22 Truth pleases God. Truthfulness rather than falsehood pleases the Lord. The contrast in consequences is strong: "pleasure" or "delight" versus "abomination." To speak falsehood is a misuse of a God-given faculty. We must act in good faith.

23 Discretion in speech. Wisdom is distinguishable from folly in speech. The "prudent" (lit., "a shrewd man") restrain themselves from displaying knowledge. The verb "keeps" (or "conceals") does not mean that they never speak; rather, it means they use discretion. Conversely, the intent of "fools" is to call out "folly."

24 Diligence. Diligence at work determines success and advancement. To put it bluntly, the diligent rise to the top and the lazy sink to the bottom, where they may be forced to work as if slaves (see also 6:6–11; 10:4; 12:27; 13:4; 19:15; and 21:5).

25 Encouraging speech. Words of encouragement will lift the spirits of someone who is depressed through anxious fear. Anxiety in the heart bows the person down—bowing in the sense of physical mourning (Pss 35:14; 38:6). The "kind word" probably includes encouragement, kindness, and insight—saying that which the person needs to gain the proper perspective and renew hope and confidence. One should seek to turn depression into rejoicing by saying the right things.

26 Dangerous associations. The righteous cautiously avoid dangerous friendships. There is a great variety of ways this verse has been translated and interpreted. The verb "is cautious" can be taken to mean "spy out" or "examine," which makes a fine contrast to the "leading astray" of the "way of the wicked." The proverb is advising correct action in friendships.

27 Success through diligence. Diligence leads to success. The negative image in the antithetical line is of the lazy person who cannot bring a project to completion. Just as a hunter may never cook what he finds, so the lazy person never completes a project.

28 Righteousness leads to immortality. Those who enter righteousness by faith and seek to live righteously are on the way to eternal life. "No death" may be taken to mean "immortality"; but it could also mean permanence and stability in this life.

Chapter 13

1 Accepting discipline. Those who are wise will respond properly to discipline. The "mocker" is the highest level of a fool. He has no respect for authority, reviles religion, and, because he thinks that he knows what is best, is not teachable. The change to a stronger word in the second line—"rebuke"—shows that he does not respond to any level of discipline.

2 Helpful or harmful speech. Words and wishes find their just rewards. This saying concerns the outcome of conduct. The clauses in this verse do not fit well. Most likely the second line is saying that the desire of the "unfaithful" (or "treacherous") is to obtain what does not belong to them. The "violence" that is their appetite refers to the violence that is done to others.

3 Wisdom of discretion. It is safest to hold one's tongue; a tight control over what one says prevents trouble (see also 10:10; 17:28; Jas 3:1–12). The old Arab proverb is appropriate: "Take heed that your tongue does not cut your throat."

4 On diligence. By contrasting "the sluggard" and "the diligent," the author makes the point that the fulfillment of dreams demands diligence. Rather than spend all day hoping for things that they do not have, the diligent will work toward realizing their dreams.

5 Hating falsehood or acting shamefully. Here is another contrast between the moral conduct of the righteous and the wicked: the righteous hate the way that is "false," but the wicked act vilely and shamefully. The words "shame" and "disgrace" can be taken as a hendiadys: "spread the smell of scandal."

6 Righteousness brings security. Righteousness, like a fortress, protects the person of integrity (see 2:11; 4:6). This may work through divine intervention or natural causes. "Righteousness" (GK 7407) refers to what conforms to law and order; so it is natural to expect that the perfect walk is safe. On the other side, perverse and malicious activity plunges one into sinful activity.

7 Honesty better than pretension. People may not be what they seem to be. Some who are poor pretend to be rich, perhaps to save face; some who are rich pretend to be poor, perhaps to conceal wealth and avoid responsibilities. Although there are times when such pretending may not be wrong, this proverb instructs people to be honest and unpretentious. An empty display or a concealing of means can come to no good.

8 Disadvantages of wealth. There are disadvantages to having possessions. The rich are exposed to legal and powerful assaults and may have to use their wealth as ransom. The poor person are free from blackmail and so ignore the attack and endure the consequences of difficulties.

9 Prospect for long life. The righteous can anticipate a long and prosperous life. The images of light and dark are used effectively: "light" represents life, joy, and prosperity; darkness signifies adversity and death. The figure of the light may very well be drawn from the enduring flame of the temple light.

10 Wisdom takes advice. Those who are wise listen to advice rather than argue out of stubborn pride. The idea of "pride" (GK 2295) here describes contempt for other opinions, a clash of competing and unyielding personalities. This kind of conceited person creates strife, inflames passions, and wounds the feelings of others.

11 Prosperity through honest investment. Steady and wise investment produces prosperity. This is a warning against wild speculation. "Little by little" (lit., "hand by hand") stresses the diligent activity and the gradual growth of one's investment. But if the riches come quickly through some unfounded or dishonest means, one could lose them just as easily.

12 Encouragement and discouragement. It is invigorating to realize hopes; to fail to do so can be discouraging or depressing. This is a general saying, applicable to both believers or unbelievers. Perhaps believers should make it part of their task to help others realize their hopes whenever possible.

13 Reward for heeding instruction. Safety lies in obedience to proper "instruction" and commands (a "command" [GK 5184] is more forceful than an instruction). The use of these two terms has religious significance: they usually refer to Scripture. The vivid point made in "will pay" (GK 2472) is that whoever despises the teaching will be treated as a debtor—he will pay for it if he offends against the law.

14 Benefits of instruction. The teaching of wisdom is life giving. The second line is the consequence of the first: not only does it give life, it turns one from the snares of death (a metaphor that suggests death as a hunter). On the "fountain of life, see also 10:11 and 14:27.

15 Discernment brings favor. Wisdom and intelligence add to one's social esteem. "Good understanding" describes the capacity for good sense, sound judgment, and wise opinions. The second line suggests that the way of treachery passes away (see NIV note).

16 Knowledge as basis of prudent acts. Actions either display wisdom or expose folly. The wise will study the facts and then make decisions. The "prudent" (GK 6874) here is one who knows the circumstances, the dangers, and the pitfalls; this makes him cautious. A fool will eventually make a fool of himself because it is his nature.

17 On servants. The faithfulness of a messenger determines the success of the mission. Here a "trustworthy envoy" (an expression suggesting government service—see Isa 18:2; Jer 49:14) ensures success (lit., "brings healing"). The "wicked messenger" falls into trouble, perhaps as a punishment.

18 Benefit of discipline. Responding correctly to discipline brings honor and success; "poverty and shame" come to those who refuse correction. The point seems to refer to commercial success: control and caution bring results.

19 Fulfilled desires. The lines here are difficult. One can surely say that Proverbs teaches people to make their desires good so that fulfilling them is cause for joy.

20 Associating with wise people or fools. Proper company contributes to safety and growth. One should associate with the wise and not with the fools. A wordplay in the second line stresses the power of association: "a companion of fools suffers harm." The point is clear: Examine who is influencing you.

21 Prosperity as reward of righteous. Here is teaching on recompense in absolute terms. It is this idea that Job's friends applied (incorrectly) to his situation. "Prosperity" comes to the righteous, calamity to the wicked.

22 Restitution by divine intervention. Divine justice determines the final disposition of one's inheritance. In Israel the idea of bequeathing an inheritance was a sign of God's blessing; blessings extended to the righteous and not to the sinners. See Ps 49:10, 17 for the idea of the wicked leaving their estates for others.

23 Poor, susceptible to injustice. Injustice can take away what hard labor produces. The verse may also be saying that anything produced through unjust means will not endure. The lesson concerns the proper way to deal with produce, not the size of one's resources.

24 Discipline as evidence of love. Parental love is displayed in disciplining the children responsibly. The powerful verbs "hates" and "loves" stress the point—hating a son probably means, in effect, abandoning or rejecting him. Too much lenience and too much harsh discipline are equally problematic. The balance comes when the child has room to grow while learning the limits.

25 Contentment as reward for righteous. Righteousness is rewarded by the satisfaction of one's physical needs (cf. the principles in Lev 26). This verse may also imply that what the righteous acquire will prove satisfying to them because they are righteous.

1 Prosperity in the household. A woman's wisdom enables the household to thrive. The contrast is between wisdom and folly; wisdom builds the house, but folly tears it down (cf. 9:1a). To see these ideas worked out, contrast the wise woman (31:10–31) with the foolish one (7:10–23).

2 Fear of the Lord brings uprightness. Here is a contrast between those who fear the Lord and those who despise him—the distinction is in the conduct produced: uprightness versus perversion (see 2:15; 3:32; 10:19).

3 Effects of speech. What people say has a great bearing on how they are received. The fool's conversation brings punishment; his talk harms him and he brings trouble on himself. But the speech of the righteous brings them safety.

4 Prosperity in business. To be productive one must use the appropriate means. For the farmer, oxen are indispensable; so the wise farmer will see to it that his oxen are numerous and in good condition.

5 True and false witnesses. A faithful witness does not lie, while a false witness pours out lies. The saying addresses the age-old problem of false witnesses in court that slow down the quest for the truth (see 12:17 and 16:10).

6 Acquiring wisdom. Those who are serious and discerning acquire wisdom. The contrast is between the "mocker" and the "discerning" person. The former is intellectually arrogant; he lacks any serious interest in knowledge or religion. He pursues wisdom only in a superficial way so that he might have the appearance of being wise.

7 Unprofitable associations. One cannot increase in knowledge by associating with a fool—nothing comes from nothing, as many can affirm. The verse is teaching people to get away from fools because they did not receive knowledge from what the fools said. If you want to learn, seek out the wise.

8 Considering one's conduct. Biblical wisdom is practical theology. While the wise give careful consideration to their conduct, the way of the fool is "deception."

9 Reparation. This verse is concerned with offending others. The parallelism suggests that the idea is that fools ridicule reparation whereas the upright show goodwill.

10 Personal emotions. There are joys and sorrows that cannot be shared. In their deepest emotional feelings of "bitterness" or "joy" people alone can understand those feelings. This proverb forewarns against any forced attempts to express empathy.

11 Prosperity ensured. Personal integrity ensures domestic stability and prosperity. The contrast is a simple one and the sentiment general. For comparison see 12:7 and Job 18:15.

12 Destructive nature of worldliness. One should be warned that any evil activity that seems successful and safe can take any number of turns to destruction. The proverb recalls the ways of the adulterous woman in chs. 1–9. The first half of the verse does not state that the way that seems right is a vice, but the second half clarifies that. The image used is of a traveler on a straight road; it seems safe, but it is fatal, because the destination is wrong. "Death" signifies mortal ruin (see 7:27; 16:25; also Mt 7:13–14). Evil, in other words, is often deceptive.

13 Mixed emotions. Life is filled with bittersweet things—no joy is completely free of grief. At first reading this proverb sounds pessimistic. The point must be the alternating emotions of life. Or it is suggesting that in some superficial joy there is underlying pain, and that once the joy leaves, the "grief" is still present.

14 On retribution. One's deeds determine one's rewards. The faithless are those whose heart turns aside; they will partake of their own evil ways ("be fully repaid"). The good man will be satisfied from his ways—his deeds are rewarding.

15 Discernment, opposite of gullibility. Wisdom prevents gullibility. This verse contrasts the simpleton with the prudent, i.e., the youth who is untrained intellectually and morally with the wise one who has the ability to make critical discriminations. The simpleton believes every word, probably because he hears what he wants to hear. The prudent person, however, discerns every step.

16 Avoidance of evil. Wise people are cautious and not reckless. The first line of the verse simply says that "a wise man fears and turns from evil." Since the holy name is not used, the verse probably does not mean that he fears the Lord (as in NIV) but fears the consequences of his actions—the wise person is thus cautious. On the other hand, the fool is reckless, self-assured, and overconfident.

17 Distasteful character traits. Two character traits that are distasteful to others are the quick temper and craftiness. The quick-tempered person acts foolishly and loses people's respect, but the malicious plotter is hated.

18 Knowledge and prudence. The kind of honor one receives in life is based on the amount of wisdom used. The contrast is between the simple who "inherit" folly and the prudent who are crowned with knowledge. "Crowned" may mean "embrace."

19 Victory over the wicked. Ultimately the wicked will acknowledge and serve the righteous. The figure used here is of a conquered people kneeling before their victors awaiting their commands. While this proverb has its primary focus on triumphs in this life, one cannot help but think of the ultimate fulfillment of the thought in Php 2:10.

20 Popularity of wealth. Possessions determine popularity. This is just a statement of the reality of life. The poor are avoided and "shunned" (lit., "hated") as useless by their neighbors, but "the lovers of the rich are many."

21 Proper treatment of neighbors. One cannot sin against a neighbor and hope to enjoy God's blessings. The line contrasts the sin of despising a neighbor (assumed to be poor or at least in need) with showing favor to the needy. "Despises" (GK 996) means to treat with contempt or to discard one as worthless. To ignore a neighbor in this cold-hearted fashion is just as much a sin as showing favor to the poor is an act of righteousness.

22 Good and evil conduct. One's moral behavior is usually the result of planning. The contrast is between "those who plot evil" and "those who plan good." The result of the first is going astray and of the second showing faithful love (NIV note, "show love and faithfulness"; these words usually describe the Lord's intervention, but here they refer to the kind dealings of the righteous).

23 Diligence profitable. Profits come from hard work and not idle talk. The "hard work" is a term introduced in Ge 3:19. Empty talk leads to poverty (see Job 11:2; 15:3; Isa 36:5). People should be more afraid of idle talk than of hard work. Or, to put it another way, do not just talk about it—Do it!

24 Wealth as a benefit for the wise. Wisdom has its own rewards—here, riches. The second line seems to be saying that fools only have their folly. The point is that fools can only expect greater exposure of their folly.

25 True and false witnesses. Telling the truth in court effects swift justice in the outcome of the trial. The person who tells the truth "saves lives"—he is a true witness. The point is that this person will deliver someone else from death in a false charge by coming forward with the truth. On the other hand, a false testimony deceives the court and brings ruin. Nothing good is gained by perjury.

26–27 Security in the fear of the Lord. The reverential fear of the Lord leads to family security and to life (cf. 13:14). The "fear" finds expression in obedience to the law with all its rewards and punishments, and this ensures the safety. The children mentioned here are the God-fearer's children. Exodus 20:5–6 declares that children will reap the benefits of the righteous parents if they love the Lord too; so if fear gives the parents security in the Lord, it will be a refuge for their children.

28 Political power. A prince's power varies with the size of his empire. From a human viewpoint political power is based on the number of people in the party.

29 Patience and a quick temper. Patience is the evidence of "great understanding." Those with quick tempers (lit., "hasty of spirit") exalt folly, i.e., they bring it to a full measure. So one should cultivate understanding.

30 Benefit of contentment. It is healthy to find contentment, for envy brings constant turmoil. That is, a healthy spirit is the life of the body—it soothes. On the other hand, envy brings pain and problems. The word for "envy" (GK 7863) describes passionate zeal, a violent excitement that is never satisfied. The one who is "consumed with envy" has no peace.

31 Treatment of the poor. How people treat the poor displays their faith in the Creator. Here is the doctrine of the Creation in its practical outworking. Those who oppress the "poor" show contempt for their Maker, for that poor person also is the image of God. Showing favor for the poor honors God because God commanded this to be done (see Mt 25:31–46; cf. Pr 14:21; 17:5; 19:17).

32 Confidence in calamity. Those who trust and obey the Lord have a sense of security in catastrophe. The contrast is with the wicked who are cast down in the time of calamity; the righteous even in death have a "refuge." That is, the righteous hope in a just retribution. A problem often raised is that nowhere in the book of Proverbs is hope for immortality found. Rather death is seen as a misfortune. Nevertheless, this verse may be a shadowy forerunner of that truth.

33 Possession of wisdom. The greatest amount of wisdom resides with those who have discernment. The second line is difficult. It is usually translated "even among fools she lets herself be known." This may be ironic or sarcastic: fools, anxious to appear wise, blurt out what they think is wisdom but in the process turn it to folly.

34 National righteousness. The prosperity and the power of a nation depend on its righteousness. The verb "exalt" (GK 8123) means that the people's condition in that nation is elevated. On the other hand, widespread sin is a disgrace.

35 Clever and incompetent servants. A servant's competence will affect the king's attitude toward him: the wise servant is a delight, for he is the skillful, clever one. But the incompetent one is the bungler who botches the king's business and whose indiscretions and incapacity expose his master to scandal and criticism.

Chapter 15

1 Conciliatory speech. The way one answers another person will have an effect on the response. This antithetical proverb stresses that it is wise to use a gentle answer to turn away wrath. More than merely gentle or soft, the idea seems to be conciliatory, i.e., an answer that restores good temper and reasonableness. To use a "harsh" word is to cause "pain" (same Heb. word; GK 6776) and will bring an angry response. Gideon in Jdg 8:1–3 is a classic example of the soft answer that brings peace, whereas Jephthah illustrates the harsh answer that leads to war (Jdg 12:1–6).

2 Wise or foolish speech. How wise people are can often be determined by what they say: knowledge comes from the wise and folly from the fools. "Commends" (GK 3512) means literally "makes good" or "treats in a good or excellent way."

3 Divine omniscience. The Lord knows everyone completely. This verse is not meant as a statement of theology but as an incentive for conduct. For the righteous divine omniscience is a great comfort (cf. 2Ch 16:9; Ps 11:4; Heb 4:13).

4 Helpful or harmful speech. What a person says can bring either healing or harm. Healing words bring life and vitality to the spirit, but perverse, twisted, or "deceitful" words crush the spirit (cf. Isa 65:14).

5 Heeding discipline. How well one responds to discipline reveals one's character. The fool spurns it while the prudent individual heeds it, showing good sense (cf. v.20; 13:1, 18).

6 Reward for righteousness. Prosperity is one reward for righteousness. The Hebrew of the second line says that the income of the wicked is "a thing troubled." The word "trouble" (GK 6579) is usually calamity that one man brings on another (as illustrated by Achan).

7 Spreading knowledge. Wise people will spread knowledge when they speak—their words are profitable. This verse is concerned with teaching. The idea of the second part of the verse is simply that the fool has no comprehension of knowledge.

8 Acceptable and unacceptable worship. The spiritual condition of the worshiper will determine the acceptability of the worship. Sacrifices from wicked people are unacceptable because they are insincere and blasphemous (cf. v.29; 21:3, 27; 28:9, et al.; see also 1Sa 15:22; Ps 40:6–8; Isa 1:10–17). On the other hand, prayer from the righteous pleases God. Sacrifice is an outward ritual and easily performed by the wicked, but prayer is a private and inward act and not usually fabricated by unbelievers.

9 Conduct acceptable to God. Parallel to the preceding verse, this verse uses "detests" (GK 9359) to describe God's reaction to the life of the wicked, in contrast to "loves" (GK 170), which describes his approval of the righteous. God hates the way of the wicked, i.e., the sin but not the sinner; and God loves those who follow after righteousness.

10 Necessity of discipline. Discipline must be used for those who go astray, but in this discipline they may die prematurely. The word "path" (GK 784) is used for the life of righteousness stressed throughout the book. The relationship of the two lines is probably synonymous: the "stern discipline" of the first line is parallel to the death in the second. That is, it is one thing to sin and find forgiveness but another altogether to refuse correction and receive such stern discipline (cf. Ro 8:13).

11 Divine omniscience. The Lord knows every intent of every individual. The argument here goes from the lesser to the greater ("how much more"). Sheol and Abaddon represent the remote underworld and all the mighty powers that reside there (see 27:20; Job 26:6; Ps 139:8; Am 9:2; Rev 9:11). If that remote region with its inhabitants is open before the Lord, how much more the motives and thoughts of people (cf. Ps 44:21).

12 Discipline rejected. Mockers resist all efforts to reform them. They are fixed in their ways and will not change to live according to the advice of the wise (cf. 1Ki 22:8).

13 Joy and sorrow. The emotional condition of a person has an obvious effect on body and soul. Joy is inspiring and is expressed by a cheerful face, but "heartache" is depressing, i.e., "crushes the spirit." The words used here stress the pain and the depression with a note of despair (cf. 17:22; 18:14; Ge 40:6; Isa 66:2).

14 Knowledge sought by the discerning. Those who are wise and discerning desire knowledge (cf. v.7). Throughout Proverbs knowledge is linked with righteousness, and ignorance goes with sinfulness. "Feeds on folly" signifies the acquisition of folly.

15 Joy and sorrow. Life can be delightful or difficult, depending on one's circumstances and disposition. The contrast is between someone inwardly "oppressed" and a "cheerful" person. The proverb recommends the cheerful frame of mind; the image of the feast signifies enjoyment of life's offerings. This is far better than the evil days (see Ru 1:20–21; Hab 3:17–18).

16–17 Spiritual things better than physical wealth. These two verses stress that spiritual things are far better than material wealth. The fear of the Lord brings more satisfaction than wealth with discontentment. "Turmoil" is anxiety; the reverential fear of the Lord alleviates such anxiety. Not all wealth has this disadvantage, but when it does, it is undesirable. Second, happy, loving relationships are more desirable than a great meal where there is hatred. All too often wealth replaces love in a family. The ideal is to have a loving family, friends, and great food; but short of that, a humble meal with love is preferable.

18 Effect of patience on strife. It takes great patience and calmness to maintain peaceful relationships. The contrast is with the "hot-tempered man" who stirs up dissension, and the person who is slow to anger (i.e., "patient"). See also 14:29 and 15:1.

19 Progress of diligence. Diligence normally determines progress in life. The slothful seem to find obstacles along the way—their way is like a hedge of thorns. By contrast, the way of the upright is like a well-made road; i.e., a "highway"—they have no reason to detour or swerve (see also 6:10; 10:26; 28:19).

20 Effect of wisdom on others. Wise children affect their parents' joy (see also 10:1). This verse describes the callousness of the one who inflicts grief on his mother.

21 Proper course of life. A valuable lifestyle must be maintained by wise decisions. This proverb shows the importance of good judgment and "understanding." The fool follows any whim of fancy, and it is a delight to him because he lacks "judgment" to see the folly in it. The one who has insight follows in a "straight course." Knowledge is the foundation of character.

22 Value of advice. The success of plans requires using good advice (see 11:14). This general observation has value on the personal and national level.

23 Appropriate speech. It is most satisfying to be able to give timely and fitting advice. To say the right thing at the right time is satisfying; it requires knowledge and wisdom.

24 Conduct beneficial for life. A life of wisdom preserves life. The righteous expect to live long and healthy lives (2:20–22; 3:18; 5:6; 10:17; 13:14). The second part of this verse clarifies the first: wisdom prevents a person from going to "the grave" (Heb. Sheol; GK 8619). "Upward" probably refers to physical life, while "going down to the grave" refers to physical death.

25 Divine justice. The Lord administers his justice through righteousness. He brings down the proud but protects the needy. Scripture amply confirms that the Lord champions the cause of the widow, the orphan, the poor, and the needy, who were often the prey of the proud (cf. 1Ki 21; cf. also Pr 16:19; Isa 5:8–10).

26 Plans pleasing to God. The Lord is pleased with plans that have righteous intentions. The "thoughts of the wicked" will harm other people, and these are an abomination to the Lord.

27 Greed and contentment. Those who are secure in their circumstances will not succumb to the evil devices of greed. The "greedy" are those who want a big cut, who are in a hurry to get rich, and who are not particular how it happens. The verse is actually a warning against taking bribes. "Gifts" could be innocent enough, but they may alter one's values. So hating bribes is the safest path to follow (see Ge 14:22–24; 2Ki 5:16, 20, 27).

28 Carefully planned speech. Those who are wise are cautious in how they answer, in contrast to the wicked who blurt out vicious things. The mind of the righteous "meditates on" or "studies" how to answer. This verse advises one to say less but better things.

29 God's response to prayer. God's response to prayer is determined by the righteousness of the one who prays. The wicked keep a distance from him, and God is inaccessible or deaf to their appeal (see the motif repeated in Ps 22). Of course, a prayer of repentance by the wicked is the exception, for by it they become the righteous.

30 Good news. It is uplifting to hear good news. The "cheerful look" (lit., "light of the eyes") may indicate the gleam in the eyes of the one who tells good news. The idea of "health to the bones" comes from a Hebrew expression that is literally "makes the bones fat," a symbol of health and prosperity (see also 17:22; 25:25; Ge 45:27–28; Isa 52:7–8).

31 A teachable person. A teachable person will become wise. This proverb shows how the one who listens to reproof that is beneficial to life will be at home with the wise.

32 Benefit of discipline. Accepting discipline is important to personal development. Those who despise discipline, slight or despise themselves (i.e., they reject themselves as if they are of little value and so fail to grow). One must acquire understanding, especially about oneself, to grow spiritually, intellectually, and emotionally.

33 Fear of the Lord, wisdom, and honor. Humble submission in faith to the Lord brings wisdom and honor. The idea of the first clause is similar to 1:7 and 9:10. Here it may mean that "the discipline of wisdom [teaches] the fear of the LORD." The second clause has its contrast in 18:12, where pride leads to destruction. Here humility brings honor (see also 22:4).

1 Divine enablement. The verse is in the form of a contrast—"the plans of the heart" and the "reply of the tongue" are contrasted by the prepositions "belong" and "from." The verse can be taken in one of two ways: (1) the thoughts and the speech are the same, or (2) the speech differs from what the person had intended to say. The second view fits the contrast better. God sovereignly enables people to put their thoughts into words. The word "reply" seems to refer to a verbal answer to another person (15:1, 23; Job 32:3, 5); so when someone is trying to speak before others, the Lord directs the words according to his sovereign will.

2 Divine omniscience. The Lord alone, by his Spirit and Word, can evaluate our behavior because he penetrates our hearts and knows our motives. People might seem "innocent" in their own estimation, but self-deception and rationalization make this estimation unreliable. The word translated "innocent" (GK 2341) is used for pure oils, undiluted liquids; here it signifies unmixed actions. The person may be far from pure when the Lord weighs the motives. The figure of "weighing" signifies evaluation (see Ex 5:8 ["require"]; 1Sa 2:3; Pr 21:2; 24:12; cf. 1Sa 16:7).

3 Plans committed to God. The verb "commit" (GK 1670) is literally "roll" (the figure of rolling, as in rolling one's burdens onto the Lord, is found also in Pss 22:8; 37:5; 55:22). This word portrays complete dependence on God, accomplished with a spirit of humility and by means of a diligent season of prayer. For our plans to succeed, we must also have God's approval. Not every plan we have is pleasing to him; but for those that are, this verse is a great comfort.

4 Divine retribution. Our sovereign God ensures that everything in life receives its appropriate retribution: all his acts are part of his plan. Since the wicked are punished in the end, this proverb adds that that is his plan for them. In God's order, every act includes its answer or consequence.

5 The fall of the proud. The Lord will surely bring down the "proud of heart," i.e., those who arrogantly set themselves presumptuously against God (see 2Ch 26:16; Ps 131:1; Pr 18:12). The second phrase explains what the Lord hating the proud means. One can be absolutely "sure" (lit., "hand to hand," as in a confirming handshake; cf. 11:21) that such people will not go free.

6 Freedom from sin. Faithfulness to the Lord brings freedom from sin. The first half of this verse speaks of atonement for sin, and the second of avoidance of sin—so from both sides the stress is on complete freedom from sin. The couplet "love and faithfulness" often characterizes the Lord, but here, in parallel to the fear of the Lord (as in 3:3–7), it refers to the faithfulness of the believer. Such faithfulness bring atonement for sin. The word "evil" can mean calamity or disaster, but it probably means sin or evil doing (see also v.17; 3:7; 4:27; 13:19). Thus, reverential fear of the Lord prompts the believer to turn from evil doing.

7 Peaceful conduct. The subject matter of the verse is "a man's ways" that are "pleasing" to the Lord. The question is: who is the subject of the second clause? The appropriate choice is the "man" and his "ways"—it is his godly lifestyle that disarms the enemies. A life that pleases God will be above reproach and find favor with others. This is part of God's plan for rewards. But we must remember that like many proverbs, this one must not be pressed to universal applications (cf. 2Ti 3:12 for a contrasting statement).

8 Righteousness better than unjust wealth. Few possessions with righteousness is better than much gain with dishonesty. The form follows the "better" sayings and so presents a contrast. There are of course other options (such as wealth with justice), but this line does not consider them. The "little" is not necessarily abject poverty; it could refer to modest income. The main contrast is between "righteousness" and "injustice." Unethical conduct tarnishes great gain and will be judged by God.

9 Sovereignty of God. The Lord sovereignly determines the outworking of our plans. The Bible in general teaches that only those plans that are approved by God will succeed. The point of contrast in this verse is between what we plan and what actually happens—God determines the latter (cf. Eph 3:20).

10 Responsible speech. Next is a series of proverbs about kings. This first one teaches that kings must speak righteously in their official capacities. The first part states that when the king speaks officially, it is as if it were "an oracle." His words form an oracular sentence, as if he speaks for God (see Nu 22:7; 23:23; 2Sa 14:20). The effect of this is that his mouth "should not betray" justice. For a portrayal of the ideal king, see Ps 72 and Isa 11:1–5.

11 Honesty in business. The Lord is the source of honesty and justice in all human enterprises. This proverb concerns weights and balances; the law of the Lord prescribed that they be just (see Lev 19:36; Dt 25:13; Am 8:5; Mic 6:11). Shrewd people kept light and heavy weights to make dishonest transactions—as a modern individual might keep two sets of books. But the verse, using synonymous parallelism to stress the point, affirms that righteous and just measures are from the Lord.

12 Stability in government. A righteous administration determines the stability of a government. Kings detest criminal acts because their thrones are "established" in righteousness. This saying stresses the ideal that righteousness characterizes the administration in God's theocracy (see Dt 17:19–20; 2Sa 7:13–16; Isa 32:1). If this proverb had been written after the monarchy had disintegrated, there would have been a great variance between the ideal and the real. But coming from the golden age of Solomon, the ideal was still credible.

13 Honesty approved. People who are honest and candid are valuable to governments. Political leaders know that without such their domains would become anarchic. Those who speak uprightly please kings. Ideal rulers love righteousness and not flattery.

14 Wisdom appeases wrath. The wise person knows how to pacify the unexpected or irrational anger of leaders. This proverb, with its dictum and consequence, introduces the danger of becoming a victim of such caprice. The first part describes the "wrath" of the king as "messengers of death" (cf. Solomon's assassinations of Adonijah, Joab, and Shimei in 1Ki 2:25, 29–34, 46). When the kings's wrath so threatens, a wise person will try to pacify or "appease it."

15 Encouragement from rulers. This proverb is the antithesis of v.14. By using two figures it describes the benefits of having a king who is pleased with his subjects. The king's brightened face signifies his delight and thus means life for those around him. His favor is symbolized by the "rain cloud"—the latter rain or harvest rain, which is necessary for a successful harvest. Some of the ideas here are similar to Ps 72:15–17, which portrays the prosperity of the land as a blessing on account of the ideal king, whose righteous reign seems to ensure prosperity.

16 Wisdom better than wealth. Wisdom is more valuable than money. These two are not incompatible; but the comparison here is between wealth without wisdom and wisdom without wealth. The point of the verse is to encourage people to acquire wisdom and understanding (cf. 3:14).

17 Righteousness prevents evil. Righteous living is a safeguard against calamity. The first line asserts that integrity avoids evil, and the second explains further that the person who guards his way protects his life. Righteous living is like a "highway," a raised and well-graded road. This well-cared-for life, this integrity, turns from evil. The metaphor of the "way" means that the person "guards" his way and thereby safeguards his life.

18 Consequences of pride. Pride leads inevitably to a downfall. Arrogance is the first step down. The lines are synonymous. Many similar sayings have appeared to warn against pride.

19 Humility better than plunder. It is better to be oppressed than to oppress. One should cultivate a humble spirit regardless of economic status; but one should never share the loot of those antagonistic to God. The "lowly" and the "proud" are here ethical and religious descriptions for the haughty, who rebel against God and are overbearing and oppressive, and for the humble, who submit to God and are unassuming and inoffensive.

20 Blessing of faithfulness. Faithfulness to the Lord brings his blessing. This simple proverb stresses that those who trust in the Lord and "heed ... instruction" will be blessed by him; they will find earthly prosperity and heavenly bliss from living a life that is right with God.

21 Competent speech. Wise speech builds a reputation for competence and enhances influence. It leads to the reputation of being "discerning," and its influence coming from sweet or "pleasant words" is to "promote instruction"—namely, the teaching will be well received because it is persuasive.

22 Prospect for life. An individual's prospects in life are determined by one's wisdom. Here is another antithetical saying. "Understanding" is a "fountain of life" (see 10:11; 13:14; 14:27; 18:4), but "folly" brings "punishment" to fools. Again Proverbs affirms that little can be done for or with the fool.

23 Wise speech. Those who are wise ensure that they say wise things. The first part asserts that the wise heart "guides" the mouth; the second one adds that such a heart increases the reception of what one says (see v.21).

24 Beneficial speech. Pleasant words are comforting and encouraging. "Pleasant words" are described as "a honeycomb" (see Ps 19:10); added to this are the predicates "sweet" and "healing." One might recall how Jonathan's eyes brightened when he ate the honeycomb (1Sa 14:27); such is the uplifting effect of pleasant words.

25 Consequence of conduct. This proverb is identical to 14:12. Conduct that seems to be right may end in disaster. The contrast is with the "way" that seems right and the "ways of death," which in the end provide the reality for the short-sighted evaluation.

26 On diligence. Hunger drives people to work diligently. Motivations are necessary for a person to continue working, especially if the labor is drudgery; hunger is the most frequent motivation. "Appetite" (lit., "soul"; GK 5883) means that part of human nature that craves food; for the "life" is a bundle of appetites. The second clause adds an explanatory idea: his "mouth" (NIV, "his hunger") presses him on.

27 Malicious conduct. Scoundrels plan ways to slander people. The "scoundrel" is literally a "man of Belial [GK 1175]"—a term describing deep depravity and wickedness. He is a wicked person, for "he digs up evil." The meaning of "plots" (GK 4125) is that of bringing evil to the surface (cf. 26:27; Jer 18:20). What he finds he spreads; his speech is like scorching fire—the simile speaks of the devastating effect of his words.

28 Divisive speech. Slanderers and gossips cause divisions. The wicked is described as "a perverse man" ("a man of falsehoods," "a liar") and a "gossip," namely, one who whispers and murmurs (18:8; 26:20, 22). This kind of person will destroy close friendships by what he says.

29 Evil associations. Violent people influence others toward violence. The word for "violent" (GK 2805) often refers to sins against society, social injustices, and crimes. The "path that is not good" must refer to habits of crime. The author warns people to keep away from such villains.

30 Wicked character traits. Often people who plan wicked things betray themselves with malicious expressions. Two such expressions are depicted here: winking the eye and pursing the lips. Facial expressions often reveal whether someone is plotting something evil (see 6:13–14).

31 Reward of a long life. Righteousness is rewarded with longevity in life. This proverb presents the ideal, of course, for it does not include evil old men. The equity envisioned in Proverbs is that the wicked come to an early end but the righteous endure. "Gray hair" is the "crown of splendor"; it can only be attained through righteousness. While the proverb presents a simplified observation, there is something commendable about old age that can remember a long walk with God through life and can anticipate unbroken fellowship with him in glory.

32 Patience more effective than power. Patience is preferable to physical power. Normally patience is an attribute of God (see Ex 34:6); here it describes a human being who has his emotions under control. This saying would have significant meaning in the times when military prowess was held in high regard.

33 Sovereignty of God. The Lord controls the decisions that are submitted to him. The verse concerns the practice of seeking divine leading through casting lots, which God controls. This chapter ends as it began, with a word about God's sovereignty.

Chapter 17

1 Value of peace. Poverty with peace is better than prosperity with strife. This contrast makes a preference for the better of two circumstances. On one side is the "dry crust" with quietness, like bread without butter or a morsel of bread not dipped in vinegar. In this humble setting there is "peace and quiet," which is better than a house of "feasting" (lit., "sacrifices"; GK 2285) and "strife." The use of "sacrifice" suggests a connection with the temple in which the people may have made their sacrifices and had abundant meat to eat. Rarely would the Israelites have meat apart from sacrificial occasions. The contrast formed, however, is not between the morsel and the meat but between peace and strife. Abundance often brings a deterioration of moral and ethical standards as well as an increase in envy and strife.

This broken piece of pottery, with a name scribbled on it (called an ostracon), was likely used to cast lots (cf. 16:33).

2 Ability is better than privilege. Faithful and prudent servants are more highly honored than disgraceful sons. The setting is the ancient world where servants only occasionally advanced beyond their station in life. This proverb focuses on the prudent or "wise servant" who uses all his abilities effectively. This one rules over the "disgraceful son," becoming a joint heir with the brothers. The meaning is that the worthless son will be disinherited.

3 Divine omniscience. The Lord examines every thought and every motive. One side in the imagery used here is silver and gold being purified; the other is the Lord "testing" human hearts. Such examinations are always constructive; they are designed to improve the value of the one being purified.

4 Malicious speech. The wicked find malicious talk appealing. Those who listen to it are in fact malicious themselves. The metonymies "lips" and "tongue" signify speech, and the qualifications "evil" and "malicious" show this speech to be destructive. Leviticus 19:17 warns people to rebuke those with such malicious words and not to bear evil with them.

5 Speech that mocks the poor. Anyone who mocks the misfortune of the poor holds the Creator in contempt and will be punished. The first part of each unit identifies the subject matter: "mocking the poor" and "gloating over disaster" ("disaster" is meant to explain the poverty). The second part of each unit diverges: the first explains that those who do this reproach or "show contempt for" their Maker; the second line affirms that they will be punished. The idea of reproaching the Creator may be mistaking and blaming God's providential control of the world.

6 Honor in family relationships. People treasure their family heritage. The synonymous parallelism here focuses on this point from two sides—grandchildren are a crown to the aged, and parents are an honor to children. This idea comes from a culture that places great importance on the family in society; older people have the preeminence and receive appropriate respect.

7 Dishonest speech. A dishonest leader is worse than an arrogant fool. A comparison shows which of two things is worse. The word for "arrogant" (GK 3856) can also be rendered "excellent" (see NIV note). It describes lofty speech, and this does not suit the fool. "Fool" (GK 5572) describes someone who is godless and immoral in an overbearing way (see 1Sa 25:25; Ps 14:1). The second line makes the point: "how much worse lying lips to a ruler!" This "ruler" is a gentleman with a code of honor, to whom truthfulness is almost second nature. Lies simply are not suited to him. So the lesson is that if fools should not speak lofty things, then certainly honorable people should not lie.

8 Success of bribery. Those who use bribery meet with widespread success. The word for "bribe" (GK 8816) may simply refer to "a gift" that opens doors, the explanation being that it was the custom to offer a gift for most occasions. This would not be as problematic as a bribe and would fit well in this positive statement. The Law clearly prohibited taking bribes (Ex 23:8); true bribery is described in v.23. This proverb is expressing a reality from the viewpoint of the one giving the bribe—it works. It is a "stone" that brings "favor," a "lucky" stone.

9 Love shown by discretion. How people respond to the faults of others reveals whether or not they have compassion. The contrast here is between "he who covers over an offense" of a friend and the one who "repeats" the news about it; the former promotes love and the latter alienates friends. Friendship requires the ability to forget. The true friend buries the wrong done for the sake of love.

10 Value of discipline. Discipline in the form of "rebuke" will benefit the wise but not the foolish. The wise will be humbled by a rebuke and learn from it; but not even a hundred lashes will make such an impression on the "fool." The proverb may also be saying that in general physical punishment is less effective than criticism.

11 Certainty of retribution. Those bent on rebellion will surely meet with severe retribution in the form of a "merciless official." This latter expression may refer to a pitiless messenger that the king would send; but it may also refer to storms, pestilence, or any misfortune that was God's messenger of retribution.

12 Dangerous associations. It is dangerous to encounter a fool engaged in folly. The first clause literally says, "Let a bear robbed of her whelps meet a man" (see 2Sa 17:8; Hos 13:8). The contrast explains that this would be less dangerous than meeting a "fool" engaged in "his [wicked] folly." The human, who is supposed to be intelligent and rational, in such folly becomes more dangerous than the beast that in this case acts with good reason.

13 Justice for ingratitude. Acts of ingratitude will be punished accordingly. This saying presents a condition and its consequences: the condition is when "a man" repays "evil for good"; and the consequences are that the punishment fits the crime—"evil will never leave his house." The verse does not explain whether God will turn evil back on him directly or whether people will begin to treat him as he treated others.

14 Strife controlled. Conflicts must be stopped before they get out of control. Starting a "quarrel" is like "letting out water" (NIV, "breaching a dam"). The image is of a small leak, perhaps in a dam, that starts slowly to spurt water. The problem will only get worse. One should stop a quarrel before strife breaks out.

15 Justice corrupted. The Lord hates any miscarriage of justice. This proverb uses effective wordplays to express the two things the Lord hates—declaring "righteous" (NIV, "acquitting") the person who is a "guilty [criminal]" and "declaring guilty" (NIV, "condemning") the person who is "righteous" ("innocent"). Such reversals are detestable to the righteous Judge of the whole earth.

16 Wisdom inaccessible to fools. This proverb asks a rhetorical question: What good is money, for what one really needs (i.e., wisdom) cannot be bought. The person under consideration here is the "fool" (GK 4067), the one who lacks the intellect to gain wisdom in the first place. He may desire the reputation of the wise, but he will not live up to its demands.

17 Friends are loyal in adversity. The love of a true friend is strong and constant. In this verse, the "friend" and the "brother" are equated. Faithful "love" is always present in a true friend, even in times of "adversity," when it might be severely tested.

18 Wisdom in business. It is foolish to pledge security for someone else's loans. The lack of judgment is introduced with the idea of striking hands and then clarified by "puts up security." The point is similar to 6:1–5.

19 Arrogant and contentious speech. Arrogant and contentious speech ends in destruction. The words used here are figurative: the "gate" is the mouth, and so to make it "high" is to say lofty things—the person in question brags too much (see 1Sa 2:3; Pr 18:12; 29:23). The figure would be comparable to the use of "trap" for mouth in American English. Thus the proverb is about a quarrelsome and arrogant individual who loves "sin" and invites "destruction." The destruction could be what he inflicts on others but may also mean what he brings on himself.

20 Wicked conduct. Wicked ways and words lead to trouble. The wicked person has a "perverse" heart, meaning he is morally crooked, and a "deceitful tongue," meaning he has turned away from the truth. All who are wicked in their plans and speech can expect only trouble ahead. The idea of "trouble" refers to calamity or adversity in this life.

21 Folly, a grief to others. Parents experience grief if their children become fools. It is not always a completely joyous experience to have children, not with the world and human nature as they are. "Fool" (GK 5572) portrays a slow-witted dullard, whether it be in spiritual, intellectual, or moral matters. A father who hoped for a son who would be a credit to the family and the faith may find only disappointment.

22 Emotions affect health. One's psychological condition affects one's physical condition: a healthy attitude fosters good health but a depressed spirit ruins health. The "heart," as with the spirit, refers to the mind. The positive and healthy outlook on life brings healing. On the other hand, a "crushed spirit," i.e., one that is depressed or dejected, has an adverse effect on the health of the body. "Bones" figuratively represents the body (encased in the bony frame): fat bones mean a healthy body (see 3:8; 15:30; 16:24), but dry bones signify unhealthiness (cf. Eze 37:1–14).

23 Justice perverted by bribes. Bribery perverts justice. The "wicked man" who accepts the gift is a corrupt judge or some other official. The fact that he accepts it "in secret" (lit., "from the bosom") indicates it is not proper. The purpose of accepting the bribe is "to pervert the course of justice."

24 Concentration on one's plans. The wise persist in following a course of wisdom. They understand the true issues of life and concentrate on the path of wisdom. "Fools," however, lack any serious concentration and are unable to fix their attention on anything—so they drift in the limitless sea of uncertainty.

25 Effect of folly on parents. It is a bitter grief to have a child turn out to be a fool. See v.21; 10:1; and 15:20.

26 Unjust punishment. It is a mistake to punish people who are innocent. The second part of this proverb is perhaps showing how wrong the first part is namely, punishing the righteous makes about as much sense as flogging an official for his integrity. In any case, this verse clearly affirms that punishing the righteous is improper.

27 Self-control. The wise restrain their speaking and control their actions. They are "sparing" of words and "even-tempered" (lit., "cool of spirit"). The intent of this proverb is to teach that in order to gain composure and restraint one must develop knowledge and understanding.

28 The wisdom of silence. Silence is one evidence of wisdom. Even fools appear wise in silence—at least they conceal their folly by keeping silent. Fools who do this do not, of course, become wise; they just hide their folly.

Chapter 18

1 Antisocial character traits. An antisocial person is self-centered and unreasonable. This verse does not describe someone who is merely unfriendly or unsociable but one who is an enemy of society; its message is a warning against being a schismatic. The proverb goes on to describe the antisocial person as one who contends against all "sound judgment"; "defies" means "burst out in contention" (lit., "snarl," "show the teeth"; GK 1679). He opposes society and its decisions (see also 17:14; 20:3).

2 Fools and speaking. Fools prefer to give their opinion rather than acquire wisdom. They find "no pleasure in understanding" (i.e., they detest understanding). Instead, they love telling what is on their mind (cf. 20:19; Ps 98:2). This is the kind of person who asks questions to show how clever one is rather than to learn.

3 Effects of sin. Wickedness leads to "contempt," and shame (parallel to contempt) leads on to "disgrace" or reproach. The point is that punishment for wickedness comes naturally from the community. One possible disgrace might be the critical rebukes of the community against the wicked person (for an example of the Lord doing this, see Mal 2:9).

4 Profound speech. The words of the wise are an inexhaustible supply of blessing and counsel. The figure of "deep waters" suggests an inexhaustible supply of words or, more likely, the idea that their words are profound. The figures of "fountain of wisdom" and "bubbling brook" describe the speech of the wise as a continuous source of refreshing and beneficial ideas.

5 Injustice denounced. It is reprehensible to pervert justice by showing partiality in judgments (cf. Dt 10:17; Mal 2:9). The predicate "not good" is an understatement—it is vile and wrong. The second clause reinforces the first clause: the innocent should not be "turned aside" (deprived) of their rights (cf.17:26; 28:21).

6–7 Speech that invites trouble. Foolish people get themselves into trouble by what they say. The reference here may be to legal controversies; since they are wrong, they are punished. The "beating" is probably physical, given either by a father or by society (see 19:25; Ps 141:5). Verse 7 continues the point of v.6. What fools say is their "undoing"; it is a "snare" to them.

8 On gossip. People delight in listening to gossip. This sad observation simply affirms the common trait of human nature. The words of the "gossip" are like "choice morsels." When such tasty bits are taken into the innermost being, they stimulate the desire for more.

9 Effects of laziness. Laziness is destructive. The lines form a comparison to express that the lazy person and the destructive person are equally detrimental to society. The first is "slack" in work; the other is a "possessor [= dealer] in/of destruction" (NIV, "one who destroys"). The link between these two is the term "brother"; it signifies that they belong to the same classification. For example, the one who is slack may look for shortcuts and may make things that fall apart. His destruction may be indirect and slow in coming, but it is just as problematic.

10 Security in the Lord's name. The Lord is fully able to protect those who trust in him. The first line establishes this truth, and the second focuses on the trust of the righteous. This is the only place in Proverbs where phrase "the name of the LORD" is found; it signifies the attributes of God, here the power to protect (cf. Ex 34:5–7). The metaphor of "strong tower" sets up the imagery of the second clause: "run" metaphorically describes a wholehearted trust in God's protection (see Isa 40:31), and "safe" (a military term; GK 8435) stresses the effect. Other Scriptures delineate how God protects his people in different circumstances.

11 Security in wealth. Wealthy people often assume that their wealth brings security. The imagery of safety (NIV, "unscalable"; GK 8435) links this proverb to the preceding; and since security is from God, this proverb is simply reporting a common assumption without commenting on it. Any protection that wealth may bring is limited; for, as Ps 49 teaches, money cannot bring ultimate security.

12 The reward of humility. The way to honor is through humility (see also 11:2; 15:33; 16:18). The humility and exaltation of Jesus provide the classic example of this truth (see Isa 52:13–53:12; Php 2:1–10). An antithesis makes the point: pride in the heart is the way to a downfall, but "humility" is the prelude to "honor."

13 Premature speech. Speaking too hastily is foolish and leads to shame. Poor listening reveals that the person has a low regard for what the other is saying or is too absorbed in self-importance.

14 A healthy spirit. This proverb contrasts a healthy spirit with a "crushed spirit": a healthy attitude sustains a person, but depression is unbearable. In physical sickness one can fall back on the will to live; but in depression the will to live may be gone, and there is no reserve for physical strength. The figure of a "crushed" spirit suggests a broken will, loss of vitality, despair, and emotional pain. Few things in the human experience are as difficult to cope with as this.

15 Knowledge sought. Those who are wise eagerly search for knowledge. By paralleling "heart" and "ears," the verse stresses the full acquisition of knowledge: the ear of the wise listens to instruction, and the heart of the wise discerns what is heard to acquire knowledge.

16 Influence of gifts. One may gain influence with important people through gifts. "Gift" (GK 5508) is more general than "bribe" (as in 17:8, 23). Thus this proverb is simply saying that a gift can expedite matters. But offering gifts is risky (see 15:27; 21:14), for by doing so one may learn how influential they are and start to make bribes (see Ge 43:11 for an example).

17 Necessity of cross-examination. The first half of this verse affirms that the one side in a dispute may seem right, but it must be challenged by the other. The proverb reminds us that there are two sides in any dispute (legal, domestic, or religious) and that all sides in a dispute must be given a hearing.

18 Disputes divinely arbitrated. Serious disputes may be prevented through divinely inspired arbitration. The assumption behind this saying is that providence played the determining role in the casting of lots. If both parties recognized this, the matter can be resolved, no matter how strong the "opponents." Today God's word and spiritual leaders figure prominently in divine arbitration (1Co 6:1–8).

19 Effect of disputes. Serious disputes create insurmountable barriers among friends. The Hebrew suggests that "an offended brother is [more isolated] than a strong city, and disputes are like the barred gates of the city." The proverb is talking about changing a friend into an enemy by abuse.

20 Productive speech. Productive speech is satisfying. In Proverbs words can bring either good or evil; "fruit" and "harvest" have good connotations, and so constructive and beneficial speech is in view here. Such speech has the power to make people happy.

21 Consequences of speech. What people say can lead to life or death. This proverb affirms this point and then explains it: "those who love it will eat its fruit." The referent of "it" must be "the tongue," i.e., what the tongue says. So those who enjoy talking must bear its fruit, whether good or bad. We should be warned by this proverb, especially if we love to talk.

22 The blessing of a wife. Although this verse does not say it, what it has in mind is clearly a "good" wife. Whoever finds a good wife—or, as it could be broadened, a good marriage—finds "good" (GK 3202, meaning "fortune" or "favor," not a "good thing"). This word describes that which is pleasing to God, beneficial to life, and abundantly enjoyable. The second line explains the first: finding a good mate is the sign of "favor" (GK 8356) from God. That is, a good marriage is a gift from God. Proverbs 31:10–31 develops this idea more fully, whereas other passages lament a bad wife (e.g., 12:4; Ecc 7:26). The background of the saying may be Ge 2:18, which affirms that it was "not good for the man to be alone."

23 Humble or harsh speech. One's social status determines the tone of one's voice. The contrast is between the poor man and the rich man. The poor man "pleads for mercy" because he has no choice—he has to ask. The rich man, however, often speaks "harshly"; he has hardened himself against such appeals because of relentless demands. It is a general view of the way of the world.

24 Loyal friendship. It is better to have one good, faithful friend than numerous unreliable ones. The idea of the first line may be that too many friends can become one's undoing, especially if these friends use him. The second line is clearer: "there is a friend who sticks closer than a brother." This indeed is a rare treasure!

1 Poverty better than folly. Personal integrity, even with poverty, is far better than foolish perversion. This proverb provides a contrast between two selected situations. One is poverty with integrity ("blameless") and the other is "perverse [speech]" of a "fool." The verse teaches people to follow honesty, even if it leads to poverty (see also 18:23; 19:22).

2 Zeal without knowledge. Ill-advised and thoughtless "zeal" (GK 5883) leads to failure. This word means "vitality," "drive"; it describes the eager person. Without knowledge such zeal will be unsuccessful. Neither is there success for those who are "hasty" (lit., "hasty with the feet") and "miss the way" (see Jdg 20:16; Job 5:24). The passage reminds us that we must know the time and the direction for action, or zealous effort will be a futile activity.

3 Blaming God. Fool are not willing to accept failure as their own; they try to blame God. The first line establishes the fact that it is "a man's . . . folly" that ruins his life; the second adds that he "rages" against God. Of course, to blame God is folly.

4 Effects of wealth. People run after the wealthy. Like 18:23–24, this proverb simply makes an observation on the reality of life by contrasting the rich and the poor; wealth adds many friends, but the poor are deserted by their friends. People will run after the rich, hoping to gain something; but they will avoid the poor, fearing that the poor might try to gain something from them.

5 False witnesses. A person who bears false witness, i.e., who "pours out lies," will be punished. The saying is general, because sometimes a perjurer gets away with the crime (see also v.9; 6:19; 14:5, 25).

6 Friendship with the influential. People seek the friendship of influential people. The verse's two ideas are loosely synonymous. The first uses the image of "stroking the face"; this means "to make the face soft" or "to curry favor" (cf. Ps 45:12). The second line introduces "gifts" again. As in 18:23, this proverb simply acknowledges the value of gifts, especially in business and politics.

7 Effects of poverty. People avoid those who are poor. The first two lines are loosely synonymous. But the third line adds, "He pursues them with pleading." The last line of the verse is open to various translations, none of which is completely satisfactory. The basic meaning of the passage is fairly clear, however: superficial friends and relatives will abandon a poor person. The plight of Job captures such an abandonment.

8 Wisdom is profitable. One who chooses wisdom and understanding "loves his own soul" (i.e., has regard for his own interests) and "prospers" (lit., "finds good").

9 On perjury. Those who bear false witness will be punished. This proverb is the same as v.5, except that the last line changes to "will perish."

10 Inappropriate positions in life. Two thoughts here present unbearable conditions, the second being worse than the first. "It is not fitting for a fool to live in luxury." Of course, if the fool changed and earned it, that is a different story, but this verse is about a misfit. The second thought is a slave who takes command over princes (see 12:24; 17:2). In these reversals the fool only makes worse his bad qualities—boorishness, insensitivity, and lack of discipline—and the slave becomes arrogant and cruel. For other unbearable things, see 11:22; 17:7; 26:1; 30:21–23.

11 Nature of patience. The first line refers to a person who prudently avoids anger and patiently passes over an offense. Patience like this is "his glory" (lit., "his honor," signifying more the idea of beauty or adornment).

12 Emotions of a king. This proverb observes that a king has the power to terrify or to refresh. By the use of two similes, it contrasts the king's "rage" with his "pleasure" or "favor." The first simile, the roar of a lion, presents him at his most dangerous attitude (see 20:2; Am 3:4); the second portrays him as benevolent. For similar teachings see 16:14–15; 20:2; 28:15. For a picture of the ideal king, see 2Sa 23:3–4.

13 How to ruin a family. Folly and strife destroy a home. Two problems bring chaos to a family. The first is a foolish son (lit., "son of a fool," meaning a son who is a fool), and the second is a "quarrelsome wife." The foolish son brings "ruin" to the father (cf. 10:1; 17:21, 25), but the quarrelsome wife is merely annoying (cf. 27:15–16).

14 A prudent wife. A prudent wife, unlike property, is God's special gift. The verse contrasts wealth that can be inherited from a father with a "prudent" wife who is from the Lord. When a marriage turns out well, one should credit God (see also 18:22; 31:10–31).

15 Consequences of laziness. Those who are lazy waste time and lose money. "Laziness" brings on a "deep sleep" (GK 9554). The Hebrew word describes complete inactivity (see Ge 2:21; Jnh 1:5); here it probably signifies lethargy. This individual wastes time that is needed to provide for himself and his family. Parallel is the "shiftless man," who goes hungry.

16 Obeying instruction. Obedience to instruction is a safeguard of life. These "instructions" (GK 5184) may refer to the teaching of the sages or to God's law. If it refers to God's commandments, then there is a stronger guarantee of safety for life. The second line announces that the one who holds in contempt "his ways" will die. "His ways" can refer to the conduct of the individual or to the divine instruction. If the latter is the case, then the punishment is more certain (even if through the courts).

17 Rewards for charity. The Lord rewards those who are charitable. Those who are "kind" to the poor are actually lending to the Lord, and the Lord will repay or "reward" them for their deed. This promise of reward does not necessarily signify that they will get their money back; the rewards in Proverbs involve life and prosperity in general (cf. Mt 19:27–28).

18 Benefit of discipline. It is necessary to "discipline" (GK 3579) children to prevent their premature death. This verb includes both chastisement and instruction. Proverbs here and elsewhere teaches that refraining from discipline allows a child to grow up stupid or wicked and thereby may result in his or her death. The motivation for discipline is "hope," an excellent reason to keep at it. The clause in the second half of the verse literally reads, "Do not lift up your life to kill him," meaning not to make the kind of decisions that will lead to the child's death (allowing him or her to go astray through neglect).

19 Hot temper. The second line of this proverb presents the consequence of the action of the first. A hot-tempered person is constantly in trouble. "Pay the penalty" suggests paying a fine; so the trouble could be legal. In the second line the warning is given that if you save such people from their legal troubles, you will have to do it again and again. Unless they change, they will always need bailing out.

20 Acceptance of instruction. By accepting advice and discipline, one becomes wise. The vocabulary of this verse reminds the reader of the first nine chapters of Proverbs: "Listen to advice and accept instruction [lit., discipline]." This advice is in all probability the teachings of the sages that will make one wise. "In the end" there will be maturity from all the discipline, and there will be a steadfast perseverance in the path of life.

21 Sovereignty of God. The success of our "plans" depends on the will of God. Only those that God approves will succeed (see 16:1, 9); his counsel or "purpose" will stand. Humans are diverse and uncertain; God is absolutely wise and sure.

22 Loyalty. Loyal love is better than wealth. What is desired is "unfailing love" (GK 2876), that bond between members of the covenant. Covenanters were expected to be faithful in their words and deeds of kindness. The second line may present a logical inference from this: "a liar" would be without "unfailing love" entirely, and so poverty would be better than that character trait.

23 Safety and contentment in the fear of the Lord. Piety brings a life of contentment and safety. "Life" (GK 2644) is probably a metonymy for all the blessings and prosperity in life. Its essential features are resting "content" and not being visited by calamity or "trouble." When one lives a life of piety, the Lord provides a quality of life that cannot be disrupted by such evil.

24 Nature of laziness. Some people are too lazy to eat. This humorous portrayal is certainly an exaggeration. It probably was meant more widely for anyone who starts a project but lacks the energy to complete it. The sluggard "buries" his hand in the dish and is too lazy to pull it out—even to feed himself (see also 26:15)!

25 Results of discipline. Discipline affects people differently. Three types of people are mentioned here: the "mocker" with a closed mind, the "simple" or simpleton with an empty mind, and the "discerning" with an open mind. The simpleton learns by observing punishment given to the mocker. Although the punishment will have no effect on the mocker, it should still be given; for the simpleton will learn what the mocker does not. But the discerning person will learn from verbal rebuke, even if it is painful truth. This is the more rational way.

26 Mistreatment of parents. One who abuses one's parents is a disgrace. The saying portrays this ingrate as a person who "robs his father" and "drives out his mother." Father/mother may be taken as a poetic word pair rather than as two ideas separating what is done to the father and then to the mother (see 10:1; 17:21; 23:24).

27 Rejection of discipline. The verse includes an admonition and its motivation (a result). The admonition uses irony: "Stop listening to instruction, my son." Of course, it means "Do not cease." The result of ceasing to listen is that the son "will stray from the words of knowledge."

28 Corrupt witnesses. When the wicked witness in court, they wilfully distort the facts. Such activity certainly "mocks" justice. The second line carries the thought further by saying that the "mouth of the wicked" (what they use to witness) "gulps down evil."

29 Certainty of retribution. Fools will be punished. "Judgments" may be rendered "penalties"; this parallels "beatings" closely.

Chapter 20

1 Effects of alcohol. The formal parallelism shows first the effects of intoxication and then makes an evaluation. The drinks are "wine" and "beer," made from grapes and grains (see Lev 10:9; Dt 14:26; Isa 28:7). These terms may be metonymies for those who drink them, or they may be personifications. In either case, the point is the conduct of the inebriated person—mocking and brawling. The excessive use of intoxicants excites drinkers to boisterous behavior and aggressive and belligerent attitudes; it confuses the senses so that they are out of control. The only evaluation possible is that whoever imbibes is unwise—it just is not sensible to drink to excess. Moreover, given the ease with which one may make a habit of this, it is wise to avoid alcohol entirely. In the OT the use of alcohol was not prohibited; in fact, it was regularly used at festivals and celebrations. But intoxication was considered out of bounds for a member of the covenant community (see 23:20–21, 29–35; 31:4–7).

2 Emotions of a king. It is unsafe to provoke the anger of a king, who cannot be treated like other people. The "wrath" of a king is compared to a lion's roar, indicating imminent judgment. Anyone who angers a king "forfeits" (lit., "misses" or "sins against"; GK 2627) his life. The simple idea is that one would do well to stay away from any angry person (see also 16:14; 19:12).

3 Avoiding strife. Honorable people find ways to avoid strife. A contrast is presented here between avoiding "strife" and jumping at a chance for a "quarrel" (includes the idea of snarling like a dog). The former is the way of honor and dignity; the latter, the manner of a "fool." One cannot avoid strife entirely but should avoid every unnecessary confrontation (see also 17:14, 28; 18:2).

4 Results of laziness. A farmer who is too lazy to plant at the right time will find no harvest. The first line describes the lazy man or "sluggard" who does not plant in the autumn. The right time for planting was the rainy season (see Ge 8:22). It was cold, wet, and unpleasant. Perhaps such discomfort was his excuse. The effect is that at harvest time, when he "looks" (lit., "asks"), there is "nothing." Since he actually looks for some harvest, the verse suggests that he did plant but perhaps at the wrong time or halfheartedly (contrast Ps 126:5–6). This character is typical of all who want excellence without putting forth the effort.

5 Discerning motives. Those who are wise can discern the motives of the heart. "Deep waters" probably means that one's motives are difficult to "fathom"—it takes a counselor with "understanding" to "draw them out." The line shows how important good counseling is.

6 Faithful love. It is rare to find a truly faithful friend. A contrast is offered here between many who claim to have faithful love and the rarity of one who actually has it. Many people profess "unfailing love" (GK 2987), but such professions are often hollow. The shift to "faithful" (GK 574) in the second clause makes this clear and captures the truth—it is rare to find one on whom you can actually depend.

7 Heritage of integrity. The integrity of parents extends to the lives of their children. Two terms portray this integrity: "righteous" (GK 7404) introduces the person as a member of the believing community who strives to live according to God's standards, and "blameless" (GK 9448) describes that person's lifestyle. In other words, this proverb describes a parent who believes in the Lord and lives out the claims of his or her faith. The second clause anticipates a blessing on the children. In God's economy the nature and actions of parents have an effect on children (Ex 20:4–6); they reap the benefits (see 14:26).

8 Justice necessary for a king. The righteous king discerns right from wrong. The king in the ancient world was a judge, whose counsel stood (see 2Sa 15:2–4; 1Ki 3:28; Ps 72:4; Isa 11:3–4). Justice is to be the basis of his administration; the image of winnowing shows that he removes evil from his realm (see Ps 101). The verse applies to any person in authority, but certainly the principle stands that a just government roots out the evils of society. Unfortunately, no government has ever lived up to this ideal.

9 Sinless conduct. No one can claim to be "pure" in thought and deed. There is a development in the second part of this verse. To claim to have kept the heart "pure" is to say that all decisions and motives are faultless; to claim "I am clean" is to say that moral perfection has been attained and that one is therefore acceptable to God ("clean" in the Levitical laws of purification means "purged of all sin"). Many passages affirm the inevitability of our sinfulness (Ge 6:5; 1Ki 8:46; Ps 143:2), and Ps 51:7 teaches that one can claim to be pure only if made pure by divine forgiveness. This proverb should bring us to personal humility and engender in us an understanding of the failures of others.

10 Honesty in business. The Lord detests dishonesty in business. See v.23 and 11:1, which are based on Dt 25:13–16.

11 Righteousness, displayed in actions. Righteous conduct reveals righteous character. The character of a "child" (GK 5853, a younger boy) can be recognized by his actions. Parents can recognize certain traits in a child's conduct. If they are pure and upright, they can cultivate this; if they are not, they must try to develop it through teaching, disciplining, and personal example.

12 Creation of human nature. The Lord has prepared people with the capacity to see and hear. By usage hearing also means obeying (see 1Sa 15:22; Pr 15:31; 25:12) and seeing also means perceiving or understanding (see Isa 6:9–10). The verse not only credits the Lord with creating these senses but reminds everyone of their spiritual use in God's service.

13 Diligence rewarded. Diligence leads to prosperity. The verse contrasts the ideas of loving sleep and staying awake, as well as their results of growing poor and being satisfied. Just as "sleep" can represent slothfulness, so opening the eyes and staying awake can represent vigorous, active conduct (see also 6:9–11; 19:15).

14 Honesty in business. Some people falsely appraise a deal to gain a bargain. This humorous but realistic proverb presents a buyer who complains about how bad the deal is for him, and then goes away bragging about it. This may simply reflect normal procedure in a world where haggling for prices was common, but it may also be a warning to the inexperienced on how things are done; it possibly also evaluates this procedure as a questionable business practice. Shrewdness is one thing, but deceitful misrepresentation in order to buy under value becomes unethical.

15 Wise words. It is rare to find someone who speaks knowledgeably; "gold" and "rubies" are far more common. "Lips that speak knowledge" means "lips that impart knowledge," i.e., wise speech.

16 Fulfilled obligations. People should be held to their obligations. A person who foolishly becomes responsible for another person's debts should have to keep his word. Taking the garment was the way of holding someone responsible to pay debts. The "one" for whom this person took responsibility is called "a stranger"—probably meaning other members of society.

17 Effects of dishonesty. Good things acquired dishonestly will not bring satisfaction. "Food gained by fraud" means anything obtained through dishonest means; it appears to "taste sweet." The imagery is advanced in the second line: "he ends up with a mouth full of gravel" (i.e., a mass of small particles; see Job 20:14–15; La 3:16).

18 Accepting sound advice. Effective plans incorporate sound advice. This verse presents a continuous idea of first making plans and then waging the war. Sound "advice" and "guidance" are indispensable to the success of the mission. Many have offered figurative interpretations of "war" as life struggles, litigation, or even evil inclinations; but there is no justification for this—it likely describes preparation for going to war, and in that there is wisdom in the consensus of leaders (see 24:6).

19 On gossip. The first line pictures the gossip as one who goes about revealing secrets, and the second line warns against associating with those who are always ready to talk. If they are willing to talk to you about others, they will be willing to talk to others about you. The less contact you have with a gossip, the better off you will be.

20 Cursing parents. Under the law (Ex 21:17; Lev 20:9; Dt 27:16), whoever cursed one's parents was cursed with death. That judgment seems to be caught poetically in this single sentence proverb. Cursing (GK 7837) means treating one's parents lightly or contemptuously. The punishment is that "his lamp will be snuffed out," and he will be left in pitch darkness. The lamp is metaphorical for the life; for the lamp to go out means death (13:9) and possibly also removal of posterity. In actual practice this may have been a social punishment only, that such a person be considered as one who is dead.

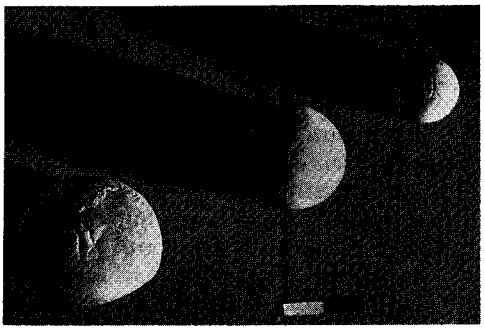
21 Prosperity unsatisfying. The statement that prosperity gained suddenly will not be blessed seems rather general. The implication is that what is "quickly gained" (GK 987) is either unlawful or unrighteous. This verb describes a hurried or hastened activity; perhaps a wayward son seized the inheritance (cf. Lk 15:12) or even drove out his parents (cf. Pr 19:26). In either case divine justice is at work—this enterprise "will not be blessed"; rather than prosper, it will probably be wasted.

22 Retribution is God's work. Leave retribution to the Lord; he will bring about a just deliverance. The verse uses two imperatives to make its point. The righteous should not take vengeance on evil, for only God can repay evil justly (cf. Ro 12:19–20). Rather, the righteous must "wait" on the Lord; this involves belief in and reliance on him. The work of the Lord here focuses on the positive side—he is a deliverer rather than an avenger, although to "deliver" the righteous involves judgment on the wicked.

23 Honesty in business. The Lord detests dishonesty in business (see also v.10; 11:1).

24 Divine providence. God's control of our lives is beyond human comprehension. This proverb asks a rhetorical question regarding this topic: since the steps of a mighty person are from the Lord—how, then, can anyone discern or "understand" his way? How can we delude ourselves into thinking that we do not need the Lord when even a strong person's activities are divinely prepared? As an example, see Ge 50:20; see also Pr 3:6 for the proper advice in view of this truth.



Honesty in business required standard weights (20:10. 23), such as these stones. Courtesy Ilan Sztulman of the Tel Miqne-Ekron Excavations.

25 Rash vows. This warning about making a rash vow addresses what was a common problem. Declaring something sacred (as in Mk 7:11) can lead a person into financial difficulties (Lev 27 explains that Israelites could buy themselves out of rash vows—it was expensive). After making a vow, one must consider to fulfill it. Too many people make promises under the inspiration of the hour, only later to realize that they have strapped themselves; they then try to go back on their word.

26 Removing wickedness through justice. A wise king discerns evil and purges his kingdom of the wicked. This proverb draws on the image of winnowing to explain how the king removes evil from his empire. The metaphor implies that the king can identify and rightly judge evildoers. The figure of driving the wheel over them represents a threshing process; the sharp iron wheels of the threshing cart easily serve the purpose (cf. Isa 28:27–28).

27 Conscience that searches motives. God provides everyone with a spirit that can evaluate actions and motives. The Hebrew literally says that the "breath" is the lamp of the Lord (see NIV note—the NIV interprets it differently and supplies "searches"). The "breath" (or "spirit"; GK 5972) is that inner spiritual part of human life that was inbreathed at Creation (Ge 2:7) and that constitutes humans as spiritual beings with moral, intellectual, and spiritual capacities. This spiritual nature includes the capacity to know and please God—it serves as the functioning conscience (the metaphor of "lamp"). This point is further developed in the second part; the searching makes it possible for people to know themselves. If one's spiritual life is functioning properly (i.e., yielded to God through salvation and controlled by his word [Heb 4:12]), then there should be increasingly less self-deception or indifference to righteousness.

28 Stability in government. Faithful covenant-love brings stability in society. The parallel ideas stress the security of the king's administration. The first line uses "love and faithfulness [lit., truth]," two terms that often form a hendiadys to express reliable love. "Love" (GK 2876) is singled out of this couplet to form the parallel idea that the throne is secure. These are covenant terms. In the Davidic covenant (cf. 2Sa 7:11–16) God promised not to take his covenant love from the king (cf. v.15) but to make his house stable and secure ("will endure," v.16). The two ideas are reiterated in Ps 89:19–37, which expresses the covenant in poetry. It is the Lord and his faithfulness to his covenant that ultimately makes the empire secure, though the enjoyment of divine protection requires the king to rule with loyalty to the covenant.

29 Strength and honor. Both youth and old age have their glory. This little observation reminds us that there are different commendations in life. For young men it is strength; for old men it is gray hair, which symbolizes dignity, wisdom, and honor. This verse must be taken in the context of ancient Israel and not modern civilization, which often has little respect for the elderly. In Israelite society, the elderly were the sages who offered their wisdom of experience to the people.

30 Spiritual value of discipline. Physical punishment may prove spiritually valuable. Loosely synonymous, the two clauses focus on corporal punishment. These "cleanse" the soul of evil. Though other proverbs have explained that certain people will never learn from such discipline, in general this saying is true.

1 Sovereignty of God. A king's decisions are controlled by God. The first line affirms that the decisions ("heart") of the king are under the Lord's control ("in the hand"), and the second explains that he directs the king as he pleases. As a farmer channels the water where he wants and regulates its flow, so does the Lord with the king. No human ruler, then, is supreme; or, to put it another way, the Lord is truly the King of kings. Scripture offers many examples (Ezr 7:21; Isa 10:6–7; 41:2–4; Da 2:21; Jn 19:11).

2 Divine knowledge. The Lord evaluates our motives and not merely our actions. This verse reiterates the point that we may think we know ourselves; but the Lord knows our hearts, and his knowledge is evaluative (see also 16:2).

3 Priority of righteousness. The Lord requires righteousness before religious service. Doing "what is right and just" is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice (see 15:8; 21:29; 1Sa 15:22; Ps 40:6–8; Isa 1:11–17; et al.). It does not teach that ritual acts of worship are to be avoided; rather, it stresses that religious acts are valueless without righteous living.

4 On pride. Arrogant pride is sin. The Hebrew reads literally, "Haughty eyes and a proud heart, the tillage of the wicked is sin." What is "tillage"? This figure indicates that the product of the wicked is sin. Thus also pride and arrogance are products of the wicked. This verse portrays pride as sin.

5 Patient planning brings prosperity. This verse exhorts industriousness. Patience and planning lead to prosperity. The "plans of the diligent" lead to profit, while "haste" often leads to poverty. The text here warns about the danger of hasty shortcuts (see also 10:4 and 28:20).

6 Prosperity by fraud. A fortune gained by fraudulent means will be a fleeting treasure. The subject of this proverb concerns a "fortune" made by a "lying" tongue. Two ideas comprise the predicate: "fleeting vapor" and "deadly snare." It is as if the treasure disappears into thin air. The second idea, "deadly snare" (lit., "snares of death"; see also Ps 18:5), suggests a crime. In other words, ill-gotten gain is a fleeting pleasure and a crime for which punishment is prepared.

7 Just retribution. The wicked will be destroyed in their own devices. It is their "violence" that destroys them—it "drags them away," probably to more sin, but ultimately to their punishment. But they are not passive victims of their crimes—"they refuse" to do justice. In the final analysis they can blame only themselves, for they have chosen to persist in evil rather than do what is right.

8 Righteousness revealed in works. Righteous behavior reveals righteous character.

The first clause asserts that it is also true that sinful acts betray the wicked.

9 Peaceful family relationships. Simplicity with peace is better than prosperity with strife. The specific situation presented is sharing a house with a quarrelsome wife; it would be better to live on the corner of the roof. The reference is probably to a little guest room built on the roof (see 1Ki 17:19; 2Ki 4:10). It may be cramped and lonely—but peaceful in avoiding strife.

10 Wicked character traits. The wicked pursue evil, not mercy (see also 4:16; 10:23; 12:10; Isa 1:16–17). Those who live to satisfy their craving for evil think only of themselves. It is the propensity for evil that constitutes them as "wicked."

11 Effect of discipline. How mature one is determines how easily one learns. The contrast is between the wise and the simple; the former learns by instruction, the latter by example. This instruction of the wise not only causes them to know but gives insight into the issues of life; they never stop learning. By contrast the "mocker" is unteachable. Nevertheless, he should be punished, because the "simple" will "gain wisdom" through seeing that punishment (see also 19:25).

12 Certainty of judgment. Righteousness will be satisfied when the wicked are punished. There are two ways that this proverb can be taken. The easiest interpretation is to take "righteousness" to refer to God, "The Righteous One." God observes the house of the wicked and then hurls them to ruin (see 22:12). But Proverbs nowhere else refers to God in this way. The other interpretation takes "righteousness" to refer to a "righteous man" (cf. NIV note), presumably a judge or ruler, who, although he may be kindly disposed to the family of the wicked, is obliged to condemn them.

13 Unmerciful people. Those who show no mercy will not obtain mercy. Measure for measure, justice is expressed by this cause and effect statement: Those who shut their ears from the cry of the poor (i.e., refuse to help) will not be listened to when they cry out for help. So justice is meted out for the omission of a commandment as well as for evil acts (see the story of the rich man and Lazarus in Lk 16:19–31).

14 Injustice through bribery. Bribes can effectively pacify an angry person. The two clauses are synonymous; the first uses the more neutral word "gift" and the second the word "bribe." This proverb does not condemn or condone; it merely observes the effectiveness of the practice.

15 Effects of justice. How people respond to justice reveals their character. The occasion—"When justice is done"—can refer specifically to a legal decision or to doing right in general. The point is that people who are law-abiding citizens are pleased with justice; those who are not are terrified by it, tend to ridicule it, and try to get around it in some way. But by means of "terror" the wicked may be shaken into reality when justice is carried.

16 Importance of wisdom. Those who abandon the way of wisdom inevitably ruin their lives. The subject matter is one who wanders away from the "path of understanding" or prudence, i.e., one who does not live according to the knowledge, discipline, and insight of wisdom. This person "comes to rest" (better, "to dwell") in the "company of the shades" (NIV, "dead"). Physical death is once again presented as the punishment for folly, which is sin. The wicked who follow the broad way that leads to destruction find themselves among the dead (Mt 7:13–14).

17 Cost of pleasure. Living a life of self-indulgent pleasure leads to poverty. "Joy" (NIV, "pleasure"; GK 5833) represents the effect of the good life; "wine and oil" represent the cause for joy. "Oil" signifies the anointing that goes with the luxurious life (see Pss 23:5; 104:15; Am 6:6). There is nothing wrong with joy or with enjoying the finer things in life. The "love" portrayed here must be excessive or uncontrolled, because it brings one to poverty. Perhaps other responsibilities are being neglected or the people are trying to live above their means.

18 Just judgment. In what way are the wicked a "ransom" for the righteous? "Ransom" (GK 4111) normally refers to the price paid to free a prisoner. The saying is either a general statement or an ideal that in calamity the righteous escape but the wicked perish in their stead (e.g., Haman in the book of Esther). We must think that when God punishes a community, it is the bad, not the good, that he is directing his anger against. Believers have a wholehearted trust in the justice of God (see Ge 18:23-25).

19 Peaceful family relations. Being alone is preferable to enduring domestic strife. This verse reiterates the theme of v.9 (see also 25:24), with one change—"a desert," which would be sparsely settled and quiet. These verses surely advise one to be careful in choosing a marriage partner and then to be diligent in cultivating the proper graces to make the marriage enjoyable.

20 Frugality of wisdom. This verse contrasts the wise person and the fool. With keen foresight and appropriate frugality, the wise prepare for the future. In their houses are "precious treasure and oil" (NIV, "choice food and oil"), but the fool "devours" it. In other words, the wise gain wealth but fools squander it.

21 Rewards of righteousness. Virtue will be rewarded. In fact, the idea may be that virtue has its own rewards. "Righteousness" and "love" (GK 2876) depict the lifestyle of the faithful covenant-believer who is pleasing to God and a blessing to others. Whoever pursues righteousness will be filled with "life, prosperity and honor" (cf. Mt 5:6; 6:33).

22 Wisdom greater than strength. This proverb uses a military scene to describe the superiority of wisdom. It tells how the wise can scale the walls of the city of the "mighty" and pull down their trusted stronghold. In a war victory is credited not so much to the infantry as to the tactician, the general who plans the attack. Brilliant strategy wins wars, even over apparently insuperable odds (see also Pr 24:5–6; Ecc 9:13–16; cf. 2Co 10:4, which explains that wisdom from above is necessary for spiritual victory).

23 Controlled speech. People who control what they say are more likely to avoid trouble than those who speak freely. The "calamity" may refer to social and legal difficulties into which careless talk might bring someone (see 13:3; 18:21). Therefore one should say only what is true, helpful, pleasant, and kind and avoid what is false, destructive, painful, and damaging to others.

24 On pride. These two lines portray the godless attitude and the scornful arrogance of the "mocker." He is "proud" and "arrogant," acting with "overweening pride." Pride may refer to the refusal to submit to the Lord or describe the refusal to learn from wisdom. While the latter may be in view here, the two are not unrelated.

25 Result of laziness. The lazy come to ruin because they want the easy way out. The "sluggard's craving" must be coupled with "his hands refuse to work" to understand the point. Living in a world of wishful thinking and not working will bring ruin ("will be the death of him" is used hyperbolically).

26 Generosity reveals righteousness. This verse has been placed with the preceding because of the literary connection of the word "crave"—"he craves for more." The one who craves is contrasted with the righteous who give generously. One thinks of the contrast between Abram and Lot in Ge 13; Lot chose the more desirable land for himself, but Abram gave Lot his preference. To be generous in that way requires walking by faith and not by sight.

27 Unacceptable worship. God abhors worship without righteousness. The verse affirms that the "sacrifice" of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord and then intensifies the idea ("how much more") by referring to "evil intent" with the sacrifice. Hypocritical worship is bad enough; worship with evil intent is deplorable. God does not want acts of worship without repentance; he detests them from someone still bent on wickedness, who thinks a sacrifice will buy continued acceptance with God. God first requires of the worshiper true repentance and resolution to live righteously.

28 True and false speech. False witnesses will be discredited and destroyed. The first line affirms that a "false witness will perish," meaning that either his testimony will be destroyed or that he will be punished. The second line literally says, "A man who listens shall speak forever." "A man who listens" contrasts with the false witness of the preceding line and likely describes a witness who knows and understands what the truth is.

29 Genuine righteousness. Those who are truly righteous cultivate a consistent lifestyle that pleases God, in contrast to the wicked, who put up a "bold front." The image of the hardened face (i.e., "bold front") reflects a hardened heart; it portrays one who holds the opinions and views of others in contempt (see Isa 48:4; Jer 5:3; Eze 3:7).

30–31 Sovereignty of God. Human "wisdom," "insight," and "counsel" (NIV, "plan") must conform to God's will to be successful. If these qualities are in defiance of God, they cannot succeed; for human wisdom is nothing in comparison to the wisdom of God (see Job 5:12–13; also Isa 40:13–14). The contrast in v.31 is between the plans and efforts for the battle and the true acknowledgment of the source of victory—the Lord (see Pss 20:7; 33:17).

1 Good reputation. The verse is not disparaging wealth; it is merely noting that a good reputation is worth more than silver or gold. Only a good name is to be desired, for it brings praise, influence, and prosperity. "To be esteemed" (GK 2834) means "good favor," i.e., one well thought of. A good reputation excels other blessings in life.

2 Sovereignty of God. Regardless of status in life, all are equally God's creation. The rich and the poor live side by side in this life, and both are part of the order of God's creation. People often forget this and make value judgments; they would do well to treat all people with respect, for God can as easily reduce the rich as raise the poor.

3 Avoiding trouble. Those who are "prudent" (GK 6874) avoid the dangers of life.They know where the pitfalls are, and they are wary. They are the product of training in wisdom and discipline, for one of the purposes of this book was to make the naive wary (see 1:4). The simple are unwary, uncritical, and credulous; they are not equipped to survive in this world and so "suffer" (GK 6740; this word describes a fine in 17:26 and 19:19; here it is more general; see 27:12).

4 Reward of piety. God rewards reverential piety. This verse lists two spiritual qualifications (humility and fear) and three rewards (wealth, honor, and life). "Humility" (GK 6708) here has the religious sense of piety and so fits well with "the fear of the LORD." For the idea of life as the product of piety, see 21:21; for the reward, see 3:2, 16.

5 Security through wisdom. Those who have the discipline of wisdom avoid life's dangers. The "wicked" are on a dangerous path, covered with "thorns and snares." In contrast, the wise and prudent guard their lives and avoid the trap.

6 Child training. Proper training of children will endure throughout their lives. The second clause here provides the result of the first. The imperative, "train" (GK 2852), includes the idea of "dedicate," and so the training should be with purpose. The NEB captures the point of early instruction: "Start a boy on the right road," i.e., "in the way he should go." There is a standard of life to which children should adhere. Of course, they would have to be young enough when change for the better is still possible. The consequence is that when they are old, they will not depart from it.

In recent years it has become popular to interpret this verse to mean that the training should be according to the child's way. That is, the wise parent will discern the natural bent of the individual child and train him or her accordingly. This may be a practical and useful idea, but it is not likely what this proverb had in mind. In Proverbs there are only two "ways" a child can go, the way of the wise and the righteous or the way of the fool and the wicked.

7 Effects of poverty. Poverty makes people dependent on others. The poor and borrowers become subservient to the rich. The verse may be referring to the apparently common practice of Israelites selling themselves into slavery to pay off debts (see Ex 21:2–7). It is not appreciably different from the modern debtor who is working to pay off bills.

8 Certainty of punishment. God will surely destroy the power of the wicked. The second clause carries the idea further, revealing how it works: "The rod of his fury will be destroyed." The rod represents the wicked person's power to do evil. In reaping trouble, this fellow will no longer be able to unleash his fury.

9 Nature of generosity. There is a reward for being generous to the poor. Such people have a benevolent disposition, keen social conscience, and deep concern for the poor. The irony is that because they are not prisoners of their selfish desires, they achieve the highest degree of self-fulfillment.

10 Source of strife. Mockers cause quarrels and strife. This proverb advises us to expel them. One can think of hecklers who are present only to disrupt a meeting; before serious discussions can begin, they should be removed.

11 Honest and graceful speech. Honest and gracious speech is highly respected. This verse is not easy to understand. The simplest interpretation is that someone who is honest and gracious will be welcomed in the courts of the palace (cf. 16:13).

12 Sovereignty of God. This proverb contrasts how God deals with truth and error. He "frustrates" the words of the "traitor" (NIV, "unfaithful"); but he keeps "watch over knowledge." The point is clear enough—the Lord acts to vindicate the truth.

13 Excuses of laziness. Lazy people make absurd excuses for not working. The verse humorously portrays them as not going out because they might be eaten by a lion in the streets (cf. 26:13)!

14 Divine judgment. Divine judgment brings ruin on the adulterer. The topic is the "mouth of an adulteress," perhaps a reference to her seductive speech (see 2:16–22; 5; 7). It is described as a "deep pit" where the guilty fall under God's judgment. The pit is like the hunter's snare, difficult to escape. So to succumb to the adulteress—or to any such folly—is both a sin and its punishment.

15 Parental discipline. Discipline will remove a child's bent to folly. A general contrast first explains that "folly" (GK 222) is in the child and then instructs how to get rid of it—"the rod of discipline." The child is morally immature; the training must suppress folly and develop potential (cf. 13:24; 23:13, 16; 29:15).

16 On extortion and bribery. Both oppressing the lowly by extortion and giving to the rich as bribery are folly and result in poverty. The first is an immoral act that God will punish and the second is a waste of money. Perhaps the verse is simply observing that it is easy to oppress the poor for gain, but it is a waste of money to try to buy a patron.

IV. The Sayings of the Wise (22:17–24:34)

A. Thirty Precepts of the Sages (22:17–24:22)

Introductory call to attention (22:17–21)

A new collection of sayings begins here, forming the fourth section of the book. This collection is not like that of 1:1–9:18; here the introductory material is more personal than 1:1–7 and the style differs, showing great similarity to the Instructions of Amenemope in Egypt (see the introduction).

17–21 In the introductory call to attention, the sage urges greater trust in the Lord and promises solid teachings that will prove reliable. This extended introduction reminds us that the wise sayings are not curiosity pieces; they are revelation, and revelation demands a response. The call is laid out with the exhortation to learn and to pass on the teaching, followed by three motivations: (1) there will be a pleasing store of wisdom; (2) there will be a deeper trust in the Lord—a distinctively Israelite aspect of wisdom literature; and (3) it will build reliability—the readers will grasp the truth and see themselves as special envoys to keep wisdom in their heart and on their lips.

1. Treatment of the poor (22:22–23)

22–23 This passage warns people not to oppress the poor; they are not to be exploited or crushed. The oppression pictured here may be in bounds legally, but it is out of bounds morally (e.g., similar to modern business ethics). The motivation is that the Lord will plead or "take up their case" and turn the plundering back on the guilty. The Lord will champion the defenseless.

2. Dangerous associations (22:24–25)

24–25 The warning is to avoid associating with a hothead because his influence could prove fatal (see also 1:10–19; 14:17, 29; 15:1). The "one easily angered" (lit., "a man of heat," i.e., "a hot-tempered man") is denounced primarily because such conduct is injurious, although the implication is also that it is morally bad.

3. Rash vows (22:26–27)

26–27 If people foolishly pledge what they have, they could lose it all (see 6:1–5; 11:15;

17:18; 20:16). The risk is that if someone lacks the means to pay, his creditors may take his bed, i.e., his last possession (cf. our expressions "the shirt off his back" or "the kitchen sink"). "Bed" may be a metonymy for the garment that covers the bed (cf. Ex 22:26).

4. Respect for property (22:28)

28 The sage warns against appropriating someone else's property. Removing an "ancient boundary" was always an issue; the general teaching is that ancient traditions, if right, were to be preserved. But violations were frequent (see Dt 19:14; 27:17; 1Ki 21:16–19; Isa 5:8; Hos 5:10). The boundaries were sacred because God owned the land and had given it to the fathers as their inheritance; to extend one's land at another's expense was a major violation of covenant and oath.

5. Benefits of skill (22:29)

29 Skill earns recognition and reward of advancement. The saying anticipates that persons "skilled" in their work will serve kings. These people might be scribes or officials; but the description would apply to all craftsmen. Such will find the proper setting where their skill will be appreciated and not have to waste it on an ignoramus.

6. Caution before rulers (23:1–3)

1–3 This passage warns against overindulging in the ruler's food, because that could ruin one's chances for advancement. The expression "put a knife to your throat" means "curb your appetite" or "control yourself" (like "bite your tongue"). The reason is that the ruler's food may be "deceptive" (GK 3942)—it is not what it seems. Thus one should not indulge in his impressive feast—the ruler wants something from you or is observing you.

7. Fleeting wealth (23:4–5)

4–5 People should not wear themselves out trying to get rich, because riches disappear quickly. In the ancient world the figure of a bird flying off symbolized fleeting wealth. It is therefore folly to be a slave to it (see also Lk 12:20; 1Ti 6:7–10).

8. Unpleasant hospitality (23:6–8)

6–8 It would be a mistake to accept hospitality from "a stingy person" (lit., "an evil eye"), for his lack of sincerity will make the evening unpleasant. This miser (see 28:22) is ill-mannered and inhospitable; he is up to no good (contrast the "bountiful eye" in 22:9 [NIV, "generous man"]). Eating and drinking with him will be irritating and disgusting.

9. Wisdom wasted on a fool (23:9)

9 A "fool" despises wisdom; so it is a waste of time to try to teach him. A fool rejects discipline and instruction, often scorning the teacher who tries to change him.

10. Respect property (23:10–11)

10–11 Once again the instruction warns against removing a boundary stone and encroaching on the property of the defenseless (see 22:22–23, 28). Their "Defender" is strong and will plead their cause. The Redeemer/Avenger was usually a powerful relative who would champion the rights of the defenseless; but if there was no human defender, God would take up their cause (see Ge 48:16; Ex 6:6; Job 19:25; Isa 41–63).

Renewed call to attention (23:12)

12 The disciple is to apply his heart to discipline and listen carefully to knowledge. This introductory verse may have been added later, based on 22:17.

11. Necessity of discipline (23:13–14)

13–14 The sage instructs the continued use of "discipline" (GK 4592), for the one punished will not die. Discipline helps children to live a full life; if they die (prematurely), it would be a consequence of not being trained. In Proverbs such a death might be moral and social as well as physical.

12. Wise and joyful speech (23:15–16)

15–16 Children bring joy to their parents when they make wise choices. The wise "heart" means one makes wise choices; the "right" speech refers to direct and honest speech—there is no discrepancy between the speech and the intentions. One does not use deception or speak ambiguously to darken counsel.

13. Fear the Lord (23:17–18)

17–18 We must always be "zealous" for the fear of the Lord and not be envious of sinners. The contrast is between right and wrong envy; the one is spiritual exercise, the other a disease. The difficulty is that the sinful world seems more attractive. Thus the motivation provided is that the future belongs to the righteous.

Renewed call to attention (23:19)

19 The disciple is to listen, be wise, and keep his decisions right (cf. 22:17; 23:12). For a fuller treatment, see 4:25–27.

14. Poor associations (23:20–21)

20–21 Those who associate with "drunkards" and "gluttons" will become poor. These two represent the epitome of the lack of discipline. Excessive eating and drinking are usually symptoms of deeper problems; today, we usually focus more on the drinking because it is a dangerous social problem with far-reaching consequences.

15. Honoring parents (23:22)

22 Because of our parents' position and experience, their wise counsel should be heeded. The idea of honoring them (cf. Ex 20:12) takes on the precise nuance of listening to instructions.

16. Wisdom's estimation (23:23–25)

23–25 We should acquire truth and gain wisdom, discipline, and understanding—this sort of life pleases God and brings joy to parents. Getting truth means acquiring training in the truth, and gaining understanding means developing the perception and practical knowledge of the truth.

17. Following advice (23:26–28)

26–28 It is imperative to follow the teacher's warnings about temptation because Dame Folly is lurking. The teacher calls for the pupil to imitate him and shun the temptress. The passage portrays two types of loose women: unmarried ("prostitute") and married ("wayward wife"). In either case there is danger, for their way is a "pit" (GK 8757), the gateway to Sheol; and those who enter are as good as dead. But the danger is active—"like a bandit she lies in wait" (see 7:12) and multiplies the unfaithful among men.

18. Excessive drinking (23:29–35)

29–35 One should avoid the temptation to excessive drinking, for it leads to trouble when the senses are dulled. The sage gives a vivid picture of the one who drinks too much: he raves on and on, picks quarrels and fights, poisons his system with alcohol, gets bloodshot eyes, loses control, is confused, is unable to speak clearly imagines things, and is insensitive to pain. While alcoholism is a medical problem, it is also a moral problem because it involves choices and brings danger to other people.

19. Evil associations (24:1–2)

1–2 One should not envy or desire the company of evil people, for they are obsessed with violence (see also 1:10–19; 3:31; 23:17).

20. Practicality of wisdom (24:3–4)

3–4 The use of wisdom is essential for domestic enterprises. In 9:1 wisdom is personified as a woman who builds a house, but here the emphasis is primarily on the building—it is a sign of security and prosperity. One can make a secondary application to building a family (cf. Ps 127). After all, if it takes wisdom to build a house, it also takes wisdom to build a household.

21. Wisdom is greater than strength (24:5–6)

5–6 Wise counsel is necessary for war. The point is that for victory strategy is more important than strength—but that strategy must be wise (see also 11:14; 20:18; 21:22).

22. Fools (24:7)

7 Fools cannot obtain wisdom. The verse portrays a fool out of his element: in a serious moment in the gathering of the community, he does not even open his mouth. Wisdom is beyond the ability of the "fool."

23. Disapproval of evil people (24:8–9)

8–9 The general public disapproves of wicked people who plot evil things. The picture of the wicked is graphic: they devise evil and are schemers, sinners, and scorners. The word translated "schemes" (GK 2365) elsewhere describes outrageous and lewd schemes (see Lev 18:17; Jdg 20:6). The "schemer" is a cold, calculating person. This type of person flouts all morality, and sooner or later the public will have had enough of them. The only way out for such wickedness is repentance and forgiveness.

24. Test of adversity (24:10)

10 How well one does under adverse conditions reveals how strong that person is. You never know your strength until you are put into situations that demand much from you. Of course, a weak person will plead adverse conditions in order to quit.

25. Preservation of life (24:11–12)

11–12 God holds us responsible for rescuing those who are in mortal danger. The use of "death" and "slaughter" seems rather strong in this passage; one might expect the verse to stress the need to rescue through teaching those who by their vice or imprudence are hastening toward destruction. The references may be general (i.e., to any who are in mortal danger) or specific (i.e., to those who are convicted). If the latter is meant, the sage is saying not to abandon the convicted in prison, for they need all the help they can get. The general application includes any who are in mortal danger, through disease, hunger, war—we cannot dodge responsibility, even by ignorance.

26. Future of wisdom (24:13–14)

13–14 One should develop wisdom because it has a profitable future. This proverb draws on the image of honey; its health-giving properties make a good analogy to wisdom. While the literal instruction is to eat and enjoy honey, the point is to know wisdom, for wisdom will have a long future to it.

27. Treatment of the righteous (24:15–16)

15–16 It is futile and self-defeating to mistreat God's people, for they triumph—the wicked do not! The warning is against attacking the righteous; to attack them is to attack God and his program, and that will fail (see Mt 16:18). The consequence, and thus the motivation, is that if the righteous suffer misfortune any number of times (= "seven times"), they will rise again; for virtue triumphs in the end. Conversely, the wicked will not survive—without God they have no power to rise from misfortune.

28. Misfortune of enemy (24:17–18)

17–18 It is dishonoring to God for us to rejoice over the misfortune of our enemies (these are personal enemies; the imprecatory psalms for the enemies of God and his program provide a different set of circumstances). The prohibitions "Do not gloat" and "do not . . . rejoice" extend even to the inner satisfaction (the "heart") at the calamity of the wicked; such people are still the image of God. The motivation for this instruction is the fear of the Lord's displeasure: God might even take pity on them! It is the property of God to judge, and it must not be taken lightly or personalized. God's judgment should strike a note of fear in the hearts of everyone (see Lev 19:17–18; Mt 5:44). So if we want God to continue his anger on the wicked, we better not gloat.

29. Envying the wicked (24:19–20)

19–20 It is foolish to envy the wicked, because they are doomed (see 3:31; 23:17–18; 24:1–2). Their lives ("lamp") will be suddenly "snuffed out."

30. Fearing God and the king (24:21–22)

21–22 People should fear both God and the government, for both punish rebels. The positive instruction is followed by the warning not to join (lit., "not get mixed-up with") "the rebellious" (lit., "people who change," i.e., political agitators; GK 9101). Verse 21a is used in 1Pe 2:17, and v.22 is used in Ro 13:4. The reward for living in peace under God in the world is to escape the calamities that will fall on the rebellious.

B. Further Sayings of the Wise (24:23–34)

23–25 Partiality in judgment. These verses contain several ethical teachings for judges: "To show partiality" is not right; calling the "guilty" (lit., "the wicked") "innocent" (lit., "righteous") will bring strong denunciation; but "those who convict the guilty" will be richly blessed. All these sayings set the standard that righteousness and evil be clearly distinguished by the courts (see 18:5; Lev 19:15; Dt 16:19).

26 Truthfulness. A truthful answer is the mark of friendship. The symbol of specifically kissing on the lips is mentioned only here in the Bible; it signifies that friendship is characterized by truth (cf. Ro 16:16; 1Co 16:20; et al.).

27 Financial stability. A man should be financially secure before he starts a family. Before entering marriage one should have a well-ordered life. In general we are to keep first things first.

28 False witness. This saying may be directed to the false accuser—an actual friend says the right thing. There should be solid reasons before one ever goes to testify against a friend.

29 Vengeance. Rather than give in to the spirit of vengeance, one should avoid retaliation (see also 20:22; Mt 5:43–45; Ro 12:9).

30–34 On laziness. The teacher makes several observations of the state of the sluggard that reveal that continued laziness will result in poverty. The reminiscence used here may be a literary device to draw a fictional but characteristically true picture of the lazy person (see also 6:9–11).

V. Proverbs of Solomon Collected by Hezekiah (25:1–29:27)

1 This section of the book contains additional proverbs attributed to Solomon that were collected by the men of King Hezekiah (715–687 B.C.). These scribes or scholars "copied out" the sayings, i.e., transcribed them from one book to another. The proverbs in these chapters differ in that there are more multiple line sayings and more similes; chs. 28–29 are similar to chs. 10–16, but chs. 25–27 differ in having few references to God.

2 Providence searched out. This first saying expresses a contrast between God and kings. On the one hand, it is the glorious nature of God to "conceal" things. God's government of the universe and his providence are beyond human understanding—humans cannot fathom the divine intentions. Kings have to investigate everything; then they must make things open and intelligible to their subjects, especially judicial matters. Kings who rule as God's representatives must also try to represent his will in human affairs—they must inquire after God to reveal his will.

3 King's counsel. The king's decisions are beyond the knowledge of the people—this is a simple political fact. While a king ought to make judicial matters clear to the people (v.2), many things cannot be made known, being "unsearchable" because, perhaps, of his superior wisdom, his caprice, or the necessity of maintaining confidentiality. But the comparison with the heavens being high and the earth deep captures the nature of the king—he must be resourceful, inscrutable, always one step ahead, to keep a firm grip on power and to enhance his perception by the people.

4–5 Stability through righteousness. These two verses offer first an illustration and then its application. The lines are written with imperatives, forming instructive lessons. Just as a silversmith removes dross from silver so that he can have material to work with, so if the wicked are removed from the nation, the government will be left with righteous counselors and therefore "will be established through righteousness."

6–7b Wisdom of humility. It is wiser to wait to be promoted than to risk demotion by self-promotion. The lesson is straightforward: Promoting oneself in court may risk a public humiliation; but it would be an honor to have everyone in court hear the promotion from the king himself (see Lk 14:8–11).

7c–8 Cautious testimony. One must not be too eager to testify, lest one be put to shame publicly. "What you have seen with your eyes" (v.7c) fits well here, referring to a neighbor's private affairs. When this information is known, it is risky to go "hastily" to court; for if the case has no valid claim, then one will be in public disgrace. We should be cautious in divulging information.

9–10 Private quarrels. It is best to keep personal quarrels private to avoid public shame. Why? If in an argument with your neighbor you reveal another person's confidence, the one who hears you will shame you, and you will always have a "bad reputation." To put it more directly, do not divulge secrets in order to clear yourself in an argument. The point involves damaging a friendship by involving others in a private quarrel.

11 Profound speech. This proverb uses the simile of "apples of gold in settings of silver." The meaning is not entirely certain; but it does speak of beauty, value, and artistry. The "apples of gold" (possibly apricots, citrons, quinces, or oranges) may refer to carvings of fruit in gold on columns. The main point is obviously the immense value and memorable beauty of words used skillfully. A balanced and beautifully constructed saying, such as a proverb (cf. 8:19; 15:23), has lasting value.

12 Rebuke. A wise rebuke that is properly received is of lasting value. It is comparable to ornamental jewelry—pleasing and complimentary. The verse presents the ideal combination of the wise teacher and the willing student ("listening ear" means that the disciple is obedient to the rebuke).

13 Appreciation of faithfulness. A faithful messenger lifts up the spirits of those who sent him on the mission. The comparison in this verse is the "coolness of snow at harvest." Various attempts have been made to explain this idea: snow at harvest is rare, so it may refer to snow brought down from the mountains and kept in an ice hole; it may be the cool air with the snow, i.e., a refreshing breeze from snow-capped mountains; it may be a snow-cooled drink or an application of ice water to foreheads; or perhaps it is an imagined pleasure—snow at harvest. The lesson itself is clear enough: a faithful messenger is refreshing.

14 On bragging. The promises of a boaster are empty. The illustration here is clouds and wind that lead one to expect rain but do not produce it—they gain attention but prove to be disappointing and hence deceitful. Similar is the windbag who brags of gifts to be bestowed, but the promise is deceitful: "he does not give." One should not make false promises.

15 Patient and mild speech. Calm and patient speech can break down insurmountable opposition. By patience one can persuade a ruler; by soft speech stiff opposition ("a bone") can be broken down. The verse recommends conciliatory and persuasive advocacy, which succeeds in the end (see also 14:29; 15:1, 18).

16–17 Moderation. Anything that is over indulged can become distasteful. Verse 16 teaches that moderation ("just enough") is necessary in the pleasures of life (see 16:24). Verse 17 advises moderation in visiting others. We should not wear out our welcome with frequent visits. The motivation for the warning is that familiarity breeds contempt.

18 False witnesses. False witnesses are deadly in society. They are compared to a club, a sword, and a sharp arrow—all deadly weapons. Such people can cause the death of innocent people (see 14:5; Ex 20:16; Dt 5:20).

19 Unfaithfulness. An unfaithful person is useless and painful. Such a person is like a bad tooth and a lame foot. Both are incapable of performing—they are painful and ineffective. The second line has been taken two ways, with "reliance" (GK 4440) referring either to reliance on an unfaithful person or to what the unfaithful person relies on. In the first case, trusting a faithless person is like depending on a decaying tooth or lame foot. In the second, "reliance" refers to the basis of a unfaithful person's hope, e.g., wealth or power (as in 14:26).

20 Inappropriate conduct. Irresponsible attempts to cheer people up only make matters worse. The first line refers to one who takes away a garment on a cold day, an action that is inappropriate. The second simile mentions pouring vinegar on soda. The reference is to sodium carbonate, natural in Egypt (see also Jer 2:22), which is neutralized with vinegar; this is counterproductive. Thus it is inappropriate and counterproductive to "sing songs" to a "heavy heart." One needs to develop sensitivity to others; songs may only irritate the grief.

21–22 Kindness to enemies. People who treat their enemies with kindness will bring remorse to them and blessing from God. The imagery of the "burning coals" represents pangs of conscience, more readily effected by kindness than by violence. These burning coals produce the sharp pain of contrition through regret (see 18:19; 20:22; 24:17; Ge 42–45; 1Sa 24:18–20). Paul uses this expression in Ro 12:20. Furthermore, the Lord "will reward you." This last phrase shows that this instruction belongs to the religious traditions of Israel.

23 Sly words. The north wind that brings the rain is compared with a "sly tongue" that brings angry looks and infuriates people.

24 Peaceful family relationship. It is better to have peaceful solitude than companionship with strife (this verse is the same as 21:9).

25 Good news. Good news refreshes the wearied soul. The point of the verse is transparent (see also 15:30). It is true of love; it is true of spiritual realms. See Ge 45:27 for an illustration.

26 Integrity. The righteous who lose their position are useless. The images of the "muddied spring" (fouled perhaps by crossing animals) and the "polluted well" suggest an action that is unforgivable. The comparison is with the righteous person who "gives way" (lit., "is moved"; GK 4572) before the wicked. This verse has often been interpreted to refer to the integrity of the righteous being lost. But the line may refer to the loss of social standing and position by plots of the wicked. For the righteous to so fall indicates that the world is out of joint.

27 Self-glory. To seek one's own glory is dishonorable. The second line of this verse is problematic; it should make an analogy to honey—glory is good, like honey, but not to excess. Perhaps a line or two was dropped out as the text was copied.

28 Self-control. Without self-control a person is vulnerable. The point of the comparison to a broken-down city is that one who lacks self-control has no defenses.

1 Honor inappropriate to fools. Honor is out of place with a fool. Verse 1 draws a comparison with snow in summer and rain in harvest to show that honor does not "belong" to the fool. The "fool" (GK 4067) is the stupid person who is worthless and vain—just the kind of person popular culture seems to honor. "Honor" (GK 3883) probably refers to the external recognition of worth, i.e., respect, advancement to high position, accolades, but could also include intrinsic worth. All the incongruities mentioned would mean that life was topsy-turvy.

2 Undeserved curse. An "undeserved curse" is ineffective. Like a fluttering sparrow or darting swallow, it does not settle down; it does not reach its destination (see 1Ki 4:33 for Solomon's interest in animals). It was commonly believed that blessings and curses had objective existence—that once uttered, the word was effectual. Scriptures make it clear that the power of a blessing or a curse depends on the power of the one behind it (e.g., Balaam could not curse what God had blessed; cf. Nu 22:38; 23:8). This proverb underscores the correction of superstition. The Word of the Lord is powerful because it is his word—he will fulfill it.

3 Physical discipline. A fool must be controlled by physical force. The point of this verse is that the "fool" is as difficult to manage as a donkey or horse. None of these respond to reason but must be driven by whip, halter, or rod.

4–5 Responding to fools. The one who responds to a fool appears like a fool. One should not descend to that level of thought. To get into an argument with a fool makes one look like a fool as well ("or you will be like him"). On the other hand, the one who rebukes a fool discourages him from thinking too highly of himself; there are times when it is wrong to be silent (cf. 2Co 11:16–17; 12:11). How can these proverbs both be true? In negligible issues one should just ignore stupid persons; but in issues that matter, they must be dealt with lest credence be given to what they say.

6 Fools are useless as messengers. To use a fool as a messenger is to invite trouble. Sending a messenger is like having another pair of feet; sending a fool on the mission is not only no help, it is like cutting off the pair of feet one has—it is a setback! "Violence" (GK 2805) means injustice or violent social wrongs; "drinking violence" is metaphorical for suffering violence. That is, sending a fool on a mission will have injurious consequences. It is better not to send a message at all than to use a fool.

7 Fools are dense. Proverbs are useless to fools—as useless as a lame man's legs, which hang down, preventing him from going too far. The fool does not understand the "proverb," has not implemented it, and cannot use it correctly and profitably.

8 Honor is inappropriate to fools. Honoring a fool is not only counterproductive, it is absurd. It is like "tying a stone" in a sling. If you honor a fool, what is intended cannot be accomplished—he would still be a fool.

9 Fools' use of proverbs. It is painful to hear fools use proverbs. The illustration is that of a "thornbush in a drunkard's hand." The drunkard does not know how to handle the thornbush because he cannot control his movements and so gets hurt. A fool can read or speak a proverb but will be intellectually and spiritually unfit to handle it; he will misuse it and misapply it. It is at just such a time as this that he should be answered (see v.5).

10 Fools are dangerous. Hiring a fool or a stranger is dangerous. The one who hires such a person is compared to "an archer who wounds at random." This line is difficult because it can be translated in different ways, but it does express something negative. Anyone who hires a fool or a stranger gives them ample opportunity to do great damage. The undisciplined hireling will have the same effect as an archer's shooting at random.

11 Fools persist in folly. Fools repeat their disgusting mistakes. No matter how many times they are warned, they never learn, not even from experience, but repeat their "folly." The simile of a dog returning to his vomit is graphic and debasing (cf. 2Pe 2:22).

12 Self-conceit. Those who think they are wise are almost impossible to help. The saying uses a comparison to stress how difficult it is to curb self-conceit—a fool has more hope. Self-conceit is actually a part of the folly the book decries, because for someone to think that he is wise when he is not makes him a "conceited ignoramus."

13–16 On laziness. These verses can be termed the "Book of Sluggards." The sluggard uses absurd excuses to get out of work (v.13; cf. 22:13). Sluggards do not think they are lazy and so are self-deceived: they would say that they are realists and not shirkers (v.13), that they are below their best in the morning and not self-indulgent (v.14; humor is used here; cf. 6:9–10; 24:33), that their inertia is an objection to being hustled (v.15; cf. 19:24), and that they are sticking to their guns and not mentally indolent (v.16), even though they are filled with self-conceit.

17 Meddling in a quarrel. Anyone who interferes in someone else's quarrel or fight is asking for trouble. The comparison is with grabbing a dog by the ears. This was dangerous, for dogs in the ancient world were not domesticated but wild, like jackals.

18–19 Deceptive speech. It is dangerous to deceive someone out of jest. Anyone who does this is like a "madman" shooting deadly arrows. By comparing the joker to a madman, the sage describes him as irresponsible and dangerous—he may hurt people while thinking it is all good fun.

20–22 On gossipers and quarrelsome people. One good way to prevent a "quarrel" is to restrict "gossip," just as one can end a fire by withholding wood (v.20). But gossip is appealing (v.22); it is like "choice morsels" that are eagerly and thoroughly devoured by those who hear them (see 18:8 for more on gossip). Quarrelsome people start fights (v.21). Their quarreling is like piling fuel on the fire—strife flares up again and again.

23–25 Deceptive speech. The sage compares hypocritical speech to the glazing over of an earthen pot. Glaze makes it look dazzling and certainly different from the clay that it actually is. In the same way, "fervent" (lit., "burning," "glowing"; GK 1944) lips conceal an evil heart. On the surface what a person says fervently may be pleasing, perhaps speaking "charming" words of affection; but they merely cover one's true nature as one plotting evil. Thus the sage warns the disciple: "Do not believe" such people, for there are countless (seven) abominations they have planned. It takes great shrewdness and wisdom to discern who can be believed.

26–27 On retribution. Concealed malice will inevitably be made known. Verse 26 is concerned with how and where evil will be exposed; the sage assumes that righteousness will ultimately be victorious. Verse 27 suggests that whatever people sow they reap. It gives two illustrations—digging a pit and rolling a stone. The digging refers to laying a trap for someone, and rolling a stone is probably rolling it on someone. Measure for measure justice is in view—he will fall into his own pit, or the stone will roll on him. For examples consider Haman (Est 7:10) and Daniel's enemies (Da 6:24–28).

28 Deceptive speech. Deceptive speech brings ruin without regard for those it may hurt. The two lines portray the evil person who deceives as one who ruthlessly ruins people. The "ruin" could be on himself (an idea that fits the context of v.27) or on others (which seems to be the point of the verse).

1 Plans in an uncertain future. Presumption about the future is dangerous because the future is uncertain. The verse is not ruling out wise planning for the future, only one's overconfident sense of ability to control the future—no one can presume on God's future (cf. Jas 4:13–16; cf. also Mt 6:34; Lk 12:20). Rather, humility is required; one must live from day to day, grateful for the life one has from God, with the awareness that it may be withdrawn at any time. A second application of the verse would be not to postpone to an uncertain future what is in one's power to do at once.

2 On humility and praise. It is best to let other people praise you, for your reputation comes from what others think of you, not from what you say about yourself. Self-praise is a form of pride, even if it begins with little things (such as who you know, where you have been, etc.), and it does not establish a reputation. "Someone else" in this proverb is literally "stranger" (GK 5799)—a person who can speak more objectively about your accomplishments and abilities.

3 Provocation by fools. Stone and sand are heavy, and whoever carries them knows the work is exhausting and painful. But more tiring is a fool's provocation, for the mental effort it takes to deal with it is more wearying than physical work—the fool brings a spiritual malaise for others to endure.

4 Jealousy. The sage focuses attention first on anger that is ruthless and destructive (lit., "a flood of anger"; see Job 38:25; Ps 32:6; Na 1:8 for the imagery used for destruction). In contrast "jealousy" (GK 7863), here in the negative sense (as opposed to the positive sense of "zeal" to defend a threatened institution for the right reasons), is a raging emotion that defies reason at times and takes the form of destructive violence, like a consuming fire (see Pr 6:32–35; SS 8:6–7).

5 Reproof as a part of love. Direct reproof is better than unexpressed love. "Open rebuke" is a frank, direct word of honest criticism or disapproval (from either a friend or foe). "Hidden love" is a love that is too timid, too afraid, or not trusting enough to admit that reproof is a part of genuine love; such love is morally useless. In fact, one might question whether or not it is sincere (see also 28:23; 29:3).

6 Value of reproof. Reproof given in love is superior to insincere expressions of affection. The wounds of a friend "can be trusted" because they are meant to correct (see 25:12; Dt 7:9; Job 12:20). But an enemy's kisses are deceptive (e.g., the deceitful kiss of Judas [Mk 14:43–45]), in spite of their profusion.

7 Need versus desire. Those who have great needs are more appreciative than those who are satisfied. Most agree that this proverb is capable of wider application than eating; it can apply to possessions, experiences, education, etc.

8 Security abandoned. To stray from home is to lose security. The parallelism compares a bird that "strays" from a nest with the man who "strays" from home. The reason for his straying is not given, but it could be because of exile, eviction, business, or irresponsible actions. The saying may be more general, simply asserting that those who wander lack the security of their home and can no longer contribute to their community life.

9 Advice from a friend. Advice from a friend is pleasant—just as perfume and incense bring joy to people. The second line is difficult. Many interpreters take it to mean the advice or counsel of a friend sweetening the soul.

10 Helpful friends. A friend who is available is better than a relative who is not. The conflict between 17:17 and 27:10b may be another example of presenting two sides of the issue, showing that such a matter cannot be resolved with one simple teaching. We should maintain relationships with family and friends but also realize that a neighbor who lives close to us will be more help than a relative who lives at some distance.

11 Teaching vindicated. A wise son (i.e., disciple) enables a father (i.e., teacher) to defend himself against his critics. The expression "treats me with contempt" refers to the taunting or criticizing of the instructor as a poor teacher. Teachers are usually held responsible for the faults and weaknesses of their pupils; but any teacher criticized that way takes pleasure in pointing to those who have learned as proof that he has not labored in vain (see also 1Th 2:19–20; 3:8).

12 Wisdom wary of evil. Avoiding the pitfalls in life requires wisdom (see 22:3). The contrast is between the "prudent" (GK 6874) and the "simple" (GK 7343); the first is the mature person who has developed a wariness (1:4), while the latter is the inexperienced youth who stumbles into things. The verse is a motivation for the naive to be trained; for life would be far less painful for them if they knew how to avoid life's dangers.

13 Obligations fulfilled. People must be held to their obligations, no matter how foolishly they were made (see also 20:16).

14 Inappropriate greeting. How, when, and why we say what we say is important. On the surface this verse appears to be describing one who comes in early and loud with a blessing or greeting; such a one is considered a nuisance ("it will be taken as a curse"). But "blesses" and "curse" may also refer to the loud adulation of a hypocrite, the person who goes to great length to create the impression of piety and friendship but is considered a curse by the one who hears him.

15–16 A quarrelsome wife. A quarrelsome mate is an unbearable irritant (see 19:13). Verse 16 adds the idea that the quarrelsome wife is also uncontrollable, like elusive winds that can gust at any moment, or like oil that one cannot control with the hand.

17 Helpful criticism. Constructive criticism between friends develops character and personality. The Talmud applied this proverb to two students sharpening each other in the study of the Torah.

18 Rewards for service. Those who faithfully serve will be rewarded in kind, just as one who takes care of a fig tree will eat its fruit. The fig tree needed closer attention than other plants; thus the analogy implies that the servant performs meticulous service for his master, anticipating the needs and watching over his charge. Such a servant will not go unrecognized and unrewarded (see also 22:29; 2Ti 2:6, 15).

19 Character traits reflected in thoughts. The verse literally says, "As water face to face / so a man's heart to a man." The simplest way to take it is to say that as clear water gives a reflection of the face, so the heart reflects the true nature of the man. Through looking at our heart attitudes we come to true self-awareness.

20 Desires are insatiable. The desires of human beings are as insatiable as "Death" and "Destruction," expressions for the underworld (see 15:11). Generations of people have gone headlong into the world below; yet it is never satisfied. In the same way, what a person desires is "never satisfied."

21 Praise as a test. Public opinion, or the praise of others, is normally a good barometer of the qualities and contributions of a person. The comparison of the point is with the crucible for silver and the furnace for gold—they refine and reveal the pure metals. Public praise certainly did form a test for Saul and David (1Sa 18:7), David coming out the better for it. But there is the other side of the matter as well, that righteousness will be denounced (Mt 5:11).

22 Folly is unalterable. Folly cannot be removed by force. The proverb uses the imagery of grinding grain in a mortar with a pestle, i.e., pulverizing, to discuss physical punishment for the fool. Since folly is his nature, it will not be removed from him.

23–27 Wealth is transitory. People should preserve what income they have because it does not long endure. Verse 23 provides the main instruction—take care of your livelihood. The motivation for this is that riches do not last long. The reasoning for wise care of income continues in the second half of the poem—the protasis is in v.25 and the apodasis in vv.26–27—if the growth is removed, then they can sell and use their livestock. The poem shows the proper interplay between human labor and divine provision.

1 Confidence of the righteous. In contrast to the fear of the wicked who flee when "no one pursues," the faith of the righteous builds confidence. This proverb implies that the wicked, prompted by a guilty conscience or a fear of judgment, become fearful and suspicious of everyone. But the righteous, who seek to find favor with God and others, have a clear conscience and thus no need to look over their shoulders.

2 Stability in government. A nation's stability comes with ruler who is discerning and knowledgeable. The reference to "many rulers" indicates that during rebellious times a nation has many changes of power or many people vying for power (cf. the period of the judges and the days of the northern kingdom of Israel with its nine dynasties as examples of political instability due to sin).

This Bedouin girl must know the condition of her family's herd of camels and care for them (cf. 27:23–27).

3 Oppressive rulers. A ruler who oppresses the poor destroys his own dominion. The first line introduces the subject matter—one who oppresses the poor—and the second line tells of the effect—like a driving rain he destroys and leaves nothing in the land (i.e., only the hardiest survive). The Hebrew text has "a poor man oppresses the poor" (see NIV note); if retained, it means that one would expect a poor man to have sympathy for others who are impoverished, but in fact that is not the case.

4 Respect for law. Obedience to the law determines one's attitude toward law-breakers. The contrast is between "those who forsake the law" and "those who keep the law." The former "praise the wicked," while the latter "resist them." Praising the wicked may mean calling them good, i.e., no longer able to discern good from evil (cf. Ro 1:18–32).

5 Perceiving justice. The contrast here between those who are evil and those who seek the Lord concerns the perception of justice. "Justice" (GK 1907) refers to the legal rights of people; but there are always those who believe justice is that which benefits them—otherwise it is not justice. To "seek the LORD" originally meant trying to obtain an oracle from God (see 2Sa 21:1) but then came to refer to devotion to God (i.e., seeking to learn and to do his will). Only people attuned to the divine will can fully perceive what justice is. Without that standard, legal activity can easily become self-serving.

6 Righteousness better than unjust wealth. Honest poverty is better than dishonest wealth. The verse only contrasts a poor man with integrity and a perverse rich man (cf. vv. 8, 11, 20, 22, 25, 27; also 19:1), without recognizing that there are rich people with integrity and poor people who are perverse. The word for "ways" suggests that the person has double ways, i.e., he is hypocritical, a double dealer.

7 On obedient. One who is obedient to the law will be discerning enough to lead an untarnished life. "Law" (GK 9368) may mean instruction, perhaps originally for this verse a father's instructions; but in this chapter that stresses religious piety, it probably refers to the law (though in Proverbs a father's instruction harmonizes with the law). The son who becomes a "companion of gluttons" has not kept the law; he shames his father because such profligacy brings disrespect on the family.

8 Wealth unjustly gained. Wealth amassed by unjust means will eventually go to the poor. The law prohibited making a commission or charging interest (see Ex 22:25; Lev 25:36–37; Dt 23:20; Ps 15:5). These laws were concerned with the necessities of life; if the poor needed help, the wealthy should give it to them as charity—they were not to take advantage of another Israelite's plight.

9 Prayer of the lawless unanswered. God will not listen to the prayers of those who will not listen to him. The prayer certainly will not be a proper prayer; someone who refuses to obey God cannot pray according to God's will—he will pray for some physical thing, perhaps even making demands on God. Of course, a prayer of repentance would not be an abomination to the Lord. But in general, God's favor is enjoyed by the righteous, and his abomination is incurred by the wicked.

10 Just rewards. Destruction awaits those who corrupt others; rewards await those who have integrity. The line shows that the wicked will be caught in their own devices; but it also shows that the righteous are corruptible—they can be led into morally bad conduct (see 26:27; see also Mt 23:15).

11 Self-deceit. Here is another contrast between the rich and the poor. In this one the rich man is filled with self-conceit, but the discerning poor man "sees through" the pretension.

12 Righteousness in government. People flourish under righteous administrations. The contrast is between the situation when the wicked come to power and when the righteous triumph.

13 Effectual repentance. Repentance and renunciation of sin bring God's mercy and blessing. This verse, unique in Proverbs, captures the theology of forgiveness found in passages such as Ps 32:1–5 and 1Jn 1:6–9. The contrast is between the one who "conceals" personal sins and the one who "confesses and renounces them." The former will not prosper; the latter will find God's "mercy."

14 Fear of the Lord. One's prospects in this life depend on reverential fear. The verse contrasts the one who "always fears" with the one who "hardens his heart." The first is blessed, while the second falls into trouble. The verse gives no object for "fear": various translations have assumed that it would be the Lord (so NIV), especially in the book of Proverbs. But it may be that the verse means fear of sin. In other words, the one who is always apprehensive about sin and its results will be more successful at avoiding it and finding God's blessing.

15 Wicked rulers. Political tyrants are dangerous and destructive. A wicked leader who rules over "helpless people" is compared to a "roaring lion" and a "charging bear"—beastly, powerful, insensitive, and in search of victims (cf. the animal imagery used in Da 7:1–8 for ruthless world rulers). The poor crumple under such tyrants because they cannot meet their demands.

16 Good versus bad rulers. The righteous ruler, not the tyrant, will remain in power. A tyrant will inevitably face the danger of rebellion and even assassination. A righteous administration, on the other hand, pleases the people and God, who preserves it.

17 Effects of guilt. The guilty fugitive will be isolated. This verse has some difficulties for the interpreter. The second line is either saying that it is futile to try to support a murderer on the run or that one should not interfere.

18 Security based on integrity. Integrity brings security; perversion brings insecurity. That is, the result of a righteous lifestyle is being "kept safe," whereas the wicked will fall.

19 Results of diligence. Prosperity depends on diligent work (see 12:11). There is a meaningful repetition here: the diligent person will have "plenty of bread," but the lazy person will have "plenty of poverty" (cf. NRSV).

20 Faithfulness. The "faithful man" is contrasted with the one who is "eager to get rich." The idea is that the first is faithful to his obligations to God and to other people; but the one who hastens to make riches is at the least doing it without an honest day's work and at the worst dishonestly. In a hurry to acquire wealth, he falls into dishonest schemes and bears the guilt of it—he will not be unpunished.

21 Injustice through bribery. Partiality in judgment is wrong, even though easily acquired. To show partiality destroys justice (see 18:5; 24:23; Lev 19:15; Dt 1:17; 16:19). The second line probably means that a man can be bribed for a very small price (i.e., piece of bread).

22 Effects of avarice. Avarice inevitably leads to poverty. Here we meet the man with the "evil eye" again (cf. 23:6, where this expression was used for the selfish, "stingy man"). The presumption is that this person's greed involves sin, for which he will be punished with poverty.

23 Reproof preferable to flattery. In the final analysis rebuke will be better received than flattery. The flattering tongue may be pleasing for the moment, but it will offer no constructive help like the "rebuke" (see also 15:5, 12; 25:12; 27:5–6; 29:5).

24 Robbing parents. Whoever robs one's parents, no matter how one seeks to justify it, is a destroyer. The point seems to be that of prematurely trying to gain control of the family property through some form of pressure and in the process reduce the parents' possessions and standing in the community. He could say, "It's not wrong," because he could reason that it would be his someday anyway.

25 Greed versus trust. The "greedy man" is pitted against the one "who trusts" the Lord. The first one is completely selfish and usually ruthless. His attitudes and actions stir up strife because people do not long tolerate him. He pushes so hard for the things he wants that his zeal becomes a hindrance to obtaining them. Conversely, the true believer, who is blessed by God, will be made abundantly prosperous.

26 On self-sufficiency. Security comes from a life of wisdom, not from self-sufficiency. One who trusts in oneself stands in stark contrast to one who follows the wisdom from above that this book has been teaching.

27 Generosity versus indifference. Generosity is rewarded but indifference is cursed (see also 11:24–26; 22:9). The generous do not miss what they give away, but those indifferent to the needs of the poor will be cursed often—by the poor, no doubt.

28 Stability in righteous government. The righteous flourish when wickedness is removed from government (see also 11:10; 28:12; 29:2, 16).

1 Stubbornness. The verse is a warning about the peril of persisting in sin; it uses the image of the "stiff neck" to portray the obstinate person who disregards all rebukes (see Ex 32:9). The opposite of the stiff neck is a bending neck, i.e., submission. The stubborn person does not foresee misfortune and so will suddenly "be destroyed" without any healing. For similar proverbs see 6:15; 13:18; and 15:10.

2 Effect of righteousness on morale. Good people can enjoy life when righteousness predominates in government. There is rejoicing then, but people always suffer under wicked regimes (see 11:10–11; 28:12, 28).

3 Effect of wisdom on the family. Wisdom ensures joy and prosperity for the family. In contrast to the wise person who brings "joy" to his father is the son who brings grief by squandering his wealth on "prostitutes." For the financial consequences of vice, see chs. 1–9 (esp. 5:10; 6:31).

4 Security through justice. This verse contrasts a king who makes the nation secure with one who "tears it down." The former brings prosperity by championing "justice"; the latter is "greedy for bribes." The idea of "bribes" (GK 9556) is not the point; this king breaks the backs of the people with demands for monetary gifts (see 1Sa 8:11–18), and this causes divisions and strife.

5 Deceptive speech. The subject of this verse is one who "flatters his neighbor." Such flattering works by deception and guile. There is some uncertainty of the referent in the second line: "he spreads a net for his steps." This could refer to a net spread for the one flattered or for the flatterer himself. The latter would make the verse more powerful (see also 2:16; 7:5; 26:28; 28:23).

6 Security of the righteous. Only the righteous can enjoy a sense of security. The sage observes that the "evil man" is caught in his own sin (cf. v.5), but the righteous sing and are glad—two expressions that signify their confidence; they have no fear of snares and so can sing.

7 Justice for the poor. Only the righteous champion justice for the poor; they care about (lit., "know," i.e., "have sympathetic knowledge of") justice for the poor (see 20:8; 31:5, 8). But the wicked do not "discern knowledge"—they have no such interest or insight into the problems of the people (see Job 29:12–17).

8 Wisdom in averting anger. The wise maintain peace and harmony in society. They "turn away anger" rather than stir up strife. The "mockers" are those who laugh at moral obligations and stir up the baser passions of their fellow citizen, like kindling a fire. Such scoffers make dangerous situations worse, whereas the wise calm things down and ensure peace in the community.

9 Strife exacerbated. It is a waste of time to try to settle a dispute calmly or rationally with a fool. To go into court with a fool, you have to reckon with unreasonable and objectionable behavior. Whether this "fool" is angry or laughing, there is no possible resolution to the matter. (cf. Pr 26:4 and its warning not to answer a fool).

10 Righteousness hated by the wicked. Bloodthirsty people loathe the integrity of the upright. Because they despise all sense of decency, they seek to destroy it. The second line forms a contrast; literally it reads, "as for the upright, they seek his life." "Seeking a life" was usually a hostile act, but here the contrast requires the idea of "seek to preserve a life" (NIV interprets this verse differently).

11 Self-control. It takes wisdom to restrain anger. This proverb contrasts "fools," who let out all their anger and are at the mercy of any moment when they happen to feel irritation, and the wise, who control their anger (see also 16:32; 25:28).

12 On lies. Once a ruler begins to listen to lies, his court will be corrupted. The point is that courtiers adjust themselves to the prince—when they see that deception and court flattery win the day, they learn how the game is played (see 16:10; 20:8; 25:2).

13 Life from God. Regardless of status or circumstances, all people receive their life from God. The imagery of giving sight means that God gives the light of life (see Job 33:30; Ps 13:3). God creates and controls them all (see 22:2).

14 Treatment of the poor. The duration of an administration depends on its moral character. It is important to guarantee fair and just treatment for all, especially the poor. To fail to do so is immoral (see 16:12; 20:28; 25:5; 31:5).

15 Effect of discipline. Discipline makes a child's behavior enjoyable ("a rod of correction" means "a correcting rod"). The focus on the mother in the last part is probably a rhetorical variation for the parent (see 17:21; 23:24–25) and not meant to assume that she will do the training (see also 13:24; 23:13).

16 Certainty of judgment. No matter how much wickedness spreads in the land, righteousness will live to see it destroyed (though this verse does not say when or how).

17 Effect of discipline. A disciplined child will bring contentment to parents (see also 19:18).

18 Obedience to revelation. A nation's well-being depends on obedience to divine revelation. This popular verse refers to two forms of divine revelation, vision and law. The first line is worded negatively—if there is "no revelation" (or "vision"; GK 2606), the people "throw off restraint" (cf. Ex 32:35). "Vision" refers to divine communication to prophets (as in 1Sa 3:1). The prophetic ministry was usually in response to the calamitous periods, calling the people back to God. If revelation is absent, people can expect spiritual and political anarchy. The second line provides the positive wording: there is a blessing for the one who keeps the law.

19 Method of discipline. It is not sufficient to train slaves by words alone. That is, slaves must be treated like sons (i.e., they frequently had to be corrected). This verse is probably a general observation on the times; doubtless there were slaves who did better (e.g., Joseph in Egypt; Daniel in Babylon).

20 Rash speech. It is easier to train a fool than to correct rash speech. The focus in this verse is on the one who speaks before thinking something through. The prospects of the fool are better, for rash speech cannot easily be remedied (see 26:12; Jas 3:8).

21 Lack of discipline. If someone pampers a servant from youth, in the end (of this procedure) such a person will have "grief." The idea of "grief" comes from the LXX (cf. NIV note).

22 Anger. Anger brings strife. The lines focus on the "angry man"—one who is given to anger and not merely temporarily angry. Not only does such a one stir up "dissension," but in so doing he also causes sin in himself and in others (see also 14:17, 29; 15:18; 16:32; 22:24).

23 Pride and humility. A humble spirit brings honor and respect, whereas pride leads to abasement (see Lk 14:11; 18:14).

24 Entanglements of sin. An accomplice in crime will find no easy way out of his dilemma. This verse is a little confusing; it describes the accomplice of a thief as his own enemy (lit., "he hates himself")—he hears a curse and will not speak up. According to Lev 5:1, if a witness does not speak up, he is held accountable for the crime. The case here might be where the guilty person is unknown; and when a curse is pronounced on that unknown culprit, the accomplice hears it but cannot speak up. So the curse attaches itself to him as well.

25 Security via faith in the Lord. True security is the result of trusting God and not other humans. Fear of others becomes a snare when it gets to the point of letting others control your life—their opinions and attitudes put subtle pressure on you, even hindering you from speaking the truth or doing what is right. Release from such bondage comes when people put their faith in the Lord alone (see 10:27; 12:2; Ac 5:29).

26 Justice from God. True justice ultimately comes from God. The great miscalculation is to assume that true justice depends on some ruler and that supplication must be directed first to him.

27 Hatred. The righteous and the wicked mutually detest the lifestyles of each other.

VI. The Words of Agur (30:1–33)

A. The Title (30:1)

1 The heading for this section identifies the words that follow as those of Agur, the son of Jakeh, for Ithiel and Ucal. There have been many attempts to interpret these names. It is most likely that someone other than Solomon wrote these sayings; they have a different, almost nonproverbial, tone to them.

The section is also entitled an "oracle" (Heb., massa; GK 5363). This word usually describes a prophetic oracle of some kind, though it is possible that Massa might be a place.

B. Agur's Confession and Petition (30:2–9)

1. Confession of ignorance (30:2–4)

2–3 Agur confesses that he is ignorant of the ways of God. He begins by lamenting that he has not learned wisdom, i.e., that he is not one of those who profess to understand the Holy One. "Ignorant" (GK 1280) refers to his intellectual dullness; he is like the lower animals (Pss 49:10–12; 73:22). The "Holy One" in this section is in the plural as in 9:10.

4 To make his point Agur includes five questions. These, like Job 38–41 or Pr 8:24–29, focus on divine acts to show that it is absurd for mortals to think that they can explain God's works or to compare themselves with God. These questions display human limitations; they may have a sarcastic tone, implying that some people think they understand the phenomena of the universe. The first question, accordingly, could refer to a human ("Who has gone up to heaven?") but may simply refer to God as the other questions do. The final question seeks to identify this sovereign God. To know a person's "name" is to exhibit power over and closeness to that person. The parallel reference to "son" has been identified as Israel, as a simple poetic parallelism for "his name," and (by Christian interpreters) as a reference to the Son of God.

2. Affirmation of the reliability of God's word (30:5–6)

5 Agur affirms that God's word is pure (NIV, "flawless"; GK 7671); this word, used elsewhere of purifying metal, is that God's word is trustworthy: there is nothing deceitful or false in it. The second half of the verse explains this meaning: it is safe to take refuge in the Lord (see Pss 12:6; 18:31).

6 This confidence is followed by a warning not to add to the Lord's words (see Dt 4:2), a tendency that is all too common.

3. Prayer (30:7–9)

7–9 Agur prays that God will prevent him from becoming deceitful and self-sufficient. He wants to be honest in all his dealings, and he wants a life of balanced material blessings. He reasons that if he has too much, he might become independent of God (see Dt 8:11–14); and if he has too little, he might steal and thus profane God's name. So acknowledging his own ignorance, relying on God's word for security in life, and praying that God will keep him from falling into temptation, Agur is ready to offer his words.

C. The Admonition of Agur (30:10–33)

1. Noninterference in domestic situations (30:10)

10 The advice here is not very clear on first reading. The warning could be taken literally: Do not slander a servant to his master; for if it is not true, then he will make you look small, and you will be found guilty. Another view is that the verse refers to the delivery of a fugitive slave to his master. "Slander" in this case would refer to denouncing, i.e., accusing to authorities (see Dt 23:15–16). The advice then would be not to meddle in the affairs of someone else.

2. Four evil things (30:11–14)

Possibly there was a heading for this section at one time ("Three things, yea four. . . ."). All the things listed here begin with the word dor ("generation," meaning a class or group of people; see also Mt 11:16).

a. Disrespect for parents (30:11)

11 The first observation is that there is a segment of society that lacks respect for parents, in spite of the law (cf. Ex 21:17; Pr 20:20). The negative statement ("do not bless") follows the positive ("who curse"); "cursing" a parent could refer to defaming, treating lightly, or showing disrespect in general.

b. Self-righteousness (30:12)

12 "Filth" (GK 7363) often refers to physical uncleanness, but here it is moral defilement (cf. Isa 36:12; Zec 3:3–4). There is a generation, a group of people, who may observe all outer ritual but pay no attention to inner cleansing (see Isa 1:16; Mt 23:27). Such hypocrisy is harmful in every walk of life.

c. Pride (30:13)

13 The eyes of the proud are "high" (NIV, "haughty"; GK 8123) and their eyelids "disdainful" (GK 5951). These expressions refer to their arrogant attitude—the lofty view of themselves and the corresponding contempt for others (see also 6:17; Ps 131:1).

d. Oppressing the poor (30:14)

14 The imagery of the first half of the verse captures the rapacity of their power—their teeth and their jaws are swords and knives. The second part explains that they devour, like a ravenous and insensitive beast, the poor and the needy (see 31:8–9). Those who exploit and destroy other people are beasts.

3. Insatiable things (30:15–16)

15a Things that seem never to be satisfied are problematic for the normal enjoyment of life. The meaning of v.15a and its relationship to vv.15b–16 have been debated for some time. The "leech" is the symbol of greed because it sucks blood through its two suckers (here called its "two daughters" who cry "Give! Give!").

15b–16 There probably is a relationship in the numbering between v.15a and vv.15b–16: two daughters, three insatiable things, and four things that never say enough. The four insatiable things are then listed: "Sheol" (NIV "grave"; GK 8619), the abode of the dead (see also 27:20); the barren womb of one whose desire for children is all consuming (see Ge 16:2; 30:1); land that is not satisfied with water; and fire that continues until stopped.

There is no clearly stated ethical lesson; these are basic observations of life. But one point that could be made is that greed, symbolized by the leech, is as insatiable as these other things.

4. Punishment for parental disrespect (30:17)

17 Severe punishment awaits those who show disrespect for their parents. The sentence focuses on the "eye" that "mocks" a father and despises obedience to a mother. The eye manifests the inner heart attitude—so the contemptuous look runs deep. The punishment is talionic—the eye that mocks will be pecked out by the birds. By these images the sternest punishment is held out for those who hold their parents in such contempt.

5. Amazing things in nature (30:18–19)

18–19 Many things in nature are amazing but incomprehensible. This little observation also begins with the numerical formula "There are three things that are too amazing for me, four that I do not understand." The verb "amazing" (GK 7098) basically describes what is wonderful, surpassing, incomprehensible (cf. Ge 18:14; Jdg 13:18; Ps 139:6; Isa 9:6). The sage can only admire the wonders of nature—he is at a loss to explain it all.

It is not easy to discover what the four things have in common. They all are linked by the word "way" (GK 2006, meaning a course of action) and by a sense of mystery in each area. Suggestions for a common theme include the following: (1) all four things are hidden from continued observation, for they are there in majestic form and then are gone, not leaving a trace; (2) they all have a mysterious means of propulsion or motivation; (3) they all describe the movement of one thing within the sphere or domain of another; (4) the first three serve as illustrations of the fourth and greatest wonder, which concerns human relations and is slightly different than the first three.

The first entry is the way of the eagle in the sky, a marvelous creature soaring with apparent ease but certain determination and purpose, all hidden from the observer. Next is the way of the serpent on a rock. Here is the mysterious but smooth and efficient movement of a reptile without feet. The way of a ship in the sea portrays the magnificent movement of a vessel through a trackless sea. All these are marvelous to observe; they focus our attention on the majestic and mysterious movements in the sky, on the land, and on the sea.

The fourth mystery is "the way of a man with a maiden." The word for "maiden" (almah; GK 6625) does not in and of itself mean "virgin" but rather describes a young woman who is sexually ready for marriage. What is in view here is the wonder of human sexuality. This mystery might begin with the manner of obtaining the love of the woman but focuses on the most intimate part of human relationships, which the sage considers to be wonderful. All of it is part of God's marvelous plan for his creation and therefore can be fully enjoyed and appreciated without fully comprehending it.

6. The brazen woman (30:20)

20 Equally amazing is the insensitivity of the adulteress to sin. That this verse was placed here lends support to the idea that the previous verse is focusing on sexual intimacy in marriage; for just as that is incomprehensible (filling one with wonder), so is the way that human nature has distorted and ruined it. Carrying forward the use of the word "way," this verse describes "the way of an adulteress." It portrays an amoral woman more than an immoral one. The act of adultery is as unremarkable to her as a meal (the imagery of eating and wiping her mouth is euphemistic for sexual activity; see 9:17). It is incredible that human beings can engage in sin and then so easily dismiss any sense of guilt or responsibility, perhaps by rationalizing the deeds or perhaps through a calloused indifference to what the will of the Lord is for sexuality.

7. Abuse of position (30:21–23)

21–23 Certain people who are suddenly elevated in their status in life can be unbearable. The sage says that under these things the earth trembles and cannot bear it—obviously using humorous or satirical hyperbole to say that these changes shake up the order of life. This assumes that the elevated status was not accompanied by a change of nature. For example, it was not uncommon for a servant to become a king in the ancient Near East. It would be possible that once he became king, he would develop the mentality and disposition of a king and perhaps be better than the preceding ruler. But the "earth trembles" when a servant is king; unaccustomed to such dignity, he might become a power-hungry tyrant and oppressive ruler (e.g., Hitler). The second, a fool who is full of food, describes a fool who becomes prosperous but continues to be boorish and irreligious; but now he is overbearing and, worse yet, finds time hanging heavy on his hands. The third is the unloved woman who is married. Perhaps she is unattractive or odious, but also perhaps she is married to someone incapable of showing love. Being unloved, not sought or wooed, she is actually hated (see Ge 29:31, 33). The fourth is the maid who displaces her mistress. The tension from the threat of Hagar in Ge 16:5 and 21:10 shows how unbearable this could be. Such upheavals in the proper order of things make life intolerable.

8. Wisdom the key to success (30:24–28)

24–28 These verses focus on four things that are small but "extremely wise": ants, rock badgers, locusts, and lizards. The wisdom exhibited in the ants concerns their forethought and organization to make provision for food; the wisdom of the rock badgers (NIV, "coneys"; cf. NIV note) is found in their ingenuity to find a place of security; the wisdom of the locust consists in its cooperation and order, which when massed in military division becomes a force for human beings to reckon with; and the wisdom of the lizard is in its elusiveness and boldness. In God's creation wisdom manifests itself in a variety of ways, and humans can learn the value of wisdom over size and numerical strength.

9. Leadership qualities (30:29–31)

29–31 Leaders exhibit majestic qualities. There is a simple point to this observation: three things are "stately in their stride," four that move with "stately being." Three examples come from the animal world, leading up to the fourth, the king, who has his army about him to defend against revolt.

10. A final admonition (30:32–33)

32–33 The sage advises those who have "exalted" themselves and "played the fool" and those who have "planned evil" to cease their efforts and control what they say; namely, "clap your hand over your mouth!" (cf. Job 40:4–5). The explanation for this warning is that it only causes strife. Two similes are used in the last verse, churning the milk and twisting the nose—both involve a pressing, the first producing butter from milk and the second drawing blood from the nose. In the same way stirring up anger (through pride and evil planning) produces "strife." There is also a subtle wordplay here, for "nose" is related to "anger." So the intent of this concluding advice is to strive for peace and harmony through humility and righteousness.

VII. The Words of Lemuel (31:1–9)

A. Title: The Words Taught to Lemuel by His Mother (31:1)

1 Nothing is known about King Lemuel. Jewish legend identifies him as Solomon and the advice as from Bathsheba from a time when Solomon indulged in magic with his Egyptian wife and delayed the morning sacrifices. But there is no evidence for this. The same question of translation for "oracle" (GK 5363) occurs here as in 30:1 (see comment on 30:1). This section is the only direct address to a king in the book—something that was the norm in the wisdom literature of the other countries. The instruction includes two warnings and then sound advice.

B. First Warning (31:2–3)

2–3 The king is warned not to spend his strength on sensual lust. The repetition of "son" shows the seriousness of the warning; and the twofold motivation adds to this impact—he is her son, and she has vowed him (cf. 1Sa 1:11). She advises him not to spend "his strength" or "his ways" on women. The term "vigor" (GK 2006) may allude to sexual intercourse (see 30:19) or in general refer to the heart's affection or attention. "Women" in this passage are qualified as those who "ruin" (GK 4681) kings. Commentators note that this difficult term is close to an Aramaic word for concubine and an Arabic word that is an indelicate description of women. Whatever the precise meaning, the point of the verse is that while it would be easy for a king to spend his time and energy enjoying women, that would be unwise.

C. Second Warning (31:4–7)

4–7 Drinking wine and craving beer is not for kings. If this literally prohibits any use of such drinks, it would be unheard of in the ancient courts. Either excessive use of alcohol or troubling need for it (reflecting deeper problems) is what is meant. The danger, of course, would be to cloud the mind and deprive the oppressed of true justice. Verses 6–7 explain that a better use for strong drink is to relieve bodily suffering and mental distress. People in those conditions need to forget.

D. Instruction: Defend the Defenseless (31:8–9)

8–9 The king is to open his mouth (i.e., "speak up for") for "those who cannot speak for themselves." It is his responsibility to champion the rights of the poor and the needy, those who are left desolate by the cruelties of life (see 2Sa 14:4–11; 1Ki 3:16–28; Pss 45:3–5; 72:4; Isa 9:6–7).

VIII. The Wife of Noble Character (31:10–31)

The book of Proverbs comes to a close with the addition of this poem about the woman of valor. A careful reading of the passage will show that her value is derived from her character of godly wisdom that is beneficial to her family and to the community as a whole. Traditionally this poem was recited by husbands and children at the Sabbath table on Friday night. Christians too have seen it as a paradigm for godly women.

The theme of the poem, the wife of noble character, captures the ideals of wisdom that have filled the book. It may well be that this is more the point of the composition than merely a portrayal of the ideal wife. The woman here presented is a wealthy aristocrat who runs a household estate with servants and conducts business affairs—real estate, vineyards, and merchandise—domestic affairs, and charity. It would be quite a task for any woman to emulate this pattern. Some see this woman as an idealized wife, in an ideal home, in an ideal society—she is not just some man's dream woman but represents a universal type of woman. Others have also recognized that more is going on here than a description of the ideal wife. After all, the work says nothing about the woman's personal relationship with her husband, her intellectual or emotional strengths, or her religious activities. In general it appears that the woman of ch. 31 is a symbol of wisdom. If this is so, then the poem plays an important part in the personification of wisdom in the ancient Near Eastern literature. Indeed, many commentators rightly invite a contrast to the earlier portrayals of Dame Folly lurking dangerously in the streets—she was to be avoided—and Lady Wisdom, who is to be embraced. The Lady Wisdom in this chapter stands in the strongest contrast to the adulterous woman in the earlier chapters.

Several characteristics of this poem should be noted in order to appreciate its impact on the teaching of wisdom. First, the entire poem is arranged alphabetically (a pattern known as an acrostic). This means the first word of each line begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet in sequence. Most commentators recognize that such a pattern makes the work uneven and somewhat random in its organization. Nevertheless, the arrangement made memorization easier and perhaps also served to organize the thoughts. We may say, then, that the poem is an organized arrangement of the virtues of the wise wife—the ABC's of wisdom.

Second, the passage has striking similarities with hymns. Usually a hymn is written to God, but here apparently it was written to the wife of noble character. A comparison with Ps 111, a hymn to God, illustrates some of the similarities. The psalm begins with "Praise the LORD"; this is reflected in Pr 31:31, which says, "Her works bring her praise." Psalm 111:2 speaks of God's works; Pr 31:13 speaks of her works. Psalm 111:2 says that the works of the Lord are searched or "pondered"; Pr 31:13 says that she "selects" wool and flax. Psalm 111:3 says that the Lord's work is honorable (NIV, "majestic"); Pr 31:25 ascribes strength and "dignity" to the woman. Psalm 111:4 says that the Lord is gracious and full of compassion; Pr 31:26 ascribes the law of compassion to the woman. Psalm 111:5 says that the Lord gives "food"; Pr 31:15 says that the woman provides "food" for her house. Psalm 111:10 says that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom—the motto of Proverbs; Pr 31:30 describes the woman as fearing the Lord. Psalm 111:10 says that the Lord's praise will endure; Pr 31:31 says that the woman will be praised for her works. It is clear that Pr 31 is patterned after the hymn to extol the works of wisdom.

Third, the passage has similarities with heroic literature. The vocabulary and the expressions in general have the ring of an ode to a champion. For example, "woman of valor" (v.10; NIV, "woman of noble character") is the same expression one would find in Judges for the "mighty man of valor" (Jdg 6:12; NIV, "mighty warrior"); "strength" (vv.17 [NIV, "vigorously"], 25) is elsewhere used for powerful deeds and heroics (e.g., Ex 15:2, 13; 1Sa 2:10); "food" (v.15) is actually "prey"; "surpass them all" (v.29) is an expression that signifies victory.

Putting these observations together, one would conclude that Pr 31:10–31 is a hymn to Lady Wisdom, written in the heroic mode. Wisdom is personified as a woman because the word "wisdom" is a feminine noun and naturally suggests it (cf. ch. 8), and because the woman is an excellent example of wisdom by virtue of the variety of applications it receives—at home, in the market, with charity, in business. A personification of wisdom allows the writer to make all the lessons concrete and not abstract (we can see them in action in everyday life); it provides a polemic against the literature of the ancient world that saw women as decorative—charm and beauty without substance; and it depicts the greater heroism as moral and domestic rather than as exploits in battle.

The poem certainly presents a pattern for women who want to develop a life of wisdom; but since it is essentially about wisdom, its lessons are for both men and women to develop. The fear of the Lord will inspire people to be faithful stewards of the time and talents that God has given; wisdom is productive and beneficial for others, requiring great industry in life's endeavors; wisdom is best taught and lived in the home—indeed, the success of the home demands wisdom; and wisdom is balanced living, giving attention to domestic responsibilities as well as business enterprises and charitable service.

A. Praise in General (31:10–12)

10 The introductory rhetorical question establishes the point that the wife of noble character is not easily found; but when she is, she is a treasure. Her description as "a wife of noble character" signifies that she possesses all the virtues, honor, and strength to do the things that the poem will set forth. This woman, like wisdom, is worth more than rubies (cf. 3:15; 8:11).

11–12 The noble woman's husband lacks nothing of value. The term "value" (GK 8965) usually means "plunder"; the point may be that the gain will be as rich and bountiful as the spoils of war. The capable woman inspires the confidence of her husband because in her business and domestic enterprises she proves able (cf. 1Sa 24:2). In any marriage, but especially when a large household is involved, such trust in the wife's abilities is essential.

B. Industrial Pursuits of the Household (31:13–15)

13–15 Now the cataloging of activities begins. The picture presented is of a large household that requires supervision. All indicators suggest that it is a wealthy and honorable household. This noble woman takes the responsibility to see that food and clothing are provided, making the choices, working with her hands, and ensuring that the food for the day will be there. The simile with the merchant ships suggests that she brings a continual supply of abundance.

C. Financial Enterprise (31:16–18)

16–18 This part of the account portrays the noble wife as a shrewd business woman, making wise investments from her earnings. There is no foolish purchasing nor indebtedness here. Verse 17 literally says that she "girds her loins with strength"—she is a vigorous and tireless worker, for girding is an expression for preparation for serious work. Consequently, she learns by experience that her efforts are profitable. The last line of v.18 may simply mean that she burns the midnight oil in following through a business opportunity, although it may signify that her house was flourishing without calamity (cf. Job 18:6; Jer 25:10).

D. Provision for the Family and the Poor (31:19–21)

19 Verse 19 focuses on the domestic activity of spinning: the "distaff" is the straight rod, and the "spindle" is the round or circular part. She "stretches out" (NIV, "holds") her hand to the work to provide clothing.

20 The noble wife also provides for the poor. The text literally says that she "opens her palm" to the poor; i.e, she gives to the poor with liberality (Ps 112:9). This was the hand that was diligently at work in the previous verse with an acquired skill; it is not the hand of a lazy, wealthy woman.

21 Moreover, the noble wife is well prepared for the future. When faced with cold, her family has warm clothes to wear. The word "scarlet" could be read also as "two cloaks," suggesting double garments for warmth.

E. Distinction by Industry (31:22–24)

22 The noble woman's clothing is "fine linen and purple," i.e., costly and luxurious. Garments dyed with purple indicated wealth and high rank (cf. Ex 25–37, passim; SS 3:10). One is reminded of the rich man in Lk 16:19, who also was clothed in purple and fine linen. The problem was not with the clothing he wore but that he was not charitable.

23 The woman's husband was important. The "gate" was the place of the assembly of the elders who had judicial responsibilities (Ru 4:1–12). The man was a prominent, well-known leader.

24 The woman's industry finds expression in business. The poet did not think it strange or unworthy for a woman to engage in honest trade. In fact, weaving of fine linens was a common trade for women in Palestine from antiquity.

F. Wisdom and Prosperity (31:25–27)

25 The noble wife is diligent and prudent in her work; her strength and honor come from her solid financial and economic position, as v.25b shows; so the result is that she is confident in facing the future.

26–27 She is wise and gracious in her speech. She uses good, practical common sense in her discussions; and her instruction is reliable. The last phrase of v.26 literally says "law of kindness": kind and faithful instruction comes from her. Finally, the wife's supervision of the household is alert, as a watchman.

G. Merits Recognized (31:28–29)

28 The wisdom of the noble woman inspires praise from her family—from those who know her the best. Unfortunately, praise often comes from outside the home, from those who do not know the person very well. This woman is of such worth that her children "rise up" to praise her.

29 This woman surpasses all other women. These words are probably the praise of the husband who speaks for the rest of the family.

H. Laudatory Summation (31:30–31)

30 These words could be the husband's but may better form the poet's summation of the matter. In any case, what is valued in the wife is her domestic efficiency and her piety rather than charm and beauty. Physical appearance is not necessarily dismissed—it simply does not endure as do those qualities that the fear of the Lord produces. Beauty is deceitful, and one who pursues beauty may very well be disappointed by the character of the "beautiful" person. The reference to the fear of the Lord brings the book full circle: it began with a reference to it (1:7) and ends with a similar reference.

31 As in v.23, there is a reference to the city gate, where all manner of business was conducted. The woman's works bring her praise in her own rights and not merely as an appendage of her husband.

Ecclesiastes

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

Ecclesiastes is one of the most puzzling books of the Bible. Its apparently unorthodox statements and extreme pessimism caused its inclusion in the canon of Scripture to be questioned. However, because historically it was thought to have been the work of Solomon (see Authorship), its place in the canon of Scripture was generally secure.

2. Authorship and Date

Traditionally, the authorship of the book has been ascribed to Solomon. This is implied in the opening verse, where the author, "the Teacher" (Heb., Qoheleth; GK 7738), is described as the "son of David, king in Jerusalem." Again at 1:12 he states, "I, the Teacher, was king over Israel in Jerusalem." The tradition of David as singer and psalmist is borne out by an early reference at Am 6:5 and is taken seriously in the light of the lament for Saul and Jonathan (2Sa 1:17–27). We ought to take Solomon's reputation for wisdom equally seriously and see his court as the center that drew the wise from all quarters to discuss problems of living in a difficult world (1Ki 4:34).

Solomon was on the high road of trade and culture. He had important contacts with Egypt, including an Egyptian wife, and Egypt had a wealth of wisdom literature. This literature includes poems that reason about the problems of life. Other known writings of a similar type come from Babylon. Presumably, Solomon too listened, collected, and added to the literature by facing the realities of life and showing the way through for the God-fearing person. A close examination of the book of Ecclesiastes reveals that there are no passages that conclusively rule out the possibility that Solomon was the author (though to view someone other than him as the author is a defensible position for evangelicals to hold).

If Solomon was the author, then this book was written sometime during his time, presumably in his latter years. Because some of the expressions in the book seem to require a later date than the time of Solomon, it is plausible that his words, preserved by wise men over several centuries, were eventually recorded by a new Teacher in his own dialect or in the Hebrew of his time.

3. Purpose

The theme of the book appears in the prologue: "Meaningless! Meaningless! . . . Everything is meaningless." The general conclusion comes in the epilogue, which speaks of fearing God and keeping his commandments because we must one day give account to him. The meaning and purpose of the book must be discovered within this framework. Life in the world is subject to frustration; but human beings can still accept their circumstances, even enjoy them, and find strength to live life as it comes.

The book tells us to begin where we are, with the assumption that God has his purpose for today. To fulfill this purpose we must use our God-given sense as well as our own experience of ourselves and that of others. God has a proper time for each thing to be done (3:1–8), and recognizing this allows us to accept life as it comes (3:11a), even though we know that we have fitted no more than one piece in the great puzzle. Thus we are directed from speculation (e.g., 8:16–17) to observation. It is right to meditate on the total work of God, but we are to glorify God in the common things of life; i.e., we are to make the fullest use of the present moment.

There may be times of stress and strain and special calling; but the norm is to eat, drink, and live our daily lives as those who gladly rejoice in God's good gifts and intend to use them to his glory. This is the theme of the refrains (2:24–26; 3:12–13, 22; 5:18–19; 8:15; 9:7–9). In fact, it tallies with the NT teaching that we are to eat and drink and do all our actions to the glory of God (1Co 10:31; Col 3:17), since he has generously given us everything for our enjoyment (1Ti 6:17). In all this there is nothing unworthy.

4. Theological Values

Ecclesiastes encourages the reader to a God-centered worldview rather than falling victim to frustrations and unanswered questions. None of its contents has to be rejected in the light of the NT. Although the NT revelation is vastly greater than that in Ecclesiastes, the two are not devoid of similarities (e.g., Jas 4:13–17). Like the people of God in Solomon's time, believers today are subject to the unexpected changes and chances common to humankind. Yet they know that God works through every vicissitude of life. Respecting the future which for Solomon was shrouded in a shadow land, Christians have the glorious hope of being in the presence of Christ himself (2Co 5:6; Php 1:23).

The writer of Ecclesiastes was no humanist. He named God some forty times, and six times he spoke of the fear of God (3:14; 5:7; 7:18; 8:12–13; 12:13). He used the general name Elohim (GK 466) and not Yahweh ("the LORD"; GK 3378), the covenant name of God. This may be because he was writing about God in relation to the whole of humankind. Another possibility may be that as the OT period drew to its close, there was a growing reluctance to use the sacred covenant name in daily speech. Hence, when Ecclesiastes reached its final form—even if Solomon had been the author and had used the covenant name—reverence would have required the use of Elohim.

So far as a person's state before God is concerned, the book contrasts two classes of humanity. One comprises the God-fearing (3:14; 5:7; 7:18; 8:12–13; 12:13), righteous (3:17; 7:15–16, 20; 8:14; 9:2), good (9:2), and wise (frequently mentioned, e.g., 10:2). The other comprises the sinners (2:26; 7:26; 8:11; 9:2, 18) and the wicked (3:17; 7:15; 8:10, 12–14; 9:2). There is also frequent mention of fools (e.g., 5:4), a term that does not mean a jester or merely unwise person, but one who is godless and wicked (cf. Pss 14:1; 53:1). It is especially descriptive of those who act wrongly because they do not make any effort to discover the will of God. At the same time the book recognizes that there is no such thing as sinless perfection (7:20).

Strangely, there is no reference to repentance and forgiveness. There are, however, two references to sacrifices (5:1; 9:2), the second of which is linked to moral evil and uncleanness. Lest we downgrade Ecclesiastes because of its silence about repentance and forgiveness, we should take into account that a book on godly morals need not necessarily deal with these things. Rather, it assumes that the reader knows about these teachings.

EXPOSITION

I. The Meaninglessness of Nature, Wisdom, and Wealth (1:1–2:23)

1. The Theme: All Is Frustration (1:1–3)

1–3 "The Teacher" (GK 7738), writing as a wise and observant king of David's line, sets out his theme. He lives in a world riddled through with vanity, futility, and frustration. Human beings, struggling to live, meet frustration at every turn. One looks back to the record of sin's entry into human life (7:29; Ge 3). The human race chose to become self-centered and self-guided rather than remaining God-centered and God-guided. Thus they became earthbound and frustrated, and this book demonstrates that there is no firm foundation under the sun for earthbound people to build on so as to find meaning, satisfaction, and the key to existence.

2. The Frustration in Nature and History (1:4–11)

4–11 The Teacher plunges straight into the search for ultimate truth and stability in nature and in human history. He cites examples of research into repetitive phenomena, choosing first four basic facts of the created order: (1) the solid earth, (2) the rising and setting of the heavenly bodies, (3) air currents, and (4) the flow and evaporation of water. South and north are selected as a balance to the east and west of the sun. Solomon was interested in nature generally (cf. 1Ki 4:33).

Scientists define physical laws that have always operated; but if we ask them about origins or some ultimate purpose, there is nothing they can tell us from nature that will give the meaning of life. The biblical view of nature, however, is that it testifies to a Creator, though it does not compel belief in him

(e.g., Ps 19; Ro 1:20). But the Teacher is concerned with proof rather than testimony and rightly maintains that meaning and security cannot be found in nature alone. If everything is endlessly cyclical, how can we break out of the temporal circle into a state that leads somewhere? We may also ask, What is the true meaning to be found in nature—if there is a meaning, is it found in the beauty of spring or in the violence of the storm and the earthquake?

There is a similar impasse in the study of history. What help is there in an endless succession of birth and death? History shows men and women struggling to find meaning in their experiences, but all in vain. Every generation looks for some satisfying novelty, but each novelty can be analyzed as only a variant on the past. Obviously, there have been many inventions; but in the context the Teacher probably has in mind any invention that enables human beings to break out of nature and the succession of history into meaning, which transcends the sense of futility. They have not found it; and each generation, regarding itself as the greatest, still reaches no conclusion.

3. The Frustration of Wisdom (1:12–18)

12–13 The Teacher has confronted us with a situation that today might be called "existential." The human race exists in a series of experiences and cannot discover any onward meaning in them. All people can do is exist and make the best of what comes—or drop out altogether. Yet most people still believe that life has some meaning if only they could find it. In his first mention of God, the Teacher stated what comes out again later (e.g., 3:11)—namely, that God has given something to humankind that he has denied to the rest of the animal world: the constant, though often worrying, urge to make sense of life and to work toward a transcendent ideal. Human beings, in the likeness of God, look for meanings so that they can control and direct their instinctive desires.

14–15 There is so much people cannot understand. Not only are people aiming at unsubstantial ideals, which blow away like the wind, but their efforts to straighten things out and supply what seems to be lacking are continually disappointed. Today we have straightened out many of the twists of the past and added many comforts to life; but as many of us have seen in our lifetime, in one moment a whole generation or some dominant group of rulers can revive the horrors of the past and destroy what is truly good and meaningful in life.

16–18 The Teacher was remorseless in his effort to make us think, but even the wisdom of Solomon could not break through on the basis of human reason. We observe that those who have struggled to wrest the secret of the universe and those who have abandoned any attempt to understand it both find frustration. Those who take life seriously can never take it lightly. At the end of this section, the Teacher is frustrated because his thinking is earthbound under heaven, for he depends wholly on his own great wisdom and increased knowledge.

4. The Frustration of Unlimited Wealth (2:1–11)

1–2 We notice that this description of Solomon omits mention of immorality but is concerned with the joys of luxury. No serious thinker supposes that a Casanova is on the way to discover the purpose of living (cf. 7:26). The Teacher set his sights on those pleasures that many people considered worthwhile in themselves. He surrounded himself with happy people who kept him amused, but even the jokes and laughter grew stale (cf. 7:1–6).

3 The Teacher then turned to sensual pleasures. Yet he still kept a hold of himself so that he could analyze his experiences and see whether they proved to be the answer to all human desires.

4–8 A sensible use of money may be a form of creativity; so Solomon expressed himself in extensive buildings and planted things. Naturally Solomon did no more than supervise the work. He had only to give the word, and slaves did his bidding (cf. 1Ki 9:17–22). The service of others is something that money can buy.

Solomon also determined to be the largest owner of cattle and sheep. He did not lose sight of the need for an ever-increasing income; and his position of holding the trading bridge between Egypt and Asia made him one of the wealthiest monarchs of the day (1Ki 10:21–29). As a connoisseur of music, he collected at court the finest soloists and choirs. The final item in the list (translated "harem"; GK 8721) may well refer to Solomon's wives and concubines, but the Hebrew word does not occur elsewhere in the Bible.

9–11 More than any other man, Solomon was able to buy every single thing he imagined could satisfy him. He kept his sense of discernment intact (vv. 3, 9). Solomon wanted to determine to what extent one could find the key to life in a varied use of great wealth. In the end money and the pleasures it can buy do not lift us out of the realm of earthbound frustration. The Teacher will later amplify this conclusion in terms of death and the handling of one's possessions (see 5:8–17). Despite riches we may still be empty shells and our gains only as substantial as the wind.

5. The Ultimate Frustration: Death (2:12–23)

12–16 A critic may object that the pursuit of luxury is the aim of a fool, but what of wisdom as a proper guide to life? Nobody who follows in Solomon's steps will ever have greater opportunities than he had for combining wisdom and wealth. Granted that wisdom is more worthwhile than folly and gives light in the darkness of life; yet both wise and foolish have to face the ultimate fate of dying, and death is the ultimate frustration. The Teacher did not go back on his conclusion that wisdom is better than folly but asked how much better it is in the light of the fact that both the wise and fools will be forgotten in future ages.

17–23 The Teacher found no security and purpose in the rewards of his labor. A person may not be so rich as Solomon but may live wisely and accumulate wealth in a perfectly legitimate way. Such people may wear themselves out in the process. Then comes death and the sharing of the estate. What sort of persons will the heirs be? They too may be wise; but they may also be fools, especially if they have imbibed their father's materialistic values without having had to struggle for a living.

II. Divine Order of Life (2:24–3:22)

1. Daily Life to Be Enjoyed (2:24–26)

24–26 This is the first of similar refrains that, if taken out of their context, might seem to advocate a life of mere pleasure seeking. The Teacher was clearly speaking to normal people in normal circumstances. He was not discussing physical and social evils that needed to be put right. Up to now he had considered life from the angle of the person who tried to have a knowledge of good and evil (cf. Ge 2:16–17) without being accountable to God for one's standards of thought or behavior. The alternative is the life of faith, which does not understand everything (see ch. 3) but looks for the hand of God in the events of daily life.

The walk with God means that we can ask for his wisdom to use life rightly and his knowledge to understand such of his ways as he may disclose to us, and thus experience the joy of fulfillment despite life's difficulties. The Wisdom writings of Scripture speak of life in a stable society where individuals and authorities should be carrying out the will of God. Normally such a society prospers. It is God's will that sinners who are here something more than fools and who, because they are sinners, do not mind what means they use for "gathering and storing up," should hand over their ill-gotten gains. The final sentence at v.26 obviously refers to the frustration for sinners.

2. God's Plan for Living (3:1–8)

1 Human beings are to take their lives day by day from the hand of God (2:24–26; 3:12–13), realizing that God has a fitting time for each thing to be done. The significance of this section is that human beings are responsible to discern the right times for the right actions; and when they do the right action according to God's time, the result is "beautiful" (v.11). The Teacher did not say that everything was imposed on them against their will, even though some events go beyond their understanding.

2 Birth and death, the boundaries of life under the sun, are mentioned first. Children have always been looked upon as a blessing from God (cf. Ps 127:3–5), whereas barrenness has been considered a judgment from him (Ge 30:22–23; 1Sa 1:6–7; 2:1–11; Isa 4:1; Lk 1:25). On the other hand, increased medical knowledge enables life to be extended far beyond the limits of threescore years and ten. So we look for God's plan, not for euthanasia, to determine when and whether to resuscitate lives that are ready to slip away. Planting and uprooting have both a natural and a metaphorical sense. The natural is taken up at 11:6, the metaphorical in Jeremiah's call to break up the fallow ground and uproot the thorns (Jer 4:3; cf. Mt 13:24–30).

3 Killing and healing involve the question of a so-called just war and capital punishment. What is God's plan for our time and for the specific situations that confront us? When should aggression be met by resistance and when should there be some healing compromise? When does an offender need a life sentence, and when does he need psychiatric treatment?

Tearing down and building up, while involving plans for building development, also have a metaphorical meaning. The Christian life has its negative and positive sides (1Co 3:10–15; Gal 2:18).

4–5 There are appropriate occasions for tears and laughter (Ro 12:15). Biblical society had a healthier attitude toward the use of weeping and mourning as a meaningful and healing part of life (cf. Ps 6:6–7; Jn 11:35). There is a time to clear the ground of loose stones before collecting other stones for building. There are also times for expressing or refraining from love, a relevant reminder for many people today that there are standards of sex.

6–8 Acquisition and sacrifice form part of life, as do tearing up and repairing, silence and speech. Love and hate are both needed, provided we love and hate the proper things (Ro 12:9; 1Jn 4:20). When must we war against those who promote evil? With whom are we to be in happy agreement?

3. The Pieces and the Whole (3:9–15)

9–11 Admittedly, God has his proper time for every event, but we naturally want to grasp the whole plan he has for our lives. What is the point of it all? (1) We have to take steps to discover and fulfill the duties to be done each day. Doing the right thing at the right time yields a beautiful sense of fulfillment. (2) However much we see things as units of knowledge and experience, we must try to bring these units into a meaningful whole. This is an aspect of our likeness to God, who alone embraces the whole. The Fall occurred when our original progenitors chose to have their own knowledge of good and evil and to be in charge of their own lives. By cutting themselves off from God, they were without clear direction, no longer living in the light of God's whole plan.

In this fallen world the believer must ask, "Lord, what would you have me do now? I know my life has an eternal purpose, and I desire to understand how all things work together for good. But I realize that I am not as you and cannot say just why such-and-such a thing has come to me" (cf. v.11).

12–14 There is much to be enjoyed, especially as one goes through life doing good. It requires faith to declare that there is a permanency about all God-inspired good deeds. Therefore, one must walk in humble fear lest one miss the will of God in life. The fuller Christian revelation enriches these principles. Treasure may be laid up in heaven (Mt 6:20), works of gold and silver will survive the fire test (1Co 3:10–15), and a Christian's works in the Lord follow him or her (Rev 14:13). But unbelieving humanists, however earnest, cannot plan their lives in the light of eternity.

15 If we look for further guidance as to the will of God, we may find it in his working in history. History does repeat itself. We may discard the lessons of history, but God confronts us with them again and again (cf. 1:10). We have no basis for complaining that he has not warned us that he will call the past to account.

4. The Consequences of Mortality (3:16–22)

16–17 One of the greatest problems in understanding the total plan of God is that reward and punishment sometimes seem conspicuously absent. People in positions of power have a tendency to grab for themselves. Hence believers by faith hold that God will redress the wrong assessments made on earth (Mal 3:16–4:3; Rev 22:11–12).

18–22 Meanwhile, the Teacher centers his thoughts on the inevitability of death. God makes all sensible people realize that they are as much subject to death as is the animal world. Both are animated by a similar breath of life that sustains them while living and is withdrawn at death. People and animals also resemble each other in having bodies made of vegetable and mineral substances that revert to dust at death. There is no reference here to any personal spirit or soul, but the spirit or breath is the sustaining life that comes from God (Ge 6:17; Ps 104:29–30).

Most people behave as though they have endless time and close their eyes to the fact of death. God wants us to face that fact. The Teacher challenges those who live as though they are immortal and are never to be accountable to God (vv.16–17). We shall not be brought back for a second chance to cooperate with God in doing his will on this side of eternity. We must make the most of the present in order to please God. We cannot count on the future, since we do not know what it is.

The conclusion is a further summary of the refrain that God has his day-by-day plan for our lives and that we can find the joy of fulfillment in it.

III. The Frustration of Politics (4:1–16)

1–3 The Teacher has seen that God must inevitably redress the wrong judgments of unjust rulers (3:17) and that high and low must face the fact that they are but mortals (3:18–22). The Teacher met the valid objection that some people find it hard to take their lives each day from the hand of God and enjoy them (3:22). Granted that average persons in settled circumstances may not find much difficulty in aiming at this, but observation shows that the simple ways of life may be wrecked by leaders who misuse their power.

There are times when we thank God for delivering some poor tortured sufferer through death. Anyone who feels deeply, like the Teacher, may wish on occasion that he or she had never been born into all the sufferings of the world (cf. Mt 18:1–9).

4 This verse gives a profound diagnosis when it says that all achievement comes through a drive toward superiority. The desire for achievement is good in itself, since God never intended humankind to be static or simply passive. The challenge to be the best and to be breaking fresh ground always involves some rivalry of ideas and has led to notable scientific progress; but rivalry between individuals and nations may divert healthy competition into bitter envy. In industry, moreover, where the average worker has little scope for creativity, there is envy for another person's money or status. So a healthy drive becomes yet another frustration and a chasing after the wind.

5–6 Two proverbs follow. To ignore the drive for achievement and become a dropout is foolish self-destructiveness. But the drive must be harnessed to what is compatible with inner peace.

7–8 The drive may turn into miserliness—the overaccumulation of money or other possessions. Collecting possessions can become an obsession, which kills sane thinking and prevents a person from following the advice of 3:22. Here is another form of the power complex—wherein one's success gives that person a feeling of triumphant superiority.

9–12 The drive to succeed is mature when it has its interplay with the whole of society. Two acting together are better than one selfish individual; they can support each other when there is need for support. This proverb applies to all relationships. Individualism and divisions make for weakness. There is a proper complex of power in a three-strand rope, provided the strands are good and support one another.

13–16 Finally, the power complex is seen in the struggle between tradition and revolution. Political leaders or business executives may fight to keep their position when they are no longer capable of making wise decisions; yet they will not take advice. Young revolutionaries who have been imprisoned or kept down may indeed be wiser. But if they come to power, they too may succumb to the desire to lord it over everyone else; and those under them will be glad to be rid of them. So the Teacher concludes that power all too often brings only frustration. It does not hold the key to life.

IV. The Frustration of Life (5:1–7:29)

1. Quiet Before God (5:1–7)

1–2 In contrast to the power complexes of the previous chapter, we are brought quietly into the presence of God. Here is a keen analysis of motives in prayer and worship. We come before God in humility, recognizing his majesty and his right to our lives. We seek his guidance and listen to his words.

The alternative is to suppose that offerings can be a substitute for a God-ordered life. Sometimes extreme concern over one issue is an unconscious screen against facing other issues. It is as though we call God's attention to the sacrifice we are making while being blind to some essential command that he makes.

Yet we are meant to speak to God in prayer. The emphasis in v.2 is on rashness and haste. Prayer is not reciting a list as quickly as possible so as to rush once more into the round of daily life (cf. Mt 6:7–8).

3 As personal and business cares produce dreams, which are unsubstantial things, so many words produce foolish and empty prayer. When we come before God, our minds are full of our own business rather than with the worship of God. When we talk too much, we usually talk like fools. This can be especially bad in the house of God.

4–6 There is, however, a place for making resolutions (vows) before God. The challenge that comes through a sermon or a book and, above all, from Scripture itself should be clinched by definite commitment. The same follow-up is vital if in time of trouble we make a promise to do something if only God will deliver us. If we do not carry it through, it would be better to have made no commitment at all. We must not draw back and make an excuse about not having understood what we were required to do. This can only arouse God's displeasure, and he may well take away what we were hoping to keep for ourselves.

7 The section concludes with the reminder that our approach to God must be a realistic response to what he has shown us to be his will—not a wordy presentation of our dreams for ourselves. In other words, we should try to put ourselves in a position to discover God's way to use what he has given us in our daily lives.

2. Money and Mortality (5:8–20)

8–9 The Teacher again speaks of the use and abuse of money in daily life. Too often the struggle for power brings suffering for the underdog. Each shows servility toward those above and waits to take their place while lording it over those below him or her. The Teacher on the whole sees an advantage in a supreme ruler truly concerned for the welfare of the land. One hopes for a wise person at the head of the country or a business or an institution—one who has both ability and humility.

10 Struggle for power comes from the desire for more and more money. It is not wrong to have a proper concern for a living wage, but the prestige of perquisites and greed for luxuries make this verse as relevant as ever. These insatiable desires also bring frustration. Not money itself, but a love of money is "a root of all kinds of evil" (1Ti 6:10).

11–12 The person who has an abundance of material possessions may become a miser (4:7–8) or may never know real friendship because of the numbers of acquaintances who want to share in the wealth. On the other hand, assuming that one has a living wage, the honest worker can sleep peacefully at night. But the anxieties of money-grubbers drive them to sleeping pills and tranquilizers.

13–17 A note of even deeper sadness is that people may accumulate money, even to the extent of warping their character. Then a miscalculation or an unfortunate turn of events destroys everything. What they had hoped to leave to their children is gone. Perhaps the children have been counting on inheriting that money and have done nothing for themselves (cf. 2:18–21). So the parents have wasted the driving desire of their lives. They have measured success by wrong standards; and when their long struggle for money came to nothing, they died poor and frustrated (cf. Mt 6:19–21).

18–19 So the refrain comes again. The Teacher has described those who aim for money and lose real life. Can we then have life first and secondarily find a place for money? The refrain says yes, if we take life day by day from God and seek to know his plan, so far as it may be known. We must be willing to work. Once most work was constructive and often creative. Today many are involved in monotonous activity, another example of frustration. We must also look for constructive uses of leisure—activity that may not bring much money but will bring the added enjoyment that the Teacher has in mind. Therefore, it is right to pray and to look for work that will produce enough to live on and possessions we can enjoy with a good conscience, because they are things God has given us to enjoy (1Ti 6:17).

20 In summary, the ideal for those devoted to God is that they not brood over the past or worry about the future; for God fills their hearts with joy (cf. Mt 6:25–34; Php 4:4–7).

Again we remember that the Teacher in this section has in mind the average person with a living wage. Elsewhere, as we have seen, he takes up the frustration of the suffering and despised.

3. The Unfulfilled Life (6:1–9)

1–2 There is an obvious contrast between the wording of 5:19 and 6:2. It seems that 5:19 describes those who accept a standard of living for which they have worked, without continually craving for more (cf. 5:10; 6:9). The "man" described in 6:2 is more concerned with having everything he wants, and his God-given status in life allows this. But his tragedy comes when God allows this wealth to be taken over by a stranger. This may happen when the man has no children or when he loses his property through war, violence, or some other act of injustice. Many have been broken by such calamities. Others have refused to succumb to what the Teacher sees as vanity but have rebuilt a new life, often with less regard for the intrinsic value of possessions (Heb 10:34).

3–6 Many children and long life were looked upon by the Hebrews as a mark of God's blessing, but neither guarantees a satisfying life. Some parents think they have to decide how many children they ought to have, in view of the population explosion (see 3:2). The exaggeration here may suggest that the large number of children keeps the whole family in poverty so that life cannot be enjoyed properly and so that at the end there is not enough to pay for the funeral. Or possibly, since children are considered in the Scriptures a blessing from the Lord, this verse may mean that a person may have double blessings—children and wealth—and yet not have the capacity to enjoy them and at the end die either in poverty or unloved or both. A life of total misery, which might have been avoided, is worse than natural abortion, by which a life never sees the light of day and never has to struggle in the arena of life (cf. Job 3:16). The death of the fetus reminds the Teacher of the death that awaits every person, even though they live to more than twice the age of the patriarchs.

7–9 This section speaks of another possible frustration. A human being has to work to live but has an insatiable appetite for more. This is common to both wise and foolish. Today the business world contains many clever people who work hard because they are obsessed with piling up money, while on the other side there are those who are ever alert for a quick profit—honest or dishonest. In between come the average people who, though poor in material things, have come to terms with life. They also work for their living but are content with what they have.

4. What Is Good? (6:10–12)

10–12 The Teacher was prepared to listen to objections. He said that human beings should do the will of God by being content to take their daily life from God's hand. But are they really free to choose? Since God is supreme, he has predestined everything and has made humanity too weak to resist. Reasoning, complaining, and arguing bring no answer and lead to further frustration. What value are categories such as "good"? Life is too short to worry about behavior. Even if moral standards have some bearing on the future, no one knows what the future will bring.

5. Practical Advice For Daily Living (7:1–14)

Ultimately the Teacher will return to the theme that obedience is possible even though we cannot discover the whole plan of God for us. So we now have some practical proverbs for daily living, showing that God's will for humanity is not a set of meaningless rules but a walk that brings a sense of fulfillment.

1–6 The first group of proverbs speaks of a serious view of life. The Teacher says that a good and well-deserved reputation is better than a mask of perfumed cosmetics. Preserve your good name until the day of your death and you achieve the potentiality of your birth inheritance (cf. v.8a).

If we are looking for signposts for living, we are more likely to gain insight when face-to-face with eternal things than in noisy company where the deeper realities of life are drowned in food, drink, and levity. Remembering that life on earth does not go on forever, we are moved to look below its surface. A sorrow shared may bring more inner happiness than an evening with back-slapping jokers.

Moreover, if we are in earnest about God's good plan (cf. 6:10–12), we must be ready for serious conversation with men and women who are experienced in life and be open to criticism from them. They may not answer all our problems, but their advice will be worth far more than popular songs devoid of serious moral content and the shallow humor of comedians.

7 The next proverbs are not so closely linked, though each relates to the question of how to live an acceptable life. If we hold an influential position, we must not use it for personal advantage. A reputation can be destroyed in a moment.

8–9 Patience is needed to see our resolutions and enterprises through to the end. How often we embark on something with pride in our ability to carry it through but abandon it because of a few discouragements! Then we may become angry and lash out at other people as an excuse for our own incompetence.

10–12 People have always looked back to the good old days. Even Christians sometimes overestimate the early church, the Reformation, or periods of revival. Wise people certainly learn from the past, but they live in the present with all its opportunities. Overmuch dwelling on the past can prevent us from overcoming the world, which often seems so much more wicked today than ever before. Many suppose that sudden wealth, which would relieve them of having to earn their living, would solve all problems. If money comes like this, one needs wisdom to use it properly. The security wisdom gives can be compared with the security associated with money; in fact, wisdom is a better guarantee of the good life.

13–14 God's name so far has not been mentioned in this section. The Teacher has set out advice that commends itself to any sensible person, even a humanist. But he is looking for the God-guided life that does not contradict the true wisdom of the ages but rather goes beyond it. The believer must look for the hand of the personal God.

The reference to God's "making crooked" (GK 6430) stresses his sovereign control over all events. There are some things that we cannot alter. As children of God, we commonly experience both good and bad and may even thank God for allowing hardships rather than giving us an entirely smooth passage (cf. Mt 8:20; Lk 10:38; 2Co 1:4–7). Part of the life of faith is accepting prosperity and adversity from God's hand without being able to explain just how everything will be worked out for the future (Ro 8:28).

6. Moderation Commended (7:15–22)

15 We have been told to live the good life. But if goodness is not rewarded in this life, why be good? The Teacher's life, like everyone else's, is lived in a world subject to frustration. It is all very well to talk of accepting prosperity and adversity (v.14); yet it is strange when righteous people die while they have still much to offer while villains survives to carry on their misdeeds.

16 This verse is not intended as an answer. In fact, its continuation at v.17 says that being a fool may bring on an early death, whereas the problem of v.15 is that a fool may live beyond his proper time. There may be unknown factors in the length of life of the good person and the bad, but there are some factors that are controllable. Being "overrighteous" is an obvious synonym for that type of Pharisaism that Christ warned against (Mt 5:20; 23:1–36). "Overwise" may be the subtle casuistry that such righteousness needs to support it (Mt 23:16–22), or it may be the substitute of a vast knowledge of facts for the knowledge needed for practical living (cf. 12:12).

17–19 We need not suppose that the Teacher means that we may be a little wicked so long as we do not plunge headlong into folly. We are not to model ourselves after either the prig or the villain. Neither can lead us to the full life. We need to take both pieces of advice to heart and to act on them. The way of victory is to keep God in the forefront of life. Wisdom is not the knowledge of accumulated facts but the inner strength that comes from a God-instructed conscience. There is a link between the fear of God and the true wisdom that gives inner strength (v.10; cf. Pr 9:10), which is here contrasted with mere power.

20–22 The good life has to be lived with the awareness that there is no such thing as sinless perfection. Righteousness is the settled way, though sins certainly occur and need to be repented of. The godly should be genuine and sincere. They should not listen to gossip, especially if they are hoping to hear themselves criticized or cursed especially by those who can observe them closely, such as their servants. The criticism may not be deserved, but again it may be.

7. Bad Relationships (7:23–29)

23–29 From a discussion of the good life, the Teacher passes to the intense depression he has felt when seeing men and women at their worst. Wise people admit that the problem of evil is insoluble, but practical evil is a horrible reality for which human beings can be held responsible. As in modern times, the Teacher faced the evil of unrestrained sex (cf. Pr 7). As an example of human folly, he warned against women of easy morals. Verse 28 is not about "upright" men and women but about "wise" men and women (NIV's "upright" is not in the MT). He found that an absolutely wise man is exceedingly rare, one in a thousand; but so far he had not found even this tiny percentage among women. One cannot blame God for this; so the fault lies in our misuse of our freedom.

Verse 26 may reflect Solomon's experiences with his hundreds of wives and concubines (1Ki 11:3–4). Though Solomon's desire to compete with other Oriental potentates may in large measure account for his building up a royal harem, he found that a harem did not provide the appropriate companion for a man. How much better he would have been with one good wife, such as he speaks of in 9:9 and Pr 31!

V. Life in View of Death (8:1–9:18)

1. The Inevitability of Death (8:1–14)

1 Chapter 7 concluded with a pessimistic view of human attainment of wisdom. Great teachers sometimes use exaggerated language to make their point (cf. Mt 19:24). Here the Teacher shakes himself out of his depression. There are truly wise people; and while true wisdom must be realistic, it need not make a person perpetually gloomy.

2–7 If you aim to please God, you are like a courtier who tries to please his king. Obey the king's commands, recognizing that you are pledged to serve him. If you displease him, you must accept the fact that there will be a rift between you. He is not accountable to you for what he does. When you know his will, you will be wise to do it at the right time and in the right way, even though you cannot see his full purpose.

8 The analogy of the king illustrates the concept of God's total plan. Like the king, God has the power of life and death; and, when the time comes for a person to die, he or she cannot insist on retaining the breath of life. Meanwhile, one must press on until the end. There is no escape from the battle by treacherously joining the enemies of the king.

9–13 Powerful oppressors who made a show of religious observances have had magnificent funerals and public orations in their honor. This has had its effect on society by creating an attitude of "If I can get away with it, I will do it." The only crime is in being found out. Servants of God know that they live in a fallen world, where bad people often escape punishment. Nevertheless, they look for the enduring approval of their Lord, for this is the purpose of living.

Up to the time when Ecclesiastes was written, God had revealed little about the future life. The superficial contradiction between v.12 and v.13 can best be resolved by the Teacher's realization that living a long time is not necessarily the same as prolonging one's days—a concept made meaningful by the revelation of eternal life in Christ. Such life is both qualitatively and quantitatively beyond any number of years on earth. The Teacher obviously believes in a future judgment (11:9). The day of the wicked, however long it lasts, will not be the normal day that closes with the lengthening of the evening shadows.

14 Yet the sense of frustration is not wholly removed so long as good and evil do not meet their just reward on earth. The Teacher does not hint again at the thought of the final assessment, because he intends to concentrate on life as it is meant to be lived now. The entire section should be compared with Mal 3:13–4:3.

2. Life to Be Enjoyed (8:15–9:10)

15 Once more the Teacher advocates the joy of life. As in 2:24–25, the gifts that God has given can be properly enjoyed only if they are accepted as God's gifts for use, not misuse. Both passages speak of the toil, or work, that God has given us to do to provide for our food and drink (cf. Ge 3:19; Ps 104:23). The verses say much the same as Jesus said in the Sermon on the Mount. Do not let your life be burdened with anxiety; relaxed enjoyment comes through seeking first the kingdom of God and taking food, drink, and clothing from the hands of your Father (Mt 6:25–34). So the Teacher refers to God-given work, God-given food and drink, and God-given joy. It is the realization of this that he commends.

16–17 The Teacher recognizes the tendency toward worry of people who want to know what lies ahead (cf. Mt 6:34). To some this worry is more acute than it is to others. The more capacity one has for thinking things out, the more one is puzzled by the apparent meaninglessness of life. So we must be content to take the pieces one by one, without being able to fit them into the plan that we know must be there (3:11).

9:1 The Teacher returns to the theme of the inevitability of death. The righteous and the wise try to act according to the plan of God, as far as they can determine it. But they have to accept both the good and the bad. Some things, of course, can and should be changed; others must be taken as they are and made stepping stones to higher things. The vital thing is to realize that there is a purpose beyond happiness and sorrow. In fact, you cannot use good and bad events as criteria to decide whether God loves you or hates you. Your future may be a mixture of the two. When trouble comes, it is easy to ask, "What have I done to deserve this?" It is less easy to ask the same question when happiness comes.

2–4 When people try to estimate the quantity of God's love by what happens to them, they have to face the final fact of death and its significance. Death is the final "reward" that God gives to good and bad persons alike. It almost seems as though God does not care whether people are good or bad. So why be good? If evil pays in this life, why should they not fling themselves into whatever they want to do? The end is only death, after all, and good people die just as others do. The contrast is between a person who is ready to speak the truth on oath and a guilty person who refuses to be put on oath. The Teacher will not accept this. He is leading up to the way we ought to live in view of the finality of death. Instead of living the rotten life of drifting self-indulgence, we should ask the further question, "What is the real purpose of life?" While there is life, there is hope—but hope for what? Surely, in the light of this book, there is hope for using life to the full. A dog that is alive can respond in a way that is impossible for the king of beasts when he is dead.

5–6 The contrast between the dead lion and the living dog supplies the meaning for v.5. The Teacher believes in a future judgment (12:14); so here he cannot be teaching the nonexistence of the departed. The context concerns the ability to plan and work. The living at least know that death must come, but from a human perspective the dead have not had it revealed to them what future there may be for them. The Teacher is not teaching soul-sleep here. Rather his emphasis is on the contrast between the carnal knowledge of the living and the dead.

To fully understand this passage, it is important to realize that our knowledge of the hereafter depends on how much God reveals to us. Attempts to discover the state of the departed through mediums is forbidden in Scripture (e.g., Isa 8:19–20). The OT speaks of the patriarchs being "gathered to [their] people" (Ge 25:8; 49:33). The significance of this expression is shown in Christ's answer to the Sadducees concerning God as the continuing God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob:

"He is not the God of the dead but of the living" (Mt 22:32). The spirits in Sheol can be roused to address the king of Babylon when he dies and joins them (Isa 14:9). Yet they clearly do not have the capacities that they once had on earth. There is, for example, nothing corresponding to the temple worship in which they can join in singing the praises of God (Ps 115:17). Occasionally God speaks of a future resurrection, but this is linked to the coming of the Messiah (e.g., Ps 16:9–11; cf. Isa 25:7–8; 26:19; Da 12:2–3; Ac 2:24–35).

So the dead at that time did not know what future they could expect. They had to wait for this until after the resurrection of Jesus Christ. They are soon forgotten on earth, and memorial inscriptions are obliterated with time. "For them love, hate, ambition, all are now over" (NEB), and they cannot return to this life to do or undo.

7–9 The Teacher is not afraid to speak of God as concerned with our present life. We should start with the assumption that our circumstances have come to us with God's approval. Let us make the most of life. Let each day be a festal day, such as when we put on our best clothes. Our hair must not be unkempt like that of mourners (cf. Ezr 9:3) but should be neat (cf. Ps 23:5; Am 6:6). God's approval is not inconsistent with life in a world of frustration. If God has given us the blessings of a wife and, presumably, a family, we are to find happiness in the precious gift of love. This is what Solomon himself failed to find (see 7:23–29).

Food, drink, clothing, and family union form a God-given basis for the good life; and governments today regard them as human rights. But the breadwinner is to be indeed the breadwinner and is to live the good life with an honest day's work. One knows the degrading feelings that come through continued unemployment and the dangers that surround the son who can become a playboy through his father's money (2:19). The Bible has a firm doctrine of work, summed up in 2Th 3:6–13.

10 Now comes the climax. Perhaps Jesus was paraphrasing v.10 in Jn 9:4. The Teacher is not saying anything sub-Christian here. The Bible knows nothing of a purgatory where one can pick up the things neglected in this life. The NT agrees that it is deeds done in the body that count (e.g., 2Co 5:10).

3. Uncertainty and Inequity (9:11–18)

11–12 It may seem strange that the Teacher can maintain faith in God's plan while accepting the factor of "chance" (GK 7004). His theme, however, is that we live in a world where we cannot calculate the future precisely but must share the day-by-day events that come to good and bad alike (cf. Mt 5:45). What we must look for is the plan of God for us today, whatever factors have brought us to this day and will affect us for the future. But the mere possession of speed, strength, wisdom, cleverness, and skill does not in itself guarantee success. We cannot bulldoze our way through life. These capacities must be used against a background of intelligent anticipation and a sense of uncertainty. All of us have to face life as it is; and we cannot foresee the future when it transcends what can reasonably be expected. There is certainly a proper time for each action (3:1–11), and we naturally try now to use our gifts in the light of what we think the future will bring. Yet we cannot foresee every threat or obstacle. We need not give up, but we must continue to ask, In what respect are we to accept God's plan and go forward from here?

13–15 The Teacher gives an interesting example, perhaps from his own experience. Time and chance struck a peaceful city when a powerful king came against it. Time and chance also ensured that the battle was not won by the strong (v.11) but by a poor man who happened to have a wiser plan than anyone else in the city. But then the poor man encountered something unexpected: the people just forgot him. It was all part of the vanity and frustration of a self-centered world. Moreover, it was undoubtedly humiliating for the people to admit that they had been saved by a nobody.

16 What are we to conclude from this illustration? Certainly not that in view of the changes and chances of life we are better off not to use our gifts. It was right for the poor man to come forward and use his wisdom to thwart the king; it would have been right for him to do so even if he had known that his fellow citizens would not ask his advice in the future.

17–18 The citizens were the real losers. The wise man's quiet words in their councils would have been worth more than the chairman's shouting for order in a meeting of people who had nothing to say but insisted on saying it. Yet, though the poor man's wisdom proved more effective than the king's armies, some loud-mouthed counselor was afterwards allowed to undo much of the good that had been gained.

VI. Proverbs (10:1–20)

1. Wise Relationships (10:1–7)

1 The Teacher has returned to the subject of wisdom being superior to folly, even when it fails to gain the recognition it deserves (9:13–18). Since few of us are wholly wise or wholly foolish, we must be careful that such wisdom as we have is not spoiled by apparently insignificant, unwise behavior, just as dead flies in a pot of ointment may turn it into a foul-smelling mass (cf. SS 2:15).

2–3 "Right" is a natural symbol for the strong and good, while "left" signifies the weak and bad. Thus the wise gravitate toward the good, the foolish toward the bad. Even when the foolish try to keep in the middle of the road, their encounters with normal people show them up for what they are. Again, this may be taken as metaphorical.

4 Sometimes our encounters are with authorities. If we clash with them, we should not walk out in a temper. Nor if we are at cross purposes with our supervisor should we resign at once. We should rather take an objective look at ourselves, and maybe we will find that we should apologize.

5–7 Unfortunately, those at the top are not always right. They too may lack wisdom and enjoy manipulating people and situations. They find jobs for their supporters and enjoy humiliating anyone of influence. There are also many little manipulators in the world of business who have undeservedly risen to the top.

2. Wise Planning (10:8–11)

8–11 Despite difficulties and risks, you cannot sit back to avoid facing them in daily life. If you dig a hole in your garden, remember it is there when you go out at night. If you have to pull down an old wall, watch out for snakes. Whenever you decide to do a certain piece of work, your task will be easier if you make proper preparations. Don't blame the class for not listening if you haven't sharpened your wits with proper preparation. Finally, you may find yourself having to undertake a really dangerous task involving life or death. Do not keep putting it off. There is nothing for the snake charmer to do once the victim is dead.

3. Wise Speech and Thought (10:12–20)

12–14 Our ignorance of what will happen in the future should not eliminate common sense. Sensible talk meets with approval in a stable society, but destructive talk degrades. Unfortunately, much of the mass media is dominated by those who pull down moral standards rather than build them up. Again, there are clever arguments that try to interpret the significance—or nonsignificance—of human existence, with concepts that can only be uncertain. The multiplication of arguments that ignore the revelation of God in Jesus Christ can end only in foolishness (1Co 1:18–25).

15 In the context "work" may relate to the many arguments of v.14 (cf. 12:12). In a fine note of sarcasm, this proverb says that a person may be so involved in arguing about the universe that he misses what the ordinary person is concerned about, namely, finding the way home (cf. Isa 35:8–10).

16 It is hard to decide what sort of a king is described here. The word translated "servant" (GK 5853) can also mean "child" (cf. NIV note); it certainly designates an inexperienced person. "Servant" suggests that the king is someone who has suddenly come to the top by others and who keeps his power by letting his deputies do what they want." Child" suggests that the real power is that of the deputies. Those under the influence of such leaders manifest a lack of self-control, shown by feasting at breakfast (cf. Isa 5:11; Ac 2:15); such actions set an example that lesser men and women soon follow.

17 The king here described is born to rule and has been trained for his task since his youth. His close associates have the self-control that gives their lives strength and not dissipation.

18–19 Lazy rulers bring down the great house of the nation, just as a lazy householder lets the beams of his house collapse so that the roof sags and lets in the rain. In v.19 the Teacher apparently returns to the thought of extravagant feasting (cf. v.16). Food and wine occupy the minds of lazy rulers, and they behave as though money can buy everything.

20 When all is said and done, the average citizen must respect authority. The Teacher does not distinguish between good and bad leaders; he has spoken of both, and probably his advice here includes both. Since this verse speaks of wishing someone ill in the privacy of one's own home, it is a warning that malice toward the powers that be may lead to ultimate confrontation with them. If there is something wrong in your town or in the place where you work, you must either keep totally silent or be prepared for your proper criticisms to come to the ears of those at the top.

VII. Wisdom for the Future and the Present (11:1–10)

1. The Uncertain Future and Present Behavior (11:1–6)

The Teacher is approaching the climax of his book. We must fulfill God's purpose by accepting our daily lot in life as from him and by pleasing him make each day a good day. This section gives further wise advice in the light of an uncertain future.

1–2 A common interpretation of this passage is that of charity. The Eastern flat bread is light enough to float, and what you give in charitable gifts will be washed back to you as a reward. But this idea of investment in charity does not belong to the Teacher's thought elsewhere. An alternative view links the meaning with vv.4, 6. "Nothing ventured, nothing gained," as a proverb says. Be like the merchant who uses his capital for trade, including trade across the seas. But be sensible, and do not gamble everything on one venture.

3–4 We are bound to recognize the God-given laws of nature, but we cannot always forecast how they will operate. We often have to act before we can foresee all we would like to know about the future. The farmer who waits until he is completely certain of perfect weather conditions will never reap anything.

5 Life begins in mystery with the baby's conception and prenatal growth and continues with the mystery of the working of God's total plan. Few parents understand precisely how a baby is formed, but most follow the rules of common sense for the welfare of the mother and the unborn child. This is exactly the whole theme of the book. We cannot understand all the ways God works to fulfill his plan, but we can follow God's rules for daily living and thus help bring God's purpose to birth.

6 Because the future is unknown, we must accept calculated risks and believe that though some of our ventures may fail, a sufficient number of them will succeed. The Teacher has been drawing his illustrations from trade and agriculture. They are intended to be practical. One thinks of making an unwise investment in a single project that promises large profits or of the restlessness that risks the family's welfare by moving to some distant field that looks greener.

2. The Certain Future and Present Behavior (11:7–10)

The Teacher has discussed how we should act in view of the uncertainties of life. Now he speaks of the certainty of growing up and growing old.

7–8 First there is the happiness of life when vitality is high, when all things seem possible and the sun shines all the time (cf. 12:2). Yet one must face the inevitable restrictions (ch. 12) that old age brings just as one sees the sun going down toward evening and eventually setting. Life is lived in a world of vanity, and part of the vanity is the process of aging. On the day Adam and Eve disobeyed God, their bodies began to die (Ge 2:17; 3:19).

9 So youth have vitality at its fullest; and if they cannot feel the sense of fulfillment in it, something is wrong. To older people it may seem risky to advise a young person to walk in the ways of one's heart and the sight of one's eyes. Yet the advice is coupled with a reminder of responsibility before God, who is the Supreme Assessor. Taken by themselves, the words could present a picture of God as a grim, condemning judge, but this would be out of keeping with what the Teacher says elsewhere of God's approval of our enjoyment (e.g., 9:7).

10 Obviously, young people face strong temptations, and anxiety and frustration are as much a part of adolescence as vitality is. So youth must say no as well as yes and must discard whatever damages mind or body (cf. Col 3:8–14). The context and the general purport of the book suggest that the Teacher is referring to indulgences that bring guilt to the mind and damage to the body; he is not advocating hedonism here.

VIII. The Frustration of Old Age (12:1–8)

Remembering one's Creator in the time of one's youth, the theme at the end of the previous chapter, is especially important in view of the gradual loss of vitality as age takes its toll of the body and brain. Old age and death are the supreme frustration and meaninglessness that we experience.

1 The passage begins with a general, nonmetaphorical statement. Some today suffer from blindness, deafness, and other physical disabilities described in this chapter. However, as we grow older, we all have some traces of these marks of age, even if they do not develop to the extremes that this chapter describes. So the Teacher is justified in reminding young people that they cannot afford to put off faith in God their Creator until they are older. God wants the best of their lives.

2 The rhythm of life is like the rhythm of the year. Spring and summer give place to the clouds of autumn and winter. The showers that so quickly come and go in youth are succeeded by rain and clouds and then more rain. It becomes progressively harder to throw off troubles and anxieties.

3 The arms and hands that minister to the body begin to tremble, and the legs that once carried the body so strongly weaken and sag at the knee. The loss of teeth makes it hard to grind solid food, and the eyes are dimmed.

4 The organs of hearing gradually close, marooning the owner within the cramped house of the human body. The next picture is difficult to interpret; but, since the grinders must be the teeth (cf. v.3), "grinding" here is likely the voice that comes out softly and often indistinguishably through the toothless gums.

The next phrase is also variously rendered. "Men rise up at the sound of birds" possibly means that in spite of deafness the old person sleeps badly and wakes at the first bird call. An alternative is "he shall rise up to the voice of a bird"; i.e., the voice rises in pitch and grows thin like the twitter of a bird.

The final clause also refers to sounds. It may be a straightforward statement that singing women no longer move him, since their voices do not come to him with any clarity. Or just as he wakes early at the first song of the birds, so he dozes off in the evening as the voices of the singers fade in his ears. But if the whole verse is symbolic, the meaning could be that while the old man's voice is squeaky in conversation, when he tries to sing he can make only a dreary, low, moaning noise.

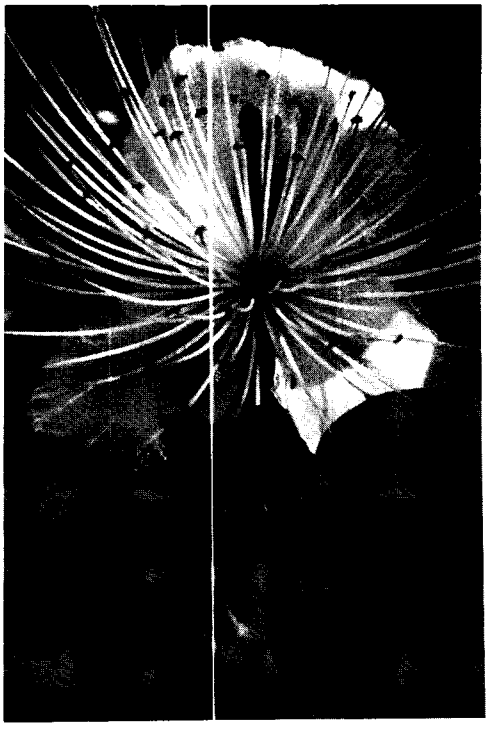
5 This verse mentions two concrete experiences that frighten old people: the fear of heights and of the traffic in the streets. The latter is specially applicable today; but the narrow streets of an Eastern town, with camels, donkeys, and bustling traders, were doubtless almost as terrifying to a slow-moving pedestrian.

The almond tree pictures the white hair of age. In Palestine, the tree begins to blossom in midwinter; and although the petals are pink at their base, they are white towards the tip. The general impression of the tree in flower is of a white mass. But the old man has no spring to follow so as to enjoy the fruit.

Now the lively, leaping grasshopper can only drag itself along, as happens when the days grow cold, an obvious picture of old age. "Desire" (GK 37) is literally the "caperberry" plant, which apparently was used as a sexual stimulant. One would expect some reference to declining sexual potency in these descriptions.

The Teacher has exhausted his description of the failing faculties, omitting little. It only remains to speak of the inevitable grave, inaugurated with the wailing of the professional mourners.

6 The young person must remember his Creator before the end draws near. The pictures in this verse describe total collapse. The silver chain from which the lamp hangs is snapped. The golden lamp bowl is crushed. The clay pitcher is broken to pieces so that no water



This is the caperberry flower along with several buds (see comment on 12:5). These buds were pickled and then eaten. It was thought that doing so would increase one's sexual desire and power.

can be brought from the well. The wooden wheel that lowers the bucket into the well has itself been broken Another interpretation links the pictures here with parts of the body. The silver cord could be the spine, the golden bowl the head, the pitcher the heart, and the wheel the organs of digestion.

7 Whatever the interpretation of the details, the fixed fact is death. The body returns to its component parts (cf. Ge 2:7; 3:19). The OT consistently teaches that at death the life principle in humans and animals alike (3:19–21; Ps 104:29–30) returns to God, the Giver of life, to whom we must give account (11:9).

8 So having warned youth to make the most of life while they have the faculties to enjoy it, remembering that they must give account to God for the use of God's gifts, the Teacher reminds them that these gifts and life itself are fleeting. At the moment their faculties are flexible, but as old age sets in, they will harden and decay. One day all will cease in death, the supreme frustration and apparent meaningless end to life.

IX. Epilogue (12:9–14)

1. The Credibility of the Author (12:9–12)

Although it is usual to treat these words as the comment of a disciple, they could be by the Teacher himself, even by Solomon, who, in spite of personal failings, must have retained the gift of wisdom, which he had asked for and obtained (2:9; cf. 1Ki 3:9–12; 4:29–34). The claim here is no more boastful than are the words of the prophets who claim to be speaking the words of the Lord. So, whether written by the Teacher or by a disciple, these verses show that the book is not to be read as the chronicles of skepticism or advocating hedonism.

9–10 The Teacher taught others with full regard for his responsibility as one in a position of authority. He took great care in sifting wise sayings (cf. Lk 1:1–4). He did not confuse truth with dullness. On the other hand, he did not let his brilliance run away with him so as to cause him to write less than the truth—the danger of all popular speakers and writers.

11 Verse 11 claims God's inspiration for the Wisdom writers and hence is very important. It is their equivalent of "This is what the LORD says." The wise draw their wisdom from the Shepherd of Israel, the one true God (Ge 49:24; Pss 23:1; 80:1). Their wise teachings are to goad their readers to action and are to be seen as wholly dependable and worthy to be collected as Scripture.

12 Next comes a warning against the vast amount of literature that is a waste of time for the reader who is really concerned to find the truth. If we take the first sentence of v.12 as warning the disciple against going beyond the inspired words of the wise, this incorporates the theme of the book. In this world there will always be mystery, and human beings can fall into all sorts of error if they try to prove what cannot be proved (e.g., 3:11, 14; 7:14). There will always be books pouring off the presses. Students who have to study them for examinations, and those mature Christians who need to understand modern trends, know how wearisome they can be—and yet at times how attractive. This verse is certainly not intended to discourage Christian writers if they can write constructively and expound in modern terms those truths of life that are there in the Scriptures. Nor should we forget the great Christian classics that expounded the same truths.

2. The Conclusion of the Matter (12:13–14)

13–14 A good author usually summarizes the main points of his book when he comes to the end. The summary here is especially important.

Obviously, the Teacher is sometimes skeptical; but God is real to him, and he believes that God has revealed his will to humankind. If God had not done so, we could not be held accountable for our actions. Thus, although we may like to know more of the total plan of God, we know enough to be held responsible for what we do or fail to do. Our lives day by day must be lived as in the sight of God, who has given us the opportunity to fulfill his purpose for that day. Our actions, as well as the secret intentions of our hearts, are open to God, and one day they will be rewarded or punished (cf. 3:17; 11:9b).

Song of Songs

INTRODUCTION

The introduction to Song of Songs is perhaps more important than that of any other book in the Bible because of the problem that the church has had in interpreting its meaning. Song of Songs is patently a collection of ancient Hebrew love poems celebrating the experiences of a lover and his beloved as they taste the beauty, power, agony, and joys of human sexual love. Is that appropriate, however, for a book that is part of the Scriptures?

1. Background

Why is the Song of Songs included in the Scriptures? Its few references to a historically identifiable person (Solomon) and to known places (Jerusalem, En Gedi, Tirzah) show its Jewish provenance. But the usual marks of biblical literature—religious themes, institutions, and practices—are absent. There are no references to law, grace, sin, salvation, or prayer. In fact, there is not a single, indisputable reference to the Lord God in the text.

Yet Song of Songs has held a significant place in the affections of the synagogue and the church. In Israel the book came to be associated with the greatest Hebrew festival, being read on the eighth day of Passover. During the first fifteen centuries of the Christian church, most major Christian writers turned their attentions to this little work. Neither Jews nor Christians have been able to ignore it.

2. Interpretation

Since the Song of Songs is in the sacred canon, how is it to be interpreted? No book in Scripture has had such varied treatment. One medieval Jewish commentator said that it is like a lock for which the key has been lost.

a. Allegorical

The oldest documented interpretation of the Song of Songs sees it as an allegory. An allegory is an extended metaphor and normally is not rooted in history or the real world but is drawn from the mind and imagination of the author. Its purpose is not to present real events related to identifiable places and persons, but rather to communicate spiritual truth of an abstract nature. Allegory is an old device in which there is a divorce between the obvious literal meaning and the "high" spiritual message. As an allegory, the Jews saw this book as a depiction of the relationship of the Lord to his chosen people, Israel. Many Christians have seen the Song primarily as a statement of the love relationship between Christ and the church, his bride.

There are problems, however, in accepting the Song of Songs as an allegory. First, nothing in the text indicates that the intention of the author was to allegorize. Second, the people, places, and experiences recorded seem to be real, not literary devices. Third, this little book does not have the narrative character—the clear progressive story-line—that we usually expect in allegory. The result of the use of the allegorical approach is that the Song of Songs has become to an unusual degree a field for fertile imaginations.

b. Natural

Occasionally through history someone has become unhappy with the allegorical treatment and has raised a voice for a more natural approach to the plain sense of the text. Until the modern era a price was usually exacted for such bravery. In the first century apparently some Jewish readers understood the Song of Songs literally. Some were even singing portions of it in their drinking houses. This evoked the wrath of Rabbi Aqiba who pronounced an anathema on such practices.

In the eighteenth century, an Anglican bishop suggested that the book actually tells us about the marriage feast of Solomon. The bride may well have been the daughter of Pharaoh. He accepted the Song as historical but was willing to see something typological here. Solomon, the king of Israel, took a Gentile bride and made her a part of the people of God. In this way he foreshadows that other King, the Prince of Peace, who would take from among the Gentiles a bride, the church. This approach helped prepare the way for the almost universal rejection of the allegorical approach in favor of the stance most commonly taken among biblical expositors in our own time (see next section).

3. Purpose and Message

Why is this seemingly erotic little book included in the sacred canon? The Bible does not see marriage as an inferior state, a concession to human weakness. Nor does it see the normal physical love within that relationship as impure. Marriage was instituted before the Fall by God with the command that the first couple become one flesh (Ge 2:24). Therefore physical love within that conjugal union is good, is God's will, and should be a delight to both partners (Pr 5:15–19; 1Co 7:3).

The prospect of children is not necessary to justify sexual love in marriage. Significantly, the Song of Songs makes no reference to procreation. It must be remembered that the book was written in a world where a high premium was placed on offspring and a woman's worth was often measured in terms of the number of her children. Sex was often seen with reference to procreation; yet there is no trace of that here. The Song is a song in praise of love for love's sake and for love's sake alone. This relationship needs no justification beyond itself.

Song of Songs, however, is more than a declaration that human sexual love in itself is good. The use of the marriage metaphor to describe the relationship of God to his people is almost universal in Scripture. From the time that God chose Israel to be his own, the covenant was pictured in terms of a marriage. Idolatry was equated with adultery (Ex 34:10–17). The Lord is a jealous God. Monogamous marriage is the norm for depicting the covenant relationship throughout Scripture, climaxing with the Marriage Supper of the Lamb.

4. Authorship

Traditionally authorship of the Song of Songs was attributed to Solomon, due in part to the title, the six other explicit references to Solomon (1:5; 3:7, 9, 11; 8:11, 12), and the three references to an unnamed king (1:4, 12; 7:5). The case for Solomon's authorship is not definitive, but the case against it is equally far from being sure. Fortunately, a knowledge of who wrote this little book is essential neither to its interpretation nor to an appreciation of its content. As a work of literature of singular beauty and power, it stands on its own feet. Like other works in the Bible, it is enough to know that it is part of our sacred canon.

EXPOSITION

I. The Title (1:1)

1 The title for this little book, "Solomon's Song of Songs," is taken from the literal translation of the first two words of the Hebrew text. It means "the greatest of all songs." A comparable expression is found in the term "the Holy of Holies" (cf. Ex 26:33; et al.). The NIV correctly translates this "the Most Holy Place." Similar superlatives are found in the expressions "King of kings" and "Lord of lords." This immediately reveals the significance the author attached to his subject.

II. Courtship (1:2–3:5)

A. A Maiden's Amorous Musings (1:2–4b)

2 The book begins with the girl expressing her deep desire for physical expressions of love by her lover. There is a fascinating shift of persons from the third person to second person in the first two verses. Such a change is not unusual in Hebrew poetry. It is as if the beloved begins with the wish in her own mind and then shifts unwittingly to speaking directly to him.

Significantly, the girl speaks first. She is not extremely diffident but seems to see herself as of equal stature with the male. She longs to express her love to him, and she wants him to reciprocate. There is a sense in which she is the major character in this poem. This is one of the aspects of this work that makes it unique in its day. Much more of the text comes from her mouth and mind than from his. It is more her love story than his, though there is no failure on his part to declare his love and admiration for her.

3 We are quickly introduced to the association of love with the most pleasant tastes and smells. Love is so delightful that it should be accompanied with all that is pleasant, like perfumes. The lover's name is like "perfume poured out." "Name" (GK 9005) speaks of her lover as a well-known person. The maidens love him. Our lover is obviously the object of wide-scale affection.

4a The beloved longs for her lover to take her away with him, and speedily. Her emotion is intense, and she longs to be able to act on it.

4b The second part of v.4 can be significant to the story-line in the Song. It may be a declared intention (as translated here, following the Hebrew) or an address: "Bring me into your chamber, O King." The reference to "the king" suggests that we are really dealing here with a royal romance.

B. The Friends' Praise (1:4c)

4c The third part of v.4 confronts us with an annoying change of persons. Who are the "we" here? The women of Jerusalem? The girl? Two things are clear: the love of these two merits praise, and the lover merits the popular affection in which he is held. Most likely the speakers here are the daughters of Jerusalem, i.e., the friends of the maiden.

C. The Maiden's Self-Consciousness (1:4d–7)

4d The NIV is helpful here in including the last line of v.4 with this segment. Our maiden turns her attention to his public again: "How right they are to adore you!" The consciousness of these "daughters of Jerusalem" (v.5) and their affection for the maiden's lover makes her apprehensive. Her question is not about his attractiveness. It is about hers.

5–6 The maiden is self-conscious about her darkness. Kedar was a territory southeast of Damascus where the Bedouin roamed. Their tents were made of the skins of black goats. She explains that her color is due to her exposure to the sun as she worked the vineyards for her brothers. She obviously is from a family where the girls had to work. Mention is made in the text of her brothers, a sister (see on 8:8–10), and her mother. She was compelled to care for her brothers' concerns whether she cared for her own or not.

We notice a confidence in her about her own loveliness. There is an appealing modesty in our heroine; yet she is not overly diffident. Several times the separate emphatic first personal pronoun "I" is used (1:5–6; 2:1, 5; 5:2, 5–6, 8; 6:3; 7:10; 8:10). In every case it is the girl who is speaking. She is very much the appropriate match for the lover pictured here. The fullness with which the text presents her and the strength that she portrays make this little book most remarkable for its age and place in human history. The two lovers meet as equals.

7 The maiden next turns her attention to her lover and addresses him. The phrase "whom I love" is literally "whom my soul loves." "Soul" (GK 5883) can be used as an equivalent for the personal pronoun "I [love]." This word always carries with it a deep sense of personal emotional involvement.

The maiden wants to know where her lover grazes his flock so that she can be near him. Yet she does not want to unduly expose herself. She does not want to be like "a veiled woman" beside the flocks of his friends. That is, she does not want to be mistaken for a cult prostitute (cf. Ge 38:13–15). She is not looking for any lover. She has made a commitment to one, and she wants to know where she can find him.

D. The Friends' Admonition (1:8)

8 Next follows a response to the maiden: first, by the daughters of Jerusalem, to whom the maiden has spoken in the preceding segment (v.5); then by her lover (vv.9–11). Her uncertainty is met by the assurance that she is the "most beautiful" of all women (cf. 5:9; 6:1). The pronouns "you" and "your" are feminine singular; so we know there has been a shift in speaker, for the maiden would hardly be speaking to herself.

E. The Lover's Praise (1:9–11)

9–11 In v.9 we confront for the first time the Hebrew word rayah (GK 8299), translated by the NIV as "darling," the NEB as "dearest," and the NRSV as "love." This word occurs nine times in the Song, used each time by the lover of his beloved. The root idea in the word is associate, companion, or friend. It develops a strong connotation of commitment and delight.

Modern Western readers understand "most beautiful" and "darling." The next figure, though, is unexpected to us. The lover likens his loved one to a mare harnessed to one of Pharaoh's chariots. We have forgotten how beautiful horses can be when compared to other animals. We are also unaware what valuable creatures they were in that ancient world. The ancient royal courts insisted on brilliantly caparisoning the horses that pulled the king's chariot. The beloved's jewelry, earrings, and necklaces make him think of such.

After the middle of the second millennium B.C., mares were never used to draw chariots. Pairs of stallions were used for the royal vehicles. The presence of a mare among such stallions could be the ultimate distraction. So our lover pays his beloved the ultimate compliment to her sexual attractiveness. That he relishes this thought is clear. He will provide her with the jewelry of silver and gold to match her natural charms.

F. The Fragrances of Love (1:12–14)

12 The maiden now muses in response to her lover's affection and praise. The context up to now has been pastoral: flocks, herds, shepherds, and vineyards. Now it is of a table, expensive and exotic perfumes, spices from faraway places, and a king. The context is royal. This may be confusing to us because we do not usually associate shepherds and kings. But the Hebrew term for the rulers is "shepherds."

The maiden ponders the impact of the presence or the memory of the one lover on the other and describes it in aromatic terms. She is like nard ("perfume"; GK 5948) to him. It is as if his table is surrounded by the most delightful fragrance—herself. Nard, an ointment derived from a plant that grew in northern and eastern India, was used as a love charm in the ancient Near East (cf. Lk 7:36–50). Her presence as a reality in his life surrounded him like a choice perfume.

13–14 The beloved's impact on her lover was no greater than his on her. The consciousness of him brought sensations as real and as delightful as the smell of myrrh and henna blossoms. Myrrh, a resinous gum, came from trees in Arabia, Abyssinia, and India. It was highly prized in international trade and was used for incense (Ex 30:23), for perfuming garments of special people, for special occasions (Ps 45:8), for lover's beds (Pr 7:17), for preparing girls for visits with Oriental kings (Est 2:12), and for embalming corpses (Jn 19:39). Henna was a Palestinian shrub, whose leaves were used to produce a bright orange-red cosmetic dye. It has been used in the Near East to color the hair, hands, and feet. Its blossoms were fragrant, and it is the smell of the blossoms the maiden refers to here.

The maiden's consciousness of her lover sweetens her life the way the aroma of a sachet of perfume placed between the breasts makes a girl move in a cloud of fragrance. The thought or sight of him is as pleasant as the aroma wafted from a field of henna blossoms. Love has its own hallowing touch on all of life.

In this section the maiden's pet name for her lover—dodi ("my lover"; GK 1856)—appears for the first time. Apparently this word best expressed her joy in him. She uses it twenty-seven times as she speaks to him or about him. Five times it is used by the women of Jerusalem as they speak of him. Four additional occurrences are in the plural (1:2, 4; 4:10; 7:12). In each case it seems best to translate the plural form as "love making."

G. Love's Exchanges (1:15–2:2)

1:15–2:2 Now the dialogue between the lovers quickens. Three times he speaks, and twice she responds. They are becoming more direct in their expressions of love. A common language is developing to show the mutuality of their love. He calls her "beautiful" (GK 3637); she responds with the masculine form of the same word: "handsome."

The lover compares his beloved's eyes to doves. She speaks of his manner as charming and delightful. These lovers live in a different milieu from ours. It is pastoral; so their metaphors are drawn from nature. Notice the extensive references to animals, birds, trees, flowers, and mountains. The site of their love making is among the cedars and firs, in all of their greenery. It hints of a return to Eden (Ge 2:18–25), with its simplicity, naivété, equality, and purity. It is as if this were the original couple.

H. Faint With Love (2:3–7)

3–7 The maiden now responds with a longer speech. Her senses are being stirred by his presence and the affirmations of his love. She finds herself feasting on it all. It is as if he is a tree that provides relief from the sun and delicious fruit for her hunger. Her satisfaction lies in him. And yet his nearness and his offering of love only intensify her desire. She is faint from it all. Her solution is not the removal of the desire that torments her. It is more food—raisins and apples—that will intensify that desire. She began with a desire for his kisses. Now she longs for his embrace. The beloved is being carried away by her passions. She relishes the joy. Yet she knows that love should have its own rhythm and its proper progression. Too fast too soon would spoil it all. So she adjures the women of Jerusalem not to encourage love beyond its right and proper pace. With the attention turned to the world beyond the two of them, the spell is for the moment broken and the first section (1:2–2:7) ends.

I. Love's Rhythm (2:8–3:5)

1. A lover's call (2:8–17)

8–17 We have seen thus far the beginnings of a free expression of love between a maiden and a man. The courtship has begun, and the desire for each other has been intense. She is weak with passion. At that point the protagonist, the maiden, appealed to the daughters of Jerusalem in her concern that the emotions of her and her lover not take them beyond the proper pace of pure love. So we now see them separated but longing for each other. Two poems (2:8–17; 3:1–5) make up this section. Again we find at the close of this division a plea for restraint.

This section is a good example of how tantalizing the Song can be for the interpreter. The maiden seems clearly to be in her own home in the city. She hears her lover's voice as he comes to visit her. He is like a gazelle or a young stag in his energy and in his passionate desire to be with her. He stands outside and calls her to go into the country with him to enjoy the beauty of spring as nature erupts with the passing of winter.

But is it an actual visit by her lover? Or is this a poetic projection of the maiden's own consuming desires for his presence? Regardless of how we interpret it, there is no way we can miss the trauma of true love with its ecstasy of longing and fear. The thought of his coming delights her. Her distance, like a dove in the clefts of the rocks, distresses him. He wants to see her form and hear her voice; for her voice is sweet, and her appearance is comely. Yet caution is called for.

Verse 15 raises questions over who is speaking and to whom. It seems that here we find a characteristic common to the moments of passion in these early chapters. Just as the two lovers are about to surrender themselves to each other and forget the world, attention is turned to the larger world; so the addresses to "the daughters of Jerusalem" throughout the Song. The appeal is made here to outsiders to prevent "the foxes," those forces that could destroy the purity of their love, from defiling their vineyards, which are blossoming. In 1:6 the maiden uses "vineyard" as a metaphor for her own person. So they plead for protection for the love that blossoms between them that nothing will spoil it.

The lovers may accept restraint on the pace of love's development, but there is no denying that they belong to each other. Here we are tantalized by the questions of whether we are to understand the text literally or figuratively. There seems clearly to be a double entendre character that pulls a cloak over the details of the lovers' love making—a metaphor in the service of the mystery and sanctity of sex! In 5:13 his lips are called "lilies." Thus it seems that she may be ready for him to graze on her lips as sheep "browse" in lush grasses. Here it certainly seems fair to look for more than one level of meaning. Perhaps this is to be related to the opening wish of our young lady (1:2).

2. A lover's seeking (3:1–5)

1–5 Our next poetic unit seems clearly to be a dream sequence. The lover is the maiden's obsession night and day. So in a dream she seeks him. She goes about the city in the night asking those whom she meets about her beloved. She finds him and will not let him go until she has brought him into her mother's home, into the very room where she was conceived. She is not looking for illicit consummation of their love. Consummation she wants, but even in her dream she wants that consummation to be right.

It may be that the reference to the maiden's bringing her lover to her mother's home reflects Ge 2:24, where the husband is to leave father and mother, but no like command is given to the woman. This passage may also reflect ancient Israelite marital customs now unknown to us (cf. Ge 24:67).

III. The Bridal Procession (3:6–11)

6–11 This unit is one of the most intriguing of all the Song. It obviously is a wedding procession. The first problem has to do with who rides in the procession. The Hebrew suggests that it is the bride. There are indications that our hero comes from northern Israel, from Lebanon (cf. 4:8); the other geographical references support this. So our picture is of the groom and his men bringing his bride from her home to his city for the wedding.

The wedding "carriage" is identified as belonging to Solomon. In fact, it appears that he oversaw its building. His name has occurred only once before (1:5). It occurs three times in this brief section. It will not reappear until 8:11–12.

For the fourth time the daughters of Jerusalem are addressed. This time they are called "daughters of Zion," an expression occurring only here in the Song (cf. Isa 3:16–17; 4:4). The singular "daughter of Zion" is used twenty-three times in the OT. It normally refers to Israel as a nation. This is the passage that most definitively attaches the Song to Israel. In fact, this is the only passage where the name "Israel" occurs.

In v.11 we are told that Solomon wears "the crown" with which his mother crowned him for his wedding day. This obviously is not a reference to his coronation, since the high priest presided at that (cf. 1Ki 1:32–48; 2Ki 11:11–20). This may suggest that, if the Song did come from Solomon, it originated before his crowning in his most innocent period.

IV. The Wedding (4:1–5:1)

A. The Beauty and the Purity of the Bride (4:1–15)

1–7 The bride has now come to the groom. The time for consummation has arrived. The bride in biblical fashion is veiled (cf. Ge 24:65; 29:23–25; 38:14), but her lover is now free to enjoy her physical charms. The result is an erotic physical inventory of the details of her beauty. The description of her is given in metaphors that may seem alien to moderns. But even then the power of this bit of love poetry is moving. Her sense of modesty is protected. His freedom is uninhibited. She is his, and what he sees is perfection. To him there is no flaw in her.

Eyes luminous as doves, hair glossy black, perfectly matched white teeth with none missing, lips scarlet, and cheeks touched with color like a sliced pomegranate make her an object of beauty that brings ecstasy touched with mystery. All this was veiled, but now it is his.

A long neck, which made her stately in appearance, like a prominent nose, seems to have been a mark of beauty in this ancient world. As was the custom, her neck was ornamented with layers of jewelry. Often these contained row upon row of beads or platelets like shields covering a tower. Her breasts had the grace and beauty that evoked tenderness like that produced by two fawns at play.

The lover's metaphors permit a chasteness and a modesty that less poetic speech would preclude. So when he says that he will go to his mountain of myrrh and to his hill of incense, he is most probably referring to the breasts he has just described and the body that awaits him. The night gives covering for their love.

8–15 The beloved has come to her lover. Her beauty is overwhelming. She has captured his heart. He wants her to be his forever. The invitation "come with me" is literally in Hebrew "with me," twice repeated. His desire is to have her with him.

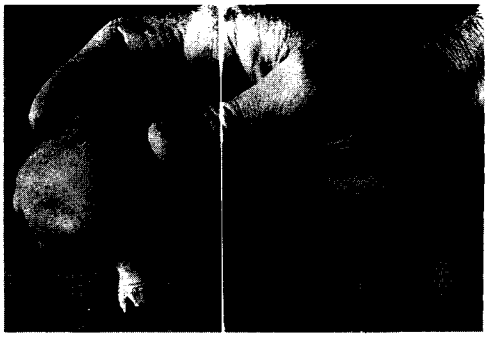
For the first time the lover calls the maiden his "bride" (GK 3987). In ten verses (4:8–5:1) he uses this term of her six times. The focus of the word is on the married status of the woman, particularly on the sexual element presupposed in that status. The lover also calls his beloved his "sister" four times (vv.9–10, 12; 5:1). This is not uncommon in ancient Near Eastern love poetry as a love epithet.

The geographical references here are significant. They all speak of places in northern Israel. The indications are that the bride was originally from that area. Senir is the Amorite name of the Hebrew Hermon, the tallest peak (over 9,200 ft.) in the anti-Lebanon range.

B. Love's Consummation (4:16–5:1)

1. Invitation (4:16)

16 The maiden now responds to her lover's praise and his cry for her to cast her lot with him. The language is figurative; she picks up the metaphor that he has used of the locked garden (4:12). She invites her lover to enter her garden, make it his own, and enjoy its fruits. She calls for the north wind and the south wind to make her fragrances the more enticing.



This pomegranate-shaped bottle at one time contained perfume. Fragrance is a common theme in Song of Songs (e.g., 1:1; 4:10–11).

2. Response (5:1a–d)

1a–d The language used here of love's consummation is classic in its chasteness, a character possible only through use of symbolic language. The beauty of expression fits the holiest of all human relationships. Metaphor plays the same role here as the veil in the temple. Sinful people needs such to protect the mystery.

3. Joy (5:1e–f)

1e–f This brief unit is a problem to most commentators. Who is speaking? And to whom? The NIV takes these words to be those of onlookers or guests encouraging the couple to enjoy their love. The kind of relationship that our two lovers now have is more than a private affair. What one does with one's sexuality is from a biblical perspective always more than a private, personal thing. It has widespread social implications. Biblically, when a lover gives himself to his beloved as these two have done, the relationship of each has charged to all the rest of the human race. That is why traditionally in our culture a wedding cannot be performed without witnesses who represent broader society. The woman now belongs to the man and the man to the woman. This changes all other personal relationships. Furthermore, what one does with one's sexuality is of concern to God (Ex 20:14).

The public aspect of marriage helps explain the presence of "the daughters of Jerusalem" (2:7; 3:5; 5:8, 16; 8:4). It also explains the role of the "friends" as seen in the NIV (1:4b, 8; 5:1c, 9; 6:1, 10, 13; 8:5, 8–9). Self-giving love between the sexes is of social significance. Society must know. How else can marriage be a witness and testimony to the relationship of Christ and the church? One Savior, one spouse! Again, one almost feels that the Song is a commentary on Ge 2:18–25 (see on 1:15–2:2).

This little unit bears witness also to the appropriateness of the festive character of weddings. Such joy demands that others rejoice.

V. The Life of Love (5:2–8:7)

A. Its Hesitancies (5:2–8)

2–8 The ecstasy of the preceding section is replaced by deep apprehension. What has been won seems now to be lost. This section most probably is to be taken like 3:1–5, as a dream sequence. Love brings its joys, but those joys are seldom unalloyed for long. We are such flawed and fragile creatures, and interpersonal relationships contain such subtleties. With our joys come fears. Often they surface in our dreams, arising from some sense of failure or fear of inadequacy.

So our maiden dreams that her lover comes for her. He comes knocking and calling. It is inconvenient for her to respond. She has already undressed, washed her feet, and is now in bed. She is slow to acknowledge his overture. Her hesitancy reflects a paralysis that we often experience both in dreams and in real life. Then the opportunity is gone. She finally rises to open to him, but he has departed. Love's chance is lost.

This is a remarkable picture of the kind of adjustments that are necessary in lifestyle in marriage. Our natural sloth, the differences between a man and a woman, our uncertainty about the other's thinking, the variations in our life rhythms, our unwillingness to alter our preferred patterns for the other, our own self-consciousness—all contribute to the problem of reading each other's advances. The lover misunderstands and departs. She is sick now with longing for him.

The bride's remorse and her love drive her out into the darkened city to seek her groom. The watchmen find her just as they did in 3:1–5. This time they are hostile. They beat, wound, and shame her. Does this treatment reflect the girl's guilt and sense of failure at the slowness of her response to her husband? There is a realism in the Song that merits our respect. The course of true love seldom runs smoothly for long. For every moment of ecstasy, there seems to be the moment of hurt and pain. The openness that lovers experience with each other makes possible both extremes. Not even love can guarantee perfect performance in personal relationships. Time and humility help. Our poet is dealing with such in this passage.

The bride's consciousness of loss and perhaps her feeling of blameworthiness drive her to call for her friends, the daughters of Jerusalem, to help. She urges them that if they find her lover, they are to let him know of her love for him.

B. The Friends' Concern (5:9)

9 The request of our hurting bride to the daughters of Jerusalem evokes a query. They want to know what is so remarkable about her lover, how he differs from other grooms.

Our questions here are numerous. Does this report an actual conversation, or is this part of the dream? The probability of such a midnight conversation seems unlikely enough. Or are we dealing with a master poet who uses this literary device to give the maiden a chance to recount the attractions and charms of the groom?

C. Love's Affirmations (5:10–6:10)

1. The beloved's praise (5:10–16)

10–16 This is one of the few poems that has come down to us from the ancient world in which the female gives an inventory of the male's features. Obviously it is her response to his description of her in 4:1–7. Her description witnesses to the uniqueness of this little book in its world in that it illustrates in its own way the equality of position and freedom that she enjoys. It is really her book (cf. Ge 2:18–25).

The bride sings. She sings of the handsomeness of her lover. Beginning with his complexion, ruddy and golden, and his hair, black and wavy, she descends from his eyes to his cheeks to his lips to his arms to his torso to his legs. The import is clear: he is one in ten thousand. She returns then to his mouth, which she finds to be a source of "sweetness" (cf. 1:2). In 2:3 she spoke of his fruit as sweet to her palate. He has spoken of her lips as dropping sweetness and honey. So she counters with the delights of his kisses (cf. Pr 5:3). His conclusion about her was that she was beauty without flaw (4:7) and sweetness itself. She counters with the fact that he is altogether desirable.

All this is addressed to the daughters of Jerusalem. She is speaking of her lover, her "friend" (v.16). The word "friend" (GK 8276) is the masculine counterpart of his regular designation of her (cf. 1:9, 15; 2:2, 10; 4:1, 7; 5:2). Its root meaning is "to associate with," and it came to mean "friend" or "companion." The Song is unabashedly erotic. Yet it is never satisfied to be content with the physical alone. A normal person finds the erotic ultimately meaningful only if there are trust and commitment, delight in the other's person as well as in the body. The writer of the Song understands this. Our hero is her lover, but he is more: he is her friend.

2. The friends' inquiry (6:1)

1 Now the daughters of Jerusalem inquire of the bride as to where her lover is. They want to assist her in finding him.

3. The beloved's praise (6:2–3)

2–3 The bride's response to the friends' inquiry assures them that she has not really lost him. The anxiety in her dream was without foundation in reality. She is her lover's, but he is also hers. And he now is browsing in his garden of spices among the lilies. In 5:13 she has described his lips as lilies that drip with myrrh. The erotic implications in this language seem clear. Her fears were unwarranted. As he possesses her, she possesses him.

4. The lover's praise (6:4–10)

4–10 The lover speaks again in poetic ode about his beloved's beauty. She is like a great city to be taken. Tirzah was an ancient Canaanite center that served as the capital of the northern kingdom before Omri (c. 879 B.C.) established Samaria as the capital. This reference is a strong indication of an early date for the origin of the Song.

The reference to Jerusalem is the only time the name occurs except in the phrase "daughters of Jerusalem." It may seem strange at first for a lover to think of his bride as a great city. This figure is not unique, however, to the Song. The author of Revelation uses Babylon as a figure of a great prostitute and Jerusalem as the bride of Christ (Rev 18:2–19:3; 19:7–9; 21:1–2). Do we perhaps have in this metaphor an anticipation of the outcome of history for every believer?

The beloved is regal to the point of awesomeness. She appears like the dawn in its glory, fair as the moon, bright as the sun, terrible as an army with banners. She is more impressive than queens or royal concubines or virgins without number. The reference to queens, concubines, and virgins may well be a reference to the royal harem. She is without equal among women. Even the ladies of the royal harem acknowledge her superiority.

D. Love's Questions (6:11–13)

11–13 This is a tantalizing section. The words are familiar. The meaning is another matter. Does this represent a momentary separation of the maiden from her lover as she or he goes to investigate the flowering of springtime? Or are we to look for a deeper, more erotic meaning here?

If v.11 is difficult to interpret, v.12 is more so. Perhaps the best approach is to see a momentary separation that leaves the bride yearning again for her lover. So the daughters of Jerusalem call for her to return. Whoever is speaking calls the girl "the Shulammite." This verse with its two occurrences is the only place where this term is found in the OT.

In v.13 the bride responds to the guests who want to see her. She is modestly reluctant. She questions their desire. If she wonders why anyone would want to see her, she is to get an answer from her lover. The next unit is his description of her charms. It is a response to her description of him in 5:10–16.

E. Love's Repetitions (7:1–9a)

1–9a The groom's description of his bride begins with her sandals and feet and proceeds upward to the flowing locks of hair on her head. It should be compared with previous descriptions in 4:1–7; 5:10–16; and 6:4–10. This is the fullest detailing of her physical charms found in the Song.

Although the Song is really the bride's song, there are three occasions when the groom describes her beauty in detail and only one where she reciprocates. If the Song has any allegorical significance, it should indicate that God finds us much more delightful than we find him. If this seems strange, it should be remembered that his love is pure and eternal. His capacity for love and joy is greater than ours even though the object of our affection is greater and infinitely more worthy.

This poem reflects the perpetual charm of the female form to the male. This song has been sung an almost infinite number of times. There is repetition here. Some of his figures are the same as those used in 4:1–15 and 6:4–10. But that is the nature of love. Our language has its limits. Our love pushes those limits and falls back in frustration at the inability of our words to communicate our ecstasy.

Even the beloved's feet are beautiful. Her rounded thighs, like the work of some more-than-human artist, capture him. Her navel has its own allure. He would like to fill it with spiced wine and drink from it. Her belly is round and wheat colored. The reference to the lilies that encircle the stomach reminds us that we are dealing with figures whose very ambiguity enriches the eroticism of the passage. Her breasts are symmetrical objects of grace and beauty that evoke tender and solicitous response. Her neck gives her stature and impressiveness. Her eyes are like pools—luminous, clear, and deep. The nose adds to her stateliness. Her head and hair crown her. She is awesome and majestic as Mount Carmel. A king is held captive by her tresses. She is an object of beauty and loveliness, a treasure of delights.

In v.7 the groom sees his bride as a palm tree loaded with luscious fruits. He turns again to her breasts and lips to enjoy his possession. We should not miss the element of near-adoration in our lover's depiction of his beloved nor be unmindful of the high value placed on the flesh in Scripture. The body is not an unworthy shell to be shucked in death. It is destined for resurrection. It may be the occasion for sin, but it can also be the very clothing of Deity, as in the Incarnation. If the devotion of our two lovers is but an imaging of the relationship of the true Bridegroom and his bride, it is fitting that there should be an almost noumenal air in the poetry.

F. Love's Belonging and Giving (7:9b–13)

9b–13 Now the maiden responds. There is no holding back. She belongs to him. There is a primeval Edenic purity about all of this. Once again we are reminded of that first couple that God gave to each other and commanded to be one flesh. We cannot keep from thinking of that context when she speaks of "his desire" (GK 9592) for her. This word is found in Ge 3:16 in reference to Eve's desire for her husband. It is as if we are observing the Fall momentarily reversed. It obviously is a strong, almost overpowering, urge. His desire for her easily equals hers for him. She is at no disadvantage. She relishes the security of her relationship to her husband.

The bride's joy and fulfillment are such that she is ready to get out into the fields and vineyards to let the common nature that flows in lovers and the cosmos rejoice together. "Mandrakes" were prized for their aphrodisiac properties. The joys the two now are experiencing in each other are but the beginning of raptures that she is prepared to bring to him.

G. Love's Longing and Liberty (8:1–4)

1–2 The bride continues to speak about leaving the security of their bed chamber and going into the fields and villages with him. Yet she is reluctant to leave the freedom that they have behind closed doors to express their love for each other. The proprieties demanded in public seem limiting. She would like the liberty in public that the brother and sister in that day had. So she wishes she could freely kiss him in public. She would like to take him to the house of her own mother, to the very chamber where she was conceived, and there give herself to him.

There is no sense of wrongness about their love. She is reminded of her mother, who in a similar relationship gave to her the life that she now enjoys with her groom. Her joy in him strengthens her identification with her own mother who taught her. With all the strength of the union with her husband, there is still the consciousness that she is a woman. She longs for a woman with whom she can share, and the appropriate one is her mother. This is no indication of withdrawal from her spouse.

3–4 The bride yearns for her lover's embrace. Apparently that yearning once more evokes the bride's remark to the daughters of Jerusalem. Again we are reminded that we are social creatures inextricably bound up in a web of human relations. In this moment of deepest intimacy, when no prying eyes are wanted, she thinks of her mother and her friend. Her ecstasy she would share with her mother and her wisdom with the daughters of Jerusalem. Love has its ecstasy when it is right, but it also has its pain when it cannot freely express itself. It is the better part of wisdom, she informs her friends, not to permit love to be awakened until the time is right. Love like this should have no shadows or constraints.

H. Love's Seal and Strength (8:5–7)

5–7 The drama is now almost over. The couple have followed her desire and now return from the trip into the fields and the villages. The friends, daughters of Jerusalem, spot the couple and call attention to them as they return. The bride leans on her lover.

The bride pays no attention to the call of the friends. She speaks only to her lover. She has not taken him to her mother's home. He has apparently taken her to the site of his conception. There they have sealed more deeply their love. She speaks of the depth of that sealing. An engraved stone or metal seal was a mark of ownership in the ancient world. Possession of another's seal indicated mutual access and possession. Her love is so total and so strong that she wants their mutual possession of each other to be as lasting as life. It is a strongly poetic demand for "until death do us part." Better to die than to experience the failure of love that produces jealousy. Love's demands are all-consuming. External forces cannot quench or drown it. Its value is greater than all the possessions one might ever possess. In all of human literature there are few passages on the power of love compared with this unit.

VI. Conclusion (8:8–14)

8–10 There is no consensus on the division of these final verses, nor is there agreement as to who is speaking and who is being spoken about. It seems most plausible to see vv.8–10 as coming from our heroine. She has now consummated her relationship with her beloved. She has tasted the mysteries of sexual love with her spouse. She is looking back with joy that she came to those sacred moments as a virgin. She thinks of her younger sister and longs for her to know the same joys that she now experiences. So she expresses her concern for the protection of her sibling.

This interpretation takes the expressions "wall" and "door" as antithetical rather than parallel. It sees "towers of silver" and "panels of cedar" as protective rather than as primarily ornamental. She with her groom commit themselves to guard her sister from the loss of something precious. She affirms vigorously that she kept herself chaste for her husband. Thus by keeping herself a virgin, she was as one "bringing contentment."

11–12 Verses 11–12 are among the more tantalizing in the whole Song. Solomon is referred to again. This time, however, it seems clear that he is not the hero of the piece. The speaker, whether it is the bride or the groom, is contrasting his or her vineyard with that of Solomon's. Solomon's vineyard is large and fruitful, very impressive. It contains a thousand vines. Solomon must let it out to tenants to keep. They share in the produce. It is a very extensive operation.

Our hero or heroine is in a very different position. But he/she is not unhappy. His/her vineyard is his/hers alone. And that is enough to satisfy our spokesman. To possess one's beloved is enough. It is to be wealthy beyond measure.

Is this passage a reference to Solomon's harem with his 700 wives and 300 concubines? If so, the question then is as to the pay of the vineyard keepers. Or is the reference here to an actual vineyard? Because of previous references to a vineyard, which seems clearly to have a symbolical meaning, one is tempted to see this as a reference to the sexual personage of the maiden. Vineyard and garden seem clearly to be used to speak of herself in previous passages (see 1:6; 2:15; 4:12; 5:1).

There is always the possibility, though difficult for us, that the reference to Solomon's vineyard is to be taken literally while the reference to the spouse's vineyard is metaphorical (cf. Jn 2:19). That would be consistent with the double entendres of the book. However we interpret this text, it is clear that the lover's concern is not for material wealth.

13–14 The closing two verses come from our groom and his bride. She seems to be in a garden with her friends. He calls to her. He wants to hear her voice. She who began the Song wishing for the kisses of his mouth answers. That response is in language used previously (cf.2:9, 17). She urges him to make haste and resume the delights of love. The figures of the deer and the mountain of spices symbolize for us for the last time the lover and his beloved. Restraints are gone. He is hers and she is his. They are free to pursue those delights of love that image a love to come for every believer.

The bride's call to her groom to hasten may find an interesting echo in Rev 22:17. The heavenly call has always been that of the Divine Groom for a human bride. In the Song she invites him to come. In human history he invites her to come. Love, Divine Love, calls to love, and love responds.

"Amen. Come, Lord Jesus!"

Isaiah

INTRODUCTION

The prophecy of Isaiah is the third longest, complete literary entity in the Bible, being exceeded in length only by Jeremiah and Psalms. Psalms is in a special category as a collection of separate literary units.

1. Background

a. Sources of information

The book of Isaiah itself is the major source of information. Additional and supporting material is contained in 2Ki 15–21 and in 2Ch 26–33. Other contemporary or near-contemporary prophets were Amos and Hosea, both of whom prophesied to the northern kingdom, and Micah, who, like Isaiah, was a vehicle of God's word to Judah. Assyrian clay tablets are a leading source of material outside the OT.

b. The life of Isaiah

The opening heading of the book (1:1) places the ministry of Isaiah in the reigns of Uzziah (or Azariah, as he is called in 2 Kings), Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. Likely his ministry continued into the reign of Manasseh. Nothing is known about Isaiah's father, Amoz. Jewish tradition declared him to be of royal stock. While this cannot be substantiated, Isaiah may have been an aristocrat, for he seemed to have easy access to kings (7:3; 37:21–22; et al.). His wife is called "the prophetess" (8:3), which may simply mean she was a prophet's wife. She was, however, the mother of his two known children, both of whom had names with symbolic meanings (7:3; 8:3, 18). Isaiah seems to have prophesied largely—if not exclusively—in Jerusalem and its environs. Isaiah 8:16–17 suggests that the rejection of his warning to Ahaz led to a temporary withdrawal from public ministry and concentration on his disciples. His last datable oracles were in 701 B.C. The noncanonical Ascension of Isaiah states that he was martyred (cf. Heb 11:37) in the reign of Manasseh (who came to the throne in 687 B.C.).

b. The international scene

Israel and Judah—under Jeroboam II and Uzziah respectively—enjoyed a period of prosperity during Isaiah's childhood, with little interference from foreign powers. Egypt was weak, while Assyria was occupied with problems elsewhere. The aggressive empire-builder Tiglath-pileser III (known in Babylon as Pul) came to the Assyrian throne in 745 B.C., and the situation quickly changed. Egypt reckoned the small kingdoms in Palestine and Syria to be within her sphere of influence, but Assyria began to carve out a western extension to its empire in that region. Damascus (732 B.C.) and much of Galilee fell to Tiglath-pileser; then Shalmaneser V (727–722 B.C.) and Sargon II (722–705 B.C.) attacked Samaria, the latter taking it in 722 or 721 B.C. In the last decade or so of the century, Egypt began to revive somewhat, and Assyria encountered trouble from Babylon. Because of this Judah and other neighboring states rebelled against Assyria. Sennacherib (705–681) invaded Judah in 701 and subdued it; but God saved Jerusalem, which was to fall over a century later to a resurgent Babylon.

c. The reigns of Uzziah and Jotham

There are some problems in dating the reigns of the kings of Judah from Uzziah to Hezekiah. Uzziah's death has been variously placed between 747 and 735, the most likely date being around 740. Jotham seems to have been regent for some years before this; and, apparently, several years before his own death (731), he handed over the reins of effective government to his son, Ahaz. Apart from the inaugural vision recorded in ch. 6, nothing in the book can be dated with certainty from the reigns of either Uzziah or Jotham. Uzziah had been a godly man until the pride of his latter days (2Ch 26:16–21), but neither he nor Jotham removed the idolatrous high places.

d. The Syro-Ephraimite war

The threat from Tiglath-pileser brought Syria and Israel into coalition around 734 B.C., and they tried to force Judah to join them. Ahaz was on the throne at the time. Isaiah challenged him to trust in the Lord (ch. 7); instead, Ahaz called on Assyria to come to his aid. Damascus, the capital of Syria, was taken by the Assyrians in 732 and much of Galilee was subjugated (2Ki 15:25–29). Pekah, king of Israel, was murdered by Hoshea, who replaced him and reigned as a virtual Assyrian puppet. Pekah, king of Israel, and Rezin, king of Syria, had inflicted some harm on Judah before the Assyrians brought relief to Ahaz (2Ki 16:5–9), but more serious still were the religious consequences of the latter's appeal to Assyria (2Ki 16:10–20).

e. The fall of Samaria

The death of Tiglath-pileser in 727 B.C. raised false hopes of freedom for the little kingdoms on the Mediterranean seaboard. When Ahaz died about a year later, Isaiah uttered a prophecy warning Philistia of the consequences of revolt, and, by implication, counseled Judah against joining her (14:28–32). It was some time later that Hoshea withheld tribute from Shalmaneser V, who for three years besieged Samaria, which was later taken by his successor, Sargon. According to the Assyrians, over twenty-seven thousand Israelites were deported at this time, being settled in the northern parts of the Assyrian empire. For about a decade the area was fairly quiet, Sargon being occupied with wars elsewhere; but then Egypt began to encourage the Philistines and others to form a new coalition against Assyria. This coalition was crushed by Sargon in 711 in a battle on the Egyptian border. Judah under Hezekiah stayed out of this, heeding Isaiah's warning (20:1–6).

f. Hezekiah and Sennacherib

Sargon died around 705 B.C. and was replaced by Sennacherib. Immediately there was trouble in different parts of the Assyrian Empire, encouraged by the Ethiopian monarchs who were imparting new vigor to Egypt, and also by Merodach-Baladan of Babylon. This time, despite Isaiah's warnings (chs. 30–31), Hezekiah became involved and prepared Jerusalem for a siege (22:8–11). The Assyrian army invaded Judah, taking forty-six walled cities and devastating much of the countryside. It besieged Jerusalem, but Isaiah encouraged Hezekiah to trust in the Lord; and the city was delivered (37:36).

g. Babylon

Merodach-Baladan, a Chaldean prince, took power in Babylon in 721 B.C., declaring it independent of Assyria. Sargon entered Babylon in 711 or 710 without a fight. After Sargon's death, however, Merodach-Baladan became a leader of movements of rebellion against Sennacherib and sought to involve Hezekiah (39:1–2). Sennacherib defeated and deposed Merodach-Baladan; but Babylon revived again during the seventh century, becoming the dominant Mesopotamian power toward the end of that century. This led ultimately to the subjection of Judah to Babylon and to the fall of Jerusalem in 587. The ensuing Exile fulfilled God's warning to Hezekiah delivered through Isaiah (ch. 39) and forms the background to the following prophecies. However, at least part of chs. 56–66 seems to assume the passage of still more time, with the Exile a thing of the past and the people back in Judah again. Cyrus the Persian, the human instrument of the return, is referred to in chs. 44–45.

2. Authorship, Unity, and Date

a. The history of criticism

The book of Isaiah has come down to us as a unity, and the name Isaiah son of Amoz is the only one linked with it in any of the Hebrew manuscripts or ancient versions. Until late in the eighteenth century, only one extant writer questioned whether Isaiah wrote the whole book. This writer maintained that chs. 40–66 were the work of a prophet who lived late in the Babylonian captivity. In the late eighteenth century, soon after Pentateuchal criticism began to get into its stride, the new critical school took an interest in Isaiah, and chs. 40–66 were attributed to a prophet of the Exile, who soon was known as "Deutero-Isaiah." This view came to be held widely in scholarly circles. Subsequently, chs. 56–66 were attributed to yet another writer, "Trito-Isaiah," and some critics have divided the book still further, virtually fragmenting it.

b. The case for its unity

It is clear that the Jews accepted Isaiah's authorship of the later chapters of the book well before the coming of Christ. Ecclesiasticus, written early in the second century B.C., in 48:24 clearly refers to Isa 61:3. The pre-Christian Isaiah scroll from Qumran known as 1QIsa[a] has the complete text of the book. More important, however, is the testimony of the NT, which quotes Isaiah—and from different parts (e.g., Jn 12:37–41)—by name more often than all the other writing prophets combined.

The case for the unity of the book is strong. While it would be too much to say that its rejection is invariably due to a rejection of supernatural prophetic prediction (e.g., the naming of Cyrus in 44:28 and 45:1), there is no doubt that this lies behind a great deal of the opposition to it. It seems likely that Isaiah lived on into the reign of Manasseh, that during this reign he was unable to function openly as a prophet, but that he committed to writing the revelations he received about the future of his people. No doubt the people in Babylonia, chastened by the hand of their God—and with a new awareness of his sovereignty—would watch events with a deep sense of anticipation, and these prophecies would themselves be instrumental in the hands of God in helping to create that atmosphere of faith and obedience that led to the return.

Only a realization that the whole book records the prophecies of Isaiah the son of Amoz can place the authority of its teaching as an important part of the OT preparation for Christ on the securest basis.

3. Theology

Isaiah's temple vision (ch. 6) of the thrice-holy God deeply influenced his whole prophetic career and his theology. Isaiah learned some things about God's holiness, transcendent separateness, and incomparable majesty and character. Isaiah's distinctive title for God is "the Holy One of Israel," used twenty-five times in all.

Isaiah learned that God is King, enthroned above all, eternal and deathless, unlike Uzziah and other earthly monarchs. He is also the Lord Almighty, so that the authority of the supreme King is wedded to an omnipotence that enables him to carry out his every purpose. As such, he could use Assyria and Babylon as instruments of his punitive purpose and yet include them also in the great judgments on all the nations (chs. 13–23). In fact, the entire world would come under his judgment (ch. 24). Isaiah is also given a wonderful disclosure of a great King for God's people, who himself bears the name "Mighty God" (9:6).

Isaiah saw that "the whole earth is full of his glory" (6:3); accordingly, he speaks of God as Creator both of the universe (40:26; 42:5; 48:12–13) and of his people, Israel (43:1, 15). He has a vision of the whole earth full of the knowledge of the Lord (11:9) and even of new heavens and a new earth (65:17; 66:22).

Because this great God is holy, Isaiah's encounter with him gives the prophet a smarting sense of sin. He is to be the mouthpiece of God, but Isaiah's lips are unclean. The people too have unclean lips; for, though worshiping their God with ritual (1:10–17), fasting (58:1–5), and words (29:13), they were in fact rebellious (1:2–6; 30:1–5; et al.). The prophet's scathing denunciations of idolatry (chs. 40–48) reflect not only his own conviction that there is only one God but also his holy intolerance of the sin of idolatry. Two sins that are singled out for special condemnation are pride and unbelief (e.g., in 2:6–22; 7:1–9). Isaiah also condemned injustice (1:16–17; 58:6–12; et al.).

But Isaiah also brings hope. His very name (meaning "The LORD Is Salvation") suggests that we should expect a positive note. The assurance of forgiveness for the penitent is constantly reiterated (1:18–19; 12:1; 30:18–19; 33:24; et al.); and, just as the ultimate sacrificial basis of forgiveness is suggested in 6:6–7, so it is shown to be grounded in the sacrificial sufferings of God's great Servant (52:13–53:12). But God's purpose is concerned not only with the individual but also with the nation, and the doctrine of the remnant is the guarantee of God's truth. In Isaiah's teaching about the remnant lies the seed of all that he declares about the future glory of Zion (see next section).

4. Eschatology

The message of Isaiah is strongly eschatological. The prophet frequently deals with the future destiny of Israel and the Gentiles. This book, like other OT prophetic Scriptures, has been understood in more than one way as far as its eschatology is concerned.

Clearly, a high doctrine of Scripture requires us to take the teaching of its every part seriously; it also requires that we consider the way the NT writers understood it.

The interpretation of the nature of Isaiah's prophecy ranges from very literal (i.e., every prophecy that can be taken literally should be so taken) to primarily spiritual (i.e., that the promises made to Israel are to be fulfilled in the church). Both of these extreme positions have difficulties in the light of the NT. A good case can be made for the fulfillment of many of the "Israel" prophecies in the church (e.g., Ac 13:46–48; 26:19–23 interpret Isa 42:6–7; 49:6–7 spiritually). But there is an important group of NT passages that can hardly be understood in any other way than in relation to literal Israel and geographical Jerusalem (e.g., Mt 19:28; Lk 21:24; Ro 11:26–27; cf. Isa 27:9; 59:20–21).

There may be passages that present us with continuing problems of interpretation and where it is not plain whether we should understand them literally or spiritually. Perhaps this is what we should expect. We are never promised complete understanding of biblical prophecies before their fulfillment. Their main purpose is to keep us expectant, obedient, and trustful and to provide, in their fulfillment, evidence of the faithfulness of God to his Word. In the fulfilled events themselves, God will be seen to be true.

5. Messianism and the Servant Songs

Each part of the OT presents its own witness to the Christ who was to come. There is no OT book—with the possible exception of the Psalter—that is so full and varied in its testimony, and certainly none is so beautifully integrated. Many themes enter this prophetic literature that are messianic in the broad sense; that is, they witness to the Christ presented in the pages of the NT. The themes of the Branch (cf. 4:2; 11:1; et al.), the Stone (cf. 8:14; 28:16–17; et al.), and Light (9:2; 42:6; et al.) are important concepts in Isaiah. These all move beyond their normal subpersonal uses to provide analogies of the coming One and his work. In the use of the terms Child (e.g., 9:6) and King (e.g., 9:6–7), however, we begin at the personal level (see 7:13–17).

The so-called Servant Songs, though clearly forming an identifiable series, have not been arbitrarily introduced to their context; for the servant theme is an important one in Isaiah from ch. 41 onward, with Israel often so-named (41:8–9; 43:10; 44:1–2, 21). Cyrus too, though not called God's servant, functions for him (44:28–45:7), with the prediction of God's prophetic servants (44:26) and the good of his servant Israel (45:4) as the background and the purpose of his work.

The Christian, guided by the use made of the Servant Songs in the NT (e.g., Mt 8:17; 12:17–21; Jn 12:38; et al.) can immediately say that they are fulfilled in Jesus. There is not a word of the songs that cannot be applied to him, even when the servant is called "Israel" (49:3); for, as Matthew clearly saw, Jesus was the perfect expression of what God intended Israel to be (cf. Mt 2:15 with Hos 11:1–2).

The prophet not only introduces a series of themes that prove eventually to be messianic, but he relates them in a kind of theological counterpoint. For instance, in chs. 8–9 we have the sanctuary (8:14; cf. Jn 2:19), the stone (8:14), the light (9:2), and the child King (9:7). The kingly theme is interwoven with that of the servant (e.g., 42:4; 52:13; 53:12), while both the king and the servant are endowed with the Spirit of God (11:1–3; 42:1; 61:1). This all gives the impression that some great person is in view, in whom all this material will find its ultimate focus.

EXPOSITION

I. Oracles Concerning Judah and Jerusalem (1:1–12:6)

A. God's Charge Against His People (1:1–31)

This chapter fitly opens the book. It vigorously sums up the teaching, not only of the prophet Isaiah, but of the whole prophetic movement.

1 The prophet's name means "The LORD Is Salvation." Nothing is known about Isaiah's father, and the Jewish tradition of Isaiah's royal birth is groundless. But he certainly had an extensive experience of kings! His knowledge of their imperfections fitted him to be a major channel of God's disclosure of the perfect king. "Vision" (GK 2606) suggests to us a mode of revelation, but it could be a technical term for an oracle of God, however received.

2–3 These two verses appear to introduce a trial scene. Here nature serves the purposes of prophecy. The heavens and earth witness God's complaint against his people, and the ox and the donkey dumbly rebuke Israel's ingratitude. Unreasoning beasts exhibit more sense and appreciation than unthinking Israel (cf. Jer 8:7). The words "children" and "they" are both emphatic in the Hebrew, underlining the unthinkable character of such filial rebellion.

4 The prophet's language suggests that guilt is an awful burden; that if paternity is truly revealed in character, then something has gone sadly wrong; and that the people have added insult to ingratitude.

5–6 The sinful people are addressed directly here. Their continuance in sin, like all rebellion against God, is utterly irrational. The whole surface of the body politic (i.e., the nation personified) testifies to the divine punishment, but the heart remains unchanged.

7–9 As Isaiah uttered these words, he may well have recalled the divine disclosure of things to come that had been given him at the time of his call (6:11–13). God's word had proved true. City and country were both suffering, for their inhabitants were powerless against the invaders. Isaiah likens the situation in the land to the roughly made shelters of the farmer's watchmen, standing desolate against the skyline once harvest was over. It was the restraining hand of the Lord Almighty that alone saved Jerusalem from sharing the fate of its environs, and the prophet stresses this by placing the names of the two destroyed cities in a position of emphasis.

10–15 Sodom and Gomorrah—shocking and deeply insulting names to Isaiah's hearers—suggest not only devastation but Gentile sin at its worst; yet the words "LORD" and "our God" have overtones of a covenant relationship unknown to the cities of the plain. The prophet presses home his point. Rulers and people have a Sodomlike offensiveness to God, and their ostentatious religious observances only aggravate the situation.

These verses highlight many features of Israel's system of worship. Verse 11 implies an abundance of sacrifices well beyond the divine requirements (cf. Mic 6:6–8). God was nauseated by such a surfeit, and the words "to me" and "more than enough" suggest the same kind of blasphemous, pagan idea of a god who needs to be fed with sacrifices that Ps 50 rejects with biting irony.

The temple courts felt the heavy tread of the worshiping throng, probably swollen at such times of national crisis; but "trampling" also suggests desecration. This puts the question "Who has asked this of you?" in its true perspective. God rejected "offerings" rendered "meaningless" by hypocrisy (cf. Jer 7:21–23; Hos 6:6; et al.). The people have been shown as burdened with guilt (v.4); but here God is shown as burdened with their sacrifices.

16–17 God's true way is announced and the moral note sounded. People are accountable, but the grace and power of fulfillment are God's alone. The prophet's words imply that the reclaimed sinner needs a course of instruction in the ways of God. This teaching process begins in the call for social justice and defense of the fatherless. Isaiah's rapid-fire style in these two verses underscores the authority and urgency of God's commands to his people.

18–20 Many see the words of v.18 as an offer of total forgiveness, for which vv.19–20 supply the divine conditions. Others understand the language to be ironic and render the second part of the verse, "If your sins are as scarlet, shall they be white as snow? If they are red like crimson, shall they be as wool?" The language permits either possibility. Verses 19–20 summarize the Deuteronomic theology of divine blessing (cf. Dt 28), which underlies much prophetic teaching. They contain a striking play on words. In effect God was saying, "Eat . . . or be eaten!"

21–23 The rhythm of Isaiah's poetry changes suddenly as he introduces the characteristic "limp" of a Hebrew lament, opening with the exclamation "how!" (cf. 14:4; 2Sa 1:19; Ps 137:4; et al.). Even though there is no explicit threat of judgment till v.24, the sensitive listener would hear the drumbeats of doom in the very sound of the poetic measure. Words like "justice" and "rulers" show that Isaiah was thinking primarily of the people's leaders; so the past he had in mind was perhaps the time of David, when Jerusalem first came under Israelite control. Silver and choice wine are probably metaphors for the rulers

(cf. Jer 6:28, 30; Eze 22:18), who had become utterly decadent.

24–26 First was the ominous rhythm of the dirge (v.21), then came the vivid description of moral corruption (v.23), and here we have a terrifying catena of majestic divine titles. The first of them—"Lord" (GK 123), meaning "master"—is used of God by Isaiah more than by any other OT writer. In its absolute form, as here, it always introduces a note of judgment (cf. 3:1; 10:16, 33; et al.). The second—"the LORD Almighty" (GK 3378 & 7372)—often linked with it, indicates supreme power, while the third—"the Mighty One [GK 51] of Israel"—is a somewhat uncommon term suggestive of bulllike strength (Ge 49:24; Isa 49:26; 60:16). Still there was no respite. To complete the verbal buildup, God's message is prefixed by the agitated exclamation "Ah" (cf. v.4).

The burden God bears as the result of the meaningless offerings of his "foes" demands relief in judgment. His hand, so often stretched out against Israel's enemies, has turned against his own people (cf. Zec 13:7). His threat of vengeance has taken an unexpected turn, however, for it issues in cleansing rather than destruction. Although so sinful, they were still his people, and his judgments were directed to the removal of their impurities.

27–31 The theme of restoration continues for another verse (anticipating the great vision of ch. 2), until the threatening tone returns (v.28). Is Zion's redemption here physical or moral? Redemption terminology is normally used in the OT with a physical connotation and is often so applied to Jerusalem/Zion (e.g., 35:9–10; 51:10–11; 52:9; 59:20).

Sacred trees played an important part in the Canaanite fertility cult (cf. Dt 12:23; 2Ki 16:4; Hos 4:13), for deciduous trees like the oak or terebinth may well have symbolized the death and rebirth of the god. The "gardens" may be groves of these trees, or, alternatively, places of sacred springs or wells.

Verses 29–30 teach the lesson that a people under judgment may be instructed from the very symbols of their apostasy as to the folly of such departure from the true God, while v.31 imparts the even more important lesson that destruction may come on us from the very thing our sin has brought into being.

B. The Exaltation of God's House and the Extension of His Dominion (2:1–5)

1 This heading virtually repeats that with which the book opens, apart from the reference there to the kings. Isaiah literally saw "the word" (cf. KJV, RSV, et al.), which suggests that the revelation contained both visionary and verbal elements.

2–4 This glorious vision is found, with small variations, in Mic 4:1–3. Joel 3:10 contains language clearly parallel with Isa 2:4 and Mic 4:3. Apart from its use in Mic 4:4, the statement "for the mouth of the LORD has spoken" is found only in Isaiah (1:20; 40:5; 58:14).

"In the last days" relates the vision to the period when God's purposes will find fulfillment. The NT, making explicit that the Messiah comes twice, applies the phrase both to the period of his first advent (e.g., Ac 2:17; Heb 1:2) and to his second (e.g., Jas 5:3; 1Pe 1:5). The context of the oracle in Micah suggests that the first stage of its fulfillment took place in the return from Babylonia (Mic 4:1–10), when ruined Jerusalem (Mic 3:12) would be rebuilt and her temple raised again.

The whole of ch. 2 makes extensive use of the language of elevation and abasement to convey dignity and pride on the one hand and lowliness and humiliation on the other. There is clearly a figurative element here, picturing nations as streams (cf. Jer 51:44)—flowing upwards! The promised elevation of Mount Zion underlines its spiritual preeminence as the source of divine teaching for the nations. The word "established" reminds us of Ps 2:6 ("I have installed my King on Zion, my holy hill"). Both the hill and the King are secure because they are in the center of God's purpose for his people.

In Isaiah's day "the house of the God of Jacob" was at Jerusalem, not at the original Bethel ("house of God" [Ge 28:16–22]), for Bethel was the site of an apostate shrine (1Ki 12:28–29). The phrase "God of Jacob" underlines the special relationship of the true God with historical Israel, while "Zion"/"Jerusalem" represents divinely ordained worship and divinely authorized government. So this passage weds together normal OT particularism with the vision of universal worship and peace.

The issues that set nations against one another do not disappear automatically but are settled by the supreme Judge, whose decisions are accepted. Thus there is no uneasy calm but peace based on righteousness (cf. 11:1–9; Ps 72). In the abolition of every cause of conflict, war itself disappears; and peace, with its economic consequences, takes its place.

5 Isaiah views the future obedience of the nations to the true God as a challenge to the house of Jacob to walk in his ways. The nations are not yet coming to Jerusalem to be taught by the Lord, but Israel already has his word. How unthinkable then that she should continue to walk in darkness!

C. The Day of the Lord (2:6–22)

6–9 The sore trials the people are to pass through will provide evidence that God has abandoned them to their enemies (not absolutely, or forever, as 4:2–6 will show), and this itself is the start of the great day of judgment on them. The causes of this judgment remind us of the divinely given constitution for the kingdom laid down in Dt 17:14–20, set in a context (Dt 16:18–18:22) of much reference not only to the leadership of the people but also to the need for separation from the abominable practices of the nations. The kings of Judah have been native-born, but this did not prevent the people from being contaminated by foreign religious and semi-religious practices.

To "clasp hands" may refer to a gesture symbolizing the striking of a bargain. The people were seeking economic and military self-sufficiency, so that they need not depend on their God; yet at the same time they were groveling to man-made objects of worship.

10–11 The people had been abasing themselves, though in the presence of dumb idols and not the true and only God. Their action was appropriate, but their object of worship was wrong. The proud are eager to avoid the gaze of God, for his majestic presence drives every rival underground in the frantic and, of course, utterly unavailing search for cover. This picture of the people—enjoying the affluence of the land but turning aside to idols till the Lord establishes his sole right to worship by an act of judgment—is a reminder of Dt 6:10–15.

12–18 When God acts in judgment, it is often to upset human values so that everything can be seen from the divine perspective. Jerusalem's hill is to be exalted above other greater mountains (v.2), but all that is reckoned great by people will be brought low.

Much of the imagery of this passage can be viewed as Phoenician. It was in the hinterland of Tyre and Sidon that the cedars grew; it was there too that the highest mountains were found, and the grand designs of stonemasons and shipwrights were to be seen in its ports. "Every trading ship" was based in Phoenicia. This land was notorious for its religious influence on both Israel and Judah, for Jezebel's family became part of the dynastic stock of both kingdoms for a while (cf. 2Ki 8:16–18). It was from this quarter that religious syncretism had come during the previous century, and its features could still stand for alien religion. The main point, of course, is that God's act of judgment would humble every manifestation of human pride.

19–21 The terrifying revelation of the glory, power, and judgment of the one true God will give human beings—but too late—a proper sense of values. The silver and gold used to make idols are at last recognized as worthless in the light of his glory.

22 After the idols have been cut down to size by the revelation of the true God in his judicial majesty, the spotlight of the divine contempt focuses on human beings, whose dignity as creatures made in God's image had been cast away by their groveling before idols made by their own hands, and whose pride would be abased before God's disclosure (vv.11, 17–21). The reference to "breath" not only suggests frailty but also may be intended to allude to Ge 2:7. So, implies the prophet, you are worshiping gods you have made instead of the God who made you!

D. God's Judgment on Jerusalem and Judah (3:1–4:1)

1–7 The divine titles in v.1, with their stress on power (see comment on 1:24), anticipate a strong threat of judgment. The reference to famine is brief but ominous (cf. v.7); the prophet concentrates on the removal of responsible and trusted leaders. The people were showing too great a tendency to put their trust in human beings (2:22). The prophet warns them that the objects of their trust are to be removed. Those traditionally respected—"the old," "the honorable"—will be violently replaced by the manifestly inadequate and by the base oppressor. The situation would in fact reach such a pitch that the mere possession of some outward semblance of wealth or rank would attract the attention of those desperately seeking for someone to bring a measure of order to a situation of chaos. The phrase "this heap of ruins" anticipates the later picture of a destitute and defeated city (v.26).

8–12 The prophet reminds his readers of the spiritual and moral causes of this anarchy. Judah and its capital city are to reach the brink of total collapse, with disaster to follow, because of insolent and blatant rebellion against the Lord. "His glorious presence" is another reminder of 2:10. By his use of the phrase "my people," Isaiah is reminding them of their covenant relationship. Walking in the counsel of the wicked is especially influential and dangerous when done by national leadership (v.12).

13–15 The law-court scene here is reminiscent of ch. 1, while the reference to the vineyard anticipates ch. 5. Many passages show the responsibility of leadership among God's people and the exacting nature of his judgment of the shepherds of his people (e.g., Jer 25; Eze 34; Zec 10–11; Jn 10; Jas 3:1). Not only may leaders take people aside from the right path; but positions of privilege and responsibility may be used to foster self-interest rather than social good. This forms God's major accusation in this dramatic judgment scene. The great titles that close this section are a fearsome reminder that God not only has the right to judge his people but also the power to carry out his judgment.

3:16–4:1 If there is still some moral fiber in the women of a deteriorating society, the situation is not without hope; for they have the most formative influence on the younger generation. The arrogant pride seen in the rulers of Judah was, however, just as evident in its women. Those depicted here are clearly the wealthy, whose rich stores of finery had probably been bought by the plunder taken by their husbands from the poor (cf. v.14).

In v.9, the prophet linked the look on the face with a Sodomlike parade of sin, suggesting that all was not right in the sexual life of the community. This language moves swiftly from the ostentatious posturing of these women as they parade in the streets of Jerusalem to far from seemly attempts to attract male attention. The judgment formula "in that day" provides a further link with ch. 2 and introduces a catalog of their adornments and other luxurious paraphernalia. This stands in stark contrast to the repeated phrase "the poor" in vv.14–15.

The judgment would come through enemies who would take the Israelites captive, giving them the rough garb of prisoners of war. The removal of locks of hair suggests that the city would be taken by the Babylonians, who did this to those taken in war. "Branding" is also consistent with an enslavement due to capture.

By a swift and yet appropriate movement of thought, Isaiah turned from the daughters of Zion (v.16) to the city herself (vv.25–26), referred to in 1:8 as "the Daughter of Zion." The city and her gates are graphically personified. Isaiah boldly transports us from his confident predictions to their fulfillment.

Just as swiftly we return to the women of Jerusalem (4:1), perhaps those widowed through the violent overthrow of the city. The judgment on the city drastically altered the normal male-female proportions in the population. These concerned women are prepared to forego the normal perquisites of marriage to secure its status—or, at least, to gain the protection of a name. The interesting links with 3:7 suggest that the same judgment is in view, or at least one with the same kind of effects on the economy of the country. God's judgments do not always follow the same pattern—though they always proceed from the same principles, for his nature is unchanging.

E. Zion's Glorious Future (4:2–6)

2 The great contrast between this section and the preceding one is accentuated by the fact that both v.1 and v.2 commence with the phrase "in that day." This section itself (4:2–6) contains a note of judgment in v.4; but clearly the Day of the Lord, though basically judgmental, introduces also the salvation that is the sequel and consequence of God's cleansing act.

This verse contains a major question concerning the phrases "the Branch of the LORD" and "the fruit of the land." An ancient and pre-Christian interpretation applies both phrases to the Messiah. The Targum renders "the Branch" as "the Messiah." Most conservative commentators have taken at least the first of the two phrases to be messianic. "Branch" (GK 7542) occurs in four verses (Jer 23:5; 33:15; Zec 3:8; 6:12) as a technical messianic designation. It is more difficult, however, to take "the fruit of the land" in a messianic sense, for nothing like it is so used elsewhere in the OT.

The Bible's use of technical language reveals a tendency for words and phrases to begin quite lowly but, through their use in various contexts, to gather more connotations as time goes by. "Branch" is a good example (cf. also "servant" in chs. 42–53). In this way the depth of God's purpose is progressively revealed. The concept of the "branch" begins in Isaiah at the botanical level, which is in view here. The famine and devastation wreaked on the land by their enemies showed the Israelites their dire need of literal fruitfulness. The God of new life therefore promised that the future would be marked by such God-given fruitfulness.

The people's need of life, however, was far greater, embracing the nation's very existence—which was being threatened by its foes. There was need of reassurance that the God of new life would make the remnant of his people fruitful, too. But their deepest need was for the Messiah; thus, he appears as the ultimate "Branch of the LORD" in ch. 11. The reader familiar with this development will see v.2 in terms both of its meaning in this context and of the deeper significance that this language was destined to have in the rest of Isaiah.

3 This verse finds its explanation in v.4, for the holiness of Jerusalem is due to the Lord's action described there. The recording of the names of Jerusalem's inhabitants may seem at first to be simply a record that they are still alive after the judgments have taken place (cf. 1:9), but the eschatological context suggests that eternal life is in view.

4 Both the women of Jerusalem (3:16–23) and her people generally (1:16–20) needed cleansing, and the Lord promises to do this. What does ruah (GK 8120) really convey here? The NIV renders it "spirit," while the marginal note has "the Spirit." The word is also rendered "breath" or "wind" in the OT and is the regular word used for the Spirit of God. It is used in a context of judgment also in 30:28 (cf. 40:7), where the NIV does not take it as a reference to the divine Spirit. On the other hand, ruah is linked with judgment—though in a much milder context—in connection with the Messiah's ministry in ch. 11. Perhaps we should understand it as "a blast of judgment and a blast of fire" and see it as another example of a term destined for enrichment as the book proceeds.

5–6 In 2:1–4 Mount Zion is elevated above the surrounding hills; here it is protected by divine symbols reminiscent of the journey out of Egypt (Ex 13:21; 14:19–20). The protective symbols would not move, as they did during the Exodus; for the future Mount Zion is journey's end. The word "create" (GK 1343), used in Ge 1, occurs later in Isaiah to denote realities brought into being by the Creator in his new and final purpose (cf. 41:20; 45:8; 48:7; 65:17–18). The glory thus seen over all Jerusalem will itself be protected by a canopy, normally used for weddings and royal occasions. The bridal implications of 5:1 suggest that this was in view here. It will protect the city from the natural elements (cf. 32:2).

The picture in these verses is glorious and certainly has not been completely fulfilled as yet. The returning exiles did not experience such idyllic conditions, though this disappointment is traced by Haggai not so much to the purpose of God as to their own sin (Hag 1:5–9).

F. The Parable of the Vineyard (5:1–7)

1–2 Role-play was used from time to time by the OT prophets (cf. Zec 11:4–17). Here Isaiah assumes the guise of a folk singer. Possibly he was really singing—at least at first—a love song and was identifying with the friend of the bridegroom (the "best man"; cf. Jn 3:29–30). If so, of course, the bride and groom are depicted figuratively in terms of a vineyard and its owner. The use of "vineyard" for a bride is often found in the Song of Solomon (2:15; 4:16–5:1; 6:1–2; 8:12). Not until the last clause of v.2 can we see that this was to be a sad, not a glad, story.

In this restored winepress at Avdat in southern Judea, the grapes were trampled by foot and juice flowed through the hole at the end.

3–4 What a dramatic change! The scene shifts to a courtroom (cf. 1:2–17; 3:13–15), and this time the human hearers are to act as assessors as the owner of the vineyard speaks. This suggests that the "vineyard" has moral responsibility. The discerning listeners have the first intimation that this parable is not for their comfort.

5–6 The abandonment of such an unprofitable venture was only to be expected; for who would waste further energy, time, and money? But there was more than this. Definite action—the removal of its hedges and wall—would be taken against it. The hidden meaning comes closer to complete unveiling when the last statement of v.6 is uttered. What human owner can control the weather? This is God!

7 The hearers fell into a trap skillfully laid for them. The figurative form is cast off, and God's people stand exposed as the guilty objects of his disappointment and judgment. They have condemned themselves, for the tacit agreement of the hearers to the criticism of the vineyard can be assumed.

G. Condemnation of Judah's Sins (5:8–30)

The eighth-century prophets were united in their condemnation of the social sins of the affluent society of their day (cf. Am 5:18; 6:1). Moreover, just as in Am 1–2 the threat of divine judgment came nearer and nearer home—so that it pointed eventually at Israel herself—so the "woe" (GK 2098) oracles here came to rest eventually on the prophet himself (6:5).

8–10 In an affluent society all do not always profit from increased wealth (cf. Mic 2:1). The horror of the prophets in response to the sin of covetousness in its application to land (cf. 1Ki 21:17–24) was almost certainly due to their recognition of the principle that the land really belonged to God and that he had made the various tribes and families stewards of it in perpetuity.

The rich have coveted and appropriated both house and land, and the judgment of God would descend on each. Whatever the measures intended, the main point is clear: there will be a minimal return for a large outlay (cf. Hag 1:5–6).

11–17 Most societies consider early morning drinking a mark of moral degeneracy, for anyone who thinks first of drink when he or she awakes is in its grip. Wealth dubiously gathered may well be dissolutely spent. The day that starts with drink ends in musical banquets when wine is drunk well into the night. As in the previous "woe," the penalty is appropriate to the offense, for exile removes them from the land on which they had set their affections, and feasting and drinking come to an abrupt end. "Lack of understanding" (v.13) relates to the outlook described in v.12b.

"The grave" (sheol; GK 8619) is the place of the dead. The midnight revelers, their mouths open for more food and drink, will suddenly find that they have become the food of that hungriest of all monsters—death. Solidarity in punishment means that both "men of rank" and "masses" will suffer the consequences of the sins of the wealthy.

Verse 16 sums up the connection between holiness and righteousness. God's separateness is not simply ontological but moral; his holiness is not a simple synonym for his majesty but the basis in his eternal character of his righteous judgments on sinners. The moral nature of divine holiness finds one of its most awesome expressions in ch. 6.

Verse 17 continues the theme, for it shows the affluent agricultural society of the day (cf. vv.9–10) reverting to a more thoroughly pastoral one, with the animals taking over the ruins. This suggests that the various woes of this section are directed against the same people.

18–19 Isaiah was fond of the picture of the burden-bearer (cf. 53:6; 57:10). Here he pictures sinful Judah, not now "loaded with guilt" (1:4), as if it was on their backs, but drawing it as a heavy load behind them. The pictures are different, but their import the same. Acceptance of deceit, the big lie (cf. v.20), sets their feet on sin's wearying treadmill (cf. Ro 6:23).

Verse 19 sums up the people's sin and exhibits its true nature as cynical rejection of the living God and all his ways. They imply that nothing is happening (cf. 41:21–24). But the "woe" this section begins with is the prophet's witness to his faith that God will act in judgment on sin—in his own time. The phrase "the Holy One of Israel" here was probably uttered by them with a curl of the lip, in contemptuous reference to a distinctive note of Isaiah's prophetic message (cf. 30:11–12).

20 This "woe" has a link with the previous one (v.18), for "deceit" is there expounded as skepticism about the ways of God. Unhappily, it is an easy journey from such skepticism to the total reversal of values that this verse demonstrates, for God is the source of all values; and if we are wrong about him, we can soon be wrong about everything.

21 This verse too may have a link with the previous "woe," for the reversal of values expressed there may form the basis for the new "wisdom" of the godless, which is antagonistic to the divine wisdom (cf. 1Co 1:17–2:16; 3:18–23).

22–23 Verse 21 condemned the outlook of those who thought themselves wise while v.22 exposes the folly of that "wisdom." These men assessed themselves as heroes and champions. But these were not sober judgments, for their drink was talking through them. The situation was even more scandalous when we learn that they occupied positions of great responsibility, needing a clear head and an unweakened moral sense. In the place of justice, they acted corruptly (cf. 1:23; 10:1–2).

24–25 The series of "woes" is over. The last was pronounced against evil judges; now the supreme Judge begins to declare sentence. The fire of God will burn them; the hand of God will smite them. In 40:6–8 the prophet likens human life to grass and flowers, doomed to wither and die. Here he uses them as figures of judgment because they are so vulnerable to fire. To those familiar with grassland fires, the illustration suggests comprehensiveness and swiftness as well as the inexorable character of the judgment. The cause spelled out in detail in the preceding woes is summarily expressed as rejection of God's word. The word "law" (torah; GK 9368) is technical enough to suggest a reference to the Mosaic Law—the basis of Israel's God-given moral standard—and at the same time general enough to include Isaiah's own authoritative teaching.

Verse 25 seems to refer to a specific judgment not to be regarded as an isolated event but as a manifestation of that divine anger that continued to burn against the people. The mention of mountains shaking and dead bodies lying in the streets is appropriate if Isaiah has in mind the great earthquake in the days of Uzziah (Am 1:1; Zec 14:5).

26–30 What a gift of vivid description was given to this great prophet! The picture makes such an immediate appeal to the imagination that it requires little exposition. The great judgment, anticipated by the earthquake, is to come through a great army from afar, swift, single-minded, effective, ferocious, and altogether terrifying. A "banner" is raised by God as a rallying point for his punitive army. He will whistle to them like a beekeeper. The phrase "the ends of the earth" is hyperbole, since the Assyrians were in view. Regarding the references to the sea and land, the former occurs in a simile while the latter is literal. The prophet moves from the figure of the roaring lion to that of the roaring sea; and then, perhaps, calling to mind the literal sea—which might have been a means of escape from the foe if it had been less turbulent—he declares that there is no hope landward either. The cloud of Assyrian judgment has blotted out any light that may have indicated an escape route.

H. The Vision and Call of the Holy One (6:1–13)

1 The date of Uzziah's death has been much disputed. Isaiah 14:28–32 is an oracle from the year of the death of King Ahaz, and it is clearly appropriate to the political situation of that time. We are not surprised, therefore, to find something similar here; and we can well imagine the spiritual value to the prophet himself of a vision of the almighty King when an earthly reign of over fifty years had come—or was coming—to its end. The vision of the Lord's transcendence never left Isaiah: the exaltation of Israel's great God is a frequent theme in his oracles (cf. 2:10–22; 37:16; 40:12–26; 57:15).

2 This is the only biblical passage where heavenly beings are called "seraphs" (GK 8597). They are part of the great variety of heavenly beings created by God (along with others such as angels, archangels, principalities, powers, and cherubim). The seraphs are bright creatures, for the word means "burning ones"; yet they hide their faces from the greater brightness and the glory of the Lord. Covering the feet suggests humility.

3 There is no indication of the number of seraphs seen by Isaiah. Possibly he was present at an act of worship in the temple, perhaps at the New Year, and that the antiphonal singing of the Levitical choir was echoed by the heavenly seraphs of his vision. The apostle Paul evidently believed that angels are present at Christian worship (cf. 1Co 11:2–16, which likewise deals with veiling and unveiling in the presence of God).

The threefold ascription of holiness to God (cf. Rev 4:8) has been interpreted in reference to the Trinity since the early Church Fathers. It is best for us simply to say that—in the fuller light of the NT—we can see the appropriateness of this threefold expression. The theme of divine holiness is of towering importance in Isaiah This man of God could never forget the disclosure of transcendent purity he encountered when he was called to prophetic service (cf. Eze 1).

The language of fullness occurs three times in these verses (vv.1, 3, 4), twice in reference to the temple and once to the whole earth. So this passage, insisting as it does on the awesome transcendence of the sovereign God, also emphatically teaches his immanence. His transcendence is not remoteness or aloofness but is known through his presence in his created world and temple. Divine transcendence and immanence are always held in balance in the Bible's view of God (cf. 12:6).

The word "glory" (GK 3883) is used of God in his manifestation to his creatures. The essence of deity is inscrutable, but something of his glory can be seen if God is pleased to disclose it (Ex 33:17–23; Eze 1:28). In Jn 12:41, after quoting Isa 6:10, John said that Isaiah "saw [Jesus'] glory and spoke about him." This amazing statement is in fact altogether consistent with the high Christology of the NT writers, for Jesus is God incarnate, and the same God is revealed in both OT and NT. This might in fact suggest that John understood the threefold use of "holy" in trinitarian terms.

4 God's power is sometimes manifested in a physical tremor (cf. Ex 19:18; Ac 4:31) and his presence in a cloud of smoke (cf. Isa 4:5; Ex 33:9). So the God who normally hides himself from the senses occasionally made himself known in a form accessible to them, and he ultimately did so in the consummate unveiling of himself in his Son (1Jn 1:1–4).

5 The word translated "woe" (GK 208) here is different from that used several times in ch. 5. They are, in fact, synonyms, each possessing various nuances ranging from the threat to the sigh. This verse teaches us that to be an effective channel for God's penetrating word, the power of that word must be felt in the person's own conscience. It is true that the lips of the prophet were destined to proclaim God's truth; but if he was in the temple at worship, the primary reference may be to the defiled lips of the worshiper (cf. 1:15; 29:13). The people of the OT always felt a deep apprehension at the prospect of seeing God. This must have been underlined still more for Isaiah as he saw even the unfallen seraphs covering their faces in the presence of the Most High.

6–7 To serve God, Isaiah needed to be a clean instrument. The God of burning holiness himself (cf. 33:13–16) provides this cleansing from the sacrificial altar (cf. Nu 31:22–23; Mal 3:2). Significantly, one of the seraphs (see comment on v.2) is the instrument of purification administered to the prophet. Isaiah may well have learned from this experience that sinful human beings can join in the worship of the "burning ones" only when purified by the fire of God (cf. 4:4).

8 Isaiah is not coerced into service; rather, his will makes its ready response as a grateful reaction to God's forgiving grace. No doubt Isaiah's very response was itself the product of divine grace, but this is not where the stress falls here. Instead, we see him faced with the challenge to personal commitment.

The plural "us" is often taken to be either a reference to the Trinity (cf. v.3; Ge 1:26; 11:7) or to a council of heavenly beings. Many passages picture God surrounded by the heavenly hosts; but none suggests that God called on them for advice or even identified them with him in some way in his utterance. In a context that speaks both of waters and mountains (nature) and of nations (history), the Lord refutes the notion that he consulted others (40:13–14). The plural, therefore, suggests either the divine majesty or that fullness of his being that was to find its ultimate theological expression in the doctrine of the Trinity.

9–10 Isaiah was apprised of the people's hardness of heart by the Lord Almighty, who not only knew what would occur but had planned it; for he is King (vv.1, 5). The words of God to Isaiah are quoted in each of the Gospels (Mt 13:14–15; Mk 4:10–12; Lk 8:10; Jn 12:39–41) and twice by Paul (Ac 28:26–27; Ro 11:8). Each quotation is given as a comment on the rejection of God's word in Christ. The synoptic references all occur in connection with the parable of the sower, which, like here, anticipates widespread failure to make proper response to God's word, but which also, as here (v.13), shows cause for hope. The holy seed of the vision finds its NT counterpart in the good soil of the parable.

11–12 The tone of Isaiah's question is one of lament. The prophets did not find God's message of judgment easy to utter (cf. Jer 1:6 8, 17; Eze 2:3–8; et al.). They belonged to the nation they addressed and must often have wept for its sins and its certain judgment (Jer 9:1; 14:17). The opening chapters of the book (as well as later passages), recording material from the events of the prophet's day (1:7–9) and from oracles of future judgment (e.g., 3:25–26; 5:8–9, 13, 17), illustrate these verses.

13 The devastation, great as it was to be, would not be total; but even its survivors would have to submit to further judgment. The illustration from nature introduces an element of hope. God has so ordered nature that almost total destruction does not always extinguish life. He has a continuing purpose of life for the remnant of his people (see comment on 4:2). The word "seed" (GK 2446) suggests a link with the promise given to Abraham that his seed ("offspring"; GK 2446) would continue and be blessed by God (Ge 17:1–8; cf. Isa 51:2). That God should use the word "holy" (GK 7731) of the remnant of his people when it has been used already in v.3 in relation to his own transcendent being is condescending grace indeed!

I. The Sign of Shear-Jashub (7:1–9)

Isaiah 7:1–9:7 has a certain unity, not only in its historical background, but also on account of the children with symbolic names. The "day of Midian's defeat" (9:4), which occurs near its close, perhaps reveals the significance of the whole section. The day of Midian was God's great victory over a mighty horde through a weak human leader commanding a tiny force of soldiers without proper weapons (Jdg 6–7). Through things that are not, God brings to nothing the things that are, so that no flesh may glory in his presence (cf. 1Co 1:25–31).

1 For the historical background, see the introduction. It is clear from 2Ki 15:37 that the alliance of the two northern kings against Judah began before Jotham died. The challenge to the faith of Ahaz, therefore, came early in his reign and, given a different response from him, could have established him in a relationship of dependent trust on the Lord from the very beginning. The reference to Uzziah could form a studied link with 6:1, hinting at the undoubted spiritual connection between the two chapters. God's supreme kingship exalts him as sovereign, not only over Judah in the days of its earthly king's demise, but over Rezin, Pekah, and the great Assyrian monarch himself. Chapter 6 predicts unbelief; ch. 7 records its historical manifestation.

2 The designation of Ahaz as "the house of David" (cf. v.13) is most unusual. This phrase perhaps underlines the sin inherent in his fear and his failure to believe; for the security of David's house, to which he belonged, was guaranteed by the divine word (2Sa 7).

3 The name Shear-Jashub is, of course, symbolic (i.e., "a remnant will return"). If this name was given to him at birth, its choice may have been determined by the disclosure of the future given to the prophet at his call (6:13). There is a double ambiguity in it. It can suggest either warning or hope, and also either physical return from exile or spiritual return to God. Without doubt the element of warning is prominent in the present context.

The meeting place of prophet and king is precisely located, though we cannot now place it with certainty. An adequate water supply was imperative for a city under siege. The king was probably satisfying himself as to this or making arrangements for its improvement. He was therefore engaged in an activity directly related to the situation described in v.1, one that provided the setting for God's test of his faith and obedience.

4 How emphatic is Isaiah's exhortation! A verb commanding attention—"be careful"—is followed by three others counseling trust instead of fear. This is reinforced by the description of the two kings. Their anger may have been fierce, but there was little real fire left in them—they were virtually impotent.

5–6 There is a touch of contempt in the way the personal name of the usurper-elect is omitted (cf. "son of Remaliah"). "The son of Tabeel" cannot be identified with certainty, though, in view of the reference to "the house of David" (v.2), it seems most unlikely that he belonged to the authentic royal line of Judah.

7–9 The message of reassurance is clear. The rulers of the two small kingdoms to the north were but human beings; they could not stand against the decree of the sovereign Lord. Verse 8b is probably best viewed as a prophecy fulfilled in a series of events that included Tiglath-pileser's imminent invasion, the fall of Samaria to Sargon II, and eventually the racial mixture introduced to Ephraim by yet another Assyrian emperor, Esar-haddon, about sixty-five years after this oracle.

The verbs translated "stand firm in your faith" and "stand" are closely related in Hebrew. They would have stayed in the mind of Ahaz as a somber summary of the message he had received and rejected (cf. vv. 12–13, 17).

J. The Sign of Immanuel (7:10–25)

10–11 This oracle probably followed closely on the previous one, for it is related to the same situation. It implies that the earlier prophecy has been rejected or at least treated with noncommittal evasion by the king. If there had been even a spark of faith in Ahaz, God was willing to give it an opportunity of expression. He responded to Gideon's repeated request for a sign, even though it followed a clear revelation of his saving will (Jdg 6:14, 17–18, 38–40). Once again (cf. 9:4) a superior foe was threatening the nation. God went even further this time in his patience with human weakness, for he actually offered Ahaz the unrestricted choice of a sign. Reinforcement of such an overflowing gesture of grace hardly seems conceivable, and yet it is secured by the possessive pronoun "your," reminding him of his special relationship to God as the chosen king (cf. 2Sa 7:11–16).

12 Ahaz made his plans, but they did not include God or his will. His reply was a monumental piece of hypocrisy; he probably had Dt 6:16 in mind. It would be good to think that this reveals at least some small attempt earlier in his life to come to grips with this book, which the king was obliged to know and follow (cf. Dt 17:14–20).

13 Isaiah still addresses Ahaz as "house of David" (cf. v.2), with its implication of special promises and also of a continuing dynasty; but here he speaks of "my God" instead of "your God" (cf. v.11). The king may have been the current occupant of the divinely secured throne of David; but it was incumbent on him to hear the divine word through the prophet who, unlike him, was in a sensitive and responsive relationship with God. It was that relationship that made the king's rejection of the prophetic word a trial of God's patience and not simply a man's patience. God was weary of his unbelief.

14–17 This great passage is both important and difficult. Before suggesting a solution, it will be helpful to set out the main facts and problems that a satisfactory interpretation must come to grips with: (1) The mother and child must be seen as a sign to Ahaz. In fact, the reference to the house of David may suggest that the sign will be significant for the whole dynasty. (2) Why did Isaiah use the word almah ("virgin" NIV; "young woman," RSV; GK 6625), and what is its exact significance here? (3) Does the Hebrew perfect tense in v.14 mean "will be" (see NIV) or "is" or "has been"? (4) Does Immanuel mean "God is with us" or "God with us"? (5) What is the significance of curds and honey (cf. v.22)? (6) What does v.15 mean? Is the discrimination in view dietary or moral? What age is in view? (7) Verses 16–17 appear to relate to historical events that actually took place in the comparatively near future. If this is so, how can the child be simply equated with the Messiah? (8) The chapters that form the context of this passage contain a number of other references to children. Do any of these shed light on the Immanuel prophecy? (9) Why did the LXX translators use the unambiguous word parthenos ("virgin"; cf. Mt 1:23; GK 4221) to translate almah? (10) Can we gain any light from a study of the way Matthew handles other quotations from the OT?

Expressed briefly, the main question is: Can we find a solution that does full justice to the language of Isaiah and at the same time to Matthew's application of the prophecy to Christ? Most suggested solutions are inadequate. Neither the queen nor Isaiah's wife was a virgin, and there is no clear OT example of the use of almah for a married woman. It seems to be used consistently to designate a sexually mature but unmarried woman. There are considerable chronological difficulties that stand in the way of identifying the child with Hezekiah. It seems unlikely that Isaiah's wife would be designated "the prophetess" in 8:3 and yet be indicated so anonymously here. It also seems unlikely that mothers in general would be referred to by a singular noun with the definite article. Moreover, one would normally expect a sign to be more objective and specific than a general return to faith and hope among the people. If v.14 were not followed by vv.15–17, we could make a straightforward equation of Immanuel with the Messiah; but this context raises major problems. These verses certainly imply a close historical relationship between the child and the political situation of Isaiah's day.

The best view seems to be that the mother is a royal contemporary of the prophet, whose child's name would symbolize the presence of God with his people and who would foreshadow the Messiah in whom God would be incarnate. An unmarried young woman within the royal house would shortly marry and conceive. Her son would be called Immanuel ("God is with us"), probably in ignorance of the prophecy (which may have been given in the presence only of Ahaz) and possibly even as a presumptuous gesture to give the support of a complacent piety to the king's pro-Assyrian policy. Before the child is old enough to eat the characteristic solid food of the Land of Promise (and so well before the age of moral discretion), the Assyrians would lay waste the lands of Aram and Israel, which they did in 733–732 B.C., only a year or two after the prophecy was given.

The "sign" (GK 253) of the child, therefore, constitutes an indication that the all-sovereign and all-knowing God has the situation completely in hand, and it rebukes the king's lack of faith in him. It is true that the instrument of this devastation was to be Assyria, the very power Ahaz was courting instead of relying wholly on God. But in fact the events of 733–732 not only heralded the downfall in 722 of Samaria—the capital city of the northern kingdom that was a large part of the domain of the house of David in its earlier days—but within a generation led to the devastation of Judah itself (cf. 1:7).

This prophecy was given to the house of David and not simply to Ahaz ("you" in v.14 is plural). In the fullness of time, the messianic Child would be born of that house. He was to be a symbol of God's salvation of his people, not simply from physical foes like Rezin and Pekah, but ultimately from sin (cf. Mt 1:21). He represents the final purpose of God in his person as well as his work. For he is, in fullness of meaning, God with us; and his mother was a virgin at the time of her conception and not simply, as in the case of the earlier royal mother, at the time of the prophecy. Matthew's concept of fulfillment is wide-ranging and flexible and embraces many different kinds of correspondence between an OT passage and a NT event.

It is characteristic of Isaiah to introduce a messianic theme at a somewhat general level before spelling it out in unambiguously messianic terms (cf. 4:2; 42:1). This interpretation, therefore, enables us to see the passage as part of a wider pattern in the book. So Isaiah predicted the coming of a boy who would be a sign from God to his contemporaries and who would foreshadow Christ, in whom the terms of the prophecy would be fulfilled in fullest measure. In terms of his heavenly origin and his destiny of suffering, death, and burial—as well as his exaltation to the highest place, where he fills the whole universe (Eph 4:9–10)—the ultimate fulfillment in Christ of the sign given to Ahaz embraces the whole range of options presented to that king (Isa 7:11).

18–19 The phrase that v.17 ends with—"the king of Assyria"—should have struck terror in the heart of Ahaz. History has known few races equal to the Assyrians for sheer cruelty. An international scene dominated by thisferocious nation was a sure recipe for sleepless nights in the Fertile Crescent, and the prospect of invasion from that quarter presented the mind with an intolerable thought. Yet such was the fate that Ahaz was risking by his course of action! The prophet spelled out the consequences in graphic language.

Whistling for insects finds mention in a number of classical texts. To create a universe, God had only to speak; to gather his instruments of punishment, he had only to whistle. In the years that lay ahead, rulers in Judah would look to the Valley of the Euphrates and to Egypt for military help, but God warned Ahaz that both areas were to be viewed as sources, not of support, but of great danger for his people. Lest his reference to bees might make Ahaz think the invasion is to be somewhat selective and limited in its effect, the prophet pictured them settling in places that were not their normal habitat. Not since the day of Midian (cf. 9:4) had an invading force been so comprehensively and graphically pictured (cf. Jdg 6:1–6).

20 Isaiah passes with ease from one vivid picture to another. The old enemy Egypt recedes from the picture so that the spotlight may be turned on Assyria, the new and even more terrible oppressor that appears on the northeastern political horizon. Shaving, particularly of the beard, was a way of inflicting shame on a defeated foe (cf. 2Sa 10:4–5). The word "hired" seems peculiar till we realize that the Assyrians were well paid—in land and booty—for their trouble. It could also be an allusion to the king's own inducement to Assyria to come west, though not against him but against his northern enemies (2Ki 16:7–8).

21–22 In a passage otherwise dark with judgment, this picture incorporates some element of hope for the future. Judgment will devastate the land, but the survivors will find that small resources will yield adequate provisions (cf. 2Ki 4:1–7). In this way (cf. 6:13) the purpose of God for his people will continue—if only in a remnant. That "curds and honey" are spoken of in connection with a remnant and with a child who foreshadows the Messiah (see comments on 7:1–17) reinforces other evidence of a divinely purposed link between the two in the prophecies of Isaiah (see comments on 4:2; 42:1).

23–25 The devastation of the country—caused by human foes as instruments of God's judgment—will affect the whole economy of the land and will set civilization back a stage or two. The agricultural economy, symbolized by the vine, will be replaced by the pastoral, symbolized by cattle and sheep, and even by the regime of the hunter, symbolized by the bow and arrow. If the king carried away in his imagination a picture of a land covered with briers and thorns, then the message was getting through.

K. The Sign of Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz (8:1–10)

1–2 A large writing surface is in view, though its form or material is unspecified. Its size strongly suggests it was intended for public display, so that it conveyed a message and could be cited later as evidence when its prophecy was fulfilled. Its somber message of doom was to be interpreted a little later (cf. v.4). "Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz" probably means "quick to plunder, swift to the spoil" (NIV note). This particular Zechariah is unknown (the name was extremely common), but Uriah the priest is probably the king's ally and instrument in apostasy who is named in 2Ki 16:11. "Reliable witnesses" need not describe their character so much as their position as people of standing in the community.

3–4 Isaiah's wife is called "the prophetess" because she was his wife or because, as the one who bore children with prophetic names, she became involved in the communication of the message of God. It is less likely that she was a prophetess in her own right. If, as seems probable, the events of vv.1–4 are in chronological order, the time involved—including both the pregnancy and the inarticulate babyhood of the child—would be between eighteen months and two years. This would place the inscribed prophecy in 734 B.C., for Damascus was occupied and Samaria plundered (cf. 2Ki 15:29) by Tiglath-pileser III in 732 B.C.

5–8 Here, as he so often did, Isaiah moves from literal statement to vivid picture-language, setting contrasting metaphors side by side; then he suddenly changes the second metaphor to another to bring out a further aspect of the full truth. Naaman had contrasted Jordan with Abana and Pharpar, the rivers of Damascus (2Ki 5:12), and so had justified his initial rejection of God's way of giving him deliverance from his leprosy. The nation of Judah was more culpable than Naaman, for he had been a Gentile; and the contrast Isaiah used is much more impressive than that used by the Syrian general.

"The gently flowing waters of Shiloah" certainly refers to Jerusalem's means of water supply and probably to the channel that conveyed a slow-moving stream of water from the spring Gihon. It is not impossible that the location of Isaiah's encounter with Ahaz in 7:3 has determined the language here. The challenge to the faith of the king may have been delivered to him at a place that here symbolized the very confidence in God (cf. Ps 46:4–5) that he had rejected. Verse 6 shows in fact that the die was cast and the king and his people were committed to a course of trust in Assyria, not in God.

The NIV's "rejoices over," though a little free, brings out the almost certain meaning of the language. The people were whooping with delight at the prospect of the downfall of the two northern kings.

"The River" without further explanation in the OT is always the Euphrates (cf. Jos 24:15). The metaphor is immediately explained as "the king of Assyria with all his pomp," a genuine Isaianic touch (cf. 10:16; 16:14; 17:3–4). Rivers in flood are viewed ambivalently in areas where this natural phenomenon is important. Normal flooding benefits the ground and its produce; abnormal flooding threatens crops and, if extreme, the lives of the people. This exceptional inundation of foreign troops would move inexorably southward, not respecting the border between Israel and Judah. The deluge would almost—but not quite—submerge the whole nation, for above the neck was the head, Judah's capital, Jerusalem (cf. 1:7–9). Here again, then, in the midst of a terrifying threat of judgment, the remnant theme reminds us of God's continuing grace (cf. also 7:21–22).

The metaphor suddenly changes. It seems that the Assyrian army is no longer a river in flood but a predator of the sky (cf. Eze 17; Hos 8:1). But is this really what the prophet meant to convey? The outspread wings could belong to the Lord, so that the image is one of protection and not judgment, amplifying in this way the promise implicit in "reaching up to the neck." God's protection of the capital was the down payment of his ultimate purpose for the whole land. So the assurance contained in the name Immanuel (7:14; cf. 8:10) would be justified by events.

9–10 The rebellious confidence of v.6b and the confident taunt of vv.9–10 occupy different worlds. The former belongs to the world of trust in human alliances and weapons, the latter is the exultant cry of faith in God. God's purpose is proof against all that people or nations—any person or nation—can do. Not only human power but also human wisdom must fall before the power and wisdom of God (cf. 9:4–6; 1Co 1:24–27).

L. Isaiah and His Children as Signs and Wonders (8:11–18)

11 In some way related to the normal process of prophetic inspiration, the hand of the Lord was on the prophet. He was under a special, divine constraint. He may have been troubled at his increasing isolation from the people he was called to address with the word and who persisted in rejecting it (cf. 6:9–10; 8:8).

12–15 The word translated "conspiracy" (GK 8004) can mean "treaty" (cf. NIV note), but more likely means "conspiracy" here. But if God was speaking here of a conspiracy, who was under criticism? Isaiah and those who welcomed his message ("you" in v.13a is plural) were to epitomize the response all the people should have made to his message, for a deep reverence for God banishes fear of other human beings. The word for "sanctuary" (GK 5219) comes from the same root as "you are to regard as holy." God will himself be a holy place in the midst of his people (cf. Ex 40:34–38; Jn 1:14; Rev 21:3).

The prophet has already shown in his language that he regarded the division of the kingdom as a tragedy of divine judgment (7:17). Both houses will face further judgment from God because of their attitude in the present crisis, though the mention of Jerusalem suggests he has Judah chiefly in mind. Perhaps he takes the judgment of apostate Israel for granted.

Isaiah uses two analogies to picture this judgment. God is often described in the OT as a Rock (e.g., Dt 32:4, 15, 18; Pss 18:2; 71:3), normally with implications of shelter and refuge. Here the prophet turns this familiar figure against the people. God the Rock is for his people who trust him, but he is against those who refuse to believe. To them he will be either a boulder over which a person falls in the darkness or loose rock at the edge of a ravine. Isaiah has already pictured people under the divine hand of judgment having to become hunters again (7:24); now he speaks of God as the hunter, who uses bird-snares and spring-traps as foils for his victims.

It is impossible in English to convey the terrifying force of the seven Hebrew words that constitute v.15. We suggest the following: "They will stumble, many of them, they will fall, be smashed, snared, seized." The NT writers saw the ultimate object of faith to be Christ. Human beings reveal their attitude to God by their faith in Christ or by their rejection of him; so the NT writers applied this prophecy to him (Mt 21:44; Lk 2:34; Ro 9:33; 1Pe 2:8).

16–17 These verses are often taken to mean that the prophet turned from public ministry to concentrate on those gathered around him who had accepted his message. In this way God's face would be hidden in judgment from the mass of the people. In substance this interpretation is correct, but it should be recognized that "testimony" and "law" may refer to an actual document, the written record of the prophet's message. This record was sealed—possibly in the presence of witnesses (cf. 8:1–2)—so that it could not be altered.

God's hiding of his face implies judgment (see Hab 1:13). Although persistent rejection of God's word leads to its withdrawal (cf. 1Sa 28:6; Am 8:11–13), the prophet, who had welcomed that word and became its channel, reposed confidence in God and in the fulfillment of it. Presumably his prophetic activity ceased for a while, perhaps until after the overthrow of Rezin and Pekah, which would then confirm the word of God through him.

18 Meanwhile, Isaiah and his children, with their symbolic names, were an eloquent visible message from God. Like Immanuel (cf. 7:14), they were signs pointing beyond themselves to the Lord and his word. Perhaps it is best to view Isaiah and his disciples here as foreshadowing Christ and his church, especially as Christ himself was a prophet and his disciples, who formed the nucleus of the church, were themselves a remnant of Israel, committed to God's word in him whom others had rejected. Literally, Isaiah had only two children; figuratively, they included his disciples. This would make this passage somewhat uniform with 7:14–17, for in both Christ is presented in type. This means, then, that both the child Immanuel and Isaiah and his children constituted the same kind of sign (cf. 7:11, 14; 8:18).

M. The Light and the Child (8:19–9:7)

19–20 The law strictly forbade necromancy and other occult practices (cf. Lev 19:31; 20:6–7; Dt 18:9–14). The words "whisper and mutter" not only describe the low tones in which the occult practitioners gave their alleged messages but invite a contrast with the clear and distinct word of prophecy.

Verse 20 introduces the theme of divine light, which is important later in the passage. The true source of light is God's word, for God is himself light (10:17). The dawning light of God within a person provides its own evidence in the way God's word governs one's speech, if one professes to be God's mouthpiece.

21–22 The Assyrian invasions would bring an acute food shortage (cf. 3:1; 7:23–25). Hunger would foster anger, which the Israelites would blame, in part correctly, on their apostate king and, quite wrongly, on their God (cf. Rev 16:11, 21). As there is none from higher authority, they seek around them alleviation of their distress. The picture of total darkness here goes even beyond that in 5:30 and is comparable to 60:2, in a context that, like this, also promises new light from the God of grace.

9:1–2 Despite Israel's rejection of God's word through Isaiah (8:11, 17, 19–20), God plans to give his people light again. The humbling of the lands of Zebulun and Naphtali refers to the invasion and annexation of the northern parts of Israel by Tiglath-pileser III in 733/732 B.C. (see Introduction). "The way of the sea" almost certainly refers to Sharon or Philistia, while "Galilee of the Gentiles" is probably Gilead and southeast Syria. The Assyrians carved out three provinces for themselves from these areas. These lands, the first to feel the ominous tread of the warrior's boot (v.5), would be the first to see the new and great light God would focus on Israel (cf. 60:1–3; cf. Mt 4:15–16; Lk 1:79; Jn 8:12).

3–5 At this point the atmosphere of great joy that entered the prophecy at v.1 turns into exultant praise as the prophet, anticipating the people's own future joy in their God (cf. ch. 12), turns to address him. National enlargement probably presupposes conditions of peace and prosperity under the blessing of God. Both the farmer and the soldier have their times of joy at the climax of their work, and these provide illustrations of the joy that is to come to God's people.

"The day of Midian" has been rightly interpreted as the day of Midian's defeat. The Bible is full of pregnant phrases that contain great power of suggestion. The appropriateness of this phrase can be clearly seen when we recall the historical situation: a vast multitude of the enemy swarming all over the land (Jdg 6:1–6; cf. Isa 8:7–8); the giving of a sign (Jdg 6:17–22; cf. Isa 7:11–14); the emphasis on faith in God and not dependence on human beings (Jdg 7; cf. Isa 7:9; 8:12); and, perhaps, the defeat of great forces through apparently insignificant means (three hundred men in the case of Gideon, and the child of promise here). Most of all the passage promises total redemption by the Lord. Israel is to be utterly delivered from the oppressor (cf. 10:5; 14:25; and esp. 10:24–27).

Isaiah pictures the resultant peace in vivid pictures. The boot of the soldier that had tramped across Israel's territory and his garment impregnated with the blood of the dead when he lay down to sleep would be as obsolete as the sword (2:4).

6–7 The word "child" is in a position of emphasis. The first person plural "us" suggests a link with 7:14. Just as the theme of the Branch of the Lord (see comment on 4:2) becomes more and more explicitly messianic, so it is with the motif of the child. If the child of Isa 7:14–16 typifies the ultimate divine Christ, the child of these verses is that Christ. It is true that monarchs of the Near East often received exaggerated adulation from their subjects, especially at their enthronement and at subsequent kingdom renewal ceremonies. This is not Mesopotamia, however, but Judah, and Hebrew prophecy was founded on truth, not flattery. The prophets did not hesitate to speak stern words of judgment to their political overlords.

This passage does not necessarily imply that the child is to be a boy-king. In fact, Isaiah may not have regarded that as a blessing (cf. 3:4, 12). The context says much about children, so the child is spoken of in terms of his birth. The tenderness of the child also suggests a comparison with the defeat of Midian's army by Gideon's small band of men (Jdg 6–7), a comparison reinforced by the dual reference to the shoulder (cf. v.4).

The KJV has a comma after "Wonderful," but it seems likely that the prophet intends us to understand that the child has four names, not five. The first two suggest divine wisdom and power, for the word translated "wonderful" (GK 7099) has overtones of deity. The last two set forth the ends he accomplished by the exercise of these attributes—his fatherly care of his people and the bringing of peace with all its attendant blessings. In the context this quartet of names comes to its climax with "Prince of Peace." Its implications are spelled out in v.7.

The word "increase" (GK 5269) combined with the phrase "his [i.e., David's] kingdom" suggest that the prophecy has in view much more than a particularly great king of Judah (cf. 2Sa 7:12–16). David's kingdom went well beyond this; in fact, its boundary extended far beyond the traditional "Dan to Beersheba" limits of Canaan proper (2Sa 8). The language here is reminiscent of that pre-Davidic ruler of Jerusalem, Melchizedek (Ge 14:18). The harmonious linking of peace and righteousness occurs again, with more detail, in 11:1–9.

Since the beginning of ch. 7, the prophet has been making the most amazing disclosures in the name of the Lord; and these have come to a great climax in these two verses. Both the advent of the Messiah and the blessing of his people, the remnant of Israel, are guaranteed by "the zeal of the LORD" (cf. 37:32).

N. The Judgment of Ephraim (9:8–10:4)

The threat of Syria and Ephraim/Israel against Judah and the associated Assyrian move against the petty states of the Mediterranean seaboard form the background to everything from the beginning of ch. 7; so an oracle against Israel is not out of place here. Moreover, the prophecy of the child's universal reign on the throne of David (v.7) would remind the reader of the defection of the northern tribes (cf. 7:17; 11:13). This oracle stresses God's coming judgment because the northern kingdom was continuing its impenitent rebellion against the Lord.

8–12 The word of God has great power. Isaiah views its painful descent on Israel. National pride is usually most arrogant in a capital city. From the heart of the country, Samaria's citizens refused to take the fall of the northern provinces to the Assyrians (cf. 9:1) as more than a temporary setback in the building of a greater and a richer land. In city and garden, the merely adequate that had succumbed to judgment through foreign armies were to be replaced by the superior.

Ephraim may well have discovered that in a foreign alliance a nation shares not only its ally's resources but also its foes. The word "Aramean" is applicable more widely than to the citizens of Aram proper, the country over which Rezin reigned; and it may here designate enemies on his borders. The specific events referred to in vv.11–12 cannot be fully identified. Isaiah was fond of conveying the concept of judgment by using figurative language for eating (cf. 5:14; 9:20). The refrain in v.12b presents the fearful thought that the judgment already described does not exhaust the manifestation of God's wrath against his sinful people.

13–17 The Lord's judgment is both retributive and restorative in purpose when directed against his people. Isaiah's two illustrations here embrace the whole nation, both the honored and the insignificant. The prophet makes it clear that although the nation was being led astray by its leaders and its false prophets, and the guilt of these was therefore great, nobody was without blame. Even the fatherless and widows, the socially disadvantaged, must share in the judgment; for the contagion of godlessness had spread throughout the whole nation. The order of "ungodly" and "wicked" suggests that the first was the cause of the second (cf. Ro 1:18).

18–21 Both the Bible and experience teach that wickedness unchecked spreads like wildfire, and this is precisely what Isaiah indicates here. The reference to "a column of smoke" (v.18) suggests that the acrid stench of wickedness reaches the nostrils of God, which provides a transition to the different use of the same analogy in v.19. Here it is not wickedness but divine wrath that causes the blaze. In both cases the undergrowth and the forest trees represent the people. The spreading flame of sin is followed in its turn by the fire of God's judgment, with perhaps just a suggestion of the punishment fitting the crime. "Briers" and "thorns" give us the impression that in the prophet's mind they stood for the consequences of sin (cf. Ge 3:18).

In vv.11–12 the prophet describes the attacks made on Israel by her external enemies. From the end of v.19, the more terrible picture of civil war takes over. The tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim should have been particularly close to each other, for they were both descendants of the sons of Joseph (Ge 48). The first civil war in Israel, however, was fought between the Gileadites of Manasseh and the men of Ephraim in the days of Jephthah (Jdg 12:1–6). Those who would not unite through a common sympathy sometimes did join together to pour out their hatred and jealousy against Judah. Both the earlier and later contexts (i.e., vv.18–19, 21b) suggest that this civil strife was to be viewed as a judgment from God.

10:1–4 Verse 1 suggests that the ruling class in Israel had devised a legal system that departed significantly from the Mosaic standard. The phrase "the oppressed of my people" expresses the affront to God's special relationship with the whole people that this evil legislation constituted. It may well have consisted largely in oppressive land laws (cf. 5:8–10). This phrase suggests the coming of a day of divine reckoning when possession of ill-gotten wealth would make some Israelites the sure objects of wrath.

The picture of cringing prisoners is so true to life, for there are few who can walk erect on their way to prison camp after defeat in war. It is possible, too, that Isaiah suggested that they were trying to avoid notice (cf. 2:10, 21) in order to escape death. The refrain that has occurred at various points in this oracle is truly terrifying in its climactic position. If even physical death does not satisfy the fierce anger of this holy God, what dread punishment lies beyond the grave?

O. The Judgment of Assyria (10:5–19)

The date of this oracle is not easy to determine, but Carchemish (v.9) was not captured till 717 B.C. This was about two years before the death of Ahaz; so the oracle could have been delivered within his reign, like most of the other oracles in chs. 7–12. A date in Hezekiah's reign is also possible, of course.

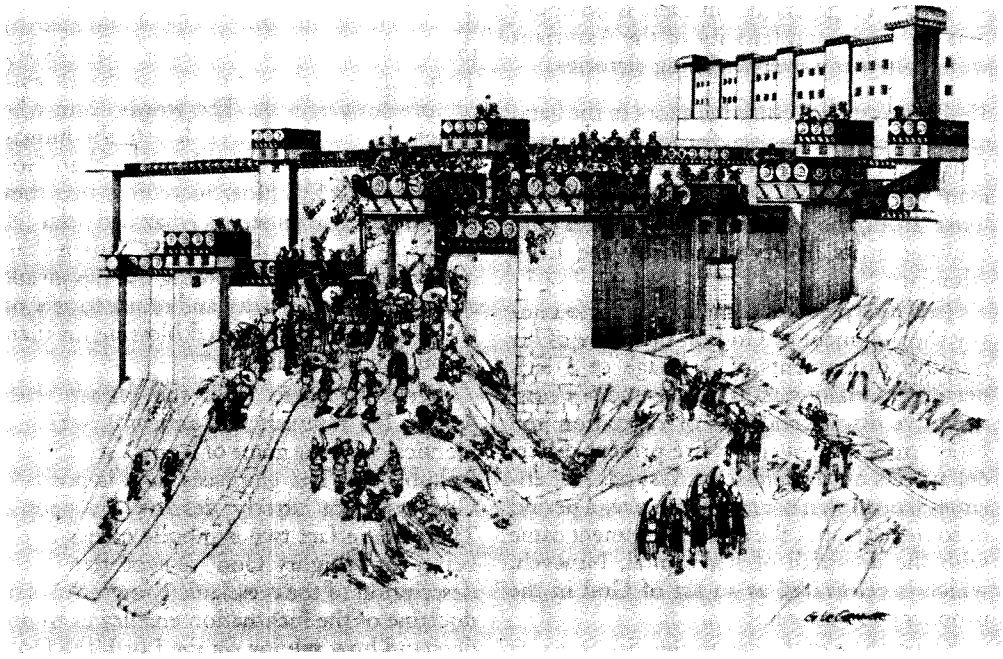
5–11 The emotional interjection "woe," with which v.1 also began, prepares us for the disclosure of Assyria's judgment in vv.12–19. Isaiah tends from time to time to anticipate a God-honoring denouement in this way. This oracle clearly relates in its theme to the preceding one (cf. 9:12, 17, 21; 10:4). God uses instruments to manifest his wrath in the judgment of his people. Assyria was the chief instrument God used in Isaiah's day. The word "godless" (GK 2868) must have been as shocking as the names "Sodom" and "Gomorrah" to those who were fastidious and even excessive in their observance of religious ritual (1:10–17). In fact, the lack of a specific reference to Judah may even have led Isaiah's hearers to think that he was speaking of some other nation, till the context put his meaning beyond doubt. The simile "like mud" (v.6) may be due to Isaiah's conviction that Judah has become spiritually and morally worthless (cf. Mt 5:13).

We have been given a glimpse into the mind of God; now we see the mind of Assyria. The two minds are at one only as to the acts of war themselves, not as to the ultimate purpose of those acts. Assyria and its boastful monarchs certainly had no intention of serving the punitive ends of the God of Israel; rather, they sought conquest and territorial expansion for their own glory. Verses 8–11 anticipate v.12, with its reference to the king of Assyria, though in fact the cities mentioned in v.9 were overcome by a series of Assyrian monarchs. Calno and Arpad, both in northern Syria, were taken in 738, Damascus in 732, Samaria in 722, and Hamath on the Orontes in 720 B.C. The ancient Hittite city of Carchemish on the upper Euphrates was vanquished in 717 B.C.

The king of Assyria's boastful rhetoric (vv.10–11) must have seemed quite irrefutable to the people of his day. In fact, Samaria had not withstood the might of his armies any more than the pagan cities, and Jerusalem ruled over an even smaller kingdom. It was a sad fact that neither the northern nor southern kingdom was without idols (cf. 2:8, 20). What the Assyrian had not realized was the special purpose of God for his people, especially his determination to deliver Jerusalem.



This drawing by Gert LaGrance, based on Assyrian reliefs, depicts an Assyrian attack on a town in Judah. A seige ramp was constructed against the wall and the infantry stormed the wall, while archers kept shooting arrows at the defenders. Courtesy Lachish Excavations.

The gods of the pagans were mere vanities, but the Lord was the living God (37:4).

12 This verse sums up the theology of this great oracle. God has two ends to fulfill in relation to Assyria. He will punish one nation through her and punish her through another, though the latter nation is not specified nor even hinted at here. The phrase "his work" (GK 5126) stands in strong contrast to the expression "my hand" in v.10. This may be God's "strange work" (cf. 28:21–22), but it is his work nevertheless; and Assyria is his agent for its accomplishment. Isaiah's special stress on the holiness and majesty of God made it inevitable that he would launch constant attacks on human pride.

13–14 Strength and wisdom were widely recognized as vital qualities for anyone in authority, especially for a king. The messianic King has them through the endowment of God's Spirit (11:2; cf. 9:6), but the Assyrian monarch boasted of them as his own. The removal of national boundaries and the consequent mixing of peoples was an Assyrian policy in the lands that they conquered (cf. 2Ki 17:6, 24). The picture of absolute power and total helplessness in v.14 may have been somewhat exaggerated, but there is no doubt that the might and ferocity of the Assyrians won them many overwhelming victories.

15–19 Assyria is pictured as a tool in the hand of the forester to be used for felling the trees. Isaiah uses logic to expose and to ridicule human sin. The tool or instrument breaking loose from the control of its master and exulting in its liberty is held by the Lord Almighty.

Two new pictures come into view to convey the judgment of God on the pride of his punitive instruments. The image of a sick person gradually wasting away under a consumptive disease and that of vegetation and forest trees destroyed by fire present different aspects of the demise of Assyria. Her enemies wore down her resistance over a period of some years, but the decisive moment came with the downfall of her capital, Nineveh, which is celebrated as an act of God in the prophecy of Nahum

The picture of the destroying fire contains two notable features. (1) Isaiah uses the word kabod ("pomp," v.16; "splendor," v.18 [GK 3883]). God's own unique "glory" (see 6:3) has been revealed to Isaiah. None other may boast of his own splendor in the light of that. (2) The prophet does not tell us simply that the Lord will light the fire of judgment; instead, he declares that the Light of Israel will become a fire (v.17). God remains eternally the same, but humans may experience now one consequence of a particular divine attribute, now another. He is the Light of his people, and one day he will be the source of light for all the nations (cf. 2:1–5; 60:1–3); but here that Holy Light is felt by an arrogant conqueror as a fire of judgment. A torch was an agent of both light and heat.

Yet even in the midst of such judgment, there is a hint of hope, so characteristic of Isaiah's prophecies. God planned a devastating judgment for Assyria but, amazingly—for this is not Israel but a Gentile nation—not total obliteration. If Israel was to be left a remnant for the fulfillment of God's purposes for her, so too was Assyria! In this way we are prepared for the astounding revelation in 19:23–25.

P. The Deliverance of the Lord's Remnant (10:20–34)

20–23 The eschatological phrase "in that day" introduces some verses dominated by the doctrine of the "remnant" (GK 8637). That phrase also connects these verses with the previous passage. The words "him who struck them down" here denote the human instrument of God's wrath rather than God himself (cf. 9:13). How incredible that they should put their trust—as Ahaz had done (cf. 2Ki 16:7–9)—in a nation whose known character could guarantee nothing but rapine and almost inhuman cruelty and refuse to rely on the God who had lavished blessing on them throughout their history!

Verse 21 opens with the phrase shear yashub ("a remnant will return"), which is identical with the name of Isaiah's son (Shear-Jashub, 7:3). The emphasis here is positive. God will not utterly destroy his people. There are in fact two symbolic names in the verse, for "Mighty God" is evocative of the description of the messianic King in 9:6. The doctrine of the incarnation enables us to understand how relying on the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, can be equated with returning to the messianic King, whose name was "Mighty God." Here then the two great Isaianic doctrines of the remnant and the Messiah come together.

Verse 22 links the remnant doctrine with that which it appears to negate but which in fact in the purpose of God it guarantees—the promise to the patriarchs that their seed would be many (cf. Ge 22:17; 32:12). The reader has been prepared for this reminder of the promise by the name Jacob in vv.20–21. The promise could and sometimes did induce complacency (cf. Mt 3:9–10; Jn 8:33–40), for Satan takes even the Scriptures God gave as a blessing and interprets them to serve his purposes of error and damnation (cf. Mt 4:6; 2Pe 3:15–16).

Verses 22b–23 are particularly somber in their tone. God is described by titles of power; this fact—in combination with the reiterated word "decreed"—makes the threatened destruction truly terrifying, for it is sovereign and irrevocable. The great Euphrates produced one "overwhelming" (same word translated "swirling over" in 8:8) flood of judgment through the Assyrians, who overcame Israel, and another in the Babylonians, who brought Judah's kingdom to its end. These nations were wicked, but God used them as instruments of his righteous judgment.

24–27 The emphasis on God's power continues as the prophet uses the same divine titles as in v.23. This time, however, his power was to be directed to the salvation rather than the judgment of his people. Other parts of the country may feel the tread of Assyria's fearful host (cf. 9:1; 10:28–32), but Zion will be secure (cf. Ps 46).

The references to the "rod," the "club," and the "yoke" remind us of 9:4–7, with its promises of defeat for the strong enemy and of the peaceful government of the Child born to be king. The King is not here, but the deliverance is. Historical parallels are drawn with the vanquishing of Midian. The death of the two Midianite leaders at Oreb (cf. Jdg 7:25) was perhaps the decisive moment in the later stages of the battle, for an army in flight without leaders cannot regroup and counterattack. On both occasions Israel was greatly outnumbered, but her trust in God was shown by him to be well-founded. So would it again!

Verse 25 may be compared with 40:1–2. God's wrath against his people was real; but because they were his people, the foreign scourge would be used against them only for a limited time. God would call a halt and would then punish his unwitting instrument for its sin (cf. 10:12–19). Once again we encounter one of Isaiah's favorite figures, the bearing of a heavy burden (see at 1:4, 14). Israel was like a slave carrying a heavy burden or like a domestic animal yoked and laden. So there would be an Assyrian captivity, but it would be ended by divine action. "The yoke will be broken because you have grown so fat" may picture Israel as an animal so large that the yoke will not fit it. So she cannot be fully subdued by the enemy.

28–32 The processes by which the OT prophets were given their messages are known to us only in part, but we are aware that the vision was one important medium used by the inspiring Spirit. The superbly dramatic appeal to the imagination in these verses suggests a visionary provenance. Perhaps the prophet in his imagination was standing on the city walls looking northward and seeing the inexorable advance of the Assyrian army through places within and just beyond his normal range of sight. For sheer drama these verses have little to equal them in the prophets, except in Nahum.

Isaiah 36:2 tells us that the Assyrian army actually came to Jerusalem from Lachish, from almost exactly the opposite direction. Possibly some tactical situation arose that caused the Assyrian army to make a circuit around the city from Lachish, finally approaching it from the north. The history of warfare contains many parallel examples.

33–34 After the advance, the counterattack! The divine title of power, "the LORD Almighty," occurs no less than five times in this chapter. This is striking in a section of the prophecy where the mighty and ferocious Assyrian enemy is never far from sight, for it underlines the infinite superiority of the true God over even the greatest of nations.

The Assyrian hosts appear like an advancing forest. Suddenly the divine Forester begins to attack undergrowth, boughs, whole trees, and even the mighty cedars of Lebanon. The pride of Assyria (cf. v.13) caused it to become an example of the general principle laid down by God (cf. ch. 2): those who have great pride are always riding for a fall (cf. Pr 16:18).

Q. The Davidic King and His Peaceful Reign (11:1–9)

The messianic theme reappears, having been out of sight since 9:7; it is taken up at precisely the point where it was left before, because the Davidic throne is implied in the reference to Jesse, David's father, and the effective zeal of the Lord Almighty in the richly empowering Spirit of the Lord.

1–3a At the end of ch. 10 the axe of divine judgment fell on the forestlike army of Assyria; at the opening of ch. 11 the purpose of divine grace is seen in the growth of a shoot from the stump of Jesse. The reduction of the Davidic dynasty to a mere stump is a true metaphor for its condition when Christ was born; for, though still in existence, that dynasty had been without royal power for nearly six hundred years. The reference to Jesse—who was of course never king—rather than to David may point to the total absence of royal dignity in the house of David when the Messiah would come. But there was still life in the house, for God's purpose (cf. 2Sa 7:16) had not been set aside (cf. Eze 21:27). The Branch (see 4:2; 6:13) is now fully messianic. God's people need more than the promise of fertile land or of continued national life through the remnant. They need the very incarnation of God's life in the Messiah.

The Assyrian monarch had boasted of his own power and wisdom (10:8–14; cf. 14:12–14), but the supreme King will be equipped for his work by the Spirit of the Lord. There are links between this passage and 9:6. The earlier passage shows the King to be divine, while this exhibits his dependence, a combination that requires the Incarnation for its explanation. Solomon, Jesse's grandson—who might have seemed to be the fulfillment of the hope of "great David's greater son" and who was endowed with wisdom by God—might have seemed at first to be an expression of this hope in the earlier history of the people; but he fell far short of the divine ideal expressed in Dt 17:14–20, because he did not fear the Lord with an undivided heart (cf. 1Ki 11:1–13).

It may be that the basic description "the Spirit of the LORD" followed by three pairs of qualities attributed to the Spirit is intended to add up to a symbolical seven (cf. the seven "woes" of 5:8, 11, 18, 20, 21, 22; 6:5). If so, the symbolism would suggest that the Messiah was to be perfectly endowed by the Spirit with everything requisite to his kingly task (cf. Rev 5:6).

3b–5 The act of pronouncing judgment in the court is often treated in the OT as the acid test of a wise and incorruptible use of authority (cf. 5:21–23; Ps 72:1–4). Verse 3b does not mean that right judgment ignores evidence available to the senses but rather that it requires inner qualities of character (cf. Jn 2:25; 7:24). The word "judge" (GK 9149) has an ominous ring to us; but when used of the poor, it is almost synonymous with salvation (Pss 72:2; 82:2–4). Where there is corruption in the law courts, it is the poor who long for a righteous judge. The reiterated word "earth" also signifies "land." The rule of the messianic King is to be over Israel but also over the whole world (9:7; cf. 11:10).

In the divine economy, the word is active and powerful (cf. Ge 1:3; Isa 55:10–11), and the Messiah's word of judgment will be utterly effective (cf. Jn 12:48). He judges as "the Word of God" (Rev 19:13–15). This testifies to his great power (cf. v.2), because he is well able to execute the judgments he pronounces. In him word and consequent action are virtually one.

In the Near Eastern dress styles, the belt or sash was the garment that gave stability to the whole ensemble; and to dress oneself with the belt was to prepare for work. The Messiah would be prepared in character for his work of judgment.

6–9 Biblical eschatology may involve more than the simple restoration of conditions as they were in the unfallen world, but it certainly includes this (cf. Ge 1:26–28; Ps 8; 1Co 15:25–28; Heb 2:5–9). It is not now Adam who is to be king of the world but the messianic King. In his reign nature will be at peace with itself and with human kings. We know something of the effects of the Fall on human kings and on plant life (Ge 3:17–18); no doubt animal life—bound with the human race and the plants in the unity of a world-wide ecosystem—must have been affected also.

The normal prey of the fierce predators need have no fear of them under the Messiah's reign. Significantly, the calf is the most vulnerable to the lion and the fatted yearling the most desirable; yet the prophecy puts them together. The predators will so respect the lordship of humans, given to them before the Fall (Ge 1:28), that even the little child will command respect and, perhaps, will act responsibly and with benevolence toward the predators like a shepherd leading his flock.

The ecological issues are touched on in v.7, with its implied reference to Ge 1:30. Any adaptation of the ecosystem involved will presumably be a restoration of the world to its unfallen condition (cf. Isa 65:25).

Genesis 3 presents the serpent as human beings' first enemy within the animal kingdom. Thus, v.8 moves beyond vv.6–7. Venomous snakes will not harm children even when their play temporarily robs the snakes of their access to the world outside their homes. The instinct of self-preservation is deep in every creature; so this scene exhibits peace, trust, and harmony.

As a result of the taming of nature, Mount Zion, the holy mountain of God (v.9), will know a comprehensive peace and security that remind us of the comprehensive promises in 4:5–6. The breadth of the Messiah's reign (cf. 9:7) means, however, that the peace and security of Jerusalem will be a microcosm of a much wider blessing, because of the references to the sea here and to the nations in v.10. The restoration of human beings to God that is implied in "the knowledge of God" reverses the alienation introduced by the Fall, so making possible the restoration of their environment to its unfallen condition.

R. The Nation and the Nations (11:10–16)

10–11 In 5:26 God raised a banner to summon a nation as one of his instruments of judgment on his people, while here the messianic King has an attractive power that brings the peoples of the world together, just as the Lord himself attracts the nations in darkness to his marvelous light in 60:1–3. In 2:1–4 it was the word of God that had drawing power; here it is the Christ.

The eschatological phrase "in that day" relates this messianic teaching to the end times. Like most OT writers, Isaiah had a lively sense of the special importance of the Exodus from Egypt, when God had stretched out his hand to deliver his people. Isaiah looks forward to a time that will see an event comparable with it in redemptive significance. This will contrast with the Exodus, for those who return will be the remnant of a larger people, while it was the greatly enlarged family of Jacob that left Egypt under Moses. The events will also differ because this time the people will not move together as a body from one point of departure but will come together from many lands and various points of the compass. Instead of going forth under a great leader, they will come together seeking a greater leader still.

The places referred to, with one exception, are located near the two great river-systems that have acted as mothers of civilization in the Near East: the Tigris-Euphrates and the Nile. The addition, however, of the phrase "the islands of the sea" is surprising. The word "island" occurs frequently in Isa 40–66 and appears to designate the Mediterranean maritime areas. The only reference to a dispersion of Jews in this area is in Joel 3:6. The considerable western dispersion in NT times is anticipated here by the Holy Spirit.

12–14 After a brief prose interlude (vv.10–11), the exalted poetry of the prophet is resumed. Isaiah first summarizes the thought of the two prose verses in poetic form, making it clear that by "his people" (v.11) he has Judah primarily in mind, even though "Assyria" may have suggested an application also to Ephraim. The Davidic dynasty had of course been associated exclusively with Judah for many centuries, ever since the division of the kingdom (cf. 7:17). The reference to Assyria (v.11) finds its explanation in v.13. Northern Israelites will also return, and the once-divided nation will be united. It had been torn apart through the sin of one of David's sons (1Ki 11:11); it would be reunited under David's Greater Son.

David's rule had extended well beyond the bounds of the territory of the Twelve Tribes (2Sa 8). Ephraim and Judah would make common cause against the Philistines, taking advantage of their location in the hill country to move down the slopes of the Shephelah, west of the Judean mountains, against the Philistines on the coastal plain. The three neighboring nations to the east and southeast would come under subjection again to Judah.

15–16 The nations mentioned in v.14 were small and insignificant when compared with the great militarist regimes of Egypt and Mesopotamia. God's hand of power would be stretched forth in fulfillment of his purposes for his people in both areas. He had dried up the water of the Red Sea before; he would act again to dry it up. He had used a great wind (Ex 14:21) at the Exodus; he would do so again to bring the people back from Mesopotamia, for the wind would produce there a delta not unlike that at the mouth of the Nile. The highway promised may contain an allusion to Ex 14:26–29, the dry road through the Red Sea; or it may mean that God will bring them back safely across the desert that stretched between Mesopotamia and the Mediterranean seaboard (cf. 35:8).

S. A Song of Joyous Praise (12:1–6)

Chapter 12 forms a fitting climax for this whole section. The preceding chapters have said much about the sins of God's people, warning them of the divine wrath and judgment that was sure to follow. They have also recorded God's declaration of forgiving grace for the penitent, the challenge to believe, and predictions of a glorious future for God's people. God's great name would be exalted, and his king would reign. Nothing could be more appropriate than a heartfelt psalm of praise to round off this section of the prophecy.

1–3 In ch. 11, the expression "in that day" introduces two verses (11:10–11) that focus on the Messiah and the remnant—and thus on the great final purposes of God for his people. This psalm of praise anticipates the feelings of his people when that great day comes. Isaiah pictures the nation like someone suffering under God's wrath because of rebellion against God (1:5–6). Though once united in sin and its divinely imposed consequences, the nation here engages as a body in one great act of thanksgiving (cf. Isaiah's proclamation of God's forgiveness to the people in the Babylonian exile in 40:1–5; 43:25, anticipating the sweet comfort of pardon they were to know at the end of their history).

The prophet's language here takes up words from the Song of Moses in Ex 15, so that Israel's first and final expressions of corporate praise are here brought together. The words "The LORD is my strength and my song; he has become my salvation" are almost identical in the Hebrew to two other verses (Ex 15:2; Ps 118:14). Isaiah's double use of "the LORD" is appropriate because the people's trust in the Lord stands in strong contrast to the unbelief of Ahaz and his trust in Assyria (cf. 7:1–9; 2Ki 16:7–18).

The assertion that God is or has become the salvation of his people goes perhaps a little further than a simple statement that he has effected deliverance for them. It is as if his person has taken color from his work; the person and the work belong together so that the one can hardly be conceived without the other (cf. 1Co 1:30). To "the song of Moses, the servant of God" is added "the song of the Lamb" (Rev 15:3–4), for salvation receives its deeper meaning through him.

When it is said that he is "my strength and my song," the reader is made aware that this God is now everything to his people. Not only do they rely on him for strength, but they have abandoned all other trust. The prophet had been warned that the people would be spiritually unresponsive (6:9–10). In the future day that Isaiah visualizes, however, trust in God the Savior will be so complete as to banish all fear. Not only will the Lord receive all their faith; he will be the sole object of their praise. The redeemed have nothing else to sing about and yet everything to sing about when their song is of him.

Isaiah has already used the imagery of water to symbolize divine supplies that are totally reliable and can be trusted (8:6). The waters of Shiloah flowing gently and yet constantly into the city are replaced by wells of salvation from which the believing people may keep on drawing with joy. The figure suggests constant recourse on their part and constant provision on his.

4–6 The proclamation to all the nations that the Lord's name is exalted is typical of Isaiah (cf. 2:2–3, 11, 17; cf. Ac 2:21, 33; 3:13–16). With v.5, we find ourselves back in Ex 15:2, but without the references to horses, horsemen, and the sea. The truth is that the Exodus will be eclipsed by an even greater disclosure of God's power (Isa 53:1). It will therefore take its place at the beginning of a whole sequence of divine saving acts that may now be celebrated retrospectively in their totality. It will not be enough now that the people praise his name simply in the presence of one another. The whole world must know what he has done so that his name may be exalted in all the earth.

The universalism of these verses is now modified by a form of particularism. The song being sung celebrates God's forgiving grace and saving deeds for his own people, Zion. The pardoning grace of God is the source of many blessings, but none is more wonderful than his presence with his people. That presence was promised and sealed in the child Immanuel (cf. 7:14; 8:10, 18). Here its realization is celebrated and extolled by his people. The presence of God among his people is no contradiction of his transcendent uniqueness and separateness, expressed in the phrase "the Holy One of Israel." He is distinct but not aloof, for in him holiness and grace find their perfect union.

II. God and the Nations (13:1–23:18)

The Israelites were separated from the nations by God to be his own special people. They did not, however, live in isolation but were placed at the most strategic crossroads of the world. Here they were brought into contact with many other peoples—especially the world powers of Mesopotamia and the Nile, who could only engage each other in trade or in conflict by taking a route through or very near Israel's territory.

In the time of Isaiah, the international scene was dominated by the cruel and aggressive Assyrians, who were ruled by a succession of ambitious monarchs. Such a situation left a buffer state with only two options: submission or a protective alliance. This formed the general political context for Isaiah's prophetic ministry. Chapters 1–12 relate the kind of message he brought to Judah from the Lord. Foreign foes were instruments of God's judgment on his people for their sins. They were not to seek relief in alliances but were to trust in the Lord himself.

The international situation brought Judah into contact with virtually all the other states of the Fertile Crescent; and it is most appropriate that oracles declaring the destiny of each should be grouped together at this point. Every state lived under the threat of Assyria and sought its own way of handling it. Each would have to face judgment. If Judah and Jerusalem, God's own people, faced judgment—but not extinction—through Assyria (so chs. 1–12), it is inconceivable that these pagan nations should escape. These judgments were in effect anticipations of those universal judgments that, along with the ultimate deliverance of the sons of Jacob, are set forth in chs. 24–27 as a climax to the oracles against the nations. Thus the divine holiness revealed to Isaiah in his temple vision in ch. 6 was to be expressed in judgment on Judah, her neighbors, and the whole universe.

A. Prophecy Against Babylon (13:1–14:23)

This "oracle concerning Babylon," has been the focus of much scholarly attention. Many modern scholars have been reluctant to accept it as an authentic utterance of Isaiah, assigning it to the sixth century B.C., shortly before the taking of Babylon by Cyrus the Great of Persia. However, the only historical context that is fully appropriate for it is 701 B.C., when the various peoples mentioned in chs. 13–23 were all involved in anti-Assyrian coalitions. The attempt of Babylon to get Judah involved in such a coalition almost certainly lies behind ch. 39.

Jeremiah 50–51 makes use of phraseology and ideas from Isa 13–14 and applies them to the fall of the Neo-Babylonian empire. In Jer 50:17–18, the prophet declared that the kings of Assyria and Babylon, having a common guilt in relation to Israel, would share a common punishment. There are really only two principles of organization for a society: the Babylonian principle (antagonism toward God) and the Jerusalem principle (submission to his purposes). The Babylonian principle is to be seen right through 13:1–14:27.

It is really unnecessary to transfer almost all of these two chapters to Assyria, as some have suggested. The events of 701 B.C. may have provided the historical conditions for this oracle, yet this does not require that all or most of it was fulfilled in the downfall of Assyria. If we accept supernatural foreknowledge in a prophet, Isaiah's prophecy may been given in one historical era and fulfilled in another. We will therefore expound the oracle as a prediction of the downfall of the Neo-Babylonian empire and its monarch, uttered by Isaiah at the close of the eighth century, and so intended as a warning to Hezekiah and Judah not to put their trust in coalitions against Assyria inspired by Babylon (cf. ch. 39).

1 The use of a surname or a patronymic may serve the end of designating a person with some precision. In view of the denial by most modern scholars that Isaiah, son of Amoz, had any part in prophecies concerning Babylon, we may see a special evidential purpose in its use here.

2–5 Imagination's curtain is drawn aside and a bare hilltop is disclosed, surmounted by a banner (cf. 5:26; 11:12; 18:3; et al.). A shout and a gesture are added so that the army will be mustered with urgency. The phrases "a bare hilltop" and "the gates of the nobles" suggest a contrast between the remote areas from which the army comes and the sophisticated urban civilization that they will destroy. Like the Assyrians (cf. 10:5), this army is the Lord's instrument. "Holy" here implies only that the persons so designated have been set apart by the Lord for his purpose—in this instance, punitive destruction.

The single shout of command is replaced by a tumultuous roar. It is the sound of human voices in such numbers and such volume that words are indistinguishable. The references to kingdoms, nations, and faraway lands would fit the armies of each of the successive world powers from Assyria through Babylon to Persia; but the mention of the Medes in v.17 plus the use of words like "hilltop" and "mountains" suggest that the army was being massed on the great Iranian plateau. "The ends of the heavens" probably refers to the distant horizons and so to the "faraway lands" from which the Medes came. The appropriateness of Isaiah's selection of designations for God can be seen in his use of "LORD Almighty" here.

The opening verses of the oracle have made it clear that the armies are the instruments of the Lord and that they are coming to execute his wrathful judgment on the whole land.

6–8 The "day of the LORD" is a frequent prophetic theme that emphasizes the certainty and decisiveness of the Lord's historical judgment in the future. It may be conceived in local or in universal terms. The Lord will expound his great name of power in terms of destruction when the day of his judgment dawns.

In vv.7–8 the prophet piles up expression after expression to convey the sense of fear that would overwhelm the objects of God's judgment. The phrase "their faces aflame" comes as something of a surprise, for shock normally pales the face. Perhaps the judgment would be recognized by those who suffer it not simply as a visitation of pain but as a punishment for wrongdoing, bringing a blush to their cheeks.

9–13 At this point this oracle of judgment about a great, coming world-power begins to expand to cover the whole world, though the NIV translation suggests that it is still local. The cosmic dimensions of vv.10–13, however, strongly suggest that v.9 needs to be understood universally also. Local judgments should stir in human beings a recognition of final accountability (cf. Mt 24).

God created the natural order as an environment for humans (Ge 1). The Fall disturbed this order, and some indication of this is given in the penalties prescribed by God (Ge 3:14–19). In v.10 we see God's hand of judgment falling on the great heavenly bodies, whose regular motions provide strong support for one's belief in an ordered universe. Their light-giving function (cf. Ge 1:14–19) will be hindered (cf. Mt 24:29; Mk 13:24–25; cf. esp. Mt 27:45; Mk 15:33; Lk 23:44–45).

Isaiah characteristically mentions arrogance and pride as prime targets of God's judgment on the wicked (cf. 2:11–18; 3:16–24; 10:8–16). Human pride is a blatant insult to the God who is highly exalted and to whom all his moral creatures should submit in obedient worship. Verse 12 makes it clear that the judgment pictured is universal. Verse 13 goes beyond v.10 by depicting the effects of divine judgment on the natural universe. There is to be a general convulsion of the whole created order (cf. 34:4). Thus the instability of the order of things since the Fall will be disclosed (cf. Mk 13), revealing the need for the eternally stable order of the kingdom of God that Christ's coming will establish.

14–16 The prophet has made no reference to the human agents of God's punitive justice since v.5; and at least since v.10 it has been clear that a universal judgment is in view. By definition such a judgment cannot be humanly executed, for everyone is to come under it. The prophet here returns, however, to the more local judgment on Babylon, for it is clear that human agencies of punishment are now being used again. A prediction of the Day of the Lord may expand and then contract again in this way, because each particular judgment foreshadows the great ultimate punishment to fall on the human race as a whole.

Beginning with Tiglath-pileser III, each great empire of Mesopotamia followed a policy of transportation and intermingling of peoples. As Babylonia is entered by its conquerors, those living there who have been exiled from their own homelands feel their isolation; and, like hunted or neglected animals, they try to make for home. Such attempts at survival will be quite fruitless. The bitter enemies of their overlords will make no distinction between the native-born and the unwilling incomer. This part of the prophecy shows that the downfall of Babylon will mean the deaths of many from other nations who find themselves within its borders when the blow falls.

17–22 Verse 17 is of special interest because of its reference to the Medes. These Iranian people, who—along with other Aryan tribes—came onto the Iranian plateau about the beginning of the first millennium B.C., were a constant thorn in the flesh of the Assyrian kings; and in 612 B.C. they captured the Assyrian capital, Nineveh. Thus in Isaiah's day they were a significant factor on the international scene. At this time the Babylonians were their allies in the eventual sack of Nineveh. By the middle of the sixth century B.C., however, the situation had altered considerably. After a period when there was enmity between the Medes and the Persians (their fellow Aryans), the Medes put their fierce fighting force at the disposal of Cyrus the Persian and were involved with him in the overthrow of Babylonia in 539 B.C. The Medes are probably mentioned here rather than the Persians because of their greater ferocity and also because they were better known to the people of Isaiah's day. Historical sources confirm that the Medes served Cyrus without thought of monetary reward.

Babylon, a very ancient city (cf. Ge 10:10; 11:1–9), seems to have had even in times of decline a special prestige among the peoples of the Near East. This was shared also by its leading deity, Marduk, and is well expressed in the phrase "the jewel of kingdoms," which Isaiah gave to it. Already Babylon was a sure candidate for divine judgment, but the cup of its sin was to become full in the days of its new empire, when it would oppress many nations and destroy Jerusalem and its temple.

It is interesting that Isaiah uses the analogy of the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah that we find also in 1:9–10. This suggests not only complete destruction but also its moral cause. The Assyrian king Sennacherib, who detested Babylon, utterly devastated it in 689 B.C. This was, perhaps, a partial fulfillment of the prophecy given here. Babylon was quickly rebuilt, and no comparable destruction took place by the Medes and Persians in 539 B.C. The prophecy did eventually find fulfillment, but over a considerable period of time. Darius the Great and Xerxes both issued important decrees of demolition. Alexander the Great apparently had great plans for the city, but they did not survive his death; and by the close of the first century B.C., Babylon was utterly desolate. So it is today. The last sentence of the chapter refers to Sennacherib's act of vengeance that stood at the beginning of the whole process and that, at the time of this prophecy, was to be accomplished within twelve years.

14:1–4a These verses are saturated with allusions to the Exodus from Egypt and the entry into Canaan. The New Exodus theme, which is so important later in the book, is the controlling motif here. The clue to this is given in the words "once again he will choose Israel." The expulsion of Israel from Canaan at the Exile would certainly make it look as if the covenant, so often flagrantly broken by the people, had finally been set aside by God. In fact, however, such was the depth and persistence of his steadfast love that his covenant purpose was never eclipsed by their unfaithfulness. His new choice was a reaffirmation of the old in the return from Babylonia.

The repeated name "Jacob" is a reminder that it is the God of the patriarchs who is setting his love on the people (cf. Ex 3:6–9). The patriarchs had been given the land by divine promise; therefore, it was already "their own land."

When Israel left Egypt, many other people left with them. There were also many aliens within their gates (Ex 20:10; 22:21; et al.). Jethro, Rahab, and other believing Gentiles found a place within the covenant of God with Israel. So it would be again (cf. 56:3–8). Furthermore, the nations in the land would become servants to them (60:9–14; 61:5), just as the Gibeonites had (Jos 9). We can find parallels to much of this in the actual events of the return from exile, for it was a decree of the Gentile Cyrus that was its immediate human cause (Ezr 1–4; cf. 6:1–12). There are, however, elements of the prophecy that were not fulfilled at this time, especially in the picture of God's people governing their oppressors. No doubt these are properly eschatological, so that the fulfillment at the return from Babylon itself foreshadows God's ultimate purpose for the people.

4b–11 At this point, one of the greatest poems in the whole prophetic corpus commences, running through v.21. Its form is really that of the funeral dirge, with the characteristic limping rhythm of a Hebrew lament, so plaintive and yet ominous to the sensitive ear. The form is appropriate, for it speaks of death (vv.9–11, 15). It is not sung at a funeral, however, for the subject of the song is a tyrant who will be denied proper burial, and the song lacks the pomp a great king would expect as his right at death (vv.18–20). There is a considerable element of irony, so that the whole song becomes a "taunt" (v.4a) in the guise of a lament.

The subject of this lament is the king of Babylon, the oppressor; but the reference to the Lord in v.5 is important. Apart from the less direct references of vv.13–14, it is the only place where he is mentioned in the poem; yet he dominates it just as much as he does the book of Esther. His action is implied in all the passive verbs of the poem. If the oppressor has ceased, it is because God has taken action to bring him low.

The "unceasing blows" and "relentless aggression" conjure up an atmosphere of terror. When a great tyrant reigns in Mesopotamia, all the little nations cower in constant fear. How impressive then is the great change intimated in v.7! The glorious peace that follows the downfall of the Babylonian oppressor becomes the setting for the glad sound of rejoicing.

The pine trees and cedars of v.8 may be literal, figurative, or both. The monarchs of Assyria and Babylon were greedy for wood, and their woodcutters stripped whole districts of their trees. Lebanon, with its magnificent trees, suffered more than most conquered territories at their hands. Understood both literally and symbolically, these trees may refer also to human rulers (cf. 2:13; Jer 22:7; Eze 17:3; 31:3; Mk 13:24–25), who are also safe now.

"The grave" is the NIV's translation of the Hebrew word sheol (GK 8619), the place of the dead. The Babylonian king, though dead, still exists, but now in a different sphere. The picture of the petty kings rising from their thrones to accord a mocking welcome to their oppressor powerfully appeals to the imagination and clearly contains some elements that were intended to be taken seriously but not literally.

To rise from one's seat is a token of respect in many cultures. Therefore, it probably indicates not only surprise but also mock homage on the part of those whose submission had been all too real, though unwilling, during their lifetime. They had heard the sound of the Babylonian harpers making music for the king as they were brought trembling into his court. All his pomp and circumstance have disappeared. His soft couches and lush carpets have been replaced by maggots and decomposition.

12–17 The taunt song continues. Isaiah's prophecies make some use of what has been called "dead mythology," and this may well be an example of this. The language of the myth—known but not, of course, accepted as true by the prophet and his hearers—becomes a vehicle for his thought by supplying the basis of an analogy. Moreover, this passage itself seems to be echoed by the Lord Jesus in Luke 10:18, where language applied here to the king of Babylon is used of Satan. Nothing could be more appropriate, for the pride of the king of Babylon was truly satanic. When Satan works his malign will through rulers of this world, he reproduces his own wicked qualities in them, so that they become virtual shadows of which he is the substance.

To interpret v.12 and the following verses in this way means that the passage points to Satan, not directly, but indirectly, much like the way the kings of the line of David point to Christ. All rulers of international significance whose overweening pride and arrogance bring them to ruin under the hand of God's judgment illustrate both the satanic and the antichrist principles.

Verse 13 reminds us of the Tower of Babel (Ge 11:1–9), though the endeavor to be like God takes us right back to Ge 3. Here Satan first sought to reproduce in human life his own proud aspirations for equal status with God. The possession of power can, of course, prove disastrous in creating a desire for utter supremacy. One who is fitted for high authority must be aware that he faces grave spiritual danger.

The dominant feature of vv.13–14 is undoubtedly the repetition of the word "I." Only God himself has a right to speak in this fashion (13:11–12; 14:24–25; 41:9–10, 17–19; et al.). The analogy from Canaanite mythology probably extends to the reference to the sacred mountain. Like the proud figure in the myth, the king of Babylon sought for absolute sovereignty. It is a strange paradox that nothing makes a being less like God than the urge to be his equal, for in Christ, he who was equal with God stepped down from his glorious throne to display to the wondering eyes of humankind the humility of God (Php 2:5–8).

The leveling power of death is again underlined (vv.15–16; cf. vv.9–10). The death of such a great one in worldly terms causes people to think hard. There are more lessons to be learned about the meaning of existence at the place of death than at the place of birth (cf. Ecc 7:1–4). Only God really has the right to make the earth tremble (cf. 13:13; 24:1–4). Human tyranny can go too far, and God acts against it from his all-sovereign throne (cf. 40:23–24).

18–21 We know from the Egyptian pyramids and other royal tombs how much stress was put on proper burial in the Fertile Crescent in OT times. How horrifying to a great king of Babylon and to his contemporaries would be the prospect of his lying out in the open, unburied, his royal body indistinguishable from those of his soldiers, to be thrown into a common burial pit! What is the cause of such a fate? The great king—like Napoleon, Hitler, and many others—led many of his people into death on the battlefield to gratify his lust for power. God therefore makes the punishment fit the crime.

The principle of group solidarity in punishment is seen throughout the OT (cf. Ex 20:5–6; Nu 16:31–35; Jos 7:24–26). The reference to the conqueror covering the earth with cities (v.21) is perhaps a reminder of Ge 10:8–11, possibly implying that this Babylonian dynasty was following the ways of its great predecessor, Nimrod. Many rulers have sought to perpetuate their names through great city-building enterprises (cf. also Ge 11:4). No throne, no tomb, no progeny, no cities—in all these ways the Lord abases those who seek self-exaltation.

22–23 These verses constitute a kind of appendix to the taunt song. The all-powerful divine King asserts his own intention to act against Babylon. Clearly the language reflects vv.20b–21, but it also goes back to v.20a. The king of Babylon's sin would bring destruction, not only to his people, but also to his land. He wanted to possess the earth, but in fact the very reverse would take place; for his own land would be possessed—not even by human beings, but by owls—and it would be covered with pools of stagnant water. The analogy the passage closes with has an eloquence all its own. The reader can almost hear the woman of the house breathing a sigh of relief as she sweeps the rubbish out her door, knowing that her house is at last clean and fit for human habitation. Rubbish fit only for the broom of judgment—this was God's verdict on mighty Babylon!

B. Prophecy Against Assyria (14:24–27)

There was an emotional link between the names "Babylon" and "Assyria" for those who were under threat from Mesopotamia; this is enough to account for placing this brief oracle at this point.

24–25 Sometimes in Isaiah a divine statement is underlined in some particularly emphatic way (cf. 5:9; 9:7; 37:32), and so it is here. The name of God used here and the statement of his settled purpose (cf. 5:19) combine to assure us that the Assyrian cannot survive. If such a mighty God has designed to crush him, he is doomed indeed. As if to reinforce this certainty still more, God speaks of "my land" and "my mountains."

26–27 God is sovereign over human history. All nations will have to submit to his judgment. This principle will be seen in relation to other nations—both small and great—in the oracles that follow. God is not like a man who makes plans and finds he has no power to put them into effect. Perfect wisdom and absolute power find their unity in God.

C. Prophecy Against Philistia (14:28–32)

28 The heading of this oracle does not in fact establish the year of this prophecy, for there is much uncertainty about the date of the death of Ahaz. The Assyrian monarch whose death is implied in vv.29–30 is Tiglath-pileser III, Shalmaneser V, or Sargon II.

29–30 The death of a cruel, oppressive monarch is a cause of rejoicing for his subjects, but such celebration is often premature; for that monarch's aggressiveness often characterizes his whole dynasty. The prophet's inspired imagination combined two sets of images here. The Assyrian monarchs are likened to a series of reptiles, which is then likened to the succession of root, shoot, and fruit in a plant. In this way the Spirit used the natural gift of a deeply poetic imagination to vividly and powerfully convey prophetic truth.

In the light of v.32, the focus of attention has moved briefly in v.30a from Philistia to Zion. The godliness of the poor and needy and the certainty that God is their helper are often presupposed in the OT, for the integrity of the godly is rarely profitable in worldly terms. Here God assumes the role of a shepherd to his people (cf. 40:11). The destiny of Philistia is portrayed in stark contrast to this, for famine instead of fresh pasture will be its lot. Leaf, branch, or stem may wither and yet the plant survive, but what hope is there when the root has been destroyed?

31–32 The prophet vividly depicts the fear induced by the terror from the north. No doubt the "envoys" were Philistine diplomats sent to Jerusalem to encourage solidarity against the common Assyrian foe. As elsewhere, Isaiah's message encourages trust in God, not in alliances (cf. 7:1–9; 8:11–15).

D. Prophecy Against Moab (15:1–16:14)

There are special features of this oracle that make it at once one of the most moving and yet most enigmatic of Isaiah's prophecies. The inspired poet-prophet presents us with graphic pictures of judgment on Moab. Through its verses the anguished wailing of the bereaved and the fugitives touches the heart of the readers. And to our utter astonishment, we discover that the inspired page is wet too with the tears of the prophet himself! Jeremiah wept for Judah (Jer 9:1), but Isaiah for Moab!

1–4 The small Moabite nation is often mentioned in the OT, sometimes on its own, sometimes with its near neighbor, Ammon. The origin of both nations is traced to Lot's incest (Ge 19:30–38). It is impossible to determine the exact historical circumstances of this oracle or even to identify the enemy with any certainty; it could have been Assyria or some incursive force of hungry and rapacious nomads from the desert—perhaps Israel (cf. 2Ki 14:25) or even Judah, though this last seems unlikely.

All the places mentioned in these verses were in Moab. The enemies no doubt had come unheralded. Their predatory purpose fulfilled, they had probably departed as suddenly as they had come. Behind them was a trail of death and destruction. The land was full of weeping people, some gathering at religious shrines to cry to their gods, others in public places to join in corporate displays of weeping. The sounds of such agonized wailing would strike the men of Moab's fighting force with a demoralizing terror.

The Mesha Stele of Moab relates their successful attacks on Israel. Isaiah prophesies the eventual destruction of Moab.

5–9 None of the place names in these verses can be identified with certainty, apart from Zoar, at the southeastern tip of the Dead Sea. Apparently the general direction of flight for most of the fugitives was southward to Edom. The reference to "the waters of Nimrim" suggests that they were in a normally fertile area. Perhaps they passed it during the dry season and saw its withered vegetation as a symbol of their own condition. The Moabites were warned that there was no hope of alleviation. The reference to the enemy as a lion reminds us of the reference to Assyria in Am 3:12, where the ultimate lion of judgment is God himself (cf. Am 3:4, 8).

16:1–5 The prophetic searchlight, having exposed to view the whole land of Moab with its ruined cities and fleeing, homeless people, becomes a spotlight. It concentrates first on the city of Sela, the source of the message of vv.3–4a, and then on the fords of Arnon, where the Moabite refugees, who are the subjects of the message, gather. Sela, normally Edomite, appears to have been in Moabite hands at this time and may even have been the seat of its government. Moab was famous for its great flocks of sheep. The Moabite rulers sent lambs in recognition of the king of Judah's overlordship to support their appeal for asylum for their refugees, many of whom would be women with children.

The "shadow" (v.3; GK 7498) may well picture Judah as affording protection, like a great rock from the merciless midday sun (cf. 32:2); but it is also possible that it further develops the analogy of the fluttering young birds. These would be easy prey for a predator on the ground, unless the large shadow of the parent bird fell protectingly across them as they moved toward the earth.

Verses 4b–5 are probably the reply sent from Jerusalem to Sela. This passage resembles 14:32 in its triumphant assertion that Jerusalem is a place of security in the purpose of God. If the words are addressed from Judah to Moab, they are most naturally understood along messianic lines (cf. 55:3). The love and faithfulness referred to are in the heart of God and come to his people on the basis of his promise (cf. 2Sa 7:12–16). At one time Moab and Midian were allied against Israel (Nu 22:4; 25:1–18). Interestingly, the prophet presents the Messiah's rule as extending over both Midian (9:4–7) and Moab.

6–7 These verses contain the only clear references to the sin of Moab. A true prophet would be expected to penetrate beyond the misery that results from God's judgment to the offenses against him that caused it, and this Isaiah does here. Because of pride the Moabites were brought to this sorry pass.

8–12 The prophet visualizes the land of Moab as a vast vineyard, with vines spreading to its farthest corners but now trampled underfoot by its enemies (cf. 5:1–7). In an agricultural community, harvest is a season of great joy (cf. 9:3). In Moab, however, the vineyards will be silent. The ripened fruit will not be trodden under foot in the winepresses, for judgment through foreign rulers will stalk the land.

Again (cf. 15:5) the prophet's heart is deeply moved by the undoubtedly deserved sufferings of the Moabites (v.11). The skilled and sensitive musician knows what instrument will best carry the feelings of his song to the heart of his hearers, and Isaiah's deep emotions come with all the pathos of a lament played on a harp. Unhappily, Moab's sufferings had not driven her to the true and living God but to the idol shrines of her god, Chemosh. There could be no help from such a source.

13–14 There had been earlier prophecies against Moab with the same general import as the oracle just given by the prophet here (cf. Am 2:1–3). Isaiah has a specific disclosure from the Lord as to the time of Moab's judgment. It most likely relates to Sargon's campaign against the tribal peoples of northwest Arabia, for the Assyrian army's route would naturally go through Moab. This would date the two closing verses of ch. 16 to 718 B.C.

Verse 14 refers either to the contract of a laborer with his master (cf. Ge 29:18; Lev 25:50, 53) or that of a mercenary soldier with his superior. In either case the point is the same, for the exact calculation of the period is important to the transaaction. The prophetic ministry did not require many such timed predictions (but cf. 7:8). Their fulfillment would, of course, provide additional clear evidence of their authenticity.

E. Prophecy Against Damascus (and Ephraim) (17:1–14)

Ephraim's devotion to the apostate shrines at Bethel and Dan had made her a perpetual rebel against the Lord, but now she became unequally yoked with a pagan nation in an endeavor to coerce Judah into an unholy league against Assyria. This oracle, therefore, certainly appears to belong to the period 735–732 B.C.

1–3 The oracle opens with a call to visualize what God would make of a once-proud city. The downfall of Damascus would not be an isolated event, for other cities too would be deserted. The double conjunction of Ephraim and Damascus and of Aram and the Israelites is striking. Israel had chosen to accept a close link with Damascus; so she had to accept the consequences of that relationship. A shared purpose involves a shared judgment. The basis of the league between the two nations was chiefly military; and, ironically, it was in military terms that she would suffer, in the loss of her "fortified city." This is no doubt a reference to Damascus, as the fortress that Ephraim herself hoped would protect her from the Assyrians.

The prophet's reference to the "remnant of Aram" likely relates to that kingdom itself. Damascus, in fact, fell to the Assyrians in 732 B.C., and Samaria, the capital of Israel, fell a decade later. The instrument of these judgments was to be Assyria, but the judgments were ultimately the great power of "the LORD Almighty."

4–6 The repeated phrase "in that day" underlines the decisiveness of the Lord's judgment on Ephraim. It has an eschatological quality in the sense that the great principles of that period cast their shadows before them. In other words, in such judgments God is making an emphatic point about sin and his attitude toward it.

The judgment on Ephraim was to be devastating, leaving the people decimated. The "glory of Jacob" suggests Ephraim's honor, the respect in which others would hold him. He would become subject to a wasting disease, making him perhaps as sorry a sight as if he just had a terrible beating (cf. 1:5–6; 52:14).

Isaiah develops the picture of a body politic suffering the consequences of sin in terms of the grain harvest. The reaper's arm encircles and makes taut many stalks of grain so that he can remove their heads by one sweep of his sickle. Fruit trees also will be climbed as far as possible and beaten to gather the great bulk of their fruit. In each case the farmer endeavors to leave as little as possible for the gleaners, who are allowed by law to gather anything edible that had been missed (Dt 24:19–22). So thorough would judgment be, and yet the destruction would not be total. The phrases "the glory of Jacob" and "the God of Israel" at the beginning and the end of this section are a reminder that the God of the patriarchal promises has an ongoing purpose beyond temporal judgment (cf. 6:11–13).

7–8 The judgment on Ephraim would bring a spirit of penitence to at least some of the survivors. The contrast between "their Maker" and "the work of their hands" shows that nothing is more misguided or pathetic than the human attempt to mend the relationship between oneself and deity by the work of one's own hands. The altars mentioned here may be the apostate shrines with their forbidden bull-images at Bethel and Dan. It may be, however, that we should read v.8a in the light of v.8b, for "the Asherah poles" (i.e., "symbols of the goddess Asherah"; see NIV note) reflect the naked paganism of Canaan. The presence of northern Israelites at Hezekiah's celebration of the Passover (2Ch 30) shows the fulfillment of this prediction.

9–11 The theme of judgment returns. When the Israelites came into the land of Canaan many years before, the strong cities of the land were abandoned to them. The Lord was at work for his people, giving them the Land of Promise. However, the situation has changed, and the same cities will be abandoned by the Israelites themselves as they are under the judging hand of God. Here again we see "the Light of Israel" becoming a fire (cf. 10:17).

The NIV treats vv.10b–11 as a further development of the illustrations of judgment given in vv.4–6. Judgment can be pictured as a thorough harvest that leaves only scattered gleanings, but it can also be pictured as disappointing in itself; for even the finest plants, which the grower has searched out in foreign lands and planted in ideal conditions, may come to nothing. Some kind of pestilence is implied here.

12–14 Mauchline points out that the thunder of many peoples amassing reminds us of the opening of Ps 2: nations mustering their armies and trying to carry out their plans and ambitions. The general nature of the picture is underlined by the implied comparison with God's creation ordinance restricting the flow of the waters across the face of the earth (cf. Ge 1:9; Ps 104:5–9). The God who rules both nature and history employs language taken from his control of the one to represent graphically his control of the other.

The imagery changes again. The foes are like great rushing torrents, but God opposes their waters by his wind; they become like chaff blown from the hilltop threshing floor (cf. Ps 1:4; 83:13; Isa 29:5) or like mere dust (cf. Isa 40:15), driven in its blinding grittiness before an advancing storm. God's judgment of the enemies of his people will be both decisive and swift.

The view at dusk is presented simply in terms of the overpowering emotion of terror, with countless hosts of pagan soldiers, eager for their prey. In the morning, however, it all seemed like a nightmare, for there was not an enemy to be seen! Doubtless God's action against Sennacherib's great army (37:36) is chiefly in view here.

The prophet closes with a general comment based on this singular example of God's care for his people and his city. The oracle opened with Damascus, moved on to deal with Ephraim, but at the end it appears clearly that all these events are part of God's plan to keep in safety those who were in Jerusalem and in the center of his purpose because they were trusting in him.

F. Prophecy Against Cush (18:1–7)

This oracle is unique in Isa 13–23 (except for ch. 20) in that it does not open with the word "oracle." Chapters 18–20 deal with Egypt and Cush, which were one at this time. The content of the passage hardly seems to warrant the use of the doom-exclamation ("Woe") with which it begins; for the doom is really pictured as falling on Assyria rather than on Cush, but perhaps it anticipates ch. 20. Biblical Cush is usually translated "Ethiopia," but the transliteration designates a much larger area than present-day Ethiopia—an area including the Sudan and Somalia. This mysterious area was normally in Egypt's area of influence and control; but for a period during the eighth century, Egypt was ruled by an Ethiopian dynasty. The visit of the ambassadors could be placed either during the Philistine revolt against Assyria (around 712 B.C.) or in the period of restlessness after Sargon's death in 705.

1–3 The phrase "the land of whirring wings" is highly evocative for anyone who has been in the Nile valley, with its swarms of insects. Ambassadors in OT days were not permanent officials placed by nations in the capital cities of other states but were emissaries sent out on special commissions. The purpose here was to foment rebellion against Assyria, which was very much in the interests of the rival power that straddled the Nile valley. The lightness of their papyrus vessels made it possible for them to be carried past rapids and other unnavigable stretches of rivers. The word "sea" (v.1; GK 3542) could be interpreted as the Nile, because the word can be applied to a great river.

The ambassadors were to return with all speed to the land they had come from; for their mission, though politically expedient, was spiritually inappropriate and irrelevant. The military reputation of the tall, handsome Nubians of Cush had been much enhanced by their recent conquest of mighty Egypt. Israel, remembering its own captivity in Egypt, might well have been particularly impressed. The message given to the messengers had universal application, for the whole world would reverberate at the trumpet blast heralding mighty Assyria's fall. The banner and the trumpet represent the call to rally for battle.

4–6 Isaiah often urged his contemporaries to adopt an attitude of quiet faith in their God instead of trusting in alliances with other powers (e.g., 7:4; 30:15). Here God himself is quiet, contemplating the frenzied scene of diplomatic and military activity. When Isaiah commends quiet trust, therefore, he is really calling his hearers to view things from a divine viewpoint.

The second simile in v.4 serves not only to reinforce the first but prepares for the disclosure of God's judgment described in v.5. The divine harvester is dealing with branches that reveal their barrenness by their emptiness (cf.

Jn 15:2, 5). The branches that are valueless to humans are left to the local birds and animals, who put them to their own use. This suggests that the fierce Assyrians would themselves become the prey of others.

7 The very people who from their position of strength had sent word to Judah to secure her cooperation in a military venture would come again with gifts for the true God in Zion. This picture is a specific illustration of the general vision of Zion as the religious center of the whole world.

G. Prophecy Against Egypt (19:1–25)

This oracle is of exceptional interest because of its amazing climax: the judgment of God on the Egyptians is followed by their repentance and conversion, by manifestations of God's grace to them, and by their incorporation in the people of God, along with their bitter enemy, Assyria, and the chosen people, Israel, who had suffered so grievously at the hands of both.

1–4 The Lord is pictured as riding on a swift cloud to Egypt. Here imagery is employed in connection with his interventions in history. Once before this, the God of Israel had judged the gods of Egypt (Ex 12:12; Nu 33:4) as well as its people. His appearance on the heavenly horizon fills them both with dread. Their power to resist him is still further diminished by internal division and internecine conflict. According to the Greek historian Herodotus, Egyptian unity—secured by the power of the Cushite dynasty—was destroyed by civil war.

The idols and human agents of paganism can be of no avail to the Egyptians in their predicament, because this oracle declares that they and their objects of worship will both be overcome by fear. There is little point in the demoralized turning to the demoralized!

The "fierce king" of v.4 most surely is Esar-haddon, king of Assyria, who subdued Egypt in 670 B.C. Ferocity was a general characteristic of all the Assyrian monarchs. The Egyptians were not to know this, of course; but their downfall before this monarch would mean the virtual end, not only of their greatness, but even of their independence, for millennia. Who is this whose power is so great that he can hand over one mighty nation to another? Why, of course, "the LORD," the Lord Almighty!

5–10 This passage graphically portrays Egyptian economics, with its total dependence on the Nile. Dry up the Nile and the whole Egyptian economy will grind to a halt. Who can—and will—dry up the Nile, which was a great deity to the Egyptians as well as a great river? The same God Almighty whose plans to intervene in the history of Egypt had been declared in vv.1–4!

Again we are reminded of the events associated with the Exodus, for several of the plagues had involved the judgment of the Nile. Fishing and linen industries were important; both were completely dependent on the fauna and flora of the Nile.

11–15 Constructive, progressive, and stable rule necessitates the marriage of power and wisdom, characteristics of God's great King (11:1–5) and qualities of God himself. Every great monarch feels the need of advice from wise counselors, but what if the wisest in the land have nothing but lunacy to offer? No matter how ancient nor how exalted their lore, it makes no difference to their ineptness. Zoan and Memphis were the two most important cities in Lower Egypt. They are mentioned together because of their administrative importance.

The quaint architectural analogy implicit in the language of v.13b is found in a number of OT passages (e.g., Ps 118:22; Zec 10:4). Its use in Isa 28:16 is particularly interesting in the light of its use here, for here the leaders who should have given stability to Egypt led her astray, while in the later passage the God of Israel promises a leader who will give true stability to his people. In Isa 28 the folly of the leaders is due to drink, while their confusion here is pictured as if it were the result of drunkenness.

When the prophet says, "The LORD has poured into them a spirit of dizziness," he is of course thinking of a personal spirit (cf. 1Sa 16:14; 18:10; 19:9; 1Ki 22:19–23). It is clear that this spirit comes for moral reasons and as a judgment from God. If we accept that God may use an evil human power in judgment (cf. 10:5), then there is really no difference in principle if he uses an evil spiritual being, as here. Foolish confidence in one's own wisdom leads not only to failure to produce appropriate counsel but also to walking and causing others to walk along a pathway that leads to disaster.

16–17 Isaiah uses the expression "in that day" forty-two times. Verses 16–17 bridge the first part of the oracle (dominated by judgment) and the remainder of it (centered in salvation and grace). They place emphasis on the fear induced in the Egyptians by God's acts of judgment (cf. v.1), which was a prelude to their repentance. The Exodus account frequently refers to the hand of the Lord and its activities against Egypt (e.g., Ex 8:19; 9:15; 13:3; 9, 16; et al.). Because God was on Israel's side, her very name became a terror to the Egyptians (cf. Ex 12:33; 15:16; Ps 105:38); so too the mention of Judah would terrorize the Egyptians.

18 The verse as it stands may mean that Jews were then living in Egypt, occupying five of its cities and so instituting a colony of worshipers of the Lord in this pagan land (cf. Jer 44:1, 15). On the other hand, it could refer to the conversion of Egypt to the worship of the true God. The five cities may be an allusion to the original conquest of Canaan by the Israelites. After the capture of Jericho and Ai by Joshua's forces, their first great victory was over the kings of five important Canaanite cities: Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon (Jos 10). This victory led to the conquest of the whole country. So the spiritual conquest of Egypt outlined in vv.19–22 starts with the conversion of five cities promised in v.18. This not only fits the context perfectly but would also furnish a further example of allusion to the Exodus-Conquest period that is such a feature of this oracle.

What then is "the City of Destruction"? The Hebrew seems like a play on "the city of the sun" (the Hebrew equivalent of Heliopolis). If so, then the conversion of the people of this stronghold of sun worship is perhaps treated as a major victory, decisive enough and significant enough as a great act of destruction at the time of the Conquest.

19–21 These verses spell out in detail the circumstances and results of the conversion of the Egyptians. The "altar" has sometimes been identified with the Jewish temple built at Elephantine in the sixth or fifth century. It is evident, however, that the final fulfillment of vv.16–25 has not yet come, unless it is all to be viewed as fulfilled spiritually in the triumphs of the gospel in Egypt.

Another echo of the conquest of Canaan is found in the reference to the monument or pillar. Pillars were associated with pagan worship in Canaan and so were prohibited to the Israelites (cf. Dt 7:5; 12:3), but it is clear from v.20 that something different is in view. Just as the altars constructed by the patriarchs were witnesses for the true God and his self-disclosure at these places, so various stones and pillars of witness were erected in the days of Joshua (see Jos 4:3, 20–22; 7:26; 8:29; 10:27). The pillar-monument here, situated on the border of Egypt, probably symbolizes the claiming of the land for the true and living God.

The analogy of the Conquest continues with a promise that could have come straight out of Judges (cf., Jdg 3:9, 15). The promise appears to be an assurance of deliverance from physical oppressors. Interestingly, the savior and defender is singular, while the oppressors are plural. The language is well fitted to refer to the supreme Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ.

A major theme of the Exodus story is the knowledge of the Lord that is given in its events. There is, however, an important distinction drawn between the form that knowledge took for the Israelites and for the Egyptians. The former knew the Lord in the context of his grace to them (e.g., Ex 6:7), the latter knew him as a God of judgment (e.g., Ex 7:5). It is more frequently declared that the events will bring the knowledge of God to the Egyptians than that they will bring it to Israel. The Lord will reveal himself to Egypt again, but this time in an entirely different way, much more after the pattern of his self-disclosure to Israel; for he will deal with them also on the basis of grace.

The references to sacrifices, grain offerings, and vows suggest a comparison with the Mosaic Law, perhaps to make it clear that the Egyptians are to be on equal footing with their erstwhile slaves who had been so gloriously redeemed from their midst. There is an implied rebuke of Israel in the assertion that "they will make vows to the LORD and keep them," which suggests that the basis of their relationship with him is the new covenant (cf. Jer 31:31–34), fulfilled in Christ's death as the ultimate sacrifice (cf. esp. Heb 8:7–9:15).

22 This verse is a virtual summary of most of the oracle. The reference to a plague is another clear echo of Exodus. In the time of Moses, the pleas of the Egyptians for the lifting of the plagues were heard through the intercession of Moses, though there was no true penitence in the hearts of Pharaoh and his servants. In terms of this prophecy, however, the plague will bring them to repentance, and God will hear their own cries for deliverance.

23 Astonishment reaches a new height here, for the revelation of God's amazing grace to the Gentiles embraces not only the old enemy, Egypt, but the new one, Assyria. In Isaiah's day, Assyria was feared by every little nation in the Fertile Crescent. Their brutality made them more of an object of general hatred than any other nation of antiquity. The Egyptians, Babylonians, and Persians were all capable of inhuman acts, but the Assyrian record for callous cruelty is difficult to parallel. This amazing verse assures Isaiah's hearers that Egypt and Assyria will drop their long-standing antagonism toward each other and cooperate, not only in a great road-building project that will further international communication, commerce, and peace, but they will come together in the worship of the true God, the God of the little Israelite nation whom they had both afflicted so sorely!

24–25 Israel, which seems for a time to have been out of the picture, now takes her place as one member of a trio of godly states. Some of Israel's own titles (cf. 1:3; 45:11) are applied to her former enemies. This suggests that the Lord has established a covenant relationship with these nations, perhaps extending to them the new covenant that he promised in Jeremiah to make with his people of Israel and Judah (cf. Jer 31:31–34).

H. Prophecy Against Egypt and Cush (20:1–6)

This passage gives not only an oracle but the circumstances in which it was delivered. This is understandable, because it was associated with an acted prophecy and so demanded a setting.

1–2 The five Philistine cities were united in a federation, and this union was dominated first by one and then by another of them. The rebellion against Assyria at this time centered in Ashdod. This revolt occurred 713–711 and probably developed in response to events further south. Egypt had been taken over by the Ethiopian dynasty in 715 B.C., and the petty states of Palestine seem to have felt there might be more hope of securing assistance against Assyria. The demise of Ashdod is mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions and can be accurately dated in 711 B.C.

The way Isaiah was clothed suggests that the prophet was in mourning at this time, either because of personal bereavement or because of his concern about the nation. At least from the time of Elijah, however, such rough clothing was associated with the office of the prophet (2Ki 1:8; Zec 13:4; Mk 1:6). The wording does not preclude the possibility that he was wearing a loincloth (cf. v.4), for strict nakedness would have been religiously and socially unacceptable (cf. Ge 9:20–27).

3–6 The sign is given first and then its significance is clarified in a spoken prophecy. Acted prophecy occurs frequently in the OT (e.g., 1Ki 11:29–32; Jer 13:1–11; Eze 4). The act normally requires verbal interpretation before it becomes a true prophecy with a specific meaning. The sign was a message to those in Judah who were inclined to put their trust in Egypt (cf. 30:1–5; 31:1–3), especially in its revived strength under its new Ethiopian rulers. In fact, the Egyptian army sent to the help of Judah in 701 was defeated at Eltekeh; this was the first of a series of disastrous defeats by Assyria in the next few decades.

Verses 5–6 probably refer to different people, those in v.5 being chiefly the leaders of Judah, while v.6 refers to the inhabitants of the Palestinian coastal strip. This makes it clear that not only Ashdod but the whole Philistine federation would suffer; and it may even imply that Phoenicia, further north, would be smitten by the Assyrians.

I. Prophecy Against Babylon (21:1–10)

This passage has two main schools of interpretation. Some feel that the occasion depicted in the prophet's vision is the downfall of Babylon in 539, when Cyrus entered the city with his triumphant forces. Cyrus was originally king of Persian lands that were formerly part of Elam, and he had conquered Media a decade or so before his assault on Babylonia. So "Elam" and "Media" in v.2 refer to the multinational army of Cyrus.

The other interpretation relates the passage to the time of Merodach-Baladan, a prince of southern Babylonia. He revolted against Assyria and had himself crowned king of Babylon in 722 B.C., with the support of the Elamites. He reigned during several periods, and after his death Babylon had further times of independence from Assyria before Sennacherib's ferocious destruction in 689. There had, however, been earlier sackings of the city under Sargon II and Sennacherib, while Merodach-Baladan was alive. This puts not only the prophecy but also its fulfillment in Isaiah's day.

1a "The Desert by the Sea" could refer to the desert lands southeast of Babylonia, where Merodach-Baladan's home territory lay. Possibly it was the great plain that Babylon stood on. This plain was so divided by lakes and marshy stretches of country that it was appropriate to call it "the sea."

1b–2 The prophet saw in his vision an invader approaching Babylon from the desert lands, through which the invading armies would pass on their way to it. His strongly imaginative mind discerned a similarity between these and the whirlwinds that were liable to move up toward Judah through the Negeb. The prophet then told his hearers that he had been shown a dire vision. If this oracle refers to Cyrus and his attack on Babylon, it might have seemed dreadful at first, because the Jews in Babylon could well have perished in the overthrow of the city. In fact, however, this did not happen. Thus an application to the time of Merodach-Baladan is certainly feasible. News of his revolt against Assyria would encourage the Jews in the thought that Assyria might be weakened or perhaps even overthrown by him. The fall of Babylon would represent a severe setback to such hopes.

Most commentators take the words of v.2b as utterances of the Lord, in which he calls on Elam and Media to attack Babylonia. However, in the time of Isaiah it was more natural to see Elam and Media as enemies of Assyria and allies of Babylonia. Thus, as has been suggested, the cries are probably the battle cries of Babylon's allies against Assyria.

3–4 The oracle against Moab (15:5; 16:9, 11) showed the deep distress Isaiah felt when he contemplated the slaughter of human beings, even when these belonged to a nation that was often an enemy of his own people. But Isaiah's horror may have come from his own identification with his people so that he felt the deep dismay that came over them with the downfall of their hope in Merodach-Baladan. The latter is perhaps the more likely, because Isaiah speaks of fear as well as horror.

5 This verse paints a scene of feasting, but where was it enacted? Herodotus says that the taking of Babylon by the Persians in 539 B.C. was so swift that many who were at their wine in the city center did not even know that the outlying parts of the city were in enemy hands. On the other hand, if this is the leaders of Judah who are feasting (cf. 22:1–2, 13), the second half of the verse does not in this case depict a sudden change of mood, with agitated preparation for battle, but rather underlines the atmosphere of leisured ease. Arrangements are made for sentry duty, and the officers detailed for this use their time on guard to apply oil to their leather shields to prevent them from cracking when they are struck by the weapons of the foe.

6–10 The prophet had seen a vision; then he hears the word of the Lord. Isaiah is to have a man posted on the lookout. Any group of riders is to be reported, for they could be bringing news of what was happening in the far country. The lookout was at his post for many days. His tour of duty wearied him, but his patience was at last rewarded as a lone charioteer appeared on the horizon. The message he brought was that Babylon, from which the people have been expecting so much, had fallen, presumably to the Assyrians. The reference to the images of Babylon's gods and their shattering is perhaps an implied rebuke to Judah's leaders. How could they hope for the blessing of God on an alliance with pagans?

The people of Judah, who had already suffered much at the hands of the Assyrians, are depicted as prostrate but still alive, like grain that has fallen—bruised and yet safe—on the threshing floor after the thresher has battered it severely with his flail. The image underlining their helpless condition was also perhaps intended to convey a note of hope. Judah was not chaff but grain, and the Lord Almighty who had used Assyria to bring the downfall of Babylon was also the God of Israel who would protect his people and fulfill his purposes for them.

J. Prophecy Against Edom (21:11–12)

11–12 "Dumah" means silence or stillness and is a wordplay on Edom (see NIV note). As part of the Word of God, this short oracle must have both meaning and relevance. Its meaning is perhaps secured if we understand it through the wordplay in its title. God gives light to his people in the midst of perplexing historical circumstances; the very ministry of Isaiah is evidence of this. It is otherwise, however, with Judah's pagan neighbors. The reply of the watchman is so vague and enigmatic that it is tantamount to no reply at all. The one certainty is that the night will end in morning, but also that this will be followed by another night. Perhaps this refers to the lifting of the oppressive Assyrian overlordship, which would be replaced by another black night, the rule of Babylon.

K. Prophecy Against Arabia (21:13–17)

13–17 This oracle has often been thought to have close ties with the brief one that precedes it. It is noteworthy that Edom was really on the edge of Arabia. Dumah, Tema, and Kedar all occur in Ge 25:13–16, in the list of Ishmael's descendants. The Dumah referred to there, of course, would be the Arabian one, as Edom was the people of Esau (Ge 25:30).

Sargon II conducted a campaign against the northern Arabian tribes in 715 B.C., which could well provide an appropriate setting for this oracle. Armed men are drawn from various Arabian tribes, but they are no match for the Assyrians and are put to flight. They flee exhausted, parched with thirst, and in need of food. The caravans plying their trade and camping out in the wastelands and the settled town-dwellers of the oases are both urged to provide sustenance for the fugitives. The resistance of the Arab tribes will be short-lived, for their armies will be reduced to a meager remnant within twelve months. The closing oracle formula probably underlines the fact that this is the judgment of the God of Israel.

L. Prophecy Against Jerusalem (22:1–25)

This chapter divides into two sections: vv.1–14 show us Isaiah's strong denunciation of Jerusalem's people because of their attitude on the occasion of a deliverance of the city from enemies outside its walls, while vv.15–25 focuses attention on two of the leaders of the people. If we read the first part in the light of chs. 36–37, we may well conclude that the occasion is the deliverance of the city from Sennacherib. Chapters 36–37 emphasize the divine deliverance that took place in response to the faith of Hezekiah and his people, while this present oracle makes it clear how shallow this faith really was. In a similar manner, the joyful attitude to Josiah's reformation taken by the writers of Kings and Chronicles stands in contrast with Jeremiah's recognition of the people's superficiality and shallow penitence. These perspectives were complementary.

1a The expression "Valley of Vision" has been variously understood by commentators, though always in reference to Jerusalem. We do not think of this city as situated in a valley because of the hills of Zion and Moriah on which it was built; but in fact it is comparatively low, being surrounded by hills (cf. Ps 125:2; Jer 21:13). The phrase may refer to the fact that it was the very place where so many prophetic visions had been received and then given to the people. This would, therefore, intensify the responsibility of her people for their reprehensible attitude.

The exceptional sharpness of the prophet's language indicates that he was deeply disturbed. If we have rightly located the prophecy during the deliverance from Sennacherib, this was late in Isaiah's public ministry; and he poured into this prophecy all the disappointment he had with his own people that must have accumulated throughout the decades that he had been prophesying. He had been warned that there would be little response (cf. 6:9–10), and he had certainly found this to be true in the days of Ahaz (ch. 7). Perhaps he had hoped for better things under Hezekiah, who was more godly than his predecessor. In this way, Isaiah identified with the feelings of the Servant of the Lord as the latter looked back on his own ministry (cf. 49:4).

1b–2a A noisy spirit of excitement came on the whole city, and the flat roofs were thronged with revelers. The people probably went up originally to survey the Assyrians outside the city; but finding them dead (cf. 37:36), they stayed to celebrate (cf. vv.12–13).

2b–3 Sennacherib, in his inscriptions, spoke of inflicting a defeat on Hezekiah; and this probably took place during the earlier stages of the Assyrian campaign in Judah (cf. 2Ki 18:13–16; Isa 1:5–9). Is the reference to the "slain" in v.2b an ironic comment on the revelers lying in drunken stupor who, only a short time before, had feared that they would be killed in battle? Possibly, though the prophet may be thinking of those captured and put to death in the early stages of the campaign. Isaiah's main point is that the people could not glory in themselves, as if they had won a mighty victory. In fact, they were so demoralized at the approach of the enemy that they simply fled.

4–8a Isaiah knew that Jerusalem, delivered by a wonderful act of God's grace, would one day perish at his hand. The people had learned nothing from what had happened. The spiritual sorrow of the prophet for his people was so deep that he was inconsolable. As a man of God, of course, he could accept what, as a Judean, he could not welcome; for the destruction of the people that had been revealed to him was the judgment of God.

The Day of the Lord, prophesied in 2:6–22, would fall on Jerusalem. The NIV has brought out the terrifying alliteration and assonance of three consecutive Hebrew words with its translation of "a day of tumult and trampling and terror." The people were looking down over the walls, gloating over the slain Assyrians. On God's great day those same walls would be battered down by the enemy, and the mountains surrounding the Valley of Vision would echo with the wails of Jerusalem's inhabitants.

This prophecy was fulfilled when Nebuchadnezzar took the city in 586 B.C., though history was destined to repeat itself in A.D. 70, when the Romans overcame Jewish resistance and entered Jerusalem to wreak havoc on its people and its buildings. There may have been Elamites and Syrians (from Kir) serving in the army of the Babylonian king. The mention of them imparts an extra dimension of terror to the oracle, because it pictures the besieging army as an international one.

8b–11 The prophet returns to the situation in Jerusalem when the Assyrian army appeared on the horizon. By their actions the people had made it clear to Isaiah that their trust was in human beings rather than in God. A city facing a long siege has many needs. Its defenders need adequate weapons. Jerusalem had, in the Palace of the Forest, its own royal armory (cf. 1Ki 7:2–5); and no doubt its staff undertook an urgent check on their supply of swords and spears that day. The walls of the city and especially its defensive towers were in need of repair, and some of its houses had to be destroyed to obtain stones for this, for there was neither time nor liberty of access to get stone from the Judean quarries. Any house that was not really needed would have to go. Ahaz, also in unbelief, had busied himself with the water supply of the city (cf. 7:1–3), and the men of Hezekiah's Jerusalem had the same outlook (cf. 2Ch 32:1–5). A special reservoir was built, probably to retain surplus water from the Pool of Siloam.

God is the maker of history as well as of nature. History, with its series of world empires and successive judgments (cf. 10:23–24), is all under his almighty hand; he is the God of Israel, for this people is in special relationship with him. Because of this situation, they should have looked to him with faith. Instead, they were busy trying to find ways of evading the challenge to believe.

12–14 There is something ominous about using a title of power—"the LORD Almighty"—instead of one of relationship, like "the God of Israel." If the people would not seek his grace in repentance, they would feel his power in a terrifying act of his judgment on their city. The prophet is outraged by the scene that presents itself to him as he walks through Jerusalem's streets. They should have been thronging with people, contrite in spirit, making their way to the temple in a corporate act of penitence.

Verse 14 contains one of the Bible's most terrifying sentences, comparable perhaps to the words of Rev 22:11. The revelers had probably slaughtered the animals used by them for their feasts at Jerusalem's temple. Let them not think, though, that any sacrifice could be offered to atone for this sin. At the very time when God's promises to protect Jerusalem were being so wonderfully fulfilled, the threat was given that the city would most certainly fall one day before its enemies and that nothing—just nothing—could avert the judgment of God on it.

15–16 Terrifying as this threat of judgment undoubtedly was, it might seem to some to lose something of its horror because it was so general. After all, Jerusalem was a community; and when an act of judgment strikes a group of people, any individual may seek to assure himself that he has simply been caught up in the consequences of other people's sins, whereas he himself is without specific blame. Isaiah allows no such escape route for the hardened conscience. God's people are dealing with "the Lord, the LORD Almighty."

The spotlight of judgment is now directed toward one man, Shebna, the steward of the king's palace (cf. 36:3, 11, 22; 37:2). The pyramid tombs of the Pharaohs epitomize the desire of prominent people in the ancient Near East to have a grandiose burying place so that they would be the objects of adulation for centuries after their death.

17–19 "Beware" forebodes for Shebna a future scene different from the one he had planned. The words "O you mighty man" take him at this own estimate of himself. God will show him who it is that has real power, for God will project him ignominiously out of his office and into another land—surely a reference to Assyria. The splendid tomb, hewn out at his order in some place of prominence, will not then be a witness to his greatness but to his overweening ambition; for he would lie dead in an alien land. He perhaps had paraded through Jerusalem's streets in ceremonial chariots (cf. 2Sa 15:1; 1Ki 1:5); but he would now be seen to be, not the glory of his master, the king, but his disgrace.

The contempt felt for Shebna is summed up in the scornful expression "this steward" (v.15). Perhaps this oracle does not tell us the whole reason for this contempt, that allied to the official's ambition and pride was a political policy (probably pro-Egyptian) that ran counter to Isaiah's message for the king and the people to trust only in the Lord. This would certainly explain why this oracle is associated here with the one in vv.1–14.

20–23 Shebna had been riding ostentatiously in his chariots and building a splendid grave for himself, seeking in all this the praise of other people. How much better to have God's smile of approval and to be described, in a simple but eloquent phrase, as "my servant." Eliakim, who is also—like Shebna—mentioned in 36:3, 11, 22, and 37:2, is to take over Shebna's office and so to be given his ceremonial robes (cf. comment on 36:3). The word "father" suggests both his authority over the people of Jerusalem and the provision he would make for them in virtue of his office. Verse 22 is to be understood literally, for the steward would have the large master key of the palace fastened to the shoulder of his tunic (but cf. Rev 3:7; see also Mt 16:19; 18:18).

The simile of a "tent peg" symbolizes the stability of the kingdom (cf. 33:20). Through Eliakim his whole family would advance in social dignity, promoted, as it were, to a seat closer to the throne at the royal table. Apparently Eliakim had a different policy from that of Shebna, more in line with Isaiah's counsel to trust in God. If so, his advice to the king would help to secure a real and not just an apparent strength to the nation in a time of international insecurity.

24–25 The mood of the oracle changes dramatically. The true honor of "my servant" (v.20) is replaced by a satirical picture that reveals almost as much contempt as that shown toward Shebna in vv.15–19. Shebna's great sin was pride, but Eliakim's was nepotism. There is a legitimate honor that comes to those related to a family head with a high position in the land. Eliakim had, however, been chosen for office because of his own qualities, not theirs. The peg is not now seen giving strength to the tent but rather fastened to the wall of the palace kitchen with a motley assortment of kitchen vessels hanging from it (cf. Zec 14:21). The temptations of high office are many, and those who occupy them need the prayers of God's people.

M. Prophecy Against Tyre (23:1–18)

Phoenicia, with its two important ports of Tyre and Sidon, was the maritime commercial state contemporary with much of OT history. Until the time of the Assyrians, who had designs on the whole Mediterranean seaboard and its hinterland, this small state and its important commercial cities had been left relatively undisturbed by conflict. It certainly merited judgment, however, and would experience this at the hands of the Assyrians, just as other states in the area were to face. During the period 705–701 B.C., Sennacherib turned his attention to Phoenicia, which had been a nominal part of the Assyrian Empire for some time. The country was devastated, and Tyre itself was subjected to a long and bitter siege. It was later also besieged by the Babylonians, the Persians, and the Greeks under Alexander the Great, who virtually destroyed it in 333 B.C. after one of the greatest sieges in history. It may be that the prophecy, in terms of its fulfillment, incorporates elements from some of these later times as well as the time of the Assyrian onslaught.

1–5 The Phoenicians had a number of colonies and dependent trading-stations in the Mediterranean. Tarshish, probably in Spain, and some of the cities of Cyprus were among these. Ships making their way back eastward from Tarshish would call at Cyprus before completing their journey to Tyre. At Cyprus they would hear that their harbor had been destroyed; so they could not complete their journey. Sidon (v.2) was the other port that alternated with Tyre as the chief port of the land. The Phoenicians had special commercial links with Egypt, and no doubt many a Tyrian or Sidonian vessel would carry large quantities of grain from the fields of Shihor, in the Nile Valley. These commercial ties would be viewed with considerable suspicion by the Assyrians and other rulers of various world-empires, for Egypt was usually the final major enemy to be overcome before complete mastery of the Fertile Crescent and the eastern Mediterranean could be achieved.

The sea is personified as the mother of the Phoenicians, and nothing could be more appropriate. With so many Sidonians slaughtered by Assyria, Sidon was bereft of her children and left as if she had never had them. The sadness of the sea is matched by that of Egypt, whose trading links with Tyre and Sidon gave her sympathy.

6–9 The prophet next turns to the people of the nearest Phoenician colony, Cyprus. They would take the news farther west to Tarshish or even, perhaps, flee there. The prophet points to the contrast between Tyre's past gaiety and wide-flung colonization and commercialism and its current humbling under the mighty hand of God. No doubt all the rulers of world empires from Assyria onward would plan to deal with Tyre on their way to other victories; but her downfall was really the work of the Lord, whose counsels ultimately prevail in the affairs of humankind. Isaiah never tires of saying that God is absolutely opposed to human pride in its every form.

10–12a Isaiah warns the Phoenicians that their trading links with Tarshish and Egypt should not induce complacency in them in the face of the threat of divine judgment (cf. Jnh 1:3–4). The hand that had been stretched out over the Red Sea in judgment on the Egyptians in the time of Moses was stretched out now even over the Mediterranean. No kingdom on its coasts could reckon itself immune from God's righteous wrath.

12b–14 If this prophecy comes from the year 703 or a little after, then it refers to the ferocious attack of Sennacherib, who had an almost pathological loathing of the Babylonians. If it is be dated a few years earlier, it could refer to the campaign of Sargon II against the Chaldeans in 710. Both events predate Sennacherib's attack on Tyre in 701. Neither Tyre nor even Cyprus, across the sea, could be regarded as a haven of safety when Assyria, the instrument of God's wrath (cf. 10:5–11), was on the rampage.

15–18 Many of Isaiah's oracles contain a note of surprise at their end, and so often it is a word of grace (cf. 8:16–9:7; 19:1–25; 42:18–43:13). Here, however, there is to be a partial reprieve, with a new period of commercial success for Tyre, but with a view not so much to the blessing of her people but to supply the needs of the house of God in Jerusalem.

The period of seventy years is familiar to readers of Jeremiah (cf. Jer 25:11–12; 29:10), where it refers to the captivity of the Jews in Babylon; here, however, it applies to Tyre.

A careful study of the symbolic picture of Babylon in the book of Revelation reveals that not only did "Babylon" prophecies in the OT go into the construction of this picture but other oracles as well, and especially those against Tyre. The description of the great city as a harlot (Rev 17) probably owes something to this present passage. The comparison is appropriate, for the harlot bedecks herself in gaudy finery and enters into a commercial transaction with her clients. Seaports have always been particularly notorious in connection with prostitution. Tyre was an old, old city and so would need to attract her clients now by singing some song associated with her trade.

There is an important link here between the oracles against the nations (which come to their conclusion with this prophecy against Phoenicia) and the range of prophecies that occur later in the book. All three major parts of the book contain the notion that people from the Gentile nations will come up to Jerusalem, not only to worship (cf. 2:1–5; 49:6–7; 60:1), but also to make their treasures available for the use of the chosen people and in the temple of God (cf. 18:7; 45:14; 49:22–23; 60:9–14). This motif, therefore, gives a further change of tone to the final verse of the oracle. God's ultimate plan for Tyre—as for Ethiopia, Egypt, and Assyria (cf. 18:7; 19:18–25)—was to bring her into line with his central purpose for Israel. As in the days of Solomon, material from Israel's northern neighbor would again be used in the service of the temple (cf. 1Ki 5:1–12).

III. God and the Whole World (24:1–27:13)

A. The Judgment of the World (24:1–23)

This chapter is fundamental to the three that follow it. It speaks of a universal judgment. Not only does it make no reference to particular nations or specific historical events, it does not even restrict the judgment to the earth. This means that it sums up all the judgments on particular nations, as predicted in chs. 13–23, and goes beyond them.

1–3 These verses are a fitting introduction to the chapter. They call for inner vision in the opening word "see" (GK 2180), so that the prophet is eager for his hearers to share what he has been given. A universal judgment on the earth is proclaimed, affecting all its inhabitants. What kind of disaster does the prophet have in mind here? "Lay waste" (GK 1327) signifies emptying. This emptying is amplified when the prophet says, "He will ruin its face." Perhaps the prophet is thinking of an earthquake, so that the inhabitants are scattered by the violence of the tremor. Or perhaps he is contemplating an extreme drought (cf. v.7), so that the earth's surface is dried up and cracked (cf. Mk 13:8).

Isaiah seems to have had the early chapters of Genesis in mind as he uttered the prophecies of this chapter. At the Tower of Babel judgment, the people were scattered (cf. Ge 11:9); and this was to happen again. God's judgment would be completely indiscriminate, for it would affect all strata of society. The religious, social, and economic relationships of human life would not restrain it. The affirmation that God has spoken underlines the certainty of the judgments predicted. They are so terrifying and so universal that some such assurance is needed.

4–6 These verses are characterized by a strong moral tone. The true and living God carries out his judgments on moral principles, not as the expression of an arbitrary will. If human kings experience his righteous wrath, it is because their actions and their way of life are contrary to his will.

Modern society is concerned about the physical pollution of our environment. Isaiah deals with the even more tragic and urgent matter of moral pollution, which is as widespread and serious today as it was in the eighth century B.C. While v.5 might seem especially appropriate to Israel, because of her possession of the Mosaic Law, the context makes it plain that the whole world is in view. The world did not possess the moral commandments of God in written form as in the Mosaic Law; but those laws nevertheless represent the will of God for humankind, and the human race is under judgment for their violation. The word "disobeyed" (GK 6296) implies at least some awareness of these moral requirements in the human conscience (cf. Ro 1:18–32; 2:11–16), thus an element of deliberateness in sin.

The judgment on original sin has already been passed, of course, and what is before us here is an eschatological judgment executed on the whole human race after centuries of disobedience to God. The earth—at the beginning placed under the dominion of the human race—has already been cursed and bears the scars of human folly. Bearing guilt means suffering its consequences and so experiencing punishment at the hand of God.

7–9 Although this judgment is universal, it appears to be carried out on earth, like many of the judgments in the book of Revelation; and there will be a remnant of humankind surviving it. The Genesis curse had affected the plant world, and thus the man whose daily work took him into the fields (Ge 3:17–19). Here the further curse of judgment affects the vines and those who use them to make drink. The prophet seems to be presenting a scene in which the vineyards are under judgment, so that little wine is available and that which is produced is bitter to the taste. The instrumental music and singing that often accompany bouts of drinking are heard no more. All the joy seems to have gone out of life, for the God of judgment is abroad.

10–13 Much has been written about the various references to "the city" in chs. 24–27. There have been many attempts to identify it with some particular city, especially Jerusalem or Babylon or an unnamed Moabite city. These attempts are probably all on the wrong track. As Clement has noted, it can best be understood as a pictorial description of organized human society, a type of "Vanity Fair." "When God asserts his will in judgment, he will bring to an end the existing human order, so that in a sense every city will be brought to chaos." These passages, therefore, help to prepare the way for the symbolic use of Babylon in the book of Revelation.

The city is in ruins; the entrances to all its standing houses are blocked, perhaps because of much rubble in the streets or because of a spirit of fear that has gripped the hearts of its remaining inhabitants. They lock themselves within their houses, hoping they will be safe from judgment (cf. 2:19, 21). Those still out in the streets are overtaken by a spirit of gloom, symbolized by the lack of wine (cf. vv.7–9). Earlier Isaiah had spoken about the judgment of Ephraim, in league with Damascus, and likened the tiny remnant left after judgment to a few olive berries left on the remotest branches of a tree that had been beaten during harvest, to secure the maximum yield (cf. 17:6). Isaiah uses the same image here, but now in relation to the whole world.

14–16a Like Revelation, chs. 24–27 have the declarations of coming judgment interspersed with songs of thanksgiving. There has been a great judgment, but God has not made a full end to the earth's population. Those who remain lift up their voices in grateful praise to him. But who are they? Jews? Gentiles? or both? The book of Isaiah provides examples both of Jews (12:3–6) and of Gentiles (42:10–13) giving praise to God from the ends of the earth. What favors Gentiles is the reference to "the islands of the sea," for these are not normally associated with Jews. In fact, later in the book the phrase often refers to Gentiles considered collectively (cf. 41:5; 42:4, 10; et al.) That the Lord is described as "the God of Israel" must be regarded as neutral or perhaps even as slightly in favor of a reference to the Gentiles.

What begins as a purely factual statement becomes an exhortation before emerging again as an affirmation, implying that the exhortation has been heeded. The prophet heard the song first of all in the west. He called on those in the east to blend their voices also in harmony of praise to the Lord. As a result, the praises of the God of Israel ascend on all sides.

16b–20 The welcome interlude of praise is over. A balanced picture of the future in the Bible contains notes of judgment and salvation. The solemn fact, however, is that more space is given in Scripture to future judgment than to future salvation.

In face of the threats in v.17, the prophet lifts his voice in great sadness. Perhaps he saw his present attitude of sorrow as continuous with the future song of praise to be sung at the ends of the earth, because both were motivated by a desire for the glory of the Lord. To express one's gratitude to God for his grace and to reveal a sorrowful concern about the treacherous acts of humankind is to manifest the character of a godly person.

In Isaiah's day the international scene was dominated by the Assyrians. We think of international law as a comparatively modern phenomenon, but there were conventions and treaties in the ancient Near East. Aggression was never welcome; but when it was married to treachery, it was to be doubly feared. The prophet felt a deep horror as he thought about this, and he identified with his people's fear.

If vv.17–18 describe the effects of Assyrian aggression on the nations, there is a thematic unity to the present and the future, for the prophet may well be saying that the present Assyrian scourge is to be replaced ultimately by an ever greater and more widespread judgment from God. God is the divine Hunter who pursues his guilty prey inexorably to a kill. There is no escape from the judgment of God (cf. Heb 2:1–3).

The language of the hunt is replaced by that of a flood, with allusion to the judgment of the Flood (cf. Ge 7:11). Isaiah does not seem to be thinking of an actual worldwide flood here, for God had promised that such a flood would never happen again (Ge 9:11–17). But the language of the Flood was appropriate to represent pictorially other great acts of judgment.

The whole earthly order is proved to be unstable (v.19), just as if some colossal earthquake had taken hold of it. Evidently all that can be shaken is being shaken. The drunken man and the swaying hut (v.20) convey an impression of total instability. Earlier the prophet had used the image of a hut (1:2, 8) to describe the divinely ordained effects of rebellion against God.

21–23 The vision of judgment that has already included the whole earth becomes yet wider, for it is seen to encompass "the powers in the heavens" as well as "the kings on the earth." The term "powers" (GK 7372) is sometimes used of the heavenly bodies (34:4; 40:26; 45:12) and sometimes of the angelic armies (1Ki 22:19; 2Ch 18:18). Since the prophet is speaking about punishment—despite the reference to other heavenly bodies in v.23—we take "powers" to apply to fallen angels (cf. Eph 6:12). The two sets of powers—in heaven and on earth—are at one in the fact of their rebellion but also in the possession of authority. Rebellion by a subordinate authority is serious, for such a being may well drag others down with him. Isaiah 14 pictures the great king of Babylon descending to Sheol. Here it seems that both the heavenly and the earthly rebels are confined in some kind of prison (cf. 2Pe 2:4; Jude 6; Rev 20:1–3).

Some suggest that "after many days" (v.22) refers to the Millennium, which harmonizes with a premillennial interpretation of Revelation, in which the spiritual powers of evil are bound in prison during the reign of Christ on earth, after which they—along with the unsaved dead—suffer eternal punishment in the lake of fire. "After many days" suggests that the imprisonment referred to in v.22 is an anticipation of God's final punishment.

The sun and the moon were created by God "to govern" (GK 4939) the day and the night (Ge 1:16–17). This expression, with its implication of authority, suggests that the term "host" can apply to both heavenly bodies and angelic beings (see comment on v.21) because there is in fact a relationship between them, with parts of the visible universe representing the spheres of authority of unseen heavenly beings. Whether or not this is true, the prophet pictures the two great heavenly bodies hiding their lights in shame when the Lord exercises direct rule in Jerusalem. All other glory is simply a reflection of his glory, and one day it will be seen that it can be no rival to him (cf. Rev 21:23).

The language of locality in v.23 may be literal or symbolic, in the latter case forming a link with the New Jerusalem of Revelation. The vision of Revelation also shows twenty-four elders, probably representing the redeemed under the old and new covenants, before the throne of God (Rev 4:4).

B. Psalms and Predictions of Judgment and Salvation (25:1–12)

The typical OT prophet is characteristically thought of as being a descending rather than an ascending mediator; that is, he functions for God toward humanity rather than for the human race toward God. This is, of course, only broadly true, for the prophet Amos prayed for the people to whom his stern messages of judgment were addressed (Am 7:2, 5), and Micah was virtually uttering the praises of the God of mercy in the last three verses of his book. Yet none of the prophets include so much praise among their oracles as did Isaiah. He was a psalmist as well as a prophet.

1–5 Isaiah's call came to him in the temple (ch. 6), and he must often have joined the worshipers in songs of praise. The language of Psalms was in his heart. The prophet's song of praise is so worded that it may apply almost equally well to his own day or to the eschatological future he has portrayed so vividly in the previous chapter. There is a fitness about this, for God's activities at the End are all of a piece with what he does throughout history; and they provide a climax to the story of his dealings with humankind. What had been done was yet to be done.

The prophet displays a sense of personal relationship with God that is reminiscent of the psalmists of Israel. The focus of his praise is not simply the acts of God but his faithfulness. Each act of God reveals his attributes and makes us aware of what he is in his perfect character. The word translated "marvelous" occurs in one of the names of the messianic Child in 9:6. In the present context Isaiah is giving praise to God after describing his coming judgment on all the earth. The maleficent schemes and actions of people can never overturn God's own sovereign purpose, eternal in conception, declared in his Word, and executed in due time.

In our comment at 24:10–13, we accepted the view that references to a city of destruction in chs. 24–27 do not have any particular city in view but are general designations of society organized apart from any reference to God. Each specific city is a manifestation in a particular place and time of the general city-spirit, the determination that life is organized for human ends and not for the purposes of God. Such cities have often been brought down, and many will suffer such an overthrow in the future (cf. 40:23–24). The logical word "therefore" in v.3 should be especially noted. God's judgment of these cities leads the strong and ruthless nations to honor and revere the Lord.

The Psalms often extol the God of Israel as the Refuge and Shelter of his people. Verse 4 uses three different words, the first of them—"refuge"—repeated, to stress the same thought. The "poor" and "needy" stand in strong contrast to the "strong" and "ruthless nations" of v.3. Judah had faced the current representative of the spirit of ruthless militarism and imperial aggrandizement. She was, of course, utterly powerless, but she had found that her God had placed his wall of protection around her (see esp. chs. 36–37). He had been her refuge ever since the Exodus from Egypt (Dt 33:27). Contrasting weather conditions provide further illustrations of God's protecting care.

Isaiah has a most sensitive awareness of the power of words and the various ways one word may be used to convey somewhat different ideas. He moves easily here from the figure of the shady place to that of the shadow cast by a cloud, both giving protection from the fierce summer heat, yet in different ways. The raucous battle cries of the foreign armies become a triumph song when God intervenes on behalf of his people, and all is changed.

6–8 There is a close connection between v.6 and 24:23. We must not forget that chs. 24–27 constitute a special section within the book and that all the diverse parts of it are bound together into one. As the Lord's eschatological purposes unfold, he will reign in glory on Mount Zion. The prophet has already pictured the Gentile nations coming up to that mountain for worship (2:1–4); v.6 gives us a view of the great feast God will prepare for them.

Verse 7 may refer to the blindness of the nations, which in the past caused them to worship false gods. The theme of light from God is important in Isaiah, and in ch. 60 the prophet pictures the shining of a great light over God's people and all the nations moving out of the darkness that covers them and into that light. On the other hand, the prophet may have mourning veils or even a shroud of death in his mind. If this is so, then vv.7–8 are concerned with God's victory over death.

Paul quotes v.8a at 1Co 15:54 in application to the doctrine of resurrection. If God is going to deal finally with death and so with the tears occasioned by it, and if vv.6–8 are intended to continue and develop the thought that ch. 24 closes with, this raises an important issue of prophetic interpretation. The banishment of death belongs to the final stage of God's great plan and is associated with the descent from heaven of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21:1–4). This suggests that Mount Zion and Jerusalem in 24:23 are not geographical terms but symbols for the ultimate society. This raises, therefore, the question of the relationship between the Millennium and the final state. It is most unlikely, of course—especially if v.7 is understood as a reference to the removal of spiritual blindness—that vv.6–7 (as well as 24:23) refer to the Millennium but that the prophecy moves on to the final state in v.8.

The disgrace of God's people can be best understood in the light of the later prophecy given in Eze 5:13–17. It lies in the fact that those who are destined by him for salvation must suffer judgment at his hands because of their sins. This too will pass away when that Day comes. God now stresses that these are his own promises, and so they cannot fail.

9 Once more we hear a song of praise to the Lord (cf. 24:14–16; 25:1–5). It wonderfully expresses the joy in God that comes when patient trust finds its reward in a consummated salvation. Its ideas and language are thoroughly characteristic of this prophet.

10–12 The destinies of Jerusalem and of Moab are here contrasted. The physical proximity of Mount Zion and the mountains of Moab should not be forgotten. The Moabite plateau can be clearly seen from Jerusalem, and this might even be included in the prophet's vision of this mountain exalted above all the surrounding hills (2:1–4). Moab, so easily visible, may therefore represent the surrounding pagan nations. If the purposes of the Lord are to triumph, so that all the nations will find their reconciliation with him and with one another at Mount Zion, it follows that their own pagan and aggressive purposes must be thwarted.

In a powerful anthropomorphic figure, the prophet pictures the Lord's hand resting in blessing on Mount Zion and his feet trampling on Moab in judgment (cf. 40:11; 63:3). The following similes are intentionally unpleasant and probably suggest that sin in its vileness reaps a harvest of judgment that is appropriate to it.

The pride of Moab is symbolized by the high fortified walls that surrounded its cities, making the people think them impregnable. The fall of the cities despite their protective battlement is just another reminder of the physical symbols of pride that are crowded together in 2:1–18. It is also an example of the general judgment threatened in v.2 on strong fortified towns.

C. Praise, Prayer, and Prophecy (26:1–21)

The movement of thought is beautiful. The prophet begins by uttering a song of praise, sung by Judah of the future. Its theme is the trustworthiness of God who protects the city of his oppressed people and destroys that of their oppressors (vv.1–6). Next Isaiah meditates on the ways of the righteous and of the wicked (vv.7–11). The Lord has blessed his people, despite their former acknowledgment of the lordship of other deities (vv.12–15). The people had been through a lot but accomplished little blessing for the world, and they confess this (vv.16–18). The God of grace then promises them a joyful resurrection to new life (v.19) after the revelation of his wrath against sin (vv.20–21).

1–6 The way chs. 24–27 are punctuated with songs of praise affects this whole section of the prophecy, for even the threats of judgment are seen in the perspective of thanksgiving that God is bringing his own purposes to fruition and that human arrogance and tyranny will not prevail in the end. The theme of the two cities links this passage with chs. 24 and 25. God here gives strength to the city by making salvation its walls and ramparts.

Every year large numbers of people from all parts of the land made pilgrimages to Jerusalem (cf. Dt 16) to take part in the great feasts. Many of the Psalms (e.g., Pss 120–34) were connected with these pilgrimages (cf. Ac 2:5–11). Isaiah may have had some such pilgrimage in mind here, or he may have had permanent settlement in view, the city being part physical expression and part symbol for the whole people of God, "the nation that keeps faith" (v.2). The latter seems more likely.

This righteous nation is made up of individuals who trust in the Lord, for the new covenant purpose of God provides for a gracious personal knowledge of him for every person included within that covenant (Jer 31:31–34). The gates of the city admit the returning members of the dispersed nation, and its walls symbolize divine protection; the Lord is himself the protecting Rock in whom believers trust. Just as there is a place of peace within the city for those who dwell in it with God (cf. Ps 46), so the Lord gives "peace" to those who repose confidence in him.

Verses 5–6 take up again the theme of God's judgment on the worldly city. Once again the language of physical elevation is used to suggest pride (cf. 2:12–18). So often an ancient city was built on raised ground so as to gain the maximum military advantage from its physical elevation, which then became the basis for walls, battlements, and other means of defense. This stress on the vertical dimension became part of the typical image of the city for most people. When God judges the pride of the city, he lays it low. Here presumably the people of God who have suffered oppression from it tread it under foot. This suggests that they share in his victory (cf. Ps 110:2–3; 2Co 2:14).

7–11 The prophet describes the way of the righteous and contrasts this with the outlook of the wicked in a fashion reminiscent of Ps 1. The God of the righteous is himself righteous, and he is described here as "upright" (GK 3838)—a term used of God's word (Ps 33:4), his judgments (Ps 119:137), and his ways (Dt 32:4). Physical uprightness is often the linguistic basis for the moral concept of righteousness. The words also suggest appropriateness of destiny. Those who are straight or "on the level" have their path smoothed by the God who is upright.

"Laws" (GK 5477) is a better translation than"judgments" in v.8 (see NIV note), as this fits the context much better. Just as the NT believer looks forward "to a new heaven and a new earth, the home of righteousness" (2Pe 3:13), so the OT saint, represented here by Isaiah, longed for the coming of a day when God's name would be honored fittingly. The words "we wait for you" show Isaiah's conviction that such a day would come—and come by the activity of God himself. This passionate longing is not just a deep desire for a better order, a kind of moral Utopia. The whole expectation is personal; the prophet longs for God, day and night.

Sin blinds the mind of sinners so that they see nothing from a divine perspective, least of all their own sin. It is a function of judgment to teach humans the seriousness of sin and to show them that God cares deeply about righteousness (cf. Ac 5:1–14). In this respect, the prophet assures us, judgment is more effective than grace. Isaiah stresses that the wicked may receive undeservedly many blessings from the hand of God and yet show no more regard for the righteousness that so greatly concerns him. Not only so, but even where general moral conditions are favorable to righteousness (i.e., in a time of spiritual revival), the wicked are determined to go their own way. Even now, God's hand is uplifted, ready to strike them in judgment; but they are totally unaware of it. The prophet identifies himself completely with the judgment of God on the wicked (cf. Rev 19:1–5). We must compassionately seek to bring the gospel to others, but on the day of judgment we must accept his every verdict; for as the Judge of all the earth, he does only what is right.

12–15 In v.11 Isaiah spoke about God's zeal for his people. It is as if Isaiah became suddenly aware of the contrast between God's dealing with Israel and with the nations and is moved to make this confession of the great unworthiness of those who have received such rich blessings from God. Verse 12 was probably written after the divine protection of Jerusalem in 701 B.C., expressing a profound truth that is destructive of spiritual pride.

The name "LORD" (GK 3378) is the distinctive name of the God of Israel by which he is set apart from every false god. Obviously this does not suggest that the "other lords [GK 123]" had real existence as deities but simply that they were believed to have and that their rule was sinfully acknowledged by the people in past times. It is possible to regard these "other lords" as the various nations that had exercised sovereignty over God's people, and certainly v.14 must refer to human beings. Perhaps it is best to think in terms of both false deities and the foreign rulers who regarded themselves as their representatives, the first being emphasized in v.13 and the second in v.14.

The rise and fall of nations and of great empires is a fact of history, and Isaiah sees it to be due to the activity of God in the story of humankind (cf. 40:23–24). Isaiah has already vividly pictured the descent of the king of Babylon into the world of departed spirits in 14:12–21, and now he makes it clear that this is the way all Israel's past oppressors have gone.

In 54:1–3 Isaiah foretells the expansion of the nation (cf. 9:3). We should, therefore, treat v.15 as predictive, expressing the prophet's certainty that what God has promised is as sure as if it has taken place already. Isaiah 9:7 contains the intriguing promise "of the increase of his government and peace there will be no end" (emphasis mine). All this will bring glory to God because it is his act, not theirs (cf. v.12), and because it will result in the showing forth of his glory in areas where paganism formerly held sway.

16–18 The prophet looks into the future as if it has all ready occurred. The people would come to the Lord in distress but with great earnestness. That "they could barely whisper a prayer" reminds us that fervor and noise are not necessarily spiritual companions. The phrase "when you discipline them" suggests that the prayer was motivated not only by distress because of foreign oppression but also by sorrow for sin.

The experience of childbirth forms the basis for a forceful analogy. The nation tried to achieve her own salvation, when, in fact, God alone could bring his own purposes for her to birth. Israel was like a woman in labor because of the pains she had suffered, yet unlike her in not giving birth to a child. All the suffering had been in vain. It was, in fact, to be only through the Servant of the Lord (52:13–53:12), not through Israel's suffering without him, that salvation would be brought to the earth. Birth into God's kingdom for the nations (Ps 87:4–7) is God's work alone—through his Messiah-Servant—and beyond the capacity of Israel herself. Only through him who is the true seed of Abraham (Gal 3:16, 28–29) can the nations become his children and so inherit the promise made to him (Ge 12:1–3; et al.).

19 This verse presents a glorious contrast for Israel not only with the dead and impotent tyrants who have lorded over her in the past (v.14) but with the strenuous and yet ineffective endeavors of Israel herself to bring forth spiritual fruit (vv.17–18). Certainly there are metaphors here, for the prophet calls the dead to awake and asserts that the earth will give birth to her dead. The metaphorical, however, must always rest on the literal; and it is with the literal that this verse commences: "But your dead will live; their bodies will rise." This verse itself prepares the way for Da 12:2, which fills out more fully the destinies of the righteous and the wicked beyond death and subsequent resurrection.

20–21 A time will come when God's wrath will have passed by. This "wrath" may be his wrath with Israel herself, and during the Exile the people are to encourage themselves with the assurance that this judgment on them will come to an end in God's good time. On the other hand, the wrath may be that expressed in God's punishment of the nations, which v.21 relates to. The latter is more likely because there is an allusion to the Passover in v.20. Just as the people of Israel found refuge within the blood-sprinkled doors of their homes (Ex 12), until the wrath of God against Egypt spent itself, so Israel is told to hide for a while, perhaps in Babylonian exile. Shutting the doors suggests safety and separation from the surrounding pagans, who were under judgment. Israel in exile was called to be a holy people.

While the people are hidden away in their places, God comes forth from his place for a punitive purpose. Verse 21 is a reminder of the general context and of the disclosure of the cosmic judgment given in ch. 24. The earth is not only the burial place of many who will desert her at the Resurrection; she has also admitted the blood and bodies of many whose deaths have been due to the sins of others, the terrible consequences of the acts of violent people. Places where great human tragedies and horrifying sins have taken place may disclose no evidence of their history to the casual passer-by, but on the day of the Lord's judgment on sin that evidence will appear to the terrified eyes of the perpetrators. Such secrets belong to time, not to eternity.

D. The Restoration of Israel (27:1–13)

The eschatological-apocalyptic section of Isa 24–27 is concerned with God's final purposes in the world. The prophecies recorded here concern the whole world, but they also relate to Israel and her place in the universal purposes of God.

1 This fascinating verse presents a graphic picture of God the great Warrior, going into battle against fearsome and monstrous enemies and utterly defeating them. The language draws on mythology; but this need cause us no serious problems. Writers frequently use illustrative material from a wide variety of sources. The use of mythology here simply shows that Isaiah and his readers knew these stories, not that they believed them.

The succession of adjectives describing the sword of the Lord stresses the fearsomeness of this weapon and so emphasizes that judgment will be completely effective. Some commentators suggest that if "his fierce, great and powerful sword" is in apposition to "his sword," so "Leviathan the coiling serpent" is in apposition to "Leviathan the gliding serpent." This would mean that the prophet had only two enemies in mind, not three. But if there are two Leviathans here, the first being perhaps a reference to the fast-flowing Tigris where the Assyrian heartland was and the second to the more sluggish and therefore more twisting Euphrates, the great river of the Babylonians, then the monster of the sea becomes Egypt, to complete the trio of Israel's great oppressors. But we can hold the latter interpretation and still think of the two phrases as being in apposition, so that the two Mesopotamian enemies are thought of as different manifestations of the same evil power centered in the Tigris-Euphrates basin.

2–6 One of the most memorable passages in Isaiah occurs in 5:1–7. Isaiah's parable of the vineyard there demonstrates that beauty of language and solemnity of theme are not inconsistent with each other. Moreover, his use there of the vineyard for Israel established this word as a symbol, used also here.

The phrase "in that day" (repeated from v.1) suggests that both the judgment on the enemies of God's people and Israel's own blessing belong to the same general eschatological era. In ch. 5, the vineyard is barren, unproductive, and threatened with judgment. Here, however, it is fruitful. There the parable began as a happy song to lull the hearers into a complacent mood and so take them unawares with the message of judgment. Here the opening mood is similar, but this time the atmosphere is sustained throughout.

"A fruitful vineyard" is literally "a vineyard of wine." This suggests both comparison and contrast with ch. 5. In v.3 the thought of 5:2 is carried through but expressed quite differently. There is even more emphasis on the loving concern of the Lord for this vineyard, and it is made clear that never for one moment does he forget its needs or relax his vigilance, lest it should become a prey to its enemies. The constant watering reminds us of Jeremiah's repeated assertion (Jer 7:25; et al.) that the Lord repeatedly sent his servants the prophets to speak to his people.

The wonderful statement that opens v.4 can be understood only in the light of the expression "in that day." The prophet is not describing Israel that then was but the Israel that was to be, when the wrath of God was past (cf. 40:2). "Briers and thorns" (likely meant to represent internal rather than external enemies, i.e., paganizers, not pagans) appear in ch. 5 both as part of the judgment of God on the vineyard and as the final evidence of its lack of real fruit. Here God pledges himself to destroy them should any such appear again to threaten his vineyard. Indeed, he appears eager to do this, perhaps as evidence of his covenant faithfulness to his people and his determination to do them good in every possible way.

Verse 5 is a neglected OT promise of forgiveness to the penitent. In v.4 the God of battles is marching against the briers and thorns with a flaming torch in his hand, about to set fire to this rank undergrowth. But before doing so, he proclaims the alternative of peace. His action against the briers and thorns is for the protection of his people, but in v.5 the enemies themselves are offered refuge (cf. 25:4), if they will accept his terms of peace.

Verse 6 brings the parable to a beautiful climax. The prophet does not speak of Judah but of Israel, for he has the whole people in view, represented now by a plant rather than a vineyard. The picture is at first perfectly normal. The root, the bud, and the blossom depict strong and healthy growth, everything happening in its season. The unexpected comes at the end. This plant will become extraordinarily extensive (cf. 16:8), filling the whole world with its fruit. Perhaps this is an allusion to the fruitfulness and extensive influence of Joseph promised in Ge 49:22. We can certainly see a spiritual fulfillment of this in the progress of the gospel throughout the world, for the Messiah is himself the true Vine (Jn 15:1–8) and his disciples the fruit-bearing branches. In this way God's purpose for Israel finds its expression in those who are joined by faith to him.

7–11 The word "Jacob" is used both within this immediate passage (v.9) and in its context (v.6), which suggests that Israel (the northern kingdom) rather than Judah is in mind. The fortified city could be Samaria, and the exile of v.8 would then follow its fall. A reference to Judah is not, of course, impossible. In this case the city would be Jerusalem and the exile in Babylon.

A third possibility takes into account that many of the references to cities in chs. 24–27 are general. The reference to Israel (i.e., Jacob) may be taken as the designation, not of Israel apart from Judah (the northern kingdom), but of Israel including Judah. The whole people and their judgment are in view. The fortified city stands for each stronghold overcome by the Mesopotamian enemies, and the Exile is the common experience of the whole people. A section of the book whose general subject is so comprehensive might be expected to treat the chosen nation as a whole in its concluding chapter. This is the standpoint from which we will view these verses.

The subject of v.7 is clearly the Lord. The questions are like those of the imaginary Jewish objector in Ro 3:1–8. There is no doubt that the new parable of the vineyard in vv.2–6 does not tell the whole story of Israel's relationship with God; for he has taken punitive action against his own people, not only against their adversaries. Despite the undoubted fact that God had often to beat his people very severely (e.g., 1:4–9), the implied answer to the question is no. God does make a distinction between his own people and their oppressors. All the chastisement is for a good end, to bring them to repentance.

Characteristically, Isaiah refers to judgment as a fierce wind (cf. 4:4; 41:16). The scorching east wind, driving the hot desert sand before it, was much dreaded (Ge 41:6; Job 27:21–22; Jer 18:17; et al.). Both the Assyrian and the Babylonian enemies came from the east and moved captives from Israel and Judah into exile. But exile, unlike destruction, is punishment tempered by mercy; for there is still life and therefore still hope.

It may seem strange that the language of atonement is used in v.9 in application to the penitence induced by exile rather than in reference to sacrifice. Through exile the nation would come to a penitent awareness of its guilt. The actual objective basis of its reconciliation with God is not so much in view as the practical cause of that reconciliation. The people were removed so that their sins might be removed. This becomes clear when we read the whole of v.9, for it is about a new attitude to the will of God, the product of a penitent heart. Isaiah is in line here with Jer 31:31–34 and Eze 36:24–31.

Israel's penitence would show itself especially in the destruction of pagan altars and symbols (cf. Ex 34:13; Dt 12:2–3). After God had purified Israel through banishment from the land and the experience of exile, she would return much chastened to carry out this commandment that she failed to do thoroughly enough at the beginning of her sojourn in the land.

In northern Israel, Samaria and other cities had been devastated by the Assyrians, who had also desolated many cities of Judah (1:7). Jerusalem too would eventually go the same way, through the Babylonians. Isaiah often represents the effects of judgment through war as the virtual reversal of civilization (e.g., 3:4–6; 5:17; 7:23–25). This language is quite literal. When a city is reduced to rubble, the domestic animals normally pastured outside the city are free to cross the broken walls and roam in the city. Soon vegetation emerges through cracks in the streets and between the fallen stones. The ghost town eventually has trees growing in it, and these will feed animals with their bark and supply firewood for the women of the surrounding villages.

In some respects Isaiah stood in the wisdom as well as in the prophetic tradition. His prophecies place emphasis from time to time on the importance of wisdom and discernment and the seriousness of inner blindness. This note is struck at the very beginning of the book (cf. 1:2). It was this culpable blindness that caused Israel's exile. The statement that God does not show "compassion" or "favor" to them is not, of course, absolute. It is perhaps a partial yes answer to the questions of v.7, the main answer to which is no. When the appointed time of their judgment came, God did not show compassion; but later, of course, he would and did.

12–13 These two verses conclude the great eschatological-apocalyptic section of Isaiah, but they do not teach the same truth; they are complementary rather than repetitive. In v.12 the prophet refers to the traditional boundaries of the Promised Land. God will treat this whole large area as one huge grain field. Never throughout its history did a pure Israel exist. There were always foreign and unbelieving elements in it. God's judgment would therefore begin at the land of his own people. If his threshing-floor yields much grain, there will be chaff, too. The nation is to be purified (cf. Eze 36:24–32).

The figure of the threshing floor is replaced by that of a trumpet. Beyond the Euphrates is the land of the Assyrians, and beyond the Wadi of Egypt is Egypt itself. In 2:1–4 and in 60:1–14, Isaiah describes Jerusalem as the focal point to which penitent Gentiles would come, both to hear God's word and to worship him. But not even Israel is there yet, and the prophet declares that the traditional lands of her captivity must yield up her lost and scattered ones so that they may join the worshiping throng at Zion's temple. Like v.6, this is capable of being interpreted at different levels.

IV. God and His People (28:1–33:24)

When the book of Isaiah was divided into chapters, clearly it was noted that at several significant points in this part the Hebrew word for "woe" (GK 2098) occurred; this was adopted as the clue to the appropriate division of chs. 28–33, except for the division between chs. 31 and 32. The material in those chapters seems to belong to the period of Hezekiah's reign.

A. Woe to Samaria (28:1–29)

1–4 Isaiah here seems to have had a vision of the alleged spiritual leaders of Ephraim, the northern kingdom (cf. v.7), staggering in their inebriation and wearing some kind of floral wreath on their heads, probably tilted at a jaunty angle. This suggested to him another crowned head, that of the hill on which their capital city, Samaria, was situated. This hill stands in a commanding position at the head of a "fertile valley." Amos also castigated Samaria for its drunken decadence (Am 4:1; 6:1, 6).

The Assyrian threat appeared on the eastern horizon at a time when the northern kingdom was relatively prosperous. It might seem to have been cut off in its prime; but, as this passage shows, the telltale signs of a descent into decay were already present. There may have been flowers, but they were fading.

A strategically situated city may also be exposed to the elements. A destructive wind from the east (cf. 27:8) was no stranger to Israel, though this time it was not the hot "sirocco" coming in from the desert but a strong hail and rain-bearing wind that normally came from another direction. The prophet piles up words and phrases to convey the ferocity of the storm.

The "powerful and strong" one is undefined, and the object of its attack is unexpressed; but they are obviously Assyria and Samaria respectively. The Assyrians will tramp through Samaria's streets, and Samaria itself will be trampled on by the great foreign foe. Outside the city walls, figs would be growing. Sometimes a fig ripens before the normal season. Isaiah pictures a traveler—perhaps an Assyrian soldier on his way into the city—quickly picking and eating it. So sudden would Samaria's destruction be (v.4).

5–8 The prophet, changing the word "pride" in v.1 to "glory" (in the phrase translated "glorious crown") because of the possibly unfavorable connotation of the former, asserts that this is what the Lord will be to "the remnant of his people." Their glorying had had a physical focus, but this would be replaced by a spiritual one. Perhaps he had in mind the southern kingdom—so small in comparison with the northern, but with God in her midst—or else the remnant left behind in Israel by the receding Assyrian conquerors, or perhaps both. "In that day" should perhaps be understood eschatologically, so that the prophet's thought overleaped many intervening centuries to the last days.

The drunkards of v.1 are the leaders of the people, such as priests, prophets (cf. v.7), and probably also judges. The administration of justice requires great wisdom and clearheadedness. The prophet promises that God will himself be a spirit of justice giving wisdom to the judge, and that the people's arms will have success against the foe (cf. 11:1–5). The remnant would have God as their crown when Samaria, the crown of Ephraim, had been taken by Assyria.

Isaiah then turns his attention to the leaders of Jerusalem (cf. v.14). The vivid picture of spiritual guides lacking not only supernatural insight but even common reason ("befuddled") is horrifying. The realistic description of the environment bears all the marks of eyewitness reporting.

9–10 As the prophet declares the word of God in this drink-dominated setting, his hearers make their response. The drunkards feel insulted. Are they not themselves spiritual leaders, well able to teach others? What right has this man to teach them the spiritual "milk"? Isaiah's words have hardly penetrated the alcohol-impregnated atmosphere that surrounds his hearers. What they have picked up are simply a few stray syllables, some of them repeated, like the baby-talk that delights the child but insults the adult. They mouth this gibberish back at the prophet. Their judgment lies in their failure to hear the word that could have led them back to God; but there is another judgment on its way, most appropriate in its form. Their sin has turned the word of God through Isaiah into a meaningless noise that may just as well have been a foreign language.

11–13 Very well, then, the next message will come through foreigners. The Assyrian devastation of Judah (cf. 1:5–9) is surely in view. Just as the drunkards picked up a few familiar sounds but no connected meaning, so the people of Judah would detect similarities between the Akkadian of the Assyrians and their own Hebrew (both Semitic tongues), without being able to understand what was being said. In reality it was through the Assyrians' swords that God would speak his message to Israel.

More serious still was the people's failure to hear God's word offering rest to those who insisted on rejecting it. The prophet was clearly speaking of the call to faith. Their disobedient refusal of the way of faith in God was therefore a continuing condition preventing the word from getting through to them. The effects of drink may pass off, but unbelief can be a permanent barrier to God's word.

On an earlier occasion, in the days of Ahaz, God had pointed out the way of faith and had warned the people against the consequences of rejecting this. Times may have changed, but not the principles of God's dealings with his people. The call to faith then had been accompanied by a warning of the consequences of walking in another way, and those consequences were the same now. The drunkards' fall is thought of first of all as a result of their drunken staggering, but the range of analogies is then extended to the picture of the hunter's snare.

14–15 People may have lost their capacity to hear God's word, but this does not modify its character. We are commanded to hear it simply because it is his, and we are culpable if we do not hear. Rejection of God's word and confidence in our own selves often go hand in hand. Isaiah is not really quoting the "scoffers" in v.15 but ironically combining their words with his interpretation of their consequences. There can be little doubt that Isaiah has in mind the growing link between Judah and Egypt and the attempt in this way to warn off the Assyrians.

The "overwhelming scourge" contains a mixture of figures: for how can a scourge be said to overflow? The separate elements are from 10:26 and 10:22 respectively. Perhaps the leaders of Judah had the circumstances of the original Passover in mind. They thought themselves immune, like Israel sheltered beneath sacrificial blood in Egypt (cf. 1:10–17), but there could be no such refuge in that land for them now.

The reference to lies and falsehood may be an attack on that trust in expediency rather than in principle. It seems more likely, however, that the prophet was not charging them directly with a lack of integrity but rather that his words were still ironic. The assertion that Egypt would effectively come to their aid, which they believed to be sober truth, was in fact a lie.

16–19 In 8:14 the Lord had declared that he would be both a sanctuary—and Judah's sanctuary at Jerusalem was made of stone—and a stumbling stone for the people of Israel. Faith would make the difference. Here the stone illustration is presented in an eminently positive fashion.

Without doubt this passage is of great importance in the messianic teaching of the prophecies of Isaiah (cf. Ro 9:33; 10:11; 1Pe 2:4–6). In 8:14 the prophet used the stone analogy in a significant way. The Lord himself was calling people to faith. If they responded, he would be a sanctuary, a holy place, to them. As the altar of God in the temple was treated as a place of refuge (Ex 21:14; 1Ki 1:50), so God himself would be a holy place of refuge for them (cf. Eze 11:16).

If, however, they refused belief, he would be a stone of stumbling they would fall over. The altar of stone was, of course, set within a temple of stone, so that both the promise and the threat rest on the spiritualizing of the stone.

The stone-built temple is once again a picture of the God the people are to trust in. Instead of reapplying the stone illustration in a threat (but see v.13b), Isaiah declares God's condemnation of the poor Egyptian makeshift that the unbelieving people had constructed as a substitute for faith in God. A comparison of the language of 8:14 and the present passage shows us that there the sanctuary and stone were God himself whereas here the stone is laid by God. If this passage is a development of the former, then who in Isaiah's prophecies is both God and distinct from him? The clear answer is "the Messiah" (cf. 7:14; 9:6).

If then the stone is the Messiah, what messianic qualities or functions emerge from the prophet's words? Zion was itself, of course, the place of the temple and also the place where the leaders of the people lived. The stone is first of all a "tested" (GK 1046) stone. As a foundation stone it has been tested for strength and shape. However, it may be taken as a "testing" or capstone, shaped by the master mason for placing at the end of the whole building process, so forming a test of trueness of line for the whole edifice (cf. Ps 118:22; Mk 12:10). The Messiah comes as the consummation of the divine building project (Mk 12:6); and, although rejected by the religious leaders of his day—the spiritual counterparts of the unbelieving leaders here—he was God's proof of the soundness of the whole structure of messianic promise. If the prophecy is truly messianic, then it is eschatological; and if eschatological, then the idea of a capstone is most apt.

The testing stone is also "a precious cornerstone for a sure foundation." This clearly points to the stone that is placed on the living rock and that is of special importance also because it is at the junction of two walls. He is "precious" (GK 3701) because of his superlative value in the divine plan. The ultimate spiritual sanctuary will find its foundation in him. In the NT God's great "building" is the church, built on Christ as confessed and proclaimed by his people (Mt 16:13–19). Here too there is a call for faith.

In architecture the same stone cannot fulfill both purposes, i.e., both capstone and foundation stone; but God gives one great answer to the totality of human need: Christ.

The architectural language continues into v.17. Divine justice and righteousness may govern the entire building operation, from foundation to capstone, so that the entire edifice of promise and fulfillment is just and true. On the other hand, it may show up as unrighteous and false the flimsy human structures represented by the refuge or hiding place that the storms of God's judgment will demolish. A similar contrast between two buildings, where relationship to Christ and his teaching is the test of true construction, is found in Lk 6:46–49.

Verse 18 takes up language from earlier verses, chiefly from v.15, but also from v.2. Water will overflow the hiding place and carry the people away. The judgment will not pass quickly. Verse 19 clearly suggests that wave after wave of the enemy will come into Judah, so that the people's hearts will be dominated by fear throughout the whole period. Through hordes of cruel Assyrian warriors, then, God would speak his message of judgment to his people, who would not hear the prophet's message.

20–22 God's people had made their bed; now they must lie on it, and they would discover its inadequacy to provide true rest. Earlier the prophet used historical allusion for the comfort of his hearers (cf. 9:6; 10:26). Now such allusions become the vehicle of threats rather than promises. Earlier, at Mount Perazim and in the Valley of Gibeon, God came to his people's aid against their enemies (Jos 10:1–10; 2Sa 5;17–25). God's anger against the Philistines, dammed up so long by his people's sin, broke forth and overwhelmed them through David; now that anger, held back again through many a year of grace, would finally burst in a "strange work" of judgment against his own people.

Isaiah's reference to mocking should be compared with v.14. Those destined for judgment are bound with chains, suggesting that there will be no escape from that destiny. Isaiah's auditory experience of God makes him aware of a terrible judgment to come, in which the whole land will be involved. The devastating Assyrian invasions, culminating in the terrible siege and overthrow of Jerusalem by the Babylonians at a later period, progressively fulfilled this prophecy in line with the terms of v.19.

23–29 Isaiah knew how obtuse and spiritually hard of hearing his listeners were and so calls on them to pay close attention. Nature, as God has created it, contains so many illustrations of spiritual truth that the sensitive and godly observer is forced to conclude that there is divine design in this.

Agriculture requires the farmer to change his activity from time to time. Plowing is needed, but it is not a year-round activity. So God's purposes require him to act differently at different seasons, perhaps sparing Jerusalem in 701 B.C. and destroying it in 586 B.C. Then, too, a farmer does not normally sow all his fields with only one plant variety. In a mixed farming economy, space is found for a variety of crops. Once again, the variety of God's ways with people is being underlined. The farmer learns such things from God, by a study perhaps of nature. Why then is humankind so reluctant to learn from God in spiritual things?

Verses 27–29 take the illustration further. When it comes to harvest time, threshing takes different forms, each dictated by the type of crop harvested. More than this, threshing time comes to an end, for the ultimate aim of all this activity is to produce edible food. Plowing, sowing, threshing, and grinding are all means to this end. So God has his purposes in history, and through a sequence of events he brings them to pass. God's power ("the LORD Almighty") and wisdom, united in his nature, bring forth a pattern of events in the story of the human race. The agricultural processes here suggest pain, implying that it is possible to find oneself on the wrong side of God's purposes in history and so to experience his judgment.

B. Woe to Ariel (29:1–24)

This chapter presents the second of the "woe" oracles in this section of Isaiah's prophecies (see introduction to chs. 28–35). Despite the double use of the word in vv.1 and 15, the atmosphere—though solemn—is not one of unrelieved gloom. Not only is judgment promised for Jerusalem but also salvation.

1–4 What does the reiterated word "Ariel" (GK 790) mean? The connection of the city with David (v.1) and the reference to Mount Zion in v.8 established its identification with Jerusalem. The NIV note ("The Hebrew for altar hearth sounds like the Hebrew for Ariel") does not make it clear that the word translated "altar hearth" (GK 789) in v.2 is exactly the same word "Ariel" and not simply like it in sound. In other words, "Ariel" is not simply a name but actually means something, "altar hearth." That name possesses a certain naturalness, derived from the fact that Jerusalem was a place of sacrifice, with an altar hearth in the temple where sacrifices were always burning.

David besieged Jerusalem when it was a Jebusite stronghold. When he took it, it became his capital city. Through many a difficult century in its history, it had never been taken again. The true poignancy of the "woe" here lies in the fact that the God who had enabled David to take it would now besiege this city himself, through its enemies, and cause its destruction by fire just as if the whole city had become an extension of the altar hearth within its temple.

The popular religion in the eighth century B.C. gave sacrifice too great a place in the relationship between God and his people, so that it was conceived to be almost purely external and ritualistic (cf. 1:10–17; 29:13). The point of v.1b is that it was at the festivals of the religious calendar that the Jerusalem altar was busiest. The people became more and more confirmed in their false assurance that all was well between themselves and God. What a shock awaited them! Verse 3—with its threefold statement that God would become their enemy—is more forceful.

The penitence of spirit that was so conspicuously absent from the sacrifices that the people were making would at last come about through divine chastisement. Instead of pompous boasting (cf. 28:15), their speech would come as a mere ghostlike whisper from the ground where they lay prostrate.

5–8 The whole mood of the oracle changes as suddenly and dramatically as the events it depicts. God would judge his people by sending their enemies against their capital city, but he did not intend that city to be taken. The ominous towers and siege works are replaced by fine dust and blown chaff. Those sent in judgment would themselves experience it (cf. 10:5–19). Appearing to be so formidable, they would be cut down to size.

The "many enemies" are further described as "the hordes of all the nations." Moreover, the coming of the Lord Almighty is described as an awe-inspiring intervention. The language (esp. v.6), so reminiscent of Ex 19, suggests that the God of judgment is also the God of the law, his judgments expressing his concern for righteousness.

Isaiah's illustrations are appropriate and true to the common experience of humanity. We all know something of the dream that seems as vivid and compelling as reality itself. The city of Jerusalem, which seemed so real a prize to its attackers, would suddenly be seen to belong to the dream world of military ambition. The phrase "Mount Zion" itself has overtones of stability and divine protection (cf. Ps 48).

9–12 The inaugural vision of Isaiah's prophetic ministry made him aware that as he declared the word of God, many of his hearers would simply shut their eyes to the truth (cf. 6:9–10). The spiritual blindness of the drunken religious leaders was emphasized in ch. 28. The professional prophets, whether literally drunk or not, are pictured here as stumbling unsteadily through life, unable even to plot their own course, let alone point the way to others. Blindness, drunkenness, and sleep build a picture of total inadequacy in the realm of spiritual leadership.

The whole point of vv.11–12 is that Isaiah's own God-given vision was a closed book to the people of Jerusalem. To those who could read—perhaps the professional prophets—the vision contained mysteries to which their eyes were closed. Those who could not read—perhaps the ordinary inhabitants of Jerusalem—were removed further still from understanding. The seeming advantage of the professional prophets did not really place them ahead of the common people, for neither understood the vision.

13–16 Spiritual blindness (vv.9–12) is an appropriate partner of externalism and traditionalism. Here the spiritual condition is diagnosed and found to be malign indeed. Wrong teaching was based on mishandling God's true revelation, the sacrificial regulations, and the Mosaic Law as a whole respectively (cf. Mt 15:9). "Rules taught by men" applies not to the Levitical teaching itself but to the way it was applied by the priests. Human nature does not change but finds different expressions of its fundamental rebellion against God. So often the prophet says in effect that the God of Israel, who had shown himself to his people in one of his great attributes for their blessing, would demonstrate that same quality in an act of judgment (10:17; 28:20–22). He is "wonderful" and had done wonderful things for his people (Ex 15:11; Ps 77:2, 15), but his power to astound them would be turned against them. The prophet seems still to have in mind the judgments God had decreed against his people in vv.1–3. Isaiah shows great interest in the distinction between worldly and godly wisdom (e.g., 5:21; 11:2; 26:7–10).

Negotiations with Egypt to form an anti-Assyrian alliance were probably carried on in secret. If so, then Isaiah was implying that the negotiators thought their actions were so clandestine that even the Lord himself was denied access to them. When human minds are not controlled by the revelation of God, their thoughts of him easily become unworthy of who he really is. The prophet suggests that such people have a completely illogical view of God. Without doubt total depravity so affects the mind that people can no longer think God's thoughts after him in any adequate way.

Isaiah anticipates Jeremiah in his use of the illustration of the potter and the clay (cf. 45:9; 64:8; Jer 18:1–6; cf. also Ro 9:19–21). Each writer made somewhat different points; yet each argued for the sovereignty of God from this analogy.

17–21 Significantly, even when the human mind retreats from logic in its conception of God, God still addresses that mind. "In a very short time, will not Lebanon be turned into a fertile field and the fertile field seem like a forest?" appears to be a promise of blessing for the land. This transformation of the physical world becomes the introduction to the eschatological picture presented in the remainder of the chapter. The former spiritual insensitivity of the people will be a thing of the past (cf. 35:5–6).

Isaiah shows a concern for the godly poor (cf. 3:14; 11:4; 25:4). That the reference to them in v.19 is followed by a promise that those who "have an eye for evil" (cf. Pr 1:11–14; 12:6) will be cut down certainly suggests that it is the restoration of justice to the oppressed in the messianic kingdom that is in view. For the "mockers" (GK 4370), see 28:14, where the same Hebrew word is translated "scoffers."

The general picture of malignity rampant in v.20 becomes more specific in v.21, where the reader is transported to the court of law. Each of the three lines relates to a verbal sin, the clever and specious use of words that perverts justice. The prophets stressed the Lord's hatred of oppression furthered by the manipulation of the courts of justice (see 10:1–4).

22–24 Joshua 24:14 links the region "beyond the River" with Egypt as places where the people had served other gods. The language of redemption was regularly applied to the deliverance from Egypt, and there is no good reason why it cannot be applied to the exit of Abraham from Ur at the call of God. There may not have been the same human bondage, but in both cases they were under a regime acknowledging other gods. The passage makes much of the people's relationship to their ancestor Jacob, and the mention of Abraham further reinforces this emphasis on the past.

In v.23, the prophet has both the patriarch Jacob and his descendants in mind. There is such a solidarity between a people and their ancestor that they can be closely identified in this way. The shame of Jacob here certainly seems to be the dispersion of many of the people of Israel from their land because of their sin (see Dt 28:36–37, 63–64). God will bring his scattered children back to the land.

Isaiah's characteristic title for God is "the Holy One of Israel [Jacob]." This holiness sets him apart from all other beings, not least the false gods worshiped in the great civilizations of the Fertile Crescent. Thus there is probably a subtle connection between the reference to the redemption of Abraham (from idolatrous Ur and Haran) and the assertion that when scattered Israel will be brought back from the pagan lands of their dispersion they will keep God's name holy.

The emphasis on God's holiness is strong. It is as if this is his final vindication of his great name at the climax of Israel's history, inspiring awe and wondering gratitude in his people. It is their deep awareness of God's goodness to them as a nation that will produce a penitent and receptive spirit in those formerly wayward and complaining. God's own light will have dispersed the spiritual darkness that the prophet was so conscious of in the people he ministered to (cf. vv.9–16).

C. Woe to the Rebellious Children (30:1–33)

This chapter, like the two that precede it, commences with the word "woe," and, also like them, contains promises as well as threats. The people of Jerusalem will have judgments to face, but these will not annul the ultimate purpose of their God to bless them with his salvation.

1 The occasion is still the proposal to enter into alliance with Egypt as a defense against Assyria, whose dark shadow looms menacingly on the eastern horizon. The rebellion against Assyria was at the same time a revolt against God. The accumulation of sin by the people is probably an allusion to the alliance with Assyria in the days of Ahaz, a device to secure aid against Israel and Syria, which is the background to the oracles in chs. 7–9. The political alignment was now different but expressed the same sin—refusal to trust in the Lord and him alone.

2–5 The Ethiopian rulers of Egypt had sent ambassadors to the land of Judah either in 712 or 705 B.C.. (see comments on 18:1–7). Now the ambassage moved in the opposite direction, perhaps during the period of Hezekiah's revolt against Sennacherib in the years 703–701 B.C. Zoan and Hanes were both in lower Egypt, though Hanes was a good deal farther south.

6–7 Isaiah not only visualizes Hezekiah's emissaries arriving at Egypt's court but also pictures the terrain and the animals of the environment and the Judean caravans. At the end of the journey, too, was an "animal"—Rahab, the Egyptian dragon. The Negev was inhospitable to travelers, which may have been the reason the messengers went this way, avoiding the more public route across the southern Mediterranean Sea. The large number of words for "lion" in Semitic languages gives some impression of the wildness and danger of much of the Near East in biblical times. "Darting snakes" renders the same Hebrew word as "darting, venomous serpent" in 14:29.

The journey was not only dangerous but costly, for it was expedient to carry a substantial bribe to this powerful potential ally. Egypt's reputation was undoubtedly great. And the advent of a new and vigorous regime may well have enhanced it, but Hezekiah was in for a shock. Great powers have chosen fearsome animal symbols for themselves, like the lion, the eagle, and the bear. Egypt, however, was identified by others with the mythological Rahab (see on 27:1). "Rahab the Do-Nothing" may be an ironic suggestion that the Judean messengers to Egypt were in more danger from the beasts of the desert than Assyria would be from that notorious supermonster, Egypt! If Assyria was to be shattered, it would be done by God (v.31), not Egypt.

8–11 The command to write has brought untold blessing and challenge to countless numbers. It may just be the ironic name for Egypt (v.7) that Isaiah is to write (cf. 8:1). On the other hand, the whole oracle may be in view. The purpose of writing is to secure a witness to God's solemn warning; vv.9–11 expound the necessity for this written warning.

The prophet repeats his accusation that the people were rebellious (cf. v.1; 1:2). An apostate priesthood and a rebellious people rejected the warnings that came through the true prophet of God. Isaiah's listeners would listen to him, but only if the content of his message was trimmed to their own desires. But the preacher was to bring a message to his listeners, not to find it among them. The words "way" and "path" in v.11, with their moral overtones (cf. Ps 1), may be a sarcastic echoing of Isaiah's own message to them, indicating that prophetic morality was unacceptable to such hearers.

The people's closing command to Isaiah is striking. His title for God was "the Holy One of Israel." This title—implying as it did the great demands that the relationship to such a God entailed—filled their hearts with loathing. Their ears could no longer tolerate its sound.

12–14 Isaiah's use of the "Holy One of Israel" is particularly significant. The people had resisted his use of it, but he was not their servant but the Lord's. Nothing would be trimmed to suit their taste. The people's reliance on "oppression" and "deceit" is probably a reference to Egypt, the oppressor par eminence. At this time her promises of aid were worthless. Judah's trust in a foreign power rather than in God would bring about her demise. A small fault in a wall may spread, and the onlooker may become so accustomed to the bulging wall that he does not detect the worsening of the problem till the collapse comes, and it is too late.

The prophet had to convey not only the suddenness of the judgment but also its completeness. He did this by likening the destruction of the wall to the breaking of pottery; the disintegration is so complete that nothing of value remains. This prophecy was not fulfilled in 701 but rather in 586, when Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, and perhaps even more in the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (cf. Mk 13:2).

15–18 "The Sovereign LORD" translates Adonai (GK 151) followed by Yahweh (GK 3378), thus combining God's sovereign authority with his redemptive name. Sovereignty and holiness find expression in vv.16–17 while redeeming grace is seen in vv.15 and 18. The word of God cuts right across ordinary human thinking (cf. 55:8–9). Those who have learned from God will turn to him in repentant faith, but continued rebellion against him produces panic when the foe appears in all his might. "Repentance" (GK 8746) here is literally "returning." In the contemporary political situation, to turn away from trust in Egypt and to return to the Lord were two sides of the same fact.

God had promised overwhelming victory to his people if they obeyed him but overwhelming defeat if they were rebellious (Lev 26:7–8; Dt 32:30). The lonely hill signal—which had served in a promise of God to suggest a fresh rallying of the scattered nation (11:10, 12)—here stands for shattering defeat. The whole army has gone into battle and met its death; the flag-bearer, kept back at the hilltop base in case he was needed for rallying purposes, discovers that he alone is left and so is without function.

The threatening tone of vv.16–17 gives place to an assurance that God is ready and willing to show mercy to his foolish and obstinate people. It is because God's justice must be expressed—and therefore punishment must fall on this rebellious people—that the manifestation of his mercy is delayed. As so often in the prophets, God's judgment falls first of all; but a remnant preserved through the judgment experiences the blessings of his grace and the fulfillment of his positive purpose for them. Those who wait for him will be identical with this remnant. The Babylonian exile and the return from it are chiefly in view here.

19–26 The God of Israel speaks to his people as if addressing the heart of one person, for singular forms are used most of the time. There is a solidarity among the people of Jerusalem that allows that city to be viewed as a single entity, a kind of corporate person, whom God addresses in grace. The people had been so dull of hearing when he spoke to them, but at their cry he comes immediately to meet them in their need. "The bread of adversity and the water of affliction" probably relate to the Exile, beyond which God would exhibit his grace to them.

The people's penitence would be accompanied by a new responsiveness to God's word through the prophetic teachers. Rejection of God's word always brings hardness of heart, so that the word cannot be heard as before. That word possesses ethical content, keeping God's people to the right path. It also possesses religious content, for their response to it will lead them to purge their land of idolatry. The idols, so splendid in appearance, were really worthless. The illustration stresses the repugnance with which they will now be viewed.

Isaiah had a deep attachment to the soil of his own land. It was not simply the natural affection of the patriot for his native land; for it was God's land, given by him to his people and from which he threatened to remove them as a consequence of their persistent sin (cf. Dt 1:8, 21–25, 34–40; 3:25–29; et al.). The prophet often saw God's blessing therefore in terms of good agricultural weather, increased fruitfulness, and fat cattle (cf. 4:2; 35:1–2; et al.) In the day of God's blessing on the land, even the working animals will live well above subsistence level.

The reference to the day of great slaughter and the fall of towers seems strange in this context. The Bible is realistic and shows that God's plan includes judgment for the rebel as well as blessing for the penitent. The choice of the word "tower" is doubly appropriate, for it has military connotations but also suggests haughty pride (cf. 2:15).

In keeping with the general context, the prophet declares that there will be abundant supplies of water from the mountains. The modern town-dweller views the hill country quite differently from the country farmer. The one sees its beauty, the other its agricultural barrenness. The language suggests that the mountains themselves will enjoy the refreshing waters with all their potential for fruitfulness.

This picture of nature, released from its present limiting conditions, is expanded further. Both the moon and the sun will be much brighter. The number "seven" is not chosen arbitrarily. It is as if the fullness of the divine creative energies is channeled to secure the greater radiance of the sun. The people had known severe chastisement from God through the Assyrians (cf. 1:5–9). Now his powers will secure healing.

27–33 With strong visual appeal, Isaiah describes God, not so much as the Redeemer of his people, but as the Judge of his enemies. The condemned foe is identified in v.31 as Assyria. The name of the Lord is, of course, a revelation of himself (Ex 3:13–15; 6:2–3). That his name is said to come from afar in judgment may be an allusion to Mount Sinai, where, in circumstances of awesome splendor (Ex 19), God showed himself in all his holiness to his people.

Verses 27–28 employ four illustrations of the wrath of God: (1) fire, with all its power to terrify and to destroy (cf. 33:14; Heb 12:29); (2) water (in 8:7–8 the prophet pictured the waters of the great Euphrates [i.e., Assyria] overflowing and reaching even to the neck of Judah; now he would similarly chastise Assyria); (3) the sieve of judgment, revealing the spiritual inadequacy of the unrighteous; and (4) the horse with a bit, suggesting that God will take the arrogant sinner down the road that leads to destruction.

God's judgments are often his means of salvation. Because Assyria was to be judged, Judah would enjoy God's deliverance. The great "festival" (v.29) in which there was a celebration night was the Passover (Ex 12:42). The prophet may have expected his hearers to draw the parallel between these two acts of salvation.

At certain times the heavens are loud with noise and are the source of God's many demonstrations of his power in nature (cf. Ps 29). This figuratively and vigorously presents the judgment of God. Amid all the noise of the storm, the Lord's arm strikes with many a forceful blow at his adversaries. Judah had been smitten through Assyria, but now God would punish Assyria. In v.32 God's people are portrayed rejoicing at his judgment on sin; this is because they must take his point of view on everything, and because this judgment is at the same time their salvation.

Some places have become symbols of spiritual realities. Zion-Jerusalem is the people of God, Babylon the world in arrogant opposition to God, and Tophet God's judgment on sin. Tophet was in the Valley of Hinnom to the south of Jerusalem (Jer 7:31–32), where apostate Jews offered their children by fire to the pagan deity, Molech. Perhaps the prophet is saying here that the king of Assyria himself must pay. He had dedicated himself to paganism, and now he would suffer for this in terrible judgment.

D. Woe to Those Who Seek Help From Egypt (31:1–9)

1–3 Hezekiah had repeated the sin of Ahaz in seeking an alliance with an alien power instead of encouraging his people to put their trust in the Lord. In so doing he showed he had failed to learn from history (for Egypt had proved to be anything but an ally to Israel in the past), from Scripture (since attempting to secure horses for cavalry units was against the divine constitution for the king; see Dt 17:1–20), or even from the experience of his father, Ahaz, which could have provided him with a salutary warning.

The decision to call for help from a particular source is in fact a value judgment, particularly when there are a number of options open. Judah was showing that it set greater value on Egypt ("Rahab the Do-Nothing," 30:7) than on the living God. The statement "yet he too is wise" is pregnant with sarcasm. False political wisdom ruled in the courts of Judah. The so-called wise men had themselves used sarcasm when speaking about the Lord's wisdom (5:19; 29:15). The prophet was convinced that divine wisdom would prove all vaunted human sagacity to be wrong (cf. 1Co 1:18–3:23).

"Disaster" (v.2) is literally "evil" (GK 8273) and is, of course, a reference to war (cf. Am 3:6). This is made the more terrifying by the assertion that God does not retract such threats of judgment (cf. Nu 23:19).

Comparisons are particularly odious when made between things or people differing in quality. The greatest distinction exists between the all-sovereign Creator and the universe he originated and rules. To us "flesh" seems so substantial, because it is visible and tangible, while "spirit" may seem ethereal. Nothing can be further from biblical thinking (cf. Zec 4:6; Jn 3:5–8). The invisible source of supernatural, almighty power in God is in an altogether superior class from the apparently strong but actually almost infinitely weak human beings and horses.

"When the LORD stretches out his hand" is ominous in reference to Egypt; for it has overtones of the Exodus, when all the power of that land was overcome by the Lord. Putting Isaiah's thought into a figure, the unequal yoke Judah was seeking with Egypt would mean that the fall of the one would bring disaster to the other also.

4–5 Is the lion, as Mauchline suggests, the Assyrians who have devastated Judah and are ready to devour Jerusalem, and are the shepherds the Egyptians who have come to aid Judah and have succeeded only in making an ineffectual noise that has not deterred or troubled the Assyrians? Or does the lion's behavior depict the Lord's descent from heaven to fight upon the hill of Zion (cf. 10:32), not allowing anyone to steal from him what belongs to him, as O. Kaiser thinks? Amos uses the lion figure of both God (Am 3:8) and Assyria (Am 3:12). The way the sentence is structured strongly suggests that the figure is intended to be understood in terms of God.

Verse 5 changes the figure but not the message, though it clarifies the peaceful intent of God's activity in relation to Jerusalem. Egypt could give no guarantee of that city's protection from the Assyrians, but God would make it his special care. In the closing line we are reminded of the Exodus. The God of the Exodus would protect his people in Jerusalem as he protected them in Egypt on the night of the Passover.

6–7 The Lord's deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib was a singular demonstration of his reality and power, setting him apart from other deities (see chs. 36–37). The gods of many nations had failed to protect their devotees from the Assyrians, but now the true God showed he was supreme. Isaiah called his people to repentance in anticipation of that day when, because of God's singular act of deliverance, the worthlessness of the idols would be recognized. Clearly idolatry was the deep revolt that the prophet called them to return from.

8–9 Isaiah makes it clear that the "sword" was not literal and that the Lord secured a great victory over Assyria by nonmilitary means (cf. 37:36–37). "Their stronghold" (lit., "their rock") conveys the picture of a fortress city, perhaps one in Assyria's heartland, approached by its enemies with their battle standards clearly visible. The sight was so unfamiliar to those who were used to constant victory for their armies that the task of the enemy would be made easy by their demoralization. The description of God, however, takes us back swiftly to Jerusalem, for whose sake Assyria was being judged, and whose temple and its ever-burning altar fire symbolized the presence of God with it.

E. God's Kingdom and the Triumph of Righteousness (32:1–20)

1–2 Are these verses messianic or do they picture an ideal government in which the whole administrative system of the country is in the hands of the righteous? The reader inevitably makes a link with the picture of the righteous messianic King given in ch. 11. The book of Isaiah presents its messianic theme in such a way that there is development from one passage to the next, and this passage certainly figures as a development of ch. 11, the new emphasis being on the association of others with the king in his righteous reign.

At the opening of ch. 31, the prophet had criticized those at the court who looked to Egypt for help against the Assyrian menace. No doubt the king would have to bear a special responsibility, but clearly the prophet had others at the court in mind as well. The whole sinful scene of government will pass away, and its place will be taken by a righteous king supported by subordinates who share his concern for righteousness and justice. Government, when it is righteous, affords protection from oppression. In the Messiah's kingdom, righteousness will reign and fear of the oppressor will belong to the past.

3–8 Isaiah was warned that he would see people shutting their eyes and ears to the truth he proclaimed (6:9–10). When the messianic kingdom comes, this spiritual insensitivity will be no more. Those who should have had minds made clear by the bright shining of divine truth in them had in fact been befuddled by drink (28:7–10) and had stammered out rash things instead of prophetic truth. This situation too is to be rectified. If leaders are blind, their people often share this blindness. A nation gets the leaders it deserves (cf. 3:4–7). The moral sense had been so warped in Judah (5:20) that there was failure to recognize the true nature of those who were in positions of leadership. This too would change in the Messiah's kingdom.

In v.5 the prophet speaks of the "fool" (GK 5572) and the "scoundrel" (GK 3964); in vv.6–7 he gives a description of each. In the OT folly often has overtones of godlessness (e.g., Ps 14). If the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom (Ps 111:10; cf. Pr 1:7), then the godless man must be pursuing the wrong way.

Verse 6 presents an appalling picture of the fool, whose mind is controlled by evil, so that both his own life and his influence with others are evil. The messianic King demonstrates his godly righteousness by his concern for the poor and needy (11:4). The godless fool is utterly unconcerned for their most elementary needs (cf. 58:7). Scoundrels (v.7) are even worse. They stoop to lies and deceit to deprive the poor of their legal rights. In fact, scoundrels are precisely those from whom the messianic King will protect the poor (11:4–5). Conduct reveals character; and this is true of both the noble man, whose day will come in the messianic kingdom, and the scoundrel, who will face God's judgment.

9–14 In ch. 3, Isaiah had moved from condemnation of Judah's leaders to strong criticism of the women. Apparently certain aristocratic women were exercising unhelpful influence over their husbands and so had to share in judgment. The stress falls on their complacency, probably meaning the court's pro-Egyptian policy. The women too were relying on Egyptian help for the security of Jerusalem, and so of their homes.

This present prophecy was probably uttered a year or so prior to Sennacherib's invasion of Judah, which led to the situation depicted in ch. 1. It is probably the effects of such an invasion that the prophet had in view here, rather than a simple harvest failure. In this case, its failure is due to the inability of the people—because of enemy occupation—to gather the vintage and other ripe fruit. The women are called to mourning. It is not their husbands or sons who are dead but their land, but this in itself will produce some of the effects of widowhood; for poverty and malnutrition must surely be their lot.

Isaiah often speaks of "thorns and briers." This also points in the direction of enemy occupation rather than mere harvest failure, for the latter would not account for the generally unkempt condition of the countryside. There is a certain emotional quality attached to the phrase "my people." How sad that the land of God's people, a chosen land for a chosen people, should be reduced to such a lamentable condition! It was, of course, their sin that had caused this.

The word rendered "yes" (v.13) is intensive, suggesting that what follows goes beyond the Assyrian judgment to the Babylonian capture of Jerusalem and its results. This language, employing the singular, indicates that Jerusalem rather than the cities of Judah is in view. The devastation caused by Sennacherib's wind would be completed by Nebuchadnezzar's whirlwind.

15–20 The description of judgment suddenly changes to one of blessing. The contrast becomes particularly impressive considering the intentionally illogical words "a wasteland forever, . . . till" (vv.14–15)! Such a decisive assertion of judgment can only be canceled by an equally decisive manifestation of grace. The condemnation humans live their lives under is undoubtedly "forever," because death ushers in their judgment and its eternal consequences; but this condemnation can be canceled by the marvel of justifying grace through faith in Christ.

The reference to the Spirit is most appropriate. If ch. 32 amplifies certain aspects of the messianic prophecy in ch. 11 (see at vv.1–2), we might expect some reference to the Spirit, who has such a place of importance in that earlier chapter. The idyllic picture described there is echoed here, but it is particularly significant that the righteous king in v.1 is accompanied by righteous subordinates. This sug-gests a wider ministry of the Spirit, not confined simply to the Messiah himself. The NT brings together the OT teaching that both the Messiah and his people would know the endowment of the Spirit of God. Here we see an implicit link in Isaiah's own thought. The language of outpouring was destined to be far-reaching (Joe 2:28; Ac 2:17–21).

In v.13 we noted the emotional quality of the phrase "my people," as God's people experience his hand of judgment on them. But now God is able to bestow on them the blessing that is in his heart for them as his own beloved people. Verse 18, with its sequence of prepositional phrases, gives emphatic expression to God's promise that he will bring them, through righteousness, into a condition of "quietness and confidence forever" (v.17).

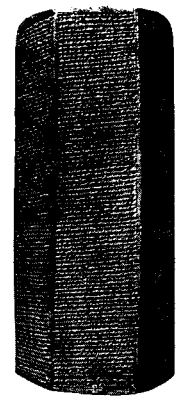
Verses 19–20 form a fitting conclusion to the oracle, because they sum up the two elements of coming judgment and ultimate blessing. Verse 20 picks up from 30:23–26 the picture of a plentiful economy based on abundant supplies of water, but it presents it in an even more desirable form. The amount of produce given by the soil will be so great that the farmer can actually allow his working animals to browse in the fields.

F. Woe to the Destroyer (33:1–24)

This oracle is the final one in a series of five, interrupted only by the messianic oracle in ch. 32 (see introduction to chs. 28–33). It is the only one of the series in which the introductory "woe" is directed against a foreign power.

1 Seemingly the first half of this verse takes up the boasts of the Assyrians, who had been all-victorious for so many years. The second half declares they will be caught in their own trap.

2–4 The people in the city had at last been brought to realize their total dependence on the Lord. These words are best understood as their prayer when the Assyrian army was at the gate. In 30:18–19, the prophet stated that their God would hear them when they called out to him. Here we see his words beginning to bear fruit. This must have been encouraging to Isaiah after so many years of unresponsiveness to his preaching. Verse 3 is an expression of general confidence in the Lord, with a possible echo of Ps 68:1. Joel 1:1–2:10 points up the appropriateness of the image used here.



This cylinder records Sennacherib's campaign against Judah and against Jerusalem in particular. Indirectly, the Assyrian king admits he was not able to take Jerusalem, only shut up Hezekiah "like a bird in a cage." Courtesy Oriental Institute of Chicago.

5–6 Isaiah believed that the Lord alone is fit to be exalted to the highest place; in ch. 2 he depicted this great God as finally given his rightful place when everything contrary to his supremacy has been debased. Here, he presents the complementary truth that the Lord is exalted already. Eschatological judgment is therefore simply the demonstration in history of that exaltation.

The major issue in recent chapters (esp. chs. 30–31) has been political security. If the Assyrian officers were below the city walls at the time of this oracle, with all hope of relief from Egypt gone, the words of the prophet are particularly significant. That "a rich store of salvation and wisdom and knowledge" is in apposition to "the sure foundation" shows that to the prophet the Lord was all the people needed (cf. 1Co 1:30; Col 2:2–3). The Lord himself was more than enough to give them protection from their enemies and wisdom in living as his people in the world.

The assertion that this "rich store" becomes available through the fear of the Lord reminds us of the association of "the fear of the LORD" with the messianic King (11:2–3). The word "fear" may also have been chosen because of the historical situation. The people trusted Egypt and feared Assyria; in fact, God was to be their fear just as the reference to a sure foundation suggests that he too should be their trust.

7–9 The prophet focuses attention on the sorry condition of Jerusalem, which led the people eventually to call on their God in penitent faith. Terror grips the hearts of the warriors within the city gates. Those who have been sent out to parley with the enemy return weeping, for their words would not penetrate the Assyrians' hard heart. All normal commerce between communities comes to a halt, and the treaty that apparently existed between Sennacherib and Hezekiah is treated as null and void.

The whole land was in mourning. The northern kingdom had already felt the heavy tread of the conqueror's feet; and the places named suggest that Judah would go the same way. If the withering of Lebanon refers to its trees, then this is clearly an indication that what happened was a divine judgment; for its slopes were covered mostly by evergreens, whose leaves do not normally wither. Sharon was one of the most fertile parts of Palestine while the Arabah was dry and arid. The prophet surveyed places farther north and saw the devastation, a hint of what faced Jerusalem if the Assyrians gained entrance.

10–12 The threefold assertion of God's exaltation reminds us of the thrice-exalted Servant of the Lord in 52:13. The enemy's plan to take Jerusalem will come to nothing, and the prophet uses the figure of a pregnancy to bring home its futility. Their destruction will in fact be self-induced, for it is the result of their sinful antagonism to God's people. In v.12 the prophet moves briefly from the particular to the general, making a point about the comprehensiveness of judgment, when it falls on all nations.

13–16 God speaks to the whole world, calling on people to learn from the object lesson provided by his judgment of Assyria. The terms "far away" and "near" describe the Gentile nations and Judah respectively (cf. 49:1; 57:19; Ac 2:39; Eph 2:13, 17).

The phrase "the sinners in Zion" jars the spirit, for such a situation should not exist. Zion was God's city. This was surely no place for the godless, and yet in every age the godless have lived cheek by jowl with the godly, contemptuous of the things of God that made their presence felt every day.

The effects of great judgments may have some kinship with those of spiritual revival, for a new sense of God—his power and his holiness—overtakes the sinners in Zion. Like those who heard Peter at Pentecost, these people, cut to the heart, cry out in their conviction of sin (cf. Ac 2:37). The "consuming fire" is not hell; it is God (cf. Heb 12:29)! Yet, in a sense, those who mistakenly interpret it as hell are not really so wide of the mark (see 10:17).

The cry of the convicted seems to require a negative answer. No human being can dwell in God's holy presence. Yet the prophet goes on to give his hearers a wonderfully positive reply. Time and again he had called his people to faith in God. To find security through the fear of the Lord is to have the key to great spiritual treasure, including that practical wisdom that indicates the way for the individual to walk as well as the right approach to international politics for the leaders (cf. 58:6–12; cf. also 32:3–8).

The book of Isaiah shows a deep concern about sins of speech (cf. esp. 6:5–7). The man of God will neither speak evil nor listen to it from the lips of others. The final line of v.15 underlines the importance of fleeing from temptation. Verse 16 promises security and provision to the one who thus dwells with God and walks in righteousness.

17–20 If this prophecy was uttered as the Assyrian army threatened Jerusalem, then these words would have been immensely reassuring to the beleaguered people. The "king" is either the Messiah or God himself; considerations of poetic structure support the former view. Viewing the land is presented as somehow complementary to seeing the king, and the greatness of the Messiah's earthly dominion has been asserted in passages like 9:7; 11:9–10 (cf. 26:15). In contrast to this embattled city, the only free territory left to God's people, the future king would appear as ruler over a wide empire.

Isaiah graphically pictures the people in the days of the Messiah reflecting on the past and contrasting their lot then with the blessings they now have. They had been the people of a king who had paid tribute to Sennacherib in attempting to buy him off (2Ki 18:13–16); and Assyrian officials had been seen in the streets of Jerusalem, the financial agents of an avaricious tyrant. The earlier prophecy had proved true. God had spoken to this people, in judgment, through men of strange speech (cf. 28:11).

At the time the prophet contemplates, however, all this is a thing of the past, subject still to vivid mental recall, but no longer experienced. The emphasis on sight—whether physical or mental—that characterizes the last few verses continues. Those who have been exhorted to see the king and the wide land of his domain are now called to view his capital city, the cultic center of the nation, where its joy in God finds its corporate expression at festival time. The enemies will be gone, and "peace" will reign (the meaning of "Jerusalem" includes "peace"). It possessed many fine buildings, but we are reminded that its people belonged to a race formerly nomadic (cf. the "tent" firmly fixed).

21–22 This chapter presents a picture of Jerusalem as a kind of Near Eastern Venice or Amsterdam. Most great civilizations have grown up around important rivers. Israel and Jerusalem were exceptions. Indeed, Isaiah remembers the concern for adequate water supplies that had been in the mind of Ahaz when he confronted him in the past (7:3). The city would now be amply supplied. Just as the prophet hastened to guard against a possible misconception of his imagery once before (see 31:8), so now he makes it clear that such broad rivers would be an unmitigated blessing. Many a city, formerly glad of all the advantages brought to it by its situation on a great river, has cursed its location when that same river brought an enemy armada into the very heart of it. Gates may keep out an enemy that a waterway may admit.

Verse 21 began with an assertion about the Lord before moving on to statements about Jerusalem. What Jerusalem is depends entirely on what Jerusalem's God is. Each of the three brief but impressive statements about God is structured so as to place emphasis on the divine name. All three recall different periods in Israel's history, for the period of the judges was preceded by that of Moses the lawgiver and succeeded by that of the king. All three were savior figures, acting as agents of God to bring deliverance to his people. Their God now sums up all these functions in himself.

23–24 It is clear that v.23 takes up again the imagery of the ship from v.21, but who is being addressed by the prophet? Assyria seems to fit the context. If a "mighty ship" was feared in Isaiah's day, it was Assyria. Let this ship sail belligerently in the direction of Jerusalem, and its essential instability—making it vulnerable to its foes—will stand revealed. Assyria appeared to be anything but vulnerable, so that the prophet is speaking with God-given insight. Only God and God's prophet can penetrate the military facade to the true condition of Assyria. When it falls, its empire will be evenly divided; and even apparently impotent states will find themselves enriched from its plunder.

Verse 24 reminds us that the whole passage is really a description of the future blessedness of Jerusalem. The blessings of God will take both physical and spiritual forms. In Ps 103:3, the greater blessing of forgiveness is placed first; here it is placed at the end, to provide a climax for the whole chapter. No blessing is greater, none more urgently needed.

V. God's Purposes of Judgment and Salvation (34:1–35:10)

Despite what is said in ch. 34 about Edom, there is a universality about the references to the judgment to come.

A. Judgment on the World—and Edom (34:1–17)

1–4 Isaiah dramatically addresses the nations of the world here. They cannot hear him, for, presumably, he is speaking in Jerusalem; but his message concerns them all. He accumulates words and phrases—"you nations," "you peoples," "earth," "world"—to emphasize this universal scope. This makes the later particular reference to one small state all the more striking.

A great judgment will someday manifest the anger of God with the nations. It is significant that the prophet refers to the armies of the nations, for national arrogance and cruelty have so often found their focus in aggressive acts by military forces. Israel had in fact been on the receiving end of many such attacks, but divine retribution was coming. The fearsome description in v.3 drives home the point that God's wrath will lead to the death of his enemies.

Verse 4 transports us suddenly from earth to the heavens. The ultimate character of this judgment encompasses the entire cosmos (cf. 24:21–23; Mt 24:29; 2Pe 3:10; and esp. Rev 6:13–14). The way Isaiah illustrates this truth of cosmic judgment from situations familiar to his readers heightens the impression of God's absolute control over all things (cf. 40:12).

5–7 God is here the universal Judge, his judgments including even the very heavens. Then, with great suddenness, the sword of judgment falls on one of the smallest states in the biblical world: Edom. Edom was a traditional enemy of Israel, so this probably represents God's judgment on all Israel's foes. Edom had appropriated territory from Judah during the reign of Ahaz (2Ki 16:6). The prophecies against the nations recorded in chs. 13–23 do not contain an oracle against Edom, though many of Judah's neighbors are mentioned. Edom has not, however, been overlooked (cf. 11:14). Indeed, its fall was so certain that it was described as "the people I have totally destroyed."

In some respects cities, persons, and articles given over in destruction to the Lord were like sacrifices, for they were holy to the Lord (Lev 27:28–29; cf. Jos 6:17–19). This is probably why v.6 goes on to speak of sacrificial animals. The inhabitants of Edom, under divine judgment, were like sacrificial animals. The fate of both was death. Yet it seems inappropriate to liken the antagonistic Edomites to the docile domestic animals employed in ritual; so the prophet looks to the herds of wild oxen that no doubt roamed parts of Edom's territory; they too would die.

8–10 The word "judgment" (GK 5477) in v.5 sets the slaughter in Edom in a moral context, which is emphasized in v.8. This act of vengeance is to further God's purposes for Jerusalem, which, in times of weakness in Judah, might well have cause to fear a threat from the south. There is an implied comparison with the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. Edom's judgment will be so complete, so permanent, that it will be utterly desolate. The final line of v.10 may mean that, not only will Edom be unable to harass Zion herself, but she will not even witness the passage of armies from beyond her borders on their way to attack Judah.

11–15 Precise identification of these creatures matters little, for the general thrust of the prophet's thought is clear. Edom will become a desolate place, fit only for creatures of the wild. Just as nomads rejoice to find terrain that has been abandoned by its inhabitants, so the birds and beasts of the desert will move into the land whose people have suffered God's judgment.

What looks at first like a suggestion that Edom, now destroyed, may be reconstructed becomes, in the prophet's paradoxical language, a warning that God is in fact measuring it up rather for destruction. The references to "chaos" and "desolation," Clement notes, recall the formless void of the world before God imposed the created order upon it (Ge 1:2).

"Nothing there to be called a kingdom" in v.12 provides a kind of parallel to the description of Egypt in 30:7 as "Rahab the Do-Nothing." Just as a measuring line suggests architectural order, so a kingdom suggests social order; but there will be none.

16–17 Most likely "the scroll of the LORD" is the prophecy just given. Thus the communication of prophetic oracles to writing has importance because it makes possible later recognition of the veracity of God. What the Lord has said comes to pass because he is the God of truth. Scripture is God's witness to his own faithfulness. The Spirit of God puts into effect what his word has promised, and the birds and animals gathering in Edom are mute testimony to the truth of what he has said. God will order the new homes of these creatures in Edom so that each is given his proper place (cf. Dt 32:8). Even in his judgments God is concerned that everything should be done in an orderly way (cf. 1Co 14:40).

B. Blessing for God's People (35:1–10)

1–2 The prophet speaks of the desert but does not indicate its location. Verses 8–10 suggest that he is thinking about the exiles returning from Babylon and crossing the many miles of desert lying between Mesopotamia and the Promised Land. In view of the promise that the messianic King will be seen "in his beauty" as governing a far-stretching land (33:17), it is probably best to think in terms of all the terrain occupied or traversed by God's people, but with Zion (v.10) as the center of the kingdom and the end goal of the returning exiles.

Nature bursts not only into bloom but into song. The very environment of God's people reflect their mood of joy at what God has done. The prophet does not say that the desert will burst into bloom with the crocus but like it. Probably he has in mind the transformation that comes over a land when winter ends and spring, with its characteristic flowers, suddenly comes with the advent of a few warm days.

The whole face of the earth is changed. So will it be with the desert. Lebanon's glory is found, of course, in its wonderful cedars, while Carmel and the plain of Sharon that runs south from it are covered with trees and other plant life. The beauty and splendor of transformed nature will be seen as a reflection of the beauty and splendor of the Creator and Redeemer (cf. 40:5).

3–4 The prophet returns briefly to his age and the fear that gripped the hearts of so many of his people in the face of the external threat (see esp. 7:2–9). Fear in the heart affects the ability of hands to work for God and of feet to walk in his ways. This could mean, then, that the returning exiles of v.10 are in view, needing divine encouragement to make the journey.

The link between ch. 34 and ch. 35 is emphasized by the contrasting pictures of topographical desolation and blessing and by the use of "vengeance" (GK 5934) in 34:8 and here. Biblical realism requires that peace be the result of righteousness, and righteousness demands the punishment of sin. Only when God has judged the enemies of his people can his salvation in all its fullness be theirs.

5–7 In view of the frequent references to spiritual blindness and deafness (e.g., 6:9–10; 29:9–12) and the promise that one day spiritual sight and hearing will be restored to the people (29:18), we are at once inclined to interpret v.5—and in harmony with it v.6—in spiritual terms. However, Jesus appears to allude to this chapter in Lk 7:18–23, and he takes the language literally and physically. But physical and spiritual sight and hearing have a symbolic relationship; and in God's ultimate kingdom his people will have glorified bodies and a perfected spirituality.

Renewed nature comes into view once again. The transformed desert is alive with the sound of living streams and gushing springs. The only sign of life before the water's advent was the jackal or wolf. But their place will be taken by the characteristic vegetation and population of lands with abundant water supplies.

8–10 In ancient times people did not build roads across stretches of desert. But this land is desert no longer, so roads are appropriate. The prophet concentrates on one highway, with a most exalted name. It is called "the Way of Holiness" because its goal is the Holy City of Zion, but also because it is intended for holy persons. Israel's highways were all intended for pilgrimage, of course, as people went up them at the feasts to meet the Lord in his holy temple. In the light of 26:7–8, the statement "It will be for those who walk in that Way" is probably to be understood morally, not simply ceremonially. Hazardous conditions faced desert travelers in that part of the world (30:6). This road will be free of predators, for it will be restricted to the redeemed.

Verse 10 brings the whole oracle to a glorious conclusion (cf. 51:11; 61:7). The most joyous periods of the year for the people of Judah had been the three annual pilgrim feasts, when they went up the highways to Zion singing pilgrim songs. The word "return" (GK 8740) makes it clear that they are in fact now coming from farther afield, probably not from Babylonia alone, but from all the lands of the Dispersion (see 49:8–26). The note of joy with which the oracle opens and which can be discerned through the language of its every part now takes over completely. Sorrow and sighing are denied any place in this revelation of God's purpose of joy for his people (cf. Rev 21:1–4).

VI. Isaiah and Hezekiah, Assyria and Babylon (36:1–39:8)

The narrative character of these chapters make them somewhat different from other parts of the book. There are oracles of Isaiah here, but they are set in a historical framework. In the overall pattern of the book, they fulfill an important function. Chapters 1–35 have the Assyrian menace as their main historical setting; and, though many other nations are touched, the reader is never allowed for long to forget the dark shadow of that threat in the background. From the beginning of ch. 40, however, exile in Babylon forms the setting of his oracles. These four chapters therefore provide a historical transition, chs. 36–37 looking back to Assyria and chs. 38–39 on to Babylon. These chapters are practically identical with 2Ki 18–20, except for the poem of Hezekiah (Isa 38:9–20).

A. The Deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib (36:1–37:38)

1–3 These events can be dated in the year 701 B.C., which raises a problem about the reference to the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign. Quite possibly a scribe made a slip when he should have written "twenty-fourth year," which harmonizes better with the historical facts. The NIV translates the familiar "Rabshakeh" (KJV, RSV) as "field commander" (GK 8072); he was probably second only to the supreme commander (KJV "Tartan"; GK 9580) of 20:1. Lachish, an important fortress city of Judah guarding the road to Egypt, was captured by Sennacherib. The location of the main Assyrian army at this point, because of its strategic position, precluded any possible hope of Egyptian help to Hezekiah.

Once again, as in the days of Ahaz (ch. 7), Jerusalem is being threatened by her foes. On that earlier occasion the aqueduct had been the place of decision for Ahaz. Much had happened over the more than three decades that separated that event from this one. Now the Assyrian himself is the threat, which in itself underlines the folly of Ahaz on that earlier occasion. This foe is much more powerful than the two allies of the earlier event. While there may have been some differences in the circumstances, the spiritual issue has not altered. Now at precisely the same spot, the son of Ahaz faces the same spiritual issue. How will he react?

The king of Assyria did not come personally but sent three of his leading men (2Ki 18:17), and Hezekiah did the same. In this way he preserved something of his dignity as the monarch.

4–7 The grandiose designation of the field commander's master ("the great king, the king of Assyria") contrasts sharply with the absence even of the word "king" in his reference to Judah's monarch. The tone of the speech is insolent, and the opening question shows that it is essentially an attempt to undermine any confidence the people might have. In a sense Hezekiah was the contemporary custodian of the messianic promises, as the dynastic expression "house of David" in 7:13 reminds us. The words of the field commander relayed to Hezekiah may even have encouraged him to trust in the God whose messianic promises were an implicit assurance that his line would continue.

Unknown, no doubt, to the field commander, his words in v.6 tallied exactly with what Isaiah had been saying about the futility of trusting in Egypt (30:3–7; 31:3). His use of a vivid illustration too may have reminded them of the prophet's words. No doubt the Assyrians were well aware of Hezekiah's religious reformation (2Ki 18:3–7). The field commander refers to Hezekiah here as if he is not addressing him. The speech, though ostensibly intended for Hezekiah, is so phrased that those who are to relay it to him will ponder its import.

8–10 The field commander's offer is sarcastic. Judah was indeed painfully weak in cavalry and looked to the Egyptian army to supply this lack (cf. 31:1, 3). The field commander does not at this stage attack the Lord's ability to save his people, but he does imply the anger of the Lord against his people. This coincides with what Isaiah constantly taught, that the Assyrian armies, wicked as they were, were accomplishing God's purposes of judgment (cf. esp. 10:5–11). The field commander could hardly have known about the prophecies of Isaiah.

11–12 Aramaic, ultimately the common language of Palestine, was at this time the diplomatic language of the Fertile Crescent, but unintelligible to the common people. The comment by Hezekiah's officials suggests that any confidence they themselves had left was fast ebbing away as a result of this speech (cf. v.22), and they feared its effect on the people. The vulgarity of the field commander's reply attests its authenticity.

13–15 Far from changing the language of his speech, the field commander raises his voice to enable the wider audience to hear more clearly. He gives at this stage no arguments against faith in the Lord's power to deliver his city.

16–17 The appeal suggests that many from the surrounding villages had taken refuge within Jerusalem at this time. The threat of exile was hardly likely to prove an extra inducement to the commander's hearers. The people were actually at the city walls at this time. In the foreground was the Assyrian detachment, including the arrogant speaker himself. Beyond, however, the people could see the devastation these Assyrians had wrought.

18–20 The reference to exile in v.17 would make the people think about Samaria's fate twenty years before. The commander gives a list of some of the main places conquered by Assyria, concluding with Samaria. Each had its distinctive gods but all had proved ineffective against Assyria. The field commander concludes his speech with what must have seemed to him to be his punch line. But a frontal attack like this on such faith as they had may well have roused his hearers to a greater trust. The Lord had such a wonderful record of delivering his people that this man was in fact beginning now to tread on thin ice.

21–22 The silence on the wall had apparently been broken only by the request of v.11 (cf. Ecc 3:7).

37:1–4 Hezekiah presents a great contrast with both Ahaz (cf. 7) and his own former attitude (2Ki 18:14–16). The account in 2Ki 18 places the visit of the field commander after Hezekiah's first payment of tribute to the king of Assyria at Lachish. That the king of Assyria should demand tribute and then absolute surrender is not without historical parallel, nor is the change in Hezekiah's attitude inconceivable.

Hezekiah went into God's temple and sent for God's servant, the prophet. Hezekiah probably hoped for a reassuring word from the Lord as well as a promise that the prophet would pray. The reference to childbirth was probably proverbial. The words "it may be" do not betoken lack of faith but rather a realization on the king's part that the people, through their sins, had forfeited any right to expect divine deliverance. Their only hope was in his unmerited favor.

In one sense God would "hear" (GK 9048) the words of the field commander, for he hears everything. But the king was using the verb in that pregnant sense that implies that action will be taken as a result of what has been heard. There is a sense of sin implicit also in his reference to the Lord as "the LORD your God," for Isaiah had shown a faithfulness that rebuked both people and king. On the other hand, the reference to "ridicule [of] the living God" and "the remnant" are expressions of hope in God, because of his nature and his purpose for the remnant of his people, so often expressed through Isaiah himself (e.g., 10:20–27).

5–8 Isaiah had once before counseled a king not to be afraid (7:4), but Ahaz had proved unresponsive to the reassuring word of God. The expression "the underlings" (GK 5853) could be an insulting reference to the field commander and the other high officers who had formed the Assyrian delegation. More likely, however, the field commander's words were not the only insults to Judah's God from the Assyrians outside the walls that had assaulted the ears of the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

The reference to "a certain report" could apply to the report about Tirhakah (v.9). But this report did not send Sennacherib back to Assyria; rather, it gave him greater concern to reduce Hezekiah to submission.

At first v.7 seems irreconcilable with v.36. In fact, v.37 records two events: the withdrawal of the threat to Jerusalem and the return to Nineveh. The first may have been caused by the miracle recorded in v.36 and the second by a report of trouble elsewhere, perhaps in Babylon. For the manner of Sennacherib's death, compare v.38. Verse 8 is an incidental testimony to the concern for truth of fact that motivates the author.

9–13 The report of the approach of an Egyptian army gave greater urgency to the bid to gain Jerusalem. No military leader welcomes a war on two fronts. The message—sent by letter as v.14 makes clear—repeats much that the field commander had said (cf. 36:13–20), except that he attributes deception now to the Lord rather than to Hezekiah himself. The reader gets a shock when he sees the God of Hezekiah designated as "god," till he recalls that the words come from a pagan and represent his valuation of the God of Israel. Sennacherib's reference to his forefathers shows his pride in being a member of an all-conquering dynasty. The list of names is longer, and therefore even more impressive, than that given in 36:19.

14–20 Hezekiah prays in similar fashion to the early church in Ac 4 (esp. v.24). His address is theological in the best sense. As "LORD Almighty," his God has all power; and as the sovereign Creator, the Assyrians are subject to that power. The word "alone" is a critical glance at their paganism. On the other hand, the God of Israel has a special relationship with his people and therefore a concern to protect them from their enemies. The act of salvation Hezekiah prays for is to be a revelation of God to all the kingdoms on earth that the Lord alone was God.

21–25 Again God speaks to Hezekiah through Isaiah. Verses 21–22 clearly imply that, even though it was God's purpose to deliver his people, it was important that Hezekiah prayed. The oracle is a taunt song with the characteristic "limping" rhythm in Hebrew. Jerusalem is represented as a young girl rebuffing with contempt the unwelcome advances of a churl. Perhaps there is a suggestion that she is betrothed to the Holy One of Israel, a title for God characteristic of Isaiah's prophecies.

Characteristic too is Isaiah's emphasis on pride, especially the quotation of arrogant words by a foreign monarch (cf. 10:12–14; 14:4, 13–15). The annals of Sennacherib are dominated by the occurrences of the first person singular. It looks as though the course of his boasting follows that of his conquering marches. The emphasis here is on the king's ability to overcome any natural obstacle that lay in his path. The mountainous, tree-covered terrain of Lebanon could not hold him back, neither could the waterless lands of southern Palestine and Sinai. The streams of the Nile Delta were equally powerless to stop him, for he had but to tread on them. This final claim, of course, went beyond the facts but was perhaps made in anticipation of a great victory over Tirhakah (cf. v.9).

26–29 The question "Have you not heard?" anticipates the great rhetorical questions of 40:21, 28 and draws attention to Israel's God. All the great conquests of the Assyrians are to be ascribed to God, whose instruments they were. Many of Isaiah's oracles up to this point have spoken of judgment on the nations of the Fertile Crescent, including Israel and Judah; and a great many of them were in fact executed through Assyria. Everything had been preordained, and Assyria can boast of nothing. Without doubt the conquests of this nation were devastating. There was a ferocity and ruthlessness that the eastern Mediterranean had never seen before, and which has probably not been surpassed since, at least on the grand scale.

God knows all there is to know about the Assyrians, and Isaiah expresses this in language that had become standard (cf. Dt 28:6; Ps 121:8; et al.). The Assyrians often treated their prisoners like animals, with the use of the rope and the nose-hook. God would do the same.

30–32 Though Scripture does not encourage us to ask for signs, God's word is sometimes followed by a given sign (e.g., 1Sa 10:1–7). The Assyrian occupation of Judah had devastated its fields (1:7–8), and it would take years to recover. If this oracle was given at the close of one season, that just about to start would probably not be normal, for the people would have building as well as agricultural tasks to perform (32:13–14). The prophecy is therefore consistent with the departure of the Assyrians.

In characteristic fashion Isaiah moves from the literal to the figurative. The remnant is pictured as a vine or fruit tree. This prophecy relates specifically to the deliverance from Sennacherib. God underlines this prophecy and the certainty of its fulfillment in a most impressive manner. The word and sign become a threefold cord when the great affirmation that ends this oracle is spoken. This puts this prophecy on a par with the great messianic oracle of ch. 9, which also closes in the same way (9:7). In fact, the two are linked, for it was of David's line (represented now by Hezekiah) that the Messiah would come and on David's throne (in threatened Jerusalem) that he would reign.

33–35 This brief oracle puts the matter clearly and painfully. Far from entering Jerusalem, the Assyrian king would not even subject it to a normal siege. Sennacherib himself said in his famous "Sennacherib Cylinder" (see picture of this cylinder at Isaiah 33) that he shut up Hezekiah in the city like a caged bird. The phrase "for my sake" shows that the Lord answers prayer, and the phrase that follows it shows that he keeps his promises (cf. 2Sa 7).

36–37 "Went out" is often used of going forward to battle. "The angel of the LORD" is a divine figure, at once distinguished from

God and yet identified with him. Herodotus, the Greek historian, records that one night Sennacherib's army camp was infested by mice (or rats) that destroyed the arrows and shield-thongs of the soldiers. The rat, quite appropriately, symbolized plague (cf. 1Sa 6:4), which could well have been the means used by the angel of the Lord. The unexpected and shocking carnage seen by the living next morning is most vividly described.

38 An interval of twenty years passes, but we get the impression that Sennacherib's death is a further manifestation of divine judgment. His death at the hands of his own progeny is confirmed from Assyrian sources. His death when at worship in a pagan shrine should be seen as further evidence of the main thesis of these two chapters, that the God of Israel is the living and true God while all other deities are powerless.

B. Hezekiah's Illness (38:1–22)

1 The phrase "in those days" is similar to 39:1. In fact, all these events probably occurred within about two years. Thus the time reference is to be taken generally. The nature of Hezekiah's illness is not mentioned, nor is it stated that it is punishment for sin. God's command suggests that Hezekiah had a duty to his family and kingdom to arrange their future administration.

2–3 Hezekiah's prayer may have been a direct result of putting his house in order, or at least this may have intensified it; for, as a comparison of v.5 with 2Ki 21:1 shows, he would have been without heir if he had died within three years. He probably turned to the wall to shut out the faces of others while he prayed. Second Kings 18:5–6 confirms Hezekiah's statements about himself and shows that his manner of life was grounded in faith in God.

4–6 God's description of himself as "the God of your father David" implies that he keeps faith with his word, especially his promises to David in 2Sa 7. God is even more concerned about the continuance of David's dynasty than Hezekiah is.

7–8 Here is another sign of messianic significance (cf. 7:10–17), for Hezekiah's dynasty was the line of the Messiah. The sun had been about to set on the life of Hezekiah but now it would return somewhat, prolonging the day. Attempts to explain this scientifically or to relate it to some calendrical adjustment have not been convincing. It is best to admit that we do not yet know the explanation but to accept this Scriptural testimony to the fact that a miracle took place.

9–14 Verses 10–14 are retrospective, the king recalling his thoughts during his illness by the device of self-quotation. Verse 10 assumes that a person can normally look forward to a certain probable life span. The reference to "gates of death" conveys an image of Sheol ("death"; GK 8619) as a city of the dead. To "see the LORD" probably refers to appearing in his presence in the temple. The king shows a right sense of priorities when he places this before the continuance of human fellowship. After the tent illustration, he alludes to the weaver rolling up and cutting a finished length of cloth from his loom. The recurrent statement "day to night" conveys the same idea of suddenness—in the morning perfect health, in the evening, death. Verse 13 seems to refer to a night spent in prayer, only to be ended in the morning when God suddenly falls on Hezekiah like a lion. The varied cries of Palestine's birds express the varied nature of Hezekiah's many cries to God, now quiet, now shrill, now mournful. The reference to Hezekiah's eyes conveys a picture of concentrated appeal to God and to him alone.

15–20 At this point the tone of the psalm changes dramatically. The opening question implies that the king feels that no words of his can do justice to his sense of gratitude to God for his great deliverance. The king has learned humility from this experience, for through it he has come to recognize that someone else controls the course of his life and the day of his death. The words "by such things men live" probably refer to the words and deeds of God mentioned in v.15. God the Creator is also God the Healer. The "benefit" of v.17 is his new understanding of God's gracious, forgiving love, expressed in his deliverance from death.

Verse 18 reflects Hezekiah's sense of forgiveness of sins. The deeper significance of death cries out for the forgiveness of sin, which Hezekiah has himself now experienced. His restoration to health has this as its crowning blessing: he can give thanks to God. Rendered literally, v.19b says, "Father tells children about your faithfulness." If he is speaking in anticipation about his literal children rather than Israel as the children of God, this strengthens the view that part of Hezekiah's concern lay in his lack of a son at that time to succeed him. Verse 20 reminds us that Hezekiah encouraged the singing of the songs of David and Asaph in the temple worship (2Ch 29:25–30; cf. Rev 5:9–10).

21–22 These verses occur in 2Ki 20 immediately after the promise that the city would be delivered from the king of Assyria. The words of Isaiah and Hezekiah may have been recorded here to satisfy the reader's natural queries about the means of healing and the reason for the sign. Hezekiah is not criticized for asking for a sign. After all, Isaiah's two prophecies in v.1 and v.5 may have puzzled him by their contradictoriness. He sought not so much confirmation as clarification.

C. Envoys From and Exile to Babylonia (39:1–8)

This brief chapter sets the scene for the chapters that follow (chs. 40–66). These chapters—enigmatic prior to the reference to Babylon in ch. 43 and perhaps even before the dramatic mention of Cyrus at the close of ch. 44—become clear as to setting when seen to presuppose the fulfillment of the prophecy given in this chapter, which therefore fulfills an indispensable function.

1–2 Merodach-Baladan, known to secular history as Marduk-aplu-idinna, was king of Babylon 721–709 B.C. and again for nine months in 703 B.C. (see ZPEB, 4:191–92). Babylon had known years of greatness in the past and was to be great again. Merodach-Baladan's brief success in throwing off the Assyrian yoke was an earnest of this. There was, of course, a political motive for sending a deputation to Hezekiah. It could have taken place during the closing years of his first period of rule; but, in view of the time references in 38:1 and here, more likely it was in 703, two years before Jerusalem was delivered from Sennacherib.

The envoys were taken on a grand tour of the palace and the kingdom. Hezekiah's glad reception of them may have been due to a desire to be involved in concerted action against Assyria, and the display of his wealth would show he had something to offer as a potential ally.

3–4 Isaiah's inquiry may have been preliminary to the coming of a message from God to him, so that he would himself understand its significance. More likely its purpose was to emphasize to the king the reason for the prophecy. Hezekiah's conduct had been unbelieving, and there may have been pride in it also. These were the two sins most often condemned by the prophet.

5–7 "The LORD Almighty," the title of God used by Isaiah in v.5, lays emphasis on the infinite resources used by the Lord in his acts of power. Hezekiah's own resources may have seemed great to him, but those of the Lord were far greater; and they would be used in judgment against Hezekiah's people through the Babylonians. The reference to his "fathers" was perhaps a rebuke to his lack of a sense of stewardship. Through his folly, what his predecessors had gathered would be lost. Furthermore, his descendants would suffer in the judgment to come. It was not until Jeremiah's day that Judah's dynasty was to take its history of sin beyond the point of no return. Yet even in the midst of this declaration of a coming judgment, there may have been a hint of a continuing purpose of grace. Almost certainly Hezekiah did not have a son at this time to succeed him. The phrase "some of your descendants" would leave room for hope.

8 Hezekiah's acknowledgment that God's word was good probably includes a recognition that the judgment was appropriate—because deserved—and that it was not altogether unmixed with grace. His final statement was not selfish and unfeeling; more likely, it was a thankful recognition that God had not dealt with him personally to the measure of what he deserved.

VII. The Sole Sovereignty and Sure Promises of the Lord (40:1–48:22)

To move from ch. 39 to ch. 40 is to enter a part of the book (chs. 40–66) that has produced more scholarly literature than any other part of the OT. The number of different views as to authorship, structure, and other related matters is bewildering; and the debate as to the nature of the Servant Songs (see comments at 42:1–4) and the identity of the servant shows no sign of abating. The view taken here is that the whole book is the work of Isaiah of Jerusalem and that chs. 40–66 consist of oracles given to him by the Spirit of inspiration, thus enabling Isaiah to live in spirit in a future day, so that he might be the vehicle of God's message to the people of that day.

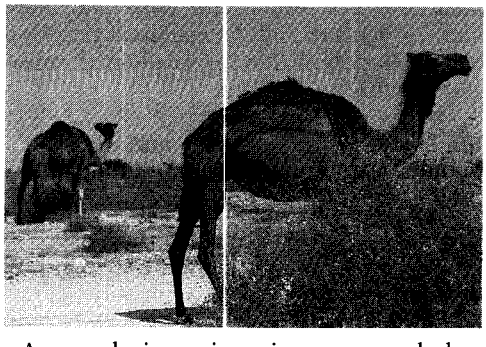
A. Good News for Jerusalem (40:1–11)

This passage sets the mood for chs. 40–48. The prophet responds to the command of God to bring a message of comfort to his people.

1–2 Such a command must have been a great joy to hear, for the prophet had been fulfilling such a discouraging commission as given in 6:9–13. Imperative or vocatival repetition is a characteristic of emotional speech and occurs frequently in Isaiah. The phrase "my people" itself suggests either comfort or rebuke rather than a message of judgment. In close connection with "your God," as here, it is really a covenant term.

Jerusalem is addressed, for God's saving deeds in Babylon were to make possible a new Jerusalem that would emerge from the ashes of the old. The "hard service" is the Babylonian exile. "Double" appears to be hyperbole used to impress on the people that the chastisement of the exile was really over.

3–5 Like other prophets, Isaiah was given visions (1:1), but he also heard words. An unidentified voice calls. John the Baptist, to whom the words are applied in the NT, was prepared to be such an unidentified voice (Jn 1:19–23). Isaiah 35:8–10 had spoken of a highway for the returning exiles, implying perhaps that it would traverse the desert (35:1). This is made clear now; and, because it represents God's purpose for his people, it is called his highway.



As people in ancient times traversed the desert (cf. 40:3), camels were often used for riding and for bearing burdens.

"Prepare" (GK 7155) introduces the idea of the removal of obstructions. The whole concept is figurative, declaring in dramatic fashion that the Lord will let nothing stand in the way of the exiles' return. Coming back often has dual significance in Isaiah, combining the physical and the spiritual (see 7:3). John the Baptist's call to repentance does not settle the matter, for the NT fulfillment of an OT passage often moves the concept from the physical to the spiritual. It seems best to consider it physical here but with possible spiritual overtones. What is in prospect is an amazing new revelation of the glory of the Lord, not now for Israel only (as in her temple), but for all humanity (cf. 60:1–3).

6–8 The prophet hears a voice again; and, in response to his request, he hears the message he is to give. The self-sufficient do not respond eagerly to good news from God. The Exile itself must have made the people aware of their frailty. God is the only enduring reality in a constantly changing world, and he has himself designed it so. The following chapters lay great stress on the enduring word of God.

9–11 Zion is the first to hear the good news of her God's return and is commanded to climb, like a herald, to some elevated place to proclaim the news to her satellite towns (cf. Ac 1:8, "all Judea"). From vv.3–8 the reader has anticipated the coming of the Lord; and he is now described, with the reiterated call to attention—"see." There is a perfect balance of strength and tenderness here. "His arm" suggests his power manifested in the Exodus (Dt 4:34), appropriate in relation to a return from exile and due to be most wonderfully expounded later (see 53:1).

"His reward" and "his recompense," Whybray suggests, perhaps refer to the spoils of victory, in this case the rescued exiles, who are in a sense God's "captives." All this power is employed with great tenderness on behalf of his people, leading them back from Babylon to the fold in Jerusalem. "Sovereign LORD" in v.10 underscores the idea of a strong and tender Shepherd-King.

B. God the Incomparable (40:12–31)

These verses develop the "Here is your God!" in v.9 and describe more fully the all-powerful yet tender Shepherd-King.

12–17 The use of the magnificent anthropomorphisms in v.12 is so natural after the picture of God as a shepherd (v.11). These do not reduce God to a human level but simply give vividness to the theological truth of his personality.

"Mind" (GK 8120) can also be translated "Spirit" (see NIV note). This passage is about God's creative power, and Ge 1:2 gives the Spirit a place in this work.

Near Eastern marketplace commerce would take no account of the minute water drop in the measuring bucket or a little dust on the scales when meat or fruit was weighed. This passage implies the consummate ease of the Lord's control of history as well as of nature. He had given a sacrificial system but was not, like Babylonia's deities, tied to it, for the most impressive forest land known to the Near East was quite inadequate to furnish fuel or sacrificial animals for a worthy offering to him.

18–20 The reference to animal sacrifice—visible offerings made to an invisible God—leads Isaiah to speak of the spectacular folly of idolatry. Later (see esp. 44:12–20) he stresses the selection of the best materials and the finest human skills; but there is a touch of prophetic irony about the stated purpose of all this: "to set up an idol that will not topple."

21–24 God is like a father here, gently yet firmly chiding his children for their failure to see the relevance to their situation of God's disclosure in history and nature of the fact that he is sovereign. He is supreme over all; he utilizes the majestic heavens he has created to suggest, through their overarching form, that the universe is a home for him; and he allows no one to further his ambitions without limit. His absolute control over all human life is quite unchallenged.

25–26 Verses 18–20 had contrasted God with the idols that were all too common in Babylonia. Now the same question introduces an implicit contrast with the astral deities that dominated their religion. This passage asserts that, far from being deities in their own right, the heavenly bodies have simply been created by the one Creator-God, who is also Israel's "Holy One." He orders their pattern, knows each in its distinctiveness, and upholds them all in their being (cf. Col 1:17; Heb 1:3).

27–31 The prophet's majestic view of God, stemming in part from the inaugural vision of ch. 6, is now brought to bear on the people's despondency. The name "Jacob" suggests the unworthiness of the chosen people but also brings to mind the ancestor's experience in the story of his descendants (cf. Mal 3:6); for Jacob too had been in exile in Mesopotamia as a result of his own folly. As God had said to Jacob (Ge 31:13), so he was now telling his progeny: Return to the Land of Promise. The language used here suggests that the people were bringing God down to their own level, thinking him either forgetful or tired—perhaps because their long history of folly seemed to be never-ending.

The closing verses assert that the God who upholds the stars (v.26) also supports his weary people. Those who found the journey to Jerusalem from other parts of the land tiring were given strength for it by God (Ps 84:5, 7). The people in Babylon could exchange their little strength for his omnipotence. The verb "renew" (GK 2736) suggests an exchange of strength. The threefold description in v.31 forms a climax, not its opposite; for the exceptional flying and the occasional running do not require, as does the constant walking, an ever-flowing stream of grace.

C. God the Lord of History for His People (41:1–29)

1 Most commentators dub this the beginning of a trial-speech, in which—as in 1:2—the scene is a courtroom. In his dealings with us, God sustains a multiplicity of legal roles; he is plaintiff, injured party, judge, lawgiver, and creator, each role finding its place within his many-sided relationship with sinners. In ch. 40, Isaiah spoke of God in the third person; here God himself speaks.

Although this verse is an address to the nations, the message of the chapter is intended for Israel. The discomfiture of the nations and the demonstration that their gods are impotent is intended to encourage God's people to trust in him. The repetition of "renew their strength" (cf. 40:31) may well be ironic. As the exiles renew their strength in the true God, so the nations are ironically exhorted to do the same—but in their man-made deities!

2–4 The Lord directs attention to himself as the true author of great historical events. But who is the mysterious "one from the east"? Most commentators have taken this and v.25 to be references to Cyrus, who is dramatically named at the close of ch. 44. If this prophecy comes from Isaiah of Jerusalem and not from an unknown prophet of the Exile, and if (see comments on 44:24–28) the revelation of the name of Cyrus is a moment of great prophetic drama, then we should expect some material at an earlier stage to stimulate the expectations of the reader. The references here and in v.25 are fully appropriate when applied to Cyrus. Every historical conqueror raised up by God is, despite his faults, a faint shadow of the great ultimate Victor, God's Messiah; and in him Israel is triumphant and her kingdom enlarged (9:2–7).

Cyrus, king of Persia, crossed the Tigris from the east and so entered the Babylonian Empire. He marched swiftly and victoriously against Croesus, king of Lydia, and took his capital, Sardis, in western Asia Minor, having already subdued the Medes in the north (cf. v.25). He could therefore be described as being both from the east and from the north. The references to "dust" and "chaff" recall 17:13; 29:5; and 40:24. In fact, this reference to Cyrus is an example of the general principle stated in 40:23–24. The conquests of Cyrus took him into areas quite unfamiliar to the people of his land (v.3). The past tenses of these verses should be interpreted as prophetic perfects, describing with vividness what is yet to be. The great conqueror does not hold the center of the prophetic stage for long, for he exists only to exalt the name of the Lord. Verse 4 declares the absolute sovereignty of God over history—from its beginning, through all its generations, and to its end. No wonder he can predict and raise up Cyrus!

5–7 Places remote from Cyrus's route get to hear of what he has done. These verses contain clear allusions to 40:18–20. In the cooperative effort of idol-making, the terrified peoples try to find strength. The atmosphere of panic in v.5 seems to disappear, for the more gods, the more security—or so they think; but v.29 shows how vain is such trust.

8–10 In Cyrus's day the people of Israel would be in exile in Babylon, itself under threat and eventually to fall to Cyrus. The remote islands may have been feeling fear (v.5), but these verses are God's answer to his people's fears.

Verses 8–10 describe Israel in several encouraging ways. The name "Israel" suggests what God is determined to make of his people (Ge 32:28), while the name "Jacob" indicates that God loves them and has chosen them despite their demerit. Taking them "from the ends of the earth" is hyperbole that stresses the distance of Abraham's journey from Ur to Canaan. God chose his people for a purpose of service; thus they cannot perish without that purpose being fulfilled. These people are loved for the sake of beloved Abraham (cf. Dt 7:7–8), to whom God gave great promises (Ge 12:1–3; 17:1–8; et al.). The strength already promised (40:31) would indeed be given to them. The threefold affirmation of strength (v.10) comes to its consummation in a reference to the "righteous right hand" of God, a reminder of the tender strength of the Shepherd-King in 40:9–11.

11–16 Those who are put to shame sometimes do not feel it as they ought, because of moral insensitivity. The call to leave their fear (cf. vv.8–10) comes yet again, with encouragements to trust in their God. The assertion "I am the LORD, your God" is a reminder of the opening of the Decalogue (Ex 20:2) and so suggests a new Exodus. This is reinforced by the use of "Redeemer" (cf. Ex 6:6; 15:13) and made even more emphatic by the phrase "the Holy One of Israel," which stresses God's special relationship with Israel as well as his own distinctive nature.

The description of Israel in v.14 represents the people's self-valuation, while v.15 shows what God's amazing purpose will make them (cf. 2Co 2:16; 3:5–6). Threshing with a heavy wooden sledge was preliminary to winnowing, which was carried out on hilltops where the wind could carry away the chaff. The hills are not now the location of the threshing floor but are themselves threshed! In this way the prophet stresses the powerful instrument God would make of this apparently insignificant people. Every hindrance to God's ultimate purposes in the international scene is overcome through a judgment executed through Israel.

17–20 The provision here described is an answer to prayer. The need for water dominates the passage (cf. 32:6–7). Through the difficult conditions that would beset the returning exiles, God expresses his total provision for their deepest needs. In the most unlikely places, plentiful supplies will be found, making the whole environment fertile and beautiful. God would supply all that his people needed by his power and grace.

21–24 The trial scene of v.1 resumes; but it is now the gods of the nations, not the nations themselves, who are called on for evidence. The concept of deity is, in some ways, simple, combining superhuman power and the claim to human worship. It has many implications, however, and ability to predict is one of these. This is the basis of the argument here. If the gods of Babylonia and other nations have objective reality as deities, they should be able to predict the future and also to so interpret history that past and future are seen to be linked in one divinely controlled plan. If prediction is beyond them, let them produce at least some evidence that they exist! They cannot respond; they and their worshipers are beneath contempt.

25–29 Cyrus was to emerge on the international scene at least a century and a half later. Here then is evidence indeed that what the gods of paganism could not do, the God of Israel could and did do. Here is prediction indeed! North and east ("the rising sun") are combined, for, considered from the standpoint of Palestine, Cyrus originated in the east and carried out major conquests in the north. The Babylonian idols might have been expected to predict Cyrus's coming, for his activities would greatly concern the people who worshiped them; but they were silent.

The prophet presses home his point with quite exceptional emphasis, for vv.26–29 are given over entirely to different ways of underlining the great contrast between the true God who predicts and the false gods who cannot. The coming of Cyrus was, of course, a message of good tidings for Israel (cf. 40:9), because through him would come the release of the exiles.

D. The Lord's Servant—the Perfect and the Defective (42:1–25)

In this part of the book, it is not easy, or perhaps even appropriate, to distinguish separate oracles. Certainly this whole chapter exhibits a point of unity in the servant theme.

1–4 The term "Servant Songs" is something of a misnomer, for there is no evidence they were ever sung. Through the prophetic word the reader's eye is directed away from the pagan gods to God's servant (cf. 41:8–10), in whom the servant mission of Israel finds perfect expression. There can be little doubt that we are intended initially to identify the servant with Israel, that we might be gently led to him who is the incarnation of God's mind for Israel (cf. Mt 12:15–21).

The words "in whom I delight" immediately suggest that the servant is either Israel idealized or Israel represented by the ideal Israelite (cf. Mt 3:17). If the baptism of Jesus was his official initiation into the messianic office, with the descent of the Spirit representing his anointing for the work, the present passage too presents Jesus' ministry in prospect from the perspective of his baptismal inauguration. There are, however, more personal links with the earlier messianic prophecies, in which the king, anointed by the Spirit, promotes justice (cf. 11:1–5; 32:1). Verses 1 and 4 suggest that even if we cannot completely identify the servant with a king, there is a regal aspect to his work.

Already the element of suffering in the servant's experience, which finds fuller and fuller expression until it achieves dominance in the fourth song (52:13–53:12), is gently suggested in v.4. Others, faced with what he would have to experience, would falter; but his faithfulness sustains him in the pathway of obedient service.

5–7 Just as Ps 2 presents the divine address to the messianic King or to Israel's king as foreshadowing him, almost certainly in the context of his kingly enthronement, so here, with the ministry of the servant in prospect, God assures him of divine support in the execution of his mission. As Genesis sets redemption in a context of creation, so the picture of God as Creator and Lord (cf. ch. 40) is summarily expressed here. His relationship to the universe is suggestive of almighty power. This power is now channeled for the support of his servant in the doing of his will. If we interpret this passage in terms of its ultimate fulfillment in Jesus, then it was through his earthly ministry with its climax in death that he was "made" a covenant and a light, just as through his sufferings he was perfected in experience for his priestly work (Heb 5:4–10).

Verse 6, with its reference to "a covenant for the people," makes us aware that the servant cannot be simply identified with Israel. He at least represents a group within it, perhaps the faithful remnant, if not an individual. Thus the reader is being gradually educated as to the identity of the true Servant of God. The "covenant for the people" implies a structured relationship between God and those already possessing his revelation, while "a light for the Gentiles" suggests the widening of the scope of this revelation. The covenant reference may be to the new covenant (Jer 31:31–34), presumably confirming the Abrahamic covenant (cf. Ge 12:1–3; et al.).

Verse 7 can apply both to the people and the Gentiles, but in fact it looks like an exposition of the light-imparting work of the servant. Ancient Near-Eastern prisons were extremely dark; but this verse teaches that the servant gives liberty as well as light (cf. 61:1–2). Freeing captives suggests the conquest of the captors and so kingship, while the opening of blind eyes and the enlightenment of the Gentiles introduces a prophetic feature into the work of this Spirit-anointed Servant of God.

8–9 The great assertion "I am the LORD" recalls 41:13 and so makes another link between the servant and Israel. Therefore, although the servant may not simply be Israel, he is closely associated with that people. God acts in the servant's work for his own glory. That work does not detract from his unique glory but rather ministers to it. "The former things" refers either to earlier prophecies given through Isaiah and already fulfilled or to the entire Israelite prophetic movement and its already fulfilled predictions. The point is that the God who has already proved his word true is able to make known new things. Perhaps he is speaking here of the predicted work of the Servant.

10–13 If we take this chapter as a unity, it is natural to see the chief cause of praise to be the work of the Servant. If his ministry is to reach to the islands of the sea, then it is not surprising that the whole earth joins in the song. The sea and the desert probably find special mention because they are great areas with few people. Even in such places there are islands and oases, and the people who live there are encouraged to join the universal song of praise. The Bedouin, represented by Kedar, and the inhabitants of rocky Sela will also be involved in this vocal worship. Even from the mountaintops, where perhaps only a wandering shepherd is to be found, singing voices are to be heard.

The song is a new one. Before there can be a new, however, there must be an old, and v.13 (recalling perhaps Ex 15:3–12) suggests that the old song was sung by Israel at its release from Egyptian bondage. If the song is occasioned by the work of the Servant, then he is to achieve a new Exodus, a great victory over the enemies of God. What an amazing paradox, when the gentleness of the Servant (vv.2–3) is pondered! This paradox is even more strikingly expressed in Isa 53:1, for "the arm of the LORD" denotes power (cf. also 52:13; 53:12). The nature of the enemies is not indicated here.

14–17 God presents himself as a pregnant woman. The long period of gestation—perhaps representing the Babylonian exile—is over; and God, who has seemed inactive, will be at pains to bring forth his people.

Verse 15 means that the Lord will remove obstacles to his people's deliverance (cf. 40:3–4), and the reference to the drying up of the waters may be an intentional allusion to the Exodus. The unfamiliar paths recall Abraham, who went out (from Babylonia) not knowing where God would take him (cf. Heb 11:8–9). Both the Gentiles and the Israelites need light from God. People worship idols because they promise more immediate satisfaction than does the worship of an unseen God. But here all such apparent promise that cannot in fact produce results will retreat before the deliverance effected by the true God.

18–20 This passage, depicting Israel as blind and deaf in her sin, stands in stark contrast to vv.1–7, where the perfect Servant of the Lord is depicted. Clearly we have been brought back with a jolt from the future's perfection to the present's lamentable failure. A blind and deaf person can hardly function as a servant. Verse 20 makes it clear that this condition is culpable; the faculties are in fact still present, but there is failure to attend. That is, the blindness is of the mind or heart rather than of the eye.

21–25 "Law" (GK 9368) here probably means "teaching" and includes the prophetic word. Whether Israel, as God's now useless servant, hears that word or not, God has determined to magnify it. By contrast, Israel in Babylon is anything but great and glorious. Her lot is a sorry one. Not only have the people been plundered, but they are themselves plunder for their enemies. In the perspective of history, the words "with no one to say, 'Send them back'" remind us that before long Cyrus would say just that.

Israel had failed to learn the spiritual and moral lessons of the Exile, tracing the calamity of it to their own rebellion against God. Herein lay their obtuseness. The occurrence of "we" in v.24 shows that the prophet himself has spiritual perception and moral sensitivity even if they have not. In this way he anticipates in his own person the Servant of the Lord whom he has so beautifully portrayed at the start of the chapter.

E. Grace Abounding and Despised (43:1–28)

This whole chapter expounds the redemptive grace of the Lord toward his people, grace that is highlighted at the end by reference to the people's sin.

1–7 The words "but now" link this chapter with ch. 42, where the prophet declared the consequences of Israel's refusal to obey the law of their God. Here Isaiah declares they will experience God as their Redeemer (cf. 44:1). The names "Jacob" and "Israel" together suggest God's grace to an unworthy people and his great purpose for them. His names and titles are reassuring, for those in v.3 imply a special relationship between God and his people, while his activities on their behalf—such as creation (out of "nothing" in Egypt), redemption, and protection—demonstrate his loving concern.

God promises his people that he will gather them from every quarter, the passage making many allusions to the Exodus. The waters and the rivers look back to the Red Sea and the Jordan, and the fire perhaps points to Da 3. The nation's preciousness to him suggests a filial relationship, which becomes individualized in v.7. As the firstborn of Israel were ransomed by substitution at the Passover (Ex 13:14–16), so God would ransom Israel as his own firstborn (Ex 4:22–23). The statement "I am the LORD, your God" (v.3) recalls Ex 20, where the divine description is followed by the words "who brought you out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery" (Ex 20:2). So, learning from this significant past event, they could rest in his promise to bring them again into their own land, this time from every point of the globe. Fear is banished as God's nature, activities, and promises to his people are considered.

8–13 The atmosphere of the prophecy changes from comfort to challenge. Once again we are transported to a courtroom (cf. 1:2; 41:1, 21). Israel and the nations are in court together. What is being examined is the Lord's claim to uniqueness, to sole deity. First of all, only he can foretell. He alone is divine; this always has been and always will be the truth. From his dealings with Israel in the past—as Revealer and Savior of his people and Judge of others, at a time (presumably the Exodus) when the people's trust was in him alone—it is clear that he alone is God and Savior.

Israel appears in these verses as God's "witnesses" (vv.10, 12). Other nations can give no witness for their own impotent deities, but the Israelites have so much to declare; for the Lord's wonderful works have been done in their presence and on their behalf. Yet, sadly, though they are God's chosen servant, they are blind, deaf, and a failure. To make matters worse, their choice by him was with a view to intelligent faith in him, which should have made them most articulate and effective as witnesses for him.

14–15 The comforting tone of the opening verses of this chapter is now resumed, along with some reassuring titles and descriptions of Israel's Lord. The generalized promise of vv.5–7 gives place to a specific reference to Babylon, the first express mention of it since ch. 39. It is clear that Babylon is to be judged.

16–21 The fundamental principles of the divine activity are changeless, but the outward shape of that activity alters with the changing needs of God's people. God affirms—in detail and with emphasis on the deadly efficiency of his deeds—that he was the God of the Exodus, but he also asserts the wonderful freshness of his new act in prospect. He had made a way through the waters; now he would make a new way—through the desert! Water, formerly a barrier, would now be a blessing, with God as its source. The abundant provision for people would be enjoyed by the wild creatures also. This would perhaps be a foreshadowing of the regeneration of creation promised in Isa 11:6–9; 65:25.

22–28 Once again the mood changes, and comfort gives place to accusation. The Lord's past acts of grace should have evoked gratitude from his people, but they have offered him sins instead of sacrifices. Both ritualistic excess of sacrifices (cf. 1:2–17) and shameful neglect of them testify to their deep spiritual malaise.

Both here and in ch. 1 the assurance of forgiveness of sins is given in the context of sacrifice. The ultimate in sacrificial—and therefore priestly—teaching is given in 52:13–53:12, where there is full forgiveness through the Servant's sacrifice. Much in vv.22–25 recalls ch. 1, esp. the double use of the word "burdened" (GK 6268; see comments on 1:4, 14, 24). The appropriate has been doubly replaced by the unexpected—on God's side by his incredible grace, and on Israel's by her unthinkable ingratitude.

Verse 26 evokes memories of 1:18, where the divine urge to forgive is expressed in courtroom language, with a call for settlement of the issue. Here God speaks to establish the guilt of his people, for without a recognition of this they would never come for forgiveness. The first father could be Adam, Abraham, or Jacob; from their beginning and throughout their history the nation has been characterized by sin, even on the part of its spiritual elite. Not only would that elite be disgraced, but the whole people would suffer destruction at God's hands.

The word "destruction" (v.28; GK 3051) refers to "the irrevocable giving over of things or persons to the LORD, often by totally destroying them" (see NIV note and comment on Jos 6:17). In other words, God will treat his people as if they are pagan. Isaiah's opening vision, however, assured him that even devastating judgment for Israel would leave a remnant in whom God's purposes would find ultimate fulfillment (cf. 6:11–13).

F. Israel's Great God and the Folly of Idolatry (44:1–23)

1–5 Once again, as in 43:1, after a strong affirmation of divine judgment, God says, "But now." The name "Jeshurun" (see Dt 32:15; 33:5, 26), like Israel, provides a contrast in meaning with Jacob (i.e., "Deceiver"), as there can be little doubt that it means "the Upright One." This fact may suggest that the Jacob-Israel name combination, so common in chs. 41–49, is used to designate the people as sinful and yet as the object of the Lord's gracious purpose of redemption.

Whybray points out that the promises of abundant rain seem not to refer to miracles that will occur during the journey through the desert but denote the conferring of a blessing. Numerous progeny are often treated in the OT as a sign of God's blessing (e.g., Ge 15:5; 17:3–5), and spiritual progeny are evidence of God's blessing on his suffering Servant (53:10).

Isaiah is almost Pauline at this point, for the Gentile converts seem like an (adopted?) extension of the children of Israel. The statement "I will pour out my Spirit" reminds us of Joel 2:29, with its fulfillment at Pentecost and the Gentile evangelization that followed it. Verse 5 probably refers to the mark of a master on the hand of a slave (cf. 49:16).

6–8 The expression "This is what the LORD says" (v.6) is most apt as introducing verses in which God's perceptive word is proclaimed. Although the Lord is the God of his own special people, he is also sovereign over all history and so holds sole title to the designation "God." He is incomparable, especially in his power to interpret the past and predict the future. The statement "I established my ancient people," the phrases "the first" and "long ago" and the use of the title "Rock" from Dt 32 all evoke memories of the Exodus, assuring the people that the first Exodus was the guarantee of the second.

9–20 These verses commence with theological statements (vv.9–11) that introduce the imaginative scene in the idol-maker's shop. The workers share the worthlessness of their images. They are nothing and must suffer discrediting and judgment. Pagan religions have attempted to provide an intellectual framework and justification for idolatry. Isaiah will have none of this, because he is jealous for the glory of the God of Israel. Whether the medium be iron or wood, the enterprise deserves nothing but ridicule. God-given strength and skill are being misused, and sin has deprived the idolater of any sense of what is fitting. He uses a tree that is dependent on God's rain for its growth and uses it for two purposes—to make a fire for warmth and a god for worship! Here is the absurdity of idolatry, for sin has blinded the mind. Right from his call Isaiah in ch. 6 was aware of the blinding effects of sin. The words "he feeds on ashes" suggest that the idolater collects the ashes remaining after his fire has burned out—unbelievably foolish!

21–23 The call to "remember" probably embraces both the vast contrast between the true God and the idols and also the earlier reminders of his activity and power to predict revealed in the past history of his people. The promise of forgiveness in 43:25 is repeated, but now the people's sins are likened to passing phenomena of the sky, blotting out the sun for a while. This does not mean that their sins are not serious, but it does mean that God has determined to forgive them. The command to "return" implies the objectivity of God's redemptive provision, to which the people are called to react in penitence. This objective work is so wonderful that the whole universe is called on to share their exuberant joy at his redemption. Clearly the glory he displays is the glory of his grace.

G. God's Actions Through Cyrus (44:24–45:25)

This great passage, with its two explicit references to Cyrus, has attracted much scholarly discussion. Some modern scholars cannot conceive of supernatural predictive prophecy of such detail. Yet it cannot be denied that the context for such predictions is the most appropriate in the whole Bible; for Isa 40–48 says more about the Lord's power to predict than any other passage.

God assures his people that he plans to rebuild Judah, Jerusalem, and his temple, that this will become possible through the pagan Cyrus, and that the ultimate issue of the divine acts through Cyrus is that people everywhere will acknowledge God's uniqueness (44:24–45:8). His sovereign choice of such a vehicle is unchallengeable and the coming of Cyrus absolutely certain (45:9–13). God will vindicate Israel as his people in the eyes of pagan peoples subdued by Cyrus (45:14–17). This will herald a final challenge to paganism, the offer of salvation to people everywhere, and the ultimate submission of the whole world to his sovereign rule (45:18–25).

24–28 The assertion "This is what the LORD says" punctuates this section of the prophecy (cf. 45:1, 11, 18). The Lord is first designated as his people's Redeemer. The phrase "who formed you in the womb" links this passage with 44:1, confirming the integrity of Isa 40–48. The simple yet important affirmation "I am the LORD" recalls Ex 20:2 (cf. 43:11; see comment on 43:1–7).

With a series of prepositional phrases, Isaiah builds a powerful doctrine of the past activities of the God of Israel. He is the sole creator, the sole revealer of the future, and the sole guarantor of a new day for Jerusalem and Judah. The meaning of v.27 is disputed, but it most likely refers to the Exodus.

There have already been allusions to Cyrus (see comments on 41:2–4, 25–29), but his name has been held back for this great moment of poetic and prophetic climax. Only in 1Ki 13:2 do we find anything quite comparable in the OT, though Isa 52:13–53:12 could hardly be made more wonderfully specific if the name Jesus had been mentioned. Only a little less dramatic than the name is the description of Cyrus as "my shepherd," for this was a pagan foreigner. The term would remind the people of the shepherd role of their own kings, especially David (cf. 2Sa 5:2), and of the description of God in Isa 40:11. The lost sheep were to be rounded up and returned to their true fold in Judah by this foreigner, who would make possible the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the temple of Israel's God. This oracle gives the first explicit reference in Isaiah to God's plans to rebuild the city.

45:1–7 The last five verses of ch. 44, for all their majesty, contain only one main statement: "I am the LORD" (v.24). All else leads into or amplifies this great affirmation. It is repeated in vv.3, 5, and 6. This is surely significant in an address to a pagan king. "His anointed" and "my shepherd" (44:28) explain each other, for both meet in the concept of a divinely chosen and divinely employed king. There is precedent for the divine anointing of a non-Israelite king, though in one passage only (1Ki 19:15–16). Although the living God normally employed Israelites for such purposes, he is sovereign and may use whom he will.

Because in God's purpose Cyrus functions for Israel, he comes into the good of some of God's promises to that people. He would enjoy great triumphs over his enemies and would find their fortified cities no obstacle to his advance. The reference to great "riches" could refer to the treasures of Lydia—the riches of whose ruler, Croesus, were proverbial—or to those of Babylon; Cyrus overcame both. That all these victories were for the sake of little Israel is one of the ironies of God's control of history.

The prophet declares that Cyrus would call on the Lord's name (41:25) and that God's support of Cyrus has as its purpose that he might know that Israel's God is the Lord. Yet twice over it is denied that Cyrus acknowledges him (vv.4–5). In the Cyrus Cylinder (see EBC, 1:238), the king attributes his victories to Marduk, god of Babylon, though in Ezr 1 he is quoted as asserting that the Lord had given him dominion. Clearly Cyrus used the names of deities without any sense of exclusiveness.

The general assertions of absolute monotheism in vv.5–6 are underlined by the specific affirmations of v.7. There are three in all, the first related to the universe, the second to human society, and the third summing up. Genesis seems to imply the creation of darkness as well as light by God (Ge 1:1–5). Although it is said in Genesis that the light is good, there is no suggestion that the darkness is evil, for it too has its function (cf. Ps 104:19–24). The words shalom (GK 8934) and rah (GK 8273), rendered "prosperity" and "disaster," are, literally, "peace" and "evil" (cf. Am 3:6). So the God who created darkness, which is not itself evil—though it is sometimes used to symbolize it—and who brings disaster as a punishment for sin, is supreme over all.

8 This verse suggests that the prophet had Ge 1 in mind. The heavens and the earth, called on first to witness the rebellion of God's people (1:2) and then to praise God for redeeming them (44:23), are now addressed in ecstatic apostrophe. The poetic imagination of the prophet sees the processes by which vegetation grows on the earth as symbols of God's saving work (cf. Heb 6:7). The God of creation and the God of redemption are one.

"Righteousness" and "salvation" are closely linked here. God's righteous order of the future is to include the manifestation of his salvation. In Pauline theology the righteousness of God is seen in the gospel (cf. Ro 1:16–17; 3:21–22; et al.); for through the bearing of sin by Christ, God's righteous wrath against sin has been fully manifested and sinners are given, by his grace, a righteous standing with God (Ro 3:25–26).

9–10 The point at issue in the quarrel is probably God's disclosure to his people that he would deliver them through pagan Cyrus. We cannot accuse God of using inappropriate means to achieve his ends. Isaiah was particularly gifted in portraying sin as ridiculous and illogical, as he does here with the illustrations of the discarded scraps of pottery and the lump of clay in the hands of the potter (cf. Jer 18:1–6). Verse 10 applies ultimately to God the Creator (cf. Ro 9:20–21).

11–13 In v.13 Isaiah again clearly refers to Cyrus (cf. NIV note). "My children" and "the work of my hands" allude to vv.9–10. The coming of Cyrus, though still future, is as certain as the existence of God's created universe. Not only is Jerusalem to be rebuilt (cf. 44:26–28), but its people will be freed from their exile, and that without any financial inducement to Cyrus.

14 This verse anticipates ch. 60. The people of Egypt, Cush, and Seba are seen here submitting to Israel. Despite their chains, the language suggests the people will voluntarily submit, and that for the best of reasons—recognition of Israel's God and him alone.

15–17 The startling disclosures just made prompt this prophetic exclamation of wonderment. The conversion of the Gentiles involves the discrediting of idolatry and the salvation and vindication of God's ancient people. The final phrase of v.17 makes it clear that this is no momentary thing but a permanent vindication of them by their God.

18–19 The introductory "This is what the LORD says" introduces some utterances of grandeur about God himself. He created the universe as an environment for humankind;

thus his work is to be discerned in history as well as in nature. Perhaps he does hide himself, for revelation is his sole prerogative; but when he does speak, his word is clear and true, enabling his people to find him.

20–21 After the disclosure about Egypt, Cush, and Seba in v.14, the prophet calls on the remnant of humanity left after all history's wars and upheavals. There is to be one last challenge to paganism. Only the Lord predicted the coming of Cyrus and the righteous salvation of Israel. He has established forever his claim to be recognized as the only God there is.

22–25 Amazingly, the God whose actions discredit paganism calls the discomfited idolaters, not for the judgment they so richly deserve, but for salvation—if only they will turn to him! God's great decree has been announced that all humanity will come to acknowledge his sovereignty. All will not be saved, but all must acknowledge the Lord as God alone. Under his ultimate sovereignty there will be both judgment for the rebel and salvation for God's people (cf. Php 2:10–11).

H. Babylon's Ineffectual Idols and the Lord Almighty (46:1–13)

1–2 All references so far made in the prophecy to pagan deities or idols have been general. Here, appropriately, where Cyrus and his victories are much in view, Isaiah named the two great gods of Babylon; Bel (also called Marduk) and Nebo, familiar to us from the compound names Belshazzar and Nebuchadnezzar. In ch. 45 Isaiah declared that every knee will bow to the Lord, and here he pictures the gods of great Babylon stooping low in humiliation. Isaiah applies the imagery of burden-bearing first to the gods of Babylon and then, in vv.3–4, to the Lord. The idols are taken from their places of honor and placed on the backs of animals, bundled off perhaps first in flight and then to captivity. It is true (see at 45:1–7) that Cyrus attributed his victories to Marduk, but there can be little doubt that those who heard of the downfall of Babylon would see in this a colossal defeat for her gods. The tiredness of the animals underscores the impotence of the gods. They have become a liability to both people and animals.

This small Egyptian god was broken during a Babylonian assault. How weak idols are! Courtesy Ilan Sztulman of the Tel Miqne-Ekron Excavations.

3–4 How different is the Lord's relationship to his people! His people do not carry him; rather, he bears them. Moreover, he always has done so and always will. The repetition of the fact that he is the God who carries his people gives place suddenly and dramatically to a new fact: he promises to rescue them. The work of Cyrus will be viewed as God's great work of deliverance.

5–7 The Lord's uniqueness (cf. 40:18, 25) has been singularly demonstrated in the overthrow of Babylon's gods. Not in their downfall alone, but at every point in their history, the idols' paltry character vividly contrasts with the Lord's unique majesty. The whole process of making idols, from the preparation through the commissioning of the workers and the transportation of the idols to their eventual worship is quite unavailing; for they are powerless to hear, to speak, or to save.

8–13 Isaiah concentrates here largely on consolation and encouragement, but he is a realist, knowing from experience that there was much unbelief among the people. They approached the prophecies of Cyrus and his work with skepticism. The Lord calls them to consider the history of his relationship with them. This illustrates that faith has objective reference and so is a response to revelation, to truth about God declared by God himself. The people's history had demonstrated his sole deity and especially his power to predict. Isaiah asserts it again: from the east Cyrus will swoop on his victims, as suddenly as the descent of an eagle from the sky. Whether they believe it or not, it will happen; for in this way the Lord will fulfill his saving purpose for Israel. The term "Zion" is a reminder of the promises of 44:26–28.

I. The Fall of Proud Babylon (47:1–15)

There is a sense of fitness to the downfall of Babylon's gods being followed immediately by a proclamation of the fall of Babylon herself, for there was solidarity between them.

1–4 The prophet's inspired imagination continues to overleap the years separating his own day from the close of the Babylonian exile. He addresses the proud capital city with irony as "Virgin Daughter of Babylon." She is to be dethroned and made to sit in the dust. Three analogies follow one another in swift succession: (1) she is a beggar, sitting in the dust; (2) she is a slave, divesting herself of the gentlewoman's veil and accepting the hard grind of manual labor; and (3) she is a fugitive, needing to tuck in her skirts to enable her to cross streams. The Lord declares all this to be an expression of his impartial punitive justice, and the prophet follows this by asserting that the judgment is to be understood in the context of his holy and redemptive purpose for Israel.

5–7 The prophet's interjection in v.4 is parenthetical, for the direct address from God is now resumed. Babylon will go from the blare of world publicity and the glare of the palace lights to the silence of obscurity! Babylon's dominion was not only over the southern Mesopotamian heartland of her empire but also over many petty kingdoms she had vanquished. The prophecy recognizes that the destruction of Judah and the exile of its people were to be understood as a divine punishment. Babylon, however, went too far, and the condition of the exiles may have worsened toward the close of their captivity. Characteristically, Isaiah underlines not only man's inhumanity to man, but also pride as a major cause of Babylon's judgment.

8–11 The accusation of self-sufficient pride already leveled at Babylonia is further expounded. This pleasure-loving lady of leisure will soon find herself a childless widow, her widowhood robbing her of the possibility of further family. Isaiah has already made it plain that sorcery and other ways of trafficking with the forbidden supernatural realm were a cause of God's judgment on his own people (2:6; 8:19). For the Babylonians, sorcery also induced a mood of complacency, because the people relied on their magicians to predict the coming of the enemy and to defeat him. For them, the intellectual and the magical were intertwined.

12–15 The prophet taunts Babylonia sarcastically. Such a rag bag of spells and magic arts she has accumulated! Could it be that there is an outside chance of success? "Not a hope!" the prophet implies. Then he exhorts the experts with the horoscopes to provide deliverance. Babylonia, with its astral deities, was the natural home of the astrologer and his kin. The prophet identifies for a moment with the people, besieged with advice from such people and yet with no hope of a remedy for future calamity. In v.13 he says, "Let them save you"; and in v.14 he boldly asserts, "They cannot even save themselves."

The coming of the great judgment is likened to a consuming fire, and the tone of sarcasm returns in the second half of v.14. They should not mistake the meaning. This is fire as an enemy, not as a friend. The whole history of Babylon's long flirtation with astrology is bluntly dismissed in v.15. All this effort, all this expenditure, and at the end—nothing!

J. Israel's Stubbornness and God's Purpose of Grace (48:1–22)

1–6a The call to "listen" introduces God's charge that his people are stubborn skeptics. They are untrue both to their national names and to their religious profession. The name "Israel" means "he struggles with God" (Ge 32:28 [cf. NIV note]; cf. Ro 9:6) and "Judah" means "praise" (Ge 49:8; cf. Ro 2:28–29). The people were proud too of their citizenship in the place God had set apart for himself (cf. 52:1). God's own name was used in solemn religious vows and in prayer, not in true faith manifested in righteousness, but in presumptuous reliance on mere profession. Let them recall that he is also the Lord Almighty, implying that he may use this great power to bring judgment on them.

Not only were the people stiff-necked and brazen in their attitude toward God's word, but they had a chronic tendency to attribute his acts to other gods. The adjectives "wooden" and "metal" reflect the prophet's contempt for idols (cf. 44:19). Let them admit that he is the God of prophecy and fulfillment and therefore true to his word.

6b–11 From things foretold "long ago," the divine word proceeds to reveal new things: the work of Cyrus (vv.14–16) and the Servant of the Lord (v.16; 49:1–7). The word "create" (GK 1343), used in Ge 1 of God's creative word, is used in v.7 to emphasize that what God has declared is as certain as if it is already fulfilled (cf. Heb 1:1).

Israel was rebellious. God did not reveal these things earlier, for he knew how cynically his people would react. Their ears were shut to his glad tidings, while, as Isaiah will show, the Servant's would be open to accept his destiny of suffering (50:4). They were untrue to their own name, but God would vindicate his own. Rebellious and treacherous they might be, but they would always find him true, upholding the honor of his great name and therefore restraining the full outpouring of his wrath on the people of the promises.

12–16 The renewed call to "listen" apparently underlines the importance of the three great facts here declared. (1) God speaks of himself, his self-existence, his lordship over all history from its beginning to its consummation, and his creation and present control of all that is. (2) He speaks a word about Cyrus, whom he calls "the LORD's chosen ally." This makes explicit for the first time that Cyrus's work would bring down Babylonia (cf. 14:13–23).

(3) Another speaker mysteriously enters the prophecy. Numerous conservative commentators have argued that the new speaker introduced here is in fact God's Servant, the Servant of the songs. He is clearly not simply the Lord, and the phrase "Sovereign LORD" recurs in 50:4–5, 7, 9, in the context of the third Servant Song. Unlike the first and fourth songs, where it is God who speaks about him, here, as in the second and third, he himself speaks. Perhaps he is introduced here because Cyrus's work is simply a harbinger of the much greater deliverance he would bring to God's people (see comment on 53:1).

Grammatically "the Spirit" could be either a second subject (with "LORD") or a second object (with "me"), but it is almost certainly the latter. The NIV's rather free rendering is probably intended to leave both options of interpretation open.

17–19 Every sensitive teacher knows the pain of heart that comes when one pours oneself out for one's students who prove to be unteachable. Israel proved to be like that (cf. v.8); and God expresses his deep concern for them, because they are themselves the losers. The language used does not exclude all possibility of penitent amendment, as if all hope had gone. The similes speak of abundance; and the whole passage stresses the contingent nature of God's blessings, even some of these that have been the subject of his own promises. Divine grace can, of course, so work within the heart that promises seemingly uncertain of fulfillment are made sure by the regenerative work of the Spirit.

20–22 This most dramatic passage anticipates the call given in 52:11–12. The military-style command is explicit and urgent and is associated with a call to all the earth to praise God for his redeeming grace to Israel. The "shouts of joy" were perfectly natural, as those who have suffered internment in prison camps well know. Verse 21 suddenly moves from the future to the past, for the people's confidence in God as their Redeemer from Babylonia was to be based on his redeeming love demonstrated at the Exodus and his care of his people during their journey through the desert. In such a context v.22 may seem harsh, but the prophet was a realist, knowing the unbelief with which many of the people would view this vision. Acts of salvation are not for the stubbornly wicked and unbelieving but for those who have faith (cf. Rev 22:14–15).

VIII. The Gospel of the Servant of the Lord (49:1–57:21)

A. The Lord's Servant and the Restoration of Israel (49:1–26)

This is the second of the so-called Servant Songs, though, as we have suggested at 48:16, this passage is anticipated not only by ch. 42 but also by that verse.

1–7 Although a collective interpretation of this passage is not impossible and is naturally suggested by a consideration of v.3, a straightforward application to Israel is ruled out by vv.5–7. The reader is therefore forced by the material itself to face the question: Who is this?

If the first song can be viewed as contemplating the ministry of Jesus the Servant in prospect from the perspective of his baptism, this second song seems to be looking back on that ministry from its close. The distant nations are to benefit from his work; so he calls them to "listen" (v.1). This harmonizes with the prophetic ministry to which he was predestined (cf. Jer 1:4–5). In v.2 the penetrating character of the Servant's message is likened to two sharp weapons, and the implications of the second weapon are developed to bring out a further point. Concealment in the quiver suggests an eternal purpose manifest at the appropriate time (cf. 1Pe 1:20).

Isaiah 42:18–20 presents Israel as the deaf and blind servant of the Lord, and 44:21–23 assures us that nevertheless God intends to display his glory in Israel his servant. Here (v.3) that promise is reiterated. Matthew saw Jesus as the expression of God's mind for Israel (cf. Hos 11:1; Mt 2:15); and the Gospel of John asserts that God's glory is revealed in him (Jn 1:14; 2:11). Jesus, even more than Nathanael, is "a true Israelite, in whom there is nothing false" (Jn 1:47).

The close of the ministry of Jesus saw the great crowds of Galilean days no longer thronging him, the official religious leaders plotting his death, and the disciples forsaking him in the face of danger; but God would reward him (v.4; cf. Heb 12:2).

Verse 5 makes it clear that the Servant is not Israel per se, for he has a ministry to Israel. The people may despise him, but God honors him. Honor is shown in the range of his ministry, for through it he will in fact be brought to great honor before the world's kings and princes. The initial phrase "and now" suggests the transition from the limited ministry of the Gospels to the more extensive proclamation of his gospel through the apostles in Acts. The words "it is too small a thing" suggest an estimate of his person or of his work or of perhaps both. Israel has light but needs restoration, while the Gentiles need both light and salvation. The church's mission to the Gentiles is to be viewed in the context of the mission of Jesus himself (cf. Jn 20:21) and is to the uttermost parts of the earth (e.g., Mt 28:19).

Accordingly Paul and Barnabas could apply the words of v.6 to themselves (Ac 13:46–47). The song of Simeon, however, applies this verse to Jesus (Lk 2:32). In other words, we have NT warrant for interpreting this second song both individually and collectively, with the second emerging out of the first.

Verse 7 prepares for the third and fourth songs. The unique servant's ministry was in fact rejected by the nation (cf. Ro 9–11). Great as he was, he came as a subject of God and of earthly rulers. As a result of his work, the highest of men and women would not only stand in respect and amazement but also would bow low in worship and submission.

8–12 Often in the NT it is said that the Messiah (Christ) rejected and crucified by humanity was raised and vindicated by God (e.g., Ac 2:23). The favor of God to the unique Servant is of course merited, but 2Co 6:2 shows that in Christ we share not only his service but also his acceptance (cf. Eph 1:6).

The background to "the time of my favor" is probably the Year of Jubilee in Lev 25:8–55 (cf. 61:1–2). The context here suggests that part of the Servant's work is to establish the aspects of the Abrahamic and possibly the Mosaic covenants that relate to the land of Canaan. Children and a land were major blessings of the covenant with Abraham (Ge 12:2–3); the first is mentioned in 48:19 and the second here. The Servant would be a kind of second Joshua (the Hebrew equivalent of "Jesus"). The land would be repopulated by freed captives.

The new conditions of the people are beautifully described. They are first pictured like sheep finding abundant pasture in a formerly barren land. In this land they will find food, water, and shelter. They will be guided by a compassionate shepherd (cf. Ps 23). These verses are echoed and applied to Christ in Rev 7:16–17. The pastoral imagery now disappears and is replaced by assurances of suitable road conditions and of a return from every quarter (cf. 35:8; 40:3–4; et al.).

13–21 The news of deliverance from Babylonia was to be proclaimed with joy to the ends of the earth (48:20); now the heavens and the earth are called to praise the Lord. The note of "comfort" with which ch. 40 opened returns, but now the prophet confronts the people's discouragement. Verse 14, like 40:9 (cf. 44:26–28), speaks not of Israel but of Zion. At the time of the return from the Exile, the Holy City would be in ruins, its walls reduced to rubble. The Lord assures her that he has not forgotten her. He uses two telling illustrations. Mother love is proverbial in every culture; God's love for this city and its people went well beyond this (v.15). The walls of Jerusalem would not even exist at the time of the return, but those people had been and were yet to be engraved on the hands of God (v.16).

Zion was to look up to see her restored citizens coming from every quarter (cf. Ge 13:14). God pictures Zion as proudly putting on her citizens, like a bride her jewels. The numbers coming would be so great that the city could not house them all. Zion regarded herself as a widow; but her husband, the Lord, had not forsaken or forgotten her. The children who would one day crowd to her are legitimate children, begotten through a living faith.

22–23 In v.7 the Servant was told that kings and princes would give him respect and submission. His people will also have their share, for not only will the nations rally to God's banner, tenderly bringing the exiled Israelites with them (cf. 11:10–12), but their exalted monarchs, with all the gentle care of parents, will also do obeisance before them. They will recognize the special place of Israel. God will not fail his people who trust in him (cf. 28:16).

24–26 Echoes of the Exodus constantly appear in this part of Isaiah. The question of v.24 recalls that this is exactly what God did when he delivered his people from Egypt (Ex 12:35–36). Moreover, not only did God make himself known to Israel but also to the Egyptians, and the greater redemption from oppression promised here will also lead to a wider recognition by all peoples of who God is. Verse 26a is a graphic and gruesome way of indicating the utter desperation of the enemies of Israel, overcome with hunger and thirst, in contrast to Israel's promised condition (vv.9–11).

B. Israel's Sin and the Servant's Obedience (50:1–11)

Here, as in ch. 42, the true Servant of God appears in a context speaking of rebellious Israel, named also as God's servant in 42:19. Here, as in 49:3, 6, the Servant is the perfect expression of God's mind for Israel. The imperfect servant, though not so named, appears in vv.1–3 and 11, and the perfect in vv.4–10.

1–3 The figures of divorce and debt set forth Israel's conception of the Lord's relationship to her. Exiled, she assumes that he has cast her off (cf. 40:27); but God her husband (cf. Jer 31:32) has not divorced her nor sold her to pay off his debts; for he, the Creator, has none. The cause of the Exile was simply sin on Israel's part; and if she returns to God, he will restore her.

Verse 2 rebukes Israel's unbelief. Through the prophets God called to the people but found no answering response (cf. 48:8). Their unbelief had closed the book of redemptive history to them. The end of this verse refers to the Exodus (cf. Ex 15:16; Dt 26:8; Ps 77:15). "A mere rebuke" suggests how simple an act of deliverance is for him. The argument from history is reinforced from nature, itself affected by the events associated with the Exodus. The judgment on the Nile and the clothing of the sky's brightness with darkness are fit symbols of God's power to judge Israel's enemies.

4–9 Although there is no explicit reference to the Servant here, there are many links with the other songs, as well as to 48:16. This divine title "the Sovereign LORD" also binds this third song together, occurring in four of six verses.

There is a contrast with vv.1–3. Here is response to God's word (cf. v.2; 42:18–20). The second song stressed the penetrating power of the word that the Servant transmits (49:2), while this one shows its pastoral effectiveness (cf. Isa 40:27–3; Mt 11:28–30). God's Servant waits on God in the morning watch (cf. Mk 1:35), the word he speaks comes from the God who sent him (cf. Jn 7:16–18).

Israel is rebellious, but God's Servant is responsive even when a destiny of suffering and shame is the subject of God's word to him. He does not draw back but "offers" his body to the tormentors. A combination of pain and shame introduces the Servant's conviction that this disgrace must yield place to a glorious vindication (cf. 52:13; 53:12). His face, cruelly assaulted, will not flinch before suffering (cf. Lk 9:51). Even in this, however, though the individualization reaches a high point, we are reminded of the picture of afflicted Israel in Ps 129. The Servant is the innocent sufferer par eminence.

God helps Israel (43:2, 5; 44:2) and Cyrus (45:1, 5); he will also help his unique Servant (cf. 43:1). The NT emphasizes the vindication by God through the resurrection of the despised and suffering Jesus (Ac 2:23–24; 3:15; et al.). Here in Isaiah there is no indication of the form the divine vindication takes. The setting is clearly forensic, and the trials of Jesus make this peculiarly appropriate. He too could confront his enemies with the challenge, "Can any of you prove me guilty of sin?" (Jn 8:46).

10–11 The people who obey identify themselves with the Servant's own attitude and so express their reverential fear of God. This fear is not one that makes people hide but draws them to God in faith. Verse 10b perhaps calls for repentance, for it speaks of walking in darkness and offers, by implication, light from God through the word of the Servant (cf. Jn 12:44–45). Before the advent of modern science, a source of light was also a source of heat, so the analogy of v.11 develops that which brings v.10 to its close. It reminds us of 1:29–31, teaching that the wicked will be caught in their own trap.

C. Listen! Awake! Depart! (51:1–52:12)

The climax of the servant theme and, indeed, of the Christological theme generally in this book is being prepared for in this passage. The many statements about God and the promises of what he will do, along with allusions to earlier parts of Isaiah, anticipate a great climax.

1–3 The prophet calls for maximum attention, the concentration of both the literal ear and the eye of the imagination (cf. Mk 4:3). His call is to those who fear the Lord (50:10). The people are to reflect on their origins, for this will encourage them as they await his deliverance from Babylonia. The Lord had brought this nation into being from such small beginnings, in fulfillment of his promises; and he is able still to translate his word into events.

God's promise to Abraham included both a land and a people (cf. Ge 17:1–8). The capital city of that land is now in ruins and its environs a wasteland, but God will comfort her by transforming her land and giving her a voice to praise him. Genesis has been in view in the reference to Abraham and Sarah; and it is again when the prophet alludes to the Garden of Eden.

4–6 The repeated use of "my" presents a vivid impression of the personal activity of God on behalf of his people. The Lord will manifest his own righteousness to those who pursue it. The first Servant Song shows that the Servant is the mediator of this divine justice (42:1). Here we see that the law, justice, righteousness, and salvation are all to be widely disseminated throughout the nations. This combination suggests that there is going to be a thorough reordering of human life on the basis of God's own character, revealed in his law, expressed in his righteousness, and taking the form of salvation. Salvation and righteousness are closely parallel ideas here, providing a background for the Pauline doctrine of salvation as righteousness (e.g., Ro 1:16–17).

The prophet calls on Israel to consider the universe. The heavens and the earth that seem to be so stable are in fact less enduring than the salvation God has promised (cf. Mk 13:31).

7–8 Isaiah draws a close link between righteousness and the law of God, for the law publishes God's right way for the human race. The heart is where God's law should be (cf. Dt 30:14), and the new covenant pledges that it will be written there (Jer 31:31–34). The prophet assumes that the righteous in the land will experience antagonism from the wicked. Like the visible universe, the wicked will perish. The only abiding realities in God's new order are his own righteousness and salvation.

9–11 Characteristically, prophets stand facing the people, addressing them for God. They must often have prayed, however, for those to whom they were sent (cf. 1Sa 7:8; Am 7:1–6). Here Isaiah prays wonderfully, with great urgency expressed in the threefold cry, "Awake!" The prophet, who had been the inspired channel of the wonderful promises God had given to his people, now cries to God for their fulfillment. A new revelation of the power of his arm had been promised (cf. v.5). This had already been manifested in the destruction of Egypt's power, for Rahab and the monster are symbols of that land (see comment on 30:7). Here is praying indeed, in which God's great deeds in the past are made the basis of prayerful confidence in his power to act again for his people. Once before the people had entered the Land of Promise with joy, and so they would again.

12–16 God begins to answer his people's cry. He rebukes them for their lack of faith. As he had been telling them since ch. 40, he is going to make himself known to them as their Divine Comforter. The repeated "I" heightens the contrast between "the LORD [their] Maker" and the "mortal men" of whom they were afraid (cf. 40:6–8). Presumably the oppressors mentioned here are the Babylonians, though there is of course an important general principle here as well.

The "cowering prisoners" are either the people as a whole or a group of hostages imprisoned as surety of the good behavior of the remainder. If the Exile did become more severe toward its close, v.14 may reflect the fears of the people that death or extreme starvation would overcome them before their release.

Verse 16 is apparently an allusion to the Servant of the Lord, another indication that he is to be found outside the Servant Songs (cf. 48:16). The verse closes with references to God's creative work, in which he established the cosmos, and that special work he had pledged himself to on Zion's behalf.

17–20 The repeated "awake" of v.17 must surely be the divine call to Jerusalem that answers the call of the prophet to God (cf. v.9). The illustration of a cup, containing the awful wrath of God and so potent in its effects that those who drink it would be totally overcome by it, is a bold one (cf. Mk 10:38). Such a drunk person is, of course, unable to walk steadily without a guide; Jerusalem's sons, sharing her drunkenness, lie prostrate in the streets. The "double calamities" remind us of 40:2. The figure of inebriation gives way first to the general ("ruin and destruction") and then to the specific ("famine and sword," which probably represents the two calamities intended). God thus metes out his judgment through nature and people.

21–23 The question asked in v.19—"Who can comfort you?"—is answered here. The cup of God's wrath, justly placed by him in Israel's hand, is to be removed in mercy and transferred to her oppressors. The barbaric practice referred to in v.23 is well documented in the ancient Near East, especially in Assyrian inscriptions.

52:1–2 The cry "Awake, awake!" addressed first to God (51:9) and then to Jerusalem (51:17), comes again as a clarion call to that city. Babylon is to be debased and Jerusalem exalted. The strength that Jerusalem is to put on is the power of her God. Her garments typify armored might and perhaps priestly beauty, fitting in view of her new God-given holiness, having now a reality formerly lacking (cf. 48:2). The exclusion of the uncircumcised and the defiled should not be read as the product of a harsh nationalism but as a reminder that the alien had so often entered Jerusalem either to conquer or to pollute its worship or both (cf. Ps 79:1). Verse 2 especially reminds us of ch. 47; instead of Babylon, Zion is now to be enthroned in queenly splendor, a gloriously free city.

3–6 Verse 3 preserves in brief compass three important truths. Jerusalem was, in fact, handed over to Babylonia by God himself—as a punishment, of course. Yet those who were given to her paid nothing and so were owed nothing. Thus God would act again, but this time in redemption. So the word "redeemed," normally implying cost, does not have this connotation here.

Verse 4 traces a history of oppression and a sequence of oppressors, with v.5 showing that Babylonia is now to be added to Egypt and Assyria. The divine soliloquy in v.5 dramatically presents the question of the appropriate divine action in this new situation faced by his people. All three tyrant nations scoffed at the God of Israel with constant blasphemy. The expression "in that day" (v.6) points to a period in which God will act decisively for his people in vindication of his name. The prediction would be called to mind when it was fulfilled, thus establishing the true and exclusive deity of the God of Israel (cf. 45:21).

7–10 This exultant passage contains echoes of 40:1–11. Here the prophet brings together a number of important themes, virtually identifying peace, salvation, and the kingdom of God, reminding us that Christ's work secures these and every other blessing for God's people. How fitting this is just prior to the fourth Servant Song (52:13–53:12), in which the sufferings of God's Servant are described and their significance expounded!

Verse 9 reminds us that Zion is the ruined city of the future. Faith can claim the promises with joyous songs, rejoicing in God's comfort and redemption. The reference to God's "holy arm" takes us back to 51:9, and it is part of God's answer to his prophet's prayer. This powerful act of salvation will be as public as the deliverance from Egypt.

11–12 Urgent as the call to "depart" is, the departure from Babylonia will not be a pressured flight, unlike that from Egypt (Ex 12:33, 39). Interestingly, Babylonia is described, not as "here," but as "there," indicating that the prophet is in Judah and not Babylonia.

Ceremonial purity is important, especially for the priests who transported the holy temple-vessels (cf. 2Ki 25:14–15; Ezr 1:5–11). It is clear that the purpose of God includes the rebuilding of the temple. The most comforting word comes at the end, for God promises that he will protect this holy procession from both the front and the rear (cf. Ex 13:21–22; 14:19–20).

D. The Man of Sorrows and His Vindication (52:13–53:12)

The interpreter who has meditated on the third Servant Song in 50:4–9 and then moves on to this fourth song feels somewhat as the high priest must have felt when he moved from the Holy Place into the Most Holy Place on the Day of Atonement. This "song" is to be seen in its full glory, not only in the light of the NT interpretation of it, but also in terms of the context in which it comes to us. We have already commented (see 51:1–52:12) that this earlier passage anticipates a great climax. It should also be noted that the important phrase "the arm of the LORD" in 53:1 is anticipated in 51:9 and 52:10.

A great deal has been written on the interpretation of the songs in general and the fourth song in particular. Whatever may be said about the earlier songs, we take this one to be understood exclusively in individual terms, fulfilled in Jesus. It is readily granted that the principles of obedience to God's will whatever the cost, in which the cross is taken up by the disciple of Jesus, apply to individual Christians and to the church as a whole. The atoning significance of the sufferings of the Servant, outlined in this passage, is, however, peculiar to Jesus the unique Servant.

13–15 Once again, as in 42:1, God draws attention to his Servant. The Servant's wisdom was deeply self-denying, for it meant accepting ends determined by God and willingly shouldering a burden of untold suffering to make them possible. Here God's wisdom and human wisdom decisively part company. The threefold assertion of the Servant's exaltation is most emphatic, whether or not we spell it out in terms of resurrection, ascension and session, or second advent. The predicted exaltation is most reassuring as we approach predictions of shame and suffering.

The observers of the Servant have a double experience of astonishment, the first mingled with horror and the second, at least for those responding in faith, with joy. The theme of suffering and subsequent glory is here presented from the standpoint of the impression made on the onlookers. The strong word translated "appalled" (GK 9037) finds its justification in the words that follow, for the sight disclosed is of such exquisite suffering that the Servant's bodily appearance seems hardly human. We need not assume from this that the experience being described is purely physical, for deep inner experiences of anguish demonstrate their presence by their effects on the face and form of the sufferer.

The word "sprinkle" (GK 5684) has priestly-sacrificial overtones, preparing us for further sacrificial language later in the passage. In common with everything else in these three verses, "sprinkle" relates to the consequences of the Servant's sufferings rather than to the sufferings themselves. It also relates his sacrificial work to the world in general, not simply to Israel. His exaltation gives him complete supremacy over all; and kings will fall silent in his presence, overawed and eager to see and hear rather than to speak themselves in the presence of such an unprecedented revelation. Notice the striking reversal here of the discouraging words of Isaiah's commission (6:9–10).

53:1–3 The intimate link between v.1 and the closing verse of ch. 52 can hardly be missed and poses a difficulty for those who divorce the end of ch. 52 from this chapter. The two astonishing events of 52:14–15—the suffering of God's own wise Servant who deserved none of it and the subsequent elevation of one so dishonored by people—produces incredulity in many who hear the report of these things. God's way of doing things often does not seem to make sense to human beings (cf. 55:8–9; 1Co 1:18–31). The Cross is, however, where God's power resides, and here is the ultimate answer to the prophet's prayer of 51:9, anticipated by its foreshadowing in the new Exodus of 52:10.

Are the speakers in v.1 Gentiles or Israelites (the latter possibly speaking through the prophet as their representative)? The Servant's work was to have wide-ranging application (cf. 42:6; 49:6). In the context it would seem natural that the nations and kings (52:15), at first struck dumb by the astounding revelation, should then speak in response to it. The "arm of the LORD" is the disclosure of his power. So this revelation answers the prophet's representative prayer in 51:9.

Verse 2 echoes and contrasts with 4:2. The whole verse suggests that the Servant would be confronted with adverse conditions from his youth. In fact, Jesus could not be explained in terms of his human environment, which in his day was dominated by a legalistic Judaism almost devoid of the refreshing moisture of God's word truly understood and applied. Verse 2b implies that his true intrinsic beauty was hidden from people because they looked at him entirely from a human standpoint. The principle that human appearance is irrelevant to God's choice is more radically applied here than in the choice of David (cf. 1Sa 16:5–13). It is possible, however, that these words apply to the Servant's appearance produced by his sufferings (cf. 52:14).

In v.3 the onlookers move from failure to desire the Servant to despising and rejecting him, refusing even to look at him. The words translated "sorrows" and "suffering" really mean "pains" and "sickness." These might suggest either a sick person or one sick at heart (Jer 15:18). Another possibility, as Derek Kidner points out, is that of the physician's voluntary involvement; for he is also a man of pain and sickness in the sense that he gives himself to these things and their relief (cf. Mt 8:17).

There is another possibility. The concept of punishment finds many analogies in Isaiah's prophecies, from the whipping of the body politic in 1:5–6 to the inebriated helplessness of 51:17–20. In this case the punitive nature of the Servant's sufferings is indicated before the vicarious nature of them is made clear in v.4.

4–6 This central stanza of the fourth Servant song has a number of general characteristics. The first is the frequency of the first person plural. Who are the speakers here? Probably the amazed onlookers of the first stanza, who appear from 52:15 to be predominantly Gentiles. Then there is the frequency of words suggesting pain and punishment. The passage also emphasizes the sins of the onlookers, with one of the most vivid analogies given in v.6. Here is a picture of the willful and yet purposeless waywardness of sin, with a suggestion that this is an offense against love as well as holiness, for the divine Shepherd is a tender, loving image in the Bible (cf. 40:11).

The costly atonement provides the dominant theme of this stanza. Verse 4a views our punishment figuratively in terms of the visitation of disease, while v.4b shows the onlookers coming to the grievously wrong conclusion that the Servant was suffering for his own sins at the hand of God. Verse 5 shows that they have now accepted for themselves the objective fact declared in v.4a. Piercing and crushing are both appropriate terms for the Crucifixion, the first literal and the second figurative; and both are aptly summed up as "wounds" later in the verse. Peace and healing view sin in terms of the estrangement from God and the marring of sinners themselves that it causes. Verse 6 may well derive its language from the Day of Atonement ritual (cf. Lev 16:21–22); for as God was the Author of the ritual (cf. Lev 17:11), the high priest was simply his agent for transferring the sins of the people symbolically to the scapegoat.

Finally, we should note the element of conversion in vv.4–5. The onlookers put aside their premature judgment on the matter and accept that the sufferings of the Servant are not only penal but also substitutionary.

7–9 The term "oppressed" (GK 5601) was appropriate in relation to the trials and death of Jesus; for all those who tried him had a measure of human authority and misused it when they condemned him, or, washing their hands of him, allowed others to take him to the place of death. In it all, he was quiet and uncomplaining (cf. 1Pe 2:23), which suggests not only comparison but also contrast with Jeremiah (cf. Jer 11:18–20; 12:1–3).

The phrase "by oppression and judgment" is two nouns presenting concomitant aspects of the same fact. The judgment was in fact employed as an instrument of oppression. It seemed as though the Servant must die without descendants, which was regarded as a great misfortune in that society. The phrase "cut off" (GK 1615) strongly suggests not only a violent, premature death but also the just judgment of God (cf. Ge 9:11; Ex 12:15).

Verse 9 presents an enigma, forming a striking prediction fulfilled in due time and a transition to the final stanza, which describes the Servant's vindication. This enigma consists in the apparent juxtaposition of "the wicked" and "the rich," the former more appropriate to his rejection and the latter to his ultimate vindication. We are forced to conclude that the parallelism in this verse is not synonymous but antithetical, the first line indicating the human intention in his death and the second the divinely ordained intervention and transference. This in fact was strikingly fulfilled in the burial of Jesus (Mt 27:57–60). The Servant's gentle ingenuousness is asserted at the close of the stanza.

10–12 Verse 10a is almost shocking in its apparent presentation of arbitrary disregard for personal righteousness, until we recall the substitutionary nature of those sufferings (already declared in vv.4–6 and to be referred to again in v.12b). God is therefore not seen as harsh but as astonishingly gracious.

Verses 10b–11 remind us of 52:14–15; for after suffering comes vindication, suggesting the completion of the Servant's atoning work in his death and the opening of a new life beyond that death. The "guilt offering" may have special overtones of completeness, for it involved restitution as well as an offering to God. Nothing then remained to be done; the work was complete.

Verse 11a, with its contrast of "suffering" and "light," points to the Resurrection, which is still more clearly suggested by the earlier words "prolong his days" (v.10). In fact, the words "he will see his offspring and prolong his days" seem to stand in intended contrast with the second and third lines of v.8. There is a parallel here with Ps 22, where a sufferer now vindicated declares, "Posterity will serve him" (Ps 22:30). In this context the Servant appears, not as a teacher, but as a savior.

Not "by his knowledge" does he justify us, but by bearing our iniquities. That is, we are saved by redemptive suffering, not simply by revelation. In this case, then, it is the experimental knowledge of faith that is in view; and we have here an important background for Paul's doctrine of justification through Christ's blood, appropriated by faith.

Christ's righteousness and therefore his innocence of sin furnished a basis for his substitution. The final clause of v.11 states the objective grounds of this justification, which is a new position before God, the righteous Judge, on the basis of what the Servant has achieved in his sufferings, not of what we have ourselves done or will do.

The opening statement of v.12 shows God honoring the Servant for his faithful work and the Servant in turn distributing the spoils of battle to others. In fact, it introduces a new note into the passage, for nowhere else is there military language. Christ's work is presented as a victory over spiritual foes, resulting in a distribution of spoils to those made strong in him (cf. Eph 4:8; 6:10–17). Some argue that the words "made himself nothing" in Php 2:7 translate a Semitic phrase meaning "he poured himself out" and are based on this verse. Both passages contain the ultimate in self-abnegation in dedication to the will of God.

The last three clauses of v.12 sum up the matter. The Servant was numbered with the transgressors, not only in the outward circumstances of his death (cf. NIV note on Mk 15:27), but as a general description of the meaning of his sufferings (Lk 22:37). Innocent, he was charged with human sins and so bore their penalty. Beyond this, he has an intercessory ministry, based on the finality of his sufferings. This means that even when vindicated by God, he is still concerned to minister to his people.

In 44:28 the name "Cyrus" is solemnly and dramatically revealed long before his coming. Our present passage speaks so eloquently of the work of Christ that even the inclusion of his name could add but little more to the extent of its disclosure of him.

E. God's Glorious Future for Jerusalem (54:1–17)

The change of mood between Isa 53 and 54 is abrupt. The Servant's task is seen to be fulfilled. But the incredible triumph of Isa 53:10–12 issues into the hymn of praise in 54:1–10, welcoming the dawn of the New Age.

1–3 The only appropriate response to a great work of God is joyous praise, which is exactly what we find here (cf. 12:5; 26:1; 35:10; 42:10–11; 61:10–11). In the OT culture childlessness was a deeply shameful state. The prophet has already indicated in 50:1–3 that there has been no divorce between God and his people. After the temporary separation of the Exile, Israel would bear more children than in earlier days.

A figure is taken from nomadic life, suggesting that the promises to Abraham and his family (Ge 12:1–3; 28:13–14) are in the prophet's mind. The family tent must be enlarged and thus will need to be strengthened. The probable allusion to Ge 28 finds confirmation when we find that the verb translated "spread out" (GK 7287) is used there also. The phrase "dispossess the nations" occurs elsewhere in the OT only in Deuteronomy and always in reference to the conquest of Canaan by Israel. This suggests that the primary reference is to the gradual expansion of the little postexilic community in Judea; however, it is possible to interpret it more broadly.

4–8 The figure of the restored wife continues to dominate the passage. People often fear disgrace more than physical danger. The shame of their youth is either Egyptian bondage (cf. Hos 11:1) or, less likely, affliction under the Assyrians; the widowhood is the Exile. In v.5 the prophet encourages them to think of the one who is the husband of his people. No less than six titles and descriptions are brought together here, all building up a picture of a God of immense power and overflowing grace. He is both able and willing to restore them to himself and to their land.

Illustrations have their limitations. God is no more to be thought of as a deserting husband than as an unjust judge (Lk 18:1–8), though both figures teach spiritual lessons. The repeated phrase "for a (brief) moment" contemplates the Exile—which must have seemed so long to the people themselves—as a mere episode in contrast to God's everlasting kindness.

9–10 Illustrating his theme from both history and nature, Isaiah compares God's oath to the great postdiluvial promise of Ge 8:22, which itself related to the natural environment of the human race and so suggested the reference to the mountains. Even the visible universe, dominated for the Jews by the hills of their native land, would prove less enduring than God's love, guaranteed by his word (cf. Mk 13:31). A relationship between persons is given added strength by its formalizing in covenant terms. The beautiful Hebrew word hesed (GK 2876) is here translated as "unfailing love."

11–15 The expression "covenant of peace" (cf. Eze 34:25–31) in v.10 is expounded here (see esp. v.13). God's covenant with his people implies that he will protect them, as a husband does his wife. In fact, the marriage analogy is still present; and, as Eaton suggests, the adornment of Zion with jewels may relate to her preparation as a royal bride of the Lord. Certainly Rev 21:10–27 presents the New Jerusalem in the context of v.2.

This covenant of peace may not be identified with the new covenant of Jer 31:31–34, but it has important links with it; for in it the people will know God through his personal instruction. Thus v.13 can be quoted and applied to Christ and his disciples (cf. Jn 6:45). The city that has for so long known iniquity and judgment through enemies whom God visited on her will then be true to its name Jerusalem, a place of peace, resulting from its new righteousness. There is no reference to the Messiah, but the juxtaposition of righteousness and peace reminds us of 9:7; 11:1–9. All this will be under God's new regime. Yet perfect and effectively protected as the city is, there will still be evil intent on its destruction, suggesting the Satan-inspired antagonism faced by the church.

16–17 In v.15 God promised that he would not send attackers against his people; here he declares that destructive nations are created by him. They are in his power and so are restrained under his sovereign hand. Not only physical assault but moral accusation will be repulsed, for Israel's righteousness (v.14) is from him. The people then enter their heritage (Dt 4:21). "Servant" (GK 6269) in the singular occurs twenty times from chs. 41–53; but in chs. 54–66, since the supreme Servant and his unique act of divine service have been revealed, and he has made the singular use of the word forever his own, it never occurs again in the singular in this book.

F. The Generosity, Urgency, and Effectiveness of God's Word of Grace (55:1–13)

1–5 The voice may be that of the Near Eastern water vendor or the accents of personified wisdom (Pr 9:1–6). Either would be appropriate, for Isaiah was a master of illustrations from nature and culture. We may in fact discern overtones of both. The water carrier is also a wise counselor.

The water vendor is part of the normal commercial scene in the Near East; but God through the prophet offers the people in Babylon not only water but more costly drinks and invites them to a banquet (Lk 14:15–24). Verse 2 probably alludes to the people's preoccupation with settling down in Babylon. As Thexton puts it, "The prophet does not plead or argue but throws into the quiet pool of their complacency a disturbing pebble as he asks: 'Does all this really satisfy you? Is this what you are for?'" He speaks with urgency, "Listen, listen."

This passage, which constitutes an important link with the promises of a Davidic Messiah given earlier, is quoted by Paul in Ac 13:34 with reference to the resurrection of Christ, through whose risen kingship the promises of this passage receive their eternal and therefore their final fulfillment.

During the reign of David, Israel's kingdom reached its greatest extent. David, as a faithful worshiper of the Lord, was therefore a witness to God's truth to all the peoples in his empire, as well as being their leader. He anticipated in himself the prophetic and kingly functions of the Messiah. In God's future for his people here depicted, the empire will be wider still. The far parts of the earth will come up to Zion (cf. 2:1–5; 60:1–14), because she will attract them by the beauty her God has given her (cf. 54:11–12).

6–7 The call of vv.1–3 is echoed here but with a stronger moral emphasis. Earlier the folly of self-willed waywardness was stressed, while here it is its wickedness. Verse 6 implies both a promise and a warning. There is urgency in this call, for the time is not unlimited. Both in lifestyle and in the attitudes that lie behind it, the sinner is wrong; and so repentance must touch the inner person as well as the outward deeds. The call here is not simply uttered to the people as such but to the individual. The promise of God's pardon is assured.

8–13 God's thoughts and ways are governed by righteousness—his righteousness—and his effective word therefore accomplishes a moral purpose, the reclamation of sinners from the error and wickedness of their ways. Verse 10 shows an awareness of the ceaseless round of nature but also of the purpose of it, which was hidden, at least for a time, from the Preacher (Ecc 1:5–7). The whole food-producing process is encapsulated within v.10, only the actual sowing of the seed being excluded (Mk 4:1–20; Heb 6:7–8). The passage teaches the efficacious nature of God's word and of the grace that works through it.

With God's conditions of repentance having been fulfilled and the people's return to the Lord having made possible a return to the land, the prophet can speak of their joyous and peaceful journey. He moves from the literal joy and peace to the metaphorical mountains and hills and then back again to the literal, for v.13 probably refers to the regeneration of the land (though this in turn may symbolize spiritual fruitfulness). All this will serve to bring glory to God.

G. Salvation Extended to the Disadvantaged (56:1–8)

Clearly there is a change in geographical perspective here. The people addressed in chs. 40–55 are being encouraged to return from the Babylonian captivity, whereas in chs. 56–66 they are in the land of Canaan. That land was a place of corruption (56:9–59:15a) and devastation (63:7–64:12), so that neither the moral standards of God nor the great hopes of the people found true realization in it. Everything cried out for something more; and, of course, it was never intended that the great promises given earlier in the book should find perfect fulfillment in the postexilic community but in an altogether new order. They are therefore confronted with their own failures and stimulated afresh both to turn to God and to hope in him.

1–2 Earlier (46:13) God chastised his people for their unbelief and failure to accept his word promising them an imminent salvation. Here, however, their general lifestyle and their failure to keep his law (cf. v.1 with 51:4), symbolized by the Sabbath, are under attack. But righteousness by works is not being taught here. The ideal here presented is negative only if the Sabbath itself is viewed in terms simply of the prohibition of work and not positively, in terms of opportunities of worship and of spiritual, mental, and physical renewal. The negative that brings v.2 to its close is balanced by the positive exhortations in v.1: "Maintain justice and do what is right." So, from now on, whether one trusts in the Lord or not is a matter for the individual to decide, and the most conspicuous sign of decision is observance of the Sabbath.

3–8 The worship system of Israel was centered in the temple and emphasized the particularism of the Jewish faith. Inevitably some who lived in the land would feel excluded, for passages like Dt 23:1–8 banned eunuchs and some foreigners from participation in the worship system. The prophet has a word of comfort for them, showing that the blessing pronounced in v.2 did not contain built-in racial or physical limitations.

Verse 3 speaks of the proselyte and the eunuch. The prophet engages with the sense of insecurity that must often have plagued proselytes. If even native-born Israelites could still have guilty consciences despite the offering of sacrifices (cf. Heb 9:9), how much more the "incomer"! The eunuch would have felt even more insecure, for his very place in the ongoing life of God's people was simply an episode. The family had great importance in Israel. A dry tree bears no fruit; a eunuch begets no children.

For each group God has an authoritative word of consolation through the prophet. This word is eschatological and so belongs to the new order of the future. Faithfulness to the Lord—expressed in keeping the Sabbath law—will give the eunuch a secure place in God's temple. (It should be noted that the Sabbath is treated in Ex 31:12–17 as a sign of the covenant, as here.) We can hardly imagine that the prophet is speaking literally when he refers to a memorial in the temple. There may even be a suggestion of eternal life in the closing affirmation of v.5. The six marks of the foreigner (v.6) provide a beautiful description of true godliness, with love as its great dynamic, the very antithesis of Pharisaic legalism.

In one of Isaiah's greatest visions (2:1–4), the people of the nations come up to Jerusalem to worship in the house of the Lord. There their eagerness is highlighted, while here it is the divine initiative. The very one whose purpose involves gathering his own scattered people will include the foreigners too in the great pilgrimage to Jerusalem. The Court of the Gentiles was a kind of symbol and foreshadowing of this, and it is from this that Christ expelled the traders, using the words of v.7 (see Mk 11:17; cf. Jn 2:16). These Gentiles would not come simply on sufferance or as mere observers but as full participants, offering sacrifices alongside the Jews.

H. God's Message to the Wicked (56:9–57:21)

9–12 The people are viewed, implicitly, as the flock of God. The prophet, as God's mouthpiece, likens the enemies of Israel to wild beasts lurking in field and forest and ironically calls them to feast on the sheep. The watchmen—who almost certainly include false prophets (cf. Jer 6:17; Eze 3:17; 33:2–7) and perhaps other leaders of the people—belong properly to a different picture, that of a city in danger; but they are soon translated into the dominant scene as dogs, set to watch the sheep. Blindness, muteness, indolence, and self-seeking greed describe different aspects of their culpable ineffectiveness. When the analogy moves from the dogs to the shepherds, the same characteristics can be seen. Verse 12 graphically represents the drunkard's careless abandon (cf. 22:13) and inebriated optimism.

57:1–2 Verse 1 has an unexpected twist to its thought at the end, suggesting the rewarding of the righteous after death and leading into v.2. A man lying dead may seem to a distant observer to be resting. He is, indeed, if he is righteous.

3–10 The words of v.3 and v.4b are intentionally insulting, not to the parents, but to the children. This was a conventional way of indicating undesirable qualities. Sorcery (cf. 2:6) and adultery in combination point to pagan fertility rites. Those who practiced them apparently did so blatantly and with a mocking gesture against the true prophet of God sent to chastise them in his name.

The pagan rites of Canaan, featuring sacred trees (cf. 1:29–30), pandered to the sexual appetites of the worshipers. During the reign of Ahaz (cf. 2Ki 16:3–4) and of Manasseh (2Ki 21:2–9), Isaiah must have been deeply grieved by the pagan child-sacrifices practiced in the land. The references to ravines, crags, and stones are obscure but no doubt reflect aspects of paganism.

At v.6 the people are pictured collectively as adulterers or prostitutes. The place where adultery was committed was "a high and lofty hill" (cf. Jer 2:20), referring to the pagan high places. The analogy could refer either to the temple or to domestic houses, but there may be an implied comparison with the prostitute's sign of her trade. The sensitive Israelite reader would also remember that it was the word of God—and, most aptly, the assertion that there is only one God—that was to be inscribed on the doors (cf. Dt 6:4–9).

Molech (v.9), god of the Ammonites, is associated with child-sacrifice (Lev 18:21; 2Ki 23:10) in the OT. The olive oil and perfumes either are offerings or they belong to the picture of the prostitute. The apostate people did not pursue their paganism as a kind of leisure activity but went to great lengths. They had courted the gods of nations far away and indulged too in necromancy. Weariness had not however induced them to give up. Verse 10 might represent an ironic comparison with 40:27–31 and perhaps suggest that there was a wicked, supernatural source from which this strength was derived.

11–13 The section closes with a message of comfort for those who had faith. The people had forgotten who God was (cf. v.15), for otherwise how could they fear the petty deities of the pagans more than their great and holy God? The references to righteousness and works are ironic. Verse 13 reminds us of the prophet's onslaught on idolatry in chs. 40–48 (cf. also 40:6–8, 24).

14–21 The urgent imperatives of v.14 echo 40:3, the second allusion to that chapter in this passage (see above). The great call for repentance in 55:6–7 finds expression in this picture of spiritual road-building requiring the removal of obstacles.

The wearied but unrepentant sinner somehow finds renewal of his strength to continue in sin (v.10); but here the "contrite and lowly" (lit., "those crushed [GK 1918] and bowed down [GK 9166]") are revived in the presence of the exalted, living, and holy God. The urgent call to bustling activity in v.11 contrasts strikingly with the eternal calm of v.15. The Lord is pictured as active in reviving the spirits of his dispirited people.

Verses 16–18 seem to allude to ch. 40 (cf. 40:1–2, 27; cf. also Ge 6:3). These verses reveal the righteous anger and the amazing grace of God and also the awful persistence of human rebellion against him. The unmerited nature of God's favor has rarely been expressed more beautifully than in v.18. The passage does not suggest that there is to be grace for the determinedly impenitent, for the "mourners" (GK 63) are probably identical with the dispirited of v.16, properly chastened and restored to God, but hardly daring to hope for comfort from him (cf. Mt 5:4). Once more the prophet employs a reiterated word—"Peace, peace"—to make a point. Possibly he uses the familiar conventional word of greeting (shalom) to emphasize that there is a welcome home for the wayward. The "far and near" here may simply be home-dwelling and dispersed Israelites respectively (cf. 11:11–12; 43:5–7; 56:8), or it may include also the foreigners (cf. Eph 2:17).

This passage ends with the same warning to the recalcitrant as the prophet gave in 48:22, but with the addition of a telling illustration. In a book so well structured as this, it may mark the end of a particular section of prophecies.

IX. God as Judge and Savior (58:1–66:24)

These chapters, while confronting realistically the fact of human sin, present God's final purposes of both judgment and salvation and thus make us aware of both his justice and his grace.

A. The True Fast (58:1–14)

Although this oracle may have been intended especially for the postexilic community, there are a number of features that remind us of the eighth-century prophets. There is the emphasis on social righteousness and also particular phrases (cf. v.1 with Hos

8:1; Mic 3:8). An eighth-or early seventh-century provenance is therefore perfectly feasible. Its teaching also has links with the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5–7).

1–3a The prophet has already exposed the empty ritualism of the people in ch. 1. Here he concentrates on one religious activity—fasting. A trumpet call is intended to rouse the hearers to action, but it must be clear and unambiguous (cf. 1Co 14:8). There is no mistaking the message here. The people showed outward evidence of wanting to do God's will, probably by consulting priests and prophets. They were prepared too to show their earnestness by enduring the minor inconvenience of fasting. A little abstinence did not matter if they could retain their basic lifestyle of disobedient rebellion against the moral demands of their God. Such empty externalism reappears in every age and culture.

3b–5 Through his prophet God exposes the people's hypocrisy (v.3b); their fasting was not spiritually motivated. Apparently they made the fast easier by idleness and made up for lost time by getting their laborers to work all the harder. Fasting undertaken as a duty can produce an edgy, irritable community, especially in difficult climatic conditions. Prayers offered with this kind of background would never reach the heavens (v.4b). The humbling seems to be a synonym for fasting. Sackcloth and ashes also suggest the extravagant expression of humiliation.

6–9a The questions of vv.6–7 point up the people's separation of religious observance and social righteousness. There were oppression (cf. Jer 34:8–22) and poverty in the land. The prophet even has to appeal to the claims of blood relationship, for their insular selfishness was leading some to neglect relatives.

The first two clauses of v.8 emphasize speed. Elsewhere Isaiah uses the verb "break forth" (GK 1324) of the hatching of eggs (59:5) and of water gushing forth (35:6). The word suggests suddenness and swiftness. God also pledges restoration of health, protection, and access to himself in prayer. "Light" perhaps encapsulates all this, for in these chapters it suggests fullness of divine blessing (cf. 59:9; 60:1).

9b–12 Isaiah develops the same basic theme again but with some variations. Oppression is emphasized by repetition, and there is also a reference to character assassination. Verse 10 suggests that social concern is not just to be seen in an isolated episode but should be a way of life for God's people. We must spend not just our money but ourselves. The promise of v.8 is taken still further. The glorious dawn will issue in an even more glorious midday. In this light a full life can flourish under God's blessing. An intended postexilic readership seems in view in v.12.

13–14 The Sabbath here may represent the entire Mosaic covenant and the blessings to be enjoyed in following it (see 56:3–8). As Kidner says, "These verses describe the strictness and the gladness of the sabbath-keeping God desires. If fasting is to be an opportunity to show love to our neighbour, the sabbath should express first of all our love of God. . . . It will mean self-forgetfulness and the self-discipline of rising above the trivial. But to people of this spirit God can safely give great things."

B. Sin, Sorrow, and Salvation (59:1–21)

The prophet who could speak words of great comfort and encouragement could also confront his hearers with their sins and make them face unpleasant spiritual and moral facts. In ch. 57 he condemned adulterous paganism, in ch. 58 hypocritical fasting, and in the present chapter, injustice. Each of these chapters speaks about prayer. In ch. 57 it was not answered because it was not addressed to the true God (57:13); in ch. 58 because the petitioners are hypocrites (58:4); while here it is because of their sins and particularly their injustice.

1–8 The vivid anthropomorphisms of vv.1–2 remind us of ch. 40. Here, however, they stress condemnation rather than comfort. God is addressing people who have anticipated some kind of divine intervention and have prayed for it, but whose lifestyle reveals all too clearly that their desires and prayers are not directed toward the establishment of God's rule on earth; for they are themselves rebels against that rule.

The people are guilty particularly of social injustice. In words reminiscent of 1:15, the prophet moves from the worst effects of legal oppression (unjust condemnation to death) to the false witness that produced such a verdict, and ultimately to the state of deep social and moral apathy that was causing such a situation. He then employs two figures taken from the basic human needs of food and clothing. The metaphors suggest that what these evil people produce seems at first wholesome, only to be revealed for what it really is later. In fact, the illustration of the cobweb that is useless for clothing implies that evil is ultimately counterproductive, not only for its victims, but for its perpetrators.

The prophet is not condemning any particular class among the people, though perhaps he has chiefly in mind those in whose hands the administration of justice is placed (cf. 5:22–23). Because his words are not only strong but general, Paul was able to quote them in his general indictment of human sin in Ro 3:15–17. The image of the moral life as a walk dominates vv.7–8. "The way of peace" finds its definition at the end of v.8, making it clear that the prophet is speaking about the results of their conduct for themselves (cf. 57:20–21), not for others.

9–11 The people, accused and condemned in the earlier verses, now begin to face their own sins, or, at least, the consequences of them. The justice and righteousness referred to in v.9 belong to God, to be manifested on behalf of his people. The "darkness" mentioned here is caused by disobedience to God (see Dt 28:15, 29).

12–15a A much deeper note is now sounded. Hatred of the consequences of sin and its destructive effects on one's own life is not necessarily evidence of true repentance. Only when we face sin as rebellion against a holy God who loves us do we begin to see it as he sees it. The prophet seems to be identifying with the people, expressing what he knew should be their own penitence. He confesses on their behalf that all was being done against the Lord. Social justice is excluded from their society, along with truth—again probably truth of witness (cf. vv.3–4). The situation is so serious that the good person was at risk.

15b–18 Paul's quotation of vv.7–8 in Ro 3:15–17 is in a context that presents sin against the background of the wrath of God (Ro 3:18–20). Here that wrath manifests itself. The intervention probably applies to those who are willing to take the part of the oppressed. The salvation reference made here is God's saving activity on behalf of those unjustly treated (cf. 49:24–26). God goes to war against sin, and this passage becomes a model for Paul's description of the Christian armor employed by God's people in their struggle against the devil, master of the realm of sin (Eph 6:10–17). In the final line of v.18, it becomes clear that God will do battle against evil in Gentile lands as well as in Israel.

19–21 The chapter that began with a picture of a nation utterly depraved by its sin moves now to a glorious climax in the grace of God. Verse 19 means that God's acts of judgment will cause people over all the world to reverence him, while the second part of the verse presents a further statement of the overflowing wrath of God against his foes. As he comes in judgment to the world, the Lord will come in quite a different character to Zion—but only when she repents. The NT shows that God has given two covenant gifts to his church—the Word made flesh in Christ and the Holy Spirit (cf. Gal 4:4–7). These two gifts are here pledged—at least in anticipatory forms—as eternal gifts. The words "in your mouth" may be personal reading, or it may be that the word given and appropriated is now to be proclaimed.

C. The Future Glory of Zion (60:1–22)

In 2:1–5 Jerusalem was distinguished by its elevation; it was the center from which the divine message would go out to all the world. In 42:6; 49:6–7, the servant of the Lord had a ministry to the nations, who in 52:14–15 were astonished by both his sufferings and his subsequent exaltation. Now the prophet depicts the future glory of Zion, a glory that is but the reflection of the glory of the Lord God himself.

1–3 In 52:1–2 God called Zion to awake and to sit on her throne. This passage calls her to shine with the divine glory. Impenetrable darkness covers the whole earth, and it once enveloped Israel when she was not walking in the light with her God (cf. 8:19–22; 59:9–10). The wonderful spotlight now shining on Zion's hill is really the divine glory that is situated above Jerusalem, whereas in the desert journeys it preceded and followed God's people (see Ex 14:19–20; Isa 52:12; 58:8, but esp. 4:5–6). His glory, so situated, would act like the sun, not only giving light, but causing the city itself to radiate it (cf. v.5). This light of God would have great power of attraction. The combination of "nations" and "kings" recalls 52:15; and this, along with the use of ch. 60 in Rev 21 and the linking of the glory of God and the Lamb in Rev 21:22, prompts us to think of the divine glory here as that of the risen Christ-Servant-Lamb.

4–9 God told Abraham to lift up his eyes and look at Canaan, which he and his seed were to possess (Ge 13:14–17). Here Zion is told to look and see her dispersed children coming from other lands. She glows with the radiance of God's glory and with the joy of a fulfilled hope. There are also streams of pilgrims from the far parts: wealthy sea-faring peoples like the Phoenicians and merchants from the deserts of Arabia. They all come with appropriate gifts: gold, incense, and lambs all finding their place in the worship of the temple. This passage, unfulfilled before the coming of Christ, can hardly teach literal sacrifice, for his sacrifice has fulfilled the entire OT system of offerings.

Psalm 87 predicts that foreigners will be registered among the citizens of Zion. Isaiah 19:23–25 places Egypt and Assyria alongside Israel as God's people. Do the "sons" (v.9) of Zion include foreigners or are they simply the dispersed of Israel returning on Gentile ships? Probably the latter, though the former is not impossible in the context.

10–12 Throughout much of her history, Jerusalem had been subject to assault from foreign enemies. The Babylonians destroyed her walls, and the Romans would do so again. Like other Near Eastern cities, Jerusalem's gates were shut every night as a protection against sudden attack. All this reflected the judgment of her God that was so often on her. Now she would be the object of his grace. Jerusalem would receive both the service and the wealth of the nations and their monarchs, and no opposition to her would be tolerated by her God. Any fulfillment of this after the Exile was only partial. The Persians made possible the rebuilding of the walls but did not do it themselves. Its true fulfillment lay beyond the OT era altogether.

13–14 Although these verses go beyond anything realized in history, they take up elements from the past. Just as Lebanon supplied wood for the building of Solomon's temple (1Ki 5), so it would again (cf. Eze 40–42). The nations that had come against Jerusalem in such a scornful spirit would now do obeisance to her as the city of her God.

15–22 The exultant tone of this chapter is sustained right to its end. The city so oppressed by some had been avoided by others. Perhaps her smaller near neighbors are in view. Now foreigners and their monarchs will love and cherish her, delighting to supply her needs. This is because the Lord will be revealing himself to her in all the glory of his grace, as indicated by the titles used in v.16, each of which has covenant implications. "The Mighty One of Jacob" reminds the people both of the sinfulness and guile of Israel's ancestor and of God's unmerited favor.

In v.17 the merely adequate is replaced by the valuable. Once again peace and righteousness, those heavenly twins, are found together (cf. 54:13–14). The beautiful description leads first of all to literal statements about the absence of violence (v.18), and then to further abstractions, symbolizing God's action on Zion's behalf and her own reaction to this. There may be an implicit reference to the meaning of the name "Judah" (i.e., "praise").

Verses 19–20 supply important background for Rev 21–22. Genesis 1:14–19 describes the sun and the moon as mere lamps made by God for lighting the earth. The Lord himself, whose glory set over the city gives the latter its special glory in this chapter, is in fact replacing his creatures—the sun and the moon—with himself. This symbolizes the fact that God's people, in his community, will always know his presence and the revelation and joy that come from him. This constant fullness of divine light will transform everything, including all the imperfections of life.

Verse 21 foreshadows the declarations in Rev 21–22 that only those cleansed of sin may have any part in God's city. His promise to Abraham (Ge 17:8) will be fulfilled. The "shoot" illustration is found again (4:1; 6:13; 11:1; 53:2). God's splendor is displayed in the growth and fruitage of this despised shoot, which symbolizes Israel. Verse 22 develops it, for the tiny shoot is seen here in its fullest development. The second half of v.22 grounds these promises in God's great name—"the LORD." It is hinted that the fulfillment of this prophecy will be remote in time.

D. The Year of the Lord's Favor (61:1–11)

1–3 These verses present a picture of a man anointed by the Spirit of God, especially for the task of preaching (cf. 1Ki 19:15–16). He proclaims glad tidings (cf. 40:9; 41:27; 52:7). His anointing with the Spirit of God provides a link with both the kingly and the servant prophecies of this book (11:1; 42:1). If he is both King and Servant, then already within the book of Isaiah that union of the two in Jesus Christ is anticipated.

Those benefiting from the preacher's message are described as the poor, the brokenhearted (cf. Ps 147:3), the captives, and the prisoners. The "poor" (GK 6705) may be literal, but the word probably has overtones of piety as well. The "brokenhearted" appear again as those who mourn and grieve. They could be mourning for sin or over the destruction of Jerusalem, though this was itself punishment for sin. The poor and the mourners reappear in the Beatitudes (Mt 5:3–4). The captives and the prisoners are likely to be the Exiles (cf. 42:22; 49:9; 51:14), so that the overtones of a new Exodus are still present.

The first two lines of v.2 are important. The term goel ("Redeemer"; GK 1457) does not appear in this passage, but in the OT the Year of Jubilee—when slaves were set free and all land was returned to its original owners—was closely linked with the legislation providing for the kinsman-redeemer (Lev 25); and the same word was used of the avenger of blood (Nu 35:12). Moreover, the Hebrew word translated "freedom" in v.1 is deror (GK 2002), a technical term for the Jubilee release in the OT (cf. Lev 25:10, 13; 27:24; Jer 34:8–10; Eze 46:17). God presents himself here then both as Savior and Judge. Significantly, Jesus, in quoting these verses in Lk 4:18–19, stopped before the reference to "the day of vengeance."

The threefold bestowal in v.3 expresses the same basic idea in different ways. Ashes symbolize deep sorrow; and the crown, oil, and garment all suggest preparations for joyous festival. The "oaks of righteousness" allude to 60:21, but with the thought now individualized.

4–9 At Sinai God described his people as "a kingdom of priests" (Ex 19:6). This ideal would now come to pass. As the Levitical priests were for them, so is Israel's place among the nations to be, which implies that her priestly ministry is for their benefit.

The laws of inheritance, so closely linked to the Jubilee regulations, provided for a double inheritance for the firstborn (Dt 21:17). Previously, perhaps because privilege brings greater responsibility, Israel had received double punishment (40:2); now, as God's "firstborn" among the nations (Ex 4:22–23; cf. Ps 89:27), she has a "double portion" in her land. Perhaps the "land flowing with milk and honey" (Ex 3:8, 17; et al.) was itself reckoned to be of double value.

The land will be restored to God's people because those who had taken it had no right to it, and the Lord is a God of justice. The "everlasting covenant" (v.8), preceded by a reference to the divine faithfulness, probably undergirds the existing covenants; so it is evidence of God's integrity. The reference to their blessing among the nations suggests the Abrahamic covenant (cf. Ge 12:1–3) rather than the Davidic (cf. Isa 55:3).

10–11 The speaker in these verses is probably personified Zion, who expresses her unbounded joy in God. The analogy of clothing appears again (cf. v.3). Clothing often expresses either status or mood—or both (cf. Ro 13:14; Eph 4:22–24).

The final verse reminds us of 55:10–11, supporting the theme of God's faithfulness. God's faithful word will secure the growth of righteousness and praise in his people, which will be publicly displayed, as at a bridal feast, before all the nations.

E. Assured Prayer for Zion's Future (62:1–12)

1–7 Here the prophet takes his place among the great men of prayer in the OT. He has received a vision of Jerusalem, living in the good of all God's promises and shining with the glory of her God (ch. 60), and he now prays with persistence and deep feeling for that day to come. Assured praying rests on the promises of God (cf. Ge 32:9–12). Jerusalem will be a spectacle for the whole world to see. So often in the OT a "new name" is the pledge of divine action to change the status or character of a person (e.g., Ge 17:5, 15). Zion's new name will emerge in vv.4, 12 and will reflect the grace of God to her, for "the mouth of the LORD" in Isaiah is associated with utterances of grace (cf. 40:5; 58:14).

Once again Zion will enjoy an intimate relationship with her God.

The theme of the wife separated from her husband because of her sin and yearning for reconciliation and home often appears in this book from ch. 49 onward. It emerges again in vv.4–5. The promise that she would be a "crown" for her God (v.3) may reflect the idea that a wife, especially a queen, should be an adornment to her husband. The Servant of the Lord is a delight to him (42:1); so is she to be. Verse 5 suggests the analogy that loyal citizens may be said to be married to their city. The analogy of the bride and groom reminds us of Rev 21:2, 9; 22:17.

Verse 6 reminds us that the vision of vv.1b–5 inspires the prophet in his praying, and that prayer continues here. If the speaker is the prophet, the watchmen here may be his fellow prophets (cf. Eze 3:17) or the godly in general, protecting the city from the ravaging forces of evil by their prayers. If the speaker is God, the watchmen could still be the godly at prayer. True prayer begins and ends at the throne of God. God graciously involves others, through prayer, in the fulfillment of his great purposes.

8–9 These words are particularly assuring to Zion's prayer-watchmen. The solemn oath of God underlines his faithfulness, and that he has sworn "by his mighty arm" stresses his ability to carry out his word; for his arm is the executor of the divine will, its power in salvation already wonderfully demonstrated (cf. 53:1). Zion repeatedly had been subject to assault from enemies and had been robbed of food supplies, either by marauding armies or as the payment of taxes to foreign overlords. God had warned her that disobedience would bring this about; but now, through his gracious action, she is righteous (62:1), and the Lord promises that this will never occur again. The temple courts would throng with worshipers offering the harvest firstfruits to the Lord and rejoicing before him.

10–11a There is to be a massive pilgrimage to the city. A road-building and road-clearing project is to be undertaken, with the banner and a proclamation providing visible and audible signals to the nations of its completion; for, as ch. 60 shows, they will be instrumental in enabling the dispersed to return.

11b–12 Here is salvation in its final stage, the fulfillment of all that has gone before. Verse 12 furthers the theme of v.4. All these names bring out different aspects of God's grace to his people (cf. Hos 1). The first goes back to the beginning of their history as a nation (Ex 19:6). At that time they also knew what it was to be the Lord's redeemed people, but before the end this experience will have been filled out with other wonders of redeeming grace. Jerusalem's destiny as the wife of the Lord will find complete fulfillment because he has sought to win her from her sin and restore her to everlasting married fellowship with himself.

F. The Lord the Avenger (63:1–6)

1–6 The oracle is most dramatic. The only OT passage that in any way resembles it is the account of Joshua's encounter with the angelic captain of the Lord's host (Jos 5:13–6:5). The city watchman or sentry peers anxiously out at a solitary and majestic figure who appears on the scene, his garment spattered with crimson. When he first comes into view, it is clear that he is coming from the direction of Bozrah, Edom's capital. That Edom means "red" (cf. Ge 25:30) is particularly apt in this context. Is this fearsome figure who has been executing judgment on Edom now coming to judge Jerusalem? The answer makes it clear that this is the Lord himself, and that he is coming to his people, not as their judge, but as their righteous Savior.

As the figure draws nearer, the watchman directs a question to him, perhaps still with a measure of apprehension. The winepress metaphor has relevance only to judgment (cf. Rev 14:19–20; 19:11–16), though atonement involves the bearing of the wrath of God. The book of Revelation takes this passage to be fulfilled in Christ as the Judge of the world, and his title "the Word of God" there probably relates to the speech at the close of v.1. The Lord declares that he has executed the judgment alone. This suggests that this passage looks beyond historical judgments—in which God uses one nation to punish another nation—to the eschatological day of God's wrath.

The "day of vengeance" and "the year of my redemption" belong to the same complex of ideas, involving the goel ("redeemer"; see comment on 61:1–3). God's act of judgment against Edom is conceived to be a putting right of the wrongs done to Zion (see 34:8–15), especially when the Edomites took advantage of Judah's weakness after the fall of Jerusalem (La 4:21-22; Eze 25:12–14; 35:1–15). Thus, as at the Exodus from Egypt and also at the return from Exile—preceded as it was by the judgment on Babylon through the Persians—judgment and redemption would be effected by the same events.

Verse 5 recalls Rev 5 and the search for someone to open the Book of Destiny, with its revelation of ultimate judgments. This testifies to the universality of sin. Verse 6 widens the judgment, making it clear that Edom is simply an appropriate example of the judgment of God on the nations. In many prophetic passages, Edom appears to represent Gentiles under divine judgment. For drunkenness as a picture of the divine wrath, see 51:22–23.

G. A Psalm of Praise and Lamentation (63:7–64:12)

Since the start of ch. 60, Isaiah's prophecies have majored on Zion's exaltation, the final fulfillment of all God's purposes for her. No doubt the man who received such visions would be filled with a deep longing for their fulfillment, especially if he was passing through a period of intense, God-given awareness that Judah's sin was going to bring devastating judgment through the Babylonians. Just as the Spirit of God used such moods in the psalmists to produce many an impassioned lamentation, so he did also with Isaiah. Indeed, this passage is really a psalm of communal lamentation, wherein the prophet's identification with the nation becomes the means by which he expresses the deep longing of the most spiritually sensitive in it. Such prayers were part of the prophetic ministry.

7–10 The repeated word "kindnesses" (GK 2876) represents God's faithful covenant love. It is fitting that the prophet should begin with praise, for God has never failed to honor his covenant promises even though his people have so often proved untrue to him. In the Lord's saving deeds his faithfulness has revealed itself. Verses 8–10 present a picture of God as a disappointed Father, facing the fact that his children have rebelled against him. This does not deny his omniscience or even the sovereignty of his purpose but expresses the fact that Israel's rebellion ought never to have been and was an offense against love as well as holiness.

God, declaring himself to be his people's Father, promised to save them from Egypt, declaring that he knew their afflictions (Ex 3:7–10). Verse 9 is one of the most moving expressions of the compassionate love of God in the OT. There are Trinitarian overtones in the passage, for "the angel of his presence"—in whom the Lord is personally present—is apparently a reference to Ex 23:20–23, in combination with Ex 33:12–14; and "his Holy Spirit" (cf. Nu 11:17, 25–29)—who can be grieved (cf. Eph 4:30)—is clearly personal. The people's rebellion brought God into conflict with them, as he had threatened (Ex 23:21; cf. ch. 32).

11–14 The prophet, still dwelling on the past deeds of God for his people, suggests that things have changed since "the days of old." The focus of attention is still the events of the Exodus period, when the nation came into being. Moses, like David, was taken from pastoring the flock to leadership of Israel, thus symbolizing the self-forgetful care God expects in those in authority over his people. The right arm of Moses symbolized and was accompanied by the right arm of God, for the Exodus was an act of divine power (see 51:9; 52:10; 53:1).

The two analogies of v.13–14 point to the conditions of the crossing of the Red Sea and the Jordan respectively. The people found the sea bed—and perhaps the desert as well—easy to negotiate; and, descending from the plateau of Moab to the Jordan and across it, they were like a herd of cattle being led into green pasture. The word "rest" (GK 5663) recalls Dt 12:10 and Jos 21:44, though Heb 3–4 teaches that there is a deeper rest available in Christ.

15–19 The wistful note that was sounded in the last few verses now becomes explicit, and the characteristics of a communal lamentation appear clearly. In his prayer at the consecration of the temple, Solomon had called on God to hear his people's cry from his heavenly dwelling place (1Ki 8:44–53), and Isaiah has shown a personal awareness of God as exalted in his holiness (ch. 6; 57:15). This exalted God has pledged his zeal in the cause of his people (9:7; 37:32); but now, as he foresees the temple and its ruin, the prophet identifies with the people's cry for mercy.

In v.16 we have the first two of three references to God as "Father" (cf. also 64:8). This repeated plea gives the prayer special intensity. The sense of relationship with God goes deeper than national solidarity; it is the deepest fact of the people's life.

Verse 17 recalls Isaiah's commission and the warning he had then (cf. 6:9–13), that through his verbal ministry the people would become hardened in sin. The prayer perhaps alludes to the hardening of Pharaoh's heart in the Exodus story, which provides much background to the thought here. It recognizes that God has established that moral law in which sin hardens the heart, and does so by divine design (cf. Ro 1:18–32). The word "return" (GK 8740) may suggest the return of the shekinah glory to the temple as the symbol of God's dwelling among his people (cf. Eze 43:6–12). Certainly v.18 implies that their sense of alienation from him is not unconnected with the destruction of their sanctuary. There is a deep sense of special election in v.19.

64:1–7 The longing for renewed blessing expressed in the closing verses of the previous chapter is now poured out in a passionate outburst. The Exodus had been followed by the great revelation at Sinai, when the mountain trembled at the presence of God (Ex 19:16–19). On that occasion God descended on the mount (Ex 19:18). Here the prophet graphically conceives of the very heavens being rent by Israel's God in his eagerness to be once more in the midst of his people. The illustration of v.2 sets forth the judgment of God. Pharaoh and the Egyptians had learned the power of God's name at the Exodus (Ex 13:3, 18). The Sinai revelation had made God's people tremble; this new disclosure of him would terrify the nations of the world.

The God of the Exodus and Sinai who revealed himself to his people was the God of the unexpected, for in so many of the plagues the ordinary course of nature was interrupted. He was a unique God, for all other so-called deities are impotent. He was also a God of righteousness, caring about the obedience of his people to his laws. It is this ethical quality in him that is revealed over against the sins of his people.

Verses 5–7 present a many-sided doctrine of sin, remarkably full for an OT passage. Sin is a continual practice; it is defiling, it is destructive, and it creates a barrier between God and humankind—both from our side, for we do not want to pray, and from God's, because he will not hear us. God himself has determined that it will have these results. No wonder the people cry out, "How then can we be saved?"

8–12 Verse 8 quite suddenly moves from the thought of God as the moral governor to whom his people are responsible to the Father who brought them into being. Both Jeremiah (Jer 18:1–6) and Paul (Ro 9:19–21) develop the analogy of the potter and the clay and present God as sovereign in the realm of sin and judgment. The people cast themselves on the mercy of God, calling on him to remember their standing as his people. Because the land is itself holy, so are all its cities, though the prophet lays special emphasis on the desolation of Jerusalem. He appeals to the fact that the land is the Lord's; it was to him that the praises of earlier generations had been offered in the temple which he had set apart for that purpose but which now lay in ruins.

Verse 12 implores God to intervene and bring to his people that forgiveness and salvation that have been promised over and over again in this book, especially since ch. 40. What response did God make to this prayer? The two closing chapters will show us.

H. The Great Final Issues (65:1–66:24)

These two chapters are not only the end of the book but also its climax. Here eschatology reaches its zenith, for the promise of new heavens and a new earth (65:17; 66:22) not only goes beyond anything else in the book but even the speculative imagination could not conceive any greater reality. At the same time, the spiritual challenge to the reader and the ultimate issues of destiny are presented with great power.

Chapter 64 was an impassioned prayer in which the people, represented by the prophet, stated their sense of relationship to God but also made frank confession of their sins, crying to him for mercy. A man of deep spiritual sensitivity may—like Daniel (Da 9) or Ezra (Ezr 9)—take the burden of a whole community's sins on his heart and confess those sins with a depth of feeling that may be shared, in fact, by very few of his compatriots. Isaiah, at his call, had confessed not only his personal sin but that of his people generally (6:5). We will then treat these chapters as God's answer to the prayer of ch. 64.

1–5 Paul applies vv.1–2 to the Gentiles in Ro 10:20–21. The Hebrew for v.1a, translated literally, is "I permitted myself to be sought." The NIV is somewhat disappointing when it translates v.1b "to a nation that did not call on my name," following the LXX and the Targum but not the Hebrew text, which reads, "to a nation that was not called by my name." We therefore understand that v.1 applies to the Gentiles and v.2 to the Jews. This reminds us of the work of the Messiah, through whom the knowledge of the Lord will fill the earth (11:9), and especially of the Servant of the Lord, whose work will savingly enlighten the nations (42:6) through his sufferings and exaltation (52:15).

Verse 2 presents God's hands held out in love "all day long" (meaning perhaps all throughout Israel's history), but finding obstinate rejection of his ways (cf. 64:5). "Imaginations" may refer to the sinful product of the unsanctified imagination in idols. "Continually" seems to answer to "all day long," with the thought that the people's sinful insults to God were as constant and long-standing as his own gracious overtures to them. The catalog of sins in vv.3–4 suggests Rev 21:8; 22:15, which lead to the second death and thus exclude those from the Holy City who practice them. "Burning incense on altars of brick" must, because of its context, be pagan, though its exact significance is unknown. The first half of v.4 refers to the forbidden practice of necromancy (cf. 57:9; Dt 18:9–13), while v.4b probably refers to flagrant disregard of the laws about unclean meats that show a rebellious outlook.

There is a tone of irony in v.5a. Paganism has its "holy" men; and these instill fear in others lest they should come too close to them and be harmed. These descriptions of sin begin to give place to the assurance of punishment at the close of the verse (cf. Dt 32:22; Jer 17:4).

6–7 The introductory "see" is a call to attention. God has those sins written before him (cf. Rev 20:12). The people's prayer (64:12) is answered, but not in the way they would hope for. In responding to our prayers, God always keeps within the spiritual and moral structure he has established. His judgment on a nation often awaits the full term of its sin (Ge 15:16; Da 8:23; Mt 23:32; cf. Rev 14:15). The mountain shrines were centers of idolatrous worship (cf. 57:7; Jer 3:6; et al.).

8–10 Here again is the important doctrine of the remnant. The vineyard of Israel, so unproductive (5:1–4), has nevertheless produced some genuine grapes. They are the servants of God. In them the promises to "the chosen people" find their fulfillment, for this remnant is "my people who seek me." Those who had received the great OT revelation had a responsibility to seek the Lord on the basis of it, while those who had never known its light would receive it through a new divine initiative (v.1).

Sharon was beautiful and fertile; but Achor had an ominous sound, for it symbolized God's judgment on his people (Jos 7:24–26). Hosea had, however, presented the God's promise (Hos 2:15).

11–12 Here God turns to the rebels among his people. The reference to the holy mountain refers to the forsaking of the worship of the Lord at his temple. This worship involved the offering of items connected with the people's food and drink. Instead, these were being presented to pagan gods (cf. 1Co 10:21–22). Verse 12 recalls v.2 (cf. 55:1–7).

13–16 The term "Sovereign LORD" was characteristic of two passages picturing the Servant of the Lord (48:16; 50:4–5, 7, 9). Here the term occurs again, providing a link between the Servant and the servants. Those addressed in these verses as "you" are the same rebels God speaks to in vv.11–12.

God's people are promised food, drink, and table fellowship (cf. Rev 2:7, 17; 3:20; 21:6; 22:2, 17). Those still in their sins will be excluded, and their name will be a byword among God's people for the curse of God. The true servants of God will have a new name (cf. Rev 2;17), perhaps the name of their God (Rev 3:12), the "God of truth" (cf. Rev 3:14). The final promise of v.16 takes its significance from the fact that the nation's troubles had been the result of its sins. This full and free forgiveness would be achieved through the sacrifice of God's Servant (ch. 53).

17–25 The great promise, with its introductory call to special attention—"Behold, I will create new heavens and a new earth" (cf. Rev 21:1)—is staggering. The whole created order is to be renewed. Great and new as this promise is, the reader does not come to it completely unprepared, for it builds on passages like 11:1–9 and ch. 24. For those whose imagination cannot cope with the macrocosm, the prophet indicates that Jerusalem too is to be created anew. The God who had identified with his people in their affliction would now do so in their joy also. The former sorrows will be over (cf. Rev 21:4).

The picture in v.20 promises greatly extended but not infinite life; yet v.19 declares that weeping will be banished! Advisedly, we are to dwell on the positive blessings in v.20 and not on their negative implications. If we take the references to death seriously, we have here a blessed but not ideal state, not quite parallel therefore to the whole of Rev 21:4.

The people's blessedness is portrayed largely in terms reminiscent of the "godly materialism" of Deuteronomy (cf. Isa 62:8–9). The greatest blessing they will know, however, will be a relationship with God in which there is complete harmony between their prayer and his will, between his desire to provide and their dependence on him to give. Verse 25 (cf. 11:6–9) is a reminder that these blessings come only through the Messiah, while the words "dust will be the serpent's food" (cf. Ge 3:14) remind us that the overthrow of Satan, the great serpent (Rev 20:2), is the result of the work of the woman's offspring (Ge 3:15).

66:1–2a There was a reference to Jerusalem in 65:18–19 and to its holy mountain (65:11) but no express mention of the temple. These verses could mean that this great God, who could not be contained in the whole of the old created order (cf. 1Ki 8:27), could have no appropriate temple at all. But the postexilic temple was built at his command; so the passage must mean rather that no edifice made by human hands could be more than a symbol; and the symbol could, as Stephen made clear, come to be cherished above the reality (Ac 7:44–54).

2b–4 In 57:15, Isaiah refers to God's heavenly dwelling and the fellowship he offers the contrite and lowly in spirit. At Sinai, where the sacrificial system was given but before its details were made known, God's people trembled when the Ten Commandments were heard (Ex 20:18–21). Here a humble reverence for God's word is in view. This thought governs v.3, where the teaching is even stronger than in 1:10–20. The most sacred exercises of true God-given religion are like the worst sins when they are divorced from humility of spirit. Verse 4 repeats the thought of 65:12. This is all the more striking in the light of the context of ch. 65, for there it is paganism that forsakes the holy mountain of God that is being condemned. Paganism that sets aside God's word and ritualism that obeys it in the letter only and not the spirit are both abominations to the Lord.

5–6 Once again the word of God passes from his enemies within Israel (vv.3–4) to his servants. The words in the second half of v.5 are uttered in irony. Verse 6 certainly implies that in some sense God accepted the Jerusalem temple as his, for from there he revealed his wrath against his enemies (see comment on 56:7).

7–11 In 54:1–3, just after the fourth Servant Song, Zion was told to rejoice and to prepare her tent for a great influx of inhabitants. This is emphasized again, with special stress on the suddenness of it. The questions of v.9 are really making the point that God promises not only a speedy but a complete work, with Zion's family deeply satisfied in their mother.

12–16 In 8:6–8 Isaiah pictured Assyria—the cruelest enemy Israel and Judah ever had to face—flooding the whole country like an immensely spreading inundation from the Euphrates. He went on to promise endlessly increasing peace as the result of the Messiah's reign (9:7). Now the analogy of the overflowing river is applied to that peace, the nations coming up, not in devastating conquest, but in peace and with their wealth (cf. 48:18; 60:11).

From the thought of Zion's children as nursed by her, the thought moves to God as the "mother" of his people. This is surprising because in earlier chapters God was represented as the husband and Zion as the wife (e.g., 54:5). Here the purpose is to make it clear that the Lord is the real source of those blessings mediated to Zion's children through her. The same flexibility is shown in v.14, where grass is not a symbol of human frailty (cf. 40:8) but rather of nourishment under the blessing of God. In this way God's power will be shown in grace to his servants but in wrath to his enemies. The manifestation of his wrath is expressed especially in terms of fire, which, like the whirlwind and the sword, has great destructive potential.

In the western wall of Jerusalem, someone has etched, in Hebrew, these words of hope from Isa 66:14: "When you see this, your heart will rejoice and you will flourish like grass."

17–21 The book that has been largely poetical throughout ends in prose. To understand v.17 it should be remembered that it is possible to consecrate oneself to a false god. The prophet clearly has in view those described in 65:3–5. In v.18 "their actions and imaginations" refers to the Jews and their departure from the true God (cf. 65:2). Isaiah had seen the glory of the Lord in the temple (ch. 6), where it had also been revealed to him that the people of Israel would not accept his message. Frequently, during the course of his prophecy, he has seen the light of God going forth and the Gentiles being attracted to it (2:1–4; 42:6; 49:6; 60:1–3). Now he expresses their promised knowledge of God in terms reminiscent of his own inaugural vision.

"Those who survive" are the Jewish remnant, and they go out to many a foreign country to proclaim the glory of the true God. The beautiful picture in v.20 is based on the Levitical system of offerings. The Gentiles will bring the dispersed remnant to the temple, just as if the Gentiles themselves were Israelites and the members of the Dispersion were the offerings they would bring to present to the Lord. Grammatically it is possible that the words of v.21 apply to the Gentiles, which anticipates Paul's teaching that there is no barrier to blessing or to privilege in Christ (Gal 3:28–29). More likely, however, they apply to priests and Levites selected from among the regathered brothers mentioned in v.20.

22–24 God here makes the greatest and most comprehensive of all his promises: the guarantee of his pledges to his people. He further affirms that the wider vision of the worship of all humankind will also find its fulfillment. This is expressed in terms of the old God-given Jewish system of special days and Sabbaths for worship and, with many other aspects of these two final chapters, raises important questions of interpretation (see the section "Eschatology" in the introduction to Isaiah). The prophecy ends on a note of the starkest realism. It pictures vividly the lessons to be learned from the eternal judgment of God on sinners for their rebellion against him. Notice that this judgment will have the approval of human beings. This reminds us of the awesome "Hallelujah!" of Rev 19:1. God's people must agree with all he says, for he is God.

Jeremiah

INTRODUCTION

1. General

Jeremiah is the most autobiographical of all the prophets. He has been credited with the survival of his people after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., a veritable savior of the Jews. Nonetheless, this man of God is one of the most misunderstood of the great OT leaders.

The book of Jeremiah is longer than Isaiah or Ezekiel, and the Minor Prophets combined are about a third shorter. It is the longest book in the Bible if 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, and 1 and 2 Chronicles are reckoned as separate books. The book sheds valuable light on the subject of the decline and fall of the Judean kingdom and influenced theological thinking in subsequent ages.

2. The Person of Jeremiah

a. His background

Jeremiah's name, not uncommon in Israel, is of disputed meaning. His name may well reflect his parents' hopes for him and the nation, in which case the meaning "the LORD exalts" is preferable to "the LORD hurls" or "the LORD establishes." Jeremiah's relation to so many political events makes it strange that his name appears nowhere in Kings or Chronicles. He was born in 646 B.C. in the Levitical town of Anathoth in the territory of Benjamin; he died, probably in Egypt, not long after 586.

In his day Jeremiah was unquestionably the greatest spiritual personality in Israel. His was not a happy life; his expressions of sorrow are classic. Only he among the prophets showed his personal feelings as he proclaimed God's message. By birth, Jeremiah was a priest; by grace, a prophet; by the trials of life, a bulwark for God's truth; by daily spiritual experience, one of the greatest exponents of prophetic faith in his unique relation to God; by temperament, gentle and timid, yet constantly contending against the forces of sin; and by natural desire, a seeker after the love of a companion, his family, friends, and, above all, his people—which were all denied him.

Jeremiah's life—private and public—is openly displayed in his book: his brave actions, his tenderheartedness toward his coreligionists, and his deep emotional and spiritual struggles before God. His disappointments and sufferings were undeniably as poignant as those of any other Jewish prophet. His life may be characterized as being one long martyrdom.

Jeremiah the son of Hilkiah was of a priestly family, but nothing indicates that he ever exercised a priestly ministry. Possibly his father was the Hilkiah who found the "Book of the Law" in the temple (2Ki 22:8). Jeremiah's father was probably a descendant of Abiathar, the sole survivor of the priests of Nob (1Sa 22:20). After ministering under David, Abiathar was exiled by Solomon to Anathoth, where he had property (1Ki 2:26). That he was from Anathoth further accounts for the fact that in Josiah's day Jeremiah was not as well known as Huldah the prophetess (2Ki 22:14–20). That Jeremiah was a man of means may be inferred from his purchase of a field in 32:6–15.

Jeremiah was called to the prophetic office in the thirteenth year of Josiah's reign (1:2; i.e., 626 B.C.); he was about twenty years old at the time and served in that office for more than forty years. The Lord did not permit him to marry (16:2). Though his public ministry was long and checkered, there is no indication that he ever had any disciples; and his closest companion was his faithful secretary and scribe, Baruch the son of Neriah.

Jeremiah preached in Jerusalem until the fall of the kingdom of Judah in 586 (cf. 7:2; 22:1; 27:1–2; 32:1). After that, he labored for some time among the survivors in Judah and later among the Jews who had fled to Egypt (chs. 40–44). His call included both Israel and the other nations of his time (1:10). The call was both simple and direct (1:4–5), but the prophet's reaction differed markedly from Isaiah's (Isa 6) and Ezekiel's (Eze 1).

b. His public ministry

Jeremiah's ministry was carried on in a politically, socially, morally, and spiritually chaotic era. The glorious days of reformation under Hezekiah in the eighth century were eclipsed by the long, ungodly reign of Manasseh, who along with his fealty to the Assyrian monarchs maintained a syncretistic worship for his people. Jeremiah did not hide his hatred for the apostasy and social injustices of Manasseh. In this spiritual decline priests and prophets alike were implicated.

When Jeremiah began to preach, the godly Josiah had begun his reforms to wipe out idolatry from his kingdom. The content of the prophet's preaching confirms his full support of Josiah's reforms and calls for a truly repentant return to the Lord. Tragically, the people of Judah had already become so ungodly that they were no longer responsive to calls to return to God. But in grace the Lord continued to plead with Judah through Jeremiah. From the beginning of his ministry, Jeremiah never deviated from the position that Judah and Jerusalem were to be destroyed by a nation from the north and the people carried into captivity (4:5–9; 6:22–26). The threatening invasion of the northern enemy gave urgency to his warnings.

With Jehoiakim's rule (608 B.C.), Jeremiah again began a public ministry. In the famous temple address (chs. 7; 26), he indicated that only faithfulness to God could guarantee the nation's security; otherwise the temple would be destroyed. He aroused bitter opposition to himself and his message from all segments of the nation, including his own family. Sad and despairing because of the rejection of his message, he yet loved, prayed for, and agonized over his people. No greater and truer Jewish patriot ever preached the truth to them. Even when the Lord forbade him to pray for them, he continued to intercede. At times he felt that God himself had forsaken him. He even cursed the day of his birth.

Jehoiakim was so enraged with Jeremiah's denunciatory messages that he cut the scroll of his prophecy to pieces and burned it. So Jeremiah became a fugitive from the king's wrath. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign (according to Hebrew reckoning [25:1], or in the third year according to Babylonian computation [Da 1:1]), Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon first invaded Judah. He had defeated Pharaoh Neco of Egypt at the Battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.), an event of unsurpassed importance because it settled the question of world supremacy in that day. After Egypt's defeat, Jeremiah counseled that it was futile and contrary to God's will to resist Nebuchadnezzar. One can imagine the unpopular nature of this message. Thereafter Jeremiah's life was one of uninterrupted misunderstanding and persecution.

Under Zedekiah's rule, Jeremiah fared no better, though this king was not so violently opposed to him as Jehoiakim had been. But Zedekiah was weak and vacillating, constantly fearing his powerful nobles. Jeremiah had some ministry to the king, but it bore little if any fruit. When the kingdom of Judea fell to Nebuchadnezzar in the eleventh year of Zedekiah's reign, the Babylonian king appointed Gedaliah as governor of Judah (40:1–6). Soon after his appointment the governor was assassinated by a descendant of the Davidic house (41:1–2), Ishmael son of Nethaniah. The remnant in Mizpah, against Jeremiah's protests, fled to Egypt from the wrath of Babylon (vv.16–18), and Jeremiah and Baruch were compelled to accompany them (42:1–43:7). At the end of his ministry, Jeremiah was at Tahpanhes in Egypt, where he both predicted Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of Egypt (43:8–13) and denounced the idolatry of the Jews there (ch. 44). Beyond this nothing is known of Jeremiah's life.

Jeremiah encountered more opposition from more enemies than any other OT prophet. Much of it stemmed from the fact that he continually preached one theme: unconditional surrender. Had not the Lord protected him, he would have been martyred.

Nothing certain is known of the time, place, or manner of Jeremiah's death. According to 44:29–30, Jeremiah was still alive around 570 B.C. (Pharaoh Hophra [Apries] reigned 588–569). By an unusual providence the prophet who fought his entire life against Egypt was forced to end his days there as a captive. A late, unattested tradition claims that the men of Tahpanhes stoned Jeremiah to death. There is a rabbinical account of his deportation with Baruch to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar at the time of the conquest of Egypt and of his death there, but this is unconfirmed.

Singularly, this great man of God, so little heeded by his own people, has been accorded great respect after death. Alexandrian Jews especially have held him in profound regard (cf. 2Mc 2:1–8; 15:12–16; see also Mt 16:14). That later Jews saw in him their intercessor partially explains this.

3. Date and Authorship

Scholars have extensively discussed the origin of this book and have held differing opinions about it. Broadly speaking, they are divided into two groups: (1) those who think Jeremiah wrote very little of it, assigning the major part of it to other writers; (2) those who assign the entire book to Jeremiah (ch. 52 is treated separately) through the secretarial aid of Baruch (i.e., he was to Jeremiah what Luke was to Paul). The first group favors a division of the book into three sources: (1) messages dictated by Jeremiah; (2) a biography of Jeremiah, probably by Baruch; and (3) various contributions from redactors and later authors. The second school, which this commentary accepts, holds that the prophet dictated his messages to Baruch, his secretary (36:17–18; 45:1).

The passages in Jeremiah on the enemy from the north fit what is known of the Babylonians. Internal evidence indicates that the first written material of the book was done in the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign (605 B.C.; cf. 36:1–2). In addition, passages like 29:1; 30:2; and 51:60 compel the conclusion that prophecies, apart from those contained in Baruch's scroll, were immediately recorded. The scroll burned by Jehoiakim was replaced with additions (36:32). Apparently through the first score of years of his ministry, Jeremiah had kept notes of his messages, which were put into writing at God's command (36:2). The burned scroll was replaced and the material gradually added to a replacement scroll. It seems reasonable that Jeremiah edited his work during the Captivity. The entire book was probably gathered together shortly after his death. The conclusion appears inescapable that Baruch's rewritten scroll was the basis for Jeremiah's written prophecies. The book bears marks of having been gathered together by one person at one time.

4. Historical Setting

a. Prophetic background

Just as the eighth century B.C. saw a galaxy of prophets in Israel, so did the end of the seventh and the first half of the sixth centuries. The contemporary prophets were Zephaniah (Zep 1:1), Obadiah (Ob 11–14), the prophetess Huldah (2Ki 22:11; 2Ch 34:22)—all in Judah—and Ezekiel (Eze 1:1–3) and Daniel (Da 1:1) in Babylon. Especially close is the relationship between Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Probably Nahum and Habakkuk were also contemporaries of Jeremiah. Three of the four major prophets were related to captivities: (1) Daniel in Jehoiakim's time (Da 1:1), (2) Ezekiel in Jehoiachin's time (Eze 1:1–3), and (3) Jeremiah in Zedekiah's time (1:1–3).

b. Historical background

Events. To understand Jeremiah's prophecy requires close scrutiny of his times because of (1) the critical events in the political world of his day—events in which Judah was directly affected—and (2) the number of kings in Judah who reigned during his career and with whom he had close contact. Jeremiah was a national and international figure. A general chronological table helps visualize the historical background of his book.

639–609 B.C.—the reign of Josiah
609 B.C. (3 months)—the reign of Jehoahaz
609–597 B.C.—the reign of Jehoiakim
597 B.C. (3 months)—the reign of Jehoiachin
597–586 B.C.—the reign of Zedekiah
586 B.C.—the fall of Jerusalem
586(?) B.C.—the assassination of Gedaliah

The times of Jeremiah are among the most important in OT history. Because of their significance, they are the best-documented times in all Israel's history. The book of Jeremiah is so filled with historical, biographical, and autobiographical material that his life can be synchronized with dates and known events to a degree unparalleled in the writings of other prophets. Events of significance during this period are as follows:

669–c. 630 B.C.—the dissolution of the Assyrian Empire after the death of Ashurbanipal
626 B.C.—the call of Jeremiah

612 B.C.—the fall of Nineveh and the Assyrian empire

609 B.C.—the death of Josiah at Megiddo

605 B.C.—the battle between Egypt and Babylonia at Carchemish, with Babylonia emerging victorious

605 B.C.—the first siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (Daniel exiled to Babylon)

597 B.C.—the second siege of Jerusalem (Ezekiel exiled to Babylon)

588–586 B.C.—the final siege of Jerusalem, beginning the Babylonian captivity

Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar and conqueror of Assyria, came from Chaldea, a province in the southern part of Babylonia, and reigned from 625 to 605 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar (more properly Nebuchadrezzar), the most famous of the Babylonian monarchs, ruled from 605 to 562 B.C.

Geographically and politically Judah was in a vulnerable position between the power politics of Egypt and Assyria. In the eighth century B.C., Isaiah had warned against trusting Egypt (Isa 30:1–7) and had keenly evaluated the threat of Assyria (Isa 37). By God's protection the kingdom of Judah had escaped Sennacherib's forces. But from the godly reign of Hezekiah, the nation declined to the lowest spiritual depths under the godless rule of Manasseh (2Ki 21:9–15; 24:3–4). If Jeremiah was called in his early twenties, he lived in the reigns of Manasseh and Amon. Under Manasseh's long, apostate reign of fifty-five years, the reforms of his godly father, Hezekiah, were forgotten. Judah was then under Assyrian power; so to please his overlords, Manasseh introduced syncretistic elements into the temple worship at Jerusalem. The northern kingdom (Israel) was already exiled (722 B.C.), and the remnant residing there had embraced mixed elements in their faith (2Ki 17:28). During the reigns of Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, the Assyrian power conquered Egypt; but the latter regained strength under Psammetik I (664–609 B.C.), so that Judah found herself balancing off one great power against the other.

Rulers. (a) Josiah. Josiah came to the throne when he was eight years old. Politically, Assyria was under strong opposition from Babylon, fighting to survive. This gave Judah more freedom to throw off Assyrian elements in her worship. In 633 B.C., Josiah sought the Lord (2Ch 34:3); his reforms began in 629 B.C. (2Ch 24:36); in 623–622 B.C., the Book of the Law was found in the temple (2Ki 22:3–8; 2Ch 34:8–15); and Jerusalem was made the only authorized center for worship. The reforms are detailed in 2Ki 22–23; though widespread and well inaugurated, they did not last, as is evident from Jeremiah's ceaseless condemnation of the nation's sins.

In 609 B.C., Pharaoh Neco of Egypt joined Assyria to strengthen them. Josiah, though he had been warned by Neco, interfered and lost his life at the Battle of Megiddo (2Ki 23:29; 2Ch 35:20–24). But Babylon, stronger than Egypt, dominated the world scene under Nabopolassar of Chaldea, ruler of Babylonia by 625 B.C. and the destroyer of Nineveh in 612 B.C. His son, Nebuchadnezzar II, succeeded him and reigned for forty-three years, having defeated Egypt at the Battle of Carchemish on the Euphrates River in 605 B.C. (46:2; 2Ch 35:20). Thereafter Babylon was master of the world. For years Jeremiah steadily counseled against Judah's involvement in world politics. When the people refused his counsel, he repeatedly entreated them to surrender to the superior forces of Babylon, who at that time were an instrument for carrying out God's will.

(b) Jehoahaz. Distraught over the calamitous death of godly Josiah, the people took matters into their own hands and set Jehoahaz (Shallum [22:11]), son of Josiah, on the throne. In three months of rule he manifested an anti-Egypt and pro-Babylon policy, for which he was summarily deposed by Pharaoh Neco (2Ki 23:31–33), who took him to Egypt and imposed tribute on the country. In his place Neco set on the throne Eliakim, oldest son of Josiah and half-brother of Jehoahaz (2Ki 23:34, 36), changing his name to Jehoiakim (2Ki 23:30–35; 2Ch 36:1–4).

(c) Jehoiakim. The reign of this king was the time of Jeremiah's greatest trial and opposition. Politically, king and prophet were diametrically opposed, the king favoring Egypt and Jeremiah counseling submission to Babylon. Spiritually, the two were even farther apart. Jehoiakim has been characterized as the worst and most ungodly of all Judah's kings. He has been labeled a bloodthirsty tyrant, an inveterate enemy of the truth. He cared nothing for the worship of the God of Israel, exacted exorbitant taxes, used forced labor without pay, and had no regard for the word or prophet of God (22:13–14; ch. 36).

In Jehoiakim's eleven-year reign, the Battle of Carchemish took place (cf. 46:2). It was an event of permanent significance, for it marked the transfer of power over the Middle East from Egypt to Babylon. This defeat was the final blow to Egypt's aspirations and guaranteed the Chaldeans the supremacy of the West. It was the turning point of the period and had important consequences for Israel's future. The Babylonians made Jehoiakim their vassal and exiled a number of Jewish nobles (2Ki 24:1), among them Daniel (Da 1:1). Some scholars consider this first taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar the beginning of the seventy years of Judah's exile in Babylon (25:11); with it the dissolution of the Davidic kingdom had begun.

Jehoiakim sponsored idolatry and had no concern for the widespread social injustice in his realm (22:13–19; 2Ki 23:37). Of all the kings under whom Jeremiah prophesied, Jehoiakim was the most inveterate foe of the message and messenger of God (cf. 26:20–23; 36:20–26). In 598–597 B.C., he revolted against Babylon but was unsuccessful, thus adding to Judah's problems (2Ki 24:1–5). In Jehoiakim's time, Jeremiah was persecuted, plotted against, maligned, and imprisoned. The king destroyed his written prophecies, but the prophet did not swerve from his divine commission (cf. 11:18–23; 12:6; 15:15–18; 18:18; 20:2; 26:10–11, 24; 36:23). Jehoiakim died violently in Jerusalem in 598–597 B.C., in the eleventh year of his rule, as Jeremiah had predicted (22:18–19). The Chronicler records Jehoiakim's deportation to Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar (2Ch 36:6–7; see also Da 1:1).

(d) Jehoiachin. Jehoiakim was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin (also called Jeconiah and Coniah [see NIV notes on 22:24; 24:1]), who reigned only three months (cf. 2Ki 24:8). But this teenage king ruled long enough to reveal himself as a wicked monarch, whom Jeremiah strenuously denounced (22:24–30). Jehoiachin's father's rebellion against Babylon forced Nebuchadnezzar to besiege Jerusalem in 597 B.C., when Jehoiachin capitulated (2Ki 24:12). He was exiled to Babylon with many of Judah's upper class (among them the prophet Ezekiel [Eze 1:2]), and the temple was plundered (2Ki 24:10–16). Jehoiachin was a prisoner in Babylon for thirty-seven years (52:31–34). He was released by Evil-Merodach, son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar (2Ki 25:27–30). Strangely, the Jews long held a hope of his restoration to the Davidic throne; and Ezekiel refers to him, not to Zedekiah his successor, as king.

(e) Zedekiah. Among the many accomplishments of the great Nebuchadnezzar were king-making and name-changing. After the exile of Jehoiachin, Nebuchadnezzar set on the Judean throne Mattaniah, a son of Josiah, full brother of Eliakim and uncle of Jehoiachin, and changed his name to Zedekiah (2Ki 23:34; 24:17; 2Ch 36:10; Jer 1:3), a fact confirmed by the Babylonian Chronicle. The situation in Judah at the outset of Zedekiah's reign was that a series of sieges and deportations with changes in rulers had depleted the small kingdom of some of its best minds. Zedekiah, weak, vacillating, deficient in personality, found it beyond him to exert effective governing leadership. A puppet of Babylon, to whose king he had sworn fealty in the name of the God of Israel, he was checkmated in every decision by the pro-Egyptian policy of his officials.

Zedekiah's relationship with Jeremiah was closer than any previous Judean king, with the probable exception of the godly Josiah. But he was powerless to protect Jeremiah from the vicious designs of the nobles and to follow the God-given counsel that Jeremiah ceaselessly reiterated about submitting to Nebuchadnezzar. In the fourth year of his reign, Zedekiah plotted rebellion against Babylon with a confederacy of the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Sidon (27:3–11). This was their object in sending representatives to Jerusalem. The plot was denounced by Jeremiah and ultimately came to nothing. Perhaps Zedekiah's visit to Babylon that same year was intended to assure Nebuchadnezzar of his loyalty (51:59).

The end, however, was not far off. In the ninth year of his reign (588 B.C.), Zedekiah conspired with Pharaoh Hophra against Nebuchadnezzar. Babylon responded with an invasion of Judah, which ended when the city fell in the summer of 586 B.C. (2Ki 24:20–25:7; 2Ch 36:17; Jer 38:28–39:10). Throughout the siege, Jeremiah urged Zedekiah to surrender (21:1–10; 34:1–5, 17–22; 37:3–10, 16–17; 38:14–23). At one point the approach of the Egyptian army compelled the withdrawal of Babylon's forces, but the siege was resumed (37:1–10). Meanwhile, because of the cowardly attitude of Zedekiah, Jeremiah was mistreated by his enemies in Judah (37:11–21; ch. 38). The destruction of Jerusalem at this time, annually observed in mourning among Jews the world over on the ninth of the month Ab, was the greatest judgment of God on Israel in the OT. Zedekiah, captured as he tried to escape, his sons slain before him, and his eyes blinded, was carried to Babylon with a company of his subjects.

Chronological Order of Chapters in Jeremiah

Note: The following chart gives a proposed chronological order for the material in the book of Jeremiah. For those sections that have no dates cited in the text of Jeremiah, the dates suggested are tentative, though supported by evangelical scholarship (such passages are listed in italics). Jeremiah 52 is a historical supplement, virtually identical to 2 Kings 24:18–25:21 and probably not from the pen of Jeremiah. All dates are B.C.

After the destruction of the city and temple, the king of Babylon appointed Gedaliah governor of Judah. After a brief period (which, in the absence of evidence, could be three months or a few years), Gedaliah was murdered by a scion of the Davidic house, possibly at the instigation of pro-Egyptian sympathizers. Fearing reprisal from Babylon, the survivors of this tragedy fled to Egypt, taking Jeremiah and Baruch by force with them. So was completed a cycle begun with deliverance from Pharaoh by Moses centuries before. Strange, too, that Jeremiah, who counseled throughout his ministry against confidence in Egypt, should end his earthly days there against his will. Thus an important era in the theocracy in Israel was ended. The destruction of the sanctuary at Shiloh had closed the age of the Judges. The destruction of Solomon's temple marked the end of the period of the monarchy in Israel. The fall of the second temple by Titus (A.D. 70) was the catastrophic close of Israel's occupation of her land until modern times.

5. Theological Emphases

The dominant elements of Jeremiah's message are of paramount significance for his day and ours. What sustained him throughout a lifetime of grief and opposition was that he had an undying confidence in God and his promises (18:7; 29:14; 32:1–15). The two foci of his life and ministry were God—his goodness, his claims on humankind, his requirements of repentance and faith—and his wayward people—their welfare, both physically and spiritually.

Jeremiah enjoyed a high concept of God as Lord of all creation (27:5). The gods of the nation are nonentities (10:11 [the only verse in the book in Aramaic], 14; 14:22). God knows the malady of the human heart (17:9–10); yet he loves his people deeply (31:1–3), longing to bless those who trust him (17:7). Idolatrous worship and heartless, impenitent service are alike an abomination to him (19:4–6; 14:12). No greater insult can be offered God than to represent him under the form of dead idols. Idolatry was the special sin Jeremiah tirelessly preached against. Three kinds of falsehood stirred him: (1) false security that refused all calls for repentance, (2) false prophets who lulled the people into dangerous complacency, and (3) the false worship of idols. Worship was tendered to Baal, Molech, and the Queen of Heaven (Ishtar). Images of these deities were even placed in the temple (32:34; cf. 7:31; 19:5; 32:35; 44:18–19).

Immorality always accompanies idolatry. In Jeremiah's time moral corruption was widespread and social injustices abounded (5:1–9; 7:1–11; 23:10–14). Priests and prophets were as culpable as the rest of Judah (6:13–15). Yet the nation carried out its religious rites. But God was not to be placated with these merely external services. Jeremiah preached that judgment was inescapable. God had already used drought, famine, and foreign invaders (14:1–6; 4:11–22); he would yet bring the culminating visitation through Nebuchadnezzar (25:9). But God's love and faithfulness to his covenants would not permit the judgment to be fatal or final. There was a future hope. Jeremiah foretold the return from captivity in Babylon (25:11; 29:10) as well as the doom of Babylon itself (chs. 50–51). He did not hesitate to give Israel's hope tangible manifestation (32:1–15).

Jeremiah also had a ministry to the nations (1:5, 10). He saw Nebuchadnezzar as God's agent in the events of that day (27:6). He warned the other nations against resisting Nebuchadnezzar (27:1–11). In God's name he demanded righteousness of all nations (chs. 46–51). He voiced God's concern for the welfare of all peoples (29:1–14, esp. v.7).

Probably the outstanding emphasis in Jeremiah's ministry was the priority of the spiritual over everything else. He saw how secondary the temporal features of Judah's faith were. He saw his coreligionists trusting (1) an outward acceptance of the covenant of the Lord (11:1–5), (2) circumcision (9:25–26), (3) the temple (7:1–15), (4) the sacrificial system (6:20; 7:21–23), (5) outward possession of the law of Moses (8:8), (6) false prophecy (23:9–40), (7) prayer (11:14; 15:1), (8) the throne (22:1–9), and (9) the ark (3:16). Jeremiah preached more about repentance than any other prophet. His overarching concern at all times was the condition of the individual heart. His exposition of the new covenant is outstanding in Scripture (31:31–34). The NT shows us how deeply this truth entered into the work of our Lord.

As for Jeremiah's predictions of the distant future, Israel will return in penitence to the Lord (32:37–40). The Messiah will rule over her in justice and righteousness (23:5–8). The remnant of the nations will enjoy blessing at that time (3:17; 16:19).

As for messianic prophecy, Jeremiah does not describe messianic times in detail. The person of the Messiah is not so prominent in his book. But Jeremiah does give some significant messianic passages: (1) the proclamation of a revelation of God that will outshine the ark of the covenant (3:14–17); (2) the disclosure of a new covenant (31:31–34); (3) the realization of the Mosaic ideal (Ex 19:6) with the fulfillment of the Davidic covenant (33:14–26).

The lasting value of Jeremiah's book lies not only in the allusions (between forty and fifty of them) in the NT (over half are in Revelation) but also in its being a wonderful handbook for learning the art of having fellowship with God. Here is personal faith at its highest in the OT, a veritable gateway to understanding the deeper meaning of the priesthood and the monarchy under the Davidic dynasty (23:1–8; 33:14–18). Indeed, the abundance of bright promises for the nation in chs. 30–33 has led commentators to designate this portion "The Book of Consolation." The most famous passage in Jeremiah's prophecy deals with the new covenant (31:31–34). He does not speak of personal resurrection but of the restoration of Israel.

Because Jeremiah is so unlike any other OT prophet, and because his writings are so inextricably bound up with his life and thought, the student of his prophecy must consider in depth the inner life and characteristics of this man of God, some elements of which have already been lightly touched on. Besides the features of his natural abilities, his emotions, his motivation, and his personal relationship to the Lord, there are the so-called Confessions of Jeremiah, his dialogues with the Lord, his imprecations on his enemies, and especially his prayer life. No

OT prophet has disclosed more of his heart and spiritual yearnings than he. Though he was gentle and timid (but never effeminate, as some have charged), because of the call and commission of God he adamantly held to his duty. He could not be swayed. No one in Judah was more patriotic; yet he never allowed himself to gloss over Judah's sin. His was a lonely and isolated life; though he longed for human fellowship and love, all his life he was denied a family and close friends. In spite of his deep love for his people, he was divinely compelled to proclaim almost monotonously their suffering and national doom. His fellowship with God was particularly deep and intimate. At times this was so frank that many modern students of his book feel he borders on the blasphemous, or at least on the irreverent.

We often forget that Jeremiah was a man of exceptional courage, unwaveringly determined to proclaim God's truth though the entire nation opposed him. Such a stance he maintained at great mental and physical cost. Imagine his agony of heart and mind when he saw his people undeviatingly headed for catastrophe, felt himself powerless to avert it, and was all the while experiencing the relentless opposition of those for whose benefit he was prophesying. These trials and temptations molded him into one of the greatest spiritual giants of all time. Because of his timidity, he was prone to discouragement and despair. The Lord gave him no signs or miracles to confirm the validity of his predictions. At one period of his life, Jeremiah had decided to resign his commission (20:8–9), but the divine compulsion would not let him do it. God had promised to make him an iron pillar and a bronze wall and did not default on his word.

It was apparently natural for Jeremiah to carry on extended dialogues with the Lord. These dialogues are valuable principally because they show how Jeremiah (and other prophets under similar conditions) kept separate his personal consciousness and the message of God (cf. 12:1-6; 14:7–15:21).

Some expositors have expressed their horror at Jeremiah's calls for revenge on his enemies; for them this is the chief blot on his life. But these imprecations are explicable on the same basis as those in the Psalms and should be understood as involving no feeling of personal vindictiveness. Jeremiah knew he was God's messenger; therefore, those who attacked him were arraying themselves against God. Jeremiah's intense fidelity to his God and his longing for the triumph of divine righteousness show that his curses were not so much personal as uttered for the vindication of the glory of the Lord. The OT saints, moreover, had no clear revelation of future retribution.

Nothing is more revealing of a man of God than his prayer life. Jeremiah lived, worked, and wept in an atmosphere of prayer and openness before the Lord. He was so committed to prayer for his wayward people that God had to proscribe such activity by him (7:16; 11:14; 14:11). And he included himself in his prayers: 11:18–20; 12:1–4; 15:10, 15–18; 17:14–18; 18:19–23; 20:7–11, 14–18—passages known as the Confessions of Jeremiah. In them are the most unreserved statements of any prophet in Israel. Other prophets narrate their experiences, but the OT has few parallels to these self-disclosures. In them Jeremiah stands in all his human frailty, his love for his people, and his utter devotion to the will and call of God.

Jeremiah had faith in the Lord and in his ultimate purpose for Israel and the nations. In spite of impending disaster on Judah, he found solid ground for confidence. Through all his denunciations he saw God's final aim to bless his people, whether the remnant in the land or the exiles in Babylon (29:1–14; 32:1–15). His prophecies of Israel's restoration are among the most glowing in the Bible (3:14–18; 30:18–22; 31:1–14; 33:10–13).

Jeremiah manifested a complete frankness with God, concealing from him no emotional reaction or fear. He even questioned the Lord's dealings with him and others (12:1; 15:10–18; 20:7). Moreover, he was able to love everyone (17:7–8). He enjoyed the devotion of Baruch (36:32), the friendship of the high priest Zephaniah (29:24–32), merciful deliverance at the hands of Ebed-Melech the Ethiopian (38:7–13), and the respect of King Zedekiah (38:14–28).

Jeremiah had an intense and unrelenting hatred of sin, rebuking it in scathing words. He scrutinized the political, social, moral, and spiritual life of the people. Prophets, priests, kings, nobles—even relatives—could expect no favoritism from him (cf. 5:1–5; 13:1–14; 23:1–4; 22:13–19).

Jeremiah displayed faith in the indestructibility of Judah, though in his day the nation was headed for judgment. Babylon was irresistible because of the purpose of God, but this never meant extinction of the nation (30:11, 18–22; 31:35–37; 33:19–26). Though considered a traitor by his contemporaries, he had more faith in the nation's future existence than his accusers did (chs. 32 and 37; see also 25:11; 29:7–14).

EXPOSITION

I. Prophecies From the Reign of Josiah (1:1–20:18)

A. The Call and Commission of Jeremiah (1:1–19)

1. The title (1:1–3)

1–2 These verses serve as the title for the entire book. They name the man through whom God gave the prophecies and refer to his home, the period of his main labors, and the chief national event of his times. The more usual formula for the title of a prophecy is "the word of the LORD." Here the term "words" (GK 1821) has a connotation broad enough to include both the prophecies and the events of Jeremiah's life. Jeremiah was a priest by birth but a prophet by calling. The "territory of Benjamin" bordered Judah on the south and Ephraim on the north. The date indicated is not that of Jeremiah's birth but of his call to service, namely, 626 B.C. (cf. 25:3). The call of God came five years before the important reforms of Josiah (2Ki 22–23).

3 The end of Jeremiah's ministry omits the events after the fall of Jerusalem because most of his ministry had already been completed. The reason why Jehoahaz and Jehoiachin are omitted is probably that their reigns lasted so short a time (three months each). Here, then, in Jeremiah's ministry was a service for God of more than two decades and possibly half a century. The Exile to Babylon occurred in the fifth month of 586 B.C. (2Ki 25:4–10).

2. The call of Jeremiah (1:4–10)

4 This verse is the heart of the prophetic experience. Jeremiah's call came not in a vision but by hearing the divine word. Unless the verse denotes inspiration by God, words are meaningless.

5 For Jeremiah to know that his commission was by divine decree, the Lord explained his motivation in accomplishing his purpose through him. Observe the four actions of God toward his prophet. That God "knew" (GK 3359) Jeremiah means not mere cognition but a sense of relationship (Am 3:2) and approval (Ps 1:6). God's claim on his life was prior to all other relationships (cf. Ps 139:13–16; Isa 49:1–5; Gal 1:15). Jeremiah's consecration was his being set apart for a definite spiritual purpose. He was appointed a prophet for a worldwide ministry.

6 Jeremiah, struck with terror over the magnitude of the task, pled his youth and inexperience (cf. Ex 4:10). The Hebrew word for "child" (GK 5853) does not connote a precise definition of age, but we may infer from the length of his ministry that Jeremiah must have been about twenty at the time of his call. Realizing that ability in public speaking was essential to the prophetic office, he stated his lack of eloquence. But what God required for Jeremiah's ministry, which was to be so sad and denunciatory, was a tender heart able to sympathize with the condemned. Little could the young man know how difficult and heartbreaking his task would be.

7–8 God never makes a mistake in choosing his servants. He empowers all he calls and provides the encouragement and help they need. Moreover, God's promise of his presence would dispel Jeremiah's fear, another source of his hesitation. He would be mercilessly opposed and persecuted, but the Lord would preserve him from the attacks of his enemies and give him the moral courage he would so greatly need.

9 As tangible evidence that he had empowered Jeremiah, in a spiritual experience God touched Jeremiah's mouth. Thus he was inspired to speak God's truth. From then on Jeremiah's words would be truly God's, and he would actually become a mouthpiece for God (cf. Isa 6:7).

10 The purposes of God in Jeremiah's ministry are twofold: destructive and constructive. God's word is accompanied with power so that the prophet will accomplish these objectives (Isa 55:10–11). For Jeremiah's ministry, the emphasis is undoubtedly on its destructive element. God's appointment brings with it his commitment of authority to carry out his goals for his prophet.

3. The vision of the almond rod (1:11–12)

11–12 Two visions were granted Jeremiah, evidently to authenticate his call. The first vision was that of an almond tree, which blossoms in January when other trees are still dormant. It is a harbinger of spring, as though it watches over the beginning of the season. So the Lord was watching to bring judgment on Israel's sins. What former prophets had said would come was about to happen. God was prepared to act because of world conditions. The "branch" (GK 5234) symbolizes judgment here, which would soon overtake Israel (cf. Mic 6:9). God keeps his word promptly and works toward an early fulfillment.

4. The vision of the boiling caldron (1:13–19)

13–14 The word "again" shows that the visions are closely related. The first deals with the time of the judgment; the second, with the direction and nature of the coming disaster. A "boiling pot" can only signify calamity. The pot was "tilting away from the north," i.e., facing toward the south, where its contents would be poured out. It would strike from Babylon. Though Babylon is located east of Judah, her armies—and all invading armies from Asia—would invade Palestine from the north because of the impassable Arabian desert. The disaster would engulf the entire land of Judah. The invasion would issue in victory for the enemy.

15–16 The "northern kingdoms" mentioned suit a Babylonian invasion under Nebuchadnezzar. The setting up of the thrones at the gates of Jerusalem, the place of public business, implies complete subjugation (cf. 39:3). Thus from the outset, Jeremiah is a preacher of judgment. As Isaiah speaks of the salvation of the Lord, Ezekiel of the glory of the Lord, and Daniel of the kingdom of the Lord, so Jeremiah incessantly proclaims the judgment of the Lord. The cause of Judah's punishment is stated in three clauses, which describe her idolatry. In a sense Jeremiah's entire book is an elaboration of what 1:16 says about this sin.

17–19 In the remainder of ch. 1, Jeremiah is given strong encouragement for his hard task, because his message would be neither welcome nor popular with his people. To fulfill his duties nothing less than utter commitment to God and to his strength would suffice. With God, Jeremiah would be invincible. In his darkest hours these words sustained him mentally, emotionally, and spiritually. He is commanded to prepare vigorously for action. He would need to rely on a triple defense against his fourfold enemy: kings, officials, priests, and people. The secret of spiritual victory is that Jeremiah is assured success on the condition of faith in God. He ultimately prevailed over all his enemies; and his prophecies were verified, attesting him to be a true prophet of the Lord.

B. Warnings of Judgment on Judah's Sins (2:1–6:30)

Chapters 2–6 form a connected message, coming probably from Josiah's reign, in the early years of Jeremiah's ministry (3:6). They show how little it was in Jeremiah's mind to excuse Judah's sin. The major themes in these five chapters are (1) God's indignation against moral and social sin, (2) his love for his people and land, (3) the certainty of doom on the unrepentant nation, and (4) salvation for the believing.

1. God's controversy with Judah (2:1–37)

No sooner had Jeremiah been appointed to the prophetic office than the Lord's message of condemnation began to sound out in Judah. The foci in this chapter are (1) the sacred love of God for his people and (2) their love of idols.

a. Israel's ingratitude (2:1–8)

1–2 To show the nation how far it had departed from the Lord, Jeremiah recalls their deliverance from Egypt. Like a devoted bridegroom, the Lord says that he still remembers their love as his true bride (cf. Hos 1–3). Proof that Jeremiah is speaking of Israel's love for God is shown by her following him in the desert at the time of their marriage, the period of her faithfulness and devotion to the Lord. Warmth, love, and purity marked her first relationship with the Lord. Apart from the golden-calf incident (Ex 32:1–29), Israel's failures in the desert came from lack of faith rather than outright apostasy.

3 The earliest bond between God and Israel was not only a fragrant remembrance to him but also a sad contrast to her present apostasy. In those early favored days, Israel was set apart as sacred to God, his very firstfruits, because she was the first nation to worship the true God (cf. Ex 19:5–6; Am 6:1). No nation was to trouble Israel because she was dedicated to the Lord. To disobey this prohibition was to incur the wrath of God as in the unauthorized eating of firstfruits (cf. Lev 22:10, 16).

4–5 Because of the covenant relationship, Israel was still under divine protection (cf. Ge 12:1–3). But the strange question in v.5 is intended to awaken the people's consciences. The change in their relationship to God was not his fault but theirs. They had broken the marriage covenant by their infidelity in going after impure lovers. A play on words reveals how worshipers become like the objects they worship. The word "worthless" (GK 2038 & 2039) correctly conveys the idea that the Lord regards idols as without substance or reality (cf. 1Ki 16:13; 1Co 8:4). Jeremiah levels as scathing denunciations against idols as any prophet; idolatry was Israel's chief and besetting sin (see comment on 1:16).

6–7 Israel's attention is directed to the multiplicity of benefits the nation enjoyed at God's hand; yet the people were unmindful of his presence in their midst. They had forgotten their experiences in the desert and the dangers the Lord had graciously brought them through. They were brought to a "fertile land" (lit., "a land of Carmel"), one well cultivated and productive. But the people defiled God's land by their idolatry and immoral practices. Although God gave Israel the land, he had never relinquished his own ultimate ownership of it. In the truest sense, the land was a stewardship to Israel from the Lord.

8 The leaders of the nation, who possibly could have stemmed the tide, are included in the prophet's indictment. They were misleading the people. Jeremiah singles out several groups of leaders. The "priests" were wholly indifferent to God and to his will. Because they dealt with the law, the priests and Levites had well-prescribed regulations for the life of the nation. But in Jeremiah's time they acted as if they did not know the Lord at all. The civil authorities were no better. The "leaders" (Heb., "shepherds"; GK 8286)—i.e., temporal rulers, kings—were adept in violating the law of God. The "prophets" were probably the most culpable. Their high duty was to proclaim the will of God and bring the sinful people back to the Lord.

The priests and prophets were a particular grief to Jeremiah because he was a priest by birth and a prophet by calling. It was his lifelong trial to incur the persistent enmity of both groups. The false prophets, instead of speaking by God's empowerment, spoke for Baal. The reference to Baal here and elsewhere in the prophecy is to idols in general. Properly speaking, Baal (meaning "lord" or "master"), whose personal name was Hadad, was the chief male object of Canaanite (Phoenician) worship. As a nature god, he was the master of storm and fertility; his worship was cruel, degenerate, and unconcerned for human life. Idolatry is always worthless, devoid of any objective reality.

b. Israel's idolatry (2:9–19)

9–12 "Bring charges" (GK 8189) is a legal term for a plaintiff's (in this instance, God) introducing his case in court. The subject of the controversy is Judah's unparalleled idolatry. The people and their children are both included in the indictment. The heart of the contention is clearly stated. God's people have forsaken their living and true God, whereas even nations with false gods stay loyal to their worthless deities. So Judah is exhorted to investigate from Kittim to Kedar to verify the indictment.

Kittim, the Phoenician town Kition in Cyprus, gave its name to the whole island; then, by extension, the name was used for the islands and coasts of the west (see Ge 10:4; NIV note on Eze 27:6). Kedar was the name of an Arab desert tribe, which came to represent people of the eastern desert (Ge 25:13). Thus the nation is urged to observe conditions everywhere.

Mark the horror and amazement of the prophet at the enormity of Judah's apostasy! The people have acted more faithlessly than the pagans. God has not changed, but Judah has—and for what? The Lord himself was her glory. So incredible has this apostasy been that nature is called on to react to it. The heavens themselves are summoned as a witness in the Lord's litigation against his people. Because inanimate nature so consistently obeys God's commands, it is pictured as astounded at Judah's actions.

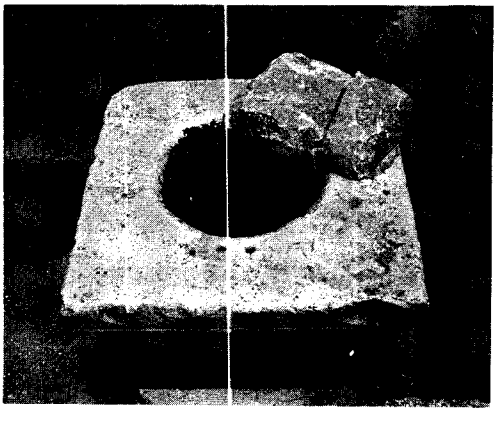
13 Like a lawyer, Jeremiah summarizes his charges: Judah's sin was compounded by rejection of truth and reception of error. The pagan nations had committed the one sin of idolatry, often exchanging one superstition for another. But Judah had exceeded them in disobedience in renouncing her own real God to serve nobodies. Jeremiah's figures are singularly vivid and apt. His nation's God is called the "spring of living water," the source of life, a metaphor often used in Scripture of God, salvation, and Christ (cf. Isa 12:3; 55:1; Jn 4:10–14; 7:37–39). Water was a rare luxury in Palestine, and water from perennial sources was cherished. On the other hand, cisterns could only store rain water. At best, they often yielded stagnant water; at worst, they cracked and allowed the water to seep out. Dead gods cannot impart life.

14 Sin inevitably brings its own punishment. By two forceful questions the Lord points out the consequences of disobedience. A slave or homeborn servant was the master's permanent property (Ex 21:1–6). Since that is so, why, then, has Israel become "plunder" to her enemies, as though her Lord could not protect her? Freed from Egyptian bondage, Israel has enslaved herself by her sins, this time to Assyria and Egypt.



Jeremiah compares the nation of Judah to a broken cistern that cannot hold water—like this one at Susita.

15 To specify how Israel became plunder, Jeremiah reminds the people of the depredations of Assyria and Egypt. The lion, a symbol of Babylon, was also a figure of Assyria; so the reference here could well be to the Assyrian conquest of the Ten Tribes in 722–721 B.C. (2Ki 15:19–20, 29; 17:4–26) and to Assyria's hostility to Judah also (Isa 10:24–32). But Egypt would not stop at exploiting Judah as well; for as Egypt was no help to the northern kingdom against the Assyrians, so it would be no help in Jeremiah's day against the threat of Chaldean power (37:7).

16 The Egyptian cities were Judah's allies on whom she depended. Memphis was the ancient capital of Lower Egypt; Tahpanhes was a fortified city on the northeast border of Egypt, southwest of Pelusium. They "shaved" the crown or scalp of the nation's head; this is probably a reference to Josiah's death at the hands of the Egyptians under Neco (2Ki 23:29). Thus both Assyria and Egypt were detrimental to Judah because they led not only to political slavery but religious disobedience as well.

17–19 With great courage Jeremiah states the cause of the impending judgment. The responsibility for it rests solely on the nation. The people would have to live with the fruit of their evil ways. God's leading was forsaken, so doom would come. Remonstrating with them further, Jeremiah asked whether they had learned nothing from the useless and dangerous game of power politics. Courting Egypt or Assyria was never in Judah's best interests. "Shihor" (meaning "Black River") is the Nile, so called because of its muddy appearance from the black deposit of soil after the annual inundations (cf. Isa 23:3). "The River" is the Euphrates, standing for the nations of Mesopotamia—here the Assyrians.

In Jeremiah's day there were two chief political parties, a pro-Egyptian one and a pro-Assyrian one. Of what help would godless nations be to Judah? Ultimately, her doom would be sealed, not by the presence or absence of treaties with allies, but by her defection from the Lord. The final cause of her calamity would be the hand of God, not the nations he used to punish her. Her great lack was the reverential fear of the Lord.

c. Israel's immorality (2:20–28)

20 Along with Israel's idolatry went unbridled immorality of long standing. "Broke off" indicates that long ago they had thrown off all restraint. In a powerful metaphor, Jeremiah pictures idolatry as adultery. Canaanite worship chose high hills and luxuriant trees to carry out its licentious rites. Judah rebelled against God's service and became a spiritual harlot. Although Jeremiah is speaking primarily of spiritual uncleanness, it must not be forgotten that sexual immorality of the lowest order was always a part of this so-called worship (cf. Hos 4:10–14).

21 Jeremiah changes to the figure of viniculture. God had planted Israel a choice vine, of completely reliable stock (cf. Isa 5:1–7; Eze 17:1–10; Hos 10:1; see also Jn 15:1–8). It was literally a "Sorek Vine," bearing a high-quality red grape. Though planted correctly, the result was corrupt, rotten branches alien to the genuine stock.

22–25 Judah's sins were so deeply ingrained that they were ineradicable. "Soda" is natron, a mineral alkali; "soap" is a vegetable alkali. Outer cleanliness could not hide the people's inner defilement. No amount of outward reform could please God. In spite of their record, the people defended themselves by brazenly denying wrongdoing. How could they claim innocence when they were carrying on their vile worship of Baal in the Valley of Hinnom with their child sacrifices? Shamelessly, like a young she-camel impelled by uncontrolled instinct to find satisfaction, so Judah went to extremes of idolatry, chasing after ever-new objects of worship. Modesty and self-control were gone. As a wild donkey in heat sniffs at the wind to find a male, so the people sought out idols; the idols did not need to woo them. Jeremiah pleads with them not to run their feet bare nor their throats dry in their lust for strange gods. But they reply that they are determined to do so in spite of God's warnings.

26–28 These verses underscore the senselessness of idolatry. The nation is warned that the people are doomed to shame in their idolatry, like a thief caught in the act. The condemnation rests on the same leaders as in v.8. Jeremiah quotes words of idolatrous adoration. What a disgrace that they should give idols the glory that is God's as Creator! The references in v.27 could be to the ritual use of standing stones and wooden pillars or to primitive rites of worship of trees and stones. Having turned completely from the Lord, the people have descended to these depths. But in the hour of their trouble, they find out the worthlessness of their idols and appeal to God for deliverance. In time of trial, people somehow feel that they have a claim on God's help. The bitter irony of v.28 is meant to lead the people to realize the senselessness of trusting nonentities. Their false gods were as numerous as their towns (cf. 11:13).

d. Israel's irrationality (2:29–37)

29–31 In spite of all she has done, Judah thinks she has a case against God. She found fault with him because she could not manipulate him to her pleasure. She murmured at his judgments and chastisement, though the fault was hers. God's visitations were unavailing. Those who sought to lead her back to godliness were slain, as in Manasseh's reign and also in Jehoiakim's (2Ki 21:16; Jer 26:20–23). In seeking to turn Judah from her irrational ways, Jeremiah thunders, "You of this generation." Do the people think God is like a wilderness to them, unable to sustain and nourish their needs? A land of thick darkness with all kinds of imagined dangers? What has moved them to rebel against him, to wander at will? With this as their intention, all moral control and decency are lost.

32–33 The rhetorical question in v.32 focuses attention on the fact that although God is Judah's great adornment, she had forgotten him, though no bride would forget her wedding attire. The number of different Hebrew words in the OT (cf. Isa 3:18–22) used for ornaments shows they were in common use. Judah was without gratitude for God's gifts to her. So abandoned was she that she could even teach wicked women new methods of seduction. She used all kinds of artifices to make herself desirable to her lovers and cared nothing for God's love.

34–37 Social sins, such as the oppression of the poor, inevitably follow spiritual decline. The historic reference could be to Manasseh's reign, but not exclusively so (cf. Am 2:6–8; 4:1; 5:10–12). The victims were "the innocent poor." In spite of all these wicked actions, the nation considered itself innocent—the height of irrationality. Judah's argumentative self-justification will do nothing to avert the visitation of God. It is always easy to justify oneself, no matter how sinful one's life has become.

Jeremiah returns to Judah's determination to make allies to bolster her position in the political world. In the long run, both Egypt and Assyria will disappoint her; no alliance will work out to the nation's benefit. The omnipotent God will overrule all her overtures to her shame, disappointment, and grief.

2. A call to repentance (3:1–25)

The prophecies through ch. 6 are in all probability a condensation of those Jeremiah gave during Josiah's reign. The theme (ch. 2) of the faithless wife of the faithful God is continued in ch. 3, which contains repeated invitations for Judah to repent of her ways.

a. Judah, the faithless wife (3:1–5)

1 The chapter has an unusual beginning because the first word in the Hebrew text is "and saying." Probably the words "The word of the LORD came to me" were inadvertently omitted by an early copyist. The Lord is questioning the nation on the basis of the law of Moses. The law forbade the remarriage of a man with his divorced wife, even if her second husband had died or divorced her (Dt 24:1–4). The purpose of the law was to curb the husband's arbitrary use of his right to divorce his wife. But with the Lord's people, the case was different on more than one count. They had not been divorced at all but had played the harlot. Furthermore, they had sought out not one lover (god) but many. It is perhaps too much to say that the Lord did not recognize the claim of both Egypt and Assyria on Israel as their wife; but since Israel had left God for pagan lovers, God would abide by the law of divorce, relinquishing his right to receive her back.

The verb "return" (GK 8740) in the last line of v.1 may allow for more than one rendering. If it is taken as an imperative, then the Lord is calling the nation to penitence in spite of the gravity of her sins. If the clause is interpreted as a question, then the sense is "Would you now return to me [in spite of all you have done]?" (so NIV). The second view emphasizes the legal prohibition of the restoration of the union. Judah, unfaithful in the marriage relationship, had no right to return to the Lord. Her pollution because of idolatry would make a reconciliation all but impossible. The broken bond was irreparable.

It is hard to see, however, how the Lord would be declaring a reconciliation impossible when, throughout the remainder of the chapter, he is pleading for that very thing in urging Judah to repent. Even the question form of the last clause can be understood to impress Judah that it would be no light thing, considering her many offenses, for God to reclaim her. God is not indignantly rejecting the possibility of her return. We must never forget that God, as he wills, exercises grace beyond the law. Ruth was a Moabite woman and was excluded from Israel (cf. Dt 23:3); how then does she become the ancestress of David and of the Lord Jesus? God operated by grace beyond the law. So God was ready to forgive Judah in spite of all her past failures. Legal claims to the contrary, God calls Judah to the solution to her predicament—namely, repentance.

2 But God's people must see that their return to the Lord does not permit continuance in sin. Their abandonment to idolatry was notorious. They had waited for lovers by the way as marauding Bedouin bandits of the desert waited for passersby to plunder. Their desire for idolatry was insatiable. Again, immoral practices were an integral part of the pagan fertility cult. Since God could not tolerate such disobedience, he chastised his people. As Moses had warned, sin would cause the withdrawal of God's prosperity of the land.

3 The rains are vital in a dry land. The early rains fell about October/November and the latter rain (for the maturing of the crops) fell in March/April (cf. Dt 11:10–17). But because of the nation's impudence, the discipline was ineffective. Natural providences that were meant to bring the nation to repentance were without success.

4–5 Instead of truly turning to the Lord, the people felt that a mere avowal of allegiance to him would suffice. The nation claimed that from then on—i.e., in the days of Josiah's reform—the Lord would be their sole guide and companion. The term "father" (GK 3) was sometimes used by a young wife of her husband. The Hebrew word denotes a husband and companion ("friend"). But the reformation was more apparent than genuine. The people's crying to God was empty lip service because they continued in their wickedness. Moreover, they were building on false hopes that God's anger would not last; so they persisted in wickedness to the limit of their power, evidently convinced that God's wrath would subside regardless of what they did.

b. Judah worse than Israel (3:6–10)

6 To show the gravity of Judah's spiritual condition, Jeremiah compares it with that of exiled Israel, the northern kingdom. The captivity of that nation should have been a warning to Judah, but the example had been lost on her. In spite of her sins, Judah considered herself favored beyond the possibility of judgment on her. How vividly this shows that Josiah's reformation was superficial and short-lived! Jeremiah uses strong language, calling the northern kingdom "faithless Israel." She had become apostasy personified. Thus Judah had learned nothing from the tragic fate of Israel, whose apostasies had led her into exile.

7–10 Furthermore, it was not as though the Lord had not shown patience with the northern kingdom, for he had waited for her to repent. But she did not. And Judah, called in v.10 "unfaithful," witnessed these dealings and their consequences but remained unmoved. The Lord used the metaphor of divorce to describe the captivity for Israel (cf. Dt 24:1–3). If anything, Judah tried to outdo her sister, Israel. Idolatry and immorality seemed trivial to her; she gave herself to idols of stone and wood, with all their base fertility rites. In Canaanite religion the main emphasis was on fertility and sex. Worship was entered into to ensure the fertility of the land, the animals, and the people. Sacred prostitution was practiced widely. Among the sacred objects were stone altars and the sacred tree or grove.

The Hebrew word underlying NIV's "mattered so little" can mean either "light" or "sound." In view of the context, the latter seems preferable, i.e., that Judah's immorality only sounded before God but went unnoticed by Judah herself. To make matters worse, Judah pretended repentance under the reforms of Josiah (cf. 2Ki 23; 2Ch 34–35). Such falsity could not hoodwink God. Apostasy Israel and Treachery Judah were spiritual sisters, and the latter was worse than the former.

c. The call to return (3:11–14a)

11 In this section and the next, Jeremiah proclaims to the northern kingdom of Israel both a call to repent and a promise of restoration. First he gives a summary statement that, in view of what has been said, has only one logical conclusion: Apostate Israel was more righteous than treacherous Judah (cf. Eze 23:11). The northern kingdom did not have the example of judgment before her as Judah did; therefore Israel was less guilty. Also, only one of Israel's kings (Jehoahaz) is said to have sought the Lord, and that only when in distress because of the Syrian invasion (2Ki 13:1–5). Furthermore, Judah had greater privileges with a divinely appointed king and a revealed priestly service, together with the example of the kingdom of Israel.

12–13 The Lord calls Israel to return, for there was still hope for her. This call is directed toward the north, toward Assyria, where the Ten Tribes had been for about a century. Not all of the northern kingdom had been carried away; a remnant was left that mingled with the expatriated Assyrians to form the Samaritans. God promises not to retain his anger toward them, for though less guilty than Judah, they had no claim on restoration. It was all of grace. Such a call to return was meant to provoke Judah to jealousy. Mark well that Israel, contrary to many erroneous views, had not assimilated into the surrounding nations (cf. Jas 1:1).

Judah must recognize that the prerequisite for pardon and blessing was acknowledgment of her sins. There must be no palliation of them but a confession that she had scattered her favors among foreign gods, all the while heedless of God's voice.

14a Again the Lord summons Israel to return. The context is one of tenderness and regard for the intimate relationship between the Lord and his people. The ground of the plea is still the indissoluble marriage bond entered into at Sinai with the nation. Actually, a double figure is employed: Israel is both son and wife. Restatement of the marriage bond indicates acceptance with God.

d. Future blessing (3:14b–18)

14b The Lord promises that even if those who return to him are few, he will bring them back to Zion. The paucity of their numbers will not hinder the Lord's purpose for them. The word "clan" is not to be understood in the restricted sense of a "family" but of a people or tribe. No matter how small, a remnant will return; God's message of pardon is ultimately on the basis of individual response to him.

15 Once back in the land, the nation will need godly rulers; and this the Lord promises them. These "shepherds" (GK 8286; cf. "leaders" in 2:8; 23:4) will govern with knowledge, i.e., in the fear of the Lord. In contrast to the corrupt leaders of Jeremiah's day, they will conform to the mind and will of God.

16 In the time of their restoration to the land, the Lord's people will increase greatly (cf. 23:3). The phrase "in those days" (vv.16, 18) clearly refers to messianic times (cf. 30:24; 21:27, 29, 31, 33, 38). In that era of blessing, no one will even mention the ark of the covenant of the Lord. The worship of God will need no visible aids, for God will dwell among his people. The ark was the center of the religious life of God's people and the place where the high priest offered the blood of the sacrifice on the Day of Atonement. The old economy is to be dissolved. The old covenant, of which the ark was a central feature, is to give way to another—a preview of 31:31–34.

17 In the same vein, Jeremiah predicts that Jerusalem will be known as "The throne of the LORD." The ark of the tabernacle and temple represented God's throne on earth (Ex 25:22; 1Sa 4:4). Neither Israel nor the nations will then be misled into idolatry. Israel purged of idolatry will be a witness and blessing to all the nations (Ps 67).

18 United to God in holiness of life, Jeremiah predicts the two long-divided parts of the nations will finally be reunited to dwell in the land promised to the patriarchs (cf. Eze 37). In summary, the elements of the promise are godly leaders, absence of outward elements of worship, the dwelling of God's presence with them, a godly life, a successful witness to the nations, and a unified nation.

e. Israel's disobedience (3:19–20)

19–20 From this point to the end of the chapter, there is an extended dialogue between God and Israel. God's love and favor met with Israel's ingratitude and disobedience. His intention was to give them a place as if they were sons. As a daughter, Israel was to receive an inheritance like that of sons, an event that was contrary to Hebrew practice (cf. Nu 27:1–8). Their legacy was the land of Palestine. But they had to match their words with their deeds. They would enter into the promise only when they practiced what they professed. But again they disappointed all expectations and committed treachery. What a contrast between God's hopes for them and what happened! From the rosy prospects of the future, Israel must be called back to the present.

f. Exhortation to repentance (3:21–25)

21 The prophet turns to the nation's avowal of repentance. Where they had so flagrantly carried on their idolatries, the people now lamented for their transgressions. Since their sin was public and prominent, so would their cries of penitence be (cf. 31:15).

22–23 In response to their genuine repentance, the Lord promised to heal the wounds his people had acquired in their apostasy (cf. 30:17; 33:6; Hos 14:4). Their answer showed the depth and reality of their penitence; they accepted the Lord's offer of pardon. Once more the way to ruin and the way of deliverance are stated. Idolatry with its wild and clamorous excesses is the way of death (cf. 1Ki 18:21–29), but the way of salvation and life is in the Lord (Ps 3:8; Jnh 2:9).

24–25 At last the people were convinced that idolatry has been their undoing. The "shameful" thing is Baal, the god of shame (cf. 11:13). How costly their idolatry was in terms of property and even more in terms of the sacrifices of their sons and daughters! And the malady was of long standing. So at the end of the chapter, we see the nation totally cast down by her sin and willing to endure the grief it had caused, lying prostrate on the ground.

3. The invasion from the north (4:1–31)

The preceding chapter closed on a note of confession on the part of the people. But vv.1–4 here show that the reform under Josiah was only superficial. More, much more, was needed.

a. The call to genuine repentance (4:1–4)

1–2 The people's cry of anguish (3:24–25) is answered by the Lord with an assurance of blessing when they do return to him. There is a vast difference between perfunctory repentance and heartfelt restoration to God. If Judah would truly repent, it must be to God alone. Furthermore, they must rid themselves of their detestable things, their idols. Evidently they had not yet done this. Moreover, if the people would remain steadfast (on their oath in the name of the Lord) in the essential qualities of truth, justice, and righteousness, then their example would profoundly affect the nations. Judah's conversion would herald blessing for the nations. To swear by God's name involves recognition of him as Lord. When the nations are being blessed, the Abrahamic blessing is being realized (cf. Ge 12:3; 18:18; 22:18; 26:4; 28:14).

3–4 Jeremiah uses two figures to show the nation's need of spiritual renewal: one from agriculture and the other from physiology. He exhorts the people of Judah to break up their neglected and untilled hearts. No farmer will sow seed on unplowed ground. So the plow of repentance and obedience was needed to remove the outer layer of weeds and thorns that had resulted from idolatry.

Again, Jeremiah calls for repentance—this time under the figure of circumcision. The hard encrustation on their hearts must be cut away. Outward ritual must be replaced by inward reality. The only alternative to obedience was the wrath of God. Jeremiah everywhere underscores the necessity for the new heart (cf. ch. 31).

b. The enemy on the way (4:5–18)

5–6 The remainder of this chapter concerns vivid portrayals of the invasion of the land, the siege of Jerusalem, the devastation of the land, and the decimation of the population. So certain is the judgment that Jeremiah sees the imminent invasion as already present. From v.5 on, the prophet is explicit in his warnings to the nation of calamity coming from the north. Since the siege is imminent, the people are warned to take refuge. The trumpet signals the danger. The fortified cities served as refuge for the fleeing rural population. The signal to point the way to Zion was well advised because the city was so strongly fortified. The "disaster from the north" tallies with what is known of the Babylonian invasion under Nebuchadnezzar.

7–9 Jeremiah compares the invaders to a "lion," a "scorching wind" or sirocco (v.11), and watchers or besiegers (v.16). The lion represented the Assyrians and Babylonians (here the latter; see comment on 2:15). So great was the Babylonian military prowess that the other nations feared it. For Judah Babylon's power would mean disaster to the land, its cities, and its citizenry (cf. 43:5–7).

The prophet encourages the people to lament, for there is no possibility of escaping the visitation. Unrepentant, the nation could only expect doom. Until their sins received their merited punishment, the blow could not be deflected from them. In the hour of distress, the very ones who should encourage the nation—king, princes, priests, and prophets—would be devoid of courage. The reference to their "losing heart" is not to a failure in understanding but rather to failure in stamina and valor.

10 At first reading, it appears that Jeremiah is blaming God for deceiving the nation. In the light of Jas 1:13, such action is impossible. The difficulty is not resolved by attributing the deception to the prophet's attempt to mislead the people by speaking God's message to them, for at no time had Jeremiah prophesied that Jerusalem would have peace. His message was always the opposite. The solution lies in the way the Jews spoke of evil in a world ruled by a righteous and holy God. God is said to do what he permits. Scripture often omits second causes and relates everything to God as the First Cause (cf. Ex 9:12; 1Ki 22:21–23; Eph 1:11; 2Th 2:11). The false prophets had spoken deceptively to the people; they had misled the people into false hopes; and God had permitted it all. Instead of peace, destruction faced Judah.

11–18 In a sense v.10 is parenthetical, for the prophet continues his portrayal of the invading army. With the approach of the enemy, the news will be carried by messengers in the way shown here. The foe is likened to the "scorching wind" from the desert that withers vegetation and brings discomfort to humankind. For winnowing and cleansing, a much less vehement wind is needed. Its purpose is not to sift but to judge; it does not separate good from bad but takes everything away. All would happen at God's command. Vivid metaphors—"clouds," "whirlwind," "eagles"—depict the Babylonian army with its chariots and war horses. No wonder the people cried out that they were ruined.

Even at that late hour there was still opportunity for repentance. Prophecies of judgment are conditional; obedience to God reverses the threat of judgment. But there must be inner cleansing, even of the thought life, if disaster was to be averted. The Lord's patience was wearied with Judah's continued unfaithfulness; so he asked how long their minds would be centered on wickedness. The need for repentance was urgent. The foe was near; there was little time left to return to God. Dan was the northern boundary of the land; Mount Ephraim was the northern border of Judah, not far from Jerusalem. The invaders were making rapid progress.

So unprecedented was the fate that would overtake God's people that the nations are called on to witness the judgment soon to fall on Judah. Resistance had not availed against the invaders; so they are finally seen besieging the capital, Jerusalem. As watchmen guard their fields from predatory animals, so Jerusalem would be surrounded to cut off any who would escape. All has come on her because of her own wickedness and rebellion. The calamity is bitter to bear because the people now realize that they have brought it on themselves. Their wounds are serious, reaching to the heart.

c. The agony of Jeremiah (4:19–22)

19–22 These verses express Jeremiah's personal involvement with the calamity of his people. The scene is so real to him that he cries out in physical pain. His profound emotion affects him physically. His personal anguish over the impending destruction is inescapable. So wholesale is the destruction that Jeremiah cannot suppress his deep sympathy with those he must denounce in obedience to the Lord's commission. Though he was accused of treason later, how can anyone reasonably deny the patriotism and love of Jeremiah for his people? Fellowship with God and obedience to his service always sharpen the sensibilities of his servants. Thus the prophet agonizes in soul and can scarcely endure the scene of judgment on his people. He longs to know the end of the travail; so the Lord answers that the trial will continue as long as they persist in disobeying him. Their trouble is that they have no fellowship with the Lord in doing his will. Their moral values are completely reversed: they major in evil and minor in good.

d. The cosmic catastrophe (4:23–26)

23–26 This beautiful vignette has been acclaimed one of the most forceful passages in all prophetic literature. For vividness, simplicity, directness, breadth of reference, and gravity of subject matter, the verses are unique in Scripture. From a contemplation of Israel's calamity, the prophet is led by the Spirit who inspired him to witness cosmic catastrophe. Chaos engulfs the physical world. It is the story of Ge 1 in reverse. It may describe the coming Day of the Lord. All nature is in upheaval, and no area of life is left untouched. The apocalyptic overtone is unmistakable.

e. The desolation of the land (4:27–31)

27 Again, Jeremiah must impress his hearers with the actuality of the coming doom. The thrust of the passage is that the die is cast, and nothing can reverse the decree. Jeremiah puts in prophetic discourse what he saw in spirit. A ray of hope is held out: though the calamity will be real enough, the Lord will not allow it to accomplish the complete dissolution of the nation. There will be no reenactment of Sodom and Gomorrah's destruction (cf. Lev 26:44; Isa 6:13; Am 9:8; Mic 5:6–7). God is committed to preserving a remnant of his people.

28–31 Because God purposes grace toward the nation, none of the people should presume that judgment would not fall. The decision was irrevocable; the fulfillment came in 586 B.C. For this destruction of the land, the very heavens and earth would mourn. The Babylonians took over the military strategy of the Assyrians, becoming adept bowmen. Before such an adversary the only course would be to escape to the rocky hills; the whole city of Jerusalem would be deserted. The desperate condition of Israel is finally pictured under the figure of a harlot who even in her desperate hour still tries to allure the enemy by her wiles. Her "lovers" (lit., "paramours") are unimpressed and despise her. Jeremiah depicts her final agonies under the figure of a miscarriage of a first child with the mother in her final gasps for breath. Though undeserving, the nation will not find Jeremiah deaf to her agonizing cries. The courtesan will be murdered by her lovers, but the prophet enters completely into her plight.

4. Judah's total corruption (5:1–31)

This chapter reveals Jerusalem under moral investigation. A superficial reading of the earlier chapters of the prophecy might lead one to conclude that the nation has been charged with all it has been guilty of. But the depths of her sin against the Lord must be reviewed at length. The nation must come to a much fuller realization of her ingrained sin. The desperately low spiritual state of the nation must be brought under the searchlight of God's scrutiny. Moreover, her sin must be judged in view of her continued refusal to heed the Lord's gracious calls to repent and so avert disaster. What a telling portrayal of unrelieved apostasy!

a. The bill of particulars (5:1–9)

1–3 Investigation, full and impartial, must always precede indictment on a legal bill of particulars. The object of the search was to find one righteous person. For such a person who practiced justice and made truth (faithfulness) the goal of his life, the Lord promised to pardon Jerusalem. There may be an allusion here to Abraham's intercession for Sodom (Ge 18:23 33). Although Jeremiah's statement was justified, obviously some godly people like Josiah, Baruch, Zephaniah, and Jeremiah himself were living in Jerusalem. But the words certainly applied to the mass of the populace. In short, corruption was so widespread that exceptions were not significant (cf. Ps 14). The reference to those who said, "As surely as the LORD lives," does not mitigate the severity of Jeremiah's statement. Their oath was a spurious profession of piety. They used the most binding and the right form of oath, but their conduct showed it to be perjury. Even God's severe chastisements made no difference in their lives.

4–5 Jeremiah thought of extenuating circumstances for the plight of his people. The population was generally poor; their poverty kept them from opportunities of learning the way of the Lord. In his disappointment, the prophet had thought that the situation might be different among the nation's leaders. But a higher station in life did not mean greater piety. The great had thrown off all restraint, placing themselves above the law. The great and learned were no more open than the poor and ignorant. All classes were alike implicated. Judgment must follow.

6 Jeremiah uses three predators—"a lion," "a wolf," and "a leopard"—to portray the imminent judgment. Probably the beasts symbolize the Babylonians. The lion represents strength, the wolf ravenousness, and the leopard swiftness—all traits of Babylonians.

7–9 God reasons with his people to convince them of the justice of his judgments. His bounty to the people evoked not gratitude but a greater desire for idolatry. Material blessings only made them feel secure in their sins. Idolatry is always accompanied by immorality. Apostasy and adultery are a horrendous pair. Publicly and unashamedly the people thronged to the prostitutes' house, i.e., the idol temple; but their actions were not confined to apostasy but included physical immorality. Orgiastic rites accompanied the idolatry of Jeremiah's times. Notice how largely this chapter is concerned with the social sins of the people. In v.9 the Lord asks the nation whether he is not punishing them justly.

b. Denial of the Lord's activity (5:10–13)

10 The result of such ungodliness must be the outpouring of the divine wrath. Thus the Lord gives the people over to the attacks of their foes. The call is from God to Israel's enemies (cf. v.15). The Lord is prepared to have his vineyard destroyed. The branches are to be stripped off because they are fruitless and no longer belong to the Lord. But because God has not forgotten that he promised Abraham an eternal nation, he will not allow the complete destruction of his people. The stripping away the branches is a full pruning, not a complete desolation. Only the branches are involved, not the root or stock. God always intended a remnant of his people to survive.

11–12 In presenting the reason for the punishment he has just announced, Jeremiah includes both parts of the nation—Israel and Judah. Although the destruction would not be absolute, it was amply warranted. Treacherously, the people tried to minimize the Lord's warnings. First, they brazenly lied about him. They scornfully said, "He will do nothing!" God, they thought, would not bring calamity on them. The Lord was not, they assumed, responsible for either their blessing or their trials; so they claimed to have nothing to fear. When told that disaster was impending, their response was that God would do no such thing (cf. Zep 1:12). So they denied God's intervention and even his interest in their ways. They were practical atheists.

13 In the second place, the people rejected the validity of God's word given through his prophets. They claimed that the Spirit in the prophets of the Lord was only wind. There is a play here on the Hebrew word ruah, which can mean "wind" or "spirit" (GK 8120). The prophets believed they had the Spirit of the Lord; the people claimed the prophets had only wind. Thus the people denied the inspiration of the message of God through Jeremiah. To label a prophet of God "wind" is the ultimate in irreverence. And the people had the effrontery to say that the judgment the prophets threatened would descend on the prophets themselves.

c. The judgment described (5:14–19)

14 Because the people denied the validity of the Lord's word to his prophets, the Lord determined to make that word a fire in Jeremiah's mouth to consume them. What they considered to be nothing more than wind, God would energize like fire. Though spoken by Jeremiah, they were still God's words. To make this pronouncement, the solemn, august name of God is used ("the LORD God Almighty"). God is the self-existent One, Commander of all the armies of heaven and earth. Here is expressed God's power over all created intelligences in the universe, a reference to the armies of Israel (Ex 7:4), the heavenly hosts (Ps 103 21), and the stars (Isa 40:26). God's word is never to be trifled with.

15–16 Jeremiah addresses the whole nation as he begins to describe the invading enemy. The description of the foe is both accurate and detailed; they were distant, ancient, enduring, unintelligible in speech, and deadly in war. The description points to the Babylonians. Distance would be no obstacle to the invaders because of their persevering and determined nature. The invaders would be an enduring, hardy people, used to war. The foe would be an ancient nation, for the national entity (to which the Chaldeans were later joined) was founded by Nimrod (cf. Ge 10:10, 11:31). Jeremiah emphasizes that the enemy would speak a language Israel did not understand. Thus the invaders would be the more fearful and unfeeling because they would not respond to cries for mercy. Finally, they would be invincible because their quivers would be filled with death-dealing arrows, always bringing more destruction. Every arrow could be depended on to slay someone.

17–18 Having so explicitly described the invaders' power, Jeremiah paints a vivid picture of the devastation they would wreak on the land. He adds a final blow to loss of harvest, children, flocks, herds, vines, and trees—the impoverishment and demolition of the fortified cities. Yet, in accord with v.10, the destruction would not be total. God's punishments are not vindictive but are meant to be restorative of the sinner. God must, and does, preserve a remnant according to his pledged word.

19 There is a direct relation between the nation's sin and its punishment—recompense in kind (Dt 28:47–48). The Exile is foretold. Because the people worshiped foreign gods in the Lord's land, they would have to serve foreign overlords in a foreign land. It was useless for them to inquire, as if they were blameless, why judgment had descended on them. The root of their difficulties was their slip into idolatry.

d. Israel's willful ignorance and rebellion (5:20–31)

20–21 This double exhortation is addressed to hearers concerned for their nation. Such a call to "announce" and "proclaim" the word of God occurs nowhere else in the book. They are to proclaim that moral blindness and deafness have kept the people from realizing their perilous state. The words Jeremiah uses refer to the people who had become like the idols they worshiped. The language is purposely blunt to awaken them to their dangerous condition.

22 God is to be adored and served because he controls the raging sea, the mightiest force in creation. Moreover, he does so by the most unlikely of restraining forces, the sand. Though small, sand can and does set a bound to the violence of the sea. If God can restrain the sea, surely he can restrain the invader. Israel is senseless to rebel against him.

23–25 Although the sea remains within its appointed limits, Israel has revolted against the Lord. The people have overstepped God's moral limits. Furthermore, they are blind to their dependence on God's providence. They do not see the hand of the Lord even in the balance of rain for harvest and his withholding it in times of his displeasure. The "regular weeks of harvest" are the seven weeks between the Feast of Passover and the Feast of Weeks (Lev 23:15–16). As Creator, God has control over the rain as he does over the sea. The withholding of seasonal rains was attributable to their sinfulness.

26–29 Three classes of people are arraigned before the divine justice: the rich oppressors of the poor, the lying prophets, and the time-serving priests (v.31). The wicked rich have acquired their wealth by deceit and heartless oppression of the poor and helpless. As a fowler snares birds by devices, so the people accumulate wealth by deceit. The trap was probably a clapnet as represented on Egyptian monuments. In those days fowlers would place several tame birds in a cage; when the wild birds saw them, they lighted on the cage, falling into the snare. The heartless aristocracy had wealth enough, but they were not satisfied. Prosperity did not bring piety. In fact, they excused their wicked deeds on the flimsiest grounds. They could not have troubled themselves less over whether the cause of the orphan was maintained. Jeremiah asked whether for sins like theirs, the people could possibly believe God would overlook inevitable judgment.

30–31 Jeremiah, viewing the moral wreckage, exclaims over the astonishing and horrible things transpiring in the land. Those who should have been the chief moral backbone of the nation had treacherously denied the Lord's commitment to them. Foremost among the guilty were the false prophets, whose rosy predictions led the nation to its final doom in 586 B.C. Next to them were the spineless priests, who ruled "by their own authority." So the chapter closes with the tragic statement that those entrusted with the spiritual welfare of the nation were unworthy of their positions. Worse yet, the people were so unaware of the issues that they acquiesced in all that their leaders did. The people had lost all sense of moral values and did not realize they were being duped. They cherished their false security. But the final question is, In the time of retribution, when the calamity would strike, then what would they do?

5. The siege and fall of Jerusalem foretold (6:1–30)

The striking feature of this chapter is its rapidity of movement, leading to the gathering storm of invasion soon to engulf the capital and the land. It has been called a chapter of alarms; it begins on a note of impending doom and concludes with the utter rejection of the people.

a. The approach of the invaders (6:1–5)

1–3 The doom is so near that Jeremiah sees the invasion as already in progress. The attack comes from the north. Jeremiah calls the people to flee for safety. The city is no longer safe; it is soon to undergo a siege. The way to safety is only by flight. The people could never plead that they had not been fully warned. Benjamin is mentioned because geographically Jerusalem belonged to that territory. It was settled by Judeans and Benjamites (cf. 1Ch 9:3), separated by the Valley of Hinnom. Moreover, Jeremiah was a Benjamite and had strong ties with his own tribesmen.

Two means of warning were the trumpet call and the fire signal. Tekoa, twelve miles south of Jerusalem, was the home of the prophet Amos (cf. 2Sa 14:2; Am 1:1). Tekoa was the last town in Judah on the edge of the desert. The "signal" or "beacon" was to show the way. Such fire signals were used in military communication. Beth Hakkerem (lit., "house of the vineyard") is mentioned only here and at Ne 3:14. The people are to flee south because invasion threatens from the north. The disaster is personified: it "looms" or looks down on its prey.

Destruction is to fall on Zion, pictured as a beautiful and delicate woman. By a sudden change of figure, the invaders are portrayed as shepherds and their armies as flocks. They denude the land, everyone "tending [i.e., devastating] his own portion" (lit., "what has been assigned him"). This is not a picture of a horde of nomads trying to starve the city.

4–5 Jeremiah next presents a consultation of the enemies of Judah. Their speech reveals haste, impatience, and thirst for destruction. The army will brook no delay in taking the city. The call to prepare for battle included offering sacrifices and performing religious ceremonies because Israel had a religious view of war and considered it a sacred service undertaken in the Lord's name (cf. 1Sa 25:28). Though the enemy here is the Babylonian army, the Babylonians too had a religious concept of war. So eager is the enemy to destroy Jerusalem that they decide to make a surprise attack at noon, when soldiers would normally be resting. But the light is fading; so they must make a night attack. They will be satisfied with nothing less than the destruction of Jerusalem's fortresses.

b. The siege of Jerusalem (6:6–8)

6–8 The Lord appears to be leading the assault against Jerusalem by using the enemy as his agent of judgment. The early preparations for the siege include felling trees for bulwarks and building siege works. Mounds of earth were also heaped up to make them level with the walls to facilitate entry into the city. Again, the Lord reminds the people that the cause of judgment lay in Judah. Jerusalem, blessed of God for some four centuries, is now characterized as oppressive. As a well keeps its water cool and fresh, so Judah seems incapable of anything but sin. The cry of the oppressed is regularly heard in Jerusalem. All her troubles come from her persistence in sin. The Lord sees the people's spiritual sickness as unchanged. But in his infinite grace he warns them before it is too late. While there is still a ray of hope, he warns the people of the doom awaiting their continued defiance in their sin. Reluctant to part from his people, the Lord must issue another call to repent.

c. The fall of the city (6:9–15)

9 Once more Israel is viewed in the figure of a vineyard (cf. 5:10). A thorough gleaning, a complete devastation, awaits them. The Lord authorizes the enemy even to search out the remnant to take them captive—the enemy will not be satisfied with one invasion but will repeat it. The northern tribes may be implied by the main gathering of grapes. Judah, left as a remnant, is now also to be gleaned. The enemy leader is exhorted to pass over the branches repeatedly, lest any grapes be overlooked.

10 Responding to the nation's unbelief, Jeremiah identifies himself with the Lord in speaking of the people's obtuseness to his word. In fact, they regard it with contempt. To warn them further is useless; their ears are "closed." They resolutely refuse to listen to God. Here is the first hint of the lack of response of the nation to Jeremiah's message.

11 Regardless of success or failure, Jeremiah's duty was to preach the Lord's message. Whether the people listened or not, he was divinely compelled to voice the Lord's indignation. Full of the divine wrath, he was commanded to pour it out on everybody—children, young men, married couples, the elderly—all were involved in the city's doom. Even the children and the aged were to be shown no mercy. The wrath was evoked by the sins now set forth: greed (v.13), deceitful prophecy (vv.13–14), loathsome deeds and shamelessness (v.15), obduracy (vv.16–17), rejection of the law (vv.18–19), and worthless sacrifices (v.20).

12–13 With the conquest of Jerusalem, houses, fields, and wives also would be violently given away to others. This is exactly what Moses had warned about. (Verses 12–15 are repeated in 8:10–12.) The entire gamut of society coveted gain. Because of their greed the people would lose everything. The blame lay largely with the priests and prophets who held out false hopes to the people regardless of the way they lived. Those whose integrity should have been exemplary practiced deceit.

14–15 Another sin was false optimism, listening to baseless promises of peace when there was no ground for it. The priests and prophets, physicians of no value ("they dress the wound of my people as though it were not serious"), misled the people. Only superficially did they heal the wound (lit., "the breach") between God and Judah. Their stock in trade was constant babbling that all was well (cf. Mic 3:5), making nothing of the people's heinous sin.

Lulled into complacency, the people lost all sense of shame for their abominable deeds. Insensitive to wrong, they were so hardened in sin that their hearts were no longer open to the message of truth. As for those who misled them, they were to share the fate of the nation they duped.

d. The cause for judgment (6:16–21)

16–17 The people's judgment was for their straying from the ways of the patriarchs into the ways of idolatry. Jeremiah pictures travelers who have lost their way; when they arrive at crossroads, the moment calls for clear decision. To go one way can mean death; to go another, life. "The ancient paths" and "the good way" are the same; they are the way of repentance, reconciliation, fear, and love of God. They were the ways of the Mosaic tradition. The result of walking in the way of obedience was peace and rest of soul (cf. Mt 11:28–29). But the people refused to walk in the ancient paths. The Lord even sent prophets as watchmen to warn them of impending danger (cf. Eze 3:17; 33:7). The nation obeyed neither the admonition nor the message of the prophets. God always gives ample warning of coming judgment. The people's disobedience was threefold: (1) they were unfaithful to the covenant bond with God; (2) they were unheeding of the warnings of the true prophets; and (3) they rejected the law (v.19).

18–20 God calls on the nations and all the earth to see how fully his people deserve their punishment. The Gentiles are being alerted to what is to happen to Judah. They will witness the righteous consequences of Judah's wicked deeds—her public humiliation. When sin is not forsaken, sacrifices are useless. This does not mean that Jeremiah was against sacrifices; he was only against unethical sacrifices. Incense came from Sheba, southwest of Arabia. Cane or calamus probably came from India and was used in making the holy anointing oil (Ex 30:23). These ingredients of worship were costly because they were brought from a great distance. But they were of no value when they were part of heartless, godless offerings. In themselves, sacrifices were never efficacious; all the prophets who speak of them as used in heartless worship deny them validity. Jeremiah's statement is all the more remarkable since he was a priest by birth.

21 The last verse of this section has been erroneously understood as saying that God placed stumbling blocks in the nation's way to bring about her eternal doom. But this is not at all the meaning. The "obstacles" refer to the Babylonians, who were the instruments to bring about Judah's physical destruction; they were not agents to effect her moral fall. The stress is on the general operation of God's moral law. In contrast to the rest promised in v.16, which they rejected, the people will meet with destruction that will engulf them all—from father to son and neighbor to friend. All will suffer the consequences of their wicked acts.

e. The terror of the enemy forces (6:22–30)

22–23 The direction "the north," from which the enemy will come, is again given. They will come from the remote parts of the then-known earth. The prophet describes their weaponry, cruelty, vigor, speed, and readiness for war against Zion. In their cruelty the Babylonians remind us of the Assyrians (Jnh 3:8). To burn prisoners in a furnace, impale them, and flay them alive were common occurrences in Babylonian wars. Their shouts in battle were like the roaring sea. The war horses seem to have been new to the nation, which was used to the war chariots of the Egyptians rather than to cavalry.

24–26 Jeremiah goes on to describe Judah's response to the news of the invading Babylonians. As one of the people, he expresses his emotions and theirs at the report that the enemy is actually attacking. There is no power in the people to resist; they are limp. Because "there is terror on every side," the people are warned not to go in undefended places, for to do so would mean death. Their trials are likened to the pain of childbirth and the death of an only son, leaving no one to carry on the family name. Among Jews death is always viewed as a calamity; and when an only son dies, it means the end of "immortality" for the parents, and the blow is unbearable. The destroyer will come suddenly on Judah; though they had been repeatedly warned, the people will find themselves unprepared because of their faith in false hopes.

27–30 The last verses of this chapter focus on the nation's incorrigibility. So that no one may think God has not given the people every chance, he is willing to have them tested for any merit or worth that may be in them. Therefore he informs Jeremiah that he is to act as a tester and assayer of the moral worth of Judah. Jeremiah evaluates them as the rebellious of the rebellious, i.e., "hardened rebels." They are entirely of inferior metal—bronze and iron, not silver and gold. And though the refining process is thoroughly carried out, there is no valuable residue to reward the labors of the refiner. In antiquity lead was put with silver in a crucible; when heated, the lead, acting as a flux, oxidized and carried off the alloy. But here the ore is so impure that the alloys are not removed. The labors of Jeremiah are in vain. As refuse silver, they are rejected by the Lord. There is a play on words: rejected silver, they are rejected of the Lord. So judgment is inevitable.

C. Jeremiah's Temple Address (7:1–10:25)

1. No refuge in the temple (7:1–34)

Chapters 7–10, known as the temple address(es), were not necessarily delivered on a single occasion. Jeremiah's address, which he delivered standing at the gate of the temple, has been called one of the majestic scenes of history. One crucial event in his ministry, it undoubtedly initiated the unrelenting opposition he experienced during the remainder of his life. According to 26:1, Jeremiah delivered it early in Jehoiakim's reign (c. 609–605 B.C.); and ch. 26 records the consequences of the address. The time was not long after the death of Josiah.

The entire discourse runs counter to Josiah's attempt to centralize worship at the temple in Jerusalem and appears to blast hopes inculcated by the earlier prophets, Isaiah among them. Josiah's reform promised a restoration of God's blessing, not the calamity of the temple and the dissolution of the commonwealth. In Isaiah's day the repentance of godly Hezekiah and the people issued in God's removal of the Assyrian threat in one night (Isa 37:36). But the spiritual decline of the nation proved irreversible in Jeremiah's time. The temple-gate address is an eloquent attack on the people's confidence in the temple as ensuring Jerusalem's inviolability from all enemies. The emphasis on ethical issues is paramount.

a. Misplaced confidence (7:1–7)

1 Jeremiah spoke at a critical time. The nation was shocked by Josiah's death, the removal of Jehoahaz, and the imposition of Jehoiakim as king by Pharaoh Neco. With Jehoiakim a religious reversal took place in the nation. Canaanite rites reappeared in Judah. The temple address was Jeremiah's first public sermon and the source of all his later opposition in the nation. Through it he made lasting enemies and may have been excluded from the temple because of it (36:5). It was a thoroughgoing denunciation of the worship of the day. The deliverance of Jerusalem in 701 B.C. in Hezekiah's reign had become almost legendary and led to the idea that Jerusalem was inviolable because of the sanctuary (cf.

2Ki 18:13–19:37). Jeremiah spoke during a lull in hostile political activity. Doubtless, many were ready to attribute the respite to the glory of the temple.

2–3 The immediate occasion of Jeremiah's address may have been one of the three pilgrimage festivals (Dt 16:16). The "gate" was the one that connected the outer and inner courts. The place suggested is the Eastern Gate. Jeremiah's position guaranteed him a wide hearing. It was doubly significant that Jeremiah's attack on the superstitious attitude toward the temple was uttered at that very place. Verse 3 states the theme of the sermon: Repent, if you expect to remain in your native land.

4 With great courage Jeremiah warned the people against believing the deceptive words of false prophets ascribing talismanic power to the temple. The threefold repetition of the false prophets' words expresses emphasis to the superlative degree. In effect they were saying, "These buildings are assuredly the temple of the Lord!" And they were saying this at a time when the temple was made central by Josiah's reforms in 621 B.C. The people were using these words like a magical incantation. The words were true, but what the people inferred from them was entirely erroneous. The temple had become a kind of fetish and object of faith. The basis for this was (1) the promise of an eternal dynasty to David (cf. 2Sa 7:11–14) and (2) the choice of Zion as God's earthly abode (cf Ps 132:13–16). Therefore no harm could come to the temple. The false prophets continually assured the people of the personal intervention of God in case of any danger to the temple and Zion. But Jeremiah thundered that the temple without godliness was a delusion.

5–7 Jeremiah had called for the people to repent; now he turns to the prescription for their remaining in the land. Profession and conduct must be in accord or all their efforts will be unavailing. The way of blessing must give spiritual and moral principles the first place in life. Four things are stressed: (1) justice; (2) concern for the alien, fatherless, and widow; (3) avoidance of judicial murders; and (4) abandonment of idolatry. Idolatry, the root of their problems and their first national sin at Mount Sinai, comes last for emphasis. Nothing less than spiritual renewal would insure continuance in the land God had given their fathers in perpetuity. As always, acceptance with God depends on true piety.

b. Indifference to godly living (7:8–11)

8–10 In their woeful spiritual state, the people were trusting in deceptive words that veneered their sins. They were guilty of violating five of the Ten Commandments; the Decalogue was still valid and binding on them all. All these violations were going on at the same time as they were expressing confidence in the temple. Jeremiah's description may even be understood as expressing great indignation at the evil practices that their attendance at the temple was meant to atone for. The people felt that going to the temple granted them release from guilt, as though they had an indulgence to go on sinning. Ignoring God's ethical demands, they rested in ceremonial rites.

11 Ultimately the people were treating the temple, the house of God, as robbers do their dens. It was a temporary refuge till they sallied forth on another foray. Limestone caves in Palestine were used as robbers' dens; so Jeremiah's metaphor was clear to his hearers. Here was nothing less than corruption of the best and the holiest. The Lord, having seen the situation, would deal with it accordingly.

c. The example of Shiloh (7:12–15)

12 Shiloh was on the main highway between Jerusalem and Shechem. The Mosaic tabernacle was set up there after the conquest of Canaan (cf. Jos 18:1; 72:12; Jdg 21:19; 1Sa 1:9, 24). It was the abode of the ark and tabernacle during the era of the judges. At Shiloh, Israel went into idolatry (1Sa 4:1–11); so the ark was captured by the Philistines at the Battle of Ebenezer. Jeremiah's references to its destruction have been confirmed by excavations of the site, which revealed a city destroyed by the Philistines about 1050 B.C. Shiloh was to the judges what Jerusalem was to the kings. Jeremiah was a descendant of the Eli family; so the tragedy had personal implications for him. The sanctuary at Shiloh proved the falsity of the claim that the Lord was unalterably committed to an earthly temple and its preservation regardless of the moral state of the people.

13–15 Because they had committed the sins mentioned in v.9, the Lord had earnestly and continuously entreated the people through his prophets, but without response. By a strong anthropomorphism, Jeremiah portrays the Lord as "rising up early and speaking" (lit. Heb.). Again Jeremiah makes it plain that the people trusted the temple of God instead of the God of the temple. God is never dependent on any particular place of worship. For Jeremiah's hearers, this was unheard-of heresy. The outcome of Judah's ways would soon be exile. This was the message that inflamed Jeremiah's hearers and earned him their lasting hatred and opposition almost to the point of martyrdom.

d. Worship of the Queen of Heaven (7:16–20)

16–18 Now the Lord explicitly forbids the prophet to intercede for his people. They were so obdurately sinful that praying for them was futile. What was particularly abominable to the Lord was the worship of the Queen of Heaven by the entire populace. This goddess was probably the Assyro-Babylonian Ishtar, the goddess of love and fertility. It appears she was worshiped mainly by women (cf. ch. 44, esp. vv.15–19). A female deity is foreign to OT theology; so the implication is that this cult was of non-Hebraic origin. Such worship was probably initiated by Manasseh (2Ki 21:1–9) and reintroduced into Judah by Jehoiakim. This obscene idolatry was practiced not only privately but also by whole families—including the children. The "cakes" have been described as round and flat, resembling the moon. Also, the people offered libations to other gods.

19–20 If they thought they were spiting God, the people were grossly insensate. They would bear both spite and shame as consequences of their sins. Moreover, sin affects all realms of nature. Devastation would fall on humans, beasts, trees, and produce of the soil.

e. Obedience better than sacrifice (7:21–26)

21 Having been prohibited from interceding for the nation, Jeremiah had revealed the punishment awaiting Judah's idolatry. Undoubtedly he spoke the words of this verse ironically and contemptuously. The purpose is to show how totally erroneous was Judah's concept of sacrifices. Because they have missed the true meaning of the Lord's worship, they might as well eat the sacrifices intended only for the Lord, for he cares for none of them. In other words, they could multiply their offerings as much as they liked because all of them were worthless.

22 The verse appears to invalidate the whole sacrificial system. The Hebrew text uses a rhetorical negation to point up antithesis between v.22 and v.23. Moreover, the negative in Hebrew often supplies the lack of the comparative. In short, the Hebrew idiom permits denial of one thing in order to emphasize another (cf. Lk 14:26). Sacrifices were always meant to be of secondary importance to obedience and godliness. Neither Jeremiah nor any other prophet decried sacrifices as such. They meant that moral law is always paramount to the ritual law. Significantly, when Lev 6–8 is read in the synagogue, this passage in Jeremiah is read as the concluding portion, called the Haphtorah.

23–26 Actually, God had not spoken at Sinai of sacrifices but only of obedience, and this even before the law was given (Ex 19:3–6). Jeremiah's words show that he had in mind the giving of the Ten Commandments. Among these there were no directions for sacrifices; they dealt solely with spiritual and moral matters. In Judah the whole sacrificial system was invalidated on the ground that it was not carried out in true faith. Obedience always was and would be the dominant consideration. And this very element was the one so conspicuously absent in the nation. Indeed, in spite of Jeremiah's consistent warnings, Judah did worse than her fathers.

f. Reception of Jeremiah's message (7:27–28)

27–28 Just as the Lord had said at Jeremiah's call (ch. 1) that he would experience opposition, so now he informs Jeremiah that the nation would not listen to him. He would have no greater success in his ministry than did his predecessors. The nation was preeminent in this respect: the people continually disobeyed the voice of the Lord, their very own God. That faith must be joined with works was lost to them; so the time of Jeremiah was a sad epilogue to Judah's history.

g. Lament over Judah's desolation (7:29–34)

29 The prophet's attention now turns to the Valley of Hinnom, the center of the cult of infant sacrifice, introduced by Ahaz and Manasseh (2Ki 16:3; 21:6), abolished by Josiah (2Ki 23:10), but later revived under Jehoiakim. The command to cut off the "hair" is feminine in Hebrew, showing that the city (cf. 6:23) is meant. The charge stems from the fact that the Nazirite's hair was the mark of his separation to God (Nu 6:5). When he was ceremonially defiled, he had to shave his head. So Jerusalem because of her corruption must do likewise. Her mourning is because the Lord has cast her off. Because of her sin, the chief mark of her beauty must be cast away as polluted and no longer consecrated to the Lord.

When Israel encountered bereavement, defeat in war, or awareness of God's displeasure, the people would lament, lying on the ground, pouring dust on their heads, tearing their clothes, beating their breasts, and cutting off their hair. Now they were to lament on the "barren heights," for the place of their idolatries was to be the place of their mourning. Their lament would be heard at a distance, for that generation was the one on which God's wrath would be poured out.

30–32 The people had brazenly introduced their idols in the temple, as though to defy God to his face. Furthermore, they had set up high places (altars) in Topheth, near the eastern end of the southern part of the Valley of Hinnom.

The Hinnom Valley was a place of idolatrous sacrifices as well as the area for the debris and rubbish of the city. The rabbis saw it as a symbol of the place of future punishment, calling it Gehenna (see comment on Mk 9:43–48). Here the idolatrous nation burned their children to appease the fire god, Molech. This passage reveals that the children were not merely made to pass through an ordeal by fire; they were actually burned up. God disclaims any connection with this hideous practice (Lev 18:21; 20:2–5). Now their pagan sanctuary was to become their cemetery. Since they so flagrantly disobeyed God, they themselves would be slaughtered where their children were slaughtered. The slaughter of the coming doom of the city would be so great that Topheth would have to be used for burial, thus changing the name of the place to The Valley of the Slaughter.

33–34 So complete would the desolation of the land be that no one would be there to drive the birds of prey from the carcasses. The highest indignity for the dead was to leave a body unburied (Dt 28:26; Isa 18:6). The chapter closes on the tragic note that all joy—even that of marriage—would be removed from Judah.

2. Remonstrance with Israel (8:1–22)

a. Desecration of the graves (8:1–3)

1–3 Even the remains of the long dead would be desecrated. The invaders would not be satisfied until the bones of the leaders as well as of the people of Jerusalem were exhumed. This would be the ultimate insult, signifying that the people of Judah were incapable of guarding the remains of their ancestors from desecration. This practice of violating the dead was not unknown in ancient warfare (cf. Am 2:1). The dead, especially kings and prominent leaders, were buried with treasures, so the graves may have been vandalized also for plunder.

Jeremiah elaborates on the fate of the dead. Their bones would be scattered in the open air under the sun to hasten their disintegration and would be exposed like refuse. All the stages of Judah's worship of idols are detailed in five verbs ("loved," "served," "followed," "consulted," "worshiped") to reveal the people's great zeal in doing so. The heavenly bodies that the people worshiped would be helpless to hinder the desecration heaped on their dead followers. The statement exposes the worthlessness of astrology.

In spite of the violation heaped on their dead compatriots, the survivors would prefer death to life because of the many trials they were yet to suffer at the hands of their captors. The banished are the whole nation of Israel (cf. 3:14), and the places where they have been driven are the countries outside Palestine (cf. Lev 26:36–39; Dt 28:65–67).

b. Obduracy of Israel in idolatry (8:4–7)

4–5 In a series of questions throughout this eighth chapter, God remonstrates with his people. First, he shows how contrary to nature is their apostasy. If a man falls down, he instinctively tries to rise as soon as possible. If he turns from the right way, he returns to it at the earliest opportunity. But Judah is different from others; her misconduct is unique. Having fallen into idolatry and having strayed from the path of obedience, she manifests no desire to either rise or return. It is too late to repent. The nation is incorrigible in her apostasy. Judah shows no desire to correct her ways but holds tenaciously to her deceitful idolatry.

6–7 God waited for the people to amend their ways; he listened in vain for some word of repentance and confession of guilt. They acted mindlessly. As a war horse rushes into battle, they impetuously followed their own way regardless of consequences. The figure stresses their determination to continue sinning. Even subhuman creatures know how to follow their instincts better than Judah follows the way of the Lord. Migratory birds recognize and follow the seasons of their migration instinctively. The stork, dove, swift, and thrush regularly return to Palestine every spring. They know more about God's appointed way for them than Judah knows about God's appointed way for her.

c. Penalty for Judah's falsity (8:8–13)

8–9 In spite of her willful ignorance of the law of God, the nation boasts of her wisdom. The chief offenders were the priests and false prophets. Apparently they thought that having the law meant they had all the wisdom they needed. Denying God's word by their deeds, they still boasted of its presence with them. To make matters worse, the "scribes" so manipulated the law of God as to falsify its message. They interpreted so as to assure the people that they could sin with impunity. In v.8 there is an appeal to reason, as there is an appeal to conscience in v.12. As a result of the people's delusion about their wisdom, they would not heed the word of the Lord. The answer to the question in v.9 is that there is no wisdom when God's word is rejected (cf. Pr 1:7).

10–12 Since God is a God of righteousness and holiness, he must visit on Judah the punishment he has warned them of. These three verses repeat what has already been stated in 6:12–15. God ordered Jeremiah to repeat the truth to impress it on the minds of the people. But the people, refusing to listen to God's word, were misled by false prophets and deceitful priests

13 The failure of the vintage and the harvest is a frequent OT metaphor of complete devastation. When God's judgment struck, nothing would be left; the desolation of the land and the people would be complete. God would withdraw all his gifts. Since the nation bore no fruit morally, the dissolution of its commonwealth was imminent.

d. The invading army (8:14–17)

14–15 Jeremiah sees the invasion by the northern enemy occurring. Those in the rural areas ask themselves why they should stay where they live, exposing themselves to the enemy's cruelties. They exhort one another to flee to the fortified cities for greater protection and longer survival. Alas, even if they flee to the fortified cities, these, like "poisoned water," will be their ruin. The people find to their dismay that the opposite of what they looked for has come on them. The false prophets had purveyed only false hopes.

16–17 Jeremiah graphically describes the invasion of the enemy, who had already come from the north. Dan, in the far north of the land and bordering on Phoenicia, would feel the invasion first. So many would be the enemy's horses that their sound would shake the earth and they would desolate the land. Suddenly the figure for the invader changes to that of serpents that cannot be charmed away. The invader will be irresistible.

e. The sorrow of Jeremiah (8:18–22)

18–19 Though Jeremiah's predictions are coming true, he does not gloat over those who opposed him. Rather, he is thoroughly heartbroken. He agonizes over the fall of Jerusalem. He had lived in a state of tension between his love for his land and countrymen and his fidelity to God's commission for him. Now he foresees Judah's captivity and the distress of her exile. Forlorn and distraught, the exiles wonder why they have been conquered and degraded. How could this happen when the Lord their King was surely in Zion? They are trying to harmonize their theology with their deplorable condition. Why have they not been delivered? The King referred to is not the Davidic ruler but God. God answers their question with one of his. Why have they gone on defying him with their idolatries when they were constantly warned of his judgment on them?

20 Jeremiah drives home another truth by using the figure of the harvest. Harvest of barley, wheat, and spelt came in April, May, and June; harvest of summer fruits like figs, grapes, and pomegranates came in August and September, and of olives in October. If these were not provided, no fruit was garnered for the winter. The people had lost every opportunity given them by God, and now they were entirely without hope. One favorable time after another went unheeded. The time is past, of course, when either Egypt or other allies could come to their aid.

21–22 In spite of his denunciations, Jeremiah does not hesitate to identify himself with his people. Their hurt ("crushed") hurts him so deeply that he is filled with mourning and dismay. In a final metaphor Jeremiah asks why, since there is balm in Gilead and physicians to apply it, the nation's malady has not been healed. The balm referred to is the resin or gum of the storax tree, which was used medicinally. The prophet is distressed because he knows that though there is a remedy for the people, they have not availed themselves of it. Gilead is a mountainous region of Palestine east of Jordan and north of Moab; so the remedy is not far away. But Judah's sickness is not healed. The plaintive question "Is there no balm in Gilead?" has become proverbial.

3. Sin and punishment (9:1–26)

a. The prophet's lament (9:1–2a)

1–2a Jeremiah's metaphors show the depths of his grief. The destruction to be visited on the nation would be so thoroughgoing that he would weep day and night. The "fountain" is a reservoir or well rather than a spring. The "slain" of this verse are those in need of a physician in 8:22. Their sickness has ended in death.

Two strong emotions gripped Jeremiah: great sympathy for his people and utter revulsion against their many sins. The life of the people was so corrupt as to make it impossible for Jeremiah to live among them. Even a lonely lodging in the desert was preferable to the soul anguish he experienced in the midst of his people (cf. Ps 55:6–8).

b. The glaring sins of the day (9:2b–9)

2b The blatant sins Jeremiah describes are literal. Society was shot through and through with wickedness. The first sin in this bill of indictment was universal adultery. As the prophet has already shown, the reference is to their spiritual adultery of idolatry, with which gross immoralities were carried out. In toto the people were a treacherous assembly. The Hebrew word for "crowd" (GK 6809) is used for solemn assemblies on pilgrimage feasts. They had fallen far short of that concept. The sins of the tongue are noteworthy.

3 The picture is vivid: the tongue is the bow and the lying the arrow. The people are consummate liars. To "make ready" is literally "to tread" because one placed his foot on the bow to fit it with an arrow. Unwearied, the people went from one sin to another. They were valiant, but not for truth. They used their power and influence, not for helping their countrymen, but for oppressing the poor and needy. They had completely abandoned moral and social standards. The inner cohesiveness of the nation had broken down. Judah was laden with deceit. At the same time as Jeremiah was in anguish over the people's sufferings, he was appalled at the depth of their departure from the Lord. Willful ignorance of God was the root of their sin. They did not care to know or recognize him.

4–5a When a nation lacks spiritual dedication, human relations become insecure. Even the godly succumb to suspicion. Society is threatened when mutual confidence is lost. Even homes and families in Judah were split by mistrust. The unity of the nation was threatened from within. The covenant of God with his people required brotherly love, but their conduct violated this. They went to great pains to deceive one another.

5b–6 To show the unnaturalness of their wickedness, the people trained their tongues contrary to their proper function. Lying takes more effort than speaking the truth, but they were willing to endure the drudgery of sin. They persisted in their wrongdoing. Their desire to do evil exceeded their power and strength. The words of v.6 are addressed to the whole nation. Deceit was the very atmosphere of their life. They lived in it and would rather cling to their deceptive ways than recognize God and abandon their godless deeds. Verse 3 stated that they did not know God; now we are told that they flatly refused to know him. In a world ruled by a Moral Governor, their woes inevitably stemmed from this recalcitrance.

7–9 The prophet returns to the metaphor of refining metals (cf. 6:28–30). But now the process would go on in the fiery furnace of affliction and would aim to remove the dross by suffering. The Lord was still seeking to purge, not exterminate, his people. Reasoning with them, the Lord asks how else he could deal with their sinful ways. No other choice was left him. What other action was open to him? The passage underscores the inevitability of judgment in view of God's righteousness. He still yearns over Judah, for he addresses the nation as literally "the daughter of my people." Again, the prophet emphasizes their deceitful dealings. Their tongues are death dealing; deceit is second nature to them. Even when their conversation appears to be cordial, in their hearts they are scheming to ensnare their neighbors.

c. The judgment threatened (9:10–16)

10–11 This section details Judah's punishment. Jeremiah prepares for mourning in the hour of disaster. The pastures in the Judean wilderness will be burned up because there will be no one to water and care for them. The land will be devastated and its inhabitants exiled. All will be so desolate that the cattle will disappear, and even the birds will abandon the land. So complete will the devastation be that only scavengers will remain.

12–16 Once more the Lord tries to show the people the cause of their ruin. The Lord challenges any of the wise of the nation to state the cause of their calamities. The wise will see by God's enlightenment that departure from God must always lead to punishment. In v.13 God himself answers the question in v.12. The nation had violated the law given at Sinai and constantly proclaimed by the true prophets; the people repeatedly ignored God's call to walk in conformity with his revealed will. Instead, they had followed a path to destruction. It was their defection from God that had brought along with it their flagrant social injustices.

The cause of the nation's problems was an insubordinate spirit that led the people into idolatry—their undoing from the wilderness period to that hour. Their sinful practices were handed down from one generation to another. In the metaphor "bitter food" and "poisoned water," the first is a plant with bitter juice, the second a poisonous bitter herb. They represent the bitter suffering in the fall of the kingdom and the Babylonian exile. The annihilation does not include the whole nation but only its ungodly members. Repeatedly, Jeremiah shows there will be no complete decimation of the people (cf. 4:27; 5:18; 30:11).

d. The universal lamentation (9:17–22)

17–18 This section describes the people's expulsion from their land. The "wailing women" were professionals employed to arouse relatives and others at funerals to outward display of their grief. They used plaintive cries, baring their breasts, flailing their arms, throwing dust on their heads, and disheveling their hair (2Ch 35:25; Ecc 12:5; Am 5:16).

19–21 As the people go into captivity, their wailing sounds out from Jerusalem (Zion). Jeremiah gives the words of the women's dirge. The demand for their services will be so great that they will have to teach others how to mourn, particularly their daughters and neighbors. Death will penetrate into the homes of poor and rich alike. Even children and young men will die in public places. A number of interpreters believe that the death referred to is the result of pestilence. But the passage need not be limited to this. The invading army could do the killing.

22 Here we see Death as the Grim Reaper. The custom was for a reaper to hold in his arm what a few strokes of his sickle had cut. Then he put it down, and behind him another laborer then gathered it into bundles and bound it into a sheaf. So death was to cover the ground with corpses, but the carcasses would lie there unburied because of the paucity of survivors and the great number of dead. The wages of sin is always death (Ro 6:23).

e. The ultimate good (9:23–24)

23–24 Jeremiah speaks of three things people of the world trust in: wisdom, strength, and riches. These three cannot help the worldly. If these fall short in the time of need, what will avail? Our highest good is to know God, not just intellectually or philosophically, but in spirit and in his true character. This is the true and lasting wisdom. The path of God's approval is clear. Ethical qualities follow a true knowledge of God. God manifests "kindness"—a readiness to manifest grace and mercy; "justice"—a proper evaluation of the rights of men; and "righteousness"—the absolute essential of all faith and worship.

f. Not privilege but morality (9:25–26)

25–26 These verses condemn faith in religious privileges. The paradox shows that circumcision is in itself as valueless as sacrifice, temple, or any other outward form of religious practice. If Judah has the rite of circumcision only in the flesh, she is no different from the pagans who have only an external sign and no inward faith. Judah cannot plead the virtue of her covenant sign when she does not possess what it stands for. The nations enumerated practiced circumcision but not of the heart. Outward rites are unavailing; the condition of the heart is paramount. Judah is placed among these nations—what degradation! Egypt is mentioned first because Israel was so prone to confide in them. Edom seems to have abandoned the practice until it was imposed on them by John Hyrcanus. The Arab tribes, recognized by their peculiar tonsure, were, along with those already mentioned, the objects of Nebuchadnezzar's attack (cf. 49:28–33).

4. Denunciation of idolatry (10:1–25)

The greater portion of this section is devoted to a condemnation of idolatry. Jeremiah shows his firsthand knowledge of idol worship, both Canaanite and Babylonian. Although people lose their awareness of the true God, they do not thereby lose their need of God. So they substitute the false worship for the true. Idolatry is the result.

a. The folly of idolatry (10:1–5)

1–2 This message is addressed to the whole nation of Israel, not just the Ten Tribes already in exile for more than a century. Those who remained in the land still retained the customs of their heathen neighbors before them. Jeremiah warns the people against being influenced to fall in with the cultic customs of the pagan nations in worshiping their gods. Idol worship was attended by elaborate ritual, motivated by demonic power, and accompanied by moral looseness. Thus it was a constant temptation. The signs of the heavens referred to are not the sun, moon, and stars, or signs of the zodiac, meant by God to be signs (Ge 1:14), but unusual phenomena like eclipses, comets, and meteors, which were supposed to portend extraordinary events. They struck terror into the hearts of those who worshiped the superhuman power in the stars. Both the Egyptians and the Babylonians were addicted to astrology. Idolatry that involves the heavenly bodies displeases God as much as the worship of man-made idols.

3–5 All idols are vanity. The worthlessness of worshiping them is proved by the worthlessness of the pagan gods. Jeremiah details every stage of the making of these worthless images. The first stage is the cutting down of a tree from the forest; the second stage, its shaping with an axe; the third, adorning the idol with precious metals; the fourth, fastening the idol in place. The final stage is dressing the idol in royal apparel. There is an exquisite touch of sarcasm in the mention of fastening the idol with nails. The mighty god has to be kept from tottering. Even after the image is secured, it has no more value than a scarecrow. Immovable, it has no power of speech to comfort the needy soul; it cannot walk to come to the aid of the harassed; instead, it is a burden to be carried. Incapable of moral decisions, it cannot counsel troubled souls.

b. The majesty of God (10:6–16)

6–8 Here the prophet contrasts the majesty of God with the uselessness of idols. Man-made idols cannot walk or stand unaided, but the true God is great in himself and in his power. To attempt to compare him with other gods or creatures shows woeful ignorance of his true character and attributes. In ancient times pagan nations had their own nationally restricted deities; but the Lord God of Israel is King, sovereignly ruling and wisely administering the affairs of the nations. Worship is due him by right and due no one else. Human beings at the highest point of their reasoning can never approximate, let alone comprehend, the blessed God of the universe (1Co 1:21). From a wooden idol no spiritual benefit or instruction can be expected. Instruction from idols is no more valuable than the idol itself. No human skill can turn wood into an intelligent creature. All the wise men among the pagans are foolish because their gods from which they receive instruction are no more than wood. Idolatry has no redeeming feature whatever.

9 At this point Jeremiah speaks of the origin of idols. Silver was obtained from Tarshish—either southern Spain or the island of Sardinia. Spain was rich in silver, iron, tin, and lead—all of which were sent to Tyre. Gold was brought from Uphaz (location unknown). Blue (violet) and purple were obtained from the murex, a Mediterranean shellfish. These pigments were costly and were used in the curtains of the tabernacle (Ex 25:4). In spite of all the workmanship lavished on them, idols are still the work of human hands.

10 In a telling contrast, Jeremiah presents the distinctive attributes of the God of the universe. He is the true God, i.e., God in truth. He is alive, the everlasting King, whose power is manifest in the earthquake and whose wrath the nations endure. This verse contains a threefold contrast with idols: (1) they are false, he is true; (2) they are dead, he is living; (3) they are transitory and subject to destruction, he is eternal.

11 This is the only verse in the book in Aramaic, the lingua franca of the day, so that the pagan idolaters would be able to read the judgment of God on their idolatry. The truths enunciated thus far are that (1) Israel is not to imitate the nations around her, (2) idols are powerless, and (3) God's power is infinite.

12–16 This section, repeated in 51:15–19, dwells on the theme of the might of the true God, especially in nature, and his relationship to Israel, particularly in his covenant promises. Both the power and the wisdom of God are clearly manifested in the creation of the heavens and the earth. Indeed, every thunderstorm witnesses to the omnipotence of God. Before these wonders of nature, people unenlightened by revelation are without knowledge. Every idolater will ultimately be ashamed when the nothingness of idols is revealed. For a thinking person to engage in idol making and worship is no less than a degrading of his or her God-given endowments. The prophet's final word on idols is that they are not only worthless but also a work of mockery, worthy only of being ridiculed.

God "makes the clouds rise from the ends of the earth" (10:13). These clouds are over the Jezereel Valley at Jezereel.

In essence, instead of helping their devotees in time of need, idols will themselves be destroyed. On the other hand, Israel's God is totally distinct from idols; instead of being made, he is the Maker and Creator of all the universe. Moreover, he is still faithful to his covenant promises, though his people have rejected him (cf. 51:19). Though he is Lord of all, yet he has a special portion or inheritance in Israel. As we come to the end of this classic passage, we should remember this: The Babylonian exile accomplished what everything else failed to do. It cured the nation Israel of idolatry, making the people witnesses of the one true God in every country where they were scattered.

c. Exile for sinning Israel (10:17–22)

17–18 In respect to continuity of thought, vv.1–16 are parenthetical. In vv.17–25 the subject that was interrupted at 9:22 is resumed, thus concluding the temple sermon. The suggested date for the passage is 598–597 B.C., during the siege under Jeconiah. The present portion is a dialogue between Jeremiah and personified Jerusalem. The people of Judah are addressed as they are told of impending exile. Now the doom of the city is at the very gates, so they had better gather up their bundles from the ground because they are to be cast out of the land. Only distress awaits them.

19–22 A new era was to begin for the nation! On other occasions when the nation was invaded, the enemy took spoils and imposed tribute. But this time invasion would result in expatriation. This means for Jeremiah an almost unbearable burden; so on behalf of the nation he laments the catastrophe. The people now recognize and admit that they have merited divine judgment. They are resigned to God's punishment. Jerusalem is next seen as a tent-dwelling mother, deprived of her children and home. No one is left to rebuild the destroyed land. The blame is placed on the leadership of the nation. Doom is near; the report has it that the army of the enemy is approaching.

d. Prayer for the nation (10:23–25)

23–25 Jeremiah pleads the constitutional mental and moral weakness of humanity in extenuation of his predicament. We can never direct our lives so as to achieve blessing without God's help. We cannot decide the course of our lives. God is in ultimate control. True to his office, Jeremiah as the prophet of God acts as an advocate for his people. He prays that Judah will not be called on to suffer more than she can endure. He admits her merited punishment but pleads for it to be kept within limits. God should show a measure of mercy so that destruction will not come. It is in this context that the last petition is to be understood. The nations had been moved by a spirit of vindictiveness and out of proportion to what God had intended. They wanted to destroy Israel utterly.

Verse 25 is recited annually at the Passover service of the Jews. The enemies of Israel and the executors of God's wrath will one day experience his scourge also. This was fulfilled within a century. Nebuchadnezzar was punished with insanity. His grandson Belshazzar was slain in his revelry, and the empire was conquered by the Medo-Persians. Jeremiah's prayer is not that of a nationalistic Jew against hated Gentiles. It is a plea for God to destroy Judah's enemies before they are able to carry out their wicked aim to destroy his people. Thus closes this whole great section (chs. 7–10). Its undying message is that God seeks reality in life and worship, and no kind of ritual can ever be a substitute for piety.

D. Signs to Awaken Repentance (11:1–20:18)

1. The broken covenant (11:1–23)

Chapters 11 and 12 form a unit because there is no break between them. Since this section is not dated, scholars differ as to the historical setting. Most likely the historical setting was the reign of Josiah with his reformation, which proved to be only superficial. The date may even have been soon after the discovery of the Book of the Law, before the reform became widespread (v.6; cf. 2Ki 23). Chapters 11–20 contain material that is more autobiographical and more narrative than that in the previous chapters. In this section we find the prophet's "confessions," in a sense a private diary. The main emphasis of ch. 11 is an admonition to be faithful to the covenant.

a. The violation of the covenant (11:1–13)

1–3 The initial charges were not directed to Jeremiah alone because the imperatives are in the plural. The commands are not to the people, nor to the priests as the teachers of the law, but to the prophets of the time. The account in 2Ki 22–23 makes it clear that the godly king Josiah was not introducing a new covenant but only calling for a reaffirmation of the old Mosaic covenant, as did other of the prophets aside from Jeremiah. Jeremiah even repeats the very curse pronounced on those who violate the Lord's covenant with Moses (cf. Dt 11:28; 27:26; 28:15–19; 29:20–21). Ancient Near Eastern treaties contained both benedictions and curses for adherence or nonconformity to them.

4–5 Verses 3–5 contain a summary of the spiritual essence of the covenant (cf. 7:23). The time of the promulgation of the Mosaic covenant is seen as being the whole Exodus period. The iron-smelting furnace refers to the hardships the Israelites underwent in Egypt (cf. Dt 4:20). What the Lord was seeking was an obedient people for his very own, a people who would rejoice in their intimate relationship and fellowship with him. The Lord also had in mind his gracious promises to the patriarchs, which he wished to fulfill. "A land flowing with milk and honey" symbolizes the fertility of the land. Jeremiah reminds the people that they were still in possession of the Promised Land. His own answer to the pronouncement of the curse was "Amen," indicating his acquiescence in God's arrangement.

6–8 Verse 6 does not mean that the prophet must take a preaching tour "in the towns of Judah," for the expression is proverbial for the length and breadth of the country (just as the Lord's command to Jeremiah in 25:15–29 did not require him to itinerate among the nations). Judah's response to the Lord's command reveals faithlessness and breach of the covenant. In spite of the Lord's loving exhortation through his prophets, the people followed their own ways in violating the law of God. In fact, the nation had already suffered, in the exile of the ten northern tribes to Assyria, some of the penalty for their infractions of the covenant; the remainder of the judgment was soon to be realized in the coming visitation on Judah (cf. Lev 18:28; 20:22; Dt 29:28).

9–13 Jeremiah divulges an existing conspiracy against the covenant of God. It was not the outcome of hasty impulse but of settled policy. The conspiracy need not have been a formal one, though the people willed to assent to it. There was general though secret resistance to Josiah's policy of reform. The people had determined not to follow in the way of the Lord but in the wicked ways of their fathers. The "forefathers" were probably those who lived during the desert wanderings and during the time of the judges. Josiah's heart was right with the Lord, but true piety never comes by osmosis. People must submit individually to God and his ways. Of their own accord, Josiah's generation broke the covenant the Lord made with the nation. The only possible result was inescapable judgment. Not only would their worthless gods be impotent to help them, but the Lord also refused to help them. The hour of his patience was over.

Once more Jeremiah stresses the impotence of the people's idols. The people's appeals to the idols will, as always, go unheeded. Not that they had a paucity of idols, for their gods were as numerous as their towns; every city had its own special god. The "shameful god" is Baal. In spite of and contrary to Josiah's reforms, these secret practices were continuing.

b. Inadequacy of sacrifices (11:14–17)

14–15 Because the nation's wickedness had passed the limit of God's patience, Jeremiah is again forbidden (cf. 7:16) to intercede for his people. Their guilt had come to a climax. Their cries for help would go unanswered because they were not repentant. The text of v.15 is obscure. Apparently the people had gone to the temple to pray and offer sacrifices. "My beloved" refers to Judah. The prophet is repeating the worthlessness of sacrifices without godliness and concern for social righteousness. Sacrifices will not avert the doom. Actually, all the people have is defiled meat (cf. Hag 2:12). In their hypocrisy they have tried to hide their apostasy by their temple sacrifices. How, then, can the people think they have a right to rejoice? They cannot, because God cannot be deceived.

16–17 Jeremiah goes on to compare the nation to a beautiful green olive tree—the way the Lord saw it and wanted it to be. Olive trees are common in Palestine, as elsewhere in the Near East. But Judah had become so barren that she must suffer the flames of judgment. The same figure is the basis of Paul's key passage about the relation of Jew and Gentile in Ro 11:17–24. God's ideal for the nation was for it to remain green and beautiful; but, because of the barrenness of sin, it must be destroyed. The judgment is clearly determined for both parts of the nation. Baalism has been their spiritual and political ruin.

c. Plot against Jeremiah's life (11:18–23)

18–20 Here is the first of Jeremiah's personal crises. Its context is the portion called "The Confessions of Jeremiah." In them are disclosed deep spiritual agonies. In this instance the plot against his life by his fellow citizens of Anathoth could well have been an aftermath of his temple address (ch. 7). Moreover, they may have resented his support of Josiah's reforms, with its abolition of local sanctuaries—something that would have been hard for the priests of Anathoth to swallow. It appeared to them that in exalting the Jerusalem priesthood, Jeremiah was further degrading that of Anathoth.

The plot was hatched in secret; so Jeremiah suspected nothing. The Lord had to reveal it to him. Rejecting God and his message, the nation was not afraid to reject his messenger. That his family, friends, and fellow citizens in his native town could conspire to assassinate him was something difficult to bear. God disclosed not only the plot to Jeremiah but also the very words the conspirators said. Unsuspecting and trusting, he was to be murdered in the full vigor of his life. Because he was unmarried (16:2) and thus had no progeny, even his memory would be eradicated. Both he and his work ("fruit") were to be obliterated. Destroying a tree with its fruit was proverbial of total destruction.

In v.19 the people speak, in v.20 the prophet speaks, and in vv.21–23 the Lord speaks. To understand v.20 we must realize Jeremiah was praying for God's vengeance on the plotters. Jeremiah was utterly open to the Lord and had entrusted his case to him who knows perfectly all human emotions, thoughts, and desires. This kind of prayer came from the conviction that his enemies were God's enemies. He was depending on the Lord to deal with them.

21–23 The Lord answered Jeremiah's request by indicating his intention to vindicate him. The people had threatened Jeremiah with death if he continued to preach in the Lord's name. That note of authority galled them. They tried to suppress God's message. Anathothites resented Jeremiah's favoring the deposition of the sanctuaries other than Jerusalem. (Anathoth was the home of the priestly house of Abiathar, a friend of David, who was deposed by Solomon, who in turn supplanted it with the house of Zadok.) It seemed to them that Jeremiah was siding with Zadok against their own ancestor. Furthermore, being priests, they doubtless hated his castigation of empty priestly ritual. Their punishment would come at the siege of Jerusalem. Death would prevail inside and outside the city. The young men of military age would die in battle, the rest by famine. The threat of "not even a remnant" must be understood only of Jeremiah's enemies, for some men of Anathoth did return to postexilic Judah (see Ezr 2:23). The year of their visitation was that of Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of the land. Anathoth was near the beleaguering armies and was thus more exposed to the carnage of war than Jerusalem.

2. Punishment and promise (12:1–17)

Out of the context of the opposition to his ministry he suffered in his hometown of Anathoth, Jeremiah deals with the question of the prosperity of the wicked. Jeremiah's perplexity is understandable because the OT does not offer full information on life after death.

a. The prosperity of the wicked (12:1–6)

1–2 The problem of the prosperity of the wicked in the light of God's righteousness is not directly solved here or elsewhere in Scripture. The only final answer is faith in the sovereign wisdom and righteousness of God. Jeremiah is still deeply troubled by the treachery of his fellow citizens of Anathoth. He acknowledges at the outset that God is righteous. Jeremiah refuses in principle to question the justice of God, but he still has questions about the success of the wicked in the light of his own trials. In a spirit of holy familiarity, Jeremiah would reason or argue the case with the Lord. The wicked he refers to are not just those of Anathoth but the wicked in general. With true discernment Jeremiah realizes that prosperity is not accidental but goes back to God's general grace in providing human needs. He uses the figure of a fruit-bearing tree. The wicked, instead of thanking the Lord for his goodness and worshiping him, are actually hypocrites, mouthing pious phrases without reality in their hearts.

3 Jeremiah now contrasts the state of his heart and life with that of the wicked. Their hatred of him was uncalled for. He speaks of his intimate fellowship with the Lord, who knows he is not speaking hypocritically. In strong language Jeremiah asks the Lord to deal with his enemies as they deserve. In asking him to "set them apart for the day of slaughter," Jeremiah is comparing the wicked to animal sacrifices. Though the wicked have been "planted" in the land, they will be utterly destroyed.

4 Jeremiah is describing some consequences of the prosperity of the wicked in Judah. The ungodly are a curse to the nation. God sends punishment, and the righteous suffer with the wicked. The drought does not negate what Jeremiah said in v.1 about the Lord's righteousness, because calamities like those he is describing affect the godly more than the wicked. The ungodly rich usually escape them. The land, beasts, and even birds suffer along with human beings. If the "he" near the end of v.4 refers to God, then it is the height of wickedness to claim that he is morally indifferent to the sin of the rich. This is practical atheism. Or perhaps the people are mocking Jeremiah's predictions and claiming they will never be realized. At least, "he" will perish before they do.

5–6 The Lord's answer to Jeremiah's complaint is meant to teach him that he is too impatient. He would have to suffer even more. What he had endured in Anathoth would be insignificant compared with the trials he had yet to undergo. His confrontation with the men of his own town has made him realize the magnitude of the task he had undertaken. He could not turn to his family for help because they were part of his difficulty. God now challenges him to greater courage and faith for greater trials in the future.

In spite of his problems, up to this point his situation has been like that of a dweller in a peaceful land. The language in v.5 is proverbial. "The flooding of the Jordan" (cf. NIV note) refers to the annual overflow of the Jordan in time of harvest (Jos 3:15) and earlier (April and May) that filled the Ghor (cf. ZPEB, 2:710). With the flooding of the valley, the beasts of prey were driven from their haunts along the river bank. The reference here is probably to the jungle of the Jordan, the land adjacent to the river covered with bushes and heavy undergrowth and inhabited by wild beasts (cf. 2Ki 6:2).

To give Jeremiah a glimpse of how serious matters would become, the Lord grants him a new disclosure. Even his own family cannot be trusted, for they will raise a hue and cry after him as though he were a criminal fleeing from justice. Nor will they be open and aboveboard; they will use threats to obscure their true intentions toward him.

b. Punishment on the ungodly (12:7–13)

7–8 The Lord, not Jeremiah, is still speaking, viewing future events as though already fulfilled. Judgment for breaking the covenant is in view. The historical background of this passage is probably the events recorded in 2Ki 24:1–2, when Jehoiakim revolted against Babylon after three years of submission. Nebuchadnezzar dispatched Chaldean, Syrian, Moabite, and Ammonite soldiers against Judah. The Lord's lament over the nation's devastation contains an abundance of figures: "house," "inheritance," "the one I love" (v.7); "a lion" (v.8); "a speckled bird of prey" (v.9); "vineyard," "field" (v.10). Having warned Judah of the consequences of disobedience, the Lord now abandons her utterly to her enemies.

It was difficult for the Lord to punish his own guilty but beloved people. As ever, his judgment was tempered with love. Thus abandoned by their Lord, the people were incapable of resisting their foes. They surrendered to the enemy because they as fiercely as a lion had opposed the Lord. They had become his declared enemy, raising their voices against him. In saying that he hated his people, the Lord was declaring that he had withdrawn his love and protection from them. He forsook them as though he hated them; this was a greater agony for him than for them.

9 The question requires an affirmative answer. Speckled birds are unusually colored birds, which are attacked by other birds, who will not allow a strange bird among them. So the Lord's people, different from other nations, will be attacked by them. The Lord invites the wild beasts (Babylon and her allies) to devour the land.

10–13 The Lord's great love for his land is reflected in his three endearing designations of it ("vineyard," "field," "pleasant field"). The shepherds who have devastated his vineyard (Israel; cf. Isa 5:1) are the heads of the invading army. They have done what they wished, heedlessly breaking through and trampling the well-tended area. Though the desolation has been thoroughgoing, no one considers the causes that have brought such judgment. The "sword of the LORD" in the hand of the Lord's agents will do its work throughout the country. Apparently the enemies will invade from the east. As far as Judah is concerned, nothing has turned out successfully for her people. In spite of all their labors in the field, they gain nothing. They reap the opposite of what they expect. Their crops are a failure (cf. 14:3–4). In fact, the harvests are so poor that even the farmers are ashamed of them. The Lord had not prospered them at all.

c. Promise for the repentant nations (12:14–17)

14–17 In this section we have an anticipation of the prophecies in chs. 47–49. In prophesying to the nations, Jeremiah was fulfilling his commission (1:10). The nations (Syria, Moab, Ammon) were to be punished by the same enemy that punished Judah, namely, Babylon. The Lord identifies himself with

Judah when he calls the surrounding peoples "my wicked neighbors." They too will experience deportation from their lands. This is part of the answer to the prophet's complaint concerning the prosperity of the wicked. But this is not the end of the matter; these nations are promised future blessing after the Lord has chastened them.

A millennial setting is in view in vv.15–16. Repatriation is promised for Israel and the nations, who have learned about God from his people, just as Israel formerly learned the worship of idols through these nations. The basis of the predicted blessing is repentance and faith. If the pagans adopt the worship of God in truth, they will be incorporated into God's people. Israel will lead in godliness. There will be a remnant among the nations (cf. Ge 12:1–3; Ro 11:15). But the members of the remnant will have to make a genuine avowal of God as their own. Then the nations with Israel will know peace in the Messianic Age. When they were in the midst of the nations (vv.7, 9), it was to God's people's detriment; when the nations are in the midst of God's people, it will be to the nations' spiritual blessing.

The chapter closes with the alternative to faith and is a warning to all. For unbelief there will be doom.

3. Corruption of the nation's life (13:1–27)

a. The marred linen belt (13:1–11)

1–7 Was this act a real one or was it a vision? The chief problem with the literal view is that the distance to the Euphrates (Perath)—and two round trips were made—would require Jeremiah to walk hundreds of miles. The literal view is preferred because (1) the act would have to be witnessed to be of value as a message to the people; (2) the language supports the literal sense; (3) Jeremiah was away from Jerusalem for part of Jehoiakim's reign, and his absence could account for Nebuchadnezzar's kind feeling toward him because of previous personal acquaintance (39:11–12); (4) "Perath" should perhaps be understood as an abbreviation of Ephrata, the original name of Bethlehem, about six miles south of Jerusalem. Then it would be easy for Jeremiah to carry out the command literally.

Jeremiah was charged to buy a linen belt, place it around his loins or waist, but not to put it in water. It was to be of linen for two reasons: (1) Linen would easily rot, skin or leather would not; (2) the original cleanliness spoke of Israel's purity when first in fellowship with the Lord. Also, the linen belt would recall Israel's priestly calling (priests wore only linen) and character (cf. Ex 19:6). After wearing it for a while, Jeremiah was commanded to hide it in a crevice of the rock at the Euphrates, and he did so. After many days, he was ordered to go to the rock and retrieve the belt he had buried. It was ruined and worthless because it had been close to the moisture of the river. Why the Euphrates? The purpose of the trip may have been to underscore the influence of Mesopotamia in corrupting the nation religiously, beginning with ungodly Manasseh (2Ki 21). Also, there may be an allusion to the coming Babylonian exile.

8–11 A linen belt was used because just as it is placed closely about the body, so the nation Israel was brought into intimate relationship with her gracious Lord. The ruin of the garment teaches that idolatry corrupts anyone who engages in it. Idolatry had corrupted Israel from her loyalty to God and made her worthless. Instead of clinging to her God in faith and love, she destroyed herself.

b. The wine of God's wrath (13:12–14)

12–14 Possibly at a drinking feast, Jeremiah took occasion to utter a proverbial saying about jars ("wineskins"; GK 5574) and wine, which was probably a platitude concerning the hope of continued prosperity. The jar was the largest earthenware container for storing wine (Isa 30:14). The largest found in excavations hold almost ten gallons. When Jeremiah used the pun of filling, the wine drinkers mocked his banal remark, which he immediately gave a serious turn. Jeremiah pointed out that the people were the jars and were to be filled with the wine of God's wrath against their sin. He had turned their saying into a prediction of disaster.

Four groups are singled out for the judgment: the kings, the priests, the false prophets, and the people. Jeremiah had several kings in mind; all would be the objects of God's judgment. His mention of David's throne perhaps stresses how far they had fallen from the standard of worship in David's day. All the people will be filled with mental intoxication, a symbol of helplessness and confusion. In the nation's drunkenness, the male portion of the population, who should have defended the land against the invaders, will be colliding one against another. Jeremiah anticipates the truth elaborated in 25:15–28; 51:7. Three times the Lord declares that he will show no pity on the nation.

c. Warning against pride (13:15–17)

15–17 Pride, the sin of Satan, infected the human family before the Tower of Babel and ever since. Jeremiah warns the people against pride in their spiritual privilege. Proud of their favored position before God as his chosen people, they refused to heed his message through his prophets. The scene in this section is that of a weary traveler on a mountain caught in the dark night. The statement "Give glory to the LORD your God" is an OT idiom for "Confess your sin" (cf. Jos 7:19). To do so would avert the evil about to come on the nation. But Jeremiah knew their obstinate ways; they would not listen. Firm in declaring the truth of God without fear or favor, he was nonetheless tender in his grief and compassion over their obduracy, which would yet lead them into captivity. He took no delight in the prospect of their misery.

d. Tragedy in the royal house (13:18–19)

18 The Lord commands Jeremiah to address the king and queen mother—King Jehoiachin and his mother, Queen Nehushta, who were carried away to Babylon in the second deportation under Nebuchadnezzar in 597 B.C. (cf. 2Ki 24:8, 12, 15). The address is an exhortation to humility in view of their impending loss of sovereignty. Because kings practiced polygamy, their mothers were highly influential (cf. 1Ki 2:19; 15:13; 2Ki 10:13). This was all the more true of Jehoiachin and his mother; because he was only eighteen when he began his short reign of three months, she probably had much influence over him. She is mentioned again—but not by name—in 22:26 and 29:2. Both the king and his mother were unreceptive to the message of God.

19 Unlike the invasion of Sennacherib (2Ki 18:13), Nebuchadnezzar would strike the cities of the South, the Negev (the barren area in the south of Judah; Jos 15:21–32). Though the Negev is farthest from Jerusalem, it too would feel Nebuchadnezzar's might—an evidence of the total extent of Judah's captivity. The cities would be in ruins with no one to clear them. The statement that "all Judah" would be exiled is rhetorical exaggeration, since only some leaders and skilled workmen were taken to Babylon at that time (597 B.C.). Yet they represented the whole nation.

e. Captivity and shame of Judah (13:20–27)

20–21 Jerusalem is addressed under the figure of a shepherdess who has abandoned her flock. She has been derelict in duty and has misled her flock. Those "coming from the north" are again the Babylonians. Jerusalem was responsible for protecting the entire nation. For her unfaithfulness to the Lord's flock, Jerusalem would have to endure subjection to the very powers she had helped to gain control. There may be reference here to the foreign policy that courted Egypt and Babylon, especially the latter, when Judah was tributary to Neco of Egypt. Though she toadied to both, Judah would be dominated by them. Judah had tried to make binding alliances with Babylon on more than one occasion (cf. 4:30). Ultimately, she was the one who made the Babylonians her masters by invoking their aid against Egypt instead of trusting the Lord.

22 When Judah is in agony as a mother in childbirth, she will ask why she is suffering. Continuance in sin has deadened the nation's conscience. She does not feel she is suffering justly. The shameful way the conquerors treat the people will be like the shaming of a prostitute. Exposure of the secret parts was the public disgrace heaped on prostitutes.

23 Using a famous proverb, Jeremiah points out that Judah is so far beyond change that her repentance would be like a suspension of nature's laws. Yet God still invites people to repent. But with Judah sin was so ingrained that there was no hope of repentance. Here is a classic example of loss of freedom of the will through persistent sinning. Sin becomes natural. Jeremiah is speaking of the force of habit, not denying freedom of choice (cf. Jn 8:34). Obviously Jeremiah is stating the case radically. He does not mean to rule out any response to the working of God in people's hearts to bring them to repentance, as v.27 shows.

24–27 Because of the nation's persistent sin, the Lord will subject the people to a process of winnowing—a familiar scene to them, for they had often seen the strong wind from the Arabian desert carry off the useless stubble. None of the things described is accidental; they are God's judgment on Judah for forgetting him and trusting in "the lie" (NIV, "false gods")—specifically, Baal. Judah's retribution will be to know the full measure of disgrace. The "neighings" are a bestial figure for illicit love (cf. 5:8; 50:11). The last question—"How long will you be unclean?"—shows that there is still opportunity for Judah to repent. The Lord does not close the door on a future return from idolatry. He still wants the nation to repent in time and so escape punishment. Two strong emotions struggled in Jeremiah: (1) the certainty of disaster for the nation and (2) the hope that it might yet be averted.

4. Drought and impending exile (14:1–22)

Chapters 14 and 15 are full of Jeremiah's grief for the future of his people. The references to invasions and exile cannot help to date the material before us because there were three invasions of Judah and as many deportations. Nor can one identify the material with a particular crisis in the life of the nation. The drought here is probably later than that mentioned in 3:3 and 12:4 because this one is connected with war (vv.17–18).

a. The critical drought (14:1–6)

1 The word for "drought" (GK 1314) is plural here, which may indicate a series of droughts. Rainfall in Palestine is never overabundant. A year of drought can cause suffering. Unlike Egypt and Mesopotamia, Palestine depends on seasonal rainfall. In Israel a drought was never viewed as a chance occurrence. Drought had been threatened for disobedience (Dt 28:23–24) and was part of the covenant curses. The Lord's purpose in sending the drought was to bring the nation to repentance.

2–3 The entire country was suffering anguish from lack of water. The drought extended to the city. The nation was clothed in black to express its mourning. The capital cried out for help. Nor were the nobles immune! When they sent their servants to the cisterns for water, they returned with empty vessels. Rain water, stored for time of need, had long been exhausted. In their mourning the people covered their heads, as though to shut out the painful sight. The famine afflicted city, country, human beings, and animals. The ground was "cracked." The farmers could not work the soil and, hence, could not expect a harvest. They too were in deep mourning.

5–6 It is sad for irrational creatures to have to suffer because the people have incurred God's displeasure. The doe, known for her care for her fawns, no longer was able to care for her offspring. The wild donkeys, known for their hardiness and ability to survive on very little, were greatly debilitated. Even on the bare heights they gasped for breath. Also, instead of the usual sharpness of sight, they lost the power of vision in their agony.

b. The confession of the nation (14:7–9)

7 The people acknowledge their apostasy and sin, which deserve only death. But they plead on solid ground—namely, that the Lord's honor may be exhibited to the pagan nations. Because there is no merit in Judah, the Lord's work in the people's behalf will reveal his nature as a God of compassion.

8–9 Thus Jeremiah entreats the Lord not to disappoint his people's hope in him ("Hope of Israel" is a favorite expression of Jeremiah; cf. 17:7, 13; 50:7). The people ask the Lord why he is as a stranger or traveler with no interest in the country he is only passing through. If he is their Hope and Deliverer in times of distress, why does he not now act as such in their behalf? The Lord is not powerless; so why should he hesitate like one paralyzed by fright? His presence is still among his people in the ark, the temple, and the sacred worship. Furthermore, the people plead the covenant, for they are called by the Lord's name. So they pray that the Lord will not forsake them.

c. The Lord's answer in judgment (14:10–12)

10–12 The Lord's reply explains his chastisements. Because his people have kept on in their wickedness, they were being punished for their ungodliness. Apparently the Lord considered the nation lacking in true penitence. They were constantly wandering after foreign gods; because the people rejected him, he was rejecting them. For the third time Jeremiah is forbidden to pray for the people (cf. 7:16; 11:14). They were beyond help because of their determined disobedience. Intercession was an important prophetic function, but Jeremiah was not permitted to intercede at that fateful time. Worse visitations than the drought would overtake the people—i.e., the sword, famine, and pestilence (the combination of these three appears seven times in the book). Neither fasting nor sacrifices would avail to recover God's favor, as long as the people were bent on idolatry. External marks of repentance were useless, since the Lord sought above all else reality, truth in the heart.

d. The doom of the false prophets (14:13–16)

13 The false prophets are blamed for the plight of the nation. As a mitigation of the nation's sin, Jeremiah, the unpopular true prophet, pleads that the false prophets have misled the people. False prophets are self-seeking, profiteering, and zealous for popularity, but with no authoritative word from God. In those desperate times they preached deliverance and peace, lulling the people into unwarranted complacency so that they would not believe in the imminence of judgment. They promised "lasting peace," the very opposite of Jeremiah's true message. Imagine the confusion in the minds of the people with the babel of bright promises over against Jeremiah's thundering message of doom.

14–16 Verse 14 points out the four methods by which the false prophets practiced their deception. The Lord's retribution on the lying prophets will be their endurance of the very punishment they would not predict. The people should have known that the Lord punishes sin, and they should not have believed the false prophets. The judgment of the nation is spoken of here because the people were willing to be deceived.

e. The grief of Jeremiah (14:17–18)

17–18 Jeremiah shows the hardened nation his grief in seeing their coming ruin. He grieves over both war and famine. He cannot view the people's distress dispassionately (cf. 9:18; 13:17). He calls Judah "the virgin daughter—my people" because she had been jealously kept from the idolatrous nations, as virgins are guarded in Oriental households. Now the prophet describes the conditions in the land after the fall of Jerusalem. The blame still falls on the false prophets and godless priests, who must be exiled to a foreign land.

f. Prayer of confession and plea for help (14:19–22)

19–22 The nation now pleads its own case with the Lord. The questions are more intense. The people cannot believe that the Lord has irretrievably cast them off. Now they freely admit that all their hopes and prospects have been blasted. They also admit the basis of their woes: their wickedness. They acknowledge the sinfulness of their ancestors. In desperation they plead three reasons for the Lord to help them in spite of their sins: (1) his reputation in the earth, (2) his temple, and (3) his covenant. The throne of God's glory is Zion, especially the temple (cf. 2Ki 19:15; Ps 99:1). Still haunted by the drought, they declare their belief that neither idols nor the heavens by themselves can give rain. Only God can end their trials, and they expect him to help them out of their difficulties.

5. Impending judgment and Jeremiah's complaints (15:1–21)

The break between chs. 14 and 15 should be disregarded. The mood in this chapter intensifies as Jeremiah elaborates on the Exile. In fact, he plumbs the depths of despair so deeply as to lead him to say some things the Lord rebukes.

a. Prayer unavailing for Judah (15:1)

1 The Lord refuses to avert judgment from his people; his decision to punish them is irreversible. Therefore the continued intercession of Jeremiah or of any others cannot succeed. The people's incorrigibility has placed them beyond the power of prayer. Moses and Samuel would have been unable to move the Lord from his decision (cf. Ex 32:11–14, 30–34; Nu 14:13–23; Dt 9:1–20, 25–29; 1Sa 7:5–9; 12:19–25). The Lord commands that the nation be sent from his presence. No longer can he tolerate them, nor does he want Jeremiah to keep reminding him of them. Nevertheless, the command is not absolute and final but conditional.

b. The punishment determined (15:2–9)

2–4 Should the nation ask where the people are going, the answer is that each will proceed to the punishment allotted him or her by the Lord. If they think they are only going to be banished, they are tragically mistaken. Their destination will be death by disease (cf. 14:12), warfare, or famine. It will also be exile. Then, as if these judgments were insufficient, the Lord speaks of "four kinds of destroyers against" the people. The first will destroy the living; the other three will mutilate and consume the dead. For a corpse to be dragged on the ground and then become carrion for bird and beast was the ultimate desecration of the dead (cf. Rev 6:1–8). When the Lord refers to making the people an object of horror to all kingdoms of the earth, he apparently has in view more than the generation of Jeremiah's time. Manasseh's sin is presented as a root cause of Judah's captivity. He had contributed to the moral decline of the nation, but the people had imitated his ways when he brazenly led Judah into idolatry (cf. 2Ki 21:3–7, 10–15; 23:26–27; 24:3–4).

5–7 No one will pity Jerusalem when the Lord forsakes her. She will be left desolate without anyone caring. Because the people repeatedly rejected the Lord and his worship by slipping back into apostasy, he will no longer be merciful to them. As a farmer winnows the wheat to remove the chaff, so the Lord will disperse the people from their cities—"the city gates" standing for the whole country. The population will be decimated. The cause of all this is the refusal of Judah to be truly repentant.

8–9 To the Lord's grief, Judah's widows will be more numerous than the sand of the seas, an amazing comparison. Even the mothers of warriors will not escape the destroyer, because Judah will be defenseless through the loss of her valiant sons in battle. Likely the reference to "mothers" is figurative of Jerusalem. The enemy will strike at noonday—suddenly and unexpectedly. To have seven sons is a Hebrew picture of complete happiness, but the mother has had her happiness pass all too soon. Because of the blessing of abundant offspring, she might have considered herself secure. But she is seen breathing out her soul or gasping for breath. Any survivors of the fall of Jerusalem will suffer the same end as those already slain.

c. Jeremiah's complaint (15:10–11)

10–11 In his overwhelming despondency the prophet laments his life's work and lot. Jeremiah's greatness lay in his sensitive nature that felt acute pain for his people and their doom. The hopelessness of the nation's situation and his own difficulties of his position weighed on him. He is lapsing here into self-pity. This is one of the saddest cries in the book. It must have been uttered at a time when he was experiencing great opposition, probably during Jehoiakim's reign. He feels deeply his alienation from the nation he loves. He wishes he had not been born. His tenderness in addressing his mother stands out. He is like one constantly in a lawsuit with his people. Borrowing and lending are proverbial reasons for disagreement and tense relations among people. The populace are cursing him because he attacked their sins so unsparingly. Passages such as this show that the prophets were not supermen but fully human.

The Lord responds to Jeremiah's complaint and gives him personal assurance. The force of v.11 is that God promises vindication for Jeremiah against his enemies as well as strength for his ministry, the objective of which is only good. In times of distress, even his enemies will ask for his intercession (cf. 21:1–6; 37:3; 42:1–6).

d. The inevitable judgment (15:12–14)

12–14 This passage clearly predicts the Exile. Bronze is an alloy of copper and tin. Unusually hard iron was available from the region of the Black Sea, famous for being harder than all other iron. The sense is that as little as people can break iron, Judah would not be able to sustain an attack from the power in the north, i.e., the Chaldeans. The question of v.12 demands a negative answer. Because Judah would not be able to withstand the northern enemy, her wealth and treasures would be freely carried off by the adversary. God's wrath against their sin would not be satisfied until all was plundered and taken to Babylon.

e. Jeremiah's charge against the Lord (15:15–18)

15–16 On the basis of his loyalty to the will of the Lord, Jeremiah pleads for divine help. He wants vengeance to be meted out by the Lord on those who have opposed his prophet. Jeremiah does not want the Lord to be patient with his enemies and withhold vengeance on them until he is gone. Jeremiah wants vindication in this life. In effect Jeremiah is pleading that God will not be so lenient with his persecutors as to give them time to destroy him. In a striking figure he recalls his first reception of God's message and how he made it his own. It symbolizes the assimilation of God's revealed truth. Jeremiah was every inch a chosen servant of the Lord. His chief delight was in God's word.

17–18 Jeremiah describes his solitariness in the midst of his people. Because he sided with God, he was cut off from the joys of those around him. He was filled with God's indignation against their sin. It greatly pained him to be out of step with his contemporaries. The hand of God was on him; the constraint of God's truth weighed on his spirit. The rhetorical questions in v.18 imply that for the moment Jeremiah gave way to despair. He was so deeply and continuously wounded that he wanted to know whether God had abandoned him and had proved unreliable. After all, his own family had betrayed him. The "deceptive brook" was a familiar figure. In Palestine many brooks have water only after a downpour. At other times a traveler may be disappointed if he looks for water in them. In his distraught state, Jeremiah charged the Lord with failure to fulfill his promises to strengthen him in his resistance against his enemies.

f. God's rebuke and encouragement (15:19–21)

19–21 The Lord tells Jeremiah that if he gives up his doubts and reproaches, avoids worthless statements, and holds to worthy ones, he may continue to be his prophet and mouthpiece. Jeremiah himself will have to undergo the refining process so that he can cleave to precious words, not worthless ones. He must lift his people and not let them drag him down to their level. His only hope is to trust more fully in God and be faithful to the message, whatever response it brings; God promises assurance and victory. These verses are practically a recommissioning of Jeremiah, in which God promises to keep him from the power of the violent wicked. There were such men in Judah, who finally assassinated Gedaliah, the governor of Judah, after the fall of Jerusalem. This word of encouragement was sufficient for the prophet's need; though opposition to his message mounted perilously, he never again complained to the Lord as he did in vv.10, 15–18.

6. Bane and blessing (16:1–21)

Again, the chapter division is illogical. The date for this passage is probably the fourth year of King Jehoiakim (2Ki 24:1–2). Jeremiah had complained of his loneliness in ch. 15, but the Lord promises him no relief. Two sections of the passage deal with doom and two with bright promises for the future.

a. The loneliness of Jeremiah (16:1–9)

1–2 Undoubtedly the Lord's command for Jeremiah not to marry was an emotional shock for him. Celibacy was unusual, not only in Israel, but throughout the Near East. Among the Jews marriage was viewed as a natural state for a man. The desire to perpetuate the family name led to almost universal marriage in Israel. But Jeremiah's dedication to his prophetic service allowed him no time for family life or for participation in the usual joys and sorrows of his countrymen. His compliance with the Lord's command not to marry shows his complete submission to the divine will and underscores the woes predicted for the nation. His being denied a wife and children would be a warning that the family life of the nation was to be disrupted. "This place" was Jerusalem and Judah. Jeremiah had already paid a price for his ministry: isolation from his countrymen (15:10), loneliness (15:17), no marriage, and no participation in funerals (v.5) or times of joy (v.8).

3–4 The Lord tells Jeremiah that the sorrows of parents will be increased. Children will die of "deadly diseases"—epidemic diseases. The number of deaths will be so great that there will be no time for mourning or burial.

5–9 Jeremiah must not mourn over the carnage in the land, for private sorrow would be exceeded by the national doom and mourn-

The vulture was considered a god of Upper Egypt. Egypt was one of Judah's enemies; Jeremiah prophesies that the Judeans would be food "for the birds of the air" (cf. 16:4)

ing. Abstinence from mourning would be a sign of universal disease and death on a universal scale. The rituals for the bereaved—even for those who lost a father or mother—would not be permitted. So Jeremiah would have to refrain from mourning because the Lord would no longer prosper his people or bestow his grace on them. Death would overtake nobles as well as common people. There would be no time to perform the pagan practices of mourning the people.

In time of death, fasting was usual. In the evening, however, food and drink were provided by friends, since the food and drink in the home of the mourner had become ceremonially unclean because of the dead body (Hos 9:4). In later Judaism the cup of consolation was a special cup of wine for the chief mourner (cf. Pr 31:6). Moreover, the prophet was also commanded to abstain from the joys of the people. This was to show the imminence of the calamity that awaited them. He could have little joy at marriage festivities when he remembered the threat hanging over them all. Nor were they to think that the doom was far off; it would happen in their lifetime.

b. The cause of the judgment (16:10–13)

10–13 Jeremiah's withdrawnness would mystify his people, so he would have to explain it. He was prepared to spell out the cause of their miseries and the reason for the Babylonian exile. Aided by the false prophets, the people had become complacent in their sinning. The prophet explains that they would be exiled for their lapses into idolatry, and he indicts the nation—first its ancestors, then the present generation—for forsaking the Lord. In fact, the latter outdid the former in evil. With great force the Lord was going to "throw" them out of their land into an unknown land. While they may have known about the land, it was unknown to them by the actual experience of living. There Jeremiah ironically assures them that they would have the opportunity of indulging their desire for pagan worship day and night. And the Lord would completely withdraw his favor from them.

c. Restoration to the land (16:14–15)

14–15 Judgment is never God's last word. After exile will be repatriation. The Exodus from Egypt will pale in significance before the people's deliverance from Babylon and from worldwide dispersion. The future Exodus will be greater than the past one. The regathering mentioned here is the final one in the consummation of Israel's national history in the last days. The reference to "all the countries" shows that the prophet was predicting a restoration from a general dispersion. The return will be through God's gracious faithfulness to the covenant he made with the patriarchs regarding the land (Ge 12:1–3,7).

d. Complete retribution (16:16–18)

16–17 There would be no escape from the coming judgment of the Lord. The hunters and fishermen are the pagan conquerors who were to be God's instruments for chastising Israel. No one would escape the invaders. To seek to hide from God would be futile. Jeremiah was not speaking of two periods of divine visitation. Rather, he was simply indicating that in the day of reckoning there would be no place to find refuge anywhere. The Lord knows all the nation's acts; none of the people's deeds has escaped his notice. But first, before they can be restored, the people must undergo retribution for their iniquity.

18 The "double" penalty cannot be understood outside the context of the Hebrew viewpoint, which used the term to express ample, full, complete punishment (cf. Isa 40:2). So the punishment would be commensurate in full with the offense. Nothing is more defiling than idolatry. As corpses pollute, so do idols. The "lifeless forms" may refer to either the animals offered to idols or the idols themselves (cf. Lev 26:30; Nu 19:11).

e. The nations in blessing (16:19–20)

19–20 Jeremiah next worships the Lord for restoring Israel and drawing the Gentiles to him. He expresses the hope that the nations will finally turn from idolatry and confess the emptiness of such worship. The threefold "my" expresses the Lord's sustaining of Jeremiah in his loneliness. So unprecedented will the divine retribution be that even idolatrous nations will respect the name of the Lord. The nations will come to the Lord, not by human persuasion, but spontaneously and voluntarily (cf. Isa 2:1–4; 45:14; Zec 8:20–23). Without doubt the picture is messianic. It is best to take v.20 as a continuation of the declaration of the enlightened nations. Even they will see the folly of idolatry.

f. The goal of the punishment (16:21)

21 Once and for all, the Lord will manifest his hand and might—namely, by the severe trials incurred by disobedience to his word and his will. What is said will apply to both Jews and Gentiles; there is no need to exclude either one (cf. Eze 36:23; 37:14). All will vindicate God's unique glory. God is who he claims to be.

7. The deceitful heart of humankind (17:1–27)

As a whole, ch. 17 has no central theme but gathers together important aphoristic or proverbial sayings on the issues of life, sin, and the way of the curse and blessing.

a. Israel's ineradicable sin (17:1–4)

1 When Jeremiah says that Judah's sin is "engraved" (GK 4180) on the people's hearts and on their altars with "an iron tool" or "a flint point," he means that their sin is indelible. Thus God's judgment is inescapable. Sin, especially idolatry, has become an integral part of Judah's life. It had been etched on their very natures and on their temple worship (cf. Ex 27:2). Iron tools were used in cutting inscriptions on stone (cf. Job 19:24). The "horns of the altars" were the metal projections from the four corners. In the temple rituals sacrificial blood was sprinkled for expiation on the four horns of the altar (Lev 16:18). What a perversion to have sin inerad-icably engraved on "their hearts" where the new covenant belongs (31:31–34) and on the very places where solemn expiation was made for the sins of the people!

2–4 The children in Judah would be so steeped in idolatry by their parents that the desire for it would emerge at the slightest provocation. Asherim were poles placed beside the altars in Canaanite worship; they were proscribed in the Mosaic Law (Dt 16:21). They represented the sacred tree (asherah), part of the Baal cult and a symbol of the Canaanite goddess Astarte. Thus long continuance in idolatry is implied. For such iniquities the nation would lose all its wealth to its enemies. "Mountain in the land" is an obvious reference to Zion or Jerusalem. It is addressed this way because of its eminent position as the center of the country. Moreover, Jerusalem is called "rocky plateau" in 21:13. In this case "plateau" does not have to denote level land but the surrounding countryside.

Jeremiah further elaborates on the loss of the nation's inheritance. The people have outraged the Lord's patience; so "through [their] own fault" they would be separated from their land.

b. The way of cursing and blessing (17:5–8)

5–8 The main concept of the broader context (vv.5–13) appears to be that of permanence. Verses 5–8 emphasize the need of reliance on God alone in all life's circumstances. Those who trust in human beings are referred to in vv.5–6; those who rely on God in vv.7–8. The results of choices are clearly spelled out: a curse on the former, a blessing on the latter. Where people depend on humankind, spiritual life cannot thrive; such persons are like the dwarf juniper of the desert, whose leaves are not refreshed by rain; so it is both stunted and starved. On the contrary, those who trust in the Lord are blessed indeed. They need fear no circumstance in life. Again, the figure of a tree is used. The blessed are firmly "planted" where there is abundance of water. Growth and fruitfulness, therefore, are assured.

c. Humanity's desperate heart condition (17:9–13)

9 If there is such blessing in trusting God, then why do people so generally depend on their fellow humans? The answer lies in the innate depravity of the human heart. The source of all human difficulty is the human "heart" (GK 4213; cf. Pr 4:23), which stands for the total inner being, including reason. From the heart come action and will. The human heart is more deceptive than anything else. It is desperately corrupt and, humanly speaking, incurable. Who on earth can plumb the depths of the heart's corruption and sickness? Even its owner does not know it.

10–11 The Lord knows the whole truth about the heart, and he will deal with all of us justly, according to our deeds. The noun translated "partridge" (GK 7926) may mean some type of sand grouse rather than a "partridge," because the partridge does not hatch the eggs of other birds. At any rate, the meaning of the passage is clear: ill-gotten gain is, like a bird with young from eggs that she has not laid, soon lost (cf. Pr 23:5). The brood forsake their foster mother. Those who weary themselves to accumulate wealth unjustly are moral and spiritual fools.

12–13 In these verses Jeremiah extols the majesty of God. True permanence is found only in the Lord. His sanctuary and throne refer to Jerusalem. Unlike riches soon lost is the eternal throne of God. That throne demands both reward and punishment. It is the fixed center of the universe and an endless source of comfort to the believer. In God's purpose it has been so from time immemorial. Those who forsake the Lord will suffer shame, for a life "written in the dust" instead of in the Book of Life (cf. Ex 32:32; Lk 10:20; Rev 20:12; 21:27) results from having forsaken "the spring of living water" (cf. 2:13). Those who do so are as unenduring as names written on the dust.

d. Jeremiah's plea for vindication (17:14–18)

14–15 From time to time the unwelcome nature of Jeremiah's prophecies drove him to plead for divine help. The Lord was his only hope and cure (cf. v.9). So Jeremiah prayed on the basis of his Lord's known faithfulness. Only the Lord can heal and save. The prophet's desire for healing and salvation undoubtedly included moral and spiritual ills as well as deliverance from his enemies. Jeremiah's coreligionists taunted him and scoffed at him daily because his predictions were not fulfilled. They criticized him for being a false prophet (Dt 18:22). This was doubly difficult for him to bear because he had prayed the Lord to refrain from meting out his judgment on Judah. Scoffing, the mockers declared, "Let it [the word of the LORD] now be fulfilled." This passage indicates that the fall of Jerusalem had not yet occurred; if Jeremiah's prophecies had already been fulfilled, the people would not have asked their derisive question. God's continued long-suffering led the prophet's enemies to demand a visible confirmation of the word he preached.

16 So Jeremiah sets forth a threefold vindication of his ministry: (1) He has not refused to follow God's will; (2) he has not hoped for their doom; and (3) all his utterances were finally known to God. Moreover, he had not tried to relinquish his ministry because of the suffering it involved. The word "shepherd" (GK 8286) usually refers to a king, but here it refers to Jeremiah as a leader of the people. His enemies accused him of wanting disaster to overtake the nation. But he never wanted his threatenings in proclaiming the Lord's message to be fulfilled. He took no delight in predicting doom (cf. ch. 40). "The day of despair" is the day of the fall of the city, when the predicted woes would come on it. Furthermore, the Lord knew everything Jeremiah preached, including his prayers that the doom might be averted.

17–18 The "terror" Jeremiah feared was that the Lord might confound him and desert him before his enemies. He wanted the Lord's protection and prayed that his loyalty to him might not be the cause of his ruin. If the Lord would not encourage him, then he would be doubly bereft of comfort. For the vindication of God's truth, he needed to be proved right. It was this that pervaded his prayers for vengeance. There is no contradiction between v.18 and v.16 because the people in view are not the same. By "double destruction" is meant full, complete destruction (cf. comment on 16:18).

e. Sabbath observance (17:19–27)

19–23 Prophecies of doom were always ethically conditioned. The way of blessing was still open for Judah. The Sabbath was a vital part of the Decalogue and was the touchstone of Israel's contractual, covenant relationship with God. Because Jeremiah was against insincere worship, we have no ground for thinking he would oppose sincere religious practices.

The "gate" where the Lord commanded Jeremiah to deliver his message was one where a number of the people could be found, no doubt one of Jerusalem's gates. It was distinct from the gate of the priests and Levites. Obviously it was one of the temple gates. In v.19 "the kings" are successive kings of Judah; those in v.20 appear to be the king and his princes, i.e., his royal house.

This passage makes sense only if we understand that the people habitually violated the Sabbath. They used it to conclude the work of the week and to prepare for the coming week's work. Contrary to the word of Moses, the Sabbath had been chosen by the people to bring their produce in from the country, since they worked the fields during the week. This must not continue. The people carried burdens out of their homes in exchange for the produce brought into the city. The people's response to Jeremiah's preaching was highly negative.

24–27 Now the blessings on obedience follow. In summary, the Sabbath recognizes God as Creator, which is a witness against idolatry, and it marks the special covenant relationship between God and Israel. If obedience is forthcoming, the blessings are distinctive: (1) the continuance of the Davidic dynasty, (2) the settling and continuance of Jerusalem, and (3) the temple as once again the center of worship for the nation. Thus Judah is assured the promise of peace, prosperity, and permanence through her native dynasty and the authorized priesthood.

The several regions of Judah mentioned were still possessed by Judah and Benjamin. The land of Benjamin was north of Judah. The lowland or Shephelah ("western foothills") was the low hills stretching toward the Philistine maritime plain, west and southwest of Judah, and was the center of agriculture. The "hill country" was the central region, with the desert of Judah stretching down to the Dead Sea. The "Negev" was the arid South (cf. Jos 15:21–32). The offerings the people were to bring are divided into blood offerings (two) and bloodless offerings (two). The "incense" mentioned here was one of the ingredients added to the offerings. The list concludes with the "thank offerings," which were the principal class of the fellowship offerings (cf. Lev 7:11).

The passage concludes with the price of disobedience, though God's yearning heart would yet keep his people from destruction. Fire is a symbol of destruction throughout the Bible (cf. Am 1:3–2:5).

8. The parable of the potter (18:1–23)

The potter's house is the most familiar of Jeremiah's figures and is found elsewhere in Scripture (cf. Job 10:9; 33:6; Ps 2:9; Isa 29:16; 45:9; 64:8; Ro 9:20–21; Rev 2:27). In this passage we have a true but mysterious blending of the divine sovereignty and human responsibility. The Lord used the potter to illustrate how he deals with humanity.

a. The message of the potter (18:1–12)

1–4 God is not to be seen here as an arbitrary sovereign; the deeper level of meaning speaks of his grace that underlay the coming disaster on Judah. The command came to Jeremiah to go down to the pottery, where it was the Lord's intention to give him a message for the people. So he went there from the temple that was in the upper part of the city. The potter's house was probably on the slopes of the Valley of Hinnom (south of Jerusalem), where water and clay were found. Here the prophet was to be taught the principles of the divine government. At the pottery Jeremiah saw what was already familiar to him. The potter was making a vessel on the wheels, the upper and lower discs made of stone or wood. The lower one was worked by the foot of the potter and was attached by an axle to the upper one, on which the clay was worked. The discs were in a horizontal position.

As happened frequently in the daily life of a potter, the clay did not turn out right. Often in throwing the clay, some defect would become evident. The potter then rolled the clay into a lump to begin his task again to make a more suitable product. The chief point here is the power the potter had over the clay. The clay was in his hand and under his control. The defects were in the clay, not the hand of the potter. The potter's perseverance is to be noted.

5–10 Now Jeremiah is taught the meaning of the figure. The infinite power of the Lord is compared with that of the potter over his clay. Just as the potter remade the clay to conform to his purpose, so the Lord's will and power continue to mold the nation until it is conformed to his plan. The Lord will never be defeated even if Judah turns from his way for them. There is a conditional element in his dealings with his people. Repentance can always change the Lord's decree of judgment, for his threatenings are never unconditional. But the parallel between humanity and the clay must not be carried too far. Human "clay" is not passive. Upon a person's repentance God can rework him or her into a vessel of honor. The position is not one of absolute fatalism (blotting out human freedom), nor is it one where God's sovereignty is wholly dependent on a person's choice. Ultimately, no human being is free. But God in his mysterious working in human life has ordered it so that humanity may freely choose.

God does not exercise his omnipotence arbitrarily or capriciously but conditions everything ethically. Though the parable is meant principally for Judah, God deals similarly with all nations. All people are given the opportunity to repent and conform to God's purpose. When the Scriptures speak of his "relenting" (GK 5714) or repenting, we must understand this in the light of Nu 23:19. When used of God, repentance never means what it does for a human being, for God has never done anything wrong. But he does act differently toward men and women when they turn from disobeying him to obeying him (26:3). With God repentance is not a change of mind but his consistent response according to his changeless nature to the change in the nation's conduct. So in this parable the prophet is holding out the opportunity for Judah to repent.

11–12 Jeremiah now applies the parable of the potter to his nation. Responsibility clearly rests on them. When the Lord says he is "preparing" (GK 3670) calamity for Judah, the Hebrew verb is the same as the word for potter; so there is a play on words. The threatened calamity is the Exile. What was the nation's reaction? The people claim it was hopeless to try to dissuade them from their ways. Having gone too far to turn back, they condemned themselves. Their obduracy showed how deep-seated their love of idolatry was. What a disheartening response for Jeremiah to receive after all his pleading!

b. The fickleness of Judah (18:13–17)

13 Even the nations around Judah would have to attest to the revolting nature of her acts. Her willfulness in forsaking the Lord was without parallel in the ancient world. The horror is heightened by calling her a virgin. She had been hedged about by the Lord to preserve her sanctity.

14 The snow from Lebanon and cold running water are dependable, but Judah has proved herself fickle in the extreme. Her conduct has been wholly unnatural. Lebanon (lit., "white mountain") has permanent snow cover and so regularly provides moisture. Nature does not change its course, but Judah has. Nature's reliability puts to shame Judah's instability.

15–17 The appalling sin the people committed was idolatry in spite of a clearly defined path for their blessing. They forgot their Lord; they were misled by their false prophets, false priests, and false gods. The nation had lost its way. The "ancient paths" were those of blessing through obeying the Lord

(cf. 6:16). The contrast is between a rough track in the country and an elevated causeway. The result of the nation's apostasy will be the desolation of her land. This condition will be so shocking that the land will be "an object of lasting scorn." People will shake their heads at the nation's uncommon stupidity. The Lord himself will scatter the people as the east wind, the sirocco from the desert east-southeast of Palestine. When the Lord says he will show them his back and not his face, he means that his face will be hidden from them. But this is the very treatment Judah has given him (cf. 2:27). God's "face" indicates his favor (Nu 6:24–26).

c. The plot against Jeremiah (18:18–23)

18–19 Unable to tolerate Jeremiah's drastic preaching, the leaders of Judah decided to hound him to death. Their opposition is spelled out: (1) slandering him and turning a deaf ear to his words (v.18), (2) digging a pit for his soul (vv.20, 22), (3) setting snares for his feet (v.22), and (4) planning to slay him (v.23). The very three groups he condemned were in the forefront of the plot against him. They boasted that because they had priests to instruct them in the law, wise elders to counsel them in the affairs of daily living, and (false) prophets to give them the word (supposedly from God), they had no need for Jeremiah. They could not conceive of a time when such ungodly leaders would be unable to fulfill their functions. So their aim now was to silence Jeremiah after they had rejected his message. They were certain that his words would not be fulfilled.

By a charge of treason, the leaders of Judah hoped to effect Jeremiah's downfall. His messages against Judah's policies provided ample basis for accusing him of treason. So he pleaded with the Lord to pay attention to him and to hear his enemies' plots. In so doing, he was using the same words as his foes but now in the affirmative sense. He wanted his prayers answered.

20–23 These verses give Jeremiah's reaction to his enemies' conspiracies against him. His imprecations are best understood in the light of the following: (1) Jeremiah's enemies were not merely personal ones but enemies of God and his truth, and his was not a vindictive cry for personal revenge; (2) life after death and retribution in the afterlife were not clearly revealed in OT times; and (3) Jeremiah delivers the people judicially to the course they have chosen for themselves. What hurt the prophet most was the manner in which his countrymen repaid good with evil. He had only sought their good and had even interceded for them when the Lord forbade him to do so (cf. 14:7–9, 21). Their response is described by the metaphor of digging a pit to trap wild beasts.

Jeremiah's words are admittedly strong, but that is because the leaders of the people had incited them against him, the Lord's prophet. Invaders will do their deadly work, in the wake of which other forms of death will come. Not only will calamity strike people outside the city, but even their own houses will provide them no security. Here is the outcry of the prophet's wounded heart. He realized the depth of the resentment and hatred toward him. Their plans had been concealed, but the Lord knew every secret plot against him.

9. The destruction of Jerusalem (19:1–15)

In ch. 19 we have another of Jeremiah's symbolic acts (cf. 13:1–11). He delivers his message in two places: in the Valley of Hinnom and in the court of the Lord's house; and its theme is the destruction of Judah in that generation.

a. The clay jar at Hinnom (19:1–5a)

1 The Lord commanded Jeremiah to buy a clay jar, one used as a receptacle for water. Because of the jar's narrow neck, it could never be repaired. Jeremiah was to take with him the elders of the people and of the priests to lend solemnity to the occasion. They were probably chosen to go with Jeremiah because they had lived under Josiah's reformation. The prophet was about to act out the final stage of Judah's spiritual hardness. A time inevitably comes when constant opposition to God will result in the people's overthrow. Whereas ch. 18 taught the sovereignty and patience of God, this passage treats the irreversible judgment about to fall on Judah.

2 The prophet was told to go to the Valley of Hinnom by way of the Potsherd Gate. Because of its proximity to the potter's house (18:1) and the dumping of potters' waste outside it, one gate of Jerusalem became known as the Potsherd Gate. It led to the Valley of Hinnom, which was connected with child sacrifice. Josiah had made the valley a garbage dump for Jerusalem, whose fires constantly smoldered (see comment on 7:30–32).

3–5a Jeremiah's denunciatory words are addressed to the kings and the people. He uses the plural "kings" because the message is not only to the reigning king but to the whole dynasty that was responsible for the apostasy. The place of the calamity is Jerusalem; the disaster will be such that all who hear of it will be stunned. The sins that will bring on the Lord's judgment are then enumerated. By forsaking the Lord and cleaving to idolatry, the people "made this a place of foreign gods." They were making it an alien place by "denationalizing" it so that it appeared no longer Israelite. They had brought many innovations into their idolatry. Moreover, this kind of worship desensitized their moral nature, for they shed the blood of innocent people. One of the most debased forms of idolatry involved child sacrifice. It was practiced in the worship of Baal and Molech (cf. 32:35).

b. The imminent calamity (19:5b–9)

5b–7a By a strong anthropopathism, the Lord indicates that the enormities the nation committed in sacrificing children had never been enjoined on them or spoken of and had never even entered into his mind. It was totally alien to and opposed to his will. For these terrible violations of his law, the Lord would bring down such drastic destruction that the place called "Topheth," or the "Valley of Ben [the Son of] Hinnom," would have its name changed to the "Valley of Slaughter." Because the valley had water, an invading force would besiege it first; and its defenders would suffer casualties in trying to hold it. The Lord would make their plans fall to the earth. He would empty them of wisdom that could shield them and their country from the enemy.

7b–9 The tragic prospect facing the nation included death for the people at the hands of their enemies and consumption of their carcasses by birds and beasts. After the horrors and carnage of war had been perpetrated on the nation, passersby would "scoff" in scorn at the havoc. The word rendered "wounds" is used elsewhere of pestilences and literally means "blows," thus referring to the people's calamities. The calamity will be so great that the people will be reduced to cannibalism; their distress will overcome natural affection. This prediction was literally fulfilled in 586 B.C., in the Babylonian invasion under Nebuchadnezzar, and again in A.D. 70, when Titus destroyed Jerusalem (cf. Lev 26:29; Dt 28:53–57; 2Ki 6:28–29; La 2:20; 4:10).

c. The destruction of Judah (19:10–13)

10–13 After this message of doom, Jeremiah was commanded to break the jar in the sight of the elders who accompanied him. In the Near East, it is still the practice to break a jar near a person who has done wrong to one and voice the hope that he will be similarly broken. Such an action is intended to bring about the downfall of one's enemies. So Jeremiah was vividly portraying the fate of the nation. The gravity of this act lay in that it not only illustrated the Lord's acts but actually inaugurated them. This was more than dramatization; it was seen as activating the Lord's word of destruction. This explains Pashhur's violent reaction and persecution in 20:1–6. The thrust of Jeremiah's acted oracle was to show the irrevocability of the nation's ruin. They knew of no way to mend a broken jar, which could only be thrown away. So Judah would be rejected because she failed to repent.

In Judah's downfall, the dead would be so numerous that even unclean Topheth would have to be used for their burial. Topheth was a place of uncleanness (cf. 7:31), made such by the detestable idolatry practiced there. So the homes in Jerusalem would be defiled by corpses just as their idolatries had made Topheth even more a place of defilement. Even the roofs of their houses had become places of religious corruption. On their roofs the people worshiped the starry host of heaven, a form of idolatry brought from Mesopotamia, where it had flourished.

d. The message summarized (19:14–15)

14–15 In the court of the temple area, to which the prophet had returned from Hinnom, Jeremiah repeated his message of doom. Its summary gave the meaning of the act he had just carried out. The crisis is pictured as rapidly approaching. The reference to "the villages around it" is probably to Jerusalem and the cities of Judah. The cause of the nation's calamity was the people's stubborn refusal to listen to the Lord's warnings. "Stiff-necked" is a figure taken from unruly oxen who resist the yoke (cf. Ac 7:51).

10. The lament of Jeremiah (20:1–18)

The prophet's symbolic actions in the Valley of Hinnom and his words in the temple court could not have gone unnoticed. This section carries the narrative forward and shows the consequence of what Jeremiah did and said.

a. Pashhur's persecution of Jeremiah (20:1–6)

1 Among the listeners to Jeremiah's words in the temple court was Pashhur, son of Immer, the deputy or executive priest entrusted with the responsibility for maintaining order through the temple police under his charge (he was not the Pashhur referred to in 21:1 and 38:1; cf. 1Ch 9:12). The mention in 29:25–26 of another person in the same position suggests that Pashhur was taken captive to Babylon in 597 B.C. (cf. 2Ki 24:15). The date of the prophecy of ch. 19 might have been the occasion of the Babylonian victory over Egypt at the Battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.). That prophecy may have been the reason Jeremiah was denied access to the temple (cf. 36:1–3). Immer was the sixteenth priestly family that returned to Jerusalem after the Exile (1Ch 24:14). Jeremiah was a threat to the authority of the overseer priest, especially since this priest added prophecy to his duties.

2 Angered beyond control, Pashhur "struck" Jeremiah ("had Jeremiah beaten") with his open hand. This is the first recorded instance of violence done to Jeremiah. Notice that "the prophet" stands in apposition to "Jeremiah," as if to indicate the sacrilege of Pashhur's act. For him Jeremiah's words were intolerable. His ministry was becoming a political threat to those who were supposedly concerned for the nation's security. The "stocks," where the prophet was confined, were intended both for restraint and torture. They held the feet, hands, and neck so that the body was almost doubled up. Jeremiah was put in the stocks at the Upper Benjamin Gate, one of the city's most conspicuous places.

3 The next morning Pashhur released Jeremiah only to find that he had not changed his message; instead he heard words of judgment for the indignity done Jeremiah. While "Pashhur" probably means "ease" or "tranquillity," Jeremiah now gave Pashhur a new name—"Magor-Missabib," meaning "terror on every side." From that time he would be "Mr. Terror All-around." The new name symbolized the terror Pashhur would be to himself and to those about him as a consequence of what the Babylonians would instill in the people of Judah.

4 Jeremiah here interprets the new name. For his opposition to the word of God through his prophet, Pashhur would be exiled to Babylon and die there. This was God's punishment for the calamity he had helped bring on the land by opposing the truth of God. This is the first time in the book that the king of Babylon is specifically mentioned as the conqueror of Judah. That is why some date this prophecy after the Battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.), where Nebuchadnezzar was victorious. When the Exile happened, it would be evident how Pashhur, in misleading the people, was responsible for the disaster. Pashhur's policy would bring judgment on him and on all he had persuaded to follow it.

5–6 Furthermore, Babylonians would plunder the land of its wealth and all its products. Both Pashhur and his family would suffer in the fall of Jerusalem and would die in exile. Apparently Pashhur had not only given the false prophets license to lie but, though a priest, had falsely assumed the prophetic office. For this he was worthy of death. He was probably exiled in 597 B.C. (the captivity of Jehoiachin) because later (29:25–26) Zephaniah had taken over Pashhur's position.

b. Jeremiah's inescapable call (20:7–10)

The remaining verses of this chapter are the last of Jeremiah's so-called confessions and are possibly his saddest and most bitter complaints. At the same time, the passage is one of his most significant self-disclosures. It reveals not only much about the prophet but also about the whole range of canonical prophecy. Nowhere else in Scripture is a prophet's sense of divine compulsion to his mission so clearly expressed. Jeremiah never doubted the reality of his call and never lost his identity under God.

7 The verb "deceived" (GK 7331) is bold and offensive to religious sensibilities. To be sure, Jeremiah is not accusing God of lying or misrepresentation; but what he calls seduction is the divine compulsion on his spirit. He is claiming that the Lord overpersuaded him to be a prophet. He pleads that, though the Lord overcame his resistance to his call (1:4–10) and he believed the Lord's promises, he has now been abandoned to shame. But the Lord had clearly informed Jeremiah of the difficulties he would face (1:18). Understandably, he could not have conceived of the magnitude and viciousness of the opposition, but the Lord had not lied to him. He complains that God had seized and "overpowered" him. This statement shows that God's prophets did not speak by their own will. Jeremiah's message was so unpopular that he was continually being mocked and laughed at—a mockery so blatant because Jeremiah's prophecies were so long in being fulfilled. As the doom of the nation approached, he felt the Lord had overpersuaded him in calling him to the prophetic office when he did not realize all it involved.

8–9 In summary form Jeremiah sets forth the gist of his messages: "violence and destruction." Jeremiah's prophecies were about coming disaster. The burden became so heavy that he finally decided he would no longer serve as a prophet. But he found out the impossibility of denying his call. He learned that it was irreversible and that God's word was irrepressible. Though he aroused opposition from his enemies, he could find no other satisfaction than in preaching God's truth. For Jeremiah the word of God was a reality, not the product of his thinking. It demanded expression in spite of opposition and derision. So great was this compelling force of the revelation that he never doubted its reality.

10 Jeremiah amplifies the reason he was so determined to resign his prophetic office. He includes some of the sayings he has overheard his enemies using. They mimicked him with the phrase "Terror on every side!" Because he had used it so many times, they made it into a nickname. Their plots were intolerable to his sensitive soul. They plotted to report him for treason by beguiling him into unguarded words that could be construed as treasonable. Even his trusted friends waited for him to make a misstep. During the fourth year of Jehoiakim the die was cast. All Jeremiah could do from this time forward was to seek to alleviate something of the judgment that was certain to come on the nation.

c. Prayer for God's vindication (20:11–13)

11–13 This is Jeremiah's prayer and hymn of praise for the Lord's protection and vindication. This was the hope that encouraged him. A new calm enabled him to withstand all criticism and physical sufferings. His ultimate confidence was the Lord's presence as a warrior striking his foes with dread. Their defeat—never to be forgotten—was as certain as if it had already happened. The Lord, who tests his own and knows all their innermost thoughts, was Jeremiah's champion. Praise bursts forth from his grateful heart as the prophet contemplates the prospect of his ultimate vindication. His circumstances had not changed, but now he could sing for joy.

d. Jeremiah's curse on the day of his birth (20:14–18)

14 This passage is enveloped in gloom and despair, but sudden transitions are frequent in Jeremiah. The transition and contrast are psychologically understandable in view of the constant pressures on Jeremiah. Feeling an utter failure after being in the stocks, he wished he had never been born. The passage is emotionally authentic because he was being prepared for the greatest blow of all—the destruction of the beloved city of Jerusalem. The experience of Jeremiah at this time shows how difficult the task of God's servants can be and how readily available the grace of God is to sustain them in their darkest hours. Jeremiah's response is normal for one caught between two inescapable contrarieties: faithfulness to the message of God and love for one's sinful countrymen.

15–17 Jeremiah's wish that he never had been born is reminiscent of Elijah's cry when pursued by Jezebel after his victory at Mount Carmel (1Ki 19:1–3). But Jeremiah held no real animosity against the man who brought news of his birth; his cry is strictly rhetorical. In the East, the messenger who brings news of a son's birth is usually rewarded. The prophet did not curse his parents, for the law of Moses condemned this (Ex 21:17). The "towns" overthrown by the Lord are Sodom and Gomorrah. The outcry in the morning represents a call for help when under attack—either a shout of alarm or a trumpet blast. Jeremiah goes on to wish his mother's womb had been at once his birthplace and his grave.

18 As the last of Jeremiah's "confessions," this verse portrays the burden he had to bear without interruption. In his outward ministry he never wavered, but his ministry required him to spend himself totally. The "shame" he refers to is that of his inability to avert the catastrophe threatening his people. It is clear that Jeremiah had no revelation of life after death or of the resurrection of the dead. Later, the truth of his predictions was all too evident; so the ridicule against him ceased.

II. Prophecies From the Reigns of Jehoiakim and Zedekiah (21:1–39:18)

A. The Trials and Conflicts of Jeremiah (21:1–29:32)

1. Zedekiah's dilemma (21:1–14)

Chapter 21 moves on to the reign of Zedekiah (597–586 B.C.) and begins a new division of the book. Chapters 21–45 abound in references to time, place, and persons. In particular, chs. 21–23 contain a series of messages Jeremiah delivered during the reigns of Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah. Likely ch. 21 should be dated 588 B.C., when the Babylonians were advancing against Jerusalem but not yet besieging it at close range. This was the ninth year of Zedekiah's eleven-year rule. The siege lasted one and a half years (cf. 52:1, 4–7).

Chronologically, this chapter should come between chs. 37 and 38. Zedekiah was a vassal king elevated by Nebuchadnezzar (cf. 2Ki 24:17). The uncle of Jehoiachin, Zedekiah respected Jeremiah but did not have the moral courage to do what he knew was right. He was weak and vacillating, and his reign was made all the more difficult because the Jews still considered Jehoiachin (taken captive in 597 B.C.) as their true king and looked for his early return from exile. The personal interplay between Jeremiah and Zedekiah in the years before the fall of Jerusalem is one of the most remarkable features in the book (cf. 37:3–10; 38:14–18). In the unfolding of God's plan, chs. 21–29 are of vital importance because they foretell "the times of the Gentiles" (Lk 21:24).

a. The embassy from Zedekiah (21:1–7)

1–2 At the approach of the siege of Jerusalem after the Battle of Carchemish between Egypt and Babylon, Zedekiah sent a deputation to Jeremiah. Depending on Pharaoh Hophra of Egypt, Zedekiah had foolishly rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar. Now he was terrified at the desperate situation that his breach of fealty to Nebuchadnezzar had brought on him, and he wanted both Jeremiah's intercession and the Lord's intervention. Zedekiah had more respect for the prophet than Jehoiakim ever had. The members of the deputation were high officials. Pashhur is not the Pashhur referred to at 20:1 but the important official of that name in 38:1. Zephaniah succeeded Jehoiada the priest (29:25–26; 37:3; 52:24) and was second in rank to the high priest. He was slain by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah; he and Pashhur opposed Jeremiah's views of the political prospects of the nation. Verses 1–2 are a fulfillment of 15:11.

The embassy hoped that Jeremiah would pray for the Lord's intervention by lifting the siege of Nebuchadnezzar. Zedekiah wanted an oracle that would reveal the future, showing, perhaps, that the invader and his army would withdraw from the city and the land. He was evidently thinking of the times of Hezekiah (2Ki 18–19), Jehoshaphat (2Ch 20), and the judges. Zedekiah fully expected deliverance from God, though he uttered no syllable of repentance or desire to do God's will.

3–4 In answer to Zedekiah's request, Jeremiah did not equivocate. Instead of the one oracle Zedekiah desired, God gave him three: one to King Zedekiah (vv.3–7), one to the people (vv.8–10), and one to the royal Davidic house (vv.11–14). For the nation there was no word of hope. The people could expect no help from God in averting the fall of Jerusalem; in fact, the Lord himself would also fight against them. The Babylonians were to conquer them as the instruments of God's judgment; since this is what the invading Babylonians were, it would be impossible to turn them back. All Judah's resistance and all their stratagems would prove useless. The reference to turning the weapons of war against them means that their defense of Jerusalem would fail.

The Babylonians (Chaldeans; see NIV note) were originally a seminomadic tribe living between northern Arabia and the Persian Gulf. In the tenth century B.C., the Assyrians gave the name Kaldu to the area. Later, "Chaldea" was used to include Babylonia as a whole (cf. Eze 23:23; Da 3:8). When the text indicates that the Babylonians were "besieging" them, the meaning is "closing in on you" or "blockading you," because the actual siege had not yet begun. But the defenders would be driven inside the city when they could no longer fight outside it.

5 To compound Judah's misery, the Lord himself was to fight against her; thus it was too late for the request for Jeremiah's intercession. The metaphor of the outstretched hand and mighty arm had been used many times of God's miraculous intervention on Israel's behalf in Egypt. But now it is used to express God's opposition to his people. Their doom was inevitable and their defeat total. Jerusalem would be crowded with refugees who, with their cattle, would have fled from the surrounding areas.

6–7 During a siege, an epidemic is always a threat. A fearful plague would weaken the people. Then the Lord would deliver Zedekiah into the invaders' hands. Slaughter awaited Judah. The prediction about Zedekiah and his court was literally fulfilled in 586 B.C. (cf. 52:9–11, 24–27). The idiom "put them to the sword" means to slay ruthlessly, mercilessly, without quarter. The fate of Zedekiah, his sons, and many Jewish nobles is clear in the OT. Though Zedekiah was not slain, he died of grief in exile as a blinded, deposed monarch.

b. The choice of ways (21:8–10)

8–10 This section is not part of Jeremiah's answer to the king's deputation. It is difficult to determine the time of this message. The setting of "the way of life and the way of death" before the people is reminiscent of the words of Moses (cf. Dt 30:19). Here, however, it refers to escape from physical death in the fall of Jerusalem. Jeremiah's counsel was for the people to submit to Babylon. Total warfare called for unconditional surrender if they were to be spared. To speak of his nation in this way was a difficult duty for Jeremiah, and it was the reason they called him a traitor. But his motive was more than patriotism; it was the declared will of God. In 38:17–18 Jeremiah also advised giving in to the Babylonians. Again he was charged with treachery, a charge that proved false after the capture of the city when he chose to remain in the devastated land (cf. 40:6).

Though Jeremiah was actually counseling desertion (a form of treason), as a prophet of God he spoke with an authority higher than even that of a king. This made him most unpopular with the nation as a whole, which was in a life-and-death struggle with a powerful invader. Yet some people did take his advice (cf. 39:9; 52:15). All that was promised the nation was bare survival. Those who surrendered would have to realize they would lose everything but their lives. As for Jerusalem itself, it was doomed; the Babylonians, tired of repeated rebellions, would burn it.

c. Exhortation to the Davidic dynasty (21:11–14)

11–12 This message, directed to the royal house, relates to a time when there was still a possibility of escape through repentance and righteous living. The monarch and his court officials were to administer justice in the morning promptly and expeditiously. In the narrower sense, the call was to the king and his family; in the wider sense, to the entire court. It was fitting for Jeremiah to address the royal family because administering justice was the prerogative of the king and not of all. To avoid the heat of the day, court was held in the morning. Even at that late hour deliverance on these godly conditions was not impossible. It is possible that the Lord was not urging righteousness as if the people could escape punishment entirely but as the prerequisite for its mitigation.

13–14 Because of past deliverances (the city had been spared from capture for about two centuries), the people were caught up in a wholly unwarranted confidence in Jerusalem's invincibility. Complacent in their sins, the people asked, "Who can come against us?" The answer was that God would do so in judgment. They could not claim immunity from punishment on any other ground than obedience to God's will. Figuratively, "forests" was used of the royal palace (1Ki 7:2; 10:21). The prophets had a keen eye for natural beauty, and a forest connoted grandeur and stateliness. Thus this reference to forests has been equated with the entire city of Jerusalem.

2. Messages to the Davidic kings (22:1–30)

Once more Jeremiah gives us a cluster of prophecies (chs. 22–23), linked not by chronology but by similar themes. Both the temporal leaders (the kings) and the spiritual leaders (the prophets, apart from Jeremiah) were responsible for the national calamity. In the light of vv.13–18, this chapter, with its oracles about four kings of Judah, appears to belong to Jehoiakim's reign.

a. Exhortation to justice (22:1–9)

1–5 The Lord commanded Jeremiah to go down, evidently from Mount Zion, to the palace south of it. The words were directed to the ruling king and his court and are a strong exhortation to practice justice. The Lord demanded that the Davidic throne make justice its primary responsibility. The king was to be addressed publicly in the midst of his court. There was no question that the sins mentioned were present in the reigns of most Judean kings, but in Jehoiakim's time they were especially rife (cf. 2Ki 23:35). Since God never desires the death of the wicked but wants them to repent and live, the prophet held out blessing for obedience, a blessing that means nothing less than the continued prosperity of the Davidic dynasty, with the people settled securely in the land. On the other hand, the penalty was also specified; namely, desolation of the house of David and of the land. To emphasize the truth and solemnity of the occasion, the Lord swore by himself. There could be no stronger ratification of a declaration from God.

6–9 These four verses give a clear picture of desolation. Gilead and Lebanon in the north are mentioned because they were regions famous for their beautiful forests. Moreover, the cedars of Lebanon were largely used in the construction of Solomon's palace. The cedar columns were like trees of Gilead and Lebanon in their loftiness and magnificence. Those who destroyed this grandeur would be God's instruments of judgment. Even the surrounding nations would realize that the fall of Jerusalem and its palace were the work of the Lord. Furthermore, they would also know the cause of the judgment. The covenant they violated would not be the Davidic covenant of 2Sa 7 but the initial covenant at Sinai referred to over and over in the earlier portion of the book. The extensive devastation would be a lesson to the nations on the perils of idolatry.

b. The fate of Shallum (Jehoahaz) (22:10–12)

10–12 Jeremiah tells the nation at large that they need not mourn the death of the godly king Josiah, who had been slain at the Battle of Megiddo in 609 B.C. (cf. 2Ki 23:29–35; 2Ch 35:75; Zec 12:11). It had become customary among God's people to sing dirges for departed rulers. But now they were to reserve their weeping for Josiah's son Shallum-Jehoahaz, who was to be forever exiled from the land. The fate of the slain Josiah was better than that of his son who was exiled to Egypt and died there (cf. 2Ki 23:34). Jehoahaz was the first ruler of Judah to die in exile. He took the throne following the tragic death of his father (cf. 1Ch 3:15). This arrangement did not meet the pleasure of Pharaoh Neco, who after three months deposed him and exiled him to Egypt. His older brother Eliakim, whose name Neco changed to Jehoiakim, was chosen by Neco to succeed Jehoahaz. Jehoahaz is contrasted with his father Josiah to highlight the tragic condition of the young king. Mourning would be more in place for him than for his departed father, Josiah.

c. The condemnation of Jehoiakim (22:13–23)

13–14 The prophecy against Jehoiakim is the most scathing of all Jeremiah's messages against kings. Though a son of the godly Josiah, Jehoiakim was the opposite of his father in temperament, action, and attitude toward God. There was constant conflict between the prophet and the king (609–597 B.C.). Jeremiah does not mince matters in stating the enormity of Jehoiakim's injustice and oppression. He mixed injustice with luxury. The building mania, common among Oriental monarchs, had seized him. What aggravated the condition of the nation was that, while he was paying heavy tribute to Neco, Jehoiakim decided to build and beautify his palace by forced, unpaid labor (cf. 2Ki 23:34–35), in direct violation of the law of Moses

(cf. Lev 19:13; Dt 24:14–15). The appointments of his palace were sumptuous indeed. Jeremiah's reference to the people as the neighbors of the king shows how God regarded the sovereign-subject relationship in Israel.

15–16 Jehoiakim is contrasted with his father, Josiah. Scathingly, Jeremiah asks Jehoiakim whether building palaces of cedar made him a king. He had mistaken fine buildings as the mark of a true king. A splendid commendation of Josiah, who held to true values, follows. He enjoyed the normal comforts of life but never made ostentation his goal. He knew how to enjoy life without extortion or oppression. He was no ascetic but did not make it his ambition to rival Solomon in building. For Josiah to do justice and righteousness was food and drink. Therefore, he received the blessing and commendation of God. His deeds reflected true kingly piety, namely, to love God so much that he would not allow any of his subjects to be neglected in their hour of need. Fellowship with God is evidenced in social justice.

17 But Jehoiakim had a contrary spirit, and with splendid irony Jeremiah points out what Jehoiakim excelled in. His motivation was covetousness. This led him to practice oppression and extortion in order to pile up dishonest gain. Finally, he did not stop at "shedding innocent blood," which may mean that Jehoiakim persecuted innocent persons after rendering unjust decisions on them or that he had them slain (see 26:20–23).

18–19 Following this exposure of Jehoiakim's evil ways, the intrepid prophet tells him of the disgraceful death that awaited him; there would be no mourning for Jehoiakim. The references to brother and sister show by parallelism that his kin would not grieve for him, nor would he be lamented by subjects or friends. He would be buried without any royal funeral ceremonies (cf. 2Ch 35:24–25). But most shocking of all, Jehoiakim would be buried with a donkey's burial; his body would be left to the beasts and birds (cf. 36:30). He would be thrown outside the gates of Jerusalem, as though to insure that he would no longer pollute the city in death as he had done in life. He died in 597 B.C.

20 This section probably is to be dated 597 B.C. Jeremiah calls on his contemporaries to mourn the disastrous results brought on the land by the foolish international policy of Jehoiakim. The occasion was probably the eve of Nebuchadnezzar's expedition against Judah. The regions mentioned—Lebanon, Bashan, and Abarim—represent the land in its entirety, from north to northeast to southeast. The invaders would overrun the whole land. Abarim refers to the regions beyond the Jordan, i.e., the mountains of Moab, east of the Dead Sea (cf. Nu 27:12; Dt 32:49). Likely the "allies" (lit., "lovers," "paramours"; GK 170) were Egypt and the other nations Jehoiakim relied on for aid against the Babylonians, because of the contrast with the nation's leaders—"your shepherds."

21–23 Jeremiah emphasizes the nation's practice of disobedience. The people all persisted in their willfulness in spite of God's blessing on them in times of prosperity ("when you felt secure"). The winds of adversity and invasion would carry off their leaders and allies alike. "You who live in Lebanon" refers to the king and his nobles in their cedar palaces. Jerusalem considered herself secure, like the eagles nesting in the cedars of Lebanon (cf. 21:13).

d. The rejection of Coniah (Jehoiachin) (22:24–30)

24–27 Coniah is the abbreviated form of Jeconiah, an alternate form of Jehoiachin. The son and successor of Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin was exiled in Babylon in 597 B.C. (cf. 2Ki 24:8–17; 25:27–30), after a reign of three months. Coniah's full name (Jeconiah) means "the LORD will establish," but permanence and stability were not his portion because of his wickedness. His punishment was mitigated after thirty-seven years (52:31–34).

The signet of a king was very valuable because it was used to authenticate official correspondence and documents. Jeremiah declared that even if Jehoiachin was as dear to God as a signet ring on God's right hand (and he was not), he would be torn off for his misdeeds. Jehoiachin and his mother (Nehushta [2Ki 24:8]) would suffer exile and die in Babylon, despite the promises of the false prophets (cf. 52:31–34). Both were taken to Babylon and never returned.

28–29 As though this fate was not enough, Jeremiah predicts severe judgment into the distant future. The questions show Jehoiachin's rejection by the Lord. They expected affirmative answers, but Jeremiah's concern was for the Davidic line rather than for Jehoiachin personally. He is likened to a broken earthenware pot, undesirable and worthless. His descendants are mentioned because children were born to him in captivity. There was apparently a desire to restore Jehoiachin from Babylon to replace Zedekiah (cf. 28:11; 29:1–32). Before he makes a final pronouncement on Jehoiachin, Jeremiah calls three times on the "land" to hear the word of the Lord. The whole nation was to be impressed by the fate of Jehoiachin.

30 The command to "record" (GK 4180) relates to a register of citizens (cf. Isa 4:3), i.e, a census list. Jehoiachin had seven sons (cf. 1Ch 3:17), but none succeeded him on the throne. Matthew's genealogy (1:12) includes Jehoiachin but shows only who Jesus' legal father was, not his natural one. Zerubbabel, grandson of Jehoiachin, though governor of Judah in 520 B.C., never ruled as king, nor did any other descendant of his. Jehoiachin's uncle, Zedekiah, reigned after him but died before him (cf. 52:10–11). Jehoiachin was thus the last of the Judean kings. In him the royal line became extinct. So ch. 23 goes on to speak of the new King to be raised up by the Lord (cf. 23:5–6).

3. Messiah the King (23:1–40)

This chapter is linked to Jeremiah's denunciation of the godless kings of Judah. The three already mentioned in ch. 22 are included along with Zedekiah. The date is probably in the time of Zedekiah's reign, which may also account for the fact that of the five monarchs (including godly Josiah) he is not mentioned by name (cf. Eze 34:1–6).

a. Godless leaders versus David's Righteous Branch (23:1–8)

1–2 The "shepherds" (GK 8286) on whom Jeremiah pronounced woe were not only kings but all the leaders of Judah—the civil leaders and the spiritual leaders (the prophets and priests). In Zedekiah's reign the court officials exercised inordinate influence on policy because of his weakness (cf. 38:5). The leaders were guilty of gross dereliction of duty. By oppression and shedding innocent blood, they destroyed the flock; those who were not destroyed were scattered to wander without protection. So the leaders were guilty of the very things the shepherds were charged with preventing. By leading the nation into idolatry, and so into the Babylonian captivity, the leaders had scattered the people. Moreover, contrary to the duty of shepherds to lead and feed the flock, they had driven the flock away. The doom on the people would not leave their leaders unscathed.

3–4 Just as the scattering of the people was literal, so also would the regathering be. The promise of restoration presupposes the Exile. The return from dispersion had already been announced in 3:15–18. Now it is God himself who does the work of the true shepherd, regathering his sheep from all countries. A world-wide dispersion is in view, not just in Assyria and Babylon. What the shepherds did in driving the people away is now attributed to the Lord because he ultimately carried out the penalty brought on them by their own sins and by the sins of their leaders (shepherds). The people would be returned to their own pasture. Moreover, God would replace the faithless shepherds with faithful ones. They would rule in godliness under the ideal King. The fulfillment of this prophecy awaits eschatological times (cf. Mt 19:28). The hour when assured peace will be Israel's and none will be missing or lost has not yet come.

5 The reference to good shepherds leads on to a prediction of the Messiah, the Davidic King par excellence. Though Jeremiah has few direct references to the messianic King, this is surely such an instance. The formula "days are coming" is a messianic formula; Jeremiah uses it to direct special attention to what is stated. In contrast to the troublous times of Jeremiah's day, there will be a time of blessing ahead. The promise is centered in David in view of the covenant in 2Sa 7:8–16.

After Jeremiah has denounced the faithless shepherds of the nation and has predicted the coming of good shepherds, he describes as a climax the incomparable rule of the King Messiah, the "Branch" (GK 7542). This designation has much in common semantically with "seed" (Ge 3:15), the Davidic "son" (2Sa 7), and the "servant of the LORD" (Isa 42–53). In each case there is a general reference to a number of individuals; but by a process of strict selection and narrowing down, the seed, the son, and the servant ultimately find highest fulfillment in the Lord Jesus, the Messiah, "the Seed of the Woman," "the Son of David," and "the Servant of the LORD." The Lord was thus superintending the historical process in such a way that his ultimate choice unmistakably was Jesus of Nazareth.

It is clear that the term "Branch" is symbolic of the Messiah because the adjective modifying it is a quality of persons and not plants. The shoot or sprout is a scion of the stock of David. "Branch" has a collective meaning when used horticulturally but not when used symbolically. Furthermore, the collective sense cannot be permitted here because (1) "a King who will reign" cannot refer to a number of kings; (2) "The LORD Our Righteousness" cannot speak of a series of monarchs; and (3) the parallel passages refer to one person (cf. 30:9; Eze 31:23–24; 37:24; for the use of Branch for the Messiah, cf. Isa 4:2; Jer 33:15; Zec 3:8; 6:12). Moreover, he will reign as a true king, not as a puppet like Zedekiah and his immediate predecessors. He will execute justice and righteousness like his ancestor David (cf. 2Sa 8:15). In contrast to the inequities and injustices common to the Davidic kings, the Messiah's reign will be the opposite.

6 Now Jeremiah dilates on the benefits that will come to Messiah's people from his reign. First, he will rule over a reunited nation; both Judah and Israel will be restored (cf. Eze 37:19). Second, he will bring salvation to his people. The verb "saved" (GK 3828) denotes spiritual deliverance. Third, peace and security will characterize Messiah's righteous rule.

Much diversity of opinion surrounds the interpretation of the last half of v.6. Does it refer to the nation as a whole (cf. 33:16)? That it is a symbolic surname (not for actual use but as an ideal inscription or objective characterization) seems apparent. This King who is "The LORD Our Righteousness" will be righteousness in actuality. Some see here the name of the Messiah and that of none other. It would, they believe, be totally out of keeping with the context for Jeremiah to be speaking of a Davidic descendant and then without warning or preparation to turn to a name for Jerusalem. The Jews also understood the name to be that of the Messiah.

7–8 That which is directly and inseparably related to the messianic hope is the national restoration of Israel (cf. 16:14–15). The future restoration of the people will exceed anything in the past. It will surpass the deliverance from Egypt. The Exodus will pale into insignificance in comparison with the future ingathering of the nation from worldwide dispersion. The inauguration of the new Exodus cannot be equated with the return of Israel under Cyrus in the last part of the sixth century B.C. (cf. Isa 11:11–12).

b. Condemnation of the false prophets (23:9–12)

9 The remainder of this chapter gives Jeremiah's classic denunciation of the false prophets. Because the tension between Jeremiah and the false prophets was greatest during Zedekiah's reign, this section may well be dated from that reign. The false prophets' characteristics were that (1) they used God's name without authorization, (2) they were of low moral character, (3) they spread false hopes and promises among the people, (4) the source of their messages was their own minds or those of other false prophets, and (5) they were never called of God. Other prophets also denounced these misleaders of the people (cf. Isa 28:7–13; Eze 13:1–16; Mic 3:5–12). Jeremiah did not take his condemnation of the false prophets lightly. It cost him tremendous emotional and physical stress. Next to the ungodly kings, they were those most responsible for bringing about the nation's ruin. He was disturbed and shocked at the enormity of their offenses and was so overcome with the trauma of it that he could only liken himself to a drunken man. Jeremiah showed no vindictiveness against those who tried to nullify his life's work, only heartbrokenness. When he contrasted their evil ways and words with the holy words of God, it was more than he could contemplate without deep agony of soul.

10 As always, immorality directly leads to godlessness. The influence of the false prophets on the nation was totally evil; the people followed the evil ways of their leaders. The adultery referred to is not just the spiritual unfaithfulness of breaking the covenant with God but the gross immorality of these godless men, whose ways could never lead to repentance. The curse on violation of the laws of God was manifest in a drought. Their use of their power was perverted. Only in doing wrong were they strong.

11–12 Furthermore, the false prophets had accomplices—the priests. Instead of drawing the people to God, the priests were part of the national corruption. Their wickedness reached into the house of God itself; it was either greed like that of Eli's sons or idolatry as in Manasseh's day (cf. 1Sa 2:12–17, 22; 2Ki 21:5; 23:12; Eze 8:6, 10, 14, 16). The penalty for such sin would be spiritual blindness. "Slippery paths" symbolizes the punishment of falling into perilous life situations. The imagery of darkness parallels 13:16.

c. False prophecy in Samaria and Jerusalem (23:13–15)

13–15 The prophets of the northern kingdom (Samaria) were devoted to Baal and seduced the people from worshiping God. The prophets of the southern kingdom were worse, having learned nothing from the sinful deeds and tragic consequences of their counterparts in the north. The Samaritan prophets prophesied by a false god, but the Jerusalem prophets were misusing God's name and committing moral outrages. Polluted by adultery, advocating idolatry, living in immorality, and being indifferent to good and encouraging evil, they hardened the nation against repentance. The Jerusalem prophets had no influence for godliness. In God's sight all the people of Jerusalem had become as bad as those of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the prophets were the instigators. God's only recourse was to punish the prophets, and this he declares in unequivocal terms. Because they had poisoned the nation's spiritual springs, the Lord would inflict drastic judgment on them—portrayed by "bitter food" ("wormwood"; i.e., strong smelling and bitter tasting) and "poisoned water."

d. Characteristics of lying prophecy (23:16–22)

16–17 The false prophets' messages originated with them and thus lacked any real authority (cf. v.18). When they deceived the people with empty hopes by self-devised messages, they showed that their words had not come from the mouth of the Lord. The heart of false prophecy was that it always held out false hope. Therefore the false prophets led the sinning nation into false security that prevented moral transformation. Because they continually denied any future evil or calamity, they could be called "success prophets." Their messages of peace and prosperity at any price marked them out as false. True prophets were burdened by necessary messages of doom (cf. 28:8–9).

18 According to Eastern custom, ministers or royal servants remained standing during deliberations. Standing in the council of the Lord pictures a group of friends in close consultation (cf. Ps 25:14). The council concept was an integral part of monotheism and was based on the Lord's desire to share his truth with his trusted servants. The reason for the false prophets' corruption was that they had not gone to the fountainhead for their message. Anyone who had had intimate dealings with the Lord could not follow the ways of the lying prophets (cf. v.22).

19–20 The tempest of the divine wrath was soon to burst upon the impenitent wicked. When that judgment finally fell, there would be no mistaking the Lord's intention. The force of the phrase "in days to come" is that when the judgment finally came, events would show the nation the truth of Jeremiah's words and warnings.

21–22 Because Jeremiah's message was relentlessly opposed by the false prophets, he had to express God's displeasure against them and their deceitful works. He showed clearly that no prophet of God can ever derive his message from observing the times he lives in. Graphically, Jeremiah points out how the words of the lying prophets were wholly unauthorized. Their call was merely from themselves. They never received a divine commission (cf. v.32); yet they ran, with their false messages, eagerly and energetically trying to accomplish their own objectives. No words could more emphatically state the falsity of their lives and ministry. On the other hand, if they had been in the intimate circle where God divulges his plans to his faithful followers, i.e., in his council, they would have uttered God's truth to his needy people. The result would have been the repentance of the nation and their restoration to godliness. A proof of the true prophet was his desire to win others to the way of godliness in which he himself was walking. The results of his ministry were indicators of the genuineness of his call and message.

e. Lying versus true prophets (23:23–32)

23–24 The questions in this section are meant to point out that the Lord cannot be circumscribed as though the false prophets could escape his notice. God is not a localized deity whom it is easy to avoid; he is inescapable (cf. Ps 139:7–10). God is both immanent and transcendent, omniscient and omnipresent. The false prophets cannot hide from God's judgment. An omnipresent and omniscient God cannot be deceived and has surely heard the lies of the false prophets.

25–26 This section contains a strong contrast between dreams and the word of God. Jeremiah is not denying that dreams were a legitimate method of divine revelation. But some of the false prophets relied on their dreams as the origin of their inspiration, a channel of revelation easily abused and counterfeited. The deceivers knew just how to trick the gullible, but the omniscient Lord was aware of their lies.

27–29 The impunity of the falsifiers would not last. They were having the same baneful effect on the contemporaries of Jeremiah as Baal worship had had on an earlier generation. When the lying prophets prophesied, the Lord was banished from the hearts of the nation. The truth of God and mere dreams were so different in essence that they had to be kept separate. If a prophet had a dream, he was to relate it as a dream and nothing more. Words of the false prophets have no value; those of the true messengers of God are as wheat, as food for believers. So Jeremiah then presents the qualities of the true word. In contrast to the useless, powerless words of the false prophets, God's truth is like fire. It is penetrating and purifying, and it consumes evil (cf. 5:14; 20:9). Moreover, God's word is full of power like a hammer strongly wielded. His message does not lull people in their sins; it crushes the heart to bring it to repentance. The true word convicts and converts; it neither amuses nor entertains.

30–32 Jeremiah describes three classes of false prophets. Three times he declares that the Lord is against the false prophets (each verse begins with a statement of the opposition of God to the godless seers). The first group misappropriate the prophecies of the true prophets, giving them out as their own. To their lies they add plagiarism; their words were not original but stolen from others. A second group are accused of using their tongues as the main weapon in their deceptions. They "wag" them to introduce their lies by the formula of the true prophets: "The LORD declares." They did this to give their words a ring of authenticity. The last group held national interests paramount. Their word—true or not—must lift national morale. No wonder the prophet refers to their speech as empty talk.

f. The burden of the Lord (23:33–40)

33–34 There is here a play on the word "oracle" (massa; GK 5363). In its main meaning, massa comes from the verb "to lift, lift up"; thus it denotes a "burden" in the physical sense. By usage, however, the word came to mean that which was placed as a burden on the heart of a prophet, having already been such on the heart of God. Thus it referred to a threatening prediction or "oracle." Jeremiah indicates that the people, the priests, and the prophets had begun to use this important word mockingly and derisively. They would ask Jeremiah, "What is the oracle [burden] now?" The answer to the question in KJV and NASB is stated either as "What burden?" or "What burden!" NIV has "What oracle?" The LXX, Vulgate, and NRSV translate it, "You are the burden!" Not only were the lying prophets the burden, but the Lord immediately indicated that he would unburden himself of them. The word of God is ultimately not the burden on them, but they are a burden to the Lord.

35–37 Moreover, because the false prophets derisively called the word of the Lord a burden, when they themselves were a constant burden to him, the word "oracle" ("burden") was forbidden them. Since they misused the word, they were no longer to use it in their prophecies. So Jeremiah's contention was that, since all the prophets of his day were using this phrase in their oracles, such frequent and overdone usage destroyed the force of the words. Their use showed irreverence and impenitence. Interestingly, though the term

"oracle" was used by canonical prophets, Jeremiah never used it of his own prophecies because it had become the hallmark of the lying prophets. Punishment would now follow their use of the word. Jeremiah even points out how they should inquire about a message from God. There were clear alternatives to "oracle" ("burden") they could use. What lying prophets spoke in jest would be found to be heavy indeed. Their mockery of the word would weigh them down and crush them. This was the penalty for misusing that word for their own purposes.

38–40 The last three verses of the chapter deal with the penalty for ignoring the Lord's admonition. The result of the false prophets' pointless mockery of God's oracles against them would be that they would live to fulfill them. False prophecy had assumed such proportions that drastic measures had to be taken to eliminate it. The horrifying prospect of being utterly forgotten of God loomed before the lying prophets.

4. The good and the bad figs (24:1–10)

This chapter belongs to the same period as chs. 22 and 23, namely, in the reign of Zedekiah. Its date is fairly well indicated by the chronological reference in v.1. The time was after Nebuchadnezzar had deported Jeconiah and his skilled laborers to Babylon in 597 B.C. Ezekiel was included in this captivity, which carried off the better element of the nation, those who would be useful to Nebuchadnezzar in his building projects and would not participate in a siege against his invading forces (cf. 2Ki 24:14–16).

a. The vision of the baskets of figs (24:1–3)

1–3 The purpose of the vision was to declare that those who went into exile with Jehoiachin would be better off than those left behind in Jerusalem; those who escaped the deportation would naturally think just the opposite. The emphasis is on the poor caliber of leadership left in Judah in contrast to the able men now in Babylon (cf. 52:28). Fig trees in Palestine produce fruit three times a year. The first-ripe figs are especially juicy and are considered a delicacy; they ripen in June (cf. Isa 28:4; Hos 9:10). The question the Lord asked Jeremiah was meant to focus attention on the vision and its explanation.

One of the most common trees in ancient Palestine was the fig tree, bearing its fruit.

b. The explanation of the good figs (24:4–7)

4–7 This passage identifies the good figs and holds out some comprehensive promises of future blessing: (1) constant prosperity from the Lord, (2) restoration to their own land, (3) permanent establishment in that land, and (4) spiritual turning to the Lord in genuine conversion. The passage says that the good figs are the exiles of 597 B.C. under Jehoiachin. The word "good" refers to the exiles' circumstances (they were not taken to Babylon for their piety and goodness). But the Lord promised that he would look with favor on them, which was manifested in their exemption from the horrors of the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. and in their being cured of idolatry. These exiles prospered in Babylon (cf. 2Ki 25:27–30; Jer 29:4–7), and the influence of men like Daniel must have helped them. Jeremiah's evaluation of them was the exact opposite of the opinion prevalent among the people of the land. To them, the very fact that they had escaped exile was an evident token of God's favor to them.

After purification in Babylon, the exiles would return, whereas those left in Jerusalem would be slain at the destruction of the city. What appeared in 597 B.C. to be all disaster, the Lord would overrule for good. Jeremiah was right: the future of the nation lay with its exiled portion. Physical restoration to the land would be followed by spiritual renewal. God foretold their reinstatement into the original covenant (cf. 31:31–34)—an event in the distant future.

c. The meaning of the bad figs (24:8–10)

8 The bad figs represent Zedekiah and his courtiers, and for them a bleak future is prophesied. Those who remained with Zedekiah were yet to be scattered in disgrace. The reference to those living in Egypt could be the Jews who were deported with Jehoahaz to Egypt by Pharaoh Neco (cf. 2Ki 23:31–34). Or perhaps they were emigrants who were opposed to the Babylonian domination of Judah or who fled to Egypt at the first approach of Nebuchadnezzar. Archaeological research reveals that those who remained in Egypt set up a rival temple; the Elephantine Papyri confirm a Jewish colony with a temple in Egypt before 525 B.C.

9–10 The doom awaiting the Jews in Judah and Egypt is detailed. The new exiles would witness the same privations as the previous ones had. The people had failed to repent. Those left behind became more hardened in their wickedness. The broad prediction in v.9 surely looks beyond the imminent Babylonian exile to a worldwide dispersion. The prophecy of v.10 was fulfilled in part in the fall of Jerusalem in Nebuchadnezzar's day (cf. Dt 28:25, 37) but more so in the siege of Jerusalem by the Roman emperor Titus in A.D. 70 (cf. Mt 23:38).

5. Prophecy of the Babylonian captivity (25:1–38)

In 605 B.C., the Babylonians defeated the Egyptians at the Battle of Carchemish, thus bringing to an end the domination of Palestine by Pharaoh Neco of Egypt. This decisive battle affected the course of history in western Asia. Through it Jeremiah was enabled by the Lord to see the working out of the divine purposes of judgment on Judah. Not only is ch. 25 important historically, geographically, and prophetically; it is also remarkable for the abundance of its ideas, the variety of its figures, and the diversity of its style in treating the same theme of sin, repentance, and judgment.

a. Israel's rejection of the prophetic ministry (25:1–7)

1 This prophecy is precisely dated to show its extraordinary significance. The fourth year of Jehoiakim synchronizes with the first year of Nebuchadnezzar (cf. 36:1; 45:1; 46:2), i.e., 605 B.C. This verse and Da 1:1 are not in conflict. Archaeology has shown that there were two methods of chronological reckoning in the Near East—by accession year and by nonaccession year. Judah used the first method; Babylon, the second.

The first year of Nebuchadnezzar marked his first invasion of Judah with his allies (cf. 2Ki 24:1–2). It also began an important era in redemption history—"the times of the Gentiles" (cf. Lk 21:24)—because his reign began the succession of the four great kingdoms that exercised world dominion (cf. Da 2; 7). The emphasis in vv.1–7 rests on Israel's continued disobedience. Jeremiah's purpose was to lead the nation to reconsider her past sinful ways and to alert her to the future. The Lord's patience with Israel had at last been exhausted.

2–7 That Jeremiah could address "all" in Jerusalem and Judah shows that he was still able to move about freely and speak publicly (cf. 36:1, 5, 26). It must have been sad for him to look back on twenty-three years of faithful ministry for the Lord and then to have to pronounce it a failure as far as Judah was concerned. Nineteen years under Josiah and four under Jehoiakim (Jehoahaz and Jehoiachin ruled only three months each) did not suffice to turn Judah to repentance; she would not hear. It was now about the middle of Jeremiah's career (cf. 1:2–3), and more difficult days lay ahead. Moreover, in his grace the Lord had sent other godly prophets contemporary with Jeremiah to warn Judah of the impending disaster (Uriah, Zephaniah, and Habakkuk). The heart of the message of all true prophets was the appeal to God, lest the nation jeopardize the blessings of God and the privilege of living in the Promised Land. Above all, the people were repeatedly exhorted to forsake the senseless worship of idols; but their response was always the same—persistent obstinacy.

b. Prediction of the Exile (25:8–11)

8–9 Because of Israel's determined disobedience, the Lord had his agent of judgment ready to inflict the merited judgment. That agent was Nebuchadnezzar and his followers. The reference to "peoples of the north" is probably to the Babylonians in general. Nebuchadnezzar is designated three times as the Lord's "servant" (here; 27:6; 43:10), which shows the magnitude of the work committed to him (cf. Isa 44:28; 45:1). As the Lord's instrument, he was to execute the divine plan for Judah and the nations. He was unconsciously doing God's will by devoting whole populations to destruction.

10–11 Specifically, Jeremiah points out the domestic effects of invasion. Normal life would be totally disrupted, and the land would be shorn of its inhabitants. All joy and domestic work would go. Sounds of normal human activity would cease. In v.11, Jeremiah for the first time indicates the duration of the captivity in Babylon—seventy years (cf. 29:10). Most who take the number of years to be precise—namely, from the fourth year of Jehoiakim (the first year of Nebuchadnezzar) to the end of the Babylonian dynasty with the coming of Cyrus (cf. 2Ch 36:21–22; Ezr 1:1–3)—hold that the reckoning must be precise because Daniel (cf. 9:1–2) went to Babylon with the first deportation and knew that he had been there seventy years. Furthermore, the number of years involved in the period of the seventy heptads of years in Da 9:24–27 is based on the years of the Captivity.

Defenders of the precise period of seventy years offer a choice between 605 B.C. (or 606) and 536 B.C., when resettlement took place under Zerubbabel and Joshua; or 586 B.C., the beginning of the Babylonian captivity, and 516 B.C., the year of the completion of Zerubbabel's temple. The former appears more tenable in view of the period of the three deportations, dating from Jehoiakim's reign to Jehoiachin's to Zedekiah's.

c. Judgment on Babylon (25:12–14)

12–14 The same divine principles that worked against Judah's sin would also be effective against Babylon. Its rule was terminated by the Medes and Persians under Cyrus (c. 536–535 B.C.). The threat of everlasting desolation probably looks beyond the near future to a far-distant day. Babylon was not to be punished for carrying out God's will but for her own sins (cf. 50:11–13; Isa 13:19). God used Babylon, not because of her merit, but because of Israel's sin. Verse 14 indicates that Babylon would receive retribution in kind (cf. 50:29; 51:24). The "many nations" and "great kings" refer to the Medes and Persians with their many allies or tributary kings under Cyrus the Great. They would impose forced labor on the once-invincible Babylonians.

d. The cup of God's wrath (25:15–29)

15–16 This powerful passage records a message about God's wrath on Judah and the nations. It is not that the nations would be given a potion to help them endure the force of God's fury but that the cup symbolizes his wrath. As the agent of God's fury, Nebuchadnezzar would be victorious over the nations. There is no need to believe that Jeremiah actually took a cup and went to these nations, because stupefying judgments are figured here. The cup is a common figure in Scripture to signify God's wrath (cf. 49:12; 51:7; Jn 18:11; Rev 14:8, 10; 16:19; 18:6; et al.). With the mention of the sword, fact replaces the figure. The horrors of war would drive the nations mad.

17–18 But how did Jeremiah take the cup and make all the nations drink it? The cup is not a physical cup but the wrath of God, and the drinking is not physical. Jeremiah declared the Lord's judgment on the nations through Babylon as his instrument. The roster of the nations that would suffer judgment began with Jerusalem and Judah. All the nations named in chs. 46–51 except Damascus are included. The list runs from south to north, from Egypt to Persia. The kings of Judah include Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah. The sins of Judah and her kings had been most offensive to God because Judah was so highly privileged. So they are the first to be mentioned. The words "as they are today" may have been inserted by Jeremiah after the fulfillment of the prophecy.

19–22 Egypt is listed after Judah because Pharaoh Neco instigated the alliance against the Babylonians. "All the foreign people" have been understood as being the mercenaries who joined the Egyptian forces, or foreigners in general, or some of the Egyptians of mixed blood. Uz (cf. Job 1:1) was east or northeast of Edom. The Philistine pentapolis, except for Gath, is mentioned next; by this time it had lost its importance (cf. 2Ch 26:6; Am 6:2). Jeremiah speaks of the remnant of Ashdod because that city was destroyed by Psammetik I (663–609 B.C.) after a siege of twenty-nine years. Ashdod was rebuilt in Nehemiah's day (Ne 13:23). Edom, Moab, and Ammon, all blood relations of Israel, were in Transjordania. The main Phoenician cities, Tyre and Sidon, are named as objects of Babylon's wrath. The coastlands were the Phoenician colonies in the Mediterranean, which some have identified with Cyprus.

23–25 The Lord's judgment moves on to other nations. Now northern Arabian tribes are mentioned. Dedan, a son of Abraham by Keturah, lived southeast of Edom (cf. Ge 25:3). Tema was a son of Ishmael (cf. Ge 25:15; Job 6:19). Buz represents a tribe descended from Nahor, brother of Abraham (cf. Ge 22:21). "All who are in distant places" are the Bedouins of the Arabian desert (cf. 9:26; 49:23). They are followed by the inhabitants of the portion of Arabia contiguous to Palestine. The "foreign people" may refer to many tribes of Arabia that had intermarried with Cushite elements. The location of Zimri is unknown. Perhaps Zimri is to be connected with Zimran, a son of Abraham by Keturah (cf. Ge 25:2). He lived in a region between Arabia and Persia. Elam and Media were lands east of the Tigris River. The first was northeast of the Persian Gulf, about 200 miles east of Babylon, and is here representative of all Persia. It was known as Elymais by the Greeks. Media was north and west of Persia. The arm of Babylon was to reach afar to the Caspian Sea, ultimately encompassing a worldwide dominion (cf. Da 2:38; 4:22).

26 Finally Jeremiah reaches the culminating point of the prophecy—the judgment of "Sheshach." This name occurs only in Jeremiah. Following Jerome, many hold that the name is a cryptogram (code) that stands for Babylon (see NIV note). The technical name for this type of cipher is Atbash, a system of secret writing that substituted the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet for the first, the next to the last for the second, and so through all the Hebrew consonants (cf. v.12; 51:1, 41, where the Chaldeans are meant under "Leb Kamai"). Sheshach has three consonants in Hebrew. By substituting sh = b (twice) and ch (or k) = l, we get bbl, the Hebrew consonants for Babylon (GK 951). The phrase "after all of them" indicates that Babylon's judgment too will come finally. Jeremiah may have resorted to the code name while Nebuchadnezzar was at the gates of Jerusalem.

27–29 This passage underscores the inevitability of the judgment Jeremiah has been describing. The same divine governmental principles apply to the other nations just as they do to Israel. The meaning of the cup metaphor is set forth. In a series of staccato commands, the Lord addresses all the aforementioned nations. They must be reduced to utter helplessness. Should any nation be so foolish as to seek to resist the will of God through Babylon, it will be futile. With irresistible logic God asks, as it were, "If Israel suffers, will you nations escape?" It will be impossible for any people to escape destruction for their sins (cf. Eze 9:6; 1Pe 4:17).

e. Judgment on all the world (25:30–38)

30–33 Turning from the metaphor of the cup, Jeremiah uses the metaphor of the lion. Like a lion's roar, the Lord's voice sounds from heaven against his own fold—the Holy Land and its people. Again, judgment begins with Judah. Suddenly the imagery shifts to a vintage scene, which was always attended with shouts of rejoicing. The shouting symbolizes a war cry; here it becomes the shout of the Lord treading down the nations (cf. Isa 63:3; Rev 14:19–20; 19:15). The noise is like the trampling of an army; it is the crash of war. Again changing the figure, Jeremiah portrays a lawsuit in which God is both prosecutor and judge of all the nations. Then he takes another metaphor of judgment from nature, namely, that of a tempest (i.e., Nebuchadnezzar). Nation after nation will fall under the domination of Babylon. Then in plain prose Jeremiah describes the appalling scene of the multitudes of unburied dead.

34–38 Jeremiah returns three times to the shepherd metaphor for the leaders of the nation. In each instance the shepherds are called "leaders of the flock," in short, the elite of the nation. They are to weep, wail, and cover themselves as thickly with dust as though they had rolled in it. The hour of reckoning has come so that only slaughter and dispersion remain for them. Jeremiah, great writer that he is, moves from the figure of a flock of sheep to that of "fine pottery" smashed by a fall. Flight from the calamity will be out of the question. The leaders will be inconsolable because with the decimation of the flock their pastures will be destroyed. Even the peaceful land will suffer the ravages of the Lord's anger. As a lion abandons a den that has been destroyed, so the Lord will abandon his own land after he has devastated it with the sword of the oppressive invader.

6. Consequences of the temple address (26:1–24)

Chapters 26–45 combine incidents in the life of Jeremiah. Some are autobiographical; others are biographical. This chapter gives us the setting of the temple address (7:1–20). The affinities between chs. 7 and 26 are too many and too minute for them not to relate to the same address. Here the emphasis is on the results of the temple address and on a brief summary of it. The heart of the temple address was that unless Judah repented, Jerusalem would be as Shiloh. By his specific warnings, Jeremiah had incurred the wrath of the false prophets and their followers. And later on when he predicted the seventy years' captivity, they tried to bring about his death.

a. The temple address (26:1–6)

1–3 The Lord gave the prophet specific orders as to where and when he would address the nation and what he would say to them. The date is chronologically earlier than that of 25:1, most likely being the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign with his accession year (609–608 B.C.).

To give the greatest publicity to his message, Jeremiah was charged to stand in the outer court, where the people assembled. It was doubtless a feast day when the people from the towns of Judah came together for worship. Furthermore, Jeremiah was not to omit a word of his message for fear of the consequences of his preaching. Nor was he to trim it to suit the feelings of his hearers. Notice how the words "perhaps . . . each will turn from his evil way" show that repentance is always an individual matter. Predictions of divine judgment are conditional. True repentance on the part of the people of Judah before the hour of doom would have been met by God's willingness to relent from his threatened punishment.

4–6 Here we have a kind of summary of the longer address in ch. 7. Three things stand out: the necessity of obeying God's law if the coming punishment was to be averted; Jeremiah's alignment with other prophets in Judah who had preached repentance or judgment; and the unrelieved gravity of the sentence on the temple and on the city of Jerusalem. Shiloh was not far from Jerusalem; the people could see the evidences of its destruction (c. 1050 B.C.), even though it had been the first resting place of the ark of the covenant in the land. Even worse, Jerusalem and Judah would become notorious among the nations as examples of God's execration. Debased before the nations, Jerusalem would be an object lesson of the consequences of incurring God's wrath. What a contrast to the promise in Ge 12:3!

b. The arrest, trial, and condemnation of Jeremiah (26:7–11)

7–9 The people listened in hushed respect until Jeremiah had finished speaking, shocking though his words were. Even the priests and false prophets did not interrupt him. But once Jeremiah had concluded, the pent-up fury of the crowd broke loose. He was arrested and the death penalty pronounced on him. The priests, prophets, and people refused to believe his seemingly incredible prediction. For them it was blasphemy and false prophecy—both of which were crimes punishable by death (cf. Dt 18:20). The priests and false prophets were at the forefront of the opposition to Jeremiah. They were angered because they had consistently promised immunity to the city and sanctuary, relying on God's past deliverances (cf. Isa 37:36–37).

10–11 So great was the tumult around Jeremiah that the court officials, hearing of the mob's fury, hurried from the palace to the temple. It was indeed a timely move because the tumult could easily have led to Jeremiah's death. So the officials took their places where trials were held—at the "New Gate." The priests and false prophets, with their vested interest in the situation, were the leaders of the opposition against Jeremiah. Acting as the prosecution, they announced the verdict beforehand: "A judgment of death belongs to this man!" (lit. Heb.). Although Jeremiah had spoken against both the temple and the city, his accusers referred only to his words against the city. This gave their charge a political slant and appealed to those who heard the message.

c. Jeremiah's defense (26:12–15)

12–13 The prophet defended the message directly, courageously, and appropriately. Nowhere does he appear in a better light than here. He did not trim his message, cower, or beg for mercy. His defense was always the same: God had sent him to deliver the controversial message. Jeremiah stated the source of his message. He did not deny the truth he had preached; instead, he stressed its origin and authority. Their contention would have to be with God, for it was solely his message. Then Jeremiah called them to repentance. He was not to be diverted from the central issue but stuck to it with unswerving fidelity. There was still time for repentance. Though from the death of Josiah till the fall of Jerusalem conditions in Judah varied little, yet Jeremiah held out the only hope God offered his sinful people.

14–15 In the hour of trial, Jeremiah's courage and fidelity to God shone brightly. He did not plead for his life. He recognized the ability of his enemies to carry out the death sentence against him but warned them of the consequence of killing him. He knew that he faced imminent death; but he also knew that he had done no wrong, let alone committed any capital crime.

d. The release of Jeremiah (26:16–19)

16–19 The prophet's honesty and conviction by the Spirit gripped the hearts of the civil officials and the people. They sided with Jeremiah against the priests and false prophets. The judges and people were freer of prejudice than the religious leaders. They saw in Jeremiah what he claimed to be: God's spokesman. To the shame of the priests, the laymen alone realized the prophet was bound to preach what the Lord had committed to him. At this point the elders added their confirmation to what had been expressed. "Elders" here (GK 2418) expresses only that they were men of advanced age. They cited as a precedent the case of Micah in the days of Hezekiah (eighth century B.C.). Micah had lived more than a century before; he also prophesied about the destruction of the temple. As in law cases, citing a precedent carried weight. The reference to this prophecy turned the tide for Jeremiah.

Micah was a native of Moresheth, about twenty-three miles southwest of Jerusalem. Possibly he was as influential in the reforms of Hezekiah as Isaiah was (cf. 2Ki 18:3–6). Micah's warning message bore fruit. Hezekiah and his people heeded the Lord's words and turned to him instead of threatening Micah's life. Thus the calamity was averted from Judah in that day. The people saw the possibility of averting judgment by repenting. The argument from precedent was successful. Though not explicitly stated, Jeremiah was acquitted by the civil leaders. They saw the enormity of the guilt that would be incurred by mistreating the Lord's messenger.

e. The murder of Uriah (26:20–24)

20–24 These can scarcely be the words of Jeremiah's opponents because there is no introductory formula. We do not know when the events narrated took place. Not all faithful preaching had the same results as Jeremiah's. Uriah's situation turned out differently, and he paid for his preaching with his life. Except for the Lord's intervention, this could have been Jeremiah's fate also (cf. 36:26). Jeremiah did not, however, run from his mission.

God does not always grant immunity to his servants. Uriah (mentioned only here) was a true prophet from Kiriath Jearim. His message agreed with Jeremiah's preaching. When Jehoiakim and his military leaders heard Uriah's words, their intense hatred of the truth sought an outlet in slaying Uriah; but he escaped to Egypt, the natural refuge for fugitives from Palestine. At this time rights of extradition prevailed between Egypt and Judah because Jehoiakim was a vassal of Egypt. Extradition was part of vassalage terms imposed by Egypt. The head of the embassy to implement it was Elnathan (perhaps the Elnathan of 2Ki 24:8, grandfather of Jehoiachin and father-in-law of Jehoiakim; cf. 36:12, 25). If so, his father, Acbor, was one of the deputation in 2Ki 22:12.

Once extradited Uriah was slain and dishonored by burial in a common cemetery, not in a family sepulcher. He was denied due process of law and the elementary right of burial with his ancestors. That Jehoiakim had no part in Jeremiah's case may mean it occurred early in his reign, before he gained influence over the civil leaders. Even though Jeremiah had been acquitted, he was still in danger. Ahikam, an official under Josiah (cf.

2Ki 22:12, 14) and father of Gedaliah, governor of Judah under Nebuchadnezzar after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (cf. 39:14; 40:13–41:3; 2Ki 25:22), espoused his cause. And Ahikam's prominence helped secure Jeremiah's release.

7. The yoke of Babylon (27:1–22)

Chapters 27–28 attack the false optimism of the prophets of Judah and are dated by most scholars in the fourth year of Zedekiah (594–593 B.C.). Foreign envoys were coming to Jerusalem to promote a confederacy against Nebuchadnezzar. Neighboring countries were apparently trying to involve Judah in a rebellion against Babylon, an enterprise encouraged by the false prophets at Jerusalem. The contemplated rebellion failed because of Nebuchadnezzar's forthright action. Chapters 27–29 dispel the erroneous view that Babylon was just a passing power, not to be reckoned with. From 51:59 we may infer that Zedekiah was called to Babylon to explain what part he had in the unsuccessful plot against Nebuchadnezzar.

a. The message to the ambassadors (27:1–11)

1–2 With Judah on the verge of revolt against Babylon, God spoke to Jeremiah and commanded him to make a yoke and place it on his neck. The yoke, similar to that used for oxen, was made of wooden bars held together by leather thongs (see also 28:10). A yoke symbolized submission, servitude, and captivity.

3 Jeremiah did not make duplicate yokes to be sent to the kings represented in the conclave. He did, however, convey to the kings the message of the yoke. Their envoys had assembled to plan how to shake off the yoke of Babylon; so the yoke symbol was highly appropriate. Jeremiah required great courage to stand against these envoys as well as his own countrymen, but he was exercising his commission as a prophet to the nations (cf. 1:10). Smaller nations often revolted against their Mesopotamian conquerors, but seldom with success. Through Jeremiah the Lord is charging them all that it is his will for them to submit to Nebuchadnezzar for their own good. The enumeration of the kings is from south (Edom, Moab, Ammon) to north (the Phoenician cities of Tyre and Sidon). The rebellion of the smaller nations may have been activated by the accession of Psammetik II as the pharaoh of Egypt.

4–7 The message the envoys took back to their kings was that the sovereign Creator of the universe had the right to give the dominion of earth to whomever he pleased. Revolt was futile and wrong because God had appointed Babylon to execute his purpose of judgment. Resistance was useless because Nebuchadnezzar was God's instrument. To resist the known will of God is always spiritual suicide. Nebuchadnezzar's dominion was vast, extending even to the animals of the field. As to its duration, Babylonian rule would extend from Nebuchadnezzar to the third generation. It passed from him to Evil-Merodach and Belshazzar (52:31; Da 5:1, 30). Thus the Babylonian threat was not to be temporary, as the false prophets glibly promised. When the appointed time came for the termination of Babylonian supremacy, the rulers of Persia, Media, and contiguous areas finally overthrew it. God is Creator of the universe and Administrator in the affairs of the nations.

8–11 The meaning of the yoke is explained. Those resisting the Babylonian power would be punished by the threefold stroke of sword, famine, and plague. Above all, the prophecies of the false prophets were not to be trusted, for they were dealing in lies that would only lead the nation to disaster. Moved by the knowledge of God's message and its authority, Jeremiah did not shrink from opposing the whole array of false leaders in all the countries. The five kinds of soothsayers mentioned in v.9 all helped forward the policy of rebellion. They represented various pagan methods of predicting the future. The result for Judah would be deportation, a policy the Assyrians had used for Israel and one the Babylonians would use for Judah. But nations that obey God would remain in peace in their lands and would prosper.

b. The address to King Zedekiah (27:12–15)

12–15 The warning already extended to the envoys of the nations is now directed toward Zedekiah. Here we have the meaning of the yoke for the Davidic king. The thrust of the message is Zedekiah's submission to the Babylonians. He was a weak and ambivalent ruler who could never carry through a resolve to follow the Lord wholly. Zedekiah is exhorted not to choose the way of resistance and disobedience, which would only bring disaster with it. So powerful was the influence of the false prophets at this time that the king had to be counseled to ignore their lying pronouncements. God never sent them; they predicted lies; the result of their advice could only be exile for the nation. To underestimate the power of a lie in times of national distress is sheer folly.

c. The warning to the priests and people (27:16–22)

16–18 So vital was the message of Jeremiah at this time that it had to be repeated to the priests and people. The false prophets were holding out baseless hopes that the temple vessels taken to Babylon were soon to be returned. This was a powerful incentive for Judah to revolt against the Babylonians, but Jeremiah reiterated the necessity of submitting to Nebuchadnezzar. The prophets of "peace" thought that their words would be more effective if they referred to details like the temple objects. Some were carried away in the deportation of Jehoiakim (cf. 2Ch 36:5–7), and even more were carried away in 597 B.C. (cf. 2Ki 24:13). Instead of these vessels being returned "shortly," as the lying prophets claimed, the vessels remaining in the temple would be carried off too (cf. 2Ki 25:13). In fact—and here Jeremiah places the false prophets under a severe test—if the prophets who were predicting a speedy return of the vessels taken to Babylon were indeed what they claimed to be, they could serve the nation best by praying that the vessels still in the temple would not be taken to Babylon. History reveals that the temple vessels were taken to the land of exile.

19–22 Of all the temple appointments, three are mentioned here (see also 52:17). The pillars were made of bronze and were placed in front of the temple; their names were Jakin and Boaz (cf. 1Ki 7:15–22). Before being taken away to Babylon, they were actually broken into pieces because they were too large to take intact. The Sea was a large cast basin, supported on the backs of twelve cast oxen and used for the washings of the priests (cf. 1Ki 7:23–26). There were also stands to support the lavers (cf. 1Ki 7:27–37; 2Ch 4:6), and the stands were on wheels. All these remaining vessels would be taken to Babylon also, Jeremiah prophesied. The hope the false prophets held out was impossible of fulfillment and hence not from God. To the prediction of the carrying away of all these things, the Lord added a promise that they would be restored in the day that he would execute judgment on Babylon. The vessels were returned to Jerusalem by Cyrus at the beginning of his reign (c. 536 B.C.; cf. Ezr 1:7–11).

8. Hananiah against Jeremiah (28:1–17)

Chapter 28 continues without a break in the narrative of ch. 27, which shows that Jeremiah was still wearing the yoke.

a. Hananiah's contradiction of Jeremiah (28:1–4)

1 The mention of the fourth year of Zedekiah as the "beginning of his reign" (lit. Heb.; NIV, "early in the reign"), which lasted eleven years, reflects Jewish usage. The date was indeed the beginning of his rule, for the Jews divided periods of time into halves: beginning and end. It means simply "in the first half of his reign."

Hananiah the prophet seized an opportunity when the temple was frequented by the people, either at the celebration of the new moon or a Sabbath, to contradict what Jeremiah had just said (cf. ch. 27). Apart from this chapter, we know nothing of Hananiah. He has been characterized as a fanatical nationalist prophet who was sincerely wrong. He was a native of Gibeon, five miles northwest of Jerusalem. It was one of the priestly cities; so Hananiah may have been a priest. The year was 594–593 B.C., and the fifth month places the episode in the summer.

2–3 Hananiah had the temerity to use the same introductory formula as Jeremiah, implying a claim for inspiration similar to his. The yoke refers to the one Jeremiah had just made. Flatly contradicting Jeremiah's God-given counsel of submission, Hananiah predicted a return of the captives and the temple vessels within two years, emphasizing the time element by putting it first. This mention of two years was meant to bolster the credibility of his false prophecy. He paid no attention to the warning in 23:31. That the prophecy was never fulfilled showed its falsity. The Babylonian Chronicle indicates that Nebuchadnezzar was quelling a revolt in Babylon at the time. This may have acted as a spur to Hananiah's optimism.

4 Perhaps Hananiah saw approval on the faces of his hearers because he went even further. He predicted that Jeconiah would be restored from exile, a contradiction of Jeremiah's prophecy in 22:24–27 (fulfilled in 52:31–34). Hananiah's prediction showed he favored Jeconiah over the vacillating Zedekiah because he may have thought that the former would resist Nebuchadnezzar better. To make his message more uplifting, he made a sweeping prediction of the return of all the Judean exiles. One can well imagine the confusion created in the minds of the populace by the spectacle of the false prophet's denying the central elements in the message of the true prophet of God.

b. Jeremiah's appeal to the past (28:5–9)

5–9 Jeremiah's response to Hananiah was immediate. His "Amen" revealed how deeply he desired Judah's good. He was just as concerned for the nation as Hananiah was. As a man of God, he sincerely desired the captives' return. He reminded Hananiah of the words of the true prophets who had preceded both Hananiah and him. Hananiah's words contradicted their predictions just as much as they contradicted those of Jeremiah. The former prophets also spoke in warning messages because of the sinful condition of the people they ministered to. In view of the nation's long spiritual decline, prophecies of disaster were not new. He made it clear that the fulfillment of a prophecy remained the best proof of its truthfulness.

The scope of the prophetic activity was comprehensive, reaching to many lands and many kingdoms, small and great. In the contest between Hananiah and Jeremiah, antecedent probability was in favor of a prophet who spoke in agreement with the true prophets of the past. The trouble with the false prophets was that they always predicted prosperity unconditionally and without need of repentance. It is always less popular to predict calamity rather than prosperity; so the presumption of truth rests with the prophet of calamity. At this time Jeremiah evidently had no specific message from God against Hananiah.

c. Hananiah's response (28:10–11)

10–11 Because of Jeremiah's incontrovertible argument, Hananiah resorted to force. He took the yoke from Jeremiah's neck and smashed it, to show that Nebuchadnezzar's power would be shattered in two years. Once more Hananiah presumed to use the introductory formula of the true prophets. Instead of waiting for the fulfillment of his prediction, he acted violently to capture the people's attention and mask his own confusion. In doing so, he may have hoped to reverse the impact made by Jeremiah's making and wearing the yoke. Jeremiah left without replying. He could have been waiting for a time when emotions had cooled off. Also, he was doubtless waiting for further instructions from the Lord. There was no need for haste anyway, because it would take two years to see whether or not Hananiah's prediction came true. And Jeremiah may have left without answering Hananiah so as not to confuse the people.

d. Jeremiah's stronger pronouncement (28:12–14)

12–14 The Lord's answer through Jeremiah did come a short time later. To one who had falsified the Lord's reiterated intentions for Israel, it was an emphatic rebuttal. By breaking the yoke, Hananiah had raised false hopes of successfully resisting the invaders—hopes that were only to make their lot harder. By breaking it, Hananiah had alleviated the pain of the yoke. But Jeremiah replied that the people were exchanging the wooden yoke of submission for the inflexible iron yoke of servitude in Babylon. Not only were the people to suffer more, but, as 38:17–23 shows, Zedekiah's fate was more severe than that of Jehoiakim or Jehoiachin. Whereas for Hezekiah to resist Assyria in 701 B.C. was an act of faith, for Judah to rebel against Babylon in Jeremiah's time was an act of disobedience. Not only would all the nations serve Nebuchadnezzar, but his dominion would extend over all the wild animals.

e. Prediction of Hananiah's death (28:15–17)

15–17 Perhaps after an interval of only a few days, Jeremiah received a word from the Lord against Hananiah. First, the Lord said that he had not sent Hananiah. Second, Hananiah had misled Judah into believing lies. Hananiah had set a time limit of two years for the realization of his prediction, but the Lord did not choose to wait that long. He decreed that Hananiah was to die that very year, and he died in two months after his wicked prophecy. He had to die because in opposing Jeremiah he instigated rebellion against the Lord. The Jews knew the penalty for apostasy (cf. Dt 13:1–5; cf. Eze 11:13; Ac 5:1–11). Jeremiah's prophecy was authenticated in the death of Hananiah, which discredited him as a fraud. Thus the authority of the true prophet was vindicated.

9. Jeremiah's letters to the exiles (29:1–32)

This chapter may be placed a few years after the exile of 597 B.C. More important than the precise date are the contents of the chapter—a letter to the three thousand Jews who had been exiled with Jehoiachin to Babylon, among them a number of priests and prophets. In Jerusalem, Jeremiah heard that some exiled false prophets were predicting an early fall of Babylon and an early restoration of the exiles to Judah. Jeremiah's letters warned the exiles against this deception and urged them to wait patiently for God's time.

a. Introduction (29:1–3)

1–2 Jeremiah rightly felt he still had a God-given responsibility for the "surviving elders," those who had not died through the rigors of the deportation. Clearly some form of community organization like that in Judah had been continued in the Exile. The letter was directed not only to the elders but to all the exiles. The "queen mother" was Nehushta (cf. 13:18; 2Ki 24:8). The craftsmen and artisans were deported to help King Nebuchadnezzar beautify Babylon.

3 Jeremiah gave his letter to an embassy whom Zedekiah sent to Nebuchadnezzar. The embassy's purpose is not stated, but it likely was sent with tribute and assurance of Zedekiah's loyalty to Nebuchadnezzar. Elasah son of Shaphan was probably a brother of Ahikam (cf. 26:24); he agreed with Jeremiah and would have been welcome in Babylon. Gemariah son of Hilkiah was probably a son of Josiah's high priest Hilkiah (cf. 2Ki 22:3–4). Babylon probably permitted communication between Judah and the exiles. The exiles were just as subject to false prophets as the people in Jerusalem. They might have been expected to heed Jeremiah's words (cf. 24:5–7). The false hope of a quick end to the Exile would only have nullified the disciplinary effects of the Exile.

b. The letter of Jeremiah (29:4–19)

1) Warning against false prophets (29:4–9)

4–7 Rather than a word-for-word record of Jeremiah's main letter and the other subsidiary letters, we probably have the gist of what was written. Underlying the main letter is the assumption that Nebuchadnezzar was the agent of the Lord. Ultimately the Lord himself had brought about the Exile. Since the Lord's will was behind it, the part of wisdom was submission. The exiles were to settle in Babylon and live normal lives there, even praying for their captors (cf. Mt 5:43) and working for peace and prosperity. Otherwise, their influence would be negligible and their exile all the more galling.

What unusual advice for Jeremiah to give his exiled countrymen! History shows that in all the centuries of their worldwide dispersion, the Jews have tried to follow this pattern. They have identified themselves with the country of their residence, while at the same time looking toward eventual restoration to their native land.

Jeremiah's exhortations show that the Babylonian stay would be an extended one. His advice to build homes there implies they had not yet been in Babylon a long time. The freedom allowed them implies they were neither slaves nor prisoners in their new land. Any feeling that they should not build homes in a foreign, unclean land was thus dispelled. The wives Jeremiah encouraged them to marry were Jewish, not foreign (cf. Dt 7:3). The seed of Abraham must continue according to the divine promise (cf. Ge 12:1–3).

8–9 Again Jeremiah warned the exiles not to trust false prophets. In Babylon, as in Judah, false prophecy was flourishing (cf. vv.15, 21). The theme was always the same: a speedy return to the homeland. Rosy predictions were the stock in trade of such people. Such deceptive dreams could only work havoc among the exiles. The deceivers must not be trusted because they had never been commissioned by the Lord.

2) The seventy-year exile (29:10–14)

10–11 Jeremiah now presents a beautiful prophecy of encouragement to the exiles. The Lord's ultimate purpose for his people called for blessing. The length of the Exile is again given as seventy years (cf. 25:11). The seventy years were "for Babylon" because Jeremiah linked the duration of Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom with the termination of the Exile. The "gracious promise" is that of the exiles' restoration to Judah (cf. 27:22). Moreover, the Lord assured them that despite their surmise as to his lack of concern for their plight, he had not forgotten them. The Lord was not denying them hope for the future; it would not be realized immediately or in the near future. Jeremiah's words "hope and a future" are literally "an end and a hope," which means "a hopeful end." This word from the Lord was surely more heartening to the exiles' spirits than the false prophets' promises of quick deliverance.

12–14 The remainder of this section stresses the nature of the hopeful future. The Lord says that he could and would be entreated of the exiles. The promises, however, were contingent on their wholehearted repentance. Then the Lord would listen to them and make himself accessible to them. The declaration "I will gather you from all the nations and places where I have banished you" looks far beyond the Jews' return from Babylon to their future restoration from worldwide dispersion.

3) A "second letter" of Jeremiah (29:15–19)

15–19 Conceivably vv.15–19 form a second letter written at a subsequent time and inserted parenthetically here. The situation was doubtless something like this: The exiles asked why Jeremiah insisted on an exile of seventy years when their prophets in Babylon were telling them the very opposite. Jeremiah replied that the false prophecies would be shown to be lies and their perpetrators would perish. For the Jews to depend on the pronouncements of the deceivers was the highest folly. Actually, the Jews still in Jerusalem were soon to experience grievous judgments for their persistence in disobeying the Lord.

Again, it must be emphasized that vv.15–19 were probably part of a second letter not sent by the king's embassy (v.3) because the king in v.16 is Zedekiah, who was yet destined for exile. "This city" was Jerusalem. The false prophets made much of the fact that in Jerusalem a Davidic king still ruled, and they argued from this that the Exile would soon end. But those still in Judah were to undergo the calamities of war and were likened to vile figs of the worst sort (cf. 24:1–10). And even in exile, the grace of God was seen in raising up Ezekiel in 592 B.C. (cf. Eze 1:2–3). Once more the Lord states that he is the Author of the Exile.

c. Denunciation of the false prophets Ahab and Zedekiah (29:20–23)

20–23 Jeremiah was well informed about conditions in Babylon. Two false prophets, Ahab and Zedekiah—of whom nothing more is known than that they had famous names and were deceitful and grossly immoral—are singled out as examples of the heinousness of false prophesying. They were probably condemned as guilty of treason against the Babylonian crown. Like Hananiah, these false prophets would become object lessons of the Lord's wrath. Babylon used burning as a punishment (cf. Da 3:6, 20, 23).

d. Condemnation of Shemaiah (29:24–32)

24–28 After castigating the two false prophets for their deceit and profligacy (v.23), Jeremiah pronounces the Lord's condemnation on Shemaiah the Nehelamite, a false prophet who presumed to order a member of the priesthood in Jerusalem to silence Jeremiah. Of Shemaiah nothing more is known than what we have in this passage. The background of his letter is clear. Jeremiah's letter understandably angered the false prophets in Babylon. Shemaiah, who was one of them, wrote the deputy priest Zephaniah to silence Jeremiah. Instead, Zephaniah read Shemaiah's letter to Jeremiah, who replied in a message predicting the doom of Shemaiah for denying Jeremiah's authority. The false prophets had apparently overlooked the promises Jeremiah had given (vv.10–14).

Zephaniah was the chief warden in charge of police regulations of the temple (cf. 21:1; 37:3; 52:24). Apparently Shemaiah, on his own initiative, had displaced Jehoiada the priest (cf. 2Ki 11:4) with Zephaniah. Although in that day insanity ("madman") may have been considered as an aberrant gift of prophecy (cf. 1Sa 19:20–24; 2Ki 9:11), this charge was an insult to Jeremiah. The "neck-irons" were an iron collar that held the head immovable while the prisoner was in the stocks (cf. 20:2). Knowing nothing of Jeremiah's divine call, Shemaiah had accused him of usurping authority as a spokesman for God.

29–32 After Zephaniah had read the letter to Jeremiah, the Lord told him to send a letter to all the exiles, unmasking Shemaiah's hypocrisy and announcing a twofold punishment: He would have no descendants, and he would not see the blessings on the Lord's people that Jeremiah had been predicting. Shemaiah had forfeited the privilege of participating in the restoration to the homeland.

B. The Book of Consolation (30:1–33:26)

1. Trial and triumph for Israel (30:1–24)

Chapters 30–33 constitute a group of prophecies that has been called "The Book of Consolation." Verse 1 of chapter 32 gives us the historical background of these prophecies (cf. 33:1). Jerusalem was in the final period of an eighteen-month siege by the Babylonians. Other Judean cities had already capitulated to them. The temporary intervention of Egypt (cf. 37:4–5) had failed to stem the tide of events, and Jerusalem remained disillusioned and helpless. Though written during a time of deep distress for Jerusalem, chs. 30–33 foretell a glorious future for the nation (cf. the latter part of 1:10).

Up to this point in the book, Jeremiah's prophecies have mostly been threatening and gloomy. Now the prophetic outlook changes. This is all the more striking since chs. 32–33 (probably chs. 30–31 also) were given in the tenth year of Zedekiah, when the final blow was about to fall. The overall theme is that Israel would not perish as a nation. Jeremiah was in prison, the city in dire straits by famine and disease; yet it was then that he spoke words of greatest comfort. He predicted the permanence of the nation, the coming of the Gentiles to the truth, the institution of God's new covenant of redemption, and the rule of the Davidic King over cleansed Zion.

a. Return from captivity (30:1–3)

1–3 These verses strike the hopeful theme of the nation's restoration. The Lord commanded Jeremiah to write these prophecies in a book to ensure their permanence at a time when so many in the nation were being exiled. Also, his activities may have been restricted at this time. Obviously "the book" was not to contain all we now have in the book of Jeremiah, not even all he spoke to this time.

The words "the days are coming" look to eschatological times (cf. 3:16; 16:14; 23:5; 31:27, 31). Jeremiah is contemplating the distant, not near, future of the nation. This statement restricts the material involved to "The Book of Consolation." To bring back any people from captivity indicates a restoration of their fortunes, which is the emphasis of this section. The good news was the promise of the people's restoration to and their possession of their homeland, a message of glorious hope in that gloomy hour. Moreover, we must not forget that this hope relates to Israel and Judah, not to one without the other (cf. v.10).

b. "A time of trouble for Jacob" (30:4–7)

4–6 Here the prophet speaks of the whole nation over which David and Solomon ruled. Jeremiah is stating that before the just-mentioned promise of restoration can be fulfilled, the nation must be severely disciplined, though not to the extent of final calamity. "Fear" and "terror" point to war. The awful terror that will come can be compared only with the travail of a mother in childbirth, a figure of extreme distress.

7 It is not clear whether this passage is referring to (1) the immediate situation, (2) the whole period of the Captivity, or (3) the time of tribulation in the end time before Israel's final restoration. If the first, then "that day" may mean the day of the capture of Babylon, with emphasis on the terror caused by the approach of Cyrus. Cyrus was the Jews' liberator from those who took them captive.

However, in the light of the immediate context and what follows, it seems preferable to assume that the reference is to the Day of the Lord. "That day" was not one immediately at hand. It is not the day of the destruction of Jerusalem but the day of God's comprehensive judgment. The present is not to be excluded, but it is swallowed up in the future. That day is to be marked by great calamities. It is vitally important to remember that v.7 speaks of Jacob's trouble, not Babylon's. The prophetic Scriptures are replete with references to this unique time of Jacob's distress; e.g., "There is none like it" (cf. Mt 24:21 with Da 12:1; cf. also Jer 46:10; Isa 2:12–21; 13:6; 34:1–8; et al.). Notice that the travail will issue in both physical and spiritual deliverance (cf. Zec 12:1–13:1) and that liberation will be such that never again will Israel be enslaved by any nation. This can never be said of any deliverance to this present hour; it must refer to eschatological times.

c. Freedom from bondage to oppressors (30:8–11)

8–9 Only in the most preliminary way may "the yoke" refer to bondage to Nebuchadnezzar; what is meant is total liberation from all foreign oppressors. This can be effected only by the glorious intervention of Israel's messianic King (cf. Eze 34:23; Hos 3:5). After the yoke of foreign rule has been broken, the benevolent yoke of their King will be gladly assumed by the godly in Israel and Judah (cf. Mt 11:28–30). Notice the pairing of "the LORD their God" with "David their kin." It is significant that in the prophetic Scriptures a resurrection of David himself is not predicted as antecedent to the rule of his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, on the Davidic throne (cf. Eze 37:24–25). The person indicated here is the future ideal King, the so-called second David (cf. "last Adam" and "second man" in 1Co 15:45–47). The Targum is correct in identifying this ideal King as "Messiah, the son of David." Among the Jews the name David came to be used of any royalty, much as Pharaoh, Caesar, or Czar, but only in the highest and final sense.

10–11 Jeremiah closes this section with promises of return, peace, freedom, and permanence. He refers to the nation as Jacob, God's "servant"—a title of honor. God's people are to be regathered from all the lands of their dispersion. Jeremiah makes a telling distinction between the fate of God's people and that of their oppressors: the oppressors may be removed finally from the scene of history, but God's people never will (cf. 4:27; 5:10, 18; 46:28). This is not partiality on God's part, for he will not overlook his people's sins. They can no more sin with impunity than any other persons or nation. The Lord must chasten them, and he will do so with justice, not capriciously. It is no wonder that Isaiah refers to Israel (i.e., Israel and Judah) as an eternal nation; for whereas Ammon, Assyria, Edom, Moab, and others no longer exist, Israel is present throughout the world today, even though in the divine chastening of dispersion.

d. Israel's wounds healed (30:12–17)

12–15 In turning to the serious condition of Israel, Jeremiah wants to show that her punishment was well deserved. Her wounds were, apart from God, incurable. Doubtless, the wounds are those she has received from her enemies because of her flagrant sins. Because God's people have transgressed so grievously, no one can defend them; moreover, there is no hope of their recovery. Jeremiah mingles his figures of speech: he sees Israel as a defendant in a lawsuit and as one suffering from a fatal wound. All her antagonists have the upper hand as they accuse her before God. What made her trial harder to bear was that Israel's allies had left her in the lurch. Her punishment clearly stemmed from the Lord because sin was at the root of all her calamities. Furthermore, she had no right to complain of her punishment since she amply deserved it.

16–17 The prophet contrasts Israel's mistreatment by her supposed lovers with the Lord's actions on her behalf. Because his people have undergone judgment and have acknowledged their guilt, God pronounces retaliation in kind on their enemies. The future blessings begin with judgments on Israel's oppressors. God will heal her and afflict her enemies. The Babylonians who devoured the nation will in turn be devoured by the Medes and Persians. Those who treat God's people ill have to reckon with God as avenger (cf. Ge 12:1–3). Again, the promise of restored health precedes any action the Lord may take against Israel's foes. In their contempt, the enemies of God's nation called her an outcast, for whom no one cared. The figure is that of a woman put away by her husband (cf. Isa 62:4). The Lord considered this treatment of his nation a great offense because their words and actions revealed their disregard of God and his expressed purpose for his people. Ultimately, calling them an outcast impugned God's faithfulness to his elect people.

e. Rebuilt Jerusalem and her ruler (30:18–22)

18–20 Days of rich blessing are ahead. These verses deal with Jerusalem rebuilt, repopulated, and governed by a native prince responsive to the Lord. It also shows the nation experiencing the blessings of renewed fellowship with the Lord. The "tents" and "dwellings," now desolate, refer to the wretched condition of their houses in their homeland. Jerusalem will be rebuilt on its original location. The word "ruins" is the well-known term tel (GK 9424), now used by Arabs for the ruined mounds of Palestine that contain the remains of ancient cities. Jerusalem and its buildings are probably intended. The meaning is that the city will be settled by a king, with all that pertains to such a residence.

Furthermore, along with material prosperity will come joy and honor so long denied the people. Out of the city and palace will flow praise and merriment. Instead of degradation and insignificance, the people will grow in numbers and in the esteem of the nations as the Lord honors them. The children of Jacob will enjoy prosperity like that in the heyday of the monarchy under David and Solomon. The congregation—the people as a whole—will be established under God's oversight.

21–22 Embedded in this passage so full of promise is one of the most beautiful of the messianic predictions in the OT. First, the nation will be blessed by a native, not a foreign, ruler. This was surely a prophecy of strong consolation in view of the nation's imminent subservience to a foreign power. Second, this ruler will have the privilege of approach to God, i.e., priestly position and ministry (cf. Ps 110:4; Zec 6:13); he will need no mediator. Thus he will be greater than David and Solomon. Like Melchizedek he will have a dual role. No man can take to himself the office of priesthood (cf. Heb 5:1). In fact, it was dangerous for even a king to do so (cf. 1Ki 12:26–33; 13:1–6; 2Ch 26:16–20). This was permitted only to the priests and, on the Day of Atonement, only to the high priest. Here is a reiteration of the promise to restore the Davidic line. And no one would "devote himself to be so close" to God on his own initiative.

Immediately Jeremiah turns to the result of Messiah's ministry—the old covenant is renewed. The nation will be restored to the position of fellowship and worship that God intended for her. The people will be seen to be God's people.

f. Judgment, then blessing (30:23–24)

23–24 Before there can be blessing, judgment must be meted out to the guilty. This passage is inserted here lest the careless be given false security in their sins. In spite of promises of hope, God's moral purposes always remain the same. God is behind the judgment to be executed by Nebuchadnezzar. Jeremiah uses the figure of a sudden storm to describe it. The Lord does his work of redemption by his power displayed in judgment. The blessings Jeremiah has been speaking of are only for the godly. The reference to "the days to come" appears to point to a time after the judgment has passed.

2. The new covenant (31:1–40)

In ch. 30 the restoration of Judah is foretold; here that of the nation of Israel is predicted. The dominant themes in this chapter are the restoration of God's people and the new covenant.

a. God's mercy for Ephraim (31:1–6)

1–2 The time reference is the "days to come" of 30:24, i.e., the Messianic Age. Although vv.1–6 deal primarily with the northern kingdom, "clans of Israel" must be allowed to comprehend the Twelve Tribes in light of the promise to the whole nation in 30:22. Jeremiah dilates on the grace of God revealed to the northern tribes. "The people who survive the sword" could refer to those who survived the Exodus and the wilderness wanderings; more likely, however, it refers to the return of the Ten Tribes from Assyrian captivity, perhaps also including the later captives from Babylon. The Lord is continuing the grace he showed his people in the desert wanderings (cf. 2:1–3). The desert is thus a figure for the land of the Exile in contrast to their homeland. As of old, the Lord in his infinite grace is concerned about finding "rest" (GK 8089) for his troubled, weary people. What he did by the pillar of cloud and the pillar of fire in the desert, he was willing to do for the returning exiles.

3–4 In one of the most beautiful poems in his book, Jeremiah cites the declaration of the people: "The LORD appeared to us." Again the people recall the unparalleled love, grace, and comfort God had extended to them "in the past." What comfort was theirs in the recognition of such perpetual love! Addressing Israel as a virgin, unsullied before God, Jeremiah implies that the Lord sees her just as appealing as in the time of her departure from Egypt (cf. 2:1–3; Hos 2:14–23). Grace blots out the past. Both rebuilding and joy are promised the northern kingdom. Contrasted with the sorrow of the Exile (Ps 137:1) is the use of tambourines at dances in times of rejoicing. In ancient times dancing was often a religious exercise (cf. 2Sa 6:14).

5 Amplifying the thought of restoration, Jeremiah says that the hills of Samaria will be planted with vineyards. Essentially an occupation in time of peace, viniculture is often interrupted by war. But in the time Jeremiah is looking forward to, those who plant grapes will enjoy the fruit of their labors. The law of Moses did not permit the Hebrews to eat the fruit of the first three years. Fruit of the fourth year was given to God, but it could be redeemed and eaten (cf. Lev 19:23–25). Thus Jeremiah's reference to the vineyards implies that Israel will be settled in her land and enjoying it under normal conditions.

6 Even more glorious is Jeremiah's prediction that watchmen will direct those of Ephraim (the northern kingdom) to go up to Zion to worship the Lord there. In the OT the temple in Zion was always considered the only authorized sanctuary. According to Jewish tradition watchmen were appointed for the appearance of the moon, from which their months were counted. Here the watchmen on the hills of Samaria are to show the northern kingdom how to go up to Jerusalem to keep the feasts, as the pilgrimage feasts were annually observed in ancient times (cf. Dt 16:16). This will mark the end of the disruption of the kingdom of Solomon in 930 B.C. Ephraim's condition in blessing will be permanent because Jeroboam's misleading them from the Lord's sanctuary will be a thing of the past. The breach of many centuries will at last be healed.

b. The restoration of Israel in joy (31:7–14)

7–9 Verses 7–14 emphasize joy at the end of the Exile. With exuberance Jeremiah celebrates the great salvation provided for Israel. Israel will be restored to her rightful position. Moreover, in his answer the Lord promises a return, not only from the north country, but ultimately from all parts of the earth. And from that restoration none will be excluded. The blind, the lame, the pregnant women—even those in labor, for whom the journey would be especially burdensome—will be included. The picture is of universal participation. Furthermore, the return will be accompanied by weeping and tears of repentance. Weeping for their sin and rebellion will then be overshadowed by the joy of return. Repentance, as always, issues in salvation. As the people give themselves to prayer, the Lord will lead them by streams of water, a metaphor of refreshment.

All this tenderness and concern for Ephraim (Israel) stem from the original elective purpose of God declared in Ex 4:22 (cf. Dt 32:6). The designation of "firstborn" in Ex 4:22 included the whole nation, whereas here it is transferred to Ephraim, the head of the Ten Tribes. Ephraim is mentioned before Judah (vv.23–26) because the Ten Tribes were in exile much longer and, humanly considered, were less likely to be delivered. The prophet could with warrant call Ephraim the firstborn, for Joseph actually received the birthright of the firstborn, which was forfeited by the sin of Reuben (cf. 1Ch 5:1–2). Sonship in the OT includes the concept of paternal love and care on a national scale, rather than the NT concept of personal membership in the family of God by the Spirit.

10–14 The word is to be spread afar that the Lord has regathered Israel. The nations will be told that it was the Lord who exiled his people and that it is he who restores them. The figure of shepherd and flock portrays the dual concepts of tenderness and concern. Just as the Lord alone was responsible for Israel's chastisement, so now he alone will regather them. The Lord will ransom Israel, delivering the people from foreign bondage under the power of a pagan world ruler. Promises are heaped one upon another—predictions of joy, return to Jerusalem, nature transformed, and a new prosperity. Israel will be ransomed, redeemed, rejoicing, and restored. When the people come to Zion, they will find every need supplied. God's "bounty" (GK 3206) includes material blessings. Never again will God's people sorrow as they did in the time of their Exile. So great will be the prosperity bestowed on them that the priests will be satiated because of the many sacrifices brought by the worshipers. With abundant harvests, the portions of the priests will increase.

c. Israel's lamentable present (31:15–22)

15 From glowing predictions of tenderness and joy, Jeremiah turns back to the sad conditions of his day. He pictures Rachel at Ramah weeping disconsolately for the loss of her children. She was an ancestress of the northern tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (through Joseph), as well as of Benjamin in the south. Undoubtedly, she is lamenting the exile of her children in 722–721 B.C. Ramah was five miles north of Jerusalem, the very place where exiles were gathered before deportation to Babylon (cf. 40:1). Jeremiah himself was in a camp for exiles in Ramah. She who had so longed for children (cf. Ge 30:1) is cruelly bereaved of them, but God purposes to restore them.

16–17 The Lord bids Rachel to stop mourning because now she can comfort herself by the promise of her children's return (spoken twice). The "work" to be "rewarded" includes bearing, rearing, sorrowing over, and praying for her children. As they were a source of grief to her, now they will be a joy on their return from exile.

A question arises as to how this prophecy of Rachel can be fulfilled in Herod's slaughter of the innocents recorded in Mt 2:17–18. First, it must be stressed that Matthew's method of quoting an OT reference does not automatically imply a direct fulfillment (cf. "The Old Testament in the New Testament," EBC, 1:617–27). For proof, see the immediate context in Mt 2:15, where Hos 11:1 in its original context unmistakably speaks of the nation Israel but by analogy and higher fulfillment refers to Christ. Similarly, that which related to Israel in original revelation is by analogy used in speaking of Herod's atrocities. In both cases God will overrule the nation's sorrow for her ultimate joy.

18–20 It is one thing to hear of Rachel's concern for Ephraim, but what was the latter's attitude? Ephraim expressed godly sorrow for his sins. He prayed for the Lord to restore him. He at last recognized the need to repent before restoration. He was formerly like an untrained calf, in need of training. Through the Lord's judgments he learned discipline. Once he was chastened and became submissive to the providences of the Lord, Ephraim smote his thigh (NIV, "breast") in grief and sorrow. The Spirit of God had done his effective work so that Ephraim recognized the shame his earlier sinful life brought on him. Finally we have the Lord's answer to Ephraim's confession of need. His fatherly concern for the prodigal Ephraim is beautifully expressed. Divine love will not be denied him in spite of his sin. Fatherly tenderness prevails over childish recalcitrance. Ephraim is forgiven.

21 Jeremiah now addresses the returning exiles of the northern kingdom. They are to make ample preparation for their homeward journey. The succession of imperatives shows the urgency of their preparation for return. It was the custom of caravans to set up pillars, poles, and heaps of stones to guide them. So the exiles are told to mark out the old route, to set up signs to help them find their way back. They are to pay heed to the way they went into exile in order to be able to retrace their steps. The imperatives admonish them not to delay their return by wavering.

22 This verse is difficult because the background is lacking. One view sees here a prophecy of the Virgin Birth of the Lord Jesus Christ. This ancient interpretation comes from the Church Fathers, but this interpretation is ill suited to the context. Granted that the word "virgin" occurs in v.21 and earlier in v.4, it is plain that these references are to Israel, not to an individual. Other solutions do not fare much better (see EBC, 6:571). It is foolhardy to be dogmatic about the meaning of these puzzling words. On the whole, it seems best to take them as a proverbial saying about something amazing and hard to believe.

d. Judah's bright future (31:23–26)

23–25 Jeremiah, after painting a magnificent picture of Ephraim's return and blessing, addresses Judah with words of strong assurance and with promises similar to those given Ephraim. When the southern kingdom and her cities are restored, the old greeting of those visiting Jerusalem will be heard once more. "O sacred mountain" refers to the temple mount and Jerusalem as a whole (cf. Ps 2:6; Isa 66:20). The city will again be characterized by her righteousness (cf. Isa 1:21). Once spiritual things are cared for, temporal things will be provided. Judah's cities will not be abandoned by their inhabitants, and those settled in them will enjoy tranquillity and prosperity without fear of marauders or invading armies. Indeed, every individual need will be amply met.

26 Jeremiah gives his own response to the bright promises of the millennial time under Messiah. The truths he had been communicating had been given him in a supernatural dream during a sleep that may have been ecstatic. Jeremiah's sleep was sweet because the truths he received in them were comforting predictions of future glory for God's people.

e. National increase under Messiah (31:27–30)

27–30 Because invasions and deportations had taken humans and animals from the land, the Lord used Jeremiah to portray a dramatic renewal of the land through resowing the country with both. That messianic times are in view is clear from the formula "The days are coming" (cf. 30:3). What a contrast to the condition of the land with its population and cattle decimated by the captivities! Once their chastisement and suffering are over, the Lord will refashion his people and his land; he prefers to build rather than destroy. Verses 29–30 reflect the bitterness of the exiles who traced their predicament to the sins of their parents and ancestors. They felt that God was judging them unjustly for circumstances they were not responsible for (the popular proverb mentioned in v.29 is also used by Ezekiel in Eze 18:2–4). One would think that in light of Dt 24:16 no one would claim that children had to pay for the sins of their parents. The altogether sufficient answer to the fatalistic despair voiced by the proverb is that in the suffering of Israel individual responsibility is clear. Each man and woman was personally responsible; so none could claim exculpation.

f. God's new covenant (31:31–34)

This portion of the book has been acclaimed as one of the most important passages in the entire OT. It is beyond dispute that the passage has had tremendous influence on NT doctrine. Likely the concept of the new covenant is Jeremiah's greatest contribution to biblical truth.

At this point an outline of the remainder of the chapter, detailing the fullness of Jeremiah's revelation, will be useful:

1. The time of the covenant (v.31)—"The time is coming";

2. The Maker of the covenant (v.31)—the LORD (vv.3, 20, 32, 35);

3. The name of the covenant (v.31)—new (Ro 11:27; Heb 8:6–13; 10:14–18; also Mt 26:26–28; Mk 14:22–24; Lk 22:19–20; 1Co 11:23–25);

4. The parties of the covenant (v.31)—"house of Israel" and "house of Judah" (cf. Eze 37:15–19; Ro 9:4–5);

5. The contrasted covenant (v.32)—not like the old covenant: based on merit and works, susceptible of infraction, no enablement, did not give life (Gal 3:21);

6. The nature of the covenant (vv.33–34)—not dependent on external law nor human interpretation; law written on the heart; gives intimate knowledge of and fellowship with God, forgiveness of sins, and peace of heart;

7. The immutability of the covenant (vv.35–37)—the unchanging purpose of God reflected in the fixed order of nature;

8. The physical aspects of the covenant (vv.38–40)—rebuilt Jerusalem in holiness and permanence;

9. The Guarantor of the covenant (vv.31–40)—"declares the LORD" or "the LORD says" (nine times), as though to swear by himself (cf. Heb 6:17–18).

31 This mountain-peak OT passage stands in a real sense as the climax of Jeremiah's teaching. Jeremiah wrote the passage while he was shut up in the court of the guard. The words "the time is coming" have already been used by Jeremiah; they are an eschatological formula that places the prophecy in messianic times in the Day of the Lord, the consummation period of the nation's history (cf. v.27). The promise relates to a "new covenant" and is a prediction of a radical change in God's economy (i.e., his dealing with humanity). Thus when Jeremiah foretold a new covenant, by implication the Mosaic covenant became the old one (cf. Heb 8:13). Moreover, the new covenant is an eternal one. National covenants do not die because of old age. The old covenant spoke of a great physical deliverance from Egypt through the blood of lambs and the power of God; the new covenant proclaims a great spiritual deliverance from sin and death through the efficacious blood of the Lamb of God and the power of God. The Passover Feast memorialized the first; the Lord's Supper memorializes the second.

Jeremiah explicitly presents the parties to the covenant: the Lord, the house of Israel, and the house of Judah. Notice that the covenant brings to mind the cleavage of the nation into two kingdoms, but notice also that both parts of the nation are included. The whole covenant is for the whole nation. Significantly, the new covenant will be with God's chosen people, as was the old. It could not be made with the church because no former (old) covenant had been made with her.

Does this mean that believers today have no part in this new covenant? Surely not, for the same death of Christ that implemented the new covenant for Israel does so for all sinners for all time. The testimony of the entire NT is too clear on this point to be misunderstood. Because Israel rejected the covenant in the first advent, Gentiles availed themselves of its provisions (cf. Ro 9:30–33); and Israel will yet ratify it at the climax of her history (cf. Zec 12:10–13:1). Thus it is correct to say that all believers in Christ are by virtue of this covenant grafted into the stock of Abraham (cf. Ro 11 16–24).

Does this mean that another covenant needs to be made for either Israel or Gentiles? Obviously not, since both share redemption by faith in the blood of the new covenant. Writing to Hebrews of his time, including believing Hebrews, the writer of the letter to the Hebrews makes clear how the new covenant now avails for both (cf. Heb 8; see also Eph 3:1–7).

Some ask how the new covenant can apply to the church when it was to be negotiated with Israel and Judah. The historical argument is insurmountable: when the new covenant was inaugurated (see the gospel accounts), there was no church, nor could there be until the resurrection of Christ (cf Eph 1:22–23). Furthermore, although Jer 31 does not state it, the making of the new covenant was inextricably bound up with the crucifixion of Christ for all humankind. When Israel refused to enter into the covenant (cf. Isa 53; Mt 22:1–10; Lk 14:15–23), God having but one way of salvation for all ages of history, the offer of redemption (the procuring means of the covenant) went out to all people. Although the church is not explicitly seen in the OT, the salvation of non-Jews is predicted more than once (cf. Isa 49:1–7, esp. v.6). It is the new truth of the NT that redeemed Jews and Gentiles constitute the church of this age. Salvation is possible only through the death of Christ, and this is the basis of the new covenant. All sinful humanity is thus in view in this covenant. Finally, Israel as a nation will ratify the covenant after the "full number of the Gentiles has come in" (Ro 11:25–27).

32 Jeremiah points out in this verse that the new covenant is built on the fact of Israel's failure under the old covenant. Because the old covenant was a legal one ("If you do . . . I will do"), it was incumbent on both parties to maintain its provisions. Israel did not, for the people broke the first commandment before Moses descended from Sinai. The fault lay with the people and their sin; they broke the covenant. Thus the new covenant must supersede the old. If the old covenant had not been broken, then what need was there for the ministry of Jeremiah or any of the OT prophets?

The day when the covenant was "made with their forefathers" refers to the whole period of the Exodus (cf. 7:22). "I took them by the hand" is a tender nuance of paternal love and concern. The blame for breaking the covenant rested wholly on Israel and Judah, for there was no fault in God; he had ever been as faithful to them as a faithful husband to his wife. This marriage relationship was the very basis on which God expected obedience to and fidelity in the covenant.

33 Once more Jeremiah stresses the nature of the covenant as a national covenant. The parties are the same as in v.31. The time factor is after the return from exile. Instead of changing his covenant relationship to his people because they broke the old covenant, in his grace God finds a way whereby they will not break the new covenant. God will write the law on their hearts. The old covenant had been engraved in stone; the new covenant will include a revolutionary change in will, heart, and conscience. It will be an internal covenant. The law now becomes a principle of life (cf. Ro 8:1–4), a part of the nature of God's people. The core of the new covenant is God's gift of a new heart (cf. Eze 36:25–27). The motivation for obeying God's law is inner knowledge of his will, coupled with an enablement to perform it—all founded on the assurance that sins are forgiven.

Permanence is also a feature of this covenant (cf. vv.35–37). Since the inward dynamic was absent in the old covenant, it could not be effective. There must be an inner force, a new power. The entire transaction implies the new birth set forth in the gospel. The regenerate spirit is the source of all godly action. The "heart" (GK 4213) includes one's emotional, ethical, and intellectual life. The goal of the covenant is that relation between God and his people that was emphasized from Abraham's time on (cf. Eze 11:19; 18:31; 36:26; Jn 1:10–13; 3:1–16).

Is it not strange that many believers today yearn for laws and rules, putting themselves under the economy of the old covenant, which Jeremiah, Christ, and the apostles warned was not capable of fulfillment? No wonder the new covenant is a missionary message for the world! Its nature is individual, internal, and universal. The reason Jeremiah emphasized the national factor (cf. vv.31–33) was that he wanted to stress the origin of the covenant and to sharpen the contrast between the new covenant and the old covenant, which was made with Israel only at Sinai.

34 One grand feature of the new covenant is that it affords a clear apprehension of God and his will by believers without human mediation. God will be known instinctively and his will performed spontaneously (cf. Isa 54:13; Jn 6:45). The knowledge spoken of is not theoretical knowledge transmitted by religious instruction. It is rather knowledge of God based on a heart experience of divine grace and imparted by the Holy Spirit, with assurance that the believer has been received into the family of God through the forgiveness of sins.

This knowledge does not militate against or render unnecessary religious instruction (cf. 1Co 12:28–29; Eph 4:11–12). There will be direct access to God for both Jew and Gentile through Christ, our High Priest (cf. Heb 4:16; 10:19–22). This does not mean that every believer will be self-sufficient and independent of others. But it does indicate that all will have their own experience of God without resort to others. "The least of them" is broad in meaning and includes "the least" in intellectual ability, in influence or position, in moral capacity—all are included in the comprehensive scope of the phrase.

The climax of this wonderful section comes in the revelation that the basis of the new covenant is forgiveness of sin. Thus gratitude for forgiveness will issue in spontaneous obedience. The new covenant does not envision sinlessness but forgiveness of sin, resulting in restoration of fellowship with God. Its foundation is the absolute and complete forgiveness of all sins. The covenant shows no dependence on law, temple, sacrifices, ark, human priesthood, nation, or country. The old covenant did not, could not, and was never intended to save anyone. The last clause of v.34 states that what grace forgives, divine omniscience forgets.

In summary, the enunciation of the new covenant, which differs so much from the old, focuses on its permanence and its sustaining principle that evokes gratitude for the forgiveness of sin. The overarching emotion is love, not fear. The goal in both covenants is the same: "I will be their God, and they will be my people" (cf.Ex 29:45; Lev 26:12).

g. The perpetuity of Israel (31:35–40)

35–37 The value of the new covenant is that it is an eternal covenant made with an eternal people. The permanence of the nation is illustrated from the fixed arrangements in nature. The survival of Israel through the centuries can be explained only on supernatural grounds (cf. 33:20, 25). As unchangeable as the laws of nature is God's covenant with the deathless nation. The concept of "nation" (GK 1580) carries with it geographical location, government, and other ethnic features to be fully realized in the end time. In short, it is utterly impossible that Israel should cease to be a nation before God. National existence is assured, regardless of how God may have to deal with individuals in the nation. God regards his promises rather than their demerits.

38–40 Since a literal nation must have an actual geographical location, it is revealed that the capital, Jerusalem, will be rebuilt and expanded—the very city that Jeremiah was before long to see destroyed by the Chaldean army. A renewed covenant demands a renewed Jerusalem. It will be greatly enlarged and permanently settled. The rebuilding is not for the people themselves or for secular purposes but for the glory of the Lord. It will be dedicated and separated to him.

The rebuilding of the city will encompass the four corners of the capital (cf. Zec 14:10). The Tower of Hananel was the northeast corner of the city (cf. Ne 3:1; 12:39; Zec 14:10). The Corner Gate probably refers to the one at the northwest corner of the city wall (cf. 2Ki 11:13; 2Ch 26:9). The locations of Gareb and Goah are unknown. The valley of the corpses and ashes is generally understood to be the Valley of Hinnom (cf. 7:31). The Kidron flows east of Jerusalem (cf. 2Sa 15:23). The Horse Gate is apparently at the southeast corner of the temple courts (cf. Ne 3:28 with 2Ki 11:16; 2Ch 23:15). Thus even the polluted areas would be sanctified to the Lord.

In strong language this section closes with the affirmation that the city will be invincible forever. A permanent nation calls for a permanent capital. The rebuilding of the city envisioned here cannot be that effected in Nehemiah's day because the contextual considerations demand the end time for Israel (cf. "days are coming" [vv.27, 31]) and the temple rebuilt by Zerubbabel was again thrown down and destroyed (cf. Mt 24:1–2; Lk 21:2–4). Finally, in the broader context of prophecy, this passage will not permit an interpretation that applies it to a spiritual, heavenly, or symbolic Jerusalem.

3. The manifestation of faith (32:1–44)

This chapter shows the reality of Jeremiah's faith in the Lord's promises of the nation's restoration. The time was the second year of the siege of Jerusalem (588–587 B.C.). The siege had begun in Zedekiah's ninth year (cf. 39:1), but the Babylonians had withdrawn on hearing of the approach of the Egyptian army (cf. 37:5). Jerusalem fell in August of the following year, 586 B.C. On "the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar," see comment on 25:1.

Chapter 32 deals with what happened during the years before the capture of Jerusalem, the destruction of the city, and the incidents that immediately followed. What Jeremiah did at that time showed his faith in the nation's restoration to the land after the Captivity. It was indeed a dark time. Jerusalem was undergoing its final siege, and Jeremiah himself was in prison. But it was also just the time for a heroic example of faith.

a. The setting for Jeremiah's act of faith (32:1–5)

1–2 This entire chapter moves within the framework of the OT law of redemption. The tenth year of Zedekiah was 587 B.C. (cf. 2Ki 25:8). The siege of Jerusalem was at an advanced state. The outlook was dark, the situation desperate. Verse 2 tells of Jeremiah's imprisonment; vv.3–5 give the reason for this.

Chapter 37 shows us that Jeremiah had not yet been imprisoned during the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem and the raising of that siege by the approach of the Egyptian army (cf. 37:4–12). During the temporary raising of the Babylonian siege, when he tried to leave the city to go to the land of Benjamin, Jeremiah was taken and thrown into a dungeon on the pretense that he was defecting to the Babylonians (37:11, 16). He remained there until Zedekiah ordered him to appear before him to be questioned about the outcome of the war. When he told Zedekiah that he would be captured by Nebuchadnezzar (37:17), Jeremiah then lamented about the difficulty of his own imprisonment (37:20) and begged not to be put back into the dungeon. So Zedekiah ordered him (37:21) to be moved to the "courtyard of the guard," where he stayed until the city fell (38:13, 28; 39:14). He was shut up at the request of the officials (38:4–6) and at Zedekiah's command. The courtyard of the guard, probably a stockade (cf. Ne 3:25), was the part of the palace area set apart for prisoners. The soldiers who guarded the palace were quartered there.

3–5 There is no contradiction between v.3 and 37:15. Verse 3 is a general account without details. The officers had confined Jeremiah in Jonathan's house (37:15), but Zedekiah had moved him into the palace (37:21). Even though Zedekiah witnessed the fulfillment of Jeremiah's predictions, he was angry enough to imprison him, as if this could alter what was happening. Zedekiah, then, is ultimately responsible for Jeremiah's imprisonment. Zedekiah should have known by this time that Jeremiah's message was not his own. In plain, unequivocal terms Jeremiah foretold Zedekiah's fate. Most scholars believe that v.4 speaks of the Lord's punishment of Zedekiah. All that is intended by the passage, however, appears to be Zedekiah's death, because he was never released from Babylon.

b. The Lord's command (32:6–8)

6–7 Throughout this chapter Jeremiah is giving his own report of events. His purchase of the field from Hanamel, his cousin, was meant to encourage the people regarding their return from captivity and to show Jeremiah's firm faith in their future despite their desperate situation. The situation is all the more dramatic since the field Jeremiah was to buy had already been captured by the invading Babylonians.

The Lord told Jeremiah in advance that his cousin Hanamel would come to him. That Hanamel did so was in accordance with the law in Lev 25:23–28 (cf. Ru 4:1–6). Family property must not pass into the hands of an outsider. The purpose of this law was to keep property in the family. For the seller this was duty; for the relative or kinsman-redeemer it was a right. Thus such a transaction is spoken of as the duty of redemption and the right of preemption. Hanamel was evidently childless. The passage reveals that the ancient laws of land tenure were still followed in Judah in spite of its apostasy. In addition to the general law for all Israel, these land-tenure laws would in Jeremiah's time have special relevance to alienation of property belonging to priestly families—property that should not pass into nonpriestly hands.

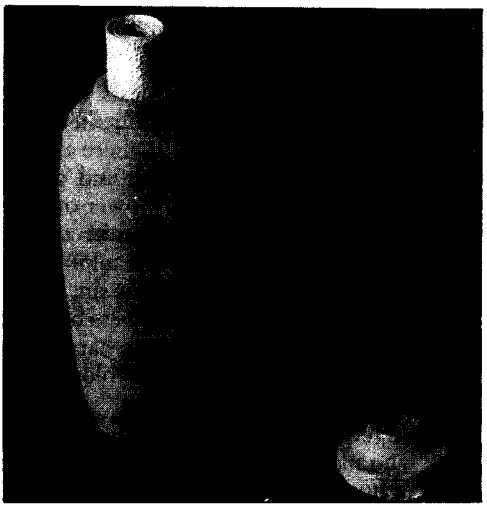
8 Here was a public test of Jeremiah's prophecies about the future blessing of the land. Hanamel was able to visit Jeremiah because the siege was not yet a tight one. His request for his cousin to buy the field seemed preposterous with the enemy at the gates of Jerusalem and exile certain. When Hanamel came, Jeremiah knew that the Lord was behind the offer. He had not doubted the Lord's word and had its confirmation in vv.6–7. Now he realized all the meaning of the purchase in relation to the nation's future.

c. The purchase (32:9–15)

9–11 Jeremiah's faith sustained him in what appeared to be the inevitable loss of his money. We do not know the source of his income, nor can we speculate about the adequacy or inadequacy of the price or about the size of the field. The transaction was carried out with legal precision. This is the only account in the Bible of a purchase of this kind. Before the introduction of coinage about the sixth century B.C., payment in financial transactions was made by weighing out quantities of gold or silver. Signing, sealing, and the presence of witnesses were necessary for legalizing a transaction like the one between Hanamel and Jeremiah. Two copies of the deed were made, one for security and the other for future reference in proving that the agreed-on terms had not been tampered with. All the conditions of the sale were carefully specified. The title deeds went to the buyer. The practice of sealing deeds throws light on the metaphor of the seven-sealed scroll (Rev 5:1), which was the title deed to the world purchased by Christ.

12–14 The deed (in duplicate) was given Baruch, the trusted confidant and secretary of Jeremiah, for preservation from loss or mutilation. Up to this point, Baruch had kept himself in the background; this is the first mention of him in the book. The sale was made as public as possible; secret transactions were avoided. Moreover, the publicity stressed and disseminated the message implicit in Jeremiah's purchase of the field. The documents were stored in clay jars to insure their permanence (the Dead Sea Scrolls, written on leather, have survived in earthenware jars for over two thousand years). Usually the jars were sealed with pitch. As for Jeremiah's transaction, it is obvious that after the Exile the deeds would be of great value to the owners. Here, then, is an instance of ancient title insurance.



Jeremiah purchased a title deed to property in Anathoth and put it in a sealed jar. This jar and scroll are like those found at Qumran.

15 Finally, Jeremiah stated that his purchase of the field symbolized the restoration of Israel to her land after the Captivity. This afforded comfort to the beleaguered people of Judah. Jeremiah had availed himself of the opportunity the Lord had given him of showing his full confidence in the prophecy that had been revealed to him by the Lord.

d. Jeremiah's doubts and prayer (32:16–25)

16 Jeremiah may have longed for some reconciliation of his purchase with his prophecies of Jerusalem's destruction. There was the possibility that his hearers would accuse him of changing his position on the fate of Judah. He could hardly believe the promises the Lord had commanded him to proclaim. So he had misgivings when he thought it over later on. Although he had explained the meaning of the episode (v.15), he was still troubled by its improbabilities; furthermore, he also longed for reassurance for the people.

17–25 In his prayer Jeremiah deals with the Lord's grace to Israel throughout her long history. He begins at the place where all theology should begin—the person and works of God. He acknowledges the power of God in creation. Then Jeremiah speaks of the boundless grace of God to humankind and the truth of divine retribution for sin. Grace does not disregard the righteousness of God. Divine retribution is likened to a harvest laborer's putting his pay into the folds of his children's garments.

Next Jeremiah magnifies the wisdom of God, who in his omniscience surveys all the deeds of humanity in order to dispense absolute justice. Jeremiah sees the wonderful works the Lord did on behalf of Israel in Egypt as harbingers of mercies he continued to show them "to this day." After that Jeremiah summarizes the Lord's gracious dealings from the Exodus through the Conquest and Israel's settlement in the land. Finally, in spite of this outpouring of God's love to them, Jeremiah acknowledges that Israel decided to live in disobedience to God's will, thus bringing on themselves their present calamities.

The "siege ramps" (GK 6149) were earthworks used in capturing a city. The Babylonians had already reached the city walls. As the Lord had foretold, the enemy had ample weaponry. The siege was successful, the city was doomed, and there was no hope of escape. The Lord's long and patient warnings were coming true. The fall of the city and the divine command for Jeremiah's purchase of land seemed irreconcilable. The incongruity was plain. Why buy the field when it would soon be lost to the Babylonians? Yet God had commanded Jeremiah to buy the field and to do it publicly. It was a situation calling for faith in and obedience to the word the Lord had given him to proclaim. So Jeremiah prayed for illumination rather than for confirmation of his understanding of the purpose of God.

e. The Lord's answer (32:26–35)

26–29 The Lord's reply to Jeremiah's prayer was reassuring. As impossible as a bright future for Jeremiah and his people might seem, it was not outside the range of the Lord's power. The omnipotent God is the source of confidence for believers in all ages. So the Lord's assurance came to Jeremiah in the very words he had used (cf. v.17). A divine summary of the nation's punishment follows. The people's sins had made judgment inescapable, and Nebuchadnezzar's capture of Jerusalem was the inevitable retribution for persistent idolatry. The homes the Lord had given his people had been used for the degenerate worship of Baal. That the people practiced their idolatry on the rooftops shows their brazen defiance of the Lord's repeated warnings.

30–33 The nation's stubborn resistance to the Lord's will had characterized the people from the beginnings of their national existence, which 2:2 places at the Exodus (cf. Ex 32). The reference to the work of their hands probably includes not only their idols but also their deeds in general. This was what aroused God's wrath in punishing them. In sweeping condemnation Jeremiah declares the long-standing character of their idolatry "from the day [the city] was built." Solomon had completed the building of the city, and he was the first of all Israel's kings to fall into idolatry. All the inhabitants of the city, from the highest to the lowest, were implicated in the sin, unwilling to be taught and to be turned from their wicked practices.

34–35 The height of the nation's impiety was reached when the people set up their idols in the temple of God himself. Their obscene symbols had been removed during Josiah's reforms, but they were reintroduced in the years of apostasy after Josiah's reign (cf. 7:30; 2Ki 23:4, 6). Molech worship included human sacrifice; so along with gross idolatry went child sacrifice (cf. 19:1–13). So abhorrent was this practice that the Lord by a strong anthropomorphism says that it had never entered his mind that his favored people would stoop so low.

f. Promises of restoration (32:36–44)

36–42 The Lord views the "city" as representing the whole kingdom. In their ultimate condition, the people would be restored to their land, and the country would again be prosperous. After the punishment, a godly remnant would return from exile to normal activity. "All the lands" presupposes a worldwide dispersion.

The new covenant is reiterated because the prophets looked forward to more than just a physical return of the people (cf. 31:32). The covenant bond between God and his people will be renewed, and they will walk in righteousness. This relationship is at the heart of the covenant in the past and in the future. Material and spiritual blessings go hand in hand. Moreover, the nation will be characterized by unity of purpose and life. They will show singleness of purpose in both thoughts and acts devoted to the Lord. The reference to inner disposition and outward expression again points to the new covenant with its promise of a new heart. Unity always characterizes the Messianic Era (cf. Zep 3:9; Zec 14:9; Jn 10:16). The covenant will never again be broken (cf. Isa 55:3; Eze 37:26). Moreover, the promise of restoration ("assuredly plant them") is just as certain as the predictions of punishment. Whatever God foretells, he makes good.

43–44 Finally, Jeremiah returns to the main theme of this chapter. His transaction was an example to be universally followed in the future restoration. What he did will be repeated by many others in that coming day. A population increase after the decimation of warfare and exile is implied. Jeremiah mentions several specific places in the land to show that the Lord's promise covers the whole country (cf. 17:26). Benjamin is mentioned first perhaps because of the property of Jeremiah at Anathoth.

4. The righteous reign of the Davidic Ruler (33:1–26)

This chapter concludes the Book of Consolation (chs. 30–33). The remainder of Jeremiah deals with Jerusalem's final siege and destruction and with the ultimate results of the prophecies against the nations. It also contains additional promises of future blessing. The theme of ch. 33 is the restoration of Jerusalem and the reestablishment of its worship. The date and occasion are the same as in ch. 32. Once more the Lord gives Judah light in her darkest hours.

a. The exhortation to call on the Lord (33:1–3)

1–3 This new message probably came to Jeremiah soon after the Lord spoke to him about the field (ch. 32). He was still imprisoned in the courtyard of the guard, where the elders and officers of the king could consult him. But the word of God is not bound. The pronouncements now to be given Jeremiah are weighty; so the Lord underscores their veracity by affixing his eternal name to them. He himself is surety for the program he is unfolding. So he invites Jeremiah to ask him for remarkable disclosures. The things to be revealed are "unsearchable" (GK 1290) because they are beyond the grasp of human knowledge. The things under consideration are the truths concerning the restoration of the nation and Jerusalem.

b. The certainty of the fall of Jerusalem (33:4–5)

4–5 All the efforts of the king and his people to save Jerusalem would be futile. Theirs was a lost cause. "The houses . . . and the royal palaces of Judah" were not demolished by the enemy but by the besieged people of Jerusalem who used them for defense against the Babylonians. But whatever measures were taken to defend the city would be useless. "The dead bodies" refers to the defenders of Jerusalem, not to the Babylonians. Opposing the invaders could not change the situation, for God had withdrawn his favor from his people because of their wickedness.

c. Days of return and rejoicing (33:6–13)

6–9 Past trials will yet be turned into blessings. So Jeremiah sets forth promises of prosperity: health, restoration, joy, and peace. The word "health" (GK 776) is literally "new flesh." The Exile will have a healing effect. The wounds of the nation will be bound up in peace and security. God will repair the losses and rebuild the land that had been destroyed. The restoration of Judah and Israel must refer to the latter days (i.e., the Messianic era) because the captivity of Israel did not end after seventy years. Judah and Israel will be restored as one kingdom, just as they were before the division of the kingdom under Rehoboam. Far more important than any territorial restitution will be the pardon and cleansing from the Lord. The future for the Jews will be so glorious that the nations will stand in awe of them and tremble at their greatness. Thus Jerusalem, with its former state reversed, will be made holy.

10–11 Jeremiah sees Judah and Jerusalem as already desolate and fallen. But they will arise; there will be joy in worship in the temple. Joy and gladness will not only mark the relationships of God's people but will also mark their worship in his temple. The liturgical words are those used by the Levitical singers in the temple service (Ps 106:1) and show that the temple will be rebuilt and the ministry restored as in preexilic days. Joy will be accompanied by security.

12–13 The reference to shepherds with their flocks points to a future time of peace, tranquillity, and prosperity. In ancient Israel and Judah, shepherds counted their sheep as they came to the fold at night. So in the restored and united kingdom, the shepherds will count their sheep in peace.

d. Restoration of royalty and priesthood (33:14–22)

14 Jeremiah declares that monarchy and priesthood, interrupted by the Exile, will coexist permanently. He proclaims the perpetuity of the Davidic dynasty and the Levitical priesthood without equivocation. The predicted restoration ("the days are coming") is not, however, to be looked for in the immediate time of the return from the Exile. Only in a limited and preliminary way were these promises fulfilled in Zerubbabel and Sheshbazzar after the Exile (cf. Ezr 1:8; 2:2; also 2:40–54; 8:15–20). Ultimately, they are combined in the highest sense in Christ (cf. Ps 110:4) and are yet to be fulfilled in his reign on earth.

15 The good word the prophets announced comprises the entire panorama of glorious promises made to both parts of the nation. "Those days" are the messianic times (cf. the parallel prophecy in 23:1–8). It is through the Lord Messiah, the righteous One, that the restoration and attendant blessings will be realized. Jeremiah's picture of the coming Messiah is varied and unique. He pictures the coming Messiah as (1) "the spring of living water" (2:13); (2) the good "shepherd" (23:4; 31:10); (3) the "righteous Branch" (here and 23:5); (4) the "Redeemer" (50:34); (5) "The LORD Our Righteousness" (23:6); (6) "David their king" (30:9); and (7) the agent of "the new covenant" (31:31–34).

16 Salvation and safety are in store for Judah and Jerusalem because of the presence of justice and righteousness personified. The name given the Messiah in 23:6 is here given to Jerusalem. The holy city can have the same name as the Messiah because she reflects that righteousness the Messiah bestows on her. Jerusalem will then be the embodiment of the nation's ideal in the Messiah. The city will be marked by righteousness.

17–18 If one sees in these verses a constant presence and succession of Davidic rulers and Levitical priests, then history does not validate this interpretation. But the passage claims no such thing. It says only that David's dynasty will never cease. Temporary interruption is only apparent; there is no true cessation. David's Scion still lives in the Messiah. To Jeremiah, David will never lack a descendant to occupy his throne. His dynasty will never be permanently cut off (see Lk 1:32–33 and comments). The permanence of the royal and priestly lines is thus forcefully stated. In the highest sense Christ as King-Priest, of course, fulfills these promises (cf. Ps 110:4).

But in the priestly realm the primary emphasis is on Levi's line, which must not be confused with Christ's priesthood after the order of Melchizedek. Monarchy and priesthood were the two bases of the OT theocracy. When these appeared to be in danger of extinction in Jeremiah's day, we find their continuance couched in sure and irrevocable terms. What is affirmed of the monarchy in v.17 is promised the priesthood in v.18. The Levitical priesthood is assured a permanent ministry (cf. Nu 25:13). As legitimate priests, they will serve the Lord.

19–22 What has been stated in 31:35–37 as a guarantee of the new covenant is now used to illustrate the certainty of the continuance of the monarchy and priesthood. The greater the promises, the stronger the assurances that they will be fulfilled. The certainty of the prophecies is riveted in God's order in nature, and the prophecies themselves are linked with the unfailing regularity of the natural order. A nullification of the covenant is an impossibility. Just as the covenant with Noah (cf. Ge 8:22) is kept, so the covenant with David (cf. 2Sa 7) and that with Levi (Nu 17) will also be kept. Moreover, the Lord adds a promise of a great increase in the descendants of David and the Levites; what was originally stated of the entire nation is here specifically applied to them (cf. Ge 15:5; 22:17).

e. Confirmation of the promises (33:23–26)

23–24 The reproach that the nation had suffered from her neighbors and even the unbelieving in her midst will be removed. The two kingdoms are Israel and Judah. This points to a time when the nation are still divided as in Rehoboam's time. Certain Jews, discouraged by the times, thought that without freedom and a government of their own they were no longer a nation (cf. Ro 11:1). The fear and lament of the people shows that they considered that God had forsaken them utterly and finally.

25–26 Of what use would the greatest national promises be if the nation did not exist to enjoy them? The Lord guarantees his people that he will make good every promise. They will certainly return from exile. They are undeniably the eternal nation. The Lord will allow no one to impugn his covenant promises to Israel. The threefold mention of the patriarchs points to the whole chain of promises repeatedly given them. Nature will utterly collapse before God goes back on the slightest promise to his people.

C. Messages and Events Before the Fall of Jerusalem (34:1–39:18)

1. Zedekiah and the mistreated slaves (34:1–22)

Chapters 34–38 are largely occupied with Jeremiah's experiences during the siege of Jerusalem. Like other portions of the book, they are not in strict chronological order. Most of the events they narrate took place in the reigns of Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, shortly before the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.

a. The warning to Zedekiah (34:1–7)

1–2 This section stresses the certainty of the Babylonian capture of Jerusalem. In view of this it would have been wise for Zedekiah to surrender. Jeremiah's faithfulness in delivering this warning led to his imprisonment. He set clear choices and their consequences before the king.

This passage must be dated before the actual siege began (i.e., 589–588 B.C.; cf. 39:1–2; 2Ki 24:20–25:1), because the Judean cities were only being threatened by Nebuchadnezzar at this time, and Jeremiah was not yet in prison. Cities like Lachish and Azekah (v.7) were not yet captured and Jerusalem was still free. The siege itself lasted from 588–586 B.C. Soldiers came from subject countries to join in the siege (cf. 2Ki 24:2). As v.22 shows, the Babylonians, who had temporarily retired from the siege (37:5), would return to finish the destruction of Jerusalem.

3 This verse discloses the fate of Zedekiah in the siege. The Lord's message to him was that he should not be led astray by the temporary respite in the siege; the situation was actually hopeless. Zedekiah himself would have to face the invader (32:4). The mention of a face-to-face confrontation with Nebuchadnezzar shows something of the fear he inspired. Zedekiah could not escape the consequences of his treason in breaking his covenant with Nebuchadnezzar. He would have to answer personally for it. After his confrontation with Nebuchadnezzar, Zedekiah was blinded and taken to Babylon (52:11; cf. Eze 12:13).

4–5 Through Jeremiah the Lord counseled Zedekiah to surrender. The Lord promised him that he would not be slain but would die in captivity. Unlike Jehoiakim (cf. 22:18–19), Zedekiah would die a natural death. The "funeral fire" does not refer to cremation, which was not practiced by the Hebrews, but to the custom of burning spices at royal funerals (cf. 2Ch 16:14; 21:19). The lamentation "Alas, O master!" was normally used of mourning for a king (cf. 22:18).

6–7 Speaking so boldly to the king was hazardous, but Jeremiah feared only God. At the time of this prophecy the only cities that remained uncaptured were Jerusalem, Lachish, and Azekah. The latter two had been fortified by Rehoboam (2Ch 11:5, 9); both were southwest of Jerusalem—Lachish, thirty-five miles, Azekah, fifteen miles, not far from the Philistine border. Since their fall was necessary to the capture of Jerusalem, they marked the southern limit of Nebuchadnezzar's invasion. The Lachish Letters give a vivid picture of these events. Letter 4 reads: "We are watching for the smoke signals of Lachish . . . because we do not see Azekah." That is, Azekah had already fallen. Lachish capitulated soon after this.

b. The perfidy against the slaves (34:8–11)

8–10 When the siege became more severe, Zedekiah made a covenant with the people to liberate their Hebrew slaves. The Hebrew law concerning slavery (cf. Ex 21:1–11; Lev 25:39–55; Dt 15:12–18) apparently had fallen into disuse. The covenant did not follow the letter of the law because it liberated all the slaves no matter how long they had served. It was ratified most solemnly in the temple (cf. vv.18–20). The covenant probably was made with the thought that the liberated slaves would join in defending the city.

11 When the siege was temporarily lifted through the intervention of their Egyptian allies, the Jews forced the liberated slaves back into former bondage. This was not only a shameful repudiation of their solemn covenant but a flagrant violation of Dt 15:12; it also profaned the Lord's name, in which they had made the covenant. To reimpose slavery on those who had been freed showed that the covenant had not been motivated by compassion, justice, and obedience to the Lord's command.

c. The sin of the nation (34:12–16)

12–14 The Lord reminds the people that their ancestors had been slaves in Egypt. Who, then, should have more compassion on slaves than those who were obligated to keep the Passover, the annual celebration of Israel's release from Egyptian slavery? Part of the law given at Sinai dealt with Hebrew slaves, and this the people had disobeyed. The words "sold himself" reflect the Near Eastern custom of voluntary slavery for economic reasons. The covenant Zedekiah made did not exactly fit the law in Dt 15:1, 12, because it required the immediate liberation of all slaves, not just those who had served six years. Thus the law did not cover this case. The "seventh year' is the year of liberation; the Hebrews counted both the first and the last years in calculating time periods.

15–16 The sin of Zedekiah and his people was especially serious because they had made the covenant of freedom in the house and name of the Lord. In contrast to earlier generations, they had decided to obey the law of releasing Hebrew slaves. Their covenant was not only a civil and economic act but a religious one as well. Their perfidy had profaned the Lord's name, in which they had sworn this covenant. Zedekiah was already notorious for breaking his pledged word (cf. Eze 17:11–21) to Nebuchadnezzar on ascending the throne of Judah.

d. The Lord's retribution for the perfidy (34:17–22)

17–22 Since they had not actually given the slaves freedom, God ironically declares that the people themselves would be freed—freed from his protecting hand. The guilty would be freed for doom and destruction. Because they had enslaved their brothers and sisters, they were to be subjected to their enemies. The ancient method of making a covenant is indicated in v.18 (cf. Ge 15:9–17). The intention was that as they passed through the pieces of the divided sacrifice they invoked on themselves a curse that, if they broke the covenant, they would be cut in pieces like the sacrificial calf. Notice how large a number of the people had contracted to release slaves. The heinousness of their sin is underlined by the punishment decreed for them. The Babylonians had only temporarily lifted the siege to meet Pharaoh Hophra (cf. 37:5, 7–10). The Lord assured Zedekiah and the people that the destruction would finally be consummated. The Babylonians did return and destroyed the city.

2. The faithfulness of the Recabites (35:1–19)

The events of this chapter (which, along with ch. 36, precede chs. 32–34 chronologically) occurred at the close of Jehoiakim's reign, some seventeen years earlier (i.e., about 606 B.C.). The Babylonians and Syrians were ravaging the land (cf. v.11; 2Ki 24:2) and had driven many in Judah, the Recabites among them, to take refuge in Jerusalem.

a. Jeremiah's test of the Recabites (35:1–5)

1–2 The episode is a rebuke to the nation for their unfaithfulness to God. "The Recabite family" refers to their clan. They were a separatist group, stemming from Jonadab (or Jehonadab, c. 840 B.C.; cf. 2Ki 10:15–23). Desiring to return to the simplicity of the nomadic life, they banned all sedentary occupations. As relations of the Kenites, they were kindred of Jethro, Moses' father-in-law (cf. Jdg 1:16; 1Ch 2:55). Their ancestor Jonadab was prominent in purging the northern kingdom of Baal worship in the time of Jehu (c. 840 B.C.). The Recabites lived in the southern deserts (1Sa 15:6) and in Israelite territory (Jdg 4:17; 5:24). With the fall of the northern kingdom, they moved south into Judah. The "side rooms" were probably anterooms of the temple used for storage and available to the Levites (cf. 1Ch 28:12). This chapter must not be interpreted in such a way as to imply that God necessarily approved of the restriction Jonadab placed on his descendants, the Recabites. What God commended was the fidelity of the Recabites to their convictions.

3–5 Jeremiah's testing of the Recabites was commanded by the Lord. We know essentially nothing of the persons mentioned in vv.3–4, except for Maaseiah, who was probably the father of Zephaniah the priest (cf. 21:1; 29:25; 37:3). He was in charge of the money given for the temple repair (cf. 2Ki 12:10). Jaazaniah was probably the leader of the group. The leaders were brought into the house of the Lord in order to publicize the message that was to follow. "The sons of Hanan" (a prophet of God) were probably his disciples. He appears to have been in sympathy with Jeremiah. The three leaders (cf. 52:24; 2Ki 25:18) probably had charge of the inner and outer court of the temple and the entrance door. They ranked next to the high priest and his deputy. Jeremiah put wine before the Recabites and invited them to drink.

b. The Recabites' loyalty to Jonadab (35:6–11)

6–11 The Recabites could not be tempted to disregard the commands of their ancestor, called "father" (GK 3) in the broad Semitic sense of ancestor. This prohibition was apparently meant to help them escape the defiling Baal worship, which was accompanied by wine drinking and carousing. Viniculture could not be carried on under nomadic conditions, so it too was banned. The restrictions imposed by Jonadab, however, went far beyond abstinence from wine and grape growing; they led to an austere and nomadic lifestyle, reminiscent of the Nazirites (cf. Nu 6:1–21). For over two hundred years this clan had obeyed their forefather's command. Again, Jeremiah's commendation was not the asceticism of the Recabites but their fidelity to Jonadab. With the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar and the Syrians, the Recabites could no longer live in tents in the open country but were forced to seek refuge in Jerusalem; but this did not compel them to drink wine.

c. The rebuke to Judah (35:12–17)

12–17 These verses drive home the purpose of the Recabite episode. Jeremiah probably spoke these words in one of the temple courts. They were meant to shame the people of Judah and Jerusalem for the way they had treated the Lord.

1. The Recabites obeyed a fallible leader; Judah's leader was the eternal God (cf. Mal 1:6).

2. Jonadab gave his commands to the Recabites only once; God repeatedly sent his messages to his people.

3. The restrictions that bound the Recabites did not deal with eternal issues; God's messages to his people had eternal as well as temporal implications.

4. The Recabites obeyed the commands of Jonadab for about three hundred years; the Lord's people constantly disobeyed.

5. The loyalty of the Recabites would be rewarded; for their disloyalty God's people would be punished.

d. The Recabites' reward (35:18–19)

18–19 In promising to bless the Recabites for their fidelity, God did not commend all aspects of their lifestyle (cf. 32:1–15 on land tenure). The expression "serve me" (lit., "stand in my presence") has been variously understood. It is a technical term for the privilege of service, used of prophets (1Ki 17:1), priests (Nu 16:9), and kings (1Ki 10:8). The term usually involves service in the temple but may not connote that here. Some think the promise in v.18 was literally fulfilled in the Recabites' being in some way incorporated into the tribe of Levi. But the promise may be a general one because the expression was used of patriarchs (Ge 19:27), of Moses and Samuel (Jer 15:1), and of the nation worshiping the Lord (7:10).

3. Jehoiakim's penknife and God's Word (36:1–32)

This chapter contains a unique description of the writing of a substantial portion of God's Word. We learn from it how Jeremiah's prophecies were written down after he had spoken them. In those days dictating to a secretary was common. Taking dictation was then, as now, a specialized skill. Jeremiah dictated his book in Jehoiakim's fourth year (605 B.C.); when the first copy was destroyed (cf. vv.23, 32), a new one with additions was produced. This was a year of highly significant events: the Battle of Carchemish, the defeat of Pharaoh Neco, and the subjugation of Jehoiakim to Nebuchadnezzar. Events before and after the siege of Jerusalem are covered in chs. 36–44.

a. The dictation of the scroll (36:1–8)

1–3 The year is the same as in 25:1 (see comments). The way the events are narrated implies the presence of an eyewitness—doubtless Baruch, Jeremiah's secretary. The Lord commanded Jeremiah to write on a scroll all the messages he had received from the Lord from the beginning of his ministry under Josiah "till now," i.e., the fourth year of Jehoiakim (cf. 25:1–3; 30:2). (These were undoubtedly the messages Jeremiah had spoken to the people.) The contents of the scroll probably included a summary of Jeremiah's messages from 626–605 B.C. The written word might be more successful than the preached word. The impending capture of Jerusalem added weight to the hope that the Lord's warnings through his prophet might yet be effective. The purpose of all Jeremiah's prophecies of judgment was to spur the nation to repentance, hence the conditional nature of the warnings (cf. 18:8; 26:3).

4–8 Baruch, the prophet's secretary, came from a prominent family (cf. 45:1; 51:59). Jeremiah was inspired by the Lord to dictate to Baruch from memory. The dates in this chapter (vv.1, 9, 22) show that a number of months passed between the dictation and public reading of what was written. Jeremiah was "restricted" from going to the temple. The authorities had probably forbidden him to speak there because of his unpopular temple address (cf. 7:1–15; 26:1–7). With Nebuchadnezzar on the march against Jerusalem, Jeremiah's message could no longer be considered harmless. Because he could not go to the temple, he had Baruch act as his agent. To guarantee a good hearing of his written messages, Jeremiah chose a fast day when the people would be assembled in the temple. After the Exile, fast days were specified (cf. Zec 7:3, 5; 8:19), but earlier they were called in times of emergency (cf. Joel 2:12, 15). Some public calamity had occasioned this fast. Internationally, it was a most opportune time for a fast because Jeremiah saw the significance of Egypt's defeat by the Babylonians at Carchemish in 605 B.C. There was a feeling that turning to the Lord in a public fast might avert the judgment that had been conditionally predicted.

b. The public reading (36:9–10)

9 The "fifth" year was 604 B.C., and the "ninth" month was about December. The fast (proclaimed by the people, not the king) was not that of the seventh month stated in the Law (cf. Lev 16:29; 23:27) but possibly one specially designated because of the first capture of Jerusalem in 605 B.C. (Jerusalem would again be invaded in 597 and 586 B.C.). The ninth month was the one in which the Babylonians sacked the Philistine city of Ashkelon. These events may have decided Jehoiakim's shift of allegiance from Egypt to Babylon. The public reading was the first of three readings that day (cf. vv.10, 15, 21). Because of the repeated readings, it is probable that only certain portions were read.

10 Gemariah was the son of Shaphan, Josiah's secretary of state (cf. 2Ki 22:3, 8, 12). This Gemariah was the brother of Ahikam, a friend of Jeremiah (cf. 26:24); he was not the Gemariah mentioned in 29:3. Shaphan's family was evidently a noble, godly one. Gemariah permitted Baruch to use his room in the temple's inner court. Evidently Baruch stationed himself at the door to Gemariah's room so that what he read could be heard by the assembled people.

c. The reading to the officials (36:11–19)

11-15 It was in Micaiah's father's chambers that Baruch read the scroll for the first time (cf. v.10). Micaiah doubtless felt that what Baruch had read affected the public interest; so he told the officials about it. When they had heard what was in the scroll, their response was immediate; and they asked that it be read to them. Of the officials mentioned, Jehudi, otherwise unknown, must have been an important person, since his ancestry is traced back to the third generation. Cushi (lit., "Ethiopian") does not necessarily imply Ethiopian descent, because the prophet

Zephaniah (cf. Zep 1:1) was a son of Cushi and of Hebrew descent. Observe the interest and respect the officials had for the message of the scroll. The way they addressed Baruch (vv.15, 19) implies that they favored him and Jeremiah. Baruch assumed the sitting position of an Oriental teacher (cf. Lk 4:20).

16–19 The reading showed the officials truths so opposed to the hopes of the king that they were stricken with fear. They believed the prophecies and may have feared for the lives of Baruch and Jeremiah as well as their own. Jehoiakim was no champion of the truth. Not in the sense of informers, but because of the terrifying contents of the book, they felt that the king should hear the message. The scroll contained such bold announcements at a time of crisis and struggle for the nation's existence that they felt it imposed a solemn responsibility on them. Not wishing to appear before the king as uninformed, they asked Baruch how the scroll had come to be written. Artlessly, he told them precisely how he had written down what Jeremiah had dictated. He had only put down the words; in no sense was he a collaborator or an editor. Realizing the potential danger involved and knowing the king's character, the officials showed their concern for the safety of Jeremiah and Baruch. Later on (cf. v.25) they even risked the king's displeasure. Their concern for safety was a wise precaution (cf. 26:20–23).

d. The reading to Jehoiakim (36:20–26)

20–21 King Jehoiakim's reception of the message was openly hostile. Unlike Josiah, his godly father (cf. 2Ki 22:1–23:25), Jehoiakim was not interested in spiritual reform but in an alliance with Egypt and, hence, was not favorable to Babylon (cf. 2Ki 23:34–35). Before the officials came into the inner courtyard where the king's chambers were, they deposited the scroll in the room of Elishama for safekeeping. They may have surmised what Jehoiakim's response to it would be; so they tried to keep it out of his reach. But the king ordered the scroll read in his presence.

22–26 So startling are the events that follow that Jeremiah describes them in detail. The king was in the winter house, a warm apartment in a sheltered part of the palace facing the winter sun (cf. Am 3:15). It was December, 604 B.C. A brazier ("firepot") with burning charcoal was placed in a low place in the middle of the room. Jehoiakim reacted violently to the reading. In an appalling act of blasphemy and contempt for God's written Word, Jehoiakim took a scribe's knife and cut off consecutive strips of the scroll as Jehudi read them and tossed them into the fire. Most of the court officials stood by indifferently. They shared the king's contempt for God's truth. Three men who opposed the king's actions are mentioned. Elnathan (cf. 26:22) was now on Jeremiah's side. In a further act, Jehoiakim compounded his sin by ordering the arrest of Baruch and Jeremiah. But the Lord intervened and used faithful friends to hide them.

e. The prophecies rewritten (36:27–28)

27–28 Soon after the king's destruction of the scroll, the Lord ordered Jeremiah to write a duplicate of it. God's message was not to be lost but rewritten in toto—with more added to it.

f. The condemnation of Jehoiakim (36:29–31)

29–31 The king's anger at Babylon may show that Jehoiakim had already decided on rebellion against Babylon (cf. 2Ki 24:1), a rebellion that resulted in the captivity during the reign of Jehoiachin. The three-month reign of Jehoiachin (cf. 2Ki 24:6, 8) does not contradict the prediction of v.30. Jehoiachin's succession was not a valid one but only a token one because he was immediately besieged by Nebuchadnezzar, surrendered in three months, and then went into exile, where he died after many years. No other descendant of Jehoiakim ever ascended the throne (Zedekiah was the uncle of Jehoiachin). Possibly Jehoiakim died either in a palace uprising or in an uprising of the people (cf. 22:18–19).

g. The prophecies recorded again (36:32)

32 Jehoiakim's destruction of the scroll was one of many attempts through the centuries to destroy God's Word. It is certain that our present text of the book of Jeremiah is longer than the original portions that had brief abstracts of Jeremiah's earlier prophecies. The additions doubtless included the doom of the godless king.

4. Resolute Jeremiah and weak Zedekiah (37:1–21)

Chapters 37–44 are a continuous record of the later work and experiences of Jeremiah, beginning with the accession of Zedekiah. They include the incidents from the fall of the city and from Jeremiah's sojourn in Egypt. In ch. 37 we have the captivity of the prophet, in ch. 39 that of Zedekiah.

a. Zedekiah's request (37:1–5)

1 This verse shows the fulfillment of the judgment Jeremiah pronounced against the godless Jehoiakim in 36:30. Instead of Jehoiakim's son Jehoiachin, Nebuchadnezzar put on the throne Zedekiah, Jehoiakim's brother and thus the uncle of Jehoiachin. The latter was deported to Babylon after three months' reign. Zedekiah had solemnly pledged his loyalty to Nebuchadnezzar in the name of the Lord. Because of Egyptian influence at his court, which he could not resist, Zedekiah decided to break his pledge. This was the immediate cause of the final siege of Jerusalem. This chapter appears to be the beginning of Zedekiah's reign, but earlier chapters have already spoken of him (cf. chs. 21, 27–79, 32, 34). He reigned for eleven years (597–586 B.C.).

2–3 The root of Judah's trouble was spiritual; the people were disobedient to God. In spite of his refusal to heed the word of God, Zedekiah sent messengers to Jeremiah (cf. 21:1–2). The approach of the Egyptian forces (vv.5, 9) seemed to contradict the message of 34:2–7; moreover, with the withdrawal of the Babylonian army, Zedekiah may have thought that Jeremiah's predictions of doom were wrong after all. Also, Zedekiah may have been encouraged by his alliance with Pharaoh Hophra (c. 590–570 B.C.). At any rate, he revolted against Babylon. Perhaps wanting a message from Jeremiah that would please him, he asked the prophet to pray for him (i.e., to support his actions). What Zedekiah wanted was for the Lord to make the temporary withdrawal of the Babylonians permanent. He may somehow have felt that the presence of Jeremiah, though he predicted doom, would ensure God's protection against Jerusalem's capture. As for his regard for Jeremiah, it was with superstition. Jehucal (cf. 38:1), one of the messengers sent to Jeremiah, later became an enemy of the prophet.

4–5 Jeremiah was not yet imprisoned (see also v.13). To help understand the narrative, there is a historical note in v.5 (see 34:8–11). At the approach of Egyptian troops, led by Hophra (cf. 44:30), Babylon temporarily raised her siege of Jerusalem. Soon after this, the Babylonians defeated the Egyptians and resumed the siege of Jerusalem.

b. Jeremiah's reply (37:6–10)

6–10 Jeremiah did not waver in his fidelity to the truth. The relief of Jerusalem was, he said, only temporary and would ultimately change nothing. This was only a passing incident. Circumstances and appearances to the contrary, God's ultimate word about Jerusalem was that it would be taken and burned. There was no basis for a false hope. Then the prophet stated in the strongest terms God's unchanging purpose to destroy Jerusalem. This was unquestionably his will. Escape was out of the question. Even the "wounded" would be able to carry out the doom threatening God's people.

c. The charge of treason against Jeremiah (37:11–15)

11–12 This section deals with Jeremiah's imprisonment after he was charged with treason. There was no proof whatever that he meant to defect to the Babylonians when the siege was temporarily lifted. His enemies misinterpreted his leaving the city and threw him into a dungeon. Apparently he left the city to care for certain of his property affairs in his native Anathoth. Jeremiah's intention is clear; the time was opportune for settling his affairs. But he planned to remain in Judah in spite of his divinely given warnings of impending disaster.

13–15 The Benjamin Gate was north of the city and led to the territory of that tribe. Irijah accused Jeremiah, who was already suspect because of his exhortations to surrender to the invaders (cf. 21:8–10), of defecting to the enemy. But Jeremiah could hardly have been deserting to the enemy, because they were already gone. The charge was vicious and nonsensical. Perhaps revenge for Jeremiah's prediction of the death of Irijah's grandfather Hananiah (cf. 28:16) motivated the charge. Many who heard Jeremiah followed his advice and deserted to the Babylonians (cf. 38:2, 19; 39:9; 52:15). The officials involved in beating and arresting him were surely not those of Josiah's time (cf. 26:16; 36:19), for they were probably captives in Babylon with Jehoiachin. Beating Jeremiah was an indignity his sensitive spirit felt deeply.

The home of Jonathan the secretary was made the prophet's prison, perhaps because he was just one of many deserters and political prisoners. It was not uncommon in the ancient East to use part of an officer's home as a prison. The treatment Jeremiah received is understandable, not excusable, on the grounds of the desperate plight of the city. Jonathan's house turned out to be a place where Jeremiah's life was endangered.

d. Jeremiah in the dungeon (37:16–21)

16–17 The prophet was put in "a vaulted cell in a dungeon" (lit., "the house of the cistern-pit"). The cell was a subterranean room adjoining the dungeon. The "long time" refers to the period when the Babylonians renewed their siege. So desperate was the situation for Jerusalem that Zedekiah felt he must have another message from Jeremiah even if he had to speak to him in secret. The nature of this meeting shows Jeremiah's unpopularity as well as Zedekiah's weakness in confronting his officials face to face. By this time he realized that Jeremiah was a true prophet of God. Evidently he was hoping Jeremiah would give him a more encouraging word about the Babylonian menace. But Jeremiah did not change his message; it was God's word, and the condition of Judah remained the same. Though without confidence in his advisers, Zedekiah was too weak to take a firm stand.

18–20 Jeremiah asked for justice, not pity. He wanted a valid accusation because he knew he was innocent of any treasonable actions. Since his words had proved to be true, why should he be imprisoned? If he was imprisoned for telling the truth, why were the false prophets, whose predictions were unfulfilled, not given the same treatment? They were the real traitors. Jeremiah's questions were uncomfortably fair because events had unmasked the false prophets (cf. Dt 13:1–5; 18:20–22). The situation was ironic: the false prophets who lied to the king and the nation were free; Jeremiah who told them the truth was in prison! The prophet then asks not to be sent back to the house of Jonathan the secretary, lest he die there.

21 Solicitous for the welfare of the prophet, Zedekiah reversed the decision of his officials and transferred Jeremiah to the guardroom, a move that doubtless gave him more security and saved him other indignities. The king also gave him a daily allotment from the rapidly failing food supply. But he did not liberate the prophet, because he still feared his officials.

5. Confined in a cistern (38:1–13)

The events recorded in this chapter took place near the end of the siege of Jerusalem. As tensions mounted in Judah, the anti-Babylonian group at court wanted to do away with their chief opponent, Jeremiah.

a. The accusation against Jeremiah (38:1–4)

1–3 The officials' opposition to Jeremiah kept up to the fall of Jerusalem. They hated him for his condemnation of their godless policies. The four mentioned doubtless represented a larger group. Jeremiah's confinement in the courtyard of the guard (cf. 37:21) still permitted him to make his message known. With the security of the guardroom as a base, he could have had access to a good many people. Gedaliah was probably the son of the Pashhur who beat Jeremiah and placed him in the stocks (cf. 20:1–6). Jehucal is mentioned in 37:3. All were in the Egyptian party. They naturally quoted Jeremiah's words in their accusation. They considered his messages treasonable, and even to ordinary listeners they sounded that way. Clearly, Jeremiah spoke as one constrained by the Lord. His counsel was either to surrender or suffer ruin.

4 Jeremiah was officially charged with working against the war effort and with weakening the will of the people to resist the invaders. Since he was speaking during the final months of the siege, no wonder his message was judged dangerous. By weakening the morale of the soldiers with whom he was in contact in the guardroom, he infuriated his enemies. There was probably truth in the statement of Jeremiah's opposition (cf. v.19) because some would have believed his words. The officials on whom the burden of the defense of the city rested saw him only as a traitor and called for his death. Judah's leaders never saw that the Exile was God's way of using the Babylonians to purge the nation of idolatry.

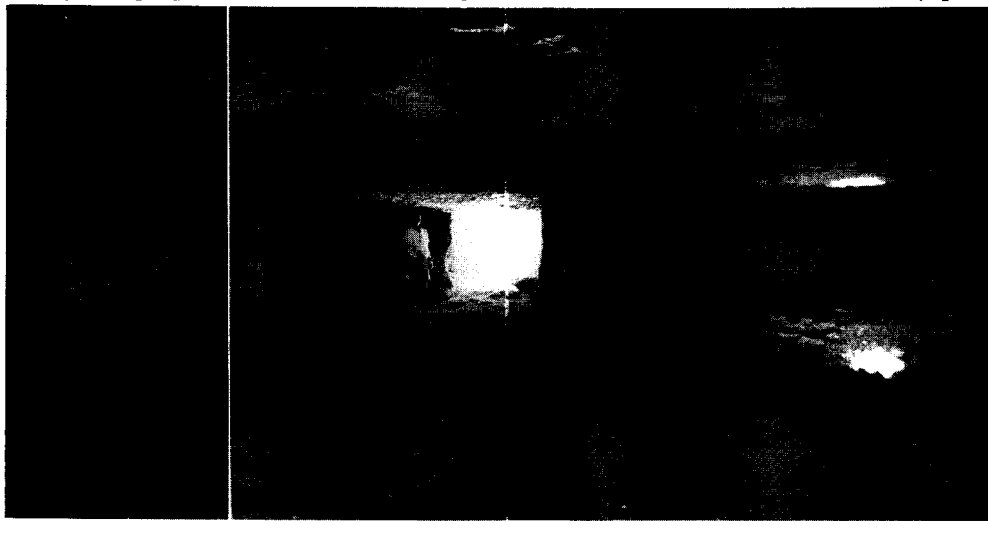
b. Jeremiah in the cistern (38:5–6)

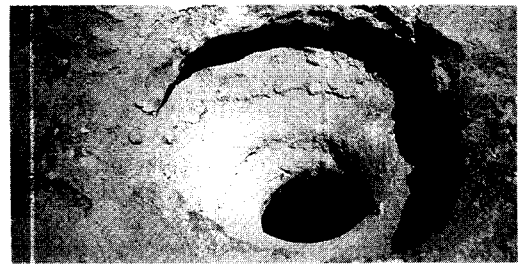
5–6 Zedekiah was too weak to withstand his officials. His capitulation to them was a clear giveaway of his lack of moral fiber. While he did not actually sign Jeremiah's death warrant, neither did he do anything to prevent it. The intention of Jeremiah's enemies was plain enough: they wanted to silence him for good. To throw Jeremiah into the miry cistern would have surely resulted in his death had he not been rescued. This was his third and harshest imprisonment. The cistern was deep, because ropes were used to lower Jeremiah into it. By this punishment his enemies tried to salve their consciences from the burden of having actually slain him. Restrained by the Lord, they stopped just short of executing his prophet. "Malkijah, the king's son" was not one of Zedekiah's sons but a royal prince (cf.36:26).

c. The rescue of Jeremiah (38:7–13)

7–9 As "a eunuch," Ebed-Melech was excluded by divine law from the congregation of God's people (cf. Dt 23:1). In ancient courts eunuchs were employed as keepers of the royal harem. Thus they had private access to the king (cf. 2Ki 24:15). It must, however, be recognized that "eunuch" did not always mean a castrated person but had a broader meaning, such as "officer" or "court official." The times were surely out of joint. Only a foreigner cared enough about Jeremiah to rescue him. Evidently Zedekiah did not know how his officials had used his capitulation to them, and he was too cowardly to ask them about it. But one official, Ebed-Melech, took pity on Jeremiah and told the king of his plight. It took courage for him to oppose the prophet's enemies. Ebed-Melech did not mince matters in speaking to Zedekiah but told him that Jeremiah was in deadly peril.



These two photos show a huge cistern at Avdat. The picture on the right shows the small opening that leads into the cistern; through it water could be removed. The picture above shows the enormous cavern that was used to store water. The opening into the cistern is the ray of light on the right side of the picture. The square light at the end of the cistern is not original; that is, the cistern was sealed watertight. One can imagine Jeremiah's being confined in some such cistern.



He boldly accused the officials and pled with the king for the prophet's life. Under the famine condition of the siege, it was unlikely that Jeremiah would get food.

10 Zedekiah was concerned and provided a rescue team of thirty men. Thirty men would not have been needed to lift Jeremiah from the cistern, but they would have been a sufficient guard to discourage the officials from intervening.

11–13 Godly Ebed-Melech knew where to get the needed manpower. He knew what the wardrobe storeroom contained, and he understood how weak Jeremiah was. There is a fine touch of compassion in v.12. So Jeremiah was transferred to the guardroom. His fourth imprisonment, this was a lifesaving move from the noxious cistern.

6. Counsel to the king (38:14–28)

a. Zedekiah's secret interview with Jeremiah (38:14–23)

14–16 This was Zedekiah's last meeting with Jeremiah. The king realized that only through Jeremiah could he get the truth. Again he questioned (cf. 37:17) the prophet and received essentially the same answer. The king still hoped for a change in the Lord's message, but it remained the same. The meeting took place privately, probably in a room connecting the palace to the temple. Apparently Jeremiah believed that Zedekiah had approved the brutal treatment he had received. He was no longer eager to warn a king who would neither protect him nor believe his message—a king who could never be trusted to keep his word. Jeremiah was under no illusions as to how his message would be received. In a highly secret oath, the king promised Jeremiah that no harm would come to him for disclosing the Lord's message.

17–19 The alternatives for Zedekiah were still the same: surrender and live or resist and suffer the worst. Though Nebuchadnezzar himself was not at the siege, he had his headquarters at Riblah (cf. 39:5; 2Ki 25:6). Zedekiah was afraid of both the officials in Judah and the Jews who had defected to Babylon (cf. 39:9; 52:15)—a fear that affected his political decisions and showed his weakness of character and lack of faith. He was afraid the Babylonians would turn him over for torture to the Jewish defectors. They had always advised submission to Babylon and would have dealt harshly with him for not doing as they had done—a course of action that might have spared Jerusalem the agony of a long siege.

20–23 As for Zedekiah's refusal to obey God, the Lord showed Jeremiah in the vision of the two baskets of figs some of its consequences (24:1–10). The Babylonians usually treated rebel kings ruthlessly and often mutilated them and put them to death. So certain was the coming doom that Jeremiah even predicted what the women of the royal harem would say on being taken into captivity. More cutting than the ridicule of the defectors would be their ridicule on him for his gullibility in trusting faithless allies. Desiring to gain favor with their Babylonian masters, the women would point out that Zedekiah's friends had impelled him to a suicidal opposition. In his hour of deepest distress, Zedekiah's so-called friends would leave him in the lurch. Out of his own experience, Jeremiah could understand all this. But the Lord would not protect Zedekiah as he had protected the prophet. What had happened to Jeremiah physically (cf. v.6) would be the lot of the king politically and spiritually. So the blame rested where it belonged—on the shoulders of Zedekiah, who would bring indignity and defeat on himself, ruin to the nation and its capital, and lasting shame on his own family.

b. The officials' inquiry (38:24–28)

24–26 Again Zedekiah did not heed the Lord's advice that came to him through Jeremiah. Until the last moment the king remained weak and afraid. He was fearful that if news of his secret talk with Jeremiah leaked out, it would be seriously misunderstood by the officials. So he warned the prophet that the officials might kill him. This precaution was needed (v.27). Just as suspicious of the king as he was of them, the officials had been spying on him. So Zedekiah told the prophet to reveal only his plea not to be sent back to Jonathan's house (cf. 37:15, 20).

27 Jeremiah's compliance with the king's request has been severely criticized on ethical grounds. Jeremiah's answer has been called a "half-truth" or "a white lie" for the king's sake. But we must be extremely reluctant to fault a true prophet of God like Jeremiah—a man of courage, brotherly love, patriotism, tremendous spiritua stature, and unparalleled devotion. In Jeremiah's defense, the following points need to be considered. (1) The precarious position of the king must be taken into account. (2) To allay suspicion was as much in the king's interest as in his own. (3) Jeremiah's answer was not a falsehood because the petition was implied in vv.15–16. (4) At this critical time, the king did not want to occasion a break between himself and his generals. (5) The officials themselves had no authority to question either the king or the prophet. (6) Jeremiah told only what was necessary and no more.

28 This verse shows that the capture of Jerusalem verified Jeremiah's forty years of ministry to the nation of Judah.

7. The Fall of Jerusalem (39:1–18)

Without doubt, the fall of Jerusalem dramatically authenticated Jeremiah's prophecies. This account generally agrees with those in ch. 52 and 2Ki 25.

a. The capture of the city (39:1–3)

1–3 After the long siege, the city walls were finally breached and Jerusalem fell. The dates span the beginning and end of the siege, which lasted about eighteen months. The fall of the city, which had been weakened by the siege without and by famine within (cf. 52:4–16; 2Ki 25:1–12), is described more fully in ch. 52. Jeremiah gives the Babylonian names of the Babylonian high officials (it is unclear how many individuals are actually listed here). Nergal-Sharezer was Nebuchadnezzar's son-in-law, who succeeded him under the name Neriglissar. The "chief officer" was head of the eunuchs who served as chamberlains. "A high official" is literally "chief magi." When these officials sat in the gate of the city, the prediction of 1:15 was fulfilled. The "Middle Gate" was probably between the upper and lower divisions of the city. The purpose of the officials' session at the Middle Gate was either to plan their military strategy or to establish their quarters there.

b. The fate of Zedekiah (39:4–8)

4–5 This passage describes the flight, capture, torture, and imprisonment of Zedekiah. The flight was at night; thus the verb "saw" is to be taken in the sense of hearing or learning that the Babylonians had taken the gate of the citadel of Zion. Zedekiah, realizing the end of Jerusalem had come, still hoped to save his life. He and his company tried to escape by way of the Jordan Valley ("Arabah"). The position of "the two walls" can only be conjectured; there may have been a gate in a double wall between Zion and Ophel. Zedekiah aimed to escape to the eastern side of the Jordan. The "king's garden" was near the Pool of Siloam (cf. Ne 3:15). Zedekiah was captured and taken to Riblah, where Nebuchadnezzar had his headquarters. It was a strategic site, which had been the military headquarters of Pharaoh Neco in his campaign against Assyria (cf. 2Ki 23:33). Riblah, on the Orontes River fifty miles south of Hamath, some sixty-five miles north of Damascus, was a good vantage point for gaining control of both Syria and Palestine.

6–8 At Riblah, Nebuchadnezzar began slaying all the resisters, starting with the king's sons and going on to the nobles of Judah. Only Zedekiah was spared for captivity after he saw with his own eyes the slaughter and then was blinded. "The nobles of Judah" were those who had been so persistently and perniciously opposed to Jeremiah. By modern standards what Nebuchadnezzar did was unusually harsh, but it was in accord with ancient pagan practices and is understandable in view of the trouble that Judah and especially Zedekiah had given Babylon. Thus two prophecies were fulfilled: Zedekiah would see the king of Babylon and be taken there (cf. 32:3–4), and he would die in Babylon without ever seeing it (cf. Eze 12:13). To add to his torture, Zedekiah had to witness the slaughter of his sons and the nobles, so that the last memory of this world's light might remain a grief. Verse 8 adds the finishing touches to the gruesome scene. The fall of Jerusalem was so important that Scripture relates it four times—here, in ch. 52, in 2Ki 25, and in 2Ch 36.

c. The release of Jeremiah (39:9–14)

9–10 After Nebuchadnezzar had dealt with the leadership of Judah, he took the people of Judah into exile in Babylon. This final deportation of the nation (586 B.C.) came some eleven years after that in Jehoiachin's time. Nebuzaradan, "commander of the imperial guard" (lit., "chief of the executioners"), was the man who had this assignment. To make a new beginning and not leave the land utterly desolate, Nebuzaradan placed some of the poorest people in charge of fields and vineyards as their own, though with reclamation rights by the conqueror (cf. 52:16; 2Ki 25:12). The Babylonians doubtless felt that gratitude would prevent the settlers from rebelling.

11–14 More interesting than the land grant to the poor were the instructions of Nebuchadnezzar about Jeremiah. Undoubtedly the Babylonians had favorable information about Jeremiah and probably considered him a sympathizer. Besides, those who had deserted Judah in the siege gave a report of him. Jeremiah's advice about submitting to Babylon even during the siege had been proclaimed over so long a time that it could not have escaped the attention of the Babylonian authorities. They realized that he was no threat to them. Paradoxically, he was treated better by foreign invaders than by his own countrymen whom he so dearly loved. So word was passed along to release Jeremiah from the courtyard of the guard and to entrust him to Gedaliah, the appointed governor, with whom he was to remain. Gedaliah was the son of Ahikam, who had been active in saving Jeremiah's life (cf. 26:24). For three generations his family had been true to the word of the Lord that came through his prophets.

d. The commendation of Ebed-Melech (39:15–18)

15–18 Verses 11–14 show how the Lord preserved his prophet; vv.15–18 show the Lord's concern for Jeremiah's rescuer. The scene goes back to Jeremiah's imprisonment in the cistern (38:1–13). This message must have come to Jeremiah soon after Ebed-Melech had rescued him. It is included here so as not to break into the chain of events (cf. 38:14–39:14). Ebed-Melech needed this message of hope, for he had doubtless incurred the wrath of Jeremiah's enemies for lifting him out of the cistern and so feared reprisals. Ebed-Melech was assured that he would escape death because his compassionate acts were motivated by his trust in the Lord.

III. Ministry of Jeremiah After the Fall of Jerusalem (40:1–45:5)

Chapters 40–44 contain prophecies and a record of events after the fall of Jerusalem. Chapters 40–42 deal with prophecies and events in Judah; chs. 43–44 with those in Egypt.

A. Ministry to the Survivors in Judah (40:1–42:22)

1. Gedaliah the governor (40:1–16)

a. The release of Jeremiah (40:1–6)

1 Since there is no prophetic word till 42:9, "word" is to be taken in the sense of history as well as prophecy. The two are related. Ramah is about five miles north of Jerusalem. This Benjamite town was the place where the captives were questioned before being deported to Babylon. In the confusion when Jerusalem fell, Jeremiah was at first taken and placed in chains—manacles for the hands only (cf. v.4). When Jeremiah arrived at Ramah, he was released at the command of Nebuzaradan, who had evidently been told who Jeremiah was and what Nebuchadnezzar had ordered to be done with him.

2–3 Some doubt whether Nebuzaradan could or would have said the words quoted in vv.2–3. The Assyrians, however, paid attention to the beliefs of the people whom they fought, for use in psychological warfare (cf. 2Ki 18:22, 33–35). The Babylonians may have been aware of certain supernatural reasons for Judah's fall; Jeremiah's reputation as a prophet was evidently known to them. Unquestionably the words sound like those of Jeremiah himself, and this may show that Nebuzaradan had some acquaintance with the prophet's teaching.

4–5 Nebuzaradan first freed Jeremiah from his manacles and then gave him a choice of where he would live. These actions were wholly within his authority as an official representative of Nebuchadnezzar, who was then in Riblah. Jeremiah was given the option of either going to Babylon or remaining in Judah. Nebuzaradan promised to care for him in Babylon: "I will look after you." Recognizing that Jeremiah was not sure about where he would go, Nebuzaradan sent him back to Gedaliah. The book says nothing about any relationship between Jeremiah and Gedaliah, who was made puppet governor of Judea by the Babylonians. It is obvious that Nebuchadnezzar had lost all faith in the house of David. His dealings with the last three kings of Judah were disappointing in the extreme.

6 Nebuzaradan sent Jeremiah off with some food and a gift. The way he treated the prophet stands in striking contrast with what his own countrymen did to him, particularly in the last days of Jerusalem (cf. Mt 13:57). Apparently the Babylonians did not care to have the Jews remaining in Jerusalem, their former capital; so they made Mizpah the administrative center of the remnant in the land. Jeremiah chose to stay in the land he loved. This does not mean that he doubted his own message in 24:4–10. He loved his people in spite of their mistreatment, hatred, and threats on his life. Now he would at least be free of ungodly priests and false prophets. His devotion to the land and his conviction that it would be the scene of future blessing influenced his decision to remain in it at this critical time.

b. Gedaliah's assurances (40:7–10)

7–8 Gedaliah's appointment by Nebuchadnezzar as governor encouraged some of the surviving Jews who had fled to neighboring areas to return to Judah. Just as Nebuchadnezzar had confidence in Gedaliah, so did his countrymen. The land had been deprived of its leaders; so chiefs of guerrilla bands, who remained hidden while the Babylonian army was besieging, waited the turn of events after the fall of the capital. They showed their trust in Gedaliah's ability to govern by joining him at Mizpah. He was a good ruler and was doubtless supported by Jeremiah. Ishmael was a grandson of Elishama, of the house of David (cf. 41:1). Netophah was a place in Judah between Bethlehem and Tekoa, about twelve miles west of Bethlehem.

9–10 Gedaliah tried to quiet the fears of the survivors and advocated submission to the conquering power. He sought to reestablish normal living in the land and promised to represent them before the Babylonians. To some, however, he appeared to be a collaborator with the destroyer of their nation. Since Jerusalem fell in the middle of summer (cf. 39:2), the people had time to gather the late fruits of summer to sustain them during their first bleak winter in the land. Moreover, they would need the harvests to pay tribute to the Babylonians. Everything was being done to hasten the return to normal peaceful conditions. Notice that the invaders had shown great enlightenment in refraining from any defoliation or "scorched-earth" policy. The clause "the towns you have taken over" indicates that the captains of the roaming bands took what towns or cities pleased them.

c. The return of the fugitives (40:11–12)

11–12 With his forthright honesty, Gedaliah inspired confidence; and his orders were obeyed. Many of those returning to Judah had fled from the Babylonians and had taken refuge in a number of neighboring countries. In God's mercy these refugees constituted a remnant. That one of their own nation was made governor gave them confidence; thus they felt that the Babylonians were not wholly without compassion for them in their time of tragic need.

d. The warning of Gedaliah (40:13–16)

13–14 Judah was still in a state of much unrest. Now a plot to assassinate Gedaliah comes to light, instigated by Baalis, king of Ammon, who used as his agent Ishmael son of Nethaniah. The man who told Gedaliah of the plot was the loyal Johanan son of Kareah. Gedaliah had apparently forgotten that Ishmael was of the house of David and thus did not appreciate being passed by in Gedaliah's favor. Or Ishmael may have considered Gedaliah a traitor for agreeing to govern under the Babylonians. Baalis may have felt that eliminating Gedaliah would make it easier to carry out his own plans to conquer Judah. The king of Ammon may have feared that Gedaliah might again make Judah a formidable nation and a potential threat to him. Also, Baalis, an ally of Zedekiah and an enemy of the Babylonians (cf. 27:3), was angry that the family of Ahikam opposed the league referred to in ch. 27.

15–16 A man of ability but lacking in knowledge of people and their devices, Gedaliah was too trusting and naive to believe Johanan's warning. The least he could have done was to have protected himself against the assassination of which he had been warned. What Johanan feared, actually happened (41:1–3); and the remnant was scattered because of Gedaliah's death. Though Johanan tried earnestly to impress Gedaliah that his life was essential for the welfare of the remnant in Judah, he apparently failed to inspire confidence. Moreover, Gedaliah may have been overconfident. At any rate, he was not convinced of Johanan's veracity. Gedaliah was right in forbidding Johanan to assassinate Ishmael but wrong in his estimate of Ishmael.

2. The atrocities of Ishmael and the flight into Egypt (41:1–18)

a. The assassination of Gedaliah (41:1–3)

1 The narrative in ch. 40 goes on without a break in ch. 41. Because v.1 gives only the month and not the year, two dates have been proposed for the assassination of Gedaliah: 586 B.C. and 583–582 B.C. Those who support the first date believe that only three months elapsed from the fall of the city to the events now recorded (cf. 39:2). But others think the text does not require that the events in ch. 41 occurred in the same year as the fall of Jerusalem. On the basis of 52:30, they hold that the reaction of Babylon to the assassination took place after five years, so that 41:1 gives the end of Gedaliah's governorship only. The Jews still keep the Fast of Gedaliah in the seventh month (Sept/Oct), on the third day of the month, the first and second days being the New Year (cf. Zec 7:5; 8:19; see also 2Ki 25:8, 25). Ishmael came from a collateral line of the Davidic family through Elishama, son of David (cf. 2Sa 5:16). Moreover, he was prominent in affairs of state with Zedekiah.

2–3 The "ten men" should not be thought of as being alone, for they may have brought a retinue of attendants with them. Ishmael, being violently anti-Babylonian, may have been motivated by deep resentment at the cruel treatment of Zedekiah (cf. 39:6–7). Ishmael carried out his dastardly plot while enjoying the hospitality of Gedaliah. Pretending friendship for him, he violated the sacred law of Eastern hospitality. In spite of having been warned of an assassination plot, Gedaliah had taken no precautions. Ishmael made no distinction between Jews or Babylonians; he killed all the fighting men, including Gedaliah's Babylonian bodyguard. For eleven men to kill so large a group indicates how unsuspecting the victims were. The reference to "all the Jews" includes only those who were in the house with Gedaliah. The number of Babylonian troops was apparently small.

b. The massacre of the pilgrims (41:4–10)

4–5 For Ishmael human life was so cheap that he had no compunction in slaughtering seventy pilgrims. Such a deed could not be concealed indefinitely. A group of men from the northern kingdom were on the way to Jerusalem to lament its desolation. Josiah had destroyed the altar at Bethel (one of the lasting effects of Josiah's reform), so they were bringing offerings to the Jerusalem temple. They had even gashed themselves—a relapse into heathen custom forbidden in Dt 14:1. In spite of the destruction of the temple itself, they came to the temple site, which was still used for worship by those who survived the fall of the city. Even the ruins were held to be sacred.

Though living among heathen colonists (cf. 2Ki 17:24–41), the men from the northern kingdom had continued to worship the Lord in Jerusalem and to celebrate the feasts (cf. 2Ch 34:9). Their offerings were bloodless sacrifices because no facilities were available for animal sacrifices (cf. Dt 12:13–14, 17–18).

6–8 Ishmael went out to meet the men, weeping hypocritically as though for the loss of the temple. Courteously he invited them to pay their respects to Gedaliah the governor before going on to Jerusalem. So he lured them into Mizpah, where he had them trapped. Just as in the assassination of Gedaliah, Ishmael used the element of surprise. Here it enabled eleven men to slaughter seventy of the eighty pilgrims. The massacre may have been done for plunder and to intimidate the remnant in Judah. Casting them into a cistern was senseless, for it made Mizpah's water supply ceremonially unclean and unfit to drink. Ishmael's greed led him to spare ten of the eighty men because of their cache of food, which was probably concealed in a cistern in a field.

9–10 At this point Jeremiah inserts a historical notation, showing that King Asa of Judah (913–873 B.C.) had ordered this cistern to be made to ensure ample water for Mizpah when he fortified it against King Baasha of Israel (910–887 B.C.; cf. 1Ki 15:22; 2Ch 16:6). Ishmael's next stop was to transport the remnant of the people from Mizpah to Ammon (according to 40:14, Ishmael was in alliance with Baalis the Ammonite king). Ishmael's motive in transporting the remnant may have been threefold: (1) to escape punishment, (2) to find refuge with Baalis, who had instigated the assassination of Gedaliah (40:14), and (3) to sell the remnant as slaves to the Ammonites. The king's daughters, spared through Babylonian clemency, were royal princesses—not necessarily Zedekiah's own daughters, but women related to Ishmael. Included among this remnant were probably Jeremiah and Baruch (cf. 42:2).

c. The escape of Ishmael (41:11–15)

11–15 Johanan, having had prior knowledge of the plot, was quick to follow Ishmael's tracks. Now Johanan acted responsibly, not as he had previously wanted to do (40:15). He and those with him overtook the assassin before he had gone far—Gibeon is about a mile from Mizpah. Gibeon was the city of priests in the tribe of Benjamin (cf. Jos 18:25; 21:17). Possibly "the great pool" is the same as "the pool of Gibeon" (cf. 2Sa 2:13). Ishmael may have taken a circuitous route to confuse his pursuers. When the people saw Johanan and his companions, they rejoiced; for they had followed Ishmael only because they had been compelled to do so. And because of the popularity of Gedaliah, they were glad to see his murder avenged. Ishmael lost only two of his men and drops out of the narrative after fleeing to Ammon.

d. The flight to Egypt (41:16–18)

16–18 Johanan now decided to go as quickly as possible to Egypt. He and the army officers with him feared reprisals when the news of Gedaliah's assassination reached Babylon. Ishmael had completely frustrated any plans for peaceful settlement in the land. Geruth means "lodging place." Kimham was the son of Barzillai, the wealthy Gileadite and faithful partisan of David during the revolt of Absalom (cf. 2Sa 9:38, 41). Johanan, able in military matters (he had given advice to Gedaliah), was wrong in thinking flight to Egypt was the only solution to the problems of the remnant. Actually, it created other problems, and certainly it did not place them beyond the reach of Nebuchadnezzar.

3. Warning against going to Egypt (42:1–22)

Johanan overtook and routed Ishmael and his forces, the residue of which escaped to Ammon. At this point the remnant of people were afraid to remain in Judah, but they were equally afraid to seek safety in a foreign country. Johanan and the remnant were anxious not to make a mistake that would incur the wrath of God, which had already been poured out on Jerusalem and Judah; hence they inquired of Jeremiah. They did not recognize that by deciding to go to Egypt they had already decided on a certain course of action (cf. 41:17).

a. The inquiry of the remnant (42:1–6)

1–3 There was an unusual unity among the remnant, all of whom were without exception concerned about what they should do and where they should go. Jezaniah is the Azariah of 43:2 (cf. NIV note). The remnant came to Jeremiah, who had apparently been a captive of Ishmael. The esteem in which they still held Jeremiah is evident in their recognition of him as a prophet of the Lord. The inquirers hoped that God would answer according to their desires. They earnestly wanted confirmation of their decision, not guidance from the Lord (cf. v.17). According to their thinking, the unrest and absence of security in Judah made resettlement there an impossibility.

4–6 Jeremiah gently reminded the remnant that the Lord was their God as well as his. Since he was no longer restrained from praying for them, he would gladly agree to ask the Lord for guidance. Realizing the gravity of their situation, he promised not to hold back any part of the Lord's answer. At this, the people solemnly pledged to obey everything the Lord would tell Jeremiah; that is, they promised to obey the Lord regardless of the nature of his answer. Later on the record shows that they actually wanted approval to settle in Egypt (cf. 43:2). Even more, their request for the Lord to be "a true and faithful witness against us" implies their acceptance of his punishment for disobeying his express will.

b. The Lord's answer to Jeremiah's question (42:7–17)

7 For ten days Jeremiah awaited the Lord's message. We may imagine the suspense and tension of this time. The prophet wanted to be certain of the Lord's will. Here was a matter on which the entire future of the nation might depend and one that at the least was crucial for the remnant. Perhaps God wanted to give the Jews an opportunity to show the sincerity of their claim that they would obey his leading and to allow time for their anxiety that bordered on panic to be dispelled.

8–12 Once more Jeremiah had to deliver an unpopular message. In strong anthropopathic language the Lord implied that the penalty given Judah would be canceled. In other words, the Lord would change his dealings with the nation. God's dealings with us are according to our obeying or disobeying his will. At this point God promised he would deal with Judah in a different way since the people were now in a different category from before the fall of Jerusalem. During Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Jerusalem, the people had cause to fear him; now there was no occasion for them to do this. In fact, God would see that Nebuchadnezzar would show them compassion, and God would turn to their favor every action of this king.

13–17 In unsparing words, Jeremiah warned of the terrifying consequences if the remnant insisted on leaving the land. Trust in human beings would neither avail them nor bless them. They would find no safety in Egypt. In fact, going there would bring on them the very disasters they were trying to escape. For their part, the people hoped that the farther they were from Babylon, the less they would be in danger of invasion. Although Egypt had lost the Battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.), it had not been the scene of other military actions. Thus the remaining Jews could not fail to be impressed by the contrast between peaceful Egypt and war-torn Judah. Actually, however, Judah's trials were past; Egypt's were soon to begin. Jeremiah was quick to see that his listeners were already determined on a different course of action than the one the Lord had for them. Fleeing to Egypt would bring terrible trials. (Nebuchadnezzar was yet to invade Egypt; cf. 43:8–13)

c. Further penalties for settling in Egypt (42:18–22)

18–22 The survivors of the fall of Jerusalem and Judah would suffer the same fate in Egypt that had overtaken them because of their disobedience. Egypt would be the place of their undoing, without a glimmer of hope of their returning to their native country. In an epilogue after the Lord's reply, Jeremiah adds to the admonition in vv.13–18. The Lord's message remained unchanged—stay in the land and do not settle in Egypt. He rebukes them for asking his will with no intention of following it.

Jeremiah shows the remnant their duplicity in asking for a message from God when they had no intention of following it. All the time they were intent on doing their own will, in the hope that God's will would coincide with theirs. So they were victims of self-deception and self-delusion. How little did they realize that in Egypt the temptation for them to worship idols—the very sin that had led to the nation's fall—would be even stronger than before! Jeremiah also reminds them it was not he that had instituted the inquiry; they themselves were responsible for provoking the Lord's severe answer. The passage closes with the threefold judgment of sword, famine, and plague ringing in their ears. The issue was clear, the warning was faithfully transmitted; but the remnant were set on having their own way.

B. Ministry in Egypt (43:1–44:30)

Chapters 43–44 relate to the remnant in Egypt. Johanan and the people disregarded the Lord's warning and went there, taking Jeremiah and Baruch, probably by force. The prophet doubtless died in Egypt.

1. The flight to Egypt (43:1–13)

a. The warning flouted (43:1–7)

1–3 The response to Jeremiah's message from the Lord was both immediate and negative. In no uncertain terms, Azariah and Johanan and "all the arrogant men" who dominated the frightened remnant accused Jeremiah of lying. To divert attention from breaking their promise to obey the Lord's message, they tried to save face, not only by giving Jeremiah the lie, but also by accusing Baruch of conniving to get Jeremiah to deliver the remnant to the Babylonians. Because Jeremiah was an old man and might conceivably have been under the influence of his secretary and companion, the charge against Baruch had a superficial plausibility. But there was not a scintilla of evidence for it. The prophet who would not trim his message for the king would never have been manipulated by his secretary.

4–6 At the death of Gedaliah, Johanan, who appears in a bad light ever since his determined opposition to Jeremiah, became the rallying center for the people. His action cannot be divorced from an element of self-promotion. The remnant was made up of the many Jews who had fled to nearby countries after the fall of Jerusalem. Unfortunately they all agreed to follow Johanan and their other leaders instead of the Lord. Such is the perversity of fallen human nature; when people reach unanimity, too often they rebel against God's will. Jeremiah and Baruch were doubtless taken to Egypt against their will; for them to have gone there voluntarily would have violated Jeremiah's prophecies (cf. 32:6–15; 40:1–6; 42:13–18).

7 This verse shows the full extent of the people's disobedience. They arrived in Egypt at Tahpanhes, a fortress city on the northern border of Lower Egypt guarding the road to Syria. Pharaoh had a palace here. Located on the Pelusian branch of the Nile, Tahpanhes was known to the Greeks as Daphne (cf. 2:16). Think of it! Abraham's descendants returned to Egypt long after their liberation from it. With great suffering they had been delivered from their bondage in Egypt, only to return there a defeated and hopeless remnant nearly nine hundred years later.

b. Jeremiah's prophecy in Egypt (43:8–13)

The fugitives probably stopped at Tahpanhes to obtain permission from Pharaoh to enter the country and to assure themselves of some means of livelihood during their stay in it. We are not told how Jeremiah and Baruch fared in Egypt. Jeremiah's first message to the remnant in Egypt foretold the certainty of Nebuchadnezzar's victory over Egypt; thus the flight of the remnant was useless. Because of the tenor of his message, Jeremiah's stay in Egypt was not a happy one; when his political position became known, the government could hardly have favored him. There is no evidence of Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of Egypt, though there is evidence that he invaded it.

8–9 In Tahpanhes the Lord told Jeremiah to act out a message for the people. He was to hide some large stones in the mortar of the brick pavement at the entrance to Pharaoh's house. This was the place where Nebuchadnezzar would set up his throne on his invasion that would bring death and destruction to Egypt.

10–11 The Jews' flight to Egypt to escape the Babylonians was futile because the Lord was going to send Nebuchadnezzar to invade it (ch. 44). The royal "canopy" has been understood as a covering over the throne or perhaps as a gorgeous carpet on which the throne stood. A fragmentary text in the British museum indicates that Nebuchadnezzar's invasion of Egypt occurred in the thirty-seventh year of his reign (568–567 B.C.). It was a punitive expedition; after it Babylonia and Egypt had amicable relations. The Lord calls Nebuchadnezzar "my servant" (cf. 27:6)—the executor of death, captivity, and destruction for Egypt.

12–13 These verses show the Lord's unalterable opposition to the idolatry of Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar would burn the wooden images and the temples with them and carry off the idols of gold to Babylon. In ancient times idols of defeated foes were carried in the triumphal processions of conquering kings. Not only would the temples be destroyed, but the sacred pillars—i.e., the obelisks, monuments of Egypt's idolatrous pride (cf. Dt 16:21–22; 2Ki 23:14)—would be broken. Jeremiah likens the ease with which Nebuchadnezzar would do these things to the casual way in which a shepherd wraps himself in his garment. In fact, the conqueror would return unscathed from Egypt. The sacred pillars were the finest representations of Egyptian idolatry. The king of Egypt at this time was Pharaoh Hophra (cf. 44:30).

"The temple of the sun" (Heliopolis; modern Tell Husn) was about six miles northeast of Cairo. The sun god was elaborately worshiped there in antiquity. The reference to "Egypt" distinguishes the Egyptian city from the Palestinian one with the same name ("Beth Shemesh"; cf. 2Ki 14:11). But the prophet has not spoken his last word on Egypt; more follows in chs. 44 and 46.

2. Condemnation of Ishtar worship (44:1–30)

This chapter contains Jeremiah's last message. It has been dated 580 B.C. because the dispersion implied in v.1 would have taken some years. The message reviews the Lord's dealings with Judah and emphatically reminds the Jews in Egypt that their sins have brought on them the wrath of God that had been foretold by Jeremiah.

a. Exhortation to heed past experience (44:1–10)

1–6 This section rebukes the Jews dispersed in Egypt. It is surprising that the Jews were practicing idolatry in Egypt; they had not yet learned from their past sins. Jeremiah mentions four places, three in Lower (northern) Egypt—Migdol, Tahpanhes, and Memphis—and one in Upper (southern) Egypt. The mention of these places shows how rapidly the Jews had spread out in Egypt. The reason for Jeremiah's prophecy was the continued idolatry of the exiles in spite of their captivity. If ever a prophecy had immediacy, it was this one; for in it Jeremiah brought the light of history to bear on the very day in which he spoke.

7–10 Moving to the current hour, Jeremiah remonstrated with the people regarding the sins in which they were still steeped. Once more the nation was committing national suicide. All his warnings previously made no difference in their thinking or in their acts. The Jews in Egypt had become ensnared in the idolatry of that land—a sin that the Lord had foreseen and that was one of the reasons God had forbidden them to go there. This must have been disheartening for Jeremiah, who had spent a lifetime preaching against idolatry in Judah; the Jews were practicing in Egypt the very sins that had brought about the fall of Jerusalem. The remnant showed they were neither repentant nor contrite.

b. Warning of punishment (44:11–14)

11–14 Now judgment is announced. It is the same for the Jews in Egypt as it had been for those in Judah. The reference to "all Judah" covers all the Jews there in Egypt—with the exception of permanent Jewish settlers there and the few mentioned in vv.14b, 28. First of all, Jeremiah roundly rebukes them for coming to Egypt. Then he dramatically specifies the troubles the remnant can expect in Egypt. He makes it clear that he is not referring to any permanent Jewish settlers in Egypt (cf. v.14) but only to those who had sought refuge there in the hope of returning to the land of Judah at the earliest opportunity. Only casual fugitives will survive.

c. The stubborn persistence in idolatry (44:15–19)

15–19 This passage is one of the strangest in the book. How stubborn the resistance to Jeremiah's message was! The people openly and unashamedly refused to forsake their idolatry; indeed, they found pragmatic justification for it. They brazenly declared that they would keep on in their idolatry. The occasion here may have been an idolatrous feast in which the women had a major part, probably because Astarte, "the Queen of Heaven" (vv.17, 18, 19, 25), was the goddess of fertility.

The remnant—women as well as men—admitted that they were not engaging in any new worship. They affirmed a causal relationship between their idolatry and the abundance of food. They also affirmed that when they stopped their idolatrous practices, food shortages and war were the result. They doubtless ascribed their troubles to the reforms of Josiah, to which they senselessly attributed the downfall of Judah. In short, the remnant claimed that idolatry had done more for them than the Lord whom Jeremiah represented. Nothing is more blinding than unbelief. Not once did they connect their trials with their sins.

Finally, in an insolent rhetorical question that implied an affirmative reply, the women acknowledged to Jeremiah that they had carried on their worship of the Queen of Heaven with the full knowledge and approval of their husbands (cf. Nu 30:3, 6–7, 12). Why then should Jeremiah complain about their actions? The "cakes" had an image of Astarte on them, said to be the image of the full moon.

d. Condemnation of the remnant's stubbornness (44:20–30)

20–22 Verses 20–30 constitute the very last message of Jeremiah recorded in the book (the remaining chapters contain prophecies dating from earlier years). The message abounds in contrast and confrontation. Jeremiah flatly denies the women's twisted defense of their idolatry. How obtuse they were not to realize that all the while they were engaged in their detestable practices, God knew all about what they were doing! The plain fact was that God, now as before, could no longer abide their idolatries. This statement stands in marked contrast to their claim that prosperity attended them as long as they were idolatrous.

23–25 Since the people were going ahead with their idolatrous worship, Jeremiah announces their punishment. It was tragic that corrupt rulers had so influenced the nation's women. In a powerful expression of irony and revulsion, Jeremiah tells the remnant to proceed with fulfilling their godless vows. He may have been pointing to their incense and libations and to the very cakes they were carrying.

26–28 The severe prediction could be taken to mean that God was saying that he would no longer be their covenant God; thus they would forfeit the privilege of calling on his name. Or perhaps v.26 means that the remnant would not be able to name God's name because they would perish in Egypt. The death penalty is perhaps best understood with the qualification that "the remnant" (cf. v.14) are excluded from this threat. Only they will survive to know the truth of Jeremiah's prophecy; they will be easily numbered because they are so few. The outcome of events will demonstrate whose word stands; God is always willing to have his word tested alongside human words.

29–30 The last verses of the chapter give the sign of the truth of God's words—the fall of Pharaoh Hophra (588–568 B.C.), the ally of Zedekiah, who had sent an army to help him when Jerusalem was besieged (cf. 37:5). Even this Pharaoh whose protection the Jews had sought would succumb to his enemies. The text does not compel the interpretation that Pharaoh Hophra was killed in the invasion of Egypt by Babylon. The facts are otherwise. Hophra was overthrown by Amasis, one of his officers, who revolted against him and then shared rule with him. Amasis rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar in 570 B.C. and was defeated in 568 B.C. So sixteen years after the fall of Jerusalem, Hophra was dethroned and strangled by some of his subjects. Again Jeremiah was vindicated.

Scripture is silent on what happened to Jeremiah after the events of this chapter, though tradition has been overly active. There are many legends concerning his death. One states that he was killed at Tahpanhes. Another claims he carried away the tabernacle, hiding it in the mountain where Moses died (2Mc 2:4–8). Yet another indicates he was alive with Enoch and Elijah, expected to return as a forerunner of the Messiah.

C. The Message to Baruch (45:1–5)

This brief chapter contains the message the Lord gave to Baruch. Historically it supplements 36:1–8 and can be precisely dated at 604 B.C. (cf. 36:1). This antedates sections about the remnant and Egypt. The message was meant to encourage Baruch, who had become disheartened, just as Jeremiah had been. Jeremiah may have had other secretaries, but Baruch is the only one mentioned in the book.

1. Baruch's complaint (45:1–3)

1–3 Baruch came from an influential family of noble birth. He was the grandson of Mahseiah (cf. 32:12), governor of Jerusalem in Josiah's reign (cf. 2Ch 34:8). His brother had been chief chamberlain in the court of Zedekiah (cf. 51:59). He may have had hopes of attaining a high office or even of receiving the gift of prophecy. But such expectations were not to be realized. Rather, he was to spend his life in a secondary role. So he may have been depressed. "The words" refer to the scroll (ch. 36; cf. "the fourth year of Jehoiakim"). Baruch shared Jeremiah's burdens. He grieved over what he had to record about the people's sin and their coming punishment. His sorrow, pain, and groaning wore him out, and his emotional involvement in what he wrote gave him no rest.

2. The response of the Lord (45:4–5)

4–5 These verses imply that the Lord's concern for his people is greater than any human being's. The destruction of Judah is in view in v.4. On the other hand, it has been proposed that "throughout the land" actually refers to the whole earth (cf. "on all people" in v.5). The reply to Baruch's complaint was simple: Do not expect to be more than you are. Why should Baruch be so concerned about his own welfare and position? He should not be self-seeking. When the nation was suffering drastic judgment, instead of making demands, he should be satisfied that his life was spared. With this he must be content. The last clause of v.5 implies that Baruch would have to flee for his life. Short though the chapter is, it has a timeless message for the Lord's servant.

IV. Prophecies Concerning the Nations (46:1–51:64)

Except for ch. 52, the remainder of Jeremiah is made up of prophecies against foreign nations. The prophecies against Egypt (ch. 46) and Babylon (chs. 50–51) contain promises of Israel's restoration (cf. 46:27–28; 50:19–20). Some messages were sent to Babylon; others were delivered in Egypt. The battle between Egypt and Babylon at Carchemish forms the background for 46:2–6.

Jeremiah was a man of world vision. He was a contemporary of five kings of Judah, of the greatest monarch of the neo–Chaldean empire, and of four kings of Egypt: Psammetik I (664–609 B.C.), Neco II (609–594 B.C.), Psammetik II (594–588 B.C.), and Hophra (588–568 B.C.). The prophecies concern ten nations: Egypt, Philistia, Moab, Ammon, Edom, Syria (Damascus), Kedar, Hazor, Elam, and Babylon. They were doubtless given to Jeremiah at different times, though collected here under a common theme: judgment. The prophecies move from west to east. Unlike the judgments pronounced against foreign nations by other OT prophets, the nations' sins are not identified.

At this point it is important to consider certain basic principles that underlie all biblical prophecies that threaten world powers. (1) God is the God of all the nations. As the Sovereign over everything, he has the authority to speak to all peoples. (2) God is first and foremost the God of holiness and righteousness (cf. Isa 6:3). (3) God's judgments are never vindictive (revengeful) but vindicative (justifying). (4) Judgment is God's strange work (cf. Isa 28:21; Eze 33:11). He does not delight in it; he rejoices in salvation (cf. Mt 1:21). (5) God is impartial. He judges among the nations just as he judges Israel's sin.

Caption for the Prophecies Against the Nations (46:1)

1 This verse serves as the introduction and title for all the chapters that follow, except ch. 52.

A. Concerning Egypt (46:2–28)

1. The defeat of the Egyptian army (46:2–6)

2 This chapter gives a prophecy against Egypt. The Pharaoh Neco referred to is the one who slew Josiah at Megiddo (609 B.C.) and placed Jehoahaz on the Judean throne. In three months he removed him, imprisoned him at Riblah, and set up Jehoiakim as king. In Jehoiakim's fourth year (605 B.C.), Neco was defeated at Carchemish. Carchemish is north of the junction of the Chebar and Euphrates rivers. The name "Carchemish" means "the fort of Chemosh," god of the Moabites (cf. 2Ki 23:13). The only great city in that region, it was the key to Syria on the east and commanded the passage of the Euphrates. It had been under the rule of the Hittites and Assyrians.

After the fall of the Assyrian Empire, at the Battle of Carchemish, the military ambitions of Egypt were blocked by the Babylonians. Thus it was one of the decisive battles in history. It proved that Assyrian power could not restrain the rising might of Babylon, which Egypt opposed in favor of Assyria. Nebuchadnezzar pursued Neco toward Egypt but was halted by the news of the death of his father, Nabopolassar. On returning to Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar was crowned king. Babylon now dominated Mesopotamia and the near eastern Mediterranean area. The times of the Gentiles had begun (cf. Lk 21:24; also Da 2:36–38). The fourth year of Jehoiakim was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar (see comment on 25:1).

3–6 In words tinged with sarcasm, Jeremiah vividly describes the preparation of the Egyptians for the battle, their march to it, and their defeat. The "shields, both large and small" were the large shield protecting the whole body of the heavily armed soldier and the small round buckler protecting the lightly armed soldier. Horses were always an important element of Egyptian warfare. Their helmets on, the Egyptians are told to put themselves in battle formation. Coats of mail ("armor") were worn by light troops. An army as well accoutered as the one described here would naturally be victorious. But events took an unexpected turn. Panic supernaturally induced brought defeat to such a force. The Egyptians were conquered and destined not to return home but to fall on foreign soil. History has fully confirmed Jeremiah's predictions: Egypt's advance was halted at the Euphrates.

2. The humbling of Egypt's pride (46:7–12)

7–9 Now the name of the nation whose army has been defeated is mentioned. The approach of the Egyptian army is compared to the annual flooding of the Nile. The rivers referred to are the branches of the Nile in the Delta region in Lower Egypt. Egypt's boast of world conquest and her defeat (vv.5–6) are described, and both descriptions lead to a climax. Her chariots and infantry are summoned to sally forth, implying that with them will be the mercenary troops which, from the time of Psammetik, formed the main part of the Egyptian forces. Cush and Put are Ethiopia and Libya (or Somaliland—both descended from Ham; cf. Ge 10:6; Eze 30:5). The Lydians (cf. Ludites, Ge 10:13) were not from the coast of Asia Minor but an African people living west of Egypt. They were the lightly armed part of the army.

10 There is more to military campaigns than international conflicts. Verse 10 presents the theological interpretation of the defeat of the Egyptians. Jeremiah does not speak of the Day of the Lord but of a day that is peculiarly God's—in short, the time of God's judgment on a nation.

11–12 Jeremiah advises Egypt to seek a remedy for her wounds. Her defeat dealt her an irrecoverable blow; she could not heal herself. From antiquity Egypt was famous for her medical arts. It was from Egypt and India that the knowledge of medicine came to Europe. The defeat will be publicized among the nations. In their rout, the warriors will get in each other's way.

3. The coming of Nebuchadnezzar (46:13–19)

13–14 Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of Egypt left it vulnerable to future attack. Not only at Carchemish but in Egypt itself the victory would be Babylon's (cf. 43:8–13). Nebuchadnezzar's invasion of Egypt came long after the Battle of Carchemish, which had prepared the way for it. Verse 14 announces that the foe has already reached the Egyptian borders. The surrounding nations had been subdued, perhaps even Tyre, so Nebuchadnezzar moved on Egypt. The news of the death of his father prevented Nebuchadnezzar from moving deeper into Egypt. He had to return to Babylon to take up his duties as king.

15–17 In v.16 the speech of the soldiers is overheard, as mercenary troops decide to return to their own countries. They call Pharaoh "a noise" (i.e., a braggart), blaming him for ruining his chances of victory by his procrastination—probably an allusion to his inaction when Nebuchadnezzar returned to Babylon after Carchemish.

18–19 Nebuchadnezzar's return to Egypt is likened to the majesty of Tabor and Carmel, mountains in northern Palestine on the road to Egypt. The Babylonian invasion of Egypt will be as outstanding as is Tabor among the mountains and as irresistible as impregnable Carmel. The defeated Egyptians are exhorted to provide themselves with what they will need for exile.

4. The fall of Egypt (46:20–26)

20–24 Jeremiah describes Egypt's doom in highly figurative language. The "beautiful heifer" is Egypt; the "gadfly" from the north is Nebuchadnezzar. Egypt's mercenaries are like calves fattened for slaughter. The fleeing Egyptians will sound like a serpent escaping from woodsmen by slithering through underbrush. The Babylonians carried axes—a novelty to the Jews. The serpent figure is an ironic reference to one of the most noted of Egyptian deities, prominent even in royal insignia—the coiled uraeus. The devastating power of the enemy is likened to a locust plague (cf. Joel 1:1–2:27). To Jeremiah, Egypt will be at the mercy of the Babylonians.

25–26 Jeremiah now predicts judgment on the gods and kings of Egypt. Amon (Amun) was the chief god of No (Thebes), the capital of Upper Egypt. The judgment will overtake all the people of Israel who looked to the pharaoh for help against Babylon. Yet the desolation of Egypt will not be perpetual; the Lord promises her future restoration (cf. Isa 19:24–25; Eze 29:8–14).

5. Blessing on Jacob (46:27–28)

27–28 In striking contrast with the vivid portrayal of Egypt's fall and destruction is the salvation here promised to the people of Israel in words that will encourage them in captivity (cf. 30:10–11). Looking, as they do, beyond the captivity, vv.27–28 are indeed consoling. If Egypt's woes are but temporary, those of Israel are even more so.

B. Concerning Philistia (47:1–7)

The Philistines settled in the coastal region known as the Philistine plain. Their pentapolis consisted of Ekron, Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, and Gath. The Philistines were greatly reduced in power by the campaigns of David against them, but during the divided kingdom they asserted their independence of Judah. Military actions against them from the Assyrian Age down through the time of Alexander the Great weakened them; finally they were conquered by the Maccabees (second century B.C.) and merged into Israel.

1 The somewhat indefinite historical reference makes it difficult to date this prophecy. One view identifies the Pharaoh as Neco, who conquered Gaza about the time he defeated Josiah at Megiddo (cf. 2Ki 23:29–30); another view sees the Pharaoh as Neco capturing Gaza on his return from his defeat at Carchemish; still another identifies the Pharaoh as Hophra, who took Gaza in his campaign against Tyre and Sidon.

2–3 Jeremiah uses a flood to describe the Babylonian threat to Philistia, Tyre, and Sidon. The word "waters" is an OT figure for an army (46:8; cf. Isa 8:7). The distress from the invading Babylonians will be so great that fathers will leave their children defenseless; limpness of hands indicates the paralyzing effect of fear. "The day" is not the Day of the Lord. In her distress, Philistia will find no help in her former allies, Tyre and Sidon. These two cities were flourishing commercial centers on the coast of what is now Lebanon. Jeremiah sees Philistia as the remnant of the ancient Aegean civilization headed by Caphtor (Crete; cf. Am 9:7). Crete was probably the original home of the Philistines before their entrance to Palestine (cf. Dt 2:23).

5–7 Shaving the head is a sign of deep mourning (cf. 16:6; 41:5; 48:37). To cut oneself was forbidden to the Jews (Dt 14:1). The "remnant on the plain" is difficult to explain. It is in apposition with Ashkelon (the RSV follows the reading of the LXX, translating "plain" as "Anakim," i.e., a tall nation). Connected with the Philistines (cf. Jos 11:22), the Anakim lived near Hebron in prehistoric times. The "cry" is that of the Philistines—their appeal is for the divine judgments to cease. That "the sword of the LORD" must first accomplish its judgment on the seacoast, the Philistine plain, is Jeremiah's answer.

C. Concerning Moab (48:1–47)

The Moabites were descendants of Lot (cf. Ge 19:37). They lived east of the Dead Sea and were often in conflict with Israel. Moab joined in the marauding bands Nebuchadnezzar sent against Judah in 602 B.C., after Jehoiakim's revolt (cf. 2Ki 24:2; Jer 12:7–13). They joined in a plot to revolt against Babylon early in Zedekiah's reign (cf. 27:1–11). The Moabites were conquered by Nebuchadnezzar and disappeared as a nation.

There is no way to determine with certainty the date of the prophecy in this chapter. Its historical setting may be the Moabite invasion into Judah during Jehoiakim's reign. This prophecy against Moab is longer than any other prophecy in chs. 46–49. It is the most thorough of all the OT prophecies about Moab.

1. Desolation of the Moabite cities (48:1–10)

1–2 More than a score of cities are mentioned in this chapter. "Nebo" is not the mountain (cf. Dt 32:49) but the city of Reuben (cf. Nu 32:38). According to the Moabite Stone, it was taken by King Mesha of Moab (c. 895 B.C.). Kiriathaim is ten miles west of Medeba. The towns of Moab will be plundered. Moab will have no more basis for boasting. Originally Moab extended from Heshbon to Bozrah. At Heshbon the Babylonians planned their attack on Moab. Once the capital of the Amorite kingdom of Sihon (cf. Nu 21:26; Dt 2:24), this city was given to Reuben (cf. Jos 13:17), then passed to the Gadites, becoming a Levitical city (cf. Jos 21:39). It was ten miles east of Jordan, opposite Jericho, almost midway between the Arnon and the Jabbok rivers. Its enemies decided on conquest and destruction.

3–6 Only destruction is decreed for Horonaim (the name is evidently used for the two Beth-horons; cf. 2Sa 13:34). The "little ones" may mean the "abject ones," made so by distress. Whether ascending or descending, the fugitives will go weeping as they flee from the enemy. Their condition is likened to a desert bush (juniper)—a picture of destruction and forsakenness.

7 Pride was the root of Moab's trouble. Her idolatry was centered in the worship of Chemosh, a name occurring several times on the Moabite Stone. Chemosh was the national deity of Moab (cf. Nu 21:29; 1Ki 11:7, 33). The reference to trust in "deeds and riches" implies that the reason for Moab's fall was her materialism When Chemosh went into exile, his followers accompanied him. Idols were usually taken captive with their worshipers (43:12; Isa 46:1–2).

8–10 The "valley" is the Jordan Valley, which touched Moab on the west. All the Moabite cities will be involved in the doom. The "plateau" is the extensive region where most of the Moabite cities were located. With the towns doomed for destruction, flight would be the only hope for Moab; but she would need wings (v.9; see NIV note) to escape the sudden onslaught of the enemy. Since the Lord has commissioned Moab's enemies to punish her, they must be diligent in performing their duty.

2. The proud complacency of Moab (48:11–19)

11–13 Moab had enjoyed a more settled life than Judah, but now she will know upheaval and disturbances. The Moabites had been made tributary but not exiled. Now their rest will be changed to unrest. Moab had experienced a certain insulation from judgment, for she had not undergone frequent invasions and deportations. As in the figure of "wine," her flavor had continued unchanged. But no longer will Moab rest quietly. Unlike an earthenware jar that is carefully tilted so as not to lose the sediment of the wine, Moab will be roughly dealt with ("pour her out") and emptied like jars and smashed like jugs. Moab's hope will be unrealized; Chemosh will be powerless to aid her. Jeremiah compares Moab's hope to the useless confidence that the northern kingdom had in the Bethel sanctuary, where the bull was worshiped (cf. 1Ki 12:26–33). In the hour of trial, the bull did not protect the Israelites from Shalmaneser and deportation. Whether in Moab or Israel, God is interested only in genuine faith in him.

14–17 Moreover, Moab will no longer boast of her valor. When the enemy forces march on her cities, slaughter will abound. "The LORD Almighty" vouches for the prediction; in spite of what the Moabites think, the Lord is still their Lord also, not Chemosh. And the hour of reckoning is not far off. The blow will be so great that the neighboring lands will sympathize with the Moabites and mourn with them. The emblems of their rule and authority, "the scepter" and "the glorious staff," will be broken, showing that their power and national glory will pass.

18–19 Dibon stood on two hills, thirteen miles east of the Dead Sea near the Arnon River. Her people are commanded to come down and sit on the ground. The Moabite Stone was found here in 1868. Her residents are about to be deported, but in their hunger and thirst they must await the pleasure of the enemy. Aroer is the southernmost city of Reuben on the northern side of the Arnon River.

3. The downfall of Moab (48:20–28)

20–28 If anyone in Aroer should ask why the fugitives were streaming from Moab, the answer would be that the land of Moab was devastated. So Jeremiah issues the call to proclaim by the River Arnon the destruction of Moab. The Arnon is the perennial stream that flows into the Dead Sea. Thus the news that the Babylonians have utterly destroyed Moab will reach its very border. The towns involved in the destruction are named to show its extent. In Joshua's time they were in the portion allotted to the Reubenites and later reconquered by the Moabites. These towns are listed from north to south (most of the places are unknown). The "horn" (i.e., an animal horn) and the "arm" (i.e., a human one) are metaphors of strength and military power, which Moab will lose. The main reason for her fall was the sin of pride. Judgment will come on the Moabites because of their derisive, arrogant treatment of the Lord's people. Drunkenness from the wrath of God is the same metaphor that appears in 25:27–29. The Moabites are exhorted to leave their settlements and live precariously.

4. The pride of Moab (48:29–39)

29–35 Jeremiah has already referred to Moab's pride (cf. vv.7, 11), but not in the strong terms of v.29. Those who have heard of the sin are Jeremiah and his countrymen (cf. Isa 16:6). With pride always go boastings, but they are futile. Because of the impending judgment, the Lord expresses his compassion and sorrow for his creatures, the Moabites. "Kir Hareseth" was the chief fortified city of Moab (cf. Isa 16:7, 11). Moab's ruin is likened to that of a vineyard because Moab was noted for its vineyards. The joy usually accompanying the vintage will be replaced by lamentations. The bitter cry of mourning will be carried from one place to another so as to cover the whole land. Furthermore, God will cut off all the idolatrous worship of the Moabites.

36–39 Jeremiah will lament for Moab the way her people do. Flutes were used at funerals; so they denote mourning. The usual signs of mourning—shaved heads and beards, lacerated hands, and sackcloth—will be visible. Moab is no longer a useful vessel but a shattered one. She will be a sad spectacle to all: mourning, shame, ridicule, and terror will mark her.

5. The terror caused by the invader (48:40–47)

40–47 Finally, Jeremiah proclaims that God's judgment still hangs over Moab. He likens the swiftness of the enemy's approach to the flight of an eagle (vulture)—a reference to Nebuchadnezzar (cf. 49:22; Eze 17:3). The strongest cities in Moab will be utterly helpless, because of Moab's defiant pride toward God. There will be no escape from the calamity; it is everywhere (cf. Am 5:19). Even fleeing for refuge to Heshbon will not avert the destruction. Balaam's prediction will be fulfilled (cf. Nu 21:28; 24:17). Historically, the name Moab appears to have been submerged after her exile by that of the Arabians. But God's pity knows no end. Wrath is always his strange work in which he does not delight. The Moabites will not utterly perish (cf. 46:26; 49:6, 39); they too will have a remnant. So the restoration of Moab is predicted, though without details. "Days to come" refers here to messianic times.

D. Concerning Ammon (49:1–6)

Chapter 49 deals with prophecies against five (or six) nations. All had incurred God's wrath for their idolatry and their treatment of Israel.

The Ammonites were descended from Ben-Ammi, son of Lot (cf. Ge 19:38). Their territory was north of Moab. A more migratory people than the Moabites, it seems that the Ammonites originally occupied the land in which the tribe of Gad was settled after the fall of Sihon, who had probably captured it from Ammon. Their important city was Rabbah. The conquest of the Transjordanian tribes by Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria in 733 B.C. (cf. 2Ki 15:29) led the Ammonites to encroach on Gad's territory, which was east of the Jordan from Heshbon to the Jabbok (cf. Nu 32:34–36; Jos 13:24–28), and to settle between the Arnon and Jabbok rivers toward the desert.

The Ammonites were often in conflict with Israel; they opposed Judah during Jehoiakim's reign (cf. 2Ki 24:2) and helped the downfall of the remnant after the fall of Jerusalem (cf. 40:11–14). They joined in the invasion of Judah in 602 B.C. (cf. 2Ki 24:2) and were among the conspirators against Babylon (cf. 27:3). They were condemned because they confiscated land from Gad during the Assyrian invasion in 733–732 B.C. The destroyer of Ammon though not named, was probably Nebuchadnezzar.

1–3 Jeremiah asks whether the tribe of Gad had no heirs since the god of the Ammonites was inheriting their land and his people were living in Gad's cities. Although the northern tribes had been carried away by the Assyrian Tiglath-pileser III, their land still belonged to them and was to be inherited by their sons. Molech was the national god of Ammon (cf. 1Ki 11:5, 7, 33). Jeremiah prophesies that war and destruction will overtake Rabbah, the chief city of the Ammonites (now Amman, the capital of Jordan). Her nearby villages will be engulfed in the catastrophe. Jeremiah names two of the more prominent towns that the Babylonians will devastate.

Five or six miles from the Ammonite border, Heshbon had been under the Amorite king Sihon (cf. Nu 21:25 30, 34). Later it came under Moabite control. Ai is not the Ai captured by Joshua (cf. Jos 8:1–29) but the Ammonite Ai.

4–6 Living in an inaccessible country with mountains on three sides, Ammon considered herself beyond invasion. She was proud of her valleys made fertile by the Arnon waters. Everyone will flee precipitately by the shortest route with no one to rally the fugitives. Josephus says that Nebuchadnezzar defeated Ammon in the fifth year after the destruction of Jerusalem. The Ammonites opposed Israel even after the Exile (cf. Ne 4:1–15; cf. also 1Mc 5:6, 30–43). As with Moab (cf. 48:47), the Lord graciously promises restoration.

E. Concerning Edom (49:7–22)

This prophecy is closely related to that of Obadiah, which was written after 587–586 B.C. The Edomites, whose relations with Israel were always poor, were descendants of Esau (cf. Ge 36:1–19) who lived in the mountainous region south of the Dead Sea toward the Gulf of Aqaba until the Nabateans displaced them. Later on the Maccabees forced them to become Jews. The severity in all the prophecies about Edom reflects the close and stormy relationship between Esau (progenitor of the Edomites) and his twin, Jacob (progenitor of Israel). Edom's cardinal sin was its pride manifested in its unrelenting and violent hatred of Israel and its rejoicing in her misfortunes (Ob 3, 10–14). There is no prophecy of future restoration prophesied for Edom.

7–12 Teman was in northern Edom, the home of Eliphaz (Job 2:11); it was renowned for wisdom (Eze 25:13). The rhetorical questions show how suddenly calamity overwhelmed the wisest in Edom. Could they not see that destruction was imminent? Dedan, a tribe living south of Edom, was known for its commerce (25:23; Eze 25:13). The people of Dedan are warned to flee from their usual contacts with Edom, lest they be overtaken in its destruction. Contrary to the practice of grape gatherers, who left something for the poor, the enemies of Edom will leave nothing but will plunder everything.

The compassionate tone of v.11 is in keeping with the Lord's character. The sense is that when the men of Edom have been slain in war, their widows and orphans may look to the Lord for protection. But the nation will have to drink the cup of God's wrath (cf. 25:28). If Israel had to drink of this cup, how could Edom escape? Because of the Edomites' complicity in Jerusalem's fall, they are especially guilty (cf. Ob 10–14).

13–22 Here the desolation of Edom is underscored. Bozrah is referred to because it was the capital of Edom in Jeremiah's time. It was midway between Petra and the Dead Sea, and here it represents all the Edomite cities (cf. Isa 63:1). The completeness of Edom's overthrow is left beyond doubt. The cause of her downfall is her inveterate pride (cf. 48:7, 29; 49:4; Ob 3, 10–14).

The nations are summoned to war against Edom. Because of her fortifications and topography, Edom had convinced herself that she was impregnable. The "rock" referred to was later called Sela (Petra, a name that means "rock")—the capital city and chief fortress of the Edomites. The ruin of Edom will be irreversible (cf. Ge 14:2, 8). Edom's foe will pounce like a lion scattering a flock. Dispersion, destruction, and devastation will be her lot. Her doom shows how fearful it is to fall into the hands of the living God (Heb 10:31).

F. Concerning Damascus (49:23–27)

23–27 It is difficult to fit this prophecy into any recorded event relating to Damascus. The important cities in Syria were Hamath, Zobah, and Damascus—the last being the seat of a powerful dynasty. Hamath and Arpad had their own local kings and gods (cf. Sennacherib's boast, 2Ki 18:34; 19:13). Word of the enemies' approach terrifies one city after another. Hamath on the Orontes is about 110 miles north of Damascus, and Arpad is about 95 miles north of Hamath. Damascus was in southern Syria. All three Syrian cities had been conquered by Assyria (Isa 10:9). Damascus was also defeated by Nebuchadnezzar in 605 B.C. The reference to the "sea" must be figurative because Syria had no seacoast in ancient times. Damascus was famous in antiquity because of its location in a large oasis and because of its commerce (cf. Eze 27:18). It ought to have been abandoned before its conquest. The young men, soldiers, the walls, and fortresses of the city are all to be destroyed. Fire will ruin its walls and defenses. Ben-Hadad was the name of a dynasty that ruled Damascus in the ninth and eighth centuries B.C. as well as the name of individual kings (cf. 1Ki 15:18, 20; 2Ki 13:24). In conquering Damascus, Nebuchadnezzar vindicated Babylon's surge toward the west.

G. Concerning Kedar and Hazor (49:28–33)

28–33 Nebuchadnezzar also moved against some of the eastern tribes. Their secluded position in the Arabian desert will not ensure them of safety, for they too will feel the might of Babylon. Kedar was an Ishmaelite desert tribe (cf. Ge 25:13; Isa 21:13, 16; Eze 27:21). Although these nomads, who were rich in livestock, were good at archery (Isa 21:16–17), Nebuchadnezzar conquered them. Hazor is not the fortress Hazor in northern Palestine (cf. Jos 11:1–13) because this Hazor was in a desert region. The areas controlled by Hazor may have included Kedar and those named in 25:23. Little is known of the early history of the Arabs. Kedar (cf. 2:10) is mentioned often in Assyrian inscriptions. Terror and destruction will strike the people of Hazor and Kedar as it has other people (cf. 6:25; 20:4; 46:5). The Lord calls the Babylonian forces to attack Hazor. Behind judgment scenes the Lord is at work, carrying out his plan. As did so many others, Kedar and Hazor lived in careless self-complacency.

H. Concerning Elam (49:34–39)

34–39 This prophecy dates from the beginning of Zedekiah's reign (i.e., 598 B.C.). Elam was an ancient kingdom (cf. Ge 14:1), two hundred miles east of Babylon and west of the Tigris River. It had been an important power but was conquered about 640 B.C., in the time of Ashurbanipal of Assyria. Later it was united with Media, then Persia. Its capital, Susa, was the residence of Darius Hystaspes and became the nucleus of the Persian Empire (Ne 1:1, Da 8:2). The purpose of this prophecy may have been to show that Elam would not and could not curb the Babylonian power. The reference to breaking the bow is a pointed one because the Elamites were famous for their skill in archery (Isa 22:6); the bow was their main weapon. Nevertheless, invaders will overwhelm them from every direction. When compared with other prophecies of Jeremiah against foreign nations, this one against Elam does not mention Nebuchadnezzar but refers only to enemies in general. Verse 38 indicates that the Lord himself will sit in judgment on Elam (cf. 1:15). "In days to come" Elam is to be restored. Some have seen the fulfillment of this prophecy when Elam, with Susa as her capital, became the center of the Persian Empire. But the phrase shows the eschatological dimension of the prophecy.

I. Concerning Babylon (50:1–51:64)

The prophecy against Babylon is by far the longest of those against foreign nations. These two chapters emphatically stress the truth of Mt 25:31–46, that the criterion by which God judges the nations is their treatment of his chosen people whom he has made the vehicle of salvation (cf. Jn 4:22) and placed at the center of the consummation of human history (cf. Isa 2:1–4). The only clue to the date of chs. 50–51 is 51:59–60, which mentions the fourth year of Zedekiah—i.e., 594–593 B.C.

Two main emphases run throughout these chapters: the fall of Babylon and the return of the Jewish exiles to their home. This does not mean that Jeremiah was pro-Babylon or pro-Judah. He had declared that Judah must be punished for her sins, and Babylon was God's agent for it. Then Babylon is to be judged for her own sins.

1. Babylon's doom announced (50:1–10)

1–10 The references to Babylon are not, as a rule, to the city but to the nation. First of all, the idols of Babylon are discredited. Bel and Marduk are alternate names for the same great Babylonian deity. Jeremiah sees the future doom as already completed. The idols are contemptuously referred to as "dung pellets" (NIV, "her idols"). "A nation from the north" (i.e., the Medes and Persians) will execute judgment on Babylon. The Lord exhorts his people to flee from Babylon because of the impending invasion. Scattered and penitent Israel is given a chance to escape. Flight alone will enable her to escape Babylon's doom. The reunited nation will return to Jerusalem to join herself to the Lord, never to forget the eternal covenant.

2. Babylon's sin and judgment (50:11–16)

11–16 Judgment on Babylon will be in retaliation for her treatment of Israel. Babylon herself is addressed so that she may realize the issues involved in her visitation. No nation in ancient times influenced the fortunes of Israel in a more devastating way than Babylon did. Her desolation is expressed in numerous ways. Babylon's enemies are summoned to wreak destruction on her. Babylon was in a fertile agricultural area. With the decline of her political power, the irrigation canals were silted up so that the country became desolate. Cyrus, who unified the Medo-Persian Empire and then overwhelmed Babylon (ZPEB, 1:1054–56), was careful to spare the country; so the references must be to a later attack. Babylon will learn the agony the law of retaliation entails.

3. Consolation to Israel (50:17–20)

17–20 This short portion summarizes the biblical interpretation of Israel's history. The sufferings of Israel are stated, then the judgment God will bring on those who inflicted such sufferings on Israel, next her return to her land in peace and plenty, and, finally, the greatest blessing of all—the pardon of Israel's iniquity. All these will be realized in messianic times.

4. God's vengeance on Babylon (50:21–28)

21–28 Once more God calls on the foes of Babylon to execute his wrath on her. "Merathaim" ("double rebellion") signifies Babylon; "Pekod" means "visitation" or "punishment." Cause and effect are thus indicated in the play on the place names—i.e., "double rebellion" and "visitation." The unexpected nature of the visitation is pointed out. Babylon, who hammered so many nations to pieces, will know the armory of God opened against her through her foes. There will be wholesale slaughter of Babylon's finest men. Clearly God is reckoning with Babylon for having burned his temple in the capture of Jerusalem. The escapees from Babylon will announce in Zion that the Lord has avenged the destruction of his temple.

5. Babylon's arrogance (50:29–32)

29–32 The stress here is on Babylon's insufferable arrogance against the Lord. The fall of the proud will be complete. The exiles, as they summon archers, are seen exulting over God's retribution on Babylon. The call is to complete the extinction of the haughty empire. Verse 30 is practically a verbatim repetition of 49:26, where Jeremiah pronounced judgment on Damascus. It is equally appropriate. Babylon is viewed as the epitome of arrogance—pride personified! The message originally addressed to Jerusalem (cf. 21:13–14) is directed against Babylon here with the necessary changes. For godless Babylon the consequences can only be fall, fire, and final consumption.

6. Israel's Kinsman-Redeemer (50:33–40)

33–40 Few nations have ever realized that God is the "Redeemer" (GK 1457) of Israel. The OT concept of kinsman-redeemer includes the protection of a relative's person and property. It involves avenging the murder of a relative, the purchase of his alienated property, and/or the marriage to his widow (cf. Lev 25:25; Nu 35:21; Ru 4). God as Redeemer is voluntarily committed to champion Israel's cause. He will bring peace to his own but unrest to his oppressors. In a sense, Israel is the epitome of all that Babylon enslaved.

7. The permanence of Babylon's doom (50:41–46)

41–46 This section should be compared with 6:22–24 and 49:19–21. The lion now is Cyrus, whereas in 49:19 it was Nebuchadnezzar. The desolation of Babylon will be permanent, as was that of Sodom and Gomorrah. The doom of Babylon will indeed terrify the nations who witness it. In 6:22–24 Judah was warned of an unnamed northern invader; the same language is now directed against Babylon, with appropriate changes. The "many kings" are those who were allied with Persia (e.g., the Medes) to bring about the defeat of Babylon. The executors of Babylon's judgment are described as to their war paraphernalia, their vast cavalry, the deafening tumult, their military formation, and their merciless attitude toward their enemy. It is clear why the "king of Babylon" is overcome with fear. Verses 44–46 are practically a verbatim repetition of the condemnation of Edom in 49:19–21. The reason is clear: since Edom's sins resemble Babylon's, God in righteousness must judge them similarly. The phrase "among the nations" indicates a wider audience than the one in view in 49:21 because of the greater prominence of the Babylonian power.

8. The Lord's vengeance on Babylon (51:1–14)

1–4 Chapter 51, the longest in the book, continues the message of condemnation and ruin for Babylon and concludes with a word concerning an important mission sent to Babylon by Jeremiah. A northern enemy is dispatched against Babylon, which is to be destroyed as chaff is winnowed from grain. "Leb Kamai" is Hebrew for "the heart of those who rise against me"; it is a cipher for Chaldea (see comment on 25:26; cf. 51:41). Why Jeremiah used these ciphers is not known, because he generally used the name Babylon. An obvious reason would be to hide the identity of the nation prophesied against. It is the enemies of Babylon who are called on to perform the will of God regarding her. Though the Babylonians with their weapons guard the walls, yet they are to be attacked and none spared.

5–10 The judgment is the vengeance of the Lord on Babylon for her treatment of Judah. She that was as a cup of wrath to the nations will now be shattered herself (cf. 25:15–16). The cup was a golden one because she intoxicated the nations with her wealth and power. And there is no healing for her mortal wound. Thus will God vindicate his cause in Judah.

11–14 The aggressor (Media) is now identified and the work of judgment described. The Medes were allied with Babylon in the destruction of Nineveh in 612 B.C. Later they joined the Persians to defeat Babylon in 539 B.C. (cf. Da 5:28, 31; 8:20). Again Jeremiah specifies that this judgment is for the destruction of the temple. All Babylon's strength cannot avert her fall that has been determined by the Lord. The invaders will swarm over her like locusts.

9. The omnipotent Lord and impotent idols (51:15–26)

15–23 In ch. 10 Jeremiah showed how the house of Israel had no cause to fear the impotent idols of the pagans. Here he demonstrates to the Babylonians the uselessness of their idols, which will all be destroyed before the mighty Creator and Ruler of the universe. The biblical doctrine of the requital is predicated on the basis of God's control over the affairs of all the nations on the ground of his creative activity (27:5) and his zeal for righteousness (Ge 18:25). In vv.20–23, Jeremiah prophesies that Cyrus of Persia, the Lord's "war club," will shatter Babylon. This passage underscores the great power of Persia. Ten times the phrase "with you" falls like hammer blows.

24–26 Babylon was situated on a plain; so "O destroying mountain" is a metaphor for a powerful kingdom (cf. Da 2:35, 14–15). But Babylon will become as an extinct volcano—"a burned-out mountain." She will never be rebuilt.

10. The nations summoned (51:27–33)

27–33 A call summons the nations to fight against Babylon. As God's avenger, Cyrus will harvest her. The people north of Babylon, who were conquered by the Medes early in the sixth century B.C., are named: Ararat, Minni, and Ashkenaz. These three are called to aid the Medes against Babylon.

11. Babylon's defenses useless (51:34–44)

34–44 The Lord in his judgment will answer Zion's complaint against Babylon. This will mean the end of Babylon. Babylon is compared to lions' cubs. She will be given a feast, followed not by drunken sleep, but by the perpetual sleep of death. In v.41 "Sheshach" is mentioned again (see comment on 25:26; cf. 51:1). Two things Babylon was famous for were the god Bel and the great wall of the city. Bel will be compelled to disgorge the nations he has swallowed, and the great wall will collapse.

12. Warning to Israel to flee Babylon (51:45–48)

45–48 Again, the Lord's people are warned to flee the doomed city before disaster strikes. They will need faith and courage until Babylon falls. But they are not to be terrified by the rumors that will be rife, for each year will have its own rumors of tyrants against tyrants. Heaven and earth will rejoice over Babylon's fall (cf. Rev 19).

13. The certainty of Babylon's fall (51:49–53)

49–53 Retribution will overtake Babylon. The remnant of Israel is ashamed when they think of Jerusalem, for they have been the cause of the temple's having been defiled by strangers. And Babylon's idolatry will not escape judgment.

14. The completeness of Babylon's destruction (51:54–58)

54–58 Jeremiah sees the destroyers of Babylon as already present. The enemy overruns the land as tidal waves sweep over a country. When most needed, Babylon's men are made drunk by God's wrath. The slave labor of many nations expended in building the wall will have been for naught.

15. The mission of Seraiah (51:59–64)

59–64 This is Jeremiah's word to Seraiah, the staff officer who was responsible for looking after the comfort of the king of Judah whenever he stopped for the night. He was probably the brother of Baruch (cf. 32:12). In lieu of Jeremiah, Seraiah was to perform a symbolic act. The fourth year of Zedekiah (594–593 B.C.) was possibly the year when Zedekiah attempted to clear himself of complicity in a revolt against Babylon. Seraiah's symbolic act was a visual enactment of the fall of Babylon. This passage is an appendix to this prophecy against Babylon that shows how it was taken to Babylon. It is remarkable that at the very time Jeremiah was advising submission to that city, he was also foretelling its final overthrow. Verse 64b is commonly understood to be a compiler's note, added to separate ch. 51 from ch. 52.

V. Historical Supplement (52:1–34)

This chapter is a historical supplement to the book of Jeremiah. It deals with the fall of Jerusalem; tells what the Babylonians did to the temple and its vessels; describes how Nebuchadnezzar treated Zedekiah, Jehoiachin, and other officials; and lists the number of Jews taken into exile. The purpose of the chapter is to show how Jeremiah's prophecies were fulfilled in contrast to those of the false prophets. The chapter is almost identical with 2Ki 24:18–25:30.

A. The Fall of Jerusalem (52:1–11)

1–11 Verses 1–3 give a brief summary of the reign of Zedekiah and show the proximate cause of the fall of Jerusalem. The narrative goes on to give a vivid account of how the city fell. So crucial was this event that the OT records it four times—in 2Ki 25; 2Ch 36:11–21; Jer 39:1–14; and in this passage.

B. Results of the Fall (52:12–27a)

12–27a Here the narrative goes into detail about what happened in Jerusalem after it fell. There is no contradiction between v.12 and v.29. In the former the accession year of Nebuchadnezzar has been included; in the second it has not. The account of the taking of the sacred vessels to Babylon (cf. 1Ki 6–8) is more elaborate here than that in 2 Kings. Zedekiah's revolt surely had an effect opposite from what the priests and false prophets had wanted. Solomon's magnificent temple, one of the wonders of the ancient world, was plundered and ruined. In v.24 the three orders of the priests are referred to. Apparently the priests and false prophets had been largely responsible for inciting Zedekiah's revolt against Nebuchadnezzar. They and the chief officers of the city were captured because of their responsibility for the calamity.

When the people of Judah fled from the Babylonian army, they headed toward the Arabah (52:7), a desolate area south of the city of Jerusalem.

C. Nebuchadnezzar's Captives (52:27b–30)

27b–30 The three deportations to Babylon listed here occurred (1) in 598–597 B.C., (2) in 587–586 B.C., and (3) in 582–581 B.C. Under Judean kings there were three deportations: (1) under Jehoiakim (606 B.C.), which marked the beginning of the seventy years of exile; (2) under Jehoiachin (597 B.C.); and (3) under Zedekiah (586 B.C.). If only Jews are numbered or only males reckoned in vv.28–30, the ultimate total of exiles was doubtless much higher.

D. Evil-Merodach's Kindness to Jehoiachin (52:31–34)

31–34 This passage agrees with 2Ki 25:27–30. The humane treatment accorded Jehoiachin (c. 561 B.C.) is confirmed by cuneiform tablets. These verses conclude Jeremiah's somberly beautiful book with a comforting thought—namely, that the Lord did not forget the Davidic line, even in exile.

Lamentations

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

The book of Lamentations consists of five laments, all but the third based on the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans in 587 B.C. and its aftermath. The vividness of the pictures points clearly to the work of an eyewitness. Though the author was conscious of the suffering elsewhere in Judah, he concentrated on the position in Jerusalem.

2. Authorship

In Hebrew the book is anonymous (the LXX has an introductory verse that ascribes authorship to Jeremiah). Arguments for and against authorship by Jeremiah are evenly balanced. We do well, then, to respect the seal of anonymity impressed on the book by the Holy Spirit. The claim for authorship by Jeremiah appears mainly sentimental. Theological similarities with Jeremiah can expected from anyone who accepted his teaching and that of the great prophets in general.

3. Date

Few commentators seriously suggest that any of the five laments fall outside the period 586–538 B.C. Indeed, the lack of national hope points to completion before 562 B.C., when the release of Jehoiachin from prison (2Ki 25:27–30) must have awakened some expectation that Jeremiah's promises would be fulfilled. Such hope as is expressed in ch.3 is for the individual rather than the nation; elsewhere national hope scarcely rises above anticipation that hostile nations will share the judgment that has befallen Zion.

4. Purpose

Already in Zec 7:3, 5; 8:19, we find that the destruction of the temple on the seventh day of the fifth month (2Ki 25:8–9) was remembered by an annual fast. (This was transferred in the second century A.D. to the ninth day of the month and has since then commemorated the two destructions of the temple as well as the crushing of Bar Kochba's revolt in A.D. 135.) We may be certain that this fast was observed from the beginning, almost certainly with ceremonies in the ruins of the temple (cf. Jer 41:5, where pilgrimage to the temple area was a goal for pious people). For as far back as tradition reaches, Lamentations has been read on the ninth day of the fifth month; it is reasonable to assume that it was intended for this purpose from the first.

The immediate purpose of the book of Lamentations, however, does not fully explain its presence in the canon, because, at least for the Christian, it would now have little more than historical and antiquarian interest. The Bible finds room for every element of human experience, including overwhelming human sorrow. This can come to the individual (e.g., Job) or to the nation as a whole. In such a position even the comfortable words of Scripture do not always bring solace and a ray of light. Though Jeremiah had set a limit to Babylonian rule (25:11–12) and had promised national restoration (chs. 30–31), the hearts of the survivors were too stunned to appreciate these promises. Even in the era of the Gospel, the same thing occasionally happens; then the brokenhearted who turn to these laments discover that they are not the first to pass through thick darkness before emerging into the sunlight again. Thus they realize that their God is the one who puts their tears onto his scroll (Ps 56:8).

The modern reader may wonder at the extremes of sorrow expressed in the book and may be puzzled that the Jews should have continued to mourn the destruction by Nebuchadnezzar. It is in fact hard for us to realize how complete the destruction was.

The old "City of David" lies outside the present city walls. This is only partially due to the effects of the destruction by the Romans. The Chaldeans so broke down the Jebusite and Davidic walls and terraces that restoration was impossible; and Nehemiah had to build his wall much higher up the slope, greatly reducing the area of what had been the center of the city. At the return from exile, a completely new beginning was needed. Lamentations, in this sense, is a funeral dirge over an irrecoverable past.

5. Literary Form

Chapter 5 is a normal Hebrew poem of twenty-two verses. It consists of a long line, normally of five beats, dividing unevenly (3 + 2) and showing much less parallelism than normal Hebrew poetry. It would certainly have suited impromptu eulogizing of the dead. In chs. 1–4 a high proportion of the lines fall into this pattern, but there are sufficient exceptions to show that it was used in no mere mechanical manner.

In addition, these chapters are built on the basis of an alphabetic acrostic. Chapters 1–2 each contain twenty-two verses, each verse having three lines; the first word of each verse begins with one of the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet in order. Chapter 4 is on the same pattern but has only two lines to a verse. Chapter 3, with sixty-six verses, has three verses for each letter of the alphabet, thus reminding us of Ps 119 (though there the groups are of eight verses each). A further peculiarity is that in chs. 2–4 pe comes before ayin, contrary to the usual order of the Hebrew alphabet.

Various explanations have been offered for the use of such an acrostic structure. In Ps 119 it aids the memory, but that can hardly have been the motive here. One likely suggestion is that such a literary convention kept a control on the expression of profound grief. Another suggestion is that the use of the alphabet symbolizes that the completeness—"the A to Z"—of grief is being expressed.

6. Theological Values

The problem of suffering presented itself to Israel on two levels—national and personal. Jeremiah best shows that the two must be kept separate; for while he anticipated and justified the downfall of Jerusalem and the Davidic monarchy, he could not understand his personal suffering, which he as a righteous man should, according to popular theology, have avoided. The classical work on the suffering of the righteous is Job. Lamentations deals with national suffering.

While there is no effort to minimize Judah's sin, the writer is clearly overwhelmed by the greatness of her doom. There is a clear recognition that the disaster was caused by God, not his enemies. Even the mockery of Judah's enemies was caused by God (2:17). Hence, the laments are shot through with prayer; and prayer leads to hope in a situation in which hope appears meaningless.

Ultimately there are depths in God's actions that finite human beings cannot grasp. God's revelation in word and act consistently shows his justice and covenant love; yet there is always a residue of human experience that demands our bowing to a wisdom too high for our understanding. This finds its supreme example in the Cross and in the cry of Jesus in Mk 15:34 (cf. Ps 22:1). This is why every facile theory of the Atonement has failed to satisfy for long, for there are depths concealed in Golgotha that pass human understanding. Only when in glory we see free will and predestination reconciled will we also grasp how God's sovereign will is compatible with his justice and covenant love.

EXPOSITION

I. The Desolation and Misery of Jerusalem (1:1–22)

This lament is evidently later than chs. 2, 4, and 5 (ch. 3 is undatable). The writer was no longer stunned by the utter brutality of defeat and destruction but was able to see what had happened in perspective. Jerusalem mourned by this time less for what she had suffered than for what she had become. The lament could be interpreted as a dialogue between poet and city; but we should rather see the poet's description moving the mourning, widowed city to burst out into a plea both to God and to those strangers that would pass by and see her misery and desolation.

1. The Poet's Description (1:1–11b)

1 The poet first looks at Jerusalem, the capital and representative of Judah, and contrasts what she once had been with what she now is. Even in the great days of David and Solomon, the territories of Israel never compared with those of Egypt, Assyria, and Babylonia at their height; as to buildings, riches (except perhaps in the days of Solomon), and population, Jerusalem never rivaled the great cities of the Near East. Yet we are not to take the poet's language as either nationalistic or sentimental. Israel as God's land and Jerusalem as the city of God's sanctuary always held the hope of seeing the Lord's universal kingship. So the poet is describing her potential in God's purposes. But what hope is there since the city is lying in ruins and the land a vassal or slave?

2 In the "night" of her desolation, Jerusalem is pictured as weeping, not merely because of her sufferings, but even more because she had been betrayed by her "lovers" and "friends." These terms (cf. Jer 4:30; 30:14) are best explained by Eze 23 and Hos 8:9-10. The suggestion is that once the monarchy was firmly established, Israel was always faced with an inescapable choice. She could rely on God for her safety against external aggression, or she could turn to allies great and small (cf. 1Ki 15:16–20). The prophets warned Israel that such alliances involved apostasy (cf. Hos 5:13; 8:8, 11; 14:3), but both the northern and the southern leaders would not listen. Judah had learned that such friends were a broken reed (Eze 29:6–7).

3 From Jerusalem the poet turns to the people of Judah who have gone into exile, leaving the city deserted. This does not mean that the afflictions and deportations have been completely effective. To "live among the nations" is used in 4:20 of national existence under the monarchy; hence "dwells among the nations" need not refer to the Exile. The lack of a "resting place" refers to Judah's inability to guarantee peace under the monarchy.

4 Not even pilgrims come to the sanctuary. Ezra 3:2–6 shows that the temple building was not necessary for sacrifices to be brought, and Jer 41:5 indicates that pilgrims came to the site even after the destruction of the temple. Apparently even that practice ceased, which suggests that this may be the latest of the laments. "Her priests" are any surviving priests who have escaped deportation and remain as near the sacred site as possible. The linking of the "maidens" with the priests is also found in Jer 31:13–14 and Joel 1:8–9, though it is unclear whether this had any part in the temple cultus (Ps 68:25).

5 All this had been foreseen in the covenant (cf. Dt 28:44); thus there is the frank and open confession that this was the Lord's doing "because of her many sins." Going into exile was one of the punishments foretold for a breach of the covenant (cf. Dt 28:36, 63–68). A touch of added pathos is given by "her children" paying the penalty for the sins of their parents.

6 Zion's majesty has collapsed. Her "princes" have fled like famished stags before the hunters, caring nothing for the herd. Twice Jerusalem yielded without a fight (2Ki 24:1, 17; Da 1:2); and at the last Zedekiah and his captains fled for their lives, abandoning the doomed city (2Ki 25:4).

7 Jerusalem is seen as participating in the sufferings of her inhabitants. She remembers the days of "affliction and wandering," i.e., banishment in misery, when her people became the helpless prey of the conquerors. This supports the view that this lament was composed some time after the fall of the city. Worst of all is the mocking laughter of her enemies. In the vast majority of cases, laughter is linked with scorn (cf. Ge 17:17; 18:12; Job 8:21; Ps 126:2). The glee of Jerusalem's enemies comes doubtless from a human reaction to Israel's claim to be God's elect.

8–9 Jerusalem is compared to a debased prostitute, shamelessly exposing her nakedness and indifferent to the marks of menstrual blood on her garments. Since prostitution is repeatedly used for Israel's idolatry and Baal worship, it is obviously implied here. The completeness of Israel's collapse has finally brought her to her senses. She knows she has no grounds for begging for a reversal of fortune, but the insolent triumphing of the enemy calls for divine retribution (cf. Isa 10:12). "The enemy has triumphed" is literally correct but misleading. It is not the victory but the insolent boasting after it that is meant.

10 The worst feature of all is that Jerusalem has lost what she held most dear. Later sentiment had enveloped Jerusalem in a haze of earthly glory and beauty; but her outstanding glory then, as later, was the temple—and even the temple derived its chief glory from its sanctity. This has been brutally violated by the conquerors. Since the Ammonites and the Moabites, who were descended from Lot and thus distantly related to Israel, had been forbidden to enter the Lord's congregation (Dt 23:3), how much more the completely unrelated Chaldeans!

11a–b The poet brings his lament to a climax. In proportion to what Jerusalem has suffered, to say, "They barter their treasures for food," does not seem to be particularly serious. In addition, it is hard to believe that when the Chaldeans had finished plundering the city, there was much treasure left. Already Theodoret (c. 450) suggested that the true meaning of the statement was, "They gave their darlings for food to keep alive." It is unimportant whether we think of them eating their children (cf. 2:20; 4:10 [prophesied in Dt 28:53–57; cf. 2Ki 6:28–29]) or selling them into slavery. Probably both are intended.

2. The City's Plea (1:11c–16)

11c We are to think of Jerusalem's being so moved by the poet's words that she breaks out in a prayer, which forms a suitable halfway stage in the poem. It is not the fact of being despised but the extent to which she is looked down on that she hopes may move God to pity.

12 From God Jerusalem turns with a plea for pity to the nations round about, pictured as travelers passing along the roads of devastated Judah. "The day of his fierce anger" is the Day of the Lord. Just as in Mk 13 and parallels the fall of Jerusalem is linked with the sufferings of the end time, so it is here (cf. also Jer 4:23–28).

13–14 The fire from on high continues the picture of God's burning anger, acting like a high fever with its racking pains, which brings death. Not Jerusalem's enemies, but God himself had entrapped the city, bringing it to an inescapable and ignominious end (cf. Eze 12:13; 17:20). The result has been an example of desolation and weakness, as though from a fatal disease. "They have come upon my neck" implies that Jerusalem just could not withstand her enemies when they came against her. For a city that had Jerusalem's strength, the siege, which lasted only a year and a half, was surprisingly short (2Ki 25:1–2; cf. 17:5–6).

15–16 Nothing but despair is left. There is likely a climax here, and instead of "an army" (GK 4595) we should understand the Hebrew here as a joyful "harvest festival" to which, not Jerusalem, but her enemies are invited. So bitter is the experience that Jerusalem does not use the name "LORD" ("Yahweh"; GK 3378), with its covenant associations (cf. Ex 3:14), but "Lord" (adonay; GK 151). Thus the poet is saying: "The Lord has rejected all the warriors in my midst," treating them like chaff: "he has summoned [a festival] against me to crush my young men," not merely to thresh them; and "in his winepress the Lord has trampled the Virgin Daughter of Judah," to provide the wine of rejoicing. Jerusalem's heartbroken sob is that "the enemy has prevailed." Defeat is bitter, but doubly so when the victors are God's enemies.

3. The Poet's Lament (1:17)

17 To prepare us for Jerusalem's final confession, the poet records that though Zion "stretches out her hands" in prayer, there is no comfort; for the destruction is the Lord's command. Abandoned by him, Jerusalem has become a filthy (menstruous) thing scorned by all.

4. The City's Confession (1:18–22)

18–22 While the poet has been speaking, Jerusalem has had time to consider her position once more. She immediately confesses that her plight has been caused by her own rebellion. Jerusalem's one hope is the Lord's judgment on her enemies, though she does not expect restoration as a result. She tells them that they will not suffer less than she has, the more so as "I called to my allies but they betrayed me." The very fact that Jerusalem's one hope and comfort is the similar fate awaiting her enemies is an almost irrefutable argument against Jeremiah's authorship, for he had foretold not only the downfall of the Chaldeans after seventy years but also the restoration of Jerusalem (Jer 25:12). This hopelessness is the best testimony to the utter shock the fall of Jerusalem caused even among the godly. It also helps explain Jeremiah's isolation, the optimism of many after Jehoiachin's deportation (Jer 28:1–4; 29:8–9), and the madness of Zedekiah's revolt.

II. The Lord's Anger With His People (2:1–22)

The main notes in the first lament were desertion, desolation, and shame; here the stress is on destruction. It seems to have been composed between the capture of the city in the fourth month (2Ki 25:3–4) and the coming of Nebuzaradan to mete out Nebuchadnezzar's vengeance (2Ki 25:8–12) a month later; for the dead still lay on the streets unburied. This would explain why the first lament, though the latest in time, is placed first. Initially the sheer impact of physical disaster is overwhelming; it is only later that the shame of it all is seen as even worse.

1. The Casting Off of People and Sanctuary (2:1–9)

1 The storm has passed over the poet's head. As he picks himself up and gazes on the desolation around him, he declares with the voice of faith that this has been the work of the "Lord" (GK 151), the All-Sovereign. The sun of Jerusalem has been hidden; "the splendor of Israel" (i.e. the temple) has been hurled from its high eminence ("from heaven"); and it has been spurned. "His footstool" can hardly mean the ark; for Jer 3:16, which must date from before the destruction of the temple, is evidence that it had vanished earlier.

2–3 All Judah has been devastated, and the kingdom has lost its sacred character. Both actively ("he has cut off every horn," i.e., all strength) and passively ("he has withdrawn his right hand"), the Lord God has destroyed his people.

4–5 God is then depicted as a mighty, hostile warrior, armed with bow to slay at a distance and with sword for close fighting (taking "on the tent of the Daughter of Zion" with "all who were pleasing to the eye"), and finally burning up all that is left. He has behaved like an enemy.

6–7 Like an enemy, the Lord "has destroyed his place of meeting" (the temple). "King and priest" are here linked; for, as the history of the monarchy clearly shows, the king was the supervisor of the temple cultus, even if he was excluded from many of the priestly functions. "The walls of her palaces" are fortified residences. Under the monarchy, too, the temple formed part of a grandiose complex, including the royal palace and state buildings. The enemies' shouts of triumph are compared to the festal shouts of joy (cf. Pss 66:1; 81:1; 95:1; et al.).

8–9 From the temple the lament passes briefly to the city and then to the king (surely Jehoiachin) and his ministers in exile. "The law is no more, and her prophets no longer find visions from the LORD" should be regarded as a unitary statement. There is no indication of God's will, either through priestly interpretation of the law or through prophetic vision.

2. The Agony of the People (2:10–17)

10 From the bitter past the lament turns to the even more bitter present. The mention of the "elders" and "young women" is probably intended to include the whole surviving population. Sitting on the ground in sackcloth, with dust on the head, in silence, and with the head bowed to the ground speak strongly of mourning.

11–12 The poet joins in the mourning in language that shows his physical participation. The fall of the city and the execution of the desperate men who have defended it do not bring the starvation to an end. During the first stage of military occupation, foraging in the surrounding countryside would not have been permitted. "Bread and wine" probably refers to essentials and semiluxuries.

13 So great is the suffering that words fail. It is probable that the extent of the sea is not intended; rather, the devastation of the city is reminiscent of the chaotic sea.

14 The best commentaries on this verse are Jer 23:18–22 and Eze 13:10–16. Just as many preachers are so obsessed with the holiness of the church that they have not been able to take its shortcomings seriously, so it was in Israel. It took the shock of the Babylonian exile to break the power and influence of the popular prophets and to discredit them finally.

Visiters to Jerusalem today are shown Jeremiah's grotto, where he is believed to have wept deeply over the coming fate of the city.

15–17 In ancient times when each pagan city or group of cities had its own deity or deities, there was a degree of mutual toleration in spite of rivalries. However, Israel's claim that their Lord is the only God, that Israel is his people, and that Jerusalem is his capital causes bitter jealousy and joy at their downfall. "The Lord . . . has fulfilled his word, which he decreed long ago" refers presumably to passages like Lev 26:14–46 and Dt 28:15–68.

3. A Call to Prayer (2:18–19c)

18–19b Despair should drive people to God; so the poet calls Zion to prayer. The first phrase here should be translated, "Cry out from the heart, O wall of the Daughter of Zion." Though the expression may seem strange, it is a call for everything, including the ruins, to join in the prayer of anguish.

19c This line bears out the interpretation that the lament describes the position after the capture of the city, not the sufferings during the siege.

4. The Response (2:20–22)

20–22 Whether the poet was composing a prayer for the survivors, whether it was meant as an ideal prayer, or whether it was a poetic expression of what was being prayed is immaterial. The prayer is a desperate recounting of utmost woe. Verse 20a is a reminder that there is a covenant relationship. Since the prophets had stressed the inviolability of the temple (cf. Jer 7:4), it is natural that they should gather there in its last hour. For the "solemn assembly" or "feast day," see comment on 1:15.

III. An Israelite's Complaint (3:1–66)

Were this lament in the Psalter, it is improbable that it would have been definitely linked with the fall of Jerusalem; for most of its language has no particular applicability to it, and that which has could come from any situation of major distress. The traditional view has seen in it Jeremiah's personal lament.

1. His Personal Sufferings (3:1–20)

1 In the OT "to see" (GK 8011) frequently goes beyond the obtaining of a visual image and involves a sharing in it. The omission of the name of God vv.1–21—except in v.18—is intended to underline the poet's feelings of abandonment and separation. For "the rod of his wrath," see Job 9:34; 21:9; Ps 89:32; and Isa 10:5.

2–3 The Hebrew word for "driven" (GK 5627) is used of driving animals, never of God's gracious leading. It was done by the rod of his anger. "Indeed, he has turned his hand against me again and again, all day long" is a complaint of exceptional suffering.

4 The force of the Hebrew for "grow old" is not to make old but to produce the effect of aging, i.e., to wear out. "Has broken my bones" refers to fever pains, a meaning that suits Isa 38:13.

5–9 "Bitterness" speaks of one's ultimate poverty—the loss of all hope. "Darkness" is one of the traditional features of Sheol. The force of "those long dead" is that they are also forgotten. The mention of "chains" suggests that we should think of the poet's being "walled in" in some dungeon from which his cries for help cannot be heard. The poet is like a man trapped in a maze. The walls are so well built—"with blocks of stone"—that he cannot glimpse the right way through any cracks in them, while side paths lead to dead ends or away from escape.

10–12 Even worse, the poet finds the path beset with danger (for the bear and the lion, see Am 5:9 and Hos 13:8). If somehow he manages to escape his deadly foes and God's leading astray, he finds God, the grim hunter, there to shoot him, not his assailants.

13–15 "He pierced my heart with arrows" shows the power of the archer's arm. "Heart" is a valid equivalent for the metaphorical meaning but misses the literal picture of "kidneys," apparently intended here. It is easy to see Jeremiah as the butt of popular ballads. "Gall," which is traditionally rendered "wormwood," is the name given to certain plants used for imparting a bitter flavor to some drinks.

16–18 "He has broken my teeth with gravel; he has trampled me in the dust" suggests the violent grinding of the face in the ground by others. In the parallelism of "deprived of peace [shalom; GK 8934]" and "forgotten what prosperity is" shalom must carry its nuance of "success" or "prosperity." In "my splendor is gone," "splendor" (GK 5905) indicates "glory" rather than strength. Both for the prophet and for Israel, hope in the Lord was their glory; when that is gone, they are on the level of the pagans round about. The poet's mention of "the LORD" breaks the spell of misery that has bound him.

19–20 The NIV follows the LXX in rendering "I remember my misery and my wandering, the bitterness and the gall," instead of the MT's "Remember my affliction." The writer must first recall the character of the Lord (vv.22–23) before he calls out to him.

2. Consolation and Hope of Grace (3:21–39)

21–24 The "hope" (GK 3498) that the writer expresses here is not created by denying or minimizing suffering and misery. Rather, these are transformed when the mind is turned to God. The vital word in v.22 is "great love" (GK 2876), the covenant love and loyalty of the Lord that leads to "compassion." The covenant called Israel into existence, and the Lord's loving mercy to what he has created will not end. The very fact of awakening to a new day is in itself a renewal of God's mercy. Humankind has passed safely through the night, a foreshadowing of death. So the verse ends with "faithfulness," the counterpart of "great love." The poet has had so little of this world's goods and pleasures because his share has been the Lord (cf. Pss 16:5; 73:26; 119:57; 142:5).

25–27 In the Hebrew these three verses begin with "good" (GK 3202). It means above all that which expresses God's will and purpose. There is the acceptance of God's time and God's will, faith expressing itself in quiet hope and the learning of discipline.

28–30 This group of verses states how the principles of vv.25–27 will be worked out, especially that of bearing the yoke. God's yoke of service will separate one from ordinary human life and lead that person to be an outcast (cf. Job 2:8). Silence implies both acceptance of God's will and refusal to complain to other people. With this should go the complete submission to God pictured in v.29 by the Oriental obeisance. It leads too to the willingness to be treated like a slave, for the yoke was a symbol of servitude. The principles formulated here will, of course, apply equally to the person called to be a prophet and to the people called to be God's private treasure (Ex 19:5–6).

31–33 These verses give reasons that will make the bearing of the yoke easier. God's rejection is temporary. Even if he afflicts, compassion and covenant love will again be shown; his infliction of pain and punishment is never arbitrary.

34–36 A contrast to God's gracious and loving dealing is offered in three pictures of man's inhumanity. There is the ill-treating of the prisoner just because he is a prisoner. There is the denial of justice. God is here called the Most High to stress that since he is the God of heaven, he is all-seeing; hence the denial of justice is a deliberate flouting of his will. There is the deliberate twisting of a human being's right, as though God does not see.

37–39 This section of the lament stresses the almighty power of God, which makes the acceptance of his will necessary. He is behind both good and calamity (cf. Isa 45:7); so why should people complain when they suffer for their sins? So long as they are alive, things can change.

3. A Call to Penitence (3:40–51)

This section divides into two parts. In vv.40–47 the poet puts a prayer into the mouth of the people. Then in vv.48–51 he adds his tears to the people's plea.

40–41 The people agree that complaint (cf. v.39) is out of place. They must examine their ways, i.e., what they have done. They lift up not merely their hands, the normal position for petition, but the whole inner person ("our hearts") to God; no mere formal prayer is involved.

42–43 There is a contrast between "we" and "you"; rebellion and disobedience are on Israel's side, a refusal to forgive on God's, with the implication that his attitude is just. The thought continues: "You have covered yourself with anger," and so pursuit and slaying have been merciless.

44–46 That God is veiled from a human being's gaze by cloud and darkness is commonplace in the OT (cf. Ex 20:21; 40:34–35; Lev 16:2; 1Ki 8:10, 12; et al.). But this veiling is never considered an obstacle to prayer. The confession of complete worthlessness follows. As a result of God's action, his people's enemies despise them openly (cf. 2:16; Ps 35:21). Judah cannot defend her honor and has no friends to do it for her.

47–48 The word translated "pitfall" probably means a hunter's trap (cf. Isa 24:17–18; Jer 48:43–44). The people's confession reminds Jeremiah of their sufferings and then even more of his own (cf. 9:1; 14:17).

49–51 Jeremiah's tears, i.e., his pleading for Israel, will continue until God responds. The Hebrew of v.51 is literally, "My eye has dealt with my soul from the daughters of my city." Scribal confusion may have resulted in the word for "my eye" instead of "suffering." The sense would be then, "Till the LORD looks down from heaven and sees the suffering done to me because of the daughters of my people," or something similar.

4. The Growth of Hope (3:52–57)

52–56 Agony over the fate of his people reminds the poet of his own fate. For the picture of the hunted bird, see Pss 11:1–2; 124:7; 140:5. Jeremiah 18:18 is an example of what is meant. "They tried to end my life in a pit" no doubt refers to the incident in Jer 38:6. "Waters closed over my head" is a common picture for distress (cf. Job 27:20; Pss 42:7; 66:12; 69:12; 88:7; 124:4; et al.). There is no real justification for taking eben ("stone"; GK 74) as a collective, i.e., "stones." A cistern was normally closed by a stone over its mouth. It is not easy to be sure of the exact force of the words in v.56. "Do not close your ears" refers to the remainder of the verse, which is his prayer ("my cry for relief").

5. An Appeal for Vengeance (3:58–66)

58–66 The rendering of these verses is straightforward. God's protection over Jeremiah in the past is an adequate basis for confidence in the future. We might think that the prophet has surely grown beyond such imprecations, and that in the destruction of Jerusalem he has seen God's punishment of his enemies. But we must remember that for the sake of his people, Jeremiah has abandoned everything, even the consolations of family life and children (Jer 16:1–4). In addition, though God gave him some of the most glowing pictures of Israel's restoration, including the promise of the new covenant, there is no indication that God gave him a glimpse of life beyond the grave. How heavy then must have been the burden of rejection and ingratitude that followed him even into Egypt!

IV. Zion, Past and Present (4:1–22)

We may reasonably date this lament not very long after ch.2. Sufficient time had elapsed for the first shock to wear off, and the poet is able to bring what has happened to a focus and so supplements ch. 2.

1. The Contrast (4:1–11)

1–2 Since gold does not tarnish and the second line refers to the destroyed temple, we can easily see a reference to its gold-covered panels and golden vessels so covered with dust that their value is no longer discernible. Similarly, it is no longer possible to discern the value of the enslaved survivors.

3–5 The "jackal" is a mammal whose maternal care might not be expected. The ostrich was proverbial because of its apparent neglect of its eggs (Job 39:13–18), and "my people" have become like it in their neglect of their babes. Money has ceased to have meaning; so the rich women have no helpers and only such food as they can find among the garbage.

6–9 Whether the lament says that "the punishment" or "the iniquity" of Judah is worse than that of Sodom (cf. Eze 16:44–52) is uncertain. Ultimately it is unimportant, for the measure of iniquity and its punishment are held to be linked. Nazir (GK 5687) is normally rendered Nazirite, but in Ge 49:26 and Dt 33:16 it is used of one separated by rank and qualities from his contemporaries. This is obviously the sense here, and so "princes" is a satisfactory rendering. The description is of men who are able to devote themselves to their physical appearance. An ignominious fate falls to these once fair nobles. So bad is their situation that death is preferable to life.

10–11 Hunger drives humans to inhuman action (cf. 2Ki 6:25–29). All this falls on the people because they have provoked the Lord to wrath.

2. The Sin of Priests and Prophets (4:12–16)

12 There is an obvious element of exaggeration here. Essentially it means that Jerusalem's deliverance in the time of Sennacherib showed people that, so long as the Lord's hand was over it, the city was impregnable.

13 This protection has been withdrawn because of the bloodguilt of the priests and prophets. We are here dealing with one of the fundamental concepts of prophetic ethics. Ezekiel 22:1–12 shows that the concept of "bloodshed" was far wider than murder or homicide; all that cut at the roots of society or that deprived people of their land and livelihood shortened their lives and so was bloodshed. Priest and prophet contributed positively and negatively—positively by advocating or condoning such behavior, negatively by failing to condemn those who wronged their fellow Israelites.

14–16 Usually these verses are taken as the direct continuation of v.13, giving the fate of the bloodguilty priests and prophets; bearing the mark of Cain, moral lepers, they are rejected wherever they go. However, Jer 29:15–23 and the earlier chapters of Ezekiel do not support such a picture for those who were deported with Jehoiachin, and the poet would hardly know the fate of those who survived the fall of Jerusalem. It may well be intended as a picture of the miserable survivors as a whole, as they are scattered abroad. This is supported by the mention of elders rather than prophets in v.16. It should be remembered that Judah is almost completely bereft of people of standing.

3. Vain Hopes (4:17–20)

17–20 The blindness of those who have gone into exile is matched only by that of those who are left at home. Hoping against hope, they have looked for Egypt's help almost to the last moment (Jer 37:3–10). The use of "we" suggests that the poet has shared in these hopes. This and the manner in which Zedekiah is spoken of are irreconcilable with authorship by Jeremiah. (For v.19, see Lev 26:8; Dt 32:30; Isa 30:16–17.) It is reasonably likely that the vivid memory of Zedekiah's last, desperate attempt to escape (Jer 52:6–9) lies behind vv.19–20. Judah's madness and blindness are due not only to faith in the inviolability of the temple but also of the Davidic dynasty. This is the obvious explanation why Jeremiah has so little to say about the messianic hope. "Our very life breath" and "under his shadow" are taken from the ancient court-language of the Near East.

4. The Reversal of Doom (4:21–22)

21–22 The vain hopes are gone, and only the stark reality remains. To Edom, who stands for all the enemies of Judah (cf. Isa 34; Eze 35), the poet says, in effect, "Rejoice while you can, for judgment is coming to you also." Their nakedness involves shame and revelation of sins, but it also implies slavery (cf. Isa 47:2–3). The consolation for Zion is that she has received all the punishment she can (cf. Isa 40:2); there can be no more exile.

V. An Appeal to the Lord (5:1–22)

The absence of an alphabetic acrostic and "lament" meter suggest that this lament may be by another hand. Though there are some references to incidents during the siege, the lament deals mainly with the sequel, which suggests some lapse of time.

1. The Affliction of the Lord's People (5:1–18)

1–3 Remembrance in the Bible always involves resultant action; so this is a call to God to act. The word traditionally rendered "inheritance" (GK 5709) normally means "possessions," however obtained. In the poet's society the fatherless orphan and the widow without grown sons are the weakest, unless they have powerful patrons. There is an implied plea to God to act.

4 From 2Ki 24:14; 25:12 and Jer 39:10 we learn that most of those left in Judah were the very poor, who were expected to keep the fields and vineyards in order. No foreign settlers were brought in, though there is little doubt that this was Nebuchadnezzar's intention, overruled by God. So this verse probably refers to the heavy taxation that has to be paid if the survivors are to live.

5 The same idea underlies this verse. The author is not an alluding to slave masters, though many people have been dragged away as slaves; rather, it is the need to live that drives them on, and they have forfeited God's promise of rest from their enemies (cf. Dt 12:10; 25:19; 2Sa 7:1, 11).

6–7 It is true that Nebuchadnezzar claimed to be continuing the Assyrian power, as did Cyrus later (cf. Ezr 6:22); but that can hardly be the force of "Assyria" here. The poet is referring to something "our fathers" did. The answer is suggested by Hos 2:5, 8, which shows Israel worshiping the Baalim, the fertility gods of nature. This reduced the Lord for them to a god among gods, and so they sought alliances with Egypt and Assyria (Hos 5:13; 7:11; 12:1). Now their descendants have reaped the bitter harvest, as Samaria had done a century and a half earlier.

8–10 Instead of their own king and ministers, the people are ruled by Babylonian officials, most of relatively low standing, who are proud of the title "slaves of the king"; there is no court of appeal against their arbitrary brutality. This shows itself in the difficulty experienced in obtaining food, which involves risk to life and limb and extreme exposure; "hot" skin is literally "scorched" or "blackened" skin, showing general starvation.

11–13 The brutality the people are experiencing is only a continuation of what they have experienced earlier, when the Chaldeans captured the city. "Princes have been hung up by their hands" suggests torture to make the rich reveal where they have hidden their treasures. This meaning is elaborated by the second element concerning elders; their being "shown no respect" manifestly refers to a deliberate shaming. Hence the hanging, perhaps impaling, is of the dead to dishonor their corpses. Since Nebuchadnezzar did not torture those whom he regarded as most guilty (Jer 52:10–11, 24–27), it is not likely that any were hung up or impaled while still alive. Now "young men toil at the millstones," doing women's work, whereas in happier days they would have been soldiers. "Boys stagger under loads of wood"; i.e., they are treated as serfs.

14–18 Old and young had found the course of life disjointed, and all joy is gone because of past sin. The supreme sign of God's anger is that the temple mount has become the abode of wild animals. No great lapse of time is suggested. The temple mount remains sacred ground (cf. Jer 41:5). We cannot affirm with any certainty whether sacrifices were continued on the sacred site; but if they were (note that there is no suggestion of this in Lamentations), it would have been only on special occasions. At other times even the surviving priests would have avoided the site in their consciousness of sin and defilement. Even today most strictly orthodox Jews will not enter the temple area. The West (Wailing) Wall is outside the holy area. And jackals rapidly occupy ruins.

2. The Lord's Abiding Power (5:19–22)

19–20 The "throne" is the visible symbol of kingly rule. The poet returns to the plea with which the lament began. "Remember" (v.1) is taken up by "forget"; "look and see" by "forsake."

21 Suddenly there is the overwhelming realization that true repentance is possible only as initiated by an act of God (cf. Jer 31:18, 33–34; Eze 36:26–27). This is a foreshadowing of the NT doctrine of regeneration. Unfortunately, it was grasped by few at the time. Judaism tends to lay great stress on the importance of repentance but always regards it as something essentially within human control.

22 The "unless" of NIV and others would normally lead us to expect a negative expression in the preceding verse. Probably the best rendering is the NEB: "For if thou hast utterly rejected us, / then great indeed has been thy anger against us." Whatever the cost in loss of dramatic effect, it is understandable that when Lamentations is read in the synagogue, v.21 is repeated at this point so that the reading will not end on such a sad note.

Just as it is difficult for us to grasp why Jeremiah should have had to suffer more than his contemporaries, so it seems strange to many that one who could so pour out his heart to God should receive so little consolation. There is not even the burning hope of return and restoration that Jeremiah and Ezekiel voiced. The simple fact is that the people of Israel—with few exceptions—had so failed to grasp God's revelation that an experience parallel to the bondage in Egypt and a new Exodus were needed to prepare Israel for the appearance of her Messiah and the world's Savior.

Ezekiel

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

Israel's idolatrous abominations caused the ten northern tribes of that nation to be taken into captivity by Assyria in 722 B.C. At that time the southern kingdom of Judah was spared through the influence of righteous men like Isaiah. Judah soon experienced a revival and spiritual refreshment under the leadership of young King Hezekiah. He had learned the spiritual lessons from the downfall of Israel and was encouraged by the ministry of the prophet Isaiah (2Ki 18–19). However, Hezekiah's faith in the Lord and zeal for the Mosaic covenant were forgotten when his son Manasseh and his grandson Amon rejected the ways of the Lord. For fifty-five years (2Ki 21:1–18) they turned the people to all kinds of idolatry and wickedness. This so perverted the people that they repudiated the law of God and forgot that it existed.

Josiah, Amon's righteous son, brought renewed hope to Judah; but it came too late. As he was having the temple repaired, a copy of the Law of Moses was discovered (2Ki 22). On reading it, Josiah was moved to obey it fully (2Ki 23). He purified the temple and officially cleansed the land of the abominations of Manasseh and Amon. But among the people this reformation was only perfunctory. The idolatry of Manasseh's long reign had so corrupted their hearts that there was little genuine repentance (cf. Jer 3:10). The Mosaic covenant declared that the nation of Israel would be taken captive and dispersed among the nations if the people continually disobeyed the stipulations of that covenant (Lev 26; Dt 28–29). That curse was now certain. It was the only thing that would remove the wickedness of Israel and cause the people to return to the Lord their God.

Meanwhile, on the international scene there was a new power struggle. Assyria, the dominant nation in the ancient Near East for more than 250 years, was declining, while the Neo-Babylonian Empire was rising under the leadership of Nabopolassar. In 612 B.C. the Babylonians defeated the Assyrians; and Nineveh, their capital city, fell. The remnants of the Assyrian army under Ashuruballit II retreated westward to Haran, where, with their backs to the Egyptians, they endeavored to keep resistance alive.

In 609 B.C. Pharaoh Neco of Egypt marched to the aid of Assyria with a large force. At Megiddo, Josiah, the reformer king of Judah, tried to stop the advance of Neco, only to be killed in the ensuing battle. Neco continued on to Haran to support Ashuruballit in his attempt to retain Haran, but the strength of the Babylonians gave them a decisive victory.

Though Neco failed in his effort to aid Assyria at Haran, he did begin to consolidate Palestine and Syria. He removed Jehoahaz, the pro-Babylonian son of Josiah whom the people of Judah crowned as their new king, and established Jehoiakim, Josiah's eldest pro-Egyptian son, as his vassal king in Judah. Throughout this international turmoil, Jeremiah the prophet warned the people of Judah to submit to the Babylonians and not to follow the enticements of Egypt. But they would not listen.

In 605 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar, the crown prince of Babylonia, attacked the combined Assyrian and Egyptian forces at Carchemish on the Euphrates in one of the most important battles of history. In Nebuchadnezzar's overwhelming victory, two great powers of the ancient Near East fell, never again to rise to international significance. As the Babylonians pushed their conquest southward, they invaded Judah and deported a group of young nobles from there (2Ki 24:1; 2Ch 36:6; Da 1:1–3, 6). This began the great Babylonian captivity of Judah that would ultimately affect every Israelite.

Jehoiakim was both a reluctant vassal of Babylon and a greedy ruler over his people, despising the Mosaic covenant and the reforms of his father, Josiah (Jer 22:13–17). After three years of unwilling submission to Nebuchadnezzar, Jehoiakim refused to heed the warnings of Jeremiah and revolted against Babylon in favor of Egypt (2Ki 24:1). The stalemate in battle between Babylon and Egypt on the frontier of Egypt in 601 B.C. encouraged him. His revolt was a mistake, for as soon as Nebuchadnezzar reorganized his army, he retaliated against those nations that had revolted and had refused to pay tribute to him.

In December 598 B.C., during the month that the Babylonians began to attack Judah, Jehoiakim died. His eighteen-year-old son, Jehoiachin, succeeded him (2Ki 24:8), only to surrender the city of Jerusalem to Nebuchadnezzar three months later. Jehoiachin, his mother, his wives, his officials, and the leading men of the land (2Ki 24:12–16), including Ezekiel (a priest; Eze 1:1–3), were led away into exile. Zedekiah, Jehoiachin's uncle, was established by Nebuchadnezzar as a regent vassal over Judah. Though in exile, Jehoiachin remained the recognized king of Judah by Babylon, as demonstrated from administrative documents found in the excavations at Babylonia.

Buoyed by false prophets' messages that Nebuchadnezzar's power was soon to be broken and the exiles would triumphantly return, and seduced by the seemingly renewed strength of Pharaohs Psammetik II (594–588 B.C.) and Apries (588–568 B.C.), on whom the vacillating Zedekiah pinned his hopes of restored national independence, the king was persuaded to rebel once more against Nebuchadnezzar. The response of Babylon was immediate. Early in 588 the Babylonian army laid siege to Jerusalem (2Ki 25:1; Jer 32:1–2), having already destroyed the fortress cities of the Judean hill country (vividly described in the Lachish Letters). In the fall of 586, Jerusalem was destroyed; Zedekiah was captured and blinded after witnessing the execution of his sons; many inhabitants of Jerusalem were murdered by the Babylonians; and others were deported to Babylon (2Ki 25:2–21; Jer 52:5–27). Judah had fallen.

During this period of international turmoil and unrest, combined with the immorality and apostasy of Judah, Ezekiel ministered. Having grown up during the reform of Josiah and having been taken captive in the deportation of Jehoiachin in 597 B.C., Ezekiel proclaimed to the exiled Jews the Lord's judgment and ultimate blessing.

The following outline will clarify the chronological relationship between the Judean, Egyptian, and Babylonian kings.

1. Judean kings

Josiah (640–609 B.C.)
Jehoahaz (Josiah's second son) (609 B.C.)
Jehoiakim (Josiah's eldest son) (609–597 B.C.)
Jehoiachin (Jehoiakim's son) (597 B.C.)
Zedekiah (Josiah's youngest son; a regent) (597–586 B.C.)
Jerusalem destroyed (586 B.C.)

2. Egyptian kings

Psammetik I (664–609 B.C.)
Neco (609–594 B.C.)
Psammetik II (594–588 B.C.)
Apries (Hophra) (588–568 B.C.)

3. Neo-Babylonian kings

Nabopolasser (626–605 B.C.)
Nebuchadnezzar (605–562 B.C.)

2. Authorship and Date

Ezekiel's authorship of the entire book was never seriously questioned before the second quarter of the twentieth century. Recent objections to the book's unity have been based on critical literary analysis. Though Ezekiel's visions caused him to see events in Jerusalem while living in Babylon, there are fewer difficulties in accepting the traditional unity than in altering the text and devising stylistic, geographical, and historical objections. The style and content of Ezekiel are remarkably consistent. Some hold to a Palestinian locale for the composition.

Few books in the OT place as much emphasis on chronology as Ezekiel does. The first three verses of ch. 1 mark the chronological setting, dating the book by Jehoiachin's deportation to Babylon in 597 B.C. The first prophetic message is dated in "the fifth year of the exile of King Jehoiachin" (1:2; i.e., 593 B.C.), and the last-dated message (29:17–30:19) was given in "the twenty-seventh year" (571 B.C.). The book contains thirteen chronological notices. Chapters 1–24, which announce both the judgment on Jerusalem and Judah and the basis for it, are dated 593–589 B.C. (1:1–3; 8:1; 20:1; 24:1). The prophecies against the foreign nations in chs. 25–32 are dated 587–585 B.C. (26:1; 29:1; 30:20; 31:1; 32:1; 17), with the exception of 29:17–30:19. The messages of blessing and hope in chs. 33–48 were delivered between 585 and 573 B.C. (33:21; 40:1).

3. Place of Origin and Destination

Ezekiel 1:1–3 and 3:15 clearly define the place of origin of Ezekiel's ministry as Babylonia, specifically at the site of Tel Abib located near the Kebar River and the ancient site of Nippur. Many identify this "River" as a canal making a southeasterly loop, connecting at both ends with the Euphrates River.

The conditions of the Jews in the Babylonian exile were not severe. Though placed at the specific site of Tel Abib, it seems that they had freedom of movement within the country and the opportunity to engage in commerce. They were regarded more as colonists than slaves.

Ezekiel's messages were primarily for these exiles. He condemned the abominations that were leading Jerusalem and Judah to ultimate destruction. The exiles questioned the prophecies of Ezekiel; and he, in turn, answered them carefully. He played the role of a watchman to warn them of the impending judgment on Judah and to proclaim the hope of their ultimate restoration to the land of Israel. Though in some of Ezekiel's visions (chs. 8 and 11) he was carried to Jerusalem, his messages were not directly given for the benefit of the Jews in Palestine. The distance between Babylon and Jerusalem would preclude these messages being directed to Jerusalem, though certainly some of the concepts of Ezekiel may have filtered back to Palestine. Jeremiah, Ezekiel's contemporary, however, was simultaneously proclaiming a similar message of warning and judgment to those remaining in Jerusalem and Judah.

4. Occasion and Purpose

When God created the nation of Israel, he gave the people the Mosaic covenant (Ex 20–Nu 9; Dt) as their constitution, which told them how to live for the Lord. The law was not given to burden the Hebrews; it was given for their own good (Dt 10:12–13), so that they might be blessed (Dt 5:28–33).

Yet the history of Israel was marked by disobedience to this covenant. Often the nation followed the gods of the peoples around them. As the above historical sketch shows, the kingdoms of Israel and Judah became increasingly corrupt and ultimately forgot their constitution. The covenant itself had warned the Israelites that if they strayed from the Lord's ways revealed in the statutes and commandments of the law, the Lord would discipline them through dispersion in order to bring them back to himself.

Ezekiel spoke to his contemporaries, declaring to them the faithfulness, holiness, and glory of God. Their God would bring judgment, cleansing, and ultimate blessing through which all peoples might come to know that he, the God of Israel, was the one true God. The Lord desired to turn the exiles of Israel away from their sinful ways and restore them to himself. His judgment, therefore, was exercised as an instrument of love to cause them to see their abominations and to recognize the Lord's faithfulness to his covenants. He was indeed faithful to his promises, both to judge and to bless his people. The destruction of the city of Jerusalem demonstrated God's faithfulness to his holy character (cf. Lev 26; Dt 28–30) as revealed in his covenants. On the other hand, Ezekiel gave hope that one day the true Shepherd, the Messiah, would come to lead God's people. Though their contemporary rulers had exploited them and led them away from the Lord, in the future the people would be restored to the Promised Land (Ge 12:7) by a righteous leader. In that day all the covenants of the Lord would be fulfilled to his people (Eze 37:24–28).

Ezekiel, as a watchman for Israel, warned the people of the judgment that was imminent and stressed the need for individual responsibility as well as national accountability before God. Each Israelite was personally to turn to the Lord. Likewise, the whole nation must ultimately return to him.

5. Theological Values

Five prominent theological concepts pervade these prophetic pages: (1) the nature of God; (2) the purpose and nature of God's judgment; (3) individual responsibility; (4) the ethical, religious, and moral history of Israel; and (5) the nature of Israel's restoration and the millennial worship.

(1) God's attributes most strongly emphasized are those relating to his covenant promises. A righteous and holy God had established a righteous way of life for the well-being of his people. If they followed the stipulations of that covenant, they would be blessed in every spiritual and physical way (Lev 26:3–13; Dt 28:1–14). If they rebelled against the Lord's righteous ordinances and disobeyed them, the Lord—being holy, just, and righteous—would discipline his people and withhold blessing (Lev 26:14–39; Dt 28:15–68). Ezekiel demonstrated the Lord's faithfulness to these promises. He was judging Israel and Judah because they had broken the law, but he would also faithfully restore the people to the land of blessing and confer on them messianic blessings of the Abrahamic, Davidic, and new covenants (Lev 26:40–45; Dt 30; cf. Ge 12:1–3; 2Sa 7:12–17; Jer 31:31–34).

(2) God's character logically reflects judgment. The Lord loved the Israelites and chose them as his very own people to bless the world (Ge 12:2–3; Ex 19:4–6; Dt 7:6–11). Since they strayed from his righteous ways, the Lord brought judgment on them to make them conscious of their wickedness so that they would return to him. Ezekiel continually declared that the purpose of the Lord's judgment was to cause Israel, or the nations, to "know that I am the LORD," a phrase repeated over sixty-five times in this book. Judgment was for Israel's good because it would result in their return to the Lord and their recognition that he was the only true God.

(3) Though the Lord often dealt with Israel nationally, Ezekiel balanced this with an emphasis on individual responsibility (cf. Dt 24:16; 29:17–21). A person was not delivered from God's curse by the righteousness of the majority of the nation or some other person's spirituality. Each person was accountable individually to God. Each person needed to obey the statutes of God's word in order to live righteously before him. Everyone was equally responsible for his or her own disobedience and unrighteousness. Therefore Ezekiel exhorted the exiles to turn from their sinful ways and live righteously, according to the Mosaic covenant (chs. 18; 23).

(4) Along with God's judgment announced in this prophecy, Ezekiel vindicated the Lord's righteous justice by recounting Israel's ethical, moral, and religious history. This was most vividly accomplished through the imagery of Israel as a spiritual prostitute who, having been wooed and married by God, had prostituted herself by going after the gods of other nations throughout her entire history. This idolatry and unfaithfulness had characterized her from her birth in Egypt.

(5) In spite of Israel's consistent idolatry, the Lord gave a message of hope through his prophet. One of the most complete descriptions of Israel's restoration to the land of Palestine in the end times was given in the hope messages (33:21–39:29), which enunciated the basis, manner, and results of Israel's restoration to the Promised Land. Likewise, the most exhaustive delineation of the worship system in the Millennium is set forth in chs. 40–48. Anyone studying eschatology must know these sections of Ezekiel.

EXPOSITION

I. Ezekiel's Commission (1:1–3:27)

A. The Vision of God's Glory (1:1–28)

1. The setting of the vision (1:1–3)

1–3 The setting of the Mesopotamian dream-visions, which occurred in both the Assyrian period and the Babylonian period, consisted of four elements: the date, the place of reception, the recipient, and the circumstances. Ezekiel included all four aspects in his vision.

The date of this vision is stated in two different ways: "in the thirtieth year, in the fourth month on the fifth day," and "on the fifth of the month—it was the fifth year of the exile of King Jehoiachin." The "thirtieth year" most likely relates to the age of Ezekiel. It was not uncommon that dates were given according to a man's age when personal reminiscences were being reported (cf. Ge 8:13). Additionally, Ezekiel was a priest, and a man entered his priestly ministry at the age of thirty (Nu 4:3, 23, 30, 39, 43; 1Ch 23:3). Therefore, Ezekiel apparently received this vision and his commission in the very year he would have begun his priestly service.

The "thirtieth year" of Ezekiel is related to the fifth year of King Jehoiachin's exile. The month is understood in v.2 from the explicit statement in v.1 (i.e., the fourth month). Since Jehoiachin was deported to Babylonia in 597 B.C., Ezekiel's commission must have been received in 593 B.C. Jehoiachin's year of deportation is the focal point of all dating within the book.

Ezekiel saw this vision "by the Kebar River in the land of the Babylonians." The river Kebar, a navigable canal, flowed southeast from the city of Babylon.

Ezekiel was the stated recipient of the vision. He was a priest and the son of Buzi. Nothing is known about Buzi, though as Ezekiel's father he would also have been a priest. The notation of Ezekiel's priesthood is significant. He would have been well acquainted with the Mosaic covenant and the priestly functions of the temple, both of which pervade the entire message of this book. Ezekiel was able to describe clearly the glory of God in the temple and the temple functions. He also was prepared to evaluate accurately the rebellion of his people against the explicit commands of the law, which was the basis for the Lord's judgments that Ezekiel announced. Moreover, this priestly background enabled Ezekiel to understand the millennial temple vision that concludes the entire prophecy.

The only circumstances set forth in this introduction to the subsequent vision were that "the word of the LORD came to Ezekiel" and "the hand of the LORD was upon him." These phrases occur whenever Ezekiel was about to receive or proclaim a revelation from God (3:22; 8:1; 33:22; 37:1; 40:1). "The hand of the LORD was upon him" connotes the idea of God's strength on behalf of the person involved (3:14), a concept inherent in the name "Ezekiel" (which means "God strengthens"). God was preparing Ezekiel to receive a vision that would provide the necessary framework for understanding the rest of the prophecy. It is important to the interpretation of this book to notice the phrase "I saw visions of God," for this immediately declared the nature of the following vision.

2. The description of the vision (1:4–28)

a. The living beings (1:4–14)

There appears to be a general pattern to the commission narratives of the prophets. First is the divine confrontation—an introductory word that forms the basis and background for the succeeding commission. Then the commission itself enumerates the task the prophet is called to and its importance. Third, the objections the prophet may offer are stated, after which the "call" narrative closes with reassurances from the Lord that answer these objections and assure the prophet that the Lord is with him. All four elements are found in Ezekiel's commission.

The Lord confronted Ezekiel with this glorious vision to impress on him the majesty, holiness, and wonder of the God who was about to execute judgment on the people of Israel. Ezekiel was awestruck by God's holiness. The indelible impression of this theophany served as a constant encouragement to Ezekiel in his difficult ministry of announcing God's judgments on his own contemporaries. Against the backdrop of the awesome holiness of God visualized here, Ezekiel saw the wickedness of Israel and thereby understood why God had to judge his sinful people. When the nations profaned the Lord by claiming that Judah was in captivity because their God was weak, Ezekiel knew that his God was greater than Babylonia's gods. Though the Lord had chosen to discipline his people then, he would be victorious over all the nations when he restored Israel to the Promised Land.

This was the same glorious, covenant-keeping God who first revealed himself to Israel in a similar vision of splendor on Mount Sinai (Ex 19). He reappeared as the glory inhabiting the Most Holy Place in the dedication of the tabernacle (Ex 24:15–18; 29:42–46; 40:34–38). This theophany led the children of Israel through the desert (Nu 9:15–23; 14:10; 16:19; 20:6), filled Solomon's temple (1Ki 8:10–11; 2Ch 5:14), and appeared at Isaiah's commission (Isa 6:3). Though some may be disturbed that the manifestation of God's glory is not always the same, variation in details is to be expected when one considers the limitlessness of God. However, the consistency of the manifestation of God's glory was such that Ezekiel, a priest and a student of the Scriptures, immediately recognized that this was a vision of the glory of the Lord (v.28).

4–14 This vision began with a common introductory formula to visions: "I looked, and I saw." Ezekiel suddenly saw what appeared to be a raging electrical storm—dark clouds, lightning, and thunder—coming from the north. Within this storm he saw four figures resembling living beings (cf. Rev 4), which he describes. Though the beings looked like people, each one had four faces and four wings. The human face was dominant, being on the front of each creature, while the lion's face was on the right, the ox's (or cherub's; cf. 10:14, 22) face on the left, and the eagle's face on the back.

The wings were joined together (vv.9, 23), with two covering each side of each being and the other two spread for movement, touching the wings of the other living beings (vv.11, 23). When the wings fluttered, they sounded like a great thunder of rushing water, a violent rainstorm, or a noisy military encampment—like the voice of the "Almighty" God. The sides of the living being had hands like a human being's under its wing, straight legs, and feet like a calf.

The rapid movement of these living beings was like flashes of lightning. Their forward movement was in the direction in which the human face looked. When they moved, they did not turn around. These creatures moved only under the control of the "spirit" (v. 12; GK 8120), which, in this context of God's glory, is most likely the Holy Spirit of God.

In addition to the general appearance of brightness, these creatures contained in their midst that which looked like coals of fire, from which lightning issued. These living beings are identified in 10:15, 20 as cherubim. Certainly Ezekiel was acquainted with cherubim from his training in the temple, with its many representations of these creatures (Ex 25–26; 36–37; 1Ki 6; 2Ch 3), as well as his knowledge of the "cherubim" imagery from Mesopotamian culture with its guardian genii before temples. Cherubim often accompanied references to God's glory in the OT; yet their specific functions are nowhere clearly delineated.

b. The wheels and their movement (1:15–21)

15–18 There was one high and awesome wheel beside each of the four living creatures (cf. 10:9) that had the general appearance of a sparkling precious stone—"chrysolite"—with a rim full of eyes (cf. Rev 4:6).

19–21 When these wheels were functioning, they gave the impression of a wheel being in the midst of another wheel. The wheels moved in conjunction with the living beings, going in any direction, lifting up off the earth, and standing still. All the movement was under the direction of "the spirit." Chapters 3 and 10 further describe the wheels as making rumbling sounds when they whirled (3:12–13; 10:5, 13).

c. The expanse (1:22–28)

22–28 An awesome expanse resembling sparkling ice appeared like a platform over the heads of the four living creatures (cf. Rev 4:6). The likeness of a throne made from precious lapis lazuli ("sapphire"; see NIV note on v.26) was above this expanse, and the likeness of a human being was on the throne (cf. Ex 24:10; Rev 4:2). This person appeared surrounded by fire, giving him a radiance similar to a rainbow (cf. 8:2; Da 10:6; Rev 4:3, 5).

The most significant phrase of the entire chapter is in the last verse: "This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the LORD." This reference would relate more directly to the likeness of the man on the throne, but Ex 19, 1Ki 6, Isa 6, Da 10, and Rev 4 confirm that the entire vision is a manifestation of God's "glory" (GK 3883; cf. v.1). The Lord revealed his magnificent person to Ezekiel to prepare him for ministry. He continued to appear to Ezekiel in this same fashion throughout the book to encourage him that he was a servant of Almighty God. When one genuinely sees God's glory, one cannot help but fall prostrate in worship before the Almighty God, as Ezekiel did.

This manifestation of the Lord's glory forms a backdrop for the announcements of judgment that Ezekiel would make. Since the glorious, holy God who gave the Mosaic covenant (Ex 19) could not tolerate disobedience to that covenant because of his righteous character, he had to execute judgment on the iniquity that his holy nature could not tolerate. Therefore, when God brought judgment on Jerusalem, his glory had to leave its residence in the temple (10:1–20; 11:22–23). However, Ezekiel saw the Lord's glory returning (cf. ch. 43) after the cleansing of God's people was completed. Thus the revelation of God's glory becomes a significant theme throughout the prophecy, showing a unity of purpose within the book.

B. The Lord's Charge to Ezekiel (2:1–3:27)

1. The recipients of Ezekiel's ministry (2:1–5)

1–2 The voice of God speaking from the theophany addressed Ezekiel with the title

"son of man" (GK 1201 & 132). This became Ezekiel's normal designation throughout the remainder of the book (used over ninety times); this expression is found nowhere else in the OT except in Da 7:13; 8:17. This title indicates the frailty and weakness of a human being humbled before the mighty and majestic God. By this title Ezekiel was reminded continually of his dependence on the Spirit's power, which enabled him to receive God's message and to deliver it in the power and authority of the Lord—"This is what the Sovereign LORD says" (v.4). This same name—"Son of Man"—was given Christ in the Gospels (Lk 19:10) to emphasize his relation to humanity and his voluntary dependence on the Spirit of God (see comments on Da 7:13–14; Mk 8:31).

3–4 The commission side of Ezekiel's call narrative encompasses the majority of chs. 2–3. God was about to commission Ezekiel for a most difficult task. He was to go to his own people in exile, the people God described as rebellious against himself, his law, and his messengers, the prophets. This was not a new condition, for this nation had transgressed the Mosaic covenant throughout her history. God's chosen people were "obstinate" and "stubborn" (lit., "hard-hearted" and "hard-faced"), demonstrating a strong-willed determination to resist God and his ways. Undoubtedly a major contribution to Judah's current rebellion were the abominations of Manasseh that had stained the hearts of the people.

5 Ezekiel's message was not to be conditioned on his listeners' response. Even if the people closed their ears to his words, he was to speak in God's authority and not his own. Only then would the people know that a prophet had been among them.

2. Ezekiel's encouragement in the ministry (2:6–7)

6–7 In light of the difficult ministry Ezekiel was being called to, the Lord reassures him. Regardless of how frightful the opposition may be—pricking him as thorns or stinging him as scorpions—Ezekiel was not to be afraid or become dismayed and give up. On the contrary, he was to be faithful in proclaiming God's message, for his recipients were rebels who needed his warnings. This truth is still a source of encouragement to those called to proclaim the truth of God's Word in the midst of a perverse and wicked generation.

3. The nature of Ezekiel's ministry (2:8–3:11)

2:8–3:3 The Lord's charge to Ezekiel emphasizes the absolute necessity of hearing, understanding, and assimilating God's message prior to going forth as a spokesman for the Lord. Ezekiel was to listen to God (2:8a) and not rebel against him, as did the people of Israel, who failed to listen to his word.

Before beginning his ministry, Ezekiel was to symbolize his complete acceptance of the Lord's message by eating the scroll. The nature of the message he would proclaim was written on the scroll: funeral dirges, mournings, and lamentations. Certainly this was not a joyous note on which to begin. But even when the ministry would seem difficult and distasteful, the Lord would cause his word to be as sweet as honey.

4–9 The recipients' response to Ezekiel's messages was not to govern the nature or manner of his ministry. The people rejected the divine messenger because they had been alienated from God. Though Israel was obstinate, and though it would have been easier to preach to foreign people in a foreign language, Ezekiel was to be strong and not respond in fear and dismay. The Lord fully prepared Ezekiel for his task by making him more determined than the people of Israel—as sharp and hard as flint. The Lord always prepares and reassures his messengers with the needed equipment.

The Lord gave Ezekiel a scroll to eat, and then told him to go to speak the Lord's message to the house of Israel.

10–11 The word of the Lord had to become part of Ezekiel (cf. Jer 1:9) before he could "go" and "speak" (Eze 3:1). Thus the prophet was to meditate on the Lord's message, giving continual attention to it throughout his ministry. Only then would he be able to speak repeatedly with God's authority—even to audiences who did not care to listen to him.

4. The conclusion of the vision (3:12–15)

12–13 The vision concludes with Ezekiel's being raised up by the Spirit and hearing a final benediction that assured him that he had witnessed a revelation of God's glory. Ezekiel's transportation was not a case of hypnotism, autosuggestion, or the parapsychic phenomenon of bodily levitation. Rather, his transportation was in a vision, experienced under the compulsion of the Holy Spirit.

14–15 These verses recount Ezekiel's objection to his commission (the third element of the normal prophetic-call narrative; see comment on 1:1–14). As Ezekiel was brought back in the Spirit to the exiles at Tel Abib, he struggled with the distasteful ministry he had been called to. He was anguished and angry that he had to deliver a displeasing message to an unreceptive audience.

It took Ezekiel seven days to sort out his thoughts and feelings after having seen this vision. The Lord's hand was on him to control him as he sat appalled at the wonder and horror he had experienced. Ezekiel's condition and the period of seven days were instructive to the exiles: mourning for the dead normally took seven days (Ge 50:10; Nu 19:11; Job 2:13), as did the length of time for a priest's consecration (Lev 8:33). Ezekiel was being consecrated for the priesthood on his thirtieth birthday and commissioned to proclaim Judah's funeral dirge.

5. Ezekiel: a watchman to Israel (3:16–21)

16–17 Ezekiel's basic prophetic role was to be a watchman to the house of Israel (cf. chs. 18; 33). A watchman in OT times stood on the wall of the city as a sentry, watching for any threat to the city from without or within. If he saw an invading army on the horizon or any dangers within the city like fire or riots, he would immediately sound the alarm to warn the people (2Sa 18:24–27; 2Ki 9:17–20).

18–21 Ezekiel was to listen to the Lord and then warn the people of Judah concerning judgment on the horizon. His warning was based on the Mosaic covenant (Ex 20–Nu 9; Deuteronomy), which showed those in a relationship with the Lord how to live life in the best way. The covenant's righteous stipulations, lovingly given for the good of the people (Dt 5:28–33; 6:25; 10:12–13), enabled them to enter into all the blessings God desired to pour out on them (Lev 26:1–13; Dt 16:20; 28:1–14; Mal 3:10–12). If they disobeyed these ordinances and wandered from God's way of living, the Lord promised that he would lovingly discipline his people to cause them to return to the righteous life he prepared for their good (Lev 26:14–39; Dt 28:15–68). Ezekiel, therefore, was to warn Israel that God's inescapable discipline was coming.

Ezekiel's role as a watchman (cf. Isa 56:10; Jer 6:17; Hos 9:8) was not reprobative and injurious but corrective and beneficial. He was to warn the wicked that if they did not turn from their wickedness, they would die in unrighteousness. Likewise, Ezekiel admonished the righteous not to turn from their righteous ways—loyalty to the Mosaic code—and disobey God's commands; if they did, they would surely die. These warnings were directed to individuals.

When a righteous person turned from righteousness and did evil, God placed a "stumbling block" before him. That person had already turned from God's ways and done evil; so this stumbling block was not placed by God deliberately to cause him to fall into sin. Rather, it was an obstacle set into the path of this person to see how he would continue to respond. If he fell, then physical death came.

If a watchman saw a potential danger to a city and failed to warn its inhabitants, he was held responsible for the following destruction. So God warned Ezekiel that if he failed to warn the people of God's curse on disobedience, Ezekiel would be responsible for their death; Ezekiel himself would have to die for his negligence. Those charged with declaring God's word have a weighty responsibility to be faithful.

"Life" (GK 2649) and "death" (GK 4637) in this context must be understood as physical, not eternal. The concept of life and death in the Mosaic covenant is primarily physical. That covenant was given to guide those who had already entered into a relationship with God by faith. The Hebrews could live righteously and freely by keeping these commands (Lev 18:5; Dt 16:20). But if they disobeyed, physical death, resulting in a shortened life, was the normal result (Dt 30:15–20). The emphasis was on living a righteous life. This covenant pointed the people on to faith in the Messiah, whose work for salvation is pictured in the festive and sacrificial system (cf. Heb 9:6–10:18); but the keeping of the commandments of the law never provided salvation. Throughout the Scriptures, eternal salvation is always by faith, never by works of any kind.

6. Ezekiel's muteness (3:22–27)

22–23 Ezekiel's commission concluded with a second glimpse of God's glory. Ezekiel, obedient to the Lord's command, went out to the plain where God's glory appeared to him, as it did in the vision of ch. 1.

24–27 As Ezekiel fell down before God in true humility and reverence, the Spirit prepared him to receive the message that he was to deliver to the exiles (cf. 4:1–7:27). Ezekiel was directed to return home and shut himself up in his house. The exiles would tie him up with rope. Then the Lord would make Ezekiel mute so that he could not reprove the people unless God opened his mouth. Whenever God did so, Ezekiel would speak only in the Lord's authority, regardless of the people's response. The phrase "Whoever will listen let him listen" (a favorite saying of Christ) stresses individual responsibility to respond to the message.

Ezekiel's muteness would last approximately seven and one-half years, until the fall of Jerusalem (cf. dates in 1:1–3 with 33:21–22). Yet he would deliver several oral messages in the intervening period (cf. 11:25; 14:1; 20:1). The concept of muteness, therefore, was not one of total speechlessness throughout these years. Rather, Ezekiel was restrained from speaking publicly among the people, in contrast to the normal vocal ministry of the prophets. The prophets usually moved among their people, speaking God's message as they observed the contemporary situation. But Ezekiel would remain in his home, except to dramatize God's messages (cf. 4:1–5:17). He would remain silent, except when God opened his mouth to deliver a message. Then his mouth would be closed until the next time that the Lord chose for him to speak. Instead of Ezekiel's going to the people, the people had to come to him. Though this rebellious people initially rejected Ezekiel's ministry, the elders started sneaking away to seek the Lord's message from Ezekiel as contemporary world events began vindicating his divine warnings.

II. Judah's Iniquity and the Resulting Judgment (4:1–24:27)

Chapters 4–24 combine a series of oral messages and symbolic acts designed to warn the people of Judah that judgment was coming and to explain the reason for this imminent discipline. In chs. 4–7 Ezekiel dramatized the coming siege of Jerusalem (ch. 4) and the subsequent dispersion of the people in exile (ch. 5). He concluded the drama by declaring that this imminent judgment would destroy pagan idolatry. The exile could not be escaped through human efforts (chs. 6–7). The vision of God's glory reappeared to Ezekiel (ch. 8) to expose, by contrast, the defilement of Judah resulting from her current participation in idolatrous heathen rituals. Subsequently God's glory left Jerusalem and Judah, enabling God to pour out his wrath on Israel in accord with the Mosaic covenant (chs. 9–11). The exiles objected to this, but Ezekiel effectively answered their complaints (chs. 12–19). They were reminded that their history, characterized by unfaithfulness to their Lord and spiritual prostitution promulgated by corrupt leadership (chs. 20–23), condemned them. Chapter 24 concludes by vividly describing the fall of Jerusalem.

A. The Initial Warnings of the Watchman (4:1–7:27)

1. Monodramas of the siege of Jerusalem (4:1–5:17)

a. The brick and the plate (4:1–17)

1–3 The Lord showed Ezekiel the methods he was to use in warning of the impending siege of Jerusalem and the resulting exile. Though Ezekiel was mute, God directed him to act out the warnings (probably just outside Ezekiel's house; cf. 3:24–25). The exiles had observed Ezekiel's unique seven-day consecration (3:15–16). Now they would wonder what strange thing he would do next. The parables Ezekiel acted out demanded an audience.

Ezekiel took a clay brick and scratched on it a diagram of Jerusalem. Then he simulated a siege of the city with "siege works," "ramp" (or "mounds"), battering rams, and military encampments. With an iron plate between him and the city, Ezekiel played this war game with determination for 430 days while prophesying against Jerusalem (vv.6–7). All this was "a sign to the house of Israel" of the coming siege of Jerusalem.

The "iron pan" was the kind used only by the priests for certain offerings (Lev 2:5; 6:21; 7:9). It was placed between Ezekiel and the city inscribed on the clay brick. The "pan" was declared to be a "wall." Normally walls provided protection. The Lord had warned Ezekiel of the hostile reception of his ministry (cf. 2:6). Therefore, the imagery portrays either Ezekiel's protection as he acted out the siege or the siege wall around Jerusalem erected by the Babylonians.

4–8 After acting out Jerusalem's siege, Ezekiel was directed to dramatize the length of time that God's people would undergo punishment for their iniquity. He faced north first (symbolically toward Israel), lying on his left side for 390 days to represent the time for bearing the punishment for Israel's sins. When the 390 days were "finished," then Ezekiel would "lie down again," this time for forty days on his right side, facing south (symbolically toward Judah), to portray the punishment for Judah's wickedness. He would be bound in each of these positions so that he could not change sides until he had completed the allotted days to portray the siege for each nation respectively. Ezekiel need not have been on his side twenty-four hours each day. The rest of ch. 4 has him fixing meals, while in ch. 8 he sat in his house with the exilic elders during the final days of lying on his right side. Apparently a portion of each day sufficed to fulfill the symbolism.

Though the basic meaning of this section is clear, the numbers have given rise to many explanations. Certain things are plain: each day represents a year (vv.5–6; cf. Nu 14:34), and the years signify a period during which the people sinned. The numbers should be taken as literal periods of time, separated into two distinct and successive intervals of 390 and 40 years. Ezekiel's reference point for chronological determination is Jehoiachin's deportation of 597 B.C. This, therefore, suggests the starting point for measuring the time periods in these verses. The 430 years then denote the punishment inflicted by conquering foreign powers on the children of Israel and Judah from the deportation of Jehoiachin, their recognized king, to the inception of the Maccabean rebellion in 167 B.C. During the Maccabean period the Jews once again exercised dominion over Judah. Though this is a possible solution, we cannot be dogmatic about these numbers.

9–17 During the 390 days Ezekiel lay on his side acting out a "siege" of Jerusalem, God placed him on a strict diet. Ezekiel was to eat bread made from a mixture of several different grains. He would be rationed to two pints of water and one-half pound of bread for his daily food for over a year. This meager diet was to communicate the reality of the famine during the siege of Jerusalem. The Lord would "cut off the supply of food" in Jerusalem (as he promised in Lev 26:16, 20, 26, 29). There would be a scarcity of any one kind of grain for bread and also lack of water. The inhabitants of Jerusalem would rot away and look on one another in horror (cf. Lev 26:19, 35; 2Ki 25:3; Jer 34:17–22).

In addition to his beggarly sustenance, Ezekiel was to bake his rationed bread over a fire made unclean from human dung (cf. Dt 23:12–14). Though eating combined grains was acceptable, using human dung was defiling, for eating unclean food was forbidden by the Mosaic covenant (Lev 22:8; Dt 12:15–19; 14:21). Since Ezekiel, a faithful priest, had never eaten defiled food, he cried out to the Lord, requesting not to have to eat unclean food. God graciously permitted him to use the common fuel of cow's dung instead of human excrement. This unclean manner of preparing food described the Captivity that would follow the imminent siege and fall of Jerusalem. The captives would eat the defiled foods of the foreign nations they would be banished to.

God was not changing his law when he told Ezekiel to do all this. God temporarily caused Ezekiel to disregard the principle of eating unclean food to dramatize in an extreme way how abhorrent the Captivity would be. God used an acted parable to convey this truth in a way that would surely be understood; the eating of unclean food as a normal practice was not being condoned here. God sovereignly protected Ezekiel against any ill effects of eating defiled food.

b. The division of hair (5:1–4)

1 Ezekiel completed the drama begun in ch. 4 by shaving his head and beard, weighing the hair, and dividing it equally into three groups. This final act also pictured defilement. Shaving the head and beard was a pagan ritual for the dead (27:31; cf. Isa 22:12; Jer 16:16; Am 8:10), which the law forbade (Dt 14:1), and a sign of humiliation and disgrace (7:18; cf. 2Sa 10:4). If an Israelite priest shaved his head, he was defiled and no longer holy to the Lord (Lev 21:5). Ezekiel defiled and humiliated himself as a symbol of the humiliation of the people of Judah who were defiled and no longer holy to the Lord. Nothing was left to do but to mourn their death as a nation.

2–4 The hair symbolized the inhabitants of Jerusalem. One-third of them would be burned when Jerusalem was burned after the siege (2Ki 25:9). Part of these people would have already died through famine and distress during the siege (v.12a). The second third of the inhabitants would die by the sword when Jerusalem fell (v.12b; 2Ki 25:18–21a; 2Ch 36:17). The final third would be scattered to the wind in exile (v.12c; 2Ki 25:11, 21b). A portion from this last group would be judged by fire as they left Jerusalem, while some would die by the sword in captivity. Out of this final third, the Lord would deliver a remnant of Jerusalem's citizens—depicted by Ezekiel's placing a few hairs from this group securely into the hem of his garment.

c. The significance of the symbolic acts (5:5–17)

5 The Lord emphasizes the recipient of the siege and the coming judgments by the statement, "This is Jerusalem." Immediately one's attention was brought back to the city etched on the clay brick in 4:1. Jerusalem was the object of God's love. However, all these symbolic actions demonstrated what would happen to her.

6–7 A judgment speech—with accusations against Jerusalem enumerated and a verdict pronounced—reinforced the monodrama. The basic accusation was that Jerusalem, this blessed city, had responded to God's blessing by rebelling against his commandments, refusing his ways, and failing to live life according to the Mosaic covenant. She had become so wicked that she did not even adhere to the common laws of the nations around her. Some of Jerusalem's inhabitants would resort to cannibalism during the coming siege (v.10a; cf. Lev 26:29; Dt 28:53; 2Ki 6:28–29; Jer 19:9; La 4:10). They had already defiled his holy sanctuary with detestable idolatry (v.11a; ch. 8).

8–17 God would execute the judgments pronounced in the Mosaic covenant on Jerusalem in the sight of the nations. Never again would he execute a judgment like this. He would withdraw himself from the sanctuary (cf. 10:4; 11:22–23) to pour out his judgment without pity. One-third of the inhabitants of Jerusalem would die in the city through disease and famine; one-third would die by the sword; and a remnant would be scattered in every direction among the nations. Famine, wild beasts, plagues, and bloodshed would all be part of Jerusalem's judgment (cf. Lev 26:21–26). The land of Judah would become a desolation, causing the nations to ridicule her because of what God had done to her. At the same time these nations would be struck with fear and terror at God's justice and wrath even on his very own people. Judah's judgment served to warn these nations of the judgments God would bring on them if they cursed Israel (cf. Ge 12:3). As a result of this judgment, God's justice would be satisfied and the people of Jerusalem would know that the Lord had executed his wrath. The punishment was certain. The Lord had spoken!

2. The coming judgment on the land of Judah (6:1–7:27)

a. Destruction of pagan religious shrines (6:1–14)

1–7 God interrupted Ezekiel's muteness to announce judgment on Judah's mountains, hills, ravines, and valleys. Ezekiel set his face against these four geographical features of the land, for it was in them that the pagans normally established their religious shrines (cf. 2Ki 23:10). Canaanite religion—with its perverted emphasis on sex, war, cults of the dead, snake worship, and idolatry—preferred high places and groves of trees for its place of worship. Manasseh, king of Judah (695–642 B.C.), had led in the resurgence of these pagan cults.

The Lord next pronounced judgment on the heathen shrines and their cultic practices that had been adopted by his people. He would remove the temptation facing them by destroying all the "high places," "altars," "incense altars," and "idols." These shrines would become desecrated by the scattering of bones of the dead around them. The "scattering of bones" is a phrase used for judgment in which uncleanness and shame are conveyed (cf. Pss 53:5; 141:7). The bones would be those of the Israelites who had become engrossed in these pagan practices (cf. 2Ki 23:20; Jer 8:1–2). The Lord was faithful to his promise in Lev 26:30; he refused to allow anything to take his rightful place. Through this discipline Judah would know that he was the only God.

8–10 God always accompanies his pronouncements of judgment with the proclamation of a way to escape—by turning to the Lord and following his ways (cf. Jer 18:7–10). Thus within Ezekiel's judicial sentence was the Lord's assurance that some of the exiles would see the wickedness of their ways and be ashamed. They would remember the Lord and recognize that he did not speak in vain when he instructed his people to live righteously or they would suffer the threatened discipline. This remnant would respond to God's discipline and repent of the spiritual fornication that had grieved the Lord. They would come to know that their God truly is the Lord. The whole purpose of God's judgment was to bring his people back to him.

11–14 Reverting to his theme of impending judgment, the Lord instructs Ezekiel to demonstrate joy because of the coming judgment. Clapping the hands and stamping the feet signify either joyful praise or derision over sin and judgment (21:14–17; 22:13; 25:6; cf. La 2:15; Na 3:19). Ezekiel exhibits God's delight over the comprehensive eradication of pagan shrines and practices from the land. The entire land would become as desolate as the desert toward Diblah. Everyone would be touched by the judgment: the distant ones by disease, the near ones by the sword, the remainder outside and inside Jerusalem by famine. Four times God directed Ezekiel to remind the exiles that the purpose for God's judgment was to restore his hearers to an experiential knowledge of God (vv.7, 10, 13, 14). This major thrust of the book called for an intimate relationship with the Lord rather than a destructive allegiance to impotent idols.

In every generation God's judgment and discipline are misunderstood by most people. God's chief desire is to bring people to himself—or back to himself. When humankind willfully refuses to turn to him, God mercifully uses discipline and judgment to cause the people to recognize that he is the only true God, always faithful to what he has said in his word!

b. The imminency and comprehensiveness of the curse (7:1–13)

1–4 God now gives a second message to Ezekiel, containing four brief, intensive prophetic speeches in poetic form that emphasize the imminency and comprehensiveness of the coming judgment on all Judah. Numerous short sentences and the repetition of words and phrases express the intensity of the message. The recurrence of the word "end" (GK 7891) stresses the finality of the judgment. Judgment had come! Imminency was heightened by the reiteration of the verb "coming," the repetition of "now," and the use of terms like "time," "day," and "is near."

The first prophetic speech (vv.1–4) emphasizes the extent—"the four corners of the land"—of the judgment and its basis; two main points summarize the reasons for judgment. Judah would be judged according to her wicked ways. Her abominations would be brought on her. The Exile would bring the Judeans into countries where the same abominable practices they had taken part in were a daily occurrence. The expectation was that this would cause them to detest such wicked rituals. Furthermore, the Lord would have pity on no one. He would not spare them. Though his forbearance and compassion had withheld discipline, such restraint would no longer continue. God's judgment genuinely manifested his love, for its purpose was to cause Judah to know that he is God.

5–9 The second oracle emphasizes the horror and surprise of the judgment as well as the person of the judge. The terror that would fill the land is stressed by the repetition of the words "disaster" and "end," in addition to the announcement that the judgment would be a time of panic, not joy like that experienced at harvest festivals (cf. Isa 16:10; Jer 25:30). The unexpectedness (chs. 12–19) of judgment is reflected by a play on words in "the end has come' and "roused itself," as well as by phrases such as "Doom has come," "time has come," and "the day is near." Verses 8–9 give the basis for the judgment stated in vv.3–4. The message closed by stunning the exiles with a new name for God: "The LORD who strikes the blow"—the one who would now judge Judah.

10–11 The third oracle focuses on the imminency, comprehensiveness, and readiness of judgment. The dawn of the judgment day had arrived; it had suddenly "budded" and "blossomed." The "rod" is either Nebuchadnezzar as the instrument of judgment or the insolence of the kings of Israel. The only passage in Scripture referring to a "budded rod" is Nu 17, where God used such a rod to denote his choice. But since judgment on Judah is described here, it would seem best to understand the "rod" as an instrument of judgment that had been divinely chosen and was ready for use. The concept of the budding rod stands in parallelism with the previous line of the poem (indicating imminency) and the following line (describing the nature of the rod God would use to discipline Judah—a rod of "arrogance"). Nebuchadnezzar fits the description of this rod as an instrument of judgment. God would use this weapon to devastate the land until nothing of value was left.

12–13 The last oracle emphasizes the permanency and quickness of the judgment. Its suddenness is illustrated by the inability one had to regain what one had sold because of the rapidity of the coming discipline. Most likely this example was given with the law of the sabbatical year (Dt 15:1–2) or the Year of Jubilee in mind (Lev 25:13–16). According to that law, if one sold land to pay for a debt, that land reverted to him on the sabbatical year or the Year of Jubilee, whichever came first. Ezekiel maintained that if one sold land under this arrangement, he would not realize its return since neither he nor the buyer would be in the land of Judah seven years hence. Though the buyer might rejoice over the fact that he would never have to return the land, it would not be a time of rejoicing for either party. When judgment came, neither would own the property. Babylon would possess it!

The vision of judgment was certain! God would not repeal it! No one would be able to continue to live in iniquity, for all wickedness would be judged.

c. The response to the curse (7:14–27)

14–18 The last half of this chapter vividly describes the reactions of the Judeans to this swift and violent judgment. Moral dissipation, famine, and disease had so decimated the nation that they would be unable to muster an army when the trumpet sounded for battle. Therefore the Babylonians would easily approach Jerusalem for the siege (cf. Lev 26:7).

Disease and hunger would slay those within Jerusalem, and the sword would catch by surprise those working outside the walls. Any fortunate enough to escape the initial invasion would flee to the hills. There, shuddering in fear, weak and dismayed, they would be ashamed of and humiliated by their sins that brought this destruction. They would put on sackcloth in mourning, shave their heads in humiliation, and moan like doves.

19 Nothing could deliver the Israelites from God's awesome wrath demonstrated in Jerusalem and Judah's destruction in 586 B.C. Many of the inhabitants had lived for wealth so long that material gain had become an obsession to them. Yet in the judgment these riches would mean nothing. Idolatry, wickedness, and materialism had robbed them of everything and led them into judgment. Money would be thrown away like something sexually unclean.

20–22 Judah had profaned her sanctuary. The "beautiful jewelry" refers to Jerusalem and her temple; "my treasured place" likewise refers to the temple when connected with the full discussion of Jerusalem's fall (see 24:21, 25). The people had taken ornaments and treasures from the temple and defiled God's temple by using them to make idols. Ironically, God would now allow foreigners to profane the temple, plundering its treasures. Everything would become spoil for Babylon.

23–24 "Chains" were prepared to bind the captives for deportation to Babylonia. This was their due for the violent crimes they had committed. As the Judeans were leaving, the worst foreigners among the nations would enter and possess the land, profaning their holy places. The land would come under Babylonian dominion.

25–27 The last response for some was to seek help. People would run to the prophet in hope of a visionary revelation of deliverance, to the priest for messages from the law that might help, or to the elders for counsel in this time of distress. None could offer help. They had no answers at all! The leadership had failed in its responsibility to lead the people in God's ways. It was too late! The anguish of judgment had come! If the people had sought peace earlier, it would have been available; but now there was no peace. Kings and princes would be horrified and mourn. God had judged Israel by her own judgments—by the Mosaic covenant they should have known and followed. The only redeeming factor was that they would learn that the Lord truly was God and that his covenants were to be obeyed!

B. The Vision of the Exodus of God's Glory (8:1–11:25)

1. The idolatry of the house of Israel (8:1–18)

a. The image of jealousy (8:1–6)

1–6 Verse 1 describes the single vision of chs. 8–11. The date was "in the sixth year, in the sixth month on the fifth day" (August/September), 592 B.C. The recipient was Ezekiel. He received the vision while sitting in his house with the elders of Judah sitting before him. God's hand came on Ezekiel, causing him to be caught up into the vision. From the chronological notices of 1:1–3 and 8:1, it appears that he received his vision about fourteen months into his symbolic siege of Jerusalem. He was still lying daily on his right side, bearing the iniquity of Judah (cf. 4:6). Most likely the elders had been watching this performance, wondering whether anything new would happen. It was fitting for Ezekiel to be on his right side when this vision of Judah's judgment appeared to him.

In light of the distance and time involved, these elders were not contemporary elders in Judah who had come from Judah to Babylonia to seek counsel from Ezekiel. Moreover, the depraved character of the Judean elders revealed in this vision would not have led them to take such an arduous journey to Babylonia for genuine spiritual reasons. Rather, the elders sitting before Ezekiel were the leaders of the Judean exiles in Babylonia who had already been deported from Judah in the captivities of Daniel (605 B.C.) and Jehoiachin (597 B.C.).

The vision's primary thrust was to make known the cause of the coming judgment on Jerusalem. The political rulers, the prophets, and the priests were expected to lead Judah in her holy ways. In this vision Ezekiel saw the contrast between God's glory in the sanctuary and the extreme moral and spiritual corruption of the nation's leadership. The latter was the main cause for God's judgment on Jerusalem. In ch. 8 the abominable idolatry as practiced by Judah's leaders in the temple precinct was exposed. Chapters 9–11 depict the judgment of a holy God on the unholy perversion described in ch. 8. Progressively God's glory is removed from Jerusalem and Judah. Appointed men are sent to pour out fiery judgment on this wicked idolatry and its proponents. The Judean leaders are singled out for special condemnation in 11:14–21, but the faithful remnant who repented of their sinful ways are marked for protection (9:4) and reassured of their ultimate restoration and cleansing (11:14–21).

The vision begins in vv.1–6 with Ezekiel seeing the same manifestation of God's glory that he had seen on the river Kebar in chs. 1–3. In the vision of ch. 8, the likeness of a man of the same appearance as the one in the vision of ch. 1 (cf. 1:27) caught Ezekiel by his hair and transported him by the Spirit to Jerusalem in the vision. In Jerusalem Ezekiel saw God's glory in the temple. Such glorious splendor stood in stark contrast to the religious perversion being practiced in the temple area.

Ezekiel found himself standing at the entrance of the inner court's north gate, known also as the altar gate, because the altar of sacrifice was located just inside that gate (cf. Lev 1:11). He stood in the outer court at the gate's entrance, not in the inner court. As he looked northward into the outer court, he saw the "idol of jealousy." This idol provoked the Lord to jealousy, for he had declared in the Mosaic covenant that he alone was God (Ex 20:1–3) and that all idolatry was forbidden (Dt 4:16; 32:16, 21). The idol's description is vague; thus it cannot be identified with certainty. Possibly it is a reestablishment of the idol of Asherah, the mother-goddess of the Canaanite pantheon, which Manasseh had erected in the temple (2Ki 21:7; 2Ch 33:7) but later removed (2Ch 33:15). This image certainly had its attraction in Israelite history, for Josiah had also had to remove it in his reformation (2Ki 23:6). Jeremiah's denunciation of the worship of the Queen of Heaven may also relate to this image (Jer 7:18; 44:17–30).

The statement "But you will see things that are even more detestable" concludes this brief examination of the "idol of jealousy." This conclusion emphasizes the progressive severity of Judah's idolatry (vv.6, 13, 15).

b. Idol worship of the elders (8:7–13)

7–9 Ezekiel was brought into the north entry gate. There he saw a hole in the wall and was told to dig through the wall, enter, and observe what the elders of Israel were doing secretly in the inner court. These seventy elders were most likely the leaders of the nation who based their traditional position on Moses' appointment of the seventy elders to assist him in governing God's people (Ex 24:1, 9; Nu 11:16–25).

10–11 Jaazaniah, the son of Shaphan (possibly the son of Josiah's secretary of state; see 2Ki 22:8–14; 2Ch 34:15–21; Jer 26:24; 29:3; et al.), was leading these men in burning incense to all sorts of sculptured animals, reptiles, and detestable things. Perhaps the detestable things were the animals declared unclean in Lev 11.

12–13 The Judean leaders were practicing their corrupt worship of these idols in the dark, each in his own room. These individual chambers are difficult to explain. Were they built into the wall that separated the inner and outer courts, or were they rooms in the private homes of each elder, indicating that each was engaged in this perverse ritual privately as well as publicly? Contextually, the former is preferable, though no such chambers were known to have existed within the inner court of Solomon's temple.

These leaders rationalized their activities by declaring that God did not see them nor was he present anymore. He had forsaken the land, as demonstrated by the deportations of 605 B.C. and 597 B.C. They denied the existence of God in direct opposition to his name: "the one who always is." They negated his omnipresence and omniscience, choosing to exchange "the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like . . . birds and animals and reptiles" (Ro 1:23). In saying that God had forsaken the land, the elders repudiated his faithfulness to the Abrahamic covenant, his love for his chosen people, and his immutability. With this kind of rationalization, they permitted themselves to do anything they desired. If God did not exist, then no one need care about him.

c. Tammuz worship of the women (8:14–15)

14–15 Leaving the inner court and the iniquity of the elders, Ezekiel returned to the entry way of the inner court's north gate, where he observed women worshiping Tammuz, an ancient Akkadian deity, the husband and brother of Ishtar. Tammuz, later linked to Adonis and Aphrodite by name, was a god of fertility and rain, similar to Hadad and Baal. In the seasonal mythological cycle, he died early in the fall when vegetation withered. His revival, by the wailing of Ishtar, was marked by the buds of spring and the fertility of the land. Such renewal was encouraged and celebrated by licentious fertility festivals.

The date of this vision was in the months of August/September, when this god Tammuz "died." At the time of this vision, the land of Palestine would have been parched from the summer sun, and the women would have been lamenting Tammuz's death. They perhaps were also following the ritual of Ishtar, wailing for the revival of Tammuz. But there were still greater abominations for Ezekiel to see (cf. vv.6, 13).

d. Sun worship (8:16–18)

16 Ezekiel returned to the temple's inner court, where he noticed twenty-five men with their backs to the temple, facing east in sun worship. The identity of these men is unsure. Possibly they were part of the seventy elders just mentioned. But it would seem strange that only a portion of the seventy would have been engaged in the sun worship. Moreover, since this was the inner court and only priests were permitted access into that court (2Ch 4:9; Joel 2:17), they may have been priests (though, to be sure, the seventy elders of Israel had just been seen practicing their idolatry within the inner court). The specific numbers of seventy (v.11) and twenty-five are probably given to aid in distinguishing the two groups. Therefore, it is more likely that these "twenty-five men" are priests. If so, the number twenty-five suggests that there was one representative of each of the twenty-four courses of the priests plus the high priest (cf. 1Ch 23). Regardless of their identity, sun worship was strictly forbidden by the Mosaic covenant (Dt 4:19); and both Hezekiah and Josiah had had to remove this pagan practice from Judah during their reigns (2Ki 23:5, 11; 2Ch 29:6–7).

17–18 These verses summarize this chapter of perverse idolatry by declaring that this wickedness of Judah's leaders had allowed violence to fill the land. All this had repeatedly provoked God. They were even "putting the branch [GK 2367] to their nose." This phrase is problematic. The word's normal reading is "twig." Possibly putting the twig to the nose was part of the ritual practice of sun worship, a concept that fits this context well. Regardless, the context implies that the act was offensive to God.

All these abominable, idolatrous rituals brought the wrath of a holy God. He would judge without compassion. He would refuse to listen to the people's cries for mercy, even though they shouted with a very loud voice. Judgment would come! The remainder of the vision continues to emphasize that point.

2. Judgment on Jerusalem and the departure of God's glory (9:1–11:23)

a. The man with the writing kit (9:1–4)

1–2 As Ezekiel stood in the temple's inner courtyard, aghast by the abominations being practiced, the Lord announced the coming of the city's executioners. Ezekiel saw them enter the "upper gate," equivalent to the inner court's north gate (cf. 2Ki 15:35; 2Ch 27:3; Jer 20:2; 36:10). Each executioner carried a lethal weapon in his hand. They gathered together and stood beside the bronze altar. Among them was a man clothed in linen and carrying a writing kit.

Ezekiel 8:18 provides a transition in the vision, where God announced judgment on Jerusalem. He would execute it through these seven men (six executioners and the man in linen). A holy and righteous God would not allow idolatry to rob him of his rightful place as Israel's true God. The basis of the judgment was God's glory and holiness as seen in the theophany of glory and the linen clothing of the man with the writing kit. Linen was often worn by divine messengers (cf. Da 10:5; Rev 15:6) and was used for priestly garments (Ex 28:42); thus linen portrays the purity and holiness of God. On the other hand, judgment was stressed by these men gathering at the bronze altar, the altar of sacrificial judgment, ready to execute their assigned task.

3 The glorious God prepared to delegate the execution of this judgment to these men as he arose from above the cherubim and proceeded to the temple's threshold. Most likely God's glory, envisioned in the man of 8:2, had separated from the cherubim throne-chariot in the vision and moved from the Most Holy Place (cf. 8:4) to the temple threshold. From there the picture of God's departure from his people in preparation for judgment began. With judgment imminent, God's glory could not be present over the ark of the covenant in the Most Holy Place or in the presence of the divine Judge. Therefore, the Lord vividly demonstrated his readiness to judge the people by withdrawing his glory from the Most Holy Place to the entry of the temple, in order to assign the tasks of judgment.

4 The Lord commanded the man clothed with linen and carrying the scribal implements to go throughout Jerusalem and mark everyone who had genuine remorse and concern for the sins of the city, who saw that the heathen ways of Jerusalem were contrary to the Mosaic covenant, and who desired to see that covenant properly instituted in the city. This man marked them on their forehead with a mark of protection as the impending judgment drew near (cf. Rev 7:3; 9:4; 14:1). These people had a righteous heart attitude.

b. The executioners' judgment (9:5–8)

5–7 God commanded the six men to follow the man with the scribal kit throughout Jerusalem and to exercise individual judgment on everyone who did not have the mark of protection, regardless of sex or age. They were to spare none. They began with the seventy elders polluting the temple with their secret worship of sculptured animals in the inner court. Judgment started in the temple (cf. 1Pe 4:17), the center from which religious leadership should come. However, Judah's leadership had become corrupt. Therefore, the temple courtyards would be defiled by the blood of these worshipers of heathen deities (cf. Nu 19:11; 2Ki 23:16).

8 As Ezekiel found himself the only inner-court survivor of the judgment, he became alarmed at the mass of people destroyed by these executioners. Although he could appear hard, his heart throbbed with love for God and his people. He pleaded with God not to eradicate the entire remnant of Judah. She was the only tribe left, and some of that tribe had gone into exile to Babylonia already (605 B.C. and 597 B.C.). The present judgment, illustrated by these six men, looked as if it would consume the remainder of Judah.

c. Vindication of God's judgment (9:9–11)

9–10 The Lord's response to Ezekiel's concern for the nation was to remind him that the iniquity of Judah was extremely great. Violence and spiritual perversion had filled the land because the people had forgotten God's character, assuming that he did not see what they were doing because he had deserted them. They denied God's omniscience, omnipresence, and faithfulness. The Lord had not left, because he presently was judging Judah for her iniquity and would not spare anyone. He did know the wickedness of the people, for he would recompense them for it.

11 As an encouragement to Ezekiel that all Judah had not strayed from God, the man with the writing kit reported, "I have done as you commanded." In other words, the righteous ones had been marked.

d. Coals of fire on Jerusalem (10:1–7)

1–2 God instructed the man clothed in linen to take fire coals from the center of the cherubim chariot (cf. ch. 1) and to pour them out in judgment on the city to purify it (cf. Isa 6).

4–5 This parenthesis clarifies the setting. The cherubim throne-chariot was in the inner courtyard to the south of the temple. The temple precinct had been cleansed by the six men, and God's glory had moved to the temple door. From there it filled the temple and the courts.

6–7 The man in linen faithfully responded to the Lord's command to take coals from the cherubim. The cherub was probably the living being with a face like a "cherub." He handed the live coals to the man in linen.

e. Cherubim and Ichabod (10:8–22)

8–17, 20–22 The living beings of ch. 1 are identified as "cherubim" (GK 4131) in this passage. Cherubim appear elsewhere in the Scriptures, though they were new to the discussion in Ezekiel. In the ancient Near East, a winged sphinx with a human head and a lion's or bull's body was often identified as a "cherub." The OT cherubim are primarily represented as guardians and protectors (cf. Ge 3:24), though they also performed worship on the mercy seat of the ark of the covenant (Ex 25:18–20). Perhaps as a throne-chariot (cf. 1Sa 4:4; 2Sa 6:2; 2Ki 19:15; 1Ch 13:6; 1Ch 28:18; Pss 18:10; 80:1; 99:1), they were protectors and guardians of God's glory.

18–19 A principal theme in this vision and in the book of Ezekiel is the departure and return of God's glory. It departed from the temple because of the corruption within Jerusalem and Judah, but it would return in the end time when the nation had been fully cleansed (cf. 43:1–9). The gradual departure of God's glory began in 9:3 and 10:4, when the glory of God left the Most Holy Place and moved to the temple's entrance. God's glory departed from the temple's threshold and assumed its place on the cherubim throne-chariot. Together they went to the temple's east gate, from where they finally departed (cf. 11:22–23). Scripture declares (Dt 31:17; Hos 9:12) that this departure would occur if the people strayed from God's ways. In 1Sa 4 a similar example of the departure of God's glory at a time of judgment was memorialized by the name of Eli's grandson "Ichabod" (v.21), which means "inglorious." Once again, in Ezekiel's day God was writing "Ichabod" over Jerusalem and Judah.

f. Judgment on Jerusalem's leaders (11:1–13)

1 As Ezekiel watched God's glory move to the east gate of the temple complex, the Spirit brought him to that gate. Here God showed Ezekiel more of the perversion of the nation's leadership. Twenty-five men were gathered together, led by Jaazaniah, the son of Azzur, and Pelatiah, the son of Benaiah, leaders of the people (these twenty-five political leaders were different from the twenty-five sun worshipers of 8:16).

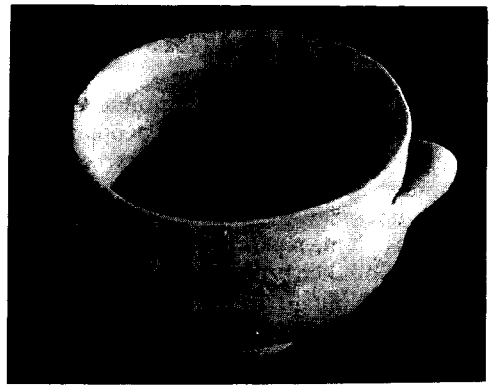
2–3 These leaders had given the people false and evil counsel. They had planned evil things, deceiving the inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judah by encouraging them to build homes at a time when the prophets were continually warning of the impending Babylonian destruction. These leaders were complacent and apathetic, believing that there was no imminent danger. They declared that Jerusalem's inhabitants were secure inside Jerusalem's walls by promulgating the proverb: "This city is a cooking pot, and we are the meat." Jerusalem, "the pot," provided security to its inhabitants, "the meat," just as a pot protects the meat within it. Prophets like Ezekiel were declared to be misguided men using scare tactics.

4–6 Ezekiel prophesies to these twenty-five men with a judgment oracle; the accusation is stated in vv.5–6 and the verdict in vv.7–12. He reminds these leaders that their actions were not hidden from God; he knew exactly what they were thinking, saying, and doing. He knew they had rejected the prophets' warnings, exchanged the righteous statutes of the law for idolatry, and murdered the inhabitants of Jerusalem with their devious schemes.

7–12 The verdict was expressed in the same imagery as the people's proverbial statements in v.3. The "pot" of Jerusalem would protect only the righteous whom these wicked leaders had already slain. These corrupt leaders and their followers would be brought outside the "pot" of Jerusalem and struck down by the dreaded sword of foreigners. Babylonia would execute this judgment, slaying the Judeans throughout the land (cf. 2Ki 25:18–21). With the fall of Jerusalem to Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C., the Judean leaders and their subjects would know that the Lord was truly the Lord. They would observe that he faithfully executed the righteous judgment he had declared would come on those who failed to live according to his statutes. If Israel would obey, she would live (Lev 18:5).



Large cooking pots, some of them completely intact, are often found while excavating biblical sites.

But she had chosen rather to live by the idolatrous ways of the nations around her and to receive the law's curse instead of its blessing.

13 While Ezekiel was prophesying this message to the leaders, Pelatiah died. He did not actually hear Ezekiel's prophecy, but news of Pelatiah's death helped confirm Ezekiel as a prophet. This stunning result of his prophecy caused Ezekiel to fear once again that God would destroy all the remnant of Israel.

g. The future of the remnant (11:14–21)

14–15 Ezekiel's great concern for the remnant of Judah had not gone unnoticed by the Lord. God encouraged him in this message that he and a remnant, his kindred, were purposely being kept by God through the Captivity. The citizens of Judah had looked on the exiles as the unclean and sinful part of the nation. Was not God judging them by their deportation? The Judeans encouraged the exiles to get as far away from the land of Israel as possible, because God had given it to those still in Judah, not to the sinful exiles.

16–20 On the contrary, God now shows that it was the deported remnant that he cared for; and he shows his care by promising to regather the exiles to the Promised Land. This is the first mention of a future restoration in Ezekiel. Many of the prophets held out restoration as a continual hope to the righteous. On the basis of the Mosaic covenant, judgment was all the prophets could offer Judah for her sins. The promise of restoration to the land, though declared in the blessings of the Mosaic covenant (Lev 26:40–45; Dt 30:1–10), was based on the eternal covenants to Abraham (Ge 12:1–3), David (2Sa 7:12–16), and Jeremiah (Jer 31:31–34).

In exile the Lord would continue to be an ever-present sanctuary for his people, making provisions for them no matter where they were scattered. This is the same ever-present God who today meets the needs of those who trust him, regardless of their circumstances. God then promises that when he finished disciplining the remnant of Israel, he would (1) regather them, (2) restore them to the land of Israel, (3) cleanse the land of its abominations, and (4) fulfill the new covenant with them.

The new covenant promised in Jer 31:31–34 provided for a change of heart and a new spirit. This new spirit would be the outpouring of the Spirit promised by the prophets (Dt 30:6; Jer 31:33; Joel 2:28–29), further developed in Eze 36:26–27, and initially instituted in Ac 2. The new heart and spirit would replace Israel's old heart of stone (Zec 7:12), which had become so hardened against the Lord and his ways. The people would be empowered to live in the godly manner set forth in the stipulations of the Mosaic covenant. Finally they would truly reflect the Mosaic covenant formula: they would be God's people, and he would be their God.

Through his death for sin once for all, Christ, the Mediator of the new covenant (Heb 8:6), has made it possible for all believers to receive the Spirit's divine enablement so that they too may live according to God's righteous standards. This is available to all who place their faith in the resurrected Messiah, Jesus Christ.

21 However, God warns those who do not repent and follow him that they will be held accountable and will be judged.

h. The departure of the Lord's glory from Jerusalem (11:22–25)

22–25 After God had encouraged Ezekiel about the future restoration of the Judean remnant, his glory departed east from Jerusalem to the Mount of Olives. His presence among Israel is hereafter pictured as removed (until his return in 43:1–4). Judgment was now certain! Ezekiel was brought back to Babylonia in the vision, and the vision stopped. He then recounted the entire vision to the exiles who had been observing his symbolic siege and had seen him caught up in the vision.

C. The Lord's Reply to the Exiles' Invalid Rationalizations of Hope (12:1–19:14)

1. The dramatic tragedy of exile (12:1–20)

a. Introduction (12:1–2)

1–2 The introductory phrase indicates the beginning of a new series of messages. Ezekiel always gives specific dates for new visions or oracles. Since no new chronological notice is given, and since the speeches of chs. 12–19 are closely related thematically to the foregoing vision, presumedly these messages were uttered shortly after Ezekiel's explanation of the vision in chs. 8–11.

God immediately reminded Ezekiel that he lived among "a rebellious people." Ezekiel had been warned of this in his commission (2:3–8), but now he would experience that reality. The exiles had been watching his symbolic acts and hearing his judgment oracles for over a year. He had communicated the imminency of the judgment, its severity, and its basis (chs. 4–11) through every possible means. Though the elders had ears and eyes, they had neither heard his messages nor seen his visual signs in chs. 8–11 (cf. Isa 6:9–10; Jer 5:21). Ezekiel had to speak to this rebellion.

The exiles had not grasped the serious consequences of Ezekiel's warnings. They still hoped for an early return to Palestine, for they viewed the continued preservation of Jerusalem and Judah as signs of security. After all, Jerusalem was the eternal city. They presented several reasons for their hope and security—as well as their objections to Ezekiel's warning—in chs. 12–19.

First, if judgment was to come, it would not be in their lifetime, as Ezekiel had declared (ch. 12). Second, Ezekiel was only one of many prophets. Most prophets and prophetesses announced hope and reasons for optimism. Why should the people listen to Ezekiel (ch. 13)? Third, the leaders in Judah were ultimately responsible. If there was to be any judgment, it would be on them, not the exiles (ch. 14). Fourth, if real danger of judgment should exist, then they would only have to find some righteous man to intercede for them before God, and they would be delivered (ch. 14). Fifth, how could Ezekiel possibly believe that God would judge his own chosen people? He would not do that (chs. 15–16). Sixth, it would not be fair for God to judge anyone for his forefathers' sins. The people thought Ezekiel was saying just the opposite (ch. 17). Seventh, if judgment was really coming, then there was nothing they could do to stop it; for they would be paying for their fathers' sins. It would not make any difference if they repented (ch. 18). Eighth, Zedekiah, the contemporary ruler of Judah, could be trusted. He would throw off the yoke of Babylonia (ch. 19).

Ezekiel patiently, systematically, and adamantly challenged the naive reasoning of the exiles, undermining each source of their optimistic rejection to his warnings of judgment. When Ezekiel had finished his challenges, no excuses remained.

A basic pattern is noticeable in the structure of Ezekiel's prophecy: each vision is followed by a message that expands and develops the concepts in the vision. The vision of Ezekiel's commission (chs. 1–3), for example, was followed by the announcements of judgment on Jerusalem. The vision of Jerusalem's religious corruption in the temple and judgment in chs. 8–11 is now elaborated in chs. 12–19, which develops the wickedness of all leaders in Judah (kings, prophets, and priests) as the core of the nation's iniquity. These chapters emphasize corrupt leadership and reasons for the coming judgment.

b. A picture of deportation (12:3–16)

3–7 Ezekiel's symbolic acts undoubtedly drew curious spectators. Even though the exiles had failed to grasp the significance of Ezekiel's previous messages, once again God graciously sought to convey his warnings to them. Maybe they would understand this time. The Lord repeatedly encouraged Ezekiel to perform new dramas for everyone to see. Ezekiel would be a "sign" to them.

Therefore, Ezekiel is told to act out something familiar to everyone watching: the process of deportation. During the day he gathered the small amount of belongings a deportee could take with him and brought them out where everyone could see them. In the evening he dug a hole through the mud-brick wall of his house. Leaving through the hole, Ezekiel carried his bag like an exile. Next he covered his face and went to another place while all the people watched. Ezekiel's act was a "sign" (GK 4603) that God would bring additional exiles to Babylon.

8–16 Since all the exiles had participated in a deportation themselves (either in 605 B.C. or 597 B.C.), they should have understood clearly Ezekiel's picture of deportation. God reminded Ezekiel that many had not understood the drama, for they were asking, "What are you doing?" Therefore, Ezekiel explained his dramatization so none would miss its meaning.

Ezekiel prophesied deportation of a remnant from Jerusalem in 586 B.C., especially as it related to Zedekiah, the current Judean ruler. Ezekiel told the captives that he was a "sign" to them of the exile that the current inhabitants of Jerusalem would soon experience. His message probably shattered any hope that they might have had that he was portraying their imminent departure from Babylonia back to the Promised Land.

Zedekiah was called "the prince" because he was not the legitimate king. That right belonged to Jehoiachin who was in Babylonia. Zedekiah would load his bags at night (2Ki 25:4; Jer 39:4; 52:7), escape with difficulty through the gates of the king's garden in southeast Jerusalem, and flee toward the Jordan, where he would be caught by Nebuchadnezzar's army like an animal on the hunt. The figure of a conqueror catching enemies in a net is from the imagery of the fowler or hunter in the ancient Near East. Zedekiah's troops would be scattered, and he would be brought before Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah. There his sons and the nobles would be slaughtered before his eyes, after which he would be blinded. Therefore Zedekiah would never see the land of Babylonia, though he would die there as a captive (cf. 2Ki 25:5, 7; Jer 39:6–7; 52:8, 10–11). Ezekiel's covering of his face in the dramatization likely indicated that Zedekiah would seek to disguise himself in his flight from the city. That in fleeing he "will not see" the land with his eyes would correlate with Zedekiah's blinding and deportation.

Moreover, God wanted to make clear the purpose of the Exile. The deportations were designed to show the deportees that the Lord was the faithful, loving, and powerful God over Israel, to which they would return. Lest the foreign nations misunderstand Judah's dispersion, God had the exiles testify that their abominations precipitated the deportations. In this way the nations would realize that the Lord was holy and righteous, and that he cared for his people. This would correct the common notion in the ancient Near East that a nation that was conquered was serving gods who were either powerless or no longer cared about their people. To prevent such a misconception, the Lord would send a remnant of Jews among the nations to witness that they were in exile only because of their own iniquity, not because of the Lord's failure. Then perhaps the nations too would come to know that the Lord was the only true God.

c. A drama of fear (12:17–20)

17–20 In another brief act Ezekiel was to quiver and tremble while he ate and drank. This displayed the fear and horror that would come on the citizens of Jerusalem and all the cities of Judah when their towns were destroyed and lay in ruins. The land would be emptied of its fruitfulness because of the violence that had been done in it. The violence they had done to others would return on their own heads. Thus the Judeans would know that the Lord was real and that he was faithful to his promises. Those things they had refused to learn in times of blessing, God would teach them through the horrors of judgment. But his judgment was still a manifestation of his love; for if he had not cared for them, he would never have disciplined them.

2. The faithfulness of God: the present judgment (12:21–28)

21–25 Ezekiel confronted the exiles' rationalizations of his messages. It had become obvious that the apathy of the Jewish exiles had blunted their understanding of his symbolic acts and oracles (12:2). They did not think that Ezekiel's prophecies were valid. Through a contemporary proverb the captives asserted that they believed all the previous judgments proclaimed by Isaiah, Micah, and others were not true, for they had not come to pass. Why should they now accept Ezekiel's prophecies as valid? Their outlook presumed on God's grace, long-suffering, and forbearance. It showed an unbelief in God's immutability and the trustworthiness of his word as revealed in the Scriptures. It was only because of his grace that God had not disciplined Israel sooner. He had waited so Israel might change her mind and return to him. Instead, the people had strayed further, living in the fantasy of security when judgment was imminent.

God declared that the exiles' proverb would be heard no more, for judgment was imminent. On the contrary, the Lord would create a new proverb: "The days are near when every vision will be fulfilled." The judgments that the Lord had promised in the Law and the Prophets would soon be executed. Judgment on Jerusalem would bring the false visions and deceptive divinations, by which the false prophets continually sought to encourage unscriptural ways, to an abrupt halt.

26–28 Others had believed Ezekiel's warning of judgment yet thought it would come, not in their lifetime, but in the distant future. God's response to Judah was brief and to the point: Judgment would no longer be delayed! What God had said, he would do—and he would do it soon!

3. The condemnation of contemporary false prophets (13:1–23)

a. Judgment on the prophets (13:1–16)

1–7 In 12:21–28 Ezekiel spoke against the exiles' false security that led them to think that judgment was not imminent. They had received encouragement in this position by the visions and divinations of the many false prophets. Now Ezekiel would deliver God's denunciation on these prophets. Ezekiel was instructed to charge the prophets to listen to the Lord's word, not to their own hearts, for judgment ("woe") was about to be delivered against them for their foolish ways.

Before the judgment verdict was delivered (vv.8–16), God clearly delineated the characteristics of the prophets that had brought this judgment on them. The prophets were summarized as "foolish" (GK 5572). This word is a broad term that encompasses spiritual and moral insensitivity contrary to the nature of a wise man. Ezekiel described the basic cause of their foolishness as their reliance on their own hearts and their failure to seek God's revelation.

The prophets followed their own desires, failing to care for the people and seeing the perversions of their own hearts as God's revelation. Their visions were false and full of lies because they had really not seen anything at all. They were using pagan practices of divination to seek messages from God: watching the movement of stars, studying animals' internal organs, casting lots, etc. This only resulted in counterfeit statements that were deceitfully prefaced with the prophetic formula of divine authority: "The LORD declares." Yet the Lord had not spoken, nor had he sent them. They were only speaking from their own perverse hearts, hoping for a word of confirmation that never came. God emphatically denied that he had spoken through them.

These prophets followed their own spirit, not the Spirit of God. The desires of their fleshly spirits caused them to behave like "jackals among ruins." Jackals love to play among rubble, seeking dens for themselves. They do not care about the ruins. Similarly, these prophets did not care about the people of Judah but made dens in their own self-interest. They played their own games of false prophecy that destroyed the people and the land. So they failed to prepare the people for the difficult times ahead or for the intense times in which they lived. Judah faced judgment and deportation unless the people turned to the Lord.

The prophets were to step in and repair the "breaks in the wall" caused by violations of the Mosaic covenant. They were to exhort the people concerning the truths of that covenant in order to repair the breaks and protect the people from judgment. But they were negligent of their responsibilities. No one could be found to repair the "breaks" for God's people (22:30). Moreover, they failed to secure the sanctuary with holiness so that it might stand in the battles of the "day of the LORD"—not the future eschatological judgment but the immediate judgment of Nebuchadnezzar's invasion and siege of Jerusalem in which the temple would fall. Sinful abominations had been permitted in the temple due in part to the failure of these prophets to speak the truth and warn the people of the statutes and ordinances of the Mosaic covenant.

8–16 The false prophets had failed as "watchmen" over the nation of Judah, crying "peace" when judgment was on the horizon. These prophets had an empty word to speak and had seen lies. God's verdict was simple and clear: "I am against you." Ezekiel repeated the reasons for the judgment.

These false prophets would be cut off from the people and have no part with the nation of Israel because they had misled the people. As prophets they had been in the hierarchy of the nation and in influential places, but they would no longer be in the council of God's people (cf. Jer 23:22). Instead, their names would be eliminated from the citizenry of Israel. They would not reenter the land of Israel at the time of their restoration from the Babylonian captivity (c. 539 B.C.). This judgment would cause the prophets to turn to the Lord and know that he existed as the only true God. The implication was that they still had an opportunity to repent and come to the Messiah in eternal salvation.

The judgment of the prophets is described in terms of their participation in "whitewashing." Since the prophets were declaring a time of peace and prosperity, it was not out of line for them to encourage home building. Consequently, they had gone around plastering walls and helping people decorate the thin partitions of their homes. It was the confirmation of a "settle down and live" philosophy. However, God declared that these walls and their decorative plaster would fall beneath the raging rains of his anger and the hail and violent wind of his wrath. When the walls were destroyed, so also would the prophets be consumed in the destruction. No one would be concerned about house decorations then. God would establish another new proverb: "The wall is gone and so are those who whitewashed it."

b. Judgment on the prophetesses (13:17–23)

17–19 The Lord exhorted Ezekiel to turn and prophesy against the prophetesses who, like the false prophets, also had prophesied from their own hearts. These women were involved in divination and sorcery. Their practice of witchcraft was common in the ancient Near East—especially Babylonia and Egypt. But witchcraft was forbidden in the Mosaic covenant (Lev 19:26). The practice of the false prophetesses was to tie bands of cloth to their wrists and place veils over their heads as they cast spells over people's lives in order to bind them and hunt them down. These women caused the righteous to die and kept the wicked alive.

Barley and bread were also instruments of sorcery. Hittite practices and later Syrian rituals demonstrate that divination was carried out with barley bread either as part of the pagan sacrificial ritual or as a means of determining whether the victim would live or die. The prophetesses, therefore, profaned God by misrepresentation. Though appearing to be God's prophetesses, they polluted his name when they used these occult practices.

These women not only had the power to kill people through their incantations, but they also lied to God's people. Because the Judeans listened to these lies, many died unnecessarily. This is not to say that the ultimate authority over life and death rested with these prophetesses, for that authority rests only with almighty God.

20–23 Ezekiel announces that God would tear off the cloth bands of these prophetesses, along with their veils with which they hunted people and bound them, thus freeing the righteous in Judah from their grip. The Lord then reasserted the reasons for this punishment. These sorceresses had used deceptive and counterfeit means to dishearten the righteous, pulling them into their cultic snare and influence. At the same time they encouraged the wicked to disobey God's ways. Therefore, God would cause their false visions and cultic divinations to cease, delivering his people from their wicked hands. When he would do that, then these prophetesses would know that he was the ever-present one, faithful and immutable Lord.

4. The effect of the false prophets on the leaders (14:1–11)

1–2 Some of the Judean elders in the exile came before Ezekiel. These "responsible" leaders came to seek clarification from him about his denunciation of the prophets and to inquire from him what God's ways for them should be. Their lives and attitudes showed they had followed the false prophets and prophetesses.

3 These leaders outwardly sought God's will by coming to Ezekiel, a true spokesman for the Lord. At the same time, however, they inwardly were exalting idols on the throne of their hearts as the real gods of their lives. Theirs was a fickle, twofold allegiance. Their lust for idols led to the elders' stumbling into sin. Their outward rebellion against God, their practice of pagan rituals, and their refusal to keep the Mosaic covenant showed their inward worship of these false gods. No true direction can be given to those who have erected idols in their hearts.

4–11 The Lord broadened his answer to include any person in Israel who may have harbored this dual allegiance; phrases like "any Israelite" and "house of Israel" unmasked this hypocrisy. The elders represented the entire nation that had followed their leadership.

The Lord's reply was threefold: two portions related to the elders and the nation at large, while one was directed at the false prophets. The Lord first declared that he would give the elders over to the many idols in their hearts. God knew that satiation with idolatry was the only way for Israel to repent of her sin. The people would become nauseated with the emptiness and perversion of idolatry. God wanted to "recapture" their hearts that had become alienated from him through lust for these idolatrous practices. He wanted to convict them of sin so that they would heed his invitation to repent.

God purposes not only to convict sinners of their sin but also to bring them to his Messiah. Therefore he lovingly exhorted these double-minded elders and their followers to "repent" and to turn from their idols and abominations to him. Instead of heart allegiance to idols, a heart allegiance to God was necessary.

The Lord's second response was directed toward those who had refused his invitation to repent. If they did not heed this, God himself would answer their empty inquiry with action, not words. In fulfillment of the "curse" stipulations of the Mosaic covenant, God would set his face against these people, cut them off as citizens of Israel (cf. 13:9; Lev 70:3, 5–6), and make them "examples" and "bywords" for all nations to see his faithfulness in executing his covenant judgments (Dt 28:37). Then they would know that he truly was the ever-present God of Israel.

Finally, the Lord turned to the prophets whose false visions and deceptive proclamations had misled the elders and people. If these false prophets were enticed to prophesy in any way other than that which God had given through Ezekiel, it would only be because God had permitted it. God ultimately controls all things, even false prophets. These prophets would receive the same punishment God would mete out to the fickle inquirers, for the iniquity of each was the same: idolatry. The Lord consistently brought judgment on the idol worshipers in order to restore them to himself. Likewise, this judgment on the prophets was given so that the Israelites might no longer wander away from their Lord and defile themselves but that they might come into the relationship God had always desired them to have with him as his people. This relationship was expressed through the covenant formula: "They will be my people, and I will be their God" (cf. Ex 19:5–6; Lev 26:12; Jer 7:23; et. al). God would remove the false prophets and leaders so that his people might be those who truly followed his ways as revealed in the Mosaic covenant.

5. No deliverance apart from personal righteousness (14:12–23)

12–14 As the elders listened to Ezekiel's call to repentance (vv.1–11), some no doubt wondered whether the impending judgment on Jerusalem might be diverted if some well-known righteous man or men could be found (cf. Ge 18). Ezekiel responds by saying that even Daniel, their contemporary, who was ministering before Nebuchadnezzar in the city of Babylon, if he teamed up with the likes of Noah and Job, could not save the nation. God reminded the elders that any nation that was unfaithful to him and turned to other gods would be punished, for God remains faithful to both his covenant curses and his covenant promises (Lev 26:22–26). Each individual and each land was responsible for its own standing before God.

15–20 Ezekiel illustrates his point through four common vehicles of judgment: beasts, the sword, disease, and famine. If any of these judgments were to come on the land, not even the personal righteousness of a Noah, a Daniel, or a Job would be able to deliver another person from judgment—even a member of his own family. These three righteous men were delivered respectively out of the dangers they faced, but each had little effect on his contemporary situation.

21–23 Judah's current situation was no exception. God would send his four severe judgments against Jerusalem. But to vindicate his justice before the exiles, the Lord would spare a small remnant of unrepentant Hebrews and send them into exile in Babylonia. This was strictly a manifestation of God's grace. When these unrighteous people would go into exile in Babylonia, the exiles already there would observe their deeds and see how wicked the Judeans had become. Through this the exiles would be consoled that God was perfectly just in his judgment on Jerusalem. As the exiles saw the Judge of all the earth doing right (Ge 18:25), they would be comforted in their sorrow over what had happened to Jerusalem.

6. Jerusalem, an unprofitable vine (15:1–8)

1–5 This parable implies that the exiles had asked about God's consistency. They understood that they were his chosen people, his choice vine, and did not believe that God's judgments would destroy Judah as Ezekiel had proclaimed. The parable shows the worthlessness of a vine except for bearing fruit. Its wood was too soft, weak, and crooked for building. It was not even fit for making a peg to hang some utensil or clothing on. If a vine was naturally of so little value, it certainly could not be expected to be useful when charred by fire.

6–8 In the parable the inhabitants of Jerusalem were likened to the vine. Just as the vine was profitable only for fruit-bearing, so Judah and Jerusalem were to be fruitful. The nation never was like other nations (trees) in military strength and riches except when they were trusting in the Lord (cf. David's reign). God had chosen Israel to be a blessing to the nations (Ge 12:1–3), though throughout her history she never had been very fruitful in this respect. Israel had been as unproductive as an uncultivated vine. Now, having experienced the fire of God's judgment through the Babylonian invasions and deportations, her value was entirely gone. She was worthless as a fruit-bearer (a blessing to the nations). She was fit only as fuel for fire. The Lord would return her to the fire of his discipline. The inhabitants of Jerusalem would be devoured, and the land would then lie desolate.

The reason for this fiery judgment was once more made clear: Judah had been unfaithful to the Lord and his covenant. They had failed to be a blessing to the world. They had disobeyed God's ordinances and had sinned. They were worthless and useless because of their idolatry. Graciously, the exiles could still be useful and fruitful for God, but only if they remained faithful to him. To cause them to return to himself, the Lord brought this ruin on those living in Jerusalem. Through this judgment the exiles would know that he was their ever-present God. So he disciplined his chosen people to make them fruitful instead of unproductive (cf. Jn 15:1–16).

7. Jerusalem's history as a prostitute (16:1–63)

a. The birth of Jerusalem (16:1–5)

1–2 The exiles were unconvinced by the parable of the vine (ch. 15). Certainly, they thought, the vine of Israel may have done a few things wrong in her past; but she was chosen of God and could not be as worthy of judgment as Ezekiel implied. Therefore, the Lord instructed him to "confront Jerusalem with her detestable practices." Ezekiel would show just how corrupt Israel's history was by tracing the history of Jerusalem, which became the capital of Israel and the symbol of the nation. Likewise, the purpose of this allegory was to show to the exilic leaders all the terrible abominations that had brought the impending judgment on Jerusalem. Needless to say, the abominations of Jerusalem pervaded the nation, and the judgments she would experience would likewise affect all Judah.

3 Jerusalem was conceived by the Amorites and the Hittites in the land of Canaan. The city was not founded by the Hebrews but by the heathen peoples of Canaan. The reference to Jerusalem's father as an Amorite and her mother as a Hittite shows how the city came into being. Jerusalem was a Jebusite city when the children of Israel entered the land under Joshua (Jos 15:8, 63) and a member of the Amorite league that joined together against the Hebrews at Gibeon (Jos 5:1).

4–5 Jerusalem had been treated in a manner similar to a child left to exposure on birth. It was the custom in the ancient Near East to wash a newborn child, rub it with salt for antiseptic reasons, and wrap it in cloths, changing these twice by the fortieth day after the umbilical cord was cut. Such common treatment was not given to Jerusalem, by analogy, in her beginning. She was a foundering city, uncared for by the people of Canaan or by Israel in the conquest of the land, for the Hebrews failed to conquer the city of Jebus (Jos 15:63). In fact, they allowed this city to lie exposed as an unwanted child throughout the period of the judges, a widespread custom in the ancient Near East that was used to eliminate unwanted children.

b. The Lord's courtship and marriage to Jerusalem (16:6–14)

6 The Lord saw Jerusalem in her ignoble condition and sent David, the newly anointed king over Israel (2Sa 5:6–10), to rescue her from the Jebusites and her maltreatment. God determined Jerusalem's destiny when he found her and stressed that she would live!

7 Once delivered, Jerusalem received the blessings and benefits of the Lord, her lover. He promised to increase her population like the plants of the field. Under his gracious care Jerusalem grew to full maturity as a city. Though she had reached marriageable age, she was still "naked and bare."

8–14 The Lord visited Jerusalem and claimed her in marriage by spreading his garment over her (cf. Ru 3:9). He entered into a marriage covenant with Jerusalem (cf. Ps 132:13–17). She became the Lord's city, where he dwelt when David brought the ark of the covenant to Jerusalem and purchased the threshing floor of Araunah, the Jebusite (2Sa 6; 24), in preparation for the temple's construction. As a groom to his bride, God lavished marriage gifts on Jerusalem: ornaments, cleansing, anointing, costly garments, jewelry, a crown, and fine foods. She was made exceedingly beautiful and advanced to royalty under the reigns of David and Solomon. Her fame and beauty became renowned throughout the ancient Near East as the capital of the leading nation of that day (1Ki 10; La 2:15).

c. Jerusalem's prostitution with other lands and gods (16:15–34)

15 No sooner had the Lord crowned Jerusalem with beauty and fame as his bride than she began to trust in her beauty rather than in God who gave it to her. She began to commit spiritual adultery with every nation. Solomon led Israel contrary to God's way of faith by making treaties with many nations (cf. Dt 17:1~20; 1Ki 11:1–13). It was customary to seal international treaties with a marriage. Solomon's many foreign wives attested to his reliance on these treaties rather than on the Lord. This led to his worship of the foreign gods of his wives. The emphasis came to be on externals and material objects. The very gifts God had given to Jerusalem had become the means of her downfall, for she loved the gifts rather than the giver.

16–22 From rebellion under Solomon Jerusalem, as the capital of Israel, gradually led the nation down the path of corruption. While the gifts of God were not inherently evil, Jerusalem became married to the gifts rather than to the Lord. She constructed pagan high places for worship and decorated them with her garments and committed adultery against God on them (2Ki 23:7). She formed male images from her precious metals and clothed them with her exquisite textiles. She fornicated by worshiping them with incense, libations, and offerings.

Worst of all, Jerusalem offered her children in sacrifice to these idols (cf. 2Ki 16:3; 21:6; 23:10; Jer 32:35). She entered into every kind of religious abomination practiced among the heathen peoples. She had forgotten what God had done for her in her youth when she had nothing and deserved nothing. She forgot that he rescued her from a despicable state and elevated her to royalty and beauty.

23–25 It would have been enough if Jerusalem had simply entered into the abominations of the pagan religions, but she became a militant advocate of these heathen practices. Jerusalem established pagan high places and mounds for abominable worship in every street. She offered herself lewdly as a prostitute by inviting every false religious ritual to come and have an intimate part of her syncretistic spiritual adultery. In doing so she made her God-given beauty detestable. So God began to declare his "woe" on Jerusalem as she broke his heart with her prostitution.

26–29 Jerusalem also began to play the prostitute with Egypt. Egypt had lusted after Israel throughout the united kingdom period. Then Jeroboam I and others prostituted themselves with Egypt (2Ki 17:4; 18:21; Isa 30:7; 36:2), though prophets like Hosea and Isaiah condemned this spiritual and political adultery. Jerusalem sought security through political relations with foreign nations rather than in her God. Thus the Lord delivered Jerusalem into the hands of the Philistines and caused the city to lose portions of the territory she had ruled over (cf. 2Ch 21:16–17; 28:18; Isa 1:7–8). Though this should have caused Jerusalem to reevaluate her sinful ways, she blatantly continued her harlotry, having political "relations" with Assyria and Babylonia. Yet her desires were never satisfied. Ahaz sought relations with Assyria (2Ki 15:19–20; 16:7–18); and overtures to Babylonia were made even during the reign of Hezekiah (2Ki 20:12–19), though Isaiah rebuked the leaders for these political desires (Isa 20:5–6; 30:1–5; 31:1). Political relations with Assyria and Babylonia normally brought the demand to worship their gods.

30–34 The Lord cried out to Jerusalem, condemning their weakness in soliciting suitors in his place. Because of the weakness of her heart relationship with God, she, as an unfaithful wife, had sought out nations with whom she could have her "relations" instead of with the Lord, her husband. Instead of the normal practice of receiving gifts or pay for her services as a prostitute, Jerusalem actually solicited these strangers (nations). She bribed or paid them to secure intimate relationships with them (cf. Hos 8:9). God summarized: Jerusalem has a rebellious and disobedient heart of infidelity. She is without excuse!

d. Jerusalem: judged a prostitute (16:35–43)

35–41 Judgment was declared on Jerusalem. She had indulged in obscene, spiritual adultery with the nations and their perverse idols. The Lord would now use these very nations as instruments to discipline her. Those nations Jerusalem had loved in fornication and those she had hated God would use to strip her bare of all her riches and blessings so that all might see the barrenness and nakedness of Jerusalem and Judah without God's blessing. These foreign nations would judge her and make her pay the penalty for adultery and infanticide as set forth in the Mosaic covenant: death (Ex 21:12; Lev 20:10). They would mockingly destroy her brothels (places of idolatry), tear off her clothes (cf. Hos 2:12; Na 3:5), and spoil her garments so that she would stand naked for all to see. Then she would be tried, stoned, and cut in pieces. Her houses would be burned as these nations executed God's judgment on her as one who practiced idolatry in contradiction to the law (Dt 13:12–18).

42–43 This punishment was ultimately accomplished by the Babylonian invasion of 586 B.C. under Nebuchadnezzar, whereby Jerusalem's idolatrous abominations ceased. She lay in burned ruins. The remnant of her population was taken captive into Babylonia. There the Israelites turned from idolatry to monotheism, learning the lesson God's judgment was designed to teach. At that time God's wrath also ceased against Jerusalem, for his justice was satisfied. So that Jerusalem might remember him once again, God brought this discipline on her. Though we may forget God, his love prevents him from forgetting his own. God takes his commitments in personal relationships seriously.

e. The perversion of Jerusalem (16:44–58)

44–48 Ezekiel changes the figure slightly at this point to make a comparison between Jerusalem, Sodom, and Samaria. These three cities are likened to three sisters, all the offspring of their Hittite mother and Amorite father. In what manner their mother, the Hittites, despised her husband and children is not clear. Perhaps she too had rejected the Lord and had sacrificed her children to idols. However, the emphasis of the allegory is to demonstrate the abominable degradation of sin that characterized the land of Canaan, for Canaan was renowned for her religious syncretism in which she experimented with every kind of idolatry and religious perversion.

A common proverb applied to these three cities: "Like mother, like daughter." Jerusalem, Sodom, and Samaria had all been nourished in the perverted religious systems of the land of Canaan, and now they were characterized by their parents' wickedness. However, Jerusalem had become the preeminent sister in spiritual abominations and wickedness. Though Samaria was Jerusalem's "older" sister to the north, greater in strength and military might, and Sodom (Ge 10:19) was Jerusalem's "younger" sister to the south, smaller in prestige and strength, Jerusalem had outstripped both in her depravity and rebellion against God. Though both sisters were known for their extreme sin, Jerusalem had become more corrupt than either of them.

49–50 Sodom's chief sin had been pride and self-exaltation, stemming from her abundant materialism (food), given to her from God (Ge 13:10), which had resulted in false security, apathy, and disdain and neglect of the poor and needy. This material ease fostered sexual perversion (Ge 13:13; 18:20; 19:4–5). As evil as Sodom was, she did not begin to do evil like Jerusalem. Since God removed Sodom in judgment, certainly Jerusalem would receive greater punishment (La 4:6; cf. Mt 11:23).

51–52 Jerusalem had sinned twice as much as Samaria, the wicked capital of the northern kingdom, which had already gone into captivity because of her abominations before God (1Ki 12:25–33; 15:30; 16:20, 26, 31–34). Jerusalem's wickedness was so perverse that she caused Sodom and Samaria with all their evil to appear righteous by comparison.

53–58 Judgment would come on Jerusalem. Just as haughty Jerusalem abhorred Sodom when she was a byword among the nations because of her corruption, so Jerusalem would be a similar byword in her day to Edom and Philistia. The nations would despise her. Jerusalem's only hope was the promise that God would restore her from her captivity in the future. God would not only restore Jerusalem but would also restore Sodom and Samaria in that day when he brings restoration to the land of Canaan (cf. ch. 36). That restoration would humble Jerusalem and humiliate her for all her wickedness.

f. Restoration: the promise of love (16:59–63)

59 The Lord concludes this allegory by affirming his immutable faithfulness to his covenants. He would discipline Jerusalem (and Israel) as the Mosaic covenant promised, because they had failed to be faithful to him and had broken their covenant with him. The covenant broken by their spiritual adultery was the Mosaic covenant, the only one Israel entered through an oath (Ex 24:7–8; Dt 29:10–21). But Judah/Jerusalem had broken that covenant exactly as described in Dt 29.

Thus God would faithfully execute the justice of that covenant on them—the curses.

The word "oath" (GK 460) can also mean "curse" and was used both ways throughout the OT. God purposely used this term to communicate both the idea of Jerusalem's despising of the oath of Ex 24 and Dt 29 and the concept of her disregard for the promise of the curse.

60 Nevertheless, after the Lord completed his judgments on Jerusalem, he would continue to be faithful by remembering the everlasting covenant that he made with the nation in her youth. In the Mosaic covenant (Lev 26:40–45), the Lord promised that after his future and final judgment on Israel he would remember the covenant that he had made with Abraham, in which he promised to give the land of Canaan to Israel as an eternal possession (cf. Ge 17:7–8; Lev 26:42). This was an everlasting covenant, and God would graciously and lovingly remember to do what he had promised. The unfaithfulness of humankind does not alter the faithfulness of God (cf. 2Ti 2:13).

61–63 When God would remember his covenant with Abraham and restore Jerusalem and Judah to the land of Canaan, then Jerusalem would remember her evil ways that forced her into exile and would be ashamed. Jerusalem would be reestablished in the future kingdom (cf. ch. 48) in a place of preeminence. Though she had been more wicked than either Sodom or Samaria and would receive greater judgment, the Lord would sovereignly exalt her over them by giving them to her as "daughters" (20:43; 36:31). Thus these cities would no longer be thought of as "sisters" (city/nation) but as cities with their suburbs under the jurisdiction of Jerusalem (cf. v.46; Jdg 1:27). The Lord's return of Sodom and Samaria to Jerusalem as daughters is not based on the Mosaic covenant, however, but on the grace of God.

This restoration would cause Jerusalem to know that the Lord was her ever-present, always faithful God, who had chosen her of his own accord in the past and would save her in the future. Never again would Jerusalem and Judah mention their past sins; God would make atonement for their sins and forget all their iniquity. This, of course, was accomplished by Jesus Christ's death on the cross.

8. The riddle and the parable of the two eagles (17:1–24)

1–10 As the exiles listened to Ezekiel's long allegory of Jerusalem's history of spiritual infidelity to the Lord, some began to wonder why they were being judged for all the past sins of their nation. Ezekiel responds that they would be judged for their own contemporary lack of trust in the Lord, which they had shown by their tendency to rely on Egypt for security and by the corruption of their regent, Zedekiah.

Ezekiel uses a riddle to communicate this message. In it, the two kings are God and Zedekiah. The historical background for this riddle is found in 2Ki 24:6–20; 2Ch 36:8–16; and Jer 37; 52:1–7. Judah's kings were fickle in failing to follow the prophets' warnings and in yielding to the Babylonians, God's instrument of discipline. On the contrary, the kings continued to seek security and aid from Egypt. This issue was at the heart of this chapter.

The riddle is set forth in two parts. Verses 1–6 describe an eagle that was extremely glorious and multicolored. This bird flew to Lebanon (the land of Canaan; cf. Jos 1:4; 2Ki 14:9) and took the top of a cedar and the topmost young twigs and brought them to the land of merchants (Babylonia; cf. 16:29). Then the eagle took some seeds from Canaan and planted them in a land of fertile soil (cf. Dt 8:7; 11:11). The seed grew into a low spreading vine that sent out shoots and branches toward the eagle.

The second part of the riddle (vv.7–10) portrays another great eagle—not quite as glorious as the first—which caused the transplanted vine to turn its branches and roots toward it. Though the vine was initially planted in good soil so that it yielded abundant produce, it no longer thrived; it was uprooted and its fruit cut off by the east wind. No one was able to restore it.

11–14 For the interpretation vv.11–12a give the summons to listen; vv.12b–18 give the charges; and vv.19–21 announce God's intervention in judgment with the word "therefore." Each eagle represented a conquering king whom, in part, God used as an instrument of his punitive wrath on Judah. The first eagle was Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylonia, who had taken King Jehoiachin (crest of the cedar) and his young princes and nobles (topmost young twigs) into exile in Babylonia, a land of merchants (cf 1Ki 10:27; 2Ki 24:10–12; Jer 22:15, 23). The cedar has messianic overtones (cf. Isa 10:33–11:1). It represents the line of David that culminates in the Messiah, Jesus Christ.

Jehoiachin was of the Davidic line. The "seed" was defined as one from the royal seed whom Nebuchadnezzar took and placed in the field of Canaan. This member of the royal seed was Zedekiah (or Mattaniah; cf. 2Ki 24:17; Jer 37:1), Jehoiachin's uncle, whom Nebuchadnezzar established as regent over the remnant in Judah by entering into a binding covenant with Zedekiah. Jehoiachin still remained the legitimate king though he was in exile in Babylonia. Zedekiah and the Hebrews remaining in the land with him should have become a flourishing vine, but instead they became a worthless and useless vine like the one already described in ch. 15. It was low and spreading because Nebuchadnezzar never allowed it to exalt itself.

15–21 The second eagle represented the king of Egypt to whom Zedekiah sent for military aid when he rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar in 588 B.C. and broke the covenant he had made with Nebuchadnezzar (cf. 2Ch 36:13). This act of trust in Egypt had been opposed rigorously by both Isaiah (Isa 30:1–2) and Jeremiah (Jer 37:1). God rhetorically asked whether the vine (Zedekiah and the small nation of Judah) would prosper. The emphatic answer was no! They would suffer God's judgment through Nebuchadnezzar when he attacked Judah, because Zedekiah had despised the covenant with him and had broken it by turning to Egypt (2Ch 36:13; cf. Eze 5:7).

Because of his disobedience both to his covenant with Nebuchadnezzar (sworn in God's name; cf. 2Ch 36:13) and to his covenant with God, Zedekiah would experience the judgments promised in the Mosaic covenant he had also broken. God would spread a net and seize him with the Babylonian army and bring him to Babylonia in exile. Egypt would be of no help when Jerusalem was besieged by Nebuchadnezzar, for Zedekiah's army would fall by the sword, the remaining population would be scattered throughout the land, and Zedekiah would ultimately die in Babylonia (cf. 12:13–14). Yet all this was a manifestation of God's grace, for he was faithfully executing his justice so that Zedekiah might come to know that the Lord, the only true God, had spoken in these judgments.

22–24 This epilogue provides an oracle of salvation. Wherever God pronounces judgment, he normally declares hope as well. Judah had failed to remain "planted" and "fruitful." In the future, however, after God had cleansed Judah through his discipline, he would take a "tender sprig" from the topmost shoots of the cedar and "plant it on a high and lofty mountain." This cutting of the cedar was not from the first cutting made by Nebuchadnezzar in vv.4, 12, for Jer 22:28–30 declared that the physical line of Jehoiachin (Coniah) would not continue to sit on the Davidic throne. Rather, the line would continue through other descendants of David. This new cutting was, however, from the "cedar," the messianic line. It was the "tender one," a concept that had messianic implications (Isa 11:1; Jer 23:5–6; 33:14–16; Zec 3:8; 6:12–13). This was the Messiah whom God would establish as King over Israel in the messianic kingdom.

The high and lofty mountain may have reference to Mount Zion and the temple complex (cf. 20:40; Ps 2:6; Mic 4:1). This messianic kingdom would be as great and fruitful as a stately cedar tree. All the birds would nest in its branches—perhaps a figure of the nations of the world (cf. Da 4:17, 32, 34–37; Mt 13:31–32). They would submit to the Messiah and his rule.

9. Individual responsibility for righteousness (18:1–31)

a. Proverb versus principle (18:1–4)

1–4 In 16:44 Ezekiel set forth a proverb to show that Israel had taken on herself the heathen character of her environment. Ezekiel's hearers misapplied that proverbial concept. They reasoned that they were being judged because of the wickedness of their forefathers. This principle of the Decalogue teaches that children would be affected by their father's sin (Ex 20:5; Dt 5:9). Parents model for their children. Regrettably, children frequently practice the same sinful acts as their parents. Likewise, they must accept the same just punishment for such actions. Each child is individually responsible. A child can abort the "sin-punishment-inheritance" progression at any time, but he or she must repent and do what is right.

The misunderstanding of the exiles was expressed in the contemporary proverb, "The fathers eat sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge"; i.e., what the father does affects his children. The people believed that righteousness and wickedness were hereditary; therefore, there was no reason to change one's ways.

The Lord's response to this new proverb was that the hereditary principle would cease immediately, for it had been erroneously applied to righteousness and unrighteousness. Each person lives or dies according to his or her own actions. God solemnly declares that "every living soul belongs to me"; he is the Creator of everyone, and all have equality before him. They are free to make a decision to walk in his ways or not. The principle of individual responsibility has always been true (cf. Ge 2:17; 4:7; Dt 24:16; 2Ki 14:6; et al.). A son is not bound to be like his father.

A basic principle is set forth at the conclusion of v.4: "The soul who sins is the one who will die." Life and death in this context are not eternal but physical. One enters into eternal life by faith in the Messiah, Jesus Christ, whether by looking forward in faith to his work on the cross, as did the OT saint, or in looking back in faith, as we do today. Eternal salvation is by faith alone (cf. Ge 15:6; Ro 4:5; Eph 2:8–9). The stipulations of the Mosaic covenant were given to a people who already had a trusting relationship with God, providing a concrete, practical outworking of faith in the God who redeemed Israel from Egypt and revealed his law. Trust in him entailed the ritual of blood sacrifice as well as obedience to his commands. If the people obeyed these commands, they would show their righteousness, receive God's blessings, and live. But if they failed to live according to God's ways as revealed in the law, the Mosaic covenant declared that even those who had believed in the Messiah would die physically (cf. Dt 28:58–66; 30:15–20). If, however, they had never trusted in their Messiah, portrayed in the sacrifices, then they would also die eternally.

b. Three illustrations of the principle (18:5–18)

5–9 The principle of individual responsibility shows that a righteous person in a trusting relationship with the Lord will live physically and eternally. First, however, the Lord must define righteousness according to the Mosaic covenant. Five legal areas differentiate righteous acts from unrighteous deeds. First, the righteous person refrains from pagan sacrificial meals at the heathen high mountain shrines and from the prevalent idolatry found in the northern kingdom of Israel (cf. Dt 12:21). Second, such a one refuses to defile his neighbor's wife or to have relations with a woman during her menstrual period (Ex 20:14; Lev 15:24; 18:19; 20:10, 18; Dt 22:22). Third, he does not oppress people through maltreatment and extortion but rather restores the pledge of a poor person's debt (Ex 22:26–27; Dt 24:6; Am 2:8). The wealthy take advantage of the poor, especially finding orphans, widows, and strangers easy prey for their extortion schemes. Fourth, the righteous person does not steal (Ex 20:15; Lev 19:13) but feeds and clothes the destitute (Dt 15:11; 24:19–22; Isa 58:7).

Finally, refusing to take interest from his fellow Israelites (Ex 22:25; Dt 23:19–20; Ps 15:5; Isa 24:2), the righteous individual practices only justice (Lev 19:15–16, 35–36; Dt 25:13–16). Interest could be charged foreigners in commercial relations, but it was contrary to the principle of love and concern for one of the covenant people to profit from a poor fellow Hebrew by extorting interest on charitable loans. Verse 9 sums up the definition of a righteous person: one who lives by the Mosaic statutes is righteous and will surely live physically and eternally to enjoy the blessings of life as God has planned (cf. Lev 18:1–5; Dt 11; 26:16–19; 30:15–20). This list clearly demonstrates that a person's attitude and acts toward others provide a true index of his or her faith and attitude toward God.

10–13 The second example deals with the unrighteous son of the righteous son. The son demonstrates his unrighteousness and lack of faith by a lifestyle opposite that of his father. Whatever his father did in righteousness, the son does not do; and whatever his father refrained from in righteousness, that the unrighteous son does. He also commits murder. Verse 18 summarizes his wicked deeds as extortion, robbery, and wrongdoing. Since he fails to live according to the righteous stipulations of the law, he will not live physically or eternally at all. This type of man was certainly manifested by the life of Manasseh.

14–18 The third illustration shows that an unrighteous man will not necessarily have an unrighteous son. If the grandson does all the righteous deeds of the Mosaic covenant, like his godly grandfather, and refuses to follow his wicked father's unrighteous acts, then he will not die because of his father's wickedness, but will surely live. But his father will die because of his own iniquity.

c. The explanation of the principle (18:19–32)

19–24 Having stated the basic principle of individual responsibility in vv.1–4 and illustrated it in vv.5–18, Ezekiel then elaborates aspects of this principle. The discussion was initiated by the exiles' rhetorical question: "Why does the son not share the guilt of his father?" God answers the question by a series of subprinciples.

First, whenever anyone—even the son of an unrighteous man—lives righteously, he lives physically and ultimately eternally. Second, the unrighteous sinner who disobeys God's righteous way for living will die physically and ultimately eternally. Third, a son will not bear the penalty for a father's sins, nor will a father bear the punishment for his son's sins. Fourth, the righteous live because of their righteousness (cf. Lev 18:5), but the wicked die because of their sin (Dt 30:17–18). Fifth, a wicked person can live physically and ultimately eternally if he or she turns from sinful rebellion, obeys the righteous commandment, and trusts in the Messiah. Past sins of such people will not be remembered because of their righteous acts by which they now live. Only God's marvelous grace has kept that wicked person from dying previously. Sixth, God does not rejoice when a wicked person dies. Rather, he is delighted when a wicked person turns to him in obedience and lives. Sinful humankind normally sees judgment as God's delight. Nothing could be further from God's desire; else he would not have sent his only Son to be judged on the cross for the sin of the whole world.

Finally, there is never a time or place where the righteous, who have trusted in the Messiah, can feel free to sin; for if they turn away from living by God's righteous stipulations and sin, then they too will surely die physically (but not eternally). They will die because of their unfaithfulness to God and their unrighteous acts. God never condones sin or grants anyone a license to disobey his holy commands.

25–29 Ezekiel again raises a rhetorical statement that expressed the mind of the exiles: "The way of the Lord is not just." God replies that it was Israel's ways, not his, that were inequitable and unrighteous. They sought to apply the principle of heredity incorrectly to righteousness and unrighteousness. The principle is repeated that the righteous are righteous only because they have practiced righteousness and justice according to the Mosaic covenant, and the wicked are unrighteous because they have turned from the righteous demands of the law. God's grace, in harmony with his law, always allows the wicked to become righteous by turning from their wickedness and practicing the righteous ordinances of the Mosaic covenant. Likewise, the righteous will die physically if they fail to walk in God's holy ways. Righteousness or unrighteousness is not inherited. Righteousness is reckoned to the individual when he or she does righteous acts of God revealed in the Scriptures. Likewise, unrighteousness is credited to the individual who fails to practice God's righteous ways. The decision is up to the individual, not heredity.

30–32 The Lord concludes this message by pleading with the people to repent individually from their sins. This was a strong invitation to live. Repentance was available to the people of Israel in Ezekiel's day. The Lord does not delight in the death of one person who dies because of his or her sin. Therefore the Lord exhorts the people to "repent and live!"

10. A lament for the princes of Israel (19:1–14)

1–9 The final question raised by the recipients of Ezekiel's messages concerns the trustworthiness of the contemporary rulers of Judah to lead the nation back to prominence. Ezekiel responds with a funeral dirge for Judah's princes. The contemporary rulers were not worthy of anyone's trust. They were examples of the wicked person in ch. 18. These rulers had been responsible for Judah's present condition. They would die. No true rulers would be left in Judah.

Ezekiel's lament centers first around the imagery of a lioness and her whelps. The figurative use of a lion normally had royal overtones, especially in reference to the Davidic line (cf. Ge 49:9). Contextually the lioness here must be identified as the nation of Israel. Israel had taken her place among the nations. The young whelps represented given kings of Israel, and in historical and biblical context they signified certain latter rulers in Judah.

The first whelp was Jehoahaz, who had been placed on the throne by the Judeans following the death of his father, Josiah (2Ki 23:31). Jehoahaz learned, as a young lion, to tear and devour humankind, doing evil in the sight of the Lord (2Ki 23:32). Becoming world renowned for the violence in his reign of three months, he was seized in 609 B.C. like a hunted lion and brought bound to Egypt, where he ultimately died (2Ki 23:33–34; 2Ch 36:1–4; Jer 22:10–12).

The second whelp was Jehoiakim's son, Jehoiachin (cf. 2Ki 24:8–17; 2Ch 36:8–10)—Jehoiakim himself is bypassed. Judah's hope had perished with the nation's decline under Jehoiakim's pro-Egyptian leadership. Hope was renewed as the young eighteen-year-old prince Jehoiachin became king. However, his reign was not substantially different from his father's, for Jehoiachin too learned to devour humankind.

Jehoiachin destroyed cities and desolated the land. He did not escape the snare of the "lion-hunting" nations that trapped him in their "pit" and brought him to Nebuchadnezzar in a "cage" in 597 B.C. Later he was released (2Ki 25:27–30; 2Ch 36:9–11). No longer would he "roar" in Judah.

10–14 The imagery changes to that of a "vine." This figure often typifies the nation of Israel as a whole (15:1–6; 17:1–10; cf. Ps 80:8–16; Isa 5:1–7; 27:2–6). The imagery used by Ezekiel probably changes since Zedekiah was not the legitimate legal king of Judah, as were Jehoahaz and Jehoiachin.

The vine referred to the historic nation of Israel. It had been planted beside abundant water in the land of Canaan (Dt 8:7–8), where it had grown large and fruitful during the kingdom period, with many branches for ruling scepters (or kings). Yet this vine was finally plucked up and cast to the ground, where its exposed roots withered under the blasts of the east wind (Babylonia; cf. 17:6–10, 15). The vine (or nation) was transplanted into a desert place—into captivity. The "fire" that "spread from one of its main branches" was the destruction that Zedekiah, Judah's current ruler, had brought on Judah. Judah's current condition was the responsibility, in part, of Zedekiah. Ezekiel had answered the exiles' earlier question by demonstrating the foolishness of trusting in Zedekiah, for he was partially responsible for the imminent judgment. In fact, there was not a "strong branch" in Judah at all—no one "fit for a ruler's scepter," not even Zedekiah, who would be deported in 586 B.C. There was no hope! Judgment was coming!

D. The Defective Leadership of Israel (20:1–23:49)

1. The history of Israel's rebellion and the Lord's grace (20:1–44)

a. Rebellion in Egypt (20:1–9)

1 The chronological notice (July/August 591 B.C.) indicates the beginning of a new segment of the book and a new series of messages. Eleven months had passed since Ezekiel had delivered the previous revelations from God (cf. 8:1). During this time, however, the Jewish leaders in Babylonia had given thought to Ezekiel's response to their arguments against his prophecies. Apparently they still had some hope that Judah would be able to find deliverance from her present state.

The news of Egypt's victory in the Sudan had reached the remnant of Judeans at Tel Abib. Rumors also indicated that Psammetik II would make a triumphal conquest of Palestine. The exiles' expectations were most certainly heightened as they hoped that Egypt would prove to be the redeemer to free them from Nebuchadnezzar. Zedekiah had foolishly shared the same dream when he revolted from Babylonian rule and placed his confidence in Egypt's strength somewhere between the end of 591 and 589 B.C. Such a move was ill-timed; for the Pharaoh soon became ill, and the potential might of Egypt never materialized.

Ezekiel's messages in chs. 20–23 set forth the Lord's response to the unspoken query of the elders. God would not even listen to such a foolish question. Israel's history had been one of persistent rebellion against her God.

In spite of such rebellion, God had demonstrated unending grace toward his people with great long-suffering. The time had come for the nation to prepare herself for judgment, for the Lord was soon going to bring Nebuchadnezzar against Jerusalem to destroy the city and to take more captives to Babylonia (20:45–21:32). The wickedness of Judah—especially that of her leaders—was full (chs. 22–23).

2–6 The Lord summarized his response to the inquiry of the elders of Israel, probably concerning the outcome of Zedekiah's overtures to Egypt. (1) He refused to give them an audience for such a question; (2) he refused because of the abominations of Judah; and (3) the nation of Judah must be judged for her iniquity. These aspects would be enlarged as Ezekiel recounted the history of Israel's rebellion against God and God's undying forbearance and grace toward his wicked people.

Israel's history as a nation began in Egypt where God chose her. He made himself known to Israel and swore that he would be her God (Dt 7:6–11). He took an oath to bring his people into the fruitful and glorious land he had promised Abraham (Ge 12:7; Ex 3:8, 13–18; 6:1–8; Jer 3:19; Da 8:9; 11:16, 42, 45). To bring a nation into being, three elements were essential: (1) a people, (2) a government, and (3) a homeland. The people of Israel came into being in Egypt, the government was received at Mount Sinai, and the homeland was acquired through Joshua's conquest of Canaan (see introductory comments on 33:21–48:35).

7–9 Ezekiel declares that the reason Jacob's descendants had to undergo the prolonged discipline in Egypt lay in their detestable worship of Egyptian idols. God's benevolent love was not only shown to Israel in her special calling and promises but also in his warning to remove her pagan deities so that he alone would be her God (cf. 23:3, 8). The Lord did not want his people to develop incorrect worship patterns.

However, as Israel's history continued, she did not heed God's gracious warnings. She rebelled against him by continuing to worship the Egyptian idols. Therefore, the Lord determined to pour out his wrath on Israel in the 430-year captivity in Egypt. Yet when the captivity was completed, God graciously brought his people out of Egypt (cf. Ge 15:13–16) so that his name would not be profaned among the nations. The Lord's name embodied all he was. He did not want the Egyptian bondage to be misconstrued as a demonstration of his inadequacies. Though Israel had failed to sanctify the name of the Lord among the nations, the Lord himself would do so by delivering Israel from Egypt. Then all the nations would know that he was the Lord, the true, faithful, and powerful God of Israel (Ex 7:5; Ps 106:8–12).

b. Rebellion in the wilderness (20:10–26)

10–12 Ezekiel turned from Israel's corrupt beginning to the generation that God brought out of Egypt by his great power (Ex 12–15). God's kindness and grace were manifested in the Exodus and in his giving of the covenant. This covenant explained the godly principles that enabled one to live life at its best. Therefore, the Israelites were to observe all the commandments of the law, practicing them in daily life (Lev 18:5; Dt 10:12–13).

God revealed Israel's constitution in the pattern of the international suzerain-vassal treaties of the second millennium B.C., in which a great king entered into a covenant with a lesser power to provide blessings and protection to that vassal. The subject nation would, in turn, follow the stipulations laid down by the great king. God was the great king, and Israel had become his vassal. The Lord had been benevolent to Israel by bringing her out of Egyptian servitude. Israel, in turn, was to be a witness for God in the world, living according to God's righteous stipulations of the Mosaic covenant. The great king would seal this covenant by placing his "sign" in the midst of the legal policy. The Lord represented himself as the Creator in the sign of the Sabbath (Ex 20:8–11; 31:13, 17). By observing the weekly Sabbath, Israel would be reminded that God graciously set her apart as an instrument of blessing to the world and as a witness against the pagans who had exchanged the worship of the Creator for that of creation (Ne 9:14; Ro 1:25).

13–17 The phrase "the man who obeys them will live by them" (cf. Lev 18:5) is not a reference to salvation by works. Obeying God's laws demonstrated Israel's faith in the Lord; disobedience showed Israel's unbelief. In spite of the gracious blessings of God, this generation of Israelites rebelled against their Lord in the wilderness by rejecting the commands of the Mosaic covenant and profaning the Sabbaths (cf. Nu 11–14). Therefore, the Lord resolved to destroy Israel (Nu 14:11–12); yet he would not, because his name would be profaned before the nations if he destroyed his people. The nations would think that he was unable to protect Israel in the desert once he brought them forth from Egypt. Moses interceded on behalf of God's people (Nu 14:13–19; Dt 1:26–40) so that the Lord spared them. Instead, God declared that he would not bring that generation into the Promised Land because they had rejected his ways in their idolatrous hearts (cf. Nu 14:32). It was only because of the Lord's holy name that he graciously spared the nation from destruction.

18–26 All members of Israel twenty years and under had the prospect of entering the land of Canaan. God warned this new generation not to follow their fathers' idolatrous and rebellious ways. However, as in the cycle of their fathers, this generation also rebelled against the Lord, failing to live by the law and profaning the Sabbaths. Once again God resolved to destroy his people. Yet, as before, God's holiness restrained his wrath so that his name might not be desecrated among the nations (cf. Nu 16:21–22; 25:1–9). Instead, God swore that he would disperse his people among the nations (Lev 26:33; Dt 28:64; Ps 106:26–27), give them over to statutes they could not live by, and pronounce their sacrifices unclean. Then he would make them desolate and thereby cause them to know that he was the Lord their God. That God would give Israel "statutes that were not good" means that Israel would choose to live according to the world's ordinances that brought misery and death. The "gift" in v.26 referred to religious sacrifices (cf. Ex 28:38; Lev 23:38). The specific offerings were the child-sacrifices of their firstborn to their pagan deities (Ex 13:12; Lev 18:21; Dt 18:10)—a practice especially common in the worship of Molech (2Ki 21:6; 2Ch 28:3).

c. Rebellion in the conquest and settlement of the land (20:27–29)

27–29 The Lord describes the sin of Israel's first generations as blasphemy and unfaithfulness (Nu 15:30–31). When a person despises God's word, that person slanders (or blasphemes) God. Israel had not learned by the mistakes of their forefathers. The generation of Hebrews who entered Canaan began practicing the Canaanites' heathen rituals they saw.

d. Rebellion of Judah in Ezekiel's day (20:30–44)

30–31 God suddenly brought the cyclic pattern of his benevolence, Israel's rebellion, his judgment, and his grace to bear on the contemporary scene. He challenged the current elders, as representatives of the exiles and Judah, with a question: Are you not rebelling like your fathers? Contemporary Israel was as rebellious as her ancestors had been. So the Lord turned to the immediate issue of the people's inquiry. He emphatically replied that he would not give an audience to anyone who disobeyed his ways and yet said that they wanted to know his will.

32–37 Because he loved them, God rejected Israel's desire to be like other idolatrous nations. In doing so he carried the cycle of judgment and grace into Israel's future history. In his judgment he would rule over her now; yet he would restore Judah at the end of the Babylonian captivity. However, there would be a second dispersion of the Israelites in which God would judge Israel and bring the people "into the desert of the nations" as he had done during Israel's Egyptian sojourn. This dispersion is most likely the one that happened in the first century A.D.

Yet, as God's grace follows judgment, so he would ultimately bring Israel into the bond of the covenant as his special possession. When a sheep passes under his shepherd's rod, it indicates that that sheep belongs to the shepherd. "Shepherd" was a common ancient metaphor for king. A rod could also have the connotation of wrath and discipline (Ps 89:32; La 3:1).

38 The covenant was described in terms of a cleansing that would result in the knowledge of God. This is the heart issue of the new covenant promise (36:25–38; Jer 31:31–34). Israel would ultimately become a cleansed flock of the Lord through the new covenant. The process of cleansing would purge out sinners from Israel in that they would not return to the land of blessing when the Lord ultimately restored his people to that land (cf. Da 12:10; Jer 31:34).

39–44 This brief summary of Israel's history of rebellion concludes with an application to Ezekiel's contemporaries. God had delivered them over to their idols since they too had refused to listen to him. The Lord also encourages them by reminding them of his ultimate grace to Israel at the end time. Once Israel was cleansed through the final judgment, God would make sure that she did not allow his holy name to be profaned among the nations again. God would accomplish this by bringing back all Israel of that day to worship on his holy mountain. There he would accept them and their sacrificial worship. The Israelites would have a contrite heart that loathed their past sins. They would come to see that God's grace had been poured out on them throughout the millennia, because the Lord refused to allow his holy name to be defiled. God had continually been dealing with them on the basis of his grace rather than on what they deserved.

2. Judgment on Judah's contemporary leaders (20:45–21:32)

a. The burning of the southern forest (20:45–21:7)

45–49 Having surveyed the history of Israel's rebellion and found the nation deserving of judgment in Ezekiel's day, God announced and described the judgment that he was about to bring on Judah. Four messages described God's judgment by Babylonia (cf. vv.45; 21:1, 8, 18). The first message consists of a parable and its explicit interpretation (21:1–7). The parable describes a forest fire in the southern forest (the southern kingdom of Judah, a forested area in biblical times) that burned every tree, whether green or dry. Everyone would see that God had kindled the unquenchable fire.

Verse 49 provides a transition between the parable and its interpretation. Ezekiel's hearers were frustrated. Ezekiel, the old parabolic speaker, was at it again with another of his parables they did not understand. Therefore, God would give the interpretation.

21:1–5 The parable's interpretation is revealed in these verses. Ezekiel was instructed to "set [his] face toward the south" (20:46), defined as Jerusalem, its sanctuaries, and all the land of Israel i.e., Judah). The fire in the parable (20:47) represented a sword of judgment, i.e., the sword of Nebuchadnezzar and his armies (cf. vv.18–27). The green and dry trees symbolize the righteous and the wicked, respectively. God's judgment would be comprehensive. When God poured out his wrath on the sinners, the effects would cover the entire land from north to south. Each person would be touched by the sword of his fury. Both the righteous and the wicked would experience the land's devastation. Everyone would know that the Lord was the one who brought the judgment.

6–7 The effects of God's wrath on Judah would also be devastating. The people would lose strength. Ezekiel communicated these emotional responses to the people by groaning as one who was in emotional distress and in bitter anguish. When the exiles inquired as to the cause of his grief, he told them that he was a sign of the emotional distress they would have when God's judgment would come. At that time their hearts would melt, their spirits would faint, and their hands and knees would become weak like water.

b. The slaughter of the sword (21:8–17)

8–13 Ezekiel was instructed to sing a song (poem) about a sword, sharpened, polished, and ready for the slaughter, with the speed of lightning. The sword is pictured as ready to be taken by the hand of the slayer (identified as Nebuchadnezzar in vv.18–23).

Therefore, Ezekiel was to weep and wail, for the Babylonian sword of judgment was against Judah, God's people, especially her leaders. Ezekiel would strike his breast (or, better, "thigh"), a gesture of remorse, grief, and despair over this heartbreaking verdict (cf. Jer 31:19). The people of Judah had been tested and found wanting. Since the nation had failed the testing, the solemn question was whether Judah and her ruler ("the scepter," cf. v.10) would continue to exist. Would God's judgment be final?

Judah and the exiles were rejoicing and still hoping in the promise of the royal messianic line through the tribe of Judah. In Ge 49:10 both "scepter" and "my son" are used to describe the promise. The messianic overtones of Ge 49:9–10, together with the promises of the Davidic covenant (2Sa 7), were foundational to Judah's hope. The people were certain that God's messianic promises ("scepter of my son") would preserve them as a nation forever. They need not fear Ezekiel's pronouncements of judgment. However, they had forgotten the stipulation of discipline both in the Davidic covenant (2Sa 7:14) and in the cursing formula of the Mosaic covenant (Dt 28–29).

There was no immediate hope for contemporary Judah in the promises of Ge 49 (cf. v.27), for God would be faithful to exercise his justice in discipline on Judah and her current ruler in order to purify her. But the ultimate "scepter of Judah," the Messiah, would not be extinguished (cf. v.13). This was Judah's only hope in the midst of their current judgment. When Judah would ultimately be purified, then the "scepter" (Messiah) would rule over his people (cf. v.27).

14–17 Ezekiel clapped his hands in approval of the judgment but with scorn and contempt for the iniquity that had precipitated God's wrath. By this act Ezekiel demonstrated the Lord's attitude of justice toward Judah's sin and encouraged the sword's greater effectiveness. The intensity of the judgment was emphasized by the doubling and tripling of the sword; it became three times more effective than it normally would be. The sword totally encompassed the people; their hearts melted, and many fell in their gates in the lightning-fast invasion. Ultimately the sword seemed to be in God's hand. The judgment was comprehensive.

The song (poem) builds to a climax. The sword's devastation covered the entire country from right (or south) to left (or north), a play on words depicting the sharpening of the sword blade back and forth as well as the comprehensiveness of the judgment from north to south. The Lord gave his approval by clapping. But he also declared that his wrath would cease when this judgment was complete.

c. The imminent judgment by Babylonia (21:18–27)

18–21 The prophetic "sword song" is now integrated and reinforced by symbolic action. Ezekiel drew a map, perhaps in the dirt or on a brick, on which he made a road from Babylonia toward Canaan. He placed a signpost in the road where it forked, one branch leading toward Rabbath-Ammon, the capital of Ammon, and the other branch descending to Jerusalem. Damascus was the normal junction where the road divided. The king of Babylonia, Nebuchadnezzar, was shown standing at the fork in the road, using all manner of magic and divination to determine which nation he should attack first. The combined conspiracy of Judah and Ammon against Babylonia in 589 B.C. undoubtedly precipitated this coming of the Babylonian army.

Shaking arrows inscribed with personal or place names was a form of casting lots. Each arrow was marked with a name, the arrows placed in the quiver, the quiver whirled about, and the first arrow to fall out was the gods' decision. Household idols were intimately related to ancestral inheritance; perhaps also they were consulted as mediums, who were supposed to give guidance. The liver, being the seat of the life, was commonly examined with a decision being determined from its color or markings. Nebuchadnezzar used all three means of divination with the same result. Though God did not condone divination in any form, he as the sovereign God controlled all things. He controlled these pagan practices to accomplish his will (cf. Jer 27:6).

22–23 The unanimous decision of this divining was to pursue the path to Jerusalem and to lay siege to that city (cf. 4:2). The inhabitants of Judah responded in unbelief. They were convinced that this was false divination and continued to place confidence in their covenant treaties with Nebuchadnezzar or their Mosaic covenant with God. The phrase "sworn allegiance" likely refers to the treaty-oaths made with Babylonia, for contextually the two participants are Babylonia and Judah. Judah was placing unfounded confidence in treaties she had broken. This provided no security at all. On the contrary, Nebuchadnezzar ("he") would bring Judah's iniquity to remembrance when he, as God's instrument of wrath, destroyed the nation.

24–27 This message was concluded with a judicial sentence. Since Judah's sins had become manifest, Jerusalem would be seized; and the wicked prince of Israel, Zedekiah, would be cut off in this time of final punishment (in 586 B.C.). The removals of the priesthood and the kingship from Judah are pictured in the removal of the high priest's turban (Ex 28:4, 37, 39; 29:6; et al.) and the king's crown. These would not be rightly worn again "until he comes to whom it rightfully belongs," a clear reference to Ge 49:10 and the king-priest Messiah (cf. Heb 5–7). Ezekiel uses this reference with its messianic overtones to stress that the kingship (and priesthood) would be removed in judgment but returned ultimately in the Messiah's coming in accord with Ge 49:10. God's judgment would be so complete that everything would be "topsy-turvy" socially. The threefold repetition of "ruin" stresses the intensity of God's wrath and its destruction administered by Babylonia.

d. Postponement of judgment on Ammon (21:28–32)

28–32 The other route that Nebuchadnezzar could have taken at the fork in the road was the road to Ammon (cf. v.20). Since Ammon would mock and mistreat Judah in her collapse before Babylonia, Ezekiel sings the same "sword song" to Ammon. The Ammonites had seen empty visions and divined lies that would lead them to fall on Judah, "on the necks of the wicked who are to be slain," at their time of punishment for iniquity.

God, however, stayed Ammon's terrorizing of Judah by calling for the sword to be placed back into the sheath. Why this was done, we do not know. God would judge Ammon by the sword in their own land, where he would pour out indignation on them with the fire of his wrath, delivering them to men skilled in destruction who would devour them. This judgment on Ammon was not forgotten just because Babylonia chose to attack Jerusalem first. It was certain! The time element of this judgment is not certain, though it seems related to the judgment soon to be executed by Babylonia. Ammon would be remembered no more.

3. The cause of judgment: Judah's idolatrous rulers (22:1–31)

a. Deliberate disobedience to the Mosaic covenant (22:1–16)

1–2 Though Israel's history of wickedness demanded discipline, it was the abominations of contemporary Israel and her rulers that had ignited the punishment. Since the people had failed to see this fact, God directed Ezekiel to deliver three judgment messages to make this clear once more. The first detailed the manner in which the nation, led by her leaders in the capital city, Jerusalem, had broken the Mosaic covenant. The second emphasized God's burning judgment that would display the people's impurity. The third message stressed the failure of every aspect of Judah's society—especially her leadership—to follow God's ways.

Ezekiel would act as a prosecutor of the nation, thus causing the "city of bloodshed" to become conscious of all her sins that were the bases of the coming judgment. Jerusalem's chief characteristic was her bloodguiltiness, the taking of lives. This perversion resulted from her disobedience to God's law.

3–5 The accusation is stated in two parts: the abominations of Jerusalem (vv.3–5) and the abominations of Judah's rulers (vv.6–12). Jerusalem had committed murder in various ways; these are itemized in the elaboration of the leaders' wickedness (vv.6–12; cf. 18:15–17). But the underlying cause of this bloodshed was the idolatry in the capital city. Her inhabitants had covered the city with idols contrary to her divine calling, which, in turn, defiled her (Ex 20:3–7). Since pagan religious practices did not restrict human sacrifice and wicked ways, the influence of idolatry had fostered indiscriminate murder that brought God's judgment near. Jerusalem would become a reproach to the surrounding nations. They would laugh at her miserable state and her infamous reputation.

6 The chief cause of Jerusalem's wickedness had been her evil rulers, especially her recent kings (Manasseh and Jehoiakim) and prince (Zedekiah). Each had acted in his own strength to shed blood through the misuse of power (cf. 2Ki 21:16; 24:4). Each went as far as his power enabled him. Each broke the explicit prohibitions of the Mosaic covenant (Ex 20:13).

7–12 The rulers ignored the rightful place and authority of parents, thus destroying the home (cf. Ex 20:12; Lev 19:3). Socially these leaders were taking advantage of the helpless (cf. Ex 22:21–24; 23:9; Lev 19:33; Dt 24:17). The indifference of the rulers to those they ruled over was directly related to their indifference to the holy things of God. They profaned the Sabbaths, thereby demonstrating their rejection of the Mosaic covenant and their great God (cf. Ex 20:8; Lev 19:3).

On the contrary, the rulers engaged in heathen rituals (cf. Dt 12:1–2; 16:21–22). Using informers ("slanderous men") these leaders carried out premeditated murders (cf. Lev 19:16; 1Ki 21; Jer 6:28; 9:3). These same officials engaged in sexual sins (cf. Lev 18:6–23; 20:10–21). They prospered through illegitimate gain (cf. Ex 23:8; Dt 24:6, 10–12; 23:19–20; 27:25). But the main cause was, "You have forgotten me, declares the Sovereign LORD."

13–16 Ezekiel concludes this judgment speech with God's verdict of scorn for Jerusalem's dishonest gain and murder. God struck his hands in a gesture of disapproval. He even questioned Jerusalem concerning her ability to stand through the days of judgment. Would her heart and hands be able to stand God's discipline? The judgment would be threefold: dispersion among the nations, cleansing of Jerusalem's impurity, and Jerusalem's desecration before all the nations by the Babylonians. God's primary purpose in judgment, however, was to cause his people to know that he was the Lord, the only true God.

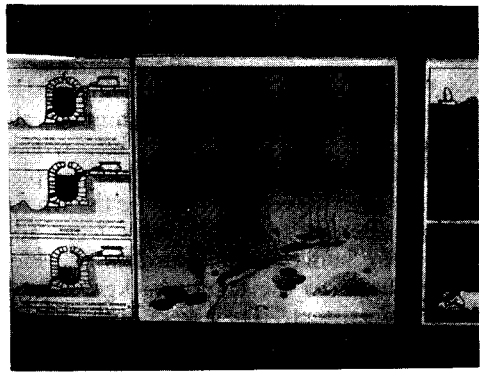
b. The purification of judgment (22:17–22)

17–22 The imagery of the smelting process is at the heart of this second judgment speech. Israel was shown to be worthless as dross already, as if from a previous smelting. Now she would once again be melted by the heat of God's wrath in the furnace of Jerusalem. This fire of God's wrath would literally be executed by the Babylonians when they burned and sacked Jerusalem. With this fiery trial, God desired to make himself and his justice known.

c. The void of righteous leaders (22:23–31)

23–29 The land of Judah was unclean and would therefore receive no "rain" of blessing in the day of judgment ("day of wrath"). Judah was an impure nation mainly because the people had failed in their responsibilities, especially those appointed as leaders. The "princes" (prophets?; see NIV note) had conspired against the people for the purpose of personal prosperity. They had led the people into situations (battle, rebellion, etc.) that had brought death to many, increasing the number of widows in the nation. These leaders were devouring lives like vicious lions.

The "priests" had done violence to that covenant by polluting God's holy statutes. They had failed to observe or to teach the distinction between the holy and profane, the clean and the unclean. They disregarded the observance of the Sabbath and profaned God through their pagan ritual practices.



After ore was extracted from the earth, it was placed in a smelter and heated, in order to melt out the metal. The picture to the left shows the actual remains of a smelter at the Philistine city of Timnah. The photo above is a diagram at that site explaining to visiters how ancient smelting was done.

The political "officials" in the land had acted like ravenous wolves, using violence to destroy people for personal gain. Through their false visions and lying divinations, the prophets had whitewashed their own impure motives and led the people astray by falsely claiming to have God's authority.

Finally, God condemned the people for following this corrupt leadership and maltreating one another. They had practiced extortion, robbery, and oppression of the poor, needy, and stranger through unjust avenues. It was everyone for himself, each doing what was for his own profit (cf. Jdg 21:25).

30–31 The Lord was unable to find anyone who would stand defensively, through spiritual leadership and intercession, for the nation against the impending judgment. Moses had stood in the breach of the wall before the Lord in his day, to intercede for his people and to instruct them in the ways of the Lord as a leader. But now God could find no one to step to the front and to lead Judah to repentance and to a godly walk according to the stipulations of the Mosaic covenant. There was no ruler who would intercede for them. They were all corrupt! Therefore, the Lord concluded this last message with a judgment verdict. He would consume the people with the fire of his wrath. They were responsible for the coming judgment!

4. An allegorical summary of Israel's political prostitution (23:1–49)

a. Israel's sordid youth (23:1–4)

1–4 Ezekiel concludes his discussion of Israel's defective leadership with a summary allegory of the political adultery into which Israel's corrupt rulers had led the people. Several distinct speeches comprise the whole allegory. Before specific oracles were addressed to Samaria and Jerusalem, Ezekiel briefly discusses the family background of these "two sisters." They were both "born" of the same "mother," an emphasis on their common origin from the united nation of Israel that existed from the time of Egypt to Solomon. It was during their stay in Egypt as youths that they had learned the trade of prostitution (cf. 16:26; 20:7–8; Nu 25:3–9). God did not hedge in describing clearly and concisely the crudeness and perversion of wickedness and sin.

The two sisters are named. Samaria, the older in the sense of initiating perverted relations with other nations and in receiving her punishment first, was named Oholah, which means "her tent." The significance of this name is not clear, unless it refers to her propensity for heathen tent-shrines. Jerusalem, the younger of the two sisters, was called Oholibah, meaning "my tent is in her." Perhaps this name refers to God's temple ("tent" or "tabernacle") that dwelt in the city of Jerusalem (cf. 2Sa 6:17; 1Ki 8:4; et al.). Both cities belonged to the Lord as his possession, specifically as his nations. Whether this statement of possession was meant to convey "marriage" or "parenthood" is not indicated within the text. Both cities bore children. These children are most likely their inhabitants and satellite towns.

b. Samaria's prostitution (23:5–10)

5–8 The older sister was the first to be accused of being unfaithful to the Lord by seeking security in the strength of other nations. Samaria, the capital of the northern kingdom of Israel, had particularly sought "relations" with Assyria as her "lover." She had seduced the governors, officials, and military leaders of Assyria to enter into relations with her, which they willingly did (cf. 2Ki 15:19–20; 17:3–4; et al.). Not only did Israel submit to political alliances with Assyria, but she likewise defiled herself by going after the idols and gods of Assyria. This spiritual and political prostitution had characterized this nation since she began to practice it in Egypt. What she had learned in her youth had created a habit pattern that was increasingly difficult to break.

9–10 Therefore, the Lord announced his verdict. He would give Samaria into the hands of her lovers, the Assyrians, who would strip her bare of her inhabitants by either taking them into captivity or slaying them with the sword. This occurred in 722 B.C. Assyria, the object of Israel's sinful lusts, became the instrument of Israel's judgment. Samaria's prostitution was so perverse that her name became a "byword" for an immoral woman.

c. Jerusalem's prostitution (23:11–35)

11–21 God turned to deliver his accusation against Samaria's younger sister, Jerusalem. Though Jerusalem, the capital of the southern kingdom of Judah, observed the consequences of Samaria's prostitution in her fall to Assyria in 722 B.C., she did not learn from Samaria's experience. Instead, Jerusalem proceeded to engage in more lustful and corrupt fornication than that of Samaria. Rather than seeing her mission to be a servant of the Lord bringing salvation to the nations, like a prostitute Jerusalem cleverly used the nations for her own advantage.

Like Samaria, Jerusalem's first major "lover" was also Assyria (cf. v.5; 2Ki 16:8; Isa 7:7–9). Judah then extended her prostitution to the Babylonians. She had inordinate affections for the Babylonian rulers (cf. Jer 22:21), seeing images of them on walls. Perhaps this was an allusion to some Judean envoys who were sent to Babylonia and saw the witness of her great power demonstrated on walls. Judah did send messengers to woo Babylonia into "relations" with her, and Babylonia complied by entering into such "relations" with Jerusalem (cf. 2Ki 23:32, 37). Judah became defiled through this political alliance. She had trusted in the world powers rather than in God's perfect security. Jerusalem, however, realized her error in part after she became a vassal of Babylonia. She became disgusted with the Babylonians after she was debased. But it was too late! God announced that he also had become disgusted with Jerusalem, which would be demonstrated by her fall in 586 B.C. to Nebuchadnezzar.

As if Jerusalem had not learned her lesson, she turned away from Babylonia only to turn to Egypt for aid (cf. Jer 2:18; 6:8; 37:5–7; La 1:17). Jerusalem still failed to learn that security lay in the Lord. Egypt was extremely anxious to enter into "relations" with Judah; for the pharaohs were planning intervention in Asia. Such desire on Egypt's part was portrayed by lustful donkeys and horses, while Jerusalem equally desired to renew the sexual perversion of her youth with Egypt.

22–27 Having accused Jerusalem of crass prostitution with the nations, the Lord announces his judgment verdict in four short speeches. The first speech stresses that he would use Jerusalem's "lovers" to execute judgment on her. The Babylonians whom Jerusalem then hated would be commissioned by God to judge Jerusalem through military aggression. Babylonia with all her entourage of vassal nations would assault Jerusalem with a hatred stirred by God's jealousy against Jerusalem.

The word "Chaldeans" (GK 4169) initially referred to the people living immediately north of the Persian Gulf. With the rise of the Neo-Babylonian Empire, however, the term was used for the entire Babylonian Empire.

Jerusalem's judgment is described in terms of ancient Near Eastern punishment for an adulteress: her "nose" and "ears" would be cut off. This was symbolized by the deportation of Judah's sons and daughters to Babylon (cf. 2Ki 24:10–16; 25:11; Da 1:1). The remainder of Jerusalem's inhabitants would die by the sword and fire (cf. 2Ki 25:18–21). Babylonia would strip Jerusalem of all her garments, leaving her disgraced as a prostitute. Jerusalem's "clothes" were her beautiful jewels, most likely a reference to her wealth and possessions (cf. v.46). The severity of Babylonian judgment and deportation would terminate Jerusalem's adulterous relationship with Egypt. Judah would forget Egypt and never seek aid from her again. Such has been the case ever since the Babylonian captivity in 586 B.C.

28–31 Babylonia's judgment on Jerusalem would demonstrate before all the nations the severity of Jerusalem's wicked adulterous ways. The desolation of Jerusalem would cause the nations to understand that Judah had erred greatly to receive such punishment. Jerusalem had committed political and spiritual adultery with the nations and their idols rather than trusting in the Lord for security and remaining faithful to him and his ways (cf. Ex 20:1–7; Dt 17:14–20). Since Jerusalem had followed Samaria's example and walked in her adulterous ways, she would share in the "cup" of Samaria's punishment.

32–34 The term "cup" (GK 3926) was often used by the prophets to refer to God's wrath. This "cup song" concentrates on the theme of judgment like the "sword song" (21:8–17). Jerusalem's "cup" of judgment would include ridicule and mocking. She would be drunken, sorrowful, horrified, and devastated. Jerusalem would drain the entire contents of God's wrath, shatter the pottery cup by casting it down, and tear her breasts in utter agony. The horror of her punishment was sobering.

35 The final message of these four judgment oracles is perhaps the most significant of all. The chief reason for Jerusalem's impending judgment was that she had forgotten the Lord. When a nation (or an individual) discards God, there is no other road to follow but that which leads to perversion and utter degradation.

d. Judgment for prostitution (23:36–49)

36–39 Though each city was treated separately in the immediately preceding messages, now the two sisters are combined. Ezekiel is exhorted to "judge" (GK 9146) both women—to prosecute them, exposing their abominations. They had committed spiritual adultery by worshiping idols rather than the Lord (cf. Ex 22:20; 23:13; Dt 4:15–24; 12:24–32). Part of this worship had involved child sacrifice, i.e., murder (cf. Ex 20:13; Lev 18:21; 20:1–5). The combination of idolatry and child sacrifice was performed in the Lord's sanctuary and thereby defiled it (cf. Ex 20:24–26). The implication was that these perversions were also performed on Sabbaths; thus they were profaned (cf. Ex 20:8–11; Lev 19:3, 30). In addition, the prophets had asserted that the Sabbath was neglected during most of the period of the divided kingdoms.

Samaria was equally condemned for defiling the temple. Perhaps she defiled the temple by her absence from proper worship in it and by her construction of heathen shrines.

40–42 These two "cities" were condemned for their adulterous political desires because they had sought out relationships with foreign nations for security alliances (cf. Dt 17:14–20). These two cities seduced foreign nations as a harlot lures lovers with her cosmetics and clothing, even offering them incense and oil of the Lord's sanctuary. All sorts of sordid "men" responded to the wooing, even drunkards from the desert— likely a reference to the Arabians, Moabites, Edomites, or Sabeans. These "lovers" gave Judah the hire of harlots—bracelets, crowns, etc.

43–47 God's indictment culminates in a summary verdict on "the one worn out by adultery." It was tragic that Jerusalem and/or Samaria would be known by this epithet. Those whom Jerusalem and Samaria lured into "relations" would now judge these two cities. Contextually the nations who would judge Jerusalem and Samaria (essentially Assyria and Babylonia) are called "righteous men." This implies that they were acting righteously in judging Samaria and Jerusalem (cf. Cyrus in Isa 41).

Assyria and Babylonia would judge Samaria and Jerusalem with the judgment prescribed for an adulteress and murderer in the Mosaic covenant: death, normally by stoning (cf. Ex 21:2; Lev 20:10; Dt 22:22). The "sisters" would be tossed about, robbed, stoned, and cut down with the sword; and their children would be murdered and their houses burned.

48–49 God's purpose in this judgment is fourfold. (1) Such discipline would put an end to wickedness in the Promised Land. (2) This judgment would instruct all other nations ("women") in the fruitlessness of following the same sort of unrighteousness. (3) It was necessary, however, that these two cities and their respective nations bear the punishment for the sin of their idolatry. (4) God must execute this punishment to bring Israel and Judah into a correct and proper knowledge of himself.

E. The Execution of Jerusalem's Judgment (24:1–27)

Until now Ezekiel had variously proclaimed the Lord's coming judgment on Jerusalem and Judah. He had systematically answered each argument against the impending judgment. Nothing remained except for the enactment of that discipline (ch. 24). The beginning of Babylonia's siege of Jerusalem is described. Then Ezekiel prophesies against the foreign nations who had abused Judah and mocked her during her judgments (25:1–33:20). These foreign nations would be judged for their wicked attitude and actions toward Judah. However, the hope of future restoration and blessing would be promised to Judah.

1. The parable of the cooking pot (24:1–14)

1–2 The date was the very day Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Jerusalem began: December/January 589/588 B.C. Through divine revelation Ezekiel understood that the fulfillment of his prophecies had begun, two years and five months from the date of his last series of messages (cf. 20:1). This chronological notice, based on the years of Jehoiachin's exile, is corroborated by similar notices in 2Ki 25:1 and Jer 39:1; 52:4, which were based on Zedekiah's regnal years. The years of Zedekiah's reign and the years of Jehoiachin's captivity were synchronous.

The Lord commanded Ezekiel to "record the date" in the sense of permanently noting it. This affirmed the validity of his prophecies so that the exiles would surely know that a prophet had been in their midst. This specific day became a memorial day in Israel's history, remembered by an annual fast (cf. Zec 8:19).

Chapters 24–25 contain three messages delivered on the date given in 24:1. The first two (in ch. 24) stress the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem. Verses 3–4 describe the siege with a parable and its interpretation. The features of God's judgment are renewed. The second message emphasizes the response that the exiles and the Judeans should have had to this siege (vv.15–27). Ezekiel is instructed to restrain his emotions after the death of his wife to show the people that they should not mourn over Jerusalem's destruction. After all, they had continually defiled God's sanctuary and had been warned of the imminent judgment, which came as no surprise. Finally, Ezekiel declares that the scorn of Judah's neighbors would not go unnoticed. Judah was reminded of the Lord's perfect justice in executing judgment on these nations as well as Judah.

3–8 Ezekiel's parable of the boiling pot was given to "the rebellious house," the people of Israel. The key to interpreting the parable is given in v.2: "The king of Babylon has laid siege to Jerusalem this very day." The parable was given in light of this siege of Jerusalem.

Ezekiel once again concentrates his message in a song, here in the "cooking pot song" (cf. 21:8–17; 23:32–34). The parable describes a pot being placed on burning bones. Water would be poured into the pot and pieces of choice mutton boiled vigorously.

Two interpretative speeches follow the parable, each interpreting and expanding the parable and then announcing a verdict. The first verdict-speech (vv.6–8) identifies the pot and stresses the reasons for Jerusalem's present judgment. The "pot" represents Jerusalem, "the city of bloodshed." The pieces of meat, choice members of the flock, are nowhere explicitly identified. Since the "pot" is Jerusalem, the context is one of a "siege" judgment; and the term "flock" was used elsewhere by Ezekiel almost entirely to represent the people of Israel (cf. ch. 34). Thus, the pieces of meat most likely picture Jerusalem's inhabitants, who would be "boiled" in the judgment fire of Nebuchadnezzar's siege. The parable portrays the siege of Jerusalem as her people boiling in the pot of God's wrath.

This first interpretative speech adds a new dimension of encrusted deposits on the pot. Verses 7–8 imply that these "deposits" represent the violent bloodshed of this "bloody city," which is like blood poured on a bare rock and not covered with dirt. Jerusalem had done nothing to cover (or to atone) for her bloodshed as required by the Mosaic covenant (Lev 17:13). Uncovered blood evoked God's vengeance (cf. Ge 4:10; Isa 26:21). The Lord declares that he has put Jerusalem's blood on the bare rock and would not allow it to be covered, so that his wrath might be poured out on her.

Another new feature is that after the cooking the pieces would be removed from the pot without favoritism. The concept of "casting lots" is that a "lot" would not fall on any person (piece of flesh), so that he would be granted favor to be removed to exile over against someone else. From a human perspective it is arbitrary and at random, but God is sovereign in all his doings.

9–14 The second verdict-speech continues the interpretation and expansion by emphasizing Jerusalem's purification through the judgment. Through the intense heat of the fire, the meat boiled until only the bones remained and were charred. On completion of this intense boiling (the siege), the contents were removed (deportation into exile) and the empty "pot" placed on the fire until it became red hot and "its heavy deposits" (filthiness of bloodshed) were melted and consumed. God would cleanse his holy city, Jerusalem. He had previously cleansed her (the deportations of 605 B.C. and 597 B.C.), but she was still unclean. She had become dirty and rusty again with the filthiness of her bloodshed. But the Lord's fire of judgment would now accomplish a complete work so that Jerusalem would be purified, but not till God caused his wrath on Jerusalem to cease. Ezekiel's entire prophecy implies that God's wrath would cease and that Israel will be cleansed completely when God begins to restore Israel to the land of Canaan in the end time (cf. 36:22–32).

This message is certain. God has spoken; he will do what he has said. He will not neglect this righteous judgment, for he is just. He spares no one in pity nor will he be sorry for anyone, for Jerusalem will receive the just due of her wicked deeds.

2. Signs to the exiles (24:15–27)

a. The death of Ezekiel's wife (24:15–24)

15–17 The Lord informs Ezekiel that shortly he would take Ezekiel's wife from him "with one blow," a phrase that normally refers to a plague or disease (cf. Ex 9:14). This predicted death of Ezekiel's wife is heightened when it is emphasized that she was "the delight of [his] eyes."

In the funeral rites of the ancient Near East, the mourner normally tears his garments and puts on sackcloth (2Sa 3:31). He removes his shoes and headdress (2Sa 15:30; Mic 1:8), shaves his head, and puts earth on his head (1Sa 4:12). The lower part of the face (from the mustache down) is covered with a veil of some sort (2Sa 15:30; 19:4). The mourner rolls his head or his whole body in dust and then lies, or sits, among a heap of ashes (Isa 58:5; Mic 1:10). He fasts for a day (2Sa 1:12; 3:35), after which friends bring "mourning bread" (Jer 16:7). Funeral lamentations are made by the family, relatives, and professional mourners (2Sa 1:17; 11:26; Mic 1:8).

In vv.16b–17 the Lord instructs Ezekiel not to use these normal procedures to mourn the loss of his wife. In fact, he was not to mourn at all, not even to shed a tear. He was only to groan silently. This was certainly an unnatural response to death, especially in the culture of Ezekiel's day. Priests mourned the death of a family member (Lev 21:1–3), but Ezekiel would not even be allowed that privilege.

18–19 Ezekiel probably shared this message with the people in the morning; in that evening his wife died. He faithfully responded to her death according to God's command, though undoubtedly this was one of the most difficult things he ever did. Only through the Lord's strength was he able to obey. Such an unnatural response to death immediately arrested the attention of his audience, and they readily inquired as to the meaning of his actions. Ezekiel's entire life was a testimony to the exiles.

20–24 The "delight" of the exiled people's eyes was the pride (2Ch 36:19; La 1:10–11) and affection that they had in the temple at Jerusalem (cf. v.25). However, the Lord would defile the temple and slay the Judean children in the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem. Ezekiel was to be a sign to them. They were to respond to the destruction of the temple and the death of their children in the same manner that Ezekiel responded to the death of his wife. Just as the delight of his eyes (his wife) was taken, so the delight of their eyes (the temple and their children) would be taken. They were not to mourn because Jerusalem's fall had been foretold by the prophets. Judgment should have been expected!

b. The removal of Ezekiel's muteness (24:25–27)

25–27 The Lord announces that Ezekiel's muteness (cf. 3:25–27) would be removed when the siege of Jerusalem was completed. On the day Jerusalem fell, a fugitive would escape to bring the news of Jerusalem's collapse to Ezekiel in Babylon. On the day that the fugitive arrived in Babylon, Ezekiel's mouth would be opened; he would have the freedom to move among his people and proclaim the message of hope for the future. He would once again intercede before the Lord on their behalf. This fulfillment is described in 33:21–22 (cf. 2Ki 25:8), in the very night on which Ezekiel delivered his great message of hope for Israel (33:31–39:29). The removal of his muteness would be another affirmation of Ezekiel's prophetic gift to the exiles. When they saw the fulfillment of the Lord's messages through his prophets, then the exiles would know that the Lord was the God of Israel.

III. Judgment on the Foreign Nations (25:1–33:20)

A. Judgment on Judah's Closest Neighbors (25:1–17)

1. Judgment on Ammon (25:1–7)

1–7 In 25:1–33:20 the prophet thematically groups all the oracles against foreign nations that he received from the Lord (cf. Isa 13–23; Jer 46–51). Though delivered at different times, topically they form a singular unit, significantly placed at this point in the book. Ezekiel had warned Judah of judgment in the first twenty-three chapters. Chapter 24 climaxed these warnings with the announcement of the beginning of Judah's foretold punishment. With the fall of Judah and Jerusalem, Ezekiel turns to announce judgment on the foreign nations that had in some manner cursed Israel (cf. 25:1–33:20; cf. Ge 12:3). By inserting these judgment oracles against the nations here, he concludes the book decisively and constructively with promise. Receiving a renewed commission in 33:1–20, Ezekiel closes his prophecy with the encouraging announcement that Israel would be brought back safely to the Promised Land (33:21–48:35).

Chapter 25 does not start a new series of messages. The four short oracles against Judah's immediate neighbors continue Ezekiel's dated judgment message begun at 24:1. The messages in this series announce judgment on Judah and then turn to denounce the surrounding nations that had rejoiced over Judah's downfall and had hoped for personal spoil and gain. God announces judgment on these nations lest their gleeful taunts continue and the exiles question his faithfulness to his promises.

The judgment announced on these nations had already been predicted several times by Jeremiah (Jer 9:25–26; 25:1–26; 27:1–11; 48:1–49:22). Nebuchadnezzar and his Babylonian armies would be the instrument of judgment on these nations as well as on Judah. They too would experience captivity in Babylonia for seventy years (Jer 25:11). Long ago God had promised that those who cursed Israel would be cursed (Ge 12:3). Now he would bring that "cursing" on these nations. Judgment would continue until the second coming of Christ, when the Lord will reign over them (cf. Isa 11:14; Da 11:41; Joel 3:1–4). Thus God's perspective of judgment extends from the immediate judgment by Babylonia to the end times.

Ezekiel was to prophesy against the children of Ammon, exhorting them to listen to God's word and not the message of their own gods. Judgment on Ammon has already been briefly discussed in 21:20, 28–32; but at that point in Ezekiel's argument Ammon's judgment was deferred until the prior discipline of Jerusalem was executed. The accusation and verdict against Ammon are stated in vv.3–5 and 6–7: Ammon is accused of expressing satisfaction over the misfortune of Judah, her enemy and rival. This was clearly shown by the interjection "Aha!" The Ammonites had clapped their hands and stamped their feet in joyous contempt over the temple's defilement (cf. 24:21), the desolation of the land of Judah, and the captivity of the Judean people by Babylonia.

God was ready to give the Ammonites as a possession to the "people of the East," who would exploit the land of Ammon by settling down in it and eating the produce of that country. The desolation of the land would be symbolized by the use of Rabbah, their capital, as a pasture for camels and the use of their land as a resting place for flocks. The "people of the East" are not identified here; but the immediate context, parallel passages, and ancient history all argue for the designation of "Babylonia." Ezekiel's proclamation of God's continuing purpose for judgment did not change in his announcement of judgment on Ammon. God desired that this discipline would cause the Ammonites to know that he was the Lord, the God of Israel, the only true God.

2. Judgment on Moab (25:8–11)

8–11 Moab had cursed the people of Israel, being disrespectful of Judah's divine election as an instrument of blessing to the world. Moab had likened Judah to all other nations because she had fallen to Babylonia. Such a defeat indicated to Moab and other nations that Judah's God was weak. Therefore, any special calling of Judah by that God was considered a joke. So Moab laughed at Judah's defeat in light of her professed election (Jer 48:27; Zep 2:8–9). Edom, known elsewhere in the OT as "Seir" (cf. Ge 32:3: 36:30: Eze 35), shared with Moab this same disdain of Judah. A more complete accusation of Edom follows in the next judgment speech.

The verdict on Moab manifested God's promise to curse those who curse Israel (cf. Ge 12:3). The Lord would expose Moab's northwest flank (the mountain plateau overlooking the Jordan rift) to the invasion of "the people of the East" (the Babylonians attacked Moab in 583/582 B.C.). The attack would begin on this shoulder of the land of Moab, along a line drawn from north to south between the cities of Beth Jeshimoth (in the Jordan Valley), Baal Meon (about five miles southwest of Madebah), and Kiriathaim (location uncertain), "the glory of the land" (the best part). The people of Moab would be given as a possession to these "people of the East," along with the children of Ammon, implying that the same invasion was involved. Moab would be exiled and laid desolate (Jer 48:7–9). Neither Moab nor Ammon would "be remembered among the nations" until the end times. This judgment was to begin with Nebuchadnezzar and conclude with the second coming of the Lord. God's consistent purpose in judgment is stated again: that Moab would come to know that he is the Lord, the only true God.

3. Judgment on Edom (25:12–14)

12–14 The accusation against Edom centered on her perpetual attitude of vengeance against Judah, an attitude that began with the conflict between Jacob (Israel) and Esau (Edom; cf. Ge 25:30; 27:41–46; 32:4). Edom had desired to possess Israel and Judah (35:10) and had joined Ammon and Moab in degrading Judah (cf. v.8; 36:5; Ps 137:1, 7–9). She had committed grievous acts against Judah. Edom's behavior was inexcusable because he was a twin brother! Israel respected this solidarity, but Edom spurned it.

Therefore, God announces his verdict on Edom, a judgment that is expanded in 35:1–36:15. Edom would become a desolation as the Lord cut off both humankind and cattle from that land. This devastation would be comprehensive from Teman to Dedan. Other passages indicate that this punishment would be executed by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 9:26; 25:21; 27:1–11; cf. Eze 32:29; Mal 1:2–5). However, God also declares that he would execute his vengeance on Edom in return for its vengeance on Judah, and that he would do so through the instrumentality of Israel. The historical context of Ezekiel's day precludes this event from happening at that time. However, Ezekiel and other prophets declared that Israel would possess Edom in the end time (cf. 35:1–36:15; Isa 11:14; Da 11:41, Am 9:12; Ob 18).

The purpose of God's judgment on Edom is stated differently than the norm: Edom would know God's vengeance in his judgment. They would understand that he was the faithful God of Israel who would curse those who cursed his people. In turn Edom would observe that he was the only true God.

4. Judgment on Philistia (25:15–17)

15–17 Ezekiel moves geographically clockwise as he announced judgment on Judah's closest neighbors. The Philistines also were accused of responding with vengeance against Judah, especially with contempt and perpetual enmity. Their goal was to destroy Judah. Such continual hostility against Israel by Philistia had been demonstrated in its interaction with Samson (Jdg 13–16), Eli (1Sa 4), Saul (1Sa 13; 31), David (2Sa 5), Hezekiah (2Ki 18:8), Jehoram (2Ch 21:16–17), and Ahaz (2Ch 28:18). God's judgment verdict declares that he would "cut off the Kerethites," a synecdoche for "Philistines" or a portion of them (1Sa 30:14; Zep 2:5). God's great vengeance against them was a judgment "in kind" for their revengeful attitude and actions against Judah. His destruction of Philistia would be complete, even consuming the remnant of them that were on the coast. His wrath, however, was for correction, so that Philistia would come to know through this act on them that he was the only true God.

Though the time of this punishment on Philistia was not stated, the context assumes the same time as the three verdicts executed on Ammon, Moab, and Edom by Babylon (cf. Jer 25:20; 47:1–7). The ultimate fruition of this judgment will be realized when Israel possesses Philistia in the end time (cf. Isa 11:14; Joel 3:1–4; Ob 19; Zep 2:4–7).

B. Judgment on Tyre (26:1–28:19)

1. Judgment by Babylon (26:1–21)

a. A judgment oracle against Tyre (26:1–14)

1–6 Ezekiel turns toward the north to announce judgment on the city of Tyre and its environs. The length of this oracle suggests the political and religious significance of this city. His indictment of Tyre is set forth in a series of four messages: a judgment speech with explanatory appendixes (26:1–21); a funeral dirge over the fall of the city (27:1–36); a judgment speech against the prince of Tyre (28:1–10); and a funeral dirge over the fall of the king of Tyre (28:11–19).

The date for these four oracles is given as "the eleventh year, on the first day of the month." The specific month was not stated. It seems that these oracles were pronounced against Tyre while the siege of Jerusalem was in process in the "eleventh" year.

Tyre is first mentioned as a strong, fortified town that formed part of the boundary of the inheritance of the tribe of Asher (Jos 19:29). Tyre had been prominent in the days of David and Solomon. Hiram, Solomon's contemporary, enlarged and beautified the city. It became an important maritime city of the ancient Near East. With the rise of Assyria to power, Tyre periodically submitted to Assyria's lordship, paying tribute out of the abundance of her wealth. Whenever possible, however, Tyre rebelled against the Assyrian power and withstood the Assyrian retribution in the security of its island fortress (as in the case of Sennacherib). As Assyria began to decline in strength, Tyre exerted her complete independence. Tyre was in this latter condition when these oracles were delivered.

Verses 1b–6 compose the basic judgment speech against Tyre with the accusation stated in v.2 and the verdict delivered in vv.3–6. Tyre was accused of delighting in the prospects of Jerusalem's downfall so that she might obtain the spoils of the city and the advantages of its fall (e.g., Jerusalem controlled the trade routes connecting Egypt and Arabia with the north). "Aha!" expresses Tyre's satisfaction over Jerusalem's misfortune. Tyre looked forward to the "gate to the nations" being broken down. The term "doors" refers to the gates of Jerusalem, which would be broken for the access to the nations. Jerusalem's gates would be broken by Babylonia and opened to Tyre.

Tyre's major desire was to be filled with the spoils of Jerusalem and with the opportunities, since Jerusalem lay "in ruins," that would then be hers in western Asia. The Babylonians had taken Jerusalem, leaving it open for Tyre to take advantage of the spoils of Jerusalem. It was this incessant desire for wealth and riches that brought God's wrath on Tyre in fulfillment of his promise in Ge 12:3.

God, who was personally against Tyre, would bring many nations successively, like the waves of the sea, to destroy Tyre and make her like a bare rock, useful only for drying nets. "Out in the sea" describes Tyre's almost impregnable situation. The cliffs of Moab, the heights of Edom, and the island fortress of Tyre were no defense against the sovereign Lord. Tyre would become spoil for all nations, just as she sought to spoil Jerusalem. Even Tyre's outlying coastal settlements would be destroyed. But even through this prolonged judgment, God's purpose would be that Tyre would too come to know that he was the Lord, the only true God.

The siege of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar lasted for thirteen years (c. 586–573 B.C.). However, when Babylonia declined in power, Tyre regained her independence once again. This brief freedom lasted till the second "wave" of destruction brought her into submission to the Persians around 525 B.C. Tyre's remaining history demonstrated the continuing "waves" of conquerors. God was faithful to bring the "many nations" against Tyre in successive "waves" of conquest. The Lord Jesus did bring his preaching and healing ministry to this heathen city (Mt 15:21; Mk 7:24–31; Lk 6:17). Her responsibility and judgment would be less than that of the Galileans who rejected Christ's constant ministry to them (Mt 11:21–22; Lk 10:13–14).

7–14 Nebuchadnezzar and his great army are identified in v.7. The process of his siege of Tyre is fully described. The city's destruction and the slaying of its inhabitants are described, followed by the taking of spoils and the demolition of the remaining glories of Tyre. The change from "he" to "they" in v.12 may demonstrate a broadening of the instrument of judgment from Babylonia to the many future nations that would plunder Tyre. Alexander the Great literally threw Tyre's "stones, timber and rubble into the sea" when he built a one-half mile causeway out to the island fortress to conquer the city.

Tyre's desolation is emphasized by the lack of any song in the city (an indication of cessation of normal social activities) and by the town's bareness portrayed by the figure of a bare rock used only for spreading fishing nets to dry.

b. The response of vassal nations to Tyre's fall (26:15–18)

15–18 Tyre had many vassals who had depended on her as their protector. Ezekiel prophesies that when the news of Tyre's fall to Babylonia is received by these peoples, they would be terribly frightened. Their princes would abdicate their thrones, perhaps in an act of surrender and submission to Babylonia before she attacked them. As mourners they would not sing a lament song in luxurious dress. They would be stunned and stand amazed as to how Tyre could fall. These vassal rulers would sing a funeral dirge over the deceased Tyre. Ironically, Tyre had the poor sense to rejoice over Jerusalem's fall. These cities, however, had the good sense to realize that Tyre's fall spelled the same for them.

c. The Lord's concluding verdict (26:19–21)

19–21 A prophecy of Tyre's eternal death was certainly an appropriate response to the funeral dirge of the nations. Ezekiel refers to the imagery of vv.3-6 to pinpoint the aspect of the previous message that he wants to expand. At the time that Tyre would be made a ruin by the great waves of nations (v.3) and left as a barren rock (v.4), God would make sure that she never again regained her place of prominence on this earth. Tyre would die. She would "go down to the pit," as had those in the past who had already died. In her ruined state she would be as if she dwelt in Sheol in the earth below. Also, Tyre would never again exist and play an important role in history as she had in the past. Though some might look for her, she would not be found.

2. Ezekiel's funeral dirge over Tyre (27:1–36)

a. The building of Tyre's ship of pride (27:1–11)

1–3 A previous dirge had been sung by neighboring kings (26:15–18). This new message is another funeral lament, but one that Ezekiel himself sings at Tyre's death. The chief cause for this major maritime power's collapse was her pride. Tyre became full of self-conceit, presuming herself to be "perfect" in all she had acquired through trade with the nations. The Lord hates pride (Pr 8:13; 16:18).

4–11 The destruction of Tyre would be lamented like the wreck of a magnificent ship. The imagery is sustained through the poem and climaxes in the wreckage. In typical dirge style the deceased's former splendor is first accented. Ezekiel uses the imagery of a ship being constructed and equipped to show Tyre's pride and development of prominence and dominion as a maritime empire.

Tyre's domain was in the heart of the sea. Her sea traffic extended throughout the ancient Near East. She obtained the finest materials through maritime trade. She used her dominion over other nations to build and beautify her own "ship" (Tyre). The wood for the frame (pine or fir) came from the district of Mount Hermon (Senir), while her "mast" was made from choice cedars of Lebanon. The ship's "oars" were from the oaks of Bashan; and her "deck," inlaid with ivory, was made from cypress wood from Cyprus. Her "sail" and "banner" were made of Egypt's fine linen, while her "awnings" were made of purple and blue textiles of Elishah. These verses convey the idea that Tyre's development into a beautiful and great maritime city-state came through acquiring the finest materials of her day from the areas that produced them. She obtained these materials through the prominence and power of her sea merchants.

Those who engineered the development and expansion of Tyre's merchant activity were native Phoenicians. Tyre secured the best-trained veteran sea merchants from the Phoenician cities of Sidon, Arvad, and Gebal (Byblos) to be her "crew" and "shipwrights." However, the intelligentsia of Tyre actually "sailed" the ship. She was so adept at sea trade that soon everyone traded with her. In turn this necessitated armed protection of her city and ships. She was then able to attract military mercenaries from far-off Persia, Lydia, and Put (in Africa), as well as more local soldiers from Arvad, Helech, and Gammad. Tyre's ability to allure these mercenaries came undoubtedly from her splendor, wealth, and power. In turn, the presence of these foreigners enhanced Tyre's significance. Truly Tyre became a magnificent maritime empire that attracted nations from all over the ancient Near East to trade with her and to come and experience her greatness as a city. In light of this Tyre could say, "I am perfect in beauty."

b. Tyre's vast commercial relations (27:12–24)

12–24 The nations desired to trade with Tyre because of the abundance of goods she had to trade. The list of geographic locations and the major items that each nation had to trade show the extent, abundance, and variety of Tyre's trade. Tyre traded with almost every region: from Tarshish (Spain) to northeast Anatolia (Tubal, Beth Togarmah) on an east-west axis (through the Aegean), and from Arabia through Syria and Palestine on a north-south axis.

c. The sinking of the ship of Tyre (27:25–36)

25–27 This last section of Ezekiel's funeral lament over Tyre gives God's verdict and the nation's response. The imagery of a sinking ship continues the metaphor and portrays Tyre's demise. Laden with all the wealth of the nations and her resulting pride in materialism, the "ship" became extremely vulnerable to the "seas." Led out on the high seas of commercial adventure by her obsession for more wealth, Tyre quickly succumbed to the strong "east wind" of Babylonia. All Tyre's "cargo" of wealth, materialism, and pride, along with those serving her, sank suddenly into the sea.

28–36 Those who had traded with Tyre quickly "abandoned their ships," i.e., their work for Tyre, and they stood stunned and shocked on the shore. They bitterly mourned for Tyre's death by putting on sackcloth, shaving their heads, placing dust on their heads, and rolling in ashes. They had never seen anyone collapse as quickly as Tyre. She had been supreme in the maritime world, constantly satisfying others with her wares, but now nothing was left. It had all sunk into the sea. Tyre was nonexistent.

The nations and kings who had traded with Tyre became afraid that they too would have the same thing happen to them (cf. 26:17–18). In fear and self-protection, they quickly turned from being ones who adored Tyre to ones who totally disowned her. They hissed at her in a derogatory manner. How quickly the proud fall! Tyre found this out. She would exist no more!

3. A judgment speech against the ruler of Tyre (28:1–10)

1–5 God commands Ezekiel to deliver a final judgment speech against the ruler of Tyre. Tyre's king is described as a very wise man. But he was so impressed with himself that he actually began to think that he was a god. He was sitting on the "throne of a god [Melkart, Tyre's patron deity] in the heart of the seas." This arrogant pride and self-exaltation as a god brought God's accusation against Tyre's ruler. God charged that Tyre's ruler was not a god but merely a man. God questioned whether Tyre's ruler was as wise as Daniel, the prophet who had revealed secrets to Nebuchadnezzar. Did Tyre's ruler know all secrets? No! Tyre's ruler was only a man.

6–10 Ezekiel announces the verdict against Tyre's ruler. God would humble him by bringing him to a horrible, disgraceful death, the death of the uncircumcised at the hand of ruthless foreigners. Phoenicians practiced circumcision; so to be slain as an uncircumcised male would be to die a barbarian's death. No longer would he have beauty and splendor. Strangers' swords would cut off his wealth and grandeur. God mocked the ruler's claim to divinity by declaring that the ruler would not claim deity before his slayers but would be a mere mortal in their hands.

4. A funeral dirge for the king of Tyre (28:11–19)

This is one of the more difficult passages in the book of Ezekiel–if not in the whole Bible! The most logical and expected understanding of this section is to see it as Ezekiel's funeral lament for Tyre's king. The progression of the prophecies against Tyre have alternated judgment speeches with funeral laments. Since 28:1–10 set forth a judgment speech against Tyre's ruler, one would expect 28:11–19 to be the corresponding funeral dirge for this king. Many, however, have understood the king of Tyre to be Satan. But this interpretation has its difficulties, as will be noted below. Therefore, the most natural and logical understanding of these verses is that the human king of Tyre is the person under discussion.

11–12 The main difficulty in this passage lies in explaining the description given for this king. He is said here to be full of wisdom and perfect in beauty, concepts already conveyed about Tyre's ruler and his city. He is also "the model of perfection [lit., the one sealing a plan]." As Tyre's king and the mastermind of the city's commercial sea traffic, it is easy to understand how he would be known as the one whose plan enabled the city to become the maritime leader of its day.

13a This individual was also declared to have been in "Eden, the garden of God." The word "God" could refer either to the true God or to a god. "Eden" may refer to the Paradise described in Ge 1–3. It probably is a simile to portray the splendor of a given geographical area, its most common use (cf. Ge 13:10; Eze 31:9). It is impossible that Tyre's contemporary king was in the Garden of Eden at the time of creation; thus many argue that Tyre's king is Satan (see Ge 3). However, several conjectures about Satan need to be made if one chooses this interpretation.

If Tyre's literal king is in view, then a possible solution may be found in understanding ancient Near Eastern temples. These temples normally encompassed a large enclosure with a garden. If the term for "God" is understood as "god," then perhaps "Eden, a garden of a god" metaphorically describes the splendor of the temple complex of Melkart ("king of the city"), with whom Tyre's human king sought identity. Admittedly the phrase "you were in Eden, the garden of God" is a difficult obstacle to the interpretation, though plausible solutions do exist.

13b–14a In the ancient Near East a "cherub" (GK 4131) was understood to be a sphinxlike creature with an animal body (normally a bull or lion), wings, and a human head. These statutory creatures normally guarded the entrances to pagan temples. The cherubim of God guarded the ark of the covenant and the Garden of Eden, and they formed the throne-chariot of God. It seems that Tyre's king was identifying himself with the patron deity of Tyre, Melkart, directly or symbolically, as the god's guardian sphinx. The Phoenician male-sphinx (or cherub) was normally bejeweled and sometimes had the head of the priest-king. The sphinx was considered to be all-wise. Such a description fits well, for the king is called a guardian cherub (sphinx), and the many jewels listed as his covering befit the many jewels that adorned the Phoenician sphinx (cherub). The passage would then be declaring that the king of Tyre had become as the guardian cherub for the god Melkart and was bejeweled with his riches as a cherub-sphinx normally was. The term "created" is used in the sense of bringing the king to the throne. God is always the Creator; so this would demonstrate that it was the true God who had sovereignly placed this king on the throne of Tyre.

To assume that the stones were the garment of Satan in the Garden of Eden and that Satan was a guardian cherub of Eden are purely hypotheses. In fact, neither Michael nor Gabriel (archangels) is described as a cherub, and Satan was no doubt on the same level as these before his fall.

14b The phrase "holy mount" is consistently used to describe Jerusalem and/or Zion as the central place of worship and the dwelling place of the Lord (Ps 99:9; Isa 56:56:7). It is to "my holy mountain" that the children of Israel will be regathered in the millennial kingdom (Isa 11:9: 65:25). If "the holy mount of God" refers to Jerusalem, then this means that the king of Tyre was in (not on) the city of Jerusalem walking amid fiery stones after Babylonia destroyed Jerusalem. However, the ritual of burning a god has been discovered on a bowl from Sidon and is recorded in the cult of Melkart at Tyre. Melkart's resurrection was celebrated by a "burning in effigy," from which he would then be revitalized through the fire and the smelling of the burnt offering. Therefore, in keeping with the Phoenician religious-cultural background, perhaps the explanation of walking among the fiery stones is a reference to the king's self-exaltation of himself even as the god Melkart, to the extent of his claiming resurrection after burning by fire.

The "holy mount of God" is never used in Scripture to mean heaven, which would have to be its interpretation if the king of Tyre is identified with Satan. Likewise, walking among the fiery stones would be an enigma if Satan is the person described here.

15–19 Last, this king is declared to be perfect in his ways from the day he was created till he sinned. "Perfect" (GK 4003) does not mean "sinless perfection" but implies that one was blameless or unobjectionable in a given area. The king of Tyre was a good king against whom objections were not raised from the moment of his coronation until pride possessed him and he sinned.

The king of Tyre's sin of pride arose from the splendor he achieved through his vast commercial traffic. His obsession for material gain opened the city to all the evils prevalent in commercial traffic. He became filled with violence. His wisdom was dulled by the glitter of wealth and splendor. He also profaned his sanctuaries—likely a reference to the idolatries practiced in the temple of Melkart. Such a description is totally unfitting for Satan. Only by seeing Satan as the force behind Tyre's king and the spirit working in him can one even begin to relate these verses to Satan.

This funeral lament concludes with a description of the fall of this king under God's judgment. God would bring him down in disgrace from his self-deification, from "the mount of god." As a cherub he would be eliminated from the area of the fiery stones, i.e., his professed immortality by fiery resurrection would be destroyed when he died (or he would be removed from taking spoils from Jerusalem). God would cast him to the ground before all the world's kings and cause fire to come forth from him to devour him. Just what is meant by fire coming out from the king is not clear. His death would be sudden and horrible, and he would exist no more. Certainly this description is befitting a human but does not coincide with what we know of Satan's fall and ultimate destruction.

Thus Tyre's king is best understood as the literal human contemporary king of that city in Ezekiel's day. Each characteristic can be explained in light of the cultural and religious context of that day. Contrarily, to identify the king as Satan requires far too much presupposition. Most of these descriptions—if they do in fact relate to Satan—are revealed nowhere else in Scripture.

C. Judgment on Sidon (28:20–24)

20–24 Sidon, a sister city of Tyre, lay in the shadow of Tyre's maritime leadership in Ezekiel's day. God's judgment on Sidon would consist of a plague and death by the sword. Bloodshed would be rampant, but God's judgment was a manifestation of his grace, for therein the Lord was glorified when the Sidonians realized that he is truly the Lord and God. God's holiness demands that he be just and execute judgment on sin. This holiness was demonstrated in his judgment on sinful Sidon.

Verse 24 summarizes the previous judgment oracles against the nations (chs. 25–28). When these judgments are completed, Israel would be free from these despising and harassing nations' constant pain that she had received for so long. Israel would then recognize and know that the Lord truly is her God.

D. Israel's Restoration From the Nations (28:25–26)

25–26 By the judgment of the nations around Israel, Ezekiel encourages the exiles that God faithfully exercises his righteousness against other nations as well as against Judah. He encourages them further with a reminder that the Lord will regather them from among all the nations where they have been scattered. This restoration will take place when God executes his judgments on the nations, judgments that will not be completed until the end times. By regathering Israel God will demonstrate that he is the holy God, unique and distinct.

When the Lord restores Israel to Canaan, he will show his immutable character of faithfulness. He promised this land to Abraham (Ge 12:7), Isaac (Ge 26:3), and Jacob (Ge 35:12) in the Abrahamic covenant. The Lord will cause his people to live in that land in security and prosperity. At that time they will know without doubt that he is the Lord their God.

E. Judgment on Egypt (29:1–32:32)

Ezekiel concludes his prophecies against the nations with six judgment messages against Egypt. Egypt had played a significant role in the final days of the Judean kingdom. From 609 B.C. until her fall to Babylonia in 605 B.C., Egypt had dominated Judah. With the momentous victory over Egypt at Carchemish, Babylonia began to rule Judah. Nevertheless Egypt continued to try to regain the Judean allegiance, frequently encouraging Judah to rebel against Babylonia. The Egyptian Pharaoh Hophra tried unsuccessfully to interrupt the Babylonians' siege of Jerusalem.

Ezekiel's prophecies reflect this historical and chronological orientation. The advancement of Egyptian forces into Palestine under Hophra during Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Jerusalem seems to have precipitated this series of oracles. Ezekiel's first message is a general prophecy of Egypt's complete desolation because of her pride and her unreliable support of Judah (29:1–16). In his third prophecy (30:20–26), Ezekiel refers to the defeats of Pharaoh Hophra by the Babylonian forces; this was only the beginning of God's judgments on Egypt. The entire nation would be destroyed because of Egypt's arrogant pride, a haughtiness that Ezekiel likens to that of Assyria at her height of power. But as Assyria was brought down by God, so also Egypt would fall (see Ezekiel's fourth message, 31:1–18). The prophet follows his judgment messages with a lament over Egypt's demise (32:1–16). A summary of his oracles of judgment against Egypt and a warning to the Judean exiles to turn to the Lord and live while there was still opportunity conclude Ezekiel's prophecies (32:17–33:20).

The second prophecy (29:17–30:19) is chronologically out of place; Ezekiel's thematic concern overweighs his chronological concern. By placing this chronologically final message immediately after the introductory prophecy of December/January 588/587 B.C. (29:1–16), Ezekiel provides an immediate and a full understanding that Egypt's ultimate and complete destruction, as foretold in that first message, would come through the Babylonians after 571 B.C. Likewise, the placement of the 571 B.C. message (29:17–30:19) after the introductory prophecy against Egypt provides a transition from the judgments on Tyre to those on Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar was the instrument of judgment on Tyre; but since he did not secure the spoils of war from that city because of Egypt's intervention, God said he would give Egypt as spoils to Babylonia instead. Finally, with the knowledge of ultimate judgment on Egypt acquired, each succeeding prophecy in this series of six messages can be better understood.

1. The introductory prophecy of judgment on Egypt (29:1–16)

1–7 Pharaoh is likened to a crocodile ("monster"; GK 9490) in the midst of the Nile that the Lord would catch, pull from the Nile, and leave on the dry land to die. Though the word used here may be translated either "monster" or "crocodile," it seems best in light of Egyptian culture and religion to use the imagery most fitting to the Egyptians. The "crocodile" was a fearful creature of the Nile. It was normally caught with hooks in the jaws and then pulled on dry land where it would be slaughtered. The crocodile god was considered Egypt's protector.

In the imagery the crocodile represented the pharaoh, the protector of Egypt, who dominated the Nile (i.e., all Egypt). This was Hophra's arrogant self-image. In his reign he sent an expedition against Cyprus, besieged and took Gaza (cf. Jer 47:1) and the city of Sidon, was victorious against Tyre by sea, and considered himself master over Palestine and Phoenicia. Such pride was consistent with the denunciation in this message, for the pharaoh felt that the Nile (Egypt) belonged to him and that he had created it for himself. This arrogance had also shown itself in an attempt to interrupt Babylonia's siege of Jerusalem—an attempt thwarted by God.

The imagery of catching a crocodile beautifully expresses God's judgment on the pharaoh. He would be pulled from his position of dominance and pride and left as carnage for the birds and animals. He would not even be afforded the royal burial so important to the pharaohs, a horrible fate. The indictment was broadened to include all Egyptians ("fish"?), for as a nation they had failed to be of political support to Israel. Rather, they were as a staff made of reeds that shattered when Israel leaned on it, seriously wounding her (cf. Isa 36:6).

8–16 Both the pharaoh and all Egypt would perish, and the land would become desolate when God brought the sword against that land because of their pride. The desolation would affect the entire country from Migdol in the northeast delta to Seveneh (located at modern Aswan opposite Elephantine Island on the east bank near the first cataract). These sites were ancient Egypt's northern and southern boundaries. The judgment would also extend into Cush (modern Ethiopia), between the Nile's second and third cataracts. The streams or canals in the Nile's delta would be affected also (cf. 30:12; 32:13–14).

While Egypt was desolate for forty years, her inhabitants would be scattered among the nations at the hands of the Babylonians. Egypt's fate was like a repetition of Judah's (cf. the forty years parallel in 4:6). If Egypt fell to the Babylonians about 568 B.C., as implied in the chronicles of the Babylonian kings, then a forty-year "captivity" of Egypt would end under the Persians. Since the Persians returned many of the peoples displaced by the Babylonians, this very well may be the case. Just because there is no direct statement in ancient history concerning this dispersion does not mean that it did not occur. God's word is more valid than our conjectures or ignorance.

When Egypt would be restored to her land after forty years, she would inhabit the area of Pathros or "Upper Egypt," the land area essentially between modern Cairo and Aswan. Never again would Egypt be a great kingdom. It would always be lowly and weak. No longer would Israel look with confidence toward Egypt. Every time she would look to Egypt in the future, Israel would be reminded of her sin in turning to Egypt for help in the past.

The purpose of God's judgment messages is always the same. He desires that those judged recognize that he is the Lord, the only true God, the God of Israel.

2. A day of the Lord: the consummation of Egypt's judgment (29:17–30:19)

a. Babylonia's compensation of Egypt for the spoilless siege of Tyre (29:17–21)

17–21 As a fulfillment of God's judgment on Tyre, Nebuchadnezzar and the Babylonian army laid siege to Tyre for thirteen years. The scant historical data indicates that Egypt and Tyre became allies under Pharaoh Hophra (Apries). The extended siege of Tyre was perhaps due to the aid Tyre received from the Egyptians. In such an act Hophra was going contrary to God's purposes. Not only was the siege prolonged by Egyptian support, but possibly Egypt's maritime aid enabled Tyre to send away her wealth for security during the siege. When Tyre surrendered about 573 B.C., Babylonia gained almost no spoils from the long siege. Therefore God promised in this latest-dated oracle of Ezekiel on Egypt that Nebuchadnezzar would receive Egypt as compensation for the spoils he failed to receive from Tyre. "Every head was rubbed bare and every shoulder made raw" indicates that they were carrying heavy loads on their heads and shoulders during the siege. Nebuchadnezzar would carry off Egypt's superior wealth as pay for his army and as a belated "reward" for his execution of God's judgment against Tyre.

For the first time the instrument of God's judgment on Egypt is revealed to be Babylonia under Nebuchadnezzar's leadership (cf. Jer 43:8–13). Since Nebuchadnezzar died in 562 B.C., this predicted desolation of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar's army would have to have occurred before then. Historical notices imply that Babylonia invaded Egypt about 568/567 B.C.

God used Babylonia's conquest of Egypt to strengthen and encourage Israel in exile. The passage treats the judgment on Egypt and states that at the time of Nebuchadnezzar's invasion "a horn" will grow for Israel. The symbol must refer to the strength (cf. NIV note) and encouragement that Israel was to receive when she observed God's faithfulness in executing his judgment on her enemy, Egypt, in accord with these prophecies and the Abrahamic covenant (Ge 12:3). At this time Ezekiel's mouth would be opened among the exiles to proclaim God's purposes and workings more freely, since the exiles would be more ready to listen. Through these events the Israelites would perceive that the God who was accomplishing these mighty acts in faithfulness was the Lord their God.

b. Nebuchadnezzar's invasion of Egypt (30:1–19)

1–19 A "day of the LORD" may be any specific time period when God does a special work. The context demonstrates that this "day of the LORD" relates specifically to God's judgment on Egypt through Babylonia, with Nebuchadnezzar being the agent of judgment. In addition, the event is called a "day of Egypt," limiting the judgment to Egypt and her satellites alone. It would occur during the "time of doom for the nations," when Babylonia would bring God's wrath on those nations that had in some manner "cursed" Israel (cf. 25:32; Jer 25, 27, 45–48).

Egypt's day of the Lord, a day of doom, would be a dark day in her history ("a day of clouds"). The masses would fear as Egypt's proud strength ceased before Nebuchadnezzar's sword. Many would be slain. Egypt's great riches would be carried off to Babylonia along with many people. Not even a prince (leader) would be left in the country. Many idolatrous statues of the Egyptian gods would be destroyed in the Babylonian quest for complete victory and wealth.

The entire land would lie desolate from Migdol in the north to Syene in the south. Pathros, the major portion of Upper Egypt between modern Cairo and Aswan, would be laid waste. Egypt's major cities would bear the punishment of Babylon: Zoan in the northeastern delta; Thebes, Egypt's perennial southern capital; Pelusium, the residence of the ruling Twenty-Sixth Dynasty of Ezekiel's day located on the northeast border; Heliopolis, a major religious center; Bubastis; and Tahpanhes (cf. Jer 43:7–9). The Nile's streams would be dried up (cf. 32:13–14).

Egypt's allies would fall also to Babylonia's sword: Cush (Ethiopia), Lydia in western Anatolia (modern Turkey), Arabia, and Libya. Even the Judeans ("people of the covenant land"), who probably had fled to Egypt following Gedaliah's assassination (2Ki 25:23–26; Jer 43), would suffer under the Babylonian invasion. The judgment would be comprehensive and awful, though God's purpose would be accomplished. This judgment was a manifestation of God's grace; for through it he would finally cause the Egyptians to understand that he, the Lord God of Israel, is the only true God.

3. Pharaoh's broken arms (30:20–26)

20–26 Ezekiel returns to his chronological sequence of messages (v.1). Pharaoh Hophra had sought to interrupt Babylonia's siege of Jerusalem at some point during the year 588 B.C. (Jer 34:1, 21–22; 37:5, 9). The Judeans' hopes were raised in expectation of deliverance from the siege. However, Hophra was not successful. The Babylonians defeated him and his army and sent them back to Egypt, after which Nebuchadnezzar renewed his siege of Jerusalem. The prophetic message in these verses follows Hophra's abortive intervention by a few months (March/April 587 B.C.). God declares that he had shattered Hophra's arm. The flexed arm was a common Egyptian symbol for the pharaoh's strength. Therefore Hophra's defeat was suitably represented by "breaking his arm." Ezekiel takes the imagery further by declaring that Hophra's arm had not been splinted so that it might heal.

This initial defeat of the Egyptian pharaoh was only a prelude of the complete devastation that God would bring on Egypt by Babylonia. In contrast God would strengthen Nebuchadnezzar's arms and place the Lord's sword in his hand to enable him to bring complete disability to Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar would symbolically break both arms of the pharaoh, so that Hophra would be unable to hold a sword at all. This occurred about 568 B.C. Again God reminds Egypt of her dispersion among the nations at that final destruction (cf. 29:12; 30:17–18). The result is equally reinforced: the Egyptians would realize that it was the Lord who brought this judgment.

4. Egypt's fall compared with Assyria's fall (31:1–18)

1–9 This beautiful poetic message was delivered two months after the previous prophecy concerning the shattering of Egypt's strength (May/June 587 B.C.). The implication is that Egypt was still proud. Ezekiel uses the imagery of a great cedar of Lebanon, the tallest of the known trees, to represent Assyria, which had recently fallen (612 B.C.). Egypt, in turn, is compared with Assyria. The great cedar (Assyria) was well-watered—an indirect reference to her great water sources in the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. Egypt, of course, equally prided herself in her unending supply of Nile water. The cedar (Assyria) had been higher than all other trees (or nations); and she was more beautiful than any other tree, even every original variety of beautiful tree in the Garden of Eden. Every bird nested in her boughs, and every beast bore its young and was shaded under her branches. These birds and beasts represented the nations under Assyria's control and in her service (cf. Da 4:10–12, 19–22; Mt 13:31–32). Assyria was perhaps the greatest nation known to that point in history.

10–17 Assyria became proud of her greatness ("height"). For this cause the cedar (Assyria) was handed over to the ruler of nations (Nebuchadnezzar) to treat her as she had treated other nations—ruthlessly. She was cut down and cast aside by the most ruthless of foreign nations. God restrained Assyria's water source. She was worthless after her fall. All nations (other trees, birds, and beasts) mourned and trembled at the cedar's demise. No other nation of that day would ever reach the height that Assyria had reached.

18 If Egypt thought she was more majestic and had greater splendor than other nations of her day, the Lord reminds her that she too would "be brought down." She would "die" disgracefully as an uncircumcised foreigner without a decent burial—a horrible thought for proud Egyptian royalty that cherished its royal burial and despised foreigners. If God brought Assyria down, Egypt could be certain that she, who had never come close to Assyria's greatness, would also fall.

5. A funeral dirge for Egypt (32:1–16)

1–10 Two months had passed since the exiles in Babylonia had learned of Jerusalem's fall seven months earlier. As they began to comprehend that the Lord did exist and had been faithful to destroy Jerusalem even as he had said, they perhaps wondered whether God would be faithful to punish the heathen nations as he had declared. Conversely, Egypt had seen the collapse of Jerusalem and Judah, and Egypt may have begun to gloat in pride over her own survival and power. Lest the Egyptians think that God would not follow through to judge them, and lest the exiles begin questioning their new understanding of God's faithfulness to his word, Ezekiel delivers this funeral dirge for Egypt in March 585 B.C.

In the previous judgment prophecies against nations, Ezekiel often followed a judgment message with a lament over that nation. So, having delivered three oracles of condemnation, Ezekiel composes a funeral dirge. He portrays Egypt as dead, and so the funeral dirge was to be sung by the "daughters of the nations" as they watched Egypt expire.

The lament over Egypt is principally a recapitulation of the judgment messages, emphasizing Egypt's false pride and bewailing the fate of judgment. Once again the double imagery portrays the pharaoh's energetic pride but ineffective strength. Hophra is likened to a young lion and a thrashing crocodile that only muddies the streams of the Nile. The crocodile would be captured with a net and hurled on the open field as food for the birds and animals. The carnage would be so great that it would fill every ravine and mountain. It would be as if a great darkness covered the land, demonstrating that Egypt's great sun gods were impotent to help. Cosmic collapse is a common image with earth-shaking events. The nations who sang this funeral dirge would be stunned and horrified that Egypt had fallen in their midst.

11–16 The slaughter of Egypt would occur at the hands of the Babylonians, the most ruthless of all peoples. Everyone and every place would be touched, including the great Nile. When all life had disappeared, then the Nile would cease to be stirred up and would flow as smoothly as oil. Only then would Egypt's pride be shattered. So much did God care for Egypt that in his grace he brought this severe judgment so that they might finally realize that the Lord was the only true God and they would turn to him.

6. Ezekiel's summary lament over Egypt (32:17–32)

17–32 This is Ezekiel's final prophecy against Egypt, and it concludes his oracles against the nations (chs. 25–32). It was given in April 585 B.C. Ezekiel must wail for the Egyptians because they too would descend into the pit of death, as had all other mighty nations that had preceded them. Egypt would not be favored over the uncircumcised nations she had proudly disdained. She too would die a shameful, barbarian's death like all the other countries. God had wrought his terror on them, and he would continue to bring his terror on any nation that dealt violently with others in this world. That is the reason God quickly brought his terror through the Babylonians against Egypt.

F. Ezekiel's Warning to the Exiles (33:1–20)

1–20 This latter half of Ezekiel's concluding prophecy against Egypt echoes two previous messages: Ezekiel's commission as a watchman (v.7; ch. 3) and his exhortation to individual responsibility (v.8; chs. 3; 18). He had faithfully performed his watchman duty for Israel (v.9), warning her of God's impending judgment on the horizon (chs. 4–24). Three to four months prior to this present message, Ezekiel had also encouraged the people with messages of hope concerning their ultimate restoration to the land (33:21–39:29). They had not heeded his warning concerning judgment and consequently found themselves in captivity, with Jerusalem and Judah in ashes. Ezekiel was exonerated from guilt for the destruction and captivity because he had been God's responsible watchman. The Judeans could only blame themselves for failing to heed the warning. Therefore, Ezekiel gives one final warning to the exiles: Turn now to the Lord! At least the exiles had come to recognize that God's judgment had come because of their sin, not their parents' sin (cf. ch. 18).

Ezekiel seeks to encourage the exiles. God does not find pleasure in death because of wickedness. Conversely, God delights in those who turn from sin, follow his ways in the Mosaic covenant, and live! Each individual is personally responsible for his or her righteousness or wickedness. If one is declared righteous, it was because he or she has decided personally to follow the Lord. If one is judged wicked, it was because he or she personally has decided to reject the Lord and to live according to his or her own desires. To some Judeans it did not seem that God's ways were fair and just. However, God's ways are always fair and just, for he does not blame one person for another's sin. The Lord fairly judges every person according to his or her own actions.

IV. The Future Blessings of a Faithful Covenant God (33:21–48:35)

The majority of evangelical interpreters claim to use a "literal" grammatical-historical hermeneutic. However, that hermeneutic is viewed differently by different groups within evangelicalism. Some hold "literal" to mean "literalistic," meaning a straightforward reading of the text (usually excluding figures of speech). Others understand that "literal" interpretation allows for figures of speech, historical perspective, contextual study, progressive revelation, analogy of faith, etc. Still others understand "literal" as reading Scripture in a normal literal manner with most prophetic material seen as symbolic and figurative. Since most evangelicals maintain that they consistently use a literal hermeneutic and that others do not, the approach taken in this commentary will be briefly outlined.

This commentary approaches chs. 33–48 with a straightforward reading of the text in the light of history, context, figures of speech, the analogy of faith, progressive revelation, etc. The flow of the argument of the book is emphasized within the context of the entire canon of Scripture and its themes. Apocalyptic visions are viewed as containing considerable symbolism as well as much reality. The interpretations of divine interpreters within visions are followed. These interpreters interpret symbols (cf. ch. 37) but allow to be taken as reality what may be understood in a straightforward reading of the text (e.g., the temple in chs. 40–42). Spiritual lessons may be learned from the realities, even as the future temple of chs. 40–48, with its sacrifices, conveys spiritual lessons as described by the divine interpreter (e.g., the importance of holiness).

This commentary presents a view of Israel's future restoration to the land after which she will be cleansed, receive a new heart, and live in security and prosperity under the Messiah's rule in his future millennial kingdom. A literal temple will be constructed according to detailed plans in order to display God's holiness. Sacrifices will be instituted as memorials of the soteriological work of Christ on the cross. A real river will flow from the temple to heal the land. A completely new geographical setting will be established.

A. Restoration to the Promised Land (33:21–39:29)

God desires to bless; he does not delight in cursing. However, both blessing and cursing are very much a part of God's covenant program. Ezekiel's entire prophecy is given in light of God's covenants with Israel. In order to perceive the unity and development of Ezekiel, it is necessary to understand God's covenants (see chart at 1Ch 17).

The Abrahamic covenant is God's basic program for blessing the world (Ge 12:1–3). In this covenant God declared that he would choose one man, Abram; from that one man he would create the nation Israel; and through that nation he would bless the world. For a nation to exist three elements are needed: a people, a government, and a homeland. The people of Israel came into being in Egypt from the twelve sons of Jacob (Israel). Israel's government was received on Mount Sinai in the form of the Mosaic covenant; the land was acquired through the conquest of Canaan under Joshua.

The Mosaic covenant (Ex 20–Nu 9, Deuteronomy) provided Israel's constitution, which governed all aspects of life. As Israel kept the Mosaic covenant, she would appropriate the blessings of the Abrahamic covenant; e.g., being in the land of blessing and being a blessing to the nations. However, at any point in history when Israel disobeyed the Mosaic covenant, she would find also that she did not benefit from Abrahamic covenant blessings and, in turn, would not be a blessing to the nations. Israel's failure to follow the Mosaic covenant was what caused her to be exiled in Babylonia. Israel found that her God was faithful to bring the judgments of Dt 27–28 on her.

In the Davidic covenant (2Sa 7:12–16) God promised that David's descendants would always sit on his throne: an eternal throne over an eternal kingdom. The concept of the Messiah is based on this covenant, for each king of Israel was a messiah, an "anointed one." This covenant promised that someday the final son of David would rule on David's throne.

Jeremiah announced a new covenant that God would make with his people, a covenant that would replace the functions of the Mosaic covenant. It would incorporate the Mosaic covenant in that its laws would be written on the hearts of those who believed in the Messiah. Under its provisions, all sin would be forgiven once and for all (by the Messiah), and the Spirit of God would be poured out on all who believed (cf. ch. 36; 2Co 3).

All these covenants provide the backdrop for Ezekiel's messages. After receiving his commission (chs. 1–3), Ezekiel warned Israel that the Lord would judge (curse) her in accord with the Mosaic covenant: she would be dispersed among the nations, and Jerusalem and Judah would become desolate (chs. 4–23). In ch. 24 Ezekiel declared that in the siege of Jerusalem, the execution of God's prophesied judgment on his people had begun. Then, as a reminder of God's faithfulness to the Abrahamic covenant, Ezekiel announced judgment on those nations that had oppressed Israel (25:1–33:20).

The fall of Jerusalem forms the pivotal point of Ezekiel's prophecy. The warnings against God's people had been consummated with that fall. But now there was the need to encourage the exiles that the Lord was as faithful to his promises to bless as he was to those to curse. The remainder of Ezekiel (33:21–48:35) emphasizes the blessings of the covenants. God promises to restore Israel to her land (Mosaic covenant, specifically Dt 30) and place within her a new heart and a new Spirit (new covenant). She will dwell in peace and security as her Lord, the Messiah, reigns over her (Davidic covenant). All God's promises of blessing will be consummated in the fulfillment of each covenant, including the peace covenant. The Messiah will reign over Israel forever, and no one will ever again dispossess Israel from her land.

The concept of the land is particularly significant to the six messages delivered in that one night before the news of Jerusalem's fall reached the exiles in Babylonia. Since Jerusalem had fallen, would the land be lost to Israel (33:21–33)? It was the false "shepherds" of Israel who had lost the land for Israel by leading the people astray from the truth. But the true "shepherd," the Messiah, would ultimately restore the land to Israel (ch. 34). Those foreigners who had possessed the land of Israel and had oppressed her people would be judged and removed so that Israel might again possess her own land (35:1–36:15). Then God would restore Israel to the Promised Land, an action described in 36:16–38 and beautifully illustrated in the apocalyptic vision of 37:1–14. Israel would return united with the Messiah as her singular ruler, and the Lord would inaugurate his peace covenant with her (37:15–28). Never again would a foreign power have dominion over Israel in her land (chs. 38–39).

1. Israel and the Promised Land (33:21–33)

21–22 The date and setting of the six messages in 33:21–39:29 are given in these two verses. Ezekiel had closed ch. 24 by prophesying that a fugitive would escape Jerusalem's destruction and come and report the city's fall to the Babylonian exiles. The fulfillment of that prophecy is in these verses. The siege of Jerusalem had begun in December/January 589/588 B.C. (24:1; 2Ki 25:1). Two years and seven months later, Jerusalem fell (September 586 B.C.; 2K 25:8). As the city fell, an unknown fugitive escaped—or was brought by the Babylonians—and came to report Jerusalem's destruction to the exiles. Five months later (December/January 586/585 B.C.), on the morning after Ezekiel delivered these six messages, that anticipated report came. Ezekiel's muteness, which had lasted for seven and one-half years (3:24–27), ended as God opened Ezekiel's mouth to speak these six messages of encouragement to the exiles immediately prior to their reception of the news of Jerusalem's fall (cf. 3:24–27).

23–29 The first of Ezekiel's six messages has two aspects: a question by the Judean remnant concerning the land (vv.23–29) and the manner in which the Israelites in Canaan and in Babylonia had responded to Ezekiel's ministry (vv.30–33). Jerusalem had fallen! Would Israel lose the land? The remnant in the ruins of Jerusalem were questioning the fate of the land promised to Abraham. Why were they, Abraham's descendants, now to be separated from the land given to their forefathers? Was not the Abrahamic covenant still valid? Did not the Abrahamic promises pertain to them as survivors of the destruction?

The Lord answers that the hope of keeping the Promised Land lay on a correct understanding of the covenants. For their disobedience of the Mosaic covenant stipulations, the Israelites failed to receive the Abrahamic covenant blessings, one of which was being in the Promised Land. The people had violated the Mosaic covenant statutes: they had eaten blood (cf. Lev 17:10–14; 19:26), worshiped idols (18:6; cf. Ex 20:4–5), made detestable things, shed blood with the sword (18:10; cf. Ex 20:13), and defiled one another's wife (18:6; 22:11; cf. Ex 20:14). In light of such violations, did they really think they should possess the land?

God's verdict was no! The judgments of the Mosaic covenant (Dt 27:28; 29:25–29) were being executed: those left in Judah would die by the sword, by disease, or fall prey to animals. Their arrogant pride would cease. The land would become a desolation and waste. Most importantly, God's purpose for judgment on his people would be accomplished: they would come to know that he was their God when these judgments were executed.

30–33 The Israelites in exile and the remnant in Palestine had looked on Ezekiel's ministry in mockery. They had gossiped that they should go and hear God's word. Yet when they came to Ezekiel to listen to his messages, they had not acted in accord with his warnings. They orally expressed devotion, but their hearts were greedy for material gain. They were "playing games" with God. To them Ezekiel was no more than a good entertainer. He was amusing to listen to and to watch, with all his symbolic acts and prophecies. But just as an entertainer demands no response, so they did not sense a need to respond to Ezekiel's messages. However, as Ezekiel's prophecies became reality—and such had already begun in the fall of Jerusalem—then Israel would realize that a true prophet had been among them.

2. Shepherds false and true (34:1–31)

a. The accusation against the false shepherds (34:1–6)

1–6 In the previous message Ezekiel explained that Palestine had been lost to Israel because she had violated the Mosaic covenant. Therefore she would not now experience the blessing of being in the Promised Land, a blessing of the Abrahamic covenant only experienced when the nation obeyed the Mosaic covenant stipulations. But the more severe indictment belonged to Israel's leaders, depicted as "shepherds."

This judgment speech sets forth the reason for God's judgment on Israel's past "shepherds." Israel's leaders had thought only of themselves and material gain. They had not cared for the "flock." Instead of feeding the flock, they fed on the flock, taking food and clothing for themselves instead of providing for the people. They had failed to provide for the needy—those weak and sick. They had not sought for sheep that had been lost. They did not care what happened to the people as long as they had all their own personal needs met. They were harsh and brutal in their rule. God makes it clear that a leader has a primary responsibility to care for those he leads, even at the sacrifice of his own desires.

Because of the de facto lack of a shepherd to lead them, the flock of Israel was lead astray and ended up being scattered among the nations (cf. Jer 23:9–10). Since they no longer had a shepherd's protection, they became as food for wild beasts. There was no shepherd to search them out and care for them (cf. Mt 9:36). Lack of leadership always leads to the disintegration of God's people and to personal and corporate heartache and injury.

b. God's verdict concerning the leadership of Israel (34:7–31)

7–10 Normal judicial procedure required repeating the accusation immediately before announcing the verdict. Israel's "shepherds" had been selfish, insensitive leaders who had plundered the flock for personal gain and had allowed the people to become prey for other nations. On this basis, God promises to remove the leaders from their position so that the flock of Israel might no longer be devoured by these wolves in shepherds' clothes. The Lord would hold each "false shepherd" accountable for his shepherding.

11–16b Though the people of Israel were responsible for their own actions, they had been led astray by brutal leaders. The Lord encourages the flock of Israel by declaring that he would personally assume the responsibility for "shepherding" them. The Lord promises to search, rescue, and regather the scattered flock from the nations, and to care for them as a loving shepherd. He would restore Israel to her own land and feed her on the lush pastures of her own mountains and ravines. Individual needs would finally be met; those lost would be sought and found. The injured would be healed; the weak would be strengthened. The Lord would care for every need of his flock.

16c–24 God would shepherd his people in justice. Those who had taken advantage of the flock would be treated like all other sheep or goats. Previous shepherds were likened to fat, sleek, and strong sheep because they had fed on the best pasture and drank the clear water. Out of lack of concern for the flock's other members, they arrogantly had trampled the rest of the pasture and muddied the clear drinking water. They had abused their positions of strength and "bullied" the other sheep, driving them away. These "shepherds" would be judged and destroyed, for there was no place for such irresponsible behavior among leaders.

The Lord would deliver Israel from all distress, whether from poor leadership or from the predatory nations. He would do so by appointing one true and responsible Shepherd for his people: the Messiah, his servant David. The Lord would be Israel's God; his servant David, the Messiah, would be Israel's Ruler on earth after he restored Israel to her land. Two members of the Godhead are clearly discerned with varying functions. The phrase "my servant David" regularly referred to the Messiah. Jeremiah equated the Messiah with the true Shepherd from the line of David, calling him "a righteous Branch," "the LORD Our Righteousness" (Jer 23:5–6). The identity is also implied elsewhere in the Prophets (Jer 30:9; Eze 37:24–25; Hos 3:5).

25–31 Finally, the Lord encourages Israel with the establishment of another covenant with them: the "covenant of peace" (cf. 37:26–28; 38:11–13; 39:25–29). This is not the new covenant. This peace covenant will be inaugurated when the Lord has fulfilled all his other covenants with Israel. (1) This covenant guarantees the ultimate removal of all foreign nations ("wild beasts") from Israel's land, so that she may live securely. (2) God will bless Israel and her land with "showers of blessings." The result will be full satisfaction from the land's abundant produce. (3) Israel will live in complete security. No longer will she be plundered or scorned by the nations; never again will she experience famine. (4) When God delivers Israel from all her captors and restores her safely to her land, then she will have realized that he truly is the Lord her God. (5) The Mosaic formula of relationship between Israel and the Lord will become a reality. The Lord will truly become their God, and they will finally be his people, following his ways at every turn. According to Jeremiah, this relationship will be entered when Israel accepts the new covenant (Jer 31:31–34) instituted by the Mediator of that covenant, the Messiah (cf. Heb 8:6).

This announcement of the peace covenant provides a transition to the following messages delivered in this series of six oracles. Each elaborates an aspect of the peace covenant. Ezekiel 35:1–36:15 describes how the foreign plundering nations will be removed and judged in preparation for Israel's return to her own land. The message in 36:16–37:14 provides a beautiful and descriptive account of God's restoration of Israel to her land. Ezekiel 37:15–28 stresses the full reunion of the nation and the fulfillment of her covenants when this peace covenant is established. Finally, Ezekiel 38–39 develops the concept of Israel's complete security in the Lord, for he will thwart the final attempt by a foreign power (Gog) to possess Israel's land and to plunder God's people.

Israel could rejoice; for though she had experienced the cruel leadership of recent rulers, she is now assured that God will provide perfect leadership through the Good Shepherd, the Messiah, who will care for her as a shepherd should. There was hope!

3. Preparation of the land (35:1–36:15)

a. Removal of oppressors (35:1–15)

1–9 Ezekiel had encouraged the Babylonian exiles that they would no longer be governed by predatory rulers. Instead the Lord would establish his Messiah as their "shepherd." But what about the land of Israel? Did it not lie desolate? Were there not foreign oppressors presently ruling that country? How would the Messiah govern his people in a land ravaged by foreigners? These questions likely came to the captives' minds as they listened to Ezekiel. The Lord understood these concerns and desired to ease their fears by announcing that he would personally remove all foreign oppressors from Israel and prepare that land to receive her people.

Edom (Mount Seir; cf. v.15) was most likely chosen as a representative of those nations that had sought to occupy Israel's land and exert dominion over her. Edom, perhaps more than any other nation, had continually detested and resented Israel. It started with the conflict between Jacob (Israel) and Esau (Edom) (Ge 25:22–34; 27; 36:1). Edom had sought to block Israel's first entrance into the Promised Land (Nu 20:14–21; 24:15–19). There were conflicts during the times of Saul (1Sa 14:47), Solomon (1Ki 11:14–22), Jehoshaphat (2Ch 20:1–23), Jehoram (2Ki 8:21), and Ahaz (2Ch 28:17). The prophets regularly made reference to Edom's antagonism toward Israel and the resulting judgment they would receive (Isa 11:11–16; Da 11:41; Am 2:1). Malachi demonstrated that the hatred between these nations was still common in his day (Mal 1:2–5). Therefore, it was fitting that Ezekiel used Edom as the epitome of nations that sought to overrun and acquire Israel's land for themselves.

Two brief accusations (vv.5–10) against Edom are followed by respective verdicts (vv.6:9; 11–15). First, Edom is indicted on two charges: she had harbored hostility against Israel throughout her history (cf. 25:12), and she was the accomplice of other nations and had delivered Israel over to them whenever possible. Psalm 137:7 and La 4:21–22 imply that Edom gladly aided the Babylonian invasion of Judah in 589–586 B.C. Obadiah 10–14 also denounces Edom for her betrayal of Israel in time of need. The implication of Ezekiel's accusation is that Edom would someday be Israel's antagonist again.

God would punish Edom. Since Edom had not refrained from bloodshed in her hatred of Israel, the Lord would bring unbridled bloodshed on Edom. Edom's land would be filled with inhabitants slain by the sword. As Edom had been continually hostile toward Israel, so God would bring an unending desolation throughout Mount Seir (cf 25:12–14; Jer 49:13, 17; Ob 18). Cities would be uninhabited. No one would carry on normal relations with Edom, for she would not exist. As a result of this judgment, however, Edom would know that the one who brought this discipline was the God of Israel, the only true God.

Edomite towns east of Beersheba and west of the Dea Sea flourished in the seventh century B.C., until the Babylonian destruction of Judah in 586. This hill, like many hills in Palestine, contains the remains of a town.

10–15 The second reason for judgment on Edom was threefold: Edom desired to control Israel and Judah; Edom, in her desire to devour Israel, had defamed her with contempt and had spoken boastfully against the Lord; and Edom had failed to recognize the God of Israel as the only true God. Edom felt that the Lord did not care what she did or hear what she said.

As Edom had done to Israel out of her anger, jealousy, and hatred, so God would do to Edom. Such a display of God's vindication against Edom would cause Israel to recognize that truly this was her God who was intervening on her behalf. Likewise, since Edom had rejoiced when Israel became desolate, so the Lord would make Edom desolate when all the earth is happy. This implies that Edom will not exist in the end time when God brings unparalleled joy to this earth. Through this judgment Edom will recognize that the God of Israel does exist and is the only true God.

b. A prophecy of encouragement (36:1–15)

1–12 This prophecy of encouragement takes the form of a judgment speech. The land of Israel could make the following charges against foreign nations: many nations had claimed the right of ownership of Israel, including her ancient religious sites; the nations surrounding Israel had brought desolation to Palestine as they trampled through the land in conquest. The land of Israel had become a mockery of evil rumors and gossip among the nations.

The Lord vindicates his righteousness and his people. He had declared in the Abrahamic covenant that he would bless those who bless Israel, but he also would curse those who curse his people (Ge 12:3). Therefore God declares that Israel has had enough scorn and shame from the nations. His fiery jealousy will come against those who had joyously and scornfully invaded Israel for spoils. As the nations had brought shame on Israel, so the Lord will cause them to bear shame and disgrace. He will emphatically lift up his hand against the nations in a symbol of strength and wrath. He will exonerate his people.

Blessing normally follows judgment in God's scheme. So, having pronounced judgment on the scornful nations, the Lord turns to encourage Israel by describing his preparation of her land for her return in the end time. This will be his work.

The mountains of Israel are contrasted with Mount Seir. After Israel's destruction one might have expected Mount Seir to triumph over the mountains of Israel. Though the land of Israel lay desolate in Ezekiel's day, God looks with favor on it and promises that he will prepare that land for Israel's return by making it productive and fruitful once again. The land will be encouraged by receiving its own people back. All Israel will return. The people and the cattle will be more plentiful than ever before. Her cities will again be inhabited and every waste place rebuilt. In demonstration of God's faithfulness to the Abrahamic covenant, Israel will finally possess her land as the inheritance promised by God but never before fully realized. When God restores his people, the condition of the land will surpass any previous state of the land. But will the land be deprived of its children (the Israelites) again and become desolate? The Lord reassures Israel that when God regathers his people to the Promised Land in that last regathering of the end times, the land will never again be deprived of its children. All will recognize that the Lord has done this great thing.

13–15 The second charge brought against the land is that she has devoured people and, in turn, has become "childless" among the nations. This conclusion arises from observing the many horrible misfortunes Israel had experienced. God refutes this false charge, for he will restore his people to that land. Then Israel will no longer hear taunts of scorn and shame from the nations. She will never again bear such reproach and will never again cease to be a nation. God encourages the exiles by declaring that he will give them the Messiah as their ruler and will remove the oppressive nations from the land of Israel to prepare the way for the restoration of his people.

4. The restoration to the land (36:16–37:14)

Ezekiel's previous message concluded with a description of the Lord's preparation of the land of Canaan for the return of his people (36:1–15). This provides the natural transition from God's removal of foreign oppressors from the land (35:1–15) to the subject of this new message: Israel's restoration to her land. This prophecy emphasizes the people's return and contains four distinct parts. So that the Lord's grace and mercy in regathering his people may be fully understood, the reason for their scattering among the nations is outlined by contrast (36:16–21). This is followed by a beautifully detailed portrayal of how the Lord will restore the people to the land (36:22–32), followed by the effective results of that return (36:33–38). As an encouragement to the Babylonian exiles, Ezekiel concludes this oracle with an apocalyptic vision, illustrating the return of God's nation to the land promised to their forefathers (37:1–14).

a. The basis for Israel's dispersion (36:16–21)

16–21 To highlight the importance of Israel's reestablishment on the land of their forefathers, Ezekiel summarizes Israel's past history that had brought her dispersion among the nations. By her disobedience to the Mosaic covenant stipulations, Israel had defiled her sacred land. Israel's two major crimes were (1) bloodshed, which was brought among her own people through infanticide, intrigue, violence and selfishness, and (2) idolatry, which pervaded the people's lives and drew them continually away from the Lord. Their actions were so abominable that the Lord regarded their defilement as impure as that of a woman during her menstrual cycle. God had set forth in Israel's constitution, the Mosaic covenant, that if she persisted in disobeying the lifestyle given to her in that covenant, he would scatter her people among the nations in discipline (cf. Dt 29:1–30:10). The Lord had been faithful to his word and had sown Israel like seed throughout the countries of that day.

God was so concerned that Israel be restored to a proper relationship with him that he sent his people out of the Promised Land so that they might learn the importance of following his ways. God's ways are always best, for as the Creator of life he knows how life can best be lived. But in disciplining Israel in this manner, the Lord risked his own reputation in the world. A nation was uniquely tied to its land in the ancient Near East. If a people were forced off their land, whether by conquest, famine, disease, or any other reason, this was a demonstration that their god was not sufficiently strong to protect and care for them. Therefore, when God scattered Israel among the nations, they perceived that Israel's God was weak; thereby the name of the Lord was profaned among them.

But the Lord would not allow his name to be defiled forever. Israel's return to her land would be based on the Lord's compassion for his own holy name that had been profaned (cf. Mt 6:9; Lk 11:2). Through Israel's restoration, God would demonstrate to the nations that he was the only true God. His name would be set apart in holiness, as it should be. Therefore, so that his name might be vindicated, the Lord would restore Israel to her land, and not because of any great thing she had done. What a contrast between God's holiness and grace and human sin! Sin never deserves mercy; yet the Lord always deals graciously and mercifully as well as justly.

b. A description of the final restoration (36:22–32)

22–23 In OT times one's "name" (GK 9005) represents the person. Through Israel's rebellion against God, the people had defamed God's person. Therefore, not only would his covenant faithfulness be displayed when he restored Israel to her land, but he would also bring honor and sanctity to his name and person throughout the nations, through his supernatural regathering of Israel. Then the nations would know that the righteous and loving God of Israel was the only true God.

24–32 The reestablishment of Israel on her land is wonderfully described in these verses. God had already foretold Israel's restoration after the Exile when Moses restated the Mosaic covenant on the plains of Moab (Dt 29:1–30:10). The pattern of restoration defined here is return, cleansing from sin, enablement of the Spirit, and prosperity.

(1) The Lord will remove his people from the nations where they have been scattered. He will gather them and bring them back to the land of Canaan, which had been promised to their forefathers in the Abrahamic covenant.

(2) The Lord will cleanse Israel in her land from all sin and idolatry that has defiled her. "Sprinkling with clean water" symbolizes cleansing through divine forgiveness by blood (cf. Ex 12:22; Lev 14:4–7; 49:53; Ps 51:7; 1Co 6:11). For ceremonial cleansing to be more than a ritual, it was essential that the people repent and acknowledge their past iniquity about which God would remind them. As they would loathe their former transgressions with their shame and disgrace, they would understand how gracious was their cleansing. Likewise, if ceremonial cleansing were to be meaningful, actual cleansing and forgiveness of sin must be made. This will be through the new covenant (Jer 31:31–34); for Israel's return to the land, the people will accept the Messiah as their Savior, through whose death all sin has been once and for all forgiven. Iniquity will be remembered no more. They will exchange their old rebellious hearts of stone for sensitive hearts of flesh.

(3) In the new covenant the people will also receive a new spirit, God's Holy Spirit (cf. 11:19–20; 18:31; 37:14; 39:29; Joel 2:28–29; Ac 2:17–18; 2Co 3:6–18), who will enable them to live God's way (cf. Ro 7:7–8:4; Heb 8:6–10:39). The old Mosaic covenant will be written on the hearts of those living under the new covenant (Jer 31:33). Therefore, the new covenant replaces the Mosaic covenant by adding those things that made it better, but not by eliminating the good, righteous, and godly stipulations that described how to live a godly life. The new covenant provides forgiveness of sin once and for all and the Holy Spirit's indwelling.

(4) A cleansed Israel will return permanently to a productive and plentiful land that will be more than "flowing with milk and honey" (vv 1–15). Never again will the land allow Israel to be disgraced among the nations through famine. Likewise, the epitome of the Mosaic covenant for Israel and the Lord is expressed in a formula that now will become a reality: Israel will be God's people and he will be her God. The nations will observe this marvelous transformation and see the Lord as the only gracious and loving God, for Israel will not deserve restoration.

This context, along with the historical perspective, make it clear that the return mentioned in this passage does not refer to the return to Canaan under Zerubbabel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, but to a final and complete restoration under the Messiah in the end times. The details of Israel's reestablishment on her land set forth here simply did not occur in the return begun in 538 B.C.

c. The effects of the restoration (36:33–38)

33–38 The effects of Israel's restoration will be great. The land will produce like the Garden of Eden. It will be Paradise regained (cf. Isa 51:3; Ro 8:19–22; 2Pe 3:13; Rev 21:1–4, 23–27). Ruined cities will be rebuilt and fortified for the many inhabitants. The people of Israel will increase so much that they will constitute a large flock for the Shepherd, the Messiah. They will be numerous like the flocks kept for the many offerings in Jerusalem during Israel's appointed feasts. The most important consequence of Israel's restoration will be the spread of the knowledge of the Lord throughout the world. The nations will unequivocally know that Israel's God has accomplished this great restoration. They will know that he is not a weak god but the only God who does exactly what he says. Israel herself will humbly acknowledge that the one who restored her is the Lord her God.

d. A vision of restoration (37:1–14)

1–2 Chapter 37 begins by simply revealing the apocalyptic vision that concludes Ezekiel's message on Israel's future restoration. Apocalyptic literature is not familiar to most people. This type of literature is symbolic visionary-prophetic, consisting of visions recorded exactly as they are seen by the author and explained through a divine interpreter. The theological content is primarily eschatological, normally being composed during times of oppression. Apocalyptic literature has a simple twofold form: the setting of the vision, in which the recipient and the geographical location are identified, and the vision per se, with its divine interpretation.

Ezekiel is brought by the Lord into a valley (or plain), perhaps the same valley mentioned in ch. 1 where Ezekiel saw the visions of God. Ezekiel sees the valley filled with innumerable bones that are extremely dry. The Spirit of the Lord leads him around the valley, and he passes among these bones.

3–10 This apocalyptic vision has two distinct sections: (1) Ezekiel recounts what he sees and does and (2) the vision is interpreted (vv.11–14). The Lord asks Ezekiel whether these bones will live. Ezekiel replies that only the Lord knows. A prophecy is then given to Ezekiel for the dry bones. The Lord will cause them to live. Tendons, flesh, skin, and breath will come on the bones so that live people will be formed. Then this "resurrected" people will know that God is the Lord. So Ezekiel does exactly as the Lord commands and proclaims the Lord's words to the dead, dry bones. While he is speaking, all the bones come together and take on themselves tendons, flesh, and skin. But no breath is found in them.

Ezekiel is instructed to prophesy again, this time to the breath to come from the four winds—probably indicating the full power of the entering breath (i.e., from every direction) to renew the bodies—and to breathe on these slain ones so that they might live. On doing so, Ezekiel sees this army of people come alive! The recovery of the bones to form bodies pictures Israel's ultimate national restoration. "Breath" (also "wind" or "Spirit"; GK 8120) entering these restored bodies portrays spiritual renewal. This imitated the sequence in ch. 36.

11–14 Apocalyptic visions were never meant to have every detail interpreted; only the major thrust of the vision was to be grasped. The bones are identified as the whole house of Israel, the slain ones of v.9 (cf. 36:10). These bones will declare three things about themselves. (1) They were dry, an obvious condition of bones from people who have been dead for a very long time. Though duration of time may be implied by the dryness of the bones, the emphasis is on spiritual deadness. (2) The bones declare that their hope has perished. The people of Israel have lost all hope of becoming a nation again or of seeing God's covenants fulfilled. (3) The bones say that they were separated from one another, i.e., the people had been separated and dispersed; that was their current condition.

The vision itself is rather self-evident and needs no interpretation once the bones are identified. The vision clearly demonstrates the restoration to life of a people who have been dead for some time. It is in two stages: first physical (or national) restoration and then spiritual renewal. The creation of humankind followed a similar pattern: the body formed first, then the breath received (cf. Ge 2:7).

This national and spiritual restoration is elaborated in the interpretation section through another figure, that of a resurrection from graves. Both the imagery of dry bones becoming live people and the figure of resurrection from a grave illustrate the same truth. Israel, nonexistent as a people on their own land and scattered throughout the nations, will be brought back to life physically as a nation in their own land. Just as the events in the vision were miraculous, so will be Israel's restoration. Once in the land they will be renewed spiritually when God places his Spirit within them in keeping with the new covenant and the message just delivered in ch. 36.

The entire context of these six messages is future. Israel's national restoration in the end time is in view (cf. the chapters surrounding chs. 36–37). It is not to be just a physical restoration or merely a spiritual restoration. A national regathering of Israel from among the nations in the end time, a spiritual conversion of Israel, and a reestablishment of the nation in the land of promise are all in view in 36:16–38 and in this apocalyptic vision.

This can genuinely be termed a "rebirth" of the nation. God will provide all three essentials—a people, a government, and a land—once again in this rebirth of Israel in the future. The people of that day are brought together through restoration in 36:16–37:28. The land is provided in the prophecy of 35:1–36:15. The government of renewed Israel will be given in chs. 40–48. When Israel is restored and becomes a nation once again, then the people will definitely know that the Lord did it and that he and no one else is their God.

5. Israel's reunion amid fulfilled covenants (37:15–28)

15–17 Ezekiel uses a symbolic act to demonstrate that the two previously divided kingdoms of Israel and Judah will once again be reunited when God brings his people back into their land. Israel will then be complete with all her covenants fulfilled. Ezekiel took two sticks. He wrote the names of Judah and her companions on one and those of Ephraim and her companions on the other—one stick representing the former kingdom of Judah, the other the previous kingdom of Israel. When Ezekiel put these two sticks together in his hand, they became one stick.

18–28 The union of the two sticks into one portrays the reunion of the nations of Judah and Israel into a united kingdom in the land promised in the Abrahamic covenant. Never again will the nation be divided. The Messiah, David's Greater Son, will be the only King, Shepherd, and Prince that reunited Israel will ever have, in accord with the Davidic covenant. This united people of God will be cleansed from their former idolatry and transgressions through the complete forgiveness provided by the Messiah's death and the ministry of the Spirit promised in the new covenant. By accepting the new covenant Israel will be enabled through the Holy Spirit to follow the righteous stipulations of the Mosaic covenant and to live by them. Then Israel will finally be the unique, choice people that God had created for himself; and he will be their God—finally fulfilling the ideal of the Mosaic covenant.

The Lord will enact his peace covenant (cf. 34:25–29) with Israel at the time of her restoration to the land, when all her other covenants with God will be fulfilled. Under this peace covenant Israel will be established in her land, her numbers will increase (cf. Ge 22:17–18), and the Lord will place his sanctuary among his people forever. Then all nations will see that it was the Lord who made Israel holy. She will be set apart from all nations as God's special possession. No other nation will have the Lord dwelling in its sanctuary uniquely in its midst as Israel.

When all Israel's covenants have been consummated, then the Lord will enact his peace covenant with Israel. She will dwell in peace forever under the rule of her king, the Messiah.

6. The Promised Land and foreign possession (38:1–39:29)

These two chapters may be viewed as isolated from the previous messages that were delivered on the night prior to the arrival of the fugitive from Jerusalem to announce Jerusalem's fall (cf. 33:21–22). The message in chs. 38–39, however, should be seen as the sixth and last in Ezekiel's series of messages delivered that night before the news came of Jerusalem's destruction.

A major subject of the five previous messages had been the land of Israel; it concluded with God's peace covenant with his people (see introductory comments on 33:21–39:29 for a summary of these messages). The message in chs. 38–39 initially describes the entire nation of Israel peacefully dwelling in their land in security. They were living without walls, bars, or doors (38:7). The remainder of the message describes a final attempt by foreigners to possess the land of Israel. The endeavor would fail because God, faithful to the peace covenant and his name, would defend Israel. He would not permit his holy name to be profaned again by a conquest and dispersal of Israel (36:20; 39:7).

The events and details of chs. 38–39 are relatively easy to understand. The major interpretative difficulties are the identity of characters and places, and the time when these events occur.

a. The initial judgment speech against Gog (38:1–23)

1–3 Ezekiel prophesied against Gog of the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal. The exact identity of each proper name has spawned many interpretations of this text. None of the proposed solutions have sufficient support to warrant their acceptance as the identity of the term "Gog." It does seem that Gog was a person, whether mentioned in this context by name or by title. Fortunately the specific identity of Gog is unnecessary to interpret the significance of this passage. Further discussion of the time of these events will aid in a more general identification of the person of Gog. Magog, a Japhetic descendant (Ge 10:7), is identified by Josephus as the land of the Scythians, a mountainous region around the Black and Caspian Seas.

The phrase "chief [rosh; GK 8031] prince of Meshech and Tubal" has been interpreted variously. Rosh presents the major difficulty in the phrase. Its normal meaning was "head" or "chief." Some understand it as a proper noun, a geographical area named "Rosh," but there is no evidence that a country named Rosh ever existed. Some would understand rosh as modern Russia, but the word "Russia" is a late eleventh-century A.D. term.

In the Hebrew both "prince" and "chief" are related equally to the geographical words Meshech and Tubal. Grammatically it would seem best to render the phrase as "the prince, the chief [head or ruler] of Meshech and Tubal." Meshech is the name of a son of Japheth in Ge 10:2 and 1Ch 1:5; the name is normally connected with the word Tubal (cf. 27:13; 32:26). The sparse data imply that Meshech and Tubal refer to geographical areas or countries in eastern modern Turkey, southwest of Russia and northwest of Iran. This, however, gives no basis for identifying these place names with any modern country. There is no data to support the contention of some that Meshech and Tubal refer to the modern Russian cities of Moscow and Tobolsk.

It can be concluded that Gog is a person from the region of Magog and that he is the prince, the chief ruler, over the geographical areas of Meshech and Tubal. These land areas or countries appear to be located generally toward the south of the Black and Caspian Seas, in the modern countries of Turkey, Russia, and Iran.

4–16 This section portrays Israel lying peacefully and securely in her land following her restoration by God. God had fulfilled his covenants with his people, and they were basking in the land's fruitfulness and the unquestioned security that they possessed in the strength of God's faithfulness to his word. Unexpectedly their safety came in grave jeopardy. Like a storm cloud's sudden darkness, disaster loomed on the northern horizon as an awesome horde of nations from every corner of the earth appeared. Gog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, was their mastermind and commander. Peoples had joined him from every direction of the compass; Persia from the east, Cush (Ethiopian Nubia) from the southwest, Put (normally identified as Libya) from the west or southwest, and Gomer (probably the ancient Cimmerians) and Beth Togarmah (possibly the ancient Til-garimmu southeast of the Black Sea) from the north. They were ready to invade Israel.

Gog had devised an evil plan. He intended to attack defenseless Israel who so naively trusted in her God. She had not protected herself; there were no city walls and no gates with doors and bars. Gog would plunder their land and gather all their possessions for his spoils. Other nations like Sheba and Dedan, along with merchants from Tarshish, would be shocked and question Gog's design to plunder and loot Israel.

God, however, made it perfectly clear that he sovereignly brought Gog on the land of Israel, though Gog thought it was his own idea. God would cause Gog to come on Israel by figuratively putting hooks in his jaws and leading him there. Though this may seem incongruous with God's restoration of his people and the security promised in the peace covenant, God would cause this invasion to be initiated by Gog so that all the world might know once and for all that the Lord was a faithful God. He would defeat Gog before Gog brought any harm to Israel and her land, even as God had promised (cf. 34:22, 28–29; 36:1–15). All would see that God was holy, right, and immutably faithful; and he would not permit his name to be profaned again.

The time of this invasion is indicated by temporal statements in these verses and the context of this message—the time of Israel's golden age in the end times. The phrase "after many days" (v.8) normally expresses an indefinite time period. It is sometimes used, however, to reach as far as the end times (cf. Jer 32:14; Da 8:26). The expression "in future years" is found only in this verse in the OT; one should understand its meaning in light of its context. The phrase "in days to come" tends to fix this invasion at the end times, for this phrase normally refers to Israel's final restoration to the messianic kingdom and Messiah's reign (cf. Ge 49:1; Isa 2:2; Jer 23:20; 30:24; Hos 3:5; Mic 4:1).

Verses 8 and 12 indicate that this invasion was planned at a time when Israel had been restored from the sword, having been regathered from among the nations. This regathering was followed by a peace and security that Israel would know in the restoration to her land (36:22–37:14). She felt so safe that she did not even seek to fortify herself. Israel has never enjoyed such an idyllic situation since she returned from Babylon in 539 B.C. The phrase "live in safety" describes messianic security after Israel's restoration. This oracle relates to other prophetic oracles concerning the end times and the Davidic, messianic kingdom (28:26; cf. Jer 23:6; 33:16; Zec 14:11). Finally, the entire context of these six messages of Ezekiel deals with the future restoration of Israel to her homeland by the Messiah. Thus the time of this invasion is the end times, after the people of Israel have been restored to the Promised Land and are living securely under Messiah's protection.

17–23 In his judgment God reminded Gog that the Lord's servants, the prophets, had formerly foretold this end-time invasion. Though there are no specific references to Gog in any of the other prophets, there are general references to the final destruction of the enemies of God's people (cf. Dt 30:7; Isa 26:20–21; Jer 30:1–21).

Israel's dependence on God was not in vain. At the very moment that Gog came against the land of Israel, God's burning wrath would arise against Gog. The Lord was a jealous God and would faithfully protect his own. God's fiery fury would break forth suddenly against Gog and his horde. The entire earth would be jolted with an enormous earthquake that would topple mountains, cliffs, and every wall. Every creature on the earth, within the sea and within the air, would shudder in awe and fear at the presence of almighty God who had come to annihilate Gog and his followers. Gog's armies and the nations following him would become so confused that they would slay one another in suicidal strife, while the Lord supernaturally destroyed them with diseases, bloodshed, and catastrophic torrents of rain, hailstones, and burning sulphur. God would vindicate his holy name and magnify himself as the only true God in the eyes of all nations with this annihilation of Gog. The purpose of all God's judgments is only to make himself known in all his greatness and holiness to those who can come to know him in no other way.

b. Reiteration and expansion of God's judgment speech against Gog (39:1–29)

1–2 These verses give a summary restatement of 38:1–16. God would sovereignly coerce Gog to invade Israel, but at the same time he would defeat Gog to display his faithfulness to Israel.

3–8 Ezekiel 38:17–23 described God supernaturally using the elements of nature to destroy Gog and his hordes: earthquakes, disease, and hailstones. Gog would be completely disarmed; his armies would fall throughout the land—on the mountains and in the open field. The slaughter of Gog's hordes would provide food for every bird of prey and wild beast (cf. vv.17–20). In addition God would bring a fiery judgment on the territory of Magog and on her allies who felt secure in their coastlands and/or islands. God would use Gog's defeat as a demonstration to the nations that he, the Holy One of Israel, was the only true God. He was faithful to his covenant people to whom he had promised eternal peace and security in the peace covenant. He would not permit his holy name to be profaned again through the conquest and dispersion of Israel. Israel, in turn, would make the Lord's name holy in her midst; for she would see his immutable faithfulness through his protection of her in this final attempt to invade Israel's land. As encouragement to the Jewish exiles, the Lord stressed again that Gog's destruction would most certainly occur. The phrase "Holy One in Israel" expresses God's absolute separation from evil. He maintains his holiness and that of his land by judging Gog and by his keeping his promises.

9–10 God totally disarmed Gog's armies. So great was the resulting assemblage of weapons that it would take the Israelites seven years to burn them all. These weapons would provide fuel for Israel during these seven years so that she would not need to use any of her own fuel resources. Likewise, though Gog and his entourage had sought to take spoils from Israel, it would be Israel who would take spoils from them.

11–16 The magnitude of Gog's armies created a staggering problem with their death. All of them needed to be buried to cleanse the land of Israel. A specific valley known as the "valley of those who travel east toward [or of] the Sea" was designated as the burial place. Whether the proper rendering is "toward" or "of" could make a distinct difference as to which sea is involved. If the sea is the Dead Sea, then the valley would either be east of that sea—and therefore out of the normal boundaries of Israel—or a valley that led travelers east toward the Dead Sea. The only valley to fit remotely this description is the Esdraelon Valley in lower Galilee. If the sea is understood as the Mediterranean, then the specific valley could be any valley in the land of Israel east "of" that sea. None of the theories of identification of this valley can be substantiated without question because of the sparse data. The text does make it clear that the massive burial of Gog and his hordes in this valley would cause a major obstacle to travel. For this reason the valley would be named "the Valley of Hamon Gog" ("the hordes of Gog").

The multitude of carcasses would require more than seven months to bury to cleanse the land (cf. Lev 5:2; 21:1; Dt 21:1–9). Every person in Israel would be involved. For seven months they would bury the easily observed bodies lying on the ground. After seven months overseers would designate two groups to carry out a "mopping-up" operation (v.14). One group would search to find any remnant of a body—even a bone—and mark it. These would be collected and taken to the Valley of Hamon Gog for burial by the second group. A city named Hamonah ("horde") would be located in the Valley of Hamon Gog, perhaps viewed as a city of the dead. The city's exact nature is unclear. Gog's burial would be a memorable day for the Lord, for the death of this enemy demonstrates God's faithfulness to protect his people forever and brings glory to the Lord's name.

17–20 The search throughout the land for bones of the deceased enemy may have arisen due to the great feast on the dead by the carrion-eating birds and animals of prey invited to feed on the carnage of Gog and his followers. This great slaughter is called a "sacrifice" that the Lord prepared for these birds and animals on Israel's mountains (cf. Isa 34:6; Jer 46:10). The flesh and fat of princes, warriors, and their animals would be consumed; and their blood would be drunk until these fowls and beasts were glutted and drunk. "Rams and lambs, goats and bulls" of Bashan were always well-fed and strong. The parallel of this imagery to the defeated princes emphasizes that these were not weaklings but the strong and mighty of the earth.

Some observations on the relationship of these two chapters to the book of Revelation are in order. There is a clear allusion to the great feast of vv.17–20 in Rev 19–21. Revelation 19:11–16 presents a heavenly scene of the Second Advent. The Lord comes on a white horse with his armies to judge and make war in righteousness. The sword that proceeds out of his mouth smites the nations as he treads out the winepress of his great wrath. Revelation 19 17–21 is a distinctly different section, in which an angel invites all the birds to a "great supper of God," a feast on the mighty leaders of the nations who have gathered against the Lord and who is slain by the sword of his mouth. The beast and the false prophet are seized and cast into the lake of fire. The birds fill themselves on the carnage of the others.

In his "great supper of God," John appears to allude explicitly to the feast on the carnage of Gog's hordes in Eze 39:17–20. Why would John directly link Eze 39 to Rev 19 in his argument? The restoration and messianic context of Ezekiel's message is also that of John. Revelation 19:11–16 presents a heavenly glimpse of the Messiah at his second coming after Israel has been restored to her land (cf. Rev 7). The beast and the kings of the earth with their armies (Rev 19:19) are certainly similar to the nations assembled with Gog in Ezekiel (Eze 38:4–7, 9, 15, 22; 39:4, 11; Rev 19:15, 18–19, 21). The Lord's judgment in Eze 38–39 finds parallel features in the Messiah's treading out God's winepress of wrath in Rev 19. The Lord calls for a sword against Gog, and the sword out of the Lord's mouth smites the nations that come against him in Revelation (cf. Eze 38:71; Rev 19:15, 20).

An explicit chronology is not set forth in Revelation. Therefore it is difficult to know the exact time of Rev 19, though the second coming of the Messiah is in view. It appears that Messiah comes to defeat all nations and perhaps conclude the Battle of Armageddon. Yet the context of Eze 38–39 sees Israel already at peace, dwelling in security, having been restored from the sword. Such would not be in harmony with the Battle of Armageddon. Since this battle is not mentioned in Rev 19 explicitly, perhaps the events of Rev 19 do not relate to Armageddon but specifically to the demise of the beast as foretold in Eze 38–39. Armageddon had already been treated in Rev 14 and 16. Therefore, though the Messiah may conclude the events of Armageddon with his return, the next event in a possible transition period between the conclusion of the Tribulation and the beginning of the Millennium would be this defeat of the beast who sought to make one final attempt to secure Israel's land.

Why would John not mention Gog in Rev 19 if this passage is a fulfillment of Eze 38–39? The last mention of the beast by John had been in Rev 17. If John used the name Gog in Rev 19, the readers would have been unaware of who he was in the Rev 19 context. By using the name "beast" and at the same time making explicit allusion to Ezekiel's Gog invasion in the unique feast of the birds, John apparently sought to equate the beast with Gog for his readers. Then his readers would see the events of Rev 19:17–21 as a fulfillment of the Gog prophecy, which helps establish the exact time when Eze 38–39 will occur.

Significantly, in addition to the specific allusion between Rev 19 and Eze 39 found in the "bird supper," none of the details of Eze 38–39 is violated in the Rev 19 context. Though the Rev 19 passage aids in determining the fulfillment and the time of Gog's invasion and defeat in Eze 38–39, other factors are involved in seeking to gain a complete perspective of these issues. Interpreting the time of these events in the prophetic program of the end times is a most difficult issue, which has resulted in several different positions. (For a more complete treatment, see EBC, 6:937–40.)

The majority of expositors see the events of Eze 38–39 taking place after the Millennium as described in Rev 20:7–10. The strong argument for this position is the explicit reference to Gog and Magog in Rev 20:8. The context of the Millennium would surely satisfy Israel's peaceful, prosperous, and safe dwelling. Restoration would have already been accomplished. Nations would be present to observe "Gog's" rebellion. Time would surely be available for the burial of bodies and the burning of weapons.

Objections, however, have been raised against this view.

1. It is argued that Gog is a northern coalition while in Revelation the armies come from the four corners of the earth. But it should be noticed that Gog brings with him nations from every point of the compass (38:5–6).

2. It is maintained that Ezekiel says nothing of Jerusalem, whereas John states that the nations encompassed the beloved city. In answer it should be observed that John's mention of the "beloved city" does not conflict with Ezekiel, for he states that Gog comes on the mountains of Israel, which most certainly include Jerusalem.

3. It is believed that the burning of the weapons and the disposal of the bodies militate against these events at the end of the Millennium, since the Great White Throne Judgment immediately follows. However, the chronology of Revelation does not demand immediate sequence of events, especially in Rev 19–20. A transition period here is plausible.

Therefore, it seems that Rev 20:7–10 is also a fulfillment of Eze 38–39. The fulfillment can be seen in two far moments: one in Rev 19:17–21 and one in Rev 20:7–10. The connection between Eze 38–39 and Rev 19:17–21 lies in the singular concept of God's defeat of the great final attempt of the Evil One to once again possess the land of Israel. Revelation 19 finds the attempt thwarted in the destruction of the beast and his armies (Satan's major representative on earth), whereas Rev 20 sets forth Satan's fall as the completion of this theme. Both are the last and greatest enemies of Israel. John only summarized the events in each case, since the full description had been recounted in Eze 38–39. The allusion to the great feast in Rev 19 was used by John to bring to his readers' attention the events of Eze 38–39, with which they would have been familiar. The term "Gog" was not used so as not to confuse the identity of the beast. On the contrary, in Rev 20 the explicit equation is made between Satan and Gog so that the readers also would identify Satan's rebellion with the events of Eze 38–39. Both passages describe attempts by Israel's greatest enemies, the beast and Satan, to possess the land of Israel and to nullify God's promise.

c. The summary of the six night messages (39:21–29)

21–29 Gog's destruction provides the climax of Ezekiel's six messages of encouragement delivered to the exiles the night prior to the fugitive's arrival with the news that Jerusalem had fallen. Gog's defeat would be the Lord's final display of his glory among the nations as he restored Israel to the Promised Land. All other nations would stand in awe at God's punishment on Gog.

These six messages have stressed God's covenant promises to Israel, especially those concerning the land. When Israel experienced God's marvelous faithfulness in restoration and protection against Gog, she would know without question from that day forward that the Lord was her God, the only true God, and that there was none other. In turn the nations would know that the Lord had not been a weak God when he sent Israel into exile; rather they would observe that he cared enough to set his face against Israel because of her sin of unfaithfulness to him. Likewise, the nations would observe that it was God's grace and faithfulness that brought Israel back from among the nations, gave her the Promised Land, and enabled her to live safely on that land without fear of oppression. In this way the Lord would show himself holy in the eyes of the nations. He was jealous for his name not to be profaned, as when the nations construed him to be as other gods. The Lord would never again turn his face from Israel and allow someone to oppress her! No one would bring terror on Israel again! God would cleanse Israel, removing her shame and sin and then pouring out his Spirit on her in accord with the new covenant. All Israel's covenants would be fulfilled. She would live securely forever under the peace covenant administered by her king, the Messiah!

B. God's Glory Returns (40:1–48:35)

The description in these nine chapters of a temple, the filling of that temple with God's glory, a sacrificial system for worship in that temple, priestly functions, and the tribal and priestly allotment of land is rather clear to the reader. But what does it all mean? Should these chapters be interpreted literally or figuratively? Since this portion of the book contains some very puzzling and difficult concepts that cannot be ignored, it is wise to examine some basic issues to determine as accurate an understanding of the text as possible.

Is Ezekiel 40–48 Historical or Future? These chapters have been interpreted as referring to the temple of Solomon, Zerubbabel, or Herod, or to a future temple in the Millennium or in the eternal state. Some interpret the section allegorically as teaching about the church and its earthly blessings and glories, while others understand the passage to symbolize the reality of the heavenly temple where Christ ministers today.

The historical fulfillments do not fit the details of the passage. The temples of Solomon, Zerubbabel, or Herod do not share the design and dimensions of the temple described in chs. 40–42. The worship procedure set forth in chs. 43–46, though Mosaic in nature, has not been followed in history in exactly the manner described in these chapters. The river that flows forth from the temple in 47:1–12 has never flowed from any of the three historical temples mentioned above. The only comparisons to this river are seen in Ge 2:8–14 and Rev 22:1–2 (cf. Isa 35:6–7; Joel 3:18; Zec 14:8). The geographical dimensions and tribal allotments of the land are certainly not feasible today, nor have they ever been followed in times past. Geographical changes will be necessary prior to the fulfillment of chs. 45, 47–48. Therefore, one should not look to historical (past or present) fulfillments of these chapters but to the future.

The figurative or "spiritualizing" approach does not seem to solve any of the problems of these chapters; rather, it tends to create new ones. When one abandons a literal interpretation, different aspects of a passage mean whatever the interpreter desires. Even apocalyptic visions such as those found in these chapters require a normal grammatical-historical hermeneutic. To interpret them in any other manner contradicts the interpretative guide in the vision who warns Ezekiel that he must write down all the minute details concerning the plan for the temple and its regulations so that these details might be considered carefully and followed in every aspect (40:4; 43:10–11; 44:5). Therefore a figurative approach does not suit the issues of Eze 40–48.

The general time frame of these chapters can perhaps be best understood in light of the development and flow of Ezekiel's argument in the entire book. He has shown the presence of God's glory in the historical Jerusalem temple and its departure from that temple because of Israel's sin of breaking the Mosaic covenant. The fall of Jerusalem and the captivity in Babylon were the consequence (chs. 4–24). After declaring how the nations would also be judged (25:1–33:20), Ezekiel encouraged the Jewish captives through six night messages of hope (33:21–39:29). In these he informed them that the Messiah would restore them to their Promised Land in the future and become a true shepherd to them. They would be cleansed and all their covenants would be fulfilled. Even in the end times, after the land prospers and Israel dwells securely in it, some will try to take the Promised Land away from Israel and profane the Lord's name; but the Lord will not permit it (chs. 38–39). It would seem logical, therefore, for Ezekiel to conclude the logical and chronological development of his prophecy by describing the messianic kingdom and the return of God's glory to govern his people (chs. 40–48) rather than suddenly reverting back to some historical period, whether immediately following the Exile or during Herod's temple, or to some undefined idealistic temple.

Ezekiel appears to have been contrasting the past and contemporary desecration of the temple and its regulations with the future holiness and righteousness of the temple and its functions—a format Ezekiel also used in chs. 33–39. The correct future procedure would bring shame and conviction on Ezekiel's contemporaries (43:6–12; 44:5–16; 45:9–12). This again points to a future fulfillment of these chapters.

God's glory is a most important feature of Ezekiel's prophecy. Its return to the new temple in 43:1–12 is the climax of the book. The context implies that this can only occur after Israel has been restored to the Promised Land and cleansed. The stress is on holiness. Holiness had not characterized Israel as a people heretofore; and Israel would not be a holy people in accord with God's standard until after they had been restored to the Promised Land and cleansed in the Messianic Age (ch. 36). When God's glory returns, it will remain in Israel's midst forever (43:6–7). The development of this unifying factor in Ezekiel's prophecy argues strongly for a future fulfillment of chs. 40–48.

Finally, the entire context and argument of the Scriptures concerning God's outworking of his redemptive plan in history place these chapters and the aspects mentioned above in the time of the consummation of all history. This is perhaps best seen in the river of life that flows from the temple to bring healing to the land (47:1–12). This concept is first seen in Ge 2:8–14 in the Garden of Eden, the perfect environment of God's holiness. With sin, this garden and its river were removed. But when God concludes his redemptive program and brings full salvation to humankind with eternal life through Jesus Christ, his Son, it is appropriate that the river of eternal life will again flow to demonstrate full healing on the earth. This conclusion to the full circle of God's redemptive program is also shown in Rev 22:1–6 (cf. Isa 35:5–6; Joel 3:18; Zec 14:8).

Therefore, the context and argument of the book of Ezekiel as well as the development of God's redemptive program all argue strongly for a future fulfillment of the events of Eze 40–48 in the end times.

Does Ezekiel 40–48 Relate to the Millennium or to the Eternal State? It is first necessary to understand the prophetic perspective of the OT prophets. Their predictive revelations concerned two main issues: the time of the judgment and discipline that was to come on Israel because of her perennial sin and breaking of the Mosaic covenant; and the ultimate period of blessing, following Israel's judgment, when Israel would be restored to the Promised Land, cleansed of her sin, and brought into the messianic kingdom. At that time all of Israel's covenants would be fulfilled, and she would live in perfect security under the divine rule of the Messiah.

The OT prophets tended not to make distinctions within the period of discipline and judgment. Rather they portrayed near and far aspects of this time in the same passage. The discipline would begin with the Babylonian captivity and would continue till the end time. Some distinctions were observed, but chronological relations were seldom delineated.

Similarly, the prophets did not make distinctions between the Millennium and the eternal state when describing the period of messianic blessing. Further distinctions are primarily the result of progressive revelation disclosed in the NT, especially in the book of Revelation, though some distinctions are implied in the OT prophets (e.g., Da 9–12). Ezekiel, like his contemporaries, intermixed these various elements in his prophecies of judgment and the future kingdom. Undoubtedly this contributes to the difficulty in distinguishing the Millennium and the eternal state in these chapters.

In light of the whole Scripture, it appears that the Millennium is like a preview or "firstfruits" of the eternal state. Therefore, because the two are alike, they share distinct similarities. Yet because they are both different revealed time periods, they likewise reflect some dissimilarities. Since the OT prophets, like Ezekiel, frequently failed to see distinctions, one should be careful about stating that Eze 40–48 is describing only the Millennium or only the eternal state. One must look to the NT for any further clues for delineation, whenever such are given.

John uses many OT prophetic concepts and images in Revelation, as observed above in his allusion to the "bird supper" of Eze 38–39. Revelation 21–22 speaks of the eternal state, and there are definite allusions to Eze 40–48 in this portion of Revelation, with striking similarities. Both writers receive apocalyptic visions on a high mountain with an intercepting messenger present, holding a measuring rod to measure various structures (Eze 40:2–5; Rev 21:2, 10, 15). Both visions portray waters flowing forth toward the east, with trees alongside and leaves for healing (Eze 47:1–7, 12; Rev 22:1–2). The names of Israel's twelve tribes are written on the city's twelve gates in both visions (Eze 48:31–33: Rev 21:12), and three gates each are found on the east, south, north, and west sides of the city respectively (Eze 48:30–34; Rev 21:13).

In addition, however, there are equally clear dissimilarities between the two passages. The city's dimensions are different (Eze 48:30–35: Rev 21:15–17). The waters that flow toward the east have different sources: the temple in Ezekiel (43:7; 47:1–5) and God's throne in Revelation (22:1, 3). It might appear that these sources are really similar since Ezekiel maintains that God's throne is the temple; but John, in his vision, declares that God's throne is in Jerusalem. The temple and the city of Jerusalem are distinctly different entities in Ezekiel (45:2–4; 48:10, 15–17), and in the Revelation vision there is no temple (21:22; 22:3). Since a major aspect of Eze 40–48 is the temple and its regulations, perhaps this would argue for Ezekiel's discussion to reflect the Millennium more than the eternal state. The tribal allotments of Ezekiel include the sea as the western boundary (47:15–20), whereas in Revelation John declares that the sea no longer exists (Rev 21:1). That is, Ezekiel's tribal boundaries could not exist in the eternal state if the sea no longer existed. These dissimilarities suggest that Ezekiel's vision is more concerned with millennial concepts than the eternal state, whereas the Revelation vision is focused on the eternal state.

The river flowing east from the temple likewise appears to be millennial since the source is different from Revelation. But here the similar nature of the two passages is perhaps best observed. Ezekiel may very well be giving a glimpse of the eternal state with this similar facet. Perhaps what is seen in the Millennium will also be seen in the eternal state, though with slight modification. Since the Lord will take the place of the temple in the eternal state, the river could flow out of the millennial temple as the throne of God in Eze 47 and out of the throne of God, distinct from a temple, in Rev 22.

It seems, therefore, that Ezekiel 40–48 is primarily describing the millennial temple, its regulations for worship, and the tribal allotments. The Millennium is only a beginning, sort of a microcosm, of the eternal state and a transition into it. Consequently, to observe reflections of Eze 40–48 in the picture of the eternal state revealed in Rev 21–22 should be expected and should not surprise the reader.

Is Not the Existence of a Temple, Priests, and a Sacrificial System a Retrogression to OT Modes of Worship? A grammatical-historical hermeneutic will see a real temple, real sacrifices, and real priests functioning in the millennial context. When these are closely examined, it becomes evident that they are Mosaic in nature, though omissions and modifications are present. But the NT states that Jesus Christ died once and for all on the cross for all sin. There is no need for a further sacrifice for sin. Likewise, the Lord's Table is designed to bring remembrance of the Lord's death to the worshipers. Why go back to OT modes of worship set forth under the old covenant when the new covenant has been instituted?

An examination of Ezekiel's purpose, especially in this section, combined with a comparison of the Levitical worship concepts with that of Ezekiel and of the NT will help us solve some of these dilemmas. Ezekiel was a priest; thus he frequently looked on issues in his prophecy from a priestly perspective. He would be expected to view the new worship principles from his vantage point with a temple, sacrifices, and priests involved. Likewise, God normally reveals himself in terms of the culture and perspective of those receiving his revelation. Such could be expected here.

The recipients of this vision are described as "the house of Israel." This terminology is used by Ezekiel to describe Israel at any time in her existence—past, present, or future. Apocalyptic literature of the OT was to be a source of hope and encouragement in a time of discouragement. Revelation that a temple would be rebuilt in the messianic kingdom to which God's glory would return and in which the nation would worship the Lord as he had commanded would surely be an encouragement. Should not the description of worship in the messianic kingdom be in terms both understandable to Israel as well as in keeping with the covenant worship of her God?

In Eze 37:15–28 all the covenants given to Israel would be fulfilled at the time of her restoration to the Promised Land and the institution of the messianic kingdom. This includes the Abrahamic, Davidic, new, peace, and Mosaic covenants. The covenant formula of the Mosaic covenant—"they will be my people, and I will be their God"—will be operative as Israel walks in the stipulations of the Mosaic covenant, cleansed under the new covenant and experiencing the eternal reign of her king, the Messiah, under the Davidic covenant (37:23–26; cf. Ex 19:5–6; Lev 26:12; Dt 26:18–19; Jer 30:18–22; 31:33; 32:36–40). Because Israel was in a relationship with God through the Abrahamic and Mosaic covenants, she had always been expected to worship the Lord in holiness. Her entire worship procedure was designed to point her to God's holiness and to her need to be holy before him (cf. Leviticus). The basic emphasis throughout Eze 40–48 is on God's holiness. The holiness of the Lord's temple and the worship of him are contrasted with the profaning of his name and his temple in Israel's past worship. Israel would have a final opportunity to worship God correctly—in the purity of holiness. Such worship would demonstrate that Israel had truly been redeemed and cleansed.

Ezekiel 40–48 presents only the Hebrew perspective of millennial worship. This does not preclude other worship forms from also existing and being carried out (cf. Lk 22:18). The manifestations and functions of all God's covenants do not contradict but rather complement one another. Israel will finally be a people of God, living and worshiping in the holiness revealed in the Mosaic stipulations. The omissions and modifications from the Mosaic system observed in Eze 40–48 are undoubtedly present to enable the various aspects of the covenants to harmonize.

But is not the presence of a temple anachronistic? In answer, the existence of a temple as a place of worship is the normal concept from an OT perspective. Likewise, without a temple complex sacrifices cannot be offered properly. Therefore, the temple will be necessary for worship (Eze 43–46).

Ezekiel sets forth two major purposes for the millennial temple. First, the temple will provide a throne for God among his people (43:6–7), the residency of his glory (43:1–12) from which he will rule over his people. Second, the temple complex will reflect God's holiness by its walls of separation, various courts, and temple divisions (40:5; 42:14–20). The design of the structure will cause the people of that day to be ashamed of their iniquities. Therefore, a temple structure should not prevent or hinder other worship forms that may exist in the Millennium (e.g., the Lord's Table), unless one divides the periods of God's working so that only certain architectural forms can be used for the worship of God at a given time. There have been a variety of structures in which Christians have worshiped in the church age. There seems to be no scriptural concept that forbids a Christian from worshiping in a temple built to almighty God. A temple, in and of itself, does not appear to be anachronistic.

A second major difficulty is the relationship between Ezekiel's sacrificial system and the NT teaching of Christ's death as a finished and complete work for sin. To understand the issues, we must describe Ezekiel's millennial sacrificial system. In doing so, we will compare it to the Mosaic system. Almost all aspects of the Ezekiel system are identical with Mosaic procedure. It is primarily the omissions, with some modifications in keeping with the purpose of Ezekiel's worship, that compose the differences.

Although the general phrase "all the appointed feasts of the house of Israel" is used in 45:17, only three festivals are explicitly mentioned in these chapters: Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the Feast of Tabernacles, and, by implication, the Feast of Firstfruits. Passover (45:21–24) began on the fourteenth day of the first month (Nisan), and the people were to eat unleavened bread for seven days (cf. Ex 12:1–30; Nu 28:16–35). The "leader" offered a sin offering each day along with a grain offering for himself and for the people of the land (cf. Nu 28:22–24). Daily the leader also offered a burnt offering with its grain offering (cf. Nu 28:19–21, 23–24). These items parallel those in the Levitical system. Likewise, Ezekiel declares that the same offerings as those made for Passover will be made for the Feast of Tabernacles for a similar length of time (Eze 45:25). Numbers 29:12–38 only differs by adding a daily drink offering. This festival began on the fifteenth day of the seventh month and lasted for seven days, as prescribed in the Mosaic system. In addition, Eze 44:30 states that "the best of all of the firstfruits ... will belong to the priests." This does not necessarily imply a Feast of Firstfruits but is the only mention of the idea of firstfruits in the Ezekiel system.

The offerings and sacrifices to be used in worship and consecration of the temple make up most of the Ezekiel system. In addition to the offerings of the various festivals, the Israelites will be required to offer daily to God burnt offerings with their accompanying grain offering in the morning (cf. Ex 29:38–42; Lev 6:12; Nu 28:3–7). The Mosaic procedure required this offering daily, both in the morning and in the evening, along with a drink offering. Offerings on the Sabbaths, new moons, and all appointed festivals will include the burnt offering, grain offering, and drink offering in Ezekiel's worship (45:17; cf. Lev 23:37; Nu 28:9–15). Only on the observance of new moons did the Mosaic list add the sin offering. Ezekiel also declares that the priests are to sacrifice for the leader a burnt offering and a fellowship offering on both the Sabbath and the new moon (46:2–7; Nu 29:39). The leader may also offer a freewill burnt offering and fellowship offerings on the Sabbath (46:12).

Ezekiel's temple is purified ("atoned for") on the first and seventh days of the first month (of each year?) with a sin offering (45:18–20). Similar procedures are outlined in the Mosaic system but with the addition of burnt offerings and fellowship offerings (cf Nu 7:87–89; 2Ch 7:1–10; 29:20–24). When the altar of burnt sacrifice is built, it will be cleansed, consecrated, and dedicated for seven days with both burnt offerings and sin offerings (43:18–25; cf. Ex 29:36–37; Lev 7:14). After the seven days, the altar may be used for regular offerings (43:27). This passage is silent concerning whether the altar's cleansing and consecration are to be repeated. Finally, Israel will make a special contribution of grains, oil, and animals for the leader to use in the regular atonement for the house of Israel (45:15–17; cf. Lev 9:17–21). The atonement offerings are the sin offering, grain offering, burnt offering, and fellowship offering. No time is specified as to how often or when such atonement is to be made.

The priesthood in Ezekiel is composed of the Levites as helpers in the maintenance, administration, and function of temple worship; but those of the Zadok line will be the only ones permitted to minister before the Lord with the most holy things (44:5–16). The other Levites are denied this privilege due to their past unfaithfulness in carrying out the duties of the sanctuary. There is no high priest. The only stated priestly functions are the slaughter, washing, cooking, and eating of various sacrifices (40:38–42; 42:13; 44:29; 46:20; cf. Lev 7:7; Nu 18:8–10).

Therefore, most stated aspects of the worship procedure in Ezekiel are like those of the Mosaic system. The major omissions include the absence of a Day of Atonement, an ark of the covenant, the Feast of Weeks (or Pentecost), a high priest, and a full, ministering Levitical priesthood. The absence of the Day of Atonement and the ark of the covenant where the atoning blood was sprinkled suggest that the work of propitiation has already been accomplished. One would think these items would have been included in the millennial system of Ezekiel, since they were extremely important factors in the Mosaic system. Being an argument from silence, however, it is difficult to be certain or to make any significant argument. The lack of a high priest may point to the high priesthood of Jesus Christ, who will be ruling in the Millennium (Heb 4:14–5:10; 7:11–8:13).

In other words, the millennial worship system is distinctly different from the Mosaic system only in that certain Mosaic elements are omitted or modified, most likely because of Christ's finished work on the cross. Millennial sacrifices are also discussed elsewhere by the OT prophets (Isa 56:6–7; 60:7, 13; 66:20–23; Jer 33:15–22; Zec 14:16–21).

The question whether these sacrifices are efficacious is crucial. The Mosaic covenant was given to a people who had already entered into a relationship with the Lord in the Abrahamic covenant. The Mosaic covenant was not given to bring one into a relationship with God but to demonstrate how one in that relationship was to live holy before him. True worship grows out of a personal relationship with God.

The Mosaic worship system, therefore, was to be used by those in a relationship with God. Never did the sacrifices and offerings deliver one from sin. They were never efficacious for the Israelite or anyone else. Rather, the sacrifices were picture lessons and types of the Messiah's work, whereby he would atone for all sin in a propitious manner through the sacrifice of his own blood once and for all. The sin and guilt offerings were reminders of one's personal inherent sin and the need for cleansing from that sinfulness by the shedding of innocent blood. These offerings were observed in much the sense in which a believer today confesses sin (1Jn 1:9) in light of the finished work of Christ for sin. The believer's confession itself is not efficacious; it is only Christ's finished work that provides forgiveness of sin. Confession, however, reminds a believer that he or she sinned and that the sin has been forgiven by Christ's blood. The sin and guilt offerings, therefore, reminded the Israelites that they were sinful and that they needed the Messiah's innocent blood, typified in the animal, to cleanse them of their sin and to bring forgiveness from God.

The burnt offering pictured the offerers' commitment to the Lord. It was voluntary, even as commitment is today. The burnt offerings required daily and at other festivals were constant reminders that the Israelites needed to be totally committed to their Lord. The fellowship offerings reflected the offerers' thanksgiving to God and the peace that existed between them and God. Certainly believers today are to express their thankfulness to God for the various blessings bestowed on them because of their relationship with the Lord.

The concept of atonement creates a major problem for many with the sacrificial system in Ezekiel. The Hebrew verb means "to atone by offering a substitute" (GK 4105), which is always used in connection with the removal of sin or defilement. When a sacrifice for atonement was brought in the Mosaic system, it was brought because God required it, not because of the initiative of the offerer (Lev 10). God alone gave forgiveness and cleansing, not the sacrifice. Ultimately, the basis for forgiveness and cleansing was the work of the Messiah's innocent blood as the ransom for the penalty of death. The sacrificial animal could not offer an efficacious ransom; rather, the atonement sacrifice was only a picture lesson of Christ's finished work.

All mentions of "atonement" in Eze 40–48 relate to the concept of purification or consecration of the temple or altar with the exception of two references. The atonement of the people is mentioned in only 45:15–17. There the concept is the same as that in the Mosaic system: a picture lesson of the ultimate atoning work of Christ when he would pay the ransom price of his blood to atone for sin and provide forgiveness of sin once and for all.

The Mosaic Day of Atonement for sin (cf. Lev 16:21–22, 30, 31) occurred annually in OT times, but it will not be observed in the Millennium. But sin will still occur in the Millennium among the house of Israel. Therefore the atonement offerings for the leader and the people will be a marvelous reminder of the work that the Messiah accomplished on the cross to enable their sin to be forgiven. It will also remind them that they are sinful people who need that redemption provided through the innocent blood of Christ. The sacrifices in Ezekiel are memorials of Christ's work even as the Mosaic sacrifices were picture lessons and types of the work he would do. Neither is efficacious.

The writer of Hebrews in chs. 7–10 discusses the relationship between the Mosaic sacrifices and the work of Christ. It is instructive to examine these chapters, for they confirm the argument stated above. The law required that nearly everything be cleansed with blood, and without the shedding of blood there was no forgiveness (Heb 9:21–22). This is observed in both the Mosaic and the Ezekiel systems of atonement. But the elements of the tabernacle (temple) and its furnishings were only copies of heavenly things (9:23); and though they needed to be purified with sacrifices, the real need of purification would be made by Christ's sacrifice, of which these things were only copies (9:24–28). These aspects of the Mosaic covenant were only a "shadow" (i.e., a picture) of the things that were coming; they were not the reality itself (10:1). Because the Mosaic covenant dealt here in shadows, the Mosaic system could never make its worshipers perfect through the repeated sacrifices that never could take away sin (10:2–4, 11). The sacrifices cleansed only outwardly as a picture (9:11–14); Jesus inwardly cleanses our consciences from the sinful acts that lead to death (10:8–14). If the Mosaic sacrifices could have cleansed its worshipers and made them perfect, those sacrifices would have stopped once and for all, but they could not (10:2). Therefore they were continued as regular reminders of sin, because it was impossible for the blood of animals to take away sin. Jesus offered himself once for the sins of humankind. The reality of the pictures had come, even as promised in the new covenant (7:27).

The writer of Hebrews goes on to say that where sins have been forgiven, there is no longer any sacrifice for sin. Understood in the context of Hebrews described above, there is no longer the need for the picture lessons and reminders, now that the reality of Christ's efficacious blood sacrifice has been offered once and for all. However, the writer of Hebrews does not declare that pictorial sacrifices and festivals absolutely can no longer be observed as reminders and picture lessons of what Christ did after his singularly efficacious sacrifice has been completed. Since the sacrifices and festivals in the OT system were only pictures themselves, they never conflict with the sacrifice of the Messiah. They never were and never could be efficacious.

Likewise, the sacrifices in the millennial system described by Ezekiel are only picture lessons and reminders of the sin of humankind and of the only efficacious sacrifice for sin once and for all made by Christ. The millennial sacrifices will be both reminders to believers in millennial worship and picture lessons to unbelievers born in the Millennium. That is their purpose. On the basis of the OT role of the sacrifices and the argument of the writer of Hebrews, it does not appear that the pictorial sacrifices of the Mosaic system or the memorial sacrifices of the millennial worship conflict with the completed work of Jesus' sacrifice for all sins once and for all on the cross.

In addition, the very observance of the Lord's Table is an argument in favor of this memorial view. The observance of the Lord's Table is not a substitute for Christ's death and does not in that sense conflict with the finished work of Christ. As a memorial, the Lord's Table will apparently be celebrated with Christ present in the messianic kingdom (Millennium) when Christ returns (Mt 26:29; Mk 14:25; Lk 22:18). If the Lord's Table is a memorial and the sacrifices of the Ezekiel system are memorials, the two should not in any way conflict with each other but should be able to coexist. One, of course, may ask why both need to be observed if they perform the same role. Perhaps the Lord's Table is the primary memorial to those believers of the church age while the sacrifices in Ezekiel will be the primary commemoration of the Jews in the Millennium, though nothing certainly prohibits any of the singular people of God—Jews or Gentiles—from participating in the worship of either memorial.

In summary, the sacrificial system in Ezekiel's worship will be used as picture lessons to demonstrate the need for holiness in the consecration and purifying of the temple and the altar. They will be visual reminders of human sinfulness and one's need for redemption, as well as pictorial memorials of the finished and completed sacrifice of the Messiah who provided atonement for humankind once and for all. Thanksgiving to God will be visually expressed in the fellowship offerings. In addition, the sacrifices will provide food for the millennial priests (44:29–31), even as they did for the Mosaic priests. Priests will be necessary in the millennial worship system to conduct the sacrifices for the leader and the people. Priests will also carry out all the necessary ministries of the temple. Their main role, however, will be to demonstrate to everyone in the Millennium the distinction between the holy and the profane (Eze 44).

A Summary of the Argument of Ezekiel 40–48. Thirteen years have passed since Ezekiel had encouraged the exiles with the six messages of restoration hope (33:21–39:29). Then, through an apocalyptic vision, Ezekiel gives a final encouragement by describing the nature of the messianic kingdom. This vision is the culmination of the book, revealing the climax of God's working with Israel throughout history. God establishes Israel as a holy nation to worship him and demonstrate his person. When God originally created Israel, three elements were essential for her existence: a people, a government, and a homeland. When God reestablishes Israel as a nation in the messianic kingdom, these same three elements must exist. God will regather the people through the great restoration described in chs. 34–37. He will then give Israel her new government (guidelines for living) and establish her in the Promised Land forever (chs. 40–48).

The reestablishment of Israel's government is described in chs. 40–46. The center of her new life will be the Lord himself, who will return in glory to rule in her midst (43:1–9). The need for a residence for God's glory will be fulfilled in the construction of the millennial temple described in detail in chs. 40–42. Here God will reign with the temple as his throne (43:7), just as he had done previously in the tabernacle and then the temple. The regulations in 43:13–46:24 describe how the priests, leaders, and the people are to live holy lives. Requirements and functions are outlined; and Israel is charged to perform these regulations in an unerring manner, thereby demonstrating God's holiness (43:10–11; 44:5–8).

The description of Israel's restoration to the Promised Land is given in ch. 36. Then in chs. 47–48 the Lord demonstrates how he will continually heal, bless, and refresh the land in its perfect state through the river of life (47:1–12; cf. Ge 2:8–10; Rev 22:1–3). Tribal borders will be established, and land will be set aside for the priests, leaders, city, and the sanctuary. With Israel reestablished in the land of blessing, the Lord will reaffirm his eternal presence with them in a new name for the city (Jerusalem): "THE LORD IS THERE" (48:35). The Lord will be there forever!

1. The setting of the apocalyptic vision (40:1–4)

1–4 There are four essential elements in the literary setting of an apocalyptic vision: the date, the identity of the vision's recipient, the location of the vision's recipient, and noteworthy circumstances under which the vision was received.

The date of this apocalyptic vision has four aspects. (1) Ezekiel expressed it in terms of his normal calendrical system, using the reference point of Jehoiachin's deportation into Babylonian exile: 597 B.C. This vision was received in the twenty-fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, or in 573 B.C.

(2) The vision was received at the beginning of that year. Israel had two different calendars. The civil calendar began in the fall month of Tishri; the religious calendar began in the spring month of Nisan. The religious calendar is preferable since Ezekiel was a priest and the concerns of the apocalyptic vision relate to religious matters. Thus the date would be March/April 573 B.C.

(3) The vision was received on the tenth day of the month. If this is the month Nisan, then the tenth day is the very day the people may have begun to prepare for the Passover four days later. Whether they actually observed the Passover or not in exile is not known, but surely they would be contemplating Israel's redemption out of Egypt and the creation of their nation. This vision, then, would be an encouragement that the Lord would complete his purposes for the nation in the messianic kingdom.

(4) The vision was received in the fourteenth year after Jerusalem fell to the Babylonians, in 586 B.C. This also would corroborate the date of 573 B.C.

The second major element of the setting of an apocalyptic vision is the identity of the vision's recipient. Though Ezekiel's name is not given in these verses, the copious use of the first person pronoun in light of the context of the entire book certainly argues strongly that the recipient was Ezekiel.

The third aspect of the setting of this vision is the location in which it was received. Ezekiel saw the vision from a very high mountain in Israel, from which he could see a city to the south. Neither the mountain nor the city is identified. However, Ezekiel was taken into the city, where he then saw the temple's construction in detail. In light of the geography of Ezekiel's day, the city was most likely Jerusalem. To identify a high mountain to the north of Jerusalem, however, is not possible.

The final aspect of a literary setting of an apocalyptic vision is the noteworthy circumstances under which the vision was received. A divine messenger with the appearance of bronze was present. He was carrying both a measuring rod and a linen measuring cord. He exhorted Ezekiel to pay careful attention to all that he would be shown, because this vision was being given to him so that he might tell it in detail to the "house of Israel."

2. The apocalyptic vision (40:5–48:35)

a. The millennial temple (40:5–42:20)

A divine messenger guided Ezekiel through the temple complex, beginning on the outside and working gradually inward through the outer and inner courts to the temple sanctuary. He provided an abundance of details, especially dimensions. These plans and specific dimensions are accurate enough to enable plans to be drawn and models to be constructed with a fair degree of accuracy.

(1) The outer court (40:5–27)

5 Many dimensions of the temple are given in chs. 40–42. The normal cubit was the distance between the tip of the middle finger to the tip of the elbow—approximately eighteen inches. The handbreadth was the measurement of the hand's width at the base of the fingers—normally about three inches. The divine messenger guiding Ezekiel carried a measuring rod six cubits long. The long cubit was composed of one normal cubit plus a handbreadth, or eighteen inches plus three inches. Since the measurements in this portion of Ezekiel were made with this measuring rod, it can be assumed that the "cubit" in Ezekiel was normally the "long cubit" of twenty-one inches.

The examination of the temple complex began on the outside, where the messenger showed Ezekiel a wall that completely surrounded the complex. The wall was one rod high and one rod wide, or six long cubits for each dimension—approximately ten and one-half feet.

6–16 Ezekiel was taken to the eastern outer gate of the temple complex. The divine messenger explained the gate's design and dimensions in detail (see Fig. 1). The description began from the outside of the gate and worked inward. The gate was composed of seven steps (E) that led up to the gate from the outside. Perhaps these were the equivalent of the "entrance" mentioned in v.11. If so, the entrance steps measured ten cubits wide and thirteen cubits long. The north and south outer gates have the identical dimensions of the east gate (cf. vv.20–27). The gate's outer threshold (OT) measured ten cubits wide and six cubits deep. The entire gate system resembled the multiple entry gates archaeologists discovered from the Solomonic period. There were several guard rooms (cf. 1Ki 24:28; 2Ch 12:11), or alcoves, on either side of the inner part of the Solomonic gate. In this gate there were three alcoves (A) on either side of the inside of the gate, each six cubits square with a wall (FW) one cubit high in front of each. The dimension of the walls (S) separating the three inner alcoves was five cubits. The gate's inner threshold (IT) was one rod deep (six cubits), like the outer threshold.

A "portico" (P; GK 395), or vestibule, on the inside of the gate faced the courtyard. It was eight cubits wide with a two-cubit doorjamb facing the temple. Verse 14 can be understood to give the total dimensions of the portico if all sides (both widths and both lengths) were measured. There would be a total of sixty cubits (eight cubits wide by twenty-two cubits long). On the other hand, if "porticoes" refers to doorjambs or pilasters, sixty cubits could be the height of each doorjamb of each gate. There were windows, or parapet openings (O), in each alcove and in the portico; but the number and exact location of each are uncertain. The only decoration mentioned was palm tree designs, found on the inner walls of the alcoves and/or on the doorjambs.

The overall dimensions of the gate system were twenty-five cubits wide by fifty cubits long.

17–19 The courtyard (see Fig. 2) had a pavement strip (LP) the width of the east gate's length: fifty cubits. The pavement formed a border all around the outside edges of the outer court and was known as the lower pavement. Thirty rooms (R) were on this pavement around the outer court. The dimension of the outer courtyard from the inside of the outer eastern gate to the inner eastern gate was said to be one hundred cubits. The same dimension separated the north and south outer gate systems from their corresponding inner gates (40:23, 27).

20–27 The outer northern and southern gate systems were exactly identical with the outer eastern gate (cf. vv.6–16).

(2) The inner court (40:28–47)

28–37 In the examination of the inner court, the guide first discussed the gates, then the rooms for preparation of the sacrifices, next the rooms for the ministering priests, and last the general dimension and character of the inner court.

The guide showed the three gates to the inner court to Ezekiel in a counterclockwise direction, beginning at the south gate. Each of these gates was identical in its dimensions and basic design with the three gates of the outer court. Two distinct alterations were made in the inner gate design over that of the outer gate. All inner gates had their porticoes facing outward toward the outer court rather than on the inside. In addition, each stairway leading up to an inner gate system had eight steps rather than seven. Verse 30 indicates that the portico dimensions of the inner gates were five cubits by twenty-five cubits. However, this dimension does not harmonize with the dimensions of the porticoes in the outer gates; and the text states that the dimensions were the same between the inner and outer gate systems, excluding the two exceptions just mentioned. Perhaps the best solution is that the dimensions of the portico of the inner gates varies slightly with that of the outer gates.

38–43 As Ezekiel and the divine messenger were standing beside the northern inner gate system, the messenger described the rooms (W) and tables (T) to be used for the preparation of the sacrifices. There was a room located beside the doorjamb outside each inner court gate. This means each room (W) was in the outer courtyard beside the stairs leading up to the portico of the inner gate. Here the burnt offerings were to be washed for ceremonial cleansing. Though the word for "gateway" is plural in v.38, it is singular in v.39. The implication is that the two tables on either side of each inner gate portico were for the slaughter of offerings. On these four tables (T) in each portico, the burnt offerings, sin offerings, and guilt offerings—the only sacrifices requiring an animal or bird to be killed—would be slaughtered. The significance of the offerings is discussed above in the introduction to this section and below where these sacrifices are mentioned in the worship ritual.

The northern inner gate had some furniture unique to it. Two additional tables (T) for slaughter of sacrifices were placed on either side of the stairs outside the north inner gate in the outer courtyard. This made a total of eight tables both outside and inside the north inner gate. Four additional small tables of dressed stone, one and one-half cubits square and one cubit high, on which the utensils for slaughtering the sacrifices would be laid, were distributed around the northern inner gate. Double-pronged hooks were placed around the portico's wall.

44–46 Inside the northern and eastern inner gates were rooms (PS) for the priests of the sons of Zadok. They were the only ones of the Levitical priesthood permitted to minister directly to the Lord. The exclusion of Levi's other descendants from this ministry is explained in ch. 44. The Hebrew states that the rooms were specifically for singers. Though other functions are mentioned for the priests who resided in these rooms, singing was a priestly function in OT temple worship (cf. 1Ch 16:4–6; 23:5; 2Ch 29). The rooms that faced south on the inside of the north inner gate housed the priests who ministered in the temple. The room that faced north on the inside of the east gate housed those priests who ministered primarily at the altar of sacrifice.

47 The inner court courtyard was one hundred cubits square. The altar of sacrifice (A; see ch. 43) was in front of the temple (TEM).

(3) The house of God (40:48–41:26)

48–49 The divine messenger moved next to the temple structure itself (see Fig. 3). The fourteen-cubit-wide entrance of the sanctuary was reached by a flight of stairs. Facing the entrance (EP) Ezekiel observed five-cubit-wide doorjambs (PJ) protruding three cubits from the inside of the temple wall on either side. Pillars (PL), perhaps similar to Joachin and Boaz of Solomon's and Herod's temples, stood in front of the doorjambs, one on either side. As Ezekiel stepped into the temple's portico (EP), he saw a room twenty-cubits wide by eleven cubits.

41:1–2 The outer sanctuary (OS), or Holy Place, consisted of a room twenty cubits wide by forty cubits long. Its ten-cubit-wide entrance (ET) was bounded on either side with six-cubit-wide doorjambs (TJ) on walls that protruded from the side walls of the chamber by five cubits on each side.

3–4 Ezekiel moved into the inner sanctuary (IS) through a six-cubit-wide entrance (EH) with two-cubit-wide doorjambs (HJ) on walls seven cubits wide. As Ezekiel viewed the twenty-cubit-square room he was told that this room was "the Most Holy Place." By narrowing the entrance ways to the portico (40:48), to the outer sanctuary (41:2), and to the inner sanctuary (41:3) from fourteen cubits, to ten cubits, to six cubits, respectively, the architect focused the worshiper's eyes on the Most Holy Place, the center of worship.

5–11 A six-cubit-thick wall (W) surrounded the entire temple. Next to this wall, but not attached to it, were ninety side rooms (SR), four cubits wide and constructed on three stories. The thirty rooms on each level became wider as one moved higher up through each story. Stairs joined the three stories from bottom to top. These side rooms (SR) had an outer wall (W) five cubits thick, and they all rested on a six-cubit-high foundation on either side of the temple proper. This foundation extended an additional five cubits beyond the temple's outer wall to the edge of the foundation. Entrances to these side rooms were only on the north and south sides of the inner court (see Fig. 2) of the temple structure. Twenty cubits separated these side rooms from the priests' chambers (PS in Fig. 2).

12–26 A separate building (WB in Fig. 2) was west of the temple proper, seemingly next to the western wall of the temple complex. Its function is unknown. The structure was seventy cubits wide by ninety cubits long with a five-cubit-thick wall all around. With its five-cubit wall on either side plus its ninety-cubit length, the building was exactly one hundred cubits across from north to south, exactly the same width as the inner court to the east of the temple proper.

The decorations of the temple structure consisted of windows all around the portico, the outer sanctuary, and the inner sanctuary. All the inside walls of each aspect of the temple structure were covered with a wood wainscoting up to the windows, and the windows were covered too. These wooden inner walls, as well as the outer walls, were carved with cherubim interspersed with palm trees. Each cherub had two faces, one each facing the palm tree on either side of it. The faces were those of a man and a lion. Though the cherubim may symbolize the guardianship of God's holiness, any significance of the palm trees is uncertain.

The only furniture in the temple was a wooden altar, three cubits high by two cubits square. The divine messenger called it "the table that is before the LORD." This altar was much smaller than the altar of sacrifice (cf. 43:13–17). Some have suggested that this was the altar of incense that sat before the veil of the Most Holy Place in the Mosaic system. The altar of incense symbolized the saints' prayers in the tabernacle.

Both the entrance to the outer sanctuary (ET in Fig. 3) and the entrance to the inner sanctuary (EH) had rectangular doors. These were double doors, hinged with two leaves for each door. The doors to the outer sanctuary were carved with cherubim interspersed with palm trees, similar to the outer walls.

The entire temple complex was of great beauty and symmetry.

(4) The priests' buildings (42:1–14)

1–9 There were two buildings (PB in Fig. 2) in the outer court just outside the inner court, one on the north and one on the south. The building was one hundred cubits long, east to west, and fifty cubits wide, north to south. The northern building lay parallel to the outer court pavement to the north and the inner court's north wall that it abutted. It was three-storied with many rooms and galleries on each floor. The two lower stories had pillars as structural supports. The rooms on the third floor were smaller, though the third floor had larger galleries than the middle and ground floors. All rooms appeared to have doors on the north side. The lower floor had an entrance on the north with a ten-cubit wide and one-cubit long step in front of it (cf. vv.11–12). The building's lower floor also had an eastern entrance, in front of which was a wall parallel to the east end of the building. Perhaps this wall provided a separation from the rest of the activity of the outer court, giving privacy.

10–12 The southern building was similar to the northern building in every facet, providing perfect symmetry, which was a hallmark of the overall design (see the NIV note on v.10 for the reading of "south" instead of "eastward").

13–14 These two buildings provided a holy place where the ministering Zadokian priests could eat the holy offerings and change from their holy ministering garments to everyday clothes. The priests were to eat portions of the grain offerings, the sin offerings, and the guilt offerings. This building also provided a place to store these portions of the sacrifices. The priests would leave the priestly garments in these buildings. In doing so they would continue to distinguish between the holy and the profane.

(5) The measurement of the temple area (42:15–20)

15–20 The divine messenger brought Ezekiel outside the entire temple complex through the east gate. Ezekiel was shown the vast area that would be set aside for the sanctuary. It measured five hundred rods square (cf. NIV note), almost a square mile. Some immediately reject the term "rod" (16.5 feet) and replace it with "cubit," the standard of measure in these verses. However, such an alteration is contrary to 45:2, which declares the temple environs to be "500 . . . square." Neither the term "rod" nor "cubit" is stated. Ezekiel 45:2 does state that a border of fifty cubits provides an open space around the "500 . . . square" area. Ezekiel's explicit use of the term "cubit" seems to have been to distinguish cubits from the rods of the "500 . . . square" area as already revealed in 42:15–20. Some argue that an area five hundred rods square (about 1.5 miles square) would be too large and not fit the topography. But Zechariah and other prophets demonstrate that the whole Palestinian topography will undergo geographical modifications at the beginning of the Millennium. No good reason appears to reject the term "rod" in these verses.

This large area provided a separation space between the holy (the temple complex and its worship) and the common (or profane) terrain of everyday life. Israel had frequently forgotten to make this distinction in her past history.

b. The return of the glory of God to the temple (43:1–12)

1–5 Ezekiel was then brought to the outer court's east gate where he looked out toward the east. Here he would see the most important aspect of this entire apocalyptic vision: God's glory returning to the temple!

The glory that Ezekiel saw had the same likeness of God's glory that he had seen in his inaugural visions on the river Kebar (chs. 1; 3) and that had departed from the temple during his announcement of destruction on Jerusalem (chs. 8; 10–11). Since Jerusalem's destruction, God's glory had not been present in Jerusalem or among his people. Israel had been under discipline in Babylonia and would remain under discipline until the end times. Then she would be cleansed and restored to the Promised Land by the Messiah. God's glory would not fill Zerubbabel's temple or the temple of Herod (cf. Hag 2:7).

The recipients of Ezekiel's messages and visions would undoubtedly be encouraged by this vision. This vision made it clear that God's glory would return after Israel was cleansed and after the millennial temple had been constructed according to the divine plan given in chs. 40–42. It would be similar to the dedication of the tabernacle (Ex 40:34–35) and the Solomonic temple (1Ki 8:10–11; 2Ch 5:13–14; 7:1–3), when God's glory filled them. What a glorious climax to God's good and wonderful plan for Israel! Ezekiel saw the marvelous glory of God coming from the east, entering the east gate, and completely filling the temple. It caused the entire land to become radiant with God's glory. The sound of its coming was just like the sound of rushing water Ezekiel had heard coming from the cherubim's wings in the previous visions of God's glory (cf. 1:24). God had indeed returned to dwell among his people!

6–12 The significance of this vision of God's glory was so important that the Lord himself interpreted it to Ezekiel. The temple was to be God's throne and residence among Israel forever. The promises of chs. 33–37 would be fulfilled when God's glory returned. The glory of God would fill the temple, and God's holiness would permeate the entire temple complex. This, in turn, would be instructive both for Ezekiel's contemporaries and for the house of Israel living in the Messianic Age. At that time Israel would never again defile the Lord's holy name (cf. 39:7) through her religious prostitution in the temple precinct (cf. 2Ki 23:7) and the burial of the corpses of kings in their high places. Israel had religiously defiled the Lord's name through her idolatrous practices. Therefore the Lord used this vision to exhort the Israelites in Ezekiel's day to put away these defiling practices.

Ezekiel's contemporaries would be ashamed of their sins when they heard of this vision and saw the new temple design with the promised return of God's glory. Likewise, millennial Israel would be ashamed for all her past sins as she reflected on the holiness of God's glory and the perfection of the new temple design in contrast to Israel's past unfaithfulness and defilement. The Lord instructed Israel in the vision's interpretation to follow carefully the detailed plan of the millennial temple in its construction so that God's glory might fill it.

There was only one basic law for the temple area: all the area on the temple mountain would be holy. The stress would be on God's holiness and his place of rule and residency. Holiness would be the emphasis in the Millennium. All worship structures and regulations were to demonstrate God's holiness. A continual contrast would be observed between the holy and the profane. The Messiah would judge unholiness with the rod of iron (cf. Ps 2:8–9; Rev 2:27; 12:5; 19:15)!

c. Temple ordinances (43:13–46:24)

(1) The altar of sacrifice: description and dedication (43:13–27)

13–17 The basic design of the altar of sacrifice is clear (see Fig 4). It was to be located in front of the sanctuary in the inner court (A in Fig. 2). The altar is described from the bottom to the top. The bottom portion (B in Fig. 4) of the altar was composed of a one-cubit-high base with a one-cubit-wide gutter around the altar. The gutter had a rim of one span length (approx. nine inches). On top of this base were three sections of the altar. Next to the base was a two-cubit-high section (I), sixteen cubits square with a one-cubit ledge around it. This ledge formed a gutter one cubit wide with a one-half-cubit-high rim. The middle section (E) was four cubits high and fourteen cubits square, including a one-cubit-wide ledge around it. The hearth (H), four cubits high and twelve cubits square, formed the altar's top portion. One horn (HA) projected from each of the four corners. Steps (S) led to the top on the east side, though the dimensions of the stairs are not given. These steps were in contrast to the altar of sacrifice under the Mosaic system, where it was forbidden to go up by steps on the altar (Ex 20:24–26). This millennial altar was very large: approximately thirty-one and one-half feet square at the base by approximately nineteen and one-quarter feet high!

18–27 After the altar of sacrifice was constructed, it would be necessary to cleanse and dedicate it. Cleansing was needed because everything associated with humankind partakes of sin and needs to be cleansed, especially if it is to be used in the worship of the Lord. A similar cleansing and dedication took place with the altar of sacrifice of the tabernacle (Ex 29:36–37; Lev 8:14–17) and the altar of Solomon's temple (2Ch 7:9).

The ritual cleansing and atonement for the altar took seven days. On the first day a special sin offering of a young bull was made by the Zadokian priests. They were to take some of the blood of the sacrifice and put it on the four horns of the altar, the four corners of the altar's upper ledge, and all around the rim. This sin or purification offering would cleanse the altar from its sinfulness, thereby making atonement for the altar. Atonement here has the idea of wiping away or cleansing, after which the altar would be holy (cf. Lev 8:14–15). The remainder of the sin offering was burned in a designated part of the temple area (cf. 42:20) but outside the sanctuary precinct per se (Lev 8:17).

On the second and succeeding five days, the priests offered a sin offering of a male goat without defect, to continue to purify the altar. After this ceremonial cleansing, the priests symbolized the altar's consecration by offering a young bull and a ram, both without defect and sprinkled with salt, as a burnt offering before the Lord. With these offerings each day for the prescribed seven days, the altar would be atoned and cleansed (cf. Ex 29:36–37).

After the seven-day ceremonial cleansing and dedication of the altar of sacrifice, the priests would begin to present the burnt offerings and fellowship offerings on the altar for the people. Not only would the Lord then accept their offerings because they had properly consecrated the altar, but he also would accept the worshipers. What a glorious truth! Because of the Messiah's sacrifice, all who believe are accepted!

(2) Regulations for the east gate (44:1–3)

1–2 The outer east gate (cf. 40:6–16) was to remain closed permanently. This was done because of reverence for the gate's special sanctity, for it was the gate through which the Lord entered into the millennial precinct in his glory (cf. 43:1–4).

3 Only the "prince" (GK 5954) was permitted to enter this gate. He must enter and leave by way of the portico from the outer court only. His only function within that gate was to eat bread in the presence of the Lord, but exactly which meal or for what purpose is not stated.

The identity of this "prince" has been a puzzle. The English word "prince" connotes royalty. However, the Hebrew word is best translated "leader." This leader is not the Messiah, because he would make a sin offering for himself (cf. 45:22); such is not possible for the Lord Jesus (cf. Heb 4:15). In addition, this leader would have natural children (46:16), another impossibility for the Messiah. The leader was a man, but his identity remains unknown. He functions as the people's leader in their millennial worship, almost like a high priest, but not having the same role and function.

(3) The priests and the service of the temple (44:4–16)

4–5 The emphasis in this vision had been on God's glory and the resulting holiness that was required in all aspects of millennial worship. Ezekiel was brought again to see the Lord's glory filling the temple, and his immediate response was reverence and awe as he fell prostrate in worship. The Lord undoubtedly used this experience to impress again on Ezekiel the importance of holiness, for holiness must characterize the priests and their actions.

The priests would instruct the rest of the people in holiness, teaching holiness by their lives, their priestly function, and their word. For this reason Ezekiel was exhorted to watch and listen carefully to all the temple regulations, especially those concerning the entrances and exits. There the priests would contact both the common life in the people and the holiness of the temple's inner court and sanctuary. There they would meet and serve the people.

6–9 The religions of the ancient Near East frequently used foreign captives as temple servants to aid the priests. The Lord's rebuke of Israel in these verses reflected ancient Israel's adoption of this practice. This custom was first observed in Israel when Joshua made the Gibeonites temple servants (Jos 9:23, 27). Israel seems to have continued this practice through the time of Ezra (Ezr 8:20). However, the Mosaic covenant stated that foreigners who were uncircumcised in flesh and heart were not to minister in the temple as priests, along with all other Israelites not of the Aaronic line (cf. Nu 3:10). Perhaps originally some of these foreigners had been circumcised both in the flesh and in the heart so that they could enter the temple area lawfully and make an offering (cf. Nu 15:14). Certainly Isa 56:3, 6 indicates that such would be possible in the messianic kingdom (cf. Zec 14:21). But Israel had broken the Mosaic covenant with the detestable practice of having foreign temple-servants not only entering the sanctuary but also taking charge of the temple duties. By their handling priestly functions related to the holy things, they had desecrated the temple. But these foreigners should never have been permitted to take over the priests' functions.

HA	Horns of the altar (43:20)
S	Steps (43:17b; cf. 40:47b)

The Mosaic covenant called for all to be circumcised in their hearts as well as in the flesh, the sign of the Abrahamic covenant (cf. Lev 26:41; Dt 10:16; 30:6; Jer 4:4; 9:25). There must be a change of heart toward the Lord and his ways, a true circumcising of the hardness of the heart's foreskin. This was necessary for both Israelites and foreigners if they were to enter into a proper relationship with the Lord. Therefore, an explicit command was given: No foreigner, uncircumcised of heart and flesh, could enter the temple, not even those living among Israel. However, the implication was that any foreigner circumcised in heart and flesh could enter as any other person, but he could not function in any manner as a priest.

10–14 The Lord now clarifies who could minister in the millennial temple and in what manner. The Levites would be in charge of the temple gates, where they would slaughter the burnt offerings and other sacrifices for the people and assist them in their worship. The Levites would also be responsible for all work done in the temple, perhaps those duties previously handled by foreigners.

Limitations were placed on Levites' ministry. They would not be permitted to serve the Lord as priests nor would they be allowed to come near any of the Lord's holy things, especially his most holy offerings. They would serve neither in the inner court nor in the temple itself. The reason for this restriction was explicit. As a group they had strayed from the Lord in the past and had pursued idolatry. In so doing they had also led the nation into this sin (cf. ch. 8). They were to be held accountable for their past transgressions, even as they had been warned in Nu 18:23. They must bear sin's consequences and shame.

15–16 The descendants of Zadok were first placed into major priestly functions under Solomon (1Ki 2:26–35), though this had been foretold in 1Sa 2:35. They alone had remained faithful to their duties in the Lord's temple when all the rest of Israel had gone away from the Lord. Because of their faithfulness then, the Lord would give to them that singularly unique ministry before him in the millennial sanctuary. They alone would stand before the Lord to offer sacrifices. They alone would be permitted to enter the temple and come near the Lord's table to perform his service of worship (exactly which "table" is meant is not certain). Chapters 45–46 indicate that the sons of Zadok would bring the sacrifices for the prince and the people daily, on the Sabbaths, and at the appointed festivals. What a great privilege and blessing would be theirs because of their past faithfulness to God's laws!

(4) Ordinances for the Zadokian priesthood (44:17–31)

17–19 Various regulations and functions for the Zadokian priests are spelled out in the remainder of this chapter. The clothing worn when ministering highlights the holiness of their ministry. Linen was to be worn when these priests entered the inner court to serve (cf. Ex 28:42; Lev 16:4). The linen not only depicted purity by its whiteness, but its coolness kept the priests from perspiring and thereby becoming unclean. In addition to the outer linen garment, the priests wore linen undergarments and a linen turban.

When the priests left the inner court to go out among the common people, they were required to change their clothes (cf. Lev 6:11), leaving their linen garments in the sacred rooms so designated (42:1–14). In this way they would not improperly make the people holy with their ministering clothes.

Contact with a holy thing consecrates. A person or object enters into the state of holiness by touching a holy thing and thus becomes subject to the restrictions of holiness to which other holy people or objects are subject (Ex 29:37; 30:29; Lev 6:27; cf. 21:1–8). This rule concerning leaving the linen garments in the sacred rooms would aid in maintaining a clear distinction between the holy and the profane.

20–22 The Zadokian priests were not to shave their heads or allow their hair to grow long. It was to be trimmed properly. Shaving the head was often associated with pagan religion in which hair was offered to the gods to establish a relationship. Long hair could depict mourning. Priests were not to practice idolatry or pagan mourning rites (cf. Lev 10:6; 21:5, 10). As this hair regulation was a sign of holiness for the priests in the Mosaic system (Lev 21:6), so it would be in the millennial system.

No priest was to drink wine while ministering before the Lord (cf. Lev 10:9). He was to make sure that he had full control of himself when performing the Lord's service. This was holiness.

A Zadokian priest was permitted to marry an Israelite virgin or the widow of a priest. This would maintain the holiness of marriage. He could not marry any other widow or a divorced woman. This restriction, which had been true for the high priest in the Mosaic system, would now be applied to all priests (cf. Lev 21:7, 14).

23–24 The above regulations would enable the priests to teach the Israelites the difference between something holy and something common through the visual lessons of their priestly lives. In addition, these priests would serve as judges for any dispute, making their decision according to God's ordinances. They were always to keep God's laws and every decree concerning the appointed feasts and the Sabbaths, the sign of the Mosaic covenant.

25–27 There would be individuals entering the Millennium with natural bodies from the tribulation period. These, of course, would ultimately die physically, though physical life will be much longer during the Millennium (cf. Isa 65:20). A priest was defiled by coming near a dead person, and so this was forbidden, except in a case of a member of his immediate family (Lev 21:1–3). When a priest cared for a dead family member, he would be defiled; it would be necessary for him to be cleansed according to biblical guidelines (cf. Nu 19:11–19) and wait seven days, the period of cleansing. When a priest returned to minister in the inner court after defilement and cleansing, it would be necessary for him to offer a sin offering as a purification for himself.

28–31 All provisions for the priests would be made by the Lord. He would be their inheritance and their possession. No other possessions were to be given to them except those specified in these verses. The priests' food would be provided by the Lord through the people's offerings. The priests would eat from the grain offerings, the sin offerings, and the guilt offerings. They would also partake of everything devoted to the Lord by the Israelites, the best of all the firstfruits, all special gifts, and the ground meal of the people (cf. Nu 18:10–13). On "devoted" things, see comments on Lev 27:1–34, also v.28; Nu 18:14. The priests were not allowed to eat anything that had been torn by a wild animal or was found dead (cf. Lev 17:5; 22:8; Dt 14:21). The Israelites were promised blessing for their faithful giving to the priests in this way. There is always blessing in giving to the Lord!

(5) The sacred area of the Holy Land (45:1–8)

1–8 A specific portion of Israel's land in the Millennium would be set aside as a sacred area for the priests and the sanctuary. The entire area would be a contribution to the Lord by Israel. That land would not really belong to the priests but to the Lord. In this sense, also, the Lord would continue to be the priests' inheritance.

This contribution to the Lord for a holy area would measure twenty-five thousand rods by twenty thousand rods. The NIV translates "cubits" rather than "rods" as the standard of measure (see comment on 42:15–20). Actually no word for a standard is given in the text; this is because the standard of "rods" had already been given in 42:15–20. We can assume that Ezekiel understood this to be the measurement and only noted the exception to it in the measurement of a fifty-cubit-wide open area around the five hundred-square-rod sanctuary area.

This twenty-five thousand rods by twenty thousand rods area was further subdivided into two equal areas, twenty-five thousand rods by ten thousand rods. One was a sacred portion for the Zadokian priests who were to minister to the Lord in the temple (cf. 44:15–16; 48:9–12). Here they would place their houses. In the center of this area would be the five-hundred-rod square area for the sanctuary, the Most Holy Place. This five-hundred-rod-square area would have a fifty-cubit-wide border of open land all around it as a barrier to separate it from all else. This would stress the holiness of the sanctuary area.

The other twenty-five thousand rod by ten thousand rod area would belong to the Levites who would assist the Zadokian priests in the temple (cf. 44:10–14; 48:13–14). They would use the area for their towns. This entire area would run parallel to the portion for the Zadokian priests, immediately to the north (cf. 48:8, 21).

Another area of twenty-five thousand rods by five thousand rods, adjoining the Zadokian sacred area to the south, would provide for the city (cf. 48:15–19, 30–35). This city is most likely Jerusalem, though no name is given. The city area would belong to the entire house of Israel.

Finally, an area was allotted to the "prince" (see comment on 44:3). His portion was the land immediately to the east and west of the entire sacred area composed of the Levites' portion, the Zadokian priests' portion, and the city area (cf. 48:21–22). It would parallel the tribal boundaries of Judah and Benjamin.

Ezekiel concludes this section by declaring that Israel's millennial leaders would no longer oppress God's people as leaders had done in the past (cf. 11:1–13; 14:1–11; 20:1–23:49; 34:1–10). They would allow the people to possess their own land according to their tribes without attempting to confiscate land (cf. 48:1–29).

(6) The role of the prince in the Millennium (45:9–46:18)

9–12 The concluding verse of the preceding section implied that the leaders in Israel's past and in Ezekiel's day had seized property that was not theirs (cf. 46:18). Therefore, Ezekiel exhorts his contemporary princes (leaders) concerning their violence and oppression in which they used unjust and inaccurate scales and standards of measure. This kind of unrighteous conduct must stop in Ezekiel's day. It would not exist in the messianic kingdom.

The proper standards of measure are given. Just as linear measurements of the ancient Near East were not as accurate as those of today, so this was true of volume measurements. Ezekiel delineates the proper standard of volume measure in the terms of his day. An ephah (approx. one bushel) was a dry measure equivalent to a bath (approx. nine gallons), a liquid measure. Both were equivalent to one-tenth of an homer (approx. ninety gallons or eleven bushels), which was the basic standard of volume measure. Ezekiel also exhorts his contemporaries to make sure that their scales and measures were accurate according to this standard.

Likewise, Ezekiel clarifies the proper standard for weights. One shekel weight (approx. two-fifths of an ounce) consisted of twenty gerahs (approx. one-fiftieth of an ounce). Sixty shekels comprised one mina (approx. twenty-four ounces). It was important that the leaders of the people be just in all their business dealings.

13–17 Contrary to the unrighteous behavior of Israel's past leaders, Israel's "prince" (see comment on 44:3) in the Millennium would be faithful to the Lord's righteous requirements. One of his duties would be to make atonement for the people.

"Atonement" (GK 4105) is a word that carries many connotations. Most view this term theologically with a sense of expiation for sin of a person or a people. Such was the picture lesson of the Day of Atonement in the Mosaic system (cf. Lev 16). It has also been observed that the concept of atonement may stress purification, especially when atonement was made for things. In either case, the atonement rituals of the Mosaic system and those of the millennial system described in these chapters were picture lessons and reminders of humanity's sinfulness and their need for a complete cleansing from sin and forgiveness through the efficacious atoning sacrifice of the Messiah, Jesus Christ. The full and complete provision for forgiveness of sin was provided once and for all by Jesus Christ's shed blood.

The Israelites had made a special contribution of materials for the tabernacle's construction (cf. Ex 25:2–7; 35:5, 21, 24; 36:3, 6). In a similar manner Israel in the messianic kingdom would make a special contribution of grain, oil, and sheep to the prince, from which he would, in turn, make atonement for them (cf. Ex 30:13–15; Lev 1:4). The contribution from each Israelite was one-sixth ephah (about one-sixth bushel) out of each homer (approx. eleven bushels) of wheat or barley that was harvested, one-tenth of a bath (about one gallon) of oil from each cor (or liquid homer—approx. ninety gallons) of oil each would have, and one sheep from every flock of two hundred that had been fed on Israel's well-watered pastures.

From this contribution the prince would provide grain offerings, burnt offerings, and fellowship offerings for the people's atonement (cf. Lev 9:7; 10:17). The general statement of v.15 is further specified in v.17. The prince would bring burnt offerings, grain offerings, fellowship offerings, sin offerings, and drink offerings to make atonement for Israel at each of her festivals, her new moon celebrations, and her Sabbaths. These rituals of atonement were commemorative of the complete and finished saving work of Christ for sin through the sacrifice of himself (see introductory comments on chs. 40–48). They were in no way efficacious. What praise and worship they would give to the Lord for his gracious provision for sin as they viewed these sacrificial reminders in worship (cf. Rev 5:7–14)!

These acts of commemoration of atonement were limited to the weekly Sabbath, the new moons, and all appointed festivals of Israel (cf. Lev 23:1–41; Nu 28:1–29, 40). There is no special Day of Atonement in the Millennium. That special day had its full fruition in the special day of efficacious atonement provided by Christ on the cross. The people also were not asked to contribute any bulls, goats, or rams that would later be specified as the animals for sin and burnt offerings (cf. 45:21–25; 46:2–8, 11–12). Though data is insufficient, perhaps these animals for the atoning sin and burnt offerings were provided by the prince (cf. vv.18, 22; 2Ch 31:3), not by the people, in order to symbolize that God alone could make that provision. The offerer in the Mosaic system was reminded of the substitute death for his own sins when he brought his own animal for his sin offering, except on the Day of Atonement, when all the sins of the nation were atoned for symbolically. In the Millennium the stress seems to be that God provides the substitute, insofar as the prince provided from his own resources the bulls, rams, and male goats.

18–20 It was also the millennial prince's annual duty to purify the temple sanctuary. On the first day of the first month (Nisan) of the religious year, the prince was to bring a sin offering of a young bull without defect to purify the temple sanctuary (cf. Lev 16:16, 33; 22:20). This was necessary because of humankind's sin that would defile the temple's holiness. Even the Zadokian priests, being human, could sin. Therefore the temple sanctuary had to be cleansed annually through this atoning (purifying) sacrifice as a reminder to all of the holiness of God and his sanctuary (cf. 2Ch 7:1–10; 29:20–24). In the ceremony the priest would take blood from the sacrificial bull and place it on the temple's doorposts (cf. 41:21—where the priests enter), on the four corners of the upper ledge of the altar of sacrifice, and on the gateposts of the inner court. This would be repeated on the seventh day of the month. Through this ceremony the temple was purified symbolically for the coming year so that all might continue to worship the Lord in holiness and purity.

21–25 The prince led in the observance of the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles. These were the only two feasts specifically mentioned in the worship procedure of Ezekiel.

The Passover (cf. Ex 12:1–14; Lev 23:5–8; Nu 28:16–25) was observed in a manner similar to its observance under the Mosaic system. The Day of Passover would be celebrated on the fourteenth day of the first month (Nisan). The prince would provide a sin offering for himself and the people in commemoration of Christ's work. The Feast of Unleavened Bread would then continue for seven days, during which no one was to eat unleavened bread. Each day the prince would make a daily sacrifice of seven bulls and seven rams, all without defect, as a burnt offering to the Lord. In addition the prince would offer daily a male goat as a sin offering for the whole nation (cf. Nu 28:19–24). A grain offering of one ephah mixed with one hin of oil would accompany each burnt offering. These procedures followed closely those of the Mosaic system.

The Feast of Tabernacles began on the fifteenth day of the seventh month (Tishri) and lasted for seven days (cf. Lev 23:33–43; Nu 29:12–38). The same daily sacrifices made for Passover would be made also for the Feast of Tabernacles. This observance provided a continual reminder of God's gracious fulfillment of his promise to bring Israel securely and permanently into the Promised Land. Surely the Israelites would give praise and thanksgiving continually to God for this!

46:1–8 The Sabbath and the observance of the new moon would be part of the worship ritual during the Millennium. It may seem incongruous that the Sabbath, the sign of the Mosaic covenant (cf. Ex 31:13, 16–17), would be observed in the millennial kingdom when it is not observed during the church age under the new covenant. Is this a retrogression in God's purposes? Not if it is understood that all God's covenants would be fulfilled and operative in the messianic kingdom (cf. 37:15–28). The Mosaic covenant would find its fruition in the messianic kingdom in that Israel finally would be God's people and he would be their God in a relationship that was to exist under the Mosaic covenant. That the pictorial sacrifices had their reality in the work of Christ does not nullify the relationship of Mosaic covenant that is a holy one. The Mosaic covenant showed Israel how to live a holy life in a relationship with God, and that type of life is still valid under the new covenant (cf. Jer 31:33–34; Ro 8:4). Therefore, for the Mosaic covenant and the new covenant to be fulfilled side by side is not incongruous. Ezekiel, however, was looking at the situation only from his perspective under the Mosaic covenant.

Just as work was to be done for six days and on the Sabbath the Israelite was to rest, so for six days the inner court's east gate would remain closed but on the Sabbath it would be open for worship. On the Sabbath the prince would lead again his people in worship. He would enter the inner court's east gate and stand by the gate post, enjoying a position not possessed by the people. Though the specific post is not clear, it is likely the doorjamb of the portico, since the tables for the slaughter of offerings were in the portico. Here the prince would bring his burnt offerings and fellowship offerings for the priests to sacrifice, since he could not enter into the inner court (cf. Nu 29:38). The burnt offering consisted of six male lambs and a ram, all without defect and each accompanied by a grain offering composed of one ephah of flour for the ram but as much as desired for the lambs. One hin of oil was to be mixed with each ephah of flour (cf. Nu 28:9–10). The makeup of the fellowship (thanksgiving) offering is not stated, since it was normally a freewill offering of whatever the offerer chose to bring. The prince would worship at the gate's inner threshold and then return in the same way as he entered. He would not enter the inner court. The people would worship at the east gate in the Lord's presence as the prince performed these sacrifices and worshiped within the gate.

The procedure for worship on the new moons was exactly the same for worship on the Sabbath except that the makeup of the burnt offering added a young bull along with the animals offered on the Sabbath (cf. Nu 28:11–15).

9–12 When Israel came to worship at the time of the appointed feasts (cf. Lev 23:37), the prince participated with the people, going in to worship and leaving whenever they did. The people entered through either the north or the south gate when they worshiped. They were not to return through the gate that they had entered but were to exit through the gate opposite from where they had entered. By entering one gate and leaving through its opposite, the flow of the festive crowd was regulated and confusion eliminated. Whether these gates were the outer or inner temple gates is not stated, though it would seem to be the inner court gates, since the people had normal access to the temple's outer court. If so, this is the first instance of others besides the priests entering the inner court. However, if the outer gates were in view, the arrangement of entering by one gate and leaving by its opposite would pertain only to these special days, probably because of the masses.

The sacrifices offered on these appointed feasts and festivals were specifically enumerated when each festival was discussed, or they were not specified. It is again stressed that a grain offering of one ephah of flour must accompany each bull or ram offered, and as much flour as desired must accompany the sacrifice of a lamb (cf. v.7). If the prince desired to make a freewill offering of a burnt offering of consecration or a fellowship offering of thanksgiving, the east gate was to be opened specially for this act of worship and then closed when he finished. This was the only exception to that gate remaining closed throughout the normal six days. The prince was to present his freewill offerings in the same manner as he made offerings on the Sabbath.

13–15 There were, therefore, three occasions for sacrifice: major festivals, freewill offerings of the priest, and daily offerings. In the daily offerings the prince also led the people. Each morning he would present a burnt offering of a one-year-old lamb without defect, accompanied by a grain offering of one-sixth ephah of flour and one-third hin of oil. Under the Mosaic system the daily burnt offering was offered both in the morning and in the evening. Here the offering was to be made only in the morning, though the reason was not stated. This daily burnt offering, which demonstrated the commitment of God's people to him, was to be a daily reminder of that commitment.

16–18 Inheritance was extremely important to the Israelite. Many laws had been established to guarantee that an Israelite retained family property. This concept continues in the messianic kingdom, at least in the case of the prince. Any inheritance given to one of his sons would remain with that son's descendants (that the prince has sons argues against his identity as the Messiah). Anything given to a servant would revert to the prince in the Year of Jubilee ("the year of freedom"; cf. Lev 25:10; 27:24) Ezekiel also stresses that the prince was not permitted to take other people's property and make it part of his inheritance as Israel's past leaders often did (cf. 34:3–4; 1Ki 21:19; Mic 2:1–2). No one was ever to be separated from his property.

(7) The priests' kitchens (46:19–24)

19–24 Ezekiel was brought out of the inner court to the north side of the outer court. He was led to the entrance of the building (PB in Fig. 2) that contained the rooms where the priests ate the most holy offerings and changed their garments (cf. 42:13–14). The rooms in this building faced north (42:1–5). Here the divine messenger showed Ezekiel the place at the end of these sacred rooms where the priests would cook guilt offerings and sin offerings. Here they also baked the grain offerings and ate all the offerings. This way the priests would not have to take these offerings into the outer court to cook them and thereby consecrate the people (cf. 44:19).

There were four kitchens (OK in Fig. 2) in the four corners of the outer court, each forming a court in itself. Each of these kitchens was forty by thirty cubits. There was a stone ledge around the inside of each room under which fireplaces were built. These ample kitchen facilities enabled the priests (probably the Levites, cf. 44:10–14) to cook the people's sacrificial meals.

d. Topographical aspects of the Millennium (47:1–48:35)

It is appropriate to conclude this prophetic book with a discussion of the land of Israel during the Millennium. In the Abrahamic covenant God promised to give Canaan to Abraham and his descendants as their national land (Ge 12:7). The acquisition of that land was accomplished through Joshua's conquest. In the Mosaic covenant, God promised that Israel would appropriate the Abrahamic covenant blessings as the people obeyed the Mosaic covenant stipulations (Dt 7:12; 8:2). One of those blessings was the land of Canaan. However, throughout her history Israel consistently broke the Mosaic covenant, so that the people were removed from the Promised Land and scattered among the nations, especially Babylonia. Ezekiel prophesied of God's future promise to restore the people of Israel to their Promised Land, to cleanse them, and to give them a new heart, followed by salvation bliss in the land (36:24–40). Never again would Israel lose her land (ch. 39).

A fitting climax to the book, therefore, is to have Ezekiel describe the character of Israel's land during the Millennium with, perhaps, glimpses into the eternal state. The divine messenger would show Ezekiel the river that would heal the land. Then he would clarify Israel's boundaries and tribal allotments during the Millennium.

(1) The temple river (47:1–12)

1–12 Ezekiel was brought in his vision to the temple's entrance, where he saw water streaming eastward from under the south side of the temple-entrance threshold (41:2). The stream passed by the south side of the altar of sacrifice in the inner court, through the outer court, and out the temple complex along the south side of the outer eastern gate. The divine messenger took Ezekiel to explore the extent of this stream. The messenger used a measuring line to mark off four one-thousand-cubit intervals (approx. one-third of a mile each). At each one-thousand-cubit interval the messenger took Ezekiel out into the stream to examine its depth. The depth increased at each interval from ankle deep, to knee deep, to waist deep, and finally, at the four-thousand-cubit mark, to such magnitude that it could not be crossed. This river continued to flow southeasterly toward the Arabah, the desolate Jordan Valley rift that extends south to the Red Sea (modern Gulf of Aqabah). The river flowed into the Dead Sea and caused that sea to become alive.

The basic purpose of this divine river was to bring life. Many trees lined its sides. Every kind of fruit tree grew on both sides. Their leaves never withered and their fruit was perennial, bearing every month of the year because the divine river watered these trees. Their fruit provided food and their leaves provided healing. The entire Dead Sea and the Arabah were healed by these waters, causing the Dead Sea to swarm with marine life to the extent that fishermen fished its entire length from En Gedi to En Eglaim, catching a great variety of fish. The Arabah bloomed (cf. Isa 35:1–2, 6–7; Joel 3:18). Only the swamps and marshes were not healed; they were left to provide salt for the people. Everywhere else the river brought its life-giving power.

This river is similar to the rivers in the Garden of Eden and the eternal state. In Ge 2:8–10 God provided a river that gave life to the land in that perfect environment. That life-giving river dried up with the fall of humankind. In Ezekiel and Revelation, the full redemption of the land would be completed (cf. Ro 8:19–22). Once again the divine life-giving waters would flow from the source of God's residence, the temple, and heal the land.

The river in Rev 22:1–2 (cf. Zec 14:8) is similar to the one described in Eze 47. Though Rev 22:2 only mentions the tree of life on either side of the river, it seems that the word "tree" in that context is most likely used in a collective sense. No variance then exists with the trees in Ezekiel, only further clarification. As the tree of life was beside the river in the Garden of Eden, so the tree of life in abundance will be beside the life-giving river in the eternal state, if not in the Millennium. The variance between Ezekiel's account of this river and that of John in Revelation centers on the river's source. God is the source of both rivers; but Ezekiel saw the river issuing from the temple, whereas John saw the river coming from the throne of God and of the Lamb (a temple did not exist; cf. Rev 21:22). The river in Rev 22:2 also flowed down the city's street, which seems difficult, though not impossible, in the Ezekiel account. Regardless of whether the visions of Ezekiel and John speak of the same river (in the Millennium and the eternal state) or of two different rivers (one in the Millennium and one in the eternal state), both are similar in purpose. The source of the land's redemption and healing came from God and his throne. He would heal the land in the Millennium and in the eternal state. After all, the Millennium is the doorway to the eternal state.

(2) Divisions of the land (47:13–48:35)

13–14 Ezekiel first sets forth the manner in which the land would be distributed. It would be divided equally among Israel's twelve tribes. Two portions would go to Joseph in the form of tribal allotments for his two sons: Manasseh and Ephraim (cf. Ge 48:5–6, 22); the tribe of Joseph had been divided into two tribes to replace Levi. Thus there were twelve tribal land divisions of equal proportions. The tribe of Levi had become the priestly tribe, and in the Millennium they would have a special land for their residence (cf. 45:1–8; 48:8–14). The principle of equality would prevail. Any past abuses of inequity would be remedied.

The Lord reminds Israel that the reception of any portion of the Promised Land by a tribe was strictly on the basis of God's promise. None of them had done anything to deserve an allotment. God had promised the inheritance of this land in his covenant with Abraham (cf. Ge 12:7; 15:7, 18–21; 17:8).

15–20 Israel's national boundaries in the Millennium are similar to those of ancient Israel

(cf. Nu 34:3–12). The borders followed known place names from Ezekiel's day and were given in such detail that they are without question to be taken literally.

The boundary started at the north, and each side is described in order clockwise. The north border started at an unspecified point on the Great (Mediterranean) Sea, though the remainder of the description suggests that that point might be around the mouth of the present-day Litani River. This border followed an easterly direction in between the unknown boundaries of Damascus on the south and Hamath on the north to the site of Hazar Enan. The sites of Berothah, Sibraim, and Hazer Hatticon have not been located. Hamath and Zedad (perhaps modern Sadad southeast of Homs) as well as the area of Hauran have each received at least tentative identification.

The land's eastern border ran between the Hauran and Damascus districts to the Jordan River, where it followed the river south of the eastern (or Dead) sea. The southern border extended from Tamar (southwest of the Dead Sea) through Kadesh-barnea, to the wadi of Egypt (present day Wadi el-Arish), which it followed to the Great (Mediterranean) Sea. The western boundary was the Great Sea. By contrast, the land of God's people in the eternal state will have no sea, since the sea will no longer exist (Rev 21:1). Old Testament Israelite boundaries included two and one-half tribes in the Transjordan.

21–23 Further guidelines for the distribution of the land are given to treat the question of allotment as it relates to aliens in Israel's midst. Aliens who had settled within Israel in a given tribe and had borne children (indicating their permanency) were to be included in that given tribe when the land was distributed. These aliens were to be treated as if they were native Israelites. In this Israel would obey the Mosaic covenant (cf. Lev 19:34).

48:1–7 Each tribal area was declared to be equal, according to 47:14. Each would have parallel borders on the north and south and would stretch from the west boundary to the east boundary, in equal sizes, one next to the other. The allotments were listed for the tribes beginning at the north and progressing south. The order has no conformity to any other in Israel's history. The tribes that originated through Jacob's wives' handmaids were placed on the outer extremities, whereas the tribes from Rachel and Leah were in the center of the land (cf. Ge 35:23–26). The faithful tribes of the southern kingdom of Judah—Judah and Benjamin—would have the privileged positions next to the land's special sacred portion.

8–14 A portion of the land—25,000 rods wide (see comments on 42:15–20; 45:1–8) and having the same length as the tribal allotments from east to west—was set aside by the people as a special contribution to the Lord (cf. 45:1–8). This special portion was composed of four distinct parts: the sacred area given to the Zadokian priests (vv.9–12), the Levites' land (vv.13–14), the city land (vv.15–20), and the prince's land (vv.21–22).

The special contribution to the Lord for the sacred area of the Zadokian priests was 25,000 rods long on its north and south sides and 10,000 rods long on its east and west sides. The Lord's sanctuary would be in the center of this territory (cf. 45:4c).

To the north of this Zadokian portion would lie the Levites' land. This territory would have the same dimensions as that of the Zadokian priests mentioned above. The Lord did exhort the Levites to make sure that they did not sell, exchange, or in any way allow this land to pass to others because it belonged to the Lord. It was holy to him.

15–20 Land set aside for the city would be 25,000 rods long on the north and south sides and 5,000 rods long on the east and west sides. This land would be used for the city, houses, and pasture. The city would be in the exact center of this portion. It would be 4,500 rods square with a strip of land 250 rods wide all around it on each side. This land strip would be used for the city's pastureland. The city's total dimensions with its border would be 5,000 rods square (cf. v.15; 45:6). The remainder of the land on either side of the city would be used for growing food for the workers in the city. These two equal segments would be 5,000 rods long on the east and west sides and 10,000 rods long on their north and south sides. Workers from every tribe who lived in the city would farm this land.

The entire area that included the Levites' land, the Zadokian land, and the city land would form a combined area 25,000 rods square.

21–22 The land on either side of this 25,000-rod-square sacred area would be given to the prince (cf. 45:7–46:18). His land areas to the east and west of the sacred portion would extend to the national boundaries, east and west, as did all the tribal areas. The property of the Levites and priests, along with that of the city, would lie in the center of the prince's land. The entire sacred area and the prince's land would lie between the tribal allotments of Judah to the north and Benjamin to the south.

23–29 The tribal allotments of Israel's land south of the land's special portion are stated in these verses.

30–35 The city in the center of the 10,000 by 5,000 rod section south of the priests' sacred area is not named, but most likely it is Jerusalem (cf. Zec 14:8). In keeping with the dimensions given in vv.15–19, Ezekiel declares that the distance around the city, minus its pasture strip, would be 18,000 rods. The main emphasis in this section is on the city's twelve gates, each named after one of Israel's tribes (cf. Rev 21:12–13). There were three gates on each side of the city. The descendants of Leah were on the north and south sides. On the north the three gates were named Reuben (the firstborn), Judah (tribe of David), and Levi (tribe of priests). On the south the three gates were named Simeon, Issachar, and Zebulun. The three gates on the east were named after Rachel's two sons, Joseph and Benjamin, plus Dan, the son of Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid. The three gates on the west were named after the descendants of the two handmaids, Zilpah and Bilhah: Gad, Asher, and Naphtali.

The city was square, and the city in Revelation also is square (actually, it is a cube; cf. Rev 21:16). These likenesses between them have caused some to identify them with each other. However, additional data in Revelation should cause some hesitancy about a quick decision. If the two are not identical, they certainly demonstrate that the characteristics of the Millennium and those of the eternal state are similar.

Ezekiel concludes his great prophecy by giving the city a name, a name that the city would have from that day forward: "THE LORD IS THERE." The Lord would reside forever with his people. Never again would they be separated from him through discipline. Forever Israel would live as God's people and he as their God! This name would characterize God's city just as in Hebrew thought any new name gave a new character to its recipient.

Daniel

INTRODUCTION

1. Purpose

The book of Daniel was written in the context of the Fall of Jerusalem and the deportation of the Jews to Babylonia. Despite decades of warning by numerous prophets, the people's flagrant apostasy and immorality finally brought to pass the destruction God had warned them about ever since the time of Moses (Dt 28:64; 29:28; 2Ch 36:16).

From a human viewpoint, it now seemed that the religion of the Hebrews had been completely discredited. The Lord appeared inferior to the gods of Assyria and Babylon. It was therefore essential at this time in Israel's history for God to display his power in such a way as to prove that he was the one true God and the sovereign Lord of history. So by a series of miracles he vindicated his position as the only true God over against his detractors and convinced the supreme rulers of Babylon and Persia that he, the Lord, was the greatest power both on earth and in heaven.

2. Authorship and Date

Many today deny that the prophet Daniel wrote this book, particularly the last six chapters. The most common argument is that the remarkably accurate "predictions" in Daniel (esp. ch. 11) were the result of a pious fraud, perpetrated by some zealous propagandist of the Maccabean movement, who wished to encourage a spirit of heroism among the Jewish patriots resisting Antiochus IV. Many modern scholars claim that every accurate prediction in Daniel was written after it had already been fulfilled, i.e., in the period of the Maccabean revolt (168–65 B.C.).

The clear testimony of the book itself, however, is that Daniel was the author (cf. 8:1; 9:2, 20; 10:2). Nor is there any question that Jesus also accepted Daniel as the author of this book (Mt 24 15; cf. Da 9:27 et al.). Furthermore, careful linguistic and historical analysis of the book supports a date much earlier than the second century B.C.

As to the date of the composition of Daniel, the first chapter refers to Daniel's capture in 605 B.C., and Daniel continued his public service until the first year of Cyrus (1:21), i.e., about 537 B.C. Daniel probably completed his memoirs c. 532 B.C., when he was about ninety years old. The appearance of Persian-derived governmental terms in Daniel strongly suggests that it was given its final form after Persian had become the official language of the government. Actually, the text of Daniel is in two languages: Hebrew (chs. 1, 8–12) and Aramaic (chs. 2–7). The Aramaic chapters pertain to the Babylonian and Persian empires, whereas the other six chapters relate to God's special plans for his covenant people.

3. Canonicity

Daniel should be regarded as having been inherently canonical from the very time it was first written and as having achieved recognition by God's people as the inspired word of God quite soon after its publication. It certainly would have found a ready reception among the exiles who returned to Judea under Zerubbabel because of its encouragement for them to trust in God's continuing providence in their behalf during the discouragements of those early years of recolonization. The discovery of several fragments of a second-century MS of Daniel in Qumran Cave I indicates that Jewish believers considered the book as inspired and authoritative.

4. Theological Values

The principal theological emphasis in Daniel is the absolute sovereignty of the Lord, the God of Israel. The book consistently emphasizes that the fortunes of kings and the affairs of humans are subject to God's decrees, and that he is able to accomplish his will despite the most determined opposition of the mightiest potentates on earth. The miracles recorded in chs. 1–6 clearly demonstrate God's sovereignty on behalf of his saints.

A second theological emphasis is the power of persistent prayer. Daniel and his companions were delivered from dangers and dilemmas by prayer. Especially impressive is Daniel's intense prayer on behalf of his nation for God to restore his people to their land at the end of the seventy years (9:2–19; cf. 10:12–14).

Another theological emphasis is the long-range purview of God's marvelous plan of the ages. Daniel predicts the precise year of Christ's appearance and the beginning of his ministry in A.D. 27 (cf. Da 9:25–26). Daniel was given the revelation of the eschatological Seventieth Week (9:26b–27), a week that we still eagerly look forward to.

Lastly, underlying the entire scenario is the indomitable grace of God. Even after the sternest warnings of the prophets had been disregarded and severe judgment of near total destruction had overtaken the nation in 587 B.C., the Lord never abandoned his people to the full consequences of their sin but in lovingkindness subjected them to an ordeal that purged them of idolatry. Then he allowed them to return to their homeland, thus setting the stage for the coming of the Messiah. The book of Daniel thus sets forth the pattern of God's persevering grace that characterizes the NT as well, that "God's gifts and his call are irrevocable" (Ro 11:29).

EXPOSITION

I. The Selection and Preparation of God's Special Servants (1:1–21)

1–2 Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, first invaded Palestine in 605 B.C. and took captives back to Babylon. His second invasion was in 597 B.C. (cf. 2Ki 24:10–14). The third and final captivity took place in 587 B.C., when all the remaining people of Judah who had not escaped were taken to Babylon (for the significance of these dates, see the comments on ch. 9).

The first (i.e., 605) invasion was in the "third" year of the reign of Jehoiakim; this follows the Babylonian method of designating the years of a king's reign. According to the Jewish method of counting those years, 605 B.C. was his fourth regnal year (Jer 25:1). Jehoiakim began his reign in 608, as an appointee of Neco king of Egypt, who officially changed his name from Eliakim ("El will establish") to Jehoiakim ("Yahweh will establish").

From the very beginning of this book, Daniel makes it clear that Nebuchadnezzar's success was not due to his own prowess but was the work of the one true God, who had brought about the complete collapse of the Judean monarchy. Thus the theme of God's absolute sovereignty is implied already here, a theme that dominates the entire book.

3–7 Nebuchadnezzar enlisted the most promising and gifted young men from Judah into his service, all of whom were assigned new names that contained the names of false gods of Babylon. A court official named Ashpenaz was put in charge of their physical and intellectual development. They were expected to follow the demanding course of study (cf. v.4) of the Chaldean curriculum.

Four of the Jewish youths accepted in the academy are singled out as having the courage to object to the food prepared for them and desiring to observe the dietary laws of the Torah (cf. Lev 11; Dt 14). Probably most of the meat items on the regular menu were from animals sacrificed to the gods of Babylon, and no doubt the wine from the king's table had first been part of the libation to these deities. Therefore even those portions of food and drink not inherently unclean had been tainted by contact with pagan cultic usage.

At the very beginning of their careers, therefore, these young worshipers faced a clear-cut issue of obedience and faith. Had they complied with their rulers, they would have displeased God, to whom they were surrendered body and soul. This early refusal to disobey God prepared them for future greatness as true witnesses for him in this pagan culture.

8–16 Daniel, spokesman for the four young Hebrews, determined to refuse the food from the king's table. Rather than break faith with God, he was willing to be expelled from the royal academy with the disgrace and danger that entailed.

But Daniel found "favor" (lit., "love or loyalty based on a mutual commitment"; GK 2876) with Ashpenaz and felt he could confide in him. Daniel proposed that the four Hebrews be given "vegetables" ("herbs" or "garden plants") to eat and "water to drink" and that Ashpenaz see whether after a ten-day testing period all four of them did not look healthier than any of the other students. Such reversal of the laws of nutrition would require a miracle; yet Ashpenaz was willing to take the risk. The venture proved completely successful. No further objection could be raised against their simple diet.

17 Daniel and his friends were granted special wisdom by the Lord, not because of their diet, but because of his approval of their faith and commitment to his word. Daniel even mastered oneiromancy (the interpretation of dreams; cf. Joseph in the court of Egypt).

18–20 Ashpenaz proudly presented his students before Nebuchadnezzar for the final examinations. Out of the entire group of brilliant young men, the king found that the four Hebrews excelled vastly; so he gave them responsible posts in his government. "Magicians" (GK 3033) probably were those who used a chart or design to answer questions. "Enchanters" (GK 379) is derived from the Akkadian word for "soothsayer." The text does not state that the four Hebrews actually engaged in divination or conjuration (cf. Dt 18:10–12) but that they attained "wisdom and understanding," which implies that they surpassed the professional heathen diviners and conjurers. (Nowhere is there any indication that Daniel resorted to occult practices. He simply went to God in prayer, and God revealed the answer to him.)

21 Daniel's career in public service continued "until the first year of King Cyrus." Since Babylon was at first entrusted to Darius the Mede by King Cyrus (Da 5:31) after its fall in 539, and since Da 9 is dated in the "first year" of that Darius (9:1), Darius possibly remained as titular king till 538 or 537. If so, the "first year" of Cyrus king of Babylon would have been 537–536 B.C., which was probably the year when the forty-two thousand Jews returned to Palestine under Zerubbabel. If Daniel studied in the royal academy for three years, his first government appointment might have been around 601 B.C. Thus his whole term of service would have been about sixty-five years (601–536 B.C.).

II. Nebuchadnezzar's First Dream: God's Plan for the Ages (2:1–49)

A. The Babylonian Wise Men's Impotence (2:1–13)

1–3 Nebuchadnezzar was convinced that his remarkable dream contained a message of utmost importance. He ordered his experts in oneiromancy to reconstruct the dream itself and then to tell him its significance.

In addition to the magicians or diviners and the enchanters or conjurers, "sorcerers" (GK 4175) are mentioned, along with "astrologers." The word for "to practice sorcery" (or witchcraft) comes from Akkadian and strongly suggests necromancy as the original idea. "Astrologers" (GK 4169) translates a Sumerian term that is applied to a special class of astrologer-soothsayers. This fourth class of wise men acted as spokesmen for the whole group.

4–9 Verse 4 marks a transition from Hebrew to Aramaic in the text of Daniel, prefaced by the statement that the wise men spoke Aramaic with the king (see Introduction).

"O king, live forever!" represents a wish that the king would live on from one age to another (cf. 1Ki 1:31). The soothsayers' request for the king to reveal his dream to them was met with a surprising rejection. He wanted them to give its contents and then to explain the meaning. If they really had powers of divination, their gods would be able to pass the dream on to them. This would prove that they were not giving a purely human and essentially worthless conjecture as to the interpretation.

To his stringent demand, Nebuchadnezzar added a gruesome threat. Failure to reconstruct his dream would prove that the wise men were charlatans who deserved death for all the years they had deceived the king. They would be "cut to pieces" (cf. Eze 16:40; 23:47) and their estates utterly destroyed and left as refuse heaps. But if they should succeed, Nebuchadnezzar promised them wealth and honor far beyond what they already had. The "wise men" were powerless before the threats of punishment and the inducements of reward. They could only beg the king to change his mind and divulge his dream. This enraged him further as he accused them of stalling for time to find a way out of their dilemma. But no deception would help them, nor could they look for any unexpected turn of events to extricate them.

10–13 In desperation the wise men insisted that the king's demand was unreasonable, unprecedented, and beyond mortal ability. This defense convinced the king that his wise men were liars and deserved the penalty he had announced. So he issued a warrant for the arrest and execution of all the wise men (v.1), including the four young Hebrews.

B. Daniel's Intercession and Offer (2:14–23)

14–16 Arioch, the captain of the royal bodyguard, told Daniel why all the wise men had been condemned. At Daniel's request Arioch took him to Nebuchadnezzar to secure a stay of execution until Daniel had an opportunity to consult his God about the mysterious dream. The stage was set to show the reality, wisdom, and power of the one true God—the Lord of Israel. Daniel knew that he had to trust in God's faithfulness to do the impossible. If he succeeded, Nebuchadnezzar and all Babylon would be confronted with irrefutable proof that only Israel's God was real, sovereign, and limitless in his power.

17–23 Daniel, confident that God would answer his prayer, sought to make his prayer even more effective by enlisting his three companions in a concert of prayer. Verses 20–23 are a ringing manifesto of biblical faith over against the pretensions of pagan pride. Although the Babylonians may have triumphed on earth, the God of Israel was absolute Sovereign in heaven and on earth. His power is illustrated by his complete control over the events of history, bringing about the reversals of fortune that give history its unpredictability. God determines the time and duration of events. Thus he not only decreed the Fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C.—an event future for Daniel in 602 B.C.—but also the exact number of years of the Captivity (cf. 9:2).

Daniel acknowledged that God alone bestows wisdom and discernment (v.21b). Only by his grace are humans able to achieve anything or to understand the "deep and hidden things" or what "lies in darkness." Thus, all the knowledge of Nebuchadnezzar's wise men could not give the king his dream and deliver them from imminent death.

Daniel closed his thanksgiving on a joyous note, expressing his confidence that the knowledge he had received of Nebuchadnezzar's dream was absolutely accurate. Acknowledging that the superhuman "wisdom" and "power" he was about to display as the interpreter of the king's dream had been granted in response to the collective prayers of him and his four companions, Daniel gave God all the glory.

C. Daniel's Recitation of the King's Dream (2:24–35)

24–25 Daniel assured Arioch, who was to execute the wise men, that he had the answer. Arioch, anxious to claim credit for himself in having discovered Daniel, hurried to tell Nebuchadnezzar his good news.

26–30 Capitalizing on Nebuchadnezzar's half-incredulous inquiry as to whether Daniel could actually describe his dream, Daniel pointed to the pagan seers' inability to unravel the mystery, thereby exposing the worthlessness of their theology and of polytheism in general. That the Lord's spokesman alone had the answer points unmistakably to the reality of the God of the Hebrews. Then Daniel told Nebuchadnezzar what he had seen in his dream.

First, Daniel reminded the king that preceding his dream, he was thinking about the future. Disclaiming any personal ability in transmitting this revelation and publicly giving God all the glory, Daniel implied that God had noticed the king's statesmanlike concern and had granted him a full answer to his thoughts on what was to come.

31–35 Daniel disclosed the main theme of the dream—the colossal image composed of a head of gold, breast and arms of silver, belly and thighs of bronze, and legs of iron, with feet of iron mingled with clay. This composite statue was then reduced to powder by a huge stone, and the powder was blown away by the wind. Where the image had stood, the rock grew to the size of a huge mountain that filled the whole scene.

D. Daniel's Interpretation of the King's Dream (2:36–47)

36–38 The golden head represented Nebuchadnezzar and the Babylonian Empire. The head came first in the explanation probably because "head" often means "beginning." To Nebuchadnezzar, his government was the ideal type and was therefore esteemed as highly as gold. He exercised unrestricted authority throughout Babylon. His word was law.

The first world-empire, then, was the Neo-Babylonian, over which Nebuchadnezzar ruled for about forty more years—from 605 to 562 or 560 B.C. But his empire did not last more than twenty-one years after his death. His son Evil-Merodach reigned only two years (562–560). Neriglissar reigned four years (560–556) and Labashi-Marduk only one (556). Nabonidus engineered a coup d'état in 555 and ruled till Babylon fell in 539.

39 The second empire (silver) is said to be "inferior" to Babylon. From Nebuchadnezzar's standpoint the restriction on the king's authority to annul a law once he had made it (6:12) was less desirable than his own unfettered power. The silver empire was to be Medo-Persia, which began with Cyrus the Great, who conquered Babylon in 539 and died ten years later. His older son, Cambyses, conquered Egypt but died in 523 or 522. After a brief reign by an upstart claiming to be Cyrus's younger son, Darius son of Hystaspes deposed and assassinated him and established a new dynasty. Darius brought the Persian Empire to its zenith of power but left unsettled the question of the Greeks in his western border, even though he did conquer Thrace. Xerxes (485–464) his son, in an abortive invasion in 480–479, failed to conquer the Greeks. Nor did his successor Artaxerxes I (464–424), who rather contented himself with intrigue by setting the Greek city-states against one another. Later Persian emperors—Darius II (423–404), Artaxerxes II (404–359), Artaxerxes III (359–338), Arses (338–336), and Darius III (336–331)—declined still further in power. This silver empire was supreme in the Near and Middle East for about two centuries.

The third empire (bronze) was even less desirable from Nebuchadnezzar's standpoint. This empire was the Greco-Macedonian Empire established by Alexander the Great. Though Greece was to "rule over the whole earth," its political tradition was more republican than its predecessor. Alexander began his invasion of Persia in 334, crushed its last resistance in 331, and established a realm extending from the border of Yugoslavia to beyond the Indus Valley in India—the largest empire of ancient times. After his death in 323, Alexander's territory was split into four realms, ruled over by his former generals (Antipater in Macedon-Greece, Lysimachus in Thrace-Asia Minor, Seleucus in Asia, and Ptolemy in Egypt, Cyrenaica, and Palestine). This situation crystallized after the Battle of Ipsus in 301, when the final attempt to maintain a unified empire was crushed through the defeat of the imperial regent Antigonus. The eastern sections of the Seleucid realm revolted from the central authority at Antioch and were gradually absorbed by the Parthians as far westward as Mesopotamia. But the remainder of the former Greek Empire was annexed by Rome after Antiochus the Great was defeated at Magnesia in 190 B.C. Macedon was annexed by Rome in 168, Greece was permanently subdued in 146, the Seleucid domains west of the Tigris were annexed by Pompey the Great in 63 B.C., and Egypt was reduced to a Roman province after the Battle of Actium in 31 B.C. Thus the bronze kingdom lasted about 260 or 300 years before it was supplanted by the fourth kingdom prefigured in Nebuchadnezzar's dream-image.

40–43 The fourth empire is symbolized by the legs of iron. From a despotic standpoint, the Roman Republic was of far less value than gold, silver, or bronze. Iron connotes toughness and ruthlessness and describes the Roman Empire that reached its widest extent under the reign of Trajan (98–117 A.D.), who occupied Rumania and much of Assyria for a few brief years.

A later phase of the fourth empire is symbolized by the feet and ten toes made up of iron and clay, a fragile base for the huge monument. The implication is that this final phase would be marked by a kind of federation rather than by a powerful single realm. The iron may represent the influence of the old Roman culture and tradition and the clay the inherent weakness in a socialist society based on relativism in morality and philosophy. This mixture results in weakness and confusion, foreshadowing the approaching day of doom. Within the scope of v.43 are disunity, class struggle, and even civil war, resulting from the failure of a hopelessly divided society to achieve an integrated world-order. Iron and clay may coexist but cannot combine into a strong and durable world power.

44–45a The final scene is of a rock cut from a mountain that rolls down and smashes against the great image's brittle feet (cf. v.34), toppling it over. The entire monument is then reduced to dust and swept away by the wind. Then the rock becomes a mountain (the fifth kingdom) that fills the earth. In contrast to the transitory nature of the four man-made empires, this God-established kingdom is destined to endure forever. Daniel 7 and parallel passages leave no doubt that this fifth realm is the kingdom ruled over by Christ.

45b–47 Daniel closed his interpretation of the dream by assuring Nebuchadnezzar that it was divinely inspired and absolutely trustworthy. Thus the God of heaven graciously granted the king knowledge of the future, unraveling the baffling mystery. The king could only respond by acknowledging Israel's Lord as "God of gods" (i.e., the Supreme God) and "Lord of kings" on earth, the true Lord of history. Moreover, the king acknowledged the Lord's supremacy in revealing the mysteries of the future, something no pagan god could do.

In token of his submission to Daniel's God, Nebuchadnezzar prostrated himself before Daniel and gave him an offering and incense. What a remarkable scene! The despot who but an hour before had ordered the execution of all his wise men was prostrating himself before this foreign captive from a third-rate subject nation! The king's praise to the Lord, however, does not necessarily mean that he doubted the existence of other gods, much less that he had experienced any sort of conversion.

E. The Promotion of Daniel and His Comrades (2:48–49)

48–49 As a result of Daniel's outstanding performance, Nebuchadnezzar put him in charge of all the diviners. He officially became "ruler" (lit., "chief of appointed officials"; GK 10715) over the whole bureau of "wise men." The king fulfilled his original promise (2:6) and loaded Daniel with gifts and honors, appointing him civil governor of the entire capital province of Babylon. Normally this would be reserved for a Chaldean nobleman of the master race. For a Jew to be so honored was unprecedented. Daniel requested that his three companions be given high appointments too, thus strengthening his position.

III. The Golden Image and the Fiery Furnace (3:1–30)

A. The Erection of the Image (3:1–3)

1–2 Nebuchadnezzar forgot his new religious insights and had a statue made of gold (i.e., covered with gold leaf; there was not enough gold in all Babylon to make a statue so large of solid gold), undoubtedly reflecting the head in the dream-image. It is doubtful that the statue represented the king himself as there is no evidence that statues of Mesopotamian rulers were ever worshiped during the ruler's lifetime. More likely the statue represented Nebuchadnezzar's patron god, Nebo (or Nabu). Prostration before this god would amount to a pledge of allegiance to his viceroy, Nebuchadnezzar. The recent establishment of the Babylonian Empire as successor to Assyria made it appropriate for Nebuchadnezzar to assemble all the leaders of his domain and exact from them an oath of loyalty, certified by a ceremony of adoration of Babylon's god. Any who refused to comply were to be immediately executed in a superheated furnace.

3 The titles of the various ranks of government officials indicate a well-organized bureaucracy. "Satraps" were in charge of fairly large realms. "Prefects" were military commanders or more likely lieutenant governors. "Governors" were leaders of smaller territories. "Advisers" were "counsel-givers." "Provincial official" is a general term for a governmental executive.

B. The Institution of State Religion (3:4–7)

4–7 Nebuchadnezzar enlisted the royal musicians to furnish a proper setting for the ceremony. "All kinds of music" indicates that there were other instruments besides the six listed. This orchestra would give the signal for all to bow down and worship the golden statue, declaring their commitment to the Babylonian government and their willingness to incur divine wrath if they should ever break their oath of fealty. The nearby furnace was a grim reminder of the dreadful alternative to compliance. When the music struck up, all foreheads touched the ground—except three.

C. The Accusation and Trial of God's Faithful Witnesses (3:8–18)

8–12 After the public worship, some malicious men (called "Chaldeans" in the NIV note) reported to the king the disobedience of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. These informers approached the king as members of the master race, denouncing the Jews. This heightens their reference to Daniel's three Hebrew associates in government service as "some Jews," with a contemptuous emphasis on their despised nationality. With a show of zeal for the king, the Chaldeans quoted his edict word for word and then related how these three recalcitrant Jews had dared to "pay no attention to" the express command of "King Nebuchadnezzar"; they had refused to bow down and worship the golden image!

13–18 Nebuchadnezzar became furious and ordered the offenders to be brought before him. Half incredulously he stared at them and asked whether they really had disobeyed his decree. Then he magnanimously gave them an opportunity to save themselves. He would order the musicians to play again so the three men might prove their loyalty and obedience by worshiping the image then and there. But Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego loved the Lord more than life itself. Ready to lay down their lives for God's glory, the three refused to plead with Nebuchadnezzar to make an exception of them. They were confident that the Lord would deal with this king who thought he was sovereign on earth.

Nebuchadnezzar made the mistake of defying the Lord, saying, "Then what god will be able to rescue you from my hand?" Nebuchadnezzar had converted his confrontation with humans into a contest with the Lord God Almighty. Ungratefully he scoffed at the very God who had granted him success in battle (cf. Jer 27:6–8). Therefore he would undergo one humiliation after another, till he groveled in the dust before Israel's God.

The heroism of the three men went even further as they were ready to be burned up in the fiery furnace rather than betray their God. Scripture contains few more heroic words than "But even if he does not" (v.18). Interestingly, Scripture is silent as to Daniel's whereabouts at this time. Perhaps he was away on official business.

D. The Sentence Imposed and Executed (3:19–23)

19–23 Nebuchadnezzar had no recourse but to order the immediate execution of the three young Hebrews. In his rage he went to absurd lengths. No mortal could have survived an instant in the huge furnace, but the king insisted that it be heated to maximum intensity. So fierce was the fire that even to come near it was fatal. Equally absurd was Nebuchadnezzar's command for the three to be fully dressed with their hats on. Finally, they were "firmly tied" and thrown like logs into the furnace. Apparently there was no door to hide the inside from view. So apart from the swirling flames and smoke, the men were quite visible to an outside observer.

E. The Deliverance and the Fourth Man (3:24–27)

24–27 The dumbfounded Nebuchadnezzar saw the Hebrews walking upright in the flames without their bonds, and he saw a fourth person walking with them. After his officials confirmed that only three men had been thrown into the furnace, the king described the fourth one as resembling deity. All four persons in the furnace were walking around freely. Their divine companion in the flames had delivered Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego from all harm.

Nebuchadnezzar commanded the three to come out of the furnace; so they climbed out—but not the fourth, who had apparently disappeared. To the officials' amazement neither the clothing nor the bodies of the three Hebrews gave any indication of having been in the fire. Their God had indeed been able to deliver them (cf. v.17).

F. Nebuchadnezzar's Second Submission to God (3:28–30)

28–30 Before such an awesome display of God's power, Nebuchadnezzar could only acknowledge his defeat. He hastened to praise the Lord and thereby confess his admiration for the courage and fidelity of the three Hebrews. To make amends Nebuchadnezzar decreed death and destruction for anyone saying anything against the God of Israel. Then Nebuchadnezzar promoted Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego to a higher office in Babylon.

IV. Nebuchadnezzar's Second Dream and Humiliation (4:1–37)

A. The Circumstances of the Second Dream (4:1–7)

1–3 This chapter is unique in Scripture because it is composed under the authority of a pagan. Though he may have been intellectually convinced of the sovereignty and omniscience of the one true God, Nebuchadnezzar hardly had a true heart conversion. The decree showed his gratitude to the Lord for delivering him from insanity and restoring him to his throne. He wanted every person in his empire to share this knowledge and join him in giving glory to the God of heaven. Nebuchadnezzar frankly confessed his own arrogance in attributing to himself the glory for what the grace and power of God had done for him.

After blessing his subjects, Nebuchadnezzar exalted the miracle-working power and eternal sovereignty of the God of Israel. He made it clear that he had experienced this power both in his warning dream (explained by Daniel) and its pride-shattering fulfillment, his seven years of bestial insanity. These convinced him that God alone is the source of power, both in nature and in human affairs, and that no ruler possessed any authority except by God's permission. In contrast to the transient reigns of human rulers, the authority of God goes on forever.

4–7 The setting for the following event is the apparent security and prosperity of the king after vanquishing all his enemies and the occasion of another dream. Again (cf. 2:2) the king sent for his wise men, although on this occasion he told them the substance of the dream (cf. ch. 2). When they could not come up with any interpretation, once more the king turned to the one true expert, Daniel the seer.

B. The Description of the Dream (4:8–18)

8 Daniel's official court name is "Belteshazzar" ("Protect his life"), most likely an abbreviated form of Bel-belteshazzar ("Bel, protect his life") or even Nebu-belteshazzar ("Nebo, protect his life," if by "his god" the king was referring to the god whose name began his own, Nebu-chadnezzar). In contrast to the other soothsayers in his court, Nebuchadnezzar acknowledged that Daniel was truly inspired by God (or the gods).

9–18 The king told Daniel his dream about the great tree that grew to dominate the landscape for many miles and about its lush foliage and abundant fruit that provided shelter and nourishment for all sorts of creatures. Suddenly "a "holy one" (lit., "watchman"; GK 10620) descended from heaven and pronounced judgment on the tree, ordering it to be chopped down and its foliage stripped away. Verse 17 indicates that this particular class of angels can execute the judgments of God. The felling of the tree scattered the birds and beasts that were dependent on it. Only the stump was spared, and it was to be encircled with bands of iron and bronze and to remain in the grassy meadow (v.15a).

The symbolism changes from the stump to a man to a brute beast (vv.15b–16). "Mind" (GK 10381) refers to the inner self as the seat of moral reflection, the will, and pattern of behavior. The person this tree stump represents is to be transformed into an animal for seven "times," here undoubtedly years (see NIV note; cf. 7:25). The sentence was decreed from heaven so that the full sovereignty of the "Most High" might be demonstrated before all the world, and that people might realize that God chooses who is to wear the crown and sometimes selects the humblest and lowliest (cf. 1Sa 2:7–8; Job 5:11). (For a prideful person portrayed as a lofty tree, see Isa 2:12–13; 10:34; Eze 31:3–17.) By appealing to Daniel, the king showed his confidence in him and his God. So once again the honor of Daniel's God was at stake.

C. Daniel's Interpretation and Warning (4:19–27)

19–22 Daniel's loyalty to the king and his kindness to Daniel made it difficult to reveal the interpretation of the dream. At the king's insistence Daniel finally began to speak. After voicing the fruitless wish that the dream might apply to Nebuchadnezzar's worst enemies, Daniel explained that the mighty tree represented Nebuchadnezzar in all his military success, organizing an empire that stretched to the "distant parts of the earth."

23–27 Daniel came to the heart of the warning: Nebuchadnezzar would lose both his power to rule and his sanity. He would be reduced to the mentality of a beast for seven years, eating grass like cattle. This humiliation would teach him to respect God's sovereignty and to appreciate his glory and power.

Verse 26 closes with Daniel's prediction about the surviving tree stump: after his seven years of dementia, Nebuchadnezzar will be restored to his throne. Normally any monarch suffering from insanity would be replaced. But the unlikely promise of God that the throne would he restored to Nebuchadnezzar after the termination of his insanity was fulfilled. The prospect of seven years of insanity was terrible; so Daniel closed with an earnest admonition for Nebuchadnezzar to defer the evil day by immediately amending his life. If he would recognize that he was subject to God's moral law and responsible to him for good government, the discipline might be deferred. Nothing is said about Nebuchadnezzar's response, but the one-year delay implies that he made some effort to follow Daniel's recommendation.

D. The King's Punishment (4:28–33)

28–30 Though eager to avoid judgment, Nebuchadnezzar nevertheless retained his pride, taking all the credit for the achievements he owed to God's grace. Perhaps he refrained from boasting during his reprieve, but he never realized his indebtedness to God (see ZPEB, 4:395–99, for a description of Nebuchadnezzar's accomplishments).

31–32 After boasting that he had built Babylon the Great as a residence for himself by his own power (v.30), Nebuchadnezzar heard an unexpected word from God—he would experience the full weight of God's wrath and the punishment threatened in his fateful dream.

33 Nebuchadnezzar was abhorred even by his lowliest subjects and reduced to the state of a beast. His skin toughened into hide through constant exposure to the weather; his hair, matted and coarse, looked like eagle feathers; and his uncut fingernails and toenails became like claws. So the boasting king, a victim of a condition known as boanthropy, sank to a subhuman level.

E. The King's Repentance (4:34–37)

34–35 After seven years the Lord fulfilled his promise. By divine grace the humiliated king's reason returned. His first response was to praise, honor, and glorify God as the eternal, omnipotent Sovereign of the universe. Second, he honored him as the Ruler whose kingdom would never end. Third, Nebuchadnezzar acknowledged that humans are as nothing before God. Finally, Nebuchadnezzar saw that God is beyond the control of any human being and accountable to no one.

36–37 Now that he had begun to fear the Lord, Nebuchadnezzar was qualified for renewed leadership. The court and the army commanders were electrified to see that his reason had returned, and they thronged to congratulate him and hail him as their sovereign. "I was restored to my throne and became even greater than before" was his grateful testimony. The "head of gold" (2:38) had bowed in humble submission to the God of Daniel.

Through this event the Jews held captive in Babylon could not help but know that their Lord was the true and living God and that all the gods of the pagans were only idols. They knew for certain that the apparently limitless power of Nebuchadnezzar was under the control of the Lord God Almighty.

V. Belshazzar's Feast (5:1–31)

A. The Profanation of the Holy Vessels (5:1–4)

(As background for this episode, see ZPEB, 1:446, 515–16.)

1–4 Belshazzar the king conducted a state banquet for his nobles. In drunken bravado he decided to entertain them with the vessels from the temple in Jerusalem. Belshazzar and his guests taunted the Lord by praising their gods and drinking from the sacred goblets. Once again an arrogant Babylonian monarch defied the Lord God of Israel.

B. The Handwriting on the Wall (5:5–9)

5–6 Divine intervention came without announcement. Suddenly fingers appeared on the palace wall, wrote four words, and vanished. The party was over. The drunken Belshazzar stared at the words, terrified.

7–9 The king sent for his wise men to unravel the message. They could come up with nothing, despite inducements of riches and position. (Belshazzar could offer nothing higher than the third highest rank in the government since he himself was a viceroy under his father, Nabonidus.) As in Nebuchadnezzar's day, the wise men were baffled (cf. 2:2–11; 4:7).

C. The Queen Mother's Recommendation (5:10–16)

10 Daniel (who was probably about eighty-one by 539 B.C.) was not included among those summoned. Perhaps he was in semiretirement, though ch. 8 indicates that he had been active as recently as the third year of Belshazzar (cf. v.1) but had not been enjoying good health (v.27). Evidently Belshazzar's administration had set him aside though he lived in Babylon. But the king's mother, likely a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, thought of Daniel as soon as she saw the commotion in the banquet hall and urged the king to stop worrying.

11–12 The queen mother commended Daniel to the king, adding that Nebuchadnezzar had found him to be far superior to all the rest of his wise men (cf. 4:8), for Daniel could unravel mysteries and solve enigmas. Surely he was the right one for Belshazzar to consult. She referred to Nebuchadnezzar as Belshazzar's "father." Strictly speaking Nabonidus was his true father; but if Nabonidus had indeed married a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar to legitimize his usurpation of the throne, Nebuchadnezzar would have been Belshazzar's grandfather.

13–16 Belshazzar sent for Daniel at once, apparently meeting him for the first time. He explained his concern and asked Daniel to explain the mysterious writing. The king also enumerated the same rewards—including the position of "third highest ruler"—he had offered the other wise men.

D. Daniel's Interpretation (5:17–28)

17–24 Disclaiming all promotions, Daniel answered the king's request. Studying the inscription on the wall, Daniel prefaced his interpretation with the reason for the judgment it contained. He reviewed the experience of Nebuchadnezzar being humbled by the decree of the Lord. The young king should have remembered what these experiences had taught his grandfather about humility and respect for the Lord. Belshazzar's blasphemous conduct of profaning the Lord's holy vessels in his drunken orgy had led to the handwriting on the wall, proclaiming Belshazzar's doom.

25–28 Daniel then interpreted the four words. "Mene," meaning "numbered" or "measured," signified that the years of Belshazzar's reign had reached their end. "Tekel" is related to the word for "shekel," whose root idea is "to weigh." In Belshazzar's case, God found him deficient in his scales and therefore rejected him. "Peres" is derived from a root that means "to divide." Belshazzar's kingdom would be divided or separated from him and given to the Medes and Persians then besieging the city.

E. Daniel's Honor and Belshazzar's Demise (5:29–31)

29 Daniel's interpretation greatly disturbed Belshazzar, for it was spelling his imminent doom. Perhaps hoping to forestall judgment, the king fulfilled his promises to the letter, bestowing the royal chain of gold on Daniel and proclaiming him the third ruler in the kingdom.

30–31 But the time for repentance had run out. Belshazzar had gone too far in profaning the vessels of the temple. Destruction was closing in on Belshazzar and his kingdom even while Daniel's investiture was taking place. The Medo-Persian troops were moving along the exposed riverbed under cover of darkness and climbing the walls of the defenses throughout the city.

Verse 30 tersely reports that Belshazzar was slain that same night. The government of Babylon was then entrusted to Darius the Mede at the age of sixty-two. Thus was fulfilled Daniel's prediction that the Babylonian Empire would pass under the yoke of the Medo-Persian Empire, as kingdom number two in the four-kingdom series. (For the identity of Darius and further background to this chapter, see ZPEB, 2:26–29; cf. also EBC 7, in loc.)

VI. Daniel and the Lions' Den (6:1–28)

A. The Conspiracy Against Daniel (6:1–9)

1–3 One of Darius's first responsibilities was to appoint administrators over the territory won from the Babylonians. The 120 "satraps" must have been in charge of the smaller subdivisions. Over these 120 were three commissioners, of whom Daniel was chairman. Daniel's long experience and wide acquaintance with Babylonian government, combined with his superhuman knowledge and skill, made him a likely choice for prime minister.

4 Daniel encountered hostility in the new Persian government, no doubt because his enemies were race-conscious and did not appreciate the elevation of a Jewish captive. To be sure, King Cyrus was either looking favorably on the request of the Jews for release or had already promulgated the decree cited in Ezr 1:1–4. Though objects of Cyrus's charity, the Jews were nevertheless considered inferior, especially by their conquerors. Daniel's elevation to prime minister so disturbed his subordinates that they scrutinized his affairs, hoping to find something that marred his past. But their investigations proved fruitless; Daniel's integrity was beyond question.

5 The way to get Daniel was to force him to choose between obedience to his God and obedience to the government. A statute was needed that seemed merely political to Darius but was clearly religious for Daniel. So his enemies proposed that for one month all petitions be directed to Darius alone. This flattered him and also served to impress the captives that they were now under the Persians.

6–9 The government overseers came to the king "as a group" (i.e., an official delegation) to present their proposal, falsely implying that Daniel concurred with them. Darius had no reason to suspect that the other two royal administrators would misrepresent Daniel's position in this matter. The suggested mode of compelling every subject in the former Babylonian domain to acknowledge the authority of Persia seemed a statesmanlike measure that would contribute to the unification of the kingdom. The time limit of one month seemed reasonable. So Darius affirmed the decree.

B. Daniel's Detection, Trial, and Sentence (6:10–17)

10 The new ordinance mandated death by caged lions for noncompliance (v.12). When Daniel received notice of this new law, he faced a dilemma. Prayer and fellowship with the Lord had safeguarded him from the corrupting influences of Babylonian culture. To preserve his role in government and to save his own life, he would have to compromise his integrity by ceasing to pray to God or by praying privately. But faithful Daniel could not compromise. He would trust the Lord for deliverance. His habit had been to pray regularly toward Jerusalem, the focal point of his hopes and prayers for the progress of the kingdom of God. (Ch. 9 reveals Daniel's concern for Jerusalem and the Jews' restoration to their land.)

11–14 Apparently in collusion in order to make a public test case of Daniel, the hostile officials waited for him to pray and then burst in on him, catching him violating the new decree. They lost no time in reporting Daniel to Darius, reminding him that he had forbidden all petitions to anyone but himself during the thirty-day period. Darius acknowledged that the decree was still in force and that the "laws of the Medes and Persians" could neither be changed nor revoked. In reporting Daniel's disobedience to the king, the conspirators represented Daniel's praying thrice daily as willful disrespect to his king rather than as devotion to his God. Darius's response was not what the conspirators had expected. Indeed, he "was greatly distressed," probably realizing that he had been manipulated by Daniel's enemies. Throughout the day he tried his best to save Daniel's life.

15–17 By sunset the king resigned himself to comply with the conspirators' desire when they reminded him of his irrevocable decree. Concerned for his cherished minister, Darius went with Daniel to the lion pit. Before it was closed, Darius called down to Daniel, "May your God, whom you serve continually, rescue you!" For Darius these words voiced a tremulous hope (cf. v.20). A heavy stone was placed over the pit and secured with clay tablets bearing the king's royal seal and that of other officials.

C. Daniel's Deliverance and His Foes' Punishment (6:18–24)

18–24 Darius was a troubled man. Daniel's peril precluded the king from eating and entertainment. His anxious thoughts kept him awake till the first gray light of dawn, when he hastened to the lion pit, which was already unsealed. Darius's apprehensive call stressed his hope that the "living" God whom Daniel served had "been able to rescue [him] from the lions." Daniel's voice from the bottom of the pit, relating how God had sent his angel to shut the lions' mouths and to prove him guiltless, brought great joy to Darius. Not a scratch was found on Daniel. The evidence was incontrovertible—Daniel's God had "stopped the mouths of lions" (Heb 11:33).

Daniel's accusers were guilty of devising a decree to deprive the king of his most able counselor and of lying to the king when they had averred that "all agreed" (v.7) to recommend this decree. Therefore Darius ordered Daniel's accusers to be brought before him; he then cast them with their families into the same pit. The fate of the conspirators and their families is a masterly touch of poetic justice: "And before they reached the floor of the den, the lions overpowered them and crushed all their bones." Perhaps Darius consigned the families to death to minimize the danger of revenge against the executioner. Daniel's position as prime minister was now secure.

D.Darius's Testimony to God's Sovereignty (6:25–28)

25–27 Darius made a public proclamation giving glory to the God of the Hebrews, commanding all citizens of the realm to honor him. The sense of vv.26–27 is like the last clause of 3:29—"no other god can save in this way"—and like 4:3. Three emphases stand out in vv.26–27: (1) Daniel's God is alive and shows it by the way he acts in history, responding to the requirements of justice and the needs of his people; (2) God's rule is eternal (unlike the empires built by mortals); (3) God miraculously delivers his people, with wonders in heaven and on earth. Once again God acted redemptively to strengthen his people's faith in him.

28 The chapter ends on a positive note, highlighting Daniel's continuing usefulness in royal service throughout the rest of the reign of Darius and in the reign of Cyrus (cf. 1:21). After this, Daniel apparently retired from public service and gave himself to the study of the Scriptures and to prayer. He received the revelations of chs. 10–12 in the third year of Cyrus (cf. 10:1).

VII. The Triumph of the Son of Man (7:1–28)

A. The Four Beasts and the Succession of Empires (7:1–8)

1 In the latter part of his career, Daniel received a series of visions and revelations. The revelation in this chapter is dated "in the first year of Belshazzar king of Babylon." Nabonidus, his father, came to the throne in 556 B.C.; but he apparently entrusted to Belshazzar the "army and the kingship" of Babylon while he himself campaigned in north and central Arabia (so the Nabonidus Chronicle). It is uncertain whether the actual kingship of Babylon was immediately entrusted to Belshazzar at the commencement of his father's reign or whether his appointment as viceroy came later, as Nabonidus found himself detained in Arabia.

Verse 1 says that Daniel recorded only the "substance" of his memorable vision, though twenty-six verses may seem to us like a rather full report. Chapter 7 parallels ch. 2; both set forth the four empires, followed by the complete overthrow of all ungodly resistance, as the final (fifth) kingdom is established on earth to enforce the standards of God's righteousness. The winged lion corresponds to the golden head of the dream image (ch. 2), the ravenous bear to its arms and chest, the swift leopard to its belly and thighs, and the fearsome ten-horned beast to its legs and feet. Lastly, the stone cut out without hands that in ch. 2 demolishes the dream-image has its counterpart in the glorified Son of Man who is installed as Lord over all the earth. But ch. 7 tells us something ch. 2 does not—the Messiah himself will head up the final kingdom of righteousness.

2–3 "The great sea," possibly the Mediterranean, symbolizes the turbulent Gentile world (cf. Rev 13:1 and 21:1; cf. also Isa 57:20). Revelation 7:1 portrays the four winds as under the control of four mighty angels; in Rev 9:14, by the River Euphrates, they are bidden to release the winds on the earth so that one-third of humankind will perish in war (v.15). Apparently the four winds represent God's judgments, hurling themselves on the ungodly nations from all four points of the compass. From the sea (Gentile nations) emerge in succession four fearsome beasts (namely, the empires of Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome), which apparently go on shore to perform their roles.

4 The first beast is a winged lion, whose eaglelike pinions are soon plucked so that instead of flying it stands on the ground. The lion was a symbol of Babylon, especially in Nebuchadnezzar's time, when the Ishtar Gate entrance was adorned with yellow lions. The final detail—"the heart of a man was given to it"—may refer to the restoration of Nebuchadnezzar's sanity after his seven-year dementia; plucking the lion's wings symbolizes the reduction of his pride and power at the time of his insanity (ch. 4).

5 The second beast—a hulking bear—apparently displaces the lion, though there is no mention of any conflict. The description of the bear suggests the alliance of two powers, one dominating the other—namely, Medo-Persia, with Persia dominating. One side of the bear was higher than the other, and it devoured three ribs from some other animal it had killed. This corresponds to the three major conquests the Medes and Persians made under Cyrus and his son Cambyses: the Lydian kingdom in Asia Minor (546), the Chaldean Empire (539), and Egypt (which Cambyses acquired in 525).

6 The third beast—the four-winged leopard with four heads—portrays the division of Alexander's swiftly won empire into four separate parts shortly after his death (see comment on 8:8). There is no way a quadripartite character can be the Persian Empire, for it remained unified till its end, under the onslaught of Alexander in 334–331.

7 The fourth beast is unlike any known to the human race, "terrifying and frightening and very powerful" (more fearsome than the preceding empires). Its teeth were of iron; hence it would be more crushing in its military power, exploitation, and repression than the other three. Another difference is the ten horns (conceivably two five-pronged antlers). There is an obvious correspondence between these horns and the ten toes of the dream image (ch. 2), and the mention of iron in the teeth suggests the legs and toes of iron in that image. Thus the superior power of the colossus of Rome—as over against the less unified and weaker empires of Greece, Persia, and Babylon—is emphasized in the symbolism of this terrible fourth beast. Its ultimate form in a confederation of ten states is suggested by the horns (cf. note on 2:41).

8 In this latter-day, ten-state federation, a "little horn" emerges as the largest of them all, uprooting and destroying three adjacent horns (apparently subjecting the remaining six to vassalage). The contemporaneity of all ten of these states (or rulers) is virtually demanded, since six remain in subservience to the aggressive little horn. The victorious little horn's features symbolize an arrogant and vainglorious ruler rather than an entire kingdom (cf. ch. 4, where the Chaldean power is symbolized in the personality of Nebuchadnezzar whereas the bear and the leopard symbolize the Medo-Persian and Greek empires as entire realms). The final clause introduces the ruthless world dictator of the last days (cf. 2Th 2:3–4, 8). This little horn emerges from the fourth empire, unlike the little horn of ch. 8 (vv.9–11), which arises from the third empire (see comments on ch. 8).

B. The Kingdom of God and the Enthroned Messiah (7:9–14)

9–12 The fifth kingdom as the final form of world power overthrows and utterly destroys all the preceding empires erected by violence-worshiping men. Attention is directed to God, "the Ancient of Days" (cf. Eze 1:13). The fire represents the brilliant manifestation of his splendor as well as the fierce heat of his judgment. A lava-like "river of fire" depicts vast destructive power. An enormous crowd stands by as the heavenly court convenes for the examination and conviction of the rebellious little horn (i.e., the final world dictator) and his followers. The record books that are opened presumably contain the sins of the little horn and his adherents (cf. Rev 20:12–13). The blasphemous beast spews out his boastings against humans and God till the very moment he is dragged before the heavenly tribunal. Then his mouth is stopped as his physical life is taken and his body consigned to the flames of judgment. The remnants of the world powers ("the other beasts") likewise come under judgment. They "were allowed to live for a period of time"; this may mean that the unbelieving world powers that precede the little horn are reserved for judgment by the returning Christ.

13–14 At this point Daniel saw the glorified Son of Man (v.13 is the most frequently quoted verse from Daniel in the NT). The personage who appears before God in the form of a human being is of heavenly origin. He comes to the place of coronation accompanied by the clouds of heaven and is clearly no mere human being in essence. The expression "like a son of man" identifies this final Ruler of the world not only as human, in contrast to the beasts (the four world empires), but also as the heavenly Sovereign incarnate. During his earthly ministry, the Lord Jesus maintained this same emphasis on his incarnate nature (that he was truly human as well as truly God). He repeatedly referred to himself as "the Son of Man" (i.e., that same one foretold in Da 7:13; see comment on Mark 8:31). Moreover, v.13 is the only place in the OT where "son of man" is used of a divine personage rather than a human being. Furthermore, Christ himself emphasized his return to earth accompanied by "clouds" (cf. Mt 24:30; 26:64; Mk 13:26; cf. also Ac 1:9–11; Rev 1:7). Nothing could be clearer than that Jesus regarded Da 7:13 as predictive of himself and that the two elements "like a son of man" and "with the clouds of heaven" combined to constitute a messianic title.

The messianic Son of Man is brought before the throne of the Ancient of Days to be awarded the crown of universal dominion. This picture refers to his appointment as absolute Lord and Judge by virtue of his atoning ministry as God incarnate—the One who lived a sinless life (Isa 53:9), paid the price for the redemption of the human race (Isa 53:5–6), and was vindicated by his bodily resurrection as Judge of the entire human race (Ac 17:31; Ro 2:16). So also his ascension into heaven means that he will be enthroned in glory (Ps 110:1; Ac 2:66) till all his enemies have been subdued (Heb 10:12–13).

The Son of Man is to be the supreme source of political power on earth after his earthly kingdom is established; all humans will worship and serve him. The outcome of human history will be a return of Adam's race under the rule of the divine Son of Man to loving obedience and subjection to the sovereignty of God (cf. Mt 28:18).

C. The Vision Interpreted by the Angel (7:15–28)

15–18 Despite the victorious conclusion of his dream, Daniel was distressed by his inability to understand several features of it. So he asked an angel standing nearby to explain some of these puzzling details. The angel gave a general reply (vv.17–18) to Daniel's first question, indicating that the four beasts represented the successive world empires that would dominate the Near East till the last days. But he added that the ultimate sovereignty over the world would be granted to "the saints of the Most High" (cf. v.27). The reason for emphasizing the participation of God's people in the final kingdom may be because it is a literal, earthly kingdom rather than a spiritual domain.

19–22 Daniel regarded the fourth beast with the greatest curiosity and dread. In particular he wondered about the ten horns and the little horn that emerged and overcame God's holy people. Despite the assurance that the ultimate victory would be the Lord's and that his people would finally prevail, Daniel was deeply concerned about their impending persecution.

23 The angel's answer (vv.23–27) centers on the career of the little horn (cf. 2Th 2:8–9; Rev 13:1–10) and his rise and fall at the second coming of Christ. In v.23 the angel refers to the Roman Empire, which will be markedly "different from" the three preceding empires. Its difference will not be in size (Alexander's empire far exceeded Trajan's) but in organization and unity, enabling it to endure for centuries beyond the lifetime of the preceding Near East empires. "The whole earth" refers (as in general OT usage) to the entire territory of the Near and Middle East that in any way relates to the Holy Land. The word translated "earth" (GK 10075), depending on context, might mean a single country or a region. Here it is the portion of the world included in the Roman Empire, or possibly the regions immediately adjacent to it. The Roman state is seen as devouring the surrounding nations bite by bite and thus acquiring an entire complex of subject kingdoms and nations.

24 The interpreting angel turned from the historic Roman Empire to its ultimate ten-horn phase (cf. 2:41–43) and the emergence of the final world dictator. He arises after ten horns have been set up and subdues three of these ten to his own direct rule. He will then subject the other seven states to vassalage.

25 The little horn will claim divine honors (even as he blasphemes the one true God). He will abandon all pretense of permitting freedom of religion and will revile the Lord of heaven and earth. By cruel and systematic pressure he will "oppress" (lit., "wear out") those with biblical convictions. Such continual and protracted persecution far more effectively breaks the human spirit than the single moment of crisis that calls for a heroic decision. It is easier to die for the Lord than to live for him under constant harassment and strain. This dictator will impose a new legal system, doubtless based on totalitarian principles in which the service of the government or the state will be substituted for the absolute standards of God's moral law. All opposition to the decisions and policies of the little horn will be adjudged treasonable and punishable by death. His program will include a revision of the calendar (implied by "to change the set times"). This was attempted during the French Revolution.

Significantly, the radical phase of the Beast's rule endures for "a time, times and half a time," or three and a half years. This is half of the seven years that mark the period of the little horn's career. Judging from 9:26–27, it appears that at the beginning of this final heptad of years the "ruler who will come" will "confirm a covenant with many for one 'seven' [but] in the middle of that 'seven'" will compel the offering of sacrifices to cease. Thus after the first three and a half years of his career, the Beast will abrogate his "covenant" with the religious establishment (cf. 12:11; Mt 24:15; 2Th 2:4). This would leave three and a half years for his program to be carried out unhindered by any rival theistic ideology.

26–27 The last two verses of the angel's explanation make it clear that a great day of judgment and destruction on the Beast's empire and on the whole wicked world will usher in the seating of the Son of Man on the throne of absolute sovereignty and the commencement of the fifth kingdom (cf. ch. 2) administered by his faithful believers. No unsubdued, rebellious elements will be left among the surviving inhabitants of earth; "the sovereignty, power and greatness of the kingdoms under the whole heaven" will be granted to "the saints, the people of the Most High," indicating that the Son of Man (v.13) is to be equated with the Most High himself. In the final clause a clear difference is made between the plural "saints" and the singular "him," the one who is called "the Most High," whose kingdom will be everlasting—words not applicable to a finite human being.

28 Apparently Daniel experienced a tremendous emotional drain as a result of his extended interview with God's supernatural messenger (cf. Isa 6:5). His facial hue changed because of his inward concern about the severe trials awaiting his people. Yet these solemn disclosures were not proper matters to divulge to anyone else; so apart from writing them down, he kept them to himself.

VIII. The Grecian Conquest of Persia and the Tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes (8:1–27)

Here the text switches from Aramaic back to Hebrew (see Introduction).

A. The Vision of the Ram, the He-Goat, and the Little Horn (8:1–12)

1 This vision was granted Daniel two years after the previous one (cf. 7:1). It somewhat resembles it in subject matter and in manner of presentation, for it too portrays successive world empires as fierce beasts; and it also culminates in a tyrant described as a "little horn." Yet there are significant differences in detail between the two chapters, especially regarding the third and fourth kingdoms.

2 Daniel received this new vision either at the Babylonian capital itself or while on a diplomatic mission to Susa, the capital of Elam.

The scene Daniel saw in the vision was not Susa proper but rather the Ulai, a wide, artificial canal that flowed near the city. Appropriately enough, this furnished the setting for the rise of the beast representing Persia.

3 The Medo-Persian power is depicted as a large, powerful ram with two formidable horns. Though one horn was larger than the other, the horn that "grew up later" outstripped the former in size. Obviously this refers to the domination of the Persian power over the Median in the federated Medo-Persian Empire that was even then being formed (cf. 7:5, the bear "raised up on one of its sides"). The larger horn came later, even as Cyrus and his Persians came later than Cyaxeres and Astyages of Media.

4 The three general areas of Medo-Persian expansion were westward, northward, and southward. Initially the Medo-Persian troops were nearly invincible; hence the various beasts representing the surrounding nations opposing Persian expansion are described as helpless against the mighty ram. Cyrus had everything his own way and became arrogant over his universal success.

5–7 Verse 5 foretells coming disaster for Cyrus in the figure of a swift, one-horned goat that with one mighty charge shatters the horns of the Medo-Persian ram. First, the goat is described as coming from the west (i.e., Macedonia and Greece, as Alexander did in 334 B.C.). Second, he moves so fast that his hooves barely touch the ground as he charges all the way to the eastern limit of the Persian domain ("crossing the whole earth"). Third, this irresistible invading force is under the leadership of one man rather than a coalition of nations. In vain the ram attempts to withstand the charge of the goat, as the goat hurls himself against the ram—an implied prediction that the Macedonian-Greek forces would launch an unprovoked invasion such as took place in 334. The completeness of Alexander's victories is fittingly prefigured by this crushing attack on the ram.

Alexander's conquest of the entire Near and Middle East within three years stands unique in military history and is appropriately portrayed by the lightning speed of this one-horned goat. Despite the immense numerical superiority of the Persian imperial forces and their possession of military equipment like war elephants, the tactical genius of young Alexander proved decisive.

8 "The goat became very great" suggests Alexander's thrust beyond the borders of the empire he had conquered even into Afghanistan and the Indus Valley (327 B.C.). Or it may refer to the growth in arrogance that led him to assume the pretensions to divinity that distressed his Macedonian troops, who finally mutinied. In support of his claim to have descended from Zeus-Ammon, which had been solemnly announced by the Egyptian priesthood after his liberation of Egypt from Persian tyranny, Alexander had required even his comrades-in-arms to prostrate themselves before him, in conformity with Oriental custom. In accord with his newly conceived imperial policy of granting equality to his Persian subjects along with his victorious Macedonian-Greek supporters, he went so far as to take the Persian princess Roxana as his queen and to designate his future son by her, Alexander IV, as successor to the Greco-Persian Empire.

Yet, as v.8 predicts, "at the height of his [the goat's] power his large horn was broken off." Alexander died of a sudden fever brought on by dissipation (though it was rumored that he was actually poisoned by Cassander, the son of Antipater, viceroy of Macedonia) at Babylon in 323, at the age of thirty-three. Although efforts were made to hold the empire together—first by Antipater himself as regent for little Alexander IV (and for Philip III Arrhidaeus, his half-witted uncle), and then, after Antipater's death in 319, by Antigonus Monopthalmus, another highly respected general—the ambitions of such regional commanders as Ptolemy in Egypt, Seleucus in Babylonia, Lysimachus in Thrace and Asia Minor, and Cassander in Macedonia-Greece made this impossible. By 311 Seleucus asserted his claim to independent rule in Babylon, and the other three followed suit about the same time. Despite the earnest efforts of Antigonus and his brilliant son, Demetrius Poliorcetes, to subdue these separatist leaders, the final conflict at Ipsus in 301 resulted in defeat and death for Antigonus. The four ruthless and powerful generals named above became the "Diadochi" ("Successors"), who partitioned the Macedonian realm into four parts.

The prophecy "in its [the large horn's] place four prominent horns grew up toward the four winds of heaven" was fulfilled when Cassander retained his hold on Macedonia and Greece; Lysimachus held Thrace and the western half of Asia Minor as far as Cappadocia and Phrygia; Ptolemy consolidated Palestine, Cilicia, and Cyprus with his Egyptian-Libyan domains; and Seleucus controlled the rest of Asia all the way to the Indus Valley. While it is true that various vicissitudes beset these four realms during the third century and after (Pergamum, Bithynia, and Pontus achieved local independence in Asia Minor after the death of Lysimachus; and the eastern provinces of the Seleucid Empire achieved sovereignty as the kingdoms of Bactria and Parthia), nevertheless the initial division of Alexander's empire was unquestionably fourfold, as this verse and 7:6 (the four-winged leopard) indicate.

9–10 Verses 9–12 foretell the rise of a "small horn" from the midst of the four horns of the Diadochi. It is described as attaining success in aggression against the "south," or the domains of the Ptolemies. This evidently refers to the career of Antiochus IV Epiphanes ("the Manifest/Conspicuous One"; see comment on 8:23–25), who usurped the Seleucid throne from his nephew (son of his older brother, Seleucus IV) and succeeded in invading Egypt 170–169 B.C. His expeditions against rebellious elements in Parthia and Armenia were initially successful "to the east" as well, and his determination to impose religious and cultural uniformity on all his domains led to a brutal suppression of Jewish worship at Jerusalem and generally throughout Palestine (here referred to as "the Beautiful Land"; cf. 11:16, 41). This suppression came to a head in December 168 B.C., when Antiochus returned in frustration from Alexandria (Egypt), where he had been turned back by the Roman commander Popilius Laenas, and vented his exasperation on the Jews. He sent his general, Apollonius, with twenty thousand troops under orders to seize Jerusalem on a Sabbath. There he erected an idol of Zeus and desecrated the altar by offering swine on it. This idol became known to the Jews as "the abomination of desolation" (cf. 11:31), a type of a future abomination to be set up in the Jerusalem sanctuary in the last days (cf. Mt 24:15).

Some observations are in order concerning the relationship between the "little horn" (lit., "a horn from a small one") in 8:9 and the "little horn" in 7:8. The horn in ch. 7 emerged from the ten horns of the fourth beast, whereas this horn in 8:9 arises from the four-horned beast that represents the third kingdom, the empire of Alexander the Great (as all critics agree). Since the author of Daniel invests numbers with high significance, there is no possibility that he could have meant to equate a ten-horned beast with a four-horned one. The only plausible explanation is that the little horn arising from the third kingdom is a prototype of the little horn of the fourth kingdom. The crisis destined to confront God's people in the time of the earlier little horn, Antiochus Epiphanes, will bear a strong similarity to the one that will befall them in the final phase of the fourth kingdom in the last days (see Mt 24:15). In each case a determined effort is made by a ruthless dictator to suppress completely the biblical faith and the worship of the one true God. Rather than concluding that the little horn of ch. 7 is also intended as a prophecy of Antiochus Epiphanes (with a resultant identification of the fourth kingdom as the Greek or Seleucid Empire), we are to understand the relationship between the little horn of the Greek Empire and that of the latter-day fourth kingdom to be that of type and antitype, similar to that between Joshua and Jesus (Heb 4:8) and Melchizedek and Christ (Heb 7). In Da 11 both the typical little horn (Antiochus) and the antitypical little horn appear in succession, the transition from the one to the other taking place at 11:36, after which are predicted the circumstances of the destined death of the antitype that were not at all true of Antiochus Epiphanes himself. Therefore, the two figures cannot be identical, nor can the Greek Empire be equated with the fourth kingdom of Daniel's prophetic scheme.

Continuing with the predicted career of Antiochus (v.10), we encounter the remarkable statement that he will grow up to "the host of heaven" and will throw "some of the starry host down to the earth," where he will "trample on them." "Host" (GK 7372) is a term most often used of the armies of angels in the service of God (e.g., "LORD of hosts" in KJV) or else of the stars in heaven (cf. Jer 33:22). But it is also used of the people of God, who are to become as the stars in number (Ge 12:3; 15:5) and are spoken of as "the LORD's divisions" (Ex 12:41). Daniel 12:3 states that true believers (lit., "those who are wise") "will shine like the brightness of the heavens [lit., stars] for ever and ever." Since the Greek tyrant can hardly affect either the angels of heaven or the literal stars in the sky, it is quite evident that the phrase "the host of the heavens" must refer to those Jewish believers who will join the Maccabees in defending their faith and liberty. It is then implied here that Antiochus will cut down and destroy many of the Jews during the time of tribulation he will bring on them, when he will have "trampled on them."

From 171 or 170 B.C. and thereafter, Antiochus pursued his evil policy of securing control of the high priesthood and bringing increasing pressure on the Jewish hierarchy to surrender their religious loyalties in the interests of conformity to Greek culture and idolatry. Already in 175, at the beginning of his reign, he had expelled the godly high priest Onias III from office and replaced him with his Hellenizing younger brother, Jason. Before long a certain Jew named Menelaus, who was apparently also of the high priestly family, bribed Antiochus to depose Jason and appoint him high priest in his place. But while Antiochus was successfully campaigning in Egypt against Ptolemy VII (181-145 B.C.), Jason laid siege to Jerusalem in the hope of ousting Menelaus. In the process of dealing subsequently with Jason, Antiochus took occasion to storm Jerusalem and pillage the temple itself. Reinstalling Menelaus as high priest, Antiochus gave him the mandate to continue an aggressive policy of Hellenization. But in December of 168 (cf. above), he had Jerusalem again seized by treachery and subjected it to prolonged looting and massacre, and a year later he converted its sanctuary into a temple to Zeus (Dec. 16, 167). So it continued until that memorable day, three years later, when Judas Maccabaeus rededicated the sacred structure to the worship of God (Dec 14, 164 B.C.), an event celebrated as Hanukkah by the Jewish community.

11 This verse describes how the megalomania of Antiochus advances to such extremes that he will declare himself equal with God ("Prince of the host"). He will halt the regular morning and evening sacrifice. (This was the daily burnt offering ordained in Nu 28:3, consisting of one lamb presented at sunrise and one at sunset, together with flour and oil [Nu 28:5].) This offering presented the atonement of the believing nation, whether or not any other sacrifice was brought before the Lord on that particular day. But the Seleucid tyrant commanded these offerings to be suspended in 168 and substituted a heathen sacrifice presented to an idol of Zeus, after the altar of the LORD had been destroyed and his temple pillaged and desecrated ("and the place of his sanctuary was brought low").

12 Judah's three-year tribulation period, during which the temple would be defiled and prostituted to heathen use, is now described. The phrase rendered "because of" is somewhat ambiguous. The verse as a whole probably should be rendered as follows:

> And on account of transgression [presumably the transgression of Jason and Menelaus and the pro-Syrian faction among the worldly minded Jews of the Maccabean period] the host [of God's people, the Jewish believers] will be given up [to the persecuting power of Antiochus IV] along with the [suspended] continual burnt offering; and the horn [Antiochus] will fling the truth [of the scriptural faith and service of God] to the ground [by forbidding it on pain of death], and he will perform [his will, or carry out his program of enforcing idolatry] and will [for the three-year period] prosper.

B. Gabriel's Interpretation of the Vision (8:13–27)

13–14 There were two or possibly even three "holy ones" (GK 7705; i.e., heavenly beings) conversing about the prophetic meaning of the vision just described. Apparently the second angel ("another holy one") posed the question to the third ("to him") as to the duration of the terrible period when the temple and altar of the Lord would be desecrated (v.11). The answer given by the third angel was that this condition would last for "2,300 evenings and mornings." This period of time has been understood by interpreters in two ways, either as 2,300 twenty-four-hour days ("evening morning" meaning an entire day from sunset to sunset; cf. Ge 1) or as 1,150 days composed of 1,150 evenings and 1,150 mornings. In other words, the interval would either be 6 years and 111 days or 3 years and 55 days. Most evidence seems to favor the latter interpretation. The context speaks of the suspension of the "sacrifice," a reference to the "continual burnt offering" that was offered regularly each morning and evening. Surely there could have been no other reason for the compound expression than the reference to the two sacrifices that marked each day in temple worship.

Consequently, we are to understand v.14 as predicting the rededication of the temple by Judas Maccabaeus on 25 Chislev (or Dec. 14), 164 B.C.; 1,150 days before that would point to a terminus a quo of three years, one month, and 25 days earlier, or Tishri 167 B.C. While the actual erection of the idolatrous altar in the temple took place in Chislev 167, or one month and 15 days later, there is no reason to suppose that Antiochus Epiphanes's administrators may not have abolished the offering itself at that earlier date. Verse 14 simply specifies that when the 2,300 evenings and mornings have elapsed, "then the sanctuary will be reconsecrated." That certainly happened when the first Hanukkah was celebrated on 25 Chislev 164.

15–18 Some other heavenly being not otherwise specified commissioned Gabriel to explain the meaning of the vision to the swooning prophet. Gabriel was instructed to identify the coming world empires and the climactic events of the "time of the end." The overwhelming splendor of Gabriel's presence rendered Daniel completely helpless, but the angel's transforming touch restored him.

19–22 This passage furnishes a general summary of the rise of the second and third kingdoms. Gabriel gave no details about the Persian era beyond indicating its compound character as Medo-Persian. But he did identify the large single horn between the goat's eyes as the first king of the Greek Empire. This mighty conqueror was soon replaced by four other horns, which were the Diadochi (see comments on 7:8; 8:8). He added that none of these four would "have the same power" (i.e., of Alexander). History proved this true.

23–25 This passage depicts the rise of Antiochus Epiphanes, described as a "stern-faced king, a master of intrigue" (lit., "a master at understanding hidden things"), who will at first enjoy much success. He will crush "mighty men" (presumably nobles and regional commanders who supported rival claimants to the throne) and also "the holy people" (i.e., the believing Jews).

Two noteworthy traits will characterize Antiochus's rule: (1) his treachery and intrigue, to catch his victims unawares and unprepared (as in Jerusalem in 168–167 B.C.); (2) his overweening pride, which led him to claim divine honors. The coins of Antiochus actually bore the title "God manifest." This clearly exhibited his character as the typical "little horn," a model for the antitypical "little horn" referred to in 7:8 (cf. 2Th 2:3–4).

While we are not told whether Antiochus made a formal claim to deity while enthroned in the court of the Jerusalem temple, he certainly did assume the right to determine what gods his subjects should worship, feeling that he was the earthly embodiment of the powers of heaven and that all rule and authority were given him. Like Nebuchadnezzar, he expected all his subjects to bow down to the great image he had set up. But he went even beyond Nebuchadnezzar in trying to abolish the ancestral religion of the Jews, forbidding them on pain of death to circumcise their children and making the possession of the Hebrew Scriptures a capital offense. By erecting the statue of Zeus Olympius (or Capitolinus) in the temple of the Lord and sacrificing swine on the altar, he committed the greatest possible sacrilege and affront to the Jewish people.

Yet v.25 predicts Antiochus's sudden destruction, not by human means, but by God's intervention. As a condign penalty for having taken "his stand against the Prince of princes" (the Lord God Almighty), Antiochus would be removed from the scene. He was. After making an unsuccessful attempt to pillage Nanaea, a wealthy temple in Elymais, he died of a sudden malady.

Ancient sources have somewhat diverse accounts of Antiochus's fatal illness. The author of 1Mc 6:4, 8–16 says that Antiochus withdrew to Babylon after his repulse at Elymais, that he became deathly ill after hearing of the victories of Judas Maccabaeus, and that he died many days later. But 2Mc 9:1–28 states that Antiochus had attempted to raid a temple in Persepolis (rather than Elymais), and that it was at Ecbatana that he heard the disturbing news of the Maccabean victories.

Then, as he was uttering dire threats of reprisal against them, he was seized with severe abdominal pains that never left him; and thus he fell out of the chariot in which he was riding. Finally, as a result of his severe injuries from the fall and the attack of worms on his bowels, accompanied by a revolting stench, he finally died with vain petitions on his lips, imploring the God of Israel to spare his life. The various accounts agree in stating that the tyrant met his end by a nonhuman agency. The question of Antiochus's death is of special importance in 11:45.

26–27 Chapter 8 closes with Gabriel's command for Daniel to keep confidential the predictions just revealed to him because they are related to "the distant future" (cf. 12:9). It is also significant that Gabriel states that the vision refers to "many days" (i.e., to many years in the future). (NIV's "distant future" is somewhat inexact but certainly should not be pressed to refer to the last days just before the Lord's return; the "many days" in this case obviously refers to the crisis years of 167–164 B.C.) Verse 27 describes the emotional strain the prophet felt following this encounter with the angel Gabriel. It drained him to the point of illness for several days. Even after he went back to the king's service, he kept brooding over the vision and its fulfillment. Perhaps what most disturbed Daniel was the prediction of the time of great tribulation appointed for the true people of God under the tyranny of the "little horn."

IX. The Vision of the Seventy Weeks (9:1–27)

A. Daniel's Great Prayer (9:1–19)

1–3 Daniel, a diligent student of Scripture, built his prayer life on God's Word. Significantly, even before any formal endorsement had been accorded them, he included Jeremiah's writings as inspired Scripture, even though Jeremiah had died only a few decades earlier. As Daniel studied Jer 25:11–13, he saw that God had appointed a period of seventy years for the captivity of Israel, at the end of which Babylon would be judged by God. Daniel was gripped by the words in Jer 29:10.

Since this episode took place in 539 or 538 ("the first year of Darius"; on the identity of Darius the Mede, see ZPEB, 2:29), less than fifty years had elapsed since the Fall of Jerusalem to Nebuchadnezzar (587 B.C.) or the destruction of the temple in 586. The earliest possible terminus a quo for the seventy years of exile would be Daniel's own captivity in Babylon (604 B.C.). While 538 might be three or four years short of the full seventy, it was not too soon for Daniel to begin praying. In view of the recent collapse of the Chaldean Empire and the benevolent attitude of Cyrus toward the religious preferences of his newly conquered subjects, Daniel was moved to claim the promise implied by the number seventy in Jeremiah's writings. So he implored the Lord to reckon those years from the year of his own exile and to ensure the reestablishment of Israel in the Land of Promise by seventy years from the first Palestinian invasion of King Nebuchadnezzar.

Although this passage does not actually mention the predictions concerning King Cyrus that were revealed to Isaiah back in the early seventh century, undoubtedly Daniel knew about them (cf. Isa 44:28; 45:1–2). Daniel must have been stirred when he first heard reports of the young king of Persia who made himself master of the entire Medo-Persian domain. When Cyrus finally launched his invasion of Mesopotamia and laid siege to Babylon itself, Daniel's heart must have leaped at seeing prophecy being fulfilled. Now that Cyrus had indeed attained the success that the Lord had promised him years before, Daniel besought the Lord to move the conqueror's heart to let the Hebrew exiles return to their land. Isaiah 45:4, 13 were promises that Daniel could claim at this critical time in Israel's history.

4–6 Verses 4–19 show how a true man of God should approach the Sovereign of the universe. Daniel made striking spiritual preparations for his ministry of intercession: he fasted, mourned, and clothed himself with sackcloth (v.3). Daniel realized he could not urge on God any merit of his nation, for they had forfeited all claim to divine mercy. By their persistent transgression of their covenant with God, their embracing of heathen idolatry and immorality, and their martyrdom of the prophets (cf. 2Ch 36:16), they had literally compelled him to bring on them the promised curses (cf. Lev 26:39–45; Dt 28:45–63; 30:1–5). They had richly deserved the destruction of their cities and the loss of their property, freedom, and native land; and they lacked any ground of merit on which to entreat God's favor. The only basis for Daniel's approach to God was his earnest desire for the Lord to glorify himself by displaying the riches of his mercy and grace in pardoning and restoring his guilty but repentant people to their land in fulfillment of his promise in Jer 25 and 29.

With these convictions Daniel devoted himself to a prayer of adoration and confession. In this chapter Daniel for the first time used the sacred Tetragrammaton, the covenant name of Yahweh (i.e., "LORD," v.2 and the preamble of v.4; GK 3378). Even though he found himself exiled from the sacred soil of Israel, Daniel boldly claimed the Lord's mercy as the covenant-keeping God of Israel. Although he addressed him as "Lord" in the opening sentence of his prayer and in v.7, Daniel addressed him directly as "LORD" in v.8 and referred to him by the same covenant name in vv.10, 13, and 14.

In his first words Daniel combined both aspects of God's nature, glorifying him as the "great and awesome God" and as the faithful, promise-keeping God. The Lord allowed his people to go down in utter defeat because they had forced his hand by flagrant and shameless sin.

As spokesman of his people, Daniel confessed their sin and wickedness and acknowledged that the Jews had succumbed to the surrounding cultures. They had been unwilling to repent at the warning of God's prophets. The whole nation had become involved in rejecting the Lord; there remained such a small remnant of faithful believers that Judah was not worth saving from the coming destruction. Daniel could find no excuse for their betrayal of their sacred trust.

7–11a Rather than appearing to be a chosen people (Dt 7:6), blessed of God in military success (Dt 28:7) and feared by the nations (Dt 28:10), Israel had been laid waste, its inhabitants killed or exiled. The Jews had become objects of scorn, deprived of property and freedom and derided for their claim to know the one true God. What made their disgrace even more shameful was their flagrant ingratitude toward their compassionate, forgiving God, whose pardon and mercy they ridiculed and rejected.

11b–14 Daniel exalted the justice of God (cf. Dt 28–32); it was more important for God to retain his integrity and uphold his moral law than for his guilty people to escape the consequences of their infidelity. Had God not fulfilled his word of judgment, little credence could be placed in his word of grace. The fall of Jerusalem, the destruction of the temple, and the Captivity vindicated the holiness and righteousness of God and demonstrated the sanctity of his moral law.

15–19 Daniel appealed to God's pity on the exiled nation and ruined Jerusalem, basing his appeal on God's honor and glory. Daniel was chiefly concerned about God's reputation in the eyes of the world. If the Lord allowed his sanctuary and Holy City to lie in ruins and his people to remain in exile, who among the surrounding nations would believe that the Lord was the true and holy Sovereign over all the universe? That, in Daniel's mind, was the worst thing about the tragedy of Jerusalem's fall and the Captivity—the pagans would conclude that the Lord was unable to protect his people against Babylon's gods. Moreover, since God had promised full pardon and restoration to his repentant people, the prophet felt emboldened to press the Lord for an early return of the Jewish captives to Palestine, that a new commonwealth of chastened believers might be established there and a testimony set up again for the one true God. Because of the purity of his motives and the earnestness of his desire, Daniel was heard and soon received his answer.

B. The Divine Answer: Seventy Heptads of Years (9:20–27)

20–23 The Lord's response came swiftly. Daniel had not even finished his prayer before Gabriel came to reveal God's will to his faithful servant. The term "the man" (GK 408) indicates that the archangel appeared in human form and spoke to Daniel as one man speaks to another. Daniel saw Gabriel approaching in "swift flight," and Gabriel responded to his prayer at the time of the evening sacrifice—i.e., at sunset. Evidently Daniel had prayed till late afternoon. Of course, no actual sacrifice could have been offered in Babylon—or in Palestine—without a new altar on the site of the destroyed temple. But devout Jews in Persia would have observed both sunrise and sunset as appropriate times of the day for offering adoration, praise, and supplication.

Gabriel began his teaching by encouraging Daniel; his faith was precious in God's eyes. The Lord is more eager to answer than we are to ask, and in Daniel's case there were powerful grounds for a speedy reply, reassuring him of the Lord's intention to bring to an end the seventy years of Israel's captivity.

24 This verse sets forth the approach of "seventy 'sevens'" of years during which God would accomplish his plan of national and spiritual redemption for Israel. The seventy "weeks" or "heptads" (lit., "units of seven," whether days or years) are 490 years (divided, as we shall see, into three sections). This was the time to elapse before the accomplishment of six great achievements for the Holy City and for God's covenant people. The first three relate to the removal of sin; the second three to the restoration of righteousness.

1. The first achievement is "to finish transgression." The culmination of the appointed years will witness the conclusion of human "transgression" (GK 7322) or "rebellion" against God—a development most naturally entered into with the establishment of an entirely new order on earth. This requires nothing less than the inauguration of the kingdom of God on earth. Certainly the crucifixion of Christ in A.D. 30 did not put an end to human iniquity or rebellion on earth.

2. The second achievement is "to put an end to sins." The Hebrew term for "sin" (GK 2633) refers to missing the mark or the true goal of life; it implies immorality of a more general sort rather than revolt against authority implied by "transgression." This achievement suggests the bringing in of a new society in which righteousness will prevail in complete contrast to the present condition of the human race.

3. The third achievement is "to atone for wickedness." This certainly points to the Crucifixion, which ushered in the final stage of human history before the establishment of the fifth kingdom (cf. 2:35, 44). At Pentecost Peter referred to "the last days" spoken of by the prophet Joel (cf. Ac 2:16–17). This implies that the "last days" began at the inauguration of the NT church at Pentecost. The Feast of Pentecost occurred just seven weeks after the Resurrection, which followed the Crucifixion by three days. The Crucifixion was the atonement that made possible the establishment of the new order, the church of the redeemed, and the coming millennial kingdom.

4. The fourth achievement is "to bring in everlasting righteousness." This clearly indicates an order of society in which righteousness, justice, and conformity to the standards of Scripture will prevail on earth, rather than the temporary periods of upright government that have occasionally occurred in world history till now.

5. The fifth achievement will be the fulfillment of the vision and "the prophecy," which serves as the grand and central goal of God's plan for the ages, that final stage of human history when the Son of Man receives "authority, glory and sovereign power" (7:14) so that all peoples will serve him. This fulfillment surely goes beyond the suffering, death, and resurrection of Christ to include his enthronement—on the throne of David—as supreme Ruler over all the earth.

6. The final goal to be achieved at the end of the seventy weeks is the anointing of "the most holy." This most likely refers to the consecration of the temple of the Lord, conceivably the millennial temple (cf. Eze 40–44).

Before the question of the seventieth week can be properly handled, the terminus ad quem of the seventy weeks must first be established. If all six goals of v.24 were attained by the crucifixion of Christ and the establishment of the early church seven years after his death, then it might be fair to assume that the entire 490 years of the seventy weeks were to be understood as running consecutively and coming to a close in A.D. 37. But since all or most of the six goals seem to be yet unfulfilled, it follows that if the seventieth week finds fulfillment at all, it must be identified as the last seven years before Christ's return to earth as millennial King.

25–26 Verse 25 is crucial. Only sixty-nine heptads are listed here, broken into two segments. The first segment of seven amounts to forty-nine years, during which the city of Jerusalem is to be "rebuilt with streets and a trench, but in times of trouble."

Verse 26 specifies the termination of the sixty-nine heptads: the cutting off of the Messiah. After the appearance of Messiah as Ruler—483 years after the sixty-nine weeks have begun—he will be cut off. This accords very well with a three-year ministry of the Messiah prior to his crucifixion. Verse 26 goes on to indicate that when Messiah is cut off, he will be bereft of followers; all of them will flee from him at the time of his arrest, trial, and death. (Or "nothing" may mean that he will die without any material wealth or resources.)

For the terminus a quo, notice that v.25 specifies the rebuilding of the city of Jerusalem with streets and moats, which will be completed within forty-nine years of the terminus a quo. The most likely fulfillment is the decree issued to Ezra in the seventh year of Artaxerxes I (i.e., 457 B.C.) (for other possibilities, see EBC, 7:113–16). Its text (Ezr 7:12–26) emphasizes restoring the temple and enforcing the Mosaic code. Yet Ezra understood the decree to include permission to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem. To be sure, he did not succeed in doing so; his attention was focused on urgently needed community reforms. Certainly he lacked the resources for so ambitious an undertaking; so the rebuilding never went beyond the talking stage. If this led to a delay of thirteen years in working on the walls, Nehemiah's disappointment (Ne 1:4) when in 446 he heard that no progress had been made seems all the more appropriate. Nehemiah no doubt had hoped for more tangible results from Ezra's leadership during his twelve years there.

If, then, the terminus a quo for the decree in v.25 be reckoned as 457 B.C. (the date of Ezra's return to Jerusalem), we may compute the first seven heptads as running from 457 to 408, within which time the rebuilding of the walls, streets, and moats was completed. Then from 408 we count off the sixty-two heptads (434 years) also mentioned in v.25 and come out to A.D. 26 (408 is 26 less than 434). But actually we come out to A.D. 27, since there is no year 0. If Christ was crucified on 14 Abib A.D. 30, as is generally believed (cf. EBC, 1:598–99, 607), this would come out to a remarkably exact fulfillment of the terms of v.25. Christ's public ministry, from the time of his baptism in the Jordan till his death and resurrection at Jerusalem, must have taken up about three years. The 483 years from the issuing of the decree of Artaxerxes came to an end in A.D. 27, the year of the "coming" of Messiah as Ruler. It was indeed "after the sixty-two 'sevens'"—three years after—that "the Anointed One" was "cut off."

The second sentence of v.26 is perhaps more accurately rendered, "The people of a prince who shall come will destroy both the city and the sanctuary." (The reason for the ambiguity here is that the definite article is missing in front of "ruler" in the Hebrew, which would be necessary for the rendering "the people of the ruler.") Subsequent history shows this to be a clear reference to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans under Titus in A.D. 70, forty years after Calvary, or forty-three years after the end of the sixty-ninth "week"—if the 457 B.C. theory is correct for the commencement of the seventy weeks.

The next sentence or two indicate what is to happen after the destruction of Jerusalem: lit., "And the end of it will be in the overflowing, and unto the end there will be war, a strict determination of desolations" or "the determined amount of desolations." The general tenor is in striking conformity with Christ's own prediction (Mt 24:7–22). Notice that this entire intervening period is referred to before the final or seventieth week is mentioned in v.27. It is difficult to explain why this is so if the entire seventy weeks are intended to run consecutively and without interruption. It seems far more reasonable to infer that a long period of time of war and desolation is to intervene between the sixty-ninth week (when Messiah appears at his first advent) and the seventieth week, which is to usher in Christ's second advent.

27 This verse evokes the question, Who? The "ruler" in v.26 is the last eligible antecedent in the Hebrew text, which normally is to be taken as the subject of the following verb. If it was a ruler of the Roman people who was to destroy Jerusalem (in A.D. 70), then it would be a ruler of the Roman Empire—in its final phase, i.e., the ten-toes phase of ch. 2 and the ten-horned-beast phase of ch. 7—who will conclude this covenant. (Of course it could not be the same ruler, for a long period seems to be referred to in the last part of v.26; the earlier ruler must therefore be a type or forerunner of the "Roman" ruler of the last days.)

Who are "the many"? (The Heb. indicates "the many" rather than "many.") Apparently this refers to the true believers, presumably Jewish believers in Christ. The foregoing thus indicates that the latter day ruler over the "Roman" people will "confirm" a "covenant" with the believing Jews for a stipulated period of seven years, permitting them to carry on their religious practices.

After about three and one-half years, the world dictator will break his agreement with the Jews. Possibly he will feel secure enough in his autocratic position to carry out his original, secret plan to impose an absolute dictatorship on all the people of his empire, especially the Jews. All pretense of religious toleration will be dropped as he aspires to display himself as the incarnation of all divine authority on earth (cf. 2Th 2:4).

The final statement of v.27 is difficult (see NIV note). The Hebrew has no word for "temple" or any verb for "set." A more literal translation is, "And on the wing of abominations (he is going to) commit abominations, and toward the end [or 'up until'] the predetermined (judgment) will be poured out upon him." In other words, the subject of "commit abominations" (lit. Heb.) is the Antichrist himself, carried over from v.26; and what we have here is more likely a construction like "he is about to commit abominations." It seems unjustified to supply a verb "to set." Since there is no word for "temple," it is more reasonable to understand "wing" as a figure for the vulture-like role of the Antichrist as he swoops down on his beleaguered victims.

The phrase "that causes desolation" (GK 9037) resembles "the abomination that causes desolation" in Da 11:31 and 12:11. Apparently these three passages were in Christ's mind when he predicted the final horrors of the Tribulation (cf. Mt 24:15). Furthermore, Jesus obviously regarded the fulfillment of this prophecy as yet future. It is simplest to take the 'desolator" as the world dictator of the last days, who will resort to violence to carry through his ruthless policy of despotism. Revelation 13 indicates that he will remain in control of world affairs down to the End, enforcing his will by violent means till the final conflict of Armageddon. The dictator will hold sway till the wrath of God is poured out in fury on the God-defying world of the Beast (little horn or ruler). What is "poured out" may include the vials or bowls of divine wrath mentioned in Rev 16; but certainly what "is poured out on him" points to the climax at Armageddon, when the blasphemous world ruler will be crushed by the full weight of God's judgment.

X. The Triumph of Persistent Prayer (10:1–21)

A. Daniel's Disturbing Vision and Prayerful Concern (10:1–3)

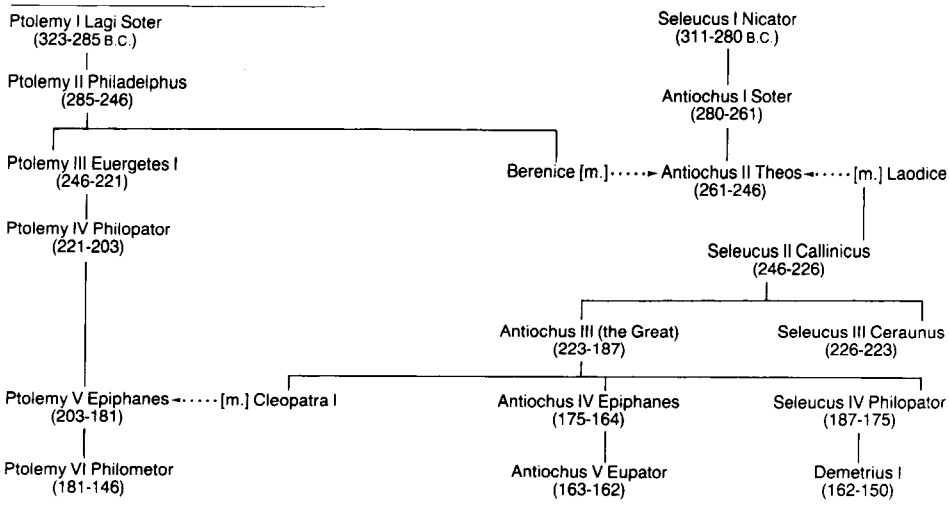
1–3 The "third year of Cyrus" identifies this vision as the latest recorded in the Book of Daniel. Since the reign of Darius lasted until 538 or 537, Cyrus's third year (at Babylon) would have been 535/534, probably just a few years before Daniel's death. (If he was born around 620 B.C., Daniel would have been ninety by 530.) The vision's message related to "a great war," portending troublesome times for the people of God. Daniel was so impressed by this revelation that he mourned and fasted for three weeks, giving himself to intense supplication and prayer (cf. v.12).

B. God's Delayed Messenger (10:4–14)

4–6 In early spring, Daniel received his answer through an angel while standing by the Tigris River, evidently there on some kind of official business. Verses 5–6 are probably the most detailed description in Scripture of the appearance of an angel (cf. Jdg 13:6; Lk 24:4; Ac 1:10). The angel (1) was dressed in linen, possibly the dazzling white apparel referred to in Lk 24:4; (2) he had a "gold" belt around his waist, possibly in the form of chain links, hinged panels, or gold thread embroidery; (3) his body glowed luminously; (4) his face flashed like lightning; (5) his eyes blazed like torches (cf. Rev 1:14); (6) his arms and legs (evidently uncovered) gleamed like burnished bronze; and (7) his voice was like the "sound of a multitude" (cf. Rev 10:1–3).

7–11 Although Daniel's companions did not see the vision, they sensed the angel's presence and fled in terror (cf. Ac 9:7; 22:9). Left alone with this awesome messenger, Daniel once again was emotionally overwhelmed (cf. 8:27). After hearing the angel speak to him, Daniel swooned. But the angel's touch soon aroused him. Daniel stood up, respectfully attentive to God's message. The remarkable greeting reassured him of God's love and concern for his faithful servants. Daniel's privileged status resulted from his

Ptolemies and Seleucids



Soon after the death of Alexander the Great in 323 B.C., his generals divided his empire into four parts, two of which—Egypt and Syria—were under the rule of the Ptolemies and Seleucids respectively. Palestine was controlled from Egypt by the Ptolemaic dynasty from 323 to 198, and was subsequently governed by the Seleucids of Syria from 198 to 142.

The Diadochi, as the successors of Alexander were called, struggled bitterly for power over his domain. At first Ptolemy I seized his own satrapy, Egypt and North Africa, which had splendid resources and natural defense capabilities. Seleucus gained Syria and Mesopotamia, and by 301 Lysimachus held Thrace and Asia Minor and Cassander ruled Macedon. The situation changed again by 277, when only three major Hellenistic kingdoms stabilized in Egypt, in Syria, and in Macedonia under the Antigonids (277-168). Each continued until the eventual triumph of Rome.

Da 11 treats the "king of the South" and the "king of the North," describing their conflicts, wars and alliances. Their hostility toward the people of God culminated in the "abomination that causes desolation" (Da 11:31), identified historically with the reign of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175-164). The Maccabean revolt followed, leading eventually to the founding of the Hasmonean dynasty.

complete absorption in the will and glory of the Lord. The angel called on Daniel to listen carefully to what he was about to receive. From the standpoint of 535 B.C., ch. 11 is full of confusing detail couched in vague terms, though the subsequent fulfillment in later times is amazingly accurate.

12–14 Daniel was told what happened in heaven when three weeks earlier he had begun to pray for an understanding of God's plan for Israel's future. Because Daniel had set his "mind to gain understanding and to humble [himself] before [his] God," the Lord commissioned his angelic messenger with the answer to Daniel's petition. The powers of evil apparently are able to hinder the delivery of the answers to requests God is minded to answer. God's response was immediate, but "the prince of the Persian kingdom"—apparently the satanic agent assigned to the Persian realm—vigorously opposed the actual delivery of the answer.

While God can override the united resistance of all the forces of hell, he accords to demons certain limited powers of obstruction and rebellion like those he allows human beings. The exercise of free will in opposition to the Lord of heaven is permitted when he sees fit (but see Job 1:12; 2:6; cf. also 1Co 10:13). The angels of God can thwart the agents of the Devil, as here Michael broke the hindrance put up by the demonic "king of Persia" and paved the way for the interpreting angel to deliver God's answer to Daniel. Michael was a faithful "minister" to someone who would "inherit salvation" (cf. Heb 1:14). This shows the importance of perseverance (cf. Lk 18:1).

In v.14 the angel begins to explain the destiny of the Hebrew people up to the last days. If the vision pertains to the last days, it is a mistake to try to interpret the end point as being the time of Antiochus Epiphanes in the second century B.C. The vision goes beyond his age to the final period in world history, before the Son of Man comes to establish the kingdom of God on earth. Beyond the type (Antiochus IV) is projected the antitype (see 11:40; also the comments on 8:9–10).

C. The Angel's Encouragement (10:15–21)

15–19 Daniel, perhaps too emotionally overcome to form any words, bowed toward the ground as the angel spoke to him. Then a heavenly figure in human form touched Daniel's lips, enabling him to speak. At first he could only speak of his utter weakness (cf. Isa 6:5), but the angel's touch was all Daniel needed to regain his speech. The angel touched Daniel again, giving him renewed strength. In the presence of the mighty angel, Daniel was reassured that the Lord was with him; he was then ready to give close attention to God's revelation of the future and write it down with utmost care.

20–21 The angel revealed that he was still in combat for the Lord and would soon return to the battlefield to fight against renewed attacks from the demon assigned to Persia. This antagonist would be succeeded by another satanic champion called the "prince of Greece." These battles between the warriors of heaven and those of hell most likely take place in heaven (cf. Rev 12:7) and result in the defeat of Satan. It is encouraging to know that God has mighty champions among the holy angels to defend the saints against the attacks of the Evil One.

XI. The Tribulation Under Antiochus and Antichrist (11:1–45)

A. From the Persian Empire to the Death of Alexander (11:1–4)

1 Clearly 11:1 points back to 10:20–21, which speaks of the angel's alliance with the archangel, Michael, against the demons of Persia and Greece, and specifies the first year of Darius the Mede (539–538 B.C.) as the time when Michael's contest with Satan's emissaries began. Apparently the struggle had been going on for four or five years (since the episode of chs. 10–12 takes place in the third year of Cyrus as king; see 10:1).

The occasion for the spiritual warfare was the restoration of the believing remnant of Israel to the Holy Land and their survival there as a commonwealth of the faithful, living in obedience to the Scriptures. Knowing that such a development could lead to the ultimate appearance of the Messiah, Satan and his hosts were determined to thwart the renewal of Israel and the deliverance of her people from destruction. The supreme effort to exterminate them altogether was to take place some fifty-five years later, in the reign of Ahasuerus (Xerxes), when Haman secured his consent to obliterate the entire Jewish race (see the book of Esther). The conflict between Michael and the "prince of Persia" (10:13) may have had some bearing on this event, and Michael's victory may have paved the way for Queen Esther to thwart this genocide. The second major effort of Satan was to take place under Antiochus Epiphanes, who sought to obliterate the Jewish faith by forbidding its practice on pain of death. The momentous events of 167–164 B.C. may well have been profoundly affected by this supernatural warfare between heaven and hell (see comments on 8:13–14).

2 Michael began to detail what God ordained for the future of the second commonwealth up until the crisis reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. The Persian king who invaded Greece was, of course, Xerxes, who reigned 485–464 B.C. The three kings who preceded him after the death of Cyrus were (1) Cambyses, Cyrus's elder son, who in the six or seven years of his reign (529–523) conquered Egypt; (2) then for a year or two an imposter named Gaumata or Bardiya (523–522), who passed himself off as Cyrus's younger son, Smerdis (who had been secretly murdered by his brother's agents); and (3) Darius the Persian (522–485), the son of Hystaspes, who in 522 assassinated the imposter and was elevated to the kingship in his place. Darius himself was of royal blood, being a cousin of Cyrus through his father, Hystaspes.

In 490 B.C. Darius attempted to conquer Athens to punish it for aiding the Ionian Greek cities in their abortive revolt against their Persian overlords. But his naval expedition came to grief at Marathon. As a result, Xerxes, Darius's son, not only inherited an obligation to wreak vengeance on Athens but also was motivated by the momentum of empire building to keep pushing westward to add yet another realm to the vast domain he had inherited from his father. Xerxes, however, sustained an even greater defeat than his father had. After his huge army (estimated at a million men) had subdued virtually all of Greece down to the Isthmus of Corinth and the city of Athens had been reduced to ashes, Xerxes' navy was soundly defeated by the united Greek fleet at Salamis in 480 B.C. This setback prompted him to retreat hastily to Asia. The land army of one hundred thousand men that he left behind was completely crushed in 479 by the allied forces of the Greeks at Plataea.

3–4 The next phase in world empires was the rise of Alexander the Great. Although v.3 does not make it altogether clear that this "mighty king" would inaugurate a new empire in place of the Persian one, v.4 leaves no doubt that he was the ruler predicted here. "After he has appeared" is better translated "As soon as he has appeared," which suggests that he would have a comparatively brief reign. Alexander's first clash with the Persians came at Granicus in 334, and his final overthrow of Persian power took place in 331 at Gaugamela. After that he pushed eastward to Afghanistan and the Indus River and Bahawalpur, beyond the farthest reaches of Persian conquest. There he was compelled by his battle-weary troops to return to Babylon in 327. Thus in seven or eight years he accomplished the most dazzling military conquest in human history. But he lived only four years more, dying in Babylon of a fever in 323 after one of his drunken bouts.

Verse 4 foretells the division of Alexander's domains among four smaller and weaker empires. After a period of imperial regency under Perdiccas (murdered in 321) and Antigonus (crushed at Ipsus in 301), the widespread domains of Alexander were parceled out to the four Diadochi (see comment on 8:8 for the history foretold here).

B. The Wars Between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids (11:5–20)

5–6 "The king of the South" was to be Ptolemy I (Soter), son of Lagus, whose ambitions extended far beyond the borders of Egypt (his charge from Alexander) to Palestine and the rest of Asia. Temporarily his naval forces captured Cyprus and important bases in Asia Minor, and there were even times when he wielded considerable influence over some of the city-states of the Greek mainland. But during the 280 years between Ptolemy I and Cleopatra VII (who met her end around 30 B.C.), the domain of the Ptolemies was mostly restricted to Egypt and Cyprus; they lost Palestine to the Seleucid king Antiochus III shortly before 200 B.C. "One of his commanders [who] will become even stronger than he" was Seleucus Nicator of the Seleucid Empire, who had served under Perdiccas and Antigonus in Babylon but had had a falling out with the latter in 316. Thereafter he defected to Ptolemy. After the defeat of Antigonus, he returned to Babylon (where he was well liked) with Ptolemy's sponsorship in 312, two years after which he assumed the title of king, so that 310 became the official starting date for the Seleucid Era. Since Seleucus secured control of Alexander's old domains all the way to the Indus on the east and to Syria and Phoenicia on the west, his authority far surpassed that of his sponsor, Ptolemy. Seleucus's dynasty endured till 64 B.C., when Pompey delivered the coup de grace to a truncated empire that had already lost Babylon and all its eastern dominions to the Parthians.

After Ptolemy I's death in 285, his son Ptolemy II (Philadelphus) continued the contest with the Seleucids till 252, when a treaty of peace was finally arranged with Antiochus II (Theos), under the terms of which Antiochus was to marry Berenice, the daughter of Philadelphus. This furnished a serious complication since Antiochus already had a wife, a powerful, influential woman named Laodice. She did not take kindly to being divorced, despite the obvious political advantages with Ptolemaic Egypt (v.6). Thus she organized a successful conspiracy, operating from her place of banishment after the divorce; and she managed to have both Berenice and her infant son assassinated. Soon afterward the king himself was poisoned (247 B.C.), and the pro-Laodice party engineered a coup d'etat that made her queen regent during the minority of her son, Seleucus II (Callinicus). Thus the prophecy was fulfilled concerning Berenice, that she would be "handed over," along with the nobles who supported her in Antioch.

7–12 Ptolemy Philadelphus died in 247 B.C., soon after the tragedy that had overtaken his daughter Berenice. But his capable son Ptolemy III (Euergetes) organized a great expeditionary force against Syria to avenge his sister's death. This war raged from 246 to 241, and Ptolemy captured and pillaged the Seleucid capital of Antioch and invaded its eastern domains as far as Bactria. Finally he returned to Egypt laden with spoil, but he did not see fit to add much of the Seleucid territory on a permanent basis. He did, however, shatter the Seleucid navy in the Aegean Sea and succeeded on other fronts as well, for he reunited Cyrenaica (at the western end of Libya), after twelve years of independence with the Ptolemaic domains. He also recovered all his father's conquests on the coasts of Asia Minor and temporarily gained control of portions of Thrace.

Verse 8 mentions the recovery of the idols and sacred treasures taken to Persia as booty by Cambyses in 524 B.C., the recovery of which moved the Egyptians to acclaim Ptolemy III as Euergetes ("Benefactor"). The verse concludes by alluding to the treaty of peace Ptolemy III made with Seleucus II in 240. Although there is no record of Seleucus II's attempting to invade Egypt proper, v.9 records his successful foray into Ptolemaic territory to regain control of northern Syria and Phoenicia, probably in the 230s.

Seleucus II (Callinicus) died in 226 and was succeeded by his son Seleucus III (Soter), who reigned for only three years (v.10). His principal efforts were directed against Asia Minor. The second son of Callinicus, Antiochus III, received the surname "the Great" because of his military successes. Coming to the throne in 223, he first had to suppress a revolt in the eastern provinces led by his trusted governor, Molon, who had set himself up as an independent king (220 B.C.). Antiochus III next launched an expedition against Phoenicia and Palestine (219–218) that ended in a serious setback at Raphia, where he was soundly beaten by the smaller army of Ptolemy IV (vv.11–12). In the peace that followed, Antiochus III ceded all Phoenicia and Palestine back to Ptolemy IV and left him in undisturbed possession of them till later. During the following years Antiochus attained his most brilliant successes in subjugating the rebellious provinces in the Middle East all the way to the Caspian Sea in the north and the Indus River on the east. These invasions absorbed all his energies from 212 to 204. But finally in 203, when Ptolemy IV died and was succeeded by Ptolemy V (Epiphanes), a mere boy of four, Antiochus saw his opportunity to strike at Egypt again.

13–19 Antiochus advanced once more against Phoenicia and Palestine with his battle-seasoned veterans and pushed all the way down to the fortress of Gaza, which fell in 201. Verse 14 continues: "In those times many will rise against the king of the South [i.e., Ptolemy V]. The violent men among your own people [i.e., the pro-Seleucid Jews] will rebel in fulfillment of the vision [i.e., this prophecy now being revealed], but without success." This refers to the counteroffensive launched by the powerful General Scopas of the Egyptian forces, who punished all the leaders in Jerusalem and Judah who favored the claims of Antiochus and were disaffected with the Ptolemaic government. But soon the war swept down from the north, and Scopas met with a severe loss at Panium (near Caesarea Philippi) in 200 B.C. From there he retreated to Sidon on the Phoenician coast, the "fortified city" of v.15.

When Scopas finally surrendered to Antiochus III at Sidon, the Holy Land ("Beautiful Land," v.16) was permanently acquired by the Antioch government, to the exclusion of Egypt. Antiochus did not pursue a general policy of destruction but simply exacted reprisals from the pro-Egyptian party leaders he captured. On his entrance into Jerusalem in 198 B.C., he was welcomed as a deliverer and benefactor.

More literally v.17 reads: "Then he will set his face to come with the power of all his kingdom, and equitable conditions shall be with him, and he will accomplish it. And he will give to him the daughter of women in order for her to corrupt [or 'destroy'] him [or possibly 'it,' referring to the kingdom of Egypt]." The clear intention of Antiochus was to bring the boy king Ptolemy V, who in 197 was ten or less, under the influence of his daughter, expecting her to maintain a strongly pro-Seleucid policy in Egypt. Then if Cleopatra gave birth to a son, he would become legal heir to both crowns, which conceivably might create a situation favorable to strong control in Egypt on the part of Antiochus himself, the maternal grandfather. However, after the marriage finally took place in 195, Cleopatra became completely sympathetic to her husband, Ptolemy V, and the Ptolemaic cause, much to her father's disappointment. Therefore when she gave birth to a royal heir (Ptolemy VI), her father gained no particular advantage or political leverage. When Ptolemy V died (181), Cleopatra became queen regent because the Egyptians all loved and appreciated her loyalty to their cause. But she herself died not long after, which meant the end of all possible Seleucid influence on Egyptian affairs. Antiochus himself had died in 187 B.C.

Soon after his victory over Scopas at Panium and Sidon, Antiochus III became involved in a new war front against Pergamum and the Aegean coastline island of Rhodes. As Antiochus's forces closed in on them, the Rhodians appealed to Rome for aid. Another important development was the arrival of Hannibal from exile in Macedonia to join Antiochus as a military adviser. The Roman government resented Antiochus's offer of asylum to their enemy. But Antiochus was not to be cowed, for he felt that he had the power to cope with Rome's military might. Therefore in 196 he crossed the Hellespont and the Aegean with his powerful navy and conquered considerable territory in Thrace. The "coastlands" (usually "islands") included all areas contiguous to the seacoast.

About this time the west-central Greek confederacy of the Aetolian League asked Antiochus for assistance against Macedon and the Peloponnesians. He therefore sent a modest naval force in 192 to land on the coast of central Greece and cooperate with the Aetolians. But the latter proved to be militarily ineffective, and the Macedonians joined forces with the Achaean League to oppose Antiochus from both the north and the south. The Romans were only too happy to jump into the fray; so they joined their Greek allies to overwhelm the Seleucid command post at Thermopylae—the historic site of the Persian War in 480 B.C. As a result of this setback, Antiochus withdrew to Asia Minor in 191, especially since his navy was beaten in several engagements with the Roman fleet. During the winter of 190–189, the Roman troops followed him across to Asia and finally met him in a pitched battle at Magnesia, west of Sardis. Although Antiochus had an army of seventy thousand at his disposal to confront the Roman force of thirty thousand, he was badly defeated. Thus his "insolence" (v.18) met with disaster.

The Roman "commander" was none other than Lucius Cornelius Scipio Asiaticus, brother to Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus, who had brilliantly defeated Hannibal at Zama in 202 B.C. After he compelled Antiochus to surrender, the commander dictated severe peace terms, which were included in the Treaty of Apamea, signed in 188. Antiochus was compelled to surrender not only all claims to Europe but also the greater part of Asia Minor as well: his boundary was to be the Taurus Range. Furthermore, he had to surrender his entire elephant brigade, all his navy, and twenty selected hostages. Finally, he was obliged to pay an indemnity of fifteen or twenty thousand talents over a period of several years. Antiochus's second son, who was named after him, was among the twenty hostages taken to Rome, where he spent the formative years of his life. He later became the dreaded persecutor of the Jews, Antiochus IV Epiphanes.

Antiochus the Great met an inglorious end in 187. Unable to meet the required indemnity payments out of his exhausted treasury, he resorted to pillaging—or attempting to pillage—the temple of Bel in Elymais. The local inhabitants were so incensed that they stormed his modest army with desperate bravery and succeeded in killing him and defending their temple (v.19).

20 The "tax collector" sent out by Seleucus IV (Philopator), the elder son of Antiochus, was apparently his special fund-raiser, Heliodorus. According to 2Mc 3:7–40, a certain traitorous Jew named Simon sent information to the king that the Jerusalem temple contained sufficient treasure to meet all the king's needs. Impoverished as his treasury was (partly through the yearly indemnity payments to Rome of one thousand talents), Seleucus eagerly grasped at the prospect of plundering the temple and sent off Heliodorus to carry out this assignment. Only a frightful vision of mighty angels assaulting and flogging him kept Heliodorus from invading the temple and he returned home empty-handed. No other details are given here of the twelve-year reign of this rather ineffectual king, except that he did not die in battle or in a mob action as had his father, Antiochus. Yet Seleucus IV met an untimely end through poison administered by Heliodorus.

C. The Great Persecution Under Antiochus Epiphanes (11:21–35)

21 The tyrannical oppressor who did his utmost to destroy the Jewish religion altogether previously appeared in 8:9–12, 23–25 as the sinister "little horn" who would suspend the worship of God in the Jerusalem temple. Now he is introduced as a despicable tyrant who will shed much blood and enjoy power for a time. Verse 21 states that this tyrant "has not been given the honor of royalty." The young son of Seleucus IV, Demetrius I, was next in line to receive the crown. But since he had been sent to Rome as a replacement hostage for his uncle Antiochus (see comment on v.19), it was deemed best to put Antiochus in charge of the government as prince regent; he became Antiochus IV Epiphanes. This man was determined to set aside his nephew's claims altogether, even though he was already in his twenties and quite competent to rule. So Antiochus curried favor with governmental leaders and, by promises of promotion and large favors in return for their support, managed to secure approval for succession to the throne vacated by his poisoned brother. Fortunately Demetrius was still being held in Rome, where he was safe for the time being from assassination by his uncle's agents. Later on he was able to make good his claim to the throne, for he left Rome to lead an army against the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, Antiochus V (Eupator), in 162.

Epiphanes, that "contemptible person who has not been given the honor of royalty," converted his regency into royalty soon after 175 and launched his own career as an ambitious and vigorous leader. The title "Epiphanes" ("the Illustrious One") also carries the meaning of "very evident" or "manifest." His coins show that he linked up Epiphanes with the added title Theos ("God"), thus yielding the combination "Illustrious God" or "God Manifest." Bearing in mind his role as a type of the Antichrist or Beast of the last days (who appears in ch. 7 as the "little horn," arising from the fourth kingdom), it becomes particularly meaningful to read about the future antitype in 2Th 2:3–4. Not only did Antiochus enthrone himself for adoration by the Jews as he sat in the court of the desecrated Jerusalem temple (in 168 B.C.), but he also claimed divine honors for himself on every major coin that he minted.

22–24 Verse 22 introduces the brilliantly successful beginning of Antiochus Epiphanes' reign, as he took up anew the struggle with Ptolemaic Egypt. Epiphanes threw his intended victims off guard by offering them his friendship and alliance. Then he would maneuver for an advantageous position till he could catch them by surprise. So it was with Ptolemy VI (Philometor), who had ascended the throne in 181 B.C. at the age of six, after the death of his mother, Cleopatra (see comment on v.17). But after he assumed power, he determined to recapture the regions of Palestine and Phoenicia that had been lost to Antiochus III. At first Ptolemy VII's invasion was successful, for he had challenged Antiochus with a large, well-equipped army. But eventually he encountered a serious reverse and became a prisoner of Antiochus Epiphanes.

The Egyptians gave up hope of regaining their king and appointed his young brother Physcon as king in his place. On learning this, Epiphanes craftily intervened on behalf of Ptolemy Philometor, his royal prisoner, and mounted an expeditionary force against Physcon's government in order to reestablish Philometor on his throne—as Antiochus's ally rather than his adversary. As the price of his help in expelling Physcon, Antiochus made a treaty of friendship and alliance with Philometor aimed at gaining a foothold in Egypt itself and ultimately uniting the two kingdoms under his own authority. The seriousness of this aim is attested by the issue of coinage (in the large and medium-sized bronzes, at least) that bore the same types as the corresponding Ptolemaic coinage (the head of Zeus on the front and the Ptolemaic eagle on the back) but with the legend "King Antiochus, God Manifest" rather than the usual Egyptian "Ptolemy the King." Although these Egyptian-type coins were presumably used in the Seleucid territory rather than in Egypt itself, they at least hinted at his potential claims to the Ptolemaic domains. Actually, Antiochus had penetrated Egypt itself all the way to Memphis, which he captured, along with Philometor himself.

Later on Antiochus's alliance with Philometor wore so thin that his reestablished protégé decided to make peace with Ptolemy Physcon, his defeated brother, because he felt he needed his help in dislodging Antiochus's troops from the border fortress of Pelusium. With Physcon as his associate, Philometor was able to raise a considerable army to expel the Seleucid army. But as soon as Epiphanes learned of this development, he again marched against Egypt, intending to subdue it once and for all. But this effort was forestalled by the intervention of the Roman fleet, which had been hurriedly dispatched to Alexandria in response to the urgent request of the embattled Ptolemies. The aggressive Roman commander Popilius Laenas met Antiochus marshaling his hosts for a siege of Alexandria and informed him that the Roman government ordered him to quit Egypt immediately or face the consequences of war with Rome. Remembering what had happened to his father at Magnesia and recalling his years as a young hostage in Roman captivity, it did not take Antiochus very long to give way before this mandate—especially after Popilius drew a circle around him with his staff and ordered him to make his decision before he stepped outside it. Even though Antiochus had for a time succeeded in destroying the power of "the prince of the covenant" (v.22)—Ptolemy Philometor—the remaining verses predicting his eventual failure found their fulfillment in this humiliation that took place near Alexandria in 169 B.C.

Verses 23–24 describe the above developments: "After coming to an agreement with him [i.e., Philometor], he will act deceitfully, and with only a few people [his initial invasion had been made by a small force] he will rise to power." The phrase "richest provinces" apparently refers not only to Egypt itself but also to the eastern provinces all the way to Bactria, where successful campaigns were conducted by Eucratides, Antiochus's general. In 166, Antiochus conducted a full-scale muster of his armies at Daphnae, just outside Antioch, in celebration of the tenth anniversary of his rule—even after his expulsion from Egypt by Popilius Laenas.

25–28 Verses 25–26 refer to the earlier invasion of Egypt in 170, after Ptolemy had attempted an attack on Palestine. The king of the South's great army did not make him invincible because "of the plots devised against him" by Antiochus and his agents in Egypt. "Those who eat from the king's provisions will try to destroy him [i.e., Ptolemy Philometor]; his army will be swept away" probably refers to negotiations carried on by the two victors at the banquet table, apparently after Physcon had been defeated and expelled from Egypt, with the help of Antiochus's troops. At this stage these ostensibly cordial allies were already plotting against each other.

Quite clearly "the end" pertained to the permanent suspension of Antiochus's campaign to annex Egypt to his domains; it is explained by v.28: "The king of the North will return to his own country [i.e., to his capital of Antioch] with great wealth [from plundering Physcon's army], but his heart will be set against the holy covenant. He will take action against it and then return to his own country." The significant term here is "the holy covenant." Apparently this does not refer to the covenant between Antiochus and Ptolemy VII but seems to signify the religious establishment in Jerusalem or even the monotheistic Jewish population as a whole. It is here that the clash between Antiochus and the faith of Israel begins on a serious level.

The original friction had arisen over the question of the high priesthood. Early in his reign Antiochus IV had been approached by a younger member of the high priestly family named Jason, who promised the king that if he would depose from office the current, legitimate high priest, Onias III, then he—Jason—would pay the king a handsome bribe for this service. Antiochus was happy to accede to this request; Onias was removed and Jason installed in his place. But once the precedent of imperial interference had been set, still another brother, Menelaus, offered Antiochus a bribe still larger than Jason's if he would be installed in place of Jason. Antiochus had no scruples about supplanting one rascal by another, so long as he himself was enriched in the process. So in 172 B.C. Menelaus took Jason's place and set about selling some of the votive offerings and golden utensils of the temple to raise the cash necessary for the bribe. At this sacrilege the godly high priest Onias, though deposed, earnestly protested and so angered Menelaus that he had Onias killed. But this murder so angered the populace of Jerusalem that they became bitter against Menelaus and sent representatives to Antiochus himself to accuse Menelaus and his wicked brother Lysimachus. Antiochus did execute Andronicus, the agent of Menelaus who had murdered Onias. But a little later a courtier Menelaus had bribed persuaded Antiochus to act against the Jerusalemites. So instead of punishing Menelaus as he deserved, the king had the Jerusalem representatives put to death in Tyre, where the whole matter was being adjudicated (cf. 2Mc 4:30–50).

Later on (167 B.C.) Antiochus, following his bitter disappointment in Egypt, went and encamped near Jerusalem. He had a score to settle with Jason, who had taken the city in an effort to overthrow Menelaus. Acting on a false report that Antiochus had died in Egypt, Jason had organized a regiment of a thousand armed supporters for a coup d'état. He massacred a large number of citizens and shut Menelaus up in the Jerusalem citadel. Hearing of this, Antiochus decided to suppress the Jewish religion altogether and to exact stern reprisal from those who had taken up arms against his government. So he marched into Jerusalem with overwhelming forces, released Menelaus, and conducted a massacre in which eighty thousand men, women, and children were put to the sword (2Mc 5:11–14). Then he profaned the temple, accompanied by the despicable Menelaus, and robbed it of its golden vessels and other sacred objects (vv.15–21).

The date of this desecration and pillage of Jerusalem was Dec. 16, 168 B.C. (see comments on 8:9–10)—a day of special significance, seeing that exactly four years later the patriot leader Judas Maccabaeus rededicated the temple to the worship of the Lord, having cleansed it from all its pagan defilements. But the actual suspension of the regular morning and evening sacrifices had apparently taken place 55 or 54 days prior to the desecration of the temple itself (if our interpretation of Da 8:14 is correct), because three years would total 1,095 or 1,096 days, and the 2,300 "evenings and mornings" (i.e., sacrifices) come out to 1,150 days. It seems, therefore, that during the earlier disturbances between Jason and Menelaus the regular daily offerings were suspended since the incumbent high priest was shut up in the Acra (Citadel) by Jason's troops. This, then, was the fulfillment of the prediction of 11:28 regarding Antiochus's "action" taken "against the holy covenant." This verse actually sums up the entire series of measures taken by Antiochus in suppressing the religious liberties of Judah, from 172 to 168 B.C.

29–30 The more exact chronology of Antiochus's later act of desecration is set forth in these verses. The "outcome" (v.29) was different this time because he was compelled by Popilius Laenas to withdraw from Egypt altogether. From the preceding discussion, it is evident that the followers of Menelaus, who made no protest as Antiochus removed the holy vessels from the Holy Place, are referred to here as "those who forsake the holy covenant." Menelaus and his followers were willing to suppress all religious scruples rather than cross the will of the tyrant who had put them in power.

31 In addition to the desecration already described, the abolition of the daily sacrifices to the Lord was made binding by the erection in the temple of the Lord of "the abomination [GK 9199] that causes desolation." Apparently this was a statue of Jupiter or Zeus Olympius because 2Mc 6:2 indicates that the temple itself was to be renamed the Temple of Zeus Olympius. Pagans invariably installed an image in the inner sanctuary of any temple dedicated to the worship of that deity. Even if the actual statue was not installed in the Jerusalem temple as early as Dec. 16 (25 Chislev), 168 B.C., an idolatrous altar was formally consecrated there at that time. Thus the same type of desecration overtook the second temple as befell the first temple in the evil days of Ahaz (735–715) and Manasseh (695–642; cf. 2Ki 16:10–16; 21:3–5). Interestingly, Christ's only explicit reference to "the prophet Daniel" as being the author of the book of Daniel occurs in the Olivet Discourse (cf. Mt 24:15), where he refers to "the abomination that causes desolation," the exact wording of the LXX for this verse (cf. Da 12:11).

32 Antiochus was a master in manipulating Jewish leaders who were divided in their loyalties, winning them over to his cause by glowing promises of preferment and reward. He already had as partisans for his cause a number of influential leaders in Jerusalem society and politics who were convinced of the expediency of a pro-Hellenic policy. These were doubtless "those who have violated the covenant"—i.e., their covenant relation with the Lord. First Maccabees 1:11–15 describes how certain "transgressors of the law" gathered about them a party of collaborators who were ready to throw off their Jewish loyalties and commitment to the Lord in their zeal to be accepted and find approval with their Syrian-Greek overlords.

The hope of Israel lay with committed believers who would risk their lives rather than betray their honor. A band of heroic patriots was stirred to action by a certain priest named Mattathias. He was the father of the valiant Maccabees: Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, each of whom later became "prince of Israel" during the victorious war of independence against the Seleucid government. These patriots, sparked by the zeal of the Hasidim movement, were the mainstay of the resistance that opposed the pro-Seleucid Jewish compromisers as well as Antiochus and his successors. They fulfilled the prediction of v.32: "The people who know their God will firmly resist him [i.e., Epiphanes]."

Later some of the Hasidim ("the godly, pious, loyal ones") became the sect of the Pharisees ("separated ones") who earnestly obeyed every regulation and oral interpretation of the Law. Later still a smaller group broke off and became out-and-out separatists rather than attempting, like the Pharisees, to reform the religious establishment from within. The Essenes, one group of whom made their headquarters at Qumran under the leadership of the unnamed "Teacher of Righteousness," believed in complete separation, abjuring the rationalism of the Sadducees and the materialism of the Pharisees. Such were the offshoots of "the people who know their God."

33 During the persecution by Antiochus, the patriot leaders would preach to their fearful countrymen stirring messages of repentance and wholehearted commitment to the holy standards of the law of Moses and of the prophets, who upheld their sanctity during the ensuing centuries. They would summon their people to trust in the promises and power of the Lord instead of bowing to the demands of the pagan tyrant. Thus "those who are wise" would engage in a ministry of education and evangelism among their own countrymen, urging them first to get back to God and to pattern their lives according to Scripture. Then they were to answer the call to arms and hazard their very lives for the liberation of their land from the yoke of their God-hating persecutor. Yet the patriot leaders would have to endure great hardships and danger, and many would lose their lives and property, as the tyrant's forces turned their swords against them.

These predictions were fulfilled in 168 B.C., when the standard of revolt was raised by Mattathias, the leading priest in the city of Modein, located in the hills of Ephraim. After killing the officer of Antiochus who had come to enforce the new decree concerning idolatrous worship, Mattathias and his five sons (John Gaddis, Simon Thassi, Judas Maccabaeus, Eleazar Avaran, and Jonathan Aphus) led a guerrilla band that fled to the hills (1Mc 2:23–28) and attracted many adherents from other cities in the Judean province. A large number of the original patriots died in their first engagement with the king's troops because they refused to fight in their own defense on the Sabbath, the day on which they were attacked (1Mc 2:38). But revising their policy after this tragic slaughter, they decided to fight even on the Sabbath, if compelled to do so. Then they engaged in vigorous attacks on all their fellow Jews who had bowed to Antiochus's ordinance and forsaken their God. Not long afterward Mattathias died, entrusting the leadership of the Israelite forces to his own capable sons.

Judas Maccabaeus (originally he alone received the title "Hammer") assumed the military leadership and gained a brilliant victory over the forces of Apollonius, whom he slew in battle. Judas's second triumph involved routing an even larger army under Seron. A third army of formidable proportions came down from Syria under Lysias, Antiochus's deputy, equipped with a fearsome elephant corps. Thanks to the heroism of Judas's brother Eleazar, who managed to plunge his sword into an elephant's chest before it fell on him and crushed him to death, even this mighty host was put to flight by the Maccabean military forces. So the Maccabees fulfilled the predictions (cf. Mic 4:12–13; Zec 9:13; 10:8–9).

34 Presumably the "little help" refers to the relatively small numbers of compatriots who joined the Maccabean troops after the early successes of the original guerrilla band. They saw how they kept on fighting with great courage against overwhelming odds, even though they soon lost Mattathias and many of their first leaders. And then, because one Seleucid army after another fell before their onslaught, the Maccabean troops were able to intimidate many of their fellow citizens who had previously held back from the conflict. Particularly when the Hasidim began to round up those who had collaborated with the Seleucids and put them to death (1Mc 2:42) and Judas himself hunted out those in the various cities who had deserted Scriptural standards ("the lawless," as Maccabees calls them), goodly numbers of insincere followers attached themselves to the patriot cause, hoping to save their own skins. Such supporters, however, proved to be of more help to the enemy than to the cause of freedom when later invasions were launched against them by the successors of Antiochus Epiphanes after his death in 164.

35 The account of the Maccabean uprising concludes with a strong emphasis on the spiritual meaning of this heroic struggle for those who risked their lives for the survival of the commonwealth of Israel. In the first instance, v.35 refers to the terrible reverse that overtook the pitifully outnumbered army of Judas himself at the battle of Mount Azotus in 161. He chose to die bravely in battle rather than save his life through a strategic retreat (1Mc 9:1–19). After he had won this victory for King Demetrius I in 161, Bacchides followed it up with a systematic search for all Judas's leaders and supporters and did his best to wipe them out. But it was not long before the tide turned and Jonathan, Judas's brother, was able to defeat the Syrian forces and compel them to retreat to Antioch. Thus the cause of freedom was maintained through vicissitudes of defeat and success, till finally a strong Jewish kingdom was founded by John Hyrcanus, son of Simon Maccabaeus (135–105), and enlarged to its fullest extent by his warlike son Alexander Jannaeus (104–78 B.C.).

D. The Latter-Day Counterpart Persecution (11:36–39)

36–39 With the conclusion of the preceding pericope at v.35, the predictive material that incontestably applies to the Hellenistic empires and the contest between the Seleucids and the Jewish patriots ends. Verses 36–39 contain some features that hardly apply to Antiochus IV, though most of the details could apply to him as well as to his latter-day antitype, "the Beast." All of ch. 11 to this point contains strikingly accurate predictions of the whole sweep of events from the reign of Cyrus (during which Daniel brought his career to a close) to the unsuccessful effort of Antiochus Epiphanes to stamp out the Jewish faith. This pattern of prediction and fulfillment is compelling evidence of the divine inspiration and authority of the Hebrew Scriptures, since only God could possibly foreknow the future and see to it that his plan would be precisely fulfilled as foretold by a prophet of God more than 360 years in advance.

Verse 36 contains material that can be applied to Antiochus IV as well as material that cannot be applied to him: "The king will do as he pleases [cf. 8:4; 11:3; 11:16—the latter two refer to Alexander and Antiochus the Great, respectively]. He will exalt and magnify himself above every god [hardly demonstrable of Antiochus, as we shall see] and will say unheard-of things against the God of gods [as Antiochus blasphemed against the Lord]. He will be successful until the time of wrath is completed [presumably referring to the wrath of God, who decreed this tribulation as a punishment for sin, possibly referring to the time between the desecration of the temple in 168 and its rededication in 164]." Yet as these words stand, they seem equally if not more appropriate to Christ's statement in Mt 24:21–22 predicting the Tribulation.

Although Antiochus entitled himself "God Manifest" on his coins, this is not necessarily tantamount to "magnifying himself above every god." In fact, he placed a statue, not of himself, but of Zeus Olympius (or possibly Jupiter Capitolinus), as the cult image in the Jerusalem temple, just as he represented Zeus enthroned on the reverse side of his coins, adorned with the title of Nikephoros ("Victory-winner"). Antiochus was evidently loyal to the Greek religious tradition that revered the entire Olympian set of gods.

The first clause of v.37—"He will show no regard for the gods of his fathers"—hardly fits Antiochus either. On the contrary, he compelled his Jewish subjects to worship the god of his fathers on pain of death. This statement seems more appropriate for a dictator of our modern age or the last days. The words "He will show no regard . . . for the one desired by women" are difficult. Some commentators see here an allusion to Tammuz or Adonis, the object of a special cult practiced by women from the second millennium B.C. and continued till the time of Antiochus. Yet there is no evidence in the historical records that Antiochus ever opposed or forbade this ancient practice. More literally the phrase reads "the love of women" or, better, "the desire of women," perhaps pointing to the cruelty Antiochus showed toward all of the women he was involved with.

The phrase "the gods [or 'God'] of his fathers"(v.37) might refer to the true God, who generally is referred to in the plural (though with a singular verb or adjective). Some commentators (esp. dispensational) take this phrase to refer to the God of the Hebrews and therefore deduce that the Antichrist himself will be an apostate Jew. While elsewhere in the OT the phrase "the God of your fathers" does indeed refer to the Lord himself, it does not necessarily follow that the Antichrist is a Jew, unless it can be demonstrated (as it surely cannot be) that the pagans never worshiped the god or gods (the plural would be more likely than the singular in the case of the heathen) of their own fathers.

Verse 37 emphasizes that this little horn will have no regard for any god. This hardly applies to Antiochus either, who exalted Zeus on the reverse side of his coinage and did everything to compel his Jewish subjects to sacrifice and bow down to his heathen gods. This therefore could only apply to his eschatological antitype, the Beast of the last days—who apparently will be an atheistic or ungodly dictator. Whether or not the Beast concedes the existence of gods in theory, he will certainly exalt himself above them in conducting his government. He will represent himself as the incarnation of the power and the will of the gods, if such there be. Thus there will be no appeal from his will to the will of heavenly deities who might outrank him or sit in judgment over him.

It is clear from v.38, however, that the Beast will not exclude all practice of religion: "Instead of them [i.e., the gods of his fathers], he will honor a god of fortresses; a god unknown to his fathers he will honor." This hardly refers to the well-known devotion Antiochus showed toward Zeus Olympius, for Zeus Olympius was certainly a god of his fathers. Rather, if this prediction relates to Antiochus, it would apply to some Roman deity whose cult he embraced as a youth while a hostage at Rome. Possibly this is a reference to Jupiter Capitolinus, the patron god of Rome itself, whose powerful protection Antiochus may have sought. In that case, he may have equated Zeus Olympius with Jupiter Capitolinus, as the deity to whom he dedicated the Jerusalem temple in 168 B.C.

But it must be conceded that "god of fortresses" does not clearly point to Capitolinus, and so this whole interpretation is thoroughly conjectural. Yet it is worth pointing out that the offering of votive gifts of silver, gold, and precious stones sounds more like an ancient, pre-Christian setting than a modern religious practice, except perhaps in the older traditions of medieval Christianity.

Verse 39 continues the account of the little horn and his conquests. Presumably this "foreign god" is the same one mentioned in v.38, even though the definite article is missing before "god." The application of this verse to Antiochus is hardly clear. Some take this in a completely futuristic sense.

E. The Triumph and Fall of Antichrist (11:40–45)

40 It is utterly hopeless to try to tie the details of the final paragraph of this chapter into the known career of Antiochus Epiphanes. As we have seen vv.36–39 contain important features irreconcilable with Antiochus. And from v.40 on there is the greatest contrast between his career and that of the little horn, whose end is here described. Furthermore, the shift of scene to the last days seems to be doubly emphasized by the introductory words "At the time of the end" (lit., "And in the end time"). The transition between v.35 and v.36 is not so clearly indicated, for the latter verse is simply introduced with a Hebrew connective (lit., "Then the king will do as he pleases").

On the analogy of the struggle between the Ptolemies of Egypt and the Seleucids of Syria, we might expect to see in the final Near Eastern struggle a contest between a bloc of nations allied with Egypt, including Libya and Nubia (or Sudan) referred to in v.43, and a Syrian coalition, comprising a league of Middle Eastern nations. Yet if the antitype of Antiochus Epiphanes is referred to by the title "king of the North," which was applied to the Seleucid kings in the earlier narrative, then we cannot be altogether certain that we are dealing with a ruler located in either Syrian Damascus or Antioch (a city now under Turkish control). It may be that the eschatological counterpart is actually an Italian leader. The "ruler who will come" (9:26) will have to be a Roman or be somehow connected with the latter-day revival of the Roman Empire. The historical Roman Empire was mainly centered around the Mediterranean with its capital in Italy; so there is a good possibility that "the ruler who will come" will be from Europe rather than from the Near East. This is not beyond dispute, however, since at least one emperor of Rome, Elegabalus, was a Syrian or Phoenician; he reigned A.D. 218–22 and was succeeded by his cousin Severus Alexander, who was also Syrian or Phoenician, having been born in Acre.

The political cause of the clash between the two superpowers and their allies is not indicated, but the large amount of troops and armaments is clearly implied by the "chariots," "cavalry," and "fleet of ships." Presumably the warfare will be carried on by modern instruments of warfare—though to communicate with Daniel's generation, ancient equivalents are used here. Likewise, the ancient names of the countries or states occupying the region where the final conflict will be carried on are used in the prediction, though most of those political units will no longer bear these names in the last days. Edom, Moab, Ammon, Assyria, and Babylon have long since ceased to exist as political entities, their places having been taken by later peoples occupying their territory.

"He will invade many countries and sweep through them like a flood" suggests the kind of spectacular success the Nazis had early in World War II. It also indicates that a large number of smaller, weaker nations will be drawn into the conflict between the two great powers of the North and the South and that Antichrist in particular will extend his authority with irresistible power.

41 This verse focuses on the Holy Land, the focal point for this terrible war. Israel will be ravaged by Antichrist's forces, as will many surrounding states, except those in the area of present-day Jordan, which for some unexplained reason (possibly because of their willing collaboration against Israel) will be spared from invasion. The "Beautiful Land" refers to the Holy Land from the standpoint of its special favor in the eyes of God rather than because of its natural beauty.

42–45 Apparently the king of the South will suffer defeat at the hands of Antichrist ("the king of the North," v.40), even though he had at first felt strong enough to initiate the conflict with the king of the North. Egypt will at last be defeated (v.42), whether or not it is completely and permanently added to Antichrist's realm. He will go on to capture all the reserves of silver and gold locked up in their vaults (v.43). Their loyal allies, the Libyans to the west and the Nubians (or Sudanese) to the south, will also be subjugated by him. At last his triumph over the powerful antagonists to the south will be consummated. But his satisfaction over this will be short-lived because (v.44) news of trouble in the Middle East will bring him out of Egypt in a fury to crush his opponents in Palestine. There, perhaps in the vicinity of Megiddo, he will encamp "between the seas" (v.45, i.e., the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean), within easy striking distance of Jerusalem itself. "The beautiful holy mountain" is Moriah, where the temple stood.

Verse 45 ends with an abrupt obituary: "Yet he will come to his end, and no one will help him." At the moment when Antichrist seems to be sweeping away all opposition, disaster overtakes him, like that which will overtake the pillaging and raping attackers of the Holy City (cf. Zec 14:12–3; Rev 19:19–20; cf. also Rev 16:16). This prediction of the location of the death of the Antichrist of Da 11:36–45 eliminates the figure of Antiochus Epiphanes, who died in Persia, after an unsuccessful raid on a temple in Elymais. There is no way the details of vv.40–45 can be fitted into the career of Antiochus Epiphanes.

XII. The Tribulation and Final Triumph of God's People (12:1–13)

A. The Great Tribulation (12:1)

1 "At that time" refers to the fortunes of God's covenant people during the career of Antichrist. The closing verses of ch. 11 deal exclusively with his military and political career, described in broad and general outline. But his internal policy toward the community of God's people within his empire has not been referred to thus far. Here we are told that it will be characterized by brutal oppression and persecution surpassing anything Israel—or perhaps any other nation—has ever experienced. Jesus enlarged on this prediction in the Olivet Discourse (see Mt 24:21), quite evidently taking this prophecy in Daniel as relating to the last days.

Michael is described as "the great prince who protects your people [lit.,who stands beside your people]" through this time of horror. Apparently God has assigned the special protection of his people to this mighty champion, and he will have a key part in protecting the people of Christ in the last days (Rev 17:6).

The faithful believers who are preserved through this harrowing ordeal are referred to as those whose names are "found written in the book." Evidently "the Book of Life" (cf. Ex 32:33) is the roster of professing believers who stand in covenant relationship with God, though apostates among them may have their name removed from this list (cf. Ps 69:28; see also Mal 3:16 and esp. Rev 20:12–15). Jesus himself was conscious of this heavenly register (Lk 10:20). Comparing these references, we find that the Book of Life contains the names of both the "elect" and those who profess faith in Christ but by their lives deny the authority and will of God. These latter will be deleted from the list of the redeemed.

In what sense will all those whose names are "found written" in the Lord's book "be delivered"? Will they be exempt from martyrdom at the hands of the Beast during the Great Tribulation? Probably not, since a great many of the true believers even back in the days of the Maccabean revolt were compelled to lay down their lives. The context of this passage seems to be definitely referring to the end times; and v.2 clearly refers to those who have already died but attain to the resurrection from the dead. They are delivered from the power of Satan and the curse of the "second death" (Rev 21:8).

B. The Resurrection and Judgment (12:2–3)

2 Those involved in the raising of the dead are said to "sleep in the dust of the earth"—i.e., they have experienced physical death (the first death implied in Rev 20:4–6) and have been buried. Yet they do not experience annihilation or a permanent imprisonment in the bonds of death so far as their body is concerned. That they will be awakened from "the dust of the earth" definitely points to bodily resurrection, not simply a renewal of the soul. They will then enter the next phase of their existence according to their faith or unbelief in their earthly life.

Resurrection is universal, whether believers or unbelievers, whether saved or lost. But in contrast to the resurrection of the saved, the resurrection of the unsaved will be neither a blessing nor a deliverance (cf. Jn 5:28–29). The unsaved will be exposed to "shame" and "contempt" (cf. Rev 20:11–15).

The word for "everlasting" (GK 6409) originally meant "lifetime," "era," or "age." When used of God, it takes on the connotation of endlessness (i.e., eternity; cf. Ps 90:2). Some thus argue that punishment in hell is only for a "lifetime" or "age." But if hell is not eternal, neither is God; for the same Hebrew and Greek words are used for both (cf. Rev 4:10; 20:10; 21:8).

3 At the judgment seat of Christ (cf. Isa 11:3 and Ro 2:16 for the identity of the Judge) the faithful children of God will be robed in the shining garments of their Redeemer's righteousness. True believers are here described as "those who are wise" and "those who lead many to righteousness." The term for "wise" (GK 8505) connotes acting sensibly or appropriately in view of the holy will of God and of the final day of judgment beyond the grave.

The parallel expression—"those who lead many to righteousness"—indicates that the fruit of a Christ-centered life is new believers won to the Lord. These faithful soul winners "will shine ... like the stars for ever and ever." He who will come like "a star ... out of Jacob" (Nu 24:17) will see his glory reflected in his followers.

Verses 2–3 clearly affirm the doctrines of resurrection and of eternity. The OT too embraces the expectation of resurrection glory (cf. Job 19:26; Pss 17:15; 73:23–24; Isa 25:8). In a sense the assurance of resurrection and eternal life is the capstone of OT revelation.

C. The Sealed Prophecies (12:4)

4 In the ancient Near East important documents were "closed up" and "sealed." The original document was kept in a secure place ("closed up") to conserve the interests and rights of all parties to the transaction. In Mesopotamian cultures these "documents" were clay tablets whose veracity was attested to by the cylinder seals the scribes rolled over the bottom section of the tablets. Once a document was thus sealed, it became official and unchangeable. The second tablet, the official copy, likewise was witnessed to by seal. Daniel was to certify by his personal seal to the faithfulness of the foregoing text as an exact transcript of what God had communicated to him through his angel. Thus this record would be preserved to the day when all the predictions would be fulfilled.

"Will go here and there" depicts movement like the strokes of an oar or a swimmer's arms. The verb stem connotes an intensity that may imply eagerness in moving quickly and excitedly back and forth. Here the meaning seems to be that many of God's people who pay heed to these prophetic sayings will eagerly seek to understand how they are presently being fulfilled or how they are going to be fulfilled in the future. As the predictions concerning the Persian and Greek kings are carried out during the fourth, third, and second centuries B.C., and those referring to the Roman conquest during the first century, so the distinction between the typical tribulation under Antiochus Epiphanes and the antitypical Great Tribulation in the end time will become clear. From this standpoint the knowledge of Bible students greatly increased between the time of Daniel's sixth-century contemporaries and the period of Jerome, whose epoch-making commentary appeared around A.D. 400. Since Jerome's time there has been a corresponding increase of knowledge, especially with the rise of archaeology and the knowledge of ancient linguistics, to say nothing of the amazing developments leading up to the return of the Jewish people to their ancestral land since 1948.

D. The Prediction of the Three and One-Half Years (12:5–7)

5–7 On either side of the Tigris River (cf. 10:4), Daniel saw two "others," i.e., other angels besides the one who had been addressing him since 10:11. These two angels were personally interested in coming events in God's program of redemption (cf. Zec 1:12–13; 2:3–4; 1Pe 1:12). One angel asked the man in linen how long it would be till the remarkable prediction concerning the Antichrist (ch. 11) would be fulfilled. The man in linen, with a solemn oath and raised hands, said that the time interval would be "a time, times and half a time" (i.e., three and a half years), at the time when the power of the "holy people" of the end time would be broken. Apparently Antichrist will harass them to the point of utter defeat and extinction; then God will intervene in a mighty judgment on the invaders, and they will be utterly destroyed (cf. Zec 14:3). The three and a half years referred to here, which is exactly one-half the full seven years of the seventieth week in 9:27, would be the second half since it ends (in all probability) with the destruction of the Beast at the Battle of Armageddon.

E. The Final Commission to Daniel (12:8–13)

8–9 Daniel, confused by these predictions, asked for clarification of the mystifying prophecies, doubtless concerning the people of God whose power was to be "broken." The angel did not directly answer Daniel's question. Although the implication of victorious survival comes through quite clearly at the close of v.13, the answer of the angel relates to the faithful completion and custody of the prophetic scroll itself.

10 During this intervening period of time, the people of God will be refined in their faith and purified in their motivation through the testings that they will endure. Moreover, the unbelieving world will not improve as a result of the testimony of the faithful but will increase in wickedness (cf. 2Ti 3:13; Rev 22:11). So we read that "none of the wicked will understand," though those who are "wise" in the Scriptures will comprehend quite fully what is going on during these times.

11–12 Verse 7 has supplied the approximate figure of three and a half years (i.e., 1,278 days; see comments at 9:24–26) for the length of the second, more intense phase of the Great Tribulation. But it appears from v.11 that the interval between the setting up of the "abomination that causes desolation" (subsequent to the abrogation of the covenant between Antichrist and Israel) and the final deliverance of Jerusalem from his hosts will come out more exactly to 12 more days than that, or a total of 1,290 days. For beleaguered saints enduring the horrors of the end time, the precise knowledge of the exact day of deliverance (cf. Mt 24:22) will be of great reassurance.

Verse 12 is one of the most enigmatic statements in this chapter. Between 1,290 and 1,335 days there is an interval of 45 days, or a month and a half. What is destined to take place in that short period can only be conjectured. It may be the time when the thousand-year earthly rule of Christ will be officially inaugurated, as he takes his seat on David's throne. The intervening time may well be devoted to repairing the devastation and burying the bodies left by the Armageddon campaign (cf. Eze 39:12). The believers who survive to that day and share in the glory of Jesus' coronation on earth are here acclaimed as "blessed" (GK 897). They are about to become citizens of the most wonderful society governed by the most wonderful ruler in all human history—the millennial kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ!

13 The final verse of the book contains an encouraging word for the aged Daniel: "You will rest [i.e., his body will rest in the grave] and then at the end of the days you will rise [on the day of resurrection] to receive your allotted inheritance." Revelation 20:4 speaks of "thrones on which were seated those who had been given authority to judge." Then it goes on to say that those who died as martyrs will at that time "come to life" and reign with Christ a thousand years. Surely Daniel will be outstanding among the galaxy of judges and kings. Yet it is also true that those of us who are sincere and obedient believers will have a part in the supernatural glory of the Son of Man himself, who will assume supreme control over the entire earth (cf. Isa 11:9b; Zec 9:10b).

Hosea

INTRODUCTION

1. Historical Background

Hosea, prophet to the northern kingdom of Israel, ministered in the stirring days just preceding the Fall of Assyria. When he began his work, one would not have thought the end was near. Jeroboam II (793–753 B.C.; cf. 2Ki 14:23–29) was the ruler, and a strong one. He had established approximately the same boundaries on the east and north of his country that had been held in the empire days of David and Solomon. This success had given him a remarkable position of influence along the entire Mediterranean coastland. Similarly, Uzziah, king of Judah, a contemporary of Jeroboam for thirty-seven years, had expanded his territory to a size nearly that of the southern boundary in the earlier period. Together Israel and Judah almost reduplicated the area held by Israel's two greatest rulers.

Before the accession of Jeroboam II, the situation had been quite a different one. Because of military attacks by Assyria and Syria, Israel had been brought to abject humiliation. During the reign of Jehoahaz (Jeroboam's grandfather), the strength of Israel's army had fallen to only "fifty horsemen, ten chariots and ten thousand foot soldiers." The king of Syria had 'destroyed the rest, and made them like the dust at threshing time" (2Ki 13:7). Recovery had begun with Jeroboam's father, Jehoash, who had defeated the Syrians three times (2Ki 13:25). Jeroboam had then been able to continue this resurgence and bring the country to the strong position noted.

Because of this recovery, Hosea's generation knew of humiliating defeat and foreign oppression only through the memories of their fathers. By this time there had been peace for many years, and with it had come economic prosperity. The land was again producing abundantly (2Ch 26:10), and many people were becoming wealthy. Luxuries had become common. Building activity was flourishing (Hos 8:14), which led to a widespread feeling of pride (Am 3:15; 5:11; cf. Isa 9:10). Social and moral conditions developed that were wrong and degrading. Side by side with wealth, extreme poverty existed. Through dishonest gain and false balances, the strong took advantage of the weak (Hos 12:7; cf. Isa 5:8; Am 8:5–6). Justice seemed absent, and the courts apparently did little to help.

Religious conditions were no better. Though the pagan cult of Baal, brought into the land during the dynasty of Omri (1Ki 16:29–33), had been largely brought to an end (2Ki 10:19–28), many of its offensive features continued (Hos 2:8; 11:2; 13:1). Apparently sacred prostitution was still practiced (4:10–18). Also, the people still built "high places" and set up images and Asherah poles "on every high hill and under every spreading tree" (2Ki 17:7–12).

Amos had preceded Hosea in preaching against such sins, but the people paid little attention. Now it was Hosea's turn, and he courageously spoke out against the evils of the day.

After the reign of Jeroboam II, Israel's political fortunes declined rapidly. His son and successor, Zechariah (753 B.C.; cf. 2Ki 15:8–12), was killed by Shallum after reigning only six months. Shallum was in turn killed by Menahem after a rule of only one month (2Ki 15:13–15). Menahem (752–742 B.C.; cf. 2Ki 15:17–22) then ruled for ten years. The series of brief reigns resumed when his son Pekahiah (742–740 B.C.; cf. 2Ki 5:23–26) was killed by Pekah, one of his military leaders. Pekah was able to keep the throne for twenty years, until 732 B.C., with an overlapping reign of twelve years, from 752–740 (2Ki 15:27). His rule was marred by the crushing invasion of Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria in 733 B.C. The next Assyrian king, Shalmaneser V, marched into the region in 724 B.C. and put Samaria, its capital, under siege. The strong city held out for many months. Finally, however, when it capitulated in 722 B.C., many more Israelites were taken captive; and the sovereign days of Israel as a nation were over.

2. Authorship and Date

The author of this first book of the Minor Prophets was Hosea, son of Beeri (Hos 1:1). The book contains convincing evidence that he was a prophet to the northern kingdom of Israel. While occasionally mentioning Judah, his messages were directed mainly to Israel. Hosea refers to the ruler in Samaria as "our king" (7:5); and he uses a number of Aramaisms, suggesting that the Aramaic-speaking state of Syria immediately to the north had a close influence on Israel.

Hosea dates his ministry by listing four kings of Judah (Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah) and one of Israel (Jeroboam II), thus indicating his recognition that the Davidic line in Judah was the only legitimate one (2Sa 7:12–13). There are few clues to the date of his prophecies. For one thing, they were not given at the same time. The words about Hosea's marriage and also the earliest prophecies must have been delivered prior to the death of Jeroboam II, because in 1:4 Hosea refers to the coming vengeance on the "house of Jehu" (of which Jeroboam was a member). This came with the assassination of Jeroboam's son Zechariah six months after he began to reign (2Ki 15:8–12). Besides this, there are the references to contact with Assyria (e.g., 5:13; 8:9; 12:1), which point to the time of Menahem, who did negotiate with Tiglath-pileser III (2Ki 15:19–20). Finally, in 7:11 there is the reference to Israel's dealing with Egypt and Assyria, which suggests that it was written in the days when Egypt was pitted by Israel against Assyria.

Hosea himself lived till the reign of Hezekiah (728–686 B.C.). Because he did not specifically refer to Samaria's fall to the Assyrians in 722 B.C., he probably had completed his writing before that time, but he certainly witnessed the fall of the northern kingdom. As there is no indication that he was taken captive, he doubtless remained in the land. His ministry was a long one, extending at least from 753 to 715 B.C.

3. Hosea's Marriage

The marriage of Hosea has occasioned much discussion. In ch. 1, the Lord commanded him to take "an adulterous wife and children of unfaithfulness." In ch. 3, the Lord told Hosea to love a woman though she was an adulteress. Hosea did this and made a payment of money and barley. The different views regarding the marriage may be divided into four principal types. The Hypothetical marriage view sees the marriage as never happening but understands it as either a vision or an allegory symbolic of the relation of God to unfaithful Israel. The Literal marriage with Gomer unchaste view holds that the marriage did occur and that Gomer was already an unchaste person, possibly a temple prostitute. The Spiritual infidelity view is that the situation is one of spiritual rather than physical infidelity. Gomer became unchaste because, like the Israelites of Hosea's day, she became a worshiper of false gods.

The preferred view is the Literal marriage with Gomer chaste view, which holds that the marriage did indeed occur but that Gomer was chaste when married and only became adulterous later. Gomer was not a harlot at the time Hosea married her. Thus the ethical problem of his marrying an acknowledged harlot would not have existed. Perhaps the most convincing reason in favor of the preferred view is that it implies a significant parallel between Hosea's marriage and God's experience with Israel (cf. 1:2, 67, 9; 2:2–13). In the OT Israel is presented as having been chaste when espoused by God in the wilderness (Jer 2:2–3). Again and again God extended his love toward Israel, but she continually proved unfaithful herself to him.

4. Theological Values

The central thought of Hosea concerns God's covenant with Israel that the people had broken. God had loved his people and called them his "son" (11:1; cf. Ex 4:22). Through the passing years, however, they had wandered away from God; and the more he had called after them, the further they went from him (11:2). They fell deep into sin, breaking the covenant God had graciously made with them. Hosea repeatedly describes the sins committed both by the people (4:1–2, 9–19; 6:4–11; et al.) and by the religious leaders (4:5–10). He used the forceful illustration of his unhappy marriage relationship to impress these truths on the minds of his readers.

Hosea's principal significance lies in his sounding the call for Israel to repent of their sins. Other prophets, such as Elijah and Elisha, had given earlier warnings. But Hosea's warning was the last one. God had been patient, but that patience was wearing thin and crushing punishment would soon be necessary. This punishment would come in the form of desolation of the land (4:3; 5:1–15) and exile for the people.

The prophet included a note of joy in this otherwise somber picture. Israel's future punishment would not spell the end; it would be followed by a glad time of restoration. Hosea characterized this time as one of true repentance on the part of the people (6:1–3) and of rich blessing at the hand of God (cf. 1:10; 2:14–15).

EXPOSITION

I. Israel's Infidelity Illustrated (1:1–3:5)

A. Historical Setting (1:1)

1 This verse concerns matters of the historical background of this prophecy (cf. Introduction).

B. Marriage and Children of Hosea (1:2–9)

2 For a discussion of "an adulterous wife," see Introduction. "Children of unfaithfulness" (lit., "of harlotries") means children who would become like their mother. Often the influence of parents will have this kind of result in their children. That the nation was "guilty of the vilest adultery in departing from the LORD" sets forth the parallel between Hosea's marriage and God's relation to Israel. Gomer was chaste at the time of her marriage but became unfaithful after her marriage; similarly, Israel became unfaithful after God chose her, and her descendants then followed in the same pattern of life.

3 Hosea obeyed God's command and married Gomer, though this was certainly not easy, knowing what Gomer would become. The text makes clear that the son that was now born was a proper son of the new marriage.

4 Three children were born to Hosea and Gomer, and each was given a symbolic name. "Jezreel" (the city where Jehu slaughtered the "house of Ahab," 2Ki 9:7–10:28) looks to a future day when "the blood" Jehu then shed would be avenged. Although Jehu had done well in carrying out God's directive (2Ki 9:1–10), he had sinned in killing more people than God had intended. The punishment for Jehu's sin was to be the cessation of Israel as a nation (which occurred in 722 B.C.).

5 The bow symbolized power; thus a broken bow symbolized the loss of power. The "Valley of Jezreel" lay north of the city of Jezreel. To the west it merged into the Esdraelon Valley, both scenes of major battles through history. The prediction here is that this valley would see a significant stage in Israel's final defeat, which came mainly in the campaign of Tiglath-pileser III (cf. Introduction).

6 "Lo-Ruhamah" means "not loved." Prophetically, God would no longer show love to Israel but would bring judgment on her. The reason Israel had continued this long was that God had favored them. "I should at all forgive them" may also be rendered "I will utterly take them away [GK 5951]," suggesting the idea that "I will no longer show love toward the nation of Israel, but will instead violently carry her away in judgment."

7 God would no more show love to Israel; yet he would continue to show love to Judah. These words were probably written during the reign of Uzziah in Judah—a "good" king (2Ki 15:3; 2Ch 26:4), the third of four "good" kings (Joash, Amaziah, Uzziah, Jotham). That God referred to himself by name ("the LORD their God") shows his desire to impress on Israel the name of their true God, whom they had forgotten. Judah's hope was fixed in the Lord and therefore Judah would be spared.

8–9 That Gomer had her third child after the second was weaned is a detail that shows the narrative is historical and not allegorical or spiritual. "Lo-Ammi" means "not my people." The people had departed from the Lord, going after other gods. Therefore Israel was disowned by God as his people; he would no longer be their God. The name Lo-Ruhamah spoke of not being loved; Lo-Ammi speaks of being fully disowned.

C. A Future Day of Hope (1:10–2:1)

10 Though in Hosea's day God was disclaiming the Israelites as his people, in a day to come God would make their number "like the sand on the seashore." God would carry out his promise to Abraham (Ge 22:17) despite the unfaithfulness of the people (cf. Ro 9:26).

11 By speaking of both the "people of Judah and the people of Israel," Hosea makes clear that the time of future hope would involve both nations. That the two peoples "will be reunited, and they will appoint one leader" is a clue to the identification of the hoped-for day. After the Babylonian exile, Israel was no longer divided into two nations, but they never attained true autonomy until May 1948. Another clue to the hoped-for day is found in the identity of "the land," which is best seen as Egypt, symbolizing the nations throughout the world among which the Israelites would be dispersed (cf. Dt 28:68; cf. 2:14–15). So this twentieth century has seen thousands of people returning to Palestine from this collective "land."

The statement "great will be the day of Jezreel" indicates that the day will in some sense be outstanding, and something will justify its being called "the day of Jezreel." In 2:22–23 Jezreel stands for Israel in the sense of the nation's being "sown" in the land by God for her rebirth and multiplication. This implies that the coming day would be "great" because it would see the nation reborn for a time of glory.

2:1 Hosea sets forth the spiritual relation between God and Israel in the future day of hope, which contrasts with his own day. At present that relationship was symbolized by the names Lo-Ruhamah and Lo-Ammi ("not loved" and "not my people"); but in the future day the appropriate names will be "my people" and "my loved one." "My people" is related to "brothers" and "my loved one" to "sisters" only because Lo-Ammi was a son's name and Lo-Ruhamah a daughter's (1:8–9).

D. Israel, the Adulterous Spouse (2:2–13)

2 Although the language of this section applies in good part to Hosea's unfaithful wife, it is primarily intended for Israel. The verb translated "rebuke" (GK 8189) means basically "to contend or strive." Here the meaning is to "strive with your mother in rebuke" for her life of sin. The mother is Israel as a nation, and the children are individual Israelites. Thus Israelites were being urged to call for their nation to return to faithful living before God.

The statement "she is not my wife" implies that Hosea had disowned his wife (see 3:1). Likewise God had disowned Israel, expressed in the symbolic name Lo-Ammi (1:9). The reference to her "breasts" may imply that she had laid bare her bosom to entice her lovers. So Israel, having turned from her own true God, was guilty of unblushing idolatry and voluptuous service to false gods.

3 If Israel did not change, she would be made as she was at birth—a naked, helpless child. The time of infancy was Israel's experience in the wilderness after the Exodus. God protected Israel at that time, but she herself would be like that parched and desolate land if she did not return to him.

4–5 Again Hosea draws a distinction between mother and children. The former again refers to the nation as a whole; the latter to individual Israelites. Israel as a nation was guilty and deserving of punishment, but so were individual Israelites. "Love" (GK 8163) would be shown to neither. "Children of adultery" refers to those who are called children because they practiced the sins of their mother (cf. 1:2).

The quotation in v.5 attributed to Israel, the Lord's unfaithful wife, applies equally to Gomer, Hosea's wife. As she was running after "lovers" who would give gifts to her, so Israel was running after the false gods of the surrounding nations. From these nations Israel was receiving gifts, which were no doubt the result of trade agreements. So the desire for trading benefits led Israel into going after other gods.

6 God threatened to keep her lovers from her by blocking "her path with thornbushes." In fact, he would use them to wall her in. The thornbushes symbolize all the warfare and hardship that God permitted to come on Israel in the following years (cf. Introduction; also Job 3:23; 19:8).

7 Though Israel's path would be blocked, she would still try to "chase after her lovers" in futility. "My husband as at first" is a reference to God. Israel, frustrated in chasing false gods, would finally recognize the supremacy of her own God, realizing that she was better off when following him than when pursuing strange gods. Only in the last days will Israel fully return to her "first husband."

8 The reason for Israel's unfaithfulness is that the people did not recognize God as the source of their benefits. They had used much silver and gold for images of false gods (e.g., Baal). Jehu had done much to eliminate Baal worship (2Ki 10:19-28), but it still persisted.

9 As a result of Israel's idolatry, God would punish her by taking away the "grain when it ripens," the "new wine when it is ready," and wool and linen. That is, because of their sin, the people would lack food and clothing (probably by rain being withheld).

10 "Expose her lewdness" is literally "uncover her shame" ("shame" means "withered state"; GK 5578). Israel would wither because God would withhold his bounty. Her "lovers" would thus come to despise her, not wanting to have dealings with one so distressed. No one would "take her out of" God's control, both because they would not care to and because God would not permit it.

11 Israel would no longer enjoy her "celebrations," "festivals" (the annual festivals of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles), the monthly festival of the new moon, and the weekly Sabbaths. "Appointed feasts" probably refers to regular celebrations not covered by the other terms.

12 The "vines" and "fig trees" represent the finest of the land's products; God would destroy them because Israel had regarded them as "pay for her lovers." These would now become merely "thickets" for wild beasts to roam and eat in. In other words, the protective hedges would be taken away and cultivation stopped. These were fulfilled during Israel's last days. Her land was devastated by Assyrian forces; then, in 722 B.C., it was totally subjugated by them. God's warnings are never to be taken lightly.

13 The reason for these punishments now becomes more specific; it goes back to "the days" when Israel "burned offerings to the Baals." Such occurrences were mainly in the reign of Ahab and his sons; but even after Jehu had slaughtered the religious personnel of the Baals, idol worship continued to some degree. The remainder of the verse depicts activities of Israel in following the Baals, activities characteristic of a prostitute in her attempt to lure men.

E. The Blessing of Israel (2:14–23)

14 God, who withheld the blessings, cannot bestow them until Israel's sin has been punished. The word for "allure" (GK 7331) connotes persuasion by means of attractive benefits. The words "desert" and "Egypt" in v.15 point to a historical parallel with the time of Israel's journey from Egypt. As God persuaded Israel to leave Egypt and move on finally to the Promised Land, so in the final day he will persuade her to leave the Egypt of spiritual decline and move on to the Promised Land of blessed rest. In that day God will "speak tenderly to her" rather than in harsh words of vv.6–13.

15 In addition to speaking consolingly, God will give Israel's vineyards back to her. The Valley of Achor (cf. Jos 7:24–26) will in the future be "a door of hope." So Israel's future response in song-filled thanksgiving will be as when she entered Canaan the first time. In partial fulfillment, there was joyful praise when Israel returned from the Babylonian exile. But in the future there will be even greater praise, when the people return to their land and Christ is their king.

16 "My husband" is the symbolic name the people of God were to give him on returning to him. Israel will be spiritually revived so that she will recognize God to be her true husband and she his wife. No longer will she think of him as "my master" (lit., "my Baal").

17–18 In the coming day the Lord will remove Baal worship and all remembrance of the names of the Baals from Israel. Then God will be truly worshiped, Israel will be reconciled with God, and there will be peace on earth. The Lord will make a covenant with the beasts, the birds, and the little creatures of the ground (cf. Isa 11:6–9). Also the bow and sword (the two main weapons of war in Hosea's day) will be abolished, so that "all may lie down in safety" (cf. Isa 2:4; Mic 4:3).

19 God promises Israel that she will be betrothed to him forever. This betrothal involves several qualitative relationships, four being mentioned here: "righteousness and justice" (which indicate that all legal standards will be met in the betrothal) and "love and compassion" (which denote God's emotional concern for the new bride).

20 A fifth relationship—"faithfulness"—is also promised. The emphasis here is probably on Israel's faithfulness to God, though God's faithfulness is also present. That new relationship is no doubt the connotation of the statement "you [Israel] will acknowledge the LORD."

21–22 As a result of this beautiful coming relationship between the Lord and Israel, God will respond to the needs of the people. The skies are seen as pleading with God to send rain on the earth, to which God responds favorably; and the earth is seen as asking the heavens to send rain, and the heavens respond favorably. Hosea sees also the grain, the new wine, and the oil as asking the earth for its provisions—a request to which the earth responds favorably. Finally Jezreel is viewed as asking the grain, new wine, and oil to provide blessings, and these also respond favorably. Here "Jezreel" almost certainly means all Israel—a name that means "God plants" (cf. v.23, which clearly refers to Israel). The Valley of Jezreel was a center for production of food.

23 Israel (i.e., Jezreel), planted bountifully, will bring forth a large population (cf. 1:10–11). In contrast to Hosea's time, when the names "not loved" (Lo-Ruhamah) and "not my people" (Lo-Ammi) were appropriate (1:6, 8), the future day will find the opposite true. Love will be shown toward "Not my loved one," and "Not my people" will be called "You are my people" (cf. Ro 9:25). The Israelites, in turn, will respond, "You are my God." Thus vv.22–23 give response to all three of Gomer's children.

F. Gomer Loved Again (3:1–3)

1 After having dealt with the relations between God and Israel (1:9–2:23), the narrative now returns to the relations between Hosea and Gomer. Gomer had left Hosea following the birth of their third child. God tells his servant to take back his unfaithful wife. Gomer is called merely "woman," without a possessive suffix to indicate "your." That Hosea may have come to think of her as "some woman" would have made God's command the more difficult to carry out. But in taking her back, Hosea would be illustrating God's continuing love for Israel, who had turned to "other gods" and lusted after "raisin cakes" (delicacies of the day that represented the idolatrous worship of the Israelites).

2 It is unlikely that the price Hosea paid for Gomer was paid to her parents. After all, though estranged, Gomer was still Hosea's wife; and no payment was officially due. It was probably given to Gomer as a kind of bridal gift. The amount was not large. This gift (given as if for a new marriage) and its modest size show the emotional separation between Hosea and Gomer.

3 "Many days" points to an indefinite period of time. Hosea wanted Gomer to know that this time he intended their relationship to last indefinitely. She must resolve to live no longer as a prostitute.

G. Israel's Future Return to God (3:4–5)

For the third time in as many chapters, the future reconciliation between God and Israel is foreseen. The parallel with the Hosea/Gomer story continues.

4 Israel's time of separation from God is portrayed by her loss of three pairs of things: (1) "King or prince"; Israel will be without an autonomous rule. (2) "Sacrifice or sacred stones"; Israel will be without religious ceremonies (the "sacred stones" represent idolatrous worship, adopted from Israel's neighbors; cf. 2Ki 3:2; 10:26–28; 17:10). (3) "Ephod or idol"; the special devices used for searching into the future (cf. Ge 31:19–34; 1Sa 23:9; 30:7) will no longer be available.

5 After the "many days" of v.4, the Israelites "will return and seek the LORD their God." This will also involve seeking "David their king," and the Israelites will come "trembling" to the Lord. All this will occur in the "last days." For the complete fulfillment of these things, we must look once more to the millennial reign of Christ. The extent to which the Israelites sought God after the Babylonian captivity was limited and surely not with "trembling." While the people did cease from following false gods, their worship was cold and formal; and there was much sin among them. But in the Millennium the Jews will seek Christ (the David of the time, ruling on David's throne), and they will also truly seek after God in heaven (Isa 12:1–6; 66:23; Jer 33:11; Eze 20:40; et al.).

II. Israel's Indictment, Punishment, and Restoration (4:1–14:9)

A. Israel's Indictment (4:1–7:16)

1. A general indictment of the people (4:1–4)

1 Hosea exhorts the Israelites to listen because God was charging them with sinfulness. They were untrustworthy, failed to show compassion toward others, and lacked a true knowledge of the being and nature of God.

2–3 A list of the people's overt sins follows. The phrase "bloodshed follows bloodshed" (lit., "bloody deed touches bloody deed") suggests that violent crimes had become so common that one seemed immediately to follow another, as if touching it. These sins resulted in drought that came as a judgment, making the land dry up and the beasts and the birds "waste away" (cf. 1Ki 17–18). It had even brought death to the fish through the drying up of the streams and ponds.

4 Though conditions in Israel were shockingly bad, mutual charges and accusations could not remedy them. Accusing others only increased problems. But the people could accuse the priests, who, as vv.5–10 show, were blameworthy.

2. Sins of the priests (4:5–11a)

5 Hosea speaks directly to the priests (the mention of prophets implies that they were included in the indictment). Both groups, instead of being leaders for the right, had been stumbling day and night, committing sin. Jeroboam I had made priests "from all sorts of people" (1Ki 12:31; 13:33). Therefore, large numbers of true priests—and doubtless true prophets—had left the northern kingdom (2Ch 11:13–16). "Mother" refers to Israel (cf. 2:2–5) as the mother of individual Israelites.

6 The priests had not been teaching the people about God and his law (Dt 33:10; Eze 44:23; Mal 2:7), so the people were being "destroyed." Moreover, God removed the priests from their service because they themselves had rejected the knowledge of God and his law. The closing lines announce, in poetic format, that since they had "ignored" (GK 8894) the law, God would "ignore" their descendants.

7–8 The priests are still in view here. The greater their power became, the more they sinned. They were so given over to iniquity that Hosea said they were feeding on "the sins of" the people. This they did by enjoying the benefits of the people's sins, such as taking bribes and eating the sin offerings. As a result God would turn their "Glory" into "something disgraceful."

9 The aphorism "Like people, like priests" shows that the priests were no better than the people. Despite their priestly office, they would share the punishment of the people.

10–11a Though the priests "eat" the sins of the people, their appetite for evil remains insatiable. Though the people engage in ritual prostitution of the Canaanite fertility rites (done to enhance human and animal reproduction and to ensure good crops), they have no harvest. Israel's indulgence in these rites is a shameless example of the depth to which the people had fallen in forsaking the true God.

3. Sins of the people (4:11b–19)

11b–12 Attention turns to Israel, here called "my people." The priests had been the leaders in wrongdoing, but the people had followed them all too closely. The mention of "old wine and new" implies the sin of intoxication, which stole away the people's "understanding." Instead, they appealed for guidance to a mere "stick of wood." The "spirit of prostitution" prevalent in the land included the people and the priests (v.10). The reference to being unfaithful to their God suggests that the prostitution was primarily spiritual. The people were worshiping and looking for leading from false gods rather than from their own true God.

13 Mountaintops, hills, and groves of oak, poplar, and terebinth trees were favorite places for idolatrous worship (see Dt 12:2; Jer 2:20; 3:6; Eze 6:13). Middle Eastern religion in Hosea's time made cultic prostitution an important part of its practice; and because the Israelites had adopted other aspects of this kind of religion, their daughters and their daughters-in-law were prostituting themselves.

14 Yet even though the younger women were immoral, God would not punish them, because "the men" were consorting with harlots (the shrine prostitutes). Even-handed justice forbade punishment of the young women while the men were turning to prostitutes!

15 Though Hosea prophesied chiefly to the northern nation, here he warned the southern kingdom not to follow Israel in this abominable kind of worship. Judah must not, he declared, go either to Gilgal or Beth Aven for this purpose. Under Elijah and Elisha (2Ki 2:1; 4:38), Gilgal had been a center for prophetic instruction. Now, however, it had become a center of false worship (Hos 9:15; 12:11; Am 4:4; 5:5). Beth Aven is to be identified with Bethel (cf. Am 4:4; 5:5) and means "house of deceit"—a deliberate substitution by Hosea for Bethel ("house of God").

Bethel was the southern center of calf worship established by Jeroboam I (1Ki 12:28–29). Though God's people had been permitted to "swear" an oath in the name of the Lord (Dt 6:13; 10:20), Hosea now warned the people of Judah not to do this, probably because at this time such oaths were being sworn in connection with the false worship at Gilgal and Bethel.

16 The thought shifts back to the people of the northern nation. Hosea told them that if they acted like stubborn cows, they could not expect to be treated like obedient sheep.

17–18 The Ephraimites were the most influential tribe of the northern nation and were often referred to as representative of that nation. They were so far gone into idolatry as to have become incorrigible. They were, therefore, to be let alone till punishment came. Furthermore, as evidence of the depths of the Israelites' sin, the people are said to have continued their prostitution even after they had finished their drinks (with its lower inhibitions against sexual immorality). This was in part because "their rulers" influenced them through their love of "shameful ways."

19 The literal meaning of this verse is vivid: "A whirlwind has wrapped her [Ephraim] up in her wings," i.e., for the purpose of destruction. In other words, the people's "sacrifices will bring them shame." They will realize how ineffective their sacrifices have been, whether to false gods or to the Lord.

4. A warning to priest, people, and king (5:1–7)

1 Hosea demands attention from three groups of people: the priests (cf. ch. 4), the people of Israel, and the royal family. The "judgment" referred to is no doubt the one cited in v.2. The "snare" and the "net" were used to trap prey; and "Mizpah" of Gilead (cf. Jdg 10:17; 11:29) and Mount Tabor were likely places for hunting. The figure is of people being hurt, as if being hunted and trapped by the religious and civil leaders of the day.

2–3 That rebels were "deep in slaughter" reflects the plight of a people not only hunted but slaughtered. But God would discipline those responsible for this. The tribe of Ephraim in particular were foremost in fornication, for the Bethel altar was in their area—the center of a religion not only corrupt (see 4:10, 12) but also corrupting all Israel. God knew the whole sad story; nothing was hidden.

4 "Deeds" are the product of the state of one's heart. Because the hearts of the people desired prostitution (probably both spiritual and physical), their subsequent deeds did not allow a return to God.

5 The Israelites, steeped in the sin of idolatry, had grown arrogant against God. Ephraim, presumably the worst-offending tribe, was again singled out for censure. Judah too was indicted for wayward behavior (see vv.8–10).

6 To go with "flocks and herds to seek the LORD" means to search after God's favor through sacrifice. But without the evidence of true faith, mere outward sacrifice will not do (cf. 6:6; 1Sa 15:22–23). Thus the people find only that God "has withdrawn himself from them."

Mount Tabor (seen here from the south) was one of the larger mountains in the northern kingdom of Israel.

7 In being "unfaithful" (GK 2338; cf. Jer 3:20; Mal 2:14), the people had produced "illegitimate children." That is, parents had reared their children in their own sinful ways rather than in the fear of God. The "New Moon festivals" were debased by hypocritical worship and thus, devoid of God's blessing, would bring about the ruin of people and fields alike.

5. A warning to Ephraim and Judah (5:8–15)

8–9 Hosea next warned Judah while continuing to warn Ephraim. A "trumpet" (GK 8795) was customarily used to sound a warning of impending danger. Both Gibeah and Ramah were important cities of Benjamin, strategic points on Judah's northern border. Beth Aven is probably another reference to Bethel (see comment on 4:15). Benjamin was especially being summoned to "lead on" in the conflict. (1) Because of its geographic proximity to Israel, Benjamin had to be especially watchful of Israel's influence on her. (2) Punishment would soon descend on Ephraim, making it a "waste." When that happened, the way would be opened for the invading army to descend immediately south on Benjamin (as Assyria eventually did). The last line shows the certainty of this.

10 Next Hosea turned to the reason for the coming punishment of Judah—its leaders were "like those who move boundary stones," which was tantamount to stealing property from neighbors (cf. Dt 19:14; 27:17). Property lines, indicated often only by stone markers, could be easily moved in a night. Judah's leaders, however, were not shifting physical property lines but spiritual ones established by God, changing the boundary between right and wrong, between true and false religion, between the true God and the idols.

11 Hosea turns back to Ephraim, saying that the tribe was "oppressed" and "trampled in judgment," looking on it as an accomplished fact. The reason is that the people had been intent on pursuing "idols." What may be in view here is Jeroboam's institution of calf worship on substitute altars at Bethel and Dan (1Ki 12:27–30).

12–13 A bold figure of speech describes the judgment referred to in v.11. It was not future but already on them. The people were being eaten—as if by moths and decay—by problems and troubles. On realizing the situation, Ephraim sought help from Assyria rather than from God—perhaps the time when Menahem paid tribute to Assyria (2Ki 15:19–20; cf. 2Ki 16:5–9). Ephraim's troubles were internal ones and indeed incurable.

14 Help could not come from Assyria, for God, mightier than this foreign country, was "like a lion" in bringing destruction on both Ephraim and Judah. His justice, like his love, works inevitably, irresistibly. His chastisement, already operating through the moth-like and decaying conditions, would be greatly accentuated through the coming devastation by Assyria—the very country whose aid had been sought. Tiglath-pileser III did come against Israel in two crushing campaigns (743 and 734–732 B.C.); later (722 B.C.) Shalmaneser V did much to bring Israel's history to an end (2Ki 17). Sennacherib came against Judah in 701 B.C. (2Ki 18:17–37).

15 When the punishment has been inflicted, God will withdraw to await the desired results. The people will admit their guilt and will search out his presence. The Assyrian-Babylonian captivity witnessed little of such a change of heart. Thus the language appears to reach into the Millennium (cf. 1:10–11; 2:14–23).

6. Words of repentant Israel (6:1–3)

For three verses Hosea gives the words of Israel in the day of her repentance. Israel as a nation has never yet prayed like this.

1–2 The people urge one another to return truly to God in the confidence that he who has punished them will heal them and bind up their wounds. The reference to "two days" and "the third day" means only that the restoration will come surely and quickly (cf. Job 5:19; Pr 6:16; 30:15, 18; Am 1:3, 6, 9; et al.)

3 Again the people admonish themselves, this time to "acknowledge the LORD." True knowledge of God provides the basis for faith and obedience. The people exhort themselves to "press on" in obtaining this knowledge. And God, they can be sure, will respond to their persistence in seeking him; he will come to them as surely "as the sun rises," a coming as delightfully welcome as the "winter rains" and the "spring rains."

7. Continued indictment of the people (6:4–11)

After the inserted words of repentance, Hosea returns to his main theme of warning the people against their sin. He continues to address Ephraim and Judah. Probably, however, Ephraim is here to be understood once again as representing all Israel, not just one tribe.

4–5 In his strong indictment against both Ephraim and Judah, Hosea stresses that the love of the people for God was as unstable as the "morning mist" and "dew." The word "love" (GK 2876) connotes continued faithful love; but the people fell lamentably short when it came to sustaining it. As a result, God had sent his prophets to speak words of warning, which included predictions of doom and death. These "judgments" came clearly and ominously "like lightning" to the people.

6 The prophet sounds a note given also by the other eighth-century prophets (cf. Isa 1:11–17; Am 5:21–24; Mic 6:6–8): God desires true faith rather than empty sacrifice (cf. Mt 9:13; 12:7). This was not a denial of sacrifice as such but only of improper, faithless sacrifice. God had commanded the people to sacrifice, but the ceremony had to be marked by a proper attitude of heart; otherwise it was meaningless and worthless (cf. 5:6). The importance of "knowing God" is stressed as it had been in v.3.

7 Hosea begins to list a series of wrongdoings of the people, starting with the general sin of covenant breaking. The people were doing this knowingly, deliberately, just as Adam had in eating the forbidden fruit. "There" refers to Israel's land, covenanted to them by God, and perhaps especially to Bethel (see comment on 4:15; 5:11).

8–9 The list continues. Gilead is first noted as a "city of wicked men." This name is often applied to all the northern Transjordan area. The prophet next thought of the priests, who were acting in packs like highwaymen. Shechem lay on the road from the capital city, Samaria, to the religious center, Bethel. The thought is that the priests themselves, appointed by Jeroboam from "all sorts of people" (1Ki 12:31), were robbing and murdering pilgrims.

10–11 "House of Israel" no doubt stands for the Israelite nation, not to some special house of worship. The "horrible thing" singled out is the sin of prostitution. Judah seems never to have been far from Hosea's mind. Her "harvest" was her time of coming punishment ("harvest" elsewhere carries this sense; cf. Joel 3:13).

8. A ruinous domestic policy (7:1–7)

1–2 The first two lines speak of attempts by God to help and heal Israel—attempts that included sending prophets to warn and remonstrate. But the people's sins had thereby become more evident and exposed. The prophets' efforts had brought more sin to light, thus compounding the people's guilt. "Ephraim" continues to be mentioned as representative of the northern kingdom and Samaria, the capital city, is cited as the center of crime. Some of the sins are deceit, burglary, and street robbery by gangs. God knew about all this and saw it as engulfing the people, who themselves seem unaware that God knew about their sins.

3–4 An important reason for this sad situation is that the king and his princes were pleased with it. The sin of adultery is singled out for special mention—again primarily spiritual adultery, though physical adultery is also meant as part of the licentious worship of Baal. The people in their zeal for this sin were like a heated oven—a striking illustration of lust. The oven was so hot that after being unattended during an entire night, with a fresh tending of the fire in the morning, it had sufficient heat for baking at that time.

5–7 The prophet gives a striking example of the oven-inflamed sin of vv.3–4: the assassination of the king. It happened on a special day, a festival day. During the festivities the ringleaders planning the crime became drunk, and the king with them. In keeping the figure of the oven, the hearts of the plotters were hot with desire to perform their treacherous deed. Each time they were near the king, their hearts flamed up. They waited during the night, however, with their passion smoldering like the baker's fire, anticipating the morning. Then the blaze of passion stirred anew, and the terrible deed was done. Hosea mentions "rulers" (pl.; GK 9149) because he was describing an incident repeated several times in Israel's history (2Ki 15:10, 14, 25, 30). Though so many kings fell in this way, still no one in the land called to God for help.

9. A fatal foreign policy (7:8–16)

Having noted the weaknesses in Israel's internal affairs, Hosea next speaks of foreign relations, which he found equally wanting.

8–9 Outsiders were living among the Israelites, encouraged to do so by the Israelites themselves. They brought heathen gods and pagan ways of worship into the country. "A flat cake not turned over" is one that is overdone on one side and not baked on the other, thus being completely worthless. Unfortunately, the debilitating inroads of the foreigners, through their licentious cultic practices, were not recognized by Israel. As hair turning gray symbolizes aging, so Israel was becoming old and feeble without noticing it.

10 In spite of the sins mentioned in the previous verses, Israel had no thought of turning back to God and had no desire to seek him.

11 Hosea compares the people to "doves," which are proverbial for their naivete (cf. Mt 10:16). As doves, "easily deceived and senseless," may be lured by food into snares, so Israel was lured by both Egypt and Assyria as sources of assistance, only to be entrapped by them—especially by Assyria, which ultimately brought Israel down.

12 God is portrayed as a fowler throwing his net over Israel and pulling her down for correction. "Flocking together" may refer to the efforts of Israel's leaders to unite in seeking aid from Egypt and Assyria. "Catch" (GK 4334) means "to chastise"; this chastisement from God will come in full measure when he permits Assyria to devastate Israel.

13 The prophet characterizes the impending punishment as "woe" and "destruction," doubtless to come on the people by Assyria. God desperately wanted to redeem them, but they told lies about him, probably saying that he would not help them.

14–15 Though they bewailed their plight, the people were not truly turning their hearts to the Lord. They were gathering together in an attempt to get "grain and new wine," which had evidently become scarce under the divine correction. But instead of seeking them from God, they persisted in turning away from him. In fact, they went so far as to "plot evil" against God, even though he was the one who had trained and strengthened them. By "plot evil" the prophet meant their worship of foreign gods—in particular, the golden calves at Bethel and Dan.

16 The people were turning everywhere but to "the Most High," to their God who alone could help them. So they were like a warped bow, one that sends its arrows awry. The mention of the leaders who "fall by the sword" points to such men as Zechariah, Shallum, Pekahiah, and Pekah, all victims of assassination (see comment on vv.5–7). In the prosperous days of Jeroboam II, Israel had defied Egypt by boasting of her great strength. Now she would be ridiculed in Egypt because of the downfall of her leaders.

B. Israel's Punishment (8:1–10:15)

1. Warning of approaching judgment (8:1–14)

Hosea has been describing Israel's sin, but now he begins to speak primarily about punishment, the awful consequences of that sin.

1 God bids Hosea to trumpet a warning. An eagle (i.e., Assyria) was ready to descend on "the house of the LORD." As there was no temple in the northern kingdom to which this phrase could refer, it must refer to Israel as the people among whom God should and would dwell (cf. 9:15; Nu 12:7; Jer 12:7; Zec 9:8). The last two lines show why God would permit this "eagle" of punishment to come.

2–3 Though Israel would cry out that she knew God, this would be a cry of desperation rather than the cry of a believing heart. The people had rejected the "good" of truly knowing and serving God. Therefore their enemy would be permitted to pursue them.

4 The people had chosen their leaders, including their kings, without seeking guidance from God. Hence there was no continuing dynasty; in fact, nine different dynasties came to power in Israel. Furthermore, the people had made idols of silver and gold (a reference especially to the golden calves at Bethel and Dan, the extreme southern and northern points of Israel). The last two lines of this verse reemphasize the note of warning in v.1 by linking idol-making to destruction. Israel's destruction would come as a result of this sin.

5 "Throw out your calf-idol" is literally "your calf stinks." Here again the golden calves at Bethel and Dan, which were so odious to God, are in view. The rhetorical question at the close of the verse implies that there would never be a time when the idolatry of Israel would not be sinful.

6 The main reason why the calves were a stench before God was that they were man-made (1Ki 12:28). Therefore God would see that they were demolished. The calf idol is linked to Samaria only in the sense that Samaria, the capital city, represents the whole northern kingdom.

7–8 The figure of sowing and reaping, here in proverbial form, is common in the Bible (cf. 10:12–13; Job 4:8; Pr 22:8; Gal 6:7). The "wind" speaks of the emptiness of Israel's sin; the "whirlwind" speaks of God's impending destruction. That punishment had already begun: the stalks were not producing grain that could be milled into flour. God had apparently withheld the rain. Furthermore, if any stalks did produce grain, it was only for foreigners to snatch it up. Thus Israel, like the grain, was being swallowed up—i.e., losing her national identity and independence. So she was despised like worthless pottery.

9 The context shows that the Assyrian captivity was not in view here. Rather, Israel had "gone up to Assyria" in the sense of asking for aid. Hosea compared this to the solitary wandering of the wild donkey (cf. Jer 2:24). Wild donkeys are intractable; so Israel was stubborn in having her own way and repudiating God's guidance. Like a prostitute, she was selling herself to the heathen nations (cf. 2:5).

10 Hosea anticipates the full force of the Assyrian captivity on Israel. "Although" the people had looked to the nations for help, God would "gather them together" in order to inflict this punishment on his people. As a result, their numbers would diminish under the oppression of the "mighty king." This most likely refers to the Assyrian ruler through whom God would bring the punishment (cf. Isa 10:8).

11 God had ordained the one altar at his central sanctuary as the place for the people to worship. With the division of the kingdom, Jeroboam had set up false altars at Bethel and Dan for religious sacrifices. Hosea made it clear that these were in no way a religious help to Israel but that God considered them only as altars for committing sin.

12 In the Pentateuch God had given the people "the many things" (lit., "ten thousand things") of his law so that they could know his will. But they had thought of his law as something "alien" or strange. Thus the fault lay with the people, not with God.

13 With the altars still in mind, Hosea says that God charged the people using these false altars to offer sacrifices that belonged to him (and therefore should have been offered in the proper place and manner). Furthermore, though God permitted certain parts of various sacrificial animals to be eaten, these people were apparently eating whatever they desired, and so were compounding their sin. In God's sight such offerings were only "meat," with no sacrificial value at all. So punishment would come in the form of a forced return to "Egypt"—a word used representatively for Assyria, where Israel was eventually taken.

14 An additional ground of Israel's punishment is that the people had forgotten their Maker and had instead put their confidence in fine palaces. Judah, too, had come to rely on fortified cities. Therefore, God would hurl fire on the cities and burn up the fortresses. This came with the Assyrian invasion not many years after Hosea's writing.

2. Assyrian captivity soon to come (9:1–9)

The message of warning continues, speaking more specifically about the coming captivity in Assyria.

1–2 The people of Israel were not to rejoice, nor were they to celebrate like other nations. They were the people of God, with standards much higher than those of the heathen with their false gods. The shame of Israel was that the people were denying their own supreme God and attributing their blessings to the heathen gods. This was spiritual adultery, analogous to the physical adultery practiced by prostitutes. The mention of "threshing floors" probably carries through the figure of prostitution, for the Canaanites frequently used threshing floors and winepresses as places for carrying out their fertility rites. God implies that because of insufficient rainfall the threshing floors and winepresses would fail to produce enough food for the people.

3 The people of Israel were soon to be taken captive from the land. The place of their captivity was first called "Egypt" (cf. 8:13) to show its general character, then "Assyria" was named as the actual place the people would be taken to (cf. 11:5). The food they were to eat there would be "unclean" because it would not be selected and prepared according to the Mosaic Law.

4–5 Moreover, the captive Israelites would not be able to present "wine offerings" or "sacrifices" because there would be no temple of the Lord in Assyria (Dt 12:5–14). Therefore, whatever sacrifices they did offer would be like "the bread of mourners" (cf. Dt 26:14)—unclean and unacceptable, like food touched by a mourner defiled by a dead body (Nu 19:22). Anyone eating the meat from such sacrifices would also be unclean. The rhetorical question in v.5 puts vividly the plight of Israel: captive in Assyria, without temple or sacrifices, and so unable to celebrate the commanded feasts and festivals.

6 Even if Israel is not utterly destroyed, the people will be taken captive; they will be gathered by Egypt (again used symbolically for Assyria; cf. v.3) and buried by Memphis (another symbol), an ancient capital of Egypt and a celebrated place of burial. Meanwhile, their own fine land ("treasures of silver") would revert to briars and thorns.

7–8 With eloquent power, Hosea announces the days of punishment that were coming on Israel and calls for understanding of it. Yet Israel had sunk so deep into sin that the people considered any prophet who warned them a madman and a fool. Since the prophets stood with God over Ephraim (the northern nation), the people, motivated by animosity, sought to entrap them. Hosea calls this "hostility in the house of his God" (the latter phrase being a reference to Israel; cf. comment on 8:1).

9 Hosea compares the sin of Israel to that of the men of Gibeah, who committed a heinous crime against the concubine of a Levite who was their guest (Jdg 19–20). This most shocking example of sin in the OT had led to civil war and brought the tribe of Benjamin to the brink of annihilation.

3. The fleeting glory of Israel (9:10–17)

The warning now turns to more general matters as Hosea speaks of punishments that would take place prior to the Assyrian captivity.

10 This is a poignant reference to Israel's earliest days as a nation, when God found her and chose her. Then she was like "grapes in the desert" and "the early fruit on the fig tree." Grapes, unusual in the desert, are a special delight when found there; the early figs are considered especially delicious. In other words, when God first found Israel in the desert (Dt 32:10), it was like finding such delicacies. Things soon changed, however. Already at Baal-peor, before even entering the Promised Land (Nu 25:3–18), the people slipped into the worship of the local Baal. This was not Israel's only time of sin, but it is singled out here because it was the first instance of their worship of Baal—worship they persisted in till it became their besetting sin.

11–12 The "glory" (GK 3883) God gave Ephraim (Israel), through making her a fine nation after he had found her in the desert, would fly away like a bird because of her recurring sin. "No birth, no pregnancy, no conception" is a terse way of saying that Israel's population would decrease. And even if children were born, they would die young before reaching adulthood (cf. Dt 32:25). God would turn his favor from Israel because of her unfaithfulness. This form of punishment would precede the captivity to Assyria, and the captivity itself would climax it.

13–14 God had given Israel a pleasant and advantageous location. All caravan trade between Egypt and countries to the north had to pass through her land, because the Mediterranean Sea was to the west and the desert to the east. She was like Tyre, for Tyre also had a situation highly advantageous for her maritime activities. Israel failed, however, to realize her potential because of her sin. Instead, her children would be led out to the "slayer"—a further factor in the diminishing of population through murders, civil strife, and warfare. Hosea's irony in v.14 is as unmistakable as it is powerful.

15 The severe treatment of Israel was because of "all their wickedness in Gilgal." By this time Gilgal had clearly become a center of false worship (cf. 4:15). The meaning of "hate" (GK 8533) in this context is defined by the words "I will no longer love them." It was not that God had a positive animosity toward Israel, but he had nothing favorable to say of them. Because of their "sinful deeds" and the rebellion of their leaders, God would expel them from his "house" (the congregation of Israel; see comments on 8:1; 9:8).

16 Hosea returns to the warning that Israel would be diminished in population, using again the figure of a plant (cf. v.10; 10:1; 14:8). The people would be withered right down to the root (cf. Mal 4:1) and thus rendered fruitless and hopeless.

17 In summary, God would reject the people because of their persistent disobedience. As a result they would become "wanderers among the nations"—another allusion to their coming captivity.

4. Guilt and coming captivity (10:1–8)

In this section Hosea speaks even more explicitly of the impending captivity of Israel.

1 Hosea begins by referring once more (cf. 9:10) to Israel's early history when the people were like a luxuriant vine. But as the "fruit" of prosperity "increased," they deteriorated spiritually. Pagan "altars" were built and "sacred stones" (or pillars) adorned. The people thus turned from the worship of the true God.

2 The word translated "deceitful" (lit., "smooth" or "flattering"; GK 2744) is elsewhere applied to lips or tongues that are insincere (cf. Pss 5:9; 12:3; Pr 5:3). Because the same is true here of the heart of a guilty people, God would destroy both the altars and the sacred stones they had erected.

3 As a result, the people would be brought to admit that they had no king worthy of the name because they did not choose one who revered the Lord. The time referred to can only have been just before the captivity, when Israel's kings showed themselves ineffectual both in tackling Israel's problems and in coping with the Assyrian menace. The last two lines note despairingly that even if the land did have a truly capable king, things were so bad that he would be powerless to help.

4 Hosea enlarges on the idea of deceitfulness of heart (cf. v.2): promises had been made, false oaths taken, and contracts signed. The thought here mainly concerns agreements among the people themselves. With the denial of people's legal rights, "lawsuits" were springing up like "poisonous weeds" (cf. Dt 29:17) in a "plowed field."

5 The people of Samaria (representative of all Israel), seeing the ominous signs of the impending punishment, are said to be anxious about their "calf-idol" at Beth Aven (Bethel; cf. 4:15) rather than about their own sin. "Its people" (i.e., the Israelites identified as the people of this calf!) mourn concerning the matter, along with the idolatrous priests (cf. 2Ki 23:5) that serve it.

6–7 Hosea now speaks clearly of the Assyrian captivity. The shameful but materially valuable calf-idol would be carried to the victorious king of Assyria as tribute. And Israel would feel disgrace and humiliation. The word for "its wooden idols" is often translated "its counsel" (cf. NIV note). The former translation refers disdainfully to the calf as mere wood; the alternate translation to the "counsel" given by Jeroboam I when he had first established calf worship (1Ki 12:28). Not only the calf idol but also Samaria and its king would be taken, borne away to foreign Assyria, helpless as a twig on a river.

8 "The high places of wickedness" signifies the calf temple at Bethel (Beth Aven; cf. comments on 4:15; 5:8; 10:5). Destruction there by the Assyrians would be so complete that thorns and thistles would replace the buildings containing the altars (cf. Ge 3:18). Also, the people would cry in despair for the mountains and hills to fall on them, apparently to terminate their time of disgrace (cf. Lk 23:30; Rev 6:16).

5. Sin and punishment (10:9–15)

Hosea speaks more generally again, referring to both Israel's sin and her resulting punishment; he also gives a word of instruction. Mention of the Assyrian captivity reappears at the close of the section.

9–10 Once more the prophet refers to the sin at Gibeah (see comment on 9:9). Since that tragic occurrence, Israel has defiantly continued in the same basic sin, and the appropriate punishment—such as was meted out to the original offenders—has not yet been experienced but is now due. This punishment, at God's pleasure, would see nations gathering against Israel—a passing reference to the captivity. The "double sin" is probably the sins of forsaking God and of departing from the rule of David's house.

11 Ephraim (Israel) had been well trained in past days, like a heifer broken to the yoke. She had come, however, to enjoy only the work of threshing grain (pleasant to the heifer because she could then eat her fill of grain). But God would put a yoke of true work on her "fair neck" so that she would have to work hard in plowing and breaking up the hard soil. Judah is once more included (cf. 6:11; 8:14; et al.) as meriting the same treatment. "Jacob" suggests all twelve tribes.

12 Hosea pauses to give advice. The people should sow "righteousness" (i.e., treat each other in the right manner), and they would reap kindness in return. Thereby unplowed ground would be plowed (cf. v.11). Admittedly, just as plowing is hard work, so it would be hard for the people to change their lifestyle; but they must do so. Only by searching for the Lord and his righteousness would they be delivered from the coming punishment.

13 Instead of doing this, however, the people were planting (lit., "plowing") wickedness and reaping evil. Deceit and its baneful results (vv.2–4) therefore abounded. Because Israel had depended on her own strength and her many warriors, God would permit the roar of battle to come against the people.

14 The outcome would be the destruction of all Israel's fortifications through the Assyrian attack. To illustrate how bad the time would be, Hosea compares it with another horrible and tragic slaughter at Beth Arbel (difficult now to identify). Perhaps Shalman is Shalmaneser V, who played such a decisive part in the Assyrian action leading to Israel's captivity (2Ki 17:3–6).

15 So, concludes Hosea, Bethel, the calf-idol center, representative of all that was wicked in Israel, would experience the same fate as this Beth Arbel. In that day even the "king of Israel" would be "completely destroyed." Israel was facing a most foreboding future. Hosea prophesies that her destruction would occur from the very beginning of the day of battle; it is noteworthy that Israel's final king, Hoshea, was taken captive by the Assyrian conqueror Shalmaneser V before the actual siege of Samaria began.

C. Israel's Restoration (11:1–14:9)

1. God's love and Israel's rebellion (11:1–7)

The theme now changes from Israel's punishment to Israel's restoration. It is introduced by a moving contrast between God's steadfast love and Israel's persistent apostasy.

1 Once more (cf. 9:10; 10:1, 9) Hosea mentions the earlier history of Israel, this time looking back to the Lord's words in Ex 4:22–23: "Israel is my firstborn son. . . . 'Let my son go, so he may worship me.'" The reason Israel was God's son is that God had especially chosen him as his own (cf. Ge 12:2–3; cf. Mt 2:13–15).

2 God had multiplied the people of Israel and had shown his power in bringing them into the land of Canaan. Yet despite these evidences of his love, Israel forsook him and worshiped other gods (Jdg 2:11–13). So God disciplined them through numerous foreign oppressions to call them back; but the more he did so, the more they apostatized.

3–4 Here the tender figure of a parent teaching an infant to walk shows the Lord's compassion in disciplining Israel (Ephraim). But they were blind to his healing purpose in dealing with them. The poetic language continues in v.4. God had "led" (lit., "drawn"; GK 5432) them with cords of "human kindness" and "ties of love." He also had lifted

"the yoke from their neck," just as an owner sometimes lifts the yoke away from the face of an ox so that it might eat more comfortably. So God had dealt gently with his people in spite of their sin.

5–6 A rhetorical question that implies an affirmative answer points to the impending captivity—the consequence of Israel's sin, which had been compounded because the people persisted in it despite God's continuing grace. When Egypt (i.e., Assyria; see comments on 8:13; 9:3) attacked, swords would bring death in the cities, the cities' defenses would be broken, and all the plans for survival would be frustrated.

7 In their apostasy the people of Israel were obdurate in their unfaithfulness. The remainder of this verse may best be taken to mean that the people would not listen to the prophets who were calling them to return to God but were choosing instead to remain in the mire of sin.

2. Restoration in the last days (11:8–11)

These verses are like a window into the heart of God. They show that his love for his people is a love that will never let them go. Like the beautiful final chapter of the book, these verses look forward, beyond the chastisement of the immediate future, to the Millennium, to the time, still distant, when Israel will truly return to her God and he will bless her once more.

8 Two poignant questions reveal the depth of God's love for his people. Despite the sure judgment that was soon to come on unfaithful Israel, he could not bear to give up his chosen people (here called Ephraim and Israel) forever. His enduring love precluded his treating them as he did Admah and Zeboiim, two cities that had been utterly destroyed along with Sodom and Gomorrah (cf. Dt 29:23).

9 In that future day God would not devastate his people Israel again, as he was about to do through the Assyrians. He is "God, and not man"—i.e., he is one whose ways transcend those of sinful humanity. Because he is holy, he does not let passion or bitterness govern his decisions. He promises wondrous blessing on the people, if they will follow him (cf. Dt 28:1–14). But in that future day of restoration, he will not come against any city or land "in wrath," as he was about to do in Hosea's day.

10 Hosea gives God's reason for carrying out his promise of restoration in the coming day: The people "will follow the LORD." The metaphor of the lion's roar means that God's call to his people will sound so clearly throughout the earth that they will come "trembling" (i.e., "humbly") "from the west." The return of Judah from the Babylonian captivity was from the east. But this mention of "the west" sets off the future return from the earlier one (cf. Isa 11:11–12).

11 Hosea next compares the swiftness (i.e., the readiness and responsiveness) of the future return of his people to the flight of birds and doves. Egypt and Assyria are named because of Israel's years of bondage in Egypt and their impending captivity in Assyria. In this context Egypt and Assyria typify the many nations from which God's people will return in the future day. Then he will settle them "in their homes"—an assurance of their permanent residence in their land (cf. 2:19).

3. The folly of Israel (11:12–12:14)

This section, like ch. 3, reverts to the main theme of the book—Israel's unfaithfulness to her God. The book, however, will end on the contrasting note of Israel's future restoration.

12 God accuses the Israelites of surrounding him with deceit and dishonesty, as though attacking him. Once more Israel's sin is paralleled by Judah's rebellion against God, who is their "faithful Holy One."

12:1 Ephraim (Israel) is now said to "feed on the wind," meaning that her efforts were to no worthwhile purpose. One aspect of this effort was the treaties they made with Assyria and Egypt (cf. 2Ki 17:4; 18:21; Isa 30:7), which were seldom of benefit to Israel. "Lies and violence" were often involved in making them. Indeed, Israel, while making a treaty with Assyria, might at the same time be sending olive oil to Egypt in an effort to enlist her support against Assyria (cf. 2Ki 17:4).

2 Once more Hosea refers to Judah as being accused by God and facing retribution. "Jacob" is probably a reference to both Judah and Israel combined; he was the ancestor of all the Israelites and so becomes the subject of vv.3–4. All his descendants, the people of both the northern and the southern kingdoms, were guilty before God.

3 When Jacob was being born, he seized his brother's heel (Ge 25:24–26). Later he struggled with God himself at the brook Jabbok (Ge 32:25–29). He is an example for the people of Hosea's day to follow. His struggling with God was a time of triumph, for through it he received the Lord's blessing. Thus, the first occasion should be understood in the same way; Jacob's act in the womb of his mother was one in which the providential direction of God symbolized Jacob's desire for the birthright and blessing. Similarly, Israel in Hosea's time should be striving for God's favor and blessing rather than chasing the wind.

4 Hosea enlarges on Jacob's struggle at Jabbok, pointing out that Jacob overcame the angel because he wanted the blessing so much that he even "wept and begged" for it. Then the prophet shifts to Jacob's encounter with God at Bethel (Ge 35:1–15), when God confirmed the blessing already promised him. The implication is that God would do the same thing for Israel if she desired God's blessing as much as Jacob had.

5 Hosea now turns to God himself, the one who had blessed Jacob and wanted to do the same thing for Israel. His great name is given—the name that stands for him in all his excellency: "LORD God Almighty" (lit., "The LORD, the God of hosts"). Israel should always think of God in this way, and they could be sure that he would keep every promise he had ever made to them.

6 The people should repent and "return" (GK 8740) to God, to "maintain love and justice" in respect to one another, and to "wait" in expectancy for God to bring them the same kind of blessing he had brought Jacob. All this they were to do with the help of God. We work for God as God enables us (cf. Php 2:11–12); so only is God's work done.

7–8 Hosea next turns to a specific area of sin in Israel—"the merchant" using dishonest scales and loving "to defraud" customers. What a way to be remembered! Much of Israel's dealing with the nations of the day had involved trading and had been contaminated by deceit. As a result of these shady practices, the people had been boasting of their wealth and declaring that no one could find them guilty of any sin. So they did not see themselves as deserving any punishment. Apparently they had devised loopholes in the law to justify what they had been doing. Hosea is probably speaking here of the reign of Jeroboam II, when Israel prospered greatly.

9 While the people were thinking themselves self-sufficient, God counters this thinking by reminding them that he had been the Lord their God from the land of Egypt. But now because of their sin, he would drive them out of their wealthy circumstances and make them "live in tents again," as they did at the Feast of Tabernacles (which commemorated the time they lived in the desert). This refers to the coming days of captivity. Because the Feast of Tabernacles was also a joyous occasion, the implication may be that even in their transient time of captivity God would again graciously provide for them—as indeed he did.

10 Hosea resumes his general theme. God, he recalls, had communicated his will to Israel through prophets, visions, and parables. The people therefore could not plead ignorance and were without excuse.

11 Gilead (east of the Jordan) and Gilgal (west of it) here represent the entire land. Rhetorical questions concerning both serve to underline their wickedness. The very idea of bulls being sacrificed at Gilgal indicates one of the ways in which wickedness was involved there, for it was the wrong place for such sacrifice (cf. 4:15; 9:15). As a result God would reduce the altars there to mere piles of stones on a "plowed field"—i.e., they would be useless and in the way.

12–13 In vv.3–4 Hosea had mentioned the blessing Jacob received; here he speaks of the hardship Jacob endured after running away from home. His point is that God had blessed this ancestor, even though things had happened at the time—the long years served for Rachel, the flight from Esau—that had not seemed like blessings. And God had similarly provided for Israel when he had brought them by a "prophet" (presumably Moses; cf. Dt 18:18) out of Egypt and cared for them.

14 This past history should have led Israel to a state of humility and submission before God, but it had not. Instead Ephraim (Israel) had "bitterly provoked him to anger" through her extensive sinning. Therefore Ephraim's "Lord" ("master"; GK 151) would leave the people in their "guilt of . . . bloodshed" (cf. Lev 20:9; Dt 19:10) and "repay" them for the insults rendered. Punishment would indeed come.

4. Israel's fall into sin (13:1–16)

Hosea continues to speak of Israel's unfaithfulness to God, but here he takes on a more historical approach.

1 Hosea has frequently referred to the whole northern nation as Ephraim, but in this verse the tribe of Ephraim is intended. In former years when Ephraim had spoken, the other tribes had listened with deference and respect. Ephraim had often asserted leadership, sometimes in improper ways (see Jdg 8:1–3; 12:1–6; 1Ki 12:25; cf. 11:26). Things had changed for Ephraim, however, since Baal worship (i.e., the calf worship at Bethel) had crept in. Though Jeroboam I had instituted calf worship as the worship of Israel's God (1Ki 12:26–33), doubtless elements of the Baal cult had come to be practiced there.

2–3 Spiritual death was the result of Baal worship. The people heaped sin on sin, owning and worshiping idols made from silver by clever craftsmen (cf. 8:4). The last two lines of v.2 admit of two renderings. Although NIV takes them to refer to "human sacrifice," this seems unlikely since no other indication is given that human sacrifices were practiced at Bethel or Dan. The more likely rendering is "In respect to the images [of the calves], they [leaders in this form of worship] are saying, 'Let those who would sacrifice do so by kissing the calf-idols.'" To kiss an image was to do homage to it (see 1Ki 19:18; cf. Ps 2:12). Jeroboam I had first bidden the people to give this homage, and leaders in the worship were continuing the practice. Persistence in this sin would lead to the disappearance of Israel (referred to in v.3 in four striking figures that suggest how surely and speedily it would happen).

4 Hosea again reminds Israel of what their covenant God had done for them in the Exodus. He then admonishes them to acknowledge God alone as their God and Savior. The admonition tallies with the tenor of the book.

5–6 Hosea goes on to remind the people how God had cared for them during those arduous desert days, a reminder that should also have stirred them to observe the admonition in v.4. God's care for the people involved his feeding them with manna, a thought that is probably intended to cover generally all of God's provisions. This satisfied the people, but then they "became proud" and forgot God (cf. Dt 8:11–20). This had happened in the desert, and it had been happening during the intervening centuries.

7–8 This brings Hosea again to his theme of coming judgment. God would pounce on the rebellious people like a lion and like a leopard, to bring punishment (cf. 5:14). The figure is apt, for in v.6 the people have been pictured as a flock under God's care. To intensify this theme, the figure of a bear crazed by the loss of her cubs is used, followed once more by the figure of a lion. The "wild animal" refers to all three as beasts of the field; they were all native to Palestine and known for their relentless manner of killing prey.

9–10 Israel would suffer destruction because she lived in opposition to God, who had helped her so much throughout history. Israel was not kingless, but she did not have as king one who could deliver the people from the Assyrian threat. Only God, their true "helper," whom they rejected, could do this. "Your rulers" (lit., "your judges") refers to the king's assistants. The last part of v.10 does not refer to the time of Samuel when the people asked for a king (1Sa 8:4–6), but to the occasion when the northern tribes wanted their own king after rebelling against Rehoboam (1Ki 12:16–20).

11–12 This verse can also be translated "I have been giving" you a king and "I have been taking him away." No one king apparently is in view here but the series of kings that had occupied Israel's throne since the kingdom's division. God had been allowing them to rule; but because of their unfaithfulness to him, he had also been setting them aside. Many had come to a violent end (see comment on 7:7). Thus was the guilt of Ephraim "stored up" and "kept on record" against the day of reckoning.

13 Hosea further delineates the punishment of Israel by likening her to a mother in labor and then to a son being born to the mother. This son, he says, was without wisdom because he did not come to the "opening of the womb" (cf. 2Ki 19:3; Isa 37:3) at the proper time for the birth. God, in other words, was bringing punishment on Israel so that the people might be reborn to follow him as he desired; but they were foolish in not grasping the opportunity. God had been using various disciplinary measures against Israel for years, but to no avail.

14 Like 11:8–11, this verse is parenthetical between v.13 and v.15. God breaks in to sound a note of encouragement and promise to the people. They had severe punishment ahead of them in Hosea's time, but a day would come when wondrous blessing would be their portion. Paul quoted v.14b at the triumphant climax of his great chapter on resurrection (1Co 15:55). One aspect of its fulfillment (that relating to the resurrection of the believer in a spiritual body) is to be found there. But since the context of ch. 13 relates to the earthly punishment of Israel, another aspect of v.14b must still be future—i. e., at the time of Christ's reign on earth during the Millennium (cf. 11:8-11).

Verse 14a speaks of the people being ransomed "from the power of the grave." The dreaded enemies of death and the grave will be shorn of their power against God's redeemed people. What glorious thoughts! The last line of v.14 literally reads, "Repentance is hidden from my eyes"; it is best taken with v.14 rather than with v.15, meaning that God will not change his mind about doing what this verse declares.

15–16 Though the people of Israel may thrive among their neighbors, eventually they will be dried up by an east wind from the desert. Because of this, springs and wells will fail. That time of thriving must be the time of Jeroboam II, when prosperity was marked. The destroying east wind must be Assyria—a power that came from the east and effected Israel's fall in 722 B.C. Moreover, Assyria did indeed plunder Israel's "storehouse" at that time. This invasion came as a result of the people's "guilt" of their rebellion against their God. The shocking brutalities described in v.16 are in keeping with what we know about the character of the Assyrians. Here "Samaria," as the capital of the northern kingdom, represents all Israel.

5. Israel's repentance and God's blessing (14:1–9)

In beauty of expression these final words of Hosea rank with the memorable chapters of the OT. Like the rainbow after a storm, they promise Israel's final restoration. Here is the full flowering of God's unfailing love for his faithless people, the triumph of his grace, the assurance of his healing—all described in imagery that reveals the loving heart of God.

1–2 The people of Israel are not only invited to "return" (GK 8740) to their God; they are also reminded of their sins—God's forgiveness must be accompanied by awareness of sin. But they may not return to the Lord without bringing something; they must come to him with words that he puts, as it were, in their mouths. When they ask for forgiveness, the Lord will graciously receive them. The offering of "the fruit of our lips" is literally "we offer our lips as sacrifices of bulls" (cf. NIV note)—i.e., instead of offering bullocks we offer as our sacrifice our lips that utter prayer and praise to God (cf. Heb 13:15).

3 The offering of words—all of them words of repentance—continues. Israel was to admit that neither Assyria nor any military might (symbolized by "war-horses") could save her. Once and for all, she was to renounce man-made images as her "gods." Moreover, since God has compassion on the orphans (cf. Ex 22:22; Dt 10:18), Israel could expect him to have compassion also on her.

4 In response to Israel's penitent words, the Lord describes the wondrous blessings that he will bestow on them. Since the people had not repented and would not repent nationally in the way Hosea described until the future Great Tribulation, and since the blessings from God described in vv.4–8 will not be fully bestowed till the Millennium, the ultimate meaning of this passage must be eschatological—i.e., the time of the Millennium again (cf. 1:10–11; 2:14–23; et al.). Here we have God's grace in action—his healing of their "waywardness" and his loving them unconditionally. He had indeed turned his anger away from them.

5–6 Among the great biblical figures of speech are those that relate to trees and flowers—especially meaningful to dwellers in semiarid lands like Palestine. Here Hosea likens Israel in her time of future blessing to a lily, a cedar of Lebanon, and that most essential of all trees, an olive tree. The second and third lines of v.6 show the result of this healthy growth: the cedar will have the "splendor" or majesty of the olive tree and the "fragrance" of the cedar of Lebanon itself. So the nation of Israel will be admired throughout the world.

7 In the Hebrew the first two lines of this verse are literally "They who dwell in his shadow shall again make grain to live." The antecedent of "his" is the tree (representative of Israel nationally); and the antecedent of "they," individual Israelites. It is a promise that the people of Israel in the future day will flourish and blossom like a vine, with their "fame" spreading abroad like the fame of Lebanese wine. How different from the situation of Israel in Hosea's day!

8 The rhetorical question here relates to the idolatry that had been Israel's besetting sin. In God's sight idols are absolutely nothing, and so shall they be for Ephraim (Israel). God, not the idols, is the one who will answer and "care for" Israel in her time of need. He is like a "green pine tree"; all their fruitfulness comes from him.

9 This verse is like a noble epilogue. The balance between the rhetorical questions, with their answers, and the dignity of the last sentence, with its concise parallelism, close Hosea's unique book on a note of solemn authority.

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

Joel prophesied in Judah in the exciting and pivotal days of Uzziah (792–740 B.C.), the tenth king of the southern kingdom. Those were days of unparalleled prosperity. To the south Uzziah continued the control over Edom that Amaziah had effected (2Ki 14:22; 2Ch 26:2); he also seized the caravan routes that led from Arabia (2Ch 26:7). To the east he seems to have imposed tribute on the Transjordanian regions (v.8). To the west he moved with great success against the Philistines, taking Gath and the coastal plain, thus controlling the important trade routes (vv.6–7) and eliminating the slave-gathering raids into western Judah (3:4–8). A great military strategist, Uzziah's military preparedness included a total reorganization of the structure and equipment of the army (vv.11–15).

About 750 B.C., Uzziah contracted leprosy because of his intrusion into the priest's office, and he appointed Jotham, his son, as coregent and public officiator. Nevertheless, Uzziah continued to be the real power of the throne, for when Tiglath-pileser III invaded Syria in his first western campaign (743 B.C.), Uzziah was singled out as the leader of the anti-Assyrian coalition. Uzziah also turned his attention to the internal affairs of his country. Indeed, most of his military activity had economic goals. He also led the way in agricultural reorganization (2Ch 26:10).

In short, the era of the early eighth century B.C. was one of great expansion—militarily, administratively, commercially, and economically; it was a period of prosperity second only to that of Solomon's. It is small wonder, then, that Uzziah's fame should endure long after his death (2Ch 26:8b, 1:5b).

In such an era God raised up the great writing prophets, men of intense patriotism and deep spiritual concern. Their message took in the entire international scene from their own time to the culmination of God's teleological program.

2. Authorship

Little is known of the personal circumstances of the author, Joel ("The Lord is God"), except what can be gleaned from the book. The son of Pethuel, Joel lived and prophesied in Judah (cf. 2:32; 3:1, 17–18, 20). He was thoroughly familiar with the temple and its ministry (1:9, 113–14, 16; 2:14, 17) and was intimately acquainted with the geography and history of the land.

Joel was a man of vitality and spiritual maturity. As a keen discerner of the times, he delivered God's message to the people of Judah in a vivid and impassioned style.

3. Date

Since no date is given, conjectures have ranged from the ninth century B.C. to the Maccabean Period (i.e., either preexilic or postexilic). The preexilic date is the better of these two.

Three general positions have been advanced by those who assign a preexilic date to Joel–the ninth century, the eighth century, and the seventh century. The view that Joel prophesied in the early eighth century is to be preferred because it best fits all the data: (1) the nonmention of Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia, best explained by Assyria being in severe decline from 782 B.C. to 745 B.C.; (2) the position of Joel among the dated minor prophets (with Hosea, Amos, Jonah); (3) the contextual juxtaposition of six foreign nations in ch. 3; (4) the internal emphases; (5) the faithful reflection of the prevailing events, attitudes, and literary themes of the early eighth century B.C.; and (6) Joel's prophecy of the Day of the Lord, which may be connected with Amos's dating of his prophecy as two years before the earthquake of Uzziah's time (1:2; cf. Zec 14:5).

4. Occasion and Purpose

A locust plague without parallel had descended on Judah, ruining all the crops. All levels of society were disrupted. Worst of all, the agricultural loss threatened the continuance of the sacrificial offerings. In these circumstances Joel saw the judgment of God on Judah. The people in Uzziah's day had taken God and his blessings for granted. Faith had degenerated into an empty formalism and their lives into moral decadence. To Joel, the locust plague was a warning of a greater judgment that was coming unless the people repented and returned to fellowship with God. If they did, God would pardon them, restore the health of the land, and give them again the elements needed to offer the sacrifices.

5. Theological Values

As a man of faith in God, Joel imparted a reliance on the sufficiency of God and his prior claim on the believer's life. His basic tenet is that God is sovereignly guiding the affairs of world history toward his preconceived goal (1:15; 2:1–4, 25–32; 3:1–21). He alone is God (2:13)—a God of grace and mercy (2:13, 17), of love and patience (2:13), and of justice and righteousness (1:15; 2:23; 3:1–8). He calls for true worship from his followers, who have trusted him for salvation by grace through faith (2:32). Mere external worship is insufficient before the Lord (2:13, 18–19, 23, 26–27, 32).

Joel also taught that when sin becomes the dominant condition of God's people, they must be judged (1:15; 2:1, 11–13). God may use natural disasters (ch. 1) or political means (2:1–11) to chastise his people. If the people repent (2:12–13), they will be restored to fellowship with God (2:14, 19, 23), and nature too will be restored to blessings (2:23–27).

Joel's theology also contains teaching about the last things. Of central concern is God's role to his people Israel (1:6, 13–14; 2:12–14; et al.). While he may allow other nations to chastise Israel for her sins, God has reserved a remnant for himself (2:28–32). On them he will pour out his Spirit (2:28–29), to them he will manifest himself with marvelous signs (2:30–31), and them he will regather and bring to the Promised Land (2:32–3:1). He will gather for judgment those nations that have dealt so severely with his people (3:2, 12–13) and bring them to a great final battle near Jerusalem (3:9–16). On that awesome day (v.15), he himself will lead his people in triumph (vv.16–17) and usher in an era of unparalleled peace and prosperity (vv.17–21).

EXPOSITION

I. Joel's Present Instructions: Based on the Locust Plague (1:1–2:27)

A. The Occasion: the Locust Plague (1:1–4)

1–4 Joel begins his prophecy by identifying himself and his lineage and clearly declaring the divine source of his prophecy. Because the intensity of the locust plague was unprecedented, this message was to be handed down to the generations that followed. The four different Hebrew words for locusts that appear in v.4 probably are used to indicate the intensity of the plague and a successive series of locusts that had devastated the land.

B. The Instructions: Based on the Locust Plague (1:5–2:27)

1. Warnings in the light of the present crisis (1:5–20)

a. Joel's plea for penitence (1:5–13)

5–7 Joel begins his call for penitence with a solemn warning to three categories of pleasure seekers—the general citizenry, the farmers, and the priests. He tells them to awaken from their sleep of drunkenness (cf. Pr 23:35b). In so doing he calls attention to not only the debased nature of society but also the people's insensitivity to their own moral condition. Times of ease and prosperity, such as were experienced during the kingship of Uzziah, are unfortunately often times of spiritual, moral, and social corruption.

Joel condemns the misuse of wine, which had led to drunkenness, debauchery, and the loss of spiritual vitality. As a result, the locusts, like a powerful army, had stripped bare the vegetation of the land. These voracious insects had teeth like a lion's. The vine and the fig tree, symbols of God's blessing, lay stripped to the bark.

8–10 Far worse than the locust plague was the condition of the people's spiritual lives. The very worship of God was being compromised. Joel instructs the citizenry to mourn like an engaged virgin whose intended husband was taken from her before the wedding. How great would be her tragedy and sorrow! So also the people of Judah and Jerusalem should weep over the loss of vital religious experience through the devastation of the land. The loss of agricultural produce meant the early cessation of the meal (grain) and drink offerings. The cutting off of them should have been a warning to the people of their grave condition.

The observances of these offerings had degenerated in Joel's day into mere routine ritual (cf. Hos 6:6; Am 4:4–5). Still worse, the Israelites had made these times an occasion for drunkenness (Hos 2:5; Am 2:8). Therefore, as he had warned, God had taken away the privilege of offering that which symbolized purity of devotion. The cutting off of the sacrifices was a severe step of chastisement, though it should also have warned the people of their grave condition.

Joel notes that the priests, the ministers of the Lord, were mourning. The once productive fields were utterly laid waste (cf. Mic 2:4), and the very ground grieved like the priests (cf. Am 1:2). Grain (wheat after threshing), wine (the freshly squeezed fruit), and oil (the fresh juice of the olive) were all considered objects of God's blessing. These were being withdrawn as punishment for their sins (Hos 2:8–13).

11–12 Joel also calls on the farmers and vine keepers to "despair" (cf. Job 6:20; Isa 1:29; 20:5) and to "wail" (cf. v.5), lamenting the loss of the products of the field and of the vineyard and orchard, which symbolized the blessings of the relationship between God and Israel (see Ps 80:8–15; Isa 5:21–6; Jer 2:21; cf. Mt 21:18–21, 28–46). Joel also mentions other trees that were not only important to the economy but were symbols of spiritual nourishment, refreshment, joy, and fruitfulness in the life of the believer (cf. Dt 8:6–10; Ps 92:12; SS 2:3).

13 Joel closes this section with a special plea to the second specially affected segment of society—the priests. They were to gird themselves with sackcloth and to mourn and wail. The prophet demonstrates the urgency of the situation by pleading with them to spend the whole night in their garments of contrition and penitence (cf. Est 4:1–4), because of the loss of the daily sacrifices.

b. Joel's plea for prayer (1:14–20)

14–18 Because the locust plague warned of a still further and more drastic judgment, Joel calls for a solemn assembly for prayer. The priests were to convene the people at the temple for a solemn fast and a season of prayer (cf. Ne 9:1–3; Jer 36:9). The prophet was concerned that the people give a fervent cry of repentance and call on God for forgiveness, lest a greater judgment descend soon.

The reason for the repentant cry was that the Day of the Lord was at hand. The locust plague was a dire warning that the Lord's judgment of Judah was imminent. That Day of the Lord was not to be one of vindication for Israel but was to signal its demise (Am 5:16-20). Not only was the Day imminent, it was certain—"like destruction from the Almighty."

Invasions of giant locusts, "with teeth of a lion" and "fangs of a lioness," still occur in the Middle East today. These two pictures, taken in 1993, show the incredible size of the locusts and their destructive power.

The need for penitence and prayer ought to have been obvious from the terrible conditions. Their food had been cut off so that there could be no feasts or offerings of gladness. Worst of all, this had affected the worship in the house of "our God." The physical world too was a shambles. The unfructified grains lay shriveled under their hoes, the barns were desolate, and the granaries were trampled down. All the cattle were without pasturage.

19–20 As an example to the people, Joel breaks forth in a cry to the Lord who alone could forgive and deliver. He again speaks of the loss of pasturage as well as of the trees. What the locusts had not destroyed, a severe summer's heat and drought ruined.

Likewise, the beasts of the field were longing for God. They had to seek higher ground because of the loss of pasture and because the streams had dried up. Joel intimates that they were more sensitive to the basic issues at hand by their panting for God than were God's own people (cf. Isa 1:3). God's message was plain. The barrenness of the land reflected the dryness and decay of the hearts of the people. If their hearts remained unmoved and unrepentant, a worse judgment loomed ahead.

2. Warnings in the light of the coming conflict (2:1–27)

a. Joel's plea for preparation (2:1–11)

1 With the picture of the locust plague before him and the warning of judgment firmly in mind (1:15), Joel portrays a coming army—namely, the Assyrian army of the eighth and seventh centuries B.C. The appearance and activities of the locusts were analogous to a real army. The fitness of the image is seen in Joel's account: in the darkening of the day (vv.2, 10), in the suddenness of the locusts' arrival (v.2), in their horselike appearance (v.4), in the orderliness of the battle (vv.7–8), and in the ubiquitous nature of their devastation (vv.3, 9). Both locusts and armies are known to be the instruments of God's chastening (e.g., Dt 28:38–39; 1Ki 8:35–39; Isa 45:1; Am 4:9). Yet the imagery goes beyond a literal locust plague in 2:1–11 (e.g., vv.3, 6, 10), especially as amplified in the spiritual challenge based on this event in 2:12–27 (cf. vv.17, 20, 26–27).

Joel saw the invaders spread out before the walls of the city. Therefore he cried, "Blow the trumpet . . . sound the alarm!" The trumpet (GK 8795) was made from a ram's horn and was used from earliest times as a signal to battle (e.g., Jdg 3:27; 6:34) or (as here) a signal of imminent danger (e.g., Hos 5:8; 8:1; Am 3:6). "My holy hill" stresses the spiritual basis of the situation. At the sound of the alarm, all would tremble because of the fearfulness of the events that were to take place. It was the Day of the Lord, seen as having arrived in all its frightful consequences!

2–3a That "day" of judgment will be one of darkness and gloominess, of clouds and thick darkness (cf. Am 5:18–20). With the suddenness of dawn spreading over the mountains, a mighty army has appeared, which cast its shadow over the entire face of the land. This army was unrivaled in records prior to Joel's day, and even then Assyria's fall would be due as much to inner stresses as to the combined efforts of the Scythians, Medes, and Babylonians.

3b What had been a scene of beauty would become a picture of utter desolation. Nothing in the land would escape.

4–6 The double figure of locusts and armies must be kept in mind. On the one hand, the locusts had appeared like horses (cf. Job 39:19–20; Rev 9:7). Not only had their swiftness and orderly charge been like a well-disciplined cavalry unit, but their very form was horselike. The clamor of the locusts' flight had been like the din of the dreaded war chariot or the crackling of blazing stubble ignited by a wild fire. The regularity of their advance had been like that of men set in battle array. The awesomeness of their approach had caused great anguish of heart.

On the other hand, Joel relates the dreadfulness of that past scene to the coming devastation by the Assyrian army. He notes first the approach of the war horses, then the frightful war chariots as they crested over the mountain passes above the cities of Judah. He compared the swiftness and noise of their advance to wild fire. He notes the uniformity of the charge of the finely trained and unstoppable host. If the locusts had caused terror, how much more the human invaders!

7–9 The attack of that mighty army was like a locust swarm. They performed as heroic warriors: they climbed the walls of the city, rushed through its streets, and reached the innermost recesses of every place. The mighty men of war first rushed against, then over the walls. All the while each moved straightforward (cf. Jos 6:5), holding his rank and course. Joel depicts the invincibility of the invading soldiers as they unswervingly continued through the city's defenses. Their attack was powerful and swift; they rushed unrestricted throughout the city.

10–11 Joel brings this section to a close by explaining this army's sure success. Its leader was none other than the omnipotent and sovereign God himself. Utilizing epithets that were well-known to every Israelite since the Exodus, Joel depicts God as moving with great might before the Assyrian host, "his army." There were signs on earth (a great shaking) and in heaven (the luminaries darkened). Before the advancing army the thunderstorm raged. The sight of the Assyrian host ought to have been enough to strike terror into the hearts of the people. The accompanying signs of God's visible presence leading that powerful battle array would melt the stoniest of hearts. It was nothing else than the day of the Lord's judgment against his own. Who could endure his visitation?

b. Joel's plea and prescription (2:12–27)

12–14 By means of the introductory phrase "'Even now,' declares the LORD," Joel presents God's concern for his people. Joel pleads with the people for broken and contrite hearts (cf. Ps 51:17): "Return [GK 8740] to me." After reiterating his plea, Joel gives the grounds for its acceptance: God is a God of grace and mercy, who not only has compassion for all in their need (cf. Jnh 4:2), but is a God of love who has revealed himself in redemptive grace (cf. Ex 34:6). God is slow to anger, abundant in his righteous concern for the spiritual welfare of humankind, and willing to forgive people in their evil condition: "He relents from sending calamity."

Since judgment is conditioned on one's failure to meet God's standards, for a person to repent and meet God in his gracious provision is to avert the just judgment. From a human point of view, God would seem to have "changed his mind" or "repented concerning the evil" (cf. Ex 32:14; 2Sa 24:16). God might even restore the forfeited blessings and the fertility of the land so that the discontinued sacrifices might again be offered, this time out of a pure heart.

15–17 Joel issues another call for a solemn assembly (cf. 1:14), this time to convene the people in the light of the revealed invasion that stood so near. All must meet with God and listen to his commandments and act on them.

The priests were to be the first to experience repentance in their lives. Then they were to lead the people in doing the same. The main business was to implore the God of all grace to spare his people, not only for their good, but also that his inheritance be not a reproach before the world or his name be brought into disrepute because of what they had done.

18–19 God promises the repentant heart that his godly jealous love (as a husband for his wife) would move him to have pity on his people. He would immediately restore all that had been lost in the locust plague; they would be fully satisfied (cf. Dt 6:10–11; 8:7–10; 11:13–15) and would no longer be a reproach among the nations.

20 God also pledges to remove "the northern army," most likely a reference to a foreign invader (i.e., the Assyrians) descending from the north. This prediction is built on the incident of the locust plague. If the people would turn to God in genuine repentance, he would drive that army into a dry and desolate land, no doubt the desert west of the Dead Sea and south and southeast of Judah.

A further reason for this turned-about condition, despite her being the Lord's army, would be that Assyria's haughty pride would cause her to leave proper bounds (cf. Pss 35:26; 38:16; cf. also La 1:9), bragging and assuming that the great destruction she was effecting would be her own doing (cf. Eze 35:13; Da 8:4, 8, 11; 11:36–37).

21–27 Should the people truly repent, not only would God's promises of restoration, rest, and protection be theirs, but certain additional benefits would accrue. The message was one of comfort: "Be not afraid."

The first object of God's consoling words was the ground that had suffered so much. It would rejoice and be glad (cf. 1:16); for God himself, who does great things (v.20), would undertake for it. Next God's comfort was directed to the beasts of the field (cf. 1:18–20), who would have an abundance of food. Furthermore, the fig tree and the vine (cf. 1:7, 12), symbols of Israel's relation with her Lord, would bear again in full strength.

This leads to the third and central object of divine solace: Israel herself. The "people of Zion" (all true Israelites) were to rejoice and be glad in the Lord their God, for he would restore them in righteousness. He would send again the refreshing former and latter rains. The arrival of "autumn rain" (at the beginning of the rainy season, Oct-Nov) and the "spring rain" (Mar-Apr) on proper schedule would demonstrate the blessing of God on those with repentant hearts (cf. Dt 11:13–17; Jer 5:24–25; Hos 6:1–3).

Joel next mentions God's supplying the people's third need: renewed provisions—threshing floors filled with grain, vats overflowing with wine and oil. God would thoroughly restore the years that the devastating plague had caused them to lose (cf. 1:4, 10, 17; 2:19). Whereas the locust plague had brought on famine, the people would now experience the full satisfaction of an abundance of food (cf. 2:19). Therefore, they could praise God in the full knowledge of all that his revealed name signifies (cf. Ex 6:3; Dt 12:7; Pss 8:1–2; 66:8–15; 67:57; Am 5:8–9; 9:5–6).

The restored fellowship would be attested by God's renewed designation of them as "my people." They need never again "be shamed," whether by locusts (1:11), among the heathen (2:17), or before the whole world (cf. Isa 29:22; 49:22–23; 54:4). Best of all they would know the abiding presence of God himself, dwelling in their midst (cf. 2:17; 3:17, 21; Hos 11:9).

II. God's Future Intentions: the Eschatological Program (2:28–3:21)

A. The Promise of His Personal Provision (2:28–32)

Since the previous section dealt with the near future, presumably the events prophesied here lay still further beyond. Indeed, these chapters disclose the Lord's eschatological interventions. Utilizing an apocalyptic style that was even then just emerging, Joel stresses two primary thoughts: the Lord's promise of personal provision in the lives of his own (2:28–32) and the prediction of his final triumph on behalf of his own at the culmination of human history (ch. 3).

1. The outpouring of the Spirit (2:28–31)

28–31 The Lord first promises that he will "pour out" (GK 9161) his Spirit. Hosea prophesied that the Lord must pour out his fury on an idolatrous Israel (5:10); Joel sees beyond this chastisement to the distant future (cf. Eze 36:16–38), when in a measure far more abundant than the promised rain (cf. 2:22–26) God would pour out his Holy Spirit in power. In those days (cf. Jer 33:15) that power would rest on all (i.e., human) flesh (cf. Isa 40:5–6; 66:23; Zec 2:12–13).

God's covenant people are primarily in view. Joel points out that what the Lord intended is that his Holy Spirit would be poured out on all believers, regardless of their age, sex, or status. It would be a time of renewed spiritual activity: prophesying, dreams, and visions (cf. Nu 12:6).

As visible signs of his supernatural intervention, God would cause extraordinary phenomena to be seen in nature. Although the heavens are mentioned first, the order that follows is one of ascending emphasis, beginning with events on earth (blood, fire, and smoke) and moving to signs in the sky (sun and the moon).

The earthly phenomena are no doubt principally concerned with the sociopolitical upheaval in that day: the blood and fire referring to warfare (cf. Nu 21:28; Ps 78:63; Isa 10:16; Zec 11:1; Rev 8:8–9; 14:14–20; et al.) and the rising smoke to gutted cities (cf. Jdg 20:38–40)—though God's activity in the natural world may also play a part (cf. Ex 19:9, 16–18; Rev 6:12, 17). These are to be recognized as well-known signs of the presence of a holy God (for blood, cf. Ex 7:17; 12:22–23; for fire, cf. Ex 3:2–3; 13:21–22; Eze 1:27; Ac 2:3; Heb 12:18; Rev 1:14; for smoke, cf. Ex 19:16–18; Isa 4:4–5; 6:4; Rev 15:8). The very signs speak of a redeemed and refined people eager to do God's will and to carry his message to a needy generation standing under his just judgment.

The heavenly phenomena are also portents of a miraculous nature. There will be a full eclipse of the sun by day (cf. 3:15; Am 5:18–20; 8:9; Zep 1:15); by night the moon will appear to be blood red, perhaps due to conditions caused by an accompanying earthquake (cf. Jer 4:23–24; Rev 6:12–13). All these will signal the advent of that great and terrible Day of the Lord. If the Day of the Lord in the Assyrian invasion would be "great" and "dreadful" (2:11), how much more the eschatological time designated "the great and dreadful day of the LORD"!

The Day of the Lord thus deals with judgment. As to the time of judgment, it could be present (1:15), the near future (Isa 2:12, 22; Jer 46:10; Eze 13:5; Am 5:18–20), the future-eschatological (Isa 13:6, 9; Eze 30:2–3; Ob 15; et al.), or the purely eschatological (Joel 3:14–15; Zec 14:1–21; 1Th 5:1–11; 2Th 2:2; 2Pe 3:10–13). The Day of the Lord, eschatologically speaking, also deals with deliverance for a regathered, repentant Israel (Joel 3:16–21; Zec 14:3; Mal 4:5–6). The NT further reveals that the eschatological Day of the Lord closes with the return of the Lord in glory (Rev 19:11–16) and the Battle of Armageddon (Rev 16:16; 19:17–21; cf. Eze 38–39), continues through the Millennium (Isa 2:1–4; 11:1–12:6; Mic 4:1–5; Rev 20), and culminates in the eternal state (2Pe 3:10–13; Rev 21–22).

2. The outworking of salvation (2:32)

32 Along with the outpouring of the Holy Spirit will be the outworking of salvation for those who truly trust God as Redeemer. To "call on the name of the LORD" is to call on him in believing faith (Pss 99:6; 145:18; Ro 10:3), which gives not only physical deliverance but a spiritual transformation and an abundant entrance into that great millennial period of peace and prosperity, when Judah and Jerusalem are once again spiritual centers for a redeemed Israel (cf. Hos 3:5; Mic 4:6–8).

Joel closes the chapter by balancing this thought with another truth. While salvation-deliverance will be the experience of the one who truly "calls on the name of the LORD" (cf. 2:26) in that day, it is God himself who will summon that remnant.

In Acts 2 Peter viewed Joel's prophecy as applicable to Pentecost (see Ac 2:16). Both his sermon and subsequent remarks are intimately intertwined with Joel's message (cf. Joel 2:30–31 with Ac 2:22–24; Joel 2:32 with Ac 2:38–40). The intent of Joel's prophecy was not only the restoration of prophecy but that such a gift was open to all classes of people. The Spirit-empowered words of the apostles on Pentecost were evidence of the accuracy of Joel's prediction; they were also a direct fulfillment of Christ's promise to send the Holy Spirit; see Lk 24:49; Jn 14:16–18; 15:26–27; 16:7–15; Ac 1:4–5, 8).

Peter affirmed that Joel's "afterward" must be understood as "in the last days" (cf. Joel 2:28 with Ac 2:17). The point of Peter's remark in Ac 2:16 must be that Pentecost, as the initial day of that period known as "The Last [Latter] Days," will culminate in the return of Jesus and thus certifies the start and character of those final events.

It must also be noted that the outpouring of the Spirit is an accompanying feature of that underlying basic divine promise given to Abraham and the patriarchs, ratified through David, reaffirmed in the terms of the new covenant, and guaranteed in the person and work of Jesus the Messiah (cf. Ge 12:1–3; 15; 17; 2Sa 7:11–29; et al.). At Pentecost two streams of prophecy meet and blend together: Christ's prophetic promise is directly fulfilled; Joel's prophecy is fulfilled but not consummated. It awaits its ultimate fulfillment in the Day of the Lord and the events distinctive to the nation of Israel.

B. The Prediction of His Final Triumph (3:1–21)

1. The tribulation program (3:1–17)

a. The coming of judgment (3:1–8)

1–3 Joel has a new and important announcement. In those future times (cf. 2:29) in which God deals kindly with his covenant people (cf. Jer 33:15–18), he will gather all nations together (cf. Zep 3:8) and enter into judgment with them in the Valley of Jehoshaphat concerning the treatment of his own (cf. Ro 11:25–26).

Judah and Jerusalem will once again be the center of God's attention. The time involved in vv.1–17 is that of the Great Tribulation—a period of Jacob's trouble (cf. Jer 30:7 with Mt 24:21; Mk 13:19, 24) and of great affliction for Israel (Dt 4:30; Da 12:1), a period culminated by God's outpoured wrath against the sinful nations of earth (Isa 13:9, 13; 26:20–21; Zep 1:15–18; Ro 2:5–10; 1Th 1:10; 5:10–11; 2Th 1:6–7; Rev 6:16–17; et al.) and the return of Christ in glory and to judgment (Mt 24:27–31; Mk 13:24–27; Rev 19:11–21).

"The Valley of Jehoshaphat" (lit., "the valley of judgment"), where God enters into judgment with the nations, is not a known valley, as the wordplay makes clear. Joel subsequently called it "the valley of decision" (v.14). The broad valley in the Jerusalem area formed in connection with a cataclysmic earthquake will either be the scene of earth's final battles or will be the climactic stroke in them.

In v.2c, God rehearses the charges against the heathen nations. First, they had scattered his people among the nations, not only after the Fall of Jerusalem, but in their continued dispersion and persecution up to the end times. God himself would have to call his people back to his land (cf. Jer 50:17–26). Second, though the people had divided God's land (cf. Am 7:17), he had not renounced his claim to his people or to his land. Third, so cheaply were his people valued that the heathen had cast lots for them and, even worse, had sold a boy for a prostitute's hire and a girl so that they might drink a flask of wine.

4–8 Joel next records God's solemn promise of the sure execution of his judgment on the nations. He begins with God's question as to their purposes regarding himself. The districts of western Canaan, Tyre, and Sidon (well-known slave dealers in the ancient world) and the Philistine coast (often condemned with the Phoenicians by the prophets) are singled out as the primary enemies of Judah, who committed the most inhuman of all crimes—dealing in human merchandise. God warns them that if they would now add insult to injury by taking vengeance without cause against the Lord himself, they could be assured that God would most swiftly repay them in just kind.

The detailed charges against the nations are that they had taken the silver and gold of God's people (probably by plundering their handsomely furnished houses) to their palaces. Furthermore, they had sold the Jewish children into the hands of the Greek slave-traders, sending them far away.

God warns these enemies that he would righteously repay them in kind (cf. Isa 24:14–23; 2Th 1:6–8), while arousing his dispersed and captive people from the distant lands of their bondage. As he had warned them (v.4), he would give those slave dealers a taste of their own medicine. Their people would in turn be sold into captivity by the children of Judah to the Sabeans who would send them far away.

Joel's prophecy, though intended for the end times, is also made historically applicable by being based on the current situation of his day. Not only would the great coalition of the future surely fall, but Uzziah's recapture of Ezion-Geber and his successes against the Philistines served as a warning of the dangerous position in which these allied commercial enemies of Joel's day stood.

b. The challenge in judgment (3:9–17)

9–12 The Lord's message is to be circulated among the nations (cf. Am 3:6–11). All the men of war were to assemble and prepare themselves in accordance with the proper spiritual rites before battle (cf. 1Sa 7:5–9), for in the final analysis theirs was to be the culmination of all holy warfare. The mighty men of battle were to be called up for duty (cf. 2:7). All segments of society and the economy were to be on a wartime footing. The basic agricultural tools were to be fashioned into weapons; weak and cowardly men were to count themselves as mighty men of war. The nations were soon to learn that the Lord too was mighty in battle (cf. Ex 15:3; Ps 24:8).

The surrounding nations are next commanded to come quickly and gather themselves together (cf. Pss 2:1–2; 110:1–3, 5–6) to that great final struggle that will culminate earth's present history (cf. Isa 17:12; 24:21–23; Mic 4:11–13; Zec 12:2–33; 14:1–3; Rev 16:14–16; 19:17–19). The thought of this climactic event causes the prophet to exclaim, "Bring down your warriors, O LORD!"—a reference to the angelic host (cf. Dt 33:2b–3; Pss 68:17; 103:19–20; Zec 14:5) of our mighty God. Whereas God's mighty ones had been the Gentile armies (ch. 2), God was now against those forces. Joel cries out for their just destruction.

The nations are bidden to come to the Valley of Jehoshaphat (see comment on v.2). The Lord had warned that he would enter into litigation with the enemies of his people; now he sits as judge to impose sentence on them (cf. Isa 28:5–6; Mt 25:31–46).

13–17 God is pictured as sending his reapers into the harvest field (cf. Rev 14:14–20) and to the winepress of judgment (Isa 63:3), for the nations are ripe for judgment; their wickedness is great and filled to overflowing. The confused and clamoring throng of nations and the tumultuous uproar and din of battle in this great day of reckoning are vividly portrayed (cf. Eze 38:21–23; Zec 14:13). The valley named Jehoshaphat (3:2, 12), in accordance with its purpose of being the place of final accomplishment, is now called "the valley of decision."

The accompanying signs in the natural world are depicted What was applicable to the local scene of impending battle in the day of the Assyrian invasion (2:10b) is now seen in all its final intensity. The Lord comes forth out of Zion as a roaring lion (cf. Am 1:2). Because the nations had roared insolently against God's people (Isa 5:25–30), the Lord would be as a lion roaring after its prey in behalf of the returned remnant (cf. Hos 11:10–11 with Jer 25:30–33). Heaven and earth will tremble at his presence among the nations (cf. Ps 29; Isa 29:6–8; 30:30–31; Zec 14:37; Rev 16:16–18).

But the very manifestation of his coming, so fearful for the nations (cf. Rev 6:12–17), gives assurance of protection and strength for God's own (cf. Isa 26:20–21). As Israel had learned of God's sovereign concern for his people through judgment (cf. Eze 6:7), now she would know of his eternal compassion through her deliverance and his abiding presence with her (cf. 2:27). In contrast to the nations who would learn who God really is (cf. Eze 6:36–38; 39:6–7), Israel would know the redeeming power and the continuous enjoyment of his glorious presence with her forever (cf. Isa 49:22–26; Jer 24:7; Eze 34:27–30; Zec 2:8–9; et al.). Because the Lord himself is there (cf. 2:32; 3:21), Jerusalem will be everlastingly holy (cf. Isa 52:1; 60:14, 21; Zec 14:21; Rev 21:2). None but his own shall again set foot in it.

2. The millennial prosperity (3:18–21)

18 Joel looks beyond the great battle to the resultant millennial scene. He concludes his prophecy by contrasting the judgment of the nations—typified by Israel's most protracted antagonist, Edom, and by her most persistent source of spiritual defeat, Egypt—with the blessings that will rest on the repentant, restored, and revitalized people of God.

In glowing and hyperbolic terms, Joel describes the great fertility of soil of the coming Millennial Age. What had been cut off in the locust plague of Joel's day due to sin (1:5) will be commonplace in that era permeated by the presence of the Holy One (cf. 2:19–27; Isa 55:1). The formerly barren hills will flourish again with vegetation. The wadis, dried by the drought of God's judgment, will flow again, giving renewed vitality to the land, as God pours out his blessing on people of renewed spiritual vitality (cf. Isa 30:25–26; Eze 34:13–14).

In Jerusalem a fountain will issue forth from the house of the Lord. Ezekiel (47:1–12) reported that it will terminate in the Dead Sea, transforming it from salt water to fresh water. Zechariah (14:8) spoke of a great flow of water from Jerusalem emptying into both the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean Sea, a prophecy that, once incredible, now stands authenticated by recent geological discoveries.

Joel goes on to say that these waters will gush through the Wadi Shittim (see NIV note). The exact location of this place is uncertain and has occasioned many suggestions. Perhaps the best solution is to identify it with a barren valley east of Judah, where the Israelites suffered spiritual failure before making the last encampment prior to their entrance into the Promised Land (cf. Nu 25:1; 33:49; Jos 3:1).

19 Joel next contrasts the future condition of Judah and Jerusalem with that of Egypt and Edom, longtime adversaries of Israel. In contrast with their desolation, Judah and Jerusalem will be inhabited forever. All Judah's sins will be forgiven, and the Lord himself will abide in her midst forever (cf. Eze 48:35).

20–21 Joel's last prophetic view is a picture of Israel's everlasting felicity. The reason for this state of unending happiness is apparent. The Lord himself will "dwell" (GK 8905; related to the word "tabernacle," GK 5438) in her midst in all his glory (cf. 3:17; Zec 8:3–8). From the Hebrew word shakan used here, theologians have spoken of the Lord's "shekinah glory." Throughout the OT this shekinah glory designates the active presence now of the invisible God who transcends the universe he created. However, because of the spiritual and moral decay that had led to religious formalism and open idolatry, that glory left the temple and Jerusalem (Eze 10; 11:22–25) to return not at all till that day of God's future temple (Eze 43:1–12), when God would again redeem his people and dwell among a repentant, regenerated, and grateful people (Zec 2:10–13).

Before that millennial scene, the NT writers reveal that God has another "tabernacling" with people. His unique Son became flesh, dwelling among us (Jn 1:14) as the promised Immanuel (Isa 7:14). Having redeemed a lost humanity through his death and resurrection, and being ascended into heaven, he now dwells in his own whom he has taken into union with himself (Eph 1:15–2:21; Col 1:15–22, 27; 2:9–10). As the triumphant Redeemer, he has given to the church, his body, gifts of which it is steward (Eph 4:8–10). The believer's destiny is to enjoy God's presence forever (Rev 21:2–3).

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

In many ways the eighth century B.C. was unique in the history of Judah and Israel. It witnessed the toppling of the northern kingdom from the glory of economic prosperity and international influence to virtual subjugation by a foreign power. It also witnessed the near collapse of Judah, averted only by the steadying hand of King Hezekiah, who could do no more than slow Judah's progress toward certain ruin.

At the same time, however, the eighth century witnessed the rise of one of the most potent moral forces the world has ever known—the writing prophets. These men shared an overwhelming conviction that God had called them. They denounced the sins of their contemporaries and also looked far into the future as they spoke of deliverance for both Jew and Gentile.

The dawn of the eighth century brought new hope to Israel and Judah. Israel's subjugation to Damascus ended abruptly when the Assyrians under Adad-nirari III crushed Damascus in 802 B.C. The internal difficulties that had plagued Judah also ended with Uzziah's accession to the throne (792–740 B.C.). He built up a powerful army and increased Judah's mercantile activities. In the northern kingdom, Jeroboam II (793–753 B.C.) came to the throne at roughly the same time as Uzziah. This king of Israel restored much of the territory that had fallen to Damascus (2Ki 14:28).

The conquest of Damascus and the attendant quiescence of Assyria, coupled with the brilliant leadership of Uzziah and Jeroboam, brought Judah and Israel to heights of prominence second only to Solomon's golden age. The kingdoms prospered and expanded their borders. But as their economic well-being and national strength continued to foster their security, an internal decay was at work. It was primarily moral because it involved a basic violation of the covenant established by God at Sinai.

The covenantal stipulations required loyalty to God and love toward one's fellow human beings. Yet the idolatrous worship of their pagan neighbors had infiltrated the two kingdoms, producing a strange syncretistic worship. While pagan high places dotted the countryside and people disobeyed God by worshiping idols that stood within the cities, they continued to trust in such concepts as the "day of the LORD" (5:18) and aspects of Levitical worship (4:4–5). Furthermore, they violated the social legislation of the covenant. Amos was particularly vehement in denouncing lack of social concern.

The erosion of Israel's social structure showed itself primarily in a cleavage between the rich and the poor. The improved economic situation in Israel led to an increase of the wealthy, who not only neglected the poor, but used them to increase their own wealth. God's will, as it applied to the nation of Israel, was ignored, and this spurred the eighth-century prophets to action. Their protest largely contributed to the establishment of a believing remnant. The prophets preserved faith by assuring the people that God had not forsaken his promise.

2. Authorship and Date

Almost all agree that the prophecy of Amos is an authentic production of the man whose name it bears. The consonance of his message with the eighth-century milieu and his forthright style make it difficult to think otherwise. Little is known of him apart from the sketchy references in the superscription and the body of the prophecy. Amos lived and worked in Tekoa (1:1), a town ten miles south of Jerusalem. He was a shepherd and also tended sycamore trees (7:14). God then called him to be a prophet. His character, molded in the harsh terrain of the wilderness of Tekoa, enabled him to stand before the priest and the people, proclaiming the word God had given him.

We may best place the prophetic activity of Amos in the latter half of the reign of Jeroboam II (793–753 B.C.; cf. 7:10). It would certainly have taken some time for the affluence during Jeroboam's reign to lead to the social decay that was so widespread when Amos carried out his mission to the northern kingdom. But it is difficult to find a more exact time in which Amos's mission would fit. Jotham, Uzziah's son, acceded to the regency of Judah when Uzziah was stricken with leprosy (c. 750 B.C.). That 1:1 mentions only Uzziah and not Jotham may point to a time before Jotham's accession. The phrase "two years before the earthquake" (1:1) limits the date of the prophecy to a narrow period. This earthquake may have occurred around 760 B.C., according to excavations at Hazor. Thus it seems best to place the prophetic ministry of Amos shortly before 760 B.C.

3. Theological Values

Central in Amos's preaching is his belief in divine sovereignty. The Lord is the God of history. He effects the migrations of peoples (9:7) and controls the orderly progression of natural phenomena (4:3; 5:8). Yet within that sovereign domain, humankind has the freedom to bow in submission to the Lord or to reject him.

Amos affirmed the historical election of Israel (3:2). But he preached strongly against the perverted concept of election which held that God was unconditionally committed to the nation. Their election alone did not guarantee national blessing, for the sovereign God promised that the people of Israel would be his "treasured possession" (Ex 19:5) only if they obeyed him and kept his covenant.

A unique concept in Amos is his teaching about the Day of the Lord. Rather than being a day of national deliverance, it would be a time when the Lord would judge all sin, even in his own people. The gloomy portrayal of that day in this book reflects the fact that Amos's hearers were guilty of many transgressions. But Amos also predicted another coming Day, when hope will shine forth with glorious promise (9:13–15). This Davidic promise will be realized when David's kingdom is restored and Jews and Gentiles are united in the kingdom of David's Greater Son.

EXPOSITION

I. Superscription (1:1)

1 The prophecy is introduced by the formula "the words of Amos." Frequently this expression is used for collections of sayings or oracles (cf. 1:1; Pr 30:1; 31:1; Ecc 1:1).

The word translated "shepherd" (GK 5924) is not the usual word for shepherd; it implies that he was a breeder and supplier of sheep (2Ki 3:4). In Am 7:14 another word is used for shepherd to describe Amos's occupation (GK 1012); this word suggests that Amos kept cattle as well as sheep. Thus likely Amos was a breeder of various types of animals.

Amos's character and ideals were shaped by the desert. Being "neither a prophet nor a prophet's son" (7:14), he was not part of the prophetic movement in Judah. Undoubtedly his simple life in the desert led him to see more clearly the evils of city life.

The prophetic word of Amos concerned Israel, no doubt the northern kingdom. The numerous references to localities in the north as well as the encounter with Amaziah support this.

Uzziah (or Azariah), king of Judah, was an energetic king whose policies contributed to the resurgence of Judah in the eighth century. He rebuilt the city of Elath and strengthened the defenses of Jerusalem. Jeroboam II, king of Israel, was a vigorous leader. His greatest accomplishment was the expansion of Israelite territorial holdings into the Transjordan (2Ki 14:23–29).

II. Introduction to the Prophecy (1:2)

2 Verse 2 forms an appropriate introduction to the entire prophecy. The name "LORD" ("Yahweh"; GK 3378), which introduces the prophecy, connotes God's redemptive and covenantal concerns. The Exodus gave the name its greatest revelational content. Moses' first impression of God's character was the Lord's inviolable holiness (Ex 3:5). The awesome phenomena accompanying his appearance on Sinai (Ex 19:16–25) and the restrictions he placed on the people (Ex 19:10–15) enforced the concept of his holiness.

The prophet introduces a shocking note in depicting the Lord as roaring from Zion (cf. Joel 3:16). Linked with the roar of the Lord in Joel and here in Amos is the crashing of thunder (cf. Job 37:4). "Thunders" appears in a number of passages depicting God's intervention in history (Pss 18:13; cf. v.6; 46:6–11; Jer 10:13; 51:16; Joel 2:11). In some of these passages God's power is expressed in natural phenomena, most frequently in a violent thunderstorm.

The roar of the Lord is accompanied by cosmic changes. But instead of a storm, God's wrath causes a withering drought to destroy the green hills of Mount Carmel—a landmark of the northern kingdom.

III. The Prophetic Oracles (1:3–6:14)

A. Oracles of Judgment Against the Surrounding Nations (1:3–2:5)

A striking pattern runs through these oracles. The prophet begins with the distant city of Damascus and moves in ever-tightening circles till at last he pounces on Israel. One can imagine Amos's hearers approving the denunciation of these heathen nations and even applauding God's denunciation of Judah. But Amos plays no favorites; he swoops down on the unsuspecting Israelites as well.

1. The oracle against Syria (1:3–5)

3 Damascus represented the entire nation of Syria (Aram). From the time of Ahab till the dawn of the eighth century, there were hostilities between Israel and Damascus. Particularly embarrassing had been the incursion of Syria into Israelite territory during the reign of Jehu (2Ki 10:32–33).

The numerical motif—"for three sins . . . even for four"—is common in Semitic literature (e.g., Job 5:19; 33:29; Pr 6:16; 30:15–31; Ecc 11:2; Mic 5:5–6) and is not always to be taken literally. Sometimes it denotes an indefinite number, as here. Amos cites only one crime of Damascus in this oracle.

The lack of immediate reference to a specific punishment following the statement "for three sins of" creates a feeling of dread uncertainty. The attention of the hearers would have been riveted on the prophet's words as they waited for the explicit judgment that comes in the last section of each oracle. The crime that provoked the judgment against Damascus was that the people had threshed Gilead with iron threshing sledges. Gilead, an extensive region east of the Jordan River, was known for its rich forests (Jer 22:6–7) and balm (Jer 8:22). Its richness, coupled with its being a frontier region, made it the object of numerous attacks by Ammon and Syria.

The incident Amos refers to here is probably the one recorded in 2Ki 13:1–9, where an incursion of the Syrians into Israel is described as making the army of Jehoahaz "like the dust at threshing time" (v.7). The threshing sledge was made of parallel boards fitted with sharp points. The metaphor implies extreme decimation and cruel or inhuman treatment.

4 The judgment the Lord decrees for Syria is "fire upon the house of Hazael." Hazael ruled Syria about 841 to 806 B.C. (cf. 2Ki 8:13). The Lord had revealed that Hazael would commit monstrous crimes against the Israelites (2Ki 8:12). When he came to the throne, he fought against Joram and Ahaziah at Ramoth Gilead, seriously wounding Joram (2Ki 8:28–29).

Ben-Hadad ("son of Hadad," an ancient storm god) is the name of two or possibly three kings of Syria. It may be a dynastic name. Ben-Hadad I, a contemporary of Baasha of Israel (909–886 B.C.) and Asa of Judah (911–870 B.C.), took large holdings from Baasha (1Ki 15:20). Each "Ben-Hadad" carried on continual hostilities against Israel. Likely the Ben-Hadad Amos had in mind was the son of Hazael (2Ki 13:3).

The "fire" is not a description of an isolated occurrence relating only to Damascus but appears in all the oracles except the one against Israel (2:6–16). It is perhaps a metaphorical representation of God's judgment (cf. 7:4).

5 The destruction of Damascus involved breaking the "gate of Damascus." Ancient gates were equipped with massive bars, sometimes of iron or bronze (1Ki 4:13). The breaking of the bar implies that the enemies had gained entrance to the city.

The identity of the places mentioned in this verse is difficult. The "Valley of Aven" was likely the plain between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon ranges. Beth Eden was probably an important city located on the Euphrates River. Kir is understood by Amos as the place of the national origin of the Syrians (9:7) and the place to which they would return. His prophecy was fulfilled when Tiglath-pileser took the people of Damascus captive and transported them to Kir (2Ki 16:9).

2. The oracle against the Philistines (1:6–8)

6–8 The prophet next turns to the Philistines, the perennial enemies of the Israelites who may have had their national origin in the Aegean area, probably Crete. They occupied the coastal plain in southwest Palestine and conducted numerous raids on the Israelites until their power was broken by King David.

Amos mentions four of the cities of the Philistine pentapolis in this oracle, excluding only Gath. Perhaps Gath never fully recovered from Uzziah's successful military campaign described in 2Ch 26:6, an event that occurred sometime between Amaziah's death (767 B.C.) and Amos's ministry (760 B.C.). Gath is excluded from all the lists of the Philistine cities cited after Amos (Jer 25:20; Zep 2:4; Zec 9:5–6).

The Philistines are denounced for the crime of enslavement—again a social crime. The event referred to was probably a series of border raids in which slaves were secured and sold to the Edomites. "Whole communities" were taken, thus underscoring the enormity of the crime. Likely the crime was committed against Israelites. The punishment to be inflicted on the Philistines was their absolute destruction.

3. The oracle against Tyre (1:9–10)

9–10 Amos has moved from Damascus in the northeast to the Philistine territory in the southwest. He moves next to Tyre, to the north of Israel and southwest of Damascus and thus closer to Israel than Damascus and the Philistine cities. Tyre was the most important city of Phoenicia at that time.

These are the ruins of the fortified Philistine city of Ashkelon, one of the cities of their pentapolis (cf. Jos 13:3).

The crime of Tyre also involved enslavement of "whole communities," but to this Amos adds a reference to its "disregarding a treaty of brotherhood." This may refer to the pact made between Hiram, king of Tyre, and Solomon (1Ki 5:12; cf. "brother" in 1Ki 9:13). This relationship was strengthened by the marriage of Jezebel, daughter of Eth-baal, king of the Sidonians, to King Ahab (1Ki 16:31). While Jehu's purge of the family of Ahab (2Ki 10) interrupted the good relationship between the two states, Amos may have been referring to the generally amicable relations that characterized these nations over their long histories.

Tyre's security, however, was only temporary. It came under Assyrian hegemony during the long period of that empire's dominance but emerged from Assyrian control to enter a period of power and affluence. Later, Tyre was besieged by the forces of Nebuchadnezzar and never fully recovered. The massive efforts required for its defense greatly weakened the city.

4. The oracle against Edom (1:11–12)

11 The extensive, mountainous region of Edom lay southeast of the southern tip of the Dead Sea, east of the Arabah. It was one of the three Transjordanian kingdoms that included Ammon and Moab. Edom's crime was that "he pursued his brother with a sword" and "his anger raged continually"—a reference to the long-standing animosity of Edom toward the Israelites.

Edom was another name for Esau, the twin brother of Jacob. The Edomites and Israelites thus had close ethnic ties (cf. "brother" in Nu 20:14; Dt 23:7; Ob 12). The bitter relations between Jacob and Esau were perpetuated in the affairs of the two countries. In their desert journey the Israelites sought access to the king's highway that ran through Edom, but the Edomites refused passage and even sent a military force to block them (Nu 20:14–21). Later, the Edomites were enemies of Saul (1Sa 14:47), David (2Sa 8:14), and Jehoram (2Ki 8:20–22). Their greatest act of hostility against Israel occurred during the sack of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B.C. At that time the Edomites gloated over the destruction of their enemies and hindered the fugitives' escape, delivering many over to their captors (Ob 10–14).

The crime of Edom was in many ways similar to that of the other nations Amos speaks against—violence against one's fellow human beings. Amos emphasizes that the Edomites stifled "all compassion" (cf. Jas 4:11; 1Jn 2:9).

12 For these crimes the cities of Teman and Bozrah were to be destroyed. Teman, one of the largest cities of Edom, and Bozrah, a strong fortress city in the north of Edom, represent the whole country (cf. Isa 34:8; 63:1; Jer 49:13, 20; Eze 25:13; Ob 9). Edom became tributary to Tiglath-pileser III in 732 B.C. and was later overrun by the Nabataeans.

5. The oracle against Ammon (1:13–15)

13 Ammon lay northeast of the Dead Sea and north of Moab. The area was dominated by a vast expanse of desert, though the valley of the upper Jabbok in the north Ammon was fertile. The origin of the Ammonites (and the Moabites) was an incestual relationship between Lot and his two daughters (see Ge 19:30–38). The Ammonites frequently sought to enlarge their territory, sometimes with the help of Moab and Syria (cf. Jdg 10:6–9). A serious threat to Israel by the Ammonites was quelled by the strong, personal leadership of Saul (1Sa 11:1–11). They were finally subdued in David's time (2Sa 12:26–31).

The crime Amos accuses the Ammonites of was like that of the other nations. They "ripped open the pregnant women of Gilead." Gilead was a mountainous region east of the Jordan, in the tribal territories of Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh. This crime evidently took place in one of their attempts to expand their territorial holdings at Israel's expense (cf. 2Ki 8:12)—a crime that went far beyond necessary acts of war and is attributed to the Ammonites' insatiable desire for Israelite territory. Apparently it was a notorious event, and its mention would stir feelings of revulsion in Amos's hearers.

14–15 Rabbah was the capital of ancient Ammon. Ammon was to be destroyed by fire, to the accompaniment of the shouts of battle and "violent winds." The word translated "war cries" refers to the shout of the enemy "on the day of battle," a sound that would terrify the people as the enemy rushed to take the city. The word "winds" describes the great force with which the enemy would sweep over the city. The king of Ammon was to go into exile along with his officials. Ezekiel berated them for rejoicing at the fall of Jerusalem (Eze 25:1–7). Yet their rejoicing was to last only a little while, for they were caught up in the same turmoil that affected Israel. Nebuchadnezzar sacked the city of Rabbah and took large numbers of its citizens captive. Thereupon the Ammonites passed from history for good.

6. The oracle against Moab (2:1–3)

1 Moab (for their origin, see comment on 1:13) lay to the east of the Dead Sea, between Ammon and Edom. Antipathy between the Israelites and Moabites developed early when the king of Moab would not grant them permission to use the king's highway (Jdg 11:17). As a result the Moabites were excluded from the assembly of Israel (cf. Dt 23:3–4).

The Israelites camped in the plains of Moab before entering Canaan (Nu 22:1). The king of Moab engaged Balaam, the enigmatic seer, to curse them (Nu 22:4–6). There the Moabite women seduced the Israelites to join in their idolatrous worship (Nu 25:1–3). During a period of Israelite weakness, a coalition of Moabites, Ammonites, and Amalekites invaded Israel and subjugated them for eighteen years (Jdg 3:13–14).

Saul defeated the Moabites (1Sa 14:47), as did David (2Sa 8:2). During Solomon's reign Moab seems to have remained under Israelite dominion, for Solomon included Moabite women among his many wives (1Ki 11:1). But Mesha, king of Moab, rebelled against Israel after the death of Ahab (2Ki 1:1). Joram of Israel and Jehoshaphat of Judah, along with the king of Edom, made an abortive attempt to subdue them (2Ki 3). Later Hazael, an Aramean king, wrested from Jehu the disputed Moabite territory north of the Arnon (2Ki 10:32–33).

The crime Amos charges the Moabites with was their burning of the bones of the king of Edom. This may have taken place during the attempt of the coalition of the kings of Israel, Judah, and Edom to suppress the Moabite rebellion (2Ki 3). The expression "burn the bones" usually refers to the burning of the skeletal remains of a corpse (2Ki 23:20; cf. v.16; cf. also 1Ki 13:2; Eze 24:10) or the burning of the corpse itself (Am 6:9–10). Thus the crime of Moab involved the desecration of the body of an Edomite king.

2–3 The punishment of Moab was to be a fire that would consume Kerioth—a major city in Moab (cf. Jer 48:24). Amos uses vivid language to describe the conflict that would overthrow Moab. One can almost hear the "war cries" and "the blast of the trumpet."

Moab became subject to Tiglath-pileser III in 734 B.C. Later it was involved in a rebellion against Assyrian domination that was quelled by Sennacherib. During the period of Babylonian supremacy, Moab was forced to pay tribute to Babylon. The Moabites rebelled against Babylon shortly after 598 B.C. and were conquered by Nebuchadnezzar. Like Ammon, the nation of Moab disappeared from history.

It is significant that Amos here pronounces the punishment of the Lord on a social crime involving a non-Israelite. In his other oracles the crimes were, for the most part, against the covenant people. But Amos understands that an aspect of God's law transcends Israel. He affirms a moral law that extends to noncovenant nations, a law that would surely bring punishment if violated. The Moabites were held liable for the law of social responsibility—respect for human dignity and for the rights of all people.

7. The oracle against Judah (2:4–5)

4–5 Having pronounced judgment on various pagan nations, Amos next turns to Judah. Judah is condemned for rejecting the "law of the LORD." This is the first time this expression occurs in these oracles, and its significance is obvious. Those who stood in relationship to the covenant were judged on the basis of the light they possessed in God's law, not on the basis of a common moral consciousness.

"Led astray" connotes "to wander around" (GK 9494). It is used of straying animals and intoxicated persons. Judah had been led astray by "false gods." The expression "walked after them" frequently relates to following false gods. This sin of idolatry caused Judah to violate the law of the Lord. Like their fathers of old, they continued to bow down to the false gods of the pagans and to spurn the Creator.

Judah's punishment was to be similar to that of the other nations—destruction by the fire of war. It was inflicted when Jerusalem fell to the Babylonians in 612 B.C.

B. Oracles of Judgment Against Israel (2:6–6:14)

1. A lesson from history (2:6–16)

6 The Israelites were accused of selling "the righteous for silver" and "the needy for a pair of sandals." The word "righteous" parallels "needy," establishing a connection between them. The word "righteous" (GK 7404) connotes "righteousness," not in the sense of blamelessness, but rather in the basic sense of "rightness" or "justice." The needy are seen as being in the right, or as having a just cause (cf. Ex 23:7; Dt 25:1). This shows us something of the social conditions of that time when the poor had to fight for their just rights.

"They" applies to the oppressing classes, especially the judges and creditors who "sell the righteous." These people of power and influence were guilty of accepting bribes. They regarded the oppressed classes so lightly that they accepted such paltry bribes as a pair of sandals.

7 Amos further describes the oppression of the poor as trampling "on the heads of the poor." The word translated "trample" (GK 8635) may also have the sense of "pant," suggesting the rendering, "who pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor." This means either that the oppressing classes longed to see the poor brought to extreme anguish or that they were so avaricious that they craved even the dust that the poor had cast on their heads as a sign of sorrow (e.g., 2Sa 1:2; Job 2:12).

Israel's decadence was marked by sexual promiscuity. The word for "girl" is general and has no specific connotations. Most likely the sin depicted here relates to the ancient laws against incest (Lev 18:6–18; 20:17–21), as indicated by "profane my holy name" (cf. Lev 22:32, which culminates a lengthy section on personal and social purity). The use of one girl by both a father and a son was tantamount to incest in that the son uncovered the nakedness of his father and vice versa. Furthermore, the marital purity and faithfulness expected in a godly father were lacking, as both father and son engaged in deliberate acts of disobedience to God.

8 Amos pictures members of his society as sleeping by the altars on "garments taken in pledge." Clothing was valid collateral for securing debts. Hebrew law, however, required that such garments be restored to the owner each evening (Ex 22:26–27) as a covering during sleep. Many obviously disregarded this law. The placing of this practice "beside every altar" emphasizes the great disparity between religion and practice in Israel. This is further illustrated by the people's drinking in the "house of their god" the wine paid as fines.

9 Amos next recounts God's gracious acts during Israel's past. "Amorite" is sometimes used for the preconquest population of Canaan (Ge 15:16). The prophet reminds the people of God's destruction of the powerful Canaanites in the Conquest. The great height and strength of the Canaanites reflect a tradition begun at the return of the spies from their reconnaissance of Canaan (Nu 13:22–33). It points to their apparent invincibility and contrasts it with the might of the Lord. Amos's vivid metaphor of the fruit and the roots portrays the destruction of the Canaanites when the Israelites took the Promised Land.

10 Amos sees the Exodus and the forty years of wandering in the desert as expressions of the gracious power of the Lord. Thus there was no need for him to mention Israel's disobedience during that time. He simply points out that the Lord gave them "the land of the Amorites."

11–12 The raising up of prophets and Nazirites was another of God's gracious acts. These two groups ministered God's word to Israel and showed the Lord's care for their spiritual welfare. The word "Nazirite" (GK 5687) conveys the idea of "separate" and denotes the consecration practiced by this group. The Nazirites took special vows of separation (cf. Nu 6:1–12), abstaining from partaking of any product of the vine and vowing neither to cut their hair nor to touch a dead body. They were an influence for good in Israel. But now Israel was forcing them to drink wine and to violate their vows, and they were muzzling the prophets. This was tantamount to rejecting the word of the Lord.

13–16 Amos's rehearsal of Israel's rejection of the God who acted on their behalf—from Egypt to the present—leads to his statement of doom. The coming judgment is vividly expressed in a series of images rapidly moving from one familiar realm to another. First, Amos pictures the nation as being crushed under the wheels of a heavily laden cart. This reflects Amos's familiarity with the agricultural world. The other images include a swift runner, a strong man, and a warrior—all depicting Israel's inability to escape the impending destruction. The archer cannot stand. The brave warriors will flee with nothing left, their weapons and armor scattered behind as on a battlefield. In other words, the sword of the Lord that had fought for them would be turned against them. The oracle closes with an awesome note of finality—"declares the LORD."

2. A lesson based on cause and effect (3:1–12)

1 A summons to hear the "word of the LORD" introduces this oracle. It is directed against "the whole family I brought up out of Egypt" and thus seems to include Judah as well as Israel. Amos did not have high hopes for Judah (2:5), and he would never have exempted them from divine wrath because of their disobedience. The pronouncement of judgment, addressed primarily to the northern kingdom, warned Judah and Israel against thinking that their election by the Lord was sufficient ground for their national security; for God demanded personal obedience as well.

2 The statement "you only have I chosen of all the families of the earth" establishes Israel's elective privilege. The word "chosen" is literally "known" (GK 3359) and bears a special sense of intimacy. It includes the idea of God's sovereign activity whereby the object of that knowledge is set apart or chosen for a divine purpose (cf. Jer 1:5). Israel's privilege, however, incurred her punishment. Elective privilege entails responsibility. Because Israel failed to live up to her holy calling, she would be punished (cf. vv.11–12).

3–5 The words of judgment are preceded by a series of questions that culminate in an affirmation of Amos's prophetic authority. The first questions all anticipate a negative answer. Amos asks, Is it customary for two to walk together without agreeing to do so? Certainly not for an extended period of time. Does a lion roar when it is stalking its prey? Hardly. Is a bird ensnared without someone setting a trap or is a snare sprung unless something triggers it? Not likely.

6 To this point each question has begun with the effect followed by the cause. But now the order is reversed. Here the cause is the blast of the trumpet and the effect is the fear it brings to the city dwellers. The sound of the trumpet from a city wall warned of invaders, or the trumpet in the square heralded bad news. Ultimately the cause of the "disaster" coming to a city is "the LORD." The figures in these questions are not necessarily representations of Israel or her enemies but simply vivid analogies from life intended to illustrate the forthcoming conclusion (v.8).

7 "Plan" (GK 6051) has as its basic meaning the thought of "intimacy." It may connote a close relationship (Ge 49:6; Job 29:4; Ps 111:1; Jer 6:11) or the scheming of those united against others (Pss 64:2; 83:3). It may refer to something as intimate as a secret (Pr 11:13; 25:9) or close fellowship with a friend (Ps 55:14). When used of God, it refers to his secret council (Job 15:8) or the intimate relationship the righteous have with God in which he "makes his covenant known to them" (Ps 25:14) and takes them "into his confidence" (Pr 3:32).

8 "The lion has roared" sounds an alarm. There is indeed cause for fear—not from any lion or blast of a trumpet, but from the Lord's voice through his prophet. The Lord has spoken, and no one can contravene his word. So Amos is about to pronounce judgment on the people.

9 Amos summons the Egyptians and the Philistines of Ashdod to witness the oppression going on within Samaria. Amos may have chosen these nations because of their past oppression of Israel. It is as though Amos was asking these nations to view the violence being done by the rich and powerful against their poor neighbors in Samaria, a kind of oppression that even the pagan nations had never seen.

10 The Israelites were different from other aggressors because they plundered and looted in their own fortresses rather than in enemy territory. By oppressing the poorer classes, they had been plundering their own people; and Ashdod and Egypt were called to witness this evil. "They do not know how to do right," Amos declared of the Israelites. Their moral sense had become so warped that right and wrong were blurred.

11 "Therefore" logically connects the judgment segment of the oracle with the accusation stated in v.10. The following section of doom is a warning for those who flagrantly violated the covenant by treating a holy God lightly. Though the enemy who would overrun the land is not identified by Amos, historically we know it was Assyria.

12 Amos concludes the oracle with the analogy of a shepherd who retrieves the remains of an animal from the mouth of a lion. This reflects the Mosaic law, for a shepherd was required to produce the remains of an animal killed while in his care as proof that he did not steal it (Ex 22:13).

Amos goes on to describe how the Israelites, "those who sit in Samaria on the edge of their beds and in Damascus on their couches," would be "saved." As the remaining parts of the slaughtered animal attest to its destruction, so the broken remains of the wealth of Israel would be a pathetic witness to the complete destruction of that kingdom.

3. An oracle against the house of Jacob (3:13–15)

13 The command to hear is not addressed to Israel, for it goes on to say, "and testify against the house of Jacob." But this is best understood as a rhetorical statement, similar to 3:9 ("proclaim"), where Amos addresses imaginary witnesses either for dramatic effect or to establish a legal atmosphere with the Lord and Israel as adversaries (Isa 1:2; cf. Dt 32:1).

"House of Jacob" recalls Israel's heritage, especially the promise to the patriarchs that established the grounds on which the Lord would deal with his people. The covenant became the external structure of the eternal promise (Ge 15:12–20), providing the vehicle for obedience. Israel had betrayed the covenant and so had forfeited every right to its promised blessing.

14–15 As a result of Israel's disobedience, the "altars of Bethel" would be destroyed as well as the expensive homes of the people. Amos focuses on the two major aspects of Israel's disobedience: false religion and misuse of wealth and power. According to Israelite law, a fugitive could find refuge at the altar by grasping its horns (1Ki 1:50), but even this last refuge would be lost. The winter house and the summer house most likely refer to separate houses. The winter house would be destroyed along with the summer house.

4. The pampered women of Samaria (4:1–3)

1 The region of Bashan was known for its excellent cattle (Ps 22:12; Eze 39:18), to which Amos sarcastically likens the women of Samaria. He accuses these rich women of oppressing the poor, just as he had accused the male leaders of his society. They may not have been directly involved in mistreating the poor, but their incessant demands for luxuries drove their husbands to greater injustices. Their demand, "Bring us some drinks," creates a vivid picture of their indolence.

2–3 An oath in which the Lord "has sworn [GK 8678] by his holiness" introduces the judgment section of this oracle. The element in the oath formula by which one swears forms an external guarantee of the thing being affirmed (cf. Heb 6:16). When God takes an oath, that element usually relates to the nature of the thing sworn. For example, in Jer 44:26 the Lord swore by his great name, which signifies his reputation achieved by his mighty deeds, demonstrating his power and authority. Here the "holiness" of God is his absolute separation from anything secular or profane. God guarantees that the judgment will become a reality, because the holy God does not lie, nor can his holiness allow sin to go unpunished.

The Hebrew words used to describe Israel's judgment are obscure. Both "hooks" and "fishhooks" basically relate to some kind of thorn or hook. One form of the word underlying "hooks" is attested in Hebrew as "shields." Thus it may picture these indolent women, who lay on beds of luxury, being carried away on the enemies' shields. A more common meaning of the word "fishhooks" is "pot" or "receptacle." Its association with "fish" may mean a receptacle for carrying fish or a cauldron for boiling fish. At any rate, these women would be led in humiliating fashion through the breached wall of Jerusalem.

5. Sinful worship (4:4–5)

4 Amos addresses all the people in this shocking command: "Go to Bethel and sin." Bethel was the chief religious sanctuary of the northern kingdom. It once housed the ark and was one of the locations in Samuel's circuit (1Sa 7:16). Shortly after the division of the kingdom, Bethel was established as a sanctuary by Jeroboam I to provide an alternative center to Jerusalem (1Ki 12:26–29). In the time of Amos, Bethel was known as "the king's sanctuary" (7:13). It thus may have been the scene of royal as well as religious pomp.

The cultic worship practiced at Bethel combined concepts common to Canaanite religion, resulting in a syncretistic Israelite religion devoid of real allegiance to the covenant. Certainly, elements of Israel's religion were observed there (4:4–5; 5:21–23). But the idolatrous influences had left their mark. The heart—indeed, the very life of Israel's religion—had been destroyed; and the covenantal obligation of a heart response to God and a caring love for one's fellow humans were forgotten.

Gilgal was another Israelite sanctuary in Amos's time (5:5; cf. Hos 4:15; 9:15 12:11). Lest the people think that Bethel should be the only sanctuary that bore an onus, the prophet includes Gilgal.

The word "sin" connotes the basic concept of "rebellion." Little did these worshipers know that as they participated in the religious rites in order to maintain their relationship to the Lord, they were actually in rebellion against him. The morning sacrifices are probably not the continual burnt offering presented each morning and evening (Ex 29:38–41; Lev 6:8–13; Nu 28:3–4); rather, the context of Am 4:4–5 deals with the individual sacrifices of pilgrims to the cultic centers. The other aspects of worship mentioned (v.5)—the tithe, the thank offering, the free-will offering—are also individual obligations.

5 Possibly Amos represents the cultic practices prescribed for the pilgrimage to the cult centers that were current in his time, but it is also possible that he was using hyperbole to show the futility of offering many sacrifices and tithes. This seems to reflect the intent of the passage, because Amos said, "This is what you love to do." It is as though he was telling them that even if they sacrificed every morning and tithed regularly so that they had something to boast about, in the end they were only engaging in acts of rebellion against God.

6. A look to the past (4:6–13)

This section expresses the immanence of God in history. Amos relates a series of events from Israel's past that he interprets as God's intervention on her behalf. Terrible as these catastrophes were, they were designed by a loving God to alert Israel to her sin and to the certainty of judgment; yet the nation did not return to him (v.11). This section vividly illustrates God's permissive will that brings suffering so that his own may be brought closer to him (Heb 12:6).

6 This verse is literally, "I gave you cleanness of teeth" (see NIV note), an expression describing complete lack of food. The catastrophes mentioned are difficult to identify historically, though they reflect God's continuing activity in history on Israel's behalf.

7–8 The "withheld rain" is the latter rain, so important to the full development of the crops. That rain fell on some towns and not on others might show that God's hand was in the catastrophe. Nevertheless, the suffering that resulted did not lead to repentance.

9–10 Even the blighted gardens and dying trees did not remind the people of their spiritual responsibility; neither did God's judgment on individuals. The reference to plague and sword recalls the curse of Lev 26:25, which was to come on the nation if the people walked contrary to God. The "sword" refers to war and was a reminder of the long period of warfare with Syria (2Ki 13:3).

11 Amos compares the overthrow of certain Israelite cities to the fall of Sodom and Gomorrah, which are used as analogies of destruction in a number of passages (Isa 1:9; 13:19; Jer 50:40; Zep 2:9). Hence the picture is of the violence suffered by certain Israelite cities during the Syrian incursions. The analogy of the stick snatched from the fire probably describes the conquered towns that might have been lost forever but were "snatched" from the fire of conflict and restored to their inhabitants because of the intervention of some "deliverer" (see 2Ki 13:1–9).

Divine chastisement is that aspect of his dealing with his children in which he uses punishment to bring them back to him (cf. Job 33:19–33; Pr 3:11; cf. Heb 12:5–11). Of course, suffering does not always have this purpose. The point of vv.6–11 is that the Israelites had become spiritually hardened. Because Amos does not want his hearers to forget this, he stated five times, "Yet you have not returned to me" (vv.6, 8, 9, 10, 11).

The preceding verses contain a number of connections with Dt 28–29, where Moses set forth the blessings of obedience and the curses of disobedience. Thus Amos shows Israel that the catastrophes mentioned are evidence that God has chastised Israel in the past for her sins. The curses of Deuteronomy have been realized. Soon the ultimate curse will follow: "Then the LORD will scatter you among all nations from one end of the earth to the other" (Dt 28:64).

12 Judgment is impending, but Amos does not state what the judgment will be ("this" does not likely refer to the catastrophes of vv.6–11 because those are broader in scope than the captivity Amos elsewhere envisions as the impending judgment). The haunting uncertainty in Amos's words makes the threat of judgment even more ominous. Israel is to meet her God, not in a face-to-face sense, but as he intervenes in history to effect her destruction. The imperative "Prepare to meet your God, O Israel" has an aura of finality. When Israel meets her God, she will finally learn the nature of the coming judgment.

The command "Prepare" should not be understood as a plea for the people to repent. The die was cast. They had not turned to God when he chastised them (vv.6–11), and now Amos holds out no hope for their full-scale repentance. The people were to get ready for the national calamity about to befall them.

13 A hymnic element, portraying some aspects of the nature of the God the Israelites are to face in judgment, closes this section. The word "forms" refers to God's activity in Creation and is paralleled by the word "creates." Not only does God form the mountains and create the wind, but he reveals to human beings "his thoughts." The word for "thoughts" (GK 8465) is never used of God, and it is unlikely that Amos believes that God revealed his thoughts to all people (cf. 3:7). It is best to speak of God's activity in searching the hearts of all humankind and revealing their secret thoughts and motives.

"High places" could refer to pagan religious sanctuaries (Jer 7:31), but more likely refers to mountains and hills. In ancient times possession of the heights of enemy territory meant that the enemy was virtually brought into subjection (Dt 33:29; Eze 36:2). The majestic metaphor of God striding over the hills and mountains shows his sovereignty over the earth (cf. Mic 1 37; 3:9–12). The awe this picture brings is heightened by the last line: "the LORD God Almighty" (lit., "LORD God of Hosts"). The "hosts" (GK 7372) are generally taken to be the heavenly bodies or the armies of heaven.

7. A lament for fallen Israel (5:1–3)

1–2 Amos next takes up a lament, mourning the fall of Israel. Amos was so certain that what he said would happen that he treated it as an accomplished fact. He saw Israel as a virgin whose life had been ended in the bloom of youth. He describes her hopelessness as "never to rise again" and her desolation as "deserted in her own land with no one to lift her up."

Israel's predicted fate stands in stark contrast to the promise God gave Abraham of numerous offspring (cf. Ge 12:15; 15:15). But Amos says that Israel was cut off as a virgin who had never borne children, and the enemy was soon to carry her off to his own land. This passage illustrates that the blessings of God's promise—which was irrevocable and eternal (Ge 13:15; 17:19; cf. Heb 6:13, 17–18)—were conditioned on the obedience of its recipients. Its eternality was guaranteed by God's sovereign activity in history and by the existence of a believing remnant in Israel whose obedience to the covenant stipulations marked them as the vehicle through whom God would keep his promises.

3 This verse depicts the finality of Israel's demise. As the cities sent out their defending armies to face the invader, they would be cut down. Only a handful of ragged, war-weary men will be left of Israel's proud army.

8. Seeking true values (5:4–17)

4 The word "seek" (GK 2011), when referring to the Lord, means to turn to him in trust and confidence (Pss 34:4; 77:2; Jer 10:21). Amos uses "live" (GK 2649) in a context of national collapse. Since he has spoken of Israel as a fallen nation, the meaning of national life or restoration seems appropriate for this word (cf. v.14). Thus it is hardly right to say that Amos confronts the people only with doom. He holds out a gracious invitation but looks only for calamity because he knows so many will not repent. His invitation may have been instrumental in leading some to seek the Lord, thus contributing to the establishment of the remnant.

5 The people are warned not to keep relying for help on the centers of cultic worship. When the invader came, these centers would fall just like all the cities of Israel.

Bethel was where Jacob had met the Lord (Ge 28:10–15) and where God had reiterated the promise to him (Ge 35). In Amos's day, however, Bethel stood for mere external religion (see comment on Am 4:4). The idolatry practiced there could only lead to continued separation from God and the ultimate destruction of the nation. The reference to Beersheba shows that Israelites continued to cross the border into the southern kingdom to worship at the sanctuary in Judah.

6 The name "house of Joseph" stands for the northern kingdom and reflects the descent of its largest tribe, Ephraim, from Joseph. The fire Amos speaks of is reminiscent of the judgment in the oracles of 1:3–2:11 and symbolizes the coming captivity. A clear alternative is offered to the people in the word "or." The choice is to "seek the LORD," with all the blessings and favor this will bring, or to experience ultimate doom.

7 "Justice" (GK 5477) connotes the fair and impartial administration of the requirements of the Mosaic law, which required concern for others (Ex 23:4–5; Dt 24:17–22). These concepts were being violated in Amos's day, for justice was being turned into "bitterness" (lit., "wormwood"; cf. Jer 9:15; La 3:15, 19; cf. Am 2:6–7).

8–9 In sublime words Amos depicts the Lord's creative power in making the constellations, establishing the succession of day and night, and summoning the vast oceans to cover so much of the land. But then he turns from the sovereignty of God in creation to his sovereignty in human history, as seen by his overthrowing military strongholds.

10 The accusation continues with Amos's description of his contemporaries' hating the one who reproves in the "court" (lit.,"gate"; GK 9133); the city gate was where the legal proceedings were carried on (cf. vv.12, 15; see comment on Ru 4:1). The "reprovers" protested the injustices of the courts. They were hated, as were those who spoke the truth during the proceedings.

11 Amos next speaks vividly of the oppressive measures that exploited the poor and made the rich richer. These symbols of Israel's wealth and greed were to become the objects of God's wrath. A terrible calamity was to befall the nation (the reversal of Dt 6:10–11). As yet it has not been fully described; but each of Amos's allusions to it builds on the other until in ch. 9 it attains its fullest statement.

12–13 All these judgments result from the people's many sins—sins that entailed rebellion and failure to live up to God's standards. In the light of the corruption of the times, the prudent man said nothing, because anything he might have said would have been unavailing. Protest would only have made the situation worse and brought greater woe.

14 Amos exhorts the people to seek good and not evil as the way to life. To concern themselves with what is good was the only way the nation could be restored to "life." As a result "the LORD God Almighty" [see comment on 4:13] will be with you." This expression connotes the Lord's presence, not only to dispense national and individual blessing, but to defend and fight for his people (cf. Dt 31:8; Jdg 6:12).

15 The people were not only to stop seeking evil (v.14), they were to hate evil and love good. This alone would bring life, for the Lord might possibly have mercy on the "remnant of Joseph" (cf. v.6). "Remnant" (GK 8642) connotes a portion of something. Since Amos's exhortation in v.14 holds open the possibility of the nation's restoration based on their repentance, this similar appeal in v.15 must not be seen as fulfilled in some far-off future but refers to the possibility of the northern kingdom escaping from God's judgment—or at least a portion of the people escaping.

If these appeals for repentance do not seem to be in accord with Amos's pronouncements of inevitable doom elsewhere, it may be that while he saw no hope for the nation as a whole, he continued to hold out the gracious offer of deliverance, even though only a few would respond.

16–17 "Therefore" relates back to the accusation in vv.7–12 and introduces the judgment of the Lord. Amos pictures the people weeping as the Lord passed through their midst, judging the sin that he had so severely condemned.

9. The Day of the Lord (5:18–20)

18 This verse affords an insight into the popular theology in Amos's time. "The day of the Lord" is an important concept that runs through the prophetic writings. It refers to the complex of events surrounding the coming of the Lord in judgment to conquer his foes and to establish his sovereign rule over the world. The people were looking forward to that day. Apparently they understood it as the time when the Lord would act on their behalf to conquer their foes and establish Israel as his people forever. They regarded their election as the guarantee of the Lord's favor. But they failed to see the Day of the Lord as the time when God would judge all sin, even theirs. They named the name of the Lord but did not obey his precepts. For these people, Amos said, that coming day would be one of darkness.

19–20 Amos uses two metaphors to show the error of the popular concept of the Day of the Lord. A man flees from a lion only to meet a bear. Another enters his home, his place of security, but is bitten by a snake. The meaning is both clear and powerful. The Israelites saw the Day of the Lord as a comforting concept. But the faithless Israelites would find it to be a time of judgment for them. There would be no hope for them in that day, for it would bring not one ray of light.

10. Unacceptable worship (5:21–27)

21 The shock felt by the people when Amos attacked their comforting eschatology was followed by another shock. He turns to their worship and proclaims the Lord's hatred of their religious observances because they lacked the love, concern, and humble obedience to God that marks sincere profession of faith. Every aspect of their ritual was an act of disobedience because it ignored the heart of the law—love for God and concern for others.

22–23 The people may, Amos says, continue to bring sacrifices, but the Lord would not accept them. The "burnt offering" (GK 6592) is the offering that was entirely consumed. The "grain offering" (GK 4966) was any offering given as a gift to the Lord. The "fellowship offering" (GK 8968) was offered in part to the Lord and the rest was shared with the offerer, his family, and his friends. Even their songs were a source of revulsion to the Lord. God says they were to be put away from him.

24 The element that will transform the people's sterile worship into acceptable worship is "justice" (GK 5477) and "righteousness" (GK 7407), concepts that relate to the social order. Only when the personal concern of the law is incorporated into their social structure and "rightness" characterizes their dealings with others will their worship be acceptable. Justice and righteousness must "roll on like a river . . . like a never-failing stream." A momentary flow of these two qualities will not do.

25–27 The question in v.25 calls for a negative answer: no, the Israelites did not sacrifice then. Evidently the forty-year period (beginning with the defection of the Israelites at Kadesh; cf. Nu 14:33–34) was a time when obedience to the Levitical institutions had declined (Jos 5:5–6; see also Eze 20:10–26; Hos 9:10; 13:5–6).

Verse 26 is best understood as adversative: "But you have lifted." Israel disobeyed God and by her neglect of sacrifice turned to idolatry. Amos lists the implements of idolatrous worship of an unknown astral deity, an event far back in their history. In other words, v.24 calls for obedience, while the judgment section affirms their disobedience (vv.25–26) and bases the predicted judgment (v.27) on their long history of unfaithfulness to God.

11. A warning to the complacent (6:1–7)

1–2 With masterly irony, Amos addresses the self-satisfied rich, secure in their affluence. The cities he mentions have not necessarily met their doom. Rather, the question has a sarcastic note: "Go to [these cities] and look. . . . Are they better off than your two kingdoms [Judah and Israel]?" It is as though he were echoing what the people of Israel were saying—"Look at the other countries: there is none greater than we." This is supported by the words "notable men of the foremost nation," which also has a note of sarcasm. Presumably the people of Amos's day were boasting of their national security and power. The prophet proclaims woe to those who felt secure in the strength of their nation. His parroting of their affirmations of self-assurance and national pride underscores their complacency and places their false pride in stark contrast to the doom he predicts in the subsequent context.

3 The people were unwilling to hear of the "evil day," the day of their demise predicted by Amos. Yet they were all too willing to make the poor miserable.

4–7 These verses describe the opulence of Israelite society. To Amos their luxuries were symbols of the oppression by which they aggrandized themselves. So those who amassed all this wealth would be the first to go into exile (v.7).

12. Pride before a fall (6:8–11)

8 The Lord swears by himself in the preface to this oracle of doom (see comment on 4:2–3). The parallelism of the oracle indicates that the "pride of Jacob" has to do with Israel's vaunted "fortresses" (likely a reference to the great houses of the people, the symbols of their misguided affluence; cf. 3:10, 15). The "city," evidently Samaria, and all its wealth would be delivered up to a conqueror.

9–11 The judgment (v.8) is vividly illustrated in vv.9–10. If ten men are in a house or fortress, they will die. When a relative of one of the dead comes to burn the corpses, should he find one person still alive, that person will not permit his mentioning the name of the Lord for fear that the Lord will turn his wrath on him. These verses reflect the responsibility of an individual for the burial of members of his family. Since cremation was not acceptable in ancient Israel, the reference is probably to the burning of corpses during a plague. Verse 11 is a powerful picture of the destruction that would surely come on oppressing Israel.

13. A grim paradox (6:12–14)

12–13 By two patently absurd questions, Amos introduces the scathing rebuke that follows. One expected the courts to dispense justice, but the rich and powerful dispensed poison instead and made bitter the fruit of righteousness. Those who did this are described as rejoicing in "Lo Debar" and "Karnaim," evidently the sites of recent victories in Jeroboam's incursion into Aramean territory. But Amos spells "Lo Debar" in Hebrew so that it means "no thing." Through this biting sarcasm he proclaims the utter futility of their burgeoning national influence. Karnaim means "horns" and, by extension, "strength." The people's pride and self-confidence were reflected in their boast that they took Karnaim by their own strength.

14 This verse specifies the judgment that would overtake the Israelites; a nation, not identified here by Amos, would oppress them from their northern border, "from the entrance to [cf. NIV note] Hamath" (cf. 2Ki 14:25), all the way to their southern border at the Wadi Arabah. This nation turned out to be Assyria.

IV. The Prophetic Visions (7:1–9:15)

A. The Vision of the Locusts, Fire, and the Plumb Line (7:1–9)

1 The first of the series of visions that occupy most of the rest of the book consists of three dramatic elements. The first is the threat of a locust invasion "as the second crop was coming" (i.e., just before the dry season). If the threat materialized, the people would be left without food till the next harvest. Apparently the king had the privilege of claiming the first mowing. The needs of the government were great, and the large military establishment had to be supported.

2–3 When Amos saw in his vision what devastation the locusts had brought, he prays that it will not happen, because Israel would not be able to survive it. "Jacob," he says, "is so small!" This appeal seems strange in view of Israel's extensive territory and economic prosperity. But Amos had seen an awesome display of the Lord's might in this vision; and, in comparison to that, the nation seemed small and helpless. Amos's prayer was answered. The Lord relented and the threat was revoked.

4–6 The second aspect of the vision involved the threat of fire—an all-consuming fire, lapping up the sea and land. Again Amos's prayer was answered, and the Lord relented, as he had done in the first part of the vision.

7–9 The third aspect of the vision is climactic and contains the didactic element of the vision. The Lord was seen standing by a plumb wall with a plumb line in his hand. The word "standing" connotes a posture of firmness and determination, thus providing a contrast to the change of heart attributed to the Lord in the first two parts of the vision.

A plumb line is a standard by which a wall's vertical trueness is tested. So the Lord was testing the people by a standard. In the first two visions, no standard was given. Therefore, the threatened judgment could be withdrawn. But after the plumb line vision, the Lord could not be accused of arbitrariness if he carried out the threats. The people had failed to live up to their privilege as the Lord's people. They had been called to be holy (Ex 19:6), but their repressive society violated the very standards of holiness itself. They gave lip service to the covenant of the Lord but ignored the social concerns woven into its fabric. When the test came, they were found wanting. The plumb line showed that the Lord was not an arbitrary judge.

The coming judgment would fall on the pagan sanctuaries of Israel and on the dynasty of Jeroboam. Thus the two major influences in Israelite life would perish.

B. Historical Interlude (7:10–17)

Amos's visions are momentarily interrupted by a passage that gives us important information about Amos himself. It may have been placed here because it actually followed Amos's public report of the preceding vision.

10–13 Amaziah, the priest of the sanctuary at Bethel, accuses Amos of conspiracy. The words reported by Amaziah are based on the threat recorded in v.9. Though Jeroboam's reaction is not given, it is presumably reflected in Amaziah's order to Amos. The word "seer" (GK 2602; a word associated with "prophet" in 2Ki 17:13) is legitimately used here, since Amos has just received a vision.

14–15 Amos's reply to Amaziah's order is not without its interpretive problems. Did Amos say, "I am not a prophet," or, "I was not a prophet"? The latter option seems best. Amos certainly denies any connection with professional prophetism and affirms that he is a prophet only by divine calling. Before that, he was merely a shepherd and a caretaker of sycamore-fig trees.

16–17 Amos's encounter with Amaziah ends with a prediction of dire judgment, despite the latter's insistence that Amos desist in his preaching against Israel. The judgment against Amaziah and his family was personal in nature. Amaziah's wife would be violated, perhaps by the invading soldiers, and his children killed. He would lose all he had and would die in a "pagan" ("unclean") country. So the priest, whose task it was to maintain the purity of the cult, would die in a Gentile land.

C. The Vision of the Summer Fruit (8:1–14)

1–2 While it is possible that Amos saw an actual basket of fruit and that the Lord used it as a means of revelation, its inclusion in this section of the book makes it more likely that it was another vision. The word for "ripe fruit" is similar to another word that Amos uses in the response of the Lord: "The time is ripe for my people." The basket of summer fruit, ordinarily associated with the joys and provisions of the harvest, becomes a mockery. The pleasant memories of past harvest festivals are shattered by the decisive words that the end time is near.

3 Just as the apparent promise of the ripe fruit was turned into the assurance of Israel's destruction, so the joyous temple hymns (cf. 6:5) would give way to the wailing of the populace of Israel when the wrath of the Lord fell on them. The last clause of v.3 is typical of the vivid staccato style of Amos: "Many, many bodies—flung everywhere! Silence!" This final word calls for the reverence this appalling scene warrants.

4–6 This scene is followed by a recital of the social crimes of those whose disobedience to the Lord was responsible for the carnage. The merchants could not wait for the end of the holy days so that they could increase their wealth by giving short measure and raising prices. They even sold the sweepings to increase the weight! Yet these exploiters were careful to observe the Sabbath. Though the marketplace was deserted on the holy days, in the bustle of commerce their god—Mammon—was quite in evidence, and their true religious credo was Gain at Any Cost.

7–8 In the oath formula, the "Pride of Jacob" is best understood as an appellation for God (see comments on 4:2; 6:8). It is the Lord as the pride of Jacob who guarantees this oath. The judgment to follow will surely come because God does not allow his glorious name to be sullied. Verse 8 describes the convulsions the land would suffer. The striking metaphor of an earthquake represents the calamity Amos has referred to throughout the book.

9 "In that day" refers to the day of calamity and need not be understood as eschatological. It introduces a section that continues to describe the impending judgment. The setting of the sun at noon describes an interruption of the natural order that would cause terror and panic among earth's inhabitants. The upheaval predicted by Amos would be a disruption of the national life on such a scale that the fear and dread in the hearts of the people would be similar to the terror that a celestial cataclysm would cause.

10–13 The destruction to come on Samaria would cause bitter mourning. Amos describes the event in terms of a funeral for "an only son." He depicts a coming famine as no ordinary famine but one of the words of the Lord. He pictures people searching for God's word as starving people seek food or water. But they would not receive any word from the Lord. Since they had rejected the word and not realized its great value, they had lost it forever (cf. Lk 17:22; Jn 7:34).

14 The word "shame" has the primary meaning of "guilt" (cf. 2Ch 24:18; 33:23). Dan was the site of the worship of the golden calf under Jeroboam, and the "way to Beersheba" (NIV, "god of Beersheba") apparently refers to the pilgrimage to that site. The various shrines Amos refers to may indicate that a geographical split in the concept of the Lord was taking place. A similar split related to the Canaanite god Baal. Thus the worship of the Lord became idolatrous. Those whose confidence was in their distorted, pagan view of the Lord would fall.

D. The Vision of the Lord standing by the Altar (9:1–15)

1. The destruction of the temple (9:1–6)

1–4 Amos sees the Lord standing by the temple altar. He commands the temple to crumble, and it collapses on the people, destroying the whole nation. The temple was not a literal temple, for the collapse of such a building would affect only a few. Rather it represents the religion of the northern kingdom, which, in the end, brought about the destruction of its adherents. The decay of the social structure that resulted from their cold externalism could lead only to national ruin. The gross sin of idolatry could lead only to judgment. The god of "greed" is no respecter of persons and often turns his voraciousness on those who are his own. Amos allowed no escape for the nation.

5–6 The hymnic element is appropriate to the context because it sets forth the power of the Lord to carry out his threat. This hymn contains several elements common to other prophetic hymns, such as the reference to the heavens and the calling forth of the waters (5:8).

2. Israel and the other nations (9:7)

7 Cush was a territory roughly corresponding to Ethiopia and Nubia. Infrequently mentioned in the OT, this country seems to have been chosen because of its great distance from Israel. It lay at the outer extremities of the important nations of the ancient Near East. At the time of Amos, it was probably considered an insignificant region. Thus it would be shocking to the Israelites, who boasted of their election, to learn that in the eyes of the Lord they were no better than those obscure Cushites.

Furthermore, Israel was no different from the Philistines or Arameans, because the Lord governed the migrations of these people just as he had led the Israelites from Egypt. Because of the Exodus, the Israelites assumed that the Lord was unalterably committed to them as a nation and that no other nation counted. But Amos destroys that false assumption by affirming the sovereignty of the Lord over all the nations.

3. The restoration of the Davidic kingdom (9:8–12)

8–10 The nation was to be destroyed, but not totally. Thus an element of hope is introduced at this point. The eighth-century prophets placed their hope of the future in a kingdom portrayed with obvious Davidic motifs (Isa 9:7; Mic 5:2). It is true that Amos held no hope for the nation of Israel. But that is not to say that he held out no hope for a preserved remnant. One important element of Amos's message was that the nation was not to be equated with the remnant; it was precisely that false hope that he attacked. A true remnant from Israel would remain (cf. Jer 30:11).

Verse 9 explains v.8 by the use of a metaphor. The concept of separation is inherent in the figure of sifting with a sieve. Amos had decreed that the nation was doomed to exile (7:17). The consonance of this with the "shaking" is apparent; a separation would be made between the destroyed kingdom and the remnant that remained.

11 "In that day" refers to the time when the sifting activity will be initiated, i.e., the period of the Exile (vv.9–10). This period was seen by the prophets as continuing until the coming of Messiah and so includes the Christian Era.

The word "tent" (GK 6109) refers to a rude shelter (a "hut") and pictures the "house" (cf. 2Sa 7:11) of David that was becoming a dilapidated shack; in Amos's time the Davidic dynasty had fallen so low that it could no longer be called a house. The continuation of that dynasty is envisioned in prophecy as continuing in the Messiah, who is often referred to in Davidic motifs (Isa 9:6–7; Jer 33:15, 17; Mic 5:2). Amos thus affirms the perpetuity of the Davidic house. The national upheaval that ultimately led to the fall of Judah and Israel and the overthrow of Judah's monarchy could not vitiate God's promise. The royal offspring would yet come. David's dynasty would be perpetuated in David's Greater Son.

The promise to David in 2 Samuel also carried with it the promise of an eternal kingdom (2Sa 7:12–13). While the Davidic dynasty is most prominent in Amos's prophecy, it is difficult to separate that concept from that of regnal authority or kingdom. Both are probably in view. The dynasty had not yet collapsed in Amos's time, but the seeds of its dissolution were present.

The Lord declared that he would restore that "tent." He would restore the "broken places" of the divided kingdom (the word "its" is plural). He would restore "his"—i.e., David's—"ruins" and "build it," referring to "the tent." The Davidic dynasty, represented by the tent, was, according to Amos, to be restored.

12 The NT, in Ac 15:17, follows the LXX here, reading "that the remnant of men may seek the Lord" instead of "possess the remnant of Edom." The subject of Ac 15:12–21, where this passage is quoted, is Gentile inclusion in the early church; James used this passage to support the rightness of Gentile inclusion. The phrase "that bear my name" always connotes that which is God's peculiar possession (Dt 28:10; 2Ch 7:14; Jer 14:9; 15:16). This is precisely James's argument.

Since the inclusion of Gentiles takes place, according to Amos, in the kingdom of the descendant of David, one may assume that that kingdom has been established in some way. It is invisible now but will appear in glorious power when Christ, David's Greater Son, returns. If this passage in Amos predicted only a future inclusion of Gentiles in the millennial kingdom, it is difficult to understand why James would have appealed to it for support of Gentile admission to the first-century church. It seems to be clearly relevant to the issues facing the early church. Then James obviously understood the restored Davidic monarchy to be represented, at least in its invisible sense, in the church in his time.

4. The blessings of the restored kingdom (9:13–15)

13 The reaper being overtaken by the plowman implies a great abundance of the produce of the field. Scarcely can the grapevines be planted than the grapes are ready for pressing. The great amount of wine in this time is pictured in the metaphor of new wine flowing from the hills. In other words, Amos sees a radical reversal of Israel's fortunes. He depicts a time when God's blessing will be poured out in unimaginable abundance.

14–15 The period of this abundance will witness the restoration of Israel to her land. Ruined cities will be rebuilt, and Israel will again flourish as a nation. Amos sees this restoration as being permanent. He maintains that Israel will be planted in her own land "never again to be uprooted." It is difficult to understand his words as finding fulfillment in the postexilic period. Not only were the economic conditions of that time not consonant with Amos's prediction, but its impermanence makes the identification doubly difficult.

It is also difficult to apply the concept of universal peace to the invisible kingdom, the church, unless the meaning of the prophet's language is severely restricted. If one understands the kingdom to have a present aspect as well as a future aspect, the problem becomes less difficult. The NT does teach a present, invisible aspect of the kingdom, which is the church. But the millennial kingdom is that aspect of the kingdom in which God's reign will be realized within the sphere of human history and natural order. It is in this aspect of the kingdom that Amos's prediction of the blessings of the kingdom may be placed.

The hope of Amos is not an isolated one that finds expression only in his book. Nor is it a purely prophetic tradition without relation to other OT traditions. It is an expression of one of the most important themes of OT theology: the promise. This promise, given to Abraham, reiterated to the patriarchs, reaffirmed to David, and expressed throughout the OT, affirms that God will mediate his redemptive blessings to Jews and Gentiles in a promised offspring or "seed." In the prophets, this offspring is clearly the Davidic Messiah, who in the NT is Christ. Amos affirms that God's promise has not ceased. In spite of the internal turmoil in the kingdom of his day, God would establish the Davidic monarchy; and through that monarchy God's blessing would come to "all peoples on earth" (Ge 12:3).

Obadiah

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

Edom, established in the region around Mount Seir as far back as patriarchal times (cf. Ge 36), was a small kingdom that inhabited the Transjordanian highlands. Edom was well-established in the area south and east of the Dead Sea by the thirteenth century B.C. In the period of the monarchy, David brought Edom under subjection; relations were often hostile from then onward. Of particular interest in the context of Obadiah's work are two questions relating to Edom: (1) When might the hostility between Edom and Judah have produced the kind of Edomite perfidy expressed in vv.10–14? (2) When in Edom's history were Obadiah's words fulfilled? The first question will be dealt with in the commentary at v.14, while the latter question is addressed here.

Despite periods of subjugation to Judah, there is clear evidence that Edom still constituted an independent monarchy about 594–593 B.C. (cf. Jer 27:3), and it provided at least partial refuge to Judah's fugitives then (cf. Jer 40:11). Although Ammon and Moab, like Judah, were subsequently subjugated by Nebuchadnezzar (c. 582; cf. Eze 21:18–20, 28), no reference is made to Edom, which may therefore have followed Jeremiah's counsel to submit (Jer 27:6–7). Edom's continued existence in the sixth century is attested by excavations at Ezion-geber. Edom also figures in OT writings from the Exile, which bear witness to its continued existence (La 4:21–22; Eze 25:12–14; 35; Da 11:41).

By 312 B.C., it is certain that Petra was occupied by the Nabataeans, a nomadic Arabic tribe. There is evidence that this transition to Arabic influence was already established in the fifth century. Ammon and Moab are cited as enemies of Judah's interests in the time of Nehemiah (c. 444–432; Ne 2:10, 19; 4:3, 7; 6:1–15; 13:1–2, 23). Edom, however, is not named among Judah's traditional opponents, being replaced by the Arabs who played a dominant role under Geshem (Ne 2:19; 4:7; 6:1–2; cf. 2Ch 17:11; 21:16; 22:1; 26:7). A similar transition is evident at Ezion-geber, where Arabic names replace Edomite names on the fifth-century site, which was controlled by the Arabs during the Persian period (late sixth to the fourth centuries).

The destruction of Edom may therefore be located tentatively in the latter half of the sixth century. This is corroborated by Malachi, who described as past history the reduction of Esau's "mountains into a wasteland" and "his inheritance of the desert jackals" (c. 450, Mal 1:3–4; cf. Eze 32:29), though the prophet envisaged a continuing identity and national striving by Edom, even in exile (Mal 1:4–5).

2. Authorship and Date

Nothing is known of the author of Obadiah. The name, which means "servant of the LORD," is given to at least twelve other OT characters, none of whom seem obviously to be the author named in the book. Most attempts at correlation founder on the inability of scholars to date the book with certainty.

The date for the book of Obadiah continues to be much debated. The prophecy is clearly a response to a time when Jerusalem was overrun by foreign armies, a sack in which the Edomites were understood to have in some way collaborated (see v.15). If it was the 586 B.C. destruction under Nebuchadnezzar, and if Edom herself came under Nabataean control by the fifth century B.C., the date of the book is best left sometime after the 586 invasion of Zion.

EXPOSITION

I. The Message From the Lord (v.1)

1 Obadiah's prophecy opens with the formal announcement of a message from the Lord "about" or "against" (cf. Ps 137:7) Edom, a pattern repeated in the following lines. "Edom" represents an alternative name of

"Esau," the brother of Jacob (Ge 36:1, 8, 43; cf. Ob 6, 8–9, 18–19, 21). It also denotes the descendants of Esau (Ge 36:9, 16–17; cf. 36:31, 43), whose blood relationship with Israel is invoked repeatedly in the OT (Nu 20:14; Dt 23:7; Am 1:11; Mal 1:2; cf. Ob 10, 12); and it describes the land inhabited by them (Nu 20:23; 21:4; 34:3; cf. Ob 18–21).

The "message" (GK 9019) is evidently a supernatural revelation, being "from the LORD," corroborated by the prophecy's description as a "vision" (GK 2606; cf. Hab 1:1; 2:2–3). Such revelation was mediated primarily through the prophets. The plural "we" might indicate a prophetic group—perhaps including the believing community to which the revelation was to be mediated.

An "envoy" (GK 7495) is normally a human ambassador, sent to represent the authority of those whom he served. Verse 1 points to an envoy who represents one of the combatants ("let us").

The dual thrust of v.1 indicates two levels at which human history moves. The Lord is the ultimate mover, but there is also an international political alliance, motivated only by callous self-seeking (cf. vv.5–7). Even nations serve the overriding purposes of a God who sovereignly shapes human affairs through countless envoys of his own (cf. Ps 104:4). The "nations" are deaf to this realm, in which they serve unconsciously (cf. Isa 45:4–7).

II. The Abasement of Edom (vv.2–9)

A. Edom's Character (vv.2–4)

1. Edom's future smallness (v.2)

2 This verse introduces Edom's abasement, which is stressed by "small" and "despised." Edom's smallness is qualitative, corresponding to its despicable and debased character.

2. Edom's present pride (vv.3–4)

3–4 "Pride" (GK 2295) is derived from a verb meaning "to boil up, seethe"; the root of this word occurs three times in the account of Esau's squandered birthright. The essence of this "pride" is insubordination, rooted in an inordinate self-estimation: the proud man rejects authority, whether from God or another human being, and arrogates it to himself.

Edom's pride is grounded in its geographical location "on the heights," from which it draws its sense of security and self-sufficiency. Edom's natural defenses were imposing. Its main centers of civilization were situated in a narrow ridge of mountainous land southeast of the Dead Sea. This ridge exceeded a height of 4,000 feet throughout its northern sector, and it rose in places to 5,700 feet in the south. The frontiers of this lofty plateau were formed on the west by the Arabah, to which the land dropped over 4,000 feet within the space of a few miles. The northern border was similarly defended by the deep canyon of the Wadi Zered, and to the south the precipitous walls of the Wadi Hismeh mark the abrupt descent of the tableland to the desert. In addition to these natural fortifications, Edom was strongly defended by a series of Iron Age fortresses, particularly on the eastern frontier where the land descended more gradually to the desert.

Such was Edom's refuge "in the clefts of the rocks" (so SS 2:14; Jer 49:16), whose austere environment might well foster thoughts of invulnerability. "Sela" (see NIV note on v.3) is also the name of an Edomite settlement captured by Amaziah (c. 800–783, 2Ki 14:7). It is commonly associated with the subsequent Nabataean capital, Petra, whose name also signifies "rock" (cf. Mt 16:18).

Edom's sense of security "deceived" it. Although virtually impregnable to human forces, Edom was still utterly vulnerable before the wisdom and power of God. Edom's deceived pride is expressed in the confident question "Who can bring me down?" It is echoed in the unanticipated answer: "I will bring you down," a blunt statement that embodies the heart of the prophecy.

B. Edom's Calamity (vv.5–9)

1. Edom's ransacking (vv.5–6)

5–6 As "thieves" plunder a household, so "grape pickers" strip a vineyard. Yet in both cases they leave at least a pittance that escapes detection and despoliation. By contrast Esau will be "ransacked" with a terrible thoroughness that leaves nothing (cf. vv.8–9; Jer 49:9–10). This will be the work of the Lord's own judgment, from which nothing can remain "hidden." Whereas the Lord consistently promised to "leave" a remnant for Jacob, no such promise is extended to Edom.

2. Edom's entrapment (v.7)

7 Edom will be deceived by its "friends"; this deception is the expression of calculated hostility as indicated by the verb "overpower" (GK 3523). "Deceived" epitomizes the treachery evoked by its juxtaposition to "friends." This deception is accompanied by rejection from its "allies," whose covenant loyalty is presupposed, when the Edomites seek help from or refuge with those allies. It is appropriate that Edom should be denied help and refuge as it had done to its brother Jacob's "survivors" (vv.10, 12, 14).

The third line is obscure in Hebrew. The meaning "they will make your bread a trap" yields good sense if "your bread" is interpreted as a synecdoche (i.e., a part for the whole): they make the friendship expressed and ratified when they ate your bread a trap.

3. God's initiative (vv.8–9)

8–9 "Declares the LORD" marks the opening of a new section, reverting to the perspective of God's initiative in the impending destruction of Edom. "In that day" frequently looks forward to a specific time appointed by God in his sovereignty, when he will intervene in human history in judgment and salvation. Both Edom's "wise men" and their "men of understanding" the Lord would destroy. The failure of Edom's traditional wisdom (cf. 1Ki 4:30; Job 1:1; 2:11; 4:1; Jer 49:7; La 4:21) amplifies further the theme of deception. Ultimately, Edom was deceived because the Lord gave her up to deception.

The term "Teman," generally taken to describe a region in the northern sector of Edom, clearly speaks of the population of "Edom" as a whole. No certainty exists regarding the historical outcome of this prophecy concerning Edom's demise at the hands of the "nations," but a great "slaughter" is in view.

III. The Charge Against Edom (vv.10–14)

A. The Reason for the Charge (v.10)

10 The noun "violence" (GK 2805) denotes both moral wrong and overt physical brutality (cf. Hab 1:2), both of which had characterized Edom's relations with Israel. This goes back to the very origins of the two nations, in the hatred of Esau for his brother Jacob (Ge 27:40–41). This hatred emerged again in Edom's hostility to Israel after the Exodus (Ex 15:15; Nu 20:14–21; Dt 2:4; Jdg 11:17–18); and Edom is numbered among Israel's "enemies . . . who had plundered them" before they were defeated by Saul (1Sa 14:47–48). It is against this background of aggression that David's later campaigns are also to be understood (2Sa 8:13–14; 1Ki 11:15–16; 1Ch 18:11–13; Ps 60). All this culminated in Edom's exultation over the destruction of Jerusalem (Ps 137:7; La 4:21–22; Eze 25:12; 35:5, 15; 36:5; Joel 3:19).

B. The Explanation of the Charge (vv.11–14)

1. The charge defined (v.11)

11 The equating of Edom with the "foreigners" is intimated in the first two lines; the equality is stated in the last line. The correlation of these subjects, however, involves a definite contrast, based on the word "aloof," which differentiates sharply between the conduct of Edom and that of the rapacious "strangers." The latter actually "entered" Jerusalem and cast "lots" for its conquered property and probably for its citizens (cf. Joel 3:3; Na 3:10), while Edom did not participate in this looting (see also v.13). However, in the sight of God, there is little distinction in moral accountability between overt sin and an inner bias toward that sin that permits it to go unchecked (cf. Mt 5:21–32).

2. The charge repeated and amplified (vv.12–14)

The main emphasis of these verses is on Edom's hostile attitudes rather than on its physical violence at Jerusalem.

12 The initial Hebrew verb means to "look on" (GK 8011). Its connotations are varied, and either the sense of contempt ("look down on") or exultation ("gloat") is drawn from the context and parallel verbs. The verbs "rejoice" (GK 8523) and "boast" (GK 1540 & 7023) betray the perverted and reprehensible values of this typical enemy of Israel, for whom covenant loyalty to a brother meant nothing.

13 This verse echoes the description of the "foreigners" (v.11), attributing their conduct directly to Edom. However, v.11 has identified Edom with the foreigners only in intent, not explicitly in action; and it is at this level that Edom is accused of active participation in the sack of Jerusalem. While moving closer to participant status, Edom's historical role was still primarily an attitudinal one ("look down").

14 The distinction between action and intent is virtually obliterated here since the verb "wait" (GK 6641) echoes the one action predicated clearly of Edom in v.11—"stood aloof." The verse describes Edom's treatment of Judah's "survivors," thereby corroborating the impression of detachment from the main scene of action in the city, since the "fugitives" would be fleeing away from the city. However, it also qualifies this detachment sharply, for it is accompanied by outright aggression against those fugitives.

The central concern of these verses is with the "day" that befell the people of Judah. This is portrayed as a major tragedy by the foreboding epithets that are applied to it and repeated with the crushing weight of a death knell (cf. Zep 1:14–16). "Trouble" (GK 7650; also v.12) and "destruction" (v.12; GK 6) both point to a national catastrophe of major proportion. Can we identify a specific catastrophe when Jerusalem was invaded, its property plundered, its people enslaved or slaughtered on a wide scale, and at the same time Edom participated as a mocking bystander and as a collaborator with the foreign invaders? Six periods in the history of Jerusalem and Judah present themselves for consideration, of which the last one (586 B.C.) corresponds to these criteria most closely (for a survey of the other five, see EBC, 7:350–51).

When this final invasion of Jerusalem by the Babylonians occurred, following Jehoiachin's previous capitulation to Nebuchadnezzar in 597 B.C., Edom still existed as an independent nation. On both occasions the city suffered seizure of its "wealth" and wholesale deportation of its population (2Ki 24:13–16; 25:4–17; 2Ch 36:18, 20). In 586 the city was virtually burned to the ground, including the temple (2Ki 25:9–10; 2Ch 36:19), and many of its inhabitants were massacred (2Ki 25:8–21; 2Ch 36:17; cf. Jer 6:1–9:22; Eze 4:1–7:27). There is specific reference to unsuccessful "fugitives" in the account of the king's escape with his retinue (2Ki 25:4–5). Of particular significance are the accounts of Edom's conduct at this time. It seems to have participated as an ally in a coalition of Palestinian states against Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 27:3; 40:11); yet it was later accused of taking vengeance on Judah (Eze 25:12) and of delivering the Israelites "over to the sword at the time of their calamity, at the time their punishment reached its climax" (Eze 35:5; cf. La 1:17). Edom was equally guilty at this time of rejoicing in Jerusalem's destruction (Ps 137:7; La 2:15–17; 4:21; Eze 35:11–15; 36:2–6); and it is therefore at this time that the prophetic announcements of Edom's annihilation reached a climax (Jer 9:26; 25:21; La 4:21–22; Eze 25:13; 32:29; 35:3–4; 7–9, 11, 14–15; 36:7).

IV. The Day of the Lord (vv.15–21)

A. The Judgment of Esau (vv.15–18)

15–16 The "day of the LORD," a theme of great significance in Israel's eschatology (cf. ZPEB, 2:46–47), gives final definition to the preceding references to a "day" in Obadiah. Edom's and Judah's downfall both constitute elements in the pattern of this "great and dreadful day of the LORD" (Joel 2:31). It signals the climactic establishment of God's rule in human history and, as such, brings judgment on all those enemies who oppose his dominion. Such a judgment engulfed apostate and rebellious Israel, most notably in the falls of Samaria and Jerusalem; it descended subsequently on "the nations" (those not bowing to God's sovereignty). This "day," then, defines the destiny of Edom and the nations in both vv.1–9 and vv.15–21. After the nations have had their "day" on the Lord's holy mountain, his "day" will come, with none to oppose its thrust. This "day" is, in the first instance, promised in terms that admit a preliminary fulfillment within history for the faithful remnant of Israel; and it is from this hope of restoration and blessing for a "holy" people that Obadiah derives his promise of "deliverance" and conquest for the "house of Jacob" (vv.17–21).

The opening line of v.15 therefore constitutes the core of Obadiah's prophecy, providing a theological framework for the preceding verses: the localized disasters befalling Edom and Jerusalem are not merely isolated incidents in a remote and insignificant war, for they mark the footsteps of the Lord himself as he approaches to set up a "kingdom that will never be destroyed" (Da 2:44). And the following verses are essentially a commentary on the implications of that impending "day." Verse 15 accordingly sets forth its guiding principle of retaliation: "As you have done, it will be done to you." The actions perpetrated by the nation addressed will correspond precisely to those perpetrated on her.

Verse 16 demonstrates the same equivalence as v.15 of past and future action ("drank," "will drink"; GK 9272). The metaphor of drinking is commonly used of the experience of judgment and humiliation (cf. Hab 2:15–16). Judah's suffering on God's "holy hill" in Jerusalem has been described as past in vv.10–14; for Edom and the nations, their suffering is still future at the time of Obadiah's prophecy.

17–18 "Mount Zion" denotes the place of God's rule in Jerusalem. It is therefore rendered "holy" (GK 7731) by his presence, and it demands a corresponding holiness of its inhabitants. As the visible expression of God's sovereign holiness, Mount Zion becomes the source of judgment on human sin (e.g., Isa 31:9; Joel 3:16; Am 1:2–2:16); and it is the final locus of God's judgment on the citizens of Judah (e.g., Isa 10:12; La 2:1–8; 4:2–16; Mic 3:12; cf. Ob 11–14, 16). However, the Lord's kingly rule is expressed equally by his salvation, which also emanates from Mount Zion (e.g., Pss 20:2; 53:6) and which restores to it the "holy" character consonant with his presence there. Obadiah's announcement of salvation belongs to this tradition.

"Deliverance" (GK 7129) implies escape from danger and widespread destruction (cf. Ge 14:13; Jdg 12:4–5; Ob 14). It is applied most consistently to God's gracious preservation and purification of a remnant in Israel particularly after the Fall of Jerusalem (cf. Ezr 9:8–13; Isa 4:2; 10:20; et al.). The final line expresses the outworking of this restoration. "Possess" (GK 3769) is associated preeminently with Israel's conquest of the Promised Land (e.g., Ex 6:8; Dt 3:8; 4:1, 22; et al.). Israel succeeded in this conquest because she obeyed the Lord, who entered the battle on behalf of his people and dispossessed the enemy before them. Israel therefore forfeited her control of the land through her subsequent disobedience; the prophets, however, held out to the nation the hope of repossessing the land on the same condition of an obedient and militant faith (e.g., Isa 54:3; 57:13; 60:21; 61:7; Eze 36:12; Am 9:12; cf. Gal 3:29; 1Pe 1:4); and it is to this hope that Obadiah appealed in expectation of a "holy" community that would be able to appropriate it (cf. vv.19–21).

In keeping with the military associations of v.17, the "house of Jacob" is to annihilate the "house of Esau." The destructiveness of fire consuming stubble forms a repeated image of the relentless judgment predicted here (e.g., Ex 15:7; Isa 10:17; Joel 2:5; Mal 4:1). This prophecy will revive an earlier subjugation of Edom under Saul, David, and their successors, a yoke Edom later threw off. Edom's final submission is therefore still anticipated by the prophets (cf. Nu 24:18; Isa 11:14; Eze 25:13–14; Am 9:12). As in Isa 11:13–14, it will be accomplished by a reunited Israel—intimated by the parallel terms "Jacob" and "Joseph" (cf. Pss 77:15; 80:1; 81:4–5; Jer 3:18). Unlike the house of Jacob, the house of Esau can expect no "deliverance," no remnant; as the Edomites had thought to plunder and possess the land of Israel, cutting off its "survivors," so it will happen to them.

Verse 18 marks a progression in the judgment of Edom. The Lord had enlisted the heathen nations to eradicate Edom from its homeland in "the mountains of Esau" (cf. vv.8–9); now, however, his own people of Israel were to cooperate with him in destroying Esau altogether. Historical events support this progression. Edom was displaced from its country east of the Arabah in the sixth and fifth centuries, in a period of Judah's weakness; this was therefore executed by foreigners, culminating in Nabataean possession of that territory. In the same period the surviving Edomites were settling west of the Arabah, in the Negev (cf. Eze 35:10, 12; 36:2, 5). The postexilic region of Judah extended no farther south than Bethzur, north of Hebron. Hebron itself and the neighboring towns were all occupied by Edomite populations (cf. 1Esd 4:50; 1Mc 4:61; 5:65; Jub 38:8–9); and, by the end of the fourth century, their territory had acquired the Hellenistic name for Edom: Idumaea (i.e., Edom-aea).

However, the fortunes of Judah were revived under the Maccabees (c. 168–63 B.C.), and this era saw a resurgence of Jewish aspirations to possess its former lands. The Idumaeans were defeated in 166 B.C. by Judas Maccabaeus (cf. 1Mc 5:3, 65). Under John Hyrcanus (135–104 B.C.) this conquest of the Idumaeans was completed (c. 125 B.C.), and they were compelled to submit to circumcision and to full observance of the Jewish law. They continued to haunt the Jews, however, for the family of Herod the Great was of Idumaean descent; but, eventually, they were consumed by the house of Jacob and lost their national identity and autonomy.

B. The Occupation of Edom (vv.19–21)

19–20 Not only the term "possess" (see comment on vv.17–18), but also the ethnic and geographical references recall Israel's conquest of Canaan. The "Negev" was not always to be the home of the Edomites, dispossessed as they were from their own "portion," the "mountains of Esau" (cf. Dt 2:4–5); rather the reverse would be true. The "foothills," the low-lying region separating the Judean hills from Philistia, would extend itself westward. Even the northern territories of Ephraim and Samaria, lost to Assyria during the preexilic period, would again be part of Israel. Benjamin, the small tribe virtually absorbed by Judah in historic times, was to move east and north into Transjordan and possess the lush highlands of Gilead, while exiles in Canaan (note the antiquated name with its Exodus and Conquest overtones) and from Jerusalem would expand north to the Lebanese coast at Zarephath and south to the Negev.

"Sepharad" is not definitely identified but may refer to Sardis in distant Lydia; if so, it reflects an early colony of Jewish exiles (ZPEB, 5:342) who, with more local refugees, were expected to inherit portions of the Holy Land. In short, the land seen by Obadiah as promised to a reunited Israel in "the day of the LORD" is the land originally given to the Twelve Tribes. It was the inalienable bequest of the Lord to Abraham and his descendants (Ge 13:14–17; 26:2–5; 28:13–15), and neither Edomite treachery nor Assyrian-Babylonian dispersion could keep God's promises from their fulfillment.

The term "exiles" (GK 1661) is applied predominantly to the deported population of Judah after 586 B.C. (e.g., 2Ki 25:27; Isa 45:13; et al.). Such an application is clearly appropriate to the qualification "from Jerusalem": no other major deportation from that city is known, and that background is most suitable to the events described in vv.10–14. The "Israelite exiles" would therefore be the survivors from the northern kingdom of Israel, from which they were deported after the fall of Samaria (cf. 2Ki 17:6, 18, 20, 23; 18:11). On this evidence, not only Israel but also Judah had been destroyed as an independent nation; and Obadiah's prophecy is proclaimed with heroic faith to "the poorest people of the land" (2Ki 24:14; 25:12, 22–24; Jer 40–44), during an era of destitution and weakness in the exilic or postexilic period.

21 Verse 21 reiterates the theme of conquest, expressed in the verb "govern" (or "judge"; GK 9149). The noun "deliverers" (GK 4635) has similar connotations of military victory (cf. Hab 1:2; 3:13, 18). This conquest finds its source in Judah and specifically in its capital, "Mount Zion." The ultimate goal of the conquest had been to unite Israel, with centralized worship in the temple (Dt 12:1–28) and with centralized rule in dynastic monarchy (Dt 17:14–20; 2Sa 7). These were not to have autonomous functions, for they were the visible institutions of the theocracy through which the Lord himself was to rule as "king over Jeshurun" (Dt 33:5). Obadiah's vision of Mount Zion restored to its destined leadership of nations is grounded in these promises. It presupposes the existence of a nation obedient to its theocratic calling, which will "serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him" (Lk 1:74–75; cf. v.17). And it finds its consummation in the true realization of that theocracy.

The "LORD" is indeed Israel's "king from of old" (Ps 74:12). He is in reality "the living God, the eternal King" (Jer 10:10), "the great King over all the earth" (Ps 47:2, 7). But the day is coming when that kingdom will be acknowledged universally, when every knee shall bow. It will be said to Zion, "The LORD, the King of Israel, is with you" (Zep 3:15); and they will say among the nations, "The Lord reigns" (Ps 96:10). Edom will be set aside, with "every pretension that sets itself up against the knowledge of God" (2Co 10:5); "And the kingdom will be the LORD's" (cf. 1Co 15:24–28; Rev 11:15; 12:10; 22:1–5).

Jonah

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

The book of Jonah is the fifth of the Minor Prophets (the Book of the Twelve). Jonah, the son of Amittai, from Gath Hepher in Galilee (cf. 2Ki 14:25; Jos 19:13) prophesied during or shortly before the reign of Jeroboam II (793–753 B.C.). This makes it virtually certain that we should place the story of the book in the period of Assyrian weakness between the death of Adad-nirari III in 782 B.C. and the seizing of the Assyrian throne by Tiglath-pileser III in 745 B.C. During this time, Assyria was engaged in a life and death struggle with the mountain tribes of Urartu and its associates of Mannai and Madai in the north who had been able to push their frontier to within less than a hundred miles of Nineveh. The consciousness of weakness and possible defeat would go far to explain the readiness of Nineveh to accept the prophet's message.

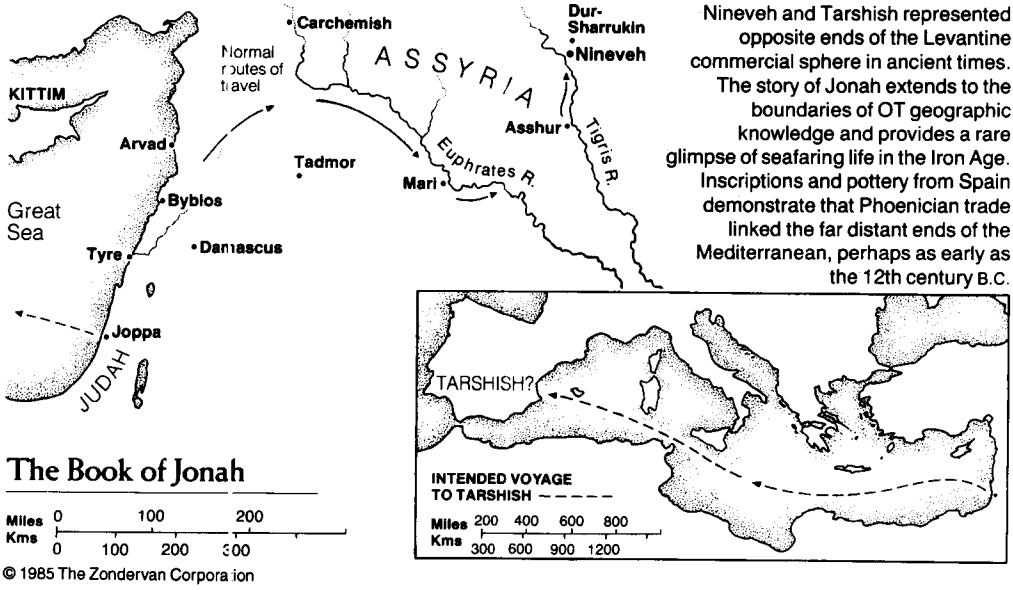
Until the nineteenth century, Jonah was regarded as history. Liberal scholars today largely contend that the book is no more than a beautiful allegory or parable. Our Lord, however, referred to the story of Jonah as historical (Mt 12:38–41; Lk 11:29–30, 32). The main argument against the historicity of the book is, of course, the alleged impossibility of Jonah's surviving three days and three nights in the belly of the fish (1:17). There are sufficient, well-attested occurrences to show that survival is possible under these circumstances. Jesus placed the incident alongside the greater miracle of his own resurrection.

2. Date and Authorship

The information in the book clearly must have come from Jonah himself in the eighth century B.C. Since he is nowhere claimed as author, and since he is constantly referred to in the third person, the possibility cannot be dismissed that its present form comes from another hand.

3. Purpose

The purpose of Jonah's proclamation was to bring the Ninevites to repentance. The declaration of God's loving care was made,



Nineveh and Tarshish represented opposite ends of the Levantine commercial sphere in ancient times. The story of Jonah extends to the boundaries of OT geographic knowledge and provides a rare glimpse of seafaring life in the Iron Age. Inscriptions and pottery from Spain demonstrate that Phoenician trade linked the far distant ends of the Mediterranean, perhaps as early as the 12th century B.C.

not to Nineveh, but to Jonah (4:11), and so to Israel. Taking the book as a whole, it is a revelation to God's people of God's all-sovereign power and care. It had a special relevance to Israel over which the shadow of Assyria was falling, and later to Judah, as it faced destruction at the hands of Babylon.

EXPOSITION

I. The Disobedient Prophet (1:1–2:10)

A. Jonah's Flight (1:1–3)

1 There is no indication how God communicated his will to Jonah. In many cases there must have been the overwhelming certainty of the divine message without any consciousness of how it had come. "Jonah son of Amittai" is the only prophetic name recorded for the North in the nearly forty years between the death of Elisha and the ministry of Amos (2Ki 14:25). Later rabbinic tradition claimed that Jonah was the widow's son brought back to life by Elijah (1Ki 17:17–24). So far as we know, Jonah was not picked because he was particularly suited to the task. When he fled, God could have turned to someone else; but since it is the sovereignty of God that is being particularly stressed, God held to his choice (cf. 1Co 9:16).

2 "The great city of Nineveh" goes back to early days after the Flood (Ge 10:11). Though it was not always the capital city of Assyria, Nineveh was always one of its principal towns. In the light of 4:11, it might be better to translate "great [GK 1524] city" as "big city"; for it is the number of its inhabitants that is being stressed. "Preach against it" indicates that God was particularly concerned with the Assyrians' self-confident pride (Isa 10:13) and cruelty (Na 3:1, 10, 19).

3 Apparently "Tarshish" comes from a Semitic root meaning "to smelt"; since there were a number of places with this name on the Mediterranean coast, probably Tartessus in Spain is intended. We need not go beyond Jonah's own words (4:2) to find his motive for not wanting to go to Nineveh, but this does not explain why he tried to run away.

Israel was involved in the battle of Qarqar in 853 B.C. and under Jehu paid tribute to Assyria in 841 B.C. If Assyria were to be spared now, it could only be that the doom pronounced at Horeb to Elijah (1Ki 19:15–18) should go into full effect. Sick at heart from the foreshortened view of the future, so common to the prophets in foretelling the coming judgments of God, Jonah wished to escape, not beyond the power of God, but away from the stage on which God was working out his purposes and judgments. "To flee from the Lord" is here probably the equivalent of "to flee from the Lord's land."

B. The Storm (1:4–6)

4 For the ancient Near East, the gods had created order by defeating the powers of chaos; but these had been tamed, not abolished, and so remained a constant threat. The embodiment of these lawless and chaotic forces was the sea, which people could not control or tame. Frequently God's control of the sea is used to stress his complete lordship over creation (cf. Pss 24:2; 33:7; 65:7; 74:13; et al.).

5–6 The crew were probably all Phoenicians, whose language differed only slightly from Jonah's; so the crew would have shared in a common religion and pantheon. In a developed polytheism, however, individuals tended to concentrate on favorite deities; in addition, all sorts of attractive foreign deities tended to be adopted by sailors.

Possibly Jonah's hurried flight to Joppa played a part in his sound sleep. The storm that can terrify the sailor can reduce the landsman to physical impotence and unconsciousness, as indeed "deep sleep" suggests. The captain's command to Jonah that he pray reflects the heathen concept that the amount of prayer is of importance (Mt 6:7) as well as that polytheists could seldom be sure which god had been displeased.

C. Jonah's Responsibility (1:7–10)

7 "Come, let us cast lots" assumes that Jonah had joined in the chorus of prayer. Though Jonah may have been terrified, he would hardly have realized, as did the sailors, that anything exceptional was happening. The lack of result from prayer and the rarity of such storms in the sailing season (cf. Ac 27:9) made the sailors conclude that someone on board must be responsible for their plight.

8 With the generosity of men who constantly risked their lives in their daily work, the sailors wanted to know whether Jonah was one who fully deserved his fate (cf. Ac 28:4), or whether there were extenuating circumstances that would justify their taking risks to try to save him.

9–10 In saying "I am a Hebrew," Jonah used the term by which an Israelite was known to his neighbors. In a polytheistic society, it was difficult to find a title that would more perfectly express the supremacy of the Lord than "the God of heaven." What terrified the sailors was the addition of "who made the sea and the land." They knew that Jonah was running away from the Lord (v.10), whom they knew to be the God of Israel. As Phoenicians they did not take seriously Jonah's claim that his Lord was superior to Baal. But now Jonah had claimed that the Lord was the Creator of the sea. Terrified they said, "What have you done!" It is an exclamation, not a question.

D. Jonah's Rejection (1:11–16)

11 The sailors found themselves in a new and unexpected position. They realized that they were not dealing with a heinous criminal. Here was a god's servant who had fallen out with his lord. In a culture where correct procedure in the service of the gods was essential, they sought to do the will of the Lord correctly. Only Jonah could guide them.

12 Jonah's answer to the distraught sailors was, in essence, "Hand me over to my God." Once the lot pointed to Jonah, he accepted that the storm was not simply a "natural phenomenon." So Jonah was willing to be handed over to his God. Jonah knew that God would not make the sailors pay for what had been an innocent act on their part. Jonah was confident that the sea would calm down once he was no longer in the ship.

13–14 Since the sailors' religious outlook could make no sense of a god of heaven's creating and controlling the sea—they probably did not even think of the sea as created but rather as a remnant of the original chaos—to throw Jonah overboard was equivalent to murdering him. They could not know for certain whether they were doing the Lord's will, and they feared that he might punish them for the death of his servant. So they tried hard to set him ashore, even though it involved great risk to the ship. When the increasing storm made this impossible, they prayed that they should not be held guilty of Jonah's death; for clearly the Lord had done as he pleased. When they called Jonah "innocent" (GK 5929), they were not impugning God's actions; they were merely stating that no human tribunal had passed sentence on him.

15–16 So far as the sailors knew, Jonah had been dealt with by his angry god. The immediate cessation of the storm after they threw Jonah overboard showed them that the Lord really had control of the sea. So "they offered a sacrifice to the LORD and made vows to him." There was a new respect for the God of Israel, a new understanding of his power. Because Jonah believed in the sovereignty of God, the sailors were brought to a realization of his power. But there is no evidence that their spiritual apprehension went further.

E. Jonah's Protection (1:17–2:1)

17 The sea did not change its nature when Jonah splashed into it. Jonah did not suddenly develop into a champion swimmer. But the necessary protection was there. There is no suggestion that the fish was a special creation for the purpose or that Jonah's preservation within it was miraculous. The power of God ensured that the fish was there at exactly the right time.

Why did God choose this means of preserving Jonah's life? God could easily have provided a piece of floating wreckage to which Jonah could have clung, until he washed up on the beach half-drowned. Miracle is not the gratuitous display of God's omnipotence, nor is it called out merely because of human need. Taken in its setting, it is probable that every miracle has spiritual significance (cf. the word "sign" in John's gospel). That must surely be the case here, especially since Jesus used this miracle to picture his own resurrection.

For the sailors the raising of the storm and its subsequent quieting were indubitable evidence of the Lord's control of chaos. Since "the fish" was at God's disposal, it meant that every force in the world, however potentially dangerous, was completely under God's dominance and control. So while in one way the fish is secondary in the revelation to Jonah, it was needed for the prophet to grasp that God's love is operative in a world that is entirely under divine control.

Once Jonah was on dry land again, he could make some kind of estimate of how long he had been in the fish. Yet to make any exact measure of the number of hours would have been impossible for him. Roused suddenly from a deep slumber, stupefied by the violence of the storm, and in all probability seasick, Jonah would have been in no position to know at what hour he was thrown overboard. Furthermore, on reaching the shore he would have needed time to collect his wits. Clearly, then, the term "three days and three nights" is intended as an approximation, not a precise period of seventy-two hours. The use by Jesus (Mt 12:40) should almost certainly be understood in the same way.

2:1 The popular idea that Jonah went straight from the deck of the ship into the fish's open mouth has no support from either the narrative or Jonah's prayer. He was half-drowned before he was swallowed. If he was still conscious, sheer dread would have caused him to faint—there is no mention of the fish in his prayer. He can hardly have known what caused the change from wet darkness to an even greater dry darkness. When he did regain consciousness, it would have taken some time to realize that the all-enveloping darkness was not that of Sheol (see next comment) but of a mysterious safety.

F. Jonah's Psalm of Thanksgiving (2:2–9)

2–4 "From the depths of the grave" is literally "from the belly of Sheol [GK 8619]." True, Sheol is often no more than a synonym for the grave; Jonah was not saying, however, that he thought he was buried but that he had gone to join the dead. The terrifying experience brought him to the realization of his plight and elicited the confession: "Yet I will look again." This is not a statement of salvation but of Jonah's determination to pray in spite of his banishment.

5–6 Jonah continued the description of his downward plunge into the deep, vividly illustrating the hopelessness of his situation. He was, as it were, beyond human help. The reference to the place of the dead as "the pit" (GK 8846) points to Jonah's expectation of certain death.

7–9 As he plummeted through the waters, Jonah realized that "his life was ebbing away." In these fleeting moments his thought turned to the Lord and his "holy temple." Remarkably, in spite of the position in which he found himself, Jonah had a mental picture of the despairing sailors calling in vain on their gods, while he, whom they thought had been lost, was awaiting the demonstration of his God's salvation.

G Jonah's Deliverance (2:10)

10 The literal Hebrew reads, "And the LORD spoke to the fish." Unlike the prophet, the fish responded promptly, as soon as it knew God's will. Where the fish spewed out Jonah is not indicated. No doubt the effect of the fish's gastric juices on Jonah's face and other exposed parts of his body must have been terrible.

II. The Obedient Prophet (3:1–4:11)

A. Jonah's Proclamation (3:1–4)

1 The expression "a second time" is completely vague. There are many examples in the Scriptures of no second chance. Indeed, we should rather ask why the second call came to Jonah. The answer seems to be the sovereignty of God, one of the main themes of this book.

2 God does not lay weight on Nineveh's political importance or on the magnificence of its buildings. "The message I give you" does not necessarily suggest that Jonah would have said otherwise. It is merely one more indication that we are dealing with the sovereignty of God.

3 "Now Nineveh was a very large city" (NIV note) most probably is the correct reading. "An important city" does not suit the context and introduces a note of particularity into a book where universality is constantly being implied. The stress on the importance and size of Nineveh is entirely justified. Its population was at least 120,000 (4:10), while Samaria, almost certainly larger than Jerusalem, had about 30,000.

"A visit required three days" is literally "a distance of three days." This could mean that it took three days to go either across it or around it; but it certainly does not mean what the NIV rendering might be taken to imply, that it would take three days to visit every part of it. Modern archaeology has shown that the inner wall had a length of almost eight miles.

4 Jonah was not necessarily proclaiming God's message as he went into the city. But sometime "on the first day," Jonah "proclaimed" his message. There may well have been something about Jonah, his bearing, his dress, or his "gastric juice tan" from the fish's belly as he strode toward the center of the city, looking neither to the right nor to the left, that drew many after him. When he finally stood and shouted, "Forty more days and Nineveh will be destroyed," the news spread like wildfire. The credibility of the message was underscored by the fact that at the time Assyria stood in considerable danger from its northern neighbors. But the word of the Lord worked the miracle, not Jonah or his commentary.

B. Nineveh's Repentance (3:5–10)

There now begins a subtle interplay on the two divine names. Up to this point, we consistently find the name "the LORD" (Yahweh; GK 3378), i.e., the name of the covenant-making God of Israel. Now alongside it we find the name "God" (Elohim; GK 466), the all-powerful One, the Creator, the Lord of nature. The obvious purpose is to bring home that Jonah had not been proclaiming the Lord to those who did not know him but that the supreme God, whatever his name, was about to show his power in judgment. There is not the slightest indication that Jonah had mentioned the God of Israel or had said that he came in his name. The Ninevites, however, recognized the voice of the supreme God, whatever name they may have given him, and repented.

5 We must picture the people, both those who heard Jonah and those to whom his words were reported, as saying spontaneously, "Let us fast!" Sackcloth was a standard, virtually obligatory, accompaniment of fasting. The coarsest of cloth, often made of goat's hair, sackcloth was the normal dress of the poor, prisoners, and slaves; it was worn by those who mourned (Eze 7:18). Prophets wore it, partly to associate themselves with the poor, partly perhaps as a sign of mourning for the sins of the people. When used by the Ninevites, it expressed their complete inability to contend with the divine decree and with the recognition that they were the slaves of the supreme God.

6 There is no suggestion that Jonah made any effort to reach the royal presence; hence the news would have reached the king later than it did many of his subjects. He not only came down from his throne and sat on the ground—a feature of mourning rites—dressed in sackcloth like the meanest slave, but he sat in the dust, which means, presumably, in the open air, where he could be seen by his subjects. All this was done completely spontaneously. Then came the realization that this concerned everyone, and the decree was issued (v.7).

7 The king's courtiers and counselors sat in the dust around him and rapidly agreed on a decree that made the spontaneous response official. With the mourners were to be linked the domestic animals, a touch suggesting that it was indeed "Greater Nineveh" that was involved. Though we have no records from Mesopotamia of animals being so involved in mourning rites, there is nothing alien to the Oriental mind in it.

8 Anything and everything condemned by law and conscience is included under "evil ways." "Violence" (GK 2805) means a defiance of the law by one too strong to be brought to account. The Assyrians assumed that in virtue of their conquests they had been placed above lesser breeds and were entitled to ignore the dictates of conscience and compassion in their behavior to their neighbors. It is easy to slip into the concept that our position gives us the right to dominate others.

9–10 The operative phrase in these two verses is that God "had compassion" (GK 5714). We can know the character of God only from what he does and the words he uses to explain his actions. When he does not do what he said he would, we as finite beings can say only that he has changed his mind or repented, even though we should recognize, as Jonah did (4:2), that he had intended or desired this all along. "Compassion" is an inadequate rendering because it does not bring out the concept of a change. Thus "relent" is better. God's change was due to the change in the Ninevites.

2. Jonah's Displeasure (4:1–4)

1 We are so obsessed with pure doctrine that we are not satisfied when we meet obvious repentance but seek to ensure that it is accompanied by right doctrine. Jonah knew God well enough to understand that the person who really was repentant would be justified in God's sight. The literal translation here is "But it was evil to Jonah with great evil." The term "evil" (GK 8288 & 8317), which has been repeatedly applied to the Ninevites, now characterizes the prophet. By objecting to the character and actions of God, Jonah has effectively put himself out of fellowship with God, just like the evil and ignorant heathen. But God showed him the same compassion as he had shown Nineveh.

Why was Jonah so angry? Rabbinic literature suggests that on the basis of Dt 18:21–22 he would be regarded as a false prophet. True enough, once the first wave of terror had passed and destruction did not come, many in Nineveh must have asked themselves whether Jonah had really been a messenger of the gods. That was an unavoidable result of divine mercy. But it was recognized universally that a pronouncement of divine punishment might be averted by suitable penitence. Prophecy is conditional. So even if this motive played a part in Jonah's thinking, it must have been a minor one; and it does not explain why he ran away.

2 Jonah told God exactly why he was angry. He objected to God's sparing Nineveh. Jonah's motive could only stem from what Nineveh had meant in Israel's past and what he expected it to be in the future. (Compare the exultation over its fall in Na 2–3.)

The word "gracious" (GK 2843) is linked with "grace" and expresses God's attitude toward those who have no claim on him, since they are outside any and every covenant relationship. The Hebrew term translated "compassionate" (GK 8157) came to be linked with the word for "womb" and expressed the understanding and loving compassion of the mother to her child. We have here the male and female aspects of understanding, compassion, and favor united in the one God. "Love" (hesed; GK 2876) expresses God's behavior in the covenant relationship. There is no one term in English that adequately expresses the wide and rich range of meaning of this word. What is clear is that Jonah was finding fault with God as he really is, not as he imagined him to be.

3 There can be little doubt that when Jonah asked God to take away his life, there is much more in what Jonah said than lies on the surface. He was virtually saying to God, "I have devoted my life to your service as your servant, as your prophet. But what I have experienced of you just does not make sense of the world order in which I find myself. Why should I go on living? For to leave your service would make my life purposeless. Once, in the past, you showed Elijah that there was a deeper purpose in life than he realized [1Ki 19:4]. Have you perhaps a similar message for me?"

4 "Are you right to be angry?" is a better translation than "Have you any right to be angry?" God was not rebuking Jonah; God was not even asking him what right he, a man, had to criticize God. Rather, he was suggesting to him that he might not be correct in his estimate of the position. Scripture has many examples of people who in agony tried to understand the ways of God and used language that others might consider blasphemous (cf. Jer 15:15–18; 20:7–18). God shows his compassion with all such people, including Jonah.

4. God's Rebuke of Jonah (4:5–9)

5 The usual view is that Jonah, hoping against hope, was waiting to see whether God might not change his mind again. But unless we are prepared to maintain that Jonah thought that Nineveh's repentance was merely superficial and transient and that therefore God might change his mind, the traditional view is alien to the picture of the prophet we have been slowly building up. It is far more probable that Jonah was expecting something to happen that would explain God's ways with humankind a little more clearly to him.

6 In the rest of this section, the divine name Elohim ("God"), which has been used consistently for God's dealings with Nineveh, is now used for his dealings with Jonah. The use of "LORD God" (Yahweh Elohim; see comment on 3:5–10) forms a link between the two usages, linking the God of creation (cf. Ge 1) and the God of revelation (cf. Ex 4). The Palestinian Jewish tradition identified the word traditionally rendered "gourd" with the castor oil plant. "Vine" is a safe rendering of this word. Though not stated, it is clear that the action Jonah took to "ease his discomfort" occurred in the hot season, when the daily maximum temperature in Mesopotamia is about 110 degrees Fahrenheit.

7 The repeated use of the verb "appointed" (GK 4948) of the fish (1:17), the vine (4:6), the worm (4:7), and the wind (4:8) stresses the divine initiative. The word for "worm" (GK 9357) implies something small. God uses both the great fish and the insignificant worm equally as instruments of his purpose.

8 "A scorching east wind" is normally called a "sirocco," which means "east wind." Obviously such a wind, blowing in from across the desert, withers all green growth. For Jonah there was no shelter, unless he was willing to reenter Nineveh. The shelter he had built did not exclude the wind and only partially broke the force of the sun's rays. Completely dispirited he in essence said, "I would be better off dead than alive."

9 As in v.4, it would be better to translate God's question by "Are you right to be angry about the vine?" and Jonah's answer by "I am." Why was Jonah so angry, or why did he feel such grief for the withered vine? God's answer in v.10 suggests that we take "Jonah was very happy about the vine" (v.6) to mean that sitting there in the burnt-up Tigris plain, shimmering in the heat, Jonah had felt real joy in the sight of the fresh, green plant. True enough, it increased his comfort, but that was secondary.

5. God's Mercy (4:10–11)

10 One of the greatest dangers besetting human beings is that they become such a part of their environment that they miss the pathos that pervades the universe. Paul describes it as a "groaning as in the pains of childbirth" (Ro 8:22), which comes from the futility caused by its bondage to decay. Jonah had apparently grown completely indifferent to the fate of God's creation outside Israel. We need hardly be surprised, for this attitude has been common within the church, and indeed within some small local churches. So God placed his prophet on the level of an ordinary person. The discomforts of the summer heat, the attractiveness of the vine, and the destructiveness of the sirocco had nothing to do with Jonah's theology. He reacted to them as an ordinary man in the setting of nature.

Again the narrative changes to "the LORD." Once Jonah had realized his link with the rest of God's creation, God could declare the link between himself, the Creator, and his creation—not only humankind, made in the image and likeness of God, but also animals.

11 The meaning of "more than a hundred and twenty thousand people who cannot tell their right hand from their left" is difficult. It could refer either to the whole population of Nineveh or to the small children who do not yet know their right hand from their left. The former has been supported by archaeological considerations, which set the maximum population of Nineveh at 175,000 or less. Thus if only children were intended, far too high a total population would be involved—even if "Greater Nineveh" (cf. 3:2–3 is included.

We do not find in Scripture the sentimentalism about animals found in many classes of society today. Even so, Jonah had to understand that the fulfillment of his wishes about Nineveh would have involved the destruction not only of innocent human beings but also of "many cattle as well" that were dependent on people.

The curtain falls, and we are not told what, finally, Jonah did or said. Quite simply, the book contains a revelation of God's character and attitude toward his creation given to Jonah and through Jonah to Israel and to us. For Christians, the Son of Man's three days and three nights in the heart of the earth assure us of a love that embraces all, even in the darkest hour. We know that in Christ, God was reconciling the world to himself (2Co 5:18–19), and we will look with new eyes on those who have been reconciled. Christians cannot regard as enemies those whom God refuses to regard as his enemies.

Micah

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

Micah, like his contemporaries Isaiah and Amos, prophesied during the eighth century B.C., a time when Israel and Judah had risen to heights of economic affluence but had fallen to depths of spiritual decadence. Under the able leadership of Jeroboam II of Israel (786–746) and Uzziah of Judah (783–742), the territories of both kingdoms became almost as extensive as during the reign of Solomon. It was a time of great economic prosperity, fostered by the absence of international crises and by the mutual cooperation of both kingdoms. While Israel and Judah appeared to be strong externally, an internal decay was sapping their strength and threatening to destroy the social fabric of these two kingdoms. Canaanite religion had extended its influence among some of the people. And while Micah attacked the idolatry, it was not this aspect of Israel's condition that he emphasized most. It was rather the social injustices of the ruling classes.

The days of peace were destined to come to an end, however, as Assyria arose from a state of quiescence to occupy a threatening posture on the national scene. Under Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 B.C.), Assyria experienced a remarkable resurgence of power. At the same time Israel was being torn by internal strife and dissension. Finally, under the leadership of Shalmaneser V, Israel, the northern kingdom, was occupied; and several years later the city of Samaria fell to him and to Sargon II (721). In Judah, Ahaz's pro-Assyrian policies made Judah little more than a satellite of Assyria. Not till Hezekiah came to the throne (715) were sweeping religious—and most probably social—reforms instituted. Assyria continued to threaten Judah under Hezekiah's reign, but an attempt by Sennacherib to take Jerusalem was frustrated (2Ki 19:32–36; 2Ch 32:21; Isa 37:33–37). It was about a century after the death of Hezekiah that Jerusalem would finally fall to the Babylonians.

2. Authorship

The superscription to the prophecy (1:1) asserts that Micah was the author. The prophet who bore that name was from Moresheth (probably Moresheth Gath) in Judah. This was a town in the general proximity of Isaiah's home, a factor that may explain certain similarities between the prophecies of both men. Little is known about Micah apart from what may be inferred from his prophecy. The book eloquently affirms his sensitivity to the social and religious wrongs of his time.

3. Date

The superscription (1:1) places Micah in the milieu of eighth-century B.C. prophetism. The reference to the destruction of Samaria (v.6) places the beginning of his prophetic career sometime before the capture of that city (722/721 B.C.); and this is in agreement with the superscription that fixes the beginning of his ministry in the reign of Jotham (750–731). The prophetic indictments of social and religious corruption fit well the time of Ahaz and could even be appropriate to the prereformation period of Hezekiah, who reigned 715–686 B.C. The reference to Micah's prophecy in Jer 26:18–19 fixes at least a portion of Micah's message in the time of Hezekiah.

4. Theological Values

While Micah may not have written a theology, he certainly based his pleas to the people on a consistent theology of God. The first theological emphasis is the sovereignty of God (1:2). To Micah the Lord acted within the nations to effect their destiny as well as the destiny of his own people. Micah understood the coming destruction of Samaria and Jerusalem to result from the Lord's punishing these centers of wickedness for their rebellion against him. However, only in the last days will God's activity regarding the nations reach its climax. Then the ultimate triumph and vindication of God's people will take place (4:11–13), and the nations will become subject to the rule of the Lord.

Another theological emphasis of Micah is the self-consistency of the Lord. He is immutably committed to his covenantal obligations. It is this theme, coupled with that of divine sovereignty, that gives such urgency to Micah's words. That God seems austere and unbending is only a partial picture of his self-consistency. He is consistent also with his nature, and that nature is to forgive (7:18–20). God will not give up his people altogether; he will forgive the sins of the believing remnant.

Micah's doctrine of the "remnant" (GK 8642) is unique among the prophets and is perhaps his most significant contribution to the prophetic theology of hope. The remnant is a force in the world, not simply a residue of people. It is a force that will ultimately conquer the world (4:11–13). By removing everything that robs his people of complete trust in him (5:10–15), the Ruler from Bethlehem will deliver his people.

The basis of the divine redemptive activity lies within the nature of God. The absence of a vicarious role in the redemptive work of the messianic King in Micah underscores the prophet's theological perspective, which is to assure us of the future exaltation and glory of the remnant; and this is done against the background of the humiliation the nation would soon endure. We may state this aspect of Micah's theology thus: The nation will suffer the shame of defeat and exile. But that is not the end, for certain triumph and glory lay ahead, not for the whole nation, but only for the remnant. The people of God will be delivered from affliction and exile by their King and will return with him, secure in his power. Thus Micah's focus is on the kingdom of the Lord and its manifestation in the world.

The kingdom is an expression of divine power and sovereignty within the sphere of the nations. The messianic King is depicted in close association with the Lord and embodies his might and authority. The work of the messianic King is presented by Micah almost entirely in terms of power. Even the tender act of caring for his own as a shepherd cares for his sheep is done in the strength of the Lord (5:4).

Micah spoke to a people whose disobedience had led them to ignominy and ruin. But he reminded them—and us—that the Lord is almighty; and, because he is consistent with his word and with his nature, the people of God will not fail to receive all he has promised them. Though we suffer shame now, glory and vindication lie ahead because the Lord will "be true to Jacob, and show mercy to Abraham" (7:20).

EXPOSITION

I. The Superscription (1:1)

1 According to the superscription, the prophetic activity of Micah spanned the reigns of three kings of Judah in the eighth century B.C. This period was one of great spiritual decline, especially for the northern kingdom; and the messages of Micah and the other eighth-century prophets, with their emphases on social justice and obedience to the laws of the Mosaic covenant, were a refreshing breeze in the arid climate of spiritual ignorance and disobedience.

The prophecy of Micah was directed primarily toward Samaria and Jerusalem, the capital cities of the northern and southern kingdoms (Israel and Judah). While Micah's message was applicable to all the inhabitants of these kingdoms, he singled out the capitals because the leaders of these centers of influence were largely responsible for the social ills of that time. In particular he singled out Jerusalem, not only because of the corruption of its leaders, but also because of its future glory—a central motif in the prophetic theology of hope.

II. The First Oracle: Israel's Impending Judgment and Her Future Restoration (1:2–2:13)

A. The Impending Judgment (1:2–7)

2 The opening statement of the prophecy consists of a summons to the nations to attend to the cosmic judgment scene so vividly described by the prophet in the subsequent verses. It is clear that the summons is directed to the nations.

Micah pictured God as coming from his dwelling place to "witness against" (GK 6332) the nations. This witness was effected in the cataclysmic destruction of the cities of Samaria and Jerusalem. Micah, like Isaiah, saw the destiny of the nations as integrally related to the destiny of God's people. He deftly developed this theme throughout the prophecy.

The burning timbers and ruined houses of Samaria and Jerusalem would be an eloquent sermon to the people of the world that God does not allow sin to go unpunished, even in the case of his own people. God's destruction of Samaria and Jerusalem was to be a witness to the nations of God's hatred of sin and the harbinger of their own eventual destruction.

3–4 God's witness against the nations is depicted in a vivid anthropomorphic scene in which God comes forth from heaven to tread the high places of the earth and to bring about the destruction of Samaria and Jerusalem. In this representation, the prophet illustrates that God is not only transcendent above the world but immanent in it, and that he intervenes in history to effect his will.

The term "high places" (GK 1195) connotes several concepts. Aside from the basic meaning, it was used of pagan religious sanctuaries (Jer 7:31; Eze 20:29), the place of security and protection (Dt 32:13; Hab 3:19), and the place of military advantage (Dt 33:29; Eze 36:2). Apparently here Micah envisioned God as the majestic Sovereign who steps from heaven into the course of human events. Samaria and Jerusalem cannot stand before the might and power of the Conqueror who strides across the heights of the earth and before whom the pagan sanctuaries crumble as the mountains melt.The cataclysm that accompanied God's intervention in history is described in terms of a violent storm or earthquake (v.4). The language is metaphorical and describes the intensity of the destruction of Samaria and Jerusalem.

5 With telling force the prophet asserts that the national upheaval would be caused by the sins of the people of Israel. The close association between "high places" and "sin" in the mind of the prophet makes it clear that to him the incursion of non-Israelite religious practices was at the heart of the crisis of the house of Israel. Because of the influence of Canaanite religion, Israel was giving only lip service to the Lord; and the ethical demands of the law, with their resultant benign effect on the social structure of the nation, were being disregarded. This was the sin that led to estrangement from God and eventual captivity.

Literally the Hebrew here says, "Who is Jacob's transgression?" The prophet personified the cites of Samaria and Jerusalem, possibly because he wished to depict them as harlots.

6–7 Samaria was to become a ruin, a place with vineyards planted on her sloping sides amid the stones of her ruined buildings. The expression "lay bare her foundations" may echo the use of the word for uncovering one's nakedness (Lev 20: 11, 17–18, 20–21), a term used in the OT of prostitution (Eze 16:36; 23:18) and lewdness (2Sa 6:20; Hos 2:10). The imagery of the harlot appears where the wages Samaria received from the practice of prostitution would be burned. The prostitution referred to is idolatry, which the OT consistently regards as spiritual fornication.

The word translated "temple gifts" (GK 924) seems out of place in a sequence describing the destruction of idols and may reflect a Semitic root meaning "resemble"; hence it may refer to an image or idol. But the same word also connotes payment to a harlot, and Micah used the same word later in this verse (translated "the wages of prostitutes"). The wealth that accrued to Samaria from her idolatry would be taken away from her to be used again for the wages of prostitution—i.e., the invading Assyrians would transfer the wealth of Samaria to their own temples, where it would again be used for idolatrous worship.

B. The Prophet's Reaction to the Pronouncement of Judgment (1:8–9)

8–9 The prophet next laments the destruction of the great metropolis of Samaria by representing himself as wailing and going about unclothed as a sign of mourning. The judgment to come on Samaria was like an incurable wound, i.e., it was irreversible. But in its malignant course it had come to Jerusalem as well.

C. The Prophet's Warning and Summons to the People (1:10–16)

10 The phrase "Tell it not in Gath" is reflective of David's lament at Saul's death (2Sa 1:20). It warns the people not to weep lest the inhabitants of Gath, a Philistine city, learn of their impending destruction. In Beth Ophrah

("house of dust") the inhabitants are to roll in the dust as a sign of mourning (Jos 7:6; Job 16:15; Isa 47:1).

11–12 The people of Shaphir ("beautiful," "fair," "pleasant") are to experience something quite the opposite of what the name of their town means; they are to be reduced to shame and dishonor. Those who live in Zaanan ("come out") will not be able to come out from their city. Beth Ezel is unknown to us. The word 'etsel means "beside," "contiguous to." We may paraphrase the name Beth Ezel as "nearby house." Perhaps the town was in close proximity to Jerusalem. That its "standing place" was to be taken away may indicate that this town would cease to exist. Thus a buffer between Jerusalem and the invading armies would be removed. The wailing is "because" Maroth ("bitter") will also endure God's punishment. All this is because God will punish his people, including Jerusalem.

13–14 The inhabitants of Lachish are to harness the team to the chariot and are to flee the coming destruction like steeds. The significance of Moresheth is difficult to determine. Its name in Hebrew is somewhat similar in sound to the word for "betrothed" and, since "parting gifts" were given to brides as dowries (1Ki 9:16), possibly the name was intended to connote that the town was soon to be parted from Judah as a bride parts from her family.

Aczib ("deception") will prove to be a deception to Judah. The word is used of a stream that has dried up (Jer 15:18); so this city will cease to exist.

15–16 The name Mareshah is somewhat similar to the root that means "to possess." Thus this town's name might have engendered associations with the word "conqueror." The glory of Israel, i.e., the people, will be forced to flee as David did to Adullam.

This section (vv.10–16) begins with words that recall David's lament at the death of Saul and ends with the name of the cave where David hid from Saul. These dark moments in David's life form a gloomy backdrop to the description of the fall of the towns Micah spoke of. Though he is never directly mentioned, the figure of a David bowed down by humiliation appears hauntingly in the tapestry of destruction. It is as if Micah saw in the fall of each town and the eventual captivity of the two kingdoms the final dissolution of the Davidic monarchy. Like David, the glory of Israel would come to Adullam.

D. The Prophet's Indictment of the Oppressing Classes (2:1–5)

1–2 The oracle continues with a denunciation of the corrupt practices of the affluent and influential classes whose hold on society was so strong in Micah's day. The basis for the national crisis and the future collapse of the nation was Israel's disobedience to her God. Micah turned to the powerful ruling classes and began to vividly picture the intensity with which they sought to defraud the poor and become richer at the expense of the less fortunate. He pictured them lying awake at night devising their plans. At first light of day, they proceeded to put their schemes into action. They controlled the structure of society and had a free hand to perpetrate their deeds with impunity. They coveted the houses and lands of those who could not adequately defend themselves in this oppressive society.

3 The word "therefore" establishes the preceding catalog of wrongs as the basis for the "disaster" (GK 8288). Micah referred to the nation as a "people." He pictured the disaster as a burden from which they would be unable to save themselves (lit., "to remove their necks"). Micah saw the captivity as unavoidable. Because of the national humiliation, they would be unable to hold their heads high among the nations.

4 This verse contains a "mournful song" (GK 5631) or lament that is characteristic of the way the people would mourn the desolation of the land. This word is used of figurative prophetic accounts (e.g., Isa 14:4). In general, however, it is a "descriptive saying," "byword," or "proverb" that has popular appeal or significance. Because it is entirely in the first person, the song is clearly uttered by the house of Israel itself.

The lamentation concerns the fact that the land allotted to the people had changed hands. The land that had been Israel's exclusive possession had become the property of her enemies. The land was to be assigned to "traitors" (GK 8745) or, better, "to a rebel." Micah describes the enemy as a rebel, which is consistent with his view of the "nations that have not obeyed" (5:15).

5 The word "assembly" (GK 7736) may mean a "multitude" in general; here it connotes the assembly of people that is distinctly the Lord's, i.e., the covenantal community (Dt 23). Because of their blatant disregard for the obligations of the covenant, the oppressors had removed themselves from any inheritance in the congregation. Micah is saying that the corrupt people of his day would have no further participation in the covenant community.

E. The True Prophet Versus the False Prophets (2:6–11)

6 Micah quotes the false prophets of his day. "Do not prophesy," they said. The prohibition against prophesying is uttered by prophets, evidently the false, self-serving prophets of Micah's time. "Overtake" (GK 6047) never means that but always means "leave." Thus those false prophets appear to be saying: "Do not prophesy. Do not prophesy of these things; for as long as you do, disgrace will not leave us." The true prophets were apparently considered troublemakers whose powerful sermons disgraced the privileged classes and embarrassed the false prophets. As long as their prophetic protest continued, so the humiliation these corrupt leaders felt would continue.

7 The sense here indicates that one should not blame the continuing disgrace on the prophetic pronouncements of Micah. The subsequent questions imply that it is not of the nature of God only to punish or to reproach because, Micah continues, "my words [i.e., the words of the Lord through the prophet] do good to him whose ways are upright." If the ungodly people of his day would have lived according to the covenantal standards of the Lord, Micah's words would have had a benign effect on their lives as well as on the life of the nation; and the reproach and disgrace that they felt as he prophesied to them would have become a means of blessing.

8 But the people were not living according to the standards of the Lord, for Micah says, "Lately my people have risen up like an enemy." By their blatant disregard for the social concern demanded by the covenant, they were really rebelling against the Lord and evoking his anger. The acts of unbelievable hostility Micah cites describe the ways in which the poor were treated like an enemy. The people forcibly stripped off the outer garments of those who unsuspectingly passed by. The word "strip" (GK 7320) frequently has the sense of a "raid" that a marauding party would make against an enemy (Jdg 9:33; 1Sa 23:27), and it is used also of stripping for spoil (Hos 7:1). The peaceful and unsuspecting were suddenly bereft of some necessity of life by those who cared nothing for their victims' security or comfort.

9–10 The money hungry even treated the women cruelly. That only women are mentioned implies that they were probably widows forced from their homes. The children too were affected, for the Lord's blessing was taken from them forever. Because of the sin of the leaders of Micah's day, a whole generation would never see the glorious works of God but would live out their days in a strange land. Micah emphasized this as the intensity of his language rose to a sharp command. The people were to be banished because the land was irrevocably defiled.

11 The people of this time had an intense desire for the fruits of their affluent society, expressed in the terms "wine" and "beer." So if someone were to preach to them of greater affluence and prosperity, they would listen to him; and he would readily find acceptance among them. The implication is that Micah's message of doom was unacceptable to those who were basking in the affluence of the eighth century.

F. The Prophet's Statement of Hope (2:12–13)

12–13 The prophet turns abruptly to the statement of hope that ends the first oracle. In it he announces Israel's future restoration. The abruptness of the transition serves to place his message of hope in stark contrast to the message of the hypothetical preacher of v.11, who falsely preaches of continuing bright prospects for Israel. Micah's hope was not centered in his generation but in a remnant that would be led by their king from captivity to deliverance.

If studied in isolation from the total context of the prophecy, the passage may be understood simply as a prediction of the return from the captivity. But this is inadequate in view of the broader background of Micah's concept of the future. Micah envisioned a kingdom of eternal duration with the Lord as King (4:7). The Deliverer-King of 5:2–4 seems to be identical with the king of the present passage; he plays an important role in the restoration of God's people. In both passages the motif of the "flock" is prominent. The fulfillment of the great prophecy in 5:2–4 requires a ruler whose birthplace is Bethlehem and who will extend his influence to the ends of the earth and bring security to God's people. Micah's perspective of hope extends beyond a mere restoration from captivity to the messianic kingdom. It is only then that Israel's hope will be finally and consummately realized.

Micah depicts the "remnant" (GK 8642) as a flock of sheep penned up in an enclosure. In the next clause the figurative depiction of sheep gives place to the picture of a vast throng of people. The word translated "throng" (GK 2101) means "to murmur." It depicts the murmuring of the members of a community (Ru 1:19) and the resonating sound of the earth echoing to the noise of a loud shout (1Sa 4:5; 1Ki 1:45).

Suddenly a figure, called "the Breaker" (NIV, "One who breaks open the way"), appears in the narrative and goes up before the multitude. Led by the Breaker, the people burst through the gate of the enclosure to form a procession with their King at their head. Micah envisions a time when the kingdom of God will burst forth into sudden reality and the people of God will be manifested. He affirms that the strictures that now prevent the visible realization of the power and glory of God's kingdom and that blur the identity of God's people in the world will be shattered and the Breaker will lead his people to glory.

The parallelism of the last clause establishes a close relationship between the work of the Breaker and the King of 5:2–4. Both arise from the people (5:2) and bring deliverance to the people (5:4); the people they lead are likened to a flock (5:4); and both are intimately associated with the Lord (5:4). We may thus understand the Breaker to be Israel's King.

The last line of v.13 establishes a close connection between the Lord and the King. It is the Lord whose strength and power are manifested in the reign of the King. The King reflects the strength and majesty of the Lord as does the figure of 5:4. The remnant, according to Micah, will receive its final glory and vindication only through the Messiah. He will arise from his people and lead them into the security of God's kingdom. This passage anticipates a later passage (4:7) in which Micah envisioned the remnant as a "strong nation" over which the Lord reigns.

III. The Second Oracle: The Prophet's Indictment of the Leaders of the House of Israel and Israel's Future Hope (3:1–5:15)

A. The Prophet's Indictment of the Rulers of Israel (3:1–4)

1 The second oracle begins, like the first, with a summons to hear the prophet's message. The summons was directed in this instance to the rulers of Judah and Israel. Micah begins this oracle with a devastating question. If any should know the meaning of "justice" (GK 5477), it is those who have the awesome responsibility of leadership. Here "justice" is used in the sense of fairness and equity in governmental administration.

2–4 The language of the prophet becomes vividly emotive as he describes the harsh treatment directed against the poor. He pictures the civil leaders as treating the exploited classes like animals being butchered and prepared for eating. The skin was torn from them and their flesh butchered. Because they had so treated the poor, the Lord would not hear these merciless authorities when they cried to him. Those who violate God's covenant cannot expect him to maintain the blessings of the covenant.

B. The Prophet's Indictment of the Religious Leaders of Israel (3:5–8)

5 Micah addresses another group of leaders in Israel, the false prophets of the time. The word "feeds" (lit., "bites"; GK 5966) is always used in the OT for the bite of a serpent—except where the root reflects the secondary connotation of paying interest on loaned money. Its primary use has led some to interpret the phrase as describing the harm inflicted on the people by the lying prophets, whose false message of peace was as harmful as a serpent's bite.

In this structure, however, "bite" is paralleled by "not put into their mouths," and "proclaim 'peace'" by "wage war." The parallelism thus determines that "bite" has to do with the action of putting something into the mouth. While the word is never used for "eating" in the OT, there is no reason why Micah could not have used this forceful figure to express the voracity with which these greedy prophets accepted the bribes given them for the performance of their prophetic activity.

6–7 The end would come for these religious hucksters. While they were basking in the sunlight of power and affluence, the sun would go down on their prophesying and the resultant night would be devoid of vision or divination. It would be a time in which false predictions of peace (v.5) would be discredited by the reality of the Captivity. These prophets would "cover their faces" (lit., "cover the beard"), an expression connoting deep mourning.

8 Micah contrasts his prophetic activity with that of the false prophets. He asserts that he was filled with power "with the [help of] the Spirit." The implication is that the false prophets were motivated by greed. The word "justice" (GK 5477) is used frequently in the OT prophetic books in the sense of true religion—i.e., the crystallization of the ethic of the law. Because Micah was not violating the covenantal standards, he stood in sharp contrast to the religious leaders who participated in and encouraged the social exploitation of their time. Because Micah was guiltless of his compatriot's crimes against their fellow Israelites, he could stand before his adversaries with the power of moral courage and a clear conscience. Thus he could fearlessly cry out against the sin of the house of Israel.

C. The Result of the Leaders' Corruption on the Nation (3:9–12)

9 The address to the leaders of the house of Jacob continues with a biting portrayal of their sins. Micah accuses them of despising justice. The word for "despise" (GK 9493) means utter abhorrence of something.

10–11 As the leaders discharged their duties, they did so with bloodshed and greed, motivated by their desire for personal gain. Characterized by avarice and violence, their whole system of government inevitably led to corruption. These leaders maintained a form of external religion based to some extent on the covenantal relationship. "Is not the Lord among us?" they asked. But they had lost sight of the ethical requirements of the covenant and felt that their historical relationship to the Lord would prevent the onslaught of misfortune. Yet a clear body of prophetic tradition made it obvious that God desired obedience, not allegiance to externals (1Sa 15:22; Ps 51:17). This optimistic but unfounded trust is described as "leaning on the Lord." It was a kind of trust, but one devoid of obedience to God.

12 Because of the actions of the corrupt religious and civil leaders, the predicted doom would become a reality. Again the "therefore" establishes that the cause of the Captivity was the disobedience of the people. While the name "Zion" originally referred to the Jebusite stronghold captured by David (2Sa 5:7), it became a synonym for the city of Jerusalem (Ps 149:2; Isa 4:3; 40:9; Am 6:1). Micah includes the destruction of the temple, the visible sign of God's presence, in his prophecy. The symbol of the people's empty religion would perish.

D. The Future Exaltation of Zion (4:1–8)

The chapter division at the end of ch. 3 is unfortunate because Micah continues to speak of Jerusalem. The mood changes, however, from gloom to sublime hope as Micah portrays the future glory of the city. The temple mount would be exalted in the latter days, and the city of Jerusalem would become the center of God's gracious activity to the peoples of the earth.

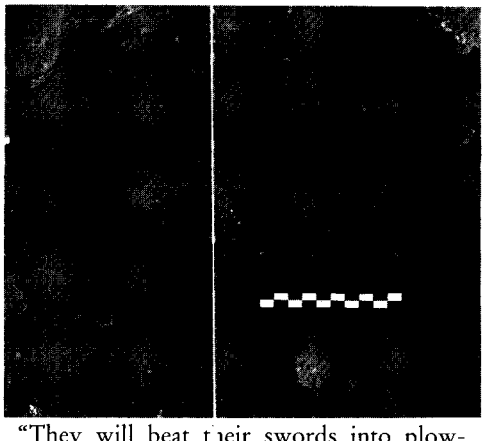
1 "In the last days" always denotes a period of time that is in the indefinite future (cf. esp. Da 10:4; Hos 3:5). Since the term is used in this context of the reign of the Lord, it is eschatological. That the prophet envisioned the exaltation of Jerusalem in association with the messianic kingdom is clear from 4:8 and 5:2–4, 7–9. So it appears that Micah looked for the fulfillment of this prophecy, not specifically in the return from the Captivity, but rather in that time when the messianic King would effect the will of God for his people and would restore the fortunes of Israel.

2 The object of the people's attraction to Jerusalem is to be their desire for God's word that emanates from the city. Micah sees a change in the hearts of all peoples at this time when the law of the Lord will be received universally rather than by Israel and Judah alone.

3 The result of God's rule in this time will be that the nations of the world will experience peace. The prophecy is national and even universal in scope and looks forward to a time when the nations will come so fully under the peaceful influence of God's Word that war will be no more. Because of this, weapons of war will be fashioned into agricultural implements. The pastoral motif reflects the peace that Micah sees as the ruling element of the messianic kingdom (cf. Isa 11:6–10; Hos 2:15; Am 9:13–15). The close identification between the Lord and the messianic King is evident in the prophecy of Micah (see comments on Isa 2:2–4).

4 The peacefulness of this era is further described in pastoral imagery (cf. 1Ki 4:25; Zec 3:10). The people will dwell in peace and safety because of the word of the Lord of Hosts. The certainty of this event is established in Micah's mind because God has sovereignly declared that such will happen: "The LORD Almighty has spoken."

5 The reason for the people's safety and security is that they will walk in the name of the Lord forever. This means more than simply adhering to religious requirements. It means to live in reliance on the strength of the Lord, relying on the might of his power. Unlike the nations, God's people will enjoy his strength forever. It will be otherwise with the nations, for the dominion of their gods will end when the people of the world submit to the rule of the Lord.



"They will beat their swords into plowshares" (4:3). These farming tools were found at Gezer in 1972. Courtesy Tell Gezer Excavations.

6–7 "In that day" refers back to the era of Jerusalem's exaltation (4:1). The future regathering of Israel in the time of Zion's exaltation is described differently from the way Micah described it earlier (2:12–13). Micah depicts those who are regathered as lame, referring to their weakness as a result of God's afflicting them; and he further describes them as exiles, connoting the shame of expulsion from one's homeland. The emphasis is on the misery and helplessness of the exiles and forms a striking contrast to the "strong nation" they are to become as a result of God's intervention on their behalf.

The returning people do not automatically comprise the remnant but are to be made into a remnant. To Micah the "remnant" is the repository of God's grace and promise as well as the force that will ultimately conquer the godless nations at the end time (5:8–15). Since the remnant is the beneficiary of God's promise, it cannot fail to experience ultimate vindication and glory. The nation the remnant is transformed into will have the Lord as its King forever. The center of God's governmental activity will be restored and exalted Zion.

8 The climax of this representation of Jerusalem's future glory is described in terms of its restoration as the seat of the "former dominion." The dominion soon to be lost in the dark time just ahead will be restored!

The phrase "watchtower of the flock" is in apposition with "stronghold ['ophel, GK 6754] of Zion" and synonymous with it. The "stronghold" was a fortified section of Jerusalem on the east side in the immediate area of the temple mount and the Kidron Valley. Since the expressions Micah uses have such close ties with the location of David's dominion, the words "former dominion" can mean little else than that the Davidic kingdom will in some sense be restored to Jerusalem. By asserting this, Micah stands firmly in the tradition of the preexilic prophets (Isa 9:17; Hos 3:5; Am 9:11).

E. The Future Might of Zion (4:9–13)

9 The writer shifts the reader's attention abruptly from the description of the future glory to the realities of the current crisis. The rhetorical questions are affirmations. Israel would have no king. She would be left without a counselor. The king was the Lord's anointed and stood as his vicegerent, mediating God's law to the people. The loss of Israel's ruler would lead many to question the veracity of God's promises as they related to the future of the nation and to the Messiah who was to come from Israel. The extreme anguish the nation was to endure through losing its national sovereignty is pictured as that of a woman in childbirth.

10 Micah saw the Captivity as taking place in three stages: leaving the city, sojourning in the open country, and arriving at the land of captivity. "Babylon" may typify world powers whose hostility to Israel was exhibited in so many ways and would continue to be shown until the time of Israel's restoration (cf. Ge 10:10; 11:4–9). The plural "enemies" indicates that "Babylon" had for Micah a broader significance than the empire soon to replace Assyria as the dominant world power.

The statement of hope that opened the chapter is reiterated and complemented by the truth that it is not a hope to be realized by an unrepentant people who have not paid for their sins. They are to suffer for their disobedience; but beyond that night of despair is the bright morning of Zion's glory, when God's people will be redeemed from the hand of their enemies.

11–13 The nations that exhibit hostility do this in ignorance; for as they gather to gloat over the misfortune of God's people, the nations do not know their part in God's plan for his people. The prophet pictures the nations as sheaves brought to the threshing floor; and only too late do they recognize that they are to be threshed and broken by Israel herself. The "horns of iron" symbolizes strength (cf. Dt 33:17; 1Sa 2:1). The wealth of the world is to be devoted to God, and all its might is to be under his dominion.

F. The Future King of Zion (5:1–4)

1 "Marshal your troops" is a summons for Jerusalem to gather troops for her defense. The expression "city of troops" depicts a warlike city. The implication is that Jerusalem, so renowned for its hostility toward the less fortunate, is to suffer siege because of its wrongdoing. The striking of the king on the cheek represents the most extreme of insults and marks the victory of Israel's enemies over her (1Ki 22:24). The king is called "judge" (GK 9149; NIV, "ruler"), depicting the judicial aspect of his office.

2 The statement of doom is followed by one of hope: the prediction of a king who will bring lasting security to Israel and whose influence will extend to the ends of the earth.

Ephrathah is the ancient name of Bethlehem (Ge 35:16, 19; 48:7; Ru 4:11) and distinguishes it from other towns named Bethlehem (cf. Jos 19:15). Its use identifies the town in which David was born (1Sa 17:12), thus establishing a connection between the messianic King and David.

The "ruler" (GK 5440) is represented as speaking here, and the close identification of the king with the purposes of God is thus implied. The ruler is the one whose activities stem from the distant past, yet whose coming is still future.

The word "origins" (GK 4606) comes from a word meaning "to go forth" or "to conduct one's activities" (cf. 2Ki 19:27). Beyond that the phrase has a military connotation referring to the departure of an army for battle (2Sa 3:25); it may thus speak of the kingly activities of the Messiah in terms of his might and power.

The terms "old" (GK 7710) and "ancient times" may denote "great antiquity" as well as "eternity" in the strictest sense. The context must determine the expanse of time indicated by the expressions. This word here can indicate only great antiquity, and its application to a future ruler—one yet to appear on the scene of Israel's history—is strong evidence that Micah expected a supernatural figure (cf. Isa 9:6; cf. also Isa 24:23; Mic 4:7). Only in Christ does this prophecy find fulfillment.

3 Because a ruler will eventually come to deliver Israel, God will give her up only temporarily. Israel will enter a period of absolute abandonment by God because of her sin (1:5–6; 2: 1–5; 3:4, 9–12; 4:10; 6:9–16), but a ruler will come who will end the period of Israel's estrangement; therefore Israel will be given up only till that time.

Micah saw the period of abandonment continuing till "she who is in labor gives birth." The end of the period of Israel's estrangement from God is marked not only by the bringing forth of the ruler but also by the return to Israel of "the rest of his brothers." The brothers are those who share a common national heritage with the ruler (cf. 2Sa 19:13). The word "return" (GK 8740) implies an original identification with Israel. The need for their return indicates that they have been dispersed.

The gathering of those who comprise the remnant is an essential element in Micah's theology (2:12–13 and 4:6–7). The depiction of the future gathering of the remnant in 5:3 is presented in a captivity motif; the brothers have been dispersed—they are in exile.

4 The peaceful effect of the kingly reign of Messiah is described in pastoral terminology. Israel will be lovingly cared for by the messianic King who will carry out his regnal duties in the strength of God. The gracious benefits of his reign are to extend beyond national limitations, for the authority of the King is to be universal. This description of his power goes perfectly with the description of universal peace seen earlier (4:1–4) and complements it by affirming that the peace described there will be effected by the Ruler born in the insignificant town of Bethlehem. Isaiah called him the "Prince of Peace" (9:6).

G. The Future Peace of Zion (5:5–6)

5–6 The placid picture vanishes for a moment, and we hear the tramping boots of the invader. The events described here are difficult to place historically. If "Assyria" is understood as a figure of speech for all the world powers that oppress Israel, we may then understand the passage as a prophecy of Israel's ultimate victory over her foes. Micah uses the word "Assyria" typically in 7:12, where in the restoration people come to Israel from Assyria. Zechariah also uses "Assyria" and "Egypt' (10:10) to refer to the nations God's people will be gathered from when the kingdom is to be established. Significantly, the prophecy of Zechariah was written long after the fall of the Assyrian Empire. In the mind of Zechariah, Assyria (no longer a nation in his time) represented more than the empire that brought down the northern kingdom.

The "seven shepherds" and "eight leaders" are to be understood as an indefinite number of leaders. The figure stresses the abundance of manpower Israel will enjoy when God accomplishes the work of gathering his people from the godless nations to establish them in the land under the Messiah.

H. The Future Vindication of Zion (5:7–9)

7 The "remnant" of believers trusting in the promises of God is to be transformed from an insignificant group to one of absolute dominance in the world, disseminating its faith and ideals throughout the earth. As the dew and showers "do not wait for man" but come from the Lord, so the remnant will be lifted to its place of sovereignty by the power of God.

8–9 Micah next pictures the remnant as a lion overcoming its prey. The vivid description does not mean that the remnant will achieve victory by bloodthirsty militaristic conquest. Micah rather pictures the relentless force with which a lion captures its prey—"and no one can rescue." The prophet indicates that the nations will not be able to withstand the burgeoning power of the remnant in the end time, with its ultimate triumph in the world.

I. The Future Purification of Zion (5:10–15)

10–13 If "in that day" refers to the period when the remnant will achieve victory over the nations (vv.7–9), then the prophet conceives of God as destroying the weaponry of the remnant and expunging their idolatrous practices after achieving the conquest. However, if it refers to Zion's exaltation in 4:1–4, the purification of the remnant will take place in the initial stages of the era of peace; and their rise to dominance over the nations is not to be by military might but by their total dedication to God, brought about as God removes everything that interferes with their total trust in him. The world will eventually be conquered, not by its own corruption or false ideologies, but by the gospel.

The implication of vv.10–15 is that the instruments of war and the elements of idolatrous worship are wrong. Horses and chariots are to be removed because they tend to undermine Israel's complete trust in God. The cities and defenses are to be destroyed as well as the elements of false religion. "Witchcraft" denotes the ways people sought control of natural forces or power over individuals. "Cast spells" connotes a type of sorcery and is always condemned in the OT (Dt 18:10; 2Ki 21:6). The foretelling of the future was an aspect of this type of divination.

Israel's images are to be destroyed as well. The word "images" (GK 6773) means idols carved from some material. The "sacred stones" were standing pillars, usually of stone, that represented pagan deities. Both terms used in this verse require manual structuring or fashioning; hence, Micah said, "You will no longer bow down to the work of your hands."

14–15 "Asherah," a Canaanite goddess who is called in mythological texts the "Creatress of the gods," was associated with all aspects of sexual life and thus with fertility in general. She was also a goddess of war. Sacred prostitution was an integral part of her cult. To Micah the "cities" were the centers of pagan worship. The repetition of "cities" (cf. v.11) throws into bold relief the inevitable captivity of the cities that were about to perish. The nations that do not yield to God will be subjugated so that the peace promised in 4:1–4 will never be threatened.

IV. The Third Oracle: God's Lawsuit With Israel and the Ultimate Triumph of the Kingdom of God (6:1–7:20)

A. God's Accusations Against His People (6:1–8)

1–2 The third oracle begins in the format of a legal controversy. The mountains are called as witnesses in the litigation. The enduring hills have mutely observed Israel's history from its very beginning; hence they are called "everlasting foundations." If they could speak, they would witness to the truthfulness of the Creator's claims.

3 Micah places the classic disputation form of the prophets in a legal context as he pictures God's pleading with his people. The passage takes on an atmosphere of pathos as God is pictured asking his people how he has wearied them. The Creator of those mountains seeks the cause of Israel's estrangement from him.

The word "burden" (GK 4206) signifies to wear down, to cause someone to become impatient, or to become physically tired. The Lord asks how he has caused them to become so weary of him that they have ceased to obey him. Their impatience cannot be due to inactivity on his part, for he has done much for them.

4 The deliverance from Egypt represents one of the first acts of redemption in which God demonstrated his saving love for the people. Moses was God's great prophet, the prototype of the line of prophets yet to come (Dt 18:15–22). Miriam was a prophetess (Ex 15:20); and Aaron, the progenitor of the Aaronic priesthood, was the representative of the people before God.

5 Micah cites the failure of Balaam to curse the people (Nu 22–24) as evidence of God's activity among them. Besides the failure of Balak to frustrate the progress of the people, the journey from Shittim to Gilgal witnessed the defeat of Midian, the crossing of the Jordan, and the conquest of Jericho. The recital of events stops abruptly as though the intent is to depict in one great sweep the progress of the nation from slavery in a foreign land to settlement in their own country.

"Righteous" (GK 7407) has the basic sense of "rightness" and can apply to the secular as well as religious spheres of life. Here the word underlines God's faithfulness to his standard, i.e., the covenant obligations. His great acts on behalf of Israel are more than simply coming to the aid of his people. They are manifestations of his righteousness as he maintains his faithfulness to the covenant promise.

6–7 The recital of Israel's history suddenly ends, and Micah speaks on behalf of the people, asking God what their responsibility is in the light of his faithfulness to the covenant. There is irony here as the prophet asks how one may come before the "exalted God." The word "exalted" (GK 5294) connotes "height" and speaks of God in his dwelling place in heaven. What is the proper way to worship him? With burnt offerings and calves a year old? Yearling calves were regarded as the choicest sacrifices. "Thousands of rams" suggests the large quantity of animals that one might offer to curry God's favor. But God is interested neither in the choicest animals nor in the number offered. Even great quantities of oil will not bring the worshiper into fellowship with God. The list reaches a shocking climax in the mention of the firstborn. Child sacrifice was carried out by certain Israelites on occasion (2Ki 3:27–16:3; Isa 57:5). The firstborn represents the most precious thing one could give to God. Again, this was not what God wants.

8 What God wants is a heart response to God demonstrated in the basic elements of true religion. God has told the people what is good. The Mosaic law differentiated between good and bad and reflected God's will in their religious and social lives. They were to act "justly" (GK 5477), here in the sense of "true religion," i.e., the ethical response to God that has a manifestation in social concerns as well. "To love mercy [GK 2876]" is freely and willingly to show kindness to others. "To walk humbly [GK 7570] with your God" means to live in conscious fellowship with him, exercising a spirit of humility before him. The prophet was not indicating that sacrifice was completely ineffectual and that simply a proper heart attitude to God would suffice. Rather, God has no interest in the multiplication of empty religious acts.

These ethical requirements do not comprise the way of salvation. Forgiveness of sin was received through the sacrifices. The standards of this verse are for those who are members of the covenantal community and delineate the areas of ethical response that God wants to see in those who share the covenantal obligations. These standards have not been abrogated for Christians, for the NT affirms their continuing validity. We are still called to the exercise of true religion (1Co 13:4; 2Co 6:6; Col 3:12; Jas 1:27; 1Pe 1:2; 5:5). Christians are in a covenant relationship with God in which the law has been placed within their hearts (Jer 31:33; cf. Heb 10:14–17), not abrogated. But our obedience is inspired by the indwelling Holy Spirit, not by the letter of the law.

B. The Sentence of Judgment (6:9–16)

9 The voice of the Lord suddenly sounds out. "Calling to the city" signifies the cry of alarm heard when disaster threatens a city. Micah adds that it is wise to fear God's name. The "rod" is the punishment that Israel would endure, and she was to "heed" it. The people were to attend to the fact that the invasion would come and that it was God who would effect it through the instrumentality of the Assyrians.

10–13 The Hebrew says, literally, "Are there yet in the house of the wicked treasures of wickedness and the short measure that is cursed?" The question, of course, is rhetorical and affirms that the oppressing classes are still getting gain from their mistreatment of the poor and that the oppression has not ended. Hence the punishment is deserved and now imminent. Micah emphasizes social sins more than sins of idolatry, though ultimately they are closely intertwined in his thinking. The response to the question of v.11 was, of course, a resounding no! The society of Micah's time was characterized by violence, lying, and deceit. False promises were uttered and claims made that were not fulfilled. According to v.13, it was because of the people's sins that God was to bring ruin on them.

14–15 The land was to fall under the devastation of the sword and be totally unproductive. The greed that motivated the rich in that day would no longer be gratified because of the desolation of the land.

16 In their pagan religious practices, the people were no better than the generation of Omri, the notorious king who headed the dynasty that produced Ahab, the husband of Jezebel, and allowed Baal worship in Israel. "Therefore" indicates that Israel's disobedience to God would bring the three calamities the prophet was about to describe. She was to become a "ruin" (GK 9014). The Hebrew word means both "to be desolated" and "to be appalled." It may connote that which is an object of horror.

C. The Prophet's Lament of the Lack of Godly Fellowship (7:1–2)

Like a day that begins with a dark, foreboding sky but ends in golden sunlight, this chapter begins in gloom and ends in hope. Clouds of gloom have rolled in on the horizon of the prophet's life because of the disobedience of the people and the somber fate that awaited his nation. But rays of hope shine through the gloom.

1 This section begins with a lament as the prophet mourns the lack of godly fellowship in his time. The metaphor pictures the remnant as seeking for grapes and choice figs to satisfy its hunger, but it is as though it were the time of harvest when these have been picked and the hunger must go unsatiated.

2 The fruit in v.1 represents godly persons. The feeling of utter disappointment in seeking food and finding none conveys the feelings of the godly at the great lack of individuals who have remained faithful to God. The language describes the excesses that characterized the treatment of the "have nots" by the "haves."

D. The Prophet's Lament of the Corruption in His Society (7:3–6)

3 Micah describes the strong hold that those in responsible positions had on the throat of society. "The ruler demands gifts" means that the ruler insisted that justice be distorted for his gain. Power can corrupt if not guarded by the law of a higher Sovereign. The judicial system was corrupted by the lust for bribes. The controlling classes, i.e., the rich, simply dictated their desires; the implication is that they received them.

In the conspiracy of the ruling classes, the ruler sought, perhaps, for the indictment of an innocent person; the judge carried it out for a bribe; and the rich man was involved in the conspiracy by speaking "the desire of his soul" ("what they desire"). The word for "desire" (GK 2094) is always used in a bad sense and may mean "evil desire" but more commonly "calamity" or "destruction."

4 Micah describes even the best of the people as briers. If one sought mercy or sympathy from any of them—even those who appeared to be upright and respectable—they would prove to be hard and piercing. In keeping with his use of sudden, almost jarring, contrasts, Micah points to the coming judgment: "The day of your watchmen [GK 7595] has come." The watchmen were the prophets (Jer 6:17; Eze 3:19) who watched the course of their nation, saw its internal decay and decline, and, like watchmen who guarded the cities of ancient times, warned of the inherent danger. The day of the watchmen was the day of punishment—the Captivity.

5–6 Micah returns to the description of the wrongs of his society. In his day a man could not trust his friends or even his wife, and respect for one's parents had vanished.

E. The Godly Man's Attitude in the Midst of Discouragement (7:7–10)

7 The clouds of gloom begin to separate as the prophet describes the attitude of the godly person amid such difficult circumstances. Micah does not succumb to despair or lethargy. The word "watch" (GK 7595) means to "look" or "wait expectantly" (cf. v.4). The godly person will look expectantly for every evidence of God's working. By waiting for him to act in his own time, Micah finds peace in the knowledge of God's sovereign activity in the world. But Micah also expresses confidence that God will answer prayer.

8 Not only does he trust God to act and to answer prayer, but Micah trusts him to vindicate the faithful. Though the faithful are subjected to difficult experiences, they will one day rise to receive their heritage. There is vivid contrast between the people of God sitting in darkness and the gladdening effect of the light of God that will shine among them.

9 The remnant affirm their determination to wait till God pleads their cause and decides in their favor. They freely confess their sin in the awareness that the temporal punishment to be endured is just. However, the remnant can be confident of God's favorable action on their behalf; for they, unlike their guilty compatriots, stand on the ground of the covenant.

10 Ultimately the remnant will be exalted and the hostile nations of the world covered with shame and trampled like mud. This latter figure is used by Isaiah (10:6) of the invading Assyrians. Micah uses it of the conquest of the hostile powers in the day of Israel's exaltation.

F. The Assurance of Victory for the Kingdom of God (7:11–20)

1. Victory described in terms of the extension of the kingdom (7:11–13)

11–12 The remainder of the chapter is an exultant description of the eventual triumph of the remnant. The prophet envisions a great extension of the remnant's influence as he sees a future day when the nation will greatly increase in population by an influx of people from Gentile nations, symbolized by Assyria and Egypt. That the Gentiles are to become partakers of the promise through faith is a cardinal doctrine of both OT and NT (Ge 12:3; Am 9:11–12; Ro 9:30; Gal 3:6–9).

13 At the same time, however, the judgment of God will fall on the sinful world. Out of the decay of a crumbling society, Micah perceives the emergence of the kingdom of God.

2. Victory assured because of God's leadership (7:14–15)

14 The remnant will triumph because of their relationship to God. The text pictures them as dwelling alone, i.e., apart from the nations, in a forest. Bashan and Gilead were agricultural areas of great fertility that became symbols of plenty. The reference to them here is symbolic. This is a request that Israel's former years of blessing be restored by her Good Shepherd.

15 The Exodus was the central event in the prophetic theology of history. It could be repeated because to the prophets history was continually being fulfilled. The Exodus would occur again—but in a new and even greater way. To the prophets the Exodus was an event of more than historical interest. Because God is unchanging and his attributes timeless, his people could expect his acts to be repeated again and again in history.

3. Victory assured over the nations (7:16–17)

16 As a result of God's intervention on behalf of Israel, the nations will be humbled before God and his remnant. The power of the nations will be as nothing before the great power of Almighty God. To lay the hand on the mouth is to indicate reverence and awe. The deafness of the nations may be caused by the thunderous events that God brings about.

17 In the vindication of God and his remnant in the world, the nations are pictured as animals crawling from their dens and trembling before the Lord.

4. Victory assured because of God's nature (7:18–20)

18 The question "Who is a God like you?" points to the uniqueness of the Lord. The name "Micah" means "Who is like the LORD?" The words "sin" (GK 6411) and "transgression" (GK 7322) recall the affirmation of Ex 34:6–7, wherein the Lord proclaimed an essential aspect of his nature to be his willingness to forgive sin.

19–20 Because God's anger does not continue forever, the believing remnant can know that an end will come to their humiliation. After the great statement of forgiveness, the prophet recalls the promise given to Abraham and reaffirmed to Jacob. The remnant's optimism was rooted in the eternal promise sworn to Abraham and their "fathers" (Ge 13:15; 17:7–8, 13, 19; 48:4), and its elements are applicable to Christians (see 1Pe 2:5; cf. 2Co 6:16; Heb 8:10; Rev 21:3, 7). The promise is a continuum that guarantees an inheritance to all God's people. As God's people, our sins have been trodden underfoot. We, too, know the loving care of the Shepherd who feeds his flock in the strength of the Lord. Micah's concept of the remnant encompasses believers today.

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

The setting of Nahum's prophecy is the long and painful oppression of Israel by Assyria and the divine prospect of its end. Although God was the ultimate author of Israel's affliction, Assyria, the rod of God's anger, was the agent of his wrath; and the cup in the Lord's right hand was now coming around to her.

Assyria had long been central in God's affliction of his people, Israel. As early as the ninth century, Shalmaneser III (858–824 B.C.) exacted tribute from Jehu in one of his western campaigns (c. 824). However, Tiglath-pileser III (745–727) represents the first major scourge of Israel. He invaded that land during the reign of Menahem (752—732; cf. 2Ki 15:29; 1Ch 5:6, 26). This king extended his authority into Judah, where Ahaz (735–715) pursued a policy of submission to Assyria, thereby incurring the opposition of both Pekah, king of Israel (c. 740–732), who favored the anti-Assyrian coalition of his predecessor Ahab, and Isaiah, who denounced his faithlessness in depending on Assyria rather than on the Lord, when faced with Pekah's aggression (2Ki 16:5–18; 2Ch 28:16–25; Isa 7:1–25; 8:6–8). During Ahaz's reign, therefore, Judah was faced with the issue of submission or resistance to Assyria—an issue that confronted the nation for over a century and to which it responded in faith or fear according to its relationship to the Lord. Pekah was murdered by Hoshea (732–722), who adopted a vacillating pro-Assyrian policy. His fickle decision to rely on Egypt and repudiate his allegiance to Assyria provoked the invasion of Shalmaneser V (727–722), Tiglath-pileser III's successor.

Samaria fell after a long siege by Shalmaneser and his successor, Sargon II (721–705); the northern kingdom was destroyed and its population deported (2Ki 17:3–6). This catastrophe is explicitly attributed to the Lord's affliction of Israel for her sin (2Ki 17:20), as were the misfortunes of Ahaz in the same era (2Ch 28:19–20). Palestine experienced further depredations under Sargon II (Isa 20:1–6), before facing the full brunt of Assyria's hostility in the reign of Sennacherib (704–681). Hezekiah (728–687) had succeeded Ahaz and had abandoned Ahaz's pro-Assyrian policy (2Ki 18:7–8, 19–20). Sennacherib thereupon invaded Judah (701), conquered its fortified cities, and threatened Jerusalem, before the decimation of his army by a "wasting disease upon his sturdy warriors" (Isa 10:16; cf. 2Ki 18:13–19:37; 2Ch 32:1–31; Isa 36:1–37:38). The terrible distress preceding this deliverance was the Lord's chastening of his unfaithful yet beloved people (cf. Isa 5:26; 10:5–6, 11–12, 24–25; et al.).

The nation of Nineveh continued for another century, having times of both political stability and instability. Finally, as the power of Babylon began to climb during the reign of Nabopolassar (625–605), the Assyrian Empire began to crumble, and in 612 the siege and destruction of Nineveh were completed.

2. Authorship and Date

Little is known about Nahum himself. According to 1:1, he is "the Elkoshite." An Arab tradition places this village near Mosul in modern Iraq. Ancient writers, however, understood the prophet's home to be somewhere in Galilee.

From internal data it is possible to date the major blocks of material in Nahum. As a message of judgment, the book makes no sense if it was proclaimed following the collapse of the Assyrian empire in 612 B.C. On the other hand, references to the destruction of Thebes (No Amon) by the Nile (3:8) demand that the prophecy postdate that city's fall to Ashurbanipal in 663 B.C. Further consideration of the still formidable state of Assyrian power reflected in the book requires a date prior to the decline of that kingdom after about 626 B.C.

3. Theological Values

Theologically Nahum stands as an eloquent testimony to the particularity of God's justice and salvation. To the suffering remnant, there was little question that God would and did punish his own covenant people; but whether he was equally able and willing to impart justice to the powerful heathen nations surrounding Israel was untested. Among those nations, none was more cruel and arrogant than Assyria. The severity and kindness of God were both under scrutiny: the former as to whether it applied only selectively to his own people, and the latter in the context of God's ability and desire to bring about ultimate salvation for those who were faithful to him

Into the situation of Israel's apostasy, Judah's vacillation, and Assyria's might came the word of the Lord: "The LORD is a jealous and avenging God . . . slow to anger and great in power; the LORD will not leave the guilty unpunished" (1:2–3). The vivid imagery of Nineveh's demise is eloquent testimony to the power of a God whose strength is never simply an abstraction. A theology of divine sovereignty and justice, applauded by all the nations, emerges from the specifics of Assyria's fall.

It is not merely divine retribution, however, that emerges from the picture. There is also good news to proclaim (1:15). Judah is called to celebration when the day of the Lord's wrath is fully understood and the remnant is prepared in righteousness. The corollary to the severity of God is his kindness, a mercy that includes covenant keeping and justice.

When the forces opposing God are so firmly ensconced and the flickering lamp of God's people is at the point of extinction, Nahum reminds us, as do the ruins of ancient Nineveh, that God himself is the ultimate Ruler. He will have the final word.

EXPOSITION

I. The Anger of the Lord (1:1–15)

A. The Judgment of the Lord (1:1–11)

The opening verses of Nahum form a prologue dominated by the revelation of God's eternal power and divine nature in creation (cf. Ro 1:20). This revelation is characterized preeminently by God's justice, expressed in retribution (v.2) and wrath (vv.2–3) that shake the entire creation (vv.3–6). The mercy of God, for all its reality, is a fleeting counterpart of this awesome display of majesty.

1. Awesome in power (1:1–6)

1–2 The adjective "jealous" (GK 7868) is used solely of God, primarily in his self-revelation at Sinai (Ex 20:5; 34:14). Against this covenantal background, it denotes the Lord's deep, fiercely protective commitment to his people and his exclusive claim to obedience and reciprocal commitment. Where this relationship of mutual commitment is threatened, either by Israel's unfaithfulness or by foreign oppression, the inevitable expressions of such jealousy are "vengeance" and "wrath," directed to restoring that relationship.

"Avenging" and "vengeance" (both GK 5933) are judicial in nature, expressing judgment and requital for infractions of law and morality, primarily those committed with presumption and impenitence. As a judicial function "vengeance" belongs supremely to God, the Judge of the whole earth, and to the ordained representatives of his authority. Consequently, human beings are forbidden to take the law into their own hands. Nineveh—despite God's use of her violence—had done just that. Now, just as she had devastated cities and populations, so it would happen to her. She had sown the wind and in her impenitence would surely reap the whirlwind.

Like jealousy, "wrath" (GK 5757) denotes intense and passionate feeling. It constitutes a divine characteristic that human beings must face whenever they break the proper limits of their relationship to God; to deny God's "wrath" is to deny the reality of judgment and the necessity of atonement. Verse 2 lays a foundation for the entire prophecy; all that follows is rooted in this revelation of the justice and burning zeal of the Lord exercised on behalf of his people.

3 The Lord's anger is balanced by his forbearance, which represents a restraint born of meekness and not of weakness; it is not to be misunderstood as passivity. Nor is it exercised indefinitely, for his power assures that "he will not leave the guilty unpunished." The forbearance of God had been extended to Nineveh a century earlier in response to her repentance (Jnh 3:10); but it was forfeited by her subsequent history of ruthless evil, making way for God's judgment instead.

The power and majesty of God are evidenced most dramatically in the forces of nature. "Whirlwind" and "storm" are often expressions of his judgment (cf. Ps 83:15; Isa 29:6). For all their grandeur, these mighty forces are dwarfed in the presence of the Lord, whom the highest heavens cannot contain; the tempest is but the disturbance caused as he marches by, and the dark storm clouds are merely dust stirred up by his feet.

4 The preceding description of the Lord's power is extended in the image of drought, consuming the fertile highlands of Palestine and their sources of water. "Bashan" in Transjordan, "Carmel" in northern Israel, and the "Lebanon" range on Israel's northern frontier are frequently represented together as the choicest forest and pasture regions of the Promised Land. Nevertheless, all are revealed as vulnerable; like the pride and strength of humankind, they are devastated and "wither" before the burning anger of the Lord. The drought depicted here is abnormally severe in its catastrophic effects on "sea" and "rivers."

5 Earthquake forms a third biblical manifestation of the Lord's power, causing the hills to "melt away." Such melting may be brought on by intense heat, a phenomenon associated with the earthquake at Sinai to which vv.2–3 allude. However, the verb "melt away" may also be applied to the effect of flooding.

6 This verse emphatically recapitulates the concept of anger, repeating the noun "wrath" that is stressed further by the kindred terms "indignation" and "fierce anger," and again describing the irresistible manifestation of this anger, before which the entire created world is subdued. This wrath is poured out "like fire"—fire is a common expression of the Lord's judgment. The section concluding with v.6 is deeply imbued with the recollection of God's covenant with Israel, also sharing with numerous poetic passages their various images of divine judgment and power (cf. Pss 11:6; 18:7–15; 29:3–9; Jer 23:29; Eze 38:19–22; Joel 2:1–11; et al.).

2. Just in execution (1:7–11)

7 The goodness of God forms a basic tenet of Israel's faith. Also, it repeatedly forms the basis for human faith, expressed in trusting obedience; where the goodness of God is impugned with success, faith soon crumbles. As an expression of covenant commitment to defend his people, the Lord himself is a "refuge" (GK 5057) or stronghold of protection. He "cares for" (lit., "knows"; GK 3359) the faithful, acknowledging their relationship to him and their claim on his goodness inherent in that relationship. The "trouble" from which he gives protection is graphically illustrated in Judah's sufferings at the hands of Assyria. It demanded a "trust" that was too often misplaced.

8 The goodness of God, like his patience, does not obviate his judgment, which is directed against those who refuse to submit to his rule, i.e., "his foes" and the oppressors of his loyal people. As long as evil exists, God's judgment, expressed here in terms of "flood" (cf. v.3; 2:6), is an inevitable expression of his goodness on behalf of the victims of evil; it banishes the enemy into "darkness" (i.e., death).

9 The utter finality of this sentence is stressed by "bring to an end." It is reinforced by the terse ambiguity of the final line: "trouble" will not arise again for God's people, for it will descend on those who trouble Israel in so conclusive a way that it need not arise again. The crime of these enemies is premeditated antagonism: they do not stumble into sin but actively "plot" against the Lord.

10 The means of judgment is portrayed here in metaphorical language. "Thorns" describes the spiny or prickly vegetation that proliferated in the semiarid climate of Palestine. They often grew as a tangled, impenetrable mass; as such, they were good for little more than burning. The Assyrians are portrayed as being "entangled among" or like such thorns, to which they correspond both in their worthless character and in their merited destruction.

The image of drunkenness reiterates these varied associations: a drunkard is good for nothing useful, and drunkenness is both a cause and consequence of judgment. The keynote of both lines, however, is helplessness. A drunkard is incapacitated from defending himself; the Assyrians would be no less vulnerable before the wrath of God.

Like thorns, stubble is without intrinsic value and is subject to be burnt; being "dry," it is an easy prey for the flames by which it is "consumed." Nineveh's destruction by fire is rooted in her helplessness to avert the disaster; and this in turn is due to her decadence, characterized by drunkenness.

11 The enemy is again defined as one who "plots" against the Lord, being specified further as a distinct individual from whom the rebellion emanates; such an individual is identified clearly in 3:18 as the "king of Assyria." The ruler envisaged here emerged from Nineveh in his opposition to the Lord. Sennacherib stands out as the most powerful aggressor to emerge from Nineveh against Judah. According to the Assyrian annals describing his Judean campaign (c. 701), he cruelly devastated forty-seven fortified cities including Lachish. That Nahum was referring primarily to Sennacherib's invasion is supported by his repeated reminiscences of Isaiah's prophecies relating to that era.

The intent of this plotting is "wickedness" (GK 1175), a noun often translated as "worthlessness" and implying a total lack of moral fiber and principle (e.g., Dt 13:13).

B. The Sentence of the Lord (1:12–14)

12 The opening clause of this verse is typical of the formula by which a messenger received or transmitted a message from his lord. The present decree is addressed to Judah and is essentially an oracle of salvation; it incorporates an announcement of judgment that is addressed directly to Assyria (v.14). The decree reverses the fortunes of the Assyrians. Although they had "allies," they would be "cut off." Although "numerous," the Assyrians would "pass away."

A similar reversal is decreed for Judah. To be "afflicted" (GK 6700) is to be humbled and oppressed. Such affliction is repeatedly the agent of God's chastisement, frequently being administered to his own people at the hands of foreign nations.

13 The continuing existence of such servitude is implied by the emphatic "Now" and by the future orientation of the promised deliverance from the "yoke" and the "shackles." This further supports dating Nahum's prophecy before Josiah's reign. Despite the devious and tragic analogy of the northern kingdom, the southern kingdom was still to experience political and religious revival in the reign of Josiah. And though its sins had made exile inevitable, this did not occur at Assyrian hands. The breaking of Assyria's yoke is strikingly affirmed by Nabopolassar, who was an unwitting instrument of the Lord's purposes (cf. Isa 45:4–5).

14 The "name" (GK 9005) of a population represented its living identity, perpetuated in its "descendants." The root underlying "descendants" (GK 2445) is used of physical and particularly dynastic succession. Thus Nahum implies the eradication of Nineveh's dynastic rule and of the nation whose cohesion derived from the Neo-Assyrian monarchy now centered at Nineveh. Nineveh's consignment to the grave reiterates the certainty of this extinction. This judgment is rooted in the charge that the city, for all its regal and religious grandeur, is "vile."

The Assyrian kings claimed to rule by the favor and authority of their "gods," whom they honored accordingly. Ashurbanipal, on a single cylinder, paid profuse homage to seventeen of the principal gods of the Assyrian pantheon. The judgment of Nineveh's king therefore demanded the destruction of the idolatrous religion on which his authority was founded. This was centralized in the "temple," which housed the "carved images" and "cast idols." These idols were normally made of precious wood plated with gold or of molten metal. The utter inefficacy of such "gods" was thus to be exposed in the destruction of their place of residence that they were powerless to protect.

C. The Purpose of the Lord (1:15)

15 The proclamation of "peace" (shalom; GK 8934) is replete with the promise of God's redemption and constitutes the most precise correlation of Nahum with Isaiah (e.g., Isa 9:6–7; 32:17; 53:5; et al.). The picture is one of joyous and complete restoration of the Lord's people and their legitimate worship. The reversal of fortunes is thus completed as Nineveh's flourishing religion is to be buried and the worship of oppressed Judah resurrected. The anticipated renewal of vital worship was accomplished in the reign of Josiah, after about 631 (2Ki 22:3–23:27; 2Ch 34–35).

As in Hezekiah's reign, this assertion of religious independence demanded that the "wicked" who opposed it be "destroyed." The verb "destroy" (GK 4162) is commonly used of cutting down an enemy in battle or of "cutting off" the name of the rebellious. The verb "invade" is similarly used of warfare.

II. The Fall of Nineveh (2:1–3:19)

The judgment of God decreed in ch. 1 is now worked out with terrifying actuality. Nahum 2:1–2 is transitional. On the one hand, it extends the dual perspective of judgment and mercy evident in 1:2–15. On the other hand, the military language and urgent imperatives of v.1 clearly anticipate the following battle.

A. Warning and Promise (2:1–2)

1 Nineveh's "attacker" (GK 7046) is more literally a "scatterer," a common figure for a victorious king (cf. Ps 68:1; Isa 24:1; Jer 52:8). In fulfillment of this prophecy, Nineveh was attacked in 614 B.C. by Cyaxares, king of the Medes (c. 625–585). A sector of the suburbs was captured, but the city was not yet taken. However, a subsequent alliance of Cyaxares with the Babylonian Nabopolassar led to their concerted attack on Nineveh in 612, a battle recorded in detail by the Babylonian Chronicle.

The Assyrians are mockingly called to action. Nineveh had in fact been well-equipped to withstand both siege and invasion. Sennacherib had spent no less than six years building his armory, which occupied a terraced area of forty acres. It was enlarged further by Esarhaddon and contained all the weaponry required for the extension and maintenance of the Assyrian empire. The royal "road" had been enlarged by Sennacherib to a breadth of seventy-eight feet, facilitating the movement of troops. However, the material resources would be of little avail if the "strength" (GK 3946) of the defenders could not be marshaled, and by the end of the seventh century it had been dissipated beyond retrieval.

2 This verse introduces the final reference to the salvation of God's people, whose "splendor" he will "restore." The noun "splendor" (GK 1454) implies elevation or exaltation. The comparison "like Israel" suggests restoration to the full stature promised to the nation and once occupied by it. The names "Jacob . . . Israel" are usually synonymous, and they came to denote the Twelve Tribes descended from Jacob. After the kingdom was divided in two, usage varies; but the names are more commonly applied to the northern kingdom. Following the destruction of Samaria, the southern prophets reclaimed these names (Isa 14:1–4; et al.). Evidently "Judah" is envisaged here, though possibly the resurrection of Israel as a whole is promised (cf. Isa 9:1–8; 11:10–16; et al.). Such restoration is necessitated by the devastation of the land's "vines"—a mainstay of its economy, a source of its joy and fulfillment and indeed a symbol of the very life and identity of the nation. All this had been obliterated in the northern kingdom by the Assyrian "destroyers."

B. Nineveh's Destruction Detailed (2:3–3:19)

1. First description of Nineveh's destruction (2:3–3:1)

a. Onslaught (2:3–5)

3–4 The antecedent of "his" appears to be the "attacker" of v.1. It is possible that the "Lord" (v.2) is also intended, summoning an enemy against Nineveh as he had summoned the Assyrians against Judah (Isa 5:26–30; 10:5–6, 15). The attack is led by the invader's chariot forces, the most formidable wing of an army fighting in open terrain. The Neo-Assyrian "chariots" were built of various types of wood, for lightness and speed, with fittings of leather and of "metal" that would flash with reflected light. The chariots were fitted with a pole and yoke for the horses, normally a team of two, and with spoked wheels and a single axle. The Assyrian shields were either round or rectangular in shape, the latter being designed to cover most of the body. They were made of wood or wickerwork covered with leather, which could have been dyed "red." It is evident from the parallel passage in 3:2–3 that cavalry accompanied the chariots, a typical feature of Assyrian warfare; and both "shields" and "spears" might also be carried by the infantry. The conflict was located in the "streets" of Nineveh, denoting its suburbs outside the inner defensive "wall" that had not yet been reached.

5 The "picked troops" represent the shock troops directed to breach the "wall." The "protective covering" would describe the screen set up to protect them as they engaged in undermining and penetrating the wall. The stumbling of the "picked troops" is due, not to their weakness, but to the "corpses" of their victims, obstructing their advance.

b. Failing defenses (2:6–10)

6 This brief verse (five Heb. words) marks a decisive turning point in the campaign, as the main line of defense was broken and the heart of the city destroyed. The "river gates" envisaged are possibly those regulating the flow of water through the city. Indeed, the Akkadian term "gate of the river" was applied to a canal gate by Sennacherib. When "thrown open" by the enemy, who already controlled the suburbs where they were situated, the gates would have released a deluge of water, as a result of which the palace "collapses."

7–8 The survivors are "exiled" amid the mourning of the "slave girls," a not uncommon scene in Assyrian wall carvings depicting the agonies of their captives. The image of water depicts Nineveh's fate with vivid irony. Nineveh was a place of watered parks and orchards. As at the Flood, however, "water" became a source of death, overflowing its boundaries and bringing chaos to the inundated city. Unlike the Flood, this "pool" promised no respite as its waters "drained away."

9 The exaction of plunder had characterized the Neo-Assyrian Empire throughout its history. Those nations that submitted were drained of their resources, a fate suffered by Israel and Judah at various times. Thus Nineveh became the richest city throughout the ancient Near East. Now it was to suffer the same fate: its own people were to be led away; its "wealth" in "gold," "silver," and valuables was to be seized.

10 The defeat of the city is summarized forcefully. The inhabitants had failed to "brace" themselves (v.1) and instead "bodies tremble." The verb underlying "tremble" (GK 2714) is often applied to labor pains.

c. An interpretive analogy (2:11–12)

11 The mocking rhetorical question introduces an extended metaphor that interprets the horror of the preceding verses: Nineveh has ravaged Mesopotamia like a savage beast of prey and must be judged accordingly. Nineveh's kings compared themselves to lions in their terrible power, and its game parks sheltered such lions. Like a pride of such lions, Nineveh had been free to terrorize the land "with nothing to fear." Now, however an accounting was due for that ruthless spirit.

12 The root of "killed" (GK 3271), recurring in the nouns "kill" and "prey," is normally used of wild beasts that hunt and tear open their prey. The verb "strangle" (GK 2871) is equally apt to the image, as lions are represented as killing their prey in this manner in ancient Near Eastern art. Assyrian brutality matched and surpassed such displays of violence. The goal of the lion's violence was prey "for his cubs"; as the lion filled its "lairs with the kill," so Nineveh had been filled with foreign plunder.

d. Judgment from the Lord (2:13)

13 The climax is announced in the verdict of condemnation. "No prey" is a metonymy of effect: the taking of prey will be cut off with the extermination of the predator. The reference to "chariots" and to "messengers" recalls Sennacherib's "evil," plotted "against the Lord" (1:11; cf. Isa 37:9, 14, 24). This verse draws together the major motifs and vocabulary of Nahum's prophecy: the Lord's inexorable opposition to Nineveh; the destruction of its military resources; the role of "sword" and "fire" that "consume" the enemy; the cutting off of Nineveh and its "prey"; the termination of its cruelty, symbolized by the "young lions"; and the reversal of fortunes that awaits Assyria and Judah, exemplified in the fate of the "heralds."

e. The verdict announced (3:1)

1 The relation of this verse to its context is rendered uncertain by the interjection "Woe." Normally "woe" introduces a new section, suggesting here that v.1 belongs with 3:2–7. However, 3:1 is related thematically to 2:11–13 much more closely than to 3:4; it repeats the focal concept of killing in the noun "victims," an association reinforced by the parallel nouns "plunder" and "blood." And it also represents the city as "full (of plunder)," like the lion's den (2:12).

2. Second description of Nineveh's destruction (3:2–7)

a. Onslaught and failing defenses (3:2–3)

2–3 These verses resume the battle scene of 2:3–5, evoking the rapid movement and the sound of the onslaught led by the chariots. The term "cavalry" (GK 7305) may denote the mounted horsemen that are depicted accompanying chariots in Assyrian reliefs, or it may refer to the horses of the chariot corps. "Swords" were characteristic weapons of foot soldiers, being used in hand-to-hand combat; they did not form part of the regular equipment of horsemen or chariot crews. The "spears" also formed an integral part of the infantry's weapons.

As in 2:3–10, the defenders are annihilated by the attack: four times—using three different words—the verse refers to the corpses left in the wake of the invading army. Possibly the "people stumbling" are the fugitives; in view of 2:5, they are more likely to be the victors, impeded by the sheer mass of bodies.

b. An interpretive analogy (3:4)

4 The root underlying the word "harlot" (GK 2390) occurs three times in this verse (cf. "wanton lust," "prostitution"). The biblical references to "prostitution" imply treachery, infidelity, pollution, and lust. All are appropriate to this city that sacrificed any semblance of morality to personal interest. Of primary significance, however, is the prostitute's motive of personal gain and the ominous "alluring" that she exercises to attain it. As Ahaz had been lured into unholy relations with Assyria formerly (cf. 2Ki 16:7–18), so Nineveh had drained the life of those enticed by her smooth ways.

The harlot's practice of allurement and manipulation is abetted by "sorceries" and "witchcraft." Both sorcery and harlotry suggest an illicit, surreptitious yet deadly means; they correspond to the stealth of the hunting lion and are equally destructive. Nineveh is here seen as using both immoral attractions (the city was a center of the cult of Ishtar—herself represented as a harlot) and sorcery (Assyrian society was dominated by magic arts) as a means to enslave others.

c. Judgment from the Lord (3:5–6)

5–6 As the Lord's condemnation overthrows the city's brutality (2:13), so it annuls the demonic power that promotes that brutality. The same principle of reversal is effected: violence has been requited with violence (2:13); Nineveh's hidden arts are destroyed by exposure; as she enslaved "nations," so she will be bared to the "nations" (cf. Jer 13:26–27; Eze 16:37–41; Hos 2:3–5).

d. The verdict announced (3:7)

7 This section concludes on a note of mourning in response to the Lord's verdict—mourning occasioned by the presence of death. In v.1 death is foreshadowed in the city's sin; here it is an accomplished fact, and the witnesses respond in revulsion and amazement to the humiliated prostitute. The "ruins" of Nineveh reflect the Lord's determination to make a full "end" of it (1:8–9), and the fulfillment of this purpose is amply attested both inscriptionally and archaeologically. The debacle is still regarded as one of the greatest riddles of world history. Within eighty years, Nineveh, which had been raised to unrivaled prominence by Sennacherib and his successors, was obliterated from living memory. The Lord had purposed Nineveh's end, and the imperial city was never rebuilt. For the next three hundred years at least, there is no evidence that the site of Nineveh was even occupied.

3. Third description of Nineveh's destruction (3:8–11)

8 In Hebrew "Thebes" is "No Amon" ("the city of Amon"; cf. Jer 46:25; Eze 30:14–16). "Amon" was the chief god of the Theban pantheon and one of the principal deities of Egypt since the New Kingdom (c. 1580–1090 B.C.): the term "No" is derived from the Egyptian word for "city." Thebes, which lay on the Nile about four hundred miles south of modern Cairo, constituted the chief city of Upper, or southern Egypt and was a leading center of Egyptian civilization. A place of temples, obelisks, sphinxes, and palaces, it was dominated by the mighty temples of Amon at Luxor and Karnak on the east bank of the Nile, opposite the funerary temples of the kings to the west. Its temples and palaces are said to have found no equal in antiquity, and they are still regarded by some as the mightiest ruins of ancient civilization to be found anywhere in the world.

As intimated above, the city lay on both banks of the Nile. The river was divided into the principal channels by the islands that interrupted its flow. Thebes could truly be described, therefore, as a city "with water around her." The term "river" (GK 3542) is normally translated "sea"; it is applied elsewhere to the Nile (Isa 18:2; 19:5; cf. Jer 51:36), and indeed the Nile is known as "the sea" to this day. The strategic location of Thebes made the river its natural or "outer" wall of "defense." In addition, it enjoyed the protection of a main, inner "wall," visualized again here as constituted by the surrounding waters or extending from them. It is thus equated with Nineveh, similarly defended by a "wall" and by water through its location on a great river (2:5–6, 8).

9 Thebes had intermittent periods of great glory as the capital of Egypt from Middle Kingdom times (c. 2160–1580) onward. After some indifferent periods, the establishment of an Ethiopian dynasty ("Cush") in the seventh century assured a continuing place for Thebes, with access to the strength of both Egypt and Ethiopia. The adjective "boundless" corresponds to "endless" (2:9), evoking the vast resources shared by the two cities and foreshadowing the "bodies without number" (v.3) that they were destined to share also.

"Libya" lay to the west of Egypt, with which it possessed similar ties: the long-lived Twenty-Second Dynasty had originated from Libya (c. 950–730), exemplified in the ruler Sheshonk I (Shishak; cf. 1Ki 14:25–26). "Put" is also to be located in North Africa on the basis of biblical references that associate it with Egypt and Ethiopia (cf. Ge 10:6; 1Ch 1:8; Jer 46:9; et al.). It is now commonly identified with the same area as Libya. Like Nineveh, Thebes was surrounded not only by natural defenses but by the confederate resources of a vast and ancient empire.

10–11 For all her strength, Thebes fell to the Assyrians (c. 664). The Ethiopian kings had provoked this attack by their policy of intrigue in Palestine. Rather than confront Assyria directly, they tended to incite the minor states to rebel against their Assyrian overlords, with a view to reestablishing Palestine as an Egyptian sphere of influence (cf. Isa 30:1–7; 31:13; 36:6; 37:9). As a result of such intrigue by Tirhakah (689–664; cf. Isa 37:9) with the prince of Tyre, Egypt was invaded by Esarhaddon in 675/674; the campaign was launched in earnest in 671, when the Egyptians were routed before the Assyrians who captured Memphis. Upper Egypt, including Thebes, surrendered; Tirhakah fled south to Ethiopia, and his rule was abrogated in Lower Egypt, which Esarhaddon fragmented under the rule of minor princes.

Esarhaddon died in 669 as he was marching to suppress further insurrection in Egypt, and Tirhakah immediately moved north into Egypt again: Thebes resumed its traditional allegiance to him, Memphis was seized, and Lower Egypt was again overrun. In 667 Ashurbanipal was in a position to take Egypt in hand, reversing the previous sequence of events. Memphis fell to his troops; Thebes surrendered with the rest of Egypt; Tirhakah fled south to Napata where he died. He was succeeded as king of Ethiopia by Tanutamon, who renewed the attempt to control Egypt. Again, Thebes reversed its allegiance, receiving him with acclaim. Memphis was taken, its Assyrian representatives were slaughtered, and Tanutamon gained temporary sovereignty over Egypt. The Egyptians were no match for the Assyrian army, however, which soon returned under Ashurbanipal in 664/663. Tanutamon fled south like his predecessors, the Delta was reconquered, and Thebes fell. Both Ashurbanipal and Esarhaddon had exercised restraint in their Egyptian foreign policy, as a means of securing loyalty in a distant country they could only with difficulty garrison effectively. Now, however, Ashurbanipal's patience was exhausted. Thebes was razed to the ground, in vengeance on its vacillating allegiance to Ethiopia (cf. 2Ki 17:3–6). His enraged and vehement attack on the city is documented in his annals. From that time on, Thebes has been largely a place of monuments to a glory and dominance now long departed. Both the Egyptian and the Assyrian sources, therefore, validate Nahum's description of a city scattered to the winds, its posterity cut off, its trained "nobles" plundered, and its leaders fleeing for refuge.

Verse 10 echoes the preceding announcement of judgment on Nineveh in the threat of "exile" (cf. 2:7) and of destruction in the streets (2:4); the human resources represented by its "nobles" suffered the same fate as Nineveh's "wealth" (2:9; cf. 3:3). And in v.11 this correlation is made explicit. Nineveh has been equated with Thebes in its defenses (v.8); it would surely be equated with Thebes in its downfall. The finality of this sentence is sealed by its further correspondence to 1:2–15. Nineveh would be "drunk" as decreed by the Lord (1:10). She would seek "refuge" (GK 5057) in vain, for she trusted in carved images and idols.

4. Fourth description of Nineveh's destruction (3:12–19)

a. Onslaught and failing defenses (3:12–14)

12–13 For Nineveh no refuge would be forthcoming. Her "fortresses" (probably walled cities) guarding the approach to Nineveh were ripe for destruction, being dislodged with as little effort as "figs" ready for harvesting. As the "gates" guarding entrance to the land, they were "open" to the enemy like those of Nineveh herself (cf. 2:6). This collapse is explained by the effeminate, weakened condition of her "troops."

14 The impending condition of "siege" demanded an independent supply of "water," since the enemy would cut off all external sources provided by the rivers flowing into the city (cf. 2:6). The Babylonian Chronicle corroborates this anticipation of siege, referring to a campaign that lasted three months. It also intimates that operations against the city had begun in 614 under Cyaxares (cf. 2:1), so that Nineveh was subject to intermittent siege for more than two years.

The word for "defenses" (GK 4448) can also mean "fortifications" or walls of the city. "Clay" was the principal building material of Mesopotamia, which lacked adequate resources in stone (cf. Ge 11:3). The walls of Nineveh, which were built of such "worked clay" bricks, averaged fifty feet in breadth, extending to over one hundred feet at the gates; they therefore demanded an enormous effort for their maintenance, as indicated here by the urgent and repeated references to the processes involved.

b. Interpretive analogy and judgment from the Lord (3:15–17)

15 Nineveh's conquest by fire, together with sword, is amply revealed in its ruins. The devouring fire evokes the destruction inflicted by "grasshoppers" or "locusts" (GK 746), which similarly "consume" all that lies in their path. Verses 15–17 develop this image of "locusts" (cf. Jer 51: 14, 27; Joel 1:4; 2:25) with intricate detail. The initial emphasis is on their omnivorous behavior, typical of locusts. The word "locusts" is related to the Hebrew word meaning "to increase, be many." The ability of the locust to proliferate in vast numbers underlies its menace to vegetation.

16 Like locusts, Nineveh's merchants proliferated beyond measure; and they likewise "strip" the land. The comparison to locusts introduces a further element: like locusts, these "merchants" also "fly away," unconcerned for the region they have exploited.

17 Nineveh's "officials," like her "merchants," are multitudinous as "swarms of locusts"; they "settle" within her boundaries for shelter and food, but they abandon her and "fly away" when tribulation comes. With remarkable artistry Nahum transforms the perspective of the prophecy. Judgment is executed from within by those claiming to serve Nineveh's interests as they flock to her (v.15); and her fall is explained in terms of the disloyalty of her own people. The Assyrians had based their empire on expediency and self-interest, multiplying power, wealth, and personnel like locusts for their own gratification. Now their empire was to succumb as a victim of the self-interest it had promoted—eaten away from within no less than it was devoured by the sword from without.

c. The verdict announced (3:18–19)

18–19 The collapse of effective loyalty penetrated even Assyria's aristocracy, represented by its "nobles" and "shepherds," or "rulers." Their "slumber" and "rest" foreshadow both their death and the inertia that occasions it.

The corollary of this failure is the scattering of the people, "with no one to gather them," like sheep without shepherds." One of the striking phenomena of history is the disappearance of a nation that had existed for two thousand years!

The "king of Assyria" is addressed directly throughout vv.16–19; ultimately it was his fatal injury that accounted for his breakdown in authoritative government and military leadership. As anticipated by Nahum, the dynasty fell with the city. The "wound" could not be healed; the brief attempt by Ashur-uballit to keep the dynasty alive in Haran failed two years later. The injury was indeed fatal.

The book closes with the response of witnesses who heard of these events; the "endless cruelty" was ended!

For his anger lasts only a moment, but his favor lasts a lifetime;
weeping may remain for a night,
but rejoicing comes in the morning.
(Ps 30:5)

Habakkuk

INTRODUCTION

1. Background and Date

Habakkuk's prophecy is set against a background of the decline and fall of the Judean kingdom (c. 626–586 B.C.). Although nothing is known of the prophet himself apart from the book bearing his name—the book is not dated in the usual manner (cf. Am 1:1; Zep 1:1; et al.)—the general background of Habakkuk is clear from the internal data. Verses 5–11 represent a period before 605, the year the Babylonians (the Chaldeans, 1:6; see NIV note) rose to power, and probably prior to the 612 destruction of Nineveh. By contrast it is sometimes argued that 1:12–17 and 2:6–20 must reflect a period after 612 B.C., when the power and rapacity of the Babylonians had become common knowledge to the prophet. The best solution seems to be to take the sections of the dialogue as representative of Habakkuk's spiritual struggles over a long period of time, possibly beginning as early as 626 and continuing as late as 590 or after.

During this period Judah enjoyed its last bit of prosperity under Josiah (d. 609 B.C.); Assyria's wound was revealed as fatal with the ultimate fall of Nineveh in 612; and the short-lived Babylonian Empire established its dominance over Palestine with Jerusalem a casualty and its people taken into exile in 586 B.C. Conditions during the life of the prophet would have progressed from excellent—with considerable material prosperity and even promise of spiritual revival—to the height of desperation as the net was drawn closer and closer around the hapless capital. There is no direct evidence from the book that Habakkuk lived past the destruction of Jerusalem (but cf. 3:16–19).

2. Authorship

Nothing is known of Habakkuk except his name, which does not lend itself to attempts at finding a Hebrew meaning. Of his temperament and personal situation we know only what may be inferred from the book. Literary dependencies and early canonical reception leave no doubt that Habakkuk's work was circulated and accepted early, but the details remain lost.

3. Occasion and Purpose

Habakkuk was unique among the prophets. He did not speak for God to the people but to God about his people. The similarity with the other prophets is in the setting. Violence and covenant violations abounded. The Lord should have arisen to correct the situation, but such had not been forthcoming, and the prayers of the righteous seemed in vain.

The Assyrians would naturally have been a threat to Judah; and apart from the problem of the future of God's covenant promises, the prophet would have expected Assyria to be "the rod of God's anger." The new element externally is the introduction of Babylonian power, with such awful potential consequences and with no clear vision of when and how the Lord would continue his commitments to the chosen line. But initially Habakkuk was more concerned with internal injustices and the Lord's apparent complacency toward the evil generation. It was God's reply (1:5–11) that catapulted the prophecy onto the international and eschatological level.

Chapters 2–3 carry us well beyond the last days of Judah to the future. Habakkuk himself was never told when or exactly how it would end, but 2:14, 20 assured him of the ultimate triumph of the Lord; and the psalm in ch. 3 shows that Habakkuk learned to live in the light of this fact.

4. Theological Values

Habakkuk's message (esp. 2:4) forms a basic point in three NT books (Ro 1:17; Gal 3:11–12; Heb 10:37–38). The theological value of Habakkuk, however, cannot be limited to a few, though crucial, NT quotations. The prophet asked deeply penetrating questions, and the answers are basic to a proper view of God and his relation to history. If God's initial response sounded the death knell for any strictly nationalistic covenant theology of Judah, his second reply outlined in a positive sense the fact that all history was hastening to a conclusion that was as certain as it was satisfying. In the interim, the righteous are to live by faith. The faith prescribed is still called for as a basic response to the unanswered questions in today's universe; and it is this theology for life that stands as Habakkuk's most basic contribution.

EXPOSITION

I. Habakkuk's Initial Lament (1:1–4)

These verses correspond closely to the psalms of lament or complaint; prominent features of this form in vv.2–4 include the questions addressed to the Lord, the urgent descriptions of dire need, and the sustained petition for deliverance (cf. Pss 10:1–13; 13:1–4; 22:1–21; 74:1–11; 80; 88). Habakkuk's prophecy is thus located clearly within the community of faith, exposed to many tribulations, yet oriented to the Lord as its help in trouble.

1–2 The question "How long" implies a situation of crisis from which the speaker seeks deliverance. The verb "listen" (GK 9048) normally carries connotations of an active response to what is heard; where that response is lacking, the righteousness of either the petitioner or the one addressed is called in question. The crisis in which Habakkuk called for help was "violence"; the response expected from the Lord was that he should "save."

"Violence" (GK 2555) denotes flagrant violation of moral law by which a person injures primarily one's fellow human beings (e.g., Ge 6:11). Its underlying meaning is one of ethical wrong, of which physical brutality is only one possible expression. To "save" (GK 3828) means to deliver from what oppresses or restricts. Such salvation is to be found ultimately only in the Lord, by those who are righteous toward him.

3 The concepts of "injustice" and "wrong" are correlated in ten other verses; NIV usually translates them as "evil" and "trouble." "Destruction" and "violence" are similarly correlated repeatedly in Scripture, associated with unjust oppression of the weaker members within a community (Jer 6:7; 20:8; Eze 45:9; Am 3:10). A third word-pair, "strife" and "conflict," evokes the anger and dissension born of conflicting and uncompromising wills (cf. Pr 15:18; 17:14; 26:20–21).

4 The disintegration of a society into factions is bound up with its rejection of the forces that bring it unity—"law" and "justice." The "law" (torah; GK 9368) may refer to any form of authoritative "teaching." When used in the singular without clear definition, as here, "law" signifies God's covenantal code established with Israel, given through Moses and mediated primarily through the Levitical priesthood in close conjunction with the king or other governing authorities. Its effectiveness was therefore "paralyzed" by the corruption of the religious and civil leadership of the nation. "Justice" (GK 5477) implies the exercise not merely of legal processes but of all the functions of government; it is through "justice" that law and order are represented, legislated, interpreted, and enforced.

II. God's First Response (1:5–11)

This passage is distinguished from vv.2–4 by a transition to the Lord as speaker. In form these verses resemble an oracle, yet scarcely the oracle of salvation that forms the turning point in certain other laments (e.g., Pss 12:5; 13:5–6; 22:23–24; et al.). They correspond more closely to an expanded announcement of judgment on God's people, the prophet's lament serving as the accusation on which this is based.

5 The Lord is now the speaker; he addresses a plural audience. The hearers, by implication Judeans, are treated as distinct from the "nations" (or Gentiles), at whom they are to "look." To be "amazed" is a human response to an event that utterly confounds all previous expectations; it runs counter to what the listeners "believe." The destruction of Jerusalem was such an event, creating both a national and a theological crisis among God's people.

6 This verse identifies both the speaker and the amazing work introduced in v.5—the Lord and Babylonia's rise to power. The latter ran counter to popular theology (cf. Jer 5:12; 6:14; 7:1–34; 8:11) but was fully in accord with the Lord's chastisement of his sinning people. Character produces conduct, and the Babylonian character is expressed by unprincipled rapacity ("ruthless and impetuous"). "The whole earth" suggests unrestricted scope for such behavior, which by implication would engulf Palestine also.

7 Verses 7–11 develop the description of the oppressors. Their character was rooted in a self-sufficiency that acknowledged no superior authority and no dependency, which was tantamount to self-deification. Thus they were "feared" and "dreaded," usurping the place of God. If God's people refuse to fear him, they will ultimately be compelled to fear those less worthy of fear. The source of Babylonian "law" and "honor" is exposed—it is self-generated.

8–9 The Babylonian "cavalry" are compared to three predators whose speed and power bring violent death to their prey. The "leopard" and the "wolf" recur, together with the lion, in Jer 5:6 as symbols of divine judgment on Judah. The "vulture" translates an ambiguous term that may also denote an eagle. The vulture is primarily a scavenger, feeding off carrion, whereas the eagle hunts and kills its prey. The imagery of the hunter better fits the historical context (cf. Dt 28:49–50).

Those who live by "violence" shall die by the violence of others. "Like a desert wind," describing the Babylonian advance, pictures the hot, scorching wind from the Eastern desert. "Like sand" creates a vivid portrait of numberless prisoners helplessly collected for deportation.

10 The Babylonians "deride kings" and "scoff at rulers," since they can "laugh" at their defenses. The "ramps," constructed primarily of earth, were a graded incline along which the cumbersome battering rams could be moved in besieging city walls. The "wicked" who "hem in" the "righteous" would themselves be hemmed in by the horrors of siege (cf. v.4).

11 The onrushing cavalry (vv.8–9) was checked by the siege warfare, in which it would not have participated. As the fortified cities fell and resistance crumbled, the cavalry's pent-up energy was released and its progress resumed. The Babylonians may "sweep past," but the final verdict was already in. "Guilty men" is followed immediately by the reason for the guilt: "whose own strength is their god." Such people acknowledge no accountability, seek no repentance, and offer no reparations, while violating the most fundamental order of created life.

III. Habakkuk's Second Lament (1:12–2:1)

This section has characteristics of a second lament, having many points of contact with 1:2–4 (see comment). These include invocation of the Lord's name (v.12), the urgent questions addressed to him (vv.13, 17), the description of the wicked oppressing the righteous (vv.13–17), and the issue of unrequited justice that this raises. The note of confidence expressed in v.12 is also typical of most laments—an attitude implicit in the prophet's perseverance and his insistence that his answers come from God.

12 Although "everlasting" (GK 7710) may refer to eternity, it more often denotes an unspecified point in past history and is applied repeatedly to God's former preservation of Israel. God's holiness is associated with his transcendent sovereignty and power, manifested in the past redemption of his people. Habakkuk's confidence of survival ("we will not die") reflects his knowledge of God's future commitment to his people in salvation history.

"Rock" (GK 7446) evokes the strength and reliability of "the LORD" as Israel's God, and the concepts of "judgment" and "punishment" are correlated repeatedly (cf. Isa 11:3–4). "Punish" (GK 3519) has an underlying judicial meaning of "establishing what is just or right." Frequently it signifies correction of an offender. Here "judgment" (GK 5477) implies the restoration of rule and authority through removal of the causes of disorder. As intimated in vv.7–8, the Israelites' rejection of God's authority mediated through the law merely exposed them to the harsher experience of his authority mediated through an alien people.

13 To "look on" (GK 8011) a matter can imply that it is viewed with acceptance. That the Lord refused to view "evil" and "wrong" in this manner was a basic tenet of Israel's faith (Pss 5:4; 34:16, 21). The evil apparently tolerated was that of the "treacherous," namely, those who are unreliable and break faith in relationship. The Lord's tolerance is implied because he was "silent," or uninvolved; the treachery was typically that of the wicked who "swallow up" the righteous as a wolf devours its prey.

Evidently the "wicked" corresponds to the fisherman in vv.15–17. The express purpose of fishing is to consume the prey. This is motivated by a boundless greed, gratified without principle and pursued by means of a far-flung, international aggression. The "righteous" correspond to the "nations," likened to fish (vv.14–17). This designation includes Judah, whose sin caused her to be numbered among the nations in judgment. Habakkuk's concern was his own people, as both the perpetrators and victims of injustice.

14 The presence of calamity and evil in the world is related without hesitation to God's sovereign control of human destiny. The comparison to "fish" implies a condition that is subhuman and vulnerable. The "sea creatures" are seen as equally helpless, lacking the organization or leadership normally expected in human society.

15 The "hook" and line were widely used for fishing. The "net" was used for hunting and fishing and so had a diversity of application (cf. Isa 19:8). The precise identification of the "net" and "dragnet" is not certain. They appear to correspond to the two main types of net, the throw-net and the seine. "Rejoice" and "be glad" are used with great frequency in religious contexts of worship and praise. They indicate not merely pleasure or merriment but a response affirming what is valued and honored. Again the Babylonians are exposed as exalting the images of their own power and dominance.

16 The verb "sacrifice" (GK 2284) denotes the slaughter of living creatures, usually in a context of worship and service offered to deity. To "burn incense" has the broad meaning of "burning," causing a sacrifice to smoke. The verb is used with various animal sacrifices (e.g., Ex 29:13, 18, 25) and specifically with incense (e.g., Ex 30:7; Nu 16:40). The prophet is complaining that the Babylonians were clearly guilty of according to their own power the honor and strength due to God alone.

The Babylonians' full-blown delusion of greatness is depicted by the swift violence of the "net" and the unyielding, wholesale spoliation of the "dragnet" (cf. vv.8–11). The vast catch they procured had the one purpose of providing "food" for the Babylonian lifestyle. The adjectives underlying "luxury" and "choicest" both have the meaning of "fat," suggesting prosperity. The prosperity of the wicked made them immune to any feeling of dependency or accountability. The metaphorical language barely veils the fact that the food consumed by the Babylonians consisted of nations and individual lives (cf. v.13).

17 Can injustice be tolerated indefinitely by a God of justice? The phrase "empty his net" is virtually identical with "draw his sword"; possibly a double entendre is intended here, since the sword symbolizes the military power of which the net has been the image. The verb underlying "without mercy" has the basic meaning of "sparing" or "removing from a situation." It is used of holding back or refraining from an action, and commonly of pity as the attitude that causes one to hold back or remove from harm. The Babylonians' unrestrained self-will produced in them a hard insensitivity, making them a pitiless threat to other nations.

2:1 The noun "watch" (GK 5466) denotes either the duty or act of watching or a place of observation where such a responsibility is fulfilled. Habakkuk's "watch" is evidently portrayed as being on the city walls, as indicated by the "ramparts." Mizpah, for example, was a typical fortified city of this preexilic period; it had a solid wall 1800 feet long, 12 feet thick on average and perhaps 36 feet high, thus posing a considerable obstacle to battering rams and attackers scaling it. It was built of stone with salients and recesses, being buttressed at its weak points with a total of ten towers; and it would have been crowned by a balcony and parapet. The gate was also guarded by two towers, being carefully designed and fortified in keeping with its strategic function.

It was at some point on such defenses as these that Habakkuk saw himself on duty. The verb "look" (GK 7595) is applied particularly to sentries or watchmen on city walls, who were to warn the citizens of danger. It is applied figuratively to the prophets, who as Israel's watchmen were to see the Lord's purposes and communicate them to their people—a fitting title for those called to be seers and visionaries. Thus, Habakkuk the prophet looked to God for revelation concerning the nations. His "ramparts" and "watch" were the place of responsibility assigned to him, to stand in the council of the Lord and to see his word. The noun "complaint" (GK 9350) denotes an argument by which one seeks to establish what is right and a rebuke or correction by which right is restored. Habakkuk needed to know how to respond to God's ways, both in his assessment of injustice and in his conduct amid the consequences of injustice. He revealed a mature wisdom in his determination that this response be shaped by what God himself would say.

IV. God's Second Response (2:2–20)

1. Prologue (2:2–3)

2 The noun "revelation" (GK 2606) denotes vision that is almost invariably supersensory in nature, and it is attributed especially to the prophets. The "revelation" was to be written down to preserve it for the future. To "make plain" (GK 930) may refer to clarity either in form (by engraving the words) or in content. The reference to the writing material favors the former. This prophecy has a lasting relevance and is to be guarded accordingly. The "tablets" may have been composed of stone, clay, or even metal. "Herald" is literally "the one who reads." Such might be done by a herald, whose role would then be to "run" with the message. Alternatively, "run with" may refer specifically to prophetic activity (cf. Jer 23:21). The context is concerned primarily with preservation of the revelation as a source of encouragement for the future, rather than with its geographical proclamation.

3 The directive to "write" is given because the revelation "awaits" a future fulfillment, at "the end"; its impact extends beyond the present and must therefore be transmitted by means of a permanent record. Indeed, this fulfillment may appear to "linger," suggesting a delay beyond what is expected or intended: the Lord's timetable differs from a human one (cf. 2Pe 3:1–10). The "end" implies the termination of a certain object, activity, or period of time. The immediate context of the "revelation" is the end of the Babylonian oppression, for which the prophet must "wait" (GK 2675).

There is an "appointed time" for the "revelation's" fulfillment, determined by the Lord; and it will not "prove false" or disappoint but "will certainly come." Thus the reader may run with confidence and perseverance the race marked out for him (cf. 1Co 15:58). The logical outcome of this "revelation" is that one should "wait."

2. Indictment (2:4–5)

4 With this verse, the prophet begins the content of the "revelation" referred to in vv.2–3. The verb "puffed up" carries the basic meaning of "swelling," here in the sense of arrogance and presumption. "His desires" translates napsho ("soul," "life"; cf. GK 5883), whose meaning includes also the idea of desire or appetite. "His" evidently refers to the Babylonians. The verb "to be upright" denotes what is straight or level. The "righteous" may be defined by his commitment to the demands of the "law."

"Faith" (GK 575) implies fairness, stability, certainty, or permanence. Hence it is commonly used of personal character and conduct, which is evidenced especially as reliability. God's reliability ("faithfulness") is parallel to his name "Rock," with its connotations of stability and security as a basis for reliance. This quality of reliability and stability is predicated of the "righteous," the only plausible antecedent of "his" in "his faith." It signifies that his commitment to righteousness is genuine and steadfast.

For a person to be faithful in righteousness entails dependent trust on God; such an attitude is clearly demanded in the present context of waiting for deliverance. And "faith" implies obedient commitment no less than trust. Contrary to appearances, the judgment of God is selective and awe-inspiring in its precision: in the midst of disaster, his grace overshadows the righteous and causes them to "live."

5 "Wine," like the Babylonians, is deceptive and unreliable ("betrays"); although drunk to enhance one's life, wine impoverishes, confuses, and destroys (cf. Pr 20:1; 23:20–21, 29–35). It is associated with arrogance, unfulfilled greed, and social injustice elsewhere in the OT (cf. Isa 5:8–30). The object of this betrayal is clarified by the references to "arrogance" and restless ambition, clearly the Babylonians. And, indeed, the Babylonian regime was to be overthrown in just the circumstances of drunken pride portrayed here (cf. Da 5:1–31).

Napsho ("greedy"; GK 5883) is also translated "his desire, throat, appetite." The greed is insatiable. "Grave" (Heb. sheol; GK 8619) is perhaps better translated "underworld" or "hell," a place depicted repeatedly as devouring its prey (Nu 16:30–34; Pr 1:12). The expression of this insatiable greed is political conquest. The dominant metaphor relates to the treachery of an addiction to wine, which, like political and military ambition, knows no limit of fulfillment and to which all other interests are sacrificed.

3. Sentence (2:6–20)

6a The opening line introduces the oracle of woe (vv.6–20), characterized as a type of proverb ("taunt"; GK 5442); as an ambiguous, allusive saying that requires interpretation ("ridicule"; GK 4886); and as a riddle or enigmatic saying translated "scorn" (GK 2648). The first two terms have certain limited associations with mockery. The dominant emphasis is not ridicule but didactic, exposing the Babylonians as an object-lesson.

6b–8 "Woe" (GK 2098) is commonly used to introduce a judicial indictment. The crime is specified, first, as unjust acquisition of wealth, achieved by "extortion" and plunder, and, more seriously, as the wholesale destruction of people and their environment in the pursuit of this wealth. The noun "extortion" (GK 6294) denotes the accumulation of pledges taken as security by a creditor; such a procedure often accompanied the exploitation and even enslavement of the poor (cf. 2Ki 4:1–7; Ne 5:1–13). The word "debtors" is defined as "the peoples who are left," i.e., the survivors within the conquered nations; and the sentence announced here was indeed executed by former victims of Babylon, the Medes and Persians (cf. Jer 25:25; 49:34–39; Eze 32:24–2.5; Isa 13:17–22; 21:2–10; Da 5:28).

9–11 The noun "gain" (GK 1299) is generally associated with rapacity and wrongdoing, associations that are stressed by "unjust." The verb translated as "plotted the ruin" implies the cutting off of life. The present section amplifies these accusations by exposing the self-interested purposes underlying such violence, namely, establishment of the Babylonian "realm" or dynastic house, by elevating it to the invulnerable security depicted by an eagle's "nest." However, this exercise of evil to escape "ruin" is futile, for one reaps what one sows. The sentence of judgment balances the crime: shame for self-exaltation, loss of life for destruction of life, a divided and discordant house for a secure house. And, indeed, despite all its impregnable defenses, Babylon was to fall in precisely such circumstances of division and deluded pride (cf. Da 5:1–30).

12–14 The third "woe" reiterates the indictment of ruthless self-aggrandizement achieved by "bloodshed," applying it to the construction of the Babylonian capital. The judgment pronounced on such an enterprise is inevitable: a civilization built up by the destruction of other civilizations and by the conscription of their labor for its own ends will itself be destroyed. The mainspring of human history is to be found, not in its events themselves, but in the revealed purposes of the Lord who directs it. The title "LORD Almighty" (lit., "LORD of armies") expresses the Lord's sovereign rule as king and commander over every created force, but primarily over Israel. It is associated repeatedly with his militant judgment of all that opposes his rule.

The underlying purpose for the preceding indictments is God's abiding intent that his "glory" (GK 3883) fill the whole earth as it has filled his house, and that humankind should know it fully—a "knowledge" that will be as the "sea" in its length, breadth, and depth. This entails the removal of all that rejects such "knowledge," of which the Babylonian character and aspirations are the very epitome. The phrase "glory of the LORD" is used of the visible presence of God, by which the preeminent value of his character and actions are revealed. It is associated most prominently with the tabernacle and temple, and especially with the cherubim above which the Lord is enthroned, ruling over Israel, his sovereign majesty being of the essence of his "glory." To know the Lord in such "glory" is therefore to abandon the Babylonians' proud autonomy and to honor him as Lord.

15–17 The fourth "woe" introduces a new accusation, expressed by the image of inducing drunkenness with its consequences. The figure is used repeatedly of God's judgment by which he prostrates human beings, confusing their faculties and thereby undermining their presumptuous claim to self-determination; and it is applied widely to the Babylonians as instruments of that judgment. However, the Babylonian motives in such judgment are entirely self-interested: they seek their own "glory" through their malicious humiliation of their "neighbors," in which there is no acknowledgment of God's sovereign determination. Once again, therefore, their evil motivation and conduct reap a corresponding judgment: they will succumb to the same drunken humiliation that they have administered to others.

The preceding crime is defined more literally as "destruction" and "violence" wrought on "Lebanon." Often associated with the territory of Israel, to whose people it was allotted by the Lord, "Lebanon" is used as a symbol of Israel, and more specifically of Israel as a victim of Babylonian aggression (Eze 17:3). In keeping with these connotations, the Babylonians' "violence" and "destruction" refer to their rape and despoliation of the region of Israel—an injustice requiting Israel's own "destruction and violence" (cf. 1:3, 9) while incurring a corresponding retribution for the Babylonians themselves.

18–20 The dominant motif of v.18 is its denunciation of "idols"; they are unable to "teach" truth to anyone, and they are therefore utterly unworthy of one's "trust." These artifacts of "wood" and "stone" are unable to "give guidance" because they are without "breath." It is therefore reprehensible folly for a person to call on them. By contrast the Lord is in his holy "temple," or "palace" (GK 2121), ruling and judging in sovereign power.

The futility of idols is contrasted repeatedly with the living God's unique claim to "trust" and obedience. Their insidiousness is suggested by their ability to usurp the place of God in human lives, claiming a trust that belongs to him alone, and "giving guidance" that can come from him alone. In view of the Lord's implacable opposition to all such usurpers, the mere reference to his presence constitutes an intimation of judgment—a judgment duly executed on Babylon and still operative against humanity's bent toward idolatry.

V. The Prayer of Habakkuk (3:1–19)

In its form and language, ch. 3 is closely related to the Psalms. Habakkuk's recollection of Israel's past history is typical of the praises, instruction, and supplications in the Psalms. More specifically, the passage resembles the psalms of lament. It shows particular affinities with Ps 18 and Ps 77. For an extended discussion on the relationship between the prayer of Habakkuk and the Psalms, see EBC 7:520–22.

1. Introduction (3:1)

1 The reference to "Habakkuk the prophet" marks a new section. The following verses are characterized as a "prayer," a title attributed elsewhere to five psalms of lament (Pss 17; 86; 90; 102; 142), and also to an early collection of Davidic psalms (cf. Ps 72:20). The associations with the psalmic literature are reinforced by the phrase "On shigionoth" (cf. "shiggaion" in the title of Ps 7). The precise meaning of the phrase is uncertain.

2. Prayer (3:2)

2 The orientation of Habakkuk's "prayer" is to the past. The noun "fame" (GK 9051) is normally used of secondhand information, suggesting a remoteness from the hearer's own experience to the persons or events referred to. The Lord's "deeds" envisaged here are his work at the Exodus—a primary anchor-point of Israel's recollection, faith, and hope. Habakkuk's appeal for "mercy" (GK 8163) is thus grounded in God's covenantal commitment to Israel, displayed in the Exodus and sealed at Sinai. However, it is also an admission of Israel's decline from the revelation of God's character and ways, made "known" at the Exodus: not only do the "deeds" of that epoch represent secondhand knowledge, but the need to "renew" them implies that their impact in redemption and revelation was facing extinction. Moreover, the imminence of "wrath" betrays the presence of sin, which the Lord is committed to judge in his people.

3. Theophany (3:3–15)

3 "Teman" was located in Edom, the land south and east of the Dead Sea, traditionally occupied by the descendants of Esau. The wilderness of "Paran" was a large, relatively diffuse area, lying between Kadesh Barnea to the north and Mount Sinai to the south and bounded by Edom to the northeast and Egypt to the southwest. "Mount Paran" is generally thought to be situated to the east of this desert. The primary function of mentioning these locales is to evoke the revelation of God's law at Sinai. The noun "glory" (GK 2086) is used primarily of kingly authority, revealed preeminently in the Lord's sovereignty over creation and history. Thus God's "glory" covers "the heavens" in permeating them, being revealed in them as an expression of his majesty. God's "praise" denotes the power of his character and works, for which he is to be praised and which pervades his creation. The meaning of the expression "Selah" has been obscure to translators since early times; possibly it had a liturgical function relating to music or prayer in the temple worship.

4 God's "glory" is as "the sunrise." "Splendor" (GK 5586) denotes the shining of various sources of light, including the sun, while "sunrise" translates the common noun "light." The noun "rays" normally means "horns," with the derived meaning of "projections," such as beams or rays of light. "Splendor" describes the radiance of God's presence in contexts that recall his theophanies at Sinai and in the wilderness. This radiance is generally manifested as intense fire, shrouded in clouds and darkness, an image very remote from that of the rising sun. "Sunrise" is used of lightning, which is a prominent characteristic of Sinai and later theophanies. On this understanding, the Lord is perceived as illuminating the world with the awe-inspiring radiance that characterized his descent on Mount Sinai. The "rays" are flashes of light manifested at the Lord's presence. The "hand" is a symbol of the Lord's power--a "power" manifested conspicuously in the forces of nature, which are "hidden" in his storehouses.

5 God's "power" is here revealed in judgment: almost invariably "plague" and "pestilence" are attributed directly to the sovereign agency and judgment of God. Accompanying him in the context of Sinai, they refer particularly to the plagues that devastated Egypt and which attended Israel's disobedience to the covenant given at Sinai.

6–7 The scope of this judgment embraces the "earth" as a whole, which is convulsed by earthquake and volcanic upheaval. The repercussions of such judgment and physical upheaval are reflected among the "nations." "Tremble" implies both emotional turmoil and abrupt physical dislocation. The "mountains" and "hills" are symbols of grandeur, permanence, and security in the "earth"; yet they are revealed as frail and temporary. Although they appear to be "age-old," in truth God alone is "eternal." The "nations" are exemplified more specifically by the tribes of "Cushan" and "Midian." The Midianites were localized in Transjordan; the word "dwellings" typifies their nomadic existence. The identity of "Cushan" is uncertain, but evidently it also denotes a nomadic group in similar "distress." This close parallelism suggests that "Cushan" was a nation related or even identical to "Midian" (cf. Ex 2:18–22; 18:1–5; Nu 12:1).

8 The Lord's "wrath" is directed against the "sea," evoking his display of power at the Red Sea. The correlation with that event is substantiated by the reference to "chariots" and "horses" and to the Lord's victory, or the salvation of his people.

9 All three Hebrew words in the second line of this verse are obscure, and they must be interpreted against the background of the first line. The noun "arrows" normally means "staffs" or "tribes," but the first of these meanings can be applied to the shaft of a weapon. Such an application is appropriate to "bow." "Many" translates a form derived from either a noun meaning "group of seven" or a verb meaning "to swear." The first alternative is suggested in the sevenfold volleys of arrows used in Israelite warfare. Although the issue is by no means clear-cut, "to swear" is preferable because vv.11–14 clearly echo Dt 32:39–43; v.9 is closely related to vv.11–14 by the correspondence of "uncovered" and "stripped"; it is therefore to be interpreted against the same Deuteronomic background. Thus, God's militant intervention is perceived as fulfilling the commitment sworn to Moses and Israel beyond the Jordan. A tentative translation of the entire line would be "The arrows of the promise are sworn."

The final line is also obscure, since it could be translated "you split the rivers to the earth." The noun "rivers" has associations with the Exodus. The verb "split" (GK 1324) is often applied to the division of the Red Sea, which allowed God's people to walk securely on the dry "earth." However, the vision of the earth "split" by floods of water is appropriate to the following verses with their undertones of the Creation and the Flood. The syntactical ambiguity is supported by the association of God's "bow" with the Flood (cf. Ge 9:13–14, 16) and by the similar juxtaposition of earthquake and flood in v.10. On this understanding "earth" may correspond to "mountains." Verse 8 would then deal with the Exodus and vv.9–11 more explicitly with the Flood, both motifs being integrated in vv.12–15.

10 The reference to "water" again evokes God's might revealed in driving back the Red Sea, as do the nouns "deep" and "torrents." This verse in particular draws on the language of Ps 77, where the Exodus is the explicit focus of recollection. Both passages envision that event in cosmic terms, as convulsing the "mountains" and the whole of nature. It is this awe-inspiring power of God, the Creator and Judge of all the earth, that is manifested in retribution and salvation at the Red Sea. As at the Cross, a universal cataclysm is compressed into a single, localized event in Israel's history; and that event, too, is destined to shake the universe.

11 The "sun" and "moon" are prominent symbols of God's created order, particularly of its permanence. Their inactivity indicates the interruption of that order. Here the picture is probably of an eclipse; they stay in their place and cease to give light. Moreover, darkness is appropriate to the context of storm in vv.9–11. Such an interruption of the created order typically accompanies the judgment of God; and this judgment, culminating in the eschatological Day of the Lord, is characterized consistently by darkness. The noun "glint" is used of lightning (cf. Ps 77:18), and the Lord's "arrows" are equated with lightning (Pss 18:14; 77:17–18). His "arrows" recur repeatedly as instruments of his judgment.

12 This verse recapitulates the motif of God's wrath, the noun "anger" being identical to "wrath" in v.8. It also recapitulates the military imagery of vv.8–9, 11. Habakkuk's vision embraces the conquest of the "nations" as an integral part of the Exodus and of Israel's subsequent destiny. The Lord may appoint the Babylonians to curse Israel, but they will surely inherit a curse themselves. Threshing implies violent shaking and crushing, which also characterizes the effects on the "earth" and mountains as the Lord "strode" by.

13 The military associations of "came out" are reiterated in the words "deliver" (GK 3829) and "save" (GK 3829), both derived from the same root as "victorious" (v.8) and "save" (1:2). This deliverance expresses the Lord's covenantal commitment to his "people" and to his "anointed one" (mashiach, "Messiah"). In the present context of the Exodus, "anointed one" appears to refer to Moses, who, like King David, combined in himself the messianic functions of shepherd, prophet, servant of God, and priest. The context of the Exodus also throws light on the identity of the "leader." Egypt represents an archetypal land of "wickedness," and the pharaoh as leader figures prominently as an agent of Israel's oppression. This understanding is reinforced by the associations of the noun "land" (GK 1074), normally translated "house," since Egypt is characterized as Israel's "house of bondage." The oppression in Egypt foreshadows subsequent oppression, and the deliverance at the Red Sea embodies the promise of subsequent deliverance.

14 This devastation is elaborated further here, the verb "pierced" echoing a meaning of "crushed," and the noun "head" being identical to "leader." It is accomplished by turning the enemy's "spear" (or "weapons") against himself. This is reminiscent of the overthrow of the pharaoh's horses and chariots and represents a fitting judgment on the Babylonians. Indeed, Babylon fell to Cyrus without opposition, its "leader" being betrayed by factions among his own subjects (cf. Da 5). The scene recalls the Babylonians' rapacity in the preceding chapters. This victory is wrought on behalf of the "wretched" (the "humble" or "afflicted"). This adjective denotes a condition of material or spiritual poverty.

15 Verse 15 reverts again to the language of v.8, thereby establishing the historical context of the intervening verses. The phrase

"great waters" represents a further allusion to the Exodus.

4. Response (3:16–19a)

16 The term "heart" (GK 1061) is applied in literal usage to the lower abdomen, particularly the womb or belly, as the seat of conception; it is used figuratively of the innermost thoughts and motives of man. As evidenced by the additional anatomical terms, the prophet was shaken and disabled throughout his being. The verb "pounded" echoes the same root in vv.2, 7, and occurs again in "trembled." The conspicuous repetitions indicate the cause of Habakkuk's inward upheaval: the imminence of God's "wrath" on Israel and, more acutely, the uncertainty of any time-frame that accompanies the subsequent judgment or the enemy. This is corroborated by the final, explanatory lines, which anticipate a "nation invading us" as an instrument of that "wrath." But they also anticipate for that nation its own "day of calamity." For Habakkuk to see such things that were veiled to his contemporaries was to experience distress. To see beyond them, to the Holy One who appointed them, was to demonstrate the greatness of faith and to find strength to "wait quietly" (cf. 2:3).

17 Israel's prosperity was dependent on the nation's obedience to the covenant and on the Lord's consequent blessing. Such prosperity was forfeited by disobedience and disloyalty to the covenant, thus incurring the Lord's chastening through natural and military disasters. In this vision of a devastated economy, Habakkuk acknowledges his nation's apostasy and the inevitability of judgment.

18 The faith demonstrated in v.16 reaches full expression (2:4). For Habakkuk it was "God" himself and his intervention as "Savior" (GK 3829) that motivated his longing and his joyful attaining. The basis of Habakkuk's faith, as of Paul's, was the revealed word of God (cf. Ro 10:17). The covenant that promised the invasion and devastation also gave assurance of restoration to God's favor and presence (cf. Dt 30:1–10; 32:34–43).

19a This verse is clearly dependent on Ps 18, in its affirmation of God-given "strength" and most notably in the image of "the feet of a deer ... on the heights." However, the phrase "go on the heights" is anticipated in Dt 33:29, which itself echoes Dt 32:13. Both passages envisage Israel's conquest and possession of the Promised Land.

5. Epilogue (3:19b)

19b The final line of the prophecy forms an editorial conclusion to ch. 3, expressed in the language of Psalms. The "director of music" probably had supervisory authority, particularly of the Levites in relation to the music of the temple service (1Ch 15:21; 23:4; 2Ch 2:2, 18; 34:12–13). The noun "stringed instruments" is translated "song" or music in common usage (cf. Job 30:9; Pss 69:12; 77:6).

Zephaniah

INTRODUCTION

1. Author and Date

As far back as the early church fathers, the etymology of Zephaniah's name was disputed. One explanation understood the name to contain the root saphan (GK 7621; "to hide, shelter"). This etymology plus the common suffix yah (for "Yahweh") gives the meaning "Yah(weh) has hidden." Another suggestion derives the name "Zephaniah" from the root sapah (GK 7595; "to watch"); thus the name signifies something like "Watchman for Yah(weh)."

Three other men bore the name Zephaniah in the OT: a Levite descended from Kohath (1Ch 6:36–38); the second priest under the high priest Seraiah during the reign of King Zedekiah (2Ki 25:18–21; Jer 52:24–27); and the father of Josiah, an exile who returned from Babylon (Zec 6:10, 14).

The opening statement of the book indicates that Zephaniah prophesied "during the reign of Josiah son of Amon king of Judah" (640–609 B.C.). Zephaniah predicted the destruction of Nineveh (2:13–15), which took place in 612 B.C. The only question is whether his prophecy belonged to the earlier or later part of Josiah's reign. Scholars have argued for both options.

2. Background

After the wicked reigns of Manasseh (695–642 B.C.) and Amon (642–640 B.C.), the reformer king Josiah (640–609 B.C.) ascended the throne. For more than a half-century, during the reigns of his predecessors, apostate conditions had prevailed. It was during Josiah's reign that Zephaniah began warning the people of impending judgment. The fall of Samaria in 722 B.C. had been a solemn reminder of God's justice and power.

Manasseh and Amon had remained loyal vassals to Assyria, but under Josiah the nation of Judah experienced independence. The death of Ashurbanipal, king of Assyria (669–633 B.C.), probably coincided with Josiah's eighth year (2Ch 34:30), a time perhaps of Assyrian policy change. By the time Josiah was of age (628 B.C.), Ashurbanipal's son had died. Assyria was facing problems with Babylon and was no longer able to retain effective control in the west. Presumably about this time Josiah launched sweeping reforms and moved to take possession of the provinces into which Assyria had divided the territory of northern Israel.

The message of Zephaniah pictures the social, moral, and religious conditions in Judah at that time. The reforms of Josiah certainly included a purge of foreign cults and practices. Undoubtedly heading the list were Assyrian religious practices. Various astral deities and old Canaanite practices were removed (2Ki 23:4–25). Cult personnel—including prostitutes of both sexes—were done away with. The shrines of the north and their personnel—especially the rival temple of Bethel—were destroyed. Probably Josiah's most noteworthy reform policy was the centralization of worship in Jerusalem.

3. Message

The focal point of Zephaniah's message is the "day of the LORD." Zephaniah used the expression more often than any other prophet. The Day of the Lord would be a day of doom, because the people "have sinned against the LORD" (1:17). But he also held out a promise of shelter for those who sought the Lord (2:3). In ch. 1 Zephaniah centers God's word of judgment on Judah. In ch. 2, he predicts and pronounces judgment on the neighbors of Judah. In ch. 3, after a word concerning judgment on Jerusalem, he promises future glory for Israel's remnant.

EXPOSITION

I. Introduction (1:1)

1 The author gave us more information about his ancestry than any other prophet, tracing his pedigree back four generations. Perhaps this was because the good king Hezekiah was his great-great-grandfather (some feel the Hezekiah here is not the same one who had been king). The time of the prophecy was during the reign of Josiah king of Judah (see the introduction).

II. Day of Judgment (1:2–3:8)

A. Against Judah (1:2–2:3)

1. General warning (1:2–3)

2 Before focusing attention on Judah, Zephaniah issues a general warning of coming destruction in broad terminology. God is judge of the whole world, and especially of his people, Judah. The expression "face of the earth," used of the great Flood of Noah's time (Ge 6:7; 7:4), refers to more than just a local land, unless a specific limitation is added.

3 Language that pairs "men and animals" (sixth day of creation) and birds and fish (fifth day) and prefaces each with "sweep away" vividly sets forth the totality and intensity of a coming destruction.

2. Judgment for Judah (1:4–13)

4 When the Lord said he would "stretch out his hand against," he was indicating a special work of punishment (cf. Isa 5:25). The reference to the "remnant of Baal" would be to the forms of Baal worship still left in the land from Manasseh's detestable institution of it (2Ki 21:3, 5, 7). Josiah destroyed much of this; but pockets of Baalism still existed, necessitating judgment and eradication.

"Pagan and idolatrous priests" reflects the traces of idolatrous worship that yet remained despite official action against the cult. God intended a judgment that would totally eliminate Baalism. This was fulfilled in Judah by the Babylonian invasion.

5–6 These verses delineate and describe the persons involved in this pagan worship. Roof worship provided a clear view of the sky and a good place for altars. Josiah acted against this practice (2Ki 23:5), but obviously the evil practice still persisted. The religious syncretism reflected in swearing by the Lord and also by Molech was not new (cf. 1Ki 11:33). Finally listed are those simply and summarily described as the faithless and indifferent.

7 In view of the doom waiting, the prophet called all to silent attention before the Lord. "The day of the LORD" in view here is his day of reckoning, the time of God's judgment. "The LORD has prepared [his] sacrifice"—the people of Judah! "He has consecrated" the despised and dreaded Babylonians as his priests to slay this sacrifice. When sinners will not repent and offer themselves as living sacrifices, then he himself becomes the sacrifice and victim of his own sins.

8 The royal leaders who bore chief responsibility were singled out for special notice. They should have led the people in righteousness instead of evil. Those of royal blood bore responsibility for the conditions in Jerusalem. "Foreign clothes" seems to refer to dress that imitated or reflected Egyptian or Babylonian styles, indicative of a foreign inclination of the heart.

9 "Stepping [GK 1925] on the threshold" may reflect a cultic practice of pagan priests avoiding stepping on a defiled or sacrosanct threshold, deriving from when the head and hands of the Philistine god Dagon broke off and lay there (cf. 1Sa 5:5). More likely this passage refers to theft and plunder, which fits in nicely with the following couplet. Accordingly, the verb should be translated "leap on" (or "over") the threshold.

10 "That day" refers to the Day of the Lord, the time of great wailing and outcry. The Fish Gate was in the north wall, probably near the present Damascus Gate (cf. Ne 3:3; 12:39; 2Ch 33:14). This is the direction the enemy would come from. The "New Quarter" (lit., "second [town]") was probably near the Fish Gate. Huldah the prophetess lived there (2Ki 22:14). "The hills" probably refers to those within Jerusalem (Zion, Opel, Moriah). The "loud crash" vividly depicts the city crashing down on the heads of its inhabitants.

11 "Market district" (GK 4847) translates an obscure Hebrew word. It seems to represent the area where merchants gathered, possibly somewhere in the depression of the Tyropean Valley. The choice of a Hebrew word that may mean "mortar" is especially appropriate since God was about to pound his people like grain in a mortar.

12 The "lamps" were clay oil-lamps commonly used at that time. The vivid imagery of "wine left on its dregs" was proverbial for indifference and callousness, as shown by the parallel: "who are complacent." In making the best wine, the liquid is poured from vessel to vessel, separating the wine from its dregs. If allowed to remain too long on its lees, the wine becomes harsh. So evil people rested complacently on harsh and evil influences and were securely settled in their wicked society. They concluded that the Lord would do "nothing, either good or bad," i.e., they denied God's providence, as though he brought about neither blessing nor judgment.

13 Because of their complacency and impudence, God would bring on the people the curses of the covenant: they would not enjoy their wealth, homes, and vineyards (cf. Lev 26:3–33; Dt 28:30, 39). He would fulfill his promises to his people—for good or bad.

3. Description of that day (1:14–2:3)

14 The Day of the Lord is called "great" (GK 1524; cf. Joel 2:11). This great day hung over the people like the famous sword of Damocles; it was right at hand, certain, and hastening to its goal. "Listen!" implies a "sound" or "noise" to be heard.

15 The dreadful character of the great day of the Lord is reflected in the words "distress," "anguish," "trouble," and "ruin." Then its ominous conditions are depicted by the use of "darkness," "gloom," "clouds," and "blackness."

16 The stark description continues so vividly that one feels he is present at the battle, seeing the clouds of smoke billowing upward and hearing the trumpet blasts from various parts of the city.

17 The deep distress was "because they have sinned against the LORD." The judgment the people would experience would cause them to stagger and stumble like the blind (cf. Dt 28:29). In addition, their life and entrails would be spilled out like dust and refuse, to be trampled underfoot by their enemy. God was against them.

18 To emphasize their desperate plight, the prophet warned the people that they could not buy their way out. Neither silver nor gold would protect them from the wrath of the Lord. This section closes with the universal terminology—"all who live in the earth."

2:1–2 Verse 1 opens with the invitation to "gather together" (GK 8006) in repentance and includes a derogatory note: "shameful nation." The "appointed time" refers to the Day of the Lord, the time of his giving vent to his holy wrath. This gathering together must take place before the judgment if it is to be averted. The reference to "chaff" indicates that the wicked nation would be scattered before the fierce anger of the Lord, as chaff is scattered before the wind.

3 Repentance must be manifested in works: seeking the Lord and doing what he commands. The "humble" must "seek the LORD," defined as seeking "righteousness" and "humility." Only the "humble of the land" are exhorted because nothing can be done with the rest. "Seeking the LORD" is essential to escape from judgment, but even with this the prophet said only, "Perhaps you will be sheltered" from the Lord's anger.

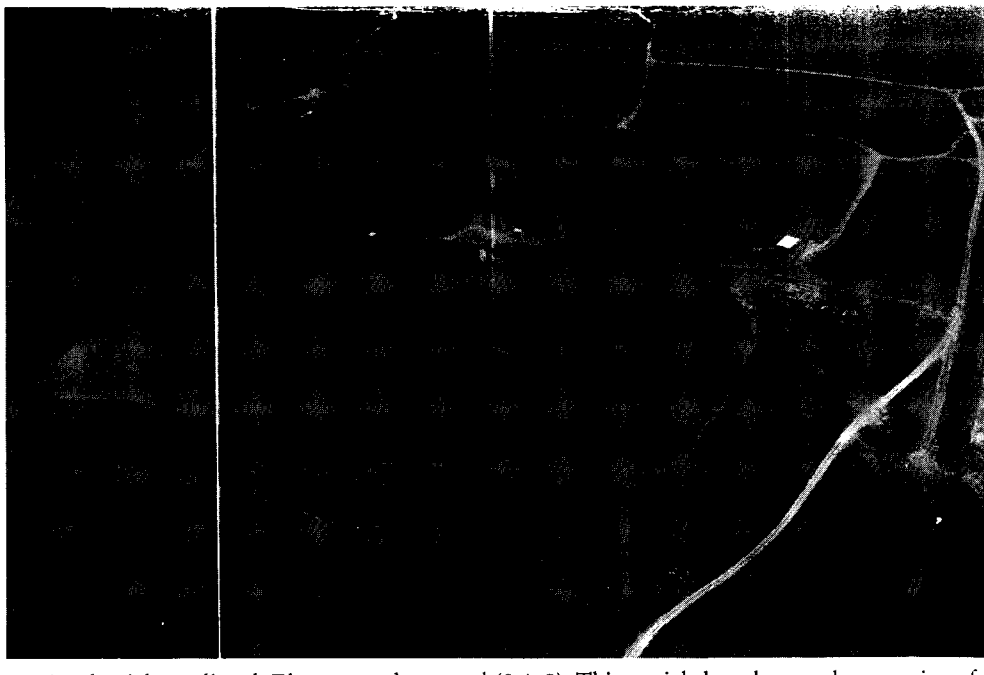
B. Against Gentiles (2:4–15)

1. Philistia (2:4–7)

4 The four cities—Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron—represented the entire area of Philistia. Gaza and Ashkelon are summarily dismissed in judgment by a typical Hebrew synonymous couplet. Ashdod and Ekron are to be uprooted and emptied at midday—unusual since this hottest time is used for a siesta in the Orient. Undoubtedly the point being made is that judgment will fall on them when they least expect it.

5 "Kerethite" is a term used of the Philistines, perhaps originally of one branch of them (cf. Eze 25:16). David's bodyguard was made up of Kerethites and Pelethites (2Sa 8:18), usually considered two branches of the Philistines.

6–7 The once heavily settled seacoast of the Philistines would become a desolate place for shepherds and sheep pens. The lowly shepherd would be able to find a place for his sheep to graze where there was no sowing or reaping and where no civilization flourished. Eventually, however, it would be inhabited by the remnant of Judah. A note of hope for Judah is sounded in v.7. They will occupy the sites of their former enemy, the Philistines.



As Zephaniah predicted, Ekron was destroyed (2:4–5). This aerial shot shows what remains of this town—a huge fifty-acre site. Completely surrounding it can be seen the remnants of the wall. Courtesy Ilan Sztulman of the Tel Miqne-Ekron Excavations, 1988.

2. Moab and Ammon (2:8–11)

8 The encounter with Philistines dates back to the time of the patriarchs (Ge 20–21; 26). The confrontation with Moab goes back to the time of Moses (Nu 22–24). Conflicts with Ammon appear in Jdg 10:6–11:33; 2Sa 10:1–11:1; and Ne 2:10, 19; 4:3, 7. Because of the fall of the northern kingdom and the decline of the southern kingdom, the pride of the nations east of Israel increased greatly. They showed their enmity toward God's people on every opportunity. The insults and taunts mentioned here probably refer to the hostility assumed at various times and not to just one particular episode.

9 The comparison of Moab and Ammon to Sodom and Gomorrah is not surprising in view of their origin from Lots' daughters (Ge 19:30–38). "Weeds" and "salt pits" reflect desolation and sterility. To this day many rock-strewn ruins of ancient Moab and Ammon bear mute testimony to the truth of the prophet's words: "a wasteland forever." Only a remnant of God's people would be needed to plunder these ancient enemies, and only the survivors of Israel would inherit the ancient sites of Moab and Ammon.

10 "Pride" (GK 1454) is cited as the sin that led Moab and Ammon to insult and mock God's people (cf. Isa 16:6 and Jer 48:26, both of which refer to the pride of Moab).

11 The Lord destroys the gods by destroying the nations that depend on these gods; these deities have no real existence apart from the people who serve them (1Co 8:4–6). By revealing the unreal nature of these gods, he brings the nations to acknowledge him as the one true God.

3. Cush (2:12)

12 Having foretold God's judgment on nations east and west of Judah, Zephaniah next directs attention to nations south and north: Cush and Assyria. The "too" indicates that the Lord would bring Cush to an end just as he would Moab and Ammon.

Cush was located in the upper Nile region. Since Egypt had been under the rule of Cushite kings for years, the prophet's words probably included Egypt as well. Nebuchadnezzar was the Lord's sword that killed the Cushites: "I will strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon and put my sword in his hand" (Eze 30:24–25).

4. Assyria (2:13–15)

13 The prophecies against surrounding nations climax with Assyria, the strongest political factor and the most northerly nation of that time. The prediction of Nineveh's utter desolation while that Assyrian capital ruled the world testifies to the divine origin of Zephaniah's message. The prediction that God would leave Nineveh "dry as the desert" is remarkable in view of the fame of the city's great irrigation system.

14 Instead of marching armies and a prosperous population, the prophet predicted that flocks of sheep and goats and all kinds of creatures would be found at Nineveh. The renowned city would become fit only for herds and wild animals. The "owls" are depicted in another picture of desolation (Isa 34:11; cf. Ps 102:6). Nineveh's magnificent buildings, tumbled into debris, would become dwelling places for various creatures. Only doleful sounds would emerge from the doorways.

15 The city—complacent and carefree at the time of Zephaniah's prediction—would become a lair for wild beasts and an object of contempt for every passerby. She boasted in her self-sufficiency. But the inspired prophet predicted that she would become a ruin and a habitat for the creatures of the fields (cf. Isa 47:8; Rev 3:17).

C. Against Jerusalem (3:1–8)

1 After the series of predicted judgments against various surrounding nations, the prophet again focuses on Jerusalem and Judah. The guilty city harbored oppressors, rebels, and defiled people. These people often washed themselves with water and observed other ceremonies of external sanctity, outwardly appearing to be pure.

2 The continuing indictment of Jerusalem contains three specific charges: (1) she obeyed no one—not even the Lord; (2) she did not trust in the Lord; and (3) she did not draw near to her God, who was the one who could provide direction and guidance for her.

3–4 Four classes of leaders represent the total leadership of the whole people. (1) "Officials" (GK 8569) were possibly the royal leaders who should have been characterized by justice and equity rather than by greed and avarice. (2) "Rulers" (GK 9149) also represented those in places of leadership, probably civil magistrates, who should have set an example for the rest of the people; instead, they are tagged as predatory and ravenous beasts. (3) "Her prophets" (GK 5566) are described as "arrogant" and "treacherous." The latter means "unfaithful," for they were unfaithful to the one they claimed to represent. (4) "Her priests" (GK 3913) represents the other religious leaders; they were profaning the sanctuary and violating the law. Their ordained function was to interpret the law and officiate at the sanctuary with reverence; they had done just the opposite.

5 In contrast to her misleading leaders "within her," the Lord in Israel's midst was a "righteous" standard against which the people were measured. His holy and righteous presence demanded judgment for sin and corruption. He is never implicated with iniquity—"he does no wrong." Moreover, he continuously—"morning by morning"—manifested his justice and righteousness before the people in his treatment of both Israel and the surrounding nations. Despite all this, the people were so calloused that they recognized no wickedness or felt no shame for what they had done.

6–7 As an object lesson, God reminded his people what he did to other nations. In view of these judgments, the Lord spoke imploringly to his people, declaring that judgment and punishment could have been averted and avoided. But trapped in the grip of sin, the people "were still eager to act corruptly."

8 "Therefore" anticipates a promise to pour out deserved judgment on the wicked people. Instead, the punishment was veiled; they were admonished to "wait [GK 2675] for me." The Lord promised "to pour out [his] wrath on them [the assembled nations]—all [his] fierce anger." He continued in strong language: "The whole world will be consumed by the fire of my jealous anger." This portrays a scene of great prophetic significance. The Lord had determined to gather the nations and kingdoms to pour out on them in great judgment his "wrath" and "fierce anger" and to consume them with "the fire of [his] jealous anger."

III. Day of Joy (3:9–20)

After the judgment thus described, the Lord will turn to himself a people of "purified lip" and united heart ("shoulder to shoulder"). The following verses describe the promises of blessing and restoration for God's people and the nations.

A. Return of a Scattered People (3:9–10)

9 The scattered people who return will bring offerings and experience purification. They will together call on the name of the Lord and worship and serve him. Before the scattering of the people at the tower of Babel, the world was unified by one language; but it was a world of rebellious people. In contrast, the new purified language will characterize a responsive people. The lips or language that had become impure through use in idol worship will become purified so that all may in unison call on the name of the Lord. To "call on the name of the LORD" is to turn to the Lord out of a sense of need. This kind of language may refer to the pre-Flood period (cf. Ge 4:26).

10 Cush, the southern extremity of the known world, represented the southern limits of the judgments. "The rivers" presumably indicates the Blue and the White branches of the Nile.

B. Restoration of a Sinful People (3:11–13)

11 "That day" refers to the time when Israel will be gathered together from the dispersion, as the Daughter of Zion (cf. v.14). They will not be put to shame because the very source of pride and haughtiness will be abolished: intolerable attitudes on "God's holy hill." Mount Zion is made holy by the presence of God.

12–13 Instead of the haughty, there will be the meek and humble, those "who trust in the name of the LORD." Their confidence and strength is derived from God himself. Further description of this remnant of Israel presents them as free from all deception, duplicity, and deceit, a probable allusion to their former idolatry. Thus they are fit to experience physical prosperity.

C. Rejoicing of a Saved People (3:14–20)

The messianic era is described vividly in this concluding passage. It will be a time of great joy; the Lord will be in the midst of his people. Fear and sorrow will be removed, and the Lord will restore their fortunes. It will be a time for singing and rejoicing.

14–15 An exhortation to "sing" and "rejoice" begins the conclusion to the prophet's message. "Daughter of Zion" refers here to the reassembled remnant of Israel; "Daughter of Jerusalem" is a parallel expression. In typical hymnic style the prophet follows the call to praise with the cause for praise: "The LORD has taken away your punishment . . . turned back your enemy. . . . [He] is with you; never again will you fear any harm."

16–17 In that wonderful messianic day, the remnant's hands will not "hang limp" because there will be no despair that slack hands symbolize. Since the Lord "is with" (lit., "in the midst of") his people, they need no longer be in fear; he is a "hero" who delivers or saves. The prophet continues his description of this saving God as one who "will take great delight in you" and "rejoice over you with singing."

18–19 The scattering of the people in judgment brought on sorrows as they yearned for the old assembly experiences at the appointed feasts, the festive meetings (cf. La 2:6). The Lord promises "at that time" to deal with all who oppressed Israel (cf. Isa 60:14). The pathetic condition of God's people is reflected in the references to the "lame" and "scattered." Undoubtedly these references apply to all in the Dispersion; all will be regathered and restored. But that is not the end of the story; also they will enjoy receiving praise and honor—even from the lands where they had been put to shame.

20 With a slight change in wording, the Lord repeats the promise just made, giving emphasis to it. It is supplemented with "when I restore your fortunes [cf. 2:7] before your very eyes." The work of redemption, as well as judgment, belongs to the Lord. He will accomplish his purposes with his people. This promise is the basis of their hope and joy.

Haggai

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

Everything in this brief prophecy hangs on this one imperative—build God's house (1:8)! The setting reflects much of the history of Israel—the days of the tabernacle, the beginning of the monarchy under Samuel, David's desire to build a dwelling for God, Solomon's building the temple, its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar, and the returning exiles who began to rebuild the temple in Jerusalem in 538 B.C. More immediately the setting of 1:8 begins with the rise of Cyrus.

In 559 B.C., Cyrus was only the king of An-shan, a district in Elam. He joined with Nabonidus, a weak successor of Nebuchadnezzar, to conquer Ecbatana, the capital of Media, in 550. Cyrus broke with Nabonidus and turned against him to capture Babylon in 539. Nabonidus had lost support because of his disinterest in Marduk and other traditional Babylonian deities. He failed also in his effort to secure Egyptian help against Cyrus. On the other hand, Cyrus, respectful of all deities, was probably welcomed to Babylon by the priests of the religion so unpopular with Nabonidus.

Nabonidus, the fourth king after the death of Nebuchadnezzar in 562 B.C., himself died in 539, after a seven-year reign. Belshazzar, his son, had evidently been coregent; but in fulfillment of Da 5:25–28, he too died. Cyrus, who had been king of Media and Persia since 549, now brought Babylon under his control. In the following year he made his famous edict (see Ezr 1:2–4; 6:3b–5), allowing all peoples to return to their native lands. The peaceful surrender of Babylon is recorded in both the so-called Nabonidus Chronicle and the Cyrus Cylinder. Ezr 5:13–14 describes the effect of Cyrus's decree on God's people.

According to Ezr 5:16, the foundations of the temple were laid by Sheshbazzar and his company, and Ezr 3:2 tells how the leaders built the altar and began sacrificing burnt offerings. Obviously, however, the work was not completed eighteen years later. Otherwise Haggai would not have preached his sermons.

Why did the enthusiasm of God's people wane? For one thing, during the seventy years in Babylon, most of the exiles had come to consider it their home (cf. Jer 29:5–7). Further, some may have been doing so well financially that they were reluctant to return to Jerusalem and face the dangers involved in rebuilding the temple. Those who did return in 538 B.C. were probably the poorer ones who had nothing to lose in such a venture.

The reconstruction project may have faltered also because of the unstable political situation that followed the death of Cyrus in 529 B.C. Cambyses came to the throne and reigned for seven years. His major accomplishment was bringing Egypt under Persian control. The passage of his armies through the land of Israel may have worked a hardship on the native population. Demands for food, water, clothing, and shelter may have greatly diminished the meager resources of a people engaged in a building project well beyond their means.

When Cambyses died in 522, there were several contestants for the throne; and one of them actually ruled for two months. He was the Pseudo-Smerdis, the real brother of Cambyses. In any event, Darius I, or Darius the Great, the son of a general named Hystaspes, became king and ruled until 486. He is the Darius of the book of Haggai. With him came the stability the Jews thought necessary for continuing the work on the temple. Even then it was the second year of his reign before Haggai appeared on the scene to stir them to action.

The biggest problem the returned exiles faced was the opposition from the Samaritans and others who lived in the land (cf. Ezr 4). At first the "enemies" offered to help build the temple, claiming that they had been sacrificing to God since the time of Esarhaddon, the Assyrian king whose policy of exchanging populations had brought them there. But Zerubbabel, Joshua ("Jeshua" in Ezra), and the other leaders declined the offer and insisted on doing the work themselves. This antagonized those who had offered to help, and they continued to hinder the reconstruction project. They even secured temporary restraining orders and frustrated the plans of the faithful Jews throughout the reign of Cyrus and down to the reign of Darius (Ezr 4:5). At this point Haggai and Zechariah, who prophesied to the Jews in Judah and Jerusalem in the name of the God of Israel (Ezr 5:1), came on the scene.

2. Authorship

Haggai is unknown to us apart from his short book, the two isolated occurrences of his name in Ezra (5:1; 6:14), and an allusion in Zec 8:9. The word "Haggai" seems to be an adjective from the Hebrew word for "feast," and therefore the prophet's name may mean "festal." If the "i" ("y" in Hebrew) on the end suggests a shortened form of the name "Yahweh" (translated as "the LORD"), the prophet's name would mean "Feast of Yahweh."

If 2:3 indicates that Haggai saw Solomon's temple before it was destroyed, then he must have been at least seventy years old at the time of his prophecy. Since he was usually linked with Zechariah, and since his name comes first, Haggai was probably the older of the two. It is likely that he had returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel eighteen years earlier (in 538).

The lists of returnees in the opening chapters of Ezra do not mention Haggai; and we know nothing of his ancestry. Nor is there any information about his occupation other than that he was a prophet. The brief record of his ministry shows him as a man of conviction. Unique among the prophets, he was listened to, and his words were obeyed. In a mere four years the temple was complete.

3. Date and Place of Origin

Haggai dates his prophecies with precision. Four specific dates are mentioned (cf. 1:1, 15; 2:1, 10, 20), ranging from August 29 to December 18, 520 B.C. Thus the ministry of Haggai lasted less than four months. He obviously wrote in Jerusalem. His book refers to the house of God (the temple in Jerusalem). The command to go to the nearby mountains to fetch wood for the construction of the temple clearly implies this setting (1:8). Since neither Babylonia nor the adjoining part of Assyria has mountains, these references must be understood as the mountains of Judea.

4. Occasion and Purpose

Depending on how one calculates them, the seventy years of captivity may or may not have been over in 520 B.C. The exile connected with the final destruction of Jerusalem was in 586 B.C. (2Ki 25:8–11). Seventy years from that date would have been 516 B.C. Perhaps Haggai saw that date fast approaching and went to work to convince the people to get on with rebuilding the temple.

The constant oppression of hostile neighbors must have had a debilitating effect on the outlook of those trying to build for God. Against these odds and in the midst of this despair, Haggai chided the people to resume the task enthusiastically taken up so many years ago and subsequently dropped. His message was simply, "Build God's house." To support his case he contended that recent crop failures (1:9) and drought (1:10–11) were God's way of reminding them of their dependence on him.

Another of Haggai's purposes was to remind the people of spiritual priorities: they were God's kingdom on earth, the only witnesses to divine truth. If they proved faithless, it would damage God's reputation. Haggai kept before them the fact that they were God's representatives in the world.

5. Theological Values

Central to Haggai's theology was the temple. In his time it was more significant than the palace, and his dealings were more with priests than with princes. The temple and Mount Zion on which it sat represented God's dwelling on earth. Its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar amounted to the ultimate blasphemy. The only way to rectify this situation was to rebuild the temple.

Coupled with this concern for spiritual matters is Haggai's criticism of personal wealth and comfort. The people had finished building their own houses but had let the program of reconstruction on God's house lapse. Haggai was convinced that if the people expressed sincere devotion and obedient service to the Lord, the Lord would in turn bless them with better crops (see 2:10–19).

Of theological importance is the prophecy in 2:9. While this verse is nowhere quoted in the NT, most interpreters take it as a reference to the advent of the Messiah. The second temple was less sumptuous than Solomon's; but because it was to become the scene of some of Christ's ministry, it would actually have a greater glory than the first temple. The peace promised by the Lord in this prophecy would ultimately come through Christ.

EXPOSITION

I. A Call to Build the House of God (1:1–11)

1. Introduction (1:1–3)

1–3 These three verses introduce the book of Haggai, date the first oracle, and identify the addressees. The second year of King Darius was 520 B.C. The sixth month was Elul, and the first day of that month would be August 29, by modern reckoning.

The first message is addressed to "Zerubbabel son of Shealtiel" and "Joshua son of Jehozadak." This is the Zerubbabel who led the exiles back to Judea; he was the grandson of Jehoiachin (Jeconiah in Mt 1:12). Zerubbabel was, then, an heir to the Davidic throne; and it is understandable that the magnanimous Cyrus and Darius should allow such a man to be the governor of the province of Judea.

"Joshua son of Jehozadak" is spelled "Jeshua son of Jozadak" in Ezr 3:2, 8, et al. Apparently he was a direct descendant of Aaron the Levite, the first high priest. Joshua was then the high priest, the holder of the highest office in the religious hierarchy.

The actual message of Haggai begins with a quotation. The people were claiming that the time had not yet come for the Lord's house to be built. Exactly what lay behind this remark is not certain. Perhaps they thought that the seventy years of predicted captivity were not yet up and that they would be out of God's will if they built the temple before those years were past. If they counted the captivity from 586 B.C., then only sixty-six years had passed. If, however, they counted from 605 B.C. (the first invasion of Nebuchadnezzar), then the time was well past.

A second explanation relates to the opposition of the local population, mostly Samaritans. Perhaps the returnees were saying that it was better to wait for more favorable times. In response to this, Haggai would have to say that the time is rarely just right to build the house of God—i.e., to do God's work. We can never expect the cooperation of the enemy in a truly spiritual task. Verse 3 is the introductory formula to Haggai's response to the people's claim that he had just quoted.

2. Ordering Priorities (1:4–11)

4 A rhetorical question opens Haggai's first sermon. A spiritual man might have answered, "No, it is not right that we live in paneled houses, while this house remains a ruin." But the people had put their own comfort before the building of the temple.

The word translated "paneled" (GK 6211) raises some questions. It apparently refers to an overlay of some kind, in some cases definitely wood. But it may be plaster (cf. KJV). It refers to an added measure of comfort the people thought they could not afford for the house of God.

5–7 The Hebrew idiom "put your heart on your roads" is aptly phrased by NIV's "Give careful thought to your ways." Verse 6 is a biting accusation that may reflect a drought and consequent famine conditions. Haggai broke into a kind of synonymous parallel poetry at this verse. The five pairs say essentially the same thing—all your effort is in vain.

(1) Pictured first is a lean harvest. It is a vicious cycle if from the precious little harvest of one year one feels obligated to save even more of it for next year's seed. Then if that next year is unproductive, the loss is even greater. Such was the desperate situation of these returned exiles.

(2) The next picture is of a person suffering from some disease where quantities of food fail to satisfy his needs. His metabolism somehow does not allow the food to be properly digested and turned into a healthy and strong body.

(3) The wine was so watery that it failed to provide the satisfaction and stimulus it ordinarily should. "Fill" (GK 8910) usually means inebriation. These people were unable to drown their sorrows because of the inadequate vintage.

(4) Their clothes were not sufficiently heavy to keep out the winter's damp chill (cf. Isa 28:20).

(5) Somehow the people's income failed to meet their expenses; money seemed to disappear through holes in their pockets. It is possible that inflation was working against solvency, as in our day.

All these figures speak of the hardship that befalls people who have not included the Lord in their plans and who are preoccupied with their own interests.

8 The first positive part of Haggai's initial message begins with three imperatives: "Go up . . . bring down . . . and build." The original temple was built with cedars from Lebanon (1Ki 5:5–6). It is uncertain whether this verse refers to the mountains far to the north or the lower but rugged hills around Jerusalem. The limited financial resources of the people would point to the more modest forests of the nearby hills. The reference to wood rather than stones may further indicate that only the interior work was left to be done.The two reasons the Lord gives for the people to obey and build the temple are that he may have pleasure and be honored in it. Proof of the people's devotion will come as they actually put their faith to work and finish the Lord's temple.

9 Agricultural and economic disaster result from God's withdrawal of his blessing because of the people's failure to do first of all what pleased him. The reference to God's blowing away what they brought home probably suggests that in the harvest was much chaff. The kernels or grains of wheat were so insubstantial that they simply disappeared with the chaff in the winnowing process. The harvest was poor because each man was busy with his own house, and no one cared for the house of God.

10–11 The first message of the prophet concludes pursuing the theme of economic catastrophe as the price for unfaithfulness in regard to building God's house. First, the heavens withheld their dew, and consequently the earth withheld its crops. Though ordinarily receiving more dew than the fields, even the mountains were denied it. Thus also the vineyards and olive orchards would be affected. Grain that supplied the staple bread, grapes that provided the basic beverage, and oil used for a number of things would all be in short supply. What a tragedy to have these three basic crops fail!

II. The People's Positive Response (1:12–15)

12 This verse records the positive reaction of the two leaders and the people to Haggai's initial sermon—they "obeyed" (GK 9048) and "feared" (GK 3707). The reason for this wholesome response was that the Lord had sent Haggai. Exactly what Haggai did to authenticate his message is unknown. Some charisma or ring of authority must have prompted this obedience and fear. A people who had been driven to their knees by the days of drought and famine would be all the more receptive to a word from God.

13–15 Haggai is named the "messenger" (GK 4855), and he brought this brief message from the Lord: "I am with you." These words were comforting and encouraging to a people oppressed by enemies and depressed by failing crops. By his divine aid this poor rabble could reconstruct a magnificent temple, repulse their enemies, seek and receive aid from an unbelieving monarch, and see dry ground bring forth food. Verse 14 records the results of that brief but strong reassurance. The Lord stirred the spirits of the two leaders (Zerubbabel and Joshua) and of the people, and they began to work on the temple. The date indicates that hardly three weeks had passed from Haggai's initial sermon to the people's obedience to his orders.

III. The Promised Glory of the New House (2:1–9)

1. Encouragement to Zerubbabel (2:1–5)

1–2 The twenty-first day of Tishri would correspond to October 17. This, the third date-formula of the book, marks the beginning of the second major oracle. The addressees are Zerubbabel, Joshua, and the "remnant of the people." "Remnant" (GK 8642) here means the population with the two leaders.

3–5 Verse 3 consists of three rhetorical questions. Some present may have been able to answer yes to the first question. They had seen the temple of Solomon in their childhood. They would have to be at least seventy years old because that temple was destroyed in 586 B.C., and Haggai was speaking some sixty-six years later (520 B.C.).

The next question addressed those who might have remembered Jerusalem before Nebuchadnezzar destroyed it. Their response may have been: "Although it certainly does not compare in opulence, it is the temple of the Lord, and we are happy to see it being built." There was no way these relatively poor exiles could have matched the extravagances of Solomon with his professional craftsmen working with imported woods and huge quantities of gold.

The third question virtually puts the discouraging sentiments into the mouths of the audience. They were all thinking it, and now Haggai says it. The new is inferior to the old, and that fact, along with the other discouraging circumstances, had thoroughly depressed the people and stifled their initiative.

Having brought the very problem of discouragement into focus, Haggai next offered the divine antidote: "Be strong . . . be strong . . . be strong . . . and work. For I am with you." The problem was essentially one of attitude. So the primary command was to take courage. When the people did that, the command to "work" would be fulfilled quite naturally. The most uplifting thing they could hear was that God was with them.

The message continues with a reminder that this is what God had covenanted with the people (v.5). After the reminder, the prophet gave the people a promise and a command: God's Spirit would remain with them, and "Do not fear." Undoubtedly fear gripped many returnees—fear that God had written an eternal "Ichabod" over Jerusalem, fear that no amount of praying or piety would induce him to bless them again, fear that the whole endeavor was in vain, fear that the political enemies would in fact win, fear that all was lost. Therefore the words of God through Haggai must have been a great source of strength and comfort.

2. The Glorious New House (2:6–9)

6–9 Verse 6 is the only verse in Haggai quoted in the NT (see Heb 12:26, 28–29); the author of Hebrews has made some interpretive comments on this verse. The first "shaking" took place at Mount Sinai, when God gave the law to Moses (Ex 19:16); the second shaking will come at the end of the world. But we who are in Christ have an unshakable kingdom. The expression "a little while" (GK 5071) could mean anything from days to millennia (cf. Ps 2:12, where the same word occurs in a similar context).

"The desire of all nations" is beautifully messianic, though most modern translations do not support it. The problem centers on the words "the desired . . . will come." In Hebrew "desired" (GK 2775) is singular and "will come" is plural. Those who read "desired" as plural do not take the verse messianically but say that the "desired things" are the wealth of other nations brought to Jerusalem. They do not see the "desired one" as the Messiah. The reference to "glory" (GK 3883), however, tilts the interpretation toward a personal reference to the Messiah (cf. Isa 40:5; 60:1; Lk 2:32). But were the Gentile nations desiring him? Certainly the Gentiles who receive Christ as Savior view him as desirable. Can that, however, be said of them before their salvation? Despite this and other problems, a messianic view should not be wholly dismissed.

God's claim that "the silver" and "the gold" are his may be a response to the fears of the people—they were economically destitute. The drought and consequent famine had forced them to dip deeply into their meager resources. Subsequently they found no funds for the temple project. To a people discouraged because the temple they were building was so inferior to the one the Babylonians had destroyed, God promised that the glory of the present house would be greater than the glory of the former house. Certainly it would be a different kind of glory, for there was no way that the actual building was grander. The second temple was to be honored by the presence of Christ, a divine presence quite different from the Shekinah of the OT (see comments on Ex 24:15–17).

The second promise is that God will grant peace to the place. In fact, there have been few periods of enduring political peace in Palestine from this time on. But since Christ is the Prince of Peace (Isa 9:6), this too is probably a reference to his work and ministry (Mt 12:6; Ro 5:1). These people were plagued by enemies without and discouragement within. The promise of peace, which they thought of first in political terms, was a comforting one indeed!

IV. Blessings on a Defiled People (2:10–19)

1. The Past Defilement (2:10–14)

10–12 Haggai's third sermon came two months after the second: December 18, 520 B.C. The prophet asked, on behalf of the Lord, the priests a question about the law. Verse 11 introduces a hypothetical problem; v.12 states the question, which concerns second-degree contact of sacred meat with other food via the fold of a garment in which the meat is carried. The law spoke of the newly anointed altar's power to sanctify whatever touches it (Ex 29:37; cf. Mt 23:19). Leviticus 6:27 declares that the meat of the sin offering has the same power of contagiousness. The question Haggai posed is whether this holiness could be twice transmitted. Does the consecrated meat consecrate the garment? Can the garment in turn consecrate other foods such as bread, broth, wine, and oil?

The priests did not believe that such consecration could be so passed on. Holiness is not catching. This is the answer Haggai wanted, because he wished to show the people that it is easier to fall into sin than it is to fall into righteousness.

13–14 The question here is not, Is holiness infectious? but, Is defilement infectious? Leviticus 22:4–6 supplies the background: Uncleanness is contagious (cf. Nu 19:11–16). So the priests correctly answered in the affirmative to Haggai's question. The Lord declared, "So it is with this people and this nation."

The selfish attitude of putting personal comforts first had spread throughout the repatriated community. The people had encouraged one another to build their own houses and to wait for more propitious times to work on rebuilding God's house. When attitudes are wrong, nothing given to God is really acceptable. So whatever these people offered was defiled. From early times it was quite clear that God basically wanted hearts, not hands. He desired obedience rather than sacrifice.

2. The Future Blessing (2:15–19)

15–19 The third message of Haggai began with a twofold illustration: Is holiness or defilement contagious? Verse 15 begins the other half of the message, the required response of the audience. The building of the temple had begun twelve years earlier, but the prophet urged the people to review what the situation was before their initial response to his first message to get to work. This, then, is a promise passage. There has been a marked contrast between the past and the future. The turning point was the start of the rebuilding project.

In the days of their disobedience, lethargy, discouragement, and personal concern with selfish comforts, the people never had enough in the pantry or the barn to meet their needs. Instead, a person came to a silo or shed where he thought there was a pile of at least twenty "measures," but he found only ten. The same was true of the wine vat (v.16). These disastrous harvests and disappointing crops were the ways God was reminding his people of their duty to him.

"From this day on" means the date of Haggai's third message (cf. v.10). The mention of laying the foundation, however, poses a problem. First, Ezr 3:6, 10; 5:16 records that the foundation was laid about 537 B.C. Second, 1:1–15 indicates that the building was resumed three months earlier. Thus v.18 might be paraphrased: "From this day onward, the eighteenth of December, start thinking about how things have been for the last sixteen or eighteen years." Their resumption of work on the temple was the turning point; Haggai calls attention to the marked difference in the productivity of the land and the general blessing of God on the people's efforts.

Verse 19 focuses again on the barren years that had preceded their resumption of the temple (cf. v.16), evidently attributing them to God's punishment for the people's unconcern with the temple. There was, of course, no seed in the barn. The returned exiles were on the brink of agricultural disaster.

The very end of this little sermon contains this promise: "From this day on I will bless you." In the past it was touch and go. While the people were putting themselves first, they suffered the agonies of drought and famine. But when they put the Lord first, they began to enjoy his blessing. This was merely one way God chose to remind the people of his sovereignty over them. He who was concerned with the temple was also in control of the rain.

V. Zerubbabel, the Lord's Signet Ring (2:20–23)

20–23 The fourth oracle came on the same day as the preceding message. The words are directed to Zerubbabel alone. Haggai's apocalyptic language points to a day in the distant future. God promises to overthrow and destroy Gentile dominions. The description is in familiar terms. Because of the cosmic language, many interpreters link these predictions to the final overthrow of all unregenerate nations at the end of the age, at the second coming of Christ.

God's promise is expanded in v.23 to include Zerubbabel. Notice that he was called "my servant" (GK 6269). This was Isaiah's favorite designation of the Messiah (Isa 41:8; 42:1; 49:5–6; 50:10; 52:13; 53:11). Also, "chosen" (GK 1047) recalls references to the chosen people and the chosen One from among those people (cf. 1Ki 11:13; 1Ch 28:4; Ne 9:7; et al.). This promise to Zerubbabel must be understood messianically, for the Persians simply would not tolerate a man laying claim to the promises here stated. Zerubbabel was no more the Messiah than Moses, Joshua, David, Solomon, or Isaiah. But Zerubbabel was in the genealogy of Christ (cf. Mt 1:12–13) and pointed forward to him.

The mention of "signet ring" (GK 2597) deserves special attention. In ancient times the signet ring corresponded to the crown, the throne, or the scepter. Ahab, the wicked king of Israel, had one that his even more wicked wife Jezebel used to seal a letter, framing the innocent Naboth (1Ki 21:8). Darius used such a ring to seal the decree concerning the lions' den (Da 6:17). And King Xerxes also used such a ring to seal his decrees (Est 8:8). This token of authority would be granted to Zerubbabel much as it had been taken away from Jehoiachin king of Judah (cf. Jer 22:24 [Coniah]; cf. Mt 1:11–12). So Zerubbabel represents the resumption of the messianic line interrupted by the Exile, which had been ushered in by the unfortunate reign of three of Josiah's sons.

So the book of Haggai, which began on such a discouraging and depressing note, ends on an uplifting and promising one. Haggai's first message was one of indictment; his last one is of a great and blessed future for the people of God. As we now know, that future was much further away than either Haggai or Zerubbabel thought. But in the mind of God, it is as close and certain as tomorrow's rising sun.

Zechariah

INTRODUCTION

1. Historical Background

Zechariah's prophetic ministry took place in the time of Israel's restoration from the Babylonian captivity, i.e., in the postexilic period. Approximately seventy-five years had elapsed since Habakkuk and Jeremiah had predicted the invasion of Judah by the Neo-Babylonian army of King Nebuchadnezzar. When their "hard service" (Isa 40:2) in Babylonia was completed, God influenced Cyrus, the Persian king, to allow the Hebrews to return to their homeland and rebuild their temple (Isa 44:28).

The historical circumstances and conditions Zechariah ministered under were, in general, those of Haggai's time, since their labors were contemporary (cf. 1:1 with Hag 1:1). In 520 B.C. Haggai preached four sermons in four months. Zechariah began his ministry two months after Haggai had begun his. Thus the immediate historical background for Zechariah's ministry began with Cyrus's capture of Babylon and included the completion of the restoration, or second, temple.

Babylon fell to Cyrus in 539 B.C. Cyrus then signed the edict that permitted Israel to return and rebuild her temple (2Ch 36:21–23; Ezr 1:1–4; 6:3–5). According to Ezr 2, a large group (about fifty thousand) did return in 538–537 B.C. under the civil leadership of Zerubbabel (the governor) and the religious leadership of Joshua (the high priest). This group completed the foundation of the temple early in 536 B.C. (Ezr 3:8–13). But several obstacles arose that slowed and finally halted the construction (Ezr 4:1–5, 24). During the years of inactivity, Cyrus died in battle (529 B.C.); and his son Cambyses II, who was coregent with Cyrus for one year, reigned in his place (530–522 B.C.).

Political rebellion ultimately brought Darius Hystaspes to the throne in 522 B.C. His wise administration and religious toleration created a favorable climate for the Israelites to complete the rebuilding of their temple. He confirmed the decree of Cyrus and authorized resumption of the work (Ezr 6:6–12; Hag 1:1–2). The construction was resumed in 520 B.C., and the temple was finished in 516 B.C. For additional events in the history of the period, see the historical background of Ezra, Daniel, and Haggai.

2. Author, Date, and Unity

Like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, Zechariah was not only a prophet but also a priest. He was born in Babylonia and was among those who returned to Palestine in 538–537 B.C. under the leadership of Zerubbabel and Joshua (cf. Iddo, grandfather of Zechariah, listed in Ne 12:4).

At a later time, when Joiakim was high priest, Zechariah apparently succeeded Iddo (Zec 1:1, 7) as head of that priestly family (Ne 12:10–16). Since it was the grandson (Zechariah) who in this instance succeeded the grandfather (Iddo), it has been conjectured that the father (Berekiah, Zec 1:1, 7) died at an early age, before he could succeed to family headship.

Though a contemporary of Haggai, Zechariah continued his ministry long after him (cf. Zec 1:1 and 7:1 with Hag 1:1; see also Ne 12:10–16). Considering his young age in the early period of his ministry (Zec 2:4, "young man"), it is possible that Zechariah continued into the reign of Artaxerxes I (465–424 B.C.).

Some scholars have challenged Zechariah's authorship of chs. 9–14. All their arguments, however, have satisfactory alternative explanations, and other scholars have argued persuasively for the structural unity of the entire book. So there is no convincing reason to question its unity and authenticity.

3. Occasion and Purpose

At the time of his prophesying and writing, Zechariah was clearly back in Palestine; and his ministry was to the returned exiles (Zec 4:8–10; 6:10, 14; 7:2–3, 9; cf. Ne 12:1, 12, 16). The occasion is the same as that of the book of Haggai. Approximately fifty thousand former exiles had arrived in Jerusalem and the nearby towns in 538–537 B.C., with high hopes of resettling the land and rebuilding the temple (Ezr 2). Their original zeal was evident; immediately they set up the altar of burnt offering (Ezr 3:1–6). They resumed worship and restored the sacrificial ritual that had been suspended during the seventy years in Babylonia. The people then laid the foundation of the temple in the second month of the second year (536 B.C.) of their return (Ezr 3:8–13). But their fervor and activity soon met with opposition in various forms (Ezr 4:1–5; Hag 1:6–11). So the reconstruction of the temple ground to a halt and did not begin again till 520 B.C. (Ezr 4:24).

The chief purpose of Zechariah (along with Haggai) was to rebuke the people and motivate and encourage them to complete the rebuilding of the temple (Zec 4:8–10; cf. Hag 1–2), though Zechariah was clearly interested in spiritual renewal as well. Also, the purpose of the eight night visions is explained in Zec 1:3, 5–6: The Lord asked Israel to return to him; then he would return to them, and his word would continue to be fulfilled.

4. Theological Values

Zechariah is probably the most Messianic, apocalyptic, and eschatological of all the OT books. The prophet predicted Christ's first coming in lowliness (6:12), his humanity (6:12), his rejection and betrayal for thirty pieces of silver (11:12–13), his being struck by the sword of the Lord (13:7), his deity (3:4; 13:7), his priesthood (6:13), his kingship (6:13; 9:9; 14:9, 16), his second coming in glory (14:4), his building of the Lord's temple (6:12–13), his reign (9:10; 14), and his establishment of enduring peace and prosperity (3:10; 9:9–10). These messianic passages give added significance to Jesus' words in Lk 24:25–27, 44.

As for the apocalyptic ("revelatory") and eschatological aspect, Zechariah predicted the final siege of Jerusalem (12:1–3; 14:1–2), the initial victory of Israel's enemies (14:2), the Lord's defense of Jerusalem (14:3–4), the judgment on the nations (12:9; 14:3), the topographical changes in Israel (14:4–5), the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles in the messianic kingdom age (14:16–19), and the ultimate holiness of Jerusalem and her people (14:20–21). God (through Zechariah) intended that the apocalyptic material (primarily 1:7–6:8), combined with the judgment and salvation (or deliverance) oracles (primarily chs. 9–14), should function as an encouragement to his people to complete the rebuilding of the temple. Yet the then-current local scene becomes the basis for contemplating the universal, eschatological picture.

The prophet's name itself has theological significance. It means "the LORD [Yahweh] remembers." "The LORD," the personal, covenant name of God, is a perpetual testimony to his faithfulness to his promises (see comment on Ex 3:14–15). He "remembers" his covenant promises and acts to fulfill them. In Zechariah, God's promised deliverance from Babylonian captivity, including a restored theocratic community and a functioning temple—the earthly seat of the divine Sovereign—leads into even grander pictures of the salvation and restoration to come through the Messiah.

Finally, the book as a whole teaches the sovereignty of God in history, over people and nations—past, present, and future.

EXPOSITION

Part I (chs. 1–8)

I. The Introduction to the Entire Book (1:1–6)

A. The Date and the Author's Name (1:1)

1 The eighth month of Darius's second year was October-November 520 B.C. (cf. Hag 1:1). While it is clear that one of Zechariah's (and Haggai's) purposes was to encourage the Israelites to rebuild the temple, it is equally clear that Zechariah was also vitally interested in spiritual renewal.

At the time of Israel's return from the Babylonian exile, she had no king of her own to date events by. So Zechariah's prophecy—as well as Haggai's—had to be dated by the reign of Darius, king of Persia and suzerain of Judah. Thus the dating by a pagan king expresses that this is part of "the times of the Gentiles" (Lk 21:24).

That the word of the Lord "came" to Zechariah is indicative of the vitality of the divine word in the OT. God's word not only "comes," it also "comes true," or is fulfilled.

Dates of Haggai and Zechariah

The dates of Zechariah's recorded messages are best correlated with those of Haggai and with other historical events. All dates are B.C.

1.	Haggai's first message (Ezr 5:1; Hag 1:1–11)	Aug. 29, 520
2.	Resumption of the building of the temple (Ezr 5:2; Hag 1:12–15). The rebuilding seems to have been hindered from 536 to c. 530 (Ezr 4:1–5), and the work ceased altogether from c. 530 to 520 (Ezr 4:24).	Sept. 21, 520
3.	Haggai's second message (Hag 2:1–9)	Oct. 17, 520
4.	Beginning of Zechariah's preaching (1:1–6)	Oct./Nov., 520
5.	Haggai's third message (Hag 2:10–19)	Dec. 18, 520
6.	Haggai's fourth message (Hag 2:20–23	Dec 18, 520
7.	Tattenai's letter to Darius concerning the rebuilding of the temple (Ezr 5:3–6:14). There must have been a lapse of time between the resumption of the building and Tattenai's appearance.	519–518
8.	Zechariah's eight night visions (Zec 1:7–6:8)	Feb. 15, 519
9.	Joshua crowned (Zec 6:9–15)	Feb. 16(?), 519
10.	Repentance urged, blessings promised (Zec 7–8)	Dec. 7, 518
11.	Dedication of the temple (Ezr 6:15–18)	Mar. 12, 516
12.	Zechariah's final prophecies (Zec 9–14)	After 480(?)

The recipient of the divine revelation is identified as "the prophet" Zechariah. A "prophet" (GK 5566) is one called by God to be his spokesman. This is one reason the prophets spoke with such authority. The three names in the complete patronymic formula (Zechariah, Berekiah, Iddo) mean "the LORD remembers," "the LORD blesses," and "timely (?)." The latter indicates perhaps "the set time" when the Lord remembers and blesses.

Iddo was among the priests who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel and Joshua (Ne 12:4, 16). Zechariah, who was born in exile, would have been quite young at the time of the return. Since Berekiah was his father, Zechariah was a "descendant" (i.e., "grandson," not "son" [GK 1201]) of Iddo (cf. Ezr 5:1 and 6:14). Like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, then, Zechariah was a priest before God called him to the prophetic office and ministry.

B. A Call to Repentance (1:2–6)

2–3 Because a holy and just God must deal with sin, Zechariah began his message by reminding his people of how angry their faithful, covenant God had been with the covenant-breaking sins of their unfaithful preexilic ancestors. Zechariah's hearers well knew that the Exile they had recently returned from was the direct result of God's wrath against their ancestors, and that the temple they were now rebuilding had been destroyed because of their sins. "Forefathers" is more literally "fathers"; but Semitic words for "father" (GK 3) can mean "grandfather," "forefather," or "ancestor."

The divine wrath is followed by the availability of divine grace. Repentance is one of the conditions for the personal experience of God's full blessing. Three times the call to repentance is said to be the authoritative declaration of "the LORD Almighty." Zechariah, then, came with the message and authority of Israel's divine King. As "the LORD Almighty," Israel's Lord is the controller of history who musters all the powers of heaven and earth to accomplish his will. The messianic King will also be a divine warrior or strong ruler (cf. "Mighty God" in Isa 9:6). If the people of Zechariah's day would only "return" (GK 8740) to the Lord or repent (i.e., change their course and go in the opposite direction from that of their forefathers), the Lord would return to them with a blessing instead of a curse. The emphasis is on personal relationship and allegiance.

4–6 "Forefathers" refers to the preexilic forefathers; and "earlier prophets" refers to the preexilic prophets who had warned of the approaching Babylonian exile—e.g., Isaiah, Habakkuk, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel.

"Evil ways" and "evil practices" stress the forefathers' wicked behavior in God's sight. In their failure to respond to the prophets, the people had not responded to God; for he is the one who had sent the prophets. The people had "mocked God's messengers, despised his words and scoffed at his prophets until the wrath of the LORD was aroused against his people and there was no remedy" (2Ch 36:16). Such brazen refusal to respond properly was the principal reason for the Fall of Jerusalem and the Babylonian exile.

Though the messengers may be gone, God's words live on to be fulfilled. These words are further defined as "decrees" (GK 2976)—the specific requirements of the law, including the threats and curses for breaking those laws. Although God's words were uttered by his servants the prophets, they were still his words. The designation "my servants" (GK 6269) is not demeaning, for it is a great privilege to serve the Lord, who is both Israel's King and the Sovereign of the universe.

In a bold personification God's words and decrees are pictured as "overtaking" (GK 5952) the disobedient forefathers. The question asked in v.6, of course, anticipates an affirmative reply. God's curse did, in fact, pursue and catch up with the wrongdoers, in direct fulfillment of Dt 28:15, 45. According to Dt 28:2, blessings too can "overtake." The choice is up to the subjects of the kingdom.

"Then they repented" (or "came to themselves," "changed their minds"; GK 8740) apparently refers to what happened to the preexilic forefathers and/or to their offspring during the Exile and immediately afterward (cf. Ezr 9–10; Da 9:1–19). They had to acknowledge that they had brought the divine discipline of the Exile on themselves because they had refused to "listen," or "pay attention," to the Lord. They also had to acknowledge that the Lord was just and righteous in his judgment, for he had done to them what their ways and practices deserved, all in accord with what he had "determined to do" (cf. La 2:17). The result was forgiveness and restoration, likewise in accord with his promise (cf. Dt 30:1–3; Isa 55:6–7; Jer 3:12; Joel 2:12–13).

II. A Series of Eight Night Visions (1:7–6:8)

A. The First Vision: The Horseman Among the Myrtle Trees (1:7–17)

7 In a series of eight apocalyptic visions on a single night, God revealed his purpose for the future of Israel—Judah and Jerusalem in particular, since Jerusalem was the seat of the Davidic dynasty and the place of the Lord's throne, i.e., the temple. As an encouragement to the people to persevere in the work of rebuilding the temple, God disclosed to them through his prophet his gracious purposes.

The setting is the time of Darius, and the date is February 15, 519 B.C., about three months after the call to repentance (cf. 1:1). On this same day five months earlier, the rebuilding of the temple had been resumed (cf. Hag 1:14–15). "The twenty-fourth day" was evidently a day in which God had special delight because of the obedience of his people.

8 The basic teaching of the first vision is that although God's covenant people are troubled while the oppressing nations are at ease, God is "jealous" (v.14) for his people and will restore them, their towns, and the temple. The Hebrew for "I had a vision" (GK 8011) is simply "I saw." From this comes the word "seer," another name for a prophet.

The vision portrayed a man on a red horse, standing among myrtle trees in a ravine. The "man" is identified as "the angel of the LORD" (v.11). In Rev 6:4 the red horse (cf. Zec 6:2) is associated with a sword, the instrument of war and death, which may also be the significance of the color here.

In Ne 8:15 myrtle trees, which are evergreen, are associated with the Feast of Tabernacles for making booths; and in Isa 41:19 and 55:13 they are included in a description of messianic kingdom blessing. Perhaps they speak of the hope and promise of the future, the restoration from Babylonian exile being but the initial stage in the progressive fulfillment of that promise. The trees are situated in a ravine. At the foot of the Mount of Olives are myrtle groves in the lowest part of the Kidron Valley. The ravine may picture Judah's lowly condition at the time; but there is a ray of light or hope for the future. Behind the horseman were red, brown, and white horses—presumably with riders on them, since they report to the angel of the Lord in v.11. These other riders or horses apparently represent angelic messengers (cf. v.10). White horses are associated with vengeance and triumph (cf. Rev 19:11, 14).

9–11 After Zechariah respectfully ("my lord") inquired about the meaning of the vision, the interpreting angel indicated that he would explain the meaning. It was, however, the horseman among the myrtle trees who did the explaining. The explanation is that the other horsemen are angelic messengers sent by the Lord on missions throughout the earth. Such angels are part of the Lord's "hosts."

The horseman among the myrtle trees, now specifically identified as "the angel of the LORD," served mainly as the captain of the Lord's host (the other horsemen). Elsewhere he is identified often with the Lord himself (cf. Ge 16:11, 13; 18:1–2, 13, 17, 22; et al.). The other horsemen report to him that the whole world is at rest and in peace.

Such a description of the Persian Empire is confirmed by the inscription and bas-relief that Darius had incised on a rock at Behistun, above the highway connecting Ecbatana and Babylon. The bas-relief portrays the surrender of those who had rebelled against the king, while the inscription tells in Persian, Elamite, and Babylonian the story of the political unrest in Persia during the first two years of Darius's reign, praising his feats of valor. Darius boasted that in nineteen battles he had defeated nine rebel leaders and had subdued all his enemies. So the empire was again virtually quiet by 520 B.C. While the Persian Empire as a whole was secure and at ease by this time, the Israelites in Judah were oppressed and, of course, still under foreign domination.

12 The angel of the Lord was moved to intercede for the people of Judah. He desired the completion of the process of restoration, which required the reconstruction of the temple, Jerusalem, and the other towns of Judah. The report of the horsemen must have disappointed God's chosen people because it told of rest and peace among the nations, when, instead, they were expecting the "shaking of all nations" (Hag 2:6–9, 20–23) as the sign of returning favor and full blessing to Zion. Through intercession the angel of the Lord prayed that in the "mercy" of God this situation would be rectified. The experience of God's disciplining anger for seventy years had been first predicted by Jeremiah (25:11–12; 29:10). This period may be calculated from 605 B.C. (the time of the first deportation from the land) to about 536 or 535 (the time when the first returnees were settled back in the land), or from 586 (when the temple was destroyed) to 516 (when the temple was rebuilt). Either way, the point is that the people wondered why God was still angry with them when the appointed time of their punishment had expired (or was almost over).

13–15 Although it was the angel of the Lord who had interceded, the Lord's answer came directly to the interpreting angel and through him to Zechariah. The answer contained words that promised kindness (or "good things") and comfort.

Zechariah was told to proclaim to the people that the Lord was "very jealous" (GK 7861 & 7863) for Jerusalem. In OT usage jealousy is but the intolerance of rivalry or unfaithfulness. When applied to the Lord, it usually concerns Israel and carries with it the notions of the marriage or covenant relationship and the Lord's right to exclusive possession of Israel. In this context the key idea is that of God's vindicating Israel for the violations against her. Actually, jealousy is part of the vocabulary of love; through such language the Lord showed his love for Israel.

In contrast to the Lord's jealous love for his people, he was "very angry" (GK 7911 & 7912) with the nations that treated them so harshly. The nations that God used to discipline his people included Assyria and Babylonia. They are characterized as feeling "secure"—i.e., they were arrogantly (or carelessly) at ease. The full charge against the nations is that "they added to the calamity" of the divine discipline, not only by going too far and trying to annihilate the Jews, but also by prolonging the calamity.

16–17 Because God had a jealous love for Israel and a jealous anger against her enemies, the promises in these verses would be fulfilled. The Lord promised to return to Jerusalem with "mercy" (GK 8171). The assurance that the temple ("my house") would be rebuilt expresses the divine mercy. The "measuring line" is that of those who were to reconstruct Jerusalem in a program of expansion (cf. 2:1–5).

Verse 17 anticipates a time when the towns of Judah (also "my towns," says the Lord) will "overflow" (or "spread out"; GK 7046) with prosperity. Thus the Lord would again "comfort Zion and choose Jerusalem." The temple, as the Lord's house, and Jerusalem, as the Lord's elect city in which his house and earthly throne were located, are inseparably linked in these verses.

B. The Second Vision: The Four Horns and the Four Craftsmen (1:18–21)

18–19 The second and third visions build on the concept of the comfort promised by presenting the manner in which God will execute his great anger against the nations that afflicted Israel (second vision) and by guaranteeing the prosperity and expansion promised Israel (third vision). The four "horns" are identified as the nations (or their rulers) that attacked Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem to scatter their people. When used figuratively, "horn" (GK 7967) usually symbolizes strength—either strength in general or the strength of a country or its king.

The Targum translates "four horns" as "four kingdoms." The kingdoms are claimed by some to be the four world empires of Da 2 and 7 (see the introduction to Daniel). Others suggest Assyria, Egypt, Babylonia, and Medo-Persia. Since the reference is to nations that have already "scattered" God's people, the latter view seems preferable. God's people are referred to under the all-inclusive designation "Judah, Israel and Jerusalem," i.e., the whole nation. Jerusalem is mentioned because it was the capital of the united nation of Israel.

20 The four "craftsmen" have been interpreted in at least two ways: (1) those who hold that the four horns symbolize the world empires of Da 2 and 7 (see vv.18–19) maintain that the craftsmen represent Medo-Persia, Greece, Rome, and the Messiah, since they are the destroyers of the preceding world empires (see Da 2:34–35, 44–45); (2) others believe that the craftsmen denote the nations God used to overthrow Israel's past enemies—nations such as Egypt, Babylonia, Persia, and Greece, or perhaps Persia alone. In any event, it is clear in Scripture that all Israel's enemies—past, present, and potential—will ultimately be defeated.

21 The prophet's inquiry this time concerns the function of the horns and craftsmen. The answer given (apparently by the interpreting angel) is that the horns came to scatter the people of Judah and render them helpless and powerless. The horns that did this to Israel, Judah, and Jerusalem have, by the time of Zechariah's prophecy, already been conquered and absorbed into the Persian Empire. The craftsmen are to be identified, then, at the very least with the world empire of Persia—and possibly with a few other nations as well. Their function was to terrify and throw down the powers that, in arrogant defiance of God, went beyond all bounds in punishing and scattering God's covenant people. In v.15 the nations "feel secure"; now they are to be terrified and overthrown.

C. The Third Vision: The Surveyor (2:1–13)

1 The scope of the restoration and blessing promised in this vision is such that its fulfillment must extend beyond the historical restoration period to the messianic kingdom era. The persons connected with the introductory part of the vision are Zechariah, a surveyor, the interpreting angel, and an unidentified angel. The "measuring line" (GK 7742) is a symbol of preparation for rebuilding and restoring Jerusalem and the temple, ultimately in the messianic kingdom. The restoration of the people, the temple, and the city immediately after the Babylonian exile was only the first stage in the progressive fulfillment of the promises that follow.

2–4a When Zechariah asked the surveyor where he was going, he replied that he was intending to measure the width and length of Jerusalem, evidently to mark out its boundaries. This would be the first step toward the restoration of the city and the realization of the promised blessing (cf. 1:16; Eze 40:5; Rev 11:1). When the interpreting angel started to leave, he was met by another angel and was instructed to convey the message to Zechariah, who, in turn, would naturally declare it to his people.

4b The measuring was done with expansion in view; now that purpose is to be achieved. The promise is given that Jerusalem will become so large and prosperous that it will expand beyond its walls. Indeed, it will overflow so much that it will be as though it had no walls. Evidently many of its people and animals will have to live in the surrounding unwalled villages (cf. Eze 38:11). Nothing like this has yet happened in the history of the city. The realization of the full scope of this prophecy must therefore still be in a future earthly kingdom.

5 Although Jerusalem will become so large and prosperous that many of its inhabitants will spill over beyond the walls into the suburbs, they will still be secure because of the divine protection and the divine presence. The "wall of fire" is reminiscent of the "pillar of fire" (Ex 13:21). Both are emblematic of God and his protection and guidance (in fact, both "fire" and "glory" recall the Exodus; Ex 13:22; 14:20; 40:34). There is the promise of the Lord's glorious presence in regal holiness and majesty. The Lord's "glory" (GK 3883) is his self-manifestation, which is here concerned with the final actualization of his rule. The future safety of Jerusalem and its people is guaranteed.

6–7 The land of the north is Babylon, north being the direction from which the Neo-Babylonian army had invaded Judah. The Jewish exiles who had not returned from Babylon in 538–537 B.C. were exhorted to do so at this time. The same Lord who had scattered them desired that they be restored and repatriated. The places of the Diaspora ("scattered"; GK 7298) included not only Babylon ("the north") but also Assyria, Egypt, Persia, and the neighboring countries ("the four winds of heaven"). "Zion" refers to the exiles from Zion in Babylon. "Flee" and "escape" imply that some imminent peril was coming on Babylon. The nature of that peril is historically uncertain.

"You who live in the Daughter of Babylon" refers to the Jews who had chosen to remain in Babylon. They were being called on to join the other returnees in Jerusalem, evidently to help them rebuild the temple and restore the city.

8 The opening words of the quotation ("After he has honored me and has sent me") are difficult. All the Hebrew has is "After glory [or honor; lit., weight or heaviness; GK 3883] he has sent me." Another problem is the identity of "me" both here and in v.9. While many think "me" refers to Zechariah, others maintain that it looks toward the messianic Servant-Messenger, the Angel of the Lord. The mission of this person is directed against the nations that have plundered God's chosen people. Such treatment of the Jews is condemned because harming them is like striking the apple of God's eye. "Apple" (lit., "gate") is the pupil, an extremely sensitive and vital part of the eye.

9 In a menacing gesture the Lord will raise his hand against Israel's enemies. The word "raise" (GK 5677) may also be rendered "wave." All it takes for God to punish his people's enemies is a wave of his hand. This is another evidence that the speaker here and in v.8 is deity. "My hand" refers to the display of God's infinite power, here exerted in behalf of God's people and against their enemies. God brings about a reversal of the fortunes of his people. The Jews, who were slaves of the nations that plundered them (v.8), will now plunder those nations (cf. Est 7:10; cf. also Gal 6:7–8). When all this happens, the people "will know that the LORD Almighty has sent" his messenger. The fulfillment will authenticate the message and ministry of the messianic Servant-Messenger.

10 The section begins with a call to joy, followed by the reason for such jubilation (cf. 9:9): the personal coming of God himself to live among his people in Jerusalem (Zion). This language is ultimately messianic—indirectly or by extension from God in general to the Messiah in particular. All passages that speak of a future coming of the Lord to his people or to the earth, or that speak of a future rule of the Lord over Israel or over the whole earth, are ultimately messianic, for to be fully and literally true, they require a future, literal messianic kingdom on the earth.

For further biblical development of the theological theme of God's dwelling or living among his people, see vv.11–13 and 8:3 (cf. also Jn 1:14; 2Co 6:16; Rev 21:3).

11–12 In the great messianic future, many nations "will be joined with the LORD" (or "will join themselves to the LORD"). Such an ingathering of the nations to the Lord echoes the promise in Ge 12:3 (cf. 18:18; 22:18). The result is that they too will become the people of God. All this will happen "in that day," which is frequently an abbreviation of the Day of the Lord (cf. Isa 2:12–21; 24–27; Joel 1:15; 2:28–3:21; Am 5:18–20; 9:11–15; Zep 1:7–2:2; Zec 14). The Messiah's advent is the turning point between the judgment and the blessing aspects of "that day." In the light of biblical usage, the eschatological Day of the Lord may be defined as earth's final period of time—the tribulation period, the Messiah's second advent to the earth (Rev 19), the messianic kingdom age (Rev 20), and the appearance of the new heavens and earth (Rev 21).

The conversion of many nations to the Lord does not abrogate the promise and purpose of God for Israel, his chosen and special covenant people. In keeping with that promise, v.12 indicates that the Lord will inherit Judah (both land and people) and will again choose Jerusalem (cf. 1:17), for many decisive events will yet take place there (e.g., 14:4).

The people of Judah are described as the Lord's portion in the "holy land." This is the only occurrence of the phrase "holy land" in Scripture (but cf. Pss 2:6; 15:1; Isa 48:2; Da 9:24; Mt 27:53; Rev 21:2). The temple, as the place of God's earthly throne, was by definition "holy" (Ps 65:4; Jnh 2:4). But that holiness extended beyond the temple and the holy city to the entire land. The root idea of the word "holy" (GK 7731) is "separate" or "set apart." Palestine is rendered holy (i.e., sacred) chiefly because it is the site of the earthly throne and sanctuary of the holy God, who dwells there among his covenant people.

13 All humankind was exhorted to be still before the Lord because, in a threatening gesture, he had roused himself from his holy dwelling and would judge the enemies of his people. He was about to break his apparent silence by acting in behalf of his elect (cf. Rev 5–6; 8). The first vision introduced the judgment (or curse) and blessing motif (1:1–17). That motif is then developed in the second and third visions in an alternating cycle: judgment for the nations (1:18–21) but blessing and glory for Israel (2:1–5); judgment for the nations (2:6–9) but blessing for Israel—and for the nations (2:10–13).

D. The Fourth Vision: The Cleansing and Restoration of Israel (3:1–10)

1 In this apocalyptic vision the high priest Joshua—the same person as Jeshua in Ezra and Nehemiah—represents the sinful nation Israel (see especially comment on v.9). However, though Israel is presented in defilement, she is also cleansed and restored as a kingdom of priests for God. The revealer of the vision is either the interpreting angel or God himself (cf. 1:20). "Standing before the . . . LORD" is a technical designation for priestly ministry. Hence the scene is in the temple.

Although the scene is not basically a legal one, Satan's accusation invests it with a judicial character. The right side was the place of accusation under the law (Ps 109:6). Satan knows the purposes of God concerning Israel and therefore has always accused the Jews and accuses them still. The tool of his nefarious opposition to Israel has primarily been the Gentile nations—something that will be particularly true during the period of Daniel's seventieth "week." Satan is the accuser, not only of Joshua (i.e., Israel), but also of all believers. Undoubtedly the accusation here relates to the sin of Joshua (cf. vv.3–4) and is made in the hope that God will reject his people irrevocably. But this we know he will never do (cf. Jer 31:36–37).

2 Israel's defender was none other than the Lord himself. Since the speaker in this verse was quite clearly the Angel of the Lord, this is but another evidence of his deity. That God chose Jerusalem further proves that Joshua portrayed Israel as a nation. The quotation contains a double rebuke of Satan ("the accuser"). God's sovereign choice of Jerusalem in grace shows the unreasonableness of Satan's attack (cf. Ro 8:33). The reference to the stick is an additional indication that Israel, not Joshua, is ultimately in view. Israel was retrieved to carry out God's future purpose for her (cf. Am 4:11). The "fire" refers to the Babylonian captivity, though it may also look back to Israel's deliverance from Egypt (cf. Dt 4:20; 7:7–8; Jer 11:4) and forward to the rescue from the coming tribulation period (cf. Jer 30:7; Zec 13:8–9; Rev 12:13–17).

3 The reason for Satan's accusation is Israel's impurity. How can a holy God bless a filthy nation like Israel? The answer is that he can do so only by his grace. Joshua's clothes represent the pollution of sin (cf. Isa 64:6). To compound the problem, Joshua (i.e., Israel) was ministering in this filthy condition before the Angel of the Lord.

4 The removal of the filthy clothes (apparently by angels) may connote that Joshua was thereby deprived of priestly office. If so, he is reinstated in v.5. This seems to be a picture of the negative aspect of what God does when he saves a person—he takes away sin. Positively, he adds or imputes to the sinner his own righteousness. The act of causing sin to pass away represents justification, not sanctification.

Next, Joshua was to be clothed with rich garments—God's representative clothed in God's righteousness. The festive garments speak of purity, joy, and glory; but their chief significance is that they symbolize the restoration of Israel to her original calling (Ex 19:6; Isa 61:6). "I have taken away" (GK 6296) emphasizes the agent of the forgiveness. It is God who causes sin to be removed, ultimately on the basis of the messianic Servant's substitutionary death. The one who actually forgave sin here is the Angel of the Lord, thus identifying him as deity.

5 Joshua was crowned with a clean turban and clothed with rich garments, symbolic of divine righteousness. On the front of the turban were the words: HOLY TO THE LORD (Ex 28:36; 39:30). Again this is a foreview of Israel's future purging and reinstatement to her priestly function. "While the angel of the LORD stood by" indicates he was approving and directing Joshua's purging, clothing, and crowning.

6–7 Israel's originally intended position would finally be realized. "Walk in my ways" refers to the personal life and attitude toward the Lord. Personal or practical righteousness is in view. "Keep my requirements" speaks of the diligent and faithful fulfillment of official, divinely appointed, priestly duties.

An analysis of the three results of meeting these two conditions reveals Israel's earthly calling and her glory and ministry in the Messianic Age: (1) Israel will govern the house of God; (2) Israel will have charge of God's courts; and (3) Israel will have ready and free access to God in the priestly function, just as the angels ("these standing here").

8 The persons involved in this prediction were Joshua, his colleagues, and the Branch, the Servant of the Lord. Joshua and his fellow priests represented coming events and persons. They excited wonder because they were types of Israel in close association with someone to come. This coming one was called "my servant, the Branch"—two well-known OT appellations for the Messiah (e.g., Isa 11:1; 42:1; Jer 23:5). As Servant, the Messiah came into the world to do the will of the Father. Through his work, Israel will yet be redeemed and restored as a priestly nation, which Joshua and his associate priests typified.

9 Some interpret the "stone" as Israel. It seems best and more consistent, however, to take it as another figure of the Messiah. To the Jews at his first advent, the Messiah (Christ) was the stumbling stone and rock of offense (Isa 8:13–15; cf. Ps 118:22–23; Mt 21:42; 1Pe 2:7–8). Moreover, he is to be the smiting stone to the nations (Da 2:35, 45). At present he is the foundation and chief cornerstone of the church (Eph 2:19–22). The seven eyes speak of the fullness of the Holy Spirit or of the Godhead and are symbolic of infinite intelligence and omniscience.

The engraving on the stone is difficult to interpret. The early church fathers refer the "inscription" to the wounds of Christ. The passage possibly connotes a sealing action by God, or perhaps a beautifying activity. Next, the Lord (the Angel of the Lord?) purged and cleansed Israel from sin. "The sin of this land," not of Joshua but of the people of the land of Palestine, was taken away in a single day, symbolized by the removal of Joshua's filthy clothes (v.4). Prophetically, the one day is the once-for-all deliverance potentially provided at Calvary—to be actually and finally realized in Israel's experience at the second advent of her Messiah, when there will be cleansing and forgiveness for the nation as a whole (Zec 12:10–13:1; Ro 11:26–27).

10 The result of the action of vv.8–9 is peace and security for God's people. God's purpose for Israel will be realized in the theocratic kingdom, when Israel will enjoy contentment, peace, and prosperity (cf. 1Ki 4:25). "That day" is the eschatological time of Israel's cleansing and restoration as a kingdom of priests. This closing verse pictures Israel's future condition under divine favor and blessing when there will be no more curse. The vine and the fig tree speak of spiritual blessing and of agricultural blessing (cf. Isa 11:1–9; 35; 65:17).

E. The Fifth Vision: The Gold Lampstand and the Two Olive Trees (4:1–14)

1 The main purposes of the vision were (1) to encourage Joshua and Zerubbabel in the work of rebuilding the temple by reminding them of their divine resources and (2) to vindicate them in the eyes of the community. In this chapter the lampstand probably represents the idea of testimony (light bearing; cf. Mt 5:16; Rev 1:20). Zerubbabel and Joshua (the two olive branches) testified to God's power in completing the temple.

To prepare Zechariah to receive the fifth vision, the interpreting angel woke him from his ecstatic sleep of wonder and astonishment over the previous vision. The wakening obviously took place on the same night, further corroborating the view that Zechariah received all the visions during one night.

2 Though we do not know precisely how the lampstand looked, we do know what it signified. The seven "channels" (or "lips" or "spouts" for wicks) to each of the seven lamps (forty-nine spouts in all) would seem to stress the abundant supply of the oil, which in turn symbolizes the fullness of God's power through his Spirit (seven being the number of fullness or completeness; cf. v.6).

3 Possibly the two olive trees stand for the priestly and royal offices in Israel (cf. 6:13). Undoubtedly the two olive branches (vv.12, 14) represent Joshua-Israel (ch. 3) and Zerubbabel (ch. 4; cf. v.14). According to v.12, each olive tree has an olive branch beside a golden pipe that pours out golden oil. The olive oil is conducted directly from the trees to the bowl of oil at the top of the lampstand—without any human agency. Similarly, Zerubbabel and Joshua are to bear continual testimony for God's glory and are to do God's work—e.g., on the temple and in the lives of the people—in the power of his Spirit (v.6).

4–6 The purpose of this vision was to encourage Zerubbabel to complete the rebuilding of the temple and to assure him of the enablement of God's Spirit for the work. The answer to Zechariah's inquiry was postponed in order to emphasize the final verse of the chapter and, in the meantime, to focus attention on only one of the two olive branches, namely, Zerubbabel, and his special ministry. "These" refers to the two olive trees of v.3 (cf. v.11).

Verse 6 interprets the symbolism of the oil ("by my Spirit"). Just as there was a constant and sufficient supply of oil without human agency, so Zerubbabel's work on the temple and in the lives of the people was to be completed, not by human might or power, but by divine power—constant and sufficient. The work was dependent on God; he would provide the oil or strength of his Spirit. Such enablement was needed because of the opposition and apathy hindering the rebuilding (Hag 2:1–9).

7 Faith in the power of God's Spirit can overcome mountainous obstacles—indeed, can reduce them to "level ground." A defiant challenge was laid down against whatever would hinder the rebuilding of the temple. The figurative mountain could include opposition (Ezr 4:1–5, 24) and the people's unwillingness to persevere (Hag 1:14; 2:1–9). That the project would ultimately succeed is indicated by the assurance that Zerubbabel will experience the joy of helping put the capstone in place, thus marking the completion of the restoration temple.

8–9 The laying of the temple foundation refers back to what took place in 537–536 B.C. (Ezr 3:8–11; 5:16). The year was now 519, three years before the fulfillment of the prediction that Zerubbabel would complete the superstructure (Ezr 6:1–18). So then, a delay in the execution of God's will need not end in ultimate defeat. Finally, the completely restored temple (in 516 B.C.) would prove the divine commission of the speaker. "Me" apparently refers to the messianic Servant-Messenger (or the Angel of the Lord).

10 The opening question obviously implies that some of the people had a negative attitude toward the temple project and those involved in it. In the context, the "day of small things" refers to the "day" of beginning the work on the temple and now continuing it. But God was definitely in this rebuilding program; by his Spirit (v.6) he was enabling Zerubbabel to finish the work. Perhaps the "despisers" were discouraged because they were a relatively small group, forgetting that God's work is usually accomplished through a remnant.

"Plumb line" (GK 643) may also be rendered "separated [i.e., chosen] stone," referring to the capstone of v.7. The parenthesis is probably a reminder to Zerubbabel and the people that God is omniscient ("seven eyes"). As such, he knows, sees, and governs the entire earth. He is in control of Israel's situation.

11–14 Zechariah repeated his question to be more specific. He desired an explanation of what he saw in vv.2–3. The answer to the prophet's inquiry is that the two olive branches are Zerubbabel, a member of the line of David, and Joshua. In the light of the context, they must be "the two who are anointed to serve the Lord" as God's appointed leaders. Both priest and ruler were anointed for service to the Lord and the covenant community. This combination of ruler and priest is evidently intended to point ultimately to the messianic King-Priest (cf. 6:13; Ps 110; Heb 7). Finally, since God was declared to be "the Lord of all the earth," he was master of all the circumstances in which Zerubbabel and the people found themselves.

F. The Sixth Vision: The Flying Scroll (5:1–4)

1–2 The scroll is not rolled up but flying (i.e., unrolled for all to read). Significantly, in the postexilic period there was a renewed interest in the study and teaching of the law (Torah). Not only was the scroll open for all to read, but it was also very large for all to see. Its message of judgment was not concealed from anyone. Such a bold, clear pronouncement of punishment for sin should have spurred the people on to repentance and righteousness.

3 The message and meaning of the scroll are revealed. Those who persisted in breaking the covenant (Ex 20) would experience the curse (punishment) for disobedience and unfaithfulness (Dt 21:23). Since the scroll was apparently inscribed on both sides, one side must have contained the curse against those who violated the third commandment of the law while the other side contained the curse against those who broke the eighth commandment. The thief broke the eighth commandment, and whoever swore falsely violated the third commandment. These two representative sins—perhaps theft and perjury were the most common ones at this time—stand for all kinds of sin. The point is that Israel was guilty of breaking the whole law (cf. Jas 2:10). "Banished" (GK 5927) amounts to the notion of "purging" the land from chronic covenant-breakers. God has always required adherence, not only to the letter of the law, but also to its spirit.

4 "It" refers to the curse. There can be no hiding, no escape, from the judgment of that curse. God's word, whether promise or threat, is efficacious. "It" will enter and destroy the homes of the guilty. Even the privacy of their homes will afford them no refuge from divine judgment. The word "thief" recalls Ex 20:15, and "him who swears falsely by my name" recalls Ex 20:7. To judge from the materials used in the houses (cf. Hag 1:3–9), it was primarily the wealthy who were guilty of committing these sins.

G. The Seventh Vision: The Woman in a Basket (5:5–11)

5–6 The removal of wickedness is now vividly depicted. Not only sinners, but the whole sinful system must be removed—apparently to the place of its origin (Babylonia). What Zechariah saw this time was a measuring basket (lit., "an ephah," a measure that here stands for the container). An ephah is less than a bushel, so a normal ephah measuring basket (or barrel) is not large enough to hold a person. This one was undoubtedly enlarged—like the flying scroll—for the purpose of the vision. The basket represents the people's iniquity or crookedness that pervades the land.

7–8 The import of the measuring basket is now fully revealed: When the cover of lead was lifted from the basket, wickedness is exposed, personified by a woman (cf. Rev 17:3–5). Like the basket itself, the woman represents the sin of the people in Palestine, whose measure or cup of evil was full. The whole evil system was to be destroyed. The Hebrew word for "wickedness" (GK 8402), denoting moral, religious, and civil evil, is feminine, which may explain why the wickedness of the people is personified as a woman.

9 The fate of the woman (i.e., wickedness) is portrayed: She is to be removed from the land. Although some regard the two women, who now appear, as agents of evil (partly because the stork is an unclean bird, Lev 11:19), it seems preferable to regard them as divinely chosen agents. They, along with the wind (cf. Ps 104:3–4), thus demonstrate that the removal was the work of God alone. The simile "wings like those of a stork" is evidently intended to show that the winged women—carried along by the wind—were capable of supporting the woman in the basket over a great distance.

10–11 The destination of the women bearing the sin away was "Babylonia" (lit., "Shinar"). Shinar roughly corresponded to ancient Babylonia (cf. Ge 11:2; 14:1, 9). The evil will be put in a "house," perhaps referring to a temple or ziggurat. "Its place" may have in view a base or pedestal on which the basket and its contents are set up as an idol.

H. The Eighth Vision: The Four Chariots (6:1–8)

1 This last vision obviously corresponds to the first, though there are differences in details, such as in the order and colors of the horses. The Lord is again depicted as the one who controls the events of history. He will conquer the nations that oppress Israel. Since his war chariots claim victory in the north (v.8), total victory is certain. The chariots must serve basically the same symbolic function—they are vehicles of God's judgment on the nations. Such judgment is probably also the symbolic significance of the "bronze" mountains (cf. Nu 21:9). The two mountains most naturally refer to Mount Zion and the Mount of Olives, with the Kidron Valley between them.

2–3 The chariots seem to represent angelic spirits, while the variegated horses evidently signify divine judgments on the earth. Revelation 6:1–8 suggests that the red horses symbolize war and bloodshed; the black horses, famine and death; the white horses, victory and triumph; and the dappled horses, death by plagues and other judgments. White horses are clearly associated with vengeance and triumph in Rev 19:11, 14. The four chariots may indicate that the angelic spirits are ready to embark on universal judgments (cf. "the four winds of heaven" [2:6], "the four corners of the earth" [Rev 7:1]).

4–6 "These" refers to the chariots, with the horses harnessed to them. The four chariots are identified as four spirits (i.e., angelic beings). Although the same Hebrew word can also mean "winds" (GK 8120), angelic "spirits" as agents of divine judgment seems more appropriate, particularly since they stand before God. The chariot with the black horses hitched to it goes toward the north country, primarily Babylonia, but also the direction from which most of Israel's formidable enemies invade Palestine. As the Hebrew text now stands, the chariot with the black horses is followed northward by the one with the white horses. However, with a slight change in the Hebrew text, the latter chariot would go toward the west, i.e., toward the islands and coastlands of the Mediterranean area. The south is principally Egypt but also the other main direction from which Israel's foes invade Palestine. Nothing is said of the east, possibly because the Arabian Desert lay in that direction. Similarly, nothing is said of the chariot with the red horses, but the latter are undoubtedly included among "the powerful horses" of v.7.

7–8 "Powerful" (GK 600) describes all the horses. All were eager to take the chariots (angelic spirits) on the mission of bringing divine judgment on the peoples of the earth. But the horses cannot begin until authorized to do so. "Those going toward the north country" designates either the black horses and their chariots or both the black horses and the white horses. The pronoun "my" in "my Spirit" indicates that the speaker is ultimately deity, i.e., either God or the messianic Servant-Messenger (the Angel of the Lord). Since conquest is announced in the north, victory is assured over all enemies.

III. The Symbolic Crowning of Joshua the High Priest (6:9–15)

9–10 The position of this actual ceremony after the eight visions is significant. The fourth and fifth visions were concerned with the high priest and the civil governor in the Davidic line. Zechariah here linked the message of those two visions to the messianic King-

Priest. In the fourth vision, Joshua was priest, here (v.13) the Branch was to officiate as priest. In the fifth vision, Zerubbabel was the governing civil official; here (v.13) the Branch was to rule the government. In 4:9 Zerubbabel was to complete the rebuilding of the temple; here (v.12) the Branch would build the temple. In 4:14 Zerubbabel and Joshua represented two separate offices; here the Branch was to hold both offices (v.13). Thus restored Israel is seen in the future under the glorious reign of the messianic King-Priest. The passage is typical-prophetical. Joshua served as a type of the Messiah, but at certain points the language transcends the experience of the type and becomes more directly prophetical of the antitype.

Verse 9 introduces a prophetic oracle. In the first part of v.10, representatives arrive from Babylon with gifts for the temple; and in the last part of the verse, Zechariah is told to meet them. The meeting takes place in the home of one Josiah, who was entertaining the returned exiles. In v.14 he is honored with the name "Hen."

11 In a coronation scene Zechariah was told to take the silver and gold brought from Babylon, to make a crown for royalty, and to put it on Joshua's head. It becomes obvious that the royal crowning of the high priest is a type of the goal and consummation of prophecy—the crowning and reign of the messianic King-Priest. Therefore Joshua, who was never a priest-king, was a type of the messianic Branch of v.12. According to v.13, the Branch would be a priest on his throne. Thus the fulfillment in the Messiah transcends Joshua's status and experience.

12 This verse predicts that the messianic Branch would appear as Joshua's antitype and would build the temple. The words were addressed to Joshua; yet it is clear that the language refers to the messianic "Branch" (GK 7542). Christ is pictured in Rev 19:12 as the majestic Sovereign of the universe, with "many crowns" on his head—an ornate crown with many diadems (cf. v.11). As the Branch, he would "branch out" (GK 7541) from his place. "His place" is most likely a reference to his humble and obscure origin, land, and people.

Verse 12 closes with the prediction that the Branch will build the temple of the Lord. Since the rebuilding of the restoration temple is to be completed by Zerubbabel (4:9–10), it is difficult to see how this could refer to that temple. Instead, it must have in view the temple of the Messianic Age (cf. Isa 2:2–4; Eze 40–43; Hag 2:6–9).

13 Not only will the messianic Branch build the temple, but he will also have regal splendor, will take his seat on his throne and rule, and will perfectly and harmoniously combine the two offices of king and priest. The clause at the end of v.12 is repeated at the beginning of v.13 to emphasize that "it is he," the Branch, not Joshua, who will build the temple. "Will sit" means "will sit enthroned." "His throne" refers to the promised Davidic throne (2Sa 7:16; Isa 9:7; Lk 1:32). No otherOT author makes it so plain that the coming Davidic king will also be a priest.

14 It was, in part, to keep the messianic hope alive that the crown was made for Joshua's symbolic crowning and then placed in the temple as a reminder of this hope. Historically, however, it was a memorial to the devotion of the embassy that came all the way from Babylon with such rich gifts for the temple. They, in turn, are typical of the group in v.15. "Hen" (meaning "gracious one"; see NIV note) is doubtless another name, and a very appropriate one, for Josiah (v.10), used on this occasion to honor him because he was so hospitable.

15 Gentiles will contribute materials for the construction of the messianic kingdom temple. When this happens, the people will know that the Lord has sent his messenger (Messenger?) to them. All this will happen if the people render absolute obedience to the Lord's word. "Those who are far away" must refer to Gentiles (cf. 2:11; 8:22; Isa 2:2–4; 56:6–7; 60:1–7; see also Eph 2:17). They will help build the temple by contributing their wealth (silver, gold, and other materials) to it (see also Isa 60:5–7). At the end of the verse, the conditional element—obedience—relates to the people's participation individually (cf. Dt 28:1–2, 15; 30:1–10). In the new covenant God will make with his people (Jer 31:33–34; Eze 36:26–27), he personally guarantees that the people will ultimately obey; his Spirit will enable them to do so.

IV. The Problem of Fasting and the Promise of the Future (7:1–8:23)

A. The Question by the Delegation From Bethel (7:1–3)

1 As early as 1:3–6 it was clear that Zechariah was interested in the spiritual renewal of the postexilic community. Here he deals further with this problem. The date is equivalent to December 7, 518 B.C., not quite two years after the eight night visions (1:7).

2–3 The occasion of the oracle is a question about fasting raised by a delegation from Bethel (cf. Ezr 2:28; Ne 7:32; 11:31). To judge from the foreign names—Sharezer and Regem-Melech—the members of the delegation had probably been born in Babylonia. They directed their question to the temple priests and the divinely appointed prophets—the latter would have included Zechariah—at Jerusalem. Their inquiry was reasonable. The fasts had been observed in exile, but should they be continued in these better times back in the homeland? Now that the temple was nearly rebuilt, it would seem that they were no longer necessary. Thus the mission of these Jews concerned a fast day instituted by the Jews in exile in commemoration of the destruction of Jerusalem. In the beginning there was doubtless sincere contrition in the observance of the day; now it had become a mere form. According to 8:19, the question included all the fasts commemorating the major events related to the fall and destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, namely, the "fasts of the fourth, fifth, seventh and tenth months."

B. The Rebuke by the Lord (7:4–7)

4–5 The Lord cast doubt on the people's sincerity when they previously had observed the fasts. They had turned a time that should have convicted them of their past and present sins into a rote ritual devoid of its divinely intended purpose—prayer and genuine repentance. They had also turned it into a time of self-pity for their physical condition. Since the question from the people of Bethel raised a larger issue touching the whole nation, the words here were addressed, not just to the people in Bethel, but to "all the people of the land [primarily Jews living in or near Jerusalem] and the priests." Priests also had to listen to God's word that came through the prophets. Since these fasts commemorated events related to the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple in 586 B.C., the "seventy years" are to be reckoned from that time. Strictly speaking, sixty-eight years had transpired; seventy is thus a round number.

"Me" is set in obvious contrast with "yourselves": Was it really for me? Their fasting had become a mere religious form, not supported by obedience to the word of God (cf. Isa 58:1–7).

6–7 The reference to "the earlier prophets" shows that the problem is not lack of knowledge but lack of obedience. Without obedience and application, religious observance is meaningless. "At rest" and "prosperous" point to the preexilic situation when Jerusalem and the surrounding towns of Judah were bustling with life and the fields were being farmed—in contrast with their current condition resulting from disobedience, with only a partial restoration and without the full resumption of agriculture. "The Negev and the western foothills" were among the agricultural and grazing areas.

C. The Command to Repent (7:8–14)

8–9a With a solemn, authoritative message from God, the prophet focuses on the covenantal unfaithfulness, disobedience, and unrighteousness that first led to the Babylonian exile. He does this, hoping that the restored community will perceive the moral implications of their fasting and will let their forefathers' disobedience and its consequences serve as a warning to them. This section also explains why the people's fasting meant nothing to God. They were guilty of legalism: an external adherence to the letter of the law while disregarding the internal spirit—the true divine intent—of the law.

9b–10 With a series of social, moral, and ethical commands, the Lord gave the people four tests of their spiritual reality.

(1) "Administer true justice." "Justice" (GK 5477) denotes the rights and duties of each party arising out of the particular relation of fellowship in which they find themselves. Everyone has his own special "justice": the king, God, the priest, the firstborn son, the Israelites as a group, etc. The task of one who administers justice is to see that the good of everyone in the community is safeguarded.

(2) "Show mercy and compassion." While hesed (GK 2875) includes "mercy," it is really stronger than that. "Faithful love" would be a better rendering. Since "compassion" (GK 8171) is related to the Hebrew word for "womb," it focuses on a tender, maternal kind of love. Faithful love and tender compassion were to govern all relationships among the covenant people of God.

(3) "Do not oppress." Oppression is denounced so frequently that it is not necessary to multiply references. The most common victims of oppression are listed here as "the widow . . . the fatherless, the alien . . . the poor." These were the weakest, the neediest, the most defenseless, and the most disadvantaged members of their society—and the ones with the fewest legal rights.

(4) "Do not think evil." In the opening part of 8:17, the almost identical Hebrew is translated "do not plot evil against your neighbor." This excludes a spirit of hatred, vindictiveness, and revenge that devises wicked schemes for harming others. The clear inference is that the people of the restored community need to repent and to begin practicing this ethical teaching; otherwise their fasting is mere formalism, legalism, and hypocrisy.

11–12a The Lord had instructed his people to carry out the four commands of vv.9–10, but they refused ("they" referring to the preexilic forefathers, as the reference to "the earlier prophets" shows). The lesson to the Jews of the restoration period is clear: Do not be like your unrepentant, unfaithful, disobedient, covenant-breaking forefathers, or you will suffer a similar fate. One indispensable ingredient in true spirituality is a dogged attentiveness to familiar truths, but they did not "pay attention." "Stubbornly they turned their backs" echoes Dt 9:6, 13, 27 and characterizes the Israelite ancestors as a stiff-necked and stubborn people. The fact that they "stopped up their ears" seems to reflect the disciplinary dulling of their ears in Isa 6:10 (cf. Ac 28:27). The people even "made their hearts [including their minds and wills] as hard as flint." The specific kind of mineral is uncertain.

For the most part the people were recalcitrant and obdurate. Nor would they listen to the word of God in the law through the prophets. The latter were the secondary agents of divine revelation. The primary agent was the Spirit of God. Thus the words of the prophets were inspired by God's Spirit.

12b–13 The result of the forefathers' rejection of the command to change—i.e., to reform their ways and actions (Jer 7:3)—was the terrible experience of God's wrath manifested in the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple in 586 B.C. and in the ensuing exile to Babylonia. The motif of God's wrath is reminiscent of 1:2, 15. Dispersion was part of the curse for disobedience to the old (Mosaic) covenant (cf. v.14; Jer 11:11–14).

14 The scattering was one of the curses for covenant disobedience (Dt 28:36–37, 64–68), as was the desolation of the land (Dt 28:41–42, 45–52). "The nations" refers primarily to Babylonia and Egypt, though "all" may at the same time anticipate a future, more widespread Diaspora—the principle of progressive fulfillment again. "Behind them" means "after they were removed from it." "This is how" means "by their sins" (e.g., unbelief and disobedience). Because of such sins, "they made the pleasant land [Palestine] desolate."

D. The Restoration of Israel to God's Favor (8:1–17)

1–2 Zechariah here contrasts Israel's past judgment with her future restoration; she is to repent and live righteously because of the promise of her future restoration. This section is basically a salvation—or deliverance—oracle, the principal features of which are (1) the self-predication of God (v.2), (2) the message of salvation (vv.3–8), (3) the direct address (vv.9–17), and (4) the "do not be afraid" phrase (vv.13, 15). It is "the LORD Almighty" who stands behind this glorious prophecy (vv.1–4, 6–7, 14, 19–20, 23). Here the divine jealousy is directed toward the restoration of Israel.

3a On the Lord's returning to Zion and dwelling in Jerusalem, see comments on 1:16 and 2:10.

3b The blessed results of the Lord's return are now delineated. The first is a new character for Jerusalem, resulting in new epithets. The first is either "the City of Truth" or "the Faithful City." Either is possible, and both will be true. Furthermore, the temple mount will be called "the Holy Mountain" because of the Lord's holy presence there.

4–5 Other results of the Lord's return to dwell in Jerusalem are undisturbed tranquility, long life, peace, prosperity, and security. The weakest and most defenseless members of society will be able to live securely. Although it may be possible to regard historical references as stages in the progressive fulfillment of the passage, they certainly do not completely fulfill the scope of this grand prophecy as a whole. The final stage awaits the second advent of the Messiah.

6 Such things may have seemed too good to be true in the eyes of the Jewish "remnant" living "at that time," but the Lord Almighty did not so regard them. Nothing is too hard for him.

7–8 Although God's action is expressed in terms of saving, it is tantamount to regathering. "I will save my people" means "I will gather them from exile, bondage, and dispersion" (cf. Isa 11:11–12; 43:5–7; Jer 30:7–11; 31:7–8). "The east" and "the west" are best understood as opposites used to express totality, meaning "wherever the people are." Thus the regathering will be universal. Israel's predicted complete restoration to covenant favor and blessing rests on nothing less than the faithfulness, veracity, and righteousness of God. "To live in Jerusalem" need mean no more than "to go there frequently to worship."

"They will be my people, and I will be . . . their God" is covenant terminology, pertaining to intimate fellowship in a covenant relationship. Although Israel may go through a Lo-Ammi ("Not My People") stage, she will be fully restored as Ammi ("My People"; cf. Hos 1:8–2:1; 2:23). The theological principle involved is that God is a saving, forgiving, delivering, restoring God—one who delights to take "Not My People" and make them "My People." In the case of Gentiles, as in the church, he does this in his sovereign grace by grafting them into covenant relationship and blessing (Ro 11).

9 The immediate purpose of all this is to encourage Zechariah's audience to complete the rebuilding of the temple. The people addressed are those who had been listening to the preaching of, first, Haggai (1:1) and then Zechariah (1:1; cf. Ezr 5:1–2), since 520 B.C. (it was now 518). The laying of the temple foundation is, accordingly, not the original one in 536. Although the foundation was restored in 536, the actual building of the superstructure was hindered from 536 to 530 (when it stopped altogether). Thus, the "founding" (almost in the sense of "building" or "rebuilding") of the temple did not begin in earnest till 520. "Let your hands be strong" is a way of saying "be encouraged" (Jdg 7:11).

10 The background for the verse appears to be the conditions described in Hag 1:6–11; 2:15–19. "Before that time" refers to the period prior to 520 B.C. (at least 530–520, if not 536–520). "No one could go about his business safely" is literally "No one could go out or come in safely." "Enemy" included the Samaritans (Ezr 4:1–5).

11–13 "But now" shows that the reasons for the people's discouragement have passed; God would now provide grounds for encouragement. In Hag 2:19, God through his prophet had predicted just such a reversal as we have here. The fecundity described is part of the covenant blessings for obedience promised in the Pentateuch (Lev 26:3–10; Dt 28:11–12) and in Eze 34:25–27. On the other hand, Israel's being an object of cursing among the nations is part of the covenant curses for disobedience threatened in Dt 28:15–68 and predicted in Jer 24:9; 25:18; 29:22. "As" God's old covenant people were an object of cursing, "so" God will save them; and they will be a blessing. Consequently, they are not to fear but to be encouraged.

14–15 These verses specify God's part in the people's restoration to favor and blessing. In the past God had "determined" (GK 2372) to bring disaster on them as covenantal discipline, but now he is "determined" to bless them (on God's determination, see Jer 4:28; 51:12). This is cause for not being afraid (cf. v.13).

16–17 Once again God's and Zechariah's interest in spiritual renewal comes to the fore. After the announcement of God's gracious action in vv.14–15 comes what he expects from his people in grateful response. Thus their obedience in the moral and ethical sphere has a gracious basis, just as the law itself did. Jerusalem will indeed be "the City of Truth" (v.3) wher its inhabitants are truthful and when true judgment is rendered in its courts. "Sound" (shalom; GK 8934) is probably best understood as descriptive of "judgment." The root idea of the word is "wholeness," "completeness," "soundness," though it is used principally of a state of "well-being," "health," "harmony," "peace," "security," and "prosperity."

The two positive injunctions are balanced by two negative ones. On the first negative command, see comment at 7:10b. The second prohibition has to do with perjury. "Do not love" perjury is another way of exhorting the people to hate it. God hates perjury and wicked schemes to harm others (cf. Pr 6:16–19). One theological rationale for ethics is awareness that God hates attitudes and actions contrary to his character. We must love what God loves and hate what he hates.

E. Kingdom Joy and Jewish Favor (8:18–23)

18–19 In this closing section of Part I, the Jews are told that there will be a reversal of their mourning and their position in the world. Returning at last to the question about fasting, the Lord announces through his prophetic messenger that there will come a time when it will cease. The people's mourning (expressed in fasting) will be turned into joy, for their low position among the nations will be changed. And they will be a source of blessing to Gentiles, for all the peoples of the earth will join them on pilgrimages to worship the Lord at Jerusalem.

The prophet announces that a day is coming when their fasts and mourning will give way to festivals (cf. Isa 65:18–19; Jer 31:10–14). Verse 19 closes with an exhortation to Zechariah's contemporaries to "love truth and peace."

20–22 As v.22 indicates, the "peoples" are Gentile nations. In view of the parallelism with "many peoples," "powerful nations" is perhaps better translated "numerous nations." Numerous Gentiles will make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem in order to seek and entreat the Lord (see also Isa 2:1–5; Mic 4:1–5).

23 "In those days" is equivalent to "in that day." "Ten" indicates a complete number. This verse closes with the reason for the Gentiles' desire to accompany the Jews on pilgrimages to Jerusalem: "We have heard that God is with you." Israel will be the means whereby God draws the nations of the earth to the Lord in the time of the messianic kingdom.

Part II (chs. 9–14)

V. Two Prophetic Oracles: The Great Messianic Future and the Full Realization of the Theocracy (9:1–14:21)

A. The First Oracle: The Advent and Rejection of the Messiah (9:1–11:17)

1. The advent of the messianic King (9:1–10:12)

a. The destruction of nations and preservation of Zion (9:1–8)

1–2a Part II of the book of Zechariah contains two undated oracles, though they probably belong to Zechariah's old age (shortly after 480 B.C.). More important than the date are the wide scope of the prophecies and the frequent emphasis on the end times, particularly the arrival of the great Messianic Era. Chapters 9–14 are almost exclusively eschatological.

The theme of Part II centers around the judgment and blessing that accompany the appearance of the messianic King. The mood of the first oracle is characterized by change. In the midst of judgment (9:1–7), Israel finds deliverance (9:8). Yet in the midst of blessing (9:9–10:12), Israel experiences sorrow (11:1–17). And when the messianic King comes, he is rejected! The judgment with which the first oracle begins commences north of Palestine and proceeds south down the west coast of Syro-Palestine (9:1–7). But Israel will be preserved for the advent of her Messiah (9:8). Thus this first section stands in sharp contrast with 1:11 and prepares the way for 9:9. It is probably best to understand 9:1–8 as a prophetic description of the Lord's march south to Jerusalem, destroying—as Divine Warrior—the traditional enemies of Israel.

As history shows, the agent of the Lord's judgment was Alexander the Great. After defeating the Persians (333 B.C.), Alexander moved swiftly toward Egypt. On his march he toppled the cities in the Aramean (Syrian) interior, as well as those on the Mediterranean coast. Yet, on coming to Jerusalem, he refused to destroy it. Verse 8 attributes this protection to the miraculous intervention of God.

In v.1, Hadrach is to be identified with Hatarikka, near Hamath. Damascus was the leading city-state of the Arameans. The last half of this verse can be rendered "For the eye of the LORD is on all mankind, as well as on the tribes of Israel" (see NIV note), though the most natural translation is that of NIV. The thought may be that the eyes of human beings, especially all the tribes of Israel, are toward the Lord (for deliverance).

2b–4 The Lord's word of judgment next came on the great Phoenician cities Tyre and Sidon, particularly the former. The judgment of Tyre and Sidon was also foretold in greater detail in Eze 26:3–14; 28:20–24. Ezekiel's prophecy against Tyre was remarkably fulfilled to the letter, first through Nebuchadnezzar, then through Alexander (see ZPEB, 5:832–35). By building a mole or causeway out to this island bastion, Alexander accomplished what Nebuchadnezzar could not do in thirteen years.

The last clause of v.2 may be either concessive ("though they are very skillful"; cf. Eze 28:5) or causal ("because they think they are so wise"; cf. Eze 28:4). Either way, their skill or wisdom is explained in v.3, which describes Tyre's island fortress (Isa 23:4) and the great wealth she acquired through commerce. "Stronghold" (GK 5190) refers to the seemingly impregnable island defenses of offshore Tyre, which was surrounded by a wall 150 feet high. The similes in the rest of the verse underscore Tyre's proverbial wealth. Despite her abundance and power, she will be destroyed.

5–7 Four of the five major Philistine cities are mentioned (Gath is omitted, evidently because it had lost all significance by this time). The Philistine cities were greatly alarmed at Alexander's inexorable advance. This was particularly true of Ekron, the northernmost city and the one that would suffer first; her "hope" that Tyre would stem the tide would meet with disappointment.

"Foreigners" probably refers to people of mixed nationality; they characterized the postexilic period (Ne 13:23–24). In v.6 the Lord explains that he is going to transform the Philistines by breaking their pride. Their "repulsive ritual" is described in the first half of v.7. The "blood" is that of idolatrous sacrifices, and "forbidden food" refers to polluted or ceremonially unclean foods. Obviously, other idolatrous practices are also included. Yet a Philistine remnant will belong to God and will become leaders in Judah. This interpretation is confirmed by the prediction that Ekron will be "like the Jebusites" in a good sense. When David conquered Jerusalem, he did not destroy the Jebusites; instead, they were absorbed into Judah (e.g., Araunah in 2Sa 24:16; 1Ch 21:18). So it will be with a remnant of the Philistines.

8 The verse begins with "But," setting it in contrast with the preceding judgments on the surrounding nations. "I" signals the fact that God was speaking through Zechariah. Just as God was to be a "wall of fire" around Jerusalem (2:5), so here he will "defend" his chosen people and land. "House" (GK 1074) stands for the land and people of Israel, among whom the Lord God had his earthly throne, so to speak, in the temple at Jerusalem. The defense is against the marauding forces of Alexander overrunning that area. "Never again" anticipates the second advent of the Messiah for its final, complete fulfillment. The word for "oppressor" is translated "slave driver" in Ex 3:7 et al.

b. The advent of Zion's King (9:9–10)

9a Verses 1–8 predicted the military campaigns of Alexander the Great as he advanced on a war-horse south from Aram (Syria), subjugating city after city. The scene depicts intense battle and war; yet it is the implements of war that the messianic King is said to remove from Israel in v.10. The language here is an echo of Zep 3:14. Zechariah first calls on Jerusalem's people to rejoice.

In the Middle East today, the common folk still will use the donkey as a means of domestic transportation.

9b The prophet now gives the reasons for the rejoicing. The jubilation is over a new Sovereign. The first reason for joy, then, is the coming of the messianic, Davidic (note the "your") King. "To you" may be alternatively rendered "for you," i.e., "for your benefit." After announcing the King's coming, the prophet describes the King's character. (1) The King is righteous, conforming to the divine standard of morality and ethics, particularly as revealed in the Mosaic legislation. (2) He is also saving. (3) In contrast to most kings (such as Alexander), he is humble or gentle. (4) He is peaceful; this is the meaning of his riding on a colt, the foal of a donkey, though it possibly suggests both peace and humility. At any rate, he does not come on a war-horse. Although Jesus was acclaimed Messiah at his Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21:1–9; Mk 11:1–10; Lk 19:28–38; Jn 12:12–15), his own people nonetheless rejected him and his peace (cf. Lk 19:39–44 and, later, his crucifixion).

10 The first reason for rejoicing is the coming of the King (v.9). The second reason is the establishment of his kingdom—a kingdom of universal peace in Israel and among the nations and universal sovereignty. Again, in contrast with Alexander's empire, which was founded on bloodshed, the messianic King will establish a universal kingdom of peace. A shift begins from the foundation for peace (v.9) to the fact of peace. The progressive fulfillment reaches to the Messiah's second advent, when weapons of warfare will be either removed or converted to peaceful pursuits (cf. Isa 2:4; 9:5–7; 11:1–10; Mic 5:10–15). The chariot is related to Ephraim because it was characteristic of the army of the northern kingdom of Israel. An impressive sidelight on the removal of war-horses from Jerusalem is Zechariah's statement that the messianic King would enter the city riding on a donkey, an animal symbolizing peace, not war.

The chariot, the war-horse, and the battle bow represent the whole arsenal used in ancient warfare; so the passage implies the destruction of this whole arsenal. Not only will there be disarmament and peace in Israel, but the messianic King will also proclaim "peace" (shalom; GK 8934) to the nations—a fulfillment of the Abrahamic covenant (cf. 14:16; Ge 12:3; 18:18; 22:18). "From sea to sea" has been variously explained as "from the Nile to the Euphrates" (cf. Ge 15:18; Ex 23:31), "from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea," and "from the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea." In any case, the Messiah's rule is to be universal. The same is implied in the phrase "from the River [Euphrates] to the ends of the earth" (cf. Ps 72:8–11; Isa 66:18). This will be the true "triumphal entry" (cf. 14:1–11; Mt 23:37–39).

c. The deliverance and blessing of Zion's people (9:11–10:1) 11–13 Although the Messiah's mission is to establish his kingdom of "peace," he must first conquer all enemies and deliver his people. This he sets out to do. Before he can reign in peace, he must fully deliver and restore Israel. The passage is filled with battle terminology: prisoners, fortress, bow, sword, arrow (vv.12–13), trumpet (v.14), and slingstones (v.15). Here the Messiah is depicted as a conquering King (Divine Warrior).

"You" is emphatic and refers to Zion (v.9). The "blood of my covenant with you" probably has in view the Mosaic covenant (Ex 24:3–8). "Prisoners" evidently refers to those still in the land of exile, Babylonia. The Lord will free them because he is bound to them by covenantal relationship. The "waterless pit" recalls Joseph's and Jeremiah's predicament (Ge 37:24; Jer 38:6–9). Those outside the land who have hope in the future, delivering King (vv.9–10) are exhorted to return. While "fortress" (GK 1315) may refer initially to Jerusalem (Zion) and Judah, the ultimate reference may well be to God himself, the only source of real security. "Twice as much" indicates full or complete restoration.

The basis for the hope is given in v.13. The verse is progressively fulfilled. The initial, partial fulfillment is apparently to be found in the conflict between the Maccabees ("Zion") and the Seleucids ("Greece"). But the final, complete fulfillment awaits the outworking of chs. 12 and 14 and 9:16–17. The point of the verse is that God's people will gain the victory over their enemies.

14–16 Here the sound of the trumpet is evidently a reference to thunder (cf. Ex 19:16– 19). God will come down to aid, protect, and deliver his covenant people. On the bowl used for sprinkling the corners of the altar, see Lev 4:7. Verse 16 plainly declares the divine deliverance of Zion's people. "That day" embraces the final eschatological era.

"His people" are the Lord's flock (cf. Ps 100:3). There is an apparent antithesis between the "slingstones" used to subdue Israel's enemies and the precious stones, or "jewels" (the saved, victorious remnant), that will sparkle in the Lord's land. The Hebrew for "crown" (GK 5694) is often used of the crown of the high priest. How appropriate, then, for Israel, restored as a priestly nation (see ch. 3)!

17 With Israel's deliverance comes blessing, including agricultural prosperity, because Israel's covenantal God controls the weather and the rain (10:1). The result is a land of peace, prosperity, and plenty. "They" is literally "he" (possibly the Lord), but the singular could be collective for the delivered remnant of the future. "Grain" and "new wine" are signs of prosperity.

10:1 This verse probably contains a veiled polemic against Baal and Baalism (cf. Jer 14:22; Am 5:8). The Lord, not Baal, is the one who controls the weather and the rain, giving life and fertility to the land. Therefore the people of God are to pray to him and trust in him. Some regard the spring rains as literal; others understand them as spiritual and typical. Perhaps both are in view. Certainly in the grand consummation of the Messianic Era, both the physical and spiritual realms will flourish (cf. Isa 55:1–12; Hos 6:3; Joel 2:21–32).

d. Warning and encouragement (10:2–4)

2 Zechariah warns Israel's idolatrous leaders but encourages the people. Prayer to God brings blessing (v.1), but trust in idols (or the false gods they represent) produces disappointment and sorrow. The "idols" (teraphim; GK 9572) are household gods (cf. Ge 31:19); they were used for divination during the period of the "judges" (Jdg 17:5; 18:5). "Diviners" were consulted to foretell the future. Since they "see visions" and "tell dreams," they were included among the false prophets. Resorting to diviners for information and guidance is specifically proscribed in Dt 18:9–14, because God provided true prophets for his people (Dt 18:15–22).

Because diviners are unreliable, "they give comfort in vain"—e.g., when they wrongly promise rain and fruitful seasons. Similarly, because diviners speak lies, "therefore" the people are led astray like sheep without a shepherd. What the people need is spiritual leadership, but it is lacking (cf. Mk 6:34).

3–4 God threatens to judge the selfish, corrupt, unqualified leaders of the nation (cf. Eze 34:1–10). Since the earthly leaders are not taking proper care of the "flock," the Lord promises to care for them himself and to make them like a proud horse triumphant in battle. Verse 4 probably should be taken as messianic. So understood, the Messiah will come from Judah (cf. Ge 49:10; Jer 30:21). He is called (1) "the cornerstone" (cf. 3:9; cf. also Ps 118:22; Isa 28:16); (2) "the tent peg," a figure of a ruler as the support of the state (cf. Isa 22:23–24); and (3) "the battle bow," part of the Divine Warrior terminology (cf. Ps 45:5; Rev 19:11–16). From Judah will also come "every" divinely sanctioned king and ultimately the Messiah.

e. Israel's victory over her enemies (10:5–7)

5 The Lord promises to make Israel mighty and to reunite and restore the nation, causing the people to rejoice in him. Judah (i.e., its people) is probably the antecedent of "they." In the context "mighty men" has a military connotation: "valiant warriors." "Because" introduces the reason for their victory: supernatural help ("the LORD is with them") enables the infantry to overcome the cavalry (a symbol of power). God's people win against superior odds. Although the final fulfillment doubtless lies in the future, perhaps the first stage in the progressive fulfillment of the passage is to be found in the Maccabean victories.

6–7 There will be a reunification of south (Judah) and north (Joseph). The reason for their restoration is given as God's tender, motherly "compassion." The reason for their not continuing in a state of rejection is that the Lord is their covenantal God, bound to his people in a covenant relationship (cf. Ro 11). God's promise to answer them implies that they will pray to him for deliverance. Not only will Judah be like mighty men, but so also will Ephraim, resulting in great exuberance. For gladness associated with wine, see also Ps 104:15. The Lord is the secret, source, and sphere of this joy (Php 4:4).

f. Israel's complete deliverance and restoration (10:8–12)

8–9 The Lord promises to regather his people from distant lands. He will strengthen them, while the power of their ancient and traditional oppressors wanes. The word "redeem" (GK 1457) is often used for ransoming from slavery or captivity (see Isa 35:10; Mic 6:4; cf. 1 Pe 1:18–19). "Before" seems to recall the situation in Egypt (Ex 1:6–20). Even in the Diaspora the Jews will remember the Lord. According to the meaning of Zechariah's name, "the LORD remembers" his covenant people and promises. Now the prediction is made that they will remember him. And they will also survive and return to the Promised Land.

10–12 Egypt and Assyria, the two ancient oppressors of God's chosen people, are probably intended to represent all the countries where the Israelites are dispersed. They evoke memories of slavery and exile. The promise of regathering is similar to that in Isa 11:11–16. "Gilead" lies east of the Jordan and "Lebanon" west of the Jordan—both in the territory of the old northern kingdom.

On the statement that "there will not be room enough for them," see v.8 and Isa 49:19–21; 54:2–3. Obstacles will be no barrier (v.11). The people "will pass through the sea of trouble"—as at the Red Sea, or Sea of Reeds. The "scepter" (i.e., "rule") of other great powers over them will cease. If the Ephraimites (northern kingdom) are still in view (see v.7), God is promising to do the same for them as he did for Judah (v.6), namely, to strengthen them. The source of the strength is the Lord himself. Walking "in his name" is probably equivalent to serving "as his representatives or ambassadors," though it may also mean that they will live "in keeping with his revealed character"—by divine enablement, of course.

2. The rejection of the messianic Shepherd-King (11:1–17)

a. The prologue (11:1–3)

1–3 Some interpret this little poem as a taunt song describing the lament over the destruction of the nations' power and arrogance (ch. 10), represented by the cedar, the pine, and the oak. Their kings are represented by the shepherds and the lions. So understood, vv.1–3 provide the conclusion for the preceding section. But others interpret the piece more literally as a description of the devastation of Syro–Palestine because of the rejection of the Messiah and Good Shepherd (vv.4–14). Verses 1–3 would then introduce the next section. The names in the text—Lebanon, Bashan, and Jordan—seem to favor this approach. Part of the fulfillment would be the destruction and further subjugation of that whole area by the Romans, including the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 under Emperor Vespasian and General Titus, as well as the later fall of Masada. This action quelled one of several Jewish rebellions against Rome. Understood this way, the passage is in sharp contrast with what has just preceded in ch. 10, with its prediction of Israel's full deliverance and restoration to the covenant land. Now the scene is one of desolation for the land, followed by the threat of judgment and disaster for both land and people.

Lebanon was famous for its cedars, but they will be consumed. Jewish rabbis identified Lebanon here with the second temple (cf. 1Ki 6:15–18; 2Ch 2:8–9). The royal palace in Jerusalem was definitely referred to as "Lebanon" in Jer 22:23 (see 1Ki 7:2). The passage announces a judgment that would embrace both people and land, including Jerusalem and the temple. The pines and the oaks are to wail; for if the cedars do not survive the coming destruction, neither will they.

Bashan lay east of the Jordan and north of Mount Gilead. The Israelites took it from the Amorite king, Og, at the time of the conquest of Canaan (Nu 21:32–35). It was allotted to the half-tribe of Manasseh (Nu 32:33; Jos 13:30; 17:5). Bashan was renowned for its rich pastures and abundance of choice cattle (Dt 32:14; Eze 39:18). The oaks of Bashan are to wail because the "dense" (or better, "inaccessible") forest of Lebanon has been felled. How, then, can the lesser and more accessible trees escape?

The shepherds are wailing because the coming destruction will leave no pasture land for their flocks. Similarly, the lions are roaring because their lairs and food are gone, again because of the coming destruction.

b. The prophecy of the rejection of the Good Shepherd (11:4–14)

4–5 The reason for the calamity is the people's rejection of the messianic Shepherd-King. Just as the Servant in the Servant Songs (found basically in Isa 42; 49; 50; 53) is rejected, so here the Good Shepherd (a royal figure) is rejected. The same messianic King is in view in both instances. The purpose of this section, then, is to dramatize the rejection of the coming messianic Shepherd-King and the resulting rejection of Israel, ending in their judgment. "My God" indicates Zechariah's personal, intimate relationship with the Lord. What follows is addressed to him. Evidently he is instructed to act out the role of a good shepherd for the flock, i.e., Israel. The "slaughter" is explained in v.5, where the sheep (the Jews) are bought as slaves by outsiders. At least part of the fulfillment came in A.D. 70 and after. The sellers are their own shepherds—bad rulers or leaders.

6 "For" introduces the reason for the misery described in v.5, namely, the Lord's displeasure. The verse also interprets the parable of the flock. The "land" is Palestine. While the fulfillment may have been partially realized during the intertestamental period, it also seems to reach to Roman times; so one example of "king" would perhaps be the Roman emperor (cf. Jn 19:15), and those who "oppress the land" would include the Romans.

7–8a Zechariah carries out his divine instructions. In doing so, he becomes a type of the messianic Shepherd-King. He gives special attention to the "oppressed" (or "afflicted") of the flock. He also takes two staffs to ensure divine "favor" (GK 5840) on the flock and to ensure its "union" (GK 2482). Such unity (cf. Eze 37:15–28) is the result of the gracious leadership of the Good Shepherd.

Since so many interpretations have been given to the first part of v.8 (forty by one count), obviously no certainty is possible. "In one month" has been taken to refer to (1) a literal month, (2) a short period of time, and (3) a longer period of indefinite duration. One's conclusion on this matter will depend on one's identification of "the three shepherds." Four of the more popular interpretations are: (1) Eleazar, John, and Simon (the leaders of the three Jewish factions during the siege of Jerusalem by Titus in A.D. 70); (2) Seleucus IV, Heliodorus, and Demetrius Soter (three Seleucid kings); (3) Jason, Menelaus, and Alcimus (high priests); and (4) three classes of leaders, such as prophet, priest, and king (or a lesser civil authority). This much is certain: The Good Shepherd will dispose of all unfit leaders.

8b–9 In spite of the ideal ministry of the Good Shepherd, the flock as a whole detested him. Similarly, he grew weary of them (cf. Isa 1:13–14) and terminated his providential care of the sheep so that they even ate "one another's flesh." According to Josephus, this actually happened during the siege of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 by the Romans.

10–11 A further consequence of the Shepherd's rejection is the cessation of his gracious favor. He revokes his covenant of security and restraint, by which he had been apparently holding back the nations from his people (cf. Eze 34:25; Hos 2:18). Now the nations (e.g., the Romans) will be permitted to overrun them. The last "it" evidently refers to Israel's affliction by the nations (cf. Mt 23:13, 23–24, 33–39). Faithful believers discern that what happens (e.g., the judgment on Jerusalem and the temple in A.D. 70) is a fulfillment of God's prophetic word—a result of such actions as those denounced in Mt 23, which led to the rejection of the Good Shepherd.

12–13 Now comes the final, outright rejection of the Good Shepherd, including even "severance" pay (his death is predicted in 13:7). "Give me my pay" speaks of the termination of the relationship; "keep it" is a more emphatic way of terminating the relationship. The "flock" (v.11) responds with thirty pieces of silver as the remuneration for the Shepherd's services. This sum was not only the price of a slave among the Israelites in ancient times (Ex 21:32) but also apparently a way of indicating a trifling amount. Next the Lord instructed Zechariah: "Throw it to the potter"—possibly a proverb. "So I took" indicates not only the prophet's obedience but also his continuing to "impersonate" the Good Shepherd by acting out this "parable." For the NT use of vv.12–13, see comments on Mt 26:14–15; 27:3–10.

14 The first staff, called "Favor," was broken (v.10). Now the second one, called "Union," is broken. This signifies the destruction or dissolution of the covenant nation, particularly of the unity between the south and the north. Yet even this new destruction and dispersion are not permanent; otherwise there would be no point in the promises of Israel's future deliverance, regathering, and restoration in the succeeding chapters.

c. The worthless shepherd (11:15–17)

15–16 With the Shepherd of the Lord's choice removed from the scene, a foolish and worthless shepherd replaces him. Zechariah acts out the role of such a bad shepherd, thus signifying that a selfish, corrupt, and greedy leader would arise and afflict the flock—the people of Israel. So the first oracle of Part II ends on a note of sorrow. "Again" doubtless refers to v.7, where Zechariah took two shepherd's staffs as the equipment of the Good Shepherd. The "equipment" would also include a bag for food, a pipe or reed for calling the sheep, a knife, and a case for setting and binding up broken bones. The bad shepherd is here characterized as "foolish" (GK 216), a word denoting "one who is morally deficient" (NIV note on Pr 1:7).

The reason for Zechariah's impersonation of a foolish shepherd is explained by the "For": God is going to raise up a shepherd who will not do what a good shepherd should; instead he will destroy the sheep. When one removes "not" from the sentence, one has an enlightening description of a truly effective pastoral ministry in the church today: (1) "care for the lost," (2) "seek the young," (3) "heal the injured," and (4) "feed the healthy." The bad shepherd will do none of these things. Instead of feeding the sheep, he will feed on them—preying on the unwary. He will even tear off their hoofs, apparently in search of the last edible morsel.

17 This same sinister figure is now called "the worthless [GK 496] shepherd" because of his diabolical deeds, such as deserting the flock, in contrast to the Good Shepherd (Jn 10:11–13). For this reason judgment is pronounced against him. While this counterfeit shepherd may have found a partial, historical fulfillment in such leaders as Bar Kokhba, who led the Jewish revolt against the Romans in A.D. 132–35 and was hailed as the Messiah, it seems that the final stage of the progressive fulfillment of the complete prophecy awaits the rise of the final Antichrist (cf. Eze 34:2–4; Da 11:36–39; Jn 5:43; 2Th 2:3–10; Rev 13:1–8). The imprecation calls for his power ("arm") to be paralyzed ("completely withered") and his intelligence ("right eye") to be frustrated or nullified ("totally blinded"; cf. Rev 19:19–21; 20:10).

B. The Second Oracle: The Advent and Reception of the Messiah (12:1–14:21)

1. The deliverance and conversion of Israel (12:1–13:9)

a. The siege of Jerusalem (12:1–3)

1 Zechariah next encourages God's covenant people by contrasting initial judgment on them with their ultimate deliverance, restoration, and blessing. "In [or on] that day" appears sixteen times in the second oracle, placing it, for the most part, in the end times. The oracle basically revolves around two scenes: the final siege of Jerusalem and the Messiah's return to defeat Israel's enemies and to establish his kingdom fully.

It is surprising to be informed that the oracle concerns "Israel" instead of "Judah and Jerusalem," but it is clear that in chs. 12–14 "Israel" means the whole nation, not just the northern kingdom. The oracle begins by describing the Lord's creative power in the heavens, on the earth, and in human beings (Ge 2:7). Perhaps this description is a means of strengthening the royal and sovereign authority of the message.

2–3 Jerusalem is pictured as a cup that the nations gather around, eager to partake of its contents. But as they drink from her, they become intoxicated and reel. The end of v.2 indicates that the siege of Jerusalem will obviously affect Judah as well. Jerusalem is compared to a heavy, "immovable rock" that the nations attempt to move but only hurt themselves in the process. This, of course, will be due to special divine intervention and protection (vv.4–5). On the invasion of Jerusalem, "when all the nations of the earth are gathered against her," see also 14:2; Joel 3:9–16; Rev 16:16–21.

b. The divine deliverance (12:4–9)

4–6 In Dt 28:28, "panic" ("confusion of mind"), "madness," and "blindness" are listed among Israel's curses for disobeying the stipulations of the covenant. Now these curses are turned against Israel's enemies.

Special emphasis is laid on the horses to exalt God's power. On God's "watchful eye" over his people, see Pss 32:8 and 33:18. The wise leaders discern that the source of the people's strength is "the LORD Almighty." These faithful leaders are compared to a fire destroying wood and sheaves of grain; thus will they consume their enemies (cf. Jdg 15:3–5). By contrast Jerusalem and her people "will remain intact in her place."

7–9 In the coming deliverance there will be no superiority or inferiority or ranking of some above others in honor. Ultimately the Lord is the one who does the saving, the shielding or protecting, and the destroying of enemies. He will make the "feeblest" (lit., "the one who stumbles"; GK 4173) among them like David, who was celebrated as a great warrior. And the members of the Davidic dynasty will be "like God," which, in turn, is explained as being "like the Angel of the LORD going before them." God will be with them, will go before them, and will give them supernatural strength.

c. Israel's complete deliverance from sin (12:10–13:9)

10 Now there is movement from the physical deliverance, just described, to spiritual deliverance (cf. Dt 30:1–10). The Lord promises to "pour out" (GK 9161) his Spirit on his covenant people. The imagery is doubtless that of water as an emblem of the Holy Spirit. The recipients are the royal leaders and people of Jerusalem, representative of the inhabitants of the whole land. The content of the effusion is "a spirit of grace and supplication." While it is possible to construe "spirit" in the sense of "disposition," it seems preferable to follow the NIV margin note and see here a reference to the Spirit of God (cf. Isa 32:15; 44:3; 59:20–21; Jer 31:31, 33; Eze 36:26–27; 39:29; Joel 2:28–29). Because of the convicting work of God's Spirit, Israel will turn to the Messiah with mourning.

The most common meaning of the Hebrew preposition translated "on" is "to" (NIV note); there is no good contextual reason to depart from it here. The emphasis, then, is not on looking "on" (or "at") the Messiah literally but on looking "to" him in faith (cf. Nu 21:9; Isa 45:22; Jn 3:14–15). Some see this taking place at the second coming of Christ to the earth, or perhaps just prior to his second advent. The object of the people's look of faith is identified as "the one they have pierced" (cf. Ps 22:16; Isa 53:5; Jn 19:34). John 19:37, which quotes this part of the verse, is but a stage in the progressive fulfillment of the whole. The final, complete fulfillment is yet future for Israel (Ro 11:25–27). The similes at the end of the verse accentuate the people's mourning (see Ex 11:5–6; Jer 6:26).

11 The convicting work of the Spirit of God will produce national contrition or repentance, led by the civil (royal) and religious leaders. The future weeping ("on that day") in Jerusalem is compared with "the weeping of Hadad Rimmon in the plain of Megiddo." Hadad-Rimmon is perhaps best taken as a place name (containing the names of ancient Semitic fertility gods) near Megiddo. So understood, the simile refers to the people of this town mourning the death of King Josiah (2Ch 35:20–27; see v.22 there for the plain of Megiddo and vv.24–25 for the mourning).

12–14 The expressions "each clan by itself" and "their wives by themselves" are doubtless intended to emphasize the sincerity of the mourning as true repentance. This is no purely emotional public spectacle. Nor are professional mourners involved. Individually and corporately, this is the experience of Lev 16 (the Day of Atonement) and Ps 51 (a penitential psalm) on a national scale. The mourning includes the royal house of David and the family of his son Nathan (2Sa 5:14), also the house of Levi and the family of Shimei son of Gershon, the son of Levi (Nu 3:17–18, 21), as well as "all the rest." While the repentance is led by the civil (royal) and religious leaders, it extends to every clan in the nation (cf. Isa 53:1–9).

13:1 Verse 1 contains new-covenant terminology. In Jer 31:33–34 God promised Israel: (1) enablement through his Spirit to obey his law (v.33a; Eze 36:26–27); (2) an intimate personal relationship and fellowship (v.33b); (3) a saving knowledge of himself (v.34a; Ro 11:26a); and (4) the forgiveness of sins (v.34b; Eze 36:25; Zec 3:4, 9; Ro 11:27). It is clear from the NT (e.g., Lk 22:20; 1Co 11:25; Heb 8–10) that the church—Gentiles and the spiritual remnant of Israel (Ro 11:1–16)—is today the recipient of the benefits promised to Israel in the new covenant. This is made possible only by God's sovereign, gracious grafting of Gentiles nto that place of blessing (Ro 11:17–24). The cleansing referred to is related particularly to the fourth provision of the new covenant (see above) and is ultimately made possible through the atoning death of the pierced one (12:10).

2–3 Not only will there be personal internal cleansing—morally and spiritually—but also external cleansing, as the country is purged of "idols" and "false prophets," both of which were such a constant snare and source of deception to Israel (10:2–3; Jer 23:30–32; 27:9–10; Eze 13:1–14:11). God himself ("I") declares that he will rid the land of the names (i.e., the influence, fame, and even the very existence) of the idols. That false prophecy was still a problem in the postexilic period is clear from Ne 6:12–14. That both idolatry and false prophecy would once again be a problem in the future is evident also in Mt 24:4–5, 11, 15, 23–24; 2Th 2:2–4; Rev 9:20; 13:4–15. The "spirit of impurity" that inspired the false prophets to lie will also be removed. In that future day, if anyone dares to utter false prophecies ("lies"), his own parents—in obedience to Dt 13:6–9—will take the lead in executing him. The word "stab" (GK 1991; cf. "pierced" in 12:10) indicates that the feelings and actions shown in piercing the Messiah will be directed toward the false prophets.

4–6 Because of these stern measures, a false prophet will be reticent in identifying himself as such and will be evasive in responding to questioning. To help conceal his true identity, he will not wear "a prophet's garment of hair," such as Elijah wore (2Ki 1:8). To avoid being killed, he will deny being a prophet and will claim to have been a farmer from his youth. And if some suspicious person notices marks on his body and inquires about them, he will claim he received them in a scuffle with friends or as discipline from his parents during childhood. Apparently the accuser suspects that the false prophet's wounds were self-inflicted to arouse his prophetic ecstasy in idolatrous rites (as in 1Ki 18:28; cf. also Lev 19:28; 21:5; Dt 14:1; Jer 16:6; 41:5; 48:37).

7 Compared to the immediately preceding verses, the oracle now moves back to the time when Israel would be scattered because of her rejection of the true messianic Shepherd. Then, after the announcement of the dispersion, the oracle seems to advance to a future period when Israel will undergo a special, purifying discipline, as silver and gold are refined (vv.8–9). The surviving remnant will be the Lord's people (v.9).

Death is announced against one whom God calls "my shepherd," i.e., the royal Good Shepherd—the true Shepherd of 11:4–14, in contrast with the foolish and worthless shepherd of 11:15–17. God also identifies him as "the man who is close to me." The expression eventually leads to Jn 10:30: "I and the Father are one" (cf. also Jn 1:1–2; 14:9).

In 11:17 it was the worthless shepherd who was to be struck; now it is the Good Shepherd (cf. 12:10). Apparently the one who wields the "sword" is God himself. In 12:10–14 the Messiah's death is presented as an act of Israel, but here it is the sovereign act of God (cf. Isa 53:10; Ac 2:23). When the Shepherd is struck, the sheep (cf. 10:3, 9) are scattered, in fulfillment of the curses for covenant disobedience (Dt 28:64; 29:24–25). This part of v.7 is quoted by Jesus not long before his arrest (Mt 26:31; Mk 14:27) and applied to the scattering of the apostles (Mt 26:56; Mk 11:50), but they are probably intended to serve as a type of the Diaspora that occurred in A.D. 70 and following. "The little ones" are the remnant (vv.8–9), "the oppressed" or "afflicted of the flock" (11:7, 11; cf. Isa 6:13; 66:22–24).

8–9 These verses apparently precede vv.1–6 chronologically. They depict a refining process for Israel. While what happened in A.D. 70 at the hands of the Romans may have been an initial stage in the progressive fulfillment, the final stage is yet future, for Israel as a whole is not in the proper covenant relationship with God described in v.9. The fact that a remnant will survive ("one-third") reveals God's mercy in the midst of judgment.

The survivors (cf. Jer 30:7) are those of 12:10–13:1; they will constitute the Jewish nucleus of the messianic kingdom and will evidently include the 144,000 of Rev 7:1–8 and 14:1–5. The calling on the Lord's name includes the "supplication" of 12:10. The verse closes with the covenant formula: "I will say, 'They are my people,' and they will say, 'The LORD is our God.'" Thus the new covenant will be fulfilled for Israel, and they will be restored to proper covenant relationship with the Lord (cf. also Eze 20:30–44, esp. v.37).

2. The Messiah's return and his kingdom (14:1–21)

a. The siege of Jerusalem (14:1–2)

1–2 The ultimate goal of all history is the Lord's personal appearance and reign. But before the literal and full manifestation of his kingdom, the earth must experience the throes of birth pangs. There is a return to the refining process as the nations gather at Jerusalem and ravish her. Although "a day of the LORD" is not the usual construction for "the day of the LORD," it doubtless means the same thing; "that day" occurs throughout the context (chs. 12–14). Perhaps this particular construction is used here to emphasize the fact that the "day" is distinctively the Lord's. Human beings are having their day now; a day of the Lord is yet to come. "Your" refers to Jerusalem.

"I" is a reminder that the sovereign God is in complete control. As the Lord of history and nations, he is the Prime Mover. The scene depicted here (contingents from all nations gathered to fight against Jerusalem) is probably the same as the one in Rev 16:16–21 (Armageddon). This eschatological verse alone—with its statement that "the city will be captured"—is sufficient to refute the notion popular in certain circles that "the times of the Gentiles" (Lk 21:24) were fulfilled as of the rebirth of the modern state of Israel. According to Lucan theology, after "the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled," Jerusalem will be trampled on no more. Since Zec 14:2 clearly indicates that Jerusalem will be "trampled on" again in the future, the "times of the Gentiles" would seem to extend to the Messiah's second advent, when those "times" will be replaced by the final, universal, everlasting kingdom of Da 2:35, 44–45. The rest of v.2 delineates some of the horrors that still await Jerusalem and its people. The fulfillment must still lie in the future. At that time all this will happen to fulfill the curses pronounced against covenant disobedience (Dt 28:30).

b. The tokens of the Messiah's return (14:3–8)

3–5 Just when it seems that all hope is gone, "then the LORD" himself appears as Divine Warrior and delivers his beleaguered people. But who is this "LORD"? When one compares this scene with Ac 1:9–12 and Rev 19:11–16, it appears certain that "the LORD" here is ultimately the Messiah. The passage, then, is indirectly messianic. "The day of battle" is any occasion when the Lord supernaturally intervenes to deliver his people, such as at the Red Sea (Ex 14:13–14). Acts 1:11–12 may well allude to the prophecy that "his feet will stand on the Mount of Olives," which is situated "east of Jerusalem." In the final days, when the Lord will stand on this mountain, it will split in two (perhaps due to an earthquake), creating a great valley running east and west. The purpose of the valley is to afford an easy means of rapid escape from the final anti-Semitic onslaught; the Mount of Olives has always constituted a serious obstacle to such an escape to the east.

The future escape of God's people is compared with the time when their ancestors "fled from the earthquake in the days of Uzziah king of Judah"—an earthquake so devastating and memorable that it is mentioned also in Am 1:1. In announcing the Lord's coming, Zechariah expresses his own personal faith in him ("my God"). "All the holy ones" will be in the Lord's retinue when he comes. These apparently include both believers and unfallen angels (see Mt 25:31; Rev 19:14).

6–8 The precise meaning of these verses is admittedly uncertain, but the general picture is clear. The eschatological aspect of the Day of the Lord described here will be characterized by cataclysmic phenomena, including cosmic signs (cf. Isa 13:9–10; Joel 2:31; 3:15; Am 5:18; Mt 24:29–30; Rev 6:12–14; 8:8–12; 9:1–18; 14:14–20; 16:4, 8–9). Because of the topographical, cosmic, and indeed, even cataclysmic changes, that day will be "unique" (GK 285). The situation itself cannot be classified as either day or night—"a day known [only] to the LORD." But after the judgment and suffering (possibly the refining of 13:8–9) are past, "there will be light" again, possibly symbolizing the ushering in of the new order.

Is the "living water" literal (physical) or figurative (spiritual)? It is probably best to view it as both literal and symbolic (cf. Pss 46:4; 65:9; Isa 8:6; Jer 2:13; Eze 47:1–12; Jn 4:10–14; 7:38; Rev 22:1–2). "The eastern sea" is the Dead Sea and "the western sea" is the Mediterranean.

c. The establishment of the Messiah's kingdom (14:9–11)

9 Statements like "The LORD will be king over the whole earth" stand at the very center of a truly biblical theology. When this comes true in the fullest sense, the prayer of Mt 6:9–10 will be answered. The time is coming when there will be no more idolatry, polytheism, or even henotheism, but only high, ethical monotheism (cf. Dt 6:4).

10–11 The land around Jerusalem is to be leveled while Jerusalem is to be elevated (see v.4). Geba was located almost six miles north of Jerusalem at the northern boundary of the kingdom of Judah (2Ki 23:8). As the text indicates, the Rimmon mentioned here is the one situated "south of Jerusalem" (this distinguishes it from other OT towns of the same name). It is usually identified with En Rimmon ("spring of the pomegranate tree," Ne 11:29; cf. Jos 15:32).

The term "Arabah" applied in part or wholly to the depression of the Jordan Valley, extending from Mt. Hermon, a 9100-ft. elevation in the Anti-Lebanon Range, and including both sides of the Jordan River, the Dead Sea, and the region slightly to the southwest as far as the head of the Gulf of Aqaba. That Jerusalem will thus be elevated is in agreement with Isa 2:2. The Benjamin Gate, the First Gate, and the Tower of Hananel were all at the northeastern part of the city wall, the Corner Gate was at its northwest corner, and the royal winepresses were just south of the city (cf. Jer 31:38). Furthermore, the city will be densely populated, never again to be depopulated through destruction. Finally, "Jerusalem will be secure" (see Jer 31:40).

d. The punishment of Israel's enemies (14:12–15)

12–15 The prophet next reveals how God will deal with the antikingdom forces of vv.1–3. (1) He will strike them with a "plague," just as he did the Assyrian army of King Sennacherib in 701 B.C. (Isa 37:36). (2) The Lord will strike the enemies of himself and his people with "great panic," causing them to "attack each other" (cf. Jdg 7:22; 1Sa 14:15–20; 2Ch 20:23). (3) The rest of the people of Judah will rally to defend the capital. The validity of this last point rests on the NIV rendering "at Jerusalem." Verse 14 ends with the Jews gathering the plunder, or spoils, of battle. Verse 15 adds that a plague similar to that in vv.12–13 will strike the beasts of burden, thus preventing their use for escape.

e. The universal worship of the King (14:16–19)

16 In spite of the awful decimation predicted in vv.12–15, there will be "survivors" (GK 3855)—a converted remnant from those nations—who will make an annual pilgrimage to Jerusalem "to worship the King" (see Isa 2:2–4; also Eze 40–48). "The Feast of Tabernacles" marked the final harvest of the year's crops (Lev 23:34–43). It was to be a time of grateful rejoicing (Lev 23:40; Dt 16:14–15; Ne 8:17). The people were to live in "booths" as a reminder that their ancestors lived in booths when the Lord brought them out of Egypt (Lev 23:42–43). Beginning with the period of Ezra and Nehemiah, the reading (and perhaps teaching) of "the Book of the Law of God" became an integral part of the festivities (Ne 8:18; cf. Isa 2:3). The festival seems to speak of the final, joyful regathering and restoration of Israel in full kingdom blessing, as well as of the ingathering of the nations. It may continue to have some significance (at least typically) in the eternal state (in the New Jerusalem on the new earth), since God will "live" (lit., "tabernacle"; GK 5012) with his people (Rev 21:3).

17–19 The prophet next unfolds what will happen to the recalcitrant nations that refuse to send delegations on this annual pilgrimage to worship the King in Jerusalem: The blessing of rain will be withheld from them (cf. Dt 28:22–24). This principle is illustrated with Egypt. Thus will all be punished who do not make the annual pilgrimage to Jerusalem to worship the King and to observe the thankful expressions associated with the Feast of Tabernacles, and thus will the King be universally worshiped.

f. "HOLY TO THE LORD" (14:20–21)

20–21 Here the nature of the messianic kingdom is depicted: It will be characterized by holiness (see 2:12). There will be holiness in public life ("the bells of the horses"), in religious life ("the cooking pots in the LORD's house"), and in private life ("every pot in Jerusalem and Judah"). Even common things become holy when they are used for God's service. So it is with our lives. In this way God's original purpose for Israel (Ex 19:6) will be fulfilled. "Cook" (GK 1418) means "cook the sacrifices." While the Hebrew for "Canaanite" can also mean "merchant" (possibly referring either to 11:5 or to the kind of activity condemned by Jesus in Mt 21:12–13), "Canaanite" seems the better translation, representing anyone who is morally or spiritually unclean—anyone who is not included among the chosen people of God (cf. Isa 35:8; Eze 43:7; 44:9; Rev 21:27).

The final scene of the book of Zechariah anticipates Rev 11:15, toward which all history is steadily moving—"the kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he will reign for ever and ever"—and Rev 19:16—"On his robe and on his thigh he has this name written: KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS."

Malachi

INTRODUCTION

1. Background

Unlike most other prophets, Malachi mentioned no datable persons or events in his brief prophecy. Any clues to the origin and time of his book must come from the text and its implications. Tradition, however, gives us some information. Malachi is and always has been placed last in the Minor Prophets, and there is an approximate chronological arrangement within the three major prophets and the twelve minor ones. In fact, the Talmud regularly classes Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi together as the three postexilic prophets.

From the contents of Malachi, we deduce that the prophet wrote sometime after Ezra. Zerubbabel, the first governor after the return from the Babylonian exile, had, with the aid of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, encouraged the people to rebuild the temple (515 B.C.). Ezra returned with another group of exiles in 458 B.C. Thirteen years later, Nehemiah returned and led the people in rebuilding the walls of the city of Jerusalem. In the twelfth year of his governorship, Nehemiah returned to Persia for an unknown period of time (cf. Ne 5:14; 13:6). It was during this interim, perhaps in 434 B.C., that Malachi took the helm of spiritual affairs in Jerusalem.

Some of the exiles had returned, the temple had been rebuilt, and the sacrificial system had been reestablished. Indeed, it had been functioning long enough to develop certain abuses against which Malachi contended at some length in his book.

In 1:8 another hint appears. The Persian word for "governor" (pehah; GK 7068) had been given to Nehemiah (Ne 5:14; 12:26), but the use here probably does not indicate Nehemiah because (1) his name is not given and its absence is hard to explain, and (2) the tone of the verse indicates a pagan ruler. Thus pehah in 1:8 likely refers to an interim governor who filled the office during Nehemiah's absence, so that Malachi's work preceded Nehemiah's second term as governor.

Many similarities exist between the thrust of Malachi's message and Nehemiah's reforms, such as mixed marriages (Ne 10:30; 13:23–27; Mal 2:11; cf. Ezra 9–10); corrupt priesthood (Ne 13:4–9; Mal 1:6–2:9); financial abuses (Ne 13:10–13; Mal 3:5–10). This is why the two are usually connected.

Thus the exiles had returned; the temple had been rebuilt; the city of Jerusalem had returned to a substantial degree of normalcy; and the inevitable lethargy, laxity, and leniency in spiritual matters had developed. A measure of comfort and security under Persian suzerainty encouraged the people of Judah to let their hands fall in their task of building their nation under God. To this declining state of affairs the last prophet of the OT addressed himself.

2. Authorship

Nothing is known of Malachi apart from his book. Even his name is in question. Some doubt that "Malachi" is a name and translate it as a title, meaning either "my messenger" or "the LORD's messenger." The suggestion has ancient support in the LXX. Some scholars affirm that the book is actually only the last of three sections of Zechariah, which was cut off in order to make the Minor Prophets amount to the sacred number twelve. The total obscurity of the author of the book is underlined by the absence of the name Malachi in all the rest of the Bible. Even in NT quotations, no name is given (Mt 11:10; Mk 1:2; Lk 7:27).

On the other hand, each of the other writing prophets is named in the opening verses of his book. If a man named Malachi did not write the book bearing this name, he would be the only exception. Moreover, Malachi is neither an unlikely name nor an unsuitable one for the author of this last book of the prophets. After all, Malachi was the Lord's messenger. His trumpet made no uncertain sound. Clearly and unmistakably he indicted his people and the priests for their sin and summoned them to righteousness.

3. Date

Malachi's book cannot be earlier than 516/515 B.C., because that was when the second temple was finished. Scholars have placed him anytime from then on through the administration of Nehemiah in Jerusalem. Ezra came to Jerusalem in 458 B.C. and Nehemiah in 445 (according to the traditional reckoning).

4. Occasion and Purpose

Apathy toward the temple ritual and especially toward the law of Moses had reached such proportions in postexilic Judah that God raised up the prophet Malachi to reprimand the people. The battle for truth and righteousness had waned because their obvious political enemies were gone. Yet this left room for the not-so-obvious enemies—namely, smugness, pride, and compromise.

The people in general and the priests in particular had lost their sense of "chosenness" (1:2). Not respecting his codes and regulations (1:6) showed they had stopped honoring God. Among them intermarriage with unbelievers was rampant (2:11). The view of domestic commitment was low, and divorce was the result (2:16). In 3:5 is a list of abuses and unacceptable practices: sorcery, adultery, perjury, fraud, oppression, and injustice. These were the things that occasioned Malachi's angry indictment.

No prophet or preacher who loves his people enjoys pointing out their sin or warning them of doom to come. So Malachi must have found his assignment, which was so packed with judgment of the people and the priests, a hard one. All the threats, challenges, encouragements, and promises were for the spiritual upbuilding of the repatriated exiles and their children. God and Malachi wanted a righteous nation, a pure and devoted priesthood, happy homes, God-fearing children, and a people characterized by truth, integrity, generosity, gratitude, fidelity, love, and hope.

5. Theology

The paramount theme of theology is the person and work of God himself. Malachi presents the sovereign Lord as the God of Israel and the God of the whole world. In 3:6 not only is the immutability of God affirmed—"I the LORD do not change"—but the corollary of the impossibility of his promises being nullified is also stated: "So you, O descendants of Jacob, are not destroyed." God has determined to maintain a people for himself; and it will happen—if not in Malachi's day, then in a later age.

Malachi was in accord with the great OT prophets in reminding the people he was addressing of the universality of God. God was concerned with all nations, not just Israel (cf. 1:5).

It may seem that Malachi was overly concerned with the proper execution of the ritual parts of the Hebrew religion (cf. 1:8, 13; 3:8), but a careful reading will show that he was actually concerned with what Jesus called the "more important matters of the law—justice, mercy and faithfulness" (Mt 23:23).

Malachi preached a God of justice who would condemn sinners but would also reward the righteous. Tithing would produce blessing (3:10); the righteous would be spared on that "day" (v.17). Those who revered God's name would bask in the "sun of righteousness" (4:2). So Malachi was a prophet of both malediction and benediction, because he preached a God who was altogether fair in his dealings with people.

Malachi's most notable contribution to the OT's corpus of messianic prophecy was his reference to the forerunner. The first allusion is in 3:1. "My messenger" there cannot be Malachi but rather some Elijah who would announce for the last time in the OT God's terms of repentance (4:5; cf. Mt 11:14; 17:12–13; Mk 9:11–13; Lk 1:17).

EXPOSITION

I. The Favor of the Lord (1:1–5)

1 This verse tells us the three barest minimum facts about the "oracle" (GK 5363): (1) it is from the Lord, (2) it is for Israel, and (3) Malachi is its agent.

2–3 The prophecy begins with the beautiful words "I have loved you." The popular attitude was that God had forsaken his people. Though the Exile might have prompted such feelings, one would think that the near miraculous turn of events that led to the repatriation of many of the Hebrews would have given the people cause to think about God's faithfulness. That return, though unaccompanied by the miracles of the Exodus from Egypt, was nevertheless viewed exultingly as the work of the hand of God. In the absence of any subsequent marvels, however, there came despair born of unfulfilled hopes.

The divine rejoinder to the people's question alludes to a crucial event in Isaac's family. While it is not baldly stated in Ge 25:23, in his sovereignty God chose Jacob over Esau, a choice that was tantamount to "hating" Esau. Paul used this to illustrate the doctrine of election (Ro 9:13). Malachi describes the result of God's rejection of Esau; his territory, ancient Edom, became a wasteland inhabited by desert jackals. In the fourth century B.C., the Nabataeans moved through Edom—driving the Edomites westward out of their centuries-old homeland—to the southern part of Judah. This area later came to be known as Idumea (cf. Mk 3:8).

4–5 These verses elaborate God's rejection of Esau's land (cf. Isa 11:14; 34:5–6; Jer 49:7–22; Eze 25:12–14; 35:15; Joel 3:19; Am 1:11; Obadiah). Of all the enemies of Israel, Edom was perhaps the most long-lived and consistent one. The enmity began with Amalek, an Edomite (Ex 17:8–16), and continued through the Exodus (Nu 14:44–45), into the period of the Judges (Jdg 3:12–13), and to the time of Saul (1Sa 15:1–3) and David (1Sa 27:8). Moreover, the enemies mentioned by Ezra (4:7) and Nehemiah (4:7) probably included Edomites (Amalekites), and this special curse would be an oblique kind of encouragement to the Israelites.

Though the Edomites in some small measure rebuilt their country, though never regaining its former territory or power, God spoke of his intention to see it perpetually cursed. This evidence of God's power beyond the borders of Israel will evoke from his people the doxology "Great is the LORD." This is the first of three or four such phrases throughout the book that speak of God's plans going beyond the boundaries of Israel (cf. 1:11, 14; 3:12; and perhaps 4:6).

II. The Failure of the Priests (1:6–14)

A. Disrespectful Service (1:6–7)

6–7 This first part of the indictment against the priests contains two more rhetorical questions. The first is God's: "Where is the respect due me?" The unwritten answer is that they had not been honoring the Lord. The servants at the temple, who were the closest to sacred things, had defaulted in the most central obligation of all—honoring God. And if the leadership failed, what could the people be expected to do? But spiritual leaders have often run the risk of treating sacred things as ordinary.

From the general charge of failing to honor the Lord, the prophet moved to this specific one: "You place defiled food on my altar." The priests countered this charge with a question. Then the prophet responded with an explanation of the charge: the priests say "that the LORD's table is contemptible."

B. Disqualified Sacrifices (1:8–9)

8 With four more questions, the prophet expanded the charge against the priests. Was it not wrong to sacrifice blind animals? Of course it was! The law forbade bringing lame, blind, blemished, or sick animals to the altar (Dt 15:21). The priests should have been reminding the people of these regulations. The second question is like the first. The third and fourth ones clearly imply that such offerings would be unacceptable to the governor. The context probably implies that this governor was not Nehemiah but one of the Persian appointees who served before Nehemiah arrived in Jerusalem, or perhaps during his absence from it. Furthermore, animals were probably not brought to him as sacrifices but as a form of tax. Despite their generally favorable attitude toward the exiles, the Persians would not tolerate any cutting of corners by their subjects.

9 The closing verse of this section, where God speaks of himself in the third person, seems loaded with irony. Most modern translations understand it as one more of Malachi's ways of charging the priests with sin. The point is that God would not extend his favor when the gifts for thanksgiving and entreaty were given, because their shoddiness was an insult.

C. Disdainful Attitudes (1:10–14)

10 God, again speaking of himself in the first person (cf. v.9), wishes that the temple would go out of business. As long as it was not serving as a meeting place for God and his people, why should any perfunctory and self-deceiving rituals go on in it? Not only were the sacrifices ineffective, but the priests and the people were lulled into thinking that their deeds were winning God's approval. So why not shut the temple doors and be done with what was for the priests merely a nuisance? God could hardly have spoken his mind more clearly than he did in the last part of v.10: "I am not pleased with you . . . and I will accept no offering from your hands."

11 God told his faithless priests that he had others who in different places and in later times would bring acceptable offerings and give him with love and devotion the worship he demanded (cf. Heb 13:15–16; Rev 5:8). No doubt Christians are among those of the far-off nations living in the distant future, who in Malachi's day were thought to be without hope because they had no contact with the religion of Jerusalem (cf. 1Pe 2:9).

12–13 Once more the altar of the temple was called a "table" (GK 8947; cf. v.7). The priests were charged with profaning the Lord's name when they declared that his table was defiled and its food contemptible. The food, of course, was the grain and meat offerings the priests put on the Lord's table. It was true that certain species of animals and others that were blemished defiled the altar. But it was the priests' responsibility to keep such unacceptable offerings away from the altar. How strange that now they were the ones complaining of the defilement! Malachi put into words the thoughts of the priests. For them the holy service of God had become a bore, a labor of duty rather than of love, a yoke around their necks. The very men who were the mediators between God and his people (Ex 28:1, 43), the teachers of Israel (Lev 10:11; Dt 33:10; 2Ch 15:3), and the court of appeal (Dt 19:17–19) were, by their own choice, profaning their office and bringing shame on the name of the Lord. The question asked in v.13 lists the things that make animals unacceptable for sacrifice. "Should I accept [such animals from you]?" God asked.

14 God spoke drastically but realistically: "Cursed is the cheat." The opposite of "blessed" is "cursed," and the opposite of an honest person is a cheat. God is an absolute sovereign. If the people he chose reject him, as Lord, he will choose others—i.e.,Gentiles, foreigners—who will revere his holy name.

III. The Rebuke of the Lord (2:1–9)

1–2 This section is aimed at the priests. The "curse" (GK 826 and 4423) idea relates to 1:14. The "blessings" are probably the very things that ultimately benefited the priesthood. Two of them are named in 3:11—pest-free crops and fruitful vines. The Levites lived off the tithes the people brought. When the nation as a whole suffered from drought or any other calamity, the perquisites of the priests dropped off proportionately.

3–6 "Offal" (GK 7302) was the internal waste of the sacrificial animal that normally was carried outside the camp. But here it is first used as a gross insult to the officiating priests; they and it would be carried away.

The word "covenant" (GK 1382) appears six times in this little book. The first three (2:4–5, 8) refer to God's covenant with Levi; then come references to the "covenant of the fathers" (v.10), the marriage covenant (v.14), and the new covenant (3:1). The covenant arrangement with the Levites was to endure unaltered. Obviously they were not meeting their responsibilities.

The description of what a priest should be simply did not fit the priests of Malachi's day. "Life and peace," "reverence," "true instruction," and "uprightness" were to be the hallmarks of those serving in the temple. There were to be the absence of falsehood on the lips and the ministry of turning many from sin. But in Malachi's day, instead of turning people from sin, the priests were, by their words and deeds, turning them to sin.

Throughout vv.4–6 Levi is spoken of ideally. What little we know of him is not so favorable; Jacob's "prophecy" in Ge 49:5–7 tells us something of what Jacob felt. Much more positive is the "blessing" of Moses on the ideal Levite (Dt 33:8–11) that Malachi was speaking of in this section. Doubtless many did their jobs conscientiously and with the required reverence and devotion.

7–8 The priests were the custodians of learning, both the preservers and the pioneers of scholarship. But those who sought to drink at those wells found them either dry or poisoned. Instead of turning people into "the way," the priests did the opposite. Such irresponsibility violated the covenant of Levi. Sins of omission were compounded with sins of commission. Malachi made it clear that God could tolerate the situation no longer.

9 The verdict comes. The sentence on the priests involved shame and humiliation. The regrettable part was that all priests were painted with the same brush, even though there must have been some conscientious ones among them. An additional feature of the indictment comes right at the end of this verse: the offenders had shown partiality in matters of the law.

So ends the section charging the Levitical priests with various misdemeanors and failures. From these specific targets of his wrath, God next turns to the people as a whole.

IV. The Unfaithfulness of the People (2:10–16)

The balance of ch. 2 deals with the same social evils Ezra and Nehemiah addressed: the problem of intermarriage with unbelievers and the subsequent divorces (Ezr 9:2; Ne 14:23–28). Hand in hand with this sin went a certain compromise of true religion.

10–12 The broad introductory statement is, of course, addressed to the people of Israel, not to the Moabites, Tyrians, Philistines, Syrians, or others with whom the intermarriage had taken place. Since Hebrew makes no proper-noun distinctions, the translators must decide whether "father" refers to God or to Abraham. In either case the point is clear: "We Jews should cooperate, work harmoniously, and marry within our own people." The implications of "breaking faith with one another" (cf. v.11) probably are broader than simply the matter of divorce. All betrayals, from the slightest unkindness to the grossest injustice, merit God's disapproval.

The mixture of the ideas of intermarriage and prostitution of the sanctuary is not unlike what Paul said in 2Co 6:14–16. Not to distinguish between Israelite women and heathen women—or between Christian spouses and unbelievers—is to deny the difference between the God of the Bible and the pagan deities. Malachi said there would be no exceptions to the rule: Intermarriage meant excommunication.

13 Apparently the people made a great display of grief over their spiritual barrenness. How exactly the lay people could be in a position to weep over the altar is uncertain. The people's sorrow, however, was for the wrong reason; they should have been bemoaning their sins rather than their lack of divine acceptance and consequent blessing.

14 We might consider the "Why" as another of Malachi's rhetorical questions. Having put the question in their mouths, the prophet proceeded to answer it. The reference to "wife of your youth" suggests that the men were divorcing their aging wives in favor of younger women.

15 This is the most difficult verse in the book grammatically. In effect it says that God made monogamous marriage and intends unions to last. Apparently the Israelites not only were marrying foreign women but were also divorcing their Israelite wives in the process. So they were really guilty of two sins—divorce and intermarriage with foreigners.

16 God succinctly gives his verdict: "I hate divorce." Many today would accuse Malachi of having a rigid view of marriage and divorce. But the covenant made between a man and a woman in the presence of a priest, the vicar of God, must be taken with utmost seriousness. "What God has joined together, let man not separate" was Jesus' way of saying it (Mt 19:6; Mk 10:9). Not even the man who is a part of that union may make such a separation.

V. The Coming Messenger of the Lord (2:17–3:5)

17 The question "Where is the God of justice?" points to the abuses in connection with worship and divorce. These have their roots in hearts destitute of the fear of God and culminate in avowed unbelief in the justice of Almighty God and his moral government of the world. God himself will answer their question, for 3:1 has "the LORD you are seeking will come to his temple." And 3:5 reads, "So I will come near to you for judgment." The first question in v.17 is "How have we wearied him [God]?" To this the prophet responds along now familiar lines. God was tired of hypocrisy, inverted morals, spiritual blindness, and obduracy.

3:1 This verse is quoted in the NT (Mt 11:10; Mk 1:2; Lk 7:27), all referring it to John the Baptist. Thus the one called "my messenger" is the forerunner of Christ, John the son of Zechariah and Elizabeth. The Lord who then follows is none other than Jesus Christ, the Son of God. The prophet's choice of the word "Lord" ('adon; GK 123) rather than "LORD" (GK 3378) points to this (cf. Ac 2:36; 1Co 12:3; Php 2:11). Significantly, the "me" establishes an identification between the first and second persons of the Trinity. Christ came to the temple, first as a baby to be dedicated, then at least yearly for the festivals. Most notably he came the last week of his life.

The phrase "whom you desire" is significant: Even in their sin the people longed for deliverance through the Messiah. Amos had people in his audience who "desired" the Day of the Lord; but he bluntly told them that the Day of the Lord would be darkness and not light (Am 5:18–20). So, too, Malachi asked, "Who can endure the day of his coming?" The coming Messiah would bring judgment—vindication and exoneration for the righteous but condemnation and punishment for the wicked. Like most OT prophets, Malachi, in his picture of the coming Christ, mingled the two advents. So while the birth and earthly ministry of Christ are in view in v.1, we already have the returning Judge in v.2. It could be said that the latter days began with Bethlehem and continued through the present, to be culminated in the eternal state. The Day of the Lord is any day God steps into history to do a special work, whether of judgment or deliverance. This passage speaks of purification and judgment.

2–4 Malachi continues his use of rhetorical questions as he asked in two ways, "Who will stand when he appears?" Christ's judgment, a Second Advent function, is likened to two purifying agents: fire for metals and soap for clothing. Just as these remove impurities, he will purify the latter-day Levites so that they will gleam and endure like "gold and silver." As a result of that process, God will have an approved and accepted priesthood to carry out the sacred ministry in a right spirit. Verse 4 does not mean that descendants of Levi and Aaron will function in any NT temple; it is, rather, symbolic of a cleansed and sanctified church (cf. 1Pe 2:5, 9; Rev 1:6; 5:10; 20:6). The soundest logical and theological reason for the abolition of the sacrificial system is found in Heb 9:23–10:14.

5 God simply says that he will at that time speedily bring to justice all sorts of malefactors. "Sorcerers" (GK 4175) is a category that takes in practitioners of the occult. "Adulterers" (GK 5537) includes any departure from God's ordained pattern of family life. Next come "perjurers" (lit., "false swearers"). This covers everything from "white lies" to perjury in a high court. The indictment against oppressors of widows and orphans reflects Malachi's interest in social justice. Like all true ministers of God, Malachi could not divorce responsibilities toward God from those toward other human beings. The number of laws in the Scriptures for the protection of aliens suggests it must have been common or easy to exploit expatriates among the Israelites. Hospitality was a requirement, any breach of which would come under the rubric of depriving aliens. All the offenders are categorized as those who "do not fear me." Their sin testified to a lamentable absence of that godly fear that is "the beginning of knowledge" (Pr 1:7).

VI. The Robbery and Riches of God (3:6–12)

A. The Neglect of the Tithe (3:6–9)

6–7 First there is a declaration of the immutability of God, the attribute of changelessness that ultimately preserves the nation from destruction. God keeps his promises to the patriarchs. He knows this evil generation will pass and that a God-fearing one will yet come to inherit the promises. God next explains why he does not answer the people's prayers: "You have turned away from my decrees." God is still pledged to give attention to those who earnestly seek him. The invitation to "return" (GK 8740), which could as well have been translated "repent" or "convert," was met with a cynical question: "How are we to return?" Malachi does not answer this question; his whole book and ministry tell how to get right with God.

8 Tithing (being fiscally responsible before God) is introduced by the blunt question "Will a man rob God?" Stealing means not only taking what is not yours but keeping back for yourself what belongs to someone else. In this case one-tenth of a man's income was due God; failure to pay that debt amounted to robbery (cf. Ac 5:1–11). The tenth of all produce as well as of flocks and cattle belonged to the Lord and was by him assigned to the Levites for their services (Nu 18:21, 24). It may be that the people's disobedience prompted some of the priestly grumbling that Malachi had earlier referred to. Nehemiah dealt with the same problem (Ne 10:32–39; 13:10). If Malachi predates the events of Ne 13, perhaps Malachi's words in v.8 had been heeded.

9 That God condemned the whole nation suggests that this "robbery" was a rather widespread abuse of his generosity. Most churches still fall under this indictment; their budgets are generally nowhere near ten percent of the members' income.

B. The Promise of Blessing (3:10–12)

10 The remedy for Israel was simply to start doing what was right—"bring the whole tithe into the storehouse." The temple served as a warehouse for the produce the Israelites brought. The Levites then distributed it for sacrificial purposes, for their own domestic needs, and for whatever emergencies arose. It should be emphasized that the OT tithe is not the upper limit. In the NT Christians are urged to "excel in this grace of giving" (2Co 8:7), remembering that they owe everything to the one who for their sake "made himself nothing" (Php 2:7; cf. 2Co 8:9). God offers his people the challenge of testing him. By this offer he virtually guarantees them a direct and abundant return on their investment. His "storehouse" of blessings is unlimited.

11–12 From a general statement of blessing, Malachi next specifies what form that blessing might take. Since he was dealing with an agrarian society, the "blessings" had to do with crops and the like. Then, as is always the case, there was a purpose for the blessing. Not merely would God's people be comfortable, healthy, and happy, but because of this the Lord's name would be honored. Whatever good happens to us should be turned into a testimony to the goodness of our God. Then unbelievers will note our blessedness and be drawn to our God.

VII. The Servants of the Lord (3:13–18)

A. The Faithless (3.13–15)

13–14 Once more, and for the last time, Malachi opens with a statement about what people said, followed by a question in which they imply that the charge is unfounded. The third element then follows: an elaboration and explanation of the charge. The sin concerned lack of trust in God. By innuendo, if not by outright statement, God was represented as unfair and the keeping of the law a useless exercise.

15 This verse is a restatement of the age-old question so prominent in the book of Job: Why do the evil prosper and the righteous suffer? Malachi did not answer the complaint immediately.

B. The Faithful (3:16–18)

16 Malachi portrays God as listening to those who feared him. What they were saying, we do not know; perhaps it was an expression of love and worship. Then comes the remarkable statement that "a scroll . . . was written in his presence concerning those who feared the LORD." This idea of God's keeping written records appears frequently in Scripture (cf. Ex 32:32; Ps 69:28; Isa 4:3; Da 12:1; Lk 10:20; Php 4:3; Heb 12:23; Rev 3:5; 13:8; 17:8; 20:12, 15; 21:27). Perhaps the most beautiful expression of the idea is in Isa 49:16: "See, I have engraved you on the palms of my hands."

17–18 God's people will be his very own, and he will spare them. On that day, when all wrongs are rectified and all wickedness punished, it will be apparent that God does judge justly and that he does make a distinction between those who serve him and those who do not.

VIII. The Day of the Lord (4:1–6)

1 The eschatological theme of the Day of the Lord looms large in the OT prophets (cf. Isa 13:6; Jer 46:10; Joel 2:31; Zep 1:14–2:3) and also appears in the NT (cf. Mt 24:3–25:46; Ro 2:5; 2Pe 3:10; Rev 16:14). It continues into the second half of this somber verse in which Malachi alternately reproves and warns. The picture is cosmological. Fire will be the agent of destruction on that day as was water in Noah's day.

The word for "arrogant" (GK 2294) is a relatively rare one, but Malachi uses it also in 3:15. So those "blessed" arrogant ones of the former reference will now be burned as stubble (cf. Am 2:9). The mention of roots and branches indicates the complete termination of growth. As with the two extremities of a plant, all the wicked—without exception—will be destroyed.

2–3 Verse 2 focuses on the blessed future of the righteous. "Sun" is capitalized in the KJV, giving rise to the idea that the figure is messianic. No use is made of this figure, however, in the NT. Therefore most modern translations have not capitalized "sun." The righteous, now enlightened and healed, will gambol like calves, frisking about in their new-found freedom. An added reward is that the righteous will trample the wicked on that great judgment day (cf. Mic 2:12–13).

4 Malachi now gives two somewhat unrelated "appendixes" to the book. The first is an injunction to heed the law of Moses. Malachi began with an illustration from Genesis (Jacob and Esau) and spent most of the first half of the book reminding priests and people of the need to keep the Mosaic Law. Now, close to the end of his book, he gives another terse reminder of their continuing obligation to those laws.

5–6 The second "appendix" (vv.5–6) relates to Elijah's coming to announce the Messiah's arrival. Elijah, as has already been stated, was John the Baptist (Mt 11:14; 17:12; Mk 9:11–13; Lk 1:17). His ministry was to prepare for the Day of the Lord and to "turn the hearts of the fathers to their children" and vice versa, "before that great and dreadful Day of the LORD." The first Christmas was a day of the Lord. So were all the other days when God stepped into history and did something extraordinary. But all these are preparatory for "that great and dreadful day" when the curtain will drop on world history and the Lord, who came the first time as Savior and Friend, will come as King and Judge.

The mission of reconciling families has been successful insofar as people have come to Christ. Where this has not happened, God will "strike the land with a curse." "Land" probably refers to the Promised Land, where God's people were dwelling. Through the Exile the land had been denied them; now they had it back, but still only on probation. If they failed to honor that land and him who gave it to them, it would be denied them. Malachi has set before Israel the age-old alternatives: respond to the God who loves them (1:2), or suffer the terrible consequences (4:1, 6).
