh had been served in 9:14–16 with a similar lesson prior to the seventh plague. The lesson for Israel was to be twofold: (1) to educate succeeding generations in how the Lord "dealt harshly" with the Egyptians and performed his miracles in their land, and (2) to thereby bring Israel to faith in the Lord.

3–6 Moses proceeded to the palace and announced to Pharaoh the next plague. The message began with a question: "How long will you refuse to humble yourself before the Lord?" His act of self-condemnation and abject humility in 9:27 was just that—an act. But here was the consummate question of all questions that God finally raises against all obstinate sinners: "How long?"

The demand for Israel's release was again laid down along with a time lag that provided ample opportunity for reflection and repentance: "tomorrow." Moses informed Pharaoh that God would "bring locusts into your country." Joel 2:25 calls locusts God's "great army." They would finish off every living green thing, leaving destruction in their wake. It would exceed any locust invasion Egypt had ever known in the past. With that, Moses and Aaron turned their backs on Pharaoh (an amazing gesture for normal protocol) and stalked out.

7–11 Pharaoh's officials picked up Moses' "How long?" with a "How long?" of their own. Out of loyalty to their king and country, they blamed Moses; but it was obvious that they were beginning to become impatient with Pharaoh's intransigence. Could Pharaoh not see the "snare" this man was setting for them, and did Pharaoh not realize that Egypt was about ruined? Someone had to give in. They urged Pharaoh to yield: "Let the people go."

In another first, Pharaoh had Moses and Aaron return to the palace for some negotiations related to the imminent pestilence. Clearly as a sop to his frightened officials, Pharaoh half-heartedly gave Moses permission to take Israel to sacrifice in the desert. However, he coyly asked (as if he did not remember Moses' original request or the advice just given him by his own officials), "Just who will be going [on this religious trip]?" Moses responded out of a position of strength: "We all are going to celebrate this festival to the LORD" (cf. v.9). "Oh no you are not," was Pharaoh's decisive rejoinder. "You take only your 'men'; that will be enough for religious purposes." It is true, of course, that later Israel required only her males to attend these three yearly festivals (23:17; 34:23; Dt 16:16), but the artificiality of this limitation at this time is evident since women normally accompanied the men at Egyptian religious festivals.

The contempt Pharaoh felt for Moses' request and for the Lord himself can be seen in his biting sarcasm and veiled threat of v.10: "The LORD be with you [i.e., 'May God help you']—if I let you go, along with your women and children!" To Pharaoh it was plain that Moses and his people were up to no good. Pharaoh did not yield to this moderate first-step request for fear of what was to be (though unknown at the time to him) the ultimate request. Moses and Aaron were then insulted by being chased from the premises—another in a string of wicked firsts.

12–15 So the plague was ordered to begin as Moses again stretched out his hand and staff over Egypt. Swarms of locusts from the bumper crop produced due to the exceedingly wet summer in Ethiopia were swept away from natural breeding grounds around Port Susa and Jidda (on the west side of the Red Sea across from the Arabian Peninsula) by an east wind that blew all day and all night (cf. 14:21). Thus these locusts (now ready to migrate in February or March after hatching during the winter from the eggs laid in September) were driven into Egypt by a sirocco (a hot wind) from the Arabian Peninsula, instead of into Canaan, had the winds been from the southwest. They came in droves (lit., "exceedingly heavy"). They finished off everything the hail had left.

16–20 Hastily Pharaoh summoned Moses and Aaron and, without any qualifications as in 9:27–28, confessed his sin against the Lord their God and against these men. But he still insisted on having the upper hand. "Now," he added, as if to organize Moses' conclusion, "forgive my sin once more [i.e., this one more time]." No more would he change his mind, no more tricks! Just ask your God, he pled, "to take this deadly plague away from me."

Once again God graciously answered Moses' prayer. He sent a strong "sea breeze," which for people in Canaan would have been a "west wind" but for those in Egypt was a north or northwest wind, which drove the locusts into the Reed Sea. The results at the palace, however, were the same.

10. Ninth plague: darkness (10:21–29)

21–23 Unannounced, like the third and sixth plagues, the ninth plague came in the month of March, as Moses once again stretched out his hand. No doubt God used the yearly phenomenon known as the Khamsin, meaning the "fifty"-day wind that blows off the Sahara Desert from the south and southwest usually about the time of the vernal equinox. During two or three of those days, it blows with great force, picking up sand and dust. Given the unusually high Nile with the red dirt it had spilled over the fields now barren and baked after the hail and locusts had destroyed all the vegetation that would hold the soil in its place, this was no ordinary Khamsin. The polluted air got so thick—"no one could see anyone"—that the sun itself was blotted out for "three days." Israel meanwhile was somewhat protected by the hills on the south side of the Wadi Tumilat and by the fact that the red silt would not have dried out as much since their fields were later in clearing the effects of the flood.

24–29 Pharaoh decided to compromise further: Israel could take their families to this festival celebration, but they must leave their flocks and herds. But Moses yielded nothing. "Not a hoof is to be left," he affirmed, for they needed them in worshiping God. The festival was brand new, and it was as yet unannounced, explained Moses. But Pharaoh had had enough. Rudely he demanded they leave and never darken his presence again on penalty of death. But did he think that would prevent further disasters? Had not plagues three, six, and nine come without warning? Was it not strange for him to be threatening Moses with death when the smell of death was all over his court and Egypt?

11. Tenth plague: death of the firstborn (11:1–10)

1–3 These verses are parenthetical; for Moses had one last message to communicate to Pharaoh before he left his presence after the ninth plague in 10:29, and thus he knew that Pharaoh had "spoken correctly" (cf. 10:28) in halting any further audiences. God had informed Moses before he went in to see Pharaoh concerning the ninth plague that this contest was about to end abruptly. One more plague and he would send Israel away, "in the manner of one's sending away a slavegirl who had been promised to be one's daughter-in-law" (probably a better rendering of the Heb. than NIV's "when he does"), i.e., filled with gifts on her release from slavery. This interpretation leads easily and naturally into their requests of the Egyptians for gold and silver articles. The reasons for the extraordinary generosity of the Egyptians are (1) the LORD made them "favorably disposed" toward Israel (cf. Ps 106:46), and (2) "Moses himself was highly regarded." The greatness of the man was not because of his personal qualifications but because of the esteem he had accumulated from the magicians (8:18–19), the court officials (9:20; 10:7), and Pharaoh himself (9:27; 10:16).

4–8 Moses' speech continues the remarks he began in 10:29. Unlike all the other plagues, this time the LORD himself would march through the land of Egypt. The firstborn of all Egyptian families—slaves and cattle—would die at midnight (the exact day was not specified). An unprecedented outpouring of grief would follow, but among the Israelites there would be such tranquility on that evening that not a dog would have occasion to bark! Moses' final word was that the Egyptians on bent knee would beg the Israelites to leave immediately. Moses said, "After that I will leave." But the stupidity and waste of all those lives just because of stubborn human sinfulness made Moses exceedingly angry.

9–10 Therefore, as a recapitulation of all Moses' negotiations beginning in 7:8, we are reminded that all had taken place as God had predicted it. No amount of evidence had persuaded Pharaoh's hard heart, and Israel was still enslaved.

E. The Passover (12:1–28)

1. Preparations for the Passover (12:1–13)

1–2 The instructions for the Passover and the Unleavened Bread feasts were the only regulations given while Israel was still in Egypt. The phrase "in Egypt" indicates that the contents of this chapter were written after the Exodus. This event was so significant that henceforth the religious or ecclesiastical year was to begin in the month of Abib (13:4), the month when "the barley had headed" (the Canaanite name for the month). Later the Babylonian month name of Nisan was substituted (Est 3:7), matching our present calendar time of late March to the beginning of April (Ne 2:1).

3–11 The following instructions, communicated through the elders (see v.21), were given to the "whole community of Israel": (1) Preparations were to begin on the tenth day of Abib; (2) the head of each household was to select a "lamb" or "kid" according to the number of people who would be present; (3) the animal was to be a year-old male without any defects; (4) each animal was to be slaughtered at twilight on the fourteenth day; (5) the blood from the animals was to be applied to the doorframe of each house; (6) that night each family was to eat the roasted lamb or kid along with bitter herbs and unleavened bread; (7) the meat was to be roasted whole with the head and legs intact and the washed internals left inside; it was not to be eaten raw or boiled in water; (8) all leftovers were to be burnt; nothing was to be allowed to become profane by putrification or superstitious abuse (i.e., before daybreak, according to 23:18; 34:25; Dt 16:4); (9) the meal was to be eaten with an air of haste and expectancy. Therefore, the people's robes were to be tucked in their belts, their sandals were to be worn, and their staffs were to be ready and on hand.

Thus the whole nation was to be a nation of priests (see 19:5–6; cf. 1Pe 2:5; Rev 1:6). The apparent intervention of the Levites in 2Ch 30:17–18 and 35:5–6 was contrary to the original design of the Passover. Here there were no priests, no altar, no tabernacle; families were communing in the presence of God and around the sacrificial lamb that was the substitute for each member of that family. The lamb was to be a year-old male because it was taking the place of Israel's firstborn males who were young and fresh with the vigor of life. The bitter herbs were to recall the bitter years of servitude (1:14), and the unleavened bread was to reflect this event's haste on that first night. This was the Lord's Passover, and this was how Israel was to eat it.

12–13 On that same night, the fifteenth of Abib, the Lord would pass through Egypt and strike down the firstborn of all men and animals whose household had not been placed under the blood. Like the other "signs" or "miracles" Pharaoh had seen, the blood also was to be a pledge of God's mercy. The Lord would "pass over" (GK 7173) these marked homes, and no "plague" would touch them. Indeed, even "all the gods of Egypt" would be judged by this final plague of God. Obviously, those deities whose representatives were linked with beasts were dealt direct blows—the bulls, cows, goats, jackals, etc. There could be little doubt that this would be interpreted as a direct blow to the gods of Egypt themselves.

2. Preparations for the Unleavened Bread (12:14–20)

14–16 The connection between the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread is close yet distinct. The OT uses both names to refer to the same feast: "Passover Feast" (GK 7175) in Ex 34:25; Eze 45:21; and "Feast of Unleavened Bread" (GK 5174) in Dt 16:16; 2Ch 30:13, 21; Ezr 6:22. Yet the two rites are treated separately, even if in sequence, in Lev 23:5–6; Nu 28:16–17; 2Ch 35:1, 17; Ezr 6; Eze 45:21.

"This day" refers to the same day in view in vv.1–13. The slaying of the paschal lamb "between the evenings" that divide the 14th and 15th of Abib (Nisan) looks forward to the festive celebration that night, the day of the Exodus (i.e., the night of the Passover; Abib 15). The Israelites were to "commemorate" (i.e., make it a memorial; GK 2355) that day as a "festival" and a "lasting [i.e., perpetual] ordinance."

For seven days they were to eat "bread made without yeast" (Heb. matzo, GK 5174), in order to remember Israel's haste in leaving Egypt (v.39) and to underscore again that impurity and corruption (which leaven sometimes symbolizes) disqualified persons from religious services. The whole household needed to be pure and clean of heart; therefore, all yeast was to be removed from the entire house (v.19). The first and the seventh days of that week beginning with the celebration of the Passover were to be holy convocations.

17–20 "I brought your divisions out" reflects a post-Exodus stance. Verse 19 is not an empty repetition of v.15 but adds the important notice that Gentiles may be celebrants along with Israel even as was contemplated in the Abrahamic covenant (Ge 12:3c). The "alien" (GK 1731) must have included the "mixed multitude" (v.38, KJV) who left Egypt with Israel, the Kenites who joined them in the desert (Nu 10:29–31; Jdg 1:16), and those who were converted later, like Rahab's family (Jos 2:10–14). Those "native-born" (GK 275) were, no doubt, Abraham's descendants who are here regarded as the true natives to the land of Canaan, since it was assigned to them by God some six hundred years prior to the Exodus.

3. Celebration of the Passover (12:21–28)

21–23 When the instructions for the preparation of the Passover had been completed, the elders were briefed on what each Israelite family was to do. Two new items are included here: (1) Blood was to be applied to each doorframe by a "bunch of hyssop" dipped into a basin of blood, and (2) no one was to leave the house "until morning."

The lamb or kid to be slaughtered by each family is called "the Passover" itself (NIV, "the Passover lamb"). Blood from this animal was placed in a basin and with "a bunch of hyssop" was "slapped" on the doorframe. Israel would know the grounds and means of their deliverance and redemption.

"The destroyer" (GK 5422) was not a demonic power that rivaled God but probably an angel of the Lord who expedited his will. In Ps 78:49, however, where God lets loose on the Egyptians four different words for his anger, this wrath is collectively called "a band of destroying angels." Thus whether an angel was the mediating agent or the term was a figurative personification of the final judgment of God on Egypt, it was still God's direct work (cf. 1Co 10:9–10; Heb 11:28).

24–28 Once again provision was made for the annual observance of this ceremony and for the parental obligation to instruct children in the meaning and significance of this reenactment. The section closes with one of those rare notices in Israel's history: they did exactly what the Lord had commanded—and well they might after witnessing what had happened to the obstinate king and people of Egypt!

F. The Exodus From Egypt (12:29–51)

1. Death at midnight (12:29–32)

29–30 The final stroke came at midnight of Abib 15. While the previous plagues may have utilized some of the natural and secondary agencies of nature, vv.23 and 29 attribute this tenth plague solely to the LORD. The Lord went through the land of Egypt, and death touched every "family" (lit., "house")—from Pharaoh to the prisoner (cf. 11:5).

31–32 How Pharaoh "summoned" Moses and Aaron is unknown. The release granted Israel was for more than a three-day journey to worship the Lord. Previously when Pharaoh had given permission to leave (only to immediately rescind it or place unacceptable restrictions on it), he had said: "Go, worship the LORD your God" (10:8, 24), or "Go, sacrifice to your God" (8:25); but now the command was: "Up! Leave my people!" In fact, God had predicted that the effect of this tenth blow would be so hard that Pharaoh would "drive [them] out completely" (11:1). As Moses was taking leave of the king and Egypt, Pharaoh had one final request. "Bless me," he begged. Pharaoh, the god of Egypt, entreated Moses' God to bless him!

2. Preparations for the Exodus (12:33–36)

33–34 The Egyptians urged the people most vehemently that they should leave immediately, for no Egyptians would be left if things continued as they were going. The Israelites wrapped the unleavened lumps of dough in sacks and slung them over their shoulders along with their kneading troughs and whatever other incidentals they planned to take with them.

35–36 On the spoiling of the Egyptians, see 3:21–22 and 11:2–3.

3. The Exodus and the mixed multitude (12:37–51)

37 The wilderness itinerary actually begins in this verse. Rameses is best identified with Qantir instead of the remoter but more popular Tanis (seventeen miles northeast), since Qantir was situated near the water—as Egyptian documents observed, on the "Waters of Ra," the Bubastite-Pelusiac eastern arm of the Nile River. Succoth is now generally identified with Tell el Maskhuta near modern Ismailia. With the number of fighting men at 600,000, the total number of Israelites could well be 2 million.

38 The "many other people" (KJV, "mixed multitude") were Egyptians (cf. 9:20), perhaps some of the old Semitic population left from the Hyksos era, and slaves native to other countries. Some of this group must be part of the "rabble" mentioned in Nu 11:4. Thus the promise to Abraham in Ge 12:3c received another fulfillment in this swarm of foreigners who left Egypt with Israel. Another reason for God's display of his power was so that the Egyptians could be evangelized (7:5; 8:10, 19; 9:14, 16, 29–30; 14:4, 18).

39 As the Lord had predicted in 11:1, the Israelites "had been driven out of Egypt." Indeed, they left so quickly that they had no time to prepare anything, much less set the yeast in the dough; so they left with unleavened bread and made unleavened cakes during those early days (see v.34).

40–42 Appropriately, now that the Exodus had begun, the narrator took a moment to reflect on the total Egyptian experience. Twice he commented that it had been 430 years, "to the very day." That "night" was to be observed by all future generations as a "Watch-night Service," for on that night the Lord "preserved" or "kept" the destroyer from touching them.

43–49 The question arises concerning the "mixed multitude" who came out of Egypt with Israel and all such persons who might join them thereafter. Were they to keep the Passover also? Thus it was necessary to repeat and elaborate on the instructions already given.

No male was to participate in that meal unless he was circumcised and thus was a member of the community of faith. This excluded temporary residents, hired workers, aliens, and all foreigners. Furthermore, each lamb was to remain in one house (as implied in vv.3–10). Its parts were not to be divided and eaten in separate homes; it was to be the basis of a fellowship meal stressing the unity and joy of the participants. In addition, no bones of the paschal lamb were to be broken (cf. Ps 34:20 and Jn 19:33–36). This was the LORD's Passover and not the table of Israel; therefore, the same requirement was made of all, whether native-born or alien.

50–51 The concluding notice is that Israel "did just what the LORD had commanded" (cf. v.28); and "on that very day" (cf. vv.17, 41) the much-delayed Exodus finally took place as the LORD brought Israel out by their "divisions." Surprisingly, the desert journey began on the Sabbath!

G. The Consecration of the Firstborn (13:1–16)

1–2 Closely linked with the account of Israel's release from Egypt and the Passover was the consecration of all the firstborn in Israel. The sanctification of all firstborn was commanded by God probably at Succoth, the first stopping place after the Exodus (12:37); and it fell within the seven days set aside for the Feast of Unleavened Bread (12:15).

The general principle is that every "firstborn" (GK 1147) male of both humans and animals (cf. vv.12–13) belongs to the Lord and is therefore "to be set apart" from common usage for holy purposes. Thus God set aside the seventh day, the tabernacle, the tribe of Levi—and here all firstborn. The basis for God's claim was that he had already set apart to himself the firstborn in Israel on the day he smote all the firstborn of Egypt. God's adoption of Israel as his "firstborn" led to his delivering them. From that time onward, that spared nation would dedicate the firstborn of its people and animals in commemoration of God's acts of love and his deeds that night.

3–10 Further directions are given relating this consecration of the firstborn to the Feast of Unleavened Bread. When Israel possessed the land promised to her, this ceremony was to be observed annually. The Israelites were to explain to their children that they ate unleavened bread and set apart the firstborn to the Lord because of what he had done personally for each subsequent Israelite (and believer)—"for me"—when he brought Israel out of Egypt. Likewise, in v.16 subsequent generations would be taught that he brought "us" out of Egypt. This festival and consecration were to be a "sign" on the people's hands and a "reminder" (GK 2355) or "memorial" between their eyes. No doubt this injunction was a figurative and proverbial mode of speech (cf. Pr 3:3), for the law of the Lord was "to be on [their] lips."

11–16 As the destroyer "passed over" their firstborn and Israel later "passed over" the Red Sea, so now they were "to cause to pass over" or "give over" (GK 6296) to the LORD all their firstborn when they entered the land. Only two slight modifications were made to this principle: (1) all firstborn male humans (firstborn females were exempted) were to be redeemed or "bought back at a price" (fixed at five shekels in Nu 18:16; cf. also Nu 3:46–47), and (2) donkeys were to be "bought back" or "redeemed" (GK 7009) by a lamb or kid, since donkeys were unclean animals and therefore unfit for sacrifice. To prevent any refusal to follow this command to ransom their animals, the Israelites were to kill them by breaking their necks.

The obligation of the firstborn to serve the LORD in some nonpriestly work around the sanctuary was later transferred to the Levites who became God's authorized substitutes for each firstborn boy or man (Nu 3). When the number of Levites was exhausted, additional males could be ransomed or redeemed at the price of five shekels apiece. Verses 15–16 again reiterate the explanation: the firstborn were owned by the LORD; for he dramatically spared them in the tenth plague, and he had previously called them to be his firstborn (4:22).

H. Journey to the Red Sea (13:17–15:21)

1. Into the wilderness (13:17–22)

17–18 There were three possible routes of escape: (1) a northeast route going to Qantara through the land of the Philistines to Gaza and Canaan; (2) a middle route heading across the Negeb to Beersheba, which incorrectly assumes Mount Sinai is Jebel Halal near Kadesh-Barnea; and (3) a southeast route leading from the wilderness east of modern Ismailia to the southern extremities of the Sinai Peninsula. Israel was warned not to take the shorter route through Philistia, for the prospects of fighting the bellicose Philistines would so demoralize Israel that they would change their minds and return to the servitude in Egypt. This judgment was proven correct when Israel was threatened with war in Nu 14:4.

Thus God led Israel around by the "desert road" or the "way of the wilderness" toward the "Red Sea" or, better, "Sea of Reeds" (Yam Suph, see NIV note). Israel camped on the west coast of the Sinai Peninsula by Yam Suph on their way to Horeb/Sinai (Nu 33:10–11), and later on Yam Suph is also used to refer to the salt waters of the Gulf of Aqaba (Dt 1:1; 1Ki 9:26; et al.). Thus nothing prevents our linking Yam Suph with the Red Sea.

19 The records in this verse are a verbatim report of Joseph's words in Ge 50:25 except for the additional words "with you." God's promise of the land is never far from sight in any of these passages.

20 The exact location of Etham is unknown. It is described as a region in Nu 33:6 and appears to be equated with the Desert of Shur (Ex 15:22).

21–22 How God led the Israelites (v.17) is now explained. This single "pillar" (14:24), which was a cloud by day and a fire by night, and whose width at the base was sufficiently large to provide cover for Israel from the intense heat (Ps 105:39), was a visible symbol of the presence of the Lord in their midst. The pillar of the cloud and fire was but another name for "the angel of God," for 14:19 and 22:20–22 equate the two. In fact, God's Name was "in" this angel who went before them to bring them into Canaan (23:20–23). He was the "angel of his presence" (Isa 63:8–9). Malachi 3:1 calls him the "messenger of the covenant," who is equated with the Lord, the owner of the temple. Obviously, then, the Christ of the NT is the shekinah glory or the Lord of the OT (see comment on Jn 1:14). Through this cloudy pillar the Lord spoke to Moses (33:9–11) and to the people (Ps 99:6–7). Such easy movement from the pillar of cloud and fire to the angel and back to the Lord himself has already been met in the same interchange between the burning bush, the angel, and the Lord in ch. 3.

2. At the Red Sea (14:1–14)

1–4 The command "to turn back" (GK 8740) meant a change in direction and perhaps even a temporary setback for Israel, but which way did they go? According to Nu 33:7, Pi

Hahiroth was opposite Baal Zephon and between Migdol and the sea. The site of Pi Hahiroth has not been identified as yet. A possible location for Migdol ("tower") is either Migdol near Succoth, mentioned in a papyrus of Seti I's time, or the ruins of a square tower on a height known as Jebel Abu Hasan overlooking the southern part of the small Bitter Lake.

Pharaoh assumed that Israel's divine help had run out and that they were hopelessly entangled on a dead-end trail since the desert, the sea, and marshes surrounded them. God, however, had commanded Moses to take this impossible route to show the Egyptians once more that he was God (see 7:17; 9:14) and to show Israel his great power (vv.30–31). Nevertheless, God would receive glory from Pharaoh and his army. That glory would have come to God whether Pharaoh had yielded or had rebelled and said in effect, "Those Hebrews will leave this place over my dead body!"

5–12 Shortly after Israel left, Pharaoh and his officials quickly put aside the terrors of that awful night when they lost their firstborn and decided to go after the Israelites, who had marched out of Egypt "boldly." When they saw the Egyptian troops, the Israelites cried out in despair to the Lord, but not for long. Moses was a much more immediate target than the Lord, so they complained to him. Were there "no graves at all in Egypt?" They mocked in the most satirical tone possible (since Egypt specialized in graves and had about three-fourths of its land area available for grave sites). Then followed the "I-told-you-so" pseudoprophets. Suddenly the hardships of their Egyptian bondage were forgotten.

13–14 The former quick-tempered Moses patiently answered the people's hasty accusation with three directives: (1) "Do not be afraid"; (2) "Stand firm" and see the salvation, i.e., the "deliverance of the LORD," for "the LORD will fight for you"; and (3) "Be still," i.e., stop all action and become inactive, for "he LORD will fight for you.

3. Across the Red Sea (14:15–31)

15–18 If God had promised to bring Israel out of Egypt and to give them the land of Canaan, then Moses and Israel had best stop their crying and begin to move on. The contrast between v.16 and v.17 is clear: "You," Moses (emphatic position), use the staff in your hand to "divide" or "form a valley" so that Israel may go through the sea "on dry ground"; "I" (again the emphatic position), the Lord, will harden the hearts of the (pursuing) Egyptians (cf. 9:12)

19–20 The identity of the angel of God is clarified in the second part of v.19: the pillar of cloud and fire (see 13:22). The reality of God's promised presence may be stated in the symbol of his presence (the pillar of cloud and fire), in his messenger (the angel of the Lord), or in the Lord himself, who "went ahead of them" (13:21; cf. 14:24). But when the presence of God "withdrew," he went behind them to protect Israel's rearguard. What was light for Israel became darkness for the Egyptians. The double nature of the glory of God in salvation and judgment could not have been more graphically depicted.

21–22 With the single gesture of Moses' upraised hand over the sea, the Lord "drove . . . back" the sea by means of a "strong east wind all that night" (lit. tr.; cf. 15:8). The exact location of this "Reed Sea" crossing is unknown; but it would seem best to place it somewhere between the southern end of the Bitter Lakes and the Gulf of Suez or even in the northern tip of the Gulf of Suez itself. Meanwhile the waters formed a "wall" on the right and on the left. They were piled up like a "heap." The event, while incorporating the natural element of the wind, has the element of the exceptional (cf. Dt 4:32, 34) accompanying it, which strongly suggests the presence of God.

23–28 Sometime during the morning watch the Lord "looked down" (GK 9207) at the Egyptian army as it began to pursue Israel across the recently formed valley in the sea and "threw it into confusion." This "look" of God took on concrete proportions, for the pillar of fire must have suddenly lit up the sky with such a flash that the chariots careened against one another.

Meanwhile a spectacular display of thunder, lightning, rain, and earthquake struck terror in the boldest and most arrogant of Egypt's charioteers (cf. Ps 77:16–20). By this time the thoroughly distracted Egyptians had another problem: God made the chariot wheels "come off" (NIV) or "jam" (cf. NIV note) against one another. The Egyptians had enough and were willing to forget about Israel altogether, but it was too late. The Lord had begun his fight against Egypt as promised in v.14, described in vv.27, 31, and celebrated in the song of 15:3. Israel had only to stand still and watch the victory won on their behalf; for with the upraised hand of Moses, the walls of water cascaded toward each other to resume their usual place just as dawn broke.

Pharaoh lost all the men and chariots he had committed to that engagement. Ps 136:15 records that God "swept Pharaoh and his army into the Red Sea." The destruction of the "entire army of Pharaoh" is qualified by the clause "that had followed the Israelites into the sea." But all involved in the chase certainly perished: "Not one of them survived."

29–31 The Lord had "saved" (GK 3828) Israel that day, for Israel saw the corpses of the Egyptians floating by. Above all, Israel saw with what great powers the Lord had delivered them, and they feared him and believed him and his servant Moses. Their response was back to where it was in 4:31 and the goal stated in 9:29–30: "that you [in this case, Egyptians] might know that the earth is the LORD's . . . [and] fear [him]."

4. Song at the sea (15:1–21)

The song in vv.16–18 is one of three composed by Moses (see also Dt 31:22; Ps 90). It is a victory ode that hymns the spectacular power and unrivaled supremacy of God over Pharaoh's chariots. The focus of the song is "the LORD" himself (the divine name appears ten times). The general outline of the song is divided between two themes: vv.1b–12, a retrospective description of the overthrow of the Egyptian forces; vv.13–18, a prospective prediction of Israel's entrance into the Promised Land.

As we see it, the song has four strophes. Each strophe is then divided into three parts.

Exodus 15: Victory at Sea

Strophe I vv.1b–5
- Part A: Introit—v.1b: "I will sing to the LORD"
- Part B: Confession—vv.2–3
- Part C: Narration—vv.4–5

Concluding simile: "like a stone," v.5b

Strophe II vv.6–10
- Part A: Introit—v.6: "Your right hand, O LORD"
- Part B: Confession—vv.7–8
- Part C: Narration—vv.9–10

Concluding simile: "like lead," v.10b

Strophe III vv.11–16a
- Part A: Introit—v.11: "Who . . . is like you, O LORD?"
- Part B: Confession—vv.12–13
- Part C: Anticipation—vv.14–16a

Concluding simile: "as a stone," v.16a

Strophe IV vv.16b–18
- Part A: Introit—v.16b: "Until your people pass by, O LORD"
- Part B: Confession—v.17
- Part C: Anticipation—v.18

1 Part A: Hymnic introit. The first person—"I will sing"—is not unusual for such invocations when the whole community praises God as one collective person; yet each individual also makes such praise/confession personally his or her own. The motivating reason is given immediately: "for he is [lit.] gloriously glorious" in that "the horse and its rider he has hurled into the sea."

2–3 Part B: Confession. The two themes of the introit's two bicola are now treated in sequence: (1) the Lord (in vv.2–3) and (2) the overthrown enemy (the narration in vv.4–5). In this confession five attributes of the Lord) are given—all in the first person: "my strength," "my song," "my salvation," "my God," and "my father's God." Then v.3 continues in the third person: "The LORD is a warrior;/ the LORD is his name."

The title in v.3 has caused many Christians to ask, "How can this 'man of war' [cf. Isa 42:13] be related to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ?" The fact that he acts at all in wars speaks only to the point of his immanence and presence in the fabric of life, but it does not tell us any more about the moral character of God than "the LORD is our rock" or "stone" or "high tower" does.

4–5 Part C: Narration (of the work of God). The concern shifts to the enemy, and the four key words focus on the water: "sea," "Red Sea," the "deep waters," and the "depths." Just as the verbs of the confession in Part B were parallel ideas—"I will praise him," "I will exalt him" (cf. the introit: "I will sing")—so here they are synonymous: "he has hurled into the sea . . . are drowned. . . . The deep waters have covered them . . . they sank." Then the strophe ends with a simile: "they sank to the depths like a stone."

6 Strophe II: Part A: Introit. With repeated use of "Your right hand, O LORD," the song announces the beginning of the second strophe using a descriptive metaphor for the omnipotence of God (cf. Moses' song at Dt 33:2 and numerous Psalms). In this strophe more details and the mode of the enemy's destruction are given.

7–8 Part B: Confession. The first line of four bicola recalls the phrase "highly exalted" of the introit (v.1). In the "greatness of your majesty," you "pulled them down" (NIV, "threw down"; usually of demolishing buildings), those "risers up against you" (NIV, "opposed you"; here of those who wanted to destroy the building of God). God, with the burning heat of his wrath and a fiery look from the pillar of cloud, "consumed them like stubble." The "strong east wind" of 14:21 is here represented in theological terms as "the blast of your nostrils," thus confirming the divine agency behind the wind. The result was that the "waters piled up" and the "running, surging, flowing ones" stood "like a heap" (cf. Ps 78:13). (Later on the Jordan River will also "heap" up [Jos 3:13, 16].) Meanwhile the waves "congealed," as if turned to solid ice. This was the power of God that Israel confessed.

9–10 Part C: Narration (of the work of God). Five bicola narrate in dramatic form the staccato phrases that almost simulate the heavy, breathless heaving of the Egyptians as, with what reserve of strength is left, they vow: "I will pursue" or "I will overtake," "I will divide the spoils," "I will gorge myself," "I will draw my sword," and "my hand will destroy [lit. and ironically, 'dispossess'] them." But v.10 changes all that; with a mere gust of God's "breath" or "wind" (cf. v.8a), "the sea covered them," and they "sank." Like the first strophe (v.5), the second strophe ends with a simile: "They sank like lead in the mighty waters."

11 Strophe III: Part A: Introit. The song now turns to the theological interpretation and the significance of all that was done. Using the formula for incomparability—"Who is like you"—Israel proclaims that God's exclusive uniqueness had been demonstrated and "proven powerful by his [NIV, 'majestic in'] holiness" and his "awesome . . . wonders" or "miracles." No other "gods" (whose reality is neither affirmed nor denied at this point; cf. 12:12) could do what the Lord had done.

12–13 Part B: Confession. The second-person address of these verses matches vv.7–8 and v.17; therefore, these verses belong together and mark the three great works of God in three bicola: the victory at sea, guidance in the wilderness, and the destination of God's "holy dwelling" in Canaan. Thus the heroic deeds at the sea were a pledge that God would fulfill his promise of giving the land. The "earth" may here signify Sheol, the grave (cf. 1Sa 28:13; Isa 29:4), for it was actually the sea that "swallowed them." But it was God's "grace" or "unfailing love" that would lead those who had been "redeemed." The alliterative sequence of the Hebrew verbs ("you stretched out," "you will lead," and "you will guide") adds to the majesty of the form and unity of the thought.

"Your holy dwelling" (lit., "your holy pasture or encampment") cannot refer to Sinai since the nations in vv.14–15 would not have been affected by that mountain. Nor is Canaan alone meant; but v.17 clearly indicates that Moses had in mind that place in Canaan where God had promised him he would "put his Name" (Dt 12:5, 11, 21; et al.) in a place he had chosen (Dt 12:14, 18, 26; et al.), i.e., his temple on Mount Zion.

14–16a Part C: Anticipation (of the work of God). Once again the song shifts from the second person to the third person (cf. vv.4 and 9). A summary statement in v.14a precedes vv.14b–15, where four of Israel's future enemies are listed: Philistia, Edom, Moab, and Canaan. Thus the "nations" of v.14a may be the Egyptian designation for the "Asiatics" who occupied southern Palestine. That news of Israel's sensational deliverance from the Egyptian army got around is clearly attested by Rahab (Jos 2:10–11). Canaan is here named by its residents along the southwestern coastal strip. The "chiefs" or "princes" of Edom introduces another piece of Mosaic identification, for the term is useful in the proto-dynastic era of Edom (cf. Ge 36:15–16), as is the local term of "leaders" or "rams" of Moab. But all these peoples and leaders shared one thing in common: fear. Seven expressions for fear are climaxed with the strophe, concluding with a simile for "stone"-cold "silence."

16b Strophe IV: Part A: Introit. Once more the repetitive parallelism introduces the past and the climactic word—this time the outcome of God's great work at the sea: "Until your people pass by" or "cross over" into Canaan (or perhaps the Jordan), even the people who had been "bought."

17 Part B: Confession. Based on God's parallel handling of Pharaoh and the nations that would oppose their entrance into Canaan, Israel may now anticipate the fulfillment of the patriarchal promise that they would be given—in that future day when the Lord would reign forever—the land of Canaan as an inheritance (on the figure of "planting," see Pss 44:2; 80:8–16). The text moves from the "mountain of [his] inheritance" to a "place . . . for [his] dwelling," even the "sanctuary" his "hands established" (see v.13).

18 Part C: Anticipation (of the work of God). In one final burst of unbounded joy, Moses and Israel rejoice in the prospect of God's universal rule and reign lasting forever. How temporary in comparison were the reigns of such hardened rulers as Pharaoh and the leaders of state in Canaan and its environs!

19–21 A narrative interlude separates the Song of Moses from Miriam's song in v.21. Miriam is called a "prophetess" (cf. Nu 12:2) and a "sister" of Aaron, even though she was also Moses' sister. But apparently she ranked only with Aaron and not with Moses. There would be other prophetesses in Israel (Jdg 4:4; 2Ki 22:14; Ne 6:14; et al.). As a prophetess and a leader in Israel (Mic 6:4), Miriam led the women perhaps in an antiphonal response, repeating the song at the conclusion of each part or strophe, accompanied by timbrels and dancing.

I. Journey to Sinai (15:22–18:27)

1. The waters of Marah (15:22–27)

22–23 The "Desert of Shur" is the whole district ranging from Egypt's northeastern frontier eastward into the northwestern quarter of the Sinai Desert and extending southward to the mountains of Sinai. Shur, meaning "wall," is mentioned several times in Genesis (16:7; 20:1; 25:18). In Nu 33:8 this area is called the "Desert of Etham." Perhaps Etham reflects the old Egyptian word for "fort."

Israel's first stop is traditionally placed at Ain Musa, the "Springs of Moses," a site not mentioned in any biblical text. It was a source of sweet water about sixteen to eighteen hours' journey north of Marah ("bitter"), Israel's first-mentioned stop. This traditional site for crossing the Red Sea is about ten miles south of the northern end of the Red Sea and about one-half mile inland from the coast. The journey from Ain Musa to Marah was about forty miles.

At first the Israelites contended with a stony desert, bounded by the deep blue waters of the Gulf of Suez on their right and the mountain chains of El Ruhat on their left. After nine more miles, they came into the desert plain called el Ati, a white, glaring stretch of sand that turned into hilly country with sand dunes rolling out to the coast. But water was nowhere to be found. Marah is usually identified with Ain Hawarah, a site several miles inland from the Gulf. Ain Hawarah's waters are notoriously salty and brackish.

24 The people's grumbling is strong evidence of the historical truthfulness of the wanderings narrative. As a general pattern the grumblings that preceded the golden calf incident are raised by genuine need, but those that follow are mainly illegitimate forms of murmuring. The unpalatable waters at Marah made a strong enough impression so as to obliterate all the miracles of Egypt and the parting of the Red Sea—or so it appeared.

25a The Lord "showed" (GK 3723) Moses a tree. The verb "showed" is from the root that means "to teach" or "instruct" and is the same root from which we derive the word "Torah" ("instruction," "law"; GK 9368). Israel was to learn that the instruction they needed, after being freed from Egypt, would come from heaven. This, in turn, would prepare them for the reception of the precept of the laws. The text is clear that God gave Moses special instructions in response to the despair of the people. The tree may have had little more to do with the actual temporary healing of the waters than did the salt in Eli-sha's healing of the Jericho spring in 2Ki 2:19–22. In both cases it may only be the power of God and a test of obedience that are present.

25b–27 This miracle was connected with a promise: From now on obedience to commands and statutes would bring healing, both physically and morally. God allowed Israel to go three days without water to "test" them. God later tested Israel at Meribah (17:1–7), at Sinai (20:20), at Taberah (Nu 11:3; 13:26–33), and elsewhere; but it was "to humble [them] and to test [them] in order to know what was in [their] heart[s]" (Dt 8:2). On the other hand, the "diseases" God "brought on" the Egyptians would afflict Israel if they disobeyed and rebelled against God (Dt 28:27).

Israel journeyed to "Elim," located in the large and beautiful valley of Gharandel, about seven miles south of Ain Hawarah. This tract of land lies between the wilderness of Shur and the wilderness of Sin and contains two other wadis besides the Wadi Gharandel. In the rainy season a constant torrent of water runs down to the Red Sea. The grass is thick and high, and there are many trees there.

2. The manna and the quail (16:1–36)

1–3 The "fifteenth day of the second month" was exactly one month after Israel had left Egypt (12:6, 31). Since Nu 33:5–11 mentions only seven places of encampment and only one journey of three days' duration (Ex 15:22), it is evident that either Israel stayed at several of these places for a number of days or that they camped in a number of other unmentioned places. The Hebrew text implies that they may have left Elim in various detachments and finally assembled as a complete group when they all reached the Desert of Sin. The location of the Desert of Sin is problematic.

This time the people "grumbled" about the amount of food and the lack of meat. Suddenly Egypt seemed all peaches and cream (actually pots of meat and all you could eat) rather than bondage and slave drivers. With a twisted piety and a condescending reference to the Lord's name, the Israelites pretended that they would have preferred being victims at God's hand in Egypt to being the recipients of so many miracles—and all this hardship. The provisions from Egypt may have lasted these thirty days, but their supplies were undoubtedly exhausted.

4–5 God would graciously answer the Israelites' grumbling by raining down on them "bread from heaven" (cf. Ne 9:15; Ps 78:24; Jn 6:31–51). But there was to be a "test" (GK 5814) to see whether Israel would obey and trust God by faith. Already prior to the giving of the Ten Commandments, the seventh day was to be set apart to the Lord because of the Creation ordinances in Ge 2:2–3. On the sixth day, the people were to gather twice the daily amount. It was not to be left or eaten in the form they gathered it; instead, it was to be prepared by milling and baking (cf. Nu 11:8).

6–8 The first part of v.8 explains that Israel's lapse of memory would be restored that very evening, when God sent them food in a way yet to be announced; then they would know (here is that evangelistic word from the plagues) that it was the Lord! The second part of v.8 elaborates on the inner meaning of the words in v.7b: your grumbling is not directed at your leaders, but ultimately your complaint is against God. Hence we have the theology and abiding principles to be gained from Israel's appreciation (and ours!), for what God did here is placed in front of the actual narration of the events.

9–12 Moses instructed Aaron to summon the congregation to "come [near] before the LORD." Verse 10 explains that they were to look toward the desert where the Lord appeared in the cloud. The meaning of this symbol of the real presence of God connected with the splendor of this cloud and fire will be clarified in 24:15–17. Once again, as in vv.6 and 8, Israel "will know that I am the LORD your God."

13–18 The events describing the gift of quail is similar in form but separate in time from the narrative in Nu 11:4–22, 31–33 (that event took place in the second year of the wanderings, Nu 10:11). Quail (not locusts or flying fish, but "feathered fowls" as Ps 78:27–31 makes clear) are well-known migratory birds. They usually fly in vast numbers in the spring to the northern regions and return in the fall. Because of their prolonged flight over the Red Sea, they landed exhausted on the shore of the Sinai Peninsula.

Not only did the quail "come up" from the horizon, but so did the dew "come up." When the dew evaporated, beneath it appeared "thin flakes like frost on the ground, . . . on the desert floor." The peoples' question "What is it?" (Heb., man hu) shows why Israel called this bread from heaven "manna" (GK 4942; see v.31). Various natural explanations have been suggested for the origin of the manna, but they all run into trouble when trying to fully explain its miraculous occurrence. In the final analysis, it was a unique substance, miraculously created for a special purpose. Each family unit was to gather "an omer," about two quarts or one-tenth of a bushel (v.36), for each person in their tent.

19–21 In spite of his warning that God was testing (v.4) the people by ordering them not to leave any manna until the next morning, "some . . . paid no attention to Moses." This test was to remind Israel that they did not live by bread alone but by "every word that comes from the mouth of the LORD" (Dt 8:3). Furthermore, it taught Israel that even their daily bread was a gift from God; therefore, they were to live in daily dependence on him.

22–30 The day of rest, a holy Sabbath to the Lord, did not originate with the Sinaitic legislation; for even in 20:8–11 it was grounded in the ordinances of Creation (Ge 2:2–3; cf. also 29:27). This pattern of six days for gathering and one day of rest was ordered by God (v.5). The seventh day was to be a "day of" cessation or "rest"; therefore, food preparations for the morrow were to be made on the sixth day. But when some failed to obey, the Lord groaned: "How long will you [pl.] refuse to keep my commands and my instructions?" Only then did the people "rest" (lit., "stop," "cease") on the seventh day.

31 The name and description of manna are given also in Nu 11:5–9. Coriander seed is a small, lobular grain that is white or yellowish gray and is used for seasoning (cf. our use of caraway and sesame seeds). Numbers 11:7 adds that it "looked like resin" and, according to the older versions, that it had the color of "bdellium" (KJV; = pearl?). Its taste was like wafers made of honey or "something made with olive oil" (Nu 11:8); and it could be ground in a mill, crushed in a mortar, cooked in a pot, or made into cakes (Nu 11:8).

32–36 At some subsequent time, Moses ordered that the manna be memorialized by placing some of it into the ark of the testimony. The ark had not been revealed, much less constructed, at this time. In support of this position is the historical note in v.35, which describes the eating of manna over the next forty years; therefore, these verses were written by Moses at the end of the wanderings.

3. The waters of Meribah (17:1–7)

1–2 Before Israel came to Rephidim, the people rested at Dophkah and Alush (Nu 33:12–14). Rephidim is best identified as the large Wadi Refayid, in southwest Sinai, instead of Wadi Feiran. They had hoped to find water, but the wadi was already dry. This situation presents us with a third narrative on the Lord's provision for Israel's needs in the desert.

As a result of this disappointment, the people "quarreled" with Moses, demanding: "Give [pl. form] us water to drink." The verb "to quarrel" (GK 8189; from the root rib) explains one of the names for this place, "Meribah" (v.7), which means "quarrel," "strife," or "argument." What had been a gracious gift of God through Moses' hands was demanded as a magical solution to their problem: "Give it to us."

Significantly, Israel had traveled to Rephidim specifically "as the LORD commanded" (lit., "at the mouth of the LORD"). Thus God in his wisdom had directed his people to move from the Desert of Sin (where they hungered but afterward were satisfied) to Rephidim (where they thirsted).

Instead of submitting to the tests God was conducting for them (15:25; 16:4), Israel began to test the Lord (Pss 78:56; 106:7, 14, 25, 29)! God's people tempt or test their Lord when they distrust his kindness and providential care and grumble against him and/or his leaders. Moses would later warn (Dt 6:16) that the people were not to put God to the test as they did at Massah.

3 Biblical narrative often leads off the story with a general statement (here, v.2) and then by means of a coordinate clause explains in more detail the theme announced in the previous verse(s). Accordingly, it might be better to translate v.3: "Since the people were thirsty for water."

4–7 Moses took his difficulties to the Lord (15:25; 32:30; et al.). In his exasperation he pled, "What am I to do with these people?" Thus they were ready to stone Moses—an angry mob's solution to an irritating problem.

The Lord's response was to move directly to sending relief. Moses, with a few elders, was to go in front of the people—presumably farther down the wadi. There, where the pillar of the cloud stood as the symbol of God's own presence, Moses was to "strike [on] the rock" just as he had "struck" the Nile River. Striking the Nile (7:17, 20) in the first plague, however, signaled an interruption in that nation's water supply, whereas this striking would signal the commencement of the flow of waters.

This incident is not to be confused with a similar episode that comes near the conclusion of Israel's forty years of journeying in Nu 20:1–13. In this later account, the glory of the Lord is not present; and Moses is explicitly instructed that he is not to strike the rock but only to speak to it.

Thus we have the dual name that brought out both the people's testing of God (Massah; i.e., "test") and their quarreling (Meribah; i.e., "contention," "strife"). In less than six months the Israelites had witnessed ten plagues, the pillar of cloud and fire, the opening and shutting of the Red Sea, the miraculous sweetening of the water, and the sending of food and meat from heaven; yet their real question came down to this: "Is the LORD among us or not?"

4. The war with Amalek (17:8–16)

8 The Amalekites lived in the desert, south of Canaan around Kadesh (Ge 14:7), otherwise known as the northern part of the Negev (Nu 13:29; 14:25, 43). Amalek was the son of Eliphaz (Esau's eldest boy) by a concubine named Timna (Ge 36:12) and became a "clan" or "chief" in the tribe of Esau (Ge 36:15). Thus the Amalekites were distant cousins to the Israelites.

Amalek's assault on Israel drew the anger of God because they failed to recognize the hand and plan of God in Israel's life and destiny and because the first targets of their warfare were the sick, aged, and tired of Israel who lagged behind the line of march (Dt 25:17–19). Thus Amalek became the "first among the nations" (Nu 24:20)—in this case, to attack Israel. They are juxtaposed with another group of Gentiles in the next chapter (Jethro's Midianites) who believed in Israel's God. These two chapters illustrate two kingdoms and two responses to the grace of God from the Gentile world.

9 To direct the battle against the Amalekites, Moses commissioned a young man (perhaps about forty-five) from the tribe of Ephraim (Joseph's son) named Hoshea (Nu 13:8) the son of Nun (1Ch 7:27), who later was renamed Joshua. He was to muster an army to fight against the Amalekites while Moses, with the staff of God in his hand, would stand on top of one of the nearby hills overlooking the plain. Both elements were to be operating: the sword in Joshua's hand and the staff (symbol of divine intervention) in Moses' hand.

10–13 Aaron and Hur went with Moses up the hill. Hur is again mentioned with Aaron in 24:14. Whether this is the same Hur who descended from Judah through Caleb (1Ch 2:18–20) and whose grandson Bezalel built the tabernacle (Ex 31:2) is difficult to say. Tradition says that Hur was the husband of Moses' sister, Miriam.

"As long as" Moses held up his hands, Joshua and his men were victorious. However, "whenever he lowered his hands" through weariness, the Amalekites forged ahead in the battle. This gesture was not merely for psychological effect to inspire the troops every time they glanced up the hill. Nor does the text specifically claim that Moses prayed while his hands were raised. Rather, Moses' outstretched arms primarily symbolized his appeal to God. Finally the lengthy battle came to an end, with Joshua as victor and with the help of Aaron and Hur in holding Moses' hands up.

14 The account of this battle, in which the powerful presence of the Lord played an important role, was to be written down on a scroll and continually reiterated for Joshua's benefit. Amalek would pay dearly for its awful deed. The psalmist (Ps 83:4, 7) links Amalek's motives with those of other nations: " 'Come,' they say, 'let us destroy them as a nation, that the name of Israel be remembered no more.' " But what they had threatened to do to Israel would be measured out to them. This sentence of total extinction was not yet carried out in Saul's day (1Sa 15), for Saul failed to do what God had said. David continued the action (2Sa 1:1–8:12); and it may still have been going on in Esther's day, if Haman indeed is proven to have been an Amalekite.

15–16 Whether "The LORD is my Banner" is the name of the altar (cf. Jacob in Ge 33:20) or a title for God himself cannot be known for certain. The result is the same in either case. The Hebrew word for "banner" reflects the root "to be high," "raised," or "conspicuous." The allusion is to lifting up the staff as a standard and a testimony to his power. The victory, then, was the Lord's, just as the war had been his.

The interpretation of v.16 is difficult because of the unusual spelling of the word "throne" (kes). The best solution (taking the more difficult textual reading) is to see kesyah as a shortened form of kisse'-yah ("throne of Yah[weh]"). The text would then read: "Truly, the hand is towards the throne of the Lord," i.e., in a supplicating position. An alternative rendering is "because a hand is against the throne of the LORD" (see NIV note). This latter reading fits the context of v.14 better.

5. The wisdom of Jethro (18:1–27)

1–5 Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, met Moses and the Israelites in the desert at the "mountain of God" (see 3:1). Moses must have sent his wife and children on ahead to Midian to bring Jethro back to Sinai for a visit. Zipporah, Gershom, and Eliezer may have been sent back to Midian after the family dispute in 4:20–26. But it would have been most important for Eliezer as the next high priest to be a firsthand witness of all that God had done for Israel in the Exodus.

6–8 Jethro announced his arrival by means of a messenger, and Moses went out to meet him (cf. Ge 18:2; 19:1; 32:6; 33:1) and to exchange the usual Oriental greetings. Moses then recounted "all" that "the LORD" (the personal and covenantal name of God is used instead of the generic name Elohim, which depicts God's relationship to all creation) had done. As the psalmist exhorted (Ps 145:5–7, 12), so Moses acted, recounting the awesome work and abundant goodness of the Lord both in Israel's rescue from Egypt and in their subsequent "hardships" along the way.

9–12 The news evoked an instinctive "Praise the LORD" from Jethro, thereby showing either that he had continued believing in the God of his fathers (cf. Ge 25:2) or that he had spiritually benefited from Moses' forty-year stay in his house. Jethro continued, "Now I know that the LORD is greater than all other gods." This confession formula is a clear statement to the Lord's incomparable greatness above all the gods of Egypt.

Jethro then "took" or "brought" a burnt offering and fellowship offerings (NIV, "other sacrifices") to God (Elohim). "Brought" (GK 4374) is the customary word for proffering or providing an animal for sacrifice; it is never used in the OT in the sense of "to offer." Accordingly, he did not officiate as priest by "offering" these sacrifices, but he did worship and fellowship with Moses and Aaron "in the presence of God."

The generic name for God (Elohim) is used instead of the covenantal, personal name (Yahweh), perhaps because God was relating to the Gentile and the Jewish world simultaneously. Clearly Jethro was an outsider, an alien (a ger, like the name Moses gave to his son—*Ger*shom), even though he had made a strong declaration of faith in vv.10–11. "In the presence of God" may simply reflect the phrase "the glory of God," and thus we may have a covenant meal eaten in the presence of the God who dwells in the midst of his people.

13–16 Jethro is depicted as an efficiency expert who wisely suggests a modification in Israel's leadership structure (cf. vv.17–23), which Moses then adopted with divine permission. Prior to this the people came to Moses for instruction and judicial settlements.

17–23 Jethro's solution to this lengthy process, which was wearing out both the people and their leader, was to give Moses that portion of the work that involved a twofold office: an advocate on behalf of the people and an interpreter on behalf of God to teach the people. Jethro warned that his plan needed to be executed only if God was pleased with this advice.

Moses' work was to be supplemented with additional help. He was to "select capable men." While it may seem from this passage that Moses autocratically chose his own staff, the actual election was the work of all the people, as Dt 1:9, 13 affirms. Their leadership course was to include instruction in "decrees" (i.e., specific enactments), "laws" (i.e., general enactments), the "way to live" (i.e., lifestyle and the path of duty), and the "duties" (or jobs) each was to perform.

The qualifications for these men were that they should be "capable men" (i.e., men with a native aptitude for judging), "men who fear [in reverence and belief] God," men of truth (i.e., "trustworthy"), and men who hated all "dishonest gain." These were to be arranged in a decimal system of a graduated series of groups in multiples of ten, with Moses being the court of final appeal.

24–27 Amazingly enough, Moses listened to his father-in-law, having been taught by a man who was not even an Israelite.

II. Divine Morality (19:1–24:18)

A. The Eagles' Wings Speech (19:1–8)

1–2 In the third month Israel left Rephidim (see 17:1, 8) and came to the Desert of Sinai. "The desert in front of the mountain" is called er-Raha (meaning "the palm [of a hand]") in that it is a flat plain about five thousand feet above sea level that stretches over four hundred acres. Several mountains have been associated with Sinai. Most scholars prefer Gebel Musa (7,363 feet elevation at the southern end of er-Raha) because of its relation to the plain (20:18: "they stayed at a distance") and because of its imposing granite formations.

3–6 The "sign" given to Moses in 3:12 is fulfilled here: he has returned to the "mountain of God" (3:1). When Moses "went up" the mountain, the Lord delivered his "eagles' wings speech." A twofold title is used for the people of God: "house of Jacob" (a reminder of their humble beginnings; cf. Ge 28:13; 35:11; 49:7) and "the people of Israel" (a statement as to what they had become: a nation).

The metaphor of the eagles' wings could refer to one of the eight species of eagles found in Syria, Palestine, and Arabia in addition to the Palestinian vulture. Here it is probably the latter one. This metaphor is developed most extensively in Dt 32:11, where the loving compassion, protection, strength, and watchfulness of God are compared to the majestic bird's attributes. As the young eagles were carried on the adult wings and brought out of their nests and taught to fly, so the Lord had lovingly carried and safely delivered Israel.

The covenant mentioned here, first given to the patriarchs, was unconditional in its transmission and bestowal, but it was indeed conditioned with regard to its enjoyment and personal participation. The presence of the "if" in v.5 did not, however, pave the way for Israel's declension from grace into law any more than an alleged presence of a condition paved an identical fall for the patriarchs (Ge 22:16–18; 26:5) or for David (2Sa 7:14–15; 1Ki 2:4; 8:25; et al.).

Three titles summarize the divine blessings that an obedient and covenant-keeping Israel will experience: they would be a "treasured possession" (GK 6035), "a kingdom [GK 4930] of priests [GK 3913]," and "a holy [GK 7705] nation [GK 1580]." The first signified that Israel would be God's valuable property and distinct treasure (Dt 7:6; 14:2; 26:18; Ps 135:4; Mal 3:17; cf. Tit 2:14; 1Pe 2:9), set aside for a marked purpose. Furthermore, they were to be at once priest-kings and royal-priests (Isa 61:6; cf. 1Pe 2:5, 9; Rev 1:6; 5:10; 20:6)—everyone in the whole nation. This expression was not a parallel phrase or a synonym for a "holy nation"; it was a separate entity. The whole nation was to act as mediators of God's grace to the nations of the earth (cf. Ge 12:3c). The last title designated Israel as a separate and distinct nation because her God was holy, separate, and distinct, as were his purposes and plans (Dt 7:6; 14:2, 21; 26:19; Isa 62:12; cf. 1Pe 2:9).

This whole synopsis of God's suzerainty treaty with his vassal Israel is remarkably personal. It begins and concludes with "to the sons of Israel." Its first and last clauses are introduced by an emphatic "you" along with two other references to "you" in v.4.

7–8 The people responded, "We will do everything the LORD has said." Some commentators have criticized Israel for speaking rashly by agreeing to do all that God said; for they went off the promise, so it is alleged, and onto a law standard. On the contrary, the Lord approved of their response in glowing terms: "Everything they said was good. Oh, that their hearts would be inclined to fear me and keep all my commandments always" (Dt 5:28–29).

B. The Advent of God on Sinai (19:9–25)

9 To forestall all future pretext for saying that the law Moses was about to give to Israel was of his own devising, God conferred on Moses the highest possible honor and deference ever given to mortals. The "you" in this verse is singular, but the event of the advent or coming of God in a dense, dark cloud was public. Ordinarily God dwelt with his people in a pillar of cloud and fire; but here it turned dense and pitch black, perhaps with a roar of thunder and the flash of lightning as God's voice pierced his creation. The voice of God speaking to Moses (cf. Dt 4:32–33) would be audible in the camp so that Israel and all her true descendants would trust in Moses' words both then and for all time.

10–15 As a token of their inward preparation for meeting with God on the third day, the people were to wash their clothes, stay off the mountain, and abstain from sexual relations. The theology of this passage is fitness for meeting with God and preparation for the worship of God (see on 3:5). This is not to say that there was intrinsic virtue in the mere act of washing clothes or abstaining from marital relations, but the outward act was to signal that the inner work of sanctification had also been sought.

Sealing off the mountain was as much a temporary and arbitrary boundary as it was in 3:5, but it was introduced as an aid for the proper worship of a holy God. The penalty for intruding on such a holy scene was death, since anyone who dared to transgress so explicit a divine precept was already a profane and sacrilegious person whose presence would pollute the rest of the worshiping community. This was tantamount to what Nu 15:30–31 calls "sinning defiantly" or what the NT regards as blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Heb 10:26–31). After the "ram's horn" sounded a long, drawn-out blast, the people could once again ascend the mountain (v.13b).

16–19 The advent of God took place amid a most impressive display of cosmic disruptions: thunder and lightning (cf. Ps 77:18; Heb 12:18–19; Rev 4:5; 8:5; 11:19), an exceedingly loud trumpet blast (cf. Rev 1:10; 4:1), and a thick cloud (Ex 19:9; 2Ch 5:14). A deep moral impression was made on the people, for they were in the presence of the glorious majesty of the holy God who was about to reveal his person and character in his law.

20–25 Moses' reaction to this awesome sight is not given here, but in Heb 12:21 his response is, "I am trembling with fear." God's response came in v.21. Moses was to warn the people not to intrude rashly on the presence of God. The triple emphasis (vv.12–13, 21–22, 25) is a standard literary practice when the text wants us to notice an important subject. Thus the boundary between the human and the divine was not to be taken lightly by mortals.

"Even" the priests who approached the Lord were to consecrate themselves. Certainly this was not the Aaronic priesthood, because that had not yet been established. It must be a reference to the "firstborn" of every family who were dedicated and consecrated to God (13:2). Only later was the tribe of Levi substituted for each firstborn male (Nu 3:45). Should the people fail to observe this request, the Lord would "break out against them."

C. The Decalogue (20:1–17)

The purpose of the law of God was threefold: (1) to show the awful sinfulness of humans in their moral distance from God, (2) to demonstrate humanity's need for a mediator if they were ever to approach God, and (3) to outline how humans should live more abundantly by using as their guide the unchangeable perfections of the nature of God as revealed in the moral law.

The grammatical form of these commandments needs some comment. There are only three positive statements in vv.2–17—all without a finite verb (vv.2, 8, 12). These phrases might be rendered thus:

1. "I, being the LORD your God . . ."
   [Therefore observe commandments one to three]
2. "Remembering the Sabbath day . . ."
   [Therefore do vv.9–11]
3. "Honoring your father and your mother . . ."
   [Therefore observe commandments six to ten]

The resulting outline would be as follows: (1) Right Relations With God (vv.2–7), (2) Right Relations in the Worship of God (vv.8–11), and (3) Right Relations With Society (vv.12–17).

1–2 God's commandments are simply labeled "all these words." The title "Ten Commandments" comes from Ex 34:28 and Dt 4:13, while Heb 12:19 speaks of "a voice speaking words." God himself is the speaker and source of these commandments (cf. Dt 5:12–13, 32–33).

The lawgiver places his law in the environment of grace, for it was his gracious act of redemption and deliverance from Egypt that revealed his name, "the LORD." The "I" is both emphatic and the subject; "the LORD" is the predicate. The introduction of the Lord's name at this point brackets both ends of the Exodus event: In Ex 3:14 and 6:2, God tied the promise of his deliverance of Israel from Egypt with his name. Now that that promise had become reality, the Lord proclaimed his name once again. All that the Lord is, says, and does is embodied in this one affirmation: "I am the LORD." The rest of the statement is one of the great formulas of Scripture, used 125 times to describe the character and graciousness of the Lord.

3 In the first commandment there is only one difficult expression, the phrase "before/besides me." Nowhere does this phrase in the Hebrew mean "except me." It is perhaps best translated, "You shall not prefer other gods to me." The result, however, is the same: The Lord is the only true God.

4–6 The second commandment discusses the mode rather than the object of worship. It has two parts: the precept (vv.4–5a) and the penalty (vv.5b–6).

The OT is replete with synonyms and words (there are fourteen) for idols and images. Verse 23 explains the proscribed idols as "gods of silver or gods of gold." "Idol" also includes images carved from stone or wood and later those made from metal. Since pesel ("idol"; GK 7181) refers to statues, "resemblance" or "form" applies to real or imagined pictorial representations. None of these is to be made with the intention to worship it. This word was not meant to stifle artistic talent but only to avoid improper substitutes that, like the idols of Canaan, would steal hearts away from the true worship of God. One need only to consider the tabernacle with its ornate appointments—all under divine instruction—to see that making representations is not absolutely forbidden.

"You shall not bow down to them or worship them" is a figure of speech called hendiadys, where two expressions are used to convey a single idea, namely, "to offer religious worship." This expression is only used with respect to giving worship to foreign deities forbidden to Israel.

The sanctions attached to this command begin with the majestic reminder that "I, the LORD [Yahweh] your God, am a jealous God." The term "jealous" (or "zealous"; GK 7862) must not be understood in such popular misconceptions as God is naturally suspicious, distrustful, or wrongly envious of the success of others. When used of God it denotes (1) that attribute that demands exclusive devotion (Ex 34:14; Dt 4:24; 5:9; 6:15), (2) that attitude of anger directed against all who oppose him (Nu 25:11; Dt 29:20; Ps 79:5; et al.), and (3) that energy he expended on vindicating his people (2Ki 19:31; Isa 9:7; 37:32; et al.). Thus all idolatry, which Scripture labels elsewhere as spiritual adultery, that raises up competitors or brooks any kind of rivalry to the honor, glory, and esteem due to the Lord will excite his zealousness for the consistency of his own character and being.

Children often repeat the sins of their fathers by personally hating God; hence they too are punished like their fathers. Moses made it plain in Dt 24:16 that such punishment is the result of the children's own sin. The effects of disobedience last for some time, but the effects of loving God are far more extensive: "to a thousand [generations]."

7 The third commandment deals with the profession of the mouth in true adoration of God. The "name" (GK 9005) of God stands for so much more than the mere pronouncing of his title of address. It includes (1) his nature, being, and very person (Ps 20:1; Lk 24:47; Jn 1:12), (2) his teaching or doctrine (Ps 22:22; Jn 17:6, 26), and (3) his moral and ethical teaching (Mic 4:5) (see ZPEB, 4:360–66).

To "take up" the name of the Lord on one's lips "in vain" meant to "misuse" it, i.e., to use it for no purpose. Some vain uses of God's name on the lips of his people (1) express mild surprise, (2) fill in the gaps in speeches or prayers, and (3) confirm something that is false. This commandment does not exclude legitimate oaths, for they appear frequently (e.g., Dt 6:13; Ps 63:11; Isa 45:23; Jer 4:2; 12:16; Ro 1:9; 9:1; 1Co 15:31; Php 1:8; Rev 10:5–6).

8–11 The fourth commandment invokes the remembrance of the Sabbath. The term "Sabbath" (GK 8701) is derived from the Hebrew verb "to rest or cease from work." The Hebrews were to set aside each seventh day as belonging to the Lord their God. The command to remember the Sabbath is moral insofar as it requires of a person a due portion of his or her time dedicated to the worship and service of God, but it is ceremonial in that it prescribes the seventh day. The sanctity of the first day in honor of God's new deliverance, which the Lord Jesus accomplished in his death and finally in his resurrection, was already signaled in the symbolism of the feasts in Lev 23—"the day after the Sabbath" (v.15); "on the first day hold a sacred assembly" (v.7); "the first day is a sacred assembly . . . on the eighth" (vv.35–36). Indeed, these were the very feasts that pointed forward to the same events that Christians now celebrate on Sunday!

The reason for memorializing this day rested on two works of God: one retrospective (v.11 links it with the Creation), which pointed to the new Rest of God in the end times; the other prospective in the plan of redemptive history (Dt 5:15 links it with the Exodus from Egypt), which pointed to a new Exodus in the final day. This interpretation is borne out by the fact that the Sabbath was another "sign" of the covenant (see on 31:12–17).

12 The fifth commandment, to "honor" (GK 3877) one's parents, involves (1) prizing them highly (cf. Pr 4:8); (2) caring, showing affection for them (Ps 91:15); and (3) showing respect or fear, or revering them (Lev 19:3). Parents are to be shown honor, but nowhere is their word to rival or be a substitute for God's word. The promise in Eph 6:2–3 attached to this commandment to revere one's parents is unique, even though there is a sense in which the promise of life stands over all the commandments (Dt 4:1; 8:1; 16:20; 30:15–16). The captivity of Israel would be caused, in part, by a failure to honor their parents (Eze 22:7, 15).

13 The sixth commandment forbids murder. The ethical theology that lies behind this prohibition is that all humans have been created in the image of God (Ge 1:26–27; 9:6). While Hebrew possesses seven words for killing, the word used here (rasah; GK 8357) appears only forty-seven times in the OT. This is the one word that could signify "murder" where premeditation and intentionality are present. Thus this prohibition does not apply to beasts (Ge 9:3), to defending one's home from night-time burglars (Ex 22:2), to accidental killings (Dt 19:5), to the execution of murderers by the state (Ge 9:6), or to involvement with one's nation in certain types of war. It does apply, however, to self-murder (i.e., suicide), to all accessories to murder (2Sa 12:9), and to those who have authority but fail to use it to punish known murderers (1Ki 21:19).

14 The seventh commandment forbids adultery. The verb "to commit adultery" can be used of either men or women. Since the punishment for adultery is death (Dt 22:22) while the penalty for the seduction of a virgin is an offer of marriage or money (Ex 22:16–17; Dt 22:23–29), adultery is distinguished from fornication in the OT.

15 The eighth commandment prohibits stealing either a person or an object. This commandment recognizes that the Lord owns everything (cf. Pss 24:1; 115:16), and only he can give it or take it away. Therefore no one must despotically enslave or kidnap his fellow human being or usurp the rights to property he has not owned or been given.

16 The ninth commandment calls for sanctity of truth in all areas of life, even though the vocabulary primarily reflects the legal process in Israel. To despise the truth was to despise God, whose very being and character are truth.

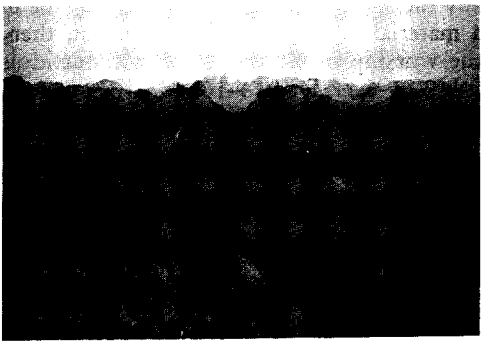
17 The tenth commandment disallows covetousness, namely, "to desire earnestly," "to long after," or "to covet" (GK 2773; cf. Dt 5:21). This commandment deals with one's inner heart and shows that none of the previous nine commandments could be observed merely from an external or formal act. Every inner instinct that led up to the act itself was also included (cf. 1Ti 6:6).

D. The Reaction of the People to the Theophany (20:18–21)

18 The awe-inspiring phenomena that heralded the theophany (i.e., the appearance of God) terrified the people. What had been depicted in 19:16–19 is here restated anew from the perspective of the people's reactions to these same phenomena. The "mountain [was] in smoke" because it was "ablaze with fire" (Dt 5:23).

19 The people suddenly had no desire to approach God's holy presence (cf. Heb 12:19). They instinctively sensed their need for a mediating priesthood or representative person to approach God on their behalf. Out of this realized need came one of the greatest revelations in a long line of OT promises of the Messiah. He would be a "prophet" like Moses who would speak God's word to them (see Dt 18:15–22). As a result of this arrangement, the people "stayed at a distance," and Moses delivered God's word to them.

20–21 "Do not be afraid," Moses told the people (cf. 14:13); for God had not come to kill Israel (cf. Dt 5:24–25) but to test her. This verse contrasts two types of "fear": tormenting fear (which comes from conscious guilt or unwarranted alarm and leads to bondage) or salutary fear (which promotes and demonstrates the presence of an attitude of complete trust and belief in God; cf. Ge 22:12). This second type will keep us from sinning (cf. Pr 1:7; Ecc 12:13; et al.).



Sunrise as seen from Jebel Musa, in the Sinai range where Moses received the Ten Commandments.

Israel's newly appointed mediator "drew near" or "approached" the thick darkness where God was and received the directives contained in the Book of the Covenant.

E. The Book of the Covenant (20:22–23:33)

The title for this section derives from 24:7. The laws may be arranged into two basic types. The conditional form, where the main condition and additional subheadings are introduced by "if" or "when," is called the casuistic or case law (laws based on actual precedents: "if a person . . ." or "when a person . . .") formulations. The second type takes a categorical, unconditional form and is in the second person (most frequently the singular), often with a negative command or prohibition. This is the form used for most of the Ten Commandments and called the apodictic (i.e., expressing what is always true) formulation.

Some scholars would isolate a third group of laws from within the apodictic. These laws are located in 21:12, 15–17; 22:19–20. They usually are very brief (around five short words), carry the death penalty, and all begin with a Hebrew participle. They are called the "Hebrew participial laws," but actually they are unconditional and apodictic in function. We may speak, then, of two basic types of law in the covenant code.

1. The prologue (20:22–26)

22–23 The connection is this: Since all of you witnessed the Lord speaking from heaven even though you saw no visible shape, form, or representation, therefore totally abandon any thought of ever trying to embody me in a material image. First and foremost, then, the worship of God must be without idols (see 20:4–6; cf. Dt 4:14–16).

24–26 These modest earthen altars were temporary in form and occasional in usage (cf. Ge 12:7; 13:18; 22:9). Stone altars were not to be hewn with a "tool," possibly so that no one could turn it into an image or some other fetish. Likewise, steps were not to be built up to the altars, to preclude the possibility of the worshiper exposing himself as he descended the steps. Later on, when altars with steps were allowed (Lev 9:22; Eze 43:13–17), the priests were instructed to wear linen undershorts (Ex 28:40–42; Eze 44:18).

2. Laws on slaves (21:1–11)

1 It is strange that the title (for v.1 appears to be such) comes after the section on the altar law (20:22–26). Since 22:18–23:19 consists mainly of moral and sapiential exhortations along with the ritual calendar in an appendix-like fashion, it is best to regard the title as referring to 21:2–22:17. These "laws" (or better, "judgments") are given as precedents to guide Israel's civil magistrates. While they deal mainly with temporal matters, they nevertheless are based on one or another express commandment in the Decalogue. It is most appropriate, therefore, that these judicial and political regulations should be set alongside the Decalogue.

2–4 Laws on the Hebrew slave are mentioned only in 21:1–11; Lev 25:39–43; Dt 15:12–18; and Jer 34:8–22. But there are differences in these laws. In Dt 15:12 the Hebrew slave is sold, while in Lev 25:39 he sells himself and the servitude is determined by the year of Jubilee. In Ex 21:2 and Dt 15:12, the servitude is for six years. In Ex 21:6 and Dt 15:17, it is for life when the slave desires it. The word "buy" (GK 7864) in judicial terms means to acquire as one's own property. After six years of service, the slave is to go out "free" (GK 2390 & 3655). The term seems to mean a "freeman" in the sense that he was a citizen once again. A slave left his master either single or married depending on what he was when he entered. Where a wife had been given to a slave, that wife and any children that resulted from that union belonged to the master.

5–6 "I love my master . . . wife and children" has legal rather than romantic overtones (cf. Dt 21:15–17: "does not love," i.e., "hates"). The "judges" changed the slave's status from temporary to permanent by a ceremony at the doorpost of the master's house. The perforation of the ear was a humiliating punishment in the Middle Assyrian Laws.

7–11 This pericope pertains to a girl who is sold by her father, not for slavery but for marriage. Nonetheless, she is designated a "servant." Should the terms of marriage not be fulfilled, it is to be considered a breach of contract, and the purchaser must allow the girl to be redeemed; she must not be sold outside that family. Always she must be treated as a daughter or a free-born woman, or the forfeiture clause will be invoked.

3. Laws on homicide (21:12–17)

12–14 This is a list of offenses that demanded the death penalty: murder, striking one's parents, kidnapping, or cursing one's parents. Homicide contravenes the divine order in Ge 9:6. Since humans are made in the image of God, no money or property settlement can atone for the premeditated destruction of the image of God in them. Accidental death is distinguished from intentional murder. In the case of accidental death, a place of asylum was to be provided (cf. Nu 35:6–34; Dt 19:1–13). But no sanctuary was to be given to the deliberate murderer. Notice the unusual first-person references to God.

15–17 Parental authority is so highly valued in biblical law that striking and cursing parents was a criminal and capital offense. Verses 15 and 17 are illustrations of the fifth commandment. Notice that the father and mother are mentioned together, thereby stressing their basic equality. Kidnapping draws a capital punishment because it is the theft of a human.

4. Laws on bodily injuries (21:18–32)

Following five cases that could involve the death penalty are five cases involving assault and bodily injury.

18–19 The first example concerns a man who is severely injured in a dispute but recovers sufficiently to be able to walk outdoors with the help of a cane or crutches. This injury will not carry the talionic punishment (cf. vv.23–25), but the assailant must recompense the injured for his "loss of time," loss of income, and all medical expenses.

20–21 The second case concerns a slave who is struck by his master and then dies after lingering for "a day or two." The master is given the benefit of the doubt and judged to have struck the slave with disciplinary and not homicidal intentions. When this law is considered alongside that in vv.26–27, which acted to control brutality against slaves at the point where it hurt the master's pocketbook, a whole new statement of the worth of the personhood of the slave is introduced. The aim of this law was to restrict the master's power over the salve.

22–25 The third situation describes a pregnant woman who gives birth prematurely as a result of an injury sustained from men who are fighting. This law envisions two alternatives: (1) "she gives birth but there is no serious injury," and (2) "there is serious injury."

Even though both mother and child survive, the offender must still pay some compensation (cf. vv.18–19). The fee would be set by the woman's husband and approved by a decision of the court. Should the pregnant woman or her child suffer serious injury, equal recompense is invoked, demanding "life for life." The talion principle invoked here appears to preclude exemption from death for an accident fatality as per v.13 because the punishment must match, but not exceed, the damage done. However, Nu 35:31 permits a substitute to ransom all capital offenses in the OT except in the one case of willful and premeditated murder. Thus the defendant must surrender to the deceased child's father or wife's husband the monetary value of each life (notice v.30) if either or both were harmed. The lex talionis does impose a strict limit on the amount of damages anyone could collect.

26–27 The fourth case concerns any slave who suffered a permanent injury from his owner; he won his freedom immediately (but cf. vv.20–21). Thus a slave was not to be treated as if he were mere chattel. The economic sanctions were designed to give the owner plenty of reason to resist any abusive tactics for the sake of his financial investment even if he totally disregarded the slave's dignity and worth as a human.

28–32 A fifth example of bodily injury involved goring oxen. People were responsible for the injuries their oxen caused to other people. The Bible's concern was not economic but moral and religious (cf. Ge 9:5–6). It made no difference what the age, social status, or gender of the person was.

5. Laws on property damages (21:33–22:15)

33–34 Culpable negligence (such as leaving a pit uncovered) that results in loss or damage to the property of another demands full restitution. The dead animal becomes the property of the person who is negligent and who must pay to replace that animal.

35–36 A second property damage case concerned a cattle fight, where one animal killed a neighbor's animal. In this case they were to kill the surviving animal, sell its meat, and divide the price as well as the dead animal. But if the animal that survived had a reputation for goring, then its owner must take total responsibility for the animal.

22:1–4 This third example of property damage, which illustrates the morality of the eighth commandment, also contains a group of five cases. In cases of theft the penalty is much greater than those of negligence involving another person's property. The reason for the fivefold penalty in the case of stealing an ox is probably because one man stole the means of another man's subsistence. The principle would extend to any of the man's livelihood implements.

Breaking and entering a home in the night could expose the intruder to the loss of his life (justifiable homicide), in which case the householder would not be held responsible (cf. Jer 2:34). Such invasion during the daylight hours would be a different situation since there would be witnesses and the scope of the intruder's intentions (whether just to steal or also to kill) could be assessed.

When stolen goods have been sold or consumed and the thief has nothing with which to repay his crime, he must be sold into servitude—presumably until he has repaid the debt. But if the goods are still in his possession, then there is hope of repentance and voluntary restitution. At least the original owner can be reunited with his own animal, and the penalty would be that the thief must provide a similar animal. When the thief voluntarily confessed, Lev 6:4–5 required that he add only one-fifth to the theft (cf. Nu 5:6–7).

5–6 A fourth type of property damage involved letting livestock graze in another man's field and letting a fire get out of control so that it burns over a neighbor's field. Both v.5 and v.6 begin with "if," meaning that they are treated as separate laws. Thus people are held responsible, not only for the harm they do, but also for the harm they occasion, even though they may not have purposely designed the damage that ensued. The restitution will be the top yield that that field has ever produced if the whole field was ruined, or, if not, the choicest sections left will be the standard for the whole field.

7–15 The last section on property damage treats four classes of goods entrusted to other persons for their custody or use.

The first case (vv.7–9) involves leaving valuable articles for safekeeping only to discover a thief stealing them. The thief is to make a double restitution (cf. v.4). The same situation appears in vv.8–9, only the identity of the thief is not known, and thus there is a suspicion that the keeper may have embezzled these securities. The bailee must appear before "the judges," where a deposition of innocence is taken as an oath before God in court. Though this text does not specifically mention an oath, the term "whether" is used elsewhere so frequently as the oath formula that we cannot take it as anything else here (the oath is mentioned explicitly in v.11). Verse 8 is the general rule, and v.9 specifies charges of misappropriation or breach of trust.

The second case (vv.10–11) deals with animals entrusted to another that are mutilated in the pasture, injure themselves, or are driven off by robbers. The same oath in court is required since there are no witnesses and only God can finally decide the keeper's culpability.

In the third case (vv.12–13), the animal given for safekeeping is stolen. Since the bailee is negligent in guarding the animal, he must make restitution by giving the owner an animal for the one stolen. But if the animal given for safekeeping is torn to pieces by wild animals, he need only produce the evidence of this fact, and no payment is required.

The last case (vv.14–15) treats the problem of a hired beast being injured or dying while the owner is not present. Since neglect is presumed, a full replacement is required. However, if the owner is present, the wages agreed on are regarded as sufficient to offset the hazard run by the owner in renting out his property; and his firsthand witness to the deed will take away all suspicion of negligence.

6. Laws on society (22:16–31)

16–17 The law on the seduction of a maiden not yet engaged is different from that dealing with the seduction of the betrothed girl in Dt 22:23, where violence is also involved. The penalty here is that the seducer must pay the bride-price and agree to marry her. Should this offer of marriage be rejected by the girl's father, the man must still pay the bride-price. This payment and offer do not clear the guilt of sin committed, for cleansing is needed by repentance.

18 "Sorceress" is the feminine form of a Semitic word that means "magician" or "sorcerer." The intensive form of the Hebrew verb means to use incantations, magic, sorcery, or the arts of witchcraft. Our English "witch" is alleged to have come from "to wit," i.e., "to know." The LXX rendered our word by pharmakos ("poisoners"), since sorcerers dealt in drugs and pharmaceutical potions.

19 This law forbids bestiality (cf. Lev 18:23; 20:15–16; Dt 27:21). The Hittite laws proscribed this evil with the threat of a sentence of death unless pardoned by the king. This offensive act apparently was prevalent among the Canaanites.

20 All who sacrifice to any god other than the Lord "will be dedicated for destruction" (pers. tr.). Notice Dt 17:2–5 for a parallel law.

21–27 These verses treat various forms of oppression against the poor, the widow, the orphan, and the alien. Since these have few or no natural protectors, they are to be shielded in their vulnerable estate. Both the sojourner or resident alien and the widows and orphans are to be protected (see 23:11; Lev 19:9–10; Dt 14:21; et al.).

The laws regulating interest on loaned money are dealt with more fully in Lev 25:35–37 and Dt 15:7; 23:19–20 (cf. Job 24:9; Pr 28:8; et al.). The righteous man may be defined as the one "who lends his money without usury" in Ps 15:5 and "does not lend at usury or take excessive interest" in Eze 18:8 (cf. vv.13, 17). On the other hand, Dt 23:20 declares, "You may charge a foreigner interest, but not a brother Israelite." This law is not dealing with "usury" in our modern sense of the word, i.e., exorbitant or illegal interest, but interest of any kind to a fellow Israelite.

Apparently even an interest-free loan required some type of pledge or security, but retaining one's outer garment (temporary collateral) overnight was strictly forbidden. This cloak or poncho, which doubled as a blanket at night, was needed when evening came.

28 Any word or deed that detracts from the glory of God is a reviling or cursing of his name (see on 20:7). Similarly, care must be taken not to curse any who are in authority, for the penalty for cursing God and the king is death (cf. Lev 24:15–16; 2Sa 16:9; 1Ki 2:8–9; 21:10).

29–30 The law of the firstfruits requires that "the fullness of your harvest and the outflow [lit., 'the tear'] of your presses" (lit. tr.), the firstborn of their children, and the firstborn of the cattle be offered to God. The children are to be redeemed by a money payment or by the substituted service of one Levite for each firstborn (13:13; Nu 3:46–48). They are not to "hold back" or "delay" to do these things, even though the text seems to be aware of a natural reluctance on the part of men. On the seven days that the young firstborn were allowed to stay with their mother, see Lev 22:27.

31 Underlining all these instructions on societal relations is this call to service: "You are to be my holy people." Such a noble calling as the Lord's firstborn son (4:22) or his "treasured possession . . . a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (see comments on 19:5–6) demands noble living. Animals killed by another are unclean because the carnivorous beasts that tear it are unclean and because the blood of such a slain animal would remain in its tissues, leaving it unclean. Such meat is to be fed to dogs. "Men of holiness" (lit. tr.) are to be separate in inward principle and outward practice—one of which is illustrated here.

7. Laws on justice and neighborliness (23:1–9)

1 This prohibition against slander (whether in court or not) is an amplification of the ninth commandment. Compare Lev 19:16 and the cases of Dt 22:13–19 and 1Ki 21:10–13. The clause "Do not help a wicked man" is the NIV's rendering of "do not set your hand with."

2–3 Justice demands impartiality rather than unwarranted compliance with the "many" (NIV, "crowd") or favoritism to the poor (cf. Lev 19:15).

4–5 Deuteronomy 22:1–3 gives fuller details on a man's responsibility to his brother in the matter of restoring a lost animal or helping someone in difficulty. This act of compassion is owed to another regardless of whether the man is an enemy or one who hates him (cf. Job 31:29; Pr 25:21–22).

6–8 Possibly "your poor people" is better understood here as "your opponent, adversary" (a synonym for "your enemy," v.4, and "the one hating you," v.5). Thus the suffix "your" is more easily understood and the meaning would be thus: When called to testify or to adjudicate between your enemy and someone else, do not pervert the judgment against your enemy just because he is your enemy. Justice demands that people distance themselves from any false charges (cf. v.1). God will not hold such persons or judges guiltless.

Verse 8 is repeated almost verbatim in Dt 16:19. Bribery must have been a common temptation, for numerous passages warn against it.

9 This verse is similar in wording and the motivation to 22:21, but it is placed here because this should be one of the great motivators for all Israelites to exercise justice: Remember how you felt when you were aliens (and all that that implies) in Egypt.

8. Laws on sacred seasons (23:10–19)

10–12 Every seventh year was to be a "Sabbath of sabbaths to the land, a sabbath to the LORD" (cf. Lev 25:4). The land was to lie fallow and to rest. The motivation for this legislation is to favor the poor and the wild animals. In Lev 25:1–7, 18–22, the reasons are more theological than civil: "a sabbath to the LORD" (25:4).

Verse 12 repeats the fourth commandment so that no one would gain the impression that once the sabbatical year was observed, all ordinary observances of the regular Sabbath would no longer be required. This repetition of 20:8–9 adds an additional reason for its observance: so that humans and animals alike might "be refreshed."

13 The caution against idolatry here appears to summarize all the divine precepts given above: literally, "in all things that I have said to you." "Do not let them be heard on your lips" is paralleled by "you shall not cause [all these things] to be remembered" (NIV, "do not invoke"). There would come a "day" when God would cut off the names of the idols out of the land, and they would "be remembered" no more (Hos 2:17; Zec 13:2). This was the practice of David in Ps 16:4 (note Ex 20:3; Jos 23:7).

14–17 This section deals with the three great annual pilgrimage feasts: Unleavened Bread at the beginning of the barley harvest in the spring, commemorating the Exodus (v.15); Harvest (also called Weeks in 34:22) at the end of the spring harvest of grain, commemorating the giving of the law (v.16a); and Ingathering of the summer crops of olives and grapes in early autumn, commemorating the wilderness wanderings (v.16b; cf. 34:18–26; Lev 23). All three feasts were at once agricultural and historical, and required annual attendance of all men. On the Unleavened Bread Feast, see 12:34 and Lev 23:5–8, 10–14. This feast began with Passover and lasted seven days with a holy convocation on the first and last days. The rule for all the feasts was "No one is to appear before me empty-handed."

Fifty days after the offering of the barley sheaf as the "firstfruits" of the harvest, the Feast of Harvest, known later as Pentecost, was to be celebrated (cf. Lev 23:15–22; Dt 16:9–11).

The Feast of Ingathering or Tabernacles (cf. Lev 23:33–36; Dt 16:13; 31:10; Jn 7:2) was a kind of thanksgiving festival. It was grossly neglected for many periods of Israel's history (Ne 8:17).

18 The first part of this verse has nothing to do with eating anything leavened. Rather, it means that individual Israelites were not to kill the Passover lamb while leaven was still in their houses. The second half of the verse makes no reference to fat as such; but as the parallel verse in 34:25b says, the "sacrifice from the Passover Feast" (here lit., "sacrifice of my feast") shall not "remain until morning" (cf. 12:10). If the word "fat" is retained over the parallel text in 34:25b, which would make "fat of my feast" parallel to "sacrifice of my feast," then the householders are being told to destroy the intestinal fat by morning. But the first explanation (i.e., the presence of leaven) is preferred.

19 The law of firstfruits and its theology have already been discussed in 4:22; 11:5; and 12:29. This was to be brought into the house of God yet to be described.

The prohibition of cooking a young goat in its mother's milk (see also 34:26; Dt 14:21b) has been explained since 1933 by a reference in a broken passage of a thirteenth-century B.C. Ugaritic text called "The Birth of the Gods Pleasant and Beautiful" (text 52, line 14). It is generally agreed that the reference is to a fertility rite that entails boiling a kid in milk; but there is no sure reference to the milk of its mother in the broken Ugaritic text. The matter is basically that the young dead kid is being cooked in the very milk that had sustained its life.

9. Epilogue (23:20–33)

An epilogue concludes the Covenant Code. Israel is promised the angel of God, every protection, and success, provided they remain faithful to the covenant (cf. 33:1–3; 34:11–16; Lev 26:3–11; Dt 7:13–15; 28:1–14).

20–22 The angel mentioned here cannot be Moses, God's messenger, or an ordinary angel; for the expressions are too high for any of these: "he will not forgive your rebellion" (who can forgive sin but God alone?) and "my Name is in him." This must be the Angel of the Covenant (cf. Isa 63:9; Mal 3:1), the Second Person of the Trinity. Just as the Lord's name resided in his temple (Dt 12:5, 11; 1Ki 8:29), so this Angel with the authority and prestige of the name of God was evidence enough that God himself was present in his Son. Obedience to the Angel would result in all of the blessings listed in the text. Israel was commanded: "Do not rebel against him"; yet they did just that (Nu 14:11; Ps 78:17, 40, 56).

23–26 On the nations listed here, see comment on 3:8. All these nations God's Angel would "wipe . . . out," i.e., remove from their national, not necessarily personal, existence; for surely David had Hittites in his army (2Sa 23:39) and was friendly with a Jebusite (2Sa 24:18–24). It was the worship and practices of the gods of these nations that were strictly forbidden. Instead, Israel was to demolish these gods and smash their "sacred stones," which apparently were free-standing stones that were associated with the veneration of deities, particularly the male deity.

The worship of God would affect the Israelites' water and food. No wonder the prophets connected a series of agricultural reverses with the judgment of God on a particular culture (e.g., Hag 1:5–11). Moreover, unlike the wicked who fail to live out half their days (Ps 55:23), the worshiping obedient will have full life spans.

27–30 God promised (in addition to his Angel in vv.20, 23) to send panic and confusion to every nation that Israel would face. He would also send "the hornet," a word that occurs only here, in Dt 7:20, and in Jos 24:12. Perhaps "the hornet" is a symbol of Egypt, just as Isa 7:18 uses the "fly" and the "bee" as symbols of Egypt and Assyria, respectively.

The speed of the conquest is stated differently in several texts. Like this one, Jdg 2:20–3:4 also argues for gradual progress in conquering the land; yet Dt 9:3 promises that it will be done "quickly." The answer lies in noting that the general sweep of the land and its conquest in principle were accomplished speedily. Because of mopping-up operations, however, the need to have people settle in the areas rid of Canaanite influence, and the threat of wild animals infesting them (cf. 2Ki 17:25), the completion of that task would designedly be slow.

31–33 The borders God promised to establish would be from "the Red Sea" (here an eastern boundary), the Gulf of Aqaba with its port city of Elath; to the "Sea of the Philistines," the Mediterranean Sea on the west; from the desert in the south, the Negeb; to "the River" in the north. Rather than equate the Euphrates with "the River," it would appear better to equate it with a river that preserves the same name in Arabic today, currently serving as the boundary between Lebanon and Syria. This description traces out limits already given to Abraham in Ge 15:18 and comes close to matching the extent of the United Kingdom under David and Solomon (2Sa 8:3–14; 10:6–19; 1Ki 4:21, 24; 2Ch 9:26).

No covenant was to be made with these people (though the Gibeonites did succeed in making one, Jos 9:3–15). The potential snare of their gods, practices, and worship was too great; thus there was to be no peaceful coexistence between these nations and Israel in Canaan.

F. Ratification of the Covenant (24:1–18)

The narrative, temporarily interrupted for the contents of the "Book of the Covenant" (20:22–23:33), is resumed from 20:21. Moses and his aides were to ascend the mountain after the actions mentioned in vv.3–8 were completed.

1 Nadab and Abihu, Aaron's two eldest sons, would have been the next high priests in the line. They died, however, under God's judgment (Nu 3:4) because of their perverse deed (Lev 10:1–2; Nu 3:4). The official "seventy elders" of Nu 11:16 had not been formally appointed yet. They were selected here to represent the twelve tribes, perhaps representing Jacob's seventy descendants.

2 Moses alone was to function as the mediator between God and the Israelites, just as Christ is designated the second Moses in Heb 3:1–6 and thus is the Mediator of the new covenant (Heb 12:24).

3 When the people promised to obey and to observe all that the Lord had said, they did not exchange the blessings of promise for the law. The keeping of the "LORD's words and laws" was to be based on the prior provision of sacrificial blood. The blood cleansed men and women so that "doing" and "obeying" became possible for them. This was not "doing" in order to merit favor or salvation.

4 This passage testifies to Moses' direct involvement in the composition of the book of Exodus. That "Moses then wrote down everything" agrees with his recording the account of the war on Amalek (17:14) and the writing of the Ten Commandments by the "finger of God" (31:18) (see comment on 17:14). The "twelve stone pillars" represented the twelve tribes (Jos 4:5, 20; 1Ki 18:31).

5 The "young Israelite men" were the firstborn who officiated until the Levites were appointed in their place in Nu 3:41 (see 19:22, 24).

6 Both the altar and the people were sprinkled with half of the blood, each in an act of dedication or consecration. Hebrews 9:19 does not mention the altar but speaks of the "book" or "scroll" of the covenant as also being sprinkled with blood. It is probably not correct to speak, as some do, of the altar as representing the Lord (cf. Ge 15:9–10, 17). The rite mentioned here is a rite of purification (not the water, scarlet wool, and hyssop of Lev 14:6–7 and Heb 9:19–20). The division of the blood points to the twofold aspect of the blood of the covenant: The blood on the altar symbolizes God's forgiveness and acceptance of the offering; the blood on the people points to a blood oath that binds them in obedience. In other words, the keeping of the words and laws was made possible by the sacrificial blood of the altar.

7 The Book of the Covenant includes in its narrowest meaning words from 20:22–23:33 but more fully, here, the contents of ch. 19, the Decalogue of ch. 20, and the case laws of 20:22–23:33.

8 The blood by which the covenant was ratified and sealed was the basis for the union between the Lord and the people. This phrase becomes most important in the NT (Mt 26:28; Mk 14:24; Lk 22:20; 1Co 11:25; Heb 9:20; 10:29; also Heb 12:24; 13:20; 1Pe 1:2).

9–10 That Moses and his company "saw the God of Israel" at first appears to contradict 33:20; Jn 1:18; and 1Ti 6:16; but what they saw was a "form ['similitude'] of the LORD" (Nu 12:8; cf. Eze 1:26; Isa 6:1). There is a deliberate obscurity in the form and details of the one who produced such a splendid, dazzling effect on these observers of God's presence.

Under God's feet was a "pavement made of sapphire," a deep blue or, more accurately, lapis lazuli of Mesopotamia, an opaque blue precious stone speckled with a golden yellow-colored pyrite. True sapphire, the transparent crystalline of corundum, was unknown in Egypt around 1400 B.C. It symbolizes the heavens (cf. Eze 1:22).

11 "God did not raise his hand against [lit., stretch out his hand; cf. 9:15] these leaders" who saw him. "Leaders"(GK 722) probably comes from the verb "to be deeply rooted," hence, "eminent ones," "nobles," or "chief men." In one of the most amazing texts in the Bible, these men saw God. Verse 11 uses another word than v.10; here it stresses inward, spiritual, or prophetic vision.

"They ate and drank" describes a covenant meal celebrating the sealing of the covenant described in vv.3–8. There is, however, no mention of God's participation in the eating or drinking!

12 Once again Moses was told to "come up" (cf. v.1). This is the first mention of the "tablets of stone."

13–14 In response to the call of God to Moses, Joshua accompanied him as they went farther up the mountain. Aaron and Hur, appointed as Moses' deputies in 17:10 and apparently as judges in 18:22, were left in charge. It is noteworthy that Hur does not appear in the golden calf incident (ch. 32).

15–16 As Moses ascended the mountain, all he could see was a cloud. When the glory of God "settled" on the mountain, the Bible uses the same word (shakan; GK 8905) as the one underlying the "shekinah" glory (cf. Jn 1:14, the Word "tabernacling" among us; see comment).

17 On "the glory of the LORD looked like a consuming fire," see comment on 16:10. The three symbols of God's glory, i.e., of his presence, are the cloud, the fire, and the voice of God. The radiance of his presence is like a fiery furnace (cf. Heb 12:18, 29).

18 Once Moses entered the "cloud," he would not be seen again for "forty days and forty nights" (cf. Mt 4:2). During this time Moses received all the instructions on the tabernacle and its furnishings in chs. 25–31. Not until ch. 32 do Moses and Joshua come down to face Israel's apostasy.

III. Divine Worship (25:1–40:38)

The final sixteen chapters of Exodus center on the worship of God. The only interruption of this theme is the episode of the golden calf (chs. 32–34), a section that contrasts the divinely appointed worship established in connection with the tabernacle with humanly devised worship that leads to debauchery.

The most important question about the tabernacle deals with its significance. My view is that the tabernacle primarily embodies the theology of worship. It thereby assumes that God is the Great King who reigns and is therefore worthy of our praise and adoration. Even more specifically, the meaning of the tabernacle is that God has come "to dwell," "to tabernacle," in the midst of Israel, as he would one day come in the Incarnation (Jn 1:14) and will come in the Second Advent (Rev 21:3). The Lord who dwelt in his visible glory in his sanctuary among his people (Ex 25:8) will one day come and dwell in all his glory among his saints forever.

A. The Tabernacle (25:1–31:18)

1. Collection of materials (25:1–9)

1–2 The "offering" (or "contribution"; GK 9556) mentioned here is not a "heave offering" (KJV, ASV mg.) but one separated for a sacred purpose as a gift to be consecrated to the Lord. See the translation "special gift" in Dt 12:6, 11, 17. It was also a voluntary gift, as v.2b stresses.

3–7 The fourteen components or materials that went into the tabernacle are listed. They include (1) gold, (2) silver, and (3) bronze. Then follow three colors of yarn. (4) "Blue" is derived from a dye of a shellfish, variously described as sky blue, deep dark blue, blue-purple, or bright violet. Its significance, though not stated, is perhaps of the heavenly character of Christ. (5) "Purple" is derived from the secretion of a gland of the murex snail and was supplied primarily by the Phoenicians. It is a purple-red and speaks of royalty. (6) "Scarlet" or crimson, is derived from the eggs and bodies of the worm coccus ilicis, which attaches itself to the leaves of the holly plant. Their maggots are collected, dried, and pulverized; and the powder produces a bright red (or yellow-red) dye. It is a part of the contribution. It may refer to the earthly aspect of the Son of Man.

(7) "Fine linen" translates an Egyptian loan word in Hebrew. Some linen found in Egyptian tombs has 152 threads per inch in the warp as compared to only 86 threads per inch in the most finely woven modern techniques. It is usually white, representing purity and righteousness. (8) The "goat hair" came from long-haired goats and most likely was black. It was a coarse material often used to weave tents. Felt would be a modern equivalent. (9) The "ram skins" had all the wool removed and then were dyed red; they were like our morocco leather. (10) The "hides of sea cows" no doubt came from the East African sea cows ("porpoise" or "dolphin") found in the Red Sea.

(11) "Acacia wood" is a species of the mimosa, whose wood is darker and harder than oak and therefore avoided by wood-eating insects. It is common in the Sinai Peninsula. (12) There was also "olive oil," made from crushing the olives, for light. (13) The word for "spices" is derived from the Hebrew word basam (GK 1411; "to be fragrant"). The four best species for anointing oil are identified in 30:22–25 as "myrrh" (sap of a balsam bush), "cinnamon" (bark of the cinnamon tree), "cane" or sweet calamus (a pink-colored pith from the root of a reed plant), and "cassia" (from the dried flowers of the cinnamon tree). The four species for incense are identified in 30:34–38 as "gum resin" or "stacte" (KJV; a powder taken from the middle of the hardened drops of the myrrh bush, rare and very valuable), "onycha" (from the shell of a type of clam [mollusks] similar to the purple murex snail and found deep in the Red Sea), "galbanum" (a rubbery resin of thick milky juice from the roots of a flowering plant thriving in Syria and Persia), and "frankincense" (a resin from the bark of boswellia carteri growing in southern Arabia). The boswellia carteri resin dripped spontaneously from the plant in the fall and was "pure," without any foreign matter—pure "white"—hence its Hebrew name "whiteness."

(14) The "onyx stones" cannot be positively identified. The LXX translates it as "beryl," mostly a sea-green color. Another suggestion is a chrysoprase quartz ranging in color from blue-green to yellow-green and apple-green. The Egyptians knew chrysoprase. For other gems mounted in the ephod and breastplate, see 28:6–25.

8 The "sanctuary" (GK 5219) means "holy" place or "the place set apart." Everything about the tabernacle was holy. The same word in 1 and 2 Chronicles refers to the temple. Hebrews 9:1 calls the sanctuary "the sanctuary of this world" (NIV, "earthly sanctuary").

9 The most important word about the sanctuary was that it was to be built according to the "pattern" God would show Moses. The word "pattern" (GK 9322) signals the fact that typology is present, for this is only a "model" or "pattern" of the real thing (see v.40).

The word "tabernacle" (GK 5438) appears here for the first time in the OT. It is from the word "to dwell" and is the place where God dwells among his people (cf.

29:42–46; Lev 26:9–12; Eze 37:26–28; and in the NT, Rev 21:2–3).

2. Ark and mercy seat (25:10–22)

The first item in Moses' list of instructions in the tabernacle was the ark of God with its "atonement cover" (GK 4114). Tyndale rendered this word as "mercy seat." However, the ark was the place of atonement or propitiation, hence the place where God was rendered favorable to his people.

10a The "chest" or "ark" (GK 778; English word from the Lat. arca) is called "the ark [of] the Testimony" (v.15), "the ark of the covenant of the LORD of all the earth" (Jos 3:11), "the sacred ark" (2Ch 35:3), and "the ark of your might" (Ps 132:8). It is the throne of God. God begins at the heart of things rather than working from the outside in (cf. also Heb 9:4).

10b–17 The ark was $3\frac{3}{4}$ feet long by $2\frac{1}{4}$ feet wide and high. It was to be overlaid with "pure gold." It had a type of "molding" or "collar" around it, and four gold rings were attached there. The "acacia wood" poles were slid through the rings for transporting the chest. The "Testimony" (GK 6343) or "laws" of the Ten Commandments were placed inside the ark. In Egypt, Babylonia, and the Hittite Empire, important documents were deposited in the sanctuary "at the feet" of the deity.

The verb that lies behind the noun "atonement" in the expression "atonement cover" (GK 4114) means "to ransom or deliver by means of a substitute." (There is no word for "lid" or "cover" here.) The LXX has "propitiatory covering" or "mercy seat," as does Heb 9:5 (see NIV note). This place of expiating the sins of humanity is an adumbration of Christ's propitiatory work (Ro 3:25; Heb 9:23–24; 1Jn 2:2) and is at the heart of our worship of the one who died for us.

18–22 A cherub (pl. "cherubim") is usually depicted as a composite creature with wings, a human head, and a body combining elements of an ox, a lion, or an eagle (cf. Ge 3:24; Eze 1; Rev 4). In Egypt the sphinx was prevalent. In Assyria the same root word was used to describe one who functioned as a temple guardian. The two cherubim were to be made from the cover itself and as part of it. These were hardly made in relief, since they were "looking toward the cover" (cf. 1Pe 1:12).

Verse 22 gives the theological relevance of the ark and cherubim, indeed, of all our worship of God: "There ... I will meet with you." The living God is continually present in his tabernacle and walks among his people there (Lev 26:11–12). It was from his throne above the cherubim that he spoke and met with his people (cf. 1Sa 4:4).

3. Table of the bread of the Presence (25:23–30)

The table of the Presence was one of three pieces of furniture in the Holy Place. It was made of acacia wood overlaid with gold on which twelve loaves of bread were placed. The table with its bread presented two sides of the same truth: a Godward side and a human side. First, it stood before God, reminding Israel that they were ever open to the omniscience and protection of God. Next, it was where the priests served and found their bread. That bread pointed to the Bread that would come down from heaven and give to men and women everlasting bread (cf. Jn 6).

23–28 The "table" measured 3 feet long by $1\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide by 27 inches high. The table taken from the second temple by Antiochus Epiphanes is depicted on the Arch of Titus among the items the Romans took back to Rome in A.D. 70. The description of the table is similar to the ark, overlaid with gold, with a molding or encircling rim and four gold rings to hold the transporting poles.

29 "Its plates and dishes ... its pitchers and bowls" were not for the purpose of serving God food as in pagan nations. Even the sacrifices set apart for God were not to be boiled or roasted; they were to come up before him in vapors and odors, not in substance or as food. Of course, some of the offerings were to be shared with the priests, and the fellowship offerings were shared in part with the people.

30 "The bread of the Presence" is referred to here and also in 1Sa 21:6 and 1Ki 7:48. In this phrase "Presence" (lit., "faces"; GK 7156) stands for the Divine Person himself, just as the "angel of his presence" (lit., "face[s]") in Isa 63:9, or in Ex 33:14–15, "my Presence [lit., 'my face'] shall go with you," is an OT designation of Christ. The twelve loaves symbolize the twelve tribes of Israel as constantly being under the scrutiny, care, and preservation of God (cf. Jn 6:32–38). Just as that bread supplied the needs of priests on the Sabbath in the Holy Place (see Lev 24:5–9), so Jesus meets the needs of his children in this generation (Jn 6:32–35).

4. Golden lampstand (25:31–40)

31 The third article in the Holy Place was "a lampstand [menorah; GK 4963] of pure gold" fashioned all in one piece. It was placed on the south or left side of the Holy Place.

The lampstand's design—"flowerlike cups, buds and blossoms"—was patterned after an almond tree (v.33), the first tree of spring in the Near East, awakening as early as mid-December and decking itself in radiant white blossoms before leafing. The triad of its parts cannot be identified with final certainty. The "cups" were either the calyx (outer covering of the flower; cf. the same word translated "cup" in Ge 44:2) or the almond nut whose medical and cosmetic properties are described as perfect. The "bud" is also rendered as the knop or bulb, the round object on the branch (same word as the capitals or chapiters on the pillars in Solomon's temple, 1Ki 7:18). The "blossoms" of the almond tree render the same word used of Aaron's almond rod that budded and blossomed (Nu 17:8).

The expression "hammer it out" is difficult. Josephus claims it was "cast gold [and] hollow," made in a mold. The verb is used of fashioning the cherubim, the lampstand (vv.31, 36; 37:17, 22; Nu 8:4), and the two silver trumpets (Nu 10:2).

32–36 The total number of ornaments—i.e., "six branches . . . three cups . . . on the lampstand . . . four cups . . . one bud," etc.—would be 69 (6 branches times 3 sets times 3 figures plus 1 branch times 4 sets times 3 figures plus 3 buds under each set of branches equals 69).

37–39 The ancient lamp was a kind of small, round (clay) saucer with the rim pinched together to form a spout from which protruded the top of the wick dipped in the oil of the saucer. Examples of seven-pinched-rim lamps come from the age of Moses (Late Bronze). Beth Shan and Meggiddo have supplied examples of metal pedestals designed to carry a lamp, consisting of an upright three-foot-long shaft dividing into three feet and joined in a ring to be placed on the ground on top of which is a ledge for the lamp. "A talent of pure gold" was about seventy-five pounds.

40 "According to the pattern [GK 9322]" is once again a key word warning Moses and all subsequent readers that what he was really building was only a model (see comment on v.9), not the real, or the archetype, that lay behind the model. Therefore, it was "only a shadow of the good things that are coming—not the realities themselves" (Heb 10:1). Thus there was a built-in obsolescence in this revelation and the models exhibited in the whole tabernacle and its service as contained in Ex 25–Lev 9. The archetype remained with God while these earthly models merely pictured what was yet to come.

5. Curtains, framework, veil, and screen (26:1–37)

a. The tabernacle's curtains (26:1–14)

There are two sets of coverings and two sets of curtains. The two coverings were an outer one of hides of sea cows and an inner one of ram skins dyed red. The two curtains were an outer set of goat hair and an inner set of fine linen with blue, purple, and scarlet yarn. Within the sanctuary, moving from the inside out, the curtains of fine linen were visible only to the priests who served in the presence of him who is purity and righteousness itself. The curtains of goats' hair were reminders of the daily sin offering that was a kid from the goats (Nu 28:15) and of our cleansing from sin (Lev 16). The covering of rams' skins also recalled the sacrifice used in consecrating the priesthood (Lev 8); and it was deliberately dyed red, showing that the priesthood was set apart by blood. Finally, the protective coating of the sea cows' hides marked a protective separation between the dwelling place of God and the world.

1–3 On the "linen" see 25:4. Each of the "ten curtains of finely twisted linen" was about forty-two feet long and six feet wide. They were sewn together in two sets of five. The curtains were more important than the tabernacle's frame, for they are described first—thus setting up the same priority we saw in the ordering of the description of all the tabernacle's parts.

4–6 After stitching each five-sectioned curtain together, two curtains were coupled together by fifty loops on one side and fifty loops on the other side. These were then to be joined by fifty golden clasps or hooks (cf. v.11). The beauty of these white, fine linen curtains with blue, purple, and scarlet yarn (see 25:4) was enhanced with cherubim (see 25:18) embroidered on them.

7–13 Of the eleven "curtains of goat hair," six were sewed in one portion and five in another, and again the fifty loops on one side were joined to the fifty loops on the other by fifty clasps. Goat hair in the Eastern world is black, not white (cf. SS 1:5; cf. on 25:4). Since the "tent curtains" were larger than the curtains of the tabernacle (vv. 1–6), there would be material left on the end and on either side to "hang down the rear" and to "hang over the sides of the tabernacle so as to cover it."

b. The tabernacle's framework (26:15–30)

15–25 On "acacia wood" see comment on 25:5. The command to "make upright frames" (cf. vv.19, 26) introduces the three elements that made up the "walls." The traditional rendering "boards" has led many to the idea that the walls were solid; but if this were so, it would have obscured the inner linen curtains from sight. These frames formed a trellis-like structure over which the four curtains were draped.

Each frame was to be 15 feet long by $2\frac{1}{4}$ feet wide. The framework of the tabernacle consisted of twenty boards each on the north and south sides with six on the western end with a post at each of the two corners. The "two projections" (lit., "hands") are probably the two tenons at the bottom of each frame to be inserted into the bases. The frames were fitted into a foundation of "forty silver bases" or sockets on each side. Israel contributed one hundred talents of silver for these bases (38:25–28), which was described as atonement money (30:11–16). Thus it may be said that the foundation of the tabernacle rested on a ransom or redemption, just as the church was "bought with his own blood" (Ac 20:28).

The Hebrew word for "corner" apparently means "angle." Thus one frame was cut down the center on a miter, and the two pieces would form the "corner" or "angle" frame on the two sides of the corner.

26–29 Fifteen "crossbars" were to be fitted on the outside of the structure to strengthen the trellis framework: five on each of the two sides (north and south) and five on the back (west). One of the five was full length down the middle of the wall; the other four extended only half the length of the wall, making three rows of bars on the outside of the frame. The "gold rings" were to serve as holders (lit., "houses") for the bars (cf. 25:26–27).

30 Once more we are reminded that all was to be done "according to plan" (see comment on 25:40; cf. Heb 8:5).

c. The tabernacle's veil (26:31–35)

31–35 The inner veil (NIV, "curtain") separating the Most Holy Place from the Holy Place was to be made of the same material and design as the inner curtain and was to be supported on four gold-covered acacia wood pillars. The "curtain" (GK 3749) is called the "veil of covering" or "shielding curtain" (39:34; 40:21; Nu 4:5) or the "curtain that is in front of the Testimony" (Ex 27:21). At the death of Christ, this inner curtain of the temple was torn in two, thereby giving the believer permanent access to the presence of God (Mt 27:51; Mk 15:38; Lk 23:45; Heb 6:19; 9:3; 10:19–22).

d. The tabernacle's screen (26:36–37)

36 "The entrance . . . curtain" was like the curtain dividing the two inner rooms (v.33) of the tabernacle and the inner curtain of v.1. The same Hebrew word is used for the curtain at the entrance to the courtyard (27:16) as the screen for the entrance to the tent (here).

37 Since this curtain went to the outside and to the corners of the wall, it had "five posts of acacia wood overlaid with gold" instead of just four (v.32).

6. Altar of burnt offering (27:1–8)

1–2 The first and largest piece of equipment that a worshiper would meet on entering the court of the tabernacle was the "altar" (GK 4640) the altar of burnt offering in Lev 4:7, 10, 18). Its position just inside the gate made it easily accessible, unavoidable, and unmistakable. It was made of acacia wood (see comment on 25:5) and measured $7\frac{1}{2}$ feet square by $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet high. It was overlaid with bronze. There was but one altar just as there is but one way of salvation, and this Jesus fulfilled (see Jn 1:29; Heb 9:13–14, 22–28). The "horns" (GK 7967), i.e., "a horn at each of the four corners," were projections of the four corner posts but of one piece with the altar. They symbolized power, help, and sanctuary (cf. 1Sa 2:10; 2Sa 22:3; 1Ki 1:50; 2:28; Pss 89:17; 112:9). The reason the horns symbolized the atoning power of the altar was that in the atonement ritual some of the blood was put on the horns before the rest was poured out at the base of the altar (29:12; Lev 4:7, 18, 25, 30, 34; 8:15; 9:9; 16:18).

3 The "pots" (or pans) were to hold the fat-soaked ashes when they were removed from the hearth by the "shovels." The "sprinkling bowls" (or basins) were to catch the blood of the animals slain beside the altar to be sprinkled on the altar's base later on. The three-pronged "meat forks" (fleshhooks) were for arranging the sacrifice or retracting the priests' portion (1Sa 2:13). The "fire pans" (or possibly "censers") were probably for carrying fire from the altar of incense inside the Holy Place (Lev 10:1; 16:12; 1Ki 7:50).

4–8 A "grating" was placed midway between the top and the bottom of the boxlike structure. This grating divided the altar into a lower and an upper part, a division necessitated by the sprinkling of the blood. Since any fire built inside the upper half would have eventually destroyed the altar from the intense heat, perhaps the altar box was designed to be filled with earth when it was in use. Perhaps this is why it was to be made "hollow."

"A bronze ring at each of the four corners" was attached to the bronze grating through which the acacia wood staves were placed when the altar had to be moved. The "ledge" was a projection or a collar around the altar halfway up its side.

7. Court of the tabernacle (27:9–19)

9–11 The "courtyard for the tabernacle" was a perfect rectangle, 150 feet long by 75 feet wide. Its purposes were fourfold: (1) to prevent unlawful approach; (2) to keep out all wild animals; (3) to be a positive line of demarcation between the world and the holy presence of God; and (4) with its single gate, to be a way of approach to God.

The courtyard was to be shielded by a curtain made of the same fabric and colors (v.16) as the entrance, the dividing curtains, and the inner curtains of the tabernacle (26:31–33, 36–37). It was to be high enough ($7\frac{1}{2}$ feet, v.18) to block the view of all persons. Each long side was to have "twenty posts and twenty bronze bases." In all there would be sixty posts (or fifty-six if the corner posts were counted twice as belonging to each side from an observer's point of view). The posts were spaced $7\frac{1}{2}$ feet apart, with a frame or rod going through the top of the silver capitals or "bands" (v.17), providing a frame or guy rod to give stability to the posts. They were also anchored by guy ropes and pegs.

12–19 The courtyard was divided in half. The tabernacle occupied the central position in the west half, and the altar and laver were probably somewhat centered in the eastern half (see the various pictures of the tabernacle). The entrance was invitingly wide; "curtains fifteen cubits long" were to flank the entrance, which would be about thirty feet wide (cf. 6:36–37). The entrance too marked a division between the world and the dwelling place of God. All the poles surrounding the courtyard had silver fillets or "bands," which apparently were narrow strips of binding metal used as decoration.

8. Priesthood (27:20–28:5)

Only Aaron and his four sons were to serve as priests in standing before God. The priest was the indispensable mediator in the life of fellowship with God.

20–21 The "clear oil of pressed olives" was extracted from unripened olives that were beaten and pounded in a mortar rather than crushed in a mill. The pulpy mass was then placed in a basket; and the oil, without any mixture of other parts of the olive, dripped through the basket, giving a clear, pure oil that burned with little or no smoke. The lamps were to be kept burning "from evening till morning" (cf. 30:8; 1Sa 3:3). Significantly, the people were to provide this oil continuously; otherwise there would be darkness in the dwelling place of God.

1 Nadab and Abihu were two of Aaron's four sons who later offered unauthorized fire before the Lord and were consumed (Lev 10:1–2), leaving only Eleazer and Ithamar. Aaron and his sons were to "serve . . . as priests." They were to stand before the Lord (applied to all Levites in Dt 10:8) "to offer gifts and sacrifices for sins" and "to deal gently with those who are ignorant and are going astray" (Heb 5:1–2). They were to teach the people (Ne 8:2, 9) and serve as intercessors for them.

2–5 The garments of the high priest were "to give him dignity and honor," i.e., they were to exalt the office and function of the high priest as well as beautify the worship of God. "The skilled men" were to make priestly garments for Aaron. Eight garments are mentioned: the four inner garments worn by all priests—tunics, linen undergarments or breeches, girdles or sashes, and headbands (vv.39–42). The four overgarments that were to be especially worn by Aaron were the breastpiece, ephod, robe, and turban (miter).

9. Garments of the priests (28:6–43)

6–14 The ephod probably was a high priestly waistcoat woven of blue, purple, scarlet, and white linen thread—all entwined with gold thread. Instead of having sleeves or being joined at the sides, it was hung from the shoulders by straps on which one onyx stone was mounted on each strap on top of a golden clasp with the names of the six younger sons of Israel engraved on one stone and the six elder sons engraved on the other stone. The names symbolize that the high priest represented all Israel when he ministered in the tabernacle. A "waistband" made of the same material and style as the ephod held the front and back of the ephod to the priest's body. It had no significance of its own.

15–30 The "breastpiece," a square piece of cloth made the same way as the ephod, was folded in half upward to form a sort of pouch in a square, 9 inches by 9 inches. Two rings at the inside lower corners attached the breastpiece to the rings of the ephod with a blue cord. Two golden rings on the top of the breastpiece fastened it to the shoulder pieces of the ephod with two golden chains. Twelve stones, one for each tribe, were set in four rows of three stones: the name of each son of Jacob was engraved on its respective stone in the proper birth order of the sons. Thus the nation was doubly represented before the Lord.

The "Urim and the Thummim" (lit., "lights and perfection") often were used in times of crisis to determine the will of God (Nu 27:21), but just how they functioned and what they looked like are unknown. Perhaps they only symbolized the special revelation open to the high priest rather than being the necessary means of achieving that information. See also Lev 8:8; Nu 27:21; Dt 33:8; et al.

31–35 Under the ephod was a long, sleeveless blue "robe," woven without a seam, which reached a little below the knees. It had slits for the arms and a hole for the head to pass through. Along the hem were blue, purple, and scarlet alternating pomegranates and golden bells. The bells, which jingled as the high priest served in the tabernacle, assured all who listened that he had not died in the Holy Place and that he continued to minister on their behalf.

36–39 The most conspicuous and important feature of the "turban" (miter) was the golden plate with the engraving "HOLY TO THE LORD." The plate stretched over the forehead from ear to ear and was attached with a blue band going through two holes at the ends of the plate and then over the top of the head to a hole in the center of the plate.

The "tunic of fine linen" no doubt referred to a long white linen coat worn over the linen drawers or breeches (v.42), which perhaps reached down to the ankles and was close-fitted to the body as were the sleeves.

40–43 The attire for the ordinary priests is described next. Its purpose was to give "dignity and honor" (lit., "glory and beauty") to them in their office. Verse 41 forms a transition to ch. 29, which speaks of the ordination of the priests. On the linen garments see comment on 20:26.

10. Ordination of the priests (29:1–46)

The instructions given to Moses in 28:41 are here elaborated in greater detail and are implemented in Lev 8. The consecration of Aaron and his sons in an act of ordination stressed the seriousness and central mission they had been given in the whole act of worship of our holy God.

1–9 Aaron and his sons were installed as high priest and ministering priests, respectively. This service of consecration uniquely marked them for the service of the tabernacle. The sacrifices for this occasion were to be "without defect" (cf. 12:5). Similarly, the consecrating sacrifice must be "without yeast" (cf. 12:15). Then Aaron and his sons were to be washed. The investiture of the high priest involved nine acts (Lev 8:7–9), but for ordinary priests it involved only three. Washing symbolized the removal of uncleanness resulting from sin (cf. 40:12–13; Lev 8:6–9; notice Heb 10:22).

Aaron and his sons were next dressed in the clothes described in ch. 28 and then anointed. The manner in which the high priest Aaron was anointed was different from that of his sons (cf. v.21; cf. also Lev 21:10). For the composition of the anointing oil, see comment on 30:22–25.

10–12 A bull was brought as a sin offering to atone for Aaron and his sons' past sins. This was accomplished in symbol by laying their hands on the bull's head, in effect transferring their sins to the sin-bearer (cf. Lev 4:1–5:13; 16:11, 15, 21). The bull was next slaughtered in the presence of the Lord as an act of appeasement. Applying blood to the horns and the base of the altar sanctified the offering place as well as the offering.

13–14 After the sacrifice was killed, the choicest parts were burned on the altar, the enveloping fat adding fuel to the fire (cf. Lev 3:4–5, 16; 7:23–25). The "flesh and its hide and its offal," however, were thought of as being permeated with sin and were thus burned outside the camp. Similarly, Christ our Sacrifice offered up his spirit to the heavenly Father, but his flesh went into the tomb, outside the "camp" (cf. Heb 13:11–13).

15–18 As with the bull, Aaron and his sons were to identify with one of the rams by laying on their hands. This ram was completely offered to the Lord. Entire and wholehearted dedication of everything they were or hoped to be to God was called for. This constituted the "pleasing aroma" to the Lord (cf. Lev 1:9).

19–21 The second ram was also to be identified with, but it was to be used to consecrate Aaron and his sons. After slaughtering the ram, they were to "take some of its blood" and consecrate "the lobes of their [right] ears," the organ that hears the Word of God. Next blood was to be applied to "the thumbs of their right hands," organs by which the mediatorial work was to be performed on behalf of the people. Then Aaron and his sons were to apply blood to the "big toes of their right feet," so that the sanctified walk of the priests would be examples to the people. Lastly, some of the blood of the altar was to be mixed with the anointing oil and sprinkled on Aaron and his sons and their clothes. This represented the full consecration of the priests.

22–26 The second ram was called "the ram for the ordination," which is literally "the ram of filling." The choice parts of this ram, along with the unleavened bread, oiled cake, and wafer, were to "fill" the hands of Aaron and his sons and to be used as a "wave offering." The origin of the idiom "to fill the hand of" is unknown, but the idea of "filling" came to mean "ordination." The waving was not from side to side but toward the altar and back, showing that the sacrifice was given to God and then received back by the priest for his use (cf. Lev 7:30; 23:20). Everything that had been waved except the "breast of the ram" was then to be burned on the altar.

27–28 "The breast that was waved and the thigh that was presented" of animals given as fellowship offerings were to be given to the priests.

29–30 The ordination garments of Aaron and his sons were to be passed down for future ordinations. The priest who would follow Aaron as high priest would wear these garments for seven days, perhaps symbolizing the completeness of his consecration.

31–34 The "ram for the ordination" (i.e., the breast and thigh, v.27) was to be cooked in a "sacred place," namely, in the tabernacle courtyard. Then Aaron and his sons were to partake of the various foodstuffs in a type of communion meal. This was a closed communion, and all leftovers were to be burned and not passed on.

35–37 Again obedience is emphasized. The full consecration of the altar required the sacrifice of a bull for seven days running. After seven days of consecration, the altar would be "most holy," as meaning that whatever touched it would likewise be made holy (cf. Mt 23:19).

38–41 Next Moses was instructed as to the nature of the daily offerings. Two yearling lambs a day were to be sacrificed, one in the morning and the other at evening (cf. Nu 28:3–8; cf. also 2Ki 16:15; Eze 46:13–15). The morning and the evening sacrifices were accompanied by a mixture of about two quarts of flour and one quarter of a hin of olive oil and a drink offering of a quart of wine. Once again the Lord reminded Moses that the offering was a pleasing aroma for him.

42–43 The Lord gave Moses a prophetic glimpse into Israel's future by referring to the obligation "for the generations to come." He promised to meet with the priests and Israel as regularly as the sacrifices were made. The Hebrew for "the place will be consecrated" is literally "it will be consecrated," perhaps meaning that "Israel" would be sanctified, since fellowship was based on atonement.

44–46 After the Lord has consecrated the priests and paraphernalia, he "will dwell among the Israelites and be their God." In fact, the divine side of the Exodus was so that God "might dwell among" his people. The real significance of the tabernacle theology is explicitly stated as God's "tabernacling" or "dwelling" among people so that they could recognize that he indeed was God.

11. Altar of incense (30:1–10)

a. Building instructions (30:1–6)

The altar of incense also stood in the Holy Place. Whereas the altar inside the gate to the court was overlaid with bronze and was the place of continual bloodshed, this altar was overlaid with gold and had perpetual incense on it to symbolize continual intercession to God.

1–6 The altar was to be made of "acacia wood." This square structure with horns on each corner was considerably smaller than the altar of burnt offering (cf. 27:1). The incense altar was to be overlaid with gold. The altar had the usual rings for the transporting poles. The altar was to be located directly in front of the curtain that shielded the "ark of the Testimony" from view.

b. Operating instructions (30:7–10)

7–10 The incense that was to be burned every morning and evening symbolized the prayers of the saints and communion with God (cf. Ps 141:2; Lk 1:10; Rev 5:8; 8:3–4). What was not to be used on the altar of incense is explicitly pointed out (v.9). Failure to follow this would result in the altar's desecration. Also, it was necessary that once a year the altar be cleansed with blood from the atoning offering.

12. Census tax (30:11–16)

11–16 The precise reason for taking a census is not given. Perhaps it was to obtain a register of citizens for public duties in the Lord's service. Previously 13:13 stated that the firstborn son belonged to God and had to be redeemed by a sacrifice. Likewise all firstborn belonged to God, and he accepted the tribe of Levi in lieu of all the firstborn (4:22; Nu 3:12). Verse 12 extends the principle. The word for "ransom" (GK 4111) or "atonement" signifies "to deliver or redeem by a substitute." In this case the substitute was money by taking a census. Usually a census was equivalent to mustering troops; that is why it was so dangerous in David's case (2Sa 24). It is clear, however, that those who were numbered under the proper circumstances would be under divine protection.

The "shekel" (GK 9203) was mentioned in 21:32. A "half shekel" would be about one-fifth of an ounce. This tax was to be paid by adults of military age. The fact that the rich were to give the same amount as the poor shows that it was not how much one had that obtained atonement for his life. The proceeds from the census tax were to be used by the Levites in their service for the Lord and were also to serve as a memorial for the Israelites (v.16).

13. Bronze basin, anointing oil, and incense (30:17–38)

17–21 The "bronze basin" was made from the bronze mirrors of the women (38:8) given as a freewill offering. Its exact shape is uncertain, but perhaps the "stand" was separate since it is always mentioned separately (cf. 31:9; 35:16; et al.). It was vital that the priests washed their hands and feet whenever they entered the "Tent of Meeting" and when they approached the altar to make an offering to the Lord by fire. Performing service to God in a state of ritual impurity risks death (cf. Lev 10:1–2).

22–38 On the spices and anointing oils, see comment on 25:6. The anointing of the various furniture pieces and other accoutrements served to consecrate them to the Lord's service. The "sacred anointing oil" was to be unique, in both its makeup and its use. To merchandise it or duplicate it without proper authorization would result in excommunication from the nation. The incense was likewise to be unique and was considered most sacred. Failure to properly consider it would similarly result in excommunication from the nation.

14. Appointment of craftsmen (31:1–11)

1–11 Bezalel means "in the shadow of God's [protection]." He was a descendant of Caleb (1Ch 2:19). His ability to work in the arts and his skills as a craftsman were gifts of the Holy Spirit. Oholiab, Bezalel's assistant, was from the tribe of Dan. His name means "tent of the father" or "the (divine) father is my tent." These two skilled craftsmen were responsible for all that pertained to the tabernacle and its service, though they themselves possibly only supervised the construction.

15. Sabbath rest (31:12–17)

12–17 Even though the construction of the tabernacle and its furnishings was a sacred work, the workmen were not to overlook the sacred institution of the Sabbath. "You must observe my Sabbaths" is emphatic. To violate the Sabbath even for the sake of working on the tabernacle would result in death. "Desecrates" contrasts sharply with "makes you holy." As God's covenant people, the Israelites were to carefully observe the sign of that covenant. The Sabbath was the sign of "a lasting covenant" (lit., "a perpetual covenant"), as were the rainbow (Ge 9:16), circumcision (Ge 17:7, 13, 19), and the table of the bread of the Presence (Lev 24:8). The Sabbath was thus a gift to Israel signifying their separateness as a people.

16. Conclusion to the instructions (31:18)

18 This verse is transitional to the golden calf scene. The forty days (see 24:18) had come to an end. The "two tablets of the Testimony" contained the Ten Commandments (cf. 32:15–16; 34:28; Dt 4:13; 5:22; 10:4). On the "finger of God," see comment on 8:19.

B. False Worship of the Golden Calf (32:1–34:35)

1. Golden calf (32:1–29)

While chs. 32–34 continue the narrative interrupted after 24:18, their appearance at this point in the text deliberately contrasts the authorized worship of God set forth in the tabernacle instructions with the fabricated human worship of the golden calf. One could hardly conceive of two greater opposites. There is another contrast between what is taking place on the mountain and what is happening on the desert floor: the contrast between the presence of God and the insidious force of sin (cf. Dt 9:8–21; Ne 9:18; Ps 106:19–23). Therefore, chs. 32–34 form a terrible and ignominious interlude between the instructions on Israel's worship and their implementation.

1Without proper visible leadership, people fail. Sometimes even the holiest of men, such as Aaron, can be persuaded to do things contrary to their testimony. The people's cry, "Come, make us gods who will go before us," revealed their inadequate faith in a time of waiting. The clause "as for this fellow Moses who brought us up out of Egypt" is deliberately cast in coarse language, thus revealing the attitude of the people who had relegated God's works to a mere mortal.

2–4 Aaron instructed the people to "take off" (lit., "tear off") their "gold earrings." No doubt these were part of the booty-gifts brought from Egypt (see 3:21–22; 11:2–3; 12:35–36). Aaron then "cast [them] in the shape of a calf," probably by applying gold leaf over a wooden form, which thus could be burned (cf. 32:20). Or he may have rough cast it in solid gold and then shaped it by hand. The idol was a calf, i.e., a young bull, the symbol of virile power. On completion Aaron—and probably his sons—had the audacity to proclaim to Israel, "These are your gods," a direct violation of the recently given second commandment (cf. 1Ki 12:28).

5–6 Apparently the altar built (of field stones and earth as in 20:24–25) in front of the calf and the "festival" were to act as sops for Aaron's conscience. After making an attempt to honor the Lord with their offerings, the people satisfied their own desires and proceeded to "indulge in revelry," namely, drunken, immoral orgies and sexual play (cf. Ge 26:8; 39:14, 17).

7–10 In response to Israel's behavior, God charged Moses, "Your people whom you have brought up . . . have become corrupt." God deliberately changed the possessive pronoun, thereby indicating that he was disowning Israel (contrast "my people" in 3:10 et al.). "Have become corrupt" (GK 8845) renders the same verb found in Ge 6:12 for the apostasy or corruption in Noah's day; it means "to go to ruin or destruction" (cf. Dt 9:6; 10:16; Ps 75:5; Jer 17:23; Acts 7:51). The fact that they were "quick to turn away" shows Israel had apostatized from the revealed truth in word and events that they had witnessed. The "stiff-necked people" would not bow under God's authority (cf. Jer 27:11–12), even though they had readily "bowed down" to the calf and worshiped it.

God was very angry with the people. The God who seemed unmerciful, however, is the same God who had mercifully prepared Moses for just such an occasion as this. So God said, by way of testing Moses, "Leave me alone." But God would allow himself to be bound, as it were, by prepared persons doing prepared work in God's way.

11–14 In his role as a divinely raised-up mediator, Moses appealed to the Lord. First, he reminded the Lord of his special covenantal relationship with his people, which he manifested in the Exodus. Then he appealed to God's need to keep his name holy and trustworthy. Finally, he referred to the great patriarchal promises. As Moses championed the Lord's cause, "the LORD relented [GK 5714]." God's repentance or "relenting" shows that he can and does change in his actions and emotions to humans when given proper grounds for doing so, and thereby he does not change in his basic integrity or character (cf. Pss 99:6; 106:45; Jer 18:8; Am 7:3, 6; Jnh 3:10; Jas 5:16). In Scripture, three grounds are given for the Lord's "repenting": intercession (cf. Am 7:1–6); repentance of the people (Jer 18:3–11; Jnh 3:9–10); and compassion (Dt 32:36; Jdg 2:18).

15–16 This is the only passage that informs us that the "two tablets of the Testimony" were inscribed "on both sides." That "the tablets were the work of God" emphasizes their divine origin. In 31:18 they are said to be "inscribed by the finger of God," though 34:28 says that "Moses . . . wrote on the tablets the words of the covenant—the Ten Commandments" (see comment on 34:1–3).

17–18 According to 24:13, Joshua had ascended the mountain with Moses, perhaps halfway up. Joshua mistook the "noise of the people shouting" for war cries. Moses, however, discerned otherwise. The phrase "sound of" is literally "the sound of answering." There is a play on the word "answer" used in two senses: it was not the "shout" of the victor with its corresponding racket of the vanquished, but it was the antiphonal song of singers.

19–20 The wickedness of the people he had just pled to the Lord to preserve angered Moses when "he saw the calf and the dancing." Not only were the stone tablets broken, symbolizing the breaking of God's covenant by the people, but Moses quickly broke up the calf and the festivities, bringing an end to the people's covenant with carnality. Moses took the calf and "burned it," "ground it to powder," and "scattered it on the water and made the Israelites drink it," a fitting conclusion for a shameful act (cf. 2Ki 23:15).

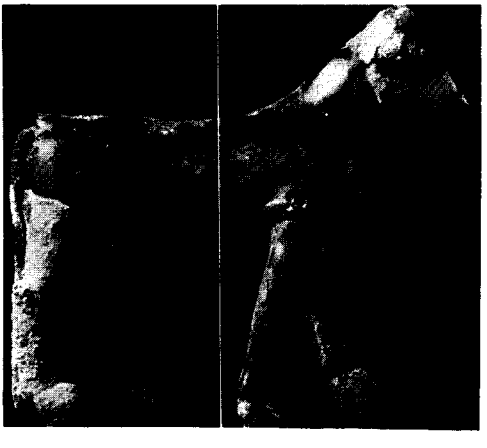
22–24 Aaron had to do some quick thinking to extricate himself from guilt as an accomplice in the people's reveling. He tried four excuses: (1) "you know how prone these people are to evil"; (2) "they said to me"; and (3) "we don't know what has happened to [Moses]." The flimsiest excuse came last: (4) "out came this calf!" Was Aaron trying to say that a miracle had occurred?

25–26 The people had cast off all restraint (cf. Pr 29:18). The idea of "to cast off all restraints" is of loosening or uncovering. Apparently there was a type of religious prostitution connected with the people's worship of the golden calf. Moses realized that decisive action was required. So he challenged the people (cf. Jos 24:14–15; 1Ki 18:21; Mt 6:24). "All" is undoubtedly a generalization, since Dt 33:9 implies that some Levites were slain in the action that followed (v.28).

27–29 The Levites who chose to follow God were commanded to arm themselves and "go back and forth . . . killing." This was not the command of a prophet but of a holy God. No small number of people had to pay the consequences for their stiff-neckedness (cf. Ac 2:41). Following God now sometimes requires denying one's family (cf. Lk 12:51–53; 14:26). A necessary part of consecration is being obedient to the Lord's command, which always results in his blessings. The Levites wholeheartedly followed God (Jos 14:8) and counted other ties of kinship as nothing in comparison (Dt 33:9).



This bronze bull calf, originally covered with silver, was found in a Canaanite sanctuary at Ashkelon, dating to 1550 B.C. The Israelites experimented with calf worship here in Exodus 32.

2. Mediation of Moses (32:30–35)

30 Even though the people had repented, atonement for sin was still needed. Moses would attempt to ransom or deliver the people from the certain judgment of their sin by offering a substitute—himself.

31–32 Moses ascended the mountain once again and proceeded to intercede in prayer on Israel's behalf a second time. The sincerity of Moses' devotion to his people is seen in his request: "Blot me out" (cf. Ro 9:1–3). The "book" or "scroll" is called the "book of the living" in Ps 69:28 and is referred to in Isa 4:3: "recorded among the living" (cf. Eze 13:9; Da 12:1; Mal 3:16; cf. Php 4:3; Rev 3:5; 20:12, 15; 21:27).

33–34 Moses' offer was refused by the Lord, who replied, "Whoever has sinned . . . I will blot out of my book" (cf. Pss 9:5; 51:1). Thus the OT principle is reaffirmed: the person who sins is accountable for his or her own sin (cf. Dt 24:16; Eze 18:4, 13, 17). Whereas in the past the Lord had led (12:42, 51; 13:17; 15:13; 20:2) and Moses was only his servant, from then on Moses and an angel were to lead. "The time comes for me to punish" is literally "in the day of my visitation." Perhaps this is the beginning of the "Day of the LORD" warnings.

35 The order of events is probably not in strict chronological sequence; hence the plague may well be the slaughter of the three thousand mentioned in v.28. The plague came on the people because they caused the calf to be made or asked for it. Frequently in Scripture events may be directly attributed to people when they only occasioned them since the one could implicate the many as a member of a community, just as today one traitor can compromise a whole army or nation.

3. Threatened separation and Moses' prayer (33:1–23)

1–3 The Lord issued the command to move on, promising to "send an angel" before them

(cf. 23:20, 23; 32:34). The angel promised here is altogether different from "the angel of his presence" in Isa 63:9, since God declared that his "Name is in him" (23:21). Thus that angel was a christophany, an appearance of Christ in the OT. Although the Lord promised to send his personal representative, he himself would "not go with [them]." This withdrawal of the divine presence assured in 23:20–23 was because of the presence of sin.

4–6 The people would rather risk the danger of divine chastisement than be deprived of the divine presence; hence "they began to mourn" and desisted from putting on any further ornaments. Reminded once more of their stubbornness, the people were asked to "take off [their] ornaments," i.e., the ones they were already wearing, as a test of their repentance. Akin to putting on sackcloth and ashes, the people "stripped off their ornaments" as a sign of mourning for their sin (cf. Ge 35:4; Eze 26:16).

7–11 The "tent . . . outside the camp" was different from the tabernacle or "Tent of Meeting" with its ark and other furniture where the Lord permanently dwelt. This "tent of the meeting" was outside the camp, a temporary structure used until the more permanent shelter was constructed (cf. 27:21 et al.). The verbs in v.7 show that Moses customarily erected this tent. Moses visited this tent whenever he desired a meeting with the Lord. When Moses entered it, "the pillar of cloud would come down," an indication that the Lord was communicating with him "as a man speaks with his friend" (cf. Nu 12:8; Dt 34:10). A similar descent later caps the completion of the tabernacle (40:33–34; see 13:21). The presence of the pillar of the cloud at the tent entrance evoked a spirit of worship from the people.

12–14 As the time approached for Moses to take up the lead of the Israelites, he became concerned as to the identity of the companion God had promised him (32:34; 33:2). He believed that a mere angel was no substitute for the presence of God. "I know you by name" is tantamount to saying, "I have singled you out" or "I have chosen/selected you." Moses asked the Lord for a demonstration of his love so that he might know and serve him better. The Lord responded by promising, "My Presence [lit., 'my face'; GK 7156] will go with you." With this new word, the Lord reinstated the angel of his presence in whom he invested his "Name" (23:20–21) as the leader of Israel's way to Canaan.

15–18 Moses beseeched God not to send the people out without his "Presence" to lead them. Moses knew that God's presence was essential to Israel's testimony, in order to keep them distinct from the rest of the world. That was the response the Lord was waiting for; but Moses sought one further thing: God's "glory."

19–20 In response to Moses' request to see God's "glory," God said that he would "cause all [his] goodness to pass" before Moses. By his "goodness" (GK 3206) is meant his whole character and nature. A further aspect of God's glory was the proclamation of his name. The name of God includes his nature, character, person (Ps 20:1; Lk 24:47; Jn 1:12), doctrine (Ps 22:22; Jn 17:6, 26), and standards of living (Mic 4:5). Here his name includes his "mercy" and his "compassion." The one restriction was that Moses would not be permitted to see the Lord's face. In fact, "no one may see me and live" (see Jn 1:18; 6:46; 1Ti 1:17; 1Jn 4:12).

21–23 To see God's glory Moses was to stand on a "rock" (cf. Mt 7:24–27). When the glory passed by, Moses would be hid in the "cleft in the rock" and covered by the Lord's hand. Then the hand of God would be removed so that Moses might see God's back. But since God is Spirit and has no form, and since no one can see him and live (v.20), the word translated "back" could just as well and more accurately be rendered "the after-effects" of his radiant glory, which had just passed by.

4. Renewal of the covenant (34:1–35)

1–3 Since Moses had broken the former tablets (32:19), which "were the work of God" (32:16), it was appropriate that he "chisel out two stone tablets like the first ones." No contradiction exists between God's statement that he "will write on them the words that were on the first tablets" and vv.27–28, where Moses did the actual writing. Apparently these are alternate ways of saying the same thing. The law is the direct expression of the mind and will of God.

4–7 Moses obediently followed the Lord's directions and prepared two new stone tablets. Early the next morning he brought them to the Lord on top of Mount Sinai. The Lord once more appeared before Moses and proclaimed his name: "the LORD" (see 33:19; cf. 20:2). Then the Lord "passed in front of Moses." The Lord's self-disclosure is prefaced by the repetition of his name, perhaps to emphasize his unchangeableness.

Verses 6b–7 are essentially repeated in Nu 14:18; 2Ch 30:9; Ne 9:17; Jnh 4:2; et al. On "compassionate" (GK 8157), see comment on 33:19. The "gracious [GK 2843] God" bestows his unmerited favor on those who have no claim whatsoever on it. His graciousness is explicated by "slow to anger, abounding in love and faithfulness, maintaining love to thousands, and forgiving wickedness, rebellion and sin." But his grace is balanced, for "he does not leave the guilty unpunished." His chastisement will be felt to the "third and fourth generation." The full formula (see 20:5) includes the important qualifier "of those who hate me."

8–9 The revelation of God's person and character humbled Moses and caused him to once more plead for his grace to be given to his people, even though they were stiff-necked and wicked.

10–14 The Lord's statement "I am making a covenant with you" is not to be understood as the instituting of a second covenant in vv.10–27 but is best seen as a renewing of the same covenant after the events of ch. 33. The word "wonders" is used of the plagues sent on Egypt (3:20). They would be so outstanding that the people would be awestruck. For Israel to benefit from God's miraculous display, however, they had to be obedient to his commands.

The Lord further warned the Israelites not to become involved in unholy alliances (cf. 2Co 6:14). More than that, they were to take the initiative and eliminate the pagan "altars, . . . sacred stones and . . . Asherah poles." The Asherim were probably sacred trees or wooden poles placed alongside Baal's altar (Jdg 6:25; 1Ki 15:13; 2Ki 21:7). With the pagan religious objects removed, there would be less temptation to "worship any other god." The word "jealous" is mentioned twice for emphasis (see comment on 20:5). This particular Hebrew word is used only of God and illustrates the parallel between idolatry and adultery (cf. Dt 22:22).

15–16 Once more the warning against unholy alliances is sounded. This time some of the "snares" (cf. v.12) are given: (1) "they will invite you and you will eat their sacrifices," and (2) "you [will] choose . . . their daughters as wives." Both actions lead to idolatry.

17 The prohibition against making "cast idols" is most relevant (cf. ch. 32; see also 20:4–6).

18–26 For these verses see comments on 23:14–19. The way of obedience balances prohibitions with admonitions: "Celebrate the Feast of Unleavened Bread" (see comments on 12:14–20). For "the first offspring . . . belongs to me" see comments on 13:11–16. See comments on 20:8–11 for laboring six days and resting one. In 23:16 the "Feast of Weeks" is called the "Feast of Harvest."

The Lord added a special promise for the pilgrim to the three annual feasts that required his presence. The Lord would protect the pilgrim's land from his ungodly neighbor who might move the boundary markers or steal from the land while the pilgrim was absent. The statement "when you go up three times each year" looks forward to the time when the people were settled in the land; it need not imply that this verse was written later (cf. Dt 16:16). On v.25 see comment on 23:18. For the law and theology of "firstfruits," see comment on 23:19 (cf. 4:22; 11:5; 12:29).

27–28 For the Lord's commanding Moses to "write down these words," see comment on v.1. For "forty days and forty nights," see comment on 24:18. That Moses was able to go for this length of time without food or water was a miracle requiring the Lord's supernatural care (cf. Dt 9:9, 18; Mt 4:2).

29–32 Spending an extended period of time in the Lord's presence had a telling effect on Moses. The verb "to radiate" is related to the noun for "horn." The Vulgate confused these two, which thus led to the representation in European medieval art of Moses wearing two horns! The manifestation of the divine countenance struck fear in the Israelites. A word from Moses, however, encouraged Aaron, the leaders, and all the Israelites to approach him; and he thus delivered the word of the Lord to them.

33–35 Moses' radiance was only visible to the people when he was acting as the oracle of God. At other times he kept his face veiled. This was not a priest's "mask," for Moses left the veil off when speaking to the people as God's messenger or when he was alone in the presence of God (cf. 2Co 3:7–18).

C. Building the Tabernacle (35:1–40:38)

1. Summons to build (35:1–19)

1–3 Since he had gathered the Israelites together, Moses relayed to them the commands of the Lord. The Sabbath, the sign of the covenant, was mentioned first, an indication of its importance. On "a Sabbath of rest," see comments on 20:8–11 and 31:12–17. Although the prohibition against lighting a fire on the Sabbath is not mentioned elsewhere, it is implied in part in 16:23.

4 Almost every item in 25:1–30:10 is repeated in 35:4–40:38 in identical or similar words, except here the verbs are mainly in the past tense. In the ancient Near East it was customary to repeat the instructions by a literal repetition of the terms except for change in verb forms.

"This is what the LORD has commanded" repeats v.1 to revert back to the primary theme after the prefatory words about observing the Sabbath (cf. Lev 23:2, 4).

5–9 See comments on 25:3–7. The differences are negligible except for the introductory words in 25:3, which would have been out of place here.

10–19 See comments on 25:1–28:43; 30:1–10, 17–38; cf. 31:7–11.

2. Voluntary gifts (35:20–29)

20–29 After Moses' instructions, the people left to set about doing their tasks. Those whose hearts were moved brought offerings for the tabernacle and its related service. The willingness of the people is mentioned repeatedly. "Men and women alike" are specifically mentioned to avoid the misapprehension that "everyone" excluded women even though vv. 25–26 mention them in another connection. On the various gifts of the people, see 25:1–7.

3. Bezalel and his artisans (35:30–36:7)

For further comments on these verses, see also comments on 31:2–6.

30–35 God's selection and equipping of Bezalel was so that he could "engage in all kinds of artistic craftsmanship" (lit., "engage in every work of thought"). This would include implementing the plan or thought previously given for the project (cf. 31:4–5). Verse 34 adds that Bezalel and Oholiab were given "the ability to teach others," a capability of training and guiding assistants who would work with these two artificers. Verse 35 is almost entirely new.

36:1–7 The chapter division here is unfortunate, for no break is signified by the verb, as though the account now turns to the execution of the work by these craftsmen. The willingness of the people exceeded the requirements of the craftsmen; so the order was given to the people to make no further offerings for the sanctuary. This is a noteworthy illustration of generosity for the Lord's work.

4. Progress of the work and Moses' blessing (36:8–39:43)

8–19 The start of the actual work on the tabernacle begins here. The order is different from the order of the instructions. The work of the curtains repeats 26:1–13.

20–34 On the frames and crossbars, see comments on 26:15–30.

35–38 For the inner curtain, see comments on 26:31–35.

37:1–9 On the ark, see comments on 25:10–22. Bezalel is specifically mentioned with the work of the holiest of tabernacle objects.

10–16 On the table of the bread of the Presence, see comments on 25:23–30.

17–24 On the lampstand, see comments on 25:31–40.

25–29 On the altar of incense, see comments on 30:1–6. On the "sacred anointing oil," see comments on 25:6.

38:1–7 On the altar of burnt offering, see comments on 27:1–8.

8 On the bronze basin, see comments on 30:17–21.

9–20 On the tabernacle courtyard, see comments on 27:9–19.

21–39:1 These verses are an inventory of the tabernacle materials. Verses 25–26 give an insight into the population of Israel at this time. There are 3,000 shekels to a talent; therefore 3,000 times 100 equals 300,000 plus 1,775 equals 301,775. Since each man (from twenty years and older) was valued at a half shekel, the total number of men able to bear arms was over 600,000 (301,775 times 2 equals 603,550), a number very similar to the later count of Nu 1:46 (603,550) or Nu 26:51 (601,730). Such a tally for the army would more than justify estimates of 2 million for the total population.

"As the LORD commanded Moses" is the emphasis of chs. 39–40. The clause occurs nine times in ch. 39 and seven times in ch. 40.

2–31 See comments on 28:6–43. "The sacred diadem" is a new designation here, not found in 28:36–37.

32–41 The statement "so all the work . . . was completed" is reminiscent of Ge 2:1–2, the concluding words of the Creation account. This section emphasizes that the Israelites completed their work "just as the LORD commanded." The workmen, on behalf of all the people of Isarael, "brought the tabernacle to Moses." Once again the list of articles is repeated (cf. 35:11–19; a shortened form occurs in 31:7–11). "With its row of lamps" is a new term for the lamps set in order on the lampstand.

42–43 "Moses . . . saw that they had done it just as the LORD had commanded" is again parallel to the expression in Ge 1:31. The conclusion was, "So Moses blessed them" (cf. Ge 1:22, 28; 2:3).

5. Erection of the tabernacle (40:1–33)

1–5 The tabernacle was erected on the "first day of the first month." Verse 17 adds that this was the beginning of the "second year" of the wilderness wanderings. Since the nation of Israel entered the Sinai Desert in the third month after the Exodus (19:1) and Moses was on Mount Sinai for two forty-day periods (24:18; 34:28) plus the events covered in 19:1–24:11 and chs. 32–33, the building of the tabernacle took less than six months to build.

Once again, as in 25:10–22, the ark, the most prominent object in the tabernacle, is first to be mentioned. This was God's throne in the midst of Israel. The "curtain" and how it shielded the ark is further described in v.21 (cf. also 26:31–35; 36:35–38).

On the "table," see comments on 25:23–30; 37:10–16; on the "lampstand," see comments on 25:31–40; 37:17–24; on the "gold altar of incense," see comments on 30:1–10, 34–38; 37:25–29.

6–8 On the "altar of burnt offering," see comments on 27:1–8; 38:1–7; on the "basin," see comments on 30:17–21; 38:8; on the "courtyard," see comments on 27:9–19; 38:9–20.

9–11 On the "anointing oil," see comments on 25:6; 30:22–33. These instructions were carried out in Lev 8:10–12. "Consecrate it" is literally "sanctify it" in the sense of setting it apart for the service of the Lord.

12–16 The anointing and consecrating of the priesthood included Aaron and his sons. The institution of the priesthood was "for all generations to come" (cf. 12:24; 27:21). Even though the hereditary priestly office of the Aaronic line ended, Christ would carry it out perpetually.

17–33 Verse 17 parallels v.2 in almost every detail. Verses 18–33 contain seven subsections, each concluding with the formula "as the LORD commanded him/Moses."

1. "Moses set up the tabernacle."
2. "He took the Testimony and placed it in the ark" (see 25:14, 16, 21).
3. "Moses placed the table" (26:35; 40:4).
4. "He placed the lampstand" (26:35; 40:4).
5. "Moses placed the gold altar" (30:6; 40:5).
6. "He put up the curtain" and "he set the altar of burnt offering."
7. "He placed the basin" (30:18; 40:7).

6. Dedication of the tabernacle (40:34–38)

34–38 The tabernacle had been constructed and set in order as the Lord had commanded Moses; yet something was lacking. Form must be invested with divine life; so "the glory of the LORD filled the tabernacle." On the Lord's glory, see comments on 16:7, 10; 24:16–17; 33:18, 22. With the arrival of the glory of the Lord, the nation of Israel was ready to move on. The promise of the divine messenger to lead the people was fulfilled (23:20, 23; 32:34; 33:2). The Lord now lived in the midst of his people as their King, and he continued to lead them throughout the next forty years in the desert. The signal for them to continue their journey was "whenever the cloud lifted" (cf. 13:21; see also 17:1; 25:22).

Leviticus

INTRODUCTION

1. Historical Background and Contents

Leviticus, the middle book of the Pentateuch, is largely limited to material revealed at Sinai after the Exodus and before Israel's wandering in the desert. Genesis gives the patriarchal background of the people of Israel. They were molded into a nation, however, at the time of the Exodus by Moses, the great lawgiver. The Israelites left Egypt in the spring on the fourteenth of Nisan, the month that begins the spring season. This was a datum point, the "first month of your year" (Ex 12:2). On the fifteenth of the second month, they came to the Desert of Sin (Ex 16:1). In the third month (Ex 19:1), they arrived at Sinai and encamped before the mountain. There they stayed for about one year. The second Passover was celebrated at Sinai (Nu 9:5).

The people were "numbered" on the "first day of the second month of the second year" after leaving Egypt (Nu 1:1). On the twentieth day of the second month of the second year, the Israelites marched on from Sinai toward Kadesh Barnea, the southern gateway to the Promised Land (Nu 10:11).

The Israelites thus encamped before Mount Sinai just short of a year. During that time Moses spent eighty days on the mountain with God. There the people of Israel, at Moses' instruction, built the tabernacle. During this year Moses also organized the nation, built up the army, established courts and laws, and ordered formal worship. It was a busy year. Although most of the laws that Moses drew up at that time are found in Exodus and Numbers, Leviticus is the law book par excellence. It mainly emphasizes Israel's worship of God and the instructions for the priests. Undoubtedly for this reason the LXX called the book Levitikon ("pertaining to the Levites").

The book of Leviticus, presuming the construction of the tabernacle as detailed in Ex 25–31; 35–40, begins with a description of the offerings for the great bronze altar (chs. 1–7) and continues with the consecration of the first priests and the start of the tabernacle worship (chs. 8–10). The chapters that follow largely set forth those laws for the conduct of the people that were administered by the priests. It is difficult to generalize, however, because the priests were concerned with instruction for and regulation of many aspects of Israel's life, not just the sacerdotal—for instance, chs. 18 and 20 cover laws of incest. The laws of cleanliness come in ch. 11–15, followed by the law of the great national sin offering on the Day of Atonement in ch. 16. The next section (chs. 17–26) is sometimes called the Holiness Code, because it emphasizes God's moral standards for his people. Included is a description of the other annual feasts of Israel (ch. 23) and further miscellaneous regulations concerning the sabbatical year and laws of land inheritance (ch. 25). Chapter 26 includes extensive warnings of punishment if Israel departs from the Lord, and the book ends (ch. 27) with regulations concerning property given to the Lord's work.

2. Date and Authorship

The view taken of the date and authorship of Leviticus depends largely on one's view of the Pentateuch as a whole. The tradition of Israel unanimously declares that the ritual laws of Leviticus—and the other Pentateuchal material as well—were given by God through Moses. See the discussion of these issues in the introduction to Exodus.

3. Literary Form and Classification

The study of Israel's laws is important because the will of God is found in them. They must be studied with care, however, because obviously not all of them apply to the Christian today (cf. Heb 7:12). Some of the laws of Israel (e.g., the Ten Commandments) carry over into the present age and are repeated in the NT (Ro 13:9); some are abrogated (Ac 10:14–15).

The nation of Israel was unique in that it was a theocracy; God was its Head. He had chosen Israel and channeled his grace particularly through that nation. To Israel he gave his revelation, including the order of true worship. In Israel things that we call sacred and profane were mingled together. Before the monarchy virtually all administration of the nation was in the hands of the priests. There were physical penalties—even capital punishment—for religious offenses.

Israel's laws have customarily been classified as moral, civil, and ceremonial—the commandments (e.g., you shall not murder), judgments (e.g., a person guilty of manslaughter may flee to a city of refuge), and ordinances (e.g, prescribing a sin offering for a repentant sinner). Such a classification implies that the ceremonial legislation is done away in Christ, the civil legislation changes with the civil government, and the moral legislation continues ever in binding force.

A better approach, however, is to see the law as defining (1) our relationship to God and (2) our relationship to our fellow beings. These laws can be further divided into eternal principles and temporary manifestations. Thus, for example, the first four of the Ten Commandments give the eternal principles of divine worship. Other laws also stress God's holiness, hatred of sin, and love issuing in redemption. These eternal principles were manifested in the temporary laws of worship that occupy much of Leviticus. They typify the holiness of God, the uncleanness of humans, the necessity of blood redemption, and the restoration of fellowship with God. They also point forward to Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God, who came to take away the sins of the world (Jn 1:29). Today these same eternal principles find temporary manifestations in baptism, the Lord's Supper, and other aspects of Christian worship.

Similarly, the last six of the Ten Commandments express God's will for our relations with our fellow beings, being manifested in civil law. The civil laws of modern cultures reflect more or less the eternal principles that God has implanted in the consciences of humans and set forth in his Word.

A third recent classification of Israel's laws is as case laws and categorical laws (casuistic and apodictic legislation). The case laws apply to a particular situation and are of the form, "If someone does such and such, then you shall punish that person in such and such a way." The categorical or apodictic laws are "You shall not . . ." or "Whoever does such and such shall surely suffer." This difference in form between case law and categorical law does not seem to be too significant in Leviticus. For example, ch. 18 is largely categorical law; ch. 20 repeats many of these items in case law formulation, but the laws in ch. 20 include a penalty. Practically all the laws of the surrounding cultures were of the case-law type.

The Pentateuchal legislation does not cover all possible situations, but it covers enough; and the judges on whom God placed his Spirit were competent enough to handle all other cases on these principles. God had providentially given Moses training in the royal academies of Egypt. And God used Moses to give the Israelites such precedents and case laws as were necessary and helpful in establishing the infant nation. Moses served as chief justice of Israel for forty years, and many cases came before him for judgment. He was knowledgeable on legal principles, and the important cases were collected at his direction and under the Spirit's inspiration during these forty years and were given for the guidance of the nation ever after.

There is no evidence that Israel's ritual law was derived from the rituals of the nations in which they lived. Eighteen of the chapters in Leviticus begin with the words "The LORD said to Moses." Israel's worship, like Israel's theology, was of divine origin; and the prescriptions for ritual were God-given. The Bible makes it plain that the sacrificial system of the OT began as soon as our first parents had sinned. The specialized institutions of national worship, however, were given by God through Moses at Sinai.

4. Theology

a. Sin

Underlying Leviticus is the biblical doctrine of sin. This seems clear both from specific words used (e.g., "sin" in 18:25; 19:22; "sins" in 16:16, 21–22; the verb "to sin" in 4:2–3; "guilt" in 10:17; 22:16) and from the punishments prescribed for offenses committed. Human beings have a problem with sin; they violate God's law. Such sin had to be atoned for—i.e., to have the penalty paid and the guilt removed—in order for fellowship between God and his people to be renewed. God revealed the sacrificial system as the means of atonement.

b. Sacrifice

The most important matter discussed in the book of Leviticus, therefore, is the sacrificial system of ancient Israel. It begins with a description of five major sacrifices, together with their regulations (chs. 1–7). Chapter 16 discusses the rituals of the great Day of Atonement. While no passage of Leviticus discusses the meaning of sacrifice in a formal manner, many things are said that give us considerable guidance. In ch. 16 the principle is clearly stated that sin is atoned for by sacrifice and the guilt is taken far away (cf. Ps 103:12). The historic view of the OT sacrificial system is that the death of the sacrificial victim is the God-given type of the death of Christ and that the blood shed by the lamb or goat points forward to the blood shed by Christ on Calvary to atone for our sins (see especially Heb 8–10; also Ro 3:25–26).

c. Cleanness

Large sections of this book deal with the topic of cleanness and its relationship to holiness. There are two main things to consider: the concept of ethical holiness as separation from sin and the concept of ritual holiness as separation from various defilements. God's own holiness involves both ethical and ritual holiness.

Regarding ethical holiness, the Holiness Code (chs. 17–26) outlines numerous ethical commands that were applicable in many areas of Israelite life. These are all subsumed under one general principle, repeated in several places of this book: "Be holy because I, the LORD your God, am holy" (19:2; cf. 11:44–45; 20:7–8; 21:8).

Regarding ritual holiness, in order to approach the holy God, the priest, the articles of worship, and the worshipers all had to be cleansed. Only in that way could God preserve his holy name in the midst of an elect but sinful nation. The animals used for sacrifice had to be perfect, in order to meet the requirements of a perfect God. The Lord also revealed to Moses numerous ritual cleanness laws regarding diet, health, and habits. Why? God had promised that he would defend his people from the diseases of Egypt (Ex 15:26; Dt 7:15); in other words, the health of his people was a major concern. Sickness and death are ultimately the result of sin. Rules of diet, washing, and quarantine were therefore necessary to promote Israel's health; these rules were also naturally given the religious sanctions requiring sacrifices and other rituals for their enforcement.

EXPOSITION

I. Description of the Five Major Offerings (1:1–6:7)

A. Burnt Offering (1:1–17)

1 These directions for sacrifice were not given to Moses while he was on Mount Sinai but while he was at work arranging for Israel's worship. The "Tent of Meeting" is the usual name of the movable tabernacle constructed by Moses at Sinai (Ex 40:2). Most likely, however, the reference here is to a temporary tent of worship set up during the time at Sinai (cf. Ex 33:7–10; 38:8). God would hardly leave Israel for a year without a place of worship.

2 The "herd" would be cattle; the "flock" would include both sheep and goats. Although the Israelites were a nomadic people, their mainstay was their cows, sheep, and goats. It is probable that during the extended wandering in the desert the cows, which needed more pasture, were reduced in number; and the people kept the hardier sheep and goats. The ruminant animals digest cellulose. Goats, especially, can live on dried grass, stalks, and bushes. The directions for sacrifice included all the animals that might be offered both in the desert and later in the settled country.

3–17 In brief, the "burnt offering" (GK 6592) was to be made of a clean animal; and all of it was to be burnt on the altar, except the feathers and crop of a bird and the hide of an animal. The hide was for the priest (7:8). The hand of the offerer was to be placed on the animal's head in symbolic acknowledgment of the substitution of the animal for the worshiper (v.4); this is specified also in the fellowship offering (3:2, 8, 13) and the sin offering (4:4, 15, 24, 29, 33). The ritual seems to be self-explanatory but is interpreted clearly in connection with the Day of Atonement (16:21). When hands are laid on the animal and sins are confessed, the sins are in symbol transferred to the animal. The scapegoat carried the sins off into the desert, signifying their total removal. In the cases where the animal was slaughtered, laying on of hands signified the substitution of the sacrifice in judgment on sin.

The blood was to be sprinkled on the altar to emphasize substitution by death (cf. 17:14). Various animals were used in the ritual depending on the choice and ability of the worshiper. The rich would bring a young bull, the poor a bird, the average person a sheep or a goat.

The burnt offering, sometimes called a "holocaust" (total) offering, was completely consumed on the altar. It was not the most common sacrifice. When thousands of sacrifices were offered, they were usually fellowship offerings, which were partly eaten.

The special meaning of the burnt offering is nowhere explicitly given. It included atonement by the giving of life for life, as did the other sacrifices. It seems probable that the additional meaning of the burnt offering was worship, symbolized by the ascending smoke. It is also legitimate to see the idea of surrender.

A burnt offering was given for all Israel every morning and again in the evening. On the Sabbath the burnt offerings were double (Nu 28:9), and there were extra offerings on the various feast days. The directions of this chapter refer especially to voluntary burnt offerings that any Israelite might be led to offer in special worship to God.

B. Grain Offering (2:1–16)

1–16 The "grain offering" (GK 4966) is sometimes called a meal offering or cereal offering, for it consisted of flour or baked goods. Four kinds of grain offerings are specified: uncooked flour, bread baked in an oven, bread prepared on a griddle, and bread cooked in a pan.

The meaning of the grain offering is not explicitly given. It has a practical value in that a "memorial portion" of the offering was burnt on the altar and the rest was given to the priests for their food (cf. 1Co 9:13). Only males who were priests could eat it in the Holy Place (6:16–18). The rest of the priest's family would eat ordinary yeast bread. Apart from the practical value that this offering gave the priests bread to eat with their meat, the symbolism of the grain offering possibly emphasizes thanksgiving. A grain offering was specified to accompany other various types of offerings on the altar (23:13–20; Ex 29:40; Nu 28–29; et al.). The drink offering, which was to accompany various sacrifices, is not mentioned in this section. It was a libation offering, poured on the altar—not drunk (cf. Nu 28:7).

The size of the grain offering is not given here. Elsewhere various amounts are specified—the smallest is one-tenth measure of flour (about two quarts if a "measure" is an ephah) mixed with one-fourth hin of oil (about a pint and a half; cf. Nu 28:11–14).

The grain offering was to be accompanied with oil, incense, and salt. The familiar olive oil was often used as a shortening, as an ointment, and as an ingredient in perfume. Only a portion of the flour was to be burnt, but all the incense was consumed on the altar. The proscription of yeast with the sacrifices that are burnt on the altar is frequent. The reason for forbidding yeast with the Passover meal was that when Israel left Egypt, there was no time to use yeast to make the bread rise. This incident may have determined the symbolic meaning in other sacrifices. The law against honey appears only here (perhaps because under some circumstances this will also ferment). Yeast and honey were indeed edible and were suitable gifts as an offering of firstfruits for the priests' food, but they were not to be burned on the altar.

C. Fellowship Offering (3:1–17)

1–17 In the phrase "fellowship offering," the word translated "fellowship" (GK 8968) includes the ideas of health, wholeness, welfare, and peace. It is reflected in the common Jewish greeting "Shalom!" This offering apparently symbolizes peace with God because the worshiper joins in the sacred meal. The fellowship offering was brought to the priest, the worshiper laid his hand on the head of the animal in symbolic identification and transfer of guilt, then the priest dressed it, handling the blood in the same way as was done for the burnt offering. In this case, however, only the fat and kidneys were burned on the altar. Elsewhere it is specified that the priest is to be given the right breast and the right thigh as his portion (see 7:34). The balance was for the worshiper and his family to eat.

Old Testament Sacrifices

NAME	OT REFERENCES	ELEMENTS	PURPOSE
BURNT OFFERING	Lev 1; 6:8-13; 8:18-21; 16:24	Bull, ram or male bird (dove or young pigeon for poor); wholly consumed; no defect	Voluntary act of worship; atonement for unintentional sin in general; expression of devotion, commitment and complete surrender to God
GRAIN OFFERING	Lev 2; 6:14-23	Grain, fine flour, olive oil, incense, baked bread (cakes or wafers), salt; no yeast or honey; accompanied burnt offering and fellowship offering (along with drink offering)	Voluntary act of worship; recognition of God's goodness and provisions; devotion to God
FELLOWSHIP OFFERING	Lev 3; 7:11-34	Any animal without defect from herd or flock; variety of breads	Voluntary act of worship; thanksgiving and fellowship (it included a communal meal)
SIN OFFERING	Lev 4:1-5:13; 6:24-30; 8:14-17; 16:3-22	1. Young bull: for high priest and congregation 2. Male goat: for leader 3. Female goat or lamb: for common person 4. Dove or pigeon: for the poor 5. Tenth of an ephah of fine flour: for the very poor	Mandatory atonement for specific unintentional sin; confession of sin; forgiveness of sin; cleansing from defilement
GUILT OFFERING	Lev 5:14-6:7; 7:1-6	Ram or lamb	Mandatory atonement for unintentional sin requiring restitution; cleansing from defilement; make restitution; pay 20% fine

When more than one kind of offering was presented (as in Nu 6:16, 17), the procedure was usually as follows: (1) sin offering or guilt offering, (2) burnt offering, (3) fellowship offering and grain offering (along with a drink offering). This sequence furnishes part of the spiritual significance of the sacrificial system. First, sin had to be dealt with (sin offering or guilt offering). Second, the worshiper committed himself completely to God (burnt offering and grain offering). Third, fellowship or communion between the Lord, the priest and the worshiper (fellowship offering) was established. To state it another way, there were sacrifices of expiation (sin offerings and guilt offerings), consecration (burnt offerings and grain offerings) and communion (fellowship offerings—these included vow offerings, thank offerings and freewill offerings).

A fellowship offering could be voluntary as a special offering of thanks to God or could be given as the result of a vow or as a freewill offering (7:12–26). This offering was given by the thousands at special celebrations when many people joined in the sacred meal (1Ki 8:63). If a man was too poor to bring a voluntary fellowship offering, he would probably be given a share in the offerings of others. Neither fat nor blood was to be eaten (see 17:10–14). It generally is not realized that eating the fat was also prohibited (see 7:22–25). It was the special part of the animal that was offered to the Lord and was therefore sacred.

D. Sin Offering (4:1–5:13; cf. Nu 15:22–31)

4:1–35 The "sin offering" (GK 2633) and the guilt offering (5:14–6:7) are similar. Indeed, 7:7 says, "The same law applies to both the sin offering and the guilt offering." They are offered in a somewhat similar way, though different animals are specified and the blood was handled differently.

The purpose of the sin offering was to give a specific way for a penitent sinner who was convicted of sin to attain full restoration of fellowship with God. It was both a confession of sin and an assurance of pardon. There were representative sin offerings prescribed for leaders of the people as well as offerings for the individual. A type of sin offering was available for the poorest sinner in the land (5:7, 11).

The difference between the sin offering and the guilt offering was in the nature of the sin. The former was for what might be called general sins; the latter was for sins that injured other people or detracted from the sacred worship. The guilt offering thus involved not only a sacrifice but also restitution plus a fine of 20 percent (6:5). The sins for which the sin offering was prescribed are called "unintentional sins"; the same expression is used in connection with the guilt offering (5:15). The sins concerned are not so strictly limited, however.

The expression "to sin unintentionally" (GK 8706) calls for some comment. The NIV reading may give the impression that there was no sacrifice for intentional sins. This presents a problem, for many of our sins are more or less intentional (though not necessarily deliberate). The word basically means "to err," "go astray," "wander," or "stagger." That is, the notion of intent or lack of intent is not basic to the meaning of the Hebrew word and ought not to be imported.

The usual sins we fall into are covered by the sin offering and the guilt offering. For instance, lying, stealing, cheating, and false swearing are surely intentional; yet they are specifically covered by the guilt offering (6:2–3). There is one place where these words seem at first to refer to unintentional sins (Nu 15:22–31). There the "unintentional" sin is contrasted with sinning "defiantly" (NIV) or, as the Hebrew expresses it, "with a high hand." Here the NIV has correctly caught the sense of the unpardonable sin—not one done intentionally, but one done "defiantly," i.e., in rebellion, sinning against light (cf. Mt 12:31–32), which results in separation from God. No sacrifice is specified for that.

The sense will be adequately caught if, in all the verses concerned here in Lev 4–5, the phrase "sins unintentionally" is rendered by "goes astray in sin" or "does wrong" or the like. "Unintentional" seems better only in the manslaughter passages (Nu 35:11–22; Jos 20:3–5), and even there "inadvertently" or "by mistake" would actually fit better.

In the case of the sin offering, there was special emphasis on substitutionary atonement. For the sin of a prominent person—e.g., an anointed priest (4:3)—or the whole congregation (v.13), an expensive offering was demanded ("a young bull"). Substitution was typified by laying hands on the offering just prior to its being slain (cf. v.24). Some of the young bull's blood was to be taken into the Holy Place and sprinkled seven times before the veil and also put on the horns of the altar of incense. The rest of the blood was poured out at the base of the bronze altar, presumably on the ashes. In such cases the fat was to be burned on the bronze altar and the carcass burned outside the camp in the place of ashes (cf. Heb 13:11).

In the case of an offering for the sin of an ordinary individual, blood was applied to the four horns of the bronze altar and the rest of the blood poured out as in the previous cases. The fat also was to be burned on the altar, but the meat was to be eaten by the priests in the sacred precincts (7:22–27).

Special sin offerings for the congregation were ordained for particular feast days (Nu 28–29). Particular solemnity was attached to the Day of Atonement in the autumn, when the ritual centered around the goat for a sin offering and the scapegoat (see on Lev 16). All the offerings of the tabernacle included the idea of atonement by blood. The sin and guilt offerings symbolized this basic idea most emphatically.

5:1–13 Verses 1–4 give examples of sins that required a sin offering. Far from the modern idea, it was the duty of a witness to come forward and give his testimony in the interest of truth and justice. In Israel all the people were to be involved in seeing that justice was done. Not to witness was a sin.

The laws of cleanness were partly for public health (cf. chs. 11–15), but they were given sanction in the tabernacle. The priests were the public health officers. Uncleanness demanded ritual cleansing.

An unlawful oath should not be made and should not be kept. Jesus' teaching on oaths emphasized that a person's word is sacred. Jesus himself went on oath before the high priest (Mt 26:63–64). In certain circumstances an oath is not wrong, but an oath should not be necessary. A Christian's word should be as good as his bond (Mt 5:33-37).

One must not suppose that every Israelite who ever sinned intentionally was cut off from the congregation or that no sacrifice availed for him. David at least did not think so (Ps 51:19). The sin offering was available for any tender soul convicted of wrongdoing. Compassionate provision was made for the poor. Atonement is without money and without price. It is true, however, that there were sins recognized under the old covenant as unpardonable because they were defiant, just as in the NT (see comments on 4:1–35).

When a pigeon or chicken has its neck wrung (i.e., rapidly twisted), the neck is broken and the bird killed; but the head is not necessarily severed. A somewhat similar procedure is given in 1:17 in connection with the burnt offering, where it is said specifically that the priest should not sever the bird. The NIV reads as if the sin-offering bird has its head still attached though its blood is to be drained out. The other bird, used as a burnt offering, is said specifically (1:15–17) to have the head wrung off and burned first, then the blood sprinkled and the carcass cleaned but not "divided" and then burned. Although the details are not clear, it would seem more probable that the two birds were handled alike and that ch. 5 has not repeated the details of the cleaning and opening of the carcass. The priest would presumably have the bird of the sin offering to eat (cf. v.13). The other bird would be put on the altar as a burnt offering.

An "ephah" (v.11) seems to have been about three-fifths of a bushel (twenty-two liters), though there is some uncertainty. Jars marked as containing one bath (= one ephah) have been found; but since they are in pieces, the total capacity is not known. Apparently a tenth of an ephah would be about two quarts. This would be an offering that even the poor should be able to give. It was distinguished from the fellowship offering in that it should have no oil or frankincense and was not to be cooked. Presumably, in accordance with 2:11–13, it also was to have no yeast or honey but would have salt added. Though it was a bloodless offering, a portion of it was burned on the altar and thus associated with the sacrifices offered with blood. The balance of the flour was for the priest.

E. Guilt Offering (5:14–6:7)

5:14–6:7 As explained above (see comment on 4:1–35), the "guilt offering" (GK 871) and the sin offering were similar in ritual and meaning. Even the names sometimes interchange. The guilt offering had more reference to sins that had done definite damage to the tabernacle service or to a neighbor. This required repair of the damage and a penalty of 20 percent in addition (5:16; 6:5). It is not entirely clear what sort of damage is referred to. Probably it could include withholding tithes or firstfruits or other required offerings.

The guilt offering required without exception a male sheep plus restitution plus a 20 percent fine. Like the fines for stealing given in the civil law of Ex 22, there was no remission of fines for the poor. Presumably, as in Ex 22:3, the poor man had to get the money or be sold into bondage. There is a distinction between the sins mentioned as examples in Lev 6:1–5 and outright stealing. These sins are more on the edge of dishonesty. They concern things obtained by false representation, keeping a lost-and-found article, etc. These things also are sins but are not so easily established in court. If a man was guilty of such things and his conscience convicted him, however, he needed to confess and bring his guilt offering and the penalty, too. For cases of outright lawbreaking, such as those given in Exodus, the fines would vary according to the circumstance and as assessed by the judge. A repentant lawbreaker, however, would also presumably offer his guilt offering. In any kind of sin involving damage, full restoration must be made. Forgiveness does not allow us just to forget the damage done but requires us in repentance and with confession to make right as far as possible the wrong done. That forgiveness is free does not mean that it is free of obligation. And there is also a 20 percent penalty. Apparently the fine was given to the person wronged along with the full payment of damage done.

Regarding "unintentional," see comments on 4:1–35.

Guilt in the biblical sense is not just a feeling but a condition. There may be known transgressions that bring feelings of guilt, but there is also the condition of guilt before God, caused by sins known or unknown. Sometimes a hardened sinner has few feelings of guilt when he is the most guilty. Any sinner must bear the guilt of his transgression.

The guilt offering differed from the sin offering in that blood was never sprinkled in the Holy Place. Rather the blood was sprinkled on the altar of burnt offering in the manner of the burnt and peace offerings. The fat parts were to be burned on the altar and the meat eaten by the priests as in the case of the ordinary sin offering. This offering is one of those specified for the cleansing of a "leper" in Lev 14:12–28. It was a special sacrifice also for a Nazirite who had accidentally become unclean during his period of consecration (Nu 6:9–12).

In the great prophecy of Isaiah, the predicted Servant is said to suffer and die as a "guilt offering" (Isa 53:10; GK 871). In this significant verse the messianic hope of Israel is associated with the sacrificial system. The Lamb that God would supply for the sacrifice was the coming Messiah. It is worth adding that in the context of Isa 53, the glorious results of the suffering and death of the Servant are given in ch. 54, climaxing in the Davidic covenant (55:3): "I will make an everlasting covenant with you, my faithful love promised to David." In this central portion of Isaiah, the sacrificial system, the suffering and dying Servant to come, and the promised Son of David are in close association. These lines of prophecy and typology thus interpret one another. The Christ was both to suffer and to die as a sin and guilt offering and yet would reign as great David's greater Son.

II. Directions for the Priests in Their Service (6:8–7:38)

A. Burnt Offering (6:8–13)

It should be remembered that the Bible does not tell us every detail of the methods of sacrificing. There was no need, for example, to tell an ancient priest how to skin a sheep. But enough was given to be self-explanatory to the Israelites and to give us the general outline and meaning of the ritual. The section on the prescribed ritual of the five major offerings gives mainly instructions for the officiating priests. Leviticus was a directory for worship for the priests from which they in turn were to instruct the people.

8–13 There is an emphasis here on the perpetual fire on the bronze altar. Actually, the sacrifices required not a little work. Wood had to be secured and cut. A good bit of wood was needed to get the roaring fire that would burn the sacrifices completely and carry the odor skyward so as not to be offensive. The care of the ashes is detailed in vv.10–11. Leviticus 1:16 says that the place of the ashes was east of the altar, i.e., toward the front of the tabernacle court (cf. Ex 27:13–15; Nu 3:38). The sacrifices were killed on the north side, i.e., to the right as the worshiper faced the tabernacle. It was helpful that the prevailing winds came from the west.

The reason for the use of linen is given in Eze 44:18. No garment "that makes them perspire" was to be worn by the priest while officiating. Linen made a fine cloth, easily washed and comfortable. The linen garments were to be kept clean. For disposing ashes outside the camp, ordinary clothes were to be worn.

B. Grain Offering (6:14-23)

14–23 Much of this section repeats material already given in ch. 2. The additional directions concern the grain offering to be given by the priests themselves. This offering differs from the usual in that it was to be burned up entirely. It was given every morning and was to accompany the burnt offering (Nu 28:5) and the fellowship offerings (Lev 7:12). It represented the thanksgiving of the priests and, through them, all Israel.

C. Sin Offering (6:24–30)

24–30 The description of this section adds little to the previous treatment at 4:1–5:13 except to emphasize the holiness of the offering. Offerings whose blood was not taken into the tabernacle could be eaten by the officiating priest but only by him and the males of his family. It was to be eaten within the sacred precincts, and the vessels it was cooked in were to be broken or scoured. It was apparently the most solemn sacrifice of Israel and was thus an especially fitting type of Christ's atoning death (Heb 13:12).

D. Guilt Offering (7:1–10)

1–10 As v.7 says, the guilt offering was similar to the sin offering, especially as regards ritual. The main difference was that the blood of the guilt offering was treated like that of the burnt and fellowship offerings rather than like the sin offering. A difference is made between the cooked and uncooked grain offerings. The former belonged to the officiating priest. The latter, because it was in flour that could be preserved, was distributed among the priests.

E. Fellowship Offering (7:11–38)

Several other instructions were given for this most common sacrifice. There were two varieties of the fellowship offerings. The first expressed thanksgiving for God's general benefits (vv.12–15); the second served as a fulfillment of a vow or as a freewill offering (vv.16–18). Slight differences were made in the eating of the remainder from these varieties of offerings. Since, of all the sacrifices of the tabernacle, only fellowship offerings might be eaten by those who were not from priestly families, special warnings are given with regard to cleanness on the part of those who eat them. The prohibition of fat and blood is repeated (cf. 3:17), and details are given as to the portion of the animals that was given to the priests for food. On these verses see the remarks on 3:1–17.

11–18 The standard grain offering is specified to accompany the burnt offering and the meat of the fellowship offering. The description of the grain offering repeats the term of 2:4 and 6:14. A "memorial portion" was burned on the altar.

A second kind of breadstuff is specified, an offering of yeast bread. This was not burned on the altar. A portion was given the priest, who would present it before the Lord as an "offering" and then eat it. The rest of the bread, like the rest of the meat, was for the worshiper.

All of the thanksgiving offering was to be eaten on the same day to encourage sharing it with the poor. The other types of fellowship offering could be eaten on the second day, but by the third day it was prohibited as unsafe (cf. 19:5–8; 22:30).

19–21 As mentioned above, only the fellowship offerings were eaten by laypersons. Rules for guarding their sacredness were therefore needed. They must be kept clean. An unclean person must absolutely not eat of the sacred meal (cf. 1Co 11:28).

The phrase "cut off [GK 4162] from his people" is used over twenty-five times, usually with regard to some ceremonial violation. It is clearly associated with capital crimes only three times (17:14; 18:29; Ex 31:14). Similar phraseology is used repeatedly of cutting off enemies. The phrase here may have meant only some kind of excommunication from the people of the Lord.

22–27 The carcass of an unclean animal was not to be touched; but a sheep or goat that died a natural death or was killed by a wild beast could be used—only not for food. Its hide and wool were usable. Its fat also was usable, perhaps mostly for fuel.

28–34 The priest's portion of every fellowship offering was the right breast and the right thigh. The breast was "waved" before the Lord, i.e., presented and then taken by the priest. Similarly, the thigh, being heavier, was lifted up before the Lord as a "contribution" and then taken by the priest and his family (10:14).

For "the right thigh" it is difficult to know whether the hindquarter or forequarter is meant. If the Hebrews observed their comparative anatomy (the word when used for people means "leg"), the hindquarter would be intended. Also, the hindquarter is much better meat than the forequarter, and it is probable that the choicer portion was given to the priests; the rest was for the worshipers.

35–38 These offerings were allocated to the priests from "the day they were presented to serve" and onward. There need be no problem between the statement "on Mount Sinai" and 1:1, which says God spoke to Moses from "the Tent of Meeting." The Hebrew preposition b (GK 928) can mean "in," "on," "at," etc. Or the phrase "Mount Sinai" may have included more than the mountaintop itself. And some of these regulations may indeed have been given to Moses during his two periods on the mount while others may have been added during the year of establishing the worship of Israel.

III. The Beginning of the Tabernacle Worship (8:1–10:20)

Chapter 8 shows in a very interesting way the relationship of Leviticus to Exodus. They are parts of a unified whole. The consecration of the priests here is the fulfillment of the commands in Ex 29 (cf. vv.1–37).

The last part of Exodus consists largely of the directions for setting up Israel's worship (Ex 25–28, 30), followed by the record that the worship was set up in just that way (Ex 37–39). There is much repetition, with a difference only in tenses. For instance, the instructions for building the ark in Ex 25:10–21 are repeated almost verbatim in the past tense in Ex 37:1–9.

In the same way, the directions for the consecration of the priests in Ex 29:4–20, 22–26, and 31 are very closely paralleled by the record of the consecration in Lev 8:6–9, 12–19, and 31. It is rather obvious that Leviticus is a continuation of Exodus. Exodus ends with the setting up of the tabernacle. Leviticus proceeds with the directions for the offerings. Then Leviticus tells how the priests began their ministry, using the terms of the directions already given in Exodus.

Moses first acted as priest to consecrate the tabernacle, the altar, and Aaron and his sons. It is hard to overemphasize the work of Moses, the man of God. As the first priest, Moses is a type of Christ, the Great High Priest. As the greatest of the OT prophets, he was a type of Christ who spoke the word of God (Dt 18:15–19; Jn 7:40). As the great lawgiver, he received God's revelations face-to-face and was faithful as a servant in all God's house (Nu 12:7–8). Here too he was but a type and a shadow, far inferior to Christ, who was faithful as a Son over all God's house (Heb 3:1–6).

A. Consecration of Aaron and His Sons (8:1–36; cf. Ex 29:1–37)

1–13 The service of consecration was carried on according to the Lord's command and was done in the presence of the congregation. The people had given to the building of the tabernacle, and many had worked on it. Now it and its ministers were ready for the consecration of the priests and the dedication of the house of God.

The steps of the consecration of Aaron and his sons were solemn and meaningful. Aaron first was washed and clothed anew with the holy garments. He wore the ephod, the breastplate with its twelve-jeweled symbols of the tribes, the Urim and Thummim, and the priest's turban with the golden plate and its inscription "HOLY TO THE LORD" (Ex 28:36; 39:30). Then he, his sons, the altar, and its accouterments were anointed with oil. This was a special perfumed oil described in Ex 30:23–25. Psalm 133 says the oil ran down to the skirts of Aaron's garments.

It is generally agreed that the anointing oil typifies the Holy Spirit. When kings were anointed, the Holy Spirit came on them (1Sa 10:1–6; 16:13). The word "messiah" comes from the Hebrew word for "anoint" (GK 5417), and the work of Christ began with such an anointing of the Holy Spirit. There is no statement in the OT as to why oil typified the Holy Spirit. Oil was widely used in lamps. As the lamp burned, the oil seemed to vanish into the air. Such a connection of oil and air possibly may have made the typology natural in the Hebrew culture. The Hebrew word ruah (GK 8120) means either "spirit" or "wind, air, breath." The seven-branched lampstand, perpetually fed with oil, is called a symbol of the Spirit in the OT (Zec 4:2–6).

14–30 After being anointed, Aaron and his sons offered first for themselves (Heb 7:27) and then for the consecration of the altar. Then came a burnt offering of worship and consecration. Next they offered a ram of "ordination." This is an unusual term, used idiomatically in the sense of "filling the hand" of a priest, i.e., installing him in his office or ordaining him (cf. v.33).

The ram was sacrificed as a fellowship offering with special application of the blood to the priests' right ears, right thumbs, and right great toes. This doubtless symbolized their new total obedience and service.

31–36 The ram of ordination was then eaten at the door of the tabernacle in a new communion with God. So for seven days Aaron and his sons stayed at the tabernacle in contrition, worship, consecration, and fellowship. The whole OT ritual is given without any prescribed prayers except the Aaronic benediction of Nu 6:24–26.

B. Divine Acceptance of the First Worship (9:1–24)

1–4 After one week of ordination service, Aaron and his sons had fulfilled the complete ritual of consecration and were then ready to begin their priestly service. This chapter tells of a sin offering, burnt offerings, fellowship offerings, and a grain offering for the priests and the people.

5–6 It seems at first sight that this promised manifestation (which occurred at v.23) was a second one, different from that recorded in Ex 40:34. However, it is difficult to see why, if God had already accepted the tabernacle then, the priests would here have to consecrate it again with offerings and anointings. It is perhaps best to see the event mentioned here as the same one as the event recorded in Ex 40.

7–14 These verses give the details of Aaron's offering for himself the sacrifices of v.2. As mentioned in 8:15, the blood of the sin offering of the priest was put on the horns of the golden incense altar in the Holy Place; the rest of the blood was poured out at the base of the large bronze altar of burnt offering.

15–21 The details of Aaron's sacrifice of the offering of the people mentioned in vv.3–4 are given here. Notice that in v.21 Aaron presented the wave breast and the right thigh to the Lord but then took them for food for himself and his sons. The people's sin offering, however, being a sin offering for the congregation, was burned outside the camp (4:13–21).

22–24 After the offerings had been duly made, Aaron lifted up his hands in benediction and blessed the people. He probably spoke the prescribed benediction of Nu 6:24–26. The material in this section need not be strictly chronological. The symbolic presence of God was evidenced by the reality of his glory (see comment on vv. 5–6). There had been fire on the altar during the week of the priests' consecration. But miraculous fire came from the Lord to consume the offerings and to show the divine acceptance. That this was miraculous fire could easily be distinguished by its suddenness, intensity, etc. It emphasized the fact that when the sacrifices were burned year after year, God himself accepted them and blessed the people accordingly. The fire was sacred and was not to be allowed to go out.

The immediate response of the people—"they shouted for joy and fell facedown"—was gladness at God's acceptance. Mingled therewith, however, was awe at the presence of the supernatural manifestation of the holy Lord who had promised to live with them, to be their God, and to take them for his people.

C. Nadab and Abihu's Profanation (10:1–7)

1–7 Unfortunately humans are feeble and frail, and no amount of oil on the outside will change the heart. Two of Aaron's own sons, Nadab and Abihu, profaned the sanctuary with strange fire and died before the Lord. Judgment was harsh (cf. Ac 5:1–11). Aaron and the congregation needed to know that God was real and that the priests were not playing at religion.

D. Explicit Instructions for the Priests (10:8–20)

8–11 Apparently Nadab and Abihu profaned the Lord's house because they were drunk. At least a prohibition of fermented drink while serving in the Lord's house was immediately given. From here on the priest entering the tabernacle was to drink no alcohol.

12–20 It appears that Nadab and Abihu were the elder sons of Aaron. When Moses was on the mountain, God invited Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy elders to come partway to meet the Lord (Ex 24:1–2). Possibly Eleazer and Ithamar were under the age of thirty (cf. Nu 4:3, 23, 30). As Aaron, however, was about eighty at this point and had been married about forty years, his youngest sons may indeed have been over thirty. The text does not say whether all four sons were consecrated at the same time.

After the death of Aaron's older sons, Moses found that Aaron and his two remaining sons had not eaten the meat of the sin offering as was normal. But Aaron replied that though he was forbidden to mourn, he could not eat in good conscience that day. With that Moses was content; for Aaron had acted, not in negligence or mechanically, but in responsible sincerity. The heart attitude is more important than the mechanics of all the sacrifices (1Sa 15:22; 2Ch 30:19).

"The goat of the sin offering" was not the people's sin offering mentioned in 9:15. When such an offering was made with a male goat, the blood was sprinkled in the Holy Place, and the meat was not to be eaten by the priests (4:13–21). In the present instance there had been further offerings. Individuals had apparently also brought sin offerings whose blood was not sprinkled in the Holy Place and whose flesh could be eaten by the priest. Aaron, however, had directed the flesh of this sin offering also to be burned outside the camp, as was prescribed for a young bull whose blood had been sprinkled in the Holy Place.

IV. Laws of Cleanness (11:1–15:33)

The Levitical laws of cleanness symbolized spiritual cleansing and set Israel apart from the surrounding nations. The spiritual and the hygienic reasons for the laws are remarkably valuable in the area of public health. In general they protected Israel from bad diet, dangerous vermin, and communicable diseases. Only recently have better laws of health been possible with the advance of medicine. These were rule-of-thumb laws that God gave in his wisdom to a people who could not know the reason for the provision.

First, the laws protected Israel's diet. Some of the food forbidden was good some of the time, but not unless it was properly prepared. Pigs spread trichinosis; rabbits spread tularemia. The fish classified as clean are normally free-swimming, whereas scaleless and finless fish are usually bottom feeders and therefore susceptible to a great many more parasites. Cows, goats, and sheep are safe to eat under all ordinary circumstances and are economical to raise. The horse and camel were too uneconomical to use for meat.

The Hebrews were not only to avoid eating unclean animals; they were not to touch their dead carcasses. Thus the laws automatically helped control vermin. Common unclean animals would be spiders, flies, bugs, rats, and mice. A dead rat in a Hebrew house was not overlooked. It was carefully taken out and buried. In an effort to avoid such problems, the Hebrew housewife would normally keep a clean house.

The word "leprosy" used in older translations of chs. 13–14 is now generally recognized to include several "skin diseases" (GK 7669) showing a rash, such as measles, smallpox, and scarlet fever. For any such disease there was a quarantine period with weekly examination until the patient was well. Likewise, the laws on sexual uncleanness protected Israel from venereal diseases and from childbed fever.

A. Clean and Unclean Food (11:1–47) (cf. Dt 14:4–21)

1–8 Deuteronomy 14:6–19 is almost a verbatim copy of Lev 11:3–20. The difference between clean and unclean food is clearly as old as the time of Noah. It was to some extent tied in with sacrifice, for parts of some of the sacrifices were eaten. Noah's purpose in taking extra pairs of the clean animals aboard the ark was to have meat available for his family. There is no reference to clean and unclean items in the history between Noah and Moses, though Job, whose date is uncertain, does frequently mention the difference. Abrahamic sacrifices were of clean animals as far as they are specified (Ge 15:9). The need for extensive laws on these matters concerning public health would only arise when Israel became a nation under Moses.

The phrase "a split hoof completely divided" is obscure. The precise meaning of the terminology is not sure.

The clean animals are further limited to those that "chew the cud." The ruminants are peculiar in that they can exist on a rough diet. Cows, sheep, goats, and camels actually digest cellulose such as found in straw, leaves, twigs, bushes, etc. Horses and pigs require more nourishing food. Deuteronomy 14:4–5 names nine animals that are clean, including the wild deer and the antelope.

Contrary to general opinion, the use of the camel was not characteristic of ancient Israel. Camels are mentioned twenty-four times in connection with the patriarchs who traveled widely along the caravan routes. The rest of the Pentateuch mentions them only three times. From Moses to the Exile, the use of camels by the Israelites is only mentioned twice. They were more a desert animal; apparently the life of Israel did not nearly so much revolve around the camel as does life for the Arab today.

Neither the "coney" (GK 9176; see NIV note, "hyrax or rock badger") nor the "rabbit" is a ruminant. The coney is a vegetarian and an ungulate (i.e., has hoofs). Though small like a rabbit, it is related to the elephant. Both the coney and the rabbit wiggle their noses in a chewing action that resembles the chewing of a cud. The description is not scientifically precise but one of external appearances. Outlawing the rabbit protected the nation from tularemia.

9–12 Fish with fins and scales are free swimming and generally free of parasites. Scaleless fish are more likely carriers of parasites since they are scavengers and mud-bottom dwellers. Clams in current times have carried hepatitis—though this may be due to modern pollution problems. Crabs are scavengers, and some of their meat is said not to be good. Snail fever from infested waters has been a curse in Egypt.

13–19 There was no easy rule of thumb for clean birds. A negative list is given that in cases is difficult to translate with certainty. The different modern versions vary in detail. In general carrion-eating and fish-eating birds were forbidden, just as they are not used for food today. Chickens are not mentioned in the OT. The eating of bird eggs and the mother bird together is forbidden in Dt 22:6, apparently for conservation reasons. If the eggs are taken, the mother bird will lay more; but if the mother bird is taken, there will be no more eggs! Doves, their eggs, and their young were eaten.

20–23 "Flying insects that walk on all fours" include such pests as cockroaches, flies, or even mosquitoes. Verses 21–22 allow the locust/grasshopper family as food. The distinction is that they have strong hind legs for springing. Evidently in the category of insects, the hind pair of legs was not counted; so these insects are described as creeping on all fours.

The "locust" (GK 746) is not the cicada or the seventeen-year locust but a large grasshopper-type of insect. These locusts could be great pests in antiquity. A plague of them could eat every green thing in a field in a very short time. Travelers in the Near East tell of having seen the sun obscured by clouds of locusts. When they are present in more normal numbers, they are used as food to this day. Only the muscular portion is used and when fried is said to be a delicacy. John the Baptist ate locusts and wild honey. No one in the OT is mentioned as eating locusts, but this silence does not prove that they were not eaten.

24–43 The words for "weasel," "great lizard," "gecko," "monitor lizard," "wall lizard," and "skink" occur only in these verses in Leviticus. It is impossible to be sure of their identification. Some of these names of animals have parallels in later Arabic or Aramaic literature. Fortunately the details are not important.

The basic meaning of the word "moves about" is to multiply. The little animals like mice, lizards, etc., multiply rapidly if they are not controlled. The word is used again in vv.41–42 to refer to snakes, lizards, centipedes, etc. The word also is used in Ge 1:21 to refer to animals that multiply in the water and in Ge 9:7 in the command to people after the Flood to multiply and fill the earth. The small animals mentioned here are thus rapid movers and reproducers.

The laws of cleanness apply as much to touching the carcasses of vermin as to eating them. Even a part of the carcass of an unclean animal was defiled. This was not true of the carcass of a clean animal killed for food. Dead vermin were a problem in the Hebrew house. Dead bugs in an earthen pot meant the pot was to be broken. Food contaminated by dead bugs or mice was to be thrown out. A carcass on dry seed was all right but on damp seed was contaminating. Even the carcass of a clean animal that had died a natural death (i.e., by a disease) was unclean. Such laws resulted in prompt burial of carrion and certainly promoted public health.

44–47 The phrase "be holy [GK 7705], because I am holy" is interesting because it is like the words of 19:2, which are said to be characteristic of the Holiness Code (chs. 17–26). Actually, the words are characteristic of the laws of holy conduct wherever found. The use of the phrase here unifies stylistically the laws of cleanness and the laws of holiness.

B. Purification After Childbirth (12:1–8)

1–8 Fuller details with regard to sexual impurity are given in ch. 15. Childbirth, like menstruation, rendered the mother unclean. The period was seven days for a boy, twice that for a girl. There may be more reasons than one for such a law. First, it would put the mother in sufficient isolation to assist in bringing her back to normal health. Being unclean she could not do the cooking or keep the house. Also, it is possible that such a provision would help prevent the spread of childbed fever, which in former days took many lives. If the mother was unclean, presumably any midwife would have to wash in water and be unclean until the evening, which would prevent the direct transmission of this disease.

Circumcision was instituted by God in Abraham's family and distinguished his descendants from all others. Although some ancient peoples practiced circumcision as a puberty rite, infant circumcision appears to have been peculiar to Israel. It had one extra virtue by precluding any licentious puberty circumcision rites that other nations may have observed. The spiritual import of circumcision is clear from Dt 10:16; Jer 4:4; and Ro 2:29.

There was an additional period of semi-isolation during which a newly delivered mother could not yet make the journey to the sanctuary for her offering. Travel in ancient days was more strenuous than now. It would be a physical blessing for a mother to wait for about a month. Breast-feeding was then a must as now it still is a desideratum. It was a natural and wise provision for a mother to have time at home with her baby until the child was stronger and her milk established.

It is not at all clear why the time of uncleanness and seclusion is doubled for a female child. There may be the symbolism of the uncleanness that the daughter would eventually suffer in her turn. Or it may be that circumcising the male child at the end of one week was considered symbolically to reduce the attendant uncleanness. There is no statement that the baby is ceremonially unclean. That the child is also a sinner is plain in the OT (cf. Ps 58:3)—else why the ritual of circumcision that is said to be symbolic of circumcision of the heart?

There may have been good reasons in that culture why the journey to the temple was delayed for a baby girl. Girls are usually smaller at birth. More girls are born than boys, but even now the mortality rate is greater for girls so that the sexes are soon numerically even. To allow a longer time to let a baby girl grow and get established would be a good thing! There may also have been cultural influences. In many countries girls are less desired than boys. Thoughtless husbands might have taken better care of baby boys and their mothers; so a longer time at home might have been a positive help for a mother with a baby girl. No difference is made in the temple ritual between the birth of a boy or a girl. The only difference is in the periods of uncleanness and seclusion.

The prescribed offering for the new mother was a burnt offering and a sin offering that was normal for a woman with any unnatural discharge (15:30). The OT does not state that conception and birth are sinful; but all who conceive and bear are sinners, and the end of all such uncleanness was accomplished by ritual laws of cleansing. The laws were for public health, but there was also the religious sanction. Doubtless the physical uncleanness was typical of spiritual uncleanness as well.

C. Cleanness and Skin Diseases (13:1–46)

Clearly chs. 13–14 are not limited to what is now termed leprosy or Hansen's disease. The Hebrew word translated "skin diseases" (GK 7669) is used only in connection with sickness and mildew, and its use elsewhere gives no great light on the identification. The word is used in connection with the miracles of Moses' hand (Ex 4:6), Miriam's plague (Nu 12:10), and Naaman's healing and Gehazi's plague (2Ki 5:1–27). These all refer to the whiteness of skin and thus would be true leprosy. Uzziah's curse, being a continuing disease (2Ki 15:5; 2Ch 26:21), also could be true leprosy. The other references are general and do not add to the picture (22:4; Nu 5:2; Dt 24:8; 2Sa 3:29).

The symptoms listed in ch. 13 are more applicable to the communicable diseases characterized by skin rash, such as measles, smallpox, scarlet fever, etc. Hansen's disease does not change the hair color but causes loss of hair. It makes no pocks in the skin. The different symptoms listed in the chapter are hard to follow in detail; but the main consideration is whether the sore is virulent, spreading, and deeper than the skin. Such a disease would be watched for seven days and if necessary seven days more. By that time, if the disease were serious, the person would likely be either well or dead. Hansen's disease is slow in onset and does not improve in seven days. Of course, the references to the disease affecting a garment or a house (vv.47–49; 14:33–53) cannot apply to Hansen's disease.

No medication is prescribed because in those days there was nothing appropriate. The only weapon the people had to prevent the spread of disease was quarantine, and this was applied as sensibly as it could be in those times. No other ancient law code has these quarantine prescriptions or even approaches the questions of public health.

Some damage may have been done by the translation "leprosy." Some of the diseases here referred to are highly communicable. Leprosy is not easily communicable; but partly because of these biblical references, people with leprosy, even in modern days, have been more isolated than necessary. It is true that leprosy is more communicable among children. With modern treatment, however, it can be controlled without the strict quarantine that was usually added to the pitiable state of the victims. Such unfortunate hardships were perhaps overbalanced by the beneficial results of an ancient quarantine for measles, smallpox, scarlet fever, and other such communicable diseases.

1–11 That the victim "must be brought" indicates that he would be too sick to walk. Leprosy in its incipient stages does not incapacitate a person. No details are given about the type of "isolation" required. The sick person was probably not confined at home, and no quarters were available around the tabernacle. His family would probably avoid him. He would stay outside the camp (see v.46). The implication is that a "rash" was a temporary thing. At least there was no serious disease. He was to wash and be clean. True leprosy does not change enough in fourteen days to be recognized by such an examination. Some other affliction is intended.

The details of these symptoms and the examinations by the priest escape us. It appears that the main questions were, Is the sore more than skin deep? Is there raw flesh? Is the infection spreading? A temporary disease meant quarantine; a chronic disease meant segregation; an abated disease meant cure—the individual was clean.

12–17 Any disease that would leave the whole body white after a couple of weeks would not be serious. Apparently it means that the rash had gone, leaving the skin white. Perhaps the whiteness would refer to new skin, not as sun-bronzed as usual. However, if raw flesh appeared, the person was unclean.

18–23 The word "boil" (GK 8825) is used of Job's affliction, and boils were one of the ten plagues of Egypt. The similar Arabic word refers to inflammation. That the person is pronounced "unclean" means that the boil has not healed. The test is, Is the infection more than skin deep? Again, leprosy is too specific for the disease.

24–28 The case of a "burn" (GK 4805) is more clear. This sore is caused by fire. Burns are not contagious, but they can become infected; in that case, for his own good as well as for others, the infected person would be quarantined. Again the key questions are, Is it deep? Is the hair dead? Is it spreading?

29–37 The "itch" (GK 5999) is possibly a scab that is complicated by the hair of the head or the beard. The patient is to shave the hair around the sore and watch it. Such open sores were not allowed to fester without care. And the person with the sore was not to spread the infection.

38–46 The dull white spot, it must be remembered, is against the background of the darker skin of the tanned Jew of Palestine. The spots are not active, raw, or deep. They are a "harmless rash," possibly a scar. From the context, at least, it was harmless.

The word for "unkempt"(GK 7277) is difficult and may derive from a word referring to long hair such as a Nazirite had (Nu 6:5) or from a word meaning "a bit loose," "untied" (a turban). In 21:10 the priest was forbidden thus to take off his turban (or let his hair grow long) as a sign of mourning. The unclean man was to do what a priest was forbidden to do.

The quarantined person in Israel was not quarantined in his house; that would endanger the family. He was to warn others of his illness by dress and action and was to stay outside the camp. He probably got little care except from a mother who was willing to share his uncleanness. Till relatively recent years many a country town had a pest house where victims of communicable diseases were put. The author's grandfather once nursed a relative in such a pest house. Mortality was high; but it would also have been high at home, and the well people were preserved. It is hard for modern people to imagine the severity of ancient epidemics. The black death (bubonic plague) killed a quarter of Europe's people in about 1350. Whole villages would move away from those stricken with the disease. Quarantine was the only available relief. The OT specified such quarantine already in the days of Moses.

D. Mildew (13:47–59)

47–59 Obviously leprosy is not in view here but some kind of rot, fungus, or "mildew" (GK 7669; cf. 14:33–53). Palestine has a winter rainy season that could generate mildew. One unfortunate result of this presence of mildew is that we have few remnants of the writings of ancient Israel. If the Israelites had written on clay tablets, we might have had an abundance of preserved writings; but except for those found in the dry, hot Jordan valley, the leather and papyrus copies have perished through the rot mentioned here.

Leather was used for clothing, as these verses point out (cf. Heb 11:37); but leather clothing is not often referred to in the OT, being, perhaps, the clothing of the poor. It would seem to be durable but hot and uncomfortable. As v.48 shows, leather was also used for other objects: belts (2Ki 1:8), skins for liquids (Jos 9:4), etc. Leather was cheap and versatile but subject to decay. Linen and woolen objects likewise would mildew if stored in a damp place. Such mildew could be irritating to the lungs and certainly would be damaging to the articles. The law that declared such objects unclean was good for both hygiene and economics.

The ancient housewife could not spray the item with a disinfectant or bleach. The Lord did not instruct Moses in the biology of fungi. He did prescribe, however, practical public health measures to be administered under the priest-physician. The article was to be shown to the priest who isolated it for seven days; then if the fungus had not spread, the article was to be washed and watched for another week. If the fungus was gone, the garment was safe to wear; if not, the spot was to be cut out or the whole article was to be burned up. If the mildew was caused by storage in a damp place, the transfer to the priests' quarters would probably fix an ordinary problem. Probably a housewife would go over stored clothes rather often to prevent such trouble and loss. If the garments were frequently inspected and aired, that alone would be a good thing. The principle of quarantine was a practical means to control mildew in clothes or houses as well as to control sickness.

To wash the item was a logical treatment. If washing did not fix the trouble, nothing more could be done—better to burn it and keep any problem from spreading. Much was left to the priests' judgment. If washing helped, cutting out the spot would cure. Then watch it again, wash it again, and the garment was safe to wear.

Verse 59 summarizes the matter of mildew only. Similar summaries for other regulations appear in 11:46–47; 14:57; and 15:32.

E. Cleansing From Skin Diseases (14:1–32)

1–7 The priests were the public health officers, but they served in their priestly capacity. Israel was a holy nation, and even her cleansing from sickness was done with religious ceremony. Sickness was symbolic of sin, and even now it should not be forgotten that sickness and death are part of God's curse on the sin of Adam and the human race. Therefore, cleansing the diseased person required sacrifices (cf. Lk 5:12–15).

It is difficult to see in detail the symbolism of the two live birds. The ritual of cleansing a house in vv.49–53 is so similar to the cleansing of a diseased person that the latter passage may be used to explain the former. Verse 52 makes it quite explicit that the fresh water was mingled with the small amount of blood of the slaughtered bird and used in the cleansing. When the bird was killed over the fresh water, its blood dripped into the water. The wording of vv.51 and 53 is so similar to that of vv.6–7 that we may use v.52 to interpret the action of the earlier verses to include the fresh water also in the sprinkling. The live bird was identified with the blood of the dead bird so that both penalty for and removal of sin are symbolized (cf. 16:21–28). The scarlet yarn, hyssop, and cedar wood were presumably used in the sprinkling. Hyssop is a plant that can be used like a paint brush, and the wood may have served as a handle around which to wrap the yarn.

8–20 The rather unusual practice of shaving was a real help in cleansing the body and showing up any remaining scabs. After seven days of semiisolation and a final bath, the man was clean and must offer his sacrifice. The order of the offerings was first a guilt offering, then a sin offering, then the burnt offering. The grain offering was three-tenths of an ephah, indicating that one-tenth should be offered with each sacrifice. The same extremities are touched with blood and oil that were consecrated with blood at a priest's ordination (Ex 29:20). The ear, thumb, and great toe stand for the whole person who is cleansed and anointed with the "log of oil"—a little over one cup of olive oil.

21–32 As usual in the case of a necessary offering, there is provision for the poor, but the principles of the offering are maintained. Verses 24–31 are almost a duplicate of the regulations of vv.12–18 with the changes of the two doves instead of two lambs. This illustrates the usual Hebrew style that loves duplication.

F. Cleansing Houses From Mildew (14:33–57)

33–57 As remarked above, the word used to describe infection in houses as well as infection of skin proves that its meaning is not restricted to leprosy. "Mildew" surely is preferable. Verse 34 shows that the Israelites had the expectation of being in Canaan within the year. This law of mildew in a house was obviously not for the desert journey. It is equally obvious, however, that God did not expect Israel to live forever in tents.

In dealing with this problem, the house was first to be emptied because it was suspect and may be pronounced unclean. For all the contents to be pronounced unclean unnecessarily would be quite a loss. As would be expected, the symptoms of "greenish or reddish depressions" are not very clear. The words for the colors are used elsewhere, but the word "depressions" is used only here. It may mean "hollow," "crack," "spot," etc. The main thing is that it is not a surface stain.

The procedure for dealing with the mildew in the house is again isolation (v.38). If the house is emptied of its contents and the mildew continues or spreads, the affected stones must be removed and the area scraped and replastered. If the mildew persists, the house must be condemned. If the mildew is cured, the house is clean. We see once more a useful procedure for public health. A house with such mildew conditions would normally not be a healthy place to live because of dampness, allergens, etc.

The procedure for purifying the house is similar to that of cleansing persons (vv.2–7). This time it is clear that fresh water was used in the cleansing, mixed with the blood that had dripped into it. The symbolism of blood atonement and removal of defilement is maintained, but no further guilt, sin, or burnt offering was required. The problem of the house's mildew was impersonal.

G. Uncleanness From Emissions (15:1–33)

Various matters are taken up in this chapter: defilement from normal sexual activity, abnormal sexual discharge, and, probably, diarrhea (cf. Dt 23:9–14).

1–3 The words "any man" may indicate that the first section applies to both men and women. The question involves the nature of the "bodily discharge [GK 2307]." This is not the normal male emission that is specifically mentioned in vv.16–18 and that involves only washing and temporary uncleanness. This discharge, like a woman's unnatural discharge of blood (vv.25–30), requires a sacrifice. It may therefore be a virulent male discharge such as in the case of gonorrhea. Or it may not be a sexual discharge at all. Diarrhea is common still in the Near East and is sometimes a symptom of many serious diseases. It is perhaps safest to say that this section is all-inclusive, and both diarrhea and any unnatural male discharge are covered.

4–12 The regulations covering the uncleanness of a person in this case are very stringent. Anything he touches is unclean, and anyone who touches anything he touches is unclean. These prohibitions better fit diarrhea. For instance, the scourge of cholera is very serious. It involves diarrhea and is very contagious. Venereal diseases, on the other hand, are almost always transmitted by sexual contact rather than by infected items.

13–15 Examination by the priest was not required because there were no external symptoms such as 13:1–44 mentions. A waiting period of seven days, however, was required in this case also, then a bath, and then offerings. The offerings specified are only the sin offering and burnt offering, and only doves or pigeons are required, not lambs. After all, diarrhea may sometimes be a serious symptom, but it may also be common and not at all serious.

16–18 Normal sexual activity resulted in temporary uncleanness requiring washing, but no guilt was attached and no offering was required. The Bible says a good bit about sex. It heavily condemns extramarital and perverted sex. Marriage, however, is plainly said to be honorable (Heb 13:4). A Christian perhaps may not speak much of sex, not because it is shameful, but because it is intimate, wonderful, and holy.

19–24 Notice the emphasis on washing, which is good hygiene. No offering is prescribed for cleansing after a woman's regular period. The natural result of the stipulation in v.24 is to protect a woman with cramps and some weakness from the unwelcome advances of an unfeeling husband. The penalty is not severe; the situation is probably different from 20:18, which should be compared.

25–33 The ancient law distinguishes between normal flow and abnormalities causing a discharge, possibly because of disease. The net effect of the quarantine imposed would be to prevent contagion and to give the woman a real rest from housework, marital relations, and family care. A person perpetually unclean could hardly prepare the food and do the housework.

The offering prescribed for a woman's sickness was exactly the same as that for the "discharge" of a man or the diarrhea of either sex (cf. vv.13–15, 28–30).

V. The Annual Sin Offering of the Day of Atonement (16:1–34) (cf. 23:27–32; Nu 29:7–11)

The Day of Atonement is not mentioned in Ex 23:14–17 and 34:18–23. Nor does it appear in Dt 16:1–16. These places mention only the three so-called pilgrimage festivals when the males of all Israel were to assemble before the tabernacle. The Day of Atonement was not such a pilgrimage festival. The ordinary Israelite remained at home, and the priests carried out the ritual. It was the only day of fasting enjoined on Israel and was to be a special Sabbath of rest and solemnity. It was a time of special contrition, special sin offerings, and atonement. It is kept to this day by the Jews and is called Yom Kippur ("Day of Atonement"). The biblical term is plural, "Day of Atonements."

This day had a special symbolism. Two goats were taken to bear the people's sins. One was killed as a sin offering; the other was sent off into the desert to bear away the sins of the people. The two goats thus symbolized both propitiation for sins by death and complete removal of the sins for which atonement was made. Clearly the Day of Atonement was to symbolize for Israel every year the substitutionary atonement God provided for their sins and the total removal of their guilt.

1–10 The mention of the death of the two sons of Aaron shows that chronologically this law of the Day of Atonement was not given until near the end of the stay at Sinai, which is one good reason why it is not found in Exodus. The occasion of the institution was the necessity to protect the priests in their ministry. It appears probable that Nadab and Abihu had entered the Most Holy Place. This privilege and duty were now limited to the high priest who "entered the inner room, and that only once a year, and never without blood, which he offered for himself and for the sins the people had committed in ignorance" (Heb 9:7). Christ, as Hebrews emphasizes, has entered heaven itself once for all with his own blood, "having obtained eternal redemption" (Heb 9:12).

The "Most Holy Place" (GK 7731) behind the curtain was the inner shrine where the ark was kept. The golden lid of the sacred chest, the "atonement cover" (GK 4114; called the "mercy seat" in KJV), is better translated "the atonement place." The emphasis is on the atonement rather than on the mercy lying behind the atonement. In the symbolism of the tabernacle, this inner shrine was the dwelling of God; and the place above the ark was the place where he would meet with humans. But the holiness of God was so awesome that for sinners to approach him carelessly and without an atoning sacrifice could be fatal—as it was for Nadab and Abihu (cf. Jn 14:6).

A young bull was the sin offering specified for a priest (4:3). This was to be followed by a burnt offering. These offerings were for Aaron himself, that he might be cleansed and consecrated afresh before acting as priest for the people. Hebrews 7:27 declares that Christ had no need of this first cleansing sacrifice. Christ is the perfect Priest. Aaron was but a human type.

What is the "scapegoat" (GK 6439)? In later Jewish theology the Book of Enoch uses the word as a name for one of the fallen angels, Azazel. Enoch's extensive demonology is demonstrably late (c. 200 B.C.). It often uses late Aramaic forms for names of the demons, which suggests that they were of postbiblical invention. Enoch is dependent on Lev 16 rather than vice versa and is no guide to the interpretation of Leviticus.

A much simpler view goes back to the LXX of 200 B.C. The first part of "Azazel" can mean "goat" and the last part is from a verb that means "go away." Compound nouns like this are rare in ancient Hebrew, but new evidence for them is turning up in Ugaritic. It is simply the designation of the goat to be taken away, the escape goat. In Nu 29:11 the escape goat is called "the sin offering for atonement."

11–14 The formula for the "fragrant incense" is given in Ex 30:34–38. It was not to be used for private perfume, for it was holy. This incense was not burned on the altar of incense in the Holy Place but in the censer that Aaron was to carry into the Most Holy Place. The smoke of the incense in the dark shrine would add to the awesomeness of Aaron's work in the annual blanket atonement for Israel's sins.

The "Testimony" (GK 6343) was the tablets of the Ten Commandments (Ex 25:16; 31:18); thus the tent is called the tabernacle of the Testimony. The phrase "ark of the Testimony" is used eleven times in Exodus, twice in Numbers, and once in Joshua. The more usual name is the "ark of the covenant," used twice in Numbers, four times in Deuteronomy, and often in the later histories, Joshua–2 Chronicles. It is clear that the tablets of the law are also called the "testimony" and the "covenant," and this is the reason for the phrase "ark of the covenant" (2Ch 6:11). Studies of ancient treaties draw attention to the nature of the Ten Commandments as sharing parts of the treaty form of early times.

In this most solemn act of worship in the inner shrine, the blood sprinkled before God symbolizes the substitutionary atonement. "Without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness" (Heb 9:22).

15–19 The same ritual is now repeated by Aaron for the people. The newly cleansed priest representatively bears the nation before God for atonement. The shrine, the whole tent, and the bronze altar must be cleansed by the sin offering because these things dwell among an unclean people. It is clear that the ritual cleansing of the tabernacle furniture was not due to its physical uncleanness. Rather, it stemmed from the Israelites whose sin and rebellion defiled the tabernacle when they worshiped.

20–28 Attention has already been called to thepart of the ritual for sacrifice wherein the symbolism of transfer of sins is prominent

(cf. 1:4 et al.). In this special case the symbolism is quite clear. The priest confesses Israel's sins over the goat, putting them on the goat, who then bears them away. Of course, this was only symbolic. The NT antitype is our union with Christ (Ro 6:5), in virtue of which "he himself bore our sins in his body on the tree" (1Pe 2:24). The divine order set forth here is, first, sins must be dealt with; then comes worship and consecration. Aaron's own burnt offering was delayed until the sin offerings were all completed; then both Aaron's and the people's burnt offerings were acceptable. The sin offering for a priest and the sin offering for the nation were to have the carcasses burned outside the camp (cf. 4:12, 21). Hebrews 13:11–12 applies this principle to the death of Christ, who suffered outside the gate as a sin offering.

29–34 A series of holy days clusters in the fall in the Jewish calendar. The phrase "deny yourselves" (GK 6700) probably signifies fasting (NIV note). It is used in conjunction with fasting in Ps 35:13 and in parallel with fasting in Isa 58:3 (where in both instances it is referred to as humbling). But as the context in Isa 58 shows, God's injunction was not for mere external fasting but for fasting as an accompaniment of true repentance and new obedience. The title "high priest" is not common in the OT, but this verse shows that a hereditary succession is in view. The conclusion to the whole chapter does not mention the cleansing of tabernacle furniture but specifies that atonement was thus "made once a year for all the sins of the Israelites."

VI. Laws of Personal Holiness (17:1–22:33)

A. One Place of Sacrifice (17:1–9) (cf. Dt 12:1–27)

1–2 Chapter 17 is a hinge chapter between the public and private regulations. It deals with the requirement for central sacrifice, as does Dt 12:1–27, and it likewise forbids eating blood. These matters concerned the general public.

3–7 Of the several Hebrew words for "kill," the one used here practically always is used for killing animals for sacrifice, except that it also refers to the slaughter of people. As Dt 12:15 makes plain, people could kill animals at home but not for sacrifice. Animals sacrificed elsewhere would not have God's blessing, and bloodguilt would be imputed to the offerer. It is unnecessary to hold that butchering was not done at home. The alleged contradiction of Lev 17:3–5 and Dt 12:15 disappears if "sacrifice" is adopted in Lev 17:3–5.

8–9 The prohibition against sacrificing away from the central tabernacle repeats the law of v.3, except that it adds mention of the major kind of sacrifice—the burnt offering. Repetition is not surprising in Hebrew; indeed, it is characteristic. A double prohibition also is given in Dt 12:4–6 and 13–14, which is probably dependent on the earlier command in Leviticus, giving, however, a few extra details—the mention of wild animals as examples of legitimate butchering at home (v.15). Deuteronomy 14:23–26 takes up the further question of converting tithes into money if the central sanctuary is too far away to carry gifts to it.

The expression "must be cut off from his people" (cf. v.4) is not easy to identify. It usually refers to ceremonial offenses (Passover, Ex 12:15, 19; Nu 9:13), being uncircumcised (Ge 17:14), eating of unclean foods, or failing to be cleansed after defilement (Lev 17:4, 9, 10, 14; Nu 19:13, 20, et al.). The times when it may refer to judgment on moral matters are Lev 18:29, where it refers to all the previous matters of incest; Nu 15:30, the unpardonable sin; Ex 31:14, Sabbath desecration; and Lev 20:3, 5–6, idolatry and spiritualism. It is hard to think that all these instances involve capital punishment—though some may. Another view is that they involve excommunication.

B. The Sanctity of Blood (17:10–16)

10–16 Blood, so obviously necessary to life, plays the major role in the sacrificial system and did so from the first sacrifice of Abel. God told Noah that human blood was sacred, for it stands for the life of a human being made in God's image (Ge 9:4–6). That animal blood was forbidden as food further emphasizes this fact. The additional reason for its sacrificial meaning is given in the present passage (cf. Dt 12:23).

C. Laws Against Incest (18:1–18)

The laws of ch. 18 and much of ch. 20 are not against indecent exposure (as the KJV and NRSV phrase "You shall not uncover the nakedness of" might suggest); rather, they deal with sexual relations, and this chapter forbids incest. Chapter 20 covers much the same ground, giving the penalties for such actions. As mentioned in connection with ch. 17, the ground for these laws is found in the lordship of God (ch. 18) and his holiness (ch. 20). The Lord had brought the Israelites out of Egypt where such practices were common. In their new land they were to avoid these common sins of pagan society.

1–5 A frequent emphasis of critics is that Israel borrowed her religion from her neighbors. Doubtless some faithless Israelites did borrow, but the constant emphasis of the Law and Prophets was for Israel's faith to be kept unique. Their religion was to be different from the practices of Egypt and Canaan. Its greatest distinction was expressed in the refrain "I am the LORD your God."

Verse 5—"Keep my decrees and laws, for the man who obeys them will live by them. I am the LORD"— is quoted in Eze 20:11, 13, 21; Ne 9:29; and in Lk 10:28; Ro 10:5; and Gal 3:12. There is some difference of opinion how it should be taken. Ezekiel and Nehemiah use the verse to condemn Israel. God's people had violated his ordinances and were exiled. Christ told the questioning lawyer to keep the commandments, and he would live. It is sometimes said that Christ here allowed a hypothetical salvation by works. But he then told the parable of the Good Samaritan in order to search out the lawyer's sin and bring conviction.

Rather than teaching salvation by works, v. 5 teaches that the OT believers who trusted God and obeyed him from the heart received life abundant both here and hereafter. It would seem that the things here required to be done include all the laws of God—including keeping the laws of morality and the rituals of atonement and worship in the tabernacle. Observance of these laws in an attitude of faith resulted in spiritual life and power for the godly Israelite. But, as Lev 19:17 and other verses show, the Lord required more than mere external obedience and ritual. The Lord desired a circumcised heart (Dt 30:6). Therefore, it is best to take Lev 18:5 as a command to keep all God's laws by faith and thus attain a full spiritual life.

6–18 The forbidden degrees of relationship are given here. Some of these provisions seem unnecessary because the marriage is impossible anyway (i.e., with a daughter-in-law, she being already married), but the law would be in point if the person were widowed or divorced.

Two items call for special mention: v.16, marriage with a brother's wife, and v.18, with a wife's sister. The problem with v.16 is that it seems to forbid the levirate marriage of Dt 25:5. It is usually supposed that levirate marriage was an old and acknowledged exception (Ge 38:6–11). It was in force only if the widow was childless. Was it also required only if the surviving brother was single (Dt 25:5, if brothers were living together)? As to v.18, at the very least it forbids this special case of polygamy. This does not mean that polygamy in general is approved—only that its excesses are curbed.

The reason for forbidding these relationships is because extensive intermarriage results in tragic abnormalities and also destroys the freedom of the family that should be able to have normal love and intimacy without sexual overtones. In a polygamous society such rules were the more necessary. And incest was common in antiquity under certain circumstances. For three generations just prior to Moses, the kings of Egypt had married their half-sisters to maintain the kingship in the royal family. The laws of incest as given in this chapter are those recognized in civilized society. Marriage with first cousins is not forbidden.

D. Sexual Purity (18:19–30)

19 As argued at 15:24, the restriction of this verse is a general protection for a woman against an inconsiderate husband's approach. The penalty in 15:24 is a seven-day period of uncleanness. In view of that regulation, it seems that here to "be cut off from their people" (v.29) does not involve death but perhaps excommunication, perhaps divine displeasure.

20 This verse defines adultery as specifically forbidden in the seventh commandment (Ex 20:14; Dt 22:22). Other sexual aberrations are mentioned and various penalties given. Intercourse with a single girl required marriage (Dt 22:28–29). But violation of another man's wife broke the marriage bond and destroyed the home. People lightly call it "cheating" today, but in God's sight it is a capital offense.

21 "Sacrificed to Molech" is literally "to cross over, or through, to Molech." It seems to be an abbreviation of the phrase used elsewhere (2Ki 23:10), "to make one's child pass through the fire to Molech" (of unwanted or illegitimate children?). On Molech see the comments on 20:1–5.

22 Homosexual acts are clearly denounced as hateful to God. The penalty given at 20:13 is capital punishment. Homosexuality is denounced also in Ro 1:26–27. This sin was well-known in Canaan—witness Sodom (Ge 19:5) and Gibeah (Jdg 19:22)—but it was no less wicked in God's sight. Clearly "gay churches," where homosexuality is rampant, can exist only where people have cast off biblical authority.

23 Bestiality is likewise punishable by death (20:15–16; Ex 22:19 [18 MT]; Dt 27:21). This wicked perversion of the holy sexual relationship given for marriage and the home shows how deeply the human race has fallen!

24–30 People forget that God judges nations when iniquity runs rampant. The Canaanites had no covenant relationship with God. Yet for their excess of abominations, God punished them, and the land vomited out its inhabitants. There comes a day when God's patience runs out. Evil brings its own reward, though not immediately or infallibly in this life. But at last when the cup of iniquity is full, evil brings God's judgment. This eternal principle of justice applied also to Israel, as she found out in the days of the judges.

E. Miscellaneous Laws (19:1–37)

These laws of varied content show how intimately the moral and ceremonial legislation was mixed in ancient Israel. A number of these laws have parallels elsewhere. It is difficult to classify the laws of this chapter and perhaps unnecessary to try. Ancient law codes do not always follow an arrangement we think of as logical.

1. Parents, Sabbaths, and idols (19:1–4) (cf. Dt 27:15–16)

1–3a Verse 2 was alluded to by Christ (Mt 5:33–35) and quoted in 1Pe 1:16 (cf. Lev 11:44; 20:26). The character of God is behind his commandments. Among the sensual and foolish deities of antiquity, no god could ground all moral duty in his divine character; only the God of Israel could. The word "respect" (v.3a; GK 3707) is frequently used of the fear of God; the principle is the same as the fifth commandment (Ex 20:12) and is stated negatively in the curse ritual at Dt 27:16.

3b The word "Sabbath" (GK 8701) refers to the annual feasts and the sabbatical years as well as the weekly Sabbaths. All parts of the Bible emphasize the Sabbaths. Attempts to explain away the Jewish Sabbath without reference to revelation are unsatisfactory. No other nation of antiquity observed a seven-day week. Efforts are made to derive the Sabbath from Assyrian unlucky days and from the phases of the moon, but the twenty-nine and a half days of the lunar month are not so divisible.

Whether the Sabbath is for Christians to observe has been much debated. Some say the Sabbath law is part of the moral law and must be kept today. But they do not keep the day as the OT believers did, resting at home. And the NT emphasizes the Lord's Day, the first day of the week, as did the early church. Others say that the Sabbath was wholly ceremonial and is done away in Christ. These also seem to neglect some NT data and the witness of the early church.

Most Christians, with varying emphases, agree that the Sabbath day, the various feasts called Sabbaths, and the sabbatical years were part of Israel's ceremonial worship. However, these days were based on eternal principles of rest. The spiritual significance of the OT law is kept in the NT by its setting apart of the Lord's Day. The ceremonial part of the law specifying the seventh day and certain feast days and sabbatical years is done away (cf. Gal 4:10 et al.). It should be noted that the OT ceremonies were not exactly "done away" in Christ. They were fulfilled and their principles continue to be represented in the simpler NT ceremonies.

4 The word "cast" means "poured out" and refers to the process of casting metals—an ancient invention. The proscription of idolatry is pervasive in the OT. This matter also is emphasized in the Ten Commandments and in the curse ritual at Dt 27:15. The basis for the prohibition is given extensively in Dt

4:15–19. God has no form or likeness. To represent the Deity by any material object is to represent the Creator by his creation—and thus to limit him. In the words of Christ, God is spirit (Jn 4:24). Such teaching is unique in antiquity In all the excavations of Palestine no idol of Israel's God has ever been found.

2. Fellowship offerings (19:5–8) (cf. Dt 24:19–22; 27:18)

5–8 This is really a rule about eating the fellowship offering. The same thing is said in more detail in 7:15–18 (see comments on those verses). There it requires a thanksgiving fellowship offering to be eaten on the same day and allows other fellowship offerings to be eaten on the second day. That passage is a rubric for priests especially. The reason is clear. Meat quickly spoils without refrigeration. Meat that could not be eaten was to be promptly shared with others or else burned up.

3. Help of the unfortunate (19:9–14)

9–10 These verses are almost identical with 23:22. Chapter 19 has an added phrase referring to vineyards. Deuteronomy 24:19–22 gives the same law in different words. Deuteronomy 23:24–25 adds a further thought that a person may eat his fill in a neighbor's vineyard or field but must not carry anything away in a vessel. This last law, incidentally, is still followed among the Arabs of Palestine.

11 "Steal . . . lie . . . deceive" are standard ethical prohibitions given in the Ten Commandments and elsewhere. In this particular setting they may have special reference to defrauding the poor. The word "another" (GK 6660) is used only a dozen times—eleven in Leviticus and once in Zec 13:7. It is translated twice in the KJV as "another," once as "fellow," and nine times as "neighbor." It is handled similarly in the NIV, except "countryman" is used at 25:14–15.

12 Verse 12 probably sheds light on the third commandment, though the wording there is slightly different. To take the name of God in vain (KJV) is not merely to use it as a curse word but to invoke the name of God to support an oath that is not going to be kept. A false oath profanes the name of God as does idolatry (20:3) or violation of God's commands for worship (22:32).

13 Evidently hired servants, at least the poor, were paid daily (cf. Mt 20:1–8). To keep their wages until later would work a hardship. Deuteronomy 24:15 gives the explanation that the laborer is poor and needs his pay daily.

14 To curse the deaf might have been fine sport, for they could not hear the cursing! But God would hear, and he is the Protector of the unfortunate. Likewise, such a callous attitude toward the blind—and there was much blindness in antiquity—comes under God's condemnation. Again there is a parallel to the curse ritual of Dt 27:18.

4. Fairness and neighborly love (19:15–18)

15 Justice is not justice unless the scales of the balance swing even. King Jehoshaphat's instruction for his judges rather closely parallels this verse (see 2Ch 19:7). Deuteronomy 27:19 also treats this subject, recognizing, however, that it is usually the "alien, the fatherless or the widow" who gets the small end of justice. Nonetheless, partiality for the poor is also not justice.

16 The word for "slander" (GK 8215) is used also in Pr 11:13 and 20:19, where it is translated "gossip." The translation "slander" is preferable in each case (cf. Jer 6:28; 9:4; Eze 22:9, where slander and murder are again connected).

17 This significant verse shows that the OT law did not concern itself only with outward obedience. Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount was not giving a new spiritual meaning to the law, as is often supposed, for it already had the spiritual meaning in the OT. He was protesting against the Pharisaic interpretation of the law that limited it to externals.

18 Verse 18 is quoted often in the NT (Mt 5:43; 19:19; 22:39; Mk 12:31; Lk 10:27; Ro 13:9; Gal 5:14). From the passage in Luke, it seems that Jesus was not the first or only one to couple this verse with Dt 6:5 as the greatest commandments. The error of the lawyer who tempted Jesus was not that he did not know the law but that he did not apply it to himself. The law is plain and gives a noble teaching. As Paul says, it sums up the commandments of our duty to our fellow human beings. The same law is given requiring love for aliens in v.34.

The great parable on this verse is the story of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10:30–37). Its usual interpretation is that to love your neighbor is to help the unfortunate as the Good Samaritan did. Another view notes that the Good Samaritan is the hero of the story. Jesus asked who had become neighbor to the wounded man. The obvious answer is, the Samaritan. Then, Jesus implies, "Love the Samaritan." This the lawyer never did. He did not really keep the law and thus needed God's grace. This is somewhat more limited than the Levitical law that forbids revenge and anger against any "one of your people."

5. Forbidden mixtures (19:19) (cf. Dt 22:9–11)

19 The reason for these provisions is not clear but could refer to keeping pure a superior breed of cattle brought from Egypt. The reference to mixed seeds or cloth is difficult to understand without more background. It might be an effort to reduce adulteration of a good product. Mixing wheat and barley would make harvest difficult because of different times of ripening. Or possibly the prohibition is against using good seed mixed with weed seed.

Similar laws are given in Dt 22:9–11. In Deuteronomy the clothing mixtures are specified as wool and linen. Why these should not be mixed is not clear. Flax and wool are spun differently. Whether weaving them together was difficult for people of antiquity we cannot say. Or perhaps different threads in warp and woof would cause difficulties in washing—surely they would shrink differently. They also take dyes differently.

Regarding the prohibitions of mixtures in Dt 22:9–11, the first, about mixed seeds (v.9), is parallel with the second of Leviticus. The third of Deuteronomy, mixed cloth materials (v.11), is parallel with the third of Leviticus. One would expect the second of Deuteronomy ("Do not plow with an ox and a donkey yoked together," v.10) to be parallel with the first one of Leviticus ("Do not mate different kinds of animals"). The trouble is that Deuteronomy seems to speak of mismatching animals, Leviticus of mismating them.

Is Leviticus, however, so clear? Different kinds of animals just do not mate. The only exception is the horse and donkey, which produce the sterile mule. The mule was not forbidden in Israel. Mules are mentioned seventeen times in the OT, often in a favorable context (e.g., 1Ki 1:44). This law can hardly forbid mules. Either the Leviticus law refers to keeping breeds of cattle pure, or the usual translation is faulty.

"Do not mate different kinds of animals" is the NIV rendering. But the word for "mate" (GK 8061) means "lie down" (cf. Ps 139:3). It is only used elsewhere in Lev 18:23 and 20:16, where it refers to bestial relations. The word is an Aramaic cognate to the common Hebrew word that many times means "to lie down to rest." Once the word is used for a donkey fallen down under a burden (Ex 23:5). It is never used for copulation.

Possibly the figure in Lev 19:19 is not sexual at all but more naturally would forbid causing different animals to bear a load in such a way that it would be an unequal load under which they would fall. If this interpretation is adopted, the law would fit beautifully its parallel in Deuteronomy. Indeed, the LXX on Lev 19:19 can be read, "You shall not hold down your animals with an unequal yoke." The word "hold down" is rare and is translated here sexually by some, but its derivatives usually refer to "restraint" in general. We suggest, therefore, something like, "Do not make your animals fall down with an unequal yoke."

6. Protection of slave girls (19:20–22)

20–22 The expression "due punishment" (GK 1334) is troublesome. The situation could be reconstructed thus: a slave woman is betrothed to a man, i.e., is assigned in advance, but not yet given her freedom (the man presumably was a free man); and then a different man sleeps with her. In such a case normally the penalty was death. But the slave girl was presumed to be not free to resist or not so guarded by a father. So the penalty was not death, but she is not marriageable to the original man. Therefore, the original suitor must be reimbursed; the damages would be a fine (NIV, "due punishment") paid to the original suitor or slave owner. Then the moral offense would be dealt with by the sacrifice, and presumably the slave girl, after being freed, would be married to the second man.

7. Fallow fruit trees (19:23–25)

23–25 The common fruit trees of Palestine were the olive, fig, and date palm. The details of Israelite horticulture are unknown. Does this verse mean that fruit may be eaten in the fifth year of the tree or in the fifth year of its fruit bearing? Probably the latter. Olives are slow-growing trees. Date palms reach full maturity in thirty years but last for nearly two hundred years. The main idea, probably, is that the first three crops are light and that the firstfruits given to the Lord should be a good crop, such as would be borne in the fourth year.

8. Against heathen practices (19:26–31) (cf. Ex 22:18; Dt 18:9–13)

26 The emphasis and frequent prohibition of blood suggest that in this context eating blood or the flesh with the blood was a common heathen practice. The words for practicing divination and sorcery involved heathen worship. To engage in such practices was a capital offense (cf. Ex 22:18; Dt 18:9–13). In ancient Israel as a theocracy, false religion was not to be tolerated. Those who apostatized were free to leave. But those who were Israelites remained bound to Israel's religion. On the other hand, the errors of the English and the New England witch trials were multiple. The definition of witchery was wrong, the court procedure—extorting confession by torture—was poor, and, in any case, the state should have been kept separate from the church so that there would not have been civil trials for religious offenses.

27–28 There was nothing morally wrong with cutting the hair or the beard or with tattooing. But these practices then, and also now in some places, were parts of heathen ritual.

29 Probably in the context to degrade a daughter by making her a prostitute means to make her a religious harlot, a devotee of a heathen shrine.

30 The command to "observe my Sabbaths" is identical with 26:2 (see comments on that verse).

31 "Mediums" and "spiritists" were common and very degrading in the surrounding religions (see v.26).

9. Protection for the old, the stranger, and the poor (19:32–37) (cf. Dt 25:13–26)

32–34 Verse 32 seems to be unique in the Pentateuch, though it is implied in the fifth commandment that honor be given to parents. Proverbs 20:29 and 16:31 give similar thoughts. Verse 34 is a complement to v.18. The neighbor is not to be treated differently from the alien. Both are to be loved as ourselves because the Lord God loved Israel when she was a stranger in Egypt and us while we were yet sinners (Ro 5:8).

35–37 There are more ways to steal than by thievery. And the poor are usually the defenseless ones who suffer most. The emphasis on just weights and measures is given again in Dt 25:13–16 and finds an echo in Pr 11:1; 16:11; 20:10, 23. Without a central bureau of weights and measures, it was all too easy to cheat the poor. Exodus 30:13, 24 et al. show that the priests served to some extent as such a bureau of weights and measures. In Egypt we find examples of a "royal cubit." There the king established the standard. Genesis 23:16 appeals to common, well-known standards. God here reminds them of his constant presence and concern: "Keep . . . all my laws . . . I am the LORD."

F. Punishments for Various Sins (20:1–27)

1. Against the Molech cult (20:1–5)

1–5 The giving of children to Molech seems clearly to be human sacrifice and is strictly forbidden. It is mentioned in the OT in 2Ki 23:10; Jer 32:35 (in the days of Josiah and Jeremiah) and in 1Ki 11:7 (which, however, may be Milcom as in v.5 [cf. NIV note]). In the past it was supposed that the name was a false vocalization for melek ("king"; GK 4889), i.e., a divine king-idol, and that the consonants were mixed with the vowels for "shameful thing," which were written in by a later pious Jewish scribe. The deity Molech was equated with Melkar ("Melech of the city"), a deity of of the city ofTyre. The cult came later into northern Israel in force with Queen Jezebel.

Evidently the sacrifice of children was a dreadful reality among Israel's neighbors and a danger to Israel herself. A bystander is also guilty if he fails to inform on a neighbor performing this monstrous sacrifice (v.4).

2. Various sexual sins (20:6–21) (cf. Ex 21:17; 22:19; Dt 22:30; 27:20)

6 "Mediums and spiritists" are the same evil pair mentioned in 19:31; 20:27; and elsewhere. Verse 27 implies that the persons are inhabited by these evil spirits (lit., "in whom shall be a medium"). Isaiah 8:19 and the report of the witch of Endor (1Sa 28:3–11) show that these people claimed contact with the dead. Of course, this was common in the heathen religions.

7–8 Following the call to consecration, v.8 nicely associates the ideas of human responsibility—"Keep my decrees"—and divine grace—"I am the LORD, who makes you holy."

9 This verse is quoted in Mt 15:4 and Mk 7:10. Cursing one's parents was a capital offense (so also in Ex 21:17; cf. Pr 20:20). Also, striking one's parents was a capital crime (Ex 21:15); and a "stubborn and rebellious son," "a profligate and a drunkard," was to be stoned (Dt 21:18–21). This appears to be severe punishment. What parent would wish to have a son stoned to death for being "stubborn and rebellious"? It is probable that there is more to these verses than meets the eye.

The phrase "stubborn and rebellious" is applied to wayward sons in Dt 21:18. It is applied to Israel's apostasy from God in Ps 78:8 and Jer 5:23. From this we may surmise that the connotation of the phrases included apostasy and idolatry. As to the duty of parents to accuse such a son, the implication is that parents should not shield even their own children who descend to apostasy and black magic (cf. Dt 13:6–11).

Likewise, cursing father and mother here surely does not refer to the angry response that a child might give in a fit of temper. The word is widely used. It includes blaspheming the name of God (24:11–16). Shimei cursed David in open rebellion (2Sa 16:5–13). Gaal, the son of Ebed, cursed Abimelech (Jdg 9:27). Cursing in ancient times sometimes involved a malevolent operation of magic against the person cursed. The modern equivalent is to put a hex on someone. It could thus include an appeal to false religion. Such cursing of parents (or anyone in authority, Ex 22:28), if it were a determined and aggravated offense, was punishable by death. The place of this sin at the head of a list of sexual crimes may or may not be significant. Many times the laws recorded in the Pentateuch are not according to a system we would expect. It may be that the law has closer affinity with the law forbidding "mediums and spiritists" in v.6.

In vv.9–16 death is specified as the penalty. The method of execution was usually by stoning. This was the penalty for idolatry (Dt 13:10; 17:5; Lev 20:2, 27), adultery (Dt 22:21, 24), blasphemy (Lev 24:13–16), profligacy (Dt 21:21), and Sabbath breaking (Nu 15:35). Often the method of execution is not named. Burning (Ge 38:24) was apparently rare.

10 Compare 18:20. The law of Israel took very seriously the sacredness of marriage. Both parties who broke that bond were judged guilty of death. In Deuteronomy this law is put in connection with the one in Ex 22:16–17 on forcible rape of a betrothed or married woman. In such a case only the man was guilty and had to die.

11–12 Compare 18:8, 15 (cf. also Ex 22:19; Dt 22:30; 27:20). These more serious cases of incest received the death penalty. At first glance it seems that adultery would also be involved, and it may have been. More likely this refers to marriage after the death of the woman's husband.

13 Compare 18:22. Homosexuality was quite common among the Greeks of a later time. The Bible is emphatic that it is a serious sin. Here the death penalty is specified. The NT condemns homosexual acts as shameless perversion (Ro 1:27).

14 Compare 18:17. The Hebrew phrasing shows that marriage is under consideration, and this would be impossible with a wife and her mother unless the mother were widowed or divorced. Theoretically in a polygamous society such a marriage would be possible, but it was strictly forbidden as was also marriage with two sisters (18:18). As mentioned above, the reason for such prohibitions is reinforced by the necessity to keep the areas of family love and affection among children in the house from the overtones of possible sexual attraction that could lead to incest and promiscuity.

"Burned in the fire" is a peculiar provision. The method of execution is mentioned only two other times (Ge 38:24; Lev 21:9). In both cases it is punishment of grave harlotry. Evidently this type of incest was regarded as especially reprehensible.

15–16 Bestiality is mentioned also in 18:23. There it is forbidden; here it has the death penalty attached. Also in Ex 22:19 it is listed among capital offenses; and in Dt 27:21 it is included among the curses at Mount Ebal. The stories of the gods and goddesses of Ugarit frequently exhibit such practices. Israel's pagan neighbors probably followed their gods in these revolting practices.

17 Compare 18:9. This incest with a full or half-sister was forbidden but apparently did not receive the death penalty.

18 The prohibition of intercourse during menstruation was given earlier (15:19; 18:19; see comments on 18:19). It seems probable that here the phrase "cut off from their people" does not refer to execution.

19–21 These verses cite various cases of incest, all of which were covered in ch. 18. The penalties added here are minor and apparently are to be executed by divine providence. "They will be held responsible; they will be childless." See the discussion of levirate marriage on 18:16.

3. Exhortations to holiness (20:22–27)

The strong emphasis on holiness in these verses and this whole section of Leviticus is noteworthy. In the midst of an immoral age and in an era of false religion, the demands of Israel's God stood out in bright light.

22–23 To dwell securely in the Promised Land, it was necessary for the Israelites to shun "the customs of the nations." The word for "customs" (GK 2978) is literally "statutes." The morals and worship of the surrounding nations were low. Therefore, the Lord required Israel to be separated and different from them. He had cast out the Canaanites because they did all "these things," i.e., the incest, perversions, and immoralities referred to in the previous chapters. Israel was to be holy because the Lord is holy (v.26).

24 The expression "flowing with milk and honey" is used fourteen times in the Pentateuch and five times in the rest of the OT. It is, of course, symbolic of the agricultural plenty of Palestine. Palestine today is far from attractive, agriculturally speaking; the rainfall is seasonal, and the summers are dry. It is probable that a similar climate obtained in Moses' day, though the subject is debated. A little more rain would have made a great difference. At least a cover of trees would have better conserved the winter rains. The mention of honey is perhaps lost to modern ears. To us honey is a dispensable condiment. Then it was the only sweetener at hand.

25–26 In the midst of moral prescriptions and warnings on false religion, there is an emphasis again on the laws of cleanness. There is here a reminder that all God's laws for Israel were intertwined and all had a religious sanction. It is convenient to divide the laws into moral, ceremonial, and civil; but the Bible itself makes no such distinction. They were all God's laws and were given in wisdom for the regulation of the life and worship of his people.

27 The two words "medium" and "spiritist" usually go together (see v.6). In the Pentateuch they are forbidden in Lev 19:26, 31; 20:6, here; and Dt 18:11. The latter verse is the inclusive one and should be compared for discussion of the terms. Only in the present verse is the penalty assigned. Since all such practices involved pagan worship, the penalty naturally was death (see 19:26).

G. Special Holiness for Priests (21:1–22:16)

The thrust of this section is twofold: the office of a priest is holy, and the office is above the man. A "priest" (GK 3913) must be holy in body, upright in conduct, and ceremonially clean; for he is the representative of God. The OT priest was a type of Christ. We see this from the priest's work of mediation, which was nevertheless not perfect or final (cf. Heb 9). We see this also from the priest's official character: he was to be cleansed and more holy than other men. His perfection pointed to a perfect priesthood. We see the priesthood as a type of Christ, especially from the references to a Melchizedekian priesthood in Ps 110 and to a king-priest to come (mentioned in Ps 110; Zec 6:11–14).

1–4 To touch a dead body brought uncleanness for seven days (Nu 19:11). The prohibitions in this chapter include more than just touching the dead body of a friend. They also refer to visible signs of mourning. Aaron was not to tear his clothes in mourning even for his two sons (10:6). The case there, however, was somewhat different; for they had died under the judgment of God, and Aaron was the high priest (cf. v.11). The verses here allow mourning by an ordinary priest for death in the immediate family.

Curiously, the priest's wife is omitted in vv.2–3! Surely this omission is insignificant, and the wife is implied. The Hebrew word for "relative" means flesh-and-blood kin, and the degree of this relationship is here specified.

5–6 The practices of self-disfigurement were forbidden to all Israelites (19:27–28). They were apparently heathen signs of grief, which were forbidden to Israel and especially to Israel's priests (cf. 1Ki 18:28).

7–8 One special reason for the prohibition in v.7 is that there should be no question of paternity about the next generation of priests. For the same reason the high priest must marry a "virgin from his own people" (v.14).

9 On "burned in the fire," see 20:14. As the priest is to be holy, his family also is to be holy. Sin is more heinous on the part of those chosen by God for special service.

10–15 The phrase "the anointing oil poured on his head" designates the high priest and his sons who were called to a special sanctity of service. The anointing is commanded for Aaron in Ex 30:30, and the anointing of Aaron as high priest is recorded at Lev 8:12. There are not many references to the high priest (Heb.: "great priest") in the OT; Aaron is called simply "the priest" (Ex 31:10; Nu 25:11), as well as "chief priest" (or "high priest"; Nu 35:25, 28).

In v.10 and at Nu 35:25, the phrase "high priest" (GK 1524 & 3913) is explained as the anointed priest, which is the term used in Lev 4:3, 5; 6:22, and 16:32. The latter verse further qualifies this anointed priest as the high priest. In Nu 20:28 and Dt 10:6, the high priesthood was transferred from Aaron to his son Eleazer and in Nu 25:11 to Phinehas. Deuteronomy 26:3 refers to the "priest in office." Outside the Pentateuch the office is referred to using various terms; and prominent men like Eli, Jehoiada, and Hilkiah occupied it. The office gathered importance after the Exile, when the high priest eventually assumed governmental functions.

The curious provision that the priest must not "leave the sanctuary" is not clear. There were no living quarters in the tabernacle or its court. Actually the phrase is more general. It forbids the high priest from going away from the tabernacle on any business. It was a twenty-four-hour job! Numbers 3:38 says that Moses, Aaron, and his sons should encamp in front of the tabernacle to the east. After the temple was built, the officiating priests lived in the rooms built in three stories against the outside walls of the temple.

As explained above, a priest's children also were to be holy and above reproach. If the high priest married only a virgin from his own people, the legitimacy of his successor to the holy office could not be questioned.

16–24 It is difficult to translate some of the terms of these verses with certainty, but it is clear that the priest was to be physically perfect. This is an understandable provision for priests who stood in a public relation; but even more, as remarked earlier, it carries out the typology of Christ the perfect Priest.

Blindness was common in antiquity. With improper setting of broken bones as well as no way to correct birth defects, lameness was also common. "A crippled foot or hand" surely refers to common deformities when broken bones would have been poorly set. The word gibben (GK 1492) is used only here, but its derivation makes "hunch-backed" probable. The word daq (GK 1987) means "thing" or "small" and could refer to someone "dwarfed," though the evidence is scanty. "Eye defect" is literally "blurred or spotted in his eye," but what kind of defect is intended is beyond our information. "Festering . . . sore" is used only here and in similar contexts in 22:22 and Dt 28:27. Surely it refers to some long-continuing disease or scab. "Running sore" is used only here and at 22:22. The exact meaning is unsure.

The term translated "damaged testicles" is used only here, and the precise meaning is uncertain, though the word for "testicle" is clear from neighboring languages. If this is the correct reading, why was the ordinary word for eunuch not used? Perhaps because that word was not specific enough and was also applied to high court officials who were not eunuchs. Could a eunuch officiate as a priest? Clearly not. Deuteronomy 23:1 is translated similarly but has totally different Hebrew words and is subject to some obscurities. Leviticus 22:24 rejects castrated animals as offerings.

The unfortunate cripple in the priest's family could not serve in office but received his regular food like others of the family. He could even eat the most holy things, which shows that there was no superstitious or callous attitude inculcated toward the disabled person.

22:1–3 Chapter 22 continues the directions for sanctity and cleanliness that govern the priesthood. The translation "treat with respect" (GK 5692) is the verb from which the word "Nazirite" (GK 5693) is derived. A Nazirite not only kept away from certain things, he kept himself holy in respect to those things. In v.2, however, it seems that the priests were not to separate themselves from the sacrifices—which, after all, they were to offer—but were to consecrate those sacrifices, to treat them with respect. As the following verses explain, the priest was to keep the holy things inviolate when he himself had some uncleanness.

4–8 The standard causes of uncleanness listed in vv.4–5 have been given before. The emphasis is further given that an unclean priest not only must not minister but also must not eat of the holy offerings. The unclean priest should bathe and be unclean the rest of the day. He would again be clean "when the sun goes down." The Hebrew day then, as now, began at sundown. This was usual in the Orient. The Romans began the day at midnight.

9 It was no small matter to be a priest of God. The institution was divine and not to be trifled with. The judgment on Nadab and Abihu was supernatural, as it later was on Korah and his company (Nu 16). On the other hand, the judgment on Eli's sons was providential. Many a faithless priest escaped catastrophe in his lifetime, but the threat of judgment was always there.

10–13 The definition of an "outsider" (GK 2424) is interesting. He was a temporary visitor or worker. The slave was considered family. The principle is that an outsider should not eat of the holy things. A married daughter with a nonpriest husband was no longer in the priest's family. A widow or divorced daughter with children might bring a stranger's children into the family. This was not allowed. But a priest's daughter without children would revert to her childhood status.

14–16 To "eat a sacred offering by mistake" would be one of the sins that required the guilt offering. There too a 20 percent penalty was specified (cf. 5:16).

Verses 15–16 are somewhat obscure. The meaning chosen by the NIV is that these verses oblige the priests to enforce the rules against the practice of the sacred portions being eaten by the people who offered them. This unites vv.15–16 with the preceding verses. The KJV seems to take v.15 to require the priests to maintain their sanctity, and v.16 requires the priests to preserve the people from profaning the holy things. The NIV reading seems to fit the context better.

H. Perfection Required in Sacrifices (22:17–33)

The principle of a perfect sacrifice has been already stated at Lev 1:3. It is emphasized here with details. Other laws on the subject are in Dt 15:21 and 17:1. Malachi reproached the people after the Exile for offering their worthless and blemished animals (though the words he used are somewhat different). He complained that Israel offered to the Lord animals that would not be acceptable for taxes and that their God, the "great king, . . . the LORD Almighty," was displeased (Mal 1:14).

17–25 Numbers 15:14–15 says that if an alien wishes to join in worship, he must do so in the same way as the Israelite. The "alien" (GK 1731) was probably not just a visitor. He was a foreigner living temporarily in Israel without full rights. Abraham was a sojourner (alien) among the Canaanites. He has been likened to a man having taken out first papers for citizenship. Doubtless the legal status of an alien varied over the centuries.

The word "defect" (GK 4583) is the same one used in 21:18. It is defined in the context as well as by common sense. If the offering was to mean anything, it should be an offering of perfection. As the priesthood symbolized Christ the Perfect Priest, so the offering symbolized Christ the Perfect Sacrifice.

As at 21:18, the words "blind, the injured or the maimed" are sometimes obscure. The words "blind" and "injured" are obvious. The word "maimed" probably means "cut." The word "warts" is used only here, but similar words suggest a running sore (see 21:20).

At 7:15–16 the fellowship offerings are divided into thanksgiving, votive, and voluntary or "freewill offerings." Here it is explained that a stunted or overgrown animal (if not diseased or blemished) can be used for a freewill offering regardless of its market value. However, an offering made in consequence of a vow would require the standard market value of a standard animal. The words "deformed" and "stunted" are uncertain, but the general sense is clear. These animals are not normal in growth, but neither are they diseased. They are all right for some purposes.

There is no word here in the Hebrew for "testicles." There may be truth in the translation, however, that would forbid the offering of an emasculated animal. The LXX takes it so.

Animals purchased from a foreigner were apparently not forbidden as sacrifice, but such purchased animals as were defective were unacceptable. Deuteronomy 15:21–22 explains that defective animals may be eaten for food at home but must not be offered to the Lord.

26–33 The reason for the law in v.27 is not entirely clear. But even today newborn calves are not usually slaughtered. The meat improves with age. Also, it probably is better for the mother that the calf not be taken at once. We might add that to transport a calf under a week old for some distance to the tabernacle or temple would likely in some cases kill the calf.

Similar provisions to v.28 are found in the thrice-repeated law, "You shall not boil a kid in its mother's milk" (Ex 23:19; 34:26; Dt 14:21), and also in the law not to kill a mother bird with her young (Dt 22:6–7). The provisions are curious. To boil a kid in its mother's milk is probably a Canaanite ritual, and this heathen practice was therefore to be avoided. It is barely possible that Dt 22:6–7 gives the key. Those verses forbid the killing of the mother bird when the young are taken. The mother bird is easily caught with her fledglings, but then the goose that lays the golden egg is killed. The mother must be preserved so that the species will not become extinct. Possibly the thrust of the phrase "on the same day" is general and means "at the same time." The mother cow especially should not be slaughtered just when she "comes in fresh" with plenty of milk.

"That same day" is slightly different from the phrase in v.28; it repeats the law of 7:15. Leviticus 19:5 gives the general law of the fellowship offerings. Repeatedly in this section the character of God is given as the basis of his will for Israel. Verse 33 (as Ex 20:1) also gives the basis of God's saving work in bringing Israel out of Egypt. Because he has redeemed us, and because he is the holy God, therefore we are bound to keep his commandments.

VII. The Feasts and Worship of the Lord (23:1–24:9)

A. Introduction (23:1–2) (cf. Ex 23:10–17; 34:18–23; Nu 28:9–29:39; Dt 15:1–16:17)

1–2 A directory for Israel's worship would not be complete without a catalog of the annual feasts. Leviticus has so far given the rules for offerings, ordination of priests, public health, and personal holiness. Now the religious ceremonial seasons are given. The emphasis is on the things the general public would need to know. Numbers 28–29 is more technical and for the use of the priests. Two feasts celebrated by Jews today do not appear in these Pentateuchal lists because their origin was much later—Purim, which was established in Esther's day, and Hanukkah, which celebrates the rededication of the temple in 165 B.C., after it had been desecrated by the Syrian invaders. Of the five major feasts, three required the presence of all grown men at the tabernacle, later at the temple (Ex 23:17; 34:23; et al.). These are often called the pilgrimage festivals. They were the special times when offerings would be brought in great numbers.

B. The Sabbath (23:3)

3 All the festivals are properly called Sabbaths, but the weekly Sabbath gains great emphasis in the Pentateuch and many other places in Israel's instruction and history (cf. Ex 20:8–11; 23:12; 31:12–17; 34:21; 35:2; Nu 15:32–36; 28:9–10; Dt 5:12–15). The basis for the Sabbath is God's Creation activity. It might indeed be that God ordained the weekly Sabbath on the basis of Creation to protect the Israelite from the pagan unlucky days associated with moon worship in the surrounding cultures. At least the Sabbath is never called unlucky or sinister as in the Assyrian tablets. It is a "holy convocation" (KJV) or day of "sacred assembly" (see 19:3).

C. The Passover and Firstfruits (23:4–14)

4–5 The Passover was probably the greatest feast of the year, commemorating as it did the deliverance from Egyptian bondage (cf. Ex 12:14–20; 43–49; 23:14–15; 34:18; Nu 9:1–14; 28:16–25; Dt 16:1–8). In type it represents Christ our Passover sacrificed for us (1Co 5:7). The Jews today, because of the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70, celebrate the Passover using only a dry bone instead of the paschal lamb. The ancient Passover ritual, like most all of the other sacrifices, emphasizes redemption through the blood of the slain lamb. It was against this background that John the Baptist proclaimed Christ as "the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!" (Jn 1:29). The Jews today celebrate the Passover far differently from the OT regulations. The Jewish liturgy changed greatly at A.D. 70.

For "at twilight" the Hebrew has "between the evenings." This curious phrase is explained, however, in Dt 16:6 as "in the evening, when the sun goes down."

6–8 More details on the Feast of Unleavened Bread are given elsewhere (cf. esp. Ex 12; Dt 16). In the latter passage unleavened bread is called the "bread of affliction" (Dt 16:3). It commemorated the fact that the Israelites left Egypt in haste with no time to let their dough rise. The Passover and the time of Unleavened Bread were so closely intertwined that in the NT the whole week is called the Passover (Ac 12:3–4; cf. Jn 19:14). Directions for the special sacrifices to be offered on this and on the other feast days are given in Nu 28–29.

9–14 Allied to Passover and Unleavened Bread was the Feast of Firstfruits celebrated at the same time. The firstfruits at Passover would be barley, which ripens in the warmer areas as early as March.

The presentation of the sheaf "on the day after the Sabbath" symbolized the dedication of the whole year's crop; and until this was done, none of the new grain was to be eaten. In Nu 28:27 other offerings are specified for this day; but as the context shows, they are the standard offerings for every day of Unleavened Bread. This "burnt offering" is an extra one for the firstfruits ceremony.

An "ephah" was about three-fifths of a bushel. Two-tenths would be about four quarts (dry measure; see 5:11). The value of the "hin" is possibly about one gallon (see ZPEB, 5:916). A "quarter of a hin" would then be about a quart. The name "drink offering" (GK 5821) is a misnomer. The Hebrew word refers to pouring. The drink offering was never drunk but was poured out over the sacrifice at a holy place (Ge 35:14; Nu 28:7; 2Ki 16:15).

D. The Feast of Weeks (23:15–22)

15–21 The Feast of Weeks is called the Feast of Harvest in Ex 23:16 and the "firstfruits of the wheat harvest" in Ex 34:22 (cf. Nu 28:26–31; Dt 16:9–12). It always occurred on the first day of the week and fell seven weeks and one day after the Sabbath after the full moon of the Passover (14 Nisan). From the day after the Passover Sabbath to the day after the Pentecost Sabbath is "fifty days" by inclusive reckoning, counting both the first and last days. It would therefore be around the end of May to mid-June.

It should be remembered that there is a wide latitude of seasons in Palestine from the seacoast to the mountains to the Jordan Valley. This feast was a dedication of the wheat harvest to the Lord. Special sacrifices were specified. The fellowship offering was normally prepared without yeast. Here in v.17 it is different. It is the first part of the harvest prepared as a Hebrew housewife would prepare it. The "seven male lambs" and other offerings were to sanctify Israel and cleanse her anew for the new season's work and rejoicing.

All the males were to appear at the tabernacle; but, in this time when the harvest was beginning, they would not stay long. The NT antitype to this feast is Pentecost, which was, as a consequence, on Sunday, and was the day of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in a new phase of God's saving work extending the harvest to the Gentiles also.

22 This rule is appropriate for a harvest festival. In all Israel's life, the poor in Israel were helped and protected. Christians should search their hearts to be sure they have a similar attitude toward the unfortunate in our day. There is much talk of the church's duty to the poor. It is obvious that in a time of famine, emergency, or tragedy, no Christian should withhold his means if he or she is able to help. Still, the NT examples and teaching emphasize the church's duty toward the poor in the church (Ac 6:1; 11:29; 24:17; 1Ti 4:9–10). The law on gleaning with mention also of the treatment of vineyards is stated in 19:9–10.

E. The Feast of Trumpets (23:23–25)

It is interesting that this ancient fall feast was not given the extra emphasis that its equivalent, the New Year (Rosh Hashanah), is given among Jews today. Neither was the New Year given the emphasis that it had in Babylon, where it was a week-long celebration. This feast was a one-day celebration with special sacrifices, and that was all. Actually, the phrase Rosh Hashanah occurs only once in the OT (Eze 40:1), where it is used of the "beginning of the year" (NIV) without reference to what month is in question; and it just as well could be in the spring. The Hebrew year began in the spring (Ex 12:2). The "turn of the year" of Ex 34:22 and the "going out of the year" of Ex 23:16 need not mean the "end of the year" but only the turn of the season (cf. below).

23–25 Every new moon in Israel began with a special celebration marked by blowing the trumpets (Nu 10:10; 28:11; Ps 81:3; et al.) and by offering special sacrifices (Nu 28:11–15). It was of some importance for business as well as for religious observances for the new month to be fixed definitely, and this announcement was made by the priests with the blowing of trumpets. Since a lunar month is twenty-nine and a half days long, there is some possibility for variation in the calendar. Probably, as in surrounding nations, the decision to start a new month was arrived at partly by observation, partly by calculation. It is not improbable that the beginnings of the months of Israel were integrated with the dates decided by the surrounding nations, at least in later years. It seems clear that the blowing of trumpets reechoed the signal across the hills of Palestine. It was helpful to know when the seventh month started since it included important religious festivals. The prescribed offering for the Feast of Trumpets is given in Nu 29:1–6.

F. The Day of Atonement (23:26–32)

26–32 The Day of Atonement has been discussed in connection with the ritual prescribed for it in Lev 16 (cf. Lev 16:1–34; Nu 29:7–11). It was to be a day of fasting. People were to remain in their houses and remember that on this day their high priest was to enter the Most Holy Place bearing the name of their tribe on his breastpiece. Verse 32 underlines the fact that any of the annual feasts could also be called a Sabbath. There seems to be no special reason why the tenth of the month was chosen for this Sabbath. It was a proper and convenient time for repentance and spiritual preparation for the Feast of Tabernacles of the following week.

G. The Feast of Tabernacles (23:33–44)

33–44 The Feast of Tabernacles (or Booths; cf. Ex 23:16; 34:22; Nu 29:12–40; Dt 16:13–17) is also called the Feast of Ingathering "at the end of the year" (Ex 23:16). As noted above, this does not necessarily mean the end of the calendar year—just as we have other years: school years, fiscal years, etc. The usual expression "turn of the year" always means "spring" (2Sa 11:1 = 1Ch 20:1; 1Ki 20:22, 26; 2Ch 36:10). The present Jewish new year starts in the fall, but the biblical text nowhere calls this Rosh Hashanah (head of the year). The biblical new year began in the spring. From these references some have concluded that there were two new years in Israel—spring and fall—but the fall new year is probably a later Jewish development.

Like Passover and the Feast of Weeks, Tabernacles was a pilgrimage festival when all the men were to appear at the tabernacle or temple. Of course, in many cases the whole family came. The offerings are detailed in Nu 29. A peculiar feature is that the burnt offering on the first day of the feast includes thirteen bulls and that each subsequent day the number is reduced by one until the last day, when seven bulls are offered (Nu 29:13–32). The other offerings stayed the same in number every day.

Autumn was a convenient time to bring an offering from the year's harvest. Even the grapes, olives, and dates would have been ripe by then. The weather would have been mild and clear, ideal for the temporary stay in booths. There is a problem in v.40 in the relation of fruit and branches. It is probable that eating the good fruit of fruit trees was part of the festivities of rejoicing during the eight days. The waving of the palms and branches, perhaps in processions, would be another part of the rejoicing. The branches were used in any case to make the booths (Ne 8:15–17).

The feast was a reminder of the Exodus from Egypt and the long trek to Sinai with the people living in tents. It would in future days be a reminder of the simple desert life when they walked with God at their head. The Hebrew name is Sukkoth, which in modern Hebrew is changed in pronunciation to Sukkos.

In contrast to the fast and repentance of the Day of Atonement, the Feast of Booths was an occasion of joy—a thanksgiving day (cf. Zec 14:16–19). Indeed, it is clear that when the Puritans proclaimed their Thanksgiving Day in New England, they had in mind the OT harvest festival.

H. The Care of the Lampstand (24:1–4)

1–4 In a sense this section, like ch. 8, is a complement to the book of Exodus. Exodus 25:31–40 has the directions for making the seven-branched lampstand; 37:17–24 records Moses' having made the lampstand. Then Ex 27:20–21 gives directions for the care of the light. Here in vv.1–4 these directions are to be carried out. The wording of this section (vv.2–4) is almost identical to that in Ex 27:20–21. This is not surprising if we recognize that Leviticus is part of the larger structure of the Pentateuch. Many times in Ex 35–40 the description of the building of the tabernacle and its furniture is almost word for word the same as the instruction for its building in Ex 25–29.

The fire on the altar was never to go out. But it seems from the phrase "from evening to morning" and the similar one in Ex 27:21 that the lamps were to burn every night but not through the day. This arrangement may explain the statement in 1Sa 3:3: "The lamp of God had not yet gone out," i.e., it was toward morning but still dark. On the meaning of "Testimony," see comment on 16:13.

I. The Bread of the Presence (24:5–9)

5–9 This is the only place where the details of the offering of the bread of the Presence are given (cf. Ex 25:30; 40:23). It was the priests' grain offering. It was set out before the Lord every Sabbath and eaten at the end of the week. Presumably it was hard baked and would not spoil in the interim. On the other hand, the text does not strictly say that the bread would stay on the table a week. It may have been taken off at a convenient time—after the Sabbath was over—and eaten by the priests. This is the background of the famous incident when David ate the consecrated bread (1Sa 21:6; cf. Mt 12:4).

"Two-tenths of an ephah" is about four quarts of flour (the ephah being about twenty quarts), which seems to be an impossibly large amount for each loaf or cake. Actually, the Hebrew says "two-tenths" to each cake. The measure is not specified. Probably some smaller measure like the seah (five quarts) or the omer (four pints) is intended. The flat, round, pancakelike loaf of bread would not take very much flour.

"Along each row put some pure incense" is a better translation than KJV's "upon each row." The incense was not eaten, for it is not edible. It was burned with the "memorial portion" of the bread. The meaning of the ritual, like the ordinary grain offering, surely includes communion as the bread was eaten before the Lord in the Holy Place.

VIII. Identical Laws for the Stranger and the Israelite (24:10–23)

10–23 Not much of Leviticus is narration. The whole year's stay at Sinai is told in a few chapters in Exodus and Numbers. But the incident of the son of Shelomith gave rise to legislation and therefore finds a place in Leviticus. His offense was plain and called for execution, just as if he had been an Israelite. His father was one of the mixed multitude who went out with the Israelites, probably because he had married a woman of the tribe of Dan.

Just what the crime was is hard to say. It may well have been more than thoughtless profanity. The Hebrew does not have the Tetragram (YHWH, "LORD"; GK 3378) here at v.11 or at the end of v.16. It is, however, at the beginning of v.16. Clearly the sacred Name is intended. The word "curse" (GK 7837) is used when Balak hired Balaam to curse Israel so that he might conquer the nation. The man may have engaged in some curse procedure to injure his opponent by a kind of hex in the name of the Lord, or it may have been an angry cursing of the Israelite man and his God. Blasphemy, of course, was strictly forbidden and punishable by death. The man was stoned.

The decision in the case established the principle that one who lived in Israel's company was counted as an adherent of their faith. The alien already had been made subject to Israel's laws of offering and cleanliness (17:8–15). Likewise, the alien enjoyed the protection of the law (Ex 23:9). But the sojourner who blasphemed would have to pay the extreme penalty.

The stoning of the blasphemer is taken as the occasion for the summation of the principles of justice. Here again the principle of lex talionis or retaliation is stated as a form of justice. The principle similarly appears in Ex 21:23–25 and Dt 19:21. Christ quoted the law in Mt 5:38–42 and seems to have opposed it, though he was actually not contradicting the OT but was denouncing the Pharisaic use of these verses to justify personal revenge.

It is another question whether this law was taken literally or is an emphatic statement of the principle that the punishment must fit the crime. If a man killed a beast, his own beast was not killed (v.21). There is no example in the OT of a judge exacting literally an eye for an eye. The usual penalties of Hebrew law were capital punishment for a limited number of serious offenses and fines and restitution for the remainder. There were no prisons in the early days, and none is mentioned in the Pentateuchal legislation. Apparently we have here an emphatic legal idiom meaning that the punishment must be commensurate with the offense.

IX. Laws of Land Use (25:1–55)

There are three subdivisions to this section: the sabbatical year, the Jubilee, and the laws of indebtedness. The basis of the land laws God gave to Israel is his statement that "the land is mine" (v.23). When Joshua conquered Palestine, the land was divided by sacred lot, not secured by individual military prowess. The people, therefore, could not sell their land. Society was agricultural; and the farms belonged, under God, to the people in perpetuity. The question was, How do you keep such a system working? The constant tendency is for the rich to increase their holdings at the expense of the poor. To obviate this danger the Lord instituted a land reform of return to the old homestead every fifty years. Actually, the Jubilee was one of the first land reforms known in history.

The sabbatical year likewise was a humane and advanced social program. Imagine all debts forgiven and slaves released every seven years! Ingrained into Israel's laws and faith was a concern for the poor and unfortunate. It is observable in many of the laws already noticed and is made most emphatic in this chapter. It is not by accident that v.10 of this chapter is the motto on the Liberty Bell that hangs in front of Independence Hall in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

A. The Sabbatical Year (25:1–7)

1–7 The sabbatical year is mentioned also in Ex 23:10–11 and Dt 15:1–18. In the former passage, however, it is described as a year to leave the land fallow (as here in Lev 25) without the year being specifically named. In the Deuteronomy passage the year is described as a year of canceling debts and freeing slaves, not as a year of rest from the tillage of the land. However, in Ex 23:11 the NIV has "let the land lie unplowed." It appears from the combination of these two ideas that the seventh year was both a fallow year for the land and a year of canceling debts. For the further matter of liberating slaves, see the Jubilee below.

As far as Moses knew at this time, the occupation of Canaan would begin in a few months, and Israel would begin this program of land tenure at once. Though Israel was in the wilderness, she was looking toward a settled condition within a year, similar to what they had known in Egypt—without the slavery! The adoption of such a law does not imply that the legislation is late, long years after the Conquest. Indeed, v.2 says it is a law adopted to cover future circumstances.

The terminology "the land itself must observe a sabbath" apparently comes from the weekly Sabbath that was already in force. The emphasis of the Sabbath was the resting. The land "I am going to give you" (notice the proprietorship) will have its rest as well. Presumably no one then knew why this would be good for the land. Principles of crop rotation were not known, and God did not give them such advanced wisdom. But he did give them the idea of the land lying fallow, and he gave it religious sanction. Seemingly no other nation had any custom like this.

Verse 5 at first appears to contradict v.4. The solution seems to be that there is to be no normal work of harvest or grape-gathering that would involve servants and include storage. It was all right to eat and gather directly from the fields (v.11), but regular harvest work was forbidden. The idea was twofold. First, the produce of the sixth year would be so abundant because of the Lord's blessing that there would be a surplus. Second, the natural produce of the land would feed the poor (Ex 23:11). It would even give wildlife a chance to repopulate itself. The natural crop would be public property.

There is an additional reason for the sabbatical year that does not appear in this chapter. In the Feast of Booths of the sabbatical year, the law was to be read to the people. The whole nation was to have a short-term Bible institute (Dt 31:10–13). There would be opportunities for other instruction during the rest of this vacation year.

B. The Jubilee (25:8–34)

8–12 The word "Jubilee" (GK 3413) means "blowing the ram's horn," which was done in announcing the year. Thus the root occurs also in the name Jubal, the father of musicians (Ge 4:21). The identifying name Jubilee occurs only in Leviticus and in Nu 36:4. But the idea of release of those enslaved for debt occurs, not only at v.10, but also at Isa 61:1; Jer 34:8, 15, 17; and Eze 46:17. From this word the idea of celebration has come into English, especially the celebration of a fiftieth anniversary.

In v.8 the Hebrew is "seven sabbaths" of years, not "seventy sevens" as in Dan 9:24–27, though there too the word "seven" is used for a sabbatical-year period. Probably it was well that the announcement came "on the Day of Atonement," that solemn day of contrition. Otherwise many a hard-hearted, rich Israelite would have refused the obligations of the release. Indeed, the Jubilee and sabbaticals were not always observed (2Ch 36:21). It was suggested above that the new moon trumpet reechoed through the land as others took up the signal of the start of a new moon. Here, clearly, there was such an arrangement for the word to get around.

It seems rather impractical to have had two fallow years in succession, namely, the forty-ninth and the fiftieth, though, of course, God could have simply compounded the blessing for the forty-eighth year. A suggestion to relieve the problem comes from the Book of Jubilees. This book, written perhaps about 200 B.C., is a reworking of Genesis with every event dated. The dates are counted from Creation and are given in terms of jubilees, sabbaticals, years, months, and days. But the Jubilees are only forty-nine years long. This may have been a mistake on the part of the author of Jubilees, or it may give a clue to a better translation of v.10. Just as seven weeks from Sunday to Sunday is called fifty days by inclusive reckoning in 23:15–16, so in the present sense the last of the forty-nine years might be called the fiftieth year by inclusive reckoning.

"To proclaim liberty" for the slaves was characteristic of every sabbatical year. The return to the family homestead was a special feature of the Jubilee. The word for "liberty" (GK 2002) is used in Jer 34:8–17 of the freeing of slaves in the sabbatical year. The inference is as suggested above, that the seventh sabbatical year was the Jubilee.

13–17 The arrangement for buying or selling considering the number of years since the Jubilee was simple. A field that could be possessed forty years before the Jubilee was worth more than one that would be possessed only ten years. A man might speculate in land for temporary advantage, but no family could be permanently disadvantaged. In all this social legislation, successful operation really must proceed on the basis of the cooperation of the citizens. And Israel's regard for the poor was supported by the knowledge that the Lord is God and that he has respect for the poor (Ex 22:27).

In a sense Israel had a kind of communism. The wealth was partially redivided every few years. But it is unfair to call this communism, just as it is inaccurate to call the communal living of the early church communism. It was a communal sharing that works well in a family where all have the strongest ties of love and interest. Even in families the system breaks down if the common bond is not there. Israel, like the early church, was a community of people united in worship of the true God and sanctified in him. In times of revival, at least, the bulk of Israel's citizens would have been God-fearing men and women who earnestly desired to obey God's law.

18–28 The success of laws such as these depended on the people's obedience; but the system still would not work except for the special blessing of God, who owned both the land and the people and had his sovereign purposes for both. Verse 21 underlines the importance of the providential blessing of God. It was doubtless good for the land to lie fallow one year. God would bless an obedient nation with rains, and pests would cease under his hand. Unfortunately the nation turned to other gods, and God vacated the land until it had "enjoyed its sabbath rests" (2Ch 36:21).

Verses 23–24 spell out the details of the Jubilee. There are certain exceptions and special regulations. The NIV's "must not be sold permanently" presents well the idea of the Hebrew text. This law of land reform is perpetual, but the land when sold was to be sold for a limited time only, not permanently. Not only was the land to return to its original family in the Jubilee, but a man who had been forced to sell his land out of necessity could buy it back at any time that he could raise the money. If his near kin could do it, he should. If the man's fortunes increased, he could do it himself (cf. the book of Ruth).

29–31 To "refund the balance" is to pay back the price of the field at the later date, which would be less than the price at the earlier date. The translation "balance" is more accurate than the RSV's "overpayment" or KJV's "overplus."

The city is different from the country. To live in a walled city was a privilege, not a right. Real estate in the walled city was at a premium. Its value was not just its land but the improvements in terms of house and fortifications. A man temporarily in need could sell the house and redeem it in a year, but after that time the buyer was protected. As explained in v.16, when a man sold his farm, he was selling so many crops until the Jubilee. In contrast to walled cities, the villages, which were unrestricted in extent, were counted in with their respective fields. They were released in the Jubilee.

32–34 The point of v.32 is that many, if not all, of the Levitical cities listed in Jos 21 were walled, where normally the right of redemption was limited to one year. Levites usually did not have any property outside these cities. Thus, except for this provision, the Levites eventually could have lost their cities and, therefore, all their holdings. But in these cities the Levites could redeem their property at any time.

The Hebrew of v.33 is somewhat involved, but the total meaning is clear. No Levitical house can be bought in perpetuity. It will go out in the Jubilee.

C. Protection of the Poor (25:35–55)

In this section there are three cases that are covered by the Mosaic law on loans (cf. Ex 22:25; Dt 23:19–20). Usually they have been treated as (1) loans without interest, (2) indentured servitude for debt, and (3) indentured servitude to an alien.

35–38 "Help him" is not a proper translation of the Hebrew, which literally says, "you shall seize him." The supposition is that a creditor has seized his debtor like a resident alien while he works off the debt. While the debtor was working off the debt, he himself served as a pledge for its payment, and no further interest or second interest could be charged. That would be "excessive" interest or usury. Verse 36 is a conclusion to v.35. If you seize him, you will not make further charges but must treat him like a brother. The implication is that it is wrong to treat him like a resident alien. After enslavement no further interest should accrue. Otherwise the poor man could never work off his debt. The word "interest" (GK 5968) is from the root "to bite." The rate of interest mentioned in Ne 5:10–11 is 1 percent—probably 1 percent a month.

Verses 36–37 do not forbid a loan to the poor man, for Ex 22:25–27 pictures a loan to a poor man with his garment as collateral. (Or was it really not collateral but a token that was taken before witnesses and restored promptly?) The passage in Dt 24:10–13 on pledges specifies that the creditor could not enter a house to choose the pledge he desired. The pledge chosen by the borrower must be accepted by the creditor, then recorded and restored promptly. In case of default, temporary enslavement would result. It seems strange in such a context to assume that no interest at all could be charged. But in any case, no excessive interest could be charged—interest beyond the usual regulations. The poor were to be protected.

39–46 The situation in v.39 is similar to that in v.35, only more extreme. The two verses begin with exactly the same words. In this instance a man has no credit to obtain a loan. His case is hopeless, and he takes the initiative. But he has his rights; he is not a slave. "A hired worker or a temporary resident" is perhaps better translated "resident laborer," i.e., not a resident alien.

The notice "until the Year of Jubilee" would apply equally well to case 1 of v.35, if that man's debt were not worked off before the Year of Jubilee. The mention of "resident laborers" brings up the contrasting positions of "slaves." Hebrews could not be enslaved by their compatriots. Slaves of the nations were permitted, and these were not released in the Jubilee. The most that could be exacted of a brother Israelite was indentured servitude. Of course, slaves too had their rights. Indeed, a runaway slave was not to be returned to his master (Dt 23:15). This would tend greatly to affect a master's attitude toward his slaves.

47–55 "An alien or a temporary resident" who bought a Hebrew slave did so under the stipulations of Hebrew law. The redemption of such a slave was a kinsman's duty. Or the slave might grow rich and redeem himself. This says a good bit about the relative independence of such a slave. His time with his owner was counted like that of a hired servant. In any event, the slave with his children would be freed at the Jubilee. Of course, if a man died in slavery, his children would not be slaves forever. They would benefit by the Jubilee.

Verse 55 is remarkably like the thought of Col 4:1. All Israelites were God's servants. They therefore should be compassionate masters—an attitude that Christians should remember even though the institution of physical slavery is happily over.

X. Warnings Against Apostasy (26:1–46)

A. Conditions of Blessing (26:1–13)

This chapter has strong affinities with Dt 28–30 (cf. esp. Dt 28:1–14; 30:1–10). It is a solemn reinforcement of the preceding laws with an appeal to Israel to obey God's laws and so be blessed rather than to turn away to disaster. The warnings in Dt 28–30 are more extensive than the promises, but the chapters end with a reminder of God's enduring mercy and the ancient covenants he made with the patriarchs.

The conditions given here are only summarized. The things specified are avoiding idols, keeping the Sabbath, and revering the sanctuary (vv.1–2). Beyond that the broad statement is "Obey my commands" (v.3). The promises, which are emphatic and detailed, largely concern material blessings; but the crowning spiritual blessing—"I will walk among you and be your God, and you will be my people"—is included (v.12; cf. Jer 30:22; Hos 2:23; et al.).

The physical blessings and curses characterize Israel's establishment as a nation. Even in God's dealings with the patriarchs, the promised material blessings were largely not for the present. Abraham died only having seen the promises afar off (cf. Heb 11:13). He owned only a sepulcher in the Promised Land. Abraham grew rich, but Isaac probably grew poor; and Jacob certainly had a hard life. Material blessings such as favorable rains, health, peace, etc., were appropriate promises for Israel as a nation living in one area with unified culture, laws, and worship. In other situations the people of God shared the common lot of human beings. God sends his "rain on the righteous and the unrighteous" (Mt 5:45). Today when God punishes a nation with war, the innocent must suffer with the guilty.

1–5 The ban on idols is sharp and pervasive throughout the OT. The reason is plainly given in Dt 4:15–19. God has no form and is not a part of his creation. Any material god is less than God. The prohibition of idolatry was so emphatic that ancient Israel made no images of God, at least as far as archaeological evidence goes. The idols that Israel worshiped were of the heathen gods. The word for "idols" (GK 496) is a word of scorn ("worthless things"). The word for "image" (GK 7181) is a general word for any image constructed or sculptured of wood, stone, metal, etc. The word "sacred stone" (GK 5167) refers to a monumental stone stele or slab with or without inscription. Some such monuments apparently associated with the temple of Baal Berith in Shechem (Jdg 9:6, 46) have been found.

The word for "carved stone" (GK 74) is less certain but refers to some kind of sculptured figure. It may be added that the absence of idols was wonderful for the advancement of faith, though it is troublesome to the archaeologist. Much can be learned of the surrounding cultures' religion, history, and art by the carved work that often bears inscriptions. Palestine digs are sadly (or happily) lacking in these idolatrous materials.

As mentioned in the comments on ch. 23, the Sabbaths include the set feasts as well as the weekly Sabbath. The word "sanctuary" (lit., "holy place"; GK 5219)) is used many times in the OT from Ex 15:17 on and usually refers to the tabernacle or the later temple. Verse 2 repeats 19:30, but here it serves well as a summary of God's will for his worship.

Significantly, the first blessing mentioned is "rain." Palestine is water conscious. In those days farmers and housewives were totally dependent on the rain and the perennial springs. There are two views of the amount of rainfall in antiquity. The first argues that the climate in Palestine has greatly changed, while the other argues that it has not. Actually, Jerusalem has about the same average annual rainfall as London. But in Palestine the rain is all concentrated in the months from October to April. If the rains have a good spread, i.e., including early and latter rains, then crops grow well. Also forestation and irrigation can conserve the water for a longer growing season. It was a very small matter for the Lord to give better rains and rains spread out in a better way so as to bless a faithful nation.

It would be quite a harvest that would last from June to September! Actually, with ancient methods of harvesting and threshing, this may not have been much hyperbole for a really good year (cf. Am 9:13).

6–8 There is a causal connection as well as a providential connection here. Decent living and decent government to an extent produce peace. Immoral, reckless government invites wars, both civil and foreign. In the years from the division of the kingdom to the fall of Samaria, the two kingdoms had a diverse character. The northern kingdom openly encouraged idolatry and in its national life apostatized from the Lord. During those two hundred years, the northern kingdom saw nine different dynasties fight for the throne. In the southern kingdom, which in general maintained the faith, the dynasty of David continued with one small interregnum at the time of Athaliah. God often uses wars as an instrument of punishment (Isa 10:6).

Dangerous animals ("savage beasts"), except for snakes and scorpions, have not been much of a problem in Palestine for many years. In biblical times, however, both lions and bears are mentioned repeatedly. There must have been a somewhat different situation (cf. v.4 above). Egyptian pictures show pharaohs hunting lions where now there are only deserts. Such animals require lesser game for food. The lesser game require some grass and woodland. Palestine in ancient times clearly must have been different from what it is today, for "savage beasts" were a real danger to Israel. In fact, God promised to drive out the Canaanites gradually so that the dangerous animals would not multiply unduly (Ex 23:30).

The same sort of expression as "five of you will chase a hundred" is found in Dt 32:30. Of course, there is hyperbole here, but it is true even today that small things can turn the tide of history. Gideon's 300 men defeated 135,000 Midianites; Jonathan and his armor-bearer alone defeated a Philistine force. When David killed Goliath, all the Philistines fled. In ancient warfare, even more than in modern times, a little incident such as the death or prowess of a hero could turn the whole tide of battle. God promised the Israelites victory if they would remain faithful to him.

9–13 "Will keep my covenant" is literally "will cause to rise up my covenant." This is probably legal language. The covenant referred to in the present verse is probably the covenant God made with Israel on Mount Sinai. Verses 1–2 refer to prominent parts of that covenant. However, this chapter should not be pressed into a covenant-treaty mold, as has been proposed in recent covenant-treaty studies. There is no historical prelude; the commands or "stipulations" are brief if they can be found at all, nor are the copies specified, as is usual in treaties. The chapter is a logical presentation of the consequences of obedience or disobedience to God's law.

God promised to dwell among his people in the tabernacle spiritually, not materially. From the word for "dwelling place" (GK 5438) and its root (GK 8905) , the later Israelites developed a name for the presence of God in the Most Holy Place—the Shekinah.

The expression "I will walk among" is not to be literalized in this connection. It refers to life, fellowship, and behavior. Enoch, Abraham, and others were said to "walk with God." God would continually fellowship with his people if they obeyed his word; he would live among them. The thought repeats that of the promised dwelling at v.11. The promise "and be your God" is repeated in Jer 30:22; Eze 11:20; Hos 2:23; and Ro 9:26.

Ten times in Leviticus and over a hundred times in the rest of the OT, God's miraculous deliverance of Israel from Egyptian bondage is emphasized. The event made an indelible impression on the Hebrew mind and record. The expression "enabled you to walk with heads held high" (lit., "upright") is an interesting commentary on how the ancient mind regarded slavery—about as we do today.•

B. Threatened Punishments (26:14–39) (cf. Dt 28:15–68; 29:18–28)

14–17 A long list of threatened punishments to Israel if they disobeyed God's laws follows (cf. Dt 28:15–68; 29:18–28). These punishments and the preceding blessing sound like the imprecations and benedictions of a Hittite treaty. Yet in this section the whole of a covenant-treaty structure is not easily observable. This should perhaps be a warning against too mechanical an approach to the covenant format. It was not always followed nor slavishly observed, and appropriate parts could be used alone for particular emphasis. The more extensive presentation of imprecations and benedictions is in Dt 28 and 30.

Similar words to "but if you will not listen to me" introduce the corresponding section in Dt 28:15, which adds "I am giving you today." Here we do not have the conclusion of a long sermon, as Deuteronomy was, but a code of laws and rituals. In one sense, all the legislation of Exodus and Leviticus is part of the covenant God ordained at Sinai. The summary was the Ten Commandments that were engraved in stone as a witness and testimony. The sacred chest that contained them was therefore often called the "ark of the covenant" or the "ark of the Testimony." The curtain separating the holy shrine where the ark was kept was even called the "curtain of the Testimony [or Covenant]" (24:3).

The word "covenant" (GK 1382) as used in such biblical phrases is somewhat like the word "contract" or "treaty"—only it was a one-sided treaty imposed on the nation chosen for God's blessing. To break the covenant or contract meant not only to forfeit all God's promised blessings but to incur his curse. The word "covenant" as used in these biblical phrases is somewhat different from the theological formulation of "covenant" when the word is used in such contexts as "covenant theology." In such contexts the covenants of works and grace embrace a representative principle that some would and others would not find so extensively in God's dealings with his people.

The phrase "sudden terror" does not seem to require the idea of surprise but means "to be terrified" or "to be confused." The words "wasting diseases and fever" are used only here and in Dt 28:22. They refer to physical ailments. The Arabic equivalent of "wasting diseases" is the disease formerly called consumption—tuberculosis. Quite likely the words "that will destroy your sight and drain away your life" are not adjectival in referring to previous "wasting diseases." The normal result of fever is not to "destroy the sight." The words are participles and probably substantival in use: "a destruction of sight" and "a draining away of life."

Palestine was situated on the land bridge between the great powers of antiquity. And there were local enemies, too. The threat of enemy domination was very real. The Midianites of Gideon's day are likened to grasshoppers who devour everything.

Verse 17 is picked up by Pr 28:1. How different the situation if Israel were obedient (v.8)!

18–26 Verse 18 is a surprisingly rare usage of the number seven. It is apparently restricted to this chapter (vv.21, 24, 28) and is a threat of multiple punishment.

The expression "sky . . . like iron and the ground . . . like bronze," which refers to a rainless sky and dried ground, is used only here and in Dt 28:23, where the symbols of iron and bronze are reversed! Obviously they are figures of speech. No Israelite thought the heavens were solid metal. The Deuteronomy passage adds further description of the dryness of the ground.

Bronze is an alloy of copper and tin and was used early, but how early is hard to tell. ("Brass," used in KJV, was not much used until nearly the time of Christ.) The first bronzes were probably accidental, for tin and copper occur together in some minerals. Bronze is a practical metal. It can be cast and hammered easily and makes good hard tools and weapons. Its properties vary according to the amount of tin used.

Verse 19 is only the second mention of iron in the Bible. The first mention (Ge 4:22) is a special case and perhaps refers to meteoric iron or even an ironlike stone that first received the name. Nothing in the tabernacle was made of iron. A little iron was found in the tomb of the Pharaoh Tutankhamun (c. 1360 B.C.). Deuteronomy 3:11 mentions it in connection with Og's bedstead (which was probably a sarcophagus trimmed with iron). But the secret of successful iron-working and tempering into steel did not come into Palestine until about 1180 B.C., when the Philistines introduced iron weapons and implements and brought in the Iron Age (1Sa 13:19–22). This verse only refers to iron as a hard metal and would fit well the pre-Philistine period. The crop failure obviously would be because of a drought so harsh as to affect the trees. The roads would not be much traveled because of danger from wild animals and enemies.

The Hebrew of v.25 is emphatic. The sword will "avenge the vengeance" of the covenant. The broken covenant cannot be passed over by God without awful judgment. The Israelites will "withdraw into [their] cities" (a phrase that indicates a state of siege). In time of war people living in the countryside fled to the cities for protection. In the crowded cities hunger and pestilence took their awful toll. "Ten women will be able to bake your bread" indicates that there would be many people but very little bread to go around. Every crumb would be weighed and conserved, and still people would go hungry.

27–35 The horrors of ancient sieges are matched perhaps only by the modern siege of Leningrad in World War II. There also cannibalism occurred. There are biblical references to these horrors in the sieges of Samaria (2Ki 6:28–29) and Jerusalem (La 4:10). Josephus (War 6.15–32 [3–4]) tells dreadful stories of the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans.

So horrible would be God's judgments that even the enemies around would be "appalled" (v.32). These references to captivity have been used to argue that this chapter could not have been written until after the Exile. It seems like a strange argument. By the same token, the blessings of vv.4–13 are so wonderful that one might think they could not have been written until after the Millennium! Actually, anyone in antiquity who could write a treaty of the Hittite suzerainty type could write such maledictions. The anguish of famine, conquest, and siege were well enough known in Moses' time.

"Enjoy its sabbath years" (v.34) is quoted in 2Ch 36:21 and combined with Jeremiah's prophecy (25:11) that the Captivity would last seventy years. There is no need to be mechanical and hold that the sabbatical-year provision was neglected for just 490 years. But it was evidently neglected for a long time. "Enjoy" is the regular translation of the Hebrew word used again at v.43.

36–39 One can argue that v.36 repeats v.17. The words "as though fleeing from the sword, and they will fall" may be parenthetical. The point is that the people will flee at the sound of a driven leaf—when none pursues. The wording is somewhat different from v.17, but the thought is similar. This section ends with an emphasis on their end and the unreasoning panic that God will put in their hearts. Proverbs 28:1 probably alludes to v.37 as well as v.17.

C. God's Perpetual Covenant (26:40–46)

God had promised the land of Palestine to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Ge 15:18) by a covenant. God's promises are inviolable. God remembered the promise to Abraham as the people groaned in Egyptian bondage (Ex 3:15–17). The promise of vv.40–46 is similar to that in Dt 30, and there too God remembers the word he "swore to . . . Abraham, Isaac and Jacob" (v.20). Two other passages give somewhat similar promises. Solomon prayed that the Lord would hear the people's prayer of repentance when they would be in captivity (1Ki 8:46–53). Nehemiah prayed (Ne 1:8–9) that the Lord would remember his promise to Israel through Moses, probably referring to Lev 26 and Dt 30, that if they returned to God, he would regather them.

The 1 Kings and the Nehemiah passages, however, have an element not found in the Pentateuch. In his prayer Solomon included the idea that the dispersed people should pray toward the holy temple he had just built in Jerusalem. And Nehemiah's prayer assumes that God would regather Israel to the place where God's name dwelt, Jerusalem. Such ideas are proper in the later books, but in Moses' time Jerusalem had not yet been chosen for the sanctuary. It was not even conquered until David's day. This chapter therefore makes no mention of Jerusalem. Indeed, the only possible mention of Jerusalem in the whole Pentateuch is in Ge 14:18.

40–45 Confession is essential if we would be rid of sin and right with God. The word in Dt 30:2 is "return to the LORD . . . with all your heart and with all your soul." The idea of the circumcised heart is thought to be characteristic of Deuteronomy and Jeremiah. And it is true that the phrase is found in Dt 10:16 and 30:6, as well as in Jer 4:4; but the Leviticus passage has the equivalent thought in negative expression and is in fact similar to Jer 9:25, which complains that Israel is uncircumcised in heart like the heathen round about.

Actually, God's law never emphasized the merely external, though there was far more of the external in the OT than in the NT. Proverbs 23:26 expresses the eternal desire of God in the words, "My son, give me your heart." Circumcision was not just a physical mark of national origin. Paul says real circumcision is a matter of the heart (Ro 2:29; more lit., "circumcision . . . is of the heart").

In Lev 25:23 God said, "The land is mine," and he promised to remember his promises to the patriarchs to give them that land. Incidentally, the promises given here to Israel are not limited to the time of the judges or the Babylonian captivity. Paul declares that the promises to Israel and the fathers are "irrevocable" (Ro 11:28–29). But the Jews will not reinherit Palestine in peace and blessing until they return to the Lord.

Verse 36 stated that only some of the people of the Captivity will be left. But God will spare some and use their punishments to bring them back to him. A sad commentary on human nature is that in prosperity people tend to forget God, and he must often punish them to bring them back to him. The wise child of God will stay close to him in the first place and rejoice in the blessings without having to get the punishments.

46 The mention of the mutuality of the covenant is interesting, though it is also stated that God "gave" the laws. This verse is really a summary of the material of Leviticus, though some additional material on vows is given before Numbers begins with the order to break camp and move on toward the land of Canaan.

XI. Laws Concerning Gifts and Endowments (27:1–34)

It is difficult to understand this section fully because we know so little about the details of dedicating things to the Lord in ancient Israel (cf. Ex 34:19–20; Dt 23:21–23). The chapter discusses dedicated persons, clean animals, unclean animals, houses, and lands. Firstborn animals cannot be dedicated because they belong to the Lord already. Then comes an enigmatic paragraph on devoted things and people. These are apparently the spoils of certain types of war that belong absolutely to the Lord. This is followed by a brief section on tithes.

It seems clear that a person normally would dedicate to the Lord some person or thing, not an amount of money. It was not an age of money exchange; coinage was not yet invented. But often, if not usually, the person or thing given was redeemed, and its value in silver was given instead. The person given would presumably become a temple slave, so the values are those of a slave. They may be given in tabular form:

Age	Value of Male	Value of Female
1–5	5 shekels	3 shekels
5–20	20 shekels	10 shekels
20–60	50 shekels	30 shekels
60 plus	15 shekels	10 shekels

We may not conclude from these figures that women were considered of less worth in the OT. It is merely that adult males were more capable of and valuable for the heavy work of the tabernacle. Note that a bride was purchased in ancient Israel; a groom cost nothing! This proves nothing! Also, the value of a slave, male or female, gored to death by a vicious ox is thirty shekels (Ex 21:32).

The "devoted" (GK 3051) things and persons mentioned in vv.28–29 are quite different. These are not things vowed to the Lord by an individual but spoils of war devoted to destruction by the Lord. The best-known examples are the spoils of Jericho (Jos 6:24) and of the Amalekites of Saul's day (1Sa 15:3–9). Such spoils and captives could not be redeemed, sold, or ransomed.

Numbers 18:14 is in line with this interpretation. At first sight it might seem that the devoted thing there promised to the priests is the firstborn of man or beast mentioned in v.15. But actually there is in this section of Numbers a list of items to be given to the priests. First-ripe fruits are mentioned in v.13. Devoted things under the ban come next as another category; then come firstborn animals and men. There is therefore no problem between the Numbers statements and the Leviticus laws that devoted things, animals, or men may not be redeemed; that firstborn animals may be redeemed; and that it is obligatory that firstborn men must be redeemed (Ex 13:13; Nu 18:15–16). The redemption price of firstborn men is five shekels of silver according to Nu 18:16, which is the valuation of a male up to five years of age according to Lev 27:6.

1–8 The rendering "special" (GK 7098) is strange. The underlying word is used many times to mean "wonderful" or even "miraculous"; but here and in Nu 15:3, 8, it is used in the sense of making a vow that is special or particular. Nothing in the contexts of these verses indicates that this type of vow was out of the ordinary. It was just the special reaction of a consecrated heart to the goodness of God. The LXX has "whoever shall vow a vow." The Hebrew word order differs a little from the English: "a special vow in valuation of persons." The presence of the word "valuation" or "equivalent value" in this connection suggests that a common practice was to give the money equivalent, not the person, for the tabernacle service. It was otherwise when Hannah vowed to give her son to the Lord (cf. 1Sa 1). There was no thought of redemption there. On the other hand, Jephthah's vow (Jdg 11:32–40) was very different and was an evil vow that never should have been made or kept.

On "fifty shekels of silver" see the table of values of a dedicated tabernacle slave given above.

Apparently "if a man is too poor" refers to a man who wanted to make a vow but was too poor to redeem the person (slave or child?) whom he had vowed. In this case the priest was not to take the one who made the vow as a slave in lieu of the money but was to reduce the evaluation to what the man could afford.

9–13 In the case of clean animals, the vow of an animal was supposed to be final. The case was quite different from the dedication of men. A man might dedicate to the Lord the next male sheep born in his flock. If so, he should give it regardless of whether it looked especially good or bad. And if he tried to exchange it for another animal, both animals would be forfeited.

The "unclean animal" might or might not be given to the tabernacle. There was a need for such animals. Priests used donkeys, too. But such an animal could be redeemed. It is not clear why the animal was valued by the priest if the animal, and not the monetary equivalent, was actually being given. Perhaps the priest's evaluation would be a factor in the worshiper's decision whether or not to add 20 percent and redeem the animal.

14–15 The law for dedicating a house is similar to that for an unclean animal. Notice that if the man adds 20 percent and redeems the house, "the house will again become his." Otherwise the house is the property of the tabernacle. Nothing is said about the house going out in the Jubilee. Probably this case applied to houses in fortified cities that were sold absolutely (25:30).

16–21 The law for other land acquired by purchase is given in vv.22–25. Land values were determined by formula depending on the area of what we would call tillable land. Rock outcropping, ravines, etc., did not count. The area that would normally be sown by a homer of barley (about six bushels) cost fifty shekels. Modern planting calls for about a bushel and a half of seeds per acre, which would mean that land values would be fifty shekels for four acres of arable land—twelve and a half shekels per acre.

"The priest will determine the value." For instance, if twenty-five years had passed since the last Jubilee, the value of the land would be reduced by half. If a man had redeemed a field by paying an extra 20 percent, the field would be his. But if he gave it to the tabernacle without redeeming it, it would be an irrevocable gift. Also, the gift would be irrevocable if he had promised it eventually to the tabernacle but had sold it to another person until the Jubilee. When it went out in the Jubilee, it would then not revert to the owner but to the tabernacle to which it was promised. By this method the tabernacle lands could greatly increase over the years. Whether they did or not, we cannot tell. Such increase of church properties was a great problem in late medieval times.

22–25 It was impossible for anyone to dedicate perpetually to the Lord a part of some other family's inheritance. Perhaps his own line of heirs might run out, and he could properly give his own land. But bought land must revert to its owners at the Jubilee, and even the tabernacle could have no claim on it. "The sanctuary shekel" was an established weight. Present-day governments have effective control over weights and measures to keep them standard. Such standardizing in antiquity was difficult. There are many references in the OT to the sin of using false weights and measures.

26–27 The principle that "the firstborn already belongs to the LORD" is first stated in Ex 13:2. God had killed the firstborn of men and animals of the Egyptians but had spared the firstborn of the Israelites. Therefore, he claimed a special ownership of the firstborn. The firstborn of men and animals that could not be offered were to be redeemed (Ex 13:13). All the firstborn of clean animals were to be the Lord's (Ex 13:12). In consequence of this principle, the clean firstling was already the Lord's and obviously could not be given by a vow.

Verse 27 adds another option to Ex 13:13. There it is said that every firstborn donkey should be redeemed with a lamb. Here it says that the animal may be redeemed with its money value plus 20 percent, or, if not redeemed, the priest may take it and sell it. The law in Ex 13:13 says that if a man does not redeem it, he must break its neck. That is, the owner cannot keep the animal in any case. The law in Leviticus is in full agreement; the animal, if not given to the Lord's work, must be redeemed either by a lamb (Ex) or money (Lev), or it must be killed.

28–34 See the discussion on devoted things at the introduction to this chapter. The word for "devoted thing" (herem; GK 3051) has the curious double usage of referring to the totally holy and the totally evil. It is used especially of the holy war of conquest of Canaan that put the spoils of war "under the ban," as it is sometimes translated. The spoils of Jericho, for instance, that were perishable were devoted to the flames (Jos 6:17, 21, 24). The spoils that could stand the fire belonged absolutely to the Lord. This principle in the Conquest kept the Israelites from fighting for the sake of the spoils, as was so often done in ancient warfare. The individual got no personal reward for his fighting.

The "tithe" (GK 5130) belonged to the Lord. It also could not be dedicated by a vow, though that point is not raised here. The tithe of grain and fruit was sufficiently uniform to be redeemed by adding 20 percent. Perhaps also this provision was used because some fruits were too perishable to transport to the tabernacle.

Some animals are strong and healthy; other are scrawny and poor. An unscrupulous herdsman could easily have given to the Lord the worst, as the priests did later (cf. Mal 1:8). Or an overzealous herdsman could injure his own flock by always giving the best breeders to the tabernacle. The Lord gave a wise provision that every tenth animal regardless of its condition should belong to the Lord.

This last chapter adds a footnote, as it were, to the main body of laws concluded in ch. 26. There were yet a few more laws to be given at Mount Sinai that were included in the early chapters of Numbers, but this section is concluded by the formula that had been used with variation before (7:38; 25:1; 26:46). The opening verses of Numbers begin the directions preparing for the march from Sinai to the Promised Land.

Numbers

INTRODUCTION

1. Historical Background and Purpose

The book's name comes from its title Arithmoi in the LXX (the Greek translation of the Old Testament), through the Latin (Numeri); this name is based on the census lists found in chs. 1–4 and 26. One Jewish designation for the book is taken from the fourth word in v.1, lit., "In the Desert"—a particularly apt description of its contents, for it describes what happened during the thirty-eight years of wandering in the desert after the Exodus.

The original recipients of the book were the people of Israel in the second generation from the Exodus, awaiting the command of God to cross the Jordan to conquer the land of Canaan. The book describes the affairs of the people of the first generation, but its teaching is for those who were about to enter Canaan.

The purpose of the book is to compel obedience to the Lord by the new community by reminding them of the wrath of God on their parents because of their breach of covenant; to encourage them to trust in the ongoing promises of the Lord as they follow him into their heritage in Canaan; and to provoke them to worship God and to enjoy their salvation. In other words, it is designed to encourage spiritual confidence on the part of the people who were about to leave the desert to cross over into Canaan.

2. Authorship and Date

The book of Numbers traditionally has been ascribed to Moses, the great prophet of God. This conclusion is based on (1) the statements concerning the writing activity of Moses (Nu 33:1–2; Ex 17:14; 24:4; 34:27; et al.); (2) the assumption that the Pentateuch is a unity and comes from one writer; (3) the excellent training of Moses in Egypt that would have prepared him for this great literary task (see Ac 7:22); (4) the involvement of Moses as the principal human protagonist in the record of the deliverance and desert experiences of Israel; and (5) the NT citations that speak of Moses as the one responsible for the books of the Torah (Mt 19:8; Jn 5:46–47; Ro 10:5; et al.).

We may style the book of Numbers "The Memoirs of Moses in the Desert." The varied styles and seeming inconsistencies of the book may have been produced in part by its occasional nature in the lifetime of Moses. Further, this book may have received some editorial additions following the lifetime of Moses, though this material may have reached back to the time of Moses. Additions to the book under the direction of the Holy Spirit may have occurred at a later time, or the book may have been compiled by another hand using Mosaic material. This would also explain the origin of the Balaam story in chs. 22-24, much of which was outside Moses' observation (see comments). All in all, however, we take the position that the essential content of this book did come from Moses, the servant of the Lord, prior to the conquest of Canaan.

3. Theological Themes

a. The old and the new

The book of Numbers presents the concept of the chastening wrath of God on his own disobedient people.The entire generation that had been delivered from formidable foes by the direct intervention of the Lord, that had formed a holy community, and that had been allowed to participate in his holy worship lost their enjoyment of the Promised Land because of their rebellion against God's grace and their disbelief in his power to deliver them. Thus Numbers presents a sobering, chilling reality. The God of Israel was also a consuming fire—a wrath that extended equally to his errant children and to the enemy nations of Egypt and Canaan. Not even Moses was exempt from God's wrath because of his disobedience.

Yet in his wrath the Lord remembers mercy; a new generation arises to inherit the land. The association of the Lord's wrath and mercy, his anger and his love, is a marked feature of this book as part of the Law and the Prophets.

b. Balaam

No doubt thoughts came to a people who had experienced the miraculous hand of God but now sensed his wrath: Is God indeed finished with us? Is he done with the nation as a whole? Have we no hope? In one of the most remarkable sections of the Bible, the Lord worked providentially and directly to proclaim his continued faithfulness to his people, despite their continuing unfaithfulness. This section is the story of Balaam.

In Balaam we have the pagan counterpart to Moses the man of God. Balaam was an internationally known prophet, who thought that the Lord God was like any other deity whom he thought he could manipulate by mantic acts. But Balaam learned that an encounter with the God of Israel was fundamentally different from anything he had ever known. When he finally began to utter his words of cursing on the nation of Israel at the instigation of Balak, king of Moab, he found his mouth unable to express anything but blessings for God's people and the most ferocious cursings on their enemies. It is the blessing of God on Israel that is the heart of the book of Numbers.

c. Worship

The book of Numbers has a great deal to contribute to the theology of worship. The NT concept that in worship all things should be done in an orderly and fitting manner (1Co 14:40) finds its basis in Numbers. We also learn of pageantry and procession, festival and fasting, mandatory sacrifices and freewill offerings, restrictions and blessings. In it the ongoing purposes of God for his covenant people are reaffirmed. It contains important materials for the specific worship patterns of Israel, such as the Aaronic Benediction (ch. 6) and instructions on Passover (ch. 9). If God's people respond in faithfulness and obedience, he will fulfill his promises and his blessings.

But the book of Numbers also is the worship of God by Moses and those who align themselves with him. By God's grace it may become a book of worship for us as well.

d. Numbers

What seems to some to be the most embarrassing element of the book—the numbers that seem impossibly inflated for a small nation at the beginning of its existence—is its crown and glory. These numbers are a mark of God's blessing. They are a fulfillment of his covenant. They anticipate numbers of peoples who will be like the stars of the heavens, the sand of the seashore. The numbers extol the glory of God in his people.

4. The Large Numbers

a. The problem

The numbers of the tribes of Israel stated and implied in this book just seem to be far too large to be historically credible. If the numbers of the men who are mustered for war from the age of twenty and up actually add up to over 600,000, then the total populace would have had to be at least two million persons—perhaps considerably more! This does not seem to be an excessively large number for our own crowded days, but it seems to be nearly an impossibly large sum for Israel in the very beginning of its existence.

The mid-1988 estimate for the population of Israel was 4,400,000, roughly twice the size of the nation at the Exodus. Currently, the population of Israel is mixed between scattered rural settlements, small towns, and three large cities. As we look at the modern cities with their sprawling size and multistory buildings, we wonder how the ancient farmlands, towns, and cities might have accommodated such numbers. Since the testimony of the wicked Hebrew spies was an exaggerated report of the size of the cities, their towering walls, and hulking men—all the stuff of fear—the implication at the least is that the Canaanite population was significantly larger and more powerful than the approaching Hebrew populace (see Dt 4:38; 7:1). The more we think of them, the more these numbers boggle our minds.

Then we may wonder what the population of Canaan was in the biblical period. Since presumably the population of Canaan was as least as dense in the eighth century under Hebrew settlement as in the fifteenth century during Canaanite times, it is just not possible to imagine an invading force of Hebrews that might number several millios having any reason to trust in the Lord for the conquest of the land. By sheer numbers they would overwhelm the native population.

A well-worn problem in the large numbers of the families of Israel in the book of Numbers has to do with the growth from seventy persons to more than two million in just four centuries. Scripture assures us that the growth of the population of the Hebrew people was a dramatic outworking of God's grace, a fulfillment of his promise. The narrative of growth in Ex 1:7 is emphatic: "but the Israelites were fruitful and multiplied greatly and became exceedingly numerous, so that the land was filled with them." This unprecedented growth was in fulfillment of numerous promises of God to the fathers (see Ge 17:2, 6; 22:17; 26:4; 28:14; 35:11; 48:4). Moses is able to use the patriarchal phrase of abundance as he recounts his experience as their leader: "The LORD your God has increased your numbers so that today you are as many as the stars in the sky" (Dt 1:10; cf. Ex 32:13).

Yet there are counterindications to this immense size. One points to just two midwives in Ex 1:15—certainly some very overworked women in a nation so large! Another points to the rhetorical underplaying of the size of the nation in Dt 7:7: "for you were the fewest of all peoples." Another has to do with the sheer logistics of two million people or more crossing the Red Sea in one night and their organization and provision in the desert for a generation.

Now all this is possible within the wonder of the work of the Lord. We have no doubt of his ability to provide for two million or two billion persons. But we still wonder at these large numbers in terms of the lands and cities of the ancient world. Were the Canaanite cities of the Late Bronze Age sufficiently large to be a formidable threat to the millions of Hebrews about to descend on them from the desert? Would the ten spies have been so fearful of the residents of the land if they themselves represented a people so very large in numbers? And could the land of Canaan have absorbed such a huge company in biblical times, right at the beginning of Israel's experience? We do not doubt that the population of Israel under her great kings David and Solomon might have numbered one million. But we pause at the thought of more than twice that many persons right at the beginning of her history.

So there we have it: The numbers of the book of Numbers are just too large!

b. A suggestion

I suggest that the large numbers in the census lists are deliberately and purposefully exaggerated as a rhetorical device to bring glory to God, derision to enemies, and point forward to the fulfillment of God's promise to the fathers that their descendants will be innumerable, like the stars.

It appears that the figure given in the two census lists for the army of Israel may possibly be a magnification by a factor of ten. An army of about 60,000 men would fit the criteria of the region and the times. A rhetorical exaggeration by a factor of ten has much to commend it. It takes into account the "round" number nature of each integer. It fits in nicely with the approximation of 600,000 as a multiple of 50,000 times 12, the number of the tribes. It results in an army in excess of 60,000 men, with a total population of about 250,000 to 300,000. This sum seems to fit the requirements of the social, geographical, and political realities without diminishing at all the sense of the miraculous and providential care of God.

An army of 60,000 is not an insignificant force, but it was likely considerably smaller than the combined armies of the city-states of Canaan at the time. In this way the peoples of Israel must have seemed to be a "swarm" as they lived in Egypt, but they were still "the smallest of nations" when ranked with combined great world powers. This smaller number accords with the large (but not supernatural!) force that the Egyptian Pharaoh sent in pursuit of them to the Sea of Reeds. Six hundred chariots (Ex 14:7) is a considerable force and would surely be a death threat against the unorganized people of Israel. This approach also allows for the drama of the conquest of the book of Judges, where battles were won by the armies of Israel in league with the Lord, their Great Warrior. This smaller number fits as well for the failures to occupy the full land as that book also details. It also accords well with the well-known Merneptah stele that records Israel as among the peoples of Canaan during his raid, which we may place during the period of the judges. A population of several million would have more of an impression on this pharaoh!

Again, this smaller number does not diminish the miraculous. It enhances it; for we confront now a cluster of miracles that we may embrace readily rather than shun from some sense of embarrassment, as some do! The supernatural increase of the people in Egypt, the crossing of the Red Sea in one night, the gathering of the people at Mount Sinai, their daily provision of food and water in the desert, their entry into the Promised Land—all miracles! Only the Lord could so provide for this vast number of people in this manner; and a population of over one-quarter million is indeed vast. But now we can envision a series of miracles that fits the geography, the topography, and the times. The "myth" of the Exodus becomes the history of redemption.

The principal objection that may come to the position I advance is the observation that the number 603,550 is in general agreement with the similarly large number in the second census in 26:51 (601,730); and it is in accord with other statements in the Torah of a population of about 600,000 men (see again, Ex 12:37; 38:26). We may observe that the same deliberate rhetorical function occurs in the second census. In fact, it is even more important that the new generation be regarded in the same significance as the first. The words of Balaam (Nu 23:10) emphasize the "mystique" of the immense numbers of Israel. But what to him was but "mystique" was to Moses nothing less than the power of God. As to the numbers in Exodus, they must be based on the numbers in the census lists of Nu 1:46; that is, the interpretation of the numbers in the book of Numbers has priority over the interpretation of these same numbers in Exodus. This means that the interpretation we derive in Numbers will work as well for the round figure of 600,000 in Ex 12:37. Exodus 38:26 is more difficult because of the very specific numbers used for weights (vv.25–31). Yet if the pattern of 600,000 (strictly 603,550) is established as the power number for Israel, then the payment of the redemption price would be rhetorically inflated to fit the established number. The "truth" of the passage is that there was the exact payment of one-half shekel for each of the numbered men in the census, whatever that exact number might have been.

The one problem remaining is the payment of the half-shekel in Ex 38:25–26. This 100 talents plus 1,775 shekels is the one number that does not easily arise from a purposeful tenfold increase. I suggest, with some temerity, that the numbers in this passage may have been inserted into the text of Exodus on the basis of the census of Nu 1–4. The number 603,550 in Ex 38:25 is certainly based on the census total in Nu 1:44. That is, once the factor of a tenfold magnification was established in Numbers, then the payment of the redemption price, to be consistent, would be presented in such a way as to agree with this larger number.

It appears to me that the numbers of the census are real figures. They are treated like real integers; there is no confusion of hundreds and thousands. Here are numbers that are internally consistent and coherent. Yet I propose that they may have been deliberately magnified by a factor of ten for rhetorical reasons. The promise was that the people of God would be in number like the stars. Six-hundred thousand must have seemed like an "astronomical" number in these early biblical times. Certainly the "real" number of 60,000 men was very large, particularly for the desert sojourn. But the 60,000 would still not be an overwhelming force for the task ahead of conquering the peoples of the land, who are seven in number and far more numerous than Israel. To have any success in their task, this army would need to have the help of the Lord along every step of their path. From the abortive battle in the first generation with the Amalekites (14:44–45) to their decisive victories a generation later with Arad (21:1–3) and the small kingdoms of Sihon and Og (21:21–31), these numbers fit the situation. Here is a seasoned army of approximately 60,000 men, ready to march across the (dry bed of the) Jordan and to take the ancient city of Jericho as the firstfruits of conquest in the land—an offering to the Lord.

The obvious objection one may bring—that people do not use numbers this way today—is not overwhelming. In ancient times numbers were used with deliberate exaggeration for rhetorical effect. The ancient Sumerian king list affords an example that long predates the time of Moses. In this list the reigns of kings from remote antiquity were vastly exaggerated, no doubt to indicate their tremendous importance. An even more common use of rhetorical language is in battle braggadocio and mottoes of heroes: "Saul has slain his thousands, and David his tens of thousands" (1Sa 18:7).

I am aware that some may regard the concept of "rhetorical use of numbers" as a departure from "literal interpretation." In fact, it is not. Literal interpretation of numbers includes understandings that extend from mathematical exactitude, through general approximation, to literary license. The only demand of literal interpretation (better, "normal" interpretation) is that the reader seek to find the use he or she believes the text itself presents and demands. It is an abuse of literal interpretation to insist that the way we use numbers in our digital and pocket-calculator age is the way that biblical persons ought to have used numbers in their day.

In summary, the book of Numbers is just that! It is a book that uses numbers to celebrate the work of the Lord! And in these numbers is his praise.

EXPOSITION

I. The Experience of the First Generation in the Desert (1:1–25:18)

The book of Numbers appears to be a bifid of unequal parts. The two censuses (chs. 1–4, 26) are key to understanding the structure of the book. The first census (chs. 1–4) concerns the first generation of the Exodus community; the second census (ch. 26) focuses on the experiences of the second generation, the people to whom this book is primarily directed. The former were prepared for triumph but ended in disaster. The latter had an opportunity for greatness—if only they would learn from the failures of their fathers and mothers the absolute necessity for faithfulness to the Lord despite all obstacles.

A. The Preparation for the Triumphal March to the Promised Land (1:1–10:36)

1. Setting apart the people (1:1–10:10)

As the book as a whole presents itself as a bifid of unequal parts, so chs. 1–10 also form a bifid of unequal sections: 1:1–10:10 records the meticulous preparation of the people for their triumphal march into Canaan; 10:11–36 describes their first steps under the leadership of Moses.

a. The census of the first generation (1:1–4:49)

(1) The muster (1:1–54)

(a) The command of the Lord (1:1–4)

1 The opening words set the stage for the chapter and, indeed, for the entire book. The phraseology "the LORD [Yahweh] spoke to Moses" presents a point of view that will be repeated throughout this book, a phrase that is important to the self-attestation of the divine origin of the book of Numbers. The expression "the Tent of Meeting" speaks of the revelatory and communion aspect of the tent. Other terms and phrases used for this tent in Numbers are "the tabernacle" (v.51) and "the tabernacle of the Testimony" (vv.50, 53). The term "tabernacle" points to its temporary and transitory nature; it is a movable, portable shrine, specially designed for the worship of God by a people on the move.

The first verse also gives a specific time notice for God's command to take a census of the nation. The book begins thirteen months after the Exodus. Israel had spent the previous year in the region of Mount Sinai receiving the law, erecting the tabernacle, and becoming a people. Now they were to be mustered as a military force and formed into a cohesive nation to provide the basis for an orderly march. The events of Numbers cover a period of thirty-eight years and nine or ten months, i.e., the period of Israel's desert wanderings. The second month in the Hebrew calendar corresponds roughly to our April. This pattern of dating events from the Exodus signifies its centrality in the experience of the people of God. Time will hence be measured from their leaving Egypt (cf. B.C. and A.D.). Time for Israel had its beginning with the Exodus, God's great act of deliverance of his people from bondage.

2 The Hebrew verbs "take" and "number" (v.3) are in the plural, indicating that Moses and Aaron were to complete this task together (see v.3), but the primary responsibility for the task lay with Moses. The purpose of this census was to form a military roster. Other reasons are (1) to demonstrate to the people the extent of God's faithfulness to the provisions of the Abrahamic covenant (Ge 12:2; 15:5; 17:4–6; 22:17); (2) to provide a clear sense of family and clan identity for the individual; and (3) to provide the means for an orderly march of the people to their new home in Canaan.

3 The point of the census was to prepare the armies of Israel for their triumphal war of conquest against the peoples of Canaan. Tragically, all the peoples who are numbered for military duty in this chapter—save only Joshua and Caleb—died without facing the war in which God demanded they become engaged.

Those mustered for war at the end of the desert period (ch. 26) are entirely different persons from those listed here. Except for Joshua and Caleb, the total died in the desert between slavery and liberty, between cursing and blessing, between there and here, with hopes dashed and desires never fulfilled. But in the new roster of Nu 26 there is a new generation, a new beginning, a new hope.

4 By having a representative from each tribe assist Moses and Aaron, not only would the task be more manageable, but the resultant count would be regarded as legitimate by all. No tribe would have a reason to suggest it was under- or over-represented in the census.

(b) The names of the men (1:5–16)

5–15 The names of these luminaries occur again in chs. 2, 7, and 10. Most are built by compounding one of the designations for God into a name that is a significant banner of faith in the person and work of God. The antiquity of the list of names is revealed by the fact that many are built on the names El, Shaddai, Ammi, Zur, and Ab. At a later time many names were based on the covenant name Yahweh because of the revelation of a new significance of that name in the Lord's encounter with Moses (Ex 3; 6) and his subsequent teaching of these truths to Israel.

16 The Hebrew word underlying the phrase "the men appointed" (GK 7924) is a technical term for representatives. Verse 16 is legal, formal, and precise in tone. Three phrases are used to give sanction to each of these leaders. Levi is not represented in this listing (see 1:47).

(c) The summary of the census (1:17–19)

17 The leadership of Moses and Aaron in the task is indicated here, as is their obedience to the Lord. This chapter is marked by a studied triumphalism. Numbering the tribes and mustering the army are sacred functions that prepare the people for their war of conquest, under the right hand of God, who is their warrior (see Ex 15:3).

18 The expression "twenty years or more" indicates that one who was under the age of twenty would still be regarded as a member of his father's house; one over the age of twenty was morally and civilly responsible.

19 Hebrew prose often gives a summary statement and then the details that explicate that summary. So here v.19 is the summary statement, and vv.20–43 give the details.

(d) The listings of the census by each tribe (1:20–43)

20–43 For each tribe there are two verses in repetitive, formulaic structure giving (1) the name of the tribe, (2) the specifics of those numbered, (3) the name of the tribe restated, and (4) the total enumerated for that tribe.

Certainly one of the most difficult issues in the book of Numbers concerns the large numbers of these lists (see the introduction for comments on this). The numbers for each of the tribes are round numbers; each unit is rounded off to the hundred (but Gad to the 50 [1:25]). The same numbers are given for each tribe in ch. 2, where there are four triads of tribes with consistent use of numbers, sums, and grand totals. Further, the total might have been rounded off to 600,000 but was not (see 1:46; 2:32).

Because the descendants of Levi were excluded from the census (see on v.47), the descendants of Joseph are listed according to the families of his two sons, Ephraim (vv.32–33) and Manasseh (vv.34–35). In this way (1) the traditional tribal number of twelve is maintained, and (2) Joseph is given the "double portion" of the ranking heir of Jacob (cf. Ge 49:22–26; Dt 33:13–17).

(e) The summary of the census (1:44–46)

44–46 There appears to be no textual difficulty in the Hebrew tradition in the soundness of this large number for the census of the fighting men of Israel. The mathematics of these numbers is accurate and complex—complex in that the totals are reached in two ways: (1) a linear listing of twelve units (1:20–43), with the total given (1:46); (2) four sets of triads, each with a subtotal, and then the grand total (2:3–32), which equals the total in 1:46. These numbers are also consistent with the figures in Ex 12:37–38 and 38:26. Further, they relate well to the figures of the second census in Nu 26 (601,730 men) at the beginning of the new generation. This large number of men conscripted for the army suggests a population for the entire community in excess (perhaps considerably in excess) of two million people.

Most importantly, the numbers of the people may also be regarded as a fulfillment of the particular blessing of God in the unusual growth of the people of the family of Jacob in Egypt. Exodus 1:7 describes in five Hebrew phrases the stunning growth of the Hebrew people in Egypt during the four centuries of their sojourn. The growth of the nation was God's benediction on them. But we are still drawn back to the problem of logistics in these large numbers. So I return to the position suggested above (see Introduction: The Large Numbers).

(f) The reason for the exclusion of the Levites (1:47–54)

47–49 The Levites, because of their sacral tasks, were excluded from this military listing; they were to be engaged in the ceremonies and maintenance of the tabernacle. Chapter 3 is given over entirely to their families, numbers, and functions.

50 As in Ex 38:21, the sanctuary is here called "the tabernacle of the Testimony." The "Testimony" (GK 6343) refers to the Ten Words written on stone tablets (Ex 31:18; 32:15; 34:29). These tablets were placed in the ark (Ex 25:16, 21; 40:20), leading to the phrase "the ark of the Testimony" (Ex 25:22; 26:33–34; et al.).

51–52 The Hebrew word rendered "anyone else" (GK 2424) is often translated "stranger," "alien," or "foreigner" (Isa 1:7; Hos 7:9). Thus a non-Levite Israelite was considered an alien to the religious duties of the tabernacle (see Ex 29:33; 30:33; Lev 22:12). The punishment of death is reiterated in Nu 3:10, 38; 18:7, and was enacted by divine fiat in 16:31–33 (see 1Sa 6:19). The sense of the Divine Presence was both blessing and cursing in the camp: blessing for those who had a proper sense of awe and wonder at the nearness of deity; cursing for those who had no sense of place, no respect for the Divine Presence.

53 The tents of the Levites are detailed in 3:21–38. The encampment of the Levites around the tabernacle was a protective hedge against trespass by the non-Levites to keep them from the wrath of God; it was a measure of God's grace and a reminder of his presence.

54 In view of Israel's great disobedience in the later chapters, these words of initial compliance to God's word have a special poignancy. Israel began so well, then failed so terribly that her experience remains a potent lesson to all people of faith who follow them. Ending well is the desire.

(2) The placement of the tribes (2:1–34)

(a) Summary command (2:1–2)

1 This chapter begins with the announcement of the word of the Lord to Moses and Aaron. The more usual phrasing in the Torah is "And the LORD spoke to Moses, . . . saying," as in 1:1. The reference to Aaron along with his illustrious brother indicates the strong focus on the shrine of God's presence in the center of the camp. Aaron, as will be detailed in ch. 3, has the principal task of maintaining the purity, order, and organization of the work respecting the central shrine.

2 The Hebrew word order stresses the role of the individual in the context of the community; each one was to know his exact position within the camp. The repetition of the verb "will encamp" is for stately stress. Here is the meaning of the individual in Israel, and here is the significance of his family.

The people of Israel were a community that had their essential meaning in relationship to God and to one another. But ever in the community was the continuing stress on the individual to know where he belonged in the larger grouping. Corporate solidarity in ancient Israel was a reality of daily life; but the individual was also very important.

The dwelling of the tribes was in a circuit about the shrine but at some distance from it. The protective grace of God demands a sufficient distance to serve as a protective barrier from untoward approach to the Divine Presence and the judgment of God that such an approach might provoke. Too casual an approach betrays too minimal a reverence.

Each tribe had its banner and each triad (group of three) of tribes had its standard. Jewish tradition suggests that the tribal banners corresponded in color to the twelve stones in the breastplate of the high priest (Ex 28:15–21) and that the standard of the triad led by Judah had the figure of a lion, that of Reuben the figure of a man, that of Ephraim the figure of an ox, and that of Dan the figure of an eagle (see Eze 1:10; cf. Rev 4:7).

(b) Details of execution (2:3–33)

In ch. 1 the nation is mustered, and the genealogical relationships are clarified. In ch. 2 the nation is set in structural order, and the line of march and the place of encampment are established.

3–9 The eastern encampment. Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun were the fourth, fifth, and sixth of the six sons born to Jacob by Leah. It is somewhat surprising to have these three tribes first in the order of march since Reuben is regularly noted as Jacob's firstborn son (1:20). However, because of the perfidy of the older brothers (see Ge 49:3–7), Judah is granted pride of place among his brothers (Ge 49:8). Judah becomes the royal line of the Messiah (Ge 49:10; Ru 4:18–21; Mt 1:1–16).

Further, the placement on the east is significant. East is the place of the rising of the sun, the source of hope and sustenance. Westward was the sea. Israel's traditional stance was with its back to the sea and the descent of the sun. The ancient Hebrews were not a sea-faring people. For Israel the place of pride was on the east. Hence there we find the triad of tribes headed by Judah, Jacob's fourth son and father of the royal house that leads to King Messiah.

10–16 The southern encampment. Reuben, Jacob's firstborn son, leads the second triad, on the south. As one's stance in facing east has the south on the right hand, one senses a secondary honor given to the tribes associated with Reuben. He is joined by Simeon, the second son of Jacob by Leah. Levi, Leah's third son, is not included with the divisions of the congregation but is reserved the special function of the service of the tabernacle and the guarding of the precinct from the untoward actions of the rest of the community (see v.17 and ch. 3). This triad is completed by Gad, the first son of Leah's maidservant Zilpah.

17 The tent in the middle, representing God's presence within the heart of the camp, is a change from Ex 33:7–11. Here the tent is inside the camp, and all Israel is positioned around the tent. Here he is continually in their midst. There is a sense here of the progressive manifestation of the presence of God in the midst of the people. First he is on the mountain of Sinai; then he comes to the tent outside the camp; then he indwells the tent in the midst of the camp. One day he would reveal himself through the Incarnation in the midst of his people (Jn 1:1–18); and, on a day still to come, there will be the full realization of the presence of the person of God dwelling in the midst of his people (Rev 21:1–4).

This verse relates not only to the manner of encampment but especially to the manner of march. On the line of march the Judah and Reuben triads would lead the community; then would come the tabernacle with the attendant protective hedge of Levites (see 1:53); last would come the Ephraim and Dan triads. In this way there was not only the sense of the indwelling presence of God in the midst of the people, there was as well the sense that the peoples in their families and tribes were protecting before and behind the shrine of his presence.

18–24 The western encampment. The Rachel tribes were on the west. Joseph's two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, received a special blessing from their grandfather Jacob; but in the process the younger son, Ephraim, was given precedence over Manasseh (Ge 48:5–20). Here, true to Jacob's words, Ephraim is ahead of Manasseh. Last comes Benjamin, the last-born son of Jacob, Joseph's younger brother, on whom the aged father doted after the presumed death of Joseph.

25–31 The northern encampment. Dan was the first son of Bilhah, the maidservant of Rachel. Asher was the second son of Zilpah, the maidservant of Leah. Naphtali was the second son of Bilhah. These, then, are secondary tribes and are positioned on the north side of the shrine of the presence, as it were, on the left hand. Here again we need to read these texts with the values of the people who first experienced them. Our orientation tends to be to the north, but Israel's orientation was to the east. In the final settlement of the land, these three tribes situated to the north of the shrine actually settled in the northern sections of the land of Canaan.

32–33 These verses conform to and summarize 1:44–53. The total number is the same as in 1:46, and the distinction of the Levites is maintained (see 1:47–53). The arrangement of the numbers of the tribes in triads, each with subtotals, and the grand total for the whole suggest the concept of the stability of these large numbers in the text.

(c) Summary conclusion (2:34)

34 These words of absolute compliance contrast with Israel's later folly. This verse also speaks of significant order—a major accomplishment for a people so numerous, so recently enslaved, and more recently a mob in disarray. The text speaks well of the administrative leadership of Moses, God's reluctant prophet, and of the work done by the twelve worthies who were the leaders of each tribe. It may have been the beauty of the order of this plan of encampment that led the unlikely prophet Balaam to say, "How beautiful are your tents, O Jacob,/ your dwelling places, O Israel!" (Nu 24:5).

(3) The placement and the numbers of the Levites and firstborn of Israel (3:1–51)

The notion of order continues to lace itself unabatedly through this chapter. These early chapters have about them a stately grace and a sense of presence. When the modern reader attempts to envision the magnitude of the task the Lord gave to Moses to bring order to an immense number of people who were so recently slaves and now so newly free, the resulting sensation is one of overwhelming burden. But these chapters do not speak of burden at all but have about them a sense of calm control—the control of God himself.

(a) The family of Aaron and Moses (3:1–4)

1–2 At first blush the wording "the family of Aaron and Moses" seems out of order because normally Moses is placed before Aaron. But the emphasis is correct: it is the family of Aaron that is about to be described. Aaron's wife was Elisheba, the daughter of Amminadab and sister of Nahshon, prince of the tribe of Judah (see Nu 1:7; 2:3), and the mother of the four sons noted in this chapter (see Ex 6:23).

The accentuation indicates that Aaron may still have been in grief for his firstborn son, Nadab. The accents lead to the following punctuation (lit.): "Now these are the names of the sons of Aaron: the firstborn, Nadab; also Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar." Nadab is given double "honor," being identified as the firstborn, and the accents set his name off from those of his brothers.

3 Exodus 28:41 records God's command to Moses to anoint his brother, Aaron, and his sons as priests of the Lord (see Ex 30:30; Lev 8:30). This solemn act gave recognition of a special consecration to the Lord and a particular knowledge on their part that they were no longer ordinary--they were now special to God. This anointing led naturally to being ordained. The Hebrew idiom "who were ordained" literally means "to fill the hand" (Heb. of Ex 32:29). The hands of the anointed were filled with a sense of the presence of the divine mystery. These were men of moment, servants of God.

The diagram of the camp (with an eastern orientation) would look like this:

4 Nadab and Abihu used fire that the Lord had not commanded (Lev 10:1). The pain of this account is strengthened by its brevity and mystery. We are left at a loss to explain their motivation, just as we do not know the precise form of their error. Because of the prohibition of wine and beer among the priests in their priestly service in Lev 10:8–11, these sons of Aaron may have committed their offense against God while in a drunken state.

Verse 4 states the matter of the death of these errant priests of the Lord succinctly: "[They] fell dead before the LORD." More fully: "Fire came out from the presence of the LORD and consumed them, and they died before the LORD" (Lev 10:2). This suggests a bolt of lightning (cf. 1Ki 18:38). There is a certain sense of poetic justice in the fact that these wicked priests who used unauthorized fire in the worship of the Lord were themselves destroyed by fire from his presence. Nadab and Abihu's fate is made even sadder in that they did not leave sons after them to continue their names among the priestly rolls in Israel. When they died, their story was over. Each time they are mentioned in the Bible, it is with sadness (cf. Nu 26:61; 1Ch 24:2). It is also the mercy of God that Aaron had two other sons who were not involved in the perfidy of their brothers. Hence the Aaronic priestly line extended through the two younger sons, Eleazar and Ithamar (see 1Ch 24:1–4), who continued to minister throughout the lifetime of Aaron.

(b) The duties for the Levites (3:5–10)

5–8 Clear distinctions are made here between the priestly house (the sons of Aaron) and the Levites. The latter were to assist and serve the priests—and the whole nation in the process. The Levites come out from among the nation; they were a part of the nation but are now distinct.

Interestingly, Moses is addressed in v.5. He is responsible for the nation as a whole and, hence, for the faithful obedience of the Levites in their service of the priestly house of Aaron. Moreover, the tribe of the Levites was to be "brought near," terminology for the approach of the Divine Presence. Only Moses had an open invitation to draw near to God in a direct manner. Now he is presented with the task of drawing these other ministers near to their work before the Lord. This work consisted of service to Aaron and the guarding of the ministry relating to him and the whole congregation. Moreover, they were responsible for the tasks of moving the furnishings of the tabernacle at times when the camp was on the move.

The key to the work of the Levites may be in the words "perform [GK 9068] duties for him." The basic meaning of the Hebrew is "to keep watch," "to guard." Hence the Levites were to guard the holy things from foolish people and to care for the holy things when the people were to be on the move.

9 That the Levites are subsidiary to the priests is made quite clear ("wholly given"). It appears that the issue here is service to Aaron (and through him to the Lord); in 8:16 the service is to the Lord.

10 The warning of the death penalty of 1:51 is repeated. The Hebrew term is literally "stranger," i.e., anyone lacking authorization. Service at the tabernacle may be done only at the express command of God. If the sons of Aaron were put to death at the commencement of their duties, how dare an unauthorized person even think to trespass (see 3:38; 18:7)!

(c) The separation of the Levites (3:11–13)

11–13 The words "in place of" are a clear example of substitution in the OT (cf. Ge 22:13; also Mt 20:28). The Hebrew text emphasizes the word "mine" by using it four times in vv.12–13, by the emphatic "I" at the beginning of v.12, by the concluding "I am the LORD," and by three verbs constructed with the first person pronoun ("I have taken," "I struck down," and "I set apart"). Again we are told that the Levites were from the midst of Israel but are now the exclusive property of the Lord (see 13:2). The last phrase of this section, "I am the LORD," adds authority, significance, and weight to the text. It is a reminder of both what has been revealed about his blessed person and work and what he has shown himself to be in relation to his people.

(d) The census of the Levites (3:14–39)

14–20 The enumerating of the Levites corresponds to that of the other tribes but is to be done of males from the age of one month rather than from twenty years. In summary, the Levites, who were not being mustered for war but for special service of the Lord, were distinct from the rest of the tribes in several aspects: (1) they had their service in and about the holy things and the holy place of God; (2) they were not numbered among the tribes but were to be distributed among them; (3) they are numbered differently than the other tribes; (4) they are not the fighting men of Israel but her ministers, subject to the leadership of the priests; and (5) they had certain restrictions of behavior and manner that marked off their office as distinct from the rest of the people.

21–26 The words of 1:53—"their tents around the tabernacle of the Testimony"—are detailed by four paragraphs in vv.21–38.

The description of the Levitical clans leads up to the most favored: Gershon to the west (vv.21–26), Kohath to the south (vv.27–32), Merari to the north (vv.33–37), and Moses and Aaron and sons to the east (v.38). The secular tribes, by contrast, began with the most favored: Judah on the east (2:3), Reuben on the south (2:10), Ephraim on the west (2:18), and Dan on the north (2:25)

The leaders of the Levitical houses correspond to the leaders of the secular tribes (see 1:5–15). As in the case of the names of the other tribal leaders, these names are theophoric (built on compounds of terms for God): Eliasaph ("[My] God Has Added") son of Lael ("Belonging to God"; 3:24); Elizaphan ("[My] God Has Protected") son of Uzziel ("My Strength Is God"; v.30); Zuriel ("My Rock Is God") son of Abihail ("My Father [God] Is Might"; v.35).

Under the leadership of Eliasaph, the clan of Gershon was to camp on the west side of the tabernacle (i.e., away from its entrance). Their particular charge was the structure itself: the tent, its coverings, and the varied curtains and ropes. This was a significant charge for the people of the house of Gershon, whose male members over the age of one month were 7,500.

There were three curtains or covering screens of the tabernacle: (1) one at the gate of the court (v.26; 4:26); (2) a second at the entrance of the tent (vv.25, 31; 4:25); and (3) a third dividing off the Most Holy Place within the tent (4:5).

27–32 The Kohathites under the leadership of Elizaphan were to encamp on the south side. This clan, the largest of the Levitical families, had particular concerns for the care of the principal furnishings of the tabernacle along with many implements of their service. Aaron's son Eleazar, "the chief leader," was placed over this group of Levites, probably because of the inordinately sensitive nature of their work.

The term "Amramites" reminds us of the family of Aaron and Moses. Aaron is an Amramite (see Ex 6:20). The presence of the family of the Amramites suggests that Amram was not the direct father of Aaron, Miriam, and Moses but an ancestor. Hence, Aaron and Moses were from the family of Kohath, of the tribe of Levi. The Kohathites were responsible for the care of the most holy things (4:4–18).

33–37 The house of Merari, camped on the north of the tabernacle, was led by Zuriel and numbered 6,200 males from the age of one month. Their particular charge was the care of the frames, posts, bases, and crossbars of the tent, as well as all auxiliary materials. It is fitting that this clan of Levites was stationed on the north, as their work is not nearly as glamorous as that of the other two companies of Levites. There is a consistency in that this house of the Levites is on the same side of the tent as the triad led by Dan.

38 Moses and Aaron had the most honored location. They guarded the entrance to the Tent of Meeting, and they did so facing the sun, and it was the direction of the encampment of the people. Later on, the entrance to Solomon's temple also would face east.

Moses and Aaron were not placed on the east side of the tabernacle because of arrogance; rather, they were placed there for a representational ministry. Theirs was an exclusive work but beneficent to the entire community. The sovereignty of God was evident in his limitations on the means to approach him. The "stranger" (NIV, "anyone else"; GK 2424) could be a better man or woman, more pious and devout than a given son of Aaron; but he or she would still face death based on presumption (cf. 1:51; 3:10, 38; 18:7).

39 The total of Levites given in v.39 is 22,000, which is 300 less than the total of 7,500 Gershonites (v.22), 8,600 Kohathites (v.28), and 6,200 Merarites (v.34) (= 22,300). Many scholars believe that there has been a textual corruption in the number in v.28, that the correct number of the Kohathites is 8,300 (as in the LXX).

Concerning the grand sum of 22,000 Levites, we observe that this is a bit small compared with the numbers given for the other tribes in ch. 1. There is a consistency, however, when this number is compared to the 23,000 Levites in the second census (26:62). It is particularly small when we realize that the 22,000 included all males in the tribe of Levi who were over the age of one month rather than over the age of twenty years as in the other tribes.

(e) The census and redemption of the firstborn (3:40–51)

40–43 The basic teaching of this text is that the male Levites over the age of one month were regarded by the Lord as a redemption for the "firstborn" (GK 1147) of the nation. The firstborn of animals were to be sacrificed to the Lord; but God never countenanced the sacrifice of humans on his altars. Hence a substitution was done; a male Levite was regarded as a substitution for the firstborn member of a secular tribe. The firstborn of the livestock were also included in the substitutionary arrangement; Levites for firstborn of Israel and Levite's livestock for firstborn livestock of Israel.

The command of God seems to be distinct in this text. Not only was there to be a count of a discrete group of people, but the names were to be written down (cf. 1:2). The number of the firstborn of the Israelites came to 22,273. This number stands out from all the other numbers we have seen thus far. All other numbers are rounded off, including the number of the Levites, 22,000. Yet this specific number of the firstborn of Israel is related to the rounded number of the Levites, to provide a surplus of 273 firstborn, for whom a redemption price had to be made.

The number of the firstborn sons of Israel (22,273) seems to be much too small for a population in excess of 2 million. In fact, this number accords very nicely for a population of about 250,000. My suggestion is that the unexpectedly small number of the firstborn in the first generation is an impressive clue to the size of the population as a whole and that there may be two different uses of numbers in this passage. Moses here presents a comparison of numbers of different sorts. The one number is specific—exactly 22,273; the other is rounded, inflated, rhetorical (22,000 Levites of a certain age). The first number is the surest figure for calculating the numbers of the whole community; the extrapolation of 250,000 is considered fitting for this number of firstborn persons. Against this specific figure (22,273) is pitted a rhetorical figure (22,000, the number of Levites of a certain age) in order to provide an analogy of redemption. The "surplus" of these two discordant types of figures affords the opportunity to deal with the problem of a surplus. The payment of a redemption price of five sanctuary shekels per "surplus" individual teaches us that every individual needs to be accounted for, no matter how these numbers are used. Possibly the point of the passage is not the numbers per se but the importance of paying the redemption price for each individual firstborn person in the young nation.

44–51 To make up for the number of the firstborn Israelites beyond the number of the Levites, a special tax of five shekels (see Lev 27:6) was to be paid for each of the 273 supernumeraries. This is the payment of a redemption price, according to the heavier sanctuary shekel. That silver was then paid to Aaron and his sons, as commanded by the Lord, so that the full complement of the firstborn sons of the community might all be redeemed together.

The redemption of the firstborn is a marvelous expression of the grace of God. Never since the story of the binding of Isaac (Ge 22) has God demanded the firstborn son of any of his people as a sacrifice to his majesty. Nor does God demand that his people enslave themselves to him (cf. Ro 12:1–2). Nevertheless, the firstborn sons are the special possession of the Lord. God does not demand the life of these sons; such would be abhorrent to the Hebrew faith. God does not demand their enslavement; such would be a slight on his mercy. But he does demand their redemption—and provides the means for bringing that to pass. The resultant weight of the shekels so collected is given (1,365 shekels) as a statement of the impressive nature of the transaction and as a witness to its accuracy (5 x 273).

(4) The numbers of the Levites in tabernacle service (4:1–49)

(a) The command for the census and a description of duties (4:1–33)

1–2 When the sons of Levi are mentioned in 3:17, their order is Gershon, Kohath, and Merari; this order also informs the structure of the balance of ch. 3: Gershonites (vv.21–26), Kohathites (vv.27–32), and Merarites (vv.33–37; cf. Ge 46:11; Ex 6:16; 1Ch 6:1, 16).

The order of the listing of sons in the Bible is not necessarily that of birth order; but the consistent pattern Gershon, Kohath, Merari suggests that birth order is intended here. This makes the order of the Levitical families in Nu 4 somewhat unexpected, as the families of Kohath (the presumed second son) are mentioned first (vv.2–20), then the families of Gershon (vv.21–28), and finally the families of Merari (vv.29–33). The same pattern is recapitulated in the numbering listed at the end of the chapter (vv.34–45).

The reason for this elevation of the second son over his older brother seems to be based on the sovereign selection of the Lord and the favored work he gives this family in proximity to the holiest things. Further, we find here a recurring pattern in the Hebrew text: the surprising elevation of a lesser son over his older brother. These are examples of the grace of God that reaches out in sovereign selection, bringing blessing to whom he wishes to bring blessing, elevating whom he desires to elevate, for reasons of his own will (cf. Isaac over Ishmael, Jacob over Esau, Joseph over Reuben, Moses over Aaron, Saul and David over their respective brothers).

3 The census here is of all males "from thirty to fifty years," in contrast to ch. 3, where all males over the age of one month are listed (v.15). This chapter lists those Levites who were of the age to serve in the tabernacle. Of the 22,000 Levite males mentioned in 3:39, there were 8,580 of service age (v.48). From 8:24 we learn that the beginning age for service was twenty-five; perhaps the first five years were something of an apprenticeship.

4–5 The paragraphs detailing the work of the Kohathites in their care of the most holy things come to the modern reader as truly from another time. The attention to care and detail for holy things is, lamentably, a lost art. Even though the primary care of these holy things was given to the Kohathites, they were forbidden to touch them (v.15)—or even to look on them (v.20)—lest they die. All the work of the Kohathites was to be strictly supervised by Aaron and his sons, and only the priests themselves were to touch and look on the unveiled holy things. We presume that even they had to be extremely careful in this regard (see 3:2–4).

6–15 Translators have difficulty in identifying the precise nature of the "hides of sea cows" (i.e., the outer covering of the ark) and the other items of holy furniture. The Hebrew word rendered "sea cow" is similar to the Arabic term for the dolphin; hence, porpoise-hide or hide of sea cows seems correct.

The manner of the transport of the holy things was by foot, with the six packages of holy things suspended between carriers by poles (see vv.6, 8, 11, 14) or kept on a carrier frame (vv.10, 12). The sad story of Uzzah is an unwitting self-test of the profound significance of these words (2Sa 6:6–7).

16 The special functions of the high priest are specified in this section both as a delimitation and as a mercy to the other sacral persons. The priest had certain duties peculiar to his office that none other might ever do. But the mercy of God was that there was a person who could draw near to the most holy things on behalf of the people. Were the high priest unable to attend to the holy things, there could be no worship from any of the community. Hence, his welfare ought to have been the concern of the people, for theirs was certainly tied to him.

17–20 The final section relating to the Kohathites in this portion concerns their ongoing service before the Lord in the context of the ongoing people of God; but it also presents a significant warning: any improper approach toward, touch of, or glance at the sacred things would mean death. The underlying reason on God's part may well have been mercy. It was a mercy of God that he had made himself known to anyone; it was the continuing mercy of God that he did not destroy more persons more quickly because of their wickedness; and it was a condescending mercy of God that he presented himself in their midst. The revelation of God's word brings with it demands, some of which seem harsh and difficult. But God is near. Some seem to be so judgmental; yet God has not destroyed all. Some seem to be so threatening; yet God by his mercy allows some sense of his presence to remain known in the camp. His manifestation is based on his mercy; his strictures allow his mercy to continue to be realized.

21–28 The Gershonites cared for the outer curtains and hides of the tabernacle. They and the Merarites were permitted to touch the things they were responsible for (cf. vv.15–20); the men of Kohath were not even to look at or touch the things of the Most Holy Place. But the Gershonites and the Merarites were not to do their work alone. Even with them Aaron was to be the chief responsible agent, but he was able to delegate some of that responsibility to his son Ithamar.

29–33 Similar phrasing to the two other family units graces this section, with the instructions that the Merari family was to have their principal duties with the frames, crossbars, posts, bases, pegs, ropes, and other equipment. Their work was as important as that of any other family group; for without it the more desirable, prestigious work of the tabernacle could not be done. Hence the Merarites could take an interest even in the placing of a post, a peg, or a rope, not because each of these items is a distinct, suitable "type of Christ," but because the worship of God could not proceed—nor could the camp move out—unless these people were doing their holy work.

(b) A description of the census of Kohath, Gershon, and Merari (4:34–45)

34–45 The most notable thing in the census of the Levitical families in this section is the use of numbers. They still appear to be rounded off; but since the numbers are smaller than those in ch. 1, the rounding off is done to the tens level: 2,750 from Kohath, 2,630 from Gershon, and 3,200 from Merari.

(c) A summary of the census and the work of Moses in the census (4:46–49)

46–49 Here we find the seemingly routine use of a summary text in which notice is given of compliance on the part of the leaders. Further, the total number of the men from the three Levitical families from the age of thirty to fifty who worked in and about the Tent of Meeting was 8,580. These summary texts give a sense of completion to the unit. Hebrew style seems to allow the reader to enjoy a sense of "going full-circle."

b. Diverse commands and rituals in preparation for the triumphal march (5:1–10:10)

(1) The test for purity and the law of jealousy (5:1–31)

(a) The expulsion of the impure from the camp (5:1–4)

1–2 In biblical times skin diseases, especially open sores, were among the three prominent factors (along with oozing discharges and contact with dead bodies) that rendered one unclean and hence unfit to be with the community; such a person was also a possible contaminate to the tabernacle and the pure worship of the Lord. It is not clearly indicated (despite the NIV rendering) that the offending skin diseases are infectious, for some of the diseases that might cause the disorders described in Lev 13 are not infectious. A preferable, nonspecific translation is "[to suffer] a serious skin disorder." The OT concept of "uncleanness" is hard for many modern readers to understand. For more on "skin disease," see Lev 13–14 and comments.

The second problem rendering a person ritually unclean is a discharge of any kind (see comments on Lev 15). These discharges were primarily from the sexual organs and were chronic in nature.

The third factor rendering a person unclean in ancient Israel was contact with a dead body. The ultimate tangible sign of uncleanness in ancient Israel was the corpse. Processes of decay and disease in dead flesh were evident to all. Physical contact with a corpse was a sure mark of uncleanness and quite possibly a source of infection.

3 The modern reader should be impressed that these various disorders that render one unclean, and hence to be expelled from the camp, include male and female alike. The concept of clean versus unclean cuts across sexual lines. Women are excluded along with men, and women may be released of exclusion along with men. The essential issue in all laws of purity in Israel was not magic or health or superstition; the great reality was the presence of the Lord in the camp; there can be no uncleanness where he dwells.

4 Israel fully complied with this law when it was initiated (cf. 1:54; 2:34; 3:16, 42, 51; 4:49). In view of the dramatic phrase "I dwell among them" (v.3), the essential reason for the importance of "uncleanness" in the camp is the indwelling presence of the Lord. His commands that the unclean be expelled from the camp are essentially expressions of his mercy.

(b) Restitution for personal wrongs (5:5–10)

5–7 Here Moses discusses a person within the camp who wrongs another. The connection of vv.5–10 (personal wrongs) to the first paragraph (ritual uncleanness) may be one of moving from the outward and visible to the inward and more secret faults that mar the community. Those with evident marks of uncleanness are to be expelled for the duration of their malady. But more insidious are those people who have overtly sinned against others and think that they may continue to function as though there were no real wrong.

The particulars of the text demand a procedure for restitution in the case of unspecified personal wrongs. Of first importance is the recognition that such wrongs are not slight offenses between people only but are in fact acts of treachery against God. The steps for restitution include (1) a condition of guilt—that person is guilty, which excludes that person from active participation in the community as surely as a serious skin disease or contact with a dead body; (2) a public confession of that sin—presumably in the precincts of the sacred shrine, before witnesses and priests; (3) full restitution plus one-fifth to the one wronged (see Lev 22:14; 27:11–13, 31); (4) a sacrifice to the Lord of a ram offering for atonement.

8 Each above step is enumerated in Lev 6:1–7 in the initial presentation of the law of defrauding. However, Nu 5 has an additional provision: What if a person has defrauded another but that person is no longer living and has no living relative to whom restitution might be paid? Verse 8 adds the next proviso: (5) the payment of restitution is to be made to the priest when there is no suitable relative to whom such payment might otherwise be made. In this way the debt is paid fully, no matter who of the injured family has survived. The term for "close relative" (GK 1457) means "the protector of the family rights" and sometimes is translated "kinsman-redeemer" (e.g., Ru 4:3).

9–10 Finally, a note is added that the offerings presented to the priests truly belong to the priests. The offering is not a sham that is withdrawn secretly after a public presentation. The intent of this law on defrauding is clear in the context of this chapter: purity among the people is essential for their successful journey through the desert and their eventual triumph over the inhabitants of the land. Just as the physically impure needed to be expelled from the camp, so those attitudes and jealousies one might have against another of a petty or serious nature also had to be dealt with equitably for the camp to remain pure.

(c) The law of jealousy (5:11–31)

Yet another element that will lead to impurity within the camp is undetected marital infidelity. The law concerning jealousy is best read in the context and flow of the two earlier laws in this chapter. Moses moves from issues of purity established with the physical marks (vv.1–4), to those of interpersonal relationships (vv.5–10), and then to the most intimate of relationships, that of purity of a man and woman in their marriage bed (vv.11–31). As with the first two, so the unexposed but treacherous act of marital infidelity also brings harm to the camp as a whole.

11–15 A test for marital fidelity is far harder to prove than a test for a skin disorder; hence the larger part of the chapter is given over to this most sensitive issue. The husband's "feelings of jealousy" may have been provoked on the basis of good cause, and the issue must be faced; the concern is ultimately based on the reality of God's dwelling among his people (v.3). The gravity of the ritual shows that the Law regards marital infidelity most seriously. Such was not just a concern of a jealous husband; the entire community was affected.

Two sides need to be discussed. On one hand, the husband may shame his wife publicly and force her to a rigorous, demeaning religious trial merely on the (unfounded) suspicion of marital faithlessness. She may have presented no evidence whatsoever. Further, there is no mention of the guilt, trial, and judgment of the man that this woman is supposedly involved with—all guilt, shame, trial, and judgment rest on her shoulders.

On the other hand, there is a limitation on the husband—a protection of the wife from his abusive hand. Were there not such a provision in a male-dominant culture, an angry, suspicious husband might strike out against his wife without any sure reason, harm her physically and mentally, and even take her life. But God reaches out through Moses and has a means of escape for a woman under suspicion of unfaithfulness. The trial she is taken to is not a kangaroo court; it is in the precincts of the tabernacle, under the jurisdiction of the priests, in concert with a solemn sacrifice—she places herself under the hand of the Lord.

The woman brought to such a place will not take this issue lightly. Public humiliation, shame, anger with her spouse, and exposure before priests and people were all terrifying prospects. But then neither would her husband take these issues lightly. For he was not just spreading rumors nor digging at his wife in the privacy of their home. He too was coming before the Lord, and he too might be judged. Hence we have another expression of the mercy of God to women who are so often abused by prideful men. Here is a means of escape from suspicion and evasion of punishment. If the woman was indeed guilty, then the husband was vindicated. This was important, not just for the pique he might be feeling, but for the sense of the ongoing stability of the family. If a woman was unfaithful to her husband, she might be carrying the child of another man; and the rights of inheritance might become hopelessly enmeshed in the complexities of family relationships.

But if the woman was innocent, then her husband would have his reasons for jealousy alleviated. Again, this is a limitation on his jealous nature. Most men would be very careful before pressing the issue. The results could be disastrous for themselves.

16–18 The central phrasing of this text is that the priest shall bring the woman to stand before the Lord. The repetition in v.18 is for emphasis. The biblical phrasing demands a theological understanding of the woman's judgment. Further, that she is brought before the Lord helps again to demonstrate the concept of purity and the proper connection of this law with the two earlier laws of the chapter.

Taking holy water, adding dust, and then mixing a doubtful drink seems to be a world away from things we understand. It seems most unlikely that the addition of dust from the floor to the holy water is what makes that water "bitter" (GK 5253). It was added to holy water, not to change the taste, but to emphasize the holiness of the matter.

Next the woman is made to loosen her hair, perhaps a sign of openness on her part. She is to be presented before the Lord. This loosening of the hair would be for the guilty woman an expectation of judgment and mourning (see Lev 13:45; 21:10). For the innocent wife, who had nothing to fear but the glory of the Lord to demonstrate, the loosening of her hair is a strengthening action of feminine personhood in the Holy Place.

The terminology that bitter water brings a curse is problematic. It is not just that the water was bitter tasting but that it had the potential of bearing with it a bitter curse. That this potion was neither simply a tool of magic nor merely a psychological device to determine stress is to be seen in the repeated emphasis on the role of the Lord (vv.16, 18, 21, 25). The verdict of the woman was precipitated by her physiological and psychological responses to the bitter water, but the judgment was from the Lord. The phrase may be rendered in a somewhat expansive manner: "the water that may result in bitterness and provoke a profound curse."

19 The priest presents two possibilities. First, the woman is truly innocent. In this case his specific prayer to the Lord is that the water with the potential of bitterness will not harm her. The priest's words to the innocent woman assure her of no harm from the bitter water. If she is truly guilty of the deed that her husband suspects, then the full onus of the curse-bearing waters will come to her, enter her body, descend through her intestines, and be the physical means the Lord will use to produce a physical change in her body.

20–22 The other possibility is that the woman has been unfaithful to her husband, in which case the priest pronounces a curse on her from the Lord. The NIV note has "causes you to have a miscarrying womb and barrenness." The figurative language here (and in v.27) speaks of the loss of the capacity for childbearing (and, if pregnant at the time of her judgment, the miscarriage of the child). For a woman in the ancient Near East to be denied the ability to bear children was a personal loss of inestimable proportion.

The woman who was guilty may return to her home to await the outcome of the oath. If she was innocent of infidelity, she should count on progeny. If she was guilty but not caught in the act, then she would suffer debilitating physical symptoms that would prohibit successful pregnancies. She would then bear her guilt in her body and the inner chambers of her heart. In either case the woman was to hear the words of the curse in the midst of the solemn precincts, and then to bring that potential curse on herself by saying to the Lord and his priest, "Amen. So be it." The double "Amen" (lit. Heb.; GK 589) is her signal that she understands the issues and is in agreement with the judgment—or escape from judgment—that will come into her body.

23–28 After the words of the cursing had been announced, the priest would write them on a scroll and then blot the letters off into the water. The woman was not only going to hear the words but in a dramatic, figurative sense drink them; thus the awful sense of taking the curse into one's own body was realized. The NIV suggests the very drinking of the water would cause suffering. The bitterness was not in taste, convulsions, or physical shock but in the latent sense of the potential judgment of childlessness. "Bitterness" is a most appropriate term for just this potential judgment. The innocent woman, however, would not suffer the bitterness of the water and its curses.

29–31 The summary statement of this law concerns the woman who has been rightly accused by her husband. The chapter has a cohesion to it of instances relating to the maintaining of purity within the camp. The importance of marital fidelity is further supported by numerous NT texts (especially 1Co 5), which point to God's continuing affirmation of the seventh commandment: You are not to commit adultery.

(2) The vow of the Nazirite and the Aaronic Benediction (6:1–27)

(a) The vow of the Nazirite (6:1–21)

1–2 It is not generally recognized that these vows of special devotion to God could be made by a woman as well as a man; that is, women were not precluded from this vow (cf. 30:1–16). The vow described here is not a routine matter; rather, it is an act of unusual devotion to God, based perhaps on an intense desire to demonstrate one's utter separation to the Lord.

"Nazirite" (GK 5687) describes the person who has marked out a special time of separation or consecration to God. The Nazirite had to face three demanding limitations: (1) absolute abstinence from all produce of the vine (whether intoxicating or not; see vv.3–4), (2) total forswearing of trimming of the hair (v.5), and (3) utter separation from contact with a dead body (vv.6–8). For the Nazirite one major clean food (any form of grape products) was prohibited during the course of one's vow. After the period of the consecration was over, wine and all grape products were permitted again (v.20).

3–4 The term "fermented drink" (shekar; GK 8911) is often used in association with "wine" (yayin; GK 3516) and is found in texts condemning drunkenness (see 1Sa 1:15; Pr 20:1; Isa 5:11, 22; et al.). But shekar is also used in other texts describing the normal, moderate drinking (along with wine) that was part of the expected common food of the people of Israel. Further, shekar could be used in the drink offering (Nu 28:7) in the worship of the Lord. Since yayin is the fermented product of the vine, presumably shekar is the fermented product of the field, i.e., beer. The Nazirite was to abstain from both wine and beer and from everything associated with the wine grape, not just the fermented beverages, but even the vinegar that results when such products sour. Moreover, the prohibition included fresh grape juice, grapes either fresh or dried, and even the seed and skin of the grape. It is unclear why grape products are specifically forbidden to the Nazirite.

5 A second voluntary prohibition for the Nazirite was the normal and expected trimming of the hair (cf. Jdg 13:5). The unexpectedly long hair of a Nazirite man was a physical mark of his vow of special "separation" (GK 5694) to the Lord. Since women in most cultures wear their hair longer than men do, presumably the Nazirite woman might not only have let her hair grow long but may have allowed it to remain relatively unkempt (cf. "untended vines," Lev 25:5, 11), or perhaps she let it hang loose as opposed to putting it up. Otherwise, it is difficult to see how the (unusually) long hair of a woman would be a distinctive sign of her period of vow. In this way, the Nazirite was to be "holy."

6–8 The third prohibition for the Nazirite concerned any physical contact with a dead body—even within his own family. Here a person faced heart-rending decisions not to do normal things in times of great grief because of intense consecration to the Lord. Even a priest was expected to care for the dead body of a close relative (Lev 21:1–3). But the Nazirite could not care for such a body, no matter how beloved the person, or he would bring contamination on himself.

9–12 The accidental death of a person in the proximity of the Nazirite makes him unclean, guilty of sin before the Lord. This section deals with the unexpected and the unplanned events of daily living. The special focus of the person's contamination is his dedicated hair, which was to be shaved on the seventh day of the Nazirite's rite of purification. Then, following obligatory offerings of birds (the less expensive offerings) for sin (v.8) and burnt offerings and a lamb (the more expensive) for guilt offerings, the person would rededicate himself to the Lord for the period of time that had originally been planned; the time spent up to that point would no longer count because of the contamination. No wonder this vow is termed a "hard vow" (v.2; cf. Pr 20:25).

13–20 The public presentation of the Nazirite by the priest at the Tent of Meeting before the Lord shows that this type of vow was not just an intensely personal and private act of relationship with the Lord. Any such public rite suggests that the vow was also a matter of public knowledge. Presumably, the community could be supportive of the person during the time of his vow. But more important is the personal presentation before the Lord at the Tent of Meeting (see vv.13–14, 16–17, 20). Through this vow, one had a profound sense of one's coming into the presence of the Holy One.

Burning the hair signified the completion of the vow and demonstrated that the act of the Nazirite was in devotion to the Lord. Since the Nazirite was prohibited any contact whatsoever with wine and vine products during his vow, one might conclude that such things are essentially evil in themselves. However, a wine offering ("drink offering"; GK 5821) was presented on the altar to the Lord along with the clean animals and the associated grain offerings. The conclusion respecting the prohibition of wine and beer to the Nazirite during his vow must take into account the use of wine in the rite of vow-completion as well as the notice that he was then free to drink wine again (v.20).

21 The costs of the Nazirite vow were considerable and varied. It was not a demand of God on his people but a provision for men or women to voluntarily show their devotion to him.

(b) The Aaronic Benediction (6:22–27)

22–23 The words of the prayer of vv.24–26 are termed the Aaronic Benediction. Perhaps the most impressive aspect of this prayer is that it is a provision for God's desire to bless his people. Blessing is his idea. It is not something his people must beg for, but the outreaching of his grace.

The pattern of the prayer is exquisite; the language is poetic and emotive. There are three lines each with the divine name "LORD"; the repetition of the divine name gives force to the expression of v.27 and is certainly fitting with the (later) Christian revelation of the Trinity. Each line conveys two elements of benediction, and the lines are progressively longer. Not counting the threefold use of the divine name, there are twelve words to the prayer, which suggest the twelve tribes of Israel.

This prayer speaks of the light of the presence of the Lord; but there is a sense that the prayer itself is light-giving. Prayed in faith, it expects God to respond by drawing near and enfolding one in his grace. In fact, the concluding words promise that he will bless his people.

24 While these words are directed to the entire community, the pronouns are singular. The Lord blesses the whole by blessing individuals; he blesses individuals by blessing the whole. "The LORD bless you and keep you" are words of reminder, of attestation of promise. The buttressing words "and keep you" further explain his blessing. God's intention for his people is their good; he will preserve them to enjoy that good.

25 The words "make his face shine upon you" recall the experience of Moses on Mount Sinai (see Ex 34:29–35). As his glory had caused Moses' face to shine, so the Lord desires to make his presence known to all his people. When Moses was on the mountain, it was in the context of terror. But God had come down in grace; his revelation was of mercy. Hence we have the splendidly suitable tie of the light of his face and the grace of his presence.

26 The Hebrew word shalom ("peace"; GK 8934) is here seen in its most expressive fullness, not just as an absence of war, but as the positive state of rightness and the fullness of well-being. This kind of peace comes only from the Lord. The expression "turn his face" suggests pleasure and affection and is functionally equivalent to "smile."

27 The Lord says that this prayer is the means of placing his name on his people. Since "the LORD" itself is a term of blessing whereby the eternal God states his relatedness to his people, these words of blessing could not be more appropriate. The prayer is designed to help the people experience the reality of the blessing of the Lord.

(3) The offerings at the dedication of the tabernacle (7:1–89)

(a) The presentation of carts and oxen (7:1–3)

1 With much repetition of language, ch. 7 records the magnificent (and identical) gifts given to the Lord for tabernacle service by the leaders of each of the Twelve Tribes. It is wonderfully fitting that the record of these gifts follows the Aaronic Benediction (6:24–26): in response to God's solemn promise to bless his people, they bring their blessing to him—magnificent gifts in twelve sequential days of celebrative pageantry.

The focus in the chapter is on the tabernacle, the "dwelling place of God," and the altar, the point of approach to God's dwelling. After Moses had completed supervising the construction and erection of the sacred tent and its altar, he "anointed" and "consecrated" them for the Lord's special services. "Anoint" (GK 5417) is the same term used for the anointing of special persons. "Consecrate" (GK 7727) means that those present recognize that the tabernacle and its furnishings and the altar and its implements are no longer common items but are now marked out as special, distinct, and other—set apart to the worship of God.

2–3 Then the leaders of the tribes (cf. chs. 1–2) come forward with their first gifts. There are six carts, each drawn by a pair of oxen, for the special use of the priests in transporting the elements of the sacred tent and its furnishings when the people set out on their march toward Canaan. The Hebrew used here has traditionally been understood to describe a covered wagon, which would certainly be appropriate for transporting the sacred items.

(b) The distribution of the carts and oxen (7:4–9)

4–9 Following the command of God, Moses takes these six covered carts and their pairs of oxen and distributes them to the three Levitical families based on their need and their particular responsibilities. Two of the carts and their four oxen he gives to the families of Gershon for their work in transporting the varied curtains of the tabernacle and the courtyard (see 4:24–28); the other four carts and their pairs of oxen go to the families of Merari for their work in transporting the frames, crossbars, etc., of the tabernacle and the courtyard (see 4:29–33). The Kohathites are not given any carts; they must carry the holy things on their shoulders, with staves placed through the carrying loops (see 4:4–20; esp. vv.6, 8, 11–12, 14). This prohibition of the use of carts for the holiest objects was not followed by David (see 2Sa 6:3–13).

(c) The plan of the tribal offerings (7:10–11)

10–11 The literal Hebrew reads "one leader for one day, one leader for one day." The repetition shows the pacing that God required. Each leader's gift was worth a day's celebration. None of the gifts were to be grouped, none of the leaders bunched. Each leader, and the people he represented, was to have his day of approach with significant gifts to the presence of the Lord.

(d) The offerings of the Twelve Tribes (7:12–83)

12–83 The leaders of the Twelve Tribes have already been named in 1:5–15 and 2:3–32. The order of the presentation is the same as the order of march: first the tribes camped to the east of the tabernacle; then those to the south; then those on the west; finally those on the north.

The gifts of each of the twelve worthies were the same:

one silver platter weighing about 1.5 kilograms one silver sprinkling bowl weighing about 0.8 kilogram one gold ladle weighing about 110 grams the plate and bowl containing flour mixed with oil for a grain offering the ladle filled with incense one young bull, one ram, and one male lamb for a burnt offering one buck goat for a sin offering two oxen, five rams, five buck goats, and five male lambs for a fellowship offering

These gifts were to be used in the worship patterns of the temple service. The "silver plate" may have been used in association with the bread of the Presence. The sprinkling bowls were for the blood that would be sprinkled on the altar. The gold "dish" might have been used for incense, as this is the way it was presented to the Lord. The shekel used to weigh the silver and gold gifts is termed the "sanctuary shekel," as against the half-value shekel sometimes used. The weight of the sanctuary shekel was established in Ex 30:13 as "twenty gerahs" (= .403 ounce or 11.4 grams; see EBC, 1:379). Certainly these gifts were regarded as substantial, particularly coming from a people so recently slaves. They had despoiled the Egyptians (Ex 12:35–36) to enrich the worship of their God. The incense that filled the dishes was the prescribed, fragrant incense of Ex 30:34.

Obviously the writer might more easily have said that each of the twelve leaders brought the same magnificent offerings to the Lord on his appointed day during the twelve-day celebrative period. How are we to regard his seeming excess of repetitive detail throughout the long chapter? Is it not possible that in this listing we catch a glimpse of the magnificent pomp and ceremony attending these gifts? Do we not see the genuine spirit of worship of each of the successive tribes as their turn came to bring gifts to the Lord? And finally, do we not see the joy of the Lord in his reception of these gifts? This chapter has a stately charm, a leisurely pace, and a studied sense of magnificence as each tribe in its turn was able to make gifts to God that he received with pleasure.

(e) The totals of the offerings (7:84–88)

84–88 At long last the twelve-day procession of givers and gifts came to its conclusion. Each tribal leader had his moment, each tribe its opportunity, and on each day there was experienced the smile of the Lord. In characteristic Hebrew style, this paragraph gives the sums of the twelve sets of gifts, a further witness to the opulence of the offerings, the festive nature of the ritual of presentation, and the sense of celebration each tribe had in its part.

(f) Moses' conversation with God (7:89)

89 The climax is Moses' hearing the voice of the Lord speaking to him from the central shrine, amid the cherubim and over the atonement cover. Communion is established between the Lord and his prophet; the people have an advocate with the Lord.

(4) Setting up the lamps and the separation and age of service of the Levites (8:1–26)

(a) Setting up the lamps (8:1–4)

1–2 The words "The LORD said to Moses" serve a double purpose: they present a new topic and remind the reader of the divine origin of the words and of the role Moses had as the intermediary between God and man. The seven lamps and the lampstand are described more fully in Ex 25:31–40. The lamps were to be positioned so that they would light the area in front of the lampstand, that is, the area where the bread of the Presence was displayed. Thus there would always be "light" on the bread.

On entering the Holy Place, the golden lampstand would be on the left side and the table of the bread of the Presence on the right side, with the altar of incense straight ahead. Beyond that altar was the veil leading into the Most Holy Place with the ark, the mercy seat, and the cherubim.

3–4 Aaron is reported to have obeyed the command of God in the proper focusing of the lamps; then a reminder of the beauty of the design of the lampstand is given. The most remarkable aspect of this section is the note that the lampstand was made in exact accordance with the pattern the Lord had given to Moses (see Ex 25:40; also cf. Heb 8:5; Rev 1:12–20).

(b) The separation of the Levites (8:5–22)

5–10 The Levites were distinct from the other tribes (see vv.6, 14, 16, 19): they were to have no tribal allotment; their places of living would be spread throughout the other tribes, but they were drawn from the tribes to have a special service before the Lord in assisting the priests.

The cleansing process of the Levites began with a sprinkling of water on them rather than with a sprinkling of blood (cf. Ex 29:20–21). In the Hebrew this water is termed "water of sin," a phrase taken to mean "water of cleansing" or "purification from sin" (cf. "bitter water" in 5:18). Next the Levites shaved their entire bodies, which speaks of the fullness of their cleansing (cf. Lev 14:8; see Nu 5:2). Shaving the body is in some ways a return to innocence and an initiative symbol of purity. Bodily hair needs to be cleansed regularly, for the follicles tend to collect and hold dirt. The cleansing of the Levites seems to be an initial rite of purification. Since Semitic men in the ancient world generally wore beards and had ample bodily hair, shaving must have been regarded as a remarkable act of devotion to God. The third factor in cleansing the Levites was washing their garments. The verb used for washing means "to tread," "to walk" (i.e., "to wash garments by treading"). This pictures the ancient form of washing clothing.

Following the sprinkling, shaving, and washing, the Levites were ready for the next step in their purification, the presentation of offerings and sacrifices to God: two bulls along with the fine flour mixed with oil that constitutes the grain offering. This would then be presented by Moses before the Tent of Meeting, with the nation gathered to witness the event. The people (their representatives) would then place their hands on the Levites as a means of identifying with them. The Levites had come from among the people; now they were standing in their place before the Divine Presence. This was a solemn act, worthy of reflection. The Levites were the substitutes for the nation; by placing hands on them, the people of the nation were dramatically acknowledging this substitutionary act (see 8:16–18).

11–14 Our text makes a subtle move from the placing of the hands of the people on the Levites to the placing of the hands of the Levites on the two bulls. This is a double substitution. The Levites substitute for the people, the bulls substitute for the Levites. The bulls, with this double signification, are then sacrifices of sin offering and burnt offering to provide atonement for the Levites.

Aaron comes more directly into the picture, as he is to present the Levites as a "wave offering" (GK 9485) before the Lord. The notion of "wave offering" is somewhat obscure to us. The idea was to hold an object, usually the part of the offering that would be the food for the priests, before the Lord, to wave it back and forth, and then to keep it for one's own use. In the case of the Levites, perhaps Aaron and his sons would place hands on their shoulders and then cause them to move from side to side in a symbolic way to represent that they were a living sacrifice presented before the Lord and that they now belonged to the priests to assist them. In this way the Levites were separated from the rest of the community; they belonged to the Lord, and in turn they would belong to the priests.

15–19 The Levites were next acknowledged by the Lord as his particular possession. They substituted for the firstborn of every mother in Israel. The story line of salvation comes strongly here: Passover! Israel was in Egypt. The tenth plague was imminent. Faithful people had slaughtered a lamb, roasted it, and were eating it along with bitter herbs and matzo bread. When the angel of death was passing over the camp, the angel looked for blood on the posts and lintel of each home. Where that blood was found, the angel moved on to the next home. No one died. All lived. But in those homes that lacked the prescribed blood, there came blood. Instead of the blood of an animal on the door bracing, there was blood in the bed of the oldest child; for the angel of death had extracted the most vicious toll, the death of the firstborn. But for the firstborn of the faithful Israelites, who were not killed, a price was to be paid; and that price was the Levites. They were given to the Lord for his exclusive use (cf. v.14). In turn the Lord gave his Levites to the priests as aids for the work of the ministry.

20–22 This section serves two functions: it reports the completion of the act of separation as a literary device; it also reports the obedience of the people as a mark of their initial compliance to the will and work of God (see 1:54; 2:34; 3:16, 51; 4:49; 5:4; 8:4, 20, 22; 9:5, 23). The implicit obedience of Moses and the people of Israel to the commands of God leaves us quite unprepared for their complaints against his loving character and their outrageous breaches of faith in the rebellions that begin in ch. 11.

(c) The age of service of the Levites (8:23–26)

23–26 At 4:3 the age for the service of the Levite is said to be from thirty to fifty. The present paragraph has the same upper limit but a new lower limit: twenty-five. We do know that the age for entering service for the Levites was reduced to twenty by David (1Ch 23:24, 27), as the circumstances of their work had greatly changed by the time of the monarchy (v.26). Apparently no contradiction was seen in these numbers at the time these words were written. The rabbis harmonized these two texts by surmising that a five-year period of apprenticeship was included in one number.

After a Levite had reached the mandatory retirement age of fifty, he was still free to assist his younger coworkers as long as he was able to do so (perhaps at the great festivals), but he no longer was to do the hard and difficult work he had done in his prime. Again, in these regulations we sense the holiness and the mercy of God. His holiness demands that his ministers be fully able to do the work that is required for them. His mercy precludes a man doing the work when he was no longer physically able.

(5) The celebration of the Passover (9:1–14)

(a) The command to keep the Passover (9:1–5)

1–2 The arrangement of materials in the book of Numbers is not strictly chronological. The events of this chapter actually preceded the beginning of the census of 1:2 (cf. 1:1). There are two discreet emphases here. The first concerns the appropriate time and the proper regulations for the Passover; the second is found in the verb "to celebrate" (GK 6913). One term focuses on the demands, obligations, and rites of worship in Hebrew Scripture and the other on the ability to reach out for the celebrative, enjoyable, and festive nature of that worship. To lose sight of the regulation is to trespass in presumption. To forget the celebrative is to lose the joy and heart of worship; only to follow the obligation is to slip into the dreary work of "religion."

3–4 In traditional Hebrew practice, "twilight" is regarded as the end of one day and the beginning of the next. The official determination of the precise moment was when one could no longer distinguish between a white or a black thread when standing outside in the growing darkness.

In addition to the emphasis on the appropriate timing of the Passover is the necessity for complete obedience to all the statutes and judgments of the celebration. The latter can lead in two directions: (1) to the obedience of faith that regards the minute details as important and compliance to them as that which will bring the pleasure of the Lord; (2) to legalism that finds itself so preoccupied with the details and the regulations as to lose the primary sense of the meaning God had in the legislation in the first place.

5 This report of compliance is yet another example of the obedience of Israel to the demands of the Lord in these early chapters of Numbers. Yet these reports ill-prepare us for the dreadful rebellion of Israel at Kadesh, described in the following chapters.

(b) The ceremonially unclean (9:6–8)

6–8 A crisis developed within the community because of ritual impurity on the part of some, who had come in contact with a dead body. Such contact rendered a person ritually unclean and no longer able to participate in the community until rites of purification had been completed (see 5:2). Hence such a person would not be permitted to participate in the celebrative Feast of the Passover. The section points to two issues: (1) the desire of these people to obey God fully in worship and festivals and (2) the formidable obstacle of participation based on ritual uncleanness.

Being "ceremonially unclean" (GK 3238) was not simply being physically soiled but was also a teaching device to remind the people of the holiness of God. The idea that any person at all might have the effrontery to approach the Lord is audacious in itself. Only by his grace may anyone come before him to worship. By developing a concept of ritual purity, an external symbol, the notion of internal purity might be presented.

Moses promised the people that he would seek an answer from the Lord regarding this situation of ceremonial uncleanness.

(c) Divine permission for a legitimate delay (9:9–13)

9–11 The grace of God is seen, not only in the words of his response to Moses, but in that he responded at all. God's gracious provision for those who were ritually unclean was an alternative opportunity to celebrate the Passover one month later, so that they would not be excluded totally from its observance. The text thus presents the reality of the distancing that uncleanness brings between a believer and his participation in the worship acts of the community; it also provides a merciful alternative from the Lord. Further, the answer of the Lord made provision also for those who might be away on a trip. Even when the Passover was celebrated a month later, it was still to be done fully in order. The text emphasizes the essentials of the meal and the ritual. There was to be the lamb (noted by the word "Passover"), the unleavened bread, and the bitter herbs.

12 The strictures for the Passover include two additional items: none of the feast is to be left over until morning, and the bones of the sacrificial lamb are not to be broken. Eating the Passover lamb and its attendant foods is to be done entirely in one evening (cf. Ex 12:10, 46; 16:19; 23:18). When the Lord Jesus ("our Passover lamb," 1Co 5:7; cf. Jn 1:29) was crucified, none of his bones were broken, in fulfillment of the Scripture (Jn 19:36; see 9:12; also Ex 12:46; Ps 34:20).

13 Grace is generally accompanied by presumption. Those who had no reason not to celebrate the Passover and simply failed to do so were to be cut off from the community. God's gracious provision for the distressed to have an alternative time of celebration was not to be license for the careless to ignore the Passover altogether. Such ones by their own neglect show that they are not part of the community and are not deserving of further union with it. The obdurate is to be "cut off" (GK 4162), which signifies either death by divine agency or perhaps banishment, a severe judgment indeed (cf. 1Co 11:28–30).

(d) The rights of the alien at Passover (9:14)

14 The alien first had to be circumcised before he was able to participate in the Passover celebration (cf. Ex 12:48). But there was an opening for the non-Israelite who had come to faith in the God of Israel to participate fully with the Israelites in holy worship. This is the point of the Abrahamic covenant (Ge 12:3).

(6) The covering cloud (9:15–23)

15 The cloud was the dramatic symbol of the presence of the Lord hovering above the tabernacle (cf. Ex 13:21; 40:34). That this was no ordinary cloud is attested not only by its spontaneous appearance at the completion of the setting up of the tabernacle but also by its appearance as fire by night. It was by means of the cloud that the Lord directed the movements of his people.

16 The mystic cloud, the fiery heaviness, and the enveloping presence must have been an extraordinary sight. The words "this is how it continued to be" suggest the permanent abiding of the cloud over the camp. The cloud and fire were both reversals of the expected phenomena of the time. To relieve the heat of the desert sun, there was a cloud by day. To reverse the cold darkness of the desert night, there was the comforting fire overhead.

17 Two significant verbs describe the presence of the cloud as the symbol of God's nearness. One means "to cover" (v.15; GK 4059); the other means "to settle" (8905). The expression "wherever the cloud settled" contains the significant verb shakan, which is the basis for the idea of the "Shekinah glory." The English rendering "shekinah" is built on the verb meaning "to dwell" and the shortened form of the divine name Yahweh (i.e., shakan-yah). This symbolizes God's nearness and remoteness. He is present as a cloud but hovers above; he is near as a fire, but one cannot draw very close.

18 The words "at the LORD's command" are literally "by the mouth of the LORD." The cloud was one way that the Lord spoke to his people; it was the means he used to direct the movements and the resting times of his people Israel.

19–22 The movement of the cloud and its presence were unpredictable, without discernible pattern. This was to impress on the people the sense that it was God who was leading them. The cloud might linger only a day or so, or it might linger in one spot nearly indefinitely. The wording of these verses indicates a very lengthy stay, a briefer stay, or a very short stay. Whatever it might be, the people were to move or to encamp based on the movement or settling of the cloud.

23 This verse gives a report of compliance. The repetitious nature of this section (vv.15–23) enhances the expectation of continued complete obedience to the sure direction of the Lord in Israel's movements through the desert. The role of Moses is mentioned for balance: He was the agent of the Lord who interpreted the movement of the cloud as signaling the movement of the people. The level of the tragedy of their subsequent disobedience is heightened by this paragraph of great obedience.

(7) The two silver trumpets (10:1–10)

(a) The command to fashion two silver trumpets (10:1–7)

1–2 The Bible speaks of two types of trumpets: the silver trumpet, as here (cf. 31:6; 1Ch 13:8; 2Ch 13:12; 29:26; Ps 98:6) and the ram's horn trumpet (the shofar; GK 8795), as in Jos 6:4. Both instruments are far removed from the modern trumpet, as they produced notes of only certain intervals such as fourths or fifths. The silver trumpet was a long, straight, slender metal tube with a flared end. Trumpets were blown for order and discipline, as required by the immense number of people.

3–7 Two trumpets were blown for assembly of the people and one for assembly of the leaders. Trumpets were also blown for a signal to the people to set out on the line of march, at times of battle (v.9), and during festivals of worship (v.10). Obviously different signals would be used; hence, we may presume the development of a guild of priestly musicians was demanded (v.8). These were professionals whose making of music was as serious as the work of a soldier on the battlefield and as sacred as any task done by a sacrificing priest.

(b) The ordinance for the silver trumpets (10:8–10)

8 The role of the sons of Aaron as the sole players of these silver trumpets further signals the sacral function of this music. These instruments were like the lampstand and the censers, implements in the worship of God.

9 In times of battle the distinctive Israelite trumpet signal for war would be blown so that (1) Israel would be remembered before the Lord and (2) the people might be rescued from their enemies. The trumpet blast was analogous to prayer, a means of participation in activating the will of God. By blowing the trumpets before the battle, Israel expected God's active presence in the battle scene.

10 As in the case of battle, it appears that the blowing of the trumpets was a means of knowing that the people were remembered by the Lord. The trumpets were blown as an introit to prepare the people for an active confrontation with God. Trumpets were used in times of festive worship, including feasts, New Moon festivals, burnt offerings, and fellowship offerings. They served as a memorial of the people to God and of him to them. The text ends with the solemn assertion that marks the importance of a text and the completion of a major unit of the book.

2. Setting forth of the people on the triumphal march (10:11–36)

a. The march begins (10:11–13)

11–13 After eleven months near Mount Sinai, the people moved out for the first time led by the Lord in his wondrous cloud. Israel, on the move from the Desert of Sinai, was on a journey that in a few weeks could lead them into the conquest of the land of Canaan. This was a day not to be forgotten: the second year, the second month, the twentieth day. At last the Israelites were on their way to Canaan!

The journey this text describes is not detailed fully here. It is not until 12:16 that the destination of the Desert of Paran is achieved. More specifically, the people settled at Kadesh in the Desert of Zin (20:1). There are at least three stops on this initial journey: Taberah (11:3), Kibroth Hattaavah (11:35), and Hazeroth (11:35).

The Desert of Paran is a large plateau in the northeastern Sinai, south of what later would be called the Negev of Judah, and west of the Arabah. This forms the southernmost portion of the Promised Land, the presumed staging area for the assault on the land itself. Israel's staging for attack in the Desert of Paran was a brilliant strategy. They would avoid the fortified routes to the west, presumably under the control of Egypt. This unusual line of attack from the south would stun the inhabitants of the land. They would come like a sirocco blast from the desert, and the land would be theirs, under the hand of God.

b. The grand procession of tribes and Levites (10:14–28)

14–28 The names of the leaders of the Twelve Tribes are given for the fourth time in the book (see 1:5–15; 2:3–31; 7:12–83); the order for the tribes in the line of march is the same as was presented in ch. 2. The new detail is that the Gershonites and the Merarites bearing the tabernacle followed the triad of the Judah tribes in the line of march. The Kohathites carrying the holy things followed the triad of the Reuben tribes. Each of the four triads of tribes had a banner for rallying and organization (cf. 2:3, 10, 18, 25).

c. The request for Hobab to join the march (10:29–32)

29–32 Hobab was Moses' brother-in-law, the son of Reuel (Jethro; see Ex 2:18; 3:1). Reuel had been most helpful to Moses earlier (see Ex 18); now his son, with expertise in the desert lands of the Sinai, would be a great help in locating water and pasturage. Several reasons made this appeal to Hobab appropriate: one was likely Moses' relatedness to him through marriage; another is based on the goodness of God that is promised to Israel and in which Hobab may participate; and another is the above-mentioned expertise of Hobab. In this latter instance Moses says that Hobab might become the "eyes" of the people. Moses then reinforces the benefits that will come to Hobab; he will share in the benefits the Lord is about to bring on the nation.

Hobab refused at first, citing the need to care for his own family, following the traditional ancient Eastern pattern of adherence to family and place. No doubt there was also a tie to his family gods. Moses continued to urge Hobab to join Israel. Hobab did not come easily, but he did eventually come (see Jdg 1:16). Coming with Moses was not just a change of address; it was a radical reorientation of life itself, a new family, a new land, and a new God.

Although Hobab's descendants received a share in the land (Jdg 1:16), Hobab himself apparently only experienced the goodness of God in the same way that the rest of the people did: in God's providential care of his erring people in the desert of their banishment. The few weeks' journey was to last a lifetime.

d. The three-day procession behind the ark of the Lord (10:33–36)

33–34 The journey began with a three-day march. Eleven months earlier the people were a rag-tag group of former slaves, gathered in the desert in the first rush of deliverance. Now they were prepared for the march, the battle, and the victory.

35–36 The sense of a victory march is enhanced by what we may call the "Battle Cry of Moses" (cf. 11:11–15). This little poem rests ultimately on the notion of cursing and blessing that goes all the way back to the Abrahamic covenant (Ge 12:2–3). The words of v.35 are a cursing of the enemies of the Lord and his people; the words of v.36 are a blessing on the people of his promise.

B. The Rebellion and Judgment of a Fearful People (11:1–25:18)

1. A cycle of rebellion and atonement and the record of death (11:1–20:29)

These ten chapters balance and contrast with the ten chapters that present the record of Israel's preparation. Barely had the march begun before the rebellion was underway—a rebellion of the spirit of the people that manifested itself in a variety of ways. But always it came down to this: God's demand of complete obedience and robust faith, a devotion of the whole person, was infrequently found in his people. Many of the people of God in all ages seem to display similar traits of irreligion and apostasy. This is one reason the book of Numbers is so important for readers today.

a. The beginning of sorrows (11:1–35)

(1) A judgment of fire (11:1–3)

1 Only three days into their march, the people reverted to the disloyal complaining they had expressed a year earlier, three days after their deliverance from the waters of the Red Sea (Ex 15:22–27). The people again expressed the ingratitude that marked their early experience. The response of the Lord to this outbreak of murmuring was one of wrath. The purging fire was limited to the outskirts of the camp, an evidence of the Lord's mercy.

2 In the midst of his wrath, the Lord remembers mercy. The people truly deserved God's considerable wrath. But the survivors of his anger cried out to Moses for help in their behalf. Moses prayed, and the fire subsided.

3 The place name "Taberah" comes from a Hebrew noun meaning "burning" (cf. Dt 9:22). Because of the raging fire of God in their midst, the people named that place of awful memory "Taberah," Burning.

(2) A surfeit of quail (11:4–34)

4 This account appropriately begins with the "rabble" (GK 671), the non-Israelite people who followed Israel from Egypt. Those who did not know the Lord and his mercies too easily incited those who did know him to rebel against him. The murmuring soon spread throughout the camp, and the people began to complain about their diet, forgetting what God had done for them (Ps 106:14). By romanticizing the past, the people tended to minimize earlier discomforts when in a new type of distress. The verb "to crave" leads to the name of the location of the subsequent judgment, Kibroth Hattaavah, "Graves of Craving" (v.34).

5–6 The vegetables and fruit mentioned in this verse are suggestive of Egypt. Further, the poor in Egypt were able to supplement their diet with fish. The contrast was sure: there are no fish or vegetables in the desert. That there should have been any food at all to eat was solely by God's mercy.

7–9 The description of the manna would be meaningful only to people who lived later (cf. also Ex 16). As with the cloud and fire (9:15–23), the nature and appearance of manna would have been familiar to the persons of this story. In fact, that is the point: they were sick of it!

Several factors suggest that the manna was a unique provision from the Lord, not just a natural substance in greater abundance: (1) The very Hebrew word manna ("What [is it]?") suggests something unknown by the people at the time (see Ex 16:15); (2) the description of it suggests that it was not experienced by other peoples; (3) the daily abundance and periodic increase and decrease (Ex 16:22, 27) hardly suggest a natural phenomenon; (4) its ample supply for the entire desert experience, no matter where the people were (Ex 16:35), goes against the idea of a natural substance; (5) the keeping of a sample in the ark for future generations (Ex 16:33–34) suggests a unique food, a holy provision.

10–15 The rejection of his heavenly food was extremely evil to the Lord. God had said that the reception of the manna by the people would be a significant test of their obedience (Ex 16:4). In their spurning the manna, the people had contemned him. Their action was greatly troubling to Moses as well. Instead of turning to the Lord to ask that he understand the substance of their complaint, Moses turned to the Lord to ask why he was given such an ungrateful people to lead.

This leads to what we may call "Moses' Lament," a studied contrast with the "Battle Cry of Moses" (10:35–36). There are elements in this section similar to the lament psalms in the Bible. The lament begins with Moses asking God why he has brought calamity on him and ends with him begging the Lord not to let him see the full extent of his calamity. Moses would rather die than continue to be so very troubled by this obdurate people. One should note, however, that the people were ultimately ranting against the Lord.

16–17 The response of the Lord was twofold—mercy and curse. There was mercy to Moses in that his work load was now to be shared. There was a curse on the people that was in kind with their complaint: they asked for meat and would now become sick with meat (vv.18–34). The reference to the Spirit is noteworthy. God tells Moses that he will take of the Spirit that is on Moses and put that Spirit on the seventy. They will share the same Holy Spirit who empowers Moses.

18–20 The people's distress at the lack of variety in the daily manna led them to challenge the goodness of the Lord. They had screamed for meat. They claimed that manna was a boring diet, that they could not live without variety, without some meat to eat. Now they were going to receive a diet of constant meat, for a full month, until it spewed from their nostrils. The principal issue was not meat at all. The people "have rejected the LORD."

21–23 Moses reminds God (!) of the numbers involved: six hundred thousand men on foot. Moses' distress at providing meat for this immense number of people is nearly comical—the task is staggering; it is an impossibility. The response of God is, "Is the LORD's arm too short?" The human impossibility is an occasion to demonstrate the wonder of the Lord.

24–25 Sovereignly, mysteriously, graciously, the Lord apportioned the same Spirit that was on Moses on the seventy elders. The taking of "some" of the Spirit from Moses suggests the release of some of the burden that he bore. They will share in that work with him. These elders prophesied, but they did not continue to do so. The temporary gift was primarily to establish their credentials as Spirit-empowered leaders rather than to make of them ongoing agents of the prophecy of the Spirit. Their principal task will be to help in the administration of the population, especially in the context of the increasing impiety of the people.

26–30 Two of the designated elders did not meet with the others when the Spirit of God came on the group; but they also received the Spirit and began to prophesy. A young man who was devoted to Moses informed him of this and begged his master to have them cease. The prophesying of Eldad and Medad was perceived as an opportunity for further personal attacks on Moses. But Moses desired that all the people might have the full gifts of the Spirit. The "young man," so protective of the reputation of Moses, is likely Joshua son of Nun. Perhaps it was this close association with Moses that emboldened Joshua, along with Caleb, to take his stand with the promise of God rather than with the fears of the people (chs. 13–14).

31–34 The sickening feast of the plague of quail ends this chapter. The people had begged for meat; the Lord supplied more quail than the people possibly could eat. The NIV suggests that the quail were borne along by the wind at the height of about three feet and hence were low enough to be seized by people quite readily. The supply of birds was stupendous. The least successful gatherer still captured "ten homers" worth (nearly sixty bushels). The drama is exquisite: "while the meat was still between their teeth," the plague of the Lord struck them down. Before they could swallow, God made them choke. So this place took on an odious name: "Graves of Craving." These graves marked the death camp of those who had turned against the food of the Lord's mercy.

(3) A journey note (11:35)

35 Surely there was a sense that the people could not leave Kibroth Hattaavah quickly enough. "Hazeroth" means "enclosures." This was a location that allowed them a temporary residence on their journey northward. But it also became the locus of yet another place of trouble, the attack on Moses by Miriam and Aaron (12:1–15).

b. The opposition of Miriam and Aaron (12:1–16)

1 Grammatical clues indicate that Miriam was the principal in the attack against Moses. Miriam was not judged because she was a woman but because she sinned. The story of her attack is included because of how important she really was. She preserved the life of the helpless infant who later became the great Moses (see Ex 1). She made it possible for Moses' true mother to become his nurse. She led the singing of the first psalm we find recorded in the Scriptures (Ex 15). It is precisely because she is such a magnificent person that her act of rebellion is recorded.

The initial attack on Moses concerns his wife, though Moses' marriage to a Cushite woman was not the real issue. The real issue concerned Moses' prophetic gift and special relationship with God. Cush was the first son of Ham, the father of the peoples living in the southern Nile valley (Ethiopia). If Moses' wife, Zipporah, is intended (see Ex 2:15–22), then her foreign ancestry is attacked by exaggeration. Maybe her skin was more swarthy than the average Israelite. More likely, however, Moses had taken a new wife, perhaps after the death of Zipporah; the language of 12:1 indicates a recent marriage of a Cushite woman. So at issue here is not "woman versus woman" or "woman against man"; rather, it is basic resentment of race against race. In any case, the attack on the woman was a pretext for the real issue at stake.

2 Miriam and her brother Aaron ask, rhetorically, "Has the LORD spoken only through Moses? Has he not spoken as well through us?" Of course, he had (cf. Mic 6:4). God spoke through Aaron and Miriam; but his principal spokesman was ever Moses. The prophetic gifting of the seventy elders (11:24–30) seems to have been the immediate provocation for the attack of Miriam and Aaron on their brother.

3 It is not likely that a truly "humble" (GK 6705) person would write in such a manner about himself. It is possible, though not likely, that Moses authored such a line under inspiration, just as it is possible that he might have recorded the account of his death and burial by prophetic insight (Dt 34). Secondly, Moses was not really an exceptionally meek man. He was given to rage, self-pity, questioning, and debate. Evidence from etymology and usage suggests that "miserable" is a possible reading, and the context indicates that it is the preferred meaning here. The basic meaning of the Hebrew root is "to be bowed down." One could be bowed down by force (i.e., subdued) or with submissiveness (i.e., humble) or with care and trouble (i.e., miserable or afflicted).

Ever since 11:1, one thing after another has brought pressure on Moses so that in 11:14 he whimpers to God that he is not able to bear the load any longer. He even asks that he might die to be relieved of the pressures. Now with this assault of his sister and brother, it was simply too much. He was now the most "miserable" man on earth. He had found his lot so difficult, his task so unmanageable, his pressure so intense that he called out to God saying, "It is too much!" (cf. 11:14). At this point he is utterly speechless; he is a broken man. "Now the man Moses was exceedingly miserable, more than any man on the face of the earth!" (pers. tr.).

4 The association of the Lord to his servant Moses is so strong that here suddenly he comes to redress the wrong done to his friend. That God speaks to Moses along with Aaron and Miriam suggests that he was present when they were berating Moses so unfairly.

5–9 When the trio came to the Tent of Meeting, according to the command of the Lord, he descended to them in the cloud (cf. 11:25).

When the Lord appeared from the midst of the cloud, he spoke to Aaron and Miriam. The Oracle of the Lord in vv.6–8 is in poetic format. Some salient features of this poem may be noted. The poem stresses in an unusual manner the sovereignty of the Lord in the way he deals with prophets and other persons. He decides how he shall speak, to whom, and in what manner. The poem also powerfully presents the distinctiveness of Moses as against all other agents of divine disclosure. To other prophets God may speak in a variety of ways (cf. Heb 1:1; 1Pe 1:10–11). But to Moses there is a one-on-one relationship. Only Moses could approach the holy mountain and gaze on the Divine Person. Only his face radiated following these encounters. The one sure thing in this text is to insist that while God has spoken through Aaron, Miriam, and a host of others, there was none who was on such a familiar ground with God as was Moses (cf. Dt 34:10). In feigned incredulity God asks, "Why are you not very afraid?" Clearly, the ax of his wrath is about to fall!

10 The immediate effect of the wrath of God was seen on the body of Miriam. That Miriam was "leprous" (GK 7665) and Aaron was not is a signal that she was the principal offender. She broke out with the type of infectious skin disease that excluded persons from the community (see 5:1–4). The result of this judgment was that Miriam became an outcast.

11–13 The repentance of Aaron for the sin of presumption is touching both in its intensity and in his concern for their sister. His description of the appearance of Miriam's skin is ghastly but effective. Moses then calls out to God to heal her. His prayer is remarkable in its urgency and simplicity.

14–15 The response of God is graciousness mingled with sobriety. He grants Miriam healing but demands a period of time of public shame. Seven days apparently was the briefest period of such shame before any restoration might be accomplished (see 19:11, 14, 16).

16 At last, the destination of the grand march was achieved. The Desert of Paran was the staging area for the attack on the land of Canaan. Despite numerous terrible events that marred the dream of the triumphal march, at last the people were at their destination. Glory awaits. Or at least that is what should have been the case.

c. The twelve spies and the mixed report (13:1–33)

(1) The command of the Lord (13:1–2)

1–2 Comparing the account in Dt 1:21–23 with Nu 13:1–2, we see that the command to send spies came from the Lord. Likely Deuteronomy presents the story from the level of the people and Nu 13:1–2 presents the divine perspective. When the people requested that spies be sent, Moses decided, on the basis of the will of God, to accede to their request. By putting the two accounts together, we see that the very idea of sending spies to the land was a further example of the grace of God. The specification of the type of men to be selected reminds us that God does use select persons for his leadership tasks. Yet ten of the twelve men turn out to be dismal failures. That they were each leaders of their tribes did not guarantee that they were adequate for the leadership role God desired they would have.

(2) The roster of names (13:3–16)

3 As in the records of chs. 1–10, the story begins with the compliance of Moses to the will of God. The names listed in vv.4–15 are different from the tribal leaders given in chs. 1, 2, 7, and 10. Presumably the tribal leaders were older men. The task called for younger and more robust men, but no less respected by their peers. The travel of the spies began in the Desert of Paran and came full circle geographically (v.26). But the men who returned were not the same as those who left. Presumably they left in confidence, with a spirit of divine adventure; but they returned in fear, groveling before men, no longer fearful of God.

4–15 The significance of listing the names is multiple: (1) they add a certain historical verisimilitude, (2) they provide a level of accuracy, (3) they should give the occasion for pride, (4) they become markers of sadness (cf. Taberah and Kibroth Hattaavah), and (5) they remind us of the significance of names to God (Rev 20:12).

16 Joshua's name was first known as Hoshea, but Moses changed it as a mark of a special relationship between the two men. This change is a fatherly action, as though Moses has adopted his young aide and marked him for greatness (cf. Ge 17). In Hebrew, "Hoshea" means "salvation"; the new form of the name Joshua means "The LORD saves"; the latter form is the Hebrew spelling for Jesus.

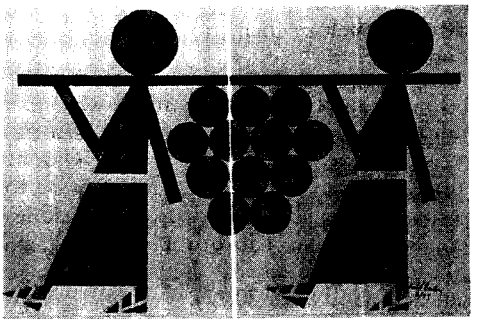
(3) The instructions of Moses (13:17–20)

17–20 The instructions of Moses to the twelve spies were comprehensive, for he had some sense of the lay of the land of Canaan. The scouts were to give special attention to the people and the produce of the land, to the cities and towns, to the soil and the presence or absence of forests. Since the journey was at the time of the harvest of grapes, there is a personal note that they were to show themselves courageous in taking some of the fruit, words that would later come to haunt the nation.

(4) A summary of the reconnaissance (13:21–25)

21–25 The journey of the spies began in the southernmost extremity of the land (the Desert of Zin) and took them to the northernmost point (Rehob near Lebo Hamath; see 34:8). The first city the spies came to was Hebron. The parenthetical comment may have been prompted by their amazement at the size and fortification of the city. According to their ancestors, Hebron had not been a great city but a dwelling and trading place for shepherds and herdsmen. The size of the grape cluster that the spies found led them to name the location "the valley of the cluster" (i.e., Eshcol). The very size was a mark of the goodness of the land that God was giving them. To think of clusters of grapes so large that two men would transport the cluster on a pole—the people should have thought they had discovered Eden! The grapes, which were wine grapes, were a symbol of the joy the land would provide.



This familiar tourist symbol used by Israel today is taken from the story of the report of the spies.

(5) The mixed report (13:26–33)

26–29 The first portion of the report was truthful, if timorous. The spies did give assent to the bounty of the land; it was a land flowing with milk and honey (cf. Ex 3:8). But immediately the spies lamented its people and cities. The cities were described as being inaccessible, impregnable. The listing of the nations that inhabited the land became a new reason for terror. Yet this listing could as well be taken as an indication of the victories that God was going to give his people in fulfillment of his promise in Ge 15.

30 The report of the majority must have caused the people to become frightened. Only Caleb and Joshua returned a report prompted by faith in God. Caleb's words, "We can certainly do it," were not merely bravado; they were the words of one who really believed that the Lord was giving the land to the people. Boldly, confidently, Caleb assured the people that they could take the land.

31–33 But the evil report prevailed. At last the ten state explicitly what they had implied. They were in a state of denial that included the power and presence of God, the promises and assurances of God, their own resources—indeed, even their own names. Those wonderful names—most of which speak of the blessing of being the people of God—were being denied as they spoke their words of calumny (see Ge 37:2; Jer 20:10).

The Land of Promise was a good land, a gracious gift of the Lord. By speaking evil of it, the faithless spies were speaking evil of him. At this point their words became exaggerations and distortions. The Anakites (who were of large size) were now said to be "Nephilim" (GK 5872), the race of giants described briefly in Ge 6:4. This word seems to be deliberately provocative of fear. The exaggeration of the faithless led them to their final folly, comparing themselves to "grasshoppers."

d. The rebellion of the people and defeat by the Amalekites (14:1–45)

(1) The final rebellion of the faithless people (14:1–4)

1–2 The threefold emphasis on the extent of the rebellion—"all the people of the community," "all the Israelites," and "the whole assembly"—is important; for the judgment of God will extend to the entire community. Moses and Aaron became the central targets of the anger of the people, who "grumbled" against them even as they grumbled against the Lord and began to wish that they had already died. It would have been preferable to have died in Egypt or even in the desert than to come this close to their goal, only to discover that it was unattainable.

3–4 The more the people wailed, the more excessive their words. Then they began to aim their anger more directly at the Lord himself. Moses and Aaron were the fall guys, but the Lord was the one really to blame; he had delivered them from Egypt. The people worked themselves into such a frenzy of fear that they wished that God had not brought them there at all. The most reprehensible charge against the grace of God concerned their children (see vv.31–33). But in the end, only they survived. All the rest died in the desert they had chosen over the Land of Promise.

(2) The words of the faithful warning against rebellion (14:5–9)

5 In the midst of this rebellion, a few voices still spoke of God's grace and remembered his power. Moses, Aaron, Caleb, and Joshua's passion for truth in the midst of error caused Moses and Aaron to prostrate themselves before the enraged leaders of the people. They were aware that the anger of the Lord was likely to burst on the people in a moment.

6–7 Joshua and Caleb tore at their clothing, mourning out of faith because of the death of hope. Yet even as they mourned, Joshua and Caleb extolled the land and its virtues with extravagant language. They had been there and reminded the people that the land still flowed with milk and honey.

8 Then these righteous men presented the posture of faith. It was still possible to gain the land and to enjoy its fruit. The only thing necessary was that "the LORD is pleased with us."

9 Two things were needful: the people had to stop their rebellion against the Lord and to cease being afraid of the people of the land. The word translated "protection" (GK 7498) is often rendered "shadow" or "shade." God had served as a protecting shadow for the peoples of the land of Canaan; now that protection was gone. The Lord was with his people, and they could swallow their foes alive!

(3) The appearance of the Lord to withstand the rebels (14:10–12)

10 Despite the impassioned language of Joshua and Caleb and the prostrate forms of Moses and Aaron, the people were deaf to mercy, blind to truth. In the midst of the peoples' rage, God in an awesome display of his wonder burst into their midst at the entrance of the tabernacle. Moses and Aaron had a foreboding this would happen; likely this is why they were prostrate (v.5).

11–12 When God appeared, he did not thunder against the people; but he spoke to his servant Moses about the people's outrageous behavior. By refusing to believe in the power of the Lord, they were holding him in contempt. The anger of God was at fever pitch. In a moment he would destroy them all. And God could begin again, with Moses as the head of a new family of God (see Ex 32:10).

(4) The pleading of Moses (14:13–19)

13–16 Not for a second did Moses mull the possibility of a new people of God. Zealous for the honor of God, Moses burst with protest. There was no God like the Lord; never had a deity done for his people what the Lord had (see Dt 4:32–40). And the nations were watching! Moses was aghast at the thought that word would go back to Egypt that God was not able to deliver his people.

17–19 Moses then affirmed the splendors of the character of God, particularly his grace. He moved from the reputation of the Lord to his character, presenting a composite quotation of his own words of loyal love for and faithful discipline of his people (see Ex 20:6; 34:6–7). Moses knew God intimately. He knew him as a consuming fire; he also knew his warm embrace. While the wrath is real, it is long delayed.

(5) The judgment of the Lord against the rebels (14:20–35)

20–21 In response to Moses' request, God declared that he had forgiven the people. But the forgiveness was not complete. The people who had behaved so intolerably would not be put to death, but neither could things go back to the way they were. A sentence had to be paid.

22–23 The judgment was mitigated. The people were not put to death, but neither would they be allowed to see the land. Since all the people were in rebellion, not one would escape the mitigated judgment.

The Lord speaks of ten times when the people tested him. A possible list of these is as follows: (1) at the Red Sea, where it seemed that Pharaoh's army would destroy them (Ex 14:10–12); (2) at Marah, where they found bitter water (Ex 15:22–24); (3) in the Desert of Sin, as they hungered (Ex 16:1–3); (4) in the Desert of Sin, as they paid no attention to Moses concerning the storing of the manna until the morning (Ex 16:19–20); (5) in the Desert of Sin, as they disregarded Moses concerning the gathering of the manna on the seventh day (Ex 16:27–30); (6) at Rephidim, as they complained for water (Ex 17:1–4); (7) at Mount Sinai, as Aaron led the people in making the golden calf (Ex 32:1–35); (8) at Taberah, where the people raged against the Lord (Nu 11:1–3); (9) at Kibroth Hattaavah, in the grumbling provoked by the rabble for quail (Nu 11:4–34); (10) at Kadesh in the Desert of Paran, when the people refused to receive the good report of Joshua and Caleb but rather wished themselves dead (Nu 14:1–3). It was a dismal record indeed.

24–25 The Lord calls Caleb "my servant" and remarks with affection on his "different spirit." Caleb's ultimate vindication came forty-five years later (see Jos 14:10). The Lord then reminded Moses that there were Amalekites and Canaanites in the land; hence the people needed to turn back to the desert. They had lost their opportunity.

26–35 The rash words of the people asking to die in the desert become in a sense the judgment of the Lord. All those who were above the age of twenty, who were counted in the census, were to die in the desert—except Joshua and Caleb. God's sharpest rebuke of his errant people came in response to their charge that he wanted to kill their children (v.3). God simply would not tolerate the accusation that he had brought the people into the desert to destroy their children. So a further element in God's justice here was the notice that the children would be the only ones actually to enjoy the land. The rest of the people's bodies would "fall in this desert."

The forty days of the travels of the spies became the numerical paradigm for the suffering of the people: one year for one day, so that for forty years the people over twenty would be dying. Thus, when the time was fulfilled, only the young generation would enter the land.

(6) The death of the evil spies (14:36–38)

36–38 The people as a whole received a commuted sentence, but not those responsible for the attitudes that led to this debacle of doubt! They had to be put to death. The judgment on the ten evil spies was immediate; the generation they influenced would live out their lives in the desert. Only Joshua and Caleb were exempt from this judgment.

(7) Defeat by the Amalekites (14:39–45)

39–45 Too late the people determined to go up and take the land. They confessed that they had sinned, but their confession was partial at best, as their actions were rash and foolish. Not only was the Lord not with them now; he was against them. In fact, he had warned them not to go this way but to turn back to the desert (v.25). Their subsequent defeat was another judgment the rebellious people brought on their heads. In fact, any soldiers who died in this abortive warfare only hastened their own punishment for the rebellion at Kadesh.

e. Laws on offerings, the Sabbath, and tassels on garments (15:1–41)

(1) Teaching on special offerings (15:1–16)

1–2 The conjunction of these verses with the sad ending of the narrative of Nu 14 is dramatic. The sins of the people were manifold; they would be judged. The grace and mercy of the Lord are magnified as he points to the ultimate realization of his ancient promise to Abraham (Ge 12:7) and his continuing promise to the nation that they would indeed enter the land.

3–12 The offerings in Nu 15 relate more to the desire of the believer for a spontaneous, grateful response to the wonder of knowing God. Grain and wine offerings were to accompany the offerings by fire; the grain was to be mixed with oil. The grain and wine offerings increased in amounts with the increase of size of the sacrificial animal. These passages are the first to indicate that wine offerings must accompany all burnt or fellowship offerings. The provision of "fine flour" speaks of luxurious food (cf. Ge 18:6; 1Ki 4:22; Eze 16:13). Only the best was good enough for the Lord.

The system of sacrificial worship in ancient Israel was very complex. Some of the sacrifices God demanded were presented in the context of a mournful admission of sin, a guilt-laden expression of repentance. But many sacrifices were presented in contexts of joyful celebrations and heartfelt expressions of one's delight in knowing the Lord.

Another element in worship is the pleasing "aroma" (GK 8194) to the Lord (cf. Lev 1:9). The odor of sacrifice would be heavy, acrid, and pungent. Flour, oil, and fine wine would add an exotic element to the smells. It was not the mere smell, however, that made God happy but the offerer (see Ps 40:6–8; Mic 6:8–10). The smells and the smoke, the flesh and the flour made the offering "real" by adding substance and action to the feeling of worship.

13–16 The "alien" (GK 1731) had the same regulations as the native-born Israelite. Because the one who sojourns with Israel was under the same Torah, he also was able to bring pleasure to the Lord. If the alien continued to please God, he could become a part of the community as a whole. While still an alien, the proselyte had to learn to worship in the same manner as the native populace; and together they needed to learn their worship from the Lord.

(2) Instructions on the cake offering (15:17–21)

17–21 This law also looks forward to when the Israelites would be in the land. Since the book of Numbers presents two generations, we need always to remember who is addressed. The plural "you," though spoken to the community as a whole, is addressed to the children who will actually enter the land.

The concept of the firstfruits symbolizes that all blessing is from the Lord and all increase belongs to him. This offering was made of coarse grain. Right at the time of the threshing of the grain, a cake was to be made in worship of God and held high from the threshing floor. The idea seems to be one of immediacy. This was a perpetual ordinance; for the further removed the people became from the events of their salvation, the more likely they would forget the nature of their salvation. The first generation was not able to remember much longer than three days (11:1–3)!

(3) Instructions on offerings for unintentional sins (15:22–29)

22–29 God's attitude toward his law is complex: he is serious about his commands. But he is also gracious. God made high demands and expected compliance, but he also provided avenues for redress when one did not comply fully. Hence sins may be unintentional, but they still needed to be covered (cf. Lev 4:2). As with other sacrifices, the alien and the citizen had the same demands of compliance.

(4) Instructions for defiant sins (15:30–31)

30–31 For one who set his hand defiantly to despise the word of God and to blaspheme his name, the punishment was one of death, not just banishment or exile (cf. Heb 10:26–39). This injunction dealt with the outrageous behavior of blasphemy, not mild infractions. However, what the law regarded as outrageous behavior may be surprising to us.

(5) A man who violated the Sabbath (15:32–36)

32–36 This account illustrates vv.30–31. The point is that Sabbath breaking is defiance of the Lord; the offense strikes at the very center of Israel's responsibility before him. The ones who discovered the man in Sabbath violation did not quite know what to do. The answer came from the Lord: The penalty for breaking the Sabbath was death (Ex 31:15; 35:2).

(6) Instructions for tassels on garments (15:37–41)

37–40 To bring fear to all people lest they too be led to the breaking of the demands of the Lord in his law, a most practical device was given: the wearing of tassels on one's garment as a perpetual reminder of God's demands. The swirling tassels would be excellent memory prods to keep faith with the law, to obey the commands of God.

41 The chapter begins and concludes with the continuing promise of God to bring his people into the land. He was still at work in the process of completing their redemption from Egypt.

f. The rebellion of Korah and his allies (16:1–50)

(1) The beginning of revolt (16:1–3)

1 This is the second presumptuous, unprincipled rebellion against Moses by leading figures under his leadership. Korah's paternity is traced through Izhar and Kohath to Levi. His name is later famous for the role his descendants had in music in the time of David and following. Korah's cohorts in this evil plan of insurrection were the Reubenites Dathan and Abiram, sons of Eliab, and On (a man mentioned only here).

2 The principals were joined by another 250 men, who were constituted officials, men of name. These dignified leaders were not content with the privilege they had received by God's grace; they wanted more.

3 Aaron also was under attack. Perhaps Korah's real desire was not only to demean Moses but to make himself priest instead of Aaron. Both Moses and Aaron were in their eighties. The nation was under a sentence of God's judgment, and these men knew that they were a part of the doomed community. "They came as a group" suggests an organized, well-planned conspiracy.

The conspirators' words are literally, "Much to you" (i.e., Moses and Aaron arrogated to themselves too much; they have presumed on their power for self-aggrandizement). When Korah and his cohorts said that the entire congregation was holy, they emphasized the word "all." They also insisted that the Lord was in the midst of the whole community, not just residing in the Tent of Meeting. They appeared to be arguing for a democratization of the divine privilege. But in fact they merely desired a shift of power—to themselves. The pattern of leadership the Lord established in Israel was theocratic—a rule of God—mediated through a divinely sanctioned regent. The Lord was present with all the people. The leaders had more privilege than the common people, and Moses and Aaron were the most privileged and had the greatest responsibilities.

(2) Moses' rejoinder (16:4–7)

4 Moses fell to his face on the ground, in obeisance to the Lord, whose regent he was and to whom his sole allegiance belonged. The baselessness of the attack of Korah and his company is superbly demonstrated by Moses' action. Although Aaron was also under attack, all focus is on Moses. If he stumbles, Aaron stumbles as well.

5 When Moses rose, he spoke decisively. His words were now the Lord's words. Tomorrow would be the day of reckoning. Once and for all the role of Moses would be defined. Moses' term for the choice one of God is "the holy" (GK 7705), perhaps "the holiest." The Lord will bring near to himself the one who is the holiest, based on his own choice in that one. The enemies were asking for a showdown. Now they would get their chance, but it would be to their ruin.

6–7 Only the initial provisions for the test are laid out here. Moses tells those involved to take a censer, fire, and incense. This is remarkable since the priests alone were to hold the censers. While Korah was of the house of Levi, he was not a member of the priestly family. The others as Reubenites were not even remote possibilities. But Moses dared them to do as he demanded. Then the Lord would make his choice known to all. In an arresting turn of phrase, Moses shouts to these detractors that it is they who "have gone too far" (cf. v.3).

(3) Moses' warning to the rebels (16:8–11)

8 Although the text says "Korah," Moses is addressing all the assembled insolent men. Since the principals along with Korah are Reubenites, it is difficult to know whether Moses' words "you Levites" are inclusive of other Levites who are joined with Korah or are meant to include Dathan, Abiram, and On in a sarcastic manner.

9 Moses asks the rebels whether in their judgment it is nothing that the Lord has marked them out as distinct from the entire community for a special work. They were in a special place in God's economy, but they were not satisfied. Korah was the ringleader, but all in his company were culpable. The issue was gratitude versus pride.

10 It became clear to Moses that the conspirators were really after the priesthood. It was not that he was in error or that Aaron was at fault. It was simply that these wicked men wanted their positions.

11 The phrase "banded together" shows the determination of Korah and his followers as a congealed body. Moses added literally, "And Aaron!" after "against the LORD." His language is incredulous, as though to say, "What did he ever do to you that you should strike out against him?"

(4) Confrontation with Dathan and Abiram (16:12–14)

12–14 The behavior of Dathan and Abiram is even more intolerable than that of Korah: (1) they refuse to appear before Moses; (2) they mock his words; (3) they abuse the language of choice for Canaan to describe contemptuously the land of Egypt; (4) they accuse Moses of their plight in the desert; (5) they mock him as a strutting prince; (6) they blame him that they do not possess the fields and vineyards of Canaan; (7) they taunt him with such a misuse of power that he attempts to blind others to his faults; and (8) they repeat their outrage of disobedience, "We will not come!"

(5) Judgment on his enemies (16:15–35)

15 In his wrath Moses asks God not to turn his face with gracious favor on their offering; he proclaims himself innocent of misuse of his office for personal gain; he proclaims himself guiltless of any harm. He has not enriched himself by one donkey nor brought harm to one person.

16–18 The trial was to be by fire: Which men would the Lord accept as his priests in the holy tabernacle? The 250 men allied with Korah came with arrogance to withstand Moses and Aaron at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting. Seemingly with Aaron now quite old, Korah wants his position. Even though the "job" is the service of the Lord in his holy precincts, Korah apparently believes he will be able to wrest that service by force, with the Lord acquiescing to his demands!

19–22 Suddenly the glory of the Lord bursts into their midst. The Lord speaks again that he has had it with the people. He is about to wipe out the nation again. Moses and Aaron understand that it is all the people, not just the foolish rebels, whom God is about to destroy. Again we see the character of Moses and Aaron who pray to God to preserve the nation despite yet another outrageous attack. Moses and Aaron ask whether it is right that the whole nation be destroyed just because one man has sinned.

23–30 The Lord seems to accede to the reasoning of these words, for he demands that the people move away from the tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. The judgment of the Lord was going to be severe, but he did not wish to have it lash out on the bystanders. Moses wished to assure the people that the judgment that was coming was certainly the direct work of the Lord. The opening of the earth to swallow the rebels was a sure and evident sign of the wrath of God and the vindication of Moses and Aaron. The earth is pictured as a ravenous monster.

31–35 As soon as Moses finished speaking, the earth split open and swallowed the rebels, with their households. Apparently the sons of Korah did not join their father in his rash plan and hence did not die (cf. 26:11; see Pss 42; 44–49; 84–85; 87–88; cf. Ex 6:21, 24; 1Ch 6:22–31). The men and all with them were under the ban (cf. Achan in Jos 7). The children, wives, and even toddlers died with their wicked fathers. The 250 men were then devoured by fire (perhaps lightning). The horror of the story is that the punishment included women and children. No easy answer presents itself to deal with this issue. But we do know that the God of Israel will do right (Jdg 18:25)!

(6) The aftermath of the contest—more distress (16:36–50)

36–40 After the terrible conflagration of Korah and his cohorts, Moses is told to have Eleazar son of Aaron take the censers from the midst of the smoldering remains. A chilling scene is that of the true priests taking the censers of the 250 deceased impostors from their charred remains and employing these holy instruments in hammered bronze sheets for the altar. Even with the death of the false priests, the holy things had to be treated as holy things! From that time on the sheet of bronze over the altar would be a memorial of the utter folly of the self-proclaimed priests of the most holy God. God has established his personnel; he will allow none to breach their ranks.

41–45 On the next day following the terrible judgment of God, the whole Israelite community grumbled against Moses again. They who had seen the judgment of God in such a remarkable manner still did not interpret things correctly. Again they blasted Moses, unfairly charging him with the death of "the LORD's people." Verse 42 speaks of the men turning toward the Tent of Meeting, which may mean that the crowd was about to take over the territory, to seize the tent as their own holding. At once, as before, the glory of the Lord was in the midst of the people—in judgment. Fear must have seized them. The Lord had come! Again, but for the intervention of Moses and Aaron (see vv.4, 22), the entire nation might have been destroyed by the Lord because of the people's continued rebellion. The Lord spoke to them to depart so that he might destroy the nation; instead they fell to the ground (cf. v.4), bowing down to seek the Lord's mercy, to turn away his wrath.

46–50 This chapter has turned on the account of holy censers being used by unholy men in mock piety. Now Aaron, whose right it was, was to take his censer and do the work of the true priest to stay the plague of the Lord and to bring mercy to the people. The wrath of God had already burst out in indiscriminate slaughter by means of a virulent, rapidly spreading plague. Moses calls to Aaron to do his priestly work. What poetic justice! The very implement used by the enemies to force God's hand to wrath now has to be used by his true priest to force his hand to mercy. Moses knows that the plague may be stemmed; only they must hurry. So Aaron ran! He stands in the breach between the dead and the living. He stops the plague. Thousands died needlessly (14,700), in addition to those who died in the incident of Korah. At last the plague is stemmed. Moses and Aaron meet again at the entrance to the Tent of Meeting, vindicated in the role that God had given to them.

g. The budding of Aaron's staff (17:1–13)

(1) The test for the true priest (17:1–7)

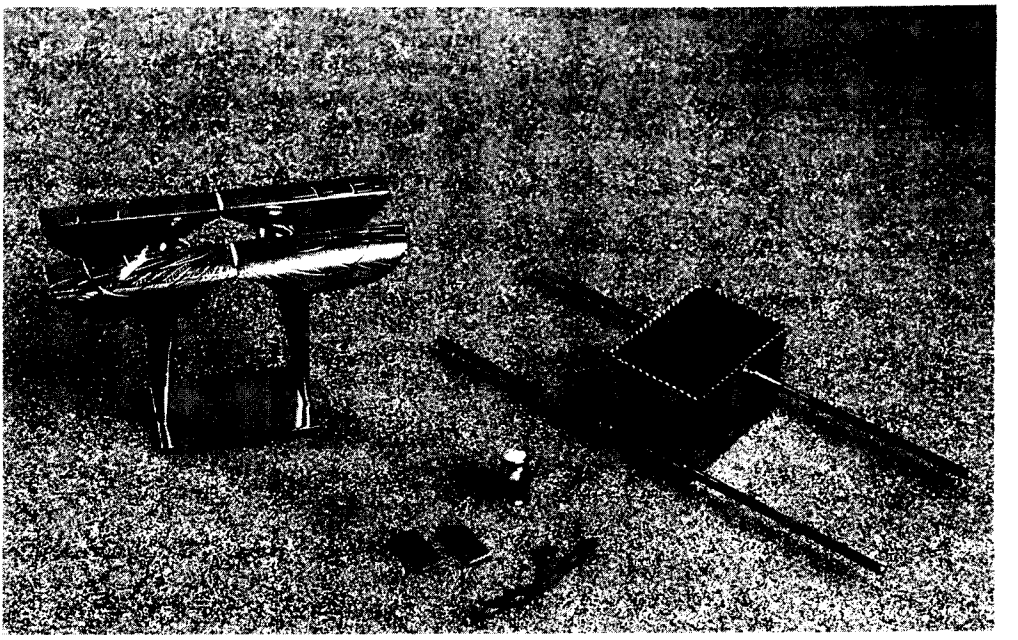
1–7 Moses is commanded to collect twelve staffs, one from each of the tribes of Israel, and write the name of each leader thereon. This is the third vindication of the Aaronic priesthood against all opposition (16:1–50). The test needed to be unequivocal. The staff of the tribe of Levi had to have Aaron's name written clearly on it. This staff had to be chosen over the other staffs because of the trans-community support given to the rebellion of Korah. The staffs were to be placed "in front of the Testimony," which means that they were brought within the Most Holy Place. Moses must have realized that he was doing a most unusual act. The intention was to rid the nation from the grumbling concerning the validity of the priests. The trial was to identify the "right" staff by having it sprout. It is clearly not possible for a wooden staff that is long dead to sprout again. This demanded a miracle.

(2) The outcome of the ordeal (17:8–13)

8–11 On the next morning, Moses found that Aaron's rod had not only sprouted, it had "budded, blossomed and produced almonds"! God exceeded the demands of a test so that there might be no uncertainty (cf. 1Ki 18:24, 38). Miracles of this sort (natural events that occur in unnatural conditions, timing, and/or placement) often occur in the Bible.

It must have been humbling for the men from the other tribes to take back their dead staffs. But only those who aspired to an office that was not theirs would feel shame. Aaron's rod was to be a perpetual reminder of the choice of God in his priest. Hence, it was to remain in front of the Testimony in perpetuity. Aaron's rod joined the stone tablets of the law of Moses (see Ex 25:16) and the jar of manna (Ex 16:33–34) within the ark of the Lord.

12–13 At last the enormity of the arrogant sin of the people in challenging the role of Aaron hit them. Their remorse was justified; death was deserved. Any untoward approach to the holy tabernacle would result in disaster.



This depicts the ark of the covenant and its contents. On the left is the atonement cover with the two gold cherubim. Inside the ark were placed the tablets of the Ten Commandments, a jar of manna, and Aaron's rod that budded. Courtesy Zondervan Corporation © 1984.

h. The priests and the Levites (18:1–32)

(1) Their general duties (18:1–7)

1–7 The Lord's choice of Aaron and his family as the true priests presented an onerous task. Without proper priests, there would be only death among the sinning community. The priests were to be assisted by the tribe of Levi; but the assistants were not to usurp their serving role. Were they to do so, not only would they die, so would the priests who were responsible. Aside from the Levites, no one else could come near. The only people who had a right to work in the shrine were the Levites under the supervision of the priests. The frightful obligations were balanced in the sense of the importance and honor of the work. They of all men were able to approach the Holy Place and minister before the Lord. The Lord's gift of the priesthood was also to the people, an act of his mercy. On their shoulders rests the protection of the nation.

(2) Their offerings and support (18:8–13)

8–11 The priests were to be supported (see Lev 6:14–7:36). Since the Levites as a whole and the priests in particular had no part in the land, it was necessary that the means for their provision be spelled out fully. The offerings not put through fire would be given to the priests. Something is regarded as holy, not because of some mysterious inner quality, but because it had been presented to the Lord for his use. Among the gifts he gave to the priests was holy food. The basic meaning of the word "holy" (GK 7731) is "set apart for special use in the service of God." These holy foods were specifically restricted to the males and could be eaten only by those who were ritually clean. The wave offerings were for the entire family to eat. Provision was made not only for the priests themselves but also for their families. Only the ceremonially unclean family members were forbidden to eat the gifts and offerings (cf. v.13).

12–13 Since the very best items of produce were to be given to the Lord, they became the special foods of the priests and their families. The grace of God is manifest in this provision for his servants, but so are the demands of God: the priests and their families were to be in a state of ritual purity when they ate sacred foods. The idea that God gets "the best of the first" occurs throughout the Bible.

(3) The firstborn offerings and redemptions (18:14–19)

14–16 Things under the ban belong to the priests (unless such things are destroyed). The firstborn were to be consecrated to the Lord (Ex 13:2); they were a means of supporting the priests. They would receive the firstborn of animals and man or their redemption price. There was to be no sacrifice of a human being and no sacrifice of unclean animals. These needed to be redeemed. The price set for the redemption of the firstborn of women (five shekels) was a considerable sum. Seemingly the reason for paying a redemption price for a firstborn son and unclean animals and the sacrifice of the firstborn of clean animals was to provide a perpetual reminder that conception, birth, and life are gifts of God.

17–19 The firstborn of clean animals were not to be redeemed; they were devoted to the Lord by being sacrificed (see ch. 15 on offerings by fire), though the meat would belong to the priests. This was a permanent obligation, symbolized by salt—a lasting compound. Salt was used in some of the sacrifices to the Lord (Lev 2:13; Eze 43:24) and in special incense that was used in the worship of God (Ex 30:35). Its mention here speaks of eating and, hence, of communion (see Ge 31:54; Ex 24:5–11; Ps 50:5).

(4) Aaron's special portion (18:20)

20 Special blessings were given to Aaron. While he did not have a part in the land that the rest of the people would inherit, he had more—a peculiar relationship to the Lord.

(5) The tithes and the Levites (18:21–24)

21–24 Giving tithes to the Levites was a gift of God in return for their work of ministry. Only Levites could approach the Tent of Meeting. The precincts were now sacred, fitted only for sacral people. The wrong people who approached for even a "right" reason would die. The Levites were cared for with a double portion: they were related to the Lord in a special way, and they were provided for by him from special sources.

(6) The contributions of the Levites (18:25–32)

25–32 The instruction of this section, which Moses was to relate to the Levites, is impressive: those who make their living by contributions for the Lord's work shall themselves be responsible for giving to the Lord. As others give, so must the Levites give. The offerings that they render to the Lord are not themselves fresh. Their grain is not new; neither is their wine. But since they themselves are not doing the harvesting of their own lands, the produce of others will be regarded as their own. As in the case of the people, the Levites are to render to the Lord "the best and holiest part of everything." By keeping faith in these matters, the Levites will escape judicial death.

i. The red heifer and the cleansing water (19:1–22)

(1) The statute of the red heifer (19:1–10)

1–4 Western readers have little understanding of or appreciation for ritual, and the slaughter of a magnificent animal is repugnant. The ritual of the cleansing waters is a direct requirement of God. The heifer was to be perfect, without defect, and unused as a draft animal. Only the very finest animals, ordinarily used for the improvement of the herd, were acceptable. The color of the heifer was to be red, presumably because of the color of blood. The animal involved was not a sacrificial beast. It was a cow, not a bull (cf. Lev 1:3). It was to be slaughtered, not sacrificed, outside the camp, not at the holy altar. In contrast to the sacrificial animals (see Lev 1:5), some of the blood of the heifer was to be sprinkled from the priest's finger seven times toward the front of the Tent of Meeting.

5–8 Instead of separating hide and offal from the meat and fat (cf. Lev 4:3–12), the heifer was to remain intact while it was burned. The fire of the offering was to be augmented with cedar, hyssop, and scarlet stuff (perhaps scarlet-colored wool). These elements were associated with cleansing properties (see Lev 14:4) and help us see the cleansing association that the resultant ashes were to have in the Hebrew consciousness. It is striking and unprecedented in the OT (cf. Lev 1:3–9) that the animal was to be burned in its entirety. The priest who officiated at the burning was ceremonially unclean for the rest of the day, as was the one who did the actual work at his command; both were considered clean after washing their bodies and clothes.

9–10 The priest and the worker, because they were unclean, were not to handle the ashes. A third person, who was ritually clean, was to gather the ashes and put them in a ceremonially clean place outside the camp. The ashes could not be brought into the camp, but they were holy. Only the clean could touch them; but whoever did so became unclean because of his contact with the dead remains. He was unclean for the rest of the day and had to bathe before returning to the camp. This was a lasting statute, pertaining to both the native-born and the aliens.

(2) Application of cleansing waters (19:11–13)

11–13 The ashes from the red heifer were kept outside the camp in a ritually pure place. Then a portion of these ashes would be mixed with water for cleansing from contact with dead bodies. The period of uncleanness was to be seven days; acts of purification were to be done on the third and seventh days. Willful neglect of the provision for cleansing brought not only judgment on the person but a pollution of the tabernacle itself. There was an issue of responsibility here. The person who was contaminated had to initiate the action. For the community the individual's state of uncleanness would pollute the dwelling place. One person's sinful state could endanger God's continuing presence in the midst of his people. The second danger was for himself. One who refused the provision of cleansing was to be a castoff (cf. 1Co 5:5).

(3) Specifics of uncleanness (19:14–16)

14–16 Touching a corpse rendered a person unclean. The individual might have died in battle or expired of a natural death. In either case the corpse was unclean and made all who touch it unclean. Thus the situation concerned a corpse out in the open in a tent, or in a container. If the container was open, then the result was uncleanness for persons in the room; it was as though the corpse was in the room with them. If the container was fastened, then there was no effect on others nearby. There would be many occasions for a person to become unclean, not because of a deliberate act of contact with a dead body, but just by being in the proximity of one who died. The cleansing water was a gift of grace, allowing family members to minister to the bodies of their deceased loved ones, knowing that their ritual impurity could be removed.

(4) Application of the cleansing waters for uncleanness (19:17–22)

17–22 The ritual application of the cleansing waters for purification rites is detailed in this section. First was the preparation of the water. Ashes from the heifer were placed in a clay pot. Then fresh water was added and mixed. This was not magic but ritual. The water was still water, the ashes were still ashes. Hyssop, a plant long associated with cleansing (e.g., Ex 12:22) and already associated with the ashes of the heifer (v.6), was used to sprinkle the water on all that was unclean—persons and things. It took a ceremonially clean person to sprinkle the ceremonially unclean person or thing. Following the sprinkling, the person being cleansed would then bathe and wash all his clothes. Failure to avail oneself of these provisions would result in his being cut off from the community, for his failure affected both himself and the sanctuary. The cleansing water of the ashes of the red heifer is specifically related to the cleansing property of the blood of Christ in the NT (Heb 9:13) and is a portrait of the cleansing of the believer (1Jn 1:7–9).

j. The ultimate rebellion in the sin of Moses (20:1–13)

1 The chronological notice indicates that this was the "first month" but does not give us the year (cf. 9:1). A comparison of 20:22–29 and 33:38, however, indicates that this chapter begins in the fortieth year from the Exodus. After challenging the authority of Moses, Miriam, along with her brother Aaron (ch. 12), nearly disappears from the scene. She may never have fully recovered the position of trust and privilege that she had enjoyed before this rebellion. It really was true: all those over the age of twenty at the time of the rebellion would die; even Miriam was buried in the sands of the desert instead of being given the opportunity to enter the Land of Promise.

2–8 Forty years earlier at Rephidim the people screamed to Moses to give them water to drink (Ex 17:1–3). Moses was instructed by the Lord to take the staff he had used to strike the Nile in the curse of plague (Ex 7:20) and to strike the rock at Horeb to initiate a flow of the water of blessing. Now, at the place of Israel's worst act of rebellion, the story was being rerun. The people now desired to die with those who had already passed away in earlier judgments of the Lord (see 14:22; 16:31–35). Moses and Aaron went to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting and fell down in obeisance to the Lord (see 14:5; 16:4, 22, 45). Then, as anticipated, there was the appearance of the Lord, in glory and in wonder. However, there was no fire, no judgment, no anger—just a gentle word to Moses to take his staff and to go with Aaron to bring water from the rock for the thirsting community. The instructions were quite clear: "Speak to that rock." While he was to take his staff, the symbol of his power through the Lord, he was merely to speak to the rock; and it would give its water for the people.

9–12 Moses began by doing exactly as the Lord had instructed him. Suddenly, Moses exploded against them—and against the rock. The accumulated anger and frustration of forty years bore down on Moses. The death of his sister was the end of an era. Yet nothing had changed; the children were as rebellious as ever. Moses' words—"Must we bring you water out of this rock?"—express the intense level of his exasperation and pain. At this point he reached out with the rod and struck the rock twice. In his rage Moses disobeyed the clear instructions of the Lord (v.8). While the water was released and the people and their livestock were refreshed, the rash action of Moses brought a stern rebuke from the Lord. The judgment of God had not flashed out against the people, but now it burst against his (usually) faithful servants. The end result was sure: neither Moses nor Aaron would enter the Land of Promise. The inclusion of Aaron in this verse demonstrates his partnership with his brother in the breach against the holiness of the Lord.

13 Once again a name of judgment was given to a place of Israel's journey: Meribah, "a place of strife" or "quarreling" (see NIV note). The same name had been used forty years earlier (Ex 17:7; also called Massah, "testing"). Psalm 95:8 laments the rebellion at Meribah and Massah, and Ps 114:8 celebrates both occasions of God's grace. For Meribah/Massah is both: a reminder of the rebellion and a symbol of celebration of God's mercy.

k. The resistance of Edom (20:14–21)

14–17 The nation was about to begin their last trek in the desert that would lead them to the land. The first nation whose land they would cross was Edom, a brother nation to Israel (see Ge 36:1). Moses diplomatically sent messengers to the king of Edom, requesting passage through his land. Moses used language designed to bring the most favorable decision: he called Edom a brother; he rehearsed their experience in Egypt and in the desert; he spoke of the deliverance of the Lord; he stated their present condition; and he asked permission to pass through the land of Edom. In all this Moses betrayed no desire for military aggrandizement; his only request was passage through their land.

18–21 The response of Edom was unusually hostile. Moses countered with an elaboration of his purpose. Again he assured Edom that he had no intention of conquest. Again Edom refused, backing up its haughty behavior with a show of force. With a sigh, Israel turned away to the east to make a broad circuit of the territory. The rebuff and its aftermath must have been especially galling to Moses and Aaron; it was another step in their decline.

l. The death of Aaron and the succession of Eleazar (20:22–29)

22–24 At last the people were on the move, north and east from their long stay in the desert near the oasis of Kadesh. As Israel came to the region of Mount Hor on the border of Edom, the word of the Lord came to Moses and Aaron that Aaron, the aged priest, was about to die. The reason for his death is stated, a reminder of the sin at Meribah. The interests of Moses and Aaron in the transfer of power were also the interests of God. Even in the death of his servant, the Lord showed his continuing grace.

The hills that once belonged to Edom appear in the distance. In a color picture, these hill have a reddish hue.

25–29 Before Aaron died, he was to see that his son Eleazar was his sure successor. In a dramatic symbol of this transfer of power, Moses took the garments from his brother, the insignia of his divine office, and placed them on his dutiful son Eleazar. At this point Moses did precisely as the Lord commanded.

Three men ascended the mountain; two returned. Aaron died there, apparently buried by his brother and his son. From the mount there was a sense of looking out to the land to the northwest; this was as close as Aaron would get. Later Moses would have a view of the land from another hill; he too would see the land only from a distance. Both brothers are associated with mountains on their dying; their sister Miriam with the oasis of Kadesh.

2. A climax of rebellion and hope and the end of their dying (21:1–25:18)

a. The destruction of Arad (21:1–3)

1–3 The first battle against the Canaanites was provoked by the king of Arad. The vow of the people speaks of their dependence on God for their victory. The verb translated "totally destroy" (GK 3049) means "to devote to the ban" and is related to the place name "Hormah" ("to devote to destruction"; see the NIV note on v.2). This ruthless action was determined from a sense that the people were engaging in holy war, where the extermination, not just the subjugation, of their enemies was their spiritual goal in the conquest of Canaan. The cup of iniquity was now full (see Ge 15:16); Israel was to be the instrument of the Lord's judgment. The success of the military action against the king of Arad was thorough. The new generation faced a new day; victory ahead seemed assured.

b. The bronze snake (21:4–9)

4–5 The people had to detour because of the intransigent attitude of Edom. They rejoined the road to the Sea of Reeds to make a broad circuit around Edom. They had been so very near the land and had even tasted the sweet wine of victory. But now they were wandering again, and they seemed to be as far away from "real" food as ever. With Moses' determination not to engage Edom in battle, the people began to speak against God and Moses. As their fathers, they asked why they had not been left back in Egypt and why they should be brought to this awful place to die. Again they complained about the lack of food and water. But then they went beyond their fathers and not only spoke of the monotony of manna, but they described it as "miserable food."

6–7 Once more God was rejected by his people; again he brought judgment on their heads. This time it was snakes, with "fire" in their venom. The virulent poison led to horrible, agonizing deaths. There was a change of sorts in the people as they asked for forgiveness. They were sinners, but they confessed their wrong. So Moses prayed for them as he had prayed before (11:2). And God answered in a most unusual way.

8–9 Instead of losing the snakes, the people had to get their fill of them (cf. 11:31–34). Moses, who had transmitted to Israel God's prohibition against making images, was told to make a graven image of a snake! In biblical thought snakes are not only detestable in themselves but are symbolic of the prince of darkness himself (Rev 12:9; 20:2). Think of the enormity of what Moses was asked to do! Verse 9 does not speak of eternal salvation but of physical healing. Many would die in the desert of the fiery snake venom, but not all had to die. God would keep alive those who would do as he demanded (cf. Jn 3:14–15).

c. The journey toward Moab and the Song of the Well (21:10–20)

10–15 At last the people were on the march; they skirted Edom and made their way to the Arnon, the wadi border between the region of Moab and that of the Amorites. This portion of the itinerary led to a quotation from a fragment of an ancient book termed "the book of the Wars of the LORD" (cf. Jos 10:13; 2Sa 1:18), mentioned only here in the OT. This book was presumably an ancient collection of songs of war in praise of God; the poem fragment attests to the variety of sources used by the author of the book. In biblical times one might well use song to set in the memory various places of encampment in the desert.

16–18a The quest for water had been a constant problem during the desert experience (see Ex 17; Nu 20). At this new promise of water from the Lord, the people burst forth into the triumphant words of the "Song of the Well"—a dramatic departure from their earlier behavior! When the people came to a likely spot, the Lord instructed Moses to have a well dug. The place received the happy name "Beer," meaning "well" in Hebrew. Here came also happy words from the Lord: "Gather the people together and I will give them water." How fitting it is that this was a place of song! Quite possibly this song came from the same collection as the Song of Places, the "Book of the Wars of the LORD" (see v.14). In this song there is a sense of the joy of knowing God, even though the name of God is not mentioned.

18b–20 From Beer the people journey ever onward, finally coming to the valley of Moab, where Pisgah was a fine spot to spy out the land of Canaan. Only later (Dt 34:1) do we associate this peak with Moses' final moments.

d. The defeat of Sihon of Heshbon (21:21–31)

21–26 The victories over Sihon and Og are the true beginnings of victories. The Amorites, unlike the Edomites, were not related to the Israelites. As in the case of Edom (20:14–19), Israel first requested a right of passage. When Sihon tried to meet Israel with a show of force, he suffered an overwhelming defeat. The land of the Amorites was in Transjordan, extending from the Arnon River at the midpoint of the Dead Sea to the Jabbok River, which flows into the Jordan River some twenty-four miles north of the Dead Sea. Among Israel's conquests were the cities of Heshbon and its dependent settlements. It was this victory that cast such a pale of fear into the Moabites (see 22:2–3).

27–30 A third song is now included, possibly also from the "Book of the Wars of the LORD" (see v.14). This one was originally an Amorite taunt song celebrating their earlier victory over Moab. Heshbon, the capital city of Sihon, had been wrested by the Amorites from a former Moabite king, perhaps Zippor, the father of Balak (see 22:2). Its reuse by Israel must have been particularly galling to Moab and the principal reason for Moab's call for Balaam. It was not just the people of Moab who had been defeated; it was their god Chemosh as well. But now a new God had come on the scene, and his power was not limited by geography.

31 After forty years of sojourn in the Desert of Sinai, the people had entered the land of the Amorites—the land that would become theirs.

e. Israel's defeat of Og of Bashan (21:32–22:1)

32–35 The region of this king and his people was east of the Sea of Galilee. By defeating Og, Israel was victor of Transjordan from the region of Moab to the heights of Bashan. The victories over Sihon and Og were matters for singing (Pss 135:11; 136:19–20) and regular parts of the commemoration of the works of the Lord in the Passover celebration.

Significantly, this section begins with a notice that Moses sent spies to scout out the land before he began his attack on the region of Bashan. These spies must have done as they were instructed, in contrast to the rebellious spies of chs. 13–14. It is also notable that the battle was joined with the army of Og only after the word of the Lord had come to Moses assuring him of a divine victory. This is to be the pattern of holy war, an obedient people following the sure word of their great God. The victory was complete because God's ways were followed.

22:1 This section ends with the statement of the journey of Israel to the plains of Moab and the subsequent encampment near the Jordan River across from the city of Jericho. This verse also sets the stage for one of the most remarkable stories in the Bible: the dramatic encounter of Balaam, the pagan mantic, with the God of Israel (22:2–24:25).

f. Balak and Balaam (22:2–41)

(1) The "call" of Balaam (22:2–20)

2–3 The story of Balaam begins with the gut-wrenching fear of Balak son of Zippor, the king of Moab. With the vast army of Israel encamped on the edge of his territory, he feared the very worst. Balak's fear was intensified because of Israel's victories over his northern enemy neighbors (see 21:10–31). A new, stronger enemy was present, before whom Balak and his people seemed to be powerless. Balak was not aware that Israel had no designs on the land of Moab. As the Lord was about to give Canaan to Israel, so the Moabite land was a gift of the Lord to Moab. In fact, the Lord had prohibited Israel from attacking the territorial integrity of Moab in their wars of conquest (Dt 2:9). Yet there was a reason for the fear of Moab: the events of the Exodus salvation of Israel were designed to provoke fear in all nations (see Dt 2:25).

4 The image of Israel as an ox is an emphatic symbol of her strength and power. The association of Moab with the Midianites in this verse is more significant than we might first think (cf. ch. 25).

5–7 Since Balak believed that there was no military means available to withstand the forces of Israel, he sought to battle Israel on the level of pagan divination. He sent for a diviner of renown. Balaam was an internationally known prophet, an expert in examining the entrails of animals and observing natural phenomena to determine the will of the gods. He thought that the Lord God of Israel was like any other deity whom he imagined he might manipulate by mantic acts. The letter of Balak to Balaam indicates his intent: to bring a curse on a people who were under a blessing of a god. This story thus takes us into the mysterious world of blessing and cursing in the ancient Near East. If God's blessing of the Israelites could be destroyed, then they would no longer be a threat.

8–11 Balaam is altogether outside Israel's prophetic tradition. He was a pagan, foreign national whose mantic acts centered on animal divination, including the dissection of animal livers, the movement of animals, and the flight of birds. He believed that he had a way with the gods, a hold on them. To him Israel's Lord was not the Lord of heaven but just another deity whom he might manipulate. He was in for the surprise of his life. That God did speak to Balaam is not to be denied; it is just that Balaam did not yet realize that the God of Israel was not like the supposed deities of his usual machinations.

12–20 Israel was under the blessing of the Lord as the heritage of the Abrahamic covenant (Ge 12:1–3). Balaam was being sought by Balak to bring Israel under a divine curse; this God would not allow, for Israel was "blessed" (GK 1385). The first words of God to Balaam are a prohibition for him to accompany the emissaries of Balak. But when these emissaries returned to Balak, he refused to listen to their report of Balaam's refusal to return with them. He sent grander and nobler representatives, with greater and finer promises of gifts for this mantic to come with them. Balaam first said that nothing could change his mind. Then in a dream he was given permission to go with them.

There seems to be a contradiction in the permission God granted Balaam in v.20 with the prohibition he had given earlier (v.12) and the anger of the Lord that was displayed against Balaam on his journey (v.22). The difficulty is best seen as lying in the contrary character of Balaam rather than in God. God first had forbidden him to go to Moab to curse Israel; then God allowed Balaam to go to Moab, but only as he would speak at the direction of the Lord. Balaam's real intentions, however, were known to the Lord, and hence by his severe displeasure he confronted the pagan mantic on the road.

(2) The donkey story (22:21–41)

21–28 The pagan mantic, the donkey, and the angel of the Lord are brought together in this truly tragicomic scene. The donkey has been depicted from the earliest times as stupid and contrary. Yet here the "stupid" ass saw the angel of the Lord and attempted to protect her rider from God's drawn sword. Three times the hapless Balaam beat his donkey. Then the donkey spoke. The donkey did not give a prophetic oracle; she merely said what a mistreated animal might say to an abusive master if given the chance. What keeps this story from the genre of legend or fairy tale is that the animal did not speak of its own accord but as it was given the power to do so by the Lord. Before he revealed himself to Balaam, the Lord first "got his attention." Balaam had to learn from a donkey before he could learn from God.

29–33 The point of the story is furthered by Balaam's words, "If I had a sword in my hand, I would kill you right now." The ridiculous picture of the hapless Balaam looking for a sword is precious; there was a sword very near, but the object was not about to be the donkey (vv.23, 31–33)! All the donkey said was that she had been a good donkey. In some ways the opening of the eyes of the pagan prophet to see the reality of the living God was the greater miracle. The animal was but a brute beast; the prophet was a man bent on trafficking with idolatrous gods.

34–35 The words of Balaam to God lead us to think that he was truly repentant. Only the later outcome of the story shows this to be false (see chs. 25; 31). The Lord told Balaam to continue on his journey but to "speak only what I tell you." This is the point of the whole chapter: Balaam would not be able to speak cursing as he had planned. Instead, he would be the most remarkable instrument of God in blessing his people, Israel.

36–38 We are led by the narrative into the enemy camp. Balak was so anxious to have Balaam begin his curse-work that he went to some distance to meet him at the border of his land, and then he upbraided his visitor for the delay in his journey. Doubtless Balak puzzled over the words that Balaam greeted him with: "I must speak only what God puts in my mouth." Ordinarily Balaam probably believed he could say pretty much what he pleased to say, if the price was right, with the belief that the will of the gods would in some manner correspond with his words. But not this time! We learn of the consternation of the enemy over the power of God in the camp of Israel.

39–41 Balak and Balaam engaged in animal sacrifices as they prepared for the mantic acts. The pieces given to Balaam presumably would have included the livers, for he was a specialist in liver divination. Numbers 24:1 reports that Balaam subsequently gave up on his acts of sorcery as the power of the word of the Lord came on him. But at the beginning he started his procedures as he always had. Yet never did he speak as he was about to speak.

g. Balaam's seven oracles (23:1–24:25)

(1) Balaam's first oracle (23:1–12)

1–6 The elaborate sacrificial actions of Balaam and Balak are pagan. The number seven was held in high regard among Semitic peoples in general. The many animals would provide abundant liver and organ materials for the diviner. Balaam was in charge; Balak was now his subordinate. Despite the pagan and unsavory actions, the Lord deigned to meet with Balaam and to speak through him. We often say that God will never use an unclean vessel. However, God may use whatever vessel he wishes. Those who had sent for Balaam were standing by the altar, hoping for a word from heaven that would destroy their presumed foe. They received a word from heaven all right, but not what they expected.

7–8 The Hebrew word translated "oracle" (GK 5442; normally translated "proverb") establishes the distinctive nature of the prophecies of Balaam; none of the prophecies of the true prophets of Israel is described by this term. The two verbs "to curse" and "to speak against with indignation" work together to give the sense of anger and indignation. "Jacob" and "Israel" are interchangeable words marking out the people of God's covenant. The words of v.7 represent Balak's desire for the Lord to break his promise to the fathers. Yet Balaam was unable to do what he had been hired to do. The blessing of Israel was inviolable; Balaam had no power to attack their blessing.

9–10 Balaam explained that Israel was unique among the nations. Her distinction was in her relationship with her God. As he is holy, so his people were holy. Balaam's wistful desire was to share in Israel's blessing! He who had come to curse wished himself to be blessed. But just as Balaam could not "get their number," so he realized that he was not a part of Israel's destiny, for he never participated in the death of the righteous (31:8, 16).

11–12 Balaam was unable to curse Israel; Israel was unique because of her blessing from the Lord. Balak was furious—and the Lord is sovereign. The words of consternation of Balak and the response of Balaam are marvelous.

(2) Balaam's second oracle (23:13–26)

13–17 Trying to cover all the angles, Balak attempted to reduce the power of the people by selecting a point where their immense numbers would be obscured. Alas for Balak, the oracle that followed exceeded the first in its blessing on Israel. If one is confronted only with a small percentage of the whole, Balak reasoned, then the enormity of the nation would not cause the gods to bless when they were requested to curse Israel. The result of all this frenetic activity was the same as the first time. Again the Lord met Balaam and gave him a new word, to the consternation of Balak who was piously pretending at his pagan altar.

18–20 The naming of Balak in the second line as "son of Zippor" is a fine use of parallelism. The words "God is not a man, that he should lie" describe the immutability of the Lord and the integrity of his word. Balaam is himself a foil for God. Balaam is constantly shifting, prevaricating, equivocating, changing—he is himself the prime example of the distinction between God and humans. Balaam's view of gods was based on his own human failings. Now he confronts God who is not like a man in his failures at all. All others may change; God—even with all his power—cannot change, for he cannot deny himself (cf. 1Sa 15:29; Ps 89:35–37). God must fulfill his promise, for he has bound his character to his word. The blessing of God is thus irrevocable.

21 It is because God is the King that he was able to use Balaam for his own ends—to bless his people in a new and wonderful manner. The whole course of Israel's experience in the desert was one evil after another, one misery on another. Yet it is evidently the standing of Israel that is in view here, not her state. It is also possible that the words "evil" and "misery" are not used to refer to moral issues but to mantic concerns. That is, God does not look on his people with "an evil eye" or a hostile glance. When Israel is presented in the context of a hostile environment, then it is the blessing of Israel that is maintained. Only in the family is the sinfulness of the people addressed. Since the Lord is in their midst, they are invincible from outside attack.

22 The wild ox is a traditional image of power (also 24:8). The Hebrew expression speaks of two horns (which the NIV paraphrases as "strength"). God is in the process still of bringing his people from Egypt; he will complete his work soon by bringing them into his land. And along the way he is their strength.

23 The reason for Israel's eventual triumph is because there can be "no sorcery against Jacob." Balaam had no tricks to withstand the blessing of Israel. Since there is no possibility of the use of magic either for or against Israel, whatever comes of Israel will truly be regarded as the work of God. Balaam had come to use magic, but he could not "get their number" (v.10). God was in control, and Balaam was his puppet.

24 Israel was about to arise and devour its foes, as a lioness on the hunt (see 24:9). At this point the would-be victim of the curse of Balaam and Balak became the instrument of the destruction of its own enemies. As a lioness (the huntress), Israel was about to rouse herself and bring her foes down to destruction. She would not rest until the enemy was devoured, its blood lapped clean at the end of the chase.

25–26 The tragicomic nature of the story is again seen in the aftermath. Balak appears incredulous. He gasps, "What have you done to me!" in v.11. Now he says, in essence, "Stop it all together." But Balaam is indefatigable in his mission from the Lord.

(3) Balaam's third oracle (23:27–24:14)

23:27–24:2 Balak then tried another tack. Perhaps a change of place would lead to a change of words. The mention of Peor takes on a horrible association in Nu 25; apparently this was the center for the worship of Baal. Again seven altars and sacrifices were prepared, but this time with a significant change. Balaam did not go about his normal routine of sorcery. This time "the Spirit of God came upon him." This unexpected language prepares us for the heightened revelation about to come from the unwitting messenger. The oracles build in intensity and in depth of meaning.

3–4 The introduction to this oracle is extensive and descriptive of Balaam's experience in the presence of the Lord. Now Balaam's eyes were opened (cf. 22:31). The repeated use of the term "oracle" adds significant solemnity to his words. Balaam's experience included a revelation. He had now heard God and seen the vision of him. Balaam lay prone before him, but his eyes were now opened to wonders he had not dreamed of. But the seer still was not a man of faith; he was not a member of the family (see again 23:10: "Let me").

5–6 Balaam, speaking prophetically, looked down on the tents of Israel, but he thought of their future. He saw the orderliness of the encampments, but he was given a vision of their coming grandeur. He spoke in general but luxuriant terms of the blessings that would fall on Israel as they settled in their new land. The people would have a sense of Eden in the lushness of their blessing from the Lord.

7 This verse speaks of luxuriance of productivity as well as of the majesty of the coming king of Israel. It is prophetic in tone. The most problematic issue is the reference to "Agag." Agag was the opponent of King Saul in the tenth century, hundreds of years later. Possibly "Agag" was a common name among the Amalekite kings (cf. Abimelech in Philistia and Ben-Hadad in Aram). In this case the use of this name may grow out of the attack on Israel by Amalek (see Ex 17:8–13) and again when Israel first came against Canaan (see Nu 14:45). But it is also possible that here we confront a specific, predictive prophecy of a victory of a king of Israel over a great enemy. The words "their king will be greater than Agag" may be a historical continuity that begins with the attacks of Amalek in Israel's recent past, leads to the future victory of Saul over his nemesis, Agag (1Sa 15:32–33), and culminates in the victory of Israel's greatest King (Jesus) over all her enemies. This is certainly in keeping with the prophecies that follow in the fourth oracle (see v.17).

8 The broad interpretation suggested for v.7 fits with the direction of v.8. It is stunning to hear the central words of Israel's salvation ("God is bringing him out of Egypt") recited by one who was an outsider and a hostile foe. The imagery of victory is in the manner of a lion (as in v.9).

9 The theology of blessing and cursing (Ge 12:2–3) is now made an explicit part of the oracle of blessing. The idea of the lion is taken from the second oracle (see 23:24). The stunning climax is in the blessing of God on all who bless Israel. The irony cannot be missed by Balaam or by any who hear his words. In his actions he brings a curse on his own head, even as he speaks blessing!

10–14 The oracles could well have ended with the great third word from Balaam. But they do not; there is one grander yet to come. Balak is beside himself. He rages in anger, strikes his hands, and rants. He observes that at this point Balaam has given three distinct blessings of Israel. At least Balak has got this right. In his disgust with the failure of Balaam to curse Israel, Balak dismisses him without pay—the ultimate insult to his greed (2Pe 2:15). Balaam is ready to leave; the whole thing must have been uncomfortable for him as well! But before he goes, he is constrained by the Lord to speak again, his greatest oracle. In the phrase "in days to come" we recognize the signal for the distant future.

(4) Balaam's fourth oracle (24:15–19)

15–16 As in the third oracle, the introduction to the fourth oracle is lengthy, preparing the reader for the startling words of the prophecy to come. Comparing this section with vv.3–4, we find one new phrase: "Who has knowledge of the Most High." This expansion intensifies the anticipation of the blessing that follows; the repetition helps tie these oracles together, giving a sense of crescendo and climax.

17 Without question this is the most debated and the most important verse in the oracle corpus. The theme is that Israel has a coming deliverer. In agreement with many in the early church and in early Judaism, we believe this text speaks unmistakably of the coming of the Messiah. That this prophecy should come from one who was unworthy makes it all the more dramatic and startling. The terms "star" (GK 3919; cf. 2Pe 1:19; Rev 22:16) and "scepter" (GK 8657; cf. Ge 49:10) certainly may speak of the promise of a king like David, Israel's greatest king in the historical period. But ultimately these words reach beyond him. The setting for the text is "in days to come" (see again v.14), an eschatological notice. The inclusion of these words in the text is for the final victory over the enemies of Israel. The section reaches to the end because it reaches all the way to the Savior.

18–19 In the time of Moses, Edom was a nation that Israel was forbidden to attack (cf. 20:14–21). The future projection of the text assumes a time of enmity of Edom against Israel (cf. Obadiah), for which they finally received their penalty for the shabby treatment of Israel. David became a victor over Edom (2Sa 8:14). But after the division of the kingdom, Edom became independent (2Ki 8:20–22) and remained an implacable foe of Israel, awaiting the final wrath of God (Isa 63:1–6). In the eschaton, words such as Edom and Seir stand for any enemies of the people of God and of their Messiah. The contrasting words to the ultimate downfall of Edom at the end of v.18 must be stressed: Israel will grow strong while her enemies languish.

This is also the point of v.19. There is no subject for the verb "will come out"; the likely referent is the Star-Scepter of v.17. The Star-Scepter makes Israel triumphant as he gains dominion over the enemies of God's people. The theme of this oracle is sustained: Israel's ultimate blessing centers in her Deliverer from all enemies.

(5) Balaam's fifth oracle (24:20)

20 The first defeat of Israel in the desert was at the hand of the Amalekites, when Israel went against them foolishly without the blessing of God (see 14:44–45). A day of reckoning would come on Amalek that would be dreadful. The Amalekites were defeated by Saul (1Sa 14:48; but see 15:1–35) and David (1Sa 30:18; 2Sa 8:12). But there is also the possibility that this verse has an extension into the days of the Messiah's final victory over all enemies.

(6) Balaam' sixth oracle (24:21–22)

21–22 The spotlight of judgment turns from Amalek to the Kenites. Why they come under attack here is not certain; perhaps it is because they became associated with the Midianites who came under the scourge of Israel (Nu 31). The mention of Assyria is also a surprise, as its ascendancy to power was centuries away from Balaam's day; yet Assyria was known as a powerful city-state even in Abraham's day. This text may be a powerful insight into the way of the prophets—the taking of familiar things and juxtaposing them in startling ways.

(7) Balaam's seventh oracle (24:23–25)

23–25 Balaam's last oracle is more difficult than any of the others to interpret. The relative obscurity of the words compels attention; clarity may come as the time of the oracle is realized. Its meaning falls in line with the lesson taught throughout the oracles: the sense of the utter dependence on the Lord; no one is able to live, except God establishes it. The mention of Asshur connects v.24 with the preceding oracle. The identification of Kittim in the early period of Israel's history seems to be Cyprus. But ultimately the word was applied to Rome (cf. Da 11:30). The resulting meaning may refer to the final battle between forces of the west (the Kittim) and forces of the east (Asshur and Eber)—a battle in which both will be destroyed, presumably before a greater power than either (the Lord of glory). One nation will rise and supplant another, only to face its own doom. With the promises of a future deliverer ringing in their ears, the defeated collaborators Balaam and Balak depart.

h. Israel's final rebellion with the Baal of Peor and the death of the first generation (25:1–18)

This chapter presents a formative encounter with Baal worship, a miniature of the disaster that would one day engulf and destroy the nation. The time is the end of the forty-year period of Israel's desert experience. The place is the staging area for the conquest of the land of Canaan. The issue is that of apostasy from the Lord by participation in the debased, sexually centered Canaanite religious rites of Baal worship. This chapter is an end and a beginning. It marks the end of the first generation; it also points to the beginning of a whole new series of wicked acts that will finally lead to Israel's punishment (see on 33:50–56). All the rebellions up to this point have centered in murmurings against the Lord and his servants Moses and Aaron. But this chapter describes Israel's involvement in the worship of another deity.

(1) The involvement of Israel in the worship of Baal Peor (25:1–3)

1–2 "Shittim" is another name for the region of Israel's staging for the conquest of the land; it was in Transjordan, across from Jericho (see Jos 2:1). From 31:8, 16 we learn that the principal instigator of the apostasy of the Israelites was Balaam son of Beor. Failing to destroy Israel by the means of the mantic curse, Balaam then seduced Israel by the Canaanite practices of the sexually centered worship of the god Baal. The phrase "Moabite women" ties this chapter to the preceding ones (chs. 22–24). What the fathers of Moab could not do, their daughters were able to accomplish. Always in the ancient Near Eastern context, references to sexual imagery such as this suggest interconnecting circles of sexual immorality tied to sacral rites of prostitution, essential parts of pagan religious systems of the day. The phrase "to the sacrifices of their gods" reminds us that the true worship of the Lord, which was sacrificial in nature, was easily compromised in the minds of the people because of the sacrificial systems of their neighbors (see Ex 34:15; Dt 32:38; Jdg 16:23; et al.).

3 The verb "to be joined in worshiping" (GK 7537) is literally "to be yoked," as oxen are yoked in a common task. In this case, Israel was "yoked" to pagan peoples in the worship of their god. The verb speaks of adapting to the worship patterns of a foreign people, an abhorrent concept from which Israel was prohibited (see Dt 22:10; cf. 2Co 6:14). "Peor" describes a mountain in Moab (see 23:28) where the manifestation of Baal was worshiped. In v.18 Peor is used alone of the god (see 31:16; Jos 22:17). The wrath of the Lord is a "reddening of his nose" (lit. Heb.), a flashing of his rage. God has his flash point; his rage has a trigger. It should have been expended against Moab and Balaam because of their effrontery; but here it is directed against Israel. They have deflected his rage from others to themselves by their folly.

(2) The judgment of the Lord on his errant people (25:4–5)

4–5 God's rage against his people provoked a terrible judgment. The gravity of the sin called not only for death but for a special display of the corpses so that the survivors would be strongly warned of the consequences. "In broad daylight" speaks of something done openly, publicly (so 2Sa 12:12). The execution of the leaders was designed to divert God's anger from the populace as a whole. So Moses commanded the judges of Israel to kill those persons who had attached themselves to Baal Peor. This may be one of the most indelicate texts of Scripture, where Israel's judges are commanded to kill their own people who are engaged in the worship of Baal. If they are not excised, they will soon ruin the entire nation.

(3) The zeal of Phinehas (25:6–9)

6 The wording of v.6 is somewhat problematic. Perhaps it is best read: "Then a certain Israelite man brought the Midianite woman to the Tent [of God] right before the eyes of Moses and the eyes of all the congregation of Israel; and they were sporting at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting." The last phrase in the NIV indicates that it was Moses and the congregation of Israel who were "weeping" (GK 1134; see below) at the entrance to the holy precincts. No doubt the outrage of the events might have driven Moses and pious persons to weep and to beg God for forgiveness. It seems to me, however, that the subject of the verb "weeping" is not Moses and the congregation but the sinning Israelite and his Midianite partner. The focus is on them, not Moses. What they did was to engage in a sexual embrace in the manner of Baal worship, before Moses, at the entrance of the holy Tent of God!

What I am suggesting is that the author made a deliberate substitution of an opposite word, "weeping," to connote "caressing," an unusual form of euphemism to stress the heightened enormity of this act. They are not weeping; they are engaged in delirious lovemaking (cf. Ge 26:8; Ex 32:6). The contempt for the holy things and the word of the Lord shown by Zimri and his Midianite lover, Cozbi (v.15), is unimaginable. In joining the sexual frenzies of the sacrificial feasts of Baal, the man and his partner act to transform the worship of the Lord into the type of sexual rites that were the mode of Canaan. Had this outrage not been stopped, there could never have been true worship in the Holy Place again.

The person is identified in the Hebrew as "the Midianite woman" which suggests that she was a person of prominence. Perhaps she was the high priestess of the religion at Baal Peor. While priests were always male in Israel, priests could be women in the pagan religions that surrounded Israel. In fact, the sexually centered religions would have catered to women in their priesthood. Perhaps this is the principal reason that Israel had no women priests. The brazenness of these two made them not just sinners but an abomination to the Lord.

7–8 When Phinehas the son of Eleazar grandson of Aaron (Ex 6:25) saw what was happening at the entrance of the tent, he reached for a "spear" (GK 8242) and drove it through the licentious couple. Possibly the implement he used was a spear that he took from a soldier nearby. It is also possible that the Hebrew word used here might mean "knife," a more expected tool for a priest. Phinehas was a man of valor and a true servant of the Lord. Ultimately, he is typical of Christ the Victor (see Pss 2; 110; Rev 19). He is an early embodiment of "star" and "scepter" of 24:17, the smiter of Moab.

Verse 8 says that Phinehas pursued the couple into the "vaulted canopy" (NIV, "tent"). It is possible that the term refers to some canopy at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting and that the couple were not actually in the Most Holy Place. That Phinehas pierced through both of them indicates that the knife or spear could not have been little and that tremendous force would have been needed to plunge the knife or spear through both bodies. The staying of the plague indicates that this was not just an outrageous instance of debauchery, but likely the couple were the instigators of the pagan rites!

9 The number who died because of the flagrant actions of the people in their worship of the Baal of Peor (24,000; see 1Co 10:8) exceeded even those who died in the rebellion of Korah and his allies (14,700; see 16:49).

(4) The Lord's covenant with Phinehas (25:10–13)

10–13 The zeal of Phinehas for the honor of the Lord became the occasion for the Lord's covenanting with him and his descendants as God's true priests. Since the hero of our story is a priest, our estimation of priests and priesthood should be enhanced. Then we remember that Christ is priest. The best in priests points to Christ. The Lord now institutes his covenant with the priests through Phinehas. He was priest by divine right, being descended from the right family in an immediate line. He showed himself to be the rightful priest by his interest in divine righteousness. He is now confirmed priest by the rite of the divine covenant. This covenant is God's doing; it involves his "seed," and it is lasting. In the case of Abraham, God first chose him; then by Abraham's action of faith, the Lord confirmed his covenant with him (see Ge 12; 15; 22). In the case of Phinehas, he was already chosen by God; but in his action, God's covenant with him is confirmed. Surprisingly, by the action of Phinehas, "atonement" was made for the people: the plague was stopped (v.9).

(5) The aftermath of the rebellion (25:14–18)

14–18 Only after the role of Phinehas has been suitably celebrated are the names of the antagonists given. The Israelite was a prince of the house of Simeon, Zimri son of Salu. He was not an insignificant individual. As the great pride of Eleazar must have swelled over the actions of his son that day, so there must have been extraordinary shame among the members of Zimri's family. Zimri ("My Remembrance") had been named in praise of God. However, he has come to be forever remembered as the one who nearly destroyed his people in his flagrant, wanton attack on the pure worship of God. The name of his Midianite partner is given as Cozbi daughter of Zur. "Cozbi" means "My Lie" or "Deception." She stands forever memorialized as a prime example of the deception of the allure of pagan worship. From a noble house of her own people, she was likely a priestess of her religion, a prototype of Jezebel who would later be instrumental in bringing Baal and Asherah worship into the center of the life of Israel.

Because of their active participation in the seduction of the sons of Israel, the Midianites were put under the curse of God and were henceforth to be treated as enemies. The Midianites had been in league with Balak from the beginning of the confrontation (see on 22:4); they now became the objects of a holy war of Israel to declare the glory of the name the Lord (see ch. 31).

II. The Prospects for the Second Generation to Enter the Promised Land (26:1–36:13)

The book of Numbers is rightly named and its organization is simple. There are two grand sections: (1) the census and preparation for march of the first generation and their subsequent failure and judgment (chs. 1–25); (2) the census and preparation for march of the second generation and the hope that they will not repeat the sins of their fathers and mothers (chs. 26–36).

A. The Preparation for the Triumphal March to the Promised Land, the Second Generation (26:1–32:42)

1. The second census of the new generation that will enter the land (26:1–65)

a. The command of the Lord to take the census (26:1–4)

1–4 The plague of ch. 25 was the final judgment of God on the first generation. The first census, taken over thirty-eight years earlier, was for conscription to the army for the conquest of the Land of Promise. That first generation of people over the age of twenty had died. It was now time for the new generation to be numbered and mustered. It was the same task: number the able-bodied men over the age of twenty to conscript them for the army of Israel, though the place had changed from Sinai to Moab. More importantly, the people had changed. The aged Moses was joined in this task by his nephew Eleazar. Aaron was dead (20:28). Miriam was dead (20:1). And Moses was soon to die.

The words of v. 4b serve as the section heading for the listing of tribe by tribe that follows. The reference to the departure from Egypt indicates that this generation is regarded as the Exodus people. It is as though their parents had not lived. The story begins anew, as though the people had just left bondage in Egypt.

b. The enumeration of the people by their ancestral tribes and clans (26:5–50)

(1) The tribe of Reuben (26:5–11)

5–7 Pride of place is given to Reuben, firstborn of Jacob. Four clans are descended from his four sons (cf. Ge 46:9). From the seventy persons of Ge 46:27 to the quarter million (or two and one-half million!) of Nu 26:51 is an enormous increase, despite the conditions in Egypt for four hundred years, coupled with the experience in the desert for another forty years.

8–11 The listing of the families of Reuben becomes an occasion to remind us of the part that certain of their number (esp. Dathan and Abiram) had in the rebellion of Korah (16:1). The overwhelming judgment was to remain "a warning sign" to succeeding generations. The tribe of Reuben numbered a decrease of 2,770 from the 46,500 of the first census (a loss of about 6 percent). Their further history is in 1Ch 5:1–10.

(2) The tribe of Simeon (26:12–14)

12–14 The greatest loss was among the tribe of Simeon. The exceedingly wicked Zimri (ch. 25) was of the house of Simeon. Perhaps the larger number of the 24,000 who died in the fairly recent plague were of the house of Simeon. Ohad of Ge 46:10 and Ex 6:15 is not mentioned in Numbers; perhaps he died childless. This tribe experienced a decrease of 37,100 from the 59,300 of the first census (a decrease of about 63 percent). The later history of the family is in 1Ch 4:24–43.

(3) The tribe of Gad (26:15–18)

15–18 There are several problems in parallel passages with the names of these sons of Gad. When we compare the names in Ge 46:16, we find some variations of names. There are several explanations: (1) different spellings for the same name, (2) different names for the same person, and (3) confusion of scribes and hence mistakes in the copying of the names. The tribe of Gad numbered a decrease of 5,150 from the 45,650 of the first census (a decrease of about 11 percent). Their further history is in 1Ch 5:11–17.

(4) The tribe of Judah (26:19–22)

19–22 The family of Judah was unique in that two sons died childless in Canaan before their father left for Egypt. Now, hundreds of years later, the sordid story of Er and Onan is alluded to, to cause the people to remember. The twin sons of Judah by his son's wife, Tamar, each fathered a clan. The firstborn, Perez, has two subclans. Likely the listing of these subclans makes up for the loss of the two deceased older sons. Perez has the double honor; his line includes king David (Ru 4:18–22) and David's Greater Son, Jesus (Mt 1:3; Lk 3:33). The tribe of Judah numbered an increase of 1,900 from the 74,600 of the first census (a gain of less than 3 percent). Their further history is in 1Ch 2:3–4:23.

(5) The tribe of Issachar (26:23–25)

23–25 There is a difficulty with the spelling of Puah (cf. Ge 46:13; 1Ch 7:1), and the name Job is mistakenly written in the Heb. of Ge 46:13 for Jashub. The tribe of Issachar numbered an increase of 9,900 from the 54,400 of the first census (a gain of about 18 percent). Their further history is in 1Ch 7:1–5.

(6) The tribe of Zebulun (26:26–27)

26–27 Sered, Elon, and Jahleel, sons of Zebulun, founded the three clans of this tribe. The tribe of Zebulun numbered an increase of 3,100 from the 57,400 of the first census (a gain of over 5 percent). Their further history is not recorded in 1Ch 2–8; only the name of the tribe is given in 2:1. This is a strange omission (see also the comment on Dan, vv.42–43).

(7) The tribe of Manasseh (26:28–34)

28–34 Joseph received the double honor of his father, Jacob, by having two sons receive equal status with his brothers among the tribes of Israel. With the removal of the tribe of Levi from the lay tribes, this "bonus" to Joseph maintained the sacred number twelve for the fathers' houses. The tribe of Ephraim was superior in numbers to Manasseh in Nu 1; the reverse is true in Nu 26. Later in Israel's history, Ephraim becomes the counterpart in the north to the importance of Judah in the south. Yet at this point the tribe of Ephraim is among the smallest (only Simeon with 22,200 is smaller).

There are a couple of unusual things in the roster of the clans of Manasseh. First, only one son of Manasseh is listed: Makir (see Ge 50:23; Nu 27:1; 32:39–40; Dt 3:15; Jos 13:31; 17:1, 3). The tribe of Manasseh did not divide into subclans until the fourth generation. The last named presents the second unusual factor; Zelophehad, actually the grandson of Gilead, "had no sons, only daughters." While the descendants of Jacob have a remarkable propensity to father sons, surely there were daughters along the way! Yet Zelophehad's daughters are nearly the only ones mentioned in this chapter (v.46). Since the chapter is a roster of men being mustered for war, the lack of the mention of daughters elsewhere is understandable. The reason for mentioning Zelophehad's daughters is to set the stage for the narrative of ch. 27 (cf. ch. 36).

The tribe of Manasseh numbered an increase of 20,500 from the 32,200 of the first census (a stunning gain of 64 percent). Their further history is in 1Ch 7:14–19.

(8) The tribe of Ephraim (26:35–37)

35–37 The clans of Ephraim are listed in three sons and one subclan (Eran is not mentioned elsewhere). The tribe of Ephraim numbered a drop of 8,000 from the 40,500 of the first census (a decrease of about 20 percent). Their further history is in 1Ch 7:20–29.

(9) The tribe of Benjamin (26:38–41)

38–41 The lists of the names of sons and clans in the earlier rosters have presented some problems of spelling and identification when those in Nu 26 are compared with similar ones in Genesis and 1 Chronicles. But in the case of the tribe of Benjamin, we come to nearly insurmountable problems of correlation. Apparently the listings of the clans of Benjamin is quite fluid, perhaps depending on differing purposes of our sources, as well as considerable confusion in the transmission of these names. The most hopeful thing one can observe is that scribes did not attempt to go through these lists to harmonize them.

The tribe of Benjamin numbered an increase of 10,200 from the 35,400 of the first census (a gain of 29 percent). Their further history is in 1Ch 7:6–12; 8:1–39.

(10) The tribe of Dan (26:42–43)

42–43 The briefest of all the tribal notations is given for Dan; only one clan (Shuham) is listed. Yet the total population is large, with only Judah being larger. In Ge 46:23, the only son listed for Dan is Hushim. The relationship of the words Shuham and Hushim is unknown. The tribe of Dan numbered an increase of 1,700 from the 62,700 of the first census (a gain of about 3 percent). Dan is not mentioned at all in the tribal genealogies of 1Ch 1–8 (see also comment on vv.26–27, with respect to Zebulun).

(11) The tribe of Asher (26:44–47)

44–47 One name has dropped in Nu 26 from the listing of the names of the sons of Asher in Ge 46:17 and 1Ch 7:30, the name Ishvah. Perhaps he did not found a clan and so is not listed in Numbers. The mention of Serah, daughter of Asher, is remarkable (cf. Ge 46:17; 1Ch 7:30). Is it possible she was the only daughter born to the twelve sons of Jacob, even as Jacob himself had only one daughter, Dinah? The tribe of Asher numbered an increase of 11,900 from the 41,500 of the first census (a gain of 29 percent). Their further history is in 1Ch 7:30–40.

(12) The tribe of Naphtali (26:48–50)

48–50 Naphtali numbered a decrease of 8,000 from the 53,400 of the first census (a drop of 15 percent). There are four clans. The tribe of Naphtali is in the twelfth rank in both census lists. The names of the sons of Naphtali, but no further history of the tribe, are in 1Ch 7:13.

c. The grand celebrative number, to the praise of the Lord (26:51)

51 Despite all those who died during the desert experience, the total—601,730—was nearly the same as those who were first numbered (on the large numbers, see the introduction). The loss of 1,820 persons from the first census is a drop of only 0.3 percent—a negligible sum! It is utterly remarkable that the total number has remained nearly unchanged even though the people have lived under the most trying conditions for a period of thirty-eight years. God's faithfulness to his people is grandly celebrated with this triumphant chapter of census; the number glorifies God and anticipates the time when the Israelites will be as countless as the sand on the seashore.

A final note: The listing of the clans in the second census would later be very important for the nation for purposes of tribal inheritance. Not all those who were part of Israel were genetically descended from Jacob through his twelve sons. From the beginning there was a joining of destiny with the people of Israel of persons of varied backgrounds. However, to have their part in the land, they had to have a tie with a tribe and a family.

d. The allotment of the land on the basis of the names of the families of Israel (26:52–56)

52–56 In the first census the emphasis was fully on preparation for warfare (see 1:3, 45). The second census relates not only to military service in the conquest of the land but to inheritance rights once the land was secured. It is a section of promise designed to impel the people to faithfulness as well as to ensure the equitable distribution of land. Larger tribes would receive larger shares, but the decisions of place would be made by lot. The land is God's gift to his people; hence their shares in it are their inheritance from him.

e. The families and numbers of the Levites (26:57–62)

57–58a This pericope corresponds to the separate counting of the Levites in the first census (see 1:47–53; 3:1–39; cf. Ex 6:16–25). A comparison of the line of Levi in Ex 6 shows that not all the sons of Gershon, Kohath, and Merari founded families that were reckoned among the Levites.

58b–61 The parenthetical section on Kohath, Amram, and Jochebed is likely inserted here to assert anew the lineage of Aaron and to remind the priests of the debacle of Nadab and Abihu. The record of Amram and Jochebed is compressed. Kohath must have lived at least 350 years before Moses, as he was born before Jacob went down to Egypt (see Ge 46:11). Further, there is a family of Amramites that numbered several hundred at the time of Moses (see comment on 3:27). Most probably Amram and Jochebed are celebrated ancestors of Aaron, Miriam, and Moses rather than their immediate parents. On Amram see also 1Ch 6:1–3; contrast Ex 2:1.

62 The number of male Levites over the age of one month increased from 22,000 in the first census (3:39) to 23,000 in the second (26:62), an increase of about 5 percent. This section ends with the restated reason for the separate numbering of the Levites: they were neither part of the army nor would they be inheritors of the land; they were a tribe holy to the Lord. But they are a part of the nation, and their families need to be listed along with the names of the other family names in Israel.

f. A recapitulation of the point of the census: this is the new generation (26:63–65)

63–65 These verses form a fitting conclusion to the section begun in vv.1–4a, with numerous ties: (1) the mention of Moses and Eleazar the priest, (2) the location on the plains of Moab, (3) the words "after the plague" in v.1, tying to the notice in v.64 that not one of the original group of rebels was still alive, save only Caleb and Joshua. Their survival reminds us of the grace of the Lord, who keeps his promise to save, even as he remembers his oath to punish.

2. The inheritance of women on entering the land (27:1–11)

1–4 The question brought to Moses by the five daughters of Zelophehad, whose genealogy is traced back to Manasseh (cf. 26:33), concerned the securing of the inheritance and the preservation of their father's name in the land. Their action in approaching the leaders of the nation was unprecedented, a great act of courage, conviction, and faith. When the women made their claim to Moses, they specified that their father had not died because of participation in the rebellion of Korah (see Nu 16) but only because he was part of the entire doomed first generation. It appears from this verse that the rebels associated with Korah not only lost their lives in the judgment of God but that their survivors may have lost their inheritance as well. So the women came asking for a decision from the Lord, that their father's name not disappear from among the clans of his family. These verses clearly demonstrate the tie of name to land in the expectation of Israel. One's meaning in the community is dependent on the survival of his name in the distribution of land in the time of conquest.

5 The leadership of Moses is seen in how he hears the women's complaint and then takes their case before the Lord. In the Heb. "their case" is highlighted to bring special attention to the fact that this was an appeal from women.

6–11 This section gives an indication of how case law might have operated in Israel. The general laws would be promulgated. Then legitimate exceptions or special considerations would come to the elders and perhaps be brought to Moses himself. He then would await a decision from the Lord. In this case the Lord gave a favorable decision to these women. In fact, he went beyond their request. They had requested a landed property (v.4). The response of the Lord was for a hereditary possession of landed property. Not only would they receive the property, they could transfer it to their heirs as well. It is as though their father had had sons!

The following pattern is then laid out. The first in line for inheritance is the son. If the father has no son, then his daughter will inherit in his stead. If there is no daughter, then the inheritance will pass to nearest relatives: brothers, uncles, or other kin. The intent is to keep the inheritance as close as possible to the deceased man's family line. The section closes by saying that the decision was mediated through Moses but originated from the Lord.

Numbers 36 provides an appendix to this account. This deals with the complicating factor of women who are now inheritors of the land and who might marry outside their families and thus muddle the subsequent inheritance claims of Israel.

3. The successor to Moses (27:12–23)

12–14 Provisions are made for the exceptions and the irregularities of the inheritance laws, but there is no provision for Moses, the (usually) faithful servant of the Lord. His sin at Meribah at Kadesh (20:1–13) was always before him. Aaron had already died; Moses was soon to die. He would be allowed a glimpse of the land from a distant mountain, but not even he would be allowed a footfall in the land itself (cf. Dt 3:23–25). The mountain from which Moses would see the land is not specified in Nu 27; Dt 3:27 and 34:1 describe it as Mount Nebo and the top of Pisgah.

The sin of Moses is tied to Aaron (cf. Nu 20); hence, both had to die before the people could enter the land. The ominous name "Meribah" reminds us of the rebellion of the leader of the people against the Lord (see comment on 20:13). The assault on the holiness of God by Moses and Aaron was disastrous. The fact of Aaron's death adds a level of certainty to Moses' own soon demise.

15–17 In the light of his impending death, Moses requested the Lord to appoint someone to succeed him (see 20:22–29). The successor was not chosen because of a blood relationship to Moses; he was not a king. Nor was he chosen by a popular election, for Moses had not been elected by the people (cf. 14:4). The successor was to be appointed directly by God. The Lord is King; Moses was only an agent. The successor is pictured as a shepherd, one needed by the flock.

18–23 As with Aaron (20:22–29), the true successor of Moses had to be established. Joshua and Caleb were the two heroes in the darkest day of Israel's apostasy (Nu 13–14). It was fitting that the Lord selected one of them. Furthermore, from his early youth Joshua had been an aide of Moses (11:28), which made him especially well suited to follow his master's steps. Moses was to be the one to single out Joshua. "Spirit" can refer to Joshua's own leadership capacity or to the Holy Spirit, which seems more likely (see Dt 34:9).

The succession procedure included the laying on of hands, a visual representation of the transfer of power while Moses was still alive (cf. Ac 6:6). This action would forestall any doubts as to the legitimacy of the transfer of power among the people. This investiture was to be done before Eleazar and the whole congregation. Moreover, the transfer was to be put into operation on a gradual but immediate basis. Some of Moses' authority was to be given to Joshua so that the people might begin to obey him. Joshua was to stand before Eleazar while Moses was alive so that there would be no priestly objections either. Joshua would go before the priest for consultation and for the decision of the Urim (see comment on Ex 28:30) before the Lord. Joshua was to begin leading the congregation as well. Moses followed the command of God to the letter.

4. Commands for the second generation on regular offerings, festival offerings, and vows (28:1–30:16)

As the first generation was given numerous laws in preparation for its entry into the Land of Promise (chs. 5–10), so now the second generation receives its own new "laws" (chs. 28–30). The change of leadership does not indicate a change in the worship patterns of Israel. These extended chapters attest to the all-pervasiveness of sacrifice in the life of the people and the enormity of the work of the priests on their behalf.

a. Regular offerings (28:1–15)

(1) The daily offerings (28:1–8)

1–8 This paragraph reiterates the laws of sacrificial worship in the daily offerings in their order (see Ex 29:38–41; Lev 1–7). The most significant issue is the wording of these commandments. The personal involvement of the Lord, the emphasis on his speaking, and the direction of worship are the paramount issues. The wording makes it abundantly clear that this is the law of God. The overwhelming emphasis on sacrificial worship points to the enormity of sin, the need for grace, and—in some mysterious way—the coming cross of Savior Jesus.

In the daily offerings the following factors are emphasized:

1. The "appointed time." Sacrifices are a part of the rhythm of worship. All of time is marked by sacrifice.

2. The "acceptable gift." A specified offering is to be presented (cf. Lev 22:17–33). Not just any animal or thing may be used; all is according to pattern.

3. The "pleasing aroma to the LORD." The acrid odor of the burning sacrifices is the physical symbol of the spiritual reality; obedient people bring pleasure to the Lord.

4. The enormity of it all. The yearly sacrifices at a minimum would include 113 bulls, 32 rams, 1,086 lambs, more than a ton of flour, and a thousand bottles of oil and wine. God would bless his people to allow them to do all that he demanded.

(2) The Sabbath offerings (28:9–10)

9–10 The Sabbath offerings, which were in addition to the daily offerings, mark that day out as "holy." This does not mean that the Sabbath was to be the "day of worship." It was to be a day of rest—except for the priests, who had additional service to perform. Each day was a day of worship; this is the reason for the daily offerings.

(3) The monthly offerings (28:11–15)

11–15 The sacrifices at the beginning of the month were of great proportion. Whereas two lambs were specified for the daily offerings (and two more on each Sabbath), the animals for the New Moon sacrifices included two bulls, one ram, and seven lambs. Each animal sacrifice was accompanied with flour, oil, and wine; in addition, a goat also was to be offered as a sin offering. Each month was a marker of his blessing, a time for special rejoicing.

b. Festival offerings (28:16–29:40)

(1) The Passover (28:16–25)

16–25 The focus of these passages is on the work of the priests. Passover is the spring feast at which the nation celebrates the marvel of redemption from Egypt. It is also associated with the Feast of Unleavened Bread (see Ex 12:15; Lev 23:4–8). This paragraph is studded with the number seven (and its multiple of fourteen). On the Passover the people were not to do any work, which gives rise to the idea of "holy days."

(2) The Feast of Weeks (28:26–31)

26–31 The Festival of Firstfruits (also called the Feast of Weeks; see Ex 23:16; 34:22) came fifty days after the Feast of Unleavened Bread (see Lev 23:9–22); the Greek term Pentecost comes from this number (Ac 2:1). This came shortly after the beginning of the grain harvest. Each feast is associated in some way with the agricultural year. The Lord used the cyclic agricultural events as a basis for his people to worship him. Two things should be noted: (1) the special offerings of these feasts are in addition to the regular daily sacrifices; and (2) the animals had to be without defect (cf. Heb 9:14).

(3) The Feast of Trumpets (29:1–6)

1–6 This feast came at the beginning of the seventh month, a busy month for holy festivals (see Lev 23:23–25). Later this feast became the time of the new year (Rosh Hashanah). The sacrifices were one bull, one ram, and seven male lambs, each along with the requisite grain and libation offerings. The goat for the sin offering and the daily offerings were to accompany these celebrative whole burnt offerings. Again both the soothing aroma of the sacrifices and the fact that the male animals must be without defect are noted.

(4) The Day of Atonement (29:7–11)

7–11 The Festival of Trumpets leads into the Day of Atonement, or Yom Kippur. Yom Kippur ("the day of atoning") was a time of confession, contrition, and celebration (see Lev 16; 23:26–32). This is the most solemn of Israel's holy days. It is a time of fasting rather than of feasting, of solemnity rather than rejoicing. "You must deny yourselves" (GK 6700) means to deny oneself by fasting (see Lev 16:29, 31; 23:27, 32; Ps 35:13; Isa 58:3, 5). In the NT, Yom Kippur is fulfilled in the death of the Savior who made atonement for us (see Ro 3:24–26; Heb 9:7; 10:3, 19–22).

(5) The Feast of Tabernacles (29:12–38)

12–38 The Feast of Tabernacles (or Booths) began on the fifteenth day of the seventh month and lasted for seven more days (see Lev 23:33–44). This feast demanded the most animals to be sacrificed. On each of the first seven days, two rams and fourteen male lambs were to be sacrificed, along with their requisite grain and libation offerings. In addition, thirteen bulls were sacrificed on the first day, twelve on the second, and one less on each of the days leading to seven bulls on the seventh day—a total of seventy bulls for the seven days. On the eighth day one bull, one ram, and seven male lambs were sacrificed along with requisite grain and libation offerings. In each day of this festival, a male goat was also offered as a sin offering, along with the normal daily offerings (see also Ex 23:16; 34:22; Dt 16:13–15; Zec 14:16–19).

(6) Summary (29:39–40)

39–40 The sacrifices that have been elaborated on in Nu 28–29 are in addition to any voluntary offerings that one might bring (see ch. 15), as well as any vow that one might make to the Lord (see ch. 30). Thus we understand that there was to be a regular pattern of sacrifice without regard to the special offerings one might bring because of a heart overflowing with joy to God or because of a desire to make a special need known to him.

c. Vows (30:1–16)

(1) The issue of vows to the Lord (30:1–2)

1–2 This chapter is a significant OT text on the subject of the "vow" (GK 5624; see Dt 23:21–23). The principal issue is that a vow is not to be made rashly (see Ecc 5:1–7), but once made, a vow to the Lord must be kept.

(2) The vows of a woman who lives with her father (30:3–5)

3–5 The vow of an unmarried woman who was still under her father's protection might be nullified by him. Presumably this and the next law were to protect the woman, who in ancient Near Eastern society was subject to strong societal pressures. This text protects her father as well, who might have to come up with whatever the vow entails if his daughter is remiss in fulfilling her vow.

(3) The vows of a (newly) married woman (30:6–8)

6–8 The vow of a married woman might be nullified by her husband. The comparison of this section with vv.10–15 suggests that these verses relate to young couples who have recently married, as these are cases where the woman brings a vow into her marriage that may be heavily restrictive on her husband. Again, there is something protective in this for the woman (she has an escape clause) as well as for the husband (who would have to pay if the vow was not fulfilled). The woman in this case is treated like a minor child, not having independent authority to enter into a vow or an obligation on her own right. She was either under her father's home or under her husband's home. In both cases, her vows may be released by a man, but only if he acts immediately on the information he has.

(4) The vows of a widow or a divorced woman (30:9)

9 A widowed or divorced woman is her own agent in the taking of vows. She is no longer under the household of her father, and she is no longer under the household of her husband. This verse clearly indicates that a divorced woman (Lev 21:7, 14; 22:13; Eze 44:22) has the legal status of one who is a widow. She has become an independent agent. Like the widow, her former husband is in a sense "dead" to her. She is not under the protection of her father (unless she were to seek that out again). So this woman, along with the widow, is able to negotiate contracts, take vows, make promises—to function like any man in society. However, some restrictions are placed on her just by virtue of her gender and her status as one who is divorced (see Lev 21:7 again).

(5) The vows of a married woman (30:10–15)

10–15 These verses deal with those who have been married for a while. Possibly these several complications arose much as the case of the daughters of Zelophehad (27:1–11). That is, one case after another presented itself; the resulting chapter is the final codification. Presumably in the centuries leading up to the NT, the legal decisions on the subject of vows became even more complex. Jesus' words in Mt 5:33–37 are quite liberating. He forswore oaths and vows altogether for his disciples and urged them to let their words speak for themselves.

(6) A summary statement (30:16)

16 Clearly this chapter has to do specifically with the making of vows by women. Much like ch. 27, it deals with the feminine exceptions to the general rule of men.

5. The reprisal against Midian, Moses' last campaign (31:1–54)

Chapter 31 picks up on the story line of ch. 25, the account of the debauchery of Israel at Baal Peor. Midian was placed under interdict by the Lord because of their part in the failure of Israel (25:17). This chapter tells the story of the holy war of Israel against these enemies. In the midst of terrible wrath, God remembers mercy, which is also the story of this chapter.

a. The report of the battle (31:1–24)

(1) The instructions for the battle (31:1–6)

1–2 This, the last war of Moses before God brings his life to an end, was to be a war of vengeance against Midian. It is announced by the Lord, not Moses. It was "the LORD's vengeance" because of the wickedness of the Midianites, who caused the seduction of the Israelites (25:16–18).

3–4 On hearing the command of the Lord, Moses turned to the people and called for a strike force. This was a limited, contained, special task calling for a limited army of special forces. One thousand men were to come from each of the tribes of Israel, a representative army for the whole nation.

5–6 In biblical thought a blood relative may take vengeance on the killer of the slain (see ch. 35). There is a sense that the Lord is the kinsman of his people who issues a command for his own holy vendetta. The war is one of divine reprisal for the near destruction of his people by the Midianites. The mention of Phinehas is especially noteworthy. His zeal for the honor of the Lord led him to spear Zimri and Cozbi (25:8). Now his leadership in the sacral aspects of the battle demonstrates that this was truly holy war. He took to battle the holy implements and the priestly trumpets (see 10:9). The implements from the sanctuary do not seem to include the holy ark. Whatever implements he took, the belief was sure: as the Lord was with his people in the sacred place, so he was with them in war. The trumpet was a long, straight metal tube with a flowing bell; it was not the shofar, the ram's horn of ancient Israel. The blowing was an act of celebrative worship.

(2) The report of the victory (31:7–12)

7 The Lord commanded the conquest and extermination of all the peoples in Canaan (see Dt 20:1–16) because of their gross wickedness and the threat they represented to the integrity of Israel and to their very survival in the land. The cup of the Amorites was full (see Ge 15:16). Israel fought as they were taught, with faithfulness, courage, and obedient trust. The report that they "killed every man" means that there was a complete defeat; that is, they killed the men only (cf. v.9).

8 The five chieftains that the Israelites killed are memorialized forever as enemies of the Lord who were impotent before his armies. There is here a vindictiveness of the sacred, a display of triumph—a celebration of God who has given glorious victory. Among the names are two surprises. One is Zur, the father of Cozbi (see 25:15), the Midianite woman who was stabbed to death with Zimri by Phinehas. That she was a significant person is now confirmed. Cozbi is like Jezebel, a priestess-princess of paganism. The other surprise is Balaam. The story of ch. 25 lacks the name of the principal instigator of the seduction of the men of Israel. But here he is found among those killed; what Balaam failed to accomplish by the mantic arts of chs. 22–24, he was able to achieve by his advice to the Midianites (v.16).

9–12 While the men of Midian were killed by the victorious Hebrew soldiers, the women and children were spared as plunder. Moses commanded that only the virgin women (who were thus innocent of the indecencies at Peor) could be spared; the guilty women and the boys (who might endanger the inheritance rights of Israelite men) were to be put to death (vv.15–17).

Jericho, the first city west of the Jordan that Israel would win by warfare, had all its inhabitants and their possessions placed under the ban. The strike on Midian, however, was punitive. Therefore, many items of plunder (including surviving people) were to be distributed among the men of the army and the people who had remained in camp. The burning of the cities precluded their being inhabited by the Hebrews and would greatly impede their being reinhabited by enemies.

In a sense of poetic justice, the Midianites who had conspired to destroy Israel through the licentious behavior of their priestess cult functionaries were now to have their wives and daughters added to the families of Israel.

There is an episodic nature to the book of Numbers, for this story ties up three loose ends: Cozbi's father, Balaam, and the meaning of the story of Baal Peor. The tone so far in this story is one of victory march.

(3) The destruction of the women and boys (31:13–18)

13–18 Surprisingly, the people face anger from Moses instead of approval. The meeting outside the camp is an omen; something is unclean. Moses does not come to bless the officers of the armies in their victory but to vent his rage at the victories. Moses asks almost incredulously about the status of the very women whom Balaam had used to bring about the seduction of Israel.

The brutality demanded by vv.17–18 is nearly unimaginable. It is one thing to kill a woman in battle, even to kill children in a frenzy of hatred. But this verse demands the purposeful killing of women and children after the battle was over. Those girls who were to be kept alive (demonstrable virgins) would have to be rather young, and their mothers would have had to be killed. The only way to understand such a ghastly command is to realize what was at stake in the story of Baal Peor. Numbers 25 records an altogether new type of sin and rebellion—one that bears within itself the threat of the doom of the nation as a whole. It was this very type of evil that finally destroyed the Hebrew kingdoms in the land. Objectively, the destruction of the women and the boys was an act of God's mercy—for Israel. Divine judgment is sure for the nations who are a threat to the existence of God's people or who have rejected his grace.

(4) The purification of the soldiers (31:19–20)

19–20 Since this was holy war (see 19:11–13), both people and things (vv.21–24) had to be cleansed. The rites of purification from contact with a dead body would demand the waters of cleansing from the ashes of the red heifer (see 19:12). All were addressed here who had been involved in killing the enemies of God. The death of any person made one who came in contact with that corpse unclean, even when the killing was commanded by God. Thus even in a text of judgment, there are still the lessons of ritual cleansing for the people of God.

(5) The purifying of the goods (31:21–24)

21–24 Things that are ritually impure will contaminate people who are otherwise clean. Metal objects had to be purified by having them pass through fire, then be cleansed with the waters of cleansing. Some of these metal objects then became gifts to the Lord (see v.50). Those items that could not withstand fire had to be cleansed in the water alone (cf. 1Co 3:10–15). In the cleansing of soldiers, they had to wait until the seventh day, then wash their clothes, and then they could enter the camp. This pattern of seven days of exclusion from the camp because of uncleanness is well established in Israel (see Miriam in ch. 12).

b. The division of the spoils (31:25–54)

(1) The share for the soldiers (31:25–41)

25–41 The book of Numbers delights in lists. Here the Lord commands Moses to have the sum taken of the spoils of the battle, both people and animals. The term "people" relates only to the little girls who were spared the ban; the animals include sheep, cattle, donkeys, and goats. Eleazar and heads of the father's houses were to aid Moses in taking this toll. The task must have been enormous, given the numbers involved.

The division of the spoil was in two sections, one for those who had fought in the war and the other for the rest of the congregation. The two halves were equal, but their distribution was deliberately unequal—there were far fewer soldiers than those who remained in the camp. Since the soldiers had risked their lives, theirs was the larger personal share. Before the men of war could enjoy their spoil, a tribute to the Lord was required. The ratio in this case was 1 unit of 500. The tax share of the soldiers who had risked their lives was smaller than the share demanded of the people. The "tax" or "tribute" for the Lord was given to Eleazar the priest as a sacred offering. From the half of the booty to be distributed to the congregation, 1 unit of each 50 was to be given as a tribute to the Lord, to be used by the Levites in return for their service at the tabernacle. Thus the people's tax was ten times that of the soldiers.

The numbers listing the plunder were enormous; the victory was staggering. This was just the beginning; on the other side of the Jordan lay the rest of the land of God's promise. Again, the section concludes with a statement of the obedience of Moses.

(2) The share for the people (31:42–47)

42–47 The statistics of the half share for the people follow in much the same procedure as that for the soldiers. The numbers of this half are the same but are listed in a celebrative manner. Again, Moses followed faithfully in the distribution of the Lord's share.

(3) The extra share for the Lord (31:48–54)

48–54 The spontaneous extra gift of the officer corps to the Lord went beyond the tax that they were required to give of the booty of the war. The captains of thousands and of hundreds approached Moses and made a magnanimous offering of numerous beautiful objects of gold that the soldiers had taken for their own use as they looted the camps. This gift was in gratitude for the most remarkable fact that not one soldier of the elite Hebrew corps had died in the war! The only explanation for this is the presence of the Lord among his people. Moses and Eleazar weighed the gold items and found the cumulative weight to be about 420 pounds! This enormous gift came from grateful men to an all-protective God. The gold became a "memorial" of the victory that the Lord had won.

The motivation of the chiefs was "to make atonement . . . before the LORD." This was prompted by overwhelming gratitude for battle losses that were nil—not one Hebrew soldier died! The making of atonement was an offering of expiation for the lives of those who ordinarily would have died.

6. The settlement of the Transjordan tribes (32:1–42)

a. The request of Reuben and Gad to settle in Transjordan (32:1–19)

(1) The original request (32:1–5)

1–5 The chapter begins with the approach of petitioners to Moses. The abundance of fertile grazing land in Transjordan prompted the leaders of Reuben and Gad to request of Moses and Eleazar the right to settle there and not cross the Jordan. These tribal leaders found that the lands they had won from the people of Sihon and Og were ideal for the running of large flocks and herds. Only later (v.33) do we find that some clans of Manasseh were involved as well. The nobles of Gad and Reuben do more than to add place names; they place the issue of the land in the realm of divine gift.

The repetition of the word "livestock" indicates that their herds must have been exceptionally large, perhaps out of proportion to the other tribes. They needed the room that Transjordan seemed to provide. But it was not just the matter of livestock that animated them; God in his power provided the land as a gift for his people. So the two tribes requested of Moses that the land of Transjordan be given to them as their singular possession. Possibly, however, their polite words were covering a rebellious spirit. That is, these two tribes may have been abandoning their place in the league as a whole, saying something such as, "We have ours, good luck with yours." This was the way Moses read their words.

(2) The angry response of Moses (32:6–15)

6–8 Moses rages against the two tribes that they have become no better than their fathers, for they also were not willing to go to the land to fight the battle of conquest. Moses' words may have been provoked by his anger, but they became the opportunity to review the basic theology of the desert period. He was able to contrast the first and second generation, to warn the second on the basis of the experience of the first. Moses charged these tribal leaders with posing an intolerable situation. By granting them the right to settle outside Canaan proper, not only would these tribes be lost from the battle plans, but their absence would be a means of hindering the other tribes from crossing the Jordan as well. The entire nation might have become discouraged. This would lead perhaps to an ominous replay of the failure of their parents. Moses' fear was that the failure of these two tribes to stay with the whole community in the war of conquest of Canaan would be the beginnings of a general revolt among the people against entering the land. It would be the failure of Kadesh (chs. 13–14) all over again.

9–13 Moses presents an example of a biblical use of history (especially chs. 13–14, the rebellion of the first generation at Kadesh Barnea) for the instruction of the people of God. The new generation had a new opportunity to be other than their parents. They could be the people who succeeded. They did not have to repeat the failure of their parents.

Numbers is a book of worship. Worship is not just responding to grace; it is also remembering past disaster—and learning to avoid it in the present. Verse 11 recalls the covenant that was promised and rebuffed. But the promise is still there. God's oath was not just a past oath. Since he lives, so does the promise. The only question in the generation that stands before him now is: Will they be the ones, or must he wait for another? The reference to twenty years and upward speaks of the generational change that these emissaries from Reuben and Gad represented.

14–15 Moses' words were unusually harsh. There was a moral culpability in the action of disunity that might bring the ruin of God on the entire community. His words were expressive of his deep, personal feelings (cf. Paul in 2Co 1–3). This was an intensely personal moment for the great prophet of God. Rightly or wrongly, he had been provoked to vent his deepest feelings. But the deep feelings were based on his experience—and the deep feelings of God that he had experienced as none other in his day.

(3) The assurances of Reuben and Gad (32:16–19)

16–19 The men who were addressed so angrily attempted to assure Moses that they did not wish to shirk from their part in the conquest of the land. They would join their brothers in battle but wished to leave their families and livestock behind in the portion of their choosing. Their promises were sound; they had met the demands implicit within the charge of Moses.

b. The decision of Moses for their settlement (32:20–30)

20–30 Moses was not easily calmed. He spoke to the people as a father to an errant but repentant child. He gave them words of comfort and also words of strong warning. Moses' adjuration also reminded Gad and Reuben that it is not just their participation that he desired but their commitment to the affirmation of faith. They needed to prepare for battle, but they also had to know that the Lord was going to win the battle. The actions were the Lord's; the people were partners with him in his holy war.

The bargain was struck, but not without strong warnings of the seriousness of the matter if the people failed to live up to their word. In the permission that Moses granted, we sense the negotiation that was possible in Israel, even from the hand of the Lord (cf. Ge 18:16–33). In a sense the bargain with Moses was a bargain with God. When they agreed with Moses, they were also saying that they would do as the Lord commanded. The specifying elements—children, wives, livestock, and cattle—were a part of the bargain. The language is like that of a contract; agreement is full and complete.

c. The public declaration of the agreement (32:31–32)

31–32 These two verses serve as a public declaration of the decision to which the men of Gad and Reuben had come before the presence of Moses. Now it is made formal and binding before the congregation.

d. The territories of Reuben and Gad (32:33–42)

33 Apparently after the principle of Transjordan settlement was established with Reuben and Gad, a portion of the tribe of Manasseh joined with them in their agreement to settle in Transjordan and then to participate in the battle for Canaan.

34–42 The happy record of the rebuilding and settling of the people of the Lord in that portion of the land that he had given to them includes notices about continuing conquests, a mark of the Lord's continuing pleasure. This land was now really theirs. The cities that had been destroyed were now being rebuilt, and in some cases they were being renamed to show new relationships and to evince the new reality. The old gods were not in control any longer; this was now the land of the people of the Lord. The exploits of the family of Makir and their conquest of Gilead, along with the heroic exploits of Jair and Nobah, are a further expansion of the people in Transjordan. This aggression was a part of the plan of God in further dispossessing the Amorites from the region.

B. A Review of the First Generation's Journey and Words of Warning and Encouragement to the Second Generation (33:1–56)

Numbers 33 is a somewhat curious piece in the book. Principally, it is a listing of places, much like some chapters have been listings of numbers and names. It is the one chapter in which we read that Moses was commanded by the Lord to write an account of his experience in the desert (v.2).

1. The stages of the journey in the desert (33:1–49)

a. Introduction (33:1–2)

1–2 The listing of the numerous places (significantly forty in number between Rameses in Egypt and the plains of Moab) in Israel's desert experience is a rather straightforward listing that might easily be charted on a map. Most of the sites were desert encampments, not cities with lasting archaeological evidences. Many of the places are not recorded elsewhere in Exodus and Numbers. The book of Numbers as a whole is a travel narrative; this chapter is just a routing list.

b. The point of departure (33:3–4)

3–4 Only at the beginning of the journey and at one point along the way does the listing of places give way to narrative. Both the specific notation as to the time of the Israelites' departure and a description of the manner of their leaving Egypt (see Ex 12:37) are included. They left with disdain (see Ps 114:1–2), not watching the burial details of the many grieving Egyptian families whose firstborn had been slain by the hand of the Lord, but relishing the victory that the Lord had won over the gods of the land. This section is a triumphant taunt; yet even the mention of the dead adds a gentle note of sadness.

c. The stages of the journey from Rameses to Mount Hor (33:5–37)

5–37 Succoth, Etham, and Pi Hahiroth were in Egypt, to the west of the Sea of Reeds. The other sites are all in the Desert of Sinai.

d. The events at Mount Hor (33:38–40)

38–40 Unexpectedly, the staging area of Mount Hor is singled out for special mention. It becomes the setting for a memorial notice to Aaron the high priest, brother of Moses, who died here at the age of 123. Not only is his age given, but so is the date: the first day of the fifth month of the fortieth year. This is the second date in the list (the first being the date of their leaving Rameses on the fifteenth day of the first month of the first year, v.3). This means that the journeying from Tanis/Rameses to Mount Hor completes the forty years of desert wanderings.

The death of Aaron marks a pivotal date in the history of Israel. His death is regarded as having an atoning effect (see ch. 35). Aaron was three years older than Moses (see Ex 7:7; cf. Dt 1:3; 34:5–7). His great age was a mark of God's blessing in his life. By the mercy of the Lord, his time was extended to the very last year of Israel's desert experience, though his own sin (Nu 20) kept him from living into the time of the conquest of the land.

The second notice given with respect to Israel's time at the staging area of Mount Hor is word concerning the king of Arad. Even the king who dwelled in the Negev of the land of Canaan knew of the coming of the people of Israel; the reference is to the story of 21:1–3, the first of Israel's victories on the military field—promise for a new generation being different from their fathers.

e. The stages of the journey from Mount Hor to the mountains of Abarim (33:41–47)

f. The encampment in Moab as the staging area for the assault on the land of Canaan (33:48–49)

48–49 After forty years, the people were situated on the plains of Moab across from the city of Jericho—the firstfruits of the land; only the Jordan River separated them from their goal, the Promised Land. The encampments of the thousands of Israel stretched from Beth Jeshimoth ("Place of Desolation"; see Jos 12:3; 13:20) to Abel Shittim ("Field of Acacias"; see Nu 25:1; Mic 6:5), in the lowlands of Moab. The distance from these two sites, north to south, was over five miles—a suitable spread for the thousands of the tribes of Israel.

2. Words of warning and encouragement to the second generation (33:50–56)

50–54 The instructions of the Lord to the new generation came at the climax of the record of their triumphal march. They were now at their last staging area. Before them was the land, behind them an exceedingly long and tortuous journey. The commands of the Lord are expressed in several significant verbs: (1) they were to dispossess the present inhabitants, (2) destroy their idolatrous symbols, (3) destroy all their molten images, and (4) shatter their high places. Verse 53 repeats the verb "take possession" (GK 3769) and then speaks of living in the land as God's divine grant to the people. The land was his to give; he chose to give the gift to his people. The manner of the distribution of the land was to be by lot, with the assurance that the lot would not be by chance but by the disposition of the Lord. In this way the people would be able to take possession of the land as a lasting inheritance. As in 35:8, consideration would be given to the size of the clans of Israel.

55–56 These verses form the true climax of the book of Numbers. If the people failed in their divine commission to dispossess the pagan inhabitants, they would find two things to be true: the natives who remained would be perpetual trouble, and the Lord would bring on Israel the dispossession he demanded them to accomplish. The description of trouble is sadly prophetic. The remaining Canaanites did become barbs in the eye and pricks in the side (see Jos 23:13). These expressions describe constant annoyance (at the least) to terrible pain (at the most). The most chilling words, however, came from the Lord: "I will give you trouble." These words were threatening indeed. But the prospects were good. The second generation had fully replaced their erring fathers and mothers. And with them is the eternal Lord!

C. An Anticipation of the Promised Land (34:1–36:13)

These last three chapters have the sense of appendages. Chapter 33, with its itinerary, final blessing, and warning, really serves as the climax of the book. The prospects for conquest and the warning of failure were just what the new generation need to be the people of God.

1. A preview of the land (34:1–29)

a. The boundaries (34:1–12)

(1) Introduction (34:1–2)

1–2 The listing of the four boundaries is given, not only for information purposes, but also to display again the dimensions of God's great gift to his people in the Land of Promise. The initial covenant specified the land in terms of the peoples who lived there (see Ge 15:18–21). This chapter presents the land in terms of an outline of its borders.

The presentation of the boundaries follows an orderly format. Even geography is a matter of worship in Numbers. This chapter is a celebration of God's gifting. It presents a trust deed, a legal document from God to his people. Prophetically, it points to realization in Jos 15. These chapters were designed to build confidence in the people and also to provoke their continuing worship of the Lord.

(2) The southern boundary (34:3–5)

3–5 The southern boundary does not run on a straight line on an east-west basis; it forms a rough, broad angle with the southernmost point south of Kadesh. Similarly, the northern boundary forms a rough, broad angle. The resultant picture of the land is somewhat ideal, jewellike, giving a dynamic shape to the outline of the land. However, the land was a real entity, not just an ideal in the mind. Hence the exotic place names are of signal importance.

The line of the border begins with the south, which was more familiar to the people from their desert environment. In a sense movement is from the known to the unknown. The southern border would include part of the Desert of Zin near Edom, with the Dead Sea as the easternmost extension. The line moves southwest through Scorpion Pass, traverses Zin, and extends to the south of Kadesh Barnea. Then the border moves westward and northward passing through Azmon to the Wadi of Egypt on the Mediterranean.

(3) The western boundary (34:6)

6 The Great Sea is the Mediterranean and its coastlands. Certainly there was no misunderstanding of the western boundary.

(4) The northern boundary (34:7–9)

7–9 The northern boundary is something of a bloated, mirror image of the southern. It does not form a straight line west to east but moves northeast to Lebo Hamath, where it turns, either dropping sharply to the eastern area north of the Sea of Galilee or, more likely, moving even more northerly as it reaches to the sites of Zedad, Ziphron, and Hazar Enan. Mount Hor here is not to be confused with the Mount Hor in the south where Aaron died (see 33:37); this is a mountain in the region of Lebanon.

(5) The eastern boundary (34:10–12a)

10–12a The line from the northernmost point that traverses to the south finally to join the southern tip of the eastern side of the Sea of Galilee is the most precarious to attempt to draw. Perhaps a grand curve is intended that includes the sweep of much of southeastern Syria (Aram). The sites Shepham and Riblah are unknown today. The Sea of Kinnereth (another name for the Sea of Galilee) and the Jordan form the traditional eastern border for the southern part of the line.

(6) Summary (34:12b)

12b These are words of grand gifting; the role of God as the Giver of the land cannot be stressed too highly. At no time in Israel's history did she ever realize the full extent of the land these verses present (but cf. Jos 23:14). But the ideal was ever there.

b. The inheritance in Transjordan (34:13–15)

13–15 The new realities that the settlement of Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh in Transjordan brought about (see ch. 32) demand that this section be added. Since the Jordan River is the traditional eastern boundary of the land of Canaan, these tribes are outside the boundaries in a strict sense. Yet it is possible to see them as deliberately extending the borders of the Land of Promise. Again in these verses we find the obedience of Moses to the word of God.

c. The personnel of the inheritance (34:16–29)

16–29 The listing of the new tribal leaders recalls that of the first generation (1:5–16). This time the promise would be realized; these new leaders would assist Eleazar and Joshua in actually allotting that land. The chapter ends in the report of accomplishment: "These are the men." These are the names of the second generation; the leaders of the earlier listings were dead. But with the outlines of the land in mind, and with new leaders of the tribes now in place, soon the new generation would begin its long-anticipated conquest of Canaan under the hand of God.

2. Levitical cities and cities of refuge (35:1–34)

a. The Levitical cities (35:1–5)

1–3 The notation of the Israelite location across from Jericho adds pungency to the account. In their final staging area for their assault on the land, the people needed to have a perspective of how the land was to be apportioned. Since the Levites would not receive an allotment with the other tribes (1:47–53), they would need towns to live in and places to care for their livestock. The Levites were to be spread throughout the land, receiving certain cities and territories. The term "pasturelands" (GK 4494) includes open land for agriculture as well as for herds and flocks (see Jos 14:4; 21:2).

4–5 The description of the allotment of land in each of these cities is not very clear. Verse 4 speaks of a distance of one thousand cubits (fifteen hundred feet) from the town wall round about for the open land; v.5 speaks of a measurement of two thousand cubits (three thousand feet) on each side of the city for the open land. The simplest suggestion is that the city is regarded as a point encompassed by a square that is two thousand cubits to a side. From the point of the city, each direction would be one thousand cubits. That this suggests a very small city is not really a difficulty, for most of the towns and settlements of the land of Canaan were small—often just a matter of acres. Were this provision of open lands not made, a grudging tribe might allow some Levitical families to live within a small settlement but not give them any room (except at great cost) for their flocks, herds, and farming needs. A city apart from arable land and sufficient pasturelands was no great gift.

b. The cities of refuge (35:6–34)

(1) The basic concept of the cities of refuge (35:6–8)

6–8 Six Levitical cities were to be stationed strategically in the land—three in Transjordan and three in Canaan proper—as cities of refuge, or asylum cities, where a person guilty of unintentional manslaughter might escape blood revenge (cf. Jos 20). These six cities were to be in addition to forty-two cities for the Levites, giving a total of forty-eight cities. Further, the ideal was that the selection of the cities would be based on the relative size of the holdings of the various tribes and their relative populations.

(2) Further details on the cities of refuge (35:9–15)

9–15 The Lord through Moses commanded the people who were about to enter the land to personally select special cities of asylum for a killer from the avenger of blood. The provision of these cities was to be for one who had killed another person accidentally (cf. 15:30). The "avenger [GK 1457] of blood" was a relative of the slain who would take it on himself to protect the family rights and to avenge his relatives of the loss suffered by the family. In fact, the term often translated "redeemer" has this basic idea (see Lev 25:48; Ru 3:13). A redeemer is one who redeems the loss sustained by the family. This could be by payment of a price or by taking of life. In the latter case, one was an "avenger of blood" (vv.19, 21).

In his rage against the loss of a family member, the redeemer might rashly kill the offender before he found out the circumstances of the death. If the death was not premeditated, or was quite accidental, then the killing of the offending party would add wrong to wrong. Basically, then, the provision of the cities of asylum was another instance of Lord's mercy in his provisions for

Cities of Refuge

The idea of providing cities of refuge (Jos 20:1-9) for capital offenses is rooted in the tension between customary tribal law (retaliation or revenge, in which the blood relative is obligated to execute vengeance) and civil law (carried out less personally by an assembly according to a standard code of justice).

Blood feuds are usually associated with nomadic groups; legal procedures with villages and towns. Israel, a society in the process of sedentarization, found it necessary to adopt an intermediate step regulating manslaughter, so that an innocent person would not be killed before standing trial. Absolution was possible only by being cleared by his hometown assembly, and by the eventual death of the high priest, which freed the offender from ritual pollution.

the needs of his people in the world setting in which they lived.

There seems to be no significance to the number of the cities (six), but there is certainly a significance to the placement of them. Three would be on each side of the Jordan River, providing accessibility from any point in the land. Also, the inclusion of three cities of asylum in Transjordan further legitimized the holdings of the two and one-half tribes in the expansion territories. Verse 15 explains that there would be equal access to these cities by all persons who were in the land, free citizen as well as sojourner or even temporary alien. This provision is another aspect of the grace of God.

(3) Basic stipulations concerning the taking of life and the cities of refuge (35:16–21)

16–21 Various descriptions of the taking of life are presented that would indicate willful murder. The provisions of this section are based on the notions of evident intent. The manner of a person's death could be suggestive of willful intent. If the person was killed by a lethal instrument, then there was a presumption of guilt on the part of the one who killed him. In these cases the party was presumed guilty, as the means of death would seem purposeful. Further, if the person died by a physical blow that was made by hatred or in the context of an ambush, then the party is guilty and had to die. For such a one was a killer.

(4) Cases to be decided concerning the taking of life and the cities of refuge (35:22–32)

22–32 The cities of refuge were to be established for persons who had committed an act of involuntary manslaughter. But such cases were not always simple to determine. Killing an individual by a lethal weapon brought a presumption of guilt on the slayer. Yet it is possible that this death was inadvertent. In cases of doubt, judgments would have to be made by the town elders. If the council decided the death was premeditated and deserving of death, then the guilty party would be delivered over to the blood avenger. But if there was no premeditated malice, then the slayer would have to go to the asylum city to be protected from the avenger. He would be protected from the avenger only so long as he remained within the asylum city; if he were to leave the city for any reason, the avenger was allowed to slay him without any consequence to his own person.

The one who sought asylum had to stay for protection in that asylum city until the death of the high priest (vv.25, 28). There was an atoning significance for the entire populace when the high priest died (cf. Heb 5–10). If the high priest died during the period of the slayer's exile in the asylum city, then he was not only free to leave the city, but he could resume his normal life again, including his stake in his ancestral land.

A further provision of mercy was the necessity for witnesses, so that the possibility of an innocent party being accused and sentenced to death on insufficient evidence might be avoided. Two witnesses (at least) were required to preclude malevolent falsehood from one isolated voice.

The stipulations concerning ransom payments were also designed as acts of mercy. Conceivably, a wealthy person might take the route of paying ransom as a means of getting out of a sticky situation, while the poor person, who could not afford a ransom payment, would be at the mercy of the avenger or be forced to live years in an asylum city. Hence, no ransom was to be paid by either the deliberate killer or the accidental killer.

(5) The divine perspective on murder and the land (35:33–34)

33–34 The shedding of human blood pollutes the land. The crime of murder is not only an offense against the sanctity of life; it is a pollutant to the Lord's sacred land (Ge 4:10). The point is not just that there were to be cities for the Levites to inhabit or cities of asylum for the inadvertent killer to find refuge. All the theology of the chapter culminates in the last words of v.34: "For I am the LORD, who dwells in the midst of the people of Israel" (pers. tr.). If God is to liveamong his people, then the land may not be polluted.

3. A review of the inheritance of women (36:1–13)

a. Concerns of the Gileadites for the daughters of Zelophehad (36:1–4)

1–4 The family of the daughters of Zelophehad brought their petition to Moses. They did not dispute the former decision of the Lord that the daughters might inherit, in the absence of brothers, to carry on their father's line. Their distress resulted the problems that would eventuate if these daughters married outside their clan and tribe. At issue was a concern for the continuity of the lines of inheritance within the tribes. At the year of Jubilee, when all problems of lines of inheritances were to be resolved, this one would not be resolvable because of the twin lines of right to the land, through wives and husbands from different tribes.

b. The law for the marriages of the women who inherit familial land (36:5–9)

5–9 Again, in great grace, the word of the Lord came through Moses to present a decision. The women were permitted to marry whomever they choose, but they must choose their husbands from within their own clans. The issue was not just their personal happiness but the solidarity of the larger family unit. The destiny of the family in Israel was tied to the land. The instance of these women became a law that was applicable in other similar cases. The basic issue was to keep the inheritance of a family in the clan and the tribe of the fathers.

c. The compliance of the daughters of Zelophehad (36:10–12)

10–12 The women were married within their families, paternal "cousins." In this manner the inheritance of their father stayed within the clan. The book of Numbers, which so often presents the rebellion of God's people against his grace and in defiance of his will, ends on a happy note. These noble women, who were concerned for their father's name and their own place in the land, obeyed the Lord. Significantly, there is a final statement of obedience; and it is in the lives of these noble daughters of Zelophehad. We likely would never have heard of him had he had sons instead of daughters!

d. A summary statement of the law of the Lord (36:13)

13 The book of Numbers is far more than a record of commands and regulations. The climax of the book is in 33:50–56. Yet there is a salutary feeling in this chapter of theoretical issues being put to practical work. There is hope in the actions of the daughters of Zelophehad that they will be representative of the nation: this generation will do well.

Deuteronomy

INTRODUCTION

1. Name

The name Deuteronomy results from a mistranslation of Dt 17:18. For the Hebrew "a copy of this law," the LXX and the Vulgate have terms meaning "the second law" or "a repetition of this law." Internal data locate the book as beginning in the desert east of the Jordan in Moab on the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year—forty years after the Exodus from Egypt (1:3). This was after Moses and the Israelites had defeated Sihon and Og, kings of the Amorites in Transjordan (1:4).

2. Character and Author

In addition to the many statements about Moses' speaking these words are statements made within the book itself that indicate he was the author (cf. 1:5; 31:9, 22, 24, 30). Other OT books assert Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy (1Ki 2:3; 8:53; 2Ki 14:6; 18:6, 12), as do Jesus and writers of the NT (Mt 19:7–8; Mk 10:3–5; 12:19; Jn 5:46–47; Ac 3:22; 7:37–38; Ro 10:19).

Deuteronomy can be approached from several angles: (1) as a "Book of the Law"; (2) as a series of addresses given by Moses, repeating much of the earlier legal material in the Pentateuch and adding various other elements; (3) as a covenant-treaty between the sovereign Lord and his people, similar in both form and content to other covenant-treaties that have been found in the ancient Near East (having a preamble, historical prologue, various laws, arrangement for depositing treaty copies and for regular reading of the treaty, witnesses, and curses and blessings); (4) as a compendium of directives that the Lord gives through Moses to the Israelites as they are about to enter Canaan. Of these four, it is primarily a covenant renewal document, to prepare the new generation of God's covenant people to live responsibly and joyfully under the Lord's rule in the Promised Land (i.e., the third purpose).

3. Purpose

The purpose of Deuteronomy is distinctly stated as "Hear, O Israel," "These are the commands," and "Be careful to do" (4:1–2, 5–6,9–14, et al.). Such exhortations are often followed by reasons for obedience to the Lord. The basic existential occasion grew out of the rescue of the people from Egypt and their position on the southeastern border of Canaan—poised to enter and to occupy that land as their own in fulfillment of the promises first made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and now reiterated to the descendants of the patriarchs. It was the intention of God to form their nation and give Canaan to them as their national homeland (cf. 6:18).

The book of Deuteronomy calls for the enactment (renewal) of the covenant as the Israelites prepared to enter Canaan to conquer and occupy it, and it presents the way of life that they were to follow in the Promised Land. Incidental to this covenant enactment are the curses that would fall on Israel if they failed to observe the stipulations and the blessings they would receive when they obeyed the Lord.

4. Theological Values

The theological values of Deuteronomy can hardly be exaggerated. It stands as the wellspring of biblical historical revelation. It is a prime source for both OT and NT theology. When the prophets speak of God, they speak of the God and the message of Deuteronomy and of the relationship embodied in its covenant-treaty. The warnings of doom in the prophets (esp. Jeremiah) are the warnings and curses of Deuteronomy. The promises of blessing for the Israelites when they live in faith, love, and obedience to the Lord are the blessings of Deuteronomy.

The way of life for the people of God forms the basis of all subsequent revelation of the way of life that is acceptable to him. God has redeemed his treasured inheritance from the bondage of Egypt, and he is about to fulfill his promise to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob by giving them the Promised Land. The later NT teachings on the love of God, the redemption offered through Christ, the saved as the inheritance of God, and the fulfillment of the promises of God to the saved as their inheritance from him rest on Deuteronomy.

God in this book is personal, eternal, omnipotent, sovereign, purposeful, loving, holy, and righteous. The knowledge of his person and will is communicated by propositional, directive, exhortative, informative, and predictive revelation. No other god exists.

The most important element of subjective theology in Deuteronomy is that of absolutely unqualified, total commitment of the people of the Lord. Nothing else is acceptable, especially no syncretism with other gods or other religious practices. The people belong to the Lord alone!

EXPOSITION

I. Preamble (1:1–5)

1–5 The terms used here indicate the nature of the book. "These are the words" suggests a suzerain-vassal treaty preamble. "All that the LORD had commanded him" indicates the source of the material in the book, the nature of Moses' ministry as communicator of the Lord's commands rather than that of an author, and the authoritative character of the addresses as commands of the Lord.

"The LORD [GK 3378]," "The LORD our God," "The LORD your God," "The LORD, the God of your fathers" (1:3, 6, 10, 11, et al.) all signify a strong emphasis on the Lord as the originator of everything that follows in Deuteronomy. He transcends any king (or any god) in the suzerain-vassal treaties (where gods are mentioned as empowering the kings), because he is not only superior to all other gods but he is the supreme author, enactor, and benefactor of the covenant-treaty.

A crucial, stirring moment in the experience of the new nation was at hand. It was time for the Israelites to realize the Lord's promises from the past—a time for the fulfillment of the hope that began at the Exodus. The Lord's concern—and Moses'—was to prepare the people for the conquest and occupation of Canaan. Now, on the brink of crossing the Jordan, Moses reviewed the salient historical events and Israel's covenant-treaty with the Lord.

The geographical references in these verses were evidently known in Moses' time. Perhaps these locations identify a few of the places where Moses had earlier imparted some of "these . . . words" to the people. Laban and Hazeroth appear to be two stations on the journey from Egypt to Canaan (Nu 33:18, 20–21). Mount "Horeb," which is interchangeable with Mount Sinai, is used more often in Deuteronomy (1:2, 6, 19; 4:10, 15; et al.) but also occurs elsewhere in the OT. "In the fortieth year" marks the terminal point of the generation that disobeyed the command at Kadesh.

Sihon and Og were kings of Amorite peoples (cf. 2:24–3:11; ZPEB, 1:140–43). Heshbon was the capital city of Moab, but Sihon had captured it and made it his capital. Bashan was the territory east of the Lake of Galilee. Ashtaroth, Og's capital, was a little more than twenty miles east of the Lake of Galilee while Edrei, where Israel defeated Og, was a little less than twenty miles southeast of Ashtaroth. Canaan proper, west of Jordan, is labeled "the hill country of the Amorites" (vv.7, 19, 20, et al.). Sihon controlled southern Transjordan and Og the northern sector, mainly the area east of the Lake of Galilee. So here, "east of the Jordan," Moses began his sermon.

II. First Address: The Historical Prologue (1:6–4:43)

A. Experiences From Horeb to the Jordan (1:6–3:29)

1. The command to leave Horeb (1:6–8)

6–8 Moses began by reciting God's order to leave Horeb and go to Canaan, though what the Lord commanded the people was a new bit of information (its content is given only here; cf. Nu 10:11–13). The Lord's gift of Canaan to Israel and his command to them to enter and to possess the land are cardinal elements of the book. The description of the extent of the land coincides with that promised on oath to the fathers (Ge 15:18). The geographical terms delimit the land by sections: "The Arabah" is the Jordan Valley from Lake Galilee to the area south of the Dead Sea; "the mountains," the central hill country; "the western foothills," the slopes toward the Mediterranean; "the Negev," the area north of the Sinai peninsula but south of the central hill country; "the coast," the land along the Mediterranean; "the land of the Canaanites" and "Lebanon, as far as . . . the Euphrates," the northern section.

The promise of the land was given "to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob—and to their descendants." The land, then, first promised to Abraham, was given Isaac as the "only" son of Abraham and Sarah and then limited to Jacob and his sons, the heirs of the promise (Ge 12:7; 15:18; 26:3–4; 28:4, 13–15). This promise was reaffirmed at the burning bush (Ex 3:8, 17).

2. The appointment of leaders (1:9–18)

9–14 The increased number of Israelites presented too many problems for Moses to care for alone. Consequently, political and juridical appointments were initiated. No mention is made here of the instigation of this procedure by Moses' father-in-law (cf. Ex 18:13–26); here Moses simply stated that he saw the need for "judges" [GK 9149] in political and judicial activity as his assistants. While Exodus suggests that Moses himself appointed these leaders, it is apparent from v.13 that the people chose the leaders as representative of the various tribes, and then Moses appointed them to their several tasks (vv.15–18). The leaders were to be characterized by wisdom, understanding, and experience.

15–18 The use of the word "commanders" [GK 8569] and the size of the groups—thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens—suggest a military arrangement. The need, however, was for assistant judges, not for military men. The context begins and ends with reference to a judicatory. The designation of these men as commanders, tribal officials, and judges seems to indicate three distinct classes. This arrangement seemed to be satisfactory to the people.

Four matters regarding the administration of justice are mentioned: (1) disputes between fellow Israelites or with foreign inhabitants in the land were to be arbitrated; (2) directives for making decisions include no partiality—small and great were to be heard on an equal basis; (3) judges were not to fear human beings because juridical process rested on the realization that "judgment belongs to God"; and (4) cases too difficult for the judges were to be referred to Moses.

3. The spies sent out (1:19–25)

19–23 After leaving Horeb, the Israelites went "as the LORD . . . God commanded" (cf. v.7) toward the hill country of the Amorites. This difficult journey of more than 150 miles through the Desert of Paran brought them to Kadesh Barnea on the southern perimeter of the Land of Promise. "That vast and dreadful desert" was a forbidding limestone plateau: hot, dry, rugged, and usually bare of any sustainable vegetation. There Moses reiterated the Lord's command (v.8) to take possession of the land God was giving them and exhorted them not to be afraid, obviously indicating that the Israelites were afraid. The people suggested that some men be sent into the land to scout it out. In light of Nu 13:1–3, apparently the people first suggested that this reconnoitering be made; Moses then approved the idea, referred the request to the Lord who agreed to it, and ordered that each tribe send out one representative.

24–25 Moses, recalling that event, left out details and descriptions, saying only that the spies returned with a report that the land was good and that they brought back some fruit from the Valley of Eshcol as evidence (cf. Nu 13:3–33).

4. The rebellion against the Lord (1:26–46)

26–31 In spite of the good report and evidence of the productivity of the land, the people refused to enter because the rest of the report discouraged them. The size and strength of the inhabitants, the high fortifications of their large towns, and the presence of the Anakites made the Israelites so fearful that they rebelled against the Lord, misconstrued his attitude toward them, and refused to believe in his promises. Grumbling in their tents, they said, "The LORD hates us," when in truth he loved them. They claimed that the Lord brought them from Egypt to have them destroyed by Amorite hands; but the contrary was true. Again Moses urged the people not to be afraid, asserting that the Lord their God would go ahead of them as he had in Egypt and Sinai. Before their very eyes God had carried them along (cf. Nu 11:12).

32–36 In spite of the promise of the Lord's leadership, the people refused to enter the land; so the Lord declared that they would not see that good land. Out of the vast throng of Israelites, only those under twenty, plus Caleb and Joshua, would enter it (cf. Nu 14:30–31). Caleb "followed the LORD wholeheartedly"; he was totally committed to the Lord and obeyed him fully. God promised him the area he had explored.

37–38 Moses told the people that the Lord was angry with him also "because of you"; so Moses himself would not be allowed to enter the land. This must refer back to the experience of the Israelite quarrel with the Lord at the waters of Meribah (Kadesh). There the Lord said that Moses and Aaron would not enter the land because they did not honor him (Nu 20:12). Moses here looked behind his own failure and referred to the cause of his action: the people's criticism of the Lord's provision of food. Joshua is called Moses' assistant (lit. Heb., "he who stands before you"); he would lead the Israelites in taking the land.

39–40 The children of this rebellious generation would acquire the country that that generation had faithlessly failed to invade and possess. That generation was condemned to return to the desert. The way of the Red Sea was doubtless a well-known route through Sinai and does not necessarily imply destination.

41 Being sent back into the vast, dreadful desert (v.19) was more than the people could take; so they confessed their sin, put on their weapons, and presumptuously went up into the hill country. This admission of their guilt was frivolous. Without due consideration of the Lord's later command, their action of going up into the hill country, now without the Lord's approval, was foolhardy.

42–43 Not only did the Lord declare that he would not go with the people, he also prophesied their defeat. But the Israelites' obstinacy was such that they would not listen; so they marched up to battle against the Amorites in an action of presumption, rashness, and arrogance.

44–46 The Amorites met the Israelite army somewhere north of Kadesh Barnea and then routed the Israelites toward the south or southeast. The Amorites' pursuit "like a swarm of bees" describes numerical greatness, persistence, and ferocity. "You came back and wept before the LORD" means that the Israelites returned to the tabernacle of the Lord and wept there. The Hebrew time phrase in v.46 expresses a long, indefinite period and suggests that a large part of the next thirty-eight years was spent there.

5. The journey from Kadesh to Kedemoth (2:1–25)

1–7 In obedience to the Lord's command in 1:40, the chastised Israelites returned to the desert, between Kadesh and the Seir range. The period probably encompassed both departures from Kadesh recorded in Nu 14:25 and 20:22. The phrase "for a long time" (cf. 1:46) suggests that the time spent at Kadesh and around Seir took up the period between the abortive attempt to enter Canaan from Kadesh and the end of the wanderings that brought them to the Jordan River opposite Jericho. It was a "long time" because the Lord had decreed punishment on the nation for their disobedience at Kadesh.

If the command to go northward was given in Kadesh, then the order gives the general direction only, for it was necessary to go south and east before marching north. With the exception of Caleb, Joshua, and Moses, the generation of men twenty years old or more who had refused to enter Canaan at the Lord's command were now dead (vv.14–15); and Moses also would die soon. Therefore, the Lord said that they had gone around the hill country long enough.

Approaching Edomite lands brought Israel in or near the area the Lord had promised to Esau and his descendants. So the Lord commanded the Israelites not to make war on their Edomite relatives; neither were they to take their land or anything in it; they were to buy food and drink with "silver." Before this the Israelites had lived off what the Lord had supplied. Manna did not completely cease until the day after the first celebration of the Passover in Canaan under Joshua (Jos 5:10–12; cf. Ex 16:35).

8–9 The order of the journey reviews the travel from Ezion Geber or Elath at the head of the Gulf of Aqaba northward to the plains of Moab. As the Lord had forbidden Israel to attack the Edomites because they were blood brothers, so now he warned them not to fight with the Moabites. They were descendants of Lot, and he had given them the land they controlled.

10–12 The mention of these territories elicited historical references to former inhabitants, which the Moabites (vv.9–11), Ammonites (vv.19–21), Edomites (vv.12, 22), and Caphtorites (v.23) had displaced. These ancient nations are described as numerous, tall, and strong. Yet they were destroyed by invading brothers of the Israelites—surely a suggestion that Israel too would succeed in conquering the land they were about to invade. The reference to Israel's destruction of former inhabitants may indicate the point of view of Moses referring to the conquest of Transjordan.

13–15 Since the fighting men of the generation that had failed to enter the land had died off, the Lord's hand was no longer against Israel. He directed the new generation to cross the Zered, which flows into the southern end of the Dead Sea from the east, and then to cross the Arnon (v.24). This brought them into the area controlled by the Amorites.

16–19 When the Israelites came near the northeastern border of Moab at Ar, they were next to the territory occupied by the Ammonites, who at that time lived east of the Amorites. Sihon controlled the area between the Arnon River on the south, the Jordan on the west, the Jabbok on the north, and the border of the Ammonites on the east. The Israelites were not to disturb the Ammonites but were to turn northwestward into the country of Sihon. The Ammonites were the descendants of Lot, and the Lord had given that country to Lot and his descendants (see comment on v.9).

20–23 This parenthetical portion mentions how the Lord had destroyed the Zamzummites (a nation of large people who could be called giants; cf. 3:11) and had given their land to the Amorites. He had also destroyed the Horites, the Avvites, and the Caphtorites and had given their land to the descendants of Esau. Evidently the Lord through Moses was establishing belief in his control over the Canaanite groups of the past to inspire Israel for the conquest ahead.

24–25 While Israel was not to disturb the Edomites, Moabites, or Ammonites, such prohibition did not extend to the Amorites. The Lord declared that he had put Sihon and his kingdom into Israel's hands. The conquest was certain; it was only for Israel to accomplish it. They were to cross the Arnon into Amorite territory and confidently engage Sihon's army in battle. God would put the fear of Israel into all the nations in the area (Cf. 11:25; also Ex 15:15–16; 23:27).

6. The conquest of Transjordan (2:26–3:20)

a. The defeat of Sihon (2:26–37)

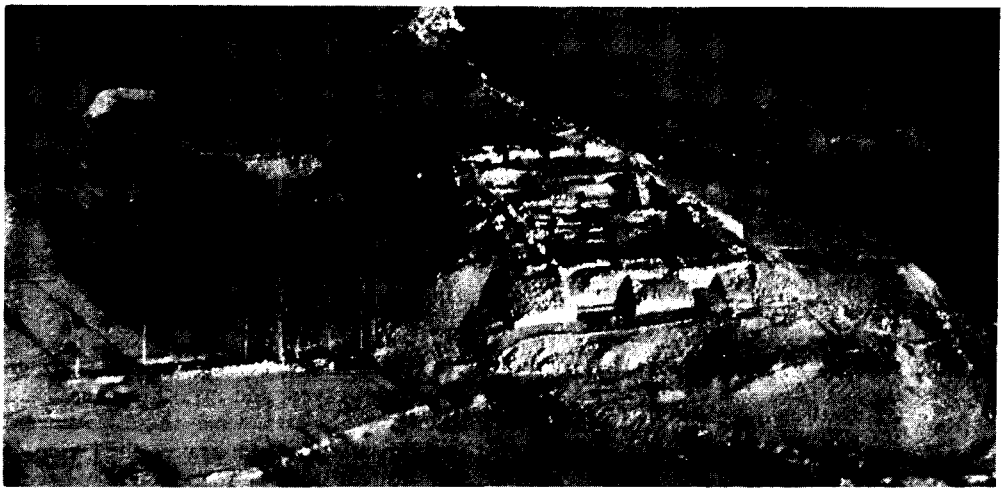
26–35 Though the Lord had said that he had given Sihon into Israel's hands (v.24), Moses approached Sihon with messengers bearing a request to pass peaceably through his country. But Sihon, from a heart made stubborn by the Lord, refused the request and came out to battle against the Israelites. Sihon, his sons, his army, his people, and his towns were destroyed. So southern Transjordan was subjected to total destruction, except that the Israelites kept for themselves the "plunder" instead of giving it over to the Lord by destruction. Such exceptions were not allowed when the Lord required a strict following of the total-destruction principle (cf. Jos 7; 1Sa 15).

36–37 So all the territory from the Arnon Gorge on the south to Sihon and Og's boundary in Gilead on the north, and from the upper course of the Jabbok River on the east to the Jordan on the west fell to the Israelites. They did not, however, encroach on any of the Ammonite land, which the Lord expressly commanded them to avoid (see v.19).

b. The defeat of Og (3:1–11)

1–3 The conquest continued by pressing north to engage Og king of Bashan in battle because the Lord had signified that his army and territory would also become Israel's. Og was vanquished; and both population and cities were destroyed, but the livestock and valued goods were kept by the Israelites (v.7).

4–7 The geographical limits of the country of Og that was conquered are in general clear, though certain specific designations are not. The description of the sixty cities as "fortified with high walls and with gates and bars"



The oasis of Kadesh Barnea is located in the narrow valley of the Wadi el-'Ain. The Israelites may have camped here for an extended period. Courtesy Ze'ev Meshel.

indicates that they were formidable obstacles and that their capture was a remarkable success (cf. Nu 32:33; Jos 9:10; Pss 135:10–11; 136:18–22). "City" (GK 6551) need not imply a place with a large population; some cities had a population of only a few hundred.

8–11 Prior to allocating the captured lands to the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, Moses described the whole area taken from the Amorite kings. The names Sirion and Senir for Mount Hermon occur elsewhere in the Scriptures (1Ch 5:23; Ps 29:6; SS 4:8; Eze 27:5). Salecah and Edrei apparently fix the southern border of Bashan. His iron bed might have been a black basalt sarcophagus, many of which have been found in that country.

c. The division of the land (3:12–20)

12–15 The geographical description of the territories given to the two and a half tribes is difficult to follow in its entirety. In the NIV this half of the tribe of Manasseh is called "the half-tribe of Manasseh"; Makir was their progenitor (cf. Nu 26:29; 32:40). The other half, which received its allotment in Canaan proper, is not mentioned as often and is not designated "the half-tribe of Manasseh." The Geshurites and Maacathites were two smaller kingdoms that Israel did not drive out. Those people continued to live on their land under Israel (Jos 13:11, 13).

"The rest of Gilead" (v.13; a northern part other than that given to Reuben and Gad) is given to the half-tribe of Manasseh (simply "Gilead" in vv.15–16). Gilead sometimes refers to the area between the Jabbok and the Yarmuk (the northern sector), sometimes to the central area south of the Jabbok but north of Heshbon and the Dead Sea, and sometimes to the area including both sections. Jair's area was in the northern sector of Gilead, beyond the Yarmuk Valley up to the territory of the Geshurites and Maacathites who occupied the land east of Lake Galilee and the Waters of Merom. The boundary between Gilead and Bashan is not clearly defined. The territory of Jair seems to be in both Gilead and Bashan.

16–17 Verse 12 says that the Reubenites and Gadites' area included half the hill country of Gilead. This makes the southern part of Gilead the northern part of Reuben and Gad, the southern border of Reuben and Gad being the Arnon Valley, and the eastern border being the Jabbok River from its headwaters in the south. The eastern border continues northward until the river bends and flows westward to the Jordan. Its western border was that part of the Jordan River and the Dead Sea that closed the gap between the northern and southern borders.

"Kinnereth" (cf. Gennesaret in Lk 5:1) is an older name for Lake Galilee, a town on its northwest perimeter, or the entire area. The western border of the Gadites and Reubenites' allotment extended from Kinnereth along the Jordan and the eastern side of the Dead Sea as far as the Arnon Gorge, approximately half the length of the sea.

18–20 Moses reminded the men of the two and a half tribes of their responsibility to cross the Jordan with the rest of the Israelites to win the land there before they settled down in their Transjordanian possessions. All the "able-bodied men" had to represent a special body of soldiers. Surely some men, also armed, must have remained in Transjordan to protect the women and children.

7. Moses forbidden to cross the Jordan (3:21–29)

21–29 After encouraging Joshua with the assurance that God would fight for him in Canaan as he did in Transjordan, Moses referred to his appeal to God that he might go into "the good land beyond the Jordan." The Lord refused this request (cf. 1:37; 3:26; 4:21) and directed him to ascend to the top of Pisgah so that he might look over the Promised Land, even though he would not enter it; this was fulfilled after Moses had delivered the messages of Deuteronomy (see 31:7–8, 14, 23). Joshua, not Moses, was to lead the people in conquering the land.

B. Israel Before the Lord (4:1–40)

1. Exhortation to obey the Lord's commands (4:1–14)

1–2 Moses next turned to the stipulations of the covenant-treaty. This beginning section is largely hortatory, though what the Israelites were exhorted to do necessitates introductory reference to the stipulations. Moses emphasized the importance and necessity of adhering to the codes that the Lord had given the people. What he declared was sufficient to guard their lives and to guarantee their possession of the land. The phrase "I am about to teach you" indicates the nature of the Deuteronomic messages. Coupled with these expositions of the law are the exhortations to "follow" (GK 6913) the laws and to "keep [GK 9068] the commands of the LORD."

3–6 Failure to follow the Lord would result in death (cf. Nu 25; cf. Ps 106:28; Hos 9:10). "Baal Peor" designates both the place and the god of the place. The worship of the Canaanite Baal involved sexual acts and continued to be a serious breach of the first commandment among the Israelites and, consequently, of the covenant. Loyalty to the Lord was an absolute requirement for those who would follow him; failure to heed the warnings about the "other gods" of Canaan would result in immediate destruction. Only those who held fast to the Lord could expect to remain alive. Obeying the Lord's codes would also make them known to the nations, who would esteem the Israelites as wise and understanding people.

7–8 Moses pointed up the distinctive character of these codes: the Lord was near them when they prayed, and no other nation had such righteous laws. Since these laws were communicated through prayer, the giving of them brought Israel close to God. The Lord's presence in the center of the camp was symbolized in the glory over the ark of the covenant and the tabernacle (tent) in which the ark was placed and in the pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night (Ex 40:34–38; Nu 23:21).

9–14 Moses was concerned that the generations to follow would be taught what he was teaching to the people; this communication involved memory and observance. But knowledge was not enough; the people had to "follow them" (vv.1, 5, 13–14) and "observe [GK 6913] them carefully" (v.6). Active obedience was essential. Israel was called on to remember the day at Horeb (Sinai) when the Lord spoke to them "out of the fire." They were to remember his presence through "the sound of words . . . only a voice." This is elaborated further by such terms as "his covenant [GK 1382], the Ten Commandments," and as what was written "on two stone tablets." The "Ten Commandments" epitomize all the commands that the Lord gave to Israel through Moses. The "two stone tablets" are two tablets, each inscribed with the list of commands. This coincides with the two copies of a suzerain-vassal treaty, which each participant was to have.

2. Idolatry forbidden (4:15–31)

15–18 As an introduction to the exhortation to shun idolatry, Moses repeated his observation (v.12) that the people saw no form when the Lord spoke to them from Horeb. Because he has no physical form, no physical representation could be tolerated. The description of the forms of creatures is slightly more explicit than that in the second commandment (Ex 20:4; Dt 5:8) and reminiscent of the Creation narrative (Ge 1:20–26). The Lord is not like the idols of Canaan.

19 Neither were the Israelites to worship the sun, the moon, and the stars. "Things the LORD your God has apportioned to all the nations under heaven" cannot mean that God gave these celestial bodies to the nations as objects of worship. Rather, these were given to all humankind for the physical benefit of the earth and were not proper objects of worship at all (Ge 1:14–18).

20 The use of metal by heating certain ores and then hammering the metallic residue or welding it to other parts while still hot may have appeared in the Near East in the first half of the third millennium B.C., but the manufacture of iron objects (usually weapons) was limited till 1500 B.C and later. Bringing Israel out of Egypt was like bringing her out of an iron-smelting furnace—the heavy bondage of Egypt with its accompanying difficulties and tensions being likened to the hottest fire then known. Israel had been brought out of Egypt "to be the people of his inheritance," as they indeed were (cf. Ps 78:62, 71; Isa 19:25).

21 Moses, however, was to die in Moab; and for the third time he referred to the Lord's refusal to let him cross the Jordan and enter Canaan proper (1:37; 3:26–27). Each time he spoke of the Lord's anger toward him "because of you." Moses seemed to feel that the Israelites were to bear the blame for his predicament. Certainly the repetitious reference to the Lord's prohibition reflects his keen disappointment.

22–24 Since the people were about to enter the land, Moses reiterated his exhortation that they be very careful not to forget the covenant the Lord made with them. The central character is the Lord himself, who is "a consuming fire," intolerant of idols in any form (5:9; 6:15; Ex 20:5; 34:14; cf. Jos 24:19; Na 1:2).

25–29 The spirit of the prophets moved in Moses as he looked into the future of Israel relative to idol worship. Seeing that the generations to come might become corrupt through idolatry, he called heaven and earth as witnesses of his warning of destruction against the Israelites, the scattering of them among the nations, and their extremely limited numerical survival. He seemed sure that such a situation would prevail because he proceeded to tell how, in those foreign lands, the Israelites would "worship man-made gods" but eventually would seek and find the Lord their God. The Lord would not abandon, destroy, or forget them—or forget his covenant with them (cf. vv.29–31). This indictment of idolatry portrays the spiritual nature of Deuteronomy. Idols have no senses but are only human fabrications using common, insensate materials. The only way out of any future predicament resulting from infidelity rested on unequivocal recommittal to the Lord (cf. 6:5; 10:12; 11:13; 26:16; 30:2, 6, 10).

30–31 The nation may fail to uphold the covenant; the people may forget their Lord; but when they turn back to him in faith and obedience, he will mercifully accept them. He will not forget the covenant based on his promises.

3. Acknowledgment of the Lord as God (4:32–40)

32 Waxing eloquent as he tried to press home the greatness of the Sinaitic experience, Moses grandly asserted by a series of questions that the revelation of the Lord at Horeb was the greatest event of history. From the creation of humanity until that time, nowhere else on earth had such an observable event happened.

33–38 God had spoken to the people out of the fire, and they still lived! Moses described what the Lord had done for them in Egypt and through the deserts. The "testings" (GK 4999) probably relate primarily to the plagues or "great trials" (cf. 7:19). This "testing" is immortalized in the experience at Rephidim where the Israelites tested the Lord's patience by asking, "Is the LORD among us or not?" (Ex 17:7). The more or less synonymous expressions in v.34 indicate the extraordinary display of the Lord's power. They all indicate that the Lord is God and that he is stronger than the gods of Egypt. Moreover, all these "awesome deeds" had been done for them "before [their] very eyes" with a specific intent. They were to (1) learn that he was the only true God, (2) be corrected of any false notions or wrong behavior, and (3) be prepared for entrance into the land of their inheritance.

The Lord's love for his people finds its first mention here. The reference to the Lord's choice of Israel, based on his love for their forefathers, and the reference to his gift of Canaan to them as an inheritance go back to the covenant with Abraham and to the promises of that covenant (Ge 12:3; 17:4–8; 18:18–19).

39–40 Moses again emphasized personal commitment to the Lord, based on the fact that he is the only God and that he exists both in heaven and on earth. Such a commitment would result in prosperity and continued possession of the land that the Lord was giving them. The Hebrew structure of the last clause in v.40 suggests purpose rather than result—in order that you may continue to live in the land.

C. The Transjordanian Cities of Refuge (4:41–43)

41–42 Bezer, Ramoth Gilead, and Golan are designated as sanctuaries—elsewhere "cities of refuge"—for whoever unintentionally and without premeditation killed someone (cf. 19:1–13; Nu 35:9–23). Only here are the names of the Transjordanian cities of refuge expressly mentioned (but see Jos 20:8).

43 The desert plateau extends eastward from the upper part of the Dead Sea. Bezer lies about twenty miles east of the northeast corner of the Dead Sea. Ramoth Gilead was about thirty miles southeast of Lake Galilee, and Golan, twenty miles east of a centerpoint on the east bank of Lake Galilee. Bezer, then, was accessible to the people in southern Transjordan, Ramoth Gilead to those in the central part, and Golan to the ones in the north. The identification and location of these places are not certain.

III. The Second Address: Stipulations of the Covenant-Treaty and Its Ratification (4:44–28:68)

A. Introduction (4:44–49)

44–49 As an introduction to the stipulations, this paragraph presents something of the character of what follows—namely, "stipulations, decrees and laws." It mentions also the people, the time, the place, and a brief description of the extent of the lands they had captured.

Why another introduction? (Notice 1:1–5.) Perhaps this follows the procedure of updating the treaty at treaty renewal time. It may be an instance of the repetitive character of Deuteronomy as a device for emphasis and instruction.

B. Basic Elements of Life in the Land (5:1–11:32)

1. The Ten Commandments (5:1–33)

a. Exhortation and historical background (5:1–5)

1–2 Moses' main address begins much as his introduction to the historical prologue (4:1). He urged the people personally to learn these decrees and laws and to adhere to them. He reminded them that they themselves had received the covenant from the Lord who had spoken to them out of the fire on Mount Horeb. Though the people he was then talking to were less than twenty years old (except for Caleb and Joshua) at the time of the Horeb experience, they were there and were now representative of Israel. The covenant-treaty was made by the nation represented at Horeb, and the covenant remained in force to all succeeding generations until abrogated or qualified by the Lord.

3 The "fathers" (GK 3) were not the people's immediate fathers but their ancestors, i.e., the patriarchs (see 4:31, 37; 7:8, 12; 8:18).

4–5 The immediacy of the Lord's relationship with the people is pointed up in the phrase "face to face" (cf. 34:10; Ex 33:11; Ge 32:30; Jdg 6:22). However, Moses explained that this relationship came through his mediatorship, because of their fear of the fire on the mountain. The character of Moses' mediation can be seen in the contrast between the Israelites' hearing the sounds of the voice of God (4:12, 15; 5:4, 22, 24; 10:4) but not with sufficient clarity to distinguish the words (Ex 19:7, 9; 20:19, 21–22; cf. Ac 9:7).

b. The commandments (5:6–21)

6–7 The Ten Commandments sit appropriately at the beginning of Moses' elucidation of the basic legislation for the Israelites. These commands are not only to be learned but also to be obeyed. They come directly from the Lord their God, who brought them up from Egypt. Their relationship with God is rooted in history, and that history is one of God's interventions for their benefit. The phrases "other gods" and "before me" also speak of the relationship of the people to God. God does not allow his people to have "other gods"—whatever they might be.

8–10 The proscription of making or using idols is total. Nothing in Israel's environmental experience may be the basis for an idolatrous form to be honored and worshiped as God. The reason is definitely personal, both on the part of the Lord and on the part of the people. The people either hate the Lord or love and obey him, and they receive from him punishment or love commensurate with their hate or love and obedience. Those who adhere to the covenant-treaty stipulations get its promised benefits; those who do not adhere to them get its punishments.

The children of Israel are not punished for the sins that their fathers committed; they are punished for their own sins (cf. 24:16). The punishment, however, goes on "to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me," just as his love continues toward "a thousand [generations] of those who love me and keep my commandments." The distinction between punishment to the third and fourth generation and love extended to thousands suggests that God's love far surpasses his retribution.

11 The third commandment concerns the use of the name of the Lord God in oaths or vows. Oaths were part of the common process of making authoritative and firm statements or promises. The Israelites were not to use the Lord's name to seal such declarations in a light or frivolous manner or without the intention of fulfilling the oath, vow, or promise. The "misuse" of the name of the Lord for an unworthy cause or in an unworthy manner destroys the proper use of that name in prayer, praise, and thanksgiving; and it substitutes a blasphemous manipulation of witchcraft and other supposed sources of power for a holy invoking of God's name (cf. 18:9–14; cf. also Mt 5:33–37; Jas 5:12).

12–15 In the commandment on the Sabbath day, the emphatic statement "as the LORD your God has commanded you" looks back to the initial declaration in Ex 20. The prohibition against making animals work on the Sabbath is also more emphatic here than in Ex 20:10. All the Israelite animal holdings are included in "any of your animals." Moses' concern for the lower strata of society is tied to the exhortation to remember that the Israelites themselves were slaves in Egypt. The Lord's bringing them out of Egypt does not preclude other reasons for the law of the Sabbath—as God's rest on the seventh day (after Creation; Ex 20:11). The words "may rest, as you do" indicate concern for others' well-being.

Ideas involved in the observance of the Sabbath are perpetuated in the NT by the analogy of the creating of a new people of God through the ministry of the Lord Jesus. The ritual elements of the Jewish Sabbath are superseded by the work of Christ and by faith in him. And the time reference has changed to the first day of the week, now called the Lord's Day, to focus on the new life effected and epitomized by the resurrection of Christ Jesus (Mt 28:1–7; Mk 16:1–6; Lk 24:1–6; 1Co 16:2; Rev 1:10; cf. Eph 2:4–10; 4:24). However, even now the observance of the Lord's Day must be in keeping with Col 2:16–17 (cf. Jn 20:1, 19, 26; Ac 2:1; 20:7).

16 To "honor" (GK 3877) one's parents is to respect, glorify, and venerate them. Children are to hold parents in high regard because of their position in the family, a position not only in God's scheme of authority in human relationships, but also in the covenant relationship that called for continuation of the people's status with the Lord. Children's regard for their parents led to regard for their parent's relationship to God. Both father and mother are to be honored. The results of failure to honor parents can be seen in the law concerning an incorrigibly rebellious son (21:18–21).

The apostle Paul referred to the fifth commandment as "the first commandment with a promise," the promise being "that it may go well with you and that you may enjoy long life on the earth" (Eph 6:2–3; see comment). The honoring of father and mother, together with its promise, carries over into all time and everywhere. However, the promise of an ultimate resting place (homeland) reaches its greatest fulfillment in "a new heaven and a new earth" (2Pe 3:13; Rev 21:1).

17 The NIV correctly translates the sixth command as a prohibition of murder rather than of killing. Murder is a personal, capital crime. Killing may be done as representative of the nation in judgment on a criminal or in war. In OT times persons were put to death in obedience to the command of God, but private or personal killing is murder and is proscribed.

Capital punishment is the penalty for willful homicide (Ge 9:6; Ex 21:12; Nu 35:16; Dt 19:12), the worshiping of other gods (Dt 17:2–7), and other acts of disobedience to the Lord (Dt 22:22; Jos 8:24–26; et al.). The Ten Commandments do not allow pandering the criminal who takes the life of a fellow human. Yet the person who accidentally kills another is protected (4:41–42). So the covenant-treaty restricts the passions that lead to murder but requires proper punishment of criminal homicides.

18 The starkly simple sentence "You shall not commit adultery" carries an immense load of social and spiritual implications and provides the basis for the later development of these implications. The marriage relationship continues throughout the OT as a figure of the covenant relationship between the Lord and his people (cf. Jer 3:8–9; Eze 16:15–63; Hosea). Apostasy is spiritual marital infidelity (figuratively), and total commitment must be Israel's relationship to the Lord; human marriage under the covenant must be marked by the same faithful commitment (cf. Lev 20). Jesus declared that lustful thoughts also constitute adultery (Mt 5:27–28).

19 Throughout Scripture thievery is condemned. The right to personal property is basic to the whole Mosaic economy. The indictment of the eighth commandment extends to both kidnapping (stealing a person) and the theft of goods. The protection granted by the eighth commandment is still essential to a free society; the freedom from involuntary servitude and the right to hold property are protected by this law against theft. The commandment involves spiritual values also, which rest on the covenant relationship that the Lord proffers to his people.

20 Truth was an important matter in Israel. God is "the God of truth" (Isa 65:16; cf. Ps 119:142, 151), and he hates "a lying tongue" and "a false witness" (Pr. 6:17, 19). Judges were required by the Lord to make their decisions on the basis of truth (1:16–17). False testimony brought severe penalty (cf. 19:15–21). Both here and in Ex 20:16 this commandment is directed to bearing false witness against one's neighbor (i.e., another Israelite).

21 The last commandment goes beyond what people do; it probes into their minds and desires. The prohibition against coveting catches wrongdoing at its source. Coveting stems from the seat of one's soul, from one's intentions, from one's motivations, from one's "heart." The prohibition against coveting a neighbor's land would have no meaning if family rights in marriage ties, domestic tranquility, and property ownership did not exist. To ensure family rights after Canaan was allotted, the Lord forbade coveting not only a neighbor's wife, servants, animals, and whatever other goods he owned, but also his house and land, neither of which any of them had at that time.

c. Ratification of the covenant-treaty (5:22–33)

22 Moses' declaration that these commands alone were spoken to the Israelites directly by God makes them more emphatic. The rest of the stipulations were given to Moses, who in turn gave them to the Israelites. The Ten Commandments constitute the basic behavioral code of the people and of all succeeding generations as well. No other short list of commands begins to compare with the effect that these have had in world history. In spite of being constantly broken, they stand as the moral code par excellence.

23–28 Moses referred to a strange inconsistency of the leaders of Israel that necessitated his mediatorial ministry. They acknowledged that they had seen the Lord's glory and majesty and had heard his voice and yet remained alive. Nevertheless, they were afraid that continuous exposure would cause their death. No reason for this contradiction was offered, but they wanted Moses to be their intermediary. They asserted that they would do whatever God told Moses they should do. Moses reminded them that the Lord had accepted this arrangement, and Moses became the intermediary for the establishment of the covenantal stipulations. The people accepted that covenant (Ex 20:19; 24:3).

29–31 The best interests of his people are deep in the heart of God. He is a God of compassion, not vindictiveness. This glimpse into his heart is in harmony with the most compassionate depictions of Christ in the NT. The Israelites were directed to return to their tents. However, at the direction of God, Moses stayed to receive additional commands, decrees, and laws for the people to follow in the land.

32–33 Before once again stating and explaining the specific laws, Moses urged the people to do exactly what the Lord had commanded. The result of obedience would be long residence in the land of Canaan. Individual longevity may not be precluded from this promise for following the Lord, but the main reference was to the national welfare (cf. 6:2).

2. The greatest commandment: Love the Lord (6:1–25)

a. The intent of the covenant (6:1–3)

1–3 As the intermediary between the Lord and the people, Moses began to teach them what the Lord wanted them to do in the land across the Jordan. They and their descendants should "fear" (GK 3707) the Lord throughout their lifetimes. Standing in awe of God and holding him in utmost reverence and respect are essential to the understanding of "fearing God." The reason for Moses' teaching is elaborated by explaining why the people should hear and obey: to insure the nation's well-being and to increase in number and wealth. "A land flowing with milk and honey" describes a land of plenty, a land of fertility.

b. The greatest command: total commitment (6:4–5)

4–5 The ineloquent Moses (cf. Ex 4:10) was used of the Lord to give the world some of the most eloquent declarations in all the history of speech when he extolled the being and nature of the Lord and described the relationship that his people should have with him. Various interpretations have been given to the shema (lit., "Hear"; GK 9048). Does the text teach monotheism? or monolatry for Israel? Or does it teach only a uniqueness in the Lord as over against various Baals and gods of other peoples? Some of the Israelites believed in the reality of other deities, but this declaration of the nature of the Lord does not admit of the real existence of other gods. The Lord is the only deity.

While the primary assertion is that there is only one true God, it is also asserted that this true God is Israel's God. Thus, the Israelites should acknowledge no other god. The Lord cannot be known or acknowledged in many forms like the Canaanite Baals. There is only one Lord, and he alone is God, and they have entered into a covenant-treaty with him.

The exhortation to love "with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength" indicates the totality of one's commitment in the purest and noblest intentions of trust and obedience toward God. The words taken together mean that the people are to love God with their whole selves.

Jesus taught that Dt 6:4–5 constituted the first, the greatest, and the most important commandment, and that by obeying it one would live (Mt 22:37–38; Mk 12:29–30; Lk 10:27).

c. Propagation of the command (6:6–9)

6–9 The people were not to concern themselves only with their own attitudes toward the Lord but were to impress them on their children as well. They were to talk about God's commands always, whether at home or on the road. Since in Ex 13:9–16 the consecration of the firstborn is said to be "like a sign on your hand and a reminder on your forehead that the law of the LORD is to be on your lips" (v.9), it would seem that here also the tying of these words as symbols on their hands and binding them on their foreheads and writing them on their doorframes and gateposts should be taken metaphorically or spiritually rather than physically. The symbols drew attention to the injunctions in vv.5–7.

d. Ways to preserve the command (6:10–25)

10–12 Again Moses gave a warning in the context of history. The land that was to be Israel's had been promised years before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This promise was to be fulfilled in Israel's experience. It involved much wealth: barns, houses, wells (cisterns), vineyards, and olive groves that they had not built, provided, dug, or planted. When they would eat and be satisfied, they might "forget" (GK 8894) the Lord who brought them out of Egypt, the land of slavery. The warning was wise, for the people later did exactly what Moses warned against.

13–19 The warnings continue, focused on the necessity of recognizing and obeying their God because of who he is and what he would do if they did not acknowledge and obey him. The people must adhere to him so that it may "go well" with them and so that they may thrust their enemies from the "good land." If they do not devote themselves to him ("fear" him), worship and work for him only ("serve" him), and speak of him in their daily relationships to one another ("take your oaths in his name") but instead follow other gods, his "jealous" (GK 7862) anger will destroy them as a nation. Many find the jealousy ascribed to God very difficult to understand because jealousy can be such a vicious sin in human beings, producing much grief and animosity. But one must recognize that the provocations that give rise to the Lord's anger are most severe. Biblical history shows that such provocations frustrate the love of God until his patience with idolatry ceases to be a virtue. Only then does his jealousy call for redress (cf. 32:16–26).

20–25 The answer to a son's query, "What is the meaning of the stipulations?" is a historical recounting of the Exodus, the making of the covenant-treaty, and the giving of the legislation for the nation, together with the Lord's commands to obey and reverence him. The Lord had been active on their behalf in freeing them from Egypt and from the control of Pharaoh by his mighty hand, by miracles that taught lessons, and by wonderful acts that were great and terrible—an appropriate description of the plagues. God had brought them out of Egypt in order to bring them into Canaan, the country that he had promised to their forefathers. Obedience was necessary for their prosperity and continuance as a people in that land. Obedience to all the Lord's legislation would constitute their "righteousness" (GK 7407; see 24:13). These items must be impressed on each succeeding generation.

3. Problems of achieving the covenant of love in the land (7:1–26)

a. Relations with the people of the land and with the Lord (7:1–10)

1–2 The Hittites mentioned here were remnants of the great Hittite Empire that began about 1800 B.C. and continued to 1200 B.C. Smaller Hittite states existed prior to this and after. The Girgashites were an otherwise unknown group; they are mentioned in Ugaritic literature. The Amorites were situated west of the Jordan near the Canaanites who were on the southwest coast on the Mediterranean (Jos 5:1). Canaanites lived farther north also (Jos 11:3; 13:4).

Apparently the Perizzites lived in the southern area allotted to Judah and Simeon (Jdg 1:4–5). However, they also appear to be in the area of Ephraim in the center of the country (Jos 17:15). At this time the Hivites were found in Gibeon (Jos 9:7; 11:19; cf. 2Sa 24:7). The Jebusites lived in Jerusalem and its surroundings (Jos 18:28; Jdg 1:21).

Israel would win the land from its inhabitants by driving them out and destroying the ones remaining (cf. 7:1, 22). The Lord would drive out the Canaanites and "deliver them over to" Israel (vv.2, 16, 23); but the Israelites would be the instrument used to accomplish this destruction—though the Lord might use other persuaders also, such as the hornet (v.20). The inhabitants who were not driven out of the country were to be destroyed. No treaty was to be made with them, no mercy shown to them. The covenant-treaty of the Lord with Israel excludes other treaties.

3–5 The young Canaanite men were not to be given Israelite daughters as wives, and young Canaanite women were not to be taken by Israelite men as wives. This would lead to forsaking the Lord and to worshiping other gods. Only by total commitment to the Lord and to the covenant-treaty could the unique status of Israel be preserved. The prohibition of intermarriage was not absolute. The regulation for the marriage of an Israelite man to a foreign woman taken as a prize of war is given in 21:10–14 (but cf. Ezr 9–10; Ne 13:23–27). "Destroy them totally" and "show them no mercy" (v.2) are explicated more fully by "break down their altars, smash their sacred stones, cut down their Asherah poles and burn their idols in the fire."

6–10 The Israelites were the Lord's "treasured possession" (GK 6035; a people of great value owned completely by him). Moses, concerned that Israel keep the right perspective in her relationship with the Lord, pointed out that the large number of people in the Israelite community was not the reason for the Lord's choice of them as his people. They were few in number (in contrast to the large Near Eastern empires, or even in comparison with the seven nations they were to displace; cf. 4:38; 9:1; 11:23)—or perhaps the reference is to their small beginnings. Elsewhere Israel is said to be "as many as the stars in the sky" (1:10; 10:22) and "a great nation" (4:6; 26:5)—doubtless in fulfillment of the promise to Abraham.

Because he loved them and kept the promise of his covenant, the Lord brought the Israelites out of Egypt. It is the character of God rather than any excellence in the people that accounts for the choice. This is more evident by the reiterated assertion that the Lord their God was God, was faithful and true in himself and true to his covenant-treaty, and would be true in his covenant love toward his people into the distant future—"to a thousand generations of those who love him and keep his commands." But those who hate him, who do not love and obey him, he will repay with destruction "to their face." Both the singular suffix on "face" and the figurative use of "face" (GK 7156) suggest the meaning "to each one personally."

b. Blessing of the conquest (7:11–26)

11–16 If the Israelites followed the Lord's stipulations, he would keep his "covenant of love" with them (cf. vv.13–15). He would love and bless them with many children and with productivity in crops and animal husbandry. These blessings were of things close to the soil and natural productivity. Good health too would come to the obedient Israelites. Those terrible diseases they knew in Egypt would not come on them (Ex 15:26; 23:25) but would be inflicted on their enemies. To secure these advantages, the Israelites were to destroy without pity the Canaanites and their gods (cf. Ex 23:33; Jdg 2:3; Ps 106:36; cf. also Ex 34:12; Jos 23:13).

17–26 The Israelites were not to be intimidated by thinking that the nations of Canaan were stronger than they, making it impossible for them to drive out the Canaanites. They were to "remember" (GK 2349) what the Lord had done to Pharaoh and all Egypt. With their own eyes they had seen how the Lord had brought them out (cf. 4:34). He would do to the Canaanites what he had done to other enemies. He would also send the "hornet" among them so that even those who survived the onslaught and hid themselves would die (this likely refers to a sense of fear, panic, or discouragement that the Lord would inflict on the Canaanites; cf. 11:25). Moses reminded the people that the great and awesome Lord was among them; so they should not be terrified by the Canaanites. However, their driving out the Canaanites would be little by little because of the wild animals (cf. Ex 23:30–31).

Though the conquest was not to be immediate over the whole land, the Lord, nevertheless, would deliver the Canaanites into Israel's hand. They would wipe out their kings' names from under heaven, i.e., remove them from the earth. The destruction of the Canaanite idols was to be complete. Even their silver and gold were detestable to the Lord. "Utterly abhor and detest it" indicates the abhorrence the people were to hold toward the idols.

4. Exhortation not to forget the Lord (8:1–20)

a. The discipline of the desert and the coming Promised Land (8:1–9)

1–5 Moses first focused on the necessity of following every command of the Lord so that Israel would be able to enter and possess the Land of Promise. They were to remember the discipline of the forty years of the Lord's leading in the desert, in order to teach them that "man does not live on bread alone but on every word that comes from the mouth of the LORD" and that "as a man disciplines his son, so the LORD . . . disciplines" them. He had made them hungry, then fed them with manna (see Ex 16). Under his providence during those forty years, their clothes did not wear out and their feet did not swell, in spite of the desert.

6–9 The Israelites were urged to walk in the ways of the Lord and to revere him, not only as in the past days of hunger and thirst, but also when the affluence of Canaanite productivity became theirs. The country he was leading them into had great natural benefits. This contrasted both with Egypt proper and with Sinai. This good land would sustain them; they would lack nothing. The iron was probably that in southern Lebanon, in the mountains of Transjordan, and, perhaps, in the Arabah south of the Dead Sea.

b. Remembrance of the Lord who led them from Egypt to Canaan (8:10–20) 10–18 When the Israelites had eaten and were satisfied, after they were settled in the land, they were to praise the Lord for his goodness. In their prosperity they were not to forget him. They had lived through the hard life of that desert by God's providence, but the future prosperity in a better land might lead them astray. In that desert experience the Lord had brought water out of the hard rock (cf. Ex 17:1–7; Nu 20:2–13); in Canaan they would find streams and pools. In that desert the Lord gave them manna. In Canaan bread would not be scarce. In their prosperity they might claim that their hands produced their wealth, not remembering that the Lord their God gave them the ability to produce wealth in confirmation of his covenant.

19–20 Once more Moses warned that forgetting and disobeying the Lord and turning to follow other gods to worship and bow down before them would mean the destruction of Israel as surely as those who followed other gods were destroyed by the Israelites.

5. Warning based on former infidelity (9:1–10:11)

a. The coming defeat of the Anakites (9:1–6)

1–6 Moses recognized the difficulties that the people would face in the country they were about to possess. The current inhabitants were greater and stronger than the Israelites (4:38), with large cities with walls up to the sky (cf. 1:28). But Moses had an adequate answer to the proverbial Anakite strength: The Lord would go across ahead of them (cf. Ex 13:21; Dt 1:30, 33, et al.). Almost in the same breath, Moses said that Israel would drive out the inhabitants and that the Lord would drive them out, indicative again that Israel's abilities were from the Lord. At best they were the Lord's instruments.

One of the most important things for the people to remember was that not Israelite righteousness but Canaanite wickedness was causing this Canaanite dispossession (Lev 18:1–30). As a matter of fact, Israel was an intractable people and, consequently, not deserving of the good land. They were receiving it by God's grace.

b. The golden calf provocation (9:7–21)

7–14 Moses sought to impress strongly on the people that they must not provoke the Lord by disobedience as they began the conquest of Canaan. Continuing his warnings, Moses reminded Israel of their behavior from the time they left Egypt till they arrived at Jordan. He exhorted them to remember how they had rebelled against the Lord, provoking his anger and arousing his wrath. He had been angry enough to slay them at Horeb. Moses had gone up on the mountain to receive the Ten Commandments (Ex 19–20; 31:18). After forty days, the Lord told Moses to go back down to the people who had become corrupt with idolatry. God told Moses that the people were stiff-necked (cf. v.6) and asked Moses not to interfere with his intention to destroy them, offering to make Moses into an even stronger and more numerous nation.

15–17 Moses proceeded to tell how he went down from the fiery mountain, carrying the two stone tablets in his hands, or perhaps one in each hand. When he saw that the people had sinned against the Lord by making an idol, Moses threw down the two tablets, breaking them before the people's eyes. The nature of their sin is indicated not only by the indictment of making the calf-idol but also by their turning away quickly from the Lord's commands. The first two commands on the tablets that were physically broken by Moses had already been broken by the people.

The stone basin on the left was used for crushing olives in the process of producing olive oil. The two pictures on the right show the pomegranate flower and fruit. The Israelites were promised these and many other earthly blessings as part of their inheritance in Canaan (Dt 8:8).

18–21 Moses spoke of the second period of forty days and nights and also referred to two prayers on their behalf. Those two prayers are telescoped, a reference to the destruction of the calf-idol being at the end of the narrative. Moses said he feared the anger and wrath of the Lord because he was angry enough to destroy the Israelites (cf. v.8). But Moses' intercession was successful both for the people and for Aaron. Moses destroyed the calf by heating it, grinding it to fine dust, and throwing the dust into a mountain stream. "That sinful thing of yours, the calf you had made" contrasts with the Lord himself as the Almighty Creator. Exodus 32:20 adds that Moses threw the dust into the stream and "made the Israelites drink" from the stream—surely an ignominious exercise!

c. Israel's rebellion and Moses' prayer (9:22–29)

22–24 Repeatedly the people had showed themselves rebellious and stiff-necked, and thus they angered the Lord. So Moses made the overall indictment: "You have been rebellious against the LORD ever since I have known you." The source of this rebellion was their lack of trust in the Lord and, consequently, their disobedience to him.

25–29 Again Moses mentioned how he had interceded successfully for Israel (cf. Nu 14:13–19). From a most humble position, Moses addressed God as "Sovereign LORD" and prayed eloquently, reminding God that these were his people, his own "inheritance" (GK 5709), and that he had redeemed them from Egypt by his great power and mighty hand. He called on the Lord to remember Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—doubtless a reference to the covenantal promises. If God's people were destroyed, the Egyptians would indict him for his inability to bring Israel into the land and for his trickery of leading them into the desert to slaughter them (because he hated them). Moses did not at all deny the people's guilt but pled with the Lord to overlook their stubbornness, wickedness, and sin.

When he spoke to Moses about the people's sin while he was on Horeb the first time, God called the Israelites "your people whom you brought out of Egypt" (v.12); but when Moses prayed, he said that they were "your people, your (own) inheritance." Why this change of identification? God was probably trying to evoke Moses' concern for his people by identifying them as Moses' people whom Moses had brought from Egypt. Moses did show his concern by his great intercessory prayer in which he insisted that the people belonged to the Lord, and this brought the desired result.

d. New tablets (10:1–11)

1–5 Moses next rehearsed the second experience regarding the two stone tablets of the covenant (Ex 34:1–4). "At that time" refers to the period when Moses offered the prayer of 9:26–29. At the Lord's command he had chiseled out two stone tablets similar to the first ones. God said that he would write on them the words that had been on the first tablets. Moses was also to construct a wooden chest for the tablets. In deference to tradition NIV uses the term "ark" (GK 778) for this particular chest. Exodus 37:1–9 reveals that the ark was built by Bezalel after Moses' return, rather than that Moses made it himself before he went up the mount the second time, as could be implied here. It is not uncommon that a leader of a venture is said to do something when the actual physical accomplishment of it is done by someone else.

6–9 The "wells of the Jaakanites" is to be identified with Bene Jaakan, Moserah with Moseroth (Nu 33:31), and Gudgodah (v.7) with Hor Haggidgad (Nu 33:32). It appears that after leaving Kadesh, Israel went toward Edom and then later returned to Kadesh before starting on the last trip around Edom and up onto the plains of Moab. Consequently the order here is the reverse of that in Nu 33:31–33. Moserah was evidently a larger area that included Mount Hor. So it was correct to identify Aaron's place of death as either Mount Hor (Nu 20:22–29; 33:38–39; Dt 32:50) or Moserah (Dt 10:6). Moserah means "chastisement" and might be Moses' designation of the area, not a generally used name. None of the places mentioned has been located with certainty.

Verses 6–9 are a historical aside. Moses' mind moved along the course of events relating to the ark and then proceeded to the Israelites' journey beginning just before the death of Aaron and includes Aaron's death, the succession of Eleazer, the ministry of the Levites relative to the ark, as well as their broader ministries and their special situation regarding landed inheritance (GK 5709; cf. 9:29). The Lord himself in a special way—not land—was to be their inheritance.

10–11 The climax of this recital is Moses' declaration that the Lord listened to his plea on the Israelites' behalf. It was not the Lord's will to destroy them. The grace of God—not because they were numerous or righteous—kept them from destruction (cf. 7:7–9), and by his grace Moses' orders were renewed to "lead the people on their way" to occupy the Promised Land.

6. Exhortation to revere and love the Lord (10:12–11:32)

a. The requirement of allegiance (10:12–22)

12–13 In answer to the question "What does the LORD your God ask of you?" five familiar phrases are piled one on the other. The people are urged to (1) "fear the LORD [their] God"; (2) "walk in all his ways"; (3) "love him"; (4) "serve" him; and (5) "observe [his] commands and decrees." More or less synonymous with "observe" are the words and phrases "keep," "obey," "fix in your hearts and minds," and "teach his commands, requirements, laws, and decrees." All this was for their own good.

14–16 Although God, to whom the Israelites were to give their fealty, owns the farthest reaches of the "heavens, the earth and everything in it," yet he set his affection and love on their forefathers and "chose" (GK 1047) these, their descendants, above all other nations. Because of this gratuitous position they had in relation to the true God, the Israelites were urged to circumcise their hearts and cease being stiff-necked (cf. 30:6; Jer 4:4). The circumcision of the heart—i.e., being open, responsive, and obedient to the Lord—contrasts with being "stiff-necked" (GK 6902 & 7997)—i.e., being stubborn and rebellious.

17–22 The majestic sovereignty of the Lord is portrayed by the names ascribed to him as well as by the characteristics and acts attributed to him. "God of gods" and "Lord of lords" are Hebrew superlatives. The designations do not suggest that there are in reality other divine gods or lords over whom God rules. Rather, as God and Lord he is supreme over all. As the great, mighty, and awesome One, the Lord performed the "great and awesome wonders" that the people had seen with their own eyes. The majesty of the Lord extends to righteous behavior, showing no partiality, accepting no bribes. He defends the fatherless and the widows and loves the aliens, giving them food and clothing. The people were to be like the Lord; they too were to love aliens, for they had been aliens in Egypt.

Not only were the people to reverence and worship the Lord, they were also to hold fast to him and make oaths only in his name. Moreover, the Lord was to be the object of their praise because he had brought up out of Egypt the descendants of the seventy (Ge 46:27; Ex 1:5), who, while there, had become "as numerous as the stars in the sky." In contrast to the few who went down into Egypt with Jacob, this generation had become numerous indeed.

b. Love and obedience toward the Lord (11:1–25)

1–7 The exhortations to love, remember, observe, worship (serve), obey, teach, and walk in the Lord's ways are all here. The dominant personnel in the nation were those who had seen what the Lord had done for them in Egypt and in the desert. They were not of the generation doomed to die in the desert for their disobedience at Kadesh Barnea (1:35–36) but those who ranged from infancy to the age of twenty (Nu 14:29–30).

Moses focused his attention on those who were the leaders, repeating the exhortation formula: "Love the LORD . . . and keep his requirements." Then, in a semi-negative way, he built up the responsibility of those who were under twenty years of age at Kadesh Barnea (1:35–36). They themselves had had the experiences in the Exodus and the desert and that should have taught them to love the Lord and to keep his requirements. Though Korah was a leader of the rebellion described in Nu 16:1–35, he is not mentioned with Dathan and Abiram here. Perhaps Korah is not named because his sons were not destroyed (Nu 26:9–11).

8–15 In order to be able to conquer the land and to live long in it as a nation, the people were to observe the Lord's commands. The description of the land has a new element. Not only was it "flowing with milk and honey"; it was a land that drank "rain from heaven." It was not like Egypt, where the planted seed was irrigated by foot because water had to be brought from the Nile. Possibly an Egyptian would use his feet to clear a channel for the flow of water to where he wanted it in his garden. In Egypt water for growing grains, vegetables, and fruits depended on the people's labors. In Canaan the water came in its season from the heavens by the providence of God; and if the people faithfully obeyed him, he would send the rain.

16–21 However, if the Israelites were enticed to turn away from the Lord and to worship other gods, he would shut the heavens so that it would not rain. Baal (Hadad) did not control the rains that brought fertility to Canaan; rather, it was the Lord who governed the incidence of rainfall. If the people did not worship and obey him, he would shut the heavens (28:23–24; Lev 26:19–20; cf. Mal 3:10).

22–25 The land that the people would acquire by obedience to the Lord under the covenant was limited in two ways: by "every place where you set your foot" and by geographic boundaries. The Lord confirmed this promise to Joshua (Jos 1:3). He also had made a particular promise of this sort to Caleb (1:36), a promise that was fulfilled in Jos 14:9–13. The geographical boundaries are generalized, in harmony with other such promises and prophecies (1:7; Ge 15:18).

c. Directives for the blessing and curse recital (11:26–32)

26–32 The most important addition to the highly repetitive directives of ch. 11 is that of the blessing and curse recital to be proclaimed from Mounts Gerizim and Ebal. The blessing was to be theirs for obedience and the curse for disobedience (cf. 27:9–28:68). The basic element is adherence to the Lord as God, and the basic error is following other gods. No doubt Gerizim and Ebal were chosen because of their centrality and natural adaptability for such an event. They are close to each other and are both about 3,000 feet above sea level. "West of the road" refers to the main north-south road, and "near the great trees of Moreh" indicates a location a little south of the center of the valley between the two mountains.

C. Specific Stipulations of the Covenant-Treaty (12:1–26:19)

1. For worship and ceremony (12:1–16:17)

a. At the place of the Lord's choosing (12:1–32)

1–14 Chapter 12 presents some crucial elements for the Israelites' national and individual spiritual lives. (1) The people were to worship the Lord their God in the place he chose to put his Name, the place he identified himself with and where his presence would be manifested (contrast vv.2, 5, 11, 13–14, 26, et al.). (2) The people were not to worship the gods of the Canaanites but were to destroy them, their articles, and their places of worship. (3) Israel was not to worship the Lord in the way or with the means that the inhabitants of Canaan worshiped their gods. (4) Israel's burnt offerings, sacrifices, tithes, special gifts, vows, freewill offerings, and the firstborn of their flocks and herds were all to be brought to the place in the Promised Land where the Lord chose to put his Name.

"The resting place" (v.8; GK 4957) as a description of the land begins with Jacob's blessing when he called the allotment of Issachar "his resting place" (Ge 49:15). Psalm 95:11 becomes the source for vital NT teaching; the psalmist says that the Lord had declared of the people who disobeyed him in the desert, "They shall never enter my rest." According to the author of Hebrews, those who disbelieved, disobeyed, and rebelled did not enter his rest (ch. 3). To fulfill the promise of God, a rest was still to be provided. That rest was for the soul in Jesus as Savior from sin (Heb 4:3). Jesus is the "the resting place" for the believer.

15–28 While sacrificial offerings were to be brought to the central sanctuary, the butchering and eating of meat for regular sustenance could be engaged in anywhere. The only restriction on eating nonsacrificial meat (except for the rules relative to unclean foods) was the prohibition on eating blood (cf. Lev 3:17; 7:26–27; 19:26; and esp. 17:10–14). The blood was to be poured out on the ground like water. The nonsacrificial meat may be eaten by anyone—unclean or not.

The freedom enunciated in v.15 and repeated in vv.20–22 is conditioned by the prohibitions of vv.17–19. The life of the creature is its blood; so the spilling of the lifeblood is the giving of its life as the atoning sacrifice. This central characteristic of the sacrificial system in the OT becomes all important in the NT, where the typical aspects of the OT sacrifices are fulfilled in Christ by the shedding of his blood on the cross as atonement for sin (Ac 20:28; Ro 3:25; Eph 1:7; Heb 9:11–28; et al.)

Tithes, vows, and certain offerings were to be eaten only in the place the Lord chose. Notice that "you, your sons and daughters, your menservants and maidservants, and the Levites" fall under the prohibition.

29–32 The Israelites were to resist the influences of the Canaanite culture and were not to conform to Canaanite religious practices. Death was the penalty for anyone who sacrificed a child by passing him through the fire (Lev 18:21; 20:2–5). This section on the place of worship ends with Moses' warning neither to add to nor to subtract from all that he had said (cf. 4:2; Pr 30:6; Rev 22:18–19).

b. Worship of other gods forbidden (13:1–18)

1–5 In order to hinder and thwart rebellion against the Lord and adherence to the deities of the country that they were soon to enter, Moses gave the Israelites directions on how to deal with insurrectionists from the Lord's authority. Dreams were used in prophecy both legitimately (Nu 12:6) and illegitimately (Jer 23:25). Moses said that illegitimate prophets were used by the Lord to test the people's love for him. They were not to be followed (cf. v.4) but were to be put to death so that the evil would be purged from among the people. This test of the prophet overrides all others. The sine qua non of life is total love, commitment, and allegiance to the Lord. Elsewhere the fulfillment of prophecy establishes a prophet as a prophet. In such a case, however, the one who claims to be a prophet does so in the name of the Lord (18:19–22; Jer 28:9).

6–11 Not only rebellious prophets, but one's closest relatives or friends who said, "Let us go and worship other gods," were to be put to death, whether the enticement had been made secretly or openly. Moses spoke of the gods of the people who would be around the Israelites as "gods you have not known" or as "gods that neither you nor your fathers have known." Neither the Israelites nor their fathers had ever acknowledged them as gods. They were not to yield to, listen to, show pity to, spare, or shield an enticer. Not only was the defector to be stoned to death, but the first stone was to be thrown by the near relative or friend that the defector had attempted to drive from the Lord. This extreme punishment was expected to produce good results. Clearly punishment—especially capital punishment—is a deterrent to crime.

12–18 Towns that defected to other gods were to be punished also. Allegations were to be investigated thoroughly and proven before a town was destroyed. Inhabitants, livestock, and all plunder were to be a whole burnt offering to the Lord, and the town was never to be rebuilt. This doom indicates how serious the Lord considered any defection from him. In other circumstances some alleviation of these rigorous rules for destruction was allowed, but under these circumstances no "condemned things" could be salvaged. If Israel kept the Lord's commands and did what was right in his eyes, he would have compassion on them.

c. Clean and unclean foods (14:1–21)

1–2 Earlier, Moses had referred to the Lord as Israel's father and to Israel as his son (1:31; 8:5). He had also said that they were holy to the Lord and were his treasured possession (4:20; 7:6). Now, on the basis of this relationship, they were commanded not to follow the ways of mourning for the dead that the nations of Canaan practiced (Lev 19:27–28; 1Ki 18:28).

3–21 Because the Israelites were the Lord's children, they were not to eat any "detestable thing" (GK 9359; cf. Lev 11). As the chosen people of God and as his holy possession, they were to follow God's injunctions to distinguish themselves from the surrounding peoples, because the pagan Canaanite culture was inimical to the holiness of the Lord and to the holiness required of his people. The reason for these injunctions about foods is basically spiritual, though there may be psychological and sanitary considerations as well. Some unclean animals had associations with Canaanite religions. Eating anything dead probably relates to the prohibition of eating blood. The meat would not be worth selling to a foreigner or giving to an alien if it were not edible.

In Lev 17:13–16 both Israelite and alien were not to eat meat with blood in it; yet here an Israelite was allowed to give such meat to an alien, and he could eat it. In Deuteronomy Moses prepared the people for the situation in Canaan, where they would be in a head-on clash with pagan culture in which the alien would not yet be integrated into Israelite culture. In Leviticus the alien comes within the culture of Israel and has the benefits of adhering to that culture.

The prohibition against cooking a young goat in its mother's milk is apparently in reaction to an ancient Canaanite and Syrian custom dated as early as the fifteenth century B.C.

d. Tithes (14:22–29)

22–29 The "tithe" (GK 5130) is to be taken to the place the Lord shall choose as a dwelling for his Name, and there it is to be eaten joyfully in the presence of the Lord. Moses had already mentioned in 12:6 the tithes along with the other things that the people were to bring to the chosen sanctuary, where they should eat and rejoice. Surely the people in a few days would not consume a tenth of their total annual production! Having already given directions for the support of the Levites by the tithes (Nu 18:21–28), Moses here spoke of the festal communal meals that the people were to enjoy when the tithes were brought to the tabernacle.

Every three years these tithes were to be brought to local city centers where they were stored for the use of the Levites, the aliens, and the poor. This care for nonlanded people would lead to God's blessing on the work of their hands. This garnering of tithes was to come during the third year and the sixth year. After the sixth year, the sabbatical year was observed as a year when the fields lay fallow, after which the cycle commenced again.

The logistics of transporting the tithes would be difficult—perhaps impossible—for families living at a distance from the tabernacle. Thus the people could turn the tithe into cash and then, at the place the Lord would choose, convert it into food and drink desired for the celebration of God's blessing.

e. The year of canceling debts (15:1–11)

1–4 Israel was to have a very special internal relationship of brotherhood in its citizenry. If followed, there would be no poor or needy person among them because of the Lord's blessing (vv.4–6, 10). The cancellation of debt itself would go a long way toward producing that blessing, and it would result in limiting the centralization of monetary assets in the hands of the more well-to-do. No evidence exists that the Mosaic economy in its details was ever fully implemented with its sabbatical years and years of Jubilee.

The assertion that "there should be no poor" among them at first glance may seem to conflict with v.7 and especially v.11. But apparently Moses proclaimed and urged the ideal while being doubtful that the ideal would be fully realized (cf. the same thing in 1Jn 2:1).

5–6 Israel would realize the ideal situation only if the people would fully obey the Lord. Obedience would not only bring rich blessings so that no poor would be among them, but they would also have monetary superiority over the nations around them.

7–11 Moses moved into the subjective bases for the Israelites' behavior—their thoughts and emotions—when he said that they should not be hardhearted, but should freely lend a brother whatever he needs. They must exercise care not to harbor a base thought that would limit generosity, such as "the year for canceling debts is near." They must give generously without a grudging heart. A warning is appended: the brother can appeal to the Lord, and the grudging-hearted will be found guilty of sin. The indictment "You will be found guilty of sin" may be one made directly by the Lord to the conscience or a formal one made by a priest (23:21–22; 24:15; cf. Lev 20:20; Nu 9:13; 18:22).

f. Freeing servants (15:12–18)

12–18 Those in servitude should go free after no more than six years of bondage (cf. Ex 21:2–6). But one's liberality should go beyond manumission, for those freed should be given liberal supplies from their former owner's flock, threshing floor, and winepress. If a servant did not want to be set free, the master was to push an awl through the lobe of his ear and into the door or doorpost, thereby marking him for a life of servitude (cf. Ex 21:6). Two reasons for this choice of life servitude are love for the master and the well-being of the servant under the master. In Ex 21:5 love for one's wife and children acquired during servitude constitutes an additional reason. The servant who does not want to leave his wife and children, as the law required, chooses life servitude instead.

Anticipating possible reaction to the largess required of the master, the Israelites were to realize that the indentured servant during his six years of servitude has been worth twice as much as a hired hand. Perhaps what is meant is that through the years the servant's labor was equivalent to that of a hired hand, yet he had not received the daily wage of a hired hand. Thus the servant was worth double because the owner not only had the service of the servant, but also did not have to pay out anything for that service.

g. Firstborn animals (15:19–23)

19–23 In addition to earlier directives on the firstborn (cf. 12:6–7, 17; 14:23–26), here it is said that the firstborn of herds should not be worked and the firstborn of sheep not sheared. They belong to the Lord and are not for private gain.

All the people were to eat and rejoice together at the annual festivals. The regulations of Deuteronomy are, generally, given to all the people, including the priests. The logistics of consuming all the specified parts of all the firstborn of herds and flocks annually might well demand the participation of the whole populace. Animals with serious defects were not to be sacrificed but were to be eaten as common food by the people, ceremonially clean or unclean, being careful to properly dispose of the blood. These regulations emphasize anew that God's people were to follow a holy way of living.

h. Passover (16:1–8)

1–4 In Deuteronomy the whole Passover (GK 7175) Festival is in mind (cf. Ex 23:14–19; Lev 23; Nu 28:16–29:38), including the Feast of Unleavened Bread, and so the sacrificing of the Passover animal (or animals) includes animals from the herd as well as from the flock for the main Passover meal. Moreover, when they were settled in the land, the Passover was to be held in the place the Lord would "choose as a dwelling for his Name." The historical occasion for the Passover would have an added significance—that of the agricultural year.

Yeast suggests decay and was unsuited for the symbolism of the Passover. Thus here bread without yeast, the bread of affliction (cf. Ex 3:7), was to be eaten because the Israelites had left Egypt in apprehensive haste. The statement "so that . . . you may remember the time of your departure from Egypt" makes it clear that the date of the Passover Feast rests on a historical basis rather than on the agricultural year. "On the evening of the first day" would be the beginning of the fifteenth of Nisan (March/April) (Lev 23:6).

5–8 After eating the Passover, the people were to return to their temporary residences where they were staying during their visit to the place the Lord would choose. The Passover meal was complete in itself; none of the meat sacrificed in the evening was to remain until the morning. The Passover-Unleavened Bread Festival ended with a special closing assembly.

In the NT the last Passover that Jesus ate with his disciples became the Lord's Supper (Mt 26:17–29; Mk 14:12–25; Lk 22:7–22), and Christ's death on the cross became the Passover sacrifice to take away sin (1Co 5:7–8; cf. Jn 1:29).

i. Feast of Weeks (16:9–12)

9–12 This feast was to begin seven weeks from the time the sickle was put to the standing grain. According to Lev 23:15, the count was to be made from "the day after the Sabbath, the day you brought the sheaf of the wave offering," i.e., on the second day of the Passover Festival. The phrase "fifty days" in Lev 23:16 in the LXX led to the designation of the Feast of Weeks as Pentecost. In the NT the Feast of Weeks becomes significant as the time of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in fulfillment of the prophecy of Joel 2:28–32 and the beginning of the NT church. The Feast of Weeks was a harvest celebration, and the freewill offering made at that time was to be commensurate with the blessing the Lord had given the people (cf. vv.16–17).

j. Feast of Tabernacles (16:13–17)

13–17 The Feast of Tabernacles or Booths was celebrated for seven days after the processing of the grain at the threshing floor and the grapes in the winepress. In Ex 23:16 and 34:22, it is called the Feast of Ingathering; and the time of the feast is more explicitly given in Lev 23:34, 36, 39, and Nu 29:12 as extending from the fifteenth to the twenty-first of the seventh month, which is Tishri (Sept./Oct.). It was followed by an additional day with a closing assembly. This seven-day feast was to be a joyful occasion for everybody, because of God's blessing on the work of their hands.

A summary and reiteration of the command that all Israelite men were to appear before the Lord for these three festivals annually concludes this review. One was not to attend the festivals empty-handed but was to bring a contribution proportionate to the Lord's blessing on his labor.

2. National concerns (16:18–19:21)

a. Judges (16:18–20)

18–20 This section really belongs with ch. 17. Contemplating the new settlement in Canaan, Moses instructed the people to appoint "judges" (GK 9149) and other "officials" (GK 8853) in the towns the Lord would give them. The judges were civil magistrates, and the officials were subordinate leaders who implemented the decisions of the judges. The judges were to "judge the people fairly"; and the people were admonished to follow justice alone, so that they would be able to continue living as a nation in possession of the land. The judges were not to pervert justice or show partiality. Bribes blind the wise and twist the words of the righteous. The Lord demands pure justice.

b. Asherah poles, sacred stones, and flawed animals (16:21–17:1)

16:21–17:1 Moses once more warned of the idolatry Israel would find in Canaan. The worship of the Lord must not be with the paraphernalia of the gods of Canaan. An important element in proper worship was the quality of the offerings brought to the Lord; the firstborn offered had to be without "serious flaw" (15:21) and "without defect" (Lev 1:3 et al.); i.e., it had to be perfect. This rule is here applied to the sacrifice of any ox or sheep.

c. Procedures for punishment of covenant violators (17:2–13)

2–3 Deviations from the worship of the Lord are called "doing evil in the eyes of the LORD," a "violation of his covenant," and "contrary to my command." Israel was not to worship the sun, moon, and stars of the sky either as physical entities or as representations of pagan deities. The sun, moon, and stars along with other physical elements show the glory of the Lord but are by no means idolatrous representations of him (Pss 8:3; 19:1; Ro 1:18–21; et al.).

4–13 Any alleged deviation from the worship of the Lord is to be thoroughly investigated. If it proves true (as in 13:14) on testimony of two or three witnesses—one witness being insufficient—the guilty party must be stoned to death, the witnesses being the first to throw stones. The seriousness of this defection and the purpose of the punishment are seen in the declaration, "You must purge the evil from among you (Israel)."

"The place the LORD will choose" is to be the juridical as well as the spiritual, social, and political center of the nation (cf. 16:18–20). All cases too difficult for local court decision were to be taken to the priests and the current judge at that chosen center. Their decision was final and was to be followed in detail. Contempt of court was a capital offense. When these procedures are followed, "all the people will hear and be afraid." As in 13:11, capital punishment would be a deterrent to crime.

The local judges were not to decide in the cases that were appealed to the higher court; the higher court decision was then implemented by the local judges. The responsibility for the application of the law is on the whole populace. "The man who shows contempt" may be anyone in Israel—as is obvious from the idea that none of the people will be "contemptuous" when they learn of the one in contempt being put to death.

d. Appointment of and rules for a king (17:14–20)

14–15 The possible future institution of kingship does not rise out of the Lord's immediate plan for government but out of a supposition that the people will want a king because of the surrounding peoples (see 1Sa 8:4–9). In developing revelation, the Lord revealed his eternal plan of using kingship as the vehicle of central importance in messianic prophecy and fulfillment. Given the desire for a king, the people were to find the one the Lord would choose, who must be a brother Israelite.

16–17 Restrictions too were placed on the king (cf. vv.18–20). The accumulation of horses is linked to the prohibition that the people were not to return to Egypt. Having many horses signified either riches or military resources or both. Doubtless both indicated a reliance on one's own resources rather than on the Lord. A large harem also represented a likeness to the Oriental courts of other kingdoms, and having many wives envisaged the usual procedure of sealing treaties by marriage. Such wives would bring foreign cultures and idol worship into the palace and so lead the heart of the king astray. The accumulation of silver and gold would also tend toward reliance on riches rather than on the Lord (cf. 1Ki 10:1–13).

18–20 Following the procedures for vassal treaties, a copy of the covenant-treaty was deposited in the dwelling of the Lord. From this the king was to make a copy for himself and keep the copy with him, reading it regularly. This preoccupation with the "words of this law" had a threefold purpose—that the king may (1) learn to serve the Lord, (2) follow carefully all the words of the law, and (3) keep on the same level as his brothers before the law of the Lord. The result of this behavior would be a long reign.

e. Shares for priests and Levites (18:1–8)

1 A wide, sweeping presentation, telling of the support of the Levites, is added to the stipulations relative to judges and possible kings. The designations the "priests," the "Levites," and the "whole tribe of Levi" indicate that the priests and Levites were not always coextensive terms; the "priests" were those Levites who were the descendants of Aaron, and the "Levites" included all those who belonged to the tribe of Levi, whether or not they were descendants of Aaron (Nu 18:20, 23–24).

2 The Levites as a tribe were not to have a tribal allotment in Canaan, as the other tribes would have. The Lord was their inheritance, as far as material possessions were concerned. They would have certain cities and, under certain situations, could also have private holdings (see v.8; Nu 35; Jos 20–21). The Levites' daily sustenance came from the offerings made to the Lord and from the firstfruits. Particular portions of the offerings were to be given to the priests, i.e., the sons of Aaron (Lev 7:31–35).

3–5 The word for "sacrifice" (GK 2284 & 2285), which normally refers to sacrificing animals for religious feasts, here includes the meals of the festivals that are in addition to the fellowship offerings (cf. 12:15, 21). "The share due the priests" was the portion established by the Lord for them because of their office and service. Designations of the Levites as the priestly tribe sometimes refer to their tribal position as a whole and at other times to the sons of Aaron, a more limited group.

6–8 When a Levite from elsewhere in Israel desired to move to the place the Lord would choose in order to engage in priestly service, he could do so; and he was to have an equal share in the benefits of his position. The benefits accrue to any Levite even though he may have other assets from the sale of family possessions—whatever they may be.

f. Detestable practices of Canaan (18:9–13)

9–13 References to these "detestable ways" (GK 9359) are not uncommon, but the list in vv.10–11 is fuller than elsewhere. Precise identifications cannot always be clearly discerned by the terms used. Comparison with other such prohibitions shows that several of the words are sometimes generalizations and at other times more specific or discrete. Not only was adherence to the false gods of Canaan proscribed, but also the means by which the Canaanites attempted to communicate with them were to be abhorred totally and rejected completely.

g. The prophet like Moses (18:14–22)

14–19 Israelite reliance was to be wholly on the Lord, who would send them "a prophet" (GK 5566) like Moses. These prophets would be selected by the Lord from their own brothers, and the Lord would put his words in their mouths. Being the spokesman for God is the central characteristic of a prophet. The Lord would call to account anyone who did not listen to the words spoken in his name. In the NT, this promise of the "prophet like you from among their brothers" was seen as prophetic of Jesus Christ (cf. Jn 1:21; 6:14; 7:40; Ac 3:22–23).

20–22 The prophet who presumed to speak in the Lord's name (without authorization) or who spoke in the name of other gods was to be put to death. The latter broke the first commandment and merited capital punishment. But the former could be difficult to determine. The prescribed test was that if the prediction did not happen, the message was not from the Lord. This answer speaks of only one of the ways to determine the validity of a prophet and a prophecy; predictive proof alone cannot be used to distinguish a true prophet from a false one, because prediction that comes true when spoken in the name of another god is a capital offense (cf. ch. 13:1–5). Verse 14 clearly states that sorcery and divination were not permitted, which is the main way pagans get messages from their gods. Adherence to the Lord and his written word is the highest law; one should not be afraid of any false prophet or his predictions.

h. Cities of refuge (19:1–14)

1–4 Bezer, Ramoth, and Golan had already been established as cities of refuge for Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh east of the Jordan (4:41–43). Now Israel is commanded to set up three cities of refuge in Canaan proper when they occupy it. If Israel's control would extend over the whole Land of Promise, which according to the oath to their forefathers apparently extended from Egypt to the Euphrates (Ge 15:18), three more cities were to be chosen (vv.8–9), making nine in all. But the third set of cities of refuge was never appointed because the people never fully controlled the larger territory.

The cities were to be centrally located in three divisions of the country so that any slayer would have reasonably close sanctuary. Cities of refuge constituted a means to thwart a hasty application of blood revenge, which might result in the death of an innocent man—one who killed another unintentionally and without malice aforethought (cf. Ex 21:12–14; Nu 35:6–34; Jos 20–21).

5–13 The shedding of innocent blood in Israel would bring guilt on the nation (v.10). It would be wrong to allow the innocent to be killed and the guilty to go unpunished (v.13). The process of determining the innocence or guilt is not given here—other than that the elders of the town of the accused should send for the killer to be returned from the city of refuge to which he had fled. If guilty, he was to be handed over to the avenger of blood for execution. Acquittal or guilt would be determined on bases indicated elsewhere (cf. v.15; Nu 35:9–34). That deliberate capital offenses were to be punished by capital punishment rigorously applied is seen in the declaration "Show him no pity" (cf. v.21).

14 Moses looked ahead to the time when Israel would be settled in the land within the tribal and family boundaries and when these boundaries could be subject to dispute. The boundaries once allotted in the original division of the land were to be inviolate; the Lord had given the land to the people. Their descendants were never to disturb the boundary stones. The right to hold property was a cornerstone of Israel's inheritance from the Lord. It is still a primary right of free people on the earth.

i. Witnesses to a crime (19:15–21)

15 Jurisprudence must have rules of evidence, and in Israel witnesses were required to supply evidence or be punished (Lev 5:1). The rule for witnesses in capital offenses (17:7) is here applied to any crime or offense. Two or three witnesses are required (17:6; Nu 35:30; Mt 18:16; 2Co 13:1).

16–20 The designation of a false witness as "malicious" probably indicts one who uses harsh and injurious language. When one accuses another after this fashion, the two of them are to stand in the presence of the Lord before the incumbent priests and judges. "In the presence of the LORD" refers to the tribunal meeting in the place in the central sanctuary designated for this purpose (17:9). The investigation must be "thorough" (cf. 13:14; 17:4); and if the accuser is proved to be a liar, the punishment for the accused will be meted out to the accuser.

21 The "lex talionis" (cf. Ex 21:23–25; Lev 24:18–20) is given as the guide to punish offenders. Jesus seemingly negated this rule for his disciples in Mt 5:38–42 and substituted the turning of the other cheek. It must be remembered, however, that Deuteronomy is the law that the officials of the nation were to follow to protect the public, to punish offenders, and to deter crime. Jesus, on the other hand, spoke to individuals about reacting to violence against themselves personally.

3. Rules for warfare (20:1–20)

1–4 The Israelites were not to be frightened by the panoply of their enemies, because the Lord who had brought them up from Egypt would be present with them. The priest was to prepare the army for battle by assuring the troops of the Lord's presence to give them victory. The fourfold expostulation is dramatic: (1) Do not be fainthearted; (2) do not be afraid; (3) do not be terrified; (4) do not give way to panic.

5–9 The officers too were to speak to the inductees and articulate the ways to be excused from service. Only men ready and willing for battle were wanted. This was no conscripted army. The exemptions—acquiring a home and having the opportunity to live in it first; being able to enjoy the fruit of one's vineyard; being able to enjoy a recent marriage (cf. 24:5)—generally relate to settled society and indicate settled life in Canaan. So that discouragement would not infect the ranks, the fearful and fainthearted were also exempt. When the troops were psychologically ready for battle, commanders were appointed. It is unclear as to who was to do the appointing.

10–15 When in the more distant future Israel would attack a city beyond the boundaries of Canaan proper, different rules would apply. The cities of Canaan were to be totally destroyed, but the distant cities were first to be offered peace. If they accepted that offer, they were to become a work force for the Israelites. In cities that refused a peace offer, the men were to be executed; but the women, children, livestock, and everything else were to become booty for Israel.

16–18 In contrast to this treatment, the cities within Canaan proper were subject to herem (cf. 7:26, "set apart for destruction"; GK 3051). "Anything that breathes," as elsewhere (except in Ge 7:22), refers to human beings. All the inhabitants that remained in the conquered cities of Canaan were to be completely destroyed so that Israel would not be enticed into the supreme sin of defecting from the Lord and turning to other gods.

19–20 When Israel needed logs for building siege works, the immediate need was not to outweigh the long term value of fruit trees. Thus, they were not to be used for this purpose because of their value in producing food. Orchards were not common and were considered valuable.

All warfare is filled with violence, anguish, and inhumanity. These directions given to Israel must be measured relative to the world they lived in and to the heinousness of the sins of the cultures of Canaan.

4. Interpersonal relationships (21:1–25:19)

a. Atonement for unsolved murder (21:1–9)

1–5 When murder or manslaughter has been committed (Nu 35:32–33), the justice of God is affronted. There is an identification of the criminal with both the land and the people; and unless the criminal is punished, justice is not met. When the perpetrator of the crime cannot be detected, some method of removal of the guilt must be secured. First, the guilty area is determined by the elders and judges who measure the distance from the body to the nearby towns. Then the elders of the nearest town must make atonement for the bloodshed. An unworked heifer is to be led into an uncultivated valley that has a flowing stream. Presumably the place where the heifer is led is as near as possible to where the body lay. The priests need to be present, for they represent the Lord (10:8; 18:5).

6–9 Atonement is made for the bloodshed when the elders break the heifer's neck and wash their hands over the heifer's body while they declare that they, representing the people, are innocent of the homicide. Then they pray that the Lord's redeemed people will be held guiltless. This action purges the people

Major Social Concerns in the Covenant

1. Personhood
   Everyone's person is to be secure (Ex 20:13; Dt 5:17; Ex 21:16-21,26-31; Lev 19:14; Dt 24:7; 27:18).
2. False Accusation
   Everyone is to be secure against slander and false accusation (Ex 20:16; Dt 5:20; Ex 23:1-3; Lev 19:16; Dt 19:15-21).
3. Woman
   No woman is to be taken advantage of within her subordinate status in society (Ex 21:7-11,20, 26-32; 22:16-17; Dt 21:10-14; 22:13-30; 24:1-5).
4. Punishment
   Punishment for wrongdoing shall not be excessive so that the culprit is dehumanized (Dt 25:1-5).
5. Dignity
   Every Israelite's dignity and right to be God's freedman and servant are to be honored and safeguarded (Ex 21:2,5-6; Lev 25; Dt 15:12-18).
6. Inheritance
   Every Israelite's inheritance in the promised land is to be secure (Lev 25; Nu 27:5-7; 36:1-9; Dt 25:5-10).
7. Property
   Everyone's property is to be secure (Ex 20:15; Dt 5:19; Ex 21:33-36; 22:1-15; 23:4-5; Lev 19:35-36; Dt 22:1-4; 25:13-15).
8. Fruit of Labor
   Everyone is to receive the fruit of his labors (Lev 19:13; Dt 24:14; 25:4).
9. Fruit of the Ground
   Everyone is to share the fruit of the ground (Ex 23:10-11; Lev 19:9-10; 23:22; 25:3-55; Dt 14:28-29; 24:19-21).
10. Rest on Sabbath
    Everyone, down to the humblest servant and the resident alien, is to share in the weekly rest of God's Sabbath (Ex 20:8-11; Dt 5:12-15; Ex 23:12).
11. Marriage
    The marriage relationship is to be kept inviolate (Ex 20:14; Dt 5:18; see also Lev 18:6-23; 20:10-21; Dt 22:13-30).
12. Exploitation
    No one, however disabled, impoverished or powerless, is to be oppressed or exploited (Ex 22:21-27; Lev 19:14,33-34; 25:35-36; Dt 23:19; 24:6,12-15,17; 27:18).
13. Fair Trial
    Everyone is to have free access to the courts and is to be afforded a fair trial (Ex 23:6,8; Lev 19:15; Dt 1:17; 10:17-18; 16:18-20; 17:8-13; 19:15-21).
14. Social Order
    Every person's God-given place in the social order is to be honored (Ex 20:12; Dt 5:16; Ex 21:15,17; 22:28; Lev 19:3,32; 20:9; Dt 17:8-13; 21:15-21; 27:16).
15. Law
    No one shall be above the law, not even the king (Dt 17:18-20).
16. Animals
    Concern for the welfare of other creatures is to be extended to the animal world (Ex 23:5,11; Lev 25:7; Dt 22:4,6-7; 25:4).

from the guilt of spilling innocent blood. The atonement mentioned is not an atonement within the sacrificial system, for the blood of the heifer is not offered. It is rather an atonement for justice; the heifer suffers death in place of the unknown criminal, to clear the land of guilt.

b. Family relationships (21:10–21)

10–14 Suppose in warfare with nations that were "at a distance" (20:15) an Israelite man desired to marry a foreign, unmarried woman captured in warfare. Since she would not be under the ban of herem (20:16–18), she and the man would be subject to the rules regarding the marriage of Israelites. This legislation would restrain the man from rape and allow the woman time to become adjusted to their new condition. Symbolic of casting off her former life, the woman was to remove her native clothing, shave her head and trim her nails, and put on new clothes. These cleansing rites (cf. Lev 14:8; Nu 8:7; 2Sa 19:24) initiated the woman into the Israelite family, but she would have a full month to mourn her separation from her natural family before she became the wife of the Israelite. She was also protected from being sold for money or treated as a commodity. After marriage, if her husband was not pleased with her, he must let her go free because he had intercourse with her.

15–17 Polygamy, while not officially approved, was condoned in ancient times; so problems relating to the responsibilities and privileges of succession would arise (cf. Ge 29:15–30:24). The rule here established for Israel existed elsewhere in the ancient Orient (cf. Middle Assyrian law). In Israel the responsibilities and privileges of the firstborn stayed with the firstborn regardless of the father's desires. A father was not to make a will to frustrate this law or otherwise dispose of his property. The Hebrew idiom for "double share" (GK 9109 & 7023) became indicative of the position of successor (cf. 2Ki 2:9). "The first sign of his father's strength" describes the first son as the first result of the father's procreative power.

18–21 The rules for behavior in domestic and civil life generally provided protection for the less fortunate. In the case of a recalcitrant son, however, no mercy was allowed. This son was "stubborn" (GK 6253) and "rebellious" (GK 5286) in the face of remonstrance. These words describe incorrigible wickedness. Moreover, when the parents leveled charges against the son before the elders, they made the specific accusations of his being both a drunkard and a profligate. No hope remained for such a person.

His parents made their accusation before the elders sitting in the place of judgment in the gate of the city, and the punishment of being stoned to death was meted out by the townspeople so that evil would be purged from among them. The fear of punishment was expected to restrain each filial rebelliousness (13:11; 17:13; 19:20). This kind of rebelliousness was strictly forbidden by the fifth commandment (5:16; Ex 20:12; cf. Ex 21:15).

c. Relations to land, animals, and things (21:22–22:12)

22–23 The body of a person put to death for wrongdoing and hung on a tree must not remain exposed overnight: the body is under God's curse, and more exposure would desecrate the land. Hanging (cf. Jos 8:29; 10:26–27) exhibited the person to public humiliation. The criminal was under the indictment of death by God's judgment.

The meaning of "under God's curse" is not certain. Since judgment basically is God's (1:17), the judgment that takes one out of the covenant community as a criminal and displays that judgment by the humiliation of hanging in public shows that that person is under God's curse. The exposure of his body was the utmost desecration. But continued exposure would desecrate the land, possibly because of the effect the continual remembrance of the crime and its punishment would have symbolically on the land. Paul's citation of this verse to illustrate the extent of Jesus' humiliation is very apt (Gal 3:13).

22:1–4 Straying domestic animals are not to be ignored but must be returned to their owner. When an owner does not live nearby, or for any other reason is unknown, the one who saw the stray must take it to his own place for safekeeping until the owner comes searching for it. Then the animal is to be restored to the owner. This same rule applies to anything one loses and another finds. Concern for an animal fallen on the road requires that anyone passing by should help it to its feet. This does not necessarily refer to an animal that had strayed; more likely it envisages an animal fallen under a load with the owner beside him (Ex 23:5). Because of the weight of the load, the owner alone is unable to assist the animal to its feet.

5 The prohibition against a woman wearing men's clothing and vice versa can scarcely refer to transvestism. Most probably illicit sexual practices—including homosexuality (Lev 18:22; 20:13)—are included in this prohibition. Scripture considers the natural differences between male and female to be the Lord's creation and so should not be disregarded.

6–7 The injunction here relates to a mother bird on her nest with eggs or newly hatched young. Concern of the "be kind to animals" type or for animal parenthood or for saving the mother in the interest of continuing productivity may have occasioned this legislation (but cf. Ge 1:28; 9:9–10). Long life and well-being follow obedience to this command (cf. 5:16).

8 Protection of self and property from the guilt of bloodshed underlies the concern for persons who may be on the flat roof of one's house (Jos 2:6; 2Sa 11:2). A railing was to be built as a safety precaution. The roofs of houses were often used for various purposes. Consequently, without some kind of restraining wall, one could easily fall off and be hurt.

9–10 The prohibitions of mixing seeds for planting, plowing with diverse animals, and wearing clothes woven of differing threads expand slightly on Lev 19:19. The ancient rationale for these regulations is not known.

Perhaps the distinctions that God ordained in Creation are to be preserved. Israelite behavior was to be differentiated from that of its neighbors. Possibly the mixing of animals pulling plows was thought to be unkind because of the differing strengths of the animals or ways of pulling under harness (see comment on Lev 19:19). Verse 9 declares that when vines and other plants are mixed, both the grapes and the other crop are "defiled" and no longer permissible for personal use. The aim of the legislation again seems to be to maintain the natural distinctiveness of Creation.

11–12 The mixing of kinds of thread is prohibited in Lev 19:19, but here the specific kinds of thread—"wool and linen"—are mentioned. Perhaps these are illustrative. In Nu 15:38–40 the regulation for the wearing of tassels includes the reason: "You will have these tassels to look at and so you will remember all the commands of the LORD. . . . Then you will remember to obey all my commands and will be consecrated to your God" (vv.39–40).

d. Marriage violations (22:13–30)

13–21 Divorce, though not God's will (cf. Mk 10:5–9), was permitted under certain circumstances and restrictions. A husband's charge of premarital infidelity on the part of his newly acquired wife followed certain procedures. If the husband, after lying with his bride, disliked her and declared that she was not a virgin when she came to him, her parents could come to her aid by displaying the proof of her virginity (apparently the blood-spotted bedclothes) to the town elders. If they decided that the man was guilty of defaming his bride, he must give a hundred shekels of silver to the girl's father, and she must remain as his wife, never to be divorced. If no acceptable proof of virginity was presented, she was to be stoned at the door of her father's house.

The law protected the innocent bride from the caprice of her husband and discouraged premarital infidelity among young women. It did not, however, protect young women from getting a husband who had previously had sexual relations. But other laws do concern themselves with men's extramarital relations (e.g., vv.22–29).

22 The injunction "You must purge the evil from among you" or "from Israel" is given three times (vv.21, 22, 24) in this series of capital offenses—an indication of the seriousness of crimes against marital fidelity. Under the conditions expressed, adultery was not only forbidden but, as a capital offense, demanded the death penalty.

23–27 If one of the adulterous persons was a woman "pledged to be married" to someone else and the act occurred in a town, without any voiced protest by the woman, stoning was required. If rape occurred in the country, where a girl's screams could not be heard, only the man's life was required; the girl went free.

28–29 The law was more lenient with a man who forced a virgin who was not pledged in marriage to another. The penalty, however, was not light. The offender had to pay a fine of fifty shekels of silver, marry the girl, and keep her as his wife as long as he lived. It was customary to pay a purchase price for a wife (Ge 34:12; Ex 22:16; 1Sa 18:25; Hos 3:2).

30 The prohibition of intercourse with one's father's wife undoubtedly refers to a wife other than one's own mother, since a father's wife in this sense is in view elsewhere (27:20; Lev 18:8, 11; 20:11). Jacob condemned Reuben for his incest with Bilhah (Ge 35:22; 49:3–4). In Leviticus death was decreed for both persons involved in such incest (Lev 18:8, 29; 20:11).

e. Family, neighborhood, and national relationships (23:1–25:19)

1–2 Chapter 23 begins its miscellany of laws with three categories of persons who are excluded from the assembly of the Lord: eunuchs, illegitimate children, and Ammonites and Moabites. The assembly is expressly called "the assembly of the LORD" (vv.1–3, 8) and is probably restricted to the religious community. Any bodily defect was considered unacceptable to God—as were the results of sinful acts, whether personal (as illegitimacy) or national (as the behavior of the Ammonites and the Moabites).

The excluded eunuchs were those who were deliberately made eunuchs—probably those in dedication to foreign gods and those who had official positions under foreign governments; these rules were also against any deliberate mutilation abhorrent to the position of God's people as holy. Isaiah predicted that in the future eunuchs who did what pleased the Lord would have a better name than the sons and daughters of Israel (56:4–5; cf. Ac 8:26–39).

Precisely who comes under the ban of those born out of wedlock is not clear (see NIV note, KJV). The passage hardly refers to all persons born out of wedlock because prohibited marriages are clearly delineated and fornicators were put to death, required to be married, or in some cases required to remain in protective custody of a family. This regulation might well be aimed at the offspring of cult prostitutes or of other promiscuous sexual practices related to the fertility religions of Canaan. It seems possible, however, that the law covers the offspring of all "forbidden marriages." The reference "to the tenth generation," as v.6 indicates, means as long as the nation exists.

3–6 Ammonites and Moabites were excluded because they failed to show concern for the Israelites when they moved toward Canaan. Israel had sought nothing except the right to purchase food and water (2:28–29). Because of a refusal, Israel skirted their lands and showed no hostility toward them (2:9, 16–19). But Moab hired Balaam, a Mesopotamian sorcerer, to curse Israel; and even though the Lord turned the curse to blessing (Nu 22–24; cf. Ge 12:3), Moab came under the indictment of not supporting the Israelites. The act of the king is naturally the responsibility of the whole kingdom because he represents and acts for the people.

Israel as a nation was never to seek peace or good relations with these two nations. The prophets also denounced the Ammonites and Moabites (Isa 15:1–16:13; Jer 48:1–49:6; et al.). Ruth, a Moabitess whose descendants included the Davidic line eventuating in the Messiah, was a notable exception.

7–8 Though Edomites and Egyptians also failed in kindness toward the Israelites—and even oppressed them—these two nations were not to be abhorred; Edom because of near kinship, and Egypt because Israel lived as an alien there. Great grandchildren could be integrated into the assembly of the Lord.

9–14 Rules for the holiness and cleanliness of the camp during military engagements are in mind here. A man who has an emission at night must go outside the camp and remain there until the next evening when, after washing himself, he may reenter at the going down of the sun. For the disposal of excrement, a place outside the camp was to be chosen. In addition to weapons, some sort of instrument like a spade was to be used for digging a hole. The excrement was to be covered over so that the Lord would not be offended as he went through the camp; this reference is most likely to the Lord's personal, spiritual presence. Holiness is identified with cleanliness. Only the clean person can approach the Lord in worship (Ex 19:10–11; 30:18–21; Jos 3:5; Ps 51:7, 10).

15–16 A fugitive slave was not to be handed over to his master but was to be given asylum and the freedom to go anywhere he desired within the domain of Israel. These slaves had fled from foreign parts; they were not to be oppressed as the Israelites themselves had been oppressed in Egypt (Ex 22:21; Lev 19:33–34).

17–18 Temple prostitution was practiced among Baal worshipers. Israel was strictly forbidden to indulge in this demoralizing practice. The earnings of prostitutes are tainted and are not to be offered to the Lord to pay any vow ("vow" covers any contribution to the Lord). Whatever is acquired by evil means as well as what is evil in itself is not to be offered to the Lord.

19–20 When the nation was first established, the Israelite economy was by no means mercantile; loans were made primarily to help persons too poor to support themselves. Such assistance was to be given without interest. But since merchants from other nations might come for business reasons to Israel or might make loans on interest to Israelites, foreigners could be charged interest. This rule alleviated the plight of the poor and made it more possible for them to work themselves out of their low estate. Interest is also regulated in Ex 22:25 and Lev 25:36–37. The Lord's blessing on the labors of God's people in the land was contingent on following this directive.

21–23 Vows were common in the OT world. They became a part of the OT system of offerings and are mentioned frequently with the sacrificial offerings. Vows were never required, however, but properly handled would have the Lord's approval. Sometimes the payment of a vow was contingent on the occurrence of some specific event (cf. Jdg 11:30–31). Moses urged the people to fulfill vows with dispatch and stressed that the payment of vows cannot be escaped (cf. Nu 30:2). The Lord requires it; failure to pay is sinful. In Nu 30 certain persons within the family structure are not under responsibility to pay their vows unless certain conditions prevail.

24–25 The right to pick a few grapes from a neighbor's vineyard or a few kernels of grain in his field appears to stand on somewhat the same level as gleaning during harvest. It is based on a concern for the immediate need for food. This advantage was not to be abused by putting grapes in a basket or putting a sickle to the neighbor's grain. According to one Jewish tradition, these verses refer only to persons who were hired to work in the vineyard or field.

24:1–4 Divorce (GK 4135) appears as a fact of social life; while under certain circumstances it was permitted, it was to be regulated (Lev 21:7, 14; 22:13; Nu 30:9). Divorce could be initiated only by men, not by women. Verses 1–3 set the stage: a man marries a woman who subsequently displeases him because of some indecency. The man divorces the woman, and she remarries another man who also dislikes her and divorces her—or dies, leaving her without a husband. This law says that the first husband cannot remarry the woman because she has been defiled by the second marriage. This act of remarriage would be detestable in the Lord's eyes and would bring sin on the land (cf. Jer 3:1; Mt 5:31–32).

The man who desires to divorce his wife must show that there is "something indecent" about her. Something less than adultery must be meant since the punishment for adultery is death (22:22–27; Lev 20:10). When grounds for divorce existed, the man must have "a certificate of divorce" served on his wife. Only then may he send her from his home.

5 In 20:7 a man engaged to a woman is exempt from military duty. Here exemption is extended to the newly married and lasts for one year, doubtless because in war he might be killed. Happy family life and family continuity were held in great respect in the Mosaic economy.

6 The millstones that ground the grain for a family were not to be taken as security for a loan. The family's life was involved.

7 The death penalty would be exacted of one who kidnapped a brother Israelite for involuntary servitude or as merchandise. The victim's free life was involved; so the death penalty was decreed for the culprit—life for life. Once more the relationship of crime to the responsibility of the commonwealth and to its moral condition is emphasized by the demand: "You must purge the evil from among you."

8–9 Twice the people are exhorted to exercise special care to follow the commands of the Lord regarding skin diseases. The reference to leprous diseases presupposes acquaintance with Lev 13–14 (see comments).

10–13 The grant of a loan to a neighbor should be made discreetly. The security is to be chosen by the neighbor privately and brought to the one granting the loan. If the neighbor is so impoverished that his cloak, which serves as his bedclothes at night, has to be given as security, the cloak must be returned to him by sunset. God will approve this act as a righteous one, and the debtor will thank his creditor.

14–15 One was not to take advantage of the poor working man living in any Israelite town. Wages were to be paid each day because the worker needed to cover his daily expenses. In contrast to the thankfulness of the man whose garment was returned at sunset, the man who was denied his daily wage at sunset might cry to the Lord against his employer, and sin would be registered against him.

16 The law of individual responsibility under which the courts decreed punishment inflicts that punishment only on the criminal. Though shame and other consequences of crime fall naturally on one's family and descendants according to the governance of God, the punishment to be exacted for a crime falls on the perpetrator alone. Therefore the Israelites as a community are not to put fathers to death for their children's crime, but "each is to die for his own sin." However, in some situations the group as a whole is implicated (cf. Jos 7), and the individuals in the group are either punished with the group or are benefitted by union with it.

17–18 Concern for the underprivileged (cf. 10:18–19; 14:29; 16:11; 24:6, 10–15) is based on Ex 22:21–24; 23:6, 9; and Lev 19:9–10; 23:22. Israel's slavery in Egypt is said to be the reason for God's commands that they act kindly toward the alien, the widow, and the orphan. The alien and fatherless are not to be deprived of justice, and the widow's cloak must not be taken in pledge (but cf. vv.12–13).

19–22 The overlooked sheaf of grain was to be left for the underprivileged so that the Lord's blessing may rest on the owner's endeavors. Only once are the olive trees to be beaten with poles to harvest olives. The remaining olives were for the alien, the widow, and the orphan. In grape harvest also the vines were gone over only once so that the needy could have the remainder. Again, the Israelites were to remember that they had been redeemed from Egypt.

25:1–3 When a dispute arises between persons, they are to take the matter to court. The judge has been given the responsibility and the authority to make decisions and to make sure that the punishment, if any, is inflicted on the guilty party. The guilty must be beaten with the number of blows commensurate with the nature of the crime. Moreover, the number of blows must not exceed forty lashes because that would be inhumane; the person would be humiliated publicly. The guilty is to lie down in front of the judge and is to be flogged there so that the punishment will conform to the judge's decision.

4 Animals too must be treated with kindness, keeping in mind their need of food. In the threshing process heavy animals were led around a threshing floor. The stalks of grain were laid on the floor, and the hoofs of the animals and sometimes a sledge drawn by animals would separate the kernels from the stalks (Isa 28:28; 41:15; Hos 10:11; cf. 1Co 9:9–10; 1Ti 5:18).

5–6 Levirate marriage, under which a brother (or nearest relative by marriage) takes a childless brother's widow into his home to raise up a descendant, was of considerable importance to the continuity of the family and the distribution of landed property. Moses had already established that when no male heir existed, daughters would be heirs of their father's property (Nu 27:1–8). So a basic reason for levirate marriage did not exist if a man died without a male heir but did have a daughter. The rule that the widow must not marry outside the family is similar to that which grew out of the experience of Zelophehad's daughters (Nu 36:10–12). If the husband's brother fulfilled the law of the levir, the first son (child?) the widow bore was to carry on the name of the dead brother; the estate would belong to him.

7–10 If the man did not want to marry his brother's wife, the widow could bring the matter before the elders. There she would indict her husband's brother for his refusal to carry on her late husband's name. If the elders failed to break the man's persistence, she was to take off one of his sandals, spit in his face, and denounce him as one who would not build up his brother's family line. His family line would then be known as "The Family of the Unsandaled." This procedure is given as law only here, but the narratives in Ge 38 and Ru 4 indicate similar practice. The legislation makes possible the release of the brother-in-law from his duty, while definitely discouraging such failure by shame.

11–12 Indecency in sexual situations is illustrated by the law against a woman laying hold of the private parts of an assailant of her husband. The circumstance would not be common but is rather a case law that would cover all such actions. The punishment was severe, necessitating the additional statement: "Show her no pity." Once again the law and punishment appear to be used as a deterrent.

13–16 An Israelite was to be honest in any commercial dealing (Lev 19:35–36). A large weighing stone for buying (to acquire more for one's money) and a small weighing stone for selling (to give less) were unlawful. Neither were the people to have differing quantitative measures in their homes—"one large, one small." The Lord detests those who deal dishonestly, but those who follow his ethical standards will be rewarded with long life in the land (cf.Lk 6:38).

17–19 The Amalekites, descendants of Esau (Ge 36:15–16; 1Ch 1:36), were a nomadic tribe living in upper Sinai who attacked the Israelites at Rephidim (Ex 17:8–16). The Israelites eventually won those battles (Ex 17:16). Later, after Israel rejected the directive of the Lord to enter Canaan from the south, Israel suffered defeat at the hands of the Amalekites and the Canaanites (Nu 14:39–45). Moses called the Israelites to remember that the Amalekites attacked the "weary and worn" stragglers. In those attacks, the Amalekites showed "no fear of God." The call to remember what the Amalekites had done and the Lord's directive concerning them are emphasized by the totality of the destruction decreed: "You shall blot the memory of Amalek from under heaven," and by the additional admonition: "Do not forget!"

The Amalekites disappeared from history after the time of Hezekiah (1Ch 4:43). Their incorrigible wickedness was such that annihilation was necessary. Besides, by their attacks on God's people, the Amalekites indicated that "they had no fear of God."

5. Firstfruits and tithes (26:1–15)

1–4 When the people were settled in the land, each family leader was to take some of the first produce to the place the Lord would choose. There each man was to say, in essence, to the priest, "I have received my part of the land as an inheritance according to the promise of God." The landowner then was to present to the priest the produce as a token of the land's fruitfulness, and the priest was to set the basket down in front of the altar. Since only priests were allowed in the tabernacle, that altar must be the altar of sacrifice outside the tent.

These tokens of the first produce together with the declarations, while similar to the regular offering of firstfruits (Ex 23:19; 34:26), surely refer to an initial offering after the first harvest in the land—subsequent, of course, to the years required by Lev 19:23–25.

5–6 The terse historical review (vv.5–9), replete with phrases and descriptive clauses used elsewhere, witnesses to the Israelites' faith in the Lord their God. Jacob, the wandering Aramean, went down into Egypt with a few individuals but became a numerous and powerful people, who, after mistreatment and suffering, were brought out of Egypt by the Lord.

7–11 When he was to appear before the enslaved Israelites in Egypt, Moses was to identify the God who spoke to him and who directed him to lead his people out of Egypt as "the LORD, the God of your fathers" (Ex 3:16). The Israelites were to assert now that they cried out in distress to the God of their history, not to any newly found or newly revealed God, and that the God of their fathers had brought them out of Egypt and into the Promised Land. Israel's escape from the oppression in Egypt and the trials of the Exodus and the blessings of residence in the land "flowing with milk and honey" (cf. 6:3) were all credited to the Lord with thankfulness, worship, and rejoicing. Levites and aliens were to be included as participants in this festivity.

12–15 Appended to this initial giving of the firstfruits is the rule for the setting aside of the tithe of every third year for the support of the Levites and the underprivileged. In substance the declaration says that the tenth of the produce had been removed from the donor's premises and was given to the Levites and the underprivileged—aliens, orphans, and widows. Because the donor had obeyed the Lord's command, he could pray for the Lord's blessing on the people and on the land the Lord had given to the people.

The part of the produce of the land given to the Levites and the underprivileged is called the "tenth" or "tithe" (GK 6923 & 5130; see 12:6) and the "sacred portion." This sacred tithe was not conceived of as a secular tax for the welfare of the poor but as an act inspired by the Lord. Both the giving of it and the reception of it were spiritual acts and were to be recognized as holy.

Several specific situations illustrate the speaker's assertion that he himself had not eaten any of the tenth. He had not eaten any while in mourning (i.e., while he was unclean for that reason). In fact, he had not removed any of it while he was unclean for any reason. Neither was any of the food ever offered to the dead (putting food in a grave with a dead body was a common Egyptian and Canaanite practice, which the Israelites were not to emulate).

The worshiper reiterated that he had obeyed the Lord's commands to the letter.

The affirmation ended with prayer recognizing that God's dwelling place is in heaven and that he had given the Israelites the land flowing with milk and honey as he had promised to their forefathers. Thus continued blessing on both people and land was requested.

6. Concluding exhortation and the declaration of the covenant-treaty compact (26:16–19)

16–19 This whole section (12:1–26:19) concludes with an exhortation to adhere carefully to the stipulations of the covenant-treaty the Lord has given to the Israelites. "This day" points to a particular day when the command to follow God's decrees and laws with heart and soul was reiterated on the plains of Moab and when the people declared that the Lord was their God and the Lord declared that they were his people.

The Lord declared that the Israelites in a special sense were his people and were his "treasured possession" (GK 6035; see 7:6; 14:2). As the Lord was to be the object of their praise (10:21), so his people would be the object of the praise of the nations. They would have a name with a fame high above other nations.

D. Ratification of the Covenant-Treaty (27:1–26)

1. The law and the altar on Mount Ebal (27:1–8)

Chapters 27–28 constitute the instruction for impressing the covenant-treaty on the Israelites by two specific programs: (1) the setting up on Mount Ebal of stones on which the law was written and the building of a fieldstone altar on which burnt offerings and fellowship offerings were to be sacrificed for this event; (2) the presentation by the people of the curses and blessings on Mounts Ebal and Gerizim.

1 According to this verse, not Moses alone, but Moses and the elders of Israel commanded the people. Perhaps the elders are associated with Moses because of his imminent death and consequent absence from the ceremony at Gerizim and Ebal.

2–4 The temporal focus of being on the verge of entering Canaan is mentioned again. Large stones set up on Mount Ebal were to be coated with plaster and then inscribed with "all the words of this law." What is meant by "all the words of this law" cannot be definitely determined. Most likely the salient parts of the laws reiterated in Deuteronomy would be all that was necessary. "Today" (v.1) limits the commands to what Moses had said to them in that twenty-four-hour period.

5–8 In addition to the stones to be set up on Mount Ebal for displaying the law, an altar of fieldstones was to be erected. In agreement with Ex 20:25, no iron tool was to be used in building this altar. This altar was for temporary use on a special occasion, like the altars erected by the patriarchs. "Burnt offerings" and "fellowship offerings" were to be sacrificed there, and the people were to eat the fellowship offerings while rejoicing in the presence of the Lord. Just as the people were instructed at the incidence of the giving of the law at Sinai, so now, at the renewal of the covenant-treaty, burnt offerings and fellowship offerings were to be made.

2. The curses from Mount Ebal (27:9–26)

a. The standing and the stance of the tribes (27:9–13)

9–11 The authority of the elders coupled with that of Moses began this series of directives (v.1); now that of the priests is added. The repetition of the declaration of the people becoming the people of the Lord their God is noteworthy. Basically three occasions of this declaration occurred or were about to occur: at Horeb (Sinai) (Ex 19:3–8), on the plains of Moab (Dt 26:16–19; 27:9–10), and on Mount Ebal (Jos 8:30–35). In every instance the important aspects of the treaty formula are present. Most notable is the relationship established between the Lord and Israel. Not only is the Lord the Creator of the people as human beings, but he is also the Creator of Israel as a political entity. Rewards and punishments stem from this relationship.

12–13 The tribes to stand on Mount Gerizim to bless the people are all descendants of Jacob's two wives, Leah and Rachel, while the tribes that uttered curses were Reuben and Zebulun, both sons of Leah, plus the tribes of the sons of the handmaids Zilpah and Bilhah. Preference is given to the sons of the wives of Jacob who had higher standing than the sons of the handmaids, though the division into two groups of six necessitated putting two sons of Leah with those of the handmaids.

b. Curses and response (27:14–26)

14 While vv.12–13 reveal that six tribes were to stand on Mount Gerizim to bless the people and the other six on Mount Ebal to pronounce curses (GK 826), here we learn that the Levites were to recite the words and the people were to say, "Amen." The Levites voicing the blessings and curses were apparently priests who cared for the ark of the covenant (Jos 8:33). The rest of the tribe of Levi was on Gerizim (v.12). The list of curses in vv.15–26 tells on whom and why the curses would fall. The actions that evoke the curses are illustrative rather than comprehensive.

15 The first curse covers an Israelite's relationship to the Lord. No one was to make an idol, either carved of wood or cast in metal. This was detestable to the Lord God (cf. Ex 20:3–4).

16 The second curse falls on the one who dishonors his parents (cf. Ex 20:12; Dt 5:16).

17 The third curse relates to the division of the land. Each family's allotment was to be respected; consequently, moving boundary stones came under God's curse (see 19:14).

18–19 The next two curses concern the disabled and the underprivileged. Leviticus 19:14 prohibits putting "a stumbling block in front of the blind." Here the curse falls on the one "who leads the blind astray on the road." The next curse is on the man who withholds justice from the disadvantaged: the alien, the fatherless, or the widow. The requirement of equal justice for everyone is frequently stated (Ex 22:21–24; 23:9; Lev 19:33–34; Dt 10:17–19; 24:17).

20 Here the first of four curses involving incest is indicative of the importance of sexual morality in the Mosaic order. The "father's wife" refers to someone other than one's mother. The euphemism "dishonors his father's bed" may mean that he violates his father's marriage. Sexual relations are only for those lawfully married.

21 Having sexual relations with animals was not unknown in the ancient Near East. Among the Hittites bestiality was practiced to bring people into union with their gods. Exodus 22:19 and Lev 18:23; 20:15–16, as well as the reiteration by Moses here, indicate that was practiced in Canaan. When this sin was discovered, death was the penalty. If not discovered, the participants were nevertheless under the curse of God.

22–23 Curses eight and nine fall on those who commit incest with a half-sister or one's mother-in-law (cf. Lev 18:9, 17; 20:14, 17).

24–25 The tenth and eleventh curses fall on those who kill secretly and those who accept fees for killing innocent persons. These actions, along with the preceding, appear to place a curse on criminal actions that are not publicly known. The Lord denounces that person, and the Lord's curse ever hangs over him, eventuating in unknown punishment. Only here is a curse placed on anyone who accepts a bribe.

26 The last of the twelve curses sums up them all but includes more than the curses specified. The Israelites must "uphold," or make effective (GK 7756), this law by following it. This covers all the law as enunciated by Moses on the plains of Moab. To the recitation of each curse, the people were to respond with a definite "Amen" (GK 589), a solemn assertion confirming the validity of the curses. The people declared that they were placing themselves under the consequences of breaking the covenant stipulations, which was tantamount to saying, "We formally accept the terms and agree to all the provisions."

The Deuteronomic curses were warnings not to break the law, given with the intent that paying heed to the warning would keep Israel in good relationship with the Lord. Those living in OT times who were faithful to the Lord were not under the curse but had the witness from the Spirit of God that they were acceptable to him.

E. The Blessings and the Curses (28:1–68)

1. The blessings (28:1–14)

1–2 The oft-repeated reference to the "commands I give you today" (cf. vv.9, 13, 14, 15, 45, 58, 62) introduces "all these blessings" (GK 1388) for obedience. Full obedience to the Lord would result in blessing for his people. Among these blessings is eminence. If Israel obeyed the Lord, she would be set high above all the nations of the world (26:19). The blessings would come to the people and go with them, much like goodness and love in Ps 23:6.

3–4 Two sections of blessings and curses balance each other in vv.3–6 over against vv.16–19. The blessing or the curse would be nationwide, covering "city and country" (vv.3, 16). Every productivity would be under either the blessing or the curse: children, crops, and livestock, including both herds and flocks. The blessing of reproduction had been in the promise to Abraham and was repeated throughout the revelation through Moses (Ge 15:5; Ex 32:13; Dt 1:10).

5 Blessing or curse would extend to the Israelites' daily sustenance (vv.5, 17), the basket and kneading trough being used to gather food products and to prepare them for meals. Among a desert-dwelling people food products were scarce, and hunger and thirst common. Abundant foodstuffs were a notable blessing indeed!

6 The Lord's goodness would cover the Israelites' daily labor. Going out and coming in is a common description of going about one's daily tasks.

7–8 Further specification of the Lord's blessing under the covenant tells of victory over enemies and utopian prosperity in the land. When enemies would come from one direction, they would flee in defeat in seven directions. External foes would be decisively disoriented and scattered, unable to carry on warfare. The Lord would eagerly command blessing to be on the Israelites' barns (granaries) and everything they put their hands to.

9–11 Once again Moses conditioned Israel's blessed relationship to the Lord on keeping his commands and walking in his ways. If Israel would do this, the Lord would fulfill his sworn promise to establish them. This establishment as the Lord's holy people would make other people recognize that the Israelites were "called by the name of the LORD," and this would make the nations afraid of them. The blessing of v.4 to be experienced in the land is expanded into "abundant prosperity."

12 The particular blessing of rain would provide fertility to the soil and an abundance of crops to the farmer. The Lord promised to bless the people by opening the treasure house of the skies (cf. Job 38:22; Pss 33:7; 135:7). The prosperity of v.8 is now the Lord's "bounty," describing the goodness and sufficiency of his treasures of rain. Moses insisted that it was the Lord who would either bless Israel with abundant rain or withhold rain because of her disobedience. Because of the blessing of the Lord, Israel was destined to be rich and would "lend to many nations but borrow from none."

13–14 Israel would move upward from her current status to that of the head among the nations. But this would be determined by the adherence of the people to the stipulations of the covenant-treaty that they had accepted from the Lord. They must "carefully follow them" and "not turn aside . . . to the right or to the left" from any of the commands Moses was rehearsing to them that day.

2. The curses (28:15–68)

15 As the blessings of the Lord seem to be personalized (v.2), so also the curses take on personal action; they would come and overtake a disobedient Israel (cf. v.45).

16–19 After the basic coverage of the curse, following the same plan as that of the blessings (vv.3–6), Moses developed—with about six times the length—the description of the disaster that would follow when Israel was disobedient to the Lord. Curses, confusion, and rebuke would fall on everything disobedient Israel did—until destruction and sudden ruin enveloped her.

20–21 The Lord would send plagues of many kinds. Some would attack the Israelites physically, and others would affect their lands and goods.

22–24 The bodily aspects of the curse that would come on the people include illnesses of various sorts and the shameful desecration of their dead bodies (v.26). Disturbance of their emotional and mental balance would follow. A precise identification of the diseases listed here is not possible. And not only were diseases to be the people's punishment, but the physical land too would suffer. The nature of that curse is developed as drought and its accompanying evils. Just as the specific diseases mentioned relate in some way to the excessive heat of fever or inflammation, so the curse of the land mentions the heat of drought and its consequences: scorching heat from a bronze sky, drought producing dust rather than rain from the Lord, and soil made as hard as iron by the hot east wind off the desert (cf. Ge 41:6, 23, 27).

"Blight and mildew" is an idiom signifying disaster to the crops by contrasting degenerative actions. Together the words depict the dearth of productivity and the destruction of the crops.

25 Israel under the curse of disobedience would also suffer defeat in warfare. Under the blessing their enemies would come from one sector but flee in seven directions (v.7). Under the curse the opposite would be true. Israel would attack her enemies from one direction and flee in seven. Seven depicts complete, disorganized rout.

26 The Israelites' dead bodies would not be given burial but would be eaten by the birds and wild animals, a shameful desecration. Jeremiah similarly portrayed the frightful future in the Valley of Hinnom, after which it would be called the Valley of Slaughter (Jer 7:32–33; cf. 1Sa 17:44, 46; 1Ki 14:11; Ps 79:2; et al.).

27 The "boils of Egypt" doubtless refers to the sixth plague (Ex 9:9–11). This may have been a form of leprosy. The "tumors" (GK 6754) were like those the Philistines later contracted when the ark of the covenant was held by them (1Sa 5–6). The Hebrew word is usually thought to be hemorrhoids, tumors, bubonic plague, or leprosy. The "festering sores" appear to be some kind of eruptive sore (cf. Lev 21:20; 22:22). The "itch" is some sort of skin disorder that induces scratching. These skin eruptions will be incurable.

28–29 Following on these diseases afflicting the skin come debilitating dysfunctions: madness, blindness, and mental confusion. This blindness will be so complete that in the brightness of noon the people will grope about. They will be unsuccessful in everything they do. Continually, they would be oppressed and robbed of whatever they labored for; and there would be no one to rescue them from their plight.

30 From this verse on, Moses portrayed the miserable existence and utter destruction of Israel as a nation. The possibility of a blessed future remained, but the possibility of the horrors of Israel because of infidelity seemed more sure.

To be pledged to be married was a more certain relationship than modern engagement; so having that status broken, probably by being taken captive and forced into sexual compliance, would be a very trying experience. Building a house would be useless labor. The same frustration would follow attempts at viticulture; not even the beginning of the enjoyment of the fruit would be experienced (cf. 20:6).

31–32 One's ox would be slaughtered in plain view, but the Israelite owner, obviously helpless, would have none of it to eat. So also his donkey would be forcibly taken from him and never returned, and his sheep given to his enemies. Sons and daughters would be taken captive; and parents helplessly would wear out their eyes watching for the return of those who would never come back.

33 Instead of the abundance that an obedient Israel would receive from the soil (vv.4–6, 8, 11–12), disobedient Israel would have the people of an unknown land eat what their "land and labor" produced while they themselves would experience cruel oppression throughout their lives. "Another nation" in v.32 and "a nation unknown to you" in v.36 both signify foreign people.

34–35 Blow upon blow continues. What the people would see would drive them insane. The specifics of this dirge are picked up again. Painful, incurable boils that particularly afflicted the knees and the legs would spread from the soles of their feet to the top of the head (cf. Job 2:7–8; 7:3–5; et al.). This may have been a kind of elephantiasis.

36–37 So far Moses has said that disobedient Israel would be plagued until they were "destroyed . . . from the land" (v.21) and that their children would be given to another nation. Here he announces the fact of national captivity and then describes their situation in the foreign land in bold outline. The Lord would drive the Israelites and their king to a distant, foreign nation unknown to them or their fathers, and there they would worship idols. Among the nations they would become an object of horror, scorn, and ridicule (1Ki 9:7; 2Ch 7:20; Jer 24:9).

38–42 Again the curse on the land, resulting in unproductive farming, is elaborated. This time the produce itself is attacked, and the harvest is lost. Grain would not be harvested because grasshoppers would eat it. Grapes would not be gathered, and people would not drink the wine that might have been made—worms would eat the grapes. Olive oil would not be available. The locust swarms would take over the land. In this scene of unproductivity, the Israelites would not be able to keep their children either, because they would go into captivity.

43–44 In contrast to vv.12b–13a, aliens would lend to the Israelites, and they would be the head and Israel the tail. The Israelite condition under the curse would be more of a curse than their blessing would be a blessing, because of their continual deterioration.

45–48 All these curses would not only come on the people and overtake them but would pursue them until they were destroyed for their disobedience. The Lord who had brought the Israelites out of Egypt by signs and wonders (4:34) would make the curses to be "a sign and a wonder" to them and their descendants forever. Because the people did not serve the Lord, they would serve the enemies he would send against them. In their prosperity, the people neglected to serve the Lord joyfully and gladly. Since they did not under these conditions serve the Lord, they would experience the dire consequences of the curse: hunger, thirst, nakedness, poverty, and servitude would come on them like an iron yoke, until they were destroyed.

49 The destruction of disobedient Israel was to come from a distant, foreign nation. This distant enemy would strike swiftly and unerringly like an eagle swooping on its prey (cf. Hos 8:1; Jer 48:40; 49:22). This foreign nation would have a language not understandable to the Israelite population (cf. Isa 28:11; 33:19).

In 1Co 14:21 Paul quotes Isa 28:11–12 and Dt 28:49 in reference to the tongues problem in the Corinthian church. The tongues mentioned in Isaiah and Deuteronomy were the regular languages of foreign peoples that were unknown by the Israelites.

50–52 This "fierce-looking nation" (cf. Da 8:23), without regard for either the aged or the young, would mercilessly eat up the choice livestock and the crops. That they would "besiege all the cities throughout the land" seems to include cities of any size or importance; however, only walled cities were subject to siege. Israel's misplaced trust would be evident when the walls fell down.

53–57 The frightful horrors of the siege included children, given to the people under the blessing of God but now eaten by their parents. And when the flesh of children was insufficient to go around, there would be no sharing of flesh with a starving brother or sister. Women, raised in delicate fashion, at the time of giving birth would begrudge their husbands and older children the afterbirths of their wombs and the children themselves who were born during the siege, eating them as food. Not only rough, coarse characters would do such things, but the most gentle and sensitive would descend to this debased state (cf. 2Ki 6:24–31; La 2:20; 4:10). All these frightful experiences would result "because of the suffering that your enemy will inflict on you during the siege." Three times this phrase occurs (vv.53, 55, 57), bearing down on the terrible experience the Israelites could expect if they disobeyed their Lord.

58–61 The Israelites would experience not only the diseases of Egypt but every other sickness or disaster as well—even all those "not recorded in this Book of the Law." The people are told that they would fall under the curse if they did not carefully follow "all the words of this law, which are written in this book." The capitalization of "this Book of the Law" signifies that a definite, particular written document is meant. While its precise contents are uncertain, it covered the basic laws and the historical episodes relating to the establishment of the covenant-treaty—so far as it was written. Failure to follow all the stipulations would result in failure to revere the glorious and awesome name: "the LORD your God." This glorious and awesome name speaks of his essence, character, and reputation as the God of the promises, the true and living God revealed to the people, particularly at Horeb (Sinai).

62–64a Israel's growth as a nation would also be reversed. Under the covenant flowing from the promise to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Israel had increased and would continue to increase in number as the stars in the sky (1:10; 10:22; 26:5); but under the curse a reversal would return them to being few in number. The promise of the land as their very own was central in the promise to Israel—a promise repeated again and again in this book. But under the curse the few people left would be torn from the land and scattered worldwide.

64b–68 Instead of following the Lord exclusively, the Israelites would turn from him and engage in idolatrous worship. Instead of the repose of the Promised Land, anxiety, wearisome longing, fear, constant suspense, and despair would be their lot among the nations. In the Promised Land under the blessing of the Lord, the nations would fear them (v.10); but under the curse in foreign lands, the Israelites would be in constant fear of the nations. So low would they sink that the offering of themselves as slaves in Egypt would be rejected. The psychological state of the people dispersed among the nations is depicted with no less descriptive power than the foregoing calamities.

IV. Third Address: The Terms of the Covenant (29:1–30:20)

The rest of the book of Deuteronomy concerns the ratification (renewal) of the covenant-treaty (29:1–15), the results of acceptance or rejection of it (29:16–30:20), Moses' Song (31:19–32:43), his final blessing on the tribes (33:1–29), Joshua's induction as Moses' successor (31:1–8, 14–15, 23; 32:44; 34:9), and Moses' death (34:1–12).

A. Recapitulation of Historical Background (29:1–29)

1. Introduction (29:1)

1 Moses differentiated between the two declarations of the covenant (Moab, Horeb). The covenant is one; the affirmations or renewals of allegiance to the Lord and the terms of the covenant could be several.

2. Recapitulation of desert situation (29:2–8)

2–3 In these culminating addresses of his life, Moses at first identified the people with the whole immediate past history. Many of those in front of him had not been in Egypt; they were born in the desert. However, many were under the age of twenty at Kadesh, two years after leaving Egypt, and were eighteen years of age or younger at the time of the Exodus (they were now thirty-nine to fifty-six years old). These had seen the "miraculous signs and great wonders" (4:34; 7:19) that the Lord had loosed on the Egyptians during the plagues, though the youngest of them would have no memory of what happened when they were infants. Moses' message, however, was directed to the nation. The community had been in Egypt and had seen the wonderful things that the Lord had done for them. Even the specific mention of "your own eyes" is doubtless directed to the whole community comprising the nation, as vv.10–11 indicate.

4 When Moses said that the Lord had not given the Israelites the realization of his intervention in the experiences of their history, he did not deny that they had knowledge of his part in the action; rather, he was asserting that the ultimate directive and operative power in all their national life was the Lord himself. This, he said, they had not yet fully realized.

5–6 The Lord's providence (cf. 8:4; Ne 9:21) included provisions of clothing and food. Specific miracles of supplying clothes and of keeping clothing from falling from their bodies in tatters are not mentioned, but uniting the durability of their clothing and sandals with the giving of manna and water puts this supply from the Lord on the same plane for the same purpose—"that you might know that I am the LORD" (cf. Ex 6:7; 7:5, 17; 10:2; 14:4, 18).

7–8 "When you reached this place" refers to the area immediately north of the Arnon, controlled by Sihon (2:24–37); so the plains of Moab were in Amorite hands until Moses conquered that area. Og had been king of the northern sector of Transjordan. He also was defeated by Moses (3:1–11). The allotment of these areas to Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh followed the defeat of the Amorites (3:12–17).

3. Clarification of covenant-treaty situation (29:9–21)

9–13 Moses emphasized the importance of adopting the covenant and following its stipulations in order to experience prosperity. All the Israelites standing in the presence of the Lord were called on to enter into the covenant-treaty with the Lord, who was sealing it with an oath. In this renewal the central characteristic and purpose of the covenant was again affirmed as the establishment of the people as the people of the Lord and their acceptance of him as their God in accordance with what he had promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob by an oath. The "oath" (GK 8678) in v.12 is like the oath to Abraham, and the formation of Israel as the people of God is in fulfillment of the promise to Abraham.

14–15 To focus on the national character of this covenant renewal—and the future benefits to the nation and the responsibilities of the national entity—Moses declared that not only those who were standing there at that time (notice the frequent "today") but those who were not there at that time but would appear in later generations were involved in making this covenant-treaty (cf. 5:3; Ac 2:39).

16–18 The statements "how we lived in Egypt" and "how we passed through the countries on the way here" provide the locale and historic background for the people's knowledge of the gods in those places and the nature of their worship. This is evident from the definite reference to the detestable images and idols that they saw among the people there. The Israelites were exhorted to "make sure" that no one's heart turned away from the Lord and that there was no source in them to produce such "bitter poison." The source of "bitter poison" was the person or persons who turned away from the Lord to worship the gods of Egypt and those of the other nations through which the Israelites passed on their journey from Egypt to the plains of Moab.

19–21 Moses, by the Spirit of God, expressed the thoughts of such a "bitter-poison" person when he heard "the words of this oath"; that is, the terms of the covenant-treaty, perhaps with special reference to its curses as a specific warning. Such a person invokes a blessing on himself saying, "I will be safe, even though I persist in going my own way."

The punishment the Lord would send is noteworthy in two respects. (1) From the "no man or woman," an individual apostate condition is considered. Individual apostasy could not hide in the blessed state of the believing community. One's apostasy would bring disaster on the innocent. The individual apostate would feel the result of the Lord's burning wrath and zeal. (2) No more dreadful state can be imagined than "the LORD will never be willing to forgive him" (cf. Heb 6:4–8; 2Pe 2; 3:16–17). The appalling results of apostasy would be heaped one on the other: all the curses in the book, the blotting out of one's name on earth (cf. 25:19; Ex 17:14), and being singled out for disaster. All these results would fall on the apostate.

4. Results of the Lord's anger on those who abandon the covenant (29:22–29)

22–24 Both the inhabitants and foreigners from distant lands would see the devastation and diseases resulting from the Lord's punishment—a punishment likened to that of Sodom and Gomorrah (Ge 14:2; 19:24–29). Utter desolation would prevail. No more would the land flowing with milk and honey be so productive that "abundant prosperity" would be present (28:11). The Promised Land would become a burning waste of salt and sulfur—"nothing planted, nothing sprouted, no vegetation growing." The pictorial representation is dramatized further by the reaction of later generations of Israelites and of the nations, who would ask the universal question when confronted by events that adversely affected lives or properties: "Why? Why did the Lord do this? Why was he so angry?" (cf. v.24).

25–28 The answer contains (again) the warning that Israel "abandoned the covenant of the LORD," though the answer is cast in the form of accomplished prediction. The people did abandon the covenant; they did go off and worship other gods. Therefore, the Lord's "furious anger" and "great wrath" uprooted them from their land and thrust them into another land.

29 The "secret" (GK 6259) or hidden things are at least the future experiences of Israel whether they are obedient or disobedient—experiences then hidden but eventually realized by future fulfillment. The hidden things of the future are known only to the Lord, but his people, nevertheless, have reason for great expectations allied with great responsibilities; they have the "things revealed" (GK 1655). These are within the area of their knowledge and that of their children forever, and for a definite, specific reason—that they should "follow all the words of this law." So God knows all things, and human knowledge in comparison is severely limited (cf. Isa 55:8–9).

B. Prosperity After the Return to the Lord (30:1–10)

1–3 Moses looked beyond the period when Israel had a time of blessing and after a subsequent time when Israel would be under the curse of the Lord while dispersed among the nations. It is not clear whether the destruction by a nation whose language they would not understand (28:36, 49) is the same experience as the scattering among the nations in 28:64; 29:22; and 30:1. Neither is it clear that there would be two basic dispersions, as later Scriptures and history have shown—one after the destruction of the kingdom(s) culminating in 586 B.C. and another after A.D. 70. When the people dispersed among the nations returned to the Lord in obedience to the covenant with all their heart and soul, then the Lord, in compassion, would restore their fortunes after regathering them.

4–8 The hypothetical particle translated "even if" is often used to make a very strong assertion (cf. Nu 22:18). So here from the most extreme distance, the Lord will regather his people. This future return will be occasioned by the resolve of their heart and will be characterized by their wholehearted love for him and by their obedience to his commands. The Lord's compassion makes possible the return from the most distant lands. That compassion not only returns the people to their land; it also rehabilitates them and makes them more prosperous and more numerous than their fathers.

The curses of disobedience will then fall on Israel's enemies, not on Israel herself. The Lord will circumcise the people's hearts so that they will love him with heart and soul. This work of God in the innermost being is characteristic of the spiritual nature of Deuteronomic revelation (6:5–6; 10:16; see comment on 10:14–16).

9–10 The initial promises that the Lord had been giving the Israelites as they were being prepared for entrance into Canaan will be renewed. They will be prosperous in everything they do. Fecundity will again mark their families, livestock, and crops (28:11). The Lord will again delight in his people; he will return to being pleased to make them prosper. This look into the future ends with a warning that prosperity will come only if the people return to the original demands of the covenant-treaty—obedience to the Book of the Law, i.e., total allegiance to the Lord their God.

C. The Covenant Offer of Life or Death (30:11–20)

11–14 Moses turned to the options for Israel as they stood by the Jordan facing the future in Canaan. He first set before them the availability of the resources for responding affirmatively to the commands he was giving them. The commands were neither too difficult nor beyond their reach. Their proximity and intimacy are illustrated by assertions and rhetorical questions. Even in these Moses emphasized the necessity of obedience. The positive assertion of the nearness of the revelation is even more specific: the word is in their mouth (i.e., they can repeat it) and in their heart (i.e., they can think it and understand and react to it). Obedience is possible!

15–20 Starkly clear, the Lord through Moses set the choice before his people: life and prosperity (for obedience) or death and destruction (for disobedience). The route of obedience is twofold. It requires one "to love [GK 170] the LORD" and "to walk [GK 2143] in his ways." As in a covenant-treaty, the "love" required is the committal in loyal devotion to the Lord. It relies on faith in his saving grace and walking "in his ways" (GK 2006), i.e., obeying his precepts. That will lead to life; it will increase the size of the nation and bring the Lord's blessing on them in the land. However, if the people turn their hearts away from the Lord, disobedient Israel will be destroyed. The nation separate from the Lord will not live long in the Promised Land.

After invoking both heaven and earth to witness that he has placed the options of life and death, blessings and curses, before Israel (4:26), Moses made his final appeal to his people. "Choose life!" (GK 1047 & 2644; see also comment on 32:44-47) he exhorted. Then they and their children will live; and they will love the Lord, listen to him, and hold fast to him. When they are committed wholly to him, he will give the nation many years in the land he promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

V. Concluding Narratives (31:1–34:12)

A. Charge to Joshua and Deposition of the Law (31:1–29)

1. Joshua to be leader (31:1–8)

1–2 Moses was 120 years old and unable to lead the people. This inability was not because his natural strength was gone (34:7) but because the time for Israel's entrance into Canaan had come. Moses' entrance was precluded by his arrogance at Meribah (Nu 20:24).

3–6 Though Moses himself was not to cross the Jordan, he encouraged the Israelites that the Lord himself would cross over ahead of them and that he would destroy the nations of the land as he had destroyed Sihon and Og. He exhorted them not to be afraid of the Canaanites. The Lord would not only go with them, he would never leave them nor forsake them. Moses would soon remind them, however, that this promise was contingent on their allegiance to him.

7–8 In the presence of "all Israel," Moses repeated to Joshua personally what he had just said to the people, adding that Joshua was to divide the land among the people. What land each would receive would be that family's inheritance. The exhortation "Be strong and courageous" given to Joshua and to the people by Moses at the end of his career is repeated by the Lord to Joshua after the death of Moses (Jos 1:6, 9) and also urged on Joshua by the people (Jos 1:18).

2. Recitation of the law at every seventh Feast of Tabernacles (31:9–13)

9 The time when Moses wrote down the law and what "law" is meant in each of the cases mentioned here cannot easily be determined. The "law" surely included all that was essential to the covenant-treaty documents referred to in Deuteronomy—and that includes historical, hortative, and legal elements, substantially all of Deuteronomy. The priests (designated as the sons of Levi) are also designated as those "who carried the ark of the covenant of the LORD," which was apropos especially to the wandering and residence in the desert.

10–13 The stated time for reading "this law" was at seven-year intervals, at the time of canceling debts (15:1; i.e., the sabbatical year). More specifically, it was to be during the Feast of Tabernacles of the sabbatical year, when all Israel was "to appear before the Lord at the place he [was to] choose" (i.e., where the tabernacle was placed).

Attendance at the feast was to be a joyous occasion for all (16:14). The law was to be read before all the people. The children were singled out for special mention because they did not know the law. This septennial reading does not obviate the teaching ministry of the home (6:1–9) or that of the priests (17:11; 24:8; Lev 10:11). It is meant, rather, to strengthen these other teaching procedures. It would also dramatize the learning of the law for those children and others who had not been reached by the other teaching procedures in home and tabernacle.

The reading of the law was to inspire the people to revere the Lord and to follow carefully all the covenant stipulations. That this process should go on "as long as you live in the land" is not to suggest that elsewhere knowledge of the Lord and his word was not necessary. Rather, the process of making known the revelation of God should never cease so that reverence for the Lord and obedience to his word would never cease.

3. Some last words on leadership transfer (31:14–23)

14–15 At the commissioning of Joshua, Moses and Joshua presented themselves before the Lord at the "Tent of Meeting"; and the Lord spoke of the future apostasy of Israel, not only to Moses, but in the hearing of Joshua as well. Thus Joshua too was warned to resist the tendency of the people to turn to foreign gods. The solemnity of the event is apparent in the description of the Lord appearing in the "pillar of cloud," with the cloud standing over the entrance to the tent.

16–18 After mentioning that Moses was soon to rest with his fathers, the Lord told him and Joshua that the people would soon prostitute themselves to the foreign gods of the land they were about to enter. Turning to Canaanite gods had its counterpart in forsaking the Lord and breaking the covenant-treaty. When the people forsook the Lord, he would forsake them in anger against their wickedness and would hide his face from them. This is the converse of making his face to shine on his people and turning his face toward them (Nu 6:25–26). Many disasters and difficulties would come on them; and they would wonder about the reason for the disasters, indicating that they knew that the disasters came because God was not with them.

19 In view of the apostasy to come, the Lord told Moses and Joshua to write down this song. "Teach it to the Israelites and have them sing it" implies sufficient repetition to fix it in the minds of the people. Only then would they be able to sing it, and only then would it be a witness to the Lord's admonition, not only to that generation, but to their descendants (v.21).

20–23 The apostasy was to come after the fulfillment of the promise made to the fathers concerning possession of the land flowing with milk and honey (Ex 3:8, 17; 13:5; et al.). Under affluence they would become apostate, turning to other gods, rejecting the Lord, and breaking the covenant-treaty. So when the disasters and difficulties come, the Song of Moses would testify against them.

Moses had shown his pessimistic view of Israelite allegiance to the Lord before. Here he reported that the Lord himself had the same expectation. The Lord said that he knew their disposition toward disobedience, which appeared even before they entered the Land of Promise. Therefore, this song was given and taught to the Israelites. The succession of Joshua, the writing down of the law, the prediction of the people's rebellion with its attendant results, and the Song of Moses are intertwined in ch. 31.

4. The deposition of the law book and its witness (31:24–29)

24–29 Moses finished writing the book from the beginning to the end, a statement not made before. The command of the Lord to write down the song was given so that it would be a witness against sinning Israel (v.19). The Book of the Law as a witness (cf. v.26) suggests that the Song of Moses is included in this completed book.

The procedure for making the song known to the people seems to have three steps: Moses wrote it down (vv.19, 22), then he spoke these words in the hearing of the elders and officials (v.28), and finally he recited them in the hearing of the whole assembly (v.30). The instruction that the Lord gave Moses indicates that initially Moses directly taught the song to the Israelites (vv.9, 22; 32:44–45). Whether the song was recited originally as a poem or sung as a song is not certain. Moses' last words are replete with warnings against apostasy, directed to all the Israelites (29:2, 16–28; 30:17–19; 31:30–32:47), to Joshua (vv.14–22), to the Levites (the priests) (vv.24–27), and to the elders and officials (vv.28–29).

The Book of the Law was to be placed beside the ark as a witness against the people, because the Lord knew how rebellious and stiff-necked the people were. The Lord had said to Moses (vv.14–18) that after his death the people would soon become apostate. Here Moses conveyed this pessimism in a more direct and personal way to the people by telling them that after he was gone they would be even more rebellious than when he was alive. His pessimism was well founded in experience and in predictive warnings from the Lord.

B. The Song of Moses (31:30–32:47)

After the call to listen (vv.1–2), the Lord is proclaimed and praised (vv.3–4). Then the people are chided for their reaction to the Lord (vv.5–6). This leads the speaker into a recital of the Lord's goodness to Israel (vv.7–14), Israel's response to that goodness (vv.15–18), his rejection of them (vv.19–20), and their estrangement and future punishment (vv.21–30) and that of their enemies (vv.31–35). The poem ends with the Lord's salvation for his people and his judgment on his (and their) enemies (vv.36–43).

1. Moses' recitation before the assembly (31:30)

30 The command to write down the song, to teach it to Israel, and to have them sing it (v.19) is said to have been obeyed (v.22). This is now made more explicit as an introduction to the song itself.

2. Literary introduction (32:1–2)

1–2 In his introduction Moses called heaven and earth to listen to what he was about to say (cf. Isa 1:2; 34:1; Mic 1:2; 6:1–2). Yet the message of the song is directed to the nation of Israel. The call to the heavens and the earth to listen is a poetic way of emphasizing the importance of the song's themes. All creation is a witness to the covenant-treaty between the Lord and Israel.

The remainder of the introduction expresses Moses' wish that his song would have a beneficent and pleasing reception and result. To this end he revealed his desire in four references to the beneficial results of water coming onto the land. Like rain, dew, showers, and abundant rain bringing fertility to the new grass and tender plants, Moses hoped that his words would prove pleasant and beneficial.

3. The theme: the proclamation of the Lord (32:3–4)

3 The song proper begins with the declaration that Moses proclaimed "the name" (GK 9005) of the Lord and called on others to ascribe greatness to him. Moses has proclaimed the name of the Lord throughout Deuteronomy. He has transmitted the third commandment and warned that such misuse of his name would bring punishment (5:11). The people were to make oaths only in the Lord's name (6:13; 10:20). The priests were to bless the people in the Lord's name (10:8; 21:5; cf. Nu 6:22–27); they were also to minister in the Lord's name always (18:5, 7). It is this name, the glorious and awesome name, that Moses called the people to revere (28:58). Basically, the name of the Lord signifies his person.

The most common reference to "the Name" (cf. 26:2) in Deuteronomy speaks of the place the Lord would choose as a dwelling for his Name (12:5, 11, 21; 14:23–24; 16:2, 6, 11). In these places the Name most significantly relates to his person, his being. Consequently, the NIV in these places capitalizes Name. This not only signifies that the Lord (YHWH, "Yahweh"; GK 3378; NIV "LORD") is God but that the he is the God of history, the God of the promises, the God who was fulfilling the covenant promises, the God whose people they were, under the covenant-treaty.

4 The metaphor "the Rock" (GK 7446) declares that the Lord is strong and stable, one who can be relied on. The following four parallel lines indicate how the Lord as "the Rock" stands in contrast to Israel who acted corruptly toward him (vv.5–6). The rest of the song suggests that the main "works" of the Lord are activities of creating, aiding, and guiding Israel. These "works are perfect, and all his ways are just" (cf. Ps 18:30). His character is marked by faithfulness; no wrongdoing exists in him.

4. The indictment of Israel (32:5–6)

5–6 The Lord's governing of his people is on the highest moral and ethical level, but in contrast the Israelites "have acted corruptly." While the Lord is always right in his handling of Israel, Israel has been wrong and devious in rejecting him. The idolatry of the golden calf illustrates this corruption that broke their relationship to the Lord so that they were "no longer his children." This condition of no longer being his children was to their shame and disgrace. The people are described further by two synonyms that speak of twisting and turning from the right path. Though the Lord is their Father (i.e, the progenitor and originator of the nation as well as the one who has matured and sustained them), the Israelites turned from him to idols and consequently lost their status of sonship.

5. Israel as God's inheritance (32:7–9)

7 The song calls on Israel to remember the past, to remember the divine acts of kindness. The people are urged to ask for information from their fathers and their elders (4:32; Job 8:8). They would "tell them" what had occurred. Then, supposing the people had asked for this explanation, the song proceeds to give it.

8–9 When speaking of God's allocating geographical areas for the nations, he is the "Most High" (GK 6610; used only here in Deuteronomy), which is in contrast to his name "LORD" (see comment on v.3) as the God of Israel. Most High is an elative form (cf. Ge 14:18–20, 22). That Canaan was Israel's inheritance by the Lord's decree, based on the promise to Abraham, is of major importance in the developing doctrine of the Lord's relationship to his people and his redemption for them and providence toward them. This inheritance was soon to be divided among the tribes. Thus ownership of landed property becomes a basic right of Israelite social structure and economy. And much more, ownership on the basis of inherent right describes the relationship of Israel to the Lord—and sometimes of the Lord to Israel. Israel is the Lord's "inheritance" (GK 5709).

However, not only did the Lord give Canaan to Israel, he also gave certain lands to other nations. The Lord rules over the disposition of land to all nations in the sovereign exercise of his will in every generation (ch. 2). The latter part of v.8 probably means that the boundaries of the nations were determined with the intent that Israel would have Canaan because her numbers could be supported in that area. The use of Jacob for Israel contributes to the poetic style of the song.

6. The Lord's early care of Israel (32:10–12)

10–11 In a bold, dramatic way it is said that Israel was found "in a desert land" and "a barren, howling waste." This is part of the moving description of how the Lord found Israel in a desolate and desperate plight in the Sinai Desert (cf. Jer 2:2; Hos 9:10). Moses focused on the people as an unorganized body in an inhospitable environment at the time God entered into the covenant-treaty with them. There the Lord "shielded" them by surrounding them with his protection, and he attentively thought of them and concerned himself with them.

The Lord exercised his loving care for Israel like an eagle caring for its young, especially as they are taught to fly. The eagle by stirring up the nest thrusts the eaglets out into the air to try their wings but does not leave them altogether on their own resources. The parent eagle catches the fluttering little ones on its outspread wings and again deposits them in the nest. Similarly, the Lord took Israel out from Egypt into the deserts of Sinai but did not leave them without his help. His widespread wings supported them throughout the learning years in Sinai.

12 The gods of the Egyptians, the desert tribes, and the Canaanites were multiple. Not so the Lord! He was alone as the leader and supporter of Israel.

7. The Lord's care of Israel in Canaan foreseen (32:13–14)

13 The Lord fed Israel with the finest foods, that which comes directly from God's natural provisions. Causing Israel to ride on the high places of the land pictures their advance and conquest of Canaan, which was known as a high, mountainous country. The song views Israel as fed and nourished with the fruit of the fields (food, produce), honey from the rock, and olive oil from the trees in the flinty crags. Bees in Canaan often built their combs between the rocks. Olive trees flourished and produced bountiful crops of olives in the unlikely limestone soil in rocky places.

14 The animals too contributed to this good life, with curds and milk and the meat of the best of lambs and goats. Curds might refer not only to the curds of cattle's milk but also to cream (Job 29:6) and butter (Pr 30:33). The fat of lambs describes the best of lambs, which is the meaning of "fattened lambs and goats." Bashan produced fine livestock, being noted for bulls and cows (Ps 22:12; Am 4:1) as well as rams. In addition the people were to have the "fat of the kidneys of the wheat"—i.e., the choicest, richest, or finest wheat—and fine wine of the blood of grapes (blood indicating the red grapes of Canaan).

8. Affluent Israel's rejection of God (32:15–18)

15 Israel's condition sets the stage for their sinfulness. After eating fine foods and drinking choice red wine, Israel the Righteous (see NIV note on Jeshurun) grew fat, i.e., became affluent and then, rather than being thankful, kicked! Where there should be thankfulness and obedience, there is open recalcitrance. The last half of v.15 and on through v.18 shows how Israel kicked: you grew fat (NIV, "filled with food"), you became heavy, you became obese ("sleek"). In this state Israel "abandoned," "rejected," "angered," "deserted," and "forgot" the Lord and "made him jealous." The God who had made Israel, who had fathered him and had given him birth, was maltreated in this way. Though he was called "God," "Rock," "Savior," "Creator" (see v.6), and Sustainer of the nation, they made him jealous with their foreign gods and angered him with their detestable idols.

16–18 The gods they turned to were "foreign," "detestable idols," "demons," "no gods," and, "worthless idols" (v.21). They were gods they had not before acknowledged. In contrast to the Lord who as Creator is the God of history and the God their fathers worshiped, these gods appeared recently and were gods their fathers had not feared (i.e., reverenced).

9. God's rejection of Israel (32:19–30)

19 The indictment of both sons and daughters for angering the Lord is unusual since it is common to include both sexes under the term "sons" (which could be "children"), as at the end of v.20. Perhaps this more sharply indicates the total participation of the people in worshiping other gods—the women being implicated as much as the men.

20 In his anger the Lord says, "I will hide my face [GK 7156] from them" (cf. 31:17–18). "I will . . . see what their end will be" does not suppose that the Lord did not know what would transpire. It is rather a declaration that he will see that those punishments do come. The two clauses—"I will hide my face from them" and "I will . . . see what their end will be"—are explicitly parallel. These two actions follow from the condition of the people—from their being a perverse generation, unfaithful children.

21 As the Lord has been roused to jealousy and anger by Israel's worship of worthless no-gods, so he will rouse Israel to jealousy, anger, and humiliation by foolish, vile nonpeople. No specific nation seems to be intended, and several nations have fitted the description and fulfilled the prediction.

22–23 The result of the Lord's anger is described as a world-embracing cataclysm of fire adversely affecting three entities: the realm of death, the earth and its harvests, and the very foundations of the mountains (Ps 18:7). The calamities of v.23 are those experiences that affect people adversely. These disasters will be heaped on Israel, and the Lord's arrows will be used up against his people.

24 This general description is followed by specific calamities: famine, pestilence, plague, attacks by wild animals and snakes, as well as warfare. Each calamitous situation is further defined by appropriate descriptive words—not only famine (or hunger), but "wasting" famine (probably from desiccation, having all one's flesh and energy sucked out by total lack of fluids and malnutrition); not only pestilence, but "consuming" pestilence. It is the fangs of the wild animals and the venom of vipers that will attack them.

25–27 Moreover, the sword (i.e., warfare) will reach Israel both "out in the streets" and "in their homes," allowing them no place of safety. All ages will succumb; those who remain will be scattered so that no one will remember them as a nation. This is the punishment the Lord said he would send on the Israelites for their disloyalty. However, because Israel's enemies might understand what was happening and attribute the devastation of Israel to their own prowess in warfare, there seems to be an unvoiced suggestion that this would in a measure stay God's hand. The Lord's compassion for his people in v.36 also affects the full application of his anger.

28–30 It seems best to interpret Israel as the subject of the poem in these verses. This section gives the reasons for the calamities described in the preceding section: the obtuse stupidity on the part of Israel and the wickedness on the part of their enemies. Israel's stupidity derives from its lack of sagacity or wisdom, i.e., "without sense." "No discernment" indicates that they could not discern what their end would be.

Because of their lack of wisdom, the people could not detect or understand their destiny. They did not believe what Moses had already told them and doubted that the Lord was the source of the miracles that brought them out of Egypt and through Sinai. In later years, however, for a long while the people had insufficient knowledge of the message of Deuteronomy to make a sound judgment, though they were never wholly without some revelation from the Lord.

The only answer to the rhetorical question of v.30, if any answer could be given, was, "There is no way one enemy warrior could chase a thousand Israelites if the Lord was on Israel's side." So when this happened, it was obvious that their Rock, whom they had abandoned, rejected, deserted, and forgotten, had now sold them (cf. Ge 37:36; 45:4–5) and "had given them up." Israel would experience this rejection repeatedly (see Jdg 2:14; 3:8; 4:2; 10:7).

10. The punishment of Israel's enemies (32:31–35)

31 The antecedent of "their" changes from Israel to the enemies of Israel. The pronoun "their" in v.30 is Israel; in v.31 it is their enemies. In v.30 "their Rock" is the Lord; in v.31 "their rock" is the enemies' god, and even the enemies concede that the Lord is superior to "their rock" (cf. Ex 14:25; Nu 23–24).

32–33 Under the figure of vines, grapes, and wine, the wickedness of Israel's enemies is described. Their vine (character) has its source in the vine of Sodom and Gomorrah—those wicked cities annihilated by the Lord (Ge 19:24–25). Their grapes were lethal, bitter, and venomous.

34–35 Once again the text of the song reverts to the first person, to the Lord speaking. He has kept in reserve the history of the acts of wicked nations against his people and has sealed this wicked history in his vaults. God's avenging wrath rests on his sense of righteousness. He will mete out righteous judgment whether in punishment or in defense. "I," God says, "will repay" (GK 8966; Ro 12:19 and Heb 10:30 interpret this as teaching that personal revenge against any wickedness is prohibited). The enemies may think that it was their decision and their strength that brought terrible punishment on the Lord's people (v.27), but that was not really so. They were only the instruments of God's punishment. But because they willfully and wickedly acted within the providence of God, their time of punishment would also come. It would come when the Lord's time for it had arrived, the time when their foot slips (cf. Pss 17:5; 38:16).

The time when God acts against the wicked is indicated as near and soon. Even though he is a God of patience, he nevertheless moves quickly to punish the wicked. "In due time" does not contradict "their day of disaster is near" or "their doom rushes upon them" but rather explains it. When their foot slips, disaster and doom rush in (Heb 2:3).

11. The Lord's compassion toward Israel and vengeance on the enemies (32:36–43)

36 "The Lord will judge his people" is not a declaration of punishment but expresses his vindication of them, having compassion on them and making atonement for both his land and his people (v.43; cf. Ge 30:6). (In the Hebrew, the first two lines of v.36 are quoted verbatim in Ps 135:14.) The Lord's vindication comes when his people have no more strength and, hyperbolically, no longer exist (actually, they would no longer exist as a nation). From the following verses "no strength" doubtless labels the gods that they had relied on as likewise utterly impotent. "Slave or free" conveys the sense that the nation is so decimated that all classes of people are destroyed.

37–38 The Lord asks his people, in this dreadful condition, where those gods they took refuge in are—those gods that they thought were a rock and they worshiped. The fat of sacrifices and wine of drink offerings should have been offered to the Lord instead of to gods that could not help them. In irony, the Lord suggests that those gods should arise and help them and give them shelter.

39 The Lord speaks of himself as the only true God who controls all life and history. This section of the song (vv.39–42) begins with a personal assertion. "See now" (GK 8011) suggests strong feeling on God's part; the word here means "understand." What was Israel to understand? That the Lord is God! This statement is made the more emphatic by the repetition of the first person pronoun, "I, even I" and the simple but profound assertion, "I am he"—an assertion of the reality and uniqueness of the Lord as God. This reality is seen in what he does: he puts to death at his will and he gives life—a reference to his creative power and his power to rescue from death. The Lord stated that he was the one who had wounded Israel and that he would also heal his people. Moreover, no one would be able to rescue Israel's enemies from his "hand" (i.e., power; see Job 10:7; Isa 43:13; Hos 5:14).

40 In a strong anthropomorphism the Lord applied to himself the taking of an oath by raising the hand toward heaven (Ge 14:22; Ex 6:8; Nu 14:30) and declaring, "As the LORD lives, I will" (cf. Jdg 8:19; 1Sa 14:39; et al.). The traditional oath formula is adjusted to the occasion by the Lord himself declaring, "As surely as I live forever" (cf. Nu 14:21, 28; Isa 49:18; Jer 22:24; Eze 5:11; et al.).

41–42 What the Lord declared as he used this strong figure must be taken as a statement of absolute certainty and received with the greatest seriousness. The Lord presented himself as a warrior, and the dramatic portrayal represented the terrible punishment to be meted out to his enemies. When he grasps his sharpened, flashing sword, it devours flesh, the heads of the enemy leaders; and he makes his arrows drunk with the blood, not only of those slain, but of the captives as well—signifying that no one will escape. The arrows that were before spent against Israel (v.23) now are turned on his enemies with devastating effect. None can withstand the Lord.

43 The song ends with a call to the nations to rejoice with Israel because the Lord will punish his enemies for what they have done against his land and his people.

12. Moses' presentation of the song and his exhortation to obey the law (32:44–47)

44–47 The narrative about the Song of Moses comes to its conclusion here, which repeats 31:30 with an additional admonition to the people to command their children to obey "all the words of this law." In 31:30 Moses is said to have recited "the words of this song." In 32:44 Moses, with Joshua son of Nun, spoke "all the words of this song." In v.45 Moses finished his recitation. It is evident that Joshua had been with Moses, since, at the command of the Lord, Moses had called Joshua and the two of them had presented themselves before the Lord at the Tent of Meeting for Joshua's commissioning. Moses' spiritual emphasis again appears in his admonition that the people "take to heart" all that he had said.

Previously Moses had said that the Lord was the people's life (see comment on 30:20); here he said that "all the words I have solemnly declared to you," "all the words of this law," are their "life." These words were not to be taken lightly. The Lord their God was their life, and his words were their life. Commitment to the Lord and to his word would ensure a long national life for Israel in the Promised Land.

C. Directives for Moses' Death (32:48–52)

48–50 There was no lapse of time. On the very same day that the song was recited, the Lord's directives regarding Moses were received. The Lord commanded him to ascend Mount Nebo, look over the land, and then die there (see also Nu 27:12–14, which has some slight variations). Mount Nebo is in the Abarim Mountains, a range running in a general north and south direction about ten miles east of the most northern part of the Dead Sea. It is 2,631 feet above sea level. From Nebo Moses could see Canaan in the north, on the west the mountains of Judea, and toward the south as far as the area south of the Dead Sea (Zoar). On Nebo Moses was to die "and be gathered to" his people (an idiom for death; see Ge 25:8, 17; 35:29; et al.), as Aaron had died on Mount Hor (Nu 20:22–29; 33:37–39).

51–52 The reason for the prohibition against Moses' entrance into the Promised Land is more explicit here than in Nu 20:24, where it is simply stated that he and Aaron had rebelled against the Lord at Meribah. Here it is said that they "broke faith" with the Lord in Israel's presence and "did not uphold my holiness among the Israelites." Instead of speaking to the rock, they called the people rebels and struck the rock twice. The Lord denounced this action on the spot as a failure to trust him enough to honor him as holy.

Thus, they were not permitted to bring Israel into the land (Nu 20:7–12; Ps 106:32–33), though Moses was to see the land "from a distance."

D. The Blessing of Moses on the Tribes (33:1–29)

1. Introduction (33:1–5)

1 The blessings that Moses pronounced on the tribes is placed after his Song and between God's directives to him regarding his death and the actual narrative of that death. This chapter presents these blessings as recorded by someone other than Moses. While Moses speaking or writing of himself in the third person is common in the Pentateuch, this chapter has every appearance of being reported by someone else. Very fittingly Moses is called "the man of God." Never before in the Pentateuch had this designation been used. The second occurrence of this phrase also refers to Moses (Jos 14:6).

2 The encomium to the Lord begins with the theophany at Sinai. Deuteronomy usually speaks of Horeb as the mountain of the giving of the law, but here it is Sinai. The coming of the Lord on Mount Sinai was like the sun flooding the desert area bounded by Sinai, Seir, and Paran. The locations are not certain. The figure could be taken from the surrounding mountains and metaphorically related to the giving of the law on Mount Sinai with its thunder, lightning, earthquake, and darkness. In these meteorological elements the Lord is presented as the brightness of light. The Lord came not only as the light-giving sun but from the tens of thousands of his holy ones, that is, from heaven—or with myriads of his angels. The last line is especially difficult. The NIV interprets the Hebrew "from his right hand" as geographic, meaning "from the south" (cf. 1Sa 23:19, 24; Ps 89:12; et al.).

3–4 The encomium moves on to state the Lord's love toward his people and their worshipful response to his instruction. It is the Lord, not some other god, who loves his people, "the holy ones" that are in his hand—a hand that both controls and supports them. At his feet they bow down and worship, and at his feet they receive the law that Moses gave them—the law that was their possession. Moses spoke of himself in the third person in v.4, a fairly common practice in this kind of literature.

5 In praise of the Lord, his kingship at the assembly at Sinai is declared—his kingship over Jeshurun, Israel the Righteous. The Lord's kingship assumes supreme importance in the Mosaic economy. Without a hereditary monarchy or any other means than direct revelatory selection by the Lord, the Israelites had no way of recognizing a leader with the exception of the leadership invested in the high priest—a leadership that did not cover the power and responsibilities of Moses. Succession to Moses was established charismatically by the Lord's choice of Joshua, but no evidence exists that the Lord revealed to Joshua who was to be his successor.

2. Reuben (33:6)

6 The order of the tribes in the blessings is not the order of the patriarchal blessings of Jacob, nor the order of birth of the tribal fathers, nor the order of their encampments, nor the order of either list in the census narratives in Numbers, nor the order of their tribal allotments in Transjordan and Canaan. For various reasons—some known and some unknown—all these differ from one another.

As in Jacob's blessings, Reuben, the eldest, is mentioned first, though he had lost his birthright because of fornication with Bilhah, his father's concubine (Ge 35:22; 49:4). Then comes Judah, who had been given the birthright, then the other sons of Jacob and his wives (Leah and Rachel), and finally the sons of Jacob with the handmaids. Simeon is not mentioned; for the most part the Simeonites found their future together with Judah and never realized a tribal patrimony except for certain cities in Judah (Jos 19:1–9). At least some of the Simeonites, however, did continue their tribal identity (see 1Ch 4:24–43). Though the tribe of Reuben lost its preeminent position, it was not to die but continued to live, though reduced numerically.

3. Judah (33:7)

7 As with Reuben, the blessing of Moses for Judah comes as a prayer couched in very general expressions. The cry of Judah, the defense by his own hands, and the plea for the Lord's help all suggest a military situation. The hand of Judah, according to Jacob's blessing, was to be on the neck of his enemies, and for this victory his brothers would praise him. The prayer of Moses that Judah should be brought to his people may relate to his victorious return to his people from battle.

4. Levi (33:8–11)

8–10 In Jacob's blessing, Simeon and Levi are considered together. In Moses' blessing, however, the status of Levi has changed remarkably because of the choice of Levi as the priestly tribe, the only appointment that gives every person in the tribe a special position in Israel. Not only all the men, but the women and the children too become beneficiaries of the support generated by the tithes and other emoluments. But the blessing of Moses speaks of Levi's status of caretaker, teacher, and revealer of the covenant and will of God, and of bearing the priestly responsibility of offering the sacrifices of the ritual system, representing the people before the Lord and the Lord and his revelation to the people. Not only did the Levites have charge of the physical, inscripturated word placed beside the ark of the covenant and of the Thummim and Urim, but they were also to teach that word to the people at regular intervals (Lev 10:11; Dt 31:9–13). The one that the Thummim and Urim belonged to is called the godly man or "the man [God] favored."

The strife that arose at Massah and Meribah over water points out the difficulties that Moses, Aaron, the leaders of Israel, and the leaders of the tribe of Levi suffered on the journey from Egypt to Moab. The special devotion of Levi to the Lord is said to be portrayed by the action of the Levites in purging the community of sin by killing many of their own relatives after they had worshiped the golden calf (Ex 32:26–29). Because of the Levites' loyalty to the Lord on that occasion, they were set apart to him as the priestly tribe (Ex 32:29; Dt 10:8) Offering incense and whole offerings to the Lord are together descriptions of the entire sacrificial system.

11 Moses concluded his blessing on Levi with a prayer that Levi's use of his skills may be blessed with accomplishments that result in the Lord's being pleased with him. Moses also prayed that the power of Levi's enemies would be destroyed--never to rise again.

5. Benjamin (33:12)

12 The blessing for Benjamin has a tenderness that differs markedly from the description of the Benjamites in Jacob's last words (Ge 49:27). Moses asked that Benjamin as the one loved of the Lord and shielded continually by him would have a secure rest between the Lord's shoulders, as a father might carry a son—a figure already used to describe how the Lord carried the Israelites all through the desert journeys (1:31). "The one the LORD loves" is a repetition of "the beloved of the LORD," a device to signify the subject of the last line.

6. Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh) (33:13–17)

13–16a When Jacob blessed his sons just prior to his death, he included Joseph rather than Ephraim and Manasseh, even though he had placed his blessing on them and had made a particular point of indicating that these two sons of Joseph were to be reckoned as his (Ge 48:5–20; 49:22–26). Moses also blessed Joseph, but he mentioned the two tribes at the end of his statement about Joseph (v.17).

The blessing desired for Joseph is expressed in considerable poetic beauty. The words "precious," "best," "finest," "fruitfulness," and "best gifts" are all from the same Hebrew word (GK 4458). This blessing would be achieved by the application of the precious things from heaven and from under the earth—the dew, the springs, and the rivers. The "ancient mountains" and "the everlasting hills" exemplify the land of the Joseph tribes across the middle of Canaan. The fertility of the land would cover the mountains with eternal productivity.

All this is summed up in v.16a—"with the best gifts of the earth"—with the further explanation that this productivity would be in all fullness possible (the same phrase as occurs in 1Ch 16:32; Pss 24:1; 50:12). The Lord, the one who presented himself to Moses in the burning bush, is the one who will favor Joseph with this blessing of abundance (see Ex 3).

16b–17 The remainder of the Joseph blessing describes the character and prowess of these two tribes. The blessing is to rest as a crown on the head and brow of Joseph, "the prince among his brothers." The reference to the majesty of the firstborn bull links v.17 with Joseph being prince among his brothers. And the end of v.17 explicitly says that the goring of the nations by the one metaphorically called the firstborn bull and wild ox refers to both Ephraim and Manasseh. Contrary to the usual poetic usage of citing thousands before ten thousands (1Sa 18:7), the ten thousands of Ephraim are mentioned before the thousands of Manasseh. So it is obvious that Moses recognized the superiority of Ephraim, though Joseph, not Ephraim, is the firstborn bull.

Manasseh was really the firstborn son, but here this prominence has become Ephraim's later prominence. Ephraim became the dominant tribe in the northern kingdom and was often militarily the more powerful kingdom in Canaan in the ninth, eighth, and seventh centuries B.C. The extent of the military victories of Joseph, however, should best be taken as poetic hyperbole, signifying the greater relative strength and prowess predicated of the Joseph tribes.

7. Zebulun and Issachar (33:18–19)

18 Zebulun and Issachar, the last two sons of Leah, are mentioned together, the younger being placed first. The poetic parallelistic structure of the first two lines is to be understood as a play on the fairly common expression of one's daily activity as "going out and coming in," with "in your tents" being equivalent to "coming in." So then the sense is "Rejoice, Zebulun, and you, Issachar, in all your activities."

19 These tribes together were to "summon peoples to the mountain" and "there offer sacrifices of righteousness." "Mountain" may simply designate a place of sacrifice and worship. The "peoples" would certainly include other Israelites but may not be limited to them. Their sacrifices would be those Moses had given to them. No other sacrifices could be called righteous, nor could righteous acts by themselves apart from the sacrificial system be considered as sacrifices at this time.

These two tribes were to feast on "the abundance of the seas" and "the treasures hidden in the sand." The boundaries of Zebulun and Issachar as allotted by Joshua did not give either Zebulun or Issachar access to the Mediterranean; but Moses is in harmony with the vision of Jacob, who saw Zebulun living by the seashore, a haven for ships, with his border extending toward Sidon (Ge 49:13). The influence of the tribes and the actual boundaries did not always remain where the original allotment placed them. Since sand is almost invariably the sand of the sea, that is, the seashore, it is likely that the two phrases are in synonymous parallelism referring to the same source of riches—maritime wealth.

8. Gad (33:20–21)

20 The blessing on Gad focuses first on the Lord himself, who enlarges Gad's territory by giving the tribe what it requested after the conquest of the area east of the Jordan, which had been under the Amorite rulers Sihon and Og (Nu 21:21–35; 32:33; Dt 3:1–20; 29:7–8). Gad was known as warlike and aggressive. The tribe was able to hold onto the territory and to keep its tribal identification on the east of Jordan until it succumbed to Tiglath-pileser in the latter part of the eighth century B.C. (1Ch 5:23–26). This warlike character is portrayed as a lion that tears an arm and even the head of its prey. Jacob too saw Gad attacking its enemies (Ge 49:19), and 1 Chronicles describes some Gadites as having faces of lions (12:8), the least of which "was a match for a hundred, and the greatest for a thousand" (1Ch 12:14).

21 Gad chose the best of the land, or the leader's part. Moreover, Gad was to fulfill the Lord's righteous will that the assembly of Israel had required of Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, that is, their cooperation in subduing the peoples of Canaan before they returned east of Jordan (Nu 32:1–33; Dt 3:18–20; Jos 1:12–18; 22:1–8).

9. Dan (33:22)

22 The blessing on Dan is a metaphor describing at least the inherent, ravenous character of a lion's cub that springs on its prey. Jacob had likened Dan to a serpent, a viper. The reference to Bashan is not to Dan directly but to the lions of Bashan, an area somewhat removed from the area around Laish that was later occupied by Dan. Moses saw the Danite tribe leaping out of ambush like a ravenous lion to secure its prey.

10. Naphtali (33:23)

23 As with Dan, little is said of Naphtali; but what is said of Naphtali is approval. Naphtali will have the Lord's favor in abundance and will be full of blessing—blessing that will be his because of the excellent and fertile land the tribe will inherit. His land will extend from the north of Galilee to the area west and south of the lake.

11. Asher (33:24–25)

24–25 Asher, declared to be a most blessed of sons, is to be favored above his brothers. Bathing his feet in olive oil (probably mixed with fragrant unguents) and having a secure residence behind gates bolted with iron and bronze bars, the tribe of Asher will grow in strength as its days increase in number.

12. Peroration of God and Israel, his people (33:26–29)

26 Moses' final blessing returns to Israel as a whole—commencing with praise to the Lord as the God of Jeshurun (cf. v.5). The God of Jeshurun has a unique greatness—he rides on the heavens and on the clouds in his majesty to help his people (see also Pss 18:9; 68:33; Isa 19:1).

27–28 The "eternal God" was the God of their fathers. In many places Moses emphasized that he was sent by the God of their fathers. The Lord is the God who is the Creator of all things, the God of history, and the God of the promises to the patriarchs. The Lord was the dwelling of his people, and his everlasting arms were beneath them to keep them from harm, discouragement, and failure. They would not be left to rely on only their own strength. The Lord was to drive out the enemy before them with the command "Destroy!"

The promise that God would go before Israel to conquer the land has always in it the participation of the people in obedience to the Lord's commands, but that participation is always to be understood as effective only as the Lord works with them and through them. The result will be victory that will leave Israel as a secure nation living in "safety," relying on the Lord, who would give them victory and would sustain them.

Israel, Jacob's spring (i.e., the descendants that flowed from Jacob), would live safely and securely in the land whose supply of grain and wine was symbolic of rich productivity and where the dew of heaven, representative of sufficient precipitation, would nourish their crops.

29 The blessing of Moses on the tribes ends with an exclamation, a rhetorical question, and a twofold affirmation of the Lord's strength and help and of Israel's triumph over her enemies. The exclamation "Blessed are you, O Israel!" comes as a fitting climax. The rhetorical question reinforces the exclamation by its obvious answer: No other nation was like Israel, the nation saved by the Lord. And the affirmation that follows reinforces the thrust of both the exclamation and the question.

As shield and helper, the Lord would defend the Israelites; as their sword of majesty or glory, he would give them victory over their enemies, thus indicating their superiority. The enemies will present themselves as vanquished in battle and consequently as inferior to their conquerors. Israel would be victorious over the enemies they would face on the other side of the Jordan.

E. The Death of Moses and the Succession of Joshua (34:1–12)

1–4 Before he died, Moses climbed from the plains of Moab up to the top of the Pisgah range, to the top of Mount Nebo, and from there the Lord showed him the whole land. The description indicates the area one would see from Nebo when looking first northward (from Gilead to Dan), turning his gaze northwest (all of Naphtali; the territory of Ephraim and Manasseh), and west (all the land of Judah as far as the western sea), and then looking southward (the Negev and the whole region from the Valley of Jericho, the City of Palms, as far as Zoar).

As Moses viewed Canaan from Nebo, the Lord told him that this was the land he had promised to Abraham's descendants (see Ge 12:7; 13:14–17; 15:18; 17:8; 26:3; 28:4, 13). The Lord let Moses see the land with his eyes, but he did not permit him to cross over the Jordan into it. At 120 years of age, Moses looked out with eyes that "were not weak" (v.7), and—though he was still vigorous—his mission came to an end. What drama! What pathos! What sense of accomplishment mixed with disappointment must have been in Moses' mind as he looked over the land the Lord had promised to Israel!

5–8 The "servant of the LORD" died and was buried in an unknown way, in an unknown grave, in the valley facing Beth Peor, where the Israelites were encamped (3:29). The thirty-day mourning for Moses conformed to the mourning period for Aaron (Nu 20:29).

9 Before the writer closed his remarks about Moses with a final eulogy, he mentioned Joshua the successor as one whose ability to lead rested on his ordination by Moses, an ordination that filled him with the spirit of wisdom. So Israel listened to (i.e., obeyed) Joshua—doing what the Lord had commanded them to do through Moses.

10–12 Deuteronomy closes eulogizing Moses as the greatest of all prophets, the one whom the Lord knew intimately, and the greatest miracle-worker. The acts of the Lord through Moses are said to be miraculous signs, wonders, and awesome deeds performed with mighty power (the terms used here are common in the narratives of Exodus and the desert journeys (see Ex 7:3; Nu 14:11, 22; Dt 4:34; 6:22; etc). These were done before Pharaoh, his officials, his people, and in the sight of all Israel. These were done to accomplish the task the Lord had called Moses to do in Egypt and on the journey to Canaan.

Not until the Lord Jesus Christ came (the one whom Moses spoke about, Jn 5:46) was there anyone greater than Moses, the emancipator, prophet, lawgiver, and father of his country.

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

The Pentateuch provides the background both historically and theologically for the book of Joshua. The call of Abraham was God's initial response to the predicament of humankind as portrayed in Ge 1–11. God was preparing a people through whom the Messiah would come. As part of that preparation, he promised to give them a land of their own (Ge 12:7; 13:14–17; 15:7; et al.). The fulfillment of that promise is the primary focus of the book of Joshua. The author has gone to great lengths to demonstrate that the work of Moses and the work of Joshua are related to each other as preparation and fulfillment.

The book of Joshua is closely related to the book of Deuteronomy; even the language is similar. Deuteronomy seeks to prepare Israel for entry into the Promised Land; Joshua describes that entry. In other words, in Exodus, Moses was called by God to mold the people into a mighty nation and to lead them out of slavery. The central feature of his leadership was the mediation of the law as the guide for Israel. Now Joshua has been appointed as Moses' successor. Like Moses, his position involved him as the religious, military, social, and civil leader. He had been prepared for the various aspects of this role during the forty years that Israel was in the desert (see Ex 17:8–16; 24:12–13; Nu 13:1–25; 32:28–29; Dt 31:1–8).

The date of the Conquest continues to be debated. The traditional date (c. 1400 B.C.) is based on 1Ki 6:1, which specifies that the fourth year of Solomon's reign was the "four hundred and eightieth year" after the Exodus. It is fairly well established that the fourth year of Solomon's reign was around 966 B.C. This would put the Exodus at about 1446 B.C. and the Conquest forty years later. These figures appear to be corroborated also by the total number of years that the various judges ruled. Other evangelical scholars, however, argue for the thirteenth century B.C., based on the Rameses of Ex 1:11 being the city named for Rameses II (who lived around 1290 B.C.). They argue that the 480 years in 1Ki 6:1 represent twelve generations (12 generations times 40 years in a traditional generation); if an actual generation is closer to twenty-five years, then the number of years before Solomon's reign was 300, making the Exodus in 1260 B.C. and the Conquest in 1220.

2. Authorship

In the Talmud Joshua is named as the author of the book of Joshua. This view is appealing because the book bears his name. Furthermore, it lends more credibility to the narratives if they are the report of an eyewitness. Those who hold this view attribute to Eleazer or Phinehas the account of the death of Joshua and other short passages that Joshua could not have written. The book itself does not specify who the author was, nor is the author named anywhere else in the OT.

The name of the book is derived from the principal character, Joshua, whose name means either "Save, Yahweh!" or "Yahweh saves" (see comment on 3:13). It is an appropriate name for the man the Lord chose to lead his people triumphantly into the Promised Land. The Grecized form of Joshua is "Jesus."

3. Date

If Joshua was the author, then the date of writing the book is a fairly simple matter: it must have been written before his death and after the last event narrated in the book. Joshua was 110 years old when he died (24:29). If Joshua was nearly the same age as Caleb, then his death and the writing of the book would have taken place about thirty years after the Conquest began. This would have been around 1370 B.C. according to the earlier dating. Other evidence, however, suggests a later date.

The phrase "to this day," which occurs frequently (4:9; 5:9; 6:25; et al.), indicates the passing of time between the event and the recording of the event. In 6:25 the statement that Rahab "lives among the Israelites to this day" suggests that Rahab was still living at the time of writing, but it probably refers to her descendants.

4. Occasion and Purpose

Apparently the author had two complementary purposes in writing: (1) to show that God had been faithful in fulfilling his promise to Abraham to give the land of Canaan to him and to his descendants; (2) to demonstrate that the covenant-keeping God is also righteous and that he would bless his covenant people only if they were obedient to his word.

5. Theological Values

The book of Joshua, like all other books of the Bible, is primarily a book of theology. Through it God has revealed himself in various aspects: (1) God is the God of Israel. In giving Israel the land, he was fulfilling the promises that he made to Abraham and which he reaffirmed to the people of Israel at the time of the Exodus. Thus he entered into covenant with some human beings, but not all. Here we see elements of a doctrine of election.

(2) God is holy. He does not tolerate wickedness and rebellion. The Canaanites are driven out because of their sin and wickedness; God treats the Israelites according to the same principle (cf. ch. 7; cf. also Dt 28–29).

(3) God is gracious. All who are willing to turn from their pagan ways and acknowledge him are spared (e.g., Rahab, the Gibeonites).

(4) God is the God of creation. All creation is subject to his sovereign control, and he therefore can work mighty miracles in nature (such as those recorded in this book: 3; 6; 10:9–14; et al.).

(5) God is a God of the entire universe. He can choose to accept into his people the prostitute Rahab upon her testimony of his universal reign (2:11). The land is his, and he can give it to whomever he chooses.

(6) God is a man of war. He fought for Israel by commanding the attack, providing the strategy, assisting with supernatural acts, and giving the victory to Joshua.

6. Special Problems

The single greatest problem in the book of Joshua is the extermination of the Canaanites. Men, women, and children were included among the things that were to be "devoted [GK 3051] to the LORD" (6:17; cf. NIV note). This was not the first instance of the practice in Israel. In Nu 21:2–3, the Israelites vowed to "totally destroy" the cities of the Canaanites in the Negev if God would give Israel victory over them. But how can we justify this seeming mass slaughter of humanity?

God was careful to point out that he was not arbitrarily destroying the Canaanites just to give the land to Israel. The wickedness of the Canaanites was the reason God was removing them; and if Israel proved unfaithful, she too would be removed from the land (as happened in the Exile; cf. Ge 15:16; 2Pe 2:9).

The extermination of the Canaanites is but one of the many evidences in the Bible that evil is real and that the Devil exists. That struggle actually took the Son of God to the cross, and only by his suffering and death has God overcome evil once and for all. Those who choose not to be separated from their sin by repentance will be destroyed with their sin (cf. Jn 8:24). Thus God's severity in his treatment of sin and of sinners is but the obverse side of his grace and love. Sin and evil destroy the people he loves and prevent the full establishment of his glorious kingdom. In the Wisdom of Solomon it is stated that God chose to annihilate the Canaanites little by little rather than all at once in order to give them a chance to repent.

The most difficult thing to understand is the slaughter of innocent children. But we must remember that death is not the ultimate destiny of the human race, nor is it the greatest evil. Someday God will give a full explanation of his actions, which is something that only he can do.

EXPOSITION

I. Conquering the Promised Land (1:1–12:24)

A. A New Leader for Israel (1:1–18)

1. Joshua's commission (1:1–9)

1 Moses' death separates the book of Joshua from the Pentateuch, for, obviously, Moses' leadership had ended. However, everything Joshua accomplishes is the fulfillment of what God had begun with Moses. Observe the many links between Moses and Joshua in this chapter alone (vv.1, 3, 5, 7–8, 13–15, 17).

"Servant [GK 6269] of the LORD" is a title of honor used most frequently of Moses (Ex 14:31; Nu 12:7–8; Dt 34:5; and 13 times in Joshua). With the words "The LORD said to Joshua," leadership is transferred from Moses to Joshua. Joshua is called the "son of Nun" ten times in this book, but nothing is known about his father. Already in the Pentateuch Joshua was called "Moses' aide" (Ex 24:13; 33:11; Nu 11:28). Only at the end of his life was he too honored with the title "servant of the LORD" (24:29).

2–3 Moses' death was the occasion for God to renew his command for Israel to enter the land. The crossing of the Jordan marked Israel's entrance into the Promised Land. Flood conditions made this a formidable undertaking. The promise of the land, which was first given to Abraham in Ge 12:7, is a major theme throughout patriarchal history. The fulfillment of that promise is one of the major themes in Joshua.

4 The promise in Dt 11:24 (cf. Dt 1:6–8) is reiterated here, although the territory that Joshua and Israel actually conquered was not nearly so vast. The literal and complete fulfillment of this promise was not experienced by Israel until the reigns of David and Solomon (see 1Ki 4:21, 24) and then once again in the time of Uzziah and Jeroboam II. The word "desert" refers to the Negev in the south, and "Lebanon" (lit., "the Lebanon") refers to the Lebanese mountains. Palestine was referred to as "the Hittite country" by both Egypt and Babylonia even after the Hittites had withdrawn from the area (cf. Jdg 1:26). "The Great Sea" is the Mediterranean.

5 Israel's failure to observe the conditions for the promise, "No one will be able to stand up against you" (vv.6–9), caused their humiliating defeat at Ai (7:1–5). God's promise, "I will be with you" (cf. Dt 31:6–8), was the secret of Moses' success and would be the secret of Joshua's success also (cf. Mt 28:19–20). The conditions for this promise are found in vv.7–8 (cf. 7:12). The statement "I will never leave you nor forsake you" is an example of the doubling of synonyms for emphasis, a common feature in this chapter (cf. vv.7–9, 18).

6 The command to be "strong [GK 2616] and courageous [GK 599]" is repeated three times in God's charge to Joshua (vv.6–9) and again in the people's reply to Joshua (v.18). Perhaps Joshua was intimidated by the greatness of his predecessor Moses and the awesomeness of his own responsibility. For this reason courage is emphasized in the Lord's charge to him. This passage introduces the two major parts of the book: the conquest of the land (chs. 1–12) and the division of the land (chs. 13–21).

7 "The law my servant Moses gave you" was probably some part or all of the book of Deuteronomy (cf. Dt 1:5; 31:9–13). The many parallels that the book of Joshua has with Deuteronomy show that the author of Joshua was familiar with the latter's contents. The covenant relationship between Israel and God was contingent on Israel's obedience to the law. The expression "to the right or to the left" shows that no deviation would be permitted.

8–9 Verse 8 is the theme verse of Joshua. The phrase "from your mouth" refers to the custom of muttering while studying or reflecting. "Meditate" (GK 2047) literally means "mutter." When people continually mutter God's word to themselves, they are constantly thinking about it. But knowledge of God's law is not enough; one must also "be careful to do" what it commands. "Everything written in it" must be observed, because obedience to certain parts only is no obedience at all (cf. Jas 2:8–13).

2. Joshua's orders to the officers (1:10–11)

10–11 Joshua had a well-organized chain of command by which orders could quickly be passed to the people. The supplies would have included the manna that God continued to provide until Israel crossed into the land of Canaan (5:12). Each man was responsible for his own supplies since there was no regular quartermaster's corps. Once the Israelites were in the land, they found a ready food supply standing in the fields, for the invasion was begun during the harvest season (3:15). "Three days" simply means "the day after tomorrow" or "in a few days" (2:16, 22; 3:2; 9:16).

3. Joshua's orders to the Transjordanian tribes (1:12–15)

12 Throughout the book special attention is given to "the Reubenites, the Gadites and the half-tribe of Manasseh" (4:12–13; 13:8–32; 22:1–34). Although their territory was included in the larger boundaries promised to Israel (1:3–4), the narrative at times seems to place the two and one-half tribes outside the Promised Land (cf. 22:19).

13–15 Moses' command referred to here is recorded in Dt 3:18–20 (cf. Nu 32:20–22). "Rest" (GK 5663) implies secure borders and peace; it is an important concept in the OT (cf. Ru 1:9; 3:1 NIV note; Heb 4:1–11).

The phrase "all your fighting men" presents some difficulty, for Nu 26:7, 18, 34 indicates that these tribes had as many as 110,000 men capable of bearing arms. Yet Jos 4:13 states that only 40,000 warriors from the two and one-half tribes entered Canaan. Perhaps only the ablest fighting men participated in the Conquest while the others cared for the women, children, elderly, and domestic animals (cf. 22:8). For the return of these tribes to their own land, see 22:1–4. The account of Moses' assigning Transjordan as their inheritance is in Nu 32.

4. Joshua confirmed as leader (1:16–18)

16–18 This paragraph apparently deals with all Israel, not just the Transjordanian tribes. The people pledged to Joshua the same allegiance that they had shown Moses. The words "may the LORD your God be with you" seem to be a condition for their allegiance rather than a prayer, as if they were saying: "We will follow your leading so long as there is evidence that you are being led by God." The severity of the punishment threatened in v.18 was in keeping with the military situation where strict discipline was required. This punishment was actually carried out in the case of Achan (ch. 7).

B. Gaining a Foothold: Jericho and Ai (2:1–8:35)

1. Rahab and the spies (2:1–24)

a. Sending the spies (2:1–7)

1 Joshua was determined to keep the spy mission secret from the Israelites, perhaps because a negative report (cf. Nu 13–14) might again demoralize the people. The sending of spies was not an act of unbelief, for the promise of divine aid never rules out human responsibility. Apparently Joshua sent spies before every major battle (cf. 7:2). The words "especially Jericho" indicate that this espionage mission was focused on Jericho, a formidable fortress guarding the pass leading westward. Jericho was particularly important as the scene of Israel's first military engagement in the Promised Land.

The house of the prostitute Rahab was the only place where the men could stay with any hope of remaining undetected and where they would be able to gather the information they were seeking. Moreover, her house afforded an easy way of escape since it was located on the city wall (v.15).

2–3 For the most part the towns of Palestine were independent city-states, and their rulers were called kings. The spies had failed in their attempt to remain undetected. The report that "some of the Israelites have come" was the worst news conceivable, for the citizens of Jericho were in terror of the Israelites (see vv.9–11; cf. Ex 15:15c). The word "tonight" must refer to late afternoon, because the spies would not have been able to enter the city after dark. The king would naturally have assumed that the spies were staying with Rahab. In antiquity prostitutes frequently were involved in intelligence activities. The king expected Rahab to do her patriotic duty and turn the spies in.

4–5 Rahab lied as much in what she did by hiding the spies as in what she said. Deception is an important strategy in warfare. By hiding the spies, Rahab was siding with Israel against her own people. It was an act of treason! Rahab told the king's men to "go after them quickly," making it clear that if they tarried, the spies would escape. She could not risk having her house searched, because she knew that anyone suspected of collaborating with the spies would be put to death.

6–7 The flat-roofed houses of that era were suitable for drying grain or stalks. Rahab used her flax stalks to good advantage. The road mentioned here led from Jerusalem to Jericho and then eastward across the Jordan River. The "fords" were places where the river was normally shallow enough to cross on foot. Though the river was at flood stage, the spies were able to cross without a miracle.

When the pursuers went out, "the gate was shut"; i.e., it was closed again (see v.5), underscoring the predicament of the spies who were trapped inside the city.

b. Rahab's covenant with the spies (2:8–21)

8 The spies may have intended to "[lie] down for the night," but before they settled in for the night and went to sleep, their rest was interrupted by Rahab.

9 It is truly remarkable how much Rahab knew about Israel's history and God's plans for Israel's future. Rahab spoke of the takeover of the land as if it were an accomplished fact. What God had done for Israel in Egypt and in Transjordan convinced her that God was able to give Israel this land, too. The "great fear" that had fallen on all the people had been predicted in Ex 15:15b–16.

10 On the Lord's drying up the "Red Sea," see Ex 14:21–31. For "Sihon and Og," see Nu 21:21–35. "Amorites" is a general term designating the inhabitants of the mountainous regions on both sides of the Jordan. "Completely destroyed" renders the Hebrew word herem (GK 3049); the ancient practice of completely destroying the spoils of warfare was a way of devoting them to a deity (cf. 6:17).

11–12 Morale is always a major factor in warfare. Fear is contagious and can even cause the defeat of an army that is superior in all other respects. Rahab's confession of her faith is remarkable for a pagan and is evidence of her conversion to faith in Israel's God (cf. Heb 11:31). "Kindness" (GK 2876), often translated "love" in the NIV, designates a reciprocal relationship of caring. In delivering the spies from the king's officers, Rahab risked her life and set herself against her own people. In return for this, she deserved to be assured of her own safety and the safety of her family.

13 When Rahab requested that the spies "spare the lives" of her family, she may have been asking no more than that they be taken alive as prisoners. Eventually, however, they were assimilated into the nation (6:25). In Scripture salvation is frequently a family matter (Ex 12:3; 24:15; cf. Ac 16:31). The family members would demonstrate their personal faith by gathering in Rahab's house and remaining there.

14–15 In the statement "If you don't tell" the pronoun is plural: Rahab and her entire family would have to guard this secret. Houses, such as Rahab's, constructed within the wall have been discovered by archaeologists in the ruins of ancient Jericho.

16 Undoubtedly the conversation in vv.16–21 occurred before Rahab lowered the spies to the ground. For "three days," see 1:11. The hills to the west of Jericho are a barren wasteland. The king's officers had gone in the opposite direction.

17–21 The spies laid down three conditions: (1) the scarlet cord must be placed in Rahab's window; (2) Rahab's whole family must stay in her house; and (3) the covenant between Rahab and the spies must be kept secret. These were practical ways for Rahab and her family to demonstrate their faith. The "scarlet cord" would identify Rahab's house. The spies no doubt anticipated a house-to-house battle in which the Israelites would have been instructed to spare the house so marked. The statement "his blood will be on his own head" means that all who disobey the instruction to stay in the house will be responsible for their own death.

Since the spies did not know at this time that God would use a miracle to capture the city, they may have arranged a plan for Rahab to deliver the city into Israel's hands. This could be the secret that Rahab was not to tell anyone. The statement "she tied the scarlet cord in the window" forms a fitting conclusion for this section because it points to Rahab's faith in action.

c. The report of the spies (2:22–24)

22–24 It is remarkable that the spies trusted Rahab so implicitly as to follow her instructions. Since the spies told Joshua "everything," we must assume that v.24 is only a summary of what they said. The narrative ends triumphantly. The spies learned two important facts: God had been faithful to his promise, and the inhabitants of the land were totally demoralized.

a. Instructions for crossing (3:1–13)

1–3 The journey from Shittim to the Jordan (c. ten miles) must have taken the better part of the day. "After three days" is a Hebrew idiom meaning "on the third day" (see 1:11). The presence of the "ark of the covenant," which symbolized God's presence among his people (cf. Ex 25:10–22), indicates that the crossing of the Jordan was a religious procession. When it was carried across the Jordan by the priests, the Lord was marching in to claim his land. "From your positions" refers to the specific locations assigned to the various tribes whenever they set up camp (cf. Nu 2).

This is the OT site where Jericho stood, viewed from the west and looking east across the Jordan River.

4 The people, warned to "keep a distance" of about "a thousand yards" from the ark while crossing the Jordan, would have had to cross one-half mile upstream or one-half mile downstream. Perhaps they maintained this distance only until the priests were stationed with the ark in the middle of the river.

5 The people were to be holy because God is holy, the ark was holy, and the event itself was holy. Consecration involved bathing, washing one's clothing, and abstinence from sexual activity (cf. Ex 19:14–15). "Amazing things" means miraculous things.

6 The priests were commanded to take up the ark and cross over but were not told how they would be enabled to cross the river, which was overflowing its banks (v.15). God often waits for us to step out in faith before he opens the way for us.

7–8 The appointment of Joshua as leader of the people would now be confirmed in action. One major reason for the great miracle was to demonstrate that God was with Joshua as surely as he had been with Moses. The command "Go and stand in the river" builds the suspense. There is still no indication how the people would get through the water.

9–10 In the phrase "the living God" emphasis is on the fact that Israel's God is living (GK 2645). Joshua is affirming that the God who marches with Israel is able to act and to perform mighty deeds in contrast to the pagan gods that have eyes but cannot see, etc. (cf. Ps 115:3–7). Either "Canaanites" or "Amorites" can be used to designate the whole population of Canaan. Strictly speaking, however, the Canaanites were the people living in the lowlands of the sea coast and the Jordan valley (Nu 13:29), while the Amorites lived in the mountainous areas. For "Hittites" see 1:4. The "Perizzites" lived in the central highlands in the time of Abraham and Jacob (Ge 13:7; 34:30). The "Gergashites" are mentioned here although they are not always included in the lists of the Canaanite populations. The "Jebusites" inhabited Jerusalem (15:63), which was formerly called Jebus. Jebusites lived also in the hill country of northern Palestine (11:3).

11 The way the people would cross the Jordan still had not been revealed. The ark would go before them, which signifies that God would go with them and prepare the way.

12 The command to "choose twelve men" interrupts the flow of the narrative, and there is no explanation here of why they were to be chosen or what they were to do. Perhaps this verse indicates when the men were actually selected, and 4:2–3 (where the command is repeated) is the point in the narrative where the mission of the twelve was carried out.

13 In the phrase "the LORD—the Lord of all the earth," the first occurrence of "lord" is printed with one large and three small capitals, representing the sacred name "Yahweh" (GK 3378). The Jews, out of reverence for God's holy name, regularly substituted the Hebrew equivalent for "Lord," "Adonai" (GK 123), when they came to the name "Yahweh" in the Scriptures. The second occurrence of "Lord" actually means "lord," "ruler," or "owner." One of the great themes in the Exodus and the Conquest is that Israel's God is the Lord of all the earth (cf. Ex 9:29). This gave Israel the right to take over the land.

Here finally we are told how the people would be able to cross. The regular flow of the river would be cut off upstream, where the waters would collect in a heap.

b. Crossing on dry ground (3:14–17)

14–16a After the Israelites "broke camp," the priests led the way bearing the ark of the covenant. That the Jordan was at "flood stage" builds the suspense by suggesting the natural impossibility of what was about to happen. The statement that "as soon as . . . their feet touched the water's edge, the water . . . stopped flowing" may be an example of narrative heightening to convey a true sense of wonder at the great miracle that was taking place. The flow of the water had to have stopped upstream prior to the moment that the priests approached the river, or else it would have taken time for the water to flow away downstream after they stepped into the river's edge.

16b–17 The waters began to collect "in a heap" upstream. "Adam" was a city located about twenty miles upstream from where the Israelites crossed the Jordan. The water stopped too far upstream for the Israelites to have seen it; so the timing had to be perfect for the waters to be exhausted at the precise moment that the priests stepped into the river. "The Sea of the Arabah" is the Dead Sea. With the water from upstream "completely cut off," the water flowing downstream was soon emptied into the Dead Sea. "Dry ground" does not mean that the riverbed was powdery dry but simply that it was no longer covered with water.

c. Memorials to the crossing (4:1–24)

1–3 The frequent repetition of the phrase "the LORD said to Joshua" emphasizes the fact that everything was done in obedience to God's commands. If the narrative followed a strict chronological order, it would mean that these men crossed all the way over and were then sent back into the riverbed. The command was actually given, however, before the people began to cross; and it is recorded here at the point in the narrative when the men actually picked up the stones on their way across the river (see 3:12). Stones taken from the middle of the riverbed were remarkable evidence that the river had actually stopped flowing to allow Israel to cross over.

4–6a The twelve men found their stones near the place where the priests carrying the ark were standing. The stones were "to serve as a sign" for future generations (v.6a).

6b–9 Raising stones as a memorial is common in the OT (cf. 7:26; 24:26–27; Ge 28:18–22; 31:45–47; 1Sa 7:12). These memorials were intended to provoke questioning so that the story of God's miraculous interventions might be told over and over. Remembering was a way for future generations to participate in the great acts that God had done for Israel.

10–11 The statement "just as Moses had directed Joshua" reminds us again that Joshua's ministry was subservient to that of Moses. There is no record of Moses giving Joshua explicit instructions for crossing the Jordan, although such a crossing is implied in Dt 31:7. "The people hurried over" because the river was stopped for a limited time only. It is clear that the priests did not march out of the river until after the people had crossed over.

12-13 Again we see how important it was to our writer that the Transjordanian tribes had a primary role in the conquest of the land of Canaan (cf. 1:12). They went ahead of the other Israelites. For "forty thousand," see comment on 1:14. They were "armed for battle" and thus were prepared in the event that the inhabitants of the land should attack while Israel was crossing the river.

14 "The LORD exalted Joshua" as he had promised (3:7). Joshua was now firmly established as leader in the place of Moses (cf. Ex 14:31).

15–18 The following order is customary in Joshua: The Lord told Joshua, Joshua told the people, and the command was obeyed. Clearly obedience is the prerequisite for God's blessing. "Dry ground" here refers to the river bank as distinct from the riverbed (cf. 3:17). The miraculous element is heightened by stressing that the waters were cut off just long enough for Israel to cross over, and then they "returned to their place."

19–20 The parallels between Moses and Joshua are obvious (cf. both crossed a body of water on dry ground, and both gave commands on "the tenth day" of the first month; cf. Ex 12:3). "Gilgal" was a strategically located town. The Jordan provided security on one side, and the open plain prevented any surprise attack from the other side. An abundant water supply was provided by the river. Joshua may have piled the stones in a heap (cf. 7:26) or he may have placed them in a circle (Gilgal sounds like the Hebrew word for circle).

21–23 Joshua foresaw the importance of these stones for future generations, as a memorial to the miraculous crossing. Again the term "dry ground" is mentioned to emphasize the supernatural aspect of the crossing. The crossings of the Red Sea and the Jordan were mighty miracles that were to be celebrated by Israel forever (cf. Ps. 114). They marked Israel's exodus from the land of bondage and entrance into the Land of Promise. They were a sign of Israel's transition from slavery to freedom.

24 This verse gives two additional reasons for this great miracle: to impress the power of Israel's God on the nations and to confirm Israel's reverence for their God.

It is possible that a landslide caused by an earthquake stopped the flow of the Jordan River. Landslides are common in the soft clay banks of the Jordan. At least two such landslides, each of which resulted in a damming of the river, are recorded in history: in A.D. 1267 and again in 1927. In the latter instance the slide occurred near the town of Adam (cf. 3:16), and the flow of the river was interrupted for about twenty-one hours. The Jordan Valley lies along one of the major faults on the earth's surface. Evidences of earthquake activity have been found in the excavations of Jericho. Moreover, there are indications in the Bible that earthquakes accompanied Israel's march into the Promised Land (Jdg 5:4–5; Ps 114:3–4, 7). If an earthquake was responsible for stopping the Jordan River, it was still a miracle. The discovery of secondary causes only serves to explain how God did what he did, and only God's intervention can account for the miraculous timing.

3. Renewing the covenant with Israel (5:1–15)

a. The covenant sign (5:1–9)

1 This transitional verse sums up the effect that the miraculous crossing of the Jordan had on the inhabitants of Canaan and explains how Israel could have been secure enough to observe the covenant ceremonies that follow. News traveled fast, even in those times (cf. 2:9–10). "Their hearts melted" with fear, but this did not result in their conversion (cf. 2:9–11; 9:9–11).

2–3 This was the Bronze Age, when bronze implements were common; yet Joshua was commanded to make "flint knives." Religious ceremonies tend to preserve ancient customs. When God reaffirmed his covenant with Abraham, promising him the land of Canaan, he warned him that anyone who was not circumcised would be violating the covenant (Ge 17:7–14). Consequently, Israel could not claim the covenant land until the sign of the covenant had been restored (cf. Ex 4:24–26). In the instructions God gave Moses for the Passover meal, no uncircumcised males were allowed to participate (cf. Ex 12:48–49). Circumcision may have been a puberty rite in some nations, but for Israel it marked one's entrance into the covenant community. Joshua was reinstituting circumcision after it had been neglected during the forty years in the desert.

The name "Gibeath Haaraloth" has a rather grotesque meaning: "the hill of the foreskins." Throughout the Promised Land there were monuments and place names that served to remind Israel of their history.

4–6 It is strange that none of the males who were born in the desert was circumcised. The fact that Israel was always on the move is not an adequate explanation. Perhaps the sign of the covenant had been suspended while a whole generation rejected the covenant in disobedience and unbelief. Israel had disobeyed the Lord thirty-eight years earlier when they stood on the southern border of the Promised Land (Nu 13–14). The stereotyped phrase "a land flowing with milk and honey" describes the fruitfulness of the land (cf. Dt 11:9–12).

7 God was fulfilling his promise in Nu 14:31. This was a new beginning for the nation: The crossing of the Jordan symbolizes death and rebirth, and the renewal of circumcision constituted Israel anew as the people of God.

8 The Conquest had to be delayed until the men recovered, for the Israelite warriors were temporarily rendered helpless by circumcision (cf. Ge 34:25). That circumcision had to be performed at this crucial moment shows how foundational the covenant relationship was between God and Israel. It is, of course, possible that a few males were living who had been circumcised in Egypt and who were under the age of twenty at the time of Israel's disobedience (cf. v.6).

9 Since the Egyptians practiced circumcision, "the reproach of Egypt" probably means that the Israelites, now reestablished as the covenant people in the Land of Promise, had been delivered from their national disgrace of enslavement and homelessness, not that they had been unable to practice this rite in that land (cf. v.5). The name "Gilgal" sounds like the Hebrew word that means "to roll" (cf. 4:20). There are other instances in Scripture where a certain locality was given the same name on more than one occasion (cf. Ge 21:31 with Ge 26:33; Ge 28:19 with Ge 35:14–15).

b. The covenant meal (5:10–12)

10 It was the first month (cf. 4:19); consequently "the fourteenth day" was the official day for observing the Passover (see Ex 12:2, 6, 18). Though the Passover had been observed at Sinai (Nu 9:1–5), it had been neglected during the years of rejection and wandering, just as circumcision had been.

11 Another sign of a new beginning was that "they ate some of the produce of the land." "Unleavened bread" was prescribed for the entire week following the Passover (Ex 12:14–20). They had no leaven anyhow, since for nearly forty years they had been living on manna and quail.

12 Since it was no longer needed, "the manna stopped." Extraordinary means are only temporary. Now the Israelites would experience the miracle of regular harvests in the land of milk and honey.

c. The true leader of the covenant people (5:13–15)

13 On the eve of Israel's attack on Jericho, Joshua personally surveyed the area surrounding the city and inspected the fortifications. The words "he looked up" convey the element of surprise. "A man" is what Joshua thought he was seeing, but subsequent events reveal that it was no ordinary man. The man's "drawn sword" was symbolic of God's participation in the coming battle. Seeing the man standing there ready for combat provoked Joshua to inquire whether he was friend or foe.

14 The stranger's response put everything in proper perspective: God is sovereign. The stranger came as "commander of the army of the LORD"; Joshua was to be subservient to him. Though he does not reappear in the story of the Conquest, the stranger was a heavenly being who fought behind the scenes in the spiritual realm. His presence was a sign that the Lord was the real military leader of the Conquest. Many identify this person as "the angel [GK 4855] of the LORD (cf. Ex 3:2–4:17; Jdg 6:11–23; et al.) The army of the Lord was an angelic host, and they assured victory to Israel if Israel was obedient (cf. Ge 32:1–2; 2Ki 6:17).

Though "Joshua fell facedown," we cannot be sure that he realized he was in the presence of a supernatural being. In that culture persons would prostrate themselves before anyone in authority. Moreover, when Joshua said "Lord," he did not use the divine name "Yahweh," which is rendered "LORD" (see comment on 3:13). The purpose of this encounter was to inspire Joshua with humility and reverence and to instill in him the confidence that God was with him and was in control (cf. 1:9).

15 The command "Take off your sandals" does not indicate that this incident occurred at an ancient shrine. Rather, any place where God reveals himself is hallowed by that revelation (cf. Ge 28:10–22; cf. also Moses' experience in Ex 3:1–6). The events of this chapter are further evidence that the Conquest was to be accomplished by God's power. From a human point of view, it would seem to have been wiser to fulfill the rituals of circumcision and the Passover on the other side of the Jordan. But celebrating them in the Promised Land symbolized that the covenant relationship between God and Israel was a prerequisite for possessing the land.

4. The conquest of Jericho (6:1–27)

a. The Lord's instructions (6:1–5)

1 The inhabitants of Jericho were paralyzed by fear of the Israelites and of Israel's invincible God (cf. 2:9–11; 5:1). Fear of infiltration or trickery by the enemy kept them from allowing anyone to enter. That no one was let out indicates how desperate the situation was. It was not uncommon in a time of siege to send warriors out to harass the enemies or to engage them in battle. Sometimes a small party was sent out secretly in search of help or supplies.

2 With the words "I have delivered Jericho," Joshua was reminded that victory comes only from the Lord (cf. Ps 108:12–13). Moreover, the tense of the verb indicates that the battle had already been won (cf. 2:9). The conquest of a walled city was a major challenge. The Israelites had not encountered walled cities before; and after their many years of wandering in the desert, they were not equipped for such an undertaking. High walls had discouraged the spies forty years earlier (Nu 13:28).

3 The command to "march around the city once" seems senseless and required faith that God would keep his promise to deliver the city into their hands (Heb 11:30). The stratagem of waiting seven days has a number of biblical parallels (cf. Ex 24:16; 1Ki 20:29; 2Ki 3:9; et al.)

Inside Jericho all routine pursuits had been given up, and every effort was aimed at defense. When the armed men of Israel merely marched around the city day after day, the vigilance may have relaxed. On the other hand, this senseless marching may have completely demoralized the defenders, who would have been totally confused about what was going on. The march around the city too was another expression of God's grace, giving the people one last opportunity (an entire week) to repent. Only "the armed men" were involved.

4 Seven is the number of divine perfection or completeness. The emphasis on the number seven (fourteen times in this chapter), the use of ceremonial trumpets (made from ram's horns), the presence of priests, and the prominence of the ark all indicate that the conquest of Jericho was more than a military campaign; it was a religious event. Israel must always remember that the land was God's gift to them.

5 "A long blast" was a signal distinct from the continual blowing of the trumpets. The phrase "all the people" means "the whole army," excluding women and children. The "loud shout" was a war cry intended to encourage their fellows and intimidate the enemy. In v.10 we are informed that Joshua had ordered the people to be silent during all the marching up to this point. The way that God would give them the city is now revealed: "The wall of the city will collapse." That "every man [went] straight in" means that from their positions all around the city, the Israelites were able to go directly in—though not necessarily in a perfectly straight line—so that the city would be attacked in every quarter at the same time.

b. The attack on Jericho (6:6–21)

6–7 Though repetitious, the account is not tedious. The suspense builds until it reaches its climax in v.20. The orders Joshua passed on to the people are summarized here (cf. vv.2–5). Separate orders were given to the priests and to the people.

8 The phrase "before the LORD" is a vivid reminder that the ark symbolized God's presence. The parallel statement in v.4 says that the seven priests were to carry seven horns before the ark.

9–10 The presence of warriors before and behind the ark indicates that the Israelites would have to fight. Perhaps the "armed guard" mentioned here consisted of the two and one-half tribes from Transjordan (cf. 4:12–13). Because of the privileges granted them, they were to lead the others into every battle. Joshua's instructions here recall the orders he had given earlier (vv.6–7.; cf. v.5).

11 No details are given as to how the march was conducted. Jericho occupied only about five or six acres of land. Even though the Israelites must have maintained sufficient distance from the city to be safely beyond the range of enemy arrows, it is possible that the head of the column had arrived back at the camp before the last of the rear guard left.

12–14 This repetitious narrative conveys something of the tedium of marching around the city day after day for six days.

15 On the seventh day the Israelites set out "at daybreak" because of all that needed to be accomplished that day. Considering the size of Jericho and the number of Israelite troops, it is likely that when "they circled the city seven times," the column doubled over on itself again and again until the city was surrounded many columns deep.

16–17 The eagerly awaited command to shout was given. Before telling us what happened, details are inserted (vv.17–19) concerning commands that Joshua must have given earlier (vv.6–7). "Devoted" represents the Hebrew word translated "completely destroyed" in 2:10 (see comment on 2:10). Jericho was Israel's first conquest in the land of Canaan, a kind of firstfruits; therefore everything in it was holy—humans, animals, and property—and was to be consecrated to the Lord (cf. Ex 23:31–33; 34:11–14; Dt 2:32–35; 3:3–7; 20:16–18; et al.).

Rahab's profession continues to be mentioned here and in vv.22 and 25 to emphasize that she was a trophy of God's grace. Her hiding of the spies is stated as the reason for her deliverance (cf. Heb 11:31; Jas 2:25). The themes of judgment and salvation often appear side by side in Scripture (cf. Ge 6–8; 19:1–29; see also Jn 3:16–21).

18–19 Joshua had made it plain that the whole nation could be devoted to destruction through the action of a single person. This verse prepares us for the story of Achan (ch. 7). Metals are not destroyed by fire. They had to be removed from common use by being placed in the treasury of the sanctuary to provide for the necessities of the sanctuary and the priests.

20–21 The narrative, which has been interrupted by the instructions concerning the things devoted to destruction, is now resumed. To emphasize the divine intervention, no secondary causes for the collapse of the wall are mentioned. The destruction of the defenders of the city together with their women and children involved the Israelites in hand-to-hand combat. Their enemies were not able to fight effectively because they were demoralized, outnumbered, and taken by surprise. Everything in the city was devoted to the Lord.

c. Rahab rescued and Jericho cursed (6:22–27)

22–23 Evidently the part of the wall where Rahab's house was located was miraculously preserved. Rahab and her family were put in "a place outside the camp" as a kind of ritual quarantine. The camp of Israel was holy, and nothing unclean could be allowed to enter (cf. Lev 13:46; Nu 5:3; 31:19; Dt 23:3, 14). After the passage of time and the observance of appropriate rituals, they were received into the congregation (see v.25).

24–25 The term "the LORD's house" is generally applied only to the temple, though the Bible often applies later terminology to an earlier institution. The statement "she [Rahab] lives among the Israelites to this day" most likely means that Rahab lived on in her posterity, not that this account was written during her lifetime. Thus concludes the two themes of ch. 2: the capture of Jericho and the salvation of Rahab.

26 The city of Jericho was to remain an object lesson of God's great victory in Israel's very first battle. Though the city was soon resettled (18:21; Jdg 3:13–14; 2Sa 10:5), the curse uttered here was not fulfilled until the time of King Ahab, when Hiel, a resident of Bethel, rebuilt the wall around Jericho to make it a fortress once again (see comment on 1Ki 16:34).

27 Joshua was firmly established as leader in Israel (cf. 1:1–9; 2:9–11; 4:14; 5:1–3). The statement "The LORD was with Joshua" marks the climax of his rise to leadership, fulfilling God's promise in 1:5. The people had pledged their loyalty to Joshua on the condition that the Lord would be with him (1:17). This triumphant summary statement in no way prepares us for the disaster in ch. 7.

5. The conquest of Ai (7:1–8:29)

a. Achan's sin (7:1–26)

1 Israel's sin, a violation of their covenant with the Lord, was serious. Though the crime was committed by one person, the whole nation was considered guilty and was charged with the punishment of the offender (cf. 1Co 5:6–13).

However unfair it may seem, experience shows that the wrongdoing of a single individual has adverse effects on others (cf. Dt 5:9). Moreover, this was a time of war, and strict discipline had to be maintained. God's judgment on sin was viewed as a result of his anger (cf. Ro 1:18–32). His judgment on the Canaanites was not arbitrary; it was the consequence of their sin, and now, when God's chosen people sin, they too must be judged.

2 "Ai" (GK 6504) means "a ruins." This may not have been the name of the city, since it is a term that could be applied to any ruins; to specify which ruins is meant, the text states that it was near Bethel (cf. 12:9). "Beth Aven" means "house of wickedness" (cf. Hos 4:15; 5:8; 10:5). Joshua confined most of his military exploits to the mountainous areas where the inhabitants were unable to use chariots. The conquest of Ai and Bethel seems to be part of a strategy to divide the central mountains in the middle and thus prevent any united defense.

In planning his attack, Joshua sent out spies as he had done earlier at Jericho. This was the first time in the Conquest that Joshua did anything on his own initiative, and it was doomed to failure. It is ominous that nothing is said about Joshua seeking guidance from the Lord. The great victory at Jericho made him overly confident of God's help.

3 The total population of Ai was estimated to be about twelve thousand (8:25). With armies of equal size, the defenders inside the city walls would have a considerable advantage. The confidence of the spies was inspired by their memory of Israel's great victory over Jericho and of God's intervention. The climb to Ai was 3,300 feet.

4–5 In spite of Joshua's sending the larger number of troops suggested by the spies, the Israelites suffered a humiliating defeat. While thirty-six casualties out of three thousand troops is not a great loss, it was symbolic of Israel's resounding defeat. In the type of warfare that was fought in those days, it was not uncommon for the victor to have no casualties at all (cf. Nu 31:48–49). The very same words that Rahab had used to describe the demoralized population of Jericho (2:9, 11; cf. 5:1) are here applied to Israel.

6 Joshua and the elders went into mourning, expressing great grief at Israel's defeat. Joshua immediately turned to God. He was able to approach the ark more freely than the high priest (cf. Lev 16:2). He, not the high priest, was responsible to intercede for the people. The actions of Joshua and the elders were not indications of repentance; they were expressions of anger, frustration, and distress.

7–8 Joshua addressed God in a reverent manner, but that did not keep him from arguing with God. If victory was to be attributed to God's help, then defeat must come from God's failure to intervene. Joshua accused God of wanting to destroy his people. He was struggling here as a man of faith who was brutally honest with God and was seeking answers to his urgent questions. Yet his comment about Israel being content to dwell on the east of the Jordan (cf. Ex 16:3) came dangerously close to the way Israel had reasoned at Kadesh Barnea (Nu 14:1–4). Had he forgotten that God himself had commanded them to cross over into Canaan? In self-pity Joshua charged God with capriciousness. He believed that the defeat of Israel meant the end of his leadership.

9 Joshua was well aware that the report of Israel's victories had demoralized and immobilized the people of Canaan. The worst part of their defeat was that Israel had lost this great advantage; now their enemies would be encouraged to fight back. Moreover, if Israel was destroyed, God's name would be disgraced. In OT times a "name" (GK 9005) was more than just an identity. It stood for one's person and reputation. This was not special pleading; Joshua was showing genuine concern (cf. Ex 32:12–13; Nu 14:13–19; Dt 9:26–29).

10 The Lord's command for Joshua to "stand up" was not a rebuke but a response to an honest and reverent prayer. This was no time for self-pity; it was time for action.

11 Since the gift of the land was part of God's covenant with Israel, Joshua should have known that defeat was not due to any fickleness on God's part but had been caused by Israel's failure to be faithful to the covenant. In God's eyes the whole nation was implicated in the sin of Achan; his crime was their crime: "they have lied." They had taken as their own things that had been dedicated to God.

12 God's warning had come true (see comment on 6:18); now the Israelites themselves must be devoted to destruction. No more dreadful threat is imaginable than that God would no longer be with Israel (cf. climax of chs. 1–6 in 6:27), but that is exactly what is being threatened here. If, however, the people will take action to "destroy whatever among you is devoted," they will demonstrate their innocence and preserve their relationship with God (cf. 2Co 7:5–12).

13 The people had to be consecrated again (cf. 3:5)—an act that was necessary whenever God was going to act in some special way. Now he was coming in judgment to remove the defilement from his people.

14 The people were to present themselves to the Lord by appearing before the sanctuary by family units. There is no specific statement as to how the Lord would single out the culprit (cf. 1Sa 10:19–24; cf. 14:36–43), but presumably it was by lot. The decision was placed solely in the hands of God (cf. Pr 16:33).

15 Though corporate responsibility was stressed, individual responsibility and guilt were not overlooked: The culprit "shall be destroyed," absolving the nation of guilt. The death penalty here was made even more offensive by burning the offender's body (cf. Ge 38:24; Lev 21:9). "All that belongs to him" is ambiguous; in v.24 both persons and possessions are included.

16–18 In the selection process each tribe, clan, and family was represented by a single individual. To us the procedure seems to leave everything up to chance. For them it left everything in the hands of God, and, in the final analysis, the right person was chosen.

19 Though Joshua deals gently and fairly with Achan, some indignation and vindictiveness are apparent in v.25. The expression "give glory [GK 3883] to the LORD" is an appeal for an honest confession (cf. Jn 9:24). Confession of sin is a way of honoring God. Joshua did not rely solely on the selection by lot. Personal confession and the gathering of evidence were also required (vv.22–23).

20 Achan confessed his sin but was not forgiven because he did not confess willingly (cf. Ps 32; 1Jn 1:9). His silence during the long process of casting lots gave evidence of the hardness of his heart.

21 Achan called what he took "plunder" (GK 8965)—as something customarily divided among the victors. "Shekel" denotes a measure of weight, not a coin. "Wedge" indicates an ingot or a bar. Coveting is often the beginning of a sinful action. The same three verbs "I saw," "I coveted," "I took" are found in the story of the Fall (Ge 3:6; cf. Jas 1:13–15). Achan hid the things he took because he knew he had sinned.

22–23 The messengers located the hidden booty, brought it to Joshua, and spread everything "before the LORD," i.e., at the Tent of Meeting (cf. v.14), because God is the final Judge.

24 Representatives of the entire nation participated in punishing Achan to remove the guilt from all the people. Apparently Achan did not have a wife at this time. The punishment of children for the sin of their father is an offense to our sense of justice, but Achan's family was implicated in his crime because he could not have hidden his loot under his tent without their knowing it. Moreover, this punishment is an example of the severe discipline necessary in time of war. Judging by his possessions, Achan had little need for what he stole. "Achor" (a pun on Achan's name; cf. 1Ch 2:7) means "disaster."

25–26 Once again "all Israel" refers to representatives from the whole nation, acting in accord with their promise to Joshua in 1:18. Achan and his family were stoned and burned, and stones were heaped on them. After Achan's sin had been judged, "the LORD turned from his fierce anger," and Israel was restored to favor (cf. also Ac 5:1-11 and comments).

b. The second attack on Ai (8:1–29)

1 Now that the sin of Achan had been dealt with, God reassured Israel of his presence and help (cf. 1:9). But Joshua would still have to use common sense and the best military strategy. It is not clear how many men constituted "the whole army" (cf. the numbers in vv.3, 12). Perhaps the 30,000 in v.3 is the size of the whole army whereas the 5,000 in v.12 is the number of troops in the ambush. The rest of the army would have been held in reserve.

2 Only the king and the people were to be devoted to destruction (see comment on 6:17); the plunder and livestock from Ai and all subsequent cities could be kept by Israel and would be their means of support throughout the years of conquest. God explicitly commanded Joshua to "set an ambush." Surprise is a necessary strategy in warfare. "Behind the city" probably means behind it from the standpoint of Israel's base of operations (on the west, v.12). This would be the least suspected area from which to stage an attack.

3 Most likely only five thousand constituted the actual ambush (v.12). It would be difficult even for a detachment of that number to avoid detection between Ai and Bethel. Presumably vv.10–13 report the carrying out of what was commanded in vv.3–9. The movement of troops "at night" was one of Joshua's successful strategies (cf. 10:9).

4–5 Joshua's men were to be ready to move at a moment's notice. Israel's new strategy required careful coordination and quick action. By drawing a sufficient number of the defenders away from the city, they could make its capture relatively easy. This involved a great risk, however, because a fleeing army was far more likely to suffer casualties.

6–7 The ruse depended on making the attack appear similar to the previous one. The troops waiting in ambush were to move in when the defenders were drawn from the city. Verses 18–19 suggest that the troops waited for a signal from Joshua.

8 The troops in ambush were to "set it on fire" to notify Joshua and the Israelites that the city had been taken. This would demoralize the enemy. With their wives and children killed and their homes destroyed (cf. v.28), what would they have left to fight for? This time the Israelites must "do what the LORD has commanded."

9 Joshua set up the ambush "between Bethel and Ai" to avoid the main route between the two cities. He did not try to prevent Bethel from assisting Ai, because any engagement with the army from Bethel would have exposed the ambush. Joshua spent the night with the main army.

10–13 It was night when "they set up camp" (cf. v.3); so the army's presence was not detected until the next morning. Though the numbers are difficult to harmonize, v.12 repeats the action described more fully in vv.3–9. Joshua went into the valley when everything was ready. Apparently he spent the night scouting the valley in preparation for battle the next day (cf. 5:13–15).

14–15 Eager for victory and overly confident, the king of Ai "hurried out." The "Arabah" is a desert area (this word commonly refers to the Jordan Valley). "Toward the desert" likely refers to a road leading from the vicinity of Ai (or Bethel) to Aphek.

16–17 The proximity of Bethel may have encouraged that army to come to the aid of Ai. Thus, the Israelite ambush had to be hidden from the main road to keep the troops coming from Bethel also from discovering them. In their confidence of an easy victory, "they left the city open" without anyone there to defend it.

18–19 Joshua's use of the javelin is another indication that God was directing the army of Israel (cf. Ex 17:8–12); Joshua did not bring his hand down until the victory over Ai was complete (v.26). This action symbolizes that victory comes from the Lord. Apparently holding out the javelin was a prearranged signal. The men in ambush would not have been able to see it, but they could have had scouts posted.

20–21 The statement "they had no chance to escape in any direction" suggests that the men of Bethel and Ai lost their will to fight when they saw that their families and possessions were gone. The smoke rising from Ai was the signal to Joshua that the ambush had been successful.

22–23 No distinction should be made between "survivors" and "fugitives." The key captive, "the king," was not killed in the battle but was taken to Joshua.

24–27 We are surprised to learn that there were still survivors in the city. Evidently the troops in ambush had not destroyed all the inhabitants of the city before setting it on fire. The chapter is silent about what happened to the army from Bethel, though they must have also been destroyed (cf. 12:16; "destroyed," the same word as used in 6:17; see comment on 2:10). Joshua was careful to do everything in conformity with God's commands. Clearly the Lord was in control this time.

28 "Heap" (GK 9424) refers to a particular kind of mound formed by the ruins of a walled city. The phrase "to this day" indicates that Ai had not been rebuilt at the time the narrative was composed. Apparently it was never rebuilt, though Joshua did not pronounce any curse against Ai as he had Jericho (6:26).

29 The king of Ai was not executed by hanging, yet his body was impaled on a tree or pole to add to his disgrace. To display the lifeless body of the king whom they had feared was another way of bolstering the morale of the Israelites. They were forbidden to leave a body hanging overnight because it would desecrate the land (Dt 21:23). This law required also that the body be buried the same day. The king of Ai's body was entombed in a pile of rocks so that it might serve as a vivid object lesson for future generations.

6. Covenant renewal at Mount Ebal (8:30–35)

30 By building the altar and offering sacrifices on it, Joshua acknowledged the Lord as the source of every victory and blessing and claimed this territory in the name of the Lord. It was an appropriate time to worship now that Israel had established a foothold in the central highlands. Mount Ebal became the place of worship at this time in Israel's history.

Because the narrative says nothing about any Israelite conquest of the area around Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim, perhaps the inhabitants were friendly to Israel, or it is possible that the battle of Ai is symbolic of the conquest of the entire mountainous area in central Palestine. The Israelites could celebrate this ritual of covenant renewal in peace because God had placed the fear of Israel in the hearts of the natives.

31 The use of "uncut stones" in constructing the altar (cf. Ex 20:25) is either a reaction to pagan culture or another example of the conservatism of religion (see 5:2), since the use of iron tools was a recent innovation.

32 The law "copied on stones" (special stones covered with plaster that Moses had commanded to be prepared for this purpose; Dt 27:4) was to be the basis of Israel's life in the land. The people's faithfulness to this law would determine their fortunes.

33 From the time of the Exodus, aliens who chose to live and worship with Israel were assimilated into the nation (cf. 1Ki 8:41–43), and they participated in the covenant renewal. "The ark of the covenant" was placed in the center of the assembly as a symbol of God's presence. Everything was done as Moses "had formerly commanded" (cf. Dt 11:29; 27:11–26). The emphasis here is on the positive blessings, even though Moses' command included both blessing and cursing (cf. v.34).

34–35 The public reading of the law had both a practical and a ceremonial function. It impressed the people with their responsibility to obey. The Israelites were always to be considerate of "the aliens who lived among them" because they too had been aliens living in slavery in Egypt (Ex 22:21; 23:9; Dt 24:17–22).

C. The Southern Campaign (9:1–10:43)

1. The Gibeonite deception (9:1–27)

a. The treaty with Israel (9:1–15)

1–2 All the city-states in mountainous regions of southern Palestine joined forces against Joshua. No longer would he be able to conquer one city at a time. No longer would the reports of earlier victories lead them to suppose that Israel was invincible. In resisting Israel, however, they were resisting God. Their stubborn rebellion was eloquent testimony that the sin of the Amorites had reached its full measure (cf. Ge 15:16).

3–5 Gibeon (see 10:2 for its importance) and several other cities (see v.17) joined together and spared no effort in trying to deceive and convince Joshua and Israel that they lived in a faraway country. Somehow they must have known that God had forbidden Israel to make any treaties or to save alive any of the inhabitants of the land (Dt 7:1–3; 20:16–18). "Dry and moldy" bread probably means "dry and crumbly," since dry bread is not likely to become moldy.

6 "Gilgal" is where Israel had had its base of operations since first entering the land (4:19). It is surprising that Joshua continued to use this as his base camp even after he had established a foothold in the mountainous region at Ai because of the arduous climb from Gilgal to the central mountain range. Perhaps Gilgal provided a more secure place for their families and livestock. The phrase "men of Israel" refers to the same group of officers who are called "leaders of the assembly" in vv.15 and 18 and "elders" in 8:33.

7 The narrator identifies the inhabitants of Gibeon as "Hivites." This was one of the nations God had promised to drive out of the land before Israel (3:10). The leaders' question—"perhaps you live near us"—indicates suspicion.

8 When the Gibeonites said, "We are your servants," they were offering to become Israel's vassals. In return they expected Israel, the stronger party, to protect them from their enemies (cf. 10:6). Their offer provoked Joshua to ask, "Where do you come from?" Joshua and the leaders were persistent in their attempt to carry out the Lord's command, even though they did not seek the Lord's guidance.

9–10 The Gibeonites' statement that they had come "because of the fame [or "name"; GK 9005] of the LORD your God" is the key statement. Though the incident is filled with tension and contradiction, the Gibeonites were drawn by the great name of the Lord and were spared. They admitted that God's mighty acts on behalf of Israel had made his great name known far and wide (cf. 2:9–11). Just as Rahab had done, the Gibeonites believed the reports about the God of Israel; and fear drove them to seek to come under his protection and to scheme in order to escape annihilation at the hand of the Israelites. In rehearsing the mighty acts of the Lord, the Gibeonites carefully omitted recent events that they would not have known about had they really come from a far country. Yet the matters they omitted were the very things that motivated them to seek a treaty with Israel (cf. v.3).

11–13 The Gibeonites spoke of their "elders," but not their king—possibly because they did not have a king. They presented their contrived evidence to the Israelites to prove that they had come a very long way.

14 Strangely, the Israelite leaders "sampled their provisions" in spite of the fact that they were dry and moldy. Eating together was often a part of making a treaty (cf. Ge 31:54). How tragic that the leaders were so impressed by the Gibeonites' stale provisions that they (including Joshua!) failed once again to seek God's guidance! Joshua especially should have known better. He had gone up the mountain of revelation with Moses (Ex 24:13–14); and in his preparation for leadership, he had been trained in the use of the Urim and Thummim for determining the will of God (Nu 27:18–21). How easy it is even in the service of the Lord to take God's guidance and blessing for granted!

15 Joshua made an alliance with the Gibeonites and concluded a treaty with them to protect their lives. This treaty committed Israel to more than simply sparing the Gibeonites' lives. They would have to come to their defense in all kinds of danger. This treaty was not valid until "the leaders of the assembly ratified it."

b. The ruse discovered (9:16–27)

16 Scarcely had the treaty been concluded when the Israelites learned that they had been deceived. As their "neighbors," the Gibeonites were some of the very people whom Israel had been commanded to exterminate and with whom they were to make no treaties, lest they be tempted into idolatry (Dt 7:1–6; 20:16–18).

17 Some of the Israelites were intent on violence against the cities in league with the Gibeonites, but they were restrained by their leaders (v.18).

18 "The whole assembly grumbled," possibly because they were resentful of the plunder that had been denied them. On the other hand, they may have been fearful of another judgment like that at Ai, because they had failed to keep God's command.

The Gibeonites, who became "water carriers" for the Israelites, were known for their excellent wells, which are being excavated today. Courtesy Werner Braun.

19 The "oath" (GK 8678) was made in the name of the Lord. Consequently fidelity was owed, not to the Gibeonites, but to the Lord. The form of the oath called on the Lord to punish the Israelites if they failed to keep their agreement (cf. vv.18–20). This explains why Israel felt bound to the treaty even though it had been made under false pretenses (cf. Ge 27:35; Ps 15:4).

20 The word for "wrath" (GK 7912) usually has the idea of divine retribution that inevitably follows the violation of some divine decree (cf. 22:20; Nu 1:53; 18:5). Many years later God's wrath did fall on Israel when King Saul violated this treaty (2Sa 21:1–9).

21 The Gibeonites were reduced to menial service as "woodcutters and water carriers" (cf. Dt 20:10–15; cf. Jos 16:10; 17:13; et al.). There is some confusion whether they were to serve "the entire community" or to serve "the house of my God" (see v.23); in v.27 both ideas are combined. Possibly they were to cut the wood and draw the water needed for the temple ritual, a duty that normally fell to the community.

22–23 At first Joshua's question seems humorous, if not ridiculous. Obviously the Gibeonites did what they did to save their lives! Even Joshua's curse of subservience does not seem to be serious, since the Gibeonites had escaped the sentence of death. For pagans to come and serve at the Lord's sanctuary is surely a blessing (cf. Ps 84:10).

24–25 The Gibeonites did not anticipate the degrading sentence imposed on them, but they preferred to live. As in the case of Rahab, fear led to their salvation. The statement "Do to us whatever seems good and right to you" was not simple resignation on the part of the Gibeonites. They knew the Israelites would be duty bound to treat them kindly.

26–27 Joshua, being a leader of integrity, accepted the Gibeonites' surrender. Worship was to be limited to one central sanctuary as a testimony to the fact that there was only one Lord (Dt 6:4) and in order to preserve the unity of the nation. This central sanctuary was located successively at Shechem, Shiloh, and Gibeon. Ultimately, of course, the site of the one sanctuary would be located in Jerusalem.

2. Israel's victory over the southern coalition (10:1–43)

a. The rescue of the Gibeonites (10:1–15)

1 One of the principal kings in the south gathered the whole region together to fight against Israel. News of Israel's victories at Jericho and Ai, with the extermination of all their inhabitants, struck fear into the heart of Adoni-Zedek (whose name means "Lord of Righteousness"). "Jerusalem," formerly called Jebus (Jdg 19:10), was a stronghold of the Jebusites, one of the seven nations the Israelites were to drive out of the land (3:10). Though the king and his army were killed by Joshua and Israel, the city itself was not captured until after Joshua's death (Jdg 1:8; cf. 2Sa 5:6–9).

2 The defection of the Gibeonites was cause for great alarm for three reasons: (1) it was discouraging to see such a large city with an excellent army surrender to the enemy, (2) without Gibeon the southern coalition was severely weakened, and (3) they constituted a fifth column that would fight with Israel in time of war. Gibeon was obviously a strong and influential city-state (cf. 11:12).

3–5 The kings of four other cities south and west of Jerusalem joined forces with Adoni-Zedek to attack the traitor city of Gibeon. They had to be punished to prevent any further defections to Israel and to eliminate the threat of their siding with Israel in time of war.

6 The Gibeonites turned to Joshua for help because the treaty of peace (9:15) obligated Joshua to defend them as his vassals.

7–8 The march from Gilgal to Gibeon involved an ascent of 3,300 feet. It is not clear whether "all the best fighting men" is descriptive of the whole Israelite army or only a special division of elite troops. The Lord assured Joshua that victory would be theirs.

9–10 A forced march under the cover of darkness was another of Joshua's well-planned strategies. The march, which covered a distance of about twenty miles, would have taken eight to ten hours. Joshua took the enemy by surprise, and the Lord used this to create disorder. Again human efforts and divine intervention worked hand in hand. The pass at Beth Horon, about five miles northwest of Gibeon, was an important point of access to the hill country and to Jerusalem.

11 Joshua pursued his enemy along the ancient road that went from Lachish to the Valley of Aijalon. In disarray the enemy fled down from the mountains through the pass at Beth Horon and headed south. God then intervened on behalf of his people with "large hailstones," a miracle that dwarfed the accomplishments of Israel's army. It was the Lord who won the victory. The Canaanites, who worshiped nature deities, must have thought that their own gods were aiding the Israelites.

12 This miracle is often called "Joshua's long day." It is the third and last great miracle in the book and the most bewildering. The NIV is correct in arranging vv.12b–13a as poetic, and they must be interpreted accordingly. The Hebrew word translated "stand still" (GK 1957) is often translated "be silent." Joshua may have been requesting that the sun not shine with its normal brightness and heat. Joshua desired favorable conditions so as to be able to make the most of the victory. After an all-night march, the sun's heat would have sapped the strength of the weary Israelites; and relief from that heat would have helped just as much as extended daylight. (At a certain time of the month the moon is visible in the daytime. Its mention here provides a poetic parallel to the sun.)

13 The Hebrew word for "stood still" (GK 1957) was used in 3:16 to say that the waters of the Jordan "stopped flowing." In a poetic passage like this, it could mean "stop moving" or even "stop shining." "The Book of Jashar" (i.e., "the book of the righteous") is mentioned also in 2Sa 1:18. Like other ancient books (cf. 1Ki 14:19, 29), this bit of ancient Hebrew literature has been lost. All of vv.12–15 may have been quoted from that source. The final statement in this verse does clearly favor the interpretation that the sun stood still or that it slowed down in its course across the sky.

14–15 "There has never been a day like it before" (cf. 2Ki 18:5; 23:25) shows something very spectacular occurred that day that elevated Joshua as a man of God: his prayers were unusually effective. This episode reminds us again that Israel was not winning the land by their own strength; God was giving it to them.

Verse 15 seems out of place here. The events of vv.16–27 are part of the battle, and it is very unlikely that Joshua returned to Gilgal in the middle of it all. There are two plausible suggestions: (1) This verse may conclude the quotation from the Book of Jashar. (2) Verses 7–14 may describe the battle in terms of the supernatural assistance, and vv.16–42 may go over the same ground supplying details about the fate of the various kings and their cities. In this case v.15 and v.43 describe the same event.

b. The execution of the five Amorite kings (10:16–28)

16–18 "The five kings" are named in v.3. "Large rocks" were placed at the entrance of the cave to prevent the kings who "had been found hiding" there from escaping and thus to free the warriors to pursue the enemy.

19–20 The warriors were encouraged to fight hard, "for the LORD your God has given them into your hand." As many as possible of the enemy were to be slain in the open fields, because it would be nearly impossible to capture them once they had reached their fortified cities. There were indeed a few survivors who managed to get to the cities, but by and large the enemy was totally annihilated.

21 The statement that "The whole army then returned safely" implies that the Israelites suffered no casualties. Apparently the campaign took longer than this abbreviated account might lead one to suppose. The observation that "no one uttered a word" provides another parallel in the careers of Moses and Joshua (cf. Ex 11:7).

22–24 Joshua did all he could to bolster the morale of his troops, so he humiliated the five kings before they were killed. When the officers placed their feet on the necks of these great kings (a widespread practice in ancient times; cf. 1Ki 5:3; Ps 110:1), they recognized that they were frail human beings like everyone else.

25–26 The words "be strong and courageous" remind us of ch. 1 (vv.6–7, 9, 18). The bodies of the kings were hung on trees to make them an example and to add to their humiliation (see comment on 8:29).

27 The bodies of the kings were taken down "at sunset" to keep from defiling the land (cf. Dt 21:23). The cave provided a convenient place for their burial. Piling large rocks at the entrance, the Israelites created a memorial to keep alive the memory of another victory God had given Israel.

28 "That day" most likely means "at that time." For "totally destroyed" see comments on 2:10; 6:17. This comparison with the king of Jericho is strange because no details were given as to how Joshua treated him (cf. 6:20–21, 24).

c. The completion of the southern campaign (10:29–43)

29–30 Libnah, Makkedah, and Debir were not included in the coalition. Joshua was beginning to secure the foothills before invading the mountains. Joshua devoted the entire population to God by destruction (cf. v.28; 2:10).

31–33 The words "On the second day" suggest that the campaign in the south continued for several days or weeks. "Gezer" is near the entrance to the Valley of Aijalon, about a day's march north of Lachish. Joshua destroyed the king and his army, though he did not follow through to capture the city itself (cf. 16:10).

34–39 Leaving the foothills Joshua moved into the highlands and captured the two principal cities with their surrounding villages. By this time Hebron may have already enthroned a new king (cf. vv. 25–26). Joshua "totally destroyed it and everyone in it."

40 This comprehensive statement of Joshua's victories in the south demonstrates that the accounts of the capture of a few cities is only a sketchy summary of the more important victories in an extensive campaign. "The hill country" is the central mountain range principally in Judah and Ephraim. "The Negev" is the desert in southern Palestine. "The western foothills" is the area between the hill country of Judah and the coastal plain. "The mountain slopes" refers to the steep descent from the mountains to the Jordan Valley. Neither Jerusalem (Jdg 1:8) nor Jarmuth were conquered at this time, but the Conquest was extensive enough to give Israel control of the area. Probably the expression "all who breathed" did not include the livestock, which the Israelites were permitted to take as booty.

41–43 The phrase "from Kadesh Barnea to Gaza" denotes a large area in southern Palestine. We have no way of determining the length of this "one campaign," but it must have taken a considerable amount of time. Victory in the south clearly demonstrated that "the LORD, the God of Israel, fought for Israel." The Israelites did not occupy these cities immediately. Instead they returned to their families and livestock in their base camp "at Gilgal."

D. The Northern Campaign (11:1–15)

1. The northern coalition formed (11:1–5)

1 "Jabin" may have been a dynastic name assumed by all kings of Hazor (cf. Jdg 4:2). "Hazor" was by far the most imposing city in all of Palestine, covering about two hundred acres (cf. the five or six acres of Jericho). With its allies and armaments, Hazor confronted Joshua and Israel with their last and most awesome challenge.

2 The cities named in v.1 were south of Hazor, but Jabin also summoned "the northern kings." The thirty-one kings named in 12:9–24 are probably only the more important ones. Jabin assembled the kings of the Jordan Valley ("the Arabah"), the area around the Sea of Galilee ("Kinnereth"), and the coastal plain south of Mount Carmel ("Naphoth Dor").

3 Since "Canaanite" was a generic term for all who lived in the lowlands, "the Canaanites in the east" must refer to the people living in the Jordan Valley (cf. Nu 13:29). The Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, and Jebusites lived in the hill country. The inhabitants of Jerusalem were Jebusites. Joshua destroyed the army of the "Jebusites" (10:9–14) and killed Adoni-Zedek their king (10:22–27), but he did not capture their city. Possibly survivors from the southern campaign rallied to the support of the northern coalition. "Hermon" is the highest mountain in the Anti-Lebanon range.

4–5 Though Palestine at this time was made up of independent and hostile city-states, the presence of a common enemy caused them to rally to Jabin's call. The northern coalition was Israel's most formidable foe. "Horses and chariots" posed an awesome challenge to the Israelites, whose army was made up solely of foot soldiers. All previous battles had been on terrain where the use of chariots was not feasible. The kings apparently gathered in the mountainous area of Wadi Meiron (4000 foot elevation) to develop their strategy, not to do battle.

2. The major battle (11:6–9)

6, 9 Before this last and most challenging battle, Joshua did not fail to consult the Lord. Disabling the horses and burning the chariots showed disdain for modern weaponry; Israel's confidence was to be in God alone (cf. Ps 20:7). Early Israelite tradition is consistently negative toward the use of horses and chariots (cf. Dt 17:16; 2Sa 8:4; Isa 31:1).

7–8 Joshua again resorted to a surprise attack (cf. 10:9). The enemies were caught unprepared and were driven into the mountains where chariots could not be used. Once again victory was God's gift to Israel. The defeated enemy fled in a northerly direction. Sidon is on the Phoenician coast north of Mount Carmel. "The Valley of Mizpah" must have been in the north in the vicinity of Sidon and Misrephoth Maim.

3. The capture of the northern cities (11:10–15)

10 The phrase "at that time" may denote the same day or later. After he defeated the combined armies, Joshua "turned back" from pursuing his enemies in the north and concentrated on individual cities, beginning with the city of Hazor. The execution of the king, as usual, is mentioned separately. Perhaps the kings were killed with some special ceremony as in 10:22–27.

11 Joshua faithfully carried out the command that all the inhabitants of the land be devoted to the Lord by totally destroying them (cf. comments on 2:10; 6:21). As in 10:40, "anything that breathed" refers only to human beings. Archaeological excavations indicate that Hazor was destroyed sometime in the late fifteenth century B.C. and was not rebuilt until the time of Solomon (cf. 1Ki 9:15).

12–15 Following Moses' command, Joshua took the "royal cities," i.e., city-states each of which had its own king (cf. 10:2). The burning of the cities had not been commanded by God (cf. Dt 7:1–6; 20:16–18); consequently, they were ready immediately for reoccupation by Israel. As the Lord had promised, the Israelites would live in cities they did not build and would have food that they had not worked for (Dt 6:10–11).

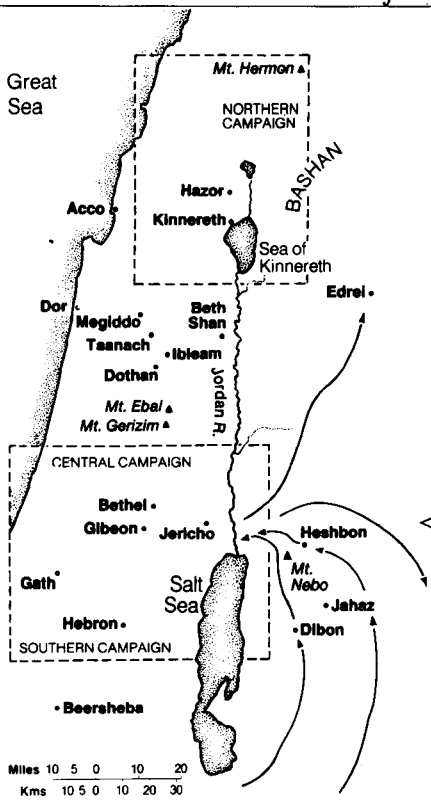
Once again we are reminded that victory and blessing are the outcome of obedience. Joshua had done everything the Lord commanded Moses. The writer uses extravagant language—"he left nothing undone"—to celebrate Joshua's obedience and Israel's great victories even though he does not hesitate in succeeding chapters to indicate that the Conquest was still incomplete (cf. 13:1–5, 13; 15:63; 16:10; 17:12).

E. A Summary of the Conquest (11:16–23)

16–17 Joshua gained control of the whole region even though he did not take every individual city. The last of the Canaanites were not subjected to Israel's authority until the reign of David. The author describes in great detail the geography of the Promised Land that Joshua had captured—from north to south and from east to west. The western coastal plains where the Canaanites were able to use their chariots are not mentioned (cf. 9:1) because Joshua did not conquer those areas (cf. 17:16; Jdg 1:19). The southern coastland was the stronghold of the Philistines, who continued to harass Israel until they were finally subdued by David.

18 Though creating the impression of a lightning-quick campaign, the Conquest really took "a long time" (cf. God's statement to Moses in Ex 23:29–30). Undoubtedly the Conquest involved many battles not mentioned.

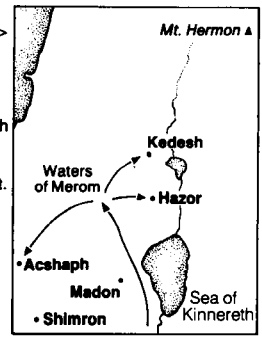
19–20 The surrender of the Gibeonites was one small exception to the general rule of totally annihilating the population of Canaan. God hardened the Canaanites' hearts, not to keep them from repenting, but to prevent them from surrendering to Israel in unrepentance. The examples of Rahab and the Gibeonites demonstrate the unchanging purpose of God that "Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved" (Ro 10:13). God was patient as long as there was any hope of



4. THE NORTHERN CAMPAIGN

Late Bronze Age Hazor was burned by Joshua (Jos 11:13). Excavations have revealed three clearly datable destruction layers, one of which may provide the strongest evidence yet for a historically verifiable date for the conquest.

The excavator thought Joshua burned the latest level (c. 1230 B.C.), but others argue that it must actually have been the earliest of the three levels, c. 1400 B.C.



Conquest of Canaan

1. ENTRY INTO CANAAN

When the Israelite tribes approached Canaan after four decades of desert existence, they had to overcome the two Amorite kingdoms on the Medeba plateau and in Bashan. Under Moses' leadership, they also subdued the Midianites in order to consolidate their control over the Transjordanian region.

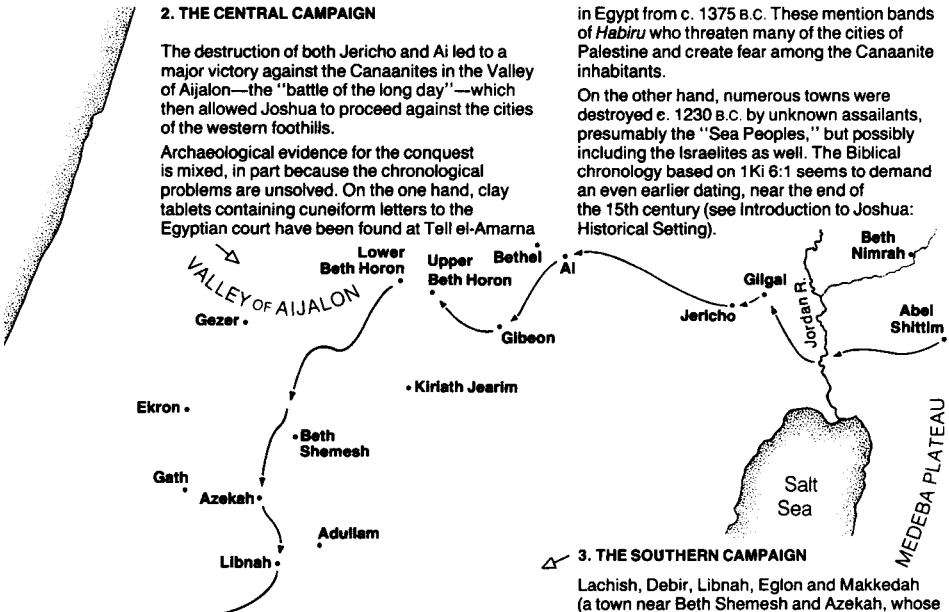
The conquest of Canaan followed a course that in retrospect appears as though it had been planned by a brilliant strategist. Taking Jericho gave Israel control of its strategic plains, fords and roads as a base of operations. When Israel next gained control of the Bethel, Gibeon and the Upper Beth Horon region, she dominated the center of the north-south Palestinian ridge. Subsequently, she was able to break the power of the allied urban centers in separate campaigns south and north.

2. THE CENTRAL CAMPAIGN

The destruction of both Jericho and Ai led to a major victory against the Canaanites in the Valley of Aijalon—the "battle of the long day"—which then allowed Joshua to proceed against the cities of the western foothills.

Archaeological evidence for the conquest is mixed, in part because the chronological problems are unsolved. On the one hand, clay tablets containing cuneiform letters to the Egyptian court have been found at Tell el-Amarna in Egypt from c. 1375 B.C. These mention bands of Habiru who threaten many of the cities of Palestine and create fear among the Canaanite inhabitants.

On the other hand, numerous towns were destroyed c. 1230 B.C. by unknown assailants, presumably the "Sea Peoples," but possibly including the Israelites as well. The Biblical chronology based on 1Ki 6:1 seems to demand an even earlier dating, near the end of the 15th century (see Introduction to Joshua: Historical Setting).



3. THE SOUTHERN CAMPAIGN

Lachish, Debir, Libnah, Eglon and Makkedah (a town near Beth Shemesh and Azekah, whose exact location is unknown) were all captured by Joshua in his attack on the lowland foothills controlling the approaches to the Judahite plateau.

Several of these towns, most notably Lachish, contain destruction evidence that might possibly be correlated with the Israelite conquest, but with Jericho and Ai, the historical implications are not clear.

repentance (Ro 2:4), but the sin of the Amorites had reached its full measure (Ge 15:16). The annihilation of the Canaanites was the only way that God's gracious purpose could be fulfilled.

21–22 The report of Anakites in the land had earlier discouraged Israel from entering while they were encamped at Kadesh Barnea (Dt 1:19–33). Now, in summarizing the victories of the Israelites, they triumphed over these very people. Joshua as leader of the army is credited with the accomplishments of his subordinates (cf. 15:13–14, 17–19). "Gaza, Gath and Ashdod" were three of the five Philistine cities that were located in the southern coastal plain. This verse places that whole region outside Israelite territory.

23 On the statement "Joshua took the entire land," see comment on v.16. "He gave it as an inheritance" is a transitional statement: with the Conquest completed (chs. 1–12), the author turns to the division of the land (chs. 13–19).

"Then the land had rest from war" is a profound declaration and a fitting conclusion for the first section of the book. It is prophetic of the "rest" that will come when all evil has been conquered and Christ is made King of Kings and Lord of Lords (Rev 11:15; 19:16).

F. A List of Defeated Kings (12:1–24)

The Conquest is summarized by listing the kings that Israel defeated. East of the Jordan there were only two kings, each of whom ruled a wide area with many cities. The land west of the Jordan was divided into individual city-states. Israel's conquests on both sides of the Jordan are mentioned together here to emphasize the unity of the nation. The conquests summarized in this chapter do not begin to reach the boundaries stated in 1:4. Consult the map for the exact location of the territories taken.

1. Kings whom Moses defeated (12:1–6)

1 East of the Jordan River, the Israelites, led by Moses, took all the land from the Arnon River, which enters the Dead Sea at about its midpoint, to Mount Hermon in the north. "The Arabah" refers to the Jordan Valley.

2–3 Most of that territory is either mountainous or high plateau; accordingly the inhabitants are called Amorites (cf. 3:10). Sihon and Og are called the two kings of the Amorites (2:10; 9:10). The defeat of Sihon is recorded in Nu 21:21–31 and Dt 2:26–37, and his territory from the Arnon River on the south to the base of the Sea of Galilee (Kinnereth) on the north, from the Jordan River on the west to slopes of the Abarim mountains on the east was taken. It was from the slopes of Pisgah that Moses was permitted to view the Promised Land (Dt 34:1).

4–5 Israel's victory over Og is recorded in Nu 21:33–35 and Dt 3:1–11. "Bashan" is the rich pastureland east of the Sea of Galilee, bordered by the Yarmuk River on the south, Mount Hermon on the north, and Salecah on the east. Og was one of the last of a race of giants called "Rephaites" (cf. Ge 14:5; Dt 3:11).

6 Moses is mentioned at the end of vv.1–6 and Joshua at the beginning of vv.7–24 to place them side by side and highlight the way the work of Joshua complemented the work of Moses.

2. Kings whom Joshua defeated (12:7–24)

7–8 The boundaries of the territory that Joshua conquered are mentioned here. All this territory is west of the Jordan River. Consult a map for what is covered in this land. For "Hittites" et al., see 3:10.

9–24 This is a catalog of the kings killed by Joshua. The ones referred to in vv.6–13a are those mentioned in chs. 6–10. The kings and armies of Jerusalem, Jarmuth, and Gezer were killed, but the cities were not captured. This may have been true of other cities also (cf. Jdg 1:27). The necessity to specify that Ai was "near Bethel" (v.9) suggests that there were other ruins with this same name. "Hormah" (v.14) means "destruction"; this name was given to a number of cities that had been destroyed (cf. Nu 14:44–45; 21:1–3; Jdg 1:16–17).

Regarding Bethel (v.16), the army of Bethel participated in the battle of Ai (cf. 8:17), but the account does not record the killing of either king or army. The conquest of Bethel is reported in Jdg 1:22–26. As we have seen, however, some cities were conquered more than once. With the name of Bethel, the list turns to cities in the central and northern parts of Palestine.

"Tirzah" (v.24) was the capital of the northern kingdom of Israel until the time of Omri (1Ki 14:17; 15:21, 33; 16:6–24).

II. Dividing the Promised Land (13:1–21:45)

A. The Command to Divide the Land (13:1–7)

1 Perhaps Joshua was about the same age as Caleb, whose age is given as eighty-five years in 14:10. This notice concerning Joshua's advanced age is evidence that the Conquest took a long time. The Lord had to remind Joshua of his unfinished task. The division of the land (v.7) was a part of his original commission from the Lord (1:6; Dt 31:7), and it had to be completed before Joshua died.

2–5 A description follows of large areas that remained unconquered along the coast and in the far north (the many cities scattered here and there that had not been captured are not taken into consideration here). "The regions of the Philistines and Geshurites" is the southern coastland along the Mediterranean Sea. The Philistines continued to oppress and harass the Israelites throughout the period of the Judges and the reign of Saul, until they were subdued by David. "Shihor" refers to the River of Egypt, which flows from the Sinai Peninsula into the Mediterranean Sea about forty-five miles southwest of Gaza and marked the boundary between Egypt and Palestine.

"Ekron" was the farthest north of the five major Philistine cities; it was regarded as "Canaanite," for although the Philistines were not Canaanite, they had taken this area from the Canaanites. Gaza, Ashdod, and Ashkelon were near the coast, whereas Gath and Ekron were farther inland. "Canaanite" refers here to any people, irrespective of origin, who lived in the lowlands. "Sidonian" here includes all the residents of the northern coastal plains.

6–7 The Lord reaffirmed his promise to drive out the inhabitants of the land (cf. 3:10). From this point on, however, further conquests would be the concern of the individual tribes. Moreover, the promise was conditional and was never completely fulfilled because Israel was disobedient to the command of the Lord (cf. v.13).

Joshua was to divide all the land promised to Israel, whether or not Israel possessed all of it at this time. The word translated "allocate" (GK 5877) refers to the casting of lots. The use of lots placed everything in the hands of God and freed Joshua and the elders from any possible charge of favoritism. The concept of "inheritance" (GK 5709) was very important in Israelite society. One's inheritance was a piece of real estate that was the inalienable possession of one's family. A large portion of OT legislation is dedicated to regulating and protecting the rights of inheritance (cf. 17:3–6).

B. Division of the Land East of the Jordan (13:8–33)

1. Introduction (13:8–14)

8 The Transjordanian tribes receive a disproportionate amount of attention in this book that records the Conquest and division of the land west of the Jordan (cf. 1:12–15; 4:12; 12:1–6; 13:8–33; 22:1–34). The author was eager to uphold the unity of the Twelve Tribes in spite of the geographic separation.

9–13 The author describes the land east of the Jordan River that became the inheritance of Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh. It covered all the land that had been ruled by "Sihon king of the Amorites" (see 12:2–3) and Og king of Bashan (see 12:4–5). The area stretched from the Jordan to the mountainous plateaus to the east. For Moses' victory over Og and Sihon, see Nu 21:21–35; Dt 2:26–37. Though this book celebrates God's great promises and Israel's mighty victories, it does not conceal the fact that sometimes the fulfillment of the promises was limited by Israel's failure to obey fully the command of the Lord.

14 The Levites had been set apart for the service of the tabernacle and the altar (Ex 32:29; 38:21; Nu 3:45; see comment on 14:3–4 for how this affected the numbering of the twelve tribes).

2. The inheritance of Reuben (13:15–23)

15–21 Beginning with Reuben in the south, a slightly more detailed description is given of the inheritance of each of the two-and-a-half tribes. The distribution "clan by clan" is in agreement with the principle laid down that the larger tribes were to receive a larger territory (see Nu 26:52–56). "Bamoth Baal" (v.17), near Medeba, was one of the places from which Balaam attempted to curse Israel (Nu 22:41). Sihon fought with Israel at "Jahaz" (v.18; cf. Nu 21:23; Dt 2:32).

"Beth Peor" (v.20) was another place from which Balaam tried to curse Israel (Nu 23:28). It was here that the Israelites engaged in sexual immorality with Moabite women and in idolatry (Nu 25:1–3). This was the place Moses delivered his farewell address to Israel (Dt 3:29), and he was buried nearby (Dt 34:6). The defeat of the "Midianite chiefs" (v.21) is recorded in Nu 31:8, where they are called "kings."

22–23 When the Israelites were traveling north from the desert into Transjordan, Balaam was hired by Balak king of Moab to curse them. Each time he tried, the Lord made him bless Israel instead (Nu 22–24; cf. Jos 24:9–10). Balaam's death is reported in Nu 31:8. Though the OT does not give the reason why Balaam was slain, Rev 2:14 makes him responsible for the sin of Israel recorded in Nu 25:1–5 (cf. Dt 23:4–5; Ne 13:2; Mic 6:5). The word "villages" (v.23) often refers to unwalled settlements outside a fortified city. Few cities in Transjordan had walls; therefore it is more likely that it refers to land around the city that was under cultivation or was used for raising livestock.

3. The inheritance of Gad (13:24–28)

24–28 Gad received the central region in Transjordan. "Jazer" became a Levitical town (21:39). Since the Israelites had been forbidden to take any of the Ammonite territory (Dt 2:19, 37), "half the Ammonite country" may refer to land first taken from the Ammonites by Sihon and then taken from Sihon by the Israelites. "Rabbah" (v.25) was the principal city of the Ammonites. "Mahanaim" (v.26) is on the Jabbok River on the border between Gad and Manasseh (see v.30); it was there that Jacob was met by two angels on his way back from Paddan Aram to Canaan (Ge 32:2). At the River Jabbok Jacob wrestled with God (Ge 32:22–30). "Sea of Kinnereth" (v.27) is the Sea of Galilee.

4. The inheritance of the half-tribe of Manasseh (13:29–31)

29–31 The territory allocated to the half-tribe of Manasseh is the northern part of Transjordan and is not described in as much detail as the territories of Reuben and Gad. Here the name "Makir" is used to designate the tribe of Manasseh (cf. Ge 50:23).

5. Summary (13:32–33)

32–33 Verse 32 brings down the curtain on the account of the distribution of the land east of the Jordan. Verse 33 repeats the statement in v.14, because of its importance.

C. Division of the Land West of the Jordan (14:1–19:51)

1. Introduction (14:1–5)

The amount of space devoted to the description of the territory of each of the tribes and the order of presentation correspond to the importance of each particular tribe in Israel's history. Accordingly, Judah—the tribe of David, Solomon, and their successors—is treated most thoroughly. Then the tribes of Joseph are considered, who so predominated the northern kingdom that Ephraim became one of its names. The third and last tribe to be given special treatment is Benjamin, the tribe of Saul, Israel's first king.

1 Only the territory west of the Jordan was called the land of Canaan. Though at times the dimensions of the land promised to Israel are described as reaching from the River of Egypt to the river Euphrates (e.g., 1:4), there is a strong, persistent tradition that the Promised Land was much more restricted. "Eleazar the priest" was to assist Joshua in dividing the land. As priest he was the one who wore the ephod with the Urim and Thummim by means of which the will of God was determined (Nu 27:21). "The heads of the tribal clans" had been chosen by Moses, as commanded by the Lord, to help in the division of the land (Nu 34:17–29).

2 The land was to be "assigned by lot [GK 1598]." Presumably the priest Eleazar employed the Urim and Thummim (cf. Nu 27:21; 34:17). For Israel the use of lots left the choice completely in the hands of God (see 7:14). The old refrain "as the Lord had commanded through Moses" is repeated again to drive home the point that obedience is the key to God's blessing.

3–4 Once again material about the two-and-a-half tribes is repeated (cf. 1:15; 12:6; 13:8–32). Since "the Levites" had been set apart to serve in the tabernacle (Nu 35:1–8), Ephraim and Manasseh were treated as separate tribes to preserve the full number twelve (cf. Ge 48:5). They were to be apportioned towns and agricultural lands throughout the territories of all the other tribes (ch. 21).

5 Typical of OT narrative style, the introduction ends in a statement summarizing what the following account relates in detail.

2. The inheritance of Judah (14:6–15:63)

a. Caleb's inheritance (14:6–15)

6 Caleb and Joshua were the two faithful spies who believed God was able to give Israel the land of Canaan (Nu 14:6–9, 30). The receiving of their inheritances frames the story of the dividing of the land among the nine-and-a-half tribes, with Caleb's at the beginning and Joshua's at the end (19:49–50). Caleb and Joshua are living examples of God's faithfulness in fulfilling his promises made more than forty years earlier.

In Ge 15:19 the Kenizzites are listed as one of the pagan nations whose land God was giving to Israel. When Caleb is called a Kenizzite, it may mean no more than that one of Caleb's ancestors was named Kenaz (cf. 15:17; 1Ch 4:13, 15). This title "man of God" is ascribed to Moses also in Dt 33:1; Ezr 3:2, and in the title of Ps 90. For what God said to Moses about Caleb and Joshua, see Nu 14:30.

7–9 The spy mission Caleb participated in is recorded in Nu 13. Caleb's report was characterized by bold confidence in God (Nu 13:30; 14:6–9). The statement that Caleb "followed the LORD my God wholeheartedly" is found three times in this brief passage (vv.9, 14). It describes him as one who really lived out the theme of this book and is the reason he was still alive and would inherit part of the land (cf. Dt 1:36).

10–11 Of all who were twenty years and older when Israel left Egypt, only Caleb and Joshua lived to enter the Promised Land. Caleb was now "eighty-five years old." From this passage we can calculate the approximate number of years involved in the Conquest. Forty years old at the time of the spy mission plus thirty-eight years of wandering leaves seven years for the Conquest.

12 The "hill country . . . Anakites . . . cities . . . large and fortified" are the very things that the ten faithless spies used to discourage the Israelites from entering the Promised Land (Nu 13:28–29). Caleb viewed them as a challenge. By faith Joshua and Caleb triumphed over the formidable foe who intimidated the unbelieving Israelites.

13–15 Some believe that when Joshua blessed Caleb, he bestowed on him the spiritual qualities needed for this dangerous venture. For "Then the land had rest from war," see 11:23. In Jdg 1:9–10 the conquest of Hebron is credited to the men of Judah. Hebron is only one of many cities that had to be captured more than once (e.g., Jerusalem; see comment on 15:63).

b. The borders of Judah (15:1–12)

1 Judah, the tribe of the great Davidic dynasty, was the first tribe to receive its allotted territory in Canaan. God had commanded that when the land was divided the size of the territory should correspond to the size of the respective tribe or clan (Nu 33:54). In the process of carrying out the command, Joshua gave Judah a territory larger than her numbers merited (19:9). The "territory of Edom" was east of the Arabah. Here, however, Edom may refer to Amalekites living in the Sinai Peninsula and the southern Negev (cf. Ge 36:12). "The Desert of Zin" is around Kadesh Barnea (see Nu 20:1). Judah's lot was "in the extreme south." The description of Judah's southern boundary is in close agreement with the southern boundary of Canaan as described in Nu 34:3–5.

2–5 The word "bay" here refers to the extreme northern and southern ends of the "the Salt Sea" (i.e., the Dead Sea). "Zin" and "Kadesh Barnea" are both localities within the Desert of Zin. The latter would have been the staging point for the Israelite's invasion of the land of Canaan had they trusted in God (cf. Nu 13:26–33). "The Wadi of Egypt" is the River of Egypt that flows from the Sinai Peninsula into "the sea" (i.e., the Mediterranean Sea). "The northern boundary" of Judah corresponds to the southern boundaries of Benjamin (18:14–19) and of Dan (19:41–46).

6–7 The expressions "go up" and "go down" are used in the OT with reference to the elevation of the land. Here the border of Judah ascends from the Valley of Achor, which borders on the Dead Sea. "Gilgal" is a different Gilgal from the one on the plains of Jericho which Joshua made his base of operations when he entered Canaan (4:19).

8-11 "The Valley of Ben Hinnom" is the wide, deep valley on the south and east of the old city Jerusalem. "The Valley of Rephaim" is west of Jerusalem. The border around Jerusalem is described in greater detail, perhaps to make clear that Jerusalem was not included in the territory of Judah. "Mount Seir" (v.10) was on the west side of Jerusalem (not to be confused with Mount Seir in Edom); "Mount Jearim" is about ten miles west of Jerusalem. "Ekron" is one of the cities of the Philistines (see 13:3).

12 "The Great Sea" is the Mediterranean. With the Mediterranean as her western boundary, Judah's allotment included Philistine and Geshurite territory that had not been conquered yet (cf. 13:1–3). This was in conformity with the Lord's command (13:6) that the entire land of Palestine be allotted in the confidence that some day all would belong to Israel.

c. The inheritance of Caleb's daughter (15:13–19)

13 God promised Caleb that he would inherit the land he had explored (14:9; Nu 14:24). In the providence of God, this area fell within the borders of his own tribe.

14–17 The "three Anakites" (cf. Nu 13:22) were living in Hebron at the time of the first spy mission; there are three accounts of their defeat (11:21–22; 14:10–15; 15:13–14). Caleb led the attack on Debir, but Othniel captured it. As in the case of Hebron, this victory is also credited to Joshua as commander-in-chief (10:36–39). It was not uncommon to offer special incentives for acts of bravery (cf. 1Sa 17:25; 18:17, 25; 1Ch 11:6). Othniel later became one of the judges of Israel (Jdg 3:7–11). The phrase "Caleb's brother" can refer to any male member of the same clan or tribe. The word "brother" (GK 278) can mean simply "relative" or "ally"; but Jdg 1:13; 3:9, where Othniel is called "Caleb's younger brother," seems to favor the idea of "blood brother."

18–19 The word "a special favor" (GK 1388) is commonly translated "blessing." Perhaps Caleb's daughter was asking her father for a wedding gift. She needed "springs of water." Land in the Negev is of little value without water, but it is very productive when irrigated. Othniel recognized the validity of her request.

d. The towns of Judah (15:20–63)

20 Possibly the list of towns assigned to Judah comes from an administrative register where the southern kingdom of Judah was divided into twelve districts for such purposes as taxation and military conscription. The towns of Judah made up ten and one-half districts and the towns of Benjamin made up the other one and one-half (cf. 18:11, 21). This list described the homeland that God had given to the tribe of Judah. It is another evidence of the historical, down-to-earth nature of God's redemptive program (cf. Jn 1:14).

21–32 "The southernmost towns" are mostly in the Negev (esp. those in vv.26–32)—towns that are also ascribed to Simeon in 19:1–9. There it is stated that the territory given to Judah was "more than they needed" (19:9). Consequently some of it was reassigned to Simeon. The distribution of the land was not all completed at once; rather it took place over an extended period of time (see 18:1–10). Thirty-six towns are named here. Even if some of the names are combined or accounted for in other ways, it seems impossible to reduce the list to "twenty-nine towns." The solution to the problem is not clear.

"Ziklag" (v.30) is the town that Achish, king of Gath, gave David as a place for him and his men to live during his time of exile from King Saul (1Sa 27:6). This was therefore one of the towns that was assigned to Judah but not occupied by them until years later.

33–47 "Zorah" is the highest point in the Shephelah. This town and Eshtaol were the scenes of some of Samson's exploits (Jdg 13:25; 16:31). "Lachish" and "Eglon" were the main towns of two of the southern kings allied with Adnoi-Zedek (see 10:1–5). "Beth Dagon" (v.41) means "house of Dagon," the god of the Philistines (see 1Sa 5:2–7).

"Ekron," "Ashdod," and "Gaza" (vv.45–47) were three of the five major Philistine cities (see comment on 13:1–5). Though assigned to Judah, these three were not possessed until many years later. The style of these three verses differs markedly from all the others in this list of towns assigned to Judah, both in the inclusion of the phrase "its surrounding settlements and villages" and in the omission of the concluding statement that gives the total number of cities.

48–60 The cities in this section were located in the vicinity of Hebron (cf. 10:3–5, 36, 39; 14:13–15). Hebron became a city of refuge (20:7) and a Levitical town (21:11). "Carmel" (v.55) must not be confused with Mount Carmel on the Mediterranean seacoast. It is seven and one-half miles south-southeast of Hebron. Nor should "Jezreel" (v.56) be confused with the town of the same name in the Valley of Esdraelon.

61–62 "The desert" refers to the desert area on the eastern border of Judah along the shore of the Dead Sea. In the title of Ps 63, it is called "the Desert of Judah" (cf. 12:8). "The City of Salt" may be Khirbet Qumran, the center of the Essene community made famous through the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls. "En Gedi" is near the midpoint of the Dead Sea.

63 The statement "Judah could not dislodge the Jebusites" is strange because Jerusalem was part of the territory assigned to Benjamin (18:28), and the description of the northern border of Judah so carefully excludes Jerusalem (see comment on vv.8–11). Judges 1:8 records that the men of Judah did capture the city. Then in v.21 we have the same statement as here, only it states that Benjamin did not capture Jerusalem. The final conquest of Jerusalem was accomplished under the direction of King David (2Sa 5:6–10). Some cities seem to have changed hands several times before they were securely in Israel's control. The admission that Judah was unable to dislodge the Jebusites is strange in a book that exalts the supernatural power of God, who gave victory to his people over all their enemies. Joshua records a remarkable mixture of miracle and human effort—a combination of divinely aided victory and of failure that resulted from Israel's disobedience and unbelief. Thus God is revealed as sovereign. He responds to the needs of his covenant people but is not subject to their whims.

3. The inheritance of the Joseph tribes (16:1–17:18)

a. Introduction (16:1–4)

1–3 "The allotment for Joseph" was divided between the tribe of Ephraim (vv.5–10) and the half-tribe of Manasseh (17:1–13; for the other half-tribe of Manasseh, see 13:8–13). The importance of the tribe of Joseph is reflected in their lot being drawn second and in the comparatively large amount of space devoted to the description of their territory. The southern border of Joseph is actually the northern borders of Benjamin (18:11–14) and Dan (19:40–48). "The Jordan of Jericho" designates the Jordan near Jericho. Jericho itself was in the allotment of Benjamin (18:12), as was Bethel (18:22).

Nothing is known about the "Arkites" (v.2) except that David's counselor Hushai was from that clan (2Sa 15:32; 16:16). The "Japhletites" (v.3) were another non-Israelite clan about which nothing is known (but cf. 1Ch 7:32–33). "The Sea" is the Mediterranean.

4 The order in which "Manasseh and Ephraim" are mentioned is the actual order of birth. The order in which their respective territories are described reflects the ascendancy of Ephraim (cf. Ge 48:12–20). The descriptions of the inheritances of the Joseph tribes contain no lists of towns.

b. The inheritance of Ephraim (16:5–10)

5–9 Although much space is devoted to Ephraim and Manasseh, the description of their territories is fragmentary and difficult to follow. Apparently vv.5–6a are a severely abbreviated restatement of the southern boundary. Then, beginning at "Michmethath," the point farthest north, the boundary is traced east and south until it joins the southern boundary forming the eastern border. Beginning again at the far north, the northern boundary is followed to the Mediterranean Sea, which formed the western border.

10 On Israel's failure to "dislodge the Canaanites," see comment on 15:63. The king and the army from "Gezer" were defeated by Joshua (10:30). Many natives of Canaan who survived were conscripted as "forced labor" for Israel (Jdg 1:28–30, 33, 35). The commands of God allowed Israel to subject the people from cities outside Palestine to forced labor, but the population of the cities inside the Promised Land were to be put to death without pity and without exception (Dt 20:10–18). Because they failed to do so, the Israelites were corrupted by intermarrying with these pagans and engaging in their perverse and idolatrous worship (Jdg 2:1–3; 3:5–6; 10:6).

c. The inheritance of Manasseh (17:1–13)

1–2 Manasseh was "Joseph's firstborn" son (Ge 41:51). "Makir" is called "Manasseh's firstborn" when, as it appears, Makir was Manasseh's only son (Ge 50:23). At times Makir's name is used to designate the half-tribe of Manasseh that settled east of the Jordan.

From the records we have (Nu 26:29–34; cf. 1Ch 7:14–19), it is difficult to unravel the genealogy of Manasseh. The phrase "the rest of the people of Manasseh" (v.2) designates the half-tribe that did not receive its inheritance in Transjordan. "Male descendants" are specified because the following paragraph deals with the inheritance of the daughters of Zelophehad.

3–6 "Hepher" (cf. 12:17) and "Tirzah" (cf. 12:24) were also the names of Canaanite towns whose kings Joshua killed. The presence of those same names in the genealogy of Manasseh gives evidence that Canaanites were assimilated into Israel.

In the four instances in this book where Joshua and Eleazar are mentioned together, Eleazar is always named first, perhaps out of respect for his crucial role as high priest (see 14:1; 19:51; 21:1).The daughters of Zelophehad based their claim on what "the LORD commanded Moses." An unusual privilege and a remarkable measure of equality were granted to these women. On brothers, see comment on 15:14–17. The "ten tracts" (v.5) are one each for five of Gilead's sons and one each for the five daughters of his sixth son.

7–13 The description of "the territory of Manasseh" is very confusing. It provides little more than a clearer definition of the border with Ephraim. "Shechem," between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerazim, is mentioned frequently in the patriarchal stories in Genesis. It was chosen to be a Levitical town (21:21) and one of the cities of refuge (20:7). Joshua gathered all Israel in Shechem for his farewell address and covenant renewal (ch. 24).

"Tappuah" (v.8) was one of several towns within the boundaries of Manasseh that belonged to Ephraim (cf. 16:9). For "bordered Asher on the north," see 19:24–31; for "Issachar on the east," see 19:17–23. While Manasseh's northern boundary was the Valley of Esdraelon, a few of their towns lay "within Issachar and Asher."

d. The complaint of the Joseph tribes (17:14–18)

14 The relative sizes of the various tribes as recorded in Nu 26 indicate that Ephraim and Manasseh should have qualified for one allotment each. However, considering the relative size of the territory granted to each tribe, it becomes apparent that the first two lots in the territory west of the Jordan were disproportionately large (i.e., Judah and Joseph). Moreover, their land was the most fertile in all Palestine. The Joseph tribes had little reason to complain.

15 Joshua was certainly justified in resisting their request. He challenged them instead to occupy the area already assigned to them. "The hill country of Ephraim" is the central mountainous region. The "Rephaites," like the Anakites, were a people of unusually large stature (cf. 12:4). As Caleb defeated the Anakites, so, with God's help, a great tribe like Ephraim should be able to conquer the Rephaites.

16–18 The Joseph tribes' response shows that their difficulty was not the size of the allotment nor the forested condition of the highlands; it was the presence of other inhabitants in the plain whom they felt unable to drive out because of their "iron chariots" (actually constructed of wood with iron points and iron reinforcements). In response, Joshua again reminded them that they were "numerous and very powerful" and able to provide for their needs within the area already assigned to them.

4. Division of the rest of the land (18:1–19:51)

a. Joshua's rebuke of the seven tribes (18:1–10)

1 "The whole assembly" refers to the seven tribes who had not yet received their specific inheritance (cf. v.3). The Tent of Meeting, mentioned explicitly only twice in Joshua (cf. 22:19), had been moved from Gilgal to Shiloh. This transfer was symbolic of the completion of the Conquest, for Shiloh was in the center of Canaan; it now became the center of national life, and here the final allotments of land were made. Yet even though the Israelites had the land "under their control," they still did not possess it all (cf. 13:1–5; Jdg 1:30–36).

The expression "in the presence of the LORD" occurs a number of times (e.g., vv.6, 8, 10) and means "before" or "near the ark of the covenant," which was housed in the "Tent of Meeting." When the Israelites moved the Tent of Meeting to Shiloh, they moved the ark of the covenant there, too, which remained there until it was captured by the Philistines (1Sa 4:1–11).

2 The statement "there were still seven Israelite tribes who had not yet received their inheritance" implies that a significant amount of time had elapsed. Apparently the remaining tribes had grown complacent. They were satisfied with nomadic life in the fertile land of Ephraim and Manasseh and were not eager to be involved in the warfare required to claim their own territory.

3 The word "Israelites" here refers only to those tribes who had not received their land. Joshua reproved them for the ingratitude and unbelief manifested in their failure to take what God had already given to them. Joshua was eager to complete his commission, which included the division of the land among the tribes.

4–5 The appointment of "three men from each tribe" was part of a new system devised for dividing the remainder of the land. The phrase "according to the inheritance of each" means that the land was to be divided into equitable portions that could then be assigned by lot. Those portions that were already assigned (to Judah and to Joseph) were to stand.

6–7 The casting of lots was done under Joshua's authority, though Eleazar actually did it (14:1–2; 19:51; cf. Nu 27:21). On casting lots "in the presence of the LORD," see comment on v.1. Joshua repeats the information about the Levites and the two-and-a-half tribes (cf. 13:3–32; 14:3–4). The two-and-a-half tribes from east of the Jordan must have become impatient to have the division of the land completed so that they could return home to their families and possessions.

8–10 The men were to describe each area "town by town" because the number and nature of the towns were more important to them than the precise borders or the number of square miles. Once again "Israelites" refers only to the seven tribes who as yet had not received any inheritance (cf. v.1). For a quick perspective on where these territories were, consult the map of the land of the twelve tribes.

b. The inheritance of Benjamin (18:11–28)

11 Benjamin was not the largest of the seven tribes receiving their allotments; yet theirs is described in greater detail than most others. Perhaps the author had more information about Benjamin. If these lists came from an administrative register (see comment on 15:20), that in itself might account for the amount of detail.

12–13 "The north side" of Benjamin corresponds to the southern border of Ephraim (16:1–3). Beth Horon belonged to Ephraim.

14–20 "Along the western side" means the western boundary of Benjamin. "The southern side" of Benjamin was the northern boundary of Judah (15:5–9). Many of the places mentioned here are referred to in 15:5–8 (see comments).

21–28 The towns allotted to Benjamin are divided into two lists. The first records twelve cities in the east (vv.21–24); the second, fourteen cities in the west (vv.25–28).

22–28 Many of these cities lie between Bethel to the north (see 7:2; cf. Jdg 1:22–23) and Jerusalem (also called "the Jebusite city"; see 15:8, 63) to the south.

c. The inheritance of Simeon (19:1–9)

1 All the towns allotted to Simeon had been given first to Judah. The text clearly states (v.9) that because Judah's portion was too large, some of the towns were reassigned to Simeon. According to the blessing Simeon and Levi received from Jacob shortly before his death (Ge 49:7), their descendants were destined to be scattered among the other tribes as punishment for their violent revenge against the Shechemites (Ge 34).

2–6 The first group of the towns of Simeon (thirteen in all) are in the Negev. "Beersheba" was an important fortress on Judah's southern border in the time of the divided kingdom.

7–8 In the second group of the towns of Simeon (four in all), two are in the Negev and two in the foothills (see also 15:28–32).

9 All the towns assigned to Simeon were located within the borders of Judah; thus the tribe of Simeon was soon assimilated by Judah. Apparently 1Ki 19:3 reflects a period when the assimilation was complete, because Beersheba is called Beersheba in Judah.

d. The inheritance of Zebulun (19:10–16)

10–16 Though Zebulun was the younger brother of Issachar, he received his inheritance first (cf. 17:1). Their cities are in the vicinity of Nazareth (in Galilee) and Mount Tabor. "Bethlehem" (v.15) is Beth Lahm east of Mount Carmel and should not be confused with Bethlehem in Judah. To arrive at a total of "twelve towns," some of the towns named in defining the border of Zebulun would have to be included.

e. The inheritance of Issachar (19:17–23)

17–23 No description of the borders of Issachar is given, only a list of towns. Their inheritance lay mostly in the plain of Jezreel and was bounded on the west by Zebulun, on the north by Naphtali, on the east by the Jordan River, and on the south by Manasseh. "Beth Shemesh" (v.22) is to be distinguished from Beth Shemesh in Judah (15:10) and Beth Shemesh in Naphtali (v.38).

f. The inheritance of Asher (19:24–31)

24–31 Asher's territory was located primarily on the western slopes of the mountains of Galilee and bordering on the Mediterranean Sea.

g. The inheritance of Naphtali (19:32–39)

32–39 The territory given to Naphtali lay between Asher and the Jordan. Its southern tip lies at the foot of Mount Tabor (where Zebulun, Issachar, and Naphtali came together). "Kinnereth" (v.35) is on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee. Naphtali reached almost to Mount Hermon in the north.

h. The inheritance of Dan (19:40–48)

40–48 The inheritance of Dan lay between the inheritance of Judah and that of Ephraim. To form this territory Judah gave up some of its northern towns (e.g., "Zorah" and "Eshtaol"; see 15:33), and Ephraim gave up some of its southern towns. Dan's allotment overlapped Philistine territory, a situation that is reflected in the Samson stories. "Leshem" is also known as Laish (Jdg 18:29). The rather gruesome tale of the capture of this town by men from the tribe of Dan is related in Jdg 18.

5. Joshua's inheritance (19:49–51)

49–50 The description of the inheritances allotted to Caleb (14:6–15) and Joshua provided a framework within which land was allotted to the nine-and-a-half tribes. They were men of faith; therefore this arrangement symbolizes the spiritual truth that the gift of the land to Israel is predicated on faith. The words "as the LORD had commanded" must be a reference to Nu 14:24, 30.

51 The dividing of the land among the various tribes was complete. All that remained was to designate the cities of refuge (ch. 20) and the Levitical towns (ch. 21). This summary is similar to the introduction in 14:1, with which the division of the land began.

D. The Cities of Refuge (20:1–9)

1. The rationale (20:1–6)

1–2 Murder is regarded as a very serious crime in the OT (Ex 20:13; Dt 5:17). Capital punishment is prescribed in all cases of murder to uphold the sanctity of all life (Ge 9:4–6). The land itself is defiled whenever murder goes unpunished (Nu 35:33). Blood vengeance can be traced back to Cain, who expected to be killed in revenge for the murder of Abel (Ge 4:13–14). The provision of "cities of refuge" was without parallel among the civilizations of the Near East. The provision was made to distinguish between murder and accidental killing (manslaughter) and to grant the right of trial to suspected murderers.

3 God's law distinguished between willful murder and manslaughter (Nu 35:6–34; Dt 19:1–13). In either case one had to leave his family and possessions and go immediately to the place of asylum to avoid being killed without a proper hearing. The elders of the cities of refuge were to provide protection and a trial for such people (Nu 35:25). Even though the law made provision for a strong centralized government to enforce the laws, at various times in Israel's history this was lacking. Thus the responsibility to protect rights to property or to avenge a murder fell to the victim's closest relative, who was called "the avenger of blood." Vengeance was to be a deterrent to murder.

4 The city gate controlled all traffic in or out of the city and thus facilitated its defense. Normally there were benches where the elders would sit to adjudicate cases of various kinds (cf. Ru 4:1–12). The accused had to "state his case," for sanctuary was not granted indiscriminately. A person was to be regarded innocent until proven guilty, and a minimum of two witnesses was required to condemn one accused of murder (Nu 35:30). The elders of these cities must "admit him . . . and give him a place to live," and presumably also a means of livelihood.

5 The command "they must not surrender" indicates that the accused murderer must be assumed to be innocent. The goal of the trial was to determine if the killing was intentional or "without malice aforethought."

6 Protection from the avenger of blood was promised only so long as the accused remained in the city of refuge (Nu 35:26–28). Even if he was only guilty of manslaughter, he had to remain in the city "until the death of the high priest." One who killed another accidentally was held responsible and had to forfeit his freedom for a period of time. It is difficult to understand why the "death of the high priest" was chosen as the time for the sentence to be ended. This may have been a time of general amnesty. The words "then he may go back" suggest that his old situation awaited him on his return. Nothing is said about what would be done for his family and his possessions while he was detained.

2. The selection (20:7–9)

7 Three cities of refuge were selected in the territory west of the Jordan. They were strategically located so that a person would have ready access to one of them. "Kedesh" (see 12:22) is in the north, "Shechem" (see 8:30; cf. 8:33; Jdg 9:7) in the center, and "Kiriath Arba" or Hebron (see 14:15) in the south. The last one was given to Caleb as a reward for his unwavering faithfulness (14:6–14). In 21:12 we are told that the agricultural land and the villages remained in Caleb's possession. Perhaps he shared the city with the Levites (see 21:1).

8 The cities of refuge in Transjordan had already been selected (Dt 4:41–43). This passage may refer to the implementation of Moses' selection. This time the three cities are named from south to north (cf. Dt 4:43). "Bezer" was in the south; "Ramoth in Gilead" was in the center; "Golan" was in the north.

9 Asylum in the cities of refuge was offered to "any alien" living within the borders of Israel. This provision is based on the memory of Israel's many years as aliens in Egypt and is a testimony to God's concern for all humanity. Though the Israelites stood against the pagan societies around them, their hearts were to be open to receive any foreigner who would adopt their religion and their customs.

E. Towns for the Levites (21:1–42)

1. Assignment of the towns by lot (21:1–8)

1–3 With the land apportioned to the various tribes, "the family heads of the Levites" felt it was time for them to be given towns to live in, as they had been promised (see comments on Nu 35:1–8). Apparently they would live in them without actually owning them, because their inheritance was to be the service of God (cf. 14:4). Thus they approached Eleazer (he is again named before Joshua here) at "Shiloh" (see comment on 18:1). "The heads of the other tribal families" complete the group of elders entrusted with this important task.

Some towns were assigned to the Levites even though they were still held by the Canaanites. Joshua assigned many portions of unconquered land, apparently confident that God would give Israel possession of these areas also. Four towns from each tribe were set apart for the Levites with the exception that only three were from Naphtali and nine were from the combined territories of Judah and Simeon. Though Levitical towns were selected from every tribe, they were not evenly distributed but seem to have been clustered on the frontiers and in other endangered areas.

4–8 The will of the Lord was determined by lot (see 7:14; 14:2). The "descendants of Aaron" mentioned here are the "Kohathites" (the family of the high priest). Because the temple would be built in Jerusalem, their towns were located in the territories of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin. The number of towns set apart for the descendants of Aaron is indicative of God's providence. At the time of selection, there were only three or four generations of the descendants of Aaron; they would scarcely have needed thirteen towns. The number of towns for each of the Levite clans (thirteen, ten, thirteen, twelve) was cleverly arranged without dividing the towns from any one tribe other than Manasseh, which had already been divided into two half-tribes.

2. The towns of the Kohathites (21:9–26)

a. Towns of the descendants of Aaron (21:9–19)

9–19 "The first lot fell" to the descendants of Aaron, presumably through the providence of God. There was no question in the minds of the Israelites that God controlled the outcome of the casting of lots. The cities of this clan were located in Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin. On the inheritance of Caleb, see 14:6–15. The "villages" were the small settlements outside the walls of the towns.

b. Towns of the remaining Kohathites (21:20–26)

20–26 The towns for this part of the clan of the Kohathites were found in the territory of Ephraim, Dan, and the western half of Manasseh.

3. The towns of the Gershonites (21:27–33)

27–33 The towns of the Gershonite clan of the tribe of Levi were located in the eastern half of Manasseh and in Issachar, Asher, and Naphtali.

4. The towns of the Merarites (21:34–40)

34–40 The towns of the Merarite clan of the tribe of Levi were located in Zebulun, Reuben, and Gad; that is, most of them were east of the Jordan.

5. Summary of the Levitical towns (21:41–42)

41–42 No new information is given in this summary of the preceding verses.

F. God's Promises Fulfilled in the Division of the Land (21:43–45)

43 The statement "the LORD gave Israel" emphasizes God's sovereign action, but Israel's obedient participation was essential. All Canaan was not yet in Israel's possession, nor were all the enemies destroyed; nevertheless Israel was in control of "all the land." God's oath to Abraham had now been fulfilled.

44 The "rest" that "the LORD gave them" was a cessation of hostilities, with the result that the people dwelt securely and serenely in the land (cf. Dt 12:9–10; cf. Heb 4:1–11). "Not one of their enemies withstood them" is a generalized statement. The Gibeonite deception and the existing pockets of resistance do not contradict the fact that Israel was victorious over every enemy that they faced in battle. God had not promised immediate destruction of the Canaanites but only their gradual extermination (Ex 23:30; Dt 7:22).

45 On this note of victory and celebration, the story of the Conquest and the division of the land is completed.

III. Preparation for Life in the Promised Land (22:1–24:33)

A. The Eastern Tribes Return Home (22:1–34)

1. The dismissal of the eastern tribes (22:1–9)

1 The role played by the eastern tribes in the Conquest and their place in the nation and in the worship of the Lord are prominent concerns throughout the book of Joshua. The Jordan River was a formidable natural barrier that isolated the two-and-a-half tribes from the rest of Israel, which would later prove to be a serious threat to the political and religious unity of the nation. Seeds of disunity are already apparent in this chapter.

2–3 The phrase "Moses the servant of the LORD" recalls 1:1–2, and 7. Joshua's words "you have obeyed me" show that they had accepted him as Moses' rightful successor (cf. 1:16–18). Joshua commended these tribes for the great sacrifice they had made, having been separated from their families and unable to work on their newly acquired lands. Their help of their fellow Israelites was regarded as "the mission . . . God gave you," i.e., as service to God.

4 "Rest" means the freedom to live in one's own land without the fear of war (see comment 21:44). "Your homes" (lit., "tents"; GK 185) has a broad usage; when the Israelites settled in the land, they began to live in houses.

5 This is the key verse in this chapter. In order to urge the Transjordanian tribes to continue to be faithful, Joshua reminded them of the way God had rewarded their faithfulness during the Conquest. The "law that Moses . . . gave you" is probably all or part of the book of Deuteronomy (see comment on 1:7). The emphasis here on loving the Lord, walking in his ways, and serving him "with all your heart and all your soul" recalls Dt 6:1–5. This is not legalism (which is rigid obedience to law for its own sake). The law is an expression of God's will for his people and must be obeyed with wholehearted devotion (cf. Jn 14:15).

6 Ritual blessing was an effective means of guaranteeing the well-being of another. The one pronouncing the blessing was acting on behalf of God.

7 The reference to the two divisions of the tribe of Manasseh is strange here. Apparently the circumstance of a tribe being given land on both sides of the Jordan was unusual enough to merit special mention. Perhaps the shorter form "Reubenites and Gadites" (vv. 25, 32–34) is a more convenient way of referring to the two-and-a-half tribes.

8 The Israelites had been enriched with the spoils taken in battle. The command "divide with your brothers" probably means they were to share the booty with those who had remained in Transjordan to guard the women, children, and elderly and to care for the livestock (see 1:14; cf. Nu 31:27; 1Sa 30:23–25).

9 "Shiloh" (see comment on 18:1) was in the hill country of Ephraim; it had been selected as the place of worship. The name "Gilead" designates all Israel's land east of the Jordan. "Israelites" here means, as it does elsewhere, a major portion of the Israelites as distinguished from some smaller portion (see comment on 18:3). Joshua emphasized once again that their land had been given to them by the Lord.

2. The altar of witness (22:10–34)

a. The crisis (22:10–14)

10 At "Geliloth" (either the name of a place or a reference to Galilee or Gilgal), the two-and-a-half tribes built an enormous altar, large enough to be seen easily. Its function was to be a witness, not a place for sacrifice.

11–12 We do not know how much time elapsed before "the Israelites heard" about this project, but the warriors had sufficient time to complete the altar and return to Gilead (v.15). Representatives of the nine-and-a-half tribes gathered at "Shiloh," the political and religious center of the nation. The whole assembly was ready immediately "to go to war." They were not unmindful that the Transjordanian tribes had served them at great personal sacrifice; nevertheless, they would not tolerate what appeared to be a flagrant act of apostasy. They expected dire consequences for the entire nation (vv.17–20; cf. ch. 7) if they did not obey Moses' command to deal severely with any such acts (cf. Lev 17:8–9; Dt 13:12–15).

13–14 The zeal of the Israelites for the honor of God and the purity of his worship might have ended in terrible disaster had they not obeyed God's command to always investigate carefully before taking action (Dt 13:14). In this episode Phinehas is the central figure. He had already distinguished himself as a zealous defender of true worship at Peor (Nu 25:6–18; Ps 106:30), and he could be trusted to confront these tribes. With him went a representative of each of the other tribes, because the investigation and any subsequent action were concerns for the whole nation.

b. The confrontation (22:15–20)

15–16 Building this altar had been viewed as an act of unfaithfulness to God. When the nine-and-a-half tribes pressed for repentance and reconciliation before declaring war, it gave the two-and-a-half tribes an opportunity to explain. Tragedy was averted by the willingness of both sides to dialogue. They did not accuse these men of turning away from the Lord to serve other gods but of deviating from the revealed will of the Lord. Even sacrifices offered in the name of the Lord were viewed as acts of rebellion when they were offered on an unapproved altar (cf. 1Ki 12:26–30).

17–18 The delegates appealed to the mistakes of the past (cf. also v.20). The "sin of Peor" had drawn some Israelites into pagan worship and immorality, and about 24,000 died in a plague that the Lord sent as judgment (Nu 25). "We have not cleansed ourselves from that sin" means that its consequences continued to be experienced. Israel had to struggle continually against idolatry among her own people (cf. 24:23). Any such rebellion would have dire consequences for the entire nation.

19 The word "defiled" (GK 3238) refers to ritual uncleanness and does not necessarily imply anything inherently evil or sinful. The delegates insinuate here that perhaps Transjordan lay outside the sphere of the Lord's blessing and that the two-and-a-half tribes were building this altar to offer sacrifices and to sanctify it. When the nine-and-a-half tribes called Canaan "the LORD's land," it is clear that they did not regard Transjordan as part of the Promised Land. The presence of "the LORD's tabernacle" was further evidence that the land west of the Jordan was especially blessed. Their willingness to "share the land" reveals a beautifully generous spirit and is proof of the sincerity of their concern for orthodox worship.

20 For "the devoted things," see comments on 2:10; 6:17. The Israelites, fearing that the sin of a few would bring judgment once again "upon the whole community," manifested a strong sense of corporate responsibility. If the unfaithfulness of a single individual such as Achan had such dire consequences (7:5, 24–26), what would happen if the two-and-a-half tribes rebelled?

c. The explanation (22:21–29)

21–22 The warriors from Transjordan appealed to God as their witness, using a name that emphasized his omnipotence and sovereignty (cf. Ps 50:1). The repetition of this solemn name indicates how serious they considered the situation to be. If they were guilty, they would not object to being punished.

23–25 The Transjordanians agreed that any departure from the pure worship of the Lord deserved severe judgment; however, they fervently rejected the idea that they had built an altar as a rival to the one at Shiloh. Joshua had expressed fear that the isolation caused by the Jordan might lead to the Transjordanians' turning from the worship of the Lord (v.5). Now they were afraid that this isolation might cause their descendants to be rejected by the rest of Israel.

26–27 In the estimation of the two-and-a-half tribes, the very presence of the altar would be a silent "witness" (GK 6332) to those on the west side of the Jordan that the Transjordanian tribes had every right to be included in the people of Israel and the worship of the Lord (cf. 24:27, where a stone serves as a witness).

28–29 The altar was a "replica" of the Lord's altar because its shape was an integral part of its witness, linking it to the true altar at the Tent of Meeting. Apparently the design of an altar indicated what deity was worshiped at that altar (cf. 2Ki 16:10–16; 2Ch 28:22–25).

d. The resolution (22:30–34)

30–31 The Israelites "were pleased" when they realized that no bloodshed would be necessary, which proves that they were not motivated by a vengeful spirit but were distressed by what appeared to be a flagrant act of apostasy. The faithfulness and unity of God's people were taken as evidence of God's presence and blessing.

32–33 No doubt the leaders of Israel returned from their Transjordanian meeting with joy in their hearts, eager to inform the rest of the community of the good news. Not only were the people "glad to hear the report," they also "praised God." All talk of war ceased.

34 This altar was to be a witness that the Lord was the God of the Transjordanian tribes and the rest of Israel and that they shared a common form and place of worship. Later history reveals that the Israelites in Transjordan were subject to repeated attacks by enemy armies and that they were tempted to worship foreign deities. Ultimately their land was taken from them and their few survivors were assimilated into the rest of Israel.

B. Joshua's Farewell to the Leaders (23:1–16)

1. God's blessing: the reward for faithfulness (23:1–11)

1 Apparently the words "After a long time" mean a long time after Joshua had assumed leadership in Israel. The events of chs. 23–24 probably occurred shortly prior to his death at the age of 110 (24:29). At least twenty-five years had passed since the end of the Conquest because Joshua was the same age as or younger than Caleb (see 14:10).

"Rest" (GK 5663)), a common theme in Joshua, was the goal of the Conquest. It was realized when the major battles were ended and Israel was at peace with "all their enemies," even though all those enemies had not yet been driven out (cf. vv.4–5).

2 In ch. 22 (v.12; cf. v.16) "the whole assembly of Israel" designated representatives of the nine-and-a-half tribes. Joshua could hardly have addressed the whole nation at one time. Most likely 22:1–8 was Joshua's farewell to the Transjordanian tribes. Here the words "all Israel" refer only to those tribes living west of the Jordan. Perhaps the leaders, judges, and officials were subdivisions of the elders (cf. 24:1). The place of assembly is not stated. Joshua's advanced age was his reason for delivering his farewell address at this time.

3 The Israelites had been eyewitnesses of God's mighty acts (cf. 24:31). The theme of Joshua's address is a call for loyalty to the Lord because of all he had done for Israel. Ultimately it was the Lord who had defeated and dispossessed the Canaanites. In this holy war the Israelites did participate with sword and shield; nevertheless the victory was credited to God alone (cf. Dt 1:30; 3:22; 20:4).

4–5 In 13:1–7 the Lord commanded Joshua to divide all of Canaan among the nine-and-a-half tribes (his remarks are limited to the land "between the Jordan and the Great Sea"), even though much of it was yet to be conquered. Israel's lethargy in driving out the last of their enemies is difficult to understand, but it contributed to the fulfillment of God's promise to drive them out "little by little" (Ex 23:30).

6 The command "Be very strong" recalls the words of encouragement directed to Joshua in ch. 1 (vv.6–7, 9, 18). The exhortation to courage and obedience to the Book of the Law in 1:7 is repeated here almost word for word. God's promise was not unconditional; Israel's faithfulness was required.

7 Because Israel replaced a people whose culture was advanced beyond their own, the temptation to worship the pagan gods of the Canaanites must have been overwhelming. Yet if the Israelites adopted any of their wicked practices, they too would be subject to punishment (Dt 8:19–20). God does not show any partiality.

8 The word translated "hold fast" (GK 1815) is used in Ge 2:24 to describe the intimate and binding relationship between husband and wife. Here it is used to describe a close relationship between Israel and God (cf Dt 4:4; 10:20; 11:22; 13:4). In spite of occasional lapses, Israel's behavior was characterized as holding fast to the Lord.

9–11 The motive for faithfulness to the Lord was that he was the God who had given Israel the land. The statement "no one has been able to withstand you" seems to overlook the Israelite defeat at Ai. This, however, was not due to the superiority of that army but to Israel's unfaithfulness. As long as Israel was faithful, the Lord would continue to fight for them. The command to "love the LORD" that was given to the Transjordanian tribes in 22:5 is repeated here for the rest of Israel.

2. God's judgment: the consequences of unfaithfulness (23:12–16)

12 The danger of apostasy was Joshua's great concern here. Thus the people must not "ally" (GK 1815; cf. v.8) themselves to any pagan nations. Alliances with other nations frequently involved intermarriage (cf. Ge 34:9–10) and respect for their gods (cf. 1Ki 11:1–6). Because of the great danger involved in intermarriage, it was strictly prohibited for Israel (Ex 34:12–16; Dt 7:1–6).

13 Just as faithfulness had been essential for Israel to acquire the land, so now it was indispensable if they were to continue to live in the land (cf. Ex 23:30–33; 34:11–12; Nu 33:55).

14 "The way of all the earth" emphasizes the universality of death in human experience (cf. 1Ki 2:2; Ro 5:12). "All the good promises" of the Lord had indeed come true. Israel's victories had been so all-pervasive that pockets of resistance remaining in the land did not detract from their appreciation of God's faithfulness.

15–16 God's faithfulness to his promises meant that he would keep his threats as well. Israel should not suppose that being the recipients of God's blessings made them immune to his judgment. The threats contained here were fulfilled in the Babylonian exile.

Although the concept of a "covenant" (GK 1382) between the Lord and Israel is foundational to the book of Joshua, it is not explicitly referred to often (cf. the ark of the covenant in chs. 3–4; 6; the covenant rites of circumcision and Passover in ch. 5; the ceremony of covenant renewal in 8:30–35). Chapter 24 contains a final ritual of covenant renewal. All this indicates that the Conquest was a religious event and not simply a military exploit.

C. The Covenant Renewed at Shechem (24:1–28)

There are three important elements that are new in this chapter and have no counterpart in ch. 23: (1) the review of Israel's history from the call of Abraham to the present; (2) the responses by the people with their solemn pledge to be faithful to the Lord; (3) the covenant that Joshua drew up for the Israelites. This ceremony of covenant renewal is similar in form to the suzerainty treaties that were common in the ancient Near East (cf. comment on Dt 1:1–5).

1. A recitation of Israel's sacred history (24:1–13)

1 "Shechem," located in the hill country of Ephraim, was one of the towns of Ephraim that were given to the Levites (21:21); it was also a city of refuge (20:7). Shechem may have been chosen as the site for Joshua's last great act of covenant renewal because of its illustrious history (cf. Ge 12:6–7; 35:4).

2 "The River" is the Euphrates, but precisely where the forefathers lived is not indicated (Ge 11:31 specifies Ur in Chaldea). Genesis is strangely silent about the existence of any pagan gods (except for Laban's "household gods" [Ge 31:19]); so it comes as a surprise when we are told they "worshiped other gods."

This excavation is of biblical Shechem; the altar in the foreground may be that of Jos 24. Courtesy Garo Nalbandian.

3–4 Abraham was brought up in pagan idolatry. We know nothing of his conversion to the Lord. Abraham's call required that he go "from the land beyond the River" to "Canaan." Abraham was constantly on the move in that land, where all he ever possessed was the Cave of Machpelah, which he bought as a place of burial (Ge 23). Land and "many descendants" were the major elements in God's promise to Abraham (Ge 15:5, 7, et al.), but neither materialized for several generations. Isaac's son Esau was given a land of his own (the mountains of Seir, south of the Dead Sea), while Jacob and his sons left the land they expected to possess and went into bondage in Egypt.

5–6 Moses and Aaron were the principal figures in the deliverance from Egypt (Ex 3:1–4:17). The second person pronoun "you" is surprising. Though some of his audience may have experienced the Exodus, most had not. In the very next sentence the reference is changed to "your fathers." A bewildering oscillation between second and third persons follows until the climax is reached in the words "you saw with your own eyes" (see comment on v.7). The "sea" is the Red Sea (lit., "the Sea of Reeds"; see comment on Ex 13:17–18).

7 Most of those listening to Joshua had not seen these things. The alternation of pronouns from second to third person expresses Joshua's conviction that all Israel participated in every crucial event in their national history, whether or not they had actually been present. The events during the forty years of wandering are covered in a single sentence: "you lived in the desert for a long time."

8–10 For the defeat of the Amorites, see Nu 21 and Dt 2 and 3. Balak did not actually fight with Israel; the only resistance he offered was the hiring of Balaam to curse them (Nu 22–24; Dt 23:4–5).

11 That the "citizens [GK 1251] of Jericho" (likely a reference to the landowners) had fought against Israel is not reported in ch. 6. The list of these seven nations (see comment on 3:10) stands in apposition to "the citizens of Jericho."

12–13 Possibly the hornet is the terror that the Lord sent to demoralize and immobilize the enemy (cf. 2:9–11, 24; 5:1; see also comment on Ex 23:27–30). The two Amorite kings are examples of those who were driven out by the hornet. The statement "you did not do it with your own sword and bow" does not mean that they did not do any fighting (cf. v.11). Their efforts alone, however, would not account for the victory—it was a gift from God. Verse 13 is clearly the fulfillment of Dt 6:10–11.

2. Joshua's charge and the people's response (24:14–24)

14 At this point the Lord's message (cf. "I" in vv.3–13) to Israel has ended. Joshua challenges the people to "fear [GK 3707] the LORD." Fear may be either destructive or saving (cf. Heb 12:28–29). The very first commandment is "You shall have no other gods before me" (Dt 5:7). Hence, we are shocked to read that Joshua had to command the Israelites to "throw away the gods" of their ancestors (see v.2; cf. Eze 20:7; 23:3, 8). Apparently the Israelites were still worshiping idols in spite of experiencing so many of the Lord's great miracles and victories. Joshua called the people to give undivided loyalty to the Lord as the only way to experience his presence and blessing in the future.

15 Joshua wanted Israel to be honest with themselves and declare their allegiance. Though he said, "Choose" (GK 1047), he did not intend to encourage idolatry but was confident that the very thought of making a commitment to an idol would be so abhorrent to them that they would take a stand against all such worship. Joshua left no doubt as to the choice he had made for him and his household (cf. Ac 16:31).

16–18 Joshua's appeal produced the effect he was looking for: "Far be it from us" was a response involving both the will and the emotions. In denying the charge of idolatry, the Israelites asserted that the Lord had always been and always would be the object of their worship. The people added their personal affirmation to Joshua's recitation of the mighty acts God had done for them. With the words "brought us and our fathers" they identified with their fathers in God's saving purpose.

19–20 Joshua's response is unexpected. After encouraging the Israelites to make a commitment to the Lord, he told them they would be unable to keep it. His purpose was not to discourage them but to lead them to count the cost and to mean what they said (cf. Lk 14:25–35). They did serve God faithfully for many years (cf. v.31). Of course, they were only able to do this by the grace of God. To be God's people they too must be holy (GK 7705; see Lev 11:44). Because the Lord "is a jealous God," he would not tolerate any rival deities or condone any apostasy (Ex 20:5; 34:14; Dt 5:9). Joshua wanted to caution the people not to speak carelessly, because God would hold them accountable.

21–22 When the people said, "No! We will serve the LORD," Joshua could see that his exhortation was producing the desired result. The people's own words would condemn them if at any time in the future they turned from the commitment they had made that day.

23–24 Joshua called for action to substantiate the Israelites' commitment to the Lord. Nothing could be tolerated that might lead to their return to idolatry. The outward expression of discarding their idols was essential, but it had to be accompanied by loyalty from their hearts.

3. Sealing the covenant (24:25–28)

25–26 The covenant that Joshua made was likely a copy of the law of Moses (1:8; 22:5; 23:6). Since commitments are easily forgotten, Joshua memorialized this important transaction in both the written word and a visible object to preserve the memory for future generations. "The Book of the Law of God" was a collection of the laws and regulations that Joshua delivered to the people and as such was distinct from "the Book of the Law of Moses" (1:8 et al.). The reference to "the holy place" suggests that they had erected the Tent of Meeting here temporarily for this very occasion.

27–28 The stone Joshua set up would be a constant reminder ("witness"; GK 6338) of the covenant promises made by Israel that day. It may have borne some appropriate inscription.

D. Three Burials in the Promised Land (24:29–33)

29–30 For the first time the title "the servant of the LORD" was granted to Joshua, elevating him close to the stature of Moses (see comment on 1:1). At his death, Joshua was ten years younger than Moses, thus indicating that he never became fully equal to Moses. A certain style of leadership also came to an end at that time. The words "in the land of his inheritance" present an important contrast with Abraham and Jacob, who possessed nothing more than a few burial plots in a land where they lived as aliens. Now the Israelites lived in a land of their own.

31 That the people were faithful "throughout the lifetime of Joshua" is eloquent testimony to the power of Joshua's influence. The memorials, confessions, and rituals of covenant renewal were designed to keep the people loyal, but these were not adequate forever (cf. Jdg 2:10–15).

32 The burial of "Joseph's bones" symbolized the completion of an era and the fulfillment of God's promises to the patriarchs. When he gave instructions for his remains to be buried in Canaan, Joseph manifested great faith in the promises of God (Ge 50:24–25; cf. Ex 13:19; Heb 11:22). The burial of Joseph's remains provides a fitting conclusion to the long saga that began with the call of Abraham.

33 When "Eleazar son of Aaron died," the whole generation of those who had left Egypt came to an end. In the Hebrew text, "Gibeah" is literally "Gibeah of Phinehas" and may be the full name of the town (cf. "Gibeah of Saul," 1Sa 11:4).

Judges

INTRODUCTION

1. Title

The English title of this book reflects the MT ("judges"), the LXX ("judges"), and the Vulgate ("Book of Judges") titles. God brought these "judges" to deliver Israel from oppression. Although they were divinely empowered leaders, they did not become hereditary rulers.

Eight men in this book are said specifically to have "judged" or "led Israel" (GK 9149; 3:10; 10:2–3; 12:7, 8–9, 11, 13–14; 15:20; 16:31). Even though others, such as Ehud (3:12–30) and Gideon (6:1–8:32), were judges, it is not specifically said that they "judged" or "led" Israel. Also "leading" Israel was one woman, Deborah (4:4–5). Elsewhere in Scripture the leaders of the period from Joshua's death to King Saul are also called "judges" (Ru 1:1; 2Sa 7:11). Eli and Samuel were the last two judges. In all there were fifteen judges, if Barak is considered a co-judge with Deborah and if Eli and Samuel are added to the thirteen judges in the book of Judges.

2. Historical Background

The book of Judges covers the period from the death of Joshua to the dawn of the monarchy. Political and religious turmoil accompanied Israel's attempts to occupy the land that had been conquered and divided by lot under the leadership of Joshua. Apart from the struggle against the Canaanites at the time of Deborah, Israel's adversaries came from outside the land. Most of these, such as Moab, Midian, and Ammon, were content periodically to plunder the land. The Philistines, however, who at this time entered Palestine in greater numbers, contested with Israel for permanent possession of the land.

Tragically, the Israelites even fought among themselves. Ephraim was ravaged by Manasseh (ch. 12), and Benjamin was almost annihilated by the other tribes (chs. 20–21). Between the days of Joshua and Samuel, Israel plummeted to moral and spiritual disaster. Over and over the pattern of sin followed by oppression was repeated. Occasionally God raised up a Deborah or a Gideon to turn the people back to himself, but the intervals of revival were all too brief.

The events narrated in Judges cover a period of 410 years if viewed consecutively. Such a lengthy time does not, however, fit any accepted chronology of the early history of Israel. Consequently some of the judgeships must have overlapped. Samson and Jephthah, for example, may have ruled simultaneously—one in the west (in Canaan), the other in the east (in Transjordan; 10:7). Most of the data can be worked into a satisfactory historical framework if we adopt the early date of the Exodus (c. 1446 B.C.) and Conquest (which began forty years later).

3. Authorship and Date

The writer of the book of Judges is unknown. Although he may have been an associate of Samuel, unlike Samuel he did not focus attention on the dangers inherent in the monarchy. The book is a unified whole, divided into three parts: (1) the success and failure of the Israelites in Canaan (1:1–2:5); (2) the period of the judges' rule (2:6–16:31); and (3) two stories denoting sin and corruption (17:1–21:25).

Several factors show that the author lived and wrote during the early monarchy (c. 1030 B.C.). The hectic events in this book are viewed from the perspective of a united, stable rule: "In those days Israel had not king; everyone did as he saw fit" (21:25; cf. 18:1; 19:1). This statement suits the time of the united kingdom best; and 1:21 points to a period before David's capture of Jerusalem, for the Jebusites were living there "to this day." The mention of Canaanite control of Gezer (1:29) implies that the king of Egypt had not yet captured the city and given it to King Solomon as a dowry for his Egyptian bride (c. 970 B.C.).

4. Purpose

The primary purpose of the book of Judges is to show that Israel's spiritual condition determined its political and material situation. When the Israelites disregarded Joshua's warnings and worshiped the gods of Canaan, they felt the wrath of an angry God, who allowed the nation to come under the control of tyrants and invaders. Few books of the Bible show human depravity as does this one. When in the midst of their suffering the nation repented of their sin, cried to God for mercy, and turned to him in renewed obedience, God graciously sent deliverers to rescue the people from oppression.

This book also shows that Israel failed to realize her divinely intended goal without a king. The Israelites were unable to govern themselves according to the law of Moses and thereby proved that they needed a king. To this author, monarchy was definitely better than anarchy. The implication is that a nation led by a godly king would experience prosperity under the blessing of God.

The events recorded in Judges also serve in general to fill the gap between the time of Joshua and that of Samuel.

5. Special Problems

One problem that perplexes the reader of Judges is the apparent approval of cruelty and gruesome killing. But such actions as performed by Ehud and Jael are not necessarily sanctioned either by the author or by the Lord. Long neglect of the Mosaic law had left the Israelites with many mistaken notions about God's will.

Another problem closely related to the above is how God's Spirit could use men like Jephthah and Samson, whose motives and behavior were open to such serious question. That God worked through Samson need not denote his approval of an immoral lifestyle. In God's sovereignty the Holy Spirit came on people for particular tasks, and this enduing was not necessarily proportionate to one's spirituality. The Spirit's power enabled people to inspire Israel (6:34; 11:29) and to perform great feats of strength (14:6, 19; 15:14). But it was a temporary enduement, and Samson and later Saul tragically discovered that the Lord had left them. The NT experience of the permanent indwelling of the Holy Spirit was not known in the OT.

EXPOSITION

I. The Success and Failure of the Tribes in Canaan (1:1–2:5)

A. The Capture of Adoni-Bezek (1:1–7)

1–2 The first chapter presents supplementary material on the conquest of Canaan viewed from the standpoint of individual tribes. Most of the episodes occurred after the death of Joshua. Before conducting further military action, the people consulted the Lord, probably through the Urim and Thummim handled by the high priest (Nu 27:21). As in the order of march in the desert (Nu 2:9), Judah was designated to be first (cf. also Jdg 20:18). Judah was also the tribe leading the march against Benjamin in the civil war at the end of the book (20:18). Though the Joseph tribes (Ephraim and Manasseh) received the birthright (1Ch 5:1), Judah had been destined to lead the nation (Ge 49:10).

"Canaanites" applies to all the peoples found in the land of Palestine, but at times it is restricted to the inhabitants of the valleys and coastal plains (Nu 13:29). God's promise that he had "given the land into [Judah's] hands" parallels his encouraging words to Joshua after the death of Moses (Jos 1:3).

3 Judah invited their full-brother tribe Simeon to join them, especially since Simeon's territory was surrounded by Judah's (Jos 19:1) and that tribe was undoubtedly gradually absorbed into Judah. The tribe of Simeon was greatly reduced in numbers during the wilderness wanderings, probably as punishment for their sins of idolatry and fornication in Moab (Nu 25:1–14).

4–5 The Lord fulfilled his promise to Judah, who won a great victory at Bezek (cf. 1Sa 11:8). Adoni-Bezek means "lord of Bezek" (cf. Jos 10:1–3). Adoni-Bezek died in Jerusalem (v.7).

6–7 The severing of Adoni-Bezek's thumbs and big toes incapacitated him as a warrior and as a priest, a dual function common to many kings. In their ordination service the priests had blood applied to their thumbs and big toes (Lev 8:23–24). Adoni-Bezek admitted that he had similarly mutilated the thumbs and toes of seventy rulers of cities, making beggars out of them; so he deserved to be paid back (cf. Ex 21:24).

B. The Capture of Jerusalem, Hebron, and Debir (1:8–15)

8 The city of Jerusalem did not become an integral part of Israel until David stormed the fortress of the Jebusites (2Sa 5:7). Hence the successful attack of Judah was either a temporary or partial capture.

9 From Jerusalem the men of Judah went south and west to continue their conquest. The three areas mentioned are the major geographical divisions of southern Palestine. The "hill country" is the central mountainous region, the "Negev" is the dry ground in the southern part, and the "western foothills" represent the region between the mountains and the coastal plain.

10 Hebron (some nineteen miles south of Jerusalem) has the highest elevation (3,000 ft.) of any city in Judah and is famous as the home of Abraham (Ge 13:2; 23:2, 19). Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai were descendants of Anak, who had terrified the spies (cf. Nu 13:22–33). This time, however, the men of Judah conquered them. Fittingly, Caleb, one of the two believing spies, was allotted Hebron as his inheritance (Jos 14:13–14); he directed its capture (Jdg 1:20; see also Jos 15:13–19).

11–13 Debir is located eleven miles southwest of Hebron. Its king was listed among the thirty-one kings captured by Joshua (Jos 12:13). Like Hebron it was a residence of some Anakites (Jos 11:21). This city was captured by Caleb's younger brother Othniel after Caleb offered his daughter Acsah as the prize. Normally young men paid a bride-price to the father of the bride, but the military triumph was considered payment enough (cf. 1Sam 18:25). As relatives of Kenaz, Othniel and Caleb were apparently associated with an Edomite clan (Ge 36:11). Their rise to prominence in Judah and Israel demonstrates the degree to which other people were assimilated by the chosen nation.

14–15 Caleb's daughter needed the permission of her husband before she could ask her father for a gift. Since Caleb had given them land in the arid Negev, she requested a field with "springs of water." Caleb agreed, and this gift may have been her dowry.

C. The Additional Success of Judah and Simeon (1:16–18)

16 The Kenites, an ancient Canaanite people (Ge 15:19) connected with the Amalekites, had been friendly to Israel during the wilderness wanderings. Moses had, in fact, married a Kenite girl. The Kenites left Jericho, the "City of Palms" (3:13), and joined some people of Judah living near Arad, an important city sixteen miles directly south of Hebron. Moses had defeated the king of Arad as Israel skirted southern Palestine (Nu 21:1–3), and Joshua later counted Arad's king among his victims (Jos 12:14).

17 Judah together with Simeon successfully captured Zephath, renaming it Hormah—a city that was allotted to Simeon (Jos 19:4). Since the name means "total destruction," it may be the same Hormah demolished by Moses near Arad (Nu 21:1–3). The complete destruction recalls the Lord's command to wipe out the Canaanites and their livestock and give all the articles of silver and gold to the sanctuary (Dt 7:1–2; 20:16–17; Jos 6:17–19).

18 The capture of Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ekron by Judah must have been temporary (cf. v.19). These were Philistine cities along the coast, though the main migration of the Philistines did not reach Palestine until 1200 B.C. The order of the three cities suggests an invasion from the south.

D. A Summary of Success and Failure (1:19–21)

19 While notably successful in the hilly regions of central Palestine, Judah failed to control the plains. The Israelites were no match for the iron chariots that functioned effectively on the level terrain along the coast (see especially chs. 4–5).

20 Taking Hebron represented the key achievement of Judah, and v.20 attributes its capture to Caleb (cf. also v.9). Hebron became a city of refuge belonging to the priests (Jos 20:7; 21:11), but its fields and suburbs were Caleb's own possession (Jos 21:12).

21 Benjamin's main city was Jerusalem, but neither Benjamin nor Judah could dislodge the Jebusites (see comment on v.8). An alternate name for Jerusalem is "Jebus" (19:10),

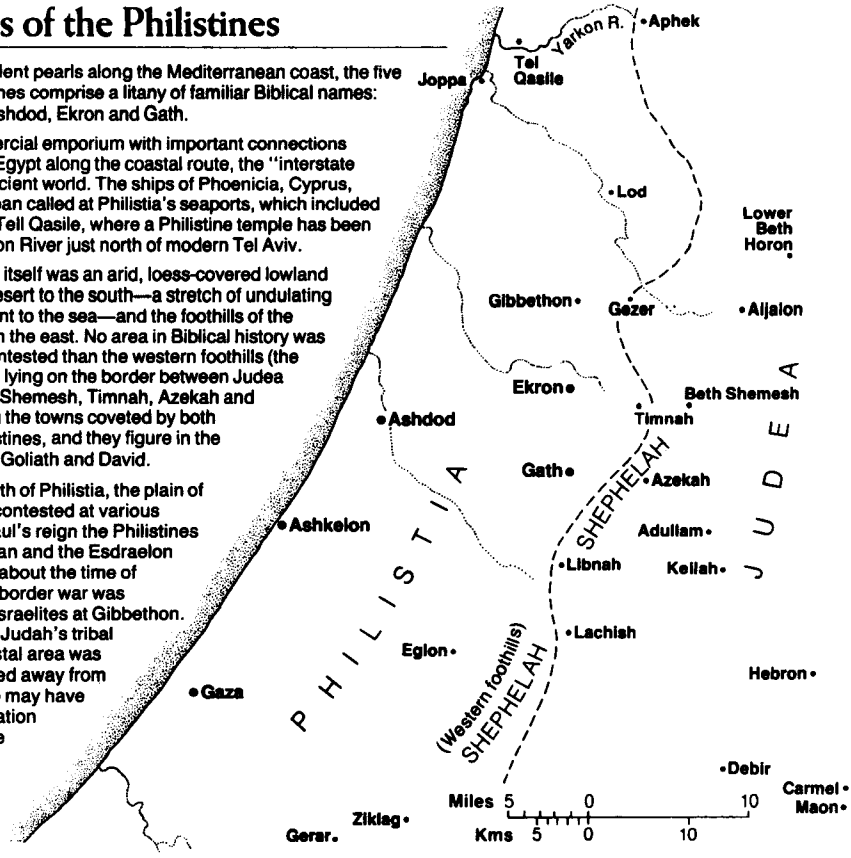
Five Cities of the Philistines

Like a string of opulent pearls along the Mediterranean coast, the five cities of the Philistines comprise a litany of familiar Biblical names: Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron and Gath.

Each was a commercial emporium with important connections reaching as far as Egypt along the coastal route, the "interstate highway" of the ancient world. The ships of Phoenicia, Cyprus, Crete and the Aegean called at Philistia's seaports, which included a site today called Tell Qasile, where a Philistine temple has been found, on the Yarkon River just north of modern Tel Aviv.

The Philistine plain itself was an arid, loess-covered lowland bordering on the desert to the south—a stretch of undulating sand dunes adjacent to the sea—and the foothills of the Judahite plateau on the east. No area in Biblical history was more frequently contested than the western foothills (the Shephelah region), lying on the border between Judea and Philistia. Beth Shemesh, Timnah, Azekah and Ziklag were among the towns coveted by both Israelites and Philistines, and they figure in the stories of Samson, Goliath and David.

The area to the north of Philistia, the plain of Sharon, was also contested at various periods: During Saul's reign the Philistines even held Beth Shan and the Esdraelon valley. Later, from about the time of Baasha on, a long border war was conducted by the Israelites at Gibbethon. Originally a part of Judah's tribal allotment, the coastal area was never totally wrested away from the Philistines who may have begun their occupation as early as the time of Abraham.



which attests to the long attachment of the Jebusites to this natural stronghold.

E. The Capture of Bethel (1:22–26)

22 Next to Judah, the most important tribe was Ephraim; and vv.22–29 describe the activities of Ephraim and his brother, Manasseh. The two tribes may have cooperated in the capture of Bethel (about twelve miles north of Jerusalem), since the attack is attributed to "the house of Joseph"; but the city lay within Ephraim's territory. Bethel means "house of God," a name given by Jacob after God's revelation to him there (Ge 28:19). As God promised to protect the patriarch, so he "was with" the Joseph tribes here. Bethel was to become a key religious center during the divided kingdom.

23–25 To capture Bethel, Israel followed the strategy used at Jericho. Spies were sent there, and they found a man willing to show them the entrance to the city. In return for his cooperation, the spies promised safety for the informer, just as Rahab and her family had been protected at Jericho. When the Israelites captured the city, they released the man and his family.

26 These survivors headed north, "to the land of the Hittites," a term applied to Syria (Jos 1:4). The Hittite Empire was based in Asia Minor but extended its control over wide areas west of the Euphrates.

F. Additional Failures of the Tribes (1:27–36)

27 The remainder of ch. 1 records the inability of the other tribes to occupy territory. Manasseh's allotment included several key cities in the Valley of Jezreel. Joshua 17:16 mentions the problems in this area because the Canaanites had "iron chariots." Beth Shan was an important fortress controlling a trading route across the Jordan.

Taanach was five miles southeast of Megiddo, a city that controlled the pass at the entrance to the Jezreel Valley. Dor lies along the Mediterranean coast south of Carmel; Ibleam is situated at the southern end of the Jezreel Valley near Dothan. Joshua had defeated the kings of these three cities (Jos 12:21, 23), but a permanent Israelite occupation did not follow. The Canaanites, like the Amorites in vv.34–35, were determined to keep their living areas and resist Israel.

28 The most the Israelites could do was to exploit the Canaanites as a cheap labor force. Moses earlier had instructed the nation to use the residents of peaceful cities near Canaan as forced laborers, but the peoples of Canaan were to be totally destroyed (Dt 20:11–17).

29 Ephraim failed to gain possession of Gezer, a city eighteen miles west of Jerusalem. This city guarded the approaches to the foothills and Jerusalem from the northwest.

30 Zebulun's territory was north of Manasseh's. The cities of Kitron and Nahahol likely were situated on the northern edge of the Jezreel Valley.

31–32 The tribe of Asher experienced wide setbacks against Acco, Aczib, and Sidon, regions on the Mediterranean north of Mount Carmel, and against the other towns somewhat farther inland. Here the cities of Tyre and Sidon led a strong Canaanite culture with its vigorous Baal worship. Their culture and religion had a strong influence on Israel, especially during the reigns of Solomon and Ahab.

33 The Naphtalites, whose region lay to the east of Asher, failed to dislodge the residents of Beth Shemesh and Beth Anath. Beth Shemesh ("house of the sun") may have had a sanctuary devoted to the worship of the sun god; Beth Anath contains the name of Anath, the Canaanite goddess of war and both consort and sister of Baal.

34–36 The fortunes of the tribe of Dan have a certain prominence in Judges (see ch. 18). Their difficulties stemmed from Amorite pressure to keep them out of the plains and valleys, where most of their inheritance lay. The Amorites kept control of Aijalon, eleven miles northwest of Jerusalem, and nearby Shaalbim. After the Danites migrated north, the nearby tribe of Ephraim finally subjugated the Amorites. The "Scorpion Pass" is located south of the Dead Sea, at the southern border of the Promised Land (Jos 15:2–3).

G. Disobedience Condemned by the Angel of the Lord (2:1–5)

1–2 The deplorable spiritual condition of the Israelites lay behind their failure to dispossess the Canaanites. To expose Israel's sinfulness, the "angel of the LORD" appeared to them. This angel, frequently identified with God himself (6:22; 13:21–22), was perhaps a preincarnate form of the Second Person of the Trinity. His announcements to Gideon and to Samson's parents promised deliverance at crucial points in Israel's history. The move from Gilgal to Bokim may signify the relocation of the tabernacle. Gilgal, situated between the Jordan and Jericho, had been the initial religious center (Jos 4:19–20). In 20:18–28 and 21:1–4, Bethel is identified with the sanctuary.

The angel of the Lord charged Israel with breaking their covenant with God in spite of his faithfulness on their behalf. God had fulfilled his promises to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. He would "never break [his] covenant" (cf. Lev 26:42–44; Dt 7:9); and out of gratefulness Israel was expected to obey him. Yet they entered into agreements with the Canaanites, including marriage covenants (cf. Pr 2:16–17), and did not tear down their altars (Ex 34:12–13).

3 God therefore did not help the Israelites drive out their enemies but left some to trap them through pagan customs and religions. Israel had been repeatedly warned that the Canaanites could become irritants in their eyes and thorns in their sides (Nu 33:55; Jos 23:13).

4–5 The response of the people to the angel's sad pronouncement was to weep loudly. Like the weeping of Nu 14:1, when the spies announced that Canaan could not be captured, here the crying does not necessarily imply repentance. They offered sacrifices, however; and the burnt offerings and fellowship offerings sacrificed at Bethel not long after (21:1–4) did connote national mourning. "Bokim" means "weeping."

II. The Rule of the Judges (2:6–16:31)

A. Introduction (2:6–3:6)

1. The passing of godly leaders (2:6–9)

After the summary of the incomplete wars of occupation, we meet the threatening wars of liberation that characterize the period of the judges. To explain how Israel fell prey to powerful oppressors, the author reviews events since the death of Joshua.

6–9 Just before his death, Joshua had led the people in renewing the covenant with the Lord (Jos 24). Then he sent them away to finish occupying the land. What they did about this is described in ch. 1. Joshua was buried on the land allotted to his family in Timnath Heres. He received the exalted title of "servant of the LORD" (see comment on Jos 24:29). During the lifetime of Joshua and the leaders who outlived him, Israel was relatively faithful to the Lord. These men had experienced God's miracles.

2. The pattern of the period of the judges (2:10–23)

10 After the death of Joshua's contemporaries, the new generation accelerated down the highway to destruction. They did not know God in a vital way nor had they seen the miracles their fathers had talked about. Each generation must personally experience the reality of God.

11–13 History repeated itself as Israel went through the fivefold pattern of sin, slavery, supplication, salvation, and silence. The sin phase is always introduced with the words "The Israelites did evil in the eyes of the LORD" (3:7, 12; 4:1; 6:1; 10:6; 13:1). They deserted the very God who had delivered them from Egypt and had saved them from Pharaoh and his host (cf. v.1). They worshiped Baal—an epithet of the Canaanite storm god Hadad, the god of rain and agriculture, and the leading deity in the pantheon. There were also "Baals" associated with particular places (see Nu 25:3; Jdg 9:4). Israel's earlier encounter with the Baal of Peor had been disastrous (Nu 25). The "Ashtoreths" were deities such as Astarte, who was goddess of the evening star and renowned for her beauty. She was a goddess of fertility, love, and war, and was often linked with Baal (10:6).

14–15 The Lord became angry at Israel's apostasy and turned the Israelites over to their enemies, thus initiating the slavery phase of the cycle. God "sold them" as one sells a slave (3:8; Dt 32:30). Israel's crops, supposedly guaranteed by the worship of Baal, were carried off year after year. The strong hand of the Lord now acted to secure Israel's defeat (cf. Dt 28:25). In their distress the people entered the supplication stage; they cried out to the Lord.

16–19 Salvation came through the judges raised up by God. Some fifteen individuals could claim this designation, though six are "minor" judges who are mentioned only briefly (Shamgar, Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon). Not long after gaining Israel's freedom, the people forgot what the Lord had done (the silence stage), and the judges would find them newly enmeshed in sin. Their religious prostitution meant that they were forsaking the nation's true "husband," the Lord ("Baal" means "husband" or "owner"). Moreover, the worship of the Canaanite gods literally involved sexual conduct with temple prostitutes supposedly to promote the fertility of the soil.

The Lord spared the people throughout the lifetime of a given judge, even though they deserved to be resubjugated. The words "groaned" and "oppressed" (v.18) relate back to the Egyptian bondage (cf. Ex 2:24; 6:5; 3:9). Then after the death of a judge, the corruption of the people increased; they became "stubborn" (GK 7997), repeating their stiff-necked attitude in the desert (cf. Ex 32:9; 33:3, 5).

20–23 Again the anger of the Lord is mentioned (cf. vv.12, 14). There is a note of contempt as the Lord addressed the people as "this nation" rather than as "my nation" (cf. Hag 1:2). The summary here closely resembles the stern pronouncement of vv.1–3 by the angel of the Lord. Violating the covenant meant a slower conquest of Canaan. The nations would be left there to test Israel's desire to obey the Lord. The constant pressure from a pagan culture would prove who the genuine believers really were.

3. The people left to test Israel (3:1–6)

1–2 The nations left in Canaan to test Israel had another purpose: they afforded practical experience in warfare, for these new generations of Israelites had not participated in Joshua's wars of occupation. Israel would one day confront major powers like Egypt and Assyria; so the smaller wars provided valuable training. Part of God's sovereign action was to use the Canaanites both to punish and to teach Israel.

3–4 The Philistines (who had migrated from Caphtor of the Aegean area) are mentioned first, perhaps because they were to become the primary opponents of Israel. Their five-city cluster along the Mediterranean included Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron. The "Sidonians" refers to the Phoenicians, whose leading port city was Sidon (cf. 1:31). The Hivites were located in northern Israel in Jos 11:3, but Shechem (cf. Ge 34:2) and Gibeon (Jos 9:3, 7) in central Palestine were also Hivite cities.

5–6 The Hittites may not be the same north Syrians of 1:26 but another Canaanite people well known at Hebron in the hills of Judah (Ge 23). Intermarriage with the peoples of Canaan had been forbidden (Jos 23:12) since it would lead directly to idolatry. It was into that very trap, however, that the nation fell (cf. 2:1–3).

B. The Victory of Othniel Over Cushan-Rishathaim (3:7–11)

7 The first cycle, though brief, follows the pattern delineated in ch. 2. Israel sinned by forgetting God and worshiping foreign deities. "Asherah" was the wife of both El and Baal, and some confuse her with Ashtareth/Astarte (2:13). An "Asherah" was also a symbol of the goddess, a sacred tree (Dt 16:21), or a carved pole set up beside an altar to Baal (Jdg 6:25).

8 Israel's sin angered the Lord, who sent Cushan-Rishathaim, king of Upper Mesopotamia, to oppress them. The king's name seems to mean "Cushan of double evil," a rather strange designation but perhaps intended to be an intimidating one. "Cush" (Ge 10:8) was the father of Nimrod, founder of Babylonian civilization.

9–10 When the Israelites appealed to God for help, Othniel was commissioned to rescue them. This relative of the illustrious Caleb has already been introduced in 1:11–15 as a successful warrior. His selection shows that the oppression followed Joshua's death quite closely, perhaps about 1375–1367 B.C. When the Spirit of the Lord came on him, Othniel won a great victory. The empowering of the Spirit is crucial in Judges, and down to the time of David it remained the mark of God's chosen vessel.

11 Othniel's triumph ushered in a forty-year peace, the first of several peace periods given in multiples of forty (v.30; 5:31; 8:28).

C. The Victory of Ehud Over Moab (3:12–30)

1. Israel oppressed by Moab (3:12–14)

12–14 When Israel again fell into sin, God used their perennial enemy Moab to subdue them. Usually the Lord gave strength to the Israelites (e.g., 16:28), but here the Lord was on the side of Israel's foe. In Moses' day the Moabites had attempted to thwart Israel by hiring Balaam to curse them, and along with the Midianites they had actually involved God's people in idolatry (Nu 25). Now Moab had allies such as the Amalekites, who had bitterly opposed Israel in the desert (Ex 17:8–16).

Moabite forces crossed the Jordan and occupied Jericho ("City of Palms"). This means that they had first defeated the tribe of Reuben, which had inherited territory east of the Dead Sea. Because of their locale, the Transjordanian tribes were especially vulnerable to enemy attack. Jericho had been cursed by Joshua (Jos 6:26) and was probably unoccupied when King Eglon moved in. From this strategic base Eglon dominated the Israelites for eighteen years.

2. King Eglon slain by Ehud (3:15–25)

15 God's choice to end the Moabite oppression was a man from Benjamin. Ehud was a left-handed man of the same mold as the seven-hundred expert slingers from Benjamin who fought in the civil war (see 20:13b–16, 43–47).

16–17 Ehud's task was ostensibly to make the yearly tribute payment to Eglon to assure him of Israel's subjection for another year. Since the payment was carried by a number of men, it may have been food or wool. For the occasion Ehud had made a small sword or dagger, about eighteen inches long. It was well concealed, and the fact that he was left-handed enhanced his stratagem.

18–23 Apparently Ehud and his men left Jericho before Ehud returned alone to strike his fatal blow. "The idols near Gilgal" were most likely a well-known landmark. After the other Israelites were safely en route home, Ehud came back to seek a private audience with Eglon. The king wanted to hear this secret message, so he requested his officials and attendants to leave. With Eglon sitting in the cool upper room of his palace, Ehud presented the "message from God." The king stood up reverently to hear the divine oracle, and Ehud drew his sword and delivered the fatal "message." Perhaps the huge size of the king (cf. v.17) and the unexpected use of the left hand prevented him from seeing Ehud's move, for it is clear that no cry of alarm was heard outside. Ehud left the dagger completely buried in Eglon's abdomen and made his escape, locking the doors of the room to prevent quick detection of his crime.

24–25 Eglon's officials hesitated to unlock the doors, assuming that their master might be seeing to his bodily needs. Finally they became suspicious and took a key to remove the bolt from the doors. They found the king lying on the floor, the victim of assassination. God did not necessarily approve of the method used by Ehud, for the Spirit of the Lord did not come on Ehud, and he was never described as "judging Israel" (cf. 2Sa 4:11).

3. The Moabites defeated by Ehud (3:26–30)

26 The reluctance of the Moabite officials to break into the king's room gave Ehud the time he needed to escape. He followed the same route he had started to take earlier (cf. v.19), heading for the unidentified "Seirah." His goal was to reach the hill country of Ephraim. Ephraim was one of the most powerful tribes of Israel and occupied the territory adjacent to Benjamin on the north.

27–29 Ehud knew that the death of Moab's king would throw the officials and troops at Jericho into confusion—an opportune time to strike the hated invaders and end their rule. Using the ancient alarm system of a trumpet (Nu 10:9), Ehud quickly assembled Israelite men to help him follow up his personal triumph. Ehud's bravery and enthusiasm inspired a large following, for all sensed that the Lord was handing the enemy over to them. Under Ehud's command the Israelites took control of the fords of the Jordan and cut off Moab's line of retreat (cf. 7:24; 12:5–6). Ehud led the rout of ten thousand Moabites, who probably represented Eglon's crack troops.

30 Israel's victory restored her independence as Moab was "made subject" (GK 6268) or "subdued." This verb is used at the end of several cycles in Judges (4:23; 8:28; 11:33) to indicate a thorough defeat. Eighty years of peace (1309–1229?), the longest "rest" in the book, followed Ehud's triumph.

D. The Victory of Shamgar Over the Philistines (3:31)

31 The reference to Shamgar is brief but intriguing. As with some of the other minor judges, there is no mention of the sin of Israel (10:1–5; 12:8–15). Shamgar's work was explicitly military. He won an astonishing victory over the Philistines by means of an oxgoad (cf. 15:16)—a stout stick tipped with bronze and used for prodding animals. Shamgar's use of this weapon implies that the Philistines were already disarming neighboring people (cf. 5:8; 1Sa 13:19–22).

Shamgar is a foreign name. His name is mentioned in 5:6, along with Jael, as a hero of Israel. He may have been a contemporary of Ehud, since the latter's death is not cited till 4:1.

E. The Victory of Deborah and Barak Over Jabin and Sisera (4:1–5:31)

1. The prose account (4:1–24)

Somewhat in the form of Hebrew parallelism, Judges has two supplementary accounts of the victory over the Canaanites. The first is in narrative fashion; the second is a majestic poem.

a. The oppression (4:1–3)

1–3 The next major oppression came at the hands of a coalition of Canaanite forces led by Jabin and Sisera, and it affected primarily the northern tribes. Jabin lived in Hazor, once the largest city in Palestine, some nine miles north of the Sea of Galilee on the main route between Egypt and Mesopotamia. Joshua had defeated a Jabin king of Hazor (cf. Jos 11:1–11). Sisera's strength lay in his 900 chariots, a sizable force for this early period. With this military advantage, he terrorized the tribes living near the Valley of Jezreel.

b. Deborah's challenge to Barak (4:4–10)

4–5 Deborah was a prophetess, like Miriam (Ex 15:20) and Huldah (2Ki 22:14), and also a judge. Because the rule of women was not normal in Israel, her prominence implies a lack of qualified men. Deborah sat as judge at the southern end of Ephraim's territory. The reference to a palm tree may allude to the stateliness and gracefulness of women (SS 7:7–8).

6 The Lord commanded Deborah to challenge Barak of Naphtali to confront Sisera's troops, whose oppression was felt even in Ephraim and Benjamin. Naphtali and Zebulun, the first tribes to be summoned, covered most of Israel's territory north of the Jezreel Valley. Cone-shaped Mount Tabor rises some thirteen hundred feet from the valley and afforded an unmistakable meeting place. Barak was told to "lead the way"; if he did so, God would lead the enemy into the trap.

7 Deborah revealed that the site of the battle would be near the Kishon River. This river flowed in a northwesterly direction through the Valley of Jezreel and emptied into the Mediterranean north of Carmel. During the summer months it dwindled to a mere stream. The surrounding valley was excellent terrain for deploying chariots. During the spring, however, the rains caused the river to overflow its banks and flood the low-lying areas nearby.

8–10 Barak expressed his willingness to go, but only if Deborah accompanied him. Her presence as a prophetess would assure contact with the Lord, just as the presence of Moses and the ark of the covenant brought victory in battle (Nu 10:35), while their absence meant defeat (Nu 14:44). Barak's lack of faith prompted Deborah to predict that the honor of killing Sisera would belong to a woman (see v.11). So Deborah went along, and her support helped Barak raise the necessary troops. They began the search for troops in Kedesh, Barak's hometown.

c. Jael's husband introduced (4:11)

11 This seemingly intrusive verse acquaints the reader with the family of the woman Deborah had just alluded to in v.9. Jael, the wife of Heber, belonged to the nomadic Kenites, most of whom lived in the arid regions of southern Judah (1:16). As relatives of Moses, this people had a strong tie with Israel. The "great tree" in Zaanannim (cf. Jos 19:33) lay on the escape route taken by Sisera after the battle.

d. Sisera's army routed by Barak (4:12–16)

12–14 When Sisera learned of Israel's troop movements at the northeastern end of the valley, he called out his entire chariot force and a large army to advance against them from the west. The presence of a sizable enemy force at Mount Tabor cut off the line of communication between Sisera and King Jabin in Hazor. Humanly speaking Barak's hastily gathered army had no chance against such might, but Deborah said that this was the opportune moment. She encouraged Barak by announcing that "the LORD [had] gone ahead [GK 4200 & 7156] of [him]." This is a technical term used of a king marching at the head of his army (1Sa 8:20). The Lord would take the lead in striking down the enemy (2Sa 5:24).

15–16 The Lord's role is even clearer as he "routed" (GK 2169; cf. Ex 14:24; 1Sa 7:10) Sisera's army. This routing probably took place by a rainstorm (cf. "thunder" in 1Sa 7:10; cf. also Jos 10:10–11), for Deborah's song shows that a sudden downpour overwhelmed Sisera's chariots (5:20–21). Even Sisera was forced to abandon his useless chariot and flee north, away from the heated action. The main conflict took place at Taanach, some five miles south of Megiddo (5:19).

The Lord's control of the forces of nature showed his superiority over Baal, the Canaanite storm god. Sisera would certainly not have tried to depend on chariots during the rainy season; so this storm probably struck some time after the spring rains that normally end in May. The lightly armed Israelites quickly demoralized the bogged-down Canaanites, who turned and fled westward. It was a decisive victory, for the Canaanites never again formed a coalition against Israel.

e. Sisera slain by Jael (4:17–24)

17 Sisera headed north away from the main line of pursuit. He may have hoped to reach Hazor, but his strength was running out. When he arrived at Zaanannim, he decided to take advantage of the hospitality of the friendly Kenites. He knew of their cordial relationship with Jabin but was clearly unaware of their intermarriage with Israel (v.11).

18–20 Jael greeted Sisera as "lord" (GK 123), in deference, he thought, to his lofty military title. Her offer of refuge was tempting, for who would search for him in a woman's tent? Besides, the law of hospitality among nomads guaranteed the safety of one's guests. Jael put a covering over the exhausted leader and gave him some milk (probably a kind of yogurt or curdled milk; 5:25). Though Jael's kindness convinced Sisera of his safety, he took one more precaution by asking her to mislead any potential searching party.

21 When Sisera had fallen into a deep sleep, Jael picked up a wooden mallet and a tent peg and drove the peg into his temple, with enough force to hammer the tent peg into the ground. Women normally did the work of putting up and taking down the tents; so Jael knew how to handle her tools. Although Jael's action was a startling violation of hospitality, Sisera was a man who had "cruelly oppressed the Israelites for twenty years" (4:3). Since he had had no mercy on God's covenant people, Sisera probably lay under the sentence of "total destruction" placed on the Canaanites in general (Dt 7:2; Jos 6:17; see comment on Jos 2:10). Victory over the enemy was usually not considered complete until the leaders were eliminated, and in specific cases the Lord demanded that their lives be taken.

22 When Barak finally tracked Sisera down, Jael showed him the dead commander. Deborah's prediction had come true; Barak lost the honor of vanquishing his chief rival. Sisera had died at the hands of a woman—in that culture a disgraceful death (cf. 9:54).

23–24 The rout of Sisera's army broke the power of Jabin, king of Canaan. Without his commanding general, he succumbed to the Israelite forces. His eventual destruction doubtless includes the loss of his capital at Hazor.

2. The poetic version—the Song of Deborah (5:1–31)

The victory over the Canaanites was also commemorated in a poem of rare beauty. Called the "Song of Deborah," this masterpiece expresses heartfelt praise to God for leading his people in triumph. It is a hymn of thanksgiving, a song of victory like Ex 15 or Ps 68. The poetry itself is magnificent, featuring many examples of climactic parallelism (vv.7, 19–20, 27) and onomatopoeia (v.22). Deborah is usually considered the author; the connection between prophetess and music is a natural one (cf. Ex 15:20–21).

a. Praise to God for his intervention (5:1–5)

1 A prose verse similar in form to Ex 15:1 introduces the song. Both songs commemorate the supernatural overthrow of horses and chariots.

2 The opening line can also be translated "When locks of hair grow long in Israel," alluding to the practice of leaving hair uncut to fulfill a vow (Nu 6:5, 18). This then connotes dedication to the Lord in participating in a "holy war" (cf. Dt 32:42). The willingness of the people to fight for the Lord is emphasized in the second line. "Praise" (GK 1385) is literally from the verb "to bless."

3 Out of deep gratitude for God's motivating work among the people, Deborah lifted her heart to the One worthy of praise. She wanted "kings" and "rulers" (GK 8142) to hear about the God of Israel and his magnificent victory. The song is directed to "the LORD" (GK 3378), the name of God that expresses his covenant relationship with Israel.

4–5 These two verses describe a theophany (a visible, temporal manifestation of God), a characteristic of songs of victory (Ps 68:7–8). God's intervention is compared with his awesome appearance at Sinai, where the covenant with Israel was established to the accompaniment of thunderstorm and earthquake (Ex 19:16–18). This is an apt reference, for the rains had been Sisera's undoing and again revealed God's transcendent power.

b. Conditions during the oppression (5:6–8)

6 Conditions were deplorable as Canaanite robbers roamed the highways, making travel dangerous. Commercial trading was likewise stopped, and the economy was being adversely affected.

7–8 Agriculture also was disrupted by the marauders. Life in unwalled villages was unsafe, and crops had to be abandoned. God had sent war and oppression because of their sin; now they were being effectively disarmed as well (or perhaps the large army did not dare to use their weapons against Sisera and his chariots). This lamentable situation continued until Deborah came on the scene. Her deep concern for the nation and her abilities as prophetess and judge inspired the people to take action. But first they had to give up the "new gods" they had chosen.

c. Challenge to recount the Lord's victory (5:9–11)

9 Oppression and defeat have given way to triumph, as travelers can once more move about freely, and normal activities are resumed. The author's heart goes out to the volunteers and leaders whose courage made this possible.

10–11 All classes of travelers are told to listen as the singers recount God's great acts. Whether rich or poor, all would stop at the wells and have an opportunity to hear about the Lord's "righteous acts." The final two lines present the reverse of v.8: instead of war coming to the gates, people could now congregate there for normal judicial and business activities.

d. The roles of the individual tribes (5:12–18)

To throw off the Canaanite yoke, it was important for the tribes to cooperate in battle. Those who participated are commended, while the tribes who shirked their responsibility are condemned.

12 The section begins with a call to Deborah herself to awake. Normally "wake up" (GK 6424) is a plea to take action (Ps 44:23; Isa 51:9), and apparently Deborah had to be roused from her complacency as a judge (4:5). The song she is asked to "break out in" may have been a war song (cf. 2Sa 1:18). Barak (son of Abinoam; 4:6) too is called on to take captives, implying a convincing victory (cf. Ps 68:18; Eph 4:8).

13 The years of oppression had taken a heavy toll in lives. The verse may reflect a two-stage gathering of troops. First, volunteers may have joined their tribal leaders, before journeying together to the rallying point at Mount Tabor. The last phrase could be translated "against the mighty," meaning the enemy.

14–15a Ephraim and Benjamin, two southern tribes, are mentioned first, perhaps because of their association with Deborah. The reference to Amalek is probably a geographical one (cf. 12:15). Makir usually refers to the half-tribe of Manasseh east of the Jordan, but here the western half is clearly intended (Jos 13:30–31) since the battle occurred within its borders. Zebulun is highly praised for its bravery. Along with Naphtali, they had responded to Barak's initial summons (4:10). Issachar, located at the eastern end of the Jezreel Valley, also participated enthusiastically.

15b–16 Several tribes somewhat distant earned the author's wrath for their inactivity. Apparently Reuben at least seriously considered sending some men, for their "searching of heart" is mentioned twice. The tribes from Transjordan had made an important contribution to the conquest under Joshua (cf. comment on Jos 1:12), but pressure from the Moabites may have influenced Reuben's decision. The mention of campfires and flocks presents a tranquil picture in contrast with war cries and clashing armies.

17 Gilead was a common designation for much of Transjordan. The tribe of Gad possessed most of Gilead (Jos 13:24–25), though the half-tribe of Manasseh also lived there (Jos 13:31). "Reuben" and "Gilead" would thus include all three of the tribes across the Jordan.

The tribe of Dan had encountered difficulty in taking possession of their inheritance ever since the time of Joshua (cf. 1:34). It is not surprising, then, that they did not help solve this largely northern problem. The reference to "ships" implies that Dan had not yet migrated to the north. Asher, situated along the coast north of Carmel, had also failed to dislodge the Canaanites. Yet Asher was close enough to the oppressed area to have offered some assistance.

18 The aloofness of these tribes is sharply contrasted with the wholehearted efforts of Zebulun and Naphtali. Judah and Simeon are not mentioned, presumably because of their location far to the south.

e. The battle described (5:19–23)

The vividness of the poetry increases as the author uses repetition, satire, and concrete imagery to paint a lively picture. This poetic account should be closely compared with the description of the battle in 4:12–16.

19 The armies clashed at Taanach, near Megiddo, and the kings of Canaan were supremely confident of victory. With a touch of sarcasm, the author says that this time there was no plunder. They had robbed and oppressed the Israelites for the last time.

20–22 The Canaanites' downfall came as God intervened. The reference to the participation of the stars may be a slap at astrological readings used by the Canaanites. As the rains fell, the river Kishon overflowed its banks; and chariots and riders were swept away. The surging river encouraged the Israelites to "march on" in pursuit of the enemy. The mighty horses of the foe were no match for the people of the God of Israel. In the context "thundering hoofs" seems to relate to a frantic retreat. The repetition of "galloping" (GK 1852) is a striking example of onomatopoeia in Hebrew.

23 The city of Meroz came under God's curse, pronounced by the angel of the Lord, for failing to fight. Meroz was undoubtedly located in the heart of the oppressed area; so the condemnation of that community was more severe than that of the distant tribes. Since elsewhere in Judges cities refusing to participate in urgent battles were destroyed (8:15–17; 21:8–10), Meroz may have shared the same fate.

f. Jael praised for her deed (5:24–27)

24–27 In sharp contrast to the curse against Meroz is the blessing reserved for Jael, a woman who refused to remain neutral (see comments on 4:19–21). She initially treated Sisera in accord with his noble standing. But this once magnificent leader was quickly struck down. This heroine is compared to an expert archer, for the verbs "shattered" and "pierced" are used of arrows in Nu 24:8 and Job 20:24.

In v.27, the words "sank" and "fell" occur three times each, and "feet" occurs twice. This repetition builds up to the final and climactic word of the verse: "dead" (lit., "destroyed"). Sisera had been a mighty and devastating force against Israel, but now the destroyer was himself destroyed (cf. Isa 33:1).

g. Sisera's mother's futile wait (5:28–30)

28–30 The scene shifts from Jael's tent to the luxurious home of Sisera. With a skillful, dramatic touch, the author reflects on the agonized waiting of Sisera's mother for the return of her son. The long delay could mean that the illustrious warrior had tasted defeat, but his mother and her ladies-in-waiting console themselves with visions of plunder. It was common for soldiers to carry off beautiful maidens as trophies of victory (cf. 21:12). "Garments" were a special prize of war (cf. Jos 7:21; Zec 14:14), and Sisera as commander was sure to secure the most beautiful for his family.

h. Conclusion (5:31)

31 As in another song of victory (Ps 68:1–2), there is rejoicing over the fall of the wicked (cf. Nu 10:35). Reference to the sun and its strength closely parallels Ps 19:4b–6; Mal 4:2. The stunning defeat of Sisera resulted in forty years of peace for Israel.

F. The Victory of Gideon Over the Midianites (6:1–8:32)

The Gideon cycle is the longest segment of the book. Chapter 9 might also be counted as part of the Gideon story, since it describes the rule of his son. Under the inspiring leadership of this judge, the Israelites won a victory even more astonishing than that of Deborah and Barak.

1. Israel's land devastated by the Midianites (6:1–6)

1–4 For the fourth time in Judges, the Israelites fell into sin. This time they found themselves at the mercy of invading Midianites. These desert dwellers, descended from Abraham and Keturah (Ge 25:2), lived generally to the south of Palestine. For seven years the camel-riding Midianites swept across the Jordan into the Valley of Jezreel at harvest time. With their speedy, wide-ranging mounts, they roamed all the way to Gaza, helping themselves to crops and animals. The Midianites were joined by the Amalekites—who had earlier assisted King Eglon of Moab (3:12–13)—and by other eastern peoples. Israel was helpless to resist the invaders and literally took to the hills to save their lives. It was a time of judgment comparable to the Day of the Lord (Isa 2:12, 19; 9:4).

5–6 The destruction was so great that it could be described in terms of a plague of locusts. Both in numbers and in effect, the invasion of the nomads matched the work of those devastating insects earlier mentioned as the inevitable outcome of disobedience (Dt 28:38; cf. Joel 1:4). The staple products of the land were no doubt hard hit by this yearly destruction (cf. Joel 1:11), including sheep, cattle, and donkeys (cf. Dt 28:31). The main areas affected had borne the brunt of the preceding Canaanite oppression. Manasseh suffered most, along with other tribes adjacent to the Jezreel Valley: Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali (v.35).

2. Israel's disobedience condemned by a prophet (6:7–10)

7–10 In their distress the Israelites once more cried out to the Lord. The last time this happened, God used the prophetess Deborah to bring deliverance (4:3–4). On this occasion the Lord sent a "prophet" (GK 5566) to pinpoint the cause of the oppression in words similar to those of the angel of the Lord in 2:1–4. Once again God reminded the people of their release from Egypt's slavery, which should have resulted in perpetual devotion to the Lord. Instead, the Israelites had been worshiping the gods of the Amorites. Here "Amorites" is used generally of all the inhabitants of Palestine (cf. Ge 15:16). Israel refused "to listen to" (GK 9048) the Lord, a Hebrew idiom for disobedience (cf. 2:2).

3. Gideon challenged by the angel of the Lord (6:11–24)

11 The Lord's instrument of deliverance was a young man from the tribe of Manasseh named Gideon. While he was threshing wheat in Ophrah, the angel of the Lord appeared to him there and sat under the oak tree (cf. 4:5). To hide the wheat and himself from the Midianites, Gideon was threshing in a winepress, a pit carved out of rocky ground. Normally threshing floors were located in exposed areas so that the wind could easily blow away the chaff.

12 The angel's words seemed out of line with the timid actions of Gideon, and Gideon himself challenged their validity. Actually, the promise of the Lord's presence was intended to encourage Gideon, just as the same assurance led Moses to take the Israelites out of Egypt. "The LORD is with you" is in fact the basic meaning of the name Yahweh (see comment on Ex 3:12–14). Gideon was called a "mighty warrior," perhaps in anticipation of his remarkable bravery, or else a term that means he was of the upper class, the warriors who became the landed aristocracy.

13 Gideon did not recognize the visitor and complained that the oppression proved that the Lord was not with Israel. Like the psalmist (Ps 44:1–3, 9–16), Gideon contrasted the miracles everyone had heard about with the current inactivity of the Lord. Apparently Gideon was unaware of the prophet's explanation in vv.8–10.

14 The heavenly guest is identified as the Lord himself, who was sending Gideon as Israel's deliverer (cf. Ex 3:12; Isa 6:8–9). The strength Gideon possessed was the promise of the Lord's presence with him.

15–16 It is difficult to know whether "Lord" (GK 151) means "sir" or "Lord," for either is possible; in any case, Gideon came to recognize the supernatural character of the visitor only gradually. Gideon belonged to the weak clan of Abiezer, and his own position in his family division was not a prominent one. Yet God delights to use those who are young or humble and bring them to prominence (see 1Co 1:26–27). Gideon's fears were somewhat relieved by the reassurance that with the Lord's help he would be able to defeat the Midianites.

17–21 To obtain proof that God or his messenger was really talking to him, Gideon requested that his guest perform a miraculous sign, the first of three signs that Gideon was to see. First, however, Gideon received permission to bring his guest an offering. Since "offering" can mean "gift," the food prepared by Gideon was partially an expression of hospitality. Unleavened bread is, of course, involved in many offerings; but it is sometimes served in quickly prepared meals (Ge 19:3). This was a substantial meal for such a time of scarcity, since the "ephah" of flour was about half a bushel. The angel instructed Gideon to use the rock—perhaps part of the winepress—as an altar. The fiery consumption of the meat and bread indicated the acceptance of Gideon's offering and, together with the disappearance of the angel, provided the sign Gideon was seeking.

22–24 Gideon's response was one of fright, for he knew that no one could see God face to face and live (Ex 33:20; cf. Jdg 13:22). Gideon was quickly assured that he would live, since the Lord promised him "peace" (GK 8934) and well-being. This peace included not only his personal welfare but also the restoration of Israel's freedom and prosperity. Gratefully, Gideon built an altar to commemorate the Lord's promise.

4. The altar of Baal destroyed and Gideon's life imperiled (6:25–32)

25–26 Almost immediately the Lord asked Gideon to respond to his call to deliver Israel from Midian by taking decisive action in his own family. Even his father had espoused the Baal cult, leading the community in the worship of this pagan deity. Through Moses, God had said that altars to Baal and their accompanying Asherahs must be torn down (Ex 34:12–13; Dt 7:5; cf. Jdg 2:2). Baal worship was popular, however, and Gideon knew he was risking his life by obeying the Lord.

Part of Gideon's task was to sacrifice a bull on a new altar dedicated to the Lord. Bull worship was closely associated with Baal and his father, El, and this particular bull was doubtless reserved for the Baal cult. If two bulls were intended, one might have been used to break down the pagan altar. The altar of the Lord was to be set up on top of a "height" (i.e., a "bluff" or "stronghold"), a prominent place where the city residents may have found refuge from the Midianites. Pieces of wood from the sacred pole would supply fuel for the burnt offering.

27–30 Gideon followed the Lord's orders at night, correctly anticipating that his deeds would arouse the anger of the populace and his own relatives. Apparently one of Gideon's ten servants revealed the identity of Baal's enemy to the townspeople, and they demanded Gideon's death. How different from Dt 13:6–10, where Moses commanded that even close relatives must be stoned for idolatry! The heresy had become the main religion.

31 Joash refused to put his son to death, arguing that a deity like Baal could defend himself. To interfere was an insult to Baal punishable by death. Joash's seemingly honest appeal to Baal may reflect his own doubt in the power of a deity who could not deliver them from the Midianites.

32 Gideon was probably called Jerub-Baal ("Let Baal contend [with him]") as a derogatory name, indicating the certain judgment the people expected him to face. When no harm came to him, the name became a reminder of Gideon's great victory over Baal.

5. Gideon's army (6:33–35)

33 The crisis in Ophrah was soon eclipsed by the annual invasion of the Midianite coalition. This was their eighth incursion into the fertile Valley of Jezreel, and it came during the wheat harvest in May or June (v.11).

34–35 This time, however, the enemy was not to feast without a fight. The Spirit of the Lord "came upon" (lit., "clothed"; GK 4252) Gideon (cf. 2Ch 24:20–21; Isa 51:9; Lk 24:49), already encouraged by his initial obedience. Like Ehud (3:27), Gideon sounded the trumpet of alarm to gather the troops. The men of his own clan of Abiezer were the first to follow him—an indication that they now shared Gideon's attitude toward Baalism. Then the rest of Manasseh and the other northern tribes came to oppose the Midianites. Ephraim was not invited, perhaps because Gideon feared that this powerful "brother" tribe would not accept his leadership (cf. 1:22; 8:1–3).

6. The fleece (6:36–40)

36–38 Gideon's confidence in God's promises was far from complete and needed to be bolstered frequently. As in the previous instance (v.17), Gideon again asked for a sign to confirm God's favor and word (cf. Ge 24:12–14). Gideon felt that if the fleece only was wet with dew and not the surrounding ground, that meant the Lord was with him. As Gideon requested, so it was: the fleece was saturated with dew, but the ground was dry.

39–40 The wool fleece would absorb the dew more readily than the hard ground of the threshing floor; so the second test required an even greater miracle. When Gideon made the second request, he knew the Lord would be unhappy with his weak faith. The wording of v.39 is remarkably close to Abraham's final plea on behalf of Sodom (Ge 18:32).

Like Gideon, many a believer whose faith needed bolstering has "put out the fleece" to help him find the Lord's will. If this "fleece" consists of a careful observation and interpretation of God's leading through circumstances, the procedure can be a healthy one. But Gideon's method was to make purely arbitrary demands of God and insist on immediate guidance. Despite Gideon's lack of faith and insistence on a second sign, God in mercy not only chose to withhold punishment but condescended to answer him.

7. Gideon's army reduced (7:1–8a)

1 With his hastily assembled army, Gideon set up camp at En-Harod, at the foot of Mount Gilboa. The Midianite hordes were located some four miles north of them in the Jezreel Valley, at a place about ten miles west of the Jordan. The invaders knew about this 32,000-man army and their leader (v.14), but apparently they did not view them as a serious threat.

2–3 The Lord's instructions probably came as a surprise to Gideon, who was already outnumbered four to one. But the size of the army was not the crucial factor: God could give victory to a few men as easily as to a large army (cf. 1Sa 14:6). Lest Israel take credit for her achievements, the Lord began to remove all ground for boasting. The first stage in the troop reduction was to allow the cowardly to go back home. Their fear might prove contagious and ruin the campaign (cf. Dt 20:8). More than two-thirds of Gideon's army left the scene.

4–6 The Lord, however, informed Gideon that the army had to be reduced even further. A special "screening" was set up based on the way the 10,000 drank water. This strange procedure netted a total of 300 men who

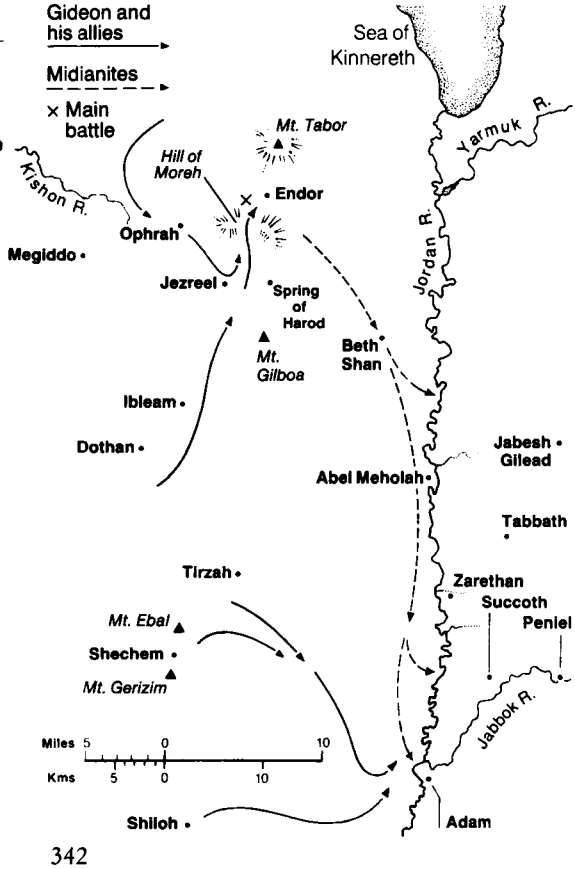
Gideon's Battles

The story of Gideon begins with a graphic portrayal of one of the most striking facts of life in the Fertile Crescent: the periodic migration of nomadic people from the Aramean desert into the settled areas of Palestine. Each spring the tents of the bedouin herdsmen appear overnight almost as if by magic, scattered on the hills and fields of the farming districts. Conflict between these two ways of life (herdsmen and farmers) was inevitable.

In the Biblical period, the vast numbers and warlike practice of the herdsmen reduced the village people to near vassalage. Gideon's answer was twofold: (1) religious reform, starting with his own family; and (2) military action, based on a coalition of northern Israelite tribes. The location of Gideon's hometown, "Ophrah of the Abiezrites," is not known with certainty, but probably was ancient Aper (modern Afula) in the Valley of Jezreel.

The battle at the spring of Harod is justly celebrated for its strategic brilliance. Denied the use of the only local water source, the Midianites camped in the valley and fell victim to the small band of Israelites, who attacked them from the heights of the hill of Moreh.

The main battle took place north of the hill near the village of Endor at the foot of Mount Tabor. Fleeing by way of the Jordan Valley, the Midianites were trapped when the Ephraimites seized the fords of the Jordan from below Beth Shan to Beth Barah near Adam.



apparently crouched down to scoop up water by using their hands as a dog uses its tongue. All the others dropped to their knees before drinking.

7–8a Possibly the 300 displayed a greater alertness in staying on their feet, but in actuality they may have been no more courageous than the 9,700 others. When v.8a says that Gideon "kept" (GK 2616) the 300, it implies that they too had a strong urge to vanish with their colleagues (this expression is used in 19:4 for a person detained against his will). If these 300 men were beginning to tremble, the need for God's intervention became even greater. Before departing the 9,700 gave the remaining soldiers their provisions and their trumpets. The large number of trumpets that Gideon acquired (cf. v.18) implies that a surprise attack was in the planning.

8. Gideon's victory confirmed by a dream (7:8b–14)

8b–12 With less than one percent of his original army, Gideon's faith again began to waver. For the third time God gave him a sign, and at last Gideon was thoroughly convinced. Any promise or action repeated three times was regarded as the surest confirmation (16:15; Nu 24:10). Before he attacked, Gideon and his aide Purah, who was probably his armor-bearer (9:54), paid a visit to the Midianite camp. What he was to hear would encourage him tremendously.

The foe spread out before them seemed innumerable (cf. Jos 11:4; 1Sa 13:5), while Gideon could count the available Israelites all too easily.

13–14 Gideon and his servant overheard two of the enemy soldiers discussing a dream. In the ancient world dreams were considered an important means of divine communication (1Sa 28:6; cf. Ge 20:3–6; 37:6–7; et al.). The enemy soldier was able to interpret the dream and predict Gideon's victory. Barley bread could represent Israel as a cultivator of the soil. The key to the interpretation of the dream is that the word translated "came tumbling" (lit., "overturning"; GK 2200) can be applied also to swords (cf. its use in Ge 3:24). The "overturning" or "overthrow" of the tent represented the collapse of the nomadic forces.

9. Preparation for the battle (7:15–18)

15 Gideon realized that what he had heard was far more than a coincidence; so he immediately prostrated himself in grateful worship before the Lord. Now ready to fight, Gideon returned to prepare his men for the historic battle.

16–18 The only orthodox part of Gideon's instructions was to divide the men into three groups (cf. 1Sa 11:11; 2Sa 18:2). By spreading out around the Midianites, Gideon's troops would create the impression of being a much larger army. The "trumpets" (GK 8795) were the same ram's horn type used by Ehud and Gideon (3:27; 6:34) to summon the troops. Only the leaders would give signals on the trumpets, so three hundred trumpets normally represented a sizable army. When Joshua captured Jericho, only seven priests had trumpets (Jos 6:6).

The empty jars were used to hide the light of the torches until the proper moment arrived. The soldiers may have been mystified as to the actual purpose of such unusual weapons, but their orders were to follow Gideon's example carefully. After blowing the trumpets, they were to shout the war cry (v.20).

10. The Midianites routed (7:19–25)

19–20 Gideon and his men disrupted the Midianite camp sometime between ten o'clock and midnight, striking just after new guards had been posted. The Israelites' main weapon was noise; and between the trumpet blasts and the smashing of jars, they achieved the intended effect of demoralizing the Midianites. Once the jars were broken, three hundred torches lit up the night, apparently at the head of vast columns of troops. To add to the nightmare, a ringing battle cry pierced the night air.

21–22 These startling developments quickly produced panic, a normal occurrence when God led his people into battle. The Midianites were convinced that a powerful army was about to massacre them. The people ran about, shouting and trying to escape as fast as possible. In all the confusion they began fighting among themselves, thinking that enemy forces were already in their camp. Finally, to avoid the slaughter, the Midianite hordes fled toward the Jordan and the safety of the desert beyond.

23–25 To help in the pursuit, Gideon summoned reinforcements, perhaps including many of his original 32,000. Their courage restored, they gladly rushed after the foe. Gideon also called on the powerful tribe of Ephraim to cut off the Midianites at the fords of the Jordan (cf. 3:28). Many of the enemy forces had not yet crossed when the men of Ephraim attacked them and captured Oreb and Zeeb, probably leading generals of the army. The two were promptly put to death at sites later named to commemorate the occasion (cf. Isa 10:26). When the Ephraimites met with Gideon in 8:1–3, they brought along the heads of these leaders.

11. The Ephraimites' complaint (8:1–3)

1–3 The tribe of Ephraim had a proud heritage (see 1:22) and felt insulted by Gideon's failure to call on them earlier. They had cooperated honorably with Ehud (3:26–29) and Barak (5:13–14a) and wondered why they were left out this time. Gideon decided to adopt a course of appeasement. He praised them for their great victory over Oreb and Zeeb, assuring them that in comparison his accomplishments were small. In a sense Ephraim received the "leftovers" (NIV, "gleanings"). These, however, were more substantial than the initial victory ("harvest") won by his little Abiezrite clan. Gideon's flattery calmed their anger and avoided the civil war that later flared up between Ephraim and Manasseh (12:4–6). "A gentle answer turns away wrath" (Pr 15:1).

12. Lack of cooperation from Succoth and Peniel (8:4–9)

4–6 The narrative now shifts back to the exploits of the "three hundred." Gideon was faced with an attitude exactly the opposite of Ephraim's as two cities completely rejected his request for help. The tiny army was now some forty miles from the hill of Moreh when they came to Succoth, just north of the Jabbok River. Worn out from the long chase, Gideon asked these residents of Gad for some provisions. The men of Succoth reasoned that the fleeing Midianites would soon regroup and easily defeat the makeshift army thrown together by Gideon. Any assistance given to Gideon would implicate Succoth and bring certain retaliation from the feared nomads. The question in v.6 apparently refers to the custom of cutting off the hands of dead victims as a convenient body count (1Sa 18:25; cf. Jdg 1:6).

7 The sarcastic, unpatriotic response of the leaders of Succoth brought a sharp retort from Gideon. Perhaps the tribes of Transjordan could be excused for failing to aid Deborah and Barak (5:17), but neutrality was impossible when the conflict was on their soil (cf. 5:23). Gideon promised that when he returned in victory, he would severely punish the city.

8–9 Moving six miles east, Gideon received the same response from the people of Peniel. In the very place where Jacob had met with God and had his name changed to Israel (Ge 32:28–30), these descendants of his refused to believe that God could give victory over the Midianites. Gideon vowed that he would soon demolish the fortified tower that had made Peniel an important city.

13. The capture of the kings of Midian (8:10–12)

10–12 True to his word, Gideon pressed farther into Transjordan, following the caravan trail taken by the Midianites. By this time the remnants of the Midianite army were in Karkor, east of the Dead Sea. No doubt the Midianites believed they were safely out of range of the pursuing armies, but again Gideon surprised them and routed them.

Gideon's main goal was the capture of Zeba and Zalmunna, Midian's two kings, for without leadership the eastern hordes were not likely to resume their raids. The two kings probably belonged to different tribal groups.

14. Retaliation against Succoth and Peniel (8:13–17)

13–17 The resounding victory over Midian did not deter Gideon from severely disciplining these two delinquent cities. A young man from Succoth was compelled to write down the names of the "princes" or "elders." The seventy-seven men who were registered on this death list heard Gideon repeat their earlier taunt before carrying out the punishment. Like their neighbors in Peniel, the men of Succoth doubtless died for their guilt.

15. The Midianite kings slain (8:18–21)

18 The scene probably shifts across the Jordan, so that Gideon could display his captives to the main body of Israelites. The presence of his young son, Jether, also points to a location nearer home. After viewing the vengeance taken by Gideon on fellow Israelites, the Midianite kings did not hold out much hope for their own survival. In fact, they seemed to prefer death by admitting they had killed Gideon's full brothers—a slaughter that may have occurred during one of their earlier campaigns, when opportunity for revenge seemed remote.

19 Gideon had considered sparing the kings' lives, but the additional element of personal revenge made their death certain. Moreover, the death of enemy leaders almost always accompanied total military victory (3:21–25; 4:21–22; 9:55; Jos 10:26).

20–21 Gideon gave the honor of executing the kings to his firstborn son, Jether. The lad shunned this gruesome task, and the kings quickly pointed out that this was a man's job. For them it would be more honorable and less painful to be killed by a renowned warrior like Gideon. Death at the hands of a boy or a woman was considered a disgrace (5:24–27; 9:54). Gideon complied with their final request.

16. Gideon's ephod (8:22–27)

22–23 Gideon's celebrated victory brought him an invitation to become king over Israel and establish a ruling dynasty. Under unified rule, the Israelites felt they could better prevent any future oppression. Gideon rejected the offer, for God was their king, and the people needed to renew their allegiance to him.

24–26 While refusing the throne, Gideon did in fact assume many of the prerogatives of a king; he established a large harem (v.30), amassed a fortune (v.26), acquired royal robes, and made an ephod to consult God (v.27). He also accepted gifts from his grateful soldiers. Most of the items given to Gideon were those usually worn by women in Israel: "earrings" (perhaps "noserings"; cf. Ge 24:47; Eze 16:12), "pendants," and "chains" or "necklaces" (cf. SS 4:9). This vast repertoire of jewelry may have been a factor in Gideon's accumulation of wives.

Verse 24 contains the only reference in Judges to the Ishmaelites. Apparently this was an inclusive term for Israel's nomadic relatives and alternated freely with "Midianites" (cf. Ge 37:25–28; 39:1).

27 With the gold Gideon surprisingly made an ephod that was to lead Israel into idolatry. The high priest wore an ephod, an apronlike garment made of linen, various colors of yarn, and gold thread (Ex 39:2–5). The breastpiece attached to it contained the mysterious Urim and Thummim (Ex 28:28–30), used to consult God (1Sa 23:9–10); this may have been Gideon's purpose in making a golden replica. Gideon seems to have wrongly assumed priestly functions. The ephod eventually served an idolatrous purpose and is described in the same terms as the gods of Canaan (2:2, 17). Gideon, who had boldly broken up his father's altar to Baal, was now setting a trap for his own family.

17. Gideon's accomplishments and death (8:28–32)

28–31 Midian had been thoroughly disgraced and caused no further trouble. Gideon himself spent the remainder of his life in Ophrah. His many wives and sons reflected his prosperity (cf. 2Ki 10:1, 4; 12:9, 14). The hatred and murder that plagued Gideon's family after his death (cf. ch. 9) are characteristic of OT polygamous situations. Among Gideon's wives was a concubine from Shechem. Apparently she continued to live in her hometown and remained under the authority of her father. In such marriage relationships the husband was expected to visit from time to time (cf. 15:1). It is the son of this low-ranking wife who rises to prominence in the next chapter.

32 Gideon's death notice further attests his importance; only he and Samson were buried in the tomb of their fathers. To die "at a good old age" implies a long and full life (Ge 15:15; 25:8; 1Ch 29:28).

G. The Brief Reign of Abimelech (8:33–9:57)

1. Apostasy after Gideon's death (8:33–35)

33 Abimelech is not called a judge, nor was he raised up by God to rescue Israel. Since he was the son of Gideon, this period stands in a unique relationship with the preceding one.

Again the Israelites became enamored with Baal worship, and particularly Baal-Berith (cf. 2:11), whose worship was centered at Shechem. Baal-Berith means "Baal of the covenant" and may indicate that they had made a covenant with Baal.

34–35 By worshiping Baal-Berith, Israel deserted the God who had made a covenant with them at Sinai and who had repeatedly been their Savior. They also quickly forgot the benefits won for the nation by Gideon. Calling Gideon Jerub-Baal here recalls Baal's inability to "defend himself" against Gideon (see 6:27–32).

2. Abimelech's rise to power (9:1–6)

1 In a polygamous society the relatives of one's mother can provide refuge and support for an ambitious prince. Abimelech was probably spurned by his half-brothers because of his mother's lowly status (cf. 11:1–2); so he appealed to his mother's brothers for help.

Shechem (between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim) lay on important caravan routes. Since no mention is made of the capture of Shechem during Joshua's conquest of Canaan, possibly a treaty was made with that city soon after the invasion (see Jos 8:30–35; 24:1–27—two covenant renewal ceremonies that took place at Shechem). The people of Shechem maintained a link with the Canaanite founders of the city, and perhaps Abimelech's mother herself was a Canaanite.

2–4 Abimelech's appeal was based on the tenuous claim that his step-brothers' rule would not have Shechem's best interests at heart. In fact, it is unlikely that Gideon's sons intended to dominate an area thirty miles south of Ophrah. The residents of Shechem, however, agreed to his plan and provided a substantial sum to carry it out. Temple treasures were often used for military and political ends (cf. 1Ki 15:18). The individuals hired were a worthless band (cf. 11:3; 2Ch 13:7).

5–6 Treacherous and unstable, these mercenaries helped Abimelech commit wholesale fratricide. But mass murders are rarely a total success, and Jotham managed a narrow escape (cf. 2Ch 22:10–12). Nevertheless, Abimelech became the first person ever to be crowned as king in Israel. His abortive rule ran roughshod over the divine requirements for that office (cf. Dt 17:14–20). His coronation ironically took place near the tree in Shechem where Joshua had solemnly placed the "Book of the Law" (Jos 24:26). Beth Millo (lit., "house of the fill") is likely the same as the "tower of Shechem" of v.46. The word "fill" comes from the huge earthen platform on which these structures were built.

3. Jotham's fable (9:7–21)

The sole survivor of Abimelech's purge delivered an incisive evaluation of his half-brother's rule. Presented in allegorical form, this story of the trees effectively lays bare Abimelech's true character and the utter disregard of the people of Shechem for Gideon's memory.

7–9 Jotham traveled to Shechem and climbed Mount Gerizim's eight-hundred-foot slope south of the city. There, at a safe distance from his audience, he pronounced a powerful curse (cf. v.57).

The introduction to the fable contains an unusual reference to God as the One who listened to them. By this statement Jotham may be asking the hearers to present to God a response to his arguments. For the comparison of kings to trees, see also Isa 10:33–34. In recognition of Israel's lowly status, Jotham began, not with a cedar, but with an olive tree. Olives were used for food, ointment, and medicine; they were one of Israel's most valued crops (Dt 11:14). Olive oil kept the lamps in the Holy Place burning constantly, thus "honoring" the Lord. In view of its important functions, the olive tree declined the offer to become king.

10–11 The fig tree likewise passed up the opportunity to rule. Like olives, figs were a key agricultural product. Israel's picture of the ideal age was for every man to sit under his vine and under his fig tree (Mic 4:4; cf. 2Ki 18:31).

12–13 Predictably, the vine also refused. Its fruit was the main beverage of the land, and libations of wine accompanied many sacrifices at the sanctuary (Nu 15:10).

14–15 At last "the thornbush" was called on; and, having nothing better to do, the surprised shrub gladly agreed to reign. This plant was a menace to agriculture and had the quality of burning quickly (Ps 58:9). Since it provided little if any shade, its "refuge" is spoken of sarcastically. It could only threaten to destroy, if its rule were not accepted.

16–20 By this time Jotham's main point was clear, but he gave a detailed interpretation. Gideon probably represented one of the good trees invited to become king (8:22), though exact identifications are not needed. Noble, capable leaders like Gideon believed that the theocracy, not a monarchy, was the best form of government. Abimelech was the thornbush king. Along with the Shechemites, he was guilty of a terrible crime against Gideon, who had saved them at the risk of his own life. He really had nothing to offer the people. Abimelech's mother is called a "slave girl," a term usually referring to a wife's servant who is also a concubine (Ge 21:12; 30:3).

The reference to acting "honorably and in good faith" (v.19) with Gideon and his family implies that an agreement of some kind had been made with Gideon (cf. 8:35). A judge and his family had certain privileges that the revolt completely ignored. The supposition in v.20 is actually a grim prediction that the parties to the crime would mutually destroy each other. True to its nature, the thornbush would ignite a deadly blaze.

21 Before the hostile audience could intercept him, Jotham ended his short speech and fled.

4. The revolt of Gaal and Shechem (9:22–29)

22 Abimelech's rule of Shechem, Arumah (v.41), and Thebez (v.50) was a brief one. The word for "governed" (GK 8606) is unique to the book and is perhaps chosen to distinguish Abimelech's ill-fated rule from that of the true judges. He ruled like a tyrant, and he soon encountered opposition in Shechem itself.

23–25 The Lord was at the source of the conflict, for he "sent an evil spirit" to disrupt the relationship between Abimelech and Shechem. If "spirit" is to be taken in the sense of a supernatural being, this situation would be comparable to Saul's (1Sa 16:14; cf. 1Ki 22:19–23). The citizens of Shechem and Abimelech had committed murder, and the friction between them arose as a result of their guilt.

"To act treacherously" (v.23) is to break an agreement with someone. Shechem's citizens betrayed Abimelech by ambushing the caravans that passed through the ideally located city. No longer could Abimelech receive revenue from these welcomed traders. With travel so dangerous and the lost income, the economy began to suffer greatly (cf. 5:6).

26–27 A certain Gaal came to Shechem to exploit the situation and to deepen the rift between Abimelech and Shechem. He was probably a Canaanite strongly opposed to Israelite rule. Gaal and his men arrived near the time of the summer harvest, when the Canaanites had a religious festival similar to Israel's Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 23:34–43). The Canaanite celebration often included excessive drinking and immorality, hardly conducive to true religious expression. Yet the "festival" of v.27 is literally a "praise," when the gods (especially Baal-Berith; cf. v.4) would be honored for providing an abundant harvest (cf. 16:24).

28–29 Gaal took advantage of the occasion to advocate open rebellion against Abimelech. Whereas Abimelech had earlier stressed his descent from a woman of Shechem (vv.1–2), Gaal noted that Abimelech's father was an Israelite. How could a city that traced its heritage back to the Hivite prince Hamor (Ge 34:2) give its allegiance to an Israelite intruder? Gaal boldly asserted that he would be a far better leader and threw out a challenge to Abimelech. Part of Gaal's appeal lay in the fact that Abimelech did not reside in Shechem; instead, he had appointed Zebul (a Canaanite name meaning "prince") to govern the city, and the Shechemites may have resented this.

5. Gaal's defeat (9:30–41)

30–33 When Zebul heard about Gaal's slanderous remarks aimed at Abimelech and him, he moved quickly before the rebel forces could decide to restrict his activities. He secretly sent messengers to inform Abimelech of the dangerous situation and to offer some sound advice. If Abimelech struck quickly, he could still save the day; for Gaal had not yet had time to organize the Shechemites into a solid army. Zebul recommended an ambush—a strategy that had worked at Ai (Jos 8:2; cf. Jdg 20:37).

34 Abimelech took Zebul's advice and used the tactics of his father, Gideon—moving at night and dividing his forces into several companies. By morning Abimelech's army was ready to make a sudden dash to Shechem and surprise the enemy.

35–37 Gaal, in his new role of leader of Shechem, was stationed at the city gate when he noticed the approaching men. But Zebul was there to ease Gaal's fears in an effort to keep him from preparing his troops. Finally, it became clear that people were coming from all over, including a company from the soothsayers' tree. Gaal may have wished he could have consulted a practitioner there, though his fate seemed sealed already.

38–39 At this point Zebul reminded Gaal of his earlier taunt and challenged him to make good his boast. Gaal probably was not prepared for a siege; so he had little choice but to leave the city walls behind and confront Abimelech in the open. It is difficult to know whether Gaal had the support of the fighting men of Shechem in the battle or had to rely only on his personal supporters (the alternate translation of v.39 in NIV note., "Gaal went out in the sight of the citizens of Shechem," is equally valid). Shechem's residents were mainly involved in battles on the following day (vv.42–45).

40–41 Whatever its composition, Gaal's army soon headed back to the city, and many more were killed or wounded along the way. Abimelech himself did not try to enter the city, but his capable governor drove the disgraced Gaal and his remaining men out of Shechem.

6. The capture of Shechem and the tower of Shechem (9:42–49)

Apparently the people of Shechem were eager to resume their normal activities. Abimelech, however, wanted to punish them further for their lack of loyalty. But his vindictive action destroyed the main city of his "kingdom" and left him with little to rule (cf. Pr 30:21–22).

42–44 Since the fields were outside the city, the people had to go outside its walls to bring in the rest of the harvest. They likely did not have any military plans, nor did they anticipate further problems from Abimelech—at least not so soon. However, for the second day in a row, Abimelech set an ambush and surprised the people in the fields. He cut off their line of retreat to the city while the rest of his troops slaughtered those who were stranded.

45 Already weakened by the loss of so many able-bodied men, the people left in Shechem were unable to ward off Abimelech's full-scale attack. He forced his way into the city and put the rest of the people to the sword. Then he tore down the main buildings and sowed the ground with salt to symbolize the utter destruction of the city and its perpetual infertility (Dt 29:23; Ps 107:34). Indeed, Shechem was not rebuilt until the reign of Jeroboam I, almost two centuries later (1Ki 12:25).

46 The tower of Shechem was probably the same as Beth Millo (see comment on v.6). Normally the tower or fortress was located within the city proper, as at Thebez (v.51). At Shechem the fortress-temple of El-Berith (an alternate name for Baal-Berith; cf. 8:33) may have been this inner citadel. People could have taken refuge within its walls to defend the citadel independently of the rest of the city (cf. 1:8).

47–49 This time Abimelech decided to build a huge fire to destroy his victims. He and his men got some branches or brushwood from nearby Mount Zalmon and carried them to the tower. Abimelech's command to have his soldiers follow his example sounds like Gideon (7:17), who himself had destroyed a tower at Peniel (8:17). After the usual long, rainless summer, the wood was like tinder; so a blazing fire was soon underway. The temple gave the people no protection. With the collapse of the fortress, all resistance at Shechem came to an end.

7. The death of Abimelech (9:50–57)

50–53 Dissatisfaction with Abimelech's rule was widespread, for he next traveled ten miles northeast of Shechem to punish Thebez. The city proper was easily taken, but a strong fortress within it proved more formidable. The people of Thebez heard of Abimelech's strategy at Shechem; so they climbed to the roof where they could offer some resistance. When Abimelech tried to set another fire, he was struck by an upper millstone thrown with amazing accuracy by a woman. The "upper millstone" was an easily held stone, about ten inches long, that rode back and forth over the larger lower millstone as the grain was crushed (cf. Dt 24:6). Grinding wheat was the work of women, and the woman doubtless took the stone with her as a potential weapon. Her success was surprising (cf. 1Ki 22:34); it was unmistakably a divine retribution.

54 Since dying at the hand of a woman was considered a disgrace (cf. 4:17–24), Abimelech commanded his armor-bearer to kill him immediately. Yet long after his death, the credit continued to be given to the woman (cf. 2Sa 11:21; 1Sa 31:4).

55 With Abimelech dead, the Israelites gave up their campaign and returned home. Similarly, later in Israel's history, the slaying of a leader led to the disintegration of Sheba's revolt against David (2Sa 20:22) and to the dispersal of Ahab's armies at Ramoth Gilead (1Ki 22:34–36). Each example illustrates the power of individual leaders and the desperate need for godly, capable rulers.

56–57 Both Abimelech and Shechem had been guilty of murder and ultimately had to pay for their crimes. Jotham's curse was fulfilled in a remarkably literal way (vv.15, 20). The fire that destroyed the tower of Shechem may have been partially fed by thornbushes, the very designation used for Abimelech in the fable.

H. The Rule of Tola and Jair (10:1–5)

1–2 Little is known about the rule of the minor judges mentioned here and in 12:8–15. The reference to "save" implies a military victory over some oppressor. Except in the reference to Shamgar (3:31), none of the references to the other minor judges identifies the oppressor of Israel. Since the word "led" (or "judged") appears most often with the lesser judges, some believe that these judges functioned primarily to handle judicial decisions (cf. its use in 4:4).

Tola son of Puah was, like his father, named after one of the sons of Issachar (Ge 46:13). Shamir was located in central Palestine. By maintaining a base there, Tola may have exercised control over much of the land.

3–5 Tola's twenty-three-year rule probably overlapped that of Jair, though Tola's began first. Jair was in charge of Gilead, east of the Jordan, and his rule provides a transition to the more important exploits of another Gileadite, Jephthah. Like Tola, Jair was named after a renowned figure—Jair, a great-great-grandson of Manasseh, who captured sixty cities in Bashan (Nu 32:39–41; 1Ch 2:22–23). These cities were called "Havvoth Jair" (the "settlements of Jair"), and thirty of them were still controlled by Jair the judge. That Jair had a total of thirty sons shows he was wealthy (cf. 8:30), as does his possession of thirty donkeys. Kings rode donkeys of this kind (Ge 49:11; Zec 9:9).

I. The Victory of Jephthah Over the Ammonites (10:6–12:7)

1. Oppression and supplication (10:6–16)

The scene now shifts to Transjordan as the Ammonites exerted tremendous pressure from the east. The author uses the occasion of this renewed suffering to detail again the phases of the cycle (cf. 2:6–3:6). These verses also introduce the Philistine oppression, which probably ran concurrently with the Ammonite invasion (cf. v.7).

6–7 This is the final and most extensive list of Israel's sins; it may apply to the whole period. The Baals and Ashtoreths (cf. 2:11–13) were worshiped by most of the nations mentioned here, but other deities also were served. Moab's main god was Chemosh (Nu 21:29), Ammon served Milcom (1Ki 11:5), and Dagon was the leading deity of the Philistines (16:23). By mentioning the gods of the Ammonites and the Philistines last, the author emphasizes that Israel deserved to be enslaved to these two nations.

8–9 The opening clause of v.8 refers to the Ammonites and their severe oppression of Israel. "That year" can be placed about 1096 B.C. The oppression lasted as long as the Moabite one (3:14) and was concentrated in Gilead (i.e., central and northern Transjordan (cf. 5:17). Tribes in south-central Palestine also came under Ammonite domination, and the mention of Ephraim is important for understanding 12:1–3.

10–14 Faced with mounting difficulties, the Israelites finally confessed their sin and cried out for help. The Lord, however, is not to be called on only in emergencies; so he withheld assistance. After all, he had faithfully rescued them at least seven times, only to have them turn quickly to other gods. He released them from Egypt's iron furnace and enabled them to defeat Sihon and Og, the two kings of the Amorites (Jos 2:10) who lived in Transjordan. The Ammonites had earlier aided the Moabites (3:13), and Shamgar was renowned for defeating the Philistines (3:31). The Sidonians may have helped Jabin and Sisera during the "Canaanite" oppression (4:1–3), and the Amalekites already opposed Israel twice in Judges, supporting the Moabites (3:13) and the Midianites (6:3). The Midianites themselves may be the seventh nation mentioned.

15–16 God's people demonstrated the genuineness of their repentance by throwing out the idols they were worshiping and by being willing to return to God on his terms. Persistent prayer finally brought an answer from Israel's compassionate Lord (cf. 2:18). Expressed in human terms, God "could bear [them] no longer," as he watched them suffer.

2. Gilead's predicament (10:17–18)

17–18 Israel's deliverance came in the campaign that followed. At first, however, it looked as if another Ammonite victory was imminent. Their army had once more assembled to attack Israel. The Israelites, determined to stop the Ammonites, gathered at Mizpah to plan their strategy (a town near the territory of the Ammonites; see 11:29). The leaders of Gilead had no outstanding general; so as an incentive they offered to make any commander who proved successful against the Ammonites the ruler of their entire territory (cf. 11:9).

3. Jephthah's exile and recall (11:1–11)

1–3 The opening paragraph is a parenthesis introducing Jephthah son of Gilead. Gilead too was named after a famous ancestor, in this case the grandson of Manasseh. Without doubt his family belonged to the "upper class," one reason why Jephthah was called a "mighty warrior" or "man of valor." Jephthah was certainly a capable fighter, but his social position also was important. Because of his mother's status, he was an illegitimate son and ranked at the bottom of his family. But in spite of this, the Lord saw fit to use him in a remarkable way.

Apparently Gilead was not a polygamist. Only one wife is mentioned in v.2, and the reason for Jephthah's expulsion was that he was the son of "another woman." His half-brothers had little sympathy for him, especially in the matter of inheritance. Unlike Abimelech (9:1–5), Jephthah did not have the protection of his mother's family; so he was forced to flee to Tob, some fifteen miles east of Ramoth Gilead. In this desolate region Jephthah roamed with a band of "adventurers" and fellow misfits (cf. 9:4).

4–6 Jephthah established such a reputation as a skilled fighter and leader that the men of Gilead turned to him in their search for a commander. Presumably "some time later" brings the reader back to 10:17–18 and the Mizpah gathering.

7–11 With understandable bitterness, Jephthah reminded the leaders of Gilead of his ostracism (cf. 10:14). The elders swore before the Lord that his banishment was over and that they would in fact make him ruler over all Gilead after the battle. This offer astonished Jephthah, but he was convinced by their willingness to take an oath. His years of wandering had served to deepen his faith in the Lord. He knew that if victory lay ahead, it would be from the Lord's hand (v.9). When Jephthah returned with the leaders to Mizpah, he confirmed his intentions "before the LORD" as the agreement with Gilead was sealed. The ceremony at Mizpah had the makings of a coronation as the people installed their new leader.

4. Jephthah's presentation of Israel's territorial claim (11:12–28)

12–13 Jephthah's first move as commander was to get in touch with the Ammonites in an attempt to negotiate peace. The reply from the king of the Ammonites contained hope for peace, but only on the condition that Israel return "occupied territory."

14–15 Since the disputed land lay between the Arnon and the Jabbok rivers, Jephthah sent back a detailed explanation of how Israel had obtained possession of that region. This historical summary attempts to prove that Israel captured this land from the Amorites without violating the territorial rights of either Moab or Ammon (who were now allies; cf. 3:13).

16–18 Jephthah first referred to Israel's stay at Kadesh, when they requested permission to travel through Edom (Nu 20:14–17) and Moab. Neither Edom nor Moab allowed Israel to pass through; so the people detoured south of Edom and then east of Moab, stopping at the eastern end of the Arnon River. The Lord specifically commanded Israel not to fight against Edom, Moab, and Ammon because these peoples were all related to Israel; and God had given them their own territory (Dt 2:5, 9, 19).

19–22 No such prohibition applied to Sihon, however. So when the Amorite king also refused the Israelites passage, there was a battle at Jahaz. God gave the Israelites a decisive victory, and they took possession of the precise parcel of land then claimed by the king of Ammon (v.13). Based on the borders at the time of Israel's conquest, Jephthah's case is a strong one. Moses had seized only Amorite territory and had avoided any open conflict with either Moab or Ammon.

23–24 In OT times war often was viewed as a contest between the gods of the nations involved (cf. v.27). The Lord had clearly defeated the gods of the Amorites, giving Israel clear title to the land. The Ammonites, therefore, had no right to take it away. They should have been content with the territory Chemosh had given to them. Indeed, land itself was considered the property of the deity (cf. 2Ki 5:17). Ammon was thus guilty of stealing real estate belonging to the God of Israel.

Jephthah's reference to Chemosh raises a problem, since Chemosh was the god of Moab while Milcom was the Ammonites' deity. The Ammonites may have joined in the worship of Moab's gods, just as the Midianites did in Nu 25. Possibly "Chemosh" and "Milcom" were viewed as alternate names of the same deity.

25–26 Jephthah's final argument is based on the length of time Israel had possessed the disputed territory. Balak was the king of Moab who hired Balaam to curse the Israelites. After the curses turned out to be repeated blessings (Nu 24:10), Balak made no attempt to regain the area held by Sihon and then Israel. He clearly recognized the legitimacy of Israel's claim to the land. During the next "three hundred years," neither Moab nor Ammon succeeded in retaking the land. Did not such a long occupancy prove Israel's right to that area?

27–28 Insisting on his innocence, Jephthah appealed to the Lord to decide the issue (this is the only explicit reference in the book to the Lord as Judge). But Jephthah's detailed arguments failed to impress the king of Ammon. Convinced that at least might was on his side, the king prepared for war with Israel.

5. Jephthah's vow and victory over Ammon (11:29–33)

29 As in the case of Gideon (6:34), the Spirit of the Lord empowered Jephthah in preparation for battle (cf. 6:34). Thus strengthened, he traveled north through Transjordan, gathering troops from the tribes of Gad and Manasseh. These two tribes actually split Gilead between them (Jos 13:25, 31), with Gad receiving the larger share.

30–31 Jephthah's desire to defeat the Ammonites was so intense that he made a special "vow to the Lord." Though intended as an act of devotion, it showed a lack of faith in God's enabling power. Scholars continue to debate whether or not Jephthah had a human sacrifice in mind. The phrases in question can be translated "whatever comes out" or "whoever comes out" and "I will sacrifice it," but it is hard to see how a common animal sacrifice would express unusual devotion.

Human sacrifice was strictly forbidden by the Mosaic law (Lev 18:21; Dt 12:31); so Jephthah should have known that God's favor could not be gained in this terrible way. Yet Israel's neighbors—ironically, especially the Ammonites—sacrificed their children (see 2Ki 3:27); and this custom might have influenced Jephthah. Although Jephthah did not originally plan to sacrifice his daughter, he would gladly have offered up anyone else if it helped bring victory.

32–33 The Lord gave Israel a stunning victory over Ammon, and Israel was able to capture twenty cities. Thus the bulk of the region between the Arnon and the Jabbok once again belonged to Israel. Verse 33 indicates that a very large number of Ammonites died in the battle.

6. Jephthah's vow fulfilled (11:34–40)

34–35 The flush of victory gave way to bitter despair when Jephthah was greeted by his daughter, leaping and dancing, like Miriam and the women of Israel who had celebrated the triumph at the Red Sea (cf. Ex 15:20). But as the first to leave his house, she came under the terms of his vow. How strange for this happy young girl to notice the response of her father! He behaved like a defeated soldier, not the victorious commander he really was. The death of his only child would mean the end of his family line. Jephthah's lament describes the situation as an unmitigated disaster. Both he and the Ammonites were humiliated and subdued. His own daughter unknowingly brought calamity to herself and her father.

36–39 Jephthah's daughter sensed the implications of her father's vow but made no attempt to get him to break it. Her willingness to yield herself resembled that of another only child, Isaac (Ge 22). Even if victory over Ammon meant her life, it was worth it; and she gently encouraged her father to perform his vow. First, however, Jephthah's daughter requested a two-month period in which she could literally weep because she would never marry. The goal of every Hebrew girl was to marry and have children (Ge 30:1), but Jephthah's daughter would do neither. Accompanied by her friends, she spent two months on the mountains, weeping and meditating, preparing for her ordeal. When she returned, Jephthah carried out his solemn vow.

40 The yearly commemoration of this noble girl makes sense only if she died at the hands of her father. No other interpretation is satisfactory. The death of this innocent girl came because of a rash vow. Jephthah knew that it was a sin to break a vow (Nu 30:2), but in this case it was an even greater sin to fulfill it. Jephthah was treating his daughter as a "person devoted to destruction" (Lev 27:29). This type of punishment was a strong curse reserved for the enemies of God (cf. Jos 6:17), but Jephthah's daughter had done nothing to deserve such a fate. According to Pr 26:2, "an undeserved curse does not come to rest" (cf. 1Sa 14:28, 43–45). Though Jephthah sincerely believed God required him to go through with his promise, he was badly mistaken.

7. Jephthah's defeat of Ephraim (12:1–7)

1–3 The proud and powerful tribe of Ephraim had earlier denounced Gideon for failing to invite them to participate in the victory over Midian (8:1–3). Gideon had soothed them by involving them in the campaign and praising their contribution. Now Ephraim challenged Jephthah, voicing their complaint after crossing the Jordan and coming to Zaphon. They threatened to burn down Jephthah's house, as if he were no more than a petty prince (cf. 15:6). This time the exchange did not end so amicably.

Understandably, Jephthah was greatly irritated by the Ephraimites' arrogance. During the eighteen-year oppression, the people of Gilead had doubtless asked for help from Ephraim and other affected tribes (cf. 10:9), but no assistance was forthcoming. In the recently completed campaign, there was no mention of an invitation to Ephraim (11:29), though Jephthah indicated that a general call may have gone out. The fight against the Ammonites was a perilous one. Yet Jephthah defeated them and gave God the credit. Why should the Ephraimites complain about a victory accomplished through God's intervention for the benefit of all the tribes? It was a strange jealousy that spurred on Ephraim.

4–6 The civil war was triggered when the men of Ephraim called the Gileadites "renegades." This insult may have been partially aimed at Jephthah's former position as a brigand chief, but more likely it stemmed from the division between the eastern and western tribes (cf. 5:15–17). Ephraim looked down on these relatives across the river, who no longer even spoke the same dialect.

For the third time in Judges, the capture of the fords of the Jordan was crucial (3:28; 7:24–25). Apparently these were the same fords where the Ephraimites had cut down the Midianites in ch. 7. But this time Jephthah's army slaughtered the Ephraimites, who were trying to flee from the skillful Gileadite fighters. The clever test faced by the disgraced soldiers was to pronounce the word "Shibboleth," which means either "an ear of grain" or "a flowing stream." The Ephraimites were identified when they managed to say only "Sibboleth" (cf. Mt 26:73).

With the loss of 42,000 men, Ephraim's military capability was virtually wiped out (cf. Nu 1:33). Jephthah was vindicated and his position as leader of Gilead was strengthened. Nevertheless, the intertribal warfare illustrated the serious problems that confronted the nation as a whole.

7 Jephthah "led" or "judged" (see the introduction) Israel for only six years, most likely only in Transjordan. He was buried in Gilead, perhaps in Mizpah where he had made his home.

J. The Rules of Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (12:8–15)

Before his detailed discussion of Samson's life, the author inserts brief notices about the last three minor judges. They ruled for comparatively short periods of time and were probably contemporaries.

1. Ibzan (12:8–10)

8 Ibzan ruled from Bethlehem, which may refer to the famous town south of Jerusalem or to a city in the territory of Zebulun (Jos 19:15). The Zebulun location is favored because the southern city is usually identified as "Bethlehem in Judah" (17:7–9; 19:1–2, 18).

9–10 Ibzan's large family reveals his wealth and polygamous practices (cf. 8:30; 10:4). He gave his daughters away in marriage to people outside his clan (cf. Dt 25:5). Marriages were often contracted within one's tribe (14:3); the fact that Ibzan's marriage policy is mentioned suggests a break with tradition.

2. Elon (12:11–12)

11–12 Elon ranks with Tola (10:1–2) as a judge about whom almost nothing is known. He was named after one of the sons of the founder of the tribe (Ge 46:14).

3. Abdon (12:13–15)

13 Pirathon was the home of Benaiah, one of David's mighty men (1Ch 11:31) from Ephraim (1Ch 27:14). The site is close to the border between Ephraim and Manasseh.

14–15 The mention of Abdon's forty sons and thirty grandsons seems out of proportion with his short period as judge. Counting sons and grandsons, Abdon's offspring equaled Gideon's (8:30). For the significance of the donkeys, see comment on 10:4.

K. Samson's Victory Over the Philistines (13:1–16:31)

In chs. 13–18, the author concentrates on the tribe of Dan, one of the largest and most prominent tribes during the desert march (Nu 2:25–31). In the period of the judges, however, Dan seemed helpless against the Amorites (1:34) and moved northward to find new territory (chs. 17–18). Contrasted with these failures are the exploits of Samson. Yet his own life was a strange mixture of the strength and weakness that epitomized the tragic conditions within the tribe itself.

1. The angelic announcement of Samson's birth (13:1–14)

1 The primary introduction to this cycle was in 10:6–16, where it was linked with the sins that brought on the Ammonite invasion. Now the author, having described the defeat of Ammon, turns to the enemy that proved to be a thorn in Israel's side until David mastered them. The Philistines had lived in Palestine since Abraham's time (Ge 21:32–34; 26:1–6); but since 1200 B.C., they had settled along the coast in increasing numbers (cf. 3:3). Shamgar had won a great victory over them (3:31), halting their advance at least temporarily.

The Philistines, however, were warlike and powerful, and by 1100 B.C. they were exerting considerable pressure from their five cities in the west. The start of their forty-year oppression of Israel—the longest in the book—followed about five years later, and the tribes of Dan and Judah were the first to come under Philistine rule (cf. 15:11).

2–5 The epic story of Samson begins in the city of Zorah, located in the foothills about fifteen miles west of Jerusalem (cf. v.25; 16:31; 18:2, 8, 11). The plight of Manoah's wife was one shared earlier by the renowned Sarah and Rachel (Ge 11:30; 29:31). Since the Israelites considered children as a gift of God (cf. Ps 127:3), barrenness was a mark of divine disfavor. To die childless was tragic indeed (cf. 11:37–40). Manoah's wife would have been overjoyed to have just an ordinary baby, but the angel of the Lord informed her that she would have a special son.

The son promised to Manoah's wife would be a Nazirite (GK 5687; a word meaning "dedicated" or "consecrated"). According to Nu 6:1–12, the Nazirite vow was voluntarily taken for a limited time, but Samson's was lifelong. Nazirites had three special restrictions: (1) they were to abstain totally from "fermented drink" and could not eat any grapes or raisins; (2) they could not have their hair cut; and (3) they could not come near a corpse. Violation of all these plays an important part in Samson's life, though the second restriction is particularly emphasized.

Samson's mother was commanded here to observe the Nazirite vow at least during the course of her pregnancy. The prohibition against eating unclean food applied to all Israelites. It was, however, especially important for her because carcasses were used as food and could contaminate—or make ceremonially unclean—whatever they came in contact with (cf. Lev 11:32–40), including her unborn son.

The dedication of the child was to have military implications also, for he would gain victories over the Philistines. Yet since he would only "begin the deliverance," the conquest would be an incomplete one.

6–7 Manoah's wife shared the amazing news with her husband but had difficulty describing the visitor. "A man of God" is a term normally applied to prophets (Dt 33:1; 1Sa 9:6; cf. 2Ch 8:14). The man's impressive or "awesome" (GK 3707; cf. Pss 66:5; 76:12) appearance caused her to wonder whether he was an angel. To establish the authenticity of the message, it was important to know the name of the messenger (cf. Ex 3:13).

8–14 Manoah's motivation in praying for a second visit by the man of God apparently lay in his anxiety about rearing so unusual a child. He seemed overwhelmed by the responsibility, which may explain why his wife had said nothing to him about the child's involvement with the Philistines. The Lord answered Manoah's prayer and sent the angel back. This time Manoah was able to confer with him (vv.11–18). Yet he said nothing more about how to raise the child; the boy's manner of life and his mission in life had been adequately explained in v.5. Verse 14 does, however, add the detail about avoiding any product of the grapevine, not just wine (cf. Nu 6:3). That the angel did not directly answer Manoah's question may imply that his request for a confirming visit showed lack of faith. He was not easily convinced by the word of God (cf. 6:36–40).

2. The angel's miracle (13:15–23)

15–17 Proper etiquette demanded that Manoah provide a meal for his guest, as Abraham had done on a similar occasion (Ge 18:1–8). So Manoah prepared a young goat. Since Manoah and his wife had not fully realized who the angel was, they did not intend to sacrifice the goat. When the angel asked that a burnt offering be presented to the Lord, Manoah wondered about the identity of this man. Besides, Manoah wished to "honor" the man who predicted the birth of the long sought-after son.

18–22 The angel avoided a direct answer to the question. In the phrase "beyond understanding," however, there is a clear indication of his divine nature. Proof that this was the angel of the Lord came when Manoah presented the burnt offering and its accompanying grain offering. As the flame rose, the angel ascended in it before the couple's startled eyes. This was even more spectacular than the disappearance of the angel who talked with Gideon (6:21). Manoah's reaction to the miracle, however, matched Gideon's; he too thought he would die as a result of seeing God (6:22; cf. Ge 16:13).

23 The Lord had calmed Gideon's fear of dying (6:23), but here Manoah's wife relieved his anxiety. Using good common sense, she reasoned that the Lord would not have taken the trouble to come down twice and promise them a child if they were to die immediately. Besides, the Lord had requested and accepted an offering from them.

3. The birth and growth of Samson (13:24–25)

24–25 The faith of Manoah's wife was rewarded when the Lord blessed the couple with a baby boy. The name "Samson" is formed from the word for "sun," perhaps to signify that God, like the sun, had brought new light into their lives (cf. Mal 4:2).

The early years of Samson's life are covered swiftly (cf. Lk 1:80; 2:40, 52). God gave him a sound mind and a strong body as he grew to maturity. For a while he lived in Mahaneh Dan ("camp of Dan")—possibly a temporary home because of Philistine pressure on the cities.

More than any other judge, Samson was moved by the Spirit of God (see also 14:6, 19; 15:14). On this occasion an unusual verb (GK 7192) describes the Spirit's activity—a word elsewhere used of men whose spirits are disturbed by dreams (cf. Ge 41:8; Dan 2:1, 3). Perhaps the Lord used the same means to speak to Samson and to stir him to "begin the deliverance . . . from the hands of the Philistines" (v.5).

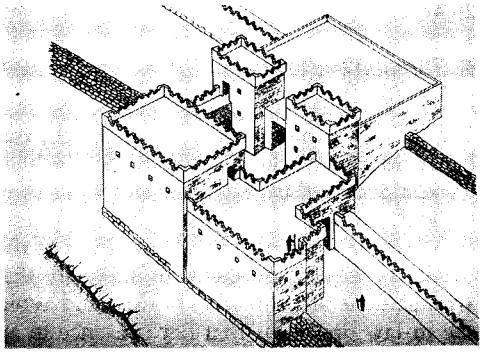
Contrasted with Jephthah, Samson had every advantage as a boy. His birth was predicted by an angel; he had godly parents who loved him greatly; he was uniquely dedicated to God as a Nazirite; and he experienced the power of God's Spirit as a young man. Despite all these favorable factors, Samson's life as it unfolds in the next three chapters is marked by tragedy.

4. Samson's engagement to a Philistine (14:1–9)

1–2 The saga of Samson begins and ends with Samson displaying a fatal weakness for Philistine women. In this first episode Samson traveled some four miles southwest of Zorah to Timnah, a city on the border between Judah and Dan, which apparently was assigned to the latter tribe (Jos 15:10; 19:43).

The presence of Philistines at Timnah reveals their occupation of Israelite territory. Their rule was more subtle and peaceful than the other periods of oppression, since Samson and presumably others were free to intermarry with the Philistines. Even the tribe of Judah was content to let the Philistines control them, a sign that a fairly normal life was possible (15:11).

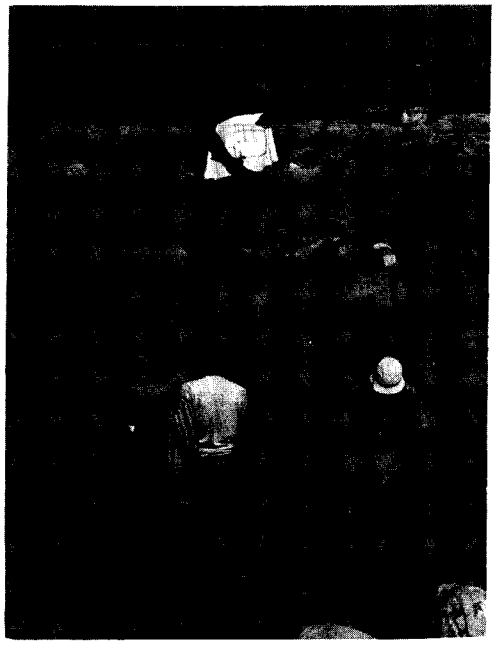


The picture to the right shows excavation in process at Timnah. The picture above is artist Ray Weisel's drawing of the gateway to that city (taken from Neal Bierling, Giving Goliath His Due [Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992]). Used by permission.

At Timnah a Philistine woman captivated Samson, and he wished to marry her. Normally in Israel parents decided whom their children should marry (Ge 24:4; Ex 21:9; cf. Ge 28:1–2) and were responsible for making arrangements with the bride's parents (Ge 24:34–38). Samson was willing to let his parents approach the woman's parents as long as he selected the woman (cf. Ge 34:4).

3–4 Samson's parents objected strenuously to his choice, for Israel had been warned not to intermarry with the Canaanites (Dt 7:1–3; cf. Jdg 3:6). Although the Philistines were not listed among the seven nations of Canaan in Dt 7:1–3, the same objections given there applied to them. They were foreigners whose idolatry would lead their spouses astray (cf. Ge 26:34–35; 1Ki 11:1–6; Ne 13:27). Moreover, the Philistines were the one nation near Israel that did not practice circumcision of any kind (cf. also 15:18; 2Sa 1:20).

The pleading of Samson's parents did not sway him, and reluctantly they gave in. From the divine perspective, however, Samson's contact with the Philistines gave an opportunity for God to use him. It may seem paradoxical that the Lord would work through Samson's willful decision, but this aspect of his sovereignty appeared before in Judges (cf. 3:1–2).



5–6 Samson and his parents were traveling to Timnah to discuss marriage arrangements when his great strength was first displayed. He had evidently left his parents briefly and rejoined them later on the main road. Attacked by a lion, Samson was enabled by the Spirit of God to kill the lion easily. Samson likely said nothing to his parents about his feat because such contact with the dead lion violated his Nazirite vow (cf. Nu 6:6, 9). The mention of the vineyards in v.5 may mean that Samson broke another Nazirite law by eating some grapes (Nu 6:3).

7–9 This additional meeting with the woman reinforced Samson's desire to marry her; so at the specified time he returned to Timnah for the wedding feast. On the way he took the same path he had followed in v.5 and noticed that there was a honeycomb in the lion's carcass. Heedless of the Nazirite vow, he scooped out some delicious honey and shared it with his parents. It was the unusual location of the honey that gave Samson the idea for the riddle of vv.12–14.

5. The marriage feast and the riddle (14:10–20)

10 Arriving at Timnah, Samson made preparations for the wedding feast. "Feast" is literally "a place of drinking," and doubtless the forbidden fruit of the vine passed between the lips of Samson the Nazirite. Samson's father is singled out, perhaps because he was paying for the feast, or perhaps because he was a witness to this marriage covenant (cf. Ge 24:50; Eze 16:8).

11 The thirty companions were probably provided by the bride's family (cf. Mt 9:15; Mk 2:19). In some instances these companions were a kind of bodyguard for protection against marauders. At this feast their function was to match wits with Samson.

12–13 Though the riddle was designed as a form of entertainment, it may have been related to the lack of proper wedding attire also (cf. Mt 22:11–12). Samson's offer was an attractive one, since clothes were highly regarded in the Near East. Possibly also the Philistines wanted to prove that they were smarter than the Israelites.

14–17 Solving the riddle turned out to be more difficult than anticipated; so by the middle of the week the Philistines realized what this wedding might cost them. In desperation they threatened Samson's wife, and the festal atmosphere turned into a battle of nerves. The bride was asked to use any means possible to get the answer from Samson, or she and her family faced destruction and death (cf. 15:6). To save her family, Samson's wife pled for him to show his love by confiding in her; she wore him down by weeping for a week (cf. 16:15). Samson was good at keeping secrets (cf. vv.6, 9), but he eventually gave in to his wife's nagging.

18–20 Given the answer by Samson's wife, the Philistines triumphantly presented it before the deadline. Samson replied with another bit of verse that showed how they got the answer. Heifers were not normally used for plowing; so the thirty had not played fair. In retaliation Samson traveled over twenty miles to the coastal city of Ashkelon, one of the five key Philistine centers. There, again empowered by the Spirit (v.6), he waylaid thirty well-dressed men and robbed them of their clothes to pay off the debt. Apparently he hoped to conceal his actions by going such a long distance from Timnah.

Still angry with his wife, Samson avoided her for a time and returned to his father's home. If Samson had not had relations with his wife, the marriage was not fully legal; and the bride's father wondered whether it ever would be consummated. Therefore, because he did not want his daughter to be abandoned in disgrace so soon after the wedding, he gave her to Samson's best man (cf. 1Sa 25:44).

6. Samson's revenge for the loss of his wife (15:1–8)

1–2 Samson's anger eventually subsided, and he decided to reclaim his wife. The wheat harvest occurred in early June and was a time of festivity. The word "visit" in v.2 suggests that Samson's marriage may have been of the "visit" type (see comment on 8:31). By this arrangement the Philistine bride could avoid the in-law problems that her presence in an Israelite household would cause.

If this was a "visit" marriage, the young goat was considered an acceptable present for the enjoyment of marital relations (Ge 38:17). Samson also wanted to atone for his apparent desertion of his wife. When he announced his intention of going to her room and consummating the marriage, her father told him that she was no longer his wife. Knowing that Samson had legally purchased his bride, the father offered him his more beautiful younger daughter.

3–6 Samson was not impressed with the "Rachel" of this family and flatly rejected the offer. His claim of being the true husband of the older daughter was correct, for even the Philistines referred to him as "the Timnite's son-in-law" (v.6). True, he had not immediately consummated the marriage, but was this sufficient ground for the divorce effected by the father? Samson held all the Philistines responsible for the affront and felt he had the right to take revenge.

The "foxes" Samson used may actually have been jackals. The fire spread with incredible speed, and soon the Philistines' crops were ruined. The fire destroyed the sheaves of stacked grain and also the grain ready to be harvested in the fields (Dt 23:25). Grapevines and olive trees were also ruined. Under the law (Ex 22:6), burning crops and fields was considered a serious offense; and the Philistines were distressed at this blow to their economy. They retaliated by burning Samson's wife and her father, a fate that ironically she had tried to avoid by wheedling out of Samson the key to his riddle (14:15).

7–8 Quickly the feud with the Philistines assumed national proportions as Samson sought to avenge the death of his wife. Though he intended to stop when he got even, neither side quit seeking revenge till Samson and thousands of Philistines were dead (cf. 16:28). Presumably the slaughter took place in the Timnah area, but it served to arouse all Philistia. Anticipating the Philistines' reaction, Samson took refuge in a "cave" or cleft of a rock.

7. Samson's victory at Lehi (15:9–20)

9–13 Aroused by Samson's outbursts, the Philistines assembled as an army and moved into Judah near "Lehi" (lit., "jawbone"), the name given to the area after Samson's victory. The presence of an army prompted a quick investigation, for the men of Judah were anxious to keep the peace. Aware of Samson's hideout, three thousand men went to extradite him. Their action betrays the strange complacency with the status quo that made them willing to accept continued domination by the godless Philistines. They meekly handed Samson over to face almost certain death. Samson's justification of his behavior was the same as that used by the Philistines: They deserved to be paid back! Samson agreed to let the men of Judah tie him up after being assured that they would not harm him. He had no desire to fight and kill his own countrymen. Uncertain of his attitude toward them, they tied him securely with new ropes.

14–15 The Philistines' battle cry was a sign that they sensed victory over their hated foe. Shouting provided a psychological advantage over one's enemy (cf. 1Sa 4:5). In this instance the shouting only served to arouse Samson. Empowered again by the divine Spirit (cf. 14:6), he easily snapped the ropes that bound him. He seized a fresh jawbone of a donkey, one that was moist and not brittle, and killed a thousand men. Any of the Philistines who survived probably fled the scene in astonishment. Again, the men of Judah had a chance to follow up this victory and throw off Philistine domination, but they remained strangely inactive.

16–17 To commemorate the triumph, Samson composed another short poem. Like the couplet in 14:18, this poem uses repetition, and it also includes a play on words (cf. NIV note). Carcasses of donkeys were usually thrown outside the city wall (Jer 22:19), and this kind of disgraceful burial had befallen the Philistines. Samson's single-handed victory resembles that of Shamgar (see 3:31). The importance of the jawbone and what Samson did accounts for the name "Jawbone Hill" (see NIV note).

18–20 Samson acknowledged that God was responsible for his victory, but, like Elijah (1Ki 19), he was physically and emotionally drained following the conflict. As he had done for the Israelites in the wilderness (Ex 17:6), God provided water for Samson from the "hollow" in Lehi. The spring was thereafter called "Caller's Spring" because of God's wonderful answer to prayer. By referring at this point in the Samson story to his twenty-year prominence as judge (cf. 16:31), the author suggests that his effectiveness ended prior to the tragic events of ch. 16.

8. Samson's feat of strength at Gaza (16:1–3)

1–3 The final episodes in Samson's story confirm both his great physical strength and his great weakness for women. A number of years passed before he ventured into Philistine territory again. This time he went to Gaza, some forty miles west of Hebron and twelve miles south of Ashkelon. Even at this southernmost Philistine city, his reputation was well known; and the residents showed great caution in their attempt to capture him.

Samson's sensual nature led him to involvement with a prostitute, one of many at centers such as Gaza. Still not married, Samson was especially susceptible to temptations of the flesh (cf. Ge 38:12–15). Thinking they had him trapped, the men of Gaza hid outside and made plans to surprise Samson in the morning. They probably fell asleep, confident that the locked city gates had hemmed in their prisoner.

Sometime during the middle of the night, when the Philistines least expected it, Samson left his shelter and tore loose the city gate. He carried off the heavy wooden doors, the posts on which they hung, and the crossbar of wood or metal that reinforced the doors. He proceeded to haul the whole gate assembly to a hill opposite Hebron.

9. Samson and Delilah (16:4–20)

4–5 Delilah lived near Samson's hometown, for Zorah and Mahaneh Dan (cf. 13:25) were situated by the Sorek Valley. Delilah is never called a Philistine woman (cf. 14:1–2), but her proximity to the Philistine-occupied area and her close contact with their leaders indicate that she probably was.

The Philistine leaders were determined to find out the secret of Samson's strength. Instead of threatening the woman he was infatuated with, the five rulers (cf. 3:3) promised Delilah a fortune—fifty-five hundred shekels of silver (more than 140 pounds)! No wonder Delilah did not give up till she had discovered the secret of Samson's strength. The Philistines' goal was to "subdue" Samson; they hoped to harness his strength and put it to good use.

6–9 Delilah's objective must have been obvious to Samson. He knew how well his Philistine wife had kept a secret (14:17) of far less importance than this one. Confident that he would never tell her the truth, he toyed with her for his own amusement. The first clue dealt with "thongs" made from animal intestines. These were "fresh," much like the fresh "jawbone" he so effectively had used in battle (15:15). But their moistness was of no more help than the perfect number seven; Samson easily broke them (cf. 15:14), and the Philistines made no attempt to seize him.

10–12 Delilah claimed that Samson had deceived or cheated her. His second clue was a variation of the first one, though the Philistines should have learned from previous experience that new ropes could not shackle him (15:13). Perhaps they felt that the men of Judah had not tied him securely enough the first time. But special tying was ineffective as Samson once more broke free.

13–14 Again Delilah complained of being mistreated, and her third plea to Samson took on a new intensity. The Hebrew suggests that Delilah shouted, "Tell me!" as Samson's irritation grew. This time he came dangerously close to the truth as he linked his strength with his hair, and his explanation was so different that it might have given Delilah hope that he was not lying this time.

It is difficult to determine the kind of loom Samson's hair was woven to. That Samson was sleeping suggests the horizontal kind. Having woven Samson's hair into the fabric and fastened it with a pin, Delilah thought she had him trapped. Samson had no more difficulty "pulling up" the pin and the whole loom than he had tearing loose the gate of Gaza (cf. v.3).

15–17 By this time Delilah was frustrated. Yet though she had failed to learn the secret and the Philistines had undoubtedly grown impatient and had gone home (cf. v.18), she was not yet ready to give up. Instead, she did as Samson's wife had done and began to question his love (cf. 14:16). Samson's continued deception disturbed Delilah because it confirmed his intention to keep the secret. Lying once or twice might have been forgiven, but this was the third time. Yet Delilah kept after Samson, who became so tired of her nagging that he finally gave in, as he had during the wedding feast (14:17). Rather than break his relationship with Delilah, he allowed it to break him.

Samson's career as a Nazirite was an inconsistent one. He had been careless about keeping his distance from the fruit of the vine or from dead bodies (see comments on 14:6–10). Yet he kept his long hair as the symbol of his dedication to God. This was the specific point the angel had spoken of (13:5), and it may have exceeded the other Nazirite restrictions in importance (cf. 1Sa 1:11).

18–20 Knowing that she had finally arrived at the truth, Delilah persuaded the Philistine rulers to return one final time so that she might betray him to them. While they knew that shaving beards and pulling out hair was a sign of mourning (cf. Jer 41:5), they hardly dared believe what cutting off Samson's hair would do to him.

Samson himself could not believe the inevitable, planning to elude the Philistines as always. But the bonds of sin are not so easily shaken off. When the Spirit of the Lord leaves someone, the results are indeed disastrous.

10. The capture and punishment of Samson (16:21–22)

21–22 Moving in quickly, the Philistines seized Samson and blinded him. The Jews considered loss of eyesight a terrible curse (Pr 30:17; cf. 1Sa 11:2). Samson's feet were fettered by bronze shackles (cf. 2Sa 3:34), and he was forced to work in a prison in Gaza, the very city from which he had once escaped (v.3). Grinding at the mill was a woman's job (9:53), which added to Samson's humiliation. It is unclear whether he used a small handmill or was forced to turn a large circular stone, a job normally given to donkeys (the latter task would avenge Samson's earlier treatment of the Philistines; cf. 15:16). While in prison, Samson's hair began to grow again.

11. Samson's final revenge at the feast of Dagon (16:23–31)

23–25 The capture of Samson led to great rejoicing; and the Philistines had a national festival in honor of Dagon, their god of grain and chief deity. They attributed Samson's downfall directly to Dagon, and it was this theological error that led to the destruction of Dagon's temple. Samson had fallen into their hands, not because Dagon had defeated the Lord, but because Samson's sinfulness had caused the God of Israel to abandon him.

How vividly the Philistines remembered Samson's "reign of terror"! It had been a time of devastation and death, and even Dagon's grain was put to the torch (15:5). But this was replaced by laughter and feasting as the drunken Philistines called for the once invincible Samson to appear before them and to "entertain" (GK 8471) or "amuse" them. Clearly the Philistines intended to mock Samson as he performed for them (cf. Ge 21:9).

26–30 From the noise around and above him, Samson could tell that he was near the center of the building. With help from the young man assigned to attend him, Samson located the main columns of the temple. It was his turn to get revenge on the Philistines (15:7); so he called on the Lord for assistance, as he had done at Lehi years earlier (15:18). The Philistines apparently had no inkling of Samson's intentions. Indeed, he may not have fully regained his strength until the Lord empowered him this one last time.

With a mighty effort Samson dislodged the pillars from their bases, bringing down the roof on top of the dignitaries assembled inside. Thousands of spectators on the roof also perished in the fall, and the number killed proved to be Samson's greatest slaughter. He gladly died with them rather than continue his pitiful existence among them.

31 The "brothers" who buried Samson may have been relatives from the tribe of Dan (cf. 14:3). The "father's family" was a more restricted group than a clan but broader than our Western conception of a family. Samson was laid to rest in the region where he had grown up and was given the honor of burial in his father's tomb (cf. 8:32).

Samson was ranked among the heroes of the faith (Heb 11:32). Yet he failed to live up to his great gifts. Unable to conquer himself, he was ruined by his own lusts. He stands as a tragic example of a man of great potential who lacked stability of character. Still, God in his sovereignty used him.

III. Two Appendixes (17:1–21:25)

The final five chapters of Judges constitute two nonchronological appendixes to the book, omitting any reference to judges or times of oppression. Both episodes recounted in this section occurred early in the whole period of the judges and illustrate the moral and religious decay that eventually led many to call for the appointment of a king. The key expression in these chapters is "In those days Israel had no king" (17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25).

A. Micah's Priest and the Migration of Dan (17:1–18:31)

1. Micah's mother and idolatry (17:1–6)

1–2 The bizarre and violent events in the appendixes are closely linked with the hills of Ephraim, the highlands of central Palestine beginning some twelve miles north of Jerusalem (the region that played an important role in the success of Ehud, Deborah, and Gideon; see 3:27; 4:5; 7:24). In tune with the moral chaos of the day, a man named Micah stole a substantial sum of silver from his own mother (a yearly wage was ten shekels; cf. v.10). No wonder Micah's mother cursed the thief! Since a well-founded curse was dreadfully effective—even within one's own family (Ge 9:25)—Micah was frightened into confessing his guilt. Immediately his mother pronounced a blessing on him to undo the curse.

3–4 Out of gratitude for getting her silver back, Micah's mother decided to consecrate it to the Lord (cf. Ex 28:38). Yet the desire to make an idol was diametrically opposed to God's command and, in fact, made Micah's mother liable to God's curse (Dt 27:15). Strangely, she dedicated only two hundred of the original eleven hundred shekels. Both her motivation and her activity are questionable.

With the two hundred shekels of silver, the silversmith made an idol for Micah's mother (cf. v.3–4; 18:14, 17–18). This idol was possibly cast in the form of a calf (cf. Ex 32:4). Later the same idol was associated with the city of Dan (cf. 18:30; 1Ki 12:29).

5–6 In addition to the carved image, Micah had teraphim ("idols"; GK 9572)—one or more household gods (cf. Ge 31:19; 1Sa 19:13, 16). Like the "ephod" (cf. 8:27), the teraphim could be used for divination purposes (Eze 21:21). Since the ephod was a priestly garment, Micah went one step further by ordaining one of his sons as priest. Thus Micah boldly set up a "shrine" (lit., a "house of God") right in his home. It was a sad perversion of the true worship of the Lord, leading the author of Judges to bemoan the fact that in those days "everyone did as he saw fit" (cf. 21:25).

2. Micah's Levite (17:7–13)

7–9 The law had specified that priests were to come from the tribe of Levi; so Micah was quick to "upgrade" his religious establishment when the opportunity arose. The Levite he hired had been living in Bethlehem (cf. 19:1). Bethlehem was not one of the forty-eight Levitical cities mandated by Moses (Nu 35:6–8) and assigned by Joshua (Jos 21). The Levites were doubtless scattered because of lack of support, a situation that prevailed all too often in Israel's history (cf. Ne 13:10). In an attempt to improve his situation, the young Levite traveled north and found Micah eager to hire a more "legitimate" priest.

10–12 The Levite became both a "father" and a "son" to Micah. "Father" is a term of honor used of Joseph's position in Egypt (Ge 45:8) and of Elisha as a respected prophet (2Ki 6:21; 13:14). Micah promised to give him enough to live on, including the clothes needed to carry on his priestly functions. Content with these terms, the Levite agreed to serve Micah, who thereupon carried out the second ordination ceremony in the chapter (cf. v.5). The new priest was a descendant of Moses (18:30); since the priesthood was restricted to the descendants of Aaron, his attempt to minister was abortive.

13 Equipped with a shrine, a Levitical priest, and an assortment of idols, Micah felt that this strange combination would bring God's blessing. His smug assertion ranks with Aaron's announcement about a "festival to the LORD" the day after the golden calf was made (Ex 32:5).

3. Danite spies and Micah's priest (18:1–6)

1 Again it is mentioned that Israel had no king (cf. 17:6; 19:1; 21:25)—the only thing that might stop the chaos described in chs. 17–21. Despite the monarchy's drawbacks, kingly rule would improve general conditions at least temporarily.

Caught in a squeeze between the Amorites (1:34–35) and the Philistines to the west and Judah's territory to the south, the Danites sought out a new homeland. Their desire to move revealed a lack of faith in the Lord who had allotted to them their original territory (see Jos 19:40–48).

2–3 Five spies were sent from the same area where Samson grew up, Zorah and Eshtaol (cf. 13:2). They were assigned to search for a new location to the north, much like the twelve men commissioned by Moses (Nu 13:2). En route they stopped at Micah's house, which must have been near a main road. They were attracted by the voice of the recently hired Levite. Their questions imply that they knew him personally, or at least recognized his "Judean" accent. Their repetitive questions reveal their surprise at finding a Levite in that locale.

4–6 When they learned his occupation and resources, the Danites decided to consult the Lord through the Levite. The inquiry was successful, for "Go in peace" implies they would be victorious over the enemy.

4. The report of the spies (18:7–10)

7 The spies traveled straight north till they arrived at the city of Laish, some one hundred miles from their original inheritance and farther north than any territory allotted to the tribes of Israel. There, at the foot of Mount Hermon, they discovered a highly desirable location, a long distance from potential enemies and furnished with an excellent supply of water. The Lebanon range protected it from interference from either Syria or Phoenicia. The residents of Laish enjoyed their secure position and had not built any defenses against invaders. It was an ideal situation for the land-hungry Danites.

8–10 The account the spies gave to the rest of the tribe was most promising. Their positive and unanimous report, recommending an immediate attack, contrasted sharply with the pessimistic majority opinion of the spies sent by Moses to explore the entire land (cf. Nu 13:25–33). The claim of divine approval, however, based on the consultation of v.6, was hardly justifiable.

5. The abduction of Micah's priest (18:11–21)

11–12 Responding to the challenge of the spies, the Danites quickly set out for this new "promised land." Yet one wonders why only six hundred are mentioned. From the Samson narratives it is clear that not all the Danites moved north. The first stop on the journey was near Kiriath Jearim, a city about eight miles from their original homeland of Zorah and Eshtaol.

13–17 The next leg of the journey brought the Danites to the home of Micah. They had recalled the favorable oracle of v.6 and were planning to make more extensive use of the priest and his paraphernalia. The young Levite must have been surprised to see the men again, and at first he was dismayed at the theft of the ephod and idols (cf. 17:4–5). With a six-hundred-man army poised outside, there was little the priest could do to prevent the robbery.

18–21 The priest's mild protest was countered by an offer that he join the Danites and enjoy an expanded ministry to an entire tribe. With the prospect of a higher salary and increased influence, he quickly forgot his loyalty to Micah and agreed to their terms. Instead of losing his religious equipment and perhaps his life, he gained a new position.

6. Micah's futile pursuit (18:22–26)

22–24 When Micah discovered the loss of his idols and his priest, he hastily gathered some friends and pursued the thieves. The Danites were forced to travel at a moderate pace because of the children and the livestock; so they were easily overtaken (cf. Ge 31:23). The Danites pretended to be innocent of the charge hurled by Micah; but they did not invite a search. Micah's protest has an almost humorous ring to it. He had good reason to be upset, and the Danites knew it.

25–26 With their superior manpower, the Danites threatened to attack Micah's forces and put an end to his complaints. They claimed to be fierce or desperate men (2Sa 17:8). Faced with almost certain defeat and death, Micah sadly gave up the cause and returned home. Micah stood face to face with the weakness of his gods. They were taken captive, unable to effect their own escape (cf. 6:31; Isa 46:1–2).

7. The capture of Laish (18:27–31)

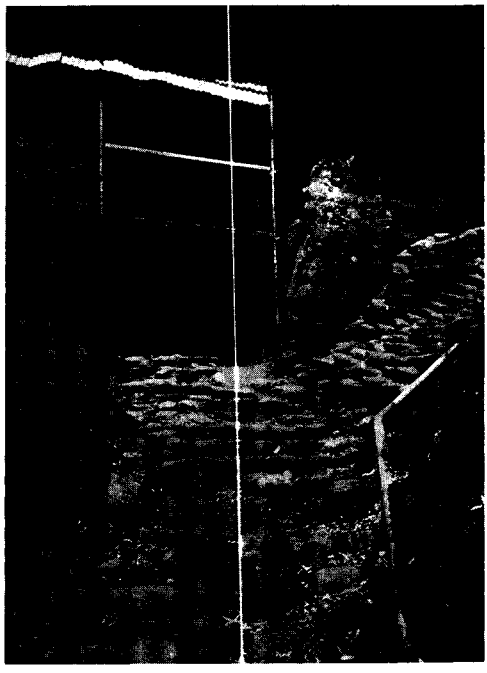
27–28 Moving straight north, the Danites successfully attacked and destroyed Laish. Because of its isolated location and the people's desire to remain independent, they could not find help against the invaders.

29–30 The new city was renamed "Dan" and became the northernmost outpost of Israel in the proverbial "from Dan to Beersheba." There Micah's idols were set up and Jonathan son of Gershom, the son of Moses (Ex 2:21–22), served as priest.

31 The events of this chapter must have occurred before 1075 B.C., since the Philistines destroyed Shiloh at about that time (cf. Jer 7:12–15). The tabernacle had been set up at Shiloh, some twenty miles north of Jerusalem, by Joshua (Jos 18:1); and the site continued as a religious center during the period of the judges. In those days Israel had no king and no Jerusalem sanctuary to unify the people.

B. The Atrocity at Gibeah and Civil War (19:1–21:25)

The second appendix relates one of the most shocking episodes of Israel's history. It occurred quite early in the period of the judges, because Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron, was still ministering as high priest (20:28; cf. Nu 25:7, 11), and because the tribes were still able to function as a unit (cf. Jos 22:9–34). There is also a need for a long time span between the disgraceful behavior of the tribe of Benjamin and the choice of a Benjamite, Saul, as Israel's first king (1Sa 10:26)!



This picture shows the excavation of the gate to Dan in the 19/18 centuries B.C. The metal roof was to prevent erosion after the rains.

1. The reconciliation of the Levite and his concubine (19:1–8)

1–2a The major characters come from the hill country of Ephraim and from Bethlehem in Judah. This time it was the Levite who lived in Ephraim and had a concubine from Bethlehem. Evidently she was unhappy with her status as a secondary wife; for she committed adultery and then returned to the refuge of her father's home in Bethlehem rather than face an angry husband.

2b–4 Four months later the Levite attempted to recover his concubine. Using tender, comforting words, he tried to persuade her that reconciliation was the best policy. Her father was very happy to see him, probably because the breakup of the relationship had meant social disgrace for the family. Anxious to please his son-in-law, the father insisted that the Levite stay in Bethlehem a few days. The laws of hospitality play an extremely important role as the story unfolds (cf. 4:17–23).

5–8 The Levite's attempt to get an early start on both the fourth and fifth day was thwarted by his father-in-law. The enjoyment mentioned in vv.6 and 9 is often associated with food and drink (cf. v.22). The concubine was apparently not present during the meals, for "the two of them" refers to the Levite and the father. She is ignored through most of the narrative, and there is no indication that she even wanted to rejoin her husband. The delay on the fifth day proved to be as dangerous as Lot's hesitation in Ge 19:16.

2. The journey to Gibeah (19:9–15)

9–10 When his father-in-law requested that the Levite delay his departure for a third time, the Levite refused the offer and insisted on leaving. Perhaps he felt that he had stayed too long already. Unfortunately it was the kindness of the girl's father that led to her fatal overnight stay in Gibeah. The travelers headed north toward Jerusalem, six miles from Bethlehem. They left mid to late afternoon, since daylight was almost gone when they reached Jerusalem.

11–14 The road the Levite and his company took passed just to the west of Jebus; so it would have been a convenient lodging place. But the Levite refused his servant's suggestion due to the foreign residents of the city (cf. 1:8, 21). He feared the possibility of danger there and wanted to reach an Israelite city where, ironically, he expected good hospitality. Gibeah lay four miles beyond Jebus. Gibeah belonged to the tribe of Benjamin. Up to that time apparently the Benjamites' immorality was not well known.

15 The city square was an open area just inside the city gate, and it was the logical place for visitors to wait. They would have had to spend the night there if no invitation was forthcoming (cf. Ge 19:2). After the lavish hospitality of Bethlehem, it must have seemed strange that no one offered them lodging. But it was too late to venture out onto the dark roads.

3. The hospitality of the old man (19:16–21)

16–17 In a culture where inns or hostels were nonexistent, it was incredible that anyone would refuse hospitality to a stranger. Yet the Levite and his party were ignored till an old man from the same tribal area as the Levite came on the scene. This Ephraimite was residing in Gibeah on a temporary basis. Like Lot, the old man did not share the morals of the townspeople.

18–19 The Levite explained the situation, though he added that he was going to the house of the Lord (located at either Bethel or Shiloh). He made it clear that he had plenty of provisions; so the old man would not find his visit burdensome. Normally the host supplied the needs of the traveler (Ge 24:25), but the Levite was taking no chances.

20–21 The old man warmly welcomed the Levite to alleviate his nervousness about the strange reception of Gibeah. Spending the night in the square was far too dangerous; so the three were taken into his house. The crisis was over—or so it seemed. The friendly man performed the normal duties of a host, politely refusing the Levite's offer to use his own supplies. The old man fed the animals and provided water for the trio to wash their feet (cf. Ge 18:4; 24:25). Then they enjoyed a meal together.

4. The sexual perversion of the Gibeahites (19:22–28)

22–24 Before long it became evident that the Levite and his company had relaxed prematurely, and the Levite must have soon understood why no one else had offered hospitality. Gibeah had imbibed the morals of Canaan and had become another Sodom. Just as the worship of Baal had brought about a near catastrophe in the plains of Moab (Nu 25:1–9), so the Baal cult was probably responsible for subverting the Benjamites. This must have been comparatively soon after the earlier incident, for the same priest Phinehas intervened on both occasions (Nu 25:7–8; Jdg 20:28).

The "wicked men" (lit., "sons of Belial") are worthless scoundrels bent on evil. They were active homosexuals engaging in practices condemned in Scripture (Lev 18:22; 20:13). The old man felt a deep sense of responsibility to protect his principal guest, and in desperation he offered the townspeople his own daughter and the Levite's concubine instead of letting them assault his guest (cf. Ge 19:8). In those days the place of a woman was often very low, and the "disgraceful thing" was to molest the man. Nevertheless, the Israelites normally considered the rape of a woman disgraceful (Ge 34:7), and women who were promiscuous were also condemned to death for their behavior (Dt 22:21).

25–26 One can easily see why the concubine had left her husband in the first place. She was virtually sacrificed to save his skin as the men sexually "abused" her all night. The concubine survived till dawn, but by actual sunrise the ordeal had taken her life.

27–28 The Levite had not anticipated the mass assault his concubine had succumbed to, but his words seem callous nonetheless. Should he not have shown concern for her long before daybreak? And did he really expect her to be in any condition to travel? It is little wonder that he is called her "master" rather than "husband" (vv.26–27).

That night of horror made a powerful impact on the nation, and centuries later the prophet Hosea recalled the depth of Gibeah's corruption (Hos 9:9; 10:9).

5. The crime report to Israel (19:29–20:7)

29 The shocking murder influenced the Levite to take drastic action. He cut up his concubine's body as one divides the carcass of a sacrificial animal (Ex 29:17; Lev 1:6) and sent a part of her body to each of the twelve tribes, including the leaders of the offending tribe, Benjamin. Apparently the recipients of this gruesome parcel were expected to respond to the appeal or else risk being struck with the sword themselves (cf. 21:10; cf. 1Sa 11:7).

30–20:1 Predictably, the nation reacted with burning indignation. The Israelites had been guilty of numerous sins since the Exodus, but never of anything so repulsive as this. They needed to appraise the situation and then plan a course of action. The nation then "came out as one man," even from the distant borders of Israel. Mizpah, an important religious center in the days of Samuel (1Sa 7:5, 16) that was only a few miles from Gibeah, was the rallying center.

2–3 The leaders of "the people of God" bore the solemn responsibility of meting out the proper punishment for the crime, and a large army supported them. Benjamin's forces of 26,700 (v.15) seemed little in comparison to the 400,000 of Israel.

4–7 The Levite related the shocking details of the murder, claiming that his own life had been in danger that night. He may have exaggerated this point to place himself in the best possible light before the assembly. Then he explained his decision to dismember the concubine's dead body lest the deed go unnoticed. Such "lewd" behavior as that of the men of Gibeah deserved swift and harsh punishment, and the Levite pled that the leaders would hand down a guilty verdict.

6. Israel and Benjamin: preparations for war (20:8–18)

8–10 The response to the Levite's plea was a positive one, and all Israel resolved to take punitive action against Gibeah. This decision was clearly God's will, though they cast lots to find out which tribe should lead the way (cf. v.18). Ten percent of the troops were set apart to gather supplies in case a lengthy campaign was necessary. No effort was to be spared to deal with the "vileness" or "disgraceful thing" (cf. 19:23–24) of the men of Gibeah.

11 For the third time in the chapter, the expression "as one man" occurs (cf. vv.1, 8). The Israelites were knit together as a unit, in marked contrast to the days of Deborah and Barak (5:15–17).

12–13a As originally intended, the anger of the nation was directed only against Gibeah. Since Gibeah belonged to the tribe of Benjamin, however, the leaders of that tribe were of necessity involved. Capital punishment was clearly prescribed, and the Israelites confronted the Benjamites with the Mosaic passages (Dt 13:5; 21:21).

13b–16 Rather than surrender the guilty men, the leaders of the tribe chose to be loyal to the town of Gibeah. What had begun as a punitive operation against one city now turned into full-scale civil war. The men of Benjamin had a good reputation as excellent soldiers (cf. Ge 49:27); their prowess with the bow and the sling was well known (cf. 1Ch 8:40; 12:2). If many of the soldiers of Gibeah were among the elite left-handed (cf. 3:15) slingers, one can understand why the whole tribe would be reluctant to hand them over without a battle. Apparently seven hundred slingers formed a unit within the army, much like the chariotry or the light infantry (cf. 2Ki 3:25; 2Ch 26:14). Stones propelled at speeds up to ninety miles per hour were extremely effective.

17–18 The forces of Israel comprised a powerful army, the largest the nation had ever assembled (cf. v.2). The nation sought guidance from God (cf. 1:1), and the Lord directed that the prominent tribe of Judah should lead the way (cf. Nu 2:9). Gibeah's proximity to the territory of Judah insured familiarity with the terrain.

The mention of Bethel poses a problem, since the tabernacle was located at Shiloh (cf. 18:31). Bethel had been a revered location ever since the Lord revealed himself to Jacob at that site (Ge 28:11–19); so, like Mizpah (v.1), Bethel could have been one of several suitable holy places. The ark of the covenant may have been moved from Shiloh to Bethel (cf. vv.26–27) to be nearer to the scene of battle (cf. Nu 10:35). Since Phinehas the high priest stayed with the ark, it was possible to inquire of the Lord wherever Phinehas happened to be.

7. The first battle (20:19–23)

19–21 Confident of victory, the Israelites moved their forces and equipment near Gibeah and lined up for battle. But the hilly terrain gave the advantage to the defending Benjamites, who used their expert slingers and swordsmen to kill 22,000 of the enemy. The men of Benjamin fought with the determination of those who knew that their very existence as a tribe was at stake. Apparently they struck quickly and withdrew into the city, leaving the Israelites to mourn their losses the rest of the day.

22–23 The startling defeat brought Israel to its knees. On other occasions such slaughter had followed blatant national sin (Nu 25:6; Dt 1:45). The tribes wondered whether perhaps the defeat was punishment for attacking a "brother" tribe—perhaps they had misinterpreted the Lord's will. So this time they asked the question the answer to which they had assumed in v.18. The Lord again answered affirmatively, and the army received a much-needed boost to their morale (cf. 1Sa 4:9; 2Sa 10:12).

8. The second battle (20:24–28)

24–25 Early the next day a more determined Israelite army took the field only to fall back once more before the invincible men of Benjamin. This time fewer were killed, but the 18,000 casualties brought the two-day total to a staggering 40,000, ten percent of their entire force (cf. v. 2)! It seemed catastrophic; but by reducing the size of the army, God was showing them that numbers alone do not guarantee victory. They needed to trust God to accomplish the impossible (cf. 7:7).

26 Deeply discouraged, the army retreated eight miles north to Bethel. The weeping and fasting revealed their desperation, for it appeared that the Lord was ignoring their just cause. The combination of burnt offerings and fellowship offerings was usually an expression of devotion and commitment. The absence of any sin offering implies that the people were innocent of wrongdoing.

27–28 Ministering at Bethel was Phinehas, the zealous grandson of Aaron who had stopped the terrible plague on the plains of Moab, where 24,000 Israelites had perished in the worship of the Baal of Peor (Nu 25:9). Once more he was called on to intercede in a time of national disaster. The sacred ark (its only mention in Judges) was also there, symbolizing the presence and power of God (cf. 1Sa 4:3). The Israelites were prepared to give up the fight against Benjamin, but the Lord again advised them to attack. This time he gave assurance of victory!

9. The third battle (20:29–41)

29 The third time for any event or activity is often the decisive time. If Israel lost this battle, the war against Benjamin would have ended in disgrace. To strengthen their attack, the Israelites changed their strategy. They decided to set an ambush, a strategy successfully used at Ai (Jos 8:2) and Shechem (Jdg 9:33–44). The men of Benjamin were overconfident after two easy victories, and the ruse might work.

30–36a For the third consecutive day, the Israelites lined up against Gibeah, and once again the Benjamites sensed victory. They pursued the men of Israel, who were retreating to the north, and thirty more soldiers died. The death of these men actually made the strategy more effective. When most of the defenders were some distance from Gibeah, the 10,000 men in ambush attacked the city. This sizable force (twice that at Ai [Jos 8:12]) was well able to capture Gibeah. The success of the ambush turned the tide of the battle.

36b–41 The sudden assault on Gibeah brought death to all in the city. Gibeah was quickly set on fire as a signal that the city had been captured. When they saw the smoke, the other Israelites turned and began to fight in earnest. They probably pointed to the fire so that the Benjamites would turn around and see what had happened. As in the case of Ai (Jos 8:20), the psychological impact was tremendous. The Benjamites could not believe their eyes, and they lost all incentive to fight. Disaster had caught up with them because of their evil deeds. The word "whole" (v.37; GK 3972) is often used of "whole burnt offerings" (Dt 33:10). The entire wicked town literally became a burnt offering (cf. Dt 13:16)!

10. The flight of Benjamin (20:42–48)

42 Caught between the inspired main force of Israelites and the ten thousand troops used in the ambush, the Benjamites' only recourse was to flee. They headed east toward the desert area extending from Bethel to Jericho (cf. Jos 16:1). Perhaps they hoped to cross the Jordan and escape into the deserts beyond, but the sheer numbers of Israelites made this impossible. The pursuing forces were augmented by men from nearby cities. Whenever Israel had the enemy on the run, it seemed that volunteers flocked to join in the pursuit (cf. 7:23–24; 1Sa 14:22).

43–47 The Benjamites were surrounded not far from Gibeah and suffered tremendous losses as the Israelites seemed intent on wiping them out. The term "cut down" (vv.42, 45; GK 8845) has the idea of killing or capturing the enemy down to the last man (cf. Dt 24:21 [NIV, "go over"]; Jer 6:9). In one day some 25,000 elite warriors died.

The total slain, given more exactly as 25,100 in v.35, still does not seem to account for the 26,700 mentioned in v.15. If only 600 survived (v.47), 26,100 must have been killed. The other 1,000 men apparently died during the first two days of fighting, where the author of Judges only supplies the number of Israelites who were killed. The last 600 men of Benjamin found refuge at the rock of Rimmon, a conical limestone hill surrounded by wadis and located about four miles east of Bethel. Numerous caves provided hiding places from the relentless pursuers.

48 Methodically, the Israelite soldiers captured and destroyed all the defenseless towns of Benjamin. According to Dt 13:12–18, any Israelite city that harbored idolaters was to be burned—people as well as animals. The sin of Gibeah was considered as serious as idolatry.

11. Concern for Benjamin's survival (21:1–4)

1–2 Unlike most victorious armies, the men of Israel mourned rather than celebrated. The terrible judgment against Benjamin had all but eliminated that tribe. So Israel went to Bethel to weep before the Lord, just as they had done after being defeated in the two earlier battles (20:23, 26). Did the nation suddenly realize that the punishment had gone further than they intended, or were they simply lamenting the judgment that the Benjamites fully deserved?

It appeared that the tribe would become extinct because of the oath that had been taken when the Israelite army assembled at Mizpah (cf. 20:1–10). The low morality exhibited at Gibeah was sufficient reason for banning intermarriage with that tribe; the men of Benjamin had become Canaanites (cf. 3:6). But the people later regretted that they had taken an oath.

3 When Israel had won battles in the past, sometimes very few men were missing in action (cf. Nu 31:49). No wonder they bemoaned the fact that an entire tribe was missing after this conflict. The tribes of Israel were twelve in number, but Jacob's youngest son was about to lose his posterity completely.

4 To renew their commitment to the Lord and to seek his help, the people presented the same kinds of offerings mentioned in 20:26. This time they built another altar (cf. 6:24, 28).

12. Wives from Jabesh Gilead (21:5–14)

5–7 The dilemma posed by the first oath was partially solved by reflecting on another, more important oath the Israelites had taken. When the pieces cut off from the concubine had been sent throughout Israel, the implication was that any city that did not respond to deal with this atrocity would itself be subject to death. If it had not been for their grief over Benjamin, the Israelites might never have discovered which regions were delinquent.

8–9 The search revealed that the city of Jabesh Gilead was guilty. This town was located nine miles southeast of Beth Shan and two miles east of the Jordan. Perhaps these residents of Manasseh refused to oppose a tribe related to them through Rachel.

10–12 The leaders of Israel decided that Jabesh Gilead deserved the same fate as the cities of Benjamin in 20:48. According to Nu 31:17–18, it was permissible in a war of revenge to save the lives of the virgins. They alone could be spared, and it was this provision that was used to secure wives for Benjamin. Four hundred girls were taken to Shiloh (the place where the tabernacle was located) on the Canaan side of the Jordan River. Situated about nine miles north of Bethel and the rock of Rimmon, Shiloh afforded a temporary refuge where the captive girls could mourn the loss of their loved ones.

13–14 Four months had passed since the six hundred Benjamites had been in hiding. The anger stirred by the war had now subsided, and the men were doubtless eager to give up their precarious existence. When the offer of peace was combined with a promise of wives, the men of Benjamin decided it was safe to accept the terms. Thus the sole survivors of a city were married to the remaining refugees of a tribe. Since there were only four hundred women, however, two hundred men were still left without spouses.

13. Wives from Shiloh (21:15–23)

15–18 The grief of the nation is again mentioned (cf. v.6); and it seems as if the "elders of the assembly" were unaware of the four hundred women obtained from Jabesh Gilead. Perhaps the plan being devised to abduct the maidens of Shiloh was formed before the outcome of the campaign against Jabesh Gilead was known. After the four hundred Jabesh Gilead virgins arrived on the scene, it would be difficult to worry about the tribe being "wiped out." By v.22 the results of the war with Jabesh Gilead had become available.

The "gap" was literally a "breach," usually associated with an outburst of the Lord's anger (2Sa 6:8). It also refers to a break in a wall, suggesting the incompleteness of Israel without Benjamin. For the third time in the chapter, reference is made to the oath that forbade the giving of daughters to Benjamin (cf. vv.1, 7). In the absence of wives, the breach seemed irreparable.

19 A solution was suggested by the approaching festival in Shiloh, when a large number of people would gather. During the celebration perhaps the Benjamites could find the girls they needed. The festival was likely the Feast of Tabernacles (see Dt 16:13–15), since vineyards are mentioned and the grape harvest comes in August and September. It was a joyous harvest festival.

The detailed directions about Shiloh's location may have been given to assist the Benjamites in making the fastest escape possible. Probably they were not familiar with the region, since it lay in the middle of Ephraim's territory to the north. In view of the spiritual condition of Gibeah and most of Benjamin, it is unlikely that they had bothered to attend any recent religious festival in Shiloh.

20–23 Ironically, the men of Benjamin were told to set an ambush ("hide"; GK 741) for the girls, the same technique used by the Israelites against the Benjamites at Gibeah (20:37). The strategy worked flawlessly, and each man obtained his wife. This highly unorthodox method of obtaining a wife was sure to disturb the relatives of the women greatly. Fathers and brothers usually received a bride price from the prospective groom and had an important voice in arranging the marriage (cf. Ge 24:50–53). The Israelites promised to intercede for Benjamin on the grounds that there was no other way to save the devastated tribe. The fact that the Benjamites stole the maidens absolved the parents from the curse against giving their daughters to Benjamin! These arguments may have been less than convincing, but the leaders of Israel prevented the relatives from retaliating against the Benjamites (cf. 18:22–26).

Restored to their property, the surviving Benjamites began the long task of rebuilding and repopulating their cities. It is a tribute to their hard work and to the resiliency of Israel as a whole that a member of the Benjamite tribe was selected to be their first king (1Sa 9:1–2).

14. Conclusion (21:24–25)

24–25 Since the Israelites had dealt with the sin of Benjamin (cf. 20:8) and yet had provided for the future of that defeated tribe, the soldiers felt free to disband. The task had been far more difficult than they had anticipated, and the whole affair constituted one of the most tragic chapters of Israel's history.

The last verse repeats the somber words with which these appendixes began in 17:6. From the standpoint of the monarchy, the period of the judges was indeed a time of anarchy and upheaval. The often leaderless people wallowed in idolatry, immorality, and hatred. Sin abounded on both a personal and a national level, and God repeatedly allowed the enemy to overwhelm his people. The reigns of David and Solomon were a far happier time. Yet it was the last of the judges, Samuel, whom God used to call the people to repentance.

Ruth

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

By any standards the book of Ruth is a classic short story. It has been called the most beautiful short story ever written. It deals with a plot that naturally emerges through conversations between the major characters: Ruth, Naomi, and Boaz.

The setting of the book is the time of the judges. Chronological uncertainties, however, make it impossible to date this period more precisely than the last third of the second millennium B.C.—the period between the initial conquest of Palestine under Joshua and the establishment of the monarchy under Saul. It was a time of moral and political chaos in Israel. There was no strong central government or leader; the people repeatedly turned away from God, and neighboring peoples constantly harassed and invaded the disorganized nation (Jdg 2:14–15; 21:25).

2. Authorship and Date

Jewish tradition in the Talmud accepted Samuel as the author of the book of Ruth. The similarity of the language of Ruth to that of Judges and Samuel was probably responsible for linking it to Samuel. But there is nothing in the book of Ruth itself that helps us to identify the author, though we do know that he was a literary artist and a skillful teacher. The book was almost certainly written during or after the time of David, since one of the main purposes of the book is to point out that Ruth, a woman from Moab, was an ancestor of King David (4:18–22).

3. Theological Values

The book of Ruth does not deal with the major events or the institutions in Israel's history but with the problems and concerns of a single family in Bethlehem. Through the story of the experiences of this family, Ruth presents unobtrusively but powerfully the concept of divine providence. There are no direct conversations with God or appeals to him, though God is mentioned in the book in various places, and the solemn oath "As surely as the LORD lives" (3:13) is invoked. Clearly divine providence is behind everything that happens in the book—the famine, the deaths, Ruth's choice of Boaz's field as a place to glean, his attraction to her, and their eventual marriage.

The covenant relationship that bound the people of Israel to God and to one another underlies much of the book. Though the word "covenant" is not found in Ruth, it is a significant factor in the book's unfolding plot. Ruth's eloquent commitment to the God of her mother-in-law (1:16–17) was her acceptance of a relationship voiced earlier by Israel at Mount Sinai (Ex 24:3). When Boaz commended Ruth's loving care of Naomi (2:12), he was echoing Deuteronomic theology (Dt 28:2). Even Naomi's bitter complaint (1:21) was based on the presupposition of his faithfulness and trustworthiness by reason of his covenant relationship with his people.

EXPOSITION

I. An Israelite Family's Sojourn in Moab (1:1–5)

A. Famine in Judah (1:1–2)

1 The story opens during "the days when the judges ruled." The judges functioned as military leaders in times of crisis; they also served as local rulers, administering political and legal justice (Jdg 4:4–5). The time of the judges was a period of lawlessness and chaos in Israel (cf. Jdg 21:25).

The story begins in a time of famine, a natural catastrophe that occurred often in Palestine, where crops were dependent on the rainfall in its proper season (cf. Dt 28:15, 23–24, 38–40). The famine was probably widespread. "Bethlehem in Judah" is located about six miles south of Jerusalem. The name means "house of bread" and suggests the fertility of the region. Bethlehem is best known as the birthplace of both David and Jesus Christ. Rachel had been buried near there (Ge 35:19).

The severity of the famine caused a certain man and his family to leave their home in Bethlehem and to journey to Moab in the expectation of a fuller life. Permanent migration was not their intention. The "country of Moab" was a land that lay east of the Dead Sea. A large part of this area is fertile and receives adequate rain.

2 The head of the family was Elimelech, whose name means "God is king" or "my God is king." As a kinsman of Boaz, his ancestry could be traced to the tribe of Judah (2:1; 4:20–21; Nu 1:7). His wife's name, Naomi, derives from a word that means "pleasant" or "lovely." The meaning of the two sons' names, Mahlon and Kilion, is uncertain.

The family is identified as Ephrathites from Bethlehem in Judah. Bethlehem was also known as Ephrath (Ge 35:19) and as Bethlehem Ephrathah (Ru 4:11; Mic 5:2). Ephrathah has been understood to have been either an older settlement that became absorbed into Bethlehem or the district where Bethlehem was located.

B. Deaths of Naomi's Husband and Children (1:3–5)

3–4a We are not told how long the family was in Moab before Elimelech died. Naomi's sons married Moabite wives named Orpah and Ruth (4:10 reveals that Ruth was married to Mahlon). Marriages with Moabites were not specifically forbidden by the law (Dt 7:1, 3), though Moabites were not allowed in the congregation of the Lord to the tenth generation (Dt 23:3; Ne 13:1–3). The name "Ruth" is traditionally derived from a word that means "friend" or "friendship"; the meaning of Orpah is less certain.

4b–5 The Hebrew is not clear whether the sons lived in Moab for ten years or were married for ten years before their deaths. For a woman to be "left without" her husband and "her . . . sons" was serious enough in her own community, but in another land she would be in desperate straits. It was only natural that Naomi's thoughts would turn to her homeland at such a time.

II. Naomi's Return to Judah (1:6–22)

A. Naomi's Appeal to Her Daughters-in-law (1:6–15)

6 Naomi heard that the Lord "had come to the aid of" his people in Canaan, so she made preparations to return to Judah. Orpah and Ruth did not question their duty to accompany their mother-in-law, though it meant leaving their own land.

7–8 Apparently the party had not traveled far on the road to Judah when Naomi realized the difficulties that faced her daughters-in-law. Therefore she released them from all obligation to her by encouraging them to return to their "mother's home." As returning to their "father's house" would have been more usual, the reference here is probably to the women's quarters of the home where comfort would be forthcoming and preparations for another marriage initiated. Naomi's parting wish was that the Lord would show "kindness" (GK 2876) to her daughters-in-law as they had shown to her.

9 Naomi also expressed the hope that her daughters-in-law would find "rest" (GK 4957) in the home of another husband. This word refers to the security that marriage gave a woman, not to freedom from work. Naomi kissed them in a parting gesture, but they began to weep loudly.

10 Both Orpah and Ruth refused to be separated from Naomi. They pledged themselves to return to Judah with her, abandoning their families, friends, homeland, deities, and prospects for remarriage. Their devotion, while remarkable in the light of what they were giving up to remain with Naomi, was at the same time high commendation of Naomi's character.

11 Naomi attempted to show her daughters-in-law the irrationality of their determination to remain with her. The verse assumes the law of levirate marriage (Latin levir, "brother-in-law") and cannot be understood apart from it. This law (Dt 25:5–10) provided for the marriage of a childless widow to a brother-in-law. If the daughters-in-law went with Naomi, as foreigners there would be little or no hope for them to remarry and have homes of their own. Naomi reminded them that she was not pregnant with sons who, as the younger brothers of Mahlon and Kilion, would be obligated to marry their widowed sisters-in-law according to the levirate law. Naomi's rebuke of their offer was not harsh but considerate. Observe her tender address: "my daughters." Her unselfish placing of her daughters-in-law's welfare above her own shows her noble character.

12–13 Naomi pointed out further absurdities of the situation they were creating. She reminded them that she was too old to find a husband. Then, even if she did find one and married that same night, it would be asking too much for them to wait till her sons were grown in order to marry them.

Having sized up the situation, Naomi concluded that her lot was far more bitter than that of her daughters-in-law. Because of their younger ages, they could remarry and find happiness and security in their homeland. But the true bitterness of Naomi's lot was that she believed the Lord was punishing her. Naomi offered no explanation as to why she thought God was her enemy. Perhaps she could not really understand the calamities that had struck her.

14 The daughters-in-law wept again because of the hopeless situation Naomi had described to them. Orpah then took leave of her mother-in-law with a parting kiss. Ruth, however, refused to leave Naomi. Orpah has frequently been described as unfeeling because she deserted Naomi; but a careful reading of the text shows that, though reluctant to leave, she was obeying Naomi's wishes. Nevertheless, by returning to her land she returned to her gods (v.15). So she stood in marked contrast to Ruth's faith (v.16).

15 In ancient times it was believed that a deity had power only in the geographical region occupied by his or her worshipers. Thus to leave one's land meant separation from one's god(s). Naomi, though a worshiper of the Lord, encouraged Ruth to join her sister-in-law and return to her land and to her own "gods." The OT does not acknowledge the genuine existence of other gods, but it does admit their reality as objects of worship.

B. Ruth's Pledge to Remain with Naomi (1:16–18)

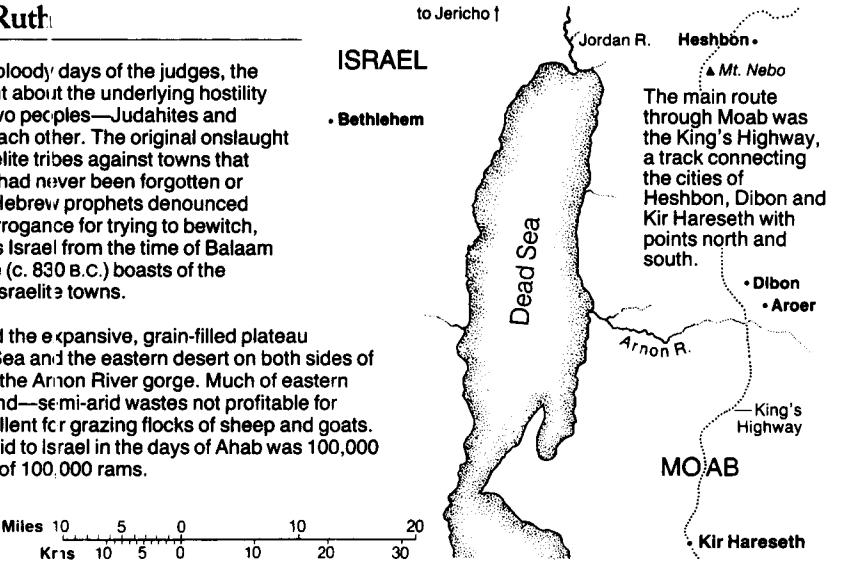
16–17 Ruth's answer to Naomi has become a classic expression of devotion and loyalty. Ruth's commitment to go and "stay" (lit., "spend the night"; GK 4328) wherever Naomi went was not limited to the journey back to Bethlehem but was a commitment to share her home and circumstances, whatever they might be, after they returned to Judah. Ruth's renunciation of her people and gods was total.

By first naming the people and then God, Ruth revealed that she could not relate to God apart from his people. Nothing but death would separate her from Naomi. She swore a solemn curse on herself if she did not keep her promise, invoking the covenant name of God (LORD). Her commitment of no

The Book of Ruth

Set in the dark and bloody days of the judges, the story of Ruth is silent about the underlying hostility and suspicion the two peoples—Judahites and Moabites—felt for each other. The original onslaught of the invading Israelite tribes against towns that were once Moabite had never been forgotten or forgiven, while the Hebrew prophets denounced Moab's pride and arrogance for trying to bewitch, seduce and oppress Israel from the time of Balaam on. The Mesha stele (c. 830 B.C.) boasts of the massacre of entire Israelite towns.

Moab encompassed the expansive, grain-filled plateau between the Dead Sea and the eastern desert on both sides of the enormous rift of the Arnon River gorge. Much of eastern Moab was steppeland—semi-arid wastes not profitable for cultivation, but excellent for grazing flocks of sheep and goats. The tribute Moab paid to Israel in the days of Ahab was 100,000 lambs and the wool of 100,000 rams.



separation even by death probably refers to the Israelite custom of burying members of the same family in a family tomb.

18 Naomi obviously realized the determination of her daughter-in-law and saw that it would do no good to argue further with her. The solemnity of Ruth's curse was itself sufficient to deter Naomi from further protestations.

C. Arrival of Naomi and Ruth in Bethlehem (1:19–22)

19 Nothing is told of events along the road back to Bethlehem; but considering that thieves frequently lurked along the roads, it must have been a dangerous trip for two unaccompanied women (cf. Ezr 8:22, 31; Jer 3:2; Lk 10:30). When they arrived back in Bethlehem, "the whole town was stirred" with the news of their arrival. The commotion caused by Naomi's return may have been from the joy of seeing her again or it may describe the women's shocked whispering about her abject, changed appearance.

20 Naomi's reply to the women involves a play on names. Following a common practice of changing a name to reflect changed circumstances (cf. Ge 17:5, 15; 32:28; 35:18; 41:45; Nu 13:16; 2Ki 24:17; Dan 1:7), Naomi asked that her name be changed from Naomi ("Pleasant") to Mara ("Bitter"). Her reason for changing her name was that God had "made [her] life very bitter" (cf. Job 27:2). The name for God used in this verse is "the Almighty" (Shaddai; GK 8724)—the name of God that the patriarchs knew before he revealed himself to Moses (Ex 6:3). Naomi's concept of the sovereignty of God caused her to attribute her ill fortune to him, not to chance or to other gods. She did not mean it as an accusation but as an acknowledgment of his total control of all things.

21 Naomi further contrasted her former and current states: "I went away full" (i.e., rich with a husband and two sons). The position of "I" is emphatic and is intended to heighten the contrast with her current condition caused by the Lord—"empty" (i.e., widowed, childless, and poor). Naomi insisted that she should not be called "Pleasant" since the Lord himself had "afflicted" (GK 6700) her. She believed that God was showing his displeasure with her by the misfortunes she had experienced. Naomi probably shared the Israelite belief that God blessed the righteous and brought calamity on the unrighteous (Dt 28:1–2, 15; Job 11:13–20). Again she named "the Almighty" as the one who had brought misfortune (lit., "caused evil") on her.

22 This verse summarizes the preceding events of the first chapter with one additional bit of information—the two women "returned" at the beginning of the season of barley harvest, i.e., in the eighth month of the agricultural calendar (April/May). This verse prepares the reader for the events to follow in the harvest field.

III. Ruth the Gleaner (2:1–23)

A. In the Fields of Boaz (2:1–3)

1 This chapter opens a window on the hardships of the poor in ancient Palestine. The first verse immediately establishes the relationship of Boaz to Naomi: he was a "relative" of Elimelech, specifically, he was from Elimelech's "clan." He was also a "man of standing," meaning that he was either a good warrior (cf. Jdg 6:12; 11:1) or a distinguished, honored person. The origin of the name Boaz is uncertain. It is the name of one of the pillars in front of Solomon's temple (1Ki 7:21). If the pillars were named for two of Solomon's ancestors, the meaning of the second pillar, Jachin, is unknown.

2 Ruth requested that Naomi allow her to go into the fields to "pick up [or glean] the leftover grain." God's law expressly allowed the poor the right to glean in the fields (Lev 19:9–10; 23:22; Dt 24:19–21), but the owners of the fields were not always cooperative. A hard day's work under the hot sun frequently netted only a small amount of grain (cf. Isa 17:5–6). Aware of that attitude of the landowners, Ruth hoped she would locate a field in which she would "find favor"; such a desire probably reflects her awareness of how either the poor or foreigners were frequently treated by hostile landowners. Naomi granted Ruth's request and added an affectionate "my daughter."

3 By chance Ruth found herself gleaning in the fields that belonged to Boaz. From the perspective of Ruth and Boaz, the meeting was accidental, but not from God's perspective. Once again the writer reminds the reader that Boaz was from the family of Elimelech.

B. Boaz's Notice of Ruth (2:4–7)

4 Boaz came from Bethlehem to see how the work was going. He greeted his workers with a typical Israelite greeting: "The LORD be with you!" which gives immediate insight into his character (cf. Jdg 6:12; Ps 129:8). They responded with a similar greeting. This kind of salutation would rarely be heard in fields today!

5 Boaz's question to his foreman, "Whose young woman is that?" suggests an attraction to Ruth, a woman he had not noticed previously working in his fields. The question suggests that he was seeking information about her ancestry or clan (cf. Ge 32:17–18; 1Sa 17:55–58; 30:13).

6–7 The foreman identified Ruth as the Moabitess who had returned with Naomi. Boaz had surely heard about the return of the two women, though he apparently had not yet met them. The foreman further told of Ruth's courteous request for permission to glean after the reapers had completed their work, even though the law allowed her the right to glean (cf. v.15, which makes it clear that the privilege of collecting grain from among the sheaves could only be granted by the field's owner). He described her as hard working, taking little time to rest.

C. Boaz's Provision for Ruth (2:8–16)

8–9 The good report the foreman gave concerning Ruth could only increase Boaz's interest in her. His greeting reminds the reader of the disparity of their ages. He encouraged her not to go to other fields to glean but to remain with his servant girls and work alongside them. The men wielded the sickles, and the women followed along, tying the sheaves in bundles. As further proof of his concern for her and his desire to protect her from harm, Boaz told Ruth that he had ordered the men not to "touch" her. She could also drink from the "water jars" that the men had filled for their use. This was a privilege not ordinarily permitted the gleaners.

10 Ruth's response is typical of ancient Near Eastern expressions of gratitude and humility (Jos 7:6; Jdg 13:20; 1Sa 20:41; 2Sa 14:4). She bowed herself with her face to the ground before Boaz and asked in amazement why she, a foreigner, had found favor in his eyes.

11 Although Boaz did not recognize Ruth when he first saw her (v.5), he had already heard about her. He informed her that he knew of her kindness to Naomi and of her abandonment of her own people and land in order to come to live with a people whom she had not previously known.

12 Boaz pronounced a blessing on Ruth, not only for her sacrificial loyalty to Naomi, but especially for her acceptance of the God of Israel. A vivid idiom describes her faith. It pictures a tiny bird snuggling under the wings of its mother (cf. Dt 32:11). Figuratively the idiom symbolizes God as her Protector (Pss 36:7; 57:1; 91:4).

13 Ruth responded with true humility and undoubtedly with some surprise that Boaz could speak such comforting and kind words to one who did not even have the standing of a servant girl before him. Ruth's calling Boaz "my lord" was a common way of showing respect. The phrase "have spoken kindly" may be understood as an expression of confidence about the future (cf. Ge 50:21; Isa 40:2). Ruth was not pleading with Boaz to be kind; she was grateful that he was kind.

14 Boaz showed his increasing interest in Ruth by inviting her to share the noon meal with his reapers. The meal consisted of bread (or in a broader sense, food), wine vinegar, and roasted grain. Boaz himself served her as she sat with his reapers. Ruth ate till she was satisfied, with food left over. Then she left to return to the fields.

15–16 After Ruth went back to continue her work, Boaz ordered his reapers to let her glean among the sheaves (not just picking up grain that they accidentally dropped as they reaped) and not to "embarrass" her. Moreover, they were to pull stalks from their bundles that had not yet been tied up by the women and leave them for her to pick up. Boaz's instructions were generous, far beyond what the law required that allowed gleaners in the fields only after the reapers had finished their work. His actions showed that he already had a special interest in Ruth.

D. Ruth's Conversation with Naomi about Boaz (2:17–23)

17 Ruth gleaned in the field till evening and then beat out what she had gleaned (i.e., separated the grain from the chaff). Her gleanings measured about one-half to two-thirds of a bushel (twenty-nine to fifty pounds). Such a large quantity could not have been acquired in a day by an ordinary gleaner. It shows how Boaz's instructions to his reapers aided Ruth and also how diligently Ruth had worked. Ruth probably gathered enough to last Naomi and her for several weeks.

18 Ruth returned to Bethlehem and proudly showed her mother-in-law what she had gleaned that day. She also gave Naomi some of the food she had saved from her noon meal with the reapers.

19 Naomi must have been amazed by what she saw, for her words tumbled out in rapid succession. There was a question concerning where Ruth had worked and a hasty blessing pronounced on the benefactor, unknown as yet to Naomi. Ruth identified him as Boaz.

20 On learning the name of their generous benefactor, Naomi pronounced a second blessing on him but acknowledged that it was the Lord who had not stopped showing his "kindness" to the living and the dead (cf. Ge 24:27; 2Sa 2:5). She added for Ruth's benefit that Boaz was a "close relative." As such, he qualified as a "kinsman-redeemer" (GK 1457), a man who under the levirate law could fulfill the duty of preserving the name of the dead by marrying Ruth. The responsibilities of the kinsman-redeemer included avenging the death of a murdered relative (Nu 35:19), marrying a childless widow of a deceased brother (Dt 25:5–10), buying back family land that had been sold (Lev 25:25), buying a family member who had been sold as a slave (Lev 25:47–49), and looking after needy and helpless members of the family (Lev 25:35).

21–22 Apparently interrupted by Naomi before her account was complete, Ruth continued by telling of Boaz's instruction to her to remain close to his servants till the harvest was finished. Naomi expressed approval that Ruth was allowed the protection of going to the fields with Boaz's maidens. She was aware that a woman of Ruth's status could meet with harm if she worked alone in other fields.

23 Ruth accepted Naomi's counsel and stayed close to Boaz's servant girls in the fields till both barley and wheat harvests were finished. She continued living with her mother-in-law, to whom she returned from the fields each evening. The two harvest seasons would have lasted for from late April to early June (cf. Dt 16:9).

IV. Encounter at the Threshing Floor (3:1–18)

A. Naomi's Advice to Ruth (3:1–5)

1 Naomi asked whether she should "try to find a home" for her daughter-in-law—i.e., find security and benefits for her in marriage. Parents customarily arranged marriages in the ancient Near East (Ge 24:3–4; 34:4; Jdg 14:2). Naomi's motive was unselfish: "where you will be well provided for." If Ruth remained an unprotected widow in a foreign land, life could go very hard for her.

2 Naomi knew that Boaz was a kinsman (though not the nearest, cf. v.12) who could satisfy the levirate law of marriage. She interpreted Boaz's kindness to Ruth that allowed her to work alongside his servant girls as an indication of a favorable disposition on his part toward Ruth and possibly a willingness to do the kinsman's part. Naomi knew that Boaz would be winnowing barley at the threshing floor that same night, and she had devised a plan whereby he might know of Ruth's willingness to marry him.

3–4 Naomi instructed Ruth to beautify herself according to the custom of the times by washing (cf. Isa 1:16) and perfuming herself. Then after putting on her "best clothes," she was to "go down to the threshing floor." Naomi cautioned Ruth not to reveal herself to Boaz till he had finished eating and drinking. Ruth was to "note" where Boaz lay down and then to go in, uncover his feet, and lie down. She would then wait for Boaz to tell her what to do. Naomi probably had in mind that Boaz would recognize Ruth's action as an appeal to marry her as the next of kin. Though some scholars claim that Naomi was encouraging Ruth to offer herself sexually to Boaz, we must caution against interpreting her advice as an act of such boldness and immorality. It is important to note that only the place of Boaz's feet was involved in the uncovering.

5 Ruth agreed to do exactly as her mother-in-law had instructed her (cf. Ex 19:8; 24:3; 2Ki 10:5). Verse 9 suggests, however, that Ruth did not wait for Boaz to tell her what to do after he awoke, as Naomi had instructed her. Divine providence does not eliminate human activity.

B. Ruth at the Feet of Boaz (3:6–13)

6–7 Ruth carried out the plan that Naomi had proposed to her. As Naomi had anticipated, Boaz ate and drank. He was happy and contented. Boaz lay down at the end of the pile of grain that had been threshed and winnowed and went to sleep. Ruth entered "quietly" (lit., "in secrecy"; cf. Jdg 4:21; 1Sa 24:4), uncovered his feet, and lay down.

8 Some time must have passed. At midnight Boaz awoke suddenly (perhaps from a bad dream or from the cold caused by his uncovered feet) and discovered that a woman was lying at his feet. In the darkness he did not immediately recognize Ruth.

9 Boaz did recognize the shadowy figure as a woman, as his question "Who are you?" uses a feminine singular pronoun. Ruth immediately identified herself as his "servant" Ruth. Then she asked him to spread the corner of his "garment" over her since he was a kinsman-redeemer. Ruth's request has been interpreted as a request for protection or perhaps even for marriage (cf. Dt 22:30; Eze 16:8). Marriage, however, was only one function of the kinsman-redeemer; he was also to serve as protector of needy members of the family. It is an arbitrary judgment to insist that Ruth was proposing marriage. It may be significant that she said, "You are a kinsman-redeemer," instead of "You are my kinsman-redeemer," as there was a closer relative (3:12; 4:1). Naomi could not have been ignorant of the existence of the nearer kinsman, though Ruth may have been.

10 Boaz was flattered by Ruth's kindness in seeking him out. If there had been doubt earlier about his age, it is now clear that Boaz was much older than Ruth. It pleased him that she turned trustingly to him rather than to a younger man, "whether rich or poor." It is increasingly clear that Boaz interpreted Ruth's bold actions as a request for marriage.

11 Boaz allayed Ruth's concern that she might have acted presumptuously or offended him by her forwardness. He assured her that he would do all that she requested. Everyone in Bethlehem knew that she was a "woman of noble character" (cf. Pr 31:10). He assured her that all would know there was nothing wrong in the fact that Ruth had come to him with the request to marry him.

12 Boaz then informed Ruth that there was a barrier to his serving as the kinsman-redeemer—there was a nearer kinsman on whom the legal duty fell. Why Naomi sent Ruth to Boaz instead of to the other man can only be surmised. She may have preferred Boaz or perhaps did not feel free to approach the other kinsman directly and hoped that Boaz would serve as a "go-between."

13 Boaz requested that Ruth remain at the threshing floor the rest of the night after assuring her that he would contact the nearer kinsman the next morning to see whether he would accept his obligation to her. If he would not, Boaz swore with an oath that he would be Ruth's kinsman-redeemer. Not to carry through his commitment after invoking the Lord's name would have been a violation of the third commandment (Ex 20:7).

C. Ruth's Return to Naomi (3:14–18)

14–15 Ruth remained at Boaz's feet till morning but arose to leave before daybreak with Boaz's encouragement, lest it be known that "a woman" had spent the night there. Town gossips would put the worst construction on the incident, thereby destroying Ruth's reputation and perhaps his own. But before Boaz allowed her to leave, he asked Ruth to hold out the "shawl" she was wearing. He filled it with six "measures" of barley. Then she returned to the city.

16–17 Naomi's question to Ruth on her daughter-in-law's return seems strange: "Who are you, my daughter?" It can be understood as initial lack of recognition in the early morning darkness, but more likely the question means "How did it go?" Ruth told her mother-in-law all that had happened. She pointed to the barley Boaz had given her and repeated his admonition, "Don't go back to your mother-in-law empty-handed" (her "empty" days were about to end; cf. 1:21). These are the last recorded words of Ruth in the book.

18 On learning what had happened, Naomi advised, "Wait . . . until you find out what happens." She was convinced that Boaz was the kind of person who would not rest till the matter of the right of the nearer kinsman was settled that day. Also, her advice to "wait" reveals a stance of faith—a confident, expectant belief that only God could bring the venture to a successful conclusion.

V. A Transaction at the City Gate (4:1–12)

A. A Kinsman's Refusal to Redeem Naomi's Land (4:1–6)

1 Naomi was correct in her assessment of Boaz's determination to settle the matter as quickly as possible. He went to the city gate, a kind of outdoor court where judicial matters were resolved by the elders and those who had earned the confidence and respect of the people (Dt 22:15; 2Sa 15:2; Pr 22:22; Jer 38:7; Am 5:10). The location also served as a place for transacting business. Boaz waited for the nearer kinsman, who had prior rights and duties toward Naomi and Ruth, to pass that way. In a town the size of Bethlehem, the best place to encounter friends was to station oneself at the city gate. Sooner or later everyone passed that way. Boaz did not have long to wait. He saw the man he was seeking and hailed him. His attention gained by Boaz's greeting, the man stopped and sat down at the gate with Boaz.

2 Boaz called ten elders who were already nearby to serve as witnesses to the legal brief he was about to set forth. The elders exercised important roles—both judicial and political—in all the periods of Israel's history (see Dt 19:12; 21:2; 22:15; 25:7–9; Jos 20:4; Jdg 11:7–8; et al.). In matters of dispute they sat and listened to the opposing parties present their cases, heard witnesses, weighed evidence, and then made their decision. In the matter between Boaz and the other kinsman, they primarily were serving as witnesses.

3–4 Boaz proceeded to set forth his case. He explained that Naomi, who had returned from Moab, was selling a piece of land that belonged to their relative, Elimelech. The reader is not told why she was selling it or what her legal claim to it was. According to law, land passed from a man to his son or to his kinsmen; property could pass from father to daughter if there was no son, but the law did not make specific provision for passing an inheritance from husband to wife.

It was important in Israel that land remain within the family (cf. Lev 25:23–28; Nu 27:1–11; 36:1–12; Dt 19:14; 1Ki 21; Jer 32). Boaz urged the kinsman to make his intentions known before the people and before the elders who were witnessing the exchange. Would he redeem the property as the nearest kinsman? The man immediately agreed to redeem the property. He must have felt that it would be to his advantage to buy it.

5 Boaz had a plan to discourage the kinsman from buying the land, so he reminded him of a condition he must satisfy to redeem the land. He must marry Ruth the Moabitess to bear children to restore the name of Elimelech to his inheritance in accordance with the levirate law (see Dt 25:5–9). The firstborn son of their marriage would legally be Mahlon's son and eventually own the land.

This case differs from the levirate law on several counts: (1) here a more distant relative than a brother was expected to marry the widow; (2) the kinsman removed his own shoe (see comment on v.8) instead of the rejected widow doing it; and (3) apparently no disgrace was involved, as the significance of removing the shoe here was to seal a legal transaction.

6 On hearing Boaz's inclusion of Ruth in the transaction, the kinsman refused to redeem the land. His justification was that it would "endanger" his own estate. In the presence of the witnesses, he forfeited his right of redemption to Boaz, the next nearest kinsman, by refusing to honor his obligation. Perhaps the kinsman was aware that he would be paying part of what should be his own children's inheritance to buy land that would revert to Ruth's son as a legal heir of Elimelech. Or maybe he was reluctant to intermarry with a Moabite woman (cf. Dt 23:3–4).

B. Boaz's Purchase of the Land (4:7–12)

7 "In earlier times" introduces the author's parenthetical insertion to describe a custom that was no longer practiced at the time the book was written (cf. Jer 32:9–12). The origin of the custom has been traced to an ancient practice of taking possession of property by walking on the soil that was being claimed (cf. Dt 1:36; 11:24; Jos 1:3; 14:9). Removing the sandal and handing it to another became a symbol of the transfer of the land.

8 In the presence of the gathered witnesses, the kinsman renounced his right to the land and invited Boaz to buy it. In a time when few written records were kept, attestation by a number of witnesses made transactions legally secure. The Hebrew is not clear as to whose sandal was transferred. The practice of removing a sandal described here is different from that described in Dt 25:9 (which suggests contempt by the widow for a husband's brother who refused to fulfill his duty). Here it appears to be a ritual used to confirm the ratification of a transaction.

9–10 Boaz addressed the elders and all the people who had assembled, reminding them that they were witnesses to what had transpired. He had "bought" from Naomi all that belonged to Elimelech and to his sons, Kilion and Mahlon. In addition he "acquired" Ruth (only here is it said that Ruth had been Mahlon's wife) to become his wife, in order that Elimelech's name would not disappear from among his people (cf. 2Sa 18:18; Isa 56:4–5). Boaz began and ended his remarks to the elders and the people with the same words: "Today you are witnesses" (cf. Jos 24:22).

11–12 The people answered with what must have been an established legal response: "We are witnesses" (cf. 1Sa 12:5). Moreover, they pronounced a blessing of fertility on Ruth, that she would be like Rachel and Leah, who had twelve sons between them (Ge 29:31–30:24).

The people then pronounced a dual blessing on Boaz—a desire that he "have standing" (likely a phrase that he might achieve wealth) and that he would become "famous" in Bethlehem. In the parallel blessing of fertility in v.12, the people wished that his family would be like the family "of Perez, whom Tamar bore to Judah" (cf. Ge 38:29; 1Ch 2:5; 4:1; cf. Ps 127:4–5). Perez is intentionally named because he was an ancestor of the house of Judah (Ge 38:26, 29). Since the first son of Boaz and Ruth would be reckoned as Mahlon's, the people were expressing a hope that Boaz would have many other children, who would legally be his.

VI. Birth of a Son to Boaz and Ruth (4:13–17)

13 Boaz and Ruth were married. We are not told how much time elapsed between their marriage and the birth of their first son. Attributing to the Lord Ruth's conception after ten years of sterility (1:4) may be the writer's subtle way of explaining why Mahlon, living in a land that worshiped Chemosh, was unable to have children. Both fertility and barrenness were attributed to the Lord (Ge 29:31; 30:2).

14 The women of the community, who earlier had witnessed Naomi's bitter lament, now gathered around her to share her happiness. They praised the Lord, giving him credit for providing a redeemer for Naomi. Their statement suggests that the child is the kinsman-redeemer, though this statement should be understood in the context as a blessing pronounced over the child, just as the men had previously prayed for blessing on Boaz (v.11). Boaz is indeed the redeemer (cf. 2:20; 3:9, 12–13; 4:10). The women blessed the child and expressed a hope that he would become famous throughout Israel.

15–16 According to the women's perspective, this child took away Naomi's reproach of childlessness and would take care of her in her old age. The women foresaw the child as a restorer of life for Naomi and as the one who would sustain her in her old age. They also had a word of praise for Ruth; she was better to Naomi than seven sons might have been. The tribute to Ruth is striking in light of the importance placed on sons in the OT (cf. 1Sa 1:8; 2:5; Job 1:2; 42:13). Naomi took the newborn child, laid him in her bosom, and cared for him as his guardian.

17 This verse gives the only example in the OT of a child being named by someone other than the immediate family (cf. Ex 2:10). The women who named this grandchild of Naomi called him Obed ("servant"; perhaps it meant he would serve his grandmother as a kinsman-redeemer). A genealogical fragment concludes the verse by linking Obed to David as the father of Jesse and thus as the grandfather of David.

The story of Ruth has shown how a Moabite woman obtained an exalted place in Hebrew history. There is later evidence that David did not forget his Moabite roots. During the period of flight from Saul's wrath, David asked the king of Moab to let his parents stay there for refuge (1Sa 22:3–4).

VII. The Genealogy of David (4:18–22)

18 Perez, the son of Tamar (Ge 38:29), and Hezron are mentioned in Ge 46:12 (cf. Mt 1:3). The genealogy in Ruth is traced back to Perez, who was the founder of a family of Judah that was named for him, called the Perezites (Nu 26:20), to which Elimelech and Boaz belonged. The list is composed of ten names. It appears that there are gaps (i.e., unimportant names are omitted) in order to preserve the number ten. The first five names cover the period from the time of the entry into Egypt (Perez, Ge 46:12) to the time of Moses (Nahshon, Ex 6:23; Nu 1:7), while the remaining five belong to the period of the early settlement in Canaan to the closing years of the judges.

19–21 For other listings of the genealogy that is recorded here, but with different spellings for some of the names, see Ge 46:12; Nu 1:7; 26:21; 1Ch 2:4–12, 25–27, 51, 54; 4:1; Mt 1:3–5; Lk 3:31–33.

With the naming of Boaz, the rest of the genealogy falls into focus. Neither Mahlon nor Elimelech is included, however, as the "legal" father of Obed; instead, Boaz, his natural father, is listed.

22 The link to David has now been established. Obed is presented as the father of Jesse and thus the grandfather of David.

It is difficult to know precisely why the book of Ruth ends with a genealogy. It is unlikely that the only purpose of the story was to lead up to the genealogy, and yet it is improbable that the book of Ruth would have found its way into the OT canon apart from its connection with David. Perhaps the genealogy was included to remind the reader of the hand of God in the direction and continuity of history. Two people brought together by a highly unlikely series of circumstances became ancestors of the great king of Israel, David, who in turn for Christians provides an integral link in the genealogy of our Lord.

1 Samuel

INTRODUCTION

1. Title

In the Jewish canon the two books of Samuel were originally one. Like Kings and Chronicles, each of which is slightly longer than Samuel, the scroll of Samuel was too unwieldy to be handled with ease and so was divided into two parts in early MSS of the LXX. Not until the fifteenth century A.D. was the Hebrew text of Samuel separated into two books. It is understandable that the ancient Hebrew title of the book was "Samuel," since the prophet Samuel is the dominant figure in the early chapters.

2. Authorship and Date

According to the Babylonian Talmud, the judge and prophet Samuel wrote the first twenty-four chapters of 1 Samuel (1Sa 25:1 reports his death), and the rest of the Samuel corpus was the work of Nathan and Gad (the latter theory is based on 1Ch 29:29). But we cannot say for certain that this is the case. The priests Ahimaaz (cf. 2Sa 15:27, 36; 17:17, 20; 18:19, 22–23, 27–29) and Zabud (cf. 1Ki 4:5), among others, have also been proposed as possible candidates. All arguments about authorship fail to convince. In sum, we must remain content to leave the authorship of Samuel in the realm of anonymity. Ultimately, of course, the Holy Spirit is the Author.

A statement in 1Sa 27:6 has often been referred to in discussions of authorship: "Ziklag . . . has belonged to the kings [pl.] of Judah ever since." This verse suggests that Samuel was not written until after the division of the kingdom of Israel following the death of Solomon in 931 B.C. But we must reckon with the possibility of a modest number of later editorial updatings and/or modernizations of the original work. With respect to the date of the books of Samuel, all that can be said for certain is that since they report "the last words of David" (2Sa 23:1), the final chapters could not have been written earlier than the second quarter of the tenth century B.C. (David died c. 970).

3. Historical Context

After the conquest of Canaan by Joshua, the people of Israel experienced the normal range of problems that face colonizers of newly occupied territory. Exacerbating their situation, however, was not only the resilience of the conquered but also the failures—moral and spiritual as well as military—of the conquerors. Their rebellion against the covenant that God had established with them at Sinai brought divine retribution, and the restoration that resulted from their repentance lasted only until they rebelled again (cf. Jdg 2:10–19; Ne 9:24–29). By the end of Judges the situation in the land had become intolerable. Israel was in extremis, and anarchy reigned (Jdg 17:6; 21:25). More than three centuries of settlement (cf. Jdg 11:26) did not materially improve Israel's position, and thoughtful people must have begun crying out for change.

If theocracy implemented through divine charisma was the hallmark of the period of the judges (cf. Jdg 8:28–29), theocracy mediated through divinely sanctioned monarchy would characterize the next phase in the history of the Israelites. In the days of the judges "Israel had no king" (Jdg 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25), and it was becoming increasingly apparent to many that she desperately needed one. Not until the accession of Saul did the people have a king in the truest sense of the word—and even then they expected him to "judge" them (cf. 1Sa 8:5–6, 20).

Historically, the division of the monarchy occurred in 931/30 B.C., following Solomon's death. If we interpret the biblical figures literally, Solomon reigned from 970 to 931 (forty years, 1Ki 11:42), David from 1010 to 970 (forty years and six months, 2Sa 5:5), and Saul from 1052 to 1010 (forty-two years, 1Sa 13:1). Assuming that Samuel was about thirty years old when he anointed Saul as king of Israel, we arrive at the approximate dates of 1080 (the birth of Samuel) to 970 B.C. (the death of David) as the time span covered in the books of Samuel.

4. Purpose

In the books of Samuel, monarchy becomes a reality. Three figures dominate the book—Samuel the king-maker, Saul the abortive king, and David the ideal king. A major purpose of Samuel, then, is to define monarchy as a gracious gift of God to his chosen people. Their desire for a king (1Sa 8:5) was not in itself inappropriate, despite Samuel's initial displeasure (v.6). Nor were they necessarily wrong in wanting a king like "all the other nations" had (vv.5, 20). Their sin was that they were asking for a king "to lead us and to go out before us and to fight our battles" (v.20). They were willing to exchange humble faith in the protection and power of "the LORD Almighty" (1Sa 1:3) for misguided reliance on the naked strength of "the fighting men of Israel" (2Sa 24:4).

5. Literary Form

Justifiable concern for the inspired truth and moral excellence of Scripture should not blind us to its consummate beauty. For the most part the books of Samuel are composed of prose narratives that serve well in presenting a continuous historical account of the advent, establishment, and consolidation of monarchy in Israel. It is possible to isolate various literary units within the larger whole—e.g., the Ark Narratives (1Sa 4:1b–7:17), the Rise of Saul (chs. 8–12), the Decline of Saul (chs. 13–15), the Rise of David (16:2–28:2), etc.—although debate is vigorous concerning their parameters.

In recent years various sections of the books of Samuel have been subjected to close reading in order to uncover aspects of Samuel's exquisite literary structure. While manufacturing chiasms where there are none is a constant temptation that the exegete must avoid at all costs, the author of Samuel seems to have used the technique on numerous occasions. A clear example is the Epilogue, in which the Song of David (2Sa 22) and David's Last Words (23:1–7) nestle between two warrior narratives (21:15–22; 23:8–39) that are framed in turn by reports of divine wrath against the people of God (21:1–14; 24).

Second Samuel 1–20 displays a four-part architectonic structure that is impressive indeed. David's Accession to Kingship Over Judah (1:1–3:5) ends with a four-verse listing of the sons born to David in Hebron (3:2–5); David's Accession to Kingship Over Israel (3:6–5:16) ends with a four-verse listing of the children born to him in Jerusalem (5:13–16); David's Powerful Reign (5:17–8:18) and David's Court History (chs. 9–20) each end with a four-verse roster of his officials (8:15–18; 20:23–26). A symmetrical literary edifice of such magnitude can hardly be accidental.

When poetry punctuates the corpus here and there, it does so in memorable and striking ways. For example, the Song of Hannah and the Song of David—the first near the beginning of the work (1Sa 2:1–11) and the second near its end (2Sa 22)—remind us that the two books were originally one by framing their main contents, by opening and closing in similar ways, and by highlighting the messianic horizons of the Davidic dynasty through initial promise (1Sa 2:10) and eternal fulfillment (2Sa 22:51).

6. Theological Values

In terms of the political scene, Israel at the beginning of 1 Samuel was a loosely organized federation of anemic tribal territories scarcely able to keep the Philistines and other enemies at bay. By the end of 2 Samuel, however, Israel under David had become the most powerful kingdom in the eastern Mediterranean region, strong at home and secure abroad. As far as the religious picture is concerned, the opening chapters of 1 Samuel find Israel worshiping at a nondescript shrine presided over by a corrupt priesthood. The last chapter of 2 Samuel, however, records David's purchase of a site in Jerusalem on which the temple of Solomon would be built. Sweeping change, then, is a hallmark of the Samuel narratives—changes guided and energized by the Lord himself through humans like Samuel, Saul, and David.

Election is also important in the books of Samuel. The Lord's elective purpose embraced Samuel (cf. 1Sa 1:19–20), Saul (cf. 10:20–24), and David (cf. 16:6–13). 2 Samuel 7 describes God's choice of the dynasty of David as that through which future kings (including the Messiah) would come. In 2Sa7, kingship and covenant kiss each other.

Reversal of fortune as an index of divine sovereignty and grace is another significant theme. Hannah, a barren woman, becomes the mother of six children (cf. 1Sa 1–2). Men of privilege (such as Eli's sons) die in shame (cf. 4:11). An unheralded donkey wrangler (cf. 9:2–3) and an obscure shepherd boy (cf. 16:11) are anointed as the first two rulers of Israel.

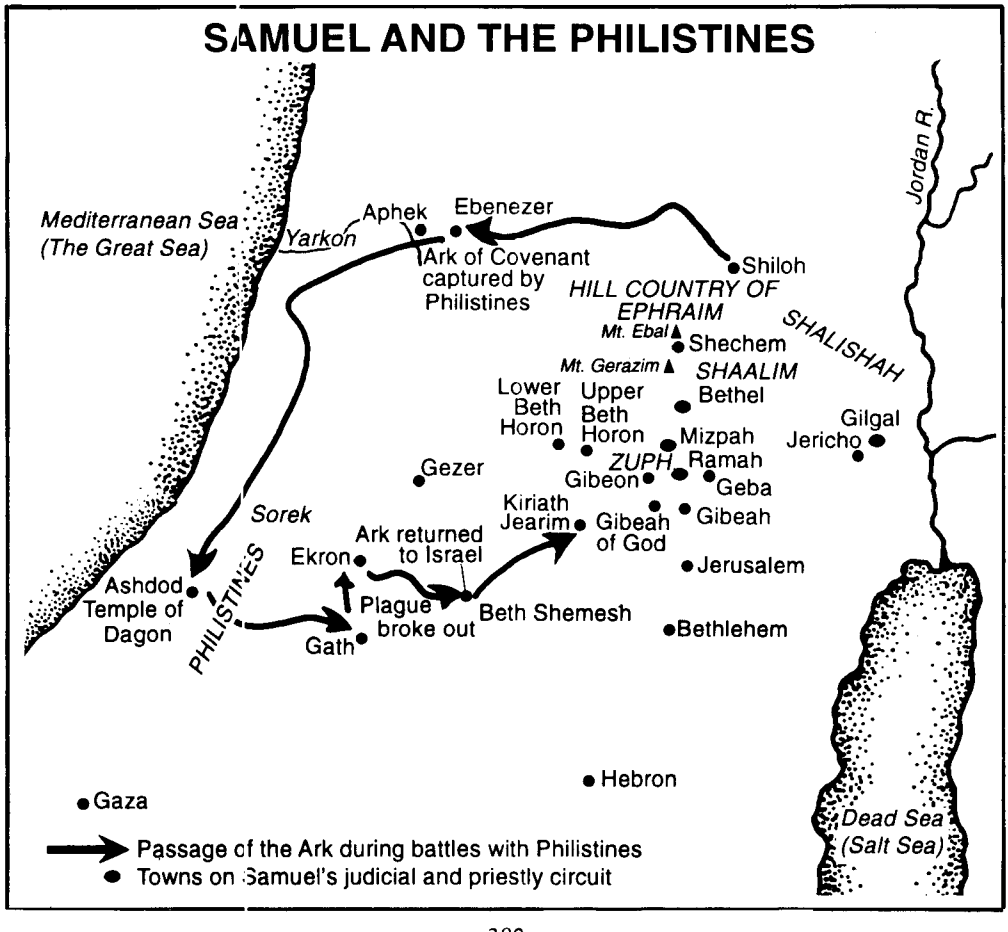
A key theme of the ark narratives is that God refuses to be manipulated. Carrying the ark into battle does not guarantee an Israelite victory (cf. 4:3–11), placing the ark in a Philistine temple does not ensure divine blessing (cf. 5:1–6:12), and looking into the ark brings death (cf. 6:19; 2Sa 6:6–7). The ark, with its tablets of the covenant, served as a continual reminder to the Israelites of God's demands on their lives.

The Deuteronomic theme of blessing for obedience and curses for disobedience is furthered in the books of Samuel. To the extent that David understood that his role as human king was to implement the mandates of the Divine King (Israel's true ruler), blessing would follow (cf. 2Sa 6:11–15, 17–19; 7:27–29). When he deliberately flouted God's will, however, he could count equally on the fact that he would be under the curse (cf. 12:1–18). If the Davidic covenant was eternal in the sense that his line would continue forever (cf. 7:12–16, 25–29; Ps 89:27–29, 33–37), it was also conditional in that individual participants in it would be punished when they sinned (cf. 1Ki 2:4; 8:25; Pss 89:30–32; 132:12).

The offices of king and prophet arose simultaneously in Israel. Saul, the first king, was anointed by Samuel, who stands at the head of the prophetic line (cf. 1Sa 9:6–10, 19; Ac 3:24; 13:20) as promised to Moses (Dt 18:15–18). If the task of the king was to administer the covenant, that of the prophet was to interpret its demands. To the end of the monarchy, the prophets protected with holy zeal their divinely authorized claims over kingship.



EXPOSITION

I. Prelude to Monarchy in Israel (1:1–7:17)

First Samuel introduces us to Israel's last two judges (Eli, a failure; Samuel, a success) and first two kings (Saul, a failure; David, a success). Appropriately the story of Israel's monarchy begins with an account of the early life of Samuel: prophet, priest, judge, and, most significantly, king-maker. God chose Samuel to anoint Israel's first two kings. Each was to be the "leader" over his people (10:1; 13:14; 16:13).

A. The Childhood of Samuel (1:1–4:1a)

1. The birth and dedication of Samuel (1:1–28)

1–2 "Ramathaim"—the town of Samuel's birth, official residence, and burial—means "Two heights." Elsewhere the town is called simply Ramah, "Height" (1:19; 2:11; 7:17; et al.).

Samuel's father is called a "Zuphite" who lived in the area assigned to Ephraim. The Chronicles genealogies identify Samuel as a member of the Kohathite branch of the tribe of Levi and an ancestor of tabernacle and temple musicians (1Ch 6:16, 22, 31–33). Allotted no patrimony of their own, the Levites lived among the other tribes (see Jos 21:20–22). "Elkanah," a popular name in ancient Israel, means "God has created [a son]." He is the only commoner in the books of Samuel and Kings specifically mentioned as having more than one wife. Although polygamy was not God's intention (cf. Ge 2:24; Mal 2:15), having "two wives" accords with the polygamous culture of the ancient world.

Hannah (lit., "Grace") initially has pride of place, probably because she was Elkanah's favorite. Later, however, Peninnah (lit., "Ruby") is mentioned first, no doubt because she was a prolific childbearer (cf. v.4). Barrenness was the ultimate tragedy for a married woman (cf. Ge 11:30; 15:2–4; 16:1–2; 25:5; et al.).

3–8 Three times a year all Israelite men were required to go to the central sanctuary to offer sacrifices at the main religious festivals (Ex 34:23; Dt 12:5–7; 16:16; cf. Lk 2:41). Shiloh (sixteen miles east of Ramah) had been the location of the tabernacle and the ark of the covenant (4:3–4; Jos 18:1; Jdg 18:31). Eli ("Exalted is [the Lord]"), the priest at Shiloh (v.9; 2:11) and a judge in Israel (4:18), was descended from Aaron's son Ithamar (14:3; 22:20). Each of Eli's two reprobate sons—unfortunately also priests—had an Egyptian name: Hophni ("Tadpole") and Phinehas ("The Nubian").

The festival in view here is probably the Feast of Tabernacles. Sacrifices were offered to the "the LORD Almighty" (or "the LORD of hosts"). Festival celebrations were times of rejoicing in God's blessings, especially that of a bountiful harvest. Elkanah distributed portions of sacrificial meat (cf. Ex 29:26; Lev 7:33; 8:29) to Peninnah and her children, since family members shared in certain of the sacrificial offerings (cf. Dt 12:17–18; 16:13–14). Elkanah provided Hannah with a double portion because of his love for her. Hannah's sterility likely prompted Elkanah to take Peninnah as his second wife, who thus became Hannah's "rival." She "kept provoking" Hannah to "grief" (v.16). The devout Hannah was content to allow the Lord to avenge the wrong committed against her (cf. 2Sa 3:39).

The "house of the LORD" refers to the tabernacle but apparently also includes more permanent auxiliary structures that had doors (3:15) and therefore doorposts (v.9). These sacred buildings are called "the LORD's temple" (cf. 3:3).

Elkanah, mindful of Hannah's grief, asked her (lit.), "Why is your heart bad?" To do something "with a bad [GK 8317] heart" means to do it resentfully (cf. Dt 15:10). Apparently he thought she was angry or spiteful because she did not have children. Thus Elkanah was asking Hannah, "Why are you resentful? Don't I [your husband, who loves you very much] mean more to you than ten sons?"

9–11 Hannah's misery peaked at Shiloh during an annual pilgrimage. Her sadness and "bitterness of soul" led her to pray and make a vow to the Lord for herself and a son. The Nazirite vow (supposed here) included (1) abstaining from the use of grapes in any form, (2) not shaving the hair on one's head, and (3) avoiding dead bodies (Nu 6:3–7). The Nazirite vow was not usually taken by proxy and was rarely lifelong.

Hannah humbly calls herself "your servant" (GK 563), a word that indicates her submissive in the presence of a superior (cf. v.16; 3:9–10), and requests that God "look upon [her] misery" (cf. Ge 29:32; cf. 2Sa 16:12). God's remembrance is not a matter of recalling to mind but of paying special attention to or lavishing special care on someone (cf. Ps 8:4). Hannah recognizes that children are always a gift of God. If he will "give" (GK 5989) her a son, in gratitude she will "give" him back to the Lord (but cf. Ex 22:29).

12–18 Hannah's prayer reveals her intimate relationship with God. She prayed "to" the Lord; she prayed "in her heart"; and she prayed silently. Eli misunderstood Hannah's actions. Prayer in the ancient world was almost always audible (cf. Pss 3:4; 4:1; 6:9; Da 6:10–11), and drunkenness was not uncommon at festal occasions. He can hardly be excused for his spiritual insensitivity and should have realized that Hannah's moving lips signified earnest prayer rather than intoxicated mumbling. He therefore mistakenly rebukes her.

Hannah justly protests that she has been "pouring out [her] soul to the LORD," a vivid idiom for praying earnestly (cf. Pss 42:4; 62:8; La 2:19). She declares herself to be "deeply troubled" and does not want Eli to mistake her for a "wicked woman."

Satisfied with Hannah's explanation, Eli tells her to "go in peace" (cf. 25:35). Eli's hope that God would grant Hannah's request is soon fulfilled in the birth of Samuel (v.27; cf. 2:20). Being assured by Eli's response, she breaks her self-imposed fast, and her face is "no longer downcast."

19–20 The next day Elkanah's family worshiped the Lord, which had special meaning for Hannah this time. After their return from Shiloh to Ramah, Elkanah "lay with" (lit., "knew"; cf. Ge 4:1, 17, 25) Hannah. The Lord "remembered [GK 2349] her" by enabling her to bear a son. Hannah called him Samuel (lit., "Name of God") and then punned on the name by saying that she had "asked" the Lord for him (the Hebrew for "asked" is found in the word "Samuel").

21–23 After Samuel was born, Elkanah continued taking his family to Shiloh to sacrifice to the Lord (1:3; 2:19). On at least one occasion he had the additional purpose of fulfilling a "vow," perhaps in support of Hannah's earlier vow (v.11). Hannah decided not to make the trip this time. She preferred to wait until Samuel was weaned. Then she could leave him there to serve the Lord for the rest of his life, as she had promised. After Samuel's weaning, Hannah intended to "present him before the LORD." Elkanah agreed with his wife's desire to follow through with her vow.

24–28 The big day finally arrived, and Hannah was ready. For the trip from Ramah to Shiloh, they took ample provisions. The three-year-old bull was doubtless meant to be sacrificed to the Lord. The purpose of the flour and wine remains obscure (cf. 28:24; Jdg 6:19). When the official slaughterers at the tabernacle had sacrificed the bull, Hannah and Elkanah brought Samuel before Eli the priest. In addressing Eli, Hannah used a common oath formula: "As surely as you live." She thus solemnly affirms that she is indeed the same woman he first had met a few years earlier and that the boy, Samuel, given in answer to her prayers, is now to be given back to the Lord. Eli responded by worshiping the God whom they both served.

2. The Song of Hannah (2:1–11)

1–2 Verses 1–10 are commonly referred to as the "Song of Hannah" because of similarities to other ancient OT hymns (e.g., Ex 15:1–18, 21; Dt 32:1–43; Jdg 5; and esp. 2Sa 22). It may have originated as a song of triumph at the Shiloh sanctuary in connection with Israel's victory over an enemy. Such songs would have been taught to worshipers, and this one perhaps became a personal favorite of Hannah. Therefore she sang it as a means of expressing her gratitude and praise to the Giver of life (cf. esp. v.5). Hannah's song may have been the seedplot for Mary's Magnificat (Lk 1:46–55; cf. also the Song of Zechariah in vv.68–79).

The song begins on a note of grateful exuberance: Her heart rejoices in the Lord—and in his "deliverance" (or "salvation"; GK 3802) as well (see Pss 9:14; 13:5; 35:9; Isa 25:9). The metaphor of one's "horn" (GK 7967) being lifted high perhaps comes from the animal world, where members of the deer family use their antlers in playful or mortal combat. "Horn" thus symbolizes strength.

For Hannah, the Lord is holy, unique, and mighty. She therefore celebrates God's holiness in righteous victory. She then connects his uniqueness with the metaphor of the Rock (cf. 2Sa 22:32; cf. also Ge 49:24; Dt 32:4; Isa 26:4; et al.)

3–8d After describing God's majesty and power, Hannah warns all who would vaunt themselves in their pride (including Peninnah!). Arrogance is both foolish and futile (Pss 31:18; 75:4; 138:6). God judges the heart and weighs it rather than external appearances (cf. 16:7). The "broken" bows are echoed by the "shattered" opponents of v.10. Making the strong weak and the weak strong is what God does (cf. Heb 11:32–34).

The last half of v.5 had special meaning for Hannah, who had once been barren (cf. Jdg 13:2–3). "Seven" here means simply "many," but at the same time also represents the ideal (cf. Job 1:2; 42:13). Just as she who has had many "pines away," so the mother of seven will "grow faint." The formerly barren Hannah eventually had a total of six children (v.21).

The Sovereign God ultimately blesses some and curses others (cf. vv.9c–10c). Verse 6a contrasts death with life; possibly the second half does too, though it may also refer to rescue from the brink of death after a serious illness (therefore contrasting sickness with health; cf. Ps 30:2–3).

The Lord can—and does—reverse the fortunes of poor and rich (Zec 9:3–4), of the humble and the proud (Job 5:11; Ps 75:7; and esp. 2Sa 22:28). He can lift a Baasha "from the dust" and later consume him (1Ki 16:2–3); he can ensconce a Job on an ash heap (Job 2:8) and later restore him (Job 42:10).

8e–10 The "foundations of the earth" (cf. 2Sa 22:16) refers pictorially to the firmness and stability of God's creation—which is always under his sovereign control. How much more is he able to protect his people (Pr 3:26) and confound his (and their) enemies (Dt 32:35)!

The word often translated "saint" (GK 2883) means "one to whom the Lord has pledged his covenant love [GK 2876]" (cf. Pss 12:1, 8; 50:5, 16; 97:10; 145:10, 20). The final destiny of the ungodly, however, is the silence of Sheol, the "grave" (GK 8619; v.6), where all is darkness (Job 10:21–22; 17:13; 18:18; cf. also Mt 8:12).

Hannah learned that in the battles of life it is not physical strength that brings victory. Whether through human agency or directly, God always shatters the enemy (cf. Ex 15:6; Ps 2:9). Peninnah may have "thundered against" (1:6, lit.) Hannah, but Hannah knew full well that the Lord would ultimately "thunder against" Peninnah and all others who oppose him.

The Song of Hannah ends as it began, by using the word "horn" in the sense of "strength." Hannah voices the divine promise of strength to the coming "king"—initially David, who will found a dynasty with messianic implications. The king—the "anointed" one (GK 5431)—will rule by virtue of God's command and will therefore belong to him body and soul. The king will be "his" (2Sa 22:51).

11 With Samuel's dedication and Hannah's song complete, the family returned to Ramah—except for Samuel, who began what was to be a continuing ministry.

3. The wicked sons of Eli (2:12–26)

12–17 The reference to Hophni and Phinehas as "wicked men" (GK 1175) contrasts them with Hannah, who did not consider herself a "wicked woman" (1:16). Furthermore, the sons of Eli "had no regard for the LORD"—unlike Samuel, who "did not yet know" (3:7) the Lord.

Not content with the priests' portions of the sacrificial animals (cf. Lev 7:34), the servant of Eli's sons "would take for [themselves] whatever the fork brought up." And not only that, "even before the fat was burned" (Lev 7:31), Hophni and Phinehas demanded raw meat. On occasion they even preferred roasted meat to boiled—as if in mockery of the necessarily hasty method of preparing the first Passover feast (Ex 12:8–11). They wanted their unlawful portion before the Lord received what was rightfully his. Their rebellion, impatience, and impudence were great sins. These premonarchic priests treated the Lord's offerings with contempt, which could only lead to disaster (cf. Nu 16:30–32).

18–26 As a young apprentice priest under Eli's supervision, Samuel wore the "linen ephod," a priest's garment. Indeed, the little "robe" that Samuel's mother made for him annually as he was growing up may well have been an example of the "robe of the ephod" (Ex 28:31). By providing Hannah with additional children, the Lord continued to be gracious to her (cf. Ge 21:1). Samuel's continued growth in the Lord's presence, in stature and in favor with God and people, anticipates Luke's portrayal of Jesus' youth (Lk 2:40, 52).

The hapless Eli, whose advanced age is stressed from this point on (4:15, 18), was unable to restrain the sinful conduct of his sons. To their earlier callous treatment of their fellow Israelites (vv.13–16), they added sexual promiscuity—and with the women who served at the tabernacle (cf. Ex 38:8)! Such ritual prostitution was specifically forbidden to the people of God (Nu 25:1–5; Dt 23:17; Am 2:7–8). Eli's rebuke, justified in the light of widespread and public reports of his sons' evil deeds, fell on deaf ears. His theological arguments, weak at best, were to no avail, especially since God had already determined to put Hophni and Phinehas to death. What is eminently clear is that God's decision to end the lives of Eli's sons was irrevocable. Hannah had already expressed her willingness to leave such decisions within the sphere of divine sovereignty (v.6)—and so must we!

4. The oracle against the house of Eli (2:27–36)

27–36 The chapter concludes by expanding on the Lord's intention to put Eli's sons to death (v.25). The prophetic oracle to (and against) Eli uses the messenger formula ("This is what the LORD says") and mediates the divine word through an anonymous "man of God." The term "man of God" occasionally refers to an angel (cf. Jdg 13:3, 6, 8–9) but is usually a synonym for "prophet" (cf. 1Sa 9:9–10). This man of God reminds Eli that God had revealed himself to his ancestor Levi's house (in Aaron; see Ex 4:14–16) before the Exodus. Indeed, Aaron had been the object of special divine election to serve the Lord as the first in a long line of priests (Ex 28:1–4). Aaron would go up "to" the Lord's altar and would wear the ephod in the course of his divinely ordained work (cf. Lev 8:7).

Recipients of such privilege, Eli and his sons nevertheless "scorn" (GK 1246) the Lord's prescribed sacrifices. Literally, the verb means "to kick" and is found only once elsewhere in the OT (Dt 32:15). Although the Hebrew words for "fat" and "heavy" are different there than the word for "fattening" here, the parallel is striking: Like Israel centuries earlier, the house of Eli has "kicked at" the Lord's offerings by gorging themselves on the best parts of the sacrifices (vv.13–17). By condoning the sin of Hophni and Phinehas, Eli has demonstrated that he loves his sons more than he loves God and that he is therefore unworthy of the Lord's continued blessing (see Mt 10:37).

The Lord had promised that Aaron's descendants would always be priests (cf. Ex 29:9), and he had confirmed that promise on covenant oath (Nu 25:13). They would "minister [GK 2143] before" the Lord forever. But because of flagrant disobedience, the house of Eli would be judged by God. Although the Aaronic priesthood was perpetual, individual priests who sinned could thereby forfeit covenant blessing. The description of divine judgment, when translated literally, is vivid: "I will chop off your arm and the arm of your father's house." Furthermore, Eli would be the last "old man" in his family line, because God's execution of his death sentence would be swift and sure (4:11, 18; 22:17–20; 1Ki 2:26–27).

Examples of the predicted distress in God's "dwelling" (GK 5061; the tabernacle is meant) are the capture of the ark by the Philistines (4:11) and the destruction of Shiloh (cf. Jer 7:12, 14; 26:6, 9). Although in Eli's line there would "never" be an old man, in the line that would replace his there would "always" be a faithful priest. The only member of Eli's line to "be spared" was Abiathar, and he was later removed from the priesthood (1Ki 2:26–27).

Hophni and Phinehas would die "on the same day" (4:11), a prophetic sign to Eli not only of his own impending death but also of the fulfillment of the other components in the oracle of the man of God. The Lord would bring a "faithful" priest on the scene, who would be privy to the very thoughts of God and obedient to him.

"Faithful" (GK 586) contrasts strongly with the rebellion of Eli's sons and plays an important role in the succeeding context, both near and remote. In this same verse the Lord says, "I will firmly [GK 586] establish his house"—lit., "I will build for him a faithful house" (cf. 2Sa 7:27). In the present context the faithful priest whose house the Lord would establish refers initially to Samuel (3:1; 7:9; 9:12–13; cf. esp. 3:20). Later, however, the line of Zadok would replace that of Abiathar, Eli's descendant (2Sa 8:17; 15:24–29; 1Ki 2:35)—a replacement that would constitute a greater fulfillment of the oracle of the man of God. Zadok and his descendants would thus "always" minister before the Lord's "anointed one"—David's son Solomon (1Ki 2:27, 35) and his descendants. Ultimate fulfillment would come only in Jesus the Christ, the supremely Anointed One, "designated by God to be high priest" (Heb 5:10) "forever, in the order of Melchizedek" (6:20).

As for the members of Eli's house, once fattened on priestly perquisites, soon not even the least benefit of priestly office would be theirs.

5. The call of Samuel (3:1–4:1a)

1 Special revelation was rare in the days of the judges. The few visions that did exist were not widely known (cf. Am 8:11–12). The word "vision" (GK 2606) means "divine revelation mediated through a seer."

2 Eli's aging eyes were so "weak" (cf. Dt 34:7) that he could barely "see" (he would eventually go completely blind; cf. 4:15). How different from Samuel, whose eyes saw clearly in a physical and a spiritual sense (v.15)!

3 The lamps on the seven-branched lampstand (Ex 25:31–37) were filled with olive oil, lit at twilight (30:8), and kept burning "before the LORD from evening till morning" (27:20–21; cf. Lev 24:2–4; 2Ch 13:11). Thus Samuel's encounter with the Lord on his bed in the tabernacle compound took place during the night, since the "lamp of God had not yet gone out."

4–10 Although Samuel did not yet know that it was the Lord who was speaking to him, his answer was typical of the servant who hears and obeys the divine call (Ge 22:1, 11; Ex 3:4; Isa 6:8). Samuel's openness to serving God would soon enable him to know the Lord in a way that Eli's sons never did (2:12). Although the word of the Lord had not yet been revealed to Samuel, that would soon take place (v.11); and as God continued to speak to Samuel through the years (v.21), the Lord's word would so captivate him that it would be virtually indistinguishable from "Samuel's word" (4:1). Samuel the priest would become Samuel the prophet (v.20).

Samuel thought that Eli was calling him. Twice Eli told Samuel to go back to bed, but the third time it finally dawned on the aged priest that it must be God who was calling the boy. He therefore told Samuel that he should respond the next time by saying, "Speak, LORD, for your servant is listening." This time the Lord "came and stood there," suggesting that Samuel could see him as well as hear him. Again the Lord called out Samuel's name twice, imparting a sense of urgency and finality. Samuel responded as Eli had instructed, though he left out the word "LORD."

11–14 The Lord's word to Samuel not only had immediate reference to Eli's house but also pointed forward to the more remote future (2:27–36). The disaster to overcome Eli and his sons (including the destruction of Shiloh) would "make the ears of everyone who hears of it tingle." Death was the penalty for showing contempt for the priesthood (Dt 17:12) as well as for disobeying one's parents (21:18–21), and Eli was implicated because he did not "restrain" (GK 3909) Hophni and Phinehas. The house of Eli had thus committed blatant sins against God and showed no signs of remorse. They were now subject to the divine death sentence (2:25; cf. Heb 12:16–17), and no sacrifice or offering could atone for their guilt.

15–18 When Samuel arose in the morning, he opened the doors of the tabernacle compound and doubtless busied himself with other tasks to avoid telling Eli what he had seen and heard. The aged priest was not to be denied, however, and demanded a full report. Indeed, he swore an oath of imprecation, calling down God's judgment if the boy refused to tell everything he knew. Samuel's obedient response in v.18 echoes key words from v.17 (pers. tr.): "Samuel told him all the words; he did not hide [anything] from him." Eli's reaction is both devout and submissive; he resigns himself to divine sovereignty.

3:19–4:1a As the Lord's presence would later be with David (16:18; 18:12), so the Lord was with Samuel, a fact evident to all the Israelites. That God "let none of [Samuel's] words fall" means that he made sure that everything Samuel said with divine authorization came true. Although earlier God's word had not been revealed to Samuel (v.7), it now was; and as the Lord had appeared to him earlier (vv.10–14), so he "continued to appear at Shiloh." The Lord's word became equivalent to "Samuel's word" (4:1; see comment on 3:4–10).

The focus of this section is thus the Lord's sentence of judgment against the house of Eli. The boy Samuel, having become a "man of God" (9:6–14), has confirmed in no uncertain terms the prophecy earlier proclaimed by the anonymous "man of God" (2:27–36).

B. The Ark Narratives (4:1b–7:17)

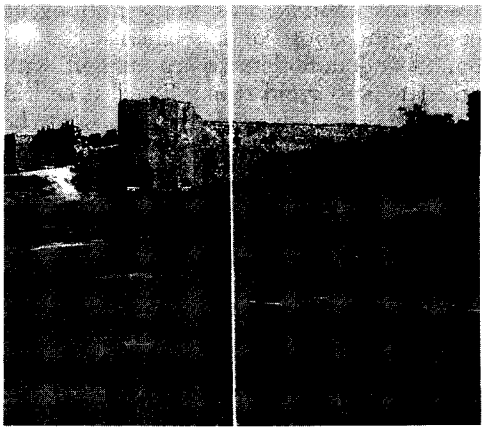
1. The capture of the ark (4:1b–11)

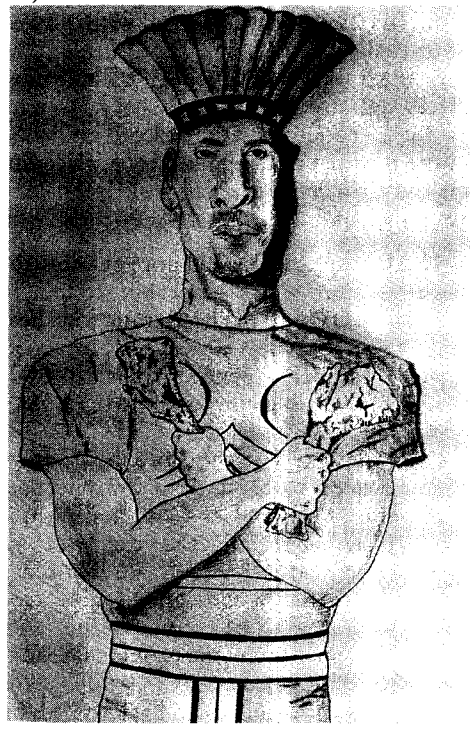
1b The "Philistines" (GK 7149), inveterate enemies of Israel, are mentioned nearly 150 times in 1 and 2 Samuel alone. They were so entrenched and dominant in the coastal areas and the foothills of Canaan that they eventually gave their name (Palestine) to the entire land. Although their connections with various Aegean cultures have been verified through decades of intensive research, their origins remain somewhat obscure. The OT relates them to Caphtor (Ge 10:14 = 1Ch 1:12; Jer 47:4; Am 9:7), which was probably Crete. The aggressive, expansionist ancestors of the Philistines of the time of Samuel apparently arrived in Canaan shortly after 1200 B.C.

It is impossible to say who was the aggressor in this first-recorded battle between Israel and the Philistines. The Philistines camped at Aphek, an important site inhabited during the entire biblical period. Ebenezer, where the Israelites camped, is about two miles east of Aphek on the road to Shiloh.

2–3 The Israelites were defeated not once but twice in this chapter (vv.2, 10). Not until 7:10–11 did they defeat the Philistines on the battlefield and then only (as always) with divine help. The Israelites lost "four thousand" men, a terrible tragedy. The Israelite elders were puzzled by the debacle on the battlefield. Their solution was to bring the ark of the covenant into the camp to guarantee the Lord's presence with his people. The "ark" (GK 778) is a significant thematic element in this section.

The elders doubtless remembered the account of Joshua's victory over Jericho (Jos 6:2–20; cf. also Nu 10:35). What they failed to understand, however, was that the ark would not ensure victory. If God willed defeat for his people, a thousand arks would not bring success. The elders understood clearly that if God was not "with" them, defeat was inevitable (Nu 14:42; Dt 1:42). They mistakenly assumed, however, that wherever the ark was, the Lord was.





The Israelites camped at Ebenezer and the Philistines at Aphek, the site shown above. A Turkish citadel is visible, which was built on the ruins of a Crusader castle. Philistine and Israelite ruins are within the walls. The picture to the right shows a Philistine soldier wearing his corselet and "feathered" headdress (details based on relief drawing of Philistines found in Egypt). Drawing by Rachel Bierling.

4–9 So men were sent to Shiloh from the Israelite camp at Ebenezer to bring back the ark, here impressively described as "the ark of the covenant of the LORD Almighty, who is enthroned between the cherubim" (cf. 2Sa 6:2; 2Ki 19:15). In ancient Near Eastern art a king was often pictured sitting on a throne supported on each side by a cherub (winged lions with human heads.) One function of the ark of the covenant was to serve as the symbolic cherub-throne of the invisible Great King.

The ark, accompanied by Hophni and Phinehas, caused a great commotion upon reaching the Israelite camp. The people gave a loud shout (cf. Jos 6:5, 20). The uproar aroused the Philistines camped nearby, and their superstitious response echoed that of the Israelite elders. They believed that the arrival of the ark heralded the coming of whatever god or gods its owners worshiped. To avoid being enslaved by the Hebrews, as the Hebrews had been by them (cf. Jdg 13:1), they encouraged one another to be strong and fight like men.

10–11 The result of the ark's presence was another Israelite defeat, this one far more severe and described as a "slaughter" (GK 4804). The Philistines' own turn would come (14:13; 19:8; 23:5), but in the meantime Israel suffered heavy losses. The sins of Eli's sons produced appalling casualties among Israel's foot soldiers (cf. Dt 28:15, 25). As foretold by the man of God (2:34), Hophni and Phinehas died. The elders' folly was revealed as the Philistines captured the ark, and the destruction of Shiloh—and perhaps the tabernacle itself—was not far behind.

2. The death of Eli (4:12–22)

12–18 No sooner was the second battle with the Philistines over than the tragic news of Israel's defeat reached Shiloh. A Benjamite messenger, with his clothes "torn and dust on his head" (cf. Jos 7:6; Ne 9:1), reports Israel's flight from and slaughter by the Philistines as well as the death of two prominent priests.

Eli is sitting on his chair beside the road (cf. 1:9). Perhaps no longer considering himself to be the priest he once was, he nevertheless trembles with fear for the ark's safety.

The messenger first told his story to the townspeople at Shiloh, who "sent up a cry" when they learned that the ark had not brought them victory and was no longer with them. Mere possession of the ark enabled neither Israelite nor Philistine to manipulate the God whose presence it symbolized.

Hearing the uproar in the city, Eli wanted to know its meaning. Ninety-eight years old, obese, and totally blind, Eli was probably unable to go into town without considerable help; so the messenger went to him. The news was bad indeed. That his sons were dead did not seem to faze Eli, who may have already given them up as hopeless. But the shock of hearing that the ark had been captured was too much for him. He "fell" off his chair, broke his neck, and died. The tragedy of Eli's life matches that of Saul: sometimes serving God faithfully, at other times not measuring up to even the most moderate of standards. Priest at Shiloh for most of his adult life, Eli had judged Israel forty years.

19–22 Eli's death did not end the tragedy, even in his own family. The message of Eli's and Phinehas's deaths, combined with the report of the ark's capture, caused Phinehas's pregnant wife to go into premature labor. The distressing report caused her to be "overcome by her labor pains." The combination was fatal: She died in childbirth. Before she died Phinehas's wife named her newborn son Ichabod ("No glory"; cf. 14:3): "The glory [GK 3883] has departed [lit., 'has gone into exile'] from Israel, for the ark of God has been captured." After the Exodus the Lord promised to consecrate the tabernacle by his glory (Ex 29:43); after it was set up, his glory filled it and the cloud covered it (Ex 40:34–35). "Glory" represents the Presence of God dwelling in the tabernacle (Ps 26:8; cf. also Ex 25:8; 29:44–46), giving rise to the later theological term the "Shek(h)inah Glory" (cf. also Heb 9:5). Perhaps the wife of Phinehas, in her dying hour, spoke better than she knew.

3. The Lord's affliction of the Philistines (5:1–12)

1–5 From the battlefield at Ebenezer, the Philistines took the ark to Ashdod, apparently the chief city (6:17). Ashdod was located three miles from the Mediterranean coast about thirty miles southwest of Ebenezer. The ark was brought into the temple of Dagon, the Philistine national deity, and placed near a large idol representing him. The next day the statue of Dagon had fallen face-down, vanquished by Israel's God (see 17:49) and lying prostrate before the ark in a posture of worship. The people of Ashdod put the idol back in its "place" (cf. v.11).

The next morning Dagon was again face-down before the ark—this time with its head and hands "broken off" (cf. 17:51). In the ancient world severed heads and hands (cf. Jdg 8:6) were battlefield trophies. The Lord had therefore vanquished Dagon in his own temple. The head and hands of Dagon's statue landed on the temple threshold, rendering it sacred (in the minds of his worshipers) and therefore untouchable (cf. Zep 1:4, 9).

6–12 With the reference to Dagon's hands being rendered helpless, a major motif is introduced in the account: "the LORD's hand." The first reference here to the hand of the Lord comes from the lips of the Philistines, who related the divine hand to the plagues of Egypt (4:8)—and rightly so (see Ex 9:3; cf. also Jer 21:5–6). They did not take lightly the possibility that the fate of the Egyptians might befall them also (6:6).

"Tumors" (GK 6754) were one of the many potential curses that would be inflicted on the Israelites if they disobeyed God (Dt 28:58–60). Here that affliction descended on the Philistines, who realized that the hand of the Lord was heavy on them (cf. v.11). Their five rulers (6:18) advised them to get rid of the ark—which all recognized as the visible counterpart for the Israelite deity and therefore the cause of the plague—by moving it to Gath (about twelve miles east-southeast of Ashdod). The Lord's hand was then against Gath (cf. 7:13) and brought "an outbreak of tumors" on its inhabitants.

The ark was quickly shipped to Ekron (about six miles due north of Gath). But the arrival of the ark in Ekron had the same effect there as the news of its capture had in Shiloh: The people sent up a cry for help, fearful that the God of Israel would "kill" them—a power that he certainly possessed (cf. 2:6, 25). The people of Ekron told their rulers to send the ark away. Even those who did not die were afflicted with tumors; no one escaped the dreaded plague.

4. The return of the ark (6:1–7:1)

1–6 Chapter 4 tells of the capture of the ark, ch. 5 of its movement from place to place in Philistia, and ch. 6 of its return to Israel after being in Philistine territory for several months. The Philistines, eager to rid themselves of the ark and its sinister influence, sought supernatural guidance as to the best way of sending the ark back to "its [proper] place." "Tell us how," they said to their pagan counselors.

Ancient religious protocol mandated that the worshiper not approach his god(s) empty-handed (cf. Ex 23:15; Dt 16:16). Thus the Philistine priests and diviners advised that a guilt offering accompany the ark back to Israel. Although such an offering was normally an animal sacrifice, occasionally money or other valuables were acceptable. If the Lord accepted the Philistines' offering, their people would be healed; then they would know that his hand had been responsible for their misery.

The linking of tumors, rats, and plague suggests that the tumors were symptoms of bubonic plague spread by an infestation of rats, which were capable of destroying a country (cf. Jer 36:29; Da 11:16). The Philistine advisers recommended gold models of tumors and rats to serve as the guilt offering to placate the God of Israel. Perhaps the Philistines intended the models to function in the realm of sympathetic magic also, so that by sending them out of their land the genuine articles would depart as well.

The word "plague" (GK 4487) recalls the Egyptian plagues in Ex 9:14, further heightening the parallel between the earlier disaster and this (cf. again v.6). The lesson is clear: Hardening one's heart only brings divine retribution, resulting in the victory of God's people over their enemies (Ex 12:31–32). The Philistines are thus well advised to cut their losses as soon as possible.

7–12 A new cart pulled by two cows "that have calved and have never been yoked" was to be used to transport the ark. The cows would later be sacrificed by the Israelites (v.14) in faint reminiscence of the slaughter of the red heifer by Eleazar (Nu 19:2–3). The Philistines were to "take" the calves from their mothers, "send" the gold objects as a guilt offering to the Lord, and "return" the ark to him and his people (v.21).

The first destination of the ark was Beth Shemesh, just inside Israelite territory. Beth Shemesh had a pagan past (its name means "Temple of the sun-god"). The Philistines of Samuel's day acknowledged that Beth Shemesh was under Israelite control. They hoped that the cows would take the ark there, reasoning that if cows new to the yoke would desert their newborn calves—even temporarily—to pull a cart all the way to Beth Shemesh, that would be a supernatural sign that the divine owner of the ark had sent the plague against them. But if the ark did not reach Beth Shemesh, they would take that fact as proof that the Lord's hand had not struck them and that mere chance was responsible.

Against natural instinct ("lowing all the way" because their calves were not with them) and under divine compulsion (not turning "to the right or to the left"—i.e., staying on the main road), the cows pulled the cart straight to Beth Shemesh. The five Philistine rulers, following the cows to the border, stayed only long enough to make sure that the ark was securely in Israelite hands.

6:13–7:1 The ark arrived at Beth Shemesh in June, during wheat harvest, after the spring rains (cf. 12:16–18). Rejoicing to see the ark, the people decided to use the cart for fuel and to sacrifice the cows as a burnt offering. They "chopped up the wood" (cf. Ge 22:3). A large rock in a field belonging to Joshua of Beth Shemesh became the temporary locale for the ark. The Levites, who alone were permitted to handle the ark (cf. Jos 3:3; 2Sa 15:24), had removed it from the cart and set it on the rock, which served as a witness of the ark's homecoming.

Ancient Near-Eastern oxcarts, such as the one used to transport the ark, have been reconstructed from archaeological remains.

Meanwhile, the five Philistine rulers returned to their five cities (cf. Jos 13:3). Each one was fortified and was supported by a number of nearby "country villages" (cf. similarly Dt 3:5; Est 9:19).

Divine retribution continued to overtake those who misused the ark. This time some men of Beth Shemesh "looked into" (GK 8011) the ark, a sin punishable by instant death (Nu 4:5, 20; cf. also 2Sa 6:6–7). The mourners sensed that the ark symbolized the presence of a "holy God" (cf. Lev 11:44–45), whose sanctity they could not approach. They therefore hoped he would depart from them.

Kiriath Jearim (about ten miles northeast of Beth Shemesh) was the ark's location for the next twenty years (7:2). More specifically, it resided at "Abinadab's house on the hill" (7:1; 2Sa 6:3). Eleazar son of Abinadab was then consecrated to guard it. The downgraded status of the ark may have been partially due to the Philistine destruction of Shiloh (presupposed by Ps 78:60; Jer 7:12, 14; 26:6, 9) and perhaps the tabernacle as well. Not until David's accession as king in Jerusalem would the ark once again be restored to its rightful place of honor (2Sa 6).

5. Samuel the judge (7:2–17)

2–4 The "twenty years" that the ark remained at Kiriath Jearim may be figurative for "half a generation," during which time the "people" (lit., "house"; GK 1074) of Israel "mourned," apparently with sincere remorse. They were bemoaning the reduced status of the ark, no longer housed in a tabernacle. Samuel encouraged them to repent and to serve the Lord wholeheartedly, as he would do later (12:20, 24).

Samuel urged the people to get rid of the foreign gods (GK 466; cf. "the Baals and the Ashtoreths" in 12:10) that they were so prone to worship (cf. also Dt 12:3; Jdg 10:16; 2Ch 19:3; 33:15). Baal and Ashtoreth were the chief god and goddess in the Canaanite pantheon during this period. Samuel pleaded with them to commit themselves wholeheartedly to the Lord. God's people are to serve him exclusively (see Dt 6:13).

5–6 The assembly of "all Israel" did not necessarily include every single Israelite living in the land but most likely consisted of representatives from all the tribal territories.

Convocations at Mizpah in Benjamin were not uncommon in the days of the judges and early monarchy (cf. 10:17; Jdg 20:1; 21:8). There Samuel prayed for the people (cf. also vv.8–9; 8:6; 12:19, 23; 15:11; Jer 15:1), and there they "poured . . out [water] before the LORD," perhaps a symbol of contrition (cf. 2Sa 23:16).

The notice of Samuel's judgeship is followed immediately by a report of Philistine intention to attack Israel. The function of a "judge" during this period was more executive than judicial. "Judge" often paralleled "ruler" or "prince" (cf. Ex 2:14), and one of the most common roles of the judge was to repel invaders (Jdg 2:16, 18).

7–9 Cowed by Philistine might, Israel typically reacted with fear to news of impending warfare with them (17:11; 28:5). But when the Philistines "came up" to attack, Samuel prayerfully "offered . . . up" a burnt offering to the Lord. The sacrifice was a suckling lamb at least eight days old (cf. Lev 22:27).

10–12 While the sacrifice was still in progress, the Philistine troops marched forward. Before the battle could be joined, however, the Lord "thundered" against the enemy (see 2:10; 2Sa 22:14–15). He demonstrated that he, not the Philistine Dagon, not the Canaanite Baal son of Dagon, was truly the God of the storm, the only one able to control the elements whether for good or ill (cf. 12:17–18). "With loud thunder" highlights the vivid OT image of thunder as the voice of God (see Ps 29:3–9).

The ensuing panic in their ranks (cf. 2Sa 22:14–15) drove the Philistines into full retreat, enabling the Israelites to pursue and slaughter them. The Ebenezer of v.12 is almost certainly not the Ebenezer of 4:1 and 5:1, since the latter is too far to the northwest for Mizpah to be used as a benchmark for its location. Ebenezer ("The stone of [divine] help"), the stone set up by Samuel, paid tribute to the God apart from whom victory is inconceivable (cf. Ge 35:14; Jos 4:9; 24:26).

13–17 The second half of v.13 assumes continued Philistine pressure (though greatly reduced) against Israel and thus cautions us not to understand the first half as meaning that the Philistines no longer bothered the Israelites (cf. esp. 9:16). The Amorites, who preferred to live in the hilly regions of the land (cf. Nu 13:29; Dt 1:7) as compared to the Philistines who lived along the coast, were also relatively nonbelligerent during this period.

The circuit of Samuel's judgeship was relatively restricted: Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah were all within a few miles of one another. All three towns served as shrine centers at one time or another, as did Ramah, Samuel's hometown. The latter was not far from the other three (about fourteen miles northwest of Mizpah). The local nature of judgeship in ancient Israel subtly introduces us to the need for a king.

II. Advent of Monarchy in Israel (8:1–15:35)

Monarchy was a significant factor in God's plans for his people from the days of Abraham (Ge 17:6, 16). The blessing of Jacob hints at the establishment of a continuing dynasty (Ge 49:10). Israel was to be "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Ex 19:6). Balaam's fourth oracle refers to monarchical rule (Nu 24:17–19), and Moses outlines the divine expectations Israel's kings were to meet (Dt 17:14–20).

However, from the earliest days it was recognized that ultimately God himself was King (Ex 15:18; Nu 23:21; Dt 33:5); he alone possessed absolute power and authority (Ex 15:6, 11; Jdg 5:3–5). Any king of Israel would have to appreciate from the outset that he was to rule over Israel under God. Only on the basis of this fundamental theological premise can the narratives of the advent of monarchy in Israel be properly understood.

A. The Rise of Saul (8:1–12:25)

1. The demand for a king (8:1–22)

1–3 With reference to Samuel's advanced age (vv.1, 5; 12:2), the old order (of the judges) is passing, the new (of the monarchy) is dawning. While Samuel continued as judge at Ramah and nearby towns (7:15–17), he appointed his two sons to serve in the same capacity at Beersheba on the southern boundary of the land (cf. 3:20). Their actions and reputations (v.5) belied their names—Joel ("The Lord is God"); Abijah ("My [Divine] Father is the Lord")—but at least their geographical distance from Samuel (Beersheba is about fifty-seven miles south-southwest of Ramah) absolved him from any direct complicity in their evil deeds.

Whether Samuel should have appointed his sons as judges in the first place is highly questionable, since judgeship was usually a divine charisma. In any event, they did not follow in their father's footsteps. "Turned aside" and "perverted" (both GK 5742) tie their three sins together. Failing to emulate their father (12:3–4) or their God (Dt 10:17), Joel and Abijah accepted bribes, a crime inseparable from the perversion and denial of justice (Pr 17:23). Ironically, Samuel's two sons were as wicked in their own way as were Eli's two sons.

4–9 Old men ("elders") confront the old man and—perhaps unwittingly—remind him of the cruel parallel between himself and the deceased Eli (cf. 2:22). Because of Samuel's age, and because they want nothing to do with a dynastic succession that would include his rebellious sons, the elders decide that a king would best suit their needs. Samuel had "appointed" his sons as "judges"; the elders wanted him to "appoint" (GK 8492) a king to "judge" Israel.

This king was to lead them, "such as all the other nations have." Verse 20 reveals their hidden agenda: The king would "go out before us and fight our battles." They were looking for a permanent military leader who would build a standing army powerful enough to repulse any invader (cf. Dt 17:14, 15–17). Samuel, fully aware of those dangers, was "displeased" with the elders' request—and he was convinced that the Lord too was displeased (12:17; cf. also 15:11).

But Samuel, as he sought God's mind in the matter, was doubtless surprised when the Lord told him to "listen to" (or "obey"; GK 9048) the people's request mediated through their elders. Israel was not rejecting the Lord's chosen leader but the Lord himself (see also 10:19). Since the days of the Exodus, the people had consistently preferred other gods and other leaders to God himself and his chosen servants.

God, graciously condescending to the people's desire (a desire not in itself wrong but sullied by the motivation behind it), told Samuel to warn them what the "regulations of the kingship" (10:25) would demand of them, particularly their loss of freedom in (absolute) monarchy.

10–18 The "regulations of the kingship" described by Samuel (with God's prompting and approval) were totally bereft of redeeming features and consisted only of oppressive requirements. Among the latter was forced labor, including compulsory induction of both raw recruits and laborers in field and foundry.

The palace-to-be would acquire horses in great numbers (cf. Dt 17:16), and the king's chariots would need front runners (cf. 2Sa 15:1; 1Ki 1:5). Reference to commanders "of thousands and . . . of fifties" implies a huge standing army, with "weapons of war." Women would not be exempt from conscription into royal service. Even in desperate times the king would always get his share (Am 7:1)—a minimum of 10 percent of the income from field and flock.

Key words in the "regulations of the kingship" are "take" (GK 4374) and "best" (GK 3203). By nature royalty is parasitic rather than giving, and kings are never satisfied with the worst. Samuel's regulations followed contemporary semifeudal Canaanite society. In the light of Samuel's own record of fairness and honesty during his judgeship (cf. esp. 12:3–5), it is no wonder that he was alarmed at the prospect of setting up a typical Oriental monarchy in Israel.

If these "regulations of the kingship" attained full authority, the average Israelite would soon be little more than a chattel at the disposal of his monarch. The frequent occurrence of "servant" and "slave" thus sounds an especially ominous note. In v.17 Samuel warned the people that they would "become" their king's "slaves" (GK 6269), terminology employed elsewhere of bondage imposed by a conqueror (17:9). Too late the Israelites would cry out to a God who would not answer—unlike the days when Samuel was judge (7:8–9).

19–22 Samuel's best efforts were futile. Despite his totally negative delineation of the royal "regulations," the people refused to "listen to" (or "obey"; GK 9048) him. They wanted a king—a demand that Samuel hurled back in their teeth twice in the context of their rejection of divine rule (10:19; 12:12). They clung doggedly to their original request (v.5). The implicit military component of their idea of monarchy now becomes explicit: Their king would "fight our battles"—although a godly Israelite king would know from the outset that it was the Lord's joyful duty to do just that for his people (2Ch 32:8).

As the Lord had told Samuel earlier (v.7), so he told him now: "Listen to them and give them a king." On that negative (for Samuel) note the chapter ends, and Samuel's farewell oration to Israel begins (12:1).

2. The anointing of Saul (9:1–10:16)

1–2 Saul's father, Kish, is called a "man of standing" (cf. Ru 2:1; 1Ki 11:28). The term often has military connotations and is translated "brave man" in Saul's servant's description of David (16:18). It is nowhere used of Saul himself. The family line of Kish is from Benjamin, the smallest of the tribes. Israel's first king came from these humble origins. The Hebrew root for the name "Saul," which means "Asked (of God)," occurs in 8:10, where the people were "asking" for a king (GK 8626).

Saul is introduced as an "impressive" young man (cf. Ge 39:6; 2Sa 14:25), "without equal" among the Israelites. That would eventually change, however; his kingdom would be torn from him and given to "one better than" he—to David (15:28). Saul was also "a head taller" than his fellow Israelites, a characteristic noteworthy enough to be mentioned again (10:23–24). Of regal stature, he had the potential of being every inch a king. Saul's subsequent failure as king makes the well-known divine admonition in 16:7 all the more poignant.

3–14 The Lord used straying donkeys to bring Saul into contact with Samuel. Searching for the lost donkeys, Saul and his servant crisscrossed the borderlands between Benjamin and Ephraim, but to no avail. They began and ended their search in the "hill country of Ephraim" since Zuph is associated with the hill country in 1:1. The unnamed town in v.6 is therefore probably Ramah.

Saul, not wishing to cause his father needless worry, wants to give up the search and return to Benjamin. The servant, however, points out that there is a "man of God" nearby who might be able to help them. The servant appears to be more persistent and imaginative than Saul himself—a fact that may not speak well for Saul's future attempts at leadership. Although the man of God is not named at first, we are later informed that he is indeed Samuel.

Saul continued to protest, reminding the servant that they had no gift for the prophet; their "sacks" were empty. When consulting a prophet, it was common courtesy to bring a gift (Am 7:12), whether modest (1Ki 14:3) or lavish (2Ki 8:8–9). The servant responded that he had "a quarter of a shekel of silver" to give to the prophet. Although coinage was not invented until the seventh century B.C., it is likely that much earlier there were pieces of silver of fixed weight.

Verses 9–10 bring together the three main terms to describe the prophetic office: "seer" (GK 8014), "prophet" (GK 5566), "man of God" (GK 408 & 466). Samuel is often (and fittingly) called the "last of the judges and first of the prophets"—the latter in the sense that the formal office of prophet began with the monarchy and ended shortly after the monarchy did (for Samuel's unique role, cf. 2Ch 35:18; Ps 99:6; Jer 15:1; and esp. Ac 3:24; 13:20; Heb 11:32).

"Seer" means just what its Hebrew (and English) root implies: one who sees—but with spiritual eyes—beneath the surface of the obvious, focusing on the divine dimension. A seer was a man of (spiritual) vision (cf. Isa 1:1; 6:1–5; Jer 1:11–19; Am 7:7–9; 8:1–2; Zec 1:7–6:8).

A "prophet" was "called" in the sense of being summoned by God to be a spokesman for God (cf. Ex 4:16; 7:1–2). A prophet was to be God's "mouth"; that was his "calling." Prophecy was by calling, not by choice.

Saul and his servant went "up the hill" to the town (probably Ramah, which means "height"). It was early evening, since girls were coming out to the well to draw water (see Ge 24:11; cf. also v.19). When asked whether the seer was there, they informed the men that he had arrived only recently to participate in a sacrificial ritual at the "high place." Almost always on conspicuous elevations and often located outside of town (vv.14, 25), high places were open-air sanctuaries, sometimes with shrines or other buildings (v.22), where worship was conducted. The association of high places with idolatry had contributed to the divine rejection of Shiloh and the capture of the ark (Ps 78:58–61).

Verses 12–13 are charged with urgency: "He's ahead of you. Hurry now; he has just come. . . . Go up now."

15–24 The divine encounter with Saul was mediated through Samuel, to whom the Lord had "revealed" (lit., "uncovered the ear of," as if to speak in secret) his will (cf. 2Sa 7:27; 1Ch 17:25). As an act of gracious condescension to the people's request (Ac 13:21), the Lord promised to send an obscure Benjamite to Samuel, emphasizing the divine initiative in the matter. Samuel was to "anoint" him (with oil; cf. 10:1; cf. also 15:1, 17).

Anointing was by prophet and/or people, both acting as agents of the Lord (cf. 16:12–13; 2Sa 2:4; 5:3). It symbolized the coming of the Holy Spirit in power (16:13; Isa 61:1–3). Especially at the beginning of the monarchy, anointing was to the office of "leader" (GK 5592) rather than "king" (cf. 10:1; 13:14; 25:30; 2Sa 5:2; 6:21; 7:8). Beyond the likelihood that it represents Samuel's understandable reluctance to establish a full-fledged kingship (with all its negative implications; cf. again 8:10–18), the term might have been a title for "king-designate, king-elect" (cf. 2Ch 11:22) with military connotations.

In language strongly reminiscent of the Exodus, God had looked on the people of Israel (cf. Ex 2:25), whose cry had reached him (cf. Ex 3:9). The new leader would have the potential of delivering Israel from the Philistines (cf. 4:3)—although some seriously doubted that Saul would be able to accomplish that formidable task (10:27).

The seer Samuel "caught sight of" Saul, raised up as leader because God had "looked upon" his people. "This is the man," the Lord said to him, in a scene that would be replayed with only modest variations a few years later (cf. 16:12). Samuel then identified himself to Saul. As the Lord had promised to "send" Saul to Samuel, so Samuel would soon "let" Saul "go" (lit., "send" him on his way, as in v.26) after his divine commissioning (10:9). Samuel the seer authenticated his prophetic role by revealing Saul's inmost thoughts and relieved Saul's mind by informing him that his father's donkeys had been found. He then told Saul that all Israel was eagerly awaiting his benevolent reign.

Saul respectfully demurred. He pointed out that Benjamin, his tribe, was the smallest in all Israel (doubtless due to the terrible massacre decades earlier; cf. Jdg 20:46–48) and that his clan was the weakest in his tribe (cf. Jdg 6:15). Saul's humility (cf. 10:22) was in the grand tradition of prophets and judges.

Samuel, however, knowing that Saul was God's choice, brushed aside his objections and led him and his servant into a "hall" (GK 4384), in a building on the high place outside Ramah. This Hebrew word almost always denotes a room in a sanctuary or temple. Such rooms were normally used as apartments for sanctuary personnel or as storerooms (cf. Ne 10:39; Jer 35:2, 4). The hall at Ramah was large enough to seat thirty people.

Saul and his servant, guests of honor, were seated at the head of the table. The special "piece of meat" brought to Saul was perhaps the "share" of the sacrifice normally reserved for priests (cf. Lev 7:33). It was a special "occasion" (GK 4595) indeed, a time for celebration—unlike a future "set time" (13:8, 11) when Saul's impatience and disobedience would initiate his downfall (13:13–14).

25–27 After what must have been a sumptuous if solemn meal, eaten in a house of worship on a sacred site, Samuel, Saul, and Saul's servant retired to Ramah and conversed for a while on the "roof" of Samuel's house. Samuel was preparing Saul for his divine commissioning as ruler of Israel. Sleeping overnight on the roof of a house is a common practice even today in the Middle East. The following morning Samuel told Saul to dismiss his servant temporarily (see 10:14). Saul himself, however, was to stay briefly at Ramah (10:2) to receive a communication from God and to be anointed leader over the Lord's inheritance (10:1).

10:1–8 Saul's rise to kingship took place in three distinct stages: He was (1) anointed by Samuel (9:1–10:16), (2) chosen by lot (10:17–27), and (3) confirmed by public acclamation (11:1–15). The Lord had told Samuel to anoint Saul as leader over his people Israel (9:16). Samuel now proceeded to fulfill that command, being careful to inform Saul that the anointing was from the Lord. The Israelites are here called the Lord's "inheritance" (GK 5709) in the sense that they inhabited his territorial patrimony and belonged uniquely to him as Creator, Redeemer, and Conqueror (Dt 4:20; 9:26; 32:8–9; Ps 78:70–71). The anointing oil was a distinctive formula (Ex 30:23–33); it was "sacred" (Ps 89:20). Samuel also kissed Saul as an act of respect and submission (cf. Ps 2:11–12).

Verses 7 and 9 speak of three "signs" (GK 253) that would confirm the Lord's choice of Saul. (1) Samuel said that Saul would "meet" two men who would verify that Kish's donkeys had indeed been found and that therefore Saul's father could now devote his attention to his son's welfare. (2) Three men would meet Saul and offer him two loaves of bread, which he would accept. The men were "going up to God" to worship and commune with him. On their way they would "greet" Saul. (3) This sign, because of its significance, is described at greater length. Whereas the first sign involved two men and the second involved three men, the third focused on a "procession"—a larger band or group—of prophets (vv.5, 10). Saul would meet them outside "Gibeah of God."

The beginnings of the Israelite monarchy witnessed the emergence of a prophetic movement known as the "sons of the prophets" (cf. 1Ki 20:35). "Sons" is used here in the sense of "members of a group" (cf. 2Ki 2:3, 5, 7, 15). The companies were often large in number ("fifty," 2Ki 2:7; "one hundred," 1Ki 18:4, 13; 2Ki 4:43). They were frequently associated with time-honored places, such as Ramah (19:18–20), Bethel (2Ki 2:3), Jericho (2:5), and Gilgal (4:38). Their characteristic activity was "prophesying," usually interpreted to mean "uttering ecstatic praises/oracles." The actions and activities of prophetic bands were sometimes accompanied by music (2Ki 3:15; 1Ch 25:1–7).

Individual or group prophesying was often induced when the Spirit of the Lord came on a person in power (19:20, 23; Nu 11:25, 29). At such times the prophet would experience an altered state of consciousness and would be "changed into a different person" (cf. also v.9). Such ecstasy was often contagious (19:20–24). Similar ecstatic phenomena, though in a negative sense, were sometimes induced when an "evil" or "injurious" spirit came on a person (18:10; cf. also 16:14–16, 23). Members of prophetic bands were often young (2Ki 5:22; 9:4); they frequently lived together (2Ki 6:1–2), ate together (2Ki 4:38), and were supported by the generosity of their fellow Israelites (2Ki 4:42–43). Samuel provided guidance and direction for the movement in its early stages. At the head of a particular group of prophets would be the "father" (2Ki 2:12) or "leader" (19:20).

Samuel told Saul that after the three signs were fulfilled, he was to do whatever his hand found to do (cf. Ecc 9:10). Samuel assured Saul that God was with him, implying that therefore he could not fail (cf. Jos 1:5).

Then came a sober warning: At a later time Samuel would meet Saul at Gilgal. A preliminary meeting would first be held there to reaffirm Saul's kingship (11:14–15), with the appropriate fellowship offerings and accompanying celebration. Then on a later occasion Samuel would meet Saul again at Gilgal, this time to sacrifice burnt offerings (cf. Lev 1:3–17; 6:8–13) and fellowship offerings (cf. Lev 3:1–17; 7:11–21). On this latter occasion Saul was to wait seven days, until Samuel came and told him what to do. Saul faithfully fulfilled the former obligation (13:8), but impatience got the better of him. He failed to await Samuel's arrival with further instructions, and his act of disobedience was the beginning of the end for his kingdom (13:9–14).

9–16 Meanwhile, however, Saul was open to Samuel's instructions and the Lord's leading. He "turned" to leave, and as he did so, God "changed Saul's heart" (cf. the third sign; v.6). The arrival of Saul and his servant at Gibeah of God (cf. v.5) was followed by the Spirit of God coming on Saul in power, resulting in his joining the prophetic band in their ecstatic behavior (cf. 11:6).

Gibeah of God was scarcely four miles northeast of Gibeah of Saul, the hometown of the new Israelite ruler. When his fellow townsmen learned of Saul's arrival, they turned out in force to see what had happened to the "son of Kish." The Spirit of the Lord, coming on Saul in power, authenticated him as Israel's next ruler and produced the visible evidences of ecstatic behavior. To question the genuineness of that behavior was to question Saul's legitimacy in his new office.

"And who is their father?" was asked to find out the identity of the leader of the "procession of prophets" (cf. 2Ki 2:12). Although perhaps prompted by the reference to Saul as "son of Kish," the question was not so banal as to be requesting information about Saul's physical paternity.

Verses 14–16 conclude the theme of Kish's concern for Saul's whereabouts and welfare. Saul's "uncle" was doubtless seeking information for Kish and himself. The story of finding Kish's lost donkeys is once again related, but Saul did not tell his uncle anything about Samuel's view of kingship or his own participation in it (cf. 8:6–22). Rule over Israel would soon be his in truth (11:14), but it would not be long before he would be convinced that he was about to lose it to a man after God's own heart (18:8).

3. The choice of Saul by lot (10:17–27)

17–24 Assembling the Israelites at Mizpah, Samuel addresses them in words strongly reminiscent of those of the prophet in Jdg 6:8–9a. The Lord is called the God of his chosen people Israel. He then speaks in the first person, using the emphatic pronoun "I" in strong contrast to the emphatic "But you." The familiar Exodus redemption formula is followed by a reminder that God had delivered his people not only from Egypt but also from the "kingdoms" that "oppressed" them. Although the Lord had saved them out of all their "calamities and distresses," they had rejected him (echoing 8:7; cf. also Nu 11:20). The Israelites continued to insist in no uncertain terms that they wanted a king (see 8:5, 19). Samuel, reluctantly acquiescing, told the people to present themselves before the Lord by their tribes and clans.

The lots, known as Urim ("Curses," providing negative responses) and Thummim ("Perfections," providing positive responses), were stored in the breastplate attached to the ephod of the high priest (Ex 28:28–30) and were brought out and cast whenever a simple "yes" or "no" would suffice. Although casting lots was perhaps not unlike throwing dice, God himself guided the results (Pr 16:33). Verses 20–21 show that Benjamin was chosen by lot from the Twelve Tribes, Matri (unknown elsewhere) from the Benjamite clans, and Saul—God's man for this season—from the Matrite families. Ironically, like the lost donkeys that had earlier consumed so much anxious time for their searchers (9:3–5, 20; 10:2, 14–16), "when they looked for [Saul], he was not to be found."

Another divine oracle was therefore necessary, but this time the question demanded more than a "yes" or "no" answer. So in a more direct way the people "inquired" (GK 928 & 8626) of the Lord to discover Saul's whereabouts. The reluctant "leader" was subsequently found hiding among the military supplies (cf. 17:22; 25:13; 30:24).

Anxious to hail their new king, the people ran to bring him out from his hiding place. He came out and presented himself in their midst; his impressive height is again stressed (9:2). Samuel reminded the Israelites that the Lord had "chosen" (GK 4334) Saul.

The public acclamation "Long live the king!" represents now, as it did then, the enthusiastic hopes of the citizenry that their monarch would remain hale and hearty in order to bring their fondest dreams to fruition. The people of Saul's day "shouted" their approval.

25–27 After the people's acclamation of Saul as their king, Samuel outlined for them the "regulations of the kingship," which he then wrote down on a scroll (cf. Ex 17:14; Jos 18:9). He deposited the scroll in a safe place "before the LORD"—i.e., in the tabernacle, probably located at Mizpah at that time (cf. v.17)—in order (1) to preserve it for future reference and (2) to have it serve as a witness against the king and/or people, should its provisions ever be violated (cf. Dt 31:26; Jos 24:26–27).

Samuel then permitted all the people to return to their homes. Saul, the recently anointed king, went to his home in Gibeah. With the formal festivities over, two opposing reactions to Israel's new leader surface: "Valiant men," apparently eager to affirm God's choice, accompanied Saul to Gibeah, while "troublemakers" despised him. The latter group unwittingly echoed to Saul the earlier words of Gideon about himself: "How can I save Israel?" (Jdg 6:15). Neither Gideon nor the troublemakers understood—at least not at first—that it is God, not a human being, who saves (Jdg 6:16; 1Sa 10:19).

4. The defeat of the Ammonites (11:1–11)

1–2 The Ammonite siege of Jabesh Gilead under Nahash produced a conciliatory response in its inhabitants. They asked Nahash to "make a treaty" with them, as a result of which they would recognize him as their suzerain and become his vassals (cf. Eze 17:13–14). The phrase "cut a covenant" is almost universally understood to refer to the sacrifice ("cutting") of one or more animals as an important element in covenant solemnization ceremonies in ancient times. Nahash's threat to gouge out the right eye of every Jabeshite may imply their rebellion against a previously established overlordship. In the ancient Near East, the physical mutilation, dismemberment, or death of an animal or human victim could be expected as the inevitable penalty for treaty violation.

3 Nahash's threat (v.2) received a plaintive response from the elders of Jabesh, who functioned as representatives of the community (cf. 4:3; 8:4; 16:4). They tried to buy some time to send for help. Nahash appears to have acceded to the elders' request, apparently sure of his own military superiority.

4 When the Jabeshite messengers arrived at Gibeah of Saul with the terms of Nahash's demands, its people "wept aloud," a common display of grief, distress, or remorse (cf. Jdg 2:4; 1Sa 24:16; 2Sa 3:32; 13:36). Apparently Saul's fellow citizens in his own hometown despaired of leadership at this critical juncture in their history.

5–6 But at that very moment, Saul was returning from plowing in the fields, and he asked two questions: "What is wrong with the people? Why are they weeping?" Upon hearing the Jabeshites' report, Saul was energized by a powerful accession of God's Spirit. He had already experienced a similar accession earlier (10:6–10). This time, in the tradition of the judges, the Spirit of God filled him with divine indignation and empowered him as a military leader. Although the earlier accession had been temporary, this one was somewhat more permanent, apparently lasting until Samuel anointed David to replace Saul as king (16:13–14).

7 Rallying the troops to defend a covenant suzerain, vassal, or brother was a common stipulation in ancient treaties. Similar to the earlier action of the Levite of Jdg 19:29; 20:6, Saul cut two of his oxen into pieces and sent them throughout Israel as a graphic illustration of what would happen to any tribe that failed to commit a contingent of troops (cf. Jdg 21:5, 10). The "terror of the LORD" that here fell on the people is not to be understood as fear of divine punishment.

8 The mustering or counting of the troops (cf. 13:15; 14:17; 2Sa 24:2, 4) took place at Bezek. The numbers represent substantial contingents of troops. Their being listed separately as "men of Israel" and "men of Judah" anticipates the eventual division of the kingdom into north and south.

9 Saul and his troops told the messengers to return to Jabesh Gilead and inform its frightened citizens that divine deliverance (cf. v.13) would come to them the very next day—"by the time the sun is hot" (cf. Ex 16:21; Neh 7:3), a phrase that almost surely refers to high noon. The messengers' report caused the men of Jabesh to become "elated" (cf. v.15).

10 Confident of victory, the Jabeshites promised the Ammonites that they would surrender to them the following day and that the Ammonites would then be free to do "whatever seems good to you" (lit., "whatever seems good in your eyes," an ironic pun on Nahash's earlier threat to gouge out the right eye of any rebellious Jabeshite; cf. 14:36).

11 Saul wasted no time in deploying "his men" for the attack on Ammon. "The next day" probably refers to the evening of the day on which Saul's message reached the Jabeshites (v.9), since among the Israelites each new day began after sunset. Saul, following a military strategy common in those days (see 13:17–18), divided his men into three groups. Offensively it gave the troops more options and greater mobility, while defensively it lessened the possibility of losing everyone to a surprise enemy attack. The Israelites under Saul's leadership broke into the Ammonite camp "during the last watch of the night" (cf. Ex 14:24). Saul's attack obviously caught the Ammonites by surprise, and—as promised (v.9)—by high noon God had defeated them and delivered his people, routing the enemy survivors by scattering them in every direction (cf. also Nu 10:35; Ps 68:1).

5. The confirmation of Saul as king (11:12–12:25)

12–15 Saul's troops and the people of Jabesh Gilead, having witnessed God's victory over Ammon under Saul's leadership, demanded from Samuel the death penalty for all the troublemakers who had questioned his ability to save them from foreign rule (10:27). Saul, however, showing how magnanimous he could be when given the opportunity, asserted that the divine deliverance was a cause for gratitude, not vengeful retribution (cf. 2Sa 19:22).

Saul's demonstration of the leadership qualities necessary to be Israel's king led Samuel to convoke an important meeting at Gilgal. The OT records three meetings of Samuel and Saul at Gilgal, each fateful for Saul: (1) In the flush of his victory over Ammon, Saul was reaffirmed as king (11:14–15); (2) because of his impatience while awaiting Samuel's arrival, Saul was rebuked by his spiritual mentor (13:7–14); and (3) because of his disobedient pride after the defeat of the Amalekites, Saul was rejected as king (15:10–26).

The purpose of the first meeting is to "reaffirm the kingship" of Saul, who had already been anointed at Ramah (10:1) and chosen by lot at Mizpah (10:17–25). The reaffirmation was a confirmation by public acclamation and is the last of the three stages comprising his rise to monarchy over Israel.

Samuel's invitation to the people to reaffirm Saul as king was greeted with enthusiasm. "In the presence of the LORD" they confirmed their earlier choice, and "before the LORD" they brought their sacrifices. Fellowship offerings were the appropriate response of the people of Israel, who by sacrificing them were expressing their desire to rededicate themselves to God in covenant communion and allegiance. Saul's ascent to the throne was now complete, and the "great celebration" that accompanied the sacrificial ritual more than matched Israel's earlier elation upon their receiving the messengers' report of the imminent doom of the Ammonites (v.9).

12:1 Samuel begins his farewell speech by reminding the people that he has "listened to" (meaning "obeyed"; GK 9048) them and has set a king over them (cf. vv.14–15). This phrase echoes 8:7, 9, 22, and highlights Samuel's commitment to God's will despite his own personal reservations. After all, Saul is "the man the LORD has chosen," the king affirmed by public acclamation (10:24).

2 However reluctantly, Samuel formally acknowledges the transfer of Israel's leadership from himself to Saul. Although Samuel has been the recognized "leader" of the people from his youth until the present (cf. 3:10; 3:19–4:1; 7:15–17), King Saul is now their "leader." Samuel's reference to himself as "old and gray" is probably a modest claim to wisdom (cf. Job 15:9–10). His mention of his sons emphasizes the length of time it has been his privilege to serve the people of Israel—and perhaps also provides them with an unwelcome reminder of their earlier refusal to allow his sons to succeed him as judge (8:5).

3 "Here I stand" echoes an important servant motif (e.g., Ge 22:1, 11) in Samuel's first recorded words (cf. 3:4, 5, 6, 8, 16). Samuel invites the people to "testify against" him about covenant stipulations he might have violated. As though in a courtroom, the inquiry takes place "in the presence of" Samuel's heavenly and earthly superiors.

Aware that testifying on his own behalf could well result in self-incrimination (cf. 2Sa 1:16), Samuel nevertheless launches into a brief series of protestations of innocence. The key verb is "taken" (GK 4374), which Samuel consciously uses as a powerful means of contrasting his admirable behavior with the potentially oppressive demands of a (despotic) king that he had earlier warned about (8:11, 13–17). Doubtless alluding to the covenant stipulations of Ex 20:17, Samuel challenges the people to accuse him of having taken from any of them so much as an ox or a donkey (contrast 8:16; 22:19; 27:9; cf. Nu 16:15; Ac 20:33).

Samuel goes on to affirm that he has neither "cheated" nor "oppressed" anyone. Samuel's refusal to cheat/oppress others looks backward to his specific denial of having engaged in bribery. Accepting bribes is universally condemned in Scripture, and Samuel carefully distances himself from a practice that has already made his own sons infamous (8:3; cf. Ps 15:5; Am 5:12). If such were the case, Samuel promises to make restitution (cf. 2Sa 9:7).

4 The people readily accepted and agreed with Samuel's declaration. Samuel declared his determination not to make merchandise of the prophetic office (cf. Mic 2:6–11; 3:11).

5 After solemnly affirming his innocence of any wrongdoing, Samuel declares that the Lord and Saul (cf. v.3) are witnesses to the truthfulness of his words. The people's response, "He is witness," could refer either to the Lord or to Saul and may be intentionally ambiguous.

6 Verses 6–12 summarize the history of Israel from the time of Moses and the Exodus through the period of the judges and their sinful request for a king, stressing divine leadership and Israel's idolatrous disloyalty while challenging them to the same covenant faithfulness. By highlighting the name of the Lord from the outset, Samuel leaves no doubt that, in the final sense, Israel's leader has always been the Lord. God, working through and in concert with Moses and Aaron, freed his people from Egyptian bondage (cf. Ex 6:13, 26–27). The exodus of Israel from Egypt was remembered as the greatest of all divine acts of redemption for the nation (see Ex 20:2).

7 Samuel continues to use the language of the courtroom as he commands the people to "stand" (GK 3656) at attention and in anticipation before the bar of God's justice. He intends to "confront [them] with evidence" of God's blessing on their history, all the more casting their apostasy in darker relief. Samuel's evidence is "the righteous acts performed by the LORD" (cf. Jdg 5:11; Da 9:16; Mic 6:5).

8–9 Verses 8–12 recapitulate and expand on 8:7–8. "Jacob" refers to the patriarch himself and also, by extension, to the nation of Israel. The Lord (cf. also v.10) graciously answered (Ex 2:25) their cry for help (Ex 2:23–24). He sent Moses (Ex 3:10) and Aaron to lead Israel out of Egypt (cf. 1Sa 10:18)—a fact acknowledged even by their enemies (1Sa 6:6)—and to bring them to the borders of the Promised Land. The dreary cycle of the book of Judges is reprised in vv.9–11: rebellion (v.9a), retribution (v.9b), repentance (v.10), and restoration (v.11).

Rebelling against their God, the Israelites "forgot" (cf. Jdg 3:7) what he had done for them in the past and ignored him personally as they worshiped other gods (cf. v.10). In response to his people's apostasy and in retribution against them for their sin, the Lord "sold them," as though on the slave market, "into the hand[s] of" their enemies, including Sisera (Jdg 4:2; cf. Ps 83:9), the commander of the army of the city of Hazor, the Philistines (Jdg 3:31; 10:7; 13:1), and Eglon king of Moab (Jdg 3:12–14).

10 Samuel now describes repentant Israel sporadically throughout the period of the judges. Although they often forsook the Lord and violated his covenant with them by serving the Baals (male deities) and the Ashtoreths (female deities), they pled for his deliverance and promised to serve him alone if only he would release them from the shackles of enemy oppression.

11 God did restore the Israelites to their former covenant relationship by sending judges to their rescue. Jerub-Baal (Gideon) is perhaps mentioned first (1) because he is the central figure in the book of Judges and arguably the most important of the judges themselves; (2) because his very name (cf. Jdg 6:32 and NIV note there) means "Let Baal Contend"; and (3) because he specifically refused to establish dynastic as opposed to divine rule over his countrymen (Jdg 8:22–23)—for which refusal he must surely have been one of Samuel's heroes (cf. v.13). Samuel then refers to Barak, Deborah's general in the successful war against Sisera's Canaanite army (Jdg 4:6–7), and Jephthah (Jdg 11:1), victor over the Ammonites. Finally, Samuel mentions himself as the last of the judges as well as the most recent victor over the Philistines (7:6, 11–15). He then summarizes the Lord's triumphant deliverance of his people from all their enemies through his chosen leaders.

12 Three times the people express their determination not to have God as their King but rather to have a human king like "all the other nations" (8:5–7): (1) after Samuel's earlier warning about the dangers inherent in their demand (8:19–20), (2) during the public assembly at Mizpah (10:19), and (3) in the face of the Ammonite threat (12:12).

13 Serving as the hinge of the chapter, this verse focuses once again on the gracious, permissive will of God, who has given his people the king they "asked for" (another pun on the name "Saul"; cf. also vv.17, 19). In successive stages Saul had acceded to that office. The Lord's eventual rejection of the very king the people demanded is eerily echoed later in a similar situation in Hos 13:10–11 (cf. esp. v.11).

14–15 To "fear [GK 3707] the LORD and serve [GK 6268]" him (Jos 24:14) brings his blessing; to "rebel [GK 5277] against his commands" (Dt 1:26, 43; 9:23; Jos 1:18) brings his curse. "Fear of God/the LORD," a common expression in OT wisdom literature (cf. Job 28:28; Pr 1:7; 9:10), was the generic term for "religion" in ancient Israel. In the OT, fearing God had more the connotation of reverence and awe (cf. Dt 17:19) than of terror or dread—although the latter was not totally lacking. To "serve" means not only to work and minister but also to worship (cf. already 7:3–4). If Israel and her new king would fear, serve, and obey God by carefully following his law, they would receive his blessing (for the king, see Dt 17:18–20). Disobedience and rebellion "against his commands," however, would result in his curse against them in the future (cf. 1Ki 13:21–26; La 1:18) as it had been against their "fathers" in the past (cf. Nu 20:24–26; 27:12–14).

16 Earlier (v.7) Samuel had told the people to "stand" and see the evidence of God's righteous acts in the past on their behalf. Now he commands them to "stand" and be awed by divine omnipotence (cf. also Ex 14:31). The divine act then results in natural inversion. In that part of the world not only is "rain in harvest . . . not fitting" (Pr 26:1), it is so totally unexpected that it could easily be interpreted as a sign of divine displeasure.

17 "Thunder" represents thunder as the loud and powerful voice of God manifested in storms (cf. 7:10; Ps 29:3–9). The driving rain that often accompanied such thunder could be especially destructive to crops (Pr 28:3), and when it occurred unseasonably, it could leave those who depended on it destitute (cf. Jdg 15:1–5). Thus Samuel's rhetorical question in this verse served as an ominous reminder to the people that all their hard work had the potential of being wiped out in an equally brief period of time. The people would then "realize" how evil their motives had been in asking for a king.

18–19 Samuel's prayer for a storm out of season was answered "that same day," and all the people "stood in awe" of both God and Samuel (cf. Ex 14:31). The reputation of Moses and Samuel as being especially close to God's counsel (Jer 15:1) was justly deserved; the people's plea to Samuel—"Pray to the LORD"—is a clear echo of Ex 9:28. That the people should ask Samuel to pray to the Lord "your" God (rather than "our" God) indicates a recognition of their own apostate condition. They admit that asking for a king was an evil that "added to" all their other sins (cf. similarly 2Ch 28:13; Job 34:37; Isa 30:1).

20 Samuel concludes his address to the people of Israel by encouraging them to do good (vv.20–24) and warning them not to do evil (v.25). He reminds them that they were the ones who asked for a king (cf. v.19); thus they have only themselves to blame if Saul proves to be either weak or despotic. All is not lost, however, if only the people will acknowledge that their true King is the Lord himself. Samuel further urges Israel to "serve the LORD with all your heart," an often expressed covenant requirement (cf. Dt 10:12–13; 11:13–14; cf. also 30:9–10).

21 By contrast, the people are not to follow "useless idols." The reference in this context seems to denote any defection from serving the Lord—including, of course, preference for a human king. Only God can do the people good; no one else can "rescue."

22 The Lord's elective purposes for his people would not be denied. His intention to make Israel his own covenant people (Ex 19:5; cf. 1Pe 2:9) was not because of any merit on their part (Dt 7:6–7). Rather, he chose them because of his love for them and to fulfill his oath that he had sworn to their forefathers (Dt 7:8–9; cf. Ge 15:4–6, 13–18; 22:16–18). In addition, and perhaps most important, he chose them "for the sake of his great name" (cf. also Jos 7:9–11).

23 Taking his rightful place among the giants of intercession (Ex 32:30–32; Da 9:4–20; Ro 1:9–10; et al.), Samuel declares his unwillingness to sin against God (cf. 14:33–34) by failing to pray for Israel (cf. also v.19; 7:5, 8–9; 8:6; 15:11; Jer 15:1). To help the people live a life pleasing to God, he promises to "teach" them "the way that is good and right" (cf. also 1Ki 8:36 = 2Ch 6:27).

24–25 The rest is up to the people themselves; so ch. 12 ends with encouragement to faith and obedience (which summarizes Dt 10:20–21) and warning against the consequences of disobedience appropriate to a covenant renewal document (cf. Ecc 12:13). After all, the Lord had done "great things" for his people, which should have been a cause for rejoicing on their part (Ps 126:2–3; Joel 2:21). Samuel feels constrained to remind them, however, that pursuing their penchant for evil will surely result in their destruction.

B. The Decline of Saul (13:1–15:35)

1. The rebuke of Saul (13:1–15)

1 This verse is doubtless the defective remnant of the formal introduction of Saul's reign. Such formulas are common in later portions of the Deuteronomic history of the southern kings. However, two notable exceptions to the regnal formula must be mentioned: that of Saul in v.1 and that of Ish-Bosheth son of Saul (2Sa 2:10). After the murder of Ish-Bosheth (2Sa 4), the regnal formula is reserved exclusively for southern kings. As for Saul, the mutilated condition of v.1 may reflect later scribal antipathy toward him. The two NIV footnotes to v.1 summarize the text-critical reasons for the numbers the NIV restores there.

2–10 The people had "chosen" a king to lead them into battle (8:18–20), and now their king obliged them: Saul "chose" (GK 1047) three thousand Israelite men to serve in his standing army (cf. 8:11–12). Two thousand were under his command at Micmash and in the high country at Bethel, while one thousand were at Gibeah in Benjamin (his hometown) under the command of his son Jonathan (which means "The LORD has given"). Apparently feeling confident in the size of his two military units, Saul sent the rest of the men home.

The smaller unit under Jonathan started a war against the Philistines by attacking their outpost at Geba in Benjamin, about five miles north-northeast of Jerusalem. Saul, ultimately responsible for the attack and realizing that the main Philistine army had heard about it, entertained second thoughts about his own troop strength. He therefore had the ram's-horn trumpet blown throughout Israel to summon additional men (cf. Jdg 3:27; 6:34).

To state that Israel had now become a "stench to the Philistines" was tantamount to affirming that the Philistines would muster their troops to fight Israel, and so they did. In the meantime, Saul's call to arms was answered by the "people," who assembled at Gilgal.

The Philistines were feared far and wide for their wooden chariots armed with iron fittings. The present account uses hyperbole to emphasize the magnitude of the Philistine threat. Besides being able to put three thousand two-man chariots into the field, the enemy had summoned troops "as numerous as the sand on the seashore"—a simile not only familiar to a believing community who traced their allegiance to the Lord back to the Abrahamic covenant (Ge 22:17; cf. also 1Ki 4:20–21) but also useful in describing huge numbers of fighting men (2Sa 17:11; Jos 11:4).

Since the Philistines set up camp at Micmash, Saul either hastily retreated to Gilgal or perhaps had earlier decided to make his headquarters there. The Philistine deployment there caused mass desertions in the Israelite army. Like their ancestors before them (Jdg 6:2), some of the Israelites hid in whatever out-of-the-way places they could find (14:11, 22). Others fled eastward across the Jordan River, seeking safety in Gad and Gilead. David would later discover that caves (23:23; 24:3, 7–8, 10) would afford safe protection from Saul and other enemies.

The greatly reduced number of men who remained with Saul at Gilgal were understandably frightened. Saul, remembering Samuel's earlier command (10:8), waited seven days for his arrival. When the prophet failed to appear at the appointed time, even more of Saul's troops began to defect. Desperate, Saul decided to seek the Lord's favor (v.12) by sacrificing the offerings that Samuel had told him he himself would make. Samuel arrived on the scene just after Saul had offered up the burnt offering but before he had had time to sacrifice the fellowship offerings. Upon Samuel's arrival Saul went out to "greet" (lit., "bless"; GK 1385; cf. Ge 47:7) him, which would not mollify him in this situation any more than in similar circumstances later (15:13).

Saul's sin was not that as king he was forbidden by God's law to sacrifice burnt offerings and fellowship offerings under any and all circumstances. David (2Sa 24:25) and Solomon (1Ki 3:15) later made the same kinds of offerings, and there is no hint of divine rebuke in either case. Saul sinned because he disobeyed God's word through the prophet Samuel—a sin that he would commit again (15:26).

11–15 Saul's motivation to offer the sacrifice seems genuine and appropriate: The Philistines were gathering for battle against Israel, his men were deserting him, and Samuel had not arrived on the scene when he had said he would. Saul therefore felt the urgent need to seek God's favor. What he apparently failed to realize, however, is that animal sacrifice is not a prerequisite for entreating God. Clearly, Saul had not heeded the divine word through the prophet, and obedience is always better than sacrifice (15:22).

But there is more. It would seem that in ancient Israel, rituals associated with the holy war were not to be performed by the king unless a prophet was present. In chs. 13 and 15 Saul acted without the presence of Samuel, and in both cases his transgression was related to holy war ritual (15:3, 7–11, 17–19). For these offenses he was rebuked by Samuel and rejected by God.

Had Saul obeyed, his "kingdom" over Israel would have been divinely established "for all time." Such a promise presents a difficulty in light of the Davidic covenant since the Lord affirms that David's throne will be established "forever" (2Sa 7:13, 16; cf. also Ge 49:10). It is possible, of course, that God's original choice of Saul (9:15–17; 10:1, 24) carried with it a genuine (though hypothetical) promise of a continuing dynasty that was never in danger of being fulfilled, given Saul's character.

Saul, reminded twice that he had not obeyed the Lord's command, is told that he would be replaced by a man "after [God's] own heart" (Ac 13:22), i.e., a man who truly has God's interests at heart.

Saul now takes a census of his fighting men to assess their numerical strength (cf. 11:8; 14:17). In spite of the original two thousand men (or perhaps three thousand) mentioned earlier (v.2) and the general call to arms to supplement them (vv.3–4), wholesale defections had reduced his troops to "about six hundred" (cf. 14:2).

2. The struggle against the Philistines (13:16–14:23)

16–22 The combined forces of Saul and Jonathan at Gibeah numbered only in the hundreds (14:2), while those of the Philistines at Micmash scarcely four miles to the northeast numbered in the thousands (v.5). Philistine "raiding parties" (14:15) left camp in three detachments, a common military strategy in those days (11:11; Jdg 7:16; 9:43; 2Sa 18:2) since it provided more options and greater mobility. They headed off in three different directions: One group went toward Ophrah in Benjamin (cf. Jos 18:23), a second went toward (Upper) Beth Horon in Ephraim (cf. Jos 16:5), and the third went an undetermined distance eastward toward the Valley of Zeboim.

As an effective method of denying weapons to the beleaguered Israelites, the Philistines had apparently deported all the Israelite blacksmiths (cf. 2Ki 24:14, 16; Jer 24:1; 29:2). Hebrew fighting men were not to have swords or spears (Saul and Jonathan, either with Philistine permission or by subterfuge, were the sole exceptions; v.22).

Since Philistia was located on the coastal plains west of the foothills of Judah, Israelites who visited the Philistines for any purpose "went down" to them (see Jdg 14:19; 16:31; Am 6:2). As in the days of Deborah (Jdg 5:8), the Israelites were woefully outgunned as the battle against the enemy loomed before them. Despite their lack of weapons, however, with God's help (14:6) they would rout the mighty Philistines just as David would later defeat the giant Goliath (17:45, 47).

13:23–14:14 The stage having been set in 13:16–22, the drama of Israel's victory over Philistia begins with a remarkably courageous attack by two men, who win a skirmish with a heavily armed enemy against overwhelming odds.

A "detachment" of Philistines had left their main camp at Micmash (13:16) and had gone out to defend a pass leading to it. It is Saul's son Jonathan who takes the initiative against the enemy. He suggests to his armor-bearer that they attack the recently established Philistine outpost. Armor-bearers in ancient times had to be unusually brave and loyal, since the lives of their masters often depended on them. The function of Jonathan's armor-bearer was especially important because of the scarcity of weapons in Israel (13:22). Jonathan decided not to tell his father about his plans, perhaps not to worry him needlessly or because he felt that Saul would forbid him to go.

Meanwhile, Saul's modest army of six hundred men (13:15) was with him near Gibeah, his hometown. Although the statement that Saul himself was sitting "under a pomegranate tree" contrasts his timidity and relative ease/luxury with Jonathan's willingness to sacrifice his very life for Israel, it may simply be intended as an allusion to his role as leader (cf. Jdg 4:5).

Among the men with Saul was the priest Ahijah, grandson of Phinehas and great-grandson of Eli (v.3). Reference to Ahijah's ancestors recalls the divine curse on the house of Eli (2:30–33) and the deaths of Eli (4:18) and Phinehas (4:11). Later the text will describe the deaths of Ahitub and his fellow priests (22:11–18) at the command of Saul himself. The apparently needless reference to Ichabod recalls yet another tragedy in Eli's family. Thus the rebuked King Saul is in the company of the priest Ahijah of the rejected house of Eli, and neither is "aware" that the courageous Jonathan son of Saul is on his way to fight the Philistines.

When Jonathan repeated his suggestion of v.1 to his armor-bearer, he made a significant change by calling the Philistines "those uncircumcised fellows," a term of reproach used elsewhere (17:26, 36; 31:4; 2Sa 1:20) and designating them as nonparticipants in the Abrahamic covenant (Ge 17:9–11). Jonathan is confident that the Lord will fight for Israel and that nothing can keep God from saving them (cf. 17:47). He knows that with God on his side, even an insignificant number of men can achieve victory (cf. Jdg 7:4, 7). The armor-bearer's response to Jonathan shows the extent of his loyalty. Their two hearts beating as one, the men march into battle together.

A brief comment by Jonathan introduces the sign and its sequel. As the dew on the fleece would give Gideon the faith to believe that God would save Israel by Gideon's hand (Jdg 6:36–37), so the appropriate Philistine response to the approach of Jonathan and his armor-bearer would give Jonathan the faith to believe that the Lord would give the enemy into their hands.

When the Philistines caught sight of the two men, they assumed them to be Israelite deserters who had earlier hidden in caves and holes (13:6). Confident that they had nothing to fear, the Philistines shouted the fateful words: "Come up to us." Wasting no time, Jonathan and his companion climbed up to the outpost and began the slaughter. Although outnumbered about ten to one, Jonathan and his armor-bearer dispatched "some twenty men" in a "[furrowed] area" (cf. Ps 129:3) of a field small enough to be plowed by a yoke of oxen in half a day—that is, the Philistines were killed in a brief time and a short distance.

15–23 Confusion struck the Philistine troops (cf. vv.20, 22) whatever their location: in the camp at Micmash (13:16), out in the field, at the various outposts, with one or another of the three raiding parties (13:17–18). The panic, sent by God, was of the kind promised to Israel against her enemies when the people trusted him (Dt 7:23). During such times of terror, the ground may shake, as when the Lord led his people through the Sea of Reeds while at the same time overthrowing the Egyptians (Ps 77:18).

So total was the Philistine panic and so noisy their flight that Saul's watchmen on the walls at Gibeah could see—and perhaps hear—many of the enemy soldiers as they scattered in all directions. The "melting [away]" of an enemy force is a vivid metaphor describing full retreat (cf. Isa 14:31; cf. also Ex 15:15; Jos 2:9, 24). Curious about what was causing the Philistine flight, and perhaps considering the possibility of helping to turn it into a total rout, Saul decided once again to take a census of his troops (see 13:15)—but this time to see whether any of them had left the camp and were perhaps responsible for the Philistine panic. Amazingly enough, it was not until the census was complete that Saul became aware of the absence of Jonathan, his own son.

Still not quite ready to go to Jonathan's aid, however, Saul told the priest Ahijah to bring the ark of God before him. A special point is made of the fact that it was "with the Israelites" at that time (presumably having been brought to Gibeah from Kiriath Jearim; cf. 7:2), and Saul may well have wanted to carry it into battle against the Philistines in a superstitious attempt to guarantee victory (cf. 4:3–7).

Hearing the increasing tumult in the Philistine camp, Saul apparently changed his mind about the need to make use of the ark and told Ahijah to stop the ritual proceedings. Together with his men he then marched into battle, presumably without benefit of priestly blessing of any kind. The Philistines, meanwhile, had become filled with total "confusion." Brother was wielding sword against brother (cf. Eze 38:21).

Saul, Jonathan, and the Israelite army were soon joined by two groups of reinforcements. Some were Hebrews who had previously gone to the Philistine camp, perhaps either to have their agricultural tools sharpened (cf. 13:20) or, disgruntled with Israelite rule, to hire themselves out as mercenaries (cf. 29:6). The second group of reinforcements consisted of Israelite deserters who had been hiding (cf. 13:6) in the hill country of Ephraim, a large, partially forested plateau (Jos 17:15–18) north and west of Micmash. The "hot pursuit" of the combined Israelite forces under Saul and Jonathan would be tragically reversed in the final relentless attack of the Philistines against the king and his son (31:2).

The Hebrew expression translated "So the LORD rescued Israel that day" is a verbatim quotation of Ex 14:30. Its deliberate use stresses the importance of Saul's victory while also giving all the glory to God (as Saul apparently also did; cf. v.39). The Israelite forces, however, were not satisfied with the results of their own efforts until they had driven the Philistines some distance west of Beth Aven toward their own homeland beyond Aijalon (v.31).

3. The cursing of Jonathan (14:24–46)

24–30 The scenes recorded here constitute a flashback to events simultaneous with the battle description in vv.20–23. Saul had bound the troops under an oath of abstaining from food for the entire day of the battle, an understandable religious demand in a "holy war" context. The result, however, was that they were "in distress" from hunger. Thus Saul's motivation, however praiseworthy, resulted in his men's becoming "faint" and "exhausted." Accompanying the fulfillment of the oath, intended to implement a religiously motivated fast that would energize the men and fill them with fighting zeal, would be the opportunity for Saul to take vengeance on his enemies.

As with Samson (Jdg 14:8–20), honey in a Philistine context almost cost Jonathan his life. Upon entering a forest, Saul's troops noticed a honeycomb on the ground. Although it was filled with honey, no one so much as tasted any of it because they "feared" the oath (cf. Pr 13:13). But Jonathan, unaware of the oath, used the end of his staff (perhaps to avoid being stung by bees) to dip some honey from the comb. When Jonathan ate it, his eyes "brightened," implying renewal of strength (cf. Ps 19:8–10).

One of Jonathan's fellow soldiers warned him about his father's oath, adding the observation that obeying it had caused the troops to become "faint." Jonathan's rebuttal, based on his refreshment after eating food, is that Saul "has made trouble for the country." Jonathan concludes by arguing that even more Philistines would have been killed if Saul's men had eaten some of the food they "took" as plunder.

31–35 Saul's men were no longer under his oath of abstinence because it was after evening and the Philistines were totally routed. The Israelites had devastated them and driven them westward all the way to Aijalon, which had originally been assigned to the tribal territory of Dan (Jos 19:40–42).

Famished, the Israelite troops seized sheep, cattle, and calves from the Philistine plunder, butchered them, and ate the meat without waiting for the blood to drain from it. Since eating meat with the blood still in it was forbidden to the people of God throughout their history (cf. Lev 17:10–14; 19:26; et al.), it is not surprising that Saul, on hearing of his men's sinful deed, would immediately act to absolve them of guilt. He first accused them of having betrayed their promise to God. He then demanded that a large stone be rolled over to him so that animals could be properly slaughtered on it, not on the ground as before. In this way he is making a commendable attempt to right a sinful wrong perpetrated by his understandably hungry troops.

Spiritually sensitive Israelite leaders built altars as a matter of routine (cf. 7:17; 2Sa 24:25; 1Ch 21:18; Jdg 6:24). In Saul's case a special point is made of the fact that this was the "first time" he had done so, probably a negative comment directed at Saul's lack of piety.

36–46 Initially Saul determined to plunder and slaughter the Philistines until nothing and no one remained. The decision to attack at night and plunder till dawn reflects the common practice of conducting military operations in the dead of night, when the number of attackers was small and the element of surprise was important (cf. 2Sa 17:22; Jdg 16:3). Saul's men, apparently satisfied that he had their best interests at heart, were ready to follow him.

The priest Ahijah, however, sensed the need to "inquire of" God (lit., "draw near to"; GK 448 & 7928; cf. Zep 3:2), perhaps by making use of the sacred lots stored in the ephod (v.3). Agreeing, Saul "asked" the Lord whether the defeat of the enemy was imminent (cf. 7:8–9; Jdg 20:23). When he received no answer, he sensed that something was amiss in the army.

Saul called for the army "leaders" (cf. Jdg 20:2) to come before him to ascertain what sin had been committed and who had committed it. Pronouncing the solemn oath "As surely as the LORD lives" (cf. v.45; 19:6; 20:3, 21; 25:34; 26:10, 16; et al.), Saul affirmed that whoever had sinned "must die." If necessary, he was even prepared to give up the life of his son Jonathan (cf. Ge 22:10, 12, 16; Jdg 11:31, 39; Heb 11:17). Respectful even in the face of Saul's shocking announcement, knowing that Jonathan had (however innocently) violated his father's imposed oath, aware that the brave Jonathan would likely die through no fault of his own, doubtless sympathizing with Jonathan's position as over against Saul's folly—none of his men "said a word" during those dramatic moments.

Anticipating the casting of lots to determine who had committed the sin that imperiled further war against Philistia, Saul made the first division by lining up his troops on one side and himself and Jonathan on the other. The casting of lots proceeds swiftly, and the rest of the men are eliminated as "Jonathan and Saul" are taken (that Jonathan's name appears first is an ominous sign). As the final lot is cast, Saul is cleared and Jonathan taken. Saul's statement to Jonathan echoes Joshua's to Achan centuries earlier (Jos 7:19). Jonathan then admits tasting a little honey with the end of his staff, but also says he is ready to die. Even more solemn than the oath Saul had taken earlier (v.39) is the one he now takes (v.44; cf. also 25:22), and it seems that Jonathan's doom is sealed.

Unable to contain themselves any longer, Saul's men remind him of how cruel it would be to execute Israel's deliverer. Because he was able to achieve victory with God's help (cf. Ge 4:1), not a single hair of his head would fall to the ground (cf. 2Sa 14:11; 1Ki 1:52; Ac 27:34). Finally persuaded, Saul rescinds his order, and thus Jonathan is "rescued" (lit., "ransomed"; GK 7009; cf. Job 6:23) by the fervent pleas of the troops. Distracted by his determination to execute his own son, Saul loses his best opportunity to deal the Philistines a lethal blow.

4. Further wars of Saul (14:47–52)

47–48 Although for the most part we do not know the times or extent of Saul's wars against his enemies, we read that he was successful wherever he turned. In anticipation of Saul's fiasco in ch. 15, the narrator reserves the Amalekites for special attention. On one or more occasions (otherwise unrecorded) during his reign, Saul "fought valiantly" against Amalek and defeated them. He also saved Israel from the hands of "those who had plundered" them. But Saul's incomplete victory in ch. 15, caused by his disobedience, led to divine rejection and the loss of his kingdom (15:28; 28:17–18).

49 The names of Saul's children are recorded here, and those of other family members appear in vv.50–51. In addition to his firstborn, Jonathan, Saul had at least two other sons: Ishvi (probably Ish-Bosheth) and Malki-Shua ("My King is noble," 31:2). Saul also had a fourth son, not mentioned here (Abinadab; cf. 31:2). Saul's two daughters, Merab (2Sa 21:8) and Michal (cf. 19:11–17; 2Sa 6:16–23), are listed in their proper genealogical order. Both would later be offered in marriage to David (18:17–27).

50–51 Saul's wife was Ahinoam ("My Brother is pleasant") daughter of Ahimaaz. Saul also had a concubine named Rizpah (2Sa 3:7). The commander of Saul's army was his cousin Abner. Saul's father Kish and uncle Ner were both sons of Abiel (cf. 9:1).

52 Chapter 14 concludes with reminders of the never-ending and all-pervasive Philistine threat and of the king's continuing need for fresh troops (cf. 8:11). The final verse of the chapter also sends forth literary rays into the future. One of the "brave" men Saul will conscript is David (18:17).

5. The rejection of Saul (15:1–35)

Chapter 15 concludes the account of Saul's decline (chs. 13–15). As in ch. 13, Saul's intention to offer an unauthorized sacrifice in the context of holy war leads to God's rejection—this time, a final rejection. If at that earlier time Saul was denied a dynasty, now he is denied his kingship. Thus ch. 15 is climactic.

1–3 Samuel stresses his role as the representative through whom God anointed Saul as king and through whom he now proclaims a further message to him. Soon to wrest the kingship from Saul's grasp, the Lord—the only true King in Israel's theocratic monarchy—is described as "the LORD Almighty," a specifically royal name (see 1:3). His message to Saul is that the time has come for the final destruction of the Amalekites, predicted and reiterated long ago (Ex 17:8–16; Nu 24:20; Dt 25:17–19). The geographical clues scattered throughout the chapter make it clear that the Amalekites referred to here are the traditional southern marauders rather than a smaller Amalekite enclave occupying an area in the hills of western Samaria.

The significance and uniqueness of the divine command to annihilate the Amalekites is underscored by herem (GK 3049; see NIV note for its meaning). In this case it means "attack," "do not spare," and "put to death" (see v.3). It is furthermore clear that "everything that belongs to them" here means "everything among them that breathes" (cf. Dt 20:16–17). Representative pairings of animate creatures doomed to destruction conclude the verse. The command is specific: "Do not spare them"; later, Saul rationalized his disobedience of that command (vv.9, 15).

We should not be surprised that Saul did not flinch at the prospect of killing innocent women and children. Wars in the ancient Near East always had a religious dimension, and the battlefield was an arena of divine retribution. The Amalekites, in their persistent refusal to fear God (Dt 25:18), sowed the seeds of their own destruction. God is patient and slow to anger, "abounding in love and faithfulness" (Ex 34:6); he nevertheless "does not leave the guilty unpunished" (v.7). The agent of divine judgment can be impersonal (e.g., the Flood or the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah) or personal (as here), and in his sovereign purpose God permits entire families or nations to be destroyed if their corporate representatives are incorrigibly wicked (cf. Jos 7:1, 10–13, 24–26).

4–9 Saul summoned from Judah "ten thousand" men. In addition he mustered "two hundred thousand foot soldiers," probably from Israel. Saul's troop strength had declined considerably since the battles against Nahash and the Ammonites (11:8), but it was more than adequate for the present task.

Before Saul's main attack against the Amalekites, he urged the Kenites living in or near Amalekite territory (cf. 27:10; 30:29) to move out (at least temporarily) to avoid getting killed in the crossfire. The Kenites had shown "kindness" to the Israelite spies centuries earlier and had thus been spared in return (Jos 2:12–14).

The Israelites attacked the Amalekites throughout their homeland. The description of the total destruction of "all" the people is hyperbolic, since the Amalekites survived to fight again (cf. 30:1). In any event, Saul spared Agag—but perhaps with the intent of later putting him to death, since the idiom "take alive" often describes an action preparatory to subsequent execution (cf. 2Ki 10:14; 2Ch 25:12; and esp. Jos 8:23, 29).

Besides sparing Agag, Saul and his troops also set aside the best of the enemy's animals. When reproved by Samuel for not slaughtering even the best animals (vv.14, 19), Saul gave the excuse that his "soldiers" (vv.15, 21) intended to sacrifice them to the Lord. If Saul is sincere at this point, his reluctance to accept responsibility and his haste to shift the blame to his men are disquietingly reminiscent of similar situations (Ge 3:12–13; Ex 32:21–24). The text, however, states that Saul and his men were "unwilling" (GK 14) to destroy—a verb specifically linked elsewhere with the sin of rebellion (Dt 1:26).

10–21 The phrase "the word of the LORD came to" is used of God's revelation to a prophet only three times in the books of Samuel (see 2Sa 7:4; 24:11; cf. 1Sa 3:1). In each of two stages in this section (vv.10–15, 16–21), Samuel brings the condemning word of God to Saul for having disobeyed the divine command.

Whether Samuel had by this time become reconciled—however reluctantly—to Saul's kingship is difficult to say. After all, God's role in making Saul king is stressed over and over in these chapters (9:17; 10:1, 24; 12:13; 13:13; 15:1). Although Samuel did not yet know it, Saul had "turned away" from the Lord (GK 8704), an action fraught with the most serious of consequences (cf. Nu 14:43; 32:15; Jos 22:16, 18, 23, 29; 1Ki 9:6–7). The Lord's "word" to Samuel was clearly disturbing to him, causing him to be "troubled" and to cry out (for help; cf. 7:8–9; 12:8, 10; GK 2410) to the Lord all night long. During his night-long wrestling with God in prayer he received the divine message of irreversible doom for Saul's kingdom (cf. v.16). God has now spoken; throughout the rest of the chapter Samuel mediates the divine word to the rejected Saul.

Samuel was told that Saul had gone to Carmel and set up a monument (probably an inscribed victory stele) "in his own honor" (apparently not giving credit to the Lord). Having built the monument, Saul then went to Gilgal—the very place where Samuel had earlier rebuked him for sacrificing to the Lord (13:7–14; cf. v.21).

When Samuel arrived at Gilgal, Saul—either genuinely or pretending innocence—greeted him in the traditional way (cf. 23:21; 2Sa 2:5; Ru 2:19–20; 3:10) and then told him that he had carried out the Lord's "instructions." But Samuel, not to be denied, wanted to know why he heard sheep and cattle in the background. Saul's meek retort in v.15 fails on two counts: (1) However commendable his declared motive, Saul had been told to destroy every living thing and therefore should not have spared even the best of the animals; (2) even if his soldiers were primarily responsible for saving the animals, Saul was their leader and therefore should not have tried to shift the blame to them. Especially stark is the contrast between "they spared" and "we totally destroyed." Notice that in speaking to Samuel, Saul referred to "the LORD your God" (rather than "the LORD our God"; cf. vv.21, 30).

Samuel would have none of Saul's self-righteous protestations. With all the force of divine authority, he told Saul to "stop" (v.16) and to listen to what God had revealed to him the previous night. He reminded Saul that despite the fact that Saul had once considered himself too insignificant to be Israel's ruler (cf. 9:21; 10:22), the Lord had nevertheless anointed him as king. He then reminded Saul of the divine commission regarding the wicked Amalekites. Saul has no better defense against Samuel's onslaught than to repeat in detail what he had already said (v.13). Although he stresses his own obedience by speaking in the first person several times in v.20, he also tries to justify the actions of his troops by attributing to them the worthy intention to sacrifice to the Lord the animals they had spared.

22–31 The poetic format of Samuel's well-known condemnation of Saul's objection in no way blunts its severity (cf. v.33). As at the time of the Fall (Ge 2–3), the matter at stake is one of obedience, and Saul failed as miserably as did Adam and Eve.

Verse 22 is a classic text on the importance of obedience, moral conduct, and proper motivation in animal sacrifice (cf. Pss 40:6–8; 51:16–17; Isa 1:11–15; Hos 6:6; Mk 12:32–33). To Samuel, himself both prophet (3:20) and priest, the issue is not a question of either/or but of both/and. Sacrifice must be offered to the Lord on his terms, not ours. Saul's postponement of the commanded destruction, however well meaning, constituted flagrant violation of God's will.

Just as Saul's earlier impetuous disobedience had brought the full force of Samuel's rebuke (13:14), so now his halfhearted fulfillment of the divine command removes him from royal office. Rejection begets rejection.

The note of finality in Samuel's voice finally brings Saul to his senses. Saul says—twice—"I have sinned." He confesses to having "violated the LORD's command," apparently not having learned the lesson of his earlier failure (13:13). Fearing the people more than God (cf. Pr 29:25; Isa 51:12–13), Saul "gave in to them"—lit., "listened to their voice"—when all along he should have been obeying the voice of God through the prophet (vv.19, 22).

At first Saul's plea to Samuel for forgiveness falls on deaf ears. As far as Samuel is concerned, the conversation is over; so he turns to leave the scene. At this point Saul in desperation seizes the hem of Samuel's robe. Saul may not have been aware of the full implications of his spontaneous act. But since a man's robe may symbolize his power and authority (cf. 2:19), the tearing of Samuel's robe implies an irreparable breech between Saul and Samuel as well as the more obvious sundering of the kingdom from Saul and his descendants (cf. 1Ki 11:11–13, 29–31).

The "neighbor" destined to receive Saul's kingdom (cf. 13:14) is David. As obedience is "better than" sacrifice, so David is "better than" Saul. It is ironic that Saul himself had originally been considered "better than" his peers (9:2).

The general statement in Nu 23:19 concerning the immutability of God's basic nature and purpose is now applied in v.29. Samuel gives to the unchangeable God a unique name by calling him the "Glory" of Israel.

Perhaps by now reconciled to the irreversible divine determination to reject him finally as king of Israel, Saul poignantly repeats his earlier statements of confession and of his desire for Samuel to "come back" with him. Saul wanted to save face before the elders and people of Israel by publicly worshiping the Lord and so demonstrating his allegiance to him. Samuel—a man, not God—this time relented.

32–35 There was one piece of business still to take care of, however. Using the language common to the ritual procedure of sacrifice, Samuel said, "Bring me Agag." The Amalekite king feels that his life will be spared. In Samuel's mind, however, Agag is an offering to be sacrificed to the Lord. Quickly dispelling Agag's optimism, Samuel applies the lex talionis to him (cf. Jdg 1:7) and reminds him that bloodshed begets bloodshed (Ge 9:6). Without further ado Samuel then executes Agag, probably by hacking him in pieces for the treaty violation implications of such an act (cf. 11:12).

Following the death of Agag, Samuel and Saul go their separate ways—Samuel to his hometown of Ramah, just as he does after anointing David (16:13), and Saul to his hometown of Gibeah. Although after this time Saul would go to see Samuel again on more than one occasion (19:23–24; 28:10–11), never again would Samuel initiate such a meeting. Samuel nonetheless "mourned" for Saul (cf. also 16:1)—the language used here suggests mourning for one who is dead.

The chapter ends with a doleful echo of v.11: "The LORD was grieved that he had made Saul king." Saul's rejection of God's word through his prophet had led to God's rejection of Saul's rule over his people. To end this part of our discussion on a relatively positive note, however, we do well to remember that the divine rejection of the kingship of Saul does not imply a rejection of the person of Saul.

III. Establishment of Monarchy in Israel (16:1–31:13)

Although monarchy in the person of Saul had long since arrived in Israel, only with the anointing and rapid rise of David can it be said to have been truly established. Unlike Saul's abortive rule, David's reign was sovereignly instituted by God alone. Chapters 16–31 are as much the story of the decline and ultimate fall of Saul and Jonathan as they are of the rise of David.

A. The Rise of David (16:1–28:2)

1. The anointing of David (16:1–13)

In addition to being the middle chapter of 1 Samuel, ch. 16 is pivotal in another way as well: Its first half (vv.1–13), ending with a statement concerning David's reception of the Spirit of God, describes David's anointing as ruler of Israel to replace Saul; its second half (vv.14–23), beginning with a statement concerning Saul's loss of the Spirit and his replacement with an "evil spirit" sent by God, describes David's arrival in the court of Saul. Thus the juxtaposition of vv.13 and 14 delineates not only the transfer of the divine blessing and empowerment from Saul to David but also the beginning of the effective displacement of Saul by David as king of Israel. It serves as the literary, historical, and theological crux of 1 Samuel.

1–5 This chapter begins where ch. 15 ends: Samuel is still mourning for Saul. Ironically, the divine "how long" serves as a prophetic rebuke to the prophet Samuel. Since God had rejected Saul as king over Israel, a change of leadership was in order. The Lord tells Samuel to go to "Jesse of Bethlehem." At Bethlehem one of Jesse's sons would become the next ruler of Israel by being anointed with oil. Jesse of the tribe of Judah (cf. Ru 4:12, 18–22) and his hometown, Bethlehem in Judah, would forever become associated with the Messiah (Isa 11:1–3, 10; Mic 5:2; Mt 1:1, 5–6, 16–17; 2:4–6).

The Lord also tells Samuel that he has "chosen" a son of Jesse. Samuel was understandably afraid that the rejected Saul would kill him if he learned that Samuel was on the way to Bethlehem to anoint Saul's successor. The Lord therefore reminded Samuel of an accompanying reason for making the journey: to sacrifice a heifer (presumably as a fellowship offering; cf. Lev 3:1) in conjunction with the ritual of anointing (cf. 9:11–10:1; 11:15).

The sacrificial ceremony was for a select few (including Jesse, his sons, and the elders of Bethlehem) and was therefore by invitation only (cf. 9:24). God's promise to Samuel in v.3 leaves no doubt concerning God's sovereign role in the choice of Saul's successor: Samuel must anoint for the Lord the one whom the Lord indicates (cf. Dt 17:15).

Obedient to the Lord's command, Samuel went to Bethlehem. Perhaps awed by his formidable reputation, the town elders "trembled when they met him" (cf. 21:1). They asked Samuel the customary question in such circumstances: "Do you come in peace?" (cf. 1Ki 2:13; 2Ki 9:22). Samuel's cordial response allayed their fears as he told them (part of) the reason he had come. In preparation for entering into God's presence, he had the elders consecrate themselves; then he personally consecrated the specially designated celebrants (Jesse and his sons).

6–10 Samuel, apparently eager to get on with the anointing of Israel's next king, saw the oldest son, Eliab, and felt sure that he was the Lord's "anointed." The divine response to Samuel's musings immediately eliminates Eliab. God rejects him (as he had rejected Saul, v.1). What Samuel saw externally was Eliab's "appearance," but what man "looks at" (GK 8011) is not what God looks at (cf. 15:29). Human beings are impressed—and therefore often deceived—by what their eyes tell them, while God looks at the "heart" (cf. 1Ki 8:39; 1Ch 28:9; cf. esp. Lk 16:15).

Abinadab and Shammah, the second and third sons of Jesse (17:13), fared no better than Eliab had. Regarding both of these, "The LORD has not chosen this one either." Verse 10 summarizes the rest of the proceedings with respect to the divine rejection of David's brothers. None of the seven is acceptable.

11–13 Samuel, knowing God's determination that one of Jesse's sons will be king (v.1), but also knowing that God has not chosen any of the first seven (v.10), asks Jesse whether he has any other sons. Jesse informs him that there is one more, the "youngest" (cf. also 17:14).

When we first met Saul, he was looking for his father's donkeys (9:2–3); when we first meet David, he is tending his father's sheep. At Samuel's request, Jesse sends someone to bring David in from the fields. Ironically, David, while presumably not a tall man, immediately presents a striking appearance. No sooner was David brought into Samuel's presence than the Lord commanded Samuel to anoint him as Israel's next ruler.

Samuel's anointing of David ("in the presence of his brothers," so that there might be witnesses that he is truly God's choice) is linked with David's accession of the Spirit of the Lord. Anointing with oil thus symbolized anointing with the Holy Spirit (cf. Isa 61:1). In David's case the divine accession was permanent ("from that day on"; cf. 30:25), while elsewhere the Spirit comes and goes (twice for Saul, 10:6, 10; 11:6; three times for Samson, Jdg 14:6, 19; 15:14).

Verse 13 concludes with Samuel's prophetic departure for his home in Ramah. Although he makes additional appearances later on, he no longer plays an active role in 1 and 2 Samuel. The anointing of David was the capstone of Samuel's career.

2. The arrival of David in the court of Saul (16:14–23)

14–18 The Spirit's coming on David and the Spirit's leaving Saul were two climactic events that occurred in close sequence to each other (cf. esp. 18:12). Just as the accession of the Spirit by David was an expected accompaniment of his anointing as Israel's next ruler (v.13), so the departure of the Spirit from Saul should be understood as the negation of effective rule on his part from that time on.

The "evil spirit," the divinely sent scourge that "tormented" (GK 1286) Saul, returned again and again (18:10; 19:9; cf. Jdg 9:23). Although the "evil" spirit may have been a demon that embodied both moral and spiritual wickedness, it is more likely an "injurious" (see NIV note) spirit that produced harmful results for him. It was responsible for the mental and psychological problems that plagued Saul for the rest of his life. That God used alien spirits to serve him is taken for granted in the OT (cf. esp. 2Sa 24:1 with 1Ch 21:1). Saul's "attendants," aware that their king was being tormented by an evil spirit, were ready and eager to help (cf. v.17; 17:32, 34, 36; 18:5 et al.).

Perhaps sensing the soothing effect of music, Saul's attendants offered to look for someone to play the "harp" to make their master "feel better." Saul agreed with his attendants' counsel, and one of his "servants" suggested that a certain son of Jesse would meet Saul's needs admirably. In the course of doing so, the servant gave as fine a portrayal of David as one could wish: a good musician, a "brave man," a "warrior," an articulate speaker, and a handsome man as well. The servant's final descriptive phrase reminds us that just as the Lord was with Samuel (3:19), so also he was with David. Although unwittingly, Saul's servant has just introduced us to Israel's next king.

19–23 Again Saul, influenced by a servant's suggestion, sent for the man described. Saul's reference to David as being "with the sheep" identifies him as a shepherd (cf. v.11). Unwittingly, he too characterizes David as Israel's next king.

Jesse sent David to take bread, wine, and a young goat to Saul (cf. Pr 18:16). Obviously impressing Saul, David "entered his service" as an armor-bearer. Although skilled men can expect to be pressed into service by kings (Pr 22:29), Saul also "liked" David personally. David's skill as a harpist brought soothing "relief" that drove the evil "spirit" from the disturbed king. The chapter ends with a gifted young man, Israel's future king, coming to serve a rejected and dejected ruler who is totally unaware of the implications of his welcoming David into his court.

3. The death of Goliath (17:1–58)

Just as Samuel's anointing of Saul (10:1) was followed by Saul's defeat of Nahash and the Ammonites (11:1–11), so also Samuel's anointing of David (16:13) is followed by David's defeat of Goliath and the Philistines (ch. 17). Each victory demonstrated the courage, determination, and military expertise of the newly anointed leader. The exciting story of David and Goliath is an excellent example of representative warfare effected by means of a contest of champions. The purpose of such contests was to decide the strength of a country without massive loss of life.

1–3 The Philistines were Saul's inveterate enemies throughout his reign (14:52). On this occasion they gathered "their forces" between Socoh and Azekah, two towns in the western foothills of Judah (Jos 15:20, 33, 35). The Israelite camp was on the northern slopes of the valley. The contest between David and Goliath took place on the floor of the valley itself, about halfway between the two opposing campsites.

4–7 In vv.4 and 23 Goliath is called a "champion." By any standard of measure, the Philistine champion was a giant of a man, "over nine feet tall." His armor and weapons are described at length. A coat of mail such as Goliath's was fashioned from several hundred small bronze plates that resembled fish scales and had to meet the needs of protection, lightness, and freedom of movement. The weight of Goliath's armor is impressive. Greaves protected the legs below the knee, and javelins were probably used to fend off attackers as often as they were used in offensive maneuvers. Goliath's most formidable offensive weapon seems to have been his spear, whose heavy "point" was made of iron (cf. 13:19–22). Goliath's sword, although not mentioned until vv.45, 51, doubtless had an iron blade. Receiving added protection from the large shield carried by his aide, the Philistine giant must have felt—and appeared—invincible.

8–11 Goliath hurls the challenge of representative combat into the teeth of the Israelite army. The Philistines (so Goliath thinks) will win a quick and easy victory over Israel, who will then be enslaved by them. Having thrown down the gauntlet, the Philistine challenger at first had no takers. In fact, Saul and his troops were "dismayed and terrified." Barring the response of an Israelite hero, Goliath would win by default, and the Philistines would continue to be Israel's masters.

12–16 Again we are introduced to David, Jesse's son (16:19). His three oldest sons, loyal warriors all, "followed" Saul into battle. Although having entered Saul's service earlier (16:21), David was currently engaged in his main task, tending his father's sheep—in preparation for a more important shepherding task later. Goliath came forward twice a day for forty days in continuing, taunting defiance. He "took his stand," like the kings of the earth in Ps 2:2, "against the LORD and against his anointed one" (Ps 2:2, NIV note).

17–22 The urgency of Jesse's command ("Hurry") underscores his concern for his sons' well-being and safety. Jesse sent along the staple items of roasted grain and bread for David's brothers, while for the commander of their unit he provided a gift of "ten cheeses."

The rest of ch. 17 describes David's transformation from being a shepherd of flocks to becoming a leader of people. When he reached the battle lines, David "greeted" his brothers (lit., "asked concerning [their] welfare/well-being"; cf. the same expression in v.18).

23–30 Even from a distance Goliath's defiant challenge appears to have been loud enough to interrupt David's conversation with his brothers. The mere sight of the giant was enough to cause the men of Israel to flee in panic. Nothing had changed in more than a month (v.16).

Notice the contrast between the attitudes of David and the men of Israel: The men of Israel call Goliath "this man," David calls him "this uncircumcised Philistine"; they say that Goliath has come out to "defy Israel," David says that he has come out to "defy the armies of the living God"; they refer to Goliath's potential victor as "the man who kills him," David refers to him as "the man who kills this Philistine and removes this disgrace from Israel." In short, the men of Israel see a fearsome giant who is reproaching Israel; David sees merely an uncircumcised Philistine who is defying the living God.

Giving one's daughter in marriage as a reward for faithful service was not unprecedented in Israel (cf. Jos 15:13–17). In addition, Saul promised great wealth to Goliath's victor as well as making his father's family "exempt . . . from taxes."

In righteous indignation David implicitly offers himself to fight Goliath, an offer that becomes explicit in v.32. In David's eyes the Philistines' god Dagon is a dead idol (5:3–4). By contrast "the LORD is the true God; he is the living God, the eternal King" (Jer 10:10). David's oldest brother, Eliab, misunderstood and angrily questioned David's motives for coming down to the battlefield (cf. Ge 37:4–36).

31–33 David's expressions of bravado were reported to Saul, who then decided that he wanted to talk to the young shepherd. Knowing that the Lord is on his side, David offers to fight Goliath in spite of the overwhelming odds against him (cf. Dt 20:1–4). But Saul, unimpressed, insists that a fight between David and Goliath would be a mismatch. As for Goliath's reputation as a "fighting man," David has already been referred to as a "warrior" earlier in the text (16:18). The odds are therefore much more even than either Saul or Goliath might imagine, especially when the divine element is added to the equation.

34–35 In vv.34–37 David demonstrates beyond cavil that he "speaks well" (16:18). Though others may flee from lions and bears (Am 5:19), David does not. As a shepherd "keeping his father's sheep" (cf. 16:11), David often rescued them from the mouths of dangerous animals (cf. Am 3:12).

36–37 The comparison between David as a herder of sheep and David as a leader of people is made even more explicit. Goliath will be "like" the lion or the bear, both of whom David had killed. As David routinely "rescued" sheep from wild animals (v.35), so also God had "delivered" David from them and would thus "deliver" him from Goliath. Deliverance from enemies depicted as predatory animals is not an uncommon motif in Scripture (Ps 22:21; cf. also 2Ti 4:17).

Saul, again impressed by David's bravado (cf. v.31), tells him to "Go." Saul's added expression of encouragement ("the LORD be with you") echoes 16:18 and unwittingly calls attention to the tragically disparate spiritual conditions of Saul and David (16:13–14).

38–40 Saul, desirous of giving David every advantage, clothed him in the same kind of armor. Since it was generally believed that to wear the clothing of another was to be imbued with his essence and to share his very being, these latter acts were probably calculated to enable Saul to take credit for, or at least to share in, David's victory.

David, however, denied Saul his potential moment of glory. He insisted that he could not "go" while wearing Saul's heavy armor. After taking the armor off, he selected five sling stones from the streambed in the Valley of Elah. Such stones were part of the normal repertoire of weapons in the ancient world (cf. 2Ch 26:14). Armed only with his shepherd's staff and the five sling stones, David the Israelite shepherd strides forth to do battle with Goliath the Philistine champion.

41–44 Together with his aide carrying a large shield, the huge Goliath must have considered himself invincible. He failed to understand, however, that he and his shield bearer were no match for David and his God. Apparently ignoring David's sling, Goliath perceived that David was coming to fight against him with "sticks." Such weapons, he implied, would be appropriate for beating a "dog," the lowest of animals. He then cursed David "by" his "gods."

45–47 David's responding taunt begins and ends with reference to the ineffectiveness and irrelevance of "sword and spear" when the God of Israel is involved in the battle. David fights Goliath "in the name of" the Lord. Goliath is on perilous ground. He has "defied" (GK 3070) "the armies of Israel," thus defying "the armies of the living God" (v.36; cf. v.10); this is tantamount to defying God himself.

Anxious to get on with the contest, David asserts that Goliath will be killed "this day" and he will "cut off" the giant's head. All who hear will know that the God of Israel is the only true God. In addition, they will know that the Lord, not weapons of war or a human instrument, is the true Deliverer, a fact already understood by Jonathan (14:6). "The battle" belongs to him alone (2Ch 20:15). David concludes by warning that God would give "you" (pl.) into "our" (pl.) hands, thus reminding Goliath of his own earlier intention that their battle was indeed representative warfare, the results of which would have profound implications for the Philistines and Israelites as a whole (vv.8–9).

48–49 Undeterred, Goliath moved closer to "attack" David, who in turn wasted no time in running forward to "meet" him. One sling stone sufficed; it felled the Philistine, who toppled to the ground facedown (cf. 5:4).

50–51a With only a sling and a stone, not with a sword, David vanquished Goliath. As David had earlier "struck . . . and killed" wild animals threatening his father's sheep (v.35), so now he "struck down the Philistine and killed him." The actual killing did not take place with an Israelite sword; irony of ironies, David killed Goliath with his own sword.

This is a kophesh sword, common in the Near East and perhaps similar to the one Goliath used. Drawing by Rachel Bierling.

That David "ran" to the Philistine after felling him indicates that he wanted to kill Goliath before he regained consciousness. As he had promised (v.46), he cut off the Philistine's head (cf. 5:4). Goliath's head was later displayed as a trophy of war (v.54); his sword as well became a battlefield trophy (owned by David; cf. 21:9).

51b–54 The death of Goliath produced panic in the Philistine ranks, and they fled in disorder. Goliath's original defiant challenge of representative warfare was now forgotten or ignored or both. The men of "Israel" and "Judah" set out in hot pursuit, chasing the Philistines all the way to Gath (Goliath's hometown, v.4) and Ekron (about six miles north of Gath).

On returning from the slaughter of the Philistines, the Israelite army plundered the enemy camp. David's role in the plundering operation is perhaps summarized in v.54b, which informs us that he put Goliath's weapons in "his" own tent. He proceeded to put Goliath's head on public display. That he took it to Jerusalem, a city not yet under Israelite control (cf. 2Sa 5:6–10), perhaps was a way of putting the Jebusites on notice that just as the Philistine had fallen victim to David, Jerusalem's demise was only a matter of time. Perhaps under cover of night to avoid detection, David may have affixed Goliath's head to Jerusalem's wall (cf. 31:10).

55–58 The events recorded in v.54 postdate vv.55–58, as v.57 makes clear. Indeed, vv.55–56 synchronize with v.40, while vv.57–58 follow immediately on v.51a. Determined to know who the boy is, Saul says to Abner, "Find out." Abner brought David to Saul, and David identified himself as the son of "Jesse of Bethlehem."

4. The jealousy of Saul (18:1–30)

Up to the events recorded in ch. 18, Saul had apparently been favorably disposed toward David. The scene that unfolds in vv.6–9, however, changed all that.

1–4 Some time after David's conversation with Saul that concludes ch. 17, Saul's son Jonathan entered into a covenant with David. The ambiguous verb "loved" (GK 170) describes the covenantal relationship. That intimate friendship made Saul all the more determined to make David a permanent member of the royal household. The covenant between Jonathan and David was only one of many such agreements made over a long period of time, until David's kingship was firmly established (20:16–17; 23:18; 2Sa 3:13, 21; 5:3). And when Jonathan took off his robe (a symbol of the Israelite kingdom; cf. 15:27–28) and gave it to David, he was in effect transferring his own status as heir apparent to him. Saul had earlier tried to put his tunic and armor on David, but to no avail (17:38–39). Jonathan now gives his own tunic and armor (including a type of belt that was often used to hold a sheathed dagger; cf. 2Sa 20:8) to David, who apparently accepts it without further ado.

5 This verse anticipates and summarizes David's continued successes as a warrior after his victory over Goliath. Having experienced repeated military success himself (14:47), Saul appreciated its importance and honored David accordingly by giving him command over one or more army units. David's skill as a warrior "pleased" all the "people." After David became Israel's king, his ability to please his subjects would continue (2Sa 3:36).

6–8 When David the conquering hero returned to the Israelite camp (17:57) after killing Goliath, and after the Israelite army had defeated their Philistine counterparts (17:52–53), all the troops (including Saul) returned home to be greeted by their fellow countrymen. Such victory celebrations were normally led by women, who came to meet the triumphant warriors with "dancing" accompanied by "tambourines" (cf. Ex 15:20; Jdg 11:34) and "singing" (cf. Ex 15:21; Jdg 5:1). Saul's reaction to the contents of the refrain was not surprising: He became angry (cf. 20:7), assuming that David was receiving ten times more praise than himself. Saul now fears for his kingdom.

9–16 Saul's formerly positive attitude toward his young armor-bearer now became decidedly negative. His paranoia was exacerbated by the frequent arrival of "an evil spirit from God." To bring relief to Saul when an evil spirit was tormenting him, David would play the harp (16:15–16, 23; cf. 19:9).

There would be at least one other time (cf. "twice," v.11) when Saul would try to pin David to the wall with a spear (19:10). Although Jonathan at first could not believe that Saul was determined to kill David (20:9), Saul's attempt to impale even his own son finally convinced him (20:32–33).

Apparently fearful because God was with David but had "left" him (cf. esp. 16:13–14), Saul "sent away" David. He made him commander of a "thousand." His purpose was sinister: He intended to place David at the head of the front rank of troops, where he would be sure to be killed by the Philistines (v.17; cf. 2Sa 11:14–15). David's military exploits, possible only because the Lord was "with him," bound him all the more closely to "Israel and Judah" in covenant relationship. But Saul became increasingly afraid of David.

17–19 As a further means of assuring David's death at the hands of the Philistines, Saul offered him the distraction of his "older daughter Merab" in marriage. But David declined to marry Merab and later became the husband of her younger sister Michal (vv.26–28), although David is never described as loving Michal.

Saul's mandate to David—essentially "be brave and fight"—echoed the common battle cries of those days (cf. 4:9). David had already proven himself to be just the sort of man that Saul was eager to press into service in his army (14:52). His duplicity, however, is evident in his intention to place him in situations that would guarantee his death at the hand of the Philistines.

20–26a Every time either Merab or Michal appears in this chapter, she is referred to as the "daughter" of Saul (vv.17, 19–20, 27–28). David's marriage to one or both could not escape the political implications of their being the daughters of the reigning king: If Saul (and Jonathan) should die, David's claim on the throne of Israel would be all the stronger. In addition, when political marriages were arranged, it was usually the daughter of the ostensibly weaker ruler who married the stronger (cf. Ge 34:9; 1Ki 3:1; 2Ch 18:1). David's relentless climb to Israel's throne was thus proceeding apace.

Michal's "love" for David parallels that of Jonathan (vv.1, 3) and perhaps carries the same covenantal nuances. What is certain is that these two siblings evidence more love to David than to their father.

In spite of David's plea of poverty as an excuse not to marry Michal, Saul would hear none of it. A mere "hundred Philistine foreskins" would suffice as compensation for her. In asking David to kill one hundred Philistines, Saul of course was hoping that David himself would be killed. Saul gave another reason, however, for his demand: that he might "take revenge" on his enemies by decimating them (cf. 14:24; Jdg 15:7). Ironically, David himself has become one of Saul's "enemies" (v.29; cf. also 19:17; 20:13; 24:4, 19; 25:26, 29).

26b–29 David's "men" (first mentioned in v.27) accompany him on this venture. The verbs "went out," "killed," and "brought" are singular in number, stressing David's leadership in fulfilling Saul's demand. "Presented," however, has a plural subject and involves David's men, without whose help he surely would have failed in the overall success. Saul, true to his word, gave his daughter to his enemy. The combination of the evidence of God's help for and presence with David and of Michal's love for David increased Saul's fear of David (cf. v.12), with the result that "he" (Saul) remained "his" (David's) enemy for the rest of his "days" (cf. 23:14).

30 The final verse of ch. 18 repeats the theme of David's success (cf. vv.5, 14–15). He soon proved that he was more than a match for the Philistine commanders; and even when they later joined in common cause against Saul, they would justifiably remain wary of David (29:3–4, 9).

5. David the refugee (19:1–24)

1–7 Although Saul is earlier described as desiring David's permanent residence at the palace (18:2), ch. 19 records the final break between the two men. Despite being Saul's wise and successful "servant," David is the object, not of the king's delight, but of his murderous intent, asking his servants and even his son Jonathan to find an opportunity to kill David. But Jonathan is "fond of" David and will therefore do everything in his power to save the life of his covenanted friend (cf. 18:1–3).

Jonathan tells David to "go into hiding and stay there." From this time on and for a long period of time, the man after God's own heart would be a hunted fugitive. Jonathan's personal interest in helping David is underscored by his agreement to stand "with" his father as David's advocate (cf. v.4). The venue was the "field" where David was hiding, perhaps not far from Saul's fortress in Gibeah. Jonathan further promised to keep David fully informed (cf. 20:10).

The plea of Jonathan in vv.4–5 begins and ends with his hope that Saul would not "do wrong to" David, especially since the latter had not "wronged" the king (cf. also 24:11). Jonathan further reminds his father that David's deeds have helped Saul, that David "took his life in his hands" in Goliath's challenge, and that Saul himself had been pleased with the outcome (17:55–58). There is therefore no reason to kill "an innocent man," and such a crime could only bring bloodguilt on Saul (Dt 21:8–9).

Jonathan's rebuke of his father brought him to his senses, at least temporarily: He "listened to" Jonathan and took the most solemn of all oaths (cf. 14:39), promising that David would not be put to death—a promise that he quickly forgot (v.11). In the meantime, however, David was once again made a member of Saul's court in good standing (cf. 16:21; 18:2).

8–10 David's continued military success against the Philistines evoked the repetition of a familiar scene (see 16:14, 16; 18:10–11).

11–17 Tradition claims vv.11–17 as the original setting of Ps 59. Although the mission of Saul's men was to kill David "in the morning," God's strength and love preserved him "in the morning" (Ps 59:16).

The human agent assuring David's rescue was Michal, his loving wife (18:20, 28). After warning him to flee the home they shared, she helped him escape by lowering him "through a window" (cf. Jos 2:15; 2Co 11:33). To give David time to put sufficient distance between himself and his pursuers, Michal fashioned a crude dummy to take his place in his bed. She further stalled for time by telling Saul's men that her husband was ill, thus implying that they should not disturb him.

Michal's dummy is described as "an idol," a Hebrew word that is usually translated "household gods" (GK 9572). Since these gods are presumably always small (Ge 31:19, 34–35; et al.), the dummy was almost certainly not a single, man-sized idol. Michal probably piled clothing, carpets, or the like on David's bed and covered it with a garment, allowing only goats' hair at the head to show. She did not place the household idols "in" the bed but "beside" it, to enhance the impression of David's illness.

Michal's ruse worked to perfection; Saul's men were deceived. Saul, however, not satisfied with their report, sent his men back for another look, this time with orders to "bring [David] up" to Gibeah, bed and all, so that he might be killed there. By the time they arrived, of course, David was long gone.

In v.5 Saul's son asks him "why" he would want to kill David, and in v.17 Saul asks his daughter "why" she would "deceive" him and keep David from being killed. Michal tells Saul that David had warned her that if she did not let him flee he would kill her. Saul's own words identify David as his mortal "enemy" (cf. 18:29), barring forever his return to Saul's court at Gibeah. David's days as an outlaw, now begun in earnest, would continue until Saul's death.

18–24 Verse 18 reverts to the time when David had escaped after Michal's warning (v.12). He went to Ramah, Samuel's hometown, to inform the prophet about what Saul had done. Saul heard where David was and, in relentless pursuit, sends men to Naioth to capture him. The Spirit of God, however, protects David by causing three successive contingents of Saul's messengers to prophesy under a divinely induced trance (see 10:5).

Finally realizing that his men were not going to apprehend David, Saul took matters into his own hands by going to Ramah himself. As soon as he found out the exact whereabouts of Samuel and David, Saul continued on his way and began "prophesying" himself, after receiving an accession of the Spirit of God. His laying aside of his robe is symbolic of his rule, demonstrating once again his forfeiture of any claim to be Israel's king.

In addition, the rhetorical question demanding a negative answer—"Is Saul also among the prophets?"—underscores that forfeiture and thus takes an ironic twist: To question the genuineness of Saul's prophetic behavior was to question his legitimacy as king of Israel. The use of this proverb in 10:11–12 and now here brackets the narrative descriptions of Saul's first and last encounters with Samuel as well as with the Spirit of God. Neither legitimate king nor genuine prophet, Saul continues to stumble toward his doom at the hands of the Philistines, when he will be "stripped" of his garments for the last time (31:8–9).

6. Jonathan's friendship (20:1–42)

1–4 David's flight from Saul at Naioth takes him back to the Gibeah fortress and to his friend Jonathan, the only one he can trust. David wants to know the nature of the terrible sin he has supposedly committed that would bring on such frantic pursuit of him. Jonathan, trusting son as well as loyal friend, thought it incredible that Saul really intended to harm David (vv.2, 9; cf. also Saul's oath in 19:6)—until it became painfully obvious to him (v.33). Jonathan encouraged David by assuring him that Saul did nothing without "confiding in me."

David, however—more sensitive to Saul's unpredictability and changes of mood—responds by suggesting that he go and hide in the field. He swears with the most solemn of oaths that there is "only a step" between him and death at the hands of Saul. David affirms that Saul, who knows of the high regard in which Jonathan holds David (cf. v.29), does not want his son to know of his evil designs on David's life or he would be "grieved."

5–7 David's plan is simple: If Saul accepts Jonathan's explanation for David's absence from the forthcoming New Moon festival celebration, then David is safe; but if Saul becomes angry, then Jonathan will know that Saul is bent on harming David. David would hide in a "field" (near Saul's fortress in Gibeah) until the evening of the third day, by which time he would presumably expect to receive word from Jonathan concerning Saul's reaction toward his absence from the festival.

David's excuse for not attending is relayed by Jonathan to Saul in vv.28–29. David's desire to participate in an "annual sacrifice" with his family would not have been considered unusual (1:21; 2:19). During Samuel's boyhood days the normal venue was Shiloh (1:3), the site of the tabernacle. By David's time, however, Shiloh had been destroyed (see 4:11), and the tabernacle had no fixed location. Thus it was only to be expected that annual sacrifices would be offered in the celebrants' hometowns.

Understandably, David was risking Saul's wrath by pretending to substitute a competing festival for the one the king had invited him to. David surely was not serious in asserting that Saul's ready agreement to allow him to go to Bethlehem would mean that he would then be back in the king's good graces. David knew that Saul was determined to kill him; and although Jonathan had not yet brought himself to admit that cold fact (vv.9, 13), he soon would (v.33).

8–17 Reminding Jonathan of the covenant that they had made (18:3), David asks him to demonstrate covenant loyalty ("kindness"; GK 2876). David voiced his preference for dying at the hand of his covenanted friend Jonathan instead of his sworn enemy Saul. But Jonathan avowed that if he had "the least inkling" that his father intended to harm David, he would surely tell his friend. David, still wary, wants to know whether Jonathan would really tell him if Saul answered "harshly."

David and Jonathan went to the field "together," using the privacy the field afforded to reaffirm their undying loyalty. In accord with David's wishes to learn of Saul's response by "the evening of the day after tomorrow" (v.5), Jonathan promises on oath to send David word no later than that time—whether the news is favorable or unfavorable. In Jonathan's closing statement, he acknowledges David's divine calling and recognizes that David, not he himself, will be the next king of Israel.

Jonathan has David reaffirm his side of the covenant they have made. Covenant friendship is the basis of Jonathan's plea that neither he nor his descendants be executed by David after he becomes king. By now Jonathan surely perceives that among David's "enemies" is his own father, Saul (cf. 18:29; 19:17). Thus Jonathan extends in perpetuity his previous covenant with David to his house/family/descendants.

18–23 Jonathan's suggested ruse begins by echoing the time and place of the venue that David had originally proposed (v.5). He agrees that David will be "missed" because his seat will be "empty." On the third day David is to go to the field where he was hiding. There he is to "wait" by a stone called Ezel. Jonathan then goes on to explain how the message of Saul's reaction to David's absence will be communicated. If the arrows are beyond where the boy is at the time of Jonathan's shout, then David's life is in danger, and he must flee in response to the will of "the LORD."

24–34 Playing out the charade to humor his friend, David hid in the field. When the celebrants gathered for the New Moon festival, Saul took his customary seat "by the wall," where he could feel relatively secure from surprise attack. Jonathan and Abner, Saul's army commander (and cousin) (14:50; 17:55), occupied places of honor at the table, but David's place was "empty" (as Jonathan and David had planned, v.18).

When David did not appear on the first day of the New Moon festival, Saul assumed that something had happened to make him "ceremonially unclean" (cf. Lev 15:16, 18) and therefore disqualified from participating in a religious feast (cf. Nu 9:6). But when David's seat was empty on the second day also, Saul naturally wanted to know why. In referring to David as the "son of Jesse" (cf. also 22:7–9, 13, and esp. 25:10), Saul probably intended at least a mild insult.

Jonathan responded to Saul's question essentially as he and David had discussed. As David had feared (v.7), Saul became violently angry when Jonathan told him the reason for David's absence. For all intents and purposes, Jonathan and David were indistinguishable to Saul as he exploded. Saul curses Jonathan by a vile epithet hurled at his son. He accuses Jonathan of having "sided with" David, and that not only to his own shame but also the shame of the "mother who bore you."

Saul further reminded Jonathan that so long as David remained alive, neither Jonathan nor Jonathan's kingdom could survive. History would prove Saul's fears to be prophetic beyond his worst nightmares: Although the kingdom of Saul and his son would not be established (13:13–14), the kingdom of David and his son would be (2Sa 7:16, 26; 1Ki 2:12, 46).

Saul's demand for David's death brings a predictable response from Jonathan: "Why?" (cf. 19:5). Saul, though placated before (19:6), would not be denied this time. Not having David as his target, Saul tried to pin David's surrogate Jonathan to the wall with his spear. Jonathan needed no further convincing that Saul indeed intended to kill David (cf. v.7) and that the spear had really been meant for his covenanted friend. In Saul's eyes, Jonathan and David had momentarily become one.

It was Jonathan's turn to fly into a rage. Knowing of his father's murderous designs on and mistreatment of David caused Jonathan to be "grieved" (GK 6772; see David's statement in v.3). On the second day of the New Moon festival, neither David nor Jonathan ate at the king's table (vv.29, 34).

35–40 Jonathan had told David to wait by the stone Ezel on the second day of the New Moon festival "toward evening" (v.19). The boy Jonathan takes with him (vv.21–22) is "small" and thus less likely to ask embarrassing questions about the orders he is given.

Jonathan tells the boy to find the "arrows" he shoots; but, since his aim is true, he discovers that he needs to shoot only one "arrow." The arrow's landing beyond the running lad, loudly confirmed by Jonathan so that David would be sure to hear it, was a signal to David that it was God's will for him to remain a fugitive from Saul (v.22). After the boy retrieved the arrow, Jonathan sent him back to town with all the weapons, assuming (and doubtless hoping) that David might want a private moment to bid his friend farewell.

41–42 Getting up from his hiding place near "the stone," David bowed down more than once to acknowledge Jonathan's (covenant) superiority. Jonathan's "Go in peace" reflects the "safe(ly)" of vv.7, 13, 21 and is generally spoken by a superior to an inferior (cf. 1:17; 25:35). At the same time Jonathan magnanimously uses the emphatic "we" as he reminds David of their mutual and everlasting oath of friendship (cf. vv.17, 23), sworn "in the name of the LORD." The covenant between Jonathan and David included their "descendants forever" (cf. v.15; cf. also 24:21).

The two friends parted after Jonathan's farewell speech. Apart from one other brief meeting (23:16–18), this was the last time they would see each other.

7. David and the priest of Nob (21:1–9)

Chapters 21–22 apparently record events later than those in the preceding chapters since by this time David has gathered around him a sizable body of "men" (21:2, 4–5; 22:6) and has become their "leader" (22:2).

1–6 David, needing help in his continued flight from Saul, went to Nob, where there was a large contingent of priests (22:11, 18–19); it may have been the location of the tabernacle. Ahimelech, one of the more prominent of Nob's priests and mentioned several times in these chapters, "trembled" when he "met" David, thus fearing his reputation and perhaps also recognizing his authority (cf. 16:4).

Ahimelech's two questions—"Why are you alone?" and "Why is no one with you?"—may seem to be saying much the same thing, but David answers them separately. He is alone because there is a secret matter that he wishes to discuss with the priest, and his men are not with him because he will meet them later.

David next asks Ahimelech two questions (vv.3, 8), each of which is followed by the priest's answer (vv.4, 9a) and then David's response (vv.5, 9b). The first question is, "What do you have on hand?" David follows it up with a request: "Give me five loaves of bread"—a modest amount at best (cf. 17:17).

Echoing David's request, Ahimelech tells him what he has and does not have "on hand": No "ordinary" bread is available, but "there is" some "consecrated" (lit., "holy") bread that David and his men may eat. There was a condition, however: The men must not recently have had sexual relations with women, which would have rendered them ceremonially unclean (Ex 19:14–15; Lev 15:18) and therefore temporarily unfit to partake of the holy food. David assured Ahimelech that women had indeed been "kept" from himself and his men, and they are thus clean.

Satisfied with David's rationale, Ahimelech gives him the bread of the (divine) "Presence." Such bread, after it had performed its symbolic function, became "a most holy part" of the customary share given to the priests, who were to eat it in a "holy" place (Lev 24:9). Since priestly perquisites were for priests and their families only (cf. Ex 29:32–33; Lev 22:10–16), how could Ahimelech in good conscience give the consecrated bread to David and his men, who were not priests? The answer provided by Jesus (Mt 12:1–8; Mk 2:23–28; Lk 6:1–5) seems to be that human need may take precedence over ceremonial law.

7 Doeg the Edomite, perhaps a mercenary pressed into service as a result of Saul's war(s) against Edom (14:47), is introduced parenthetically in anticipation of his sinister role later (22:18–19). He had been detained "before the LORD" (i.e., at the tabernacle). His official role in Saul's employ was as his "head shepherd."

8–9 David's request for bread (v.3) is followed by one for weapons. What is not in his own hand he hopes is in Ahimelech's. The urgency of the "king's business" is David's excuse for his lack of weapons. As in v.2, the identity of the king remains shrouded in studied ambiguity.

The only weapon Ahimelech has to offer to David is the sword of Goliath, whom—as was apparently widely known—David had killed (cf. 17:2, 19, 48–51). Although he first took the giant's sword as part of his share of the Philistine plunder (17:54), he must have eventually brought it to the sanctuary of the Lord. Ahimelech thus tells David that it is in a storage place behind the "ephod," where David can find it protected in a "cloth" (cf. Ex 12:34; Jdg 8:25).

8. David the fugitive: Gath, Adullam, Mizpah (21:10–22:5)

10–15 Immediately after departing from Nob with the sword of Goliath, David went to Gath (ironically Goliath's hometown, 17:4), possibly to seek employment as a mercenary soldier. The king of Gath was Achish son of Maoch (27:2). Whatever David's intentions in going to Gath, the "servants" of Achish were sufficiently impressed by David's reputation—as reflected in the ditty composed after he and Saul had defeated the Philistines (18:7; cf. 29:4–5)—to be wary of him. David took the servants' words seriously. Having fled "from" Saul, he was now very much afraid "of" Achish. Sensing danger, David extricates himself from the situation by feigning madness. The manifestations of David's pretended insanity were "making marks" on the doors of the (city) gate and letting saliva run down his beard—hardly the picture of a recently anointed king!

Achish has seen enough. Sarcastically declaring that he already has sufficient madmen of his own, he makes it clear that he wants nothing more to do with this Israelite refugee. David's deception of Achish worked—as it would again (ch. 27) and again (ch. 29).

22:1–2 Leaving Gath David "escaped" (a reference to his continuing flight from Saul; cf. 27:1) to a cave near Adullam. His brothers and other family members went "down" (presumably from the higher ground at Bethlehem, their hometown) to join him there. They may have feared royal reprisal if they remained in Bethlehem, where Saul would be sure to come looking for the fugitive David.

Those who had gathered around David numbered about "four hundred" (in itself a formidable force; cf. 25:13; 30:10, 17) even in the beginning; the ranks of David's men eventually swelled to as many as six hundred (23:13; 27:2; 30:9). United by adverse circumstances of all sorts, they were attracted to the charismatic David as their "leader" (GK 8569; cf. 2Sa 4:2; 1Ki 11:24). Such bands of malcontents and other social misfits were not uncommon in the ancient Near East (cf. Jdg 9:4; 11:3).

3–5 The "forest of Hereth" was located on one of the heights of the tableland east of the Dead Sea. It was understandable that David should seek refuge for his "father and mother" in Moab (which he would later conquer, 2Sa 8:2), since Moabite blood flowed through the veins of his ancestors on his great-grandmother's side (Ru 1:4; 4:13, 16–17). In being solicitous of the needs of his parents, David was following common ancient practice (Jos 2:13, 18; 6:23; 1Ki 19:20) as well as obeying the fifth commandment (Ex 20:12; Dt 5:16). The location of David's "stronghold" is unknown, though it could not have been the Cave of Adullam since that "stronghold" was not in Judah. David's true stronghold, of course, was ultimately God himself (2Sa 22:2–3).

As the prophet Samuel had helped and advised Saul, so from now on "the prophet Gad," among others, would perform the same functions for David (cf. 2Sa 24:11). It was through such prophets that the word of God was mediated to Israel's leaders during the days of the monarchy.

9. The slaughter of the priests of Nob (22:6–23)

6–8 Saul knew both David's whereabouts and the identity of the men with him. They "had been discovered." Saul demands of his fellow Benjamites an answer to the question of whether the "son of Jesse" can provide for them more possessions and privileges than they already have as associates of Saul himself. Would David be able to make them "commanders of thousands and commanders of hundreds" (which, if true, would mean that David had become king; cf. 8:12)? After all, David himself was merely a "leader" of a few hundred men.

In his paranoia Saul assumes that all his men—indeed, the priest Ahimelech as well (v.13)—are co-conspirators with David against him. Saul complains that no one "tells" him about his son Jonathan's perceived acts of treachery: making a covenant with David (cf. 18:3; 20:16) and inciting David to ambush Saul. All this, Saul insists, demonstrates his servants' lack of concern for their master.

9–10 Like Saul's officials (v.6), Doeg the Edomite was "standing" near him. Imitating Saul's reference (v.7) to David as the (despised) "son of Jesse," Doeg informs Saul that he witnessed David's meeting with Ahimelech, "son of Ahitub" (see 14:3), at Nob (see 21:7) and intimates that Ahimelech had "inquired" of the Lord for David, a fact not mentioned in 21:1–9 but readily admitted to by the priest (v.15). In addition, Doeg continues, Ahimelech gave David "provisions" and "the sword of Goliath the Philistine." Doeg is suggesting that Ahimelech was committing treasonable acts by assisting Saul's enemy.

11–17 Doeg's report to Saul resulted in the king's sending for Ahitub's "whole" priestly family, who "all" responded by coming from Nob to Gibeah, scarcely two miles to the northwest. Upon their arrival Saul addressed Ahimelech in words that echo vv.7–8. In response Ahimelech's "Yes, my lord" is appropriately servile and obedient.

Saul's retort combines the elements of Doeg's report in v.10 and the substance of his own accusations against his officials in v.8. But whereas Saul was of the opinion that his men had conspired among themselves, he insists that Ahimelech is overtly in league with his enemy David. Ahimelech's response to Saul is polite but firm. He defends David's character by suggesting that none of the king's servants is as "loyal" as David (cf. 2:35). After all, David is Saul's "son-in-law" (cf. 18:18). In addition, he is the captain of Saul's "bodyguard" (cf. 2Sa 23:23) and "highly respected" (cf. 9:6).

Having evaluated David's reputation positively to his own satisfaction, Ahimelech emphatically denies that this was the first time he had consulted God on David's behalf. Ahimelech claims to know nothing at all of the crimes that Saul attributes to David. Believing Ahimelech to be a liar, however, Saul tells him that he and his family "will surely die" (cf. 14:39, 44).

Saul then issues orders for the execution of the priests of Nob. He first commands the "guards" at his side to kill them for their failure to tell Saul about David's whereabouts and perhaps also for being in league with David. But Saul's orders fall on deaf ears, thwarted by the religious scruples of his officials. The officials are adamant: They are "not willing" to kill the Lord's priests.

18–19 When Saul, not to be denied, issues his ominous order to Doeg, the doom of the priests is sealed. An Edomite, Doeg has no qualms about massacring Israelite priests. Not satisfied with killing the eighty-five priests of Nob, Doeg extends the slaughter by putting the entire town "to the sword" (cf. the similar threat against Jerusalem in 2Sa 15:14). The doleful list of victims at the end of the verse recalls once again the contrast to Saul's earlier reluctance to totally destroy the Amalekites (see 15:3). David's response to this massacre is found in Ps 52.

20–23 Probably unknown to Saul at the time, one son of Ahimelech, Abiathar, "escaped" and joined David's fugitive band. He performed priestly functions for David for the rest of David's life (cf. 23:6, 9; 30:7; 2Sa 8:17), eventually to be replaced by Zadok under Solomon's reign (1Ki 2:27, 35). When he informs David about Saul's massacre, David tells him that he had anticipated Doeg's act of betrayal ever since their earlier encounter at Nob (cf. 21:7). David then confesses that he himself, however unwittingly, is ultimately accountable for the massacre. He therefore offers refuge to Abiathar, telling him not to "be afraid" (cf. 23:17). Saul now seeks the life of both of them; so they become partners in flight. King-elect and priest-elect have joined forces as fellow fugitives.

10. The rescue of Keilah (23:1–6)

1–6 The Philistine threat returns to menace a town in Judah. Just as Saul had saved Israel from "those who had plundered" them (see 14:48), so also David would save the people of Keilah from the Philistines who were "looting" their threshing floors, which often served as storage areas (2Ki 6:27; Joel 2:24).

David's repeated inquiries to God concerning whether he should go to Keilah and attack the Philistines are reminiscent of similar inquiries and responses during the period of the judges (Jdg 20:23, 28). Such inquiries usually made use of the sacred lots, the Urim and Thummim, stored in the priestly ephod (cf. v.6). When David's men learned that the Lord had responded affirmatively to his first inquiry, they demurred out of fear.

David therefore inquired of the Lord again, and this time God told him that he himself would guarantee David's victory over the Philistines. The promise of divine help apparently reassured David's men, who then joined him in defeating the enemy. Thus David "saved" the people of Keilah, as God had commanded and promised. Once again, the Lord chooses not the rejected king Saul but the fugitive king-elect to deliver his people from the Philistines.

11. The pursuit of David (23:7–29)

In contrast to David's seeking and receiving divine guidance, which brings him victory (vv.1–6), Saul relies totally on human messages and reports (cf. vv.7, 13, 19, 25, 27), which bring him frustration and failure (vv.7–29).

7–13 Whether sincerely or in a false display of piety, Saul affirms that God has "handed" David over to him (cf. v.20). Saul assumes that David is trapped, that he has "imprisoned himself" in a walled town from which there may be only one exit. Preparing to attack David at Keilah, Saul "called up" his troops.

David soon found out about the evil that Saul was "plotting" against him. He therefore told Abiathar to bring the ephod so that he might use the Urim and Thummim to inquire of the Lord (cf. vv.1–6; 30:7–8). David begins and concludes his plea with the words "O LORD, God of Israel," acknowledging the Lord as the true Sovereign of his people. He expresses his concern that Saul "plans" to destroy Keilah because of him.

Although David asks two questions, the Lord answers only the second one. David therefore repeats the first one, this time expressing his concern for the safety of his men also. The Lord now answers it as well. That the citizens of Keilah would even think of surrendering their deliverer and his men to Saul might seem like the height of ingratitude, but perhaps they feared royal retribution if they harbored fugitives. In any case, David and his men leave Keilah and frequently change their location. Although since the last count (22:2) the number of his men has increased to "about six hundred" (cf. also 25:13; 27:2; 30:9), David understandably feels that they are still no match for Saul and his army (cf. 24:2). For his part, Saul changes his mind about going to Keilah when he learns that the fugitives have left.

14–24a Knowing that Saul was relentlessly continuing his search for him, David hid in various "strongholds" in the Desert of Ziph and elsewhere. In spite of God's gracious and providential care, David was afraid, because Saul came out to take his life (cf. 20:1; 22:23). So Saul's son Jonathan went to Horesh to remind David of the Lord's concern for him and to encourage him. Jonathan said, "Don't be afraid, because" Saul will not "lay a hand on you."

Jonathan vigorously continues to encourage David: "You will be king," while "I will be second to you"—an inevitable truth that Saul also knows. "The two of them"—as equals—then make a covenant in the presence of the Lord, perhaps invoking his blessing and taking an oath in his name. It is better to understand this covenant as a fresh, bilateral covenant defining their new relationship (see 18:3) rather than simply renewing their previous covenant. Having comforted his friend, Jonathan returns home to Gibeah—perhaps never to see David again.

Certain "Ziphites" go to Gibeah and reveal David's whereabouts, perhaps to ingratiate themselves to Saul (cf. the title of Ps 54, whose traditional setting is the narrative in vv.19–24a). The Ziphites invite Saul to come to them "whenever it pleases you," at which time they promise to hand David over to him.

Saul's reply to the Ziphites, "The LORD bless you," is a stereotyped expression that tells nothing about his piety (or lack of it; see v.7). Always the investigator relying on human ability, Saul tells the Ziphites to "find out" (cf. 14:38; lit., "know and see") where David usually hides. David will later hurl Saul's phrase back at him (24:11) in protestation of his own innocence.

Saul is determined to track David down no matter where he goes or what it takes; he will not permit the "crafty" David to outwit him. The Ziphites are to pinpoint every potential hiding place that David might use and then report back to Saul "with definite information." Obedient to their presumed overlord, they return to Ziph and begin to search for David and his men.

24b–29 On the run as usual (v.13), David and his men go to "the Desert of Maon, in the Arabah south of Jeshimon." Like the Desert of Ziph (see v.14), the Desert of Maon was named for a town that had been allotted to Judah in the hill country west of the Dead Sea after Joshua's conquest of Canaan (Jos 15:48, 55).

Upon hearing that Saul had once again embarked on his relentless "search" for him (cf. v.14), David retreated with his men to "the rock" in the Desert of Maon. Informed of this (probably by the Ziphites), Saul pursued his quarry. He probably divided "his forces" into two groups so that they could attack both flanks of David's men "on the other side" of the mountain, thus "closing in" on them. Although David had been able to "get away" from Saul on several occasions (cf. 18:11; 19:10), it appears that this time all was lost—at least from a human standpoint. Providentially, however, a messenger arrived with the unsettling news that Philistines were raiding part of Saul's sovereign territory. Sensing a greater threat from the Philistines, Saul had no choice but to postpone his pursuit of David. The "rock" therefore was called "Sela Hammahlekoth," "The rock of parting," apparently referring to the timely retreat of Saul's men from David's men on that occasion.

God used the distraction of Philistines, rather than the aid of Ziphites or other Judahites, to rescue David from the tentacles of Saul. For his part David moved himself and his men to strongholds in the vicinity of the En Gedi oasis (cf. SS 1:14; Eze 47:10, 18–19; 48:28).

12. Sparing Saul's life (24:1–22)

1–7 On a previous occasion when the Israelites "returned from chasing the Philistines," they plundered their camp (17:53). This time, after Saul "returned from pursuing the Philistines" (cf. 23:28), he was told about David's general location and set out with "three thousand chosen men" (see also 26:2) that outnumbered David's motley band five to one. The term "chosen men" (GK 1047) refers to warriors who were especially skilled (Jdg 20:16) and courageous (Jdg 20:34).

David hid in a cave in En Gedi, perhaps in Crags of the Wild Goats—a lush area with waterfalls, surrounded by the Judean desert.

The "sheep pens" Saul came to probably consisted of one or more enclosures made of low stone walls flanking the entrance to a cave. Thus Saul would have entered the pens to gain access to the cave. His purpose in going into the cave was to "relieve himself" (cf. Dt 23:12–13; Jdg 3:24).

Unknown to Saul, David and his men were "far back in" that very cave; compare Pss 57 and 142 in this connection. In both psalms David cries out for divine "mercy" (57:1; 142:1), and in both he affirms that the Lord, not the cave, is his true "refuge" (57:1; 142:5).

David's men see in the presence of Saul inside the cave a golden opportunity to get rid of him once and for all: David now has a chance to eliminate his "enemy" (vv.4, 19; see also 18:29). Out of respect for Saul's divine anointing, and therefore not willing to kill him, but at the same time wanting to let him know that he was not in control of his own destiny, David crept up behind him "unnoticed." In cutting off the corner of Saul's robe, David may have been symbolically depriving Saul of his royal authority and transferring it to himself (cf. v.11).

That David was "conscience-stricken" for what he had done is to be understood as recognition on his part that he had sinned (cf. 2Sa 24:10). Using a solemn oath, David—himself also the Lord's anointed—affirms to his men that he will never do harm to his master Saul, who is "the LORD's anointed" (used seven times in chs. 24 and 26).

8–15 The brief apologia of David recorded here should be compared with that of Samuel (ch. 12) in terms of persuasive power. Moreover, David's speech is echoed at the end of ch. 26, where it functions in much the same way as that of Samuel, serving as a kind of farewell speech to Israel's king. After Saul left the cave (v.7), David, after a short time, himself emerged and "called out" to Saul (the verb often implies physical distance between sender and receiver, as in 20:37; GK 7924). Addressing Saul as his acknowledged superior, David "bowed down and prostrated himself with his face to the ground" (cf. 28:14).

David begins his protestation and defense with a "Why?" He assures Saul that he is not intent on "harming" him, nor is he guilty of "wrongdoing." Unlike those who spread false rumors about his murderous plans, David refuses to listen to all who would incite him to vengeance against Saul. Indeed, the king himself knows that David has just now had a unique opportunity to kill him, but David has refused to seize it.

Pressing his advantage, David says to Saul, "See . . . look . . . recognize." When he addresses Saul as "my father," he is probably not simply using a term of respect but is reminding the king that he is, after all, Saul's son-in-law (cf. 18:17–27; 22:14) and thus holds him in high regard (Saul will later respond to David as "my son," v.16).

Continuing to protest his innocence, David wants Saul to "understand and recognize" that he is not guilty of "wrongdoing," a plea that he will repeat later (26:18). David reminds Saul that he has not "wronged" him (cf. also Jonathan's strong objections to his father in 19:4). There is therefore no reason, says David, that Saul should be "hunting" him down. Unwilling to submit their dispute to human arbitration, David invokes the help of the Lord, the only fair and impartial Judge (cf. Jdg 11:27). But no matter what happens, David assures his king, "My hand will not touch you."

David concludes his apology by entreating the Lord to decide between himself and Saul. Confident of the outcome, David affirms his belief that the Lord will "uphold" his "cause" against Saul, using a phrase that he would use again after the death of Nabal, Saul's alter ego (25:39). He prays to the Lord to "vindicate me [by delivering me] from" Saul (v.15).

16–22 It is no more necessary to deny Saul's sincerity here than in 26:21, 25. In each case Saul begins with the plaintive "Is that your voice, David my son?" (v.16; 26:17; cf. also 26:21, 25). Saul, distressed and conscience-stricken, "wept aloud" when confronted by David's innocence. Saul says to his son-in-law David, "You are more righteous than I." He then draws a contrast between David's exemplary conduct and his own deplorable actions. David has treated Saul "well." Saul admits that what David has done to him is "good," and Saul desires that the Lord will reward David "well" for what he has done, since no one ever lets his enemy get away "unharmed." Saul admits to David, "I have treated you badly."

Saul's recognition that the Lord had "delivered" (GK 6037) him into David's hands is later echoed by Abishai (26:8). Understanding that David has every right not to let his "enemy" (cf. v.4) get away, Saul—with words reminiscent of Boaz's to Ruth (Ru 2:12)—prays that God will reward David richly for what he has done.

Earlier Samuel had told Saul that, because of his rebellion against God, his "kingdom" would not endure but would be given to a man after God's own heart (13:14). Now Saul emphatically acknowledges that David will be ruler over the "kingdom" of Israel (cf. also 15:28; 18:8; 23:17).

Like Jonathan before him, Saul is concerned that David not "cut off" his "descendants." And as David had sworn that he would show unfailing kindness to Jonathan and his family (20:14–17), so now he swears that he will not harm Saul's offspring or wipe out his name. Having secured David's oath, Saul returns to Gibeah. David, however, wisely continues to distrust Saul and therefore retreats to his "stronghold" (see 22:4–5).

13. David, Nabal, and Abigail (25:1–44)

1a Loved and respected by his people, Samuel was mourned by them at his death (cf. 28:3). Notices of the burials of Samuel and Saul in v.1 and 31:13 frame the final seven chapters of the book.

1b–3 The difference in social status between David and Nabal becomes immediately apparent: David "moved down" to the "Desert of Maon," but he told his men to "go up" (v.5) to Nabal at "Carmel." Like David's later friend Barzillai (2Sa 19:32), Nabal was very "wealthy." Sheepshearing was a time for celebration (cf. 2Sa 13:23–24).

The contrast between Nabal (meaning "fool") and his wife Abigail (meaning "My [Divine] Father is joy") could scarcely be more stark. Not only "beautiful" (GK 3637 & 9307; cf. Ge 29:17; Est 2:7), Abigail was also "intelligent" (GK 3202 & 8507). Nabal, however, was "mean" (GK 8273)—and thus a polarity between "good" and "evil" is set up at the beginning of ch. 25. Together they underscore one of the major themes of the story: Good brings its own reward, while evil recoils on the head of the wicked.

The beautiful and intelligent Abigail, though mismatched with Nabal, is a perfect match for David, whose commendable qualities complement hers (cf. 16:12, 18). In all respects she is David's equal. In fact, she should perhaps be identified with one of David's two sisters, the only other Abigail mentioned in the Bible (1Ch 2:15–16). At the same time, since David was the son of Jesse, Abigail would then have been only his half sister, which would have made it possible for him to marry her (v.42; cf. Ge 20:12). If the two Abigails are thus identified, her first husband would have been Jether (2Sa 17:25; 1Ch 2:17)—perhaps Nabal's real name.

4–13 After hearing that Nabal is shearing sheep, David sends ten young men to him. David's message to Nabal begins by telling them to "greet him" in David's name (i.e., as his representative). They are instructed to wish him "well-being/welfare/peace/good health" (GK 8934). David continues in his persuasive tone as he seeks a favor from Nabal. He senses that sheep shearing time would put Nabal in a good mood, because it is a "festive" occasion. Utilizing the ancient equivalent of the protection racket, David observes that his men did not mistreat Nabal's shepherds or steal anything from them, perhaps implying that there were plenty of opportunities to do so (see also vv.14–16). David's concern for the welfare of Nabal's shepherds had in fact extended over a long period of time.

David's request that Nabal should "be favorable toward my young men" is the epitome of courtesy. He is simply requesting for himself and his men "whatever" supplies (primarily food; cf. v.11) Nabal might be willing to give them, since they depend on the generosity of others for the protection they provide (v.16).

Arriving in Carmel, David's men act as faithful messengers by reporting to Nabal David's message. Nabal's repeated "Who?" is uttered with scorn, like that of David with respect to Goliath (17:26). Nabal also uses "son of Jesse" in an insulting and belittling way, as did Saul before him. In so doing Nabal rejects David's courteous reference to himself as Nabal's "son."

Nabal's contention that "many servants are breaking away from their masters these days" is at least double-edged and perhaps even triple-edged. (1) He may be referring to David, who is fleeing from his master Saul;

(2) he may be subtly suggesting to David's servants that they would be well advised to break away from their master; and (3), ironically, he speaks better than he knows, since he will shortly find himself as a master whose servants break away (cf. vv.14–17). Nabal is even unwilling to give to David and his men "bread and water," the most basic food and drink (Nu 21:5; Dt 9:9, 18; 1Ki 13:8–9, 16–17)—much less the meat he had slaughtered for his workers.

Upon receiving Nabal's response, David's men "turned" (GK 2200) and reported back to David. His immediate reaction was to retaliate by arming himself and his men with swords—a poignant contrast to his earlier repudiation of the sword before his contest with Goliath (17:39, 45, 47). Splitting his six hundred men into two groups of unequal size, David sets out for Carmel with four hundred and leaves the rest behind with the "supplies."

14–19 Nabal's servant describes to Abigail the shoddy treatment David's men received at Nabal's hands. He especially stresses the physical proximity of Nabal's shepherds to David's men ("near them") during "the whole time" they were in the fields. Like the fortress "wall" enclosing a city, the protection provided by David and his men continued around the clock. The servant concludes his appeal by observing that no one can talk to Nabal, implying that perhaps his wife Abigail may be able to persuade him of the folly of his ways. Otherwise, disaster may happen.

Abigail's response to the servant's report was a "gift" (lit., "blessing," v.27; GK 1388) of substantial proportions for David. Nabal's sloth is more than compensated for by Abigail's speed in meeting David's needs. She "lost no time," she acted "quickly" by supplying him with "two hundred loaves of bread" in addition to large amounts of other provisions. "Cakes of raisins" and "cakes of pressed figs" were especially prized, not only for their sweetness and nutritive value, but also because they could be kept for some time without spoiling (cf. 30:1, 11–12).

20–31 Having sent her servants ahead with the provisions for David and his men, Abigail follows on a donkey, a common means of transportation in ancient times (Ex 4:20; Jos 15:18). She intercepts David near a mountain "ravine," an out-of-the-way place reminding us that he is still a hunted fugitive. David was feeling cheated by Nabal's action (or inaction). Although guaranteeing that none of his property was "missing" (cf. also vv.7, 15), David has been "paid . . . back evil for good." He was intending to retaliate by killing every male in Nabal's household by daybreak—although he later expresses his gratitude that the Lord (and Abigail) kept him from doing so (vv.33–34).

In preparation for responding at some length to David's threat against her husband and in contrast to Nabal's treatment of David and his men (vv.10–11), Abigail bows down respectfully before him. Her speech is a masterpiece of rhetoric, appealing not only to reason and the emotions, but also to her own credibility. Beginning with a formal introduction and ending with a formal conclusion, the main body of the speech treats matters of the past, present, and future.

Riding alone to meet a band of four hundred armed men bent on violence, the defenseless Abigail knows that she has very little time to change their minds. She immediately demonstrates an attitude of submission to David, referring to him as "my master" in every verse of her speech and to herself as "your servant" in all but vv.26, 29, and 30. The contrast between her attitude toward David and that of Nabal could hardly be more striking. Abigail pleads for an opportunity to "speak to" David.

To save Nabal's life, Abigail assumes his guilt (v.24). The urgency and insistence clearly detectable throughout her speech are modulated by a tone of courtesy and politeness. She characterizes Nabal as a "wicked man" and a "fool"; her action is wise and calculating, for David would hardly have been eager to marry (vv.39–40, 42) a woman known for disloyalty to her husband, even though wealthy and beautiful, since she would be a continual threat to his rule. At the same time her integrity prevents her from pulling any punches. Since Nabal is a "wicked man," one should "pay no attention" (cf. also 4:20) to him.

Abigail disavows having seen the "men" (v.25) David had sent to him (v.5). She senses that God has "kept" David from harming Nabal and his men, a truth that David later acknowledges (v.34). At the same time David asserts the important role of Abigail herself in keeping him from "bloodshed" (v.33), recognizing in her the mediator of the Lord's intentions. Since vengeance belongs to God alone (Dt 32:35), David must not avenge himself (vv.26, 31, 33) and so usurp God's prerogatives. Abigail expresses her desire that David's "enemies" (among whom Saul counts himself, 18:29; cf. also 26:8) and all who "intend to harm" him might "be like Nabal"—thus apparently anticipating the death of her husband and also, by implication, foreshadowing the death of Saul.

Though Nabal may be stingy, not so Abigail. She describes the generous supply of food that she brings to David and his men as a "gift" (GK 1388). Continuing to accept the blame for Nabal's folly (v.28), she begs David's forgiveness for her own "offense" and pleads with him not to do anything rash—anything that might endanger or even destroy the "lasting dynasty" that God will give him. Unlike the king desired by the people of Samuel's day, a king who would "fight our battles" (8:20), David is to be a man who "fights the LORD's battles."

Continuing to look into the future, Abigail alludes (v.30) to the Davidic covenant of 2Sa 7. She refers to the time when the Lord will have done for David "according to every good thing he promised." Although God has already "appointed him leader," a fact earlier announced to Saul by Samuel (see 13:14), David would not exercise effective rule over Israel until after Saul's death. In the meantime, however, Abigail does not want David to do anything to jeopardize his future or endanger his throne. Abigail ends her plea by asking that David "remember" her when the Lord "has brought . . . success" to him.

32–35 Although David was on his way to destroy Nabal's household, Abigail's sevenfold use of the divine name YHWH (vv.26 [bis], 28 [bis], 29, 30, 31) has perhaps reminded him of the spiritual dimensions of his calling. David sees in Abigail the Lord's envoy. He recognizes that "good judgment" is an admirable quality in a woman (cf. Pr 11:22). He also understands that God has used Abigail to keep him from bloodshed and from attempting to avenge himself. The oath "As surely as the LORD . . . lives" is frequently used where life and death hang in the balance (see 14:39). Mass killings of the kind that David had contemplated often occurred at night, giving point to his statement that not a male in Nabal's household would have survived till "daybreak" (cf. v.22; 14:36).

David then gratefully accepts Abigail's gift of food for himself and his men. He makes it clear that she has succeeded in assuaging his wrath: "Go . . . in peace." His final words must have been like music to her ears: "I have . . granted your request," guaranteeing that he would not be the instrument of Nabal's death.

36–38 Abigail went to Nabal's "house," doubtless in Carmel (cf. v.40), where his sheep shearing celebration was taking place. He was presiding at a banquet fit for a "king"—a cruel irony when it is remembered that his wife has just declared her allegiance to Israel's king-elect. At his feast Nabal was "in high spirits" from wine. Realizing that he was in no condition to understand what she might say to him, Abigail decided to tell him "nothing" until "daybreak"—the time by which, ominously, David had originally sworn to kill every male in Nabal's household (cf. also v.22).

As it turns out, Nabal's folly was his own worst enemy. By the next morning "Nabal was sober." Feeling that the time is now ripe, Abigail tells her husband "all these things"—perhaps the entire story of her meeting with David, but doubtless including the list of provisions that she had so generously given him and that Nabal would surely begrudge. The shock is too much for him in his materialistic greed. Nabal the "fool" now suffers from a heart that goes bad. Since the heart is the seat of courage, Nabal is depicted as a coward as well.

The description of Nabal's becoming "like a stone" should not be diagnosed as a specific illness but understood figuratively (cf. Ex 15:16). The narrator may be presenting Nabal as receiving a "heart of stone" in exchange for his heart of flesh (contrast Eze 36:2). Though not immediate, Nabal's death was not long in coming. After about ten days "the LORD struck" him. Thus Nabal "died" at God's hand.

39a David greets the news of Nabal's death with an outburst of praise (cf. v.32). As he had earlier entreated the Lord to "uphold" his "cause" against Saul (24:15), so now he expresses his gratitude to the Lord for having "upheld his cause" against this Saul-like person. The Lord's dealings with David and Nabal could hardly be more diverse: As for David, God has "kept his servant from doing wrong," while in Nabal's case he has "brought [his] wrongdoing down on his own head."

39b–43 Nabal now dead, David "sent" his servants to Abigail to "take" her to become his wife. Abigail, by no means unwilling, nevertheless continues to characterize herself as David's "maidservant." Adopting the same posture of servile obedience with which she had first met him (v.23), Abigail then expresses her readiness to go so far as to "wash the feet of my master's servants." Since foot-washing normally was a self-administered act (Ge 18:4; 19:2; 24:32; et al.), Abigail demonstrates her joyful willingness to be "slave of all" (Mk 10:44; cf. Jn 13:5–17). "Attended by her five maids," she hurries back with David's messengers to become his wife (see v.3).

Verse 43 calls attention to David's marriage to Ahinoam, which occurred before he took Abigail as his wife (Ahinoam is always mentioned before Abigail when the two names occur together; 27:3; 30:5; 2Sa 2:2; 3:2–3). The only other Ahinoam mentioned in the Bible is the wife of Saul (14:50), and thus possibly before David took Abigail to become his wife, he had already asserted his right to the throne of Israel by marrying Queen Ahinoam—a tactic perhaps hinted at in Nathan's speech to David (2Sa 12:8).

44 Whether or not Ahinoam of Jezreel is to be identified with the wife of Saul, he "had given" his daughter Michal, David's wife, to another man. The name of Michal's second husband was Paltiel, who was from Gallim.

14. Sparing Saul's life again (26:1–25)

1–5 This chapter narrates the final confrontation between Saul and David, and its speeches are animated by the mutual irreconcilability of the two men. Once again Saul goes "down" from the high ground at Gibeah with his "three thousand chosen men" (see 24:2) to the "Desert of Ziph," where he continues to "search . . . for" David. David, sensing that Saul has followed him to the desert, sends scouts to confirm that fact.

After his scouts have pinpointed the exact location of Saul's camp, David waits until Saul and his men have retired for the night and then goes to look over the situation for himself. Saul's apparent invulnerability is detailed: (1) Abner, his cousin (see 14:50–51) and the commander of his army, is lying beside him; (2) he is safely inside the "camp" (vv.5, 7); and (3) the rest of his army is encamped "around him" (v.7).

6–12 "Ahimelech the Hittite" (mentioned only here) and "Abishai son of Zeruiah, Joab's brother" are asked whether they are willing to join David to go down to Saul's camp. Zeruiah, David's sister, was the mother of Abishai and Joab (1Ch 2:15–16), who both figure prominently in 2 Samuel, especially after David becomes king following Saul's death. Portending his later importance, Abishai volunteers to go down with David into the camp of Saul.

The two men arrive after dark, when everyone is asleep, and leave before anyone wakes up (v.12). Since Saul and his men are in a "deep sleep" brought on by the Lord (cf. Ge 2:21; 15:12), David and Abishai can move about undetected and speak to one another without being heard. Like a scepter symbolizing the royal presence, a "spear" is stuck in the ground near Saul's head. Abishai, anxious to be rid of Saul once and for all, wants to kill him. He envisions himself as the instrument of divine deliverance: "Let me pin him to the ground." Not characterized by restraint, Abishai is always quick to act (cf. 2Sa 16:9–10; 19:21–23).

David does not allow any of his men to press their advantage against the unsuspecting Saul. Because he is the "LORD's anointed," no one—including David himself—is to "lay a hand on" him (vv.9, 11, 23; cf. 24:6, 10).

David intones the solemn oath—"As surely as the LORD lives" (cf. v.16). Then David describes potential ways that Saul might die: (1) The Lord will "strike" him (with a fatal disease), "or" (2) when his "time" comes he will die (i.e., a natural death), "or" (3) he will "perish" in battle. In any of these, of course, the Lord is the ultimate cause of Saul's death, because vengeance belongs to him (25:32, 39).

Reflecting the language of 24:6, David uses another oath to underscore his refusal to kill Saul. In 24:4 he had taken "a corner of Saul's robe," a symbol of royal authority. Here he orders Abishai to take Saul's spear (a symbol of his authority but also of death) and water jug (a symbol of life; cf. 1Ki 19:4–6). As Saul was unprotected and unsuspecting in 24:3, so also here—indeed, he and his men are unable to awaken because of divinely induced slumber. Thus David and Abishai, unseen and unheard, steal away into the night. Although Abishai doubtless obeyed David's command to take the spear and the water jug, he did so on David's behalf—and so the text attributes the act to David.

13–16 After leaving Saul's camp, David places a safe distance between himself and his enemy. Then David calls out to Saul's army in general and to its commander, Abner, in particular. Abner finally replies, "Who are you who calls to the king?" David's first two questions in v.15 seem to be scornful. His third question rebukes Abner for dereliction of duty, a failing in which he also implicates Abner's men. The "someone" who came to "destroy" the king was of course Abishai, whom David had already kept from doing so.

17–20 Saul's initial question—"Is that your voice, David my son?"—is a verbatim echo of 24:16. But whereas there David had addressed Saul not only as "my lord the king" (24:8) but also as "my father," here Saul is simply "my lord the king." Saul has already acknowledged David as his legitimate successor (24:20), and therefore David no longer needs the rejected "king" as his "father." David is firm in his conviction that he is innocent of any "wrong[doing]" (cf. 24:11). By deciding again not to "lay a hand" on the Lord's anointed, David refuses to make his guiltless hands guilty of wrongdoing.

In vv.19–20a David sets forth two possible sources of Saul's dogged pursuit of him. First, God may have "incited" Saul against him. Second, men may be at fault. In that case David pronounces a solemn oath against them: "May they be cursed before the LORD!" (cf. Jos 6:26). David's sense of urgency is underscored by his use of "now." He is concerned that his fugitive status would prevent his participation in "the LORD's inheritance" (i.e., the land of Israel). David thus prays that Saul will not cause him to die "far from the presence of the LORD"—in this case, in Philistia.

In a reprise of 24:14, David concludes his statement to Saul by stressing the incongruity of Saul's enterprise. The most powerful man in the land ("king of Israel") has taken it upon himself to "come out" (cf. also 23:15) to look for something trivial, something unworthy of his time and energy—a single "flea." Looking for a single flea is compared to hunting a single "partridge" in the mountains, something no one in his right mind would take the time or make the effort to do.

21–25 Saul responds to David with words that he has felt a need to utter before: "I have sinned" (cf. 15:24). Recognizing that David has "considered" his "life precious," Saul promises not to harm him. Apparently Saul's repentance is sincere this time: He admits that he has erred "greatly" and that—like Nabal—he has "acted like a fool" (cf. 13:13).

David's retort to Saul offers to return his spear, the symbol of death, but not the water jug, the symbol of life. The argument of David to the effect that God "rewards" all who are characterized by "righteousness" (GK 7407) and "faithfulness" (GK 575) is perhaps as much a condemnation of Saul's conduct as it is a commendation of his own. As before so also now David refuses to lay a hand on Saul, the Lord's anointed. It is the Lord who has "delivered" Saul into David's hands, and as recompense for his respect for Saul's life he prays that the Lord will "deliver" him from "all trouble."

Strangely enough, Saul's final words to David are good wishes for his greatness and triumph. Three times Saul has called David his "son" (vv.17, 21, 25), and Saul now apparently knows that David will be his successor on Israel's throne as well (cf. 24:19–20). His blessing on David virtually assures as much. David had prayed that any potential enemies of his might be "cursed" (v.19); Saul now leaves David after praying that he might be "blessed." Since there is nothing more to be said, David and Saul part (cf. 24:22), never to see each other again.

15. Achish the Philistine (27:1–28:2)

27:1–4 Long a fugitive, David decides to flee to Philistia where he will be free of Saul's relentless pursuit once and for all. David knows that it is only a matter of time before he will be "destroyed" (lit., "swept away"; GK 6200) by Saul. David thus comes to the conclusion that "the best thing I can do is" to go to Philistia. If he does so, Saul will "give up" his pursuit. Saul does stop "searching" for him, ceasing what he had relentlessly done while David was still in Israelite territory (23:14, 25; 24:2; 26:2, 20).

So David and his six hundred men seek refuge in Philistia with Achish son of Maoch king of Gath, to whom David had earlier fled for help (see 21:10). Since Gath is some thirty rugged miles northwest of the Desert of Ziph, where David had been hiding earlier (26:1–2), the task of moving himself, his two wives Ahinoam and Abigail, and his men and their families (v.3) must have involved considerable hardship.

5–7 David's settlement in Gath would doubtless be temporary, however, since he is not sure that it would be advisable to live with a man who had earlier given him reason to fear him (21:11–12). David therefore hopes that if he has "found favor" in the "eyes" of Achish—implying that Achish can now trust him (see 20:29)—the Philistine ruler will not insist that he live in the "royal city." David would be content to be assigned a country town; so Achish gives him Ziklag, which originally had been part of the tribal patrimony of Simeon "within the territory of Judah" (cf. Jos 19:1, 5; cf. Jos 15:21, 31). Achish doubtless placed David in Ziklag to protect Philistia against marauders from the south. His settlement there anticipates the subsequent ownership of Ziklag by the "kings of Judah," of whom he would become the ideal dynastic ancestor (2Sa 2:4). Altogether David lived in Philistine-controlled territory for "a year and four months."

8–12 While vv.1–7 describe David's settlement in Philistia, vv.8–12 outline his raiding operations, in connection with which—for the second time—he succeeds in deceiving Achish (cf. 21:12–15). Since the Philistines themselves were often raiders (23:27), it is not surprising that a Philistine vassal or ally like David would also engage in raiding campaigns. Among those whom David and his men raided were the Geshurites, the Girzites, and the Amalekites. All these peoples had lived in southern Canaan and northern Sinai "from ancient times." Saul had conducted a fateful campaign against the Amalekites (ch. 15), and David would soon fight them again (ch. 30).

David's "practice" whenever he attacked an area was not to "leave a man or woman alive." Unlike the situation in 15:3, however, where total annihilation of the population was for religious purposes, David here kills everyone so that no survivors would be left to report to Achish what has really happened. In addition to garments, he "took" as plunder only animals, a procedure to be expected as a matter of course from kings (8:16) but not from prophets (see 12:3).

Although David was raiding Geshurites, Girzites, and Amalekites, he told Achish that he was raiding various subdistricts of the Negev that belonged to or were controlled by Judah (30:26–29). Far enough away from Gath so that Achish would be ignorant of his movements, David can lie to him with impunity—especially by leaving no survivors who might be able to contradict him. David thus has the best of both worlds: He implies to Achish that Judahite hostility toward David is increasing, and at the same time he gains the appreciation and loyalty of Judah toward himself by raiding their desert neighbors.

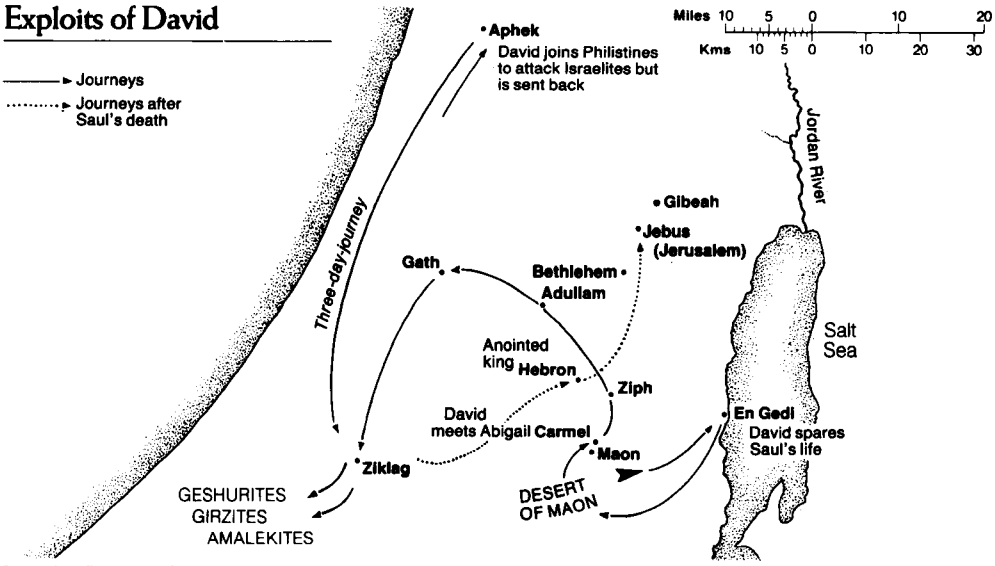
To his detriment, Achish trusts David and is therefore deceived by his report. He is confident that David the Israelite has become "odious" (GK 944) to his own people and will thus be forced to be a "servant" (GK 6269) of Achish the Philistine for life.

28:1–2 Still laboring under the assumption that David is his faithful vassal, Achish forcefully reminds him that he and his men are expected to "accompany" the Philistines to fight against Israel. David appears to acquiesce by responding that Achish would then "see" for himself what David was capable of doing. In referring to himself as Achish's "servant," David reflects the thoughts of Achish concerning him (27:12)—although David intends nothing more than a polite expression equivalent to the personal pronoun "I." Continuing to misjudge David, Achish announces his desire to make him "my bodyguard." Achish, however, fails to see that David and his men constitute a dangerous fifth column inside Philistine territory.

B. The End of the Reign of Saul (28:3–31:13)

1. Saul and the medium at Endor (28:3–25)

The strange story of the meeting of Saul with Endor's "witch" (better "necromancer" or "medium"; GK 200), resulting in the announcement that Saul would die at the hands of the Philistines (v.19), is preceded (27:1–



© 1985 The Zondervan Corporation

28:2) and followed (29:1–11) by accounts of David's friendly relationships with the Philistines through Achish king of Gath.

3 Verse 3a reprises 25:1a. The reminder that Samuel had died is coupled with the observation that Saul (cf. Lev 19:31; 20:6–7; Dt 18:11) had expelled the mediums and spiritists from Israel; both events figure prominently in the rest of the chapter.

4–6 Skillfully and tersely v.4 describes the opposing forces: The Philistines "assembled" and "set up camp" at Shunem (in the territory of Issachar), while Saul "gathered" his forces and "set up camp" at Gilboa (a mountain ten miles south-southeast of Shunem).

When Saul "saw" (GK 8011) the Philistines, he became "afraid" (cf. 17:11, 24; 23:3). Given the situation, it is understandable that Saul "inquired of" the Lord. For all Saul's efforts to receive an "answer" (cf. v.15) from the Lord, none came. The normal modes of divine communication were silent: "dreams" (cf. v.15), "Urim" (the sacred lots stored in the priestly ephod), and "prophets" (cf. v.15).

7–14 Under such circumstances it is not surprising that Saul, out of sheer desperation, would resort to a forbidden source of information—a "medium." Fearful of Philistine strength, he wanted to know how to proceed (v.15). An element of mystery suffuses ch. 28, and it would be presumptuous to claim to have successfully plumbed its depths.

"Find" a medium, the king says, thus violating his own earlier intention (v.3). Endor was located dangerously close to where the Philistines were encamped (v.4). That Saul should prefer a "woman" as a medium is not surprising (cf. Na 3:4). Although he was obviously convinced that if he "disguised himself" he would be able to conceal his identity, he was wrong—and in any event the information he received through the medium's efforts was hardly what he wanted to hear (vv.17–20).

Since the netherworld is a place of darkness (Job 10:21–22; 17:13; Pss 88:12; 143:3), "night" provided the proper setting for communicating with one of its denizens. In addition, necromancers probably preferred to do their work at night, and Saul would have found it easier to conceal his identity under cover of darkness. Taking two men with him, the king went to the woman and asked her to "consult" a "spirit" on his behalf, a practice universally condemned as a pagan abomination (6:2; cf. Dt 18:10, 14; 2Ki 17:17). King Saul is now commanding a necromancer to "bring up" for him one who dwells in the "realm of death below" (Dt 32:22).

Not yet recognizing Saul, the woman reminds him that Israel's king has "cut off"-(either killed or expelled) all the land's mediums and spiritists. Her words to Saul drip with irony: "You know" that "spiritists" are no longer allowed here. Saul will later compound the irony by asking the wraith that he believes to be Samuel "to tell me" what to do (v.15). Meanwhile the woman wonders why her nocturnal visitor would want to put her life in jeopardy by begging her to do what royal decree has forbidden. In promising the woman that she would not be punished, Saul uses the most solemn of oaths by swearing (for the last time) in the Lord's name.

Saul's response to the medium's question is specific: He wants her to bring up "Samuel." Although Saul and Samuel had worked at cross-purposes throughout much of their time together, the king now desires a final word from his prophet. How—and whether—the woman engaged the dead we are not told. The medium's reaction when Samuel appeared was one of shock and surprise: She "cried out" (GK 2410), an emotional outburst often linked with feelings of fear and dismay (cf. 4:13; 5:10). At the very least the woman must have been clairvoyant, because while in her trancelike state she was able to penetrate Saul's disguise and recognize him.

The irony continues: Saul, previously afraid because of the Philistine threat (v.5) and soon to be afraid "because of Samuel's words" (v.20), tells the necromancer not to be afraid. He then asks her what she sees, thus indicating that he is not privy to the apparition itself. She responds that she sees "a spirit." Saul asks what he looks like. When the medium describes him as "an old man wearing a robe," Saul is convinced that the apparition is Samuel, who in Saul's mind has always worn the robe of the prophet (15:27; cf. 2:18–19).

15–19 Saul now speaks (probably via the medium) to what he believes is the "spirit" of Samuel. The apparition begins the interchange by complaining that Saul has "disturbed" him (see Isa 14:9). Saul's claim to be in "great" distress reflects his desperate emotional state. He knows full well that "God" had long ago abandoned him (see 16:14; cf. also 18:12), and therefore he felt it necessary to consult a spirit.

In v.6 the Lord did not answer Saul "by dreams or Urim or prophets"; in v.15 Saul tells "Samuel" that God does not answer him "either by prophets or by dreams," perhaps omitting "Urim" to hide his slaughter of the priests of Nob (22:11–19) and perhaps listing "prophets" first in his hope that the prophet Samuel will now fill that vacuum. In a sense Samuel obliges: Saul has complained that God no longer speaks by prophets, and Samuel says that the Lord has done what he predicted through Samuel himself. Meanwhile Saul wants Samuel to "tell" him what to do, in spite of his earlier refusal to pay attention to Samuel's counsel (cf. 10:8 with 13:8–14).

The statements made to Saul are in full agreement with what we know of Samuel in other contexts. Although Saul uses the general word "God" in v.15, Samuel characteristically refers to "the LORD" in vv.16–19—seven times in all.

The prediction in v.17 refers back to 15:28 and echoes much of the terminology found there. This time, however, Samuel specifies precisely who the new king will be: "David" (a fact that Saul himself had already admitted earlier; cf. 24:20).

Verse 18 summarizes the two fateful decisions made by Saul that prompted the Lord to wrench the kingdom from his grasp: (1) He disobeyed the Lord's command through his prophet (see ch. 13), and (2) he refused to fully carry out the divine wrath against the Amalekites (see ch. 15). Obeying God had never been easy for Saul (cf. 15:19, 22), and his impatient insistence on his own way cost him the kingdom.

Although throughout Samuel's lifetime the Israelites had been delivered "out of the hand/power of the Philistines" (cf. 7:3, 14), the Lord would now "hand over" Israel to them. Samuel predicts the slaughter of Saul and his sons on Mount Gilboa. Samuel's last-recorded words, describing the fate of "both Israel and you [Saul]," reprise the final words of his apologia: "Both you [Israel] and your king [Saul] will be swept away" (12:25). Apart from v.20, Samuel does not appear again in the two OT books named after him, though his importance and influence continue to leave their mark throughout the rest of the Bible.

20–25 His strength gone, King Saul falls on the ground "full length." Fearful earlier because of the Philistine threat (v.5), Saul is now "filled with fear" because of Samuel's words of doom. In addition he lacks physical strength because he has eaten no food "all that day and night" (19:24).

The medium, politely referring to herself as Saul's "(maid)servant" (GK 9148; see 1:11;

25:27), reminds him that she risked her own safety for him. The verb for "hear," "obey," "listen to" (GK 9048) plays a prominent role in this section: The medium "obeyed" Saul when she "did" (lit., "listened to") what he told her to do; she now wants him to "listen to" her and eat some food; although he at first refused, he finally "listened to" her when his men joined her in urging him. Having eaten, Saul and his men go out into the night—"that same night" (v.25) in which Samuel's words have sealed the fate of a doomed king.

2. The dismissal of David (29:1–11)

1–5 The chapter begins by recalling the muster of Philistine and Israelite armies described in 28:4. The Philistines gathered their "forces" at Aphek (mentioned only here and in 4:1)—the staging area for Philistine troop deployment in the first and last battles in 1 Samuel.

The personal involvement of the Philistine "rulers" demonstrates their perception that the present battle was crucial. David and his men, mercenaries in the Philistine army (cf. 28:1), fall in behind at the behest of Achish king of Gath. The commanders, understandably wary of David (cf. 18:30), question the wisdom of including "Hebrews" in the army. But Achish, who had earlier made David his "bodyguard for life" (28:2), rises to his defense: (1) Although David had at one time been an "officer" of Saul, he "left" Saul. (2) Having fled from Saul, David has now been with Achish for "over a year" and has therefore had sufficient time to demonstrate his loyalty. (3) During this entire period Achish has found "no fault" in David. Unconvinced, the Philistine commanders demand that Achish "send" David "back" to Ziklag (see 27:6), fearing that David might turn against them during the fighting. They want no fifth column in their ranks. The commanders conclude their critique by reminding Achish of the victory refrain—by now well known (see 18:7–8)—sung by the women of Israel in honor of (Saul and) David.

6–11 Achish, not willing to buck his peers on this point, tells David about the commanders' concern but without sharing any details with him. To assure David of the truth of what he is about to say, he takes a solemn oath in the name of David's God. As far as Achish is aware (but cf. 27:8–11), David has been "reliable" (GK 3838). He then advises David to "go in peace," a cordial expression of farewell (2Sa 15:9; cf. 2Sa 15:27).

David's response echoes in part some of Achish's own words (cf. v.6). In addition, David wants to know "what [he has] done" to deserve such suspicion, again playing the role of the innocent victim (cf. 17:29; 20:1; 26:18). He wants to fight (or pretends that he does) against the enemies of his "lord the king"—Achish, at least in this context.

For the third time (cf. vv.3, 6) Achish vindicates David's honor and dependability. In Achish's eyes David is like "an angel of God" (cf. 2Sa 14:17, 20; 19:27; Zec 12:8). But he goes on to request urgently that David return to Ziklag before he needlessly angers the Philistine rulers even further. David and his men leave early in the morning, doubtless relieved that they have avoided fighting against David's countrymen.

3. The defeat of the Amalekites (30:1–31)

1–3 Having been dismissed by Achish, David and his men begin the long trek from Aphek (29:1) to Ziklag (see 27:6) in "the land of the Philistines" (29:11) and arrive there on the "third day." In the meantime the Amalekites (Israel's agelong enemies, who inhabited large tracts of land southwest of the Dead Sea) had "raided [lit., stripped; GK 7320] the Negev and Ziklag" (see v.14 for more details). The Amalekites had taken advantage of David's absence from Ziklag and retaliated for David's earlier raid (27:8). They had also "taken captive" everyone who lived in the town, from the youngest to the oldest (vv.2, 19). The captured "women" receive pride of place in v.2, probably because David's two wives were included among them (v.5).

4–8 Weeping aloud is an understandable reaction when the situation seems hopeless. But the abject sorrow of David and his men would soon be replaced by confident expectation as a result of the Lord's assurance of victory. David mourns the apparent loss of his two wives, whom he had moved to Ziklag after Achish had assigned the town to him (cf. 27:3–6).

David is further grieved because his men blame him for their plight. They even consider "stoning him." Convinced that they will never see their children again, the men are "bitter in spirit" (cf. 1:10; 2Ki 4:27). While in 22:2 people who were "discontented" flocked to David's leadership, here his men are so distraught that they are ready to harm him.

David's spiritual discernment now comes to the fore: He "found strength" in the right Person (cf. Ezr 7:28; Dan 10:19). By using the expression "the LORD his God," the narrator emphasizes David's intimate relationship with the One who from the beginning has always been "with him" (see 16:18).

As at Keilah, so also at Ziklag David inquires of the Lord through Abiathar the priest. When the rejected Saul inquired of the Lord, no answer came (28:6); when the "man after [God's] own heart" (13:14) does the same, the Lord answers specifically and with precision (cf. also 23:2, 4). David is commanded to "pursue," he will "certainly overtake," and he will "succeed in the rescue." True to his promise, the Lord makes sure that David has "recovered" everything (vv.18, 22).

9–20 The staging area for the campaign against the Amalekites is the Besor Ravine. Of David's "six hundred men," two hundred are too "exhausted" (vv.10, 21) to continue the rigorous march. David and the four hundred others, however, press on. Finding a starving Egyptian in a field, whose cruel Amalekite master had left him for dead simply because he had become ill, they give him water and food. His enforced three-day fast has apparently weakened him, because after eating he is "revived."

The emphatic "we" at the beginning of v.14 suggests that the slave participated personally in the Amalekites' raids. Among the pillaged regions were the Negev of the Kerethites, an undefined portion of Judahite territory, and the Negev of Caleb (named after the clan that occupied it and of which Nabal was a member [25:3]). Last of all, says the Egyptian, "Ziklag we burned."

The Egyptian agrees to show David where the Amalekite raiding party has gone if David will swear not to kill him or "hand [him] over to" his master; the present text is silent concerning whether he does so. In any event, the Egyptian leads David down to the Amalekite bivouac. The raiders are not only "eating" and "drinking"—in contrast to the former plight of the Egyptian slave, who had considered himself one of their number—but also "reveling." After all, they had recently "taken" great quantities of plunder (cf. vv.18–20).

David and his men are more than a match for the Amalekites, who must have been much more numerous than the Israelites. Even after a full night and day of fighting, during which large numbers of Amalekites fell, "four hundred"—the same figure as David's original army (v.10)—are still able to get away on their camels.

Emphasizing the completeness of the rout and the scope of David's victory, the narrator reports that everything the Amalekites had taken, David "took" back, including (most important of all) "his two wives." Indeed, "nothing was missing." The success is attributed to David as the leader of his men; the plunder is "David's plunder."

21–25 David, however, understands that the plunder is ultimately not his but the Lord's, and he must therefore exercise the utmost care in its disposition. Returning to the Besor Ravine, he and his troops are met by the two hundred men who had remained behind (cf. vv.9–10). As was his custom on such occasions (17:22; 25:5–6), David "greeted" them.

As Saul had his "troublemakers" (10:27) at the beginning of his reign, so also David has his. They declare their unwillingness to share the plunder with men who had not participated in the campaign against the Amalekites. David, generously calling the troublemakers "my brothers," reminds them that the booty is not, as they think, "the plunder we recovered" but rather "what the LORD has given us." God has enabled them to defeat those who came against them. However exhausted the men who remained behind might have been, they deserve a reward for staying with and guarding the "supplies" (see 10:22). They are thus not to be considered inferior and are to share equally in the plunder. The magnanimous David, who knows full well that he has been divinely deputized to distribute the Lord's plunder as he wishes, makes sure that loyal service is suitably compensated. David makes the principle of equal sharing of plunder a "statute and ordinance."

26–31 The final section of ch. 30 begins as does the first: "David arrived in Ziklag." Representing Judah, the elders (cf. 2Sa 19:11) receive a "present" (lit., "blessing"; GK 1388) from David (see comment on 25:27). The Judahite elders, who are David's "friends," stand in contrast to the Amalekite raiders, who are "the LORD's"—and therefore David's—"enemies."

Concluding the chapter, vv.27–31 list the specific places where David's "present" was distributed and give additional information concerning the areas raided by the Amalekites. David thus ingratiates himself to the elders and other inhabitants of Judah. And even before David the king-elect has finished currying favor with Israelites living in the south, King Saul has died while fighting the Philistines in the north, a story vividly and tersely related in the last chapter of 1 Samuel.

4. The death of Saul and Jonathan (31:1–13)

1–7 The Philistine threat has hung like a pall over Israel throughout 1 Samuel almost from the beginning (cf. 4:1–2), and the end is not yet. Even now, as Samuel promised, the Philistines fight Israel (cf. 28:19), and, as all too often under Saul's erratic leadership, "many" Israelites "fell slain." Symbolizing defeat for Israel, the verb "fell" (GK 5877) appears three times in this section (vv.1, 4–5).

Although Saul and Jonathan had earlier engaged "in hot pursuit" of the Philistines (14:22), now the tables are tragically turned: The Philistines "pressed hard" after Saul and his sons. Of the four sons of Saul, three (including Jonathan) are killed (vv.2, 6, 8) before Saul himself commits suicide. The other son, Ish-Baal/Ish-Bosheth, may not have been present on the battlefield (see 2Sa 2:8, where he enters the scene).

With Saul helpless and virtually alone, the Philistines moved in for the kill. As the fighting grew "fierce" around him, the archers "overtook him," and he was badly wounded. Saul does not want those "uncircumcised fellows" to finish him off. Relying on his armor-bearer to do as he is told, Saul tells him, "Draw your sword and run me through." But Saul's armor-bearer—like David before him (26:23)—"would not" kill the Lord's anointed. Since Saul is determined to die on his own terms, he has no alternative but to take his own sword and fall on it. Thus the man who had originally been introduced as the one who would "deliver [God's] people from the hand of the Philistines" (9:16) meets his end by dying at their hands.

Seeing that his king is dead, the armor-bearer follows his example and falls on his own sword. As if to stress the camaraderie and mutual loyalty within the Israelite army, the narrator states that all the warriors—Saul, his sons, his armor-bearer, his men—die "together." The Philistines now occupy deserted Israelite towns in the valley of Jezreel and in Transjordan.

8–13 The following day the Philistines come back to the battlefield to "strip the dead." As David had earlier cut off the head of Goliath (see 17:51), they now cut off the head of Israel's king and put it on display in the temple of Dagon as a trophy of war (1Ch 10:10). They also strip Saul of his armor and display it in the temple of their goddesses. Messengers "proclaim the news" of the resounding victory and its aftermath.

The report is to be broadcast throughout Philistia but especially "in the temple of their idols." It is indeed ironic that a book that begins at the "house of the LORD at Shiloh" (1:24) ends at the "temple" of one or more pagan deities. As for the mutilated bodies of Saul and his sons (Saul's suicide did not prevent his body from being abused, v.4), the Philistines fasten them to Beth Shan's wall.

At the beginning of his reign, Saul's first military action had been to rescue the people of Jabesh Gilead from the Ammonites (11:1–11). At the end of his reign, after his final military action (which cost him his life), the grateful people of Jabesh pay tribute to Saul and his sons by retrieving their bodies from Beth Shan (doubtless at great personal risk), burning them, and giving them an honorable burial. Then, in honor of Saul, they fast for seven days (cf. also 2Sa 1:12).

At best, Saul remains a complex and enigmatic figure, at once hero and villain. Perhaps the fittest conclusion to the story of Saul, as well as the most appropriate transition from 1 Samuel to 2 Samuel, is the Chronicler's inspired coda: "Saul died because he was unfaithful to the LORD; he did not keep the word of the LORD and even consulted a medium for guidance, and did not inquire of the LORD. So the LORD put him to death and turned the kingdom over to David son of Jesse" (1Ch 10:13–14).

EXPOSITION

I. Consolidation of Monarchy in Israel (1:1–20:26)

The overriding theme of the books of Samuel is the beginning of Israel's monarchy in the eleventh century B.C. Having discussed its prelude (1Sa 1:1–7:17), advent (1Sa 8:1–15:35), and establishment (1Sa 16:1–31:13), the author next turns to its consolidation under David, Israel's greatest king.

A. David's Accession to Kingship Over Judah (1:1–3:5)

The story of David's rise to the kingship begins with an account of the decimation of Saul's line (1:1–16) and ends with a summary of David's fecundity (3:2–5). Nestled in the center of this literary unit is the narrative of David's anointing as king over Judah (2:1–7), signaling the replacement of Saul and his house in southern Canaan.

1. The death of Saul and Jonathan (1:1–16)

Second Samuel begins as 1 Samuel ends—with an account of the death of King Saul and his son Jonathan, the heir apparent. But while 1Sa 31 describes the events as they occurred, 2Sa 1:1–16 consists of a report of the events filtered through the not disinterested words of an Amalekite.

1–5 Saul's defeat and death at the hands of the Philistines and David's victory over the Amalekites occurred at approximately the same time. The distance from Mount Gilboa to Ziklag is more than eighty miles, a three-day trip for the Amalekite fugitive. Torn clothes (cf. v.11) and dust on one's head are signs of anguish and distress, appropriate and understandable behavior in a man who has so recently witnessed a battlefield scene of suffering and death. The man demonstrates his submission to David by prostrating himself.

David's desire to know where the man has come from is doubtless prompted by the man's appearance. His response—that he has escaped from the Israelite camp—makes David all the more curious; so he demands that the man tell him what has happened. His report reveals that the Israelites "fled" (GK 5674) from the battle against the Philistines and that many of them died. What is more, continues the man—who obviously thinks that he is bringing David good news (4:10)—"Saul and his son Jonathan are dead." David of course wants to know how the messenger can be so sure of this latter assertion; so the man tells his story.

6–10 The Amalekite's account deviates in several important respects from that in 1Sa 31. Most of the proposed solutions to the problem only serve to further complicate it. On Mount Gilboa (the scene of Saul's last battle, 1Sa 31:1), the Amalekite encountered the wounded Saul, who was supporting himself by "leaning on his spear." Seeing the Amalekite nearby, Saul called out to him. The man replied with the response commonly used by servants: "What can I do?" Perhaps to be sure that the man was not a Philistine, who might abuse the Israelite king if he had the chance (cf. 1Sa 31:4), Saul asked the man to identify himself.

Satisfied as to the general identity of the young man, Saul uttered words reminiscent of the earlier description of David's dispatching of Goliath: "Stand over me and kill me" (cf. 1Sa 17:51). Although in mortal agony and wanting to die, Saul seemed unable to take his own life. Apparently happy to oblige, the Amalekite claims to have fulfilled Saul's wish to the letter. He "knew" that the fallen king could not survive, and—since he himself had killed him—he could also "know" for certain that Saul was dead. After killing the king, the Amalekite took Saul's "crown," the primary symbol of his royal authority (cf. 2Ki 11:12), as well as a band that he was wearing on his arm.

11–12 Having once been a valued member of Saul's court, David undoubtedly recognizes the crown and armlet. But the messenger could scarcely have been prepared for the response of David and his men, who tear their clothes with heartfelt expressions of grief over Saul and Jonathan and mourn and weep. They also fast, but only "till evening," which was apparently David's usual practice in such situations (cf. 3:35). Their sorrow extends to the people as a whole, since all Israel has suffered tragic and irreparable loss in the death of their king.

13–14 Apparently after the period of mourning is over, David questions the messenger again. David wants to know something of the man's background. The man affirms that, in addition to being an Amalekite, he is the son of an "alien." David has now learned all that he needs to know concerning the man. Since his father was a resident alien, living in Saul's realm, the young man can be expected to have at least minimal knowledge about Israel's basic traditions, including the inviolability of "the LORD's anointed." By the Amalekite's own testimony, he had destroyed the Lord's anointed king, something David had never done (see 1Sa 24:6, 10; 26:9, 11).

15–16 Far from receiving the reward that he thinks David will surely give him because of the "good news" he thought he was bringing (cf. 4:10), the Amalekite's callous bravado has sealed his own doom. David has the young man executed with the words, "Your blood be on your own head" (cf. 1Ki 2:31–33). In the light of 1Sa 31, it is clear that the young man's claim to have killed Saul was false, however much the rest of his story may appear to have the ring of truth.

2. David's lament for Saul and Jonathan (1:17–27)

17–18 That David was the author of this remarkable poem about 1000 B.C. is universally recognized. The poem is strikingly secular, never once mentioning God's name or elements of Israel's faith. Like Joshua's poetic address to the sun and moon (Jos 10:12–13), this lament was eventually written down in the "Book of Jashar" (a poetic collection no longer extant).

19 "Mighty" is probably best understood as being parallel to "glory," and thus "slain" is parallel to "fallen." "Heights" here refers to Gilboa, located in "Israel," which was Saul's main realm and to whose people David's lament is addressed. Not yet king over all Israel, David orders that the lament be taught only to the men of "Judah" (v.18), where he has already gained considerable influence.

20 The verb translated "proclaim" (GK 1413) almost always implies good news—in this case, of course, only from the standpoint of the Philistines. "Gath," on the eastern edge of Philistine territory, and "Ashkelon," by the sea, represent all of Philistine territory. The "daughters of the Philistines/uncircumcised" will rejoice at this news, in contrast to the "daughters of Israel," who must "weep for Saul" (v.24).

21 This verse consists of a curse on the "mountains of Gilboa," the site of the Israelite defeat (cf. Ps 106:38; Hos 4:2–3). In Hebrew thought, "dew" was often a symbol of resurrection or the renewing of life (cf. Ps 110:3; Isa 26:19). Regarding Saul's shield being "defiled" (GK 1718), the text is unclear as to whether the Philistines treated Saul's shield as they wished or whether it was "rejected (with loathing)" in the sense that the shield is pictured as lying on the mountains, worthless and neglected, no longer oiled and ready for action.

22–23 Each verse refers to both Saul and Jonathan by name, the only verses in the lament to do so. They summarize the bravery, the determination, the comradeship, and the ability of the two men. Jonathan's "bow" did not turn back from "blood," and Saul's "sword" did not return (to its sheath) "unsatisfied" from "flesh" (cf. Dt 32:42; Isa 34:5–6).

The Hebrew word order of v.23 suggests that the king and his son, inseparable in life as in death, would continue to be honored in death as in life.

24 Verse 24 mirrors v.20 (see comment). Here David calls on the "daughters of Israel" to "weep" (GK 1134) for Saul, as he and all his men had done (v.12). Weeping for/over a person was a universal custom in ancient Israel (3:34; Job 30:25; et al.). The "daughters" are probably wealthy women of the land since Saul has lavished fine clothes and expensive jewelry on them.

25–26 "How the mighty have fallen" is a verbatim echo of v.19 and at first gives the impression that the lament concludes at this point. The addition of "in battle," however, signals that v.25 is a false ending. The two lines of v.25 reverse the elements of v.19, its mirror image.

David's grief is for Jonathan, his "brother" (GK 273)—not in the sense of "brother-in-law" (a true enough description; cf. 1Sa 18:27) but of "treaty/covenant brother." David's further statement that Jonathan's "love" (GK 173) for him was "more wonderful than that of women" should be understood to have covenantal connotations (i.e., covenantal/political loyalty; translated "friendship" in Ps 109:4–5).

27 The song ends as it began, with the central theme of "How the mighty have fallen!" David's lament for Saul and Jonathan is characterized by both passion and restraint. While giving full vent to his feelings on hearing the report of their death, David displays no bitterness toward his mortal enemy Saul. Since in v.18 David orders that the men of Judah be "taught" his lament, apparently the epic hymns of Israel's history were intended to be taught and applied from generation to generation. David's lament may well have been a favorite.

3. David anointed king over Judah (2:1–7)

1–4a Now that King Saul is dead and buried, the time has come for the private anointing of David (1Sa 16:13) to be reprised in public. David decides to leave Ziklag (1:1)—but not without seeking divine guidance. Unlike Saul, David "inquired of the LORD," doubtless by asking his friend Abiathar the priest to consult the Urim and Thummim stored in the ephod that he had brought with him from Nob (1Sa 22:20; 23:6; cf. 23:1–4, 9–12; 30:7–8).

David wants to know whether he should "go up" to one of the towns in the hill country of Judah. By means of the sacred lots, the Lord responds affirmatively. When David then asks for a more precise destination, the lots pinpoint Hebron as the place. Located twenty-seven miles northeast of Ziklag, Hebron was the most important city David sent plunder to after defeating the Amalekites (1Sa 30:31) and looms large in chs. 2–5. Obedient to the divine command, David severs his ties with Philistine Ziklag and, with his two wives Ahinoam and Abigail (27:3; 30:5), moves to Judahite Hebron. He also takes with him the army of men who have rallied to his leadership, and they together with their families settle in Hebron and its nearby villages. David is publicly anointed by the "men of Judah" as king over Judah. David's elevation to kingship, however, is fundamentally due to divine anointing (1Sa 16).

4b–7 Word eventually reaches David that the men of Jabesh Gilead had given Saul a decent burial. Since Jabesh is an Israelite (not Judahite) town and therefore presumably still loyal to Saul's house, David realizes that he must try to win them over to his side. He therefore sends messengers to them with overtures of peace and friendship, an approach that stands in sharp contrast to the tactics used by David's men in the rest of the chapter.

The Jabeshites are commended for "showing kindness" (in the sense of demonstrating loyalty) to Saul. "Kindness" (GK 2876) of this sort ultimately derives from God, as David himself recognizes (cf. 9:1, 3, 7). Indeed, he invokes the Lord's "kindness and faithfulness [GK 622]" on the Jabeshites. Both of these are part of all genuine covenant relationships, and David stresses his eagerness to transfer the Jabeshites' covenant loyalty from Saul to himself. He offers to show them the same favor that Saul had shown them. He reminds them that Saul their master is now dead and that the house of Judah has anointed him as king. He concludes his offer by encouraging them to "be strong and brave." But there is more than one fly in the ointment, as the rest of the chapter clearly suggests.

4. War between Saul's house and David's house (2:8–3:1)

2:8–11 Abner, Saul's cousin and the commander of Saul's army (cf. 1Sa 14:50; 17:55; 26:5), had either avoided or escaped from the battle on Mount Gilboa that had resulted in the death of Saul and his three sons (1Sa 31:8). Still ostensibly loyal to the dead king, he had taken a fourth son, Ish-Bosheth, and brought him to Mahanaim, far away from the continuing Philistine threat. Located just north of the Jabbok River in the tribal territory of Gad (Jos 13:26, 30; 21:38), it would later serve as a place of refuge for David during the rebellion of Absalom (17:24, 27; 19:32; 1Ki 2:8).

Ish-Bosheth ("Man of shame"), mentioned only in chs. 2–4, is perhaps to be identified with Ishvi in 1Sa 14:49. Not killed in Saul's last battle (cf. 1Sa 31:2), he may have been something of a coward. Scribal tradition often substituted the word bosheth ("shame"; cf. GK 1017) for the hated name of the Canaanite god Baal (cf. Jer 3:24). Thus Ish-Bosheth's real name was E/Ish-Baal, "Man of Baal" (cf. 1Ch 8:33), Mephibosheth's (4:4) was Merib-Baal (1Ch 8:34), and Jerub-Besheth's was Jerub-Baal (11:21; cf. Jdg 6:32). Since baal is also a common noun meaning "lord" or "master" and could therefore be used occasionally in reference to the one true God (cf. Hos 2:16), Saul presumably did not intend to honor the Canaanite god Baal when he named his son Ish-Baal (which would mean "The man of the Lord")—especially since the name of his firstborn son Jonathan means "The LORD has given."

Although David became king over "the house of Judah" by popular anointing (v.4), Abner single-handedly makes Ish-Bosheth king over "all Israel," thus demonstrating that he is the real power behind the throne of Israel now that Saul is dead. Gilead was located thirteen miles north of Mahanaim, indicating something of the difficulty David faced in attempting to win the Jabeshites over to his side. The territories of Ephraim and Benjamin are probably selected to represent those areas within Israel that could be reasonably considered to have been under Saul's control ("all Israel" is an obvious hyperbole for the northern tribes). Ephraim was the largest tribal territory in the north, and Benjamin was the homeland of Saul (1Sa 9:1–2). It is this realm that Ish-Bosheth now inherits—with the ambitious Abner son of Ner pulling the strings.

While Ish-Bosheth was reigning over Israel, the tribe of Judah "followed David." Since David is the man after God's own heart, following David implies following the Lord.

David became king of all Israel shortly after Ish-Bosheth's death (4:12–5:3).Because David's reign in Hebron was more than five years longer than Ish-Bosheth's in Mahanaim (2:10–11; cf. 5:5), it must have been several years after Saul's death before Ish-Bosheth had gained enough support to become king over the northern tribes. Thus Ish-Bosheth's two-year reign would have coincided with the last two years of David's seven-and-one-half-year reign over Judah.

12–17 David and Ish-Bosheth each attempted to seize the other's kingdom. Full-scale warfare was not the only way to accomplish such a goal, however. It could be done between teams of champions. Saul's cousin Abner, together with Ish-Bosheth's men, meet David's nephew Joab, together with David's men, at the "pool of Gibeon." Once again the hand of God can be seen working on David's behalf.

Ish-Bosheth's men and David's men sit down on opposite sides of the pool of Gibeon, probably facing each other. Abner makes a proposal, which Joab accepts, that some of the young men in one group "fight hand to hand" with some in the other. Twelve from each group are "counted off." The number twelve here doubtless stands for the twelve tribes of "all Israel," whose fate hangs in the balance. The initial skirmish ends quickly. Each man "grabbed" his opponent by the head, thrusting a dagger into his side. Just as all the men had met at the pool "together," so also all the men now fall down "together." Following that was a fierce battle, ending in the defeat of Abner's men.

18–23 Asahel, one of the three "sons of Zeruiah," is compared to a gazelle, though his speed as a runner would eventually prove to be his undoing (cf. v.23). The initial combat between Ish-Bosheth's men and David's men broadens and becomes more dangerous. Abner, not spoiling for a fight and eager to get out of harm's way, flees the scene of the massacre. Asahel, however, is determined to overtake and kill Abner, nothing deterring him. After identifying his pursuer to his own satisfaction, Abner tells Asahel to give up the chase; he advises him to appease his desire for vengeance by killing one of the young men fleeing from Gibeon. The single-minded Asahel, however, is adamant.

Abner then issues a final warning: Unless he stops chasing Abner, Asahel will be the one who dies. Why would he want Abner to strike him "down"? And if Abner kills Asahel, how could he "look" Asahel's brother Joab "in the face"? Abner's fear of Joab proves to be not unfounded (cf. 3:27, 30). Asahel, however, refuses to listen. Continuing to run full speed ahead, he closes the gap between himself and Abner, and the latter suddenly turns to face his pursuer. Asahel's momentum hurls him onto the butt of the spear of Abner, who thrusts it through Asahel's "stomach" (cf. 3:27; 4:6; 20:10), killing him on the spot. As David's men began passing by that place, they stood transfixed in horror at the death of a fallen comrade.

Asahel, though dead because of his headlong pursuit of Abner, would be long remembered in Israel. He is listed first among the Thirty, David's military elite (23:24). It would only be a matter of time, however, before Asahel's brother Joab would avenge his great loss (3:30).

24–28 Although others came to a halt at the sight of their dead comrade, Joab and Abishai (Asahel's brothers) continue their pursuit of Abner. At sunset they come face to face with the Israelites ("the men of Benjamin," since they probably formed the largest number as the tribe of Saul), who take their stand "on top of a hill"—an ideal vantage point from which to direct or engage in battle if necessary (cf. Ex 17:9–10). Just as Abner had earlier proposed that hostilities begin (v.14), so he now proposes that they cease with the words: "Must the sword devour forever? . . . How long before you order your men to stop pursuing their brothers?"

"How long" commonly introduces questions implying a rebuke. Abner cleverly baits Joab by referring to the two groups of antagonists as "brothers"—and Joab bites by accepting the identification. When brothers fight brothers, the result can only be "bitterness" and shame (Ob 10). Joab thus calls off the chase, and Abner's timely plea thus leads to results remarkably similar to those described in 1Sa 25:34.

29 It was customary for armies to travel at night, probably to be as inconspicuous as possible. Marching eastward across the Jordan, Abner and his men continue until they arrive at Mahanaim.

30–32 Including Asahel, a total of twenty of David's men are "missing" in action, presumably all dead. The body count of Ish-Bosheth's men, however, is "three hundred and sixty." The eighteen-to-one ratio in favor of David demonstrates how terrible was the cost of Abner's arrogance (v.14) and how thoroughly "Abner and the men of Israel were defeated by David's men" (v.17).

Joab's men took Asahel's body to Bethlehem, the hometown of David and his clan, where Asahel would be given a proper burial in "his father's tomb." During much of ancient Israelite history, multiple burials in family tombs cut into the underlying rock of the slopes of hills were commonplace. Having left the body of their fallen comrade in Bethlehem, Joab and his men continue on to Hebron, more than twenty miles southwest.

3:1 The "house of Saul" and the "house of David" figure prominently in the next several chapters (cf. esp. ch. 7). War—almost inevitable when rivals aspire to the same throne—continues between them "a long time" (at least for the two years of Ish-Bosheth's reign over Israel). But Ish-Bosheth's weakness is no match for David's strength, and the outcome is a foregone conclusion.

5. Sons born to David in Hebron (3:2–5)

2–5 Anointed king over Judah in Hebron, David settled down with his two wives Ahinoam and Abigail and began to build a substantial family during his seven-and-a-half-year rule there. His firstborn son Amnon ("Faithful"), the son of Ahinoam, would ultimately be killed by the men of Absalom (13:28–29), David's third son. His second son, Kileab, whose mother was Abigail, is mentioned only here and apparently died before he was able to enter the fray to determine who would be David's successor as king of Israel.

Absalom ("[Divine] Father of peace") was the son of Maacah, a Geshurite princess whom David may have married as part of a diplomatic agreement with Talmai, the Geshurite king. See chs. 13–18 for the story of Absalom.

Adonijah ("My Lord is the LORD") the son of Haggith would figure prominently in the struggle for David's throne (cf. 1Ki 1–2), eventually to be assassinated in favor of Solomon. David's polygamy, begun with Ahinoam and Abigail (1Sa 25:43), continues unabated—indeed, it increases—in Hebron.

B. David's Accession to Kingship Over Israel (3:6–5:16)

1. Abner's defection to David (3:6–21)

The devastating defeat of Ish-Bosheth's men by David's men (2:30–31) has made its impact on Saul's cousin Abner. Ruthless and ambitious, Abner is a canny politician who sees the handwriting on the wall. He therefore sets about to transfer Ish-Bosheth's kingdom over to David—and Ish-Bosheth can only sit by helplessly and watch the inevitable unfold (vv.9–11). Doubtless hoping for a prominent place in David's kingdom, Abner wants to be the divinely chosen agent in delivering Israel to David's rule.

6 Abner is not only well positioned to wrest Israel's kingdom from the hapless Ish-Bosheth but also to do with it whatever he pleases—including delivering it to David. While Abner was "strengthening his own position," it was characteristic of David that he "found strength" in the Lord his God (1Sa 30:6).

7–11 Ish-Bosheth's surprise question to Abner—"Why did you sleep with my father's concubine?" (i.e., Rizpah)—arrives like a bolt from the blue. This act by Abner is probably intended to assert his claim to Saul's throne (cf. vv.8–10; 16:20–22; 1Ki 1:1–4; 2:13–22). Abner responds indignantly to Ish-Bosheth: "Am I a dog's head—on Judah's side?" That is, how can Ish-Bosheth possibly think that Abner would defect to Judah? He protests that although he is loyal to Saul's house, Ish-Bosheth is accusing him "now." He has not, after all, handed Ish-Bosheth over to David. He therefore pretends not to be able to understand how Ish-Bosheth can "accuse" him of cohabiting with Rizpah.

Far from denying Ish-Bosheth's accusation, however, Abner takes a strong oath of self-imprecation, vowing that he will become God's instrument in bringing about what the Lord had promised to David—namely, transferring the entire kingdom of Israel to David. Cowardly and powerless, Ish-Bosheth can do nothing to stem the tide of Abner's ambitions.

12–16 The preliminary meeting between Abner and David takes place through messengers rather than face to face. Abner's rhetorical question, "Whose land is it?" is perhaps intentionally ambiguous. To Abner it means, "The land of Israel is mine to give" (and therefore David should make an agreement "with me")—though it could also mean, "The land of Israel is yours because of God's promise." In any case, the Lord is working behind the scenes to deliver the northern tribes into David's hands.

For his part, David is willing to accept Abner's proposal only on one condition: that he bring Michal, Saul's younger daughter, with him when he comes to Hebron. David is adamant, warning Abner not to come without bringing Michal.

David chooses his words carefully. When speaking to Abner he refers to Michal as "daughter of Saul," thus reminding Abner that if he agrees to bring her with him he has turned his back on Ish-Bosheth for good and has assented to David's succession to Saul's throne. When speaking to Ish-Bosheth, however, David calls Michal "my wife," thus reminding Ish-Bosheth that she is David's wife (cf. 1Sa 18:25–27) and that the responsibility for her being now with Paltiel is Ish-Bosheth's, since he is the son and heir of Saul, who wrongfully gave her to Paltiel in the first place (1Sa 25:44). Now that Saul's death has given him a free hand, David wants to strengthen his claim to Saul's throne by retrieving Michal.

The guardian and brother of Michal, Ish-Bosheth, powerless as ever, readily consents to David's demand and takes Michal away from her husband Paltiel. When Abner and Michal depart for Hebron, the heartsick and weeping Paltiel tags along as far as Bahurim, where Abner orders him to go back home. And so it is that Michal is added to David's roster of wives.

17–21 The time when Abner "conferred" with Israel's elders was probably before the events of vv.15–16. Abner's counsel to the elders is straightforward: There is no reason to delay any longer in making David king over all Israel. God had promised David that he would be divinely endowed to "rescue my people Israel from the hand of the Philistines," a word originally spoken concerning Saul (see 1Sa 9:16). In any event, God himself is the true Deliverer of his people (cf. esp. 1Sa 7:8) and thus sovereignly chooses whom and when he will.

On his way to Hebron, Abner pays special attention to the Benjamites, Ish-Bosheth's kinsmen, and tells them of his plans. He then went on and told David what Israel and Benjamin wanted to do. Though counted among the northern tribes and an indispensable part of the kingdom of Israel, the "house of Benjamin" would eventually become inextricably linked to the house of Judah (cf. 1Ki 12:21–23).

Arriving in Hebron with Michal, Abner and his twenty men sit down to a feast prepared for them by David. With his offer to bring "all Israel" into a covenant relationship with David, Abner's defection to the house of Judah is complete. The agreement between the two men in vv.12–13 was personal and is not to be confused with the national "compact" now being made between north and south. Abner assures David that the end result of the compact would be that "you may/will rule over all that your heart desires" (1Ki 11:37). Abner's mission now complete, David sends him away and he goes "in peace" (GK 8934).

2. The murder of Abner (3:22–39)

22–27 In the middle of this otherwise tranquil scene the narrator states that David's men and Joab return from a raid. Arriving in Hebron and learning that Abner has come and gone, Joab goes to David and demands to know why he released Abner—the only genuine obstacle to David's sitting on Israel's throne—when he had him firmly in his grasp. After all, Abner is a cousin of Saul, who must therefore be an opponent of David. Indeed, to Joab, Abner has doubtless come to Hebron for the sole purpose of learning everything that might well prove useful in the future. Joab's accusation that David allowed Abner to "deceive" him is ironic in light of his own subsequent treachery (cf. Pr 24:28–29).

David is realistic enough to recognize that he is still too weak to risk a showdown with the sons of Zeruiah (v.39). The brash Joab thus feels free to leave David without so much as waiting for a response to his rebuke; nor is David told that Joab's men pursue Abner and bring him back.

Pretending that he wants to discuss a private matter with him, Joab takes Abner into a relatively secluded area. Then, "to avenge" (GK 928) the blood of his brother Asahel, Joab kills Abner. The method used is the same used in Abner's killing of Asahel and thus illustrates the principle of retaliation in kind.

28 Upon hearing of Abner's murder, David declares himself and his kingdom "innocent" (GK 5929) of all personal responsibility for Abner's death. The motif of innocence is first recorded in the assessment of his friend Jonathan (1Sa 19:5; cf. also Pss 19:13; 26:6; 64:4). Needless to say, that opinion is not shared by disaffected Israelites, who hold David accountable for the massacre of the Saulides and continue to think of him as a "man of blood" (cf. 16:7–8).

29 David places the blame for Abner's death squarely where it belongs by cursing the "head of Joab" and devoutly hoping that Abner's blood will "fall" upon it—i.e., that Joab's bloodguilt will eventually bring about his own destruction through divine vengeance (cf. v.39). Just as David had absolved himself and his "kingdom" of all guilt in the matter (v.28), so also now he includes Joab's "father's house" in Joab's condemnation. In pronouncing this curse, David uses colorful language. He pleads that Joab's house will never be without people who would suffer in five categories: (1) has a "running sore"; (2) has "leprosy"; (3) "leans on a crutch"; (4) falls by the sword; and (5) lacks food. The first three curses relate to physical ailments, the fourth to war, and the fifth to famine.

30 Since the blood of a kinsman was to be avenged by the death of the one who had shed it, Joab and Abishai invoked the hoary custom of the blood feud as a rationale for murdering Abner. It is, however, questionable whether the blood vengeance of Joab and Abishai was justified, seeing that Abner had killed Asahel in battle. Indeed, David later excoriates Joab for having shed the blood of Abner "in peacetime as if in battle" (1Ki 2:5). Joab, of course, may have had an ulterior motive in wanting Abner out of the way, for Abner could supersede him as commander of David's army (8:16; 20:23; 1Ki 1:19; 11:15, 21).

31–35 David issues commands concerning Abner's funeral: The murderer Joab is required to attend, as are all his men. David's weeping and mourning over a slain family member, comrade, or friend is not only a concession to custom but also—and far more significantly—an indication of his tender heart (cf. 1:12; 13:36–37; 18:33; 19:1–4). Joab and his men walk in front of the funeral procession; David brings up the rear. Expressing his grief, the king "wept aloud" at Abner's tomb.

The rhetorical question that begins the lament requires a negative answer. With his hands not bound and his feet not fettered, Abner was surely not "lawless." Just as with Saul and Jonathan and their comrades in arms, David fasts till evening (see 1:12). Try as they might, Joab's men are unable to induce David to eat the customary funeral meal (cf. Jer 16:5, 7). Although David could not have been completely unhappy about the death of his most powerful rival for control, his grief is genuine.

36–37 David's magnanimity impresses Joab's men and is sure to draw them ever closer to his inner circle of advisors. Indeed, in their eyes he can do no wrong. David was not an accessory to Abner's death. His protestation of innocence, believable then to his own cohorts, is ratified now by the northern tribes.

38–39 The chapter concludes with David's final brief encomium for Abner and final imprecation against Joab and Abishai, both of which are directed to his own men. Just as it was important for all Israel to know that David was innocent of the death of Abner (v.37), so also David wants his men to "realize" that in Abner a great man has been lost to Israel.

David realizes that although he is "the anointed king," he is nevertheless "weak." By contrast Joab and Abishai are "strong"; and David, exercising commendable caution, realizes that he is not presently able to rebuke them with any semblance of authority. In the hearing of his own men, however, he repeats the curse against Joab (cf. v.29), perhaps this time including Abishai.

3. The murder of Ish-Bosheth (4:1–12)

The only viable threat left to the throne is Saul's son Ish-Bosheth and Jonathan's son Mephibosheth. Chapter 4 removes them from the scene, one explicitly and the other implicitly.

1–3 When Ish-Bosheth heard that Abner had died, "he lost courage"—a typical and expected reaction. Abner's death left a power vacuum in the north, and it is therefore not surprising that all Israel became "alarmed."

Among the opportunists eager to take charge are two of Ish-Bosheth's men, Baanah and Recab, who are "leaders of raiding bands." Such groups functioned under David's authorization as well (3:22; 1Ch 12:18) and were not uncommon elsewhere during the early days of Israel's monarchy (cf. 1Sa 30:1, 8, 15). These two men were members of the tribe of Benjamin and thus loyal to Saul (and Ish-Bosheth).

4 Jonathan's son Mephibosheth is introduced parenthetically to demonstrate that his youth and physical handicap disqualify him for rule in the north. When the nurse of Jonathan's son learned that the boy's father had been killed (1Sa 31), she decided to flee with the boy to a safer location. In her headlong flight the boy fell from her grasp and became permanently crippled. Five years old when his father died, Mephibosheth was now twelve (cf. 2:11).

5–7 Baanah and Recab go to where Ish-Bosheth was staying (doubtless in Mahanaim) and arrive there at the time of siesta, knowing full well that Ish-Bosheth would be sleeping. They gain access to his sanctum through subterfuge and stab him "in the stomach"—a technique rapidly becoming the preferred method of killing.

Ish-Bosheth is assassinated while lying on "the bed in his bedroom," luxuries available only to the wealthy or to royalty in those days (Ex 8:3; 2Ki 6:12; Ecc 10:20). Recab and Baanah "cut off" (GK 6073) Ish-Bosheth's head and bring it to David as a trophy of their vile deed. To avoid easy detection they travel through the night a distance of almost thirty miles.

8 Presenting the head of Ish-Bosheth to David, Recab and Baanah remind him that Ish-Bosheth's father, Saul, had been David's "enemy." Indeed, Saul had "tried to take" David's "life" on many occasions. But now, say the assassins, the Lord himself—to whom belongs all vengeance (cf. Heb 10:30)—has "avenged" (GK 5935) David not only against Saul but also against Saul's "offspring."

9–11 David now takes an oath in the name of the Lord. To the assassins' reminder that Saul had tried to take David's "life," the king responds that the Lord delivers his "life" out of "all trouble" (including the difficulties he had faced when he was a fugitive from Saul's wrath). Like the Amalekite who claimed to have killed Saul (1:10), Recab and Baanah can hardly have expected David's blistering response to their murder of Saul's son Ish-Bosheth. The man who had "told" David that Saul was dead was of course the Amalekite (see comment on 1:4). Although he thought he was bringing "good news," he brought about only his own death at David's headquarters in Ziklag (cf. 1:1). Expecting a "reward" for his news (cf. 18:22), he received death instead.

If David condemned the Amalekite for delivering the finishing blow to the mortally wounded Saul on the battlefield, then a similar fate is self-evident in this context: (1) Recab and Baanah, "wicked men," have killed Ish-Bosheth, an "innocent" (lit., "righteous"; GK 7404) man. (2) Although Saul was killed in a context of danger and violence in battle, Ish-Bosheth was murdered in what should have been the secure and peaceful serenity of his own home and bed. David's outrage (whether real or pretended) over the circumstances of Recab and Baanah's assassination of Ish-Bosheth causes him to hold them accountable.

12 Death begets death: The Amalekite claimed to have killed Saul, and in retaliation David "put him to death" (v.10); Recab and Baanah have killed Ish-Bosheth (v.11), so David gives the order that they in turn be killed. David's men mutilate the dead bodies of Recab and Baanah by cutting off their hands and feet. Following the ancient custom to expose to public view the entire corpse of the victim whenever possible (cf. 21:9–10; 1Sa 31:9–10; Dt 21:22–23; Jos 10:26–27), the bodies of Recab and Baanah are "hung" in Hebron. It is ironic indeed that the prolonged struggle between Ish-Bosheth's men and David's men begins and ends by the placid waters of a pool (see 2:13).

The contrast between the treatment of the remains of the assassins and of Ish-Bosheth could hardly be more striking. While the dead bodies of Recab and Baanah are impaled in a public setting to disgrace them and deter others, Ish-Bosheth's head is given an honorable burial in Abner's tomb at Hebron—the headquarters of David, their political rival.

With the death of Ish-Bosheth, no other viable candidate for king remains for the elders of the northern tribes. Meanwhile David sits in regal isolation, above the fray as always, innocent of the deaths of Saul, Jonathan, Abner, and now Ish-Bosheth. The way is open for his march to the throne of Israel.

4. David anointed king over Israel (5:1–5)

1–3 That the kingdom about to be established under King David is intended as a truly united monarchy is underscored by the use of the word "all" three times (vv.1, 3, 5). The "elders" of Israel, representing the "tribes," come to David at Hebron with the express purpose of submitting to his rule. Preliminary consultations with them had been initiated by Abner (3:17), but his death had postponed further discussion.

The elders give three reasons for their submission to David. (1) Their reference to themselves as "your own flesh and blood" signifies their sense of kinship with him. David is a "brother Israelite" (Dt 17:15). (2) During Saul's reign David was Israel's best army officer. (3) They understand that the Lord has chosen David (cf. 3:18) as Israel's new king. They sense that the Lord has invested David with the titles of "shepherd" (GK 8286) and "ruler" (GK 5592) as well as "king" (GK 4889). Apart from God himself (Ge 48:15; 49:24), David is the first example of a specific person being called a "shepherd" (cf. Nu 27:17). Moreover, the motif of David as shepherd was prefigured at his earliest anointing (see 1Sa 16:11).

In the ancient Near East, the figure of the shepherd was associated with gentleness, watchfulness, and concern. Since it is the shepherd's task to lead, feed, and heed his flock, the shepherd metaphor was a happy choice for benevolent rulers and grateful people alike. David thus becomes the paradigm of the shepherd-king (cf. Ps 78:70–72; Eze 34:23; 37:24), and it is not surprising that "great David's greater son," Jesus Christ, is introduced frequently as the "good shepherd" (Jn 10:11, 14), the "great Shepherd" (Heb 13:20), and the "Chief Shepherd" (1Pe 5:4).

David is also called a "ruler," a title that provided a convenient transition between judgeship on the one hand and kingship on the other. David's sovereignty is underscored by the threefold reference to him as "king" in v.3. He does not go to Israel's elders in Mahanaim; they come to him in Hebron. Their need for him is greater than his for them—although the stakes are enormous on both sides.

Abner had suggested earlier that Israel "make a compact" with David (3:21). But now that the moment for such an agreement has arrived, the king initiates "the compact" with his (future) subjects. At the same time, however, the covenant should not be understood as bestowing on David the role of all-powerful suzerain and dooming the Israelites to become his craven vassals. The covenant-making formalities take place "before the LORD," acknowledging that the proceedings are under his guidance and enjoy his blessing (v.12).

As David had earlier been anointed king over Judah (2:4), so now he is anointed king over Israel, "as the LORD had promised through Samuel" (1Ch 11:3). The news of the anointing would soon become well enough known to cause concern in the hearts of the Philistines (v.17).

4–5 David became king in Hebron when he was thirty years old. His overall reign of forty years matches that of Saul (cf. Ac 13:21) as well as that of his son and successor Solomon (1Ki 11:42). His reign consisted of seven and a half years in Hebron over Judah alone (2:11) and thirty-three years in Jerusalem over all Israel and Judah. Although Jerusalem had not been unknown to David before the elders of Israel anointed him (see 1Sa 17:54), he is now determined to make it his capital.

5. David's conquest of Jerusalem (5:6–12)

6–8 Far and away the most important city in the Bible, Jerusalem is mentioned there more often than any other. Geographically and theologically it is located "in the center of the nations" (Eze 5:5). Known also by its abbreviated name "Salem" (Ps 76:2), it makes only one appearance in the OT before the time of Joshua (Ge 14:18).

Soon after being anointed king over all Israel and Judah (v.5), David deploys his men for a march on Jerusalem "to attack the Jebusites, who lived in the land." Some of the Jebusites lived outside the fortress at Jerusalem (cf. 24:16), where the temple of Solomon would eventually be built (2Ch 3:1).

The interchange about the "blind" and the "lame" is an example of pre-battle verbal taunting. Thus in v.6 the Jebusites smugly claim that even disabled people can withstand any attack on their fortress, while in v.8 David retaliates in kind by characterizing his enemies as "lame and blind." The overconfident Jebusites, however, do not count on the skill and determination of David, who captures the fortress of Zion and renames it the "City of David." For more on the capture of Jerusalem, see 1Ch 11.

Up to this time Jerusalem had been on the border between Judah in the south (Jos 15:1, 5, 8) and Benjamin in the north (Jos 18:11, 16). Tied to no tribe, the City of David could champion its neutrality, central location, and virtual impregnability as qualities that made it and its environs the ideal capital for David's newly established, united kingdom.

9–10 David thus "took up residence" in Jerusalem where the Jebusites lived (v.6). He then set about to repair the surrounding areas "from the supporting terraces inward." Joab (David's commander-in-chief) "restored the rest of the city" (parts of which were doubtless damaged or destroyed as a result of Joab's attack to capture it; see 1Ch 11:8).

The assertion that David "became more and more powerful" is reminiscent of 3:1. Now as earlier, however, David himself is not the source of his strength; "the LORD God Almighty" (a title for God that is more royal than military), the true King of Israel, grants his power and, as always, is "with him."

11–12 The events described here occurred a long time after those recorded in vv.6–10.

Hiram did not become king of Tyre (a well-fortified island in the Mediterranean Sea) until about 980 B.C., more than twenty years after David was anointed king over Israel and conquered Jerusalem. Hiram continued his friendly relations with Israel's royal house well into the reign of David's son Solomon (1Ki 5:1–12; 9:10–14). Hiram traded building materials (which Israel lacked) for agricultural products (which Phoenicia lacked). Thus Hiram sends to David logs of "cedar," carpenters, and stonemasons. All this activity would eventuate in a "palace for David"—a palace that would fill him with a certain unease (7:1–2).

Witnessing God's evident blessing on his life, David once again acknowledges the Lord's role in establishing "him as king over Israel" (v.12). Indeed, David's throne and dynasty would be established forever (7:11b–16; 22:51; 1Sa 25:28), culminating in the eternal reign of great David's greater Son (Lk 1:30–33). As Israel's ideal ruler, David has the privilege of seeing his kingdom "exalted" (GK 5951) by the Lord himself. All this is not for his own sake alone but also, and primarily, for the sake of "his" (i.e., God's) people.

6. Children born to David in Jerusalem (5:13–16)

13–16 In violation of the divine decree to Israel's future kings not to "take many wives" (Dt 17:17), David adds "more" concubines and wives to the wives he already has (see 3:5). This is the first time that concubines are mentioned in connection with David.

David fathered many children in Jerusalem. Although vv.14–16 list only sons born to him by his wives, the name of at least one of David's daughters has survived (Tamar, the sister of Absalom; cf. 13:1; 1Ch 3:9).

The first four names are of sons born to David by Bathsheba (1Ch 3:5), two of whom appear elsewhere in the biblical narratives. The two main claimants to David's throne in his later years were Absalom (his third-born, 3:3) and Solomon (his tenth-born). Solomon would eventually outlast his rivals for the throne and rule over the united kingdom (cf. 1Ki 1:28–39).

C. David's Powerful Reign (5:17–8:18)

1. The Philistines defeated (5:17–25)

17–21 As soon as the Philistines learn "that David had been anointed," they become concerned and go to "search" for him, an unnecessary task if David had already occupied the formidable fortress of Zion. So apparently this incident occurred after David's anointing and before the conquest of Jerusalem. The "stronghold" to which David retreats is therefore not the fortress of Zion. Also, David "went down" to the stronghold (a person went up to Jerusalem). Possibly the cave of Adullam is the place intended.

The locale of the two battles of vv.20–25 is the "Valley of Rephaim," on the border between Judah and Benjamin. A relatively flat area, its fertile land produced grain that not only provided food for Jerusalem but also attracted raiding parties.

To meet the Philistine threat David, as always, "inquired of the LORD" by consulting the Urim and Thummim through a priest: Should he attack the Philistines, and would the Lord hand them over to him? The divine answer is emphatically affirmative to both questions. In obedience to God's command, David goes to engage the Philistines in battle at Baal Perazim, where he defeats them and carries off their idols, which they had probably brought onto the battlefield as protective talismans. The purpose of carrying the Philistine idols away from the battlefield was so that, at David's command and in accordance with Mosaic prescription (Dt 7:5, 25), they could be burned up (1Ch 14:12).

22–25 On a subsequent occasion, the Philistines again came to attack David, again in the Valley of Rephaim. As before (v.19), David inquires of the Lord. Unlike earlier, however, this time David is told not to go straight up. Apparently the first confrontation was with a smaller contingent of Philistines, whereas now a flanking movement is strategically preferable. The Lord instructs David to "move quickly" as soon as he hears the sound of "marching" in the treetops, promising to go out in front of them. David, acting at God's command, defeats the Philistines and pursues them "all the way from" Gibeon to Gezer.

2. The ark brought to Jerusalem (6:1–23)

Apart from brief mention in 1Sa 14:18, the ark of the covenant has not been mentioned since 1Sa 7:2. David now adds to political centralization in Jerusalem a distinctly religious focus by bringing to the city the most venerated object of his people's past: the Lord's ark—repository of the covenant, locus of atonement, throne of Israel's invisible Lord.

1–5 For the third time (cf. 5:17–21, 22–25) David assembles his troops, here to serve as a military escort for the ark of the covenant. David's "chosen men" are reminiscent of Saul's elite corps of soldiers (see 1Sa 24:2). For at least half a century the ark of the covenant had been sequestered in Kiriath Jearim, in the house of Abinadab—either inaccessible to the Israelites because of Philistine control of the region, or languishing in neglect (perhaps partially because King Saul had shown no interest in it; cf. 1Ch 13:3).

The solemnity of the scene that unfolds is enhanced by the grandiose description of the ark and the repeated references to it. It is depicted as the seat of authority of "the LORD Almighty, who is enthroned between the cherubim" (see 1Sa 4:4). It is also referred to as the "ark of God" and the "ark of the LORD." The ark "is called by the name/Name," an idiom denoting ownership and thus here emphasizing that the ark is the Lord's property. The term "Name" (GK 9005) not only refers to the Lord's name but also stands for his presence.

David's intention to "bring up" the ark to the City of David is of course not only commendable but also entirely appropriate. At the same time, however, his first attempt to do so follows Philistine rather than Levitical procedure. David and his men transport it on a "new cart" (see 1Sa 6:7–8). Abinadab's sons (or perhaps grandsons), Uzzah and Ahio, were given the task of guiding the cart, Ahio walking in front and Uzzah presumably bringing up the rear.

With David taking the lead, the Israelites begin "celebrating." In this context "before the LORD" means "before the ark." "Songs" and "harps, lyres, tambourines, sistrums and cymbals" were staple elements on such joyful occasions.

6–11 At the threshing floor of Nacon (possibly a place of sanctity), Uzzah (whose name, ironically, means "Strength") sensed that the oxen pulling the cart were stumbling and that the ark might fall to the ground. Thus he "reached out" to steady the ark and "took hold of" it. Despite whatever good intentions he may have had, his doom was sealed.

The wrath of divine judgment fell on Uzzah for several reasons. (1) Most obvious was "his irreverent act" of putting his hand on the ark (cf. 1Ch 13:10). (2) Uzzah was transporting the ark in a cart rather than carrying it on his shoulders as prescribed in the law. (3) There is no evidence that he was a Kohathite Levite (cf. Nu 4:15). Just as God had "struck down" (GK 5782) and put to death some of the men of Beth Shemesh for looking into the ark (1Sa 6:19; cf. Nu 4:20), so also God "struck [Uzzah] down" for touching the ark. Ironically, he died "beside" the ark, which he had been attempting to rescue from real or imagined harm.

The Lord's anger causes David to react first with anger of his own and then with fear. He is understandably indignant that the divine "wrath" (GK 7288) has broken out against Uzzah and resulted in his death, a seemingly harsh penalty for so small an infraction. It is not surprising that David's anger against God should be mingled with fear of him; he questions whether the ark can "ever" come to him.

David decides that a cooling-off period is in order before he is willing to give further consideration to taking the ark to be "with him" in the "City of David." Instead, he gives the ark a temporary home in the house of Obed-Edom, a Levite (1Ch 15:17–18, 21, 24–25; 16:4–5, 38)—possibly a Kohathite Levite (cf. Jos 21:20, 24–26; 1Ch 6:66, 69). There the ark remained for three months, during which time the Lord blessed the house of Obed-Edom with numerous descendants (cf. 1Ch 26:8). This fact led to the confidence of David that the Lord would bless the house of David forever (7:29).

12–19 When David is told of the Lord's blessing on the house of Obed-Edom "because of the ark," he proceeds to bring the ark up to the fortress, accompanied by "the elders of Israel and the commanders of units of a thousand" (1Ch 15:25). If in the case of the first attempt there was celebration and singing (v.5), now there is "rejoicing."

"Those who were carrying the ark" were, of course, (Kohathite) Levites (1Ch 15:26). It seems likely that every six steps a bull and a fattened calf were sacrificed, after which the procession continued. Given the proximity of the house of Obed-Edom to the City of David, such a procedure would not have been needlessly cumbersome or time-consuming.

Prefiguring the priestly functions of King David, the prophet Samuel had earlier worn a "linen ephod" (see 1Sa 2:18) and most likely the linen robe normally worn under the ephod (cf. 1Ch 15:27; also Ex 28:31). During the time of the Israelite monarchy, kings occasionally officiated as priests (cf. 24:25; 1Ki 8:64; 9:25).

"With all his might" David "danced before the LORD"—i.e., before the ark, the symbol of the Divine Presence. He and the entire nation now "brought up" the ark from the house of Obed-Edom to Jerusalem. The scene is punctuated with shouts of excitement and triumph and with the sound of ram's-horn trumpets.

"Michal daughter of Saul" (so described because she is depicted here as being critical of David and is therefore acting like a true daughter of Saul) watched the proceedings from a window. Perhaps still smarting from her separation from her former husband Paltiel (cf. 3:13–16), Michal looks at David leaping and dancing with something less than the love she at one time had for him (see 1Sa 18:20), and she reacts with disgust. Once she had helped David escape through a window (1Sa 19:12); now, peering at him through a window, she despises him "in her heart."

The ark is brought in and set in its predetermined place "inside the tent David had pitched for it." Apparently at a somewhat later date, another tabernacle was constructed and installed at the high place in Gibeon (1Ki 3:4; 1Ch 16:39; 21:29; 2Ch 1:3, 5, 13), about six miles northwest of Jerusalem. Thus there were in effect two tabernacles: The one in Jerusalem served as the repository for the ark (1Ch 16:37), while the one in Gibeon housed the other tabernacle furnishings (1Ch 16:39–40).

During the time that the Mosaic tabernacle was not in use (for whatever reason), various offerings continued to be sacrificed without necessary benefit of the bronze altar of burnt offering. Now David sacrifices "burnt offerings and fellowship offerings" as an act of gratitude and consecration "before the LORD" (i.e., honoring the Divine Presence symbolized by the ark). In particular, the fellowship offering signified the desire of the worshipers to rededicate themselves to God in covenant allegiance and to reaffirm their king as God's covenanted temporal ruler.

After bringing an unspecified number of offerings, David blesses the people "in the name of the LORD Almighty," once again performing the role of a priest. David adds to his blessing the distribution of food.

20–23 Having blessed the Israelites who witnessed the procession of the ark (v.18), David returns home to "bless" (GK 1385) his own household. When a warrior returned victorious from battle, the women of his hometown would come out to meet him and would celebrate with music and dancing. David might have expected his wife Michal to celebrate his similar triumph in much the same way. If so, he is quickly disappointed.

Michal's words drip with the "How" of sarcasm: David, the "king of Israel" (an office once occupied by her father Saul), has "distinguished himself." To what extent David's state of undress was scandalous is impossible to say (see comment on v.14). Far from the kind of "vulgar fellow" who would be an exhibitionist, David makes it clear that he is most concerned about how the Lord evaluates his actions, insisting that he is celebrating "before the LORD," not before the "slave girls." In his rebuke of Michal, he clearly dissociates himself from Saul ("your father") and the Saulides by asserting that God had chosen him rather than them.

The chapter ends on a somber note: "Michal daughter of Saul" remains childless to her dying day. In ancient times childlessness, whether natural or enforced, was the ultimate tragedy for a woman.

3. The Lord's covenant with David (7:1–17)

1–3 Settled in his royal house and victor over his enemies, David's regal status is now beyond question. He can thus now be referred to as "the king."

David decides that the time has finally come for him to do what any self-respecting king worthy of the name should do: build a house for his God. The contrast between his own house and that of the Lord is stark: The human king is "living" in a sumptuous "palace" while the "ark of God remains" in a mere "tent." Constructed of the finest materials and with the best available workmanship (see 5:11), David's palace overwhelms in size and splendor the relatively simple tent. To David's credit he recognizes that the imbalance needs to be rectified.

Safe within his well-fortified palace and behind secure frontiers, the king doubtless had plenty of time for a major construction project. The Lord has "given him rest from all his enemies around him," fulfilling during David's reign a promise he had made to Israel centuries earlier (cf. Dt 3:20; 12:10; 25:19; Jos 1:13, 15) and had already fulfilled during the lifetime of Joshua (Jos 21:44; 22:4; 23:1).

Just as Saul had been advised by Samuel the prophet (1Sa 3:20), so also David would be counseled by various prophets, the most important being Nathan. Agreeing that the king should fulfill his desire to build a house for God, Nathan understands that David will ultimately follow the path of obedient servanthood because "the LORD is with" him.

4–7 The messenger formula ("This is what the LORD says") pinpoints Nathan as the mediator of the divine oracle. David is now referred to by the Lord as "my servant David," a description that he willingly and humbly accepts (v.26).

The Lord's first question in v.5 expects a negative answer (cf. 1Ch 17:4). In the broader context, at least two reasons are given why David himself did not build the temple: (1) He was too busy waging war with his enemies (1Ki 5:3); (2) he was a warrior who had shed much blood (1Ch 22:8; 28:3). Neither reason dims David's vision, however, and before his death he makes extensive preparations for the temple (cf. 1Ch 22:2–5; 28:2).

The tabernacle will still suffice as the Lord's dwelling. He reminds Nathan that he has never "dwelt" in a permanent house, not from the day of the Exodus. He has been content with "moving from place to place," demonstrating his continuing desire to walk among his people. The irony in v.6 must not be missed: Although God condescends to accompany his people on their journey with a tent as his dwelling, a tent carried by them, all along they have in fact been carried by him.

The second question (v.7) also expects a negative answer. It implies that the Lord never required the Israelites nor any of their rulers to build him a "house of cedar." The word "people" (GK 6639) used with reference to Israel is an important theme in the chapter, employed four times in each half. "I will be your God, and you will be my people" or the equivalent is doubtless the most characteristic covenant expression in the entire OT (cf. v.24; Ex 6:7; Lev 26:12; Dt 26:17–18; et al.).

8–11a The repetition of the messenger formula (cf. v.4) marks the start of a new section of Nathan's oracle. Here, however, the word "LORD" has been augmented by "Almighty"

(GK 7372), a regal title that stresses the Lord's function as covenant Suzerain of David, his "servant" vassal.

The divine grant to David is divided into two parts: promises he will realize (vv.8–11a) and those to be fulfilled after his death (vv.11b–16). In vv.7b–8a the Lord reviews his earlier blessings on his servant David. He begins by reminding David of where he found him. Once a mere shepherd boy, David has been given a much weightier responsibility: to be "ruler" (GK 5592) over the Lord's people Israel.

As the Lord had been "moving from place to place" (v.6) with his people, so he has been with David wherever he has gone. He had promised to "cut off" (GK 4162) David's enemies from before him. Now the Lord promises three things.

(1) He will make David's "name great," a promise that is a clear echo of the Abrahamic covenant (cf. Ge 12:2). It is fulfilled in 8:13.

(2) The Lord will "provide a place" for Israel. This had been predicted long ago (Dt 11:24; cf. Jos 1:3–4). And far from being temporary, the "place" that God would provide would be the land where he would "plant" (GK 5749) them (cf. Ex 15:17; Pss 44:2; 80:8). Having a home of their own, David and his countrymen will be free from "wicked people" and their oppression. Although oppression had been virtually endemic in Israel during the entire period of the judges, such would no longer be the case.

(3) The Lord will give David "rest" (GK 5663) from all his enemies. The method he will use will be to "subdue" them (1Ch 17:10). As always, the ultimate Giver of the rest is God himself.

11b–16 "The LORD declares to you" introduces God's promises to David's descendants: a "house" (GK 1074; i.e., a dynasty); a throne and kingdom that will last forever; a "house" (GK 1074; i.e., a temple); and a Father-son relationship, including covenant love that will never be taken away. "House" is obviously used with two different meanings in these verses. All the promises will be fulfilled after David's death (i.e., his being laid to "rest" with his "fathers"; see comment on 2:30–32).

It is David's "offspring" who will build the Lord's temple. The emphasis that his offspring will "come from your own body" forges yet another striking link to the Abrahamic covenant (cf. Ge 15:4). The possibility of understanding "offspring" (lit., "seed"; GK 2446) as either singular or plural is exploited by Paul in Gal 3:16 (see comments on that verse). The Lord goes on to promise that he will "establish" (GK 3922) the "kingdom" and "throne" of Solomon.

In v.13a, "house" means temple. David's offspring has been designated to build a temple for the Lord's "Name." As for v.13b, the Lord promises that the Davidic dynasty, throne, and kingdom will endure "forever" (a fact mentioned seven times in ch. 7).

The Lord's words in v.14a are doubtless the best known as well as the most solemn in the entire chapter: "I [emphatic] will be his father, and he [emphatic] will be my son." In its original setting the son is Solomon. The statement is therefore a formula of adoption. Because of its typological use in 2Co 6:18 and Heb 1:5, v.14a has long been considered messianic in a Christological sense.

A further aspect of the father-son metaphor is its covenant setting. The use of "father" for God and "son" for Solomon is thus entirely appropriate in what has justifiably come to be known as the Davidic covenant. Although the Davidic king was to enjoy the unique relationship of being the Lord's "son," the Lord would use "men" as agents of divine judgment on Solomon (and his dynastic successors) "when he does wrong." It is not an idle promise: "The rod" of divine wrath fell on Jerusalem and her citizens because of the sins of David's descendants (cf. La 3:1).

Finally, the Lord promises that although he "took away" (GK 6073) his love from Saul, the divine "love" (GK 2876) will never "be taken away" (GK 6073) from David's son Solomon and his descendants, through whom David's throne "will be established." That David's "house" will "endure" echoes Abigail's insight in 1Sa 25:28. That the throne of David will remain "forever" refers ultimately to Christ, because David's kingdom came to an end.

Taken together, vv.14b–15 have often been understood to mean that the Davidic covenant is unconditional: No matter what David's descendants do, the Lord's love will "never be taken away" from them. But that the Lord will punish the king for disobeying the law at least qualifies the promise if not making it conditional. Kings are not to use the Davidic promise as a justification for wicked behavior.

17 It was incumbent on a prophet to report "all the words" that the Lord commissioned him to proclaim, and Nathan keeps nothing back.

4. David's prayer to the Lord (7:18–29)

18–21 In response to the Lord's promises as mediated through Nathan, David "went in" (probably into the tent he had pitched for the ark) and sat "before the LORD." Beginning his prayer with appropriate humility and deference, David addresses God with a title found in the books of Samuel only here—"Sovereign LORD"—which he employs seven times in vv.18–29. And if God is sovereign to David, he recognizes his own status as vassal by referring to himself ten times as the Lord's "servant" in vv.19–29.

The central theme of the prayer is David's "house/dynasty," a word that occurs seven times (vv.18 ["family"], 19, 25, 26, 27, 29 [twice]). Though his household is insignificant at present, David is confident that it will become great in the future because of the proven reliability of God and his promises. That the Lord has brought him to this point in his experience would be sufficient for David, but he gratefully recognizes that in God's eyes it is "not enough." The Lord has even better things in store for him in the future.

The Lord has honored his servant beyond measure, and David asserts that there is scarcely anything more that he can say. He affirms that the Lord "know[s]" (GK 3359) his servant, which perhaps includes the fact that he has "chosen" him (cf. Ge 18:19; 2Sa 6:21).

If David earlier knew that the Lord had blessed him "for the sake of" his people Israel (5:12), he now confesses that the Lord has done a "great thing" (GK 1525) simply for the sake of his "word" (GK 1821) and according to his "will" (GK 4213). The greatness of God overwhelms David, for the Sovereign Lord is "great" (GK 1540), he has done "great" (GK 1525) wonders (v.23), and his name is "great" (GK 1540; v.26).

22–24 Verse 22 is only one among many OT texts describing God as unique. That there is "no one like" the Lord is a major theme in the Song of Hannah (1Sa 2:2; see also 10:24). Three times in v.23 Israel is referred to as God's "people," the one elect "nation" (GK 1580) out of all the "nations." Israel's powerful "God" is contrasted with the nations' impotent and ineffective "gods."

Israel's matchless Lord has gone out to do three things for his grateful people: "redeem" GK 7009) them, "make a name" for himself, and "perform great and awesome wonders" by driving out the enemy. The ancient establishment of Israel as God's own people "forever" is now to be channeled through David and his dynasty, which will continue "forever" (vv.25, 29). The OT manifestation of the kingdom of God is now to be mediated through the Davidic monarchy.

25–29 David is much concerned about the permanence of the promise the Lord has made concerning the Davidic dynasty. The covenanted establishment of David's house would be a visible sign of the greatness of God's name. Indeed, "LORD Almighty" would become widely known as the appropriate royal title of the Great King, the God of Israel.

David is grateful that God has "revealed" to him his plans and purposes: "I will build a house for you." He acknowledges that the Sovereign Lord alone is God and that his words are "trustworthy" (GK 622). Although 2Sa 7 never uses the term "covenant" (GK 1382) of God's promises to David, "good things" (GK 3208) is a technical term synonymous with "covenant" in contexts like this (cf. 2Ch 21:7; Ps 89:3; Isa 55:3).

David concludes his prayer with a request to the Lord to "be pleased" to bless the Davidic dynasty. Since it is the Sovereign Lord himself who has promised, David speaks with the calm assurance of a man who knows that his house will continue forever "in your sight." The prayer of David thus ends on a note of confident contentment.

5. David's enemies defeated (8:1–14)

1 It is impossible to know for certain whether the divine promises of ch. 7 preceded or followed the divine victories of ch. 8. In any event, the account of the Philistine defeat resumes the story told in 5:17–25. Exactly what David "took" from the Philistines cannot be determined with certainty. The importance of the conquest of Philistia by David can scarcely be overestimated.

2 As David defeated the Philistines, so also he defeated the Moabites. Why he fought against Moab is unknown, especially since the Moabitess Ruth was his ancestress (cf. Ru 4:10, 13, 16–17) and Moab had at one time sheltered his parents (see 1Sa 22:3–4). His method of executing a specified number of prisoners of war is not attested elsewhere. Only a third of its inhabitants are "allowed to live" (cf. 1Sa 27:9, 11).

The Moabites "became subject to" David, which included bringing "tribute" (GK 4966). This word often means "gift(s)/offering(s)" presented as sacrifices, which are thus understood as tribute brought into the throne room of the Great King. After David's death, nations conquered by him would continue to bring tribute to his son Solomon (1Ki 4:21) and his successors.

3–12 Despite the limited information available about Aram during David's reign, the space given to its conquest in this chapter testifies to its overall significance in the scheme of things. David "fought" and "defeated" the Arameans. His main adversary is "Hadadezer son of Rehob." Hadadezer ("[The God] Hadad is [my] help") is the Hebrew form of an Aramean dynastic royal title.

The pronoun "he" (v.3) most likely refers to Hadadezer, for David could not have extended his power to the Euphrates before the defeat of Hadadezer. Marking the eastern reaches of David's realm, the Euphrates was one of the fixed boundaries of the land promised to Abraham (Ge 15:18).

In driving back the forces of Hadadezer to the Euphrates, David obtained substantial numbers of chariots, charioteers, and foot soldiers. Most of the horses that pulled the chariots he "hamstrung" (i.e., severed the large tendon above and behind their hocks to disable them). Reinforcements from Damascus came to "help" Hadadezer, but David defeated them, and the Arameans became tributary to him.

Part of the tribute that David took from Hadadezer was his officers' "gold shields," ceremonial or decorative shields not used in battle (cf. SS 4:4; Eze 27:11). They were brought to Jerusalem and eventually placed in Solomon's temple, where they remained for well over a century (see 2Ki 11:10). Three towns that belonged to Hadadezer yielded a "great quantity of bronze" to King David. Solomon used the bronze in his construction of the articles of the temple (1Ch 18:8).

The news of David's defeat of the entire army of Hadadezer eventually reaches the ears of Tou king of Hamath, who had been at war with Aram. Tou wants to make peace with David, so he sends his son Joram to "congratulate" him on his victory over Hadadezer and to bring a voluntary gift of "articles of silver and gold and bronze" in order to gain David's goodwill.

In grateful acknowledgment of divine blessing, David dedicates all the articles—whether received as gifts, as tribute, or as plunder—to the Lord. After recording the defeat of Aram in the north, the narrator includes a summary of David's conquest of neighboring nations in every direction: south (Edom), east (Moab and Ammon), west (Philistia), and southwest (Amalek).

13–14 David's "striking down" the Edomites was accomplished through Abishai son of Zeruiah (see 1Ch 18:12), but David gets the credit because he is the supreme commander. At the same time, Abishai's brother Joab strikes down 12,000 Edomites (cf. the title of Ps 60). David then "put garrisons throughout Edom." In all his successes, however, the Lord was the One who "gave victory."

The regions added to David's realm through the defeat of all the nations more than doubled the territory of Israel, thus initiating the golden age of Israelite history. David's new boundaries correspond to those outlined in the divine promise to Abraham (Ge 15:18; cf. also Dt 11:24; Jos 1:4).

6. David's officials (8:15–18)

15 A mighty warrior, King David now reigns over "all" Israel and administers justice and equity to "all" his people. "Doing what was just and right" was the hallmark of a strong king in the ancient Near East and included such reforms as the elimination of oppression and exploitation (cf. esp. Ps 72).

16–18 As expected, the commander of David's army is Joab son of Zeruiah. Jehoshaphat is recorder and remains so into the reign of Solomon (1Ki 4:3). The function of the recorder was apparently either to have oversight of state records and documents or to serve as a royal herald. Though appearing here by name for the first time, Zadok was probably one of the preliminary fulfillments of the oracle of the man of God in 1Sa 2:35. It is striking, and perhaps intentional, that Jehoshaphat (meaning "The LORD judges") and Zadok ("Righteous") are listed in sequence so soon after David is described as doing what is "just and right" (v.15).

Zadok shared priestly duties with Ahimelech during at least part of the reign of David. Possibly Zadok was appointed to offer sacrifices at the tabernacle in Gibeon (cf. 1Ch 16:39–40) and Ahimelech to minister before the ark of the covenant in Jerusalem.

The function of Seraiah as "secretary" was as much that of secretary of state as it was that of royal scribe. Benaiah was in charge of David's bodyguard (23:22–23), became a royal executioner (cf. 1Ki 2:25, 34, 46), and eventually rose to the position of commander-in-chief of Israel's army (1Ki 4:4). The Kerethites and Pelethites constituted a corps of foreign mercenaries employed as David's bodyguard (for details see ZPEB, 1:787).

The list of David's officials concludes by reporting that his sons (how many and who they were is not stated) were "royal advisers" (GK 3913), the same word translated "priests" in v.17. Apparently in early Israel there were priests who were (1) connected with the royal house, (2) not of the Levitical order, and (3) serving a function that is still largely unknown to us.

D. David's Court History (9:1–20:26)

1. Kindness to Mephibosheth (9:1–13)

1 Now that he is the undisputed king, David can afford to be magnanimous. He thus actively seeks out anyone "still left of the house of Saul" so that he might show "kindness" (GK 2876) to him "for Jonathan's sake." David's desire to show kindness derives from his long-standing covenant relationship with the deceased Jonathan (1Sa 18:3; 20:12–15).

2–5 David makes contact with the house(-hold) of Saul through Ziba. David asks him whether Saul's house "still" has a survivor to whom David would be able to show kindness. Ziba responds that there "still" remains one of Jonathan's sons, a man who is "crippled in both feet." He tells David where the man is living—in Lo Debar, a town on the other side of the Jordan. David sends for Mephibosheth.

6–8 David meets "Mephibosheth son of Jonathan, the son of Saul" (his ancestry is fundamental to the narrative). Mephibosheth approaches David with "your servant" and bows down to him. Doubtless knowing what had happened to his uncle Ish-Bosheth (cf. 4:5–8), he is understandably apprehensive. To put him at ease David tells him not to be afraid. True to his earlier promise (vv.1, 3), David declares emphatically that he will show Mephibosheth kindness for Jonathan's sake. David's specific expressions of covenant loyalty to Saul's grandson consist of (1) restoring to him all the land that had belonged to Saul (though certainly not his father's kingdom; cf. 16:3), and (2) welcoming him as a perennial guest at his table. "Eating (food) at the (king's) table" can be understood as a metaphor referring to house arrest (cf. 2Ki 25:29), though that is not necessarily David's intention.

Again Mephibosheth "bowed down" and, speaking to the king, referred to himself as "your servant" (cf. v.6). He was grateful that David should "notice" him. Becoming more craven still in his submission to David, Mephibosheth referred to himself as a "dead dog."

9–11a Ziba is "summoned" into David's presence, and David announces that he has turned over to Mephibosheth the property belonging to Saul and his "family." David then gives Ziba (together with his sons) the responsibility to "farm" the land for Mephibosheth, since the latter is a cripple (v.13). Ziba is also to "bring in the crops" so that Saul's grandson may "be provided for"—a phrase that seems to cast a cloud over David's generous pledge that Mephibosheth would always "eat [food] at [the king's] table," in that it appears that Mephibosheth would be supplying some if not most of his own provisions.

11b–13 David's intention to show kindness to Saul's survivors (v.1) is now implemented. Some time has passed since the earlier mention of Mephibosheth in 4:4, when he was no more than twelve years of age. He is now old enough to have a "young son" named Mica. Mephibosheth moves from Lo Debar to Jerusalem.

2. The Ammonites defeated (10:1–19)

1–5 The deceased king of the Ammonites was Nahash (1Sa 11:1–2). When political power is based on dynastic rule, a king about to die can reasonably expect his son to succeed him as king (cf. 2Ki 13:24). Thus Hanun becomes king of Ammon. Assuming that Nahash is the same Ammonite king defeated by Saul (1Sa 11:1–11), the kindness he showed to David may have been expressed during David's days as a fugitive from the Israelite royal court. David now wants to reciprocate by showing "kindness" (GK 2876) to Nahash's son, thereby cementing the alliance already existing between the two nations. Just as the events of ch. 9 promoted domestic harmony inside Israel, so this event helped maintain the viability of one of David's international agreements and strengthen his position outside Israel.

The means chosen by David to show kindness is sending a delegation to "express his sympathy" on the death of Nahash. The Ammonite "nobles," convinced that David's delegation are spies, share their suspicions with Hanun. Accepting the assessment of his men, Hanun decides to refuse David's cordial overtures and to humiliate David's messengers. He begins shaving off "half of each man's beard," no doubt vertically rather than horizontally to make them look as foolish as possible. He then cuts off their garments "in the middle at the buttocks" and sends them on their way. Forced exposure of the buttocks was a shameful practice inflicted on prisoners of war (cf. Isa 20:4).

Hanun's treatment of David's men was clearly a violation of the courtesies normally extended to the envoys of other states in ancient times. Indeed, the indignities heaped on them are a grotesque parody of the normal symbolic actions that accompanied mourning. When David was told about their humiliation, he sent messengers to tell them to stay at Jericho until their beards had grown back; only then could they return to Jerusalem. The regrowth of the beards of David's men would portend disaster for the Ammonites.

6–14 The Ammonites' perception of themselves is accurate: They have become a "stench" in David's nostrils, affirming that David would almost surely be expected to declare war against Ammon. In anticipation of that likelihood the Ammonites, at enormous cost, hire a large army of Arameans to supplement their own troops.

Upon learning that the Ammonite-Aramean coalition has been formed, David takes no chances. He sends out the entire army, under the leadership of his commander Joab, to engage them. While the Ammonites prepare to defend their city by amassing at its most vulnerable point, the "entrance to their city gate," the troops from the various Aramean districts are deployed in "the open country."

Before the battle is joined, Joab decides on a strategy and encourages his brother Abishai. He perceives enemy battle lines in front of him and behind him, thus recognizing that he must divide his army if he is to prevail. Sensing that the Arameans are the stronger of the two forces in the enemy coalition, he chooses some of the best troops and leads them personally to fight against the Arameans. The rest of the men he puts under the command of Abishai, who leads them against the Ammonites.

Failing to size up one's opponent adequately, for whatever reason, can prove disastrous. Joab therefore stresses vital communication between the two commanders so that either can come to the other's "rescue" if necessary—an outcome that the Ammonites and Arameans would be unable to accomplish with respect to each other.

Joab's "Be strong" is clearly reminiscent not only of the ringing words of encouragement of Moses and the Lord to Joshua and to all Israel (Dt 31:6–7, 23; Jos 1:6–7, 9) but also of those of the Transjordanian tribal leaders to Joshua (Jos 1:18). Joab senses that he is responsible not only for the people of Israel but also for "the cities of our God." Like Eli before him (see 1Sa 3:18), Joab resigns himself to divine sovereignty: "The LORD will do what is good in his sight."

Leading Israel's finest troops and convinced of the Lord's guidance, Joab marches into battle against the Arameans, who turn tail and flee. As soon as the Ammonites learn of Aram's headlong retreat, they scurry to the protection of the walls of Rabbah. Apparently unable to pursue his advantage against the Ammonites by besieging the city—for now, at least—Joab returns to Jerusalem.

15–19 Undeterred by what they consider a minor setback, the Arameans regroup their forces. Hadadezer sends for Aramean reinforcements from beyond the eastern side of the Euphrates River, and his army commander Shobach leads them to Helam. When David's intelligence network informs him of the exact location of the Aramean forces, he musters his entire army and crosses the Jordan River eastward to engage the Arameans in battle (see also comment on 11:1). The Israelites prove to be more than a match for them; David and his men press their advantage and inflict huge numbers of casualties on the enemy. The defeat of the Arameans leaves them no option; they sue for peace and become subject to the Israelites (cf. 8:6). The defeat of the Ammonites is reported in 12:26–31.

3. David's sin against Bathsheba (11:1–5)

1 The story, continuing the account begun in ch. 10, is set "in the spring, at the time when kings go off to war." Springtime, which marks the end of the rainy season in the Middle East, assures that roads will be in good condition (or at least passable), that there will be plenty of fodder for war horses and pack animals, and that an army on the march will be able to raid the fields for food.

David sends his commander Joab and his army to continue the battle against Ammon. The result is the mass slaughter of the Ammonites and the siege of Rabbah, their capital city, the reduction and capture of which is yet to come (cf. 12:26–29). Every able-bodied man in Israel goes to war—except the king himself. The contrast between David and his men could hardly be expressed in starker terms. Staying home in such situations was not his usual practice, of course (cf. 5:2; 8:1–14; 10:17). Indeed, leading one's troops into battle was expected to be the major external activity of an ancient Near Eastern ruler (see 1Sa 8:5–6, 20). Although therefore reprehensible in itself, David's conduct on this occasion opens the way for royal behavior that is more despicable still.

2–5 Perhaps because of the oppressive heat of a spring sirocco, David lengthens his afternoon siesta into the cooler part of the day. Getting up from his bed and taking a stroll, "from" the roof of his palace he sees a "very beautiful" woman bathing. The heat of the unusually warm spring day has forced the woman to bathe outside to escape the suffocatingly hot atmosphere of her house. Failing to heed the warning of texts such as Nu 15:39, David lusts after her and sends someone to find out who she is.

The woman is Bathsheba, the daughter of Eliam and the wife of Uriah the Hittite. Eliam was the son of Ahithophel (23:34), who was in turn David's counselor (see 15:12). Since Eliam was one of David's warriors and thus perhaps a foreign mercenary, and since Bathsheba is listed along with the pagan ancestresses of Jesus (Mt 1:3–6), she possibly was of non-Israelite origin. She was married to Uriah the Hittite, another of David's mercenary warriors (cf. 23:39). He was apparently a worshiper of the Lord (his name probably means "The LORD is my light"). Like Ahimelech the Hittite before him (see 1Sa 26:6), Uriah depends on his master David for sustenance and support. In return he gives total loyalty to the king.

It is thus the wife of a trusted servant that David is about to violate, and v.4 mercifully tells the story in the briefest possible compass. Master of all he surveys, David has everything—and yet does not have enough. David sends messengers to get her. She came to him, and David "slept with her." The scene is blatantly adulterous.

The parenthetic sentence—"She had purified herself from her uncleanness" (i.e., her ceremonial uncleanness from her menstrual period; cf. Lev 15:25–26, 30)—informs the reader that Bathsheba was clearly not pregnant when she came to David. Shortly thereafter she found out that she was, leaving no doubt that the child is David's. Of all the fateful conceptions recorded in the OT (cf. Ge 16:4–5; 19:36; 25:21; 38:18; Ex 2:2), Bathsheba's ranks near the top of the list in terms of future repercussions.

4. The murder of Uriah (11:6–27)

6–17 David hatches a three-phase scheme to cover up the serious problem of Bathsheba's pregnancy, each phase more ruthless than the preceding: a clean one (vv.6–11), a dirty one (vv.12–13), and a criminal one (vv.14–17).

As Bathsheba had sent word to David informing him of the problem, David now sends word to Joab to begin the process of seeking a solution. At David's command Joab sends him "Uriah the Hittite," the full description underscoring Uriah's mercenary status and therefore presumably also his loyalty to David. Uriah "came to him," just as Bathsheba had come under similar circumstances (v.4).

David begins his conversation with Uriah in an apparently cordial way by asking about the welfare of Joab, the soldiers, and the war. Ostensibly satisfied concerning how things are going on the battlefield, David tells Uriah to go down to his house and "wash" his "feet." Although usually an expression describing an act affording refreshment and relaxation in a land where dusty roads are the rule (see 1Sa 25:41), the phrase may well be intended here as a double entendre, given the euphemistic use of "feet" in the sense of "genitals" (cf. Ex 4:25; Dt 28:57). Thus Bathsheba's washing and Uriah's washing would both involve or eventuate in sexual cohabitation. So Uriah "left" the palace, and a royal gift "was sent" after him.

"But Uriah slept"—not with Bathsheba, as David had hoped, but "at the entrance to the palace" with all of David's servants. The next day, when David learns that Uriah did not sleep with his wife, he obviously wants to know why. Just as David and his men had always "kept themselves from women" whenever they set out to do battle (1Sa 21:4–5), so now Uriah refuses to sleep with his wife. How could Uriah in good conscience "eat" and "drink" and "lie" with his wife, while the rest of the army was on the battlefield? That he calls Bathsheba "my wife" could hardly have failed to rebuke David, who had callously violated the relationship between Uriah and the person most precious to him.

Uriah concludes his statement to David by emphatically rejecting the king's offer. Taking a solemn oath, which translates literally as "By your life, and by the life of your soul," Uriah swears that he will not so much as think of doing the unthinkable.

Failing in his first attempt to cover up his sin, David tries again: "'Stay here one more day.' . . . So Uriah remained in Jerusalem" for two more days. Although he will not go to his own house to eat and drink, he has no such scruples in the king's house. When David gets him drunk, he assumes that Uriah's inhibitions will be overcome and that he will automatically go home, sleep with Bathsheba, and thus absolve David of any charge of her child's paternity. At first it appears that David's plan will succeed: Indeed, "in the evening he went out to sleep on his mat." But on his bed at home? With his wife? No, on the bed where he had slept earlier: "among his master's servants. He did not go home."

His second attempt at covering up his affair with Bathsheba having failed, David senses that he has exhausted his options and so decides to have Uriah killed. David takes no chances: In the morning he "wrote a letter to Joab and sent it with Uriah." Doubtless unknown to him, Uriah carries to Joab his own death warrant.

David orders Joab to put Uriah in the front line of battle against the Ammonites where "the fighting is fiercest." Uriah is then to be abandoned to his fate: He will be "struck down and die." "Cursed is the man who kills his neighbor secretly," intones Dt 27:24. David "struck down" (GK 5782) Uriah and took his wife (12:9), and these things were done "in secret" (12:12). The implication is obvious: David's heinous actions are punishable under the divine curse.

At this point in the account, however, Uriah is still alive. When Joab receives David's letter, he recognizes that to isolate Uriah as the only fatality in the attack would cast suspicion on David's motives. Joab thus besieges Rabbah, the Ammonite capital, and puts Uriah at a "place" where its best troops are defending it. But he also sends other "men" in David's "army" to accompany Uriah into the heat of battle. And so it is that "some" of the mercenaries are sacrificed so that one, relatively unnoticed, might die. David's criminal purpose is finally accomplished: "Uriah the Hittite died."

18–27a Sending a complete "account of the battle" to David through a messenger, Joab warns the latter that the king's anger may "flare up"—presumably when he learns of the high casualty count. Indeed, says Joab, David may ask a series of questions designed to reveal the stupidity (in his opinion) of Joab's battle plans against Rabbah. To get too near a city wall in ancient times was to flirt with mortal danger, since arrows and other missiles rained down from protected positions. Joab thus senses that when David hears about the casualties he will want to know why his men needlessly risked their lives.

Arriving in Jerusalem, Joab's messenger tells David "everything" his master has sent him to communicate. He apparently elaborates somewhat on the words of Joab, however, by giving (or concocting) a few additional details. The powerful Ammonites, says the messenger, "came out" from Rabbah to engage the Israelites in "the open," but David's men were able to drive them back to "the entrance to the city gate."

As the messenger completes the fulfillment of his mission to David, his words remind us that the tragedy has come full circle: The archers' death volley has been fired "from" the wall. And it is not the guilty king, safe in his fortress palace in Jerusalem, who suffers; the enemy's arrows find their mark in his innocent "men," who are sacrificed so that David can inconspicuously dispose of his ultimate target, Uriah.

Temporarily oblivious to the divine displeasure, David resorts to a platitude: "The sword devours one as well as another." From his own selfish perspective the king is basically saying that what is done is done, that it cannot be helped, and that innocent people will often get caught in the crossfire when vital goals are pursued. What is more, David further masks his true concerns by telling the messenger to authorize Joab to "press" the attack against Rabbah as part of the royal message that will "encourage" him.

When the news of Uriah's death reaches Bathsheba, she mourns for him. David, however, apparently sheds no tears for Uriah (cf. 1:12). With the husband of Bathsheba now dead and the period of her mourning now over, the way is open for David to bring her to his house. The phrase emphasizes the abuse of royal power that David exercises. Bathsheba becomes David's wife, and in due course a son is born of their earlier adulterous act. Although short-lived and unnamed, the child would not be unloved during the days of his fatal illness (cf. 12:16–24).

27b This is the only reference to "the LORD" in the entire chapter. David would later confess that his sin with Bathsheba is known to God and is therefore deserving of divine judgment (Ps 51:4).

5. Nathan's rebuke (12:1–25)

1–10 In his prophetic role Nathan is sent by the Lord to proclaim his convicting word to the king. That Nathan's rebuke begins with a parable makes it none the less effective. Now a rich man, David should have remembered what it was like to be "poor" because by his own admission he himself had once been a "poor man" (see 1Sa 18:23).

The parable is clear enough. David is the rich man, and Uriah is the poor man with only one "ewe lamb" (= Bathsheba). The verbs used of the ewe lamb indicate that it is prized as a genuine member of the poor man's family (cf. especially the references to eating, drinking, and sleeping, precisely the things Uriah refused to do with his wife in 11:11). "Food" is literally "piece (of bread)," meager fare at best. That the ewe lamb stands for Uriah's wife becomes clear at the end of v.3, where the status of the lamb is raised to that of a human being.

The word for "traveler" (lit., "walker"; GK 2144) reminds the reader that David's trouble began because he had earlier "walked around" on the roof of his palace (see 11:2). Bound by culture and tradition to provide hospitality for his guest, the rich man set about to prepare a meal for him. Instead of slaughtering one of his own animals, however, he took the poor man's one ewe lamb instead—just as David had sent messengers to get Bathsheba. That the rich man "refrained" from taking one of his own animals is a key element in understanding the main point of Nathan's parable.

Understandably, David's moral indignation against the rich man in Nathan's parable takes the form of burning anger that will not be assuaged until justice is done. David, using the Lord's name in a solemn oath, declares that the one who did this "deserves to die"—David of course being oblivious to the fact that he himself is "the man" (v.7a). David's actual sentence reflects Ex 22:1, where the penalty for a stolen lamb is "four times over." Nathan then delivers his terse incriminating word to David: "You are the man."

Nathan goes on, using an amplified variation of the messenger formula, to remind David that it was the Lord who had anointed him king and delivered him from Saul's clutches. Just as Saul, the Lord's anointed, had fallen from grace, so also would David—though not in the same way or to the same degree. Furthermore, the Lord "gave" Saul's "house" and wives (presumably including at least Ahinoam [1Sa 25:43] and perhaps his concubine Rizpah [cf. 3:7]) to David. That they are given into David's "arms" is an ironic allusion to Nathan's parable. And the God whose generosity knows no bounds would have "given" even more to David if he had considered it appropriate. But David's unbridled desire and willful murder have foreclosed that option.

If Saul lost the kingdom through having "rejected [GK 4415] the word of the LORD" (1Sa 15:23), David is judged because he has decided to "despise [GK 1022] the word of the LORD." To despise the Lord's word is to break his commands and thus to incur guilt and punishment (cf. Nu 15:31), and that without remedy (cf. 2Ch 36:16). It is to do what is evil in his eyes (cf. Ps 51:4). It is tantamount to despising the Lord himself. David thus finds himself in unsavory company (cf. 1Sa 2:29–30).

11–12 The second section of the Lord's oracle (vv.11–12) is relentless in the immediacy with which it threatens retaliation against the king. As David has done what is evil, so the Lord will bring "calamity" (GK 8288) upon him, "before your very eyes"—events such as Amnon's rape of Tamar (13:1–14), Absalom's murder of Amnon (13:28–29), Absalom's rebellion against David (15:1–12). David's punishment for his crimes against Bathsheba and Uriah is a clear example of a conditional element in the Davidic covenant (see comment on 7:15–16).

As David "took" Uriah's wife, so the Lord will "take" David's wives. As the Lord "gave" Saul's property and wives and Israel's kingdom to David, so he will now "give" David's wives to someone else, to "one who is close to you"—ironically, an expression earlier used of David himself in similar circumstances (see 1Sa 15:28; 28:17). The "one who is close" to David turns out to be his own son Absalom.

13–14 To his credit, David confesses to the prophet Nathan that he has broken God's law. Though he could have vacillated or indignantly denied Nathan's accusation or ridded himself of Nathan in one way or another, David accepts full responsibility for his actions. And, as might be expected, the prophet does not leave the king comfortless. Nathan comes to David with words of divine grace. In judging the rich man for his cruelty (v.5), David had unwittingly chosen his own death penalty (cf. Lev 20:10; Dt 22:22). But the Lord, through his prophet, announces the forgiveness of David's sin and preserves his life. That God does not hesitate to strike people down for what might be considered lesser infractions (see 6:7) makes his forbearance here all the more noteworthy.

At the same time, however, the Lord is not through with David, for David shows "utter contempt [GK 5540] for the LORD" (cf. 1Sa 2:17). While David will not "die," the son born to him will.

15–23 Having fulfilled his prophetic mission, Nathan leaves the palace and goes home. The Lord then strikes Bathsheba's newborn son with what proves to be a fatal illness. The phrase "the child that Uriah's wife has borne to David" underscores the fact that David's adultery and murder will claim yet another innocent victim.

Despite the prophet's pronouncement that the child's fate is sealed, David is not yet willing to resign himself to the death of his son. He therefore intercedes for the child's life. Ostensibly as a symbol of mourning, he "fasted." David's servants stand "beside" him, concerned about him and urging him to get up and take care of his personal needs. He refuses, however, and will not so much as eat any food with them.

The death of the child takes place on "the seventh day." David's servants are reluctant to tell him of the child's death for fear that their master may do something "desperate." Aware of the whispering of his servants and thus realizing that the child is dead, David gives verbal expression to his own worst nightmare. The servants finally affirm to him that the child is indeed dead. Having admitted to himself the inevitable, David gets up from the ground, washes, puts on lotions, and changes his clothes, no doubt exchanging mourning garb for normal clothing.

After entering the "house of the LORD" (the tabernacle; see comment on 1Sa 1:7) to worship him, David then goes to "his own house." There he breaks his fast (cf. v.16) and eats ordinary food. Understandably, David's servants are confused. While the child was alive, David—acting like a mourner—had "fasted and wept." Now that his son is dead, however, the king puts on garments befitting royalty and enjoys a good meal.

David readily admits that his conduct might appear peculiar, but he was counting on the open door of the divine "perhaps":

"Who knows?" But why should he fast now? Since the netherworld is the "Land of No Return," the child "will not return" to David, and nothing that David can do will "bring him back again." Indeed, David's only option for a reunion with his son is to "go to him."

24–25 At the beginning of the narrative, Bathsheba had been "the wife of Uriah the Hittite" (11:3), but as an outcome of the sin of King David she has become "his wife." David "comforted" Bathsheba (who doubtless mourned her son's death) when he "went to her and lay with her." In due course she gave birth to yet another son, named Solomon, which apparently means "(God is) his peace."

On the basis of his love for Solomon, the Lord "sent word through" the prophet Nathan, who was thereby instructed to call David's newborn son Jedidiah ("Loved by the LORD"), a name similar to that of David himself (see 1Sa 16:13). Why the boy was given two names is not known.

If at the beginning of ch. 12 Nathan rebuked the king (vv.7–14), at its end he comforts him. But Nathan's ministry with respect to David and Solomon is not yet finished. During David's last days Nathan plays a key role in the succession of Solomon as king (cf. 1Ki 1:11–14, 24–27).

6. The Ammonites defeated (12:26–31)

26–28 Intensifying the siege of Rabbah (the Ammonite capital city) begun in 11:1, Joab captures its "royal citadel," probably the major fortification either within the city or guarding the approaches to it. The city now rendered defenseless, Joab sends word to David that he has fought against Rabbah and taken its "water supply." Joab advises David to muster the "rest of the troops" and lead them in the final attack against the city. He warns the king that if he refuses to become personally involved, Joab himself will capture Rabbah, and it will be named after Joab rather than after David. Since it was vital that Rabbah become a part of David's domain, he must be credited with seizing it.

29–31 Thus David finishes what Joab has begun. Having "mustered" the necessary troops, he captures the city. Of the many trophies seized by David, one of the most spectacular was a gold crown that had rested on the Ammonite king's head and was now transferred to David's. Set with "precious stones," the crown was of such enormous weight and value that it was probably used only on ceremonial occasions. The plunder was in "great quantity." Upon the people David heaped a number of atrocities (cf. 8:2), apparently forcing them to work on various building projects.

Only after David had extended the forced labor requirement to the other defeated Ammonite towns did he and his troops return to Jerusalem. The Israelite victory was thus both thoroughgoing and complete.

7. Amnon's sin against Tamar (13:1–22)

1–2 The events in this chapter occur some time later. A sister of Absalom, Tamar, is "beautiful" indeed (as were a number of the members of the family of David: cf. 1Sa 16:12; 17:42; 2Sa 14:25, 2). As a "virgin," Tamar is protected property, inaccessible to males, including her brother. Amnon is therefore "frustrated" to the extent that he becomes lovesick, because "it seemed impossible for him to do anything to her."

3–5 As the son of David's brother Shimeah, Jonadab is Amnon's cousin, and thus all the people mentioned by name in vv.1–22 are members of the same family circle. Jonadab is also Amnon's "friend." He wants to know why Amnon looks so "haggard" all the time. On hearing the reason, Jonadab advises Amnon to go to bed and "pretend to be ill." When David hears of his son Amnon's "illness," he will come to see him. At that point Amnon should tell his father that he wants Tamar to come and give him something to eat, preparing it in his room. As she does so, Amnon will "watch her"—but in what sense? Amnon's desire to "watch" reminds us of his father's earlier voyeurism.

6–9 Amnon readily accepts the advice of Jonadab, whom he perceives as acting in his best interests. But although on David's arrival Amnon at first quotes Jonadab's words verbatim, he chooses his own terminology in describing what he wants her to do after she actually comes: "make some special bread." The cakes/dumplings will strengthen his heart, but they will also reflect his amorous intentions.

Without hesitation Tamar obeys David's command to go to the house of her "brother Amnon." As might be expected, Amnon is "lying down," a posture devastating for Tamar. Amnon's response to Tamar's six acts of solicitude on his behalf leads to a climactic seventh act of the capricious sort so characteristic of spoiled royalty: He "refused" to eat. He asks everyone to leave the room so that he can be alone and ravish his sister unhindered.

10–14a Once they are alone, Amnon tells Tamar to bring the "food" to him so that he might "eat" from her hand. The language Amnon uses is designed to perpetuate the charade of his pretended illness (cf. vv.5–6). Unsuspecting, Tamar brings the "bread" to Amnon, her "brother," in the "bedroom"—a locale usually reserved for rest and bliss but where betrayal and violence all too often hold sway (cf. 4:7). As soon as the gullible Tamar was within arm's reach, Amnon "grabbed" her. His lustful demand is both ominous and insensitive: "Come to bed with me, my sister."

Tamar's immediate response to Amnon is indignant as well as frantic, in effect saying "No." She matches his "my sister" with "my brother," but in the sibling rather than in the amorous sense. One by one, her short sentences bespeak her terror: "Don't force me." She calls Amnon's intended act of rape a "wicked thing" (GK 5576).

As far as Tamar herself is concerned, she wants to know where she could possibly get rid of her "disgrace" (GK 3075). And as far as Amnon is concerned, Tamar warns him that if he gives vent to his lustful desires, he will be like one of Israel's "wicked fools."

Having asked and answered her own rhetorical questions, Tamar voices her final plea. She implores Amnon to speak to the king (referring to him not as their father but by his title, since she anticipates his acting in an official capacity rather than as a family member). She is sure that David will not keep her from "being married to" Amnon. After all, had not her ancestor Abraham married his half sister Sarah (cf. Ge 20:12)?

Tamar does not appear to be inherently opposed to the idea of marrying Amnon. What she is adamantly against is sexual intercourse with him outside the marriage relationship. Her most eloquent pleading, however, is to no avail. Amnon "refused to listen to her."

14b–15a Amnon had "grabbed" his half sister earlier (v.11), and he has apparently not released her throughout the entire dreary episode. He is, after all, "stronger" than she. So he "raped her." The immediate denouement of the rape is poignantly anticlimactic. A rapist's emotional response following the crime is unpredictable; Amnon "hated" Tamar (cf. the opposite reaction in Ge 34:2–3).

15b–16 Scarcely has Tamar had a chance to catch her breath after being ravished by Amnon before he tells her, "Get up and get out!" Before, consumed by lust, he had begun by begging Tamar to "come [in]"; now, repulsed by disgust, he concludes by banishing her.

Although Tamar's response here is much briefer than her earlier pleas (vv.12–13), she is no more ready to obey Amnon's commands now than she was earlier. She begins in the same way as she had before: "No!" (see v.12). Amnon's sending Tamar away would only add insult to injury by involving him in a greater "wrong" than the rape itself. For the third time, however, Amnon "refused" (vv.9, 14, 16).

17 In v.9b he wanted everyone else out of his bedroom so that, without the presence of witnesses, he could have his own way with Tamar; here he wants Tamar out of his bedroom so that, in her absence, he will not be reminded unduly of the awful sin he has committed. "This woman" here is best rendered simply "this thing," reflecting the contempt in which Amnon now holds Tamar.

Amnon's second command to his servant is to bolt the door. The purpose of securing doors is all too often to prevent or conceal an evil deed (see Ge 19:6; Jdg 3:21–24). Needless to say, a door keeps people not only in but also out.

18–19 Although Tamar's arrival into Amnon's presence was carefully orchestrated (vv.6–9a), her forced departure is abrupt indeed, being locked out by the servant. Once the man has satisfied his lustful desires, he discards the woman (cf. similarly Jdg 19:25) as though she were so much refuse.

But Tamar is one of "the virgin daughters of the king," a status that should have made her doubly untouchable. By no means trash, she wears a "richly ornamented robe" that befits her regal position. Now no longer a virgin, she tears her robe as a symbol of her ravished state. The act of tearing her garment also gives expression to her mourning over her irreparable loss (cf. v.31; 15:32), as do her putting ashes on her head and her weeping (cf. 19:4).

20 The advice of Absalom is both matter-of-fact and calculating. Choosing his words carefully, he asks Tamar whether Amnon has "been with" her—an expression that, though not sexually explicit, is at least suggestive of potential involvement (cf. Ge 39:10). He counsels her to be quiet about the matter for the time being; he, her brother, will solve the problem within the parameters of the family. Therefore Tamar should not pay undue attention to it or worry about it. For the foreseeable future Tamar lives in Absalom's house. There she remains "desolate" (GK 9037), which includes the meanings "unmarried" and "childless" (see Isa 54:1). For an Israelite woman it was a living death (cf. 2Sa 20:3).

21–22 When David hears about Amnon's rape of Tamar and its sequel, he is understandably "furious" (cf. 12:5). But even though he is king, he feels powerless to act because he himself is guilty of a similar sin: his adultery with Bathsheba. His guilt paralyzes him.

Meanwhile Absalom bides his time, saying nothing "either good or bad" to Amnon. Absalom's remarkable forbearance, which would last two years, along with his earlier immediate recognition of Tamar's situation (v.20), suggests the possibility that Absalom has been behind this event, advising Jonadab what to say to Amnon, in order that Absalom would have just cause to kill Amnon and remove him as David's oldest son from likely succession to the throne (see also comment on vv.32–33). Amnon's acquired hatred for his half sister Tamar (v.15) is reprised in Absalom's acquired hatred for his half brother Amnon.

8. The murder of Amnon (13:23–39)

23–24 Two full years having passed, Absalom determines that the time is ripe to avenge the rape of his sister Tamar. He chooses the season of sheepshearing as a suitable if macabre backdrop for the murder of his brother Amnon. As the sheep of Absalom would lose their wool, so David's firstborn, the potential shepherd of Israel, would lose his life.

Absalom invites the king, together with all his sons and officials, to join in celebrating their mutual prosperity at Baal Hazor. Absalom's words to his father are well chosen in terms of both politeness and protocol. In his invitation he refers to himself as "your servant."

25 David declines the invitation, knowing that if his entire retinue would accompany Absalom it would be "a burden to" him. Absalom's urging to the contrary notwithstanding, David refuses to go and gives him his "blessing" (or "farewell"; GK 1385).

26a After asking for the impossible, Absalom cannily requests that Amnon alone be allowed to come. He probably realizes that David, knowing that Absalom may intend to harm Amnon because of what he did to Tamar, will not accede to his latter request any more than he did to the former. On the other hand, perhaps Absalom hopes that the two years that have elapsed since the rape have dimmed the event in his father's mind. In addition, Absalom refers to Amnon as "my brother," apparently to assuage whatever lingering fears David may have.

26b–27 To Absalom's chagrin, David does not agree immediately. His "Why?" smacks more of the suspicious than of the incredulous. This time, however, Absalom's urging is successful—and perhaps beyond his wildest expectations: The indecisive king not only allows his son Amnon to go but also sends the rest of his sons along with him.

28–29 Emboldened by his increasing success, Absalom is now in command. To be "in high spirits from drinking wine" is often to invite mischief (cf. Est 1:10–11) or disaster (see 1Sa 25:36)—or, in this case, mayhem ("Kill him"). Absalom both encourages and reassures his men. At the designated time, the "men did to Amnon what Absalom had ordered." Panic-stricken, the rest of the king's sons decide against waiting to find out whether Absalom's execution order will extend to them. They flee for their lives.

Thus David's adultery with Bathsheba is mirrored in his son Amnon's rape of Tamar, and David's murder of Uriah is reprised in Absalom's execution of Amnon. Applicable to the present situation, a principle enunciated by Paul says it best: "A man reaps what he sows" (Gal 6:7).

30–31 Before the princes arrive in Jerusalem, a false "report" comes to David, claiming that Absalom has killed "all the king's sons." It would seem that David's usually reliable intelligence network (see 10:5) has failed him this time. Like far too many rumors, the one that reaches David is a gross exaggeration.

David's immediate reaction to the news is both predictable and understandable: He "stood up" in alarm, just as his sons had done (v.29). Echoing the behavior of his disgraced daughter Tamar, who tore her robe to bewail the loss of her virginity, David tears his clothes as a sign of mourning, and his servants dutifully follow suit. As a further symbol of his grief, the king lies "on the ground" (cf. 12:16).

32–33 The false "report" is quickly challenged by Jonadab. The fact that he knows that "only Amnon is dead" and that his murder has been Absalom's expressed "intention" for the past two years lends further credence to the theory that Absalom and Jonadab had long ago hatched a plot to do away with Amnon, David's heir apparent and thus an obstacle to Absalom's pretensions. Jonadab's confident assertion being the true state of affairs, David should not "be concerned about the [false] report."

34–35 Whereas the king's sons had "fled" to avoid Amnon's fate (v.29), Absalom has meanwhile also "fled," in this case to escape royal retribution. Although the other princes escape to the refuge of Jerusalem, Absalom flees across the Jordan, far from Jerusalem—a flight mentioned three times (vv.34, 37, 38). One of the watchmen atop the walls of Jerusalem sees a number of men (the king's other sons) on the road leading to the city from the west. As Jonadab had earlier assured the king that of all his sons only Amnon was dead (see vv.32–33), so he now advises David to see with his own eyes that "the king's sons are here." He then adds a statement that is doubtless intended to ingratiate himself to David: "It has happened just as your servant said."

36–39 David's servants and sons join him in weeping and wailing "loudly" and "bitterly" at the tragic loss of David's firstborn son.

For his part Absalom, David's third son, flees for his life to Geshur in Aram (cf. 15:8) to find protection in the household of Talmai, his grandfather on his mother's side (see 3:3). David continues to mourn for "his son"—doubtless Amnon, although the fact that the narrator does not name him leaves open the slight possibility that Absalom is intended (cf. 18:33–19:4). The depth of David's grief over Amnon's death is underscored in the statement that he mourned for his son "every day."

The narrator ends the section by briefly exploring David's attitude toward Absalom after the period of mourning for Amnon is over. The king has no desire to march out against Absalom. Instead, he is ready to be prodded toward a reconciliation.

9. The wise woman of Tekoa (14:1–20)

1 The full name "Joab son of Zeruiah" (1Sa 26:6) signals a new beginning in the narrative (Joab has not been mentioned since 12:27). Joab chooses a time when he knows that David is thinking about Absalom.

2–3 Determined to enlist an expert to help his cause, Joab sends for a "wise" (GK 2682) woman to be brought to Jerusalem. His choice of a woman rather than a man is perhaps related to the nature of his mission, and his decision to engage a stranger rather than an intimate (such as Jonadab) may be calculated to catch David off guard and therefore help him ultimately to view his relationship to Absalom more objectively.

Upon the woman's arrival, Joab tells her to pretend that she is in mourning and to act as if she is grieving for the dead. She is thus asked to play a fictitious role. By telling her to pretend that she has "spent many days grieving for the dead," Joab is intentionally comparing her with David (see 13:37). Indeed, the woman from Tekoa and the king of Israel are twice bereaved: She has lost her husband and a son, and he has lost an illegitimate son born through Bathsheba as well as Amnon his firstborn.

Joab next orders the woman to go to the king and speak to him the specific words that he tells her (cf. v.19b). Joab is to be commended for choosing a messenger who is "wise" enough to use the words in the most persuasive way before the king.

4–5a Arriving at the royal court in Jerusalem, the woman of Tekoa gains an audience with David, as Joab had commissioned her to do. She pays due respect to the king by falling before him. In his role as judge and paramount, David in genuine concern asks the woman, "What is troubling you?" (cf. Jos 15:18; 1Ki 1:16; 2Ki 6:28).

5b–8 The woman begins her first appeal to David by identifying herself as a widow. As the sequel indicates, she is a consummate actress and spins a tale that is eminently believable.

Using the usual submissive language (referring to herself as David's "servant"), she states that her two sons got into a fight. The goal of one of the sons was apparently mayhem, and thus the battleground of choice was at some distance from their village—in a field with no witnesses and/or rescuers. There, says the Tekoite, one of the brothers killed the other.

The woman then states that, after the slaying of her son, clan loyalty took over and demanded retribution against the murderer. The Tekoite comes to David, not to dispute the general custom of blood vengeance, but to question its strict application to her only surviving son. Fabrication though it is, her story is persuasive enough to convince David that she is telling the truth. She claims that she has been ordered to hand over her other son to the clan. She concludes by hinting at the likelihood that their ulterior motive in putting her only surviving son to death was to get rid of the "heir" and thereby gain possession of the family property (cf. also v.16). She thus raises the issue of a conflict of interest.

In a final personal plea (v.7), the wise woman adds a note of pathos to her request. She accuses the clan members of wanting to extinguish the only "burning coal" remaining to her. He is all she has left, and when he is gone, her deceased husband will be without "descendant," and her husband's "name" (GK 9005) will be blotted out and thus forgotten.

The wise woman from Tekoa has spun an admirable tale. Plausible enough for David to believe it, the situation it describes differs enough from his own to keep him from becoming suspicious of her true purposes. Her story prepares the groundwork for what Joab wants her to accomplish.

Although David surely has the power and authority to reverse the decision of the woman's clan, he at first treads cautiously so as not to alienate a group that forms part of his own power base. Unlike his earlier forceful and decisive response to Abigail (1Sa 25:35), his statement to the Tekoite is uncharacteristically vague: "Go home, and I will issue an order in your behalf."

9–10 Undeterred, the woman is not to be dismissed quite so easily. Like Abigail before her, she makes a confession of guilt in the hope that doing so will force David to take action. Impressed by the woman's persistence, the king commits himself personally to make sure that no one who chose to interfere with the royal decision concerning her would ever "bother" her again.

11 Pleading that the king will pray to the Lord on her behalf, the Tekoite asks for divine help in preventing the "avenger of blood" from killing her only surviving son (cf. Nu 35:6–28; Dt 19:1–13; Jos 20).

Again using the Lord's name in a solemn oath (see 12:5; 1Sa 14:39), David promises her that not one hair of her son will "fall to the ground." David's reference to the "hair" of the woman's son is both ironic and poignant. The hair of his own son Absalom was not only an index of his handsome appearance (cf. vv.25–26) but would also contribute to his undoing (cf. 18:9–15).

12–17 Having received the assurance she needs, the woman is now ready to make her second appeal. When David gives her permission to say whatever she wishes, she addresses him in an open and forthright way. In the light of his firm determination to intervene on behalf of the murderous sibling for whose life she has just pleaded, why has the king "devised" (GK 3108) a thing like this? Unlike her own situation, which involves only a small clan, by allowing (or forcing) Absalom to remain in exile David has jeopardized the future welfare of all God's people.

To make sure that David understands the ramifications of what she is saying, the woman points out that his willingness to help her son convicts the king himself because he has not "brought back" Absalom, his own banished son. The woman of Tekoa demonstrates her expertise and wisdom by using a proverb about water spilled on the ground. Although its exact application is debatable (e.g., whether it means that life once lost cannot be recovered, or that death is inevitable, or that punishment for sin is irrevocable), the image of wasted water is suggestive and therefore appropriate in any event.

It is best to translate v.14b as a rhetorical question: "But will not God dedicate himself, and will he not devise [GK 3108] ways to make sure that a banished person does not remain estranged from him?" The Tekoite implies that God will effect Absalom's return from Aram to Israel. Although David has "devised" one thing, God "devises" another.

Having made her point, the woman concludes her second appeal by intermingling elements of it with those of her first appeal. She indicates that she had nothing to lose by seeking an audience with the king. She hopes that the king will "deliver" her from her avenger. She is afraid that her clan members will "cut off" her and her son from God's "inheritance" (either the land and people of Israel or an individual family's landed property in the Lord's land).

The Tekoite wants David's decision to bring her relief from a bad situation (v.17). Like Achish before her (see 1Sa 29:9) and Mephibosheth after her (cf. 19:27), she compares David to an "angel of God." David is capable of "discerning good and evil." The woman's stated desire that the Lord might be "with" the king not only expresses her hope that God will help him make the right decision(s) but also echoes a recurring theme with respect to David in the books of Samuel (see 1Sa 16:18).

18–19a Balancing the woman's request (cf. vv.4–5a), David makes a request of her—that she not keep the truth from him. He senses that she is not acting entirely on her own initiative and wants to know whether Joab's "hand" has been influencing her in what he now recognizes is her (= Joab's) effort to return Absalom to Jerusalem.

19b The woman takes a solemn oath that translates literally, "By the life of your soul." She implies that the king's words hit the mark precisely: Joab had engineered her deceptive gambit.

20 Ultimately, of course, David is not fooled by the fictitious story. Like an angel of God, he discerns good and evil (v.19) and knows "everything that happens in the land." If Joab has been able to "change" the present situation, his ploy is transparent to David. The woman may be "wise" (v.2), but the "wisdom" (GK 2682) of the king is like that of a divine messenger and, by implication, of God himself. At the same time, however, the Tekoite's compliment is not without its backlash. In its wider context, the narrative depicts the kind of royal power that Absalom will either try to undermine or seek to usurp.

10. Absalom's return to Jerusalem (14:21–33)

21 The name "Absalom" appears prominently in the section, but the key player is clearly Joab, who mediates between the king and his son and is eventually the catalyst that brings about their reconciliation. The king, impressed by the urgency and logic of the woman's arguments in her desire to save the life of her son, applies them to his own situation. He tells Joab that he will bring Absalom back from exile.

22–24 Like the Tekoite before him (cf. v.4) and Absalom after him (cf. v.33), Joab falls "face to the ground" before the king. The statement that Joab "blessed" (GK 1385) David surely implies a prayer directed to God that David would receive a divine blessing. Continuing in an attitude of humility mingled with courtesy, Joab expresses his gratitude that he has "found favor in [the king's] eyes."

Through the good offices and personal mission of Joab, Absalom's three-year exile in Aram comes to an end as he returns to Jerusalem. Not yet welcome in David's quarters or the royal court, however, Absalom must "go to his own house" within the palace precincts. Thus Joab's ultimate goal remains unfulfilled. David is still not ready to allow Absalom to have an audience with him.

25 Since he has a "handsome" father (1Sa 16:12; 17:42) and a "beautiful" sister (see 13:1), it is not surprising that Absalom himself should be "handsome." Like the most ideal of priests (cf. Lev 21:17–18, 21, 23) or the most desirable of women (cf. SS 4:7), Absalom is totally without "blemish" (GK 4583). Such uncommon good looks often attract fawning praise (cf. Ge 12:14–15), and so handsome is Absalom that in Israel he is the most "highly praised" of all.

26 Refraining from cutting one's hair was an emblem of the Nazirite (cf. Nu 6:5). For Absalom, however, it is a sign of vanity. Its weight is remarkable. What Absalom proudly considers his finest attribute will prove to be his downfall (cf. 18:9–15).

27 The narrator notes that three sons were born to Absalom, though they must have died in infancy (see 18:18). The name of his daughter has been preserved: Tamar, the same as that of her aunt, Absalom's sister, whose beauty his daughter reflects.

28–32 For two whole years, Absalom is not allowed to have an audience with the king. He finally decides to take drastic measures to get Joab's attention again and perhaps also to get even. He instructs his servants to torch a nearby field belonging to Joab. The loss of an entire crop of barley was a tragedy in ancient times (cf. Ex 9:28–31; Joel 1:11). On the basis of the Mosaic law (cf. Ex 22:6), Joab would have every right to demand adequate compensation.

If Joab's indignant reaction is understandable, Absalom has a ready answer. Joab has been unresponsive to Absalom's repeated pleas for his mediation, leaving Absalom with few alternatives. Unless the king grants him an audience soon, he might as well never have left Geshur in the first place. Absalom declares himself ready to be "put ... to death" (cf. the penalty for the Tekoite's son because of his alleged fratricide in v.7).

33 The three chief players in the chapter (the king, Joab, Absalom) come face-to-face at its end. Joab, suitably chastened by Absalom's rebuke, submits to his request and relays his desires to David. Summoned to the court, Absalom humbles himself by falling with his "face to the ground." But perhaps Absalom also gets the last laugh, at least for a while: Although he has "bowed down" to King David and then has been "kissed" by the king (who acts according to royal protocol and not as Absalom's father; cf. 19:39), David's subjects would soon "bow down" before Absalom himself, who would then "kiss" them (15:5–6).

11. Absalom's conspiracy (15:1–12)

1–6 Absalom's providing himself with a "chariot and horses" and "men to run ahead of him" symbolizes his ambition to acquire the trappings of royalty (see 1Sa 8:11). His plan to ingratiate himself to the people of Israel is as simple as it is subtle. Early each morning he takes up a position alongside the main road leading to Jerusalem's city gate, the place where disaffected citizens would be expected to bring their complaints for royal adjudication. He then asks such a person what town he is from. If the plaintiff responds that he is from one of the tribes of Israel, Absalom then assures him—apparently without further ado or investigation—that his claims are valid and "proper." He proceeds to commiserate with the person by deploring the fact that the king has no representative on hand to hear the case.

Needless to say, a solution for the plaintiff's dilemma is ready at hand: Absalom suggests that he should be appointed judge. Everyone could come to him, and he would personally see to it that justice was served. Continuing his royal posturing, Absalom proceeds to "take hold of" and "kiss" anyone who approaches him to "bow down" to him. In everything he does Absalom implies that he himself, and not King David, is best suited to provide the people with the "justice" they deserve. Thus Absalom "stole the hearts" of the men of Israel. Something must have gone seriously awry with David's rule to explain the readiness with which the people were willing to abandon him and follow his son.

7–12 After he has lived in Jerusalem for four years, Absalom decides that the time has finally come for him to seize the kingdom. As a way of masking his true intentions, he asks David for permission to go to Hebron (the same place where David was first anointed king; cf. 5:3), where he intends to fulfill a vow that he had made to the Lord. David, apparently unsuspecting, tells his son to "go in peace."

Meanwhile Absalom sends "secret messengers" throughout Israel. Their mission is to alert the various tribal territories that a prearranged signal ("the sound of the trumpets") is their mandate to declare Absalom king of Israel. A large contingent of men from Jerusalem, unsuspecting of Absalom's true intentions, has accompanied him to Hebron.

Realizing that if his designs on Israel's throne are to have any chance of success he will need all the expert advice he can get, he sends for David's own counselor, Ahithophel, whose son Eliam (cf. 23:34) is doubtless Bathsheba's father (11:3). It is therefore understandable that as Bathsheba's grandfather Ahithophel was an enemy of David.

Years before, David had experienced the exhilaration of growing stronger, while the house of Saul grew weaker (3:1). Now, however, the shoe is on the other foot. The evil alliance of Absalom's ambition and Ahithophel's advice causes Absalom's following to increase.

12. David's flight (15:13–37)

13–18 A messenger comes to David with bad news: The hearts of Israel are now "with" Absalom, and they are following him. David sees no way out but to "flee," an activity that is not new to him (cf. 1Sa 19:12, 18; 22:17)—and a cruelly ironic twist on Absalom's earlier flight to escape his father (see 13:34, 37–38). To his officials David counsels the utmost speed since Absalom can be expected to move quickly. If Absalom succeeds in overtaking David and his men, they will be brought to ruin and Jerusalem will be "put . . . to the sword," a terrifying fate at best.

The king's loyal officials are ready to abide by whatever decision he "chooses." In addition to his numerous wives, David also had many concubines, ten of whom he leaves behind to take care of the palace (see 16:21–22). All the rest flee with the king. David pauses temporarily as all his officials, together with his crack mercenary corps (the Kerethites, Pelethites, and Gittites), march before the king. By any reckoning David has a sizable and dependable military force to protect him from whatever contingency might arise from Absalom's delusions of grandeur.

19–23 The first high official in David's retinue to whom the king speaks is Ittai, the leader of the Gittite mercenaries, who is apparently considered trustworthy enough to share command of Israelite troops as well (see 18:2). David wants to know why he, of all people, would wish to accompany him in his flight, and he suggests that Ittai return to Jerusalem and stay with "King Absalom." It would seem that David considers Absalom's coup d'etat an accomplished fact. Ittai has nothing to gain and everything to lose by remaining with David. Because of Ittai's recent arrival on the scene, David is reluctant to make him "wander about" on a journey of uncertain destination.

Not to be dissuaded, however, Ittai takes the most solemn of oaths as he swears undying loyalty to David: He will never leave the king, whether in "life or death." David—however reluctantly—honors Ittai's determination and agrees to let him march on.

Whatever problems certain citizens of Jerusalem and other towns may have with David, people living in the countryside see him in a different light. He is their king, and they weep "aloud" in fear of an uncertain future as the entourage passes by. David crosses the Kidron Valley east of Jerusalem. Large numbers of his followers continue on toward the northern part of the Desert of Judah.

24–31 Sharing priestly duties during the reign of David, Zadok and Abiathar decide to accompany him on his flight from Jerusalem. Not wanting to leave the ark of the covenant in the city and perhaps trusting in its supposed powers as a military palladium if war should break out (cf. 1Sa 4:3–4), Levites carry it across the Kidron. As during another procession of the ark (see 6:13), they halt long enough for sacrifices to be offered.

Sensing no need for the ark to accompany him, David directs Zadok to take it back to the city. Hoping to "find favor in the LORD's eyes," he is prepared to resign himself to the will of God. David is confident that if the Lord so chooses, he will bring him back to Jerusalem to see again not only the ark in its proper setting but also the Lord's "dwelling place" (probably the city; cf. Isa 33:20). Even if the Lord is not "pleased" with David, he will accept "whatever seems good" to the Lord.

Zadok and Abiathar will be of more help to David back in Jerusalem than if they flee with him, so David tells them to return to the city with Ahimaaz and Jonathan. As for David himself, he will continue on his way and wait at the "fords in the desert" on the west bank of the Jordan. David expects the two priests to be involved together in gathering data about Absalom's plans. Following David's instructions (v.29), the two men took the ark back to Jerusalem with their sons and stayed there.

David and the people now ascend the Mount of Olives. As they do so, they express their sorrow and love by "weeping" and their despair and sense of foreboding by covering their heads. David walks barefoot to symbolize the shameful exile on which he is now embarking.

A harried king feels surrounded by conspirators, and David's intelligence network informs him that Ahithophel (his name means "My brother is foolishness") is among them. The news alarms David, and he turns to God for help: "O LORD, turn Ahithophel's counsel into foolishness [GK 6118]."

32–37 The summit of the Mount of Olives was a place "where people used to worship God." Upon arriving there David finds Hushai the Arkite waiting to "meet" him, his robe "torn" and dust on his head. As in the case of Zadok and Abiathar (cf. vv.24–29), David is convinced that Hushai will be of more value to him back in Jerusalem than as a fellow refugee. David therefore tells Hushai to return to the city and promise Absalom the same kind of faithful service that he had already given to David himself. By becoming a member of Absalom's inner council, Hushai would be able to assist David by "frustrating" (GK 7296) Ahithophel's advice, in answer to David's prayer (v.31).

Zadok and Abiathar are to be David's eyes and ears in the palace while the king is fleeing, and he wants Hushai to collaborate with them by telling them anything he hears there. The three men will then send the priests' two sons to David with whatever helpful information they have been able to gather. And so it is that Absalom, the king's treasonous son, and Hushai, the king's loyal "friend," arrive at Jerusalem simultaneously.

13. Kindness to Ziba (16:1–4)

1 Proceeding beyond the summit of the Mount of Olives, David is met by Ziba (see 9:2), the steward of Saul's grandson Mephibosheth. Ziba's entourage includes donkeys loaded with all kinds of provisions, items especially suited for men on the march. Apparently Ziba wants to demonstrate his loyalty to David.

2–4 Suspicious either of Ziba's motives or of the origin of the supplies, David inquires why he brought them. Ziba deftly dodges the question of whether he has a right to bring them and concentrates instead on their purposes, all of which are good and proper: The donkeys are for the king's household to ride on, and the foodstuffs are for nourishment and refreshment. People on an arduous journey quickly become "exhausted" and need special attention. Ziba, whatever his ulterior motives may be, declares his willingness to help.

Still skeptical, David wants to know where Mephibosheth is, perhaps to speak directly to him to find out whether Ziba is telling the truth. Ziba's response—later indignantly denied by Mephibosheth (cf. 19:26–28)—is that the latter has decided to stay in Jerusalem in the belief that the house of Israel will return the kingdom to the house of Saul and therefore to Mephibosheth himself. Apparently Ziba either did not know or did not care that the kingdom of Israel had long ago been torn from Saul by divine decree and given to David (see 1Sa 15:27–28).

For the moment at least, David chooses to believe Ziba. Without hearing the other side of the story, he punishes Mephibosheth in absentia by giving Ziba everything that formerly belonged to his master. Not unexpectedly, Ziba's response is servile: "I humbly bow." Mephibosheth has taught him well (cf. 9:6, 8).

14. Shimei's curse (16:5–14)

5–6 On the line of march of David and his party is Bahurim, the hometown of Shimei, a member of one of the Saulide clans. Shimei is in an ugly mood and curses David. Shimei's headstrong actions will not ultimately go unpunished (1Ki 2:8–9) in spite of his repenting of them (cf. 19:18–20). Not content with hurling curses at the king, Shimei pelts David and his officials with stones. Fortunately for David, his armed escort is protecting him on all sides.

7–8 Shimei continues his curse by demanding that David get out of Benjamite territory. He refers to David not only as a "man of blood" but also as a "man of Belial" (NIV, "scoundrel"). He tells David that because of all the blood he has shed in Saul's family, his ruin is inevitable (cf. 3:28 for the truth of this accusation). In any event, Shimei and doubtless many of his compatriots are apparently ready to acknowledge David's son Absalom as their new king.

9 Abishai cannot understand why a "dead dog" (a term of reproach and insult) should be allowed to curse David with impunity. To get rid of a minor annoyance like Shimei, Abishai wants to kill him.

10–12 Knowing that the "sons of Zeruiah" usually work in concert with one another, David's rebuke to Abishai apparently includes his brother Joab. "Sons of Zeruiah" is probably used in a disparaging or contemptuous sense here. David's long experience with God's intimate presence has taught him that if the Lord has prompted Shimei's curse, no one should question Shimei's motivation, however vindictive or otherwise unworthy it might be.

Widening his audience, David now addresses not only Abishai but also all his officials. He acknowledges that Absalom, like Saul earlier, is trying to take his life. It is not surprising, then, that the Saulide Shimei—"this Benjamite" (cf. 1Sa 9:21; 1Ki 2:8)—should be bent on David's ruin. David's mandate concerning Shimei is clear and forthright: "Leave him alone." David hopes that the Lord will turn this curse to his own benefit. After all, it is not an "undesired curse" (Pr 26:2). Thus David, while still pleading for divine mercy, reckons with the punishment that God is inflicting on him.

13 Shimei's pelting David with stones and cursing him do not stop. His persistence in such dangerous activity bears eloquent witness to the depth of his anger and frustration. As David and his party continue slowly on their way, Shimei keeps pace along a hillside that parallels the road. In addition to his stone-throwing, Shimei begins throwing dirt.

14 The king arrives in Bahurim (v.5a) with his entire entourage. The physical and psychological stresses of the journey leave him and his company exhausted, and he thus takes the time to "refresh" himself.

15. Ahithophel's advice (16:15–17:29)

15–19 Resuming the narrative that ends in 15:37, v.15 describes Absalom's arrival in Jerusalem with the main Israelite army, together with Ahithophel, who had formerly been "David's counselor" but has now defected to Absalom—doubtless because he feels that the future lies with the son rather than with the father.

Enter Hushai, who will turn out to be the fly in Ahithophel's ointment, an integral member of David's fifth column in Absalom's fledgling court. He is again described as David's "friend" (see 15:37). A Davidic loyalist, Hushai speaks to Absalom in words that are an exercise in studied ambiguity. If Absalom understands Hushai's "Long live the king!" as a reference to himself, it is virtually certain that in his own mind Hushai is thinking of David.

Although the first part of Absalom's response to Hushai may be intended as a question, it is also possible to read it as a caustic comment: "So this is the love you show your friend!" He questions Hushai's "love" (GK 2876), his covenant fidelity, to David. He also wonders aloud why the supposedly faithful Hushai did not "go with" David.

Hushai counters by ostensibly declaring his loyalty to Absalom. Beginning with the emphatic "No," he affirms that he will remain with the one whom the Lord has "chosen" (GK 1047). By appearing to refer to the pretender Absalom, Hushai is engaging in flattery since nowhere is Absalom stated to be the Lord's choice. On the other hand, the OT fairly teems with references to David as the one whom God has chosen—and thus Hushai once again secretly has David in mind.

As Hushai concludes his assurances to Absalom, he becomes less ambiguous, although even here he avoids mentioning Absalom's name directly. David had earlier asked Hushai to offer the same service to Absalom that he had formerly performed for David (cf. 15:34), and Hushai now fulfills that request.

20–22 Having listened to Hushai's pledge of fealty, Absalom turns his attention to a counselor whom he feels confident he can trust. Ahithophel first suggests that Absalom preempt his father's harem and that he have sexual relations with the ten concubines whom David had left behind in Jerusalem to take care of the palace. David had illicitly slept with a woman who was not his wife (cf. 11:4), and now his son is counseled to follow in his father's footsteps. Doing so, Absalom would make himself a "stench" in David's nostrils—a fact not necessarily to be deplored, although not without its inherent dangers. In this case, however, Ahithophel clearly believes that the "hands" of Absalom's supporters would be "strengthened" by such a bold move on his part.

Having the utmost confidence in Ahithophel's advice, Absalom agrees to it. A tent is pitched on the roof of the palace (cf. 11:2). The "tent" may have been intended to symbolize the "pavilion" occupied by the bridegroom and bride on their wedding night (Ps 19:4–5; cf. Joel 2:16).

Thus with the full knowledge of the people of Israel, Absalom sleeps with his father's concubines—little remembering that to do so may well jeopardize his inheritance rights (cf. Ge 35:22; 49:3–4) and compel him to forfeit them to another (see 20:3 for the final stage of this episode).

23 In theory, of course, Ahithophel's advice concerning David's concubines was entirely appropriate, since a king's harem was expected to be passed on to his successor (cf. 12:8). It is therefore understandable that both David and Absalom should respect the "advice" of Ahithophel and regard it as equal to that of one who "inquires of God." The value of Ahithophel's advice was like that of a priestly oracle divinely sent.

17:1–4 Sensing that he has successfully shored up Absalom's claims to kingship over Israel, at least in the eyes of the citizens of Jerusalem, Ahithophel now suggests to Absalom a bold military expedition that he is convinced will result in David's death. The "twelve thousand" suggests one unit from each of the twelve tribes to demonstrate the involvement of all Israel in Absalom's rebellion. Ahithophel also advises an attack on David while he is "weary" and "weak." His strategy involves a lightninglike surgical strike that would result in David's company fleeing in terror and the death of only "the king." All the other people would then be brought back to Jerusalem unharmed.

Absalom seems just as impressed by Ahithophel's advice on this occasion as he was earlier (cf. 16:20–22), an opinion shared by the "elders of Israel"—upon whom, after all, the ultimate responsibility for entering into covenant with a new king devolves. Nevertheless Absalom, realizing that whatever plan he adopts must be as nearly foolproof as possible, decides to get a second opinion.

5–13 Absalom therefore summons Hushai, whom he knows to be a trusted confidant of David but who—like Ahithophel (cf. 15:12)—has offered his services. In his response, Hushai first of all denigrates Ahithophel's second piece of advice by asserting that it is "not good"—a judgment that reflects the Lord's determination to frustrate Ahithophel's counsel.

Hushai makes capital of David's longstanding reputation as a "fighter." Indeed, David and his men are as "fierce," and therefore as dangerous, as a "wild bear robbed of her cubs." Due caution must be exercised in trying to outsmart or overpower David, whose fame as an "experienced fighter" (GK 408 & 4878) is widely known. David is a past master at knowing how and where to hide from pursuers (see 1Sa 23:22–23).

Warning Absalom that David on the offensive would have the strategic advantage and would therefore draw first blood, Hushai points out that the exaggerated news of the initial defeat would cause uncontrollable panic among Absalom's troops. Absalom's "bravest soldier" is no match for David's "brave" men, who in this regard emulate their leader (see 1Sa 18:17). Though their hearts be like that of a lion, Absalom's troops will "melt" with fear. David, after all, is a "fighter" (GK 1475) who has not flinched in the presence of lions (cf. v.10) or bears (cf. v.8), among the most dangerous of animals (see 1Sa 17:34–37).

After eloquently belittling Ahithophel's counsel, Hushai gives some advice of his own. If followed, his plan is so elaborate that it will consume enough time for Hushai to send instructions to David concerning what to do in the light of Absalom's troop movements. Hushai suggests that Absalom needs a much larger force than the mere "twelve thousand" men proposed by Ahithophel. He must enlist every able-bodied Israelite, "from Dan to Beersheba"—an enormous army. The ultimate flattery: Absalom will personally lead them into battle. Neither David nor any of his men will be able to survive an onslaught of such magnitude. David cannot possibly escape—not even if he "withdraws" into the presumed safety of a city. Using a vivid hyperbole, Hushai envisions the entire Israelite army attaching ropes to that city in order to "drag" it down into the valley. David's supposed haven will be so thoroughly demolished that not a "piece" of it will be found.

14 Hushai's rhetoric wins the day, thus giving David and his troops time to escape across the Jordan and regroup. Absalom makes his fateful choice, and Hushai becomes the point man in the Lord's decision to "frustrate" Ahithophel's counsel. The admittedly "good advice of Ahithophel," described so glowingly in 16:23, and the forthcoming "disaster on Absalom," implied in and hastened by Ahithophel's suicide (v.23), thus flank the erroneous judgment of Absalom and his men.

15–16 Having given Absalom advice that, if implemented, would turn out well for David (vv.5–13), Hushai now gives similar advice to the priests Zadok and Abiathar, who are in a position to carry out Hushai's instructions through their sons Ahimaaz and Jonathan (see 15:35–36). He quickly rehearses the substance of Ahithophel's advice and then contrasts it with his own obviously superior counsel.

Since there is no time to lose, Hushai's advice and its execution (vv.17–22) are suffused with an atmosphere of urgency. His message for David is that it would be too dangerous to spend even one more night in the desert. The king's only option is to cross the Jordan immediately. If he refuses to do so, he and his entire party will be "swallowed up."

17–22 The messengers designated to bring word to David (cf. v.16) are Jonathan and Ahimaaz, sons of Abiathar and Zadok respectively (see 15:27–28, 36). So as not to be accused of attempting to subvert Absalom's plans originating in Jerusalem while at the same time wanting to be near enough to keep in touch with developments there, Jonathan and Ahimaaz are staying at En Rogel, a spring in the Kidron Valley on the border between Benjamin and Judah close to Jerusalem.

A servant girl from Jerusalem relays the necessary information to the two men, who cannot risk "being seen" entering the city. But in spite of their caution a young man sees them and reports their whereabouts to Absalom. Knowing that they must act quickly, the two men leave En Rogel and go to Bahurim (cf. 16:5). There they climb down into a well in a residential courtyard, and the wife of the house's owner keeps their presence secret by spreading a covering over the mouth of the well. She then scatters "grain" over the covering, ostensibly to dry it out. The ruse works, and the men's hiding place is kept secret.

When Absalom's men arrive in Bahurim and ask the woman where Ahimaaz and Jonathan are, she says that they have already left. Apparently not believing her, they search the area, returning to Jerusalem only after failing to find the two fugitives. As soon as Absalom's men are gone, the two climb out of the well and go to deliver Hushai's instructions (cf. vv.15–16) to David, who is presumably still at the unspecified "destination" mentioned in 16:14. They advise him to cross the Jordan River and to do so "at once" in the light of Ahithophel's advice to Absalom to strike quickly and decisively. Sensing that there is no time to lose, David and his entire party cross over to the eastern side of the Jordan River under cover of darkness.

23 If 16:23 describes Ahithophel in glowing terms as being at the height of his power and influence because of the extraordinary brilliance and dependability of his "advice," 17:23 depicts him as realizing that his good "advice" has not been followed this time. Knowing that the implementation of Hushai's advice will not result in the death of David, who will thus return to Jerusalem seeking revenge on his enemies, Ahithophel therefore decides that the only course of action open to him is suicide. He returns to his hometown, puts "his house in order," and strangles himself. David's prayer of 15:31 is now answered.

24–26 The account of the crossing of the Jordan by Absalom parallels the similar narrative concerning David (vv.17–22), who stays one step ahead of his pursuers by continuing on to Mahanaim, the earlier headquarters of his rival Ish-Bosheth (see 2:8). Since Joab had apparently accompanied David on his flight from Jerusalem, Absalom had appointed Amasa to replace him as head of the army; he was most likely a relative not only of David but also of Joab. Although the exact location of Absalom's camp is not specified, the "land of Gilead" presumably encompassed Gad, and therefore Mahanaim, at this time—an ominous prospect for David and his men.

27–29 David is befriended upon his arrival in Mahanaim. Three staunch allies come to his aid: the Ammonite Shobi son of Nahash from Rabbah, Mephibosheth's patron Makir from Lo Debar, and the Gileadite Barzillai from Rogelim. They bring essential foodstuffs to supply his needs and those of the people with him. Knowing full well that the rigors of the desert flight have caused David and his party to become "tired" and that they are "hungry and thirsty," the allies give them the rest and provisions they need. Refreshed, David and his troops will engage Absalom and his army. The battle will be joined in Transjordan, and the outcome there will determine which of the two men will rule over all Israel.

16. Absalom's death (18:1–18)

1–5 David has formidable military strength at his disposal. He divides them into three divisions and sends them out under the command of Joab (the overall commander of David's army), his brother Abishai, and Ittai. Though a Philistine, Ittai the Gittite (see 15:19) is considered loyal enough to share command of David's regulars with Joab and Abishai.

David announces his intention to march out with them as well. The men point out that if they are forced to flee, or even if half of them are killed in battle, Absalom's soldiers "won't care about us." But "you," on the other hand, are "ten thousand" times as important as the troops (i.e., David is equal to all of them together). They are convinced that he will be of more help to them if he remains behind in Mahanaim.

Acquiescing to their wishes, David stands "beside the gate" of the city, a prominent and visible location from which to review the troops as they march off to battle. His final order to his three commanders is that they be "gentle" (GK 351; i.e., that they not deal too hastily) with Absalom. David's reference to his son as "the young man" indicates something of his paternal affection in spite of Absalom's destructive ambition, arrogance, and treachery.

6–8 The locale of the initial confrontation is "the field," which provides ample room for large-scale troop movements. In spite of the fact that the "forested hill country" of Ephraim and Manasseh was west of the Jordan River, the location of the armies of David and Absalom in Transjordan demands an eastern site for the specific "forest of Ephraim" mentioned here.

If in v.6 "army" refers to David's troops, in v.7 it signifies Absalom's men. "Defeated" and "casualties" highlight not only the devastation that has befallen Absalom's troops but also the key role played by the Lord in their overthrow. That "the forest claimed more lives . . . than the sword" reminds us that natural phenomena are often more deadly than human enemies (cf. Jos 10:11). This is best explained by the superiority of David's more skilled, private army being at home in the uneven and dangerous terrain and thus having a decided advantage over the larger conscript army of Absalom.

9–18 These verses provide a macabre example of how a forest can claim victims. Riding his "mule," a suitably regal animal, Absalom gets his "head" (most likely through his thick hair, cf. 14:26) caught in a tangle of "thick branches growing out from a large oak" tree as the mule passes under them and leaves its owner behind.

One of David's men is the first to see Absalom hanging in the tree. In reporting to Joab what he has seen, the man is characterized as a messenger who ordinarily brings bad news. To Joab, however, the news is bad only in the sense that Absalom is still alive.

Joab's call for violence and vengeance is totally in character: "What! You saw him?" Joab cannot understand why the man did not kill Absalom on the spot. Had he done so, it would have been incumbent on Joab to give the man ten shekels of silver as well as a warrior's belt (cf. 1Ki 2:5).

Not nearly so insensitive and unscrupulous as Joab, the man affirms that even a hundred times as much silver could not induce him to "lift [his] hand against" Absalom, who is after all the "king's son." He had been among the troops who had heard David order his three commanders to be gentle with Absalom, and he now reminds Joab of that fact. If he had killed Absalom, Joab would not have defended him, since ultimately "nothing is hidden from" David, who, like an angel of God—indeed, like God himself—"knows everything that happens in the land" (14:20). The king would surely execute the murderer of his son (cf. 1:15; 4:5–12).

Petulant and impatient, Joab declared his unwillingness to wait for his man to kill Absalom and decided to take matters into his own hands. He "plunged" three sharp-pointed weapons into Absalom, which pierced his heart. Mortally wounded, Absalom was then surrounded by ten of Joab's men, who finished the grisly task of striking and killing Absalom. In so doing they performed one of the functions of "armor-bearers" (cf. 23:37), who were expected to be ready to fight and kill when the occasion arose (cf. 1Sa 14:13–14; 31:4). Absalom's death brings to three the number of sons that David has lost as a result of his sins against Bathsheba and her husband Uriah.

Israel's erstwhile leader now dead, Joab "sounded" the trumpet to recall his troops. Absalom's corpse is thrown into a large pit in the forest, and an enormous heap of rocks is then piled up over him. The survivors among Absalom's troops have meanwhile fled to their homes.

The account of Absalom's demise concludes with a brief flashback summary of his own self-serving attempt to perpetuate his name. There are thus two monuments commemorating Absalom (the "heap of rocks" and the "pillar"), each in its own way as pitiable as the other.

17. David's mourning for Absalom (18:19–19:8)

19–23 Jubilant over the fact that Absalom's army has been defeated by David's troops, Ahimaaz asks Joab for permission to report to the king. His desire to "take the news" is doubtless prompted by his feeling that David will be as happy about the outcome of the battle as he himself is. What could be better news for David than that the Lord has delivered him from the rebellious Israelite troops?

Joab, however, at first refuses to send Ahimaaz, perhaps because he does not want to endanger the life of a messenger who will in fact be bringing bad news to the king. Another more likely messenger comes to Joab's attention: "a Cushite" (a person born either in the upper Nile region or in central and southern Mesopotamia). In their relationships with the people of Israel, Cushites were alternately friendly (cf. Jer 38:7–13; 39:15–18) or hostile (cf. 2Ch 14:9–15). Thus Joab sends him on his way, instructing him simply to tell David what he has seen.

Undeterred and unafraid, Ahimaaz again requests permission to take the news to David. As before, however, Joab tries to deter him and attempts to convince Ahimaaz that none of the news can be expected to "bring . . . a reward." Persistent to the end, Ahimaaz pleads a third time—and Joab finally relents. So intent is Ahimaaz on performing his mission well that, even though the Cushite has a head start, Ahimaaz outruns him, following a route that is less direct and longer than that of the Cushite, but over smoother territory.

24–27 The scene shifts to Mahanaim, the temporary headquarters of David. There the king, waiting for news of the outcome of the battle, sits between "the inner and outer" gates of the city, perhaps in one of the guardrooms. A watchman, standing on the roof of the gateway complex that forms part of the city wall, looks out toward the horizon and catches sight of a lone runner approaching the city. When the watchman calls to the king below and reports what he has seen, the king assumes that if the runner is by himself "he must have good news." The watchman then sees another man running, and this time he calls the information down to the city gatekeeper, whose duties included the dissemination of news to interested parties. The king is thus duly notified, and his response is the same as before.

Ahimaaz's reputation as a superb athlete has preceded him, and the watchman recognizes his running style even before he has gotten close enough for his face to be visible. For the third time David responds favorably, characterizing Ahimaaz as a "good" man and the news he brings as "good." However, the news turns out to be anything but good.

28–33 Arriving in Mahanaim, Ahimaaz first reassures the king with the common greeting. Ahimaaz bows down before King David "with his face to the ground." Beginning with an outburst of praise, Ahimaaz informs David that the Lord has "delivered up" the king's enemies. Again referring to Absalom as "the young man," David insists on knowing whether he is "safe." For his part Ahimaaz, who perhaps does not know that Absalom is dead, responds simply that he saw great "confusion," and he does not "know what it was." His question unanswered, David tells Ahimaaz to step aside and wait for the next messenger.

The Cushite then arrives with essentially the same report as Ahimaaz. When the king asks him the same question about Absalom, the Cushite responds that Absalom is dead. In the light of his obvious concern about his son, David's reaction to this death is totally predictable: He is shaken. Seeking privacy to weep alone, he goes up to the room over the city gateway and laments. David's mournful cry is filled with the pathos of a father's grieving heart: "If only I had died instead of you."

19:1–4 Doubtless a beneficiary of David's intelligence network, Joab is eventually told of David's "weeping" and "mourning" for his son Absalom. It is not long before Joab's entire army hears of it as well, with the result that what should have been for them a great "victory" (brought about by the Lord) becomes a cause for "mourning." Far from capitalizing on their triumph as an occasion for celebration, the men slink into Mahanaim like those who sneak in because cowardice has forced them to flee the battlefield. Meanwhile David, with face "covered," continues to cry aloud in mourning for his dead son.

5–8 David's army commander begins by upbraiding him for humiliating the very men who are responsible for having saved the king's life as well as the lives of all who are near and dear to him, including his "wives and concubines." But the heart of Joab's complaint is that David loves those who hate him and hates those who love him. Whatever else it may involve, at the very least "love" (GK 170) in this context surely implies covenant loyalty.

Joab has received the clear impression that the "commanders" and their men mean nothing at all to the king. Indeed, in his present frame of mind David would trade Absalom's life for those of everyone else. He swears on oath to David that if the king does not immediately go out and "encourage" his men by nightfall, no one will remain loyal to him. The troops of Judah thus having deserted David, no greater calamity for him throughout his entire life could possibly be imagined.

However reluctantly, the king is prodded into action by Joab's harsh words. If David formerly sat in the gateway of Mahanaim awaiting news of the battle's outcome, he now takes his seat there in his official capacity as king and head of the army.

18. David's return to Jerusalem (19:9–43)

9–15a Animated discussion is the order of the day as some Israelites remind their countrymen that David, despite whatever flaws he may have, had in fact been their conquering hero in the past, who had rescued them from their perennial enemies, the Philistines. But now he was still outside the country. Absalom, however, is dead, so the Israelites insist on knowing why their fellow Israelites "say nothing" about returning David to his rightful place on the throne in Jerusalem.

Sending word to his friends Zadok and Abiathar, the priests, David tells them to ask the elders of Judah (whom he had counted as his friends many years before) why they should be the "last" to bring the king back to the city (the desire to do so was by no means unanimous throughout Israel). In the meantime David is privy to the substance of the ongoing discussions, the news of which has reached him at his "quarters" in Mahanaim. At least partly because of his ancestry David senses a special tie between himself and the Judahite elders; so he repeats his incredulous question: "Why should you be the last to bring back the king?"

In addition Zadok and Abiathar are to say to Amasa, Absalom's army commander and also a blood relative of David (see 17:25): "Are you not my own flesh and blood?" Although Joab was also related to David (see 1Sa 26:6), he was Absalom's chief executioner as well (cf. 18:14–15), and thus his position as David's army commander is in jeopardy. By means of a strong oath (cf. 3:35), David replaces Joab with Amasa as the commander of his army.

Although it is impossible to know for certain whether it was David who "won over the hearts of all the men of Judah" (some texts make Amasa the subject), the end result is that they send word to the king to return to Jerusalem with all his men. Happy to comply with their request, David leaves Mahanaim and arrives at the Jordan River. The question concerning whether Israel or Judah would "bring the king back" is resolved—at least temporarily—in favor of Judah.

15b–23 Various other significant constituencies, however, also vie for David's approval. Shimei the Benjamite, Mephibosheth the Saulide, and Barzillai the Gileadite are the three key figures that represent them. The men of Judah intend to bring the king across the Jordan, from which he will lead his followers to ultimate triumph over the land.

Accompanying the men of Judah is Shimei, the Benjamite from Bahurim. He who had earlier been quick to curse David and pelt him with stones (16:5–14) now hastens to beg for mercy. With him are not only a thousand of his countrymen but also "Ziba, the steward of Saul's household, and his fifteen sons and twenty servants" (cf. 9:10). Shimei and his companions have come to take the king and his household westward across the ford of the Jordan and are eager to "do whatever he wished."

The story of Shimei continues in v.18b. He meets David on the eastern side of the Jordan, fully admits that earlier he did wrong, and begs the king not to hold him guilty and punish him. A short time ago he had called David a "man of blood" and a "scoundrel" (16:7–8); now he addresses him respectfully as "my lord the king." Recognizing how inappropriate his earlier conduct was, he readily confesses his sin. His misdeeds are part of a past that he would just as soon forget.

But Abishai, one of David's army commanders, will hear none of it. He wants to put Shimei to death for his cursing of "the LORD's anointed," not only because such rashness is entirely in character for Abishai, but perhaps also because to curse the king was considered a capital offense.

David's reply to Abishai echoes verbatim his response to him in an identical context earlier (see 16:10). David is in full control of the situation and he alone will determine Shimei's fate. David's response is addressed to both Joab and Abishai, though primarily to the latter. They have become his "adversaries" (GK 8477), meaning here his "legal accusers." Wanting to know why Abishai thinks he has to stand up for the king's rights, David rhetorically asks whether anyone should be executed. Turning to Shimei, he promises him on oath that his life will be spared.

24–30 The second—and central—of the three key men who come to meet David is Mephibosheth, Saul's grandson. David's exile from Jerusalem has encompassed many days if not weeks, and during that entire time Mephibosheth has not cared for his feet, mustache, or clothes in a way befitting a guest of royalty (cf. 9:7, 10–12). His refusal to wash his clothes demonstrates his desire to remain ceremonially unclean during the king's absence (cf. Ex 19:10, 14). David wants to know why Mephibosheth decided not to go with him when he was forced to flee from Absalom (cf. 1Sa 30:22). Mephibosheth counters that he had indeed wanted to go along but that since he is lame (see 5:8; 9:13) he needed to have his donkey saddled. Probably the string of donkeys Ziba had earlier saddled and brought to David (16:1–2) included Mephibosheth's own private mount. He also accuses Ziba of having slandered him in David's presence.

Mephibosheth, however, consoles himself that David will not be deceived by Ziba's actions. After all, King David is "like an angel of God" and therefore not only "knows everything that happens in the land" (14:20) but also exercises divine wisdom "in discerning good and evil" (14:17). He readily admits that Saul's descendants—including himself—deserved death from David, whose life Saul had persistently and mercilessly tried to take from him. By contrast, Mephibosheth is grateful that David has given him the privilege of being among those who eat at his table (see 9:7).

David responds to Mephibosheth by ordering him and Ziba to divide the land that he had originally restored to Mephibosheth (9:7) but had later turned over to Ziba (cf. 16:4). David demands this division to discern whether Mephibosheth or Ziba is the liar (cf. 1Ki 3:16–28). Mephibosheth offers the entire estate to Ziba; presumably, therefore, he received the fields back.
